Since in the pecuniary cause which you propose has been moved between you and R. you have chosen to litigate not personally but through a syndic or representative, the oath against calumny will indeed have to be furnished through him. But if you litigate personally, it appears that an oath of this kind is to be exhibited by you with the Gospels merely set before you but not touched, as when giving testimony. (And below:)

§ 1. The penalty for one refusing this oath when it is to be furnished is that the claimant falls from the action instituted, while the defendant ought to be held as having confessed.

Title VIII: On Delays

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: Summarize thus, lest it appear to belong under the rubric on appeals: a citation that is both summons and peremptory ought not to be excessively brief, especially where ecclesiastical things are concerned, unless necessity suggests otherwise.

Alexander III, to the Bishops of Canterbury and Worcester.

Our beloved sons, the Abbot and Monks of H., took care to intimate to us that, when we committed to the Dean and Archdeacon of Lincoln for termination the cause pending between them and the nuns of Leden. concerning the church of Alten., they, fearing that they would be aggrieved by the aforesaid judges because at the first citation they established for them an excessively brief and peremptory term, appealed to our hearing; the judges nevertheless adjudged the aforesaid church to the aforesaid nuns. (And below:) But because it does not belong to the order of law to hasten a peremptory day in such a way, especially when ecclesiastical things are concerned, unless perhaps necessity presses, nor to promulgate sentence in such a way against those who contumaciously absent themselves—except that the opposing party be placed in possession, so that, affected by weariness, they may thus be compelled to stand in judgment—through apostolic writings we command your fraternity, by way of precept, that, if it is so, after revoking as void whatever you find attempted after an appeal of this kind, you proceed in the cause according to the tenor of the earlier letters.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: Deliberative adjournments are denied to a defendant if through the letters of citation he could have been fully instructed and could have deliberated concerning the matter in question.

Celestine III.

Furthermore, in your petition you added that, when causes are delegated to you by the Apostolic See, you insert the apostolic rescript in the letters of citation so that, after seeing it, the one sued by another may be able to deliberate. And when he comes not at the first and second canonical citation but only at the third, peremptory one—although the claimant comes at all the citations—and the claimant proposes his claim in court, the defendant, intent upon vexing him, then for the first time seeks deliberative adjournments, although the claimant offers him the authentic instrument so that he may compare it with the rescript which he received at the first citation, asserting also that during so long a span of citations he could, if he wished, have had time for full deliberation.

§ 1. Therefore, because you desire to be instructed about what is to be done in this case, we answer you in this way: when the defendant has been lawfully summoned to judgment in the aforesaid manner, if from the rescript transmitted to him he could have been fully instructed concerning the matter about which he is sued in judgment, deliberative adjournments are not [further] to be granted to him, but one is rather to proceed to examination of the cause and impose its due end. [Given at the Lateran, in the third year of our pontificate, 1193.]

Quia igitur, quid agendum sit in hoc casu desideras edoceri, taliter tibi respondemus, quod, praedicto modo reo ad iudicium legitime convocato, si ex rescripto sibi transmisso plene potuit instrui super eo, de quo in iudicio convenitur, induciae deliberatoriae [sibi] non sunt ulterius indulgendae, sed procedendum potius est ad examinationem causae, et finem et debitum imponendum. Chapter III

Latin source headnote: From the clarification of a general or ambiguous word placed in a complaint, new deliberative adjournments are not to be given if, from the things expressed, the defendant could deliberate concerning that ambiguity or generality. This is what it says.

Honorius III, to the Bishop of Ferentino.

Your letters and the petition of our beloved son, the priest of Saints Prisca and Aquila in the City, exhibited to us contained that, when we had considered that the cause pending between the same archpriest on one side and the noblemen Andrew of Alatri and G., and their brothers and sons, on the other, concerning certain possessions and other things, should be committed to you, the same priest offered against the noblemen A. and G., in the name of his church, a complaint containing that the pension from the said possessions had not been paid to that church, three years and more having now elapsed.

But when those noblemen petitioned that he explain to them the span which he intended to signify by this addition, "and more," and the priest expressed that payment of the said pension had ceased for seven years, the same noblemen, saying that the complaint had been changed by an expression of this kind, sought longer adjournments for deliberating. Because you denied these to them, they appealed to our hearing. Therefore, considering an appeal of this kind frivolous, we command your fraternity that, notwithstanding it entirely, you proceed in the business itself, reason leading the way, according to the contents of the earlier letters.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: If a person cited in an arduous cause is summoned from afar for the public utility, even to the place of judgment, in such a way that within the term of citation he could not deliberate and arrange the other things necessary for appearing, he is not compelled to answer at the term if he is found at the place of judgment, but will have new adjournments. This is what it says notably.

Gregory IX, to the Abbot of L'Eau Vive in the diocese of Tours and the Archdeacon of Tours.

The Archbishop of Bourges set forth to us—(And below:) We commanded the Archbishop of Bordeaux that, concerning the right of primacy which the said Archbishop of Bourges proposes that he has over him and his province, he should present himself before us, personally or through a suitable proctor, at the beginning of the recently past Lent, which we assigned him as a peremptory term. And when afterward, personally summoned for the support of the Roman Church, he approached our hearing, the said Archbishop of Bourges, established at the Apostolic See, urgently petitioned that we ought to proceed in the same business.

But the same Archbishop of Bordeaux, returning to his own lands, constituted a proctor for himself in that business who, preserving the exceptions belonging to him in answering, defending, and other matters, was to do everything which he would have done in his own person. Therefore, when the aforesaid archbishop petitioned that the proctor answer him, the latter proposed by way of exception that he was not bound to do this, since the said Archbishop of Bordeaux, having been summoned for another, greater cause—namely, for the public utility—ought to have been regarded as absent and to have possessed the privilege of being sent back home. Nor had he yet deliberated concerning this matter with his suffragans and others whose counsel so arduous a cause required, nor had he had time in which he could be prepared for both businesses as was expedient.

But the other party answered to the contrary that, since he had first been summoned concerning the aforesaid question, it had not been our intention to revoke the first mandate by the later one. He had also had so long a space of time that, if he had wished, he could have deliberated concerning the aforesaid cause, as he had done with certain persons, and conveniently attend to both businesses. (And below:) Therefore, with the counsel of our brothers, we considered that a further delay until the next coming feast of the Lord's Nativity should be granted to him.

> Si citatus in causa ardua de longinquo vocatur pro publica utilitate, etiam ad locum iudicii, ita, quod infra terminum citationis deliberare, et alia sibi necessaria ad comparendum explicare non potuit, in termino respondere non cogitur, si reperiatur in loco iudicii, sed habebit novas inducias. Quumque postmodum personaliter vocatus pro ecclesiae Romanae subsidio ad nostram audientiam accessisset, dictus Bituricensis archiepiscopus apud sedem apostolicam constitutus postulavit instanter, ut in eodem negotio procedere deberemus. Idem vero Burdegalensis archiepiscopus ad propria rediens constituit pro se procuratorem in ipso negotio, qui, salvis exceptionibus sibi competentibus in respondendo et defendendo ac aliis, omnia faceret, quae in propria erat persona facturus. Petente ergo archiepiscopo supradicto, ut praefatus procurator responderet eidem, ille excipiendo proproposuit, se ad hoc non teneri, quum pro alia maiori causa, pro publica scilicet utilitate, dictus Burdegalensis vocatus, pro absente reputari debuerat et revocandi domum privilegium habuisset. Nondum etiam super hoc deliberaverat cum suffraganeis suis et aliis, quorum consilium tam ardua causa requirit, nec tempus habuerat, in quo ad utrumque negotium valuerit, sicut expediret, esse paratus. Sed pars altera econtra respondit, quod, quum super quaestione praedicta prius fuerit evocatus, nostrae intentionis non fuerat primum mandatum per posterius revocare. Temporis quoque spatium habuerat tam prolixum, ut potuisset, si voluisset, super causa deliberare praedicta, sicut fecerat cum quibusdam, et commode utrique negotio imminere. (Et infra:) Nos igitur de consilio fratrum nostrorum usque ad proximum venturum festum Nativitatis dominicae dilationem adhuc sibi duximus indulgendam.

Title IX: On Judicial Vacations

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: On Sundays one ought not to trade, litigate, judge, or swear, but they ought to be celebrated from evening to evening.

From the Council at Compiègne.

We decree that all Sundays be observed from evening to evening with every reverence, and that persons abstain from every unlawful work, so that on them no market at all is held, nor any judicial hearing, nor is anyone judged to death or punishment, nor are oaths furnished except for peace or some other necessity.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: The beginning and end of feasts ought to be determined according to their importance and the custom of the region. This is the first point. On the principal feasts and between Easter and Pentecost no solemn bending of the knees is made. If, however, clerics or bishops are then ordained, the knees are bent according to the manner of the ordination. This is the second point. The Roman Church does not keep a special feast of the Trinity; nevertheless, the custom of each church concerning this is preserved. This is the third point.

Alexander III.

Because in the region—(And below:) We wish your prudence to hold with certain knowledge that, although it is written, "From evening to evening you shall celebrate your sabbaths," nevertheless the beginning and end of feasts ought to be considered according to their character and according to the custom of the various regions; and, just as the importance of the days requires them to be celebrated, so by true reason they appear to begin earlier and to end later. (And below:)

1. On Sundays, however, and on other principal feasts, or between Easter and Pentecost, a bending of the knees ought by no means to be made, unless someone out of devotion wishes to do this in private.
2. But at the consecrations of bishops and the ordinations of clerics, only the consecrator and the person consecrated may bend their knees, according as the manner of consecration requires.
3. Furthermore, according to the customs of various regions, the feast of the Holy Trinity has customarily been celebrated by some on the octave of Pentecost, by others on the first Sunday before the Advent of the Lord. The Roman Church, however, does not have it as its usage to celebrate a special feast of this kind at any time, since every day "Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Spirit," and other similar things pertaining to the praise of the Trinity, are said. Wherefore, brother archbishop, we have by no means been able to give you a certain answer concerning the use of the pallium on the day on which the feast of the Holy Trinity is celebrated.

> Festorum principium et finis fieri debet secundum ipsorum magnitudinem et consuetudinem regionis. Hoc primo. In praecipuis festis et intra Pascha et Pentecosten non fit solennis genuum flexio. Si tamen tunc clerici vel episcopi ordinentur, secundum ordinationis modum genua flectuntur. Hoc secundo. Romana ecclesia speciale festum de Trinitate non facit; servatur tamen de hoc cuiusque ecclesiae consuetudo. Hoc tertio.
> Alexander III.
>
> Quoniam in parte (Et infra:) Vestram volumus prudentiam certa cognitione tenere, quoniam, Licet scriptum sit, de vespera in vesperam celebrabitis sabbata vestra, festorum tamen principium et finis iuxta eorum qualitatem et iuxta diversarum regionum consuetudinem debet attendi, et, sicut magnitudo dierum exigit celebrari, sic prius incipere, et tardius terminari vera ratione videntur. (Et infra:) 1. Diebus autem dominicis et aliis praecipuis festivitatibus, sive inter Pascha et Pentecosten, genuum flexio nequaquam debet fieri, nisi aliquis ex devotione id velit facere in secreto. 2. In consecrationibus autem episcoporum et clericorum ordinationibus consecrans et consecratus tantum genua flectere possunt, secundum quod consecratioinis modus requirit. 3. Praeterea festivitas sanctae Trinitatis secundum consuetudines diversarum regionum a quibusdam consuevit in octavis Pentecostes, ab aliis in dominica prima ante Adventum Domini celebrari. Ecclesia siquidem Romana in usu non habet, quod in aliquo tempore huiusmodi celebret specialiter festivitatem, quum singulis diebus Gloria Patri et Filio et Spiritui sancto et cetera similia dicantur ad laudem pertinentia Trinitatis. Quare tibi, frater archiepiscope de usu pallii eo die, quo sanctae Trinitatis festivitas celebratur, certum nequaquam potuimus dare responsum.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: On account of the necessity of sustenance, it is permissible on feast days established in honor of God to attend to servile work, especially concerning a thing liable to perish with time. This is what it says.

The same, to the Archbishop of Trier.

Although the page of both the Old and the New Testament has specially assigned the seventh day to human rest, and the Church has decreed that both it and other days assigned to the Most High Majesty, as well as the birthdays of the holy martyrs, are to be observed, and that on these one must cease from every servile work, nevertheless we, to whom the governance of the Church has been entrusted by the Provider of all, are bound fittingly to provide for the faithful of Christ concerning those things which necessity requires, so that, if at any time it should happen that they attend, not to servile work—that is, to the doing of sin—but perhaps to seeking things necessary for food and clothing, we will that the providence of the Apostolic See come to their aid with its accustomed mercy. Hence indeed it is that, knowing from the reports of many that your region does not abound in many crops and that the sea, in which the people have customarily had their greater sustenance, has become more barren than usual, by the authority of blessed Peter and our own we grant that, on Sundays and other feast days, except on the greater solemnities of the year, if herrings have approached the land, it may be lawful for your parishioners, under the pressure of necessity, to attend to catching them, yet in such a way that, after the catch has been made, they make a fitting portion for the neighboring churches and the poor of Christ. If, however, those who are bound by a penance imposed upon them to pass certain days on bread and water do not have bread on which to feed, let them, if necessity requires, be refreshed with fish or other foods, moderate discretion nevertheless being employed, so that they use these not for delicacies, but only for necessary sustenance.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: The three weeks during which the canon prohibits weddings from being held before the feast of John the Baptist are not continuous with the feast, but are understood to mean the week of the Ascension together with the two following weeks.

Clement III, otherwise Celestine III.

Your chaplain, brother bishop, proposed before us on your behalf that, since the canonical statutes declare that weddings ought by no means to be celebrated during the three weeks before the feast of the Nativity of blessed John the Baptist, some understand those weeks to be continuous without interruption. Others, however, wishing to make an interval between the feast and those weeks, say that this was established out of reverence for the feast of Pentecost, which is sometimes accustomed to fall within these weeks; and thus, beginning from the three Rogation Days before the Ascension of the Lord and extending to the eighth day after Pentecost, those weeks being counted, they do not permit weddings to be celebrated during that space of time alone, but by no means prohibit their celebration thereafter.

Therefore, because we were consulted as to which of these opinions appears the stronger, it appeared to us and our brothers that, although this has been the custom of the Roman Church, observed from long-past times, that at whatever time a marriage is contracted with a legitimate consent in the present tense intervening—nevertheless, because weddings are not permitted to be celebrated from Septuagesima until seven days after Pentecost, and afterward they are celebrated without distinction even within three weeks or more before the feast of Saint John, the latter opinion rests upon better and subtler reason. And whether, according to the canons, weddings are suspended from Septuagesima until after the octave of Easter, or, according to the custom of the Roman Church, until after the seven days of the feast of Pentecost, which has no octave, they may lawfully be celebrated on the following Sunday and thereafter.

> Tres septimanae, quibus canon prohibet fieri nuptias ante festum Ioannis Baptistae, non continuantur festo, sed intelligitur de septimana Ascensionis cum duabus sequentibus.
> Clemens III. alias Coelestinus.
>
> Capellanus tuus, frater episcope, coram nobis ex parte tua proposuit, quod, quum statuta canonica declarent nuptias tribus septimanis ante festum Nativitatis B. Ioannis Baptistae minime celebrari debere, quidam hebdomadas illas absque interpellatione continuandas intelligunt. Alii vero inter festum et ipsas volentes facere intervallum, illud dicunt ob reverentiam festivitatis Pentecostes fuisse statutum, quae in septimanis istis solet intervenire quandoque, et sic a tribus diebus rogationum ante Ascensionem Domini inchoantes, usque ad octavum diem post Pentecosten, illis hebdomadis computatis, illo tantum spatio temporis celebrari nuptias non permittunt, earum celebrationem abinde nullatenus inhibentes. Quia ergo consulti fuimus, utra istarum opinionum potior videatur, nobis et fratribus nostris apparuit, quod, licet ea sit Romanae ecclesiae consuetudo a longis retro temporibus observata, ut quocunque tempore matrimonium contrahatur consensu interveniente legitimo de praesenti, quia tamen a septuagesima usque ad septem dies post Pentecosten celebrari nuptiae non sinuntur, et postea etiam tribus septimanis vel pluribus ante festivitatem sancti Ioannis sine differentia celebrantur, posterior sententia meliori et subtiliori nititur ratione, et, sive secundum canones a septuagesimae usque post octavas Paschae, sive iuxta consuetudinem ecclesiae Romanae usque post septem dies festi Pentecostes, quod caret octavis, nuptiae suspendantur, in dominica, quae sequitur, et deinceps possunt licite celebrari.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: On judicial vacations introduced in honor of God and the saints, judgment cannot be exercised, even with the consent of the parties, unless by reason of necessity or piety; the parties can, however, renounce judicial vacations introduced for the benefit of human beings.

Gregory IX.

He complained to us—(And below:) Although questions ought not to be prolonged but dispatched, nevertheless judicial clamor ought to be quieted on feast days, which are known to have been established out of reverence for God, namely: the Nativity of the Lord; Saint Stephen; John the Evangelist; the Holy Innocents; Saint Sylvester; the Circumcision; the Epiphany; the seven days of the Lord's Passion; the Resurrection with the seven following days; the Ascension; Pentecost with the two days which follow; the Nativity of John the Baptist; all the feasts of the glorious Virgin; the Twelve Apostles, and especially Peter and Paul; blessed Lawrence; the Dedication of blessed Michael; the solemnity of All Saints; Sundays; and the other solemnities which the individual bishops, together with clergy and people, shall have determined are to be solemnly venerated in their dioceses. On these solemn judicial vacations it is assuredly fitting to abstain from things of this kind—unless necessity urges or piety counsels—to such a degree that, even if the parties consent, neither shall proceedings conducted be valid, nor a sentence which happens to be promulgated on days of this kind; although on judicial vacations which are granted on account of vintages or harvests because of human needs, proceedings may be conducted if this has proceeded from the will of the parties.

> In feriis introductis in honorem Dei et sanctorum, nisi ob necessitatem vel pietatem, iudicium exerceri non potest, etiam de consensu partium; feriis tamen introductis favore hominum partes renunciare possunt.

Gregorius IX.

Conquestus est nobis (Et infra:) Quamvis non prorogari, sed expediri deceat quaestiones, debet tamen iudicialis strepitus diebus conquiescere feriatis, qui ob reverentiam Dei noscuntur esse statuti, scilicet Natalis Domini, sancti Stephani, Ioannis Evangelistae, Innocentium, sancti Silvestri, Circumcisionis, Epiphaniae, VII. diebus dominicae Passionis, Resurrectionis cum VII. sequentibus, Ascensionis, Pentecostes cum duobus, qui sequuntur, Nativitatis Ioannis Baptistae, festivitatum omnium Virginis gloriosae, XII. Apostolorum, et praecipue Petri et Pauli, beati Laurentii, dedicationis beati Michaelis, solennitatis omnium sanctorum, ac diebus dominicis, ceterisque solennitatibus, quas singuli episcopi in suis dioecesibus cum clero et populo duxerint solenniter venerandas, quibus utique solennibus feriis, nisi necessitas urgeat vel pietas suadeat, usque adeo convenit ab huiusmodi abstinere, ut, consentientibus etiam partibus, nec processus habitus teneat, nec sententia, quam contingit diebus huiusmodi promulgari, licet diebus feriatis, qui gratia vindemiarum vel messium ob necessitates hominum indulgentur, procedi valeat, si de partium processerit voluntate.

Title X: On the Order of Judicial Inquiry

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: Against a woman claiming someone as her husband, an exception of consanguinity is admitted, which must be discussed before judgment is pronounced concerning the marriage; and it is sufficient to pronounce upon the principal matter itself. This is what it says.

Clement III, to the Bishop of Alatri.

We have understood from your letters that, when a certain woman claimed a certain man as her husband, she produced witnesses in support of her contention; through them the man's party, fearing future prejudice to itself, interposed an exception of consanguinity, by which it maintains that the woman's petition is entirely defeated. Because you wished to consult us as to whether the impediment of consanguinity should be dealt with before sentence is rendered upon the matrimonial cause, we have considered that your inquiry should be answered in this way: since, when the exception is proved, the principal question is extinguished, cognizance must be taken of the exception before proceeding to the point of definition. When this has been done, you shall absolve the man from the woman's attack, as the reason of law requires.

DE ORDINE COGNITIONUM.

Contra mulierem vindicantem aliquem in maritum admittitur exceptio consanguinitatis, quae prius discutienda est, quam super matrimonio pronuncietur, et sufficit super ipso principali pronunciare. H. d.

Clemens III. Alatrino Episcopo.

Intelleximus ex literis tuis, quod, quum quaedam mulier peteret quendam in virum, testes ad suae intentionis assertionem induxit, per quos pars viri futurum sibi praeiudicium metuens, exceptionem consanguinitatis obiecit, ex qua intendit petitionem mulieris prorsus elidi. Quia vero nos consulere voluisti, an prius sit de impedimento consanguinitatis agendum, quam super causa matrimonii sententia proferatur, Inquisitioni tuae taliter duximus respondendum, quod, quum exceptione probata quaestio principalis perimatur, ante est cognoscendum de ipsa, quam ad diffinitionis articulum procedatur. Quo facto virum ab impetitione mulieris, prout exposcit ratio iuris, absolvas.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: If a defendant objects that the plaintiff is a despoiler, he does so either by excepting, and then he is heard first and, when this is proved, is not compelled to answer, but is not restored by this; or by bringing an action, and then both questions are determined together, and when it is proved he will be restored.

Innocent III, to the Bishop of Narni.

When the beloved son, the Abbot of Ferentillo, had approached our presence, complaining of the noblemen O. and A., his brother, and the sons of R., lords of Arrone, the parties being established in our presence, we appointed as auditors our beloved sons I., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Mary across the Tiber, and G., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Pudentiana. In their presence the abbot set forth his complaint: that the aforesaid nobles, without any previous demand, coming with armed force and an army to the monastery's castle of Ferentillo and Gabio, had presumed to damage the said monastery, through seizures of animals, burning of crops, captures of men, homicides committed, and other losses up to the amount of five hundred Lucchese pounds, apart from the slaughter of men and the injuries inflicted; and he requested that justice be done for him concerning these and likewise other matters which he wished to propose against them.

Before joinder of issue it was answered against him in the form of an exception that, since the abbot himself had promised the noblemen O. and R., under an oath furnished, that he would assist them against all men—except the Roman Pontiff, the emperor, and their legates—to retain what they then held in castles, villages, and other goods, and to recover it without fraud or evil contrivance if they lost any of it, through his deceit and violence they had fraudulently lost the castle of Sirati, which both their ancestors had held and they themselves had possessed in peace. [Although he had often been admonished by them concerning this, he refused to restore it to them. Indeed, rather, in breach of the compact, he and his men had plundered in animals, spoils, and other household goods the three villages—namely Quadraginta, Casale, and Carpium—which the said abbot had received under safeguard for himself and his party; married women had been shamefully treated and women also harshly beaten. He even caused a priest, with his hands bound behind his back, to be led before him, afflicted with blows and wholly stripped of his garments. He also caused the men of the villages to be shut in prison, where it happened that one of them expired. The abbot also caused fire to be set by night to the castle in which the said nobles dwelt; through this, in the aforesaid losses and many others, they said that they had been despoiled of as much as one hundred marks.] They therefore petitioned to be restored before they answered his petitions, especially since they had witnesses present through whom they wished to prove their contention immediately, and they endeavored to show by the authorities of both laws that restitution ought to be made to the despoiled before entry upon the cause.

But on the abbot's behalf it was replied as follows: that his libellus ought first to be answered according to the rule of law by which it is said, "Let him who first calls another to judgment first proceed"; that restitution could not be sought from one who had not been the despoiler, especially since the said castle pertained to the right and ownership of his monastery, which the adverse party did not deny at all; and hence that the true owner, to whom his own thing returns from another by whom it is possessed, even after rather long periods, ought to obtain the advantage of retention, while the restitutory judgment is known to lie only against a despoiler. Nor could restitution be demanded for losses inflicted, but a competent action ought to be brought for them; otherwise, since the abbot's party also complained that very grave losses had been inflicted upon it, those losses would first have had to be restored, if restitution were to be made for matters of this kind according to the tenor of the aforesaid rule. They also asserted that the chapters speaking of restitution to be made have place in criminal matters and when someone is despoiled by an adversary and is sued concerning the very thing of which he had been despoiled. Moreover, the adverse party said that the rule introduced by the abbot's party has place in mutual petitions, since causes treated in turn are afterward determined by one sentence. But when one party proposes that something is owed to it by way of restitution or in some other manner, and the other asserts by way of exception that it has been despoiled and will by no means answer before its own restitution, it asserted that cognizance must first be taken of the incidental matter.

We, however, believe that a distinction must be made as to whether the question of spoliation is raised by those nobles by way of an action for seeking restitution, or in the form of an exception for repelling the opponent's contention. For when it is proposed by way of an action, the mutual petitions are understood not to touch one another, as being distinct; and consequently, in accordance with the aforesaid rule of law by which it is said, "Let him who first calls another to judgment first proceed," the one which was proposed first would be treated first, although, when both had been brought into the same proceeding and treated in turn, they would be determined together by the same sentence. But because that question was raised by those nobles only by way of an exception, by the common counsel of our brothers we pronounced by an interlocutory judgment that their proofs concerning that exception should first be heard; and, when it had been lawfully proved, they should not be compelled to answer the abbot concerning the aforesaid petitions until they were restored by him, since one despoiled is by no means compelled to answer his despoiler before restitution.

1. Yet when spoliation has been proved only by way of an exception, restitution is not to be made by this fact, just as, if some crime is alleged against a witness by way of an exception so that he may thus be repelled from testimony, even if [thus] the crime has been proved against him civilly, the ordinary penalty is not therefore inflicted upon him, but credence is merely not given to his testimony. This occurs for the reason that an accusation is not proceeding against him. Nor are witnesses whose testimony is rejected held among the infamous as though on account of false testimony. [But when, etc. Given at Amelia on the third day before the Nones of October, 1198.]

> Si reus contra actorem spoliatorem spoliationem opponit, aut excipiendo, et tunc prius auditur, et ea probata respondere non cogitur, sed per hoc non restituitur; aut agendo, et tunc simul utraque quaestio terminatur, et ea probata restituetur.

Nos autem distinguendum esse credimus, utrum spoliationis quaestio ab eisdem nobilibus sit obiecta in modum actionis ad restitutionem petendam, an in forma exceptionis ad intentionem adversarii repellendam; quum, ea in modum actionis proposita, intelligantur mutuae petitiones sese tanquam diversae minime contingentes, ac per hoc iuxta regulam iuris praemissam, qua dicitur: qui prior appellat prior agat, quae prius esset proposita prius foret tractanda, quanquam in idem iudicium ambae deductae vicissimque tractatae simul essent eadem sententia terminandae. Sed quoniam quaestio illa fuit ab eisdem nobilibus tantum in modum exceptionis obiecta, de communi fratrum nostrorum consilio interloquendo pronunciavimus, ut probationes eorum super ipsa exceptione primitus audirentur, et ea probata legitime abbati non cogerentur respondere super petitionibus memoratis, donec restituerentur ab ipso, quum spoliatori spoliatus ante restitutionem non cogatur ullatenus respondere. 1. Verum spoliatione in modum exceptionis tantum probata non est per hoc restitutio facienda, quemadmodum, si in modum exceptionis aliquod crimen testi obiicitur, ut sic a testimonio repellatur, etsi [sic] crimen contra eum civiliter probatum fuerit, non ideo sibi poena infligitur ordinaria, sed eius duntaxat testimonio non creditur, quod ea ratione contingit, quoniam in ipsum accusatio non procedit. Testes etiam, quorum testimonium reprobatur, inter infames quasi ex falso testimonio non habentur. [*Quum autem etc. Dat. Ameliae III. Non. Oct. *1198.]

Latin source headnote: Against one seeking an inheritance there lies an exception concerning birth, which must first be determined before the ecclesiastical judge. This is what it says according to the gloss, with the understanding that the inheritance here had first been sought before the secular judge, and an exception had been taken concerning illegitimacy.

Honorius III, to Louis, King of the Franks.

We do not believe it escapes your prudence that the cause concerning the birth of our dearest daughter in Christ, the illustrious Queen of Cyprus, since it pertains to the ecclesiastical forum, has long since been brought to our examination. Hence we took care to admonish by our letters Philip, king of the Franks of illustrious memory, your father, that if the queen herself should perhaps propose before him a question concerning succession to the county of Champagne, he should not hear it until the aforesaid cause concerning her birth, upon which that question is known to depend, had been determined. Therefore, although, as we wrote to your father, we wish the queen herself to be heard in her just petitions, nevertheless, because to begin the cause of succession dependent upon it before the cause concerning birth had been determined would be nothing other than to entangle the business in diverse proceedings and to disturb the order of judgment by a certain confusion, if perhaps you are requested concerning this by the queen herself, or by her messenger or any other person, you shall wait patiently until the aforesaid cause concerning birth has received its end by apostolic judgment. [Given at the Lateran on the seventeenth day before the Kalends of December, in the eighth year of our pontificate. 1223.]

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: One bringing a possessory action for recovery is not bound before restitution to answer his despoilers, except concerning the question of spoliation; he can nevertheless be repelled from bringing the action by an exception of spoliation. This is what it says.

Gregory IX.

A person sued concerning spoliation is not to be heard against one seeking restitution—unless he brings a counterclaim against him concerning the question of spoliation—since a petition for restitution is known to be privileged in this respect: one instituting it is not compelled before restitution to answer his despoilers, although he may be repelled from bringing the action when the spoliation is proposed by them by way of an exception.

Title XI: On Excessive Claims

Sole Chapter

Latin source headnote: It sets down the four modes of claiming too much and the penalties of those who claim too much.

Gregory IX.

It cannot be called the counsel of prudence that you demanded from your adversary before the term the money owed to you. For the importunity of those claiming too much is punished if they have determined to persist in judgment with their petition, in such a way that those who, without cause, seek more in respect of the thing are condemned in expenses to the adversary.

1. Those who claim too much in respect of place are liable for the interest, because the advantage which the debtors would have had if they had paid at the appointed place is taken from them.
2. For him from whom more is sought in respect of time, the delays are doubled, nor shall he undertake the lawsuit unless his expenses are paid to him.
3. We do not believe that you doubt that too much is sought in respect of cause when something is owed generically or under an alternative and it happens that a specific thing or one thing precisely is sought.
4. In respect of the thing, however, when ten are owed and twenty are demanded.
5. In respect of place, when someone is sued, not where it was agreed that he should pay, but elsewhere.
6. In respect of time, when what is owed is sought before the day or the condition.

Title XII: On the Cause of Possession and Ownership

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: The cause of possession and ownership ought to be determined before one and the same judge, nor is judgment to be pronounced against an absent person.

Gregory I, to the Duke of Sicily.

Having received [the letters of your Magnitude, we were saddened that you indicated that certain possessions, which you say you held, had been unreasonably occupied by the agents of the Church of Syracuse. But we believe that this did not come to the knowledge of our brother and fellow bishop John. For, once the truth was known, whatever had been unlawfully done could readily be corrected. And therefore, because] it has been decreed by legal provision that both the cause of momentary possession and the cause concerning ownership ought to be heard before one and the same judge, and we cannot determine anything against a party who has not been heard, [to the aforesaid brother, etc. Given in the month of October, in the second indiction. 598.]

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: If proceedings have been conducted in both the possessory and the petitory action, the judge, after receiving the proofs concerning both, may first discuss the proofs concerning the possessory action and determine it. This is what it says.

Celestine III.

Finally, we were asked whether judges appointed to take cognizance of possession and ownership, wishing to spare the parties heavy expenses, may hear the allegations concerning both intermingled and likewise admit the witnesses, and thereafter first hear the attestations concerning possession and pronounce according to their tenor; and whether this is lawfully done. We answer that it may lawfully be done, since this is expressed in the civil law.

illarum utrum licite hoc agatur. Nos autem quum hoc sit in iure civili expressum, quod licite possit fieri, respondemus.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: If a person who has been despoiled, bringing the possessory and petitory actions together, proves possession and spoliation but not lordship or ownership, he prevails in the possessory action but fails in the petitory.

Innocent III, to the Archbishop and Canons of Sutri.

When the Church of Sutri was without a pastor, you came together and, as is customary, after the grace of the Holy Spirit had been invoked, unanimously elected a pastor, petitioning that his election be confirmed by the Apostolic See. But the beloved sons, the clergy of the conventual churches of that same city, afterward laid their complaint against you before us: that, since they and their predecessors had been accustomed to take part in making episcopal elections, you presumed, while they were unwilling, resisting, and excluded, to proceed to make the election; and for that reason they petitioned that it not be confirmed, but rather annulled.

Therefore, when the parties had been established before the Apostolic See for a question of this kind, we gave them as auditors our beloved sons B., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Peter in Chains, I., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Prisca, and the cardinal deacon of the title of Saint Mary in Cosmedin. In the presence of these auditors witnesses were produced on both sides, and, their depositions having been published, the party of the canons said that by the witnesses whom they had produced their contention—that the election pertained to them alone—had been sufficiently proved. The party of the clergy nevertheless asserted that by the statements of the witnesses whom they had produced they too had more fully proved their assertion that they ought to take part in the election of bishops; through these statements, they said, it was established that they had been present with the canons of the cathedral church at the elections of the three bishops who had last and immediately presided over the Church of Sutri, and that they had possessed with the others a voice in electing.

We therefore, having heard the allegations and reasons of the parties and having diligently inspected the depositions themselves, because we clearly discovered that your witnesses had been inconsistent in giving their testimony and had wavered before the said auditors against the credibility of their attestation, as those auditors afterward reported to us, and because they were endeavoring in a certain manner to establish a negative—wishing to prove that the right of election pertained indeed to you in such a way that it by no means pertained to your adversaries—while it was sufficiently shown by the witnesses of the adverse party that in the elections of the three bishops mentioned above the clergy had been present and had possessed a voice in electing, by the counsel of our brothers we decreed that the aforesaid election, made while they contradicted and were excluded, should be annulled, restoring the often-mentioned clergy to that quasi-possession which they had held before the controversy was moved.

Yet because in the aforesaid question whatever right either party had in the election appeared to have been brought into judgment, since it is provided by the civil law that not only that which it was intended should come into judgment does come into judgment, but that does not come into judgment concerning which it was expressly intended that it should not come; and since, according to the canonical statutes, the elections of bishops are known regularly to pertain to the clergy of cathedral churches unless perhaps a special custom obtains otherwise in some place; and since the aforesaid clergy could not acquire for themselves the right of electing from the fact that they had proved that they had taken their place among those electing the bishops of Sutri on three occasions, because of the brevity of a time not extending to lawful prescription; and since, when the plaintiff does not prove his case, the person sued will prevail even if he has furnished nothing—we have considered that you should be absolved from their attack concerning elections to be made, imposing perpetual silence concerning this upon the often-mentioned clergy of the churches. [Therefore let no one, etc. Given at the Lateran on the seventh day before the Ides of February, 1200.]

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: With respect to its sense, this says the same thing as the immediately preceding decretal.

The same, to the Canons of Bethlehem.

When, concerning the election of the Church of Bethlehem, a question was being conducted between R., our subdeacon, and P., canon of the Lord's Sepulchre, recently in our presence, each conducting himself as the elect—since the aforesaid subdeacon had been confirmed by our venerable brother, the Patriarch of Jerusalem, while the other enjoyed royal favor—we gave them as auditors our beloved sons P., cardinal priest of the Basilica of the Twelve Apostles, I., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Stephen on the Coelian Hill, and G., cardinal deacon of Saint Mary in the Portico. In their presence, witnesses having been received on each side and their depositions published, they faithfully and prudently reported to us and our brothers what had been alleged on this side and that. But we, having been sufficiently instructed concerning the merits of the cause both through the cardinals' reports and through the acts, after sharing the counsel of our brothers, decreed, by the mediation of justice, that the person who had proved that he had been despoiled by secular power should be restored. Yet because both the possessory and also the petitory matter had been brought into judgment, and both the question of restitution and that of election had been fully argued, and because it was established to us that the election of each had been less than canonical, since a judge ought to pronounce upon even the matter of which he has taken cognizance, we considered that both elections should be annulled by sentence according to the canonical sanctions. Chapter V

Latin source headnote: One who brings an action concerning ownership may, before the conclusion of the cause, bring a possessory action for acquiring or recovering possession; but after conclusion and before sentence he cannot do this unless a just cause is present.

The same, to the Bishop of Noyon.

You pursue the duty of pastoral office with a solicitous mind when, inflamed by zeal for justice, you humbly seek and devotedly await, through the oracle of the Apostolic See—from which the authority of your jurisdiction depends—answers concerning doubtful points of law, lest perhaps a new diversity of opinions or an exception of law distinguished by novel variation should produce, not the effect of law, but rather bring about a failure of justice. Indeed, as you informed us through your letters, it sometimes happens that, when one who asserts that he has been despoiled brings his despoiler into a cause and, being asked at the very beginnings of the law which judgment he prefers to employ, enters the lawsuit concerning ownership without making any mention of the violence inflicted upon him, then, when the proceeding in the cause has advanced so far that witnesses have been produced on this side and that, he endeavors to begin a new judgment concerning the possessory matter, saying that one who has begun to vindicate a thing does not appear to renounce the possessory judgment. It is resisted on the other side that, when he voluntarily proposed the complaint concerning ownership, he created prejudice against himself in the question of possession, which according to the order of law could and ought first to have been proposed and determined. Your fraternity therefore asked what is to be established in these matters. We, however, answer your consultation in this way:

The possessory judgment which is proposed for recovering or acquiring possession may indeed be employed by one who has begun to vindicate the thing before the petitory judgment first instituted has been renounced or concluded. For it has been established by legal provision that one who has vindicated land from the person against whom he could have proceeded by the interdict unde vi may nevertheless institute the interdict while the judgment is pending; the other possessory judgments, which by their nature precede the vindication of ownership, are to remain in their force.

But if the petitory judgment has been renounced or concluded, so that the cause concerning ownership can now be determined by the decision of a definitive sentence, the possessory judgment is not to be employed while the cause remains undecided, lest lawsuits be heaped upon lawsuits and a way be opened to frauds—unless the judge who takes cognizance of the cause should see that this is expedient for a just cause, as, for example, when the inequity of the invader is readily inferred from manifest indications and a mischance or malice has taken from the despoiled person the faculty of proving ownership. Therefore, having considered these and other causes which contain equity or justly move the mind of the judge, we do not deny that, even after the cause has been concluded, a possessory action may be brought. [Given at the Lateran on the fifth day before the Kalends of June. 1202.]

Sane, sicut nobis per tuas literas intimasti, contingit aliquando, ut, quum is, qui se asserit spoliatum, suum trahit spoliatorem in causam, inter ipsa iuris auspicia requisitus, quo malit experiri iudicio, litem proprietatis ingreditur, de illata sibi violentia nullam faciens mentionem. Quum autem adeo fuerit in causa processum, ut testes sint hinc inde producti, novum iudicium super possessorio nititur inchoare, dicens, quia non videtur possessorio renunciare iudicio qui rem coeperit vindicare. Cui ex adverso resistitur, quia, dum querelam proprietatis sponte proposuit, praeiudicium sibi fecit in quaestione possessionis, quam secundum iuris ordinem prius proponi licuit et debuit terminari. Quid igitur in his statuendum sit, tua fraternitas requisivit. Nos autem Consultationi tuae taliter respondemus, quod possessorio quidem iudicio, quod de recuperanda seu adipiscenda possessione proponitur, antequam renunciatum sit, aut conclusum in proprietatis iudicio primitus instituto, agi potest ab eo, qui rem coeperit vindicare, quum legali sit provisione statutum, eum, qui fundum vindicaverit ab eo, cum quo interdicto unde vi potuit experiri, pendente iudicio interdictum posse nihilominus intentare, aliis possessoriis iudiciis in suo robore duraturis, quae vendicationem dominii sui natura praecedunt. Si vero renunciatum fuerit vel conclusum, ut iam possit causa proprietatis diffinitivae sententiae calculo terminari, ne lites litibus inculcentur, et via possit fraudibus aperiri, causa non decisa possessorio non erit utendum, nisi iudex, qui de causa cognoscit, hoc ipsum ex iusta causa viderit expedire, puta quum ex perspicuis indiciis facile arguitur iniquitas invasoris, et spoliato casu seu malitia probandi dominium subtraxerit facultatem. His igitur et aliis causis inspectis, quae continent aequitatem aut iuste moverint animum iudicantis, postquam etiam conclusum fuerit, posse agi possessorio iudicio non negamus. [*Dat. Lat. V. Kal. Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: If proceedings have been conducted in the petitory and possessory actions together, they are determined by one sentence, and the possessory is put first in the determination; but the petitory prevails in execution.

The same, to the Bishop and Official of Saint Andrews.

When the beloved son—(And below: [Cf. c. 6, On Arbitrators, I. 43.]) To the fourth question, however, we answer briefly that, when proceedings have been conducted concerning the possessory and petitory matters together, both ought to be determined by one sentence. But although possession is to be placed first in the pronouncement, ownership ought nevertheless to prevail in the execution. [Although, however, etc. Given at the Lateran on the thirteenth day before the Kalends of April, in the tenth year [of our pontificate]. 1207.]

Latin source headnote: A benefice is adjudged to the person who proved that his collator was in possession of conferring it at the time of the collation; by this, however, the unsuccessful party is not prohibited from bringing an action concerning ownership of the right of conferring against the collator himself. The same, to the Bishop of Verona.

When formerly the question which existed between the beloved son, the archdeacon, on the one side, and the archpriest and canons of the Church of Vicenza on the other—(And below:) Therefore, when the aforesaid archdeacon faithfully recounted these things before us, because it was clearly established to us through the same attestations that the archdeaconry itself had been assigned without any protest of the canons by the bishops of Vicenza to the two archdeacons who had successively preceded him; and because the aforesaid canons ought not to have refused the judges or requested a copy of the rescript, since the cause had been delegated to the aforesaid judges with the assent of the proctors of both parties, and the rescript had been obtained by those same proctors, nor ought they to have sought delays for deliberation when issue had been joined before the Apostolic See through the proctors of both parties—we took care to adjudge the aforesaid archdeaconry to him by definitive sentence, notwithstanding exceptions of this kind, imposing perpetual silence upon the canons of Vicenza who contradicted the same archdeacon concerning the stall assigned to the archdeacon and his other appurtenances. Nevertheless, the question of ownership concerning the collation of the archdeaconry itself was reserved to them, if perhaps they should wish to contend concerning this against the Bishop of Vicenza, since a matter conducted between others ought not to generate prejudice against them. Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: If one seeking a thing fails on one ground, he will be able to seek it on another ground. This is what it says according to the letter. Or thus: For one seeking a thing by right of ownership, it is not sufficient to prove possession. This is what it says in relation to the title.

Honorius III, to the Abbot of Saint Cyprian in the Diocese of Torcello and the Abbot of Saint Mary the New in Venice.

In the cause which was conducted between our venerable brothers, the Patriarch of Grado and the Bishop of Castello, on the one side, and the abbot and convent of the monastery of Saint George in Venice, concerning the subjection of that monastery, on the other, we found it proved for the same patriarch that he was received processionally in that monastery with incense, holy water, and an icon; that when he returned from the step, the bells were rung there, as in the other churches of the city; and, among other things, that the abbot sometimes went to his synod, paying him fifty small Venetian solidi over many years. For the bishop, however, it was found proved that he confirmed the abbots of the same monastery, who rendered him obedience and reverence. The abbots of that monastery also came to the bishop's synods; when invited to funerals, he was received processionally with the aforesaid solemnity; and, similarly, when invited on the feast of blessed George, he received procuration there. They conveyed him in their boat on the feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin.

Since the aforesaid patriarch and bishop had first proceeded in the possessory action concerning these matters, we restored them to the possession or quasi-possession of the aforesaid things. Yet because proceedings had nevertheless been conducted on both sides in the petitory action, and each party appeared to have brought its entire right into judgment, we, having inspected the privileges of our predecessors, by the counsel of our brothers decree that the monastery itself is free and pertains immediately to the Roman Church. We absolve it from the attack of the said patriarch and bishop in the aforesaid matters and in others which concern jurisdiction and subjection, notwithstanding the possession proved concerning the aforesaid matters, since they did not show that they had received such things for so long a time that the privileges of liberty were derogated by this. We reserve, however, to the aforesaid bishop those things which are specially reserved to him in the same privileges concerning chrism, holy oil, ordinations of clerics, and certain other matters.

In addition, since the patriarch proceeded concerning the aforesaid fifty solidi, which he sought as evidence of subjection, by the definitive sentence which he received against him concerning this we do not take away his power if he should wish to proceed concerning them by another right. [Therefore to your discretion, etc. Given on the Nones of May, in the eighth year [of our pontificate]. 1224.]

Virginis conducebant. Quum autem in his primo possessorio egerint patriarcha et episcopus memorati, nos eos ad possessionem vel quasi restituimus praedictorum. Verum quia hinc inde petitorio nihilominus actum fuit, et utraque pars totum suum ius videtur in iudicium deduxisse, nos, visis praedecessorum nostrorum privilegiis, monasterium ipsum de fratrum nostrorum consilio liberum esse decernimus, et immediate ad Romanam ecclesiam pertinere, illud in praemissis, et aliis, quae iurisdictionem et subiectionem respiciunt, ab impetitione dictorum patriarchae ac episcopi absolventes, non obstante possessione circa praedicta probata, quum non docuerint se tanto tempore talia percepisse, quod per hoc libertatis fuerit privilegiis derogatum. Reservamus autem episcopo supradicto quae sibi circa chrisma, oleum sanctum, ordinationes clericorum et quaedam alia in eisdem privilegiis specialiter reservantur.* Ad haec, quum de praemissis L. solidis, quos petiit ad subiectionis iudicium, a patriarcha sit actum, per sententiam diffinitivam quam super hoc contrariam reportavit, ei non adimimus, si alio iure de ipsis experiri voluerit, potestatem. Title XIII: On the Restitution of Those Despoiled

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: Against one seeking restitution, a defendant objecting concerning ownership is not to be heard unless the plaintiff consents.

Gregory IX, to the Bishop of Constance.

Although greatly [the scourge of blindness borne by Philagrius, the bearer of the present letters, invites your fraternity to preserve justice for him, nevertheless, because he wished you to be made more prompt by us to restore the things which he asserts are prejudicially detained from him, we have foreseen that the present writing should be directed to you.] But Philasius, a blind man, has complained to us that his field, together with his vineyard, has been unreasonably occupied by men of your church. If this is so, although before every contention the possession violently taken from him ought to have been restored to him, nevertheless, because [our common son] Eventus, a deacon of that church, with his consent undertook that he would lawfully prove that the said field belongs to that church's right, therefore inquire into the truth; and, if this is proved, it is to be said to him that he should withdraw from his contention; otherwise, before every contention, let the thing taken from him be returned to him. So that thereafter cognizance concerning ownership may remain unimpaired for each party, etc. He indicated furthermore, etc. (Cf. c. 4, On Payments, III. 39.)

Quod si ita est, quanquam ante omnem contentionem possessio ei debuerat violenter ablata restitui, tamen, quia [communis filius] Eventus diaconus ipsius ecclesiae consentiente illo constituit se legitime probaturum, dictum campum eiusdem ecclesiae iuris esse, ideoque veritatem inquire, et, si hoc probatum fuerit, huic dicendum est, ut a sua intentione discedat; alioquin ante omnem contentionem res ei ablata reddatur. Ut sua cuique parti integra post hoc maneat de proprietate cognitio etc. Indicavit praeterea etc. (cf. c. 4. *de cens. Chapter II

Latin source headnote: A renunciation made after spoliation does not stand against one seeking restitution of a benefice, because it is presumed not to have been voluntary. And I deliberately added "because it is presumed not to have been voluntary," since, even if it were proved voluntary, such an exception or renunciation ought to stand in beneficial matters.

Alexander III, to the Bishop of Worcester.

You shall take solicitous and diligent care to investigate at what time H. renounced the church; and if it is established to you that he had been despoiled when he renounced the same church—whether he renounced on this occasion only, or whether he renounced the aforesaid church on several occasions, provided that he renounced while despoiled—you shall not admit against him, before he has been restored, the witnesses of the other party concerning an oath and a renunciation voluntarily made, because it is not likely that one who renounces while despoiled has voluntarily renounced his right. But you shall not postpone receiving the witnesses of the same H., through whom he intends to prove for himself that he was violently despoiled of the aforesaid church, provided that they are suitable.

> Petenti restitutionem beneficii non obstat renunciatio facta post spoliationem, quia praesumitur non spontanea. Et seriose addidi: quia praesumitur non spontanea: quoniam, etsi probaretur spontanea, deberet obstare talis exceptio vel renunciatio in beneficialibus.
> Alexander III. Vigorniensi Episcopo.
>
> Sollicite cures et diligenter perquirere, quo tempore H. renunciavit ecclesiae, et, si tibi constiterit, eum esse spoliatum, quum eidem ecclesiae renunciavit, si hac vice tantum renunciavit, aut si pluribus vicibus renunciavit ecclesiae praescriptae, dummodo spoliatus renunciavit, contra eum testes alterius partis de iuramento et renunciatione sponte facta, antequam restitutus fuerit, non admittas, quia non est verisimile, quod sponte iuri suo renunciaverit qui renunciat spoliatus. Sed testes eiusdem H., quibus intendit se probare, quod violenter praedicta ecclesia fuerit spoliatus, dummodo idonei sint, recipere non postponas.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: One seeking restitution of a benefice is not heard, even if he proves spoliation, if it is proved that he had previously resigned that benefice voluntarily.

The same.

Having received the complaint of P., a cleric, that he had been violently despoiled of the church of Procebrant, we, [by commanding] through apostolic writings, if we remember correctly, gave you a mandate that, if this were established, you should cause it to be restored to him by our authority. When this became known, it was answered by the adversary, as we are told, that this ought not to benefit him because he had of his own free will abjured the aforesaid church before the Archbishop of York, legate of the Apostolic See. But because we have not written to unlearned men, but to discerning persons, and because it belongs to us to discern what reason dictates, by the authority of the present letters we command your discretion that you diligently and subtly inquire into the truth of the matter, and, if it is established to you that the aforesaid P., compelled by no fear or force but voluntarily, abjured the aforesaid church in this manner, you shall impose perpetual silence upon him concerning this, every occasion and appeal being removed.

> Petens restitutionem beneficii non auditur, etiamsi spoliationem probat, si probatur, eum sponte illud beneficium prius resignasse.
>
> Idem.
> Accepta conquestione P. clerici, quod violenter fuerat ecclesia de Procebrant spoliatus, vobis per apostolica scripta, si bene meminimus, [praecipiendo] dedimus in mandatis, ut, si hoc constaret, eam sibi auctoritate nostra restitui faceretis. Quo cognito responsum est, sicut nobis dicitur, ab adversario, id non debere proficere eo, quod spontanea voluntate coram Eboracensi archiepiscopo apostolicae sedis legato praescriptam ecclesiam abiurasset. Quia vero non scripsimus idiotis, sed discretis personis, et nostrum est discernere, quid ratio dictet, discretioni vestrae praesentium auctoritate Mandamus, quatenus rei veritatem diligenter et subtiliter inquiratis, et, si vobis constiterit, quod praefatus P. nullo metu vel vi coactus, sed spontanee praelibatam ecclesiam taliter abiuraverit, ei omni occasione et appellatione remota super hoc perpetuum silentium imponatis.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: In an interdict for retaining possession, the defendant fails when his abjuration has been proved. This is what it says in relation to the title.

The same, to the Bishop of Worcester and the Archdeacon of Ely.

Having heard the complaint of our beloved son T., a cleric of our dearest son in Christ, the illustrious King of the Scots, that H., parson of the church of Sander, was unduly troubling him concerning his church of Pelen, which the aforesaid T. had obtained, then free and vacant, upon the presentation of the same king, although the same H. is said to have sworn voluntarily that he would move no question against the aforesaid T. concerning the church of Porten, we gave a mandate to our venerable brother the Bishop of London and to you, son archdeacon, that, after the truth of the matter had been more fully investigated, if it were established to you that the aforesaid H. held the parsonship of another church, or had confirmed by a voluntarily furnished oath that he would not thereafter move a question against the aforesaid T. concerning the same church, you should thereupon, appeal being removed, impose perpetual silence upon him and restrain him from troubling that man concerning this.

But afterward a messenger of the aforesaid H., approaching our presence, proposed to us with firm assertion that the same H. had been despoiled of the same church through violence; and for that reason he obtained our letters to you, directing that, if it were established to you after the truth had been learned that H. himself had been despoiled when he renounced that church, you should by no means receive against him the witnesses of the other party concerning an oath and renunciation voluntarily made, but rather should not delay to receive the witnesses of H. himself, through whom he intended to be able to prove that he had been violently despoiled of the aforesaid church, provided that they were suitable; and that, according to their depositions and the reasons and allegations produced on this side and that, you should judge in that cause what was just, the obstacle of appeal being removed, notwithstanding [our] letters, if any others had been obtained by either party, or the form which we expressed in other letters obtained concerning this. We added, furthermore, that if anything had been changed in the cause itself after the messenger of the aforesaid Henry began his journey to come to our presence, before entering the principal cause you should, every contradiction and appeal ceasing, restore the whole cause to the state in which it was known to have been when the messenger of H. himself undertook that journey, unless perhaps in the meantime the same H. could come to an agreement concerning the church itself with the other party by voluntary will.

But now it has become known to us from the letters of the aforesaid bishop and from yours, son archdeacon, that you, [as you ought], following the tenor of the former letters, cited the parties with due solemnity. When, however, after several citations a peremptory day was finally appointed, the contumacy of the aforesaid H. had been more fully established to you by lawful proof, and when you learned from the testimony of suitable persons that the often-mentioned H. not only held the parsonship of another church but also, of his voluntary will, had abjured the church of Pelen in perpetuity in the face of the Church, you prohibited him from thereafter troubling the said T. concerning this.

Although, however, the messenger of the same H. obtained the later letters, as we have said, containing a different form—that, notwithstanding letters obtained by the other party, anything changed in the cause after the same messenger began his journey to come to us ought to be revoked—nevertheless, because we did not understand, nor ought it to have been understood, that what had been done by you under the authority of our letters should be rendered void, but only if anything had been changed by presumption or violence, by commanding your discretion through apostolic writings we order that you shall by no means attempt, on the occasion of those letters, to revoke the sentence which you rendered before receipt of the later letters; and, if you have decreed anything against that sentence, you shall take care to revoke it, the obstacle of appeal being removed, and shall by no means permit the aforesaid H. to proceed against the same sentence, but rather, contradiction and appeal being set aside, shall cause the sentence to be inviolably observed by our authority. But if the sentence was rendered after receipt of the subsequent letters, notwithstanding that sentence, you shall proceed in the cause according to the tenor of those letters, appeal being set aside, provided that the aforesaid H. was despoiled through violence and furnished that oath while despoiled.

In interdicto de retinenda succumbit reus, ipsius abiuratione probata. H. d. quoad titulum.

Idem Wigorensi Episcopo et Heliensi Archidiacono.

Audita querela dilecti filii nostri T. clerici carissimi in Christo filii nostri illustris Scotorum regis, quod H. persona ecclesiae de Sander, ipsum super ecclesia sua de Pelen. indebite molestaret, quam liberam tunc et vacantem ad repraesentationem eiusdem regis praedictus T. fuerat adeptus, licet idem H. sponte iurasse dicatur, quod super ecclesia de Porten. praefato T. nullam quaestionem moveret, venerabili fratri nostro Londonensi episcopo, et tibi, fili archidiacone, dedimus in mandatis, ut, veritate rei plenius inquisita, si vobis constaret, quod praedictus H. alterius ecclesiae personatum haberet, vel iuramento spontanee praestito firmaverit, se memorato T. super eadem ecclesia quaestionem de cetero non moturum, ei exinde appellatione remota perpetuum silentium imponatis, et ab eius molestia super hoc compesceretis eundem. *Postmodum vero nuncius praefati H. ad praesentiam nostram accedens constanti nobis assertione proposuit, quod per violentiam idem H. eadem ecclesia fuerit spoliatus, et ideo ad vos nostras literas impetravit, ut, si constaret vobis veritate cognita, ipsum H. spoliatum esse, quum eidem renunciavit ecclesiae, contra eum testes alterius partis de iuramento et renunciatione spontanee facta nullatenus reciperetis, sed potius testes ipsius H., quibus intendebat posse probare, quod violenter praedicta ecclesia spoliatus fuerit, dummodo essent idonei, non differretis recipere, et secundum eorum depositiones et rationes et allegationes hinc inde productas in causa ipsa appellationis obstaculo remoto quod iustum esset iudicaretis, non obstantibus literis *[nostris], *si quae aliae ab alterutra parte impetratae fuissent, aut forma, quam expressimus in aliis literis super hoc impetratis. Addidimus insuper, quod, si in causa ipsa aliquid esset immutatum, postquam nuncius praedicti Henrici iter arripuit ad nostram praesentiam veniendi, totam causam ante ingressum principalis causae contradictione et appellatione cessante in eum statum reduceretis, in quo fuisse dignoscitur, quum nuncius ipsius H. est iter ipsum aggressus, nisi forte interim idem H. cum altera parte spontanea voluntate posset super ecclesia ipsa convenire. observari. Si vero post receptionem sequentium literarum sententia lata fuerit ea sententia non obstante in causa iuxta tenorem literarum ipsarum appellatione postposita procedatis, dummodo praefatus H. per violentiam spoliatus fuerit, et spoliatus illud praestiterit iuramentum.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: The question of noncanonical institution cannot be raised against one seeking restitution of a benefice.

The same, to the Bishop of Brescia.

In your letters—(And below: [Cf. c. 9, On the Office of a Delegated Judge, I. 29.]) Concerning that question—namely, when someone says that he has been violently ejected from possession, and his adversary says that he was not canonically instituted—we answer that proceedings concerning the violent ejection ought to be conducted before proceedings concerning canonical institution, because even a robber must be restored according to the rigor of law. [Likewise, when, etc. (Cf. the following chapter.)]

Latin source headnote: An exception of crime does not stand against one proceeding by the interdict unde vi or quod vi aut clam.

The same, to the Bishop of Exeter.

Likewise, when someone says that he has been violently ejected from possession, or that his adversary has secretly entered the possession, and the adversary alleges a crime against him in order to repel him from his contention by reason of the crime, it does not indeed occur to us that the latter's objection ought to be admitted, or that the execution of the principal cause ought for this reason to be delayed, because he cannot proceed criminally against him before restitution, since he is presumed to be his enemy.

Item quum quis dicit, se de possessione violenter eiectum, vel adversarium clam possessionem intrasse, et adversarius ei crimen obiicit, ut eum ratione criminis a sua intentione repellat, non occurrit quidem nobis, quod illius obiectio admitti debeat, vel principalis causae propter hoc exsecutio retardari, quoniam criminaliter adversus eum ante restitutionem agere non potest, quum praesumatur eius exsistere inimicus.

The same, to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Upon the complaint of the cleric R., the bearer of the present letters, we learned that, while he was devoting himself to scholastic disciplines, you despoiled him, [without his having been cited], of the church of Werfort without a judgment. But because it does not become your honor to despoil the clerics of your jurisdiction, without a manifest and reasonable cause, of their benefices—clerics for whom you are bound to provide with paternal foresight—[by commanding] your fraternity through apostolic writings we command that, if it is so, you restore to the aforesaid cleric the aforementioned church together with the revenues received from it, and permit him to possess it in peace. But after restitution has been made, if you wish to propose anything [thereupon] against him concerning the aforesaid church, you will be able, personally or through your sufficient representative, to proceed according to judicial order with the same R. before our venerable brother, the Bishop of Exeter, delegated by us; and you shall firmly receive and observe what [he] shall thereupon decree, for we have committed the cause to the same bishop for determination.

The same.

From that transmitted to us—(And below:) Because the truth could not become clear to us, we have considered that the cause should be committed to your experience; through apostolic writings we command your fraternity that, if it is established to you that the aforesaid woman had been lawfully betrothed to the aforesaid knight and carnally known by him, you shall cause her to be restored to him, sufficient security nevertheless having been received that he ought not to inflict any harm upon her. But if the husband persecutes the woman with such mortal hatred that she deservedly distrusts him and holds him suspect, she shall be carefully committed for safekeeping until the decision of the cause to some upright and honorable woman, in a place where neither the husband nor his relatives can inflict any violence upon the woman.

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: Through payment of the pension from the donated thing, made to the donee with the donor's authority, possession of the donated thing is acquired for that donee to such a degree that, if he is expelled from it, he will be able to proceed by the interdict for recovering possession.

The same.

When our beloved son G., canon of Holy Trinity of Hasul, came to us, having been sent by his prior and chapter, he proposed in our hearing that, when our venerable brother the Archbishop of York had granted them the church of N. and confirmed it by his own writing, in such a way that after the death of G. of Pontino, the cleric who held the aforesaid church at that time, it would in every way be applied to their uses, and meanwhile, by the authority of that archbishop, the same G. would pay an annual pension to those canons, we afterward, having diligently inspected the writing of that archbishop, considered that the same grant should be confirmed by apostolic authority. But when the aforesaid cleric had died, the said canons, although they had not been inducted into possession of the aforesaid church by the archbishop himself, nevertheless, placing very great confidence in the grant and our confirmation, entered the church itself lest they be troubled by a certain cleric who was endeavoring to harass them concerning that church; and they appealed to our hearing both against the archbishop himself, by whom they feared they would be aggrieved, and against the aforesaid cleric. While two of their brothers were prosecuting the appeal made by them, the often-mentioned archbishop caused the grain and all the goods of the church which the aforesaid cleric G., when dying, left there to be carried away against the will of the aforesaid canons—which we can scarcely believe. (And below:)

Master M. and A., clerics and messengers of the same archbishop, who were present, steadfastly excused him concerning these matters, and added that a grave injury had been inflicted upon the aforesaid archbishop by the aforesaid canons, because, even if they had letters of grant from him, they ought not, after his authority had been disregarded, to have entered into possession by themselves. We therefore answer that, if the aforesaid canons, during the cleric's lifetime, received an annual pension from the aforesaid church under the authority of the same archbishop, then, when that cleric was dead, although they did not seek the authority of the same archbishop, they nevertheless did not enter possession wrongfully, since, as is provided in the laws of secular princes, he possesses in whose name possession is held.

We commit the cause itself to you, in whose prudence and integrity we confide, commanding your fraternity through apostolic writings that, having summoned the parties before your presence, if their assertion is established, before entry upon the principal cause you shall by our authority cause the grain and all the goods of the church carried away after the appeal by command of the archbishop himself to be restored, the obstacle of appeal being removed. Thereafter you shall earnestly admonish the archbishop to hold his grant ratified and henceforth cease to harass the aforesaid canons concerning the aforesaid church. But if he is unwilling to acquiesce in your admonition, you shall diligently hear the cause concerning the church and determine it without acceptance of persons, the evasion of appeal being removed.

Latin source headnote: If, while the plaintiff proceeds in the petitory action, the defendant brings a possessory action concerning the same thing, proceedings are conducted only in the possessory action, the petitory being suspended.

Lucius III, to the Archdeacon and I., Archpriest of Tours.

You should know that it has reached us from the complaint of the woman B. that, when the knight C. had joined her to himself in marriage and, treating her with marital affection, had begotten a daughter from her, he afterward removed her from himself without a judgment of the Church and obtained letters to judges for accusing the marriage on the ground of consanguinity, the obstacle of appeal being removed. But when, before the woman was cited by the delegated judges, she had petitioned through the diocesan bishop that her husband be restored to her, and for this reason she had sent her own messenger to us, finally, having been established before the aforesaid judges, now personally, now through a proctor, she petitioned both before entry upon the cause itself and afterward that her husband be restored to her. The judges, however, restitution being entirely denied —which ought not to have been done—wished to proceed in the principal matter, whereupon she appealed from such a grievance to our hearing.

Therefore, because we ought to impart apostolic protection to those unjustly aggrieved, by commanding your discretion through apostolic writings we order that, if it is so, you shall cause her own husband to be restored to the aforesaid woman, every contradiction and appeal ceasing, revoking as void the things done after her appeal, and afterward shall hear the cause concerning the marriage attentively and determine it with a canonical end. Given at Verona on the twelfth day before the Kalends of November.

Latin source headnote: A violent possessor is compelled to restore the thing together with the fruits, including those which could have been received, to repair the losses, and to make satisfaction for the injuries.

Celestine III.

A grave complaint [has come] to us—(And below:) Therefore, through apostolic writings we command and firmly enjoin your fraternity that, having summoned the parties, if the aforesaid matters are established to you, you shall compel the aforesaid archdeacon, by ecclesiastical constraint, relying upon our authority, every favor, fear, and affection being set aside and every delay, contradiction, and appeal ceasing, to restore in their entirety the things taken from the brothers of the aforesaid monastery, to repair the losses fully, and to make competent satisfaction for the injuries inflicted; then you shall admonish the archbishop to hold his grant ratified and henceforth cease to harass the aforesaid canons concerning the aforesaid church. Furthermore, if any persons should determine to oppose the restoration of the things taken to the aforesaid brothers according to our mandate, you, supported by our authority, shall strike them with a sentence of anathema, notwithstanding appeal. But if the aforesaid archbishop perhaps does not come at the citation of your admonition, or is unwilling to obey your mandate, you, having received the witnesses of the monastery of Dol, shall proceed in the whole business according to the aforesaid form and take care to execute it with every solicitude as we have said, appeal ceasing, providing in every way that you do not permit the liberties granted to the aforesaid monastery by our predecessors and by you to be diminished or infringed by anyone.

Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: One who has entered possession without the knowledge of the lord to whom it pertains can, as soon as the lord learns of it, be repelled by that lord even violently; nor from such repulsion does a possessory interdict lie against the lord for the person repelled. This is what it says.

Innocent III, to the Bishop and Chapter of Tortona.

Formerly, we remember committing, under a certain form, to the beloved sons, the abbots of Lucedio and La Colomba, the cause which was conducted between you, in the name of the Church of Tortona, and the beloved sons B., the master and brothers of the Knights of the Temple in Lombardy, concerning the house of Calventia. The abbots themselves, having summoned the parties and issue having been joined in their presence, received the witnesses produced by each party; and, when renunciation had been made, they solemnly published their depositions on each side and, reducing them to writing by a public hand, remitted the fully instructed cause to our presence. We therefore granted as auditors to the beloved son C., canon and proctor of the Church of Tortona, and to the aforesaid master our beloved sons I., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Stephen on the Coelian Hill, and H., cardinal deacon of Saint Eustace. Before them it was proposed on your behalf that, when formerly certain Humiliati had sought from V., Bishop of Tortona of good memory, license to construct a hospital and oratory in the place of Calventia, the Bishop of Tortona redeemed certain possessions from certain knights who held them in fief from the Church of Tortona, and granted them to the Humiliati at their request under this condition: that in honor of God and the Blessed Virgin they would construct an oratory and hospital there in the name of the Bishop of Tortona; would furnish three solidi as an annual payment to the Bishop of Tortona; and the person placed over that place would receive investiture from him and, for himself and the other brothers, would make manual obedience to him and his successors, the bishop nevertheless retaining for himself lordship of the place.

But the said master, aspiring to that house and wishing to join it to the house of Caselle, so circumvented them that, without your knowledge, they delivered themselves and their things into his hands, this condition nevertheless being added: if what they did pleased you, without whose assent they asserted that they could do nothing. The master accepted the condition added and affirmed that otherwise he would not receive them. (And below:)

Then the master, approaching Calventia, took from there the ornaments of the church, the instruments of the house, and the books, and caused ninety sheep to be led away. Afterward, returning to you when what he had sought had been denied him, he added that he was prepared to render you an account if perhaps he had offended you. But you, observing his malevolent intention, strictly prohibiting him from intermeddling with the aforesaid house, appealed to the Apostolic See. And when you, brother bishop, heard what had been done, all of you together approached the same house and cast out from it those whom you found there, left by the master for the custody of the house, lawfully repelling force with force, as all laws permit. Hence, since possession of the aforesaid house had been delivered to the same master under a condition, the condition not existing, the delivery was not valid. Furthermore, since the same master secretly entered that house, no prejudice was generated against you whereby you could not repel him when this came to your hearing, especially since the true lord either moved a controversy against him, or he suspected, or ought to have suspected, that he would. (And below:)

Understanding that the aforesaid house had been delivered to the same master under a condition, and that no prejudice had been inflicted upon your right by the fact that the same master, not ignorant of your right, took possession without your knowledge—especially since, immediately when this became known to you, you determined that force should be repelled with force—and that the same master by his own temerity entered possession without the knowledge of you, to whom he knew that possession pertained and whom he ought to have suspected would move a question against him, by the counsel of our brothers we absolve the said proctor, personally and in your name, from the attack of the master himself, in the name of the house of the Knights of the Temple, with respect to making the restitution which he sought, saving to him the question of ownership, concerning which nothing was conducted in this judgment, as the aforesaid Abbot of Lucedio explained to us orally. We nevertheless decree that you furnish due satisfaction to the same master if, in defending your right, you perhaps exceeded the measure to the injury of him or of the house of the Knights of the Temple.

Chapter XIII

Latin source headnote: If consanguinity in a prohibited degree is objected against one seeking restitution of a spouse, and proofs ready at hand are offered, then, after an oath concerning absence of malice has been received from the objector, restitution will be denied with respect to the marriage bed and made with respect to the other matters. But if the proofs are not ready, full restitution will be made, unless the husband's cruelty is great.

The same, to the Archdeacon of Bourges.

We recently received your letters, containing that, when a certain matrimonial cause was being conducted in your presence while our venerable brother the Archbishop of Bourges was acting in distant regions, a woman named Guillelma most urgently petitioned to be separated from B., her husband, to whom she alleged that she was joined in the fourth degree of consanguinity. Accusers also appeared, producing witnesses and a chart setting out the line of consanguinity on both sides; they said that they had been absent at the time the marriage was contracted and that they were prepared immediately to prove the things which they proposed. The husband, on the other hand, petitioned that his wife be restored to him, alleging that she had departed from him by her own temerity.

Moreover, the wife's party replied that restitution should be entirely denied, both on account of the future danger of incest and because, with the proofs ready and at hand, what was maintained could be demonstrated without evasion. In addition, it alleged that the husband's cruelty was known: he possessed impetuous levity and bestial cruelty; and, if he had free power over his wife when she had been restored to him, her friends feared that danger of death or bodily torment would thereby threaten her, and thus they would desist from the accusation, preferring that she live in whatever manner rather than perish. They added, nevertheless, that she had departed from the husband with permission, in tears and unwilling. But the knight himself nevertheless petitioned that his wife be restored to him freely and peaceably; and, lest otherwise be done, he appealed to the Apostolic See. Therefore, since exceptions of this kind are rather often proposed in matrimonial causes, you sought to be instructed by an apostolic rescript as to what is to be done in such matters, eliciting from the foregoing, as from a certain theme, many questions.

First, you asked whether, when some degree of consanguinity is alleged in which the Apostolic See cannot and is not even accustomed to dispense, and proofs are ready and at hand, restitution is to be granted or denied. Second, you asked whether the same rule of law exists if some dispensable degree or another dispensable impediment is alleged and proofs are similarly present—whether restitution ought to be granted or denied. Third, you asked whether, if the husband's cruelty and savagery are known to the judge, so that, angered because the controversy was moved, he is likely to treat his wife with torments and afflict her with injuries, and the accusers thus desist from accusing because they fear the woman's death, this furnishes in the first or second case an aid for denying restitution. Finally, you asked whether, if restitution is to be denied in any of the aforesaid cases and appeal is made to the Apostolic See, deference should be given to an appeal of this kind.

Indeed, concerning the resolution of the proposed question, different persons hold different opinions: some assert that restitution is to be made in the aforesaid cases; others hold the contrary; and some choose a middle way, saying that it is sometimes to be made and sometimes indeed entirely denied.

The first appear to be assisted by the decretal letter of Pope Lucius of good memory, our predecessor. In it he reproved certain delegated judges who denied to a woman, despoiled and seeking her spouse, the restitution of a husband who had dismissed his wife without a judgment of the Church and afterward objected consanguinity against her; and he commanded that the woman so despoiled first be restored to him, and that cognizance afterward be taken of the matrimonial cause. The danger of incest, however, appears to oppose their assertion. But they answer that the fear of incest is empty, since even after the benefit of restitution has been obtained, one who has knowledge of consanguinity is neither permitted to demand the marital debt against conscience nor bound to render it, because, if such a person acts otherwise, he builds toward Gehenna, just as does one conscious of consanguinity concerning whose marriage no question is moved.

The second assertion, however, is supported by the oracle of Pope Clement of happy memory, our predecessor. When he was asked whether, when a certain woman was claiming a certain man as her husband and he, in order to repel her, interposed an exception of consanguinity, the impediment of consanguinity should be dealt with before sentence was rendered concerning the marriage, he answered the inquiry made in this manner: because, when the exception is proved, the principal question is extinguished, cognizance must first be taken of the exception before proceeding to the point of definition, since in many cases restitution is also deferred according to the canonical sanctions.

It appears not unfittingly adapted to the final opinion that, in degrees of consanguinity prohibited by divine law, access to restitution should be closed, but that, in degrees forbidden by human constitution, restitution should have its place with effect, since there can be no dispensation in the former, but dispensation can be granted in the latter, as blessed Gregory and many others granted dispensations. Hence one who, at the command of the Church, renders the marital debt in this circumstance does not sin.

We, however, at present reprove none of the aforesaid opinions, nor do we wish any prejudice to be generated against any of them by our response, although the aforesaid mandate of Pope Lucius relates to the possessory action, while the response of Clement, our father and predecessor, relates to the petitory action. Furthermore, since that woman who has knowledge of consanguinity—especially within the degrees prohibited by divine law—cannot be carnally joined to a man of this kind without mortal sin, because everything which is not from faith is sin, and whatever is done against conscience builds toward Gehenna, restitution would in vain be adjudged in such a case to the person despoiled. For in this matter she ought not to obey the judge against God, but rather humbly to endure excommunication. Thus a difficulty would arise as though insoluble, because on account of the sentence she would have to render the marital debt, and on account of conscience she ought not to render the debt. Hence it would happen that they would be gravely impeded, and a snare would be prepared for each of them, since they could not be joined carnally to each other, nor could either be matrimonially joined to another.

For this reason it appears better to us that, when consanguinity is objected—especially in the degrees prohibited by divine law—and proofs ready at hand are immediately offered, restitution should indeed be adjudged in other matters, but, for greater caution, after an oath has been received that an objection of this kind is not made maliciously, restitution with respect only to carnal union, especially if reputation agrees, is to be deferred until, the proofs having been heard and discussed, the cause is determined without evasion, since it is better for each to be dispatched in this way than to remain impeded in that way.

But if she does not have proofs ready immediately, but awaits longer delays, because there is a presumption against her who departed from her husband without a judgment of the Church solely by her own temerity, she ought to be compelled to full restitution by ecclesiastical censure. Nevertheless, by refusing association in the marriage bed she ought humbly to endure that censure until she offers proofs that have been prepared; and then, having sought absolution, she will be absolved according to the form of the Church. But before a command is issued to her under the obligation of an oath, let proceedings be conducted after the proofs have been received, in the manner stated above. If, however, the husband's cruelty is so great that sufficient security cannot be provided for the trembling woman, not only ought she not to be restored to him, but she ought rather to be removed from him; otherwise, sufficient security having been provided if this can be done, the spouse assuredly appears to be restored to the husband before cognizance of the cause.

Si contra petentem restitutionem coniugis opponitur consanguinitas in gradu prohibito, et offeruntur probationes paratae, recepto ab opponente iuramento de malitia, negabitur restitutio quoad torum, et fiet quoad reliqua. Si vero probationes promptae non sint, fiet plena restitutio, nisi sit magna viri saevitia.

Idem Bituricensi Archidiacono.

Literas tuas nuper recepimus, continentes, quod, quum quaedam matrimonialis causa venerabili fratre nostro Bituricensi archiepiscopo in remotis agente, in tua praesentia tractaretur, Gulielma mulier separari a B. viro suo instantissime postulabat, cui se quarto gradu consanguinitatis proponebat esse coniunctam. Apparebant etiam accusatores et testes exhibentes chartam ab utroque latere consanguinitatis lineam contingentem, qui se contracti matrimonii tempore absentes fuisse dicebant, et quod in continenti parati erant quae proposuerunt comprobare. Vir autem econtra sibi uxorem postulabat restitui, quae ab eo sua temeritate divertit, quemadmodum allegabat. Ceterum pars replicabat uxoris, tum propter futurum incestus periculum, tum quia probationibus paratis et promptis sine diffugio quod intendebatur poterat demonstrare, restitutionem penitus denegandam. Ad haec notam esse mariti saevitiam proponebat, cui erat impetuosa levitas et crudelitas bestialis, et, si liberam restitutae sibi facultatem haberet uxoris, eius amici timebant mortis ex hoc sibi periculum imminere vel corporis cruciatum, et sic ab accusatione desisterent, eam qualiter cunque vivere quam interire malentes; adiicientes, nihilominus ipsam licentiatam a viro recessisse cum lacrimis et incitam. Ipse vero miles nihilominus sibi uxorem petebat libere ac pacifice restitui, et, ne secus fieret, sedem apostolicam appellavit. Quum igitur in causis matrimonialibus exceptiones huiusmodi saepius proponantur, quid sit in talibus agendum, Rescripto petebas apostolico edoceri, ex praemissis velut quodam themate multas eliciens quaestiones, primo quidem utrum, quando aliquis consanguinitatis gradus obiicitur, in quo sedes apostolica dispensare non potest nec etiam consuevit, et probationes promptae sint et paratae, indulgenda restitutio sit, an neganda? Secundo quaerebas, an idem iuris exsistat, si aliquis gradus dispensabilis vel aliud impedimentum dispensabile allegetur, et probationes similiter sint praesentes, utrum restitutio concedi debeat, an negari? Tertio loco quaerebas, si mariti crudelitas et saevitia nota sint iudici, ut propter motam controversiam indignatus uxorem torturis tractaturus sit et iniuriis affecturus, et sic accusatores de morte feminae metuentes accusare desistant: utrum hoc in primo vel in secundo casu restitutionis praebeat adminiculum denegandae? Postremo quaerebas, si deneganda sit restitutio in aliquo casuum praemissorum, et ad sedem apostolicam appelletur, utrum appellationi huiusmodi sit deferendum? Sane circa solutionem propositae quaestionis diversae sunt sententiae diversorum; aliis asserentibus restitutionem in praemissis casibus faciendam; aliis sentientibus in contrarium; nonnullis viam mediam eligentibus, ac dicentibus, eam faciendam interdum, quandoque vero penitus denegandam. Primi per decretalem epistolam bonae memoriae Lucii Papae praedecessoris nostri iuvari videntur, arguentis quosdam iudices delegatos, qui, restitutionem viri, qui sine iudicio ecclesiae uxorem dimiserat, et ei consanguinitatem postmodum opponebat, spoliatae ac repetenti coniugem denegabant, et mandantis, sibi prius restitui taliter spoliatam, et postea de matrimoniali causa cognosci. Horum autem assertionem incestus videtur periculum oppugnare; sed ipsi timorem incestus inanem esse respondent, quum etiam beneficio restitutionis obtento qui consanguinitatis habet notitiam nec exigere debitum contra conscientiam, nec solvere teneatur, quoniam, si secus egerit, aedificat ad gehennam, sicut nec consanguinitatis conscius, super cuius coniugio quaestio non movetur. Secunda vero assertio per oraculum felicis recordationis Clementis Papae praedecessoris nostri fulcitur, a quo quum fuisset quaesitum, utrum, muliere quadam quendam in virum petente, qui, ut eam repelleret, exceptionem consanguinitatis obiecit, prius esset de impedimento consanguinitatis agendum, quam super matrimonio sententia proferretur, sic inquisitioni factae respondit, quod, quum exceptione probata principalis quaestio perimatur, prius est cognoscendum de ipsa, quam ad diffinitionis articulum procedatur, quum etiam in multis casibus restitutio differatur secundum canonicas sanctiones. Opinioni autem ultimae videtur non incongrue adaptari, ut in gradibus consanguinitatis divina lege prohibitis restitutioni aditus praecludatur, sed constitutione interdictis humana restitutio locum habeat cum effectu, quum in illis dispensari non possit, et in istis valeat dispensari, sicut B. Gregorius et multi alii dispensarunt. Unde non peccat qui in hoc articulo ad mandatum ecclesiae reddit debitum coniugale. Nos autem ad praesens nullam de praedictis sententiis reprobamus, nec cuiquam earum aliquod praeiudicium ex nostra responsione volumus generari, quamvis praescriptum Lucii Papae mandatum ad possessorium, responsum vero patris et praedecessoris nostri Clementis ad petitorium referatur. Porro quum mulier illa, quae consanguinitatis habet notitiam, praesertim in gradibus, quos lex divina prohibuit, non possit huiusmodi viro sine mortali peccato carnaliter commisceri, quoniam omne quod non est ex fide, peccatum est, et quicquid fit contra conscientiam aedificat ad gehennam, frustra in tali casu adiudicaretur restitutio spoliato, quum illa contra Deum non debeat in hoc iudici obedire, sed potius excommunicationem humiliter sustinere. Sicque difficultas occurreret quasi perplexa, quia propter sententiam oporteret eam reddere debitum, et propter conscientiam debitum reddere non deberet. Unde contingeret eos graviter impediri; et utrique laqueus pararetur, quum inter se carnaliter coniungi non possent, nec alter alteri matrimonialiter copulari. Propterea melius nobis videtur, quod, quum opponitur consanguinitas, praesertim in gradibus divina lege prohibitis, et probationes offeruntur in continenti paratae, in ceteris quidem adiudicanda sit restitutio, sed ad maiorem cautelam iuramento recepto, quod talis obiectio malitiose non fiat, sola quoad commixtionem carnalem, maxime si fama consentit, est restitutio differenda, donec auditis probationibus et discussis causa sine diffugio terminetur, quum utrique sit melius taliter expediri, quam manere taliter impeditos. Quod si non habeat probationes in continenti paratas, sed dilationes exspectat longiores, quia praesumitur contra eam, quae sine iudicio ecclesiae sua tantum temeritate recessit a viro, ad restitutionem plenariam ecclesiastica debet censura compelli, quam tamen ipsa tori negando consortium debet humiliter tolerare, donec probationes offerat praeparatas, et tunc absolutione petita secundum formam ecclesiae absolvetur. Sed antequam fiat ei mandatum sub debito iuramenti, receptis probationibus procedatur, quemadmodum est praemissum. Si vero tanta sit viri saevitia, ut mulieri trepidanti non possit sufficiens securitas provideri, non solum non debet illi restitui, sed ab eo potius amoveri; alioquin sufficienti, si fieri potest, securitate provisa profecto videtur coniunx ante causae cognitionem restituenda marito.

Chapter XIV

Latin source headnote: By the mere conveyance of a woman to a man's house, when no betrothal preceded or the betrothal was invalid, possession is not acquired; hence, when she departs on her own authority, restitution does not lie.

The same, to the Bishop of Volterra.

It was proposed before us on behalf of the woman M. that, while she was still within the years before puberty, a certain paternal uncle of hers wished to join her in marriage to the son of H., a citizen of Siena, who was not yet seven years old. When she had been conveyed to the house of that citizen, and when she reached marriageable years, being unwilling to ratify what had been procured in this matter by her said uncle, she sought from our venerable brother, the Bishop of Siena, license to marry another. And when that bishop had cited the parties, and the aforesaid M. appeared in judgment through a suitable proctor, seeking that the possessions and other things given for her in the name of dowry be restored to her, while the other party sought restitution of that woman, asserting that she could not conduct the cause through another but ought personally to attend its treatment, the aforesaid bishop, doubting what he could decree by law concerning these matters, suspended the course of the business, as he informed us by his letters.

Therefore, because we do not believe it doubtful that this woman—although she is said to be a minor—can conduct the matrimonial cause through a proctor, and that restitution ought by no means to be made to the other party which first petitioned that the woman be restored to it, since that party lacks every advantage of right or possession, because by the aforesaid conveyance alone, which no betrothal or legitimate consent preceded and which none followed either, no binding bond was contracted between them, so that an end may be imposed upon the lawsuits, through apostolic writings we command your fraternity that, if it is so, notwithstanding the aforesaid exceptions and having summoned the parties, you shall hear what the parties shall determine to propose on this side and that, and decree, appeal being removed, what is canonical, [causing what you decree, etc. Given at the Lateran on the third day before the Ides of January, in the eleventh year of our pontificate. 1209.]

Chapter XV

Latin source headnote: The interdict unde vi does not lie against one who neither despoiled, nor commanded that spoliation be committed, nor ratified the spoliation.

The same.

When formerly the proctors of A., our venerable brother, the Bishop of Como, and brother G., of the beloved sons, the brothers of the Hospital of Jerusalem, had approached the Apostolic See and presented to us the instruments and the acts of the cause which was conducted between them concerning the church and hospital of Monte Cinaro, as they had been carried out in the presence of our venerable brother the Bishop of Pavia, who had taken cognizance of the cause by our delegation, we, having diligently inspected the things done before that bishop, decreed that they should be held as not done, since it was established to us that he had not been a judge in that cause, as he himself finally acknowledged. We considered that the same cause, with the assent of the parties, which was conducted between them concerning the church and hospital of Monte Citano, should be committed to the beloved son, the Abbot of Accon, in such a way that he would hear all things pertaining both to the possessory and to the petitory judgment which either party should determine to propose, and would determine the cause itself with a due end.

Before him afterward the proctor of the Hospital of Jerusalem petitioned that the aforesaid church and hospital, together with their possessions and appurtenances, which the said Bishop of Como held, be restored to him, asserting that they belonged by right to the Hospital of Jerusalem and that the Hospital had possessed them for a rather long time. To these things the bishop's proctor answered that he neither knew nor believed that the aforesaid things had ever been possessed by the Hospital of Jerusalem or in any way pertained to it; rather, the Bishop of Como reasonably detained them, since they were situated in his diocese. Therefore, when each party produced witnesses to establish its contention, the said abbot, afterward having inspected the attestations, arguments, and instruments of both parties, condemned the bishop's proctor to restitution of all the aforesaid things. (And below:)

But recently, when the proctors of each party appeared for this reason before us, the acts of the former judgment having been faithfully presented to us, we diligently examined the cause itself, sometimes personally and sometimes through our beloved sons P., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Marcellus, and R., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Anastasia. It indeed appeared to have been proved through the witnesses that Cratus, the messenger of the Bishop of Como, formerly took the crosses from the Hospitallers, prohibiting them from returning to the aforesaid church or hospital, and that the bishop possessed all the aforesaid things; hence the proctor of the Hospitallers petitioned that the said sentence of restitution be confirmed by apostolic authority.

On the opposite side, however, it was proposed that, even if it had perhaps been sufficiently shown through the witnesses that the Hospitallers had been despoiled by the bishop's messenger, nevertheless, since it was not established that he did this by the bishop's command or that the bishop ratified his deed, restitution could not claim a place for itself, although it was established that the bishop held the aforesaid things, which he assuredly possessed by right, since they pertained to him and were situated in his diocese. But to this the other party replied that, although the bishop's command or ratification was not clearly proved by the statements of the witnesses, nevertheless, because the judge could have informed the movement of his mind from other grounds, a presumption should deservedly be made in favor of the sentence. Therefore, having understood these and the other things which the proctors of both parties took care to propose, we, reviewing more diligently the acts of the former judgment, which had, as stated above, been fully and faithfully presented to us, because it could not be established to us—either by the statements of the witnesses, or by confessions of the parties, since none at all had been made in judgment, or even by instruments which did not in any way deal with the spoliation, or even by the evidence of the fact—that the Bishop of Como had despoiled the aforesaid Hospitallers, or commanded them to be despoiled, or at least ratified the spoliation committed, by the counsel of our brothers we pronounced in the aforesaid question that the interdict unde vi had by no means had place. Justice requiring it, we quashed the sentence of restitution rendered by the aforesaid abbot, although the adverse party proposed that a presumption should be made in favor of the judge's sentence, since he could have informed the movement of his mind from other grounds.

Sed ad hoc pars altera replicavit, quod, quamvis per dicta testium evidenter mandatum episcopi vel ratihabitio non probetur, quia tamen iudex motum animi potuit ex aliis causis informare, pro sententia erat merito praesumendum. Formerly, when a question arose between you on behalf of your abbey and our venerable brother, the Bishop of Paris, in the name of the Church of Paris, concerning possession of parochial right in the parish of Mont—(And below:) We, considering that from the sole fact that the people of the aforesaid parish abstained from divine services for several days through fear of his sentence, the same bishop had acquired no possession of parochial right over them, and that it had not been proved in any way that, at the time at which he rendered the sentence, he possessed parochial right over them or had even possessed it previously, could not by law adjudge restitution to him, since it was not established that he had been despoiled.

Latin source headnote: One who knowingly receives from a despoiler a thing that has been invaded is bound to restore it to the person despoiled, although the latter does not prove ownership.

The same, in the General Council.

It often happens that, when an unjustly despoiled person's thing has been transferred by the despoiler to another, while the despoiled person is not aided against the possessor by the benefit of restitution, he loses the effect [of his right] because of the difficulty of proofs of the right of ownership, the advantage of possession having been lost. Hence, notwithstanding the rigor of civil law, we decree that if henceforth anyone knowingly receives such a thing, since he succeeds, as it were, to the despoiler's vice—because there is not much difference, [especially] with respect to peril of the soul, between unjustly detaining and invading another's property—the person despoiled shall be aided against a possessor of this kind by the benefit of restitution.

Unde, non obstante iuris civilis rigore, sancimus, ut, si quis de cetero scienter rem talem receperit, quum spoliatori quasi succedat in vitium eo, quod non multum intersit, [praesertim] quoad periculum animae, iniuste detinere ac invadere alienum, contra possessorem huiusmodi spoliato per restitutionis beneficium succuratur.

Chapter XIX

Latin source headnote: One who occupies a particular place in which someone freely possessed rights can, if through that occupation the possessor cannot freely possess his rights as before, be sued in a possessory action for freedom of possession; and restitution cannot be made unless he leaves the place in its former freedom. This is what it says, very exceptionally.

Gregory IX, to the Bishop of Lucca.

When the citizens of Pisa and Lucca had been gravely afflicted and worn down by the grave discord which they had long had between themselves—(And below:) we gave a mandate to P., our subdeacon, that, after the possession which it was established that the Church of Lucca had held in certain castles had first been fully and freely restored to it as it had held it at the time the discord arose, and after sufficient security had been received concerning that possession about which doubt arose that the aforesaid Pisans would obey the law before us, he should relax the sentences rendered against them for the occupation of those castles. (And below:)

Therefore, when the Pisans asserted that it stood through you that restitution was not made to you according to our mandate, and urgently petitioned that the aforesaid subdeacon relax the said sentences, he, having received securities for obeying justice before us, relaxed those sentences. Because of this, you, considering yourself aggrieved, approached our presence, intending to attack the proceeding of the often-mentioned subdeacon. (And below:)

Furthermore, two things were contained in our mandate: namely, that the possession which it was established that the Church of Lucca had held at the time the discord arose should first be restored to it; and that restitution of the same possession should be made fully and freely, as it had held it at the aforesaid time. The first of these related to the fact, but the second to the manner. Hence, although, as the party of the Pisans said, the subdeacon himself was unable in fact to fulfill the form of the mandate because he could not cause possession of the castles to be restored to you—a possession concerning which he had no established evidence—and, even according to what you yourself said, possession of the rents and pensions could not be restored to you because you had not been despoiled of it, there was nevertheless an error in the manner. For he ought to have caused the Pisans to leave to you, fully and freely, the possession of the pensions and rents which it was established by their confession that you held in the aforesaid castles, just as your church had held it at the time the discord arose. This assuredly could not be so unless the Pisans entirely relinquished the castles themselves, because, while they detained the castles and the fortifications of the castles in which you receive the said pensions and rents, you could not hold them fully and freely as you held them when they did not detain the same castles at all, because, for as long as they detain them, it is left in their power not to admit you or to repel you whenever they wish. Therefore, having diligently heard these things, by the counsel of our brothers we adjudge a proceeding of this kind void.

(Et infra:) Pisanis igitur asserentibus, quod per te stabat, quo minus tibi iuxta mandatum nostrum fieret restitutio, et instanter petentibus, ut dictas sententias praefatus subdiaconus relaxaret, ipse, receptis cautionibus de parendo iustitiae coram nobis, sententias relaxavit easdem, propter quod tu reputans te gravatum ad nostram praesentiam accessisti, impugnaturus processum subdiaconi saepe dicti. Unde licet, prout pars Pisanorum dicebat, in facto mandati formam subdiaconus ipse adimplere nequiverit, quia non poterat facere tibi restitui possessionem castrorum, de qua non constabat eidem, nec etiam, secundum quod tu ipse dicebas, affictuum et pensionum possessio poterat tibi restitui, quia ea non fueras spoliatus, fuit tamen in modo peccatum, quia debuit facere, ut Pisani possessionem pensionum et affictuum, quam per eorum confessionem constabat te in castris praedictis habere, tibi dimitterent plene ac libere, sicut ecclesia tua illam habuerat tempore motae discordiae, quod quidem esse non poterat, nisi Pisani castra ipsa omnino dimitterent, quia illis detinentibus castra et munitiones castrorum, in quibus dictas pensiones recipis et affictus, ea plene ac libere habere non posses, sicut habebas, quando ipsi castra eadem minime detinebant, eo, quod, quamdiu ea detinent, in eorum potestate relinquitur, te non admittere vel repellere, quando velint. His ergo diligenter auditis, processum huiusmodi de fratrum nostrorum consilio irritum iudicamus.

Title XIV: On Fraud and Contumacy

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A defendant who did not admit into possession a person who was to be sent into possession at the judge's command will not, according to canonical equity, be punished if within a year he gives security to submit to the law. This is what it says.

Alexander III, to the Bishop of Hereford.

In addition, since it frequently happens that a plaintiff is to be sent into possession for the purpose of preserving the property because of the absence of the adverse party, and because of the latter's fraud or power the plaintiff cannot obtain the thing to be preserved, while, as the end of the year approaches, the defendant offers the security due, lest he lose possession, your fraternity asked us with what kind of penalty the defendant is to be punished because he did not obey the command of the judge. To this we say that in ecclesiastical persons and affairs the rigor and severity of the law is not required nor exercised; rather, since justice is not endangered on this account, it ought patiently to be tolerated and admitted when the defendant binds himself by security to submit to judgment.

Ad quod dicimus, quod in ecclesiasticis personis et negotiis rigor et districtio iuris non requiritur, nec exercetur; sed, quum iustitia propter hoc non periclitatur, patienter tolerari et admitti debet, quum reus per cautionem standi iudicio se adstringit.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: Because of a defendant's contumacy, a judge can sequester the thing sought and condemn the contumacious person in the expenses which the plaintiff incurred because of his contumacy or fraudulent exception. This is what Panormitanus says.

The same, to the Abbot of Ramsey and the Archdeacon of Ely.

We learned from your letters directed to us that, when we considered that the cause conducted between our beloved sons, the monks of Etoll and the canons of Lincoln, and also Gervase, a cleric, concerning the churches of V. and M., should be committed to you, and the canons, although lawfully cited, contumaciously absented themselves, you—although the monks were to be sent into possession of the things sought on account of the contumacy of the adverse party—nevertheless, wishing to act more mildly with them out of regard for their religious state, caused the possession to be sequestered, so that at least in this way the canons, affected by weariness, would be compelled to submit to judgment.

But finally, when the parties had been established in your presence and the aforesaid monks petitioned that the churches be restored to them, the canons answered that your authority had wholly expired because they had obtained letters from us to other judges which appeared to prejudice the former letters. But because no mention of the former letters was made in the later ones, nor were the names of the churches contained in them which had been placed in the former ones, but it was said indefinitely, "concerning certain churches," we, considering that malice and fraud ought to protect no one, and being unwilling to leave so great a mockery unpunished, by commanding your discretion through apostolic writings, order that, when you are requested concerning this, you shall summon the parties before your presence and determine the aforesaid cause according to the form of the former letters, notwithstanding the later letters, causing the expenses which the monks are known to have incurred because of this to be restored to them by the canons.

Tandem vero, partibus in praesentia vestra constitutis, et memoratis monachis ecclesias sibi restitui postulantibus, canonici responderunt, auctoritatem vestram penitus exspirasse eo, quod a nobis ad alios iudices literas impetrarunt, quae praeiudicare prioribus videbantur. Verum quoniam in posterioribus literis non fuit mentio facta priorum, nec in eis nomina continebantur ecclesiarum, quae in prioribus posita fuerant, sed indefinite dicebatur: super quibusdam ecclesiis: nos attendentes, malitiam et dolum nulli patrocinari debere, et nolentes tantam illusionem impunitam relinquere discretioni vestrae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus, quum exinde requisiti fueritis, partes ante vestram convocetis praesentiam, et praedictam causam secundum formam priorum literarum, non obstantibus posterioribus, terminetis, expensas, quas propter hoc monachi fecisse noscuntur, eis a canonicis restitui facientes.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: When the plaintiff is contumacious, witnesses ought to be received and sentence rendered, even when issue has not been joined, at the defendant's urging. This is what it says according to the common understanding.

The same, to the Bishops of Exeter and Winchester and the Abbot of Hereford.

We committed to you, brother bishops, and to our venerable brother, the Bishop of London, under a certain form, for determination the cause which is conducted between the noblemen F. and R. of Arden formerly, son of Agatha, concerning his birth. (And below: cf. c. 17, On the Office of a Delegated Judge, I. 29.) Moreover, if his adversary, having been lawfully cited, should scorn to approach your presence or to obey your judgment, or even if, as is proposed to us, he has absented himself for many days past, since he is said to have departed from England and afterward not to have appeared openly in the land nor approached your presence, you shall nevertheless summon to your presence his proctor, if perhaps he left one. Whether the proctor comes or not, or if he left no proctor, all denunciations having been sent to his house, you shall attentively hear the cause according to the order of law and, after receiving the witnesses of the other party, shall, within three months after receipt of these letters, proceed according to the said form, the obstacle of appeal being removed, to the rendering of sentence, in such a way that you by no means defer the decision of the cause beyond three months, notwithstanding any letters—whether those which make mention of restitution of possession to R. of Arden to be made, or those which make mention of leaving the possessory judgment to the king, or any others—which were obtained before, or if any should happen to be obtained afterward without the tenor of these letters having been set forth. Indeed, if within the aforesaid time you are unable or unwilling to proceed in execution of the things which have been said, we will that our commission ought for this reason to expire.

(*Et infra: cf. c. *17. *de off. iud. del. I. *29.) Ceterum, si adversarius suus legitime citatus ad praesentiam vestram accedere, vel iudicio vestro parere contempserit, aut etiam si ita, sicut nobis proponitur, se absentaverit a multis retro diebus, quum de Anglia recessisse dicatur, nec in terra postea manifeste comparuisse, neque ad praesentiam vestram accesserit, procuratorem eius, si quem forte reliquerit, ad praesentiam vestram nihilominus convocetis, qui sive procurator venerit sive non, aut si procuratorem non dimisit, denunciationibus [omnibus] ad domum eius missis, secundum ordinem iuris causam audiatis attentius, et receptis testibus alterius partis, infra tres menses post harum literarum susceptionem iuxta dictam formam sublato appellationis obstaculo ad proferendam sententiam procedatis, *ita quod ultra tres menses causam ipsam decidere minime differatis, nullis obstantibus literis, sive quae de restitutione possessionis R. de Ardenna facienda, sive quae de possessionis iudicio regi relinquendo fecerint mentionem, sive quibuslibet aliis, quae antea fuerint impetratae, aut si quas in posterum, non exposito tenore literarum istarum contigerit impetrari. Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: If the defendant is contumacious after joinder of issue, then, if the cause is otherwise clear, a definitive sentence is rendered; if it is not clear, the plaintiff is inducted into true possession.

Urban III, to the Priors of Neuflieu and Viger.

As you noted to us in your letters, etc. (And below:) Because the defendant had contumaciously withdrawn from your presence, you compelled him to furnish security under oath that he would obey the law before you in all respects. And when he had presented himself before you on the appointed day, under the pretext of an advocate, whom he did not have, he refused to answer with his customary malice. Finally, at the plaintiff's urging, he answered that he had received for forty years the tithes concerning which there was contention; and afterward, employing various excuses, he broke forth into the utterance of an appeal and, in contempt of his oath, contumaciously withdrew.

Therefore, by commanding you we order that, in order to convict his malice, you summon him once to your presence; and, if he comes, you shall hear what shall be proposed and, appeal ceasing, impose a fitting end upon the business. But if, having been summoned, he scorns to come, you shall nevertheless determine the cause by definitive sentence, since issue has been joined in the matter introduced, or at least adjudge possession to the person present, saving only the question of ownership to the person absent. Concerning that matter, however, etc. (Cf. c. 4, On Parishes, III. 29.)

Tandem actore instante respondit, quod quadraginta annis decimas, de quibus erat contentio, percepisset, variisque postmodum excusationibus utens in vocem appellationis prorupit, et contumaciter iuramento contempto recessit. Ideoque vobis praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus ad convincendam eius malitiam semel eum ad praesentiam vestram convocetis, et, si venerit, audiatis quae fuerint proponenda, et appellatione cessante finem imponatis negotio competentem. Quod si vocatus venire contempserit, vos nihilominus causam, utpote lite, quae ingeritur, contestata, diffinitiva sententia terminetis, vel praesenti saltem adiudicetis possessionem, servata duntaxat quaestione proprietatis absenti. Super eo vero etc. (cf. c. 4. de paroch. III. 29.)

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: One who, after the plaintiff's contention has been established, interposes a peremptory exception which he does not prove immediately but receives delays to prove, if he fails in proving, is immediately, without waiting for the definitive sentence, condemned in expenses and compelled to pay; but if he cannot, he will be punished in his person according to the judgment of the judge. This is what it says. This text is noteworthy according to the reading which pleases Panormitanus.

Innocent III.

Desiring that an end be imposed upon lawsuits, lest the parties be burdened beyond measure with labors and expenses—especially when litigation concerns ecclesiastical benefices or offices, which cannot long remain vacant without loss—we establish by the present decree that, after one party has established its contention, if the other should perhaps wish to interpose a lawful exception which it is unwilling or unable to prove immediately, because exceptions of this kind are frequently interposed through calculated malice to impede or defer the proceeding, then, when delays have been accepted, it shall from that time be condemned, if perhaps it fails in proof, to pay the other party the moderate expenses thereafter to be incurred in the judgment. And if it is not solvent, it shall be punished otherwise according to the judgment of a discerning judge, so that, at least terrified by this fear, no one may readily interpose false exceptions to the injury of another.

> Qui fundata intentione actoris exceptionem peremptoriam obiicit, quam non probat in continenti, sed accipit inducias, si defecerit in probando, condemnatur in continenti, diffinitiva non exspectata, in expensis, ac solvere cogitur; quod si non potest, punietur in corpus secundum arbitrium iudicis. > Finem litibus cupientes imponi, ne partes ultra modum graventur laboribus et expensis, praesertim quum de beneficiis vel officiis ecclesiasticis litigatur, quae sine dispendio diu vacare non possunt, praesenti decreto statuimus, ut, postquam intentionem suam altera pars fundaverit, si reliqua forte voluerit legitimam exceptionem opponere, quam nolit aut nequeat in continenti probare, quia frequenter ad impediendum vel differendum processum exceptiones huiusmodi per excogitatam malitiam opponuntur, ad solvendas alteri parti moderatas expensas extunc in iudicio faciendas, cum acceptis induciis, si forsitan in probatione defecerit, condemnetur. Et si solvendo non fuerit, alias secundum arbitrium discreti iudicis puniatur, ut hoc saltem timore perterritus non facile quis in gravamen alterius falsas exceptiones opponat.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: A person cited for the whole cause, with a certain term assigned for appearing, is bound to appear at the term; and, if an impediment exists at the term, he ought to appear as soon as he can after the term; otherwise he will be condemned in expenses from the time the citation was issued.

The same, to the Bishop of Palestrina, Legate of the Apostolic See, and the Dean of Brin.

When the beloved sons Master S. of Liège and H., canon of Laon, messengers of the beloved son H., called Bishop-elect of Liège, had formerly approached the Apostolic See on his behalf, the beloved son [L.], archdeacon, and H., canon of the Church of Liège, afterward coming to our presence in their own names and those of certain of their fellow canons—L., archdeacon, H., cantor, L., provost of Saint Peter, and certain others—whose letters of ratification concerning the same business they exhibited to us, proposed certain crimes against that bishop-elect, through which they endeavored to repel him from election to the Church of Liège as unworthy. (And below:)

Although, however, no slight suspicion had arisen against him from the fact that the same bishop-elect appealed from the grievance of the adverse party and that, although the appeal had not been interposed through sufficient proctors, he could have prosecuted it while they prosecuted, nevertheless, wishing to observe the order of law in all things, by strictly commanding him we ordered that by the Sunday then past on which "I am the good shepherd" is sung, he should approach our presence either personally or through a sufficient proctor sufficiently instructed, lest he appear afterward to evade examination through delays or any occasions, to answer concerning all the aforesaid matters; otherwise, since we assigned the aforesaid term to him as peremptory, he should know that, so far as we could by law, we would thereafter proceed in the aforesaid business.

Therefore, while his adversaries waited for him at the Apostolic See, we considered that he should be awaited for a long time, even beyond the term; but he neither came nor sent a sufficient proctor, but only a simple messenger bearing letters of his excuse. For he wrote that he had received late the aforesaid Master S., his messenger, upon whom, when he withdrew from us, we had enjoined orally that he should cite the same man; hence, both on account of the shortness of the term and the dangers of the roads, he could not present himself before us. But it operated against this that, just as he had sent to us an excuser, so he could have sent a representative, since it had not been enjoined upon him that he come to the cause only in his own person, but that either he should approach or he should send a suitable proctor.

Furthermore, when someone is commanded to present himself to a judge at a certain term, two things are commanded under this form: that he come to the judge and that he approach on the day appointed to him. Hence, if he cannot come on the assigned day, he is nevertheless bound to present himself to the judge, as reason suggests and lawful sanction manifests. For if someone is commanded to pay a certain thing to another on a certain day, he will not for that reason be released from the command if he is unable to pay on the given day; indeed, he is bound to payment even when the day appointed for payment has elapsed.

Wherefore, because the said bishop-elect neither came nor sent a sufficient representative on the day appointed to him, or afterward, although awaited for a rather long time, and because there was no hope of his nearby arrival—inasmuch as he had in some fashion excused his delay by letters and feared the summer heats and ambushes set for him—by the counsel of our brothers we held him contumacious and took care to condemn him to the lawful and moderate expenses which his adversaries had incurred from the time the citation was issued, when they began to await him, regarding as frivolous what was meanwhile said by some to have been attempted concerning H., provost of Saint Denis.

(Et infra:) Quamvis autem ex eo, quod idem electus a gravamine adversae partis appellaverit, et appellationem non fuerit interpositam per sufficientes procuratores, quum possit, illis prosequentibus, prosecutus, his non levis exorta esset suspicio contra eum, volentes tamen in omnibus iuris ordinem observare, ipsi districte praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus usque ad dominicam, qua cantatur: Ego sum pastor bonus, transactam per se vel per procuratorem sufficientem sufficienter instructum, ne postmodum per dilationes vel occasiones quaslibet subterfugere videretur examen, ad praesentiam nostram accederet, super praedictis omnibus responsurus; alioquin, quum assignaremus ei pro peremptorio terminum supradictum, sciret, quod, quantum de iure possemus, procederemus extunc in negotio memorato. Exspectantibus igitur adversariis eius apud apostolicam sedem, ipsum diu etiam ultra terminum duximus exspectandum; sed ipse nec venit, nec sufficientem procuratorem direxit, sed simplicem solummodo nuncium excusationis eius literas afferentem. Scribebat enim, quod praedictum magistrum S. nuncium suum, cui nos, quum a nobis recederet, iniunximus viva voce, ut citaret eundem, sero receperat; unde non poterat, tum propter termini brevitatem, tum propter viarum discrimina, nostro se conspectui praesentare. Sed contra hoc faciebat, quod, sicut excusatorem ad nos direxerat, sic dirigere potuerat responsalem, quum ei non fuisset iniunctum, ut ad causam in propria persona duntaxat veniret, sed vel ipse accederet, vel procuratorem idoneum destinaret. Praeterea quum mandatur alicui, ut ad certum terminum se iudici repraesentet, duo sub hac forma mandantur, ut ad iudicem veniat, et ad diem sibi praefixam accedat. Unde si venire non possit ad diem assignatum, tenetur nihilominus se iudici praesentare, sicut ratio suggerit et legitima sanctio manifestat. Si enim mandatur alicui, ut alii ad certum diem certam rem exsolvat, non ideo erit a mandato solutus, si solvere nequiverit die data; immo ad solutionem elapso etiam die solutioni praefixo tenetur. Quapropter quia dictus electus nec venerat, nec sufficientem miserat responsalem, ad diem sibi statutum vel post etiam diutius exspectatus, nec de vicino eius adventu spes erat, utpote qui per literas utcunque excusaverat moram suam, et calores aestivos et insidias sibi positas formidabat, eum de consilio fratrum nostrorum reputavimus contumacem, et ad legitimas et moderatas expensas, quas adversarii eius fecerant a tempore citationis emissae, quem extunc exspectare inceperant, ipsum curavimus condemnare, quod de H. praeposito sancti Dionysii dicebatur interim ab aliquibus attentatum fricolum reputantes.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: A sentence in a beneficial cause does not pass into res judicata with respect to a superior so as to prevent him from being able to inquire into the rights of the parties, especially when sentence was rendered against a person absent, although contumacious and undefended.

The same, to the Archbishops of Armagh and Cashel.

When formerly the cleric D., presenting diverse letters of the prelates of Ireland to Pope Celestine, our predecessor, asserted that he had been elected Bishop of Ross, and no one appeared who proposed anything against him, our said predecessor caused the office of consecration to be conferred upon him through A., Bishop of Albano of good memory, and sent him back consecrated to his church. But afterward the beloved sons F. and G., monks, approaching the presence of the same predecessor of ours, each asserted that he had been elected by the canons of the Church of Ross, and the same F. explained that the aforesaid D. had been consecrated to the same church at the Apostolic See, which he had circumvented through false letters.

For this reason our same predecessor committed their cause to you, brothers, the Bishops of Cashel and Laon, under this form: that you should solicitously inquire into the form and proceeding of the election of the aforesaid D.; and, if it were established that he had been canonically elected, you should cause him to enjoy peaceful possession; otherwise, you should hear the cause between the aforesaid F. and G., and whichever one's election you found to have been canonical and more reasonably made, reason going before, you should take care to prefer it to the election of the other; and you, brother of Cashel, should consecrate as bishop the one whom you reasonably considered should be confirmed.

But, as we learned from your letters, when the letters of the said commission had been presented to you, you wished first, according to their tenor, to inquire into the election of the aforesaid D. When the said D., although cited by you a third time, was unwilling to present himself before you, you proceeded in the cause; and you learned, both from the testimony of the clergy and people of the Church of Ross and from the assertion of the illustrious King of Cork and the prelates of his province, that the election of the aforesaid F. had been canonically celebrated, and afterward took care to confirm it by apostolic authority, especially since the chapter of the Church of Ross steadfastly asserted that it had not elected the said D., nor had it thought in any way about the election of the aforesaid monk G.

Meanwhile, however, the aforesaid D., approaching the Apostolic See [and] making no mention at all of the aforesaid commission or even of the elections of the aforesaid persons, [did not fear to suggest to us that, when he was returning to the diocese of Ross with the aforesaid letters of our predecessor, the aforesaid King of Cork had caused it to be prohibited to him that he enter the diocese or Church of Ross until he paid, or at least promised, a certain sum of money to him. But when his friends afterward, without his knowledge, promised certain gifts to the king, he was admitted to his church and ministered in it for half a year. But when he was unwilling to pay the money promised by his friends, the king, moved to anger, commanded the dean to show him no reverence. Although the dean was bound to the said D. by an oath, nevertheless, because he could not obtain the archdeaconry from him for his still-young son, on the Thursday of Holy Week he presumed to steal the oil which ought to have been blessed; and, although on account of this he had been bound by D. with the bond of excommunication, nevertheless, on the Tuesday of the following week he stole the books of the Church of Ross and did not at all hesitate to transfer himself to the king against him. Wearied by the harassment of these two, he was compelled to leave the king's land, on account of which he obtained from us letters to our venerable brother, the Bishop of Ferns, and his co-judges, directing them diligently to induce and admonish the aforesaid king to permit him to return safely to his church without any exaction of money and to exercise the administration of the episcopate in temporal and spiritual matters; otherwise, they were to bind the king with the bond of excommunication and subject his land to interdict, relaxing neither sentence until he fulfilled the apostolic mandate concerning D.'s reception. They were also to compel the aforesaid dean, if the foregoing were established to them, to come to the Apostolic See, suspended from office and benefice, and, until he came to his senses, cause him to be publicly announced as excommunicated.]

Furthermore, he obtained letters concerning certain other grievances and injuries against the said F. and certain others, [asserting that the same bishop detained the rights of the Church of Ross and that the same monk F. had rashly laid violent hands upon the archdeacon and clerics. Moreover, when the same D. departed from us with letters of this kind, after a space of almost three months] the said monk F. approached the Apostolic See and afterward presented to us letters on your behalf which contained how you had proceeded in the aforesaid commission. Therefore, after diligent deliberation concerning this had been held with our brothers, fearing lest, just as our predecessor is said to have been circumvented through the letters which the same D. had presented to him, it might also happen that we were circumvented through your letters, presented to us by the same monk, wishing therefore still to act mercifully with the absent man, so that [both] his malice might be [more strongly] convicted, we considered that the said monk F. should be remitted jointly to you, by more strictly commanding your fraternity through apostolic writings that, notwithstanding the fact that the election of the same F. had been confirmed, you should lawfully cite the often-mentioned D., if he could be found in Ireland, to the cause and, after the faculty of defense had been granted to him, should proceed canonically in the cause itself, having God alone before your eyes.

If, having been found, he should scorn to present himself before you within three months, you shall proceed to the consecration of the said F., every occasion being set aside. But if he is not found in Ireland, after a period of one year has been granted to him from the time when he is understood to have appealed to us—if not by word, nevertheless by deed—by undertaking the journey to come to the Apostolic See, you shall commit the administration of the Church of Ross in spiritual and temporal matters to the said F.; and, when that period has elapsed, you shall not defer to consecrate him as bishop. [Lest, however, etc. Given at Perugia on the fifteenth day before the Kalends of October. 1198.]

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: If proceedings are conducted by way of inquisition against a person contumaciously absent, witnesses can be received even when issue has not been joined, and a definitive sentence can be rendered, even by way of deposition, if the offense merits this.

The same.

The word emitted by the instrument of the Lord's voice is a word of truth: that the tree which uselessly occupies the earth is deservedly judged to be cut down and cast into the fire, so that the earth, which is held barren under the harmful occupation of a useless tree, may through a new planting receive suitable cultivation for bearing fruit. Not without reason is H., formerly Bishop of Chur, compared to this tree, for he has until now detained the Church of Chur through violence and, as the beloved sons, the canons of Chur, V., S., and R., and Be. Ro., pleban of Saint George, reported in our tribunal on your behalf, the aforesaid H., Bishop of Chur, not only brought his church low by dilapidating it, as public infamy proclaimed, but polluted it with homicide, incest, and other crimes.

But we, as those upon whom the correction of these matters lies, when your canons themselves, induced by good zeal, as we judge, took care to accuse the aforesaid bishop [and], considering the enormities of the same man, to bring them to our ears—fearing lest, as is contained in the decree of Gelasius, they would incur apostolic offense if they thought that excesses of this kind ought to be suppressed from the hearing of the Catholic Church—first committed the cause concerning these matters to our venerable brother, the Bishop of Trent, and the beloved sons, the Abbot of Mount Saint Mary and the Provost of Isola; and a second time to our venerable brother, the Bishop of Brescia, and again to the same abbot and provost, etc. But when the bishop himself had contumaciously scorned to approach the presence of the first judges, etc., he was suspended from office and benefice by those first judges under our authority. (And the rest:)

Finally, having been called before the judges by canonical citation, he with difficulty presented himself; but then, advancing a frivolous excuse conceived in malice, he neglected to proceed at law with the canons. For this reason, we, by the counsel of our brothers, suspending the bishop himself —or rather, confirming by apostolic authority the suspension made by the judges—committed the cause concerning these matters for a third time to our venerable brother, the Bishop of Como, and the beloved son, the Abbot of Saint A., to be heard in order to overcome the malice of the bishop himself. They, after the parties had been cited, having associated with themselves prudent and honorable men, when he appeared neither personally nor through a suitable representative, rendered a sentence of excommunication against the bishop on account of his disobedience, admitting the witnesses on your behalf as they had received in mandate from us—namely, abbots, priors, provosts, and other religious men—through whom it was established that every article of the aforesaid crimes had been proved. (And below:)

We therefore, seeing that the judicial order had been observed in this deed, considering furthermore that after the sentences rendered against him he presumed to celebrate, and since many prelates of churches wrote against that bishop and not one wrote in his defense or even to excuse him in any respect, wishing in the name of the Lord with the Apostle to avenge every disobedience, although absent in body yet present in spirit, according to the word of the same Apostle we rendered a sentence of perpetual deposition against him; and, depriving him both of pontifical office and of every priestly office, we considered that he should be condemned without any hope of restitution, nevertheless revoking as void whatever, after the prohibition of the Apostolic See or after the suspension and excommunication had been made, he presumed to alienate from the goods of the church.

Latin source headnote: A plaintiff who is not admitted into the possession decreed to him by a judge for the purpose of preserving the property, or who is expelled from it, becomes a true possessor through the lapse of a year.

The same, in the General Council.

It sometimes happens that, when possession for the purpose of preserving the property is adjudged to a plaintiff because of the contumacy of the adverse party, because of the defendant's power or fraud the plaintiff cannot obtain the thing to be preserved within a year, or loses it after acquiring it; and thus, since according to the assertion of many he would not become a true possessor after the lapse of a year, the defendant derives advantage from his own malice. Therefore, lest the contumacious person be in a better condition than the obedient person, according to canonical equity we decree that in the aforesaid case the plaintiff shall, when a year has elapsed, be constituted a true possessor. [For this, etc. (Cf. c. 8, On Arbitrators, I. 43.)]

Ne igitur contumax melioris quam obediens conditionis exsistat, de canonica aequitate sancimus, ut in casu praemisso actor verus constituatur elapso anno possessor. Title XV: On One Sent into Possession for the Purpose of Preserving the Property

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: One sent into possession by the first decree in a real action acquires, through the lapse of a year, true and unchangeable possession of that thing, although the person who suffered the sending into possession had within the year the intention of furnishing security but, through his own default, did not put it into effect. This is what it says according to the true understanding.

Alexander III, to the Prior and Brothers of Guisborough.

When our beloved son R., your canon, and the representatives of our beloved son G., provost of Beril, were established in our presence, concerning possession of the church of Lamento, into which you had been inducted for the purpose of preserving the property by our mandate and authority through the delegated judges, namely the Bishop of Exeter and the Prior of Chinelwi, there was debate on each side before us for some time.

Finally, however, after the reasons and allegations on each side had been produced, we gathered from the assertion of each party that, although you had been inducted into possession of the same church only for the purpose of preserving the property, nevertheless within the year the other party did not furnish security with you concerning the same cause to submit to the law, although it had the intention of furnishing that security and you were prepared to receive it. Hence it is that, by apostolic authority with the common counsel of our brothers, we decree that you shall henceforth possess the aforesaid church freely and without any contradiction, saving the right which the same provost is known to have in seeking the church; nor shall the aforesaid provost dare henceforth in any respect to harass you with vexations concerning the same possession.

But so that the sentence of our determination may be inviolably observed in future times, we have considered that it should be strengthened by apostolic protection, establishing that it shall be lawful for no person whatsoever to infringe this page of our determination. But if anyone should presume to attempt this, let him know that he will incur the indignation of Almighty God and of the Apostles Peter and Paul.

DE EO, QUI MITTITUR IN POSSESSIONEM CAUSA REI SERVANDAE.

Missus in possessionem ex primo decreto in reali, per lapsum anni veram et incommutabilem illius rei possessionem acquirit, licet passus missionem habuerit infra annum voluntatem cautionem praestandi, quam tamen non deduxit ad effectum suo defectu. Hoc dicit secundum verum intellectum.

Alexander III. Priori et Fratribus de Guiseburch.

Constitutis in praesentia nostra dilecto filio nostro R. canonico vestro, et responsalibus dilecti filii nostri G. praepositi de Beril. super possessione ecclesiae de Lamento, in quam de mandato et auctoritate nostra per iudices delegatos, videlicet Exoniensem episcopum et priorem de Chinelwi, causa rei servandae fueratis inducti, hinc inde fuit coram nobis aliquamdiu disputatum. Tandem vero post rationes et allegationes utrinque productas ex utriusque partis assertione tenuimus, quod licet causa rei servandae tantum in eiusdem ecclesiae possessionem inducti fueritis, infra annum tamen altera pars super eadem causa vobiscum standi iuri non praestitit cautionem: licet voluntatem ipsam cautionem praestandi habuerit, et vos eam parati recipere fuissetis. Inde est, quod nos de communi fratrum nostrorum consilio auctoritate apostolica decernimus, ut vos amodo possessionem praescriptae ecclesiae, salvo iure, quod idem praepositus in petenda ecclesia habere dignoscitur, libere et absque contradictione qualibet habeatis, nec praefatus praepositus super eadem possessione vos audeat aliquatenus de cetero vexationibus fatigare. Ut autem nostrae diffinitionis sententia futuris temporibus inviolabiliter observetur, eam apostolico duximus patrocinio roborandam, statuentes, ut nulli omnino hominum liceat hanc paginam nostrae diffinitionis infringere. Si quis autem hoc attentare praesumpserit, indignationem omnipotentis Dei et Apostolorum Petri et Pauli se asserit incursurum.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: The period of a year does not run against the person who suffered the sending into possession if, within that period, he offered security to the judges, or to one of them while the others were absent, although it was not received by them or by him. And according to this understanding, this is a noteworthy case.

Clement III, to the Bishop and Archdeacon of York.

When, as we have learned, a question was being conducted between the beloved son P., subdean of Bayeux, and the beloved daughters in Christ, the abbess and convent of Holy Trinity of Caen, concerning the church of Capit, the abbots of Thaurin and Corinth and the archdeacon of Chima, delegated by the Apostolic See, sent those nuns into possession of the thing sought for the purpose of preserving the property, which the constitution of the law appears to have decreed against contumacious persons. Hence, when this came to the knowledge of the subdean, he approached the aforesaid archdeacon and, offering him security for submitting to judgment—because the Abbot of Corinth had departed for England and the Abbot of Thaurin had entered upon the way of all flesh—urgently petitioned that possession be resigned to him according to the order of law within the year; but he could not obtain this.

But in the course of time the nuns whom we have mentioned obtained other letters to our venerable brother W., Archbishop of Rouen, and the beloved sons, the Abbot of Saint Catherine and I. of Vieux-Pont, Archdeacon of Rouen. The subdean, as they assert, refuses to undergo their judgment for this reason: that he holds the aforesaid archbishop suspect for a certain reason and fears that the co-judges may readily be drawn by his authority to either party. But because no one is compelled against his will to be subjected to the judgment of suspect judges, through apostolic writings we command your discretion that, if the subdean shows a certain ground of suspicion against the archbishop, you shall hear the business and determine it, appeal being removed, by the mediation of justice; yet first, if it is so, after security for submitting to judgment has been received from him, you shall cause possession to be restored to him. Nor do we will that it stand in the way that the year is alleged to have elapsed, if it did not stand through him that he did not receive possession and furnish security within the year. But if you learn that anything was wrongfully changed against him concerning this through the aforesaid letters after he refused the suspect judges, you shall reduce it to the due state, proceeding in all these matters without the obstacle of appeal.

Tempus annale non currit missionem passo, si infra illud cautionem iudicibus vel alteri eorum aliis absentibus obtulit, licet per eos seu per eum recepta non fuerit. Et est casus notabilis secundum hunc intellectum.

Clemens III. Episcopo et Archidiacono Eboracensibus.

Quum, sicut accepimus, inter dilectum filium P. subdecanum Baiocensem et dilectas in Christo filias, abbatissam et conventum sanctae Trinitatis de Cadomo super ecclesia de Capit. quaestio verteretur, de Thaurino et de Corinth. abbates, ac archidiaconus Chima. a sede apostolica delegati, moniales ipsas rei servandae causa in possessionem rei petitae miserunt, quod in personas contumacium iuris videtur constitutio decrevisse. Unde, quum hoc ad subdecani notitiam pervenisset, ad archidiaconum praedictum accessit, et offerens ei sistendi iudicio cautionem, quoniam abbas de Corinth. profectus erat in Angliam, et abbas Thaurinensis viam fuerat universae carnis ingressus, possessionem infra annum sibi iuris ordine resignari cum instantia postulavit, sed non potuit obtinere. Processu vero temporis moniales, quas diximus, ad venerabilem fratrem nostrum W. Rothomagensem archiepiscopum et dilectos filios abbatem S. Catharinae et I. de Veteri Ponte archidiaconum Rothomagensem literas alias impetrarum, quorum iudicium ideo subdecanus, sicut asserunt, subire recusat, quod praedictum archiepiscopum habet certa ratione suspectum, et metuit, ne coniudices ad partem quamlibet eius auctoritate de facili trahantur. Quia vero nemo invitus suspectorum iudicum compellitur iudicio subiacere, Discretioni vestrae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus, si certam suspicionis causam contra archiepiscopum ostenderit subdecanus, audiatis negotium, et appellatione remota mediante iustitia terminetis, in primis tamen, si, ita est sistendi iudicio ab eo cautione recepta, ei possessionem restitui faciatis. Nec obstare volumus, quod annus elapsus esse proponitur, si per eum non steterit, quo minus infra annum et possessionem receperit, et dederit cautionem. Si quid autem per praedictas literas, ex quo suspectos iudices recusavit, adversus eum super hoc noveritis contra iustitiam innovatum, in statum debitum reducatis, in his omnibus sine appellationis obstaculo processuri.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: If the person who suffered the sending into possession, in seeking possession again, alleges that he was not contumacious, he is restored to his former state after security has been furnished, and condemnation in expenses is deferred; he avoids that condemnation if it is afterward established that he was not contumacious.

Innocent III, to the Bishops of Urbino and Senigallia.

When the beloved sons, the Abbot of Saint Angelo on behalf of his monastery, and the nobleman P. Gal., a knight, on behalf of himself, his father, and his wife, came to the Apostolic See, the same P. proposed before us that, when the aforesaid abbot had drawn him into a cause concerning a certain possession before our beloved son John, cardinal priest of the title of Saint Prisca, then legate of the Apostolic See in the March, he asserted before the same cardinal that he would answer him according to the good custom of the land. But the legate himself committed their cause to judges for determination according to the law and the good custom of that land. When they wished to proceed in the cause according only to the law and not according to a custom of this kind, the aforesaid P. appealed from them, as persons who wished to exceed the form of the mandate, to our hearing. Nevertheless, the judges decreed that the adverse party should be inducted into possession of the things sought for the purpose of custody, in such a way that, if the knight himself furnished security for submitting to judgment within a year and a day and restored thirty pounds to the other party for expenses, he would receive that possession.

And when our beloved son G., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Mary across the Tiber, legate of the Apostolic See, afterward entered that land within the year, the knight offered before him security to submit to the law and petitioned that possession be restored to him. But the same legate cited the aforesaid abbot to the cause, to whom afterward the same knight was prepared to restore the expenses incurred in the suit, which, as he asserts, did not exceed the sum of six pounds; but the abbot petitioned that the amount of thirty pounds be restored to him. (And below:)

We therefore, when the often-mentioned knight sought that possession be restored to him, while the abbot petitioned that he be constituted a true possessor by the second decree, understanding that the abbot himself had confessed in law that the often-mentioned knight had applied to that cardinal within the lawful time—indeed, had even offered before the same cardinal, within the year, security to submit to the law—and that the cardinal had sent his letters to him within the year, although he was cited for a later term, believe that P. himself should, after security has been furnished, be reduced into possession. We also decree that, if it is established that that custom which the knight alleges is praiseworthy, because it follows from this that he reasonably appealed, he shall by no means be compelled to restore the expenses. Otherwise, if you find that custom to be reprobated, since it appears from this that he appealed for the purpose of frustration, he shall be compelled to restitution of those expenses which it is established that the abbot necessarily incurred in the suit because of this.

> Si passus missionem, repetens possessionem, allegat se contumacem non fuisse, restituitur in pristinum statum praestita cautione, et dilata condemnatione expensarum, quam evitat, si postea constiterit, eum non fuisse contumacem.

Title XVI: That Nothing Be Altered While Litigation Is Pending

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: Even a privilege obtained from a prince, through which someone is deprived of the use of possession while litigation is pending without cognizance of the cause, is invalid as surreptitiously obtained, or is to be revoked as contrary to reason.

Alexander III, to the Archbishop of York.

It has not fallen from our memory how, in the first year of our advancement, you caused to be presented to us a transcript of the letters of Pope Honorius, our predecessor of happy memory, in which it was contained that it had been granted by apostolic kindness to your predecessors that both they and their successors should be free to have the cross borne before them throughout all England. We, however, adhering to the footsteps of our predecessor, confirmed to you under the protection of our writing what had been kindly granted to your predecessors by our predecessor. But afterward T., formerly Archbishop of Canterbury of holy and venerable memory, judging that this redounded to the depression of his right and dignity, began to move a question concerning it. And for this reason he appealed to the Apostolic See, affirming, if we remember correctly, that this had by no means been lawful for you and your predecessors. And thus it happened that through our writings we prohibited you from daring for any reason to have the cross borne before you in the province of the Church of Canterbury until cognizance had been taken of the cause itself. Therefore, because through our beloved sons I. and A., your clerics, you laid a grave complaint before us, asserting that we had despoiled you, before cognizance in judgment, of possession of this thing which you and your predecessors had held, we, wishing to defer to you as our venerable brother and to preserve your rights unimpaired [and] inviolate, by the present letters establish that our letters of prohibition, which we directed to your fraternity at the petition of the Archbishop of Canterbury, shall create no prejudice against you whereby you and your successors are not free—as has been granted to you by the benefit of the privileges of the Apostolic See and as you and your predecessors have been accustomed to do this—to have the cross borne before you throughout all England, until it is decreed by definitive sentence whether your church ought by right to have this.

> Privilegium etiam a principe impetratum, per quod privatur quis sine causae cognitione, lite pendente, usu possessionis, tanquam surreptitium non valet, seu tanquam rationi obvium est revocandum.

Alexander III. Eboracensi Archiepiscopo.

A memoria, nostra non excidit, *qualiter in primo anno nostrae promotionis transscriptum literarum felicis memoriae praedecessoris nostri Honorii Papae nobis feceris praesentari, in quo continebatur, antecessoribus tuis apostolica benignitate esse indultum, ut tam eis, quam successoribus suis liberum esset per totam Angliam ante se crucem deferre. Nos vero antecessoris nostri vestigiis inhaerentes, tibi sub scripti nostri munimine confirmavimus quod antecessoribus tuis fuerat a praedecessore nostro clementer indultum. Postmodum vero sanctae et venerandae memoriae T. quondam Cantuariensis archiepiscopus existimans hoc in depressionem iuris et suae dignitatis redundare, exinde coepit quaestionem movere. Et propter hoc ad sedem apostolicam appellavit, affirmans, si bene meminimus, quod tibi et praedecessoribus tuis id nullatenus licuisset. Sicque factum est, quod nos tibi per scripta nostra prohibuerimus, ne in provincia Cantuariensis ecclesiae, donec de ipsa causa cognosceretur, ante te crucem deferre aliqua ratione auderes. Quia ergo per dilectos filios nostros I. et A. clericos tuos gravem coram nobis querimoniam deposuisti, asserens, quod te de possessione huius rei, quam tu et antecessores tui habuistis, ante cognitionem iudicii spoliassemus, volentes nos tibi tanquam venerabili fratri nostro deferre, et iura tua integra *[et] illibata servare, praesentibus literis Statuimus, ut literae prohibitionis nostrae, quas ad petitionem archiepiscopi Cantuariensis tuae fraternitati direximus, nullum tibi praeiudicium faciant, quo minus tibi et successoribus tuis liberum sit, quemadmodum vobis est beneficio privilegiorum apostolicae sedis indultum, et tu et praedecessores tui id consuevistis facere, ante vos per totam Angliam deferre crucem, quousque diffinitiva sententia decernatur, an ecclesia tua de iure hoc debeat habere.

Clement III.

A praiseworthy—(And below: [*Cf. Comp. To this we answer briefly that, since Alexander II expressly prohibits persons from being separated from one another until a just examination of the cause is made, and the institution of Pope Symmachus contains that any prelate who is accused ought not to be abandoned by his subjects before the things alleged shine forth in the light, in the present matter either one of the spouses who is accused cannot, before the accusation is proved, be deprived of the right which that person has in the other. The Church of Saint Mary in Via Lata moved a question before the judge L., in the time of B., called Carosomo, senator, against John of Ateia, who was said to detain certain of its possessions contrary to justice. (And below: [Cf. c. 10, On Constitutions, I. 2.]) We prohibit you from presuming meanwhile to alienate the possessions which succeeded into the place and right of those which the Church of Saint Mary had sought from John of Ateia and which were transferred by the same John into your monastery while litigation was pending, so that, if the Church of Saint Mary should perhaps wish to proceed either concerning the vice of the litigated contract or concerning ownership, it may, if it prevails in judgment, have something which it can evict and possess, lest it labor in vain when your monastery no longer possesses it. Chapter V

Latin source headnote: A suit is to be decided according to the laws existing at the time of the controversy, not according to a privilege obtained while litigation is pending, unless it makes mention of the pendency of the suit.

Honorius III, to the Chancellor, Cantor, and A., Canon of Paris.

The beloved son Master A., parson of the church of Basseville, explained before us that, when a question had arisen between his predecessor on the one side and the prior and monks of Basseville in the diocese of Chartres on the other, concerning the tithes of newly cultivated lands situated within the bounds of his parish, while it was pending before judges delegated by the Apostolic See, the abbot and convent of Saint Martin of Marmoutier at Tours, to whom the aforesaid prior and monks are subject, obtained from the Apostolic See for themselves and their members an indulgence concerning the receipt of tithes of this kind. Under pretext of it the said prior and monks strive to claim the aforesaid tithes for themselves, although no mention of the above-mentioned question had been made in that indulgence. Therefore, we command your discretion that by our authority you enjoin upon the same judges to whom that question was committed that, notwithstanding the aforesaid indulgence, they proceed in the business according to the form handed down to them.

Title XVII: On the Sequestration of Possessions and Fruits

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A thing into possession of which a sending has been made ought not to be sequestered, even if the person sent into it was violently ejected from it. Or, more notably, thus: A sequestration made in place of a sending into possession for the avoidance of scandal ought to be revoked after security has been offered and expenses restored.

Innocent III, to the Archbishop of Milan.

For this God anointed us [with the oil of gladness above our fellows, that we should love justice and hate iniquity. We fulfill this laudably when, walking on the royal road, we turn aside neither to the right nor deviate at all to the left, but, justly pursuing what is just, we neither regard the person of the poor nor honor the face of the powerful, because there is no acceptance of persons before the Lord; when we also discuss merits by subtle examination and consider the quality of petitions, so that we render to everyone his right and reasonably repel petitions which do not accord with reason.]

For the Abbot of Regula, coming to the Apostolic See, explained to us [and our brothers] that, when M., [formerly Archbishop of Milan], your predecessor, concerning the cause which had been conducted for a rather long time between him and his monastery, after many commissions finally obtained letters directed to [our venerable brother] the Bishop of Verona, [a cardinal of the Roman Church], and he, [the delegated judge, after the parties had been established in his presence], rendered sentence in the possessory judgment partly for the monastery and partly for the archbishop, when the proctor of that monastery afterward wished to institute a question concerning ownership, [the archbishop's party rather often sought delays and adjournments. And when the same archbishop had very often informed the aforesaid Bishop of Verona by letters that he by no means declined his judgment, and each party was at Novara before the messenger of the bishop himself, who had been sent for this purpose,] the archbishop objected that the bishop's jurisdiction had expired, asserting that only the cause of possession and not that of ownership had been committed, and that, because he had pronounced concerning possession, having once discharged his office, he could not thereafter take cognizance of the question of ownership. [And after alleging these matters, the aforesaid archbishop appealed.]

To these things the monastery's party proposed to the contrary that the cause conducted between the archbishop and the monastery had been committed to the aforesaid bishop absolutely and without distinction, and it therefore said that the scope of the cause ought not to be divided. [It also added that, since the archbishop had so often sought from the judge a delay and a place in which he ought to answer before him concerning that question of ownership, he could not afterward refuse him or appeal in any respect; especially because, while the adverse party was absent, as stated above, he himself had petitioned for the same judge and had caused the remedy of appeal to be prohibited in the apostolic rescript.]

But the judge, [having employed the counsel of prudent men], decreed that, on account of the archbishop's contumacy, the plaintiff should be sent into the possession which had been adjudged by the bishop himself to that archbishop, from which, nevertheless, the archbishop violently ejected the monastery. And when [the beloved son G., then prior but now abbot of that monastery, and G., messenger of the adverse party], approached the Apostolic See for this reason, Pope Celestine, our predecessor of good memory, after all the matters stated above had been more fully understood through [our beloved sons Hugh, cardinal priest of the title] of Saint Martin, and the cardinal deacon of Saint Mary in Aquiro, whom he had granted to them as auditors, through

[Al. of good memory,] then Bishop of Albano, interpreted his rescript in this manner: that both the cause of possession and that of ownership had been delegated to the judge, since it had been committed absolutely and without distinction and its scope ought not to be divided, [and that for the aforesaid reasons the same judge could not have been refused by the archbishop even through the obstacle of appeal.]

Therefore, the same predecessor of ours, wishing to defer to the archbishop and abbot without injury to justice, also ordered the aforesaid possession to be sequestered with our venerable brother the Bishop of Vercelli and the Bishop of Novara of good memory according to his judgment. He enjoined upon [our venerable brother] the Bishop of Reggio and the [then, of happy memory,] Bishop of Modena that, [having summoned the parties to their presence and notwithstanding any contradiction or appeal concerning either the principal or the incidental matter], after taking fuller cognizance within two months of the cause of possession and ownership, they should decide it with a due end and afterward resign possession to the party which prevailed triumphantly concerning ownership.

[*And when the same letters reached the said Bishops of Modena and Reggio and the parties had been established in their presence, the archbishop's proctor offered security to purge the contumacy, if any had preceded. The monastery's proctor was unwilling to receive it unless sequestration of the possession first occurred and the right which belonged to him from a commission of this kind was preserved, so that the archbishop should seek from him in judgment as from the possessor. When, on the other hand, the archbishop's proctor answered that it ought to be sought from him as from the possessor, the debate was prolonged, and the term within which the aforesaid bishops ought to have taken cognizance concerning ownership expired. Moreover, a messenger of the monastery, again approaching the Roman Church, asserted that it had stood through the archbishop that neither had possession been sequestered nor had proceedings concerning ownership been conducted in the cause. For this reason our said predecessor commanded our venerable brother, the Bishop of Bobbio, through apostolic writings that, after possession, together with the fruits received from it, had been restored to the monastery, they should afterward hear whatever question the parties had against one another.

When he commanded through his messenger that, according to the tenor of the apostolic mandate, the abbot be inducted into the possession which the Bishop of Verona had adjudged, Hugh of Camerario violently ejected the abbot from it. With his accomplices he drove away by armed force both the bishop's messenger and the abbot and monks; burned with fire the boat by whose conveyance they had approached there; plundered the cells of the monastery; beat several lay brothers; and did not blush to burn houses situated outside the enclosure of the cloister, together with certain animals and a certain man. After this reached the hearing of the same predecessor of ours through the report of the abbot's messenger, by strictly commanding our venerable brother, the Bishop of Ferrara, he ordered that, having summoned the parties and after possession, together with the fruits received from it from the time of the sentence rendered by the said Bishop of Verona, had been restored to the monastery, he should take cognizance concerning ownership and, preserving it unharmed in the possession adjudged to it, should decree what was just and cause it to be firmly observed by apostolic authority, the obstacle of appeal being removed. He was also to restrain by sentence of excommunication, appeal being removed, those who opposed apostolic mandates or troubled the monastery concerning the other possession; and he was to announce the said Hugh and his accomplices as excommunicated and cause them to be avoided by all until they made competent satisfaction to the monastery for all things taken and injuries inflicted and presented themselves before the apostolic countenance with his letters, unless you, brother archbishop, exercised against them this coercion as had been commanded to you.

But the said Bishop of Ferrara, having received letters of the Apostolic See concerning this, as we learned from his letters, after admonition had been made, promulgated a sentence of excommunication against Hugh of Camerario and his accomplices when you were unwilling to excommunicate him within the appointed term; and when, although lawfully cited by him, you neither approached nor sent a sufficient representative, but excused your absence by words and letters, he pronounced, saving the question of ownership, that possession was to be restored to the monastery. And when he caused the abbot to be inducted into it through his messenger, that abbot was cast out from it through the violence of armed men, at the command of you, brother archbishop, Hugh of Camerario, and the beloved sons, the consuls of Milan.

For this reason the same abbot petitioned us that we ought to confirm by apostolic authority the sentence of restitution so often rendered for him and, after possession had been restored to him together with the fruits, should cause him to enjoy it without molestation. But the beloved son Passaguerra, your proctor, and his associates said that the abbot's petition was not to be admitted, especially for this reason: that the abbot himself, in the letters which he obtained from the Apostolic See to the Bishops of Bobbio and Ferrara, had suppressed the truth and expressed falsehood. For he had suggested that the Bishop of Verona had promulgated sentence concerning possession, saving the question of ownership, although he had only decreed that the abbot be inducted into possession for the purpose of preserving the property. He also concealed the truth when he made no mention before the Apostolic See of the giving of security offered by the archbishop before the said Bishops of Reggio and Modena.*]

We therefore, [after mature counsel had been held concerning these and all other matters proposed on this side and that with our brothers, the archbishops and bishops established at the Apostolic See, understanding that the said Bishop of Verona had decreed that the abbot be inducted into possession only for the purpose of preserving the property, as was consonant with reason, since issue concerning ownership had not been joined before him; and that it had not stood through the same M., the former archbishop, that he did not furnish the security offered within the year and purge the contumacy, if any had preceded; also considering that the abbot himself had obtained the letters to the Bishops of Bobbio and Ferrara through suppression of the truth and expression of falsehood—not rendering sentence, because issue had not been joined before us, but responding to the abbot, we answered that his petition according to the aforesaid form was not to be admitted, and commanded that he lack the writings which he had obtained through falsehood;] reduce the scope of the cause to the state in which it had been when our aforesaid predecessor committed the cause of ownership and possession to the Bishops of Reggio and Modena, the mandate of sequestration being entirely revoked. [We will and command, nevertheless, that the sentence of excommunication rendered against Hugh of Camerario and his accomplices be inviolably observed until fitting satisfaction.]

But lest we appear to fail the monastery in its right, we decree that there are to be restored to it the moderate expenses incurred for this from the time when the Bishop of Verona decreed that it be inducted into possession until the time of the satisfaction offered, and that sufficient security to submit to judgment is to be furnished by you. [The sentence, however, etc. Given at the Lateran on the sixth day before the Nones of March. 1198.]

commissione huiusmodi competebat, ut a se tanquam a possessore peteret in iudicio. Quumque procuratur archiepiscopi e contrario responderet, quod ab eo peti velut a possessore deberet, disceptatione protracta in longum terminus exspiravit, infra quem episcopi memorati de proprietate cognoscere debuissent. Ceterum nuncius monasterii iterum ad ecclesiam Romanam accedens, per archiepiscopum stetisse asseruit, quod nec possessio sequestrata fuerat, nec super proprietate processum in causa. Propter quod dictus praedecessor noster venerabili fratri nostro Bobiensi episcopo per apostolica scripta mandavit, ut, possessione cum fructibus perceptis ex ipsa monasterio restituta, audirent postmodum si quid haberent partes inter se invicem quaestionis. Qui quum abbatem iuxta tenorem mandati apostolici in possessionem, quam Veronensis adiudicaverat, per suum nuncium mandasset induci, Hugo de Camerario ipsum abbatem ex ea violenter eiecit, qui cum suis complicibus tam nuncium episcopi, quam abbatem et monachos armata manu fugavit, et navi, cuius vehiculo illuc accesserant, igne combusta, cellas monasterii depraedatus, conversis pluribus verberatis, domos extra claustri ambitum constitutas cum quibusdam animalibus et quodam homine non erubuit concremare. Quod postquam ad eiusdem praedecessoris nostri audientiam nuncio ipsius abbatis referente pervenit, venerabili fratri nostro Ferrariensi episcopo districte praecipiendo mandavit, quatenus partibus convocatis, et possessione cum fructibus a tempore sententiae per dictum Veronensem prolatae perceptis ex ipsa monasterio restituta, de proprietate cognosceret, et, eo in adiudicata sibi possessione indemni servato, quod iustum esset statueret, et faceret auctoritate apostolica sublato appellationis obstaculo firmiter observari; eos autem, qui se apostolicis mandatis opponerent, vel monasterium super possessione alterius molestarent, per sententiam excommunicationis appellatione remota compesceret, et dictum Hugonem et eius complices, donec monasterio de ablatis omnibus et illatis iniuriis satisfacerent competenter, et cum literis eius apostolico se conspectui praesentarent, nunciaret excommunicatos, et faceret ab omnibus evitari, nisi tu, frater archiepiscope, hanc in ipsos districtionem, prout tibi mandatum fuerat, exerceres. Dictus vero Ferrariensis, receptis super hoc literis apostolicae sedis, sicut ex literis eius accepimus, admonitione praemissa in Hugonem de Camerario et complices eius; te infra statutum terminum eum excommunicare nolente, excommunicationis sententiam promulgavit, et, quum tu legitime citatus ab ipso nec accederes, nec sufficientem mitteres responsalem, sed absentiam tuam verbis et literis excusares, salva quaestione proprietatis possessionem monasterio restituendam pronunciavit; et, quum abbatem in eam per nuncium suum fecisset induci, idem abbas ab ea deiectus fuit te, frater archiepiscope, Hugone de Camerario et dilectis filiis consulibus Mediolanensibus mandantibus per violentiam armatorum. Propter quod idem abbas postulabat a nobis, ut sententiam restitutionis toties latam pro eo deberemus auctoritate apostolica confirmare, et possessione sibi cum fructibus restituta faceremus eum absque molestatione gaudere. Verum dilectus filius Passaguerra procurator tuus et socii eius petitionem abbatis non esse admittendam ea praesertim ratione dicebant, quod abbas ipse in literis, quas ad Bobiensem et Ferrariensem episcopos a sede apostolica impetravit, veritatem suppresserat et expresserat falsitatem. Suggesserat enim, Veronensem episcopum salva quaestione proprietatis super possessione promulgasse sententiam, quum non nisi causa rei servandae abbatem decrevisset in possessionem induci. Chapter II

Latin source headnote: If one sent into possession for the purpose of custody dissipates the fruits, those dissipated are recalled and sequestered with the others.

