> Item de eadem Sinodo. [VII., actione 1.] II. Pars. Conuenientibus apud Nicenam Bithiniae, et consedentibus Petro archiepiscopo, et Petro presbitero et abbate monasterii sancti Sabae, locum tenentibus Adriani Papae, et Tharasio archiepiscopo Constantinopolitano, et Iohanne et Thoma apocrisariis apostolicarum sedium orientalium, et ceteris episcopis, episcopi Siciliae dixerunt: Dignum est, ut de futuris inquiramus. §. 1. Item Basilius episcopus Anchirae dixit. Constitutio ecclesiastica habet canonice tradita ab antiquo a sanctis apostolis et successoribus eorum, sanctis Patribus nostris et magistris, et sanctis uniuersalibus sex sinodis, et localibus sinodis orthodoxis, ut qui ab aliqua heresi reuertuntur ad orthodoxam fidem et traditionem catholicae ecclesiae, scripto negare debeant heresim suam et confiteri catholicam fidem. §. 2. Item Tharasius patriarcha dixit: Videtur uobis, ut sedes suas recipiant qui ab heresi reuertuntur? §. 3. Religiosissimi monachi dixerunt: Sicut receperunt uniuersales sinodi sex ab heresi reuertentes, ita et nos recipimus. §. 4. Sancta sinodus dixit: Placet omnibus nobis. Et iussi sunt Basilius episcopus Anchirae, et Theodorus episcopus Mirreae ciuitatis, et Theodosius sedere in gradibus suis et sedibus. §. 5. Item Constantinus episcopus Cypri dixit: Non oportet nos, qui episcopi sumus, indigere doctrina, sed aliorum esse doctores. §. 6. Item Tharasius episcopus dixit: Malorum doctorum mala doctrina. Ecclesia de malis doctoribus sacerdotes non recipit. §. 7. Item Iohannes apocrisarius orientalium sedium dixit: Heresis separat omnem hominem ab ecclesia. §. 8. Item Tharasius episcopus dixit: Ecce multi canonici libri, et sinodici, et paterni lecti sunt, et ab heresi reuertentes docuerunt nos recipere, si alia aliqua causa non est in eis. §. 9. Item Petrus apocrisarius Papae dixit: Romae exiliatus est Macharius hereticus a sancta sexta sinodo, et quadraginta dierum inducias dedit illi pater noster Benedictus Papa, et cottidie mittebat ad eum Bonifatium consiliarium suum, et instruebat eum conmonitoriis uerbis ex diuina scriptura, et nullatenus uoluit emendari. Hoc autem faciebat, ut eum reciperet in suo ordine. §. 10. Item Tharasius patriarcha dixit: Quid dicitis de Anatholio? Nonne etiam in quarta sinodo factus est princeps? et ecce ab inpio Dioscoro ordinatus est. Et nos igitur recipiamus eos, qui ab hereticis ordinati sunt, sicut Anatholius receptus est. §. 11. Item: Vere uox Dei est, quoniam non moriuntur filii pro patribus, sed unusquisque in suo peccato moritur; et quoniam ordinatio ex Deo est. §. 12. Item Tharasius patriarcha dixit: Audiuimus mandata paterna. Quid igitur? oportet recipere ab hereticis ordinatos? §. 13. Sancta sinodus dixit: Audiuimus, domine, et oportet nos recipere. §. 14. Tharasius patriarcha dixit: Plures eorum, qui in sexta sinodo conuenerunt, a Sergio, Pirro, Petro, Paulo ordinati sunt, qui fuerunt principes hereseos Monoscelitarum, quoniam isti continuatim in Constantinopolitana sede sederunt, et ab ultimo eorum, Petro scilicet, usque ad sextam sinodum non fuerant plus quam duodecim anni. Thomas uero, et Iohannes, et Constantinus ab hereticis illis archiepiscopi facti sunt, et tamen propter hoc non sunt reprobati. §. 15. Sancta sinodus dixit: Hoc manifestum est. §. 16. Constantinus episcopus Cipri dixit: Sufficienter ostensum est, quod ab hereticis uenientes recipiendi sunt. Si uero quis sponte ad hereticum uadit et accipit ordinationem, non recipiatur. §. 17. Item Tharasius patriarcha dixit: Et ego refuto eos, qui ob huiusmodi causam ad fidei subuersionem ordinati sunt, et maxime, cum presentes essent orthodoxi episcopi, a quibus poterant ordinari. Sic est paternus intellectus. Si uero sinodalis consonantia fuerit, et unitas ecclesiarum de orthodoxis, qui presumpserit ab inmundis hereticis ordinari, depositioni subiaceat. Sancta sinodus dixit: Hoc est iustum iudicium. III. Pars. Gratian. Ex hac auctoritate datur intelligi, quod qui ab unitate catholicae fidei in hereticorum societatem transierit, ut de manibus eorum ecclesiasticae dignitatis sacramenta percipiat, uel qui contemptis orthodoxis ab hereticis ordinari desiderauerit, etsi postea suae abrenuncians heresi ad ecclesiam redierit, offitio tamen accepto fungi non poterit. Auctoritate uero Cipriani prohibentur ab administratione ecclesiastica, qui intra catholicam ecclesiam ordinati ad fidei inpugnationem dilabuntur. Porro symoniaci nec ab hereticis ordinantur ad fidei subuersionem, nec intra ecclesiam catholicam ordinati aduersus fidem armantur. Quamuis enim nonnullos per pecuniam ordinent, non tamen fidem inpugnant, nec gratiam Spiritus sancti uenalem predicant. Unde cum heresim suam ueraci penitentia detestati fuerint, premissis auctoritatibus non prohibentur recipi in suis gradibus. Verumtamen capitulo illo Nicenae sinodi: "Si quis per pecuniam etc." et illo alio septimae sinodi, "Si quis omnem traditionem etc." et Innocentii, et aliorum multorum auctoritatibus inreparabiliter dampnari iubentur. Hinc etiam Leo IV. Episcopis Brittanniae:

C. V. Simoniacs cannot do penance in an order wickedly received.

You inquire concerning those who do not fear to sell doves in the Lord's temple for most base gain and, by wicked temerity, join their own deeds to the heresy of Simon: whether they can do penance in their order or only outside the order and priestly grade? We certainly cannot aid by any penance those who are convicted and those who are known to have perpetrated so detestable a crime—which has already been condemned by many councils—and oppose so many spiritual fathers; but let it be certain to all that I concur in the sentence of those Fathers. Part IV. GRATIAN. Unless the rigor of discipline is sometimes relaxed through a dispensation of mercy. For the crimes of many are damnable, which nevertheless the Church tolerates on account of the time, on account of the person, in view of piety, necessity, or utility, and because of the outcome of the matter. On account of the time: as Gelasius, when because of the necessity of the time he saw the Italian Church, through the incursion of war and famine, deprived of the office of nearly all clerics, so that the means of governing souls were lacking for very many peoples, conceded that clerics might be taken from monks or laymen, speaking thus, [to the Bishops throughout Lucania, epistle I, c. 1]:

C. V. In ordine male accepto symoniaci penitentiam agere non possunt.

Requiritis de his, qui turpissimo lucro columbas in templo Domini uendere non pertimescunt, et sua acta inproba temeritate Symonis heresi coniungunt, utrum possint in ordine penitentiam agere, an tantummodo extra ordinem et sacerdotalem fieri gradum? Quod nos quidem conuictis et his, qui tam detestabile nefas (quod iam multis est dampnatum conciliis) peregisse noscuntur, nulla possumus penitentia subuenire, et tot spiritualibus patribus obuiare, sed in illorum Patrum me sententia conuenire omnibus certum sit. IV. Pars. Gratian. Nisi rigor disciplinae quandoque relaxetur ex dispensatione misericordiae. Multorum enim crimina sunt dampnabilia, que tamen ecclesia tollerat pro tempore, pro persona, intuitu pietatis, uel necessitatis, siue utilitatis, et pro euentu rei. Pro tempore: sicut Gelasius, qui, cum necessitate temporis uideret Italicam ecclesiam propter belli famisque incursionem fere omnium clericorum offitio destitutam, adeo ut plerisque populis subsidia regendarum deessent animarum, concessit de monachis uel de laicis clericos assumi, ita dicens: [Episcopis per Lucaniam, epist. I. c. 1.]

C. VI. The decrees of the Apostolic See are tempered because of the necessity of the times.

We are constrained by the necessary disposition of affairs and induced by the moderation of the Apostolic See so to weigh the decrees of the paternal canons that, with diligent consideration, we may temper them—as far as can be done—in those things which the necessity of the present times demands be relaxed for restoring the churches. GRATIAN. Likewise: "By ancient [canons], therefore, etc." Seek this above in the treatise on those to be ordained. Likewise Pope Innocent, when because of the necessity of the time, lest there be too great a scandal in the Church, he received those ordained by the heretic Bonosus, says in his decrees, [epistle XXII to the Bishops of Macedonia, c. 5]:

> Necessaria rerum dispositione constringimur, et apostolicae sedis moderamine conuenimur sic canonum paternorum decreta librare, ut ea que presentium necessitas temporum restaurandis ecclesiis relaxanda deposcit, diligenti consideratione (quantum potest fieri) temperemus. Gratian. Item: "Priscis igitur, etc." Require supra in tractatu ordinandorum. Item Innocentius Papa, cum pro necessitate temporis, ne nimium scandalum esset in ecclesia, ordinatos a Bonoso heretico susciperet, ait in decretis suis: [epist. XXII. ad Episcopos Macedoniae, c. 5.]

C. VII. When the necessity ceases, that which pressed ought to cease.

That which was established for a remedy and because of the necessity of the time is established not to have existed originally. Therefore, when the necessity ceases, that which necessity devised as a remedy ought likewise to cease, because the legitimate order is one thing, and that which usurpation compels to be done for the present time is another.

GRATIAN. Similarly, by dispensation it was established in the Council of Nicaea, [c. 8], concerning the Novatians that those returning to the Church should be ordained:

> C. VII. Cessante necessitate, debet cessare, quod urgebat.
> Quod pro remedio ac necessitate temporis statutum est constat primitus non fuisse. Quod ergo necessitas pro remedio reperit, cessante utique necessitate debet cessare pariter quod urgebat, quia alius est ordo legitimus, aliud, quod usurpatio ad presens fieri tempus inpellit.
> Gratian. Similiter ex dispensatione in Niceno Concilio [c. 8.] de Nouatianis statutum est, ut ad ecclesiam redeuntes ordinentur:

C. VIII. Let those who have returned to the Church from the Novatians be ordained again.

If any of the Novatians wish to come to the catholic Church, it pleased the holy Council that they be ordained and thus remain in the clergy. But before all things it is proper that this confession be exacted from them in writing: that they profess that they will observe, by common consent, the statutes of the catholic Church.

> Si qui uoluerint uenire ad ecclesiam catholicam ex Nouatianis, placuit sancto concilio, ut ordinentur et sic maneant in clero. Ante omnia autem hanc ab eis confessionem per scripturam exigi oportet, ut fateantur se communi consensu catholicae ecclesiae statuta obseruaturos.

C. IX. The oath of those returning from schism.

Whenever the eye of the heart, covered by a cloud of error, is made serene by the light of heavenly illumination, one must strive with great caution lest the author of schism secretly rush in and again cut off with the weapon of error, from the root of unity, those who have returned to it. And therefore, after I, N., bishop of the city of N., discovered the snare of division by which I was held, considered the matter within myself in prolonged deliberation, and, with ready and spontaneous will, returned under the guidance of divine grace to the unity of the Apostolic See—and so that I may not be thought to have returned with a mind not pure but feigned—I pledge, under penalty of the loss of my order and the obligation of anathema, and promise to you, N., and through you to Saint Peter, prince of the Apostles, and to his vicar, the most blessed N., or his successors, that I will never, through the persuasion of any persons or by any other means, return to the schism from which I was rescued by the liberating grace of our Redeemer, but that I will always remain in every respect in the unity of the holy catholic Church and the communion of the Roman Pontiff. Hence I say under oath, by almighty God, these four holy Gospels which I hold in my hands, and the welfare of N., our lords governing the commonwealth, that I will remain always and without doubt in the unity, as I have said, of the Church to which by God's favor I have returned, and in the communion of the Roman Pontiff. But if —which may it not happen—I separate myself from this unity by any excuse or argument, let me, incurring the guilt of perjury, be found bound to eternal punishment, and let me have a portion in the future age with the author of schism. Moreover, I dictated that this document of my confession and promise be written by N., my notary, with the consent of the priests, deacons, and clerics who, binding themselves with me in this unity, likewise followed with ready will in all the things written above and subscribed with their own hands; and, subscribing it with my own hand, I delivered it to you. Enacted in the place N., on that day, and under the consuls written above. Subscription of the bishop. I, bishop of the city of N., having furnished an oath to preserve all the things written above, have subscribed this my confession and promise. GRATIAN. But to the contrary, from the rigor of the canons Pope Felix [III] writes to all Bishops, [epistle I, c. 5]:

> C. IX. Iuramentum a scismate redeuntium.
> Quociens cordis oculus nube erroris obductus supernae illustracionis lumine fit serenus, magna cautela nitendum est, ne latenter auctor scismatis irruat, et unitatis radice eos, qui ad eam reuersi fuerint, telo iterum erroris abscidat. Et ideo postquam ego N. ciuitatis episcopus, conperto diuisionis laqueo, quo tenebar, diutina mecum deliberatione pertractans, prona et spontanea uoluntate ad unitatem sedis apostolicae diuina gratia duce reuersus sum, et ne non pura mente, sed simulate reuersus existimer, spondeo sub ordinis mei casu et anathematis obligatione, atque promitto tibi N. et per te sancto Petro, apostolorum principi, atque eius uicario N. beatissimo uel successoribus eius, me numquam quorumlibet suasionibus uel quocumque alio modo ad scisma, de quo redemptoris nostri gratia liberante ereptus sum, reuersurum; sed semper me in unitate sanctae ecclesiae catholicae et communione Romani Pontificis per omnia permansurum. Unde iuratus dico per Deum omnipotentem, et hec sancta quatuor euangelia, que in manibus meis teneo, et salutem N. dominorum nostrorum rempublicam gubernantium, me in unitate, sicut dixi, ecclesiae, ad quam Deo propitio sum reuersus, et communione Romani Pontificis semper et sine dubio permanere. Quod si (quod absit) ab hac me unitate aliqua excusatione uel argumento diuisero, periurii reatum incurrens eternae penae obligatus inueniar, et cum auctore scismatis habeam in futuro seculo portionem. Hanc autem confessionis promissionisque meae cartulam N. notario meo cum consensu presbiterorum et diaconorum et clericorum, qui me in hac unitate obligantes se in suprascriptis omnibus prona similiter uoluntate secuti atque propriis manibus subscripti sunt, scribendam dictaui, et propria manu subscribens tibi tradidi. Acta in loco N., die illa, et consulibus suprascriptis. Subscriptio episcopi. Ego episcopus ciuitatis N., huic confessioni promissionique meae prestito de conseruandis suprascriptis omnibus sacramento subscripsi. Gratian. Ceterum ex canonum rigore contra scribit Felix Papa [III.] omnibus Episcopis: [epist. I. c. 5.]

C. X. Those who have been baptized or rebaptized outside the Church are not to be admitted to ecclesiastical service.

Those who at any age have been baptized or rebaptized anywhere other than in the catholic Church shall by no means be permitted to approach ecclesiastical service. It ought to suffice for them that they have been received into the number of catholics. For whoever violates this statute, or does not remove one whom he has learned to have crept from their assembly into clerical ministry, will appear to pronounce judgment upon his own order and communion. GRATIAN. On account of the person: as blessed Gregory, writing to Bishop Januarius, [book VII, indiction 2, epistle I], says:

C. X. Qui extra ecclesiam baptizati uel rebaptizati fuerint, ad ecclesiasticam miliciam non admittantur.

Qui in qualibet etate alibi quam in ecclesia catholica aut baptizati, aut rebaptizati sunt, ad ecclesiasticam miliciam prorsus non permittantur accedere. Quibus satis debet esse, quod in catholicorum numero sunt recepti. Quoniam de suo ordine et communione uidebitur ferre iudicium quisquis hoc uiolauerit institutum, uel qui non remouerit eum, quem ex eius cetu ad ministerium clericale obrepsisse cognouerit. Gratian. Pro persona: sicut B. Gregorius scribens Ianuario Episcopo [lib. VII. Indict. 2. epist. I.] ait:

C. XI. The rigor of the canons is sometimes relaxed on account of the person.

So great a wickedness concerning your old age has reached my ears that, unless we still weighed it in a humane manner, we would already strike it with a fixed curse. § 1. And indeed a sentence of punishment ought to have been hurled against you; but because we know your simplicity together with your old age, for the present we remain silent. GRATIAN. In view of piety: as Gelasius says concerning the illiterate and those defective in body, [to the Bishops throughout Lucania, epistle I, c. 18]:

C. XI. Rigor canonum pro persona aliquando relaxatur.

Tanta nequicia ad meas aures de tua senectute peruenit, ut eam, nisi adhuc humanitus pensaremus, fixa iam maledictione feriremus. §. 1. Et quidem penae fuerat in te sententia iaculanda; sed quoniam simplicitatem tuam cum senectute nouimus, interim tacemus. Gratian. Pietatis intuitu: sicut de illitteratis et corpore uiciatis Gelasius ait: [Episcopis per Lucaniam, epist. I. c. 18.]

C. XII. The decrees of the canons are sometimes relaxed in view of piety.

If any such persons have been received either through their own rashness or through the negligence of those presiding, let them receive nothing further by way of promotion, and let them hold it sufficient that this was conceded to them out of excessive compassion. GRATIAN. In view of necessity: as Pope Hilary, when grave scandal arose on both sides concerning a certain bishop ordained without the metropolitan's knowledge, says in his epistle, [to Ascanius and all the Bishops of the Province of Tarragona]:

C. XII. Canonum decreta pietatis intuitu nonnumquam relaxantur.

Si qui uel propria temeritate uel incuria presidentium tales suscepti sunt, nichil ultra promotionis accipiant, satisque habeant, hoc sibi pro nimia miseratione concessum. Gratian. Necessitatis intuitu: sicut Ylarius Papa, qui, cum de quodam episcopo preter noticiam ordinato metropolitani in utroque graue scandalum fieret, ait in epistola sua: [ad Ascanium et uniuersos Episcopos Tarraconensis prouinciae]

C. XIII. Certain things are tolerated in the Church for the sake of necessity.

Because we see that whatever has been indicated by either party is confused by every perversity, after considering the necessity of the times we have decreed that what was done pertains to pardon on this condition: that henceforth no bishop be ordained without the knowledge or consent of the metropolitan.

C. XIV. On the same.

Likewise Innocent, [to the Bishops of Macedonia, epistle XXII, c. 6]. Whenever a people or a crowd sins, because punishment cannot be inflicted upon all on account of their multitude, it is customarily allowed to pass unpunished. I therefore say that the former things are to be left to God's judgment, and that henceforth they are to be guarded against with the greatest solicitude.

C. XIII. Necessitatis causa quedam in ecclesia tollerantur.

Quoniam quicquid ab alterutra parte est indicatum omni uidemus peruersitate confusum, temporum necessitate perspecta hac ratione decreuimus ad ueniam pertinere quod gestum est, ut deinceps preter noticiam nullus uel consensum metropolitani ordinetur antistes.

C. XIV. De eodem.

Item Innocentius. [Episc. Macedoniae, ep. XXII. c. 6.] Quociens a populis aut a turba peccatur, quia in omnes propter multitudinem uindicari non potest, inultum solet transire. Priora ergo dimittenda dico Dei iudicio, et de reliquo maxima sollicitudine precauenda.

C. XV. Through dispensation certain things are tolerated which the rigor of the canons condemns.

Likewise from the epistle of Cyril sent to Maximus, Deacon of Antioch. I learned from the monk Paul, beloved by me, that your piety refuses to this day to embrace the communion of the most reverend Bishop John, because certain persons in the church of Antioch either still hold evil opinions with Nestorius or indeed once held them but perhaps have come to their senses. Therefore, let your moderation test whether at any time, openly and irreverently gathering together with Nestorius, they hold his opinions and converse together; although they once had a cauterized conscience, let them now be gathered together after penance has been done concerning the things into which they were drawn, even though perhaps they are ashamed to confess the transgression. § 1. But so that we may not be thought to love contention, let us embrace the communion of the most reverend Bishop John, showing indulgence to him; and for the sake of dispensation, let him recognize that his affair is not being treated more searchingly, strictly, or vehemently against him. For, as I have said, the affair greatly needs the grace of dispensation.

C. XV. Ex dispensatione quedam tollerantur, que rigor canonum condempnat.

Item ex epistola Cirilli missa Maximo Diacono Antioceno. Didici a diligendo mihi Paulo monacho, quia recusat pietas tua usque hodie communionem reuerentissimi episcopi Iohannis amplecti, pro eo, quod quidam in Antiocena ecclesia male adhuc cum Nestorio uel sentiant, uel iam senserint quidem, sed forsitan resipuerint. Probet igitur tua modestia, utrum aliquando colligi nude ac inreuerenter cum Nestorio sentiant et inuicem colloquantur; licet aliquando cauteriatam habuerint conscientiam, colligantur autem nunc acta penitentia super his, in quibus subrepti sunt, quamuis confiteri fortassis reuereantur excessum. §. 1. Ut autem non existimemur amare contentionem, amplectamur episcopi reuerentissimi Iohannis communionem, indulgentes ei, et causa dispensationis eius negotium non subtilius uel districtius siue uehementius erga se recognoscat agitari. Dispensationis enim gratia (sicut dixi) eget negotium multum.

C. XVI. On the same.

The same to the priest and archimandrite Januarius. Dispensations in affairs sometimes compel certain persons to go a little outside what is owed in order to make some greater gain. For just as those who sail the sea, distressed when a storm presses and the ship is endangered, unload certain things so that the rest may remain safe, so also we, when we do not have complete certainty of preserving all affairs, disregard certain of them lest we suffer the loss of all. GRATIAN. In view of utility: as is related in the Council of Meaux, [c. 64], concerning the sons of virgins abducted by force and thus joined in marriage to their abductors:

C. XVI. De eodem.

Idem ad Ianuarium presbiterum et Archimandritam. Dispensationes rerum nonnumquam cogunt parum quidem a debito quosdam foras exire, ut maius aliquid lucri faciant. Sicut enim hii, qui mare nauigant, tempestate urgente nauique periclitante anxiati quedam exonerant, ut cetera salua permaneant, ita et nos, cum non habemus saluandorum omnium negociorum penitus certitudinem, despicimus ex his quedam, ne cunctorum patiamur dispendia. Gratian. Utilitatis intuitu: sicut in Meldensi Concilio [c. 64.] perhibetur de filiis uirginum per uim raptarum et sic ad coniugium raptorum applicatarum:

C. XVII. Certain things are tolerated in the Church in view of utility.

Those begotten from such a marriage are not to be admitted to ecclesiastical orders unless perhaps either the greatest utility or necessity of the Church demands them, or an evident prerogative of merits commends them. GRATIAN. Peter, agreeing with this, says: “In truth I have discovered that God is not a respecter of persons, etc.” § 1. Certain things are also tolerated in the Church because of the outcome of the matter, as Leo says in his decrees concerning laymen suddenly ordained bishops contrary to the decrees of the canons, [epistle LXXXV, otherwise LXXXVII, c. 1, to the Bishops of Africa]:

C. XVII. Utilitatis intuitu quedam in ecclesia tollerantur.

Tali coniugio generati ecclesiasticis ordinibus non applicentur, nisi forte eos aut maxima ecclesiae utilitas uel necessitas postulet, uel euidens meritorum prerogatiua commendet. Gratian. Huic Petrus concordans ait: "In ueritate conperi, quia non est personarum acceptor Deus, etc." §. 1. Pro euentu etiam rei quam in ecclesia tollerantur, sicut Leo ait in decretis suis de laicis subito contra decreta canonum ordinatis episcopis: [ep. LXXXV. al. LXXXVII. c. 1. Episcopis Africae]

C. XVIII. The office received is left out of mercy to laymen who are promoted to the episcopate contrary to the decrees of the canons.

The cases demand that fitting punishment be brought forth not only against such prelates but also against those who ordained them. But the mildness of mercy surrounds us on one side and the censure of justice on the other, so that we believe certain offenses are to be tolerated in some manner, but others entirely cut away. We therefore permit those whose promotion incurs only this ground for reproach—that they were elected from the laity to episcopal office—to retain their place, without prejudicing the statutes of the Apostolic See or dissolving the rules of the blessed Fathers, because remission of a sin does not give license to sin, nor will it be lawful afterward to commit with impunity what could be conceded for some reason, lest we punish with just vengeance afterward what we have conceded for a time with pious lenity.

> Exigunt causae ut non solum in tales presules, sed etiam in ordinatores eorum conpetens ultio proferatur. Sed circumstant nos hinc mansuetudo misericordiae, hinc censura iusticiae, ut credamus quedam delicta utcumque tolleranda, quedam uero penitus amputanda. Illos ergo quorum prouectio hoc tantum reprehensionis incurrit, quod ex laicis ad episcopale offitium electi sunt locum suum tenere permittimus, non preiudicantes apostolicae sedis statutis, nec beatorum Patrum regulas soluentes, quia remissio peccati non dat licentiam delinquendi, nec quod potuit aliqua ratione concedi fas erit amplius inpune committi, ne quod ad tempus pia lenitate concessimus iusta post modum ultione plectamus.

C. XIX. Donatists and Novatians, although blamefully ordained, are nevertheless tolerated from necessity.

The same to the Moorish bishops. Maximus also, although blamefully ordained from the laity, if he is now no Donatist and is alien to the spirit of schismatic depravity, we do not repel from the episcopal dignity which he obtained in whatever manner, on condition that he make manifest that he is catholic by a declaration directed to us.

> C. XIX. Donatistae et Nouatiani, quamuis reprehensibiliter ordinati, tamen ex necessitate tollerantur.
> Idem ad Mauros episcopos. Maximum quoque ex laico, reprehensibiliter licet ordinatum, tamen si Donatista iam non est et a spiritu scismaticae prauitatis alienus est, ab episcopali, quam quoquo modo adeptus est, non repellimus dignitate, ita ut ipse libello ad nos directo catholicum se esse manifestet.

C. XX. On the same.

The same, [in the same, at the beginning of c. 3]. We wish Donatus of Seia, converted—as we have learned—from Novatianism with his people, to preside over the Lord's flock in such a way that he remembers to direct to us a declaration of his faith, in which he both condemns the error of the doctrine of Novatian and most fully confesses the catholic truth. But the things which we have now remitted after a certain consideration of the cases are henceforth to be guarded by the ancient rules, lest we punish with just vengeance afterward what we have conceded for a time with pious lenity.

> C. XX. De eodem.
> Idem. [ibidem initio c. 3.] Donatum autem Seiacensem ex Nouatiano (ut conperimus) cum sua plebe conuersum ita dominico gregi uolumus presidere, ut libellum suae fidei meminerit ad nos dirigendum, quo et Nouati dogmatis dampnet errorem, et plenissime confiteatur catholicam ueritatem. Que autem nunc certa remisimus consideratione causarum, antiquis deinceps custodienda sunt regulis, ne quod ad tempus pia lenitate concessimus iusta post hac ulcione plectamus.

C. XXI. Those returning from heresy can, after public profession, be received in their own orders.

The same to Januarius, Bishop of Aquileia, [epistle III]. For it is most salutary and fullest of the utility of spiritual medicine that priests, deacons, subdeacons, or clerics of any order who wish to be seen as corrected and strive to return again to the catholic faith which they formerly lost should first profess without ambiguity that they have condemned their errors and the very authors of the error, so that, their depraved opinions also having been extinguished, no occasion for despair may remain and no member can be violated by fellowship with such persons, when their own profession has begun to stand against them in all respects. Concerning them we also command that this constitution of the canons be observed: let them hold it as a great benefice if, every hope of promotion having been taken from them, they remain with perpetual stability in the order in which they are found, provided that they have not been stained by repeated anointing.

C. XXI. Redeuntes ab heresi post publicam professionem in suis ordinibus recipi possunt.

Idem Ianuario Episcopo Aquilegiensi. [epist. III.] Saluberrimum enim et spiritualis medicinae utilitate plenissimum est, ut siue presbiteri, siue diaconi siue subdiaconi aut cuiuslibet ordinis clerici, qui se correctos uideri uolunt atque ad catholicam fidem, quam pridem amiserant, rursum reuerti ambiunt, prius errores suos et ipsos auctores erroris se dampnatos sine ambiguitate fateantur, et sensibus prauis etiam peremptis nulla desperandi supersit occasio, nec ullum membrum talium possit societate uiolari, cum per omnia illis professio propria ceperit obuiare. Circa quos etiam canonum illam constitutionem precipimus custodiri, ut in magno habeant beneficio, si adempta sibi omni sepe promotionis in quo inueniuntur ordine stabilitate perpetua maneant, si tamen iterata unctione non fuerint maculati.

C. XXII. Those returning from heresy are publicly to detest the heresy and its authors.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 36]. If any bishop, or a priest or deacon of any bishop, has fallen into the opinion of some heresy and for this cause has been excommunicated, let no bishop receive him into communion unless first, in a common council, he satisfies all by presenting a declaration of his faith and thus obtains his free purgation. Let this same thing also be decreed concerning faithful laymen if they have been named as holding the opinion of any heresy. Part V. GRATIAN. Behold the causes for which certain things are tolerated in the Church, which, when those causes cease, are punished with pious severity. But Pope Gelasius distinguishes when they are to be tolerated and when cut away, saying, [to the Bishops throughout Lucania, epistle I, c. 11]:

C. XXII. Ab heresi redeuntes heresim et eius auctores publice detestentur.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 36.] Si quis episcopus, siue alicuius episcopi presbiter aut diaconus in alicuius heresis opinionem offenderit, et ob hanc causam fuerit excommunicatus, nullus episcopus in communionem eum recipiat, nisi prius in communi concilio porrecto fidei suae libello satisfaciat omnibus, et ita liberam teneat suam purgationem. Hoc idem et de fidelibus laicis sit decretum, si in aliquam heresis opinionem fuerint nominati. V. Pars. Gratian. Ecce, quibus de causis quedam in ecclesia tollerantur, que eisdem cessantibus pia seueritate uindicantur. Quando autem tolleranda sint, quando resecanda, Gelasius papa distinguit, dicens: [Episcopis per Lucaniam, epist. I. c. 11.]

C. XXIII. When certain things are to be tolerated in the Church.

Even if those things are sometimes to be permitted which, if the integrity of the others is established, cannot alone do harm, those things nevertheless must be guarded against greatly which cannot be received without manifest discoloration. And if regard for circumstances or times compels, or consideration of accelerated provision excuses, those very things which are sometimes believed to be indulgently allowed without any detriment, how much more are those things in no way to be mutilated which neither any necessity nor any ecclesiastical utility at all extorts? For sometimes canonical precepts are curtailed and relaxed on account of necessity or the utility of the Church. Part VI. GRATIAN. § 1. We have briefly shown which persons returning from heresy can be received in their own orders and which cannot. But now the question concerns those who were ordained by heretics: if they return from heresy to the unity of the catholic mother Church, whether they can be ordained again in the same order? "For one once consecrated," as blessed Gregory says, "ought not to be consecrated again." § 2. Likewise, sacraments which are ministered by heretics in the form of the Church—as Augustine testifies—ought not to be reiterated, lest the injury appear to be done not to the man but to the sacrament. § 3. But that saying of Gregory is understood concerning those who received priestly or episcopal consecration; when they return to the Church, they either receive the effect of their anointing through the imposition of hands or are commanded to cease perpetually from its administration. Similarly, that saying of Augustine is understood concerning the same mystical anointing and the sacrament of baptism. § 4. But there are other orders in the Church which are conferred without sacramental anointing, by the blessing of the bishop alone, with a certain distribution of vessels or vestments, such as the Levites and the others constituted below them. Although these are ordained by heretics, nevertheless, when returning to the Church, let them be ordained by the Church in the same order—if they are otherwise worthy—nor will there be in them a reiteration of the office, since it is taught that nothing was conferred upon them by the heretics. Hence Urban II writes to Peter, Bishop of Pistoia, and Rusticus, Abbot of Vallombrosa:

> Etsi illa nonnumquam sinenda sunt, que, si ceterorum constat integritas, nocere sola non ualent, illa tamen magnopere precauenda sunt, que recipi sine manifesta decoloratione non possunt. Et si ea ipsa, que nullo detrimento aliquociens indulgenda creduntur, uel rerum uel temporum cogit intuitus, uel acceleratae prouisionis excusat respectus, quanto magis illa nullatenus sunt mutilanda, que nec ulla necessitas, nec ecclesiastica prorsus extorquet utilitas? Aliquando enim pro necessitate uel ecclesiae utilitate mutilantur et laxantur precepta canonica. VI. Pars. Gratian. §. 1. Breuiter ostendimus, qui reuertentes ab heresi in suis ordinibus ualeant recipi, uel qui non. Nunc autem queritur de his, qui ab hereticis ordinati sunt, si ad unitatem catholicae matris ecclesiae ab heresi redierint, utrum in eodem ordine iterum ualeant ordinari? "Semel enim consecratus" (ut ait B. Gregorius) "iterum consecrari non debet". §. 2. Item sacramenta, que ab hereticis in forma ecclesiae ministrantur (sicut Augustinus testatur) reiterari non debent, ne non homini, sed sacramento uideatur iniuria fieri. §. 3. Sed illud Gregorii de his intelligitur, qui consecrationem sacerdotalem uel episcopalem acceperunt, qui aut per manus inpositionem, cum ad ecclesiam redeunt, effectum suae unctionis accipiunt, aut ab eius amministratione perpetuo cessare iubentur. Similiter illud Augustini de eadem mistica unctione et de sacramento baptismatis intelligitur. §. 4. Sunt autem in ecclesia alii ordines, qui sine sacramentali unctione, sola episcopi benedictione, cum quadam uasorum uel indumentorum distributione prestantur; ut sunt Leuitae et ceteri infra eos constituti. Hi quamuis ab hereticis ordinentur, tamen ad ecclesiam redeuntes in eodem ordine (si alias digni fuerint) ab ecclesia ordinentur, nec fiet in eis reiteratio muneris, cum nichil ab hereticis eis doceatur fuisse collatum. Unde Urbanus II. scribit Petro Pistoriensi Episcopo et Rustico Abbati Vallis umbrosae:

C. XXIV. Those returning from heretics are to be ordained anew.

We found from his own confession that Daibert was ordained deacon by Negzelon, although the latter was a simoniac, but not simoniacally; and it is established as declared by the judgment of blessed Pope Innocent that Negzelon, a heretic (who, it is established, was ordained by heretics), because he had nothing to give, could give nothing to him upon whom he laid his hand. We therefore, supported by the authority of so great a pontiff and strengthened by the testimony of Pope Damasus, who says, "What was badly done ought to be repeated," have constituted Daibert deacon wholly anew—since he has departed from the heretics in body and spirit and labors according to his strength for the benefit of the Church, and since the Church's necessity presses. We judge that this is not to be considered a repetition, but only the complete conferral of the diaconate, since indeed, as we have said above, one who had nothing could give nothing.

C. XXIV. Redeuntes ab hereticis sunt reordinandi

Daibertum a Negzelone, licet symoniaco, non symoniace eiusdem confessione reperimus in diaconum ordinatum; et B. Innocentii Papae sententia constat declaratum, quod Negzelon, hereticus (quem constat ab hereticis ordinatum) quia nichil habuit dare nichil potuit ei, cui manus inposuit. Nos igitur tanti Pontificis auctoritate firmati Damasi Papae testimonio roborati qui ait: "Reiterari oportere quod male actum est", Daibertum, ab hereticis corpore et spiritu digressum atque utilitati ecclesiae pro uiribus insudantem, ex integro (ecclesiae necessitate ingruente) diaconem constituimus. Quod non reiterationem existimari censemus, sed tantum integram diaconii dationem, quoniam quidem, ut prediximus, qui nichil habuit nichil dare potuit.

C. XXV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Damasus, [letter IV, On Chorepiscopi]. Through the illicit imposition of a hand, those who seemed to have received something had a wounded head; and where a wound has been inflicted, it is necessary to apply medicine by which the inflicted blemish may be healed—that is, it is necessary to repeat what is not proved to have been legitimately done or conferred. For how one who received honor from a man who did not have the power to give it legitimately can retain that honor, I cannot discover.

C. XXV. De eodem.

Item Damasus Papa. [epist. IV. de chorepiscopis] Per illicitam manus inpositionem uulneratum caput illi qui uidebantur aliquid accepisse, habebant, et ubi uulnus infixum est, necesse est medicinam adhibere, qua infixa sanetur macula; id est, reiterari necesse est quod legitime actum aut collatum minime probatur. Nam quomodo possit honorem retinere qui ab illo accepit, qui potestatem dare non habuit legitime, inuenire non possum.

[C. XXVI.] Book 9 of the Code, under the title On the Julian Law concerning Extortion.

The Emperors Theodosius and Valentinian, [Augusti, to Florentinus]. Part VII. We decree that men of such a kind shall approach the governing of provinces as are accustomed to be advanced to the insignia of office, not by ambition or a price, but by their proven life and the testimony of Your Magnificence; provided, certainly, that those to whom these offices have been entrusted through the choice of your See or ours declare under oath in the proceedings that, for obtaining administrations, they neither gave anything nor would ever thereafter give anything, whether through themselves or through an intermediary acting in fraud of the law and of the oath, or under the title of gift or sale, or under any other covering of whatever contract; and that on this account—excepting salaries—they would accept absolutely nothing, whether while placed in an administration or after laying down the office, for any benefit furnished during the time of an administration which they obtained gratuitously. And although we judge that no one, through contempt of his oath, would be so forgetful of divine fear as to place any advantage before his own salvation, nevertheless, so that he may be subjected to fear for his salvation by the necessity of peril, if anyone should dare to neglect the oaths furnished, we grant to everyone, as in the case of a public crime, the capacity to accuse not only the recipient but also the giver, with the one who is convicted to be struck in every way by the penalty of fourfold restitution.

C. XXVII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Paschal. It is evident that simoniacs, as the first and principal heretics, are to be rejected by all the faithful and, if after admonition they do not come to their senses, are to be oppressed by external powers. For all crimes, in comparison with the simoniacal heresy, are reckoned as almost nothing.] GRATIAN. With these matters briefly set forth, let us come to those things which the Church is prepared to avenge by the severity of discipline, showing by what accusers or witnesses any persons are to be convicted; by what judge each person ought to be condemned or absolved; if a case has been vitiated, by what remedy it may be relieved; and, if the accusers fail, whether the defendant is to be compelled to purgation. And so that what we are about to say may appear more easily, let an example be placed before our eyes, in which the authorities contending on either side may be distinguished, and what the authority of the holy Fathers holds may be clearly made known.

C. XXVII. De eodem.

Item Pascalis Papa. Patet symoniacos, ueluti primos et precipuos hereticos, ab omnibus fidelibus respuendos, et si commoniti non resipuerint, ab exteris potestatibus obprimendos. Omnia enim crimina ad conparationem symoniacae heresis quasi pro nichilo reputantur.] Gratian. His breuiter premissis ad ea ueniamus, que ecclesia seueritate disciplinae parata est ulcisci, ostendentes, quibus accusantibus uel testificantibus quilibet sint conuincendi; quo iudice quisque debeat dampnari uel absolui; si causa uiciata fuerit, quo remedio possit subleuari; si accusatores defecerint, an reus sit cogendus ad purgationem. Et ut facilius pateat quod dicturi sumus, exemplum ponatur sub oculis, in quo auctoritates hinc inde controuersantes distinguantur, et quid sanctorum patrum sentiat auctoritas liquido intimetur.