Honorius III, to the Prior of Deben and the Dean of Calin.

The beloved son R., rector of the church of Bethusia, showed us by his petition that, when a question was being conducted concerning the same church before the Abbot of Sibiton and his colleagues by apostolic delegation, between him on the one side and the abbot and convent of Cisteria in the diocese of London on the other, those judges, inasmuch as they were more favorable than was due to the other party, after an appeal had been lawfully interposed by the same R., inducted the aforesaid abbot and convent into possession of the church itself for the purpose of custody. They dispose according to the choice of their own will of the fruits of that church received in the meantime, to his prejudice and injury. Wherefore, we command your discretion that, if it is so, causing the aforesaid fruits to be sequestered until decision of the business, you shall recall to its former state whatever you find meanwhile to have been disposed of by them from those fruits, restraining contradictions by ecclesiastical censures.

Si missus in possessionem causa custodiae fructus dissipat, dissipati revocantur, et cum aliis sequestrantur.

Honorius III. Priori Deben. et Decano de Calin.

Dilectus filius R. rector ecclesiae de Bethusia sua nobis petitione monstravit, quod, quum inter ipsum ex parte una, et abbatem, et conventum de Cisteria Londoniensis dioecesis ex altera super eadem ecclesia coram abbate de Sibiton. et eius collegis ex delegatione apostolica quaestio verteretur, et iudices ipsi, prout erant plus debito parti alteri favorabiles, post appellationem ab eodem R. legitime interpositam praedictos abbatem et conventum in possessionem ipsius ecclesiae causa custodiae induxerunt, qui fructus ipsius ecclesiae medio tempore perceptos pro suae distrahunt libito voluntatis in eius praeiudicium et gravamen. Quocirca discretioni vestrae mandamus, quatenus, si est ita, facientes usque ad decisionem negotii fructus sequestrari praedictos, si quid interim de ipsis per eos distractum inveneritis, in statum pristinum revocetis, contradictiones per censuras ecclesiasticas compescentes.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: If a defendant in possession appeals from a sentence rendered against him, the fruits of the thing sought are lawfully sequestered if they are dissipated by him.

Gregory IX.

The fruits of the possession can reasonably be sequestered while litigation is pending from one who has appealed from a sentence, if they are dissipated by him.

Si reus possessor appellat a sententia contra eum lata, licite rei petitae fructus sequestrantur, si dissipantur ab eo.

Gregorius IX.

Ab eo, qui a sententia provocavit, fructus possessionis, si dissipentur ab ipso, possunt lite pendente rationabiliter sequestrari.

Title XVIII: On Confessions

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: From the statement alone of one confessing his own crime, no penalty is to be inflicted upon another; nevertheless, purgation is to be enjoined upon one defamed.

Clement III.

When the monastery—(And below: [Cf. c. 13, On Election, I. 6.]) But concerning what you took care to attach to your letters—what you should do concerning a certain priest of the same monastery who, at the instigation of the devil, killed one of the brothers, as you publicly proposed that he confessed—we write back to your fraternity and command through apostolic writings that you shall not defer solemnly to degrade him from every divine office and to confine him in some monastery of the Cistercian order, in which, performing the penance imposed upon him for so great a crime, he may worthily lament there for as long as he lives what he committed. But those at whose suggestion the priest declares that he perpetrated the crime of homicide, unless it is established to you by other means and just reasons to be true, we judge are to be subjected to no penalty, since according to the statutes of both laws persons who have confessed concerning themselves ought not to be questioned concerning the consciences of others; and, except for the crime of injured majesty, the perilous confession of one confessing concerning his own guilt is not to be admitted against anyone. If, however, you learn that they labor under infamy of this kind, you shall enjoin purgation upon each of them with three associates of his order joined to him.

Si tamen eos infamia huiusmodi laborare cognoveris, singulis eis, adiunctis tribus sociis sui ordinis, purgationem iniungas.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: If a crime touching the principal cause is established against someone through his confession, he is punished with the ordinary penalty even if proceedings are not directed against him directly. This is what it says according to the gloss. And it is a noteworthy case and true in itself. Or summarize it thus according to another no less noteworthy understanding, which the gloss also holds although it does not explain it perfectly: If anyone incidentally confesses a crime in judgment, the ordinary judge, by beginning a new proceeding, can punish him with the ordinary penalty. This is what it says exceptionally. Abbas.

Innocent III, to the Canons of Bethlehem.

When a question was being conducted concerning the election of the Church of Bethlehem between R., your subdeacon, and P., canon of the Lord's Sepulchre, recently in our presence—(And below: [Cf. c. 4, On the Cause of Possession, II. 12.]) Moreover, because V., canon of Bethlehem, confessed in law that, in return for furnishing his consent to the election of another, he had received an obligation and promise of five hundred Saracens and had acted as an intermediary of simoniacal depravity, we, understanding that a contract of this kind contained simoniacal depravity, because we wish to prosecute a vice of this kind as we ought, considered that he should, by definitive sentence, be deposed from every clerical order and from every ecclesiastical benefice and office.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: A confession made in law by a church's steward harms the church itself; it can nevertheless be revoked if, before the business is ended, it is shown to have issued from an error of fact. This is what it says.

Gregory IX, to B., Judge of Viterbo.

It was proposed [before us] on behalf of [the beloved sons], the abbot and convent of the monastery of Saint M. [on the mountain of Viterbo, of the Cistercian order], that, when a question was being conducted before you between them on the one side and V., [a citizen of Viterbo], in the name of his wife, on the other, [the parties finally submitted it to you as arbitrator under an agreed penalty. And when the suit proceeded before you by its own impetus], the steward of the aforesaid monastery, [who was prosecuting the same cause], confessed certain things in law through an error of fact, from which he fears that prejudice may be generated against it. [Wherefore they petitioned us that fitting provision be made for it concerning this.] Therefore, since an error of fact harms no one while the business is not yet ended, we command that, if [the aforesaid abbot and convent] can demonstrate an error of this kind, you shall provide [concerning this by our authority] that no prejudice is generated against it concerning this. [Given at Rieti on the twelfth day before the Kalends of February, in the fifth year [of our pontificate]. 1232.]

Quumque coram te lis procederet suo Marte*], oeconomus monasterii memorati [qui causam prosequebatur eandem] quaedam per errorem facti fuit in iure confessus, ex quibus timet sibi praeiudicium generari. [Quare super hoc sibi petierunt a nobis congrue provideri.] Quum igitur negotio nondum finito nemini noceat error facti, mandamus, quatenus, si [praedicti abbas et conventus] de huiusmodi potuerit errore docere, [super hoc auctoritate nostra] provideas, ut nullum sibi super hoc praeiudicium generetur. Title XIX: On Proofs

Latin source headnote: A defendant is not bound to produce his own instruments for his plaintiff. It is commonly summarized thus.

Gregory, to King Tancred of Winchester.

From the words of the letter—(And below:) Your Excellency petitioned that I write to the [most pious] emperor that he should seek in the archive the agreements which were formerly issued between the Emperor Justinian of pious memory and your predecessors, so that from them he might gather what he ought to observe toward you. But this strongly prevented me from doing this: that no one is to be told, "You ought to seek among your own things the documents which are against you and bring them forward into the midst." [From this matter, etc.]

DE PROBATIONIBUS.

Reus actori suo propria instrumenta edere non tenetur. Ita communiter summatur.

Gregorius Tancredo Regi Vincestriae.

Ex epistolae verbis (Et infra:) Tua excellentia postulavit, ut [piissimo] imperatori scriberem, quatenus pacta in chartophylacio requireret, quae dudum inter piae memoriae Iustinianum principem et praedecessores tuos fuerunt emissa, ut ex his colligeret, quid tibi servare deberet. Sed ad hoc faciendum hoc mihi vehementer obstitit, quia nulli dicendum est: ea, quae contra te sunt, apud temetipsum debes documenta requirere, in mediumque proferre. [Ex qua re etc.]

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: A plaintiff who has proved fully ought not to be compelled to swear.

Alexander III.

Just as no praiseworthy custom ought to be torn down by any novelty, so that which is known to have been introduced by usage contrary to law ought, when contrary reason meets it, to be dissolved. Indeed, because we have learned that it is customary among you that, when someone has established his contention by instruments or introduced witnesses, an oath is nevertheless tendered to him, and, if he is unwilling to undertake it, faith is not given to the proofs produced—which, since it is supported by no reason but manifestly opposes the laws—we reprove such a custom, since only then is recourse to be had to aid of this kind when other lawful proofs are known to be lacking, and we decree that it shall henceforth possess no validity.

Actor, qui plene probavit, non debet compelli iurare.

Alexander III.

Sicut consuetudo laudabilis nulla debet novitate convelli, sic quod noscitur contra ius moribus introductum obvia ratione debet dissolvi. Sane quoniam apud vos consuetum esse didicimus, ut, quum aliquis intentionem suam fundaverit instrumentis aut testibus introductis, ei sacramentum nihilominus deferatur, quod si subire noluerit, fides probationibus exhibitis non habetur, quod quum nulla sit ratione subnixum, sed manifeste legibus adversetur: nos, quum tunc demum ad huiusmodi sit suffragium recurrendum, quum aliae legitimae probationes deesse noscuntur, talem consuetudinem reprobamus, nec ullam habere firmitatem deinceps sancimus.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: In a common judgment both plaintiff and defendant prove; and if they prove equally, the defendant is absolved, unless the plaintiff supports a favored cause.

Lucius III, to the Bishop of Chichester.

We have understood from your letters that you and the archdeacon have adjoining prebends in the villages which you each possess individually, and that a controversy is conducted between you under pretext of their boundaries because you say that he has passed beyond the ancient bounds and occupied part of your land, while he asserts to the contrary that he has possessed the same part of the land undisturbed for the space of forty years. But you affirm that you have possessed it peacefully for the same time, and therefore you asked whether proof lies upon the claimant or the possessor.

To this you ought to know that a judgment for regulating boundaries is of such a kind that in it each person holds the places of two persons, namely of plaintiff and defendant. Hence witnesses can be duly produced on each side to instruct the judge's cognizance; when they have been examined, the judge shall admit for creating faith for himself those whom he understands to excel. But if perhaps the witnesses of both parties are equally suitable, the possessor's witnesses shall be preferred, since the laws are more ready to absolve than to condemn, except in a cause concerning liberty, in which, if the witnesses of each party perhaps are equal, sentence shall nevertheless always be rendered in favor of liberty. For it is manifest law that proof is sometimes given to the possessor, since it is thus provided by law that one who has objected a prescription of the longest time—which no one rightly objects unless he possesses—and has proved it ought to prevail in the cause.

In communi iudicio probant actor et reus; et si pariter probant, reus absolvitur, nisi favorabilem causam foveat actor.

Lucius III. Cistrensi Episcopo.

Ex literis tuis intelleximus, te et archidiaconum confines habere praebendas in villis, quas singuli singulas possidetis, et praetextu terminorum inter vos controversiam agitari eo, quod dicas, eum antiquos fines egressum, partemque tui fundi occupasse; illo in contrarium asserente, se partem eandem fundi possedisse quadraginta annorum spatio inconcusse. Tu autem, quod per idem tempus quiete illam possederis, asseveras, quare utrum incumbat petitori vel possessori probatio quaesivisti. Ad quod scire debes, quod iudicium finium regundorum tale est, ut in eo utraque persona vices duorum habeat, videlicet actoris et rei. Unde hinc inde testes rite produci possunt ad cognitionem iudicis instruendam, quibus examinatis iudex quos praecellere intellexerit ad fidem sibi faciendam admittat. Quod si forte ambarum partium testes sint aeque idonei, possessoris testes praeferentur, quum promptiora sint iura ad absolvendum quam ad condemnandum, praeterquam in liberali causa, in qua si utriusque partis testes forte aequales fuerint, pro libertate tamen semper sententia proferetur. Nam possessori probationem aliquando dari, iuris manifesti est, quum iure ita cautum sit, quod, qui obiecerit praescriptionem longissimi temporis, quam nemo recte obiicit, nisi qui possidet, et eam probaverit, in causa debeat obtinere.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: Credence is not given to a husband asserting, even with an oath, that he has known his wife carnally if the wife proves the contrary through matrons attesting by inspection of her body.

Gregory VIII, to the Provost of Saint Cataldus.

You proposed to us, beloved son provost, that the matrimonial cause conducted between our beloved son O. of Casanova and the woman S., daughter of O. of Pisco, was delegated to you by apostolic mandate. And when the parties were established in your presence, the woman proposed that she had neither been known carnally by the man nor could have been known, which she proved both by her own oath and by the testimony of seven women, who affirm by inspection of her body that she is a virgin; while the man, however, asserted the contrary through his oath, you were by no means willing to proceed in the business until you had our counsel concerning this. It therefore appears to us that faith is rather to be given to the oath of the girl and the testimony of those seven women, who affirm from experience that she is a virgin.

Non creditur marito asserenti etiam cum iuramento, uxorem se cognovisse, si uxor per matronas attestantes per ipsius corporis aspectum probat contrarium.

Gregorius VIII. Praeposito sancti Cataldi.

Proposuisti nobis, dilecte fili praeposite, quod causa matrimonii, quae inter *dilectum filium nostrum O. de Casa nova, et S. filiam O. de Pisco mulierem vertitur, tibi fuit de mandato apostolico delegata. Quumque partes essent in tua praesentia constitutae, mulier proposuit, se nec a viro cognitam, nec potuisse cognosci, quod tam proprio iuramento, quam testimonio septem mulierum probavit, quae per aspectum corporis eam esse virginem asseverant; viro autem per iuramentum suum contrarium asserente, vos in negotio procedere minime voluistis, donec de hoc nostrum consilium haberetis. Videtur igitur nobis, quod iuramento puellae et testimonio illarum septem mulierum, quae ipsam per experientiam virginem asseverant, fides est potius adhibenda.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: Individual members of a corporate body can, for the advantage of the corporate body, disprove an instrument falsely drawn up in the name of the corporate body.

Clement III.

In the third place, indeed, we were asked as follows: Behold, a certain regular, using the seal of the chapter, sealed a certain instrument for a friend of his, in which is contained an alienation to him of certain immovable things of the church. When this was produced in judgment, the proctor of the corporate body asserted that it had not been drawn up with the assent of the convent and that the seal was adulterated or stolen. And when, wishing to reveal the falsehood civilly, he produced the regular brothers to give testimony, they said under oath that, at the time at which the adversary alleged that the same instrument had been conferred upon him, whenever there was any mention of this among the brothers, the counsel of the whole convent and its voice were unanimous that they did not wish the alienation of those things, but wished the things of their house to remain whole and be preserved. But because the adverse party proved nothing against this, we answer that judgment is to be made solely according to the assertion of the witnesses.

> Singulares de universitate possunt ad commodum universitatis reprobare instrumentum falso confectum nomine universitatis.
> Clemens III.
>
> Tertio quippe loco fuit a nobis ita quaesitum: Ecce quidam regularis sigillo capituli quoddam instrumentum cuidam amico suo signavit, in quo facta ei alienatio quarundam rerum ecclesiae immobilium continetur. Quo exhibito in iudicio procurator universitatis illud asseruit de assensu conventus non fuisse confectum, et adulterinum vel furtivum esse sigillum. Quumque, volens falsitatem civiliter revelare, fratres regulares ad perhibendum testimonium produxisset, iurati dixerunt, quod eo tempore, quo adversarius allegabat idem instrumentum sibi fuisse collatum, quotiens de hoc inter fratres aliqua erat mentio, consilium totius conventus et vox fuit unanimis, quod nolebant alienationem rerum illarum, sed res domus suae fore integras et conservari volebant. Sed quoniam contra hoc nihil pars adversa probavit, respondemus secundum assertionem testium tantummodo iudicandum.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: Where proceedings concern contracting a marriage, after an impediment has been proved and the attestations published, other witnesses concerning the absence of the impediment are not to be admitted.

The same.

A certain man swore, as you assert, that he would take a certain woman as his lawful wife. When he wished to convey her [to his house], certain persons, after furnishing oaths according to custom, lawfully proved that they were related to each other in the fifth degree of consanguinity. But because you asked us what is to be done when another person wishes to prove, against the aforesaid proof made by canonical oaths and published to the parties, that no degree of consanguinity touches them, we answer your fraternity in the present matter that the former proof is to be upheld. Nor is heed to be paid to the testimony of only one person. Nor does the fact that the groom and bride propose with steadfast assertion that they have known one another carnally persuade that the marriage should remain, since carnal intercourse between persons who are not lawful cannot by law make a marriage.

> Ubi agitur de matrimonio contrahendo, probato impedimento et publicatis attestationibus alii testes super defectu impedimenti admittendi non sunt.
>
> Idem.
> Iuravit quidam, ut asseris se quandam in uxorem legitimam accepturum. Quam quum vellet traducere, quidam iuramentis secundum morem exhibitis legitime probaverunt, ipsos in quinto consanguinitatis gradu sibi invicem attinere. Quia vero requisisti a nobis, quid agendum sit, quum quidam alius probare velit contra praedictam probationem iuramentis canonicis factam et partibus publicatam, nullo eos sese consanguinitatis gradu contingere, fraternitati tuae in praesenti articulo respondemus, quod standum est probationi priori. Nec de unius testimonio tantum curandum est. Illud etiam, ut matrimonium remaneat, non suadet, quod sponsus et sponsa constanti assertione proponunt, se carnaliter cognovisse, quum commercium carnale inter non legitimas personas matrimonium de iure facere non possit.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: If it is proved by letters of the ordinary that someone is excommunicated, he will be repelled from acting as proctor. This is what it says; and this summary agrees with the text and title, admits no objection, and therefore hold it.

Innocent III, to the Archdeacon of Paris.

After the resignation [*of the beloved son, formerly Abbot of Saint Martin of Troyes, when the votes of the canons of that church were divided in the election, some of them elected the beloved son Manasses, canon of the Church of Saint Lupus, while others transferred their votes to the beloved son P., chaplain of our venerable brother [...], Archbishop of Sens. For this reason we committed the cause for determination to our venerable brother [...], Bishop of Chalon, and the beloved son [...], Abbot of Cluny, under this form: that, inquiring into the rights of each election and the merits of those elected, they should confirm by apostolic authority the election which they found canonically celebrated concerning a suitable person. But if they found neither canonical, after both elections had been quashed they should cause provision to be made for that church concerning a suitable person.

They, summoning the parties to their presence and solemnly taking cognizance of the cause, received very many witnesses both concerning the deed of the electors and against the persons; and, when they had proceeded as far as publication of the witnesses, [...], the proctor of the said chaplain P., appealed to the Apostolic See. But the judges, because one of them—namely, the Abbot of Cluny—was occupied with greater affairs and could not attend cognizance of the cause, deferred to an appeal of this kind on the counsel of prudent men, enjoining upon the parties that they should hasten to our presence with the attestations received, to receive from us a definitive sentence concerning the cause itself.

Therefore, when the acts of the judgment had been received by each party, certain of the aforesaid canons constituted V., their fellow canon, as proctor in the presence of the aforesaid bishop, as we perceived was contained in that bishop's letters. But while the same V. was on the journey to come to the Apostolic See, when in the meantime the said Archbishop of Sens was traveling through the diocese of Nevers for the purpose of visitation, the messengers of the aforesaid church approached him, intimating to him that all the canons, except a few who, although they did not contradict, nevertheless did not expressly consent, had conferred their votes upon P., his chaplain; and they entreated the archbishop himself to hasten to the place as quickly as possible to provide for the church. When he approached it because of their urgency, all who had formerly refused to express their consent, except Vitalis alone, who was absent, returned to agreement with the others and voluntarily consented to the aforesaid chaplain, seeking pardon for their former dissent. And thus it happened that, at the petition of all, on the feast of the Apostles Peter and Paul, in the greater Church of Troyes, the same P. received the office of benediction from the aforesaid metropolitan; and afterward, solemnly introduced into the Church of Saint Martin with the exultation of all and general joy, and installed as is customary by the beloved son [...], Dean of Troyes, he publicly received in the chapter of the same church the professions of each.

But the said Vitalis, coming to our presence, presented to us the acts of the judges, solicitously petitioning that we deign to dispatch him as quickly as possible. While he waited for some time, the proctor of the said chaplain P. arrived in the meantime. When they were established in our presence, the said proctor humbly petitioned that we deign to approve what had been done concerning the said chaplain by the archbishop and that we should not hear the often-mentioned V. at all, since he was excommunicated. For he asserted that the same V. had beaten L., formerly Abbot of Saint Martin, to the shedding of blood; had also scourged John, a priest of that church, with such grave blows that all his companions despaired of his life; and had afflicted with such hard blows a certain priest of that church who had recently returned from the Apostolic See that his battered face appeared exceedingly frightful. For these excesses and others—concerning which, although cited and admonished by the said metropolitan, he was unwilling either to make satisfaction or even to appear—he was bound by the bond of excommunication. To prove this, the same proctor produced letters both of the said Archbishop of Sens and of the Dean of Troyes.

To these things it was answered to the contrary on behalf of the said Vitalis that he ought not to be impeded in any respect by the objection of an excommunication of this kind. For the canons themselves, not avoiding him up to that time, had by no means declined communion with him either in offices or in judgment; indeed, rather, when he was constituted proctor in the presence of the said Bishop of Chalon, they admitted him without any contradiction. Nor had the archbishop announced to the judges or his fellow brothers that he was subject to excommunication. Therefore, he proposed that he ought to be admitted in judgment like any other, notwithstanding an exception of this kind.

Against this the proctor of the other party replied that, if at any time the same V. attended divine services with his canons, this displeased them altogether; but he, although prohibited, thrust himself into divine offices while they grieved, as is manifestly gathered from the letters of the aforesaid dean. Nor did they communicate with him in judgment, because, although he was of the number of those who opposed the election of the aforesaid chaplain, faith was nevertheless not made in the judgment that the same V. was a proctor or witness in that judgment, or that the often-mentioned canons otherwise communicated with him. He also added that the fact that the same V. was not excluded as an excommunicated person when he was constituted proctor before the aforesaid bishop could not generate prejudice, because this was done in their absence. He further added that, if the archbishop did not announce in that judgment that he was subject to excommunication, this was because he did not know that he was litigating in that judgment; nevertheless, after he had announced him excommunicated by letters fortified with his seal, he was to be avoided by all as excommunicated.*]

Therefore, when debate concerning this had been conducted before us, because it was established to us by the letters of the ordinary judge—which are to be upheld until the contrary is proved—that V. was excommunicated at the time when he assumed the office of proctor, we considered that he was not to be admitted as proctor. [But, etc. Given at the Lateran on the fourth day before the Nones of October, in the ninth year [of our pontificate]. 1206.]

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: If one who was requested to restore the whole inheritance in the event that he died without children enters a monastery, the fideicommissum vanishes and the inheritance is applied to the monastery; nor, to invalidate his entrance, is it sufficient to prove minority of age at the time of entrance if a twofold entrance is proved on the other side. This is what it says, with the understanding that the substitution was fideicommissary. But if it was direct, summarize it thus: A substitution made for a son in the event that he dies without children vanishes through his entrance into a monastery. And then add what is in the first summary at the words "nor, to invalidate," etc., to the end; and each understanding is true in itself. I say, nevertheless, that the first is truer, because here there was a fideicommissary substitution, although Lord Antonius says here that it was compendious.

The same, to the Abbot and Convent of Casamari.

In the presence of our beloved son G., cardinal deacon of Saint Adrian, G., a subdeacon, and B., a woman, his sister, siblings of Veroli, caused it to be proposed before him, when they were established with your syndic, that, when the late A., their brother, made his testament, he instituted M., his son, as his heir and directed that, if he perhaps died without children, his goods should devolve upon G. and B. Hence they petitioned that the things which your monastery detained from his goods be restored to them, and sought that you be restrained from troubling them concerning this.

But the syndic proposed to the contrary that the aforesaid M. had offered himself and his property to your monastery, wherefore everything which he had possessed had devolved upon the monastery. He therefore petitioned that everything which they had invaded from his goods be restored to your monastery and that silence concerning the remainder be imposed upon them. To these things, however, the other party replied that the said M. was a minor in years at the time of his offering, as it lawfully proved through witnesses, and that, repenting of the vow made, he revoked after recovery that which he had done in the fervor of illness. Hence, both because Milo offered himself and his property to the monastery of Casamari below lawful age and because he afterward revoked what he had done without deliberation, his offering was not valid. Therefore, since he died without children, under the testament of his father his inheritance had devolved upon them.

But to these things the syndic took care to answer that, although the said M. had departed from that monastery with your permission, son abbot, afterward, approaching your presence with his grandfather, who was his proctor, when you had gone to Veroli, he humbly and devoutly offered himself and his property to it, and confirmed by oath that he would no further proceed against his offering and donation, as the public instrument contains. Therefore, since it is established from these things that the same M. twice conferred himself and his property upon your monastery, and it is not proved on the other side that M. was a minor in years at the time of each offering, the proof of an exception of this kind does not destroy your proof, since, even if he was a minor in years at the time of the first offering, he could nevertheless have been of age at the second.

Furthermore, since the phrase "a minor in years" could be understood in two ways—for both one who is younger than fourteen years and one who is younger than twenty-five years is customarily called a minor in years—the doubtful phrase did not harm your contention, since a donation made under twenty-five years, especially one confirmed by oath, was valid. But even if what had been done by the said A. were valid, since one who instituted a monastery as his heir was nevertheless not to be understood to die without an heir, this did not harm the monastery.

And when the aforesaid cardinal reported in the hearing of us and our brothers the things proposed before him, we considered that the beloved son H., cardinal deacon of Saint Eustace, should be appointed to advise. Therefore the same beloved son H., cardinal of Saint Eustace, having more fully understood the merits of the cause, considering that your syndic had fully established his contention and that nothing had been sufficiently proved on the opposite side—since, even if it had been shown through witnesses that M. was a minor in years at the time of his offering, it had not been expressed whether he was a minor at the time of the first or second offering, nor by how many years he was a minor—rendered sentence by our mandate. Imposing silence upon the aforesaid G. and B. concerning the things which they sought from the monastery, he condemned them to restitution of those things which by their own temerity they had invaded from the goods of the aforesaid M. We therefore confirm that sentence by apostolic authority.

> Si rogatus restituere totam hereditatem, eo sine liberis decedente intret monasterium, evanescit fideicommissum, et hereditas applicatur monasterio; nec ad invalidandum ingressum sufficit probare minorem aetatem tempore ingressus, si ex adverso geminatus probetur ingressus. H. d. intelligendo, quod substitutio fuit fideicommissaria. Si vero fuit directa, summa sic: substitutio facta filio, eo decedente sine liberis, evanescit per ingressum monasterii. Et tunc adde id, quod est in primo summario ibi: nec ad invalidandum etc., usque ad finem, et uterque intellectus est verus in se. Dico tamen, quod primus est verior, quod hic fuit substitutio fideicommissaria, licet Dom. Anton. hic dicat, quod fuit compendiosa.

Verum syndicus ipse proposuit ex adverso, quod praedictus M. monasterio vestro obtulit se et sua, unde universa, quae habuerat, erant ad monasterium devoluta, quare universa, quae ipsi de bonis eius invaserant, restitui monasterio vestro petebat, et super ceteris silentium illis imponi. Ad haec autem pars altera replicavit, quod dictus M. oblationis suae tempore fuerat minor annis, sicut per testes legitime comprobavit, et quod voti facti poenitens id, quod fervore infirmitatis fecerat, post convalescentiam revocavit. Unde tum ex eo, quod Milo infra aetatem legitimam monasterio Casemarii obtulit se et sua, tum quia quod inconsulte fecerat postmodum revocavit, eius oblatio non tenebat. Unde quum sine liberis decessisset, ex testamento patris illius ad ipsos erat eius hereditas devoluta. Verum ad haec syndicus respondere curavit, quod, licet dictus M. de monasterio ipso de tua licentia, fili abbas, fuisset egressus, eidem postmodum, cum avo suo, qui eius erat procurator, ad praesentiam tuam, quum Verulas ivisses, accedens, se et sua obtulit humiliter et devote, et, quod nec contra oblationem et donationem suam veniret ulterius, iuramento firmavit, sicut publicum continet instrumentum. Quare quum constet ex his, quod idem M. bis monasterio vestro contulit se et sua, nec ex adverso probetur, quod utriusque oblationis tempore M. fuerit minor annis, probationem vestram huiusmodi exceptionis probatio non elidit, quum, etsi primae oblationis tempore fuerit minor annis, secundae tamen potuit maior exstitisse. Praeterea quum verbum illud minor annis duobus potuerit modis intelligi, quum et qui minor est quatuordecim annis, et qui viginti quinque minor fuerit, dici soleat minor annis, intentioni vestrae verbum dubium non nocebat, quum infra viginti quinque annos teneret donatio praesertim iuramento firmata. Sed etsi teneret quod factum fuerat a dicto A., qui tamen intelligendum non erat sine herede decedere qui monasterium sibi heredem instituit, hoc monasterio non nocebat. Quum que cardinalis praedictus ea, quae coram ipso proposita fuerant, in nostra et fratrum nostrorum audientia retulisset, nos ad consilium dilectum filium H. sancti Eustachii diaconum cardinalem duximus deputandum. Idem igitur Dilectus filius H. sancti Eustachii cardinalis causae meritis plenius intellectis attendens, quod syndicus vester intentionem suam plene fundasset, et quod nihil fuisset ex adverso sufficienter probatum, quum, etsi ostensum esset per testes, quod M. suae oblationis tempore fuerit minor annis, utrum tamen primae vel secundae oblationis tempore minor fuerit, et quot annis minor, non fuisset expressum, de mandato nostro sententiam protulit, et praedictis G. et B. silentium imponens super his, quae a monasterio postulabant, eos ad restitutionem illorum, quae de bonis praedicti M. propria temeritate invaserant, condemnavit. Nos igitur sententiam ipsam auctoritate apostolica confirmamus.

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: If plaintiff and defendant prove in the interdict for retaining possession, the one prevails who proves the older possession, especially one justified by title, or has adduced better proofs with respect to possession. This is what it says notably; and the summary is sufficiently proved at the verse "from the foregoing," when the verse "especially" is weighed.

The same.

Although the cause which is conducted between the Church of Ravenna and the commune of Faenza concerning jurisdiction, honors, and district in the village of Luci, Saint P., and the castle of Ariolo, which the said church proposed pertained to it by right—(And below:) But because it was very burdensome to each party to produce witnesses before us, we commanded the Bishop of Piacenza that within three months, appeal being removed, he should receive the witnesses whom each party should determine to produce both concerning the principal business and against the persons of the witnesses, in such a way, namely, that, restraining an unbridled multitude, he should by no means permit them on each side to exceed the number forty. (And below:) And thus afterward the proctors of both parties returned to our presence with the sealed attestations.

Furthermore, when the attestations had been solemnly published, the syndic of the people of Faenza proposed that he wished to object and prove certain things against the persons of the witnesses produced by the other party, while the steward of the church asserted that this ought not to be done. Concerning this, when debate had been conducted on each side for some time, finally we decreed by interlocutory judgment that he should by no means be heard concerning this, since he had not taken care to produce witnesses of this kind within the space of three months contained in our letters, within which term each party could introduce witnesses both against the persons of witnesses and concerning the principal business.

After this the same syndic objected against the aforesaid witnesses that, having been corrupted, they had spoken falsely, and petitioned that the faculty of proving the complaint of falsehood be granted to him. Hence, because such an exception can be interposed not only before but even after sentence according to lawful sanctions, although some believed that the party of Faenza had interposed an exception of this kind through calculated malice to impede the course of the business, nevertheless, because we are unwilling to deviate from the path of law, we commanded the beloved sons Masters G. and T., dwelling at Bologna, through our writings that, having summoned the parties, they should take care within a month to receive and examine the witnesses whom the proctor of Faenza should determine to produce concerning this exception, subtly inquiring into the individual circumstances and faithfully reducing their depositions to writing. Another month was thereupon granted to the proctor of the aforesaid church, within which, if he wished, he might produce witnesses before them for the reprobation of those witnesses; and, faithfully writing down their statements, they should appoint to each party a term of twenty days, within which they should present themselves before us with the attestations to receive sentence. Therefore, when the parties again appeared before us and attestations of this kind had been published, we heard whatever they wished to propose.

Although the party of Faenza produced many witnesses concerning the principal business, to prove that from long-past times the men of the aforesaid places had furnished them services in bans, pleas, ditches, collections, military expeditions, and certain other matters pertaining to the district, nevertheless, scarcely six only of them remained concordant, since many others contradicted themselves in the course of their testimony, and certain others were singular in the statement of their testimony. Although certain witnesses were introduced on behalf of Faenza to disprove some of the witnesses of the Church of Ravenna, nevertheless most of them are rejected because they very clearly contradict one another. Certain few others, although they are not expressly rejected, are nevertheless of such bad reputation and slight standing, as was proved through the attestations produced, that no or little faith is to be given to their statements.

The same witnesses of Faenza are also generally repelled because they do not prove that for the proving of which their syndic bound himself, namely, that, having been corrupted, they had spoken falsely; for, even if they appear to say something about corruption, they say nothing at all about falsehood. But it was manifestly proved through many witnesses of the Church of Ravenna, greater than every exception, that the Church of Ravenna had possessed the village of Luci, Saint Potitus, and the castle of Aureolo from the longest time with every honor, district, and jurisdiction, all the articles expressing jurisdiction, honor, and district having been individually specified.

From the foregoing, therefore, it appears sufficiently clearly that the Church of Ravenna, through witnesses more numerous in number, whom the light of truth assists more fully and who also expressed in their testimony things more fitting to the business and nearer to the truth, sufficiently showed that it possessed the aforesaid places from sixty years ago and thereafter with every jurisdiction, honor, and district. Through this it is evident that, if the commune of Faenza received any services in the aforesaid places from fifty years ago and thereafter, as their witnesses appear to depose, they undoubtedly began to receive them without just title, since two persons cannot simultaneously possess the same thing wholly and in the same manner, especially since the same people of Faenza do not show a just title of possession, and it is very clearly gathered from the privileges of the emperors and Roman Pontiffs granted to the Church of Ravenna that the possession of that church in the aforesaid places was just.

Therefore, since it is established that the people of Faenza, from the time from which they strive to prove that they possessed, less justly and without title occupied certain things in the aforesaid places by their own temerity, and in the course of time extorted them through violence, as is manifestly proved through many witnesses of the Church of Ravenna, and since the steward of the same church petitioned before us that the commune of Faenza be prohibited from disturbing or disquieting force concerning the aforesaid matters, we, recognizing that in this case the interdict Uti possidetis does not have place in such a way that we ought to say, "As you possess, so shall you possess," since the proofs of the church are far stronger and it is therefore superior in the interdict, by the counsel of our brothers condemn the commune of Faenza to [submit] to it. With respect to the possessory judgment, concerning which alone proceedings were conducted, we impose perpetual silence upon the commune concerning jurisdiction, honor, district, and other things generally pertaining to this in the aforesaid places; and we prohibit it from presuming, either personally or through others, to trouble the Church of Ravenna or the inhabitants of the aforesaid places in any respect concerning these matters.

> Si actor et reus in interdicto retinendae possessionis probant, obtinet is, qui antiquiorem possessionem probat titulo maxime iustificatam, vel meliores probationes respectu possessionis adduxit. H. d. notabiliter, et probatur satis summarium in versic. ex praemissis, ponderato versic. maxime.

Potiti et castrum Aureoli a longissimo tempore possedisse cum omni honore, districtu et iurisdictione, nominatim expressis universis articulis exprimentibus iurisdictionem, honorem atque districtum*. Ex praemissis igitur satis evidenter apparet, quod ecclesia Ravennatensis per testes numero plures, quibus potius lux veritatis assistit, qui etiam aptiora negotio et vero proximiora in suis testimoniis expresserunt, sufficienter ostendit, quod a LX. annis et citra cum omni iurisdictione, honore atque districtu loca supra dicta possedit. Per quod patet, quod, si commune Faventiae a L. annis et citra, sicut videntur testes eorum deponere, aliqua servitia in locis perceperunt supra dictis, illa proculdubio sine iusto titulo percipere inceperunt, quum duo insimul eandem rem et eodem modo in solidum possidere non possint, maxime quum iidem Faventini iustum possessionis titulum non ostendant, et ex privilegiis imperatorum et Romanorum Pontificum ecclesiae Ravennatensi concessis evidentissime colligatur, possessionem ipsius ecclesiae in praedictis locis iustam fuisse. Quum ergo constet Faventinos ab eo tempore, quo se possedisse probare contendunt, minus iuste ac sine titulo aliqua in praedictis locis temeritate propria occupasse, ac processu temporis per violentiam extorsisse, sicut per multos testes ecclesiae Ravennatensis manifeste probatur, et oeconomus eiusdem ecclesiae petierit coram nobis, a vi turbativa seu inquietativa super praemissis commune Faventiae prohiberi, nos recognoscentes in hoc casu, non sic locum esse interdicto Uti possidetis, ut dicere debeamus; Uti possidetis, ita possideatis, quum probationes ecclesiae longe sint potiores, et ideo sit in interdicto superior, de fratrum nostrorum consilio commune Faventinum sibi condemnamus, super iurisdictione, et honore, atque districtu et aliis ad hoc generaliter pertinentibus in locis praedictis, quoad possessorium iudicium, quo tantummodo actum est, perpetuum silentium imponentes, et prohibentes eidem, ut neque per se, neque per alios super his praesumat Ravennatensem ecclesiam aut habitatores praedictorum locorum aliquatenus molestare.

Chapter X

Latin source headnote: If persons name someone as a son, and he is commonly reputed to be so, credence is not afterward given to one of them swearing the contrary.

The same.

You informed us through your letters that, when T., a citizen of Tivoli, had kept a certain woman as a concubine for seven years and had meanwhile received no offspring from her, and when she afterward departed from him but returned to him not long afterward, she asserted that the son whom, after returning, she bore in his house had been received by her from him. Although he said at first that this boy was by no means his son, since that woman, living with him for seven years, had not conceived from him, finally, overcome by the insistence of the woman and others, he acknowledged him as his own son, calling him by the name Rainaldus. And when the same R. reached manly age and frequented the house of Saturnella, the sister of T. himself, who publicly named him as her nephew, he betrothed and carnally knew Sophia, the daughter of Saturnella herself, with whom he had had daily association. When this came to the knowledge of Saturnella, she harshly reproved them both and, retaining her daughter with herself, removed the aforesaid R. from the house. And when the mother of Rainaldus himself learned that the father of the same Sophia gravely threatened R., she publicly swore before many persons in the square of the city that Rainaldus was by no line of relationship related to the aforesaid Sophia, affirming under the force of the oath furnished that she had received Rainaldus from someone other than the aforesaid T.

But because that woman at first steadfastly asserted that she had received R., concerning whom proceedings are conducted, from the said T., and the same T., overcome especially by the insistence of the aforesaid woman, publicly acknowledged him as his own son, and because he was commonly named and held as the son of them both, the oath of the same woman afterward furnished to the contrary is not to be upheld, since according to lawful sanctions it is exceedingly unworthy that what anyone has clearly attested by his own voice, that he should be able in the same case to weaken by his own testimony. Hence it consequently appears that the aforesaid R. cannot in any respect have as wife the aforesaid Sophia, granddaughter of the aforesaid T., whose first cousin he is presumed at first sight to be. [Given at the Lateran on the fifth day before the Kalends of December, in the thirteenth year of our pontificate. 1210.]

Quum autem idem R. ad virilem pervenisset aetatem, ac domum Saturnellae sororis ipsius T. frequentaret, quae ipsum nepotem suum publice nominabat, et Sophiam ipsius Saturnellae filiam, cum qua quotidianam conversationem habuerat, arravit et carnaliter cognovit eandem. Quia vero mulier illa de dicto T. suscepisse R., de quo agitur, primitus constanter asseruit, et idem T. praefatae mulieris praecipue devictus instantia ipsum suum filium publice recognovit, et filius eius nominatus communiter fuit et habitus ab ambobus, eiusdem mulieris postmodum iuramento in contrarium praestito non est standum, quum nimis indignum sit iuxta legitimas sanctiones, ut, quod sua quisque voce dilucide protestatus est, id in eundem casum proprio valeat testimonio infirmare. Chapter XI

Latin source headnote: A judge ought to have a notary or two suitable men who write the acts of the judgment; otherwise, if any difficulty arises, he will be punished by his superior, nor is he believed concerning the proceeding except insofar as it is established by the acts or otherwise by lawful documents.

The same, in the General Council.

Because an innocent litigant sometimes cannot prove a true denial against the false assertion of an iniquitous judge, since by the nature of things there is no direct proof of the act of one denying, lest falsehood prejudice truth or iniquity prevail over equity, we establish that, both in an ordinary and an extraordinary judgment, the judge shall always employ either a public person, if he can have one, or two suitable men who shall faithfully write down all the acts of the judgment: namely, citations and delays, recusations and exceptions, petitions and answers, interrogations and confessions, depositions of witnesses and productions of instruments, interlocutory judgments and appeals, renunciations, conclusions, and the other things which arise and are to be written down in fitting order, designating places, times, and persons.

And all things thus written shall be delivered to the parties in such a way that the originals remain with the scribes, so that, if a contention arises concerning the judge's proceeding, the truth can be declared through this; to the end that, when this safeguard has been employed, deference may be given to honorable and discerning judges in such a way that the justice of innocent persons is not injured by improvident and iniquitous judges. But a judge who neglects to observe this constitution, if any difficulty arises because of his negligence, shall be chastised by the superior judge with due correction; nor shall a presumption be made in favor of his proceeding except insofar as it is established in the cause by lawful documents.

> Iudex debet habere notarium vel duos viros idoneos, qui scribant acta iudicii; alias, si quid difficultatis emerserit, per superiorem punietur, nec creditur ei super processu, nisi in quantum per acta vel alias per legitima documenta constabit.
> Idem in concilio generali.

> Quoniam contra falsam assertionem iniqui iudicis innocens litigator quandoque non potest veram negationem probare, quum negantis factum per rerum naturam nulla sit directa probatio, ne falsitas veritati praeiudicet, aut iniquitas praevaleat aequitati, statuimus, ut tam in ordinario iudicio quam extraordinario iudex semper adhibeat aut publicam, si potest habere, personam, aut duos viros idoneos, qui fideliter universa iudicii acta conscribant, videlicet citationes et dilationes, recusationes et exceptiones, petitiones et responsiones, interrogationes et confessiones, testium depositiones et instrumentorum productiones, interlocutiones et appellationes, renunciationes, conclusiones, et cetera, quae occurrerint, competenti ordine conscribenda, loca designando, tempora et personas. Et omnia sic conscripta partibus tribuantur ita, quod originalia penes scriptores remaneant, ut, si super processu iudicis fuerit suborta contentio, per hoc possit veritas declarari, quatenus hoc adhibito moderamine sic honestis et discretis deferatur iudicibus, quod per improvidos et iniquos innocentium iustitia non laedatur. Iudex autem, qui constitutionem ipsam neglexerit observare, si propter eius negligentiam quid difficultatis emerserit, per superiorem iudicem animadversione debita castigetur, nec pro ipsius praesumatur processu, nisi quatenus in causa legitimis constiterit documentis.

Latin source headnote: If it can be proved that a defendant committed an offense, his proof that he did not commit the offense is not to be admitted.

Honorius III, to the Archbishop of Lund and His Suffragans.

You should know that it has reached our hearing that the priests and clerics of Denmark, rashly relying against the canons and lawful sanctions upon the law of the kingdom through which a negative is proved, are reputed innocent of crimes which can lawfully be proved against them by witnesses worthy of faith if they can purge themselves concerning them in any manner. Hence it happens that sometimes they adduce criminals like themselves for their purgation, so that those persons ought in similar circumstances to respond to them at the opportune time, and many crimes are committed more boldly by the same persons.

Therefore, wishing that this pest contrary to every law be entirely uprooted from the clergy, [by commanding through apostolic writings] we order your fraternity that in a proof of a negative of this kind, provided that the affirmative can be proved on the opposite side, you shall hear no one against the canonical sanctions in the ecclesiastical forum. Rather, admitting canonically in purgations only men of good reputation, you shall know that a person who is stained with the mark of infamy concerning a similar fault is less suitable to purge any crime. [Given at Rome on the fifth day before the Kalends of January, in the second year [of our pontificate]. 1218.]

Latin source headnote: The boundaries of dioceses are proved through ancient books, supporting evidence, witnesses, and reputation.

The same, to the Bishops of Orense and Lamego.

Since we have considered that the cause conducted between our venerable brothers, the Bishops of Coimbra and Idanha, concerning the delimitation of their dioceses, should be committed to you, we command your discretion that, when you come to the principal matter in the aforesaid cause, you shall proceed in the business committed to you, having God before your eyes, according to the divisions which are better proved through ancient books or in another manner, and also according to witnesses, reputation, and any other supporting evidence.

Latin source headnote: The matrons through whom virginity is proved can be discredited.

The same, to the Bishop and Archdeacon of Sens.

The matrimonial cause which is known to be conducted between V., a young man, and G., a girl of Sens who professes herself a virgin and a nun, because you, brother bishop, did not send it so instructed that we could freely proceed in it as far as the decision of a definitive sentence, we remit to you to be more fully instructed. We command your discretion that meanwhile, by apostolic authority, you place that girl in the monastery which she entered, so that she may dwell there safely until it is decreed by judicial sentence what ought to be done. Afterward, as justice shall dictate, you shall receive not only the man's proofs, as he had protested, which he wishes to introduce against those women who were introduced on behalf of the girl to investigate the signs of virginity, but also the other proofs touching this business which either party should determine to produce. And because, as the canon says, the hand and eye of midwives are often deceived, we will and command that you shall take care to appoint still other honorable, provident, and prudent matrons to inquire whether the said girl is fortified with the privilege of virginity, and shall remit the cause to us more fully instructed under your seals.

Latin source headnote: Acts ordering the litigation, even when done before the first judges, create faith before the second judges.

Gregory IX, to the Provost of Saint Mary of Magdeburg and the Dean of Meissen.

When, of good memory—(And below:) Since the original acts are said to have remained with the former judges, we command that, seeking them with every diligence, you shall remit to our presence the acts themselves, if they can be found, together with whatever the parties shall determine lawfully to propose, reduced to writing. Otherwise, since no doubt is raised concerning the joinder of issue over the status of the monastery of Pigam and certain spoliations committed against its abbot by the Bishop of Merseburg, you shall receive the proofs of the parties anew; and, hearing a discussion of settlement if the parties wish to hear it, you shall take care to remit to us both what you shall find concerning this and the sufficiently instructed cause.

Title XX: On Witnesses and Attestations

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: It is brief.

From the Council of Mainz.

It pleased the holy assembly that witnesses should not be hired for giving testimony at a price; that all persons who are suitable and faithful should be assumed as witnesses, so that the person against whom they ought to testify can impute no infamy to them; and that no one shall give testimony unless fasting.

De testibus et attestationibus.

Breve est.

Ex concilio Matercensi.

Placuit sancto conventui, ut testes ad testimonium non conducantur pretio, et ut quicunque idonei et fideles in testimonium assumantur, ut is, contra quem testimoniare debent, nullam eis infamiam possit inferre, ac nullus testimonium dicat, nisi ieiunus.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: A reception of witnesses made against a person not cited is invalid.

Gregory, to John the Defender, Going to Spain.

In the name of the Lord—(And below:) But what the same bishop says, that in his absence even persons of the vilest condition were produced as witnesses, is to be known as of no moment under the law of the Novel Constitution, which speaks concerning witnesses in these words: ["We have also rather often learned this: that certain persons enter either before the defenders of places, or before the most illustrious judges of provinces, or even, as is customary, here before the most illustrious master of the census, and complain as though they suffered something contrary to the laws from another, or were otherwise injured or damaged, wishing to produce witnesses. But"] "lest it afterward be objected against them that these things were conducted and completed by one party, it is necessary that the testimonies be given after that person has been admonished by the judge or defender to come and hear the witnesses. But if he is unwilling to come, and is unable to come not from some unavoidable necessity, we decree that testimonies of this kind shall be valid as though they had not been constituted by one party, but had been given in his presence." Behold, the adversary must always be admonished to come to hear the witnesses; and because this was omitted here, it is necessary that what was done contrary to law possess no validity. [But what kind of witnesses, etc.]

Nulla est receptio testium facta contra non citatum.

Gregorius Ioanni Defensori eunti in Hispaniam.

In nomine Domini (Et infra:) Quod autem dicit idem episcopus, quia se absente etiam vilissimi sint testes exhibiti, nullius momenti lege noscendum est constitutionis novellae, quae de testibus loquitur in haec verba: [«Hoc quoque saepius agnovimus, quoniam quidam aut apud locorum defensores aut apud clarissimos provinciarum iudices, aut etiam, ut assolet, hic apud virum clarissimum magistrum census ingrediuntur, et queruntur tanquam ab alio passi aliquid contra leges, aut aliter laesi aut damnificati, testes volentes producere. At»] «Ne postea obiiciatur eis, quod per unam partem gesta et confecta sunt, oportet, ut testimonia dentur, illo admonito a iudice aut defensore, venire et audire testes. Si vero noluerit venire, et non ex inevitabili quadam necessitate venire non possit, sancimus, huiusmodi testimonia ita valere, tanquam si non ex una parte consisterent, sed etiam ipso praesente facta fuissent.» Ecce admonendus est semper adversarius, ut ad audiendos testes veniat, quod quia hic omissum est, necesse est, ut quod contra legem actum est non habeat firmitatem. [Quales autem testes etc.]

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: A woman testifies against a cleric when proceedings concern a crime.

The same, to Sabinus, Defender of Sardinia.

Because certain crimes concerning the person of Epiphanius the priest have been reported to us, it is necessary that you investigate everything more diligently and hasten to bring here together either the women with whom he is said to have committed them or others whom you perceive to know something about the same cause, so that through ecclesiastical coercion the things which are true can clearly be disclosed. [These things, however, etc.]

Mulier testificatur contra clericum, quum de crimine agitur.

Idem Sabino Defensori Sardiniae.

Quoniam aliqua nobis de persona Epiphanii presbyteri sunt facinora nunciata, necesse est, ut cuncta diligentius perscruteris, et seu mulieres, cum quibus peregisse dicitur, seu alios, quos de causa eadem scire aliquid senseris, huc pariter festines adducere, quatenus ecclesiastica districtione liquide possint quae vera sunt aperiri. [Haec vero etc.]

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: Where proceedings are conducted for correction by preventing sin, the principal person is admitted as a witness.

Pope Paschal II.

In every business, the principal person, speaking the truth about a matter known to him, is most rightly to be held as a witness; when indeed one person is joined to him, two witnesses are produced, and when two are joined, three are produced. The Lord plainly shows this when he says: "If your brother sins against you, correct him between you and him alone; but if he does not hear you, take with you one or two witnesses, so that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may stand"; and elsewhere [the same] affirms, saying: "Let not one stand against another, but in the mouth of two or three witnesses let every word stand." Likewise, elsewhere he affirms, saying: "I am he who bears testimony concerning myself, and the Father bears testimony concerning me; for in your law it is written that the testimony of two men is true."

Ubi agitur ad correctionem de peccato impediendo, principalis persona admittitur in testem.

Pascalis Papa II.

In omni negotio principalis persona, dicens veritatem de re sibi nota, rectissime habenda est pro teste, cui quidem adhibito uno efficiuntur duo testes, adhibitis duobus efficiuntur tres. Quod patenter ostendit Dominus, quum dicit: «Si peccaverit in te frater tuus, corripe eum inter te et ipsum solum; quodsi te non audierit, adhibe tecum unum vel duos testes, ut in ore duorum, vel trium testium stet omne verbum,» et alibi [idem] affirmat dicens. «Non unus stet contra alium, sed in ore duorum vel trium testium stet omne verbum.» Item alibi affirmat dicens. «Ego sum, qui testimonium perhibeo de me ipso, et testimonium perhibet de me Pater; nam in lege vestra scriptum est, quia duorum hominum testimonium verum est.»

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: It states what sort of persons those who depose concerning consanguinity ought to be, and how they ought to swear.

Eugenius III.

Whenever persons are sought to be separated because of relationship by affinity or consanguinity, it ought to be affirmed by two or three witnesses who survive from the same family relationship, or it ought lawfully to be proved by the same number of older and better persons of the same place. The proof of the witnesses ought to be made by a twofold oath: they are to swear that they have not been induced to swear this through private hatred, friendship, or for any advantage which they have had, have, or will have; afterward they ought to swear that they received the truth of the matter from their ancestors, as they themselves say, and believe it to be so.

Dicit, quales esse, et qualiter iurare debeant, qui super consanguinitate deponunt.

Eugenius III.

Quotiens aliqui propter cognationem propinquitatis vel consanguinitatis separari petuntur, duobus vel tribus testibus adhibitis affirmari debet, qui de eadem consanguinitate supersint, vel totidem senioribus et melioribus loci eiusdem id debet legitime comprobari. Probatio autem testium debet fieri duplici iuramento, ut iurent se non privato odio, neque amicitia, neque pro aliquo commodo, quod habuerint, vel quod habent vel habituri sunt, ad hoc iurandum esse inductos; postea debent iurare, sicut ipsi dicunt, rei veritatem accepisse a maioribus suis, et credere ita esse.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: A prelate and clerics who do not conduct the cause of a church can testify in it.

The same, to the Prior and Brothers of Holy Trinity.

Furthermore, by our authority, we establish that it shall be lawful for you to give testimony in the causes of your church, provided that one or two of you are appointed to bring actions and answer them; their testimony ought not to be admitted in the causes in which they are appointed as plaintiffs or representatives.

Praelatus et clerici qui causam ecclesiae non procurant, testificari possunt in ea.

Idem Priori et Fratribus S. Trinitatis.

Insuper etiam auctoritate nostra statuimus, ut liceat vobis in causis ecclesiae vestrae ferre testimonium, dummodo unus ex vobis vel duo ad agendum et respondendum instituantur, quorum testimonium in causis, in quibus actores vel responsales sunt instituti, non debet admitti.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: If proof of an exception interposed against a produced witness is not admitted before the witness's statement is received, in a case in which it ought to have been admitted, an appeal is lawfully made. This is what it says according to the reading which Panormitanus sets down.

The same, to R., Bishop of Hereford, and the Abbot of Sard.

A complaint was brought to us on behalf of the priest A. that, when he had canonically obtained the church of Clunoden and had possessed it peacefully for thirty years and more, a certain knight named H. provoked him from it with grave vexations and injuries and finally, suppressing the fact that he was a layman, obtained our letters to judges, directing that, if the said priest was the son of the person who had most recently ministered in that church and held it by hereditary right, or if he publicly kept a concubine, they should entirely remove him from the aforesaid church.

Finally, however, when the same knight, through an intermediary, drew him into a cause before the aforesaid judges, he is said to have produced certain infamous and notorious laymen to give testimony, namely that the aforesaid priest was the son of that priest who had most recently ministered in that church. Although the aforesaid priest A. asserted that those witnesses should not be received because certain of them were manifest thieves and robbers, while certain others had been convicted of perjury in another cause, and steadfastly said that he would prove this, the aforesaid judges nevertheless, after receiving such witnesses of the adverse party, even after the appeal which he proposes that he interposed concerning this, awarded the aforesaid church away from that priest in his absence. It is now held occupied by the son of the steward of the aforesaid knight.

Therefore, because we fully confide in you, we have considered that the cause itself should be committed to your discretion; by commanding you under the authority of the present letters, we order that, having summoned the parties before you, you shall diligently inquire into the truth of the matter concerning this; and if it is established to you that the aforesaid priest was not lawfully despoiled of the aforesaid church through suitable witnesses, you shall, after quashing the sentence of those judges and notwithstanding letters of confirmation, if any were obtained concerning the same church, restore that church to the same priest, delay, contradiction, and appeal ceasing, and shall not permit him henceforth to be troubled concerning it by the aforesaid knight or by the person who holds that church. But if the matter has itself otherwise, you shall nevertheless hear the cause and determine it with a due end. You shall take care to admonish and diligently induce, from consideration of God and love of justice, any witnesses whom the same A. invokes in testimony of his assertion to give testimony to the truth concerning these matters before you, and not to presume to conceal anything concerning this to the peril of their salvation.

Si probatio exceptionis oppositae contra testem productum non admittitur, antequam dictum testis recipiatur, in casu, in quo admitti debuit, licite appellatur. Hoc dicit secundum lecturam, quam ponit Panorm.

Idem R. Herfordensi Episcopo et Abbati Sardi.

Ex parte A. presbyteri ad nos est querela perlata, quod, quum ipse ecclesiam de Clunoden. canonice fuisset adeptus, et eam XXX. annis et amplius pacifice possedisset, miles quidam H. nomine ipsum exinde gravibus molestiis et iniuriis lacessivit, et tandem, tacito, quod laicus esset, ad iudices nostras literas impetravit, quod, si dictus presbyter filius esset illius, qui proximo in eadem ecclesia ministrarat, et iure hereditario eam teneret, vel quod publice fornicariam haberet, ipsum a praedicta ecclesia prorsus amoverent. Tandem vero, quum idem miles per interpositam personam eum coram praefatis iudicibus traxisset in causam, quosdam laicos infames et notabiles ad testimonium perhibendum dicitur produxisse, quod videlicet memoratus presbyter filius sacerdotis illius fuisset, qui proximo in ipsa ecclesia ministraverat. Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: A judge ought to send a discerning examiner to receive witnesses who cannot conveniently come to him.

The same, to the Bishops of Exeter and Worcester.

If any of the witnesses are sick, aged, consumed by weakness, or oppressed by poverty, so that they cannot be brought to your presence, you shall send suitable and discerning persons to receive them.

Iudex mittere debet examinatorem discretum ad testes recipiendos, qui ad eum commode venire non possunt.

Idem Exonensi et Vigorniensi Episcopis.

Si qui testium valetudinarii sunt, et senes, vel debilitate confecti, aut paupertate depressi, ita, quod non possint ad vestram praesentiam adduci, ad ipsos recipiendos mittatis personas idoneas et discretas.

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: A sentence is to be reconsidered if it is established that it was rendered according to the statement of corrupted witnesses. This is what it says according to the reading which Panormitanus holds.

Alexander III, to the Bishop of Beauvais.

As was intimated to us on your behalf, certain of your parishioners, having received money, furnish oaths concerning a relationship between a man and wife, through which a sentence of separation is promulgated between them; but afterward, asserting privately that there is no line of consanguinity between them, they say that they were corrupted by gifts and gave testimony to falsehood. Concerning this we answer as follows: if the man and wife, or either of them, has passed to second vows, it appears that no other remedy remains except that penance be enjoined upon the witnesses for perjury and for the adultery of one or more persons to which they gave cause. But if the same man and wife have not migrated to second vows, diligent inquiry is to be made concerning those before whom the corruption took place; and, if such persons are produced through whom the truth of the aforesaid corruption can be proved, the sentence is to be revoked after their testimony has been received. For the testimony of the aforesaid persons, since they are perjurers, is not to be admitted in this case in any respect.

> Retractanda est sententia, si constat, eam fuisse latam ad dictum corruptorum testium. H. d. secundum lecturam, quam tenet Panorm.
> Alexander III. Belvacensi Episcopo.
>
> Sicut nobis est* ex parte tua* intimatum, quidam parochiani tui accepta pecunia de parentela inter virum et uxorem exhibent iuramenta, per quae inter ipsos divortii sententia promulgatur, postea vero privatim nullam inter eos consanguinitatis lineam asserentes, se corruptos muneribus dicunt, et testimonium perhibuisse falsitati. Super quo taliter respondemus, quod, si vir et uxor, aut alter eorum ad secunda vota transivit, nullum aliud remedium superesse videretur, nisi ut testibus de periurio, et adulterio uno pluribusve, quibus causam dederunt, poenitentia indicatur. Si vero ad secunda vota idem vir et uxor non migraverint, diligenter inquirendi sunt coram quibus corruptio intercessit, et, si tales exhibeantur, per quos possit praedictae corruptionis veritas comprobari, recepto eorum testimonio est sententia revocanda. Non enim testimonium praedictorum, quum periuri sint, est in hoc casu aliquatenus admittendum.

Chapter X

Latin source headnote: An associate in the crime and the gift does not testify even in the crime of simony. And the testimony of one person does not suffice for condemnation.

The same.

Coming to us with your letters, L., your priest, showed us by his report, and your letters contained the same thing, that when he had been instituted in the church of Oven, it was objected against him that he had not had a canonical entrance into the church of Oven, namely because he had previously promised to remit to each parishioner five barrels of wine which they had been accustomed to give as a benefice to the priest serving that church there for the time being. But when two persons appeared who deposed under oath that the aforesaid priest had made such a promise and [said] that that agreement had been improperly made with one of them, you judged concerning the priest as was fitting and as the order of reason requires. And we commend your sentence, as is worthy, because the person who was infected with the same crime could not testify against him concerning it, no one who has confessed concerning himself is to be believed against another in the same crime, and the testimony of one person does not suffice for anyone's condemnation. [Indeed, what is in the letters, etc.]

> Socius criminis et muneris non testificatur etiam in crimine simoniae. Et unius testimonium non sufficit ad condemnationem.
>
> Idem.

> Veniens ad nos cum literis tuis L. presbyter tuus sua nobis relatione monstravit, et hoc idem tuae literae continebant, quod, quum in ecclesia de Oven. institutus fuisset, ei obiectum fuit, quod in ecclesia de Oven. canonicum non habuisset ingressum, videlicet quia prius promisisset unicuique parochianorum quinque barillos vini remittere, qui sacerdoti eiusdem ecclesiae ibi pro tempore servienti consueverant pro beneficio dari. Verum quum duo apparuissent, qui iurati deposuerunt, praedictum presbyterum talem fecisse promissionem, et cum altero illorum pactum illud indecenter [dicerent] factum fuisse, tu de presbytero prout decuit et ordo rationis exigit, iudicasti. Et nos tuam sententiam, prout dignum est, commendamus, eo, quod ille, qui eodem erat infectus crimine, inde contra eum testificari non posset, nullique de se confesso adversus alium in eodem crimine sit credendum, nec unius testimonium ad condemnationem sufficiat alicuius. [Sane, quod in literis etc.]

Chapter XI

Latin source headnote: Attestations received in one judgment create faith in the same cause and between the same persons before another judge.

The same, to the Abbot of Saint L. and the Prior of Saint C.

We commit to your experience for hearing, and for determination with a due end, appeal being removed, the cause which has for a rather long time been conducted between the monks N. and O. concerning the election of each made in the monastery. Therefore, by commanding through apostolic writings, we order your discretion that, having summoned the parties before your presence and having received the attestations of both parties which were received by other judges, admitting other witnesses if any suitable ones are produced, unless the attestations themselves have been published, and after the arguments on this side and that have been diligently heard and understood, you shall determine the cause itself with a due end, the remedy of appeal being removed.

Attestationes in uno iudicio receptae fidem faciunt in eadem causa, et inter easdem personas coram alio iudice.

Idem Abbati sancti L. et Priori sancti C.

Causam, quae +inter N. et O. monachos super electione de utroque facta in monasterio diutius est agitata, experientiae vestrae committimus audiendam, et appellatione remota fine debito terminandam. Ideoque Discretioni vestrae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus partes ante vestram praesentiam convocetis, et susceptis attestationibus utriusque partis, quae ab aliis iudicibus sunt receptae, testes alios, si qui idonei producti fuerint, admittentes, nisi attestationes ipsae sint publicatae, et rationibus hinc inde diligenter auditis et cognitis, causam ipsam sublato appellationis remedio fine debito terminetis.

Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: Clerics are not to be repelled from giving testimony in the cause of their church without a reasonable cause.

The same, to the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Worcester.

When the messenger of the canons of Plutin and the messenger of Joel, a knight, etc. (And below:) Furthermore, let it not escape your prudence that clerics are not to be repelled from giving testimony concerning the own business of their church unless another reasonable cause impedes.

Clerici non sunt a ferendo testimonio in causa ecclesiae suae sine rationabili causa repellendi.

Idem Cantuariensi Archiepiscopo et Vigorniensi Episcopo.

Quum nuncius canonicorum de Plutino, et nuncius Ioelis militis etc. (Et infra:) Praeterea Non lateat prudentiam vestram, quod clerici non sunt a ferendo testimonio super proprio negotio ecclesiae suae, nisi alia rationabilis causa impediat, repellendi.

Chapter XIII

Latin source headnote: A crime now proved repels a witness who has not otherwise been condemned for that crime.

The same, to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Concerning what indeed you asked us—whether those witnesses against whom crimes are objected by the adverse party are to be discredited in a criminal or civil cause—we answer your prudence that, even if they have not previously been convicted of or confessed those crimes, provided that they are convicted of them, they ought not to be admitted as witnesses.

> Crimen nunc probatum repellit testem alias de illo crimine non damnatum.
>
> Idem Cantuariensi Archiepiscopo.
> Super eo vero, quod quaesivisti a nobis, utrum testes illi sint reprobandi in causa criminali vel civili quibus ab adversa parte crimina opponuntur tuae prudentiae respondemus, quod, si etiam ante non sunt convicti vel confessi de criminibus illis, dummodo inde convincantur, in testimonium non debent admitti.

Chapter XIV

Latin source headnote: A layman does not testify against a cleric in a criminal cause, but he accuses for an injury to himself or his people.

The same, to the Archbishop of Salerno.

For the rest, the censure of the sacred canons teaches more clearly that laymen are not to be admitted in any respect to accusation or testimony against a cleric in a criminal cause, unless perhaps they prosecute an injury to themselves or their people; and even then they can be admitted not to testimony but to accusation. But if, etc. (Cf. c. 4, On Judgments, II. 1.)

> Laicus in criminali non testificatur contra clericum, accusat tamcn pro sua vel suorum iniuria.
> Idem Salernitano Archiepiscopo.
> De cetero laicos in accusationem vel testimonium contra clericum in criminali causa non esse aliquatenus admittendos, censura sacrorum canonum manifestius edocet, nisi forte suam vel suorum iniuriam prosequantur; nec tunc etiam ad testimonium, sed ad accusationem possunt admitti. At si etc. (cf. c. 4. de iud. II. 1.).

Chapter XV

Latin source headnote: In ecclesiastical and civil causes, three productions of witnesses can be made; but a fourth is not admitted without legal solemnity. And after the statements of the witnesses have been published, they can be debated publicly. This is what it says according to the common reading, which agrees with the words of the text.

The same, to the same.

In ecclesiastical or civil causes, witnesses ought not to be produced beyond the third production unless a certain solemnity expressed in the laws is employed. And when the statements of the witnesses have been published, they can be debated publicly.

In causis ecclesiasticis et civilibus possunt fieri tres productiones testium; quarta autem non admittitur absque solennitate legali. Et super dictis testium post ipsorum publicationem potest publice disputari. H. d. secundum lecturam communem et verbis textus congruentem.

Idem eidem.

In causis ecclesiasticis vel civilibus ultra tertiam productionem non debent testes produci, nisi adhibita quadam solennitate, quae in legibus invenitur expressa. Et super dictis testium, quum fuerint publicata, publice potest disputari.

Chapter XVI

Latin source headnote: If someone proves that an act was performed after an appeal and the adversary proves that it was performed before, the first proof is preferred and the act is judged invalid unless the second proves that it occurred before every appeal.

The same, to the Provost and Canons of the Church of Embrun.

When you, son provost, with certain of your canons, and your venerable brother [our] archbishop, for the cause which was conducted between you and him, were established in our presence, the archbishop asserted that he had excommunicated you before the appeal and petitioned that his sentence be confirmed; but you proposed to the contrary that he had rendered the sentence of excommunication against you after the appeal, and for this reason you said that it was of no moment. Both you and the other party also objected that witnesses had been produced on each side and their attestations received. But we, having heard and understood the arguments and allegations of both parties and having diligently inspected the attestations, since it is established that your witnesses swore that he rendered the sentence of excommunication after the appeal and the archbishop's witnesses similarly swore that it was before the appeal, wishing kindly to interpret the statements of the witnesses and to provide that they not be marked with the guilt of perjury, because both could have occurred—that the sentence was rendered after the first appeal and before the second—by the common counsel of our [brothers] we announce and decree that the same sentence is not valid. [But so that this our determination, etc.]

Si quis probat actum gestum post appellationem, et adversarius probat quod ante, praefertur prima probatio, et actus iudicatur non tenere, nisi secundus probet, quod ante omnem appellationem.

Idem Praeposito et Canonicis Embrudensis ecclesiae.

Nos vero, auditis et cognitis rationibus et allegationibus utriusque partis, et attestationibus diligenter inspectis,* Quum constet, testes vestros iurasse, quod post appellationem excommunicationis sententiam tulerit, et archiepiscopi testes similiter iurasse, quod ante appellationem, nos dicta testium benigne interpretari ac providere volentes, ne de periurii reatu notentur, quia utrumque esse potuit, et quod post primam appellationem et ante secundam sententia lata fuerit, de communi consilio fratrum [nostrorum] eandem sententiam denunciamus et decernimus non tenere. [Ut autem huius nostrae diffinitionis etc.]

Chapter XVII

Latin source headnote: In an appellate cause, new and former witnesses are produced only concerning new articles, after an oath has first been received according to custom.

The same, to the Bishop of Piacenza.

Through the letters of your fraternity you wished to consult us whether new witnesses are to be received concerning an adjudicated question in which it is established that witnesses were renounced on each side, and whether, after witnesses have been received in the first cause, it is lawful to propose anything new concerning adjudicated questions on account of the appellate cause. Although, therefore, it did not become fully known to us from these things whether the parties desire witnesses to be introduced concerning the same or new articles, nevertheless, because you wished to consult us concerning this when you [do not] have an abundance of persons learned in law, we have considered that you should be answered that, in an appellate cause, if new articles should happen to arise concerning which one of the parties wishes to introduce new witnesses or to prove something through those already received, we believe that they can be received only concerning the new articles, after oaths according to the form for receiving witnesses have first been received from them.

> In causa appellationis super novis capitulis tantum testes novi et veteres producuntur iuramento secundum morem prius recepto.

> Idem Episcopo Placentino.
> Fraternitatis tuae literis nos consulere voluisti, utrum recipiendi sint novi testes super quaestione iudicata, in qua testibus renunciatum esse constet utrinque, et an, testibus in prima causa receptis, propter causam appellationis liceat super quaestionibus iudicatis aliquid novi proponere? +Licet igitur nobis ex his non plene innotuerit, utrum testes super eisdem vel novis capitulis a partibus desiderentur induci, quia tamen, quum prudentium iuris copiam [non] habeas, nos super hoc consulere voluisti, hoc Duximus tibi respondendum, quod in appellationis causa, si nova contigerit emergere capitula, super quibus aliqua partium voluerit novos testes inducere, vel per iam receptos aliquid comprobare, eos credimus posse recipi super novis duntaxat capitulis, receptis prius ab ipsis secundum formam recipiendorum testium iuramentis.

Chapter XVIII

Latin source headnote: One who swore not to give testimony is compelled to testify if the attestations have not been published.

The same, to the Bishop of Exeter.

The priest R. intimated to us that the cleric G. bound his chaplain and very many others of his witnesses by an oath that they would not furnish testimony, counsel, or aid to him against G. Therefore, by the authority of the present letters, we enjoin upon you that, if their testimony has not been published and witnesses have not been renounced, you shall not postpone receiving those who are bound by the oath and other suitable persons, if necessary, whom he produces as witnesses.

> Qui iuravit testimonium non dicere, testificari compellitur, si testificationes publicatae non sunt.
> Idem Exonensi Episcopo.
> Intimavit nobis R. presbyter, quod G. clericus capellanum eius et alios quamplures de testibus suis iuramento constrinxit, quod testimonium, consilium et auxilium contra ipsum non praeberent eidem.

Ideoque praesentium auctoritate vobis iniungimus, ut, si testimonium eorum publicatum non est, nec est abrenunciatum testibus, eos, qui sunt iuramento adstricti, et alios, si necesse fuerit, idoneos, quos ipse in testimonium produxerit, recipere non postponas.

Chapter XIX

Latin source headnote: Publication or renunciation of witnesses concerning certain articles does not prejudice a person wishing to produce witnesses concerning others. This is what it says in relation to the title.

The same, to the Abbot and Brothers of Martura.

We formerly committed to our sons, the archpriest of Volterra and the Abbot of Spognia, as judges for determination with a due end, appeal being removed, the cause which is conducted between you and our beloved sons, the pleban and clerics of the parish church of Saint Mary of Martura. And when each party was for this reason established in their presence, and witnesses had been received on each side and renounced by both parties, and the attestations of both parties had also been published, you brought into the midst a certain privilege recently obtained from us, asserting that you had obtained from us certain other defenses which appeared to obscure and impede the arguments of the aforesaid parish church, wherefore the cause itself could not yet be determined. But because it lies upon our solicitude to preserve unimpaired the rights of each church and to impose an end upon lawsuits and contentions, by commanding the judges themselves we ordered that they should summon those parties before their presence; diligently hear the arguments on this side and that concerning other articles, if there were any other than those concerning which witnesses had been received and their attestations published; receive any suitable witnesses produced; and decide the cause by agreement or through justice, no articles recently obtained from us through your messengers—which are contained in your privilege or in other letters which we granted you after we committed the cause itself to those judges—furnishing an impediment to the aforesaid parish church in this cause.

But because our venerable brother I., the Bishop of Florence, intimated to us through his letters that certain articles were inserted into the same privilege which we recently granted to your monastery and appear contrary to reason, by commanding you through the present writings, we order that, as you hold dear the grace of blessed Peter and our own, you shall transmit that privilege to our presence with your messenger, who shall come safely to us with it, delay and occasion ceasing.

Publicatio vel renunciatio testium in certis capitulis non praeiudicat volenti testes producere in aliis. H. d. quoad titulum.

Idem Abbati et Fratribus de Martura.

Causam, quae vertitur inter vos, et dilectos filios nostros plebanum et clericos plebis sanctae Mariae de Martura, iam pridem filiis nostris archipresbytero Vulterano et abbati de Spognia commisimus iudicibus appellatione remota fine debito terminandam. Quumque utraque pars propter hoc in eorum esset praesentia constituta, et testes essent hinc inde recepti, et eis ab utraque parte renunciatum, et attestationes utriusque partis etiam publicatae, quoddam privilegium nuper a nobis impetratum in medium protulistis, +asserentes, vos quaedam alia munimenta a nobis impetrasse, quae rationes supra dictae plebis obscurare et impedire videntur, quare causa ipsa nondum potuit terminari. Quia vero sollicitudini nostrae incumbit, utrique ecclesiae iura sua conservare integra, ac litibus et contentionibus finem imponere, Iudicibus ipsis praecipiendo mandavimus, ut partes ipsas ante suam praesentiam convocent, et super aliis capitulis, si qua alia fuerint ab his, super quibus testes recepti sunt, et eorum attestationes publicatae, rationes hinc inde diligenter audiant, et testes, si qui idonei producti fuerint, recipiant, et nullis capitulis noviter a nobis per vestros nuncios impetratis, quae contineantur in privilegio vestro, vel in aliis literis, quas vobis indulsimus, postquam causam ipsam eisdem commisimus, praedictae plebi in hac causa impedimentum praestantibus, concordia vel iustitia mediante decidant. Quia vero venerabilis frater noster I. Florentinus episcopus per suas nobis literas intimavit, quaedam capitula eidem privilegio, quod monasterio vestro nuper indulsimus, esse inserta, quae obvia rationi videntur, per praesentia scripta vobis praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus privilegium illud, sicut gratiam beati Petri et nostram caram habetis, ad nostram praesentiam cum vestro nuncio, qui ad nos secure cum eodem veniat, dilatione et occasione cessante transmittatis.

Chapter XX

Latin source headnote: One laboring under a similar disease is repelled from testimony.

The same, to the Bishop of Noyon.

The persons of the churches—(And below: [Cf. c. 4, On Appeals, II. 28.]) But if businesses of this kind are ventilated before you or anyone else, we will that, if persons laboring under a similar disease are brought forward as witnesses by either party, they shall not be admitted to testimony if it is certain or they can lawfully be convicted concerning this.

A testimonio repellitur simili morbo laborans.

Idem Novicensi Episcopo.

Personas ecclesiarum (Et infra: [cf. c. 4. de appell. 2.28.]) Verum si coram te, vel alio quolibet huiusmodi negotia ventilentur, nolumus, ut aliqui consimili morbo laborantes, si certum sit, aut legitime super hoc possint convinci, si ab alterutra parte testes adducti fuerint, in testimonium admittantur.

Chapter XXI

Latin source headnote: A Christian is admitted as a witness against a Jew.

The same, in the Lateran Council.

Jews or Saracens—(And below: cf. c. 5, On the Jews, V. 5.) We judge also that the testimony of Christians against Jews is to be received in all causes, since the latter presume to use their witnesses against Christians; and we decree that whoever wishes to prefer Jews to Christians in this respect is to be struck with anathema, since they ought to be subject to Christians and to be supported by them for humanity alone. [If any, etc. Cf. c. 5, On the Jews, V. 5.]

Christianus contra Iudaeum in testem admittitur.

Idem in concilio Lateranensi.

Iudaei sive Sarraceni (Et infra: cf. c. 5. de Iudaeis V. 5.) Testimonium quoque Christianorum adversus Iudaeos in omnibus causis, quum illi adversus Christianos testibus suis uti praesumant recipiendum esse censemus, et anathemate decernimus feriendos, quicunque Iudaeos Christianis voluerint in hac parte praeferre, quum eos Christianis subiacere oporteat, et ab eis pro sola humanitate foveri. [Si qui etc. cf. c. 5. de Iudaeis V. 5.]

Chapter XXII

Latin source headnote: The testimony of a mother is suspect where her daughter claims as husband a man superior to herself. And at the statement of the mother alone deposing concerning an impediment, a marriage is impeded, but a contracted marriage is not dissolved.

The same, to Cardinal Matthew.

Concerning what your devotion sought from us—whether, when a man denies that he betrothed a woman, the mother of the woman herself and another woman can be received as witnesses—we answer your consultation in this way: since a mother appears to love the advancement and honor of her daughter, where the man is superior in riches and nobility, power, or honor, her testimony appears to be altogether suspect, and therefore not to be admitted in any respect.

But concerning that question which you posed, whether a woman is not to be joined to a man because the mother alone of either one confesses that they are consanguineous, we answer your discretion in this way: if marriage has not been established between them, when the mother affirms that they are consanguineous, they ought not to be joined, because there is no slight presumption that they touch one another by a line of consanguinity, since the mother confesses it. But if the marriage has been established, it ought not to be dissolved without the oath of several persons.

> Testimonium matris est suspectum, ubi filia petit in virum aliquem se maiorem. Et ad dictum solius matris de impedimento deponentis impeditur matrimonium, sed contractum non dissolvitur.
> Idem Matthaeo Cardinali.
> Super eo, quod a nobis tua devotio postulavit, utrum, viro negante se mulierem affidasse, ipsius mater mulieris et altera mulier possint ad testimonium recipi, consultationi tuae taliter respondemus, quod, quum mater filiae incrementum et honorem videtur diligere, ubi vir superior est divitiis et nobilitate, potentia vel honore, testimonium eius omnino videtur esse suspectum, et ideo non esse aliquatenus admittendum. Super illa vero quaestione, quam fecisti, an mulier coniungenda non sit viro, pro eo, quod sola mater alterutrius eos esse consanguineos confitetur, discretioni tuae taliter respondemus, quod, si non est firmatum matrimonium inter eos, matre asseverante, ipsos esse consanguineos, non debent coniungi, quia praesumptio est non modica, quod se linea consanguinitatis attingant, quum mater id confitetur. Si vero matrimonium est firmatum, non debet sine plurium iuramento dissolvi.

Chapter XXIII

Latin source headnote: For decision of a cause, especially on behalf of a Jew, the testimony of one person does not regularly suffice, but that of two persons of proved life and praiseworthy conduct does.

The same.

Although, by duty of the office committed to us, [we ought to assist with provision all the faithful of God, nevertheless we ought with vigilant care more attentively to defend ecclesiastical men from the harassment of depraved malignant persons, to whose governance we have, although of insufficient merits, more specially been appointed by the providence of God.] It has, however, been brought [to] our hearing that the Jews dwelling in your city have come to such pride and elation that, whenever a cause has arisen between them and any cleric, or between you and them, they draw you before a secular judge and litigate with you before any judge; through a simple charter without witnesses, or through one Christian or Jew of any sort, they intend to prove their cause contrary to every justice and reason, and they do not receive against themselves [even] the testimony of great and approved men.

But because it is not lawful for any Christian—and much less for an enemy of the cross of Christ—namely, to draw ecclesiastical men before a secular curia and to impose an end upon his cause by the purportedly lawful testimony of only one person, [by commanding] through apostolic writings we order your discretion that, if a question arises between you and any Christians or Jews, you shall not presume, at anyone's summons, to approach a secular curia to treat the business or be judged there; but, as justice requires and the reason of equity demands, in any cause you shall admit the testimony of no fewer than two or three Christian men—and especially clerics—who are of proved life and faithful conduct, according to the Lord's saying: "In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word stands." For, although there are certain causes which require more than two witnesses, nevertheless no cause is reasonably determined by the testimony of only one person, however lawful. [In addition, etc. (Cf. c. 8, On the Jews, V. 5.)]

Latin source headnote: Witnesses whom the plaintiff produced from his household are not suitable.

The same, to the Bishop of Fermo.

In the letters—(And below:) A certain nobleman of your bishopric, having lawfully joined a certain woman to himself, after he had kept her in his house for almost seven years, asserted that before marrying her he had known carnally her father's female cousin; to prove this he produced three witnesses from his household. We therefore answer that, if the matter is so, you shall for no reason permit him to be separated from his wife on account of their testimony, nor shall you hear any persons against them unless they are of proved life and reputation, concerning whom it would not be likely that they ought to perjure themselves for anyone.

Chapter XXV

Latin source headnote: Until the attestations have been published and witnesses renounced, witnesses can be produced; afterward, however, they cannot be produced concerning the same article, but they can be concerning another. This is what it says in relation to the title.

Urban III.

When our beloved son Master M. came to the Apostolic See, he explained to us that Pope Lucius, our predecessor of happy memory, committed to judges for determination with a due end the cause conducted between him and our beloved son, the Abbot of Sicolan. (And below:) By commanding your discretion through apostolic writings, we order that, having summoned the parties, if you learn that their sentence was canonically promulgated, you shall confirm it by apostolic authority and cause it to be committed to execution. Nor shall the appeal which is said to have been interposed here on the occasion of our predecessor's death impede it, since afterward he both brought an action and answered, and determined to produce witnesses.

You shall also determine by the mediation of justice, without the obstacle of appeal, the other questions concerning which witnesses were produced and their depositions published, or witnesses were renounced on this side and that, no others being received from either party concerning the same matter, according to the tenor of those depositions. But if there are any questions concerning which either witnesses were not produced or those witnesses were renounced, you shall hear whatever has been proposed on this side and that and impose upon them a due end, appeal ceasing.

Donec attestationes fuerint publicatae, et eis renunciatum, produci possunt testes; postea vero non super eodem capitulo, sed super alio sic. H. d. quoad titulum.

Urbanus III.

Quum venisset ad apostolicam sedem dilectus filius noster magister M., nobis exposuit, quod felicis memoriae Lucius Papa praedecessor noster causam, quae inter ipsum et dilectum filium nostrum abbatem de Sicolan. vertebatur, commisit iudicibus fine debito terminandam (Et infra:) Discretioni vestrae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo Mandamus, quatenus, partibus convocatis, si sententiam illorum noveritis canonice promulgatam, eam auctoritate apostolica confirmetis et faciatis exsecutioni mandari, nec appellatio illam impediat, quae hic interposita dicitur occasione mortis praedecessoris nostri, quum postea et egerit et responderit, testesque duxerit producendos. Quaestiones quoque alias, super quibus testes fuere producti, et depositiones publicatae eorum, vel renunciatum fuit testibus hinc et inde, nullis aliis ab alterutra parte super eodem receptis, secundum tenorem ipsarum mediante iustitia sine appellationis obstaculo terminetis. Si quae vero fuerint quaestiones, super quibus vel testes non fuerint producti, vel, renunciatum eisdem, audiatis, si qua hinc inde proposita fuerint, appellatione cessante finem illis debitum imponentes.

Chapter XXVI

Latin source headnote: A defendant can produce witnesses to prove the contrary of what the plaintiff proved if publication of the attestations has not been made, notwithstanding a contrary custom. This is what it says according to the more noteworthy reading.

Clement III.

The course of your rescript disclosed to us that, when a conjugal question was recently conducted between the sons and daughters of certain nobles of your city, because you were distracted by other more urgent business, you committed your functions in the ventilation of that question to certain prudent men, before whom that party which accused the marriage produced lawful witnesses who firmly asserted that consanguinity existed in the fifth degree between the aforesaid persons, placing two persons in the first degree, namely B. and I., and saying that they were brother and sister. But the opposite party said this was false—namely, that B. was the sister of I.—offering both witnesses and a public instrument to corroborate its assertion.

Hence, because the party of the accusers proposes that those witnesses are not to be received, and you affirm that it is not the custom of your church that, after witnesses have been received who compute consanguinity according to the form of the canons, others are admitted from the opposite side, concerning which you request to be instructed both in the present business and in similar ones, we answer by the present page that, if there is no other canonical matter which stands in the way, notwithstanding that custom as contrary to law, you shall not omit to receive the witnesses, appeal ceasing.

Unde, quia pars accusantium testes illos non esse recipiendos proponit, et tu non esse consuetudinem ecclesiae tuae affirmas, ut post receptos testes, qui consanguinitatem secundum formam canonum computant, alii ex opposito admittantur, super quo tam in praesenti negotio quam in similibus postulas edoceri, praesenti pagina respondemus, quod, si non est aliud canonicum, quod obsistat, non obstante illa consuetudine, utpote iuri contraria, testes appellatione cessante recipere non omittas.

Latin source headnote: Carnal union is proved by consistent eyewitness testimony; the same applies to testimony from hearing, when supporting evidence and reputation assist it.

Celestine III.

Furthermore, you wished to consult us, among other matters, when someone is accused of having known a woman carnally, whether the witnesses are to be questioned concerning sight, whether the reputation of the neighborhood alone suffices, or whether credence is to be given to sworn witnesses who confess that they are aware of the carnal union but affirm nothing concerning sight. To these things, therefore, we answer that, if consistent testimony concerning sight is rendered, or even testimony concerning hearing, and agreeing reputation supplies a violent presumption, and other lawful supporting evidence assists it, the testimony of the sworn witnesses is to be upheld. For a circumspect and discerning judge, according to what is provided in the civil law, will confirm the movement of his mind from the arguments and testimonies which he finds more fitting to the matter.

Ad haec itaque* Respondemus, quod, si testimonium conveniens de visu reddatur, vel etiam de auditu, et praesumptionem violentam fama consentiens subministret, ac alia legitima adminicula suffragentur eidem standum est testimonio iuratorum. Etenim circumspectus iudex atque discretus iuxta illud, quod in iure civili cautum exsistit, motum animi sui ex argumentis et testimoniis, quae rei aptiora esse compererit, confirmabit.

Chapter XXVIII

Latin source headnote: Credence is not given to the word of one judge; his writings, however, can be disproved through witnesses. This rule fails in the case of the Pope. It is commonly summarized thus.

Innocent III, to the Consuls and People of Benevento.

When from us—(And below:) Following both canon and civil laws, we more strictly prohibit credence from being given in causes to the word of one judge, of however great authority he may be, whether a question is conducted concerning testaments, concerning any other contracts, or other matters. Nor shall his writing, unless supported by the aid of witnesses, obtain such force that the testimonies of two or three good witnesses cannot and ought not to prevail over it, saving in all matters the authority of the Apostolic See. [Therefore let no one, etc. Given at Rome at Saint Peter's on the fourth day before the Ides of June. 1198.]

Nec scriptum eorum, nisi testium adminiculo fulciatur, earn obtineat firmitatem, quin ei possint et debeant duorum vel trium testium bonorum testimonia praevalere, salva in omnibus sedis apostolicae auctoritate. Chapter XXIX

Latin source headnote: A witness introduced concerning a dilatory exception is not believed concerning the principal matter, nor is he compelled to depose; it is otherwise if he is introduced concerning a peremptory exception. For then he can be compelled to swear to depose concerning the whole matter.

The same, to the Bishop of Tyre.

Your fraternity was led to consult us concerning witnesses who are introduced by the parties to prove an exception: whether they are to be compelled to give testimony to the truth also concerning the principal business, and whether those who are introduced to purge someone's infamy are to be strictly examined like the other witnesses. Therefore, greatly commending your fraternity [in the Lord] because it wishes to be made certain in doubtful matters by a rescript of the Apostolic See, we answer your consultation in this way: if the witnesses have already been introduced only to prove a dilatory exception, since they swore to speak the truth concerning it alone, they ought neither to be heard nor compelled to give testimony concerning the principal matter, since they have not sworn concerning that upon which they would depose.

But if, when they are introduced by either party to prove a peremptory exception, the other party should perhaps seek that they also depose concerning the principal business and petition that they be compelled to be bound by an oath to speak the truth concerning the whole business, they are without doubt to be compelled to this, unless perhaps a sufficient production of witnesses concerning the principal matter has already been made, or witnesses have been renounced, or the depositions of the witnesses have been published. [But those, etc. (Cf. c. 13, On Canonical Purgation, V. 34.) Given at the Lateran on the fourth day before the Nones of January. 1199.]

Super hoc igitur fraternitatem tuam plurimum* [in Domino] commendantes, quae in dubiis sedis apostolicae vult certificari rescripto, Consultationi tuae taliter respondemus, quod, si testes iam sint inducti ad exceptionem dilatoriam solummodo probandam, quum super ea tantum iuraverint dicere veritatem, super principali nec debent audiri, nec cogi testimonium perhibere, utpote super quo deponerent non iurati. Si vero, quum ad probandam exceptionem peremptoriam ab alterutra partium inducuntur, reliqua pars super principali negotio etiam eos deponere forte petierit, et ut cogantur super toto negotio dicere veritatem, sacramento eos postulaverit obligari, ad id sunt sine dubitatione cogendi, nisi forsitan sufficiens productio testium super principali iam facta fuerit, vel renunciatum testibus, vel depositiones testium fuerint publicatae. Chapter XXX

Latin source headnote: The statements of witnesses are not to be published at the petition of a third party. And one who produced witnesses before certain judges cannot produce them for the same effect before other judges, but ought to be content with their attestations.

The same, to the Bishops of Ely and Chichester and the Archdeacon of Norban.

Established in our presence, the beloved son Master Robert, proctor of Master R. of Saint Edmund, proposed that, when the beloved sons, the dean and chapter of York, had canonically conferred upon him the Archdeaconry of Richmond both by authority of the Lateran Council and by reason of their own privilege, assigning to him both a stall in the choir and a place in the chapter, and when, having obtained possession of the archdeaconry through them, he had received obedience and the customary oath from the clerics of the same archdeaconry, the beloved son Master H. of Kent, who is called Archdeacon of Richmond, despoiled him of it outside the order of law and after an appeal had been interposed to us. And when the aforesaid R. obtained letters of commission to judges concerning his restitution, the aforesaid Master H. appealed to the Apostolic See and, approaching our presence, obtained letters of revocation, which the same proctor asserted had been obtained through a suggestion of falsehood. (And below:)

And, among other things, the aforesaid H. petitioned that we cause the depositions of certain witnesses to be opened; but the aforesaid proctor said that they were not to be opened, since they had not been introduced in this cause, but rather in the one conducted between our venerable brother, the Archbishop of York, and the same R. (And below:) Although, however, the archdeacon, as stated above, sought that certain attestations be opened to create fuller faith for us concerning all matters, while the adversary asserted that they had been received in another cause, we were unwilling to open them, but, with the assent of those same persons, considered that the cause should be committed to your examination.

Therefore, through apostolic writings, we command your discretion that, having summoned the parties, you shall inquire more diligently into the truth concerning all the aforesaid matters, discern what is canonical, appeal being set aside, and cause what you decree to be firmly observed through ecclesiastical censure, yet in such a way that, if it is established to you that the aforesaid H. produced witnesses on his behalf before the Bishop of good memory and the beloved son, the Dean of Lincoln, before you, son archdeacon, and before our beloved son P., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Marcellus, then legate of the Apostolic See, as delegated judges, he shall be content with the attestations deposited with him. Otherwise, notwithstanding the fact that those witnesses were produced before those judges and you, son archdeacon, if they are produced on behalf of the said H., they shall be admitted to testimony.

Chapter XXXI

Latin source headnote: After the attestations have been published, objection is not made against the persons of the witnesses; it excepts three cases and adds a determination concerning the second.

The same.

By the authority of the present letters we establish that, if anyone wishes after the depositions of the witnesses have been published to object against their persons, this shall then at last be lawful for him when he has confirmed by oath that he is not proceeding to this from malice, unless perhaps before publication he protested concerning this, or he can show that after publication he learned what he objects against their persons. Moreover, when someone has protested that he wishes after publication of the depositions to repel the persons of the witnesses, if they say anything on his behalf, credence shall not readily be given to it.

Publicatis attestationibus non opponitur in personas testium; tres casus excipit, et ad secundum determinationem subdit.

Idem.

Praesentium auctoritate statuimus, ut si quis post depositiones testium publicatas obiicere voluerit in personas eorum, ei tunc tandem id liceat, quum iuramento firmaverit, quod ad hoc ex malitia non procedat: nisi forsan ante publicationem id fuerit protestatus, vel ostendere poterit, quod post publicationem didicerit quod obiicit in personas. Ceterum, quum quis personas testium se velle post publicationem depositionum repellere fuerit protestatus, si quid pro ipso dixerint, de facili non credatur.

Chapter XXXII

Latin source headnote: If the witnesses of the plaintiff and defendant depose contrary things, they do not derogate from one another's credibility, but those who are worthier and depose more probable things prevail; and, if there is no disparity in the other matters, number is preferred.

The same, to the Bishops of London and Ely.

Established in our presence, the beloved son Master Walter, in the name of the beloved son, the Archdeacon of Canterbury, by whom he had been appointed proctor for this purpose, petitioned that possession of the church of Middleton, which the beloved sons, the abbot and monks of Saint Augustine of Canterbury, had unlawfully occupied, be restored to him together with the fruits received in the meantime, [especially since custody of vacant churches of the diocese of Canterbury pertained to the archdeacon himself both under the common law and by the general custom of the English Church; and, when two parsons died in the aforesaid church before the monks most recently occupied that custody, the Archdeacon of Canterbury had used this right in the same church, as he said had been sufficiently proved through twenty-five witnesses greater than every exception in the presence of the delegated judges, whose depositions we heard read before us. He added, furthermore, that after the death of the last parson who died in the same church, the same archdeacon possessed the keys of the church itself, as four priests, one deacon, and one cleric most clearly testified. Hence, since we decreed that the church of Faversham be restored to the aforesaid monks, by equal right the aforesaid church ought to be restored to the archdeacon. But the beloved son O., monk of Saint Augustine of Canterbury, proposed to the contrary that, since the said church of Middleton pertained to his monastery without intermediary and it had hitherto possessed its custody undisturbed, as had likewise been clearly proved on his behalf through sixteen witnesses greater than every exception, they did no injury to the aforesaid archdeacon by using their own right. It had also been sufficiently shown through two monks that it freely disposed of the church itself and its property.]

Therefore, since on one side more witnesses and on the other fewer in number were produced, and since it is established that in certain matters they rendered not only different but wholly adverse testimonies, because regard ought not to be had only to multitude but to the quality of the witnesses and their depositions—which the light of truth more fully assists—from which it is fitting that the judge inform the movement of his mind, through apostolic writings we command your discretion that, if the witnesses produced on each side are of the same integrity and reputation, since it is established that the witnesses of the monks are fewer in number than those of the archdeacon, you shall render sentence for the same archdeacon, the obstacle of any contradiction and appeal being removed. But if the witnesses produced on behalf of the monks are of such preeminence that their authority is deservedly to be preferred to the multitude of the others, you shall absolve the same abbot and monks from the archdeacon's attack, contradiction and appeal likewise notwithstanding. [But if not all, etc. Given at Rome on the second day before the Ides of December. 1205.]

Chapter XXXIII

Latin source headnote: Laymen and women are admitted to prove impediments of a person elected. Add: witnesses from hearing and reputation do not prove sufficiently.

The same, to the Prior of Saint Fridianus of Lucca and Master G., Canon of Pisa.

Having diligently heard both your letters and the depositions of the witnesses, we clearly understood that nothing had been sufficiently shown against the beloved son, the Bishop-elect of Lucca, except concerning hearing alone and reputation, since concerning the other matters, if any perhaps appear to have been proved, the witnesses are either alone or of such a kind that they could not lawfully prove them. But because concerning the marriage which the same bishop-elect is said to have contracted with a widow, witnesses were not received because of the obstacle of appeal—namely, lest laymen or women be received against him in such a matter—as you intimated to us by your letters, although the messengers of the same bishop-elect endeavored to prove otherwise before us, we, so that the objection of so great an irregularity does not remain undiscussed, through apostolic writings command and enjoin your discretion that you shall lawfully receive and prudently examine witnesses, whether laymen or women, provided only that they are suitable, who are introduced within a month to prove this; solemnly excommunicating anyone who presumes to impede them from giving testimony to the truth.

Then, after the attestations have been published, if perhaps it is established that an irregularity of this kind has not been proved, you shall enjoin upon the same bishop-elect canonical purgation concerning the matters objected, to be furnished through seven canons of the greater church, or priest or deacon priors of the secular churches of the city of Lucca, of good reputation. When this has been received, you shall appoint for him a fitting term in which he is to present himself before us to be consecrated. But if either the impediment of irregularity has been proved or he has not furnished the enjoined purgation within the appointed term, you, supported by our authority and with the obstacle of any contradiction and appeal removed, shall entirely remove him from the prelacy of the Church of Lucca and command the chapter on our behalf that they shall not defer canonically to celebrate the election of another.

You shall announce that the Archpriest of Lucca and G. [Amsoff], the sacristan, who directed to us letters against the aforesaid bishop-elect in the name of the far greater part of the chapter, are suspended from office and benefice until they merit to obtain our indulgence, since it is established by the aforesaid attestations that by far the greater part of the chapter had not been aware of letters of this kind. You shall inquire, etc. [Given at Ferentino on the second day before the Ides of May. 1203.]

The same, to the Bishop of Durham and the Dean and Prior of Holy Trinity of York.

When formerly the beloved son, the Archdeacon of St Davids, proposed in the presence of us and our brothers a question against our venerable brother, the Archbishop of Canterbury, concerning the status of the Church of St Davids, we gave the archbishop himself a mandate through our letters that he should approach our presence concerning this, personally or through a suitable proctor, to answer. But when he neither came nor sent a suitable representative for this purpose, wishing with paternal solicitude to provide for the Church of St Davids, we considered that the cause concerning this should be committed under a certain form to our venerable brother, the Bishop of Ely, and the beloved sons, the Dean of London and the Archdeacon of Buckingham; they have not hitherto proceeded in that business according to our mandate. Therefore, lest the cause itself remain undecided, through apostolic writings we command your discretion that, unless the adverse party can repel the aforesaid archdeacon from bringing the action through a lawful exception, after the parties, if it can be done, or their proctors have been summoned through your messengers and letters to a safe and suitable place and issue has been lawfully joined, you shall take care to receive in England the witnesses whom the archbishop, and in Wales those whom the archdeacon, shall determine to produce against him.

But if the archbishop, although lawfully cited before you, is unwilling to appear either personally or through a suitable proctor, or even to join issue, you shall nevertheless admit the witnesses, especially the aged and sick, whom the archdeacon personally or through his proctor shall determine to produce, the obstacle of any contradiction and appeal being removed; and you shall take care to send their written depositions, enclosed under your seals, to the Apostolic See, appointing for the parties a fitting peremptory term at which, personally or through suitable representatives, they shall present themselves before us to receive sentence. [The witnesses, etc. Given at Ferentino on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of July, in the sixth year of our pontificate. 1203.]

Latin source headnote: After the attestations have been published, the adversary is admitted to prove the contrary if before publication he could not have been instructed concerning this contrary proof. This is what it says, and it is an exceptional case.

The same, to the Prior of Bolonic and I., Rector of the Church of Borellis.

We learned from the tenor of your letters that, when we committed to you and the beloved son, the Abbot of Furneia, for determination with a due end, the cause conducted between R., son of W. of Eston, a knight, and the woman M., sister of W. of Arches, when the aforesaid abbot reasonably excused himself because he could not attend cognizance of the same cause, you cited the parties to your presence. When they were established in your presence, the woman's party proposed that the said knight first furnished a corporal oath that he would take her as his wife, and afterward, having known [her] carnally, conveyed her into his house and received offspring from her.

But the aforesaid knight denied this altogether, adding that, even if the things proposed by her were true, he nevertheless could not by law have her because he had previously taken another woman, then living, as his wife. Therefore, after witnesses had been received from each party and the attestations published, when it appeared to have been proved through the witnesses of the often-mentioned knight that before the feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary he had solemnly taken the woman B. as his wife, while the witnesses of the woman M. of Arches said that during Easter week following the aforesaid feast he had furnished an oath to marry her, the aforesaid knight urgently petitioned to be absolved from her attack.

But it was replied on behalf of the often-mentioned woman that at that time, and also previously, at which the witnesses of the said knight had said that he contracted marriage with another, he had always dwelt in the province of York, while the witnesses themselves said that this had been done far outside the said province, specifying the time and place; and she was prepared to prove this through suitable witnesses. But it was answered to the contrary on the opposite side that, since the attestations had already been solemnly published on this side and that, there was no longer place for the production of witnesses. Therefore, because you doubt whether witnesses ought to be admitted after publication of the attestations concerning that article, by the authority of the present letters we answer your inquiry that the woman's witnesses are to be admitted to prove that article. Chapter XXXVI

Latin source headnote: A fourth production of witnesses sought in a cause with legal solemnity is to be granted when no lawful cause opposes it; otherwise, an appeal is lawfully made.

The same, to the Prior of Saint Victor.

Our venerable brother, the Bishop of Senlis, and the beloved sons I., Abbot of Saint Victor of Paris, and F., Dean of Orléans, signified to us through their letters that, when the cause conducted between the abbot and monks of Saint Denis on the one side and the abbess and nuns of Forchelles on the other, concerning both ownership and possession of the priory of Argenteuil, had been committed to them as judges by us, and when the nuns, first entering the suit concerning ownership, had produced witnesses in it, they afterward instituted the possessory judgment, the petitory being suspended, which, after counsel from prudent men, those judges declared by interlocutory sentence was lawful for them by right.

Hence, when, in the cause concerning possession which the nuns sought—namely for the reason that those whom they had succeeded had been violently ejected from it—witnesses had been produced by each party, and proceedings had reached the point that publication ought now to be made, the aforesaid nuns petitioned that the depositions of the witnesses be published only in the cause concerning possession. But the monks contradicted them, alleging that, just as the cause concerning ownership had first been begun, so it ought first to receive an end, or at least the witnesses concerning both the petitory and the possessory ought to be published together. But those judges, after hearing what was proposed on each side, when they wished to pronounce an interlocutory judgment concerning this after taking the counsel of wise men, the monks added that the nuns had renounced the production of witnesses concerning the cause of ownership. When the adverse party denied this and it was conducted between the parties as though doubtful, they pronounced interlocutorily that they would publish the attestations in the possessory and hear the monks' proofs concerning the nuns' renunciation; but the monks appealed from this interlocutory judgment to our hearing. The judges, appointing another day for the parties so that they might deliberate whether they ought to defer to an appeal of this kind, summoned prudent men and, by their counsel, without reproving their sentence, granted the monks' party a hearing if perhaps they might allege some reason for retracting the aforesaid ineffective sentence. They finally, after their appeals, strongly insisted upon the appeal previously made.

[*But because they could scarcely find assessors at Paris without their being said to be suspect—although the nuns' party finally said that they would in no way hold as suspect anyone whom the three judges together summoned—the judges nevertheless, considering the arduousness of the business, judged that these things should be intimated to us, enjoining upon the parties that on the feast of Saint Luke the Evangelist, then next to come, they should present themselves before us with letters of this kind. But when the aforesaid Abbot of Saint Victor and Dean of Orléans together affixed their seals to the letters containing this course of events, the said Bishop of Senlis deferred affixing his seal because the monks of Saint Denis complained that certain things which ought to have been included had been omitted. Hence, the parties having been recalled, they appointed the day after Saint Remigius. The monks steadfastly asserted that the nuns had had three productions of witnesses in the cause of ownership and conclusion had already been made in them, so that they were not going to be heard further in producing witnesses concerning the cause of ownership, and they offered lawful proofs concerning these things; but the adverse party denied all these things.

But when for this reason both the abbess on her own behalf and Master Thomas on behalf of the abbot and monks, around the octave of blessed Martin, which had been assigned as the term for the parties to present themselves before us, approached our presence, and when we had given them a full hearing in our consistory, the same master added that it had often been petitioned by the abbot and monks from the delegated judges that they grant them a fourth production in the cause of possession with legal solemnity. When the judges entirely denied it to them contrary to lawful sanctions, they, perceiving themselves to be unjustly aggrieved, appealed immediately to our hearing after the interlocutory judgment concerning publication of the witnesses in the possessory had been promulgated. They endeavored to show this from the testimony of certain special letters of the aforesaid Bishop of Senlis, who wrote, among many things, that in the addition which, upon recall of the parties, was made to the first letters, the monks petitioned that this clause be included: namely, that there still remained to them in the possessory judgment a fourth production, the solemnity of law having been employed, and they offered necessary proofs concerning this. The same master promised that he would prove his assertion by lawful witnesses. But the abbess, relying upon the report of the three delegates and upon certain of their letters containing that they had assigned the third day after the Purification of the Blessed Mary for publication of the witnesses produced by each party concerning possession, asserted that what had been added by the same master was entirely false.*]

We therefore, having diligently heard these and the other things proposed on this side and that, by the common counsel of our brothers, through apostolic writings command your discretion that, coming together at Paris, if it is established to you through lawful proofs that the abbot and monks sought a fourth production of witnesses in the possessory with the solemnity of law, and that for this reason they appealed within ten days after the interlocutory sentence—unless perhaps the judges denied the fourth production because they wished to restrain an unbridled multitude of witnesses—you shall admit the aforesaid abbot and monks to the fourth production of witnesses, legal solemnity having been employed, condemning them in lawful expenses if they fail in proof. And unless proceedings in the petitory have already advanced so far that ownership can be fully clear, you shall first determine the cause of possession, to which the abbess and nuns had recourse by benefit of law, and afterward proceed lawfully in the cause of ownership; otherwise, you shall determine both questions together. [But those, etc. Given on the Kalends of February, in the eighth year [of our pontificate]. 1206.]

The same, to the Bishop of Piacenza.

When the cause known to be conducted between our venerable brother, the Archbishop of Ravenna, and the beloved sons, the commune of Faenza, concerning the village of Luci and Saint Potitus, the castle of Aureolo, and their district, honor, and jurisdiction, had been [committed by us to various judges, because it could not be determined with a due end by certain of them, we, wishing to impose an end upon the suit, finally commanded our venerable brother, the Bishop of Montefeltro, and the beloved son, the Abbot of Galeata, through our letters that, notwithstanding the commissions hitherto obtained and every occasion and exception ceasing, they should assign the parties a period of three months within which they were to produce all the witnesses whom they should determine to produce concerning this cause; and, after diligently examining them and faithfully reducing the attestations to writing, if it proceeded from the will of the parties, they should determine the cause itself through the mediation of justice; otherwise, remitting the attestations with the instruments and other arguments to our presence, they should appoint a fitting term for the parties at which they should present themselves before us to receive sentence. Therefore, when the aforesaid delegates had by no means proceeded, etc. (Cf. c. 6, On the Oath against Calumny, II. 7.)]

But because it would be exceedingly burdensome for each party to produce witnesses before us, [by commanding] your fraternity, in whom we place full confidence, through apostolic writings, we order that within three months after receipt of the present letters you shall receive, appeal being removed, the witnesses whom each party should determine to produce both concerning the principal business and against the persons of the witnesses. Latin source headnote: Attestations received in a summary judgment do not create faith in a plenary judgment. And, notwithstanding their publication, the same or other witnesses can be received concerning the same articles.

The same, to the Abbots of New Fountain and La Chaise-Dieu.

Coming to the Apostolic See, the beloved son G. de Cros, Archdeacon of Clermont, humbly supplicated us that we cause the sentence reasonably rendered for him by our venerable brother, the Bishop of Limoges, concerning the deanery of the Church of Clermont, which had already in part been committed to execution, to be committed to execution in its entirety. But when the beloved sons, the abbot and G. Dalmas, [a canon] of Clermont, proctors of the beloved sons, the chapter of Clermont, being established in our presence, proposed to us that that sentence had been promulgated contrary to justice and after an appeal had been lawfully interposed to us, [and that therefore the same archdeacon was by no means to be heard in his petition, the same archdeacon proposed to the contrary that the said abbot and canon ought not to be received as proctors, since both they and those on whose behalf they had come were bound by the bond of excommunication. For the aforesaid bishop had bound with the bond of excommunication all those who determined to oppose the sentence rendered by him for the aforesaid archdeacon; and, when litigation concerning this had been conducted for some time, we finally caused the aforesaid proctors to be absolved as a precaution. But afterward, when the same abbot and canon wished to proceed against him, the archdeacon was unwilling even thus to admit them as proctors because they conducted themselves as proctors of those who were still bound by the bond of excommunication, and therefore could not proceed at law on their behalf,] and when the same archdeacon was unwilling to admit them as proctors or to answer their statements in any respect, the beloved son P., our subdeacon, a canon of the basilica of the Prince of the Apostles, opposed him on the other side, asserting that he had been canonically elected Dean of Clermont. For this reason, the said archdeacon was by no means to be heard in his petition, because the deanery itself pertained not to him but rather to P.

[To this the aforesaid archdeacon replied that, until the sentence rendered for him had been committed to full execution, the aforesaid P. ought not to be heard to impede execution of the sentence. To this the said P. answered that the sentence rendered for the archdeacon by the aforesaid bishop generated no prejudice against him, since according to lawful sanctions a matter conducted between others does not prejudice others.]

Therefore, when they had debated concerning these matters for some time, we pronounced interlocutorily that the said P., if he could, should establish his contention immediately. When he to establish his contention produced witnesses and instruments concerning this, and when debate had been conducted on each side concerning them for some time, we pronounced by interlocutory judgment, because it was established by the things which had been shown, that it concerned his interest, so that the same P. could oppose the aforesaid archdeacon.

Therefore, when issue had been lawfully joined between them concerning both the election and the sentence, the archdeacon himself was asked before us whether he wished to admit in this judgment the attestations previously produced concerning the aforesaid point. After prior deliberation, he answered that he wished this, provided that he could object both against the persons of the witnesses and against their statements. Upon hearing this, the adverse party answered that it was unwilling to use those attestations in this judgment, since they had been received, when issue had not been joined, not concerning the principal business but concerning an incidental point. Hence it wished to produce other witnesses concerning the whole business, or the same witnesses.

But the adverse party answered that, since those witnesses had spoken concerning both the sentence and the election, and their attestations had been published in judgment, it was not lawful for P., after he had learned the things testified, to produce other witnesses concerning the same articles, especially since the aforesaid subdeacon had used those attestations in this same judgment. We therefore, having heard what was proposed on this side and that, pronounced, as justice required, that witnesses whom each party should determine to produce were to be received concerning the whole business.

Wherefore, through apostolic writings, we command your discretion that, after the witnesses have been received and the arguments of the parties understood, you shall determine the cause itself with a canonical end concerning both the principal and the incidental matter, the obstacle of every contradiction and appeal being removed, causing [what you decree to be firmly observed.] But because the things done in a chapter can hardly be proved except through the canons themselves, we will and command that as a precaution you absolve them, so that, when called to testimony, they may be able freely to testify for each party. [The witnesses, etc. Given at the Lateran on the fourth day before the Ides of July, in the seventh year [of our pontificate]. 1204.]

undeservedly be asked. Although both those and these swore for another matter and for another reason, nevertheless, if in the second judgment the persons first sworn deposed those same things which they said in the first, without doubt their testimonies would prevail, nor could they be repelled under the pretext that the parties had learned the things testified, since such an exception has no place in this case. Chapter XLV

Latin source headnote: Those who impede a party in producing witnesses can be excommunicated, and witnesses are to be declared not bound by an oath not to tell the truth. And if relatives impede the plaintiff's witnesses from telling the truth, the defendant is punished, since this is presumed to be done by his will.

The same.

When our venerable brother [Alferius], Archbishop of Sorrento, and the beloved son M., canon of Sorrento, were established in our presence, while M., [after a libellus of accusation had been framed], denounced him for the crime of simony, [*asserting nevertheless that he was liable for the crime of injured majesty because, as he said, by the machination of the same archbishop the city of Sorrento withdrew from royal fidelity and swore to the reprobate Otto; and that the archbishop himself, while excommunicated, celebrated divine services, since after such a machination—through which persons who machinate things of this kind incur the sentence of excommunication rendered by the Apostolic See—he presumed to celebrate divine services, the archbishop, before he petitioned that the faculty of copying the libellus be granted to him, excepted against the person of the accuser that he was an enemy and conspirator, alleging that access to accusation should be interdicted to him, since according to canonical institutes enemies and conspirators ought to be admitted to the accusation of no one.

To this the adverse party answered that, since the stain of simoniacal depravity is so great that slaves are admitted against masters and any criminals whatever are admitted, and since, in betraying the crime of injured majesty, even an associate in the faction entered into is not only heard but indeed endowed with reward and honor, exceptions of this kind could not defeat the accusation concerning the aforesaid matters, especially since it concerns public liberty that crimes not remain unpunished. To these things, however, it was answered to the contrary that, since in the decree of Pope Anacletus it is expressly provided that persons who were enemies before yesterday or the day before yesterday cannot be accusers, lest in anger they desire to harm or, having been injured, to avenge themselves, and since an unoffending and not a suspect disposition of accusers is sought, and the constitution of Pope Callistus generally forbids conspirators to be admitted to anyone's accusation, while it is not expressed in any canon that an enemy and conspirator is heard in excepted crimes, lest what has not been established by the teaching of the holy Fathers be attempted through superstitious inventions, the general prohibition is to be upheld concerning the aforesaid matters, especially according to canonical equity, which ought not to open a way to acts of malice.

Amid these things, when the archbishop was questioned concerning the causes of enmity and conspiracy, he answered that the aforesaid M. had opposed himself to the bishop as a manifest adversary both when he was assumed as archdeacon and when he was assumed as archbishop. Furthermore, when a certain Neapolitan had machinated the death of the archbishop's brother and was ejected from his own city by the latter's friends, certain magnates whom the said Neapolitan touched by a line of consanguinity, regarding his ejection as an injury, induced the same Matthew to conspire with certain others for the condemnation of the archbishop himself. We did not consider that the former ground should be admitted, especially since reconciliation had followed, as was noted from the narration of the archbishop himself. But concerning the other, which M. denied, it was proposed on his behalf that every conspiracy by subjects against a prelate is not prohibited. For, since according to the decree of Pope Gelasius no cleric ought to trust that he is immune from apostolic offense if he sees a bishop transgressing in those things which apostolic authority has declared are to be followed salubriously and does not immediately take care to bring this to the ears of the Roman Pontiff, subjects can not undeservedly conspire against a pestilential prelate, after the example of the forty bishops of Illyricum and Greece who, coming together through a profession made in writing, withdrew from Timothy, who through fear of the Emperor Anastasius had been assumed as Bishop of Constantinople.

But when the archbishop asserted that Matthew conspired against him from the foment of malice and that he would lawfully prove this, finally, with the parties consenting, we considered that provision should be made as follows: that the archbishop, receiving the libellus presented, should answer concerning the crimes objected, the faculty of proving that the same M. had conspired against him from malice being reserved to him. The framing of the libellus was as follows:

"In the name of the Lord, Amen. In the year of the Lord one thousand two hundred and thirteen, in the sixteenth year of the pontificate of the lord Innocent III, Supreme Pontiff, in the month of October, on the seventh day before its Ides. Before you, lord Innocent, by the grace of God Supreme Pontiff, I, Matthew, canon of Sorrento, denounce the lord Alferius, Archbishop of Sorrento, as guilty under canonical law of simony, because I say that in the city of Sorrento, in the chamber beside the dining room of the episcopal residence, in the time of the lord Celestine III, Supreme Pontiff, in the month of January, he promised the Archdeaconry of Sorrento to John Ciroleon, formerly canon of Sorrento, so that he would consent to his election. Likewise, I denounce him as guilty of the crime of injured majesty because, in the city of Sorrento, in his palace, in the month of May, in the time of the lord Innocent III, Supreme Pontiff, through his procurement the city of Sorrento, withdrawing from royal fidelity, swore to Otto. And I denounce that afterward he celebrated divine services many times in the Church of Sorrento, although I believe that on this account he incurred the bond of excommunication through your sentence. I, the said M., profess that I have given this libellus of inscription."

When the libellus was finally offered, the archbishop's party alleged that in a certain part it had been framed less than lawfully because it did not contain the year in which the objected crimes had been committed. For since the framing of a libellus ought to contain the month and consuls under whom the crime is said to have been committed, and consuls were appointed annually in antiquity, it appears that the year of the admitted crime ought to be expressed in the libellus. The month would also be ordered to be included in vain if there were no certainty concerning the year to which the month belongs.

To this the accuser's party answered that, since the year is not found expressed in the form of framing a libellus, just as the day is not to be included, so neither is the year of the admitted crime to be included, lest an occasion for suborning witnesses be furnished. Nor, from the fact that consuls ought to be expressed in the civil forum, although consuls were formerly annual, does it follow that a certain year is to be expressed, since the same consul could have held the office of consul at different times and in several years; hence a certain year could not be established by expression of his name. And since in the naming of the month it is not established to which year the month belongs, an occasion for suborning witnesses could not be taken through expression of the month as it could through expression of the year.

But after these and other things had been proposed on this side and that, when finally the accuser expressed that the archbishop committed the objected crime of simony in the year in which he obtained the archbishopric, by promising the Archdeaconry of the Church of Sorrento to I. Ciroleon, formerly canon of Sorrento, if he would consent to him; and since the time when the aforesaid city swore to Otto was sufficiently manifestly established, proceedings advanced to joinder of issue, the archbishop denying the crimes alleged against him. He confessed, nevertheless, that after the city swore to Otto, he celebrated many times.

But after certain witnesses had been produced on behalf of the archbishop to prove the exception objected, with a protestation of this kind by M.—namely, that after publication of their depositions he might, if he wished, object against their persons, because the archbishop was unwilling to be content with them—without publishing their depositions, with the consent of the parties we considered that the reception of witnesses concerning both the principal matter and the aforesaid exception should be committed to your fraternity. Through apostolic writings we command you that you shall diligently examine the witnesses whom each party should determine to produce and shall faithfully transmit their written statements to us enclosed under your seal, appointing for the parties a fitting term at which they shall present themselves before us.*]

Moreover, because from the beginning the aforesaid M. protested that the nobleman Simon of Sorrento, the full brother of the aforesaid archbishop, and certain other relatives of the archbishop himself had through their power furnished many impediments whereby he could not have with him an abundance of proofs in our presence—since they induced certain persons to swear that they would say nothing against the archbishop and endeavor by threats and terrors to keep others from giving testimony—we, wishing by our office to provide concerning this, command that you shall render a general sentence of excommunication against all who presume to furnish any impediment to M. himself in producing witnesses. But you shall announce that those who, as has been said, are established to have sworn that they would say nothing against the archbishop are not bound by an oath of this kind, [whereby they may freely give testimony to the truth in this cause.]

But if any of the said archbishop's relatives presumes to impede any of the witnesses, because it does not appear likely that such things would be done against his will, and for this reason he is not free from the scruple of concealed complicity, because, if he had wished, he could have prohibited it—since according to lawful sanctions persons who withdraw the opportunity of defense from an adversary show that they favor an iniquitous cause and ought to experience the authority of the judge as mocked—you shall suspend the same archbishop from pontifical office and cause him, the obstacle of appeal being removed, to remain suspended until he causes that person to cease from such presumption. [You, finally, etc. Given at the Lateran on the eighth day before the Ides of November, in the sixteenth year of our pontificate. 1213.]

> Constitutis in praesentia nostra venerabili fratre nostro [Alferio] archiepiscopo et dilecto filio M. canonico Surrentianis, dum ipse [accusationis concepto libello] illum de simoniae crimine deferret +[asserens nihilominus eum crimini laesae maiestatis obnoxium eo, quod, ut dicebat, eodem archiepiscopo machinante Surrentina civitas a regia fidelilate recessit, et reprobo iuravit Othoni, ac ipsum archiepiscopum excommunicatum celebrasse divina, quum post talem machinationem, per quam machinatores huiusmodi latam a sede apostolica excommunicationis sententiam incurrerunt, divina praesumpserit celebrare, archiepiscopus, antequam describendi libellum fieri sibi copiam postularet, in personam accusatoris, quod esset inimicus et conspirator, excepit, allegans interdicendum ei aditum accusandi, quum secundum instituta canonica inimici et conspiratores in nullius debeant accusationem admitti. Ad quod pars adversa respondit, quod, quum, tanta sit labes simoniacae pravitatis, ut servi adversus dominos et criminosi quilibet admittantur, et in prodendo crimine laesae maiestatis socius etiam initae factionis non solum auditur, quin immo praemio et honore donatur, super praemissis exceptiones huiusmodi accusationem elidere non valebant, praesertim quum publicae libertatis intersit, ne crimina remaneant impunita. Fuit autem ad haec ex adverso responsum, quod, quum in decreto Anacleti Papae caveatur expresse, accusatores esse non posse qui ante hesternum diem aut nudiustertius inimici fuerunt, ne irati nocere cupiant vel laesi ulcisci, et inoffensus accusatorum quaeratur affectus et non suspectus, ac constitutio Callisti Papae generaliter interdicat conspiratores in alicuius accusationem admitti, nec in aliquo canone sit expressum, quod inimicus ac conspirator in exceptis criminibus audiatur, ne quod sanctorum Patrum documento sancitum non est superstitiosis adinventionibus attentetur, circa promissa prohibitioni standum est generali, praesertim secundum aequitatem canonicam, quae viam non debet malignitatibus aperire. Inter haec autem de causis inimicitiarum et conspirationis archiepiscopus interrogatus respondit, quod memoratus M. ipsi episcopo, et quum in archidiaconum, et quum in archiepiscopum fuit assumptus, se opposuit adversarium manifestum. Praeterea quum quidam Neapolitanus fuisset in mortem fratris archiepiscopi machinatus, et per amicos ipsius eiiceretur de propria civitate, quidam magnates, quos dictus Neapolitanus consanguinitatis linea contingebat, eiectionem illius ad iniuriam reputantes, eundem induxere Matthaeum, ut cum quibusdam aliis in damnationem ipsius archiepiscopi coniuraret. Porro priorem causam non duximus admittendam, maxime quum reconciliatio fuerit subsecuta, prout ex narratione ipsius archiepiscopi notabatur. Super alia vero, quam inficiabatur M., fuit pro ipsius parte propositum, quod non est interdicta subiectis omnis coniuratio in praelatum, quia, quum secundum decretum Gelasii Papae quisquam clericorum confidere non debeat offensae apostolicae se immunem, si in iis, quae sequenda salubriter apostolica deprompsit auctoritas, episcopum viderit excedentem, et non protinus ad aures Romani Pontificis deferre curaverit, in pestilentem praelatum non immerito possunt coniurare subiecti, exemplo quadraginta episcoporum Illyrici ac Graeciae, qui per professionem in scriptis factam convenientes in unum, a Timotheo, qui per metum imperatoris Anastasii fuerat in Constantinopolitanum assumptus episcopum; discesserunt. Verum asserente archiepiscopo ex fomite malignitatis in eum coniurasse Matthaeum et hoc se legitime probaturum, ad ultimum consentientibus partibus sic duximus providendum, ut archiepiscopus, porrectum libellum accipiens, super obiectis criminibus responderet, reservata sibi facultate probandi, quod idem M. ex malignitate coniuravit in ipsum. Libelli vero conceptio talis erat: «In nomine Domini Amen. Anno Domini millesimo CCXIII. pontificatus domini Innocentii III. summi Pontificis anno sextodecimo, mense Octobris, septimo Idus eiusdem. Apud vos, domine Innocenti, Dei gratia summe Pontifex, ego Matthaeus canonicus Surrentinus defero dominum Alferium Surrentinum archiepiscopum lege canonica reum de simonia, quia dico ipsum promisisse archidiaconatum Surrentinum Ioanni Ciroleon olim canonico Surrentino, ut consentiret electioni suae in civitate Surrenti, in camera, iuxta triclinium episcopii, tempore domini Coelestini tertii summi Pontificis, mense Ianuarii. Item defero eum reum de crimine laesae maiestatis, quia civitas Surrentina recedendo a fidelitate regia iuravit Othoni, ipso hoc procurante, tempore domini Innocentii tertii summi Pontificis in civitate Surrenti, in palatio suo, mense Maii. Et defero eum postmodum multotiens celebrasse divina in ecclesia Surrentina, quum per sententiam vestram credam eum ob hoc excommunicationis vinculum incurrisse. Ego dictus M. profiteor me hunc libellum inscriptionis dedisse.» Oblato tandem libello pars archiepiscopi allegavit, quod erat minus legitime in quadam sui parte conceptus eo, quod non continebatur in ipso, quo anno fuerint crimina obiecta commissa. Quum enim libelli conceptio continere debeat mensem et consules, sub quibus crimen dicitur fuisse commissum, et antiquitus consules constituerentur annales, videtur quod admissi criminis annus exprimi debeat in libello. Frustra etiam mensis iuberetur apponi, si anni, cuius est mensis, non habetur aliqua certitudo. Ad quod pars accusatoris respondit, quod, quum in forma concipiendi libellum de anno non inveniatur expressum, sicut nec dies, ita nec annus admissi criminis debet apponi, ne subornationi testium occasio praebeatur. Nec propter hoc, quod in foro civili debent exprimi consules, licet consules essent antiquitus annui, sequitur, quod certus annus sit exprimendus, quum idem consul diversis vicibus et pluribus annis gerere potuisset officium consulatus; unde per expressionem nominis eius de certo anno constare non posset. Et quum in denominatione mensis non constet, cuius anni mensis exsistat, non ita per expressionem mensis, sicut et anni, ad subornandum testes occasio posset assumi. His autem et aliis hinc inde propositis, quum ad ultimum accusator expresserit archiepiscopum eo anno commisisse simoniae crimen obiectum, quo fuit archiepiscopatum adeptus, promittendo archidiaconatum ecclesiae Surrentinae I. Ciroleon quondam canonico Surrentino, si consentiret in ipsum, ac de tempore, quo praedicta civitas iuravit Othoni, satis manifeste constaret, ad contestationem litis, inficiante archiepiscopo crimina sibi opposita, est processum. Confessus est tamen, quod, postquam civitas iuravit Othoni, multotiens celebravit. Pruductis autem ex parte archiepiscopi quibusdam testibus ad probandam exceptionem obiectam cum huiusmodi protestatione M., scilicet quod post publicationem depositionum illorum, si vellet, posset obiicere in personas, quia illis archiepiscopus contentus esse nolebat, depositiones ipsorum minime publicantes, receptionem testium tam super principali quam super exceptione praedicta de consensu partium fraternitati tuae duximus committendam, per apostolica tibi scripta mandantes, quatenus testes, quos utraque pars duxerit producendos, diligenter examines, et eorum dicta conscripta fideliter ad nos sub tuo conclusa sigillo transmittas, praefigens partibus terminum competentem, quo nostro se conspectui repraesentent.] Ceterum quoniam a principio protestatus est praefatus M., nobilem virum Simonem Surrentinum germanum archiepiscopi memorati, et quosdam alios ipsius archiepiscopi consanguineos multa impedimenta per suam potentiam praestitisse, quo minus probationum copiam in nostra praesentia secum haberet, quum quosdam induxerint ad iurandum, ne adversus archiepiscopum aliquid dicerent, et alios minis et terroribus a testimonio perhibendo arcere nitantur, nos ex officio nostro super hoc providere volentes, mandamus, ut generalem feras excommunicationis sententiam in omnes, qui impedimentum aliquod ipsi M. praestare praesumpserint in testibus producendis. Illos autem, quos, ut dictum est, iurasse constiterit, quod contra archiepiscopum nihil dicerent, denuncies iuramento huiusmodi non teneri, [quo minus valeant in hac causa perhibere testimonium veritati.] Si quis autem de consanguineis dicti archiepiscopi aliquem de testibus praesumpserit impedire, quia verisimile non videtur, ut eo invito talia fierent, et ob hoc non caret scrupulo societatis occultae eo, quod, si voluerit, potuerit prohibere, quum secundum legitimas sanctiones iniquam ostendant se causam fovere, et experiri debeat iudicis auctoritatem elusam, qui defensionis copiam subtrahit adversario, eundem archiepiscopum ab officio pontificali suspendas, et facias sublato appellationis obstaculo manere suspensum, donec illum fecerit a tali praesumptione cessare. Chapter XLVI

Latin source headnote: One who has not learned the things testified and has not renounced the production of witnesses can produce, concerning old articles or chapters, even witnesses produced elsewhere.

The same, to the Archbishop of Magdeburg and the Provost of Seeburg.

When the proctor of the beloved daughter in Christ A., sister of the nobleman, the Margrave of Meissen, and the messenger of the illustrious Prince of Bohemia were established in our presence, we granted as auditor our beloved son P., cardinal priest of Saint Marcellus. Before him the proctor of the aforesaid noblewoman proposed that, when it had formerly reached our hearing upon her report that the aforesaid prince had lawfully taken her as his wife, had treated her as a lawful spouse for fourteen years and more, and had received sons and daughters from her, the Bishop of Prague, at the petition and command of the same prince, promulgated a sentence of separation after an appeal had been interposed to us, while she wished to approach him in order to propose her actions before him but was prohibited by the attendants of the same prince, who twice or three times prohibited her entrance; from that sentence she through her chaplain, within ten days, caused an appeal to be made to our presence. (And below:)

We therefore, having understood through the aforesaid cardinal what was proposed on this side and that, considered that the attestations received for the aforesaid noblewoman should neither be approved nor disapproved, but decreed that they be reserved for the time of discussion, so that the parties might then allege for or against them; by more strictly commanding you through apostolic writings, we order that, after the parties have been summoned to a suitable place, every excuse and contradiction ceasing, you shall receive the witnesses whom either the noblewoman herself on her own behalf or the prince on his behalf should determine to produce concerning the proceeding of the Bishop of Prague or of the later judges, since they have not yet learned the things testified. Nor shall the noblewoman herself be prohibited from introducing on her own behalf either the witnesses whom she previously introduced or others, if she wishes, since she did not renounce the production of witnesses. [And the acts, etc.]

Qui testificata non didicit, nec renunciavit testibus producendis, super antiquis articulis seu capitulis testes etiam alias productos producere potest.

Idem Magdeburgensi Archiepiscopo et Praeposito Seburgensi.

Constitutis in praesentia nostra procuratore dilectae filiae in Christo A. sororis nobilis viri marchionis Misnensis et nuncio illustris principis Bohemorum, +dilectum filium nostrum P. Sancti Marcelli presbyterum cardinalem concessimus auditorem, coram quo proposuit procurator nobilis memoratae, quod, quum olim ea significante ad nostram audientiam pervenisset, quod praedictus princeps eam duxisset legitime in uxorem, et XIV. annis et amplius velut coniugem legitime pertractasset, et filiis et filiabus susceptis ex ea, Pragensis episcopus ad petitionem et mandatum eiusdem principis, ipsa volente ad ipsum accedere, ut suas coram eo proponeret actiones, sed a satellitibus eiusdem principis prohibita, qui ei bis vel ter prohibuerunt ingressum, post appellationem ad nos interpositam divortii sententiam promulgavit, a qua ipsa per suum capellanum intra decem dies fecit ad nostram praesentiam provocari. (Et infra:) Nos igitur, intellectis per cardinalem praedictum quae fuere hinc inde proposita, attestationes pro nobili memorata receptas nec approbandas duximus, nec etiam improbandas, sed eas tempore discussionis decrevimus reservari, ut tunc pro illis vel contra illas a partibus allegetur, per apostolica scripta districtius vobis praecipiendo Mandamus, quatenus, partibus ad locum idoneum convocatis, omni excusatione et contradictione cessante recipiatis testes, quos vel nobilis ipsa pro se, vel princeps pro parte sua, quum nondum testificata didicerint, super processu Pragensis episcopi vel posteriorum iudicum duxerint producendos, et nobilis ipsa pro se vel testes, quos prius induxit, vel alios, si voluerit, inducere non vetetur, quum non renunciaverit testibus producendis. [et gesta etc.]

Chapter XLVII

Latin source headnote: The council lays down twelve requirements, without which testimony from hearsay is not valid for proving consanguinity in a matrimonial cause. This it says, summing generally.

The same, in the general council.

Although, from a certain necessity, it was formerly established, beyond the common form, that testimony from hearsay should be valid in calculating the degrees of consanguinity and affinity, since, because of the brevity of human life, witnesses were unable to depose from sight when calculating as far as the seventh degree; nevertheless, because we have learned by many examples and sure experiences that from this many dangers have arisen against lawful marriages, we establish that henceforth witnesses from hearsay shall not be received concerning this, since now the prohibition does not extend beyond the fourth degree, unless perhaps they are persons of weight to whom faith may deservedly be given, and, before litigation was initiated, they learned the matters testified from their elders—not, indeed, from one, since he would not suffice if he were living, but from two at least; and not from infamous and suspect persons, but from persons worthy of faith and superior to every exception, since it would appear sufficiently absurd that those should be admitted whose authorities would be repelled. Nor yet, if one person has received from several persons, or infamous persons from persons of good reputation, what they testify, ought they to be admitted as several suitable witnesses, since even according to the accustomed order of judgments the assertion of one witness does not suffice, even if he shines with the dignity of a governor, and lawful acts are forbidden to infamous persons. Moreover, witnesses of this kind, confirming by their own oath that they do not proceed to give testimony in the cause itself from hatred, love, fear, or advantage, shall designate the persons by their express names, or by a demonstration or sufficient circumlocution, and shall distinguish the individual degrees on either side by a clear computation, and shall likewise conclude in their oath that they received from their elders what they depose and believe it to be so. But not even such persons shall suffice unless, under oath, they depose that they saw persons situated at least in one of the aforesaid degrees hold themselves to be blood relatives. For it is more tolerable to leave some persons joined contrary to human statutes than to separate persons lawfully joined contrary to the statutes of the Lord.

Ponit concilium duodecim, sine quibus ad probandam consanguinitatem in causa matrimoniali, non valet testimonium de auditu. H. d. summando generaliter.

Idem in concilio generali.

Licet ex quadam necessitate praeter communem formam olim fuerit institutum, in consanguinitatis et affinitatis gradibus computandis valere testimonium de auditu, quum propter brevem hominum vitam testes de visu deponere non valerent usque ad gradum septimum computando; quia tamen pluribus exemplis et certis experimentis didicimus, ex hoc multa pericula contra legitima provenisse coniugia, statuimus, ne super hoc recipiantur de cetero testes de auditu, quum iam quartum gradum prohibitio non excedat, nisi forte personae graves exstiterint, quibus fides sit merito adhibenda, et ante litem motam testificata didicerint ab antiquioribus quidem suis, non utique ab uno, quum non sufficeret ille, si viveret, sed duobus ad minus; nec ab infamibus et suspectis, sed a fide dignis et omni exceptione maioribus; quum satis videretur absurdum illos admitti, quorum repellerentur auctores. Nec tamen, si unus a pluribus, vel infames ab hominibus bonae famae acceperint quod testantur, tanquam plures et idonei testes debent admitti, quum etiam secundum ordinem solitum iudiciorum non sufficiat unius testis assertio, etiamsi praesidiali refulgeat dignitate, et actus legitimi sint infamibus interdicti. Testes autem huiusmodi proprio iuramento firmantes, quod ad ferendum testimonium in causa ipsa odio, vel amore, vel timore vel commodo non procedant, personas expressis nominibus, vel demonstratione vel circumlocutione sufficienti designent, et ab utroque latere singulos gradus clara computatione distinguant, et in suo nihilominus iuramento concludant, se accepisse a suis maioribus quod deponunt, et credere ita esse. Sed nec tales sufficiant, nisi iurati deponant, se vidisse personas vel saltem in uno praedictorum graduum constitutas pro consanguineis se habere. Tolerabilius est enim, aliquos contra statuta hominum dimittere copulatos, quam coniunctos legitime contra statuta Domini separare.

Chapter XLVIII

Latin source headnote: After publication, at the petition of the producing party, witnesses ought not to be interrogated unless, through the fraud or negligence of the examiners, they were not interrogated upon all the chapters.

Honorius III, to the Provost of Mogliano in the Diocese of Fermo.

You have intimated to us by your letters that, when the cause that is being conducted concerning certain lands between the canons of Old Saint Peter on one side and G. of Saint Simon of Guido of Fermo on the other had been committed to you by the Apostolic See, the said G., after three months had elapsed following the publication of the witnesses, petitions that his witnesses be interrogated again, concerning which you desire to be instructed by an apostolic response as to what you ought to do. We therefore briefly respond to your discretion that he is not henceforth to be heard concerning this, unless perhaps from the beginning he had petitioned that they be interrogated concerning certain chapters and this had been omitted maliciously or negligently.

Post publicationem ad petitionem producentis interrogari non debent testes, nisi quando dolo vel negligentia examinatorum super omnibus capitulis interrogati non fuerunt.

Honorius III. Praeposito Molisii Firmanae dioecesis.

Per tuas nobis literas intimasti, quod, quum causa, quae super quibusdam terris vertitur inter canonicos sancti Petri veteris ex una parte, et G. sancti Simonis Guidonis Firmani ex altera, tibi fuisset ab apostolica sede commissa, dictus G., tribus mensibus post testium publicationem elapsis, testes suos interrogari postulat iterato, super quo quid agere debeas, apostolico responso desideras edoceri. Nos igitur discretioni tuae breviter respondemus illum non esse super hoc de cetero audiendum, nisi forsan a principio illos interrogari super certis capitulis postulasset, idque malitiose vel negligenter fuerit praetermissum.

Chapter XLIX

Latin source headnote: It is permitted to disqualify witnesses of proof and witnesses disqualifying those of proof; but it is not permitted to disqualify witnesses disqualifying those disqualifying witnesses.

The same, to the Abbots of Valladolid and Sacramenia in the Dioceses of Palencia and Segovia.

Although our beloved son L., cardinal priest of the title of the Holy Cross, whom we appointed as auditor for the proctors of our venerable brother the Bishop of Burgos and of the clerics of Saint Mary of Castro Soret, diligently heard the matters that the proctors themselves wished to propose, nevertheless, because the proctor of the said bishop proposed that he still wished to speak against the persons of the witnesses produced in the principal cause, likewise protesting that, for certain reasons, the attestations of the other party, which are said to have been received while the see of Burgos was vacant, were of no moment, since the question itself could not be terminated by you, although the other party urgently sought a sentence. Therefore, remitting it to you with the consent of the parties, we command your discretion to receive the witnesses whom the parties should determine to produce against the persons of those produced concerning the principal matter. If the other party or both parties should wish in turn to disqualify them, you shall take care to admit proofs against them in such a way that thereafter the parties shall not be permitted to aspire to the disqualification of witnesses, lest, if permission be granted to the parties to produce fourth witnesses against the third, and so forth, it should happen that the matter, already long protracted, be protracted still longer.

Illam igitur ad vos de consensu partium remittentes, discretioni vestrae* Mandamus, quatenus recipiatis testes, quos contra personas productorum super principali negotio partes duxerint producendos. Quos si rursus pars altera vel utraque voluerit reprobare, contra illos probationes admittere procuretis ita quod ultra non liceat partibus ad reprobationem testium adspirare, ne, si producendi quartos contra tertios et sic deinceps partibus licentia tribuatur, negotium protelatum iam diu diutius protelari contingat.

Chapter L

Latin source headnote: Attestations received by an arbiter create faith in a judgment if the witnesses are dead; if they are alive, it is at the option of the person against whom the witnesses were produced whether he wishes to receive the attestations or to have the witnesses depose anew. And add: even if the attestations have been published. And this last point is not in the final law of the Code, under the same title, where the case of this decretal is set forth.

The same, to the Provost and Masters G. and R., Canons of Laon.

The petition presented to us by Garaud, Archdeacon of Soissons, contained that, when a question was being conducted between R., his late predecessor, on one side, and the chapter of Saint Peter of Soissons on the other, concerning the jurisdiction that the same archdeacon proposed that he had in the said church by reason of the archdeaconry, at length by the counsel of good men they elected Bernard, Chancellor of Paris, and Masters R. of Reims and P. the Breton, canons, as arbiters concerning this. When, after assuming the arbitration, they had proceeded so far in the aforesaid matter that, the witnesses having been produced and their depositions published, the allegations of both parties having been received, and all the acts having been reduced to writing and marked by the impression of their seals, they ought to pronounce the award, while they were deferring it at the pleasure of their own will, one of them entered upon the way of all flesh, and another was appointed Archbishop of Embrun, who is distant from them by twelve days' journeys and more. Hence, since the arbitration appears to have expired because the aforesaid R. alone was wholly unable to arbitrate, he humbly supplicated us that we should deign to write to discreet men who ought to proceed to the decision of the cause according to the aforesaid acts. Therefore we command your discretion that, if it is so, you shall terminate the cause itself with its due end according to acts of this kind, the obstacle of appeal removed; nevertheless reserving to the same chapter according to the laws the option either to receive the depositions of those of the witnesses produced against them who survive, or, rejecting them, to consent that the same witnesses be admitted again, yet saving the right that in either case belongs to the same chapter, both against the persons of the witnesses and against their statements.

Latin source headnote: Faith is not given to a witness, even a religious, who deposes without an oath.

The same, to the Bishop of Penne.

Recently it became known to us upon the supplication of the priest A. that, since he had entered the Order of Friars Minor for the purpose of trial and thereafter, no profession having been made, had left within a year, we should deign mercifully to provide concerning this; we commanded you that, if the matter stood thus, you should declare that he was not bound to regular observance. Therefore, when the said priest and Brother John, custos of the Friars Minor in your parts, together with certain others, were established in your presence on this account, the said custos, in order to prove that the same priest had made profession, introduced certain witnesses of his order, who deposed concerning this, without being sworn, while the said priest contradicted. Hence the aforesaid priest asserted that their testimony was null, while the aforesaid custos replied that according to the rule of his order they could not and ought not to swear, but that in matters of this kind one was to stand by their simple words; wherefore you humbly supplicated us that through our letters we should render you certain of what ought to be done. We therefore briefly respond to your fraternity that the testimony of no one, however religious he may be, ought to be believed to the prejudice of another unless he has deposed under oath. Chapter LII

Latin source headnote: Witnesses are to be examined diligently and separately. Supply: even if the matter concerns the life and miracles of someone to be canonized. Abbas.

The same, to the Bishops of Quimper and Tréguier.

When our venerable brother the Bishop and our beloved sons the chapter of Quimper, and all the abbots assembled at Cîteaux in general chapter, and many other bishops and religious, together with the abbot and convent of the Monastery of Saint Maurice of the Cistercian Order in the Diocese of Quimper, formerly intimated to us that, by divine gift, Maurice, of pious memory, abbot of the aforesaid monastery, was resplendent with illustrious miracles, so much so that the monastery itself, by a certain usurpation of usage, or rather by a certain anticipation of what was to come, has taken its designation from his name, and humbly supplicated that we should cause him to be numbered in the catalogue of the saints, so that what the people now usurp by devout presumption, as we have said, or even anticipate by divine prompting—calling him a saint and venerating him without the authority of the Apostolic See—they may at length do duly by apostolic command, to the glory of Christ and of the Christian name, we, assenting to their devout prayers insofar as was fitting, commanded through our letters our venerable brother the Bishop of Saint-Pol-de-Léon and our beloved son the Abbot of Saint Leo in the Diocese of Quimper that they should most diligently inquire into the truth concerning the life and miracles of the aforesaid man and faithfully intimate it to us, so that, when it had been fully ascertained, we might more fully be able to assent to the pious desire of the supplicants. The same bishop and abbot transmitted to us a certain document secured by the appending of their own seals, in which indeed many and great miracles are contained, performed, as is said, by the Lord through the merits of the said man; although they are found to have been proved through witnesses sworn and named in the document itself, nevertheless it does not appear from the often-mentioned document that they examined the witnesses themselves separately, or that they interrogated them concerning those things about which they testified and the circumstances thereof with that diligence which is customarily and ought to be employed in the reception of witnesses. Hence, although human devotion ought with ready affection to honor those whom the condescension of divine goodness honors, nevertheless we have judged it safer to defer this matter than to pronounce a sentence in it with insufficient consideration. Yet, unwilling to fail the gift of heavenly grace, but wishing to assist it, we command your discretion that you shall take care to examine separately, with that diligence which is customarily and ought to be employed in the reception of witnesses, the witnesses whom the abbot and monks of Saint Martin of the Cistercian Order shall determine to produce concerning the life and miracles of M., of pious memory, abbot of the aforesaid monastery. [Given on the Kalends of September, 1225.]

Chapter LIII

Latin source headnote: A witness who has deposed obscurely is to be examined again. You supply: by the office of the judge.

Gregory IX.

When a strong outcry had ascended against the Bishop of Acerenza concerning simony and other crimes, we commanded the Bishops of Melfi and Ruvo that they should inquire diligently into the truth concerning them. (And below:) But because, after the attestations were opened, L. and G. deposed concerning simony so confusedly that the truth cannot be made clear from their statements, we command that you shall diligently examine them again, and faithfully report to us under your seals the matters testified by them and by the others whom you shall receive.

(Et infra:) Verum quia apertis attestationibus L. et G. super simonia ita deposuere confuse, quod ex dictis eorum non potest veritas declarari: mandamus, quatenus examinetis eos iterum diligenter, et tam eorum quam aliorum, quos receperitis, testificata, sub sigillis vestris nobis fideliter referatis.

Chapter LIV

Latin source headnote: One persisting in a crime is repelled from testimony even in a civil cause; but one reformed, if not infamous, is admitted in a civil cause, and even in a criminal cause pursued civilly. It is otherwise in the case of a perjurer, who is repelled in a criminal cause.

The same.

The testimony of one against whom a crime is objected by the adverse party is deservedly disqualified in a criminal cause, or in a civil cause if he persists in the crime itself. But if he is both reformed from the crime and is not accompanied by infamy, he is not to be repelled in a civil cause, or even when a crime is pursued civilly, except on account of the guilt of perjury. In a criminal cause, however, if, upon an accusation instituted against him in another judgment, he has been convicted of or confessed the crime, or if he is now convicted of it by way of exception, or if his reputation has been burdened because at some time he was repelled in such a manner, although in this case he would not be excluded in a civil cause, he can be removed from testimony even if he has done penance.

> Perseverans in crimine, etiam in civili repellitur a testimonio; emendatus vero, non infamis, admittitur in civili, et etiam criminali mota civiliter. Fallit in periuro, qui in criminali repellitur.
>
> Idem.
>
> Testimonium eius, cui ab adversa parte opponitur crimen, merito reprobatur in criminali causa, sive civili, si in ipso crimine perseveret. Si vero sit et crimine emendatus, et eum non comitetur infamia, non est in causa civili, vel etiam quum de crimine civiliter agitur, praeterquam pro reatu periurii, repellendus. In criminali autem, si in alio iudicio instituta accusatione contra ipsum, de crimine convictus exstitit vel confessus, vel si nunc per exceptionem exinde convincatur, aut gravata sit eius opinio, pro eo, quod quandoque fuit tali modo repulsus, quamvis in hoc casu non excluderetur in causa civili, potest a testimonio, licet egerit poenitentiam, removeri.

Chapter LV

Latin source headnote: A fourth production is not to be granted without the legal solemnity described here.

The same.

After a third production, witnesses ought not to be produced further in a cause unless an oath has been furnished by the person who petitions this, that neither by himself nor through another has he withdrawn matters testified or made inquiry into them, nor does he seek a fourth production through any fraud or artifice, but because he was previously unable to have those whom he desires to produce anew.

> Quarta productio non est danda sine solennitate legali, de qua hic.
>
> Idem.
>
> Ultra tertiam productionem non debent testes ulterius produci in causa, nisi praestito ab eo, qui hoc postulat, iuramento, quod neque per se, neque per alium testificata subtraxerit, vel fuerit percunctatus, nec per dolum aut artem aliquam quartam productionem exposcat; sed quia quos desiderat de novo producere prius habere nequivit.

Chapter LVI

Latin source headnote: A person criminally accused is not admitted as a witness against another in a criminal cause while his own accusation is pending, except in excepted crimes.

The same.

No one ought to be admitted to give testimony in criminal matters, except perhaps in excepted crimes, while an accusation of crime against him is pending, since accused persons also are repelled from accusation and from the reception of orders unless they first prove themselves innocent.

> Accusatus criminaliter non admittitur in testem contra alium in causa criminali sua accusatione pendente, nisi in exceptis criminibus.
>
> Idem.
>
> Non debet quis in criminibus, nisi forsan in exceptis, ad testificandum admitti pendente accusatione de crimine contra ipsum, quum etiam accusati, nisi prius se probaverint innocentes, ab accusatione ac susceptione ordinum repellantur.

Title XXI: On Witnesses Being Compelled or Not

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: In a civil cause witnesses are to be admonished and induced to testify, and, if they withdraw themselves because of hatred, favor, etc., they are to be compelled.

Alexander III, to the Bishop-elect of Pavia.

We have committed for termination by judges the matrimonial cause that is being conducted between the woman M. and the son of R. Cane, which was brought by appeal from your examination to our hearing. Therefore, by commanding through apostolic writings, we order your fraternity that you shall diligently admonish and induce the witnesses invoked by either of the parties in testimony of its assertion, lest they conceal the truth. But if you see that they withdraw themselves because of hatred, favor, or fear, lest the truth be concealed, you shall compel them by ecclesiastical coercion to give testimony before the aforesaid judges, or before their messenger whom they shall send for this purpose.

> De testibus cogendis vel non.
>
> In causa civili monendi et inducendi testes sunt ad testificandum, et, si se subtrahant odio, gratia etc., compelluntar.
>
> Alexander III. Papiensi Electo.
>
> Causam matrimonii, quae inter M. mulierem et filium R. Canis vertitur, ab examine tuo ad audientiam nostram appellatione perlatam commisimus iudicibus terminandam. Ideoque fraternitati tuae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus testes ab alterutra partium in suae assertionis testimonium invocatos, ne veritatem occultent, diligentius moneas et inducas. Si autem videris, quod odio, vel gratia vel timore se subtrahant, ne veritas occultetur, eos ad ferendum testimonium coram praefatis iudicibus, vel eorum nuncio, quem ad hoc miserint, ecclesiastica districtione compellas.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: Where testimony is necessary, witnesses are to be compelled to give it, even by a sentence of suspension, excommunication, and deposition.

The same, to the Priests of Ponza.

Since your testimony is necessary concerning the cause that is being conducted between our venerable brother the Bishop of Palestrina and our beloved son the Abbot of Subiaco, lest anything contrary to truth should occur, by the authority of the present letters we command you that on the Wednesday of the immediately following week, in order to give testimony to the truth, you shall present yourselves before the apostolic presence, every occasion and excuse ceasing. But if then you do not come, know that by apostolic authority you are suspended from ecclesiastical office and benefice; and, if you do not come even thus, you will be able to fear a sentence of excommunication and deposition.

> Ubi testimonium est necessarium, compellendi sunt testes ad illud ferendum, etiam per suspensionis, excommunicationis et depositionis sententiam.
>
> Idem Presbyteris Pontiae.
> Quum super causa, quae vertitur inter venerabilem fratrem nostrum Praenestinensem episcopum et dilectum filium Sublacensem abbatem, sit testimonium vestrum necessarium, ne contrarium veritati contingat, praesentium auctoritate vobis mandamus, quatenus quarta feria proxime sequentis hebdomadae perhibituri testimonium veritati omni occasione et excusatione cessante apostolico vos conspectui praesentetis. Si vero tunc non veneritis, sciatis vos ab officio et beneficio ecclesiastico apostolica auctoritate suspensos, et, si nec sic veneritis, excommunicationis sententiam et depositionis poteritis formidare.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: A witness who withdraws himself through fear of the adverse party is compelled to testify; add: even in a criminal cause, according to the common understanding, and thus something is added to chapter 1 above, under the same title, and to the chapter Dilectorum below, under the same title.

The same, to the Archbishop of Genoa.

Concerning that of which you desire to be made certain—whether, when someone is convened before a judge concerning some manifest deed, those who were present at the deed are to be compelled to give testimony to the truth — we respond to your consultation in this way: if the deed is notorious, it does not need to be made clear by the depositions of witnesses, since such matters, as your discretion is not unaware, do not require proof or judicial order. But if it is not notorious and the person who is convened has denied the deed, the witnesses who were present at the deed, according to the custom of the Roman Church, are to be admonished, not compelled, to give testimony to the truth—unless perhaps it has been established to the judge that they are recalled from giving testimony by fear of the adverse party—although perhaps they may generally be compelled to this according to the rigor of human law. [But if a priest, etc. (cf. c. 5, On the Competent Forum, II.2.)]

> Testis, qui timore adversae partis se subtrahit, testificari compellitur, adde: etiam in criminali, secundum communem intellectum, et sic aliquid additur ad c. 1. supr. eod. et c. Dilectorum. infr. eod.
>
> Idem Genuensi Archiepiscopo.
> Super eo +vero, quod certificari desideras, an, quum aliquis de aliquo facto manifesto ante iudicem convenitur, hi, qui facto interfuerunt, cogendi sint ad ferendum testimonium veritati, Consultationi tuae taliter respondemus, quod, si factum est notorium, non eget testium depositionibus declarari, quum talia, sicut tua non ignorat discretio, probationem vel ordinem iudiciarium non requirant. Verum si non est notorium, et is, qui convenitur, factum negaverit, testes, qui interfuerunt facto, de consuetudine Romanae ecclesiae monendi sunt, non cogendi ad ferendum testimonium veritati; nisi forte timore adversae partis constiterit iudici, eos a ferendo testimonio revocari; licet ad hoc forte passim possint de iuris humani rigore compelli. [Si vero presbyter etc. (cf. c. 5. de for. comp. II. 2.)]

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: Even in a criminal cause, witnesses whom the accused maliciously withdrew from the accuser are compelled. This it says according to the true and common understanding. Abbas.

The same.

It has reached our hearing that, when I., Prior of Saint Lawrence, had been accused before you of the crime of simony and adultery, he induced and bound by oath a certain person who was to be led as a witness against him not to depose against him. Therefore you doubt in what manner one must proceed against the defendant, or whether the aforesaid witness is to be compelled to the assertion of the truth. We therefore, considering that no one ought to withdraw from an adversary instruments, under the appellation of which witnesses are contained, and that both he who steals instruments and he who withdraws from an adversary an equal opportunity for advocacy or defense shows that an inequitable suit is fostered by him, and ought to experience in himself the authority of the judge that he has mocked, by the authority of the present letters [thus] respond to you that the witness himself is deservedly to be compelled in order to uncover the contrivance of so great a fraud and cunning.

> Compelluntur testes etiam in criminali, quos accusatus malitiose accusatori subtraxit. Hoc dicit secundum verum et communem intellectum. Abbas.
>
> Idem.
> Pervenit ad audientiam nostram, quod, quum I. Prior sancti Laurentii coram te fuisset de simoniae et adulterii crimine accusatus, quendam, qui contra eum ducendus erat in testimonium, induxit et iuramento adstrinxit, ut non deponeret contra ipsum. +Ideoque dubitas, qualiter adversus reum sit procedendum, vel si testis supradictus sit cogendus ad veritatis assertionem. Nos igitur attendentes, quod nemo debet adversario instrumenta, quorum appellatione testes continentur, subtrahere, et quod tam ille, qui surripit instrumenta, quam qui adversario parem advocationis seu defensionis copiam subtrahit, iniquam ostendit a se litem foveri, et experiri debet in se iudicis auctoritatem elusam, praesentium auctoritate tibi [taliter] respondemus, ad detegendum tantae fraudis et calliditatis commentum ipsum testem merito esse compellendum.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: If the matter cannot be proved otherwise, witnesses are to be compelled even in a criminal cause. This it says according to the more notable reading.

Clement III, to the Bishop of Segovia.

It has reached us that, when in your episcopate it often happens that an enormous and intolerable injury is inflicted by laymen upon a cleric in the presence and sight of many, [or that, while the people are present in church, human blood is horribly shed at the instigation of diabolical fraud,] and on this account those inflicting the injury, when drawn into a cause, deny that they committed so great a crime. And when the injured person desires to prove this by the testimony of those who were present and saw it, they, although they know the truth, are unwilling to bear testimony to the truth. And thus it happens that ecclesiastical justice perishes and the clerical order becomes vile. [It also happens that, when several persons frequently lay violent hands rashly upon clerics, they are unable, because of very many obstacles, to labor their way to the Apostolic See. And] because your fraternity was led to consult us concerning these matters, we respond to your consultation in this way: those who refuse to testify concerning ecclesiastical affairs, if the truth cannot otherwise be elicited, are to be compelled to do so through ecclesiastical censure. But if clerics who have suffered injury are unable [perhaps] to prove the truth by the testimony of others, although according to the rigor of the canons one ought not to stand by the testimony of one, nevertheless, according to the custom of the Roman Church, on account of reverence for the clerical order, we will that faith be given to their oath. [But those, etc. (cf. c. 17, On the Sentence of Excommunication, V.39.)]

Si res aliter probari non potest, etiam in causa criminali compellendi sunt testes. H. d. secundum lecturam notabiliorem.

Clemens III. Segobiensi Episcopo.

Pervenit ad nos, quod, quum in episcopatu tuo saepe contingat, quod a laicis enormis et intolerabilis iniuria clerico multis adstantibus et videntibus inferatur, [vel praesente plebe in ecclesia cum diabolicae fraudis instinctu accidat horribiliter humanum sanguinem perfundi,] et ob hoc iniuriantes in causam tracti negant se tantum facinus commisisse. Et quum laesus eorum testimonio, qui praesentes exstiterant et viderant, hoc probare desideret, illi, licet veritatem cognoverint, nolunt veritati testimonium perhibere. +Sicque fit, quod ecclesiastica iustitia deperit, et ordo clericalis vilescit. [Accidit etiam, quod quum plures frequenter in clericos violentas manus temere iniiciant, ad sedem apostolicam plurimis nequeant obstaculis laborare. Et] quia super his tua nos duxit fraternitas consulendos, Consultationi tuae taliter respondemus, quod hi, qui de rebus ecclesiasticis testificari recusant, si aliter veritas nequiverit elici, ad illud sunt per censuram ecclesiasticam compellendi. Si vero clerici passi iniuriam veritatem [forte] aliquorum testimonio nequiverint comprobare, licet iuxta rigorem canonum unius testimonio non sit standum, tamen iuxta consuetudinem Romanae ecclesiae propter reverentiam clericalis ordinis ipsorum iuramento fidem volumus adhiberi. [Illos autem etc. (cf. c. 17. de sent. exc. V. 39.)]

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: Witnesses are to be compelled concerning the proof of consanguinity. Thus it is commonly summarized. But Panormitanus is not pleased by this summary and therefore summarizes it as chapter 1 above, under the same title.

The same.

Moreover, it is not doubted by us that a witness is to be compelled to bear testimony to the truth concerning consanguinity, since both written law approves this and custom approved by the acts of those employing it, so that, if it has been established that he suppresses the truth through hatred or favor, or fear, he is to be compelled to confess completely what is true.

> Super consanguinitate probanda cogendi sunt testes. Ita communiter summatur. Sed Panorm. non placet hoc summarium, et ideo summat, sicut c. 1. supra eod.
>
> Idem.
>
> Ceterum, quod super consanguinitate cogendus sit testis perhibere testimonium veritati, non dubitatur a nobis, quum id tam ius scriptum approbet, quam consuetudo actibus utentium approbata, ut, si ipsum constiterit odio vel gratia veritatem supprimere, seu timore, cogendus sit, ut quod verum est penitus fateatur.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: A synodal witness who has deposed concerning a marriage before the ordinary is not compelled to swear concerning it before a delegate; this is the first point. Because of supervening infamy he is repelled from testimony; this is the second. He can nevertheless, if he has erred, correct his statement immediately, but not after an interval. This is the third.

Celestine III.

Furthermore, if public witnesses whom your city calls synodal have once rendered testimony concerning a matrimonial cause before you or your chapter, they ought not to be compelled to furnish an oath again concerning the same cause in the presence of any delegated judge, provided that faith is otherwise made for the delegated judge, unless perhaps the article of a new question should arise. Witnesses of this kind, however, can by public law be removed from giving testimony because of infamy, if it should happen that they have publicly contracted it after they were received in common. Their testimonies, if at any time they have erred—not, however, deliberately, but in the very act of uttering them—and have corrected themselves immediately, ought not to be disqualified; but it will be otherwise if they have interposed an interval before their correction.

> Testis synodalis, qui coram ordinario super matrimonio deposuit, non compellitur iurare super eo coram delegato; hoc primo. Propter supervenientem infamiam a testimonio repellitur; hoc secundo. Potest tamen, si erraverit, in continenti, non ex intervallo, dictum suum corrigere. Hoc tertio.
> Coelestinus III.
>
> Praeterea si testes publici, quos tua civitas nuncupat synodales, super causa matrimonii coram te vel tuo capitulo semel testimonium reddiderint, non debent compelli, ut in praesentia alicuius delegati iudicis super eadem causa iterato praebeant iuramentum, dummodo aliter fiat fides iudici delegate, nisi forte articulus novae quaestionis emergat. Huiusmodi vero testes publico iure possunt propter infamiam a perhibendo testimonio removeri, si eam, postquam in communi recepti fuerint, contigerit publice contraxisse. Quorum testimonia, si quandoque, non tamen studiose, sed in ipso proferendo erraverint, et se in continenti correxerint, reprobari non debent; secus autem erit, si correctioni suae interposuerint intervallum.

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: When inquiry is made concerning reputation or the vice of falsity, witnesses are to be compelled. This it says according to Johannes Andreae, but according to Panormitanus it restricts the text too greatly.

Innocent III, to the Prior of Saint Fridianus and Master P., Canon of Pisa.

Concerning these matters—(And below: [cf. c. 16, On Accusations, V.1.]) Moreover, we will and by the authority of the present letters command you that, concerning the articles of the inquiry, both concerning the reputation of the bishop-elect and concerning the letters sent against him in the name of by far the greater and sounder part of the chapter, you shall compel the witnesses who shall have been named to bear testimony to the truth. [Given at the Lateran, on the third day before the Ides of February, in the fifth year of our pontificate, 1203.]

Quum de fama vel vitio falsitatis inquiritur, cogendi sunt testes. Hoc dicit secundum Ioan. Andr., sed secundum Panorm. nimis restringit textum.

Innocentius III. Priori sancti Fridiani et Magistro P. Canonico Pisano.

Super his (Et infra: [cf. c. 16. de accus. V. 1.]) Ceterum volumus et praesentium vobis auctoritate mandamus, ut super inquisitionis articulis, tam de fama electi, quam literis contra eum sub nomine longe maioris et sanioris partis capituli destinatis, cogatis testes, qui nominati fuerint, perhibere testimonium veritati. [Dat. Lat. III. Id. Febr. Pont. nostr. Ao. V. 1203.]

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: Witnesses who withdraw themselves are to be compelled even in a criminal cause.

The same, to the Archdeacon of Milan.

When we directed our writings to you against Master R. of Arca Mariana in the Diocese of Novara concerning the fact that he is said to have brought back false letters from the Apostolic See and to have used them by himself or through a proctor, you petitioned to be instructed by the oracle of the Apostolic See whether you ought to compel the witnesses named concerning the aforesaid vice of falsity. We therefore briefly respond to your fraternity that, if the aforesaid witnesses withdraw themselves because of favor, hatred, or fear, you ought, appeal removed, to compel them through ecclesiastical censure to bear testimony to the truth.

Testes, qui se subtrahunt, etiam in criminali cogendi sunt.

Idem Archidiacono Mediolanensi.

Quum contra magistrum R. de Arca Mariana Novariensi dioecesis super eo, quod dicitur a sede apostolica falsas literas reportasse, ac eis per se vel per procuratorem usum fuisse, tibi direximus scripta nostra, postulasti per sedis apostolicae oraculum edoceri, utrum super praefato vitio falsitatis testes compellere debeas nominatos. Nos igitur fraternitati tuae breviter respondemus, quod testes praedicti, si se gratia, odio vel timore subtraxerint, per censuram ecclesiasticam debes appellatione remota compellere veritati testimonium perhibere.

Chapter X

Latin source headnote: It is not summarized because of the variety of readings, nor is it divided.

Honorius III, to the Abbot of Saint Eugenius and Master G., Canon of Siena.

When the proctors of the beloved sons, the chapter of Volterra, on one side, and of our venerable brother, the Bishop of Volterra, on the other, were established in our presence, we granted our beloved son, the cardinal deacon of the title of Saints Cosmas and Damian, as auditor; before him, when through complaint and countercomplaint issue had lawfully been joined concerning the several chapters that we transmit to you enclosed under our bull, etc. (And below:) Moreover, as to the witnesses who shall have been named, except concerning crimes, if they withdraw themselves because of favor, hatred, or fear, you shall, appeal ceasing, compel them through ecclesiastical censure to bear testimony to the truth.

Chapter XI

Latin source headnote: To uncover the truth of a conspiracy, the associates are compelled, even though bound by oath.

The same, to the Bishop of Bologna and Master B.

Our venerable brother the Archbishop of Ravenna proposed before us that the citizens of Cervia, together with M. and I., former clerics of the church of Ravenna, presumed to make a certain conspiracy against him, likewise giving them a certain quantity of money to his detriment and binding themselves by the bond of an oath to conceal these matters. Hence the same archbishop humbly supplicated us that, since we determined to commit the cause concerning these matters and certain articles to you for his sake, and he cannot prove his intention except by the testimony of the aforesaid citizens, we should deign to provide for him concerning this, lest his justice perish for lack of witnesses. Therefore we command your discretion that, admonition having been given beforehand, you shall, through ecclesiastical censure and with appeal removed, compel those whom you see ought to be compelled to absolve those whom the same archbishop shall lead to be produced as witnesses from an oath of this kind; likewise compelling them, if they withdraw themselves because of favor, hatred, or fear, by similar coercion to bear testimony to the truth.

Unde idem archiepiscopus nobis humiliter supplicavit, ut, quum causam super his et quibusdam articulis vobis eius obtentu duxerimus committendam, et ipse intentionem suam probare non possit, nisi testimonio civium praedictorum, super hoc providere ei, ne pro defectu testium pereat sua iustitia, dignaremur. Ideoque discretioni vestrae mandamus, quatenus, monitione praemissa, per censuram ecclesiasticam appellatione remota cogatis illos, quos videritis compellendos, ut ab huiusmodi iuramento absolvant illos, quos idem archiepiscopus ad testimonium duxerit producendos; eos nihilominus, si se gratia, vel odio vel timore subtraxerint, districtione simili compellentes ad perhibendum testimonium veritati.

Title XXII: On the Credibility of Instruments

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A copy of an instrument not taken with solemn formality does not create faith without the original. This it says according to its meaning.

Gregory.

If we do not see the authentic writing, we can do nothing upon the copies. [But to the Florentine, etc.]

De fide instrumentorum.

Instrumenti exemplum non solenniter sumptum fidem non facit absque originali. H. d. secundum ipsius mentem.

Si scripturam authenticam non videmus, ad exemplaria nihil facere possumus. [Sed Florentino etc.]

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: An instrument falls if the subscribed witnesses have died, unless it has an authentic seal or was drawn up by a notary.

Alexander III.

Authentic writings, indeed, if the subscribed witnesses have died, unless perhaps they were made by a public hand in such a way that they appear public, or have an authentic seal by which they can be proved, do not appear to us to possess the strength of any firmness.

Corruit instrumentum, si testes inscripti decesserint, nisi sigillum habeat authenticum, vel a notario sit confectum.

Alexander III.

Scripta vero authentica, si testes inscripti decesserint, nisi forte per manum publicam facta fuerint, ita, quod appareant publica, aut authenticum sigillum habuerint, per quod possint probari, non videntur nobis alicuius firmitatis robur habere.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: An apostolic rescript is not judged defective because of an erasure in a place not open to suspicion. This it says according to its meaning.

The same.

We have clearly learned from your letters that, when you undertook by our mandate to terminate the cause being conducted between Master A. of Hillesdale and R. of Haute Rive concerning the chapel of Ambitoria, and caused our letters to be read in a public hearing, the aforesaid R. petitioned that a copy of the letters be made for him. When, after diligently inspecting the letters, he accused them of falsity, for this reason, namely, that they were erased in the narrative of the fact where "parochial rights" is written, [asserting that he would prove in our presence that such letters had not emanated from our chancery; but you, seeing that the form of the letters deviated in no respect from the path of reason, were unwilling to desist from the execution of the cause, tendering to the aforesaid R. an oath that he had not alleged this for the purpose of evasion or delay, but because he believed it to be so. The oath, however, not having been furnished on the appointed day, you adjudged that the aforementioned H. be placed in possession for the purpose of preserving the thing; and because a certain lay servant of the same R. resisted your judgment, he was excommunicated and excluded from the church under interdict. The aforesaid R., approaching us and concealing, as is said, that appeal had been prohibited in the commission, and making no mention of the erasure of the letters, or of the oath tendered to him and not furnished, or of the sentence placing [H.] in possession for the purpose of preserving the thing, obtained letters to the Bishops of London and Norwich in this form: that, if anything had been done to the prejudice of the aforementioned R. by occasion of the former commission, it should be recalled as void by our authority. And when the aforesaid H., cited by the Bishop of Norwich, who was discharging his own office and that of the Bishop of London, said before him that the letters had been obtained with the truth suppressed, fearing that the sentence would be executed and holding the Bishop of Norwich suspect—since the aforesaid R. was joined to him by great familiarity, as one who was the nephew of the Bishop of London and is said to eat his bread daily—he appealed to us. Hence, because one's own fraud ought to benefit no one or furnish protection,] we, inspecting our letters, say that they cannot be judged false because of that erasure, nor even held suspect, especially since privileges may be erased in [the descriptions of] possessions, and letters may without hesitation be erased in the narrative of fact if an error has been made.

And those who prohibited obedience to or reception of the apostolic letters, having been suspended, shall be compelled to labor their way to the Apostolic See. Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: An instrument not drawn up by a public hand, bearing a seal whose letters are not legible or whose writing is erased, or which suffers an enormous fracture, does not prove. This it says insofar as it pertains more closely to the title. And it is an everyday and notable case concerning those ancient seals. Panormitanus.

Innocent III, to the Archbishop of Milan.

Between the beloved sons G., Abbot of Saint Donatus of Scozula, on one side in the name of the monastery, and W. B., Canon of Milan, your proctor on the other in the name of the Archbishopric of Milan, litigation was conducted for a long time in our auditorium concerning the articles set forth below. For the said abbot, in the name of his monastery, sought from your aforesaid proctor, in the name of the Church of Milan, restitution to the aforementioned monastery of the port of Scozula or Sesto, together with the lordship, district, and jurisdiction of the aforesaid place and castellany, saying that all these belonged to the monastery; and he said the same concerning the people who dwell in the court of Beruno and hold property of the aforementioned monastery, namely, in Gralia, Carpuneno, Vesterpeno, Cadempleno, and Baveno [and Isola Superiore, Belgirate, and Lesa. He also sought that the Archbishop of Milan cease from troubling the people who dwell in the place of Baveno] concerning a manse of the court, respecting whom the monastery had prevailed in a possessory judgment by the sentence of the Bishop of Verona. [Likewise, that he cease from troubling the vicars, that is, the communes and lands situated in the territory of Sesto or Scozula and in its castellany, and also from troubling the lodging-service of the aforesaid place of Scozula or Sesto and also of that castellany. Again, that he not trouble the aforesaid monastery in possession or quasi-possession of the fishery of the whole water of the Ticino as far as the ravine of Castelletto or Pigarolo. And] he sought all these things together with all fruits received from them, saving in all things the right to add or diminish, striving in many ways to prove that all the foregoing belonged to his monastery. First, through the privilege of Count Luitard, formerly Bishop of Lucca, who had founded the monastery itself and had given it all the foregoing. Second, through the instrument of the sentence of Aspert, formerly Archbishop of Milan, which he rendered concerning these matters by delegation of Emperor Louis, for the often-mentioned monastery against A., nephew of the aforesaid Luitard, who was troubling the monastery concerning them. Third, through the privileges of the Roman emperors, and especially of Henry, who confirmed or even conferred all the foregoing upon the monastery. Fourth, through the instruments of leases that the abbots of the aforementioned monastery had made to various persons. He had also produced witnesses through whom he endeavored to prove that the monastery, for the last sixty years and within, and for fifty years and more, had held and possessed all the foregoing, and that it was public report that they had all been donated to the aforesaid monastery by the already-mentioned Luitard.

But many objections were made by your proctor against the privilege of donation. First, because it appeared to be consumed most of all at the very point, namely in the notation of the indiction, where falsity could more easily have been detected. Second, because, although the charter appeared most ancient, the writing appeared more recent, as though it had not been made at that time. Third, because a false seal appeared to have been defectively affixed, in that on one half of the seal a certain image appeared, not with a miter on its head but with a cap, and not clothed in pontifical but in royal vestments, holding in its hand not a pastoral staff but something like a royal scepter; its face did not appear whole but half, as though on that half it looked toward another half-image, although that other half remained entirely empty. But a certain image appeared to have been erased from it, because the wax in that part appeared similar to the remaining part neither in color nor in flatness. Hence it appeared to have been the seal not of a bishop but of an emperor, because on one half it portrayed the image of Caesar and on the other half it was presumed to have borne the image either of his son or of his wife. For on the seal itself no other letters appeared except those that designated the proper name together with this addition, "By the grace of God." But since the proper name of the bishop himself had been Luitard, two letters had been erased in the proper name expressed by the seal: the second, which was between "I" and "t," and the sixth, which had been between "r" and "v," so that, if the second had been "o" and the sixth had been "i," without doubt it would read not Luitardus but Lotharius. This could also be proved from the fact that, according to the disposition of the other letters, between "I" and "t" there was space sufficient to contain only one letter, although according to the completeness of the name Luitardus there are two different letters between "I" and "t." Moreover, between "r" and "v" there was so little space that the letter "d," which occupies greater space, did not appear to have been formed there, but rather the letter "i," which occupies the least. Again, although the wax of the seal on the inner side was most ancient, the wax placed on the outer side, as if for preservation of the seal, was fresh and soft. When this had been diligently investigated, it was ascertained with the greatest certainty that the charter had been perforated beneath the ancient seal and, through the adhesive of the new wax placed on the outside as if for preservation of the seal, it was defectively joined to the charter itself. By the same kind of falsity, namely through defective affixing of a seal, nearly all the other privileges of the Roman emperors, except the privilege of Henry, were found either false or falsified.

But even Henry's privilege itself did not appear sufficient for establishing faith, because it had neither been drawn up by a public hand nor did it have an authentic seal, in that it was consumed over almost one half and no more of the proper name appeared than its latter half, namely "icus," nor of the other letters except this addition, "By the grace of God," so that from the letters themselves it could no more be proved to have been the seal of Henry than of Louis. The instrument of the sentence was also found suspect in many ways, both because certain erasures appeared in it and because the subscription of the notary appeared to be by a different hand than the writing of the instrument, although the notary professed in the subscription that he had written the instrument with his own hand. The writing also appeared more recent than the charter, and the ink appeared to have been stained with water so that it might appear older. Moreover, in all the imperial privileges that were later, no mention at all was made of that sentence, although in some of them mention was made of Luitard, who was said to have made the donation.

Furthermore, if the instrument of the sentence were true and lawful, nevertheless no prejudice could be generated against the Archbishopric of Milan through that sentence, since the sentence itself had been rendered between other persons, and a matter transacted between some persons does not prejudice another. Nor could the attestations contained in the instrument of the sentence, by which the lawful donation of Luitard appeared to have been proved, inflict any injury upon the same archbishopric, since they had been received between other persons and in another judgment.

Moreover, the aforementioned privilege of Henry appeared to have been not only one of confirmation but also one of donation, whence perhaps the ownership of the things donated could be understood to have been acquired and delivered to the monastery. Yet, although from the form of the petition declared in the privilege itself and from certain other words placed in it it appeared to have been only confirmatory, nevertheless, so that it may be understood in the manner in which it could have greater effect, it appeared certainly necessary to distinguish that the same Henry donated some things and confirmed others, since the same things could not lawfully both be confirmed and donated at the same time: confirmed, as things previously had and possessed; donated, as things then delivered and granted. He donated, I say, those things that he granted to the monastery within the space of three miles; but he confirmed those things that had previously been granted and donated to the monastery itself, among which were contained those brought into judgment. And on this account those things could not be understood to have been donated through that privilege, but confirmed, since according to the sanctions of the laws that which is mine cannot become mine by another cause unless it has ceased to be mine; especially since the party of the monastery endeavored to prove, both through the privilege of grant and through the instrument of the sentence, that those things had lawfully been donated by Luitard, and throughout the whole judgment it relied upon that donation; whence after a donation of this kind the same things could not be donated again to the same party. Therefore, since Henry's privilege was only confirmatory, at least as to those things brought into judgment, if the principal did not hold, neither did the accessory, which is known to have followed from it or on account of it. In the same way, the other privileges of the Roman emperors, even if they had been true and without suspicion, would nevertheless be proved invalid for proof. Through the instruments of lease, indeed, neither ownership nor even full possession is proved, since according to the lawful sanctions a lease made is not sufficient for proof or defense of one's own property.

[Although in these and other ways your often-mentioned proctor appeared to refute the intention of the abbot, and it is provided in civil law that, when the claimant does not prove, the person convened shall prevail even if he has furnished nothing, nevertheless, in order to show more clearly the justice of your party, he appeared to prove through witnesses that the Archbishop of Milan had possessed undisturbed for the last sixty years all the foregoing. But against prescription of this kind the said abbot objected both civil and natural interruption in the intervening time. For formerly, when Gozovio, once a count, had been delegated as judge concerning these matters by Emperor Frederick, because after lawful citations the Archbishop of Milan had contumaciously absented himself, a sentence was rendered for the monastery, and corporal possession was assigned in its name; the abbot asserted that, after it had been held for six years and more, it was lost in the war of the Milanese. Through this he alleged that prescription was interrupted civilly and naturally. But your often-mentioned proctor replied to the foregoing exception in this way: John of Anagni, of good memory, cardinal deacon of Saint Mary in Portico, afterward cardinal priest of Saint Mark and finally Bishop of Palestrina, then legate of the Apostolic See, observing with what barbaric ferocity and insatiable hatred Emperor Frederick wished utterly to overthrow the church and city of Milan and reduce them to the lowest servitude, recalled as void whatever he or any judge or ministerial of his had ordained at that time against the churches, clerics, or citizens of Milan. Our predecessor Pope Alexander, of happy memory, approving his act, confirmed it; whence what had been done by the aforesaid count in hatred of the Milanese, whom the said emperor was persecuting more bitterly, could not for the foregoing reason generate prejudice against the Church of Milan. But the adverse party considered reasoning of this kind frivolous, since completed matters cannot be made uncompleted by any constitution of law.]

When litigation had therefore been conducted for a rather long time concerning the matters that we have set forth in our presence and that of our brothers, because the things that were sought had not been lawfully proved to belong to the monastery, by the common counsel of our brothers we determined by sentence that your aforesaid proctor, in your name and that of the Church of Milan, should be absolved from its claim, since, when the rights of the parties are obscure, it is customary for judgment to be rendered against the person who is claimant. [But concerning the manse, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the sixteenth day before the Kalends of May, 1199.]

Rursus, ut non inquietaret monasterium antedictum in possessione vel quasi possessione piscariae totius aquae Ticini usque ad raviam Castelleti vel Pigaroli. Et*] Haec omnia petebat cum omnibus fructibus inde perceptis, salvo in omnibus iure addendi vel diminuendi, satagens multipliciter comprobare omnia, quae praemissa sunt, ad suum monasterium pertinere. Primo per privilegium Luitardi comitis, quondam episcopi Lucani, qui monasterium ipsum fundaverat, et ei, quae praemissa sunt, donaverat universa. Secundo per instrumentum sententiae Asperti quondam Mediolanensis archiepiscopi, quam ex delegatione Lodovici imperatoris tulit super his, pro monasterio saepe dicto contra A. praefati Luitardi nepotem, qui super his monasterium molestabat. Tertio per privilegia Romanorum imperatorum et praesertim Henrici, qui praemissa omnia monasterio confirmabat, vel etiam conferebat. Quarto per instrumenta locationum, quas fecerant diversis personis abbates monasterii memorati. Testes quoque produxerat, per quos nitebatur probare, quod monasterium a LX. annis et citra, et a L. annis et supra tenuerat et possederat omnia supradicta, et quod fama publica erat, ea omnia praefato monasterio a iam dicto Luitardo fuisse donata. Sed contra privilegium donationis a procuratore tuo multa fuerunt obiecta. Primo, quia ibi maxime apparebat consumptum, videlicet in annotatione indictionis, ubi potuisset falsitas facilius deprehendi. Secundo, quia, quum charta vetustissima videretur, recentior apparebat scriptura, tanquam non illo tempore facta fuisset. Tertio, quia falsum sigillum vitiose videbatur appositum, eo, quod a media parte sigilli apparebat quaedam imago, non cum mitra in capite, sed cum pileo, nec induta pontificalibus, sed regalibus indumentis tenens in manu non baculum pastoralem, sed quasi sceptrum regale, cuius facies non apparebat integra, sed dimidia, tanquam in illa medietate respiceret aliam mediam, quae tamen tota vacua remanebat. Sed quaedam imago videbatur ex ea fuisse deleta, quia cera in ea parte nec in colore, nec in planicie reliquae parti similis apparebat. Unde non episcopi, sed imperatoris videbatur fuisse sigillum, quia in una medietate Caesaris imaginem exprimebat, et in altera medietate praesumebatur, vel filii vel coniugis imaginem habuisse. Nam et in ipso sigillo nullae aliae literae apparebant, nisi quae nomen proprium cum hac adiectione: «Dei gratia,» designabant. Sed quum proprium nomen ipsius episcopi fuerit

Luitardus, in nomine proprio, quod exprimebat sigillum, deletae fuerant duae literae, secunda, quae erat inter «I» et «t,» et sexta, quae fuerat inter «r» et «v,» ita, quod, si secunda fuisset «o,» et sexta fuisset «i,» procul dubio non Luitardus, sed Lotharius legeretur. Quod etiam inde convinci poterat, quod secundum dispositionem aliarum literarum inter «I» et «t» non erat spatium, nisi quod potuisset unam literam continere, quum secundum integritatem huius nominis Luitardus inter «I» et «t» duae literae sint diversae. Praeterea inter «r» et «v» tam modicum erat spatium, ut in eo nec haec litera «d,» quae maius occupat spatium, sed haec litera «i,» quae minimum occupat, videretur formata fuisse. Rursus quum cera sigilli ab interiori parte vetustissima esset, cera, quae posita erat ab exteriori parte, quasi ad conservationem sigilli, recens erat et mollis. Quod quum diligenter investigatum fuisset, certo certius est compertum, quod sub vetusto sigillo charta fuerat perforata, et per glutinum novae cerae, quae posita fuerat exterius, quasi ad conservationem sigilli vitiose fuit ipsi chartae subiunctum. Eadem falsitatis specie, per vitiosam videlicet appositionem sigilli, cetera fere privilegia Romanorum imperatorum praeter privilegium Henrici vel falsa reperta sunt, vel falsata. Sed et ipsum Henrici privilegium ad fidem instruendam non videbatur sufficere, quia nec erat publica manu confectum, nec sigillum habebat authenticum, eo, quod erat ex media fere parte consumptum, nec plus de nomine proprio, nisi ultima medietas, videlicet «icus,» nec de ceteris literis, nisi haec adiectio: «Dei gratia» apparebat, ita, quod ex literis ipsis non magis poterat comprobari fuisse sigillum Henrici, quam Lodovici. Instrumentum quoque sententiae multis modis inveniebatur suspectum, tum quia in ipso quaedam apparebant liturae, tum quia subscriptio notarii videbatur manus alterius fuisse, quam subscriptio instrumenti; quum tamen notarius in subscriptione profiteretur, se instrumentum manu propria conscripsisse. Litera quoque recentior videbatur, quam charta, et aqua videbatur encaustum infectum, ut antiquius appareret. In omnibus autem imperialibus privilegiis, quae posteriora fuerant, nulla prorsus est habita mentio de illa sententia, quamvis in eorum aliquibus mentio facta fuerit Luitardi, qui dicebatur donationem fecisse. Porro si legitimum esset et verum instrumentum sententiae, per illam tamen sententiam nullam Mediolanensi archiepiscopatui praeiudicium poterat generari, quum ipsa sententia lata fuerit inter alios, et res inter alios acta alii non praeiudicet. Nec attestationes, quae continebatur in instrumento sententiae, per quas legitima donatio Luitardi videbatur esse probata, poterant eidem archiepiscopatui nocumentum aliquod irrogare, quum inter alias personas et in alio iudicio receptae fuissent. Ceterum memorati Henrici privilegium, quod non solum confirmationis, sed etiam donationis videbatur fuisse, unde rerum dominium donatarum intelligi forte poterat monasterio acquisitum et traditum, quamvis ex forma petitionis, quae in ipso privilegio declaratur, et quibusdam aliis verbis, quae ponuntur in ipso, confirmatorium tantum fuisse videretur, ut tamen intelligatur eo modo, quo magis posset valere, distinguendum utique videbatur, ut idem Henricus alia donaverit, et alia confirmaverit, quum eadem legitime nequivissent et confirmari pariter et donari; confirmari, tanquam prius habita et possessa: donari, tanquam tunc tradita et concessa. Donaverit, inquam, illa, quae ipse intra trium milliarium spatium monasterio concedebat; confirmaverit autem, quae prius ipsi nonasterio concessa fuerant et donata, inter quae illa continebantur, quae deducta sunt in iudicium. Ac per hoc illa non poterant intelligi per privilegium illud donata, sed confirmata, quum iuxta legum sanctiones quod meum est ex alia causa meum fieri non possit, nisi desierit esse meum; +praesertim quum pars monasterii nixa fuerit comprobare tum per privilegium concessionis, tum per instrumentum sententiae, quod illa legitime fuerint a Luitardo donata, et illi donationi per totum iudicium est innixa; unde post donationem huiusmodi eadem eidem non poterant redonari. Quum igitur privilegium Henrici confirmatorium tantum exstiterit, saltem quoad illa, quae deducta sunt in iudicium, si principale non tenuit, nec accessorium, quod ex eo vel ob id dignoscitur esse secutum. +Pari modo cetera privilegia Romanorum imperatorum, etiam si vera fuissent et sine suspicione, ad probationem tamen invalida probarentur. Per instrumenta vero locationis nec est utique probata proprietas, nec etiam ad plenum possessio, quum iuxta legitimas sanctiones ad probationem rei propriae sive ad defensionem non sufficiat facta locatio. Verum contra praescriptiones huiusmodi dictus abbas interruptionem medii temporis civilem pariter et naturalem obiecit. Olim enim Gozovio quondam comite a Frederico imperatore super his iudice delegato, quum post citationes legitimas Mediolanensis archiepiscopus se contumaciter absentasset, pro monasterio fuit lata sententia, et ipsius nomine corporalis possessio assignata, quam per sex annos et amplius habitam in bello Mediolanensium asserebat amissam; per quod allegabat praescriptionem civiliter et naturaliter interruptam. Cuius factum felicis recordationis Alexander Papa praedecessor noster approbans confirmavit, unde quod a praefato comite factum fuerat in odium Mediolanensium, quos dictus imperator acrius infestabat, Mediolanensi ecclesiae praemissa ratione non poterat praeiudicium generare. Porro rationem huiusmodi pars adversa frivolam reputabat, quum factae causae nulla iuris constitutione fieri possint infectae.] Quum autem super his, quae praemisimus, in nostra et fratrum nostrorum praesentia fuisset diutius litigatum, quia legitime probata non fuerant ea, quae petebantur ad monasterium pertinere, de communi fratrum nostrorum consilio ab impetitione ipsius praefatum procuratorem tuum nomine tuo et Mediolanensis ecclesiae sententialiter duximus absolvendum, quoniam, quum obscura sunt iura partium, consuevit contra eum, qui petitor est, iudicari. Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: Letters concerning absolution from a vow obtained by crusaders with the truth suppressed or falsity expressed are not valid.

The same, to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Concerning what—(And below: [cf. c. 8, On a Vow, III.34.]) You asked, moreover, what you ought to do concerning crusaders who, saying that they are returning from the Apostolic See, bring back unknown seals of cardinals concerning their absolution, although they should not lightly have been believed concerning the impediments alleged. To this we respond to you that, when we at any time grant apostolic letters to such persons, we write in this manner to those who know their persons and resources more fully: that, after the truth concerning the impediments alleged has been more diligently investigated, they shall ordain concerning them what they shall know to be more expedient for the salvation of souls and the relief of the Holy Land, providing attentively, as is contained above, lest anything be deceitfully fabricated in fraud of the vow. Hence, if it has been established that such persons obtained, through suppression of the truth or expression of falsity, letters not only of the cardinals but also our own, and not only doubtful but even certain letters, we will them to be without what was obtained and, notwithstanding those letters, command, appeal removed, as is expressed above, that they be compelled to execution or redemption of the vow.

Non valent literae super absolutione voti per cruce signatos impetratae tacita veritate vel expressa falsitate.

Idem Cantuariensi Archiepiscopo.

Quod super his (Et infra: [cf. c. 8. de voto III. 34.]) Quaesivisti praeterea, quid agere debeas circa cruce signatos, qui dicentes, se ab apostolica sede redire, super absolutione sua ignota cardinalium sigilla reportant, quum eis super impedimentis expositis non fuisset de levi credendum. Ad quod tibi respondemus, quod, quum nos, si quandoque talibus literas apostolicas indulgemus, illis, qui personas et facultates eorum plenius noverunt, hoc modo scribimus, ut super impedimentis expositis inquisita diligentius veritate, statuant circa illos quod animarum saluti et succursui terrae sanctae magis noverint expedire, providentes attentius, sicut superius continetur, ne quid in fraudem voti fallaciter confingatur; unde, si tales per suppressionem veritatis aut falsitatis expressionem literas non solum cardinalium, sed etiam nostras, nec solum dubias, sed etiam certas constiterit impetrasse, carere volumus impetratis, et, eis non obstantibus, ad voti exsecutionem vel redemptionem compelli praecipimus, appellatione remota, sicut superius est expressum.

Latin source headnote: If there is doubt whether an extravagans is an authentic decretal, either it accords with the law, and then judgment is rendered according to it, or it conflicts with the law, and then the Pope is consulted.

The same, to the Bishop of Ely.

The pastoral—(And below: [cf. c. 28, On the Office of a Delegated Judge, I.29.]) You also asked by what indications faith is to be given to decretals concerning whose authority a judge can not undeservedly doubt, since many are found in the compilation of scholars and alleged in causes, concerning which authenticity by bull has not been established, nor were they themselves published through the metropolitan sees. Therefore, because it often happens that decretals of this kind are proposed even before us which we doubt to be authentic, responding benignly to your fraternity, we have determined by authority of the present letters to establish that, when some decretal concerning which a judge deservedly doubts is alleged, if it accords with the common law, he shall not fear to judge according to it, since he appears to proceed not so much by its authority as by the authority of the common law. But if it conflicts with the common law, he shall not judge according to it, but shall consult his superior concerning it. [Moreover, because, etc. (cf. c. 4, On Exceptions, II.25.) Given at Rome at Saint Peter's, on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of January, 1204.]

Si de extravaganti dubitatur, an decretalis sit authentica, aut est iuri consona, et tunc iudicatur secundum illam; aut dissona, et tunc Papa consulitur.

Idem Heliensi Episcopo.

Pastoralis (Et infra: [cf. c. 28. de off. iud. del. I. 29.]) Quaesivisti etiam, quibus indiciis fides habenda sit decretalibus, de quarum auctoritate iudex potest non immerito dubitare, quum plures inveniantur in compilatione scholarium, et allegentur in causis de quibus per bullam non constitit, nec ipsae per metropoles insinuatae fuerunt. Quia igitur saepe contingit, quod etiam coram nobis decretales huiusmodi proponuntur, quas esse authenticas dubitamus, fraternitati tuae benignius respondentes, Auctoritate praesentium duximus statuendum, ut, quum aliqua decretalis, de qua iudex merito dubitet, allegatur, si eadem iuri communi sit consona, secundum eam non metuat iudicare, quum non tam ipsius, quam iuris communis auctoritate procedere videatur. Verum si iuri communi sit dissona, secundum ipsam non iudicet, sed superiorem consulat super ea. [Quoniam autem etc. (cf. c. 4. de exc. II. 25.) Dat. Rom. ap. S. Petr. XIV. Kal. Ian. 1204.]

Latin source headnote: After the attestations have been published, instruments can be produced until conclusion. This is the first point. The custom of a place makes an instrument authentic. This is the second.

The same, to the Bishop of Saint Andrews and the Abbot of Broch.

When the beloved—(And below: [cf. c. 6, On Arbiters, I.43.]) Moreover, we have determined to respond to the second question in this way: either party can exhibit instruments even after publication of the attestations, up to the casting of the definitive sentence, before the cause has been concluded. But concerning the third article we respond in this way: you shall inquire more diligently into the truth, and, if the approved custom of that country obtains that faith is given in such matters to the instruments of that king, you will be able to admit them safely, especially since the aforesaid king was of such integrity that his instruments are of the greatest authority in the regions of Scotland. Super tertio vero articulo taliter respondemus, quod inquiratis diligentius veritatem, et, si consuetudo illius patriae obtinet approbata, ut instrumentis illius regis fides adhibeatur in talibus, vos ea secure poteritis admittere, praesertim quum supradictus rex tantae fuerit honestatis, quod ipsius instrumenta maximae auctoritatis sint in partibus Scoticanis. Chapter X

Latin source headnote: The falsity of an instrument, or what is lacking in an instrument, can be proved through witnesses.

The same, to Peter, a Citizen of Viterbo.

When John the Hermit had sought from you one hundred and thirty Sienese pounds by reason of a loan before Donadeus and John, judges of Viterbo, and you proposed in opposition that, since the same John was bound to you for one hundred and eighty pounds as the price of a house that you had sold to him, the one hundred and thirty pounds from them ought not undeservedly to be set off against the loan, at length, after litigation had been conducted between you for some time concerning this and certain other articles, the same judges, having understood the arguments of both parties and diligently inspected the attestations and published instruments, condemned you by sentence to deliver to the same John vacant possession of the aforesaid house, and freed from creditors. (And below:)

Therefore, when you determined to appeal from this sentence to our hearing, and we appointed our beloved son T., our subdeacon and chaplain, as auditor both for you and for the aforesaid John, it was proposed before him on your behalf that the sale of the aforesaid house had been not pure but rather conditional, and that you were in no way bound to its delivery. Four witnesses were nevertheless introduced to prove this, because, even if it was a new chapter, it nevertheless depended upon the old; having been sworn, they deposed that they were present at the contract celebrated between you and the aforesaid John concerning the same house, situated in the quarter of Saint Blaise, for which a price of one hundred and eighty pounds had been fixed for you, with this condition added, namely, that you should inhabit the house itself freely during your life and, after your death, it should remain to M. and R., your children and the nephews of the same John. In consideration of this condition, you sold the house itself to the same John for a lower price, although you could have had two hundred pounds for it from G. Morandi; but the same witnesses said that they did not at all remember the year, month, and day on which the sale was made.

The said John, however, proposed that the sale itself had been not conditional but pure, exhibiting to prove this a public instrument [drawn up in the year of the Lord's incarnation 1206, in the month of November, on the fourth day,] in which you professed that by your own will you had sold and delivered the house itself to the same John and afterward received the price of one hundred and eighty pounds. He also introduced to prove it the notary who had drawn up the instrument and one of the witnesses subscribed in the instrument. But although the notary affirmed that the sale had been pure, as is contained in the sequence of the instrument, [and the witness also asserted that the sale had been made,] nevertheless, whether the contract had been entered into under a condition or purely, he said that he did not at all remember.

Furthermore, when a doubt had arisen as to whose proof ought to prevail, it was proposed on your behalf that, although according to the lawful sanctions the credibility of instruments and the depositions of witnesses possess the same force in conducting litigation, nevertheless not every instrument ought to be of such moment that it is preferred to the depositions of three or more suitable witnesses. For it is sufficient if, on account of the authority of the notary, who is presumed faithfully to fulfill his office since he is bound to this by oath, as much faith is given to the instrument drawn up as would be given to two suitable witnesses. But since it was manifestly proved through four witnesses superior to every exception that the aforesaid sale had been celebrated conditionally, you asserted that their depositions were deservedly to be preferred to the instrument.

To this, however, the same John responded in opposition that, since he founded his intention through the already-mentioned instrument, to which undoubted faith is to be given, since it is neither canceled, effaced, nor corrupted in any part of itself, and you propose by way of exception that the sale itself was celebrated not purely but conditionally, and certain faith concerning the time was not made through the witnesses introduced by you for this purpose, and therefore it does not appear that they depose concerning that sale which, as is established by the said instrument, was contracted at a determinate time, proof of this kind appeared ineffective to refute the contrary intention. But you proposed that this response was invalid, because, when either party, interrogated by us, had confessed at law that only one sale had been contracted concerning the house, and it is clear from the depositions of the witnesses that the sale was conditional, it is gathered from the confession of both parties that the sale of the same house was conditional, not pure, notwithstanding that the interrogation itself was made after the cause had been concluded by the parties, since the judge, who ought to investigate all things up to the pronouncement of sentence, can interrogate concerning a fact whenever some matter of doubt occurs.

Therefore, these and other matters having been proposed both before us and before the said chaplain and more fully understood, by the counsel of our brothers we pronounced that the sale of the aforesaid house had been celebrated conditionally and that on this account you were in no way obligated to its delivery, imposing perpetual silence upon the aforementioned John concerning this. But the sentence of the aforesaid judges, who are known otherwise to have pronounced justly, since an exception of this kind was neither proved nor objected before them, we invalidate as to the said chapter, confirming it as to the other articles by apostolic authority.

Falsitas instrumenti, vel quod deest instrumento, probari potest per testes.

Idem Petro Civi Viterbiensi.

Quum Ioannes Eremita a te centum triginta libras Senenses ex causa mutui coram Donadeo et Ioanne iudicibus Viterbiensibus petiisset, et tu ex adverso proponeres, quod, quum idem Ioannes in centum et octoginta libris tibi pro pretio domus, quam eidem vendideras, teneretur, centum triginta libras ex illis non immerito in mutuo debebat compensare. Tandem quum super hoc et quibusdam aliis articulis inter vos fuisset aliquamdiu litigatum, iidem iudices, utriusque partis rationibus intellectis et diligenter inspectis attestationibus, et publicatis instrumentis, te sententialiter condemnaverunt, ut eidem Ioanni praedictae domus possessionem vacuam traderes, et a creditoribus liberatam (Et infra:) Quum igitur ab hac sententia ad nostram duxeris audientiam appellandum, et nos tam tibi, quam praedicto Ioanni dilectum filium nostrum T. subdiaconum et capellanum nostrum dederimus auditorem, ex parte tua fuit propositum coram eo, supradictae domus venditionem non puram, sed conditionalem potius exstitisse, ac nullatenus te teneri ad traditionem ipsius, quatuor nihilominus testibus ad hoc probandum inductis, quod, etsi novum esset capitulum, pendebat tamen ex veteri, qui iurati deposuerunt, se interfuisse contractui inter te et praedictum Ioannem super eadem domo posita in ora S. Blasii, celebrato, pro qua centum octoginta librarum pretium tibi fuerat constitutum, tali videlicet adiecta conditione, ut tu domum ipsam inhabitares libere in vita tua, et post obitum tuum M. et R. natis tuis, eiusdem Ioannis nepotibus, remaneret. Cuius conditionis intuitu domum ipsam eidem Ioanni pro minori pretio vendidisti, quum a G. Morandi pro ipsa ducentas libras potuisses habere; anni vero, mensis et diei, quo venditio facta fuit, iidem testes se dixerunt minime recordari. Dictus vero Ioannes venditionem ipsam non conditionalem, sed puram proposuit exstitisse, ad hoc probandum publicum exhibens instrumentum [anno dominicae incarnationis MCCVI. mense Novembri die quarto confectum;] in quo profitebaris, te propria voluntate vendidisse ac tradidisse domum ipsam eidem Ioanni Eremitae, et postea CLXXX. librarum pretium recepisse. Tabellionem quoque, qui confecerat instrumentum, et unum ex testibus in instrumento subscriptis ad id probandum induxit. +Sed licet tabellio venditionem puram exstitisse firmavit, prout in serie instrumenti continetur, [et etiam testis asseruit venditionem esse factam,] utrum tamen sub conditione vel pure fuerit contractus initus, dixit se minime recordari. Porro quum dubitatio fuisset exorta, utrius deberet probatio praevalere, pro tua fuit parte propositum, quia, etsi secundum legitimas sanctiones eandem vim obtineant instrumentorum fides et depositiones testium in litibus exercendis, non tamen quodlibet instrumentum tanti debet esse momenti, ut trium vel plurium idoneorum testium depositionibus praeferantur. +Satis est etenim, si propter tabellionis auctoritatem, qui suum officium fideliter adimplere praesumitur, quum ad hoc ex iuramento teneatur, tanta fides adhibeatur instrumento confecto, quanta foret duobus idoneis testibus adhibenda. Sed quum. per quatuor testes omni exceptione maiores fuerit manifeste probatum, supradictam venditionem fuisse conditionaliter celebratam, eorundem depositiones asseruisti instrumento merito praeferendas. Ad hoc autem idem Ioannes ex adverso respondit, quod, quum intentionem suam per iam dictum fundaverit instrumentum, cui fides est indubitata adhibenda, quum nec cancellatum, nec abolitum, nec corruptum sit in aliqua parte sui, ac tu in modum exceptionis venditionem ipsam non pure, sed conditionaliter celebratam esse proponas, nec per testes ad hoc a te inductos de certo fuerit tempore facta fides, et ideo non appareat, quod super illa venditione deponant, quam constat per dictum instrumentum determinato tempore fuisse contractam, huiusmodi probatio videbatur inefficax ad intentionem contrariam elidendam. Verum responsionem istam esse proponebas invalidam, quoniam, quum utraque pars a nobis interrogata fuisset in iure confessa, quod unica tantum venditio super domo contracta fuerit, et ex depositionibus testium liqueat, venditionem conditionalem fuisse, ex utriusque confessione colligitur, eiusdem domus venditionem conditionalem exstitisse, non puram, non obstante, quod ipsa interrogatio facta fuerit, postquam a partibus exstitit in causa conclusum, quum iudex, qui usque ad prolationem sententiae debet universa rimari, possit interrogare de facto, quotiens dubitationis aliquid occurrit. His ergo et aliis tam coram nobis, quam coram dicto capellano propositis et plenius intellectis, De consilio fratrum nostrorum pronunciavimus venditionem praedictae domus fuisse conditionaliter celebratam, et te ob hoc nullatenus obligatum ad traditionem ipsius, super hoc memorato Ioanni silentium imponentes perpetuum. Sententiam vero iudicum praedictorum, qui alias iuste pronunciasse noscuntur, quum huiusmodi exceptio coram ipsis nec probata fuerit nec obiecta, quoad dictum capitulum infirmamus, eam quoad alios articulos auctoritate apostolica confirmantes.

Latin source headnote: The absence of a letter does not invalidate a rescript.

Honorius III.

It was proposed before us on behalf of our dearest daughter in Christ B., formerly Queen of the English, that, when the nobleman W. de Guerche and his accomplices of the Dioceses of Nantes, Rennes, and Angers despoiled her at their own pleasure of the castle of Segré, which belonged to her by reason of her dower, and she obtained letters concerning this against him from Pope I., our predecessor of good memory, directed to us, because an apostolic rescript is asserted to be defective on the ground that in the word spoliarunt this character "o" was missing, although three or four citations had already emanated from us, nevertheless, admitting frivolous exceptions of this kind, you deferred proceeding in the matter itself. We therefore, marveling not a little at your discretion, since from what precedes and follows the meaning can be understood, although through the fault or occupation of the scribe the aforesaid "o" was omitted, you could sufficiently have ascertained the intention of the mandator, nor had his mandate expired at his death because the matter was no longer untouched; and willing that an end be imposed upon litigation, through apostolic writings we command your discretion that, notwithstanding this, you shall proceed in the matter itself according to the tenor of the former letters, with the obstacle of any contradiction and appeal removed, reason going before. Latin source headnote: An appeal is lawfully taken from a judge who does not cause common instruments to be produced for a party petitioning this.

Gregory IX, to the Prior of Saint Bartholomew and the Dean of Arches in London.

G., perpetual vicar of the church of Rechan., explained to us that, when the prior and convent of Leeds convened him concerning tithes before judges by apostolic authority, and the said G. reconvened them before the same judges concerning like matters, because the said judges did not cause a copy of certain common instruments—which the other party had and through which he intended to establish his intention concerning the principal matter—to be made for him although he petitioned this insistently, he appealed to our hearing. Latin source headnote: Marriage is proved through long cohabitation and reputation concerning marriage, matrimonial contracts, and other supporting evidence. Panormitanus.

The same, to the Archbishop of Genoa.

That also has nevertheless become known to us from your inquiry: that, when a certain free woman knowingly cohabited for ten years and more with a certain slave and was known carnally by him, she now asserts that he is not her husband because the witnesses to the betrothal do not appear. But the man, claiming her as wife, shows a public instrument in which they name themselves spouses and through which it appears that he made to her a donation on account of marriage. The woman, however, asserting that the instrument was defective, so that the master might be defrauded of the slave, produced several witnesses that that slave, often asked by her friends to betroth her, firmly asserted that he had neither betrothed nor would betroth her. But the man proved that the woman herself was his wife by nothing except the aforesaid instrument and certain witnesses who had seen her wearing rings; but the woman said that she wore the rings according to the custom of those women who sell bread. But because in doubt of this kind the reputation of the neighborhood ought rather to be considered, it shall belong to your solicitude to inquire diligently into the reputation of the place—whether the aforesaid man had her at bed and board as his wife or as a concubine; and if the reputation of the place holds that the man kept her at bed and board as a wife, since marriage is the union of male and female retaining an undivided custom of life, the woman is to be compelled to serve the same man with conjugal affection, especially if the aforesaid instrument was drawn up by one who fulfilled his office faithfully.

Verum vir eam vendicans in uxorem ostendit publicum instrumentum, in quo sese coniuges nominant, et per quod ipsum ei donationem propter nuptias fecisse apparet. Mulier vero instrumentum illud asserens vitiosum, ut servo dominus fraudaretur, plures testes produxit, quod servus ille ab amicis eius saepe rogatus, ut eam desponsaret, et ille nec desponsasse, nec desponsaturum se ipsam firmiter asserebat. Vir autem nonnisi praedicto instrumento, et quibusdam testibus, qui viderant eam annulos deferentem, mulierem ipsam probavit esse uxorem; sed mulier de more illarum mulierum, quae panes vendunt, se annulos detulisse dicebat. Verum, quia in huiusmodi dubietate fama viciniae magis debet attendi, tuae sollicitudinis erit famam loci diligenter inquirere, utrum praedictus vir eam in lecto et in mensa sicut suam uxorem aut concubinam habuerit; et si fama loci habet, quod vir ipsam in lecto et in mensa sicut uxorem tenuerit, quum matrimonium sit maris et feminae coniunctio, individuam vitae consuetudinem retinens: cogenda est mulier, ut eidem viro affectu serviat coniugali, praesertim si praescriptum instrumentum ab eo conditum fuerit, qui officium suum fideliter adimplevit.

Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: Carnal union is proved through a violent presumption.

The same.

Having received the letters of your fraternity, from their tenor it became known to us that, when P., your parishioner, sought by your judgment to be separated from the woman A., whom he had taken as wife, the accusers of the marriage produced witnesses firmly asserting that, after the aforesaid woman had contracted marriage with the aforesaid man, they saw a blood relative of her husband lying alone with her alone, naked with her naked, in the same bed, with the intention, as they believed, that he should know her carnally. They also said that this happened often in their presence both in many secret places and hiding places suitable for this purpose and at chosen hours and places. And public report agrees that after the marriage had been contracted they mingled with one another, which, as you assert, they publicly confessed in your presence, although they denied that they had done it before the marriage was contracted. It is also said concerning the aforesaid woman that, pretending that she had conceived by her husband, she falsely claimed that she had given birth to another's offspring, already baptized, as is reported, and, causing it to be rebaptized, deceived her husband. But in the course of time, when report of the purchased alien offspring uncovered the fraud, she secretly returned it to the parents from whom she had bought it. Afterward the same woman is reported to have prepared a poisonous drink and other snares against the life of the man. Therefore, because your fraternity considered that we should be consulted as to whether the already-mentioned proofs suffice to dissolve the marriage, we respond to your consultation in this way: both from the confession and from a violent and certain suspicion of fornication of this kind, especially if what is said concerning the offspring and the contrivance of death can be proved, a sentence of separation can not undeservedly be promulgated, yet in such a way that the man shall have permission to marry another when she is dead, while the woman remains without hope of marriage.

Et publica fama consentit, quod post contractum matrimonium se miscuerunt ad invicem, quod in praesentia tua publice, ut asseris, sunt confessi, quamvis id se ante contractum matrimonium fecisse negarent. Dicitur quoque de muliere praedicta, quod de marito sese simulans concepisse, alienum partum iam baptizatum, ut fertur, se mentita est peperisse, et rebaptizari faciens virum suum decepit. Procedente vero tempore, quum fama empti alieni partus fraudem detegeret, parentibus, a quibus eum emerat, occulte restituit, postea veneficum poculum et alias vitae insidias viro parasse eadem mulier perhibetur. Quia ergo tua nos fraternitas duxit consulendos, si ad solvendum matrimonium iam dictae probationes sufficiant,* Consultationi tuae taliter respondemus, quod tum ex confessione, tum ex huiusmodi violenta et certa suspicione fornicationis, praesertim, si quod de partu et machinatione mortis dictum est probari valet, non immerito potest sententia divortii promulgari, ita quidem, ut vir licentiam habeat mortua illa ducendi aliam, muliere sine spe coniugii remanente.

Chapter XIII

Latin source headnote: It says the same as the preceding chapter.

Clement III.

In the third place, your fraternity sought to have the knot of a question of this kind untied: whether a young man ought to have as wife the betrothed woman to whom he consented through words of the present tense, when her niece, springing forth to impede their marriage, proposed that she had previously been known carnally by the young man. Witnesses produced by her said that they believed for certain that she had been the concubine of the said young man and joined to him by carnal commingling, adding that they had seen them wandering together many times through plains and woods, ways and pathless places, and said that they had received the testimony of the neighborhood concerning this. For greater certainty, however, because you believed that what the same woman asserted had been proved less than sufficiently, both she and the young man, bound by oaths, separately confessed that they had previously known one another carnally, although the young man did not wish to be separated from the woman whom he had betrothed. But we, understanding these things that have been said, and considering that the reputation of the neighborhood, the customary conversations of the said woman and young man, and their wandering courses through solitary places were proved by witnesses, and that they separately confessed under oath to carnal knowledge, especially since this is not said to be hidden but is proclaimed by many as virtually manifest, adhering to the footsteps of our predecessors, and especially following the statutes of Alexander III of happy memory, believe it more advisable and safer that they not be joined matrimonially, but that, their betrothal being dissolved, they be separated from one another. [Given at the Lateran.]

Idem dicit, ut praeced. cap.

Clemens III.

Tertio loco quaestionis huiusmodi nodum tua fraternitas petiit explicari, an iuvenis sponsam, in quam per verba de praesenti consensit, debeat in uxorem habere, ad quorum matrimonium impediendum neptis ipsius sponsae prosiliens, se a iuvene carnaliter praecognitam proponebat. A qua producti testes dixerunt, se pro certo credere, quod illa dicti iuvenis exstiterit concubina, et ei carnali commixtione coniuncta, adiicientes, quod eos insimul viderant per plana et nemora, vias et invia pluries convagantes, et testimonium viciniae se super hoc recepisse dicebant. Ad maiorem autem certitudinem, quia minus sufficienter credidisti esse probatum quod eadem mulier asserebat, tam ipsa quam iuvenis iuramentis adstricti seorsum confessi sunt, quod se invicem carnaliter praecognoverant, licet iuvenis nollet ab ea, quum desponsaverat, separari. Nos autem haec, quae dicta sunt, intelligentes, et attendentes viciniae famam, et dictorum mulieris ac iuvenis consuetas confabulationes, et per solitudines vagos incessus per testes esse probatos, ut de carnali cognitione eos per iuramentum separatim fuisse confessos, praesertim quum hoc non dicatur occultum, sed quasi praedicetur a pluribus manifestum, praedecessorum nostrorum vestigiis inhaerentes, et praesertim felicis memoriae Alexandri III. statuta sectantes, consultius et securius esse credimus, ut matrimonialiter non coniungantur, sed ab invicem solutis sponsalibus separentur. Chapter XIV

Latin source headnote: No one ought to be condemned of a grave crime because of a presumption, even a vehement one.

Innocent III, to the Bishop of Nevers and the Archdeacon of Bourges.

We have received your letters containing that, when the cause being conducted between our venerable brother the Bishop of Auxerre and certain burgesses of La Charité whom the same bishop was accusing of heresy had been delegated to you and our beloved son the Abbot of Colonges by the Apostolic See, both parties at length, so that the prolixity of the matter might more easily be brought to an end, appointed you two as arbiters for themselves under a certain penalty, while the power delegated to you was nevertheless reserved. But G., the bearer of the present letters and one of those whom the aforesaid bishop was accusing, had confessed his heresy at La Charité in a public voice, and had similarly acknowledged concerning a certain brother of his that he was laboring with him under the same error. When this man was convened concerning his faith before our venerable brother the Archbishop of Bourges, and a purgation to be made by the same W., who was believed to be truly penitent and Catholic, had been prescribed to him, W. himself, after furnishing an oath, purged his brother, whom he had publicly asserted [to be] a heretic, and thus he was judged by the bishop to be both perjured and a heretic. On the contrary, however, the same W. proposed that, although he had publicly confessed concerning himself, he had nevertheless confessed nothing concerning his brother. Hence he could rightly have purged him, especially since he had heard from two chaplains of Aubigny, who knew the latter's conscience, that he could safely purge him as a Catholic; afterward he showed you their letters. But concerning what he had denied about his brother, the bishop immediately convicted him before you through himself, one priest, and another deacon; whence he called him relapsed into heresy. You, therefore, considering these notable contradictions in the aforesaid W., transmitted him with your letters to our presence, his goods having meanwhile been inventoried until we should take care to ordain what ought to be ordained concerning his person and goods; you added that, when the same W., together with certain persons, pressed you to receive his purgation, as you had that of certain others, you were unwilling to admit his oath because he appeared self-contradictory, although a purgation for him with eight reputable men as oath-helpers was admitted.

But we, because the little foxes that endeavor to demolish the vineyard of the Lord are to be caught by sagacious effort—for foxes have dens and the birds of heaven nests—from the matters written above held the aforesaid G. vehemently suspect of heresy, both because he afterward denied having said what he had said before, as he was convicted before you, and because either he first spoke a falsehood against his brother by asserting him to be a heretic, or afterward committed perjury against God by purging him of heresy, either of which renders him very suspect; although it appears more probable that at the time when, as one truly penitent, he was returning from heresy to the faith, he would not have spoken so grave a falsehood, especially against a brother whom certainly, as most dear to him, he would not have asserted to be a heretic unless he had been kindled by zeal for the orthodox faith. Hence it is presumed that, when he afterward purged him of heresy, he perjured himself shamefully.

Wherefore, [by commanding through apostolic writings,] we order your discretion that, since we do not will him to be condemned of so grave a crime because of suspicion alone, although indeed vehement, you shall receive from him, beyond an oath-bound surety, security of such kind and quantity that he ought to be restrained by fear of corporal punishment; you shall impose upon him a discreet penance from which it can appear whether he walks in darkness or in light, and whether he is truly penitent or feignedly converted. And if in this manner you learn that he is a true Catholic, you shall not permit him to be unduly molested; otherwise, you shall condemn him as a heretic. Chapter XV

Latin source headnote: One who maintained continence in youth is not presumed incontinent in old age, especially if he is learned.

The same, to the Bishop of Ceneda and the Abbot of Deciquorum.

Since in his youth our venerable brother C., Bishop of Pécs, exhibited himself so mature, honorable, and provident that, because of the sweet odor of his probity, he merited to be adorned with the pallium by the Roman Church, it is not lightly to be believed that, after he reached old age, he shamefully cast aside the yoke of the Lord by embracing the stenches and foulness of lust, since a stain of this kind, which is sometimes contracted in youth, is more frequently expiated in old age. Who, moreover, would easily believe that a man endowed with knowledge of letters, forgetful of his own salvation, would turn himself to that ignominy of passion so as to perpetrate abominable incest with his own niece, since, even according to the opinions of the pagans, the natural bond between such persons permits no suspicion of a savage crime? Therefore, although the King of Hungary, of illustrious memory, had sometimes denounced the same bishop to us through messengers and letters concerning such a crime, supplicantly and insistently petitioning that we remove from the Hungarian Church an evil of this kind, pernicious by example, nevertheless, because his suggestion appeared to proceed not from the root of charity but from the tinder of hatred, since he did not cease to persecute him as an enemy, as is manifest throughout the whole province, we were unwilling to incline our ears as if to malicious denunciations; but, so that we might prove whether the spirit was from God, we commanded the Bishop of Auria, of good memory, that he should prudently and cautiously investigate from the fellow bishops whether they believed that the aforesaid bishop had been sprinkled with such a stain. They afterward wrote back to us that they believed him to be a man of honorable conduct, commending his person in many ways. [But because, etc. (cf. c. 12, On Canonical Purgation, V.34.) Given at Ferentino, on the Nones of July, in the ninth year, 1206.]

Non praesumitur incontinens in senectute, qui in iuventute continuit, maxime si est literatus.

Quum in iuventute sua venerabilis frater noster C. Quinqueecclesiensis episcopus adeo se maturum, honestum et providum exhibuerit, ut propter suavem suae probitatis odorem ab ecclesia Romana meruerit pallio decorari, non est de levi credendum, quod, postquam ad senilem pervenit aetatem, turpiter abiecerit iugum Domini, foetores et foeditates libidinis amplexando; quum labes huiusmodi, quae nonunquam in iuventute contrahitur, in senectute frequentius expietur. Quis praeterea de facili crederet, quod vir praeditus scientia literarum, propriae salutis oblitus, ad eam passionis ignominiam se converteret, ut cum propria nepte abominabilem perpetraret incestum, quum, etiam secundum sententias ethnicorum naturale foedus inter tales personas nihil permittat saevi criminis suspiciari? Chapter XVI

Latin source headnote: A person in whose favor a letter is written concerning the conferral of a benefice with the clause "if he shall have been suitable" is not bound to prove that he is suitable, since he is presumed suitable.

The same, to the Archdeacon and Provost of Milan.

Some time ago we commanded the Archdeacon of Milan, of good memory, that he should cause our beloved son C., a scholar, to be received as a cleric and brother of the same church by the priest of Saint Victor of the Forty Martyrs, who alone ministered in that church, in which, as the same scholar asserted, a cleric and a priest formerly ministered, and the same scholar proposes that its resources have in no way been diminished. But the aforementioned priest, maliciously declining the examination of the archdeacon, sent the cleric I. [on his own behalf] to our presence; and we appointed as auditor for him and the aforesaid C. our venerable brother the Archbishop of Trani, legate of the Apostolic See, then our subdeacon and chaplain; before him the said John asserted that the resources of the aforementioned church by no means sufficed for two clerics, adding that the aforesaid C. was not suitable for obtaining the benefice of that church.

[Hence, with their assent, we commanded our venerable brother [N.], Patriarch of Jerusalem, then Bishop of Vercelli, that, if the aforesaid C. lawfully proved before him that the resources of the aforesaid church had not been diminished but sufficed for two and that his person was suitable, he should compel the aforesaid priest to receive him through ecclesiastical censure, appeal removed; and, if any contradictors or rebels should perhaps appear, he should restrain them from their presumption by similar coercion, appeal ceasing; otherwise he should impose perpetual silence upon the aforementioned scholar concerning this. Any witnesses who should be named to him, if they withdrew themselves because of favor, hatred, or fear, he should also compel by canonical coercion, appeal ceasing, to bear testimony to the truth. But when the aforesaid scholar, in order to prove that the resources of the church had not been diminished but sufficed for two, had many times approached the presence of the aforesaid patriarch, then Bishop of Vercelli, and the same bishop had placed under interdict the witnesses named by him because, after admonition had been given beforehand, they were unwilling to bear testimony to the truth, our venerable brother [N.], then Archbishop of Milan, relaxed the interdict by his own authority. For this reason the aforesaid C. was unable to obtain his right. Hence we afterward commanded you, son Provost, that, having inspected the attestations already received—which we willed that you should cause to be exhibited to you through ecclesiastical censure—you should, according to them and others, if the parties should determine lawfully to produce any, since those received had not yet been published, terminate the cause itself according to the tenor of the preceding letters, with the obstacle of any contradiction and appeal removed, reason going before. Therefore, when the parties were afterward established in your presence on this account, since the said C., in order to prove that the resources of the church were sufficient, had named certain patrons and parishioners of the church to give testimony, and although often admonished by you they were unwilling to give testimony, excusing themselves by certain reasons, you bound them with the bond of excommunication unless within fifteen days from then they came to give testimony; but before the appointed day they appealed to the Apostolic See, wherefore the cause was not further pursued. Therefore, willing that an end be imposed upon the same controversy,] we have determined to commit the cause to you, [commanding you by authority of the present letters that you shall, as a precaution, bestow the benefit of absolution upon the aforesaid laymen, and shall terminate the cause itself according to the tenor of the former letters, appeal removed, reason going before;] in such a way that, from that clause—namely, "if the person shall have been suitable"—which is found inserted in our rescript, no necessity of proving himself suitable shall be imposed upon the same scholar, since prima facie he is presumed suitable unless something contrary is shown. [Moreover, the witnesses, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the fifth day before the Ides of May, in the tenth year, 1207.]

Is, pro quo beneficiando scribitur cum clausula, si idoneus fuerit, non tenetur probare se idoneum, quum idoneus praesumatur.

Title XXIV: On Oaths

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: An action can be brought for release from an oath whose fulfillment contains turpitude on the part of the recipient. This it says as to its meaning, and it is a notable case. Abbas.

Gregory III.

From the administration—(And below:) Therefore, because creditors bind debtors by oath to pay them usury, to the manifest peril of souls, we, wishing according to the duty of our office to provide for their salvation and to remove the unjust burden from debtors, and especially from those who have given themselves as aid for bringing relief to the land of Jerusalem, command all of you that you shall compel the creditors themselves by ecclesiastical coercion to release the oaths furnished concerning payment of usury to them, with the obstacle of contradiction and appeal removed.

De iureiurando.

Agi potest ad relaxationem iuramenti, cuius implementum turpitudinem continet ex parte suscipientis. H. d. quoad intellectum, et est casus notabilis. Abbas.

Gregorius III.

Ex administrationis (Et infra:) Quoniam igitur creditores ad usuras sibi solvendas in manifestum periculum animarum iuramento debitores adstringunt, nos eorum saluti volentes iuxta debitum officii nostri prospicere, et iniquum gravamen a debitoribus removere, et ab illis praecipue, qui se in auxilium dederunt ad succursum terrae Hierosolymitanae praestandum, universitati vestrae Mandamus, quatenus creditores ipsos ad iuramenta super usuris sibi solvendis praestita relaxanda sublato contradictionis et appellationis obstaculo ecclesiastica districtione cogatis.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: An oath furnished by a prelate not to seek the return of property of the church is not valid. Or thus: absolution from an oath induced by fear is made by an ecclesiastical judge.

From the Register of Gregory.

It has reached us that the Bishop of Laodicea, despoiled of his property by Count Ar., was compelled at sword-point, in an increase of wickedness, to swear that he would not seek the return of the things thus taken, and [the count] asks that pardon for so great a crime be imparted to him. Therefore, having learned of the insult inflicted upon himself in blessed Peter, we grieved greatly, asserting that the bishop himself could be bound by no bonds of an oath concerning this; nevertheless, by apostolic authority, we absolve him who swore under most abominable compulsion. [Given at Rome, on the third day before the Kalends of February, in the third indiction, 1080.]

Non valet iuramentum praestitum a praelato de non repetendis rebus ecclesiae. Vel sic: a iuramento meticuloso fit absolutio per iudicem ecclesiasticum.

Ex registro Gregorii.

Pervenit ad nos, Laudicensem episcopum ab Ar. comite rebus suis spoliatium, et ad nequitiae augmentum gladiis iurare compulsum, quod non repeteret sic ablata et huius tanti sceleris veniam sibi impertiri rogat. Cognita igitur contumelia, sibi in beato Petro illata, valde doluimus, asserentes, ipsum episcopum nullius iuramenti vinculis super hoc posse constringi, quern tamen apostolica auctoritate absolvimus, qui nefandissima coactione iuravit. [Dat. Romae III. Kal. Febr. Ind. III. 1080.]

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: One who changes the fulfillment of an oath for the better does not perjure himself; and no one is bound by an oath to fulfill what he swore if the other party, with respect to whom he furnished the oath, does not fulfill [his part].

The same, to the King of the Franks.

It has reached us that, when formerly [you went] to the regions of Auvergne, etc. (And below:) For one who changes a purpose or promise for the better does not break it. Nor are you bound to him in any respect, even if you had confirmed your aforesaid promise by an oath or an obligation of faith with a condition interposed, if it is established that he did not at all comply with the condition.

Non deierat qui iuramenti implementum in melius commutat, et non adstringitur quis iuramento ad implendum quod iuravit, si ab alia parte non impletur, cuius respectu praebuit iuramentum.

Idem Regi Francorum.

Pervenit ad nos, quod, quum iam pridem ad partes Alverniae, etc. (Et infra:) Non enim propositum aut promissum infringit qui in melius illud commutat. Nec tu ei, etiamsi praescriptum promissum tuum iuramento vel fidei obligatione interposita conditione firmasses, aliquatenus teneris, si constat, eum conditioni minime paruisse.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: A form of oath containing seven chapters is set forth, according to which bishops swear to the Pope; but today all persons receiving a dignity from the Pope swear to him. Let this stand for the summary and division.

The same, to Peter the Subdeacon.

I, N., bishop, from this hour forward shall be faithful to Saint Peter, to the holy apostolic Roman Church, to my lord Pope C., and to his successors entering canonically. I shall be neither in counsel nor in deed that he lose life or limb, or be taken by an evil capture. Counsel that he shall reveal to me, either by himself, by letters, or by a messenger, I shall disclose to no one to his harm. I shall be a helper in defending and retaining the papacy of the Roman Church and the rules of the holy Fathers, saving my order, against all men. Summoned to a synod, I shall come unless I shall have been hindered by a canonical hindrance. I shall treat honorably, in going and returning, a legate of the Apostolic See whom I shall know to be a certain legate, and shall aid him in his necessities. I shall visit the thresholds of the Apostles every year, either by myself or by a certain messenger of mine, unless I shall be released by their permission. So may God and these holy Gospels aid me.

Ponitur forma iuramenti septem capitula continens, secundum quam iurant Papae episcopi; sed hodie omnes recipientes dignitatem a Papa sibi iurant. Hoc sit pro summario et divisione.

Idem Petro Subdiacono.

Ego N. episcopus ab hac hora in antea fidelis ero sancto Petro, sanctaeque apostolicae Romanae ecclesiae, dominoque meo Papae C. eiusque successoribus canonice intrantibus. Non ero neque in consilio neque in facto, ut vitam perdat aut membrum, vel capiatur mala captione. Consilium quod mini aut per se, aut per literas, aut per nuncium manifestabit, ad eius damnum nulli pandam. Papatum Romanae ecclesiae et regulas sanctorum Patrum adiutor ero ad defendendum et retinendum, salvo ordine meo, contra omnes homines. Vocatus ad synodum veniam, nisi praepeditus fuero canonica praepeditione. Legatum apostolicae sedis, quern certum legatum esse cognovero, in eundo et redeundo honorifice tractabo, et in suis necessitatibus adiuvabo. Apostolorum limina singulis annis aut per me aut per certum nuncium meum visitabo, nisi eorum absolvar licentia. Sic me Deus adiuvet et haec sancta evangelia.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: A cleric is not bound to furnish an oath of obedience to his bishop except by reason of an administration granted to him.

Pope Urban.

No bishop shall compel his clerics to swear to him, except perhaps those to whom the administration of ecclesiastical property shall have been committed.

Non tenetur clericus episcopo suo obedientiae iuramentum praestare, nisi ratione administrationis sibi concessae.

Urbanus Papa.

Nullus episcopus clericos suos, nisi forte quibus ecclesiasticarum rerum commissa fuerit dispensatio, sibi iurare compellat.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: One who obligated himself to pay usury is not compelled to pay unless he swore; in that case he is compelled, but he recovers it.

Alexander III, to the Bishop of Ávila.

Debtors, however, ought not to be compelled to pay usury to which they had bound themselves, unless they are bound by oath to pay it. But if they have sworn concerning its payment, they are to be compelled to render the oath to the Lord, so that they may be released by the creditors. And when the usury has been paid, the creditors are to be compelled by ecclesiastical severity to restore it, if necessary.

Qui se obligavit ad usuras solvendas, solvere non cogitur, nisi iuraverit; quo casu cogitur, sed repetit.

Alexander III. Episcopo Vigiliensi.

Debitores autem ad solvendas usuras, in quibus se obligaverant, cogi non debent, nisi eas iuramento solvere teneantur. Si vero de ipsarum solutione iuraverint cogendi sunt Domino reddere iuramentum, ut a creditoribus solvantur. Et quum usurae solutae fuerint, creditores ad eas restituendas sunt ecclesiastica severitate, si necesse fuerit, compellendi.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: A debtor who swore to inflict no burden upon the creditor concerning a pledged thing until he paid the debt is not heard when seeking the pledge back and wishing to set off the fruits against the principal; but he ought first to pay the debt in full and then seek the thing together with the fruits received from it. This it says, and it is a notable case.

The same, to the Archbishop of Rouen and his Suffragans.

Know that it has reached our hearing that, when Peter de Neasdem, during the war that existed between our dearest son Henry, illustrious King of the English, and his sons, lent a certain sum of money to certain men of a province of the Kingdom of France, he received from them in pledge certain possessions and revenues, binding them to himself under the sanctity of an oath that they would inflict no burden or molestation upon him concerning those possessions and revenues until they paid him the lent money. Although he has not yet received his principal, as he asserts, from those possessions and the aforesaid revenues after expenses have been deducted, nevertheless, because you, brother Archbishop, bound him with the bond of excommunication on this account, we are therefore compelled to direct our letters to you, especially since he wishes, as he asserts, to be content with [his] principal. Therefore, by commanding you through apostolic writings, we order your fraternity that, having received from the aforesaid P. sufficient security that in this matter he ought to obey your mandate, you shall by our authority wholly absolve him, contradiction and appeal ceasing, from the sentence by which he is bound. Then, if it is so, you shall compel his debtors, who are said to have withdrawn from him the aforesaid possessions and revenues contrary to their oath, by ecclesiastical censure to restore these to the same P., delay and appeal ceasing, and not henceforth inflict molestations upon him contrary to their oath until the money is paid to him, because it is not safe for anyone, but rather dangerous, to violate the sanctity of an oath. But when they have paid his money to him, as they swore, you shall endeavor studiously to admonish and diligently induce him to restore whatever, after expenses have been deducted, it is established before you that he received beyond the principal; and, if after admonition he does not do this, you shall, appeal removed, bring him back under the same sentence of excommunication, because, just as it is dangerous for debtors to violate their oath, so it is no less dangerous for creditors to retain what they have received as usury, since the crime of usury is detestable and exceedingly horrible and condemned by the page of either Testament.

> Debitor, qui iuravit, creditori nullum gravamen super re pignorata inferre, donec solverit debitum, non auditur repetens pignus, volendo compensare fructus in sortem; sed debet prius debitum integraliter solvere, et demum rem cum fructibus inde perceptis exposcere. H. d. et est casus notabilis.
> Idem Rothomagensi Archiepiscopo et eius Suffraganeis.
> Ad nostram noveritis audientiam pervenisse, quod, quum Petrus de Neasdem tempore guerrae, quae fuit inter carissimum filium nostrum Henricum illustrem Anglorum regem et filios eius, quibusdam hominibus provinciae regni Francorum certam summam pecuniae mutuasset, quasdam ab eis possessiones et reditus recepit in pignore, ipsos sub iuramenti religione sibi adstringens, quod super possessionibus et reditibus illis, donec solverent sibi pecuniam mutuatam, nullum ei gravamen vel molestiam inferrent. Licet autem de possessionibus illis et reditibus praefatis nondum sortem suam, sicut asserit, deductis expensis receperit, quia tu tamen, frater archiepiscope, eum propter hoc excommunicationis vinculo adstrinxisti, +exinde cogimur literas vobis nostras destinare, praesertim, quum ipse sicut asserit, [sua] velit esse sorte contentus. Ideoque fraternitati vestrae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus, recepta a praefato P. sufficienti cautione, quod exinde vestro debeat parere mandato, contradictione et appellatione cessante, a sententia, qua tenetur, penitus auctoritate nostra, absolvatis eundem, et deinde debitores eius, qui sibi praedictas possessiones et reditus contra iuramentum suum subtraxisse dicuntur, si ita est, eos ecclesiastica censura cogatis, ut haec eidem P. dilatione et appellatione cessante restituant, nec sibi de cetero contra iuramentum suum molestias inferant, donec ei pecunia persolvatur, quia non est tutum cuilibet, sed periculosum potius religionem infringere iuramenti. Quum autem ei pecuniam suam, sicut iuraverunt, persolverint, vos ipsum ad restituendum, quicquid eum vobis deductis expensis ultra sortem recepisse constiterit, studiose monere et diligenter inducere studeatis, et, si commonitus id non fecerit, in eandem excommunicationis sententiam remota appellatione reducatis eundem, quia, sicut periculosum est debitoribus suum infringere iuramentum, ita non minus periculosum est creditoribus detinere quod pro usuris receperint, quum sit usurarium crimen detestabile et horrendum plurimum, et utriusque testamenti pagina condemnatum.

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: If an oath extorted through fear can be observed without the destruction of eternal salvation, it is to be observed; nevertheless, the Roman Church has been accustomed to absolve from such an oath.

The same, to the Archbishop of Sens.

But if someone, by gravest fear and under the sanctity of an oath, has compelled another to renounce his right and has retained it for himself, because you wished to consult us whether one of them or neither ought to have it, we have determined to respond this to you: it is not safe for anyone to go against his oath unless the oath is such that, if observed, it tends toward the destruction of eternal salvation. Nor do we will by our response to give anyone material for going against his own oath, lest we appear to be authors of perjury. But it is recalled that this was sometimes done in the Roman Church by many of our predecessors: clerics who, under compulsion, abjured the ministry of the church merited the benefit of absolution from the oath, and, in order to restrain the iniquity of those who compelled ecclesiastical men to furnish that oath, they were permitted to minister in the same church.

Si iuramentum per metum extortum servari potest sine interitu salutis aeternae, servandum est; ecclesia tamen Romana consuevit a tali iuramento absolvere.

Idem Senonensi Archiepiscopo.

Si vero aliquis quemquam gravissimo metu sub religione iuramenti suum ius refutare coegerit, ipsumque sibi retinuerit, quia nos consulere voluisti, an alter eorum, vel neuter id habere debeat: hoc tibi duximus respondendum, quod non est tutum, quemlibet contra iuramentum suum venire, nisi tale sit iuramentum, quod servatum vergat in interitum salutis aeternae. Nec nos alicui ex responsione nostra dare materiam volumus veniendi contra iuramentum proprium, ne auctores periurii esse videamur. Verum aliquando in Romana ecclesia a pluribus praedecessoribus nostris factum esse recolitur, quod clerici, qui coacti ministerium ecclesiae abiurarunt, de iuramento absolutionis beneficium meruerunt, et ad coercendam iniquitatem eorum, qui ecclesiasticos viros ad praestandum illud iuramentum compulerant, permissi sunt in eadem ecclesia ministrare.

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: Monks who swear to remain in hostage for a debt of the monastery, and sureties who swear to keep the creditor indemnified, are compelled to observe their oaths.

The same, to the Bishops of Sardinia.

From a certain rescript presented to us, it became manifestly known to us that R., formerly Abbot of Tremiti, agreed with Peter concerning a sum of eight thousand solidi in this manner—(And below:) In addition, the aforesaid abbot gave certain monks as hostages, who swore to observe the agreement, so that, if they failed, other monks would be placed in hostage in their place. Moreover, if the said monks did not keep faith, the abbot gave to the same man V. and his wife as sureties, who are likewise said to have pledged faith. Therefore, we command that you shall take care studiously to admonish the abbot and the monks, and V. and his wife, that, as they swore, they cause the same agreement to be fulfilled; otherwise, you shall prohibit entry into the church to the same abbot and monks, and prohibit divine offices from being celebrated in the land of the aforesaid V. and his wife until worthy satisfaction.

> Ex rescripto quodam, quod nobis est praesentatum, manifeste nobis innotuit, R. quondam abbatem Tremensem cum Petro super summa octo millium solidorum taliter convenisse (Et infra:) Super haec praedictus abbas quosdam ex monachis obsides dedit, qui de observanda conventione iuraverunt, ut, si ipsi deficerent, alii monachi loco eorum in obstagio ponerentur. Insuper, si fidem dicti monachi non servarent, abbas dedit eidem V. et eius uxorem fideiussores, qui similiter fidem praestitisse dicuntur. Ideoque mandamus, quatenus tam abbatem quam monachos, quam V. et uxorem ipsius studiose monere curetis, ut, sicut iurarunt, eandem conventionem faciant adimpleri, alioquin eidem abbati et monachis ingressum interdicatis ecclesiae, et in terra praefati V. et uxoris eiusdem usque ad dignam satisfactionem inhibeatis divina officia celebrari.

Chapter X

Latin source headnote: One who goes against a lawful oath not from necessity but voluntarily is perjured and is to be removed from the church.

The same, to the Bishops of London and Worcester.

We have received the complaint of R., canon of the church of Lincoln, that, when a cleric named V. Savage had paid him two bezants in the name of the church of Statera for very many years, and had confirmed by an interposed oath that he would pay them to him annually, the sanctity of the oath now having been contemned, for two years he has ceased from payment of a pension of this kind. Therefore, because those who are entangled in the crime of perjury do not deserve to rule churches, by commanding you through apostolic writings, we order your fraternity that you shall summon the parties before your presence and take care to inquire more diligently into the truth of the matter concerning these things; and, if it is established to you that the aforementioned V. ceased from payment of the same pension contrary to his oath not from necessity but voluntarily, you shall, by our authority, contradiction and appeal ceasing, remove him from the aforesaid church and not at all delay restoring it to the aforesaid R., and shall cause him to possess it peacefully.

> Periurus est et ab ecclesia removendus qui non necessitate, sed voluntate venit contra licitum iuramentum.
> Idem Lundonensi et Vigoriensi Episcopis.

> Querelam R. canonici Linconiensis ecclesiae accepimus, quod, quum V. Salvagius nomine clericus ei duos Bisantios nomine ecclesiae de Statera annis plurimis persolvisset, et se illos annuatim sibi soluturum interposito sacramento firmasset, contempta religione iuramenti iam per biennium ab huiusmodi pensionis solutione cessavit. Quoniam igitur non merentur ecclesias regere, qui sunt crimine periurii irretiti, fraternitati vestrae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus partes ante vestram praesentiam convocetis, et super his rei veritatem curetis diligentius inquirere, et, si vobis constiterit, memoratum V. contra iuramentum suum non necessitate, sed voluntate ab eiusdem pensionis solutione cessasse, ipsum a praescripta ecclesia auctoritate nostra contradictione et appellatione cessante removentes, eam praefato R. restituere minime differatis, ipsumque faciatis eam pacifice possidere.

Chapter XI

Latin source headnote: If a person presented swears to the presenter to increase an ancient payment and afterward swears the contrary to the person instituting him, the second oath is valid and not the first; nevertheless, he is removed from the church.

Lucius III, to the Bishop of Norwich.

Your fraternity considered that we should be consulted as to which oath is to be followed when religious persons bind certain clerics by the sanctity of an oath to pay a greater pension than customary, or to furnish something [in the name] of the benefice beyond the customary pension; but, when they are instituted by bishops, they swear that they will not increase the ancient and customary pension. We therefore respond briefly to your consultation that, since the later oath is supported by reason and the authority of the Lateran Council, it prejudices the first, which proceeded from greed. Moreover, it is just that clerics [thus entangled] be perpetually excluded from churches because of the perjury that they cannot avoid.

> Si praesentatus iurat praesentanti de antiquo censu augendo, et postea contrarium iurat instituenti, valet secundum, et non primum; tamen ab ecclesia removetur.
>
> Lucius III. Norvicensi Episcopo.
>
> Tua nos duxit fraternitas consulendos, cui standum sit iuramento, quum clericos quosdam religiosi iurisiurandi religione constringunt ad maiorem solito pensionem solvendam, vel praestandum aliquid [nomine] beneficii praeter solitam pensionem; quum autem instituuntur abepiscopis, iurant, quod antiquam pensionem et solitam non augebunt. Tuae igitur consultationi breviter respondemus, quod, quum posterius iuramentum ratione et Lateranensis concilii auctoritate iuvetur, primo praeiudicat, quod de cupiditate processit. Ceterum iustum est, ut clerici [sic perplexi] pro periurio, quod vitare non possunt, ab ecclesiis perpetuo excludantur.

Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: Bishops are to be punished more gravely for perjury than others. This it says. — § 1. An oath not to furnish aid to a relative is unlawful. This it says.

Urban III, to the Archbishop of Pisa.

When a certain—(And below: cf. c. 8, On the Times of Ordinations, I.11.) We respond to your consultation in this way: punishment is to be taken against bishops who have transgressed their oath all the more gravely in proportion as they are eminent in greater dignity and others can more easily be provoked to similar acts by their example. (And below: cf. c. 8, On the Times of Ordinations, I.11.)

§ 1. But those who swear not to speak to father, mother, sister, or brother, or not to furnish them the aid of humanity, are to be absolved from observance of that oath, since it is unlawful and contrary to all reason; nevertheless, a fitting penance is to be imposed upon them for having sworn wrongly concerning this.

Latin source headnote: The oath of a monk abjuring the cloister is not valid, and a grave penance concerning this is imposed upon him.

The same.

As we have learned from the letters of your discretion, R., prior of your monastery and bearer of the present letters, inflamed by the heat of anger, by the rash impulse of a precipitate mind confirmed by oath that he would no longer remain with the monk G. in the cloister of the same monastery, to which he bound himself by the bond of profession. Therefore, to you who ask what is to be done concerning this with regard to the same monk, we respond that, since blessed Benedict in his rule, which nearly all monks profess, altogether prohibits swearing, it was not permitted to the aforesaid monk to make the rash oath, especially since he would break the faith of his profession and make void his purpose of stability. Therefore, your solicitude shall provide concerning him that such a penance be imposed upon him through which he may make satisfaction to almighty God for taking his name in vain, so that anyone else, deterred by his example, may fear to do anything similar; but he himself shall perform his penance with perpetual stability in the cloister, which he could not lawfully abjure, yet in such a way that, because he approached our presence, he is not deprived of the customary portion of the benefit of the rule.

Simplicity, the friend of truth, does not seek to be obscured by any deceits of words or by any coverings of ambiguities. [It is therefore frequently necessary that those things which appear to have been said less fully, and which might generate the scruples of ambiguities although said soundly, should shine forth more clearly through truthful explanation.] On this account, dearest son in the Lord, having heard that a question was moved in the presence of your greatness as to whether it was gathered from the tenor of our rescript that each of your heirs ought to furnish an oath of fealty and homage to each of our successors; having understood also the exposition of our beloved sons A., cardinal priest of the title of the Holy Cross in Jerusalem, and P., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Lawrence in Damaso, legates of the Apostolic See, which was transmitted to us under the attestation of their seals; unwilling to dissent in any way from their sound understanding, we have determined to intimate to the royal serenity that, since our intention is to impose nothing intolerable upon you [and your] heirs, we respond to you in this article in such a way that your heirs who have sworn to us or any of our successors shall not at all be compelled to swear [afterward] to others. Celestine III.

But in that question which in addition to this is placed fifth—namely, whether those who made an oath unwillingly in order to preserve life and property are absolved from the bond of the oath—following the custom of our Church, we judge nothing other than what our predecessors, the Roman Pontiffs Zacharias, Gelasius, Gregory VII, Urban II, and others, are known to have judged, who absolved such persons from the bonds of the oath. Moreover, so that action may be taken more advisedly and material for perjuring themselves be removed from them, it shall not be said to them so expressly that they are not to observe the oaths; but, if they do not attend to them, they are not on that account to be punished as for a mortal crime.

Chapter XVI

Latin source headnote: If the person whose mandate I swore to obey commands me to do something contrary to an oath previously and lawfully made by me, I am not bound to observe it. This it says, adhering to the words of the letter.

Innocent III, to H., S., and M., Citizens of Venice.

Coming to our presence, the beloved son A. [Mengun,] bearer of the present letters, by a humble report explained to us that, when formerly he had been established in the presence of the beloved son, the noble Doge of Venice, together with several others for the discussion of many causes, he contended with M. Maurien., alternately inflicting insults. Because he incurred grave enmities on this account, and you and your other relatives were more vehemently stirred on this account, certain persons who were lovers of either party, placing themselves in the middle, endeavored to recall that disturbance to peace and concord, suggested to the aforesaid A. that, in satisfaction for the injuries, he should swear to obey your mandate. And since he did not believe that he had committed anything of such a kind that something grave ought to be imposed upon him, and had furnished that oath under such confidence, you immediately commanded him under the obligation of the oath that, from the feast of blessed Michael immediately past onward, he should never enter the court of the said doge except when all persons were generally called to court by his edict, or unless it should happen that he was released by the nobleman Count Roger and M. Mauricen., who are said to be absent. But because the same A., who, as he asserts, is a counselor of the said doge and is bound by promise to assist in their right many churches of which he is advocate, would by no means have sworn in this way if he had foreknown that mandate contrary to him, especially since he fears to act against the salvation of his soul, through apostolic writings we command [you] that, for the remedy of your souls, you shall wholly revoke the mandate itself. But if you are unwilling or unable to revoke the mandate itself, know that we have commanded our venerable brother the Patriarch of Grado that, if that mandate conflicts with the prior oath lawfully made, he shall by our authority declare that it is not to be observed. [Given at Civita Castellana, on the fourth day before the Ides of October, 1198.]

Latin source headnote: One who swore to defend a church and, when required, refuses without just cause is perjured, and an appeal does not defend him.

The same, to Master Apollinaris.

You asked the Apostolic See in a brief question whether a person who is bound by oath to preserve and, to the extent possible, defend the rights of some church incurs the guilt of perjury if, when necessity presses, he has been required under the obligation of the oath concerning this and, unwilling to do it, has determined to appeal to the Apostolic See. But we respond to your question in this way: in this article, such an appeal does not excuse the appellant from perjury; rather, unless some difficulty exists on account of which the person required cannot aid the church, he is instead entangled in the fault of perjury. [Given at the Lateran, on the twelfth day before the Kalends of November, 1198.]

Chapter XVIII

Latin source headnote: One who knowingly swears to something unlawful does not need absolution but is bound not to observe it. But if he swore in ignorance, he ought to observe it if it is observable in some lawful manner. If, however, he swore to something lawful that he thought unlawful, he ought to observe the oath, but shall do penance for his depraved intention.

The same, to the Illustrious King of Aragon.

In proportion as we love your person among the other Christian princes with more sincere charity, with so much the more diligent solicitude do we wish to take precaution for the royal serenity, lest anything, which God forbid, threaten it that could redound either to the peril of the soul or detriment of the land. For from the tenor of your letters and those of many prelates, and also of many others dwelling in your kingdom, it became known to us that, when you were hastening with a multitude of armed men against the enemies of Christianity, who at that time occupied the land of Spain by reason of the magnitude of their power, to the aid of our dearest son in Christ, the illustrious King of Castile, certain of your counselors—or rather deceivers—induced your mind to swear, without the assent of the people having been sought, that until a certain time you would preserve your father's coinage, which nevertheless around the time of his death had been defrauded of its lawful weight. But since the same coinage has been so diminished and rendered of lesser value that grave scandal is generated among the people on this account, you, desiring to revoke what you had done indiscreetly and to satisfy the necessity of the people, supplicated us humbly to be absolved from observance of the aforesaid oath, from which you fear that grave peril threatens you and your kingdom.

Concerning this, a diligent investigator, the truth having been discovered, could easily perceive that absolution was not so much necessary as interpretation was to be sought, because, when you made the oath, you believed the coinage to be either false or lawful. If false—which we do not believe concerning the royal serenity—the oath would have been unlawful and in no way to be observed, and penance would have to be imposed upon you for it, since an oath was not instituted to be a bond of iniquity. But if you believed it to be lawful, the oath was lawful and is altogether to be observed. And so that it may be observed blamelessly, we counsel and command that, the coinage that had been defrauded of its lawful weight having been rejected, another coinage be struck under the name of your father, which you shall restore to lawful weight according to the best condition that it had in your father's time, in such a way that [also] the old coinage that had not been falsified from that condition shall be spent equally with it, through which both loss can be avoided and the oath observed. Nevertheless, if perhaps when furnishing the oath you believed that the coinage itself had been diminished from lawful weight, and your conscience reproaches you concerning this, you shall humbly confess your sin to our venerable brother the Bishop of Zaragoza, to whom we write concerning this, and shall devoutly receive and endeavor to fulfill the satisfaction imposed upon you for the unlawful oath. [Given at the Lateran, on the Nones of April, 1199.]

Iurans scienter illicitum, non indiget absolutione, sed tenetur illud non observare. Si vero iuravit ignoranter, debet illud observare, si aliquo licito modo est observabile. Si autem iuravit licitum quod putabat illicitum, debet observare iuramentum, sed de animo depravato aget poenitentiam.

Idem illustri Regi Aragoniae.

Quum autem eadem moneta adeo sit diminuta et minoris valoris effecta, quod grave propter hoc scandalum in populo generatur, tu quod egeras indiscrete cupiens revocare, ac necessitati populi satisfacere, ab observatione iuramenti praedicti, ex quo tibi et regno tuo metuis grave periculum imminere, postulasti suppliciter a nobis absolvi. Super quo diligens indagator veritate comperta potuisset facile intueri, quod non tam erat absolutio necessaria, quam interpretatio requirenda, quoniam, quum iuramentum fecisti, monetam aut falsam, aut legitimam esse credebas. Si falsam, quod de regia serenitate non credimus, iuramentum fuisset illicitum et nullatenus observandum, et pro eo esset tibi poenitentia iniungenda, quum iuramentum non, ut esset iniquitatis vinculum, fuerit institutum. Et ut irreprehensibiliter observetur, consulimus et mandamus, ut reprobata moneta, quae a legitimo pondere fuerat defraudata, alia sub nomine patris tui moneta cudatur, quam ad legitimum pondus reducas, secundum eum statum, quem tempore patris tui habuit meliorem, ita, quod [et] antiqua moneta, quae ab illo statu falsata non fuerat, cum ea pariter expendatur, per quod et dispendium vitari poterit, et iuramentum servari. Verumtamen si forte monetam ipsam in praestatione iuramenti credebas a legitimo pondere diminutam, et tua super hoc conscientia te remordeat, venerabili fratri nostro Caesaraugustano episcopo, cui super hoc scribimus, tuum humiliter confitere peccatum, et satisfactionem iniunctam tibi pro illicito iuramento devote suscipias et studeas adimplere. Chapter XIX

Latin source headnote: An oath furnished to the prejudice of the right of a superior is not valid.

The same, to the Consuls and People of Todi.

When recently your beloved sons, the consuls, came to the Apostolic See, we received them benignly and took care both to admonish [you] paternally and to convene [you] somewhat sharply concerning those matters that are rather frequently reported to us about you. For although, when appeals have been interposed to the Apostolic See, you are bound humbly and devoutly to defer to them, since even secular laws do not deny the benefit of appeal after sentence to persons aggrieved, you, attending to this less than befits you, put into execution sentences suspended by appeal, and, in contempt of the Apostolic See, burden those appealing when aggrieved. But the same consuls took care to explain to us, in your excuse, that, when any of you are called to the office of consul, they confirm by their own oath that they will judge concerning loans and kidnappers according to the custom of your city and will execute within twenty-eight days the things they have judged. Hence they said that, saving an oath of this kind, you were unable to defer to appeals concerning these matters.

But because judges swore to judge according to the laws no less than your consuls according to the custom of your city, and therefore, just as judges could burden subjects contrary to the laws, so also could your consuls contrary to custom, lest we appear to fail the aggrieved even in these matters, through apostolic writings we command and order all of you that, since we will your approved customs to be observed, you shall humbly and devoutly defer to appeals interposed to us, since the aforesaid oath cannot excuse you, in which the right of a superior ought to be understood to be excepted. Therefore, since, as we have learned, after the beloved son S., bearer of the present letters, appealed to the Apostolic See from the sentence of Judge G., you determined to put the sentence itself into execution, placing the adversary of the appellant in possession of the things concerning which the question was being conducted, we nevertheless will and command that you restore the possession itself to the same man. Otherwise, know that we have commanded our venerable brother the Bishop of Nocera through apostolic writings that, admonition having been given beforehand, he shall compel you to this by ecclesiastical censure, appeal removed. [Given at the Lateran, 1200.]

Unde salvo huiusmodi iuramento vos non posse super his appellationibus deferre dicebant. Quia vero non minus iudices secundum leges, quam consules vestri secundum consuetudinem vestrae civitatis iudicare iurarunt, et ideo, sicut iudices contra leges, sic et consules vestri contra consuetudinem possent subditos aggravare, ne in his etiam videamur deesse gravatis, universitati vestrae per apostolica scripta mandamus atque praecipimus, quatenus, quum approbatus consuetudines vestras servari velimus, appellationibus ad nos interpositis deferatis humiliter et devote, quum praedictum iuramentum vos excusare non possit, in quo debet intelligi ius superioris exceptum. Quum ergo, sicut accepimus, postquam dilectus filius S. lator praesentium ad sedem apostolicam a sententia G. iudicis appellavit, sententiam ipsam duxeritis exsecutioni mandandam, in possessionem rerum, de quibus quaestio vertebatur, appellantis adversarium inducentes, volumus nihilominus et mandamus, ut possessionem ipsam restituatis eidem; alioquin noveritis, nos venerabili fratri nostro episcopo Nucerino per apostolica scripta mandasse, ut vos ad id monitione praemissa ecclesiastica censura appellatione remota compellat. Chapter XX

Latin source headnote: One who swears not to recover usury can, notwithstanding the oath, recover it upon a new cause. This it says according to the more notable understanding.

The same, to the Archbishop of Pisa.

Know that it has reached our hearing that, when I. Pellar. and G., his son, had paid no small amount of usury to Peter Soctan., by an oath furnished they confirmed that neither by themselves nor through another would they recover the aforesaid usury, or bring a question concerning it before an ecclesiastical or even a secular judge. And when the creditor himself, established at the point of death, made a testament, he commanded his heirs that they should take care to restore it to all who should reasonably prove that they had given usury to him. Hence, since the aforesaid I. and G. do not attempt to recover the usury because of an oath of this kind, and the heirs of the aforesaid P. neglect to satisfy them concerning the usury, therefore, through apostolic writings, we command your fraternity that you shall cause it to be publicly proposed in the church under penalty of excommunication—or shall propose it—that those who know the truth concerning this shall come forward to put forward testimony; and, if it is lawfully established to you concerning the foregoing through the statements of witnesses or other documents, you shall, admonition having been given beforehand, compel his heirs by ecclesiastical censure, appeal removed, to restore all the usury that their father received from the aforesaid I. and G. [Given at Rome at Saint Peter's, on the Ides of March, 1205.]

Quumque creditor ipse in mortis articulo constitutus condiderit testamentum, suis praecepit heredibus, ut omnibus, qui rationabiliter probarent, se dedisse usuras eidem, ipsas eis restituere procurarent. Chapter XXI

Latin source headnote: A general oath ought, if possible, to be understood in such a way that it does not conflict with law; otherwise, as rash, it does not bind contrary to observance of law.

The same, to the Archbishop of Naples.

Know that it has reached our hearing that some time ago, almost through extortion, an oath of such a kind was furnished by you: that in every cause you ought to observe judicial order. But because, according to canonical traditions, manifest matters do not need an accusation, nor is the judicial order that ought to be observed in other matters to be observed in them; and because, when you swore under the foregoing tenor, you did not have it in mind that on account of this you would go against the canonical sanctions—for otherwise it would have been not an oath but rather perjury, and would not have to be observed for any reason—we, wishing to interpret your oath more benignly so that it accords with canonical institutes, intimate to your fraternity by authority of the present letters that, in manifest and notorious matters, we do not believe that by reason of the foregoing oath you are bound to observe the subtlety of judicial order, which the very reason of law also postulates and requires not to be observed in all respects in such matters. Hence, to one looking subtly, it will appear, and not undeservedly, to proceed from the order of judgments that judicial order is not observed in all respects in the foregoing, although also according to the approved understanding of divine scripture what you swore can rightly be understood as meaning that you would observe judicial order in all causes—namely, in those in which judicial order is to be observed. Therefore, by acting thus, you will both observe the tenor of the oath and not omit the canonical institutes. [Given at the Lateran, on the eighteenth day before the Kalends of December, 1198.]

Latin source headnote: If one oath owed to one person is furnished to another, it is unlawful, and notwithstanding it the oath is to be furnished to the person to whom it is owed.

The same, to the Judge of Cagliari.

We believe that you flourish in such discretion that you understand by yourself that a burden is not remitted but increased when that which is to be furnished to another as a debt is imprudently discharged to someone else. Indeed, when our venerable father the Archbishop of Torres exacted from you in our name an oath of fealty, as he had received a mandate from us, you deferred furnishing it into his hands, asserting that you had furnished an oath of this kind to our venerable brother the Archbishop of Pisa, saving the honor of the Apostolic See. Therefore, since you are bound to make fealty to us and the Roman Church, as even your prudence acknowledges, if you reckon the oath furnished to be contrary to that which is to be furnished to us by you as a debt, you will judge it unlawful and, notwithstanding the unlawful oath, will furnish what is lawfully—indeed, by debt—sought; or, if the oath furnished does not conflict with that to be furnished, you will furnish the latter without difficulty. We therefore admonish and attentively exhort your nobility, and through apostolic writings [to you] command and order that, every excuse and occasion ceasing, into the hands of the same archbishop you shall furnish to us and the Roman Church an oath of fealty. [Given at Ferentino, on the seventeenth day before the Kalends of October, 1203.]

Latin source headnote: One who swore to stand by someone's mandate is not bound to obey if he commands unlawful things, such as that he disinherit his son or abjure his wife.

The same, to the Bishop of Alatri.

Quintavallis, a vicar, intimated to our ears that, when formerly his daughters and Giborga and Venetia, daughters of John Bertius, had come from words even to blows, the same Quintavallis, desiring on the advice of neighboring persons to make satisfaction to those women and their relatives for the injury that his daughters had inflicted upon the other women, furnished an oath that he would obey their mandate for their injury. After receiving the oath from him, they gave him such a mandate under the obligation of the oath: that, if at any time his sons or daughters or his wife should cast some insulting deed or word against those women, the same Quintavallis should disinherit his daughters and sons and remove his own wife from himself. Wherefore, through apostolic writings, we command your fraternity that you shall inquire more diligently into the truth concerning the foregoing, and, if you learn that the matter is so, since the oath was lawful but the mandate unlawful, you shall enjoin upon the aforesaid daughters of John Bertius that they revoke that mandate; otherwise, supported by our authority, you shall declare that he is not bound to observe that mandate. Latin source headnote: Spouses cannot separate themselves, even as to bed and mutual cohabitation, for a light and rash cause, even with the interposition of an oath.

The same, to the Archbishop of Tarragona.

Your fraternity considered that we should be consulted as to what is to be done by you concerning this article, namely, that B. of Bell-lloc and A., his wife, formerly swore to one another that they would never seek one another again; but now he insistently seeks her again, while she on the contrary affirms that she would sooner make herself a Saracen and lose her soul than return to him, but would willingly dismiss the adulterer to whom she adhered after she withdrew from him, and would promise and swear chastity. We therefore, responding to your fraternity concerning this, through apostolic writings command you that you shall attentively admonish and induce both to observe continence. If they wish to promise and observe it, you shall permit each to remain without the other. Otherwise, if the man is unwilling to be continent, you shall compel her, by a sentence of excommunication and with appeal removed, to return to him and remain with the man as his wife, since an oath of this kind was rash and adultery was committed on both sides. Chapter XXV

Latin source headnote: One who swore to contract with a woman can reject her because of supervening fornication or deformity, but not because of preceding fornication or deformity. This it says. — (Moreover, that, etc.:) If a man swore not to accuse his wife, the oath is rash. But if he swore this specifically concerning adultery, he will be able to denounce her, but ought not to accuse her.

The same, to the Archbishop of Genoa.

Just as, if a man had sworn to a woman when he contracted with her that he would always hold her as his lawful wife, he indeed could not dismiss her for fornication that the woman had committed before, but could dismiss her for fornication that she might perpetrate afterward, notwithstanding an oath of this kind, because in it this condition was to be understood—namely, if she did not sin against the law of marriage—so, if someone has sworn that he will take a certain woman as wife, he assuredly cannot object against her preceding fornication, but can object against her subsequent fornication so that he does not take her as spouse, because in that oath this condition ought to be understood—namely, if she does not go against the rule of betrothal. Otherwise, if after an oath of this kind she became a public prostitute, he would be bound to take her as wife, which is utterly absurd. For if, after marriage has been contracted, a man can lawfully dismiss a wife from his cohabitation because of fornication, much more strongly, before marriage has been celebrated, a betrothed man can lawfully refuse to admit a betrothed woman into his cohabitation for the same cause, because a guest is more shamefully cast out than not admitted; notwithstanding in either case the bond of the oath, which indeed, because of the condition to be understood, is of such a kind that the person who swore can comport himself toward either outcome without transgression.

But if, after an oath of this kind, the woman became not only leprous but also paralytic, or lost her eyes or nose, or something more shameful befell her, would the man be bound to take her as wife? Certainly, he could not dismiss her once taken. But would he be bound to admit her when not taken, although that which sometimes does not dissolve a contract impedes a contract to be made?

Moreover, that oath is undoubtedly rash if a man swears to his wife that he will accuse her of no crime, because, if the woman should become an unbeliever and should be unwilling to cohabit with the man without insult to the Creator, or [should seek] to draw him into the error of unbelief, then the man ought without hesitation to accuse her before his judge so that, unless she came entirely to her senses, he should dismiss her altogether according to the canonical sanctions. But if he had expressly sworn that he would not accuse her concerning adultery, would an oath of this kind have to be observed, since scripture testifies that he who conceals the crime of his wife is a patron of turpitude, and according to the rule of the Gospel, if after being corrected a first and second time she were unwilling to come to her senses, it would have to be told to the Church, so that she would thereafter be avoided as a heathen and a publican, and through this a free faculty of sinning would not be furnished to her because of the impunity of sin? But can a man not forgive his wife who sins against him, not only seven times but even seventy-seven times, according to the truth of the Gospel? It therefore appears safer in this case that, because of the sanctity of the oath, the man desist from accusing his wife for the pronouncement of a separation, although he can denounce her for the performance of penance. Therefore, having weighed the tenor of this response, you shall proceed in the cause concerning which you determined to consult us. [Given at Viterbo, on the Kalends of September, in the tenth year, 1207.]

> Is, qui iuravit cum muliere contrahere, propter supervenientem fornicationem vel deformitatem eam repellere potest; propter praecedentem non. H. d. - (Illud autem etc.:) Si vir iuravit non accusare uxorem, temerarium est iuramentum. Sed si specialiter de adulterio hoc iuravit, denunciare poterit; sed accusare non debet.
>
> Idem Genuensi Archiepiscopo.
> Quemadmodum, si vir mulieri iurasset, quando contraxit cum illa, quod eam semper pro legitima uxore teneret, ipse quidem pro fornicatione, quam mulier antea commisisset, non posset eam dimittere, sed pro fornicatione, quam postea perpetraret eam dimittere posset non obstante huiusmodi iuramento, quoniam in eo talis erat subintelligenda conditio, si videlicet in legem coniugii illa non peccaret, ita, si quis iuraverit, se ducturum aliquam in uxorem, ipse profecto non potest ei fornicationem opponere praecedentem, sed subsequentem ei potest opponere, ut illam non ducat in coniugem, quia in illo iuramento talis debet conditio subintelligi, si videlicet illa contra regulam desponsationis non venerit. Alioquin si post huiusmodi iuramentum publica meretrix fieret, teneretur eam ducere in uxorem, quod est prorsus absurdum. Nam si post contractum coniugium vir propter fornicationem licite potest uxorem a sua cohabitatione dimittere, longe fortius ante coniugium celebratum propter eandem causam sponsus licite potest in suam cohabitationem non admittere sponsam, quia turpius eiicitur quam non admittitur hospes, non obstante in alterutro casu vinculo iuramenti, quod quidem propter subintelligendam conditionem est tale, ut is, qui iuravit, ad utrumque sine transgressione se possit habere. Quod si post huiusmodi iuramentum mulier fieret non solum leprosa, sed etiam paralytica, vel oculos vel nasum amitteret, seu quicquam ei turpius evenerit, numquid vir teneretur eam ducere in uxorem? Profecto ductam non posset dimittere. Sed numquid non ductam admittere teneretur, quamvis interdum contractum non dirimat, quod impedit contrahendum? Illud autem iuramentum est proculdubio temerarium, si vir iuret uxori, quod eam super nullo crimine accusabit, quia, si mulier fierit infidelis, et nollet cohabitare viro absque contumelia creatoris, vel ut illum pertraheret ad infidelitatis errorem, tunc vir incunctanter deberet illam impetere apud iudicem suum, ut eam, nisi penitus resipisceret, omnino dimitteret, secundum canonicas sanctiones. Quodsi expresse iurasset, quod eam super adulterio non impeteret, essetne servandum huiusmodi iuramentum, quum scriptura testetur, quod patronus est turpitudinis qui celat crimen uxoris, et secundum regulam evangelii, si primo et secundo correcta resipiscere nollet, dicendum esset ecclesiae, ut tanquam ethnica et publicana deinde vitaretur, nec per hoc libera praeberetur ei peccandi facultas propter impunitatem peccati? Sed numquid vir non potest dimittere uxori in ipsum peccanti non solum septies, sed etiam usque septuagies septies secundum evangelicam veritatem? Tutius ergo in hoc casu videtur, ut propter iurisiurandi religionem vir accusare desistat uxorem ad divortium celebrandum, quanquam denunciare eam possit ad poenitentiam peragendam. Pensato itaque huius responsionis tenore procedas in causa, super qua nos consulere decrevisti. [Dat. Viterbii Kal. Sept. Ao. X. 1207.]

Chapter XXVI

Latin source headnote: An oath is lawfully made from a necessary cause, even by religious persons.

The same, to the Abbot and Chapter of Châtillon.

Although Christ commanded according to the truth of the Gospel [that] your speech be "yes, yes," and "no, no," [that is,] that an affirmation or negation should proceed from the heart just as it proceeds from the mouth, nevertheless, because as human malice grows a simple assertion or negation is scarcely believed, he therefore prudently added: "What is more than this is from evil." From evil indeed, not so much of fault as of punishment; and not of those furnishing the oath but of those exacting it. For unbelief of this kind is more punishment than fault. Hence he did not say "evil," but said "from evil."

For although the Lord appears to have prohibited an oath, he nowhere prohibited swearing by the Creator, but by a creature, lest through an oath of this kind the honor of the Creator be transferred to a creature. Wherefore, when in the Gospel he had premised, "I say to you, do not swear at all," he immediately added: "neither by heaven, because it is the throne of God; nor by earth, because it is his footstool; nor by Jerusalem, because it is the city of the great king; nor by your head, because you cannot make one hair white or black." And although one must not swear by a creature, nevertheless, if one swears by a creature, it is indeed to be observed, provided that what is sworn is lawful, because, as Truth testifies, "he who swears by heaven swears by the throne of God and by him who sits upon it."

James also does not simply prohibit an oath, but "the will to swear," when he says: "Before all things, my brothers, do not swear," since spontaneous will ought not to induce anyone to an oath, [because one who swears easily perjures himself easily,] but pressing necessity ought to draw him. And then you can swear without fault, provided the oath has those three companions concerning which the Prophet speaks thus: "And they shall swear, 'The Lord lives,' in truth, judgment, and justice, and all shall bless him and praise him." But when James adds, "neither by heaven, nor by earth, nor by any other oath whatsoever," he forbids swearing by any creature, whatever it may be. Otherwise, the Apostle would not have said: "Men swear by one greater than themselves, and an oath for confirmation is the end of all their controversy." In this he plainly shows by whom one is to swear, when he says, "Men swear by one greater than themselves," that is, by God; and why one is to swear, namely, that an oath may be the end of all controversy.

The angel also whom John saw in the Apocalypse standing upon the sea and upon the earth lifted his hand to heaven and swore by him who lives for ever and ever. Christ also is read to have said more in the Gospel than "yes, yes," "no, no," since he very frequently said, "Amen, I say to you." Explaining this according to Luke, when he had premised, "Amen, I say to you, that no prophet is accepted in his own country," he consequently added: "In truth I say to you, that there were many widows in Israel in the days of Elijah." The Apostle also swore when he said, "God is my witness," and again, "I die daily by your glory, brothers." The Greek copies show these words to be a most manifest oath.

For if to swear were evil in itself, assuredly the Lord would not have sworn, although in the Old Testament it is read: "Because the Lord has sworn and will not repent," and again: "The Lord swore truth to David and will not frustrate him"; indeed, he also commanded in the Old Testament: "Render your oaths to God." For some things are prohibited because they are evil in themselves, such as theft, adultery, and things of this kind, which are not to be done in any way. But some things are prohibited because of a cause, not because they are evil in themselves, but because, if they are done frequently and much, evils follow from them. Thus wine is not [indeed] evil in itself, and nevertheless the Apostle prohibits it, saying: "Do not become drunk with wine, in which there is wantonness," since wantonness is generated from frequent and immoderate drinking of wine. So also an oath is indeed not evil in itself, since it is a confirmation of truth, but nevertheless it is prohibited for a cause, because perjury often occurs from frequent and incautious swearing, as is read in Ecclesiasticus: "A man who swears much will be filled with iniquity, and a plague will not depart from his house."

Therefore, just as Paul permitted his disciple [namely] Timothy, on account of necessity, to use a little wine because of his stomach and frequent infirmities, so assuredly, when necessity exacts it, one can safely swear concerning a true, lawful, and honorable matter, because when the cause ceases the effect ceases. Therefore, although you ought to be perfect men, so that, insofar as you can, you avoid the bond of an oath, nevertheless, wishing with paternal solicitude to provide for the indemnity of your monastery, lest through a deficiency of witnesses it sustain injury to its right, by the authority of him who says in the Gospel, "If your brother sins against you, correct him between you and him alone; and, if he does not hear you, take with you two or three witnesses, so that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may stand," by the present page we grant to you that you and the lay brothers of your monastery may in its causes, when other witnesses are lacking, bear testimony to the truth on its behalf. [Let no one therefore, etc. Given at Rome at Saint Peter's, on the twelfth day before the Kalends of April, in the ninth year, 1206.]

Licite ex causa necessaria etiam per religiosos iuratur.

Idem Abbati et Capitulo Castellionis.

Etsi Christus praeceperit secundum evangelicam veritatem [ut] sit sermo vester: est est et non non, [id est,] ut affirmatio vel negatio, sicut procedit ex ore, ita procedat ex corde, quia tamen hominum excrescente malitia simplici assertioni vel negationi vix creditur, idcirco prudenter adiunxit: «quod amplius est, a malo est.» A malo quidem, non tam culpae, quam poenae; nec exhibentium, sed exigentium iuramentum. Nam incredulitas huiusmodi magis est poena, quam culpa. Unde non dixit «malum,» sed dixit: «a malo.» Licet enim iuramentum prohibuisse Dominus videatur, nusquam tamen per creatorem, sed per creaturam iurare prohibuit, ne per huiusmodi iuramentum transferretur ad creaturam honorificentia creatoris. Quare quum in evangelio praemisisset: «Dico vobis, nolite iurare omnino,» statim subiunxit: «neque per coelum, quia thronus Dei est; neque per terram, quia scabellum pedum ipsius est; neque per Hierosolymam, quia civitas est regis magni; neque per caput tuum, quia non potes unum capillum facere album aut nigrum.» Et quamvis non sit per creaturam iurandum, si tamen iuretur per creaturam, servandum est quidem, dummodo sit licitum quod iuratur, quia, teste veritate, «qui iurat in coelo, iurat in throno Dei, et in eo, qui sedet super eum.» Iacobus quoque non simpliciter prohibet iuramentum, sed «voluntatem iurandi,» quum ait: «Ante omnia, fratres mei, nolite iurare,» quoniam ad iuramentum non debet quemquam spontanea voluntas inducere, [quia qui facile iurat facile peierat,] sed necessitas trahere importuna. Et tunc potes sine culpa iurare; dummodo illos tres comites habeat iuramentum, de quibus Propheta sic ait: «Et iurabunt, vivit Dominus, in veritate, et iudicio, et iustitia, et benedicent eum omnes, ipsumque laudabunt. Quod autem Iacobus subdit: «neque per coelum, neque per terram, neque per quodcunque aliud iuramentum,» iurare vetat per quamlibet creaturam, quodcunque sit illud. Alioquin non dixisset Apostolus: «Homines per maiorem suum iurant, et omnis controversiae eorum ad confirmationem finis est iuramentum.» In quo patenter ostendit, per quem sit iurardum, quum ait: «homines per maiorem suum iurant,» id est, per Deum, et cur sit iurandum, ut videlicet omnis controversiae finis sit iuramentum. Angelus quoque, quem vidit in Apocalypsi Ioannes stantem super mare et super terram, levavit manum suam ad coelum, et iuravit per viventem in saecula saeculorum. Christus etiam plus legitur dixisse in evangelio, quam est est, non non, quum saepissime dixerit: «Amen dico vobis.» Quod ipse secundum Lucam exponens, quum praemisisset: «amen dico vobis, quia nemo propheta acceptus est in patria sua,» consequenter adiunxit: «in veritate dico vobis, quia multae viduae erant in diebus Heliae in Israel.» Apostolus quoque iurabat, quum diceret: «Testis est mihi Deus,» et iterum: «Quotidie morior per gloriam vestram, fratres.» Quae graeca exemplaria manifestissimam iurationem esse ostendunt. Si enim per se malum esset iurare; profecto Dominus non iurasset, quum tamen in veteri testamento legatur: «Quia iuravit Dominus, et non poenitebit eum,» et rursum: «Iuravit Dominus David veritatem, et non frustrabitur eum;» immo et praecepit in veteri testamento: «Redde Deo iuramenta tua.» Quaedam enim prohibentur, quia per se mala sunt, ut furtum, adulterium et huiusmodi, quae non sunt aliquatenus facienda. Quaedam vero prohibentur ex causa, non quia per se mala sunt, sed quia, si fiant frequenter et multum, ex his mala sequuntur, ut vinum per se [quidem] malum non est, et tamen prohibet Apostolus dicens: «Nolite inebriari vino, in quo est luxuria,» quoniam ex frequenti et immoderata potatione vini luxuria generatur. Sic et iuramentum per se quidem malum non est, quum sit confirmatio veritatis, sed tamen prohibetur ex causa, quoniam ex frequenti et incauta iuratione periurium saepe contingit, sicut in Ecclesiastico legitur: «Vir multum iurans replebitur iniquitate, et non discedet a domo eius plaga.» Quemadmodum ergo Paulus indulsit propter necessitatem discipulo suo, [videlicet] Timotheo, ut utatur modico vino propter stomachum et frequentes infirmitates, sic profecto, quum necessitas exigit, pro re vera, licita et honesta potest secure iurari, quia cessante causa cessat effectus. Licet ergo debeatis esse viri perfecti, ut, quantum potestis, iuramenti vinculum evitetis, volentes tamen indemnitati vestri monasterii paterna sollicitudine providere, ne propter defectum testium sui iuris sustineat laesionem, eius auctoritate, qui dicit in evangelio: «Si peccaverit in te frater tuus, corripe eum inter te et ipsum solum, et, si non audierit te, adhibe tecum duos vel tres testes, ut in ore duorum vel trium testium stet omne verbum,» praesenti vobis pagina indulgemus, quatenus vos et monasterii vestri conversi possitis in causis eiusdem, deficientibus aliis testibus, pro ipso perhibere testimonium veritati. Latin source headnote: An oath furnished contrary to ecclesiastical utility does not bind.

The same, to the Bishop of Amelia.

As was intimated to our ears, when the Church of Todi was some time ago vacant, its canons—and our venerable brother the Bishop of Todi with them, while he was established in minor orders—made certain oaths to the detriment of episcopal right before any discussion was had concerning the election of a pontiff, as to whether they ought to be observed, especially since it would happen from them that episcopal revenues would be diminished, the same bishop, as a provident and discreet man, formerly considered that we should be consulted. We therefore, wishing with paternal solicitude to provide for his salvation, caused a fitting penance to be imposed upon the bishop for the incautious swearing. And nevertheless, considering that an oath was not instituted to be a bond of iniquity, and because things attempted contrary to ecclesiastical utility are to be called not oaths but rather perjuries, through apostolic writings we command your fraternity that, personally approaching the Church of Todi, you shall inquire more diligently from the canons themselves into the truth concerning the foregoing; and, if you find that the things said above are true, you shall, supported by our authority and with appeal removed, reduce to its due state whatever you find to have been attempted in this manner to the detriment of episcopal right, causing what you decree to be firmly observed through ecclesiastical censure.

Chapter XXVIII

Latin source headnote: An oath furnished concerning an act invalidated by law principally in favor of the person swearing, although secondarily in the public interest, necessarily is to be observed if it was furnished neither by force nor fraud and does not principally redound to the prejudice of another. This it says, with the core of the chapter considered in a very singular manner.

The same.

Since it sometimes happens in your diocese that, while a marriage continues, women [spontaneously] consent to alienations concerning dotal property and donations given to them on account of marriage, confirming by their own oath that they will not afterward contravene them, and, after the marriage is dissolved in the course of time, endeavor to contravene them, your fraternity asked us whether this is permitted to them. But we respond to your fraternity in this way: although the consent of women in such matters does not appear obligatory according to the lawful sanctions, nevertheless, lest under such a pretext it happen that a way is opened to perjuries, the women themselves ought to observe oaths of this kind, furnished willingly and in good faith, without force and fraud, since they do not redound to the prejudice of another, nor, when observed, tend toward loss of eternal salvation. Latin source headnote: One who initiates an unjust war is compelled to restore the things he occupied through violence and to absolve those from whom he unduly extorted oaths. This it says as far as the words "But the oath." — § 1. No one is bound by an oath to fulfill what he swore if the other party, with respect to whom the oath was furnished, does not fulfill [his part].

Latin source headnote: Clerics who do not hold temporal things from laymen are not bound to furnish them oaths of fealty.

The same, in the general council.

Laymen indeed strive to usurp too much of divine right when they compel ecclesiastical men who hold nothing temporal from them to furnish oaths of fealty to them. But because, according to the Apostle, a servant stands or falls to his own lord, by authority of the sacred council we prohibit clerics of this kind from being compelled to furnish such oaths to secular persons.

Latin source headnote: One who swears not to be against someone can be against him in causes belonging to himself and his church. This it says according to the understanding of the gloss.

Honorius III, to A. and C., Canons of Antioch.

Your petition exhibited to us contained that, while the Church of Antioch was vacant, the nobleman R., Prince of Antioch, fearing that certain conspiracies would be made against him, extorted from you an oath that henceforth you would not be against him. But since the same prince has frequent disputes against the church itself, you can neither fail the church without its detriment nor dare to assist it lest you appear to act contrary to the said oath. Wherefore you humbly supplicated us that we should deign to provide concerning these matters with paternal solicitude. We therefore, providing equally for the utility of the same church, your salvation and reputation, and the honor of the said prince, declare by a fitting interpretation that you are not bound by an oath of this kind so that you cannot stand freely against the prince himself in lawfully defending the rights and honors of the church itself, and also your own particular rights, restraining you only from a machination through which the same prince ought to incur injury to his person or loss of his principality. We therefore decree that, when necessary, by resisting the said prince for defense of the right or honor of the often-mentioned church or of yourselves, you are subject through this to no mark or calumny.

Latin source headnote: When the matter concerns usury, a judge can at any part of the litigation, proofs being deficient, exact from the parties by his office an oath to tell the truth. And by the same reasoning the same applies in any cause in which sin threatens. This it says according to Panormitanus.

The same, to the Archdeacon and Master G., Canon of Toul.

We have learned from your letters that, in the cause concerning usury committed to you by the Apostolic See for G., a knight of Rossuel, against E., a knight of Épinal in the Diocese of Toul, the quantity of the principal could not become clear to you through witnesses produced by the party of G. himself, although the obligation of the pledge was established. Hence you see it to be expedient that an oath to tell the truth be exacted from the parties, since it is held as virtually notorious from report that the aforesaid E. received the principal and more from a certain land of G. himself obligated to him by title of pledge. Therefore, lest justice succumb with the truth concealed through the lack of an oath of this kind, we command your discretion that, if it is so, you shall compel the parties by ecclesiastical censure, appeal removed, to furnish an oath of this kind.

Unde expedire videtis, quod exigatur de dicenda veritate a partibus iuramentum, quum ex fama quasi notorium habeatur, praefatum E. ex quadam terra ipsius G. sibi titulo pignoris obligata sortem et amplius percepisse. Ne igitur ex huiusmodi iuramenti defectu iustitia occultata veritate succumbat, discretioni vestrae mandamus, quatenus, si est ita, partes ad praestandum huiusmodi iuramentum per censuram ecclesiasticam appellatione remota cogatis.

Latin source headnote: If one placed in a dignity alienates the goods of the dignity, the alienation is not valid; and he himself ought to revoke it, notwithstanding an oath not to revoke it, especially if he first swore not to alienate. This it says according to the true understanding. Panormitanus.

The same, to the Archbishop of Kalocsa and his Suffragans.

Having understood some time ago that our dearest son in Christ, the illustrious King of Hungary, made certain alienations to the prejudice of his kingdom and contrary to the honor of the king, we, desiring to counsel him concerning this with paternal affection, direct our writings to the same king that he shall endeavor to revoke the aforesaid alienations, notwithstanding an oath, if he made any, not to revoke them, because, since he is bound, and also swore at his coronation, to preserve inviolate the rights of his kingdom and the honor of the crown, an oath not to revoke alienations of this kind was assuredly unlawful if he furnished it, and is therefore not at all to be observed.

Latin source headnote: If a woman swore that someone was her husband and lost her case because she did not prove it otherwise, permission to contract with another is neither given nor denied to her.

Gregory IX, to the Bishop of Le Mans.

To a woman who asserted at law, under an oath furnished, that a certain man had consented matrimonially to her through words of the present tense, but who had no other proofs, the man having been absolved from her claim by sentence, you ought not to give permission to contract marriage with another, lest you appear an author of perjury. Nor do we say that this is to be prohibited to her, lest perhaps, if she swore falsely, it should happen that a lawful marriage is impeded; but it is rather to be left to her own conscience.

Latin source headnote: One who swore to observe statutes already issued and afterward, by that oath without swearing otherwise, promised to observe statutes to be issued or afterward issued is not bound by the oath to those newly issued. This it says according to the true understanding.

Latin source headnote: A decisory oath in litigation tendered by a judge cannot be refused without just cause; but one tendered by a party is lawfully refused and referred back; nevertheless, in an infamous action it is not permitted to the defendant to refer it back. This it says as far as § Certainly. — § 1. When the claimant proves nothing, the defendant is to be absolved without any burden; but if there is a presumption for [the claimant], an oath is tendered to the defendant or to the claimant himself, after consideration of the circumstances of the persons and the cause. This it says.

The same, to Judge H.

An oath tendered by you to a party could not be refused except for a just cause, although an oath tendered in judgment by one party to another can be lawfully refused and referred back; nor is it permitted to the person convened in an infamous action to refer back an oath of this kind.

§ 1. Certainly, if the claimant has wholly failed in proof, the defendant ought to prevail even if he has furnished nothing; but if a presumption makes for the claimant, an oath can be tendered to the defendant to show his innocence, unless the judge, after inspecting the circumstances of the persons and of the cause, sees that it should be tendered to the claimant.

Sane, si actor omnino in probatione defecerit, reus debet, et si nihil praestiterit, obtinere; praesumptione vero faciente pro illo, reo deferri potest ad ostendendam suam innocentiam iuramentum, nisi iudex inspectis personarum et causae circumstantiis illud actori videat deferendum.

Title XXV: On Exceptions

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: If a witness is convicted of a crime excepted against him, or appears to have been convicted otherwise, he is repelled from testimony; but he is not punished for the crime if it does not touch the principal matter.

Celestine III.

Finally, as to the fact that objections can be made against the statements and persons of witnesses against whom nothing was objected before their oath or depositions, after the attestations have been published, know that this has obtained by long custom in the Roman Church: that before the oath or depositions and afterward, a lawful exception [at law] can be objected against the statements and persons of witnesses. And, if crimes are objected against witnesses concerning which they had not hitherto been accused, but which are only opposed by way of exception by anyone, proof certainly of those crimes is to be exhibited before the cause is terminated by sentence, since, as the canonical institutes declare, witnesses without any infamy, suspicion, or manifest stain are required in giving testimony. But if only [those] crimes concerning which at another time they were convicted or confessed are objected against witnesses, they can be repelled from testimony, because, as Pope Stephen and many other Roman Pontiffs testify, their confession is not to be believed against others unless they first prove themselves innocent. Moreover, if witnesses have been convicted of or confessed crimes objected against them solely by way of exception, they ought not to be punished by the ordinary penalty, since an accusation does not proceed against them according to the order of law. It therefore suffices if they are repelled from giving testimony, especially where the crime objected against them does not appear to touch the cause at issue.

> De exceptionibus.
>
> Si testis de crimine contra eum excepto convincitur, vel alias convictus apparet, repellitur a testimonio; sed de crimine non punitur, si non tangit negotium principale.
>
> Coelestinus III.
>
> Denique, quod in dicta et personas testium, +quibus ante iuramentum vel depositiones nihil obiectum fuit, post attestationes publicatas possit opponi, hoc in Romana ecclesia de longa consuetudine obtinuisse cognoscas, ut ante iuramentum vel depositiones et post, in dicta et personas testium legitima exceptio [in iure] possit opponi. Et, Si crimina testibus obiiciuntur, de quibus non fuerant hactenus accusati, sed tantum per exceptionem a quolibet opponuntur, probatio utique illorum criminum exhibenda est, antequam causa per sententiam terminetur, quum, sicut canonica instituta declarant, testes absque ulla infamia, vel suspicione vel manifesta macula in ferendo testimonio requirantur. Quodsi sola [illa] crimina, de quibus alio tempore convicti vel confessi fuerunt, testibus obiiciuntur, a testimonio repelli possunt, quia, sicut Stephanus Papa et alii Pontifices multi Romani testantur, non est credendum contra alios eorum confessioni, nisi prius se probaverint innocentes. Ceterum si de criminibus ad solam exceptionem obiectas testes convicti fuerint sive confessi, poena ordinaria mulctari non debent, quum accusatio in ipsos secundum iuris ordinem non procedat. Sufficit ergo, si a perhibendo testimonio repellantur, praesertim ubi crimen, quod eis obiicitur, causam, de qua agitur, contingere non videtur.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: When the defendant excepts against the claimant on account of excommunication, a replication of communion does not obstruct him.

Innocent III, to the Archdeacon of Richmond.

It was asked of us on your behalf whether one who knowingly communicates with an excommunicated person in speech or prayer can repel the excommunicated person himself from his accusation when the latter replicates a communion of this kind against him. We therefore respond to your inquiry in this way: the excommunicated person himself can be removed from accusing the other, since the first is excluded from the communion of the faithful, while the second is removed only from participation in the sacraments.

> Reo excipiente de excommunicatione contra actorem, non obstat communionis replicatio.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: One who has several benefices does not except against another concerning plurality. This it says. Johannes Andreae.

The same, to the Bishop of Aosta.

Since the office of ecclesiastical provision, [to which, although unworthy, we have been called by the Lord's disposition, has, according to the word of the Apostle, established us as debtors to the wise and the unwise, it thus befits us to discuss with subtle investigation the questions brought to the notice of our apostolate, to terminate them by judgment or through reasonable settlement, and to commit for decision by others, on our authority, those that we cannot [decide] ourselves, so that no one may be able to complain in the sight of the Apostolic See that he has suffered a failure of his right, and so that we may appear, as we are bound by the care of pastoral solicitude, to judge just things and love justice.]

For both the messengers of the chapter of Novara and the same cleric Jacob approached the Apostolic See because of the question being conducted between the beloved sons, the chapter of Novara and Jacob the cleric, concerning a prebend of the Church of Novara. And while either party was established in our presence and that of our brothers, it was alleged in our auditorium on behalf of Jacob in this way: [that, when formerly by mandate of F., of good memory, cardinal priest of the title of Saint Marcellus, then legate of the Apostolic See, he had been invested with the first prebend then to become vacant in the Church of Novara, a stall in the choir and a place in the chapter having been assigned to him, and afterward the son of the beloved son Saxo Vulgaminus, a noble Roman citizen, had been admitted to it by authority of the Apostolic See—who suffered molestations and oppressions from the relatives of the aforesaid Jacob concerning possession and fruits of the prebend itself—at length an amicable settlement concerning those fruits intervened between Jacob himself and the aforesaid nobleman, because silence had been imposed upon Jacob himself concerning the prebend so that he could move no further question concerning it. At length it pleased C., our predecessor of good memory, after considering the labors and expenses of the aforesaid Jacob, at the prayers of certain cardinals, to confer upon him the prebend of the Church of Novara that had belonged to Master B. de Suno and to invest him with it by his own hand through a ring, strictly commanding the chapter of Novara that, notwithstanding the election that they had made concerning several persons to be assumed as canons in the Church of Novara, the constitution that they had made concerning the fruits of prebends—all of which our same predecessor had invalidated by the counsel of the brothers—and any alienation, obligation, or assignment of the same prebend, they should, every difficulty set aside and appeal postponed, receive Jacob himself as a brother and canon in the name of the said prebend, place him in corporal possession of the prebend itself, and assign him a stall in the choir and a place in the chapter. Otherwise, they should know that our beloved provost of Saint Gaudentius of Novara, our subdeacon, and R., canon of Gorgonzola, had been firmly commanded by our predecessor himself that they should not delay executing these things by canonical coercion, appeal postponed. We plainly perceived all these things to be contained in the letters of our same predecessor. And when the said canons passed by the apostolic mandates and commands with deaf ears, the aforesaid executors, having heard whatever was proposed on behalf of the canons and received it reduced to writing, after many admonitions and delays sought by them, having taken counsel with prudent men and decreeing that the exceptions of the canons were not to be admitted, assigned to Jacob himself, according to the tenor of the apostolic mandate, a stall in the choir and a place in the chapter; and one of the executors, namely R. de Gorgonzola, by the mandate and will of the other, placed him in corporal possession of the prebend and, after very many admonitions, bound the aforesaid canons with the bond of excommunication unless within fifteen days they obeyed the apostolic mandate, as is contained in the instruments that he exhibited to us.]

But the canons of Novara, responding on the contrary, alleged very many exceptions by which they intended in every way to repel Jacob himself from receipt of the prebend, [saying that, through the letters that Jacob himself had obtained from the aforesaid Cardinal F., he had been invested with the prebend after an appeal had lawfully been interposed; that our aforesaid predecessor invalidated what had been done concerning him by the cardinal; and that after the annulment had been made, contrary to apostolic prohibition, he did not fear to invade the fruits of the prebend by his own authority. Moreover, he obtained the investiture of the prebend and letters of execution from our predecessor through false suggestion, because he did not disclose that he was beneficed in another church, nor did he say that for those two prebends that were vacant in the Church of Novara—one of which had belonged to Master R. and the other to Master P., now Bishop of Novara but then a canon—a priest and another who ought soon to be ordained priest had, with discretion granted to two persons before that general ordinance was made, been concordantly elected and admitted in the Church of Novara. Furthermore, many other things were proposed on either side that we did not order to be intermingled with the present letters. Therefore, wishing to preserve each person's justice unharmed, because certainty concerning the foregoing could not be given to us as was fitting, by the counsel of our brothers we determined to commit the fact itself to your fraternity; through apostolic writings] we command that [the parties having been summoned to your presence, unless within two months it shall lawfully be established to you that the aforesaid priest and the other who ought soon to be ordained priest were canonically elected and admitted to those two prebends before that general ordinance annulled by authority of the Apostolic See, by our authority and with the obstacle of any contradiction and appeal removed,] notwithstanding the other exceptions, you shall cause Jacob himself to enjoy peaceful possession of that prebend with which he is known to have been invested by Celestine, our predecessor, especially since those who are established to obtain various benefices in different churches cannot oppose against him that exception, that the aforesaid Jacob possesses a benefice in another church. [But those, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the fifth day before the Nones of March, 1198.]