Causa II

GRATIAN. A certain bishop is assailed by a layman concerning a fall of the flesh; two monks, one subdeacon, and two Levites bear testimony against him; he perceives himself to be burdened by his metropolitan; in the very ventilation of the case, three of the witnesses fail, whether deceived by a promise or rejected by canonical examination; nevertheless the bishop is despoiled, because his crime was notorious. (Question I.) Here it is asked first whether judicial order is required in manifest matters. (Question II.) Second, whether one who has been despoiled is to be judged by anyone. (Question III.) Third, with what penalty those who have failed in accusation or testimony are to be struck. (Question IV.) Fourth, whether he is to be condemned by the testimony of two. (Question V.) Fifth, whether, when the accusers fail, he is to be compelled to purgation. (Question VI.) Sixth, whether a remedy is to be given to one who, for the sake of delay in the case, has put forward the plea of appeal. (Question VII.) Seventh, whether laymen, monks, or any persons of the lower orders are to be heard in the accusation of their superiors. (Question VIII.) Eighth, how an accusation ought to be made: whether in writing or without writing.

GRATIANUS. Quidam episcopus de lapsu carnis a laico inpetitur; duo monachi, unus subdiaconus, et duo Leuitae aduersus ipsum testimonium ferunt; a metropolitano suo sentit se pregrauari; in ipsa uentilatione causae tres ex testibus deficiunt, siue promissione decepti, siue canonica examinatione reprobati; expoliatur tamen episcopus, quia crimen eius notorium erat. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, an in manifestis iudiciarius ordo sit requirendus? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an expoliatus ab aliquo sit iudicandus? (Qu. III.) Tertio, qua pena sint feriendi qui in accusatione uel testificatione defecerint? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, si duorum testimonio sit condempnandus? (Qu. V.) Quinto, si deficientibus accusatoribus sit cogendus ad purgationem? (Qu. VI.) Sexto, si remedium sit dandum ei, qui causa dilationis uocem appellationis exhibuerit? (Qu. VII.) Septimo, si laici, monachi uel quilibet inferiorum ordinum in accusatione maiorum sint audiendi? (Qu. VIII.) Octauo, quomodo fieri debeat accusatio, an in scriptis, an sine scripto?

Question I

GRATIAN. Part I. That no one can be condemned without judicial order is proved by many authorities. For concerning this Augustine says, [homily L, On the Usefulness of Penance]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem nullus sine iudiciario ordine dampnari ualeat, multis auctoritatibus probatur. De eo namque ait Augustinus: [hom. L. de utilitate penitentiae]

C. I. One cannot be condemned unless either convicted or voluntarily confessed.

We cannot pronounce sentence against anyone unless he has either been convicted or voluntarily confessed.

> C. I. Dampnari non ualet nisi aut conuictus aut sponte confessus.
> Nos in quemquam sententiam ferre non possumus, nisi aut conuictum, aut sponte confessum.

C. II. Concerning the same.

Likewise Emperor Constantine. A judge examining a criminal shall not pronounce sentence before either the defendant himself confesses or he is convicted through irreproachable witnesses. GRATIAN. Augustine testifies to this same thing, and in the same words:

> C. II. De eodem.
> Item Constantinus Inperator. Iudex criminosum discutiens non ante sententiam proferat, quam aut reum ipse se confiteatur, aut per innocentes testes conuincatur. Gratian. Hoc idem testatur Augustinus, et eisdem uerbis:

C. III. Concerning the same.

Likewise Gregory, [book VIII, letter 50]. Just as we do not wish anyone to be condemned without a judgment, so we do not permit things justly determined to be delayed by any excuse.

> C. III. De eodem.
> Item Gregorius. [lib. VIII. epist. 50.] Sicut sine iudicio quemquam nolumus condempnari, ita que iuste diffinita sunt nulla patimur excusatione differri.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Bishop Eleutherius, [to the bishops of Gaul]. Let nothing be done against anyone accused without a lawful and suitable accuser. For our Lord Jesus Christ also knew Judas to be a thief; but because he was not accused, he was therefore not cast out.

> C. IV. De eodem.
> Item Eleuterius Episcopus. [ad Episcopos Galliae] Nichil contra quemlibet accusatum absque legitimo et idoneo accusatore fiat. Nam et Dominus noster Iesus Christus Iudam furem esse sciebat; sed quia non est accusatus, ideo non est eiectus.

C. V. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Felix, [letter I to Bishop Paternus]. Primates examining an accused bishop shall not pronounce a sentence of condemnation before either he himself confesses that he is guilty or he is convicted through irreproachable witnesses examined canonically and according to rule. Otherwise we judge the condemnation of bishops to be void and unjust, and therefore to be reconsidered by a synod, so that those oppressed may be aided by all in all cases. GRATIAN. Pope Zephyrinus decrees the same:

> C. V. De eodem.

Item Felix Papa. [I. ad Paternum Episcopum] Primates accusatum discutientes episcopum non ante sententiam proferant dampnationis, quam aut reum se ipse confiteatur, aut per innocentes et canonice examinatos regulariter testes conuincatur. Aliter irritam esse censemus et iniustam episcoporum dampnationem, et idcirco a sinodo retractandam, ita ut obpressis ab omnibus in cunctis causis subueniatur. Gratian. Idem decernit Zepherinus Papa:

C. VI. Many are to be sustained through tolerance, although they have been condemned by the sentence of divine judgment.

Likewise Augustine. "One of you is about to betray me." He said well, "of you," and not, "of us." For he is of you, from whom he has not been excluded through judicial authority after confession or conviction. But from me, who need no proofs and know all things most certainly, he has been separated and divided. It is as if he said: Although through the sentence of hidden judgment I hold him condemned, nevertheless you are still to sustain him through tolerance.

C. VI. Multi per tollerantiam sustinendi sunt, quamuis sententia diuini iudicii sint condempnati.

Item Augustinus. Unus ex uobis me traditurus est. Bene dixit: ex uobis, et non: ex nobis. Ex uobis enim est, a quibus per iudiciariam potestatem confessus aut conuictus exclusus non est. A me uero, qui nullis indigeo argumentis, et omnia certissime noui, separatus et diuisus est. Tale est, ac si diceret: Etsi ego per occulti iudicii sententiam eum dampnatum habeo, uos tamen adhuc illum per tollerantiam sustinete.

C. VII. Let no judgment be maintained unless it was conducted reasonably.

Likewise Gregory to John the Defender, going to Spain, [book XI, letter 50]. First, inquiry must be made concerning the person of the priest of our most beloved brother and fellow bishop Januarius; and if the truth stands as that bishop's petition contains, let that priest be recalled in every way to his church and place. But if it should be said that some case was brought or proved against him, with him present and giving an account for himself, both the kind of case and the manner of proof must be investigated carefully, so that from this you may be able to gather whether he should still remain in exile or instead be recalled to his church and office.

§ 1. Concerning the bishop's person this is to be done: if no criminal case worthy of exile or deposition was brought or proved against him, that bishop who, while he was surviving, perversely and contrary to the canons presumed to be ordained in his church shall, deprived of the priesthood, be expelled from every ecclesiastical ministry. He shall also be handed over to that same most beloved Januarius, our brother and fellow bishop, so that either he may be held in custody by him or certainly be sent by him to us. The bishops who ordained him, or who were present consenting to his ordination, shall be deprived of communion in the Lord's body for six months and decreed to do penance in a monastery; and the aforesaid Januarius shall be restored in every way to his place and order. But if the danger of death should happen to threaten those deprived of communion, the blessing of viaticum shall not be denied them. If, however, the bishops should confess of their own accord that, to the prejudice of the condemnation or deposition of the remembered bishop, they consented through fear of the judge and did such things, the time is to be shortened for them and the manner of penance moderated. But if perhaps the man who invaded his place has departed from this life and another has been ordained, because he appears to be of lighter guilt, as having succeeded not that living man but a dead man, the office of the episcopate shall be forbidden him only in that

§ 2. Moreover, the glorious count shall be condemned to restore to the aforesaid bishop whatever the bishop affirms by an oath that he expended or suffered as loss through the count's violence and persecution. But if perhaps it is reported that the matter was done otherwise than the aforesaid bishop's petition contains, it must be investigated carefully, and, once the truth is known, what the order of justice counsels must be judged with fear of God.

§ 3. Therefore, because Bishop Stephen asserts that certain things were fabricated out of hatred for him, that he was accused on false charges, that nothing was done in an orderly manner, and that he was condemned unjustly, inquiry must first be made diligently whether the judgment was conducted in an orderly manner; whether some persons were accusers and others witnesses; then into the quality of the charges, whether it was worthy of exile or deposition; whether testimony was spoken against him under oath and in his presence; whether the proceedings were in writing; and whether he himself had permission to answer and defend himself. Inquiry must also be made carefully into the persons accusing and testifying: of what status or reputation they are; whether they are needy; whether perhaps they had any enmities against the aforesaid pastor; whether they gave testimony from hearsay or testified that they knew specifically; whether judgment was given in writing; and whether the sentence was read with the parties present. But if perhaps these things were not done solemnly, nor was a case worthy of exile or deposition proved, let him be recalled in every way to his church. Those who condemned him contrary to the fear of God and the statutes of the canons are, after excommunication, to be sent to a monastery to do penance for six months, provided certainly that, if the danger of death should happen to threaten any of them, the blessing of viaticum shall not be denied him. The man who rashly sought his place while he was living shall, deprived of the priesthood, be expelled from every ecclesiastical ministry and handed over to that same most beloved brother and fellow bishop of ours, so that he may either send him to us or hold him in custody with himself. The bishops who presumed to ordain him or gave consent to his perverse ordination shall, deprived of communion, be assigned to a monastery to do penance for six months, etc., as above in the case of Bishop Januarius and below.

§ 4. But if perhaps some of the things alleged against the remembered Bishop Stephen have been proved, while others could not be demonstrated, it must be weighed with altogether cautious consideration whether the lighter charges or instead the graver ones have been proved, so that from them you may know how you ought to form your determination.

§ 5. But the glorious count, if the aforesaid bishop is shown to be innocent, shall restore to him without any delay whatever he took from his property or from that of his church, etc., as above in the case of Bishop Januarius. But if the bishop has such a fault, etc., and below in the first case of the monks. Concerning the person of the priest, etc., and below in the case: A cleric against a cleric. And below, [in the same letter 54 of the eleventh book].

§ 6. Concerning the person of Bishop Januarius, it must be known that it was done altogether gravely and contrary to the laws that he was violently dragged from the church; for if a bishop should suffer any injury from anyone in a church, the law strikes the person doing the injury with capital punishment and, as one guilty of maiestas, gives everyone permission to accuse him, as the sequence of this law speaks in book I of the Code, chapter III, constitution 11:

§ 7. "If anyone should rush into this kind of sacrilege, so that by breaking into a catholic church he inflicts any injury upon the priests and ministers, or upon the worship or place itself, etc." And below:

§ 8. Concerning the person of Bishop Stephen, this is to be attended to: he ought neither to have been dragged to judgment against his will nor to have been judged by the bishops of another council.

§ 9. If it should be said against this that he had neither a metropolitan nor a patriarch, it must be said that this case ought to have been heard and settled by the Apostolic See—which is the head of all churches—just as the aforesaid bishop is known to have petitioned. Therefore, because the bishop had as judges men of another council who were altogether suspect, let the sentence spoken by one who was not his judge possess no firmness.

§ 12. As to what that same bishop says, that in his absence certain witnesses of the vilest kind were produced: if this is true, it is of no weight.

§ 13. Many laws show what kind of witnesses, or witnesses of what reputation, are to be admitted to testimony; these are unknown to scarcely anyone, and they also decree that witnesses of the vilest kind ought not to be believed without bodily examination.

§ 14. As to what is said, that nothing was judged in writing, one must read under title XLIV of book VII of the Code, the final constitution, that judgment ought to have been given in writing. For there, among other things, it is commanded that a sentence which was spoken without writing should not deserve even to have the name of a sentence.

Quod si forte aliqua de obiectis contra memoratum Stephanum episcopum probata sunt, aliqua uero doceri minime potuerunt, cauta omnino consideratione pensandum est, utrum leuiora capitula, an certe grauiora probata sint, ut ex eis qualiter diffinitionem tuam debeas formare possis scire. §. 5. Gloriosus uero comitiolus, si suprascriptus episcopus innocens esse claruerit, quicquid de rebus eius uel ecclesiae ipsius tulit ei sine aliqua dilatione restituat etc. ut supra in causa Ianuarii episcopi. Si autem episcopum talem culpam etc. et infra in prima causa monachorum. De persona presbiteri, etc. et infra in causa: Clericus aduersus clericum. Et infra. [in eadem epistola 54. undecimi libri] §. 6. De persona Ianuarii episcopi sciendum est, grauiter omnino et contra leges actum, ut uiolenter de ecclesia traheretur; dum si quamlibet iniuriam a quocumque episcopus passus fuerit in ecclesia, iniuriantem lex capitali pena percutiat, et sicut maiestatis reum omnibus det illum accusandi licentiam, ut huius legis series loquitur codicis libro I. capitulo III. constitutione 11.: §. 7. "Si quis in hoc genus sacrilegii inruperit, ut in ecclesia catholica inruens sacerdotibus et ministris, uel ipsi cultui locoque aliquid inportet iniuriae, etc." Et infra: §. 8. De persona episcopi Stephani hoc attendendum est, quia nec inuitus ad iudicium trahi, nec ab episcopis alieni concilii debuit iudicari. §. 9. Contra hoc si dictum fuerit quia nec metropolitanum habuit, nec patriarcham, dicendum est, quia a sede apostolica (que omnium ecclesiarum caput est) hec causa audienda fuerat ac dirimenda, sicut et predictus episcopus petisse dinoscitur. Quia ergo episcopus alieni concilii iudices habuit omnino suspectos, sententia non a suo iudice dicta nichil firmitatis obtineat. §. 10. Quod autem dicitur a seruis suis accusatus, sciendum est, quia audiri minime debuerunt. §. 11. Si uero de crimine maiestatis accusatus dicitur, nec ipsum de eo credendum fuit, si uita uel opinio eius talis ante non extitit. §. 12. Quod autem dicit idem episcopus, quia se absente aliqui uilissimi sint testes exhibiti, hoc si uerum est, nullius est momenti. §. 13. Quales autem testes uel cuius opinionis ad testimonium admittendi sunt, plurimae leges ostendunt, que pene nulli habentur incognitae, que etiam illud sanciunt, ut uilissimis testibus sine corporali discussione credi non debeat. §. 14. Quod autem dicitur, quia nichil scriptis iudicatum est, legendum est titulo XLIV. libri VII. codicis constitutio ultima, quia scriptis debuit iudicari. Nam ibi inter alia precipitur, ut sententia, que sine scripto dicta fuerit, nec nomen sententiae habere mereatur.

[PALEA.

C. VIII. A final sentence ought to be delivered from a writing.

Likewise book VII of the Code, under the title On Sentences to Be Recited from a Written Summary: the Emperors Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian, Augusti. We ordered by general statutes that all judges to whom we have permitted the capacity to render law in the provinces, once the cases have been heard, shall pronounce their final determinations by recitation from a writing. To this decree we add that a sentence which was spoken when it had not been written should not deserve even to have the name of a sentence, and that the solemnity of an appeal should not be required for the rescission of things wrongly decreed.]

[PALEA. Likewise, from the Council at Saint-Médard, Hincmar, Archbishop of Reims, said:

C. VIII. Ultima sententia debet de scripto preferri.

Item Codicis libro VII., titulo de sententiis ex breuiculo recitandis, Imppp. Valentinianus, Valens et Gratianus AAA. Statutis generalibus iussimus, ut uniuersi iudices, quibus reddendi iuris in prouinciis permisimus facultatem, cognitis causis ultimas diffinitiones de scripti recitatione proferant. Huic adicimus sanctioni, ut sententia, que dicta fuerit, cum scripta non esset, nec nomen quidem sententiae habere mereatur, nec ad rescissionem perperam decretorum appellationis solempnitas requiratur.]

[PALEA. Item ex Concilio apud S. Medardum Hincmarus Remorum Archiepiscopus dixit:

C. IX. Concerning the same.

The custom and authority of ecclesiastical laws is such that in cases involving formal proceedings they always require a writing, to such a degree that one who approaches the sacred font is commanded to give his name. One who is advanced to the highest priesthood is elected by a decree confirmed by the hands of all. Once ordained, he is commanded to receive letters from those who ordained him. One who is also severed from ecclesiastical fellowship by any transgression is either received or cast out by the inscription of a written document. But one who is accused, excommunicated, or reconciled is also commanded to be accused or reconciled through a writing. And thus in the other things of this kind, a writing is required to such a degree that, as blessed Gregory writes in his memorandum to John the Defender, taking from the Roman laws: "A sentence which is pronounced without a writing should not deserve even to have the name of a sentence."]

C. IX. De eodem.

Legum ecclesiasticarum consuetudo et auctoritas talis est, ut in causis gestorum semper scripturam requirant, adeo, ut qui ad sacrum fontem accedit, suum dare nomen precipiatur. Qui ad summum sacerdotium prouehitur, decreto manibus omnium roborato eligitur. Ordinatus autem a suis ordinatoribus litteras accipere iubetur. Qui etiam ab ecclesiastica societate quolibet excessu discinditur, libelli inscriptione aut recipitur, aut eicitur. Sed et qui accusatur aut excommunicatur, seu reconciliatur, per scripturam accusari uel reconciliari iubetur. Et sic in ceteris huiusmodi in tantum scriptum deposcitur, ut sicut B. Gregorius in commonitorio ad Iohannem defensorem ex Romanis legibus sumens scribit: "Sententia, que sine scripto profertur, nec nomen sententiae habere mereatur."]

C. X. One who, it is established, was cast out neither after confession nor conviction is to be restored.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to Airard, Archbishop of Tours. Let it be known to your fraternal charity that this poor priest, named Christopher, has tearfully complained to our clemency concerning his distress, saying that he was assailed by false crimes and, neither convicted nor confessed, was unreasonably cast out from his church. For, as he reports, after your diligence made inquiry three times, no guilt could be found in him, either concerning the crime of fornication or concerning consent to homicide, except that, on account of his poverty, he either was unwilling to agree to the things demanded or was unable to fulfill them. Yet his voluntary rival did this, who unjustly seized his church beforehand. Therefore we greatly admonish Your Reverence that the things which, perhaps without your knowledge, appear to have been done from Gehazi-like cupidity be corrected by the censure of Your Fraternity with speedy amendment: namely, by restoring the already-mentioned priest to his own church and, through your piety, returning to him the former honor which he lost; and you shall by no means permit canonical institutes to be contemned by anyone's rashness, because an equal penalty binds the one who does and the one who consents.

C. X. Restituendus est, quem neque confessum, neque conuictum constat esse eiectum.

Item Nicolaus Papa Airardo Turonensi Archiepiscopo. Notum sit tuae fraternae karitati, quod iste presbiter pauper, nomine Christoforus, de sua angustia ad nostram clementiam lacrimabiliter sit conquestus, dicens, se falsis criminibus inpetitum, et ab ecclesia non conuictum neque confessum inrationabiliter fuisse reiectum. Nam, ut ipse refert, tua diligentia per tres uices inquisitione facta, nulla in se neque de fornicationis crimine, neque de homicidii consensione potuit culpa reperiri, nisi quia suae paupertatis causa que petebantur aut consentire noluit, aut adinplere non potuit. Quod suus tamen emulus ultroneus egit, qui ecclesiam illius iniuste preripuit. Idcirco magnopere monemus reuerentiam tuam, ut que, forte te ignorante, Gieziaca cupiditate peracta esse uidentur, tuae fraternitatis censura celeri emendatione corrigantur, scilicet restituendo ecclesiae propriae iam dictum sacerdotem, atque ei reddendo tua pietate, quem perdidit pristinum honorem, et nullatenus canonica instituta alicuius temeritate contempni permittas, quia facientem et consentientem par pena constringit.

C. XI. Before a case is proved, no one ought to be excommunicated.

Likewise from the Book of Constitutions. Let no bishop, no priest, excommunicate anyone before the cause for which the ecclesiastical canons command this to be done has been proved. But if anyone should excommunicate another contrary to this, let the one who was excommunicated return to the grace of holy communion by the authority of a higher priest; but let the one who excommunicated unlawfully abstain for as much time as shall seem good to the authority of the higher priest, so that he may justly suffer himself what he did unjustly.

C. XI. Antequam causa probetur, aliquis excommunicari non debet.

Item de libro constitucionum. Nemo episcopus, nemo presbiter excommunicet aliquem, antequam causa probetur, propter quam ecclesiastici canones hoc fieri iubent. Si quis autem excommunicauerit aduersus eam aliquem, ille, qui excommunicatus est, maioris sacerdotis auctoritate ad gratiam sanctae communionis redeat; is autem, qui non legitime excommunicauerit, in tantum abstineat tempus, quantum maioris sacerdotis auctoritati uisum fuerit, ut quod iniuste fecit ipse iuste patiatur.

C. XII. Uncertain and doubtful things cannot be judged.

Likewise Augustine, in letter [CXXXVII] to the clergy and the whole people of Hippo. For this reason I have not dared either to suppress or erase the name of the priest from the number of his colleagues, lest I seem to do an injury to divine power, under whose examination the case still hangs, if I wished to anticipate his judgment by my judgment. Not even judges in secular affairs do this when a doubt is referred to a higher power: that, while the report is pending, they should dare to change anything. It has also been established in a council of bishops that no cleric who has not yet been convicted ought to be suspended from communion, unless he has not presented himself for the examination of his case.

> C. XII. Incerta et dubia iudicari non possunt.
> Item Augustinus in epistola [CXXXVII.] ad clerum et uniuersalem plebem Ipponensem. Nomen presbiteri propterea non ausus sum de numero collegarum eius uel subprimere, uel delere, ne diuinae potestati, sub cuius examine causa adhuc pendet, facere uiderer iniuriam, si illius iudicium meo uellem iudicio preuenire; quod nec in negotiis secularibus iudices faciunt, quando ad maiorem potestatem dubitatio defertur, ut pendente relatione aliquid audeant conmutare. In episcoporum quoque concilio constitutum est, nullum clericum, qui nondum conuictus est, suspendi a communione debere, nisi ad causam suam examinandam se non presentauerit.

C. XIII. Let no one be condemned either by the judgment of suspicion or before a true and just judgment.

Likewise Pope Melchiades, [to the bishops of Spain]. First, always investigate all things diligently, so that you may determine them with justice and charity. Condemn no one before a just and true judgment. Judge no one by the judgment of suspicion; but first prove, and afterward pronounce a charitable sentence; and what you do not wish to be done to you, do not do to another.

> C. XIII. Nec ex suspicionis arbitrio, nec ante uerum et iustum iudicium aliquis condempnetur.
> Item Melciades Papa. [Episcopis Hispaniae] Primo semper omnia diligenter inquirite, ut cum iustitia et karitate diffiniatis; neminem condempnetis ante iustum et uerum iudicium; nullum iudicetis suspicionis arbitrio; sed primum probate, et postea karitatiuam proferte sententiam, et quod uobis non uultis fieri alteri nolite facere.

C. XIV. Who are prohibited from accusing, and who are received.

From book XLVIII of the Digest, under the title On Accusations and Formal Charges, [law Who May Accuse]. Some are prohibited from accusing on account of sex or age, such as a woman and a ward. Others on account of an oath, such as those who earn military pay. Others on account of the magistracy and power in which, while serving, they cannot be summoned to court with impunity. Others on account of their own offense, such as infamous persons. Others on account of base gain, such as those who have signed two prosecutions against two defendants, or who have accepted money for accusing or not accusing. Others on account of their status, such as freedmen against patrons. Others on account of suspicion of calumny, such as those who, having been suborned, gave false testimony. Some on account of poverty, such as those who possess less than fifty gold pieces. Nevertheless, none of all these are excluded from accusation if they pursue their own injury or defend the death of their relatives. Freeborn persons and freedmen are not to be prohibited, for the sake of defending their own property, from complaining of an act of their parents or patrons, as, for example, if they say that they were driven by force from a possession by them—certainly not so that they may prosecute them for the crime of violence, but so that they may recover the possession. For a son is likewise not prohibited from complaining of an act of his mother if he says that a child was falsely substituted by her so that he would have an additional coheir; but it is not permitted him to make her a defendant under the Cornelian Law.

§ 1. One person cannot denounce a man who has been denounced by another; but one is not prohibited from denouncing a man who was removed from among the defendants by the intervention of a public or private abolition, or because the accuser desisted.

§ 2. The deified Severus and Antoninus prescribed that a woman denouncing a matter pertaining to the public utility of the grain supply is to be heard by the prefect of the grain supply. Persons of ill fame who make accusations are also admitted without any doubt. Soldiers too are to be admitted to this accusation. Slaves who denounce are also heard. Part II. GRATIAN. By all these authorities it is given to be understood that no one is to be condemned unless, after judgment has been conducted in an orderly manner, he is either convicted or himself confesses that he is guilty. But these things are to be understood of those whose crimes are hidden; manifest crimes, by contrast, do not require judicial order. Hence Ambrose:

> Digestionis libro XLVIII. titulo de accusationibus et inscriptionibus. [l. qui accusare] Prohibentur accusare alii propter sexum uel etatem, ut mulier et pupillus. Alii propter sacramentum, ut qui stipendium merentur. Alii propter magistratum et potestatem in qua agentes sine fraude in ius euocaris non possunt. Alii propter delictum proprium, ut infames. Alii propter turpem questum, ut qui duo iudicia aduersus duos reos subscripta habent, nummosue ob accusandum uel non accusandum acceperint. Alii propter conditionem suam, ut libertini contra patronos. Alii propter suspicionem calumpniae, ut illi, qui falsum testimonium subornati dixerunt. Nonnulli propter paupertatem, ut sunt qui minus quam quinquaginta aureos habent. Hi tamen omnes, si suam iniuriam exequantur, mortemue propinquorum defendant, ab accusatione non excluduntur. Liberi libertique non sunt prohibendi suarum rerum defendendarum gratia de facto parentum patronorumue queri, ueluti si dicant, ui se a possessione ab his expulsos, scilicet non ut crimen uis eis intendant, sed ut possessionem recipiant. Nam et filius non quidem prohibitus est de facto matris queri, si dicat subpositum ab ea partum, quo magis coheredem habeat; sed eam ream lege Cornelia facere ei permissum non est. §. 1. Ab alio delatum alius deferre non potest: sed eum, qui abolicione publica uel priuata interueniente, aut desistente accusatore de reis exemptus est, deferre non prohibetur. §. 2. Mulierem propter publicam utilitatem ad annonam pertinentem audiri a prefecto annonae deferentem diuus Seuerus et Antoninus rescripserunt. Famosi quoque accusantes sine ulla dubitatione admittuntur. Milites quoque, ad hanc accusationem admittendi sunt. Serui quoque deferentes audiuntur. II. Pars. Gratian. His omnibus auctoritatibus datur intelligi, quod nullus est condempnandus, nisi iudicio ordinabiliter habito aut conuincatur, aut reum se ipse confiteatur. Verum hec de illis intelligenda sunt, quorum crimina sunt occulta; ceterum que manifesta sunt iudiciarium ordinem non requirunt. Unde Ambrosius.

C. XV. Manifest things are judged without an accusation.

Manifest things do not need an accusation.

> C. XV. Sine accusatione manifesta iudicantur.
> Manifesta accusatione non indigent.

C. XVI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to King Charles, [in the letter which begins Syllabarum]. The things which King Lothair, your nephew, has done do not need an accusation. For his works are manifest. GRATIAN. In manifest matters the defendant is not oppressed by the craftiness of accusers, nor is the crime concealed by his own tergiversation, since his guilt of its own accord forces itself upon the eyes of all. And therefore judicial order is not required in such matters; it was instituted only so that neither innocence would lie open to the snares of adversaries nor the guilt of the offender escape the sentence of a just examination. Hence Pope Stephen [V] to Leo, Bishop of Teano:

C. XVI. De eodem.

Item Nicolaus Papa Karolo Regi. [in epistola, quae incipit: "Syllabarum"] Que Lotharius uester nepos rex fecit accusatione non indigent. Manifesta enim sunt opera eius. Gratian. In manifestis enim calliditate accusantium reus non opprimitur, nec tergiuersatione propria crimen celatur, cum culpa sua sponte se oculis omnium ingerat, atque ideo in talibus iudiciarius ordo non requiritur, qui ideo tantum institutus est, ut nec innocentia insidiis pateret aduersantium, nec culpa delinquentis sententiam effugeret iusti examinis. Unde Stephanus Papa [V.] Leoni Episcopo Thianensi:

C. XVII. A manifest case does not desire judicial order.

In a case manifest and known to many, witnesses are not to be sought, as Saint Ambrose says in the letter to the Corinthians, expounding the Apostle's judgment concerning fornication: “It is not,” I say, “for a judge to condemn without an accuser, because the Lord did not cast out Judas, although he was a thief, since he was not accused. But once this deed was known, the Apostle judged that the man was to be driven from the assembly of the brotherhood. For all knew his crime and did not bring a charge. He publicly had his stepmother in the place of a wife; in this matter neither was there need of witnesses nor could the crime be covered by any tergiversation.” And a little later: “Absent in face, but present by the authority of the Spirit, who is nowhere absent, I have already judged as though present that the one who committed this be handed over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh.” Part III. GRATIAN. But it must be known that, of those things which are manifest, some are known to the judge and unknown to others; others are hidden from the judge and manifest to others; while certain things are known to the judge and to others. Things known only to the judge cannot be punished without examination, because, when the person of an accuser is assumed, judicial power is lost. For in one and the same case no one can be at the same time accuser and judge. Hence Augustine, in the homily On Penance, [which is L, c. 12]:

C. XVII. Ordinem iudiciarium manifesta non desiderat causa.

In manifesta et nota plurimis causa non sunt querendi testes, ut S. Ambrosius in epistola ad Corinthios dicit, de fornicacione exponens sententiam Apostoli: "Iudicis," inquam, "non est sine accusatore dampnare, quia Dominus Iudam cum fuisset fur quia non est accusatus, minime abiecit. Cognito autem opere isto pellendum illum Apostolus de cetu fraternitatis censuit. Omnes enim crimen eius sciebant, et non arguebant. Publice enim nouercam suam loco uxoris habebat, in qua re neque testibus opus erat, neque tergiuersatione aliqua poterat tegi crimen." Et paulo post:

"Absens facie, presens autem auctoritate Spiritus, qui nusquam abest iam iudicaui ut presens eum, qui hoc admisit, tradi satanae in interitum carnis." III. Pars. Gratian. Sed sciendum est, quod eorum, que manifesta sunt, alia sunt nota iudici, et incognita aliis; alia sunt occulta iudici et manifesta aliis; quedam uero sunt nota iudici, et aliis. Que iudici tantum nota sunt, sine examinatione feriri non possunt, quia, dum accusatoris persona assumitur, iudiciaria potestas amittitur. In una enim eademque causa nullus simul potest esse accusator et iudex. Unde Augustinus in omelia de penitentia: [que est L. c. 12.]

C. XVIII. When some are to be corrected, and when tolerated.

Many are corrected, as Peter; many are tolerated, as Judas; many are unknown, "until the Lord comes, who will illuminate the hidden things of darkness." And below: § 1. But we cannot prohibit anyone from communion—although this prohibition is not yet mortal but medicinal—unless he has either confessed voluntarily or been formally named and convicted in some secular or ecclesiastical judgment. For who dares to assume both things for himself, so that he himself is both accuser and judge of someone? It is understood that the Apostle Paul also briefly intimated a rule of this kind in the letter to the Corinthians when, after recalling certain crimes, he gave from certain ones a form for all similar ecclesiastical matters. For he says: "I wrote to you in the letter not to associate with fornicators—not, certainly, the fornicators of this world, or the covetous, or robbers, or servants of idols; otherwise you would have had to go out of this world." For people remaining in this world cannot live except with such persons, nor can they win them for Christ if they avoid their conversation and living together. Hence the Lord also, eating with publicans and sinners, says: "A physician is not necessary for the healthy, but for those who are ill. For I came not to call the just, but sinners." And therefore the Apostle continues and adds: "But now I have written to you not to associate: if any brother is formally named as either a fornicator, or a servant of idols, or covetous, or a reviler, or a drunkard, or rapacious, with such a person not even to take food. For what is it to me to judge those who are outside? Do you not judge those who are inside? But God will judge those who are outside. Remove the evil from among yourselves." By these words he shows sufficiently that evil persons are to be removed from the communion of the Church not rashly or in just any manner, but through a judgment, so that, if they cannot be removed through a judgment, they should rather be tolerated, lest, by perversely avoiding the evil, the one himself departing from the Church bind to hell those whom he appears to flee. For examples have also been proposed to us for this in the Scriptures: that, as chaff in the harvest, it be endured until the final winnowing fan; or that, within those nets where good fish are with bad, they be tolerated with an even mind until the separation which will occur on the shore, that is, at the end of the age.

§ 2. For that which the Apostle says is not contrary to this passage: "Who are you, who judge another's servant? He stands or falls to his own lord." For he did not wish a man to be judged by a man according to the judgment of suspicion or even by an extraordinary usurped judgment, but rather according to God's law and the order of the Church, whether he confessed of his own accord or was accused and convicted. Otherwise, why did he say, "If any brother is formally named as either a fornicator, or a servant of idols, etc.," unless because he wishes that naming to be understood which is made against someone when a sentence is pronounced with judicial order and integrity? For if mere naming suffices, many innocent persons are to be condemned, because crimes are often falsely named against someone.

§ 3. Therefore, let those whom we admonish to do penance not seek companions for themselves in punishments, nor rejoice because they find many like themselves. For they will not burn less because they will burn with many.

C. XVIII. Quando aliqui sunt corrigendi, quando tollerandi.

Multi corriguntur ut Petrus; multi tollerantur, ut Iudas; multi nesciuntur, "donec ueniat Dominus, qui illuminabit abscondita tenebrarum." Et infra: §. 1. Nos uero a communione quemquam prohibere non possumus (quamuis hec prohibitio nondum sit mortalis, sed medicinalis) nisi aut sponte confessum, aut in aliquo siue seculari, siue ecclesiastico iudicio nominatum atque conuictum. Quis enim sibi utrumque audet assumere, ut cuiquam ipse sit et accusator, et iudex? Huiusmodi regulam etiam Paulus apostolus in epistola ad Corinthios breuiter insinuasse intelligitur, cum quibusdam commemoratis criminibus ecclesiasticis formam ad omnia similia ex quibusdam daret. Ait enim: "Scripsi uobis in epistola ne commisceamini fornicariis. Non utique huius mundi fornicariis, aut auaris, aut raptoribus, aut ydolis seruientibus, alioquin debueratis de hoc mundo exire." Non enim possunt homines in hoc mundo manentes nisi cum talibus uiuere, nec eos possunt lucrifacere Christo, si eorum colloquium conuictumque uitauerint. Unde et Dominus cum publicanis et peccatoribus comedens: "Non est, inquit, necessarius sanis medicus, sed male habentibus. Non enim ueni uocare iustos, sed peccatores." Et ideo sequitur Apostolus, et adiungit: "Nunc autem scripsi uobis non commisceri. Si quis frater nominatur aut fornicator, aut ydolis seruiens, aut auarus, aut maledicus, aut ebriosus, aut rapax, cum huiusmodi nec cibum sumere. Quid enim mihi de his, qui foris sunt, iudicare? Nonne de his, qui intus sunt, uos iudicatis? De his autem, qui foris sunt, iudicabit Deus. Auferte malum a uobis ipsis." Quibus uerbis satis ostendit, non temere, aut quomodolibet, sed per iudicium auferendos esse malos ab ecclesiae communione, ut, si per iudicium auferri non possunt, tollerentur potius, ne peruerse malos euitando ab ecclesia ipse discedens, eos, quos fugere uidetur, uinciat ad gehennam. Quia et ad hoc nobis in scripturis sunt exempla proposita, uelud in messe ut palea sufferatur usque ad ultimum uentilabrum, uel intra illa retia, ubi pisces boni cum malis usque ad segregationem, que futura est in litore, id est in fine seculi, equo animo tollerentur. §. 2. Non enim est contrarium huic loco illud, quod dicit Apostolus: "Tu, quis es, qui iudicas seruum alienum? suo domino stat aut cadit." Noluit enim hominem ab homine iudicari ex arbitrio suspicionis uel etiam extraordinario usurpato iudicio, sed potius ex lege Dei secundum ordinem ecclesiae, siue ultro confessum, siue accusatum atque conuictum. Alioquin illud cur dixit: "Si quis frater nominatur aut fornicator, aut ydolis seruiens etc." nisi quia eam nominationem uult intelligi, que fit in quemquam, cum sententia ordine iudiciario atque integritate profertur? Nam si nominatio sufficit, multi innocentes dampnandi sunt, quia sepe falso in quoquam crimina nominantur. §. 3. Non ergo illi, quos monemus agere penitentiam, querant sibi comites ad suplicia, nec gaudeant, quia plures inueniunt sibi similes. Nam non propterea minus ardebunt, quia cum multis ardebunt.

C. XIX. A sin which is known only to the judge cannot be condemned by him.

The same in the same work. “If your brother has sinned against you, correct him between you and him alone.” Why? Because he sinned against you. What does “he sinned against you” mean? You know that he sinned. Because it was secret when he sinned against you, seek secrecy when you correct what he sinned. For if you alone know that he sinned against you and you wish to rebuke him before all, you will not be a corrector but a betrayer. Attend to how the just Joseph spared with so great a kindness so great a disgrace which he had suspected concerning his wife, before he knew from where she had conceived, whom he perceived to be pregnant and knew that he had not approached her. There remained, therefore, a certain suspicion of adultery; and yet, because he himself did not know, what does the Gospel say? “But Joseph, since he was just and did not wish to expose her publicly, wished to dismiss her secretly.”

§ 1. Therefore, the very things which are sinned before all are to be corrected before all. The very things which are sinned more secretly are to be corrected more secretly. Distinguish the occasions, and Scripture is in accord. Thus let us act, and thus it must be done, not only when a sin is committed against us, but also when a sin is committed against someone in such a way that it is unknown by another.

§ 2. A bishop has come to know some murderer, and no one else knows him. I wish to correct him publicly, and do you seek to make a formal accusation? By no means do I betray or neglect him: I correct him in secret, I place God's judgment before his eyes, I terrify his bloodstained conscience, I persuade him to penance. We ought to be endowed with this charity. Hence sometimes people reprehend us because, as it were, we do not reprehend; either they think that we know what we do not know, or they think that we are silent if we know. Perhaps you know what I also know: I do not correct him before you because I wish to cure, not to accuse.

§ 3. There are men who are adulterers in their own homes; they sin in secret; sometimes they are disclosed to us by their wives, most often through jealousy, sometimes seeking their husbands' salvation. We do not disclose them, but rebuke them in secret. Where the evil occurs, there let it die. Yet we do not neglect that wound, showing before all things to the man established in such sin and bearing a wounded conscience that the wound is mortal. Part IV. GRATIAN. But when a crime is known to others and not to the judge, even then it is not to be punished without examination, since a judge ought not to pronounce sentence upon a crime hidden from himself. Hence Pope Evaristus says, [letter II]:

> Idem in eodem. Si peccauerit in te frater tuus, corripe eum inter te et ipsum solum. Quare? quia in te peccauit. Quid est: "In te peccauit?" Tu scis, quia peccauit. Quia enim secretum fuit, quando peccauit in te, secretum quere, cum corrigis quod peccauit. Nam si solus nosti quia peccauit in te, et eum uis coram omnibus arguere, non eris corrector, sed proditor. Adtende, quemadmodum iustus Ioseph tanto flagitio, quod de uxore fuerat suspicatus, tanta benignitate pepercit, antequam sciret unde illa conceperat, quam grauidam senserat, et se ad illam non accessisse nouerat. Restabat igitur certa adulterii suspicio, et tamen, quia ipse non nouerat, quod dicit euangelium? "Ioseph autem, cum esset iustus, et nollet eam diuulgare, uoluit occulte dimittere eam." §. 1 Ergo ipsa corripienda sunt coram omnibus que peccantur coram omnibus. Ipsa corripienda sunt secretius que peccantur secretius. Distribuite tempora, et concordet scriptura. Sic agamus, et sic agendum est, non solum quando in nos peccatur, sed etiam quando peccatur aliquo, ut ab altero nesciatur. §. 2. Nescio quem homicidam nouerit episcopus, et nemo alius illum nouit. Ego uolo illum publice corripere, et tu queris inscribere?
> Prorsus nec prodo, nec negligo: corripio in secreto, pono ante oculos Dei iudicium, terreo cruentam conscientiam, persuadeo penitentiam. Hac karitate prediti esse debemus. Unde aliquando homines reprehendunt nos, quod quasi non reprehendamus, aut putant nos scire quod nescimus, aut putant nos tacere si scimus. Forte quod scis et ego scio: non coram te corripio, quia curare uolo, non accusare. §. 3. Sunt homines adulteri in domibus suis, in secreto peccant, aliquando nobis ab uxoribus suis, plerumque zelantibus, aliquando maritorum salutem querentibus produntur. Nos non prodimus, sed in secreto arguimus. Ubi contingit malum ibi moriatur. Non tamen illud uulnus negligimus, ante omnia ostendentes, homini in tali peccato constituto, sauciatamque conscientiam gerenti, illud uulnus esse mortiferum. IV. Pars. Gratian. Quando uero crimen est notum aliis, et non iudici, nec tunc sine examinatione feriendum est, quin in crimen sibi occultum iudex sententiam ferre non debet. Unde Euaristus Papa ait: [epist. II.]