Latin source headnote: An excommunicated person can make an exception, appeal, and make every defense; but he cannot bring a counterclaim.

The same, to the Monks of Farfa.

When a question was being conducted before you by our delegation concerning damages and other matters between the beloved sons, the prior and convent of Argenteuil, on one side, and the nobleman S. de Mauléon of the Diocese of Poitiers on the other, and the proctor of that nobleman wished to decline your judgment because he held two of you suspect, the proctor of the monastery alleged that the benefit of an exception of this kind was forbidden to the party of the same nobleman because he was bound by the bond of excommunication. For since an excommunicated person, lest he receive an advantage from contumacy, can be convened, if he could have free recourse to exceptions, that which was introduced in his disfavor would very often be drawn to his favor. Hence you sought to be instructed by the oracle of the Apostolic See how you ought to proceed in this article of doubt. To this we have determined to respond to your inquiry that lawful defense in judgment is reserved to the aforesaid nobleman, and especially recusation of a judge, since it is dangerous to litigate before a suspect judge, and the Apostolic See does not knowingly commit a cause to suspect judges. Hence, in such matters the favor of the excommunicated person is not considered, but the equity of the person judging, since judgment ought not to limp, and it appears sufficiently absurd if, while the claimant attacks, an opportunity for defense is denied to the defendant, because in this way one who ought to be absolved would often be condemned. Furthermore, since a just sentence is not to be denied to an excommunicated person when he exists in a cause of absolution, nor ought the remedy of appeal to be forbidden to him if he is condemned contrary to justice, we do not see by what reason other lawful supports should be withdrawn from him in one and the same matter. But we do not think thus concerning a counterclaim, lest that which is sustained as a remedy of defense be extended to material for attack.

Excommunicatus excipere, appellare, et omnem defensionem facere potest; sed reconvenire non potest.

Idem Monachis Farsensibus.

Quum inter dilectos filios priorem et conventum de Argentolio ex parte una, et nobilem virum S. de Malileone dioecesis Pictaviensis ex altera super damnis et aliis coram vobis ex delegatione nostra quaestio verteretur, procuratore ipsius nobilis vestrum volente declinare iudicium, eo, quod duos ex vobis habebat suspectos, procurator monasterii allegavit, parti eiusdem nobilis, quum esset vinculo excommunicationis adstrictus, exceptionis huiusmodi beneficium interdictum. +Quum enim excommunicatus, ne repurtet ex contumacia commodum, valeat conveniri, si ad exceptiones liberum posset habere recursum, traheretur multoties in favorem quod est in odium introductum. Unde postulastis apostolicae sedis oraculo edoceri, qualiter in hoc dubitationis articulo procedere debeatis. Ad quod sic Inquisitioni vestrae duximus respondendum, quod praedicto nobili legitima defensio in iudicio reservatur, et maxime iudicis recusatio, quum periculosum sit coram suspecto iudice litigare, ac suspectis iudicibus sedes apostolica causam de certa conscientia non committat. Unde in talibus non excommunicati favor attenditur, sed aequitas iudicantis, quum non debeat claudicare iudicium, ac satis videatur absurdum, si actore impugnante reo defensionis copia denegetur, quia sic condemnaretur multotiens absolvendus. Porro quum excommunicato, quando in causa absolutionis exsistit, non sit iusta deneganda sententia, nec interdici debet eidem appellationis remedium, si contra iustitiam condemnetur, qua ratione in uno eodemque negotio ipsi alia legitima subtrahantur suffragia, non videmus. Ceterum non sic in reconventione sentimus, ne quod in defensionis remedium sustinetur ad impugnationis materiam extendatur.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: One who makes an exception is not seen to confess the things included in the exception, and an exception of falsity can be opposed even after sentence.

The same, to the Monks of Farfa.

When our venerable brother I., Bishop of Sabina, sought before our beloved sons R., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Anastasia, and P., cardinal deacon of Saint Lucia in Septisolio, whom we granted as auditors to him and R., your proctor, the Church of Saint Vitus [of Granica] with its possessions and [its] appurtenances, asserting that it belonged to him in spiritual and temporal matters, the same [proctor,] before the intention of the same bishop had yet been established, responded prematurely that, even if the said church had formerly been subject to the Church of Sabina, nevertheless the bishop could not claim it, since the Monastery of Farfa held it by reason of an exchange. To prove this he exhibited a certain instrument in which it appeared prima facie to be contained that Bishop Theodosius, with the assent of his priests, determined that the aforesaid Church of Saint Vitus should be granted in exchange to your monastery for certain churches and other property.

To these things [however] the aforementioned bishop proposed that his intention had been established through a response of this kind. For since your party responded that it held the said church by an exchange made by the Bishop of Sabina, which it also endeavored to prove by a public instrument, it appeared by consequence to confess that it believed that the said church belonged to the Church of Sabina at the time of the exchange, since exchange is numbered among contracts of good faith and cannot lawfully be celebrated with anyone other than the owner or one who was held in the place of the owner. He added that, although he wished to stand by a confession [of this kind] insofar as it appeared to act against you, nevertheless he did not at all admit against himself an instrument of this kind, which is known to be supported neither by the authority of a notary nor by the subscription of witnesses.

But to this your party responded that, since the proctor objected to it by way of exception, he was not seen to have confessed the intention of the adverse party, because, according to the lawful sanctions, one who uses an exception is not judged to confess the intention of the adversary against whom the action is brought. It added that, even if at the time of the exchange the Monastery of Farfa believed that the said Church of Saint Vitus belonged to the Church of Sabina, nevertheless the aforesaid proctor could afterward have informed his belief in such a way from certain causes or probable conjectures that [now] he believed the same church not to have belonged to the Church of Sabina at that time.

Furthermore, in order to prove that the already-mentioned church belonged to him in temporal matters, the aforementioned bishop introduced certain witnesses through whom he endeavored to show that the bishops of Sabina had rather long possessed both the said church and its mills, lands, and other goods, freely disposing of them at the pleasure of their will. [Certain witnesses were also produced by your party to prove prescription; through them your proctor asserted that it was sufficiently shown that for ninety years your monastery had possessed the same church with its mills and other goods in peace. But to this the party of the bishop responded that, although certain witnesses appeared to depose concerning ninety years, nevertheless, according to the order of law, there ought to be subtracted from the computation the periods of schisms known to have intervened in the times of Innocent and Alexander, Roman Pontiffs of good memory, and, by our special indulgence granted to the aforementioned bishop, the time of Conrad, formerly Bishop of Sabina, when, on account of his absence—since he exercised pastoral care in the Church of Mainz—and the negligence of those to whom care of the bishopric of Sabina had at different times been committed, the rights of that bishopric were neglected; since we determined that the same bishop was to be restored, as regards defense of the rights of the bishopric of Sabina, to the condition that it had when the same Conrad received the prelacy of the Church of Sabina, the remaining time without doubt did not at all reach the limit of lawful prescription.]

Therefore, after deliberation with our brothers concerning these and other matters proposed before the aforesaid cardinals, we understood that the aforesaid bishop had not at all established his intention through the depositions of witnesses or the response of the aforesaid proctor, because, as was premised, one who objects an exception is not understood to have confessed the intention of the adverse party; nor [even] through the instrument exhibited by the opposing side, since in it Bishop Theodosius, by whom the exchange is proposed to have been made, is not called Bishop of Sabina, although in the transcript that the proctor used "of Sabina" had been appended through the vice of falsity. Although the person who falsified the transcript of that instrument exceeded greatly, nevertheless, because the delict of a person ought not to redound to the damage of the church, and an exception of falsity can be cast forth not only before sentence but even afterward—since a sentence rendered under pretext of false instruments can, when the truth has been discovered, be retracted within the space of twenty years—we do not will prejudice to be generated against your monastery through it.

But because it was established to us that the aforesaid Church of Saint Vitus was situated in the Diocese of Sabina, we adjudged to the same bishop episcopal right in all [spiritual] matters in it, excepting only those things known to have been withdrawn from him through authentic writings, since it was in no way proved to be exempt through privilege or lawful prescription. But because the said bishop, who claimed the same church [for himself as to temporal matters,] did not show himself fortified [concerning this] by lawful prescription, although he proved that a Bishop of Sabina possessed the goods of the same church for some time, we determined by sentence that you were to be absolved from the claim of the bishop as to the temporal matters of the same church. [Let no one therefore, etc. Given at Viterbo, on the second day before the Nones of August, in the twelfth year, 1206.] ecclesiae Sabinensi subiecta, eam tamen non poterat episcopus vendicare, quam ex permutationis causa Farsense monasterium obtinebat, ad hoc probandum quoddam exhibens instrumentum, in quo contineri prima facie videbatur, quod Theodosius episcopus cum suorum sacerdotum assensu praedictam ecclesiam sancti Viti pro quibusdam ecclesiis et rebus aliis in cambium vestro duxit monasterio concedendam. Ad haec [autem] episcopus proposuit memoratus, intentionem suam per huiusmodi responsionem esse fundatam. Quum enim pars vestra responderit, se dictam ecclesiam, ex permutatione facta per Sabinensem episcopum obtinere, quam etiam publico nitebatur instrumento probare, confiteri per consequens videbatur, se credere, quod dicta ecclesia tempore permutationis pertinuit ad ecclesiam Sabinensem, quum permutatio inter contractus bonae fidei computetur, nec cum alio, quam cum domino, vel cum eo, qui habebatur loco domini, legitime valeat celebrari, +adiiciens, quod, etsi confessioni [huiusmodi] stare vellet, in quantum contra vos facere videbatur, instrumentum tamen huiusmodi contra se minime admittebat, quod nec tabellionis auctoritate, nec subscriptione testium dignoscitur esse fulcitum. Sed ad hoc pars vestra respondit, quod, quum procurator id in modum exceptionis obiiceret, non videbatur ex adversae partis intentione fuisse confessus, quia iuxta legitimas sanctiones qui exceptione utitur non aestimatur de intentione adversarii, cum quo agitur, confiteri, adiungens, quod, etsi permutationis tempore coenobium Farfense crediderit dictam ecclesiam S. Viti ad Sabinensem ecclesiam pertinere, praedictus tamen procurator ex certis causis seu verisimilibus coniecturis credulitatem suam postmodum potuit taliter informare, ut [nunc] crederet eandem ecclesiam ad Sabinensem ecclesiam tunc temporis non spectasse. Porro memoratus episcopus ad probandum, quod iam dicta ecclesia ad se in temporalibus pertinebat, quosdam testes induxit, per quos nitebatur ostendere, quod tam dictam ecclesiam, quam molendina, terras, et alia bona eius Sabinenses episcopi diutius possederunt, de illis pro suae voluntatis arbitrio libere disponendo. +[Quidam quoque testes ad probandam praescriptionem ex vestra fuerunt parte producti; per quorum aliquis vester procurator asseruit, sufficienter ostensum, quod a nonaginta annis eandem ecclesiam cum molendinis et aliis bonis eius vestrum monasterium possederat in quiete. Sed ad hoc pars episcopi respondebat quod etsi quidam testes de nonaginta annis deponere videantur, quia tamen de iuris ordine tempora schismatum, quae temporibus bonae memoriae Innocentii et Alexandri Romanorum Pontificum intercessisse noscuntur, et de nostra indulgentia speciali episcopo memorato concessa tempus Conradi quondam Sabinensis episcopi, quum propter eius absentiam, qui pastoralem curam gessit in ecclesia Maguntinensi, et illorum incuriam, quibus Sabinensis episcopatus diversis temporibus fuit cura commissa, eiusdem episcopatus iura neglecta fuerint, debeant de computatione subduci, quum eundem episcopum in eo statu quoad defendenda Sabinensis episcopatus iura duxerimus reponendum quem habuit quando idem Conradus Sabinensis ecclesiae praesulatum accepit, residuum temporis procul dubio ad legitimae praescriptionis limitem minime pertingebat.] Super iis igitur et aliis propositis coram cardinalibus supradictis deliberatione cum fratribus nostris habita, Intelleximus, supradictum episcopum intentionem suam minime fundavisse per testium depositiones, vel procuratoris supradicti responsionem, quia, sicut praemissum est, exceptionem obiiciens de intentione partis adversae, non intelligitur fuisse confessus, vel [etiam] per instrumentum ex adverso exhibitum, quum in eo Theodosius episcopus, a quo permutatio facta proponitur, non dicatur episcopus Sabinensis, quanquam in transscripto, quo procurator utebatur, appositum fuerit «Sabinensis» per vitium falsitatis. Licet autem nimis excesserit qui transscriptum illius instrumenti falsavit, quia tamen delictum personae in damnum ecclesiae redundare non debet, ac non solum ante sententiam, verum etiam post abiici potest exceptio falsitatis, quum falsorum instrumentorum praetextu lata sententia usque ad XX. annorum spatium valeat retractari veritate comperta, nolumus, ut per id monasterio vestro praeiudicium generetur. Latin source headnote: If an exception excluding jurisdiction, on account of which an appeal was made, is proved true, the judge of appeal ought not to take cognizance of the principal matter, but to stay proceedings. This it says on the understanding that these were judges of appeal, and it is a notable understanding. Panormitanus.

Honorius III, to the Abbots of Saint-Hubert and Saint Martin of Liège.

Formerly it was intimated to our ears that, when Pope Innocent, our predecessor of happy memory, had commanded our venerable brother the Archbishop of Trier to cause the amicable settlement entered into between the noblemen L., Count of Loon, and W. of Holland, crusaders of the Diocese of Utrecht, concerning the abduction of the noblewoman, wife of the same count, lands, and other property to be observed, and the said W. endeavored to go against the aforesaid settlement and turned himself to the evasion of appeal, the same archbishop, not deferring to his appeal, which he decreed to be frivolous, promulgated against the aforesaid W.—who was otherwise bound by the bond of excommunication—a sentence of excommunication specifically on account of the aforesaid settlement, and a sentence of interdict against his land. And when afterward the beloved son G., proctor of the said count, obtained our letters to you concerning execution of those sentences, and H., proctor of the aforesaid W., publicly contradicted them in the hearing, our venerable brother P., Bishop of Albano, and our beloved son R., cardinal deacon of Saint Mary in Cosmedin, whom we appointed as auditors for the aforesaid proctors, because it was manifestly established through the things proposed by them before the auditors that the said W. was bound by the bond of excommunication, decreed by sentence that the proctor of the same W. was not to be admitted to obtain letters or to contradict, and released the letters that the proctor of the said count had obtained to you. We indeed, at the insistence of the proctor of the often-mentioned count, who feared the cunning of the other party, commanded you that, proceeding in the matter committed to you according to the form expressed in our aforesaid letters, reason going before, you should decree that any letters that it might happen were obtained from us by surreption concerning the foregoing on behalf of W., to the prejudice of the often-mentioned count, and that did not make full mention of the foregoing, lacked force.

But recently it was proposed before us on behalf of the aforementioned G. that, when the letters of our aforesaid predecessor were presented to the Archbishop of Trier, the latter proposed before him by way of exception that he was in no way bound to respond by authority of the letters themselves, both because the mandate had already expired upon the death of the mandator while the matter remained untouched, and also because, contrary to the constitution of the general council, he was drawn into a cause more than two days' journeys outside his diocese. And because the said archbishop refused to admit this exception, the same W. uttered the voice of appeal to us. But the aforesaid archbishop, having contemned his appeal, commanded our venerable brother the Bishop of Utrecht to cause the aforesaid settlement to be firmly observed through ecclesiastical censure. It was also added on behalf of the aforesaid W. that the said count, falsely claiming that the aforesaid appeal was frivolous, obtained the aforesaid letters to you while excommunicated and with the truth concealed. Wherefore it was humbly supplicated of us on behalf of W. himself that, since he, his land, and his other goods exist under the protection of the Apostolic See, we should deign mercifully to provide for him concerning this, notwithstanding the sentence that he incurred while crossing into England with Louis, since we absolved him from it. We therefore, wishing to provide for him after he had been absolved from the bond of excommunication, commanded through our letters the Abbot of Saint Lawrence in Oostbroek and his fellow judges that, if they found the matter to stand thus, after recalling as void whatever they found to have been attempted after an appeal of this kind, they should hear the cause and terminate it with its due end; otherwise they should remit the parties to your examination, condemning the appellant in lawful expenses.

But the proctor of the adverse party responded that the same G. was in no way drawn more than two days' journeys outside his diocese, since the archbishop himself had established a term in such a place as was not more remote from him than is provided by the constitution of the general council. The proctor of the same count also added that the often-mentioned W. was bound by another excommunication by authority of our already-mentioned predecessor, of which he made no mention at all in the letters directed to the already-mentioned Abbot of Saint Lawrence and his fellow judges. Wherefore the proctor of the often-mentioned count petitioned that for the aforesaid causes we decree them void and empty. But because in so great a contradiction among the persons proposing the truth is not established to us, we command your discretion that, if the proctor of the said G., within three months after the first term assigned to him by us concerning this, shall be able to prove the exception that he proposed before the often-mentioned archbishop—namely, that the mandate expired while the matter remained untouched, or that he was drawn into a cause more than two days' journeys away, contrary to the constitution of the general council, or even that the Count of Loon himself was excommunicated at the time when he obtained our letters to you, as the proctor of W. himself explained before us—you, decreeing that the appeal of the said G. was lawful, shall take care to stay proceedings in the matter. But if the proctor of the often-mentioned W. fails in proof of the said exceptions, or if the count himself sufficiently proves that the said W., at the time the letters were obtained for him, was bound by an excommunication other than that which he incurred when crossing into England, you shall proceed in the matter itself, appeal postponed, according to the form delivered to you, notwithstanding the letters obtained for the Abbot of Saint Lawrence and his fellow judges, or any letters that may appear to have been obtained from the Apostolic See with the tenor of the present letters suppressed.

Quia vero in tanta contrarietate proponentium nobis de veritate non constat,* Discretioni vestrae mandamus, quatenus, si procurator dicti G. infra tres menses post primum terminum, sibi super hoc assignatum a nobis, probare potuerit exceptionem, quam coram archiepiscopo proposuit saepe dicto, videlicet mandatum re integra exspirasse, vel se in causam trahi ultra duas diaetas contra constitutionem concilii generalis, seu etiam ipsum comitem de Los excommunicatum fuisse tempore, quo nostras ad vos literas impetravit, prout eiusdem W. procurator exposuit coram nobis, vos appellationem dicti G. legitimam decernentes, negotio supersedere curetis. Procuratore vero saepedicti W. deficiente in exceptionum probatione dictarum, vel ipso comite sufficienter probante, dictum W. tempore literarum impetratarum pro eo excommunicatione alia ab ea quam in Angliam transfretando incurrit, fuisse ligatum, vos, literis ad abbatem S. Laurentii et eius coniudices obtentis nequaquam obstantibus in negotio ipso iuxta formam vobis traditam, appellatione postposita procedatis, nullis literis obstantibus, si quae apparuerint harum tenore tacito a sede apostolica impetratis.

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: For the defense of his church, someone can oppose an exception of excommunication, perjury, or another lawful exception, and cannot be repelled through a replication of excommunication or perjury.

The same, to the Archdeacon of Translig., the Official, and I., Canon of Tours.

The beloved sons S., P., and G., canons of the Church of Saint Mary of Graçay, showed by a petition transmitted to us that, when M., a canon of the same church in the Diocese of Bourges, drew them into a cause before the dean and Master Hervé, Canon of Auxerre, delegated by us, concerning the fact that they opposed the election made by certain canons of Graçay of him as prior of the aforesaid church, and they proposed before the aforesaid judges that the said M. ought not to be heard because he was excommunicated and entangled in the crime of perjury. And when the said M., objecting by way of exception and replication that the aforesaid G. and P. had committed perjury and that S. was excommunicated, endeavored through this to refute their exception, their proctor proposed that, although the judges had assigned the aforesaid M. a term to prove his replication, nevertheless his proof concerning this ought not to be received, because, even if the perjury objected against the aforesaid canons were proved, nevertheless they were not on that account to be repelled from defense of their church. He also added that the excommunication of the aforesaid S. could not be replicated with effect against the excommunication objected by way of exception against the said M., both because S. showed this by the letters of his absolution, and because the exception opposed and proved against M. himself would repel him from acting, while the replication would by no means repel the often-mentioned S. from defending, even if it were proved. Wherefore he petitioned that, omitting proofs of a replication of this kind—in which, even if it were proved, labor would, as was shown above, be consumed in vain—they should receive the proofs that they should determine to produce to prove the matters objected against M. himself. But the judges themselves ruled interlocutorily that they would first receive proofs concerning the aforesaid replication, on account of which an appeal was made to our hearing. Wherefore, we command your discretion that, if the matter stands thus, after recalling as void, etc.

> Pro defensione suae ecclesiae potest quis opponere exceptionem excommunicationis, periurii, vel aliam legitimam exceptionem, nec per replicationem excommunicationis vel periurii repelli potest.

> Dilecti filii S. et P. ac G. canonici ecclesiae sanctae Mariae Gratiacensis transmissa nobis petitione monstrarunt, quod, quum M. canonicus eiusdem ecclesiae Biturícensis dioecesis ipsos coram decano et magistro Herveo canonico Altissiodorensi delegatis a nobis traxisset in causam, super eo, quod se opponunt electioni a quibusdam canonicis Grandensibus factae de ipso in priorem ecclesiae supradictae, et iidem proposuerunt coram praefatis iudicibus, quod dictus M. non debebat audiri, eo, quod excommunicatus erat et periurii crimine irretitus. Quumque dictus M. praefatis G. et P. periurium, et S. excommunicationem in modum exceptionis et replicationis obiiciens, per hoc eorum exceptionem elidere niteretur, procurator eorum proposuit, quod, licet iudices praefato M. ad probandam replicationem suam terminum assignassent, eius tamen super hoc probatio recipi non debebat, quia, etsi obiectum praefatis canonicis periurium probaretur, non essent tamen propter hoc a defensione suae ecclesiae repellendi. Adiecit etiam, quod contra excommunicationem dicto M. in modum exceptionis obiectam excommunicatio supradicti S. replicari non poterat cum effectu, tum quia suae absolutionis literis ostendebat, tum quia exceptio ipsi M. opposita et probata eundem repelleret ab agendo, replicatio vero saepe dictum S. nequaquam a defendendo repelleret, si etiam probaretur. +Quare petebat, ut, omissis huiusmodi replicationis probationibus, in quibus etiamsi probaretur, labor, ut praeostensum est, consumeretur inanis, probationes reciperent, quas ad probandum obiecta ipsi M. ducerent producendas. Ipsi vero iudices interlocuti fuerunt, quod prius probationes reciperent super replicatione praemissa, propter quod ad nostram fuit audientiam appellatum. Quocirca discretioni vestrae mandamus, quatenus, si res ita se habet, revocato in irritum etc.

Gregory IX, to I. and M., Canons of Prague.

Of the Apostolic See—(And below:) Indeed, while you were established at the Apostolic See, certain sentences of suspension and removal from benefices were objected against you by way of exception. Although you proposed that you could prove through suitable witnesses and instruments that they

Chapter X

Latin source headnote: Notwithstanding an exception of excommunication, a rescript obtained in a cause of appeal is valid, even though it makes no mention of an excommunication rendered after an appeal from a grievance. This it says, and according to this it is a notable and singular case, from which perhaps one rule could be gathered: that it is not necessary to make mention in a rescript of something introduced after an appeal, even from an interlocutory [sentence]. Panormitanus.

The same, to the Dean of Lincoln.

The beloved daughters in Christ, the prioress and convent of Campsey, took care to signify to us that, when a question was being conducted between them on one side and the prior and convent of Bucklesham on the other concerning certain tithes and other things for which they were convened by the latter before the Abbot of Saint Benedict and his colleagues by apostolic authority, and they appealed to us from a sufficient grievance and sent their messenger to prosecute the appeal, the aforesaid judges afterward rendered a sentence of excommunication against them. Therefore, when our letters concerning the aforesaid appeal, making no mention of the excommunication, had been obtained through the same messenger for the Prior of Angles and his fellow judges, the adverse party, proposing that it had appealed because those judges denied admission of the exception of the aforesaid excommunication proposed against them by the same party, obtained our letters concerning this for the Prior of Yarmouth and his fellow judges. Before them it was proposed by way of exception on behalf of the women that, since the said sentence had been rendered after a lawful appeal and the aid of defense is known to belong to every excommunicated person, the aforementioned judges were unwilling to admit the exception of the contrary party, just as they ought not. But when the said Prior of Yarmouth and his fellow judges did not receive an exception of this kind from them, they appealed to our hearing. Wherefore we command that, if it is so, after recalling to its due state whatever you find to have been attempted after an appeal of this kind, you shall proceed in the same matter, reason going before, according to the tenor of our former mandate directed to the aforesaid Prior of Yarmouth and his fellow judges.

> Excommunicationis exceptione non obstante, valet rescriptum impetratum in causa appellationis, licet de excommunicatione lata post appellationem a gravamine non faciat mentionem. Hoc dicit, et secundum hoc est casus notabilis et singularis, per quem forte posset colligi una regula, quod de innovato post appellationem etiam ab interlocutoria non est necesse in rescripto facere mentionem. Panorm.

Idem Decano Linconiensi.

Dilectae in Christo filiae priorissa et conventus de Campessia nobis significare curarunt, quod, quum inter ipsas ex una parte, et priorem et conventum de Buccelleia ex altera super quibusdam decimis et rebus aliis, pro quibus conveniebantur ab illis coram abbate S. Benedicti et eius collegis, auctoritate apostolica quaestio verteretur, et ipsae ad nos ex sufficienti gravamine appellassent, ac nuncium suum ad appellationem miserint prosequendam, praefati iudices postmodum tulerunt excommunicationis sententiam in easdem. Nostris ergo literis super appellatione praefata, non facta mentione de excommunicatione, per eundem nuncium ad priorem de Angles et suos coniudices impetratis, pars adversa ex eo se appellasse proponens, quod ipsi iudices exceptionem excommunicationis praedictae contra ipsas ab eadem parte propositam admittere denegarunt, ad priorem de Gernemoe et suos coniudices nostras super hoc literas impetravit. Coram quibus ex parte ipsarum fuit excipiendo propositum, quod, quum post appellationem legitimam dicta sententia lata fuerit, et cuilibet excommunicato defensionis auxilium competere dignoscatur, memorati iudices exceptionem partis contrariae, sicut nec debebant, admittere noluerunt. Sed quum dictus prior de Gernemoe et coniudices sui talem exceptionem non reciperent earundem, ipsae ad nostram audientiam appellarunt. Quocirca mandamus, quatenus, si est ita, revocato in statum debitum quicquid post huiusmodi appellationem inveneris attentatum, in eodem negotio iuxta prioris mandati nostri ad praefatum priorem de Gernemoe et coniudices suos directi tenorem praevia ratione procedas.

Chapter XI

Latin source headnote: Even an original claimant ought not to be repelled from prosecution of an appeal through an exception of excommunication. This it says, and it is a singular case insofar as it speaks of a claimant.

The same, to the Abbot of Saint Saviour of Pavia and the Provost of Vercelli.

The chapter of Tornacens. signified to us that, when they had elected P. as their archpriest, the Archbishop of Milan, refusing to confirm the election presented to him, instituted a certain cleric Zepus as archpriest of the aforesaid church. Wherefore, when they appealed to the Apostolic See, we are said to have committed the cause itself concerning these matters to the Provost of Saint Stephen, who, confirming their election and pronouncing that the right of electing belonged to the chapter itself, absolved the adverse party from their claim. When the parties appealed from this sentence to the Apostolic See, they obtained that the cause itself be committed to you. But when an exception of excommunication was opposed by the other party against the aforementioned chapter, you, attending less providently to the fact that no one ought to be excluded from prosecution of an appeal under pretext of an opposed excommunication, since every lawful defense is reserved in judgment to an excommunicated person, wrongly decreed that the adverse party was not to be compelled to respond to them; on account of this the said chapter appealed to our hearing. (And below:) We command that, if it is so, notwithstanding an exception of this kind, you shall proceed in the same matter.

Per exceptionem excommunicationis a prosecutione appellationis etiam originalis actor repelli non debet. H. d. et est casus singularis, quatenus dicit de actore.

Idem Abbati sancti Salvatoris Papiensis et Vercellensi Praeposito.

> Significaverunt nobis capitulum de Tornacens., quod, quum P. in suum archipresbyterum elegissent, Mediolanensis archiepiscopus praesentatam sibi electionem renuens confirmare, quendam Zepum clericum in archipresbyterum instituit ecclesiae supradictae. Quare, ipsis ad sedem apostolicam appellantibus, praeposito sancti Stephani causam ipsam super his dicimur commisisse, qui electionem ipsorum confirmans, et pronuncians, ius eligendi ad ipsum capitulum pertinere, partem adversam ab impetitione ipsorum absolvit, a qua sententia partes ad sedem apostolicam appellantes, causam ipsam vobis obtinuere committi. Sed a parte altera exceptione excommunicationis opposita contra capitulum memoratum, vos minus provide attendentes, quod praetextu excommunicationis oppositae a prosecutione appellationis non debeat quis excludi, quum omnis legitima defensio excommunicato in iudicio reservetur, partem adversam non esse cogendam ad respondendum eisdem, perperam decrevistis, propter quod dictum capitulum nostram audientiam appellarunt. (Et infra:) Mandamus, quatenus, si est ita, exceptione huiusmodi non obstante in eodem negotio procedatis.

Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: A defendant who objects excommunication against a claimant at any part of the litigation is heard; and, if he maliciously delayed, he is condemned in expenses; and granted that he does not except, the judge himself will repel a publicly excommunicated person.

The same.

A defendant who knowingly omits an exception of excommunication when dilatory exceptions are proposed is not prohibited from opposing it at any part of the litigation; this is to be observed specially in this exception, lest anyone be compelled to communicate with an excommunicated person to the peril of his soul. But if he omitted it so that the claimant might be wearied by labors and expenses, he is to be condemned in lawful expenses. Moreover, one publicly excommunicated is nevertheless to be repelled by the office of the judge even if an exception of this kind is not opposed.

> Reus in qualibet parte litis excommunicationem contra actorem obiiciens auditur, et, si malitiose distulerit, in expensis condemnatur, et dato, quod non excipiat, ipse iudex publice excommunicatum repellet.

> Idem.
>
> Exceptionem excommunicationis in dilatoriis proponendis reus scienter omittens; in qualibet parte litis opponere minime prohibetur, quod est in hac exceptione specialiter observandum, ne quisquam in periculum animae suae excommunicato communicare cogatur. Qui si eam omiserit, ut actor laboribus et sumptibus fatigetur, in expensis est legitimis condemnandus. Excommunicatus autem publice, etsi huiusmodi exceptio non opponitur, nihilominus est officio iudicis repellendus.

Chapter XIII

Latin source headnote: An exception of a matter adjudged does not belong to a defendant absolved because he did not possess [the thing].

The same.

When your adversary has been absolved by the judge because at the time the litigation was initiated he had ceased without fraud to possess the thing sought from him, if he now possesses it, an exception of a matter adjudged does not obstruct you when you seek it anew.

> Non competit exceptio rei iudicatae reo absoluto, quia non possidebat.

Idem.

Adversario tuo per iudicem absoluto, quoniam tempore motae litis rem petitam ab ipso sine dolo desierat possidere, si eam modo possideat, tibi petenti denuo rei iudicatae exceptio non obsistit.

Chapter XIV

Latin source headnote: A rescript obtained by an excommunicated person concerning prosecution of an appeal is valid, even though he made no mention of the excommunication.

The same.

We have decreed that our venerable brother the Archbishop of Narbonne, who, appealing from the judges to the Apostolic See because of a sufficient grievance, brought back to you our letters concerning his appeal, is to be admitted to prosecute the aforesaid appeal through the same letters, even if, at the time the rescript was obtained, he was bound by the bond of excommunication for other causes of which no mention is made therein, because it would profit an excommunicated person nothing to appeal if he could not prosecute his appeal and obtain letters concerning it.

Valet rescriptum impetratum ab excommunicato super prosecutione appellationis, licet de excommunicatione non fecerit mentionem.

Idem.

Venerabilem fratrem nostrum archiepiscopum Narbonensem, qui a iudicibus ex sufficienti gravamine ad apostolicam sedem appellans ad vos super appellatione sua nostras literas reportavit, etsi ex causis aliis tempore impetrati rescripti vinculo fuerit excommunicationis adstrictus, de quibus ibi mentio non habetur, ad prosequendam per easdem literas appellationem praedictam decrevimus admittendum, quia nihil excommunicato appellare prodesset, si non posset appellationem suam prosequi, et super ea literas impetrare.

Title XXVI: On Prescriptions

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A bishop prescribes in three years against another bishop a place converted to the faith by himself; but while the church is vacant or is in schism, prescription does not run against it.

From the African Council.

It was resolved that, if anyone after the laws has converted some place to Catholic unity, if he has held it for three years without anyone seeking it back, it shall no longer be sought back from him; provided, nevertheless, that during those three years there was a bishop who could seek it back and remained silent, [he shall suffer prejudice.] But if there was none, prejudice shall not be done to the mother church; rather, when the place has received a bishop, which it did not have, it shall be permitted to seek it back within three years from that day. Likewise, if a bishop has been converted to the Catholic faith from the party of Donatus, the prescribed time shall not prejudice him; but from the day on which he was converted, he shall have for three years the power to seek back a place that belonged to that see.

De praescriptionibus.

Episcopus contra episcopum locum per se conversum ad fidem praescribit triennio, sed, quum vacat ecclesia vel est in schismate, non praescribitur contra ipsam.

Ex concilio Africano.

Placuit, ut, si quisquam post leges aliquem locum ad catholicam unitatem converterit, si eum per triennium nemine repetente tenuerit, ulterius ab eo non repetatur; si tamen per ipsum triennium fuerit episcopus, qui posset repetere, et tacuit, [praeiudicium patietur.] Si autem non fuerit, non praeiudicetur matrici ecclesiae, sed liceat, quum locus acceperit episcopum, qui non habebat, ex ipso die infra triennium repetere. Item si fuerit episcopus ad catholicam fidem ex Donati parte conversus, non ei praeiudicet praefinitum tempus; sed ex quo die conversus est, habeat per triennium potestatem repetendi locum, qui ad ipsam cathedram pertinebat.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: It is summarized in two ways. First thus: the silence of a prelate does not harm the church until prescription is completed. Second thus: prescription does not run in invaded property. Johannes Andreae.

From the Register of Gregory, to Patricia of Italy.

Nothing profits most glorious health and beauty on the surface of the body if a wound lies hidden within. And that discord to which outward peace furnishes attendance is the more to be guarded against. But as to that which Your Excellency earnestly strives to recall to our memory in the aforesaid letters, know that it was written to you: we will to determine nothing with you concerning causes of the poor with scandal or forensic clamor. We remember that we wrote this also to you, and we know that, with the Lord helping, we restrain even ourselves from the strife of causes with ecclesiastical moderation and, according to that apostolic meaning, sustain with joy the plundering of our goods. But we believe that you know this: our silence and patience will not create prejudice in the property of the poor against the pontiffs future after me. [Hence we also, fulfilling, etc.]

Duobus modis summatur, primo sic: Taciturnitas praelati non nocet ecclesiae, donec sit praescriptum. Secundo sic: In rebus invasis non currit praescriptio. Ioan. Andr.

Ex registro Gregorii Italiae Patriciae.

Nihil prodest +gloriosissima sanitas et pulchritudo in corporis superficie, si vulnus latet intrinsecus. Atque illa magis cavenda est discordia, cui satellitium pax praebet exterior. Illud vero, quod in epistolis praedictis revocare in memoriam nostram excellentia vestra studiose contendit, sciat scriptum vobis, Nihil cum scandalo, nihil cum forali strepitu vobiscum nos velle de causis pauperum definire, hoc nos et vobis scripsisse meminimus, et scimus, nosmet ipsos iuvante Domino a causarum litigiis ecclesiastica moderatione compescere, atque secundum apostolicum illum sensum rapinam bonorum nostrorum cum gaudio sustinere. Sed illud vos scire credimus, taciturnitatem atque patientiam nostram futuris post me pontificibus in rebus pauperum praeiudicium non facturam. [Unde et nos, explentes etc.]

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: Through quiet and good-faith possession of thirty years, a church prescribes a private person's thing. This it says insofar as it speaks of a church prescribing actively, and this understanding is to be held.

Gregory.

The sanctions of the holy Fathers, establishing [this] and the human laws, have confirmed it irrefragably, and we, in the present council with all who are with us, confirm it irrefragably: that all possessions belonging to the individual provinces of our brothers, which have been possessed by them quietly and in good faith for thirty years without synodal proclamation, shall be held perpetually, and permission to be heard shall be granted to no adversary. But if some presumptuous person shall have deviated with rash mouth, because he acts against the statutes of the holy Fathers, let him be indissolubly bound by the bonds of excommunication and wholly banished from the Church and alien from the communion of the brothers.

> Per quietam et sinceram possessionem triginta annorum praescribit ecclesia rem privati. H. dicit, prout loquitur in praescriptione ecclesiae active, et iste intellectus tenendus est.
> Gregorius.
>
> Sanctorum Patrum sanctiones et humanae leges irrefragabiliter statuentes confirmaverunt, et nos in praesenti concilio cum omnibus, qui sunt nobiscum, irrefragabiliter confirmamus, ut omnes possessiones ad singulas provincias nostrorum fratrum pertinentes, a quibus per triginta annos possessae sunt, quiete et sincere absque synodali proclamatione perpetuo teneantur nullaque vox audiendi alicui adversario concedatur. Si vero aliquis praesumptor temerario ore exorbitaverit, quia contra sanctorum Patrum statuta agit, sit vinculis excommunicationis indissolubiliter innodatus et penitus extorris ab ecclesia et communione fratrum alienus.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: The fourth part of tithes and funeral offerings is prescribed against a bishop if it is not paid for a space of forty years and the cathedral church was not vacant in the meantime.

Alexander III, to the Archbishop of Salerno.

As to the fourth part indeed of a tithe and the offering of the dead, a cleric appears able to defend himself from the claim of a bishop by prescription of forty years, unless perhaps in the meantime the pastoral see had lacked a pastor who ought to have exacted the rights of his church. For the Roman Church does not admit a thirty-year prescription against a church.

> Quarta decimarum et funeralium praescribitur contra episcopum, si quadraginta annorum spatio non solvatur, et cathedralis ecclesia interim non vacavit.
>
> Alexander III. Salernitano Archiepiscopo.
>
> De quarta vero decimae et oblationis defunctorum clericus ab impetitione episcopi quadragenaria praescriptione temporis se posse tueri videtur, nisi forte interim pastoralis sedes caruisset pastore, qui iura ecclesiae suae exigere debuisset. Nam Romana ecclesia tricennalem praescriptionem contra ecclesiam non admittit.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: A possessor in bad faith does not prescribe.

The same.

It is to be guarded against with vigilant study, since the supreme measure of divine judgment has from the beginning decreed that one relinquish one's own things and not seek another's, lest we be possessors in bad faith of another's estates and property, [especially] ecclesiastical property, since no ancient possession of days by divine law aids any possessor in bad faith unless he comes to his senses after he learns that he possesses another's property, since even at law he cannot be called a possessor in good faith. For the Ephesian legislator, the paternal uncle of Origen, first imposed the force of law upon thirty- or forty-year prescription solely to avoid the sluggishness of the wretched and the error and confusion of a long time. But it has pleased us that it shall have no force either in known matters or in matters lying hidden.

> Possessor malae fidei non praescribit.
>
> Idem.
>
> Vigilanti studio cavendum est, quum summa dimensio divini iudicii ab initio censuerit propria dimittere, aliena non appetere, ne malae fidei possessores simus in praediis alienis, atque rebus [maxime] ecclesiasticis, quoniam nulla antiqua dierum possessio divino iure iuvat aliquem malae fidei possessorem, nisi resipuerit, postquam se noverit aliena possidere, quum iure etiam bonae fidei possessor dici non possit. Ephesinus enim legislator Origenis patruus solum propter vitandam miserorum segnitiem et longi temporis errorem et confusionem primus tricennali vel quadragenali praescriptioni vigorem legis imposuit. Nobis autem tam in rebus cognitis quam in rebus latentibus placuit non habere vigorem.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: One church prescribes tithes in the parish of another through a space of forty years.

The same, to the Bishop of Maurienne.

It reached our ears upon your report that two churches under your examination rather frequently litigated concerning tithes that one of them possessed in the parish of the other for forty years, and through this it thinks the latter's action extinguished; but the other, wishing to evict them by parochial right, proposes that prescription ought not to obstruct it. Therefore, your fraternity considered that we should be consulted as to what the law is in this case. Let it therefore become known to your fraternity by the tenor of the present letters that, by divine and human law, the condition of the possessor is better, because forty-year prescription wholly excludes every action.

> Una ecclesia in parochia alterius quadraginta annorum spatio decimas praescribit.
>
> Idem Mauritano Episcopo.
>
> Ad aures nostras te significante pervenit, duas ecclesias sub examine tuo saepius litigasse super decimis, quas una earum in alterius parochia annis XL. possedit, +ac per hoc eius putat actionem exstinctam; altera vero volens eas iure parochiali evincere, praescriptionem non debere sibi obesse proponit. Ideoque quid iuris sit in hoc casu, tua nos duxit fraternitas consulendos. Tuae itaque fraternitati tenore praesentium innotescat, quod de iure divino et humano melior est conditio possidentis, quia quadragenalis praescriptio omnem prorsus actionem excludit.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: Laymen cannot possess spiritual things; therefore, by consequence, neither can they prescribe them. This it says, and it is alleged daily.

The same, to the Bishop of Parma.

The cause being conducted between our beloved son I., Archdeacon of Reggio, and the nobleman G. de Baiso concerning tithes that the same G. and his men are known to have in the court of Fogliano, we commit to your experience, in which we have full confidence, to be heard and terminated by means of justice. Therefore, by commanding through apostolic writings, we order your fraternity that you shall summon the parties before your presence and, the arguments having been heard and diligently learned, contradiction and appeal ceasing, decide the cause itself with its due end, notwithstanding prescription of time or a grant of an ecclesiastical or secular person, if the same G. should wish to oppose it; because, since laymen cannot retain tithes, they can prescribe them by no reasoning.

> Laici spiritualia possidere non possunt; ergo et per consequens nec praescribere. H. d. et quotidie allegatur.
>
> Idem Parmensi Episcopo.
> Causam, quae inter dilectum filium nostrum I. Reginensem archidiaconum et nobilem virum G. de Baisio super decimis vertitur, +quas idem G. et homines sui habere in curte Folianni dignoscuntur, experientiae tuae, de qua plene confidimus, committimus audiendam et mediante iustitia terminandam. Ideoque fraternitati tuae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus partes ante tuam praesentiam convoces, et rationibus auditis diligenter et cognitis, contradictione et appellatione cessante causam ipsam debito fine decidas, non obstante praescriptione temporis, vel concessione ecclesiasticae saecularisve personae, si idem G. eam opponere voluerit; quia, quum laici decimas detinere non possint, eas nulla valent praescribere ratione.

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: If interruption is opposed against a prescription of forty years, which alone runs against a church, each party will prove [its claim].

The same.

But we will you to know and firmly hold this: against churches the Roman Church does not admit a prescription shorter than forty years, although certain canons approve a thirty-year prescription; and a church can defend itself against a church by prescription of forty years concerning a thing that it is known to have possessed undisturbed for forty years. But if a question concerning prescription and interruption has been moved between the parties, witnesses ought to be received from either party; and, if interruption has been proved, the prescription will not bind.

> Si contra praescriptionem XL. annorum, quae sola currit contra ecclesiam, opponatur interruptio, uterque probabit.
>
> Idem.
>
> Illud autem te scire volumus et firmiter tenere, quod adversus ecclesias minorem praescriptionem, quam quadraginta annorum, Romana ecclesia non admittit, licet quidam canones comprobent tricennalem, et ecclesia se potest adversus ecclesiam quadragenaria temporis praescriptione tueri de re illa, quam inconcusse quadraginta annis noscitur possedisse. Verum si de praescriptione et interruptione inter partes fuerit mota quaestio, ab utraque parte testes recipi debent, et, si probata fuerit interruptio, praescriptio non tenebit.

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: Boundaries of ecclesiastical estates are prescribed through a space of forty years.

The same.

Because, upon the indication of Abbot C. of the Monastery of Saint Peter, [which is situated in a place called Baia,] we have learned that a grave question concerning [certain] boundaries has arisen between him and John, Abbot of the Monastery of Saint Lucia [situated in the city of Syracuse,] lest the contention itself be prolonged between them, we have provided that it be terminated by the determination of a land surveyor. [And therefore we wrote to Fantinus the defensor that he ought to send there to your fraternity John the land surveyor, who set out from the city of Rome for Palermo.] We therefore exhort you that, approaching with him the places concerning which there is contention [and either party being established nearby,] you shall cause it to be terminated in your presence, preserving for either party a prescription of only forty years. [But whatever, etc.]

Latin source headnote: Prescription does not run in time of hostility.

Lucius III.

From the complaint transmitted to us by the abbot and monks of Haben., we learned that, although the Church of Camenon belongs to their right, and the people of Sibin. and Vinto. are parishioners of that church, the clerics who held the aforesaid churches from N. and W. gradually withdrew every parochial right except the right of burial from the mother church. For, retaining the tithes and other revenues for themselves, they permitted only the bodies of the dead to be carried to the aforesaid church; their successors are said to contend to take away the aforesaid parochial rights. Through apostolic writings we command your discretion that, if you learn that what is asserted rests upon truth, appeal removed, you shall cause the aforesaid tithes and offerings, together with other revenues, to be restored to the aforementioned mother church, prescription not running during time of hostility, and shall henceforth restrain the aforesaid clerics from receiving them by ecclesiastical censure.

Latin source headnote: Procurations that are owed to legates and messengers of the Apostolic See cannot be prescribed.

Innocent III, to the Abbot of Ceneda.

Coming to our presence, the beloved sons, the Provost of Saint Nazarius and A., Canon of Saint Stephen, syndics and proctors of the beloved sons, the primicerius and clerics of Milan, complained gravely to us concerning the ordinaries of the greater church that, although they themselves devoutly receive and furnish procuration for the legates and messengers of the Apostolic See, the said ordinaries refuse both to furnish procuration for them and to impart aid for expenses to those furnishing it. Hence they complained that grave prejudice was generated against the clerics of Milan. For since it often happens that our messengers and legates make passage through that city, the fewer there are in furnishing their procurations, the more heavily those furnishing them are burdened; and the more persons among whom the burden of procuration would be divided, the more easily it would be borne by those furnishing it. Since we do not cease continually to keep watch for those ordinaries and others, and to minister spiritual things to all as the Lord shall grant, it does not appear why they strive to defend themselves in a special right of this kind, especially since the Apostle also says, "If we sow spiritual things for you, it is no great thing if we reap your carnal things," and our daily insistence is the continual solicitude of all the churches, as those present and remote alike know more fully. But, willing that what presses upon all be borne together by all, by commanding through apostolic writings, we order your discretion that, unless the said ordinaries show through a special privilege of the Apostolic See that they are immune from furnishing procurations, even if for the longest time they have not furnished the service of procuration—since prescription cannot claim a place for itself in such matters—you shall decree, appeal removed, that they are bound to undertake the burden of procuration in due order. [If indeed, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the seventh day before the Kalends of March, 1199.]

Procurationes, quae debentur legatis et nunciis apostolicae sedis, praescribi non possunt.

Innocentius III. Abbati de Cenedo.

Accedentes ad praesentiam nostram dilecti filii praepositus sancti Nazarii, et A. canonicus sancti Stephani, syndici et procuratores dilectorum filiorum primicerii et clerici Mediolanensium, de ordinariis maioris ecclesiae nobis graviter sunt conquesti, quod, quum ipsi legatos et nuncios apostolicae sedis devote recipiant et procurent, dicti ordinarii et procurare ipsos renuunt, et procurantibus ad expensas subsidium impertiri. +Unde clericis Mediolanensibus grave querebantur praeiudicium generari. Quum enim per civitatem ipsam saepe contingat transitum facere nostros nuncios et legatos, quanto in eorum procurationibus faciendis pauciores exsistunt, tanto facientes amplius praegravantur, et quanto per plures onus esset procurationis divisum, tanto a facientibus facilius portaretur. Qui siquidem ordinarii, quum pro eis et aliis vigilare iugiter non cessemus, et spiritualia, sicut Dominus dederit, omnibus ministrare, cur in huiusmodi speciali se iure satagant tueri, non videtur; praesertim quum et Apostolus dicat: «si vobis spiritualia seminamus, non est magnum, si carnalia vestra metamus», et instantia nostra quotidiana sit omnium ecclesiarum sollicitudo continua, sicut plenius norunt praesentes pariter et remoti. Volentes autem, ut quod omnibus imminet ab omnibus comportetur, discretioni tuae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus nisi dicti ordinarii per speciale privilegium apostolicae sedis a praestandis procurationibus ostenderint se immunes, etiamsi longissimo tempore procurationis

Latin source headnote: A subject does not prescribe obedience against a prelate.

The same, to the Priors of Costa and Saint Donatus.

Since it is not permitted for the members to withdraw from the head, we cannot sufficiently marvel that, as was intimated to us upon the report of our venerable brother the Archbishop of Braga, although your churches are situated in his diocese, nevertheless you, putting forward no privilege of exemption, contumaciously refuse to obey him as your bishop. Therefore, since to resist is the crime of divination and to be unwilling to acquiesce is the wickedness of idolatry, unwilling to sustain that subjects do not obey their prelates as they are bound, by the common counsel of our brothers and through apostolic writings we command and strictly order in virtue of obedience that henceforth, without any contradiction, you shall furnish the aforesaid archbishop and the Church of Braga the obedience and reverence owed, as the other clerics of his diocese do, notwithstanding prescription of time. Otherwise, we shall hold as ratified the sentence that he shall reasonably render against you or your churches on this account and, with God as author, shall cause it to be inviolably observed. [Given at the Lateran, on the twelfth day before the Kalends of August, 1199.]

Chapter XIII

Latin source headnote: Concerning rights belonging to the Roman Church, only a hundred-year prescription runs.

The same, to the Nobleman Matafelon.

It reached the hearing of our apostolate upon your complaint that the castellan of the same castle denied returning certain rights from the castle of Palazzuolo, granted to you by Pope Alexander, our predecessor of happy memory. Furthermore, we caused you and the beloved son Leo, consul of the castle itself, who were established in our presence on this account, to be heard diligently. It was indeed proposed on your behalf that the aforesaid Pope Alexander, our predecessor, granted to you in the already-mentioned castle of Palazzuolo each year forty solidi of Pavia denarii, which the Roman Church was accustomed to receive there annually; and also the meals, banns, pleas, forfeitures, and all rights that the Apostolic See had there. But the castellan of the same castle most steadfastly asserted that they were owed to you for no reason. To prove this, you introduced the privilege of the aforesaid Pope, in which it is expressly contained that all the aforesaid things were granted to you by him with the common counsel of the brothers, and the census book of the Roman Church, in which it is similarly contained, as the consul himself with another fellow castellan acknowledged in our presence, that the people of Palazzuolo are bound to pay each year to the Roman Church forty solidi of Pavia money. You also endeavored to prove this through witnesses who said that they had seen the aforesaid census paid to the messengers of the Roman Pontiffs for the last fifty years. Moreover, you endeavored in many ways to prove other articles through many witnesses.

But among other things it was responded in opposition that neither the Pope Alexander's privilege nor the census book brought you any advantage, since you had not used the Alexander's privilege for a space of thirty years, and the census book was suspect because it had not been received in our chamber but in that of Master G., cardinal deacon of Saint Adrian at that time, and the scriniarius had written the statements of the witnesses otherwise than they had spoken them. We therefore, the attestations, allegations, arguments, and instruments of either party having been diligently heard and learned, attending more to the authority of the privilege than to the depositions of witnesses, considering also the census book, which we did not hold suspect although it was found not in our chamber but in that of the Cardinal of Saint Adrian, who had received it from the chamber of Blessed Peter when he was chamberlain, and not believing that the scriniarius, since he had sworn to execute his office faithfully, had written anything other than what was said by the witnesses, considering moreover what is far stronger, that the matter itself principally touched the Roman Church, against which no prescription runs except one of a hundred years, by the counsel of our brothers condemned the adverse party in the payment of the aforesaid census, namely forty solidi of Pavia money, and the other things sought, firmly enjoining it by apostolic authority that it shall pay to you without difficulty—not as to you, but as to the Roman Church, by whose authority you ought to receive it and of which, on account of the aforesaid benefices, you also exist as vassal—what is established to have been adjudged by us with the common counsel of our brothers.

Latin source headnote: From the hundred-year prescription, which alone runs against the Roman Church, the periods of schisms are to be deducted.

The same, to the Abbots Hel. and Gu.

Since by other letters we commanded you that, in the cause known to be conducted between the Church of Hildesheim on one side and the Church of Gandersheim and the Roman Church on the other, you ought to receive witnesses to prove prescription, by notification of the present letters we have determined to declare to you that, after prescription against the often-mentioned monastery and its liberty is said to have begun, the rupture of three schisms against the Roman Church intervened. Therefore, although it has been established by both legal and canonical definition that against the holy Roman Church, which rejoices in a special privilege, no prescription except one of a hundred years can claim a place for itself, nevertheless we do not will the periods of intervening schisms, which according to the order of law impede the course of prescription, to be computed in any way, but, diligent consideration having been applied, to be deducted from the computation itself. [Given at Ferentino, on the fifteenth day before the Kalends of July, in the ninth year, 1206.]

De centenaria praescriptione, quae solum currit contra Romanam ecclesiam, tempora schismatum deducantur.

Idem Hel. et Gu. Abbatibus.

Quum vobis +aliis literis dederimus in mandatis, ut in causa, quae inter ecclesiam Hildesemensem ex una parte, et ecclesiam de Gandersheim et ecclesiam Romanam ex altera dignoscitur agitari, testes ad probandam praescriptionem recipere debeatis: insinuatione praesentium vobis duximus declarandum, quod, postquam praescriptio contra monasterium saepe dictum et libertatem ipsius dicitur inchoata, scissura trium schismatum adversus Romanam ecclesiam intervenit. Licet igitur tam legali quam canonica sit diffinitione statutum, ut contra sacrosanctam Romanam ecclesiam, quae gaudet privilegio speciali, non nisi centum annorum praescriptio locum sibi valeat vindicare, tempora tamen intercidentium schismatum, quae secundum iuris ordinem cursum praescriptionis impediunt, nolumus aliquatenus computari, sed diligenti consideratione adhibita de ipsa computatione deduci. Chapter XV

Latin source headnote: An inferior prelate can prescribe the whole episcopal right in certain churches of his diocese; nevertheless, the time during which the cathedral church was vacant is subtracted from the prescription.

The same, to the Bishops of Ely and Rochester.

Having heard and understood the merits of the cause being conducted between our venerable brother the Bishop of Worcester and the beloved son the Abbot of Evesham concerning the churches situated in the Vale of Evesham, which the bishop asserts belong to him by diocesan law, while the abbot [asserts] that they are altogether exempt from his jurisdiction, we learned clearly that these churches were not withdrawn from episcopal jurisdiction through privileges of the Roman Pontiffs, unless perhaps the Vale of Evesham is that place which, having been endowed with liberty by two kings, namely Cenred and Offa, Pope Constantine of good memory endowed with liberty, as is contained in his privileges. But they are proved through witnesses to have been possessed with full right by the Abbots of Evesham for so long a time that they appear lawfully to have prescribed episcopal right in them, unless perhaps in the meantime the Church of Worcester was vacant for so great a period that, the time of vacancy being subtracted, the prescription is not at all completed. [Although the cause has been concluded on either side, nevertheless, because either party lost proof that it asserts was necessary, we, considering that either church discharges the function of a minor, after equity was weighed restored either against the other for proving the omitted argument, lest either be injured by grave loss on account of negligence of this kind.]

Wherefore, through apostolic writings, we command your discretion that, after inspecting the privileges of Kings Cenred and Offa, which the abbot asserts that he has concerning the aforesaid liberty, if through them it shall be established that the Vale of Evesham is that place which Celestine, our predecessor, endowed with liberty, you shall absolve the Evesham abbot from the claim of the Worcester bishop concerning the aforementioned churches and, adjudging that they are subject with full right to the abbot, shall impose perpetual silence upon the bishop concerning them. But if the abbot fails in this proof, you shall hear the proofs concerning the time during which the episcopal see was vacant within the forty years; and, if it is established to have been vacant for so long a time that, it having been subtracted, a forty-year prescription is not completed, you shall adjudge episcopal right in those churches to the bishop and impose perpetual silence upon the abbot concerning it. But if the bishop does not prove an exception of this kind, nevertheless, because he proved interruption concerning the Pentecostal procession in the village and Church of Morton, the reception and procuration of the archdeacon, and also payment of Peter's Pence in the Vale of Evesham, and also concerning cognizance of matrimonial causes, the suspension of a chaplain in the aforesaid village of Morton, and the interdict of the chapels in the aforesaid village of Evesham, you shall adjudge episcopal right concerning these matters to him—provided, nevertheless, that concerning suspension and an interdict of this kind, interruption was made within forty years—imposing silence upon him in the other matters that the abbot is proved to have prescribed. [But if perhaps they are unwilling, etc. Given on the third day before the Nones of February, 1205.]

Chapter XVI

Latin source headnote: A subject cannot prescribe against a superior either visitation or the procuration owed by reason of visitation in himself, although another could prescribe both in the person of another.

The same, to the Bishop of Paris.

When our venerable brother the Archbishop of Sens was visiting the Province of Sens by the obligation of his office, making passage through the Diocese of Paris, he had need to turn aside to the churches of the Abbot of Saint-Magloire, the Prior of Castres, and certain others of the same diocese. When he sought from them the procuration owed to him, they inhumanly denied the exacted procuration, altogether contemning to pay it, alleging only this in defense of their denial: that they did not remember having paid a procuration of this kind to the predecessors of the same archbishop, nor that it had ever been sought from them. But the same archbishop, on account of the procuration less than reasonably denied to him, suspended them from execution of their offices by authority of a rescript that he had obtained from the Apostolic See concerning this; afterward, because they did not observe the sentence of suspension, he bound them with the bond of excommunication. We perceived all this to be contained in the letters of the archbishop himself, who sought that the same sentence be confirmed by apostolic authority.

We therefore, considering their foregoing allegation altogether null—since it was impossible to prescribe against a procuration owed by reason of visitation, just as prescription can in no manner run against visitation itself, even if another could prescribe both against him—[by commanding] through apostolic writings, we order your fraternity that you shall cause the sentence that the aforementioned archbishop rendered against contemners of this kind, both by authority of our rescript and by the ancient custom of the metropolis, to be inviolably observed throughout your diocese until worthy satisfaction, because according to divine law an ox treading grain is not to have its mouth closed, and, according to the Apostle, "if one sows spiritual things, it is no great thing if he reaps carnal things, since no one is compelled to serve as a soldier at his own expense." For if they wish to object and prove anything other than what was alleged above against the intention of the often-mentioned archbishop, we shall cause justice to be exhibited to them. Latin source headnote: One who possesses in another's name does not prescribe; nor even does one who possesses in his own name unless he has good faith and a just title, if a presumption is against him. This it says according to Johannes Andreae, with the addition supplied by Panormitanus.

The same, to the Archbishop of Pisa.

If by diligent meditation you had weighed what that ark of the tabernacle signifies, in which, at the Lord's command, the rod and manna were deposited together with the tablets, you would by no means reckon that we wrote harshly or severely to you, since in the breast of the Roman Pontiff, who by God's authority is known to preside over all prelates of the churches, there ought to be both the rod of correction and the manna of sweetness, so that with the one he may cherish the humble and devout, but with the other strike rebels and punish delinquents. Hence it is that wine and oil are applied to the wounds of that wounded man whom the Samaritan brought into the inn, so that, unless the wounds of delinquents are soothed by the oil of admonition and exhortation, the wine of ecclesiastical severity may follow. Therefore, although from the matters that we have premised, our admonitions and mandates having been contemned—by which we frequently endeavored to induce your fraternity to absolve our beloved son W., Margrave of Massa and Judge of Cagliari, from the oath of fealty that you caused to be furnished to you and the Church of Pisa, so that, notwithstanding it, he might swear to us and the Roman Church—we could perhaps have proceeded against you not only with severity of words but with execution of ecclesiastical discipline, since the Judicate of Cagliari belongs to the right and property of Blessed Peter, just as all Sardinia belongs immediately, and nothing has been reasonably alleged on your behalf why it was permitted to you to exact an oath of fealty for yourself or your church from the Margrave of Massa, Judge of Cagliari. (And below: [cf. c. 12, On the Competent Forum, II.2.])

But concerning the other article, you responded in this way: that from the time when you were assumed to the office of prelate, you received the oath of fealty for the Apostolic See from the judges [of Sardinia,] knowing that Villanus the archbishop, your predecessor, a man of great authority and integrity who existed for a long time as a cardinal in the Roman Curia and knew its customs and statutes more fully, and all your predecessors, who were men of great authority, had thus equally held and acted by ancient custom, since nothing had hitherto been objected to you or them by the Apostolic See. We therefore, having more fully considered these and the other things that the beloved son Master Bondinus, your messenger, wished to propose, did not understand that you or your church was supported concerning this by any right through which you could reasonably be excused from execution of our mandate, since you do not show authority of the Apostolic See through which you and your predecessors exacted oaths of fealty from the Judges of Cagliari, nor are you fortified by any prescription; since, according to your confession, neither the Church of Pisa nor you were in quasi-possession of the right to exact an oath of this kind, which you confess was received from those judges for the Apostolic See. Through this it is established that the Roman Church was always in quasi-possession, since the oath was exacted and furnished on its behalf through the ministry of you and your predecessors, and one is also said to possess in whose name possession is held.

But if it should be said that the oath was exacted in your name and that of your predecessors, and not in our name and that of the Roman Church, it could be inferred that the oath furnished concerning preservation of the right and honor of the Apostolic See had been violated. Hence what had knowingly been obtained contrary to an oath of this kind could not be lawfully retained, because even according to this prescription could have no place, since in prescription of ecclesiastical property good faith and a just title are required. And even if prescription could have had a place, we do not believe that a hundred-year prescription, which alone runs against the Roman Church, can be proved. [But because, etc. Given at Rome at Saint Peter's, on the second day before the Nones of May, in the ninth year, 1206.]

Chapter XVIII

Latin source headnote: An abbot can prescribe episcopal rights in chapels; nevertheless, he prevails only in those rights that he has prescribed. This it says as regards the title.

The same, to the Bishop of Lucca.

When formerly, brother Bishop, litigating in our presence with the beloved sons, the abbot and monks of Saint Saviour of Fucecchio, concerning the parish church of Salamazana and its adjacent chapels, you claimed institution [of clerics] in them and other matters belonging to episcopal right, to establish your intention you principally alleged the common law, by whose authority you said that all spiritual things in the aforesaid places, which are situated in your diocese, belonged to you as diocesan bishop. You further alleged the award concerning this promulgated by the Bishop of Pistoia of good memory and by the archpriest and primicerius of Lucca, who had been elected by the parties, which had been commonly approved by either party. [In it it is expressly contained that, after any professed religious in the same parish church has been elected as plebanus by the abbot, he shall be presented to the Bishop of Lucca to receive from him the favor of confirmation and promise to the same bishop, together with his priests, manual obedience under this form: that he shall go with his people to the synod, chapter, and also the litanies at the Church of Saint Martin; answer to the bishop in an annual procuration and concerning the fourth part of the tithes; when necessary, supply him aid; and observe his sentence of interdict rendered against the people of Fucecchio; and, if the plebanus or his priests should perhaps offend the Church of Lucca in the matters contained in the award, and the abbot, having been required once or twice, did not cause the offense to be amended within twenty days, it should be permitted to the Bishop of Lucca to judge them for that fault as his own priests.]

But in order to refute your intention, the aforesaid abbot exhibited the privilege of Pope Gregory VII, our predecessor of happy memory, which appeared to precede the aforesaid award by much time and through which both the Fucecchio monastery and the aforesaid parish church and chapels appeared to have been endowed with liberty. [For in it is contained that our already-mentioned predecessor instituted the Church of Salamazana with the adjacent chapels granted to the aforementioned monastery, so that no archbishop or bishop should dare to molest the place itself or the aforesaid parish church and chapels, or to excommunicate or even judge the priests established there by the abbot then in office, but that, existing under the protection, immunity, and judgment of the Roman Pontiff, they should take care to serve almighty God securely.] The said abbot also used privileges of other Roman Pontiffs, namely Urban, Paschal, Calixtus, Eugenius, Anastasius, Adrian, Alexander, and Lucius, obtained after the award was promulgated, who appeared to grant him privileges of liberty. [For this is found among other things in the privileges of each: "We also decree that it shall be permitted neither to any bishop or archbishop nor to their ministers to excommunicate or place under interdict the place itself"—namely the Monastery of Fucecchio—"or its monks, or the adjacent churches of Salamazana with their chapels, or the priests established there by the abbot, without the cognizance of the Roman Pontiff."]

The said abbot further proposed that, even if the aforesaid matters belonged to you by common law, nevertheless it was established that both he and his monastery were fortified concerning them by lawful prescription. Through his own witnesses and those of your party, who by our mandate had been produced on either side before the beloved son, the Prior of Saint Fridianus of Lucca, he said that it was proved that his monastery had enjoyed peaceful possession of all the foregoing for forty years and more. He further alleged that no prejudice could have been generated against the monastery through the often-mentioned award, both because the greater and sounder part of the chapter of the same place in no way consented to the aforementioned submission to arbitration and because it was not at all proved that the authority of the Roman See, to which the monastery and churches belonged, had acceded.

To these things, however, it was responded on your behalf that faith was not to be given to the privilege of Pope Gregory, as manifestly suspect. For it was found erased in that part of itself in which the force of the question existed, namely, where mention is made of the chapels. You further proposed that the same abbot ought to receive no advantage through the other privileges, since they appeared obtained by surreption because they make no mention of the aforesaid award, approved by the parties, which had passed into the authority of a matter adjudged. You added that you could not be repelled by the objection of prescription by the adverse party, because, although certain witnesses depose that they remember from a time of forty years and add that they saw the monastery enjoy liberty in the aforesaid places concerning those matters that belong to episcopal right, nevertheless, through depositions of this kind, faith is not made concerning continuous possession for forty years, since these two things can sufficiently concur: that the witnesses remember from a time of forty years and saw the monastery in possession of the aforesaid matters only for the last ten years.

But the other party, considering this frivolous, responded that, even if some witnesses thus use doubtful words, nevertheless there are several witnesses who openly testify that they saw the aforementioned monastery in continuous possession of all the aforesaid matters for forty years and beyond. Against this your party proposed in replication that, although forty-year prescription were established, nevertheless the time of the schism that was shown through witnesses to have intervened in the Church of Lucca ought deservedly to be subtracted from the computation. The other party responded in opposition that, although faith had been made concerning a schism that intervened, nevertheless, since it was in no way shown how long it lasted and it could have lasted for a short time, the objection of prescription could not on this account be effectively impeded, especially since prescription of forty-five years was proved through several witnesses.

We therefore, having perspicaciously understood these and the other things proposed on either side before us, because the aforesaid abbot sufficiently showed that his monastery was fortified by lawful prescription concerning the institution, destitution, and ordination of the plebanus and clerics; baptism; penance in lighter faults; burial; receipt of tithes; celebration of divine offices in both the parish church and the aforesaid chapels; excommunicating, placing under interdict, and also absolving—we determined, by the counsel of our brothers, that the abbot himself was to be absolved from your claim concerning the already-mentioned articles, imposing perpetual silence upon you concerning them; but concerning all other matters known to belong to episcopal right, we condemn the same abbot by sentence as regards the aforesaid parish church and chapels, according to the tenor of the award. [Let no one therefore, etc. Given at Ferentino, on the second day before the Kalends of November, in the eleventh year of our pontificate, 1208.]

Per testes quoque suos et partis tuae, qui coram dilecto filio priore sancti Fridiani Lucani de mandato nostro fuerant utrinque producti, dicebat esse probatum, quod super praemissis omnibus monasterium suum per quadraginta annos et amplius pacifica fuerat possessione gavisum, allegans insuper, per arbitrium saepedictum nullum potuisse monasterio praeiudicium generari, tum quia maior et sanior pars capituli eiusdem loci nullatenus compromissioni memoratae consenserat, tum etiam quia Romanae sedis auctoritas, ad quam monasterium et ecclesiae pertinebant, accessisse minime probabatur. Ad haec autem ex parte tua exstitit sic responsum, quod privilegio Gregorii Papae, utpote manifeste suspecto, fides adhibenda non erat. Nam in ea sui parte inveniebatur abrasum, in qua vis quaestionis exsistit, ubi videlicet fit mentio de capellis. Sed nec per alia privilegia proponebas eundem abbatem aliquod debere commodum reportare, quum illa viderentur per subreptionem obtenta, quum de praedicto arbitrio a partibus approbato, quod in rei iudicatae auctoritatem transierat, nullam faciat mentionem; adiiciens insuper, te non posse praescriptionis obiectu ab adversa parte repelli, quia, licet quidam testes deponant, se a quadraginta annorum, tempore recordari, et adiiciant, se vidisse monasterium super iis, quae ad ius episcopale spectant, in praedictis locis libertate gavisum, per depositiones tamen huiusmodi de quadraginta annorum possessione continua non fit fides, quum haec duo concurrere satis possint, ut et testes a quadraginta annorum tempore recordentur, et a decennio citra duntaxat monasterium ipsum in possessione viderint praedictorum. Sed hoc frivolum pars altera reputando respondit, quod etsi testes aliqui verbis dubiis sic utantur, plures tamen testes sunt, qui aperte testantur, se a quadraginta annis et ultra monasterium memoratum in continua praedictorum omnium possessione vidisse. Contra quod pars tua proposuit replicando, quia, licet de quadraginta annorum praescriptione constaret, tempus tamen schismatis, quod in Lucana ecclesia intervenisse per testes erat ostensum, debebat merito de computatione subduci. E contra parte altera respondente, quod, licet de schismate, quod intercesserat, fuerit facta fides, quum quanto tempore duraverit minime sit ostensum, et potuerit modico tempore duravisse, propter hoc tamen praescriptionis obiectio non poterat efficaciter impediri, praecipue quum per plures testes quadraginta quinque annorum praescriptio sit probata.*] Nos igitur, his et aliis, quae coram nobis utrinque fuere proposita, perspicaciter intellectis, Quia praedictus abbas sufficienter ostendit, monasterium suum super institutionibus, destitutionibus, et ordinationibus plebani et clericorum, baptismo, poenitentia in levioribus culpis, sepultura, decimarum perceptione ac divinis officiis celebrandis tam in plebe quam in capellis etiam praedictis, in excommunicando atque interdicendo, et etiam absolvendo legitima praescriptione munitum, abbatem ipsum ab impetitione tua super iam dictis articulis de consilio fratrum nostrorum duximus absolvendum, super illis tibi perpetuum silentium imponendo, super aliis omnibus, quae ad ius episcopale spectare noscuntur, iuxta tenorem arbitrii eundem abbatem quoad plebem et capellas praedictas sententialiter condemnantes. Chapter XIX

Latin source headnote: One who, after prescription has been completed, obtains a contrary privilege and uses it renounces the prescription. If the prescription was not completed, he has bad faith and therefore does not prescribe.

The same.

Coming to our presence, the beloved son [G.,] Abbot of Saint Martin of Pannonhalma, [showed us by his complaint that our venerable brother the Bishop of Veszprém exempted conditional persons, who furnish certain services to him, from full payment of tithes and, although he has jurisdiction over them, does not compel them by pontifical authority to pay the aforesaid tithes to him in full and to make fitting satisfaction concerning those withdrawn; and that he refuses to furnish him counsel and aid in expenses and other things against woodland people dwelling at the outermost boundaries of the aforesaid parish, who withdraw themselves from payment of tithes. Wherefore he humbly petitioned that we should deign to enjoin the same bishop by apostolic authority not to attempt this henceforth. He petitioned further that the same bishop should prohibit the priests of that parish from admitting to divine offices certain persons who do not pay tithes to him as they are bound, with a servile condition falsely objected as their excuse, or bell-ringers and funeral attendants delinquent in the same article, or receiving from them any part of the tithes, while furnishing him fitting satisfaction for the things withdrawn. He humbly supplicated that, if the said bishop did not take care to effect this, we should command it to be done through judges delegated by us, compelling the bishop to make fitting satisfaction for the aforesaid matters if the said chaplains presumed to attempt this by his authority. He petitioned, moreover, that the same bishop should not permit parishioners of his chapels to be received into other chapels as to spiritual jurisdiction and the fourth part of tithes, making satisfaction to him for the things withdrawn if anything in this had hitherto been presumed by his authority. Otherwise, he should cause fitting satisfaction concerning these matters to be exhibited to him by his chaplains; and, lest any doubt arise concerning the parishioners, he petitioned by distinguishing thus: that the aforementioned bishop should not withdraw the parishioners of the villages of Fajsz and Görbe from the Chapel of Táp; but should not withdraw from the Chapel of the Swineherds the parishioners of the estate of Dominic de Mogh, of the king's udvornici, and of the village of those who give martens to the king; prohibiting priests from receiving any caps or cubuli of wine from the conditionarii of the king or queen, who are commonly called royal servants, while permitting the abbot himself to receive them; and also compelling the king's archers and Bisseni to pay the tithes in full.]

The same abbot afterward [also] sought from us and humbly petitioned that the Bishop of Veszprém should not impede, or cause to be impeded, all those who dwell in the parish or county of Somogy from paying him tithes from all the things they possess, as is more fully contained in the privileges of Pope Paschal, our predecessor of happy memory, and of the holy King Stephen. But the aforesaid bishop, established in our presence, on the contrary petitioned that we cause the tithes of the county of Somogy situated within the boundaries of his diocese, which the same abbot retains, to be restored to him, unless the said abbot showed by some special right that he justly possessed them, commanding that, when he visits the said county, the bishop be furnished procuration in its churches by the same abbot. [He further petitioned that the fourth part assigned to building be restored to him for repairing churches; sought that the chapels in the village of the swineherds and Saint Ladislaus of Fizgoi be destroyed as constructed without the authority and consent of the diocesan bishop; and sought back the Church of Keurishyg, in which the said abbot usurps spiritual jurisdiction for himself, and also the Church of Táp, in possession of which the same abbot had confessed that he was. Asserting that reconciliation of penitents and ordinations of clerics belonged to him, he humbly petitioned that the chaplains and people of Saint Martin situated in the Diocese of Veszprém should receive chrism, holy oil, and the other ecclesiastical sacraments from him as their diocesan, leaving cognizance of spiritual causes to him.]

But we, having understood through our venerable brother [Hugolinus,] Bishop of Ostia, whom we granted to the parties as auditor, the things that had been proposed before him, decree that the objections proposed by [the] bishop against the privileges of the aforesaid Pope Paschal and the holy King Stephen, to which the abbot sufficiently responded, are invalid, so that, notwithstanding them, the privileges themselves shall be reckoned valid if the authentic instrument of the aforesaid king shall have been found to be such as the transcript thereof presented to us under the bull of our dearest son in Christ, the illustrious King of the Hungarians; but how far it avails to establish the intention of the abbot, we shall decree at the opportune time. [Meanwhile, nothing shall be altered concerning the status of the monastery according to the receipt of tithes that the same monastery possesses.]

But chrism, holy oil, consecrations of altars or basilicas, and ordinations of clerics who are to be promoted to holy orders, the clerics of the churches or chapels of the monastery itself, which is situated in the Diocese of Veszprém, shall seek from the Bishop of Veszprém, provided that he is Catholic, has the favor [and communion] of the Apostolic See, and wishes to exhibit them freely and without any depravity; otherwise, they shall have free faculty to receive them from another Catholic prelate whom they prefer, as we perceived to be contained in the privilege of the said Paschal and of Pope Alexander, of good memory, our predecessors, notwithstanding the privilege of Pope Clement of happy memory, through which the privileges of his predecessors were not derogated, since he made no mention of them, especially since Clement himself granted that privilege saving the institutions not only of the Roman Church but even of its legates.

Nor could the prescription that the same abbot opposed in his own support obstruct, because, if the prescription was completed when the Abbot of Saint Martin obtained the privilege from Pope Alexander, he appears to have renounced the right of prescription, especially since before us he used that privilege, which contradicts his intention as to this article. But if the prescription was not yet completed but was in the process of prescribing, after a privilege of this kind had been obtained he did not have good faith, and therefore according to the canons he did not prescribe. [Moreover, the interdicted persons, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the fifth day before the Nones of March, in the fifteenth year of our pontificate, 1212.]

[Ceterum interdictos etc. Dat. Lat. V. Non. Mart. Pont. nostr. Ao. XV. 1212.]

Chapter XX

Latin source headnote: In neither the canonical nor the civil forum is prescription with bad faith valid.

The same, in the general council.

Because everything that is not from faith is sin, by synodal judgment we define that no prescription, either canonical or civil, shall be valid without good faith, since every constitution and custom that cannot be observed without mortal sin is generally to be derogated. Hence it is necessary that one who prescribes have no consciousness at any part of the time that the thing belongs to another.

> Non in foro canonico nec civili valet praescriptio cum mala fide.
> Idem in concilio generali.
>
> Quoniam omne, quod non est ex fide, peccatum est, synodali iudicio diffinimus, ut nulla valeat absque bona fide praescriptio tam canonica quam civilis, quum generaliter sit omni constitutioni atque consuetudini derogandum, quae absque mortali peccato non potest observari. Unde oportet, ut qui praescribit in nulla temporis parte rei habeat conscientiam alienae.

Title XXVII: On Sentence and a Matter Adjudged

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A sentence rendered contrary to laws or canons does not bind, nor is it necessary to appeal from it. Panormitanus.

Gregory.

A sentence pronounced contrary to laws or canons, although it is not suspended by an appeal, nevertheless cannot subsist by the law itself. But after, by way of superabundance, it is established that an appeal was also extended to you, we marveled why you did not even send men who could have rendered an account of your right.

> De sententia et re iudicata.
> Sententia lata contra leges vel canones non tenet, nec ab ea opus est appellare. Panorm.
>
> Gregorius.
>
> Sententia contra leges canonesve prolata, licet non sit appellatione suspensa, non potest tamen subsistere ipso iure. Postquam tamen ex abundanti, et appellalionem tibi constat esse porrectam, mirati sumus, cur nec homines, qui tui iuris potuissent rationem reddere transmisisti.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: Litigations ought to be terminated quickly.

The same.

To terminate the controversies of disputants by a swift sentence [without doubt] accords both with equity and with rigor. [Therefore, because, etc.]

> Lites debent celeriter terminari.
>
> Idem.

> Iurgantium controversias celeri sententia terminare et aequitati [proculdubio] convenit et rigori. [Quia ergo etc.]

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: A priest is not to be deposed without just cause.

The same.

A concordant sentence of priests cannot remove anyone from the priestly grade except for just causes. [We exhort, etc.]

> Sacerdos sine iusta causa non est deponendus.
>
> Idem.
>
> Non potest quemquam a sacerdotali gradu, nisi iustis ex causis, concors sacerdotum sententia submovere. [Hortamur etc.]

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: Someone justly petitions that a sentence be confirmed by the Pope if it was rendered justly and reasonably.

Pope Leo.

Let the things that have been defined justly and reasonably according to ecclesiastical custom be strengthened also by our sentence. [Given on the fourth day of August, in the current year, 446.]

> Iuste quis petit sententiam a Papa confirmari, si iuste et rationabiliter fuit lata.
>
> Leo Papa.
>
> Ea, quae iuxta ecclesiasticum morem iuste et rationabiliter fuerint diffinita, nostra quoque sententia roborentur. [Dat. IV. Aug. c. a. 446.]

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: A judge appointed over execution of a sentence admits an exception of fraud or nullity of the sentence, not to the effect that he pronounces upon it, but that he transmits the matter to the superior who judged, if he finds it probable. This it says notably.

Alexander III, to the Archbishop of York.

For the rest, know that, if we command that a sentence rendered by us be put into execution by someone and fraud has intervened, the executor does not have faculty to take cognizance of the whole matter, but it will be necessary that the questions that arise be brought to the Apostolic See.

> Iudex deputatus super exsecutione sententiae, admittit exceptionem fraudis seu nullitatis sententiae, non ad effectum, ut super ea pronunciet, sed ut negotium ad superiorem, qui iudicavit, transmittat, si illam probabilem repererit. H. d. notabiliter.
>
> Alexander III. Eboracensi Archiepiscopo.
>
> De cetero noveris, quod, si sententiam a nobis latam praecipimus per aliquem executioni mandari, et fraus intervenerit, non est facultas exsecutori de toto negotio cognoscendi, sed deferri quaestiones, quae inciderint, ad sedem apostolicam oportebit.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: For a defendant condemned to delivery of possession, it does not suffice to deliver a pledge in place of possession itself.

The same, to the Bishop of Norwich.

When possession has been adjudged to certain persons, it does not suffice that pledges be given to them unless they enjoy corporal possession.

> Non sufficit reo damnato ad traditionem possessionis tradero pignus pro ipsa possessione.
>
> Idem Norvicensi Episcopo.
>
> Quum aliquibus est adiudicata possessio, non sufficit eis dari pignora, nisi corporali possessione laetentur.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: A sentence rendered against a marriage never passes into a matter adjudged; hence it is revoked whenever the error is established.

The same, to the same and V., Archdeacon.

W., bearer of the present letters and your parishioner, showed us by his notification that, when in the face of the Church he had lawfully betrothed a certain woman, a widow named A., and carnal union followed, scandal arose between them, on occasion of which the aforesaid man withdrew the conjugal debt from her. But the blood relatives of the already-mentioned woman, taking this ill, moved a question before you, proposing that he had taken the woman as wife when unwilling and resisting, and not existing at an age suitable for marriage. And because the same man, as is proposed to us, desired to lead a dissolute life, at length, through the intervening effort of either, they were separated less than reasonably. Therefore, unwilling that marriages canonically contracted be dissolved through a certain levity, by commanding through apostolic writings, we order your discretion that, if it is established to you that they were not lawfully separated by a judgment of the Church and that the Church was deceived, you shall cause them to remain together as man and wife, contradiction and appeal ceasing.

> Sententia lata contra matrinionium nunquam transit in rem iudicatam; unde quandocunque revocatur, quum constat de errore.
> Idem eidem et V. Archidiacono.
>
> Lator praesentium W. parochianus vester sua nobis insinuatione monstravit, quod, quum in facie ecclesiae quandam mulierem viduam A. nomine legitime desponsasset, et carnalis esset copula subsecuta, inter eos scandalum est subortum, cuius occasione praedictus vir debitum ei coniugale subtraxit. Consanguinei vero iam dictae mulieris hoc molestum habentes, coram vobis quaestionem moverunt proponentes, quod mulierem invitam et renitentem, nec aetatis aptae matrimonio exsistentem duxisset uxorem. Et quoniam idem vir, sicut nobis proponitur, vitam cupiebat agere dissolutam, demum, utriusque studio interveniente, fuerunt minus rationabiliter separati. Nolentes igitur matrimonia canonice contracta levitate quadam dissolvi, discretioni vestrae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus, si vobis constiterit, eos per iudicium ecclesiae non fuisse legitime separatos, ecclesiamque deceptam, ipsos contradictione et appellatione cessante faciatis sicut virum et uxorem insimul permanere.

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: A sentence rendered against a church under pretext of an iniquitous custom is retracted.

The same, to T. and the Clerics of Saint Anastasia of Verona.

When the cause being conducted between you and the laymen G. and A. concerning a certain house sold to them by your archpriest had been brought to the examination of our beloved son I., cardinal priest of the Basilica of the Twelve Apostles and then legate of the Apostolic See, after an appeal had been interposed to us and delays received, because within the term fixed for you, son T., to prosecute it you had not set out on the journey of coming to us, he, pronouncing sentence against you, took care to adjudge the aforesaid house to the aforementioned G. and A. according to the custom of the city of Verona. Then, when the cause had been brought to us by appeal, the Bishop of Brescia, delegated by us, promulgated a sentence against you according to the same custom, with the form of the canons spurned, as the aforesaid legate had done. But we, when at length either party had presented itself to our sight, more diligently considering that, although the authority of usage or custom is not small, nevertheless it never prejudices truth or law, revoked the aforesaid sentence by the common counsel of our brothers and, absolving you from their claim, adjudged the aforesaid house to you and your church by apostolic authority.

> Retractatur sententia praetextu iniquae consuetudinis lata contra ecclesiam.
>
> Idem T. et Clericis S. Anastasiae Veronensis.
>
> Quum causa, quae vertitur inter vos, et G. et A. laicos super domo quadam eis ab archipresbytero vestro vendita, ad examen dilecti filii nostri I. basilicae XII. Apostolorum presbyteri cardinalis, tunc apostolicae sedis legati delata fuisset, post appellationem ad nos interpositam, et receptas inducias, quoniam infra terminum tibi, fili T., ad eam prosequendam praefixum iter ad nos veniendi non arripueras, contra te sententiam proferens memoratis G. et A. praetaxatam domum secundum Veronensis civitatis consuetudinem adiudicare curavit. Deinde quum causa fuisset ad nos per appellationem delata, Brixiensis episcopus delegatus a nobis sententiam contra vos, spreta forma canonum, secundum eandem consuetudinem, sicut praefatus legatus fecerat, promulgavit. Nos autem, quum tandem utraque pars nostro se conspectui praesentasset, diligentius considerantes, quod, licet usus vel consuetudinis non minima sit auctoritas, nunquam tamen veritati aut legi praeiudicat, praescriptam sententiam de communi fratrum nostrorum consilio revocavimus, et vos ab impetitione absolventes illorum, vobis et ecclesiae vestrae domum auctoritate apostolica adiudicavimus supradictam.

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: An iniquitous sentence is retracted by a superior, although the cause was committed with appeal removed. But if it contains manifest iniquity, it is null. This it says on the understanding that it sets forth two cases.

The same, to the Archbishop of York.

Among the other—(And below: [cf. c. 2, On the Office of a Delegated Judge, I.29.]) Likewise, when some cause is committed with appeal removed and an iniquitous sentence is rendered, it is necessary that it be annulled; nor ought one to stand by it if it contains manifest iniquity.

> Sententia iniqua retractatur per superiorem; licet causa fuerit appellatione remota commissa. Si autem continet manifestam iniquitatem, est nulla. H. d. intelligendo, quod ponat duos casus.

Idem Eboracensi Archiepiscopo.

Inter ceteras (Et infra: [*cf. c. *2. de off. iud. del. I. 29.]) Item quum aliqua causa appellatione remota committitur, et sententia fertur iniqua, eam evacuari oportet, nec ei debet stari, si iniquitatem contineat manifestam.

Chapter X

Latin source headnote: A sentence rendered against an absent person who is not contumacious is not valid in a matrimonial cause. This it says on the understanding that this woman was not contumacious. Panormitanus.

Clement III.

The tenor of your letters transmitted to us shows that, when in the archpresbyterate of Saint Germanus a matrimonial question was being conducted between R. and the woman M. and had been committed to our venerable brother the Bishop of Chieti, because that land was then disturbed by the death of the king, the woman, taking precaution for herself against the evident danger of the roads, could not present herself to the judge, by whom she had now been cited a third time, although she transmitted a messenger with an excuse; nevertheless, the same bishop afterward absolved R., while the woman was absent, from her claim. But the same woman, coming to our presence, obtained letters from us to you that you should take cognizance of the cause and terminate it with its due end, since it could not be decided before the aforementioned bishop because of the disturbance of the land. But the said R., summoned by you to the cause, did not attend, putting forward illness. But because on the following night he presumed to join another woman to himself, you promulgated a sentence of excommunication against him. Afterward, absolved from it and coming to you in his own person, he showed the letters of the aforementioned bishop, by which it appeared that he had been absolved on this account from her disturbance, because the woman did not approach the presence of the bishop.

Therefore, because, as you propose, the same woman daily cries after you with tears and offers her witnesses to prove that the same R. publicly betrothed her with a betrothal ring, you humbly petition to be instructed as to what you ought to do concerning these things. We therefore respond to your inquiry in this way: notwithstanding such unlawful absolution that the bishop made, you shall proceed in the cause, with the impediment of appeal removed, and decide it with its due end, strictly prohibiting the same R. under penalty of excommunication from approaching the woman whom he superinduced before the cause has been decided. Moreover, you shall not reject the witnesses whom the aforesaid M. shall determine to produce from her own kindred, or others, provided that they are otherwise suitable, since blood relatives are accustomed to know their own kinship better than strangers, both through charters, witnesses, recitation of their elders, or other arguments.

Sententia lata contra absentem non contumacem in causa matrimoniali non valet. H. d. intelligendo, qnod haec mulier non fait contumax. Panorm.

Clemens III.

Tenor literarum tuarum nobis transmissus ostendit, quod, quum in archipresbyteratu sancti Germani inter R. et M. mulierem quaestio matrimonii verteretur, et venerabili fratri nostro Theatino episcopo commissa fuisset, quia, terra illa tunc pro regis morte turbata fuerat, mulier sibi evidenti periculo viarum praecavens non poterat se iudici, a quo iam tertio citata fuerat, praesentare, licet nuncium cum excusatione transmiserit, episcopus tamen idem eundem R. postmodum, muliere absente, ab impetione ipsius absolvit. Ceterum eadem mulier ad praesentiam nostram veniens a nobis ad te literas impetravit, ut de causa cognosceres, et eam fine debito terminares, quandoquidem coram memorato episcopo pro commotione terrae non poterat definiri. Dictus vero R., a te vocatus ad causam, infirmitate praetenta non adfuit. Sed quia nocte sequente aliam sibi copulare praesumpsit, in eum excommunicationis sententiam promulgasti; a qua postmodum absolutus ad te in propria persona veniens, ostendit literas episcopi memorati, quibus eum ab inquietatione ipsius ob hoc absolutum fuisse patebat, quod mulier ad praesentiam episcopi non accessit. Quia igitur, sicut proponis, mulier eadem quotidie cum lacrimis clamat post te, suos testes offert ad probandum, quod idem R. eam desponsationis annulo publice subarrasset, tu quid super his agere debeas humiliter postulas edoceri. Ideoque inquisitioni tuae taliter respondemus, quod, non obstante tali illicita absolutione, quam episcopus fecit, in causa sublato appellationis impedimento procedas, et eam debito fine decidas, eidem R. sub poena excommunicationis arctius interdicens, ne ad eam, quam superinduxit, accedat, priusquam fuerit causa decisa. Testes autem non respuas, quos de parentela sua, vel alios, dummodu alias idonei sint, praenominata M. duxerit producendos, quum consanguinei tum chartis, tum testibus, tum et recitatione maiorum vel argumentis aliis melius quam extranei suam consueverunt cognoscere parentelam.

Chapter XI

Latin source headnote: A sentence of separation duly rendered in a matrimonial cause is not revoked solely upon the confession of a spouse asserting the contrary, but in the meantime one stands by it until the contrary is lawfully shown. Thus Panormitanus summarizes it, so that it contributes something new.

The same.

The blood relatives of E., bearer of the present letters, as you intimated to us by your letters, having produced witnesses at law under your examination, lawfully proved spiritual co-parenthood between her and her husband in such a way that you pronounced a sentence of separation between them. But when the aforesaid E. afterward confessed to you that in truth she had not been his co-mother before the sentence, but that after the separation she contracted spiritual co-parenthood with him, she at length hastened into a second marriage. Therefore, because, now recognizing her guilt, she awaits our counsel concerning this, and you also sought a response from us in this matter, by the present page we respond to your fraternity that one is not to withdraw from a sentence reasonably promulgated by a judgment of the Church because of the confession of the woman alone, unless perhaps the contrary were lawfully proved. Finally, you shall impose upon the same woman, who confessed her delict to you, that penance which, according to the quality of the person and the quantity of the excess, you see should be imposed upon her.

Sententia divortii in causa matrimoniali rite lata, ad solum coniugis confessionem asserentis contrarium non revocatur, sed interim ei statur, donec legitime de contrario doceatur. Ita summatur, ut aliquid de novo afferat, Panorm.

Idem.

Consanguinei E. latricis praesentium, sicut nobis tuis literis intimasti, productis in iure sub examine tuo testibus, compaternitatem inter ipsam et virum suum legitime probaverunt ita, quod inter eos sententiam divortii protulisti. Praedicta vero E., quum sit tibi postmodum confessa, quod eius commater in veritate ante sententiam non fuisset, sed post separationem compaternitatem cum eo contraxit, et tandem ad secundas nuptias convolavit. +Quia igitur reatum suum nunc cognoscens consilium nostrum super hoc exspectat, tu etiam a nobis in hoc postulasti responsum, Fraternitati tuae praesenti pagina respondemus, quod propter solam confessionem mulieris non est recedendum a sententia per iudicium ecclesiae rationabiliter promulgata, nisi forte legitime in contrarium probaretur. Ad ultimum vero eidem mulieri delictum suum tibi confessae poenitentiam illam iniungas, quam iuxta qualitatem personae et quantitatem excessus ei videris imponendam.

Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: If the Pope, contrary to his own pronouncement, confers a benefice while concealing this, the collation is said to be surreptitious and does not bind.

Innocent III, to the Archdeacon and Sacristan of Maguelone.

When formerly, [as we have learned,] the Bishop of Maguelone of good memory, [having obtained the assent of the beloved sons P. de Agrifolio, archdeacon, and B., claustral prior,] nominated our beloved son P. of Castelnau to the vacant archdeaconry of the same church, while the provost prohibited by interposed appeal that anyone be instituted there unless a double vote had first been granted to him, the bishop [both because he said that it was contrary to the ancient custom of the Church of Maguelone and the common law of the canons for anyone to claim for himself the vote of two persons in the same church, and because from an indulgence of Pope Celestine, our predecessor of happy memory, which he caused to be read in the chapter while the provost was present, he proved that it was granted to him that he should confer a vacant archdeaconry or sacristy, notwithstanding contradiction or appeal, if nothing reasonable and canonical could lawfully be objected and proved against the person nominated by him,] invested the said P. with the archdeaconry through his ring, placing him corporally in the office of archdeacon. But the provost, agitated by the goads of indignation, [afterward] presumed to nominate another person to the same archdeaconry.

When, on occasion of this act, both the provost and the aforesaid P. presented themselves to the apostolic sight, [and received as auditors in their questions us, then established in a lesser office, and our beloved sons B., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Peter in Chains, and M., of good memory, cardinal priest of the title of Saints John and Paul, the provost objecting that the institution by the bishop ought to be annulled because it was made after appeal, contrary to the definition of Pope Alexander, our predecessor of happy memory, and by one suspended, the aforesaid P. responded, as he asserts, to each point in this manner: namely, that it was established that the appeal itself was of no moment, both because an appeal had been made by a suspended person—which he said that he wished to prove immediately—wherefore it was not his concern to appeal, and because an appeal interposed contrary to the said indulgence did not bind; and because in the form of appeal he expressed a cause prohibited at law, namely that of a double vote or dignity, which according to the canonical sanctions ought to be committed to no person, however experienced. Hence he proved from a consultation of Pope Alexander of happy memory that deference was not to be given to such an appeal. He firmly asserted that the constitution of Henry, formerly Bishop of Albano, under pretext of which the provost had usurped the dignity of senior prior, could not protect him, since in it it is expressed more clearly that henceforth there should be no senior prior in the Church of Maguelone. Hence it followed that neither the provost nor another could in any way claim that dignity for himself, especially since it is expressly contained there that the provost ought not to have the dignity of prior but only care concerning correction of excesses and errors. For if he had wished a dignity to be understood where he placed "care," he would have expressed the term "dignity," as he said could be proved from a consultation of our aforesaid predecessor Pope Alexander. From the words of the constitution itself, however, he showed that the provost ought to have received the said care from the hand of the bishop. Moreover, from the letters of the bishop complaining concerning this, it was clearly evident that the provost, not called by God as Aaron was but arising from himself, had shamelessly assumed honor for himself. Hence, since one who abuses power permitted to him deserves to lose his privilege, he petitioned that perpetual silence concerning this be imposed upon him both in the name of the bishop and in his own, proposing that by law and the ancient custom of the Church of Maguelone the aforementioned dignity was to be conferred only upon one discharging priestly office. He insistently affirmed that the provost could not be promoted to the priesthood because weakness as well as deformity of body impeded him, saying that the party of the bishop, as the greater and sounder part, deservedly prevailed according to the Lateran Council, notwithstanding the appeal of one person. He further alleged that the provost had voluntarily renounced the appeal interposed. For since he had appealed in such a way that no archdeacon ought to be instituted unless a double vote were granted to him, and he himself attempted to proceed to the institution of another, he was convicted by a contrary act, according to a consultation of Pope Urban, our predecessor of good memory, of having withdrawn from the office of appeal. But to the article of the definition he responded in this way, asserting that the bishop proceeded reasonably according to the tenor of the definition, adding also that the provost, by retaining the Churches of Saint Firminus and Maurinus, had acted manifestly contrary to the definition itself and therefore could not invoke its aid at law. To the objection of suspension, he said in opposition that the bishop had first lawfully appealed and therefore was in no way bound by the sentence afterward rendered, proposing also that the sentence of interdict had been rendered conditionally and for a time, namely until he obeyed the apostolic mandates. Hence, since before the said institution he had obeyed the commands of the Apostolic See, he had without doubt been absolved by the censure of both civil and canon law, especially since the person who had suspended him did not at all doubt to communicate with him in all things as one fully absolved. Finally, he concluded that, even if the aforementioned bishop truly were suspended, nevertheless this could not be objected against him by the provost, because, since the provost had been marked by a sentence of suspension for the same matter, every hearing against the bishop ought to have been denied to one laboring under a similar disease, especially since he had often communicated with the bishop himself both in the ecclesiastical sacraments and in institutions of churches, and therefore could not object against him the mark of suspension. Finally, if none of these things supported the party of the bishop, he said that this could suffice to deny the provost a hearing: that from the letters of the bishop it appeared most clearly that the provost was bound by the bond of excommunication both through the sentence of the ordinary judge and by the law itself.]

At length C., our predecessor, annulled by sentence what had been done by either party according to its own will, pronouncing that he would write to certain persons of the province that they should admonish both the bishop and the persons to ordain the archdeacon concordantly and, if perhaps their admonitions were not admitted, should not delay executing this by apostolic authority. But after this our said predecessor, as we believe deceived, conferred the archdeaconry itself, contrary to his own pronouncement, upon G., who had not yet been promoted to the office of the diaconate, without the knowledge of the aforesaid Peter, proctor of the bishop, then staying at the Apostolic See.

We therefore, adhering to the footsteps of our predecessors, who say that a sentence of the Roman See, when something has been obtained by surreption, can be altered for the better, revoke as void, by the [common] counsel of our brothers, what was done concerning the aforesaid G., notwithstanding the donation that he is recently said to have received from the same bishop in mockery of the apostolic donation; and, imposing perpetual silence upon him concerning the said archdeaconry, although absent, since the surreption is clearly established, by authority of the present letters and by commanding, we order you that, notwithstanding any contradiction or appeal, within the space of one month after receipt of these letters, you shall take care to ordain the often-mentioned archdeaconry with a person against whom none of the canonical institutes stands, with the full concord of all of you who shall be present in the church intervening. [Otherwise, etc. Given at Rome, on the sixth day before the Ides of June, 1198.]

Si Papa contra pronunciationem suam confert beneficium, hoc tacito subreptitia dicitur collatio, et non tenet.

Praepositus vero indignationis stimulis agitatus alium ad eundem archidiaconatum [postmodum] nominare praesumpsit. +Cuius facti occasione quum tam praepositus, quam praefatus P. apostolico se conspectui praesentassent, [et nos in minori tunc officio constitutos, et dilectos filios nostros B. tit. sancti Petri ad Vincula, et bonae memoriae M. tit. sancti Ioannis et Pauli presbyteros cardinales recepissent in suis quaestionibus auditores, praeposito obiiciente institutionem episcopi post appellationem, et contra definitionem felicis recordationis Alexandri Papae praedecessoris nostri, et a suspenso factam cassari debere: a praedicto P. (sicut asserit) ad singula fuit hoc modo responsum, scilicet, quod appellationem ipsam nullius constabat esse momenti, tum quia a suspenso fuerat appellatum, quod in continenti se velle probare dicebat, quare illius non intererat appellare, et contra dictam indulgentiam appellatio interposita non tenebat; tum quia causam in iure prohibitam, scilicet duplicis vocis vel dignitatis, quae nulli quantumlibet exercitatae personae secundum canonicas sanctiones debet committi, in forma appellationis, expressit: unde tali appellationi non fuisse deferendum, ex consultatione felicis memoriae Alerandri Papae probabat, nec constitutionem Henrici quondam Albanensis episcopi, cuius obtentu dignitatem prioris maioris usurpaverat, illi posse patrocinari firmiter asserebat, quum in ipsa evidentius exprimatur, ne deinceps prior maior in Magalonensi ecclesia haberetur; unde sequebatur, nec praepositum, nec alium dignitatem illam sibi posse aliquatenus vendicare, praesertim quum ibi contineatur expresse, quod praepositus non dignitatem prioris, sed curam circa correctionem excessuum et erratorum debeat duntaxat habere. Si enim dignitatem vellet intelligi, ubi curam apposuit, dignitatis vocabulum expressisset, sicut ex consultatione dicti Alexandri Papae praedecessoris nostri comprobari dicebat. Ex verbis autem ipsius constitutionis monstrabat, ipsum praepositum dictam curam de manu episcopi accipere debuisse. Ceterum ex literis episcopi super hoc conquerentis evidenter liquebat, praepositum non tanquam Aaron a Deo vocatum, sed a se ipso exortum sibi impudenter honorem sumpsisse. Unde, quum privilegium mereatur amittere qui permissa sibi abutitur potestate, tam nomine episcopi quam suo super hoc ei perpetuum silentium imponi petebat, proponens, quod dignitas memorata non nisi sacerdotali fungenti officio de iure et antiqua Magalonensis ecclesiae consuetudine fuerat conferenda; praepositum vero tam debilitate quam deformitate corporis impediente ad sacerdotium promoveri non posse affirmabat instanter, dicens partem episcopi, utpote maiorem et saniorem, non obstante unius appellatione, merito secundum Lateranense concilium obtinere; insuper allegans, eum praepositum appellationi renunciasse spontaneum interiectae. Quum enim taliter appellasset, ut nullus, nisi duplici sibi voce concessa, archidiaconus deberet institui, et ipse ad institutionem alterius procedere attentaret, contrario actu convincebatur secundum consultationem bonae memoriae praedecessoris nostri Urbani Papae ab appellationis officio recessisse. Ad definitionis autem articulum taliter respondebat, asserens episcopum secundum tenorem definitionis rationabiliter processisse, adiiciens etiam, quod praepositus ecclesias sancti Firmini et de Maurino retinendo contra ipsam definitionem fecerat manifeste, et ideo eius auxilium de iure non poterat invocare. Ad suspensionis obiectionem ex adverso dicebat, quod episcopus prius legitime appellavit, et ideo sententia post lata nullatenus tenebatur adstrictus, proponens etiam, conditionalem et ad tempus latam fuisse sententiam interdicti, scilicet, donec apostolicis obediret mandatis. Unde quum ante dictam institutionem sedis apostolicae iussionibus paruisset, tam civilis quam canonici iuris censura indubitanter fuerat absolutus, praesertim quum ille, qui eum suspenderat, ipsi ut plene absoluto in omnibus communicare minime dubitaret. Ad ultimum concludebat, quod, etsi vere suspensus esset episcopus memoratus, tamen a praeposito hoc ei non posset opponi, quia, quum pro eodem suspensionis sententia notatus fuisset, morbo consimili laboranti omnis contra episcopum audientia debuit denegari, maxime quum ipsi episcopo tam in ecclesiasticis sacramentis, quam in ecclesiarum institutionibus saepe communicasset, et ideo ei notam suspensionis obiicere non valebat. Denique, si nihil horum parti suffragaretur episcopi, ad denegandam praeposito audientiam sufficere posse dicebat, quod tam per sententiam iuducis ordinarii, quam ipso iure eum excommunicationis vinculo innodatum esse, per episcopi literas evidentissime apparebat.] Tandem C. praedecessor noster, quod factum fuerat ab utraque parte pro sua voluntate cassavit sententiando pronuncians, quod aliquibus de provincia scriberet, ut tam episcopum quam personas ad ordinandum concorditer archidiaconum moneret, et, eorum forte monitis non admissis, hoc ipsi auctoritate apostolica exsequi non differrent. Post haec vero dictus praedecessor noster G., qui nondum ad diaconatus erat promotus officium, praeter conscientiam praefati Petri procuratoris episcopi apud sedem apostolicam tunc morantis, ipsum archidiaconatum contra pronunciationem suam contulit, sicut credimus, circumventus. Nos igitur inhaerentes vestigiis praedecessorum nostrorum, dicentium, sententiam Romanae sedis, quum aliquid fuerit subreptum, posse in melius communitari, quod de praedicto G. factum est, non obstante donatione, quam ab eodem episcopo in illusionem donationis apostolicae nuper dicitur recepisse, de [communi] fratrum nostrorum consilio in irritum revocamus, et ei, licet absenti, quum de subreptione liquido constet, super dicto archidiaconatu perpetuum silentium imponentes, vobis praesentium auctoritate praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus nullius contradictione vel appellatione obstante infra unius mensis spatium post harum susceptionem saepe dictum archidiaconatum de persona, cui nihil de canonicis obviet institutis, plena omnium vestrum, qui praesentes fuerint in ecclesia, interveniente concordia, ordinare curetis. Chapter XIII

Latin source headnote: A sentence rendered against the right of a litigant is valid if an appeal was not made from it within ten days. Or otherwise thus: through a sentence from which no appeal was made, a church can be subjected to a prelate inferior to a bishop or made to belong to another church.

The same, to the Abbot and Convent of Saint Zeno of Verona.

When a question was being conducted between you [on one side] on behalf of your church and Musetus, archpriest, and the clerics of Saint Proculus, in the name of their church, concerning subjection of the same Church of Saint Proculus and many other articles, [while you, son Abbot, and the archpriest himself were established in our presence, we appointed as auditors our venerable brothers P., Archbishop of Compostela, and Odo, Bishop of Tortona, then staying at the Apostolic See. But when the bishop himself departed from the regions of the City while the litigation was pending, we took care to substitute in his place the beloved son M., our subdeacon and chaplain. In their presence,] it was proposed on your behalf that the said [Church of Saint Proculus] ought to be subject with full right to your monastery, namely in institution, destitution, or investiture of the archpriest; his fealty; the obedience of him and the brothers; correction; presentation to orders; tonsure; reception of chrism; litanies; and other similar things through which full subjection is declared.

To prove this, your party produced in the midst the public instrument of the grant of B., formerly Bishop of Verona of good memory, which grant his successor T. held ratified and also confirmed. Concerning these matters it also introduced privileges and confirmations both of Roman Pontiffs and of the Patriarchs of Aquileia. One of them, namely Godfrey, expressly stated concerning full subjection in his privilege that this had been done and completed under the testimony of R., formerly Bishop of Verona, who had been archpriest of the same church, and in it he commanded that the prior of the Monastery of Saint Zeno subscribe in his place, as is contained in the public instrument. Your party also added that in the course of time a controversy arose between B., formerly abbot of the same monastery, and Sicherius, Archpriest of Saint Proculus, and his brothers concerning fealty and manual obedience; they denied that they were bound only to those two things, and witnesses were produced concerning them. At length the aforesaid T., Bishop of Verona, the arguments of either party having been heard and learned, following a certain cardinal by whom it had been adjudged that either the archpriest should leave the church or promise obedience to the abbot, and also believing that the witnesses who had given manifest testimony concerning fealty had deposed true things before him, himself likewise defined it by sentence, as we perceived to be contained in the public instrument.

Since his sentence had been suspended by no appeal, it passed into a matter adjudged, which your party asserted could be attacked by no remedy of law. From its pronouncement until the present times, a space of fifty years elapsed, through which it proved by witnesses and instruments that the Monastery of Saint Zeno possessed the aforesaid church with full right; that the aforesaid archpriest and his brothers, past and present, made obedience to the Abbots of Saint Zeno; [that they received tonsure from them and furnished them services in the other matters that we have premised; and thus it firmly asserted that the monastery was in possession until the time of the recently arisen litigation, complaining that the Church of Saint Zeno was unduly molested by the named archpriest concerning certain of the foregoing. It therefore proposed that its assertion was fortified principally by three arguments: namely, confirmation of privileges, authority of the sentence, and length of time, so that a threefold cord is dissolved with difficulty. But in opposition, the aforementioned archpriest denied that all the foregoing belonged to the monastery, responding to the foregoing arguments in this way: because the instrument of the grant of the aforesaid Bishop B. had not been drawn up by a public hand or secured by an episcopal seal and appeared prima facie suspect on account of certain erasures, it neither could nor ought to generate prejudice against his party. And thus neither could the other proofs of the abbot, such as confirmations and privileges dependent upon that donation, since, resting as upon a sandy foundation and a reed staff, and the principal not being valid, the accessories had no firmness. He said that the sentence of the aforementioned T., Bishop of Verona, did not harm his party for this reason also: because it contained neither absolution nor condemnation, since it had been pronounced under an alternative, as was the sentence of the cardinal, which, since it could not be produced in the midst, could neither profit nor harm, especially since he altogether denied that it had been pronounced. Against it, even if it had been pronounced and not suspended by appeal, an action of falsity could nevertheless be brought, since it had been rendered from the instrument of the aforesaid B., Bishop of Verona, falsified through the vice of erasure. Nor are the witnesses said from the tenor of the sentence to have deposed under oath, wherefore no faith was to be given to them. He also said that length of time or prescription could not harm his church, because the adverse party had in no way proved continuous or frequent subjection, but only that an abbacy at some time presided over the Church of Saint Proculus. Moreover, to assert his intention, the party of the aforesaid archpriest produced a public instrument of the above-mentioned B., Bishop of Verona, older than that which had been produced by the already-mentioned abbot. In it, the same bishop, when the archpriest and clerics of Saint Proculus lamentably petitioned him, firmly promised under penalty of excommunication that he would never subject the named church to another, after the archpriest and clerics of the Church of Saint Firmus had heard from the bishop that it was to be subjected. The said T., his successor, confirmed his act by his letters. They would in no way have acted contrary to these letters if the aforesaid abbot, when he obtained from them the letters of subjection that we premised, had disclosed the things that had been done.

Therefore, he said that the rescripts of the abbot were obtained through suppression of the truth with fraud employed. The same archpriest, also wishing to show the liberty of the church, lawfully proved by the depositions of witnesses that he, together with his clerics and without the abbot's permission, had leased and withdrawn leases, and had ordered the chapels of Saints Vitus and Maximus, placing lay sisters and other persons in them; that he had freely instituted cellarers and other officials in his church; and that he had sometimes received chrism from the cathedral church and sometimes from the named monastery. But the party of the abbot, in order to refute the response of the adverse party that said the instrument of donation lacked force, produced other instruments of that time, so that from comparison with them, although they had not been drawn up by a public hand, its instrument might appear authentic, since the simplicity of the people of that time did not require such things. But the adverse party disqualified both it and the others. Furthermore, the party of the abbot said that the instruments of the adverse party, which it proposed bore the mark of falsity, even if they were true, could harm it in no respect, since they had been exhibited in the former judgment, where both these and other things that the adverse party could object—whether committed or even alleged—ought not to be heard further, lest litigations become immortal; they ought in no way to be renewed under pretext of an instrument afterward discovered. Also, a complaint of falsity, which the adverse party wished to propose, does not exceed a space of twenty years; and since forty years and more had elapsed from the time of the sentence rendered, and three years from the time litigation was moved, a complaint of falsity could no longer be brought.]

Therefore, when the aforesaid auditors had prudently and faithfully reported these things that we have premised and many similar things to us and our brothers, we, having communicated the counsel of our brothers, although perhaps one should not rely greatly upon the said instrument of donation or upon the confirmations or privileges that took cause and origin from it, nevertheless, considering that, as far as the litigants themselves are concerned, a right was made from the sentence after it passed into a matter adjudged —even if it had been rendered contrary to the right of a litigant, since it was not rendered expressly contrary to the law of a constitution, the truth of the acts prevailing over words, which is presumed to have been duly celebrated in all respects—we establish and by sentence define that the Archpriest of Saint Proculus who shall be in office for the time being shall furnish fealty and obedience to the Abbot of Saint Zeno. [And because, etc. Given at Rome at Saint Peter's, on the thirteenth day before the Kalends of July, 1198.]

Super his quoque tam Romanorum Pontificum, quam patriarcharum Aquilegiensium privilegia et confirmationes induxit, quorum unus, scilicet Godefridus, de subiectione plenaria in privilegio suo evidenter expressit, quod sub testimonio R. quondam Veronensis episcopi, qui eiusdem ecclesiae archipresbyter exstitit, factum fuerat et completum, et in eo a priore monasterii sancti Zenonis mandavit sua vice subscribi, sicut in instrumento publico continetur. Adiecit etiam pars vestra, quod inter B. quondam abbatem eiusdem monasterii, et Sicherium sancti Proculi archipresbyterum et fratres ipsius procedente tempore de fidelitate et obedientia manuali controversia fuit exorta, ad quae duo illi se duntaxat teneri negabant, et super his testes producti fuerunt. Tandem praefatus T. Veronensis episcopus, rationibus utriusque partis auditis et cognitis, quendam cardinalem sequens, a quo idem fuerat iudicatum, quod vel archipresbyter dimitteret ecclesiam, aut abbati obedientiam repromitteret, credens etiam, quod testes vera deposuerint coram eo, qui de fidelitate manifestum protulerant testimonium, idem et ipse sententialiter diffinivit, sicut in instrumento publico perspeximus contineri. Zenonis praefatam ecclesiam pleno iure possederit, et quod praedictus archipresbyter et fratres eius praeteriti et praesentes obedientiam abbatibus S. Zenonis fecerint,* [tonsuram ab ipsis receperint, et in aliis, quae praemisimus, obsequia sibi praestiterint, per testes et instrumenta probavit, et sic usque ad tempus litis nuper exortae monasterium in possessione fuisse firmiter asserebat, querens, ecclesiam S. Zenonis a nominato archipresbytero super quibusdam de praemissis indebite molestari. Tribus ergo praecipue rationibus suam assertionem proponebat esse munitum, videlicet per privilegiorum confirmationem, per auctoritatem sententiae et per temporis longaevitatem, ut quasi funiculus triplex difficile dissolvatur. Ex opposito vero memoratus archipresbyter praedicta omnia monasterio competere denegabat, praemissis rationibus sic respondens, quod, quum instrumentum concessionis praedicti B. episcopi non fuerit publica manu confectum, nec sigillo episcopali munitum, et propter rasuras quasdam suspectum prima facie videbatur, parti suae nec poterat nec debebat praeiudicium generare, et sic nec ceterae probationes abbatis, ut confirmationes et privilegia, ex ipsa donatione pendentia, quum quasi arenoso fundamento et arundineo baculo niterentur, et principali, non valente nullam haberent accessoria firmitatem. Quod etiam parti suae sententia memorati T. Veronensis episcopi non noceret, illa ratione dicebat, quia non continebat absolutionem vel condemnationem, quum sub alternatione prolata fuisset, sicut et sententia cardinalis, quae, quum in medium produci non posset, nec prodesse poterat nec obesse, praesertim quum et prolatam esse penitus denegaret; contra quam, etiamsi prolata fuisset, nec appellatione suspensa, poterat tamen agi de falso, quum ex instrumento praedicti B. Veronensis episcopi per vitium rasurae falsato lata fuisset. Sed nec testes ex tenore sententiae dicuntur deposuisse iurati, quare nulla fides eis fuerat adhibenda. Longaevitatem etiam temporis seu praescriptionem ecclesiae suae non posse nocere dicebat, quia pars adversa nulla ratione probaverat subiectionem continuam vel frequentem, sed quod ecclesiae S. Proculi quandoque praefuit abbatia. Ceterum ad assertionem intentionis suae pars archipresbyteri praedicti supra dicti B. Veronensis episcopi publicum protulit instrumentum antiquius illo, quod fuerat a iam dicto abbate productum, in quo idem episcopus lacrimabiliter postulantibus archipresbytero et clericis S. Proculi sub poena excommunicationis firmiter repromisit, quod nunquam alii subiiceret ecclesiam nominatam, quam ecclesiae S. Firmi archipresbyter et clerici audierant ab episcopo supponendam. Cuius factum dictus T. successor illius suis literis confirmavit. Contra quas nulla ratione venissent, si praefatus abbas, quum subiectionis ab eis literas, de quibus praemisimus, impetravit, quae gesta fuerant expressisset. Ideoque abbatis rescripta per suppressionem veritatis adhibita fraude dicebat obtenta. Idem etiam archipresbyter libertatem ecclesiae volens ostendere, quod ipse cum clericis suis sine abbatis licentia locaverit et dislocaverit, et capellas sanctorum Viti et Maximi ordinaverit, conversas et alias in eis ponendo personas, et quod canevarios et alias officiales in ecclesia sua libere instituerit, et ab ecclesia cathedrali quandoque chrisma receperit, quandoque a monasterio nominato, depositionibus testium legitime comprobavit. Verum pars abbatis, ut responsionem partis adversae elideret, quae instrumentum donationis viribus carere dicebat, illius temporis alia instrumenta produxit, ut ex eorum collatione, quum non essent publica manu confecta, instrumentum suum authenticum appareret, quum simplicitas hominum illius temporis talia non requireret. Sed pars adversa et illud et alia reprobabat. Porro instrumenta partis adversae, quae notam falsitatis habere pars proponebat abbatis, etiam si vera essent, in nullo sibi posse nocere dicebat, quum in priori iudicio fuissent exhibita, ubi et haec et alia, quae posset obiicere pars adversa, sive commissa fuerint vel etiam allegata, audiri ulterius non deberent, ne lites fierent immortales, quae praetextu instrumenti post reperti non debent ullatenus instaurari. Chapter XIV

Latin source headnote: A sentence rendered against a claimant, containing nothing iniquitous, is to be confirmed in a cause of appeal, although through the attestations it appears that proof was made for the claimant, provided that presumptions concur for the sentence. These are in the letter here, and according to this understanding the case here is very singular.

The same, to the Canons of Novara.

The cause being conducted between you and the beloved son A. Siccus, a cleric, concerning a prebend of the Church of Novara that formerly belonged to our venerable brother the Bishop of Novara, with which the same Albert said that he had been invested by a ring by Pope C., our predecessor of good memory, after it had been examined before us for a rather long time, at length, with the consent of the parties and appeal removed, we committed it to our venerable brother the Bishop of Lodi to be terminated. He, as we learned from his letters, having more fully understood the arguments of either party, promulgated a definitive sentence for you against the said A., from which an appeal was made to our hearing. Therefore, when the said Albert and Masters I. and V., proctors of your church, were established in our presence on this account, the same Albert endeavored in many ways to prove that the sentence itself had been rendered iniquitously and for this reason ought not undeservedly to be retracted, while your said proctors defended the sentence and petitioned that it be fortified by the protection of our confirmation. We therefore, having heard the things proposed on either side and understood them more diligently, having held [also] a diligent deliberation with our brothers concerning this, although it had been proposed on behalf of A. himself that the said bishop promulgated the sentence contrary to the form of our mandate, as he endeavored to prove through the attestations, nevertheless, because the mind of a judge is not always inclined to one kind of proof; because the sentence itself contained nothing iniquitous; because the cause had been committed to the same judge by the common assent of the parties with appeal removed; and because he had been requested by either party to render sentence after examination of the cause, we took care to confirm the sentence itself by apostolic authority and by the counsel of our brothers, and through our venerable brother the Bishop of Porto we defined that it was to be observed [etc. Given at the Lateran, on the sixth day before the Ides of December, 1198.]

Sententia contra actorem lata, nihil iniqui continens, venit in causa appellationis confirmanda, licet per attestationes videatur pro actore fuisse probatum, dummodo pro sententia concurrant praesumptiones. De quibus hic in litera, et secundum hunc intellectum est hic casus singularis valde.

Causam, quae inter vos et dilectum filium A. Siccum clericum super praebenda Novariensis ecclesiae vertebatur, quae quondam fuit venerabilis fratris nostri Novariensis episcopi, de qua se dicebat idem Albertus per bonae memoriae C. Nos igitur, auditis quae fuerant hinc inde proposita et diligentius intellectis, habito [etiam] cum fratribus nostris super hoc diligenti tractatu, Licet ex parte ipsius A. fuisset propositum, quod contra formam mandati nostri dictus episcopus sententiam promulgavit, sicut per attestationes nitebatur probare, quia tamen iudicis animus non semper ad unam probationis speciem inclinatur, et ipsa sententia nihil continebat iniquum, et eidem iudici de communi partium assensu fuerat causa appellatione remota commissa, qui, ut sententiam ferret post examinationem causae, ab utraque parte fuerat requisitus, sententiam ipsam de fratrum nostrorum consilio auctoritate apostolica curavimus confirmare, ac eam per venerabilem fratrem nostrum Portuensem episcopum diffinivimus observandam [etc. Dat. Lat. VI. Id. Dec. 1198.]

Chapter XV

Latin source headnote: If a sentence commands something to be done at a certain term, the period of ten days for appealing runs from the time of the sentence, not from the day when the term ended. This is the first point. The period of four months that is granted by law to those condemned in a personal action can for cause be shortened by the judge, and one who willingly receives the shortened term cannot appeal after ten days, even though it is not established that the judge shortened the term for cause. This is the second. An appeal is not made from execution of a sentence unless the manner is exceeded in execution. This is the third point, extracting the core of the chapter according to Panormitanus.

The same, to the Bishop of Constance.

As to the consultation—(And below:) Because you similarly asked us whether deference is to be given to the appeal of a cleric who, receiving without contradiction a purgation prescribed to him by sentence and a suitable term for receiving it—say twenty days or more—and coming on the day afterward appeals, expressing no cause for appealing, although there is no place except for undertaking the purgation and executing the sentence, and more than ten days is said to have elapsed from its pronouncement and the purgation enjoined, we have determined to respond in this way: since after a space of ten days a sentence passes into the authority of a matter adjudged, one who does not have recourse to the aid of appeal within that time has denied himself an approach to appeal, since through this he appears by interpretation of law to have obeyed the sentence rendered, especially where no cause for appealing is rendered. Nor is it fitting on that account that execution of the sentence itself be retarded, although a period of four months is regularly established for doing this, because it can sometimes be shortened by the person sitting in the middle and also extended. And it can and ought to be imputed to one who from the beginning willingly receives a shorter term, since from this he appears to have contemned a greater benefit. Hence such a person will not be heard when appealing, unless perhaps the canonical manner of execution is exceeded against him. [Given at the Lateran, on the third day before the Ides of January, 1199.]

Sed nec exsecutionem ipsius sententiae ideo convenit retardari, licet ad hoc agendum quadrimestre tempus regulariter sit statutum, quia id arctari potest nonnunquam a sedente in medio, et etiam prorogari. Latin source headnote: A sentence can be proved through witnesses, although they do not depose concerning the causes that customarily move the judge to give sentence.

The same, to the Dean, Chancellor, and C., Canon of London.

As you intimated to us by your letters, when the cause being conducted between H., a subdeacon, and B., priest of Saint Clement, concerning five measures of grain to be paid to the subdeacon himself each year had been committed to you by our delegation, and, the parties being established in your presence, the aforesaid subdeacon petitioned that restitution be made to him, the adversary responded that he was not bound to this, since on another occasion he had been convened before a judge concerning this and absolved by sentence, which he wished to show through the testimony of two priests. From their depositions it was established to you that Master A., by authority of our venerable brother the Bishop of London, absolved him by judgment from the claim of the aforementioned subdeacon. But because their testimony had been put forward as if naked, since they said that they knew nothing concerning the causes that customarily move a judge to pronounce sentence, there was disagreement among the learned in law from whom you sought counsel, some asserting that such testimony was not valid and others thinking that it was. Hence in this ambiguity, you determined that the Apostolic See should be consulted as to what is to be held. But since in very many places in which there is an abundance of prudent persons, the custom exists that all things that move the judge are not expressed in pronouncing sentences, we respond to you in this way: since from the depositions of the aforesaid witnesses it was established to you that a sentence was pronounced by his judge, it ought to be presumed, on account of judicial authority, that all things proceeded lawfully. [Given at the Lateran, on the second day before the Kalends of April, 1199.]

Latin source headnote: Not only a defeated defendant but also a third party whose interest is involved can appeal from the same sentence; and the sentence can be confirmed as regards a defendant showing nothing of his right, but invalidated with respect to a third party reasonably appealing.

The same, to the Bishop of Astorga and the Abbot of Saint Isidore of León.

When, concerning the controversy being conducted between our venerable brother the Bishop of Orense on one side and the Monastery of Celanova on the other concerning its status, various sentences had been rendered for the same bishop, O., archdeacon and messenger of our venerable brother the Bishop of Oviedo, approaching the Apostolic See, complained that through them the Church of Oviedo was gravely injured, to which he proposed that that monastery belonged. (And below:) Therefore, after the aforesaid cardinals faithfully reported these and similar things to us and our brothers, because it was established to us through the letters of the legates that two had proceeded when the third was unable to participate, as we also understood from the assertion of that third person established at the Apostolic See; and against their sentence, since nothing reasonable was proposed and shown on behalf of the monastery why the sentence promulgated for the bishop ought to have been invalidated, we determined, after communicating the counsel of our brothers, that it was to be confirmed as regards the monastery itself, imposing perpetual silence upon it in this part. But because we could not elicit the truth concerning the appeal of the Church of Oviedo, we have determined to commit the cause itself to your examination; through apostolic writings we command that, if it is established that an appeal was reasonably interposed on behalf of the Church of Oviedo and that its messenger was sent to prosecute it within the lawful time, execution of the sentence shall be deferred, lest the Church of Oviedo incur detriment concerning the same possession. Otherwise, it shall be put into execution, as law postulates, without prejudice to the Church of Oviedo, to which the foregoing does not prejudice its ability to obtain its right, since a matter transacted between some persons does not regularly harm others according to canonical and civil constitutions.

Chapter XVIII

Latin source headnote: If one cited for sentence did not appear for a lawful cause unknown to the judge, the sentence rendered in his absence holds, but is retracted when he proves the lawful cause of his absence. But if the impediment is proved not fully, the sentence is not retracted unless he first demonstrates its injustice. This it says, and this is the true and noteworthy understanding according to Panormitanus, which other doctors did not elucidate so clearly.

The same.

When Berthold, a knight, had obligated his manor or estate in Westhusen formerly to P., a knight, as a pledge, after that P. had been taken from the midst, A., his nephew, who succeeded him, of the diocese of Strasbourg, while the church of the same place in Westhusen was vacant, asserting that the right of patronage had passed to him with the whole estate, presented D., a cleric of the same diocese, at the entreaties of C. of good memory, Bishop of Strasbourg, to the archdeacon of the same place for the aforesaid church; and the archdeacon, with the consent and will of the bishop, instituted him in it, causing him to be inducted into corporal possession. But the aforesaid B., lord of the estate, asserting that he had expressly retained the right of patronage for himself when he had obligated the estate to the creditor, presented T., a priest, to the aforementioned bishop, but the bishop did not admit him, at the judgment of his own will. But when the aforesaid bishop had entered the way of all flesh, the said T. lodged a question against the aforementioned D. concerning the aforesaid church before the substitute of the bishop-elect, and the Bishop of Reims, legate of the Apostolic See, delegated the business to judges. When afterward they had remitted to him the attestations received on both sides through the parties, and, while the aforesaid D. approached with his attestations, the said T. took no care to appear either through himself or through a suitable representative, the bishop, after carefully inspecting the attestations of the aforementioned cleric, as we perceived to be contained in his letters, rendered him absolved by sentence from the impetition of the often-mentioned T., imposing silence upon that T. concerning the aforementioned church.

Afterward, however, that priest, approaching the presence of the same archbishop with his attestations within a short time, alleged a just cause of absence. The archbishop, by his letters, commanded the aforesaid Bishop-elect of Strasbourg and the beloved sons, the Abbots of Haute-Seille and Tudebernon, that, if he showed a just cause of absence before them, they should declare the aforesaid sentence to be of no validity and, after carefully inspecting the attestations of both parties, should terminate the cause itself with its due end; otherwise they should cause the sentence that he had rendered firmly to be observed. But when the said bishop-elect and the aforesaid abbots committed their places to others, those subdelegates received witnesses concerning the aforesaid article, from whom the said cleric sent forth the voice of appeal to us.

Although, when each party had approached our presence with the attestations sealed with the seals of the aforesaid judges, the priest had proved a just cause of absence less than sufficiently, nevertheless, lest opinion prejudice truth, wishing to proceed in truth, since Christ is truth, we granted to them as auditor our beloved son R., cardinal deacon of Santa Maria in Domnica. When he had fully and faithfully reported to us all things that had been proposed before him, we, after carefully inspecting the attestations of both parties and the sentence of the aforesaid bishop, found that the same archbishop had been circumvented by the tenor of his sentence: both because it was contained in it that it had been sufficiently proved through the attestations of that cleric that the aforesaid A. had been in possession of the right of patronage when he presented the same Bruno to the aforesaid church, although through those attestations nothing else concerning this had been shown except that, for a certain right customarily rendered from that church to the patrons, the aforesaid P. and A. received ten solidi annually, which the parish priest of the same place nevertheless always resisted providing; and also because it is said in the same sentence that the said T. utterly failed in proof, although it appears manifestly through his attestations that he sufficiently proved his intention; and also because he did not receive the cause sufficiently instructed, since he received the attestations of only one party, which contributed little to the cause.

Hence we have determined that the sentence itself should be invalidated, adjudging the aforesaid church to the aforementioned T., since it has been established to us evidently through the attestations that he was presented to the often-mentioned church by the true patron, imposing perpetual silence upon the adversary concerning it; wherefore, through apostolic writings, [by way of precept,] we command your discretion that, supported by our authority, you cause our sentence to be observed inviolably, inducting the aforesaid T. into corporal possession of the same church and protecting him after induction. [Contradictors, etc. Given at Rome, at Saint Peter's, on the Ides of March, 1205.]

Chapter XX

Latin source headnote: A second sentence, rendered in a different instance contrary to the first, holds by mere law; nor ought it to be infringed, even if it is unjust, since no appeal was taken from it —especially if the first sentence was not shown to the second judges. This it says, according to Panormitanus.

The same, to the Convent of Saint Leodius.

A question was some time ago agitated between the Monastery of Saint Audoen of Rouen and yours concerning the manner of electing an abbot in your said monastery, [*on account of which, when the parties approached the Apostolic See, we gave them as auditors our venerable brother Octavian, Bishop of Ostia, and our beloved son G., cardinal deacon of San Giorgio in Velabro. In their presence it was proposed on behalf of your monastery that, when that abbey was formerly vacant of a pastor, you, coming together as one, assumed for yourselves as abbot by canonical election Richard, a monk and religious man, from the bosom of that church, according to the Rule of blessed Benedict and the liberty of the church, also strengthened by apostolic privilege, presenting that abbot-elect to the diocesan bishop for obtaining the office of benediction. The bishop, being prohibited by the beloved son Geoffrey, abbot of the aforesaid Monastery of Saint Audoen, did not grant what had been requested. Therefore, seeing that your purpose was being retarded, lest anything be done to the prejudice of your monastery, you appealed to the Apostolic See, from which afterward, through your messengers, you obtained letters of commission to our venerable brother Henry, bishop, and the beloved sons Henry, cantor, and R., archdeacon, of Bayeux, under this tenor: that, the parties having been called to their presence, after inspecting the privilege and all the reasons that they should determine to propose on each side, they should terminate the cause itself, with appeal removed, by concord or judgment, notwithstanding any letters obtained from the Apostolic See without mention being made of these. But if all could not participate, the bishop with one of the others should nevertheless execute these things.

When, therefore, the parties, established in the presence of the aforesaid bishop and precentor of Bayeux—their colleague the archdeacon being excused for a certain and necessary cause—could not be recalled to concord, your party wished to produce witnesses greater than every exception to prove that the election had been canonically celebrated according to the tenor of the privilege of Pope Lucius of good memory, our predecessor, granted concerning the election to be made. R., a monk and proctor of the said Abbot of Saint Audoen, presented to them the open letters of our venerable brother the Archbishop of Rouen, the Bishop of Évreux, and the beloved son R., Archdeacon of Évreux, prohibiting them from proceeding in the cause on the ground that they said they had received an apostolic mandate concerning discussion of the same cause. But because the tenor of the mandate had not been inserted in those letters, and the proctor, although more often required, was unwilling to show the original or rescript, setting their prohibition aside, they decreed together more than once that the proof you offered concerning the canonical election was to be admitted.

But the aforesaid proctor, striving to oppose the proof, said that in the preceding election the Monastery of Saint Audoen had been despoiled of possession of a certain right of its own, which it had obtained without disturbance up to the creation of the last abbot of that place, who had been petitioned and elected from the congregation of Saint Audoen by the monks of La Croix. Therefore, when he wished to prove this, they received your witnesses concerning the canonical election, but those of the proctor concerning the alleged spoliation. When, after diligent examination, they were preparing to publish their depositions, at the instance of the said proctor they assigned another day for a second production of witnesses, with which he said that he would be content.

And when the parties came together on the day and at the place, the proctor, being required by the judges themselves concerning the witnesses to be produced, as though renouncing the production of witnesses, delivered to them letters of the beloved sons the Abbots of Bellebec and Mortemer and the Prior of Bellebec, prohibiting them from proceeding in the cause. For they said that they had undertaken a mandate prejudicial to the first, the tenor of which they joined to their letters. But when the first judges, after diligently inspecting the rescript, recognized that it had been obtained through suggestion of falsehood and concealment of the truth—since in the second no mention was made of the apostolic privilege, as in the first, from which the election drew its principal firmness, and the judges themselves were said in the second letters to be suspect to the monks of Saint Audoen for a certain reason, which the proctor could not show—after alleging certain sufficiently frivolous causes of suspicion, he withdrew contumaciously from them without waiting for any interlocutory decision.

Therefore, considering that a recusation of this kind and the allegation of the said suspension had been late and superfluous, especially after the suit had been commenced and witnesses produced on each side—an allegation that perhaps could have had some color before entry into the suit—and also considering that the same mandate had made mention of the former not fully but perfunctorily, they were unwilling to acquiesce in the prohibition of the later judges, just as they had not in that of the former, wishing rather to obey apostolic commands than to exhibit undue reverence to the mandates of inferiors. Many learned in law who were present agreed with them that, since the often-mentioned Abbot of Saint Audoen first obtained letters to the former judges, of which no mention was made in the second, he ought to lack the benefit of both; or, if one mandate ought to prevail over the other, the first was to be obeyed rather than the second, in which there was no mention of the former, since neither did the first, obtained by the same Abbot of Saint Audoen, make mention of that which the other party had obtained.

Moved, therefore, by the foregoing reasons and using the counsel of discreet men, and the attestations of the parties also having been published and their reasons and allegations subtly understood, by authority of our mandate they held the aforesaid election ratified and firm, imposing perpetual silence upon the abbot and monks of Saint Audoen concerning that molestation of the abbot-elect. They also condemned them in expenses of one hundred Angevin pounds, although the other party wished, after giving oath, to declare concerning two hundred. Your party therefore petitioned us that the act of the delegated judges be confirmed and the office of benediction be imparted to the abbot-elect.

But the other party proposed in opposition that your often-mentioned monastery had from the beginning of its construction been made subject to the other by consent of the diocesan bishop to such an extent that no one was to be assumed there as abbot from anywhere other than the Monastery of Saint Audoen, provided that someone suitable for this could be found in it. The correction of the monks and of the Abbot of La Croix also, if he were negligent, was reserved to the Abbots of Saint Audoen, and thus it had obtained from times so long that no memory of them exists. And this institution and the use itself, indeed, are alleged to have been confirmed by Pope Alexander of good memory, our predecessor. Hence, when at one time the monks of Saint Leufredus had elected a certain abbot from somewhere other than the bosom of Saint Audoen, the Abbot of Saint Audoen, learning these things, appealed; and through a sentence of delegates of the Apostolic See the abbot-elect was obliged to renounce the abbey. When, after making profession to the Abbot of Saint Audoen, he had resided for several days in that monastery, through the abbot's grant he was given as abbot to the aforesaid monks.

But while the last abbot still held the monastery—from which, compelled by fear of the king, he withdrew for a time—and while the monks wished to vindicate themselves into liberty and proceed to an unaccustomed election, the Abbot of Saint Audoen, foreseeing this, appealed to the Apostolic See, as Richard, then your abbot-elect, confessed in judgment, adding nevertheless that he had appealed first. But the often-mentioned monks, nevertheless electing him as abbot, obtained an apostolic rescript to the already-said Henry, Bishop of Bayeux, and his colleagues. The Abbot of Saint Audoen, desiring to avoid their judgment as suspect, obtained letters of revocation to the aforesaid abbot and prior. After the prohibition of the former judges, who intimated to them the tenor of the apostolic mandate through their letters, and after the abbot's proctor presented the authentic instrument to them, those former judges asserted that the letters had been obtained through suggestion of falsehood because no mention of the privilege of the adverse party was made in them; and, even after the appeal interposed by the same proctor, they nevertheless proceeded in the cause. On behalf of the Monastery of Saint Audoen they petitioned that their act be revoked as invalid.*]

Therefore, these and similar things that the already-said bishop and cardinal prudently and faithfully reported to us and our brothers having been more fully understood, since it was established to us that the first commission had not been revoked through the last—both because the causes of suspicion proposed in law appeared frivolous, which they ought also to have raised as dilatory before entry into the suit, and which they seem to have renounced by undergoing judgment before the same delegates; and also because nothing was said in the second letters concerning privileges of the Apostolic See and the process of the business up to the publication of witnesses before the first judges, which, if it had been expressed, they could by no means have obtained them—notwithstanding the sentence that was said to have been rendered for the Monastery of Saint A., which nevertheless was not shown to us, since, if it had been shown to the aforesaid judges, they would have set it aside and established the contrary; otherwise, it is the case that it is to be imputed to those raising it, since suits ought not to be renewed under pretext of new instruments: after communicating the counsel of our brothers, we hold the act of the first judges ratified and firm, and, confirming their sentence, we ourselves took care that the office of benediction be exhibited to the abbot-elect by you afterward, saving the right of the diocesan bishop. [Therefore, let no one, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the third day before the Nones of June, 1199.]

Latin source headnote: A sentence rendered contrary to a privilege, whether shown or not shown, holds if no appeal or supplication was made from it.

The same, to the Bishop, Dean, and Chancellor of Paris.

When a matter of question had some time ago arisen between our venerable brother the Bishop of Meaux and the Monastery of Arras concerning the subjection of the monastery itself, and the proctors of the parties were litigating before us, because it was established through the confession of the adverse party that the same bishop had had a quasi-possession of obedience in the same monastery, we decreed that he was to be restored to it. But because a privilege of Pope Innocent of happy memory, our predecessor, expressed the full liberty of the monastery, we commanded [the beloved son Master G.,] Dean of Soissons, and his fellow judges that, when the [aforementioned] bishop had been restored to the quasi-possession of obedience, unless within six months after his restoration he objected and proved something reasonable against the privilege, they should take care, with the obstacle of appeal removed, to impose upon him perpetual silence concerning the subjection of the aforesaid monastery. [*We strictly prohibited him from daring thereafter to molest the same monastery concerning the liberty of the privilege. But if it were the will of the parties, after sufficiently instructing the cause and remitting it to our presence, they were to set for them a suitable term at which they should present themselves before us to receive sentence.

Therefore, when the parties were afterward established in the presence of those judges and the same bishop had had a copy of the privilege, he wished to accuse it of falsity on the ground that, when the bull of that privilege was compared with other bulls, it appeared, as the bishop proposed, smaller than and dissimilar to the others. He also alleged the authority of a matter adjudged to evacuate the force of the privilege, asserting that Pope Alexander of happy memory, our predecessor, as he showed through Alexander's letters, had promulgated a sentence against the monastery concerning this. The same bishop additionally introduced privileges of the said Pope Alexander and Pope Honorius of good memory, our predecessors, in which it is expressly recognized to have been established that canonical obedience should be rendered to him by the Abbot of Rebais.

But the abbot of the aforesaid monastery proposed in opposition that he ought to enjoy full liberty by authority of the aforesaid privilege, and indeed also for another reason: namely, because Saint Faro, Bishop of Meaux, had determined that a most liberal privilege should be granted to it, as he said was manifestly contained in the legend of that saint. The same abbot added that, until that day, he had never heard any mention of the aforesaid sentence that the bishop alleged for his own party; but even if the sentence were genuine, there had been a tacit withdrawal from it through the amicable settlement that followed. For, as he said, such a settlement intervened between B. of good memory, Abbot of Rebais, and Stephen, Bishop of Meaux, that the same abbot would render obedience to him on this condition: that if the privilege of liberty, which he did not have at hand, were found, the same abbot would enjoy liberty and would be bound in no way to exhibit obedience to that bishop. The same abbot asserted that he would prove this settlement and certain other things that he had proposed.

Therefore, a day having been assigned at Paris, the dean and succentor received the witnesses of the aforesaid abbot, because the third judge could not participate, and at Rebais they examined the same witnesses and certain other elderly and infirm persons. At length, when your party, to make greater faith concerning Alexander's sentence, presented to the judges the letters of certain cardinals and others, the abbot's party objected that, since a period of six months was comprehended in our letters, within which you had the faculty of proving what you wished, after that time had elapsed you could not exhibit instruments on your behalf or other proofs. But since the approach to proving was not closed to you, it requested that an oath be received, which the chapter of Rebais commanded to be rendered under peril of their souls, namely, that they had never seen before the sentence that you determined was to be exhibited.*]

But when the judges remitted the instructed cause, because we recognized the bishop's reasons to be more efficacious, we adjudged to him the subjection of the aforementioned monastery, so that there he may have free power as diocesan bishop, yet in such a way that no prejudice is generated thereby to the Apostolic See, whereby, at the lawful time, if it wishes, it may prosecute its justice. For indeed, if the privilege of the aforesaid Innocent was presented to Alexander in judgment and he rendered sentence against it, he is understood to have disapproved it. But if it was not exhibited before him, the aforesaid sentence ought not to be retracted under pretext of a newly found privilege. Wherefore, through apostolic writings, we command your discretion that you cause what has been defined by us by sentence to be observed reasonably, with appeal removed, [constraining contradictors, if there are any, etc. Given at Viterbo, on the seventeenth day before the Kalends of July, in the tenth year, 1207.]

Chapter XXII

Latin source headnote: A sentence from which an appeal was taken is retracted if it is established that the witnesses, upon whose statements alone it was rendered, were conspirators and were received over the party's contradiction.

The same, Alexander III, to the Abbots of Saint Mary in Cagi and of Valsecrète.

When I. and A., canons of Saint Denis of Reims, revealed to our apostolate on behalf of certain canons of the same church that their abbot was multiply defamed concerning dilapidation, perjury, simony, and certain other things, and when concerning these and other matters they had litigated for a long time at the Apostolic See with the proctor of the abbot himself, we afterward commanded our venerable brother the Bishop of Châlons and his colleagues that, personally approaching that church, they should correct, both in head and members, the things to be corrected, with appeal set aside, and establish the things they should see were to be established. [Afterward, when both the abbot and the canons were established before them, the same abbot appealed lest the judges proceed in that business against the order of law; and when the judges required from the abbot and canons alike an oath concerning speaking the truth about the status of the church, the abbot, asserting through his advocate that he had been despoiled, petitioned from them the benefit of restitution. Thereupon] the judges, [with the will of the parties, restored the abbot himself to the administration of spiritual things and committed the care of temporal things to certain discreet and faithful men. After these things,] receiving the oaths of the abbot and canons, [they examined certain of them on the same day, establishing another day for examining others, which each party received gladly. But on the appointed day, while the abbot did not appear before them at all, the Abbot of Saint James of Provins, his maternal uncle, presented himself with open letters concerning ratification. While he in no way contradicted, the judges proceeded in that examination; and when on the following day they were prepared to promulgate sentence, the aforesaid proctor exhibited before them letters in which it was expressly contained that he renewed the appeal that he had interposed on the first day. But the judges, considering that the same abbot had tacitly renounced the aforesaid appeal by rendering the oath and undergoing their judgment, especially since the obstacle of appeal was closed off by our letters and an irreparable collapse of that church was feared,] after taking the counsel of prudent men, removed the aforementioned abbot from the administration of the church itself by sentence, deferring the correction of the members, which they could not then dispatch.

When the aforesaid proctor appealed from that sentence as iniquitous to our hearing, [on the ground that the delegates had declared by interlocutory decision that, for the aforesaid causes, there had been a withdrawal from the appeal; moreover, when the aforesaid abbot and the proctor of the canons recently came to the Apostolic See on account of this, before our beloved son John, cardinal deacon of Santa Maria in Via Lata, whom we gave to them as auditor, the same abbot proposed many things] through which he said that the said sentence was deservedly to be disapproved: [both because those letters by whose authority the judges proceeded had been obtained by suppression of the truth, since the canons through whom they were obtained had made no mention of the threefold sentence of excommunication with which they had been bound by him because they were dice players, frequently entered taverns, and were disobedient to him;] and because [after the appeal interposed to us, in the inquiry itself —although a charitable admonition had in no way preceded the denunciation, while he had not yet been restored— and] the judges proceeded in that business without joinder of issue; and also because, receiving the oaths of conspirators against him, the judges presumed to proceed to sentence when the depositions had in no way been published before the parties or shown to him.

[*To these things the other party responded that the aforesaid canons could in no way be repelled under pretext of an excommunication of this kind, since, even if that excommunication were established, the same abbot had communicated with them in divine things not only through his proctor, who received common letters with them, but also through himself. Nor could the aforesaid appeal have impeded the judges' process; for when the abbot appealed lest the judges proceed against the order of law, and the judges proceeded according to the order of law in all things, it appears evidently that nothing at all was attempted contrary to that provocation. But even if an admonition had not preceded the denunciation, it is the case that it can be imputed to the abbot if he neglected to allege this at the beginning. The aforesaid party also added that the same abbot ought not to have been restored to temporal things, although he was restored to spiritual things, since a question concerning dilapidation was being held; rather, in such a case, according to the rigor of law, even if he had been found in possession of the administration, he could not undeservedly have been removed as suspect.

Furthermore, it was not necessary that joinder of issue be made before those judges, since long ago issue had been joined at the Apostolic See through the proctors of both parties concerning the same articles, especially since that subtlety is not to be observed in inquiries so that joinder of issue is necessarily required. And this one thing could have sufficed against the preceding citations: that he voluntarily underwent the judgment of inquiry. Although it were also established that the judges received the oaths of conspirators, nevertheless their process ought not to be invalidated from this, since it is not established that they pronounced the sentence by following those persons' statements —especially since the statements of confederates could be received in those matters that in no way touched the abbot. Nor could the depositions of the witnesses be published before the parties or a copy of them be made for the abbot, since he had absented himself through contumacy and the aforesaid proctor had not been sent for defense of the cause but only for renewing the provocation. When, therefore, that cardinal faithfully reported to us these and other things that were proposed before him,*] because full faith could not be made to us concerning the article of conspiracy, [through apostolic writings, we] command your discretion that, after more fully inquiring into the truth, if it is established to you that those whose oaths it is established were received by the judges were conspirators, and that this very thing the abbot wished to prove before them, and that the judges, following only their statements when those matters had not been proved through others, pronounced the sentence, then, with appeal removed, invalidating their process, you shall proceed in that business according to the aforesaid form comprehended in the former letters.

But if he is unable to prove that they were conspirators, or, although this were established, it nevertheless appears that they deposed nothing concerning those things for which the same abbot was removed, or, even if they deposed something concerning them, those things nevertheless had been sufficiently shown through the statements of others, you shall confirm the process of those judges, with the obstacle of appeal removed. For although conspirators ought not to have been admitted against the abbot, their oaths concerning speaking the truth about the status of that house could nevertheless have been received, so that faith might be had through their statements concerning other things that in no way touched the abbot, especially since at that time it had not been proved that they were conspirators. [Moreover, we will and command, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the fifteenth day before the Kalends of April, in the eleventh year, 1208.]

Latin source headnote: When a sentence has been revoked because of a defect of jurisdiction—as because one of the judges was publicly excommunicated—or because the order of law was not observed, inquiry is made again concerning the principal matter.

The same.

To prove that the proctor of the lady—(And below:) Meanwhile, however, take cognizance of the sentence of confirmation that was rendered by the delegated judges concerning the election of the custodian, so that you take care to confirm or invalidate it, as ought to be done by law; in such manner, indeed, that, if it is established that the same sentence is to be invalidated because one of the delegated judges who pronounced it was publicly bound by the bond of excommunication when the sentence was rendered, as is asserted through the metropolitan's letters, or for another just cause, after it has been quashed you shall take cognizance again concerning the election of the custodian herself, and, hearing the things that have been proposed and shown both as to the act and as to the person, if the election is found canonical, confirm it by our authority; otherwise, after invalidating it utterly, give the sisters the faculty of freely electing, and confirm by apostolic authority, with the obstacle of appeal removed, the election of the woman whom they have determined is regularly to be elected as their abbess, and cause provision to be made for the aforesaid custodian from the goods of the church for legitimate expenses incurred.

Chapter XXV

Latin source headnote: A matter adjudged between some persons does not harm others. This fails in the case of one who allowed him to litigate to whom an action or defense belonged in the second place, or from whom he derived his cause in the matter adjudged.

Gregory IX.

Although regularly a matter adjudged between some persons does not harm others, nevertheless prejudice is generated for one who, when an action or defense concerning that matter belonged first to him, allowed a subsequent person to act, and also for one who allowed the person from whom he derived his cause to litigate.

> Res inter alios iudicata aliis non nocet. Fallit in eo, qui passus est illum litigare, cui secundo loco competebat actio vel defensio, vel a quo causam in iure iudicato habuit.
>
> Gregorius IX.
>
> Quamvis regulariter aliis non noceat res inter alios iudicata, ei tamen, qui, quum sibi primum de ea re actio vel defensio competebat, sustinuit sequentem agere, ac illi etiam, qui passus est eum, a quo causam habuit, experiri, est praeiudicium generatum.

Chapter XXVI

Latin source headnote: If two ordinaries pronounce contrary sentences, the sentence for the defendant holds. This fails in the four cases contained here and similar ones. But if delegated judges disagree, the delegator is to be approached; if arbiters disagree, neither sentence holds.

The same.

When two judges, as we have received, pronounce differing sentences, if they proceeded from ordinary jurisdiction, the sentence for the defendant, not for the claimant, holds, unless in a favorable cause—for example, marriage, liberty, dowry, or testament—it was promulgated for the claimant. But if they proceeded from delegated power, each sentence depends upon the decision of the delegator. But if they proceeded from a compromise, neither ought to have force.

> Si duo ordinarii pronunciant contraria, tenet sententia pro reo. Fallit in quatuor casibus hie contentis, et similibus. Si vero delegati discordant, delegans est adeundus; si arbitri, neutra tenet.
>
> Idem.
>
> Duobus iudicibus, ut accepimus, diversas sententias proferentibus, si ex iurisdictione ordinaria processerunt, tenet pro reo, non pro actore sententia, nisi in causa favorabili, puta matrimonio, libertate, dote seu testamento, pro ipso fuerit promulgata. Si vero ex delegata potestate, utraque pendet sententia ex arbitrio delegantis. Quodsi ex compromisso, neutra debet habere vigorem.

Title XXVIII: On Appeals, Recusations, and References

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A collation of a benefice made after an appeal interposed from a probable and plausible cause is null by the law itself.

Alexander III, to the Bishop of Exeter and the Dean of London.

Our beloved sons, the prior and clerics of Giseburn, transmitted a grievance very grave and difficult for us: that our venerable brother R., Archbishop of York and legate of the Apostolic See, suspended that prior after an appeal made to us, and interdicted his churches, and declared the canons excommunicated if they obeyed him as prior. (And below:) Concerning all of these things, if, after the truth has been solicitously inquired into through suitable persons and the reputation of the locality, you find that grants of the churches were made in such manner, unless the prior and canons maliciously deferred arranging them insofar as it pertained to them, you shall revoke those grants as invalid, by our authority, notwithstanding any appeal, causing the churches themselves to be restored to the prior and canons and compelling both the vicars and those who swore to their canons to observe the oath rendered, unless it was unjustly extorted by the prior. Being provident, etc. [Cf. c. 6, On Judgments, II. 1.]

> De appellationibus, recusationibus, et relationibus.
> Collatio beneficii facta post appellationem ex probabili et verisimili causa interpositam est ipso iure nulla.
>
> Alexander III. Exonensi Episcopo et Decano Lundonensi.
>
> Dilecti filii nostri prior et clerici de Gisebergen, gravem admodum et difficilem nobis querimoniam transmiserunt, quod venerabilis frater noster R. Eboracensis archiepiscopus et apostolicae sedis legatus eundem priorem post appellationem ad nos factam suspendit, et suas ecclesias interdixit, et canonicos, si eidem tanquam priori obedirent, excommunicatos denunciavit. (Et infra:) Super quibus omnibus si veritate per idoneas personas et famam loci sollicite inquisita inveneritis ecclesiarum concessiones taliter factas, nisi prior et canonici malitiose distulerint eas, quantum ad se pertinet, ordinare, nullius appellatione obstante auctoritate nostra in irritum revocetis easdem, et priori et canonicis ecclesias ipsas restitui facientes, et tam vicarios quam iuratos eorum canonicorum iuramentum praestitum servare cogatis nisi fuerit a priore inique extortum. Provisuri etc. [cf. c. 6. de iudic. II. 1.]

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: A general appeal with respect to a cause is not valid.

The same, to the Archbishop of Reims.

Among the other things concerning which you wished to consult us—what you ought to do concerning those who appeal from you and do not prosecute the appeal—we respond thus: that you ought to compel them within a suitable term to prosecute the interposed appeal or to submit to justice before you. But concerning the fact that the Abbot of Saint Apollinaris in the cloister interposed before you a general appeal concerning every cause that could be moved against him at any time, we reproved him thereupon and determined that an appeal of this kind was not to be admitted. But if someone specifically appeals from you to us, we do not have power to remit him to your examination.

> Appellatio generalis respectu causae non valet.

Idem Archiepiscopo Remensi.

Inter cetera +quod nos consulere voluisti, quid facere debeas de his, qui appellant a te nec appellationem prosequuntur, taliter respondemus, quod debes eos compellere infra congruum terminum appellationem interpositam prosequi aut coram te iustitiae parere. Super eo vero, quod abbas sancti Apollinaris in claustro a te appellationem interposuit generalem super omni causa, quae adversus eum aliquo tempore posset moveri, ipsum exinde redarguimus, nec huiusmodi appellationem duximus admittendam. Verum si quis specialiter a te ad nos appellaverit ad examen tuum eum remittere non valemus.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: No appeal is made from lawful correction unless the measure is exceeded. This it says, when the intention of the letter is inspected.

The same, to the Abbot of Saint Peter.

You should know that it has reached our hearing that, if at any time you wish to correct and chastise your subjects for their excesses according to the Rule of blessed Benedict and the institution of your order, they flee to the remedy of appeal so that they may be able more freely to exercise their malice. But because the remedy of appeal was not invented for this purpose, that it ought to exhibit protection in his wickedness to someone deviating from observance of religion and order, through apostolic writings, by way of precept, we command your discretion that, if at any time any one of your subjects has flown to the remedy of appeal lest you correct and chastise him for his excesses, you shall no less on that account correct and chastise him according to the tenor of the mandate contained in the aforesaid rule and the institution of the order.

A correctione legitima non appellatur, nisi modus excedatur. H. d. inspecta mente literae.

Idem Abbati S. Petri.

Ad nostram +noveris audientiam pervenisse, quod, si quando subditos tuos vis pro suis excessibus secundum regulam B. Benedicti et institutionem tui ordinis corrigere et castigare, ipsi, ut malitiam liberius suam valeant exercere, ad appellationis remedium confugiunt. Quia vero remedium appellationis non ideo est inventum, ut alicui a religionis et ordinis observantia exorbitanti debeat in sua nequitia patrocinium exhibere, discretioni tuae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus, si quando quilibet subditorum tuorum, ne ipsum pro suis excessibus corrigas et castiges, ad remedium appellationis convolaverit, non ideo minus eum iuxta tenorem mandati, quod in praedicta regula continetur, et institutionem ordinis corrigas et castiges.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: If an appellant does not prosecute the appeal within the term established by the judge from whom he appealed or by himself, he is compelled to stand by that judge's sentence or judgment.

The same, to the Bishop of Norwich.

You shall fortify the parsons of the churches situated in your diocese by your authentic writings and those of the lords of the estate in such a way that, when it should happen that any of them dies, the son or vicar of the deceased, or anyone else, cannot by any cunning forestall your course of conferring the parsonship of the vacant church upon a suitable man. But if any of such persons appeals to our hearing for the sake of frustrating delay and fixes a protracted term for his appeal, you shall assign him a day within which he can suitably approach the Apostolic See. If he contemns to come to it, you shall then strictly compel him to stand by your judgment concerning those things that are in question, without any contradiction, every excuse and appeal ceasing. But if anyone fixes a suitable term for his appeal and nevertheless has not prosecuted the cause by the day of appeal, you shall no less constrain him thenceforth to obey your sentence, with appeal removed, as we said concerning the other. But if, etc. (Cf. c. 20, On Witnesses, II. 20.)

> Si appellans infra terminum, a iudice, a quo appellavit, vel a se ipso statutum, appellationem non prosequitur, sententiae vel iudicio illius stare compellitur.
>
> Idem Norvicensi Episcopo.
>
> Personas ecclesiarum +in tua dioecesi consistentium ita tuis et dominorum fundi authenticis scriptis praemunias, ut, quum aliquam illarum decedere forte contigerit decedentis filius vel vicarius seu alius quilibet personatum ecclesiae vacantis viro idoneo conferendi tibi viam praeripere aliqua calliditate non possit. Quod Si quis talium ad nostram audientiam frustratoriae dilationis causa appellaverit, et appellationi suae prolixum terminum praefixerit, tu ei diem, infra quem apostolicam sedem convenienter possit adire, assignes. Ad quam si venire contempserit, tu illum extunc iudicio tuo super iis, quae in quaestione vertuntur, sine contradictione aliqua stare omni excusatione et appellatione cessante districte compellas. Si autem quisquam appellationi suae praefigat terminum congruentem, nec tamen causam ad diem appellationis fuerit prosecutus, ipsum nihilominus ex tunc sententiae tuae, sicut de alio diximus, appellatione remota parere constringas. Verum si etc. (*cf. c. *20. de test. II. 20.)

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: An appellant has a year for prosecuting and, for cause, two years, unless the judge moderates the period. And if he does not prosecute within that time, the sentence remains ratified, or he returns to the first judge if he appealed before sentence. This it says. § 1. One who is assailed concerning a crime can appeal unless the crime is notorious. This it says.

The same, to the Archbishop of Reims.

Since the most holy Roman Church has been constituted by the Lord's ordering as the head and mistress of all churches, and consultations and questions are deservedly referred to it from the diverse parts of the world, we rejoice that you have consulted it concerning various questions of law and not undeservedly commend your prudence. Hence it is that by the present writing we have determined that a worthy response should be made to your fraternity: that, if an appeal has been made for the sake of frustrating delay or even necessarily before sentence or afterward, a year is granted to appellants of this kind, or, from a necessary and evident cause, two years, unless perhaps the judge from whom the appeal was taken has moderated a shorter time according to the distance of the places and provinces and the quality of the persons and business. If, within that time, the person who appealed has not prosecuted the cause of appeal, the sentence will hold. If he appealed after sentence, he also appears to have fallen from his cause, nor will the appellant be heard further concerning the same business. But if an appeal was taken from a grievance and before entry into the suit, an appellant of this kind will be heard, since the sacred canons allow appeals everywhere even outside judgment; appeals of this kind are not customarily called appeals but provocations to a cause. But if someone appealed before sentence, he is compelled to stand by the judgment of the person to whom he is known to have appealed.

§ 1. Moreover, if the person who appeals is a ravisher or otherwise a violent detainer of another's thing, an appeal of this kind made in judgment before ecclesiastical persons is customarily heard, unless perhaps he is a manifest ravisher or fornicator, like the man whom the Apostle excommunicated while absent and without being required. [To these things, etc. Cf. the following chapter.]

> Appellans ad prosequendum habet annum, et ex causa biennium, nisi iudex moderetur. Et si infra id tempus non prosequitur, rata manet sententia, vel redit ad primum, si ante sententiam appellavit. H. d. - §. 1. Qui de crimine impetitur, appellare potest, nisi sit notorium. Hoc dicit.
>
> Idem Remensi Archiepiscopo.
>
> Quum sit sacrosancta Romana +ecclesia caput et magistra omnium ecclesiarum disponente Domino constituta, et ad eam consultationes et quaestiones de diversis mundi partibus merito referantur, quod eam super variis iuris quaestionibus consulueris, gratulamur et prudentiam tuam non immerito commendamus. Inde est, quod scriptis praesentibus Fraternitati tuae dignum duximus respondendum, quod, si frustratoriae dilationis causa vel etiam necessario ante sententiam vel postea fuerit appellatum, huiusmodi appellantibus annus indulgetur aut ex necessaria et evidenti causa biennium, nisi forte iudex, a quo appellatum fuerit, secundum locorum et provinciarum distantiam, et personarum et negotii qualitatem recisius tempus fuerit moderatus. Infra quod si is, qui appellaverit, causam appellationis non fuerit prosecutus, tenebit sententia. Si post sententiam appellaverit, et a causa sua cecidisse videtur, nec amplius super eodem negotio audietur appellans. Si vero a gravamine et ante litis ingressum fuerit appellatum, huiusmodi audietur appellans, quoniam sacri canones etiam extra iudicium passim appellare permittunt, nec solent huiusmodi dici appellationes, sed provocationes ad causam. Si autem ante sententiam quis appellaverit, cogitur illius stare iudicio, ad quem noscitur appellasse. §. 1. Praeterea si raptor sit, vel alias violentus detentor alienae rei is, qui appellat, huiusmodi appellatio facta in iudicio apud ecclesiasticas personas solet audiri, nisi forte manifestus raptor vel fornicator exsistat, sicut ille, quem absentem et irrequisitum Apostolus excommunicavit. [Ad haec etc. cf. c. sequ.]

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: Before the judge from whom I have appealed in one cause, I can be convened in another, unless I recuse him as suspect.

The same, to the same.

To these things: if someone appeals in one cause and, while the appeal is pending, commits some crime, or is said previously to have committed one, or is now even accused, or is convened concerning another matter about which no appeal has been taken, and it happens that it is brought to the hearing of the judge from whom he [also] appealed in another business, he can, if he wishes, avoid him as suspect; otherwise he will be obliged to stand by the judgment of the person from whom the appeal was taken, especially if he is his ordinary judge. [Likewise if to two persons; cf. the following chapter.]

> Coram iudice, a quo appellavi in una causa, possum in alia conveniri, nisi eum recusem ut suspectum.
>
> Idem eidem.
>
> Ad haec si in una causa quis appellaverit, et pendente appellatione aliquod crimen committat, vel prius commisisse dicatur, vel modo etiam accusetur, aut conveniatur de alia re, super qua non sit appellatum, et illam proferri contingat ad audientiam iudicis, a quo in alio [quoque] negotio appellavit, eum potest, si voluerit, tanquam suspectum vitare; alioquin debebit eius stare iudicio, a quo appellatum est, maxime si suus ordinarius iudex exsistat. [Item si duobus cf. c. sequ.]

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: If, from a lower judge, one person appeals to the Pope and another to an inferior judge, the person appealing to the Pope is bound to appear upon the citation of the inferior judge, at least to allege his appeal; otherwise the process before the lesser judge will be valid, unless he knew that an appeal had been interposed to the Pope. § 1. No appeal is made to the Pope from a civil judge who is not of the temporal jurisdiction of the Church. This it says up to the end.

The same.

If, while two persons are litigating before their own judge, one appeals concerning the same business to our hearing and the other to the hearing of his own judge, and the person who appealed to his own judge, coming on the day of appeal, proposes that he appealed to him—being silent concerning the fact that his adversary had appealed to the hearing of the Roman Pontiff—if that adversary, lawfully cited, neither comes nor sends any representative, or otherwise even contemns to obey, and the judge renders a sentence of excommunication against him, the sentence of excommunication promulgated against him for contumacy will [certainly] hold, unless the judge knew that he had appealed to the hearing of the Roman Pontiff.

§ 1. Finally, as to what you ask at the end of your questions: if an appeal has been taken from a civil judge, before judgment or afterward, to our hearing, whether an appeal of this kind holds—it indeed holds in the case of those who are subject to our temporal jurisdiction; but in the case of others, although it holds by custom of the Church, according to the rigor of law we believe that it does not hold. [Given at Tusculum, on the eleventh day before the Kalends of April.]

> Si a iudice inferiori unus appellat ad Papam, alius ad inferiorem, tenetur appellans ad Papam comparere ad citationem iudicis inferioris, saltem allegaturus appellationem suam; alias valebit processus a minori, nisi sciverit appellationem interiectam ad Papam. - §. 1. A civili iudice, qui non est de temporali iurisdictione ecclesiae, non appellatur ad Papam. H. d. usque ad finem.
>
> Idem.
>
> Si duobus coram suo iudice litigantibus alter ad nostram, alter ad sui iudicis audientiam super eodem negotio appellaverit, et ille, qui ad suum iudicem appellavit, ad diem appellationis veniens, se ad eum appellasse proponit, eo tacito, quod adversarius eius ad audientiam Romani Pontificis appellarat, si legitime citatus nec venit, nec aliquem responsalem misit, aut etiam alias parere contemnit, et in eum excommunicationis sententiam tulerit, tenebit [utique] excommunicationis sententia in eum pro contumacia promulgata, nisi iudex cognoverit, eum ad audientiam Romani Pontificis appellasse. §. 1. Denique, quod in fine quaestionum tuarum quaeris, si a civili iudice ante iudicium vel post ad nostram audientiam fuerit appellatum, an huiusmodi appellatio teneat: tenet quidem in his, qui sunt nostrae temporali iurisdictioni subiecti; in aliis vero, etsi de consuetudine ecclesiae teneat, secundum iuris rigorem credimus non tenere. [Dat. Tusculi XI. Kal. Apr.]

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: The lapse of two years does not prejudice an appellant so as to prevent him from being heard for a lawful cause, at least through the benefit of restitution in full. This it says according to the fuller understanding.

The same, to the Parish Priest and Clerics of Saint Nazarius of Albia.

From reason—(And below:) But if, after two years had elapsed, you did not prosecute the appeal interposed from the sentence that had been pronounced against you concerning the controversy that you had against the Church of Solaria, provided it is established that you omitted prosecution of the appeal through inability, we will that it ought not to generate in any way prejudice to your justice.

> Lapsus biennii non praeiudicat appellanti, quo minus ex causa legitima audiatur, saltem per beneficium restitutionis in integrum. H. d. secundum uberiorem intellectum.
> Idem Plebano et Clericis sancti Nazarii de Albia.
>
> Ex ratione (Et infra:) Verum si appellationem biennio elapso interpositam a sententia, quae fuerat contra vos prolata, de controversia, quam habuistis contra ecclesiam Solariae, prosecuti non estis, dummodo prosecutionem ipsius appellationis per impotentiam vos constiterit omisisse, nolumus, quod iustitiae vestrae debeat aliquatenus praeiudicium generare.

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: If the defendant went to the Curia after citation or notice of the letters, the delegate shall proceed in the cause; otherwise not. This it says, together with c. It Was Suggested, below, under the same title.

The same, to the Bishop of Worcester.

We remember—(And below: [Cf. c. 3, Clerics or Those Vowed, IV. 6.]) But when it happens that some cause is committed to you with appeal removed, and the adverse party after the citation has been made enters upon the journey of coming to the Apostolic See, you will nonetheless be able to proceed in the business according to the form of law; but certainly, if he entered upon the journey before the citation was made, there is no proceeding in any way.

> Si reus post citationem vel notitiam literarum ivit ad curiam, delegatus in causa procedat; alias non. Hoc dicit, cum c. Suggestum infra. eod.
>
> Idem Vigoriensi Episcopo.
>
> Meminimus (Et infra: [cf. c. 3. Qui cler. vel vov. IV. 6.]) Ceterum quum aliquam causam contingit tibi appellatione remota committi, et adversa pars post citationem factam iter arripuerit ad sedem apostolicam veniendi, non minus poteris in negotio secundum iuris formam procedere, quod utique, si ante citationem factam iter arripuerit, non est aliquatenus procedendum.

Chapter X

Latin source headnote: Proceedings are stayed, on account of the article in which an appeal was taken, even concerning the principal cause, if it cannot be dispatched without that article. This it says, by adhering to the letter. § 1. Notwithstanding an appeal interposed from a false cause, the judge can proceed to further acts. This it says.

The same.

Concerning the matter about which your solicitude inquired from us—whether a sentence ought to be suspended through an appeal that often happens to be made from an incidental question, although the cause had been committed with appeal removed—we have determined that a response should be made to your prudence: that, if a question arises concerning some exception and it happens that an appeal is taken therefrom, proceedings are deservedly to be stayed concerning that exception; and if the principal cause cannot be terminated without it, proceedings are no less to be stayed concerning the principal cause. § 1. But if the adverse party broke forth into an appeal concerning suggestion of falsehood, the sentence is not to be deferred concerning this, if by the letters of commission the obstacle of appeal is prohibited. [On Appeals, etc. (Cf. the following chapter.)]

> Supersedetur propter articulum, in quo appellatum est, etiam super principali causa, si sine illo articulo expediri non potest. H. d. inhaerendo literae. - §. 1. Non obstante appellatione, ex falsa causa interposita, potest iudex ad ulteriora procedere. H. d.
>
> Idem.
>
> Super eo, quod a nobis sollicitudo tua quaesivit, utrum sententia per appellationem, quam ex incidenti quaestione fieri saepe contingit, fuerit suspendenda, licet causa fuerit appellatione remota commissa, prudentiae tuae duximus respondendum, quod, si de aliqua exceptione quaestio oriatur, et exinde appellationem fieri contingat eidem exceptioni erit merito supersedendum, et, si principalis causa sine illa terminari non poterit, ei nihilominus supersedeatur. §. 1. Si autem adversa pars de falsi suggestione in appellationem prorupit, non est sententia super hoc differenda, *si literis commissoriis appellationis obstaculum inhibeatur. * [*De appellationibus etc. *(cf. cap. sequ.)]

Chapter XI

Latin source headnote: An appeal can be taken even for lesser or lighter causes.

The same.

But concerning appeals interposed for the smallest causes, we will you to hold that deference is no less to be given to them, for whatever and however slight a cause they are made, than if they were made for greater causes. But if they contemn to prosecute their appeal, you shall strictly compel them either to prosecute the appeal or, with appeal removed, to stand by your judgment.

> Etiam pro minoribus seu levioribus causis appellari potest.
>
> Idem.
>
> De appellationibus vero pro causis minimis interpositis volumus te tenere, quod eis, pro quacunque et quantulacunque levi causa fiant, non minus est, quam si pro maioribus fierent, deferendum. Verum si appellationem suam contemserint prosequi tu illos aut appellationem prosequi vel tuo iudicio stare appellatione remota districte compellas.

Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: According to the canons an appeal is made even before sentence; according to the laws it is not, except in certain cases. This is the first point. And appeal and recusation are made equivalent in this: that just as a reasonable cause is required in an appeal, so also in a recusation. This is the second. And the time assigned to a judge for deciding a cause begins to run from the time of presentation of the rescript. This is the third, according to the true understanding.

The same.

Concerning the matter that sometimes delegated judges are recused by one of the parties as suspect, let this become known to your prudence by the present letters: that, since the sacred canons grant to individuals the faculty of appealing both before and after joinder of issue, in the pronouncement of sentence, and after sentence, but the secular laws do not admit an appeal before sentence except in certain cases, in ecclesiastical causes also, where the remedy of appeal is removed, both remedies are denied; and therefore, just as no deference is to be given to an appeal, so [also] none is to be given to a recusation in any way. But if a suit is committed to certain persons to be decided within a certain time, in such a way that it is contained in the letters that the cause, after receipt of the letters, [and] within a certain term, ought to be terminated, the term begins to run from the time when it happens that the judges to whom the suits are delegated receive those letters.

> Secundum canones appellatur etiam ante sententiam; secundum leges non, nisi in quibusdam casibus. Hoc primo. Et appellatio et recusatio aequiparantur in hoc, quia, sicut in appellatione requiritur causa rationabilis, ita et in recusatione. Hoc secundo. Et tempus assignatum iudici ad causam decidendam incipit currere a tempore praesentationis rescripti. Hoc tertio secundum verum intellectum.
>
> Idem.
>
> Super eo +vero, quod interdum iudices delegati ab altera partium tanquam suspecti recusantur, hoc tuae prudentiae praesentibus literis innotescat, quod, quum Sacri canones et ante et post litis contestationem, et in prolatione sententiae, et post sententiam singulis facultatem tribuunt appellandi, leges autem saeculares appellationem, nisi in casibus, ante sententiam non admittunt, in causis quoque ecclesiasticis, ubi appellationis remedium tollitur, utrumque remedium denegatur, et ideo, sicut appellationi, ita [et] recusationi non est aliquatenus deferendum. Si autem infra certum tempus personis aliquibus lis decidenda committitur, ita quod contineatur in literis, causam post susceptionem literarum [et] infra certum terminum terminari debere, extunc terminus incipit currere, quum iudices quibus lites delegantur, easdem contigerit literas recepisse.

Chapter XIII

Latin source headnote: A person convened concerning an injury to a cleric or concerning adultery can appeal unless he is notorious. This it says together with the following chapter.

The same.

It has reached us that, when priests and other clerics complain that they have been wounded by some persons or have otherwise been gravely injured, and frequently produce witnesses to prove what they assert, those who are assailed appeal to the Apostolic See, but contemn to prosecute the interposed appeal or to avoid the fellowship of men. Hence, because you desire to be made more certain through our letters concerning what you are to do thereupon, by authority of the present writing we command your fraternity that, if their excess is not public and notorious, you shall compel those who appeal for such a cause, contradiction and appeal ceasing, by ecclesiastical censure, to prosecute the interposed appeal within a suitable time. But if their excess is public and notorious, under pretext of an appeal, if they have interposed any to foster their iniquity, you shall not omit to declare them excommunicated, inasmuch as [from] the very laying of hands upon clerics they incurred a sentence of excommunication, and shall cause them to be more cautiously avoided as excommunicated until they make satisfaction to those who suffered injury and present themselves to the apostolic presence with your letters.

Chapter XIV

Latin source headnote: It is summarized above in the immediately preceding chapter.

The same, to the Archbishop of Toledo.

Your fraternity consulted us whether deference is to be given to appeals when an appeal is made for the cause of frustrating delay and they do not prosecute the interposed appeal. Concerning this, indeed, we have determined that a response should be made to your consultation: that if at any time some persons who are manifestly and notoriously known to detain another's wife or to have laid violent hands upon a cleric appeal, no deference is to be given to their appeal in any way. But since many things are called notorious that are not, you ought to provide lest you appear to hold as notorious what is doubtful. But those who appeal from your presence you ought to compel, within a suitable time, to prosecute the interposed appeal or, with appeal removed, to obey your judgment.

Summatum est supr. cap. proximo.

Idem Archiepiscopo Toletano.

Consuluit nos fraternitas tua, +utrum deferendum sit appellationibus, quando causa frustratoriae dilationis appellatur, nec interpositam appellationem prosequuntur. Super quo utique Consultationi tuae duximus respondendum, quod, si aliquando aliqui, quos manifestum sit et notorium uxorem alterius detinere, aut iniecisse manus violentas in clericum, appellaverint, eorum appellationi non est aliquatenus deferendum. Sed quum multa dicantur notoria, quae non sunt, providere debes, ne quod dubium est pro notorio videaris habere. Illos autem, qui appellant a praesentia tua, cogere debes infra tempus conveniens appellationem interpositam prosequi, aut iudicio tuo appellatione remota, parere.

Chapter XV

Latin source headnote: This chapter is summarized above, under the same title, in the chapter We Remember.

The same.

It has been suggested to our ears that, when those oppressed and aggrieved have recourse to the protection of the Apostolic See and, an appeal having been made, enter upon a journey, their adversaries, knowing of the interposed appeal, neither approach our presence nor transmit a representative for themselves; but when they perceive that those persons have returned and have brought back our letters, they break forth into the voice of appeal and enter upon the journey of coming to us, so that they may thus elude the solicitude of those by whom they are assailed. But because no one's fraud ought to protect him, and things that are known to contain in themselves the vice of cunning and fraud are to be cut away by the sickle of apostolic moderation, we respond to your consultation in this way: if anyone is discovered to do this from fraud or malice, you shall not defer to his appeal, nor on that account postpone terminating with a suitable end the cause committed to you, because you are to know that we issued the decretal letter with which such persons appear to be fortified not to suppress anyone's justice, but to remove an unjust grievance.

Chapter XVI

Latin source headnote: An excommunicated person can, while cognizance of the appeal is pending, be absolved as a precaution; and if it appears that he appealed lawfully, he is not punished because in the meantime he celebrated divine services.

The same, to the Archbishop of York.

When R., a priest, came to our presence, we committed your cause and his to the Bishop of Tusculum and P., Cardinal of Santa Susanna, to be heard. At your objection, although R. the priest was not excommunicated by law, they nevertheless caused him to be absolved in fact. But because we will that what is known to have been established in this part by our brothers be changed for no reason, through apostolic writings, by way of precept, we command your fraternity that you in no way trouble the aforesaid priest because, after the excommunication made contrary to the appeal, he sang divine services, but, the appeal ceasing, restore all things to that status in which they were at the time the appeal to the Apostolic See was sent forth.

Chapter XVII

Latin source headnote: If an appellant is disturbed in the possession concerning which the appeal was taken, the judge from whom the appeal was taken can reform that possession for him, while the appeal remains in its state. This it says according to the common understanding.

The same, to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Since we are bound to respond to the consultations of individuals insofar as the Lord shall have ministered, we wish to impart a response to you the more gladly, the more we love your person with more abundant charity. Since, therefore, you wished to consult us whether, if the possession of those who appeal to our hearing has been disturbed, it is lawful for you to reform it for them, setting aside that concerning which the appeal was interposed, we respond to your prudence in this way: if a complaint thereupon has reached you, it will be lawful for you to do this in judicial order.

Chapter XVIII

Latin source headnote: A general and vague appeal with respect to any grievance whatever is not valid, but one restricted to a certain cause is. Thus.

The same, to the Bishop and Archdeacon of Bologna.

Your devotion consulted us that we should make your prudence more certain through our letters whether an appeal interposed from every grievance holds, and therefore we respond to your consultation in this way: that if perhaps someone were generally to interpose an appeal from every grievance that could happen to him, an appeal of this kind ought not to hold. But if someone before some judge were to interpose the obstacle of appeal concerning every grievance that could be inflicted upon him in one cause, although a general appeal has been interposed, nevertheless deference is to be given to his appeal by the same judge. But concerning the fact that you say some persons appeal for purposes of frustration so that they may avoid canonical punishment, and do not prosecute the interposed appeal, we will this to become known to you: that if, because they have appealed from you, you ought to compel them within a suitable and competent time to prosecute the appeal or, concerning those things about which the appeal was taken, with appeal removed, to obey your judgment.

appellatio tenere non debet. Si vero aliquis ab aliquo iudice super omni gravamine, quod in una causa sibi possit inferri, appellationis obstaculum interponeret, quanquam generalis appellatio sit interposita, appellationi tamen eius est ab eodem iudice deferendum. Super eo vero quod quosdam dicitis frustratorie ut poenam possint vitare canonicam appellare, nec appellationem interpositam prosequi, hoc vobis volumus innotescere, quod si, quia a vobis appellaverint eos debetis cogere ut infra tempus congruum et competens appellationem prosequantur, aut super his, de quibus appellatum fuerit, appellatione remota, iudicio vestro pareant.

Chapter XIX

Latin source headnote: A frivolous appeal does not excuse an inferior from being bound to obey a superior and from being punished for contempt, unless he purges his innocence in another way. This it says, and it is a noteworthy case in that it is said that this man is to be punished.

The same, to the Bishop of Zamora.

When we were prepared kindly to admit and efficaciously hear the petitions that you presented to us through your messenger, our beloved son I., cardinal deacon of Santa Maria in Cosmedin, formerly legate of the Apostolic See, proposed to us with constant assertion that, when he had called you to his synod and you had contemned to approach at his summons, he promulgated a sentence of excommunication against your person, after which excommunication you caused yourself to be consecrated as bishop by one who was discharging our place. And when our beloved son N., canon of Saint James, firmly asserted that you were on a legation of the king and therefore could not have approached at the summons of the aforesaid cardinal, the cardinal asserted in opposition that his messenger found you not on a legation of the king but in the Church of Salamanca, and told you that he was not going to require you in another church. And when it was again proposed on your behalf that, when our venerable brother the Archbishop of Compostela appealed, you also interposed your appeal, the cardinal added that that appeal could in no respect have protected you from being bound to approach at his summons. But we, considering that it was not fitting for you, under pretext of an appeal, to contemn coming at the summons of the legate, admonish and command your fraternity that, either in your own person or through suitable messengers, you present yourself to the apostolic presence, to show your innocence and immunity, if you can.

Appellatio frivola non excusat inferiorem, quo minus teneatur obedire superiori, et ut de contemptu puniatur, nisi innocentiam suam aliter purget. H. d. et est casus notabilis in eo, quod dicitur, istum esse puniendum.

Idem Zamorensi Episcopo.

Quum parati essemus petitiones, quas nobis per nuncium tuum porrexisti, benigne admittere, et efficaciter exaudire, dilectus filius noster I. sanctae Mariae in Cosmedin diaconus cardinalis olim apostolicae sedis legatus constanti nobis assertione proposuit, quod, quum te ad synodum suam vocasset, et ad eius vocationem contempsisses accedere, in personam tuam excommunicationis sententiam promulgavit, +post cuius excommunicationem qui vice nostra fungebatur, te fecisti in episcopum consecrari. Quumque dilectus filius noster N. canonicus B. Iacobi firmiter asseveraret, quod in legatione regis esses, et ideo non potuisses ad vocationem praedicti cardinalis accedere, cardinalis e contra asseruit, quod non in legatione regis, sed in Salamantina ecclesia te suus nuncius invenisset, +tibique dixisset, quod in alia ecclesia te non esset requisiturus. Et quum iterum ex parte tua fuisset propositum, quod, quando venerabilis frater noster archiepiscopus Compostellanus appellavit, tuam etiam appellationem interposuisses, cardinalis adiecit, quod appellatio illa te tueri nulla parte potuit quin ad ipsius vocationem accedere tenereris. Nos vero attendentes, quod te non decuit contemnere obtentu appellationis ad vocationem venire legati, fraternitatem tuam monemus atque praecipimus, quatenus vel in persona propria, vel per nuncios idoneos apostolico te conspectui repraesentes, innocentiam et immunitatem tuam, si poteris, ostensurus.

Chapter XX

Latin source headnote: If a mandate made to one who swore to stand by the judgment of the Church exceeds the limits of the oath and of a lawful promise, he will be able to appeal; otherwise it is different. This it says compendiously, according to the Abbot.

The same, to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

To these things—(And below:) Moreover, concerning those who render an oath that they will stand by the judgment of the Church and afterward appeal, the oath having been rendered, let your solicitude provide that you compel them to observe what they swear, or within forty days after the appeal has been interposed to enter upon the journey to prosecute it.

Si mandatum factum ei, qui iuravit stare iudicio ecclesiae, excedit limites iuramenti et licitae promissionis, appellare poterit; alias secus. H. d. compendiose. Abb.

Idem Cantuariensi Archiepiscopo.

Ad haec (Et infra:) Praeterea de his, qui iuramentum praestant, quod ecclesiae stabunt iudicio, et postea praestito sacramento appellant, id tua sollicitudo provideat, ut eos servare quod iurant, vel infra XL. dies post appellationem interpositam iter arripere ad ipsam prosequendam compellas.

Chapter XXI

Latin source headnote: The summary is as above, in the immediately preceding chapter.

The same, to the Bishop of Chartres.

To the question [however] that you ask—whether deference is to be given to the appeal of one who, as is customary, merits to be absolved after rendering an oath, and, before anything is commanded to him, has appealed, or if, after receiving a mandate, he appeals for the sake of evasion—we respond thus: that, after he has sworn, no deference at all is to be given to his appeal that ought to derogate from his oath; but he is immediately to be reduced to the same sentence, which ought to be firmly observed until he has received the mandate and, to the extent of [his] ability, has prosecuted what was received.

Summa ut supr. cap. proximo.

Idem Carnotensi Episcopo.

Quaestioni [vero,] quam facis, utrum appellationi illius sit deferendum, qui, sicut moris est, praestito iuramento absolvi meretur, et antequam ei mandetur aliquid, appellasset, vel si mandato recepto causa subterfugii appellaverit, taliter respondemus, quod, postquam iuravit, appellationi eius, quae iuramento eius debeat derogare non est in aliquo deferendum; sed statim erit in eandem reducendus sententiam, quae, donec mandatum susceperit, et susceptum pro posse [suo] fuerit prosecutus, debet firmiter observari.

Chapter XXII

Latin source headnote: One who appeals from an ordinary can afterward be punished by that ordinary for an offense committed by him. This it says; but supply to the text that the same applies to offenses committed before, if he is now accused concerning them, as in c. To These Things 1 above under the same title, and c. He Proposed below under the same title.

The same, to the Bishop of Winchester.

Moreover, concerning those who appeal to the Apostolic See and afterward, committing grave and enormous things, protect themselves with the appeal when they are convened, we have determined that this response should be made: that, if after the appeal they commit grave things, and so publicly and manifestly that others are gravely scandalized and the seemliness of ecclesiastical honor is deformed, the appeal ought not to protect them in their wickedness and iniquity so as to prevent their excesses from being punished by canonical censure. Moreover, concerning those who, bound by a sentence of excommunication, swear to stand by ecclesiastical judgment and immediately, having forgotten it, break forth into the voice of appeal, we signify to your affection that you ought through excommunication to compel them to pursue the appeal made within a suitable time or to stand by the judgment of the Church.

> Appellans ab ordinario postea de delicto ab eo commisso puniri potest per ipsum ordinarium. H. d., sed supple ad textum, idem esse de antea commissis, si nunc de illis accusatur, ut cap. Ad haec 1. supr. eod. et cap. Proposuit. infra eod.

Chapter XXIII

Latin source headnote: One who did not defer to his adversary's appeal cannot raise an exception against him concerning his own later appeal in the same matter.

The same, to the Patriarch of Grado and the Cardinal Priest of San Vitale.

When our beloved sons M., Abbot of Saint Felix, and the priest R., and [V.,] canon of Saint Mark, were established in our presence for the controversy that arose concerning the election of the Church of Torcello, through the envy of the malignant enemy—(And below:) Therefore, through apostolic writings, by way of precept, we command that, coming together as one, you summon both parties before your presence and, after diligently inquiring into and learning the truth of the matter, if it is established to you that the aforesaid archdeacon, after the appeal made to us and after denunciation also of excommunication, proceeded to the nomination of the often-mentioned C., and that the primicerius with the canons, and the parish priest with the assent of the [whole] clergy of the bishopric, or of the greater and sounder part, elected the aforesaid I. as bishop and pastor, then, notwithstanding the appeal or prohibition of the aforesaid archdeacon, if he himself did not defer to the appeal made earlier, you shall confirm by apostolic authority, with appeal and excuse removed, the election made concerning the aforesaid I.; and you, brother patriarch, shall impart to him the office of consecration. But if the matter was otherwise, after summoning the suffragans of the patriarchate of Grado and associating with yourselves other discreet and honorable men, you shall hear the cause and, with the obstacle of appeal removed, terminate it with its due end.

Si autem aliter res se habuerit convocatis suffraganeis Grandensis patriarchatus aliisque viris discretis et honestis vobis ascitis causam audiatis et eam remoto appellationis obstaculo fine debito terminetis.*

Chapter XXIV

Latin source headnote: One who appeals from an ordinary in one cause is bound to respond before him in others; he can nevertheless recuse him as suspect, unless he is convened concerning a manifest crime in which no excuse or suspicion has place, as when a penalty of law arising from the act itself is imposed. This it says according to the understanding.

The same, to the Archbishop of York.

M., your cleric, proposed to us that it often happens that, when someone appeals concerning some cause, he utterly refuses and declines to respond in other causes in which no appeal has been taken. Concerning this, we respond to your consultation in this way: although on account of that appeal he is no less bound to respond in other causes concerning which no appeal has been taken, nevertheless the judge from whom the appeal is made, because he is altogether suspect to him, ought not in the preceding cause to compel him to respond concerning other causes, unless for a crime so grave and manifest that by the act itself he is held guilty and is deservedly to be condemned.

Appellans ab ordinario in una causa, in aliis coram eo respondere tenetur, potest tamen eum recusare ut suspectum, nisi conveniatur de crimine manifesto, et in quo non cadit excusatio nec suspicio, ut quia imponitur poena iuris surgens ipso facto. H. d. secundum intellectum.

Idem Eboracensi Archiepiscopo.

Proposuit nobis M. clericus tuus, quod saepe contingit ut, quum aliquis super aliqua causa appellat, in aliis causis, in quibus non est appellatum, respondere penitus renuat et recuset. Super quo consultationi tuae taliter respondemus, quod, licet pro illa appellatione non minus teneatur in aliis causis, super quibus appellatum non est, respondere, iudex tamen, a quo appellatur, quia illi omnino suspectus est, eum in causa praecedente non debet ad respondendum super aliis causis compellere, nisi pro crimine adeo gravi et manifesto, quo ipso actu habetur reus, et merito sit damnandus.

Chapter XXV

Latin source headnote: An excommunicated person is absolved after security has been received, although the adversary or the excommunicator appeals lest he be absolved. This it says according to one understanding, which nevertheless must be limited to when the excommunication was not rendered for manifest contumacy or offense, because then he ought not to be absolved unless satisfaction has preceded, as in c. On Behalf 1 below, On the Signification of Words.

The same, to R., Archbishop of Canterbury.

With what countenance you are able to consult us concerning articles of law we do not see, since in those things that are known and clearly manifest you are said to pervert the order of law and evidently to oppose ecclesiastical liberty, for which that glorious and illustrious martyr Thomas, your predecessor, did not fear to undergo martyrdom. For now you are said to confirm elections of bishops, contrary to the due order of law and contrary to the dignity of the pontifical office, not in a church, as is canonical and honorable, nor even in a palace, nor in your chamber, but in the very chamber of the king. But lest we appear to deny our assent to your petitions, concerning those things about which you wished to consult us we respond to you as the Lord shall have given to us.

Indeed, if anyone is held bound by interdict or excommunication for contumacy or any other cause and offers himself to justice concerning those things for which he received the sentence itself, the judge will be able to absolve him lest he die in excommunication, even if the adverse party interposes the obstacle of appeal lest he be absolved—sufficient security nevertheless having been received from him before absolution, that he will obey the equity of law either in the presence of the Roman Pontiff, to whose hearing the appeal is made, if the adversary should prefer, or before the judge to whom the Roman Pontiff shall delegate the cause. Concerning those also who complain that they have been subjected unreasonably to excommunication or interdict, we say the same thing, even if those who pronounced a sentence of this kind have determined to appeal to the Apostolic See. But concerning the fact that, when someone has died, sometimes religious persons, sometimes ecclesiastical persons, and sometimes secular persons demand that debts owed to them, which the deceased himself owed, be paid, and, if they are not paid, send forth the voice of appeal lest the body of the deceased be delivered to burial, we have determined that this response should be made to your fraternity: unless sufficient security concerning payment of the debts, provided the estate is solvent, is given to them by the heir or relatives of the deceased, his body is not to be delivered to burial after the appeal.

> Absolvitur excommunicatus cautione recepta, licet adversarius vel excommunicator, ne absolvatur, appellet. H. d. secundum unum intellectum, quem tamen oportet limitare, quando excommunicatio non fuit lata pro manifesta contumacia vel offensa, quia tunc non debet absolvi, nisi satisfactione praecedente, ut in cap. Ex parte 1. infra, de verb. signif.

Iam enim non in ecclesia, sicut est canonicum et honestum, non etiam in palatio, non in camera tua, sed in ipsa camera regis, contra debitum iuris et contra pontificalis officii dignitatem episcoporum electiones diceris confirmare. +Verum ne petitionibus tuis nostrum denegare videamur assensum, super his, de quibus nos consulere voluisti, tibi, prout dederit nobis Dominus, respondemus. Sane, si quis pro contumacia vel alia qualibet causa, interdicto vel excommunicatione tenetur adstrictus, et offert se ad iustitiam, de his, pro quibus sententiam ipsam excepit, iudex eum, ne in excommunicatione decedat, absolvere poterit, etiamsi pars adversa, ne absolvatur, appellationis obstaculum interponat: ab ipso tamen ante absolutionem sufficienti cautione recepta, quod vel in praesentia Romani Pontificis, ad cuius audientiam appellatur, si maluerit adversarius, vel coram iudice, cui causam Romanus Pontifex delegaverit, iuris pareat aequitati. De his etiam, qui conqueruntur, se irrationabiliter excommunicationi vel interdicto suppositos, illud idem dicimus, etiamsi ii, qui huiusmodi protulerunt sententiam, ad sedem apostolicam duxerint appellandum. Super eo vero, quod defuncto aliquo interdum religiosae personae, interdum ecclesiasticae, interdum saeculares postulant, sibi debita solvi, quae defunctis ipsis debebat, et nisi solvantur ne corpus defuncti sepulturae tradatur, vocem appellationis emittunt, hoc tuae fraternitati duximus respondendum, quod nisi eis de solutione debitorum dummodo sit solvendo ab herede vel consanguineis defuncti sufficiens cautio detur, corpus eius post appellationem non est tradendum sepulturae.

Chapter XXVI

Latin source headnote: A prelate ought not to suspend or excommunicate a subject unless admonition has preceded, nor can a subject appeal against ecclesiastical discipline, especially if he is religious. And the judge from whom the appeal is made sets a term for the appellant to prosecute the appeal; if he does not prosecute within it, the judge from whom the appeal is made reassumes jurisdiction. But an appellant who does not prosecute his appeal is condemned in expenses, when the appellee prosecutes it.

The same, in the Lateran Council.

A very reprehensible custom has grown strong in certain regions: that, when our brothers and fellow bishops, or even archdeacons, think that certain persons will appeal in their causes, without any admonition at all having preceded, they render against them a sentence of suspension or excommunication. Others also, while they dread the sentence of a superior and canonical discipline, raise an appeal without any grievance and usurp for the defense of iniquity what is recognized to have been instituted for the protection of the innocent. Wherefore, lest either prelates be able to aggrieve subjects without cause, or subjects at their mere will be able under pretext of appeal to elude the correction of prelates, by the present decree we establish that neither shall prelates pronounce a sentence of suspension or excommunication against subjects unless canonical admonition has preceded, unless perhaps the fault is such that by its own kind it induces the penalty of suspension or excommunication; nor shall subjects break forth into the voice of appeal against ecclesiastical discipline before entry into the cause.

But if anyone believes that he must appeal for his necessity, a competent term shall be set for him to prosecute the appeal; if perhaps he neglects to prosecute within it, then the bishop may freely use his authority. But if in any business someone appeals, and, when the person appealed against comes, the one who appeals neglects to come, if he has anything of his own, he shall make to the other a suitable recompense of expenses, so that, terrified at least by this fear, someone may not easily appeal to the grievance of another. But we will this to be observed especially in religious places, lest monks or any religious persons, when they are to be corrected for some excess, presume to appeal against the regular discipline of their prelate and chapter, but shall humbly and devoutly receive what has been usefully enjoined upon them for their salvation.

Praelatus subditum suspendere vel excommunicare non debet, nisi monitione praemissa, nec subditus contra disciplinam ecclesiasticam appellare potest, maxime si est religiosus. Et iudex a quo praefigit terminum appellanti ad appellationem prosequendam, infra quem si non prosequitur, iudex a quo reassumit iurisdictionem. Appellans vero non prosequens appellationem suam, condemnatur in expensis, appellato hoc prosequenti.

Idem in concilio Lateranensi.

Reprehensibilis +*valde consuetudo in quibusdam partibus inolevit, ut, quum fratres et coepiscopi nostri seu etiam archidiaconi appellaturos quosdam in suis causis existimant, nulla penitus admonitione praemissa suspensionis sive excommunicationis in eos sententiam ferant. Alii etiam, dum superioris sententiam et disciplinam canonicam reformidant, sine ullo gravamine appellationem obiiciunt, et ad defensionem iniquitatis usurpant quod ad praesidium innocentium dignoscitur institutum. Chapter XXVII

Latin source headnote: The judge from whom the appeal is made takes cognizance of the cause notwithstanding the appeal if the appellant does not prosecute. This is the first point. And a judge recused as suspect can commit the cause to another. This is the second.

The same.

To these things, we have determined that it should be granted to you by the present letters that, when an appeal has been taken from you concerning some cause, it shall be lawful for you, with the appeal ceasing, to compel the appellants either to prosecute the interposed appeal or to obey the equity of law before you. Or, if either of the parties holds you suspect, at your insistence they shall choose a judge who may be able to decide the question proposed between them. [But, etc. (Cf. c. 5, On Judgments, II. 1.)]

Iudex a quo non obstante appellatione cognoscit de causa, si appellans non prosequitur. Hoc primo. Et iudex, ut suspectus recusatus, potest alteri causam committere. Hoc secundum.

Idem.

Ad haec +praesentibus tibi literis duximus indulgendum, ut, quum a te super aliqua causa fuerit appellatum, fas tibi sit appellantes appellatione cessante compellere, ut vel appellationem interpositam prosequantur, vel coram te iuris pareant aequitati. Aut, si alterutra partium te suspectum habuerit, te insistente iudicem eligant, qui propositam inter eos valeat dirimere quaestionem. [Ceterum etc. (cf. c. 5. de iud. II. 1.)].

Chapter XXVIII

Latin source headnote: If a canon, admonished to residence, appeals, a term is established for him to prosecute the appeal, and meanwhile the benefice is served through a vicar to be sustained from the fruits of the benefice. And if he does not prosecute the appeal or make residence, he is deprived of the prebend.

The same, to the Bishop of Salisbury.

It has reached us that, when you admonished Roger, son of G., a canon of your church, that he should make due residence in it, he broke forth into an appeal to our hearing and prescribed as the term for his appeal the approaching feast of blessed Luke. But since the said canon appears to have appealed for the sake of frustrating delay, through apostolic writings, by way of precept, we command that you diligently and earnestly admonish him to make due residence in the same church, all delay set aside, or, within the term, to enter upon the journey of coming to us to prosecute it. Meanwhile, however, you shall commit his place in the aforesaid church to some honorable person to be executed, and, with appeal ceasing, assign to him from the benefices of that canon the means by which he can be suitably sustained. But if the aforesaid G. neglects to fulfill either of these, you shall then, every contradiction and appeal set aside, deprive him of his prebend, and, no appeal being admitted, grant and assign it to another suitable person.

> Si canonicus ad residentiam monitus appellat, statuitur sibi terminus ad appellationem prosequendam, et interim deservitur beneficio per vicarium de fructibus beneficii sustentandum. Et si appellationem non prosequitur, vel residentiam non facit, privatur praebenda.

Lucae praescripsit*. Quum autem frustratoriae dilationis causa videatur dictus canonicus appellasse, per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus eum diligenter et studiose moneas, ut in eadem ecclesia debitam, omni mora postposita, residentiam faciat, vel infra terminum eam prosecuturus iter ad nos arripiat veniendi. Interim vero alicui honestae personae vices eius in ecclesia praetaxata exsequendas committas, et ei de beneficiis illius appellatione cessante assignes, unde possit congrue sustentari. Quodsi praefatus G. alterum istorum adimplere neglexerit, tu extunc praebenda sua prives eundem omni contradictione et appellatione postposita, et eam alii idoneae personae nullius appellatione admissa concedas pariter et assignes.

Latin source headnote: No appeal is made from a judge executing jurisdiction.

The same.

Your fraternity consulted us whether deference is to be given to appeals interposed by our dearest son in Christ L., [the illustrious] King of the Franks, on behalf of the Jews, so that they may retain Christian slaves, and whether you ought to tolerate their establishing new synagogues where they had none at all. [We therefore wrote to the aforesaid king that he should desist from defending the Jews in this part, and concerning this we also caused him to be admonished through others; and we believe that he will acquiesce in our admonitions, because it would not be right that what was recently established by the holy Fathers in council should be negligently observed.] Hence, it is not fitting that on account of appeals of this kind you ought to abstain from observance of the decree. Chapter XXX

Latin source headnote: One who sent a messenger to the Pope before citation or notice of the letters can appeal so that the delegate does not proceed; it is otherwise if afterward.

The same, to the Archbishop of Genoa.

To these things: as you assert, sometimes concerning a cause that is committed to a judge with appeal removed, one party appeals, asserting that he has sent his messenger to the Apostolic See for the same cause. To this we respond thus: that the judge, if it is established to him that the appellant, before the parties were cited or the delegation of the cause reached the person who interposes the obstacle of appeal, had sent a messenger to the Apostolic See, ought to defer to the appeal made; but if the messenger was sent after the citation, he can sufficiently execute what is commanded.

Qui ante citationem vel notitiam literarum misit nuncium ad Papam, appellare potest, ne delegatus procedat, secus si post.

Idem Genuensi Archiepiscopo.

Ad haec, sicut asseris, +quandoque super causa, quae iudici appellatione remota committitur, altera pars appellat, asserens, se pro eadem causa nuncium suum ad sedem apostolicam destinasse. Ad quod taliter Respondemus, quod iudex, si ei constiterit, ipsum appellantem, antequam partes essent citatae, vel delegatio causae pervenisset ad ipsum, qui appellationis interponit obstaculum, nuncium ad sedem apostolicam destinasse, factae debet appellationi deferre; sed, si post citationem fuerit destinatus, satis potest exsequi quod mandatur.

Chapter XXXI

Latin source headnote: One who did not defer to an appeal interposed to the Pope is sent to the Curia with the ordinary's letters to be punished.

The same.

Concerning the prior who, not deferring to our protection and to the appeal made to the Apostolic See, caused a certain canon of his to be stripped of all his garments down to his shirt, and compelled him to renounce the accusation and appeal because he murmured concerning his own and certain brothers' enormities, we have determined to intimate this to your solicitude: after diligently inquiring into the truth of the matter, if you find that the aforesaid canon appealed to avoid discipline, you ought on that account to inflict no penalty upon the same prior, since the most holy Roman Church is not accustomed to admit an appeal of this kind, lest audacity for offending be furnished to monks or regular canons. But if the aforesaid canon appealed the prior to the Apostolic See on account of his manifest enormities, which render him notorious, and he contemned to defer to such an appeal, you shall compel him to come to the Apostolic See with your letters containing the truth, to make satisfaction for so great an excess. But upon his accomplices in this wickedness you shall inflict such a penalty that others hearing of it shall not dare to perpetrate similar things.

Qui non detulit appellationi interpositae ad Papam, mittitur cum literis ordinarii ad curiam puniendus.

Idem.

De priore, +qui non deferens protectioni nostrae et appellationi ad sedem apostolicam factae quendam canonicum suum vestibus fecit omnibus usque ad camisiam spoliari, et eum accusationi et appellationi renunciare coegit, quia de suis et quorundam fratrum enormitatibus murmuravit, id tuae sollicitudini duximus insinuandum ut rei veritate diligenter inquisita si inveneris, quod pro evitanda disciplina praedictus canonicus appellavit, eidem priori propterea nullam poenam infligere debeas, quoniam sacrosancta Romana ecclesia huiusmodi appellationem admittere non consuevit, ne monachis vel canonicis regularibus praeberetur audacia delinquendi. Ceterum si praefatus canonicus priorem propter suas enormitates manifestas, quae ipsum notabilem reddunt, ad sedem apostolicam appellavit, et ipse tali appellationi deferre contempsit, eum cum literis tuis veritatem continentibus de tanto excessu satisfacturum ad sedem apostolicam venire compellas. Suis autem in hac malitia complicibus talem poenam infligas quod ceteri audientes similia non audeant perpetrare.

Chapter XXXII

Latin source headnote: An appeal does not defend a religious against regular constitutions.

The same.

Because the Lord chose us for an inheritance for himself and looked out from afar on high, desiring to provide for your peace and tranquility insofar as divine grace grants, by apostolic authority we concede and grant you that abbots of your order who have been publicly bespattered by, or convicted of, some public infamy, and who, after being admonished by the abbots and afterward in the general chapter, are unwilling of their own accord to yield their prelacy, shall not have the faculty of appealing to the Apostolic See, defending their guilt through an appeal. [Given at Benevento, on the fourth day before the Nones of July, in the second indiction, 1169.]

Beneventi IV. Non. Iul. Ind. II.* 1169.]

Chapter XXXIII

Latin source headnote: The judge from whom the appeal is made can set a term for the appellant to prosecute the appeal; when it has elapsed, the judge reassumes jurisdiction.

The same.

It has reached our ears through your intimation that, when sometimes we delegate causes to you or others with the remedy of appeal removed, one of the parties, so that he may avoid the examination of the delegated judge, opposes incidental questions and, although the remedy of appeal has not been reserved in the principal cause, nevertheless breaks forth into the voice of appeal, fixing no term for his appeal, and thus causes the other party to remain suspended without prosecution of the appeal. Therefore you petition that it be granted to you and other judges, where causes are committed without the remedy of appeal, to terminate incidental questions with their due end, with appeal set aside. But since incidental questions are often not undeservedly judged prejudicial, we have not determined that assent should be given to your petition in this part; but lest either party be afflicted longer by frustrating judgments, a suitable term shall be set for the appellant to prosecute the appeal; if he has not prosecuted the appeal within it, from that time he shall be compelled to stand by the judgment of the delegated judge, with appeal set aside, both concerning the incidental questions and concerning the principal cause, in such a way that neither shall the common remedy be withdrawn from one, nor shall the other be able to be wearied by frustrating delays.

Postulas igitur tibi et aliis iudicibus indulgeri, ubi causae sine appellationis remedio committuntur, incidentes quaestiones fine debito appellatione postposita terminare. Ceterum quum incidentes quaestiones saepius praeiudiciales non immerito iudicentur, petitioni tuae in hac parte non duximus annuendum, sed, ne quae partium diutius frustratoriis iudiciis affligatur,* Appellanti ad prosecutionem appellationis terminus congruus praefigatur, infra quem si appellationem non fuerit prosecutus, extunc tam super incidentibus questionibus, quam super causa principali appellatione postposita compellatur stare iudicio delegati iudicis, ita quod nec uni commune medium subtrahetur, nec alter possit frustratoriis dilationibus fatigari.

Chapter XXXIV

Latin source headnote: If, after a grievance has preceded, someone submits himself to the protection of a superior, he is held as an appellant, provided that he has observed those things that are necessary in an appeal.

The same, to the Bishop of Ávila.

You should know that it has reached our hearing that, when the Bishop of Zamora multiply molested G., priest of the Church of Saint James of Zamora, which belongs properly to the Church of Compostela, at length the same priest, to avoid his grievances, subjected himself and his church and parishioners to our protection and that of the Roman Church. But the aforesaid bishop, perhaps because he did not expressly appeal, after the protection of the Apostolic See had been invoked, and even contrary to the privilege granted to the Church of Compostela, promulgated a sentence of excommunication against him. Although the aforesaid priest perhaps did not express the word of appeal from simplicity, nevertheless, because after he had subjected himself and his things to our protection he ought not to have been condemned by any sentence without cognizance of the cause, through apostolic writings we command your fraternity that you inquire more diligently into the truth concerning this, and, if it is thus established to you, declare that the sentence that the aforesaid bishop rendered against the same priest does not hold, with contradiction and appeal ceasing. But afterward, if the aforesaid bishop perhaps wishes to act against the priest, you shall hear the cause and decide it with its due end. You shall also more earnestly admonish and induce the same bishop to desist altogether from the molestations and grievances of the Church of Compostela, and so to be content with his own right that he shall in no way presume to usurp those things that belong to the aforesaid church.

> Si praecedente gravamine quis submittit se protectioni superioris, habetur pro appellante, dummodo servaverit ea, quae in appellatione sunt necessaria.

Idem Abulensi Episcopo.

Ad audientiam nostram noveris pervenisse, quod, quum Zamorensis episcopus G. presbyterum ecclesiae sancti Iacobi Zamorensis, quae est propria Compostellanae ecclesiae, multipliciter molestaret, tandem idem presbyter pro eius gravaminibus evitandis se et ecclesiam suam ac parochianos nostrae ac Romanae ecclesiae protectioni subiecit. +Sed praefatus episcopus pro eo forte, quod expressim non appellavit, in eum post invocatum sedis apostolicae patrocimum, contra etiam privilegium Compostellanae ecclesiae indultum, excommunicationis sententiam promulgavit. Licet autem praedictus presbyter ex simplicitate forte verbum appellationis non expresserit, quia tamen, postquam se et sua nostrae protectioni subiecerat, non debuit sine causae cognitione aliqua sententia condemnari, fraternitati tuae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus super hoc inquiras diligentius veritatem, et si ita tibi constiterit, sententiam, quam praefatus episcopus in eundem presbyterum tulit, contradictione et appellatione cessante denuncies non tenere. Postmodum vero, si praefatus episcopus adversus presbyterum forte agere voluerit causam audias et fine debito decidas. Eundem quoque episcopum studiosius moneas et inducas ut a molestiis et gravaminibus Compostellanae ecclesiae omnino desistat, et sic suo iure sit contentus, ut ea quae ad praedictam ecclesiam spectant sibi nequaquam praesumat usurpare.

Chapter XXXV

Latin source headnote: A cause is not to be remitted to the judge from whom the appeal was taken while the appeal has not yet been justified, unless by consent of the parties.

The same, to the Archbishop of Tarragona.

Having received the complaint of the canons of Pamplona that the beloved son the Duke of the Navarrese had despoiled them of their goods, at their petition we determined that the cause itself should be committed to your fraternity and terminated with a canonical end. But because they were silent to us that an appeal had been taken from your hearing to the Apostolic See, and we would not have committed the cause itself to your examination if this had been established to us, since a cause ought not to be remitted to those from whom it is known that an appeal was taken unless the parties have consented to this, through apostolic writings we command and more strictly prohibit your fraternity from proceeding in any way in execution of that business on occasion of our letters.

Causa non est ad iudicem a quo remittenda appellatione adhuc non iustificata, nisi de partium consensu.

Idem Archiepiscopo Terraconensi.

Accepta conquestione canonicorum Pampilonensium, +quod dilectus filius noster dux Navarrorum eos bonis suis spoliasset, causam ipsam tuae fraternitati ad eorum petitionem duximus committendam, et fine canonico terminandam. Verum quoniam nobis tacuerunt, quod ab audientia tua fuit ad sedem apostolicam appellatum, nec nos, si hoc nobis constitisset, ipsam causam tuo commisissemus examine quum Non debet ad eos causa remitti, nisi partes in hoc consenserint a quibus noscitur appellatum, fraternitati tuae per apostolica scripta mandamus et arctius inhibemus, ne in exsecutione ipsius negotii occasione literarum nostrarum aliqua ratione procedas.

Chapter XXXVI

Latin source headnote: Even a delegate appointed with the clause "with appeal removed" can be recused if he is a blood relative of the impetrant or if he was his advocate in that cause.

Lucius III, to Walter, Bishop of Lincoln.

Finally, by the present letters we intimate to your fraternity that, if some cause has been delegated to someone who is a blood relative of the person who impetrated the letters, or has discharged the office of advocate in the same business, or is suspect from any other just cause, a delegate of this kind will not undeservedly be able to be recused, although the business was delegated to him with appeal removed.

> Delegatus etiam datus cum clausula «appellatione remota» recusari potest, si est consanguineus impetrantis, vel si fuit advocatus eius in illa causa.
>
> Lucius III. Galtero Linconiensi Episcopo.
>
> Postremo fraternitati tuae literis praesentibus intimamus, quod, si causa aliqua alicui fuerit delegata, qui consanguineus sit illius, qui literas impetravit, aut in eodem negotio advocati officio functus, vel ex alia quacunque iusta causa suspectus, huiusmodi delegatus non immerito poterit recusari, quamvis appellatione remota fuerit ei negotium delegatum.

Chapter XXXVII

Latin source headnote: A sentence of interdict is not suspended through a subsequent appeal.

The same, to the Bishop of Norwich.

To these things: because some persons established under interdict appeal and afterward contemn to observe it, you wished to consult what is to be observed in this case. You should know, therefore, that, just as they cannot be excommunicated after an appeal, so they cannot avoid an interdict to which it is established they were subjected before the appeal.

> Sententia interdicti non suspenditur per appellationem sequentem.
>
> Idem Norvicensi Episcopo.
>
> Ad haec, quoniam sub interdicto aliqui constituti appellant, et deinde illud servare contemnunt, quid in hoc casu servandum sit consulere voluisti. Noveris igitur, quod, sicut post appellationem excommunicari non possunt, sic interdictum nequeunt, cui ante appellationem eos constat suppositos, declinare.

Chapter XXXVIII

Latin source headnote: The judge of appeal remits the appellant and the cause to the first judge unless it is established to him that an appeal was taken from a grievance or an unjust sentence.

Clement III.

Since in the [Church of God, according to the diversity of orders and honors, the jurisdiction of those presiding sometimes varies among subjects, and our venerable brothers the bishops exercise the power conceded to them in rendering the rights of subjects and peoples, it happens that, considering not justice but the liberty of their own will, seeking the things that are their own, not those of Jesus Christ, they avoid the judgment and power of the bishops themselves, usurping the refuge of appeal, whose aid, to be interposed justly for the protection of the innocent, is recognized to have been instituted.] But we received a complaint through the grievance of our venerable brother the Bishop of Lincoln transmitted to us that certain clerics of Gual., not compelled by necessity of grievance nor burdened by the weight of any oppression, but under the sole pretext of casting off from themselves the yoke of ecclesiastical discipline, so that they may more freely rage in the liberty of their error and iniquitous purpose, send forth the voice of appeal from his hearing and, on occasion of your judgment, which they boast that they wish to observe, avoid without reasonable cause the cognizance of the Bishop of Lincoln, their ordinary judge.

Hence, [because both canonical and civil laws introduced the refuge of appeal not for the defense of iniquity but as a remedy for the oppressed and those unjustly condemned, according to the statutes of the Lateran Council an appeal of subjects of this kind is not to be admitted, which is not extended except where the worthy correction of prelates may be eluded; and it is recognized to concern all who, by the Lord's ordering, are called into a share of the solicitude of the churches that each person's rights be preserved inviolate,] through apostolic writings we command your discretion that, if at any time it happens that any of the aforesaid clerics appeals from the aforesaid bishop to your hearing, you shall neither provide him a hearing nor admit his appeal before it is established to you that it was extended either from a grievance or from an unjust condemnation; otherwise you shall remit him to the hearing of the aforesaid bishop, with appeal removed, to obey his judgment in the just examination of his discussion. For thus the contumacy of the wicked will be restrained, and the honor due to fellow bishops, through observance of fraternal reciprocity, will remain in its liberty.

Chapter XXXIX

Latin source headnote: If an appellant who does not prosecute returns to the judge from whom the appeal was taken and is again aggrieved, notwithstanding the first abandonment he can appeal again. This it says, and it is a noteworthy case, according to Panormitanus.

The same.

Your letters directed to us showed that, when a cause concerning a certain marriage was being treated in your presence, in which the man's party objected a bond of consanguinity, and the woman's party had appealed to the Apostolic See and had not prosecuted her appeal by the appointed term for its prosecution and for receiving the apostoli when the term arrived, afterward, when she renounced the appeal that she had made, you, proceeding in cognizance of the cause, received testimony concerning the kinship. But because the woman's party appealed again, you petition us to be instructed whether you have power to proceed to the calculus of sentence. We respond, therefore, that, although according to the decree of the Lateran Council, after an appellant has not prosecuted his appeal within the term established for prosecuting the appeal, you can freely use your authority, nevertheless, because she appealed again, since according to the laws it was lawful for her to appeal twice in the same cause, she made herself exempt from your jurisdiction—especially since here the man's intention proceeds toward separation of a marriage, which is a favorable matter, and nothing is to be done unless it lacks suspicion and is judged irreprehensible by law. But another judge will be able to terminate the same cause, according to God and the enactments of the canons, according to the statements of the witnesses who were rightly admitted after renunciation of the first appeal, and other things, if any, that can still be produced in the same cause.

Verum quia mulieris pars iterum appellavit, a nobis postulas utrum ad calculum sententiae procedere valeas, edoceri. Respondemus igitur, quod, licet iuxta decretum Lateranensis concilii, postquam in termino prosequendae appellationis statuto appellans suam appellationem non fuerit prosecutus, auctoritate tua libere possis uti, tamen, quia iterum appellavit, quum secundum iura ei licuerit in eadem causa bis appellare, a iurisdictione tua se fecit exemptam, praesertim quum hic ad separationem matrimonii, quod est res favorabilis, intentio viri procedat, nihilque agendum sit, nisi quod suspicione careat, quod iure inreprehensibile censeatur. Alius vero iudex poterit eandem causam iuxta dicta testium qui post renuntiationem primae appellationis rite admissi fuerunt et alia si qua adhuc poterunt in eadem causa produci secundum Deum et sancita canonum terminare.

Chapter XL

Latin source headnote: A sentence of excommunication, suspension, or interdict rendered under a condition is suspended if an appeal was taken before the occurrence of the condition. This it says by adhering to the words of the letter, so that it may thus satisfy every reading. And it is a subtle and very much allegeable decision.

Celestine III.

Moreover, we were asked: if some judge has pronounced sentence thus, "Unless you make satisfaction to Sempronius within twenty days, know yourself to be excommunicated, suspended, or interdicted," and the person against whom [such] a sentence is rendered, appealing in the intervening time, has made no satisfaction by the appointed day, whether he is bound by such a sentence or remains protected by interposition of the appeal? It appears to us that the obstacle of appeal ought to impede a sentence of this kind. [Given at the Lateran, in the third year, 1193.]

Chapter XLI

Latin source headnote: If several connected articles are committed by a rescript and appeal is removed in one, it is understood to be removed in the others also. This it says. § 1. The cause of suspicion is to be proposed before the judge who is recused and proved before arbiters. This it says.

The same.

Second, you ask: when several articles have been placed in one commission, and only in one does it happen that appeal is expressly prohibited, whether an appeal holds if an appeal has been taken concerning the others? Concerning this we respond to you that, since according to blessed Gregory words serve intention, and this is our intention—that concerning all the articles that are placed in our commission justice shall attain its effect notwithstanding appeal—appeal is understood to be interdicted in all. For it makes no difference whether [appeal] is prohibited first or second, in the middle or at the end, since, as the express arguments of each law teach us, both those things that are at the beginning of rescripts often happen to be referred to the middle and the end, and those that are in the middle to the end and the beginning.

§ 1. Third, you petition to be instructed whether, when someone recuses a judge as suspect, he ought to allege a cause of suspicion and is bound to prove the cause, unless it is manifest, before the same judge; and also whether the judge can proceed in that judgment and business if the person who objects the suspicion is unwilling or unable to prove its cause in law. We respond to your consultation in this way: when someone proposes that he holds a judge suspect, he is bound to allege the cause of suspicion before that judge, lest anyone else be able, at the decision of his own will, frustratingly to avoid any judgment whatsoever. But the parties, through that judge who is named as suspect, ought to be compelled to agree upon some one judge or upon some persons not very remote. If the cause of suspicion is not proved before him or them within a competent term, then at length the judge shall use his authority. But if the cause of that suspicion is proved before those upon whom agreement is made, the recused judge will be bound to stay cognizance of the cause.

For reason itself dictates, and it is proved by very many examples, that suspect and hostile persons ought not to be judges, since, as a decretal constitution asserts, no one can give anything more welcome and pleasing to an enemy than if he has committed to him for assailing the person whom he intends to injure and damage. Moreover, you propose in the fourth place this other question: whether a judge can take cognizance by his office whether an appeal was taken for purposes of frustration or from a reasonable cause, and, if the appellant has not objected a reasonable cause of appeal or has not proved the one he objects, whether the judge is bound under pretext of this appeal to cease from cognizance of the cause. Here it does not please us to define otherwise than has been defined by our predecessors and those skilled in each law. For it is provided in the law that, when an appeal has been interposed, whether it has been received or not, nothing ought to be altered in the intervening time. Canonical constitutions no less hold that those who wish, or for whom it is necessary, to flee to the Roman Church as to their head may appeal without any impediment, to which indeed it is granted that they may go freely without any calumny, custody, excommunication, or despoiling; it permits appeals everywhere according to the sanctions of the holy canons. Therefore, when a judge has before him a cause that he recognizes has thus been suspended through an appeal, he shall abstain as quickly as possible from cognizance of the cause. [Therefore, fifth, etc. (Cf. c. 21, On the Office of a Delegated Judge, I. 29.) Given at the Lateran, on the fifteenth day before the Kalends of July, in the third year of our pontificate, 1193.]

> Si per rescriptum committantur plures articuli connexi, et in uno removeatur appellatio, intelligitur remota etiam in aliis. Hoc dicit. - §. 1. Causa suspicionis proponenda est coram iudice, qui recusatur, et probanda coram arbitris, H. d.

Gregorium verba intentioni deserviant, et haec sit nostra intentio, ut de omnibus articulis, qui in commissione nostra ponuntur, iustitia non obstante appellatione suum consequatur effectum, in omnibus appellatio intelligitur interdicta. Nihil enim interest, utrum [appellatio] inhibeatur primo an secundo, medio an in fine, quum, sicut utriusque iuris argumenta expressa nos docent, et ea, quae in principio rescriptorum, ad medium et ad finem, illa vero, quae in medio, ad finem atque principium saepe referri contingat. §. 1. Consultationi tuae taliter respondemus, quod, quum aliquis iudicem proponit se habere suspectum, suspicionis causam coram eodem iudice allegare tenetur, ne possit alius quilibet pro suae voluntatis arbitrio quodlibet iudicium frustratorie declinare; sed partes, in aliquem. iudicem vel in aliquos non valde remotos conveniant, per eundem iudicem, qui nominatur suspectus, debent cogi, coram quo vel quibus si causa suspicionis infra terminum competentem probata non fuerit, tunc demum auctoritate sua iudex utetur. Quodsi coram ipsis, in quos convenitur, eiusdem causa suspicionis probata fuerit, causae cognitioni supersedere tenebitur iudex recusatus. Ipsa namque ratio dictat, et plurimis probatur exemplis, quod suspecti et inimici iudices esse non debent, quum, sicut decretale perhibet institutum, nil gratius et amabilius quis dare valeat inimico, quam si ad impetendum commiserit, quem laedere et damnificare intendit. Illam vero praeterea quaestionem quarto loco proponis, utrum iudex possit de officio suo cognoscere an frustratorie sit an causa rationabili sit appellatum et si appellans rationabilem appellationis causam non opposuerit aut non probaverit quam opponit, an iudex huius appellationis obtentu teneatur a causae cognitione cessare. Hic non placet aliter definire quam ab antecessoribus nostris et utriusque iuris peritis fuerit definitum. Cautum est enim in lege, quod appellatione interposita sive ea recepta sit sive non tempore medio nihil innovare oportet. Canonica nihilominus tenent instituta, ut qui vult, vel quibus necesse fuerit ad Romanam ecclesiam quasi ad caput suum confugere, possent et sine impedimento quolibet appellare, ad quam nimirum sine ulla calumnia, vel custodia, vel excommunicatione, vel exspoliatione ire libere concedatur, quae secundum canonum sanctorum sanctiones passim appellare permittit. Ideo iudex quum ante se causam tractaverit quam sic per appellationem suspensam esse cognoverit a cognitione causae quam citius abstineat. [Quinto igitur etc. (cf. c. 21. *de off. iud. del. Chapter XLII

Latin source headnote: Neither the judge nor the adversary is bound to defer to an appeal to which the appellant did not defer.

The same.

You determined to consult us through your messengers whether deference is to be given to the appeal of one whom his adversary is prepared to convict immediately of a despoiling committed against him after an appeal had been lawfully interposed. We respond therefore that, since one is to be punished in that in which he offended, one who neglected to defer to an appeal renders himself unworthy of the benefit of appeal, whence we judge that deference is not to be given to him when appealing either.

Chapter XLIII

Latin source headnote: It has two understandings. According to the first it intends this: a mere executor is not recused, nor is an appeal made from him, unless he exceeds the measure, especially if he is appointed with the clause "with appeal removed." According to the other understanding, this it says: there is no withdrawal from a suspect judge through appeal unless he exceeds the measure.

Innocent III, to the illustrious King of the Franks.

He who is ignorant of nothing knows—(And below: [Cf. c. 7, On the Office of a Legate, I. 30.]) Moreover, the cardinal himself did not issue the said sentence of interdict but rather published it; nor was he its author, but more truly its executor. Hence, since according to canonical and civil law no appeal can be taken from executors unless perhaps they exceed the measure in executing, and we also took care in the letters directed to him concerning this to prohibit the obstacle of appeal, no deference was to be given to the appeal interposed from him. But concerning the objection of suspicion, although we believe that he was deservedly not suspect to you, nevertheless, even if he had been, he ought not on account of the appeal interposed to have desisted from that to which he proceeded not by his own motion but rather by our precept.

> Habet duos intellectus; secundum primum hoc intendit: Merus exsecutor non recusatur, nec ab eo appellatur, nisi modum excedat, maxime si est datus cum clausula: «appellatione remota.» Secundum alium intellectum h. d.: A iudice suspecto non receditur per appellationem, nisi modum excedat.

Unde quum secundum ius canonicum et legale ab exsecutoribus appellari non possit, nisi forsan modum excederent in exsequendo, nos etiam in literis super hoc directis ad ipsum appellationis curavimus obstaculum inhibere, appellationi ab eo interpositae non fuerat deferendum. De suspicionis autem obiectu, licet eum merito tibi suspectum non fuisse credamus, non tamen, et si fuisset, propter appellationem interpositam ab eo desistere debuisset, ad quod non proprio motu, sed nostro potius praecepto processit.

Chapter XLIV

Latin source headnote: If an appeal is received by the judge or approved by the party, the term fixed for prosecuting it obtains the place of a peremptory citation, so that proceedings are taken against the absent person as though he had been cited peremptorily; nor can such a term be anticipated by either party.

The same.

It often happens that, when an appeal is made to our hearing, suits that could easily have been terminated remain undecided on account of the default of one party who prosecutes the interposed appeal neither through himself nor through a suitable representative, or perhaps through the malice of a representative who afterward conceals his procuratorial mandate, although frequently a question of law is moved, for which necessary proofs to the contrary do not exist before us, and sometimes also a question of fact could lightly be proved with the parties present. Hence, although it was established in the Lateran Council that, if in any business someone appeals and, when the person appealed against comes, the person who appealed neglects to come, he shall make to the other a suitable recompense of expenses, so that, deterred at least by this fear, someone may not easily appeal to the grievance of another, nevertheless, because questions are no less prolonged on this account, wishing that an end be imposed upon suits and that fraud and deceit support no one, by the counsel of our brothers, by the present decree we establish that, if an appeal of this kind has been either received by the judge or approved by the party, after the term fixed for the appeal it shall obtain the force of a peremptory edict, in such a way, namely, that from then proceedings shall be taken against the absent person just as if he had been called to judgment peremptorily.

But if perhaps the interposed provocation was maliciously neither received nor approved, when it is established that a lawful provocation was made, we will that it no less obtain force, saving the constitutions promulgated concerning those provoking after sentence: if they take no care to prosecute their appeals, after the term fixed for prosecuting the appeal the sentence that had been suspended by the appeal remains ratified. But whatever could be proposed by an absent person against a peremptory citation may be alleged against an appeal of this kind. But if anyone, anticipating the term of appeal and concealing the truth, has impetrated letters, he shall both lack the letters impetrated and not escape the penalty of contumacy. We will this, however, to be observed in conducting suits or judgments.

Si appellatio recipitur a iudice, vel approbatur a parte, terminus ad eam prosequendam praefixus obtinet vicem peremptorii, ut in absentem procedatur, ac si peremptorie fuisset citatus; nec talis terminus praeveniri poterit ab aliqua partium.

Idem.

Saepe contingit, quod, quum ad nostram audientiam appellatur, propter defectum partis alterius neque per se, neque per responsalem idoneum appellationem interpositam prosequentis, vel forsitan ex malitia subsequentis responsalis mandatum procuratorium occultantis, lites, quae de facili poterant terminari, remaneant indecisae, quum frequenter iuris questio moveatur, cuius apud nos probationes necessariae in contrario non exsistunt, et interdum etiam facti quaestio de levi posset partibus praesentibus comprobari. Unde, licet in Lateranensi concilio fuerit constitutum, ut, si in quocunque negotio aliquis appellaverit, et eo, qui appellatus fuerat, veniente, qui appellavit venire neglexerit, competentem illi recompensationem faciat expensarum, ut hoc saltem timore deterritus in gravamen alterius non facile quis appellet; quia tamen propter hoc quaestiones nihilominus prorogantur, volentes, ut finis litibus imponatur, et ne fraus et dolus alicui suffragentur, de consilio fratrum nostrorum praesenti decreto statuimus, ut, si huiusmodi appellatio vel a iudice recepta, vel a parte fuerit approbata, post terminum appellationi praefixum edicti peremptorii vires obtineat, ita videlicet, ut extunc in absentem perinde procedatur, ac si peremptorie vocatus ad iudicium exstitisset. Quodsi forsitan interposita provocatio malitiose recepta vel approbata non fuerit, quum constiterit legitime provocatum, nihilominus eam vigorem volumus obtinere, salvis constitutionibus de provocantibus post sententiam promulgatis; quibus appellationes suas prosequi non curantibus, post terminum appellationi prosequendae praefixum rata manet sententia, quae fuerat appellatione suspensa. Quicquid autem contra citationem peremptoriam posset ab absente proponi, adversus appellationem huiusmodi valeat allegari. Si quis autem terminum appellationis praeveniens tacita veritate literas impetravit, et careat impetratis, et poenam contumaciae non evadat. Hoc autem in litibus sive iudiciis exercendis volumus observari.

Chapter XLV

Latin source headnote: When an appeal has been abandoned through the appellant's negligence, the judge can proceed by office in cases in which his office abounds. And it is a very noteworthy case.

The same, to the Bishops of Limoges and Cahors.

Established in our presence, the beloved son G., Archdeacon of the Church of Clermont, explained to us that, when formerly the deanery of Clermont was vacant, the abbot, the cantor, and certain canons of Clermont transferred their votes to the venerable brother, the Bishop of Clermont, and the bishop, with certain others expressly consenting, conferred the deanery upon the same archdeacon, although only eleven canons had first appealed that no one should be assumed as dean without the assent of all, while [other] twenty-five consented to his election, partly through themselves and partly through the mediation of the bishop. And when the beloved son P., cardinal priest of the title of San Marcello, then legate of the Apostolic See, made his passage through those regions, not so that he might derogate from the appeal interposed to us but so that he might transmit the instructed cause to us, he delegated its examination to the beloved sons, the Abbots of Saint Giles and Saint Andrew, and commanded them to cite to himself the party contradicting the election of the dean, to show in his presence the cause of its contradiction. When, therefore, the aforesaid cardinal had faithfully reported to you the things proposed before him, it was therefore understood through the assertion of the aforesaid G., Cardinal of San Marcello, that an appeal had been made under this form—namely, lest proceedings be taken in the election of the dean without the assent of all—and that the appellants had not prosecuted the appeal within a year, nor was there a reason that two years should be granted to them, since, just as twice within the lawful time they sent a simple messenger to the Apostolic See, so they could have sent a suitable proctor at least once.

Nevertheless, lest we appear to pass over in silence the peremptory exceptions proposed on their behalf, through apostolic writings we command your fraternity that you inquire more diligently into the truth concerning these things; and, if it is established to you that the archdeacon voluntarily renounced the bishop's act upon which he relies, or that the aforesaid bishop proceeded to his election while omitting the aforesaid things without which it is proposed that it had been agreed that he should not proceed in that transfer of votes upon which the archdeacon relies, you shall impose silence upon him concerning that deanery; otherwise you shall declare by our authority, with the obstacle of appeal removed, that the nomination or election thus made concerning the other person, and whatever followed from it, is invalid and empty.

Chapter XLVI

Latin source headnote: Against a person elected or confirmed, who awaits no other right, an exception or appeal is not regularly admitted, especially a frustrating one to impede the effect of election or confirmation; but, after possession has been obtained, he will be able to be accused or denounced. This it says, and according to this it is a noteworthy case.

The same, to the Chancellor of Metz.

When the beloved son I., Dean of the Church of Saint-Sauveur, and the beloved son E., Cantor of Metz, and D., scholasticus of the same church, your proctors, were established in our presence, we took care to grant them a kindly hearing. But it was proposed to us on your behalf, as also our venerable brother the Bishop of Metz intimated to us through his letters, that, when the provostship of Saint-Sauveur was vacant and the day for the election had been fixed, the aforesaid D. bishop, understanding that the votes of the brothers were divided into two parties—(And below:) through the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, in virtue of obedience and under peril of their souls, adjured the canons that, according to God and according to their conscience, they should elect only one of the two toward whom the parties already appeared to have extended their eyes, the one whom they deemed more useful and suitable for the church. But the dean with two deacons and three subdeacons nominated the said cantor, his kinsman of the greater church, as provost. But the cantor himself, who discharges the priestly office, and the custodian with the scholasticus and Master B., priests, two Levites, and five subdeacons concordantly elected you; and the aforesaid bishop, since the honesty of your person was established, confirmed your election as made by the greater and sounder part of the chapter. And when he wished to extend to you the house and investiture, as is customary, the dean appealed to the Apostolic See, alleging only inability against you.

Although the bishop did not believe that deference was to be given to an appeal of this kind, since Pope Alexander of happy memory, our predecessor, established in the Lateran Council that, unless something reasonable has been objected and shown by the fewer and inferior persons, with appeal removed, what was instituted by the greater and sounder part of the chapter shall always prevail and attain its effect, nevertheless, humbly and devotedly deferring to us, he ceased from the investiture. But it was proposed in opposition that the dean, who obtains the greater place in the aforementioned church, with the two more senior deacons and three subdeacons from among the elders of the church, understanding that the provost ought to exercise the administration of temporal things, and that therefore he is more useful for this who is deemed more powerful, with good zeal nominated the aforesaid E. as provost, a man knowing how to provide for the church and powerful to protect its rights and possessions, if necessary, with a strong hand and an outstretched arm. Hence, when the other party, although greater in number, nevertheless inferior in authority, nominated you as provost, proposing that you were, as it were, utterly powerless in those regions in which the possessions of the provostship exist, both on account of this and because it held the bishop suspect by law, it appealed to the Apostolic See, adding that it would object other things to you in our presence, which it was then unwilling to explain in the presence of the suspect judge; but the bishop, not deferring to the appeal, nevertheless confirmed the nomination made concerning you.

We therefore, having heard these and other things that had been proposed on this side and that, because it was evidently established that the cause of appeal that was set out and expressed was not reasonable, but the dean then neither objected nor expressed another, although he said that he wished to object another before us, by the counsel of our brothers decree that the effect of your confirmation ought not to be impeded by the things that were proposed. Nevertheless, if he should determine to propose anything against you not in the manner of an exception to impede the effect of the election and confirmation, but in the manner of denunciation or accusation, after you have obtained peaceful possession of the provostship itself, we do not deny him license to propose it.

> Contra electum vel confirmatum, nullum aliud ius exspectantem, non admittitur regulariter exceptio vel appellatio, maxime frustratoria ad impediendum electionis vel confirmationis effectum; sed possessione habita poterit accusari vel denunciari. H. d. et secundum hoc est casus notabilis.

Latin source headnote: A defendant lawfully appeals if he is not heard when objecting that the claimant's proctor does not have a sufficient mandate, or that he was previously convened through other letters of which no mention is made in the second. This it says with regard to the title.

The same, to the Bishop, Dean, and Precentor of Hereford.

The beloved son John, master of the Hospital of York, signified to us that, when P., formerly rector of that hospital, had closed his last day, our venerable brother the Archbishop of York, to whom and to whose predecessors the ordering of the same hospital had belonged from antiquity, unwilling that it should sustain loss from the want of a rector, placed over it as rector the said I., a priest of the same house unanimously elected by his brothers, hoping that the house itself would receive increase through him both in temporal and spiritual things. But in the course of time, the dean and chapter of the Church of York, as though the ordering of the same hospital belonged to them, wishing to remove the master himself from the office of his administration, impetrated apostolic letters concerning this to the Dean of Lincoln and his fellow judges, by whose authority they caused both the archbishop and the rector to be called into law. Therefore, when the parties were established before those judges on the day peremptorily assigned to them, the judges committed their places to others, reserving only definitive sentence to themselves.

Furthermore, the Chapter of York, by authority of certain letters on whose seal was contained the seal of the chapter only for citations, although that chapter is known to have another seal, constituted through it a certain person as claimant. But although the same master alleged that the same person ought not to be admitted as claimant on occasion of those letters, and additionally added that, by authority of certain letters obtained by us concerning this to other judges, he had been convened earlier and ought not to have been convened through later letters in which no mention was made of the former, nevertheless the judges were unwilling to admit exceptions of this kind; on account of this he sent forth the voice of appeal to us. Wherefore, through apostolic writings we command your discretion that you inquire more diligently into the truth concerning the foregoing, and, if it is established to you that an appeal was taken to our hearing on account of the said causes or one of them, after revoking as invalid whatever you know was done after an appeal of this kind, you shall summon the parties to your presence and diligently hear, with appeal removed, the things that they determine to propose on this side and that. [Given at the Lateran, on the second day before the Ides of May, 1284.]

The same, to Master G., Archdeacon, and Wnormannus, canons of Soissons.

Through the signification of the brothers T. and R. it was declared to our apostolate that, when a question concerning a certain land was being conducted before delegated judges between them on one side and V. on the other, since they had several lands, they petitioned the judges that the land concerning which the question was being conducted should be shown to them. When the judges refused to do this, they provoked to our hearing. Wherefore we command that, if it is so, after restoring to the due state whatever, if anything, you know was attempted after the appeal, etc.

The same, to the Bishop of York and the Abbots of Luc. and Mont-Molli.

From the intimation of the beloved sons, the prior and canons of Saint Barbara, it became known to us that, when a question concerning a certain manor was being conducted before an ordinary judge, not by our delegation, between them on one side and V., chamberlain of Tangar. in the Diocese of Rouen, on the other, and the same chamberlain appealed from that same judge to our hearing, fixing no term for his appeal, the said judge—who appeared to favor his cause because a certain cleric, a table-companion of his, had been advocate in the same cause for the already-said chamberlain—deceitfully and contrary to custom fixed this term for the appeal: that by the feast of the Purification of blessed Mary each party was to have returned from prosecution of the appeal. Yet he could not impose a law upon us that we should be bound to dispatch it within the said term, since also, according to lawful sanctions, a suit that is expected to be introduced in the prince's consistory remains untouched without detriment from delay until he causes it to be introduced and decided by the nobles according to custom. Meanwhile, however, the messenger of the aforesaid chamberlain, anticipating their messenger and not waiting for him until the lawful term, impetrated letters and withdrew. But because fraud and deceit ought to protect no one, through apostolic writings we command your discretion that, if it is so, after summoning the parties, you shall hear the cause and, after hearing the things proposed on this side and that, terminate the cause concerning them by means of justice, with appeal removed. [Given at Rome, on the fourth day before the Ides of February, 1205.]

Chapter LI

Latin source headnote: One who appeals outside judgment from plausible and probable causes lest he be molested in possession, if he is afterward despoiled, is restored before all things to the state in which he was at the time the appeal was sent forth. This it says by adhering to the words of the letter and so that accommodation may be made for every reading, according to Panormitanus.

The same, to the Bishops of Rochester and London.

When O. de Camera of good memory, parson of the Church of Faversham, entered the way of all flesh, the beloved son the Abbot of Saint Augustine of Canterbury, first through certain monks and second through himself, entered possession of the same church, which he asserts belongs to him, and more than once sent forth to us the voice of appeal lest anyone presume unduly to molest him concerning possession of that church. And when he had peacefully possessed the aforesaid church for some time, certain laymen of the Diocese of Canterbury, rashly laying violent hands upon that abbot and the monks within the same church, even to the shedding of blood, violently cast them out of possession of the church itself.

[*We therefore, hearing of the savagery of the aforesaid laymen and wishing with paternal solicitude to provide for the abbot and monks concerning so great an injury inflicted upon them, firmly commanded our venerable brother the Bishop of Ely and his fellow judges that, if the matter stood thus, with appeal removed, they should publicly declare those laymen and their accomplices excommunicated and command them to be more strictly avoided by everyone until they made suitable satisfaction to those who suffered the injury and presented themselves to the apostolic presence with the testimony of their letters. By our authority, under threat of anathema, they were also more strictly to prohibit anyone from presuming, in the cities, towns, villages, and other places to which it should happen that they came, to celebrate divine services in their presence, except baptism of infants and penances of the dying, or to exchange anything with them under the appearance of any contract whatsoever. We added no less in the mandate that, after removing any unlawful detainer from that church, notwithstanding anyone's precept and with the obstacle of appeal removed, they should reduce and preserve the aforesaid abbot and monks in that state in which they had been before the violence was attempted.

Meanwhile, however, when the dean of the place obtained possession of the same church through induction by the laymen who had violently cast out the monks, the beloved son the Archdeacon of Canterbury afterward began to possess the same church, and, converting its fruits to his own utility, still perseveres in the same possession, as is said. Therefore, when in the presence of the aforesaid judges the proctor of the aforementioned abbot insistently petitioned for restitution of the said church, after the archdeacon had been removed from it, so many exceptions were opposed on this side and that, so many delays were granted, and so many byways of escape were invented that, after a very long space had elapsed from the time the commission was made, since the cause did not have its due process, the abbot and the often-mentioned monks took care to impetrate other letters from us. In them, reproving those judges because they had deferred so much to frustrating appeals and frivolous exceptions that the cause had not yet been able to have process under their examination—wherefore the abbot and monks had been compelled to undergo, besides great injuries and losses, no less grave labors and expenses—we strictly commanded those judges that, all favor and fear set aside and the obstacle of any contradiction and appeal removed, they should through ecclesiastical coercion compel the party adverse to them immediately to join issue. They were to take care to receive and examine within two months after joinder of issue the witnesses whom either party should determine to produce concerning both the principal matter and any incidental matter, in such a way that, if they could not participate personally, they should nevertheless execute this through others, from whom no appeal would in any way be lawful. But after the attestations had been received, they were to fix for the parties a competent term at which they should present themselves to our presence to receive sentence.

Therefore, after receiving the later mandate, the same judges, advancing the business according to its tenor, when witnesses had been admitted after joinder of issue, at length, after the attestations had been published, established for the parties a day on which they should appear in our presence to receive sentence concerning this. They transmitted to us the attestations and acts and also other things that appeared to contribute to the cause, enclosed under their seals, as they had in mandate. Therefore, when the beloved son ..., a monk and proctor of the Abbot and Monks of Saint Augustine, approached the Apostolic See at the appointed term and by our mandate waited for the proctor of the other party for almost three months, and at length both were established in our presence, the aforesaid monk proposed that, when the abbot and monks, as was aforesaid, enjoyed peaceful possession of the Church of Faversham, after an appeal had more often been lawfully interposed to us they were violently cast out of it. On that account he petitioned more insistently that, after any unlawful detainer had been removed from it, we deign to restore to them possession of the church itself, with the fruits both received and to be received, also to be calculated from the time of the ejection.

He also sought the expenses of forty marks and more that the abbot and monks were compelled to incur on occasion of certain exceptions that the archdeacon's proctor had proposed for purposes of frustration, and of the competent delays for proving them, since that archdeacon or his proctor afterward did not prove those exceptions. For since the aforesaid O. de Camera possessed the said church in another's name, inasmuch as he rendered for it a certain pension each year to the Abbot and Monks of Saint Augustine, and since it was also proved through several witnesses that, after O. Medicus had been taken from the midst until the substitution of O. de Camera, the Abbot of Saint Augustine had custody of the aforesaid church, after the death of the aforesaid O. de Camera that possession was continued, since it was apprehended by the monks immediately after his death. Furthermore, since an appeal was made by that abbot while he possessed the church itself, both before the ejection and afterward, nothing ought to have been altered while the appeal was pending. He said that it was no obstacle that the archdeacon is alleged to have done this for the sake of preserving his right, because, since a question concerning this had already been moved and it was denied on behalf of the abbot that he had jurisdiction of this kind, through the denial the matter was made doubtful. Hence he could not be judge, since he had already become adversary; and therefore, since he presumed to pronounce law for himself in his own cause, he deservedly ought to suffer detriment from his act, and it is fitting that the matter be recalled to its former state.*]

But the proctor of the aforementioned archdeacon proposed in opposition that, when a parson of a church dies, only its custody is given; indeed, the Canterbury archdeacons who existed for the time being had always used this right, both by common law and by the general custom of the Province of Canterbury, as much in that church as in all others of the same diocese. As had been sufficiently proved, such restitution in no way belonged to the monks, nor did he appear to do them injury by using his own right. Furthermore, since the aforesaid O. de Camera possessed the same church in the name of the archdeacon, inasmuch as each year he paid him one procuration and five solidi in the name of that church, *when the same O. had been taken from the midst, possession in intention is recognized to have remained with the archdeacon; it is not lost unless the archdeacon thought that he could be repelled or unless, upon coming, he had not been admitted. Thus, therefore, the possession of the monks ought rather to be called clandestine detention, since the archdeacon did not lose that possession. And thus the monks could not have it, since two persons cannot possess anything wholly. Therefore, since the archdeacon could enter possession by his own right and cast out the de facto holders, all the more could he, when no one was there and no one resisted in any way, reserve his own right for himself, since the execution of a right is recognized to contain no injury.

To these things, the monks cannot in any way call away the possession of the archdeacon, even if it were established that they had it, because, since he in no way cast them out of possession, and this was neither proved nor confessed in law, they have nothing to object against an external detainer, especially since they themselves entered possession by their own authority and, doing injury to another,* [for the monastery] were unable to acquire any right. The appeal also that the monks allege they interposed was utterly null, since an appeal ought to be made only from a present, past, or future grievance. But the archdeacon had neither previously aggrieved them nor aggrieved them after the appeal, since he is known to have undertaken custody of a vacant thing that he has a right to guard—indeed, which by office he is bound to guard. Finally, no deference at all was to be given to the monks' appeal because, even if the same church belonged to them, they ought [nevertheless] not to have entered possession of it by their own authority, especially since they knew, or rather ought to have known, that custody of vacant churches belonged to the archdeacon and that, if the same archdeacon had then been present, he would have denied it to them and retained it for himself, as pertained to his office. Since, however, their possession was clandestine, they could not be held as true possessors, since no injury concerning possession can be done to a clandestine possessor.

Therefore, after diligently inspecting the foregoing, we decree that the aforesaid abbot and monks are to be reduced to that state in which they are known to have been at the time the appeal, lawfully interposed to us from plausible and probable causes, was made, saving the right of either party concerning ownership; and we judge that the fruits received in the intervening time are likewise to be assigned to them. Wherefore, through apostolic writings, we command your discretion that, with the obstacle of any contradiction and appeal removed, you reduce the aforesaid abbot and monks to that state in which they are known to have been at the time of the appeal, and cause all the fruits of the intervening time likewise to be resigned to them, restraining contradictors, if there are any, or rebels, after admonition has preceded, through ecclesiastical censure, with appeal set aside. [Given at Rome, at Saint Peter's, on the eleventh day before the Kalends of December, 1205.]

Latin source headnote: Through the clause "with appeal removed," every appeal that is not expressly granted by law is prohibited. This it says up to § But. § 1. Although an excommunicated person appeals from the excommunication, he can nevertheless be denounced and despoiled of the revenues of a benefice. This it says.

The same, to the Bishop of Ely.

The diligence of the pastoral office—(And below: [Cf. c. 28, On the Office of a Delegated Judge, I. 29.]) You asked, also diligently, whether, when appeal is prohibited in a rescript, only a frustrating appeal appears to be prohibited, so that it is lawful to appeal from every grievance, or every appeal appears to be excluded, except only in cases expressed by law. We therefore, considering that a business ought not to be impeded through a frustrating appeal even if it had not been prohibited, respond briefly to your diligence that every provocation is understood to be removed that is not expressly granted by law; but if an appellant has been unjustly aggrieved, a grievance of this kind will be able to be amended by a superior.

§ 1. But because frequently someone is for a time exempted through a lawful appeal from the power of his judge with regard to some certain article, you consulted us whether, if someone bound by a sentence of excommunication, before its denunciation, has taken care to provoke from it as less than reasonably promulgated, in a case in which an appeal before sentence would have obtained force, on the ground that through the interposed appeal the jurisdiction of the excommunicator appears to have lain dormant, he can denounce that person and for a time despoil a cleric of ecclesiastical benefices, since through a provocation made in such manner the excommunication is not deprived of its effect. We therefore respond to your inquiry that, since excommunication brings execution with it, and the excommunicated person is not bound more fully through denunciation, you can not undeservedly denounce him as excommunicated, so that he may be avoided by others. And ecclesiastical revenues are indeed deservedly withdrawn from him to whom the communion of the Church is denied. Latin source headnote: If an appellant to a superior appears before an inferior judge concerning matters touching the appeal itself, he appears to renounce that appeal. But if he protests that on this account he does not intend to renounce the appeal, he is not to be heard as one alleging contraries, unless it is notorious that the act concerning whose amendment he approached the inferior was unjust. This it says, and it is a good case.

The same, to the Bishop of Paris.

You execute the solicitude of the pastoral office prudently when you petition to be instructed by a response of the Apostolic See concerning doubts of law. Indeed, when, as we received from your intimation, while two persons were litigating before their bishop, one of them appealed to the Apostolic See, the bishop, not deferring to the interposed appeal but reckoning the appellant contumacious, bound him with the bond of excommunication. Before his metropolitan, he petitioned that justice concerning this be exhibited to him concerning the bishop, asserting that after an appeal had lawfully been interposed to us the bishop excommunicated him and caused him to be publicly denounced as excommunicated, and petitioning that he be reduced by the metropolitan to that state in which he had been at the time of the appeal—namely, that he be declared absolved—adding also that he did not renounce the objected appeal but wished to prosecute it. Hence your fraternity asked us whether the metropolitan has power to take cognizance of a complaint of this kind, and, if he finds that the man lawfully provoked, whether he ought to declare him absolved, and whether, if the bishop appeals before the archbishop lest the person who had been excommunicated by him be absolved, deference is to be given to an appeal of this kind.

We therefore respond to your inquiry thus: just as the metropolitan has altogether no power to take cognizance of an appeal interposed to us, so neither does he have power concerning those things that had been altered after that appeal, provided that cognizance cannot be taken of them unless cognizance is taken [also] of the appeal at the same time, or of those things that are recognized to touch the cause of appeal. In that case, if the metropolitan should perhaps presume to interpose his part for taking cognizance, the bishop certainly could fly to the benefit of appeal. For it pertains to the office of the person who is to take cognizance of the appeal prudently to correct the things that he finds attempted contrary to it. But if it perhaps were notorious that the bishop's mandate had been indiscreet or unjust, which the subject was not bound to obey, and consequently it was evidently clear to him that the subject lawfully provoked, the archbishop can by metropolitan authority declare that the subject was unreasonably struck by the sword of anathema.

But when the excommunicated person who had appealed lodges a question against the bishop before the archbishop according to the prescribed form, namely, that he take cognizance of the injury inflicted upon him by the bishop, the metropolitan himself can interpose his part to take cognizance of the cause, since that person appears tacitly to renounce prosecution of the appeal. But if by word or deed he protests that he wishes to prosecute the appeal, as is expressed above in the proposed case, he is not to be heard as one petitioning adverse things and contrary to himself. [Given at Rome, at Saint Peter's, on the second day before the Ides of December, in the tenth year, 1207.]

Chapter LV

Latin source headnote: Through an appeal lawfully interposed, the principal matter with its accessories is transferred to the judge of appeal, and sentences of excommunication and interdict rendered after the appeal do not hold.

The same, to the Bishop and Cantor of Troyes.

When the beloved sons the Dean of Auxerre and Master R., proctor of our venerable brother the Bishop of Auxerre, were established in our presence, the same master proposed before us that, when the said bishop caused R., a priest of the House of God [of Mont-Attrito,] in which the same bishop is recognized to obtain provision and full administration, to be detained and committed to chains because he refused to restore certain goods of the same house that he had furtively taken away—on account of which he had also been bound by the same bishop with the bond of excommunication—and the aforesaid dean admonished the bishop that he should restore to him, or at least provisionally release to him, the aforementioned priest, whom he firmly asserted belonged to his jurisdiction, [the same bishop, alleging several reasons why he said he was in no way bound to this, utterly refused to restore or provisionally release the same priest. He proposed that concerning this he was prepared to exhibit justice to the same dean in his own court, since the dean was his vassal, or before arbiters to be chosen in common, or even before the metropolitan. But the dean, altogether refusing these things, began gravely to threaten that he would do something that would displease the bishop. On account of this,] the bishop, fearing lest the dean attempt something to his prejudice, subjected himself and his men and the status of his church and city to the protection of the metropolitan and appealed to his hearing, fixing the recently past feast of Saint Mary Magdalene as the term for the appeal.

But after a short time the dean, having summoned the canons of Auxerre, promulgated an interdict of this kind, although they contradicted, that, while the bishop was present in the city, divine services should cease in the Church of Auxerre. But afterward, when on the day fixed for the appeal the parties appeared before the official of the Court of Sens, the dean alleged that he had determined not to defer to the appeal interposed by the bishop because the aforesaid priest was still held in chains when he sent forth to us the voice of appeal. The official, however, judged invalid the interdict promulgated by the dean after the bishop's appeal interposed to the metropolitan see, [*and enjoined upon the chapter of the Church of Auxerre that it should in no way observe that interdict. And when afterward, while the bishop was present, the dean firmly prohibited singing in the church and, binding G., the bishop's chaplain who was singing there after an appeal had been interposed to us, with the bond of excommunication, impeded divine office in the church, and, although admonished more often by the bishop, did not desist from disturbing the office, at length the bishop struck him, as contumacious and incorrigible, with the sword of excommunication. Afterward our venerable brother the Archbishop of Sens publicly declared that he was to be avoided. Hence the proctor himself petitioned us that, judging the aforesaid sentence of interdict invalid, we should cause the sentence of excommunication rendered by the bishop to be observed inviolably until worthy satisfaction.

But the dean proposed in opposition that, when the bishop caused R., a priest belonging to his jurisdiction, to be detained in chains, and he himself had been gravely reproved by both clerics and laymen of the city as though he neglected to defend a right belonging to him—he who was bound to observe the customs of the church by an oath rendered concerning this—he admonished the bishop through himself to restore the priest himself to liberty, being prepared sufficiently to show that the same priest belonged to his jurisdiction, and at length caused the same bishop to be admonished through several others that he should render or provisionally release the priest to him, or at least place him in sequestration. And when the bishop could not be inclined to any of these, after summoning the chapter the dean, with its connivance, placed an interdict of this kind upon the church: that while the bishop was present in the city there should be an utter cessation from divine services in the church. He nevertheless suspended execution of the sentence until he should have a discussion concerning this with the archbishop, who was soon to come into the city, through whom he hoped that concord could be reformed.

But although afterward, when the archbishop was present, he admonished the bishop to accept one of the aforesaid modes for liberation of the priest, he could accomplish nothing with him; rather, the bishop appealed to the hearing of the metropolitan see, fixing the aforesaid term for his appeal. Hence the dean, returning to the chapter, enjoined upon all the canons that they should observe the interdict as it had been placed by him. But on the day fixed for the appeal, the dean, appearing before the official of Sens with the bishop's proctor and fearing that a grievance threatened him, appealed to the Apostolic See, establishing Laetare Jerusalem as the term for his appeal and subjecting himself and his status and that of the Church of Auxerre to the protection of the Apostolic See. But when, after these things and while the bishop was present, the dean publicly declared G., a cleric of the same bishop, excommunicated because he had violently seized two clerics, and commanded the clerics to observe the sentence of interdict rendered by him, the bishop promulgated a sentence of excommunication against the dean himself, declaring him excommunicated to the often-mentioned archbishop and the Chapter of Sens. On that account the archbishop, by the counsel of certain persons, publicly declared him to be avoided, although certain canons of Sens, led by sounder counsel, did not avoid communion with him.*]

From these things, therefore, and others that were proposed before us on each side, we understood evidently that, although the bishop would have provided prudently and usefully if he had provisionally released the often-mentioned priest to the dean, to cut away altogether every material of scandal, nevertheless, because the same bishop, as was premised, expressed diverse modes according to which he was prepared to exhibit justice to the dean concerning the seizure of the priest, and appealed to the metropolitan see, the dean could not after this render a sentence of interdict. And therefore, by the counsel of our brothers, we decree invalid and empty the sentence itself promulgated by him after the appeal had been lawfully made, notwithstanding that which the dean, as though varying, proposed before us for his excuse: that, before the bishop appealed, he himself had rendered the sentence, whose effect he had nevertheless determined should be suspended for a time, since in the meantime, after the appeal was interposed, he ought not to have proceeded to execute the sentence.

We judge temerarious, however, the process of the official who, after the appeal to the Apostolic See had been interposed, decreed that such a sentence of interdict was invalid and empty and commanded that it be observed in no way, since, after an appeal had been interposed to us, nothing ought to have been altered. Furthermore, although at first appearance the sentence of excommunication promulgated against the dean by the bishop appeared to have been rightly rendered, because, when it had been prohibited through the already-said official that the interdict be observed in the church, the same dean, by prohibiting celebration in the church, appeared to disturb divine office, nevertheless, because through the appeal interposed to us on behalf of the dean, to which the official also determined to defer by granting the apostoli, not only the principal business but also the accessories were referred to our examination, we decree that the same sentence promulgated after an appeal of this kind lacked force, and that the dean himself was not bound by it.

But although the archbishop, circumvented by the counsel of certain persons, after the aforesaid appeal, which had become known to him through the letters of his official, declared that the dean was to be avoided, nevertheless we judge inculpable the canons of Sens who, led by sounder counsel, communicated with him, so that they deferred more to the appeal interposed to us than to the denunciation made by the archbishop. [But because, etc. Given at Rome, at Saint Peter's, on the fourth day before the Ides of January, in the tenth year, 1207.]

Chapter LVII

Latin source headnote: If the other party anticipates a term established by a person for prosecuting an appeal, impetrating letters while concealing this, the letters are not valid; but even the appellee can anticipate the term of law, provided that he does not run too far ahead. And where danger threatens from delay, even when neither party prosecutes, the judge to whom the appeal is taken can supply the defect by compelling the parties to prosecution.

The same, to the Abbot of Saint Felix and G., Canon of Bologna.

Your letters offered to us contained that, when certain judges to whom the cause being conducted between the parish churches of Sambro and Rinocor. had been committed by the Apostolic See without the remedy of appeal pronounced sentence for the parish church of Sambro, and its proctor appealed to us without a term on behalf of the parish church of Rinocor., and neither had deference been given to the appeal nor had a term for prosecuting it been assigned to the parties by the judges, the parish priest of Sambro impetrated our letters to you concerning observance of the aforesaid sentence, as it had been reasonably rendered. Afterward the other party impetrated from us other letters of commission to other judges concerning invalidating [or confirming] the same sentence, no mention of the former letters having been made in the later. Hence, recalled into doubt whether the later judges or you ought to take cognizance of it, you wished to consult us concerning this, [*adding nevertheless that it had been proposed by certain wise men on behalf of the appellant that, since in such an article he has by benefit of law a year within which he can execute the suit by himself or jointly, in the intervening time he could prosecute the same appeal at his own decision whenever he wished, nor ought he to be compelled to it before the same space of time had run. Therefore they asserted that the first letters were of no validity, even though no mention of them had been made in the second.

But on behalf of the other party certain other learned men in law were said to have maintained that, since it was in that party's interest that the sentence should not remain suspended for so long and its confirmation be deferred, and the judges who pronounced it determined that the aforesaid appeal was not to be admitted, both because it had been prohibited by us and because it appeared frivolous, the party appealed against could lawfully have impetrated letters of this kind in the meantime—especially since, if it were said otherwise, churches would sometimes sustain grave loss, since in ecclesiastical causes according to the canons it is lawful to appeal whenever a grievance or another just cause occurs. Hence it could happen, if in this way a year were given to everyone provoking, that a cause would not attain its due effect for six or eight years. Certain others were additionally of the opinion that the first letters, not the second, were valid, but that the party who had appealed was not bound to prosecute his appeal within a year.*]

Therefore, although a year is granted by law to one lawfully appealing from a sentence, or [even] two years from a just cause, to prosecute the interposed appeal, nevertheless, because a term of this kind can be restricted not only by the person provoking but also by the judge from whose sentence the provocation is made—since it was established for this purpose, not that the term itself cannot be anticipated, but lest it be capable of extension—we believe that a distinction is to be made as to the case in which letters are impetrated. And indeed, when a certain term is fixed by the appellant or judge for prosecuting the appeal, if the appellee, concealing it, impetrates letters, letters of this kind, as surreptitiously obtained by concealment of the truth, ought to obtain no firmness. But if no certain term has been fixed by the judge or appellant, the party appealed against will be able, within the term established by law, provided that he does not run too far ahead so as to supplant the appellant in impetrating the commission, to impetrate letters of commission, by whose authority lawful proceedings shall be taken in the cause of appeal, in such a way that, if the appellant wishes to proceed in the cause of appeal, he will be obliged to act under the judge thus obtained, unless he can lawfully recuse him.

But if the appellant is unwilling to act, the appellee can nonetheless prosecute the cause itself, especially if he perceives that a grievance threatens him from the delay. The superior judge also, if he sees that danger threatens from delay, can and ought, when neither party prosecutes the appeal, to intervene so that the danger may be avoided. For example, if a provocation was made from a sentence rendered concerning confirmation of some bishop-elect, and each party wishes to defer prosecution of the appeal even [up to] a year, the superior judge to whom the appeal was taken certainly can—indeed, ought—to moderate the term providently, lest the Lord's flock long lack the care of a pastor. From these things, therefore, you should know that a response has been made to your consultation: through the later letters no derogation is made from those first lawfully impetrated, through which proceedings can be taken, with reason preceding, to confirm or invalidate the sentence. [Given at Viterbo, on the seventh day before the Ides of July, in the twelfth year, 1209.]

Si terminum appellationis prosequendae statutum ab homine altera pars praevenit, hoc tacito literas impetrando, literae non valent: sed terminum iuris etiam appellatus praevenire potest, dummodo nimium non praecurrat. Oblatae nobis vestrae literae continebant, quod, quum quidam iudices, quibus causa, quae inter Sambr. et Rinocor. plebes vertebatur, absque appellationis remedio fuerat ab apostolica sede commissa, pro plebe Sambriensi sententiam protulissent, et a procuratore plebis de Rinocor. ad nos fuerit sine termino appellatum, nec delatum appellationi fuisset, nec ad prosecutionem ipsius terminus a iudicibus partibus assignatus: plebanus de Sambro super observatione praedictae sententiae, sicut rationabiliter lata erat, nostras ad vos literas et alia pars alias commissionis literas a nobis super infirmanda [vel confirmanda] eadem postmodum ad alios iudices impetravit, nulla in posterioribus literis de prioribus habita mentione. Unde in dubitatione revocato, an posteriores iudices, vel vos de illa debeatis cognoscere, nos super hoc consulere voluistis, [adiicientes nihilominus, a quibusdam sapientibus pro parte fuisse propositum appellante, quod, quum in tali articulo de legis beneficio annum habeat, infra quem secundum se communiterve ipsam exsequi litem possit, medio tempore pro suo arbitrio, quando vellet, prosequi poterat appellationem eandem, nec ad id compelli debebat, antequam idem temporis spatium haberetur. Quare nullius esse valoris primas literas asserebant, etsi de ipsis nulla sit mentio habita in secundis. Pro parte vero altera quosdam alios iurisperitos dixisse, quod quum interesset eiusdem, ne tamdiu sententia maneret suspensa et ipsius confirmatio differretur, et iudices, qui eam protulerant, appellationem praedictam non duxerint admittendam, tum quia fuerat a nobis inhibita, tum quia frivola videbatur, licite pars potuit appellata huiusmodi literas interim impetrare, praesertim quum, si aliter diceretur, gravem interdum ecclesiae sustinerent iacturam, quum in causis ecclesiasticis secundum canones appellare liceat, quotiens gravamen occurrit vel alia iusta causa. Unde contingere posset, si taliter annus cuilibet provocanti daretur, quod causa usque ad sex vel octo annos debitum non sortiretur effectum. Quosdam insuper alias opinatos, quod primae valebant literae, non secundae, sed pars, quae appellaverat, infra annum suam appellationem prosequi non tenebatur]. Licet igitur appellanti legitime a sententia indulgeatur annus a lege, aut [etiam] ex iusta causa biennium ad appellationem interpositam prosequendam; quia tamen huiusmodi terminus potest restringi non solum a provocante, verum etiam a iudice, a cuius sententia provocatur, quum ideo sit constitutus, non ut terminus ipse praeveniri non possit, sed ne valeat prorogari, credimus distinguendum, in quo casu literae impetrantur. Et quidem, quando certus terminus ab appellante vel a iudice appellationi praefigitur prosequendae, si eo tacito appellatus literas impetraverit, huiusmodi literae tanquam tacita veritate subreptae obtinere non debent aliquam firmitatem. Si vero non sit aliquis certus terminus a iudice vel ab appellante praefixus, pars appellata infra terminum constitutum a lege, dummodo nimium non praecurrat, ut appellantem in commissione impetranda supplantet, commissionis literas poterit impetrare, quarum auctoritate in appellationis causa legitime procedatur ita, quod, si appellans voluerit in causa appellationis procedere, oportebit eum agere sub iudice sic obtento, nisi possit eum legitime recusare. Quod si agere noluerit appellans, appellatus potest nihilominus prosequi causam ipsam, maxime si sentiat, sibi ex dilatione imminere gravamen. Superior quoque iudex, si viderit, ex dilatione periculum imminere, potest et debet, neutro prosequente appellationem, occurrere, ut periculum evitetur, puta, si a sententia lata super confirmatione alicuius electi fuerit provocatum, et utraque pars velit etiam [usque] ad annum prosecutionem appellationis differre, potest utique, immo debet superior iudex, ad quem fuerat appellatum, terminum provide moderari, ne gregi dominico diu desit cura pastoris. Ex his igitur consultationi vestrae noveritis esse responsum, quod per posteriores non

Chapter LVIII

Latin source headnote: When the other party is contumaciously absent, the judge of appeal can define even the principal business if the appeal was taken after joinder of issue.

The same.

Through your letters you asked us whether, if an appeal has been made to the Apostolic See under someone's examination after sentence was rendered, or at least after the depositions of the witnesses were published and read, those who are delegated by us concerning these things can, if one of the parties is unwilling to present himself to their sight, terminate by judicial calculus the cause delegated to them. We therefore respond to your consultation in this way: since issue concerning the same business was lawfully joined before the first judges, the delegated judges, when the person convened absents himself through contumacy, will be able, when the merits of the cause are clear to them, to define the business committed to them.

Altera parte contumaciter absente potest iudex appellationis etiam principale negotium definire, si post litem contestatam fuerit appellatum.

Idem.

Per tuas nobis literas requisisti, utrum, si sub alicuius examine post latam sententiam, vel saltem post depositiones testium publicatas et lectas, fuerit ad sedem apostolicam appellatum, hi, qui super haec delegantur a nobis, si altera partium eorum se noluerit conspectibus praesentare, causam sibi delegatam iudiciali possint calculo terminare. Nos igitur consultationi tuae taliter respondemus, quod, quum lis super eodem negotio coram primis iudicibus sit legitime contestata, poterunt iudices delegati, eo, qui convenitur, se per contumaciam absentante, quum eis de meritis causae liquebit, commissum sibi negotium diffinire.

Chapter LIX

Latin source headnote: A noteworthy and famous chapter, having many new sayings limiting each law; and, in sum, this it says, by adhering simply to the words of the letter: one appealing before sentence is bound to express a reasonable cause before the very judge from whom the appeal is taken, nor is an exception admitted that he had previously sent a messenger to the Apostolic See or that he had impetrated letters that have not yet been presented to the judge.

The same, in the general council.

That due honor may be deferred to judges and that provision may be made for litigants concerning labors and expenses, we establish that, if someone convenes an adversary before a suitable judge, the latter shall not provoke to a superior judge before sentence without reasonable cause, but shall prosecute his justice before that judge, notwithstanding that he says he sent a messenger to the superior judge or even impetrated letters from him before they were assigned to the delegate. But when he believes that an appeal is to be taken from a reasonable cause, after a probable cause of appeal has been set out before the same judge—namely, such a cause as, if it were proved, ought to be reputed lawful—the superior shall take cognizance of the appeal. And if it is established that he appealed from that judge less than reasonably, the superior shall remit him to the inferior and condemn him in expenses to the other party; otherwise the superior himself shall proceed, saving the constitutions concerning greater causes to be referred to the Apostolic See.

Quum autem ex rationabili causa putaverit appellandum, coram eodem iudice causa probabili appellationis exposita, tali videlicet, quae, si foret probata, deberet legitima reputari: superior de appellatione cognoscat. Et si minus rationabiliter eum appellasse constiterit, illum ad inferiorem remittat, et in expensis alteri parti condemnet; alioquin ipse procedet, salvis constitutionibus de maioribus causis ad sedem apostolicam referendis.

Chapter LX

Latin source headnote: If the judge from whom an appeal is taken from a grievance revokes it, he can proceed in the principal cause.

The same, in the same council.

Since, when a cause ceases, its effect ceases, we establish that, whether an ordinary or delegated judge has pronounced something by threatening or by interlocutory decision by whose execution one of the litigants would be aggrieved, and, using sound counsel, has desisted from the effect of an interlocutory decision or threat of this kind, he shall freely proceed in cognizance of the cause, notwithstanding that an appeal was taken from such a threat or interlocutory decision, provided that he is not lawfully suspect from another cause, lest the process of the business be retarded by frivolous occasions.

> Quum cessante causa cesset effectus, statuimus, ut, sive iudex ordinarius sive delegatus aliquid comminando vel interloquendo protulerit, quo exsecutioni mandato alter litigantium gravaretur, et sano usus consilio ab huiusmodi interlocutionis vel comminationis effectu destiterit, libere in causae cognitione procedat, non obstante, si a tali comminatione vel interlocutione fuerit appellatum, dummodo non sit ex alia causa legitima suspectus, ne processus negotii frivolis occasionibus retardetur.

Chapter LXI

Latin source headnote: One wishing to recuse a judge ought to propose the cause of suspicion before that judge and prove it before arbiters to be chosen in common. If it is not proved, the judge uses his jurisdiction in the principal matter; but if it is proved, he remits the business to the superior or commits the cause with the consent of the recusing party. (Moreover, etc.:) In notorious matters an appeal is not admitted. In doubtful matters a probable cause is to be expressed before the judge that ought to be reputed lawful; if the appellant does not prosecute it, the judge from whom the appeal was taken shall proceed in the cause. It is the same if he prosecutes and does not prove. This constitution, however, is not extended to regulars. This it says.

The same, in the same council.

Since it is provided by a special prohibition that no one shall presume to promulgate a sentence of excommunication against anyone unless competent admonition has preceded, wishing also to provide lest perhaps the person admonished be able under pretext of a frustrating recusation or appeal to avoid examination by the person admonishing, we establish that, if he alleges that he holds the judge suspect, he shall assign before the same judge the cause of just suspicion, and he with the adversary—or, if perhaps he has no adversary, with the judge—shall choose arbiters in common; or, if perhaps they cannot agree in common, without malice he shall choose one and the other another, who shall take cognizance of the cause of suspicion. And if they are unable to agree upon one sentence, they shall call a third, so that what two of them decree shall obtain the strength of firmness. And they should know that they are bound to execute this faithfully by the strict precept enjoined by us in virtue of obedience under attestation of divine judgment.

But if the lawful cause of suspicion is not proved before them within a competent term, the judge shall use his jurisdiction. But if it is lawfully proved, the person recused shall, with the assent of the recusing party, commit the business to a suitable person or transmit it to the superior, so that proceedings may be taken in that matter according to what is to be done. Moreover, when the person admonished flies to the obstacle of appeal, if his excess is manifest by the evidence of the matter, by his confession, or by another lawful mode, since the remedy of appeal was instituted not for the defense of iniquity but for the protection of innocence, no deference is to be given to a provocation of this kind.

But when the excess is doubtful, lest the appellant impede the judge's process by the refuge of a frivolous appeal, he shall set out before the same judge a probable cause of appeal—namely, such a cause as, if it were proved, ought to be reputed lawful. And then, if he has an adversary, within a term to be moderated by the same judge according to the distance of places, the quality of the time, and the nature of the business, he shall prosecute the cause of appeal. If he takes no care to prosecute it, from that time the judge himself shall proceed notwithstanding the appeal. But when no adversary appears, since the judge proceeds by his office, if the cause of appeal is proved before the superior, the superior shall execute the office of his jurisdiction. But if the appellant fails in its proof, he shall be remitted to the person from whom it is established that he appealed maliciously. But we will that these two foregoing constitutions not be extended to regulars contrary to their special observances.

> Volens iudicem recusare, debet coram eodem suspicionis causam proponere, et eam coram arbitris communiter eligendis probare, qua non probata sua iurisdictione iudex utitur in principali; ea vero probata, remittit negotium ad superiorem, vel causam committit de recusatoris consensu. - (Porro etc.:) In notoriis non admittitur appellatio. In dubiis causa probabilis coram iudice est exprimenda, quae debeat legitima reputari, quam si non prosequitur, iudex a quo in causa procedat. Idem si prosequitur, et non probat. Haec autem constitutio non extenditur ad regulares. H. d.
> Idem in eodem.
> Quum speciali sit prohibitione provisum, ne quis in aliquem excommunicationis sententiam nisi competenti commonitione praemissa promulgare praesumat, volentes etiam providere, ne forte commonitus frustratoriae recusationis vel appellationis obtentu monentis possit declinare examen, statuimus, ut, si allegaverit, se iudicem habere suspectum, coram eodem causam iustae suspicionis assignet, et ipse cum adversario, vel, si forte adversarium non habeat, cum iudice arbitros communiter eligat; aut, si forte communiter convenire non possint, absque malitia ipse unum, et ille alium eligat, qui de suspicionis causa cognoscant. Et si nequiverint in unam concordare sententiam, advocent tertium, ut quod duo ex ipsis decreverint robur obtineat firmitatis; sciantque se ad id fideliter exsequendum ex iniuncto a nobis in virtute obedientiae sub obtestatione divini iudicii districto praecepto teneri. Causa vero suspicionis legitima coram ipsis infra competentem terminum non probata, sua iurisdictione iudex utatur. At ipsa probata legitime, de recusatoris assensu personae idoneae committat negotium recusatus, vel ad superiorem transmittat, ut in eo ipso procedat secundum quod fuerit procedendum. Porro commonito ad appellationis obstaculum convolante, si eius excessus evidentia rei, vel ipsius confessione, aut alio modo legitimo fuerit manifestus, quum appellationis remedium non sit ad defensionem iniquitatis, sed ad praesidium innocentiae institutum, non est provocationi huiusmodi deferendum. Excessu quoque dubio exsistente, ne frivolae appellationis diffugio appellans iudicis processum impediat, coram eodem probabilem causam appellationis exponat, talem videlicet, quae, si foret probata, deberet legitima reputari, et tunc, si habuerit adversarium, infra terminum secundum locorum distantiam et temporis qualitatem et naturam negotii ab eodem iudice moderandum, appellationis causam prosequatur. Quam si prosequi non curaverit, extunc ipse iudex appellatione non obstante procedat. Nullo autem adversario comparente, quum iudex ex suo procedat officio, appellationis causa coram superiore probata, superior suae iurisdictionis officium exsequatur. Sed si appellans in eius probatione defecerit, ad eum, a quo ipsum malitiose appellasse constiterit, remittatur. Ceterum has duas constitutiones praemissas nolumus ad regulares extendi contra suas speciales observantias.

Chapter LXII

Latin source headnote: If a judge wishes to hold as joinder of issue an advocate's confession revoked on the same day, or ratifies a process made by a subdelegate of a subdelegate, a lawful appeal is taken.

Honorius III, to the Dean, Chancellor, and Cantor of Lincoln.

When, while the proctors of both parties were established at the Apostolic See, we committed to our beloved son R., cardinal deacon of Sant'Angelo, to be heard the cause being conducted concerning the Church of Holiseth between the beloved sons the abbot and brothers of the Valley of Saint John of Croston, of the Premonstratensian Order, on one side, and the prior and canons of Newstead in the Diocese of York on the other, P. and B., proctors of the aforesaid abbot and brothers, established in his presence, insistently petitioned that, approving the process of the Abbots of Rievaulx and Bellalanda and the Prior of Malton, to whom the cause itself had been delegated by Pope I. of good memory, our predecessor, we deign to terminate by sentence the cause itself, which had already lasted for so long. But W., proctor of the aforesaid prior and canons, proposed in opposition that issue had not been joined before the aforesaid judges, but they had proceeded wrongly and abruptly. For when, on the appointed day, the same man, appearing before the subdelegates of the delegated judges, petitioned for delays to propose dilatory exceptions, because his advocate, led by error, responded that the Church of Newstead had peacefully and quietly possessed that church concerning which the question was being conducted for forty years and more, although on the same day he corrected the advocate's error and, lest through it any prejudice be capable of being generated against him because dilatory exceptions are to be proposed before joinder of issue, revoked before the same judges the advocate's response, which appeared to contradict his petition. Nevertheless, the judges, believing through an erroneous response of this kind by the advocate that issue had been joined, proceeded not only rashly to the reception and examination of the witnesses of the other party, but also, adding grievance to grievance, when they had delegated the examination of certain witnesses to the Prior of Vellebeum and his fellow judge, who subdelegated their places to others contrary to canonical sanctions, they less providently approved the reception and examination of witnesses made by those persons in fact, although they were unable to do it by law. On account of these grievances an appeal was taken to the Apostolic See on behalf of the aforesaid prior and canons. Hence the same proctor insistently petitioned that we declare the process of the aforementioned judges invalid and empty. But because full faith concerning the foregoing could not be made to us, with the assent of the proctors of both parties, we command your discretion that, if the said prior and canons of Newstead, within three months after receipt of the present writing, lawfully prove before you that the advocate's response was revoked on the same day by their aforesaid proctor W., because thus by consequence issue was not joined, since the proctors of the other party also acknowledged that issue had been joined in no other way than through the response of the said advocate alleging prescription of time, or that the first delegates, namely the Abbot of Rievaulx and his colleagues, approved the witnesses received by the subdelegates of their subdelegates, as is proposed by the other party, although, according to canonical and lawful sanctions, no one except a person delegated by the prince has power to delegate a cause to another, then, provided that these things were expressed in the appeal itself, you shall declare invalid and empty whatever was done by them after their appeal.

Si iudex confessionem advocati eadem die revocatam pro litis contestatione velit habere, vel processum a subdelegato subdelegati factum ratificat, licita appellatur.

Honorius III. Decano, Cancellario et Cantori Linconiensibus.

Quum causam, quae inter dilectos filios abbatem et fratres de Valle sancti Ioannis de Croston Praemonstratensis ordinis ex parte una, et priorem et canonicos de Novo loco Eboracensis dioecesis ex altera super ecclesia de Holiseth vertitur, utriusque partis procuratoribus apud sedem apostolicam constitutis, dilecto filio nostro R. sancti Angeli diacono cardinali commiserimus audiendam, +P. et B. procuratores praedictorum abbatis et fratrum in ipsius praesentia constituti, petebant instanter, ut processum approbantes de Rievalle et Bellanledae abbatum et prioris de Malton, quibus ipsa causa a bonae memoriae I. Papa praedecessore nostro fuerat delegata, causam ipsam, quae tanto tempore iam duraverat, dignaremur sententialiter terminare. W. vero Procurator praedictorum prioris et canonicorum proposuit ex adverso quod coram praedictis iudicibus lis non fuerat contestata, sed perperam processerant ex abrupto. Nam quum die statuta idem coram subdelegatis iudicum delegatorum comparens inducias ad proponendum exceptiones dilatorias petiisset, quia advocatus ipsius ductus errore respondit, quod ecclesia de Novo loco ecclesiam ipsam, de qua erat quaestio, per quadraginta annos et amplius pacifice possederat et quiete, licet ipse eadem die advocati errorem corrigens, ipsius responsionem, quae suae petitioni contradicere videbatur, ne per eam aliquod sibi posset praeiudicium generare, pro eo, quod ante litis contestationem sunt exceptiones dilatoriae proponendae, coram eisdem iudicibus revocavit. Iudices tamen per huiusmodi responsionem erroneam advocati litem contestatam fore credentes, non solum ad receptionem et examinationem testium partis alterius temere processerunt, +sed etiam gravamini gravamen addentes, quum examinationem quorundam testium priori de Vellebeo et suo coniudici delegassent, qui vices suas subdelegarunt aliis contra canonicas sanctiones, receptionem et examinationem testium ab ipsis de facto, quum de iure nequiverint, factam minus provide approbarunt. Propter quae gravamina ex parte praefatorum prioris et canonicorum ad sedem fuit apostolicam appellatum. Unde idem procurator cum instantia postulabat, ut memoratum iudicum processum decerneremus irritum et inanem. Quia vero super praemissis nobis non potuit fieri plena fides, discretioni vestrae utriusque partis procuratorum assensu Mandamus, quatenus, si dicti prior et canonici de Novo loco infra tres menses post susceptionem praesentium

Chapter LXIII

Latin source headnote: It does not suffice for an appellant to show that he opposed a lawful and true exception and appealed unless he shows that he appealed because the exception was not admitted. This it says, and it is a noteworthy and everyday case.

The same, to the Dean and Treasurer and P., Canon of Saint Peter, of Zamora.

When our beloved son G., our chaplain, was granted by us as auditor to D., a priest, and I., proctor of the bishop, and G., proctor of the Chapter of Salamanca, the proctor of the chapter, for himself and the proctor of the bishop himself, proposed before him that, when the said priest impetrated from us executory letters concerning his reception in the Church of Salamanca to the Archdeacon of Ciudad and his colleagues, and the parties were established before them as executors, it was alleged on behalf of the bishop and chapter that, since in that church there was a certain number of canons confirmed by oath, of which no mention was made in the letters directed to them, they ought not to proceed against them through those letters; and, lest they do otherwise, an appeal was taken to our hearing, certain other lawful causes having been assigned. But those executors, having contemned an appeal of this kind, pronounced a sentence of excommunication against the bishop and chapter. Wherefore the aforesaid proctor petitioned that the sentence itself be declared invalid and that the said priest be restrained concerning this from the vexation of the same bishop and chapter. (And below:) Therefore, although through the confession of the priest himself made before the aforesaid auditor it was established that the Church of Salamanca had a certain number of canons confirmed by oath, and that an exception of this kind had been proposed before the aforesaid executors, and also that an appeal had been taken from them, nevertheless, because it was not established that an appeal had been taken on account of the nonadmission of an exception of this kind or another lawful cause, we command your discretion that, if it is established to you that the aforesaid exception concerning such a certain number of canons confirmed by oath, or other lawful exceptions, had been proposed before those executors and not admitted, and that for this reason the party of the bishop and chapter appealed, you shall declare the process of those executors invalid and empty.

Non sufficit appellanti docere, quod exceptionem legitimam et veram opposuit et appellavit, nisi doceat propter exceptionem admissam appellasse. H. d. et est casus not. et quotidianus.

Idem Decano et Thesaurario et P. S. Petri Canonico Zamorensibus.

Dilecto filio G. capellano nostro, D. presbytero et I. episcopi et G. capituli Salamantini procuratori a nobis auditore concesso, procurator capituli pro se et procuratore ipsius episcopi proposuit coram eo, quod, quum dictus presbyter super receptione sua in Salamantina ecclesia exsecutorias a nobis ad archidiaconum Civitatensem et collegas eius literas impetrasset, partibus coram eis exsecutoribus constitutis, fuit ex parte ipsorum episcopi et capituli allegatum, quod, quum in ipsa sit ecclesia certus numerus canonicorum iuramento firmatus, de quo in literis ad eos directis mentio non fiebat, per eas non debebant contra ipsos procedere, et, ne aliter facerent, fuit ad nostram audientiam, assignatis quibusdam aliis causis legitimis, appellatum. +Sed ipsi exsecutores, huiusmodi appellatione contempta, excommunicationis sententiam in episcopum et capitulum protulerunt. Quare petebat procurator praedictus, sententiam ipsam irritam nunciari, et dictum presbyterum super hoc ab eorundem episcopi et capituli vexatione compesci. (Et infra:) Quoniam igitur, etsi per confessionem ipsius presbyteri factam coram auditore praedicto constiterit, Salamantinam ecclesiam habere certum numerum canonicorum iuramento firmatum, et huiusmodi exceptionem coram exsecutoribus supra dictis fuisse propositam, et etiam, quod appellatum exstiterit ab eisdem, quia tamen non constitit, quod propter exceptionem huiusmodi non admissam aliamve legitimam causam fuerit appellatum, discretioni vestrae mandamus, quatenus, si vobis constiterit, praefatam exceptionem huiusmodi de certo canonicorum numero iuramento firmato, vel alias legitimas exceptiones fuisse propositas coram ipsis exsecutoribus, nec admissas; ac ideo partem episcopi et capituli appellasse, ipsorum exsecutorum processum denuncietis irritum et inanem.

Chapter LXIV

Latin source headnote: An appellant who fixes a term for the appeal, if he sends a proctor only for impetrating and contradicting, and the appeal was received by the judge or approved by the party, is condemned in expenses to the adversary lawfully prosecuting. This it says according to the common understanding, although the gloss thought otherwise.

The same, to the Archdeacon of Saint Andrew and Master Canon of Melten.

When Nicholas, a knight, and Brother E., a monk of the Monastery of Saint Mary of Drundanian, of the Cistercian Order in the Diocese of Whithorn, were established at the Apostolic See, we granted them as auditor our beloved son S., cardinal deacon of Saint Africanus. In his presence, since the said monk had been constituted proctor only for impetrating and contradicting, as was evidently established from the letters of the said abbot and convent, the same knight humbly supplicated that we ought to proceed against them as contumacious, and to command certain persons that, lawfully condemning them to repair his damages and expenses because, while he personally prosecuted the appeal sent forth, they sent a less suitable proctor to prosecute it, after he had first been restored as should be just, they should hear those things that the aforesaid knight should reasonably determine to propose against the aforesaid abbot and convent. But because full faith concerning the foregoing could not be made to us, with the assent of the knight and the aforesaid monks, we command your discretion that, if it is established to you that the said abbot and convent fixed a term for their appeal and did not send a sufficient proctor to prosecute it, while the aforementioned knight personally prosecuted it, you shall condemn them to restore to that knight the expenses incurred from the time of the appeal; and, after he has first been restored as shall be just, you shall hear the cause and terminate it with its due end, with appeal removed.

Appellans, qui terminum appellationi praefigit, si mittit procuratorem ad impetrandum et contradicendum tantum, et appellatio fuit recepta a iudice, vel approbata a parte, adversario legitime prosequenti condemnatur in expensis. H. d. secundum communem intellectum, licet glossa aliud senserit.

Idem sancti Andreae Archidiacono et Magistro Canonico de Melten.

Nicolao militi ac fratri E. monacho monasterii sanctae Mariae de Drundaniam Cisterciensis ordinis dioecesis Candidae casae apud sedem apostolicam constitutis dilectum filium nostrum S. sancti Africani diaconum cardinalem concessimus auditorem. In cuius praesentia quum dictus monachus non nisi ad impetrandum et contradicendum procurator fuerit institutus, sicut ex literis dictorum abbatis et conventus constitit evidenter, supplicavit humiliter idem miles, ut contra ipsos tanquam contumaces procedere deberemus, +ac dare aliquibus in mandatis, qui eosdem pro eo, quod ad prosequendam appellationem emissam procuratorem minus idoneum destinarunt, ipso eandem personaliter prosequente, in resarciendis sibi damnis et expensis legitime condemnantes, eo prius, sicut iustum fuerit, restituto, audiant super his quae contra praedictos abbatem et conventum praefatus miles rationabiliter duxerit proponenda. Quia vero super praemissis nobis non potuit fieri plena fides, de assensu militis et monachorum praedictorum discretioni vestrae Mandamus, quatenus, si vobis constiterit, dictos abbatem et conventum appellationi suae terminum praefixisse, quum ad prosequendam eandem sufficientem procuratorem non miserint, memorato milite ipsam personaliter prosequente, ipsos ad restituendas expensas a tempore appellationis factas eidem militi condemnetis, eodemque, sicut iustum fuerit, primitus restituto, audiatis causam, et appellatione remota fine debito terminetis.

Latin source headnote: It is not lawful for the same person to appeal a third time from the same sentence.

The same, to the Bishop of Mantin. and P., Canon of Tuscania.

R., tutor of the children of the late B., a citizen of Tuscania, showed us by his petition that, when a question concerning a certain sum of money and other things was being conducted before R., then judge of the county of Tuscania, not by apostolic delegation, between him on one side and F. for himself and Peter Campumallus, tutor of B., the late son of B., their fellow citizens, on the other, the same judge promulgated definitive sentence for that R., which was twice confirmed by judges delegated by the Apostolic See. Latin source headnote: An appeal interposed with the intermediate judge omitted does not devolve the cause when an exception is opposed. This it says according to the common understanding.

The same, to Master G., Archdeacon, and the Official of Limoges.

The beloved sons the prior and convent of Lac-Rouge showed us by their transmitted petition that, when a question concerning a certain wood and other things was being conducted before Master A., Canon of Clermont, not by apostolic delegation, between them on one side and F. of Hambaro, a knight of the Diocese of Clermont, on the other, the same knight, frustratingly sending forth the voice of appeal to our venerable brother the Archbishop of Bourges, obtained that the cause concerning these things be delegated to the Official of Bourges. Before him, it was proposed by way of exception on behalf of the said prior and convent that, since an appeal had been taken to the same archbishop with the diocesan bishop omitted, to whom appeal should have been made by degrees, he could not and ought not by law to proceed in the cause itself. But because the said official of the archbishop refused to admit an exception of this kind by them, they appealed to our hearing. But he, contemning their appeal, rendered sentences of suspension and interdict against them. Wherefore we command your discretion that, if you find that the said sentences were rendered against them after an appeal of this kind, you shall declare that they utterly do not hold.

Appellatio omisso medio iudice interposita causam non devolvit exceptione opposita. Hoc dicit secundum communem intellectum.

Latin source headnote: If one who has ceased to be a tutor is unwillingly convened in the name of the pupil, he will be able to appeal.

Gregory IX, to H., Master of the Scholars, and G. de Rupe, Canons of Saint-Audomarus in the Diocese of Thérouanne.

On behalf of M., Lady of Colb., a complaint was offered to us that, when a woman, the Lady of Bellebron., drew her into a cause before judges by our authority concerning certain lands in the name of her sons, she caused an exception to be made in the presence of those judges: that, since the things concerning which proceedings were being conducted in judgment, and the aforesaid sons, remained in no way under her power and tutelage, since she had already passed to second vows, she was not bound to respond concerning these things in their name, whose tutor she had ceased to be. But because the said judges, neglecting this exception, nonetheless compelled her to this, she, perceiving herself aggrieved, appealed to our hearing. And therefore we command that, if it is so, after revoking as invalid whatever you find was attempted after an appeal of this kind, you shall hear the things proposed on this side and that, etc.

Latin source headnote: If a judge doubting concerning the law wishes to consult a superior, he ought to give the parties a copy of the consultation; otherwise faith is not given to his words of consultation.

The same, to the Master and Brothers of the House of Moriensis.

You intimated—(And below:) Moreover, the Hospitallers being ignorant and no copy of the process of inquiry having been made for them, they are known to have transmitted a reference to us, although according to lawful sanctions, whenever any judge promises that he will make a reference, he is bound immediately to give the litigants a copy of the consultation among the acts.

Chapter LXIX

Latin source headnote: If, before joinder of issue, a judge alters something concerning the principal business or anticipates without cause the day assigned, a lawful appeal is taken. And if a proctor appointed to impetrate concerning the appeal did not observe the form of the mandate, the appellant is heard even after a year.

The same, to the Archbishop, Archdeacon, and G., Canon of Tours.

You should know that we received, through the signification of the Bishop of Orléans, that, when the dean and Chapter of Meung convened him before judges by apostolic authority concerning the fact that, as they said, butchers ought not to sell meat anywhere other than in the stalls of the aforesaid dean and chapter, and at length the named dean and chapter, petitioning by imploring the office of the judges that, since the same bishop after citation caused meat to be sold in other stalls, they should recall to its former state what had been done by him concerning this, it was proposed on his behalf that, since issue especially had not been joined concerning the business, an imploration of this kind had no place. He added that, since by consent of the parties a certain day had been established before the said judges for litigating concerning the business itself, and the session of those judges had been adjourned until that day, they ought not without the parties' consent to anticipate that day and hear the adverse party in such an imploration. And because they did not hear him concerning these things, he appealed to our hearing.