C. XX. Sentence is not to be pronounced precipitately.

Almighty God, in order to restrain us from the pronouncement of a precipitate sentence, although all things are naked and open to his eyes, nevertheless did not wish to judge the evils of Sodom from hearsay before he manifestly knew the things which were being said. Hence he himself says: "I will descend and see whether they have fulfilled in deed the outcry which has come to me, or whether it is not so, that I may know." Almighty God, from whom nothing is hidden but to whom all things are manifest before they occur, deigned to investigate these and many other things by himself—which we have not inserted in the chapter because of their length—not because he did not know them, but so that he might give us an example, lest we be precipitate in examining and judging affairs, and lest anyone presume to believe the evils of his neighbors before proving them. By his example we are admonished never to be precipitate in pronouncing sentence, or rashly and carelessly to judge in any way matters not examined, as the voice of Truth says: "Do not judge, that you may not be judged; for with what judgment you have judged, you will be judged," and the rest. Let evil things heard move no one, nor let anyone ever believe things said indiscriminately without certain proof; but let him first investigate carefully what has been heard, and let no one do anything precipitately. For if God, the knower of all things, although knowing beforehand all the evils of the Sodomites, whose outcry had reached even to heaven, wished neither to believe nor to judge until he himself, carefully investigating them with faithful witnesses, proved in deed what he had heard, we, who are human beings and sinners, to whom the hidden judgments of God are unknown, must guard against these things and judge or condemn no one before true and just proof, as the Apostle Paul manifestly says: "Who are you, who judge another's servant? For he stands or falls to his own lord." Part V. GRATIAN. But when a crime is known to the judge and to others, sometimes the defendant denies the deed, as if someone should deny that he killed the man whom he had killed before the judge's eyes and in the sight of many. Here, because he denies that he is guilty, he cannot be punished without examination. Sometimes the very evidence of the deed bears witness that the man is guilty, when by a public deed he confesses his crime; then, after a second and third correction, he is to be condemned without examination if he has proved incorrigible. Therefore, in this final case that authority of Ambrose and Nicholas is to be understood: "Manifest things do not need an accusation." For that fornicator against whom the apostolic sentence proceeded without examination publicly had his stepmother as a wife before all. Lothair also, concerning whom Nicholas writes, had similarly put away his wife publicly and brought in another. Hence the same Nicholas writes to the archbishops and bishops established throughout Gaul, Italy, and Germany:

> C. XX. Sententia non precipitanter ferenda est.
> Deus omnipotens, ut nos a precipitandae sententiae prolatione conpesceret, cum omnia nuda et aperta sint oculis eius, mala tamen Sodomae noluit audita iudicare prius, quam manifeste cognosceret que dicebantur, unde ipse ait: "Descendam, et uidebo, utrum clamorem, qui uenit ad me, opere conpleuerint, an non est ita, ut sciam." Deus omnipotens, cui nichil est absconditum, sed omnia ei manifesta sunt antequam fiant, non ideo hec et alia multa (que ob prolixitatem capitulo non inseruimus) per se inquirere dignatus est, non quod ea ignoraret, sed ut nobis exemplum daret, ne precipites in discutiendis et iudicandis negotiis essemus, et ne mala proximorum prius quisquam presumat credere quam probare. Cuius exemplo monemur, ne ad proferendam sententiam umquam precipites simus, aut temere indiligenterque indiscussa quoquo modo iudicemus, dicente ueritatis uoce: "Nolite iudicare, ut non iudicemini: in quo enim iudicio iudicaueritis iudicabimini," et reliqua. Mala uero audita nullum moueant, nec passim dicta absque certa probatione quisquam umquam credat, sed ante audita diligenter inquirat, nec precipitanter quid aliquis agat. Si enim Deus omnium cognitor Sodomorum mala, quorum clamor ad celum usque peruenerat, omnia sciens prius, nec credere, nec iudicare uoluit, quam ipse ea cum fidelibus testibus diligenter inuestigans, que audierat, opere conprobaret, nos qui sumus homines et peccatores, quibus incognita sunt occulta iudicia Dei, hec precauentes, nullum ante ueram iustamque probationem iudicare aut dampnare debemus, manifeste Paulo apostolo dicente: "Tu, quis es, qui iudicas alienum seruum? suo enim domino stat aut cadit." V. Pars. Gratian. Quando autem crimen notum est iudici aliis, aliquando reus inficiatur factum, ueluti si quis negaret se interfecisse eum, quem sub oculis iudicis in conspectu multorum interfecerat. Hic, quia se reum negat, sine examinatione feriri non potest. Aliquando ipsa euidentia operis reum testatur, quando opere publico crimen suum confitetur, tunc post secundam et tertiam correctionem sine examinatione dampnandus est, si incorrigibilis extiterit. In hoc itaque ultimo casu intelligenda est auctoritas illa Ambrosii et Nicolai: "Manifesta accusatione non indigent." Fornicator enim ille, in quem sine examinatione sententia apostolica processerat, publice coram omnibus nouercam suam pro uxore habebat. Lotharius quoque, de quo Nicolaus scribit, similiter uxorem suam publice dimiserat, et aliam superduxerat. Unde idem Nicolaus scribit Archiepiscopis et Episcopis per Galliam, Italiam, Germaniam constitutis:

C. XXI. Manifest things are to be punished without an accuser.

The crime which King Lothair committed—if indeed he can truthfully be called a king, who restrains the appetites of the body by no salutary governance, but through slippery enervation yields rather to its illicit impulses—in two women, namely Theutberga and Waldrada, is manifest to all. But nearly the whole world, flowing from all sides to the threshold or Apostolic See, also reported that the bishops Theutgaud and Gunthar had long been his guardians and supporters in such a deed. Therefore, by decree of the holy synod together with us, they exist without doubt as deposed in its presence, excommunicated from priestly office, and removed from the governance of the episcopate.

C. XXI. Sine accusatore manifesta ferienda sunt.

Scelus, quod Lotharius rex (si tamen ueraciter rex dici possit, qui nullo salubri regimine corporis appetitus refrenat, sed lubrica eneruatione magis illicitis eius motibus cedit) in duabus feminis, Teberga scilicet et Waldrada commisit, omnibus manifestum est. Sed et dudum episcopos Teugaldum et Guntarium in tali facto eum habuisse tutores atque fautores, pene totus orbis undique ad limina seu sedem confluens apostolicam referebat. Igitur decernente nobiscum sancta sinodo, in presentia depositi, et ab offitio sacerdotali excommunicati, atque a regimine episcopatus alienati indubitanter existunt.

Question II

GRATIAN. That one who has been despoiled cannot stand before a judge is proved by many authorities. For Pope John says, [letter I to Archbishop Zacharias]:

GRATIANUS. Quod autem expoliatus ante iudicem stare non possit, multis auctoritatibus probatur. Ait enim Iohannes papa: [I. ad Zachariam Archiepisc.]

C. I. Before joinder of issue, all things are to be restored to the possessor.

It was decreed of old that, before joinder of issue, the bishop or primate presiding shall restore to the possessor all possessions, all things taken from him, and all revenues.

C. I. Ante litem contestatam possessori cuncta sunt restituenda.

Antiquitus decretum est, ut omnes possessiones, et omnia sibi sublata, atque cunctos fructus ante litem contestatam preceptor episcopus uel primas possessori restituat.

C. II. Concerning the same.

Likewise Nicholas, [Pope]. All laws, ecclesiastical as well as common and public, command that all things taken from a person who has been despoiled of his property be restored to him.

C. II. De eodem.

Item Nicolaus. [Papa] Omnes leges tam ecclesiasticae, quam uulgares et publice precipiunt, ut omnia sibi ablata restituantur ei, qui suis est rebus expoliatus.

C. III. No one ought to be accused while he has been despoiled of his property.

Likewise Pope Stephen, [letter II]. No bishop, while he has been despoiled of his property, ought to be accused before all things which were taken from him by whatever device are restored in accordance with the laws, so that before an accusation is received the primates and synod shall restore completely to the bishop who is under consideration all possessions and all revenues.

C. III. Nullus debet accusari, dum suis rebus fuerit expoliatus.

Item Stephanus Papa. [epistola II.] Nullus episcoporum, dum suis fuerit rebus expoliatus debet accusari, priusquam omnia, que ei ablata sunt quocumque ingenio, legibus redintegrentur: ita ut omnes possessiones, atque omnes fructus ante acceptam accusationem primates et sinodus episcopo, de quo agitur, funditus restituant.

C. IV. One who has been despoiled ought neither to be summoned to a synod nor to be judged in any matter.

Likewise Eusebius to the brothers established throughout Alexandria and Egypt, [letter II]. In your writings we have found that certain bishops in your regions have been accused by their own sheep—some, to be sure, from suspicion and others upon certain ground—and that for this reason some have been despoiled of their property while others have been driven from their own see. Know that they can neither be summoned to a provincial synod nor to a general one, nor judged in any matter, before all things which were taken from them are restored to their power according to the laws.

C. IV. Nec conuocari ad sinodum, nec in aliquo iudicari debet expoliatus.

Item Eusebius fratribus constitutis per Alexandriam et Egiptum. [epist. II.] In scripturis uestris reperimus, quosdam episcopos uestris in partibus a propriis ouibus accusatos, aliquos uidelicet ex suspicione, et aliquos ex certa ratione, et idcirco quosdam suis esse rebus expoliatos, quosdam uero a propria sede depulsos. Quos sciatis nec ad sinodum conprouincialem, nec ad generalem posse conuocari nec in aliquo iudicari, antequam cuncta, que eis sublata sunt, legibus potestati eorum redintegrentur.

C. V. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Julius, [in the letter to the Easterners, cc. 35 and 8]. No one can be summoned or judged before all things taken from him and all his rights are restored to him in full, because one who has already been stripped has no privilege of which he can be stripped.

C. V. De eodem.

Item Iulius Papa. [in epistola ad Orientales, c. 35. et 8.] Nullus potest uocari aut iudicari, antequam omnia sibi ablata et omnia iura ei in integrum restituantur, quia non habet priuilegium, quo possit exui iam nudatus.

C. VI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Zephyrinus, [Pope to the bishops of Egypt, letter II]. It is therefore commanded in the ancient statutes that those cast out and despoiled of their property shall recover their own churches, and first all their property shall be returned to them; and then, if anyone wishes to accuse them justly, he shall do so under equal peril. They decree that the judges shall be bishops thinking rightly and assembling in the church where the witnesses of each person who seemed oppressed were, and that the defendants shall not answer before all their property has been restored most fully, according to the laws, to them and their churches.

C. VI. De eodem.

Item Zepherinus. [Papa ad Episcopos Aegypti, ep. II.] Preceptum est ergo in antiquis statutis, eiectos atque suis rebus expoliatos ecclesias proprias recipere, et primo sua omnia eis reddi, et demum, si quis eos iuste accusare uoluerit, equo periculo facere; iudices esse decernentes episcopos recta sapientes, et in ecclesia conuenientes, ubi testes essent singulorum, qui oppressi uidebantur, nec prius eos respondere, quam omnia sua eis et ecclesiis eorum legibus integerrime restituantur.

Question III

GRATIAN. Part I. With what penalty those who fail in an accusation are to be struck is determined by the censure of the canons. For they shall receive the penalty of the crime charged, together with loss of reputation. Hence Pope Gaius:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Qua autem pena feriendi sint qui in accusatione deficiunt, canonum censura diffinit. Penam enim illati criminis cum dispendio existimationis excipient. Unde Gaius Papa:

C. I. Concerning those who allege things that are not to be proved.

If anyone should bring against persons of this kind allegations not to be proved, let him understand by the authority of this decree that he sustains the loss of infamy, so that by damage to his honor and loss of reputation he may learn that, at least thereafter, he is not permitted to lie in wait for another's honor with impunity.

C. I. De his, qui non probanda obiciunt.

Si quis circa huiusmodi personas non probanda detulerit, auctoritate huius sanctionis intelligat se iacturam infamiae sustinere, ut dampno pudoris et estimationis dispendio discat, sibi alienae uerecundiae inpune insidiari saltim de cetero non licere.

C. II. If an accuser fails in an accusation, let him receive retaliation.

Likewise Pope Damasus, [to Archbishop Stephen, letter III]. If a calumniator fails in his accusation, let him receive retaliation.

C. II. Si accusator in accusatione defecerit, talionem recipiat.

Item Damasus Papa. [ad Stephanum Archiepiscopum, epist. III.] Calumpniator, si in accusatione defecerit, talionem recipiat.

C. III. Concerning the same.

Likewise from a decree of Pope Hadrian, [in the capitularies collected by him, c. 52, in the middle]. One who has not proved what he alleged shall suffer the penalty which he himself sought to inflict.

C. III. De eodem.

Item ex decreto Adriani Papae. [in capitulis ab ipso collectis, c. 52. in medio] Qui non probauerit quod obiecerit, penam, quam ipse intulerit, patiatur.

C. IV. Concerning those who assail someone with false crimes.

Likewise. If anyone should assail a bishop, priest, or deacon with false crimes and has not been able to prove them, we judge that communion is not to be given to him even at the end. Part II. GRATIAN. It is one thing not to complete an accusation and another not to prove a verbal reproach. The former is permitted to no one without abolition; the latter is permitted to all. Hence Pope Fabian, [to Bishop Hilary, letter III]:

C. IV. De his, qui falsis criminibus aliquem inpetunt.

Item. Si quis episcopum, aut presbiterum, aut diaconem falsis criminibus appetierit, et probare non potuerit, nec in finem dandam ei communionem censemus. II. Pars. Gratian. Aliud est accusationem non inplere, et aliud conuicium non probare. Illud enim nulli sine abolitione, hoc omnibus licet. Unde Fabianus Papa: [ad Hilarium Episcopum, epist. III.]

C. V. A verbal reproach is not to be held as an accusation.

If anyone in anger should rashly allege a crime against someone, a verbal reproach is not to be held as an accusation; rather, after a period for deliberating has been allowed, let him declare that he will prove in writing what he said in anger, so that, if perhaps, coming to his senses, he is unwilling to repeat or write the things he said through anger, he may not be held as guilty of the crime. Part III. GRATIAN. But it is one thing not to be able to prove a crime charged, and another to abandon an accusation because of some promise. For pardon is given to one who, deceived by a promise, abandons an accusation; but infamy is imposed upon one who was unable to prove the crime charged. Hence blessed Gregory writes to John, Bishop of Corinth, [book IV, letter 50]:

C. V. Conuicium non est pro accusatione habendum.

Si quis iratus crimen cuilibet temere obiecerit conuicium non est pro accusatione habendum, sed permisso tractandi spatio id, quod iratus dixit, per scripturam se probaturum esse fateatur, ut, si forte resipiscens que per iracundiam dixit iterare aut scribere noluerit, non ut reus criminis teneatur. III. Pars. Gratian. Sed aliud est crimen illatum non posse probare, aliud est aliqua promissione accusationem deserere. Huic enim, qui promissione deceptus accusationem deserit, uenia datur; illi uero, qui crimen illatum probare non ualuerit, infamia irrogatur. Unde B. Gregorius scribit Iohanni Corintiorum Episcopo: [lib. IV. epist. 50.]

C. VI. Concerning one who, enticed by a promise, desists from an accusation.

Therefore, although his own guilt gravely confounds Deacon Paul, because, deceived by a promise, he desisted from the accusation of his bishop, nevertheless we forgive him this guilt.

[PALEA. Therefore, everyone who alleges a crime shall write that he will prove it. In truth, a case is always conducted there where an accusation is admitted; and one who has not proved what he alleged shall himself suffer the penalty which he sought to inflict.]

> C. VI. De eo, qui promissione illectus ab accusatione desistit.
> Paulum itaque diaconum quamuis culpa sua uehementer confundat, quod deceptus promissione ab accusatione sui episcopi destiterit, tamen hanc ei culpam ignoscimus.
> [PALEA. Omnis igitur, qui crimen obicit, scribat se probaturum. Reuera ibi semper causa agitur, ubi crimen admittitur; et qui non probauerit quod obiecit, penam, quam intulerit, ipse patiatur.]

C. VII. Concerning those who abandon an accusation in order to receive ecclesiastical orders.

The same. Euphemius and Thomas, who received sacred orders in return for abandoning the accusation of their bishop, have been deprived of those same orders, and we will that they remain as they were deposed. GRATIAN. From this it is gathered that the infamy of clerics can be abolished by the Roman pontiff, contrary to that statement of Gelasius: "Although we can save souls through penance, nevertheless we cannot abolish infamy," and that statement of Stephen, after he had enumerated the causes from which infamy is imposed: "All these," he says, "we receive to penance under the mark of perpetual infamy." Or, not all those whom the secular laws declare infamous are made infamous by the law of the canons, since Deacon Paul, who desisted from an accusation without obtaining abolition, recovered the dignity of his office by this authority, although the Turpillian senatus consultum declares him infamous. We are compelled to acknowledge the same also concerning a woman who marries within the period of mourning, since marriages today are governed by the law of heaven, not the law of the forum; and by the law of heaven, when her husband is dead, a woman is released from the law of her husband: let her marry whom she wishes.

§ 1. But the same Stephen writes to the contrary, saying: "We call infamous whomever the secular laws declare infamous." But that statement of Gelasius and Stephen, "Although we can save souls," etc., and, "Under the mark of perpetual infamy," etc., is understood of those upon whom infamy is imposed by a civil judge; just as their examination and chastisement, so also their restoration in full, pertains only to the civil judge. Concerning the woman who marries within the period of mourning, however, this is not contrary to what Stephen says, "We call infamous," etc. For since the secular laws do not disdain to follow the sacred canons especially in marriages, they do not seem to declare infamous a woman who marries not illicitly by apostolic and canonical authority. Part IV. § 2. It must also be noted that it is one thing when a person has repented of making a criminal accusation and of making a formal inscription, if he has been absolved by an innocent defendant; another, if he accepted money from a guilty person in order to desist from proving what he had alleged. Hence in the Book of Capitularies, [c. 175, it is read]:

> Idem. Eufemium atque Tomam, qui pro deserenda accusatione episcopi sui sacros ordines acceperunt, eisdem ordinibus priuatos esse, atque ita, sicuti depositi sunt, uolumus permanere. Gratian. Hinc colligitur autem clericorum infamiam per Romanum pontificem aboleri posse, contra illud Gelasii: "Quamquam animas per penitentiam saluare possimus, infamiam tamen abolere non possumus," et illud Stephani cum causas enumerasset, ex quibus infamia inrogatur: "Hos omnes," inquit, "sub nota perpetuae infamiae ad penitentiam suscipimus." Vel non fiunt infames lege canonum omnes quos leges seculi infames pronunciant, cum Paulus diaconus, qui non inpetrata abolicione ab accusatione destitit, hac auctoritate dignitatem sui offitii recuperauit, quem senatus consultum Turpilianum infamem pronunciat. Quod etiam de ea fateri cogimur, que intra tempus luctus nubit, cum matrimonia hodie regantur iure poli, non iure fori, et iure poli mortuo uiro mulier soluta est a lege uiri: nubat cui uult. §. 1. Sed idem Stephanus contra scribit, dicem: "Infames dicimus quoscumque leges seculi infames pronunciant." Sed illud Gelasii et Stephani: "Quamquam animas," etc. et: "Sub nota perpetuae infamiae," etc. de illis intelligitur, quibus per ciuilem iudicem infamia inrogatur, quorum sicut examinatio et castigatio, ita et in integrum restitutio non nisi ad ciuilem iudicem spectat. De ea uero, que intra tempus luctus nubit, non est contrarium ei, quod Stephanus ait: "Infames dicimus," etc. Cum enim leges seculi precipue in matrimoniis sacros canones sequi non dedignentur, non uidentur pronunciare infamem, que apostolica et canonica auctoritate non illicite nubit. IV. Pars. §. 2. Notandum quoque est, quod aliud est, cum aliquem penituerit criminaliter accusasse et inscriptionem fecisse, si ab innocente fuerit absolutus: aliud, si pecuniam a nocente acceperit, ut a probatione eius, quod obiecerat desistat. Unde in Libro Capitulorum: [c. 175. legitur]

C. VIII. Concerning one who repents of making a criminal accusation.

If someone has repented of making a criminal accusation and of making a formal inscription concerning something which he was unable to prove, if he has come to an agreement with the innocent accused person, let them absolve one another. But if the judge has recognized that the accused person is criminal, and an agreement concerning collusion has been reached by subreption between the defendant and the accuser, let him receive the penalty established by the laws. Part V. GRATIAN. It must also be noted that, as is read in the Digest, book XLVIII, under the title On the Abolition of Crimes, [law I]: "The rashness of accusers is disclosed in three ways. For they either calumniate, prevaricate, or tergiversate. To calumniate is to press false crimes; to prevaricate is to conceal true crimes; to tergiversate is to desist altogether from an accusation.

§ 1. But certainly one who does not prove what he presses is not immediately seen to calumniate. For inquiry into that matter is committed to the judgment of the cognizant official, who, after the defendant has been absolved, begins to inquire into the accuser's intention: with what mind he was led to proceed to accusation. And if indeed he finds his error just, he absolves him; but if he detects him in evident calumny, he imposes upon him the lawful penalty. Either of these is manifested by the very words of the pronouncement. For if he has pronounced thus, 'You have not proved it,' he has spared him; but if he has pronounced, 'You have calumniated,' he has condemned him. And although he has added nothing concerning the penalty, nevertheless the force of the law will be exercised against him. For the question of fact is indeed in the judgment of the one adjudicating; but pursuit of the penalty is not entrusted to his will, but reserved to the authority of the law." But if, in an interlocutory ruling, he said, "Titius appears to have accused rashly," he did not pronounce him a calumniator. For rashness contains pardon for facility, and unconsidered heat lacks the vice of calumny; for this reason no penalty ought to be imposed upon him. Above, book XLVII, under the title On Prevaricators, [law 1]:

§ 2. "A prevaricator is, as it were, a straddler, who assists the opposing party after betraying his own case. Labeo says that this name is drawn from variable contention. For one who prevaricates stands on both sides—or rather on the other. But one is properly called a prevaricator who has accused in a public judgment. Otherwise, an advocate is not properly called a prevaricator. What, then, shall be done concerning him? Whether he has prevaricated in a private judgment or a public one—that is, has betrayed the case—he is customarily punished outside the ordinary procedure.

§ 3. It must be known that today an extraordinary penalty is imposed upon those who have prevaricated." And below: § 4. "An accuser convicted of prevarication shall not afterward make an accusation by law." And below: § 5. "In all cases—except a capital case—one who corrupts an informer is held by the senatus consultum as having lost the case." And below, book XLVIII, under the title On the Abolition of Crimes: § 6. "We show that person to be a prevaricator who colludes with the defendant, because he concealed his own proofs but admitted false accusations.

§ 7. But if anyone desists from an accusation without abolition, he is punished. Abolition is customarily petitioned and obtained privately from governors; likewise before the tribunal, not informally; nor can the governor delegate this cognizance to another. If the same man brought several crimes against the same man, he ought to seek abolition of each; otherwise, in respect of whatever he has omitted, he will suffer the penalty of the senatus consultum." And below, under the same title: "We understand that person to have desisted who has laid aside his whole intention of proceeding, not one who delayed the accusation; but one who desisted from accusation with the emperor's permission is unpunished."

§ 8. Abolition, however, remits the penalty; it does not remove infamy. Hence the Emperors Valens, Valentinian, and Gratian are read to have said in book IX of the Code, under the same title On General Abolition: "Indulgence, conscript fathers, marks those whom it frees; it does not remove the infamy of the crime, but grants remission of the penalty." But if the prince should say, "I restore you in full," he removes infamy. Hence in the same book, under the title On Those Who Have Suffered Sentence and Those Restored, Emperor Antoninus is read to have said to a certain man deported to an island: "I restore you in full to your province," and added: "But so that you may know what it is to restore in full: to your honors, your order, and all other things."

C. VIII. De eo, quem penitet criminaliter accusasse.

Si quem penituerit criminaliter accussasse, et inscriptionem fecisse de eo, quod probare non potuerit, si ei cum accusato innocente conuenerit, inuicem se absoluant. Si uero iudex eum, qui accusatus est, criminosum esse cognouerit, et inter reum et accusatorem per obreptionem conuenerit de colludio, penam excipiat legibus constitutam. V. Pars. Gratian. Notandum quoque est, quod, sicut in Digestis lege XLVIII. legitur, titulo de abolitione criminum: [l. I.] "Accusatorum temeritas tribus modis detegitur. Aut enim calumpniantur, aut preuaricantur, aut tergiuersantur. Calumpniari est falsa crimina intendere; preuaricari uera crimina abscondere; tergiuersari in uniuersum ab accusatione desistere. §. 1. Sed non utique qui non probat quod intendit protinus calumpniari uidetur. Nam eius rei inquisitio arbitrio cognoscentis committitur, qui, reo absoluto, de accusatoris incipit consilio querere, qua mente ductus ad accusationem processit, et si quidem iustum eius errorem reperit, absoluit eum: si uero in euidenti calumpnia eum deprehenderit, legitimam penam ei inrogat. Quorum alterutrum ipsis uerbis pronunciationis manifestatur. Nam si quidem ita pronunciauerit: 'Non probasti,' pepercit ei: sin autem pronunciauerit: 'Calumpniatus es,' condempnauit eum. Et quamuis nichil de pena subiecerit, tamen legis potestas aduersus eum exercebitur. Nam facti quidem questio in arbitrio est iudicantis: penae uero persecutio non eius uoluntati mandatur, sed legis auctoritati reseruatur." Si autem interloquendo dixerit: Titius temere accusasse uidetur, non calumpniatorem pronunciauit. Temeritas enim facilitatis ueniam continet, et inconsultus calor calumpniae uicio caret, et ob hoc nullam penam huic irrogari oportet. Supra libro XLVII. titulo de preuaricatoribus: [l. 1.] §. 2. "Preuaricator est quasi uaricator qui diuersam partem adiuuat prodita causa sua. Quod nomen Labeo a uaria concertatione tractum ait. Nam qui preuaricatur ex utraque parte consistit, quinimo ex altera. Is autem preuaricator proprie dicitur, qui publico iudicio accusauerit. Ceterum aduocatus non proprie preuaricator dicitur. Quid ergo de eo fiet? Siue priuato iudicio, siue publico preuaricatus sit, hoc est prodiderit causam, hic extra ordinem solet puniri. §. 3. Sciendum, quod hodie his, qui preuaricati sunt, pena iniungitur extraordinaria." Et infra: §. 4. "Accusator de preuaricatione conuictus, postea ex lege non accuset." Et infra: §. 5. "In omnibus causis (preterquam in sanguine) qui delatorem corrumpit ex Senatusconsulto pro uicto habetur." Et infra libro XLVIII. titulo de abolicionibus criminum: §. 6. "Preuaricatorem eum esse ostendimus, qui colludit cum reo, eo quod propria quidem probationes dissimularet, falsas uero accusationes admitteret. §. 7. Si quis autem ab accusatione citra abolicionem destiterit, punitur. Abolitio priuatim a presidibus postulari ac inpetrari solet; item pro tribunali, non de plano, nec preses hanc cognitionem alteri demandare potest. Si plura crimina idem eidem intulit, singulorum debet abolicionem petere, alioquin, prout quid omiserit, eius nomine senatusconsulti penam patietur." Et infra titulo eodem: "Destitisse eum accepimus, qui totum animum agendi deposuit, non qui distulit accusationem, sed qui permissu inperatoris ab accusatione destitit, inpunitus est." §. 8. Abolicio autem penam remittit, infamiam non tollit. Unde Inppp. Valens, Valentinianus, et Gracianus IX. libro C. eodem titulo de generali abolicione dixisse leguntur: "Indulgentia, patres conscripti, quos liberat notat, nec infamiam criminis tollit, sed penae gratiam facit." Si autem: restituo te in integrum, princeps dixerit, infamiam tollit. Unde in eodem libro titulo de sententiam passis et restitutis, cuidam deportato in insulam inperator Antoninus dixisse legitur: "Restituo te in integrum prouinciae tuae," et adiecit: "Ut autem scias, quid sit in integrum restituere, honoribus et ordini tuo, et omnibus ceteris."

QUESTION V. *

GRATIAN. Part I. When the accusers fail, the defendant does not appear to be compelled to purgation. For just as, when the claimant fails, a possessor is not compelled to prove the title of his possession, so one who is assailed is not believed to be compelled to purge his innocence. By the authority of Pope Cornelius and of the Council of Tribur, priests are also prohibited from swearing, except for the right faith. For Cornelius says, [letter II to Rufus, an eastern bishop]:

QUESTIO V. *

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Deficientibus uero accusatoribus reus non uidetur esse cogendus ad purgationem. Sicut enim possessor deficiente actore titulum suae possessionis probare non cogitur, ita qui in petitur ad innocentiam suam purgandam cogendus esse non creditur. Auctoritate quoque Cornelii Papae, et Triburiensis concilii sacerdotes iurare prohibentur, nisi pro recta fide. Ait enim Cornelius: [epist. II. ad Rufum, Episcopum orientalem]

C. I. An oath is not to be exacted from priests.

Up to this time we have by no means known an oath to be exacted from high priests or from the rest except for the right faith, nor have we found that they swore of their own accord.

> C. I. Iuramentum a sacerdotibus non est exigendum.
> Sacramentum hactenus a summis sacerdotibus uel reliquis exigi, nisi pro recta fide, minime cognouimus fieri nec sponte eos iurasse reperimus.

[C. II.]

Likewise. We, following the laws of the holy apostles and their successors, confirm them and prohibit incautious oaths.

> [C. II.]
> Item. Nos, sequentes sanctorum iura apostolorum eorumque successorum firmamus, et sacramenta incauta prohibemus.

[C. III.]

Likewise. We do not know an oath to have been offered by bishops, nor ought it ever to be done.

> [C. III.]
> Item. Nos sacramentum ab episcopis nescimus oblatum, nec umquam fieri debet.

C. IV. If any priest has a complaint against a layman, or a layman against a cleric.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur, [c. 21]. If any priest has a dispute arising from a complaint against a layman, or a layman against a priest, at the bishop's command let it be concluded without respect of persons. Let the layman purge himself by oath, if necessary; but in place of an oath let the priest be questioned by the holy consecration, because priests ought not to swear for a light cause. Shall the hand through which the body and blood of Christ is confected be polluted by an oath? Far be it, since the Lord says in the Gospel to his disciples—whose place we unworthy ones bear in holy Church: “Do not swear at all; but let your speech be: yes, yes; no, no. Whatever is more than these is from evil.” Part II. GRATIAN. In truth, by these authorities not all oaths are prohibited from being made by priests, but only incautious ones and those which are offered in a judgment for any temporal cause. But when priests are oppressed by popular infamy, then they ought to offer oaths for the assertion of their innocence. Hence Pope Gregory says, [letter I to Boniface III]:

> Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. [c. 21.] Si quis presbiter contra laicum, uel laicus contra presbiterum aliquam habet querimoniae controuersiam, episcopo precipiente sine personarum acceptione finiatur, laicus per iuramentum (si necesse sit) se expurget; presbiter uero uice iuramenti per sanctam consecrationem interrogetur, quia sacerdotes ex leui causa iurare non debent. Manus, per quam corpus et sanguis Christi conficitur, iuramento polluetur? Absit, cum Dominus in euangelio discipulis suis (quorum uicem nos indigni in sancta gerimus. ecclesia) dicat: "Nolite omnino iurare; sit autem sermo uester: est, est; non, non. Quod autem his habundantius est a malo est." II. Pars. Gratian. Verum his auctoritatibus non omnimoda iuramenta prohibentur fieri a sacerdotibus, sed tantum incauta et ea, que pro qualibet causa temporali iudicio offeruntur. Cum autem populari infamia sacerdotes obprimuntur, tunc ad innocentiae suae assertionem iuramenta debent offerre. Unde Gregorius Papa ait: [III. ad Bonifacium, ep. I.]

C. V. A priest accused by the people shall affirm his innocence by an oath.

If a priest, or any sacerdotal person, has been accused by the people and certain witnesses have not been found who speak the truth concerning the crime charged, let him make an oath in the midst and produce as witness to the purity of his innocence him to whom all things are naked and open.

C. V. Sacerdos a populo accusatus iuramento innocentiam suam affirmet.

Presbiter uel quilibet sacerdos si a populo accusatus fuerit, et certi testes inuenti non fuerint, qui crimini illato ueritatem dicant, iusiurandum in medio faciat, et illum testem proferat de innocentiae suae puritate, cui nuda et aperta sunt omnia.

C. VI. Concerning Bishop Leo, whom blessed Gregory caused to furnish purgation.

Likewise from the Register of Gregory, [book II, indiction 10, letter 23], to Emperor Justin, chapter VII. The envy of the ancient enemy has this as its peculiar trait: those whom it cannot cast down into the perpetration of wicked acts because God resists it, it rends their reputations for the present by fabricating falsehoods. Therefore, because a certain sinister rumor had cast aspersions contrary to the priestly purpose upon Leo, our brother and fellow bishop, we caused a strict inquiry to investigate at length whether those things were true, and we found in him no guilt concerning the things which had been said. But lest anything appear to have been omitted which could remain doubtful to our heart, we caused him, in addition, to furnish strict oaths at the most sacred body of blessed Peter. When these had been furnished, we rejoiced with great exultation, because his innocence of this kind shone forth evidently. For this reason, let Your Glory receive the aforesaid man with all charity and show him the reverence which befits a priest; nor let any doubt concerning those matters which have now been purged remain in your hearts. And thus you ought most devotedly to adhere to the above-written bishop in all things, so that you may be seen fittingly and becomingly to honor God in the person of him whose minister he is.

C. VI. De Leone episcopo, quem B. Gregorius fecit purgationem prebere.

Item ex Registro Gregorii, [lib. II. Indict. 10. epist. 23.] ad Iustinum Inperatorem capitulo VII. Habet hoc proprium antiqui hostis inuidia, ut quos inproborum actuum perpetratione (Deo sibi resistente) deicere non ualet, opiniones eorum falsas, ad presens simulando, dilaceret. Quoniam igitur quedam contra sacerdotale propositum de Leone fratre et coepiscopo nostro sinister rumor asperserat, utrum uera essent districta diutius fecimus inquisitione perquiri, et nullam in eo culpam inuenimus de his, que dicta fuerant. Sed ne quid uideretur omissum, quod nostro potuisset cordi remanere ambiguum, ad B. Petri sacratissimum corpus districta eum ex habundanti fecimus sacramenta prebere. Quibus prestitis magna fuimus exultatione gauisi, quod huiuscemodi innocentia eius euidenter enituit. Pro qua re gloria uestra predictum uirum cum omni karitate suscipiat, et reuerentiam ei, qualem sacerdotem decet exhibeat, nec aliqua cordibus remaneat de his, que iam sunt purgata, dubietas. Et ita suprascripto uos episcopo deuotissime oportet in omnibus adherere, ut congrue decenterque Deum in eius persona, cuius minister est, uideamini honorare.

C. VII. That blessed Gregory caused Bishop Menna to be purged by an oath.

Likewise from the same to Brunhild, Queen of the Franks, chapter CCXXXVII. But after we, inquiring into the things which had been said concerning Menna, our most reverend brother and fellow bishop, found him culpable in nothing—and he, moreover, furnishing satisfaction under oath at the most sacred body of blessed Peter the Apostle, showed himself foreign to those things which had been alleged against his reputation—we permitted him to return purged and absolved. For just as it was fitting that, if he existed as guilty in anything, we should punish the guilt in him canonically, so it was not fitting that, with innocence aiding him, we ought to retain him longer or afflict him in any respect.

§ 1. Nevertheless, where the accuser has ceased, we entrust to your judgment that this same man shall furnish before you a purgation concerning himself with two priests joined to him. Finally, the common law, supported by no canonical decree—namely, contact with boiling or cold water or with glowing iron, or any popular invention whatsoever, because these things are altogether fabricated by envy as their maker—we do not wish either him to offer or you to demand in any way; indeed, by apostolic authority we most firmly prohibit it.

> Item ex eodem ad Brunichildam Reginam Francorum, capitulo CCXXXVII. Mennam uero reuerentissimum fratrem et coepiscopum nostrum, postquam ea, que de eo dicta fuerant, requirentes, in nullo inuenimus esse culpabilem, qui insuper ad sacratissimum corpus B. Petri apostoli sub iureiurando satisfaciens, ab his, que obiecta fuerant eius opinioni, se demonstrauit alienum, reuerti illum purgatum absolutumque permisimus, quia, sicut dignum erat, ut, si in aliquo reus existeret, culpam in eo canonice puniremus, ita dignum non fuit, ut eum adiuuante innocentia diutius retinere uel affligere in aliquo deberemus. §. 1. Purgationem tamen ante te duobus sacerdotibus sibi iunctis, ubi accusator cessauerit, eundem hoc ex se prebere tuo committimus arbitrio. Vulgarem denique, ac nulla canonica sanctione fultam legem, feruentis scilicet siue frigidae aquae, ignitique ferri contactum, aut cuiuslibet popularis inuentionis (quia fabricante hec sunt omnino ficta inuidia), nec ipsum exhibere, nec aliquo te modo uolumus postulare, imo apostolica auctoritate prohibemus firmissime.

C. VIII. Concerning Maximus, Bishop of Salona, that he purge himself by an oath.

The same to Castorius, notary of Ravenna, [book VII, indiction 2, letter 80]. In proportion as you are trusted by us and see necessary causes entrusted to you, so ought you to show yourself energetic and solicitous. Therefore, if Maximus of Salona, after furnishing an oath, has affirmed that he is not held by the simoniacal heresy and, merely questioned concerning the other matters before the body of Saint Apollinaris, has answered that he is innocent, and if he has done penance for his disobedience as we appointed, we will that Your Experience should give him, for his consolation, the letter which we wrote to him, in which we signified that we had returned both our grace and communion to him. For just as it is fitting that we be severe toward those persisting in contumacy, so we ought not to deny a place of pardon to those who are humbled and penitent.

> C. VIII. De Maximo Salonitano episcopo, ut sacramento semet ipsum expurget.
> Idem Castorio Notario Rauennae. [lib. VII. Indict. 2. epist. 80.] Quanto a nobis creditur, et necessarias uides causas iniungi, tanto strenuum debes te et sollicitum exhibere. Proinde, si Maximus Salonitanus prestito sacramento firmauerit se symoniaca heresi non teneri, atque de aliis ante corpus sancti Apollinaris tantummodo requisitus, innoxium se esse responderit, et de inobedientia sua (sicut deputauimus) egerit penitenciam, uolumus, ut ad consolandum illum epistolam, quam ad eum scripsimus, qua ei et gratiam nostram, et communionem reddidisse signauimus), experientia tua dare debeat; quia sicut in contumacia persistentibus seueros esse nos conuenit, sic humiliatis et penitentibus locum ueniae negare non debemus.

C. IX. Concerning the same.

The same to Marinianus, Bishop of Ravenna, [book VII, letter 79]. You have learned from the letters which we transmitted to you what things are to be done concerning the case of Maximus. But because we have learned more fully what the will of Your Fraternity is concerning this matter from the report of the bearer of these presents, Castorius our chartulary, therefore, if that same Maximus before you and our aforesaid chartulary has purged himself by oath concerning the simoniacal heresy and, merely questioned concerning the other matters before the body of Saint Apollinaris as we wrote, has answered that he is free of them, we commit his case to the judgment of Your Fraternity concerning the penance by which so great a fault ought to be purged: namely, that while excommunicated he presumed to conduct the solemnities of Masses. And therefore securely dispose whatever is pleasing to you according to God, and hold nothing doubtful concerning us. For whatever has been ordained by you concerning this case we both receive with gratitude and willingly admit.

C. IX. De eodem.

Idem Mariniano Episcopo Rauennae. [lib. VII. ep. 79.] Que de causa Maximi sint agenda, ex epistolis, quas ad uos transmisimus, agnouistis. Sed quia, qualis de hac re fraternitatis uestrae uoluntas sit magis a presentium latore Castorio cartulario nostro renunciante cognouimus, ideo, si idem Maximus coram uobis et predicto cartulario nostro de symoniaca heresi se sacramento purgauerit atque de aliis ante corpus sancti Apollinaris (ut scripsimus) tantummodo requisitus, liberum se esse responderit, causam ipsius fraternitatis uestrae iudicio, de eo, quod excommunicatus missarum solempnia agere presumpserit, committimus, qua debeat penitentia talis culpa purgari. Et ideo quicquid uobis secundum Deum placet securiter disponite, nec aliquid de nobis dubium habeatis. Nam quicquid a uobis hac de causa ordinatum fuerit nos et gratis suscipimus, et libenter admittimus.

C. X. How Sixtus purged himself.

Likewise Pope Sixtus [III] to all bishops, [c. 1]. You commanded me to write to you how the pressing dispute against me was stirred up, or by whom, so that it might be repelled by your assistance and my case be made firm. Know that I am accused by a certain Bassus and unjustly persecuted. Hearing this, Valentinian Augustus ordered a synod to be assembled by our authority. And when the council had been held, satisfying all with a great examination—although I could sufficiently have escaped otherwise, nevertheless fleeing suspicion—I purged myself before all, namely freeing myself from suspicion and rivalry, but not giving a form for doing this to others who should be unwilling or who should not choose it voluntarily.

C. X. Qualiter Sixtus semetipsum purgauit.

Item Sixtus Papa [III.] omnibus Episcopis. [c. 1.] Mandastis, ut scriberem uobis, qualiter instans iurgium contra me suscitatum sit, uel a quo, ut uestro aminiculo pelleretur, et causa mea firmaretur. Scitote me criminari a quodam Basso, et iniuste persequi. Quod audiens Valentinianus Augustus nostra auctoritate sinodum congregari iussit. Et facto concilio, cum magna examinatione satisfaciens omnibus, (licet euadere aliter satis potuissem, suspicionem tamen fugiens,) coram omnibus me purgaui, me scilicet a suspicione et emulatione liberans; sed non aliis, qui noluerint aut sponte hoc non elegerint, faciendi formam dans.

C. XI. Concerning the case of the priest Gillandus.

Likewise Alexander II to Rumald, Bishop of Como. We have deliberated in assembly concerning the case of your priest Gillandus, defamed concerning the death of his bishop, your predecessor. Therefore, with the unanimous assent of the brothers standing around us, we report to Your Belovedness that the aforesaid priest Gillandus is to be presented before you, where, if certain accusers should be lacking, then, with justice dictating and without any controversy, the priest shall receive whatever he unjustly lost on this account: both the priesthood and the benefices unimpaired.

C. XI. De causa Gillandi presbiteri.

Item Alexander II. Rumaldo Cumano Episcopo. Super causas Gillandi presbiteri tui de morte episcopi sui, predecessoris tui, infamati, in medium consuluimus. Itaque circumstantium fratrum unanimi assensu tuae dilectioni referimus, prefatum Gillandum presbiterum ante te representandum, ubi, si certi accusatores defuerint, tunc dictante iusticia sine omni controuersia presbiter quecumque ob hoc iniuste amisit ac sacerdotium accipiat et integra beneficia.

C. XII. Concerning the purgation of clerics, if they cannot be convicted.

Likewise from the Council of Agde. If lawful accusers have not been able to prove the crimes of a priest and he has denied them, let him, if he is able, purge himself of the crime with seven associates of his order. But if a deacon has been accused of the same crime, let him clear himself with three.

C. XII. De purgatione clericorum, si conuinci non poterunt.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. Si legitimi accusatores crimina sacerdotis probare non potuerint, et ipse negauerit, cum septem sociis suis eius ordinis (si ualet) a crimine semetipsum expurget. Diaconus uero si eodem crimine accusatus fuerit, cum tribus semetipsum excuset.

C. XIII. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Lleida. If a priest has been defamed by an evil reputation among the people committed to him, and the bishop has not been able to prove it by lawful witnesses, let him be suspended until worthy satisfaction, lest the people of the faithful suffer scandal in him. Worthy satisfaction, however—as it is taught to have been established by the elders—is when, either according to the canons or at the bishop's judgment, he joins seven colleagues to himself and swears upon the holy Gospel placed before him that he did not perpetrate the crime charged against him. And, purged by this satisfaction, let him thereafter securely discharge his office.

[PALEA.

C. XIII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Ylerdensi. Presbiter si a plebe sibi commissa mala opinione infamatus fuerit, et episcopus legitimis testibus adprobare non potuerit, suspendatur usque ad dignam satisfactionem, ne populus fidelium in eo scandalum patiatur. Digna uero satisfactio est (sicut a maioribus constitutum esse docetur), quando siue secundum canones, siue ad arbitrium episcopi septem sibi collegas adiungit, et iurat in sacro euangelio coram posito, quod crimen sibi illatum non perpetrauit. Et hac satisfactione purgatus secure deinceps suum exequatur offitium.

[PALEA.

C. XIV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Sylvester. We held it supremely necessary to prohibit in writing the man accused of simony from celebrating the solemnities of Masses until we could learn what was more true.]

[PALEA.

C. XIV. De eodem.

Item Siluester Papa. Accusatum symoniacum necesse habuimus summopere per scripturam prohibere, ne missarum solempnia celebrare debuisset, donec quid esset uerius potuissemus cognoscere.]

[PALEA.

C. XV. Likewise from the Council of Tribur.

If a noble or freeborn man is accused in a synod and has denied it, if it is established that he is a man of faith, let him purge himself with twelve freeborn men. If he was previously detected in theft, perjury, or false testimony, let him not be admitted to an oath, but—like one who is not freeborn—let him purge himself by boiling water or glowing iron.]

C. XV. Item ex Concilio Triburiensi.

Nobilis homo uel ingenuus si in sinodo accusatur et negauerit, si eum constiterit fidelem esse, cum duodecim ingenuis se expurget; si antea deprehensus fuerit in furto, aut periurio, aut falso testimonio, ad iuramentum non admittatur, sed (sicut qui ingenuus non est) feruenti aqua uel candenti ferro se expurget.]

C. XVI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Hincmar, Bishop of Reims. If an evil report has gone out concerning a priest and lawful accusers and witnesses are lacking, lest, contrary to the Apostle, the hearts of the weak be struck by the priest's evil report, and lest our ministry be reviled, and lest priests, becoming more secure, slide more licentiously into sin, let him, according to the decrees of the elders, purge his reputation by an oath with neighboring priests nominated for him whom we know to be unwilling to perjure themselves.

[PALEA.

C. XVI. De eodem.

Item Igmarus Remorum Episcopus. Si mala fama de presbitero exierit, et accusatores ac testes legales defuerint, ne, contra Apostolum, infirmorum corda de mala fama presbiteri percutiantur, et ne uituperetur ministerium nostrum, neue securiores presbiteri existentes licentius in peccatum prolabantur, secundum decreta maiorum cum denominatis sibi uicinis presbiteris, quos scimus se nolle periurare, sacramento famam suam purget.

[PALEA.

C. XVII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Innocent to the Patriarch of Aquileia and the Bishop of Mantua. We do not believe that it is hidden from your Prudence how often our brother, the Bishop of Trent, has been assailed in our presence concerning simony. When his case had finally been ventilated in our presence, accusers were produced against him, asserting by living voice and in writing that he had given the church of Saint Peter of Pado to the priest Paul for four modii of grain which he had accepted from the laymen of that same church. But because neither accusers nor witnesses were able to proceed in that case according to the form of the canons and the statutes of the holy Fathers, by the common counsel of our brothers we judge that he ought to purge himself in your presence as the third oath-taker among men of his own order—that is, with two others of his order—and with four abbots and religious priests concerning the aforesaid simony. The form of the purgation, moreover, will be of this kind. That same bishop shall first swear upon the holy Gospels that, for the church of Saint Peter of Pado to be given to the priest Paul, neither did he himself through himself, nor through a subordinate person, nor did another for him with his knowledge, receive a price. Then the purgators shall swear upon the holy Gospels of God that, as they themselves believe, he swore truthfully. We therefore, entrusting the sequence of this case to your Prudence, command you to take care to assemble together in a suitable place and, with the Lord granting it, so to restore the case itself according to the tenor of the present letter that every scruple of this question may thereafter be removed and justice preserved for both parties. But if either of you, with a certain cause hindering him, cannot be present, let those of you who can be present conclude the same judgment. But if our aforesaid brother A. has performed the aforesaid purgation, restore to him by our authority the aforesaid office and the church of Trent. We order him to fulfill this purgation before the next Purification of blessed Mary the Virgin.]

GRATIAN. In the foregoing authorities it is understood implicitly, "if the defendant wishes to purge himself," so that the sacred canons impose upon the accused the manner, not the necessity, of purging, as appears from the end of the chapter of Pope Sixtus and from the authority of Leo, who, after giving a purgation, says concerning himself:

> C. XVII. De eodem.
> Item Innocentius Aquileiensi Patriarchae et Mantuano Episcopo. Quoties frater noster Tridentinus episcopus in nostra presentia de symonia sit inpetitus, prudentiam uestram latere non credimus, cuius causa tandem in nostra presentia uentilata producti sunt aduersus eum accusatores, uiua uoce et scripto asserentes, quod ecclesiam S. Petri de Pado presbitero Paulo dederit pro quatuor modiis frumenti, quos ab eiusdem ecclesiae laicis acceperit. Verum quoniam nec accusatores, nec testes secundum formam canonum et sanctorum Patrum statuta in causa ipsa procedere potuerunt, communi fratrum nostrorum concilio iudicamus, ut tertia manu sui ordinis et quatuor abbatum et religiosorum sacerdotum de supradicta symonia in uestra presentia se debeat expurgare. Porro purgationis tenor erit huiusmodi. Idem episcopus super sancta euangelia primum iurabit, quod pro ecclesia S. Petri de Pado, presbitero Paulo danda, neque ipse per se, neque per submissam personam, neque alius pro eo, se sciente, pretium receperit. Deinde uero purgatores super sancta Dei euangelia iurabunt, quod, sicut ipsi credunt, uerum iurauit. Nos itaque causae huius seriem committentes prudentiae uestrae, mandamus uobis, ut congruo loco in unum conuenire curetis, et ita causam ipsam iuxta presentium tenorem prestante Domino restauretis, quatenus et omnis de cetero huius questionis scrupulus auferatur, et utrique parti sua iustitia conseruetur. Si quis uero de uobis, certa prepediente causa, interesse non poterit, uos, qui adesse poteritis, idem iudicium terminate. Quod si predictus frater noster A. predictam purgationem fecerit, uos ei auctoritate nostra predictum offitium et Tridentinam ecclesiam restituite. Hanc autem purgationem ante proximam purificationem B. Mariae uirginis adinplere iubemus.] Gratian. In premissis auctoritatibus subintelligitur, si reus se purgare uoluerit, ut sacri canones modum, non necessitatem purgandi accusato inponant, sicut aparet ex fine capituli Sixti Papae, et auctoritate Leonis, qui data purgatione ait de se ipso:

C. XVIII. Concerning Leo, how he purged himself.

It has been heard, dearest brothers, how evil men fabricated grave crimes against me. For this reason I, Leo, pontiff of the holy Roman Church, purify myself in your sight before God and his angels, because I neither perpetrated nor ordered to be perpetrated these criminal and wicked things which they allege against me. But in doing this I do not prescribe a law for others by which they are compelled to do it. GRATIAN. Behold, each supreme pontiff purges himself, yet he does not prescribe to others the necessity of purging. Hence it is given to be understood that the satisfaction of purgation rests in the will of the accused, not in the judgment of the judge. But since in the Council of Lleida a priest is commanded to be suspended until worthy satisfaction, and since also by the decree of Leo it is placed in the bishop's judgment with how many oath-takers a priest ought to purge himself, it is evident that he is to be compelled to purgation and that it rests not in his own will but in the judgment of the judge. Likewise Pope Leo, writing to King Charles, says:

C. XVIII. De Leone qualiter semet ipsum purgauit.

Auditum est fratres karissimi, qualiter mali homines grauia crimina in me confinxerunt. Quamobrem ego Leo Pontifex sanctae Romanae ecclesiae purifico me in conspectu uestro coram Deo et angelis eius, quia criminosas istas et sceleratas res, quas illi mihi obiciunt, nec perpetraui, nec perpetrare iussi. Hoc autem faciens non legem prescribo ceteris, qua id facere cogantur. Gratian. Ecce uterque summus pontifex semetipsum purgat, nec tamen ceteris purgandi necessitatem prescribit. Unde datur intelligi, quod satisfactio purgationis in uoluntate consistit accusati, non in arbitrio iudicis. Sed cum in Ylerdensi concilio presbiter iubeatur suspendi usque ad dignam satisfactionem, cum etiam decreto Leonis in arbitrio ponitur episcopi, quota manu sacerdos se purgare debeat, patet, quod ad purgationem cogendus est, nec in sua uoluntate, sed in arbitrio iudicis consistit. Item Leo Papa scribens ad Karolum Regem ait:

C. XIX. How priests ought to be purged.

We do not doubt that it is known to all of you by sight or hearing that, very often at the persuasion of the ancient enemy, various crimes are alleged against priests. But although, in the time of the lord Pippin of good memory, your father, or in ancient times, it was very often ventilated by the holy Fathers and other men of good devotion how a reasonable examination and satisfaction concerning these matters is to be made by them, nevertheless we have by no means been able to find anything fully concluded on the matter. Indeed, in our times this very matter has very often been ventilated by holy bishops, other priests, and the other ministers of ecclesiastical dignity dwelling in your kingdoms or in others for God, and by us acting together with them, on account of the many and excessive complaints which have come to us concerning this from various parts. But we wish all you ministers of either order to know how it was determined by the counsel of our lord and father Leo the Apostolic, of the other bishops of the Roman Church and other priests, of the eastern and Greek patriarchs, and of many holy bishops and priests; also by the authority and consent of all our bishops and all the other priests and Levites; and by the counsel of the rest of the faithful and all our counselors.

ought to be received—because the canons fully express what sort ought to be admitted to the accusation of priests—if, however, as was said, that accuser who is canonically to be received can prove the charge against him in the sight of the bishops with the lawful number of men and of good witnesses, then let him be judged canonically; and if he has been overcome as culpable, let him be condemned canonically. But if the accuser himself cannot prove the charge against him under the above-written condition, let this also be judged canonically. Therefore, if that priest is suspect or not credible to his bishop, to his other fellow priests, or to good and just men from his people or his parish, lest he remain under crime or the aforesaid suspicion, let him—with three, five, or seven good and neighboring priests, after the example of Pope Leo, who had twelve bishops in his purgation, or with more if it should seem good to his bishop or if he should perceive it necessary on account of the tumult of the people, and with other good and just men—after giving an oath before the people upon the four Gospels, return himself purged to the Church. But if anyone desires to know what sort of witnesses ought to be received for the accusation of priests and what is to be done concerning the accuser, it can be found fully in the canons. Part III. GRATIAN. Purgation by the ordeal of glowing iron or boiling water, however, is not to be added to an oath. Hence Stephen V to Liutbert, Bishop of Mainz:

> Omnibus uobis uisu aut auditu notum esse non dubitamus, quod sepissime suadente antiquo hoste sacerdotibus crimina diuersa obiciantur. Sed qualiter ex eis ab his rationabilis examinatio et satisfactio fiat, licet tempore bonae memoriae domni genitoris uestri Pipini, siue priscis temporibus a sanctis Patribus et reliquis bonae deuotionis hominibus sepissime uentilatum fuerit, nos tamen pleniter et aliquid inde finitum reperire minime quiuimus. Nostris quippe temporibus id ipsum a sanctis episcopis, et reliquis sacerdotibus, ac ceteris ecclesiasticae dignitatis ministris, uestris in regnis, seu in aliis Deo degentibus, nobisque una cum eis agentibus, sepissime propter multas et nimias reclamationes, que ex hoc ad nos de diuersis partibus uenerunt, uentilatum est. Sed qualiter consultu domni et patris nostri Leonis Apostolici, ceterorumque Romanae ecclesiae episcoporum, et reliquorum sacerdotum, siue orientalium et grecorum patriarcharum, et multorum sanctorum episcoporum et sacerdotum, nec non etiam nostrorum episcoporum omniumque ceterorum sacerdotum ac Leuitarum auctoritate et consensu, atque reliquorum fidelium et cunctorum consiliariorum nostrorum consultu diffinitum est, uos omnes utriusque ordinis ministros scire uolumus. Statutum est namque ratione et necessitate auctoritate predicta consultu omnium, ut quotiescumque cuiquam sacerdoti crimen inponitur, si ipse accusator talis fuerit, ut recipi debeat, (quia quales ad accusationem sacerdotum admitti debeant, in canonibus pleniter expressum est;) si autem (ut dictum est) ille accusator, qui canonice est recipiendus, eum cum legitimo uirorum numero et bonorum testium approbare in conspectu episcoporum poterit, tunc canonice diiudicetur, et si culpabilis uictus fuerit, canonice dampnetur. Si uero eum suprascripto pretextu minime approbare ipse accusator poterit, et hoc canonice diiudicetur. Ipse ergo sacerdos, si suspiciosus aut incredibilis suo episcopo aut reliquis suis consacerdotibus, siue bonis et iustis de suo populo uel de sua plebe hominibus fuerit, ne in crimine aut predicta suspicione remaneat, cum tribus, aut quinque, uel septem bonis ac uicinis sacerdotibus, exemplo Leonis Papae (qui duodecim episcopos in sua purgatione habuit) uel eo amplius, si suo episcopo uisum fuerit, aut necesse esse propter tumultum populi perspexerit, et cum aliis bonis et iustis hominibus se sacramento coram populo super quatuor euangelia dato purgatum ecclesiae reddat. Si quis autem scire desiderat, quales testes ad accusationem sacerdotum recipi debeant, et quid de accusatore faciendum sit, pleniter in canonibus reperiri poterit. III. Pars. Gratian. Iuramento uero candentis ferri uel feruentis aquae purgatio non est addenda. Unde Stephanus V. Luiberto Maguntino Episcopus:

C. XX. The judgment of boiling water and glowing iron is prohibited from being conducted in the Church.

You consulted us concerning infants who, sleeping in one bed with their parents, are found dead: whether the parents ought to purify themselves by glowing iron, boiling water, or any other test from having smothered them. The parents are to be admonished and warned not to place such tender infants with themselves in one bed, lest, through some resulting negligence, they be suffocated or crushed, whence the parents themselves may be found guilty of homicide. For the sacred canons do not judge that a confession is to be extorted from anyone by an examination of glowing iron or boiling water; and what was not decreed by the teaching of the holy Fathers is not to be presumed by a superstitious invention. Offenses made public by voluntary confession or proof of witnesses, with the fear of God held before the eyes, are committed to the ruler to judge. But hidden and unknown things are to be left to him who alone knows the hearts of the sons of men. Those, however, who are proved or confess themselves guilty of such an offense, let your moderation chastise, because if one who destroys by abortion what was conceived in the womb is a homicide, how much more will one who has killed a little child even of a single day be unable to excuse himself from being a homicide? GRATIAN. Whether this pertains to every kind of purgation or only to these two which appear to be prohibited here is not undeservedly doubted, on account of the sacrifice of jealousy and that statement of Gregory: "If a man who is said to be of a frigid nature can prove by a true judgment that he has never known his wife, let him be separated from her."

C. XX. Feruentis aquae et candentis ferri iudicium fieri in ecclesia prohibetur.

Consuluisti de infantibus, qui in uno lecto cum parentibus dormientes mortui reperiuntur, utrum ferro candente, aut aqua feruente, seu alio quolibet examine parentes se purificare debeant eos non obpressisse. Monendi namque sunt et protestandi parentes, ne tam tenellos secum in uno collocent lecto, ne negligentia qualibet proueniente suffocentur uel opprimantur, unde ipsi homicidii rei inueniantur. Nam ferri candentis uel aquae feruentis examinatione confessionem extorqueri a quolibet sacri non censent canones, et quod sanctorum Patrum documento sancitum non est supersticiosa adinuentione non est presumendum. Spontanea enim confessione uel testium approbatione publicata delicta, habito pre oculis Dei timore, commissa sunt regimini iudicare. Occulta uero et incognita sunt illi relinquenda, qui solus nouit corda filiorum hominum. Hi autem, qui probantur, uel confitentur talis reatus se noxios, tua eos castiget moderatio, quia si conceptum in utero qui per aborsum deleuerit, homicida est, quanto magis, qui unius saltem diei puerulum peremerit, homicidam esse se excusare nequibit? Gratian. Hoc autem utrum ad omnia genera purgationis, an ad hec duo tantum, que hic prohibita uidentur, pertineat, non inmerito dubitatur propter sacrificium zelotipiae, et illud Gregorii: "Si uir, qui frigidae naturae esse dicitur, per uerum iudicium probare potuerit, uxorem suam numquam se cognouisse, separetur ab ea."

[C. XXI.]

For in the book of Numbers it is read that the Lord commanded Moses to speak to the sons of Israel and say to them: "A man whose wife has gone astray and, despising her husband, has slept with another man, and the husband has been unable to discover this, but the adultery is hidden and cannot be charged by witnesses because she was not found in the illicit intercourse: if the spirit of jealousy has stirred up the man against his wife, who either has been polluted or is assailed by false suspicion, he shall bring her to the priest and shall offer as an offering for her the tenth part of a satum of barley flour. He shall not pour oil upon it nor put frankincense upon it, because it is a sacrifice of jealousy and an offering investigating adultery. Therefore, the priest shall offer her and station her before the Lord; and he shall take holy water in an earthenware vessel and put into it a little earth from the pavement of the tabernacle. And when the woman stands in the sight of the Lord, he shall uncover her head and place upon her hands the sacrifice of remembrance and the offering of jealousy. But he himself shall hold the most bitter waters upon which he has heaped curses with an imprecation; and he shall adjure her and say: If a foreign man has not slept with you, and if you have not been polluted by abandoning your husband's bed, these bitter waters upon which I have heaped curses shall not hold you. But if you have turned away from your husband, have been polluted, and have lain with another man, you shall be subject to these curses: may the Lord give you as a curse and an example to all among his people; may he cause your thigh to rot and your swelling womb to burst; may the cursed waters enter your belly, and, with your womb swelling, may your thigh rot. And the woman shall answer: Amen, amen.

"And the priest shall write these curses in a book and shall erase them with the bitter waters upon which he has heaped curses, and he shall give them to her to drink. When she has drained them, the priest shall take the sacrifice of jealousy from her hand and shall elevate it before the Lord and place it upon the altar, provided only that he first takes from it a handful of the sacrifice which is offered and burns it upon the altar; and thus he shall give the bitter waters to the woman as a drink. When she has drunk them, if she has been polluted and, having contemned her husband, is guilty of adultery, the waters of cursing shall pass through her; and, with her belly inflated, her thigh shall rot, and the woman shall be as a curse and an example to all the people. But the husband shall be without guilt, and she shall receive her iniquity. But if she has not been polluted, she shall be unharmed and shall bear children." Part IV. [GRATIAN.] But every purgation of this kind appears to be prohibited, since in the foregoing authority of Pope Stephen it is said: "By voluntary confession, etc."

[C. XXI.]

In libro namque Numerorum legitur, Dominus precepisse Moysi, ut loqueretur filiis Israel et diceret eis: "Vir, cuius uxor errauerit, maritumque contempnens dormierit cum altero uiro, et hoc maritus deprehendere nequiuerit, sed latet adulterium, et testibus argui non potest, quia non est inuenta in stupro, si spiritus zelotipiae concitauerit uirum contra uxorem suam, que uel polluta est, uel falsa suspicione appetitur, adducet eam ad sacerdotem, et offeret oblationem pro illa decimam partem sati farinae ordeaceae; non fundet super eam oleum, nec inponet thus, quia sacrificium zelotipiae est et oblatio inuestigans adulterium. Offeret igitur eam sacerdos, et statuet coram Domino, assumetque aquam sanctam in uase fictili, et pauxillum terrae de pauimento tabernaculi mittet in eam. Cumque steterit mulier in conspectu Domini, discooperiet caput eius, et ponet super manus eius sacrificium recordationis et oblationem zelotipiae. Ipse autem tenebit aquas amarissimas, in quibus cum execratione maledicta congessit, adiurabitque eam, et dicet: Si non dormiuit uir alienus tecum, et si non polluta es deserto mariti thoro, non tenebunt te aquae istae amarissimae, in quas maledicta congessi. Si autem declinasti a uiro tuo, atque polluta es, et concubuisti cum altero uiro, his maledictionibus subiacebis: det te Dominus in maledictionem et exemplum cunctorum in populo suo; putrescere faciat femur tuum, et tumens uterus tuus disrumpatur; ingrediantur aquae maledictae in uentrem tuum, et utero tumescente putrescat femur tuum. Et respondebit mulier: Amen, Amen. Scribetque sacerdos in libello ista maledicta, et delebit ea aquis amarissimis, in quas maledicta congessit, et dabit ei bibere; quas cum exhauserit, tollet sacerdos de manu eius sacrificium zelotipiae, et eleuabit illud coram Domino, inponetque illud super altare, ita dumtaxat, ut prius pugillum sacrificii tollat de eo, quod offertur et incendat super altare, et sic potum det mulieri aquas amarissimas. Quas cum biberit, si polluta est et contempto uiro adulterii rea, pertransibunt eam aquae maledictionis, et inflato uentre conputrescet femur, eritque mulier in maledictionem et in exemplum omni populo. Maritus uero absque culpa erit, et illa recipiet iniquitatem suam. Quod si polluta non fuerit, innoxia erit et faciet liberos." IV. Pars. [Gratian.] Sed quelibet huiusmodi purgatio uidetur esse inhibita, cum in premissa auctoritate Stephani Papae dicatur: "Spontanea confessione, etc."

C. XXII. Single combat is not received in the New Testament.

Likewise from a decree of Pope Nicholas. We do not, however, admit single combat in the law, since we do not find that it was commanded. Although we read that certain persons entered upon it—as sacred history relates of holy David and Goliath—nevertheless divine authority has nowhere ordained that it should be held as law, since those who pursue this and things of this kind seem only to put God to the test. GRATIAN. Part V. To the contrary, in the Council of Worms, [c. 15]:

C. XXII. In nouo testamento monomachia non recipitur.

Item ex decreto Nicolai Papae. Monomachiam uero in lege non assumimus, quam preceptam fuisse non reperimus, quam, licet iniisse quosdam legamus, sicut sanctum Dauid et Goliam sacra prodit istoria, nusquam tamen ut pro lege teneatur alicubi diuina sanxit auctoritas, cum hoc et huiusmodi sectantes Deum solummodo temptare uideantur. V. Pars. Gratian. Contra in Concilio Guarmaciensi: [c. 15.]

C. XXIII. If thefts occur in a monastery, the monks are to purge themselves by an ordeal.

It often happens that thefts are perpetrated in monasteries of monks. We therefore establish that, when the brothers themselves ought to purge themselves concerning such matters, Mass shall be celebrated by the abbot or by one of the brothers present, and, when the Mass has thus been completed, all shall communicate with these words: "May the Body of the Lord be for you as a proof today."

C. XXIII. Si furta in monasterio fiant, monachi iudicio se expurgent.

Sepe contingit, ut in monasteriis monachorum furta perpetrentur. Idcirco statuimus, ut quando ipsi fratres de talibus expurgare se debeant, missa ab abbate celebretur uel ab aliquo ex presentibus fratribus, et sic expleta missa omnes communicent in hec uerba: Corpus Domini sit tibi ad probationem hodie.

C. XXIV. Whoever is accused of adultery shall purge himself by a credible ordeal.

Likewise, [in the Council of Salzungen, c. 7]. It was asked what should be done if two persons have been blamed for adultery, and one confesses while the other denies it. It was decreed by the holy council that the one who denied it shall purge himself by a credible ordeal, and the one who confessed shall perform worthy penance.

C. XXIV. Quicumque de adulterio accusatur, probabili se expurget iudicio.

Item. [in Salegustadiensi Concilio, c. 7.] Interrogatum est, si duo de adulterio inculpati fuerint, et unus profitetur, et alter negat, quid inde agendum sit. Decretum est a sancto concilio, ut ille, qui negauerit, probabili se iudicio expurget, et qui professus fuerit dignam penitentiam agat.

C. XXV. When several persons are accused of adultery, and one wishes to purge the others, all shall be held guilty if he falls in the ordeal.

Likewise, [in the same council, c. 14]. The holy synod also established that, if two persons have been accused of adultery and both have denied it, and they ask that it be granted them that one of them purge both by a divine ordeal, if the one falls in this, both shall be held guilty.

> C. XXV. Cum plures de adulterio accusantur, et unus ceteros purgare uoluerit, omnes rei habeantur, si ipse in iudicio ceciderit.
> Item. [in eodem, c. 14.] Statuit quoque sancta sinodus, ut, si duo de adulterio accusati fuerint, et ambo negauerint, et orant sibi concedi, ut alter illorum utrosque diuino purget iudicio, si unus in hoc ceciderit, ambo rei habeantur.

C. XXVI. Mass shall be celebrated for each charge brought against a person accused of some crime.

Likewise, [in the Council of Worms, c. 10]. If some evil deed has been imputed to a bishop or priest, he ought to celebrate Mass and communicate for each charge, and to show himself innocent of each thing imputed to him. If he has not done this, he shall be held excluded from the thresholds of the church for five years. GRATIAN. But what Sixtus and Leo added at the end of their purgation is to be understood from their example; for by the example of their own satisfaction they did not wish to prescribe for others a law of purgation.

> Item. [in Concilio Wormaciensi c. 10.] Si episcopo aut presbitero aliquod maleficium inputatum fuerit, in singulis missam celebrare debet, et communicare, et de singulis sibi inputatis innocentem se ostendere. Quod si non fecerit, quinquennio a liminibus ecclesiae extraneus habeatur. Gratian. Illud uero, quod Sixtus et Leo in fine suae purgationis addiderunt, ex eorum exemplo intelligendum est; exemplo enim suae satisfactionis noluerunt prescribere ceteris legem purgandi.

Question IV

GRATIAN. Part I. That which was asked in the fourth place—whether a bishop is to be condemned by the testimony of two persons—is proved by the authority of many. For, as is read in the Gospel of John, Christ says to the Jews: “It is written in your law that the testimony of two men is true.” From this he consequently argues against them, saying: “If the testimony of two men is true, why do you not receive my testimony and that of the Father?” Likewise Paul in the Epistle to the Corinthians: “In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall stand.” Likewise in the Epistle to the Hebrews: “Anyone transgressing the law of Moses, convicted by two or three witnesses, was stoned without mercy.”

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod uero quarto loco querebatur: An duorum testimonio episcopus sit condempnandus? multorum auctoritate probatur. Sicut enim in euangelio Iohannis legitur, ait Christus ad Iudeos: "In lege uestra scriptum est, quoniam duorum hominum testimonium uerum est." Hinc consequenter argumentatur contra eos, dicens: "Si testimonium duorum hominum uerum est, quare testimonium meum et patris non accipitis?" Item Paulus in epistola ad Corintios: "In ore duorum uel trium testium stabit omne uerbum." Item in epistola ad Ebreos: "Quis preuaricans legem Moisi, duobus uel tribus testibus conuictus, sine miseratione lapidabatur."

C. I. By how many witnesses each cleric ought to be convicted.

Likewise from the Second Council of Braga, [c. 8]. It was resolved that, if anyone assails any cleric with the stain of fornication, two or three testimonies shall be required from him according to the precept of the Apostle Paul. But if he has not been able to prove by testimonies what he said, the accuser shall receive the excommunication of the accused. GRATIAN. Part II. From the foregoing, therefore, it is gathered that a bishop can be convicted and condemned by the testimony of two or three persons. Pope Sylvester, however, sitting in a general synod, said to the contrary:

> C. I. Quot testibus quisque clericorum conuinci debeat.
> Item ex Concilio Bracarensi II. [c. 8.] Placuit, ut si quis aliquem clericorum maculatione fornicationis inpetit, secundum preceptum Pauli apostoli duo uel tria testimonia requirantur ab illo. Quod si non potuerit datis testimoniis approbare quod dixit, excommunicationem accusati accusator accipiat. II. Pars. Gratian. Ex premissis itaque colligitur, quod duorum uel trium testimonio episcopus potest conuinci et dampnari. Porro Siluester papa in generali sinodo residens dixit econtra:

C. II. By how many witnesses a bishop, a priest, or the other clerics are to be convicted.

A prelate shall not be condemned except with seventy-two witnesses. A cardinal priest, however, shall not be deposed except with sixty-four witnesses; a cardinal deacon of the city of Rome shall not be condemned except with twenty-seven witnesses. A subdeacon, acolyte, exorcist, lector, or doorkeeper shall not be condemned except with seven witnesses. The witnesses and accusers, however, shall be without any infamy.

> Presul non dampnetur nisi cum LXXII. testibus. Presbiter autem cardinalis nisi in LXIV. testibus non deponatur; diaconus cardinalis urbis Romae nisi in XXVII. testibus non condempnabitur. Subdiaconus, acolitus, exorcista, lector, hostiarius nisi in septem testibus non condempnabitur. Testes autem et accusatores sine aliqua sint infamia.

C. III. Bishops are not to be condemned except under seventy-two witnesses.

Likewise Leo IV, [in a letter to the Bishops of Britain]. We judge that there can never be any condemnation of bishops unless either before the lawful number of bishops—which is constituted by twelve bishops—or certainly after the sentence has been proved by seventy-two suitable witnesses, who are such as are also able to accuse. § 1. And first they shall furnish oaths upon the four sacred Gospels of Christ that they utter nothing false, as blessed Sylvester handed down to us and as the holy Roman Church appears to maintain. And if, among the men whom they have said are to be condemned, there shall be a bishop who has petitioned that his case be heard in the presence of the bishop of the Roman See, no one shall presume to give a final sentence upon him, but we decree that he shall be heard in every respect. GRATIAN. But this is understood either by a special privilege concerning the clerics of the Roman Church, or on account of the shamelessness of certain persons who, although they are not of approved life and knowledge, suddenly leap forward into the accusation of the ministers of God. But those whose life is so praiseworthy that it appears worthy of imitation by all, and concerning whose assertion no doubt can arise: by the testimony of two or three such witnesses anyone can lawfully be convicted and condemned.

C. III. Episcopi non nisi sub LXXII. testibus condempnandi sunt.

Item Leo IV. [in epistola Episcopis Britanniae] Nullam dampnationem episcoporum umquam esse censemus, nisi aut ante legitimum episcoporum numerum (qui fit per duodecim episcopos), aut certe probata sententia per LXXII. idoneos testes, qui tales sint qui et accusare possint. §. 1. Et prius ad sacra Christi quatuor euangelia sacramenta prestent, quod nil falsum depromant, sicut nobis B. Siluester tradidit, et Romana sancta uidetur ecclesia tenere. Et si inter eos, quos dampnandos esse dixerint homines, fuerit episcopus, qui suam causam in presentia Romanae sedis episcopi petierit audiri, nullus super illum finitiuam presumat dare sentenciam, sed omnino eum audiri decernimus. Gratian. Sed hoc uel speciali priuilegio de clericis Romanae ecclesiae intelligitur, uel propter inprobitatem quorumdam, qui, cum non sint spectatae uitae et scientiae, in accusatione ministrorum Dei repente prosiliunt. Quorum uero uita adeo laudabilis est, ut omnibus imitanda apareat, de quorum assertione nulla dubitatio nasci poterit, eorum testimonio duorum uel trium testium quilibet iure conuinci et dampnari poterit.

Question VI

GRATIAN. Part I. The sixth question follows, in which it is asked: By what remedy may a vitiated case be relieved, and is that remedy to be given to one who has uttered the plea of appeal for the sake of delaying the case? A vitiated case will be able to be relieved by the remedy of appeal. Hence Pope Fabian says, [to Bishop Hilary, letter III, c. 3]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Sequitur sexta questio, qua queritur: Quo remedio causa uiciata subleuetur, et si remedium illud sit dandum ei, qui causa dilationis uocem appellationis exhibuerit? Causa uero uiciata remedio appellationis subleuari poterit. Unde Fabianus Papa ait: [ad Hilarium Episcopum, epist. III. c. 3.]

C. I. Let the remedy of appeal come to the aid of vitiated cases.

Let it be lawful for an appellant to relieve a vitiated case by the remedy of appeal.

[PALEA.

C. I. Causae uiciatae remedium appellationis subueniat.

Liceat appellatori uiciatam causam appellationis remedio subleuare.

[PALEA.

C. II. Concerning the same.

The same author a little above. No affliction or custody of detention ought to injure an appellant.]

C. II. De eodem.

Idem paulo ante. Appellantem non debet afflictio ulla, aut detentionis iniuriare custodia.]

C. III. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Anacletus, [letter I, at the end]. Let every oppressed person freely appeal to the judgment of the priests, if he wishes, and let him be prohibited by no one, but let him be supported, freed, and heard by them. But if difficult cases or greater matters have arisen, let them be referred to a greater see. And if they cannot easily be discerned or justly terminated there, when the assembly of the highest persons has been gathered—which is accustomed and ought to occur every year—ecclesiastical matters shall be judged in common, justly and in a manner pleasing to God, before the patriarch or primate, and secular matters before the patrician. Likewise Pope Sixtus, [letter II], writes to all rulers of the Church, saying:

C. III. De eodem.

Item Anacletus Papa. [epist. I. in fine.] Omnis obpressus libere sacerdotum (si uoluerit) appellet iudicium, et a nullo prohibeatur, sed ab his fulciatur et liberetur et audiatur. Si autem difficiles causae aut maiora negotia orta fuerint, ad maiorem sedem referantur. Et si illic facile discerni non potuerint aut iuste terminari, ubi fuerit summorum congregatio congregata (que per singulos annos fieri solet et debet), iuste et Deo placite coram patriarcha aut primate ecclesiastica, et coram patricio secularia iudicentur negotia in commune. Item Sixtus Papa [epist. II.] omnibus rectoribus ecclesiae scribit, dicens:

C. IV. Whoever has been assailed shall appeal to the Apostolic See.

If any one of you has been assailed in some adversity, let him freely appeal to this holy and Apostolic See and have recourse to it as to the head, lest an innocent person be condemned or his church suffer loss.

C. IV. Quisquis pulsatus fuerit, apostolicam sedem appellet.

Si quis uestrum pulsatus fuerit in aliqua aduersitate, licenter hanc sanctam et apostolicam sedem appellet, et ad eam quasi ad caput suffugium habeat, ne innocens dampnetur, aut ecclesia sua detrimentum patiatur.

C. V. Bishops assailed in graver cases shall appeal to the Apostolic See.

The same to Bishop Gratus, [letter I]. All bishops who are assailed or accused in any graver cases shall, whenever it is necessary, freely appeal to the Apostolic See and flee to it as to a mother.

C. V. Episcopi grauioribus causis pulsati apostolicam sedem appellent.

Idem Grato episcopo. [epistola I.] Omnes episcopi, qui in aliquibus pulsantur uel criminantur grauioribus causis, quociens necesse fuerit libere apostolicam sedem apellent, atque ad eam quasi ad matrem confugiant.