And although within a year he sent his proctor to prosecute an appeal of this kind, nevertheless, because the said proctor, circumvented, as is believed, contrary to the prohibition of the bishop himself impetrated our letters concerning this to certain judges suspect for a certain reason, the said bishop was unwilling to use the letters thus obtained, petitioning to be admitted to prosecution of the appeal notwithstanding the lapse of the year. And therefore we command that, if the prohibition of this kind and the foregoing causes of appeal, or one of them, are established, after revoking as invalid, etc., up to: what was attempted in the already-said business according to the contents of the former letters, etc.

Et quia super his non audiebant eundem, nostram audientiam appellavit. Et licet procuratorem suum infra annum ad huiusmodi appellationem miserit prosequendam, quia tamen dictus procurator, ut creditur, circumventus contra inhibitionem ipsius episcopi nostras super hoc ad quosdam iudices certa ratione suspectos literas impetravit, dictus episcopus uti noluit literis sic obtentis, petens non obstante lapsu anni ad prosecutionem appellationis admitti. Chapter LXX

Latin source headnote: A famous and very much allegeable chapter, and this it says: to justify an appeal interposed from a cause, it is necessary to prove the truth of the cause before the judge to whom the appeal is taken, unless it was offered and rejected before the judge from whom the appeal was taken. This it says uniquely up to § To the Same. § 1. If an appeal was not received by the judge or approved by the party, it suffices for the appellant to send a proctor for impetrating and contradicting, although the party appealed against is prepared to prosecute in the Curia. This it says up to § Finally, He. The Sicilian Abbot. § 2. Before prosecution of an appeal has begun, the appellant can, if he wishes, petition, even against the will of the appellee, that he be remitted to the judge from whom the appeal was taken; but he will be condemned in the expenses incurred by the adverse party in that appeal. This it says up to § Indeed. The Sicilian Abbot. § 3. The article of an appeal interposed from a grievance is discussed by the judge to whom the appeal is taken, when the party is absent through contumacy, even when issue has not been joined in the appeal or principal cause. This it says. The Sicilian Abbot.

The same.

When an appeal has been interposed from a probable cause, it does not suffice for the appellant to prove that he provoked from a cause of this kind unless he shows that it is true, unless, when offering to prove this, he was not admitted.

§ 1. It is also permitted to him, if his appeal is not received by the judge nor approved by the adversary, to impetrate letters concerning prosecution of the appeal through a proctor constituted for impetrating and contradicting, although the other party, through himself or a suitable proctor, is prepared to receive judgment concerning this at the Apostolic See.

§ 2. Finally, one who sent forth the voice of appeal, cognizance of which has not yet been delegated to another at his petition, is by law remitted to the person from whom he provoked, notwithstanding the contradiction of the other party; nevertheless he is to be condemned to the adversary in the lawful expenses that it is established the adversary incurred on this account.

§ 3. Indeed, when someone is prepared to prove the grievance on account of which he determined that an appeal was to be made, and the adverse party contumaciously absents himself, proceedings can be taken concerning this without joinder of issue, although joinder of issue has not yet been made in the article of appeal itself or the principal business, because, since in this case the injustice of the first judge is principally accused, the rigor of law from which perplexity of the cause could follow is not to be required.

> Capitulum famosum et multum allegabile, et h. d.: Ad iustificandam appellationem ex causa interpositam probare oportet causae veritatem coram iudice ad quem, nisi fuerit coram iudice a quo oblata et reiecta. H. d. singulariter usque ad §. Eidem. - §. 1. Si appellatio non fuit recepta a iudice vel approbata a parte, sufficit appellanti mittere procuratorem ad impetrandum et contradicendum, licet pars appellata sit parata in curia prosequi. H. d. usque ad §. Ille denique. Abbas Siculus. - §. 2. Ante inchoatam prosecutionem appellationis appellans potest, si vult, invito appellato petere, ut remittatur ad iudicem a quo; sed condemnabitur in expensis factis per partem adversam in illa appellatione. H. d. usque ad §. Sane. Abbas Siculus. - §. 3. Articulus appellationis interpositae a gravamine discutitur per iudicem ad quem, parte absente per contumaciam, etiam lite non contestata in appellatione vel principali causa. Hoc dicit, Abbas Siculus.

Idem.

Interposita appellatione ex causa probabili non sufficit appellanti probare, quod ex causa huiusmodi provocavit, si eam non doceat esse veram, nisi hoc se offerens probaturum non fuisset admissus. §. 1. Eidem quoque permittitur, si non recipiatur appellatio eius a iudice, nec ab adversario approbetur, super prosecutione appellationis per procuratorem ad impetrandum et contradicendum constitutum literas impetrare, licet pars altera per se vel per procuratorem idoneum iudicium super hoc apud sedem apostolicam recipere sit parata. §. 2. Ille denique, qui vocem appellationis emisit, cuius nondum est alii cognitio delegata ad petitionem eiusdem, ad eum, a quo provocavit, de iure remittitur, contradictione partis alterius non obstante; est tamen in legitimis expensis adversario, quas eum propter hoc fecisse constiterit, condemnandus. §. 3. Sane parato aliquo probare gravamen, propter quod duxerat appellandum, et parte adversa se contumaciter absentante, potest super hoc lite non contestata procedi, licet nondum litis contestatio facta fuerit in ipso appellationis articulo vel negotio principali, quia, quum in hoc casu iniquitas prioris iudicis principaliter arguatur, non est rigor iuris, ex quo sequi posset causae perplexitas, requirendus.

Chapter LXXI

Latin source headnote: The clause "with appeal removed," placed in the middle of letters, looks to the foregoing matters to which it is annexed, not the following, unless it is repeated at the end of the letters. And this applies if the businesses are separate.

The same.

We respond to your inquiry in this way: whenever a clause through which the remedy of appeal is removed is placed in the middle of letters, if there are several businesses in no way touching one another, it embraces only the foregoing, unless perhaps the aforesaid clause is repeated at the end of the letters.

Clausula: «appellatione remota» in medio literarum posita respicit praemissa, quibus annectitur, non sequentia, nisi repetatur in fine literarum. Et hoc si negotia sunt separata.

Idem.

Inquisitioni tuae taliter respondemus, quod, quotiens clausula, per quam tollitur appellationis remedium, in medio literarum ponitur, si sunt plura negotia se minime contingentia, praemissa tantum complectitur, nisi forte in fine literarum praedicta clausula iteretur.

Chapter LXXII

Latin source headnote: It is brief, but in other words it is summarized thus: the appeal of one profits another if they are helped by a common right, the business is the same, the cause of defense is the same, and they were condemned by the same sentence; otherwise it is different.

The same.

When several persons have been condemned by one sentence, if one alone flies to the benefit of appeal, his victory by common law supports the others, if they are helped by a common right and the business is the same and the cause of defense is the same.

Breve est, sed per alia verba sic summatur: Appellatio unius prodest alteri, si communi iure iuventur, et idem sit negotium, et eadem defensionis causa, et sint eadem sententia condemnati; alias secus.

Idem.

Latin source headnote: Just fear excuses to such a degree that one who does not appeal is held as an appellant if he has protested and determined that the causes of appeal were to be expressed.

The same.

If just fear excuses you from appealing, you are reputed to have flown to the benefit of appeal, provided that, within the time in which a provocation is lawfully made, after a protestation concerning this has been proposed before the judge from whom you had wished to appeal—or, if you were unable to have access to him, in the presence of good men—you determined that the causes of appeal were to be expressed.

Title XXX: On Useful or Useless Confirmation

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: An inferior judge cannot take cognizance of a matter knowingly confirmed by the Pope unless the confirmation did not hold, as because it was surreptitious or concerned a litigious matter. This it says together with the following chapter.

Alexander III, to the Bishop of Exeter.

If anyone has impetrated from the Apostolic See confirmation of a litigious matter, the judge can no less take cognizance of the cause and terminate it with its due end. But if he peacefully possessed the thing at the time when he obtained confirmation concerning it, it is not safe or lawful for a judge to decide or define a question that afterward arose without a mandate of the Apostolic See.

De confirmatione utili vel inutili.

De re scienter confirmata per Papam inferior iudex cognoscere non potest, nisi confirmatio non tenuerit, ut quia subreptitia, vel de re litigiosa. H. d. cum cap. sequenti.

Alexander III. Exonensi Episcopo.

Si quis rei litigiosae confirmationem impetravit ab apostolica sede, non minus potest iudex de causa cognoscere, et eam fine debito terminare. Sed si rem tunc pacifice possidebat, quum inde confirmationem obtinuit, non est tutum aut licitum iudici, de quaestione postea exorta decernere, aut eam diffinire absque sedis apostolicae mandato.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: It says the same thing.

The same, to the Bishop of Worcester.

But concerning confirmations of the Roman Pontiffs, we will you to hold that judgment is in no way to be made contrary to them unless a new mandate of the Apostolic See proceeds or it is certain that the confirmations themselves were elicited through suggestion of falsehood.

Idem dicit.

Idem Vigoriensi Episcopo.

De confirmationibus autem Romanorum Pontificum volumus te tenere, quod contra illas, nisi novum apostolicae sedis procedat mandatum, aut certum sit, quod ipsae confirmationes sint per falsi suggestionem elicitae, non est aliquatenus iudicandum.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: Letters of confirmation concerning a sentence from which an appeal had been taken are not valid if the appellee maliciously anticipated the appellant; otherwise they remain pending until cognizance is taken of the appeal.

Celestine III.

A. of good memory, formerly your canon, who closed his last day at the Apostolic See, took care to consult us concerning certain things that we have determined necessarily to intimate to you according to the tenor of our response. He however proposed that a sentence through false instruments had been pronounced by delegated judges, which indeed were believed to be genuine, and within ten days the person against whom sentence had been given, noticing the falsity of the instruments, appealed from that sentence; nevertheless, the judges no less commanded that the sentence be put into execution. But the appellant, immediately entering upon the journey to the Apostolic See, impetrated letters concerning retracting the sentence; his adversary, however, cunningly anticipating him, had obtained a rescript confirming the promulgated sentence, in which nevertheless no mention was made of the appeal that had been made. And therefore you asked which letters should generate prejudice against which. We respond, therefore, that the later ought to generate prejudice against the former.

Indeed, from this first consultation there arose a second question exhibited in our auditorium, which stands thus: if in the same letters—namely, the later—this clause were placed, "notwithstanding any letters of confirmation of the rendered sentence, let the cause be heard and terminated with its due end," whether the former letters ought thus to be revoked. To this we say that through the last the first would be utterly revoked. But if it were said, as is more frequently accustomed to be placed in apostolic letters, "no letters prejudicing truth and justice," or under another form of words, provided that nothing were said expressly concerning the letters of confirmation, we say that the first ought to have their force until fuller cognizance is had of the iniquitous or false sentence. Third, etc. (Cf. c. 5, On Proofs, II. 19.)

Ceterum appellans, itinere statim ad apostolicam sedem arrepto, literas de retractando sententiam impetravit; adversarius autem ipsum caute praeveniens, confirmationis promulgatae sententiae rescriptum fuerat assecutus, in quo tamen nulla de facta appellatione mentio habebatur. Ideoque requisisti, quae quibus literis praeiudicium faciant. Respondemus igitur, quod posteriores debent prioribus praeiudicium generare. *Ab hac siquidem prima consultatione quaestio suborta exhibita est in auditorio nostro secunda, quae ita se habet: Si. in eisdem, videlicet posterioribus, literis haec clausula poneretur, non obstantibus aliquibus literis confirmationis latae sententiae audiatur causa et fine debito terminetur, utrum sic primae revocari deberent. Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: Renewal of a privilege does not grant a new right, nor does it confirm an old one; but it preserves whatever right belonged. More briefly it can be summarized thus: renewal of a privilege does not induce confirmation of the right contained in it.

Innocent III, to the Dean of Paderborn.

When the beloved daughter in Christ the abbess and sisters of the Church of Gardeven. wished their privileges to be renewed because of the dangers of the roads, we determined that it should be enjoined upon four bishops and as many abbots that they should inspect them diligently and, faithfully transcribing their tenor, remit them to us under their seals, and they, obeying the apostolic mandate, subtly inspected the privileges of Agapitus and John of happy memory, our predecessors, presented to them, and faithfully transmitted their tenor to us under their seals. Our venerable brother G., Archbishop of Reims, also, then Bishop of Palestrina, discharging the office of legation in those regions, caused the tenor of those privileges to be presented to our sight under his own seal. But we, giving due faith both to the legate, who caused them to be presented to our sight under his own seal, and to the investigators themselves, although we did not see why the same privileges ought not to be renewed, nevertheless, because C., canon of the greater church, and I., canon of Holy Cross, [of Hildesheim, established in our presence,] proposed that the Church of Hildesheim had been in possession of the subjection of that monastery for one hundred years and more, we determined that the privileges themselves were not then to be renewed.

Hence we commanded judges that, approaching together a suitable place and citing those who were to be summoned, they should inquire more diligently into the truth concerning these things, and, proceeding up to definitive sentence, should faithfully send to the Apostolic See all the acts written under testimony of their letters, fixing for the parties a competent term at which they should present themselves to our sight to receive sentence. But they, wishing to execute the apostolic mandate, cited the parties to their presence, from whom the party of the Church of Hildesheim appealed to the Apostolic See, on account of which those judges were unable to proceed in the cause. But recently, when the parties were established in our presence, the aforesaid abbess again petitioned that we ought to renew the privileges of her church, especially since in the presence of the delegated judges the party of the Church of Hildesheim took no care to show or prove anything that derogated in any respect from the monastery or its privileges. But in opposition it was solicitously petitioned that we deign to commit the cause itself to discreet men who should receive the witnesses whom that party proposed to introduce against the privileges of the monastery and to prove lawful prescription.

We therefore, more diligently considering that it was established by civil law with provident deliberation that, when danger concerning witnesses is feared, lest the truth be concealed and opportunity for proving be removed by fortuitous events, even without joinder of issue infirm witnesses and others concerning whom fear exists from some reasonable cause shall be admitted to testimony, being moved by the likeness of the same equity, determined that the aforesaid privileges should be renewed as though already consumed by excessive age, since they had been written not on parchment but on papyrus. We will that no new right be acquired by the monastery from a renewal of this kind, but that its ancient right, if it has any, be preserved through renewal of the privilege.

But because the aforesaid monastery is shown through a privilege of our predecessor to belong to the right and property of the Apostolic See, lest the right of the Roman Church remain undefended, we determined that the same abbess should be constituted its proctor, so that, since prescription does not run against the possessions and rights of the Roman Church unless it is of one hundred years, she shall in our place procure concerning this and other things those things that are to be procured before you in judgment. Therefore, unwilling that the status of the same monastery be doubted longer, through which the cause itself would remain further undecided, through apostolic writings we command your discretion that, choosing a safe and suitable place, within the space of six months after receipt of the present letters, you shall receive the witnesses whom the Church of Hildesheim should determine to produce to prove prescription, or the Convent of Gandersheim to show interruption. And if the former proves lawful prescription, as it intends, unless interruption has been proved in opposition, you shall adjudge the subjection of the monastery itself to the aforementioned bishop, annulling the privilege that we caused to be renewed for that monastery; otherwise, imposing perpetual silence upon him concerning this, you shall pronounce that the monastery enjoys perpetual liberty, after our privilege has been returned to it. [But the witnesses, etc. Given at Ferentino, on the fifteenth day before the Kalends of July, in the ninth year, 1206.]

Innovatio privilegii novum ius non tribuit, nec antiquum confirmat; sed, si quod competebat, conservat. Brevius sic potest summari: Innovatio privilegii non inducit confirmationem iuris in eo contenti.

Innocentius III. Decano Padeburensi.

Quum dilecta in Christo filia abbatissa et sorores ecclesiae de Gardeven. sua cuperent privilegia innovari propter, viarum discrimina quatuor episcopis, et abbatibus totidem, ut ea inspicerent diligenter, et tenorem ipsorum fideliter transcribentes sub sigillis suis nobis remitterent, duximus iniungendum, +qui apostolico mandato parentes, privilegia felicis recordationis Agapiti et Ioannis praedecessorum nostrorum sibi praesentata subtiliter conspexerunt, tenorem eorum sub sigillis suis nobis fideliter transmittentes. Venerabilis quoque frater noster G. Remensis archiepiscopus, tunc episcopus Praenestinus, in partibus illis officium legationis exercens, tenorem privilegiorum ipsorum sub sigillo proprio nostro fecit conspectui praesentari. Nos autem tam legato, qui sub sigillo proprio ea nostro fecit conspectui praesentari, quam inquisitoribus ipsis fidem debitam adhibentes, licet non videremus, quare non deberent eadem privilegia innovari, quia tamen C. maioris ecclesiae, et I. sanctae Crucis canonici [Hildesemenses in nostra praesentia constituti] proposuerunt, Hildesemensem ecclesiam in possessione subiectionis ipsius monasterii per centum annos et amplius exstitisse, privilegia ipsa tunc non duximus innovanda. Unde iudicibus dedimus in mandatis, ut ad locum idoneum pariter accedentes, citatis qui fuerint evocandi, inquirerent super his diligentius veritatem, et usque ad diffinitivam sententiam procedentes gesta omnia sub suarum testimonio literarum conscripta fideliter ad sedem apostolicam destinarent, praefigentes partibus terminum competentem, quo nostro se conspectui praesentarent, sententiam recepturae. Ipsi vero mandatum apostolicum exsequi cupientes partes ad suam praesentiam citaverunt, a quibus pars Hildesemensis ecclesiae ad apostolicam sedem appellavit, propter quod iudices ipsi in causa procedere nequiverunt. Nuper autem, partibus in nostra praesentia constitutis, iterato praedicta petiit abbatissa, quatenus deberemus privilegia suae ecclesiae renovare, praesertim quum in praesentia delegatorum iudicum pars Hildesemensis ecclesiae nihil ostendere studuerit vel probare, quod monasterio vel privilegiis eiusdem in aliquo derogaret. Ex adverso vero fuit sollicite postulatum, ut causam ipsam discretis viris committere dignaremur, qui testes reciperent, quos contra privilegia monasterii, et ad probandum praescriptionem legitimam inducere proponebat. Nos igitur diligentius attendentes, quod iure sit civili provida deliberatione statutum, ut, quando periculum testium formidatur, ne veritas occultetur, et probandi copia fortuitis casibus subtrahatur, etiam lite non contestata testes valetudinarii et alii, de quibus ex aliqua rationabili causa timetur, ad testimonium admittantur, eiusdem aequitatis similitudine provocati, praedicta privilegia, quasi iam nimia vetustate consumpta, quum fuerint non in pergameno, sed in papyro conscripta, duximus innovanda, nolentes, quod ex innovatione huiusmodi novum ius monasterio acquiratur, sed ut antiquum ius, si quod habet, per innovationem privilegii conservetur. Quia vero praefatum monasterium ad ius et proprietatem apostolicae sedis per privilegium praedecessoris nostri pertinere monstratur, ne ius ecclesiae Romanae remaneat indefensum, eandem abbatissam procuratricem ipsius duximus statuendam, ut, quum adversus Romanae ecclesiae possessiones et iura non nisi centenaria currat praescriptio, ipsa super hoc et aliis vice nostra procuret quae coram te in

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: A confirmation that a religious impetrated from the Pope concerning a temporal administration or priory is not valid if he concealed that he was a regular. But if he expressed it, the rescript is presumed false, because the Pope is not accustomed to grant it. This it says together with the following chapter.

The same, to the Bishop and Provost of Utica.

It reached our hearing through the signification of the beloved son the provost of the Church of Neman. that certain canons of the Church of Neman., defamed concerning dilapidation or other crimes, labor to obtain from us letters of confirmation concerning their administrations, the condition of their religion and profession having been suppressed. Since, therefore, the Apostolic See is not accustomed personally to confirm anything to regular persons, through apostolic writings we command your discretion that you, supported by our authority, declare invalid and empty the confirmations that you know were thus impetrated by those canons, since they are regulars. [But if not both, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the seventeenth day before the Kalends of July, 1209.]

Non valet confirmatio, quam religiosus impetravit a Papa super temporali administratione seu prioratu, si tacuit se regularem. Si vero expressit, rescriptum praesumitur falsum, quia Papa non consuevit concedere. H. d. cum sequent.

Idem Episcopo et praeposito Uticensibus.

Ad nostram audientiam dilecto filio praeposito Nemanensis ecclesiae significante pervenit, quod quidam canonici Nemanensis ecclesiae, super dilapidatione vel aliis criminibus infamati, a nobis literas confirmationis super administrationibus suis obtinere laborant, religionis ac professionis suae conditione suppressa. Quum igitur regularibus personis non consueverit apostolica sedes aliqua personaliter confirmare, discretioni vestrae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus confirmationes, quas ab ipsis canonicis, quum regulares exsistant, noveritis taliter impetratas, auctoritate nostra suffulti denuncietis irritas et inanes. [Quodsi non ambo etc. Dat. Lateran. XVII. Kal. Iul. 1209.]

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: It says the same thing as the immediately preceding chapter above.

The same.

The petition extended to us on your behalf contained that several of the religious who preside over priories or other administrations assert that they have impetrated from us letters of confirmation concerning possession of those priories for as long as they live, on occasion of which they alienate and consume the goods of their priories, asserting that they are subject to you in no respect as regards those priories. Since, therefore, we do not believe that letters of this kind emanated from our chancery, through apostolic writings we command your discretion that you punish as authors of falsity those who exhibit such letters in which priories or administrations are confirmed to them as religious; but if no mention of their religious status is made in them, you shall declare that they are not valid as having been surreptitiously obtained through concealment of the truth. Quum igitur a cancellaria nostra huiusmodi literas emanasse non credamus, discretioni tuae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus illos, qui tales literas exhibuerint, in quibus prioratus vel administrationes tanquam religiosis confirmantur, eosdem punias tanquam falsitatis auctores; si vero in eis non fit mentio religionis ipsorum, illas tanquam tacita veritate subreptas denuncies non valere. Latin source headnote: A sentence or award rendered by arbiters contrary to the form of law or of the compromise does not hold, although it was confirmed by the Pope in common form.

The same, to the noble man Matthew de Rivariis.

After examining the cause being conducted between you and the knights of Campania concerning the Church of Saint Angelo of Casaperota, after hearing the confessions and understanding the attestations, and also inspecting the instruments and investigating the allegations, we perceived evidently that the arbitral award that the Vicedominus of Sabina was said to have promulgated concerning the same business had been dictated contrary to the form of law and of the compromise. Hence, notwithstanding the confirmation of Pope C. of happy memory, our predecessor, who had confirmed it as it had been providently rendered and received by both parties, we declare it invalid and empty. But the action, etc. (Cf. c. 15, On Judgments, II. 1.) [Given at the Lateran, on the ninth day before the Kalends of April, in the tenth year, 1207.]

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: In a confirmation from certain knowledge, the word "as" is placed causatively; nor does it harm if the word of confirmation precedes the tenor of what was confirmed.

Honorius III, to the illustrious King, the Barons and Knights, and the other men of Cyprus.

Our venerable brother the Archbishop of Nicosia and his suffragans showed us by their transmitted petition that an amicable settlement intervened, through the mediation of our venerable brother the Bishop of Albano, then legate of the Apostolic See, between them on one side and you on the other concerning certain tithes, possessions, and other things, with this expressly added: that as soon as it should happen to be confirmed by apostolic authority, it ought immediately to be put into execution. But although the settlement itself was confirmed by us, and, for greater evidence of the matter, the tenor of the settlement was inserted in the letters of confirmation, you nevertheless refused to observe the settlement itself, advancing a frivolous occasion both from the fact that in our letters the word of confirmation precedes the tenor of the settlement according to the style of the Roman Church, and because that customary clause—namely, "as it was providently made without depravity"—is contained in the same letters. Since, therefore, you ought to insist upon no cavilling refuges of this kind, not merely against God and churches, but not even against private persons, we command that, if truth supports the foregoing, you shall take care to fulfill the same settlement, observing it.

Verum licet ipsa sit per nos compositio confirmata, et ad maiorem rei evidentiam literis confirmationis tenor compositionis insertus, compositionem ipsam tamen renuistis observare, occasionem frivolam praetendentes tum ex eo, quod in literis nostris verbum confirmationis tenorem compositionis iuxta stylum ecclesiae Romanae praecedit, tum quia illa clausula consueta, scilicet: «sicut sine pravitate provide facta est,» in eisdem literis continetur. Quum igitur nedum contra Deum et ecclesias, sed nec etiam contra privatas personas huiusmodi cavillosis diffugiis insistere debeatis, Mandamus, quatenus, si praemissis veritas suffragatur, compositionem observantes eandem, ipsam adimplere curetis.

Latin source headnote: A collation of a church made to another by a legate and confirmed by the Pope does not injure the right of the diocesan.

The same, to all Abbots and Prelates and Convents and Clerics established in the Diocese of Constantinople.

Our venerable brother the Patriarch of Constantinople showed us by his complaint that, when certain of you, taking occasion from the fact that our beloved son I., cardinal priest of the title of Santa Prassede, then legate of the Apostolic See, conferred their monasteries in spiritual and temporal things upon certain other churches and clerics, they refuse to obey the patriarch himself and to answer to him concerning patriarchal rights, introducing in aid of their presumption confirmations of such collations impetrated from the Apostolic See. Since, therefore, we will that the rights that are owed to diocesans not be diminished or in any way injured through the aforesaid collations or confirmations, we command your whole body that, notwithstanding an occasion of this kind, you take care humbly to exhibit due reverence and obedience to the patriarch himself and to answer to him fully concerning his just rights, also in spiritual things, unless perhaps some persons show themselves to be fortified by an express privilege of exemption; otherwise, we will that the sentence that the same patriarch shall reasonably render against rebels on this account be firmly observed until worthy satisfaction.

Title I: On the Life and Honorable Conduct of Clerics

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: When celebration is taking place, the clergy ought to be separated from the people.

From the Council of Mainz.

Let laypersons not presume to stand or sit among the clerics beside the altar when the sacred mysteries are celebrated, whether at vigils or at Masses altogether; but let that part which is divided from the altar by the screens be open only to the clerics singing psalms. But for praying and communicating, let the holy of holies be open to laymen and women, as is the custom.

Ad orandum vero et communicandum laicis et feminis, sicut mos est, pateant sancta sanctorum.

Chapter II

From the Council of Poitiers.

Let clerics bearing arms and usurers be excommunicated.

> Ex concilio Pictaviensi.
>
> Clerici arma portantes et usurarii excommunicentur.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: A priest having a people ought to have a cleric who sings with him and assists him in the other things expressed here.

From the Council of Mâcon.

Let every priest who rules a people have a cleric who sings with him, reads the epistle and lesson, and is able to maintain schools and admonish his parishioners to send their sons to the church to learn the faith, whom he himself shall instruct with all chastity.

> Presbyter habens populum debet habere clericum, qui secum cantet et in aliis hic expressis eum iuvet.

Chapter V

From the Council of Carthage.

Let a cleric grow neither his hair nor his beard.

> Ex concilio Carthaginensi.

> Clericus neque comam nutriat, neque barbam.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: A cleric who has not made profession and is not in sacred orders can take a wife; but he shall be tonsured again if he wishes to enjoy clerical privilege or, by dispensation, to retain a benefice. This it says according to the manner that is more consonant with the letter, according to which it posits only one case.

From the Council of Tribur.

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: One who frequents monasteries of nuns and, after being admonished, does not desist, is deposed if he is a cleric; if a layman, he is excommunicated.

The same, in the Lateran Council.

If, moreover, any cleric presumes to frequent monasteries of nuns without a manifest and reasonable cause, let him be restrained by the bishop; and if he does not desist, let him be rendered exempt from ecclesiastical office. If laymen do so, let them be subjected to excommunication and made altogether alien from the assembly of the faithful.

>
> Idem in concilio Lateranensi.
>
> Monasteria praeterea sanctimonialium si quisquam clericus sine manifesta et rationabili causa frequentare praesumpserit, per episcopum arceatur, et, si non destiterit, ab officio ecclesiastico reddatur immunis; si laici, excommunicationi subdantur, et a coetu fidelium fiant penitus alieni.

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: A bishop can establish in a church a certain number of clerics according to its means who live in common, and compel contradictors to this; and he can absolve those living in common from excommunication incurred on account of laying hands upon a companion.

Gregory VII.

Because, as Scripture says, the senses of man are inclined to evil from his youth, just as through sensuality the flesh inclines toward fault, so, with vigor of spirit preceding and divine grace following, the mind ought to strive toward pardon and always to seek remedies by which it may avoid rushing occasions of death. Hence indeed it is that, understanding that many things have occurred in your churches from one's own defect and many from another's malice, which either have offense in themselves or occasion for offending, we decree, through the authority of the Apostolic See, which by the Lord's disposition we serve, as it is given by him, that opposition is to be made, and that the authority of the episcopal office in you is to be fortified by apostolic writings for cutting away harmful things among your subjects and inserting useful ones, [we have determined,] recollecting that in the old law the Lord commanded, saying: "The fire shall always burn upon the altar, which the priest shall nourish, placing wood beneath it morning by morning each day."

We establish, therefore, that, after the means and revenues and also expenses of your churches have been diligently inspected, you may establish in them a certain number of clerics and decree that their goods shall come into common, and that they shall eat in one house and sleep and rest under one roof. But if there are any contradictors, let it be lawful for you to compel them to this observance, notwithstanding appeal, through suspension from office and benefice, or even by a graver penalty if there is need. We also grant that, if anyone among those who live together has merited to be made alien from communion for laying a hand upon a companion, you shall have full power to reconcile him and impose penance, unless perhaps the atrocity of the act awaits a graver penalty. We will that this also be observed concerning women and those who, on account of old age or infirmity, cannot approach our presence, bringing no prejudice to an ecclesiastical constitution or our successors whereby they may have power to order concerning these things what they shall see more rightly.

> Episcopus potest statuere in ecclesia certum numerum clericorum secundum ipsius facultates qui vivant in communi, et contradictores ad hoc compellere; et istos in communi viventes potest absolvere ab excommunicatione incursa propter iniectionem manuum in socium.

Inde siquidem est, quod intelligentes multa ex defectu proprio, multa ex aliena malitia in vestris ecclesiis pervenisse, quae aut delictum in se, aut occasionem habeant delinquendi, per auctoritatem apostolicae sedis, cui ex dispositione Domini deservimus, prout datur ab eo, decernimus, obviandum, et auctoritatem in vobis episcopalis officii ad resecanda nociva in subditis vestris et inserenda utilia scriptis apostolicis muniendam* [duximus], recolentes quod in veteri lege praecepit Dominus, dicens: "ignis in altari semper ardebit, quem nutriet sacerdos, subiiciens mane ligna per singulos dies. Statuimus ergo, ut, facultatibus ecclesiarum vestrarum atque proventibus et expensis etiam diligenter inspectis, certum in eis valeatis ponere numerum clericorum, et statuere, ut bona eorum veniant in commune, et in una domo vescantur, atque sub uno tecto dormiant et quiescant. Si qui vero contradictores exstiterint, licitum vobis sit per suspensionem officii et beneficii, aut graviori etiam poena, si opus fuerit, ad hanc observantiam eos appellatione compellere non obstante. Indulgemus etiam, ut, si quisquam eorum, qui simul vivunt, pro manus iniectione in socium a communione meruerit fieri alienus, reconciliandi eum et poenitentiam imponendi potestatem plenariam habeatis, nisi forte atrocitas facti poenam graviorem exspectet. Quod etiam de mulieribus et his qui pro senectute vel infirmitate praesentiam nostram adire non possunt volumus observari, nullum praeiudicium constitutioni ecclesiasticae aut successoribus nostris afferentes, quo minus super his qui rectius viderint valeant ordinare.

Latin source headnote: Ecclesiastical and delegated judges ought to judge without payment, nor can they exact a tenth or another quota of the suit, even if custom has this.

Innocent III.

Since the Apostle commands abstinence from every appearance of evil, we who, although unworthy, have been established by God over peoples and kingdoms so that, according to the prophetic word, we may root out and destroy, build and plant, ought to strive with the greatest effort that we root out vices and plant virtues, destroy iniquitous things and build honorable ones, and thus, by the mediation of our solicitude, crooked things may pass into straight and rough things be converted into level. Although the labor of this solicitude of ours ought generally to extend to all, because we are debtors to the wise and the unwise, nevertheless it ought specially to extend to clerics, who ought to sleep away from vices so that they may be the silvered wings of the dove, lest anything appear in them that obscures the brightness of ecclesiastical purity.

Indeed, it has reached the hearing of our apostolate through the assertion of many that, when you receive causes to be treated by our delegation, in the manner of secular persons you make agreements with the litigants for your salary—pledges having been received—concerning a tenth of the suit or another part, according to the diverse custom of the lands, apart from expenses for provisions, which afterward you contend to retain until payment of the money, even when the parties are unwilling. We, considering that ecclesiastical revenues are allotted to you and other clerics for this purpose, that from them you ought to live honorably—(And below:) therefore, we command and enjoin that, abstaining henceforth from exactions of this kind, you take care to impart judicial vigor to litigants without payment, notwithstanding what is proposed by some in fraud: that it is exacted in the name of assessors, since it is lawful neither for a judge to sell a just judgment nor for venal sentences to be approved even by the secular laws themselves. [Given at Todi, on the fifth day before the Nones of October, 1198.]

Chapter XI

Latin source headnote: To avoid scandal, religious of diverse habits, sent to preach to the newly converted, can conform themselves to one superior habit and purpose.

The same, to the Bishop of Livonia and to the Brothers who are with him.

God, who always makes his Church fruitful with new offspring, wishing to conform modern times to the former and to propagate the Catholic faith, inspired your predecessors, and you after them, with the pious affection that, entering the Province of Livonia, you should evangelize to the pagans the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, following the example of those to whom we read in the Gospel that it was said: "Going, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit"; and concerning whom the evangelical word adds: "But they, setting forth, preached everywhere, the Lord cooperating and confirming the word by the signs that followed." For that evangelical householder, considering that the harvest is great but the laborers few, still sends laborers into his harvest and in this, as though the eleventh hour, appoints new vine-dressers to his vineyard, whose labor he may recompense with an equal denarius with the first. Hence, since you have assumed the office of evangelizing by the inspiration of him who makes both one, you must walk in the spirit of unity and charity, following the example of those concerning whom it is read: "The multitude of believers, however, had one heart and one soul."

Therefore, lest, if observance among you is disparate and habit dissimilar, scandal arise among those to whom you preach one Gospel, and that new people be divided into parties before it is gathered into one Church, since the hostile man is still prepared to sow tares over the Lord's harvest, we admonish and exhort your discretion in the Lord, through apostolic writings we command that, notwithstanding that among you there are monks and regular canons, or others also professing the regular life under another strictness, you all equally conform yourselves to one regular purpose and honorable habit, insofar as it concerns this office, lest the new plantation of the Church of Livonia, reddened with the blood of your predecessor of pious memory, brother bishop, suffer even a slight scandal among you, through whom it is to be rooted in and fostered in the Catholic faith. [But because (Cf. c. 9, On the Separation of Spouses, IV. 19.) Given at the Lateran, on the thirteenth day before the Kalends of May, 1201.]

Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: Theatrical games ought not to be performed in churches or by clerics, even under pretext of custom.

Innocent III.

Since the beauty of the house of God—(And below: [Cf. c. 15, On the Sons of Priests, I. 15.]) Sometimes theatrical games are performed in the same churches, and not only are monstrosities of masks introduced in them for spectacles of mockery, but also on certain feasts of the year that immediately follow the Nativity of Christ, deacons, priests, and subdeacons in turn presume to exercise the mockeries of their madness, and through the obscene revelries of their gesticulations in the sight of the people cause clerical honor to become vile, although at that time they ought rather to soothe the people through preaching the word of God. Therefore, because through the office enjoined upon us zeal for the house of God consumes us, and the reproaches of those reproaching him are recognized to fall upon us, through apostolic writings we command your fraternity that, lest the honorable conduct of the Church be polluted through turpitude of this kind, those persons, etc. (Cf. c. 8, On Married Clerics, III. 3.), and that you take care thus to root out from your churches the aforesaid custom—or rather corruption—of mockeries, so that you prove yourselves zealous for divine worship and sacred order. [Given at Rome, at Saint Peter's, on the sixth day before the Ides of January, in the ninth year, 1207.]

Chapter XIII

Latin source headnote: Clerics ought to be continent and live chastely; he punishes those acting contrary, and those who can use lawful marriage are punished more severely.

The same, in the general council.

That the morals and acts of clerics may be reformed for the better, let all take care to live continently and chastely, especially those established in sacred orders, guarding against every vice of lust, especially that on account of which the wrath of God comes [from heaven] upon the children of distrust, so that in the sight of almighty God they may be able to minister with a pure heart and clean body. But lest facility of pardon furnish an incentive for offending, we establish that those who are caught laboring under the vice of incontinence shall be punished according to the canonical sanctions, in accordance with whether they have sinned more or less. We command that these be observed more efficaciously and strictly, so that temporal punishment may at least restrain from sin those whom divine fear does not recall from evil. Therefore, if anyone suspended for this cause presumes to celebrate divine services, not only shall he be despoiled of ecclesiastical benefices, but for this double fault he shall also be perpetually deposed. But prelates who presume to sustain such persons in their iniquities, especially under pretext of money or another temporal advantage, shall be subject to equal vengeance. But those who, according to the custom of their region, have not renounced conjugal union shall be punished more gravely if they lapse, since they can use lawful marriage.

Ne vero facilitas veniae incentivum tribuat delinquendi, statuimus, ut, qui comprehensi fuerint incontinentiae vitio laborare, prout magis aut minus peccaverint, puniantur secundum canonicas sanctiones, quas efficacius et districtius praecipimus observari, ut quos divinus timor a malo non revocat temporalis saltem poena cohibeat a peccato. Si quis igitur hac de causa suspensus praesumpserit celebrare divina, non solum ecclesiasticis beneficiis spolietur, verum etiam pro hac duplici culpa perpetuo deponatur. Praelati vero, qui tales praesumpserint in suis iniquitatibus sustinere, maxime obtentu pecuniae vel alterius commodi temporalis, pari subiaceant ultioni. Qui autem secundum regionis suae morem non abdicarunt copulam coniugalem, si lapsi fuerint, gravius puniantur, quum legitimo matrimonio uti possint.

Chapter XIV

Latin source headnote: A cleric given to gluttony or drunkenness who does not desist after being admonished is suspended from office or benefice.

The same, in the same council.

Let all clerics diligently abstain from gluttony and drunkenness; hence let them temper wine to themselves and themselves to wine. Nor let anyone be incited to drinking, since drunkenness both induces exile of the mind and provokes an incentive of lust. Hence we decree that abuse to be utterly abolished by which, in certain regions, drinkers bind themselves in their manner to equal draughts, and in the judgment of such persons he is praised more who intoxicates more persons and drains fuller cups. But if anyone shows himself culpable concerning these things, unless, after being admonished by his superior, he makes [suitable] satisfaction, let him be suspended from office or benefice.

Unde illum abusum penitus decernimus abolendum, quo in quibusdam partibus ad potus aequales suo modo se obligant potatores, et ille iudicio talium plus laudatur, qui plures inebriat et calices foecundiores exhaurit. Chapter XV

Latin source headnote: He commands clerics to abstain from dishonorable occupations, persons, places, games, garments, and less than honorable adornment, and to use honorable habit, whose vanity he expresses and detests in many particulars.

The same, in the same council.

Let clerics not exercise secular offices or commerce, especially dishonorable ones. Let them not attend to mimes, jesters, and actors. And let them altogether avoid taverns, unless perhaps, established upon a journey, for cause of necessity. Let them not play at dice and knucklebones, nor be present at games of this kind. Let them have a suitable crown and tonsure. And let them exercise themselves diligently in ecclesiastical offices and other good studies. Let them wear closed outer garments, not notable for excessive shortness or length. Let them not use red or green cloths, nor stitched or pointed sleeves or shoes, bridles, saddles, breastplates, and gilded spurs, or things bearing another superfluity. Let them not wear sleeved copes for divine office within a church, nor elsewhere either if they are established in the priesthood and in parsonships, unless a just cause of fear requires their habit to be transformed. Let them bear no brooches at all, nor belts having ornament of gold or silver, nor rings either, except those to whom it belongs by office of dignity. But let all pontiffs in public and in church use linen outer garments, unless they are monks, who must bear monastic habit. Let them not use unclasped cloaks in public, but ones joined on each side either behind the neck or before the breast.

> A negotiis, personis, locis, ludis, vestibus inhonestis et ornatu minus honesto praecipit clericos abstinere, et habitu honesto uti, cuius vanitatem in pluribus exprimit et detestatur.

Et se in officiis ecclesiasticis et aliis bonis studiis exerceant diligenter. Clausa deferant desuper indumenta, nimia brevitate vel longitudine non notanda. Pannis rubeis aut viridibus, nec non manicis aut sotularibus consutitiis sed rostratis, frenis, sellis, pectoralibus et calcaribus deauratis, aut aliam superfluitatem gerentibus, non utantur. Cappas manicatas ad divinum officium intra ecclesiam non gerant, sed nec alibi, qui sunt in sacerdotio et personatibus constituti, nisi iusta causa timoris exegerit habitum transformari. Fibulas omnino non ferant, neque corrigas auri vel argenti ornatum habentes, sed nec annulos, nisi quibus competit ex officio dignitatis. Pontifices autem in publico et in ecclesia superindumentis lineis omnes utantur, nisi monachi fuerint, quos oportet ferre habitum monachalem. Palliis diffibulatis non utantur in publico, sed vel post collum, vel ante pectus hinc inde connexis.

Chapter XVI

Latin source headnote: A cleric who, after being admonished a third time, does not abstain from secular commerce in the meantime loses clerical privilege as regards his goods. This it says. And it is a very noteworthy text that is alleged daily.

Honorius III, to the Bishop of Amiens.

From the letters of the noble man, the Count of Ponthieu and Montreuil, we understood that certain clerics in name alone of his land, declared taverners, who, not content with benefices but devoting themselves rather to illicit secular commerce and domestic cares than to divine offices and services, and wishing to enjoy clerical privilege, are unwilling to be subject to the statutes of the country, by which, whenever it is expedient, they defend themselves like laypersons, and to be subject in the profits of their commerce. Hence, because great scandal is generated from this among the laity, he humbly supplicated us that we should either command clerics of this kind to be compelled to serve [in] churches, illicit secular commerce being set aside, or permit them, as regards their means, to be subject to the statutes and customs of the province. Since, therefore, these things are recognized to redound to the reproach of clerical order, and the life of clerics ought not to generate scandal for laypersons but to furnish an example of honorable conduct, [through apostolic writings] we command your fraternity that, if it is so, since you are the diocesan of the place, if such clerics, after being admonished by you a third time, do not come to their senses from things of this kind but, divine offices having been set aside, persist in the aforesaid commerce, since by an act of this kind they cast away clerical privilege, you shall not defend them from being subject, while they implicate themselves in these things, to the statutes and customs of the country as regards their means. Title II: On the Cohabitation of Clerics and Women

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A cleric ought not to retain in his house a woman suspected of incontinence, even if she is his mother or another blood relative.

From the Council of Mainz.

It is to be forbidden and threatened in every way that no priest retain in his house women as [also] is contained as inserted in the canon, concerning whom suspicion can exist. But neither should he retain those whom the canons permit, [namely] a mother, paternal aunt, and sister, because, at the devil's instigation, crime is found to have been frequently perpetrated even with them, or also with their maidservants. But if any one of these has a necessity suffering such a condition, priests are to have for them a house in a village or country estate far from their own dwelling, and there supply to them the things that are necessary. But according to the authority of the canons, in every way it is also to be forbidden that any woman presume to approach the altar, or minister to a priest, or stand or sit within the chancel.

Sed neque i llas, quas canones concedunt, [scilicet] matrem, amitam et sororem, quia instigante diabolo et in illis scelus frequenter perpetratum reperitur, aut etiam in pedissequis earundem. Sed si qua de his talem patientem necessitatem habuerit, presbyteri habeant in vico aut in villa domum longe a sua conversatione, et ibi eis quae sunt necessaria subministrent. Sed secundum auctoritatem canonum modis omnibus Prohibendum quoque est, ut nulla femina ad altare praesumat accedere, aut presbytero ministrare, aut infra cancellos stare sive sedere.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: A cleric in sacred orders who, after being admonished, does not desist from conversation with suspect women or from their company is excommunicated.

From a decree of Pope Eugenius.

If any one of the priests, that is, a presbyter, deacon, or subdeacon, suspected of the crime of fornication with any woman whatsoever, is found after the first, second, and third admonition to converse and in any way associate with her, let him be subjected to excommunication; but let the woman be judged canonically.

> Excommunicatur clericus in sacris, qui a suspectarum mulierum colloquio vel earum consortio monitus non desistit.
>
> Ex decreto Eugenii Papae.
>
> Si quisquam sacerdotum, id est presbyter, diaconus vel subdiaconus, de quacunque femina crimine fornicationis suspectus, post primam et secundam et tertiam admonitionem inveniatur fabulari et ali quo modo conversari cum ea : excommunicationi subdatur, femina vero canonice iudicetur.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: A prelate ought not to compel a cleric to abjure a concubine; but he can excommunicate one unwilling to dismiss her.

Alexander III, to the Archbishop of Salerno.

Moreover, we do not wish your fraternity to compel clerics constituted in sacred orders who publicly keep concubines in their own houses to abjure them, lest, returning to the same fornication by the instigation of diabolical fraud, they incur the guilt of perjury. But you ought to compel them more strictly by a sentence of suspension and interdict to remove those women from themselves in such a way that sinister suspicion cannot be had concerning them. And if any of them should perhaps presume to return to them or take others, you ought to pronounce against some of them a perpetual sentence of excommunication, so that others, terrified by their example, may be restrained from similar acts.

Non debet praelatus clericum cogere ad concubinam abiurandam; sed eam nolentem dimittere potest excommunicare.

Alexander III. Salernitano Archiepiscopo.

Clericos autem in sacris ordinibus constitutos, qui in domibus propriis publice tenent concubinas, ad eas abiurandas nolumus a tua fraternitate compelli, ne, in eandem fornicationem instinctu diabolicae fraudis redeuntes, periurii reatum incurrant. Verum ipsos per suspensionis et interdicti sententiam debes arctius cogere, ut mulieres ipsas a se ita removeant, quod de illis sinistra suspicio non possit haberi. Et si qui eorum ad ipsas redire, vel alias accipere forte praesumpserint, in aliquos eorum debes perpetuam excommunicationis sententiam proferre, ut alii eorum exemplo perterriti a similibus arceantur.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: If clerics, after being admonished, do not dismiss their concubines, they are suspended from benefices, and, if they do not correct themselves, they are deposed.

The same, to the Archbishop of Canterbury and his Suffragans.

Just as it becomes us to strive with the utmost effort to extirpate vices that give rise to danger of souls, so also it befits us to propagate the seeds of virtues, from which an increase of salvation may come to [God's] faithful and the adornment of honorable conduct to sacred churches. Hence, since in England it has been established by a depraved and detestable custom and for a long time that clerics have fornicating women in their houses, we, wishing to remove so grave a scandal from the people and to bring the aforesaid clerics back to ecclesiastical honorable conduct, command your fraternity by apostolic writings, by way of precept, that you take care diligently to admonish the clerics of your jurisdiction who, in the subdiaconate and above, have had fornicating women in their houses, that they remove them from themselves cessation of delay and appeal, in no way to admit them further. But if within forty days after your communication they should perhaps disdain to acquiesce in these matters, relying upon apostolic authority and with the remedy of appeal removed, suspend them from ecclesiastical benefices until fitting satisfaction; and, if while suspended they presume to retain them, take care to remove them perpetually from the same benefices. [But if any, etc. (Cf. c. 1, On Married Clerics, III. 3.)]

Si clerici moniti concubinas non dimittunt, suspenduntur a beneficiis, et, si se non corrigunt, deponuntur.

Idem Cantuariensi Archiepiscopo et eius Suffraganeis.

Sicut ad exstirpanda +vitia, quae periculum pariunt animarum, summopere nos decet intendere ita etiam nos convenit germina propagare virtutum, ex quibus [Dei] fidelibus salutis augmentum, et sacris ecclesiis decor proveniat honestatis. Unde quum in Anglia prava a detestabili consuetudine et longo tempore sit obtentum, ut clerici fornicarias in suis domibus habeant, nos volentes tam grave scandalum de populo removere, et praedictos clericos ad honestatem ecclesiasticam reducere, Fraternitati vestrae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus clericos vestrae iurisdictionis, qui in subdiaconatu et supra in domibus suis fornicarias habuerint, studiose monere curetis, ut a se illas dilatione et appellatione cessante removeant, eas ulterius minime admissuri. Si vero infra XL. dies post communicationem vestram vobis in his forte acquiescere contempserint, eos apostolica auctoritate freti sublato appellationis remedio ab ecclesiasticis beneficiis usque ad satisfactionem congruam suspendatis, et, si eas suspensi praesumpserint detinere, ipsos ab eisdem benefici is perpetuo removere curetis. [Si qui autem etc. (cf. c. I. de cler. coni. III. 3.)]

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: Letters concerning absolution, obtained by a suspended concubinary cleric with the sequence of facts suppressed, are not valid.

The same, to the Archbishop of York.

But concerning what you assert, that A., a presbyter retaining a fornicating woman, was suspended from his office because of this, we answer your prudence thus: that, if an appeal has been made concerning this to our presence, if it should happen that he comes to us, as we shall see to be expedient, we shall correct his pertinacity and audacity. But if he does not come to our presence, we wish the sentence of suspension pronounced against him because of this to be observed for so long until he casts his fornicating woman wholly away from himself and lives continently, as befits a presbyter. Moreover, if he obtains from us letters that do not contain the sequence of the fact, we do not wish those letters to profit him.

> Super eo vero quod asseris A. presbyterum fornicariam detinentem, propter hoc ab officio suo suspensum, +prudentiae tuae taliter respondemus, quod, si super hoc appellatum sit ad praesentiam nostram, si contigerit ipsum ad nos accedere, prout expedire videbimus, pertinaciam eius et audaciam corrigemus. Si vero non venerit ad praesentiam nostram, suspensionis in eum sententiam propter hoc latam tamdiu volumus observari, donec fornicariam suam a se prorsus abiiciat, et vivat, sicut decet presbyterum, continenter. Porro si literas a nobis obtinuerit, quae facti seriem non contineant, nolumus literas illas sibi prodesse.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: If clerics, after being admonished, do not dismiss their concubines, they are suspended from benefices, and, if they do not correct themselves, they are deposed.

The same, to the Archbishop of London.

But if clerics of your jurisdiction, whether constituted in sacred orders or in lower ones, retain fornicating women, unless at the second or third admonition they dismiss them from themselves, to hold them in contempt thereafter, let it be lawful for you, appeal being set aside, to despoil them of churches or portions of them, if they have any, their office nevertheless being interdicted to them.

> Si autem clerici tuae iurisdictionis, sive in sacris ordinibus sive in inferioribus constituti, fornicarias detinent, nisi eas ad secundam vel tertiam co mmonitionem a se dimiserint, easdem de cetero contempturi, liceat tibi eos ecclesiis vel earum, portionibus, si quas habent, appellatione postposita spoliare, officio ipsis nihilominus interdicto.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: Divine offices are lawfully heard and ecclesiastical sacraments received from a fornicating cleric so long as he is tolerated and there is no manifest evidence of the deed; but one must abstain from a notorious one, not because there is a defect in the sacrament, but for the correction of the fornicators themselves. This it says, adhering to the words of the letter.

Lucius III.

Your devotion has thought fit to inquire whether, when you go to parish churches, [it is useful to hear the masses of those] who are believed to have concubines. For concerning this, [indeed,] diverse opinions of the sacred canons seem to have issued. For in one place it is said: "Let no one hear the mass of a priest whom he knows indubitably to have a concubine"; but elsewhere it is read: "No one, however polluted he may have been, can pollute the divine sacraments, which exist as purgatives of all contagions. For of whatever sort a priest may be, the things that are holy cannot be defiled. Therefore receive fearlessly the mysteries of Christ from every priest, because all things are purified in the faith of Christ." Yet one thing is a notorious crime, another a hidden one. Notorious is defined as that concerning which a presbyter is canonically condemned. Another is hidden, which is still tolerated by the Church. Yet one thing is when a presbyter does not deny a notorious crime or has been canonically condemned concerning it; another is almost hidden, which is tolerated by the Church. Likewise, one thing is to abstain from the offices of such men, so that license to sin may be taken away from others and men of this kind may be drawn to the fruit of penance; and another, if the mysteries of such men are rejected as though they lay in fornication. Therefore hold without doubt that from clerics and presbyters, although fornicators, so long as they are tolerated by the Church and do not have manifest evidence of the deed, the divine mysteries may lawfully be heard and the other ecclesiastical sacraments received.

> A clerico fornicario, quamdiu toleratur, nec habet operis evidentiam, licite audiuntur divina, et percipiuntur ecclesiastica sacramenta; a notorio vero abstinendum est, non quia in sacramento sit defectus, sed ad ipsorum fornicatorum emendationem. H. d. inhaerendo verbis literae.
> Lucius III.
>
> Vestra d uxit devotio inquirendum, +utrum vobis ecclesias parochiales adeuntibus [utile sit missas eorum audire], qui concubinas habere creduntur. De hoc [enim] videntur diversae sacrorum canonum sententiae emanasse. Alicubi enim dicitur: " Nullus audiat missam sacerdotis, quem scit indubitanter concubin am habere; " alibi vero legitur: " Non potest aliquis, quantumcunque pollutus fuerit, divina polluere sacramenta, quae purgatoria cunctarum contagionum exsistunt. Qualiscunque enim sacerdos sit, quae sancta sunt coinquinari non possunt. Sumite ergo ab omni sacerdote intrepide Christi mysteria, quia o mnia in Christi fide purgantur. " Ceterum aliud est crimen notorium, aliud occultum. Notorium definitur, de quo presbyter canonice condemnatur. Aliud est occultum, quod adhuc ab ecclesia toleratur. Ceterum aliud est, quando crimen notorium non diffitetur presbyter, vel de ipso est canonice condemnatus; aliud est paene occultum, quod ab ecclesia toleratur. Item aliud est a talium officiis abstinere, ut peccandi licentia ceteris auferatur, et huiusmodi ad poenitentiae fructum trahantur; atque aliud, si talium tanquam in fornicatione iacentium mysteria respuantur. Sine dubitatione itaque teneatis, quod a clericis et presbyteris, quanquam fornicariis, quamdiu ab ecclesia tolerantur, nec habent operis evidentiam, licite divina mysteria audiantur, et alia recipiantur sacramenta ecclesiastica.

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: If the fornication of a cleric is so public that it passes into notoriety, neither accuser nor witness is necessary. But if it is public through report alone, testimonies alone—that is, statements of witnesses not under oath—do not suffice for condemnation. But if scandal should arise from this, purgation is imposed, and one failing in it is canonically punished.

Innocent III, to the Bishop of Exeter.

Your fraternity has thought fit to consult us whether, concerning clerics publicly having concubines who, when they are called before you, deny that they are concubinaries, and no lawful accuser appears against them, belief is to be given to the testimony of good men among whom they are known to live. We therefore answer your consultation thus: that, if their crime is so public that it ought deservedly to be called notorious, in that case neither witness nor accuser is necessary, since a crime of this kind cannot be concealed by any evasion. But if it is public not from manifest evidence but from report, in that case testimonies alone do not suffice for their condemnation, since judgment is to be made not by testimonies but by witnesses. But if such suspicion is had concerning those clerics that scandal is generated from it among the people, although no accuser has appeared against them, canonical purgation is nevertheless to be imposed upon them. If they are unwilling to perform it or fail in performing it, you ought to punish them by canonical chastisement. [Given at the Lateran, on the fifth day before the Ides of May, 1199.]

> Si fornicatio clerici est ita publica, quod transit in notorium, nec accusator, nec testis necessarius est. Sed si est publica per solam famam, non sufficiunt ad condemnationem sola testimonia, id est testium dicta non iuratorum. Sed si ex hoc oriretur scandalum inducitur purgatio, in qua deficiens canonice punitur.

Nos igitur consultationi tuae taliter respondemus, quod, si crimen eorum ita publicum est, ut merito debeat appellari notorium, in eo casu nec testis nec accusator est necessarius, quum huiusmodi crimen nulla possit tergiversatione celari. Si vero publicum est, no n ex evidentia, sed ex fama : in eo casu ad condemnationem eorum sola testimonia non sufficiunt, quum non sit testimoniis, sed testibus iudicandum. Sed si de clericis ipsis talis habeatur suspicio, ut ex ea scandalum generetur in populo, licet contra ipsos non apparuerit accusator, eis tamen est canonica purgatio indicenda. Quam si praestare noluerint, vel defecerint in praestanda, eos canonica d ebebis animadversione punire. [Dat. Lat. V. Id. Mai. 1199.]

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: It is brief, whence it is not summarized.

The same, to the Bishop of Pistoia.

Your fraternity has asked of us—(And below: [Cf. c. 24, On Tithes, III. 30.]) You are also not to permit little women to dwell with clerics, unless perhaps they are among those persons in whom the bond of nature permits no suspicion of savage crime. Chapter X

Latin source headnote: A concubinary cleric is not to be avoided in offices unless he is notorious.

Gregory IX.

It has been asked concerning clerics fallen into fornication whether their office is to be heard before they have repented. But although it is established that anyone is suspended as regards himself for mortal sin, he ought nevertheless not to be avoided in offices, because, as regards others, even in the case proposed he is not suspended, unless a sin of this kind is notorious through a sentence or through a confession made in court, or through manifest evidence of the matter, which cannot be concealed by any evasion.

> Clericus concubinarius in officiis vitandus non est, nisi sit notorius.
>
> Gregorius IX.
>
> Quaesitum est de clericis in fornicationem prolapsis, si eorum sit officium, priusquam poenituerint, audiendum. Verum etsi quemlibet pro mortali peccato quoad se ipsum constet esse suspensum, non debet tamen in officiis evitari, quia, quantum ad alios, etiam in casu proposito suspensus non est, nisi peccatum huiusmodi sit notorium per sententiam seu per confession em factam in iure, aut per evidentiam rei, quae tergiversatione aliqua celari non possit.

Title III: On Married Clerics

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A marriage contracted by a cleric existing in sacred orders does not hold; it is otherwise in minor orders, but then he is compelled to relinquish his benefice.

Alexander III.

But if any of those clerics themselves below the subdiaconate have taken wives, you shall compel them by ecclesiastical severity to relinquish ecclesiastical benefices, if they have any, and to retain their wives. But if they are known perhaps to have taken wives in the subdiaconate and other higher orders, take care to compel them by a sentence of suspension and excommunication, appeal being set aside, to dismiss the wives and do penance for the offense, by our authority.

Sed si forte in subdiaconatu et aliis superioribus ordinibus uxores accepisse noscuntur, eos uxores dimittere, et poenitentiam agere de commisso auctoritate nostra per suspensionis et excommunicationis sententiam appellatione postposita compellere procuretis.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: A married man is not promoted to an ecclesiastical administration, order, or benefice unless he promises chastity and is not a bigamist.

The same, to the Bishop of Hereford.

Indeed, concerning clerics of the lower orders who, constituted in marriage, have for a long time held ecclesiastical benefices by grant of your predecessors, of which they cannot be deprived without great danger and shedding of blood, we have thought that this answer should be given to your fraternity: that, because a nation and a barbarous people and a multitude are involved there, you should tolerate under dissimulation their possession of the ecclesiastical benefices held for so long. Take more attentive care that henceforth a married cleric not be admitted to ecclesiastical benefices, sacred orders, or ecclesiastical administrations, unless perhaps he should vow perpetual chastity and had had one wife, and a virgin.

> Coniugatus ad administrationem et ad ordinem ecclesiasticum vel beneficium non promovetur, nisi castitatem promittat, et non sit bigamus.
>
> Idem Herfordensi Episcopo.
>
> Sane +de clericis inferiorum ordinum, qui in coniugio constituti diu ecclesiastica beneficia ex concessione praedecessorum tuorum habuerunt, a quibus sine magno discrimine ac effusione sanguinis non possunt privari, fraternitati tuae id duximus respondendum, ut, quia ibi natio et gens barbara et multitudo in causa est, eos sub dissimulatione sustineas ecclesiastica beneficia tamdiu habita possidere; Provideas attentius, ne deinceps clericus coniugatus ad ecclesiastica beneficia, vel sacros ordines aut administrationes ecclesiasticas admittatur, nisi forte castitatem voveret perpetuam, et qui unicam et virginem habuisset uxorem.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: If a beneficed cleric in minor orders contracts marriage, he is deprived of the benefice, and what he gave to the church is restored to him. This it says, and in this last point there is a noteworthy and highly citable case.

The same, to the Bishop of Veroli.

What by you—(And below:) For the future, because the diligence of your fraternity seeks to know whether clerics constituted below the order of subdeacon, who, overcome by the vice of the flesh and unable to contain themselves, take wives, ought canonically to be despoiled of ecclesiastical benefice: we wish you to hold with undoubted truth that, since they cannot at the same time devote themselves to pleasures and carnal desires and to divine and ecclesiastical services, they are, because of their uncleanness, unworthy to handle ecclesiastical sacraments and are without doubt to be deprived of ecclesiastical benefices. Indeed, if they are known to have conferred upon the churches to which they had been attached anything from their own possessions or other goods, when they have been separated from the ministry and benefice of those churches, dominion and ownership ought by the direct way to return to them freely and without any contradiction.

> Si clericus in minoribus beneficiatus matrimonium contrahat, privatur beneficio, et quod dedit ecclesiae sibi restituitur. H. d. et in hoc ultimo est casus not. et multum allegabilis.

Sane si ecclesiis, quibus intitulati fuerant, de possessionibus aut aliis bonis suis aliqua contulisse noscuntur, quum ab earundem ecclesiarum ministerio fuerint et beneficio sequestrati, ad ipsos recta via dominium ac proprietas libere debent et absque ulla contradictione redire.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: After penance has been completed, bishops dispense with priests who have contracted marriage in fact.

The same.

Indeed, those priests who contract nuptials, which are to be called not nuptials but rather concubinages, will be able, after long penance and a praiseworthy continent life, to be restored to their office and, by indulgence of their bishop, to have its exercise.

Peracta poenitentia dispensant episcopi cum sacerdotibus, qui matrimonium de facto contraxerunt.

Idem.

Sane sacerdotes illi, qui nuptias contrahunt, quae non nuptiae, sed contubernia sunt potius nuncupanda, post longam poenitentiam et vitam laudabilem continentes officio suo restitui poterunt, et ex indulgentia sui episcopi eius exsecutionem habere.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: Benefices that a cleric had at the time of contracting marriage are to be taken away from him; but those knowingly conferred afterward by the bishop cannot be taken away by the same bishop, but by a superior. This it says.

Innocent III, to the Bishop of Norwich.

Ensnared by diverse deceits, they endeavor to serve God and mammon, although according to evangelical truth no one can serve two masters, because, if he loves one, he will hold the other in hatred, or, having despised one, will sustain the other. We have learned that certain clerics of your diocese who have contracted marriage solemnly in the sight of the Church contend that they may retain ecclesiastical benefices, in whose manner of life the harp agrees badly with the psaltery. Since, therefore, a husband thinks how he may please his wife and for that reason is less able to think about the things that are God's, since, as though divided in two, he does not have full power over himself so as to serve more fully him from whom he receives a stipend, by the authority of the present letters we command your fraternity that, supported by our authority, you deprive clerics of this kind of the ecclesiastical benefices they have obtained in your diocese, with appeal removed, especially since the substance of ecclesiastical property is accustomed to perish through such men; unless perhaps you knowingly conferred ecclesiastical benefices upon such men, in which case we decree that they are to be despoiled of them not by you but by a superior. [Let no one therefore, etc. Given at Ferentino, on the twelfth day before the Kalends of July, 1203.]

Auferenda sunt clerico beneficia, quae habebat tempore contracti matrimonii; collata vero postmodum scienter per episcopum per eundem auferri non possunt, sed per superiorem. H. d.

Innocentius III. Norvicensi Episcopo.

Diversis fallaciis +circumventi Deo et mammonae famulari conantur, quum tamen secundum evangelicam veritatem nemo possit duobus dominis deservire, quoniam, si unum dilexerit, alium habebit exosum, aut uno contempto alium sustinebit. Accepimus autem, quod quidam clerici tuae dioecesis, qui solenniter in conspectu ecclesiae matrimonium contraxerunt, ecclesiastica beneficia detinere contendunt, in quorum conversatione cithara cum psalterio male concordat. Quum ergo vir cogitet, quomodo placere possit uxori, et ideo minus quae Dei sunt valeat cogitare, quum quasi divisus in duo plenam sui non habeat potestatem, ut ei, a quo stipendium recipit, plenius famuletur, fraternitati tuae auctoritate praesentium mandamus, quatenus huiusmodi clericos beneficiis ecclesiasticis, quae in tua dioecesi sunt adepti, auctoritate nostra suffultus prives appellatione remota, praesertim quum rerum ecclesiasticarum substantia per tales soleat deperire; nisi forte tu talibus scienter contuleris ecclesiastica beneficia, quibus eos non per te, sed per supe riorem decernimus spoliandos. [Nulli ergo etc. Dat. Ferentini Xll. Kal. Iul. 1203.]

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: The son of a Greek priest, begotten of a wife, is lawfully promoted among the Latins if scandal does not stand in the way. This it says, and it is a noteworthy case.

The same, to the Archbishop of Acerenza.

When it had formerly come to our hearing that the canons of Anglona had elected the beloved son, the cantor of Tricarico, as their pastor, we gave you a mandate that, after examining the election and the person more diligently, if you found the election canonical and the person suitable, you should confirm the election itself by apostolic authority, proceeding as metropolitan in the other matters. Although it was established for you in other respects concerning the canonical form of the election and the suitability of the person, it nevertheless moved you, and induced you to consult us, that, since his father was a Greek and, according to the rite of the Greeks, had taken a wife while constituted in minor orders, he had begotten the cantor himself of a lawful wife while in the priesthood. We therefore, considering that the Eastern Church did not admit the vow of continence, because Easterners contract marriage in minor orders and in higher orders make use of a marriage already contracted, command your fraternity by apostolic writings that, unless the custom of the region opposes this because Greeks of this kind live among the Latins, if no other canonical impediment stands in the way, you proceed without hesitation to the confirmation and consecration of the same cantor. [Given at Ferentino, on the Nones of September, 1203.]

Filius sacerdotis Graeci, ex uxore genitus, licite inter Latinos promovetur, si scandalum non obsistat. H. d. et est casus notabilis.

Idem Archerontino Archiepiscopo.

Quum olim ad nostram audientiam pervenisset, quod canonici Anglorienses dilectum filium cantorem Tricaricensem sibi elegerant in pastorem, +tibi dedimus in mandatis, ut, examinata electione diligentius et persona, si electionem canonicam et personam idoneam invenires, electionem ipsam auctoritate apostolica confirmares, sicut metropolitanus in ceteris processurus. Licet autem tibi de forma electionis canonicae ac idoneitate personae in aliis constitisset, movit te tamen, et ad nos consulendos induxit, quod, quum pater eius Graecus fuerit, et iuxta ritum Graecorum uxorem duxerit in minoribus ordinibus constitutus, cantorem ipsum ex uxore legitima in sacerdotio suscepisset. Nos igitur attendentes, quod orientalis ecclesia votum continentiae non admisit, quoniam orientales in minoribus ordinibus contrahunt, et in superioribus utuntur matrimonio iam contracto, fraternitati tuae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus, nisi pro eo, quod inter Latinos Graeci huiusmodi conversantur, regionis consuetudo repugnet, si aliud canonicum non obsistat, ad confirmationem et consecrationem eiusdem cantoris sine dubitatione procedas. [*Dat. Ferentini Non. Sept. * 1203.]

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: A married cleric who is not beneficed is not compelled to wear the tonsure.

The same, to the Bishop of Poitiers.

John, son of A., has shown us by complaint that, although he long ago took a lawful wife and begot sons and daughters of her, because he had previously been ordained an acolyte, you endeavor to compel him to wear the clerical tonsure, from which scandal could be generated between him and his wife, although according to the custom of your land married clerics are not compelled against their will to wear the tonsure. Therefore, because a man ought to think how he may please his wife, and the same man, even when tonsured, cannot enjoy clerical privilege, by the authority of the present letters we command that you no longer molest him concerning tonsure of this kind, provided that he receives no ecclesiastical benefice by reason of which he is bound to wear the clerical tonsure, because, since he must involve himself in secular business, the tonsure of one conducting secular affairs would indeed seem to redound to the reproach of our ministry.

Quoniam igitur virum oportet, quomodo uxori placeat, cogitare, et idem etiam tonsuratus non potest privilegio clericali gaudere, praesentium auctoritate mandamus, quatenus ipsum super tonsuratione huiusmodi de cetero non molestes, dummodo nullum percipiat beneficium ecclesiasticum, cuius ratione teneatur clericalem deferre tonsuram, quia, quum eum oporteat saecularibus negotiis immisceri, tonsura ipsius saecularia exercentis videretur profecto in ministerii nostri vituperium redundare.

The same.

Since the adornment—(And below: [Cf. c. 15, On the Sons of Priests, I. 15.]) You are henceforth not to admit those who are publicly married to ecclesiastical dignities, those being relinquished by them which they cannot retain without a depraved example and grave scandal. Their sons also, etc. (Cf. c. 15, On the Sons of Priests, I. 15.) [Given at Rome, at Saint Peter's, on the sixth day before the Ides of January, in the ninth year, 1207.]

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: Married clerics do not enjoy clerical privilege in their property.

Honorius III, to H., formerly Queen of the English.

It was proposed before us on your behalf that some learned men of your land, having laid aside clerical habit and tonsure, publicly take wives, being solicitous about the things of this world and how they may please their wives, who, although they apply themselves to commerce and other secular business, nevertheless, so that they may defraud you of customary dues and owed services, resume the discarded tonsure, under pretext of which they may be excused as clerics from things of this kind, although they serve not the Lord but rather the world, as do other married men. Certain men also, after receiving the first tonsure, similarly contract marriage and wear the same tonsure so that under the same pretext they may be excused from the aforesaid things, and the venerable brother the bishop and the beloved sons the dean, archdeacon, and chapter of Le Mans endeavor to favor them as clerics in the withdrawal of your services, to your prejudice and burden. Since, therefore, the things that are Caesar's are to be rendered to Caesar and the things that are God's to God, and publicly married men are not ecclesiastical men while they thus entangle themselves in secular business, we have thought that it should be tolerated with equanimity if you exact from such men the owed dues and customary services as from other married men and receive them from the same, since the tonsure which they appear to have resumed or received not on account of religion but fraudulently to withdraw services ought not to furnish them protection in these matters.

Quidam etiam accepta prima tonsura similiter contrahunt, et eandem tonsuram deferunt, ut eodem praetextu e xcusari valeant a praedictis, +et venerabilis frater episcopus et dilecti filii decanus, archidiaconus et capitulum Cenomanenses ipsos tanquam clericos in subtractione servitiorum tuorum fovere nituntur in tuum praeiudicium et gravamen. Quum igitur reddenda sint quae sunt Caesaris Caesari, et quae sunt Dei Deo, et publice uxorati viri ecclesiastici non exsistant, dum se sic saecularibus negotiis implicant, aequanimiter duximus tolerandum, si a talibus iustitias debitas velut ab aliis uxoratis exigas et servitia consueta, et recipias ab eisdem quum tonsura quam non obtentu religionis sed in fraudem subtrahendi servitia resumpsisse vel accepisse videntur in his sibi non debeat patrocinium impertiri.

Latin source headnote: If a cleric in minor orders serves as a soldier, he is not to be compelled to wear the tonsure or clerical habit.

The same.

That your consultation may be satisfied briefly, we answer that R., a knight of your diocese, who, as he humbly confessed to you, formerly, when he was constituted in a younger age, when he knew how to read or sing but little, received only the tonsure and clerical crown, which he is ashamed to wear among soldiers and laypersons, is not to be compelled to wear clerical habit.

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: It is not lawful for a bishop to transfer to another bishopric without the Pope's license by accepting it; otherwise he is deprived of the one held and the one sought. This is its meaning according to the gloss.

From the Council of Sardica.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: A cardinal who does not reside in his title is deposed. This it says, and this text is very noteworthy.

Leo III.

From the acts—(And below:) In the synod Anastasius, cardinal presbyter of the title of Blessed Marcellus, was canonically deposed by all because for five years he had deserted his parish contrary to the statutes of the canons and remains among others to this day.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: Several dignities or churches ought not to be conferred upon one person, and a church is to be conferred upon one who is able to reside and govern by himself; otherwise the recipient loses the church, and the giver is deprived of the power to confer.

From the Lateran Council.

Because certain men, setting no measure to avarice, endeavor to receive diverse ecclesiastical dignities and several parish churches contrary to the statutes of the sacred canons [thus], so that, although they are scarcely sufficient to fulfill one office, they claim the stipends of many for themselves, we more strictly forbid this to be done henceforth. Therefore, when a church or ecclesiastical ministry is to be committed, let such a person be sought for this who is able to reside in the place and exercise its care by himself. But if it has been done otherwise, both let the one who received lose what he received contrary to the sacred canons, and let the one who gave be deprived of the power of bestowing.

Quum igitur ecclesia vel ecclesiasticum ministerium committi debuerit, talis ad hoc persona quaeratur, quae residere in loco et curam eius per se ipsam valeat exercere. Quod si aliter actum fuerit, et qui receperit quod contra sacros canones accepit amittat, et qui dederit largiendi potestate privetur.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: One presented to a church but not confirmed, if it appears that he does not wish to reside, ought not to be instituted by the superior; but one confirmed and not residing without a just cause is deprived, with appeal removed.

Alexander III, to the Archbishop of York.

It has been reported to us on your behalf that, although it was established in the Lateran Council that a church or ecclesiastical benefice be conferred upon such a person as is able to reside in the place and exercise its care by himself, certain persons presented to churches affirm that they can do this but refuse to carry it out. Therefore you wished to consult [us] whether because of this you can reject such persons when presented, or remove them when instituted, the obstacle of appeal being taken away. Since, therefore, words are to be taken with effect, such persons, if they have been presented, ought not to be admitted; and those admitted, if they have been instituted, can lawfully be removed—unless perhaps it should happen that they are absent by license of their prelates, for study of letters, or for other honorable causes. Nor ought the refuge of appeal to protect them if it was interposed against the intention of a decree of this kind. [Because, moreover, etc. (Cf. c. 5, On the Right of Patronage, III. 38.)]

Chapter V

The same, to the Archbishop of York.

We have thought fit to grant to your fraternity that, if clerics who have obtained a benefice in churches of your jurisdiction have transferred to another diocese for the purpose of remaining there without your license and assent, it may be lawful for you to despoil them of the benefices they have from you, unless perhaps they have applied themselves to scholastic disciplines or shown you a reasonable cause why they ought not to return. Furthermore, you ought not to receive a cleric of another diocese without commendatory letters from his bishop, unless on his behalf you have received requests or a mandate from the Apostolic See.

Idem Eboracensi Archiepiscopo.

Fraternitati tuae +duximus indulgendum, ut, si clerici, qui in ecclesiis tuae iurisdictionis beneficium sunt adepti, ad aliam dioecesin absque licentia et assensu tuo morandi causa transierint, liceat eos tibi beneficiis, quae a te habent, spoliare, nisi forte scholasticis disciplinis invigilaverint, aut rationabilem causam tibi ostenderint, quare reverti non debeant. Praeterea clericum alterius dioecesis absque commendatitiis literis sui episcopi non debes recipere, nisi pro eo receperis ab apostolica sede preces aut mandatum.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: One who does not reside in a benefice even of small value is deprived of it.

The same.

Upon the complaint of R., a presbyter, we learned that G., a cleric, endeavors to extort twenty solidi annually from him for his church, from which, as is said, he can scarcely receive the necessities of life, asserting that that benefice had been conferred upon him in the same church, although, as we have learned, he does not serve the same church and has and possesses other sufficient ecclesiastical benefices from the Church. Since, therefore, it is indecent and not consonant with reason that the same man, when he has and possesses other sufficient ecclesiastical benefices, should seek a benefice from a church which he does not serve, through apostolic writings we command your fraternity that, if it is established for you that the said G. has sufficient ecclesiastical benefices or that he does not serve the same church, with the obstacle of appeal removed, you impose silence upon him concerning the aforesaid benefice.

Qui non residet in beneficio etiam modicae aestimationis, illo privatur.

Idem.

Conquerente nobis R. presbytero accepimus, quod G. clericus ab eo pro ecclesia sua, de qua, sicut dicitur, vitae necessaria vix potest percipere, annuatim viginti solidos extorquere conatur, asserens beneficium illud in eadem e cclesia sibi fuisse collatum, +quanquam eidem ecclesiae, sicut accepimus, non deserviat, et alia ecclesiastica beneficia sufficientia habeat et possideat ab ecclesia. Quoniam igitur indecens est et non consentaneum rationi, ut idem, quum alia ecclesiastica beneficia sibi sufficientia habeat et possideat, ab ecclesia, cui non deservit, beneficium quaerat, Fraternitati tuae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus, si tibi constiterit, quod dictus G. habeat ecclesiastica beneficia sibi sufficientia, vel quod eidem ecclesiae non deserviat, sibi super praescripto beneficio silentium sublato impedimento appellationis imponas.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: One who is in the service of a bishop receives the fruits of a benefice as though resident, except for daily distributions. Abbas.

The same.

For the future, because it is worthy and fitting that the canons of your church, while they remain about you in your service, receive a portion of the common fund, by the present writing we establish that nothing ought to be subtracted or taken away from your canons, while they are in your service, that is owed to them from the benefit of the common fund, unless perhaps these are victuals that are not accustomed to be furnished to absent persons.

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: A nonresident prelate or cleric who, after being cited, does not return within the term fixed for him is to be deprived, unless he has a just impediment. This it says, together with the two following chapters.

Celestine III.

It was reported to our apostolate on your behalf that the dean of your church, who chose for himself a dwelling rather in the regions of Gaul, has for a space of ten years already made it impossible for your church to have his presence. Therefore, because we do not wish the same church to be defrauded of the office of dean, through apostolic writings we command your whole body that you write to him that he ought to visit your church and exercise his office there as dean. But if, after being summoned, he should perhaps be unwilling to come, we grant you from then on free faculty to elect another who is able to preside over and profit your church.

Quia ergo nolumus, ut eadem ecclesia decani officio defraudetur, universitati vestrae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus scribatis eidem, quod ecclesiam vestram visitare et suum ibidem officium ut decanus debeat exercere. Quodsi forte vocatus venire noluerit, eligendi alium, qui praeesse ecclesiae vestrae valeat et prodesse, vobis extunc concedimus liberam facultatem.

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: It has been summarized in the preceding chapter.

Innocent III, to the Chapter of Ragusa.

How your archbishop departed from the church of Ragusa by his own temerity and, though awaited, has not returned for more than four years already, and was recalled even by your letters, your whole body knows fully, since you have very often laid complaints before us concerning him on this matter and requested that license to elect be granted to you. But we, waiting, thought that he should be awaited longer, to see whether perhaps he would return to his heart and go back to his church, which he had thus abandoned. Therefore, being unwilling that the church itself remain longer destitute of a pastor's solace, through apostolic writings we command and enjoin your discretion that, unless perhaps he has now returned, after one month from receipt of the present letters you elect a person suitable for you as archbishop and take care to present your election to us as quickly as possible. [Given at the Lateran, 1202.]

Nolentes igitur, quod diutius ecclesia ipsa pastoris maneat solatio destituta,* Discretioni vestrae per apostolica scripta mandamus atque praecipimus, quatenus, nisi forsitan iam redierit, vos post mensem a receptione praesentium personam vobis idoneam in archiepiscopum eligatis, et electionem vestram nobis curetis quam citius praesentare. [*Dat. Chapter X

Latin source headnote: The summary is as in the chapter On your behalf above, under the same title.

The same, to the Patriarch of Constantinople.

Among the four animals—(And below: [Cf. c. 8, On Majority and Obedience, I. 33.]) But concerning clerics who without a just and necessary cause in this new state of affairs desert churches or prebends granted to them, especially without your consent being added, we have thought that this answer should be given to you: that, after they have been awaited for a suitable time, unless they return to them, they can justly be deprived of them, provided that they are not detained by a just impediment. [Concerning monasteries, etc. (Cf. c. 5, On Religious Houses, III. 36.) Given at Ferentino, on the fourth day before the Nones of August, in the ninth year, 1206.]

[De monasteriis etc. (cf. c. 5. de rel. dom. III. 36.) *Dat. Ferentini IV. Non. Aug. Ao. IX. * 1206.]

Chapter XI

Latin source headnote: If it is not known where a cleric is, he will be cited by three public edicts in his church, and, if he does not return within six months, he will be deprived of his church. This it says as far as the verse Against them. — (Against them, etc.) This short passage is not summarized because of the variety of readings and because according to one interpretation it does not pertain to the rubric.

The same, to the Archbishop of Palermo.

From the communication of your devotion we received [that, when the Latins had occupied the region of Achaea, certain Greek bishops, your suffragans, terrified by fear and fleeing from their own places, left their churches; some of them, although admonished more often, nevertheless disdain to return to their sees, while some cannot now be admonished through reliable messengers because of the dangers of wars. Hence you humbly supplicated us that, giving you salutary counsel concerning this, we should deign to write to you how you ought to proceed concerning them and their dioceses. We therefore, considering that because of the novelty of the change of that land and the occurrence of new events one must proceed with very great maturity, answer your devotion thus: that you take care to cite them not once but often, namely a first, second, and third time; and if they are unwilling to appear but wish to persist in their contumacy, unless perhaps they have thought that they should be fortified by the shield of an appeal, which they are to prosecute within the lawful time, compel them by sentences of suspension and excommunication to come to your obedience.] But in the churches of those who absent themselves fraudulently and whom a citation cannot reach, you are to cause an edict of triple citation to be published; and, if not even thus do they take care to obey, and if they desert their churches for more than six months, according to the canonical sanctions they ought deservedly to be despoiled of them. Against them also, as has been written above, let proceedings be taken, namely that you compel them by a sentence of suspension and excommunication to come to your obedience. But if not even thus can their malice be softened, let the beloved son B., cardinal presbyter of the title of Saint Susanna and legate of the Apostolic See, remove them from the administration of spiritual things and cause the churches over which they preside to be provided with suitable persons; but let him not promulgate a sentence of degradation against them, so that, if expedient, it may more easily be possible to act mercifully with them. [You asked, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the thirteenth day before the Kalends of May, in the tenth year, 1207.]

Nos igitur attendentes, quod propter novitatem mutationis illius terrae et novitatum eventus sit cum maturitate plurima procedendum, devotioni tuae taliter respondemus, ut illos non semel, sed saepe, videlicet primo, secundo et tertio citare procures, et si comparere noluerint, sed in sua voluerint contumacia perdurare, nisi forte se appellationis clypeo duxerint muniendos, quam intra tempus legitimum prosequantur, ipsos per suspensionis et excommunicationis sententias ad tuam obedientiam venire compellas.*] In ecclesiis autem eorum, qui se fraudulenter absentant, nec ad ipsos valet citatio pervenire, trinae citationis edictum facias publicari, et, si nec sic curaverint obedire, et ultra sex menses suas deseruerint ecclesias, iuxta sanctiones canonicas eis debent merito spoliari. etiam procedatur, scilicet ut ipsos per suspensionis et excommunicationis sententiam ad tuam obedientiam venire compellas. Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: One privileged to receive the fruits of a prebend while absent in study does not use the privilege while staying in a village or castle where there is no study or a less suitable one.

The same, to the Bishop of Auxerre.

The discretion of your fraternity requested—(And below:) You asked furthermore whether, when at times canons to whom, for the sake of studies, it has been granted that in their absence they receive the fruits of their prebends, after obtaining license transfer themselves to villages or castles in which there is no exercise of studies or a less suitable one, the fruits of their prebends are to be conferred upon such men. To this we answer briefly that the aforesaid indulgence ought not to belong to those who commit fraud of this kind, since fraud and deceit ought to furnish protection to no one. [Furthermore, etc. (Cf. c. 15, On Usury, V. 19.) Given at the Lateran, on the seventeenth day before the Kalends of June, in the tenth year, 1207.]

Chapter XIII

Latin source headnote: One who swore to reside in a church lawfully absents himself for the services of the church.

Honorius III, to the Provost of Valières.

It was proposed before us on your behalf that at the time when you received the provostship of Valières, you took an oath to make residence, which is called liege residence, in the church of Saint Martin of Tours, in which you hold the same provostship, promising by an oath additionally taken that you would maintain and defend the men and rights of the provostship itself. But because, while prosecuting the rights of the provostship, you sometimes cannot reside in the aforesaid church, fearing concerning the oath taken regarding the residence itself, you humbly requested that provision be made for you by us concerning this. But we answer your petition thus: that, if, not absenting yourself fraudulently, you faithfully prosecute the rights of your provostship, since from this you ought to be accounted resident, you do not incur perjury.

Qui iuravit in ecclesia residere, pro servitiis ecclesiae licite se absentat.

Honorius III. Praeposito de Valeriis.

Chapter XIV

Latin source headnote: A member of the Pope's household receives the fruits of his prebend in his absence, notwithstanding a contrary constitution.

The same, to the Chapter of Metz.

Since the beloved son Master Otto, our scribe and a canon of your church, continually renders pleasing services to us and is held to be no less useful to the same church when absent than when present, we have thought that your whole body should be requested and admonished, and through apostolic writings we command you that, notwithstanding the constitution said to have issued among you against absent canons, out of reverence for the Apostolic See and us, you assign him in full the fruits of his prebend annually while he remains in our service, making fitting satisfaction to him concerning those withdrawn, since our household members, who exhibit themselves as serviceable toward all around us, ought not to enjoy a lesser prerogative than each of you, whose affairs are very often advanced through them.

Familiaris Papae, non obstante constitutione contraria, praebendae suae fructus percipit in absentia.

Idem Capitulo Metensi.

Quum d ilectus filius magister Otto, +scriptor noster, canonicus ecclesiae vestrae, grata nobis iugiter impendat obsequia, et non minus, si sit absens, quam praesens, eidem ecclesiae utilis habeatur, universitatem vestram rogandam duximus et monendam, per apostolica vobis scripta Mandamus, quatenus, non obstante constitutione, quae contra absentes canonicos inter vos dicitur emanasse, ob reverentiam apostolicae sedis et nostram annuatim fructus praebendae suae integraliter assignetis eidem in nostro servitio commoranti, satisfacientes sibi congrue de subtractis, quum familiares nostri, qui circa nos se obsequiales exhibent universis, minori non debeant praerogativa gaudere, quam vestrum singuli, quorum negotia per ipsos saepius promoventur.

Chapter XV

Latin source headnote: Two canons absent with the bishop, or in his service, receive the fruits of their prebends in their absence, notwithstanding a contrary constitution of the church.

The same, to the Bishop of Meaux.

It came to our hearing through your report that, although in the church of Meaux there is a certain constitution entered into, fortified by oath and confirmed by authority of the Apostolic See, that namely its canons who do not reside in the same church for six months are deprived of the fruits of their prebends, those alone being excepted whom infirmity of their own body would excuse or whom it should happen to be detained in the service of the Apostolic See, and whom the labor of pilgrimage or literary studies might draw away, the dean and certain other canons of Meaux, on the occasion of a constitution of this kind, endeavor to deprive the canons remaining in your service of the fruits of their prebends. Hence, since it is very expedient for you to retain some of those canons in your service, you humbly supplicated us that we deign to provide for your necessity in this matter by the moderation of apostolic provision. Therefore, wishing so to moderate the aforesaid constitution that the said church may perceive fruit from it and you may not incur loss through its abuse, by the authority of the present letters we decree that two of the canons of the aforesaid church, existing in your service, receive in full the fruits of their prebends, since those who remain with you for your service and that of the church itself ought not to be called absent but present.

Unde, quum tibi plurimum expediat aliquos canonicorum ipsorum in tuo servitio retinere, nobis humiliter supplicasti, ut super hoc necessitati tuae apostolicae dignaremur provisionis moderamine providere. Volentes igitur sic constitutionem moderari praedictam, ut dicta ecclesia fructum sentiat ex eadem, et tu per eius abusum dispendium non incurras, praesentium auctoritate*, Decernimus, ut duo ex canonicis ecclesiae memoratae, in tuo servitio exsistentes, suarum fructus integre percipiant praebendarum, quum absentes dici non debeant, sed praesentes, qui tecum pro tuo et ipsius ecclesiae servitio commorantur.

Chapter XVI

Latin source headnote: If a church suffers a lack of ministers, those privileged concerning absence are compelled to return by withdrawal of revenues. This it says, and it is a good text and can be much practiced.

Gregory IX, to the Patriarch of Antioch, Legate of the Apostolic See.

Since ecclesiastical benefices are assigned for this—(And below:) Indeed, it has become known to us that the church of Antioch is almost destitute of ministers because many of its servants are absent. Hence we command that, notwithstanding apostolic indulgences and the license of your predecessors, you recall the absent canons and assessors to reside in the aforesaid church; and if they do not come, while they are absent you are to cause the same church to be fittingly served from their benefices, converting to the use of the same church what remains from the aforesaid benefices.

The same.

Let it be lawful for you to despoil clerics who have obtained benefices requiring residence in churches of your jurisdiction, if they have transferred to another diocese for the purpose of remaining there without your license and, after being admonished, have not returned, of the said benefices, unless they have shown a reasonable excuse.

Latin source headnote: It is not lawful for a bishop to ordain anyone without a title.

In the Body of Canons.

Let it not be lawful for any bishop to ordain clerics and furnish them no means of support; rather, let him choose one of two alternatives: either let him not make clerics, or, if he makes them, let him give them that from which they can live.

> Non licet episcopo aliquem ordinare sine titulo.
>
> In Corpore Canonum.
>
> Non liceat ulli episcopo ordinare clericos, et eis nullas alimonias praes tare, sed duorum alterum eligat : vel non faciat clericos, vel si fecerit, det illis unde vivere possint.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: The goods of churches are common, and no one ought to claim them for himself as his own.

Gregory, to Anthemius the Subdeacon.

No reason permits that what is recognized to have been given for the common utility be applied to anyone's private uses.

> Bona ecclesiarum communia sunt, nec debet quisquam tanquam propria sibi vendicare.
>
> Gregorius Anthemio Subdiacono.
>
> Ratio nulla permittit, ut quod pro communi utilitate datum esse cognoscitur propriis cuiusquam usibus applicetur.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: One who ordained to sacred orders without a title someone not having from his own property that from which he may live is bound to provide for him from his own property until he has obtained some title.

Alexander III, in the Lateran Council.

If a bishop ordains anyone as deacon or presbyter without a certain title from which he may receive the necessities of life, let him furnish necessities to him until he assigns him in some church suitable stipends of clerical service, unless perhaps the one so ordained can have the support of life from his own or his paternal inheritance.

> Qui ordinavit aliquem ad sacros ordines sine titulo, non habentem de suo unde vivat, providere tenetur ei de suo, donec aliquem titulum fuerit consecutus.
>
> Alexander III. in concilio Lateranensi.
>
> Episcopus, si aliquem sine certo titulo, de quo necessaria vitae percipiat, in diaconum vel presbyterum ordinaverit, tamdiu ei necessaria subministret, donec in aliqua ecclesia ei convenientia stipendia militiae clericalis assignet, nisi talis forte ordinatus de sua vel paterna hereditate subsidium vitae possit habere.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: Bishops ought not to permit anyone to hold several churches.

The same, in the same council.

Because the ambition of certain men has now advanced so far that they are reported to have not two or three but six or more churches, although they cannot expend the provision owed upon even two, we command that this be corrected through our [most beloved] brothers and fellow bishops; and we wish the lack of those who are able to serve churches [worthily] to be relieved from the multitude of prebends, which is hostile to the canons, introduces matter for dissolution and wandering, and contains a certain danger of souls.

> Non debent episcopi permittere, quem plures ecclesias obtinere.
> Idem in eodem.

Quia in tantum quorundam iam processit ambitio, ut non duas vel tres, sed sex aut plures ecclesias perhibeantur habere, quum nec duabus possint debitam provisionem impendere, per fratres et coepiscopos nostros [carissimos] hoc emendari praecipimus, et de multitudine praebendarum canonibus inimica, quae dissolutionis materiam et evagationis inducit, certumque continet periculum animarum, eorum, qui ecclesiis [digne] deservire valeant, indigentiam volumus sublevari.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: By mandate of the Pope, one is not bound to provide for him who concealed a benefice in the letters, or for whom provision cannot be made without scandal. This it says; and in its last point this text is always to be held in mind.

The same.

Since we are bound by the duty of the governance undertaken to attend to the provision of clerics, we direct our writings for them to you and to other prelates of churches, and sometimes even concerning the provision of those who are known to have another sufficient benefice. But because sometimes we do not know that those for whom we write to you and other prelates of churches have another benefice, if you have received our requests and mandate for the provision of someone, or shall at some time receive them, who has another benefice from which he is able to be suitably sustained, unless perhaps mention of this is made in the letters themselves, or if provision cannot be made for him without scandal, we bear it with equanimity if you have not thought that our requests and mandate should be executed for him.

Ad mandatum Papae non tenetur quis providere illi, qui beneficium in literis tacuit, vel cui sine scandalo provideri non potest. H. d. et in ultimo est iste textus semper menti tenendus.

Idem.

Quum teneamur +ex debito suscepti regiminis provisioni clericorum intendere, tibi et aliis ecclesiarum praelatis pro eis scripta nostra dirigimus, et interdum etiam super illorum provisione, qui aliud sufficiens beneficium habere noscuntur. Verum quia aliquando ignoramus, eos habere aliud beneficium, pro quibus tibi et aliis ecclesiarum praelatis scribimus , Si preces et mandatum nostrum pro alicuius provisione receperis vel aliquando recipies, qui aliud beneficium habeat, de quo valeat commode sustentari, nisi forte in literis ipsis de hoc mentio habeatur, aut si non potest ei sine scandalo provideri, aequanimiter sustinemus, si pro eo preces et mandatum nostrum non duxeris exsequendum.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: One having several churches is compelled to choose one and relinquish the other.

The same.

Upon the report of I., a presbyter and bearer of the present letters, we learned that, although he had two churches, your archdeacon despoiled him of one of them and assigned the same to a certain presbyter named G.; but the aforesaid I., perceiving that he was burdened in this respect, appealed to the metropolitan, namely the Archbishop of Reims. And when the same I. had been restored to the aforesaid church by mandate of the same archbishop, the aforesaid G. appealed to our hearing. But afterward the aforesaid archdeacon bound the same I. with the bond of excommunication because, when summoned to his presence so that he might grant to the aforesaid G. one of the aforesaid churches, he disdained to come. But we, causing him to be absolved from the sentence by which he was bound, have thought that the same man should be remitted to you. Wherefore we command you that, the parties having been summoned before your presence, after one of the aforesaid churches, whichever he wishes, has been left to the aforesaid I. with its appurtenances, you do not delay in assigning the other to the aforesaid G., if he has no church; otherwise, without delay assign it to another suitable person lacking an ecclesiastical benefice.

> Habens plures ecclesias alteram eligere et alteram dimittere compellitur.
>
> Idem.
>
> Referente I. presbytero latore praesentium, accepimus, quod, quum, duas haberet ecclesias, archidiaconus tuus ipsum altera illarum spoliavit, et cuidam presbytero G. nomine assignavit eandem, praedictus autem I., sentiens se in hac parte, gravari, ad metropolitanum, videlicet Remensem archiepiscopum appellavit. Quumque idem I. de mandato eiusdem archiepiscopi in praedicta ecclesia restitutus fuisset, memoratus G. ad nostram audientiam appellavit. Postea v ero praefatus archidiaconus eundem I. eo, quod ad praesentiam suam vocatus, ut alteram de praedictis ecclesiis praenominato G. concederet, venire contempsit, vinculo excommunicationis adstrinxit. Nos autem ipsum a sententia, qua tenebatur, facientes absolvi, eundem ad te duximus remittendum. Quocirca tibi mandamus, quatenus, partibus ante praesentiam tuam convocatis, praescripto I. de praedictis ecclesiis una, quam voluerit, cum pertinentiis suis relicta, alteram praefato G., si ecclesiam non habet, non differas assignare; alioquin ipsam alteri personae idoneae beneficio ecclesiastico carenti incunctanter assignes.

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: Prebends and dignities ought not to be divided, nor even exchanged.

The same, in the Council of Tours.

While the greater benefices of a church remain in their integrity, it seems exceedingly unbecoming that the prebends of lesser clerics should suffer division. Therefore, so that the Church may have unity established in its lesser members just as in its greater ones, we forbid the division of prebends or the exchange of dignities to take place.

> Praebendae et dignitates non debent dividi, nec etiam permutari.
>
> Idem in concilio Turonensi.
>
> Maioribus ecclesiae beneficiis in sua integritate manentibus indecorum nimis videtur, ut minorum clericorum praebendae patiantur sectionem. Idcirco, ut, sicut in magnis, ita quoque in minimis membris suis firmatam ecclesia habeat unitatem, divisionem praebendarum aut dignitatum permutationem fieri prohibemus.

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: One received as a canon by promise of the chapter ought, when the opportunity has offered itself, to have a prebend. See chapter 2, On the Granting of Prebends, in the Sixth Book, with the gloss.

The same, to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

It has been reported to our ears that, although our beloved son Master Ja. has been canonically instituted by you in your church and has full power as a canon in the choir, chapter, and other things whose use is common, you have not yet taken care to assign him a prebend according to your promise, although several prebends are said to have become vacant in that church after your promise. Therefore, because it is worthy and consonant with reason in every way that, after Master I. has been instituted a canon in your church and had from you a promise that the first prebend should be conferred upon him when one became vacant in that church, he ought to enjoy the integrity of a prebend, especially since, as is proposed to us, he is learned and discreet, by apostolic writings and by way of precept we command your fraternity that, if the same I. has been canonically instituted in your church and has power as a canon in the choir and chapter and in other things whose use is common, you liberally grant and assign him, according to your promise, a prebend if any of the old ones in that church is now vacant, or when one shall first become vacant there, every occasion and contradiction ceasing, in such a way that you can deservedly be commended for constancy and gravity and we are not compelled to write to you again because of this, because it is not fitting that one who is known to have been received as a canon should lack a prebend.

> Receptus in canonicum ex promissione capituli debet quando facultas se obtulerit, habere praebendam. Vid. cap. 2. de concess. praebend. in VI. cum gloss.
>
> Idem Cantuariensi Archiepiscopo.
>
> Relatum est +auribus nostris, quod, quum dilectus filius noster magister Ia. in ecclesia tua sit per te canonice institutus, et in choro, capitulo et aliis, quorum communis est usus, plenam, sicut canonicus habeat, potestatem, nondum sibi praebendam iuxta promissionem tuam assignare curasti, licet post promissum tuum plures praebendae in ipsa ecclesia vacasse dicantur. Quoniam igitur dignum est et omnimodis consentaneum rationi, ut, postquam magister I. in ecclesia tua canonicus est institutus, et a te habuit in promissis de conferenda sibi prima praebenda, quum in ecclesia ipsa vacaret, ut debeat praebendae integritate gaudere, praesertim quum, sicut nobis proponitur, literatus sit et discretus, fraternitati tuae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus, si idem I. in ecclesia tua est canonice institutus, et in choro et capitulo et in aliis, quorum usus est communis, potestatem sicut canonicus habet, ei praebendam, si qua de antiquis in ecclesia ipsa nunc vacat, vel quum ibi primo vacaverit, omni occasione et contradictione cessante secundum promissionem tuam concedas liberaliter et assignes ita, quod de constantia et gravitate possis merito commendari, et nos propter hoc iterato tibi scribere non compellamur, quia non est congruum, ut praebenda careat qui in canonicum noscitur esse receptus.

Chapter X

Latin source headnote: Religious cannot diminish the revenues of their churches with respect to the portion owed to rectors or vicars, nor divide parishes.

The same, to the Canons Regular and Monks of the Diocese of York.

The root of avarice, which is the service of idols, ought to be rooted out more diligently by those who, renouncing the vanities of the world, have chosen to serve the Lord in religious habit. We have understood, however, that in your churches from which you have been accustomed to receive fixed pensions, you have diminished the portions or ancient revenues that certain clerics of those churches are known formerly to have had. Therefore, because this proceeds from the root of avarice and cupidity, which you ought to avoid in every way, by apostolic writings and by way of precept we command your fraternity that, if you have presumed unduly, without the counsel or consent of your archbishop, after he obtained the archbishopric, to diminish any portions or ancient revenues of clerics or to divide parishes, you restore them to their former integrity, and preserve intact and unimpaired the reasonable and ancient pensions of the clerics who ought to serve at the altars; and in churches from which you have been accustomed to receive fixed pensions from them, in no way diminish by rash presumption the portions or ancient revenues that clerics had in them before the time of that archbishop and after he obtained the archbishopric, and do not presume in any way to divide the parishes of churches by your own authority.

> Religiosi reditus ecclesiarum suarum diminuere non possunt respectu portionis, quae debetur rectoribus seu vicariis, nec parochias dividere.
>
> Idem Canonicis regularibus et Monachis Eboracensis dioecesis.
>
> Avaritiae, quae est idolorum servitus, +ii debent radicem studiosius exstirpare, qui saeculi vanitatibus renunciantes Domino elegerunt in religionis habitu militare. Intelleximus autem, quod in ecclesiis vestris, de quibus certas pensiones consuevistis percipere, portiones vel antiquos reditus minorastis, quos nonnulli clerici ecclesiarum ipsarum olim habuisse noscuntur. Ideoque, quoniam hoc ex radice avaritiae et cupiditatis procedit, quam debetis modis omnibus evitare, fraternitati vestrae per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandamus, quatenus, si quas portiones vel antiquos reditus clericorum indebite sine consilio vel consensu archiepiscopi vestri, postquam ipse archiepiscopatum habuerit, minuere vel parochias dividere praesumpsistis, eas ad integritatem pristinam revocetis, et rationabiles et antiquas pensiones clericorum, qui debent altaribus deservire, integras et illibatas servetis, et in ecclesiis de quibus certas eis pensiones soliti estis percipere, portiones vel antiquos reditus, quos in illis clerici ante tempora ipsius archiepiscopi et postquam adeptus est archiepiscopatum habuerant, nullatenus praesumptione temeraria minuatis, ne parochias ecclesiarum auctoritate vestra dividere aliquatenus praesumatis.

Chapter XI

Latin source headnote: A prelate and chapter can impose an honorable burden upon a vacant prebend, to which the prebendary is bound.

The same, to the Provost and Chapter of Lille.

It was signified to us that, by common [consent and] will, you gave one prebend in your church to a certain priest in such a way indeed that he ought to celebrate the Mass of Saint Mary daily unless burdened by bodily infirmity, and could not relinquish your church except by the common consent both of the provost and of the chapter, or delegate the anniversary of that prebend to anyone. We confirm this institution to this extent: that the aforesaid priest, unless impeded by bodily infirmity, ought assiduously to render his service to the aforesaid church and, as frequently as he can, with his honorable conduct and due devotion preserved, celebrate the solemnities of Masses; nor is it lawful for him to withdraw this service from it, whether for the sake of pleasure or by transferring himself to another church.

> Possunt praelatus et capitulum praebendae vacanti honestum onus imponere, ad quod praebendarius teneatur.
>
> Idem Praeposito et Capitulo Insulensibus.
>
> Significatum est nobis, quod cuidam sacerdoti praebendam unam in ecclesia vestra communi [consensu et] voluntate dedistis, ita quidem, quod missam de sancta Maria, nisi corporis infirmitate gravatus sit, debeat quotidie celebrare, et ecclesiam vestram non nisi communi tam propositi quam capituli consensu possit dimittere, vel cuiquam praebendae illius anniversarium delegare. Quam siquidem institutionem eatenus confirmamus, ut praedictus sacerdos, nisi infirmitate corporis fuerit impeditus, assidue debeat obsequium suum impendere ecclesiae memoratae, et, quanto frequentius potest, salva honestate sua et debita devotione missarum solennia celebrare, nec sibi liceat hoc illi subtrahere, sive causa voluptatis, sive se ad aliam ecclesiam transferendo.

Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: Upon the presentation of religious, no one ought to be instituted by the bishop in their churches unless a fitting portion of the revenues is first assigned to him.

The same, to the Archbishop of Worcester.

Concerning the monks, however, who burden vicars of parish churches to such an extent that they cannot maintain hospitality or have an honorable sustenance, you are to have that care and providence that you receive no one upon presentation of the monks unless so much from the revenues of the church has been assigned to him before you that he can pay the episcopal dues and have a fitting and sufficient sustenance. But from those priests to whom the care of souls has been committed by you or your predecessors in churches of the monks, you will be able to withdraw it unless an honorable and sufficient sustenance has been assigned to them by the monks.

> Ad praesentationem religiosorum in eorum ecclesiis nullus debet institui per episcopum, nisi prius ei congrua portio redituum assignetur.
>
> Idem Vigoriensi Archiepiscopo.
>
> De monachis autem, qui vicarios parochialium ecclesiarum in tantum gravant, ut hospitalitatem tenere non possint, nec honestam sustentationem habere, eam curam et providentiam habeas, quod ad praesentationem monachorum nullum recipias, nisi tantum ei de proventibus ecclesiae coram te fuerit assignatum, unde iura episcopalia possit persolvere, et congruam atque sufficientem sustentationem habere. Illis autem sacerdotibus quibus a te vel praedecessoribus tuis in ecclesiis monachorum cura est animarum commissa, eam subtrahere poteris, nisi ipsis a monachis honesta et sufficiens sustentatio fuerit assignata.

Chapter XIII

Latin source headnote: No one can have several dignities or personates in one or in diverse churches.

The same, to the Archbishop of Salerno.

To these matters: although that custom is not consonant with reason according to which, if a cleric dies from the Kalends of March to the Kalends of November, he grants, according to his own will, the right to receive the entire benefice that he has for that year, nevertheless, because it is preserved in many churches, you will be able sufficiently to tolerate it in your archbishopric, especially if at his death the cleric is burdened by a load of debts. And it is contrary to all reason that one cleric should hold several dignities or personates in one church or in diverse churches, since each office in churches requires the assiduity of persons.

> Plures dignitates vel personatus in una vel in diversis ecelesiis quis habere non potest.
>
> Idem Salernitano Archiepiscopo.
>
> Ad haec licet +consuetudo illa non sit consona rationi, secundum quam si clericus, a Kalendis Martiis usque ad Kalendas Novembris decesserit, totum beneficium quod habet anno illo percipere, pro sua voluntate largitur; quia tamen in multis ecclesiis conservatur, eam satis in archiepiscopatu tuo poteris tolerare, praesertim si clericus in decessu suo gravetur onere debitorum. Et Illud est omni rationi contrarium, ut unus clericus in una ecclesia vel in diversis ecclesiis plures dignitates vel personatus obtineat, quum singula officia in ecclesiis assiduitatem exigant personarum.

Chapter XIV

Latin source headnote: One having several dignities is compelled to relinquish one.

The same, to the Archbishop of Bordeaux.

Furthermore, concerning Archdeacon G., who has been constituted archdeacon in your church and that of Toulouse and has been regularly professed in each church, and who, after collecting those things that he can collect in the archdeaconry of your church, returns to Toulouse without your knowledge and remains there for a year or more, we command your prudence that you cause the same G., if the matter is so, to be content with one archdeaconry, whichever he prefers, occasion and appeal ceasing.

> Habens plures dignitates alteram dimittere compellitur.
>
> Idem Burdegalensi Archiepiscopo.
>
> Praeterea de archidiacono G., qui in tua et Tolosana ecclesia est archidiaconus constitutus, et in utraque ecclesia regulariter professus, collectis illis, quae in archidiaconatu ecclesiae tuae colligere potest, praeter conscientiam tuam Tolosam regreditur, et ibi per annum vel eo amplius moratur, prudentiae tuae mandamus, quatenus eundem G., si res ita se habet, altero, quem maluerit, archidiaconatu occasione et appellatione cessante facias esse contentum.

Chapter XV

Latin source headnote: If one elected to a second church is unwilling to relinquish the first, the electors can withdraw and not accept the elect.

The same, to the Archbishop of Genoa.

Since you are not unaware that one church ought to belong to one priest, we regard it as astonishing and unworthy if you wish to grant one person a place in several churches and introduce into your episcopate the custom of the Gallican Church, which, since it receives one person to several benefices contrary to the statutes of the sacred canons, is not approved by us, although it cannot be corrected because of the multitude of delinquents. Therefore, since the messenger of that presbyter who contends that he has a place in two churches, and certain clerics of the other church in which he said that he had a place, have come to our presence against him, we, considering that it is not fitting or honorable for the same presbyter to have a place in two churches, will and command that you cause him to remain content with that benefice which he has. But if perhaps the archpriest and clerics of the other church consented to him, since they now dissent, to their scandal, he ought not [either] to seek or have a place in that church.

> Si electus ad secundam ecclesiam noluerit dimittere primam, eligentes possunt resilire, et electum non acceptare.
>
> Idem Genuensi Archiepiscopo.
>
> Quum non ignores, quod una ecclesia unius debeat esse sacerdotis, +mirabile gerimus et indignum, si uni personae locum in pluribus ecclesiis velis concedere, et in episcopatu tuo inducere consuetudinem ecclesiae Gallicanae, quae, quum unum ad plura recipiat beneficia contra sacrorum canonum instituta, non comprobatur a nobis, licet non possit prae multitudine delinquentium emendari. Quum igitur nuncius illius presbyteri, qui in duabus ecclesiis locum habere contendit, et quidam clerici alterius ecclesiae, in qua locum se habere dicebat, ad nostram praesentiam accesserint contra eum, nos attendentes, non esse conveniens vel honestum, ut idem presbyter locum habeat in duabus ecclesiis, volumus et mandamus, quatenus ipsum illo beneficio, quod habet, facias manere contentum. Quodsi forte archipresbyter et clerici alterius ecclesiae in eum consenserint, eis nunc dissentientibus, cum ipsorum scandalo non debet locum in ipsa ecclesia [vel] quaerere vel habere.

Chapter XVI

Latin source headnote: When someone has been ordained to sacred orders by a bishop without a title, no one presenting him, the ordainer or his successor is compelled to provide necessities until he has a title.

Innocent III, to the Bishop of Zamora.

Since according to the Apostle one who serves the altar ought to live from the altar, and one who is chosen for the burden ought not to be repelled from the reward, it is apparent by similitude that clerics ought to live from the patrimony of Jesus Christ, to whose service they are assigned, as the very rationale of the name persuades. For since clerics are named from κλῆρος, which is lot or inheritance, because in their ordination either they are taken into the Lord's inheritance or obtain an inheritance in him, so that they can truly sing with the Prophet, saying, "The Lord is the portion of my inheritance," it is worthy that they be sustained by the stipends of the church in which and through which they are enrolled in divine services. But although our predecessors wished the ordinations of those who are promoted without a certain title to be void and empty, to the injury of the ordainers, we nevertheless, desiring to act more benignly, will that those ordained be provided for by the ordainers or their successors until through them they obtain ecclesiastical benefices, lest perhaps we seem with hardened face to neglect the cries of poor clerics, which we believe enter the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth. Hence it is that, since the beloved son G., bearer of the present letters, was, as he asserts, promoted to the subdiaconate by G. of good memory, your predecessor, no one presenting him, [and has obtained no ecclesiastical benefice,] through apostolic writings we command your fraternity that, if those to whom we have thought that his examination should be committed, after you have lawfully been cited so that you may be present personally or through a suitable representative and may be permitted to propose whatever you reasonably think should be proposed concerning both the suitability of the person and the amount of the benefice, find him suitable and not unworthy of ecclesiastical benefice, you suitably furnish him the necessities of life until through you he has obtained a competent ecclesiastical benefice in the church of Zamora or in another, knowing for certain that, if through their examination he is found suitable and you neglect to provide for him according to our mandate, when this becomes known to us through their letters we shall compel you by ecclesiastical severity to execute it, because, just as we do not wish to command unjust things, so, when we command just things, we wish to be heard effectually. [Given at the Lateran, on the third day before the Nones of April, 1198.]

Ordinato ad sacros per episcopum sine titulo, nemine praesentante, ordinator vel successor compellitur in necessariis providere, donec titulum habuerit.

Innocentius III. Zamorensi Episcopo.

Quum secundum Apostolum qui altario servit vivere debeat de altari, et qui ad onus eligitur repelli non debeat a mercede, patet a simili, ut clerici vivere debeant de patrimonio Iesu Christi, cuius obsequio deputantur, ut ipsa nominis ratio persuadet. Quum enim a κλῆρος, quod est sors vel hereditas, clerici appellentur, quia in sui ordinatione vel assumuntur in hereditatem Domini, vel assequuntur hereditatem in ipso, ut vere possint psallere cum Propheta, dicente: " Dominus pars hereditatis meae, " dignum est, ut ecclesiae stipendiis sustententur, in qua et per quam divinis obsequiis adscribuntur. Licet autem praedecessores nostri ordinationes eorum, qui sine certo titulo promoventur, in iniuriam ordinantium irritas esse voluerint et inanes, nos tamen, benignius agere cupientes, tam diu per ordinatores vel successores eorum provideri volumus ordinatis, donec per eos ecclesiastica beneficia consequantur, ne forte clamores clericorum pauperum, quos in aures Domini Sabaoth credimus introire indurata facie negligere videamur. Inde est, quod, quum dilectus filius G. lator praesentium a bonae memoriae G. praedecessore tuo, sicut asserit, fuerit ad subdiaconatum nullo praesentante promotus, [nec ullum sit ecclesiasticum beneficium assecutus,] fraternitati tuae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus, si eum hi, quibus examinationem ipsius duximus committendam, te citato legitime, ut per te ipsum vel idoneum responsalem intersis, et tam super idoneitate personae quam etiam super quantitate beneficii proponere tibi liceat quicquid rationabiliter duxeris proponendum, idoneum esse repererint et ecclesiastico beneficio non indignum, tam diu ei vitae necessaria congrue subministres, donec per te in Zamorensi ecclesia vel in alia fuerit competens beneficium ecclesiasticum assecutus, sciturus pro certo, quod, si per examinationem eorum fuerit repertus idoneus, et tu ei iuxta mandatum nostrum neglexeris providere, quum hoc nobis per literas eorum innotuerit, ad id exsequendum te per districtionem ecclesiasticam compellemus, quia, sicut nolumus iniusta praecipere, sic, quum iusta praecipimus, volumus efficaciter exaudiri. [Dat. Lat. III. Non. April. 1198.]

Chapter XVII

Latin source headnote: One who knowingly conferred upon an ignorant person a prebend that he could not confer, when that prebend has been evicted, is bound to confer another that he can confer. This it says, and it is a singular disposition.

The same, to the Archbishop of Sens.

Among other things, [by which we are instructed for the governance of the universal Church, he whose grace, not our merit, advanced us to its governance left us a wondrous and marvelous example of his kindness, namely in this: that, just as we see was done by the Lord concerning Blessed Peter, whose successors we are, though unworthy, he chose the weak things of the world so that he might confound every strong thing, mercifully foreseeing that he who before his calling had sustained the weight of secular passions, having experienced the frailty of the human condition, would know better how to suffer with his brothers and more suitably how to pity them, while, conscious of himself, he would have in himself manifest proof in similar things. Setting these things before our eyes, after our beloved son P. de Cassaneto explained to us the sequence of his business, we were moved by paternal piety toward him. Since certainty concerning the matter that we had handled while we formerly discharged a lesser office supported his account in part with testimony of fuller credibility, we assumed the endeavor of a more solicitous mind to assist him and relieve his useless labors, lest his pitiable affliction, which was already threatening him with doubtful perplexity, complain that the Apostolic See was devoid of its customary mercy and the remedy owed.] Indeed, we believe it to be sufficiently known to you how, after G. (de Bochar), formerly a canon of Laon, [the beloved son,] had resigned the prebend of that church, which by an exchange of prebends ought by apostolic authority to have been assigned to the beloved son H., then a Siclunian canon, by the dean of Reims of good memory, Master P. was invested with that same prebend by [our venerable brother] the Bishop of Laon, and was invested both in choir and in chapter by the dean and canons of Laon, the due solemnities having been employed according to the custom of the church of Laon. When a controversy concerning this had arisen between the master himself and the said H., [and an appeal had been interposed to the Apostolic See, although the same master, coming to the same See with great labors and expenses, after a long wait that, with the inclemency of a dangerous season threatening, afflicted him with much weariness and the hardships of diverse persecutions and brought him almost to extremity, had completed his business against the aforesaid H. according to his desire, nevertheless, when he was afterward absent because of illness, at the instance of the often-mentioned H.,

then present at the Apostolic See,] all things were retracted by Pope C. of good memory, our predecessor, [by counsel of the brothers,] and thus the master himself was wholly frustrated of his hope [and after his deprivation was compelled to approach the Apostolic See again, seeing that no remedy remained for him unless the Apostolic See should think that merciful provision ought to be made for his manifold desolation. Therefore, because of these and many other things that rendered his cause favorable, we, bearing a paternal affection toward him, by mandate strictly command the aforesaid dean and canons of Laon that they have the same master, who is known to have been instituted in that church by the said bishop and admitted by them as a brother, as a canon both in choir and in chapter, with that which the Apostolic See definitively adjudged concerning the aforesaid H. preserved, notwithstanding anyone's appeal or contradiction, and treat him with fraternal charity in the other things that pertain to a canon. Furthermore, we firmly forbid them to presume in any way to receive anyone as a canon until the aforesaid master has fully obtained the benefice of a prebend in the aforesaid church. Hence, by apostolic writings and by way of precept, we command your fraternity that, if the aforesaid dean and chapter neglect to fulfill our mandate, you do not omit, after diligent admonition has first been made, to compel them by ecclesiastical severity, with the obstacle of appeal removed, to carry out his reception as has been said, restraining by the same censure any who think that they should oppose the apostolic mandate. Know, moreover, that, because we do not wish the same bishop to be able to excuse himself under occasion of some promise or by authority of any rescript obtained from the Apostolic See in order to elude our mandate,] we have given the aforesaid bishop a strict command that, until the same master has obtained a prebendal benefice in that church, he is not to presume to assign a prebend to anyone else in any manner whatsoever; but if perhaps he presumes to do so, we decree it [wholly] null and void. For it is fitting that, because he assigned him a prebend that he could not assign by law, he assign him one that he can assign by law, lest he seem to have assigned him a prebend fraudulently. Chapter XVIII

Latin source headnote: The election of one who possesses several dignities and prebends is quashed, and likewise if he is held by any vice written here.

The same, to the Bishop and Cantor of Tournai.

Since some time ago [a question had been brought to the Apostolic See concerning the election of the beloved son I. de Bethunia to the provostship of Siclinium, because omission had been made concerning this, the names of the dignities in which the same I. is said to abound having been suppressed, and after an appeal interposed to us confirmation had been obtained from the beloved sons the dean and provost of Soissons, it was established by common deliberation that the commissory letters, as obtained by surreption, should lack the weight of firmness, as should what had followed from them. Moreover, when the beloved sons R., a canon of Siclinium, for himself, and R. the archdeacon and Master W., his canons, with their letters of ratification, and Nicholas, a canon of the same church who asserted that he was the messenger of the aforesaid I., came because of this to the Roman Church, we thereafter gave them our beloved brother Hugh, cardinal presbyter of the title of Saint Martin, as auditor. In his presence, many things proposed on either side having been reduced to writing and also reported to us in summary, because a proctor appeared from only one party, the other not appearing through contumacy, we ought not to have defined anything concerning the principal business, since the merits of causes are disclosed by the assertions of the parties.] But because certain things were objected by the already-mentioned R., canon of Siclinium, against the aforesaid I. de Bethunia, which it was not fitting to pass over in silence, namely the multitude both of dignities and of prebends, the vice of ambition and avarice, to which he has not yet set an end, and because, contrary to the tenor of our definition and the statutes of the Lateran Council, he thrusts and has thrust himself forward to obtain the provostship of Siclinium, and because [on] the day of his intrusion he presumed to minister before confirmation, as also after the confirmation had been quashed, which he obtained from the judges of Soissons, [having been obtained, we] command you through apostolic writings that, if you find that the aforesaid I. has several other dignities and prebends, or find to be true any other of the foregoing things sufficient for his quashing, you impose silence upon him concerning the aforesaid provostship, with the obstacle of appeal removed, absolving the church of Siclinium from his suit, since many things are tolerated through patience that, if brought into judgment, ought not to be tolerated when justice requires.

Chapter XIX

Latin source headnote: A prebend is owed to one received as a canon as soon as the opportunity offers itself, and meanwhile he will have the daily distributions.

The same, to the Archbishop and Archdeacon of Sens.

The beloved son T., a canon of Lincoln, established in our presence, proposed that, although by mandate of Pope C. of good memory, our predecessor, G., formerly Bishop of Lincoln, assigned him a certain prebend in the church of Lincoln, and the same was confirmed to him by our aforesaid predecessor, because the chapter of Lincoln disdained to receive him to that prebend, the beloved sons the abbots of Clairvaux and Longpont, by authority [of our aforesaid] predecessor, when it was unwilling in any way to cease from contradiction, subjected it to ecclesiastical interdict. But afterward, coming to our presence, he obtained our writings to the beloved sons the abbots of Melun and Quincy. But when he could not obtain his justice through them, we gave a mandate, as he asserts, to our venerable brother the Archbishop of Reims, cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, then Bishop of Palestrina and legate of the Apostolic See, that he cause the aforesaid sentence of interdict, as it had reasonably been promulgated, to be firmly observed with appeal set aside. But when the same archbishop prolonged the business and the same man, after manifold labors, had almost despaired of advancing the business, failing in expenses, at the instance and by the authority of the Archbishop of Reims, then Bishop of Palestrina and legate of the Apostolic See, such a settlement intervened between him, T. on one side, and our venerable brother R., the bishop, and the beloved sons the canons of Lincoln on the other: that, after he had been received by them as a canon and as a brother through the hand of the aforesaid archbishop, and a stall in choir and participation in all divine things had been granted to him, he ought not to receive the fruits of any prebend of the same church except in the place of the next one to become vacant. But although we love the aforesaid archbishop in the Lord with sincere charity and wish to defer to his honor, nevertheless, because in those things that are known to be attempted contrary to canonical sanctions we neither wish nor ought to defer to him, we have thought that what was done unlawfully by him in this matter should be annulled, while approving what was done lawfully. Therefore, since the reception of the said T. as a canon and as a brother does not oppose canonical statutes, while there is no doubt that awaiting a prebend to become vacant opposes the Lateran Council, we, disapproving the unlawful act of the same legate and approving what is lawful, because it seems unworthy that one who has been received as a canon should be defrauded of the benefice of a prebend, command your discretion through apostolic writings that you compel the said bishop and canons of Lincoln, if what is asserted is true, after admonition has been given, by ecclesiastical censure, with appeal set aside, not to delay in assigning him a prebend when the opportunity offers itself, causing the daily portions made in the aforesaid church to be assigned to him without any diminution, restraining contradictors by ecclesiastical censure with appeal set aside. [Given at Rome, at Saint Peter's, on the thirteenth day before the Kalends of May, in the ninth year, 1206.]

Latin source headnote: An election does not hold when two persons are elected simply to one prebend.

The same, to the Bishop of Brescia.

The devotion of your fraternity—(And below: [Cf. c. 10, On Him Who Knew His Wife by Consanguinity, IV. 13.]) Furthermore, you consulted whether, since it often happens that two clerics are elected to one prebend because of the excessive importunity of petitioners, such an election is to be confirmed or rather annulled. We, therefore, considering that, if two held one prebend, that would be contrary to the Council of Tours, which forbids the division of prebends, and, if one of them obtained the prebend itself, the other would remain in expectation contrary to the statutes of the Lateran Council, answer your inquiry thus: that such an election is wholly to be quashed by rigor of law. [Furthermore, etc. Given at Rome, etc., 1206.]

Non tenet electio, quum ad unam praebendam duo simpliciter eliguntur.

[Ceterum etc. Dat. Rom. etc. 1206.]

Chapter XXI

Latin source headnote: If two persons elected to some dignity submit to judges by compromise, the judge can confirm one and, for the good of peace, make provision for the other from the revenues. This is a most beautiful disposition, and you do not have one similar in the whole body of law.

The same.

Unless both those who made the ordinance and those concerning whom the ordinance was made in your church regarding the business of the priorship were provident and honorable men, we would hold that ordinance very suspect because of the destructiveness of the example. Therefore, what after prolonged contention was ordained concerning one of the two elect, that he should have the priorship, seems to have been established according to justice by delegated jurisdiction. But what was ordained concerning the other, that he should receive annually twenty pounds from the revenues of the chapter and forty pounds from the revenues of the priorship, is understood to have been commanded according to providence by arbitral power, since submission had been made to the delegates, who confess that, while retaining the authority committed to them, they ordained this for the good of peace and utility. Therefore, because this ordinance has been received by all, and the prior and chapter can lawfully furnish provision of this kind from their revenues for the aforesaid causes—not indeed by agreement of the parties but by command of the judges—we tolerate it with this moderation employed: that not the dignity of the priorship but the person of the prior remain burdened with the payment of forty pounds, lest perhaps [even] concerning the revenues some division of the priorship seem to have been made, such that, when that prior is dead, his successor is in no way bound to the payment of forty pounds. [Given at Rome, at Saint Peter's, on the seventh day before the Ides of February, in the ninth year, 1207.]

> Si duo electi ad aliquam dignitatem compromittant in iudices, poterit iudex alterum confirmare, et alteri pro bono pacis de proventibus provisionem facere. Ista est pulcherrima dispositio, et in toto corpore iuris non habes consimilem.

> Nisi essent viri providi et honesti tam ii, qui ordinationem fecerunt, quam illi, circa quos est facta ordinatio in ecclesia vestra super negotio prioratus, ordinationem illam valde suspectam propter exempli perniciem haberemus. Quod ergo post concertationem diutinam ordinatum est circa unum de duobus electis, ut ipse habeat prioratum, hoc ex iurisdictione delegata secundum iustitiam videtur esse statutum. Quod autem ordinatum est circa reliquum, ut ipse viginti libras de reditibus capituli, et quadraginta libras de proventibus prioratus percipiat annuatim, hoc secundum providentiam intelligitur esse praeceptum ex arbitraria potestate, quum in delegatos fuerit compromissum, qui, auctoritatem sibi retinendo commissam, se pro bono pacis et utilitatis hoc ordinasse fatentur. Quia igitur haec ordinatio ab omnibus est recepta, possuntque licite prior et capitulum de proventibus suis propter causas praedictas, non quidem ex pactione partium, sed ex iussione iudicum provisionem huiusmodi exhibere, nos eam hoc adhibito moderamine toleramus, ut ad praestationem quadraginta librarum non dignitas prioratus, sed persona pri oris maneat onerata, ne forte [vel] circa proventus aliqua videatur facta sectio prioratus ita, quod ipso priore defuncto successor ipsius ad praestationem quadraginta librarum minime teneatur. Chapter XXII

Latin source headnote: Canons privileged by the Pope concerning a certain number, if they voluntarily received someone beyond the number, cannot use the exception of number against those obtaining provision from the Pope.

The same, to the Bishop of Valence and the Abbot of Vatian.

For the provision of those—(And below:) For the beloved son Master P. Audoen., who is known to have made a longer stay at the Apostolic See and had not yet obtained a competent ecclesiastical benefice, although he was suitable to obtain it, by our letters and by way of precept we commanded the Archbishop of Bordeaux to cause a competent benefice to be assigned to Master P. in one of his churches where he recognized it to be expedient for him, every delay and excuse having been set aside, and the obstacle of anyone's contradiction and appeal having been removed, restraining by ecclesiastical severity contradictors who should think rashly to oppose him concerning this. But the archbishop himself, as he intimated to us by his letters, considering the knowledge and probity of the aforesaid master and recognizing him as suitable to obtain such a benefice, after receipt of our mandate, commanded the dean and chapter of Saintes by our authority to admit him as a canon and brother out of reverence for the Apostolic See and to treat him with fraternal charity. And when those canons resisted his requests and our mandates and opposed to him an indulgence concerning a number of forty canons, which they boast that they have from the Apostolic See, because the same archbishop manifestly recognized that they, in elusion of our mandate, were irreverently abusing as their own the indulgence granted to them, and it was clearly established for him that at that time there were not merely forty canons in the same church but more, he invested the aforesaid master with a prebend and canonry of the church of Saintes with your consent and will, brother bishop, and by counsel of prudent men, binding contradictors with the bond of excommunication. (And below:) But because we wish what was providently done by the said archbishop concerning the aforesaid master by our authority to obtain due firmness, through apostolic writings we command and more strictly enjoin your discretion that, if it is established for you that the aforesaid canons did not observe the indulgence they have concerning a certain number of canons and received someone as a canon beyond the established number by their own authority, since they ought not to impose upon us a law that they themselves neglect to observe, you declare that the sentence of excommunication pronounced against them by the aforesaid archbishop is, by our authority, to be observed, with the obstacle of any contradiction and appeal removed, until they receive the often-mentioned master as a canon and take care to assign him those things that pertain to the canonicate, with a stall in choir and a place in chapter.

The same, to the Bishop of Zamora.

Coming to the Apostolic See, the beloved son B., a brother of the Hospital of Jerusalem, asked us on your behalf whether an absent cleric can, for the sake of studies, be invested with an ecclesiastical benefice, and whether, if an abducted girl, carried into another diocese, consents to her abductor in the face of the Church, a marriage of this kind is to be held lawful. We therefore answer your inquiry thus: that both an absent cleric can be invested with an ecclesiastical benefice through another, or another, rather, for him. And an abducted girl, etc. (Cf. c. 7, On Abduction, V. 17.)

Absenti potest conferri beneficium, alio mediante, nec refert, utrum absens investiatur per personam mediam, vel persona media investiatur pro absente. H. d. coniungendo utrumque intellectum, et est casus not. et quotidie practicatur.

Idem Episcopo Zamorensi.

Accedens ad apostolicam sedem +dilectus filius B. frater Hierosolymitani hospitalis a nobis ex parte tua quaesivit, utrum clericus absens gratia studiorum de ecclesiastico beneficio possit investiri, et utrum, si rapta puella et in alienam delata dioecesim in ecclesiae facie consenserit in raptorem, matrimonium huiusmodi legitimum sit habendum. Nos igitur Inquisitioni tuae taliter respondemus, quod et clericus absens per alium, vel alius, magis pro ipso poterit de beneficio ecclesiastico in vestiri. *Et rapta puella etc. * (cf. c. 7. de rapt. V. 17.)

Chapter XXV

Latin source headnote: If two persons are received simply to one canonicate and prebend, the reception does not hold, even when apostolic authority intervenes. This it says, and it is a noteworthy chapter; therefore always hold it in mind and note it.

The same, to the Bishop of Troyes.

The beloved son P., our cardinal presbyter of the title of Saint Pudentiana, having been appointed auditor for the beloved sons R. [de Avalon], cellarer of Troyes, and R. [de Noa], a cleric, your proctor, the same cellarer proposed before him that, when he freely resigned into the hands of the Archbishop of Reims, then legate of the Apostolic See and intending to provide for his nephew G. in the church of Troyes, the prebend that he held there, the said legate instituted the aforesaid G. and the same cellarer as canons of Troyes, and the chapter of Troyes assigned to both a stall in choir and a place in chapter, and the same archbishop assigned the fruits of the aforesaid prebend to be divided in common until the same G. had obtained the full prebendal stipend of the church, a sentence of excommunication having been promulgated against those who should presume to contravene. The general proctor of your predecessor [of good memory], who was then acting in the regions of Constantinople, afterward approved their reception. The said cellarer is also known [afterward] to have read the lesson and Gospel in his week, and, as a canon of Troyes, was present both at the election of the dean and bishop and at the handling of other business, and obtained through the aforesaid chapter a certain house that was accustomed to be assigned only to a canon. And you, when after your consecration you came to the same church, received him with the other canons to the kiss, although at that time only canons were admitted to the kiss, and for two years you raised no question against him concerning the foregoing. On account of this he petitioned that we deign to restrain you from undue molestation of him concerning this. But the said R., your proctor, proposed in opposition that, when the same cellarer had resigned his prebend into the hands of the aforesaid Archbishop of Reims, the archbishop invested his nephew with one half [of it and the said cellarer with the other] half, [which he still presumes to retain to your prejudice and burden, not permitting you freely to dispose of it as is known to pertain to you. And although our letters concerning this had been obtained to the beloved sons the dean and Masters G. Cornutus, a canon of Paris, and S., a canon of Reims, the cellarer finally appealed to us for the sake of frustration, so that he might burden you with labors and expenses.] The same proctor of yours also proposed in opposition that, since a certain number of canons had formerly been established in the church of Troyes and fortified by oath of the chapter, the aforesaid archbishop, who, although he had been legate in Germany, nevertheless had not been enjoined the office of legation in the province of Sens, could not make an institution of this kind as legate; indeed, even if he had been legate in that province, it was not lawful for the aforesaid legate to institute two canons together to the one individual spiritual right that was vacant there, contrary to the canonical sanctions. For if two persons had one prebend, that would be contrary to the Council of Tours, which forbids the division of prebends. But if, after two persons had been received as canons and brothers, a prebend were given to one alone, the other would remain in expectation contrary to the Lateran Council. Furthermore, although in a church in which there is no certain number of prebends someone can be assumed as a canon even when no prebend is vacant, since he is understood to be elected to a certain right that is newly created by the consent of the electors, is born with the one elected as canon, and ends with the deceased, nevertheless in a church that has a determined number of prebends, when only one individual right is vacant, two cannot be elected together to it, because a spiritual right of this kind cannot be divided or shared between them; although sometimes those to whom the election pertains can by common consent increase the number of prebends by newly creating a certain spiritual right, unless perhaps some statute fortified by oath stood in the way, or one to which confirmation of the Apostolic See had been added, with a clause of prohibition of this kind appended, that, if anything were done contrary to it, it would not be valid. On this account the said proctor asserted that the aforesaid institution was null, since in the church of Troyes, as has been premised, there is a certain number of prebends that the chapter or legate in no way intended to increase or to create any new right, [which he proposed could be inferred from this: that one person was not instituted to the vacant prebend and the other simply, but both were received to the single prebend vacant in the aforesaid manner. Nor could the chapter of Troyes, to which the collation of prebends in no way pertained, or the said proctor of your predecessor approve a reception of this kind, as one attempted contrary to the canons. He said that it likewise in no way prejudiced you that you had admitted the aforesaid cellarer to the kiss among the canons of Troyes or that you had remained silent for some time concerning this business, since at that time you were ignorant of the customs of your church and of those things that had been done less lawfully in it. But to these things the cellarer answered thus: that, since the same archbishop had caused the letters of his legation to be read in the chapter of Troyes and at that time was held by all to be legate, whether he had been legate in that province ought not further to be called into doubt, especially since in the aforesaid letters that you had obtained against him you had thought that the aforesaid archbishop should be named legate. He added further that someone can lawfully be elected to spiritual fraternity as a canon and brother even when no prebend is vacant, adducing as an argument for this a certain decretal letter in which it is read that, when T., a cleric, while no prebend was vacant in the church of Lincoln, had been received as a canon and brother by the bishop and canons of Lincoln through the intervening authority of the aforesaid archbishop, a judge delegated by us, in such a way that he received the fruits of no prebend except in the place of the next one to become vacant, we, considering that the reception of the said T. as a canon and brother did not oppose canonical statutes and that there was no doubt that awaiting a vacant prebend opposed the Lateran Council, disapproving what was unlawful and approving what was lawful, since it seemed unworthy that one who had been received as a canon and brother should be defrauded of the benefice of a prebend, gave a mandate to the bishop and canons of Lincoln that, if the matter stood thus, they take care to assign to the same T. a prebend when the opportunity offered itself. He alleged further that letters of this kind are frequently obtained from the Apostolic See, that in a church in which there is a certain number of prebends, when no prebend is vacant, someone be received as a canon and brother and a prebend be conferred upon him when the opportunity offers itself. Likewise, although the Council of Tours forbids the division of prebends, nevertheless the Roman Church, by approving as canons the reception of those who were assumed to half prebends, sometimes commands that the divided prebends be made whole for them. But it was answered in opposition to this that, although the Roman Pontiff sometimes commands, contrary to the Council of Tours, that a prebend halved as regards temporal revenues be made whole for the one upon whom a vacant spiritual right had been conferred with due integrity, nevertheless, because someone was in fact received to a half prebend of this kind when he could not be so by law, he is in no way accustomed to command that; and from the fullness of power he can grant that someone be received to one spiritual right that is not vacant, utility or necessity having been weighed, as is found in the canon concerning Augustine, who, promoted and consecrated in a new manner, while Bishop Valerius of the church of Hippo remained unharmed, came into the episcopal chair but did not succeed him. And just as it is read in the decretal alleged above concerning a prebend not vacant but nevertheless granted and confirmed by the Roman Pontiff to a certain cleric in the church of Lincoln, and concerning his reception by the executor to that same prebend even though it was not vacant, nevertheless the aforesaid archbishop, even if he had been legate in the province, without at least our special license could not, contrary to the tenor of written law, institute his nephew and the aforesaid cellarer to the one spiritual right that was vacant in the aforesaid church, in which there was a certain number of prebends, since this opposed not only the Council of Tours but also the Lateran Council, especially since he intended neither to create a new right nor to increase the number of prebends, which is gathered from the fact that, after procuring the resignation of the cellarer, he instituted them to the one vacant prebend.] Hence, after we had understood these and other things, we thought that the aforesaid cellarer, who it was established had first freely resigned the prebend, should by definitive sentence be condemned, by counsel of our brothers, to restitution of those things that he held by reason of the aforesaid institution, imposing silence upon him concerning the prebend itself or a part of it, in such a way that through this no prejudice is generated against the aforesaid G., especially since a thing done between others regularly does not prejudice others, according to canonical and lawful sanctions. [Let no one therefore, etc. Given at Rome, at Saint Peter's, on the Kalends of May, in the thirteenth year of our pontificate, 1210.]

> Dilecto filio nostro P. tit. sanctae Pudentianae presbytero cardinali dilectis filiis R. [de Avalon] cellerario Trecensi et R. [de Noa] clerico procuratori tuo auditore concesso, idem cellerarius proposuit coram eo, quod, quum in manibus Remensis archiepiscopi, tunc apostolicae sedis legati, intendentis providere G. nepoti suo in Trecensi ecclesia, praebendam, quam ibi obtinebat, liberaliter resignavit, dictus legatus praefatum G. et eundem cellerarium in canonicos Trecenses instituit, et ambobus capitulum Trecense stallum in choro, et locum in capitulo, et idem archiepiscopus supra dictae praebendae fructus dividendos communiter assignarunt, donec idem G. integrum esset ecclesiae praebendale stipendium assecutus, +in eos, qui contra venire praesumerent, excommunicationis sententia promulgata. Quorum receptionem procurator generalis [bonae memoriae] praedecessoris tui, in partibus Constantinopolitanis tunc agentis, postmodum approbavit. Dictus quoque cellerarius lectionem et evangelium in hebdomada sua [postea] legisse dignoscitur, et tam decani quam episcopi electioni et aliorum negotiorum tractatibus sicut canonicus Trecensis interfuit, et domum quandam per capitulum memoratum obtinuit, quae non nisi canonico consueverat assignari. Tuque, quum ad eandem accessisses ecclesiam consecratus, eum cum canonicis aliis ad osculum recepisti, quum tamen tunc temporis non nisi canonici ad osculum admittantur, et eidem super praedictis non movisti per biennium quaestionem. Propter quod petiit, ut te ab ipsius super hoc molestatione indebita compescere dignaremur. +Verum dictus R. procurator tuus proposuit ex adverso, quod, quum idem cellerarius praebendam suam in praedicti archiepiscopi Remensis manibus resignasset, ipse de medietate [illius nepotem suum, et de medietate] *alia dictum cellerarium investivit, * [quam adhuc detinere praesumit in tuum praeiudicium et gravamen, non permittens te libere de ipsa disponere, prout ad te dignoscitur pertinere. Et licet ad dilectos filios decanum et magistros G. Cornutum Parisiensem et S. Remensem canonicos super hoc nostrae fuerint literae impetratae, cellerarius demum ad nos frustratorie appellavit, ut te posset gravare laboribus et expensis.] Idem quoque Procurator tuus proposuit ex adverso, quod, quum in Trecensi ecclesia institutus olim fuerit certus canonicorum numerus et capituli iuramento firmatus, supra dictus archiepiscopus, qui, etsi legatus fuisset in Teutonia, in Senonensi tamen provincia eidem non fuit officium legationis iniunctum, institutionem huiusmodi facere non potuit ut legatus, quin immo, etsi legatus in eadem provincia exstitisset, ad unicum tamen ius spirituale, quod vacabat ibidem, insimul duos canonicos instituere praedicto legato non licuit contra canonicas sanctiones. Nam si duo unicam praebendam haberent, id esset contra Turonense concilium, quod praebendarum inhibet sectionem. Si vero duobus in canonicos et fratres receptis uni tantum praebenda daretur, sub exspectatione alius contra Lateranense concilium remaneret. Praeterea licet in ecclesia, in qua non est certus numerus praebendarum, nulla etiam praebenda vacante in canonicum quis possit assumi, quum intelligatur ad quoddam ius eligi, quod ex electorum assensu de novo creatur, et cum electo in canonicum nascitur et desinit cum defuncto, in ecclesia tamen, quae determinatum habet numerum praebendarum, uno duntaxat individuo iure vacante, duo simul eligi non possunt ad illud eo, quod huiusmodi spirituale ius dividi seu communicari nequeat inter eos; quanquam interdum hi, ad quos spectat electio, de communi assensu augmentare valeant numerum praebendarum, quoddam ius spirituale de novo creando, nisi forte statutum aliquod obviaret, quod esset iuramento firmatum, vel cui sedis apostolicae confirmatio accessisset, huiusmodi clausula prohibitionis adiecta, ut, si quicquam contra id fieret, non valeret. Propter quod institutionem praefatam nullam fuisse dictus asseruit procurator, quum in Trecensi ecclesia, sicut praemissum est, certus sit praebendarum numerus, quem capitulum vel legatus augmentare minime intendebat vel ius aliquod de novo creare, [quod ex eo argui proponebat, quia non fuit unus ad vacantem praebendam et alius simpliciter institutus, sed ad praebendam unicam supradicto modo vacantem exstiterunt ambo recepti. Sed nec Trecense capitulum, ad quod praebendarum collatio nullatenus pertinebat, vel dictus procurator praedecessoris tui receptionem huiusmodi approbare potuit, utpote contra canones attentatam. Tibi quoque nequaquam obfuisse dicebat, quod cellerarium praefatum ad osculum inter canonicos Trecenses admiseras, vel quod aliquanto tempore super hoc negotio siluisti, quum tunc temporis ecclesiae tuae consuetudines, et quae in ea minus legitime facta fuerant, ignorares. Ad haec autem cellerarius sic respondit, quod, quum idem archiepiscopus in Trecensi capitulo suae legationis literas legi fecerit, et legatus eo tempore ab omnibus haberetur, an legatus in illa provincia fuerit, non debebat ulterius in dubium revocari, maxime quum tu in praedictis literis, quas obtinueras contra eum, memoratum archiepiscopum legatum duxeris nominandum. Adiecit insuper, quod licite quis ad spiritualem fraternitatem eligi potest in canonicum et in fratrem, nulla etiam praebenda vacante, argumentum ad hoc cuiusdam epistolae decretalis inducens, in qua legitur, quod, quum T. clericus, nulla in Lingonensi ecclesia praebenda vacante, ab episcopo et canonicis Lingonensibus supradicti archiepiscopi iudicis delegati a nobis interveniente auctoritate in canonicum receptus fuisset et fratrem ita, quod nullius praebendae fructus perciperet, nisi loco proximo vacaturae, nos attendentes, quod dictum T. in canonicum et fratrem recipi non occurrebat canonicis institutis, et vacaturam exspectare praebendam Lateranensi concilio non esset dubium obviare, illicito reprobato quod licitum erat duximus approbandum. Unde quum videretur indignum, ut is, qui receptus erat in canonicum et in fratrem, praebendae beneficio fraudaretur, episcopo et canonicis Lingonensibus dedimus in mandatis, ut, si res taliter se haberet, eidem T. praebendam, quum se facultas offerret, assignare curarent. Allegavit insuper, quod ab apostolica sede frequenter huiusmodi literae impetrantur, ut in ecclesia, in qua certus est numerus praebendarum, nulla praebenda vacante recipiatur quis in canonicum et fratrem, et eidem praebenda, quum se facultas obtulerit, conferatur. Item, licet Turonense concilium sectionem inhibeat praebendarum, nihilominus tamen Romana ecclesia receptionem eorum, qui ad dimidias praebendas assumpti sunt, in canonicos approbando, nonnunquam sectas praebendas eis praecipit integrari. Sed ad hoc fuit ex adverso responsum, quod etsi Romanus Pontifex dimidiatam quoad temporales proventus praebendam contra concilium Turonense illi quandoque praecipiat integrari, cui ius spirituale vacans fuerat cum debita integritate collatum, pro eo tamen, quod ad huiusmodi dimidiam de facto, quum de iure non valeat, est receptus, id mandare minime consuevit, et ex plenitudine potestatis ad unicum ius spirituale non vacans aliquem recipi utilitate vel necessitate pensata valeat indulgere, sicut de Augustino in canone invenitur, qui novo modo provectus et consecratus episcopus, incolumi Valerio episcopo ecclesiae Hipponensis accessit in cathedra, non successit. Et sicut de non vacante praebenda, concessa tamen et confirmata per Romanum Pontificem cuidam clerico in ecclesia Lingonensi et per exsecutorem ipsius ad eandem etiam non vacantem recepto in praeallegata legitur decretali, praefatus tamen archiepiscopus, qui, etsi legatus fuisset in provincia, absque nostra saltem licentia speciali contra iuris scripti tenorem ad unicum ius spirituale, quod vacabat in ecclesia supradicta, in qua certus erat numerus praebendarum, instituere non potuit nepotem et cellerarium supradictos, quum hoc non solummodo Turonensi, sed etiam Lateranensi concilio obviaret, maxime quum nec novum ius creare intenderet, nec praebendarum numerum augmentare, quod inde colligitur, quia resignatione cellerarii procurata eosdem instituit ad unicam praebendam vacantem.] Unde nos, his et aliis intellectis, ante dictum cellerarium, quem praebendam constitit prius libere resignasse, ad restitutionem eorum, quae ratione praedictae institutionis tenebat, de consilio fratrum nostrorum sententialiter duximus condemnandum, ei super praebenda ipsa vel eius parte silentium imponentes ita, quod per hoc praedicto G. nullum praeiudicium generetur, maxime quum res inter alios acta regulariter aliis non obsistat iuxta canonicas et legitimas sanctiones. Chapter XXVI

Latin source headnote: Two prebends can be made from one vacant prebend if its resources suffice; otherwise the one dividing it is bound to make them whole.