C. VI. Let an appeal be made to the Roman Church by all.

Likewise Pope Marcellus, [letter I to the Bishops of the province of Antioch]. All bishops who wish, or for whom it shall be necessary, ought to have recourse to the Roman Church as to the head and appeal to it, so that they may receive protection and consecration from it. This ought by no means to be denied to any bishops; rather, without any custody, excommunication, condemnation, or despoiling, let them be permitted to go freely.

C. VI. Ad Romanam ecclesiam ab omnibus appelletur.

Item Marcellus Papa. [epist. I. ad Episcopos Antiochenae prouinciae.] Ad Romanam ecclesiam omnes episcopi, qui uoluerint uel quibus necesse fuerit, quasi ad caput suffugere, eamque appellare debent, ut inde accipiant tuitionem atque consecrationem. Quod omnibus minime conuenit denegari episcopis; sed absque ulla custodia, aut excommunicatione, uel dampnatione, aut expoliatione libere ire concedatur.

C. VII. One who thinks himself burdened by his own metropolitan shall appeal to a greater see.

Likewise Bishop Victor, [to Theophilus of Alexandria, letter I, c. 3]. If anyone thinks himself burdened by his own metropolitan, let him be judged before the patriarch or primate of the diocese, or at the See of the universal Apostolic Church.

> C. VII. Qui a proprio metropolitano se grauari putauerit, maiorem sedem appellet.
> Item Victor Episcopus. [ad Theophilum Alexandrinum, epist. I. c. 3.] Si quis putauerit se a proprio metropolitano grauari, apud patriarcham uel primatem dioceseos, aut penes uniuersalis apostolicae ecclesiae iudicetur sedem.

C. VIII. Let all appeal to the Roman Church as to a mother.

Likewise Zephyrinus, Archbishop of the city of Rome, [letter I]. An appeal is to be made to the Roman Church by all, but especially by the oppressed, and they are to hasten to it as to a mother, so that they may be nourished at its breasts, defended by its authority, and relieved from their oppressions, because a mother cannot and ought not to forget her son.

> Item Zepherinus urbis Romae Archiepiscopus. [epist. I.] Ad Romanam ecclesiam ab omnibus, maxime tamen ab obpressis est appellandum, et concurrendum quasi ad matrem, ut eius uberibus nutriantur, auctoritate defendantur, suis obpressionibus releuentur, quia non potest nec debet mater obliuisci filium suum.

C. IX. Whenever someone has appealed, a hearing shall not be denied him.

Likewise Pope Julius, [in the decrees, or in the rescript to the Easterners, c. 22]. It was resolved that, whenever an appeal has been made from any ecclesiastical judges to other ecclesiastical judges, where there is greater authority, a hearing shall not be denied.

> C. IX. Quociens aliquis appellauerit, audientia sibi non denegetur.
> Item Iulius Papa. [in decretis, siue in rescripto ad Orientales, c. 22.] Placuit, ut a quibuscumque ecclesiasticis iudicibus ad alios iudices ecclesiasticos (ubi est maior auctoritas) prouocatum fuerit, audientia non negetur.

C. X. Those unjustly condemned ought to have restoration, and the oppressed aid, from the Roman Church.

The same, [c. 30]. Therefore the aforesaid privileges have been specially granted to this holy See, both concerning the assembling of councils and judgments and the restorations of bishops, and concerning the highest affairs of the churches, so that all the oppressed may receive aid from it, and those unjustly condemned restoration, and such things may neither be presumed by the impious without vengeance nor carried out without their own condemnation. GRATIAN. Part II. Therefore, since Zephyrinus says that an appeal is to be made by all, but especially by the oppressed, and Marcellus writes, "All bishops who wish, or for whom it shall be necessary, ought to appeal," it is evident that the plea of appeal is not to be denied to an accused person, whether he is burdened or not. Certain persons, however, make this distinction: they refer those wishing to persons to be consecrated, and those suffering necessity to the oppressed, so that the sense is: All who wish to receive consecration from the Roman Church, and are impeded by some persons, ought to appeal to it; all for whom it shall be necessary to flee to it in their oppressions shall likewise utter the plea of appeal, so that the latter may receive protection from it and the former consecration. Likewise that statement of Zephyrinus is distinguished: "An appeal is to be made to the Roman Church by all." It is to be understood of those who wish to receive consecration from it, or who have suffered some injury from their prelates, but especially by the oppressed. According to the first interpretation, the oppressed are understood to be those affected by some injury; but according to the second, those unjustly condemned by a judge are called oppressed. According to this distinction, one who in some matters has uttered the plea of appeal not for relief but for delay does not have authority to appeal. But since Gregory writes to all throughout the several provinces:

> Idem. [cap. 30.] Ideo huic sanctae sedi prefata priuilegia specialiter sunt concessa tam de congregandis conciliis et iudiciis ac restitutionibus episcoporum, quam et de summis ecclesiarum negotiis, ut ab ea omnes obpressi auxilium, et iniuste dampnati restitutionem sumant, et talia ab inpiis non presumantur absque ultione, nec exerceantur absque sua dampnatione. II. Pars. Gratian. Cum ergo Zepherinus dicat, ab omnibus esse appellandum, maxime tamen ab obpressis, et Marcellus scribat: "Omnes episcopi, qui uoluerint uel quibus necesse fuerit, appellare debent:" patet, quod accusato (siue grauetur, siue non) appellationis uox non est deneganda. Quidam tamen ita distinguunt, ut uolentes ad consecrandos, necessitatem patientes ad obpressos referant, ut sit sensus: Omnes, qui uoluerint a Romana ecclesia consecrationem accipere, et ab aliquibus inpediuntur, eam debent appellare; quibuscumque in suis obpressionibus necesse fuerit ad eam subfugere, similiter uocem appellationis exhibeant, ut isti tuicionem, et illi consecrationem ab ea accipiant. Similiter et illud Zepherini distinguitur: "Ab omnibus est appellandum ad Romanam ecclesiam:" intelligendum est, qui ab ea consecrationem uoluerint accipere, uel qui a prelatis suis aliquam iniuriam passi fuerint, maxime tamen ab obpressis. Secundum primam interpretationem obpressi intelliguntur aliqua iniuria affecti; iuxta secundam uero obpressi dicuntur a iudice iniuste condempnati. Secundum hanc distinctionem qui in aliquibus negotiis non ad releuandum, sed ad differendum uocem appellationis exhibuerit, appellandi auctoritatem non habet. Sed cum Gregorius scribat omnibus per diuersas prouincias:

C. XI. It is not lawful for anyone except the person to whom an appeal is made to take cognizance of the case of an appeal.

Requesting your charity, we command by our decree that, if any one of his rivals—which we do not wish—should damnably attempt to accuse Aldric, bishop of the church of Le Mans, it shall be lawful for him, after a hearing before the primates of the diocese, if necessary, to appeal to us, and by our authority to conduct and conclude his actions according to the decrees of the Fathers, either before us or before our legates sent from our side; and let no one judge him or presume to judge him before these things. But if something grave and intolerable—which God forbid—has been alleged against him, our censure must be awaited, so that nothing may be decreed beforehand concerning one who has fled to the bosom of the holy Roman Church and implores its aid, until it has been commanded by the authority of that Church, which so imparted its functions to other churches that they were called to a share of solicitude, not to the fullness of power. § 1. But if, as we do not suppose, something contrary to this has been presumed by anyone, let him, removed from clerical office, be judged by all to be guilty before apostolic authority, lest wolves who have entered under the appearance of sheep dare with bestial savagery to tear anyone to pieces and presume to inflict upon others what they do not wish done to themselves. Likewise, since Pope Vigilius says, [in the letter to Eleutherius, final chapter]:

> C. XI. De causa appellationis cognoscere non licet nisi ei, ad quem appellatur.
> Decreto nostro uestram rogantes karitatem mandamus, ut si aliquis (quod non optamus) suorum emulorum Aldricum Cenomannicae ecclesiae episcopum, accusare dampnabiliter attemptauerit, liceat illi post auditionem primatum dioceseos, si necesse fuerit, nos appellare, et nostra auctoritate aut ante nos, aut ante legatos nostros e latere missos iuxta Patrum decreta suas exercere atque diffinire actiones, nullusque illum ante hec iudicet aut iudicare presumat. Sed si quid (quod absit) graue intolerandumque ei obiectum fuerit, nostra erit expectanda censura, ut nichil prius de eo, qui ad sinum sanctae Romanae ecclesiae confugerit eiusque inplorat auxilium, decernatur, quam ab eiusdem ecclesiae fuerit auctoritate preceptum, que uices suas ita aliis inpertiuit ecclesiis, ut in partem sint uocatae sollicitudinis, non in plenitudinem potestatis. §. 1. Si autem (quod non arbitramur) a quoquam secus presumptum fuerit, ab offitio cleri submotus apostolicae auctoritatis reus ab omnibus iudicetur, ne lupi, qui sub specie ouium subintrauerunt, bestiali seuicia quosque audeant lacerare, et quod sibi fieri nolunt aliis inferre presumant. Item cum Vigilius Papa [in epistola ad Eleutherium, c. ult.] dicat:

C. XII. The judgments of appellants are to be heard by those to whom appeal is made.

One who knows that he has been placed over others shall not bear it badly that someone has been placed over him. For the Church itself which is first so entrusted its functions to the other churches to be dispensed that they were called to a share of solicitude, not to the fullness of power. Hence it is clear that the judgments of all bishops appealing to the Apostolic See, and all the greater business of cases, have been reserved to that holy See—especially since, in all these matters, the counsel of that See must always be awaited; and if any priest has attempted to obstruct its path, let him know that he will render an account before that holy See not without peril to his honor. GRATIAN. Likewise, since Bishop Nicholas inveighs against the Archbishop of Reims, who dared to condemn Bishop Rothard when he was appealing to the Apostolic See, saying thus:

> Qui se scit aliis esse prepositum, non moleste ferat aliquem sibi esse prelatum. Ipsa namque ecclesia, que prima est, ita reliquis ecclesiis uices suas credidit largiendas, ut in partem sint uocatae sollicitudinis, non in plenitudinem potestatis. Unde omnium appellantium apostolicam sedem episcoporum iudicia, et cuncta maiorum negotia causarum eidem sanctae sedi reseruata esse liquet; presertim cum in his omnibus eius semper sit expectandum consultum, cuius tramiti si quis obuiare temptauerit sacerdotum, causas se non sine honoris sui periculo apud eandem sanctam sedem nouerit redditurum. Gratian. Item cum Nicolaus Episcopus in Remensem Archiepiscopum inuehatur, qui Rothardum episcopum appellantem apostolicam sedem dampnare ausus est, ita dicens:

C. XIII. Concerning the Archbishop of Reims, who dared to judge a person appealing to the Roman See.

Your shrewd wisdom—would that it had been kindled by a good fire received—took up the subject matter for a judgment of deposition against Rothard, removed him from the journey to the Apostolic See, condemned him while he was continuously appealing to the Apostolic See, and committed him to prison custody. And below: § 1. Nevertheless, you ought by no means to have consigned to oblivion the privileges of the Apostolic See, by which the venerable canons command that the judgments of the whole Church be brought to it. And below: § 2. Know that we have carried out these things concerning Rothard for this reason: so that the privileges of the Apostolic See, which appeared to have been badly violated by you, might at last, by apostolic authority and the canonical deliberation of the Fathers, be adorned with their former character and proper honor.

C. XIII. De Remensi archiepiscopo, qui appellantem Romanam sedem iudicare ausus est.

Arguta tua sapientia, utinam in accepto bono fomite, iudicii materiam depositionis aduersus Rothardum assumpsit, et ab itinere apostolicae sedis remouit, et continuatim apostolicam sedem appellantem dampnauit et carcerali custodiae mancipauit. Et infra: §. 1. Priuilegia tamen apostolicae sedis uos obliuioni tradere nullatenus debuistis, quibus uenerandi canones iudicia totius ecclesiae ad hanc deferri iubent. Et infra: §. 2. Hec quippe nos in Rothardo idcirco noueris operatos, ut priuilegia sedis apostolicae, que male a uobis uiolata esse uidebantur, auctoritate apostolica et canonica Patrum deliberatione pristino tandem ingenio et proprio decorentur honore.

C. XIV. Let each person show to his superiors the obedience he desires from his inferiors.

Likewise Pope Leo, [to Anastasius, Bishop of Thessalonica, letter LXXII, otherwise LXXIV]. One who knows that he has been placed over certain persons shall not bear it badly that someone has been placed over him; rather, let him himself also render the obedience which he exacts, and just as he does not wish to bear the burden of a heavy load, so let him not dare to impose an unbearable weight upon another. For we are disciples of the humble and gentle Master, who says: "Learn from me, for I am gentle and humble of heart." GRATIAN. It is evident, therefore, that a period of delay is to be denied to no appellant. But if he has appealed for the sake of frustrating delay, he will be condemned by the judge to whom the appeal was made. The time for an appeal is either before sentence is given or after it is given. For whenever a person perceives that he is being excessively burdened, he can freely appeal. Hence Pope Sixtus says, [II, letter 1 to Bishop Gratus]:

C. XIV. Quisque eam obedientiam maioribus exhibeat, quam ab inferioribus desiderat.

Item Leo Papa. [ad Anastasium Thessalonicensem Episcopum, epist. LXXII. al. LXXIV.] Qui scit se quibusdam prepositum, non moleste ferat aliquem sibi esse prelatum, sed obedientiam, quam exigit, etiam ipse dependat, et sicut non uult grauis oneris sarcinam ferre, ita non audeat alii inportabile pondus inponere. Discipuli enim sumus humilis et mitis magistri, dicentis: "Discite a me, quia mitis sum et humilis corde." Gratian. Patet ergo, quod nulli appellanti induciae sunt denegandae. Ceterum, si causa frustratoriae dilationis appellauerit, a iudice, ad quem prouocatum fuerit, condempnabitur. Tempus uero appellationis est ante datam sententiam uel post datam. Quociens enim se pregrauari senserit, libere potest appellare.

Unde Sixtus Papa [II. epist. 1. ad Gratum Episc.] ait:

C. XV. One who is burdened by his own metropolitan shall appeal to the see of the primate or of the universal Church.

If anyone thinks himself burdened by his own metropolitan, let him be judged before the primate of the diocese or before the Pope of the universal Apostolic Church.

C. XV. Qui grauatur a proprio metropolitano, primatis aut uniuersalis ecclesiae sedem appellet.

Si quis putauerit se a proprio metropolitano grauari apud primatem dioceseos aut penes uniuersalis apostolicae ecclesiae Papam iudicetur.

C. XVI. One who has a judge whom he suspects shall appeal to the Roman See.

[Likewise Felix II, to the Bishops assembled in the Synod of Alexandria, c. 19]. Whenever bishops think themselves excessively burdened by their coprovincials or by the metropolitan, or hold them suspect, let them immediately appeal to the Roman See, and let it be lawful for them to go freely. And when they have appealed to the aforesaid Roman See or have asked to be heard by it, let no one presume to excommunicate them, to seize their sees, to take away their property, or to inflict any violence upon them before the case of both parties is concluded by the authority of the Roman Pontiff. If anything contrary to this has been presumed by anyone, it shall be nothing and shall lack force.

> C. XVI. Romanam sedem appellet qui iudicem suspectum habuerit.
> [Item Felix II. ad Episcopos in Alexandrina sinodo congregatos, cap. 19.] Quociens episcopi se a suis conprouincialibus uel a metropolitano putauerint pregrauari, aut eos suspectos habuerint, mox Romanam appellent sedem, atque eis libere ire liceat; et dum predictam Romanam appellauerint sedem, aut ab ea se audiri poposcerint nullus eos aut excommunicare, aut eorum sedes subripere, aut res eorum auferre, aut aliquam uim eis inferre presumat ante, quam amborum causa Romani Pontificis auctoritate finiatur. Quod si aliter, a quoquam presumptum fuerit nichil erit, sed uiribus carebit.

C. XVII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Julius, [in the rescript to the Eastern bishops, c. 30]. Therefore the aforesaid privileges have been specially granted to this holy See, so that all the oppressed may receive aid from it, and those unjustly condemned restoration. GRATIAN. The oppressed and those thinking themselves excessively burdened are understood before sentence is given; those unjustly condemned, after it is given. Hence Eutychian, Bishop of the city of Rome, writes to all bishops, [letter II, c. 1]:

> C. XVII. De eodem.
> Item Iulius Papa. [in rescripto ad Episcopos orientales, cap. 30.] Ideo huic sanctae sedi prefata priuilegia specialiter sunt concessa, ut ab ea omnes obpressi auxilium, et iniuste dampnati restitutionem sumant. Gratian. Obpressi et se pregrauari putantes intelliguntur ante datam sententiam, iniuste dampnati post datam. Unde Euticianus urbis Romae Episcopos scribit omnibus Episcopis: [epist. II. c. 1.]

C. XVIII. Before the conclusion of a case it is lawful to withdraw through an appeal.

One is not to act in ecclesiastical business as in secular business. For even in secular business, after a person summoned under the laws has appeared and begun to contend in the forum, it is not lawful for him to withdraw before the case is completed. But in ecclesiastical business, after the case has been stated, it is lawful to withdraw if it is necessary or if he sees himself being excessively burdened. GRATIAN. Part III. But those who through contumacy have been unwilling to obey the judges shall be deprived of communion. Hence in the Council of Milevis, [c. 24]:

> Non ita in ecclesiasticis agendum est negotiis, sicut in secularibus. Nam et in secularibus postquam legibus uocatus quisque uenerit et in foro decertare ceperit, non licet ei ante peractam causam recedere. In ecclesiasticis uero dicta causa recedere licet, si necesse fuerit aut si se uiderit pregrauari. III. Pars. Gratian. Qui uero ex contumacia iudicibus obtemperare noluerint, communione priuentur.

Unde in Mileuitano Concilio: [c. 24.]

C. XIX. Let one who has been unwilling to obey his judges be excommunicated.

Whoever has been proved unwilling through contumacy to obey the judges: when this has been proved to the bishop of the first see, let him give letters so that none of the bishops shall communicate with that person until he obeys. GRATIAN. Likewise, that an appeal can be made after sentence is given is attested by Pope Fabian, who says, [to Bishop Hilary, letter III, c. 2]:

C. XIX. Excommunicetur, qui iudicibus suis obtemperare noluerit.

Quisquis probatus fuerit pro contumacia nolle obtemperare iudicibus, cum hoc primae sedis episcopo fuerit probatum, det litteras, ut nullus ei communicet episcoporum, donec obtemperet. Gratian. Item quod post datam sententiam appellari possit, Fabianus Papa testatur, dicens: [Hilario Episcopo ep. III. cap. 2.]

C. XX. An appeal shall not be denied to one whom a sentence has destined for punishment.

Let it be lawful to appeal even in criminal cases, and let the plea of appeal not be denied to one whom a sentence has destined for punishment. GRATIAN. The same author affirms this above, [in the same chapter]:

C. XX. Non denegetur ei appellatio, quem in supplicio sententia destinauit.

Liceat etiam in criminalibus causis appellare, nec uox appellandi denegetur ei, quem in supplicio sententia destinauerit. Gratian. Quod ante idem affirmat: [eod. cap.]

C. XXI. It is lawful for someone to appeal before sentence is given.

If anyone has perceived a judge to be adverse to him, let him utter the plea of appeal. GRATIAN. Part IV. But one who wishes to appeal after sentence has been given shall appeal within five days; within those same days he shall receive dimissory letters from the judge from whom he has appealed, and within those same days he shall set out on the journey to the judge to whom he has appealed. Hence it is found to have been established thus in the Theodosian laws:

C. XXI. Ante datam sententiam licet alicui appellare.

Si quis iudicem aduersum sibi senserit, uocem appellationis exhibeat. IV. Pars. Gratian. Post datam uero sententiam qui appellare uoluerit, infra quinque dies appellet et infra eosdem a quo prouocauit dimissorias accipiat et infra eosdem ad quem appellauit iter arripiat. Unde in Teodosianis legibus sic statutum inuenitur:

C. XXII. Within what time after sentence is given each person ought to appeal.

On account of the excessive license of appellants, lest they appear to have free discretion in reconsidering or revoking sentences, both periods for appeal and penalties have been established, so that whoever wishes to appeal before the judge who heard his case and to appeal to another judge shall appeal within five days, shall arrive without any evasion before the judge to whom he has appealed within these same five days, and the very day on which he received the letters shall be counted particularly among these five days. But if the journey is longer, in addition to the five days—

[PALEA.

C. XXII. Post datam sententiam infra quod tempus quisque appellare debeat.

Propter superfluam appellatorum licentiam, ne in retractandis uel reuocandis sententiis liberum habere arbitrium uiderentur et tempora appellationis, et penae constitutae sunt, ut quicumque apud iudicem, qui causam eius audiuit, appellare, et ad alium iudicem prouocare uoluerit, infra quinque dies appellet, in his ipsis quinque diebus ad iudicem, ad quem prouocauerit, sine aliqua dissimulatione perueniat, et ipse dies in quo accepit litteras, in his quinque diebus conputetur specialiter. C. XXIV. Dimissory letters are to be directed from the judge from whom the appeal is made to the judge to whom it has been made.

Likewise, [in the same place, title XXXIV]. From the judge from whom an appeal has been made, dimissory letters are to be directed to the judge who will take cognizance of the appeal; these are commonly called apostoli. Their request and receipt must officially be completed within the fifth day. These matters have already been interpreted above under the title concerning cautions and penalties for appeals. § 1. Those who have not requested, received, or delivered the dimissory letters within the established periods shall be excluded from bringing the action by a procedural bar and compelled to bear the penalty for appeal.

C. XXIV. A quo appellatur ad quem appellatum fuerit dimissoriae litterae dirigantur.

Item. [ibidem tit. XXXIV.] Ab eo, a quo appellatum est, ad eum, qui de appellatione cogniturus est, dimissoriae litterae dirigantur, que uulgo apostoli appellantur, quarum postulatio et acceptio intra quintum diem finienda est ex offitio. Ista iam superius sub titulo de cautionibus et penis appellationum interpretata sunt. §. 1. Qui intra statuta tempora dimissorias non postulauerint, uel acceperint, uel reddiderint, prescriptione ab agendo submoueantur et penam appellationis ferre cogantur.

C. XXV. Concerning those who appeal for the sake of delay.

Likewise, [in the same place, title XXXV, c. 2]. If anyone has appealed not from confidence in a just case but for the sake of introducing delay, lest sentence be pronounced against him, or, after confessing concerning his own deed, has wished to appeal lest he be condemned, appeals of this kind shall not be received.

C. XXV. De his, qui causa dilationis appellant.

Item. [ibidem tit. XXXV. c. 2.] Quicumque non confidentia iustae causae, sed causa afferendae morae, ne contra eum sententia proferatur, appellauerit, uel si de facto suo confessus, ne addicatur appellare uoluerit, huiusmodi appellationes non recipiantur.

C. XXVI. When a possessor appeals, while the outcome of the case is uncertain the fruits of the possession shall be sequestered.

Likewise, [in the same place, title XXXVI, c. 1]. Whenever, after the case has been heard, the possessor appeals from the judge, the fruits of the possession which is in dispute are deservedly sequestered while the outcome of the hearing to be pursued is uncertain. For if the claimant has appealed, this cannot be demanded from him, because that which he does not have cannot be sequestered. § 1. If an appeal is made concerning urban estates or slaves, their possessions or rents, or even the freight charge if the action concerns the freight of a ship, are customarily deposited.

> Item. [ibidem, tit. XXXVI. c. 1.] Quociens post auditam causam iudicem possessor appellat, fructus possessionis, de qua agitur, dum sequendae audientiae euentus dubius est, merito sequestrantur. Nam si petitor appellauerit, ab eo hoc non potest postulari, quia non potest sequestrari quod non habet. §. 1. Si propter predia urbana uel mancipia appellatur, possessiones eorum uel mercedes, uel uectura etiam, si de nauis naulo agatur, deponi solent.

C. XXVII. One who appeals unjustly is in every way to be punished.

Likewise, [in the same place, title XXXVII, c. 1]. Whenever an appeal is pronounced unjust, the appellant is in every way to be punished, so that he is compelled to repay the expenses which his adversary incurred while pursuing it, not singly but fourfold. GRATIAN. By the foregoing authorities each person is permitted to appeal within five days after sentence is given. Justinian afterwards corrected this in his constitutions and decreed that the remedy of appeal was to be given to each person within ten days, saying:

> C. XXVII. Iniuste appellans omnimodo puniendus est.
> Item. [ibidem, tit. XXXVII. c. 1.] Omnimodo puniendus est, quociens iniusta appellatio pronunciatur, sumptus, quos, dum sequeretur, aduersarius inpendit, reddere cogatur non simplos, sed quadruplos. Gratian. Premissis auctoritatibus infra quinque dies post datam sententiam cuique appellare permittitur. Quod postea Iustinianus in constitutionibus suis corrigens, infra decem dies appellationis remedium cuique dandum decreuit, dicens:

C. XXVIII. The remedy of appeal is granted within ten days.

Emperor Justinian Augustus. Imposing very many remedies upon the severity of the earlier laws, and especially making these provisions concerning appeals, we have deemed it necessary in the present instance also to arrive at a benefit of this kind. For it had been provided by antiquity that, if anyone conducted litigation in person and was condemned, he had the license to appeal for only two days; but if a case was argued through a procurator, it was extended to the next three days. From experience of affairs, however, we found this to be sufficiently harmful; for many men, ignorant of the subtlety of the laws and thinking that appeals were to be presented within three days, fell into immediate danger and lost their cases when two days had elapsed. Hence we deemed it necessary to provide a suitable remedy for a matter of this kind. And we decree that all appeals—whether the cases are argued in person, through procurators, through defenders, or through curators and tutors—can be offered to the judges whom it concerns, whether great or lesser, within the space of ten days to be numbered from the reading of the sentence, with the most exalted praetorian prefecture excepted. Thus it shall be lawful for a man to deliberate most fully within that space whether he ought to appeal or to remain at rest, so that the work of appeal may not be undertaken repeatedly because fear presses upon him, but all may have an opportunity for examination, which can restrain the unconsidered ardors of men.

§ 1. In addition, we decree that, if at any time litigation is expected to be brought into our consistory and it should perhaps happen that the imperial majesty, occupied with public cases through provisions for worldly affairs, cannot convene the Fathers so that the case may be argued, the litigation shall not be endangered by this. For what fault is it of the litigants if the imperial summit is occupied? Or who is of such authority that he can constrain an unwilling prince to convene the Fathers and the other nobles? But if anything of this kind has occurred, the case shall remain untouched until the emperor, moved of his own accord, orders the nobles to be convened, permits the litigation to be introduced, and permits all things to proceed according to custom.

§ 2. In a third chapter, that also must be arranged which antiquity established well but novelty neglected. For when the venerable authority of antiquity so ordered the magistrates that some were greater, some intermediate, and some lesser, and appeals from lesser judges were remitted not only to the greatest judges but also to the tribunal of judges of spectable rank, so that they too might conduct the litigation with the sacred court employed, novelty abandoned this. It happened, therefore, that our greatest judges were disturbed over the smallest cases, and men were wearied by great expenditures on account of the smallest cases, so that perhaps the valuation of the entire litigation would not suffice for judicial expenses. We therefore decree that, whenever an appeal from the Egyptian region or either Libya joined to it is expected, up to the amount of ten pounds of gold, it shall not come to this royal city but to the Augustal prefect, who shall hear and decide the case in the place of the sacred cognizor, with no appeal to be presented to them after the final sentence. In like manner, whenever anything of this kind has arisen in the Asian or Pontic diocese, appeals up to the aforesaid amount of ten pounds of gold shall be remitted to the men of spectable rank—perhaps counts, proconsuls, praetors, or governors—to whom we have specially assigned the conduct of those litigations, so that they too, after the likeness of the Augustal prefect, may intervene in the place of the sacred cognizor and bring the cases to decision with no hope of appeal, in fear only of God and the laws. But the eastern regions shall send cases suspended by appeal and limited to the amount of ten pounds of gold to the man of spectable rank, the Count of the East, who in like manner will impose a hearing and an end upon them.

This, of course, is to be observed: men of spectable rank or other judges of spectable rank shall not transmit their appeals in litigations, of whatever amount they may be, to other judges adorned with the same spectable rank—since appeals ought not to be referred to equal judges, but ought to ascend from a lesser judgment to a greater tribunal. Instead, their appeals, of whatever amount they may be, as was said, shall be directed to the most illustrious prefecture, which shall decide them together with the eminent man who is quaestor at that time, with both offices providing assistance: that is, both from the sacred bureaus according to custom and from the praetorian prefect. Yet we decree these things in such a manner that neither from dukes nor from other judges of spectable rank—to whom perhaps, even if they are private persons, the imperial majesty has entrusted cases—shall an appeal proceed to the aforementioned judges of spectable rank, lest the case appear to proceed not by steps but perversely. Rather, it shall be referred from provincial governors and judges assigned by us, if they are not judges of spectable rank, within the aforementioned amount. But if those assigned by us as judges are illustrious, whose summits of dignity are above spectable rank, or if they are dukes, who in every respect are adorned with spectable rank, or if those delegated by the prince possess spectable dignity, their appeals, under whatever amount, shall be referred in the ancient manner to the competent judges in this royal city. All other things established in appeals, whether by ancient lineage, by the authority of earlier constitutions, or by our humanity, are to be kept untouched and inviolate.

C. XXVIII. Infra decem dies appellationis remedium conceditur.

Inperator Iustinianus Augustus. Anteriorum legum acerbitati plurima remedia inponentes, et maxime hec circa appellationes facientes, et in presenti ad huiusmodi beneficium peruenire duximus esse necessarium. Antiquitati etenim cautum erat, ut si quis per se litem exercuerit et fuerit condempnatus, intra duos dies tantummodo licentiam appellationis haberet; sin autem per procuratorem causa uentilata sit, et in triduum proximum eam extendi. Ex rerum autem experientia inuenimus hoc satis esse dampnosum; plures enim homines ignaros subtilitatis legum, et putantes in triduum prouocationes esse porrigendas in promptum periculum incidisse, et biduo transacto causas perdidisse. Unde necessarium duximus huiusmodi rei conpetenter mederi. Et omnes appellationes sancimus, siue per se, siue per procuratores, seu per defensores, uel curatores et tutores uentilentur, posse intra decem dierum spatium a recitatione sententiae numerandum ab his iudicibus, quorum interest, offerri, siue magni siue minores sint (excepta uidelicet sublimissima pretoriana prefectura), ut liceat homini intra id spatium plenissime deliberare, siue appellandum ei sit, siue quiescendum; ne timore instante opus appellatorium frequentetur, sed sit omnibus inspectionis copia, que indiscussos hominum calores potest refrenare. §. 1. Ad hec sancimus, si quando lis speratur in nostrum inferri consistorium, si forte contigerit inperatoriam maiestatem publicis occupatam causis ex mundanis prouisionibus non posse conuocare patres, quatinus causa agitetur, non ex hoc litem periclitari. Quod enim uicium est litigantium, si culmen inperatorium occupetur? uel quis tantae est auctoritatis, ut nolentem principem possit ad conuocandos patres ceterosque proceres coarctare? Sed si quid tale euenerit, causa intacta permaneat, donec inperator motus sua sponte et conuocari proceres iusserit, et litem inferri patiatur, et omnia secundum morem procedere. §. 2. Illud etiam in tertio capitulo disponendum est, quod antiquitas bene statuit, nouitas autem neglexit. Cum enim ueneranda uetustatis auctoritas ita magistratus digessit, ut alii maiores, alii medii, alii minores sint, et appellationes a minoribus iudicibus non solum ad maximos iudices remitterentur, sed ad spectabilium iudicum tribunal, quatinus et ipsi sacro auditorio adhibito litem exercerent, nouitas autem hoc dereliquit, euenit, ut super minimis causis maximi nostri iudices inquietentur, et homines propter minimas causas magnis fatigentur dispendiis, ut forsitan totius litis estimatio ad sumptus iudiciales non sufficeret. Ideoque sancimus, si quando ex Egiptiaco tractu uel adiuncta ei utraque Libia prouocatio speratur usque ad decem librarum auri quantitatem, non in hanc regiam urbem eam uenire, sed ad prefectum augustalem, qui audiat et causam dirimat uice sacri cognitoris, nulla eis post diffinitiuam sententiam appellatio est porrigenda. Similique modo quociens in Asiana diocesi uel Pontica tale aliquid emerserit, usque ad predictam quantitatem decem librarum auri appellationes ad uiros spectabiles, comites forte, uel proconsules, uel pretores, uel moderatores, quibus specialiter easdem lites peragendas deputauimus, remittantur, quatinus et hi ad similitudinem prefecti augustalis uice sacri cognitoris intercedant et causas sine spe quidem appellationis, Dei tantum et legum timore perferant decidendas. Orientales autem tractus causas appellatione suspensas, et usque ad decem librarum auri quantitatem limitatas, ad uirum spectabilem comitem orientis mittere, simili modo audientiam et finem eis inpositurum. Illo uidelicet obseruando, uti uiri spectabiles uel alii spectabiles iudices non ad alios eadem spectabilitate decoratos iudices suas transmittant appellationes in litibus, quantaecumque sint quantitatis (cum non oporteat ad conpares iudices appellationes referri, sed a minore iudicio in maius tribunal ascendere), sed ad illustrissimam prefecturam illorum appellationes, cuiuscumque sint quantitatis, (ut dictum est) dirigantur, que una cum uiro excelso pro tempore questore eas dirimat utroque offitio subministrante, id est tam ex sacris scriniis more solito quam prefecto pretorio. Ita tamen hec sancimus, ut nec a ducibus uel ab aliis spectabilibus iudicibus (quibus forte et si priuati sint, inperialis maiestas causas iniunxerit) appellatio ad memoratos iudices spectabiles currat ne causa non gradatim procedere, sed perperam uideatur; sed a presidibus quidem prouinciarum, et iudicibus a nobis datis, si non sint spectabiles iudices, intra memoratam quantitatem referetur. Si autem uel illustres sint dati a nobis iudices (quibus apices dignitatum super spectabilitatem sunt) uel duces, qui omnimodo spectabitilate sunt decorati, uel hi, qui principe delegati sunt, spectabilem habeant dignitatem, eorum appellationes sub quacumque quantitate in hanc regiam urbem ad conpetentes antiquo more iudices referantur, aliis omnibus, que in appellationibus statuta sunt uel antiqua prosapia, uel ab auctoritate anteriorum constitutionum, uel a nostra humanitate, intactis illibatisque custodiendis.

[C. XXIX.]

From the Digest, under the title When an Appeal Is to Be Made, law 1, [§ Two days]. Two or three days for an appeal shall be computed from the day on which sentence was delivered. § 1. What, then, if sentence was spoken under a condition? Do we compute the time for appealing from the day of the sentence, or from the day on which the condition of the sentence was fulfilled? Certainly a sentence ought not to be stated under a condition; but if it has been so stated, what will be done? It is useful that the periods for appealing ought to be computed immediately. § 2. What is prescribed concerning sentences—that an appeal be made on either the second or the third day—is also to be observed in the other matters from which, although a sentence is not indeed pronounced, an appeal nevertheless ought and can be made, as when someone is nominated to a tutorship or to other civil duties and his excuse is not admitted. § 3. If perhaps immediately after sentence has been spoken, the person who pronounced it has not made himself available, as is accustomed to happen, it must be said that this does no harm to the appeal. For as soon as the appellant has an opportunity to approach him, he will be able to appeal. Therefore, if the judge immediately withdrew himself, aid is similarly to be given. § 4. What, then, if the circumstance of the hour causes him to withdraw? If perhaps sentence was spoken at the very last hour, he will surely not appear to have withdrawn himself. § 5. We always understand there to be an opportunity to approach if he has made himself available in public. But if he has not done so, is it to be imputed to anyone that he did not come to the judge's house, did not approach him in his gardens, and, further, did not go to his suburban villa? The better view is that it ought not to be imputed. Accordingly, if there was no opportunity to approach him in public, it will be better said that there was no opportunity to approach. § 6. If anyone did not have an opportunity to approach the very person from whom he appealed in order to give him the petitions, but does have access to the person to whom he appealed, it must be considered whether it can be pleaded against him as a procedural bar that he did not approach the latter. We follow this law: if there was an opportunity to approach the latter, the procedural bar has effect. § 7. It is evident that a person's own case is one whose advantage or loss pertains to him in his own name. § 8. If sentence has been pronounced against an absent person, the two or three days are to be computed from when he knows, not from when it was pronounced. But when it is said that an absent person can appeal from when he knows, we understand this thus: if he was not defended in the case through a procurator. For if the procurator did not appeal, it is difficult for the principal to be heard.

[C. XXIX.]

Digestis titulo Quando appellandum sit, lege 1. [§. Biduum] Biduum uel triduum appellationis ex die sententiae latae conputandum erit. §. 1. Quid ergo, si sententia fuerit sub condicione dicta, utrum ex die sententiae tempus conputamus ad appellandum, an uero ex die, quo condicio sententiae extitit? Sane quidem non est sub condicione sententia dicenda; sed si fuerit dicta, quid fiet? Et est utile statim tempora ad appellandum conputari debere. §. 2. Quod in sententiis preceptum est, ut uel altera die, uel tertia prouocetur, hoc etiam in ceteris obseruandum est, ex quibus sententia quidem non profertur, appellari tamen oportet et potest, ut cum quis ad tutelam uel ad alia ciuilia munera nominatur, eius excusatio non admittitur. §. 3. Si forte post sententiam statim dictam copiam sui non fecerit is, qui pronunciauit (ut fieri assolet), dicendum est nichil nocere appellationi. Nam ubi primum copiam eius habuerit, poterit prouocare. Ergo si statim se subtraxit, similiter subueniendum est. §. 4. Quid ergo, si condicio horae efficit, ut se reciperet? Si forte dicta sit sententia iam suprema hora, utique non uidebitur se subtraxisse. §. 5. Adeundi autem facultatem semper accipimus, si in publico sui copiam fecerit. Ceterum, si non fecit, an inputetur alicui quod ad domum eius non uenerit, quodque in hortos non accesserit, et ulterius quod ad uillam suburbanam? Magisque est ut non debeat inputari. Quare si in publico eius adeundi facultas non fuit, melius dicetur facultatem non fuisse adeundi. §. 6. Si quis ipsius quidem, a quo appellauit, adeundi facultatem non habuit, ut ei libellos daret, eius autem, quem appellauit, habeat copiam, uidendum, an ei prescribi possit quod eum non adierit. Et hoc iure utimur, ut, si alterius adeundi copia fuit, prescriptio locum habeat. §. 7. Palam est, eam esse propriam causam, cuius emolumentum uel dampnum ad aliquem suo nomine pertinet. §. 8. Si aduersus absentem fuerit pronunciatum, biduum uel triduum ex quo quis scit conputandum est, non ex quo pronunciatum est. Quod autem dicitur absentem posse prouocare ex quo scit, sic accipimus, si non in causa per procuratorem defensus est. Nam si ille non prouocauit, difficile est ut hic audiatur. §. 9. Si quidem in insulam deportandum annotauerit preses prouinciae, et inperator rescripserit ut deportetur, uideamus quando sit prouocandum, utrum cum inperator rescripserit, an cum ei scribitur? Et putem, tunc appellandum esse, cum recipi eum preses iubet. Ceterum uerendum est, ne sero sit, ut tunc prouocetur, cum inperator insulam ei assignauerit; conprobata enim sententia presidis tunc solet insulam assignare. Rursus illud uerendum est, si mendaciis apud principem onerauit eum, quem deportandum laborat, intercludit uiam prouocandi. Quid ergo est? Recte dicetur humanitate suggerente ut et hoc illo tempore non frustra prouocaretur, quia non aduersus principem, sed aduersus iudicis calliditatem prouocauit. §.

10. Illud uideamus, si, cum inperatori scriberetur, exemplum litterarum litigatori editum sit neque is appellauerit, et postea contra eum rescriptum sit, an appellare a litteris pridem sibi editis possit? quia qui tunc non appellauerit uera esse que scripta sunt consensisse uidetur, nec est audiendus, si dicat euentum rescripti sacri se sustinuisse.

C. XXX.

From the title On Appeals That Are to Be Received or Not. Part V. Appellants are not customarily heard unless they are persons whose interests are involved, persons to whom a mandate was given, or persons conducting another's business which the defendant would immediately ratify. But even if a mother has appealed from filial devotion, it must be said that she too ought to be heard; and if she has preferred to take care that litigation be prepared, she does not appear to intermeddle, although she cannot defend at the beginning. § 1. An appeal can be made before sentence if a judge has interlocutorily ordered that torture be applied in a civil matter, or in a criminal matter if he does this contrary to the laws. § 2. The request of one who frustrates the conduct of a case for the reason that he says he has given a petition to the prince and awaits a sacred rescript is prohibited from being heard; if he has appealed for that reason, the sacred constitutions prohibit his appeal from being received.

C. XXX.

De appellationibus recipiendis uel non. V. Pars. Non solent audiri appellantes, nisi hi, quorum interest, uel quibus mandatum est, uel qui negotium gerunt alienum, quod mox reus ratum haberet. Sed et si mater, ex pietate prouocauerit, dicendum est et hanc audiri debere, et si litem preparandam curare maluerit, intercedere non uidetur, licet ab initio defendere non potest. §. 1. Ante sententiam appellari potest, si questionem in ciuili negotio habendam iudex interlocutus sit, uel in criminali, si contra leges hoc faciat. §. 2. Eius, qui ideo causam agere frustratur, quod dicit se libellum principi dedisse, et sacrum rescriptum expectare, audiri desiderium prohibetur, si ob eam causam prouocauerit, appellatio eius recipi sacris constitutionibus prohibetur.

C. XXXI. Concerning dimissory letters.

[Likewise Marcian, book 2 On Appeals, under the title On Dimissory Petitions, sole law]. After an appeal has been interposed, letters are to be given by the judge from whom the appeal was made to the person who will take cognizance of the appeal, whether the prince or someone else; these letters are called dimissory letters or apostoli. The sense of the letters is as follows: that, for example, Lucius Titius has appealed from that sentence which was pronounced between him and Maevius. It is sufficient to have requested the dimissory letters urgently and repeatedly within the prescribed time; and if he does not receive them, let him formally attest that very fact. For the constitutions require urgency from the person requesting dimissory letters. It is just, therefore, that, if it was due to the person who ought to give the letters that he failed to give them, this should not harm the person receiving them. § 1. Under the title That Nothing Be Altered. When an appeal has been interposed, whether it has been received or not, nothing ought to be altered in the meantime. § 2. If anyone condemned for several crimes has appealed concerning some but not others, it is asked whether his punishment is to be delayed or not. If the crimes concerning which the appeal was interposed are indeed graver, but that concerning which he did not appeal is lighter, the appeal is in every way to be received and the punishment delayed. But if he deserved a graver sentence from the category concerning which no appeal was made, the punishment is in every way to be imposed.

GRATIAN. The form of the apostoli is this: "I, N., bishop of the holy church of Bologna, by these apostoli release you, Roland the priest, chaplain of Saint Apollinaris, from observance of my judgment to the Apostolic See to which you have appealed." The form of an appeal is this: "I, Adelinus, minister of the church of Saint Regina, although unworthy, perceiving myself to be excessively burdened by lord Walter, archbishop of the holy church of Ravenna, appeal to the Roman See and request apostoli." § 1. But if he wishes to appeal after sentence has been given, this will be the manner of appealing for him: "I, A., minister of the church of Saint Regina, although unworthy, appeal to the Roman See against the sentence unjustly delivered against me by lord Walter, archbishop of the holy church of Ravenna, on the day before the Kalends of May, in the year of the incarnation of the Lord 1105, on the fourth day of the week, and request apostoli." § 2. But if one or two persons wish to appeal on behalf of several, they shall appeal thus: "We, G. and P., syndics of the canons of the holy church of Bologna, perceiving ourselves to be excessively burdened, or against the sentence, etc., appeal to the Roman See and demand apostoli." Appeals of this kind ought to be made in writing. A Catholic, however, is not permitted to appeal to the judgment of a person of another faith. Hence in the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 7]:

C. XXXI. De libellis dimissoriis.

[Item Marcianus l. 2. De appellationibus, tit. De libellis dimissoriis, l. unica.] Post appellationem interpositam litterae dandae sunt ab eo, a quo appellatum est, ad eum, qui de appellatione cogniturus est siue principem, siue quem alium, quas litteras dimissorias siue apostolos appellant. Sensus autem litterarum est talis: appellasse (puta) Lucium Titium a sententia illius, que inter illum et Meuium dicta fuit. Sufficit autem petisse intra tempus dimissorias instanter et sepius, et si non accipiat, id ipsum contestetur. Nam instantiam petentis dimissorias constitutiones desiderant. Equum est igitur, si per eum steterit, qui debeat dare litteras, quo minus det, ne hoc accipienti noceat. §. 1. Titulo: Nichil nouari. Appellatione interposita, siue ea recepta sit siue non, medio tempore nichil nouari oportet. §. 2. Si quis ex pluribus facinoribus condempnatus propter quedam appellauerit, propter quedam non, utrum sit differenda pena eius, an non, queritur. Et si quidem grauiora sunt crimina, ob que appellatio interposita est, leuius autem id, propter quod non appellauit, recipienda est omnino appellatio, et differenda pena. Si uero grauiorem sententiam meruit ex ea specie, ex qua non est appellatum, omnino pena inponenda est. Gratian. Forma apostolorum hec est: "Ego En. sanctae Bononiensis ecclesiae episcopus, te presbiterum Rolandum, capellanum S. Apollinaris, ad apostolicam sedem, quam appellasti, ab obseruatione mei iudicii his apostolis dimitto." Forma uero appellationis hec est: "Ego Adelinus S. Reginae ecclesiae minister licet indignus sentiens me pregrauari a domino Gualterio S. Rauennatis ecclesiae archiepiscopo Romanam sedem appello, et apostolos peto." §. 1. Si uero post datam sententiam appellare uoluerit, hic erit ei modus appellandi: "Ego A. sanctae Reginae ecclesiae minister licet indignus contra sententiam domini Gualterii sanctae Rauennatis ecclesiae archiepiscopi iniuste in me latam pridie Kal. Magi Anno incarnationis Domini MCV. feria quarta, Romanam sedem appello, et apostolos peto." §. 2. Si autem unus, uel duo pro pluribus appellare uoluerint, sic appellabunt: "Ego G. et P. sindici canonicorum Sanctae Boloniensis Ecclesiae sentientes nos pregrauari uel contra sententiam, etc. Romanam sedem appellamus, et apostolos postulamus." Huiuscemodi appellationes in scriptis fieri debent. Ad iudicium autem alterius fidei catholico appellare non licet. Unde in Cartaginensi Concilio IV. [c. 7.]

C. XXXII. Let a Catholic who commits his case to the judgment of unbelievers be excommunicated.

A Catholic who appeals his case, whether just or unjust, to the judgment of a judge of another faith shall be excommunicated. GRATIAN. Part VI. It is to be noted, however, that there are certain judges from whom one ought not to appeal. Hence it is read in the Council of Milevis, [c. 24]:

> C. XXXII. Excommunicetur catholicus, qui causam suam iudicio infidelium committit.
> Catholicus, qui causam suam, siue iustam siue iniustam, ad iudicium alterius fidei iudicis prouocat, excommunicetur. VI. Pars. Gratian. Notandum uero est, quod quidam iudices sunt, a quibus appellari non oportet. Unde in Concilio Mileuitano [c. 24.] legitur:

C. XXXIII. From which judges it is not lawful to appeal.

It shall not be lawful to appeal from judges whom common consent has chosen. GRATIAN. This is to be understood of arbitrators. For of judges, some are arbitral and others ordinary. Ordinary judges are those who receive lawful power from the apostolic pontiff, as ecclesiastical judges do, or from the emperor, as secular judges do. Arbitral judges are those who, possessing no power, are chosen as judges with the consent of the litigants, and to whom the matter is committed so that their sentence may be obeyed. Of these, some are ordinary and arbitral, while others are arbitral only. Ordinary and arbitral judges are those who, possessing lawful power, are chosen as arbitrators by persons who are not subject to their jurisdiction. Although these sit as arbitral judges and not as ordinary judges, nevertheless, by the privilege of their ordinary dignity, someone who is burdened will be able to appeal from them. Hence it is read in the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 10]:

> C. XXXIII. A quibus iudicibus prouocari non licet.
> A iudicibus, quos communis consensus elegerit, non liceat prouocari. Gratian. Quod de arbitris intelligendum est. Iudicum enim alii sunt arbitrarii, alii sunt ordinarii. Ordinarii uero sunt, qui ab apostolico, ut ecclesiastici, uel ab inperatore, utpote seculares, legitimam potestatem accipiunt. Arbitrarii sunt, qui nullam potestatem habentes cum consensu litigantium in iudices eliguntur, in quos conpromittitur, ut eorum sententiae stetur. Horum alii sunt ordinarii et arbitrarii, alii arbitrarii tantum. Ordinarii et arbitrarii sunt, qui legitimam potestatem habentes ab eis eliguntur ad arbitrandum, qui non sunt suae ditioni subpositi. Ab his, etsi ut arbitrarii sedeant, et non ut ordinarii, priuilegio tamen ordinariae dignitatis, grauatus aliquis appellare ualebit.
> Unde in Cartaginensi Concilio legitur III.: [c. 10.]

C. XXXIV. It is lawful to appeal from judges who are chosen by common consent.

Indeed, if judges have been elected by consent of the parties, it shall be lawful to appeal even from a smaller number than has been established.

> C. XXXIV. A iudicibus, qui eliguntur communi consensu prouocari licet.
> Sane, si ex consensu partium iudices electi fuerint, etiam a pauciori numero, quam constitutum est, liceat prouocari.

C. XXXV. Those who complain concerning judgments of bishops shall be heard by neighboring bishops, or by others added with their consent.

Likewise from the Council of Milevis, [c. 22]. It was resolved that, if priests, deacons, or other lower clerics complain concerning the judgments of their bishops in cases which they have, neighboring bishops shall hear them and settle between them whatever is at issue, with others added by the neighboring bishops with the consent of their own bishops. But if they think that an appeal is to be made even from them, let an appeal be made only to African councils or to the primates of their own provinces. But those who think that an appeal is to be made overseas shall be received into communion by no one within Africa. GRATIAN. Unless perhaps they have appealed to the Roman See. But one who has appealed ought not to be remitted to the judge from whom he appealed. Hence in the Council of Sardica, [c. 7]:

> C. XXXV. Qui de episcoporum iudiciis queruntur, a uicinis episcopis audiantur, uel ab aliis ex consensu eorum adhibitis.
> Item ex Concilio Mileuitano. [c. 22.] Placuit, ut presbiteri, diaconi, uel ceteri inferiores clerici in causis, quas habuerint, si de iudiciis episcoporum suorum questi fuerint, uicini episcopi eos audiant, et inter eos quicquid est finiant, adhibiti ab eis ex consensu episcoporum suorum. Quod si et ab eis prouocandum putauerint, non prouocetur, nisi ad Affricana concilia uel ad primates prouinciarum suarum. Ad transmarina autem qui putauerint appellandum, a nullo intra Affricam in communione suscipiantur. Gratian. Nisi forte Romanam sedem appellauerint. Is autem, qui appellauit, ad eum, a quo appellauit, remitti non debet. Unde in Sardicensi Concilio: [c. 7.]

C. XXXVI.

If a bishop has been accused, and all the assembled bishops of that region have judged and have cast him down from his rank, if the person who appears to have been cast down has appealed and has fled to the most blessed bishop of the Roman Church and wishes himself to be heard, then, if the Roman bishop thinks it just that the examination be renewed, let him deign to write to those bishops who are in the neighboring and adjoining province, so that the bishops may diligently investigate all things and determine them according to the faith of truth. But if the person who requests that his case be heard again moves the Roman bishop by his supplication to send priests from his side, it shall be in his power what he wishes and what he judges. And if he decrees that persons are to be sent who are present to judge with the bishops, so that they also possess the authority of the person by whom they were sent, it shall be in his discretion. But if he believes that the provincial bishops suffice to impose an end upon the business, he shall do what he has judged most wisely in his counsel. GRATIAN. Those who are arbitral only are persons who have received no lawful power; it is not lawful to appeal from them, because this is to be imputed to those who chose such persons for themselves. But if the sentence of those from whom appeal is made has been dissolved, it shall harm them in no respect, unless perhaps they are proved to have rendered an unjust sentence after being corrupted by enmity or money. Hence it is read in the same Third Council of Carthage, [c. 10]:

> Si episcopus accusatus fuerit, et omnes iudicauerint congregati episcopi regionis ipsius, et de gradu suo deiecerint eum, si appellauerit qui deiectus uidetur et confugerit ad beatissimum Romanae ecclesiae episcopum, et uoluerit se audiri, si iustum putauerit ut renouetur examen, scribere episcopis dignetur episcopus Romanus his, qui in finitima et propinqua altera prouincia sunt, ut episcopi diligenter omnia requirant et iuxta fidem ueritatis diffiniant. Quod si is, qui rogat causam suam iterum audiri, deprecatione sua mouerit episcopum Romanum, ut de latere suo presbiteros mittat, erit in potestate eius quid uelit, et quid estimet. Et si decreuerit mittendos esse qui presentes cum episcopis iudicent, ut habeant etiam auctoritatem personae illius, a quo destinati sunt, erit in eius arbitrio. Si uero crediderit sufficere episcopos prouinciales, ut negotio terminum inponat, faciet quod sapientissime consilio suo iudicauerit. Gratian. Arbitrarii tantum sunt qui nullam legitimam potestatem acceperunt, a quibus appellari non licet, quia eis inputandum est qui sibi tales elegerunt. Si uero sententia eorum, a quibus appellatur, soluta fuerit, nichil oberit eis, nisi forte uel inimicitia uel pecunia deprauati iniustam probantur tulisse sententiam. Unde in eodem Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 10.] legitur.

C. XXXVII. When a sentence is dissolved through an appeal, it ought not to harm one who did not judge with an unjust mind.

Part VII. This also was resolved: when an appeal has been made from any ecclesiastical judges to other ecclesiastical judges where there is greater authority, it shall not harm those whose sentence was dissolved, if they could not be convicted of having judged either with a hostile mind or after being corrupted by some cupidity or favor. GRATIAN. But it is asked concerning the person from whom appeal is made whether he is to be summoned as a witness before the person to whom appeal is made concerning the business of which he undertook cognizance. Concerning this it was established thus in the Fifth Council of Carthage, [c. 1]:

C. XXXVII. Cum per appellationem sententia soluitur, non debet ei obesse, qui iniquo animo non iudicauit.

VII. Pars. Hoc etiam placuit, ut a quibuscumque iudicibus ecclesiasticis ad alios iudices ecclesiasticos, ubi est maior auctoritas, fuerit prouocatum, non eis obsit, quorum fuerit soluta sententia, si conuinci non potuerint uel inimico animo iudicasse, uel aliqua cupiditate aut gratia deprauati. Gratian. Queritur autem de eo, a quo appellatur, an sit deuocandus in testimonium apud eum, ad quem appellatur, super negotio, cuius cognitionem suscepit. De hoc ita statutum est in Concilio Cartaginensi V.: [c. 1.]

C. XXXVIII. A cleric shall not be summoned as a witness in that case of which he first undertook cognizance.

It is to be established that, if anyone wishes to conduct in the Church any case under the apostolic law imposed upon the churches, and perhaps the decision of the clerics has displeased one party, it shall not be lawful for the cleric who was present or was the cognizor to be summoned in the judgment as a witness, and no ecclesiastical person of any kind shall be assailed to give testimony. GRATIAN. Furthermore, from those to whom appeal was made, as is read in the African Council, [c. 63], it is not lawful to appeal further:

C. XXXVIII. Clericus non deuocetur ad testimonium illius causae, cuius primum cognitionem suscepit.

Statuendum est, ut qui in ecclesia quamlibet causam iure apostolico ecclesiis inposito agere uoluerit, et forsan decisio clericorum uni parti displicuerit, non liceat clericum in iudicium ad testimonium deuocari eum, qui presens uel cognitor fuit, et nulla ad testimonium dicendum ecclesiastici cuiuslibet persona pulsetur. Gratian. Ab eis quoque, ad quos prouocatum fuerit (sicut in Concilio Affricano [c. 63.] legitur) ulterius prouocari non licet:

C. XXXIX. It is not lawful to appeal from those to whom appeal was made.

But if an appeal has been made, let the person who appealed choose judges, and together with him the person against whom he appealed, so that thereafter it shall be lawful for neither to appeal from them. GRATIAN. This is to be understood after the second appeal, for it is not lawful to appeal a third time in one and the same case upon the same heads. Hence Emperor Justinian writes in book VII of the Code, under the title It Shall Not Be Lawful to Appeal a Third Time in One and the Same Case, [sole law]: "If anyone has appealed a second time in any litigation whatsoever, it shall not be lawful for him to use an appeal a third time in the same litigation upon the same heads, or to reconsider the sentences of the most excellent praetorian prefects. License is to be given to litigants, when an arbitrator has been assigned, to invoke the hearing of the very person who assigned him before joinder of issue, with a petition of this kind by no means obtaining the force of an appeal. § 1. But when a challenge has been made in a capital case or a case concerning civil status, those appealing ought to conduct their case not through procurators but in person." Hence Pope Hadrian says, [in the chapters collected by him, c. 44]:

> Si autem fuerit prouocatum, eligat qui prouocauerit iudices, et cum eo ille, contra quem prouocauerit, ut ab ipsis deinceps nulli liceat prouocare. Gratian. Post secundam prouocationem intelligendum est: tertio enim in una eademque causa super hisdem capitulis prouocare non licet. Unde in VII. libro Codicis, titulo non liceat in una eademque causa tertio prouocare, [lege unica] inperator Iustinianus scribit: "Si quis in quacumque lite iterum prouocauerit, non liceat ei tertio in eadem lite super hisdem capitulis prouocatione uti, uel sententias exellentissimorum prefectorum pretorio retractare, licentia danda litigatoribus, arbitro dato, ipsius audientiam, qui eum dedit, ante litis contestationem inuocare, et huiusmodi petitione minime prouocationis uim obtinente. §. 1. Cum autem in causa capitali uel status interpellatum fuerit, non per procuratores, sed per se ipsos appellantes causam suam agere oportet. Unde Adrianus Papa ait: [in capitulis a se collectis, cap. 44.]

C. XL. It is not lawful to pursue through a procurator an appeal interposed in a capital case or a case concerning civil status.

Whenever a challenge has been made in a capital case or a case concerning civil status, it is to be conducted not through procurators but by the parties themselves. GRATIAN. The period for pursuing an appeal is one year, or, if a just cause has intervened, two years. Hence it is read in the Authentic Constitutions, constitution II, collation V:

> C. XL. Appellationem in causa capitali uel status interpositam per procuratorem exequi non licet.
> Si quando in causa capitali uel causa status interpellatum fuerit, non per procuratores, sed per se ipsos est agendum. Gratian. Tempus autem exequendae appellationis annus est, uel, si iusta causa intercesserit, biennium. Unde in Autenticis constitutione II. collatione V. legitur:

[C. XLI.]

"If anyone appeals, a year shall be allowed, within which he shall pursue the litigation individually or jointly; or, if a just cause has intervened, another year is granted. When it has passed without the litigation being completed, the sentence remains. § 1. If the appellant is inactive, when one month remains of the two years it is lawful for the victor to enter so that the defendant may be sought; whether he has or has not been found, the victor shall present his allegations so that the sentence may either be confirmed or rescinded, with the absent party being condemned in every case for the expenses. If neither appears, the sentence remains after the second fatal period." In constitution II, in collation IV: § 2. "But litigation which is expected to be brought into the consistory of the prince remains untouched without harm from delay until he himself causes it to be introduced and decided by the nobles according to custom."

[GRATIAN.] But if the person who appealed, led by repentance, wishes to desist from the appeal, he is not prohibited, as the Emperors Arcadius and Honorius are read to have established in book VII of the Code, under the title On Appeals and Consultations, [law 28]: "If anyone has presented appellate petitions, let him know that he has license to change his decision and recover his petitions, lest the humanity of just repentance be cut off." § 1. There are, moreover, times when it is not necessary to interpose an appeal. For in the same book and under the same title, [law 27], the same Emperors decreed: "Nominations made by petitions or edicts without a public council are not valid, and it is not necessary to appeal from them."

Part VIII. § 2. Likewise, a final sentence which contains neither condemnation nor absolution is held as nothing. § 3. Likewise, a sentence delivered by a governor outside the customary order of judgments does not obtain the authority of a matter adjudged. § 4. Likewise, if a sentence has been delivered contrary to matters previously adjudged from which no appeal was made, it will not obtain the authority of a sentence, and therefore it is not necessary to appeal from it. § 5. Likewise, if a sentence is rendered contrary to written law—for example, when it is said that a deceased person was under fourteen years of age and lawfully made a testament—it obtains no force, nor is the aid of an appeal against it necessary. § 6. But if a sentence is spoken contrary to the right of a litigant—for example, when it is pronounced that a person under fourteen completed his fourteenth year and therefore lawfully made a testament—it is necessary to flee to the remedy of appeal. § 7. Likewise, if several judges have been assigned and it is alleged that only one of them pronounced sentence, there appears to be no necessity to appeal, since the sentence does not hold by law. § 8. Likewise, when judges can impose a fine according to a fixed basis and limit, if they have otherwise imposed a fine contrary to the measure established by law, that which appears to have been done contrary to law possesses no firmness and can be rescinded without appeal. § 9. It has also been decreed that venal sentences, which are delivered for a payment by corrupted judges, are invalid even without the aid of an interposed appeal. § 10. Likewise, if you have proved that because of the infirmity of your age you are incapable of the honor to which you were nominated, the unjust nomination will be removed without an appeal.

§ 11. There are also persons whose appeals are not received. For the appeal of one who, absent through contumacy, was condemned after he had been summoned to conduct the case once the business had first been examined summarily cannot be received. § 12. Likewise, let no homicide, poisoner, practitioner of magic, adulterer, or any of those who committed manifest violence be heard when appealing if he has been convicted by arguments, overcome by witnesses, and confessed the vice and crime even by his own voice. And this applies in notorious cases. § 13. But in hidden cases: if, after witnesses were produced, instruments presented, and other arguments furnished, sentence was delivered against him, and the person who was condemned either did not confess by his own voice at all or said something against himself after being terrified by fear of tortures, license to appeal is not denied him. § 14. Furthermore, an appeal from the sentence of his own judge shall be granted to no official, except only in a business which he perhaps began before his own judge on a civil basis concerning his patrimony. § 15. Likewise, whenever satisfaction of a fiscal account is demanded, a tax is exacted, or repayment of a public or even private debt which is evident and proved is demanded, judicial rigor is necessarily exercised against the contumacious person with appeal excluded. § 16. It is not possible to appeal from the execution of a sentence, unless perhaps the executor of the sentence exceeds the measure of the judgment. § 17. Likewise, if anyone has dared to appeal lest the will of a deceased person written in a testament be disclosed or lest those who have become known as written heirs be sent into possession, and the person who has cognizance of the matter has received the appeal, both the judge who so sluggishly showed connivance and the litigant who so inopportunely appealed shall be fined twenty pounds of silver. § 18. Likewise, if a case is stated concerning possession and its momentary state, which sentence is called interlocutory, even if an appeal has been interposed, the delivered sentence nevertheless shall take effect. § 19. Sometimes several persons together receive one and the same condemnation, and the diversity of deeds admits no separation. In that case, if all have appealed and, when one of them conducts the case, their appeal has been pronounced just, the benefit of the victory will also pertain to the others. But if only one has appealed and his appeal is pronounced just, it also benefits the person who did not appeal. § 20. But if one person has obtained restoration against a sentence by the aid of his age, this rescript does not benefit an adult who did not appeal by his own right. § 21. It appears, however, that not only has the necessity of receiving an appeal been imposed upon judges, but spaces of thirty days from the day of sentence have also been defined, within which it is proper that the record, together with the report, be furnished to the litigants. § 22. Similarly, an arbitrator is compelled to receive an appeal and give a report if he was delegated. § 23. Litigants, moreover, have the opportunity to appeal immediately by voice, even without petitions written out, when the matter adjudged demands it, both in civil and in criminal cases. § 24. No recourse can be made from the person who takes cognizance of the appeal to the judge from whom the appeal was made. Therefore, let them understand that the occasion for remitting litigants to the provinces has been taken away from them and completely excluded, since concerning every case in which an appeal has been interposed it is lawful to pronounce only that the appeal is either unjust or just. § 25. You will find all these things in book VII of the Code, from the title On Appeals and Consultations as far as the title It Shall Not Be Lawful in One and the Same Case.

"Si quis appellat, inquiratur annus, intra quem secundum se communiterue litem exequatur, aut, si iusta intercesserit causa, annus alius indulgetur, quo transacto lite non conpleta manet sententia. §. 1. Appellatore cessante, cum unus mensis superest ex biennio, licet uictori ingredi ut reus queratur, quo sine inuento siue non, suas afferat allegationes, ut uel confirmetur uel rescindatur sententia, omni casu absente in expensas condempnando. Neutro occurente post secundum fatalem permanet sententia." Constitutione secunda, in collatione IV.: §. 2. "Sed lis, que speratur in consistorium principis inferri, absque dampno morae manet intacta, donec ipse faciat eam introduci, et a proceribus secundum morem dirimi." [Gratian.] Si uero is, qui appellauit, penitentia ductus ab appellatione desistere uoluerit, non prohibetur, sicut in 7. libro Codicis titulo de appellationibus et consultationibus, [l. 28.] Inpp. Arcadius et Honorius statuisse leguntur: "Si quis libellos appellatorios ingesserit, sciat se habere licentiam arbitrium conmutandi et suos libellos recuperandi, ne iustae penitudinis humanitas amputetur." §. 1. Est autem quando appellationem interponi necesse non est. In eodem namque libro, et eodem titulo [l. 27.] idem Inpp. decreuerunt: "Nominationes libellis uel edictis factae, citra concilium publicum non ualent a quibus nec appellare necesse est." VIII. Pars. §. 2. Diffinitiua quoque sententia, que condempnationem uel absolutionem non continet, pro nulla habetur. §. 3. Item sententia citra solitum ordinem iudiciorum a preside prolata auctoritatem rei iudicatae non obtinet. §. 4. Item si sententia lata fuerit contra res prius iudicatas, a quibus prouocatum non est, sententiae auctoritatem non obtinebit, et ideo ab ea appellari non est necesse. §. 5. Item si sententia contra ius scriptum feratur, ueluti dum defunctus et minor XIV. annis fuisse, et testamentum iure fecisse dicitur, nullas uires obtinet, nec contra eam est necessarium prouocationis auxilium. §. 6. Si uero contra ius litigatoris sententia dicatur, ueluti dum minor XIV. annis, annum XIV. inpleuisse, ac per hoc testamentum iure fecisse pronunciatur, ad prouocationis remedium oportet confugere. §. 7. Item si plures iudices dati fuerint, et unus tantum ex his pronunciasse proponitur, non uidetur appellandi necessitas esse, cum sententia iure non teneat. §. 8. Item cum certa ratione et fine mulctare iudices possunt, si aliter contra legis statutum modum mulctam irrogauerint quod contra ius gestum uidetur firmitatem non tenet, et sine appellatione potest rescindi. §. 9. Venales quoque sententias, que in mercede a corruptis iudicibus proferuntur, et citra interpositae prouocationis auxilium infirmas esse decretum est. §. 10. Item si propter infirmitatem etatis ad honorem, ad quem nominatus es, inhabilem te esse probaueris, pretermissa appellatione iniqua nominatio remouebitur. §. 11. Sunt etiam, quorum appellationes non recipiuntur. Non enim potest recipi eius appellatio, qui per contumaciam absens, cum ad agendam causam negotio prius summatim perscrutato uocatus esset, condempnatus est. §. 12. Nullus etiam homicidarum, ueneficorum, maleficorum, adulterorum, itemque eorum, qui manifestam uiolentiam commiserunt, argumentis conuictus, testibus superatus, uoce etiam propria uicium scelusque confessus audiatur appellans. Et hoc in notoriis. §. 13. In occultis autem: Si testibus productis, instrumentis prolatis, aliisque argumentis prestitis sententia contra eum lata sit, et ipse, qui condempnatus est, aut minime uoce sua confessus sit, aut formidine tormentorum territus contra se aliquid dixerit, prouocandi licentia ei non denegatur. §. 14. Nulli quoque offitialium a sententia proprii iudicis prouocatio tribuatur, nisi in eo tantum negotio, quod ratione ciuili super patrimonio forte apud proprium iudicem inchoauerit. §. 15. Quociens etiam fiscalis calculi satisfactio postulatur aut tributum exposcitur, aut publici, uel etiam priuati debiti euidentis atque conuicti redibitio flagitatur, appellatione exclusa necessario in contumacem uigor iudiciarius exercetur. §. 16. Ab executione sententiae appellari non potest, nisi forte executor sententiae modum iudicationis excedat. §. 17. Si quis etiam ausus fuerit prouocare, ne uoluntas defuncti testamento scripta reseretur uel ne hii, quos scriptos patuerit heredes, in possessionem mittantur, et is, cuius de ea re notio erit, appellationem receperit, et iudex, qui tam ignaue conniuentiam adhibuerit, et litigator, qui tam inportune appellauerit, uiginti libris argenti mulctetur. §. 18. De possessione etiam et eius momento si causa dicatur, que sententia interlocutoria appellatur, quamuis prouocatio interposita fuerit, tamen lata sententia sortiatur effectum. §. 19. Quandoque unam eandemque condempnationem plures simul reportant, nec diuersitas factorum separationem accipit, quo casu, si omnes appellauerint, et uno ex his agente eorum appellatio iusta pronunciata fuerit, emolumentum uictoriae etiam ad alios pertinebit.

Si autem unus tantum appellauerit eiusque appellatio iusta pronunciata est, ei quoque prodest, qui non appellauit. §. 20. Quod si etatis auxilio unus contra sententiam restitutionem inpetraverit maiori, qui suo iure non appellauit, hoc rescriptum non prodest. §. 21. Iudicibus autem non solum suscipiendae appellationis necessitas uidetur inposita, uerum etiam XXX. dierum spatia ex die sententiae diffinita sunt, intra que gesta una cum relatione litigatoribus conuenit prestari. §. 22. Similiter arbiter appellationem suscipere et relationem dare conpellitur, si delegatus fuerit. §. 23. Litigatoribus uero copia est etiam non conscriptis libellis illico uoce appellare, cum res iudicata poposcerit, tam in ciuilibus quam in criminalibus causis. §. 24. Ab eo autem, qui de appellatione cognoscit, non potest fieri recursus ad iudicem, a quo fuerit prouocatum. Quapropter remittendi litigatores ad prouincias remotam sibi occasionem atque exclusam penitus intelligant, cum super omni causa interpositam prouocationem uel iniustam tantum liceat pronunciare, uel iustam. §. 25. Hec omnia in VII. libro Codicis inuenies, a titulo de appellationibus et consultationibus usque ad titulum ne liceat in una eademque causa.

Question VII

GRATIAN. Part I. That laymen are not to be heard in the accusation of bishops is attested by Pope Evaristus, who says, [to the Bishops throughout Egypt, letter II]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod uero laici in accusatione episcoporum non sint audiendi, Euaristus papa testatur, dicens: [Episcopis per Aegyptum, epist. II.]

C. I. Laymen are not to be received in the accusation of bishops.

A bishop is not to be reproved or accused by the people or by common persons, even if he is disorderly, because the life of rulers is disposed by God according to the merits of their subjects. I say these things for this reason: an ambusher is very often accustomed to turn good into evil and to place a stain upon the elect.

C. I. Laici in accusatione episcoporum recipiendi non sunt.

Non est a plebe aut uulgaribus hominibus arguendus uel accusandus episcopus, licet sit inordinatus, quia pro meritis subditorum disponitur a Deo uita rectorum. Ideo ista dico, quia insidiator bona sepissime solet conuertere in malum, et in electis ponit maculam.

C. II. A layman shall not accuse a cleric.

Likewise Pope Sylvester, [in the epilogue of the Roman Council]. Let no layman dare to bring a charge against a cleric.

C. II. Laicus clericum non accuset.

Item Siluester Papa. [in epilogo Concilii Romani.] Nullus laicus crimen audeat clerico inferre.

C. III. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Marcellus, [to the Eastern Bishops, letter II]. Let it not be lawful for a layman to accuse any cleric.

C. III. De eodem.

Item Marcellus Papa. [ad Episcopos orientales, ep. II.] Laico non liceat quemlibet clericum accusare.

C. IV. One who has been anathematized cannot accuse priests.

Likewise Pope Julius, [in the decrees, c. 36]. It was established in the holy Synod of Nicaea that no one anathematized shall be received in an accusation before us, nor shall those persons who do not wish to receive us in an accusation before them, since we know that we have been constituted by the Lord over them, not they over us. And just as a greater cannot be judged by a lesser, so neither can he be bound by him, because everything great is rare. We bear the burdens of all who are burdened—or rather, blessed Peter the Apostle bears them in us, whose place we fulfill by legation and by whose rule we are formed—so that, supported by his aid, we may now and forever be defended from all adversities.

C. IV. Anathematizatus sacerdotes accusare non potest.

Item Iulius papa. [in decretis, c. 36.] In sancta Nicena sinodo statutum est, ut nemo anathematizatus in nostra suscipiatur accusatione, nec illi, qui nos in sua accusatione nolunt recipere, cum nos super illos sciamus a Domino constitutos, non illos super nos, et sicut maior non potest a minore iudicari, ita nec colligari, quia rarum est omne quod magnum est. Portamus onera omnium, qui grauantur, quin imo hec portat in nobis B. Petrus apostolus, cuius uice fungimur legatione, et cuius regula informamur, quatinus eius fulti auxilio nunc et in perpetuum ab omnibus tueamur aduersis.

C. V. Concerning the same.

Likewise Eusebius, [to the Bishops of Gaul, letter I]. It has hitherto been observed and established that laymen have not accused bishops, because they are not of the same manner of life, and certain laymen are exceedingly hostile to them, especially since the bishops' life and manner of life ought to be separate and removed from the acts of laymen. Nor ought they to be assailed by those who do not wish to imitate their chastity and gravity, especially since the laymen do not wish to receive them in accusations against themselves.

C. V. De eodem.

Item Eusebius. [ad Episcopos Galliae, epist. I.] Laicos non accusasse episcopos hactenus obseruatum et constitutum est, quia non sunt eiusdem conuersationis, et oppido eis quidam existunt infesti, quippe cum uita eorum et conuersatio debeat esse secreta et a laicorum actibus remota, nec ab his inpeti debent, qui eorum castitatem et grauitatem nolunt imitari, maxime cum eos in suis nolunt recipere accusationibus.

C. VI. Neither clerics are to be received in the accusation of laymen, nor laymen in the accusation of clerics.

Likewise Fabian, Bishop of the city of Rome, to all the faithful. Just as priests or the other clerics are excluded from the accusation of secular laymen, so the laymen are to be excluded and removed from an accusation by the clerics; and just as the former shall not be received against the latter, so the latter shall not be received against the former, because, just as the manner of life of the Lord's priests ought to be separated from their manner of life, so also ought their litigation, because a servant of God ought not to litigate.

[PALEA.

C. VI. Nec clerici in accusatione laicorum, nec laici in accusatione clericorum sunt recipiendi.

Item Fabianus Episcopus urbis Romae cunctis fidelibus. Sicut sacerdotes uel reliqui clerici a secularium laicorum excluduntur accusatione, ita illi ab istorum sunt excludendi et alienandi criminatione, et sicut illi ab istis, ita et isti ab illis non recipiantur, quoniam sicut Domini sacerdotum segregata debet esse conuersatio ab eorum conuersatione, ita et litigatio, quia seruum Dei non oportet litigare.

[PALEA.

C. VII. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Mainz. It was decreed that priests are able both to accuse their parishioners and to give testimony against them. But if they have neglected to do so, they shall be subject to peril of their rank.]

C. VII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Maguntino. Decretum est, ut presbiteri suos plebeios et accusare et attestimoniare possint. Si autem neglexerint, sui gradus periculo subiacebunt.]

C. VIII. Laymen ought not to accuse clerics.

Likewise Clement, [to James, letter I]. Priests and the other ministers of the Church and all the people ought to love their bishops and obey their precepts, even if, which God forbid, they act otherwise, unless they have erred in the faith.

C. VIII. Laici clericos accusare non debent.

Item Clemens. [ad Iacobum, epist. I.] Sacerdotes et reliqui ministri ecclesiae omnisque plebs episcopos suos diligere debent, et eorum preceptis obedire, etiamsi aliter (quod absit) agant, nisi in fide errauerint.

[C. IX.]

The same. Divine Scripture shows what kind of condemnation threatens those who sin against fathers. For if Ham was cursed because he did not cover his father's shame, those who inflict insult upon fathers who perform the legation of God are worthy of a much greater condemnation. GRATIAN. Persons of lower orders are not to be received in an accusation of those in higher orders. Hence Pope Sylvester, [in the epilogue of the Roman Council]:

[C. IX.]

Idem. Qualis condempnatio eis inmineat, qui in patres peccant, diuina scriptura ostendit. Si enim Cham, quia non operuit pudenda patris, maledictus est, multo ampliori condempnatione digni sunt qui patribus legatione Dei fungentibus contumeliam inferunt. Gratian. Personae inferiorum ordinum in superiorum accusatione recipiendae non sunt. Unde Siluester Papa: [in epilogo Concilii Romani]

C. X. Lesser persons ought not to accuse greater persons.

A cleric cannot bring an accusation or bear testimony against an exorcist; an exorcist against an acolyte; an acolyte against a subdeacon; a subdeacon against a deacon; a deacon against a priest; or a priest against a bishop.

C. X. Minores non debent accusare maiores.

Clericus aduersus exorcistam, exorcista aduersus acolitum, acolitus aduersus subdiaconum, subdiaconus aduersus diaconum, diaconus aduersus presbiterum, presbiter aduersus episcopum accusationem dare aut testimonium ferre non ualet.

C. XI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Zephyrinus, [to the Bishops of Sicily, letter I]. Let no one among the highest be assailed by accusations of lesser persons.

C. XI. De eodem.

Item Zepherinus Papa. [ad Episcopos Siciliae, ep. I.] Summorum quispiam minorum accusationibus non inpetatur.

C. XII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Anacletus, [letter III]. By the sentence upon Ham, son of Noah, those are condemned who betray the fault of their teachers or prelates, like Ham, who did not cover his father's shame but displayed it for ridicule.

> C. XII. De eodem.
> Item Anacletus Papa. [epist. III.] Sententia Cham filii Noe dampnantur qui suorum doctorum uel prepositorum culpam produnt, ceu Cham, qui uerenda patris non operuit, sed ridenda monstrauit.

C. XIII. Sheep cannot accuse their shepherd unless he has strayed from the faith.

Likewise Pope Eusebius, [to the Bishops of Alexandria, letter II]. The sheep entrusted to their shepherd can neither reprove him—unless he has strayed from the faith—nor accuse him in any way, because the deeds of shepherds are not to be struck with the sword of the mouth, although they may rightly appear worthy of reproof. GRATIAN. Part II. By these authorities it is proved that subjects, whether laymen or clerics, cannot accuse their prelates. But this is to be understood of criminal and infamous persons, who are prepared to reprove the life of their prelates, not to imitate it. This is given to be understood from the words of Anacletus, who says:

> Item Eusebius Papa. [ad Episcopos Alexandriae ep. II.] Oues, que suo pastori commissae sunt, eum nec reprehendere (nisi a fide exorbitauerit), nec ullatenus accusare possunt, quia facta pastorum oris gladio ferienda non sunt, quamquam reprehendenda recte uideantur. II. Pars. Gratian. His auctoritatibus probatur, quod subditi, siue sint laici sine clerici, prelatos suos accusare non possunt. Verum de criminosis et de infamibus hoc intelligendum est, qui uitam prelatorum suorum parati sunt reprehendere, non imitari: quod ex uerbis Anacleti datur intelligi, qui ait:

C. XIV. Why laymen are not to be heard in the accusation of bishops.

Laymen are not to be heard in the accusation of bishops, because certain of them are exceedingly hostile to bishops, and it is unworthy that bishops be accused by those who do not wish to imitate their gravity.