The same.

When a certain prebend in your church was vacant, you constituted two from it and, with the consent of your chapter, assumed two canons to them. When one of them entered at the Apostolic See upon the way of all flesh, the prebend that the deceased had held was obtained by authority of the Apostolic See by a certain cleric named Hippolytus. But since the same Hippolytus troubles you concerning the integrity of the prebend through certain letters of ours, and the other proposes that he has the same right against you, you have asked what you ought to do. Concerning this we have thought that this answer should be given to your fraternity: that, since the statutes of the Council of Tours forbid division of prebends, you are bound to make a whole prebend for each of them from those things that happen to become vacant, unless perhaps for a reasonable cause two were constituted from the aforesaid vacant prebend and the revenues of each are so great that through each, provision has been made for each in a competent benefice. [You, finally, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the sixth day before the Ides of January, in the sixteenth year of our pontificate, 1214.]

De una praebenda vacante possunt fieri duae, si eius suppetant facultates; alias dividens integrare tenetur.

Idem.

Vacante quadam praebenda in ecclesia tua, duas ex ea constituens, ad illas de consensu capituli tui duos canonicos assumpsisti, quorum altero apud sedem apostolicam viam universae carnis ingresso, praebendam, quam defunctus habuerat, quidam clericus nomine Hippolytus fuit auctoritate sedis apostolicae assecutus. Verum quum idem Hippolytus te super integritate praebendae per quasdam nostras literas inquietet, et alius idem ius adversus te se habere proponat, quid facere debeas requisisti. Super quo fraternitati tuae sic duximus respondendum, quod, quum Turonensis statuta concilii sectionem inhibeant praebendarum, teneris utrique de his, quae vacare contigerit, integrare praebendam, nisi forte rationabili causa de vacante praebenda supradicta duae fuerint constitutae, ac tot sint utriusque proventus, quod per utramque sit utrique provisum in beneficio competenti. [Tu denique etc. Dat. Lat. VI. Id. Ian. Pont. nostr. Ao. XVI. 1214.]

Chapter XXVII

Latin source headnote: If the Pope commands a chapter to receive someone as a canon and confer a prebend if any is vacant, and, knowing of the mandate, they confer it upon another, they are compelled to receive the first person and provide for him from the revenues of the church in place of a benefice until he has a prebend.

The same, to the Bishop of Vercelli.

The beloved son G., a cleric, for whose reception as a canon in the church of Novara we had written, who did not obtain through our letters what he intended, against its canons, explained to us by complaint that, when we had sent an apostolic mandate on his behalf to the chapter of Novara that they receive him as a canon and brother, conferring upon him a prebend if any nevertheless was then vacant, they not only were unwilling to fulfill the apostolic mandate but even presumed to assign to another the vacant prebend that we commanded to be conferred upon him. Hence he petitioned us that we deign to execute what we had begun concerning him. But Master Gregory, proctor of the church of Novara, proposed in opposition that, since no prebend was vacant in that church, the aforesaid cleric, coming to the Apostolic See, falsely suggested to us that a prebend was vacant in that church and had procured letters concerning his reception upon a false suggestion. Hence, since a mendacious petitioner ought wholly to lack the things obtained, the same proctor petitioned that the church be absolved from his suit. Therefore, since they litigated longer concerning these things before our beloved son G., cardinal deacon of Saint George at the Golden Veil, whom we gave them as auditor, and the same cardinal diligently reported to us the things that had been proposed before him, through apostolic writings we command your fraternity that, if it is established for you that a prebend was vacant in the church of Novara at the time when the canons of that church received our letters concerning a prebend, since they thought that it should be conferred wholly upon another in elusion of our mandate, you cause the same cleric, if he does not have a sufficient ecclesiastical benefice elsewhere, to be received as a canon by the aforesaid clerics according to the tenor of our former mandate, and competent revenues from that church to be assigned to him each year until he has been provided with a prebendal benefice.

> Si Papa mandat capitulo, ut aliquem in canonicum recipiant, et praebendam, si qua vacat, conferant, si de mandato scientes alii conferunt, coguntur primum recipere, et de reditibus ecclesiae loco beneficii providere, donec praebendam habeat.

> Dilectus filius G. clericus, pro quo canonicando in ecclesia Novariensi scripseramus, quod intendebat per nostras literas non obtento, contra canonicos eiusdem nobis exposuit conquerendo, quod, quum pro eo ad Novariense capitulum mandatum apostolicum misissemus, ut eum in canonicum reciperent et in fratrem, praebendam, si qua tamen tunc vacabat, conferentes eidem, +ipsi non solum mandatum apostolicum noluerunt adimplere, verum etiam praebendam vacantem, quam mandavimus illi conferri, alii praesumpserunt assignare. Unde petebat a nobis, ut quae de ipso inceperamus exsequi dignaremur. Magister autem Gregorius Novariensis ecclesiae procurator proponebat econtra, quia, quum in illa ecclesia nulla vacaret praebenda, praedictus clericus ad apostolicam sedem accedens falso in ecclesia ipsa nobis suggessit vacare praebendam, et ad suggestionem falsam super receptione sua literas impetrarat. Unde, quum mendax precator carere debeat impetratis penitus, idem procurator ab impetitione ipsius ecclesiam postulabat absolvi. Quum igitur coram dilecto filio nostro G. S. Gregorii ad Velum aureum diacono cardinali, quem eisdem dedimus auditorem, super his diutius litigarent, et idem cardinalis quae fuerant proposita coram eo nobis retulit diligenter, Fraternitati tuae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus, si tibi constiterit, quod in Novariensi ecclesia praebenda vacaret tempore, quo super praebenda eiusdem ecclesiae canonici nostras literas receperunt, quum eam penitus alii in elusionem mandati nostri duxerint conferendam, eundem clericum, si non alibi habet sufficiens beneficium ecclesiasticum, iuxta tenorem prioris mandati nostri a praedictis clericis in canonicum recipi, et sibi de reditibus ipsius ecclesiae singulis annis competentes assignari proventus, donec ei sit in beneficio praebendali provisum.

Chapter XXVIII

Latin source headnote: One having a personate or a benefice with cure, if he receives a second such benefice, vacates the first; but if he contends to retain it, he will also be deprived of the second. This first. And the one to whom collation of the benefice with cure pertains lawfully confers it immediately when the person instituted receives another; and, if he does not confer it within six months, the collation devolves upon another, and it is otherwise set forth. This second. But concerning eminent and learned persons, the Pope alone dispenses regarding plurality of incompatible benefices. This third. This is what this useful and famous chapter says.

The same, in a general council.

With great providence it was forbidden in the Lateran Council that anyone receive diverse ecclesiastical dignities or several parish churches contrary to the statutes of the sacred canons; otherwise [both] the recipient would lose what was so received, and the one conferring would be deprived of the power of bestowing. But because, on account of presumptions and the cupidities of certain men, no fruit or a rare one has hitherto come from the aforesaid statute, we, desiring to oppose this more clearly and expressly, establish by the present decree that whoever receives some benefice having the cure of souls annexed, if he previously had such a benefice, is by the law itself deprived of it; and if perhaps he contends to retain it, let him also be despoiled of the other. Let the one to whom the donation of the first pertains freely confer it, after reception of the other, upon one to whom he sees it ought deservedly to be conferred; and if he delays beyond six months in conferring it, not only shall its collation devolve upon others according to the statute of the Lateran Council, but he shall also be compelled to assign from his own revenues, for the utility of the church whose benefice it is, as much as it is established was received from it from the time of its vacancy. We decree that this same thing is to be observed in personates, adding that no one presume to have several dignities or personates in the same church, even if they do not have the cure of souls. Nevertheless, concerning eminent and learned persons who are to be honored with greater benefices, when reason has demanded it, dispensation can be made through the Apostolic See.

> Habens personatum vel beneficium curatum, si secundo tale receperit, vacat primum; quod si retinere contenderit, etiam secundo privabitur. Hoc primo. Et is, ad quem spectat beneficii curati collatio, licite confert statim, quum institutus aliud recepit, et, si infra sex menses non conferat, devolvitur ad alium collatio, et aliter ponitur. > De multa providentia fuit in Lateranensi concilio prohibitum, ut nullus diversas dignitates ecclesiasticas vel plures ecclesias parochiales reciperet contra sacrorum canonum instituta; alioquin [et] recipiens sic acceptum amitteret, et largiendi potestate conferens privaretur. Quia vero propter praesumptiones et quorundam cupiditates nullus hactenus aut rarus de praedicto statuto fructus provenit : nos evidentius et expressius occurrere cupientes praesenti decreto statuimus, ut, quicunque receperit aliquod beneficium, curam habens animarum annexam, si prius tale beneficium habebat, eo sit ipso iure privatus, et, si forte illud retinere contenderit, etiam alio spolietur. Is quoque, ad quem prioris spectat donatio, illud post receptionem alterius libere conferat, cui merito viderit conferendum, et, si ultra sex menses conferre distulerit, non solum ad alios secundum Lateranensis concilii statutum eius collatio devolvatur, verum etiam tantum de suis cogatur proventibus in utilitatem ecclesiae cuius est illud beneficium, assignare, quantum a tempore vacationis ipsius ex eo constiterit esse perceptum. Hoc idem in personatibus esse decernimus observandum, addentes, ut in eadem ecclesia nullus plures dignitates aut personatus habere praesumat, etiamsi curam non habeant animarum. Circa sublimes tamen et literatas personas, quae maioribus sunt beneficiis honorandae, quum ratio postulaverit, per sedem apostolicam poterit dispensari.

Chapter XXIX

Latin source headnote: A provincial council suspends from collation of benefices those who, after a second correction, confer benefices upon unworthy persons; it also provides who meanwhile is to confer the benefices, and that suspension is relaxed by the Pope alone or the patriarch alone.

The same, in the same council.

It is exceedingly grave and absurd that certain prelates of churches, although they can promote suitable men to ecclesiastical benefices, do not fear to assume unworthy men, whom neither honorable conduct nor knowledge of letters supports, following the affection of carnality, not the judgment of reason; no one of sound mind is ignorant how great are the losses that come to churches from this. Wishing, therefore, to remedy this disease, we command that, unworthy men having been passed over, they assume suitable men who wish and are able to render pleasing service to God and the churches; and let diligent inquiry concerning this be made annually in the provincial council, so that one who after the first and second correction is found culpable be suspended from conferring benefices by that council, a provident and honorable person being appointed in the same council to supply the defect of the suspended person in conferring benefices. And let this same thing be observed concerning chapters that have offended in these matters. But the offense of a metropolitan is to be left to the judgment of a superior and announced on behalf of the council. But so that this salutary provision may obtain fuller effect, let a sentence of suspension of this kind in no way be relaxed apart from the authority of the Roman Pontiff or of his own patriarch, so that in this matter also the four patriarchal sees may be specially honored.

Concilium provinciale a beneficiorum collatione suspendit eos, qui post secundam correctionem indignis beneficia conferunt: providet etiam, quis interim beneficia conferat, et illam suspensionem relaxat solus Papa, vel solus patriarcha.

Idem in eodem.

Grave nimis est et absurdum, quod quidam ecclesiarum praelati quum possint viros idoneos ad ecclesiastica beneficia promovere, assumere non verentur indignos, quibus nec morum honestas, nec literarum scientia suffragatur, carnalitatis sequentes affectum, non iudicium rationis; unde quanta ecclesiis damna proveniant, nemo sanae mentis ignorat. Volentes igitur huic morbo mederi, praecipimus, ut praetermissis indignis idoneos assumant, qui Deo et ecclesiis velint et valeant gratum impendere famulatum, fiatque de hoc in provinciali concilio diligens inquisitio annuatim ita, ut qui post primam et secundam correctionem fuerit repertus culpabilis, a beneficiis conferendis per ipsum concilium suspendatur, instituta in eodem concilio persona provida et honesta, quae suspensi suppleat defectum in beneficiis conferendis. Et hoc ipsum circa capitula, quae in his deliquerint, observetur. Metropolitani vero delictum superioris iudicio relinquatur, ex parte concilii nunciandum. Ut autem haec salubris provisio pleniorem consequatur effectum, huiusmodi suspensionis sententia praeter Romani Pontificis auctoritatem aut proprii patriarchae minime relaxetur, ut in hoc quoque quatuor patriarchales sedes specialiter honorentur.

Chapter XXX

Latin source headnote: A rector of a church, notwithstanding a custom of the bishop or patron, ought to have a sufficient portion from the revenues of the church. This it says as far as § Who, however. (Who, however, etc.:) A rector not residing in a parish church is deprived of it unless it is annexed to a dignity or prebend, in which case he ought to have a perpetual vicar there. And at the end it forbids, to the prejudice of rectors, a pension from its revenues to be given as a benefice. This it says. Or thus: one not residing in a parish church, or not appointing a vicar when it is annexed to a greater benefice, is deprived of it. This it says.

The same, in the same council.

A vice of custom that is to be extirpated has grown strong in certain regions: namely, that the patrons of parish churches and certain other persons, claiming for themselves [almost] wholly their revenues, leave to the presbyters assigned to their service so meager a portion that they cannot fittingly be sustained from it. For, as we have learned for certain, in some regions parish presbyters obtain for their sustenance only a quarter of a quarter, that is, a sixteenth of the tithes. Hence it happens that in these regions almost no parish priest is found who has any, even slight, learning in letters. Therefore, since the mouth of the ox that treads the grain ought not to be bound, but one who serves the altar ought to live from the altar, we establish that, notwithstanding any custom of the bishop, patron, or any other person, a sufficient portion be assigned to the presbyters themselves. But let one who has a parish church serve it not through a vicar but by himself in the order that the care of that church requires, unless perhaps the parish church is annexed to a dignity or prebend. In this case we grant that the one who has such a prebend or dignity, since he must serve in the greater church, have in the parish church itself a suitable and perpetual vicar canonically instituted who, as has been said, has a fitting portion from the revenues of that church; otherwise, let him know that by authority of this decree he is deprived of it, freely to be conferred upon another who wishes and is able to fulfill what has been said. But we wholly forbid that anyone presume fraudulently to confer upon another as though for a benefice a pension from the revenues of a church that ought to have the cure of its own priest.

> Rector ecclesiae, non obstante consuetudine episcopi, vel patroni, debet de reditibus ecclesiae sufficientem habere portionem. H. d. usque ad §. Qui vero. (Qui vero etc.:) Privatus est parochiali ecclesia rector in ea non residens, nisi sit annexa dignitati vel praebendae, quo casu debet ibi habere perpetuum vicarium. Et in fine prohibet in fraudem rectoribus de ipsius proventibus pensionem in beneficium dari. H. d. Nam, ut pro certo didicimus, in quibusdam regionibus parochiales presbyteri pro sua sustentatione non obtinent nisi quartam quartae, id est sextam decimam decimarum. Unde fit, ut in his regionibus paene nullus inveniatur sacerdos parochialis, qui ullam vel modicam habeat peritiam literarum. Quum igitur os bovis ligari non debeat triturantis, sed qui altario servit de altari vivere debeat, statuimus, ut, consuetudine qualibet episcopi vel patroni, seu cuiuslibet alterius non obstante, portio presbyteris ipsis sufficiens assignetur. Qui vero parochialem habet ecclesiam, non per vicarium, sed per se ipsum illi deserviat in ordine, quem ipsius ecclesiae cura requirit, nisi forte dignitati vel praebendae parochialis ecclesia sit annexa. In quo casu concedimus, ut is, qui talem habet praebendam vel dignitatem, quum oporteat eum in maiori ecclesia deservire, in ipsa parochiali ecclesia idoneum et perpetuum habeat vicarium canonice institutum, qui, ut praedictum est, congruentem habeat de ipsius ecclesiae proventibus portionem; alioquin illa se sciat auctoritate huius decreti privatum, libere alii conferenda, qui velit et possit quod dictum est adimplere. Illud autem penitus interdicimus, ne quis in fraudem de proventibus ecclesiae, quae curam habere debet proprii sacerdotis, pensionem alii quasi pro beneficio conferre praesumat.

Chapter XXXI

Latin source headnote: Religious ought not to receive churches or tithes from laypersons without the consent of the diocesans, admit excommunicated or interdicted persons to divine offices, or institute or remove in churches that do not pertain to them by full right; rather, they will present suitable men to the diocesans for them.

The same, in the same council.

It is known to have been forbidden in the Lateran Council that any regulars presume to receive churches or tithes from the hand of a layperson without the consent of the bishops, or admit excommunicated persons or those interdicted by name in any way to divine offices. But we, forbidding it more strongly, have taken care to punish transgressors by worthy chastisement, establishing nevertheless that, in churches that do not pertain to them by full right, according to the statutes of the same council they present to the bishops the presbyters to be instituted, so that they answer to the bishops for the care of the people but render a competent account to the religious themselves for temporal property; but let them not dare to remove those instituted without consulting the bishops. Indeed, we add that they take care to present those whom either their manner of life renders known or credible testimony of prelates commends.

Non debent religiosi ecclesias vel decimas a laicis sine dioecesanorum consensu recipere, excommunicatos vel interdictos ad divina admittere, in ecclesiis quoque, quae ad eos non pleno iure pertinent, instituere vel destituere; sed praesentabunt dioecesanis ad eas viros idoneos.

Idem in eodem.

In Lateranensi concilio noscitur fuisse prohibitum, ne quilibet regulares ecclesias seu decimas sine episcoporum consensu de manu laici praesumant accipere, nec excommunicatos vel nominatim interdictos admittant aliquatenus ad divina. Nos autem id fortius inhibentes, transgressores digna curavimus animadversione punire, statuentes nihilominus, quatenus in ecclesiis, quae ad ipsos pleno iure non pertinent, iuxta eiusdem concilii statuta episcopis instituendos presbyteros repraesentent, ut illis de plebis cura respondeant, ipsis vero pro rebus temporalibus rationem exhibeant competentem, institutos vero removere non audeant episcopis inconsultis. Sane adiicimus, ut illos repraesentare procurent, quos vel conversatio notos reddit, vel commendat probabile testimonium praelatorum.

Chapter XXXII

Latin source headnote: One absent in the study of theology receives the fruits of his benefices in his absence, but not the daily distributions.

Honorius III, to the Abbot and Prior of Saint Geneviève.

Although we directed our writings to you that you cause the ecclesiastical revenues of the beloved son Master N., Archdeacon of York, who desires to study sacred scripture, to be ministered to him in full, nevertheless we do not wish, nor was it our intention, that you cause to be given to him those daily distributions that are furnished only to those residing in the churches and those who are present at the canonical hours.

Chapter XXXIII

Latin source headnote: Because of the poverty of the prebends of a cathedral church, chapels can be annexed to them, with a fitting portion reserved for their presbyters.

The same, to the Bishop of Veszprém.

You explained to us, while established in our presence, that the canons of your church, their provision having been diminished from the time of the general council, since from that time chapels have not been granted to them for their sustenance as was accustomed to be done before, cannot be sustained from the revenues of their prebends, since these are exceedingly meager, on account of which several of them, after leaving the same church, are compelled, to the reproach of its clerical body, to bind themselves to the services of others. Hence you humbly supplicated that by our permission it be lawful for you to enlarge their provision from those chapels. But because through this derogation would be made from the statutes of the same council, which we wish to be observed unshaken, we were unable to hear you in this respect. Nevertheless, suffering with paternal affection for their poverty and desiring also to do you a favor as the merit of your devotion demands, by authority of the present letters we commit to your fraternity, in which we have full confidence, that, if manifest necessity or utility demands, you can increase the prebends of your church by chapels to be annexed to them in perpetuity, as with prior discretion you shall see to be expedient, with a fitting portion nevertheless reserved for the presbyters of each chapel. [Let no one therefore, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the fourth day before the Kalends of February, 1225.]

Unde humiliter supplicuisti, ut de capellis eisdem provisionem eorum de nostra permissione tibi ampliare liceret. Quia vero per hoc statutis derogaretur eiusdem concilii, quae servari volumus inconcusse, te in hac parte nequivimus exaudire. Verum illorum paupertati paterno compatientes affectu, et tibi etiam, prout exposcit devotionis tuae meritum, gratiam facere cupientes, fraternitati tuae de qua plenam fiduciam obtinemus, praesentium auctoritate committimus, ut, * Si evidens necessitas vel utilitas exigat, praebendas ecclesiae tuae poteris de capellis in perpetuum annectendis eisdem, sicut discretione praevia expedire videris, augmentare, reservata tamen congrua singularum cap ellarum presbyteris portione. Chapter XXXIV

Latin source headnote: Although a church confers a benefice by donation of a layperson, the procurement of that benefice holds even when no mention of this was made.

The same, to the Bishop, Prior, and Archdeacon of Hereford.

The beloved son G., a poor cleric, proposed to us that, when we directed requests and commands to the dean and chapter of the Church of Saint Martin of Angers that they receive him as a canon and brother as soon as the opportunity offered itself, with you given to him as executors concerning this, two prebends meanwhile having become vacant in the aforesaid church, the said cleric insistently petitioned you to execute our mandate concerning him. But because the proctor of the same dean and chapter proposed by way of exception that our letters concerning this were not valid because no mention was made in them that the aforesaid dean had the collation of the prebends of that church by donation of the king, you said by interlocutory decision that you were not executors of our mandate, and thus those two prebends that became vacant in the meantime were conferred upon others, and the said cleric, on account of an occasion of this kind that you seem to have received maliciously, has remained until now frustrated of his provision, on account of which he appealed to our hearing, and you are said to have deferred to his appeal. Therefore, being unwilling that the often-mentioned cleric, frustrated by you of the benefit of our letters, be further suspended, we firmly command you that, notwithstanding an occasion of this kind, which we regard as frivolous, you take care to execute our mandate directed to you on his behalf in such a way, without any difficulty, that because of this he does not have recourse to us further and you cannot be reproved for disobedience, which is compared to idolatry.

Licet ecclesia ex donatione laici beneficium conferat, tenet illius beneficii impetratio, de hoc mentione non habita.

Idem Episcopo et Priori et Archidiacono Herfordensibus.

Dilectus filius G. pauper clericus nobis proposuit, quod, quum decano et capitulo ecclesiae beati Martini Andegavensis preces direxerimus et praecepta, ut ipsum, quam cito facultas se offerret, in canonicum reciperent et in fratrem, vobis super hoc exsecutoribus sibi datis, vacantibus interim duabus in ecclesia praefata praebendis, dictus clericus, ut mandatum nostrum exsequeremini circa ipsum, a vobis cum instantia postulavit. Sed quia ipsorum decani et capituli procurator excipiendo proposuit, nostras super hoc literas non valere pro eo, quod in eis mentio non fiebat, quod praefatus decanus ex donatione regis praebendarum eiusdem ecclesiae collationem haberet, vos mandati nostri exsecutores non esse interloquendo dixistis, et sic illae duae praebendae, quae medio tempore vacaverunt, aliis sunt collatae, +et dictus clericus occasione huiusmodi, quam vos malitiose recepisse videmini, remansit hactenus sua provisione frustratus, propter quod idem nostram audientiam appellavit, appellationi cuius dicimini detulisse. Nolentes igitur, ut saepe dictus clericus frustratus a vobis literarum nostrarum commodo ulterius suspendatur, vobis firmiter Mandamus, quatenus, occasione huiusmodi, quam reputamus frivolam, non obstante, mandatum nostrum ad vos pro ipso directum taliter sine difficultate qualibet exsequi procuretis, quod ipse propter hoc ad nos ulterius non recurrat, nec vos possitis de inobedientia reprehendi, quae idolatriae comparatur.

Latin source headnote: Children and those otherwise beneficed are not suitable to obtain benefices. This it says, adhering to the words of the letter.

Gregory IX, to the Bishop of Strasbourg.

Concerning disordered ordination—(And below:) But since those are to be reputed suitable in churches who can and wish to serve in them, we answer your consultation thus: that children and beneficed persons who cannot serve in the same church ought not to be reputed suitable in it.

Chapter XXXVI

Latin source headnote: Another prebend ought not to be divided for the completion of one prebend.

The same, to the Archbishop and Master R. of Tours.

Since we thought that the cause being conducted between the Bishop of Orléans and I. de Blesis, canon of Holy Cross, concerning the completion of the prebend of that canon should be committed to you—(And below:) We answer your consultation thus: that it was not our intention that for the completion of the prebend of the aforesaid canon some prebend should be newly divided.

Chapter XXXVII

Latin source headnote: Clerics who are not noble and not of eminent learning ought not for this reason to be repelled from prebends, even in a church that has not been accustomed to admit such persons.

The same.

Our venerable brother the Bishop of Porto supplicated that, since, while he discharged the office of legation in those regions, he conferred upon I., a cleric, a certain prebend that had been vacant in the church of Strasbourg for so long that its donation had devolved upon the Apostolic See, we should pursue his collation with benign affection. But the proctor of the chapter of Strasbourg proposed in opposition that the same chapter, having heard this and alleging an ancient custom inviolably observed, according to which they had until now admitted into their fellowship no one unless noble and free, illustrious from each parent, of honorable manner of life, and of eminent learning, appealed to the Apostolic See before it received monitory or executory letters, lest anything be done contrary to this, especially since no prebend was then vacant. (And below:) We therefore, considering that not nobility of lineage but of virtues and honorable conduct of life make a servant pleasing and suitable to God, for the governance of which he chose not many noble and powerful according to the flesh but ignoble and poor persons, because with him there is no acceptance of persons, and since men of eminent learning can scarcely be found for the summits of dignities, much less for prebends, have not thought that exceptions of this kind should be admitted. (And below:) We command your discretion that, if it is established for you that the aforesaid prebend was vacant when the aforesaid bishop conferred it upon the said I., you cause him to be received to it.

Verum procurator Argentini capituli proposuit ex adverso, quod idem capitulum, hoc audito, consuetudinem allegans antiquam inviolabiliter observatam, iuxta quam nullum, nisi nobilem et liberum, et ab utroque parente illustrem, honestae conversationis ac eminentis scientiae, in suum consortium hactenus admiserant, ne contra hoc fieret, maxime quum nulla tunc praebenda vacaret, antequam monitorias vel exsecutorias literas recepisset, ad sedem apostolicam appellavit. (Et infra:) Nos igitur attendentes quod non generis, sed virtutum nobilitas vitaeque honestas gratum Deo faciunt et idoneum servitorem, ad cuius regimen non multos secundum carnem nobiles et potentes elegit, sed ignobiles ac pauperes eo, quod non est personarum acceptio apud ipsum, et vix ad culmina dignitatum, nedum praebendas viri eminentis scientiae valeant reperiri, exceptiones huius modi non duximus admittendas. (Et infra:) Discretioni vestrae mandamus, quatenus, si vobis constiterit, praedictam praebendam vacasse, quando ipsam dicto I. contulit episcopus memoratus, ipsum ad eam recipi faciatis.

Chapter XXXVIII

Latin source headnote: If it is commanded that provision be made in a church, provision cannot be made by means of a church.

The same.

Since formerly we gave a mandate to the prior of Saint M. that by apostolic authority he provide for G., a deacon, in some church of the city or diocese of Lucca, the same prior, by authority of this kind, endeavored to designate the aforesaid G. rector of the Church of Saint Peter of Vico, in which the rector has been accustomed to be elected by the clerics of the same church, pronouncing nevertheless a sentence of excommunication against those resisting. Therefore, since a mandate of this kind does not extend to such things, nor is our intention directed to a rectorship or dignity, since our command proceeds for a simple benefice, we command that you declare that both an institution of this kind and the sentence of excommunication pronounced because of it do not hold.

Quum igitur mandatum huiusmodi se ad talia non extendat, nec ad rectoriam vel dignitatem nostra feratur intentio, quum pro simplici beneficio iussio nostra manat : mandamus, quatenus tam institutionem huiusmodi quam excommunicationis sententiam propter hoc latam denuncies non tenere.

Title VI: On a Sick or Debilitated Cleric

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A sick cleric receives the fruits of his benefice in full.

Gregory, to Candidus, Bishop of Orvieto.

Since, when there is bodily affliction, [whether it happens for purgation or for vengeance, God's judgment in this is unknown, affliction ought not to be added by us to those scourged, lest, which may it not be, the offense of guilt regard us. And because Calumniosus, bearer of the present letters, asserts that on account of this affliction that he sustains the customary advantages are denied him by your church, therefore] we exhort your fraternity by the present letters that his sickness ought not to impede the bearer of the present letters from receiving the benefits that are customary from your church; because, if others were deterred by his example, perhaps no one could be found who would serve the church. Rather, according to the order of his place, let your fraternity, in contemplation of divine judgment, furnish to the sick man, from the very small means that can come to the church, whatever could be ministered to him if he were healthy, [so that, etc.]

Latin source headnote: A presbyter from whom half the palm with two fingers has been cut off does not celebrate Mass, but he can perform the other priestly functions.

Pope Eugenius.

We do not permit the presbyter whose two fingers together with half his palm you signified to have been cut off by a robber to celebrate Mass, because we trust that this cannot be done safely because of the debility or without scandal because of the deformity of the member. But we in no way forbid him to perform the other priestly offices. [Furthermore, etc. (Cf. c. 1, On Apostasy, V. 9.)]

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: If the rector of a church is leprous, a coadjutor is to be given to him.

Lucius III.

Concerning rectors of churches infected with the mark of leprosy to such a degree that they cannot serve at the altar or enter churches without great scandal to those who are healthy, we wish you to hold this: that a coadjutor is to be given to them who has the care of souls and receives from the resources of the church a fitting portion for his own sustenance.

Si rector ecclesia sit leprosus, dandus est ei coadiutor.

Lucius III.

De rectoribus ecclesiarum leprae macula usque adeo infectis, quod altari servire non possunt, nec sine magno scandalo eorum, qui sani sunt, ecclesias ingredi, hoc volumus te tenere, quod eis dandus est coadiutor, qui curam habeat animarum, et de facultatibus ecclesiae ad sustentationem suam congruam recipiat portionem.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: If the rector of a church is leprous, he is removed from the office of administration, but is sustained from the goods of the church.

Clement III.

Your fraternity has thought fit to consult us—(And below: [Cf. c. 19, On the Sentence of Excommunication, V. 39.]) But concerning a priest who, struck by divine judgment with the disease of leprosy, performs the office of prelacy in a parish church, we say that, because of the scandal and abhorrence of the people, he ought to be removed from the office of administration, in such a way indeed that necessities are ministered to him for as long as he lives according to the resources of the church.

Si rector ecclesiae sit leprosus, ab administrationis officio removetur; sed de bonis ecclesiae sustentatur.

Clemens III.

Tua nos duxi t fraternitas consulendos: (Et infra: [*cf. c. * 19. de sent. exc. V. 39.]) De sacerdote vero, qui divino iudicio leprae morbo repercussus in parochiali ecclesia praelationis officio fungitur, dicimus, quod pro scandalo et abominatione populi ab administrationis debet officio removeri, ita quidem, quod iuxta facultates ecclesiae sibi necessaria, quamdiu vixerit, ministrentur.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: A coadjutor is to be given to a bishop who, because of an incurable illness, cannot exercise the pastoral office.

Innocent III, to the Archbishop of Arles.

It was proposed before us on your behalf that, since our venerable brother the Bishop of Orange has labored under a grave and incurable illness for almost four years already, so that he has not been able and is in no way able to exercise the pastoral office, the noble man the lord of Baux, the consuls, and the citizens of the same city incessantly petition you, since you are their metropolitan, that you take care to provide both for them and for the Church of Orange. But since you neither can nor ought in any way to compel him to resignation, nor ought affliction to be added to affliction, but rather one ought to pity his misery, because the same man has been good and honorable and governed the church committed to him in a salutary manner, you have thought that the Apostolic See should be consulted as to what you ought to do concerning these things. We, therefore, wishing to provide salutarily both for the aforesaid bishop and for his church, answer your fraternity thus and through apostolic writings command that you associate with him as coadjutor a provident and honorable man through whom both the bishop and the people committed to him may be usefully counseled. [Given at Rome, at Saint Peter's, on the fourth day before the Nones of December, in the seventh year of our pontificate, 1204.]

Latin source headnote: The number of clerics ought to be established in collegiate churches according to their resources.

Latin source headnote: Laypersons cannot be instituted as canons.

Eugenius.

As has become known to us, you have taken care jointly to establish a certain number of canons in your church and to fortify your institution by the binding force of an oath. Hence, because, with that number diminished in the course of time, you call into doubt whether you can fill that number by the institution of canons, counting the laypersons who are named by the title of canons in your church, and whether the established number is filled, so that this ambiguity may be removed from your hearts, it seems to us that, since laypersons ought not to be counted among the number of canons, you ought not to delay to fill the established number, confirmed by an oath taken, with other suitable clerical persons as canons. For your intention is not thought to have been other than that you unanimously take care to find such persons to fill the number when it should be necessary, through whom God may fittingly be served in divine offices through ecclesiastical orders. Furthermore, we more strictly forbid you henceforth to admit laypersons as canons.

Latin source headnote: The institution of benefices pertains to bishops or their officials.

Alexander III, to the Archbishop of Canterbury and his Suffragans.

From the frequent complaints of persons, we have learned quite manifestly that in your regions an exceedingly depraved and enormous custom, contrary in every way to the constitutions of the holy Fathers, has grown strong for many past times: namely, that clerics, led by blind cupidity, receive churches and ecclesiastical benefices without the consent of the bishop of the diocese or of his officials who can do this by law, thinking less solicitously than is fitting how alien this is from the statutes of the holy Fathers and contrary to ecclesiastical honorable conduct. Hence, since you, brother archbishop, wish, as you ought, by the office committed to you, to root out so iniquitous a custom from your province, you pronounced a sentence of excommunication both against those clerics who knowingly retain churches or ecclesiastical benefices henceforth occupied in such a way, and against those who should henceforth presume to occupy churches or ecclesiastical benefices in such a way, as we understood from your letters. We therefore, holding that sentence ratified and firm and confirming it by apostolic authority, through apostolic writings and by way of precept command that each of you, renewing the sentence in his episcopate at least four times a year, cause it to be inviolably observed, contradiction and appeal ceasing, and that you in no way presume to absolve the clerics themselves who have incurred or henceforth incur that sentence unless they have made fitting satisfaction and wholly desisted from their presumption.

Latin source headnote: No one ought to be instituted beyond the resources of a church against the will of its clerics.

Clement III, to the Clergy of Constantinople.

By the authority of the Apostolic See and the duty of our office, we are compelled to regard ecclesiastical men with a more benign eye and to provide for them with pastoral solicitude, lest they be burdened by molestations. Therefore, induced by this reason, we forbid by apostolic authority that any of you be proceeded against by anyone in a civil or criminal business except in an ecclesiastical forum, or be in any way committed to prison or bonds through a secular person unless he has been cast out of clerical order by his archbishop, or without a reasonable and manifest cause suffer a burden from anyone in his office or his right. We also forbid the king's vicar or any person exercising the place of secular power to presume to inflict injury upon you in your houses or other property; rather, both in these and in other things we wish the privileges granted to you by kings or archbishops upon pious consideration to be preserved inviolate. We establish further that no one be instituted in your churches against your will beyond what their resources can sustain.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: When outsiders must be instituted in churches, clerics of only a certain origin ought not to be instituted, but from wherever they may be, provided that they are suitable.

Innocent III, to the Cardinals of Saint Marcellus and Saint Susanna, Legates of the Apostolic See.

It is known to pertain to the adornment and advantage both of the Church of Hagia Sophia and of the other churches constructed in the city of Constantinople that learned men conspicuous for honorable conduct, coming from any parts of the world, ought to be instituted in them. But, as has been suggested to our ears, our venerable brother the Patriarch of Constantinople, unmindful of those things that we suggested to him by living voice and afterward commanded through writings, if nevertheless our letters reached him, scorning clerics of other nations, strives to place only Venetians in the churches of Constantinople, not considering that in every nation one who does justice is acceptable to God, nor is it fitting that the sanctuary of God be possessed by hereditary right. Wherefore, through apostolic writings [by way of precept] we command your discretion that you admonish him not to postpone instituting in the aforesaid churches, and especially in the greater church, men who are religious, honorable, and learned, and otherwise suitable, from wherever they derive their origin; otherwise he will render himself unworthy for you to compel clerics of other nations to his obedience, especially since because of this they have thought that they should appeal to our hearing. Nor can you dissemble from intimating this to our ears, so that from this very thing we may be able to conjecture whether what he is said to have promised the Venetians concerning this is true. But if any clerics have been instituted by you or one of you in the aforesaid churches, cause them, with appeal set aside, to enjoy peaceful possession, and cause those removed to be restored to the same churches, as shall be just, by ecclesiastical censure, with appeal removed. [But if not. Given, etc., at Ferentino, on the eleventh day before the Kalends of July, in the ninth year, 1206.]

Quum in ecclesiis oportet extraneos institui, non debent institui clerici certae originis tantum, sed undecunque sint; dum tamen sint idonei.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: Institutions and custodianships can by special right pertain to one who is not the bishop, and while litigation with the diocesan is pending he is defended in possession. This it says. Or thus: if one to whom it does not pertain by common law possesses the right of instituting, while judgment concerning ownership is pending he is defended in possession.

The same, to the Bishop of Ely and the Archdeacon of Norwich.

When the beloved sons Master Honorius, Archdeacon of Richmond, and Master Columbus our subdeacon, I. of York, R. Avenel, and the proctors of our venerable brother the Archbishop of York came to the Apostolic See, we thought that they should be heard in our consistory. On behalf of the aforesaid archbishop it was proposed that the institution of persons and custody of vacant churches pertain to him in his diocese both by common law and by general custom. But certain of his predecessors personally committed both institution and custody to certain archdeacons of Richmond, retaining them to themselves at the time of someone and freely using them, as pertained to them, in such a way that the archbishop who now presides over the church of York granted them by special grace to W. de Chimili, formerly Archdeacon of Richmond, at the requests of Richard, King of the English of illustrious memory, and, when he was afterward elected bishop, retained them for himself as his own. [And when he intended to assign that archdeaconry to the aforesaid master, both before its grant and in the grant itself he expressed that he reserved to himself both the institutions and custodianships. The archdeacon himself answered him that he would act against God and derogate from canonical law if he presumed to usurp for himself the institutions of churches, which belonged to the archbishop alone. Then, renouncing those liberties, he reduced his renunciation to writing and, for greater caution, fortified it with his own seal, and finally took a bodily oath that he would in no way involve himself in them.] But among other things the archdeacon himself answered that, when Henry I, King of England of illustrious memory, wished a new episcopal see to be created at Carlisle, because the Archdeaconry of Richmond was harmed by this, the king himself humbly petitioned T., Archbishop of York of good memory, that, in compensation for a certain part that was withdrawn from the aforesaid archdeaconry, he grant it the aforesaid dignities; and the archbishop, assenting to the requests of the petitioner, gave both the institutions and custodianships, not personally to the archdeacon who then existed, but perpetually to the archdeaconry, by a real and free grant with the consent of the York chapter. But since the archdeaconry itself had existed in continuous possession both of these and also of other liberties in the times of many archbishops, kings, and archdeacons, and the often-mentioned archbishop had granted it to him without any condition, after the grant he asserted that he had granted it with all its liberties except the institutions and custodianships of vacant churches. But he, [fully knowing the custom of the same archbishop, namely that, just as he would give easily, so he was accustomed lightly to repent, and] fearing that, if he expressly denied this, since he had not yet obtained possession as archdeacon, the archbishop would either wholly impede his act or it would be delayed longer, answered that he would do what pleased him not only concerning that but concerning all his revenues. [But afterward, having entered possession of the archdeaconry, he freely used those liberties as his predecessors had been accustomed to do. Subsequently, when the archbishop had despoiled him of the archdeaconry itself contrary to justice and he could in no way obtain its restitution unless by charter he renounced the aforesaid liberties, he, knowing that his right endured, while still despoiled gave the archbishop himself letters of renunciation fortified with his own seal; but, as was proposed in opposition, he in no way abjured them. Indeed, after obtaining the benefit of restitution, he used the same liberties as before, although the same archbishop manifoldly burdened him and his clerics concerning them and other things after an appeal had been lawfully interposed. Hence, since the grant of the aforesaid liberties was not made to the person but rather as a real grant to the personate, they were not specially granted to anyone by grace but were rather delivered as owed together with the archdeaconry, to whose integrity they undoubtedly pertained as compensation by way of dowry. On this account, even if some archbishop perhaps used them while he retained the archdeaconry in his hands, no prejudice was generated thereby against the archdeaconry, since they are understood afterward to have been granted in it. Furthermore, since in the Council of Tours divisions of prebends, dignities, and benefices are forbidden, and the Lateran Council, where it forbids new assessments to be imposed and adds that old ones are not to be increased, says, "Let no persons presume to appropriate a portion of the revenues for their own uses," it is apparent that the archbishop neither ought nor was able to mutilate the archdeaconry of its dignities and liberties. Nor is it to be believed that, before the grant or in the grant itself, it was arranged that the archbishop should retain the aforesaid liberties for himself, because, if he had perhaps wished thus to usurp another's property for himself, he would seem to have committed simoniacal depravity. But the renunciation could not harm the archdeacon, since he renounced while despoiled, and Pope Alexander of good memory, our predecessor, asserted that a renunciation of this kind was not valid. Moreover, although collation of the archdeaconry should have come by surreption to the aforesaid archbishop, its integrity nevertheless pertains to the dignity of the church of York, and neither archbishop nor archdeacon could, apart from the assent and without the counsel of the York chapter, harm to such an extent the dignities or liberties of the archdeaconry itself.] Upon these matters the opposing party replied that, even if the renunciation or abjuration did not harm the archdeaconry, nevertheless by these the faculty of seeking recovery was taken away from the archdeacon. But the archdeacon answered that he was not seeking recovery of those liberties, since he freely used them, as before, when he began his journey to come to the Apostolic See and enjoyed possession of them. But against this they replied again that the same archdeacon would not have petitioned to be instituted by the archbishop in a certain church of his archdeaconry if such institution pertained to him and he then enjoyed possession of those liberties. To this the archdeacon himself answered that he petitioned not to be instituted by the archbishop but rather to be confirmed, although it seemed unfitting that he should institute himself. We therefore, having heard and more fully understood the things proposed on either side, declared by interlocutory decision that the archdeacon is to be protected in full possession of the liberties of the same archdeaconry until it has lawfully been proved in opposition that those liberties were personally granted to the archdeacons by the archbishops, since in this case both before and after, and even in the grant itself, the archbishop could lawfully have retained them for himself as his own, or until it has lawfully been proved that the archdeacon abjured those liberties. But in this case, if that grant was real, no right or utility would accrue to the archbishop, because either at the petition of the church of York or by ourselves we shall make provision concerning this for the same archdeaconry. Therefore, if either of these has been lawfully [both proposed and] proved, let silence be imposed upon the archdeacon concerning those liberties; if neither, upon the archbishop. [Therefore strictly, etc.] adverso, nullatenus abiuravit; immo restitutionis beneficium assecutus, usus est eisdem libertatibus sicut prius, licet idem archiepiscopus ipsum et clericos eius super illis et aliis post appellationem legitime interpositam multipliciter aggravaret. Unde quum praedictarum concessio libertatum non fuerit personae, sed sicut realis personarii magis facta, non gratia specialiter concedebantur alicui sed ex debito potius cum archidiaconatu pariter tradebantur ad cuius integritatem tanquam in recompensationem dote proculdubio pertinebant. Propter quod, etsi aliquis archiepiscopus eis forsan usus fuerit, dum archidiaconatum in suis manibus retinebat, nullum propter hoc archidiaconatui est praeiudicium generatum, quum intelligantur postmodum in ipsa concessae. Praeterea, quum in Turonensi concilio praebendarum, dignitatum, beneficiorum sint inhibitae sectiones, et Lateranum concilium, ubi census novos imponi prohibet, et veteres augmentari subiungat, "Ne partem redituum aliqui suis usibus appropriare praesumant, "patet archiepiscopum nec debuisse nec potuisse archidiaconatum suis dignitatibus et libertatibus mutilare. Nec est credendum quod ante concessionem, vel in ipsa concessione actum fuerit, ut praedictas libertates sibi archiepiscopus retineret, quia si alienum sibi sic voluisset forsitan usurpare, commississe videretur simoniacam pravitatem. Renuntiatio autem archidiacono nocere non potuit, quum renunciaverit spoliatus, et bonae memoriae Alexander papa, praedecessor noster, renunciationem huiusmodi asseruerit non valere. Insuper quum, etsi collatio archidiaconatus surrepserit ad archiepiscopum memoratum, integritas tamen ad Eboracensis ecclesiae pertinet dignitatem, nec potuisset archiepiscopus vel archidiaconus praeter assensum et absque consilio Eboracensis capituli ipsius archidiaconatus in tantum laedere dignitates vel libertates.] Super haec pars replicavit adversa, quod, etsi renunciatio vel abiuratio archidiaconatui non noceret, per haec tamen esset archidiacono repetendi facultas adempta. Sed archidiaconus libertates illas se non repetere respondebat, quum eis libere, sicut prius, quando iter arripuit ad sedem apostolicam veniendi, uteretur, et earum possessione gauderet. Sed contra hoc iterum replicabant, quod idem archidiaconus in quadam ecclesia sui archidiaconatus non per archiepiscopum institui postulasset, si talis institutio pertinebat ad ipsum, et ipse tunc ipsarum libertatum possessione gauderet. Ad quod archidiaconus ipse respondit, quod per archiepiscopum non institui, sed confirmari potius postulavit, licet, quod se ipsum instituere, incongruum videretur. Nos igitur, auditis quae fuerant hinc inde proposita, et plenius intellectis, interlocuti fuimus, archidiaconum esse in plena libertatum eiusdem archidiaconatus possessione tuendum, donec probatum legitime fuerit ex adverso, libertates ipsas archidiaconis ab archiepiscopis personaliter fuisse concessas, quum in hoc casu tam ante quam post, et in ipsa etiam concessione archiepiscopus eas retinere sibi potuerit licite tanquam suas, vel donec legitime probatum fuerit, easdem libertates archidiaconum abiurasse. Sed in hoc casu, si concessio illa fuerit realis, archiepiscopo nihil iuris vel utilitatis accederet, quia nos vel ad petitionem Eboracensis ecclesiae, vel per nos ipsos super hoc archidiaconatui eidem consulemus. Si ergo alter utrum ipsorum fuerit legitime [et propositum, et] comprobatum, archidiacono super libertatibus ipsis, si neutrum, archi episcopo silentium imponatur. [Ideoque districte etc.]

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: He to whom the collation of dignities pertains cannot institute himself.

The same, to the Bishop of Troyes and the Archdeacon of Paris.

When it [had formerly come to our hearing that a certain dignity in the church of Péronne, which is commonly called the custodianship, had remained vacant for two years and more contrary to the statutes of the Lateran Council, we recall that we gave in command to our venerable brother the Archbishop of Tours, then Archdeacon of Paris, and our beloved son the Dean of Saint-Quentin that, if the matter stood thus, since the donation of that dignity had devolved upon us, they, supported by our authority, should assume it into their custody and should disclose the truth to us by their letters, so that, made more certain by them, we might confer the dignity itself upon a suitable person. But they peremptorily cited both the dean and chapter and also Matthew, abbot of the church of Péronne, who also conducted himself as custodian of that same church. And when the said archbishop, because he could not be present on the appointed day, had excused himself by his letters, the proctor of the aforesaid abbot appeared before the said dean, proposing that our letters directed to them were suspect for many reasons: both because in their salutation the name of the archdeacon had been placed before that of the dean, and the small mark that is customarily appended for the identification of the person obtaining the letters had not been written on the back but rather in the margin of the letters; and because the capital letter S in this word "salutem" was extended too far lengthwise on its rear part; and because in the same letters an adversary, accuser, or even denouncer had not been designated by name—all of which he alleged to be contrary to the custom of the Apostolic See. The same proctor also, alleging that it was necessary to proceed in that business according to judicial order, insistently requested a delay so that the said abbot might be able to be present personally in the same cause, interposing the obstacle of an appeal if the requested delay were denied him. But the said dean, treating the aforesaid allegations with contempt as superfluous, wholly denied the delay and assumed the aforesaid custodianship into his care, appointing suitable providers both in external and internal matters. And so that he might make us more certain about the truth of the business, he compelled the dean and certain canons of the church of Péronne to bear witness to the truth concerning that business; he sent their depositions, enclosed under his own seal, to our presence. We therefore, reviewing more diligently the proceeding of that dean, although we regarded certain exceptions proposed by the proctor of the aforesaid abbot as frivolous and empty, nevertheless, because according to lawful enactments, even if not cognizance but execution is committed, it is still necessary to inquire into the truth of the petitions, especially since that clause, namely, "if the matter stands thus," had been inserted in our letters, thought that the proceeding of the same dean—who assumed the custodianship into his care before he inquired into the truth—should be annulled. By apostolic writings we command your discretion that you restore the abbot himself to the aforesaid custodianship, since it is established that he was removed contrary to the form of the apostolic mandate, and then take care to proceed according to the tenor of the same mandate, nevertheless attending to this: unless the said abbot shows a reasonable cause why he can have the custodianship and the abbacy together in the same church, you, after removing him, are to assume the often-mentioned custodianship into your care, the obstacle of appeal having been removed, and are to keep it until you fulfill the apostolic mandate concerning it.] But we do not wish you to be ignorant that, after the same M. was made abbot, he could not by law obtain the aforesaid custodianship, because, since by reason of the abbacy the donation both of the custodianship and of the other dignities, and also of the prebends in the church of Péronne, pertains to him, he could not receive the custodianship itself from himself, since there ought to be personal distinction between giver and receiver; nor could he receive it from another, since another did not have the right of conferring it. Title VIII: On Granting a Prebend and a Church Not Vacant

Latin source headnote: One knowingly instituted into the benefice of a living person is to be deposed.

Pope Gelasius I, to the Romans.

Those who are placed in the position of living priests are by that very fact, according to the canons, to be driven from ecclesiastical communion, because they permitted themselves to be appointed as successors to living priests.

DE CONCESSIONE PRAEBENDAE ET ECCLESIAE NON VACANTIS.

Institutus scienter in beneficium viventis deponendus est.

Gelasius I. Papa ad Romanos.

Qui in vivorum sacerdotum loco ponuntur, hoc ipso secundum canones sunt ab ecclesiastica communione pellendi, quo se passi sunt successores vivis sacerdotibus adhiberi.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: Benefices not vacant ought not to be granted or promised; and, when they become vacant, they ought to be granted within six months. When these have elapsed, collation devolves from the bishop to the chapter, and conversely, and finally to the next superior.

From the Lateran Council.

Let no ecclesiastical ministries, or even benefices or churches, be bestowed upon or promised to anyone before they become vacant, lest someone seem to desire the death of his neighbor, into whose position and benefice he believes that he will succeed. For since [this] is found to have been forbidden even in the laws of the gentiles, it is [exceedingly] shameful and full of the chastisement of divine judgment if expectation of a future succession should have a place in the church of God, when even the gentiles themselves took care to condemn it. But when ecclesiastical prebends or any offices in some church happen to become vacant, or if they are even now vacant, let them not long remain in suspense, but within six months let them be conferred upon persons who are able worthily to administer them. But if the bishop, where it pertains to him, should delay conferring one, let it be ordered by the chapter. But if it pertains to the chapter and it has not done this within the prescribed term, let the bishop execute it according to God with the counsel of religious men. Or if perhaps all have neglected it, let the metropolitan dispose of them according to God without their contradiction. [Furthermore, etc. (cf. c. 4, On Prebends, III. 5.)]

Quum vero praebendas ecclesiasticas seu quaelibet officia in aliqua ecclesia vacare contigerit, vel si etiam modo vacant, non diu maneant in suspenso sed infra sex menses personis, quae digne administrare valeant, conferantur. Quod si ad capitulum pertinuerit, et infra praescriptum terminum hoc non fecerit, episcopus secundum Deum hoc cum religiosorum virorum consilio exsequatur. Chapter III

Latin source headnote: Vacant benefices are conferred notwithstanding the appeal of those to whom they had been promised before they became vacant.

Alexander III, to the Archbishop of York.

It has been reported to our ears that certain clerics, possessing revenues of one hundred or two hundred marks in ecclesiastical benefices and alleging that the first churches to become vacant had been promised to them by monks or canons or others having the right of patronage, issue the voice of appeal so that others may not be instituted in those churches when they become vacant, and so that meanwhile they may be able by some artifice to fulfill their purpose. We answer your consultation in this manner: since promises made concerning churches not vacant were annulled in the Lateran Council, it ought not, under pretext of the appeal of those who rely upon the aforesaid promises, to be omitted that churches, when they become vacant, be ordered concerning suitable persons.

> Beneficia vacantia conferuntur non obstante appellatione illorum, quibus promissa fuerant ante, quam vacarent.

Alexander III. Eboracensi Archiepiscopo.

Relatum est auribus nostris, +quod quidam clerici in beneficiis ecclesiasticis C. vel CC. marcarum reditus possidentes, et proponentes primas vacantes ecclesias a monachis vel canonicis vel aliis ius patronatus habentibus sibi fuisse promissas, ne in illis, quum vacant, instituantur alii, vocem appellationis emittunt, ut interim arte aliqua propositum suum valeant adimplere. Consultationi tuae taliter respondemus, quod, quum in Lateranensi concilio promissiones factae de ecclesiis non vacantibus sint cassatae, praetextu appellationis eorum, qui iam dictis promissionibus innituntur, omitti non debet, quin ecclesiae, quum vacaverint, de personis idoneis ordinentur.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: If a rescript is written to him to whom collation pertains, with an executor appointed to provide, by presentation of the letters made to the collator the prebend is so affected that a collation made to another is not valid. This it says according to the true understanding. See chapter If to the chapter, under the same title in the Sixth.

Innocent III, to the Provost and Chapter of Cambrai.

T. the priest, our beloved son, proposed to us that, when Pope C. of good memory, our predecessor, after the requests that he had extended to you for receiving him as a brother and assigning to him the prebend next to become vacant in your church, which pertained to your donation, had sent you an apostolic mandate, with the Dean of Reims appointed executor, the dean himself, finding you contumacious and rebellious in the execution of the apostolic mandate, invested him by apostolic authority with the first prebend to become vacant in your church that pertained to the donation of the chapter, [commanding you that, receiving him as a canon and brother, you confer upon him a stall in the choir and a place in the chapter; entrance into churches was interdicted to you if you delayed beyond three days to fulfill what he commanded. But you neither wished to execute his mandate nor refrained from entrance into churches; rather, in evasion of the apostolic mandate, you appealed to the same dean as a means of escape.] But when the dean himself, overtaken by death, could proceed no further in that business, and the prebend that pertained to your donation became vacant in the church of Cambrai, you assigned it to another, [promulgating a sentence of excommunication against that priest because he had retained the letters of the same dean as testimony for himself.] But that same predecessor of ours, wishing what had been done by the same dean to be held valid, wholly annulled the collation of the prebend made by you and, [after absolving the priest from the bond of excommunication,] invested him with it by his own hand through a ring. Although it is not our intention to hold valid investitures made concerning things to become vacant contrary to the statutes of the canons—we who, according to the plenitude of power, can by law dispense above the law—nevertheless, attending that the same priest was invested by our predecessor not with a thing to become vacant but with a vacant thing, inasmuch as it was understood to be vacant after the annulment of the grant made by you, by apostolic writings we command your discretion and order that, removing any holder from that prebend, you confer it upon T., every delay, excuse, and appeal being set aside, and permit it to be possessed peacefully by him; and assign to him a stall in the choir and a place in the chapter with the fullness of canonical honor. [Otherwise, etc. Given at Rome at Saint Peter's. 1198.]

Si scribitur ei, ad quem spectat collatio, dato exsecutore ad providendum, per praesentationem literarum collatori factam afficitur praebenda ita, quod collatio alteri facta non tenet. H. d. secundum verum intellectum. Vide cap. Si capitulo eod. tit. in VI.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: The six-month period fixed by law for electing or conferring does not run against one lawfully impeded, nor does it begin to run except from the day of knowledge of the vacancy. This it says, and the text is very frequently alleged and of daily application.

The same, to P., Cardinal Deacon of Saint Mary in Via Lata, Legate of the Apostolic See.

Because diversity of minds often follows diversity of bodies, lest the plenitude of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, distributed among many, grow cheap, but rather, conferred upon one, remain vigorous, the Lord conferred upon the Apostolic See in blessed Peter the mastership and primacy of all churches and of all the faithful of Christ. Retaining for itself the plenitude of power, for the more praiseworthy fulfillment of the pastoral office that made it a debtor to all, it called many into a share of its solicitude, so distributing its burden and honor to others that it subtracted nothing from its own right nor diminished its jurisdiction in anything. But since, by the office of the authority it has received, it neither can nor ought, as the mother of individuals, to deny justice to individuals justly petitioning, since justice and judgment are the preparation of its seat, we, who, although insufficient, have been assumed to its governance, cannot fail to assist our brothers and fellow bishops crying out to us in justice, or fail to hear what they have justly requested, lest, if perhaps we should be found remiss in exhibiting justice to them, they too should be found negligent in rendering the rights of their subjects, and should execute less praiseworthily the part of our solicitude committed [to them] if—which may it not be—they see us either turn aside from right or fail to hear those petitioning for justice. Therefore, diligently moved by this reason, we benignly received at the Apostolic See our venerable brother [G.,] the Archbishop of York, who came there, and took care to hear his manifold complaints. Among other things the Archbishop of York complained [that,] since the collation of prebends in the church of York and in his other churches pertains to him, during the time of his suspension and afterward certain persons intruded themselves into them apart from his authority, and in this and other matters derogated not a little from his right. Certain persons also had crept into certain abbeys of the diocese of York after an appeal had been interposed to us, and had requested from him neither the gift of confirmation nor the grace of benediction. Wishing, therefore, that provision be made for the same archbishop through the industry of your solicitude, by the counsel of our brothers, by apostolic writings we [strictly] command—we command you that, after previous admonition, you induce those who accepted prebends or dignities of the church of York or of other churches pertaining to his donation apart from his authority to resign them, since they cannot retain them with a safe conscience. But if perhaps they should be unwilling to acquiesce in your admonitions, compel them to this, through a sentence of excommunication and the withdrawal of their other benefices, notwithstanding a confirmation obtained from the Apostolic See under the common form, which confirms benefices and prebends as they are justly and peacefully possessed, appeal being removed, unless perhaps some obtained them either by a special mandate of the Apostolic See or by authority of the Lateran Council from the York chapter. Yet let the time of suspension in no way be computed within the six months, since that constitution of the Lateran Council was promulgated only against the negligent and slothful, and then, even if the archbishop himself wished, he was nevertheless unable to use his own power in conferring prebends. And although he was suspended from that power by his own fault, the donation of prebends did not by reason of that fault devolve upon the chapter itself, but during the time of his suspension the donation of prebends pertained to him who, apart from his sloth and negligence, could donate the prebends. Nor is the time during which he journeyed to the Apostolic See, remained there, or departed from it in any way to be computed within the six months. Moreover, we wish the six-month period to be computed not from the time of vacancy of the prebends, but rather from the knowledge of the archbishop himself and from the admonition made to his person by the chapter, since mention is made in the privilege that the same chapter is said to have obtained from our predecessor of a canonical admonition to be sent beforehand. But we regard as altogether frivolous the claim, if perhaps some say that they obtained certain of those prebends by royal donation, as if the royal highness could by its own authority confer those prebends during the archbishop's suspension. But canonically punish the aforesaid abbots if, after an appeal [to us] was lawfully interposed, they received the benefit of confirmation and benediction, lest by their example others assume the haughtiness of pride against their prelates. [Given on the fourth day before the Kalends of May. 1199.]

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: Letters obtained for a benefice are not valid when they make no mention of another's colorable possession in fact. This it says according to the true and common understanding; the text is very frequently alleged, has matter of daily application, and was a very subtle decision.

The same, to the Bishop of Basel and the Abbot of Saint Mary.

When it was formerly intimated to our ears that the provostship of the church of Lausanne had been vacant for so long that, according to the statutes of the Lateran Council, its donation had devolved upon us, we, wishing to exhibit a special grace to our venerable brother the bishop and our beloved sons the canons of Lausanne, and thereby to acquire merit for them from ourselves, commanded them by writings that they confer that provostship, without any difficulty, upon our beloved son B., our subdeacon, the treasurer of Lausanne, certain executors being appointed concerning this; and that, when he had been assumed by them as provost, they assign the treasury of that church, whose assignment was alleged to pertain by law to the same bishop and canons, to a suitable person. But lest the benefit of apostolic provision should remain in any respect imperfect, we commanded our beloved sons the Abbots of Hauterive and Fontaine-André and the Prior of Val-de-

Travers that, if the aforesaid bishop and canons neglected to fulfill our mandate, they themselves, every obstacle of contradiction and appeal being removed, should not delay to execute it if they relied upon the truth of the premise, restraining by ecclesiastical censure, appeal being removed, those who rashly chose to oppose our mandate. But the aforesaid bishop and canons, upon receiving our letters, said that the aforesaid provostship was not vacant, because, although the man who had been provost had been assumed as bishop, he had nevertheless, after his consecration, again been elected by the canons themselves to that provostship and possessed it as before. The aforesaid executors, saying that this was contrary to law unless it had been specially granted to them by the Apostolic See, therefore assigned the provostship itself, vacant by law, to the aforesaid treasurer, by the apostolic authority with which they appeared to be supported, to be corporeally possessed, interdicting entrance into the church to the canons themselves unless within eight days they humbly obeyed him as their provost. (And below:) When the aforesaid and other things had been related in his presence by the messenger of our said subdeacon, the messenger of the opposing party proposed that, after his lord the Bishop of Sion, who had been Provost of Lausanne, was consecrated bishop, the Lausanne chapter again conferred and granted that provostship upon him to have, attending in this to the utility and necessity of their church and also to ancient custom. The Bishop of Lausanne, seeing that he was exceedingly useful and necessary to his church, approved what had been done concerning this by his canons, and honor was rendered to him as provost by the canons and even by the treasurer himself. But afterward the aforesaid treasurer, approaching the Roman Church and suppressing everything that had been done both by the bishop and by the said canons, suggested to us that the provostship was vacant. Therefore he obtained from us letters concerning its assignment to him; the messenger alleged on many grounds that they had been obtained through suppression of the truth and suggestion of falsehood, alleging on behalf of his lord of Sion the utility, custom, and necessity that the aforesaid treasurer had suppressed. (And below:) Conversely, the messenger of the opposing party alleged, and endeavored by many reasons to show, that the provostship was vacant and had, while vacant, been granted to the treasurer of Lausanne by authority of the superior to whom its donation had devolved according to the statutes of the Lateran Council. He also endeavored by manifold reasoning to show further that the said Bishop of Sion could in no way have been elected after his consecration to the provostship of Lausanne, from which he had been assumed to the governance of the episcopate, since the statutes of the sacred canons opposed him concerning this. He also said that the provostship was vacant for another reason: those whose donation it was presumed, after he had been assumed as bishop, to grant it to him, since according to the statutes of the aforesaid council both he who received what he accepted contrary to the sacred canons ought to lose it, and he who gave it ought to be deprived of the power of granting. He also showed by many assertions that the utility, custom, and necessity that his messenger had alleged in support of the cause of the Bishop of Sion in no way aided him, since these appeared rather to be begged supports than true supports for his cause. Hence the messenger himself petitioned that we deign to confirm by apostolic authority what had been done by the aforesaid judges and to remove the Bishop of Sion from the provostship itself. Therefore, an auditor appointed by us concerning this decreed by our mandate that what had been done by the aforesaid executors under color of our letters be held null and void, namely because they had been obtained by suggestion of falsehood and suppression of the truth, since that provostship was not vacant in fact, because such possession has more of fact than of law. But we, holding valid the sentence of the same cardinal, by apostolic writings command you that, unless the aforesaid Bishop of Sion sufficiently shows that the aforesaid provostship was granted to him after his consecration either by a special indulgence of the Apostolic See or for another just and necessary cause, you compel him to resign it, if he should be unwilling to do so voluntarily, by ecclesiastical censure, appeal being removed, and thereafter take care diligently to admonish and induce the Lausanne chapter on our behalf to confer it upon the aforesaid treasurer.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: Where it is established that a benefice was conferred by one having power, possession ought not to be delayed by an exception of abjuration and renunciation.

The same, to the Archdeacon of Richmond.

After the election and confirmation of our venerable brother [Eustace,] Bishop of Ely, when the Archdeaconry of Richmond, which he had held, became vacant, the Archbishop of York granted it to you by his own liberality, giving a mandate to the York chapter by his letters that they take care to receive you as archdeacon, as is customary. They were unwilling to obey his mandate for reasons of this kind, because, among other things that Pope Celestine of good memory, our predecessor, is known to have granted to the dean and chapter of York by his privilege, he also decreed that the ordering of canons or persons should be free, as had been observed until then from the very foundation of the place, namely, so that a suitable and honorable person upon whom the archbishop himself should determine to confer a vacant prebend or dignity in the church of York would, according to the ancient custom of that church, be presented to the aforesaid dean and chapter; [and, received by the chapter as a canon through the book and bread, he ought to be invested in the chapter by the hand of the dean; afterward, received with the kiss of the brethren, he would interpose the customary and due oath concerning preserving fidelity to the church itself, defending its liberties and customs consonant with law to the best of his ability, and not disclosing the secrets of the chapter; and then, by the mandate of the dean and chapter, as is customary, he would be installed by the hand of the cantor;] and if anyone were introduced into that church by someone contrary to this ancient and approved custom, he would be held neither as a person nor as a canon. But if the archbishop should not confer a vacant prebend or personate in that church, within the term of the Lateran Council and according to the prescribed form, after a canonical admonition had been sent beforehand, upon a suitable person, it would be lawful for the dean and chapter, by apostolic authority, notwithstanding any contradiction or appeal, to confer it according to the statutes of that council. Therefore, since no mention of the dean had been made in the archbishop's letters directed to the chapter, by whose hand you ought to have been invested in the chapter, his mandate rightly met contradiction, [and also for this reason: when that same predecessor of ours took care to invest I. of Saint Lawrence with the chancellorship of York by his own hand through a ring, commanding his messenger to assign in his name a stall in the choir and a place in the chapter and procession, together with the entirety of the revenues and everything pertaining to the chancellorship, you, because you presumed to retain those proceeds in contempt of the apostolic mandate, were ensnared in the bond of excommunication by the dean and chapter of York; hence you were not in the meantime to be admitted to a dignity. Moreover, this reason opposed you: before receiving investiture from the chapter, you intruded yourself into the archidiaconal office. Hence, according to the tenor of the privilege, you ought not to be held as a person, especially since homicides, sacrileges, arsons, and many other grave and enormous acts were objected against you, which, while striving to usurp that archdeaconry for yourself by armed force, you did not fear to perpetrate.] Therefore, when your institution had been rejected by the chapter for the foregoing and other reasons, they, lest they sustain loss of their right, understanding also that donation of that archdeaconry had devolved upon them both by authority of the Lateran Council and by the privilege granted to them, having taken the counsel of prudent men, unanimously conferred it upon our beloved son R. of Saint Edmund, investing him with it, as is customary, and solemnly installing him. But in the course of time, after the aforesaid archbishop returned from the Apostolic See into Normandy, and after the resignation and abjuration made by you and received by him, he conferred the aforesaid archdeaconry upon the same R., who petitioned that the archdeaconry itself, assigned to him with reason by virtue of both the first and the second grant, be confirmed by the Apostolic See.

To his objections you replied in order as follows: although mention of the dean was not expressly made in the archbishop's letters directed to the chapter, he nevertheless could not or ought not on that account to appear excluded, as the opposing party alleged; rather, he was contained in the chapter, just as a part is contained in the whole, of which the dean is an honorable part, while the archbishop is the head, nor does it happen that in one body [without] a monstrous prodigy two heads are found. [You endeavored to show in many ways that the sentence of excommunication issued by the dean and chapter did not bind you: both because you had by no means received the fruits of the chancellorship, since you had been constituted by the archbishop proctor only of the spiritualities; and because neither you nor another could be coerced on occasion of a simple mandate, by which coercion is committed to no one, especially since that sentence, whatever it was, had been promulgated after an appeal interposed by you. Hence our venerable brother the Archbishop of Canterbury, then legate of the Apostolic See in England, having shared the counsel of many fellow bishops and other prudent men, pronounced that you were not bound by a sentence of this kind, as you endeavored to show from the rescript of the legate himself. Moreover, since you were absent at that time, you did not intrude yourself into the administration of the archdeaconry; but when you later saw investiture denied to you by the chapter contrary to justice, you entered the archdeaconry by mandate of the superior and began to minister in it as pertained to your office. But you wholly denied that homicides or other such things were perpetrated there by you, or that you had renounced or even abjured the archdeaconry, asserting that, at the time when the opposing party said that you had renounced or abjured it and that the archdeaconry had been conferred upon him, the archbishop regarded you as archdeacon and your adversary alike as excommunicated and as an intruder. Hence, by authority of our letters, at the mandate of our beloved son P., cardinal priest and then legate of the Apostolic See, before our venerable brother the Archbishop of Rouen and his fellow judges in Normandy, and thereafter before the Bishop of Lincoln of good memory and his fellow judges in England, that same archbishop drew your adversary into litigation concerning his intrusion; and we recall that we received the attestations taken concerning that business.] You further added that, even if you had done those things, they nevertheless could not effectually be objected against you by your adversary. Rather, silence should be imposed upon him concerning the archdeaconry itself and, your institution having been approved, restitution should be made to you; this you endeavored to show from the confession made in judgment and repeatedly reiterated by the opposing party. For Roger himself, when questioned by us in law as to the time from which the Archdeaconry of Richmond had been assigned to him by the chapter, answered that around the next feast of the Ascension three years would be complete. Therefore, since it was established from the date of our letters that at that time the archbishop was staying at the Apostolic See, and in them the ancient law had been declared by us, so that the time during which he approached the Apostolic See, [and] remained there, or departed from it was not to be computed within the six-month period, you said that it was plainly established that that period had by no means run against the archbishop. But even if four years had elapsed, as the opposing party, repenting of its earlier response, proposed in the last place—which on your behalf was said not to be possible in law—since even then he had begun the journey to come to the Apostolic See, although he had not pursued it continuously, having been delayed by manifold impediments, the interpretation of our rescript pertained also to a time of this kind; moreover, prescription could not harm one placed in exile. But the act of the chapter could not excuse that same R., because, since the institution made by the archbishop had preceded it, the chapter as inferior could not reject what the superior had ordered, for, even if you had not been admitted contrary to the statute of the privilege, they nevertheless could not proceed against you—especially while absent and not contumacious—because they had neither been constituted executors of the privilege nor could they be judges and actors at the same time. Therefore, if anything was to be proposed by them against the archbishop's act, a question of this kind was to be brought to the superior tribunal so that it might be ended by its authority. Consequently, while your institution made by him was pending—by him to whom it pertained both by common law and by authority of the aforesaid privilege, by which collation of personates and prebends was reserved to the archbishop—the same R. ought not to have crept into the place of a living person. [For blessed Gregory says: "We depose from the honor of that archdeaconry the man who consented to be advanced to another's archdeaconry contrary to the rule of justice; and if he should presume thereafter to minister in the same place, let him know that he is deprived of participation in holy communion." By the authority of this decree, therefore, you asserted that your adversary was to be deposed from the office of the archdeaconry that he had received badly, especially since he vehemently insisted upon that first surreption and endeavored through an institution of this kind to prove his purpose; and you humbly petitioned that the archdeaconry itself be restored to you.]

We therefore, having heard and more fully understood these and the other things that the parties wished to propose in our presence, because it was established to us that the aforesaid archdeaconry had first been granted to you by the Archbishop of York [and] that, the institution made by him not having been rejected according to the order of law, an archdeaconry not vacant could not and ought not duly to be transferred to another, thought that silence should be imposed concerning it upon the aforesaid R., who consented to be advanced to another's archdeaconry contrary to the rule of justice, decreeing by sentence that the institution made concerning you by the Archbishop of York take effect. But thereafter, if anyone who wishes and is able should determine to propose anything against you concerning the renunciation, abjuration, or any of the foregoing matters, he will be able to try it by judicial order. [Therefore let no one, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the Kalends of June. 1202.]

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: Once a person has been received as a canon, the chapter is bound to provide for him as soon as the faculty presents itself.

The same, to C., Canon of Tortona.

When, concerning the question of a prebend of Tortona that was disputed between you on the one side and our venerable brother the bishop and our beloved sons the canons of Tortona on the other, you and the proctors of the other party were constituted in our presence, we appointed for you as auditor our beloved son Hugh, cardinal priest of the title of Saint Martin. Before him it was alleged on your behalf as follows: when Odo, Bishop of Tortona of good memory and your paternal uncle, having returned from the Apostolic See, earnestly requested the canons of Tortona to receive you as a canon and brother, they, cheerfully assenting to his requests, received you, no mention being made of a first or second [prebend.] From that time until now you have had a place in the choir and chapter like the other canons, have read lessons in the church and sung responsories, and houses in the canonry had been assigned to you by the aforesaid bishop [in the name of a canon;] you possessed and possess them in quiet. And since, of those canons in that church of Tortona who possess no prebend in it, you were the first instituted and received, and now a benefice in it is vacant, you humbly petitioned us that we deign to give a strict mandate to the canons of Tortona that they assign the vacant benefice to you, every difficulty being set aside, and cause you to enjoy peaceful possession of it. But the proctors of the other party answered to the contrary that, since a fixed number of canons had been instituted in the church of Tortona and confirmed by writings of the Roman Pontiffs, and the canons were bound by an oath given to observe that constitution, we gave them a mandate by our letters to receive our beloved son B., our subdeacon and chaplain, as a canon and brother and assign him a prebend as to one of the other canons. But because the established number of canons was then full in that church, they could not put our mandate into execution. After no small time, however, the aforesaid O., formerly bishop, pressed the canons of Tortona by persuasions, threats, and terrors to receive you as a canon for the prebend next to become vacant, steadfastly promising them that he would free them both from the petition of the citizens of Tortona and from execution of the apostolic mandate that they had received for the reception of our same subdeacon; and thus, fraudulently circumventing them, he caused you to be received for the prebend next to become vacant. [But when our beloved son R., cardinal priest of the title of Saint Peter in Chains, was exercising the office of legation in the regions of Lombardy, he caused our same subdeacon to be instituted as a canon of the church of Tortona through a certain cleric of his, assigning to him a stall in the choir and a place in the chapter, in the presence of the aforesaid former bishop, who made no mention of your reception. But the aforesaid canons, although because of the insolence of the clerics they did not show it publicly, held wholly valid the institution made concerning B. When, around the past Easter, the said former bishop paid the debt of the flesh, and the aforesaid bishop who now exists—who had been Archdeacon of the church of Tortona—was substituted for him, those same canons unanimously decreed that the vacant prebend be conferred upon our aforesaid subdeacon, as we perceived was contained in their letters; and the proctors of the chapter itself granted the aforesaid vacant prebend to him in our presence. Hence it was humbly petitioned of us that, wholly annulling your institution as attempted contrary to the Lateran Council and absolving the church of Tortona from your impetition, we deign to confirm by apostolic authority the grant of the aforesaid prebend made to our same subdeacon.] We therefore, made more certain by the aforesaid cardinal of those things that were proposed on either side, holding valid by the counsel of our brothers the grant made by the aforesaid canons to our aforesaid subdeacon concerning the aforesaid prebend, thought that it should be confirmed by apostolic authority. But since it is established both by your assertion and by the confession of the other party that you were received as a brother and canon of the church of Tortona, although the opposing party alleges that your reception was made contrary to the Lateran Council, nevertheless, because this was not proved, the other party wholly denying it, and the canons themselves did not appear able by law to object this against you, since they confess that they received you contrary to the statutes of the aforesaid council, we decree by sentence that a prebendal benefice be conferred upon you in the church of Tortona as soon as the faculty presents itself, since, from the time you were received as a canon, you ought not to lack a prebend. [Willing, moreover, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the seventh day before the Ides of July. 1202.]

Latin source headnote: If one having a prebend in the same church receives a dignity with a prebend, or another prebend, the first becomes vacant. And although it is confirmed to him by a superior, nevertheless an impetration of it made by another is valid, even when the other's possession is not mentioned, because that possession is not colorable. This it says according to the true understanding. Panormitanus.

The same, to the Bishop and Master P., Canon of Hildesheim.

We have received your letters, by which you took care to signify to us that, when we wrote to you on behalf of our beloved son D. the cleric, that you should take care to invest him by apostolic authority with the vacant prebend of Saint Willehad at Bremen, which he said had devolved upon our donation according to the statutes of the Lateran Council, if the canons to whom we wrote concerning this did not take care to execute it; and when Herbert the provost and certain canons of that church, together with Daniel himself and Master B., a canon of that church, were for this reason constituted in your presence, it was proposed before us concerning the fact that the same H. the provost, formerly a simple [existing] canon of the same church, had been elected from that church as a canon in the greater church, and afterward, when the space of one year or a year and a half had elapsed, was assumed as provost in that church of Saint Willehad, nevertheless retaining the former prebend that he then had in that church; and concerning this the parties agreed, saying to one another that these things stood thus. It was also proposed by one party that the provost himself had, in addition to that prebend, another prebend annexed to the provostship, which the same provost and his supporters denied to be a prebend. Furthermore, it was alleged in law that, from the time when the same provost had been called from the lesser church to the greater, the former prebend had begun to become vacant by law according to the statutes of the canons. Then it was alleged on behalf of the cleric that the first ordinance of that church had been that there should be thirteen persons in it, namely the provost with twelve brothers; this would in no way be observed unless that prebend were said to be vacant. But the provost alleged to the contrary that it was almost of general custom that one man should have several prebends in the same church, and that, when the Archbishop of Bremen invested the provost himself with the provostship in full synod, he confirmed to him both that provostship and the prebend with the common assent of the canons, binding with the bond of excommunication those who should trouble him concerning this. Hence it was objected against the aforesaid cleric that on this account he had incurred the sentence of excommunication; but he denied that such a confirmation had intervened, and asserted that, even if it had intervened, it was not valid by law, because that thing which cannot be obtained by law could reasonably be confirmed to no one. He also said that he had never been bound by a sentence of excommunication on this account, since he proceeded concerning these matters by authority of a superior. Hence, because it appeared doubtful to you whether, when someone is elected from one prebend to another, the former at once begins to become vacant, or whether it ought to be adjudged away from him by sentence, or whether, on account of the confirmation of this kind that is expressed above, that prebend ought to be said not to be vacant, you wished to consult us before you should determine anything concerning this. Therefore, since, if it is thus, that prebend, even if not in fact, is nevertheless known to be vacant by law, by apostolic writings we command your discretion that, after previous admonition, you compel the aforesaid provost to resign that prebend without difficulty, by ecclesiastical censure, appeal being removed; and when it has become vacant in fact, take care, supported by our authority and with the obstacle of appeal removed, to confer it upon the aforesaid cleric, inducting him into its corporal possession and defending him once inducted; but restrain by ecclesiastical censure those who rashly determine to oppose themselves. [But if, etc. Given on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of June. 1205.]

Latin source headnote: In churches without a fixed number, vacancy of prebends or canonries is not possible, nor does devolution to the superior occur there from six months' negligence in not providing the church with ministers. This it says, and it is a notable case.

The same, to the Bishop and Archpriest of Pavia.

It was intimated to our ears on behalf of the church of Asti that, when certain prebends in it had been vacant for four years and more, our venerable brother the Bishop of Asti diligently admonished his canons to order the church. When they did not admit his admonition, the bishop instituted certain persons there, believing this to be lawful for him by the Lateran Council. But those instituted, knowing that an institution of this kind was not firm, had recourse to our venerable brother the Archbishop of Milan, who ordered them as canons of the church of Asti and inducted them into corporal possession of the prebends, with the chapter of that church furnishing assent, except only three, who took care to oppose themselves to an institution of this kind. Those three said that the election ought to be annulled because neither the bishop nor the aforesaid archbishop could by the grant of the Lateran Council have ordered the aforesaid church, since each had been negligent and remiss in that ordering during the time granted to them by the canon. But the other party said to the contrary that, although the bishop's institution was not valid, nevertheless the archbishop's ordering was valid by law, because the time granted to him by the canon did not run except from the time when it had been made known to him; to prove this it introduced manifold reasons. When these things had been proposed on either side, finally both parties confessed in agreement that in the aforesaid church there were no distinct prebends, nor was the number of canons fixed. We therefore, having diligently heard these and the other things that were proposed on either side, clearly understood that the statute of the Lateran Council concerning benefices vacant beyond six months had no place at all in this matter, since, even if perhaps the church of Asti suffered a deficiency of canons, nevertheless no prebends were vacant in it, since in it neither are there distinct prebends nor is the number of canons determined. Hence the institution made by the archbishop or bishop on occasion of the aforesaid council ought to lack the strength of validity. But because the whole chapter, except only three, approves and desires the reception of the aforesaid persons, and nothing reasonable has been objected and shown against them by those three, by apostolic writings we command your discretion that, after diligently inquiring into the truth, if the resources of the church of Asti suffice, you cause the aforesaid clerics, with every obstacle of contradiction and appeal removed, to be held as canons according to the custom hitherto observed. [As for contradictors, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the seventeenth day before the Kalends of July. 1204.]

Pars vero altera dicebat econtra, quod, licet institutio episcopi non valeret, archiepiscopi tamen ordinatio de iure valebat, quia ei tempus indultum a canone nisi a tempore, quo illi declaratum fuerat, non currebat, ad quod probandum inducebat multiplices rationes. His autem utrinque propositis,* Tandem utraque pars concorditer est confessa, quod in praedicta ecclesia non erant distinctae praebendae, nec canonicorum numerus erat certus. Nos igitur his et aliis, quae fuerunt utrinque proposita, diligenter auditis, intelleximus evidenter, statutum Lateranensis concilii de beneficiis ultra sex menses vacantibus locum in hoc articulo nullatenus habuisse, quum, etsi forte Astensis ecclesia canonicorum pateretur defectum, nullae tamen in ea praebendae vacabant, quum in illa nec sint distinctae praebendae, nec canonicorum numerus diffinitus. Latin source headnote: One having the power of conferring can by law deliver to another the power of conferring the first benefice that shall become vacant.

The same, to the Bishop and Chapter of Laon.

Constituted in our presence, our beloved son H., subdeacon [of ours] and canon of your church, humbly intimated to us that you, brother bishop, gave him power to confer the sacerdotal prebend that should first become vacant in your church, and that W., Archbishop of Reims of good memory, then legate of the Apostolic See, strictly commanded you, sons of the chapter, by our authority, as appears through his letters directed to you, which were read before us, that, when that prebend in your church became vacant, you receive to it, without the interposition of another person, that person upon whom the same H. should wish to confer it, and take care to invest that person with it without any difficulty. The same subdeacon [also] asserted that, when he was about to approach the Apostolic See, he, taking precaution, appealed lest you, brother bishop, if perhaps meanwhile some sacerdotal prebend happened to become vacant, confer it upon anyone, or you, sons of the chapter, receive anyone presented to it except one whom the aforesaid subdeacon should determine to present. Therefore, by apostolic writings we command your discretion that you admit without any contradiction that person upon whom the aforesaid H., when the sacerdotal prebend happens to become vacant, should determine canonically to confer it; and meanwhile you, brother bishop, are not to presume to confer a prebend of this kind upon anyone contrary to the form of your grant. Otherwise, know that we have commanded our beloved sons the chancellor and Helvin and Adam, canons of Paris, to compel you to this by ecclesiastical censure, appeal being removed, reducing to invalidity anything that they learn was attempted, after the appeal lawfully interposed to us by the aforesaid subdeacon, contrary to the grant made to him concerning the sacerdotal prebend. But because such grants, if drawn into a precedent, could be made in fraud of the canonical sanction by which ecclesiastical benefices are forbidden to be granted or promised before they become vacant, we do not wish that, on occasion of a mandate of this kind, which contains a personal grace, license be granted to those wishing to employ fraud. Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: The Lateran Council concerning benefices vacant beyond six months is not extended to bishoprics.

Innocent III.

Our beloved son Master G., your canon, formerly suggested to us that, when your bishop of good memory entered upon the way of all flesh, the greater and sounder part of you had agreed upon him and proposed to elect him as bishop, but, because the noble man the Count of Crotone impeded it, the election was not celebrated. Afterward the same count, investing Madius his chaplain with that bishopric, enjoined you either to depart from his land or to elect that M. as pastor. When our venerable brother the Archbishop of Santa Severina, then elect, heard this, he summoned the aforesaid William to his presence and, asserting that authority to elect had devolved upon him because of your negligence, elected him as your bishop. [But after this became known to the aforesaid count, he caused you, summoned to his presence, to be detained in custody until you elected the aforesaid Madius in common. Approaching the presence of our beloved Gerard, cardinal deacon of Saint Adrian and legate of the Apostolic See, he obtained the benefit of confirmation from him. But afterward the aforesaid William, having gone to that cardinal, appealed to our hearing lest he cause him to be consecrated; and finally, constituted in our presence, he proposed that the same Madius had betrayed a certain castle, had received investiture from a lay hand by means of money, and even before obtaining confirmation had wasted many goods of the church by dissipating them. Hence we commanded our venerable brothers the Archbishop of Cosenza and the Bishops of Bisignano and Strongoli to compel you and others who might happen to be named to tell the truth concerning all these things, and, if they found the election concerning the aforesaid Madius irregularly celebrated, to declare it null and void, compelling him by means of justice to restore the things of the church, and afterward, after carefully inquiring into the truth concerning the election of the aforesaid William, to establish what was just, appeal being removed. As we perceived was contained in their letters, when they had peremptorily cited once, twice, and a third time both the aforesaid Madius and you, and also the abbots of the church of Gerace, the said Madius, though awaited for four months, neither approached them nor permitted you or the abbots to approach. But when, because of suspicion of dissipation, they suspended him from administration of the episcopal goods, and he nevertheless presumed to administer, they pronounced a sentence of excommunication against him; contemptuously disregarding it, he did not cease to celebrate. Hence, since it was established to them through the statements of sworn witnesses that the same Madius had received investiture of the bishopric from a lay hand, had incurred perjury, and had manifoldly perpetrated treason, homicides, and also simony; and that his election had been extorted, and his consecration attempted not only after an appeal but also otherwise contrary to the canons; finally, having taken the counsel of prudent men, they annulled by sentence what had been done concerning him.] We therefore, [having diligently heard these and the other things that were set forth to us concerning that business,] attending that the canon of the Lateran Council, issued by Pope Alexander against the negligent, is not accustomed to be extended to an archbishopric or bishopric, but to be restricted to other personates and lesser ecclesiastical benefices, annulled an election of this kind, [not because of the guilt of the person, but] because justice required it. [The said person also, etc. Given at San Germano, on the sixth day before the Ides of July, in the eleventh year. 1208.]

The same, to the Prior of Hastings and the Superior of Saint Frideswide.

From the tenor of your letters we have received that, when the cause that was disputed concerning provision for I. the cleric on the one side and the abbot and convent of Battle on the other (And below:), after joinder of issue the said cleric exhibited before you a certain charter of those monks, expressly containing that they would assign to him the first church pertaining to their donation worth ten or fifteen marks, nevertheless proving through suitable witnesses that, after a promise of this kind, although they were able, they had been unwilling to provide for him, though they had been admonished concerning this; wherefore he insistently petitioned that the said abbot and monks be compelled to assign him a revenue of at least ten marks. But to these things it was answered in opposition that he could not sue them by reason of the promise, inasmuch as it was made contrary to the statutes of the Lateran Council, which it appeared was proved through the charter exhibited, especially since mention was made in the letters not of any church but only of a promise. Therefore, when this had been disputed at length on either side before you, some asserting that they could be sued and others holding the contrary opinion, you, doubting what the law was in this matter, were unwilling to proceed further in the business until you received concerning this the good pleasure of our will, humbly supplicating us that we deign by our letters to make you more certain what was to be done in this regard. Latin source headnote: A prelate who promises to provide when he is able is bound.

The same.

Approaching the Apostolic See, our beloved son R. the cleric showed us by his intimation that, although you promised that you would provide for him in an ecclesiastical benefice when you were able, as clearly appeared through the letters of the delegated judges drawn up concerning it, you have thus far not taken care to effect this, alleging before the aforesaid judges that such a promise in no way bound you, since it appeared to have been made contrary to the statutes of the Lateran Council, which forbids the promise of a benefice not vacant. But we, considering that it is one thing for a prelate to promise the collation of a benefice when he is able, and another when it becomes vacant, since in many cases a faculty could present itself in which collation should not be deferred in expectation of a benefice that will become vacant, by apostolic writings command you that, when you are able, you assign an ecclesiastical benefice to the aforesaid R.; [otherwise, we have commanded by our letters the Abbot of Saint John and the Dean of Soissons to compel you to this by ecclesiastical censure, appeal being removed.]

Nos autem considerantes, quod aliud est praelatum promittere beneficii collationem, quum poterit, aliud, quum vacabit, quum in multis casibus se facultas offerre posset, in quibus collatio non esset in exspectatione vacaturi beneficii differenda, per apostolica vobis scripta mandamus, quatenus memorato R. quum poteritis, ecclesiasticum beneficium assignetis; [alioquin abbati sancti Ioannis et decano Suessionensi dedimus nostris literis in mandatis, ut vos ad id per censuram ecclesiasticam appellatione remota compellant.]

Chapter XV

Latin source headnote: If the power of conferring pertains to the chapter and the prelate as prelate, it does not pass from one to the other by lapse of time; it is otherwise if the prelate participates as a canon, because then it passes from the chapter to the prelate, unless he commits fraud. This it says, and the text is very frequently alleged.

Innocent III.

You petitioned to be instructed by the Apostolic See whether, since the donation of the prebends of your church pertains to you and your archbishop together, the donation of a vacant prebend remains with the archbishop himself if you have neglected [together] to order it within the six-month period. To this we briefly answer you that, if you and the same archbishop have been negligent concerning this within the prescribed time, just as the power of conferring does not devolve from him to you, so neither does it devolve from you to him; rather, according to the statutes of the Lateran Council, the donation of those prebends passes to the superior, unless perhaps the archbishop has the right of conferring with you, not as prelate but as canon. And in this case, when he has perhaps fraudulently impeded it, fraud ought not to assist him. [Given at the Lateran, on the fourth day before the Ides of January, in the fourteenth year of our pontificate. 1212.]

Ad quod vobis breviter respondemus, quod, si vos et idem archiepiscopus infra tempus praescriptum circa hoc negligentes exstiteritis, sicut nec ab illo ad vos, ita nec a vobis ad illum potestas devolvitur conferendi, sed secundum statuta Lateranensis concilii ad superiorem transit donatio earundem, nisi forte archiepiscopus, non ut praelatus, sed ut canonicus, vobiscum ius habeat conferendi. Latin source headnote: Just as a patron cannot promise that he will present someone to a benefice that will become vacant, so neither can he give the power of presenting before the benefice becomes vacant.

Honorius III, to the Bishop and Provost of the Chapter of Cambrai.

Since our beloved daughter in Christ, the noble woman Joan, Countess of Flanders, overcome by the importunate requests of certain persons, has made unlawful promises concerning benefices of churches not vacant in which she holds the right of patronage, and has placed their donations in the hands of others, as has been intimated to our ears, we command your discretion that, decreeing this invalid, you forbid her by our authority to presume to attempt similar things henceforth.

Title IX: That Nothing Be Innovated While the See Is Vacant

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: While a see is vacant, its status ought not to be changed.

Innocent III, to the Prior and Convent of Glastonbury.

He who is the searcher of hearts and knower of secrets knows that, although Pope C. of good memory, our predecessor, erected your church [as a see] into a cathedral, uniting it to the church of Bath so that the bishop of each would be the same, and took care to confirm his constitution not only through his privilege but also through many other writings, nevertheless, because you asserted that this union was a confusion, complaining that it redounded to the grave prejudice of the church of Glastonbury, since by it religion was dissolved, almsgiving was defrauded, and hospitality was taken away, we, inclined by your supplications, began diligently to direct our attention, as much as was fitting, to relieving the status of your church. And because it appeared incongruous that we should suddenly annul the statute of our predecessor in this matter, since we wish to defer to him insofar as we can with God, just as we wish our successors to defer to us insofar as they will be able with God, while the union remained we so disposed of the other matters—however much this displeased Savaric, Bishop of Bath of good memory, who frequently labored on this account to the Apostolic See—that the status of your church appeared to have been relieved for the better. Hence, after diverse negotiations and manifold deliberations, at the petition of the same bishop, after he could obtain nothing else from us, we finally took care to strengthen by apostolic protection what had been ordained concerning this by provident and honorable men under authority of our mandate. But after the death of the aforesaid Bishop of Bath, having recourse to our presence, you humbly petitioned that, because the time had arrived when the ruin of your church could without scandal be raised to its former state, since both the church of Bath and that of Wells together petitioned the same thing, and the king with the magnates of the kingdom, and certain bishops with many abbots, also sought the same, we should wholly dissolve the union and reduce your monastery to its ancient state, to be governed under the rule of an abbot. We therefore, attending diligently that, while an episcopal see is vacant, nothing ought concerning this to be innovated, since there is no one to protect the episcopal right—especially lest we should appear to have favored the person more than the church if we suddenly changed after his death what we granted while he lived —could not hear your petition in its entirety without harm to conscience and danger to reputation. But so that, according to the customary manner that you have experienced to be both useful to you and honorable to us, one may proceed gradually from the lowest to the highest, granting you the aforesaid authority, we decree that, when the church of Bath has been ordered concerning a prelate, if you wish to show that provision has not yet been made fully for your church to avoid detriment or prejudice, you are to have free faculty to prosecute your right before the Apostolic See; meanwhile, however, let the same monastery be governed freely under the care of the prior. [Therefore let no one, etc. Given at Rome at Saint Peter's, on the second day before the Ides of March, in the ninth year. 1206.]

NE SEDE VACANTE ALIQUID INNOVETUR.

Vacante sede status eius mutari non debet.

Innocentius III. Priori et Conventui Glastonensi.

Novit ille, qui scrutator est cordium et cognitor secretorum, quod, licet bonae memoriae C. Papa praedecessor noster ecclesiam vestram [in sedem] erexerit cathedralem, ipsam Bathoniensi ecclesiae uniendo, ut idem esset episcopus utriusque, suamque constitutionem non solum per privilegium suum, verum etiam per alia scripta multa curaverit confirmare; quia tamen haec unio asserebatur a vobis esse confusio, conquerentibus, eam in grave praeiudicium Glastonensis ecclesiae redundare, quum per ipsam dissolveretur religio, et fraudaretur eleemosyna, et hospitalitas tolleretur nos vestris supplicationibus inclinati ad relevandum ecclesiae vestrae statum coepimus intendere, quantum decuit, diligenter. +Et quoniam absonum videbatur, ut subito praedecessoris nostri evacuaremus in hac parte statutum, quum ei, quantum cum Deo possumus, deferre velimus, sicut et volumus, quod, quantum cum Deo poterunt, nostri nobis deferant successores, unione manente sic de ceteris disposuimus, quantumcunque bonae memoriae Savarico Bathoniensi episcopo displiceret, frequenter ob hoc ad sedem apostolicam laboranti, quod status ecclesiae vestrae videbatur in melius relevatus. Unde post diversos tractatus et deliberationes multiplices, quod per viros providos et honestos auctoritate mandati nostri super hoc exstitit ordinatum, ad petitionem eiusdem episcopi, postquam aliud a nobis non potuit obtinere, apostolico tandem curavimus munimine roborare. Vos autem post obitum praefati Bathoniensis episcopi ad nostram praesentiam recurrentes humiliter postulastis, ut, quia tempus advenerat, quo sine scandalo ecclesiae vestrae ruina poterat in statum pristinum relevari, quum et Bathoniensis ecclesia et Wellensis id ipsum pariter postularet, rex quoque cum regni magnatibus, et quidam episcopi cum multis abbatibus deposcerent illud idem, ut unione penitus dissoluta monasterium vestrum reduceremus in statum antiquum, sub abbatis regimine gubernandum. Nos attendentes igitur diligentius, quod, episcopali sede vacante, non debet super hoc aliquid innovari, quum non sit qui episcopale ius tueatur, maxime ne plus favisse personae quam ecclesiae videremur, si quod eo vivente concessimus post obitum eius subito mutaremus, petitionem vestram ex toto absque damno conscientiae ac periculo famae nequivimus exaudire. Ut autem solito more, quem et vobis utilem, et nobis honorabilem estis experti, gradatim ab imo procedatur ad summum, auctoritate vobis praedicta indulgentes, ut, quum Bathoniensis ecclesia de praesule fuerit ordinata, si ostendere volueritis, quod ecclesiae vestrae nondum sit ad detrimentum vel praeiudicium vitandum plene provisum, ius vestrum apud sedem apostolicam prosequendi facultatem liberam habeatis; interim autem sub cura prioris idem monasterium libere gubernetur. [Nulli ergo etc. Dat. Rom. ap. S. Petr. II. Id. Mart. Ao. IX. 1206.]

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: Benefices pertaining to the collation of a prelate cannot be conferred by the chapter while the see is vacant.

Honorius III, to the Bishop of Calvi and Masters V. and S., Canons of Sessa.

That sincerity of devotion and sincere devotion that our beloved son Master R., Dean of Teano, is known to have had until now toward our person and the Apostolic See induce us, in consideration of his learning and probity, to bear him in the bowels of charity and to be unwilling to deny him those things that ought to be granted according to God. Hence we thought that the church of Saint Leucius of Capua, with all its appurtenances, with which our venerable brother R., Archbishop of Capua, by our mandate invested Master R. in the name of a prebend, the grace of our donation preceding, should be confirmed to him by apostolic authority, notwithstanding a grant made concerning that church to another by the chapter, or our confirmation, if any perhaps appears to have been obtained in common form; since it is nowhere found to be provided in law that, while the see is vacant, the chapter performs the function of the bishop in collations of prebends. Nor in the same case can the power of conferring prebends be said to have devolved upon the chapter by the negligence of the superior, since there was no superior there who could confer them in fact or in law. Therefore we command your discretion that, with the obstacle of appeal removed, you induct the same master into corporal possession of that church and defend him once inducted.

Beneficia spectantia ad collationem praelati non possunt conferri per capitulum sede vacante.

Honorius III. Episcopo Calmensi et Magistris V. et S. Canonicis Suessanensibus.

Illa devotionis sinceritas +et sincera devotio, quam dilectus filius magister R. decanus Teanensis ad personam nostram et sedem apostolicam hactenus habuisse dignoscitur, nos inducunt, ut eum pro suae scientiae ac probitatis intuitu geramus in visceribus caritatis, et ei denegare nolimus quae secundum Deum fuerint concedenda. Unde nos Ecclesiam sancti Leucini de Capua cum omnibus pertinentiis suis, de qua magistrum R. donationis nostrae gratia praecedente praebendae nomine de mandato nostro venerabilis frater noster R. Capuanus archiepiscopus investivit, sibi duximus auctoritate apostolica confirmandam, non obstante concessione per capitulum facta de ipsa ecclesia alii, seu confirmatione nostra, si qua forte in forma communi apparet obtenta; quum nusquam inveniatur cautum in iure, quod capitulum vacante sede fungatur vice episcopi in collationibus praebendarum. Nec in eodem casu potest dici potestas conferendi praebendas ad capitulum per superioris negligentiam devoluta, quum non fuerit ibi superior, qui eas posset de facto vel de iure conferre. Quocirca discretioni vestrae mandamus, quatenus eundem magistrum in corporalem ipsius ecclesiae possessionem sublato appellationis obstaculo inducatis, et defendatis inductum.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: A judgment had against a church while the see is vacant is not valid.

The same, to the Bishop of Burgos.

When formerly the proctor of the church of Saint Mary of Castroforte and G., Bishop of Burgos of good memory, your predecessor, were constituted before Pope I. of good memory, our predecessor, the said proctor sought from that bishop restitution both concerning the freedom of electing a prelate for itself and concerning the lands of that church and other things, of all of which his party had been despoiled, as he said. (And below:) Therefore, after issue had lawfully been joined concerning the foregoing before that predecessor of ours, and afterward confessions had been made and witnesses received before delegated judges, the cause, having been instructed, was remitted to us. We therefore, when the proctors of the parties, constituted in our presence, had litigated at length before us concerning the foregoing, thought that the depositions of the witnesses who had been received while the church of Burgos was vacant and lacked a lawful defender should be rejected.

Title X: On Those Things Which Are Done by a Prelate Without the Consent of the Chapter

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: An alienation of ecclesiastical property without the approval of the chapter is not valid.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: In a temporal alienation that a prelate makes, the silence of the chapter is held as consent.

Alexander III, to the Bishop of Norwich.

It was contained [in the letters transmitted by you to us that, when a question was disputed before you by our mandate between Master Hubert and Master N. concerning the tithe of W., it was established to you that Emma, Abbess of Saint Mary of Winchester, by common vote and unanimous consent, with the convent furnishing assent, granted that tithe to the aforesaid H., and Ralph, Archdeacon of Winchester, made investiture thereof to him through bread and a book; but Master N. proved before you by suitable witnesses that the aforesaid abbess had previously given the aforesaid tithe to him, the convent not contradicting, before she gave it to the aforesaid H., and that her grant had been confirmed by the diocesan bishop. Hence, because you wished to consult us as to which grant ought rather to be relied upon,] we answer your consultation in this manner: the grant of the tithe first made by the abbess, if it was made with the convent knowing and not contradicting, ought to have firm strength. But if the aforesaid abbess, while the convent was ignorant or contradicting, first granted her tithe to the aforesaid H., and not long afterward gave the same tithe to the same man with the assent of the convent, [since it is established to you that it was given to him,] the second grant ought to prejudice the first.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: A temporal alienation made without the consent of the chapter is strengthened by its ratification.

The same, to the Bishop of Worcester.

Since some time ago, if we remember correctly, we granted you by our letters that, if John your predecessor conferred the church of Bibury upon the abbot and brothers of Oseney while the chapter of your church protested, it would be lawful for you to revoke it; but, as you assert, we granted [letters directed to you] to the aforesaid brothers, so that you leave the church itself to be possessed peacefully by them, being forgetful of the writing that had been granted to you by us concerning this. Although we granted this to you, nevertheless we earnestly admonish and exhort your prudence that, from regard for God and reverence for blessed Peter and us, if you can in any way without grave detriment to your church, you leave that church to the aforesaid brothers in peace and quiet, because it befits your providence to direct attention to the advantage and advancement of religious places and to hold valid and firm what that predecessor of yours did from zeal for piety. But if perhaps you cannot be induced to leave the same church to them, notwithstanding the letters that the aforesaid brothers obtained concerning this, we wish the writing granted to you thereof to stand in its stability, because it is certain that, by the rigor of law, that grant which it is established was made by that predecessor of yours while the chapter protested is not valid, unless the same chapter afterward held that grant valid.

Quum nos iam pridem, +si bene meminimus, tibi per literas nostras indulserimus, ut, si Io. praedecessor tuus reclamante capitulo ecclesiae tuae, abbati et fratribus de Oseneia ecclesiam de Beibur contulit, eam tibi revocare liceret, iam dictis fratribus, sicut asseris, [ad te] *literas nostras indulsimus, ut ipsis ecclesiam ipsam dimetteres pacifice possidendam, immemores exsistentes illius scripti, quod super hoc tibi fuerat a nobis indultum. Licet autem hoc tibi indulserimus, prudentiam tamen tuam monemus et exhortamur attentius, quatenus divino intuitu et pro reverentia B. Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: A prelate ought not to institute or remove without the counsel of the chapter, or transact other business of the church. This it says together with the following chapter.

The same, to the Patriarch of Jerusalem.

The prudence of your discretion knows more fully, as we believe, how you and your brothers are one body, in such a way indeed that you are proved to be the head and they the members. Hence it does not become you, omitting the members, to use the counsel of others in the business of your church, since it is not doubtful that this is contrary both to your honor and to the institutions of the holy Fathers. Indeed, it became known to our ears that without the counsel of your brothers you institute and remove abbots and abbesses and other ecclesiastical persons, not considering and attending how it is not doubtful that you transgress the statutes of the sacred canons, since in causes of this kind you are said to use the counsel of clerics and laymen dwelling around you, who are not of the body of that church, rather than that of your brothers. Therefore we forbid this by apostolic authority. (And below:) For we annul by apostolic authority such institutions and removals, if you make any henceforth, and decree that they lack the strength of validity.

Praelatus sine consilio capituli instituere vel destituere, vel alia negotia ecclesiae tractare non debet. H. d. cum capitulo sequenti.

Idem Hierosolymitano Patriarchae.

Novit plenius, sicut credimus, tuae discretionis prudentia, qualiter tu et fratres tui unum corpus sitis, ita quidem, quod tu caput, et illi membra esse probantur. Unde non decet te omissis membris aliorum consilio in ecclesiae tuae negotiis uti, quum id non sit dubium et honestati tuae, et sanctorum Patrum institutionibus contraire. Innotuit siquidem auribus nostris, quod tu sine consilio fratrum tuorum, abbates et abbatissas, et alias ecclesiasticas personas instituis et destituis, +non considerans et attendens, quomodo te non sit dubium statuta sacrorum canonum transgredi, quum in huiusmodi causis et clericorum et laicorum circa te commorantium, qui de corpore ipsius ecclesiae non sunt, potius quam fratrum tuorum consilio uti dicaris. Ideoque id auctoritate apostolica prohibemus. (Et infra:) Nos enim tales institutiones et destitutiones, si quas amodo feceris, auctoritate apostolica cassamus, et carere decernimus robore firmitatis.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: It is summarized above in the preceding chapter. A prelate ought not to institute or remove without the counsel of the chapter, or transact other business of the church. This it says together with the following chapter.

The same, to the same.

The more exalted the dignity in which, by the Lord's gift, you are preeminent, the more it becomes and behooves you to have such diligence and gravity in all things that you may appear to perform everything without stain and reproach, and laudably administer the office of solicitude enjoined upon you. But we have heard, whereat we marveled, just as [also] we could rightly [thereat] marvel, that in grants and confirmations, omitting the canons of your church, you sometimes—indeed, often—seek the counsel of clerics and laymen dwelling around you who are not of the body of that church, and in those grants and confirmations you proceed according to their counsel and will; and also in privileges, which is wholly unbecoming to your honor, for greater authority and certainty you cause the names of your brothers who were absent to be subscribed as though they had been present. Therefore, because it does not become your prudence to set aside in the business of the church committed to you the counsel of your brothers, with whom you are proved to exist as one [body,] by apostolic writings we command your fraternity that, in grants and confirmations and the other business of your church, you seek your brothers and transact and treat the same business with their counsel, or that of the sounder part, and establish the things that are to be established, correct errors, and scatter and root out the things that are to be rooted out. Nor are you in any way to permit the names of absent brothers to be inscribed, because such instruments are invalid and false, and on that account you could rightly fear a charge of forgery. For we decree that all privileges in which the names of absent brothers were subscribed without their knowledge or while they were absent, or shall henceforth be written, are invalid, and we judge that they have no strength of validity.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: If a collegiate church has the presentation, the prelate shall present with the consent of the chapter or of its greater part, unless by custom or privilege it belongs to the prelate alone.

Celestine III.

That is known to be [the dignity of the Apostolic See, granted to it by the Lord himself in blessed Peter, that, where some point of doubt arises, it is referred to its oracle, and what it establishes should be answered ought to be received and observed by all without any hesitation.] It has indeed been proposed to us on your behalf that, since in your province it often happens that, to churches in which colleges are known to have the right of presentation, their abbots, either personally or through their letters, present suitable persons to the diocesan bishops, and after those presented have been afterward received, sometimes before institution and sometimes after, monks or colleges of another order contradict and protest; concerning these things you seek to be certified by an open answer whether an institution already made or still to be made ought to be impeded on this account. To these things we answer you in this manner: namely, that in the presentations of such prelates it ought to be understood that they are made with the assent of their colleges, without which they obtain no manner of validity. Hence, if it is established that the consent of the convent, or of its greater and sounder part, was not present, it is fitting that institutions of this kind be annulled, unless some of them prove by ancient and approved custom or granted liberty that the consent of the college committed to them ought not to be sought in collations of churches or benefices. Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: A donation that a layman makes to a church, with the consent of the diocesan alone, of tithes that he has held from another church in fief from of old, that is, before the Lateran Council, is valid.

Innocent III, to the Archpriest and Master of the Schools of Bourges.

Since the Apostolic See, over which, although unworthy, we preside, is set above all churches throughout the world not by human but by divine institution, it is just and fitting that doubtful questions concerning diverse points of law be referred to it as mistress and mother, so that it which establishes laws may also distinguish those same laws, lest things that are seen to be diverse appear to be opposed. Indeed, as we have received from your letters, when on the one side the Chapter of Saint Stephen and the Chapter of Selles, and on the other the monks of La Place, had submitted to your arbitration concerning a certain tithe that they sought from those monks, and you, after summoning the parties, had taken cognizance of the cause, the said monks alleged that donation of that tithe had been made to them by a certain knight and confirmed with the consent of our venerable brother the Archbishop of Bourges, the diocesan, acceding; and that they were fortified by the authority of Jerome, who, writing to Damasus, says: "If things that are known to be of divine right have at any time been wrongfully detained by laymen and have passed to the use of monks, with the bishop of the place nevertheless furnishing them consent, they will stand for them supported by perpetual validity." To the contrary, the opposing party alleged that the consent of the bishop without the consent of the clergy was insufficient, by the authority of Pope Leo, who says: "Let no bishop dare to donate, exchange, or sell anything from the property of the church, unless perhaps he should do one of these things so as to provide for something better, and with the consent and deliberation of all the clergy choose that which is not doubtful to be profitable to the church." But because, doubting concerning these authorities, you wished to consult us, humbly inquiring whether, when a tithe is held by a layman, if it is conferred upon a church, the consent of the bishop without the consent of the clergy suffices to confirm the donation, we answer your devotion in this manner: the layman who detains the tithe is to be admonished to restore it to the church to which it belongs. But if perhaps he cannot be induced and assigns it, with the consent of the diocesan, to another church—especially to a religious convent—the donation itself will stand supported by perpetual validity. For the aforesaid authorities, although diverse, are nevertheless not opposed, since it is one thing to alienate what is possessed by a church and another to recall to ecclesiastical use what is detained by a layman. In alienation, according to the decree of Pope Leo, the consent of the bishop without the consent of the clerics does not suffice. But in recalling, according to the writing of Jerome, the consent of the bishop suffices, since by each the utility of the church is consulted. For in the Lateran Council it is also forbidden that any religious person receive churches and tithes from the hands of laymen without the consent of the bishops, by which it is indirectly given to be understood that the consent of the bishop suffices for it to be lawful for a church to receive tithes from the hands of laymen. But we understand this concerning those tithes that have been granted to laymen perpetually in fief. [Given at Rome, etc., on the Nones of July, in the first year of our pontificate. 1198.]

" E contrario pars allegabat adversa, consensum episcopi sine cleri consensu minus sufficere auctoritate Leonis Papae, dicentis : " Ne quis episcopus de rebus ecclesiae quicquam donare vel commutare vel vendere audeat, nisi forte aliquid horum faciat, ut meliora prospiciat, et cum totius cleri consensu atque tractatu id eligat, quod non sit dubium ecclesiae profuturum. " Quia vero super his auctoritatibus dubitantes nos consulere voluistis, humiliter inquirentes, utrum, quando decima tenetur a laico, si conferatur ecclesiae, ad confirmandam donationem consensus episcopi sine cleri consensu sufficiat, nos devotioni vestrae taliter respondemus, quod monendus est laicus, qui decimam detinet, ut eam restituat ecclesiae, ad quam spectat. Qui si forte induci nequiverit, et eam cum dioecesani consensu alteri ecclesiae assignaverit, praesertim religioso conventui, constabit ipsa donatio perpetua firmitate subnixa. Auctoritates enim praemissae, licet diversae sint, non tamen adversae, quum aliud sit alienare quod ab ecclesia possidetur, et aliud quod detinetur a laico ad usum ecclesiasticum revocare. In alienatione quoque iuxta Leonis Papae decretum consensus episcopi sine clericorum consensu non sufficit. In revocatione autem iuxta scriptum Hieronymi sufficit consensus episcopi, quum per utrumque utilitati ecclesiae consulatur. Nam et in Lateranensi concilio est inhibitum, ne quaelibet religiosa persona ecclesias et decimas de manibus laicorum sine consensu episcoporum recipiat, per quod indirecte datur intelligi, quod sufficit consensus episcopi, ut licitum ecclesiae sit decimas de manibus recipere laicorum. Hoc autem de illis decimis intelligimus, quae laicis in feudum perpetuo sunt concessae. [Dat . Rom. etc. Non. Iul. Pont. nostr. Ao. I. 1198.]

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: A bishop cannot without the consent of the chapter grant churches to other churches, even if he has the right of patronage in the churches granted.

The same, to the Archdeacon of Metz.

Recently yours to us (And below:) You also added whether it is lawful for a bishop or bishop-elect, together with the archdeacon alone apart from the assent of the greater church, since both the bishop is elected from it and the archdeacon is assumed from it, perpetually to confer vacant baptismal churches upon monasteries or conventual churches to which the right of patronage pertains. The solution of the other question is also clearly gathered from an epistle of Pope Leo, in which it is read to have been established: "Let no bishop dare to donate, exchange, or sell anything from the property of the church, unless perhaps he should do one of these things so as to provide for something better, and by the deliberation and consent of all the clergy choose that which is not doubtful to be profitable to the church." For a donation, sale, or exchange of ecclesiastical property by bishops will be invalid without the connivance and subscription of the clerics. By this you will know the question proposed in the second place to have been resolved, since it is not doubtful that perpetual grants of churches pertain to alienations.

" Irrita enim episcoporum donatio, venditio et commutatio rei ecclesiasticae erit absque conniventia et subscriptione clericorum. Per hoc enim noveris solutam secundo loco propositam quaestionem, quum concessiones ecclesiarum perpetuas ad alienationes non sit dubium pertinere.

The diligence of the pastoral office (And below: [cf. c. 28, On the Office of a Delegated Judge, I. 29]) Furthermore, you carefully asked, since parishes were delimited by the authority of Dionysius so that the proceeds of individual parishes might fall to the necessary uses of the church and the stipends of ministers, whether it is lawful for a bishop, without the authority of the Supreme Pontiff or at least without the will of his chapter, to confer upon religious men the revenues of some parish church, the support of a vicar being reserved. And since the statutes of the Lateran Council forbid a new pension to be imposed upon churches or an old one to be increased, you request to be instructed whether a bishop, with the patron consenting, can confer the whole church upon religious places, or confer some portion anew. To this we briefly answer that, saving the canonical constitution concerning the granting of a fiftieth portion to pious places, a bishop can do neither the first nor the second, without the will of his chapter, except by license of the Roman Pontiff. Although the members of the body of Christ (And below:), the chapters of the cathedral churches of the province of Sens transmitted their complaint to us that the Archbishop of Sens and his suffragans were unwilling to admit their proctors, recently summoned to a provincial council, to its deliberation, although certain things are customarily treated in councils of this kind that are known to pertain to those chapters, for which reason they appealed to our hearing. Indeed, having heard and understood what their messengers wished to propose concerning these things, and likewise the letters that you took care to send us concerning the same business, we had diligent deliberation thereupon with our brothers, and indeed in agreement it appeared to us and to those same brothers of ours that the chapters themselves ought to be invited to councils of this kind, and their messengers admitted to deliberation, especially concerning those things that are known to affect the chapters themselves.

Title XI: On Those Things Which Are Done by the Greater Part of the Chapter

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: In ecclesiastical corporate bodies, what is done by the greater part regularly prevails, unless the lesser part reasonably contradicts. This it says.

From the Lateran Council.

Since in all churches that which has appeared good to the more numerous and sounder brothers ought to be observed without delay, it is exceedingly grave and most worthy of reproof that in certain churches a few sometimes, not so much from reason as from their own will, impede the ordering of the many [and more prudent] and do not permit an ecclesiastical ordering to proceed. Therefore, by the present decree we establish that, unless something has been reasonably objected and shown by the fewer and inferior, that which has been established by the greater and sounder part of the chapter shall always prevail, appeal being removed, and shall obtain its effect. Nor shall our constitution be impeded if perhaps someone says that he is bound by an oath to preserve the custom of his church; for those things that come against the utility of the church and the statutes of the holy Fathers are to be called not oaths but rather perjuries. But if anyone has presumed to swear to customs of this kind, which are neither supported by reason nor consonant with the sacred statutes, let him be excluded from reception of the Lord's body until he has done worthy penance.

> DE HIS, QUAE FIUNT A MAIORI PARTE CAPITULI.

In universitatibus ecclesiasticis praevalet regulariter quod fit a maiori parte, nisi minor pars rationabiliter contradicat H. d.

Ex concilio Lateranensi.

Quum in cunctis ecclesiis quod pluribus et sanioribus fratribus visum fuerit incunctanter debeat observari, grave nimis est et reprehensione dignissimum, quod per quasdam ecclesias pauci quandoque non tam de ratione, quam de propria voluntate ordinationem multorum [et prudentiorum] impediunt, et ad ordinationem ecclesiasticam procedere non permittunt. Quocirca praesenti decreto statuimus, ut, nisi a paucioribus et inferioribus aliquid rationabiliter obiectum fuerit et ostensum, appellatione remota praevaleat semper et suum consequatur effectum quod a maiori et saniori parte capituli fuerit constitutum. Nec constitutionem nostram impediat, si forte aliquis ad conservandam ecclesiae suae consuetudinem se iuramento dicat adstrictum; non enim iuramenta, sed potius periuria sunt dicenda, quae contra utilitatem ecclesiae et sanctorum Patrum veniunt instituta. Si quis autem huiusmodi consuetudines, quae nec ratione iuvantur, nec sacris congruunt institutis, iurare praesumpserit, donec dignam egerit poenitentiam, a perceptione sit dominici corporis alienus.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: A canon does not interdict a church; rather, the bishop with the chapter ought to do this.

Celestine III, to the Bishop of Clermont.

The diligence of your probity asked of us what you ought to observe and establish by the authority of an apostolic response concerning the fact that certain of the canons or even the least ones, on any occasion assumed, subject your church to interdict without your assent and that of the other canons, either because a pension owed to the church is not rendered, as is customary, or because sometimes some cleric or parishioner has committed an offense, through which the service of that church perishes and no small scandal is generated among the people. Concerning this we answer your fraternity in this manner, as we recall that we have answered in similar consultations: namely, that you ought not to observe an interdict placed upon any church by one or some of your canons without your assent and that of your other brothers, unless such an excess and one so grave has occurred that the church ought rightly to be silent, nor permit that an interdict under pretext of an occasion of this kind be observed by others, unless your consent and that of the other canons has acceded. But if anyone has offended in these matters, let him be subject to ecclesiastical coercion, since sins ought to hold their authors, nor is punishment to be extended further than the offense has been found in the transgressor.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: The common ordering of a church ought not to be impeded by the contradiction and appeal of one who has no interest. This it says with regard to the title.

Innocent III, to the Provost of Augsburg.

From the mouth of the one sitting upon the throne proceeded a two-edged sword. This is the sword of Solomon, which cuts on either side, rendering to each what is his own. We therefore, who, although unworthy, by divine favor hold the place of the true Solomon, prudently draw this sword when we determine, through justice, questions lawfully debated in our hearing. For to this end the perplexity of emerging questions and the difficult knots of causes are referred to the Apostolic See: so that, when their merits have been disclosed by the assertion of the parties, a sentence may proceed from the Apostolic See bringing doubtful things into certainty and producing obscure things into the light, so that, once the dissension of the litigants has been quieted, justice may protect and follow its author. Hence it was that, when T. and our beloved son B., a canon of Augsburg, approached our presence on account of the question disputed between you concerning the provostship of the church of Augsburg, we appointed as your auditors our venerable brother [Octavian,] Bishop of Ostia, and our beloved son Gratian, cardinal deacon of Saints Cosmas and Damian. In their presence it was proposed on behalf of B. himself that, when our beloved son E., Provost of Augsburg, had been elected Bishop of Brescia, he requested the Augsburg chapter not to elect another as provost for themselves before his election was confirmed. And when they had assented to his requests, and that elect, having obtained confirmation of his election through his metropolitan and coming to Tivoli, had been invested with the regalia, B., the knight, his father, approaching the Apostolic See, obtained from C. of good memory, our predecessor, letters to be sent to our beloved sons the dean and chapter of Augsburg that, within the space of one month and with the obstacle of appeal removed, they elect and assume that man as Provost of Augsburg; a golden ring was sent to him as a sign of investiture, and certain executors of the apostolic mandate were appointed. But when the aforesaid dean and chapter heard that C., their former provost, had been elected and confirmed as Bishop of Brescia, although they had received the said letters, nevertheless, in contempt of them, after a term had first been assigned within which they ought to answer concerning the apostolic mandate, they elected H., then Dean of Augsburg, as provost. [But lest his election be confirmed, the same B. appealed to the hearing of the Apostolic See. And although afterward various and manifold letters emanated from the Apostolic See concerning this on behalf of the said H., in which silence appeared to be imposed upon him, nevertheless this ought not to have been binding, because, absent and not summoned, he could not be condemned; and he nevertheless afterward contradicted the said H. concerning that provostship as much as he could, which he proved through witnesses. He also obtained apostolic letters by which it was commanded that he be inducted into possession of the provostship, notwithstanding any letters obtained from the Apostolic See before or afterward. Hence, when that man entered upon the way of all flesh and the dean and chapter of Augsburg wished to proceed to an election of a provost, he appealed to the Apostolic See lest this be done. But, not at all deferring to the appeal, after excluding certain canons and not summoning certain others, they elected you as their provost. Therefore he petitioned that your election, not made concordantly by all the canons but attempted after an appeal was interposed to us, be annulled, and that he be confirmed as provost, since he had first been invested with the provostship by our said predecessor, which he wished to prove through the ring transmitted to him by that predecessor.

To these things it was answered on your behalf, son provost, in this manner: that which had been done concerning B. had been obtained before our predecessor held valid the election of the aforesaid E., which was also proved by witnesses; but even if the aforesaid letters had emanated from the Apostolic See after the said elect was confirmed as bishop, nevertheless no right had been acquired by him through this, since he had neither been invested with the provostship nor had the judges executed the apostolic mandate on his behalf. You proved this from the tenor of the letters themselves, in which it was expressly contained that the dean and chapter of Augsburg should elect and assume him as provost within a month, and that the ring was sent to him for receiving investiture. For if he had been invested by the Apostolic See, neither an election of the chapter nor an investiture of the executors would afterward have had any place. You also added that, when the said H. afterward approached the Apostolic See and fully explained to our aforesaid predecessor the manner of his election and the cause of the contradiction of the same B., our said predecessor, notwithstanding the investiture made to B., confirmed H.'s election, asserting that he had been circumvented by a false suggestion in what he had written on behalf of B., since it had not been expressed to him that B. was constituted below the sacred orders; rather, those who petitioned on his behalf had taken care to suggest to him that B. was suitable. And although letters on his behalf were presented to the said Bishops of Freising and Eichstätt and the greater Provost of Speyer, in which they were commanded by virtue of obedience to induct him into corporal possession of the provostship, notwithstanding any letters obtained from the Apostolic See before or afterward, nevertheless our said predecessor rescripted that they had by no means emanated with his knowledge; decreeing them null and void, he annulled anything done by their authority and commanded the same judges to detain the man who had obtained those letters in faithful custody until they should receive from him a mandate as to how they ought to proceed concerning this.

It was furthermore objected against the foregoing that, even if it were established—which was altogether false—that the aforesaid B. had been invested by the Apostolic See and that his investiture had by no means been revoked, nevertheless, because he exhibited to the said H. the reverence owed to a provost, which you proved through witnesses, and received a stipend from him like the other canons, he had renounced his right and was no longer to be heard concerning this. Moreover, when the said H. paid the debt of nature, and the dean and chapter, by the counsel of our venerable brother the Bishop of Augsburg, had established first a space of six weeks, secondly another six weeks, and then three days for celebrating an election of the provost, so that the absent canons might come together for the election, and when, after they had assembled, the election was treated, the same B. did not contradict until he learned that both he and others constituted in minor orders were to be excluded from the election. Indeed, when the dean, intending to investigate the wills of all, asked the assent of our beloved son Walter, a canon of Augsburg, concerning that election, he answered that he would not express his intention in the presence of those who were constituted below the sacred orders, since according to the canonical statutes they could neither be elected nor, according to the custom of the church, have any voice in the election. Hence, when the chapter in common established that they were by no means to be admitted to the election, the said B., hurling insults at the same dean, Ulrich the archdeacon, and Herman the canon, appealed to the Apostolic See, summoning them by the appeal to approach us. And although he departed from the chapter with certain of his canons, nevertheless ten others, more numerous in number and greater in dignity—since only nineteen who had the right in the election had assembled for this—attending that he had no interest, since he had no right in the provostship, elected you, the eleventh, as provost, saving the grace of the Apostolic See, namely, lest they appear to commit anything in contempt of the Apostolic See.

Therefore, since it was established from the foregoing that he had neither been invested by the Apostolic See nor elected or assumed as provost by the chapter or delegated judges; and even if that had been established, it had been sufficiently proved on your behalf that that investiture, if there had been any, was afterward revoked by our aforesaid predecessor; and even if these things had not been proved, it had sufficiently been shown through witnesses that he rendered reverence to the said H.; nor was what had been proved in opposition—that he had always contradicted the aforesaid H.—contrary, since he could have contradicted in words and consented in deeds, especially since, although the witnesses said generally that the said B. always contradicted, nevertheless that generality ought to be restricted to suitable times, lest he be convicted of having spoken falsely if what they said were understood more generally; and since it followed from all these things that he had no interest for the purpose of appealing to the Apostolic See concerning this, you concluded that none of those things that had been done prevented your election from having to be confirmed.]

Therefore, when the said cardinals had faithfully reported to us and our brothers these and all the other things that had been proposed on either side, and the attestations, allegations, and reasons of both parties had been more fully heard and understood, because it was lawfully established that the aforesaid B. was not in any way invested with that provostship, although a mandate had been given that he be invested with it; and even if he had been invested with it, his investiture was annulled by our predecessor once and a second time for a certain reason; and even if it had not been annulled, he appears to have renounced his right through the fact that he often exhibited to the said H. the reverence that is owed to a provost: we, attending that it could not belong to him by law to impede the common ordering of the church through an appeal interposed on that account, and also understanding that you were canonically elected as provost by the greater part both in dignity and in number of those who were established to have the right of electing, by the common counsel of our brothers confirm your election by apostolic authority, imposing silence upon the aforesaid B. concerning that provostship. [Therefore let no one, etc. Given at Rome at Saint Peter's, on the tenth day before the Kalends of July. 1198.]

> Innocentius III. Augustensi Praeposito.

> Ex ore sedentis +in throno procedebat gladius bis acutus. Hic est gladius Salomonis, qui secat utrimque, reddens unicuique quod suum est. Nos igitur, qui, licet immeriti, locum veri Salomonis divina dignatione tenemus, gladium istum tunc prudenter exserimus, quum quaestiones in auditorio nostro legitime ventilatas mediante iustitia definimus. Ad hoc enim emergentium quaestionum perplexitas et difficiles nodi causarum ad sedem apostolicam referuntur, ut, quum earum merita fuerint assertione partium patefacta, prodeat ab apostolica sede sententia deducens in certitudinem dubia, et obscura producens in lucem, ut litigantium dissensione sopita suum iustitia tueatur et sequatur auctorem. Inde siquidem fuit, quod Accedentibus ad praesentiam nostram T. ac dilecto filio nostro B. Augustensi canonico pro quaestione, quae inter vos super praepositura Augustensis ecclesiae vertebatur, *nos venerabilem fratrem nostrum * [Octavianum] Hostien. episcopum, et dilectum filium Grat. sanctorum Cosmae et Damiani diaconum cardinalem vobis concessimus auditores, in quorum praesentia ex parte ipsius B. fuit propositum, quod, quum dilectus filius E. Augustensis praepositus fuisset in episcopum Brixiensem electus, rogavit capitulum Augustense, ne aliquem sibi prius eligerent in praepositum, quam eius esset electio confirmata, quumque ipsi eius precibus annuissent, et idem electus, electionis confirmatione per suum metropolitanum obtenta, veniens Tibur fuisset de regalibus investitus, B. miles pater eiusdem ad apostolicam sedem accedens a bonae memoriae C. praedecessore nostro dilectis filiis decano et capitulo Augustensi literas obtinuit destinari, ut infra spatium mensis unius eundem sublato appellationis obstaculo eligerent et assumerent in praepositum Augustensem, in signum investiturae annulo ei aureo destinato, et quibusdam mandati apostolici exsecutoribus constitutis. Decanus autem et Capitulum memoratum quum audisset quod C. quondam eorum praepositus in episcopum Brixiensem electus et confirmatus fuisset, licet dictas literas recepissent, in contemptum tamen eorum assignato prius termino, infra quem ipsi deberent super mandato apostolico respondere, H. tunc Augustensem decanum in praepositum elegerunt. +[Sed ne eius confirmaretur electio, idem B. ad apostolicae sedis audientiam appellavit. Et licet super hoc postmodum a sede apostolica pro dicto H. literae variae ac multiplices emanaverint, in quibus ei videbatur imponi silentium, id tamen tenere non debuit, quoniam absens et irrequisitus non potuit condemnari; et ipse nihilominus postmodum dicto H. super praepositura ipsa, quod per testes probavit, quantum potuit contradixit. Literas etiam apostolicas impetravit, per quas nullis literis obstantibus in possessionem praepositurae mandabatur induci. Unde quum, eo viam universae carnis ingresso, decanus et capitulum Augustense vellent in praepositi electione procedere, ne id fieret, ad sedem apostolicam appellavit. Sed ipsi appellationi minime deferentes, exclusis quibusdam canonicis, quibusdam etiam non vocatis, te sibi in praepositum elegerunt. Quare tuam electionem non ab omnibus canonicis concorditer factam, sed post appellationem ad nos interpositam attentatam, cassari petebat, et se in praepositum confirmari, quum a dicto praedecessore nostro de praepositura, quod per annulum sibi transmissum ab ipso probare volebat, fuisset primitus investitus. Ad haec ex parte tua, fili praeposite, taliter est responsum quod id, quod de B. factum fuerat, ante, quam praedecessor noster praefati E. electionem ratam haberet, fuisset obtentum, quod etiam fuit testibus comprobatum; sed etsi dicto electo in episcopum confirmato praedictae literae a sede apostolica emanassent, nullum tamen ius per hoc ei fuerat acquisitum, quum nec de praepositura investitus fuisset, nec iudices pro eo fuissent mandatum apostolicum executi. Hoc autem ex ipsarum literarum tenore probasti, in quibus continebatur expresse, quod decanus et capitulum Augustense ipsum eligerent et assumerent in praepositum infra mensem, et quod pro recipienda investitura annulus ei mittebatur. Nam si fuisset per sedem apostolicam investitus, locum postmodum electio capituli et investitura exsecutorum nullatenus habuissent. Adiecisti etiam, quod, quum dictus H. ad sedem postmodum apostolicam accessisset, et dicto praedecessori nostro electionis suae modum et causam contradictionis eiusdem B. exposuisset ad plenum, dictus praedecessor noster, non obstante investitura ipsi B. facta, electionem confirmavit ipsius, asserens, se per falsam suggestionem fuisse in eo, quod pro ipso B. scripserat, circumventum, quum, quod esset infra sacros ordines constitutus, ei non fuisset expressum, immo potius, quod idoneus esset, hi, qui pro eo petebant, ipsi suggerere curavissent. Et licet pro ipso dictis Frisingensi et Eistetensi episcopis et maiori Spirensi praeposito literae fuerint praesentatae, in quibus eis in virtute obedientiae mandabatur, ut ipsum in possessionem praepositurae inducerent corporalem, nullis literis obstantibus ante vel post a sede apostolica impetratis, dictus tamen praedecessor noster eas nullatenus de conscientia sua emanasse rescripsit, et ipsas decernens vacuas et inanes, si quid auctoritate ipsarum factum fuerat irritavit, mandans eisdem iudicibus, ut eum, qui easdem literas impetrarat, sub fideli custodia detinerent, donec ab eo reciperent in mandatis, qualiter super hoc procedere debuissent. Fuit praeterea praedictis obiectum, quod, etsi praedictum B. constaret, quod omnino falsum erat, fuisse per sedem apostolicam investitum, et investituram eius minime revocatam, quia tamen dicto H. reverentiam praeposito debitam, quod probasti per testes, exhibuit, et stipendium, sicut ceteri canonici, percepit ab eo, renunciaverit iuri suo, nec super hoc erat de cetero audiendus. Ceterum dicto H. naturae debitum exsolvente, quum decanus et capitulum de consilio venerabilis fratris nostri episcopi Augustensis primo sex hebdomadarum, ac secundo aliarum sex, et deinde trium dierum spatium electioni de praeposito celebrandae, ut absentes canonici ad electionem concurrerent, statuissent, et eis postmodum convenientibus fuisset de electione tractatum, idem B. non antea contradixit, quam ab electione tam se quam alios in minoribus ordinibus constitutos cognovit excludi. Sane quum decanus, perscrutaturus omnium voluntates, dilecti filii Walterii Augustensis canonici super electione ipsa requisisset assensum, ipse, quod eis praesentibus, qui erant infra sacros ordines constituti, suam non exprimeret intentionem, respondit, quum ipsi secundum statuta canonica nec eligi possent, nec iuxta ecclesiae consuetudinem in electione vocem aliquam obtinere. Unde quum capitulum communiter statuisset, eos ad electionem nullatenus admittendos, dictus B. eidem decano, Ulrico archidiacono et Erman. canonico convicia inferens, ad sedem apostolicam appellavit, ipsis, ut ad nos accederent, per appellationem indicens. Et licet ipse cum quibusdam canonicis suis de capitulo recessisset, decem tamen alii numero plures et dignitate maiores, quum decem et novem tantum, qui ius in electione habebant, ad hoc convenissent, attendentes quod eius non interesset, cui nihil iuris fuerat in praepositura, te undecimum salva sedis apostolicae gratia, ne videlicet in contemptum apostolicum aliquid committere viderentur, in praepositum elegerunt. Quum igitur ex praedictis constaret, eum nec investitum fuisse per sedem apostolicam, nec a capitulo vel iudicibus delegatis electum fuisse in praepositum vel assumptum, et si id etiam constitisset, sufficienter esset ex parte tua probatum, investituram illam, si qua fuerat, fuisse per dictum praedecessorem nostrum postmodum revocatam; et si haec etiam probata non essent, sufficienter esset per testes ostensum, eum dicto H. reverentiam impendisse, nec esset contrarium, quod fuerat ex adverso probatum, eum praedicto H. semper contradixisse, quum verbis contradicere potuisset et operibus consentire; praesertim quum, etsi testes generaliter dixerint, quod dictus B. semper contradixit, generalitas tamen illa debeat ad competentes horas restringi, ne convincatur falsum dixisse, si generalius intelligatur quod dixerant, et ex his omnibus sequeretur, quod sua non intererat propter hoc ad sedem apostolicam appellare; concludebas, quod nihil eorum, quae facta fuerant, obesset, quominus tua deberet electio confirmari.] Quum ergo dicti cardinales haec et alia, quaecunque fuerant hinc inde proposita, nobis et fratribus nostris fideliter retulissent, attestationibus, allegationibus et rationibus utriusque partis plenius auditis et cognitis, Quia vero legitime constitit, quod praedictus B. de praepositura ipsa non fuit aliquatenus investitus, etsi mandatum fuit ut de ea investiretur, de qua etiamsi investitus fuisset, investitura eius per praedecessorem nostrum semel et secundo certa fuit ratione cassata, quae nec etiam si cassata fuisset, per hoc, quod saepe dicto H. reverentiam exhibuit, quae debetur praeposito, iuri suo renunciasse videtur : nos attendentes, sibi de iure non potuisse competere, ut per appellationem ob id interpositam communem ordinationem ecclesiae impediret, intelligentes etiam, te a maiori parte tam dignitate quam numero eorum, quos eligendi ius constabat habere, electum fuisse canonice in praepositum, de communi fratrum consilio electionem tuam auctoritate apostolica confirmamus, praefato B. super ipsa praepositura silentium imponentes. [*Nulli ergo etc. Dat. Romae ap. S. Petr. X. Kal. Iul. * 1198.]

Latin source headnote: A prelate, with the greater part of the chapter and against the contradiction of the lesser, can establish that every canon is bound to contribute toward the necessary repair of the fabric.

The same.

It was intimated to us on your behalf, brother archbishop, that you held a common deliberation for restoring the fabric of the church of Rouen, with you, brother archbishop, requesting that every canon, equally with you, assign some portion of his revenues to so pious and necessary a work. But because diverse and varying intentions concerning this existed among you, sons and canons, lest so praiseworthy a work be neglected through your dissension, by authority of the present letters we establish that, if any of you should determine to resist the statutes and ordinances concerning this of you, brother archbishop, and of the greater and sounder part of the chapter, the judgment of the majority shall prevail. Title XII: That Ecclesiastical Benefices Be Conferred Without Diminution

Sole Chapter

Latin source headnote: The rubric suffices for the summary, or the summary is thus according to the Abbot: A secret collation of a benefice, although suspect, is valid, provided that it is otherwise proved to have been lawfully made. This it says, and it is a notable case; nevertheless it does not pertain to the title, nor do all hold this without distinction, but the greater part concludes with this summary.

Innocent III, to the Archbishop of Milan.

So that our judgment may proceed from the countenance of God, and our eyes may see equity, we ought to walk along the royal road and turn neither altogether to the left nor to the right, judging the great as the small, because with God there is no acceptance of persons. [Indeed, it had come to our hearing by the report of many that the chancellorship of the church of Milan had been vacant for more than a year, whence according to the statutes of the Lateran Council its donation had devolved upon us. But wishing to defer to you with accustomed dignity, we earnestly requested and commanded you benignly to confer that chancellorship upon our beloved son Henry of Settala, our subdeacon and a canon of the church of Milan, well deserving with you and suitable for obtaining this office; and if after receipt of our letters you should establish anything concerning that chancellorship contrary to the right acquired for us from the Lateran decree, we decreed it null and void. But, having received our letters, you are said to have answered, as is declared from a public authentic instrument, that you had not conferred that chancellorship upon another because its proceeds were exceedingly necessary to you on account of the burdens of debts; nevertheless, after our letters had been opened and their tenor inspected, you would answer on the next day what you believed ought to be answered. Furthermore, as we learned from another instrument, after you heard the tenor of our mandate, changing your speech, you said that you could not confer that chancellorship upon our aforesaid subdeacon according to our mandate because, with the proceeds reserved to yourself, you had granted that chancellorship to Henry of Lampugnano ten months previously. And when this variation of your answers became known to us from authentic writings, although according to the Apostle we are ready to avenge all disobedience, nevertheless, still wishing to defer to you—to whom both when constituted in a lesser office and, as pleased the Lord, promoted to greater things, we deferred in many and great matters—we commanded you to send to our presence a suitable proctor who should lawfully show us in your name that you had donated the said chancellorship to a suitable person in canonical manner and at the time belonging to you. The said H. of Lampugnano, to whom the donation was said to have been made, should also, if he wished, approach our presence to defend his justice.

Therefore, coming to the presence of our apostolate, our beloved sons G., your proctor, and the often-mentioned H. endeavored manifoldly to excuse you concerning the variation of the answers, although credence is not easily derogated from public instruments, and according to the nature of things it could scarcely have been sufficiently shown that you had by no means answered what was said, even if perhaps it could have been shown that you had answered something else. But they produced before us two witnesses who, having been sworn, said that in the recently past January a year had elapsed since the Chancellor of Milan paid the debt of all flesh; and in the following May, when the kinsmen of Henry of Lampugnano repeatedly and vehemently pressed you to confer the chancellorship upon him, and you answered that you could not lack the proceeds of the chancellorship, nevertheless, after much insistence, it was obtained that you should retain the proceeds of the chancellorship and confer its right upon the aforesaid Henry. Therefore, with four present, among whom were the two aforesaid witnesses, in a more private chamber of your palace you invested that H. with the chancellorship by a book according to the aforesaid tenor, and received fidelity from him, prohibiting all of them from revealing that word to anyone. One of the aforesaid witnesses also added that, after our mandate had come to you and H. himself had already returned from Bologna, you, in his sight, solemnly and publicly delivered the seal to him, commanding him to exercise the office of chancellor; the other witness also asserted this from hearsay, and your same proctor answered that he believed it to be true. Henry also confessed the fact but denied the solemnity of the fact.]

Therefore, because after our prohibition you presumed to deliver the bull to him, although you ought at least to have deferred [that] delivery until you consulted our good pleasure, we commanded our beloved sons I., Archdeacon of Milan, and O. Lento, a canon of Milan, etc. (cf. c. 56, On Appeals, II. 28.) [But we tolerated for a time, so that the merits of the business might become more fully known to us, the investiture that was said to have been made secretly through a book, although ecclesiastical benefices are not to be conferred by a clandestine donation, as Truth testifies, saying: "He who does evil hates the light." Moreover, because the office of the aforesaid chancellorship was alleged to be spiritual or annexed to a spiritual thing, since the chancellor by his office ought to do many things that are known to be spiritual, and for this reason it was said that it ought not to have been conferred under the aforesaid tenor, since the Apostle commands abstinence from every appearance of evil; and because also the aforesaid Henry of Lampugnano, although received as a brother for a prebend that would become vacant, was nevertheless asserted not to be an ordinary, and for this reason the chancellorship ought not to have been conferred upon him, since by law or custom it ought to be committed only to an ordinary, as he is written to be Chancellor not of the Archbishop of Milan but of the church of Milan, nor when the see is vacant does the chancellor lose his office—for not even the seal itself is changed when the pontiff is replaced—we thought that inquiry into these matters should be committed to the aforesaid I., Archdeacon of Milan, and O. Lento, canon of Milan, commanding them by apostolic writings that, every contradiction and appeal ceasing, having God before their eyes, grace and fear being set aside, without acceptance of persons, they should inquire most diligently into the truth concerning the foregoing; and, lest the truth be concealed, should compel by ecclesiastical censure the witnesses who were named to them, if they withdrew themselves through favor or fear, to bear testimony to the truth; and should send to the Apostolic See under the testimony of their letters whatever they found concerning all these things, so that, sufficiently instructed through their inquiry, we might better decide the business itself.

But they, faithfully executing the apostolic mandate, summoned the ordinaries of the church of Milan and compelled them under penalty of excommunication to tell under the sanctity of an oath the truth they knew concerning the foregoing articles from the fact of the chancellorship; they transmitted to our presence their attestations reduced to writing and fortified with a seal. They also interdicted the administration of the seal to the same H., as we received from their letters, according to the form of our mandate and by the counsel of wise men. And when the often-mentioned H. of Lampugnano presented himself to our sight with Roger his father on this account, we granted him free and benign opportunity to plead for himself in a common audience. Through his advocate he proposed that the aforesaid delegates, without an inquiry, despoiled him of execution of the seal contrary to the tenor of our mandate, since delivery of that seal had not been made after the second mandate; and therefore in the first place he petitioned that restitution be made to him. He endeavored manifoldly to excuse the form of the grant, alleging that simoniacal depravity in no way intervened in retention of the fruits: both because the office of chancellorship is neither spiritual nor annexed to a spiritual thing—for although the chancellor performs certain things that are known to be spiritual, as is clear from the attestations, he nevertheless does not perform them by the office of chancellor but by mandate of the archbishop, as is proved from the statements of the witnesses—and because he bought and sold nothing, since simony is described as the deliberate cupidity of selling or buying a spiritual thing or a thing annexed to a spiritual one; especially since before the delivery you separated the fruits, and thus retained for yourself what was yours, not receiving another's. He also alleged that he was suitable for obtaining the chancellorship, since by mandate of the Roman Pontiff he was instituted as a canon of the church of Milan, having a voice in the chapter and a place in the choir, and was admitted as a true and full canon in the deliberations and contracts of that church. Nor was it an obstacle that he did not have a full prebend, since, as was proved by the statements of the witnesses, the archdeaconry of that church, concerning which it is in no way doubted that it is a dignity and spiritual office, had sometimes been granted to one who did not have a full prebend. But the fact that, according to the testimony of certain persons, for sixty years it had been granted only to an ordinary with a prebend from the number of twenty canons, who are properly called ordinaries, could not harm him, since no prejudice was thereby generated against you preventing you from being able to confer the same chancellorship upon one who was not of the number of twenty, especially a canon. He alleged further that, even if an agreement to retain the proceeds for a time had intervened—which he nevertheless denied—between you and his parents, nevertheless he himself had been invested with the aforesaid chancellorship purely and simply; and therefore such an agreement ought not to harm him, since his parents gave or promised you nothing on his behalf.]

Furthermore, you alleged that, since no one ought to be condemned without an accuser, and nothing concerning that business was transacted in the form of a judgment, the depositions of the witnesses could not generate prejudice against you. But because this allegation appeared to touch our person, we thought it worthy to explain more fully the cause and order of the committed inquiry, lest anyone suspect in any way that we proceeded wrongly in this business, especially since the reason to be assigned ought to benefit posterity. For since it is settled law that, when the claimant does not prove, the person sued ought to be absolved even if he has furnished nothing, it could appear that maliciously or indiscreetly we imposed upon you, who were sued by us, the burden of proof concerning the three foregoing articles, namely, that you should show that you had donated the aforesaid chancellorship to a suitable person, in canonical manner, and at the time belonging to you. Furthermore, since the donation was secret and therefore not free of suspicion, and a year had already elapsed while no chancellor at all appeared, we not undeservedly believed that, according to the statutes of the Lateran Council, donation of the chancellorship had devolved upon us, and therefore we could have conferred it without fault, since, although we hold the place of God on earth, we nevertheless could not divine hidden things. Therefore, because against that which at first sight was justly presumed in our favor—especially since you answered the first time that you had conferred the chancellorship upon no one—we granted you the faculty of proving on your behalf, it was not a burden but a grace, and proceeded not from malice but from benignity. You also furnished cause for the mandate that we commanded credibility to be made to us concerning the canonical manner, since you often intimated to us by your letters and finally proved through witnesses that, with the proceeds retained to yourself, you had granted the aforesaid office. From this we were not undeservedly suspicious against such a grant, since it was also openly alleged that you had committed it to a person to whom, according to the custom of the church of Milan, it ought not in any way to have been committed. And therefore we, who not so much from plenitude of power as from the duty of office can and ought to inquire into the truth concerning the excesses of subjects for their correction, especially since you furnished the cause and occasion, committed the inquiry to be made.