> C. XIV. Quare laici non audiantur in accusatione episcoporum.
> Laici in accusatione episcoporum audiendi non sunt, quia oppido quidam eis infesti sunt, et indignum est ut ab eis accusentur, qui eorum grauitatem nolunt imitari.

C. XV. Priests can be accused only by suitable and approved men.

Likewise, [Anacletus to the Bishops of Italy, letter II]. The accusation of them, also, concerning which you wished to consult us, ought to be made only by suitable and most approved men who are free both of suspicions and of crimes, because the Lord did not wish the handlers of his sacred body to be defamed or calumniated by vile, reprobate, and unsuitable persons; rather, he himself cast the sinning priests out of the Temple with his own scourge. Hence it is clear that the highest priests, that is, bishops, are to be judged by God, not torn to pieces by human beings or by men of depraved life, but rather borne by all the faithful. The Lord himself gave the example, since in person and not through another he cast from the Temple the priests who were selling and buying. § 1. For, as I think, no one is found among us who wishes his servant to be judged by anyone other than himself. But if this has been presumed, either he himself grows angry with much indignation or, rather, seeks vengeance upon the other. § 2. Hence the Lord also says through the Prophet: "He who touches you touches the pupil of my eye." And a little later: § 3. If detractors of any persons whatsoever are judged severely and fall into the snare of perdition, much more are the assailants, detractors, and accusers of God's servants condemned; and unless they have corrected themselves, made worthy satisfaction to them, and performed penance, they undoubtedly go into the abyss and are burned by avenging flames. § 4. Considering these and other dangerous things, the Apostles established that the pillars of the holy Church of God—who are not undeservedly called the Apostles and their successors—should not easily be disturbed, torn to pieces, or accused. But if anyone has been stirred against them or their churches, or has a case, let him first have recourse to them with zeal for charity, so that, after being admonished in familiar conversation, they may heal those things which are to be healed and charitably amend those things which they have recognized are justly to be amended. But if any persons have presumed to tear them to pieces, accuse them, or assail them before doing these things, let them be excommunicated and by no means absolved before, through worthy satisfaction, as has already been said, they have performed penance, because an injury to them pertains to Christ, whose legation they perform.

C. XV. Sacerdotes non nisi a uiris idoneis et probatis accusari possunt.

Item. [Anacletus ad Episcopos Italiae, epist. II.] Accusatio quoque eorum, super qua nos consulere uoluistis, non nisi ab idoneis et probatissimis uiris, qui et suspicionibus et sceleribus careant, fieri debet, quia et Dominus sacri corporis sui tractatores a uilibus et reprobis et non idoneis personis infamari noluit, nec calumpniari, sed ipse proprio flagello peccantes sacerdotes a templo eiecit. Unde liquet, quod summi sacerdotes, id est episcopi, a Deo sunt iudicandi, non ab humanis, aut prauae uitae hominibus lacerandi, sed potius ab omnibus fidelibus portandi, ipso Domino exemplum dante, quoniam per se ipsum, et non per alium uendentes et ementes eiecit de templo sacerdotes. §. 1. Nullus enim (ut reor) inuenitur inter nos, qui uelit seruum suum ab alio quam a se iudicari. Quod si presumptum fuerit, aut multa indignatione ipse irascitur, aut potius uindictam querit super eum. §. 2. Unde et Dominus ait per Prophetam. "Qui uos tangit, tangit pupillam oculi mei." Et paulo post. §. 3. Si detractores quorumcumque grauiter iudicantur, et in perditionis laqueum cadunt, multo magis laceratores et detractores atque accusatores famulorum Dei dampnantur, et in baratrum (nisi se correxerint, et per eorum satisfactionem condignam egerint penitentiam) indubitanter uadunt, et uindicibus flammis exuruntur. §. 4. Hec et alia periculosa considerantes apostoli constituerunt, ne facile conmouerentur, aut lacerarentur, uel accusarentur columpnae sanctae ecclesiae Dei, que apostoli et successores eorum non inmerito dicuntur. Sed si quis aduersus eos uel ecclesias eorum conmotus fuerit aut causam habuerit, prius ad eos recurrat karitatis studio, ut familiari colloquio ea sanent conmoniti, que sananda sunt, et karitatiue emendent que iuste emendanda agnouerint. Si autem aliqui eos prius, quam hec egerint, lacerare, accusare uel infestare presumpserint, excommunicentur et minime absoluantur, antequam per satisfactionem (ut iam dictum est) condignam egerint penitentiam, quoniam iniuria eorum ad Christum pertinet, cuius legatione funguntur.

C. XVI. One who complains to a primate against a bishop before approaching him familiarly shall be deprived of communion.

Likewise Alexander, [letter I, c. 3]. If anyone believes that he has any just complaint against a bishop or authorities of the Church, he shall not first approach the primates or other judges before repeatedly—indeed, very often—approaching familiarly the very persons by whom he believes himself injured, so that he may receive from them either his justice or an excuse. But if he has acted otherwise, let him be deprived of communion by them and by others as a contemner of the Apostles and the other Fathers.

C. XVI. Communione priuetur, qui primati aduersus episcopum conqueritur prius, quam eum familiariter conuenerit.

Item Alexander. [epist. I. c. 3.] Si quis erga episcopum uel auctores ecclesiae quamlibet querelam iustam se habere crediderit, non prius primates aut alios adeat iudices, quam ipsos, a quibus se lesum existimat familiariter conueniat, non semel, sed sepissime, ut ab eis aut suam iustitiam accipiat, aut excusationem. Si autem secus egerit, ab ipsis et ab aliis communione priuetur tamquam apostolorum Patrumque aliorum contemptor.

C. XVII. Accusers of bishops shall not be heard unless their reputation has been examined.

Likewise Pope Evaristus, [to the Bishops throughout Egypt, letter II]. If there are any detractors or accusers of bishops or of the other priests, it is not fitting that they be heard by the judges of the Church before the suspicion or reputation concerning their standing is examined: with what intention, with what faith, with what rashness, with what life, with what conscience, or by what merit they have presumed these things—whether for God, for empty glory, from enmity, from hatred, or from cupidity.

C. XVII. Nisi opinione discussa non audiantur accusatores episcoporum.

Item Euaristus papa. [Episcopis per Aegyptum, ep. II.] Si qui sunt uituperatores aut accusatores episcoporum uel reliquorum sacerdotum, non oportet eos a iudicibus ecclesiae audiri, antequam eorum discutiatur estimationis suspicio uel opinio, qua intentione, qua fide, qua temeritate, qua uita, qua conscientia, quoue merito, si pro Deo, aut pro uana gloria, aut pro inimicitia, uel odio, aut cupiditate ista presumpserint.

C. XVIII. Those who are not of right faith and manner of life shall not accuse their elders.

Likewise Pope Callistus, [to the Bishops of Gaul, letter II]. In a judgment it is to be asked what manner of life and faith belong to the person who accuses and the person who is accused, because those who are not of right faith and manner of life, whose life is open to accusation, and whose faith and freedom are unknown, are not permitted to accuse their elders. Nor shall vile persons be received in the accusation of them.

C. XVIII. Maiores natu non accusent qui non sunt rectae fidei et conuersationis.

Item Calixtus Papa. [ad Episcopos Galliae, ep. II.] Querendum est in iudicio, cuius sit conuersationis et fidei is, qui accusat, et is, qui accusatur, quoniam hii, qui non sunt rectae fidei ac conuersationis, et quorum uita est accusabilis, et quorum fides et libertas nescitur, non permittuntur maiores natu accusare. Neque uiles personae in eorum recipiantur accusatione.

C. XIX. An accusation of bishops shall not be received without two or three witnesses.

Likewise Pope Sixtus II, [to the Bishops of Spain, letter II]. An accusation of bishops is not easily to be received, for the Lord says: "You shall not receive the voice of a lie." And the Apostle says that a written accusation against a priest is not to be received without two or three suitable witnesses. If these precautions are to be taken concerning priests or the other faithful, how much more concerning bishops?

> C. XIX. Absque duobus uel tribus testibus non recipiatur episcoporum accusatio.
> Item Sixtus Papa. [II. ad Episcopos Hispaniae, ep. II.] Accusatio episcoporum non est facile recipienda, dicente Domino: "Non suscipias uocem mendacii." Et Apostolus inquit, aduersus presbiterum inscriptionem non recipiendam absque duobus uel tribus idoneis testibus. Si hec de presbiteris uel ceteris fidelibus sunt precauenda, quanto magis de episcopis?

C. XX. No one shall be removed from communion merely for bringing an action against a bishop.

Likewise from the First Council of Orléans, [c. 8]. If anyone believes that something is to be reclaimed from a bishop, either concerning the right of the church or concerning his own right, if he has alleged nothing insulting or criminal, it shall not be lawful for him to be removed from the communion of the Church merely for bringing the action.

> C. XX. Pro sola conuentione episcopi non submoueatur aliquis a communione.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I. c. 8.] Si quis ab episcopo, uel de ecclesiae uel de proprio iure crediderit aliquid repetendum, si nichil conuicii aut criminationis obiecerit, eum pro sola conuentione a communione ecclesiae non liceat submoueri.

C. XXI. Why subjects cannot reprove their prelates.

Likewise Pope Evaristus, [letter II]. There are some who perversely reprove their prelates if the latter have been even a little troublesome to them. GRATIAN. From all these authorities it is given to be understood that those are removed from accusation who seek to defame and reprove the life of their prelates, not from an affection of charity but from the depravity of their own conduct. § 1. But that criminal persons are prohibited by the foregoing authorities from the accusation of prelates is attested by Augustine in the book of Soliloquies, who says thus:

> C. XXI. Quare subditi prelatos suos reprehendere non possunt.
> Item Euaristus Papa. [epist. II.] Sunt nonnulli, qui prepositos suos peruerse reprehendunt, si uel parum ipsis molesti extiterint.
> Gratian. Ex his omnibus datur intelligi, quod illi ab accusatione remouentur, qui non affectione karitatis, sed prauitate suae actionis uitam eorum diffamare et reprehendere querunt. §. 1. Quod uero premissis auctoritatibus criminosi prohibeantur ab accusatione prelatorum, testatur Augustinus in libro Soliloquiorum, ita dicens:

C. XXII. Not all subjects, but only criminal persons, are prohibited from accusing prelates.

Prelates presume that they ought not to be reproved or accused because the canons do not establish that they are to be accused indiscriminately. Yet this is denied only to criminal persons, since Truth itself establishes concerning reproof: “If I have spoken badly, bear witness concerning the evil.” GRATIAN. It is objected against this distinction: The sacred canons themselves distinguish in what case shepherds are to be accused by their subjects, saying: “Let sheep neither accuse nor reprove their shepherds unless they have strayed from the faith.” Behold the case in which they are to be accused by subjects; in other cases, by no means. GRATIAN. Part III. § 1. The response to this objection is as follows: That distinction of the canons is understood of criminal and infamous persons. For criminal and infamous sheep cannot accuse or reprove their shepherd unless he has strayed from the faith. But if he has strayed from the faith, so great is the stain of that crime that, for his accusation, slaves are admitted against a master, as are any criminal and infamous persons against anyone whatsoever. Hence Pope Dionysius, [to Bishop Severus, letter II]:

C. XXII. Non omnes subditi, sed criminosi tantum prohibentur accusare prelatos.

Presumunt prelati non debere se reprehendi uel accusari, pro eo, quod canones non eos passim constituunt accusandos. Quod tamen negatur solum criminosis, cum de reprehendendo ueritas ipsa constituat: "Si male locutus sum, testimonium perhibe de malo." Gratian. Opponitur huic distinctioni: Ipsi sacri canones distinguunt, in quo casu pastores sint accusandi a subditis, dicentes: "Oues pastores suos non accusent nec reprehendant, nisi a fide exorbitauerint." Ecce in quo casu sint accusandi a subditis: in aliis autem minime. III. Pars. §. 1. Huic oppositioni sic respondetur: Distinctio illa canonum de criminosis et infamibus intelligitur. Oues enim criminosae et infames pastorem suum accusare uel reprehendere non possunt, nisi a fide exorbitauerit. Ceterum si a fide exorbitauerit, tanta est labes illius criminis, quod ad eius accusationem et serui aduersus dominum, et quilibet criminosi et infames aduersus quemlibet admittuntur. Unde Dionisius Papa: [ad Seuerum Episcopum, epist. II.]

C. XXIII. Infamous persons cannot accuse heretics.

We cannot and ought not to receive an associate of an alien error, or one voluntarily departing from the path of his own purpose, or one not obedient to the sacred rules and constitutions of the Fathers. Nor do we permit them to assail those believing rightly or obeying the sanctions of the holy Fathers, because we judge to be infamous all who transgress their own law or the Christian law, or who willingly set aside apostolic or regular authority.

C. XXIII. Infames hereticos accusare non possunt.

Alieni erroris socium, uel a sui uoluntarie propositi tramite recedentem, aut sacris Patrum regulis et constitutionibus non obedientem suscipere non possumus nec debemus, nec inpetere recte credentes uel sanctorum Patrum sanctionibus obtemperantes permittimus, quia infames omnes esse censemus, qui suam aut Christianam legem preuaricantur, aut apostolicam uel regularem postponunt libenter auctoritatem.

C. XXIV. Those who have abandoned the faith they received cannot accuse Christians or testify against them.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 63]. One who has proved unfaithful to God cannot be faithful toward human beings. Therefore Jews who formerly became Christians and now have transgressed in the faith of Christ ought not to be admitted to give testimony, although they declare themselves to be Christians, because, just as they are suspect in the faith of Christ, so are they held doubtful in human testimony. The testimony of those who are shown false in the faith ought to be invalidated, nor are those to be believed who have cast away from themselves faith in the truth.

C. XXIV. Christianos accusare uel in eos testificari non possunt qui fidem acceptam deseruerunt.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano IV. [c. 63.] Non potest erga homines esse fidelis qui Deo extiterit infidus. Iudei ergo, qui dudum Christiani effecti sunt, et nunc in Christi fide preuaricati sunt, ad testimonium dicendum admitti non debent, quamuis esse se Christianos annuncient, quia, sicut in fide Christi > suspecti sunt, ita in testimonio humano dubii habentur. Infirmari oportet eorum testimonium, qui in fide falsi docentur, nec eis est credendum, qui ueritatis a se fidem abiecerunt.

C. XXV. Heretics, Jews, or pagans cannot accuse Christians.

Likewise Pope Gaius, [to Bishop Felix]. Pagans, heretics, or Jews cannot accuse Christians or bring against them a voice of defamation. GRATIAN. In this chapter it is decreed that heretics shall not assail those believing rightly. From this it is understood, conversely, that heretics can be assailed by heretics. Likewise, persons voluntarily departing from the path of their own purpose cannot assail those observing the boundary of their profession. From this it is given to be understood that persons departing from their purpose can similarly charge other persons departing from theirs. Likewise, those not obeying the sanctions of the holy Fathers cannot accuse those obeying the sacred constitutions. In this it is similarly understood that disobedient persons are permitted to accuse disobedient persons. From this it is gathered generally that, in an accusation, equality of faith and manner of life between the accuser and the accused is always to be considered, so that the person who accuses is found to be either equal or superior.

[PALEA.

> C. XXV. Heretici, Iudei uel pagani Christianos accusare non possunt.
> Item Gaius Papa. [Felici Episcopo] Pagani, uel heretici, siue Iudei non possunt Christianos accusare, aut uocem infamationis eis inferre. Gratian. In hoc capitulo decernitur, ut heretici non inpetant recte credentes. Unde econtra intelligitur, quod heretici ab hereticis inpeti possunt. Item a tramite sui propositi uoluntarie recedentes non possunt inpetere seruantes limitem suae professionis. Ex hoc datur intelligi, quod recedentes a suo proposito similiter recedentes criminari possunt. Item non obedientes sanctionibus Patrum sanctorum non possunt accusare obtemperantes sacris constitutionibus. In quo similiter intelligitur, quod inobedientibus inobedientes accusare licet. Unde generaliter colligitur, quod in accusatione equalitas fidei et conuersationis inter accusantem et accusatum semper consideranda est, ut is, qui accusat, uel par, uel superior inueniatur.
> [PALEA.

C. XXVI. A heretic can accuse a heretic and testify against him.

Likewise from the Novels, constitution 45, at the end. If a heretic litigates against a heretic, let either of them be permitted to bring forward a heretic as a witness. But if an orthodox person litigates against a heretic, the testimony even of a heretic shall indeed be valid for the orthodox person; but against an orthodox person only the testimony of an orthodox person shall be valid. § 1. But when orthodox persons are litigating, let no access to testimony lie open to any heretic.]

GRATIAN. But it is asked whether a most flagitious Catholic can bring an action against a heretic concerning a crime other than heresy. The response to this question is as follows: In that respect in which the heretic is inferior—namely, in the rule of faith—he can be accused by an evil Catholic. But in that respect in which he is superior—namely, in his manner of life—he cannot be brought to trial by a most flagitious person. § 1. Likewise, the statement that shepherds are to be tolerated rather than corrected for their acts is understood in two ways: either because they are to be tolerated by criminal persons and not corrected—hence it is added there that the life of rulers is often depraved according to the merits of their subjects; therefore, those by whose merit, with God's permission, the life of rulers is depraved are rather to tolerate them than to correct them—or because there are certain persons who are often deserted by public proofs and are unable to prove the crime which they allege. Concerning these Augustine says in the homily on penance, [c. 12]:

> C. XXVI. Hereticus hereticum accusare et contra eum testificari potest.
> Item Nouellarum constituta nouella 45. in fine. Si hereticus contra hereticum litiget, liceat cuiuis eorum hereticum testem adducere. Sin autem orthodoxus contra hereticum litiget, pro orthodoxo quidem etiam heretici testimonium ualeat: contra orthodoxum autem solius orthodoxi testimonium ualeat. §. 1. Orthodoxis autem litigantibus ad testimonium nulli heretico pateat aditus.] Gratian. Sed queritur, si flagitiosissimus catholicus possit conuenire hereticum de alio crimine, quam de heresi? Huic questioni ita respondetur: In quo hereticus inferior est, uidelicet in regula fidei, in eo a malo catholico accusari potest. In quo autem superior fuerit, uidelicet in conuersatione uitae, in eo a flagitiosissimo conuenire non potest. §. 1. Item quod dicitur, pastores pro suis actibus magis sunt tollerandi quam corrigendi, dupliciter intelligitur, uel quia a criminosis tollerandi sunt et non corrigendi, unde ibi subinfertur, quia pro meritis subditorum deprauatur sepe uita rectorum. Quorum ergo merito (Deo permittente) uita rectorum deprauatur, ab eis potius sunt tollerandi, quam corrigendi. Vel quia sunt quidam, qui sepe deseruntur publicis documentis, et crimen, quod intendunt, probare non ualent. De quibus Augustinus ait in omelia de penitentia: [c. 12.]

C. XXVII. Things which cannot be proved by public proofs are to be tolerated.

Many good men suffer the sins of others and remain silent for this reason: they are often deserted by public proofs by which they cannot prove before judges the things which they themselves know.

GRATIAN. Part IV. That statement of Anacletus is also understood concerning these persons: "By the sentence upon Ham, son of Noah, those are condemned who betray the fault of their teachers or prelates, like Ham, who did not cover his father's shame but displayed it for ridicule." For by this authority subjects are not prohibited from accusation, but from betrayal. For it is one thing to betray, another to accuse. One betrays who reports things that cannot be proved; one accuses who, with the defendant present, offers a charge to the judge, intending to prove what he alleges. Ham alone saw his father's shame, and therefore by him are understood those who, since they alone are privy to the crimes of their prelates and therefore cannot accuse them, nevertheless offer their life for ridicule to others by defaming it.

§ 1. Likewise, it is objected that subjects, even religious subjects, cannot accuse their prelates. For it is read in Exodus that Miriam, the sister of Aaron—who first, after the passage of the Red Sea, merited to sing a hymn after taking up a timbrel—afterwards murmured against Moses because he had taken an Ethiopian woman as wife, and was struck with leprosy by the Lord. § 2. Likewise, it is read in the Book of Kings that, when David was fleeing from the face of Saul, he hid in a cave. When Saul turned aside into it to purge his bowels, David cut off the hem of his cloak; afterwards David grieved greatly and repented vehemently that he had done this. Saul had been rejected by the Lord and was persecuting David from envy in order to deliver him to death. David was a humble and gentle man, substituted by the Lord for Saul and anointed king through Samuel; but nevertheless, because he cut off the hem of Saul's cloak, he wept greatly, even though Saul surpassed him only in the administration of the anointing. From this it is given to be understood that subjects, although they are religious, cannot accuse their criminal prelates. For by Saul, who was purging his bowels, are understood prelates who bring into deed the malice conceived in the heart. Likewise, it is read in the Book of Kings that, when the Ark of the Lord was being brought back from Gibeah to Jerusalem, the oxen kicked and the Ark was tilted. When Uzzah the Levite applied his hand to it in order to raise it, he was struck by the Lord and died. By the Ark are understood prelates; by Uzzah, subjects; by the tilting of the Ark is understood the fall of prelates; and by the person who applied his hand are understood those who reprove or accuse the life of teachers, who are struck by the Lord and perish.

§ 3. The response to these arguments is as follows: It is true that prelates are signified by the Ark and subjects by Uzzah. But the assertion that the fall of prelates is signified by the tilting of the Ark is false. For it is one thing to incline or descend, another to fall. It is read that our Savior inclined himself—as when he wrote on the earth with his finger—and frequently descended from the mountains which he ascended, whether to spend the night in prayer, to teach the disciples higher precepts on the mountain, or to look upon the crowds and be able freely to teach them from the height of the mountain while fleeing them. Inclination or descent signifies the humility by which spiritual persons sometimes condescend to carnal persons and suffer with their infirmity, according to the Apostle's statement: "Who is weak, and I am not weak?" They were also signified by the angels whom Jacob saw descending on the ladder. Concerning them it is also said through the Prophet: "He inclined the heavens and descended." By the inclined Ark, therefore, are understood those who mercifully bear the faults of their subjects and humbly suffer with their infirmity. Hence it is well said that, when the oxen kicked, the Ark was inclined. For the kicking oxen signify subjects not obeying their teachers; while prelates suffer with them, the Ark is as it were inclined when the oxen kick. The Levite who applied his hand signifies those who reprove the compassion of mercy in their prelates and wish to raise them into the bitterness of severity. Hence that Levite is well called Uzzah, for Uzzah is interpreted "strong." They are called strong because, while they presume upon their own justice, they think that mercy is to be denied to sinners and reprove those who extend it. Hence, struck by the Lord, they perish, because judgment without mercy will be for those who do not wish mercy to be shown to those who transgress. To such a person it is said through Solomon: "Do not be overly just, because there is a just person who perishes in his justice."

The passage concerning Moses is to be understood in the same way. For by Moses are understood prelates; by the Ethiopian woman, sinners are designated. Moses takes an Ethiopian woman as wife when any preacher joins a sinner to himself, so that from him he may be able to beget for God offspring of good works. When Miriam—that is, subjects—reproves this union, they are infected with the leprosy of sin. Or by Miriam is understood the Synagogue, which murmured against Moses—that is, Christ—because he joined to himself the Ethiopian woman, that is, the Church from the Gentiles; the leprosy of unbelief and error made them filthy. Therefore, by these authorities subjects are not prohibited from the accusation of prelates, but are admonished not to reprove their merciful compassion.

§ 4. Likewise, by Saul are understood prelates, and by David, subjects. Saul purging his bowels signifies those who bring outwardly into deed the malice conceived in the heart. But the reproof of sin is not signified in the cutting of the cloak. For by the cloak is understood the power of the kingdom. One cuts it who strikes a prelate with a sentence of condemnation, which is lawful for none of the subjects. For the deeds of a shepherd are not to be struck by subjects with the sword of the mouth, that is, by a sentence of condemnation. Hence Jerome says upon Mark concerning the high priest who tore his garments: The tearing of the garment signifies the tearing of the priesthood, which was soon to be torn and taken away from the Jews. Or by David are signified those who, seeing the wickedness of their prelates, despise their greater sins, but strive to reprove and tear apart the smallest and lightest ones, as though cutting off the outermost hem of the cloak. Or because Saul alone turned aside into the cave in which David alone was hiding. § 5. The same thing can be understood concerning this as was said concerning Ham, who alone saw his father's shame, which he did not cover but displayed for ridicule. Therefore, by this authority subjects are not prohibited from accusing prelates if they have been open to accusation.

§ 6. Likewise, it is proved that subjects cannot accuse their prelates, even if they are religious. For they are infamous by the very fact that they attempt to reprove the life of their teachers. For, as the authority of the canons hands down, all who take arms against fathers and who reprove or accuse the life of their teachers are infamous. But no infamous person is to be heard in the accusation of prelates unless perhaps the prelate has strayed from the faith, as was said above. Therefore, since subjects become infamous by the very fact that they leap forward into the accusation of prelates, while the opportunity to accuse is denied to infamous persons, it is evident that subjects cannot accuse their prelates. § 7. The response to these arguments is as follows: Not all prelates are held as prelates; for the name does not make the bishop, but the life. Hence Gregory writes to Bishop Januarius, [book VII, indiction 2, letter 1]:

> C. XXVII. Que publicis documentis probari non possunt tolleranda sunt.
> Plerique boni uiri propterea sufferunt aliorum peccata, et tacent, quia sepe deseruntur publicis documentis, quibus ea, que ipsi sciunt, iudicibus probare non possunt. IV. Pars. Gratian. De his etiam illud Anacleti intelligitur: "Sententia Cham filii Noe dampnantur, qui suorum doctorum uel prepositorum culpam produnt ceu Cham, qui patris pudenda non operuit, sed ridenda monstrauit." Hac enim auctoritate subditi non prohibentur ab accusatione, sed a proditione. Aliud enim est prodere, aliud accusare. Prodit qui non probanda defert: accusat qui reo presente crimen iudici offert, probaturus quod intendit. Cham solus uidit pudenda patris, et ideo per eum intelliguntur, qui, cum sint soli conscii criminum suorum prelatorum atque ideo eos accusare non possunt, uitam tamen eorum infamando aliis ridendam offerunt. §. 1. Item obicitur quod subditi et religiosi prelatos suos accusare non possunt. Legitur enim in Exodo, quod Maria soror Aaron, que prima post transitum maris rubri sumpto tympano ymnum cantare meruit, postea murmurans in Moysen, quod Ethiopissam duxerat in uxorem, a Domino lepra percussa est. §. 2. Item in libro Regum legitur, quod cum Dauid fugeret a facie Saul, latuit in spelunca, in quam cum Saul diuertisset ad purgandum uentrem, Dauid precidit oram clamidis eius, quod se fecisse postea grauiter doluit et uehementer penituit. Saul a Domino erat reprobatus, et ex inuidia Dauid persequebatur, ut eum morti traderet. Dauid erat uir humilis et mitis, Sauli a Domino substitutus, per Samuelem unctus in regem, sed tamen, quia precidit oram clamidis Saulis, grauiter fleuit, cum a Saule sola amministratione unctionis superaretur. Unde datur intelligi, subditi, quamuis religiosi sint, prelatos suos criminosos accusare non possunt. Nam per Saulem, qui uentrem purgabat, prelati intelliguntur, qui malitiam corde conceptam in opus producunt. Item legitur in libro Regum, quod cum archa Domini reduceretur de Gabaa in Hierusalem, bubus recalcitrantibus archa inclinata est, cui dum Oza Leuites manum adhiberet, ut eam erigeret, a Domino percussus interiit. Per archam intelliguntur prelati, per Ozam subditi, per inclinationem archae casus prelatorum intelligitur, per illum, qui manum adhibuit, intelliguntur reprehendentes uel accusantes uitam doctorum, qui a Domino percussi intereunt. §. 3. His ita respondetur: Verum est, per archam significari prelatos, et per Ozam subditos. Illud uero falsum est, quod per inclinationem archae significetur casus prelatorum. Aliud est enim inclinari uel descendere, aliud cadere. Legitur enim quod saluator noster se inclinauerit, sicut quando digito scribebat in terra et de montibus frequenter descenderit, in quos ascendebat, ut uel pernoctaret in oratione, uel ut discipulos in monte altiora doceret precepta, uel ut turbas fugiens ex altitudine montis eas respicere et libere posset docere. Inclinatio uel descensio humilitatem significat, qua spirituales nonnumquam carnalibus condescendunt, et eorum infirmitati conpatiuntur, iuxta illud Apostoli: "Quis infirmatur, et ego non infirmor?" Hos etiam significauerunt angeli, quos Iacob uidit in scala descendentes. De his etiam per Prophetam dicitur: "inclinauit celos, et descendit." Per archam ergo inclinatam intelliguntur, qui subditorum culpas misericorditer portant, et eorum infirmitati humiliter conpatiuntur. Unde bene dicitur, quod bubus recalcitrantibus archa inclinata est. Boues quippe recalcitrantes subditos significant suis doctoribus non obedientes, quibus dum prelati conpatiuntur, quasi bubus recalcitrantibus archa inclinatur. Leuita, qui manum adhibuit, significat illos, qui misericordiae compassionem in prelatis suis reprehendunt, eosque in seueritatis amaritudinem erigere uolunt. Unde bene Leuita ille Oza dicitur; Oza quippe robustus interpretatur. Illi enim robusti dicuntur, quia dum de sua iustitia presumunt, misericordiam Peccantibus negandam putant, et inpendentes reprehendunt. Unde a Domino percussi intereunt, quia sine misericordia iudicium erit illis, qui nolunt fieri misericordiam delinquentibus. Cui per Salomonem dicitur: "Noli esse nimis iustus, quia est iustus qui perit in iustitia sua." Sic et illud Moysi intelligitur. Per Moysem enim prelati intelliguntur, per Ethiopissam peccatores designantur. Moyses Ethiopissam uxorem ducit, cum quilibet predicator peccatorem sibi copulat, ut ex eo sobolem bonorum operum Deo gignere ualeat. Hanc copulam dum Maria, id est subditi, reprehendunt, lepra peccati inficiuntur. Vel per Mariam synagoga intelligitur, que in Moysem, id est in Christum, murmurauit, quia Ethiopissam, id est ecclesiam, de gentibus sibi copulauit, quos lepra perfidiae et erroris sordidos fecit. Non ergo his auctoritatibus subditi prohibentur ab accusatione prelatorum, sed monentur, ne reprehendant misericordem conpassionem eorum. §. 4. Item per Saulem prelati intelliguntur, et per Dauid subditi. Saul purgans uentrem eos significat, qui malitiam corde conceptam foras in opus producunt. Sed in precisione clamidis non significatur reprehensio peccati. Per clamidem enim regni potestas intelligitur. Hanc precidit, qui prelatum sententia dampnationis ferit, quod nulli subditorum licet. Facta enim pastoris oris gladio, id est sententia dampnationis, a subditis ferienda non sunt. Hinc est, quod Ieronimus ait super Marcum de pontifice, qui scidit uestimenta sua. Scissio uestis scissionem significat sacerdotii, quod in proximo erat scindendum, et auferendum Iudeis. Vel per Dauid significantur, qui, nequiciam suorum prelatorum uidentes, maiora eorum peccata contempnunt, minima uero et leuia, quasi extremam oram clamidis precidentes, reprehendere et lacerare satagunt. Vel quia Saul solus diuertit in speluncam, in qua Dauid solus latebat. §. 5. Idem super hoc potest intelligi quod de Cham dictum est, qui solus uidit pudenda patris, que non operuit, sed ridenda monstrauit. Hac itaque auctoritate non inhibetur subditis accusare prelatos, si accusabiles fuerint. §. 6. Item probatur, quod subditi prelatos suos accusare non possunt, etiam si religiosi fuerint. Infames enim sunt eo ipso, quod suorum doctorum uitam reprehendere conantur. Infames enim sunt (ut canonum tradit auctoritas) omnes, qui in patres armantur, et qui doctorum suorum uitam reprehendunt uel accusant. Nullus autem infamis in accusatione prelatorum est audiendus, nisi forte a fide exorbitauerit ut supra dictum est. Cum ergo subditi eo ipso, quod in accusationem prelatorum prosiliunt, infames efficiantur, infamibus autem copia accusandi denegetur, patet, quod subditi prelatos suos accusare non possunt. §. 7. His ita respondetur: Omnes prelati non pro prelatis habentur; nomen enim non facit episcopum, sed uita. Unde Gregorius Ianuario Episcopo scribit: [lib. VII. Indict. 2. epist. 1.]

C. XXVIII. One whom age, not life, makes an elder is to be severely rebuked.

Paul says: “You shall not rebuke an elder.” But this rule of his is to be observed when the fault of an elder does not by its example draw the hearts of younger persons to destruction. But where an elder furnishes to the young an example leading to destruction, there he is to be struck with severe rebuke. For it is written: "All of you are a snare to the young," and again: "Cursed is the child of a hundred years."

C. XXVIII. Quem etas, non uita seniorem facit, grauiter increpandus est.

Paulus dicit: "Seniorem ne increpaueris." Sed hec eius regula in eo est obseruanda, cum culpa senioris suo exemplo non trahit ad interitum corda iuniorum. Ubi autem senior iuuenibus exemplum ad interitum prebet, ibi districta increpatione feriendus est. Nam scriptum est:

"Laqueus iuuenum omnes uos," et rursus, "Maledictus puer centum annorum."

C. XXIX. Dignity does not make a bishop, but life does.

Likewise Jerome to Heliodorus, [letter I, On the Praise of the Solitary Life]. Not all bishops are bishops. You attend to Peter; consider Judas. You receive Stephen; look upon Nicholas. § 1. Ecclesiastical dignity does not make a Christian. Cornelius the centurion, while still a gentile, is cleansed by the gift of the Holy Spirit; Daniel as a boy judges the priests. § 2. It is not easy to stand in the place of Peter and to hold the place of Paul, who now reign with Christ. § 3. Salt that has become insipid is useful for nothing except to be cast outside and trampled by swine.

C. XXIX. Dignitas non facit episcopum, sed uita.

Item Ieronimus ad Eliodorum. [epist. I. de laude uitae solitariae.] Non omnes episcopi sunt episcopi. Attendis Petrum, Iudam considera. Stephanum suscipis, Nicolaum respice. §. 1. Non facit ecclesiastica dignitas Christianum. Cornelius centurio adhuc ethnicus dono sancti Spiritus mundatur, presbiteros Daniel puer iudicat. §. 2. Non est facile stare in loco Petri, et Pauli tenere locum, iam cum Christo regnantium. §. 3. Infatuatum sal ad nichilum prodest, nisi ut proiciatur foras et a porcis conculcetur.

C. XXX. The life of a bishop, not the name, merits reverence.

Likewise Augustine in homily VI. Not everyone who says, "Peace be with you," is to be heard as a dove. Ravens feed upon death. The dove does not have this habit; rather, it lives upon the fruits of the earth, and its food is innocent.

C. XXX. Vita episcopi, non nomen reuerentiam meretur.

Item Augustinus in omelia VI. Non omnis, qui dicit: Pax uobiscum, quasi columba audiendus est. Corui de morte pascuntur. Hoc columba non habet; immo de frugibus terrae uiuit, innocens est eius uictus.

C. XXXI. The learned are sometimes deservedly reproved by the unlearned, and clerics by laymen.

Likewise Bede on the Second Epistle of Peter. "They followed the way of Balaam from Bosor, who loved the reward of iniquity, but received a rebuke of his madness. A mute beast under the yoke, speaking with a human voice, prohibited the folly of the prophet." Heretics very often bring forth dogmas so foolish and mysteries so execrable that even the dull understanding of pagans, and of those who are altogether without rational knowledge of God, detest their madness and, by thinking more sanely, refute their distorted paths contrary to God. And, what is worse, sometimes many Catholics love the reward of iniquity to such a degree that even the learned are deservedly refuted by the unlearned, and clerics by laymen. They are rightly compared to the prophet who is rebuked by the words of an ass speaking contrary to nature and nevertheless is not delayed from the purpose of his depraved journey. The name of the city from which Balaam is related to have come also most aptly agrees with them. For Bosor is interpreted "carnal" or "in tribulation." No other cause exists more strongly for luxurious persons to adulterate the word of truth through love of money or temporal desires than that they have enslaved themselves to the concupiscences of the flesh. But the name of Balaam himself—which is interpreted "vain people" or "precipitating them"—also suits such persons. For what are those who voluntarily desert the recognized way of truth if not a vain people? And do they not cast their hearers into a precipice when they preach to them not salutary things which would correct them, but erroneous things which delight them? Concerning them it is aptly added: "These are fountains without water and clouds driven by whirlwinds, for whom the gloom of darkness is reserved."

GRATIAN. Therefore, because not all bishops are bishops, priests are indicated by Daniel as a boy, insipid salt is trampled by swine, and one who says, "Peace be with you," is often reckoned not a dove but a raven, it is evident that one is not always to desist from accusation on account of the office or authority of a person. Rather, one must proceed against depraved persons, since every person who sins criminally is altered and, so to speak, is judged under the laws to have diminished legal status. For one who commits sin is the servant of sin both in punishment and in guilt. Hence Augustine:

> Item Beda in II. epistola Petri. Secuti sunt uiam Balaam ex Bosor, qui mercedem iniquitatis amauit, correptionem uero habuit suae uesaniae. Subiugale mutum quod hominis uoce loquens prohibuit prophetae insipientiam. Plerumque heretici tam stulta dogmata, tam execranda proferunt sacramenta, ut etiam hebetum sensus paganorum, et qui ratione diuinae agnitionis omnimodis carent, illorum detestentur insaniam, illorum distorta et Deo contraria itinera sanius sapiendo redarguant. Et (quod peius est) nonnumquam multi catholicorum in tantum mercedem amant iniquitatis, ut etiam docti ab indoctis, clerici a laicis merito redarguantur, qui iure conparantur prophetae, qui uerbis asinae contra naturam loquentis corripitur, nec tamen a proposito praui itineris retardatur. Quibus etiam aptissime nomen congruit ciuitatis, de qua Balaam uenisse perhibetur. Bosor namque carneus siue in tribulatione interpretatur. Neque enim alia magis causa luxuriosis existit, uerbum ueritatis amore pecuniae uel desideriorum temporalium adulterare, quam quia carnis se concupiscentiis manciparunt. Sed et nomen ipsius Balaam, qui uanus populus, siue precipitans eos, interpretatur, talibus conuenit. Qui enim agnitam uiam ueritatis sponte deserunt, quid nisi uanus populus sunt? Quid etiam in precipitium suos mergunt auditores, quibus non salutaria, que corrigant, sed que illos delectent erronea predicant? De quibus apte subditur: "Hii sunt fontes sine aqua, et nebulae turbinibus exagitatae, quibus caligo tenebrarum reseruatur." Gratian. Quia ergo non omnes episcopi sunt episcopi, presbiteri a Daniele puero indicantur, sal infatuatum a porcis conculcatur, et qui dicit: Pax uobiscum, plerumque non columba, sed coruus reputatur: patet, quod non semper pro offitio uel auctoritate personae ab accusatione est cessandum, imo contra prauos est agendum, cum omnis persona criminaliter peccans alteretur, et (ut ita dicam) capite minor legibus censeatur. Qui enim facit peccatum seruus est peccati tam in pena quam in culpa. Unde Augustinus:

C. XXXII. One who does not administer the office he received is not a bishop but a shameless dog.

One who neither possessed in himself the principle of governance, nor wiped away his own transgressions, nor corrected the crime of his sons is to be called a shameless dog rather than a bishop. GRATIAN. Therefore, since Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory take away from such persons the name of dove, bishop, and elder, ought not the privilege of dignity also to be taken away, so that they can be reproved by their subjects? Hence Scripture, disregarding the privilege of depraved old age, says, "Cursed is"—not the elder, but—"the child of a hundred years." It is therefore evident that those become infamous through accusation of prelates who attempt to reprove and tear apart the life of those who hold the position of their governance not in name alone but in life and morals. But others become praiseworthy rather than infamous through the accusation of their prelates. Likewise, when it is said, "Let no greater person be assailed by accusations of lesser persons," the lesser are to be understood as lesser not in dignity but in life. Hence Jerome says of Paul upon the Epistle to the Galatians:

> C. XXXII. Qui susceptum offitium non administrat, non est episcopus, sed canis inpudicus.
> Qui nec regiminis in se rationem habuit, nec sua delicta detersit, nec filiorum crimen correxit, canis inpudicus dicendus est magis, quam episcopus. Gratian. Quibus ergo Ieronimus, Augustinus, Gregorius auferunt nomen columbae, episcopi, senioris, nonne et priuilegium est auferendum dignitatis, ut possint a subditis reprehendi? Unde scriptura dissimulans priuilegium prauae senectutis ait: "Maledictus," non senior, sed "puer centum annorum." Aparet ergo, quod illi ex accusatione prelatorum infames fiunt, qui eorum uitam reprehendere et lacerare conantur, qui locum sui regiminis non nomine tantum, sed uita et moribus tenent. Alii autem potius laudabiles fiunt ex accusatione prelatorum suorum, quam infames. Item, quod dicitur: "Maiorum quispiam minorum accusationibus non inpetatur," minores non intelligendi sunt dignitate, sed uita. Unde Ieronimus ait de Paulo super epistolam ad Galatas:

C. XXXIII. Greater and lesser persons ought to be understood according to life, not dignity.

Paul reproved Peter, which he would not have dared to do unless he knew that he was not unequal. GRATIAN. This is understood not of the office of ecclesiastical dignity but of purity of life and holiness of manner of life. For Peter alone held the primacy among the Apostles. Hence Augustine says to Jerome, [letter XIX, near the end]:

> C. XXXIII. Maiores et minores non dignitate, sed uita intelligi oportet.
> Paulus Petrum reprehendit, quod non auderet, nisi se non inparem sciret. Gratian. Hoc non de offitio ecclesiasticae dignitatis, sed de puritate uitae et sanctitate conuersationis intelligitur. Solus enim Petrus inter apostolos primatum gerebat. Hinc Augustinus ait ad Ieronimum: [epist. XIX. prope finem]

C. XXXIV. Not the name of bishop, but life, makes one greater.

Although, according to the terms which usage has established, the episcopate is greater than the presbyterate, nevertheless Augustine is lesser than Jerome.