Therefore, after all things that were to be proposed in our hearing had been diligently heard, we deliberated with our brothers, and in that deliberation found you to have been culpable principally in three things: concerning the contrariety of your response, because not only to us, who, although unworthy, hold the place of Jesus Christ, but to no one should you knowingly have given contradictory answers; concerning carnality of mind, because not from carnal affection but by discerning judgment ought you to have dispensed an ecclesiastical office and benefice to the more suitable person; and concerning the dishonor of the act, because it was not lawful by any pact or agreement, under the aforesaid mode or tenor, to grant the bare office and retain the proceeds for yourself, since also in the Lateran Council it is forbidden that anyone, in conferring an ecclesiastical benefice, presume to retain a part of the proceeds for his own uses, and elsewhere it is found provided in the canon that ecclesiastical benefices ought to be conferred without diminution. Hence we believe that a distinction must be drawn as to whether he who gives a spiritual benefice receives its proceeds before the donation. For if he himself did not receive the proceeds before the donation, but another did, and from the donation it follows that he himself receives the proceeds, there is no doubt that simoniacal depravity intervenes concerning these things. But if he himself received the proceeds before the donation, we believe also that a distinction must be drawn: whether before the donation he establishes that the proceeds be retained by him for a time for a just and necessary cause; or whether he agrees with the one who receives the benefice, or with any intermediary, that, when that office has been granted, he retain the proceeds for himself. For we believe the first member to be lawful, but we say that the second is not lawful, lest we open a way to those who endeavor to cloak their depravity. [But because, etc. (cf. c. 9, On the Office of the Archdeacon, I. 23.) Given at Perugia, on the ninth day before the Kalends of October. 1198.]

UT ECCLESIASTICA BENEFICIA SINE DEMINUTIONE CONFERANTUR.

Rubrum sufficit pro summario, vel summa sic secundum Abbatem: Occulta collatio beneficii, licet sit suspecta, bene valet, dummodo alias legitime facta probetur. H. d. est casus not.; non tamen facit ad titulum, nec omnes indistincte hoc tenent, sed maior pars concludit cum hoc summario.

Innocentius III. Mediolanensi Archiepiscopo.

Ut nostrum prodeat de vultu Dei iudicium, +et oculi nostri videant aequitatem, regia via debemus incedere, nec ad sinistram omnino, neque ad dextram declinare, ita magnum iudicantes ut parvum, quia non est apud Deum acceptio personarum. [Ad audientiam sane nostram multorum relatione pervenerat, quod cancellaria Mediolanensis ecclesiae vacaverat ultra annum, unde secundum Lateranensis concilii statuta ad nos ipsius erat donatio devoluta. Volentes autem tibi solita dignitate deferre, rogavimus te attentius et mandavimus, ut cancellariam ipsam dilecto filio Henrico de Settara subdiacono nostro, Mediolanensis ecclesiae canonico, bene apud te merito et ad hoc officium obtinendum idoneo, benigne conferres; et si post receptionem literarum nostrarum quicquam de ipsa cancellaria contra ius acquisitum nobis ex Lateranensi decreto statueres, decernebamus illud irritum et inane. Tu vero literis nostris receptis diceris respondisse, sicut ex publico declaratur authentico, quod cancellariam ipsam alteri non contuleras, quia propter gravamina debitorum proventus ipsius tibi erant plurimum necessarii, literis tamen nostris apertis earumque tenore perspecto, responderes in crastino quod crederes respondendum. Porro, sicut ex alio comperimus instrumento, postquam mandati nostri audivisti tenorem, variata locutione dixisti, quod cancellariam ipsam non poteras iuxta mandatum nostrum praefato subdiacono nostro conferre, quia, reservatis tibi proventibus, eandem cancellariam decem mensibus iam elapsis Henrico de Lamp. concesseras. Quumque nobis huiusmodi responsionum varietas ex scriptis innotuisset authenticis, etsi secundum Apostolum omnem inobedientiam prompti simus ulcisci, adhuc tamen tibi deferre volentes, cui et in minori officio constituti, et promoti, sicut Domino placuit, ad maiora in multis et magnis detulimus, tibi dedimus in mandatis, ut ad praesentiam nostram procuratorem idoneum destinares, qui tuo nomine legitime nobis ostenderet, quod dictam cancellariam personae idoneae modo canonico tempore tibi competente donasses; dictus quoque H. de Lamp., cui dicebatur facta donatio, si vellet, ad praesentiam nostram accederet, suam iustitiam defensurus. Venientes igitur ad apostolatus nostri praesentiam dilecti filii G. procurator tuus et saepedictus H. super varietate responsionum nitebantur te multipliciter excusare, licet publicis instrumentis fides non facile derogetur, et secundum rerum naturam vix potuisset sufficienter ostendi, quod tu id, quod dictum est, minime responderes, etsi forte potuisset, quod aliud respondisses.

Produxerunt autem in nostra praesentia duos testes, qui iurati dixerunt, quod in Ianuario nuper praeterito fuit annus, ex quo Mediolanensis cancellarius debitum universae carnis exsolvit, et in sequenti Maio, quum consanguinei Henrici de Lamp. frequenter apud te ac vehementer instarent, ut cancellariam ipsi conferres, te respondente, quod cancellariae proventibus carere non posses, ad multam tamen instantiam est obtentum, ut cancellariae tibi retineres proventus, et ius ipsius praefato conferres Henrico. Quatuor ergo praesentibus, inter quos duo testes memorati fuerunt, in secretiore palatii tui camera eundem H. secundum tenorem praescriptum de cancellaria investisti per librum, et recepisti fidelitatem ab eo, prohibens universis, ne verbum istud cuiquam revelarent. Adiecit autem unus testium praedictorum, quod, postquam ad te mandatum nostrum pervenerat, et ipse H. iam Bononia rediisset, tu ei solenniter et publice tradidisti se vidente sigillum, mandans ei, ut cancellarii officium exerceret; quod et alter testis asseruit de auditu, et idem procurator tuus, quod verum crederet esse, respondit. Henricus quoque confessus est factum, sed solennitatem facti negabat.] Quia ergo post interdictum nostrum ei praesumpsisti tradere bullam, quum traditionem [ipsam] saltem debuisses differre, donec nostrum consuleres beneplacitum, dilectis filiis I. archidiacono et O. Lento canonico Mediolanensibus dedimus in mandatis etc. (cf. c. 56. de app. II. 28.) [Tolerabamus autem ad tempus, ut negotii merita nobis plenius innotescerent, investituram, quae dicebatur in occulto facta fuisse per librum, licet ecclesiastica beneficia non sint donatione clandestina conferenda, teste veritate, quae dicit: "Qui male agit odit lucem. "Ceterum quia cancellariae officium memoratae spirituale vel annexum spirituali proponebatur exsistere, quum cancellarius ex officio suo multa facere debeat, quae spiritualia esse noscuntur, ac per hoc sub tenore praescripto dicebatur non debuisse conferri, quum ab omni specie mala praecipiat Apostolus abstinere; quia etiam praefatus Henricus de Lamp., licet receptus sit in fratrem ad vacaturam praebendam, ordinarius tamen asserebatur non esse, ac per hoc cancellariam sibi non debuisse conferri, quae de iure vel consuetudine ordinario tantum debet committi, quum nec Mediolanensis archiepiscopi, sed Mediolanensis ecclesiae cancellarius esse scribatur, nec vacante sede cancellarii perdat officium, (nam nec ipsum sigillum substituto Pontifice variatur,) inquisitionem horum duximus praenominatis I. archidiacono et O. Lento canonico Mediolanensibus committendam, per apostolica scripta praecipiendo mandantes, quatenus omni contradictione et appellatione cessante Deum habentes prae oculis, gratia et timore postpositis, sine personarum acceptione inquirerent super praemissis diligentissime veritatem, et, ne veritas celaretur, testes, qui eis nominarentur, si se gratia vel timore subtraherent, per censuram ecclesiasticam compellerent perhibere testimonium veritati, et quod super omnibus invenirent sub literarum suarum testimonio ad sedem apostolicam destinarent, ut per inquisitionem ipsorum sufficienter instructi negotium ipsum melius decidere valeremus. Ipsi vero mandatum apostolicum fideliter exsequentes, convocatis Mediolanensis ecclesiae ordinariis, et per poenam excommunicationis compulsis dicere sub iurisiurandi religione de facto cancellariae, quia noverant, super praemissis articulis veritatem, attestationes suas redactas in scriptis sigillo munitas ad nostram praesentiam transmiserunt. Interdixerunt etiam eidem H. administrationem sigilli, sicut ex literis eorum accepimus, iuxta formam mandati nostri, de consilio sapientum. Quumque saepedictus H. de Lamp. cum patre suo Rogerio propter hoc nostro se conspectui praesentasset, copiam allegandi pro se liberam ac benignam in communi concessimus auditorio. Qui per advocatum proposuit, quod delegati praedicti sine inquisitione spoliaverunt eum exsecutione sigilli contra nostri mandati tenorem, quum ipsius sigilli traditio non fuerit facta post secundum mandatum; et ideo primo loco restitutionem sibi fieri postulabat. Formam vero concessionis nitebatur multipliciter excusare, proponens, quod in retentione fructuum simoniaca pravitas nullatenus intercessit; tum, quia officium cancellariae nec est spirituale, nec annexum spirituali; quia licet cancellarius quaedam agat, quae spiritualia esse noscuntur, sicut ex attestationibus liquet, ea tamen non agit ex officio cancellarii, sed de mandato archiepiscopi, sicut ex dictis testium comprobatur; tum etiam, quia nihil emit et vendidit, quum simonia describatur esse studiosa cupiditas vendendi vel emendi spirituale vel spirituali annexum; praesertim quum tu ante traditionem separaveris fructus, et ita quod tuum erat tibi retinuisti, non accipiens alium. Se quoque ad obtinendum cancellariam proponebat idoneum, quum de mandato Romani Pontificis sit Mediolanensis ecclesiae canonicus institutus, vocem habens in capitulo et locum in choro, et tanquam verus et plenus canonicus in tractatibus et contractibus ipsius ecclesiae admittatur. Nec obstat, quod integram praebendam non habet, quum, sicut per dicta testium est probatum, archidiaconatus eiusdem ecclesiae, de quo nullatenus dubitatur, quia sit dignitas et officium spirituale, quandoque fuerit concessus ei, qui praebendam integram non habebat. Quod autem a sexaginta annis iuxta quorundam testimonium concessa fuit tantum ordinario praebendato de numero viginti canonicorum, qui proprie ordinarii appellantur, sibi nocere non poterat, quum per hoc nullum sit tibi praeiudicium generatum, quin ei, qui de numero viginti non esset, praesertim canonico, eandem cancellariam potuisses conferre. Allegabat insuper, quod, etsi pactio de retinendis ad tempus proventibus intervenisset, quod ipse tamen negabat, inter te ac parentes ipsius, ipse tamen de praedicta cancellaria pure fuit et simpliciter investitus; et ideo talis pactio sibi non debet obesse, quum parentes nihil tibi pro eo dederint vel promiserint.] Praeterea proponebas, quod, quum nullus debeat sine accusatore damnari, nec aliquid circa negotium illud sit actum in forma iudicii, depositiones testium non poterant tibi praeiudicium generare. Quia vero haec allegatio personam nostram tangere videbatur, dignum duximus causam commissae inquisitionis et ordinem plenius explicare, ne quis quomodolibet suspicetur, quod nos in hoc negotio perperam processerimus; praesertim quum ratio assignanda debeat esse posteris profutura. Quum enim iuris sit explorati, quod actore non probante is, qui convenitur, etiamsi nihil praestiterit, debet absolvi, videri poterat, quod nos tibi, qui conveniebaris a nobis, malitiose vel indiscrete onus probationis super tribus praemissis articulis imposuimus, videlicet ut ostenderes, quod praedictam cancellariam personae idoneae, modo canonico et tempore tibi competenti donasses. Porro quum donatio fuisset occulta, et ideo suspicione non careat, et elapso iam anno, nullus omnino cancellarius appareret, non immerito credebamus, quod secundum Lateranensis concilii statuta ad nos esset ipsius cancellariae donatio devoluta, et ideo potuissemus ipsam sine culpa conferre, quoniam, etsi locum Dei teneamus in terris, non tamen de occultis potuimus divinare. Quia ergo contra illud, quod prima facie iuste praesumebatur pro nobis, praesertim quum responderis prima vice, quod cancellariam alicui non contuleras, facultatem tibi pro te probandi concessimus, non fuit gravamen, sed gratia, nec ex malitia, sed ex benignitate processit. Quod etiam de modo canonico fidem nobis fieri mandavimus, tu causam praestitisti mandato, qui saepe nobis per literas tuas intimasti et tandem probasti per testes, quod retentis tibi proventibus officium concesseras memoratum. Ex quo non immerito contra talem concessionem fuimus suspicati, quum et proponeretur aperte, quod illud ei personae commiseras, cui secundum consuetudinem Mediolanensis ecclesiae non debuerat aliquo modo committi. Et ideo nos, qui non tam ex plenitudine potestatis, quam ex officii debito possumus et debemus de subditorum excessibus ad correctionem inquirere veritatem, te maxime causam et occasionem praestante, inquisitionem commisimus faciendam. Omnibus ergo diligenter auditis, quaecunque fuerunt in nostro auditorio proponenda, deliberavimus cum fratribus nostris, et in ipsa deliberatione te in tribus praecipue comperimus fuisse culpabilem : circa contrarietatem responsi, quia non solum nobis, qui, licet immeriti, locum Iesu Christi tenemus sed nec cuiquam debuisses ex certa scientia contraria respondere; circa carnalitatem animi, quia non ex affectu carnali, sed discreto iudicio debuisti ecclesiasticum officium et beneficium in persona magis idonea dispensare; et circa inhonestatem facti, quia non licuit ex pactione vel conventione quacunque, sub modo vel tenore praescripto concedere nudum officium et tibi retinere proventus, quum et in Lateranensi concilio prohibitum sit, ne quis conferendo ecclesiasticum beneficium partem proventuum suis usibus retinere praesumat, et alibi cautum reperiatur in canone, quod ecclesiastica beneficia sine deminutione debent conferri. Unde credimus distinguendum, utrum qui dat spirituale beneficium proventus ipsius ante donationem percipiat. Nam si proventus ante donationem non perceperit ipse, sed alius, et ex donatione consequatur, ut ipse proventus percipiat; non est dubium circa haec intercedere simoniacam pravitatem. Si vero ante donationem perceperit ipse proventus, credimus etiam distinguendum, utrum ante donationem constituat, ut ipsi proventus retineantur ad tempus pro causa iusta et necessaria, an conveniat cum eo, qui accepit beneficium, seu cum mediatore quocunque, ut officio illo concesso retineat ipse sibi proventus. Primum enim membrum credimus esse licitum, secundum autem dicimus non licere, ne viam aperiamus his, qui pravitatem suam satagunt palliare. [Quia vero etc. (cf. c. 9. *de off. archid. Title XIII: On Whether the Property of a Church May Be Alienated

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A prelate cannot give the property of one church to another, nor exchange their properties with one another, without the consent of both.

From the Fourth Council of Lyon.

It is not lawful for a bishop or abbot to transfer the land of one church to another, although both are in his power; nevertheless, if he wishes to exchange their lands, let him do so with the consent of both parties.

> DE REBUS ECCLESIAE ALIENANDIS VEL NON.
>
> Non potest praelatus res unius ecclesiae alteri dare, nec invicem res illas commutare, sine ambarum consensu.
>
> Ex concilio Lugdunensi IV.
>
> Non licet episcopo vel abbati terram unius ecclesiae vertere ad aliam, quamvis ambae in eius sint potestate; tamen, si commutare voluerit terras earum, cum consensu ambarum partium faciat.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: Secular princes cannot donate the property of a church, and those who receive it from them are excommunicated and lose everything that they otherwise lawfully held from the church. This it says according to one understanding, which is sufficiently pleasing.

From the same.

Those who seek the property of a church from kings and, by the impulse of dreadful cupidity, seize the substance of the needy, let the things they obtain be held invalid, and let them be excluded from the communion of the church whose resources they desire to take away.

> Principes saeculares res ecclesiae donare non possunt, et qui ab eis recipiunt, excommunicantur, et perdunt omnia, quae ab ecclesia alias legitime obtinebant. H. d. secundum unum intellectum, qui satis placet.
>
> Ex eodem.
>
> Qui res ecclesiae petunt a regibus, et horrendae cupiditatis impulsu egentium substantiam rapiunt, irrita habeantur quae obtinent, et a communione ecclesiae, cuius facultatem auferre cupiunt, excludantur.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: A rector of a church who gives the church property of twice the value can manumit slaves of the church; nevertheless, the person manumitted and his descendants will be under the patronage of the church. It is commonly summarized thus, although Panormitanus does not approve what is said concerning the valuation.

From the Council of Toledo.

The consent of the whole council determined that priests who either leave something to their church or, having nothing, nevertheless acquire certain estates or households for their churches may manumit some persons from the household of that church according to the measure of the property conferred, as the ancient canons decreed, in such a way that, with their peculium and posterity, they remain freeborn under the patronage of the church, pursuing the services enjoined upon them according to their ability.

> Rector ecclesiae, qui dat ecclesiae rem duplae aestimationis, servos ecclesiae manumittere potest; ipse tamen manumissus et eius posteri erunt sub patrocinio ecclesiae. Ita communiter summatur, tamen non placet Panorm. id, quod dicitur de aestimatione.
>
> Ex concilio Toletano.
>
> Consensus totius concilii diffinivit, ut sacerdotes, qui aut aliquid ecclesiae suae relinquunt, aut nihil habentes aliqua tamen praedia vel familias ecclesiis suis acquirunt, liceat illis aliquos de familia eiusdem ecclesiae manumittere iuxta rei collatae modum, quem antiqui canones decreverunt, ita, ut cum peculio et posteritate sua ingenui sub patrocinio ecclesiae maneant, utilitates iniunctas sibi iuxta quod poterunt prosequentes.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: If a prelate, giving nothing of his own to the church, manumits a slave of the church, the manumission is not valid.

From the same.

Let bishops who contribute nothing of their own to the church of Christ [fear this divine sentence and] not presume, to their own condemnation, to make free persons from the servants of the church. For it is impious that one who has not brought his own property to the church of Christ should inflict loss and intend to alienate the right of the church. Therefore, without any opposition, a successor bishop shall recall such free persons to the right of the church, [because not equity but wickedness absolved them.]

> Si praelatus nil de suo dans ecclesiae servum ecclesiae manumittit, non tenet manumissio.
>
> Ex eodem.
>
> Episcopi, qui nihil ex proprio suo ecclesiae Christi conferunt, [hanc divinam sententiam metuant et] liberos ex famulis ecclesiae ad condemnationem suam facere non praesumant. Impium est enim, ut qui res suas ecclesiae Christi non attulerit damnum inferat et ius ecclesiae alienare intendat. Tales igitur liberos successor episcopus absque aliqua oppositione ad ius ecclesiae revocabit, [quia eos non aequitas, sed improbitas absolvit.]

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: The property of a church ought not to be alienated.

From the Council at Senlis.

Let no one be permitted to alienate immovable property of his church, whether a house or a field, a garden or a rural slave [or civic loaves,] or to obligate it to creditors by title of a special hypothec. The word "alienation" includes a conditional grant, donation, sale, exchange, and a perpetual contract of emphyteusis. Hence let all priests [altogether] abstain from alienation of this kind, fearing the penalties that the constitution of Leo threatens.

> Res ecclesiae alienari non debent.
>
> Ex concilio apud Silvanectim.

> Nulli liceat alienare rem immobilem ecclesiae suae, sive domum sive agrum, sive hortum sive rusticum mancipium [vel panes civiles,] neque creditoribus specialis hypothecae titulo obligare. Alienationis autem verbum continet conditionem, donationem, venditionem, permutationem et emphyteusis perpetuum contractum. Unde omnes [omnino] sacerdotes ab huiusmodi alienatione abstineant, poenas timentes, quas Leonina constitutio comminatur.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: An alienation made concerning the property of a church is not valid, and the alienators, unless they restore the property, are excommunicated; any cleric can contradict and reclaim the property with its fruits. This it says, and the text is notable and is alleged daily.

Pope Symmachus.

If any of the priests, deacons, or defenders has subscribed to one alienating an estate of the church, let him be struck by the anathema by which an angered God strikes souls, the punishment that we premised against the alienator being preserved, unless perhaps both the alienator, while he reclaims it, and the person who received it provide for themselves by swift restitution. But if, with less care for their soul, they perhaps neglect the offered remedy, in addition to the penalty prescribed concerning this, let the instrument drawn up therefrom be emptied of force, although from the beginning it had none. But it is also lawful for any ecclesiastical persons to offer the voice of contradiction, and for them to be supported by ecclesiastical authority so that they can reclaim alienated things with their fruits. But we wish the law of this constitution to be observed only in the Apostolic See, with the custom preserved in all churches throughout the provinces that their rectors see to accord with their profession of religion.

> Alienatio de rebus ecclesiae facta non tenet, et alienatores, nisi rem restituant, excommunicantur, et quilibet clericus potest contradicere, et rem cum fructibus repetere. H. d. et est textus notabilis, et quotidie allegatur.
>
> Symmachus Papa.
>
> Si quis presbyterorum, diaconorum seu defensorum alienanti praedium ecclesiae subscripserit, quo iratus Deus animas percutit anathemate feriatur, servata, quam praemisimus, in alienatorem vindicta; nisi forte et alienator, dum repetit, et qui acceperit celeri restitutione sibi prospexerint. Quod si minore animae suae cura remedium oblatum forte neglexerint, praeter poenam, super hoc adscriptam, confectum exinde documentum viribus, quamvis ab initio nullas habuerit, vacuetur. Sed etiam licet quibuscunque ecclesiasticis personis vocem contradictionis offerre, et ut cum fructibus possint alienata reposcere, et ecclesiastica auctoritate fulciri. Huius autem constituti legem in apostolica tantum volumus sede servari, universis ecclesiis per provincias quae proposito religionis convenire rectores earum viderint more servato.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: Unfertile land of a church can be given in emphyteusis to one by whose effort it may be reduced to cultivation.

Alexander III, to the Bishop of Worcester.

To the ears (And below:) But those lands that, cleared from woods, have been made arable, you will be able to grant under hereditary right, to be held under an annual payment, to those by whose labor, or that of their parents, it is established that those lands were cleared, unless perhaps they can then be conferred upon others with the same labor and burden for the greater utility of your church.

Terra non fertilis ecclesiae dari potest in emphyteusin ei, cuius studio reducatur ad culturam.

Alexander III. Vigoriensi Episcopo.

Ad aures (Et infra:) Illas vero terras, quae de silvis exstirpatae sunt arabiles factae, eis hereditario iure poteris concedere sub annuo censu tenendas, a quibus ipsas suo vel parentum suorum labore constiterit fuisse exstirpatas; nisi forte tunc aliis possint ad maiorem tuae ecclesiae utilitatem cum eodem labore et onere conferri.

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: One swearing not to alienate the goods of the church cannot alienate those that are of the table, or those concerning which it is doubted whether they are of the table. This it says, as far as § Possessions. The Abbot.—(Possessions, etc.:) A bishop can, with the consent of the chapter, exchange or alienate possessions of the church that are less useful for more useful ones. This it says.

Celestine III, to the Archbishop of Ravenna.

So that the doubt of a proposed question may be untied by the providence of the Apostolic See, the Roman Church, over which although unworthy we preside, has been accustomed to answer the consultations of individuals. Indeed, you asked us whether the possessions or revenues of royal tithes, and those proceeding from other certain places, which your predecessor of good memory, until he closed his last day, held in his hands and took or expended for his own use, and did not enfeoff to others, are to be understood as belonging to his archiepiscopal table; and whether any contract of alienation can intervene concerning them when by the oath of fidelity you are bound to alienate nothing from the Apostolic See. Therefore, by the present page, we answer your inquiry in this manner: whether they are understood to be of the table or not, we consider it more prudent that they not be alienated. But we grant you free faculty to alienate or exchange possessions that are less useful to your church for other more useful ones, with the counsel and assent of your brothers and of the sounder part of the chapter. [You asked, etc. (cf. c. 1, On the Use and Authority of the Pallium, I. 8.) Given at the Lateran, in the third year. 1193.]

Iurans non alienare bona ecclesiae, non potest alienare ea, quae sunt de mensa, vel ea, de quibus dubitatur, an sint de mensa. Hoc dicit, usque ad §. Possessiones. Abbas — (Possessiones etc.:) Possessiones ecclesiae minus utiles pro utilioribus de consensu capituli potest episcopus permutare vel alienare. H. d.

Coelestinus III. Ravennatensi Archiepiscopo.

Ut super aliqua +repositae quaestionis dubietas apostolicae sedis providentia enodetur, Romana ecclesia, cui licet immeriti praesidemus, singulorum consultationibus consuevit respondere. Sane quaesivisti a nobis, si possessiones sive reditus regalium decimationum, et aliunde ex certis locis provenientes, quos praedecessor tuus bonae memoriae, quousque diem clausit extremum, ad manus suas tenuit, et in proprium usum excepit vel expendit, nec aliis infeudavit, de mensa sua sint archiepiscopi intelligendi, et de eis, quum ex sacramento fidelitatis tenearis apostolicae sedi nihil alienare, contractus alienationis cuiuslibet possit intervenire. Tuae ergo inquisitioni praesenti pagina taliter respondemus, quod, sive intelligantur de mensa sive non, ut non alienentur, consultius existimamus. Possessiones vero, quae ecclesiae tuae minus sunt utiles, pro aliis utilioribus de fratrum tuorum et sanioris partis capituli consilio et assensu alienandi seu commutandi liberam concedimus facultatem. [Quaesivisti etc. (cf. c. 1. de usu et auct. pall. I. 8.) Dat. Lat. Ao. III. 1193.]

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: A canon cannot lease an estate of the church in perpetuity.

The same, to the Bishop of Exeter.

Know that it has come to our hearing that certain canons of the church of Exeter, without consulting the other brothers, leased in perpetuity certain estates of that church, to its harm and their detriment, after receiving money therefrom. Therefore, by apostolic writings we command your fraternity that, if what is asserted is true, you take care lawfully to revoke those leases, in such a way indeed that, if those estates cannot otherwise be recalled, you compel, appeal being removed, those whom you know to be the authors of these leases to refund to the lessees the money received therefrom, lest, if leases of this kind happen to persist in their stability, grave disadvantage could thereby come to that church.

>
> Idem Exonensi episcopo.
>
> Ad audientiam nostram noveris pervenisse, quod quidam de canonicis Exonensis ecclesiae, quaedam praedia eiusdem ecclesiae, inconsultis aliis fratribus, in damnum eius et detrimentum eorum, accepta inde pecunia, in perpetuum locaverunt. Ideoque fraternitati tuae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus, si verum est quod asseritur, locationes illas legitime revocare procures, ita quidem, quod, si eadem praedia non aliter revocari potuerint, eos, quos noveris harum locationum auctores, ad susceptam inde pecuniam conductoribus refundendam appellatione remota compellas, ne, si huiusmodi locationes in sua contigerit stabilitate persistere, inde gravis eidem ecclesiae incommoditas possit provenire.

Chapter X

Latin source headnote: Possessions that are of the table cannot be alienated. And churches accustomed to be governed by regulars ought not to be conferred upon secular clerics. This it says. John of Imola.

Innocent III, to the Archbishop of Monreale.

You ought not to alienate possessions pertaining to your table or that of the chapter, or assign to clerics or lay persons churches in which monks have been accustomed to minister. Therefore, by authority of the present letters, we forbid your fraternity to grant to anyone seeking them possessions, villages, or churches that have not been accustomed to be assigned as benefices. Rather, you are not to delay, appeal being set aside, to recall to their former uses the Church of Saint Clement of Messina, which you are said to have conferred upon Gerard the Teuton; likewise the Church of the Holy Sepulcher of Messina, which you are said to have conferred upon Falcon the canon; and the benefice that you are said to have conferred upon Thomas, son of I. Ferrarius, to the grave prejudice of your church. [Given at Rome at Saint Peter's, on the eleventh day before the Kalends of June, in the first year of our pontificate. 1198.]

> Possessiones, quae sunt de mensa, non possunt alienari. Et ecclesiae consuetae regi per regulares saecularibus clericis conferri non debent. H. d. Ioann. de Imola.
>
> Innocentius III. Archiepiscopo Montis regalis.
>
> Possessiones ad mensam tuam vel capituli pertinentes, alienare non debes, aut ecclesias, in quibus monachi ministrare consueverunt, clericis vel laicis assignare personis. Ideoque fraternitati tuae auctoritate praesentium inhibemus, ne possessiones, casalia vel ecclesias, quae non consueverunt in beneficium assignari, alicui petenti concedas, immo potius ecclesiam S. Clementis de Messana, quam Gerardo Teutonico et s. sepulchri ecclesiam similiter de Messana, quam Falconi canonico, et beneficium quod Thomae filio I. Ferrarii in grave praeiudicium ecclesiae tuae diceris contulisse, ad priores usus non differas, appellatione postposita, revocare. [Dat. Romae ap. S. Petr. XI. Kal. Iun. Pont. nostr. Ao. I. 1198.]

Chapter XI

Latin source headnote: A church is restored against an alienation through which it was enormously injured. This it says according to the truer reading.

The same, to the Bishop of Moriana and the Provost of Ulcinj.

Know that it has come to our hearing that, when the monastery of Tusia was oppressed by the greatest burden of debts, our beloved sons its abbot and convent, compelled by necessity, granted a certain village in fief to the layman B., with this condition added: that the same layman should pay eighty pounds for which the same village had been obligated, which he did not delay to carry into effect. Hence, because the aforesaid monastery, as they say, was enormously injured in this, in that from the revenues of the aforesaid village the convent was accustomed to receive one course on individual days, and fish or another equivalent on feasts of twelve lessons, they humbly supplicated us that we cause the aforesaid fief to be recalled for the utility of the monastery, especially since in the first year the same layman received from its proceeds beyond the aforesaid sum, and for many years afterward took its fruits. Therefore, wishing so to provide for the burdens of the aforesaid monastery that we do not appear to inflict injury upon others, by apostolic writings we command your discretion that, after more fully inquiring into the truth, if you find that the aforesaid monastery incurred enormous loss on this account, you compel the often-mentioned layman, after previous admonition, by ecclesiastical censure, appeal being set aside, to leave the aforesaid fief free and quiet to that monastery, once the money that he is known to have expended for discharging the aforesaid fief or even for the utility of that monastery has been received from the same abbot and convent, since the fruits received until now ought to suffice him for his labor. [No letters, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the fourth day before the Kalends of April, in the ninth year. 1206.]

Restituitur ecclesia contra alienationem, per quam enormiter fuit laesa. H. d. secundum lecturam veriorem.

Idem Episcopo Mauriensi et Praeposito Ulconensi.

Ad nostram noveritis audientiam pervenisse, quod, quum Tusiense monasterium depressum esset onere maximo debitorum, dilecti filii abbas et conventus eiusdem villam quandam necessitate coacti B. laico concesserunt in feudum, tali conditione apposita, quod idem laicus LXXX. libras persolveret, pro quibus eadem villa exstiterat obligata, quod idem non distulit effectui mancipare. Unde +quia praedictum monasterium est, sicut dicunt, enormiter in hoc laesum eo, quod de reditibus villae praedictae conventus diebus singulis unum ferculum, et in festis duodecim lectionum pisces vel aliud aequivalens percipere consuevit, nobis humiliter supplicarunt, ut feudum praedictum faceremus ad utilitatem monasterii revocari, praesertim quum idem laicus primo anno de ipsius proventibus ultra summam perceperit praetaxatam, et per multos postmodum annos sumpserit eius fructus. Quocirca +nos, sic volentes gravaminibus praefati monasterii providere, quod alii non videamur iniuriam irrogare, discretioni vestrae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus, inquisita plenius veritate, si praedictum monasterium propter hoc inveneritis enorme dispendium incurrisse, saepe dictum laicum, ut pecunia, quam pro exoneratione praedicti feudi, seu etiam pro utilitate ipsius monasterii expendisse noscitur, ab eisdem abbate et conventu recepta, quum sibi fructus percepti hactenus sufficere debeant pro labore, praefatum feudum eidem monasterio dimittat liberum et quietum, monitione praemissa per censuram ecclesiasticam appellatione postposita, compellatis. [Nullis etc. Dat. Lat. IV. Kal. April. Ao. IX. 1206.]

Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: An alienation of ecclesiastical property made without the lawful assent of ecclesiastical persons is not valid, although approved by a constitution of laymen.

The same, in the General Council.

Since no power of disposing of the property of a church is attributed to laymen, however religious, whom the necessity of obeying awaits, not the authority of commanding, we grieve that in certain of them charity grows so cold that they do not fear to attack by their constitutions—or rather, destitutions—the immunity of ecclesiastical liberty that not only the holy Fathers but also secular princes fortified with many privileges, unlawfully presuming not only concerning alienation of fiefs and other possessions of churches and usurpation of jurisdictions, but also concerning mortuaries and other things that appear annexed to spiritual right. Wishing therefore concerning these matters to consult the indemnity of churches and provide against such great burdens, with the approval of the sacred council we decree that constitutions and sales of this kind, concerning fiefs or other ecclesiastical goods presumed without the lawful assent of ecclesiastical persons on occasion of a constitution of lay power—which can be called not a constitution but a destitution or destruction—and also usurpation of jurisdictions, are not valid, with the presumers to be compelled by ecclesiastical censure.

Alienatio rei ecclesiasticae facta sine legitimo ecclesiasticarum personarum assensu non tenet, licet approbetur per constitutionem laicorum.

Idem in concilio generali.

Quum laicis, quamvis religiosis, disponendi de rebus ecclesiae nulla sit attributa potestas, quos obsequendi manet necessitas, non auctoritas imperandi : dolemus, in quibusdam ex illis sic refrigescere caritatem, quod immunitatem ecclesiasticae libertatis, quam non tantum sancti Patres, sed etiam principes saeculares privilegiis multis munierunt, non formidant suis constitutionibus, vel potius destitutionibus impugnare, non solum de alienatione feudorum, ac aliarum possessionum ecclesiarum et usurpatione iurisdictionum, sed etiam de mortuariis, nec non et aliis, quae iuri spirituali annexa videntur, illicite praesumendo. Volentes igitur super his indemnitatibus consulere ecclesiarum ac tantis gravaminibus providere, constitutiones et venditiones huiusmodi feudorum seu aliorum bonorum ecclesiasticorum sine legitimo personarum ecclesiasticarum assensu praesumptas occasione constitutionis laicae potestatis, quum non constitutio, sed destitutio vel destructio dici possit, nec non usurpatio iurisdictionum, sacri approbatione concilii decernimus non tenere, praesumptoribus per censuram ecclesiasticam compellendis.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: A successor revokes a precarious grant unreasonably made by his predecessor.

From the Council of Carthage.

Concerning precarious grants unreasonably made by rectors of churches who bind themselves and their successors under a grave penalty so that they cannot dissolve their acts, we command that no successor be bound by the penalty of his predecessor, but that it be granted to his providence that, if his predecessor unreasonably distributed the property of the church, it be recalled by him to the right of that church.

> Ex concilio Carthaginensi.
>
> De precariis, irrationabiliter factis a rectoribus ecclesiarum, se suosque successores poena gravi obligantibus, ut facta ipsorum dissolvere nequeant, praecipimus, ut nemo successor antecessoris sui poena sit obligatus, sed suae providentiae sit concessum, ut, si antecessor eius res ecclesiae irrationabiliter distribuit, ab eo ad ius eiusdem ecclesiae revocentur.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: The grant of a loan for use is extinguished by the will of the grantor or his successor; but the grant of a precarium is not.

Gregory IX.

A thing loaned for use is granted for as long as the one who granted it permits. It is also dissolved by the death of the one to whom it was granted, but not by that of the grantor; or when it happens to be alienated to someone wishing to revoke it, because by an agreement of this kind it is not lawful for another's property to be possessed against the owner's will. But precarious grants that are sometimes customarily made from possessions of churches are not to be revoked at the will of the grantors.

Solvitur quoque obitu eius, cui concessum est, non etiam concedentis; aut quum ipsum alienari contingit alicui hoc revocare volenti, quia per conventionem huiusmodi non licet rem alienam invito domino possideri. Porro precariae, quae quandoque de ecclesiarum possessionibus fieri solent, non sunt pro voluntate concedentium revocandae.

Title XV: On Loan for Use

Sole Chapter

Latin source headnote: A borrower for use who receives solely for his own benefit is liable even for the slightest fault, but not for accident except in the three cases placed here. And a loan for use is not revoked before completion of the use. This it says.

Gregory IX.

When someone receives a loan for use solely for his own benefit, he is liable even for the slightest fault, although a fortuitous accident ought not to be imputed to him unless it occurred through his fault, or an agreement intervened, or he was in delay. Nor is an action on loan for use rightly brought against him except after completion of the use for whose sake the thing had been lent, since it behooves us not to be deceived but to be assisted by a benefit.

Title XVI: On Deposit

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A church is not liable for a deposit made with a cleric of the church unless it was turned to the utility of the church.

Alexander III, to the Bishop of London.

That grave and hateful complaint which has reached us concerning your deposit hitherto denied to you constrains us with twofold anxiety, in that we can neither fail you in this nor effectively assist you as you would wish. For since it is not established to us that your money, which that man of Belial stole by impious and detestable surreption, was turned to the utility of the church, we ought not by law, nor can we, direct a peremptory insistence of command against the canons of that church that they return to you the same money, committed, as is said, to a person, not to the church. Therefore, we counsel your discretion, and with the diligence of inward charity persuade you to direct your action meanwhile against that robber and thief, because, as we have heard, he has the purses and carried away the things stolen from you. For we ourselves also commanded judges to bring that wicked man to account under severe examinations and, even if necessary, to torment and afflict him, bound with chains, so that he may be compelled to return the said money. But we wish you to have such affection toward the church that you seek nothing undue from it. If, however, you can amicably make an agreement with them concerning receipt of revenues, know that this is acceptable to us.

> DE DEPOSITO.

Ex deposito, facto apud clericum ecclesiae, non tenetur ecclesias, nisi in utilitatem ecclesiae sit versum.

Alexander III. Londonensi Episcopo.

Gravis illa et odibilis querimonia, quae usque ad nos super deposito tuo tibi hactenus denegato pervenit, +duplici nos anxietate perstringit eo, quod tibi in hoc et deesse non possumus, et adesse, prout velles, efficaciter non valemus. Quum enim non constet nobis, pecuniam tuam, quam ille vir Belial impia et detestabili surreptione furatus est, in ecclesiae utilitatem conversam, non debemus de iure, nec possumus contra canonicos eiusdem ecclesiae praecise intentare iussionis instantiam, ut tibi eandem reddant pecuniam, personae, ut dicitur, non ecclesiae commendatam. Quocirca discretioni tuae consulimus, et internae caritatis diligentia suademus, ut in raptorem illum et furem tuam interim dirigas actionem, eo, quod, ut audivimus, loculos habet, et ea, quae tibi surrepta sunt, asportavit. Nam et nos ipsi iudicibus dedimus in mandatis, ut illum iniquum sub duris quaestionibus ad rationem ponant, et etiam, si oportuerit, vinculis macerent alligatum et affligant, ut dictam pecuniam reddere compellatur. +Ceterum circa ecclesiam illum affectum te habere volumus, ut nil ab ea requiras indebitum. Si autem cum eis amicabiliter poteris de redituum perceptione pacisci, noveris id nobis acceptum.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: It states for what a depositary is liable and how a deposit is reclaimed.

Gregory IX.

Good faith is presumed absent if, while your own property remained safe, you lost the things deposited. You are also liable for fault if you offered yourself for the deposit, or if you received something for safekeeping. But when agreement, fault, or delay has preceded, even a fortuitous accident is imputed. Indeed, it was lawful for the depositor to revoke the deposit at his own will, against which there was no place for setoff or deduction, so that a contract that arises from good faith may in no way be referred to bad faith, although setoff is admitted in other matters if the cause from which it is sought is liquid in such a way that it is believed to have an easy outcome.

Dicit, ad quid tenetur depositarius, et quomodo repetatur depositum.

Gregorius IX.

Bona fides abesse praesumitur, si, rebus tuis salvis exsistentibus, depositas amisisti. De culpa quoque teneris, si te ipsum deposito obtulisti, vel si aliquid pro custodia recepisses. Pacto vero, culpa vel mora praecedentibus, casus etiam fortuitus imputatur. Sane depositori licuit pro voluntate sua depositum revocare, contra quod compensationi vel deductioni locus non fuit, ut contractus, qui ex bona fide oritur, ad perfidiam minime referatur, licet compensatio admittatur in aliis, si causa, ex qua postulatur, sit liquida ita, quod facilem exitum credatur habere.

Title XVII: On Purchase and Sale

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A bishop compels that goods not be sold more dearly to travelers than they would be sold in the market.

From the Council at Valence.

It pleased [us and our faithful] that priests admonish their peoples that they too be hospitable, [that they deny lodging to no traveler,] and, [so that every occasion of robbery may be removed,] that they not sell more dearly to travelers than they can sell in the market; otherwise, let the travelers report this to the priest, so that at his command they sell to them with humanity.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: One who falsifies measures and weights ought to do penance for thirty days on bread and water.

From the Council of Mainz.

So that measures and weights may be just, as has been enacted in the divine laws, is contained in the lordly capitulary, and is established by this sacred assembly, thus it pleases all of us to observe. And if anyone has presumed to alter just measures and just weights for the sake of gain, let him do penance for thirty days on bread and water.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: A sale is valid although the seller was deceived beyond half the just price; nevertheless, the seller can bring an action so that the thing is restored or the just price supplied, and if he seeks one of them peremptorily, he fails.

Alexander III, to the Bishop of Arras.

When our beloved sons the canons of Beauvais proposed a complaint against the religious men, the abbot and brothers of Chaalis, that they had purchased from certain of them, while the chapter was ignorant, for ten pounds the forest called Black Valley, then worth forty marks, after many commissions we finally committed the cause itself, under a certain form, to our venerable brother the Bishop of Thérouanne and our beloved son the Dean of Reims to be terminated, adding in the letters that, if each could not be present for cognizance of that cause, the other, associating with himself prudent and honorable men, should not delay to proceed in the same business. Therefore, when the dean summoned the parties to his presence on this account, the abbot and monks sent messengers not to act or answer but to seek delays, asserting that they had sent to us and appealed to our hearing. But because appeal had been removed in the letters, the dean finally proceeded in cognizance of that cause. And when it was established to him through witnesses of the canons of Beauvais that the aforesaid brothers had purchased the forest for less than half the just price, he pronounced that the sale was not valid and, adjudging the forest to the church of Beauvais, inducted the canons into possession. Therefore, when messengers of both parties were constituted in our presence on this account, and confirmation of the sentence by apostolic authority was insistently and earnestly sought on behalf of the canons, after deliberation with our brothers and other wise men who, sworn to the laws, give judgment, we understood that sentence to be contrary to law. But because it is in the choice of the purchaser, when a thing is bought for less than half the just price, whether he wishes to supply the just price or rescind the sale, annulling that sentence as contrary to law, we adjudged that possession should be restored to the monks, saving to the canons every question concerning deception in the price, lack of consent of the chapter in the sale, or any other reasonable cause that the canons should determine to propose against the monks.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: If a husband has other goods from which a wife can provide for herself, and with the wife's consent sells a thing donated to the wife on account of marriage, the wife cannot trouble concerning it a purchaser who possessed the thing for a period of thirty years, especially if the price was turned to the common use of husband and wife. This it says according to the understanding held by Panormitanus, and it is a notable case limiting civil law. According to John Andrew, it is unnecessary to add "especially," but all three things are necessarily required.

Celestine III.

It has come to us from your intimation that formerly P. the knight sold to the woman B., for a certain quantity of money, a certain house assigned to his wife A. as a donation on account of marriage, with the woman herself giving express consent, which B. possessed freely and peacefully from that sale for thirty years while the aforesaid marriage endured. But when the aforesaid knight entered upon the way of all flesh, his widow presumes to proceed against this, alleging that the said house, granted to her by title of donation on account of marriage, could not have been alienated, although her consent is known to have acceded to that contract. But the aforesaid woman B. endeavors to protect herself on the ground that for thirty years, while their marriage endured, she possessed the house itself in good faith and under a just title; that its price was turned to the common uses of that husband and wife; and that at the time of the sale there existed among the husband's resources that from which the aforesaid woman could advantageously provide for herself. Therefore, because you took care to consult us concerning these things, we answer your solicitude that, if the things we have premised are true, the aforesaid purchaser ought not to be further troubled concerning that house on the aforesaid occasions.

Praenominato vero milite viam universae carnis ingresso, relicta eius venire contra hoc praesumit, allegans, dictam domum titulo donationis propter nuptias sibi concessam alienari non potuisse, licet eius consensus ipsi noscatur contractui accessisse. Praefata vero B. mulier ex eo nititur se tueri, quod triginta annis constante illorum matrimonio domum ipsam bona fide tituloque iusto possedit, et quia in communes usus viri et uxoris illius pretium est conversum, ac factae venditionis tempore, unde sibi praefata mulier utiliter consulere potuisset, in viri facultationibus consistebat. Chapter V

Latin source headnote: If in a sale an agreement is added concerning recovery of the thing after a certain time, with a small price established, a pledge and not a sale is presumed.

Innocent III, to the Bishop of Patti.

Know that it has come to our hearing that, when the layman R., bearer of the present letters, wished to receive a loan from M., the creditor of the diocese of Trani, lest in the future he could be sued under the canon issued against usurers, received from him by title of purchase his houses and olive trees, when in truth a usurious contract was being transacted. This is apparent from the fact that the creditor, as the public instrument contains, promised the debtor that, whenever between the seventh and ninth years he should give forty ounces of tarins, which scarcely attained half the just price, he would restore his houses and olive trees. Therefore, because fraud and deceit ought to furnish patronage to no one, by apostolic writings we command your fraternity that, if the matter stands thus, notwithstanding the instrument of sale drawn up in fraud of the canon promulgated against usurers, you compel the aforesaid M., by the penalty promulgated against usurers in the Lateran Council, appeal being removed, to restore the aforesaid houses and olive trees to him upon whom they ought to devolve by hereditary right, since the debtor has entered upon the way of all flesh. [Given at the Lateran, on the fourth day before the Nones of March. 1203.]

Quia igitur fraus et dolus cuiquam patrocinari non debent, fraternitati tuae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus, si res ita se habet, instrumento venditionis confecto in fraudem canonis promulgati contra usurarios non obstante, praedictum M. ad restituendas domos et olivas praedictas ei, ad quem debent hereditario iure devolvi, quum debitor sit viam universae carnis ingressus, per poenam in Lateranensi concilio contra usurarios promulgatam appellatione remota compellas. Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: A seller deceived beyond half the just price can bring an action so that the thing is restored to him upon returning the price received, or that the just price is supplied; and in this the choice belongs to the purchaser. This it says according to Antonius.

The same, to the Bishop and Archdeacon of Urbino.

Gregory IX.

Title XVIII: On Letting and Hiring

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: Masters and scholars at Bologna who, before the term of the letting, hire the lodgings of other masters or scholars without their consent are excommunicated.

Clement III.

It became known to us from the rescript of the letters of P., formerly Bishop of Tusculum of pious memory, that, when he entered the city of Bologna during the time of his legation, he found that it had been established there by W., formerly Bishop of Porto of good memory, and forbidden under excommunication, that any scholars [of others] should hire lodgings by the promise of a greater rent, so that they might claim them for themselves either from zeal for empty glory, wishing to appear more powerful in expenditures, or for the advantage of private utility. Hence he himself, considering with solicitous providence that the wickedness of a condition of this kind would engender both a tinder of discord and no small impediments to studies, decreed valid the constitution made by the Bishop of Porto, legate of the Apostolic See, and afterward confirmed by the aforesaid Bishop of Tusculum, namely: that none of the masters or scholars should dare to make an agreement with a landlord concerning the hiring of others' lodgings, to the injury or prejudice of the inhabitants, unless it was first established that the term of the letting had elapsed or the tenants had furnished their favor and consent in this; since the Bishop of Porto forbade this under excommunication, and the other decreed the same to be observed under penalty of anathema. We confirm it by apostolic authority, establishing that this be recited each year by you, brother bishop, and by every successor of yours, in a common hearing of the masters and scholars, and that the aforesaid wickedness of an improper hiring be expressed by a renewed [each year] sentence of excommunication. Therefore, let it be lawful for no person whatsoever to infringe the page of our confirmation, etc.

> DE LOCATO ET CONDUCTO.

> Excommunicati sunt magistri et scholares Bononienses, qui ante tempus conductionis conducunt hospitia aliorum magistrorum vel scholarium sine eorum consensu.

Clemens III.

Ex rescripto literarum piae recordationis P. quondam Tusculanensis episcopi nobis innotuit, quod, quum civitatem Bononiensem tempore suae legationis intrasset, invenit, ibi fuisse a bonae memoriae W. quondam Portuensi episcopo constitutum et sub excommunicatione prohibitum, ne aliqui scholares [aliorum] hospitia maioris mercedis promissione conducerent, ut ea sibi vel inanis gloriae studio, quasi potentiores in expensis apparere volentes, vel privatae utilitatis commodo vindicarent. Unde ipse sollicita provisione considerans, quod huiusmodi conditionis improbitas et discordiae fomitem, et impedimenta non modica pareret studiorum, praedictam Constitutionem, factam ab episcopo Portuensi apostolicae sedis legato et a praedicto Tusculanensi episcopo postmodum confirmatam, videlicet ut nullus magistrorum sive scholarium super conducendis aliorum hospitiis in laesionem vel praeiudicium habitantium audeat hospitem convenire, nisi prius constiterit tempus conductionis elapsum, vel inquilini in hoc suum favorem praestiterint et consensum, quum idem Portuensis sub excommunicatione hoc prohibuerit, et alter sub poena anathematis idem decreverit observandum, ratam esse decernimus, et eam auctoritate apostolica confirmamus, statuentes, ut a te, frater episcope, et tuo quolibet successore hoc singulis annis in communi audientia magistrorum atque scholarium recitetur, *et praetaxata pravae conductionis improbitas innovata * [per annos singulos] *excommunicationis sententia exprimatur. Nulli ergo omnino hominum liceat paginam nostrae confirmationis infringere etc. *

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: Ecclesiastical persons can lease the proceeds of tithes to those with whom the condition of the church is made better, notwithstanding a contrary statute of the diocesan; and the same reasoning applies to other property of the church.

Innocent III, to the Abbot and Convent of Saint Peter of Préaux in the Diocese of London.

Your report declared to us that, although you have been accustomed to give the fruits of your tithes at farm, the diocesans of the places issued a certain statute concerning tithes of this kind to be leased to parish priests, by which your utility is not a little impeded; wherefore you implore concerning this the remedy of apostolic provision. Notwithstanding a contrary statute of the diocesan bishops, you can freely lease the proceeds of your tithes to those whom you see to be expedient for you and with whom you will be able to make the condition of your church better, yet in such a way that a letting of this kind does not appear to extend to a fief or alienation.

Personae ecclesiasticae locare possunt proventus decimarum his, cum quibus conditio ecclesiae fit melior, statuto dioecesani contrario non obstante; et eadem ratio est de aliis rebus ecclesiae.

Innocentius III. Abbati et Conventui S. Petri de Pratel. Londoniensis dioecesis.

Vestra nobis relatio declaravit, quod, quum ad firmam fructus vestrarum dare consueveritis decimarum, +diocesani locorum statutum quoddam de huiusmodi decimis locandis parochialibus presbyteris ediderunt, per quod utilitas vestra non modicum impeditur; quare super hoc apostolicae provisionis remedium imploratis. Dioecesanorum episcoporum statuto contrario non obstante vestrarum decimarum proventus illis libere locare potestis, quibus vobis expedire videritis, et cum quibus ecclesiae vestrae conditionem poteritis facere meliorem, ita tamen, quod huiusmodi locatio ad feudum vel alienationem non videatur extendi.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: On account of grave sterility happening to the lessee without his fault, the rent is remitted proportionally, unless it can be set off against the abundance of the preceding or following period. This it says as far as § But.—(But, etc.:) Four cases are placed here in which a tenant can lawfully be expelled before the term of the letting has ended. The Abbot.

Gregory IX.

On account of sterility affecting the lessees with great disadvantage, happening through a defect of the property without fault of the cultivator or by a fortuitous accident, remission of rent is to be made proportionally to the cultivators of your church, unless the sterility can be set off against the abundance of the preceding or following year. But you will be able, against the tenant's will, to inhabit or repair the house if necessity—which nevertheless was not imminent at the time of letting —requires it, with the rent for the remaining time remitted to him. He is also reasonably removed therefrom if he conducted himself wickedly there, or, when he had not paid the rent for two years, did not provide for himself by swift satisfaction.

Verum invito inquilino domum inhabitare vel reficere poteris, si necessitas, quae tamen non imminebat locationis tempore, id exposcat, remissa sibi pro residuo temporis pensione; qui etiam inde rationabiliter amovetur, si perverse ibi fuerit conversatus, vel quum canonem per biennium non solvisset, si sibi satisfactione celeri non providit.

Latin source headnote: An emphyteuta of a church cannot sell his improvements unless the things stated here are observed. And if he acts contrary to them, or has not paid the rent for two years and has not afterward swiftly purged the delay, he can justly be expelled.

The same.

An emphyteuta, after first asking the church and notifying it how much is offered to him by others, could sell his improvements and the right belonging to him to others who are in no way prohibited from a purchase of this kind, if the church said that it was unwilling to buy or if the space of two months elapsed from the time of notification. An emphyteuta also, by presuming otherwise or ceasing payment of the rent for two years, unless he afterward endeavored to provide for himself by swift satisfaction, could justly be expelled, notwithstanding that he was not notified to pay the rent, since in this case the appointed day makes demand for the lord.

Title XIX: On Exchange of Things

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A prince can acquire immovable property of a church by exchange, after giving better or equal property. This it says, and in what it says, "or equal," there is a notable case.

From the Council at Silvanum.

If a prince wishes to furnish immovable property to holy places and receive from them another immovable thing, and in that manner contract an exchange by common will, it is lawful for him to do this if a reasonable cause requires it and the thing that he furnishes is greater or equal, a divine pragmatic sanction concerning this having been promulgated by him.

> DE RERUM PERMUTATIONE.
>
> Princeps potest rem ecclesiae immobilem per permutationem acquirere, data re meliori vel aequali. H. d. et in hoc, quod dicit, vel aequali, est casus notabilis.
>
> Ex concilio apud Silvan.
>
> Si princeps voluerit rem immobilem sanctis locis praestare, et accipere ab eis aliam immobilem rem, eoque modo de communi voluntate permutationem contrahere, liceat ei hoc facere, si causa rationabilis id exposcat, et res, quam praestiterit, maior fuerit vel aequalis, divina pragmatica sanctione super hoc ab eo promulgata.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: An exchange of ecclesiastical property made in a case not permitted, or without observance of the solemnity of law, is to be revoked by a successor.

From the Council of Beauvais.

Let exchanges of ecclesiastical property be guarded against greatly and, if in any way they ought to be made, inspected most subtly; but those that were made imprudently by a predecessor according to the canonical decree of Pope Hilary, or were unlawfully committed by others, shall be corrected by the one who is successor.

> Permutatio rerum ecclesiasticarum, facta in casu non concesso, seu non servata solennitate iuris, est revocanda per successorem.
>
> Ex concilio Belvacensi.
>
> Ut commutationes rerum ecclesiasticarum valde caveantur et subtilissime, si aliquo modo fieri debent, inspiciantur; quae autem ab antecessore inconsulte factae sunt iuxta decretum canonicum Hilarii Papae, vel ab aliis illicite commissae sunt, ab eo, qui successor est, emendentur.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: Slaves of a church ought not to be exchanged except for freedom, or unless they are fugitives. This it says together with the following chapter.

From the Council at Senlis.

It is not fitting that ecclesiastical slaves be exchanged except for freedom, namely, so that the slaves who are given for an ecclesiastical man remain in servitude to the church, and the ecclesiastical man who is exchanged enjoy perpetual freedom. For that which has once been consecrated to God ought not now to be transferred to human uses.

> Mancipia ecclesiae non debent permutari, nisi ad libertatem, vel nisi sint fugitiva H. d. cum c. sequenti.
>
> Ex concilio apud Silvanectum.
>
> Mancipia ecclesiastica nisi ad libertatem non convenit commutari, videlicet ut mancipia, quae pro ecclesiastico homine dabuntur, in ecclesiae servitute permaneant, et ecclesiasticus homo, qui commutatur, fruatur perpetua libertate. Quod enim semel Deo consecratum est ad humanos usus iam transferri non decet.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: Slaves of a church cannot be exchanged with profane persons or alienated unless they are fugitives.

From the same.

It appears unjust and impious that slaves whom faithful men or women consecrated to God and his saints for the remedy of their soul should, for slavery to any gift or by commerce of exchange, again be reduced to the servitude of secular persons, since canonical authority permits only fugitive slaves to be sold. Therefore let all rectors of churches take the greatest care lest the alms of one become the sin of another. And it is absurd that a slave departing from ecclesiastical dignity should be subject to human servitude.

> Servi ecclesiae cum profanis permutari non possunt nec alienari, nisi sint fugitivi.
>
> Ex eodem.
>
> Iniustum videtur et impium, ut mancipia, quae fideles viri seu feminae Deo et sanctis eius pro remedio animae suae consecrarunt, cuiuscunque muneris mancipio vel commutationis commercio iterum in servitutem saecularium redigantur, quum canonica auctoritas servos tantummodo permittat distrahi fugitivos. Et ideo omnes ecclesiarum rectores summopere caveant, ne eleemosyna unius alterius peccatum fiat. Et est absurdum, ut ab ecclesiastica dignitate servus discedens humanae sit obnoxius servituti.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: Prebends cannot be exchanged when an agreement precedes; nevertheless, a bishop can exchange persons from place to place.

Urban III.

It was asked on your behalf whether exchanges of prebends can be made, since exchange of dignities was interdicted in the Council of Tours. For there are certain persons who yield their prebend and renounce their right so that they may obtain a greater prebend or thereby obtain a certain sum of money, which indeed is contrary to honor and undoubtedly contains simoniacal depravity. Therefore hold generally that exchanges of prebends cannot be made by law, especially when an agreement has been sent beforehand, which concerning spiritual things or things connected with spiritual ones always contains the stain of simony. But if the bishop has inspected a necessary cause, he will lawfully be able to transfer persons from one place to another, so that those who are less useful to one place may be able to exercise themselves more usefully elsewhere.

> Praebendae pacto praecedente permutari non possunt; episcopus tamen potest de loco ad locum permutare personas.
>
> Urbanus III.
>
> Quaesitum est ex parte tua, si commutationes fieri valeant praebendarum, quum commutatio dignitatum in Turonensi concilio fuerit interdicta. +Sunt enim quidam, qui praebendae suae cedunt et iuri renunciant, ut maiorem praebendam obtineant, vel ex hoc certam summam pecuniae consequantur, quod quidem honestati est contrarium, et simoniacam procul dubio continet pravitatem. Generaliter itaque teneas, quod commutationes praebendarum de iure fieri non possunt, praesertim pactione praemissa, quae circa spiritualia vel connexa spiritualibus labem semper continet simoniae. Si autem episcopus causam inspexerit necessariam, licite poterit de uno loco ad alium transferre personas, ut quae uni loco minus sunt utiles alibi se valeant utilius exercere.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: Churches can be exchanged with one another by right of ownership, and their possessions can also be exchanged, and a price can be supplied for those of lesser value.

Clement III.

For resolving questions [that are extended to the Apostolic See by our brothers and fellow bishops, it befits us to apply solicitude according to the duty of our office.] We have understood therefore from your letters that two conventual churches are constituted in your diocese, each of which has a parish church with possessions nearer to the other than to itself. But because they desire to exchange them, and one of them abounds more by reason of better revenues, and therefore requests that a certain sum of counted money be added to its church so that they may thus be able to arrive at equality of exchange, it was doubted whether this could lawfully be done; for which reason you wished to consult the Apostolic See. Therefore, although we in no way think that the industry of your discretion is ignorant of what is to be done concerning that matter, nevertheless we answer [thus] your prudence: since an exchange can be celebrated concerning the aforesaid parish churches by themselves, and in an exchange of possessions it is not forbidden by itself, if one outweighs the other by reason of possessions, for money to be refunded also from their possessions to one another, as shall appear expedient, a contract of exchange can be entered after a certain quantity of money has been refunded, yet in such a way that those contracts are in no way mixed with one another.

> Ecclesiae iure proprietatis possunt ad invicem permutari, et possesiones earum etiam permutari possunt, et pro minus valentibus pretium suppleri.

> Ad quaestiones solvendas [quae per fratres et coepiscopos nostros sedi apostolicae porriguntur, iuxta officii nostri debitum nos convenit sollicitudinem adhibere.] Intelleximus itaque ex literis tuis, quod duae conventuales ecclesiae sunt in tua dioecesi constitutae, quarum utraque parochialem habet ecclesiam cum possessionibus magis alteri quam sibi vicinam. Illis autem eas desiderantibus permutare, quum illarum altera respectu meliorum proventuum plus abundet, et ideo suae ecclesiae sibi postulet adiici certam summam pecuniae numeratae, ut sic ad aequalitatem permutationis valeant pervenire, utrum possit id licite fieri exstitit dubitatum; +quam ob causam sedem apostolicam consulere voluisti. Licet itaque tuae discretionis industriam ignorare minime putemus, quid super eodem articulo sit agendum, nihilominus [sic] tuae prudentiae Respondemus, quod, quum de iam dictis parochialibus ecclesiis per se queat commutatio celebrari, et in permutatione possessionum per se non sit inhibitum, si altera ratione possessionum alteri praeponderet, pecuniam posse refundi de ipsarum quoque possessionibus ad invicem, prout visum fuerit expedire, refusa certa pecuniae quantitate, poterit contractus permutationis iniri, sic tamen, quod illi contractus nequaquam sibi invicem misceantur.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: Those who exchange their benefices by their own authority lose them.

Innocent III, to the Archbishop of Sens.

When formerly it came to our hearing that our beloved sons Master S. and B. had exchanged an archdeaconry and a provostship with one another, at the request of that master [B.,] we thought that the cause concerning this should be delegated to the Bishop of Mâcon of good memory. And when that same B. afterward approached our presence, so that the business might proceed without suspicion, at his request we thought that our beloved son the Abbot of Cluny should be joined to that bishop. But because, on account of the abbot's absence, the delegated judges had not proceeded together in the cause, each party presented itself to our sight and obtained a hearing before us. And although the aforesaid master from the beginning voluntarily confessed the exchange, that same B. nevertheless wholly denied it, assertively alleging that both he had resigned the provostship without any condition, and after the free resignation of the aforesaid master had obtained the archdeaconry; although the master himself [G.] alleged in opposition that B. had treated with him at length concerning the exchange and finally completed in the hands of our venerable brother the Bishop of Autun what he had treated. (And below: [cf. c. 33, On the Office of a Delegated Judge, I. 29.]) Therefore, when it was established to us, both through public report and through valid presumption and even manifest proof, that B. himself furnished his assent to the exchange, while the aforesaid master publicly confessed his error, we took care to despoil the one of the provostship and the other of the archdeaconry, issuing concerning this a definitive sentence against them. [But finally, etc. Given at the Lateran, on the Ides of January, in the fifth year. 1203.]

Beneficia sua perdunt qui ea propria permutant auctoritate.

Innocentius III. Senonensi Archiepiscopo.

Quum olim ad nostram audientiam pervenisset, quod dilecti filii magister S. et B. archidiaconatum et praeposituram ad invicem commutassent, +magistri eiusdem [B.] obtentu causam super hoc bonae memoriae Matisconensi episcopo duximus delegandam. Quumque idem B. ad praesentiam nostram postmodum accessisset, ut in negotio sine suspicione procederet, obtentu ipsius dilectum filium abbatem Cluniacensem eidem episcopo duximus adiungendum. Verum quum propter abbatis absentiam non fuisset a delegatis ipsis pariter in causa processum, utraque partium se nostro conspectui praesentavit, et audientiam obtinuit coram nobis. Et Licet praedictus magister ab initio sponte fuerit de permutatione confessus, idem tamen B. eam inficiabatur omnino, assertive proponens, quod et ipse praepositurum sine conditione qualibet resignavit, et post liberam resignationem praedicti magistri archidiaconatum fuerat assecutus: +licet magister ipse [G.] proponeret ex adverso, ipsum secum diutius de permutatione tractasse, et complevisse tandem in manibus venerabilis fratris nostri Eduensis episcopi quod tractaverat. * (Et infra:* [cf. c. 33. de off. iud. del. I.  29.]) Quum ergo nobis tum per publicam famam, tum per validam praesumptionem et probationem etiam manifestam constaret, quod ipse B. suum praestiterit permutationi consensum, praedictus autem magister suum publice fateretur errorem, et hunc praepositura, et illum archidiaconatu curavimus spoliare, super hoc diffinitivam contra eos sententiam proferentes. [*Tandem vero etc. Dat. Lat. Id. Ian. Ao. V. * 1203.]

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: If an exchange of benefices has been completed on one side, and it is due to the other that it is not fulfilled, the party is restored to his benefice, and to this extent the law contains this.

The same, to the Archbishop and Provost of Saint Andrew of Cologne.

Since pastoral care of all the faithful has been committed to us by the Lord Jesus Christ himself, it is known to be expedient for our solicitude that we ought so to support all persons in their reasons that the rights of some do not sustain loss in the sight of the church, but ought to remain firm and unimpaired. We have understood, from the report of our beloved son G., a canon of Saint John in Liège, that, when he and the cleric L., led by a certain lightness of mind, began to treat between themselves concerning an exchange of their prebends, which they believed to threaten the utility of each, nevertheless, on occasion of the said exchange, after the prebend of that G., which he had had in the church of Saint Mary of Namur, had been assigned to a certain kinsman of his, that same cleric L. was unwilling to resign his prebend to G. as he had promised, and thus the same G., as he asserts, remained altogether frustrated of his hope. And when there had been litigation concerning this for a long time in the presence of our venerable brother the Bishop of Liège, that same L. finally appealed to the Apostolic See; and when the said G. [approached our presence] not without great danger and labor, the same L. neither came nor took care to send a sufficient respondent on his behalf. Therefore, since the laws assist those deceived and not those deceiving, and fraud and deceit ought to furnish patronage to no one, although by themselves they could not by law exchange ecclesiastical benefices, nevertheless, so that pardon may be granted to simplicity, by apostolic writings we command your discretion that, if it is established that the aforesaid G. was thus deceived, after removing from his prebend, which he is said to have possessed for a long time, the kinsman of L. himself or any other unlawful holder, you cause it, with the obstacle of appeal removed, to be restored to him and cause him to enjoy its peaceful possession [etc.]

Si permutatio beneficiorum completa est ex una parte, et per alteram stat, quo minus impleatur, restituitur pars ad suum beneficium, et secundum hoc continet ius.

Idem Archiepiscopo et Praeposito sancti Andreae Coloniensibus.

Quum universorum +fidelium ab ipso Domino Iesu Christo pastoralis sit nobis cura commissa, sollicitudini nostrae dignoscitur expedire, ut sic debeamus quoslibet in suis rationibus confovere, quod aliquorum iura in conspectu ecclesiae dispendium non sustineant, sed firma et illibata debeant permanere. Intelleximus siquidem dilecto filio G. canonico S. Ioannis in Leodio referente, quod, quum ipse et L. clericus ducti quadam animi levitate de permutatione praebendarum suarum inter se tractare coepissent, quam utilitati utriusque imminere credebant, tamen idem L. clericus occasione dictae permutationis praebenda eiusdem G., quam in ecclesia S. Mariae Namurcensis habuerat, cuidam consanguineo suo assignata, praebendam suam ei, sicut promiserat, noluit resignare, +*et sic idem G., ut asserit, sua spe remansit omnino frustratus. Quumque super hoc in praesentia venerabilis fratris nostri Leodiensis episcopi fuisset diutius litigatum, tandem idem L. sedem apostolicam appellavit, et, quum dictus G. * [ad nostram praesentiam] non sine magno periculo et labore accessisset, idem L. nec venit, nec pro se curavit sufficientem mittere responsalem. Quum igitur deceptis, et non decipientibus iura subveniant, fraus etiam et dolus nemini debeant patrocinium impertiri, licet ipsi per se de iure non possent ecclesiastica beneficia permutare, ut tamen simplicitati venia tribuatur, discretioni vestrae per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus si constiterit, praetaxatum G. taliter fuisse deceptum, amoto a praebenda sua, quam diu dicitur possedisse, consanguineo ipsius L. vel quolibet alio illicito detentore, eam sublato appellationis obstaculo restitui faciatis eidem et eundem ipsius pacifica possessione gaudere [etc.].

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: A spiritual thing cannot be exchanged for a temporal thing.

Gregory IX, to the Abbots of Bél and Pannonhalma.

A petition exhibited to us by [our beloved sons] the abbot and convent of Saint Martin of Pannonia contained that, when concerning the cause disputed between them on one side and the Provost of Alba on the other concerning certain tithes [and a certain arbitral award issued concerning them,] [after diverse commissions to our beloved son E., subdeacon,] they obtained our letters to C., our chaplain then dwelling in Hungary, [finally] he and Master M., [Archdeacon of Sásvár,] to whom on each side, [with the other party procuring it,] the matter was submitted as to arbiters, [thus] arbitrated: if the said provost obtained from [our dearest son in Christ, the illustrious] King of Hungary that ten thousand royal solidi [which they hold at Pressburg] be granted [by him] to the aforesaid monastery, [in such a way that in the same place they should place its aforesaid abbot and convent in possession of the aforesaid salt revenues,] they would cease from seeking the same tithes. [But afterward, although the king himself granted those salt revenues to the said monastery by his letters, nevertheless the aforesaid provost and chapter, neither at the appointed term nor after it, though awaited through many other terms, gave them possession of those salt revenues; although the aforesaid abbot, after first protesting that he had not been inducted into possession by them, induced by the requests of certain persons and compelled by certain threats and terrors, received fifty marks of Friesach money for the revenue of the salt for one year. And when, after a further space of a year had been granted to them, they determined to wait uselessly as before, finally, after manifold complaints, he issued the voice of appeal to us, fixing for himself as a term the octaves of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul most recently past. Finally constituted in our presence, he humbly supplicated that, since the same provost and chapter had not obeyed the condition contained in the arbitral award, we command, notwithstanding it, that answer be made in full to that monastery concerning the aforesaid tithes.] Therefore, [by apostolic writings we command] your discretion that, if the foregoing is established to you, since an exchange of spiritual things for temporal things is disapproved, you, [by our authority without the loss of delay and with the impediment of appeal removed,] decree invalid the aforesaid arbitral award and whatever followed from it or on account of it, [and afterward concerning the tithes, etc. Given at Rieti, on the thirteenth day before the Kalends of November, in the fifth year. 1231.]

Title XX: On Fiefs

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: If a lord receives a fief from a vassal in pledge, abstaining from his service, he is not bound to compute the fruits toward the principal. This it says according to the common understanding, and it is a singular case not read elsewhere.

Innocent III, to the Bishop of Marsico.

By the intimation of the present letters, we declare to you that the pledge which you are known to have received from M. concerning a fief of your church, with the consent of his brother Wifred acceding, can be freely retained by you without the fruits being computed toward the principal, namely, in such a way that, for as long as you receive those fruits without their being computed toward the principal, that same M. is meanwhile immune from the service in which he is bound to you and your church for the fief itself. [Given at Rome at Saint Peter's, on the Kalends of March, in the ninth year of our pontificate. 1206.]

DE FEUDIS.

Si dominus a vasallo recipit feudum in pignus, abstinendo ab eius servitio, non tenetur computare fructus in sortem. H. d. secundum intellectum communem, et est casus singularis, qui alibi non legitur.

Innocentius III. Mariensi Episcopo.

Insinuatione tibi praesentium declaramus, quod gageria, quam de feudo ecclesiae tuae ab M. dignosceris recepisse, Wiffredi fratris eius accedente consensu, a te potest libere detineri, fructibus non computatis in sortem, ita videlicet, ut, quam diu fructus illos perceperis in sortem minime computandos, idem M. a servitio, in quo tibi et ecclesiae tuae pro feudo ipso tenetur, interim sit immunis. [*Dat. Rom. ap. S. Petr. Kal. Mart. Pont. nostr. Ao. IX. * 1206.]

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: It sets forth three cases in which, notwithstanding an oath not to enfeoff, a bishop can grant to a new vassal an ancient fief reverted to the church. This it says, and it is a notable case interpreting the oath concerning alienation.

Innocent III, to the Archbishop of Milan.

It was disclosed to our apostolate on your behalf that you have often doubted whether, when it happens that your vassal dies and his fief reverts to you, it is lawful for you to give his fief to another, although you are bound by oath not to enfeoff anew without consulting the Roman Pontiff. Furthermore, if it should happen that your vassal alienates a fief, whether you can invest his son or kinsman, a partner in that fief, with it. Another of your doubts also contained whether, when you find an alienated fief that you cannot easily recover by yourself, you can grant that fief to a layman who may both recover it and acknowledge it as a fief through the church. (And below:) Therefore, in the first case, freely grant the fief of the deceased if you see it to be expedient; in the second, invest the son or kinsman of the alienator; and in the third, you will lawfully be able to grant the alienated fief to him through whom the church itself can recover it. [Given at Ferentino, on the tenth day before the Kalends of November, in the eleventh year of our pontificate. 1208.]

> Ponit tres casus, in quibus, non obstante iuramento de non infeudando, potest episcopus antiquum feudum ad ecclesiam reversum novo vasallo concedere H. d. et est casus notabilis, interpretans iuramentum de alienando.

> Innocentius III. Mediolanensi Archiepiscopo.
>
> Ex parte tua nostro est apostolatui reseratum, quod saepius dubitasti, utrum, quum contingit vasallum tuum decedere, et ad te feudum ipsius redire, feudum eius alii liceat tibi dare, quamvis iuramento tenearis adstrictus non infeudare de novo Romano Pontifice inconsulto. Ad haec, si vasallum tuum feudum alienare contingat, an ipsius filium vel consanguineum eiusdem feudi consortem de ipso valeas investire. Alia quoque tua dubitatio continebat, ut, quum feudum alienatum repereris, quod per te facile recuperare non potes, utrum possis alicui laico in feudum illud concedere, qui et illud recuperet, et in feudum per ecclesiam recognoscat. (Et infra:) In primo ergo casu feudum decedentis libere, si videris expedire, concedas, atque in secundo filium vel consanguineum alienantis investiens, in tertio feudum alienatum poteris ei licenter concedere, per quem ipsa ecclesia valeat rehabere. Title XXI: On Pledges and Other Securities

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: Property of a church ought not to be pledged except from necessity and for a reasonable cause.

From the Council of Reims.

Let no priest presume to give a chalice, paten, altar cloth, priestly vestment, or ecclesiastical book as a pledge to an innkeeper, merchant, or any layman or woman, unless the most just necessity presses, [because so great is the sanctity of the sacred ministry, etc.]

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: A free man cannot be pledged.

Gregory III, to the Bishop of Exeter.

The bearer of the present letters, [Cosmas the Syrian, reported that he contracted a debt in the business he conducted, which, with many others and his tears attesting it, we believed to be true. And because he owed one hundred and fifty solidi, I wished his creditors to agree upon something with him,] because also the law holds that a free man is not to be detained for a debt, even if property that can be assigned for the debt is lacking. Therefore the creditors, etc.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: If a rector of a church obligated property of the church for his own act, his heir is compelled to redeem the property and restore it to the church.

Alexander III, to the Bishop of Exeter.

We received from the intimation of the bearer of the present letters that Alexander, formerly priest of the church of Offiton, pledged a [certain] silver chalice and half of one breviary of that church for his own necessity, and, overtaken by death, did not recover them. Hence, because it is unworthy that its property, and especially things assigned to sacred ministries, ought thus to perish from the same church, by apostolic writings we command your fraternity that, if what is asserted is true, you diligently admonish and compel his son Walter, who is said to obtain a right from succession to his patrimony, to recover those things and restore them to the aforesaid church. But if he is unwilling to do this, do not delay to restrain him with the bond of anathema.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: If a usurer buys a thing under an agreement that after a time he will restore it to the seller, receiving something beyond the principal, but with its fruits computed toward it, the contract is adjudged a loan at interest.

Innocent III, to G., Our Subdeacon, and P., Canon of Pisa.

We believe you to flourish with that gift of knowledge by which you clearly know what the law is concerning that about which you wished to consult us. Nevertheless, because you petitioned to be instructed by our response, lest decision of the business be prolonged under expectation of that response, we thought that we should answer you by the present letters. Indeed, you intimated to us by your letters that, when we thought that the cause disputed between H. and B., sons of G. de Cosa, on one side, and G., daughter of Tebert, and her heirs on the other, concerning certain lands pledged to the aforesaid persons for twenty-three pounds, should be committed to you, giving you a mandate by our letters that you take care, by the penalty promulgated against usurers in the Lateran Council, to compel G. herself and her heirs to restore to the complainants the vineyards and whatever they had received from them beyond the principal, you took care to cite the parties so that you might proceed in the aforesaid business according to our mandate. And when they were constituted in your presence, it was proposed before you on behalf of the aforesaid G. and her heirs that the lands that H. and B. sought from them were not obligated as a pledge but sold purely, as was contained more fully in the instrument drawn up therefrom. But the aforesaid H., on behalf of himself and his brother, firmly asserted that the lands were not sold purely but obligated as a pledge, since such a condition had been added to the aforesaid sale: if from the time of the contract until the next two years the purchase displeased the aforesaid T., G., father of H., ought from then until one year to give twenty-six pounds, with the fruits received computed in them, as he firmly asserted was contained in the same instrument. But because, as you indicated in the same letters, you doubt whether it is a pure and absolute sale or the aforesaid contract ought to be adjudged a pledge, you petitioned to be instructed by our letters. But we answer your consultation in this manner: whatever the intention of the contracting parties was, and although from the form of the contract the sale appears not conditional but pure, even if it can be dissolved by a condition, nevertheless from the two things that were expressed in the agreement—namely, that the fruits received ought to be counted in payment of the money, and that sixty solidi ought to be paid beyond the sum received—a strong presumption arises against the purchaser himself, especially since he has been accustomed to practice usury and commit the fraud of usury. [Given at Ferentino, on the fifth day before the Nones of July. 1203.]

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: A woman proceeds for her dowry against anyone detaining the husband's goods.

The same, to the Bishop of Aquino.

We received from the letters of your fraternity that, when we thought that the cause disputed between R. of [Saint] George and the woman A. [of Saint] Germano should be committed to you, when for almost two years you had endeavored that the cause be ended by agreement, but the parties did not acquiesce, after summoning prudent men and examining more diligently the merits of the aforesaid cause, you thought, by the counsel of prudent men, that the same business should be remitted to our presence, especially for this reason: that it appeared specially to pertain to royal judgment. Indeed, it was clearly proved that, after an offense was committed by the husband of the aforesaid woman and he sought flight, both the husband's brother, namely, the aforesaid R., and the woman herself, although less justly, were captured by R., then Count of Caserta and royal justiciar; and that at his mandate all the goods of the offender were sold, and money [was] paid to the merchant who had been wounded by the husband of the said woman and despoiled of his own goods. But the sale of those goods was made through the aforesaid R., although at the mandate of the aforesaid justiciar. Yet certain possessions of that man remained with the same R., the woman's brother-in-law, which that R. retained at the mandate of the court, after paying money for them to the aforesaid merchant, because, as he says, no other purchaser existed on account of the smallness of the possessions. But the woman's party firmly alleged that, since a dowry is preferred to all creditors, and all the husband's goods were obligated to that woman on account of her dowry, since the woman was not culpable in this, she ought not to lose her dowry; on this account she insistently sought that the valuation of the dowry be restored to her, or that by virtue of the delegation she be inducted into the possessions that had belonged to her husband, asserting that her husband's fault ought in no way by law to harm her. But the man's party answered to the contrary that he was not bound [to her] to answer in any way concerning these things, because nothing had been sold from the goods of the woman's husband by his will or authority, but the fisc had caused them to be seized and commanded them to be sold, which he also proved by the assertion of witnesses. Indeed, when the woman's party said that some possessions of her husband remained that had not been sold, and petitioned to be satisfied from them, you diligently inquired of each party how great the sum of money was that had been paid to the merchant, and from the confession of each it was established to you that immovables up to twenty-four ounces of gold had been alienated. But the aforesaid R. said that he had added eighteen [ounces] to those twenty-four ounces and completed for the merchant the number of forty-two ounces of gold. The aforesaid R. also alleged that, since there were five sons of one father and all succeeded to the paternal goods, when the whole inheritance had been valued, nothing came to the husband of that woman from the paternal inheritance worth beyond twenty-four ounces of gold.

But because the same cause remitted to us was not sufficiently instructed, nor was it established to us whether the woman had given as dowry the ten pounds of tarins that she sought, or whether R. himself possessed anything from the goods pertaining to his brother, the husband of the aforesaid woman; nor could we have insisted upon examination of the cause, both because, as you say, allegations and proofs had been renounced in your presence, and because suitable and sufficient respondents had not come to our presence: we thought that the same cause should be remitted to your examination. By apostolic [writings we command you] that, if it is established to you from the things proposed and proved in your presence that the woman gave to the man as dowry what she says and that the aforesaid R. possesses some of his brother's goods—since much favor is owed to women in recovering dowries, and it is also provided in law that a woman ought not to remain without dowry on account of the wrongdoing of her husband, since the husband's goods are also tacitly obligated to the woman for her dowry and have passed with their burden to any possessor—you condemn the aforesaid R., appeal being removed, to restitution of the dowry to that woman to the extent that he is known to possess goods of his aforesaid brother. [Given at Rome at Saint Peter's, on the second day before the Ides of February. 1205.]

> Ex literis fraternitatis tuae accepimus, quod, quum causam, quae vertitur inter R. de [sancto] Georgio et A. mulierem [de sancto] Germano, tibi duximus committendam, +quum fere per biennium studuisses, ut eadem causa concordia finiretur, partibus non acquiescentibus, adscitis viris prudentibus, praedictae causae meritis diligentius examinatis, idem negotium de prudentum consilio ad nostram duxisti praesentiam remittendum, ea maxime ratione, quia videtur hoc ad regium iudicium specialiter pertinere. Si quidem probatum est evidenter, quod pro facinore a marito praedictae mulieris commisso eo fugam petente, tam frater mariti, praefatus videlicet R., quam ipsa mulier, licet minus iuste, ab R. comite Casertano tunc regio iustitiario capti fuerint, et de ipsius mandato bonorum omnium delinquentis fuit facta distractio, et soluta [est] pecunia mercatori, qui a marito dictae mulieris vulneratus fuerat et rebus propriis spoliatus; per praedictum autem R. illorum bonorum venditio facta fuit, de mandato tamen iustitiarii ante dicti; sed quaedam possessiones illius penes eundem R. mulieris sororium remanserant, quas idem R. de mandato curiae retinuit, soluta pro eis pecunia praedicto mercatori, quia emptor alius, sicut dicit, propter possessionum minutias non exstabat. Pars vero mulieris firmiter allegabat, quod, quum dos omnibus creditoribus praeferatur, et omnia bona mariti eidem mulieri propter dotem fuerint obligata, quum mulier in hoc non fuisset culpabilis, dotem suam amittere non debebat; propter quod aestimationem dotis instantius petebat sibi restitui, vel in possessiones, quae mariti fuerant, ex officio delegationis induci, +*asserens culpam viri sui nequaquam ei de iure debere nocere. Pars autem viri e contrario respondebat, se non debere * [ipsi] *super his aliquo modo respondere, quia nihil voluntate vel auctoritate sua distractum fuerat de bonis mariti mulieris ipsius, sed fiscus ea capi fecerat et mandaverat distrahenda, quod et testium assertione probavit. Quia vero ad nos eadem causa remissa non fuit sufficienter instructa, nec nobis constitit, utrum X. libras Tarenorum, quas petebat mulier, dedisset in dotem, aut idem R. aliquid possideat de bonis, pertinentibus ad fratrem suum, virum mulieris praedictae, nec potuissemus examinationi causae insistere, tum quia in praesentia tua renunciatum fuerat allegationibus et probationibus, sicut dicis, tum quia idonei et sufficientes ad nostram praesentiam non venerant responsales: eandem causam tuo duximus examini remittendam; per apostolica * [tibi] scripta praecipiendo Mandamus, quatenus, si tibi constiterit ex his, quae in praesentia tua fuere proposita et probata, quod mulier dicit viro dedisse in dotem, et praedictum R. de bonis fratris aliqua possidere, quum mulieribus favor multus in recuperandis dotibus debeatur, et cautum etiam sit in iure, quod propter maleficium viri mulier remanere non debeat indotata, quum etiam bona viri mulieri sint pro dote tacite obligata, et cum suo onere transierint ad quemlibet possidentem; R. praedictum eidem mulieri ad restitutionem dotis eatenus appellatione remota condemnes, quatenus de bonis fratris sui praefati noscitur possidere. Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: If the creditor, or one who has a cause from him, has received so many fruits from the pledge that the principal has been satisfied, the pledge ought to be restored to the debtor.

The same, to R. of Montefortino.

When you moved a question in our presence against the noble man G., a citizen of Anagni, concerning certain possessions that formerly L. de Saul, your father, had obligated for a certain quantity of money and the heirs of that creditor had pledged to the aforesaid G., we appointed for you and him as auditor our beloved son P. de Saron., our subdeacon and chaplain. Therefore, constituted in our presence, you lawfully proved that the possessions themselves had been obligated by title of pledge, and that so much had been received from their proceeds, both by that G. and by others who held them from the time when they were obligated, that the fruits could be equated with the principal. We therefore, attending that in such matters receipt of the fruits accrues toward payment of the principal, since according to the canonical sanctions the fruits ought to be restored and computed toward the principal, and also considering that the possessions themselves had already wholly exhausted the entire burden and annulled the debt, by the counsel of our brothers decreed that they were to be restored to you, and caused you to be inducted into corporal possession through our messenger.

Si creditor vel is, qui ab eo causam habet, tot fructus percepit ex pignore, quod satisfactum est sorti, debet pignus restitui debitori.

Idem R. de Monte Fortino.

Quum contra nobilem virum G. a civem Anagninum super quibusdam possessionibus, quas quondam pater tuus L. de Saul pro certa quantitate pecuniae obligaverat, et ipsius creditoris heredes praedicto G. pignoraverant, movisses in nostra praesentia quaestionem, tibi et ei dilectum filium P. de Saron. subdiaconum et capellanum nostrum concessimus auditorem. Constitutus igitur in nostra praesentia legitime probavisti, quod possessiones ipsae pignoris titulo fuerunt obligatae, ac ex earum proventibus tantum fuerat tam ab eodem G. quam ab aliis, qui eas tenuerant, a tempore, quo fuerant obligatae, perceptum, quod fructus sorti poterant adaequari. Nos igitur attendentes, quod in talibus perceptio fructuum in solutione sortis accedat, quum secundum canonicas sanctiones fructus restitui, et in sortem debeant computari, considerantes etiam, quod possessiones ipsae iam extenuassent penitus totum onus et debitum annullassent, de consilio fratrum nostrorum ipsas tibi restituendas esse decrevimus, et te per nuncium nostrum in possessionem induci fecimus corporalem.

Latin source headnote: If one who pledged his property under an agreement of a forfeiture clause and swore not to contravene was justly impeded from redeeming it within the appointed day, he will be able to redeem it after the day.

The same.

It became known to us from the signification of our beloved son R., a citizen of Pisa, that, when he had pledged his house with a garden to G., a citizen of Pisa, for two hundred and fifty pounds, and had promised under oath that, unless he recovered the house itself within the term appointed between them, he would not thereafter trouble the same creditor concerning it, within the appointed time he remitted counted money to the creditor through a certain and faithful messenger, as it appeared to him. Acting unfaithfully, that messenger did not pay it as had been enjoined upon him, and afterward the same R., captured and detained by the emperor, could not satisfy the said G. as he ought. Now, restored by God's grace to his former liberty, he is prepared to return the money to the creditor, although the latter wholly refused [to receive it,] because it was not paid to him at the appointed term. Therefore, since an agreement of a forfeiture clause is disapproved in pledges, and the aforesaid R., insofar as it lay with him, fulfilled the debt of his oath, since through one whom he hoped to be a certain [and faithful] messenger he remitted the money at the appointed term, but, while detained in imperial captivity, could not satisfy the creditor, by authority of the present letters we command your discretion that, if it is thus, you compel by ecclesiastical censure, after previous admonition and with the obstacle of contradiction and appeal removed, the aforesaid creditor to be content with his principal, with the revenues of the aforesaid pledge computed toward it, and to resign that house and garden to the aforesaid R., every delay being set aside, notwithstanding such an agreement or oath. [Given at the Lateran. 1198.]

Latin source headnote: A cleric is compelled to preserve a surety harmless through assignment of his revenues.

Lucius III, to the Bishop of Ely and the Archdeacon of Norwich.

It came to us from the complaint transmitted to us by R., a cleric of Saint Albans, that, when at their insistence he became surety for C. and F., clerics of London—for one of them, namely Elias, in six, and for the other in seven additional marks of silver—to merchants of Bologna, and they did not pay the aforesaid money as one had promised under faith and the other under oath, he was compelled to satisfy the aforesaid creditors for them, as had been agreed between them, concerning it. Therefore, lest the aforesaid R. suffer loss whence he appears to have deserved reward, we commanded our venerable brother I., Bishop of Bologna, to inspect the instruments concerning those debts that are with the creditors and not delay to send you transcripts of them marked with his seal. Therefore, we command and order your discretion that, if from the confession of the aforesaid clerics or otherwise it is lawfully established to you that the matter stands thus, you admonish them to restore to the aforesaid R., delay and appeal ceasing, the money that he paid for them, and to preserve him harmless. Otherwise, supported by apostolic authority, cause the aforesaid debts to be paid in full, appeal being removed, from their revenues, and also the losses that the same R. sustained on this account to be repaired; or assign the aforesaid revenues to him to be retained without molestation until those losses have been repaired and the debts paid without diminution. But if it is established that the aforesaid clerics violated the sanctity of their faith and oath, suspend them *from office and benefice with the obstacle of appeal removed. Chapter III

Latin source headnote: A debtor is compelled by canonical censure to absolve from suretyship a surety who is troubled by creditors.

The same, to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Constituted in our presence, our beloved son Master S. showed us by his assertion that, at the requests of Master P. of Blois, your chancellor, at the time of the Lateran Council, he interceded for him in a certain sum of money. Because the debtor has not paid it until now, this man asserts that he has suffered many troubles from merchants of Bologna, and that the ancient debt has been greatly increased. Therefore, because by reason of our office we wish to provide that one who deserved favor not sustain punishment, by apostolic writings we command your fraternity that, if the truth of an assertion of this kind is lawfully established to you, you compel the aforesaid debtor by ecclesiastical censure, every favor and fear being set aside and notwithstanding anyone's appeal, wholly to absolve him from the aforesaid intercession without delay. But because diverse experiences of diseases compel us to find varied remedies, by authority of the present letters we also enjoin that, if perhaps he denies the debt or its accruals, notwithstanding a custom contrary to law, he be compelled to undergo the oath of calumny. Furthermore, because it would be difficult for the intercessor to bring his witnesses to England, after suitable security has been received from the chancellor himself by the judges of Bologna that he will go or send to hear the witnesses within a competent term, signify to them by your letters that in your stead they receive and examine them, and question them diligently; and, transmitting their depositions enclosed, signify how much credence can be given to the instruments or witnesses. Moreover, if the aforesaid P., having been cited, should contemn to approach your presence or stand in judgment, within thirty days after receipt of these letters render him deprived of his benefice and convert its revenues to payment of the debts until the creditors have been satisfied.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: If without license of the prelate and greater part of the chapter a religious person becomes surety or receives a loan, the church is not liable and the recipient himself is punished, unless the loan was turned to the utility of the church.

Innocent III, in the General Council.

What has been prohibited to certain religious by the Apostolic See we wish and command to be extended to all: namely, that no religious person, without license of the greater part of the chapter and of his abbot, become surety for anyone or receive from anyone a loan of money beyond the sum established by common providence. Otherwise, let the convent in no way be bound to answer for these things, unless perhaps it is manifestly established that it redounded to the utility of that house. And let one who has presumed to come against this statute be subjected to graver discipline.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: It sets forth three cases in which a surety proceeds against a debtor before he pays, so that he may be freed from the suretyship.

Gregory IX.

If the person for whom you obligated yourself as surety has long ceased from payment of the debt, has begun to dissipate his goods, or you have been condemned concerning it, you will by law be able to sue him so that he ought to free you from the suretyship.

Title XXIII: On Payments

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A successor in a benefice is bound to pay debts contracted by his predecessor for the necessity of the church.

Alexander III, to the Dean and Chapter of Thérouanne.

For this purpose we have been constituted, [although unworthy, by the Lord's ordering upon the watchtower of the Apostolic See: that we extend the acuity of our consideration to all churches and direct our full attention to their advantages and advancement. But it came to our hearing on behalf of your venerable brother the bishop that he is heavily burdened by a great load of debts for the necessities of your church. Hence, as a provident and honorable man, he earnestly requested us to make you solicitous for their repayment. But because it becomes you to be diligent and vigilant for the utility and increase of the church, we command your dignity that, if it should happen that the same bishop migrates from this light before payment of the debts that he contracted for the utility and necessity of the church committed to him, until another is substituted in his place you endeavor to pay those debts from the revenues pertaining to his table. When he has been substituted, you shall altogether induce the bishop to payment of those same debts; and] just as a son is bound to pay the debts of his father, so a prelate is bound to pay those of his predecessor contracted for the necessity of the church.

DE SOLUTIONIBUS.

Successor in beneficio tenetur solvere debita praedecessoris pro necessitate ecclesiae contracta.

Alexander III. Decano et Capitulo Morinensibus.

Ad hoc in apostolicae +[sedis specula sumus, licet immeriti, Domino disponente constituti, ut aciem nostrae considerationis ad universas ecclesias extendamus, et earum commodis et profectibus omnino intendamus. Pervenit autem ad audientiam nostram ex parte venerabilis fratris episcopi vestri, quod ipse pro ecclesiae vestrae necessitatibus magno sit onere debitorum praegravatus. Unde quasi vir providus et honestus nos obnixe rogavit, ut vos pro eis reddendis sollicitos redderemus. Quia vero decet vos pro utilitate ecclesiae et incremento diligentes et vigiles exsistere, dignitati vestrae mandamus, quod, si contigerit eundem episcopum ante solutionem debitorum, quae pro utilitate et necessitate ecclesiae sibi commissae contraxerit, ex hac luce migrare, de reditibus, qui spectant ad mensam eius, donec alius loco eius substituatur, eadem debita solvere studeatis. Quo substituto episcopum ad eorundem debitorum solutionem omnino adducetis, et] Sicut filius debita patris solvere tenetur, ita praelatus sui praedecessoris pro ecclesiae necessitate contracta.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: If a prelate obligates the church for the debts of others, he is suspended by the act itself from administration of spiritual and temporal things, and the church is not liable.

Gregory IX, to All Prelates of Churches.

If we wished justly to weigh the [presumption of certain prelates, to be abhorred by God and men, scarcely any delay should be employed, but the severity of swift vengeance should be exercised against the transgressors. For, as it has reached us by a strong and astounding clamor, certain persons, not content that, adhering to their own advantages and seeking what is their own rather than what is Christ's, they enormously dissipate and consume the churches committed to them, presume, by inventing a new kind of alienation and dissipation, to burden them with the debts of others: granting their seals or sealed letters for contracting loans to certain clerical and lay friends of theirs, on occasion of which they have obligated the aforesaid churches in so great a quantity of money that they are afterward compelled to its payment and can scarcely or never be freed from the burden of debts. Wishing therefore to provide for the indemnity of churches with paternal solicitude, by authority of the present letters] we firmly forbid anyone to presume [henceforth] to burden the church committed to him with the debts of others, or to grant letters or seals to anyone by which churches could be obligated, decreeing that, if the contrary, [which we do not believe,] should be attempted, the churches are not bound to payment of such debts. But if anyone should presume henceforth to come against the foregoing, let him know himself to be suspended from administration of spiritual and temporal things. [Given at Rieti, on the second day before the Ides of February, in the fifth year. 1232.]

Si praelatus obligat ecclesiam pro alienis debitis, est suspensus ipso facto ab administratione spiritualium et temporalium, et ecclesia non tenetur.

Gregorius IX. universis ecclesiarum Praelatis.

Si quorundam +[praelatorum praesumptionem deo et nominibus exhorrendam iuste pensare vellemus, pene non esset adhibenda dilatio, sed in transgressores celeris vindictae severitas exercenda. Sicut enim ad nos valido et stupendo clamore pervenit, quidam non contenti, quod, propriis commodis inhaerentes et quaerentes potius quae sua sunt, quam quae Christi, commissas sibi ecclesias enormiter dilapidant et consumant, dum novo alienationis et dilapidationis genere adinvento eas praesumant alienis debitis onerare: sigilla sua, seu literas sigillatas de contrahendo mutuo quibusdam amicis suis clericis et laicis concedendo, quarum occasione praedictae ecclesiae in tanta obligarunt pecuniae quantitate, ad cuius solutionem postea compelluntur, quod vix aut numquam liberari possunt ab onere debitorum. Volentes igitur Ecclesiarum indemnitatibus paterna sollicitudine providere praesentium auctoritate] Firmiter inhibemus, ne quis praesumat [de cetero] ecclesiam sibi commissam pro alienis gravare debitis, aut literas alicui seu sigilla concedere, quibus possent ecclesiae obligari, decernentes, si secus [quod non credimus,] fuerit attentatum, ad solutionem talium debitorum ecclesias non teneri. Si quis autem contra praemissa de cetero venire praesumpserit, ab administratione spiritualium et temporalium noverit se suspensum. [Dat. Reate II. Id. Febr. A. V. 1232.]

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: If a cleric does not have means to satisfy his creditors, he ought not to be excommunicated or otherwise troubled; nevertheless, he shall furnish security, at least by oath, to pay when he comes to a richer fortune.

The same, to the Dean and I., Canon of Toul.

The cleric Odoard proposed that, when the cleric P., the layman D., and certain others sued him before the official of the Archdeacon of Reims concerning certain debts, that official promulgated a sentence of excommunication against him when he acknowledged such debts but was unable to pay because of poverty of resources. (And below:) We command that, if it is established that the aforesaid Odoard cannot pay the aforesaid debts in whole or in part, you relax that sentence without any difficulty, after first receiving from him suitable security that, if he comes to a richer fortune, he will pay the aforesaid debts.

Si clericus non habeat unde satisfaciat suis creditoribus, non debet excommunicari nec aliter molestari; praestabit tamen cautionem saltem iuratoriam de solvendo, quum venerit ad pinguiorem fortunam.

Idem Decano et I. Canonico Tullentibus.

Odoardus clericus proposuit, quod, quum P. clericus, D. laicus et quidam alii ipsum coram officiali archidiaconi Remensis super quibusdam debitis convenissent, idem in eum recognoscentem huiusmodi debita, sed propter rerum inopiam solvere non valentem, excommunicationis sententiam promulgavit. (Et infra:) Mandamus, quatenus, si constitent, quod praedictus Odoardus in totum vel pro parte non possit solvere debita supra dicta, sententiam ipsam sine difficultate qualibet relaxetis, recepta prius ab eo idonea cautione, ut, si ad pinguiorem fortunam devenerit, debita praedicta persolvat.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: One complaining that he paid what was not owed ought to prove this, except in the case placed here.

The same.

One who complains that he paid money not owed is bound to prove that it was paid without being owed, unless his adversary, denying the payment, is convicted thereof. For then the burden lies upon the denier of proving that he received a debt.

Conquerens se indebite solvisse, hoc probare debet, nisi in casu hic posito.

Idem.

Is, qui conqueritur, indebitam pecuniam se solvisse, probare tenetur, quod indebite sit soluta, nisi eius adversarius solutionem inficians exinde convincatur. Tunc enim diffitenti onus incumbit probandi, quod debitum recepisset.

Title XXIV: On Donations

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: It can be understood in two ways, and according to the first understanding this it says: One who is liberal in giving considers himself to owe what he gives. Or thus, according to the other understanding: Those promising to give something are bound to fulfill it as a debt.

Gregory the Great, to the Patrician of the Gauls.

For prudent [men such as you to adhere to kings is the consolation of many. For while they understand that a more excellent place has been given to them for the utility of the soul, it is certain that, where they find a cause of reward, they do not set it aside. With how much affection and how great devotion your glory has expended itself in the causes of the poor through zeal for piety, we learned from the report of our dearest son Candidus the priest. But because] nobility in a certain manner imposes this law upon itself, that it considers itself to owe what it voluntarily bestows and, unless it has increased in its benefices, thinks that it has furnished nothing, [saluting your glory with paternal love, we confidently commend to you the aforesaid priest and the patrimony of our church, so that, fortified by the aid of your favor, he may sustain no troubles or burdens. If therefore care for good endeavor advances in you, so that with your assistance the utilities of the poor are nourished and we perceive what we presume concerning your charity, increase the safeguards of your favor, because] in the minds of nobles a good is seen as half-complete when it is left without addition.

DE DONATIONIBUS.

Potest intelligi duobus modis et secundum primum intellectum h. d.: Liberalis in donando existimat se debere quod donat. Vel sic secundam alium intellectum: Promittentes aliquid donare, illud tanquam debitum adimplere tenentur.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: A donation made by a prelate without consulting the chapter and to the harm of the church is not valid.

Alexander III, to the Bishop of Paris.

We believe it is not hidden from your fraternity that, since a bishop and every other ecclesiastical prelate is a proctor, not owner, of ecclesiastical property, he can improve the condition of the church but ought not to make it worse. But we have received that P. of good memory, your predecessor, at the insistence of certain persons made grave donations burdensome to the church from the property of the bishopric, to the detriment of the church, without consulting his Catholic canons. Hence, because donations of this kind are not valid by law, by apostolic authority we grant you that it be lawful for you lawfully to revoke donations of this kind from both clerics and laymen.

> Non valet donatio, quam facit praelatus inconsulto capitulo et in damnum ecclesiae.
>
> Alexander III. Parisiensi Episcopo.
>
> Fraternitatem tuam credimus non latere, quod, quum episcopus et quilibet praelatus alius ecclesiasticus ecclesiasticarum rerum sit procurator, non dominus, conditionem ecclesiae meliorare potest, facere vero deteriorem non debet. Accepimus autem, quod bonae memoriae P. praedecessor tuus graves donationes et onerosas ecclesiae in rebus episcopatus ad quorundam instantiam fecit in detrimentum ecclesiae, suis canonicis catholicis inconsultis. Unde quoniam donationes huiusmodi de iure non tenent, auctoritate apostolica indulgemus tibi, ut liceat tibi donationes huiusmodi tam a clericis quam a laicis legitime revocare.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: In considering whether a donation made by a prelate is valid, the quantity of the thing donated and the custom of the place ought to be attended. This it says by adhering to the letter.

The same, to the Bishop of Worcester.

Moreover, if it should happen that an abbot of your diocese makes a donation with the prior and certain members of his convent, or the abbot alone makes one, and afterward a part of the convent protests, the quantity of the thing given and the custom of that land—which nevertheless does not manifestly oppose the sacred canons—are to be attended more diligently, and according to this the gift is to be adjudged valid or invalid. But when to someone, etc. (cf. c. 4, On Conditions Apposed, IV. 5.)

> In considerando, an valeat donatio facta per praelatum, debet attendi quantitas rei donatae et loci consuetudo. H. d. inhaerendo literae.
>
> Idem Vigoriensi Episcopo.
>
> Ceterum, si abbatem tuae dioecesis donationem cum priore et quibusdam de conventu suo, vel solum abbatem facere contigerit, et postea conventus pars reclamaverit, datae rei quantitas, et illius terrae consuetudo, quae tamen sacris canonibus manifeste non obviet, est diligentius attendenda, et secundum hoc est donum ratum vel irritum iudicandum. Verum quum alicui etc. (cf. c. 4. de cond. appos. IV. 5.)

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: A church not vacant cannot be granted as a benefice, but it can be granted in ownership, yet by authority of the bishop and without prejudice to the prelate.

The same, to the Abbot of Saint Albert.

To consultations (And below:) Furthermore, if any cleric has been instituted in some church by the ordinary judge upon presentation of one who was believed to be patron of that church, and afterward another has evicted the right of patronage in judgment, the cleric who was instituted ought not on this account to be removed from the church itself if, at the time of his presentation, the one who presented him possessed the right of patronage of the church. But if he did not possess the right of patronage but was only believed to be patron when he was not and did not have possession of the patronage, according to English custom he will be able to be removed from that church. But donations or grants of churches, if any are made to private persons while those who possess the churches themselves are living, ought to be of no moment. If they are made to religious places by the bishop or by his authority, they ought to be held valid, in such a way indeed that the persons who possess the aforesaid churches ought not to be despoiled of them during their life without their assent.

> Ecclesia non vacans in beneficium concedi non potest, sed in proprietatem sic; de auctoritate tamen episcopi, et sine praeiudicio praelati.
>
> Idem Abbati S. Alberti.
>
> Consultationibus (Et infra:) De cetero si aliquis clericus ab ordinario iudice in ecclesia aliqua institutus fuerit ad repraesentationem illius qui eiusdem ecclesiae credebatur esse patronus et postea ius patronatus alius evicerit in iudicio, clericus qui institutus est non debet ab ecclesia ipsa propter hoc removeri, si tempore praesentationis suae ille qui eum praesentavit ius patronatus ecclesiae possidebat. Si vero non possidebat ius patronatus sed tantum credebatur esse patronus, quum non esset, nec possessionem patronatus haberet secundum consuetudinem anglicam poterit ab eadem ecclesia removeri. Donationes vero vel concessiones ecclesiarum, si quae fiant privatis personis, viventibus illis, qui ipsas ecclesias possident, nullius debent esse momenti. Si religiosis fiant locis ab episcopo vel eius auctoritate, ratae debent haberi, ita quidem, quod personae, quae iam dictas ecclesias possident, sine ipsorum assensu eis in vita sua non debeant spoliari.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: Notwithstanding an oath not to enfeoff anew, a prelate can complete a fief if it appears that the vassal was deceived in the measure.

Innocent III, to the Bishop of Florence.

By your letters you took care to propose to us that, when certain noble Florentines, powerful, ready for service, and devoted, during the time of schism kept J., Bishop of Florence of good memory, in their house against the attacks of the emperor and his supporters, that bishop, after the storm of schism was quieted, at the mandate of Pope Alexander of happy memory, our predecessor, granted them four modii of land in fief; and, after he afterward entered upon the way of all flesh, B. of good memory, his successor, invested the aforesaid nobles with the certain fief, as is customary. But when they caused the land assigned to them to be measured, they found only two modii, and insistently petitioned that the fief be completed. Concerning this you doubt, because they are not in possession of it, lest you appear to confer it anew, although they took care to exhibit fidelity to you and were invested with four modii; before you determined to assent to their petition, you thought that the Apostolic See should be consulted. We therefore, attending that the church ought not to employ any fraud in its acts, answer your fraternity in this manner: you will safely be able to complete the fief for those nobles, since that land was assigned to them under the name of four modii, and the aforesaid bishop promised that he would give four. [Given at Rome at Saint Peter's, on the second day before the Ides of December. 1205.]

Non obstante iuramento de non infeudando de novo praelatus integrare potest feudum, si appareat vasallum in mensura fuisse deceptum.

Innocentius III. Episcopo Florentino.

Per tuas nobis literas proponere procurasti, quod, quum quidam nobiles Florentini et potentes, prompti ad servitium et devoti, tempore schismatis bonae memoriae Iustum episcopum Florentinum in domo sua tenuerint contra imperatoris suorumque fautorum insultus, idem episcopus, sedata schismatis tempestate, de mandato felicis recordationis Alexandri Papae praedecessoris nostri quatuor modios terrae in feudum concessit eisdem, et, eo postmodum viam universae carnis ingresso, bonae memoriae B. successor ipsius, prout est moris, de certo feudo praefatos nobiles investivit. Verum quum ipsi assignatam sibi terram mensurari fecissent, non nisi duos modios invenerunt, feudum integrari cum instantia postulantes. Super quo dubitas eo, quod non sunt in possessione ipsius, ne de novo videaris illud conferre, +licet tibi fidelitatem curaverint exhibere, et de quatuor modiis fuerint investiti, antequam eorum petitioni duceres annuendum, sedem duxisti apostolicam consulendam. Nos igitur attendentes, quod ecclesia in actibus suis fraudem non debet aliquam adhibere, fraternitati tuae taliter respondemus, quod feudum ipsum secure poteris eisdem nobilibus integrare, quum terra illa nomine quatuor modiorum ipsis fuerit assignata, et iam dictus episcopus quatuor promiserit se daturum. [Dat. Rom. ap. S. Petr. II. Id. Dec. 1205.]

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: In donations the fullest interpretation is made, and on this account a burdensome clause apposed after many donations regards only the nearest donation. This it says, and it is a singular case.

The same, to R. de Burg. and G. Berbur., Abbots.

When our beloved sons the abbot and monks of Melrose proposed before us that the noble man Alan wished violently to reduce into forest certain lands assigned in alms to their church of Machelin by William, formerly his father, we recall that we commanded you to compel that A. by ecclesiastical censure, appeal being set aside, to desist from undue molestation of them concerning those lands. But, in order that you might fulfill the apostolic mandate concerning that cause, proceeding more diligently in the cause, when the parties were constituted in your presence, you received witnesses on either side and, after lengthy disputes and debates had been held in the cause itself concerning their attestations and also the instruments, you proceeded as far as the pronouncement of sentence, [and,] remitting the cause itself sufficiently instructed to our hearing, [you assigned to the parties as a term the octaves of Saint Andrew most recently past. Therefore, when the party of the abbot and monks came at that term, finally, because the opposing party, though awaited for a long time, did not come, we had diligent deliberation with our brothers concerning the aforesaid instruments, the depositions of witnesses, and the allegations of each party; and, after the truth had been more diligently inquired into and discussed, we clearly recognized that sentence concerning that cause was to be given for the aforesaid monastery.] But so that through your diligence an end may be imposed upon the same cause, we remit to you, enclosed under our bull, the tenor of the instruments, the depositions of the witnesses, and also the allegations, as we had received them, marked with the protection of your seals; by apostolic writings we command you—we command that, supported by our authority, you proceed, appeal being set aside, to issue sentence for that monastery, compelling contradictors by ecclesiastical censure and causing what you adjudge to be firmly observed by our authority, since from the tenor of the instrument it clearly appears that this was the mind and intention of the donor: that the clause concerning the forest placed at the end of the instrument ought, according to a sound understanding, to be referred not to the earlier donation, which was so free and pure as to be immune from secular vexation and custom, but to the later grant, which has a pension and delimitation inserted; because in contracts a full, in testaments a fuller, and in benefices the fullest interpretation is to be employed. [But if not all, etc. Given at Anagni, on the second day before the Nones of March. 1204.]

[Quod si non omnes etc. Dat. Anagniae II. Non. Mart. 1204.]

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: If a bishop receives certain proceeds in a church that he granted to a pious place with the consent of the chapter, he is seen to have donated those; otherwise, all proceeds apart from the cathedraticum fall to the pious place. And if the bishop granted it with the consent of the patron, the patron is understood to have donated the right of patronage.

The same, to the Bishop of Ely.

Of the pastoral office (And below: [cf. c. 28, On the Office of a Delegated Judge, I. 29.]) Your discretion further led you to consult us whether, if a bishop, with the patron consenting, grants some church to religious men using this simplicity of words, "We grant you that church," by that very fact that church is seen to have been granted to their uses, or only the right of patronage. But we thought that we should answer your inquiry in this manner: if the bishop confers the church upon them with the consent of the patron, assuredly the patron is seen to confer what is his, namely, the right of patronage; and the bishop confers that which he himself temporally obtains in it, so that, if he receives some portion of the fruits of that church, that portion is converted to their uses. But if the bishop ought to have no portion of its proceeds, we believe all the proceeds apart from the cathedraticum are to be converted to their uses; but, for the bishop's donation to be lawful, the consent of his chapter is to be sought. [To explain, etc. (cf. c. 28, On Tithes, III. 30.) Given at Rome at Saint Peter's, on the fourteenth day before the Kalends of January. 1204.]

> Si episcopus in ecclesia, quam de consensu capituli pio loco concessit, percipiat certos proventus, illos donasse videtur; alioquin omnes proventus praeter cathedraticum cedunt pio loco. Et si episcopus concessit de consensu patroni, intelligitur patronus donasse ius patronatus.

Nos autem inquisitioni tuae taliter duximus respondendum, quod, si episcopus ecclesiam illis conferat de consensu patroni, profecto patronus quod suum est conferre videtur, ius videlicet patronatus, et episcopus confert illud, quod ipse temporaliter obtinet in eadem, ut, si fructuum ecclesiae eiusdem aliquam recipiat portionem, in eorum usus illa portio convertatur. Quodsi ex ipsius proventibus nullam debeat episcopus portionem habere, omnes proventus praeter cathedraticum in eorum usus credimus convertendos; sed, ut episcopi donatio sit legitima, consensus est sui capituli requirendus. Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: Hospitallers can, to their own prejudice, subject and donate themselves and their house to another religious house. This it says according to the understanding of the gloss.

The same, to the Bishops of Florence and Fiesole.

When a question arose concerning the same hospital between our beloved sons, the Hospitallers of the Holy Sepulcher of Pisa of the Hospital of Jerusalem on the one side, and the brothers of the Hospital of Saint Allucius of the diocese of Lucca on the other, after those Hospitallers had received an adverse sentence in the possessory action that they attempted once and a second time, although for dissimilar causes, then, recurring to the petitory action, through their proctor before our beloved son Andrew, our subdeacon and chaplain, whom we appointed as auditor for him and the proctor of the other party, they took care to propose that, when G., formerly rector, and the brothers and patrons of that Hospital of Saint Allucius, having held a common deliberation, decided to subject the hospital itself to the aforesaid Hospitallers, they committed their functions in this to three proctors, establishing in common that they would accept what was done concerning this through them. These, afterward approaching the aforesaid Hospitallers, established with them that some persons should be sent to that hospital who would receive assignment of it in their name. And when they sent two of their brothers there for this purpose, they, in the chamber of the aforesaid rector, received the donation and assignment of the aforesaid hospital both from the aforesaid master and from the aforesaid proctors and other brothers of that house. (And below:) But the proctor of the other party answered in opposition that the aforesaid donation deserved to be retracted because it had been celebrated by the aforesaid rector and the fewer brothers, without consulting many of the brothers, who were moreover excommunicated and perjured, and concerning a thing in litigation and in fraud of the parish priest of Pescia, who had moved a question concerning that hospital. And he alleged that all these things were sufficiently proved by the depositions of the witnesses produced. But when the other party answered manifoldly to these things, it was disputed on either side for some time. Therefore, having understood these and the other things that the parties took care to propose before the aforesaid chaplain, and having diligently inspected their attestations, attending that the brothers and patrons of Saint Allucius alleged for themselves—or rather against themselves—their own turpitude, namely, perjury, excommunication, and fraud committed not indeed against them but by them; and understanding that the donation made by them to the aforesaid Hospitallers was pure and simple, because laws assist not deceivers but the deceived, whence through the things proposed above they could not lawfully defend themselves against their own act; and since certain of those things were not proved, by the counsel of our brothers we took care to adjudge the aforesaid Hospital of Saint Allucius, with its appurtenances, to the Hospitallers of the Holy Sepulcher, in such a way that through this sentence of our determination no prejudice is generated against the diocesan bishop and the parish priest of Pescia, since a thing transacted between some ought not to generate prejudice against others.

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: A donation of a fiftieth or hundredth part that a bishop makes with grave detriment to his church can lawfully be revoked; nor can he confer beyond a fiftieth or hundredth part without authority of the superior, even when injury to the church is absent.

The same, to the Bishop of Saint Andrews.

The oracle of the Apostolic See (And below:) [Moreover,] since it often happens that bishops successively confer upon religious places from revenues pertaining to them beyond a fiftieth portion, in such a way that sometimes revenues of this kind are diminished to a third or fourth part, and sometimes more or less, your fraternity consulted us whether it is in any way lawful for their successors to revoke the things that have thus been granted beyond the fiftieth portion. We therefore answer your inquiry in this manner: although it is determined in the canon that, if any bishop should perhaps wish to construct a monastery in his parish and endow it from the property of the church over which he presides, he ought to bestow there no more than a fiftieth part; but upon a church that he wishes to form under monastic rules or magnify for his own burials, no more than a hundredth part of the revenue of the church over which he presides; nevertheless, because it is consequently added in the same canon that this equity of moderation is to be observed —that he confer a suitable subsidy upon the one to whom he gives, and not inflict grave harms upon the one from whom he takes—with this caution observed, that he assume only one of these two rewards, whichever he pleases, this is always to be observed: one bishop or another ought not only not to confer more, but neither so much nor less, with grave detriment to his church, whether he wishes to do it together and once, or repeatedly by conferring successively upon the same or diverse churches. Hence, when it is established that grave detriment was conferred in any portion whatsoever, whether from possessions or proceeds pertaining to the episcopal table or cathedral church, it can lawfully be revoked unless an action of this kind is excluded by prescription or another lawful exception. For even if at first sight it is presumed that collation of a fiftieth or hundredth part does not inflict grave detriment, nevertheless, because not only if this is done often but even if it is done once, from various circumstances it can sometimes be apprehended to be very harmful—which indeed can be known more from demonstration of the fact than from expression of any statute—neither a fiftieth nor a hundredth part ought to be conferred, once or successively, with grave harm to the church. But if the bishop abounds to such an extent that without harm to his church he can assist the necessity of another church by even more than a fiftieth or hundredth part, although by himself he ought not to exceed the limit predefined by the canon, by which those wishing incautiously to give lavishly were restrained, nevertheless, by authority of the superior pontiff provision can be made for another's poverty in an even greater sum [from his abundance.] [Given at the Lateran, on the eighth day before the Ides of April, in the tenth year. 1207.]

> Donatio quinquagesimae vel centesimae, quam facit episcopus cum gravi ecclesiae suae detrimento, potest legitime revocari; nec etiam potest ultra quinquagesimam vel centesimam conferre, etiam cesssante laesione ecclesiae, sine auctoritate superioris.

Unde quum grave detrimentum, sive de possessionibus sive de proventibus, vel ad episcopalem mensam vel cathedralem ecclesiam pertinentibus, in quantalibet portione constiterit esse collatum, poterit legitime revocari, nisi praescriptione vel alia exceptione legitima actio huiusmodi excludatur. Nam, etsi prima facie praesumatur, quod collatio quinquagesimae vel centesimae partis grave non inferat detrimentum, quia tamen non solum si saepe, sed etiam, si semel id fiat, ex variis circumstantiis deprehendi potest interdum esse valde damnosum, quod quidem magis potest ex ostensione ipsius facti, quam expressione alicuius statuti cognosci : nec quinquagesima, nec centesima semel aut successive debet cum gravi ecclesiae damno conferri. Si vero in tantum abundet episcopus, ut sine damno ecclesiae suae possit amplius etiam quam per quinquagesimam vel centesimam partem necessitati alterius ecclesiae subvenire, quamvis per se non debeat summam excedere a canone praefinitam per quam incaute largiri volentibus est occursum : de superioris tamen auctoritate pontificis potest etiam in maiori summa [ex eius copia] inopiae alterius provideri. [*Dat. Lat. VIII. Id. Apr. Ao. X. * 1207.]

Chapter X

Latin source headnote: A donation can be revoked by the donor, but not by his heir who remained silent, on account of the ingratitude of the donee in the cases expressed here.

Gregory IX.

On account of the ingratitude of the person upon whom liberality was conferred, the person of the donor could by rigor of law revoke it if perhaps he laid impious hands upon him, presumed to inflict upon him atrocious injuries, grave damage to his property, or danger to his life; this nevertheless is not extended to the successors of the donor who remained silent concerning it.

Donatio potest per donatorem, non per heredem eius, qui tacuit, ob ingratitudinem donatarii revocari in casibus hic expressis.

Gregorius IX.

Propter eius ingratitudinem, in quem liberalitas est collata, donatoris persona de rigore iuris eam potuit revocare : si forte in ipsum impias manus iniecerit, aut sibi atroces iniurias, seu grave rerum suarum damnum vel vitae periculum inferre praesumpserit; quod tamen ad donatoris, qui hoc tacuit, non extenditur successores.

Title XXV: On the Peculium of Clerics

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: What was acquired by a rector of a church who had nothing at the time of his promotion is presumed to have been acquired from the goods of the church.

From the Council of Arles.

It must be investigated, if a priest who possessed no patrimony, when he was promoted to an ecclesiastical order, afterward purchased estates, to whose right they belong, since according to canonical authority they ought to belong to the church to which he was promoted while possessing nothing.

> DE PECULIO CLERICORUM.
> Quaesitum a rectore ecclesiae, tempore promotionis nihil habente, praesumitur de bonis ecclesiae quaesitum.

> Ex concilio Arelatensi.
>
> Investigandum est, si nihil patrimonii habens presbyter, quando promotus est ad ecclesiasticum ordinem, postea emerit praedia, cuius iuris sint, quoniam ecclesiae, ad quam nihil habens promotus est, esse debent iuxta canonicam auctoritatem.

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: Concerning things purchased by a prelate from the goods of the church, an instrument ought to be drawn up in the name of the church; otherwise the prelate ought to be removed from the administration.

From the same.

When a priest holds a diocese, concerning those things that he shall have acquired in addition he shall make a written instrument in the name of that church, or he shall withdraw from the governance of the church which he held.

> De emptis per praelatum de bonis ecclesiae debet instrumentum confici nomine ecclesiae; alias debet praelatus ab administratione removeri.
>
> Ex eodem.
>
> Presbyter, quum dioecesim tenet, de eis, quae superemerit, ad ipsius ecclesiae nomen scripturam faciat, aut ab eius, quam tenuit, ecclesiae ordinatione discedat.

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: Things acquired by a bishop after his consecration are to be left to the church.

From an epistle of Pope Pius.

That every priest leave to his own church the things that he shall have acquired after the days of consecration.

> Quaesita per episcopum post consecrationem suam ecclesiae relinquenda sunt.
>
> Ex epistola Pii Papae.
>
> Ut unusquisque presbyter res, quas post dies consecrationis acquisierit, propriae ecclesiae relinquat.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: Things purchased by a prelate from the emoluments of the church become the church's, although the prelate purchased them in another's name.

From the Council of Rheims.

It must be inquired whether any of the priests purchased property in another's name from the revenues of the church, or from offerings, or from the vows of the faithful, and erected structures there, or placed there things that pertain to the church; [and permitted the frequenting of women to occur there, or, what is more shameful, kept there such women as exercise his benefice and conduct the care of the house, and resorted to, frequented, or remained at their places unbecomingly, since action is taken contrary to the decrees by those by whom it is perpetrated, because just as the same priest, coming frequently, remained. This evil is done contrary to the decrees of the canons,] because, just as neither in his own name, so neither in another's name ought a priest [or anyone under a rule] to practice usury, much less to commit fraud concerning ecclesiastical resources; for this is sacrilege, and equal to the crime [of Ananias and Sapphira and] of Judas the thief, who carried away and stole the sacred offerings [that were being sent for the uses of the faithful and of the poor.]

> Empta per praelatum ex emolumentis ecclesiae efficiuntur ecclesiae, licet praelatus emerit nomine alieno.
>
> Ex concilio Remensi.
>
> Inquirendum est, si quis presbyterorum de reditibus ecclesiae, vel oblationibus, vel votis fidelium alieno nomine res comparavit *et ibi structuras fecerit, vel quae ad ecclesiam pertinent ibidem collocaverit; * [et mulierum frequentationem inibi fieri permiserit, vel quod turpius est, tales mulieres ibidem habuerit, quae beneficium suum exerceant et curam domus agant et ad eorum loca incongrue recurrerit, frequentaverit vel manserit, quoniam contra decreta agitur, a quibus perpetratur, quia sicut eodem presbyter frequenter veniens manserit. Contra decreta canonum hoc malum agitur,] quia, sicut nec suo, ita nec alieno nomine presbyter [vel quilibet sub regula] foenus exercere, multo minus fraudem facere de facultatibus ecclesiasticis debet : quoniam hoc sacrilegium est, et par crimini [Ananiae et Sapphirae et] Iudae furis, qui sacras oblationes [quae ad usus fidelium ac pauperum mittebantur] asportabat et furabatur.

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: Improvements made by a prelate to the property of the church are his during his life, even if he relinquishes the benefice; but he cannot make a testament concerning them. This it says according to a sufficiently notable understanding.

From the Council of Toledo.

If any of the clerics is indeed proved to have made small fields or vineyards for himself on the land of the church for the sake of sustaining his life, he may possess them until the day of his death; but after his departure from this light, according to the constitutions of the earlier canons, he shall restore its right to the holy church, nor shall he leave it by testamentary or successory right to any of his heirs or successors, unless perhaps to one upon whom the bishop shall wish to bestow it for services and prestation to the church.

> Meliorationes, factae per praelatum in rebus ecclesiae, sunt suae in vita, etiamsi dimittat beneficium; sed de his testari non potest. H. d. secundum intellectum satis notabilem.
>
> Ex concilio Toletano.
>
> Si quis sane clericorum agella vel vincolas in terra ecclesiae sibi fecisse probabitur sustentandae vitae causa, usque ad diem obitus sui possideat; verum post suum de hac luce decessum iuxta priorum canonum constitutiones ius suum ecclesiae sanctae restituat, nec testamentario aut successorio iure cuiquam heredum proheredumve relinquat, nisi forsan cui episcopus pro servitiis ac praestatione ecclesiae largiri voluerit.

Title XXVI: On Testaments and Last Wills

Chapter I

Latin source headnote: A bishop can make a testament concerning patrimonial property; but concerning the property of the church or property acquired by reason of the church, he cannot make a testament.

Gregory IX, to Antony the Subdeacon.

It has come to us by the report of certain persons that I., bishop of the city of Atella, when he was departing from this light, by a testament made, instituted his own daughter-in-law heir to eight ounces of his whole substance, and his church to the remaining four. We therefore exhort your experience that you diligently investigate this, and in no way permit whatever he is shown to have possessed to be detained by any person, except only that which it is established he had as his own before the order of the episcopate. But whatever you shall know either to have belonged to the church before his consecration or to have been acquired by the aforesaid bishop while in the episcopal order is to be preserved in the ownership of the same church, [lest anyone presume on any occasion to usurp anything therefrom.]

DE TESTAMENTIS ET ULTIMIS VOLUNTATIBUS.

Episcopus de rebus patrimonialibus testari potest; de rebus vero ecclesiae seu intuitu ecclesiae quaesitis testari non valet.

Gregorius IX. Antonio Subdiacono.

Quorundam ad nos relatione pervenit, quod I. Attellanae civitatis episcopus, dum de hac luce migraret, condito testamento in octo unciis totius substantiae suae nurum suam heredem instituit, et ecclesiam suam in residuis quatuor. Hortamur ergo experientiam tuam, ut sollicite hoc discutias, et, quicquid ipsum habuisse patuerit, a qualibet persona detineri nullatenus patiaris, nisi hoc solum, quod eum ante episcopatus ordinem proprium habuisse constiterit. Quicquid vero ecclesiae vel ante ipsius consecrationem fuisse cognoveris, vel in episcopatus ordine praedictum episcopum acquisivisse, in eiusdem ecclesiae dominio conservetur. [ne quisquam exinde aliquid usurpare qualibet occasione praesumat.]

Chapter II

Latin source headnote: An abbess cannot make a testament even if she never put on the monastic habit.

The same.

Because for those entering [a monastery for the sake of conversion there is thereafter no license to make a testament, but their property becomes that of the same monastery, it has been decreed by the clear definition of the law.] The abbess Gabina complained that S., formerly abbess of her monastery, after she undertook the office of governing, made a testament and left legacies to certain persons, saying that up to the day of her death she had not put on the monastic habit, but had remained in the garments that the priests of that place use, just as she who had been abbess before her had also done, and that this had been permitted almost by custom. (And below:) It therefore seemed necessary to discuss with both our counselors and other learned men of this city what was [to be done] according to law; and, discussing it, they answered that, after she was ordained abbess [in solemn manner] by the bishop and presided in the monastery for many years until her death, the character of her garment perhaps pertained to the fault of the bishop who permitted her to be so, yet could not have inflicted prejudice upon the monastery, but that her property belonged by law to the same place from the time when she entered there and was constituted abbess. And therefore [because concerning the property illicitly left, etc.]

> Abbatissa testari non potest etiamsi nunquam induisset habitum monachalem.
>
> Idem.
>
> Quia ingredientibus +[monasterium convertendi gratia ulterius nulla sit testandi licentia, sed res eorum eiusdem monasterii fiant, aperta legis definitione decretum est.] Gabina abbatissa conquesta est, S. quondam abbatissam monasterii sui, postquam regendi suscepit officium, condito testamento legata quibusdam reliquisse, dicens, eam usque in diem obitus sui non induisse habitum monachalem, sed in vestibus, quibus utuntur loci illius presbyteri, permansisse, sicut et illa, quae ante ipsam fuerat abbatissa, et hoc paene ex consuetudine licuisse. (Et infra:) Necessarium ergo visum est, tam cum consiliariis nostris, quam cum aliis huius civitatis doctis viris, quid esset [agendum] de lege tractare; qui tractantes responderunt, postquam [solenni more] abbatissa ab episcopo ordinata est et in monasterio per annos plurimos usque ad obitum praefuit, vestis qualitatem ad culpam forte episcopi pertinere, qui eam sic esse permisit, non tamen potuisse praeiudicium monasterio irrogare, sed res ipsius eidem loco, ex quo illic ingressa, et abbatissa constituta est, de iure competere. Et ideo [quia ex dimissis illicite rebus etc.]

Chapter III

Latin source headnote: If, within a year from the day of admonition, a testament is not executed by the person who ought to execute it, its execution devolves upon the bishop.

The same.

We indeed [judge that your order itself sufficiently compels you toward the imminent fulfillment of pious matters. But lest the intervention of anyone's remission soften your zeal, we have judged that you should also be specially exhorted concerning these things.] It has [indeed] come to us that S., when departing from this light, by a written declaration of his last will commanded a monastery to be founded, whose desire is being delayed by T., a religious woman and his heir. Wherefore we exhort you to admonish her that within a year she ought to establish the monastery that was commanded and to construct all things according to the will of the deceased without dispute. But if within the aforesaid time [she should delay through negligence or cunning to complete anything, so that] whether in the [same] place in which it had been established, or certainly, if it cannot be there and it is pleasing that it be established elsewhere, she should neglect to fulfill it with you, then let it be built by you, and let all things be assigned by you to that venerable place without any diminution. For thus you will both escape before your dreadful Judge a sentence of remission, and, according to the most pious laws, it is fitting that the delayed pious wills of the dead be fulfilled by episcopal zeal.

> Si infra annum a die monitionis non fit exsecutio testamenti per debentem exsequi, devolvitur exsecutio ad episcopum.
>
> Idem.

Nos quidem +[arbitramur, quod ad imminentiam expletionis piarum rerum ipse te tuus satis ordo compellat. Sed ne zelum tuum cuiuslibet interventus remissionis emolliat, de his etiam te specialiter iudicavimus exhortandum.] Pervenit [siquidem] ad nos, S. de hac luce migrantem supremae voluntatis elogio monasterium praecepisse fundari, cuius desiderium a T. religiosa femina eius herede protrahitur. Quamobrem te hortamur, ut eam commoneas, quatenus infra annum monasterium, quod iussum est, debeat ordinare, et cuncta secundum voluntatem defuncti sine altercatione construere. Quod si infra praedictum tempus [aliqua perficere negligentia vel calliditate distulerit, ut] sive in loco [eo] quo constitutum fuerat, seu certe, si ibi non potest, et alibi placet ordinari, tecum implere neglexerit, tunc per te aedificetur, et omnia per te loco ipsi venerabili sine diminutione qualibet assignentur. Sic enim et ante tremendum iudicem tuum sententiam remissionis effugies, et secundum piisimas leges dilatas defunctorum pias voluntates episcopali decens est studio adimpleri.

Chapter IV

Latin source headnote: A legacy is owed although it was left by the testator in bare words. The same, to Peter the Subdeacon.

The same, to Peter the Subdeacon.

Upon the indication—(And below:) We learned, moreover, from the report of R. that, when the wife of Redemptus was dying, she ordered one silver basin to be sold in bare words and the proceeds to be given to her freedmen, and that she left a silver dish to a certain monastery; in both of these matters we will that her will be fulfilled in all respects, [lest from the smallest matters we incur greater sins.]

Debetur legatum, quamvis nudis verbis a testatore sit relictum Idem Petro Subdiacono.

Idem Petro Subdiacono.

Indicante (Et infra:) Cognovimus autem R. referente, quod moriens uxor Redempti unam concham argenteam nudis verbis iussit venundari, et suis dari libertis, et scutellam argenteam cuidam monasterio reliquisse; in quibus utrisque voluntatem eius per omnia volumus adimpleri, [ne ex rebus minimis peccata maiora capiamus.]

Chapter V

Latin source headnote: A legacy is not owed when the testator bequeathed a thing that was not his own but the church's. This it says by adhering simply to the letter.

The same, to Bishop T.

Our son F., [a most eloquent man coming to us,] complained to us that the late P., his father, left to your church, for the sake of his burial, certain things subject to another's right. And indeed the laws of the age hold that an heir is compelled to make payment if his author bequeathed a thing belonging to another. But because we live by the law of God and not by the law of this age, it seems to me greatly unjust that the things bequeathed to you, which are said to belong to a certain church, should be retained by you, who ought to have restored things belonging to another.

Non debetur legatum, quum testator rem non suam, sed ecclesiae legavit. H. d. simpliciter inhaerendo literae.

Idem T. Episcopo.

Filius noster F. [vir eloquentissimus ad nos veniens] conquestus est nobis, quod quondam P. pater suus aliqua ecclesiae vestrae, sepulturae suae gratia, iuris alieni reliquit. Et quidem leges saeculi hoc habent, ut heres ad solvendum cogatur, si auctor eius rem legaverit alienam. Sed quia lege Dei, non autem lege huius saeculi vivimus, valde mihi videtur iniustum, ut res tibi legatae, quae cuiusdam ecclesiae esse perhibentur, a te teneantur, qui aliena restituere debuisti.

Chapter VI

Latin source headnote: An heir who does not fulfill the commands of the testator is interdicted by the bishop from the property left by the testator. This it says by adhering to the letter.

From the Council of Mainz.

If the heirs do not fulfill the commands of the testator, all the property that was left to them, together with its fruits and other emoluments, is to be canonically interdicted by the bishop of that place, so that the wishes of the deceased may be fulfilled.

Heredi, non adimplenti iussa testatoris, ab episcopo interdicitur res a testatore relicta. H. d. inhaerendo literae.

Ex concilio Maguntino.

Si heredes iussa testatoris non adimpleverint, ab episcopo loci illius omnis res, quae eis relicta est, canonice interdicatur cum fructibus et ceteris emolumentis, ut vota defuncti adimpleantur.

Chapter VII

Latin source headnote: Clerics cannot make a testament concerning goods acquired through the church.

From the Lateran Council.

Since in duties of charity we are bound in the first place to those from whom we know that we have received a benefit, certain clerics, on the contrary, when they have received many benefices from their churches, presume to transfer to others goods acquired through them. Therefore, because it is established that this was also prohibited by the ancient canons, we nevertheless also prohibit it, [and,] wishing to provide for the indemnity of churches, whether they have died intestate or wished to confer them upon others, we command those goods to remain with the churches. Moreover, etc. (cf. c. 1, That Prelates Not Delegate Their Powers, V. 4.)

De bonis per ecclesiam acquisitis clerici testari non possunt.

Ex concilio Lateranensi.

Quum in officiis caritatis primo loco illis teneamur obnoxii, a quibus beneficium nos cognoscimus recipisse, econtra quidam clerici, quum ab ecclesiis suis multa beneficia perceperint, bona per eas acquisita in alios transferre praesumunt. Hoc igitur, quia et antiquis canonibus constat inhibitum, nos etiam nihilominus prohibemus [et] indemnitati ecclesiarum providere volentes, sive intestati decesserint, sive aliis conferre voluerint, penes ecclesias eadem bona praecipimus remanere. Praeterea etc. (cf. c. 1. Ne prael. vices suas V. 4.)

Chapter VIII

Latin source headnote: Clerics can make moderate alms from goods acquired through the church, even when placed in sickness.

Alexander III.

In addition, let it be known to you by the present letter that clerics cannot by law make a testament concerning movables that they have acquired through the church; nevertheless, while living and in possession of themselves, they can moderately dispense some things from those goods, not by reason of a testament but with a view to alms, even when placed in sickness.

> Moderatam eleemosynam de bonis per ecclesiam acquisitis clerici facere possunt, etiam in aegritudine constituti.
>
> Alexander III.
>
> Ad haec praesentibus literis tibi innotescat, quod clerici de mobilibus, quae per ecclesiam sunt adepti, de iure testari non possunt; viventes tamen et sui compotes moderate valent aliqua de bonis ipsis non ratione testamenti, sed eleemosynae intuitu erogare in aegritudine etiam constituti.

Chapter IX

Latin source headnote: Clerics can make a testament concerning their own goods or those acquired by reason of their person, but not concerning those acquired by reason of the church.

The same, to the Bishop of Vigevano.

Because your prudence led you to consult us as to whether secular clerics can make a testament concerning movable or immovable property, we answer your consultation in this manner: although clerics may freely dispose of those things that they obtained by paternal succession, by reason of kinship, or from a craft, or that came to them by a gift of their relatives or friends without respect being had to the church, nevertheless by law they can make no testament concerning those things that they received in consideration of the church.

Chapter X

Latin source headnote: A testament that a parishioner makes before the parish priest and two witnesses is valid, and a contrary custom is not valid. This it says by adhering to the words of the letter.

The same, to the Bishop of Ostia.

When you, brother bishop, were constituted in our presence, you proposed to us in a diligent account that such a custom obtains in your bishopric: testaments that are made as a last will by those who have power over others are utterly rescinded unless they are made with the subscription of seven or five witnesses, according to what human laws decree. But because this is known to be alien to divine law, the institutes of the holy Fathers, and the general custom of the church, since it is written, "In the mouth of two or three witnesses let every word stand," we utterly disapprove the aforesaid custom; and we decree that testaments that your parishioners shall henceforth make as a last will before their priest and three or two other suitable persons are to remain firm and possess the strength of perpetual firmness, prohibiting under threat of anathema that anyone dare, by any presumption, to rescind testaments of this kind. [Moreover, since princes, etc.]

Quia vero a divina lege et sanctorum Patrum institutis, et a generali ecclesiae consuetudine id noscitur esse alienum; quum scriptum sit : " In ore duorum vel trium testium stet omne verbum, " praescriptam consuetudinem penitus improbamus, et testamenta, quae parochiani vestri coram presbytero suo et tribus vel duabus aliis personis idoneis in extrema de cetero fecerint voluntate, firma decernimus permanere et robur obtinere perpetuae firmitatis, sub interminatione anathematis prohibentes, ne quis praesumptione qualibet huiusmodi rescindere audeat testamenta. Chapter XI

Latin source headnote: A last will for pious causes made before two witnesses is valid, and it is a singular case.

The same, to the Judges of Velletri.

It has been reported to our ears that, when some cause concerning testaments left to a church is brought to your examination, you wish to proceed in it according to human and not divine law and, unless seven or five suitable witnesses have intervened, you wholly postpone judging thereupon. Wherefore, because causes of this kind concerning the judgments of the church ought to be treated not according to the laws but according to the canons, and for these, as divine scripture attests, two or three suitable witnesses suffice, by apostolic writings we command your discretion that, when any such cause has been brought to your examination, you treat it not according to the laws but according to the statutes of the decrees, and, after requiring three or two lawful witnesses, [be content,] since it is written: "In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word stands." Chapter XII

Latin source headnote: A cleric can make a testament concerning his own goods; as to goods acquired through the church, even if they are movable, the church or the successor succeeds; nevertheless, he can bestow some things upon servants or the poor. But if the deceased has several churches or benefices, an equal division will be made among them.

The same, to the Bishop-elect and Chapter of Cassano.

It has been reported to our ears that, because we established in the Lateran Council that goods acquired through the church devolve upon it at the death of clerics, you doubt whether this is to be understood only of immovables or also of movables. You also seek to be taught by our answer whether the aforesaid goods pass by law to the use of the bishop or of him who succeeds the dying cleric, or ought to be applied to the common utility of the church. To these things, therefore, briefly we answer that in general any goods acquired through a church ought, according to the Lateran Council, to remain with it after the death of the acquirer. By the name of the church, however, not only the bishop or the successor of the dying cleric, where there is a college of clerics, but the common congregation is understood, which ought to have the canonical distribution and care of those things. But where only one person is to be ordained in place of the deceased, let him dispense those goods, just as the other goods of that church, in the fear of God. Although movables acquired through the church, as we have determined, cannot by law be transferred to others at the choice of the dying person, nevertheless it is a custom not to be disapproved that some things from them be conferred upon the poor, religious places, and those who had served the living person, whether they are relatives or others, according to the merit of their service. But the things that come from inheritance, a craft, or learning are to be distributed according to the choice of the person dying. Since, however, some persons possess benefices in different churches, we distinguish thus: the things they had are to be divided among them according to a fitting valuation.

> De propriis potest testari clericus; in acquisitis per ecclesiam etiamsi sint mobilia, succedit ecclesia vel successor; potest tamen aliqua servitoribus vel pauperibus elargiri. Si autem defunctus habet plures ecclesias vel beneficia, fiet aeque divisio inter illa.

His itaque breviter* Respondemus, quod generaliter bona quaelibet per ecclesiam acquisita eis debent iuxta Lateranense concilium post acquirentis obitum remanere. Nomine autem ecclesiae non solum episcopus vel successor clerici morientis, ubi est collegium clericorum, sed communis congregatio intelligitur, quae rerum illarum debet canonicam distributionem et curam habere. Ubi autem in loco defuncti tantum unus est ordinandus, is ea bona, sicut et alia ipsius ecclesiae, in Dei timore dispenset. Licet autem mobilia per ecclesiam acquisita, ut duximus, de iure in alios pro morientis arbitrio transferri non possint consuetudinis tamen est non improbandae, ut de his pauperibus, et religiosis locis, et illis, qui viventi servierant sive consanguinei sint sive alii, aliqua iuxta servitii meritum conferantur. Ceterum, quae ex hereditate, vel artificio aut doctrina proveniunt, distribuantur pro arbitrio decedentis. Quia vero nonnulli in diversis ecclesiis beneficia possident, ita distinguimus, ut dividantur quae habuerant per aestimationem congruam inter ipsos.

Chapter XIII

Latin source headnote: A testament is valid if someone commits his last will to the disposition of another, and he is said to have made a testament for pious causes. This it says according to the more notable understanding.

Innocent III, to the Bishop of Auxerre.

When to you concerning kindness—(And below: [cf. c. 18, On the Meaning of Words, V. 40.]) But on the second question we say that one who commits his last will to the disposition of another is not seen to die intestate. [Given at the Lateran. 1202.]

Chapter XIV

Latin source headnote: The bishop seeks his portion from things left to the church, although something was left to him by the testator, unless it was left by the testator in such a way, and not in fraud, that he should remain content with that portion, and he acknowledged the legacy.

The same, to C., Cardinal Priest of the title of Saint Lawrence in Lucina.

Of the office—(And below: [cf. c. 38, On Election, I. 6.]) Secondly, you asked: when someone in a testament leaves his own portion to the bishop and leaves many other things to monasteries or churches and others, whether the bishop can seek his lawful portion from those things; adding whether, when someone by testament, in fraud, has established a small mortuary and has left many other things for his soul, the bishop can nevertheless exact from the other things the portion established by the canon. But concerning these matters, we answer your consultation in this manner: if he bequeathed that portion to the bishop with the condition that he be content with it alone, and the bishop accepted it, because through this he is seen to have renounced the other things, he will not be able to exact a portion from the rest. But if he left it to him absolutely, he will nevertheless be able to vindicate from the rest the portion owed to him. If, however, it is established that he established a small mortuary in fraud so that in the rest the bishop would be defrauded of the portion owed, because fraud and deceit ought to afford patronage to no one, the bishop will be able to exact from those things the portion established by the canon, saving the indulgences of the Roman Pontiff that have been granted to certain regulars. [You asked, etc.; cf. the following chapter.] mortuarium, et alia dimiserit pro anima sua plura, nihilominus possit episcopus exigere portionem de aliis a canone constitutam. Nos autem super his Consultationi tuae taliter respondemus, quod, si portionem illam cum conditione legavit episcopo, ut esset ea sola contentus, et eam episcopus acceptavit, quia per hoc aliis renunciasse videtur, de ceteris non poterit exigere portionem. Quodsi eam ipsi absolute reliquit, portionem sibi debitam poterit nihilominus de ceteris vindicare. Si vero constiterit, quod in fraudem modicum constituit mortuarium, ut in ceteris episcopus portione debita fraudaretur, quia fraus et dolus alicui patrocinari non debent, episcopus portionem ex illis poterit exigere a canone constitutam, salvis indulgentiis Romani Pontificis, quae quibusdam regularibus sunt concessae. Chapter XV

Latin source headnote: A thing left to a bishop in consideration of his person is not divided with the cathedral church; otherwise, if it is left in consideration of the church, whether nothing is left to the church or something is, whether jointly or separately. But if a bequest is made to the church alone, the bishop will have the canonical portion. A bequest is presumed to have been made in consideration of the church when it is made to an outsider having an administration; otherwise, if it is made to one not having an administration. But with inferior churches the bishop does not divide what is left to him, because he does not have as great a communion with inferior churches as with the cathedral.

The same.

You asked how those things that a testator bequeaths for his soul in his last will are to be divided between the bishop and the church. And indeed it is regularly true that the bishop ought to have from them a third or fourth portion according to diverse customs; but it must be diligently considered whether the testator bequeaths in this manner: "I leave," he says, "this to the bishop"; or, "I leave this to the church"; or, "I leave this to the bishop and the church"; or, "I leave this to the bishop, and I leave that to the church." In the first case a distinction must be made as to whether that is left to the bishop by an outsider or by a relative. If by an outsider, it is generally true that it is presumed to have been left in consideration of the church, not of the person. Hence the cathedral church can seek a canonical portion from it, just as his own portion belongs to the bishop if something is left to the church itself. And this indeed is true unless the testator expresses that he wishes it to belong only to the bishop, not to the church. In that case the disposition of the testator is to be observed; but otherwise if he expresses that he wishes it to belong only to the church, not to the bishop, because the private disposition of the testator cannot alter the general constitution of the canon. Nor is what is read in the canon contrary to this, namely, that pontiffs to whom something is left or donated by outsiders either together with the church or separately—because he who donates is proved to offer this for the redemption of his soul, not for the advantage of the priest—shall reckon it among the resources of the church not as their own property but as something left to the church; for this is true when the testator bequeaths that thing separately to the bishop in such a way that he does not express whether he wishes it to pertain only to the bishop and not to the church. But if that is left to the bishop by a relative, it is presumed to have been left not in consideration of the church but of the person, unless perhaps the contrary were proved, and the church can seek nothing from it during his life. But if it is left to the bishop and the church, a canonical division of it is to be made between them. If, however, this is left to the bishop and that to the church, whether the things left are equal or unequal, they are to be reduced to a canonical division between the bishop and the