> C. XXXIV. Non episcopi nomen, sed uita maiorem facit.
> Quamquam secundum uocabula, que usus obtinuit, episcopatus sit presbiterio maior, Augustinus tamen Ieronimo minor est.

C. XXXV. Although bishops are equal in merits, they nevertheless differ in grade of dignity.

The same in book II On the One Baptism, [against the Donatists, c. 1]. I think that without any insult to himself, Bishop Cyprian is compared to Peter the Apostle insofar as the crown of martyrdom is concerned. But I ought rather to fear lest I be found insulting toward Peter. For who does not know that the primacy of his apostleship is to be preferred to any episcopate? But even if the distinction of sees differs, the glory of the martyrs is nevertheless one. Likewise: When Peter is corrected by Paul, who was later, and, with the bond of peace and unity preserved, is advanced to martyrdom, how much more easily and more firmly is that which is confirmed by the statutes of the universal Church to be preferred either to the authority of one bishop or to the council of one province?

> Idem libro II. de unico baptismo. [contra Donatistas, cap. I.] Puto, quod sine ulla sui contumelia Ciprianus episcopus Petro apostolo conparatur, quantum attinet ad martirii coronam. Ceterum magis uereri debeo, ne in Petrum contumeliosus existam. Quis enim nescit illum principatum apostolatus cuilibet episcopatui preferendum? Sed etiamsi distat cathedrarum gratia, una est tamen martirum gloria. Item: Cum Petrus a Paulo posteriore corrigitur, et pacis atque unitatis uinculo custodito ad martirium promouetur, quanto facilius et fortius quod per uniuersae ecclesiae statuta firmatum est uel unius episcopi auctoritati, uel unius prouinciae concilio preferendum est?

C. XXXVI. A son is equaled or preferred to his father not in honor but in truth.

The same, [tractate XXX on John, at the end]. A father complains concerning an evil son; a son complains concerning a harsh father. We preserve the honor which is owed to a father by a son. We do not equal the son to the father in honor, but we prefer the son to the father in truth, and we thus render the honor owed so that equity does not lose its merit.

> C. XXXVI. Non in honore, sed in ueritate filius equatur uel preponitur patri.
> Idem. [tractatu XXX. in Ioannem, in fine.] Queritur pater de malo filio, queritur filius de duro patre. Seruamus honorificentiam, patri que debetur a filio. Non equamus filium patri in honore, sed preponimus filium patri in ueritate, et sic tribuimus honorem debitum, ut non perdat equitas meritum.

C. XXXVII. Peter and Paul were equal in merits, although differing in rank.

Likewise Ambrose, [sermon LXVI, on the feast of Peter and Paul]. Blessed Peter and Paul stand eminent among all the Apostles and excel by a certain particular prerogative; but it is uncertain which of the two is to be preferred to the other. For I think those who are equal in suffering to be equal in merits, and those whom we see arrived together at the glory of martyrdom to have lived with a similar devotion of faith. § 1. For we do not think it was done without cause that they suffered on one day, in one place, under one persecutor. On one day, so that they might arrive at Christ together; in one place, lest Rome be absent from either; under one persecutor, so that equal cruelty might bind both. Therefore, the day was decreed for merit, the place for glory, and the persecutor for virtue. And in what place did they at last undergo martyrdom? In the city of Rome, which possesses the primacy and headship of the nations, so that where the head of superstition was, there the head of holiness might rest; and where the princes of the gentiles dwelt, there the princes of the churches might die.

GRATIAN. Part V. Likewise, penitents and twice-married men cannot accuse priests. From this it is gathered generally that whoever are not priests or cannot be priests cannot bring an accusation or testimony against priests. Hence Fabian says, [letter II to the Eastern Bishops]:

> C. XXXVII. Equales fuerunt meritis, licet gradu differentes, Petrus et Paulus.

Item Ambrosius. [sermone LXVI. de natali Petri et Pauli.] Beati Petrus et Paulus eminent inter uniuersos apostolos, et peculiari quadam prerogatiua precellunt; uerum inter ipsos quis cui preponatur incertum est. Puto enim illos equales esse meritis, qui equales sunt passione, et simili eos fidei deuotione uixisse, quos simul uidemus ad martirii gloriam peruenisse. §. 1. Non enim sine causa factum putamus, quod una die, uno loco, sub uno persecutore passi sunt. Una die, ut ad Christum pariter peruenirent; uno in loco, ne alteri Roma deesset; sub uno persecutore, ut equalis crudelitas utrumque constringeret. Dies ergo pro merito, locus pro gloria, persecutor decretus est pro uirtute. Et in quo loco martirium tandem pertulerunt? In urbe Roma, que principatum et caput obtinet nationum, scilicet ut ubi caput superstitionis erat, illic caput quiesceret sanctitatis, et ubi gentilium principes habitabant, illic ecclesiarum principes morerentur. V. Pars. Gratian. Item penitentes, bigami, sacerdotes accusare non possunt. Unde generaliter colligitur, quod quicumque sacerdotes non sunt uel esse non possunt, in sacerdotes accusationem uel testificationem proferre non possunt.

Unde Fabianus ait: [epist. II. ad Episcopos orientales]

C. XXXVIII. Those who cannot be priests are unable to accuse priests.

The Apostles themselves and their successors established that those who are not and cannot be of their order shall neither accuse the priests of the Lord nor testify against them.

C. XXXVIII. Qui sacerdotes esse non possunt, sacerdotes accusare non ualent.

Ipsi apostoli, et eorum successores statuerunt, ut sacerdotes Domini non accusent, nec in eos testificentur, qui sui ordinis non sunt nec esse possunt.

C. XXXIX. Those who are prohibited from being chosen to the priesthood are unable to accuse priests or testify against them.

Likewise Pope Damasus, [to Archbishop Stephen, letter III, c. 3]. Witnesses ought to be without any infamy, suspicion, or manifest stain and instructed in the fullness of the true faith; and they ought to be such as divine authority commands to be chosen for the priesthood. For, as the authority of the ancients hands down, those who ought not and cannot be advanced to that same honor cannot charge priests with a crime or testify against them.

GRATIAN. Thus also that statement of Sylvester is understood: "A layman shall not accuse a cleric, etc.," that is, those constituted in a lower grade who cannot ascend to a higher one ought not to accuse those acting in higher grades. § 1. Behold, it has been shown what response is to be given to the authorities and arguments by which subjects appeared to be repelled from the accusation of prelates. Now it must be demonstrated by what reasons they are proved to be receivable, and what is answered to the contrary by prelates. Christ, who was the shepherd of shepherds, said to his sheep—of whom he said, "I was sent only to the sheep of the house of Israel who have perished, etc."—amid the insults and blows which he suffered from them: "If I have spoken badly, bear witness concerning the evil." Likewise: "Which of you will convict me of sin?" But all who are admitted to testify against or reprove someone can be admitted to accuse the same person. Therefore, since sheep are admitted to bear testimony against their shepherd and to reprove him, if they can, it is evident that subjects can accuse their prelates.

§ 2. The response to these arguments is as follows: Although Christ was the shepherd of his sheep, whom he fed by word and example, nevertheless, with regard to the distribution of offices—from which some now preside over others in the Church, whence some are called prelates and others subjects—he did not hold pastoral office among that people. For he had been anointed by neither mystical nor visible anointing as king or priest, which alone among that people were the persons who claimed the name of prelacy for themselves. Therefore, from this authority subjects are not proved to be admissible in the accusation of prelates; it is shown only that, when they are hearers, they can reprove and testify against those who, although they do not possess ecclesiastical offices, nevertheless strive by word and example to gain for God whomever they can.

§ 3. The response is also made in another way. It is one thing which we compel to be observed by the rigor of discipline, another which is admitted from consideration of perfection. Christ admitted the Jews to reprove him from the perfection of humility, not the severity of law. For if they had been admitted by the rigor of law, by this authority criminal and infamous persons would have to be received in the accusation of religious persons, since those who were treating concerning Christ's death and wished to condemn the innocent man were most criminal. Therefore, by this example prelates are not compelled to receive subjects in an accusation against themselves, but they are permitted to do so.

§ 4. Likewise, Paul reproved Peter, who was prince of the Apostles. From this it is given to be understood that subjects can reprove their prelates if they have been worthy of reproof. But this is easily refuted if one attends to the matter for which he was reproved. Peter was compelling the gentiles to Judaize and to depart from the truth of the Gospel, making a flock with the Jews and secretly withdrawing himself from the food of the gentiles. But to stray from the faith oneself and to cast others down from the faith by example or word are equal. Therefore, by this example prelates are not proved to be accusible by subjects unless perhaps they have strayed from the faith or compelled others to stray. § 5. Likewise, when Peter had entered to Cornelius, the brothers who were in Judea complained and reproved him because he had turned aside to a gentile. Behold, prelates can rightly be reproved by subjects. But blessed Gregory responded to this objection, saying, [to the Patrician Theoctista, book IX, letter 39]:

> C. XXXIX. Sacerdotes accusare uel in eos testificari non ualent, qui ad sacerdotium eligi prohibentur.
> Item Damasus Papa. [ad Stephanum Archiepiscopum, epist. III. c. 3.] Testes absque ulla infamia aut suspicione, uel manifesta macula, et uerae fidei plenitudine instructi esse debent, et tales, quales ad sacerdotium eligere diuina iubet auctoritas. Quoniam sacerdotes (ut antiquorum tradit auctoritas) criminari non possunt, neque in eos testificari, qui ad eundem non debent, nec possunt prouehi honorem. Gratian. Sic et illud Siluestri intelligitur: "Laicus non accuset clericum, etc." id est, qui in inferiori gradu constituti ad superiorem ascendere non possunt, in superioribus agentes accusare non debent. §. 1. Ecce, ostensum est, quid respondeatur auctoritatibus et argumentis, quibus subditi ab accusatione praelatorum uidebantur repellendi. Nunc demonstrandum est, quibus rationibus probentur recipiendi, et quid contra respondeatur a prelatis. Christus, qui erat pastor pastorum, ouibus suis, de quibus ait: "Non sum missus, nisi ad oues, que perierunt, domus Israel, etc." inter obprobria et uerbera, que patiebatur ab eis, ait: "Si male locutus sum, testimonium perhibe de malo." Item: "Quis ex uobis arguet me de peccato?" At quicumque ad testificandum in aliquem uel ad arguendum admittuntur, ad eundem accusandum admitti possunt. Cum ergo oues, ut aduersus pastorem suum testimonium ferant, et ut ipsum (si possunt) reprehendant, admittantur, patet, quod subditi possunt accusare prelatos suos. §. 2. His ita respondetur: Christus, quamuis esset pastor suarum ouium, quas uerbo et exemplo pascebat, tamen quantum ad offitiorum distributionem (ex qua hodie in ecclesia alii presunt aliis, unde quidam prelati quidam subditi uocantur) in populo illo pastorale offitium non gerebat. Mistica enim et uisibili unctione nec in regem, nec in sacerdotem unctus erat, que solae in illo populo personae prelaturae nomen sibi uendicabant. Non ergo ex hac auctoritate subditi probantur admittendi in accusatione prelatorum, sed tantum ostenditur, quod auditore eos reprehendere possunt, et in eos testificari, qui cum offitia ecclesiastica non habeant, uerbo tamen et exemplo quoscumque ualent lucrari Deo satagunt. §. 3. Respondetur et aliter. Aliud est, quod de rigore cogimus seruare disciplinae, aliud, quod admittitur ex perfectionis consideratione. Christus Iudeos ad se arguendum admisit perfectione humilitatis, non seueritate iuris. Si enim legis rigore essent admissi, hac auctoritate criminosi et infames in accusatione religiosorum essent recipiendi, cum essent sceleratissimi, qui, de Christi nece tractantes, innocentem condempnare uolebant. Hoc ergo exemplo prelati non coguntur recipere subditos in accusatione sui, sed permittuntur. §. 4. Item Paulus Petrum reprehendit, qui princeps apostolorum erat. Unde datur intelligi, quod subditi possunt reprehendere prelatos suos, si reprehensibiles fuerint. Sed hoc facile refellitur, si, unde sit reprehensus, aduertitur. Petrus cogebat gentes iudaizare et a ueritate euangelii recedere, cum Iudeis gregem faciens, et a cibis gentilium latenter se subtrahens. Par autem est in se a fide exorbitare, et alios exemplo uel uerbo a fide deicere. Hoc ergo exemplo non probantur prelati accusandi a subditis, nisi a fide forte exorbitauerint, uel alios exorbitare coegerint. §. 5. Item cum Petrus intrasset ad Cornelium, conquesti sunt fratres, qui erant in Iudea, et reprehenderunt eum, quia ad gentilem diuertisset. Ecce, quod prelati iure possunt reprehendi a subditis. Sed huic oppositioni B. Gregorius respondit, dicens: [Theoctistae Patriciae, lib. IX. epist. 39.]

C. XL. When Peter was questioned by the faithful why he had entered among the gentiles, he did not respond from power but humbly rendered a reason.

Peter had received the power of the kingdom, and yet, when the same first of the Apostles faced a complaint made against him by the faithful as to why he had entered among the gentiles, he responded not from the power of his office—by which he could have said, "Let sheep neither accuse nor reprove their shepherd"—but from the authority of the divine power by which the gentiles had received the Holy Spirit. GRATIAN. Therefore, since Peter could have repelled the complaints by virtue of his office but was unwilling to do so, prelates are not compelled by this example to receive the reproof of subjects. That statement of Leo IV to Louis Augustus is also understood from this dispensation of humility:

C. XL. Petrus a fidelibus interrogatus, cur ad gentes intrasset non ex potestate respondit, sed humiliter rationem reddidit.

Petrus potestatem regni acceperat, et tamen idem apostolorum primus querimoniae contra eum a fidelibus factae, cur ad gentes intrasset, non ex potestate offitii, (qua posset dicere, oues pastorem suum non accusent nec reprehendant,) sed auctoritate diuinae uirtutis, qua gentiles acceperant Spiritum sanctum, respondit. Gratian. Cum ergo Petrus potuit ex offitio repellere querelas, sed noluit, non hoc exemplo coguntur prelati suscipere reprehensionem subditorum. Ex hac etiam humilitatis dispensatione intelligitur illud Leonis IV. Lodowico Augusto:

C. XLI. The Apostolic pontiff promises to amend by imperial judgment if he committed anything unjustly against his subjects.

If we have acted incompetently in anything and have not preserved the path of just law among our subjects, we wish to amend all things by your judgment and that of your envoys, because, if we who ought to correct the sins of others commit worse things, we certainly will not be disciples of truth but, as we say with grief, teachers of error above all others. Therefore we earnestly implore the clemency of Your Magnitude to direct into these regions, for the investigation of the things which we have said, such envoys as fear God in all things and investigate all things diligently, just as if your imperial glory were present. We ask that they examine exactly not only those things which we said above, but, whether smaller or even greater matters concerning us have been reported to them, that all of them be concluded by their lawful examination, so that henceforth nothing concerning them may remain unexamined or undetermined.

GRATIAN. Part VI. Likewise, when Balaam the soothsayer was going to curse the people, the angel of the Lord opposed himself in the road to the ass upon which he was sitting and, with drawn sword, restrained her from the journey. When Balaam afflicted her with blows, she burst into speech and refuted the madness of the prophet. Therefore, if a mute animal, by angelic power, reproved the folly of a prophet, much more can subjects accuse their prelates. § 1. The response to these arguments is as follows. It is true that subjects are signified by the ass and prelates by Balaam. Nevertheless, by this example prelates are not proved to be accusible by subjects; rather, a form is given to subjects only for humbly resisting prelates if perhaps they wish to compel them to evil. For Balaam urging the ass to carry him to curse the people of God signifies those who by blows and tortures demand from subjects that they become their supporters and helpers in evil. But because the angel—that is, any preacher—with drawn sword, namely with the fear and horror of future vengeance openly preached, calls them back from consent to another's malice, it is lawful for them to burst into the voice of complaint and say to their prelates: Why do you afflict us with blows? Why are you unjustly angry with us? Have we ever been disobedient to you except now, when we are compelled to evil? See the one who prohibits the undertaking. Therefore, from this prelates are not proved to be accusible by subjects.

§ 2. Likewise, when David had committed adultery and homicide, Nathan the prophet was sent by God to refute him. Behold, prelates are to be reproved and rebuked by subjects. § 3. But it is to be noted that there are two persons by which this world is ruled, namely the royal and the priestly. Just as kings preside in the affairs of the world, so priests preside in the affairs of God. It belongs to kings to inflict corporal punishment, to priests to impose spiritual vengeance. Therefore David, although by royal anointing he presided over priests and prophets in the affairs of the world, nevertheless was subject to them in the affairs of God. Hence kings were anointed by prophets and priests, and the sins of kings were expiated by their offering. § 4. Therefore, just as Ahaz was struck with leprosy by the Lord when he wished to usurp the offices of priests, so priests and prophets were not permitted to usurp the offices of kings. Therefore, when Nathan the prophet refuted the king, he carried out his own office, in which he was superior to the king; he did not usurp the king's office, in which he was inferior to the king. He admonished him to expiate his sins through penance; he did not deliver against him a sentence by which, as an adulterer and homicide, he would be condemned to death. § 5. Thus blessed Ambrose also excommunicated the emperor and prohibited him from entering the church. § 6. For just as a judge does not bear the sword without cause, so priests do not receive the keys of the Church without cause. The former bears the sword for the vengeance of evildoers but the praise of the good; the latter have the keys for the exclusion of persons to be excommunicated and the reconciliation of penitents. Therefore, by this example subjects are proved to be worthy of reproof by prelates, not prelates by subjects.

§ 7. Likewise, Daniel, exercising no lawful power, convicted the judges constituted by the people of false testimony and condemned them after conviction. It is established, therefore, that persons possessing no power can refute those raised to dignities. § 8. The response to these arguments is as follows. Miracles—and especially those of the Old Testament—are to be admired, not drawn into an example for our action. For many things were then granted which are now entirely prohibited. For Samuel then cut Agag, the very fat king of Amalek, into pieces; now it is lawful for no ecclesiastical person to conduct a judgment of blood. Phinehas then killed a Jew coupling with a Midianite woman, and it was reckoned to him as justice; today this would turn to the destruction of a priest's office. Therefore, by the example of Daniel, subjects would claim for themselves against prelates not only the power to accuse or refute but even to judge, if that which is permitted by no authority whatsoever were allowed to be assumed as an argument for our action. Rather, from this deed it is given to be understood that in the last times God would stir up the spirit of a younger boy, namely the one of whom it is said through the Prophet, "A child is born to us," and again, "Behold my child," who would convict and condemn the judges of iniquity—namely, the scribes and Pharisees—when they accused Susanna, that is, the Church, with false crimes and pronounced her guilty of adultery because she followed Christ.

§ 9. Likewise, Jerome relates in the book On Illustrious Men that Pope Damasus, accused of adultery by his subjects, purged himself with forty-two bishops. § 10. Likewise, Pope Symmachus, despoiled of his dignity in a Roman synod, is decreed first to be returned to his former status so that he might then come to the case and, if it thus appeared right, answer the allegations of the accusers. The matter appeared worthy to the greatest number of priests and deserved to take effect; and, when it was afterwards being arranged how he was to be accused, the aforesaid Pope came forward to plead the case, but was impeded by his rivals. Likewise Pope Gregory says concerning himself:

> C. XLI. Inperiali iudicio Apostolicus emendare promittit, si quid erga subditos iniuste commisit.
> Nos, si incompetenter aliquid egimus, et in subditis iustae legis tramitem non conseruauimus, uestro ac missorum uestrorum cuncta uolumus emendare iudicio, quoniam si nos, qui aliena debemus corrigere peccata, peiora committimus, certe non ueritatis discipuli, sed (quod dolentes dicimus) erimus pre ceteris erroris magistri. Inde magnitudinis uestrae magnopere clementiam inploramus, ut tales ad hec, que diximus, perquirenda missos in his partibus dirigatis, qui Deum per omnia timeant, et cuncta (quemadmodum si uestra presens fuisset inperialis gloria) diligenter exquirant, et non tantum hec sola, que superius diximus, querimus ut examussim exagitent, sed siue minora, siue etiam maiora illis sint de nobis indicata negotia, ita eorum cuncta legitimo terminentur examine, quatinus in posterum nichil sit, quod ex eis indiscussum uel indiffinitum remaneat. VI. Pars. Gratian. Item, cum Balaam ariolus iret ad maledicendum populum, angelus Domini asinae, cui insidebat, in uia se obposuit, euaginatoque gladio eam ab itinere conpescuit, quam dum ille uerberibus affligeret, in uocem prorupit, et prophetae uesaniam redarguit. Si ergo animal mutum angelica uirtute prophetae insipientiam reprehendit, multo magis subditi possunt accusare prelatos suos. §. 1. His ita respondetur. Verum est, quod per asinam subditi significantur, et per Balaam prelati; non tamen hoc exemplo probantur prelati accusandi a subditis, sed subditis tantum forma datur humiliter renitendi prelatis, si forte eos ad malum cogere uoluerint; Balaam namque asinam urgens, ut ad maledicendum populo Dei eum ueheret, significat eos, qui uerberibus et cruciatibus a subditis exigunt, ut eis in malo fautores et coadiutores existant. Sed quia angelus, quilibet uidelicet predicator, euaginato gladio, aperte scilicet predicato timore et horrore futurae uindictae, a consensu alienae maliciae illos reuocat, licet eis in uocem conquestionis prorumpere et prelatis suis dicere: Cur nos uerberibus affligitis? cur nobis iniuste irascimini? numquid uobis aliquando inobedientes fuimus, nisi nunc, cum ad malum cogimur? Videte illum, qui prohibet ab incepto. Non ergo hinc prelati probantur accusandi a subditis. §. 2. Item cum Dauid adulterium et homicidium commisisset, missus est a Deo Nathan propheta, ut eum redargueret. Ecce, quod prelati sunt arguendi et reprehendendi a subditis. §. 3. Sed notandum est, quod duae sunt personae, quibus mundus iste regitur, regalis uidelicet et sacerdotalis. Sicut reges presunt in causis seculi, ita sacerdotes in causis Dei. Regum est corporalem inrogare penam, sacerdotum spiritualem inferre uindictam. Dauid ergo, etsi ex regali unctione sacerdotibus et prophetis preerat in causis seculi, tamen suberat eis in causis Dei. Unde reges a prophetis et sacerdotibus ungebantur et eorum oblatione peccata regum expiabantur. §. 4. Sicut ergo Achaz a Domino lepra percussus est, qui sacerdotum offitia usurpare uoluit, sic sacerdotibus et prophetis regum offitia usurpare non licuit. Nathan ergo propheta, cum regem redarguit, suum executus est offitium, in quo erat rege superior, non usurpauit regis offitium, in quo erat rege inferior; monuit eum, ut per penitentiam peccata sua expiaret, non tulit in eum sententiam, qua tamquam adulter et homicida morti addiceretur. §. 5. Sic et B. Ambrosius inperatorem excommunicauit, et ab ecclesiae ingressu prohibuit. §. 6. Sicut enim non sine causa iudex gladium portat, ita non sine causa claues ecclesiae sacerdotes accipiunt. Ille portat gladium ad uindictam malefactorum, laudem uero bonorum, isti claues habent ad exclusionem excommunicandorum et reconciliationem penitentium Hoc ergo exemplo subditi probantur reprehendendi a prelatis, non prelati a subditis. §. 7. Item Daniel nulla legitima potestate functus iudices a populo constitutos de falso testimonio conuicit, et conuictos dampnauit. Constat ergo, quod nullam potestatem habentes possunt redarguere dignitatibus sublimatos. §. 8. His ita respondetur. Miracula (et maxime ueteris testamenti) sunt admiranda, non in exemplum nostrae actionis trahenda. Multa enim tunc concedebantur, que nunc penitus prohibentur. Tunc enim Samuel Agag pinguissimum regem Amalech in frustra conscidit; nunc nulli ecclesiasticorum iudicium sanguinis agitare licet. Tunc Finees Iudeum coeuntem cum Madianita interfecit, et reputatum est ei in iustitiam; hodie sacerdotibus in perniciem sui uerteretur offitii. Exemplo ergo Danielis non solum accusandi uel redarguendi, sed etiam iudicandi potestatem subditi sibi in prelatos uendicarent, si illud in argumentum nostrae actionis liceret assumi, quod nulla umquam auctoritate permittitur. Magis ergo ex hoc facto datur intelligi, quod in nouissimis temporibus suscitaret Deus spiritum pueri iunioris, illius uidelicet, de quo per prophetam dicitur: "puer natus est nobis," et iterum: "Ecce puer meus," qui iudices iniquitatis, scribas scilicet et Phariseos, falsis criminibus Susannam, id est ecclesiam, accusantes et ream adulterii pronunciantes, eo quod Christum sequeretur, conuinceret et condempnaret. §. 9. Item Ieronimus refert in libro uirorum illustrium, quod Damasus Papa a subditis de adulterio accusatus cum quadraginta duobus episcopis se purgauit. §. 10. Item Simacus Papa, in Romana sinodo dignitate sua expoliatus, prius statui pristino reddi decernitur, ut tunc ueniret ad causam, et si ita recte uideretur, accusantium propositionibus responderet. Digna res uisa est maximo numero sacerdotum, atque mereretur effectum, et cum postmodum ordinaretur, quomodo esset accusandus, prefatus Papa, ut causam diceret, occurrebat; sed ab emulis est inpeditus. Item Gregorius Papa ait de se ipso:

C. XLII. Blessed Gregory grants to others license to refute him.

If anyone wishes to refute us concerning these matters or contends that we act outside authority, let him come to the Apostolic See, so that there before the confession of blessed Peter he may justly contend with me, and one of us may there receive his sentence. GRATIAN. From all these things it is gathered that subjects can reprove and accuse their prelates. But, just as was said of Christ when he said to the Jews, “If I have spoken badly, etc.,” so it is to be understood concerning these persons: by their example they gave prelates the capacity to receive subjects in an accusation against themselves, but did not compel them.

C. XLII. Redarguendi se licentiam B. Gregorius aliis prestat.

Si quis super his nos redarguere uoluerit, uel extra auctoritatem nos facere contenderit, ueniat ad sedem apostolicam, ut ibi ante confessionem B. Petri mecum iuste decertet, quatinus ibi unus ex nobis sententiam suscipiat suam. Gratian. Ex his omnibus colligitur, quod subditi possunt reprehendere et accusare prelatos suos. Sed sicut de Christo dictum est, quando Iudeis dixit: "Si male locutus sum, etc." ita de istis intelligendum est, quod suo exemplo prelatis dederunt facultatem recipiendi subditos in accusatione sui, sed non coegerunt.

[C. XLIII.] Likewise.

Paul, bishop of the city of Dioclea, is accused by his subjects concerning a fall of the flesh, convicted, and deposed, and another is substituted in his place. Whether this was done by dispensation of the accused or by rigor of law can be considered from Gregory's Register, to Bishop John [of First Justiniana], chapter CCXVII, where he says:

[C. XLIII.] Item.

Paulus Deaclinae ciuitatis episcopus accusatur a subditis de lapsu carnis, conuincitur, deponitur, alter loco eius substituitur. Hoc an ex dispensatione accusati, an ex rigore iuris sit factum, ex registro Gregorii ad Iohannem Episcopum [primae Iustinianeae] capitulo CCXVII., potest perpendi, ubi ait:

C. XLIV. Paul, bishop of the city of Dioclea, convicted by the accusation of his subjects, is deposed.

Nemesion, the bearer of these presents, coming to us, reported that Paul, bishop of the city of Dioclea, having fallen, among other evils, into a carnal crime, was accused and convicted by his own clerics and deposed by an episcopal sentence. Afterwards, coming with the aid of secular persons, he entered the episcopate in the manner of a robber and, after taking away the property of the church, expelled from it the most beloved Nemesion, bearer of these presents, who had been substituted for him, and almost brought him to the highest injury and death. Therefore let Your Fraternity take care to learn all these things, and compel him to return, with every delay or excuse ceasing, whatever he took away from the church. But if he has said that he took nothing from the church but his own property—although it was grave and unjust that he did not seek this from you or from his metropolitan but presumed to act by rash daring—nevertheless, if he took anything of his own, it ought to be established under the examination of Your Fraternity whether this is true. But that also is to be diligently investigated: whether he badly dissipated anything from the property of the church, so that he may be compelled in every way, from that which he now took away, to restore it and make satisfaction.

GRATIAN. By this statement Gregory does not avenge himself against the accusers or the persons who deposed him, but proceeds further against the deposed man, so that, if he should attempt again to aspire to the episcopate, he may be repelled in every way and thrust into a monastery to perform perpetual penance. Therefore, since Gregory repels in every way one aspiring to the episcopate and subjects him to grave penance, it is evident that he was accused and convicted by his subjects not through Gregory's dispensation but through the censure of the canons. And, so that we may now proceed not by examples but by laws, it must be seen what Gregory writes to Innocent and the other Bishops of Sardinia, [book VII, indiction 2, letter 8], saying thus:

C. XLIV. Paulus Deaclinae ciuitatis episcopus subditorum accusatione conuictus deponitur.

Lator Nemesion ad nos ueniens indicauit, quod Paulus Deaclinae ciuitatis episcopus, inter alia mala in corporali crimine lapsus, a suis clericis accusatus atque conuictus, episcopali sententia depositus est; postea, cum auxilio secularium ueniens, episcopatum more predonis ingressus est, ablatisque rebus ecclesiae dilectissimum Nemesion latorem presentium sibi substitutum ab eo proiecit, et ad summam iniuriam ac necem pene perduxit. Fraternitas itaque uestra hec omnia curet addiscere, et quecumque ecclesiae abstulit omni mora uel excusatione cessante reddere conpellat. Si uero nichil ecclesiae, sed proprium se dixerit abstulisse, (quamuis graue et iniquum fuerit, ut non a uobis, uel a metropolitano eius hoc petierit, sed temerario ausu agere presumpserit,) uerum tamen si quid proprium tulit, sub fraternitatis uestrae debet examine constare si uerum est. Sed et illud diligenter querendum est, si quid male de rebus dilapidauit ecclesiae, ut ex eo, quod nunc abstulit, illud reformare ac satisfacere modis omnibus conpellatur. Gratian. Hoc dicto non in accusatores uel depositores ulciscitur, sed in depositum ulterius prosequitur, ut si ultra ad episcopatum aspirare temptauerit, modis omnibus repellatur, et ad agendam penitentiam perennem in monasterio detrudatur. Quem ergo Gregorius ad episcopatum aspirantem modis omnibus repellit, quem graui penitentiae subicit, patet, non sua dispensatione, sed canonum censura a subditis accusatum et conuictum. Et ut iam non exemplis, sed legibus agamus, uidendum est, quid Gregorius scribat Innocentio et reliquis Episcopis Sardiniae, [lib. VII. Indict. 2. epist. 8.] ita dicens:

C. XLV. That subjects can accuse their prelates.

Do not presume to set aside your metropolitan in any matter, except if—which we do not wish—it happens that you have some cause against him, so that on account of this you ought to seek the judgment of the Apostolic See.

C. XLV. Quod subditi prelatos suos accusare possunt.

Metropolitanum uestrum in aliquo postponere non presumatis, excepto si (ut non optamus) contra eundem uos habere aliquid causae contingat, ut ob hoc sedis apostolicae iudicium petere debeatis.

C. XLVI. Subjects shall not neglect the life of prelates through any dissimulation.

Likewise to all the Bishops of the Council of Byzacena, [book X, letter 37]. Just as, he says, it is praiseworthy and discerning to show reverence and honor to one's superiors, so it belongs to rectitude and fear of God not to set aside through any dissimulation whatever things in them need correction, lest disease invade the whole body—which God forbid—if weakness has not been cured in the head. For certain things concerning your primate Clementius have been reported to us which, since they are so grave that they ought in no way to pass unexamined, cause us to exhort Your Fraternity to investigate in many ways with all solicitude and vigor of truth the things alleged; and, if they are as they have been heard, let them be cut away by canonical vengeance. § 1. We admonish, moreover, that neither regard for any person, nor favor, nor any enticement soften any of you away from the things reported to us or shake you from the truth; rather, gird yourselves priestly for the investigation of truth on account of God. For if anyone has presumed to be sluggish or negligent in this, let him know that before God he is a participant in the stated crimes, since he is not moved by zeal for God to examine minutely the causes of a nefarious deed. GRATIAN. If anyone contends that these are special cases and that a general rule ought not to be gathered from them, let him hear what Gelasius says in chapter XXVII, writing thus to all clerics of whatever order:

C. XLVI. Vitam prelatorum subditi nulla simulatione negligant.

Item uniuersis Episcopis Concilii Vizachii. [lib. X. epist. 37.] Sicut (inquit) laudabile discretumque est reuerentiam et honorem exhibere prioribus, ita rectitudinis et Dei timoris est, si qua in eis indigent correctione, nulla dissimulatione postponere, ne totum (quod absit) corpus morbus inuadat, si languor non fuerit curatus in capite. Quedam enim de primate uestro Clementio ad nos perlata sunt, que quoniam ita grauia sunt, ut transire indiscussa nullo modo debeant, fraternitatem uestram hortamur, ut cum omni sollicitudine ac uiuacitate ueritatis indagare multis modis debeatis illata, et si sunt ut audita sunt, ultione canonica resecentur. §. 1. Ammonemus autem, ut non cuiuscumque personae gratia, non fauor, non quodlibet blandimentum quemquam uestrum ab his que nunciata sunt nobis molliat, uel a ueritate excutiat, sed sacerdotaliter ad inuestigandam ueritatem uos propter Deum accingite. Nam si quis in hoc piger aut negligens esse presumpserit, dictis criminibus apud Deum se nouerit esse participem, cuius zelo ad perscrutandas subtiliter nefandi facinoris causas non mouetur. Gratian. Hec si quis specialia, et ex his generalem regulam colligi non oportere contendit, audiat, quid Gelasius c. XXVII. dicat, omnibus clericis cuiuscumque ordinis ita scribens:

C. XLVII. Clerics shall report the transgression of their bishop to the ears of the Roman Pontiff.

Accordingly, let no cleric trust that he will be immune from apostolic offense if, in those things which apostolic authority has declared are to be followed salutarily, he has seen a bishop, priest, or deacon transgressing and has not immediately taken care to report it to the ears of the Roman Pontiff, provided that competent proofs are furnished, so that vengeance upon the transgressor may become a prohibition against transgressing for others. But otherwise every pontiff will in every way be an overthrower of his own order and honor if he has thought these things should be suppressed from any cleric or from the hearing of the whole Church.

C. XLVII. Clerici excessus sui episcopi auribus deferant Romani Pontificis.

Quapropter nec clericorum quisquam apostolicae offensae se confidat futurum inmunem, si in his, que salubriter sequenda deprompsit auctoritas apostolica, siue episcopum, siue presbiterum, seu diaconum uiderit excedentem, et non protinus ad aures Romani Pontificis deferre curauerit, probationibus dumtaxat conpetenter exhibitis, ut transgressoris ultio fiat ceteris interdictio delinquendi. Sin uero, modis omnibus erit unusquisque pontificum ordinis et honoris sui elisor, si cui clericorum uel auditui totius ecclesiae hec putauerit subprimenda.

C. XLVIII. Concerning the same.

Likewise. If you see your pontiff admit anything involving harm to the church, or among those things prohibited by our precept, immediately signify it to our ears by a report, so that we may determine what ought to be done.

C. XLVIII. De eodem.

Item. Si quid in ecclesia dampni, aut in his, que sunt preceptionis nostrae prohibita, pontificem uestrum uideritis admittere, mox nostris auribus relatione signate, ut quid fieri debeat censeamus.

C. XLIX. Clerics or laymen shall not be admitted to the accusation of bishops without examination.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 21]. We decree that clerics or laymen indiscriminately accusing bishops or clerics and without proof are not to be received into an accusation unless the reputation of their standing is first examined.

C. XLIX. Clerici aut laici sine examinatione ad episcoporum accusationem non admittantur.

Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 21.] Clericos aut laicos passim accusantes et sine probatione episcopos aut clericos ad accusationem non recipiendos decernimus, nisi prius discutiatur eorum estimationis opinio.

C. L. Any person accusing bishops or others shall bring forward things to be shown by documentary proofs.

Likewise from a Roman Synod. If any bishop, deacon, or any cleric has been accused before bishops—for this ought not to be done elsewhere—by any person, whoever that man may be, whether of exalted honor or of another dignity, who has undertaken this kind of blameworthy contention, let him know that he ought to bring forward things to be stated with proofs and things to be shown with documentary evidence.

C. L. Quelibet persona episcopos aut alios accusans, monstranda documentis inferat.

Item ex Sinodo Romana. Si quis episcopus, aut diaconus, uel quilibet clericus apud episcopos (quia alibi non oportet) a qualibet persona accusati fuerint, quicumque fuerit ille uir, siue sublimis honoris, siue alterius dignitatis, qui hoc genus illaudabilis intentionis arripuerit, nouerit dicenda probationibus, monstranda documentis se debere inferre.

C. LI. Those who cannot be advanced to the same order shall not accuse priests.

Likewise Pope Damasus to Archbishop Stephen, [letter III, c. 3]. As ancient authority hands down, those who ought not and cannot be advanced to the same honor cannot charge priests with a crime or testify against them.

C. LI. Sacerdotes non accusent qui ad eundem ordinem prouehi non possunt.

Item Damasus Papa Stephano Archiepiscopo. [epist. III. cap. 3.] Sacerdotes (ut antiqua tradit auctoritas) criminari non possunt, nec in eos testificari, qui ad eundem non debent nec possunt prouehi honorem.

C. LII. Only irreproachable persons shall be received in the accusation of their elders.

Likewise Pope Hyginus, [letter I]. Charges against elders shall not be made through others but through the very persons who allege the crimes, provided nevertheless that they have appeared worthy and irreproachable and have shown by public records that they are free from all suspicion and enmity and possess irreproachable faith and lead an irreproachable manner of life. GRATIAN. It is therefore gathered from all these authorities that subjects are to be admitted in the accusation of prelates. Now it must be seen whether monks are to be heard in the accusation of bishops. Pope Hadrian, [in the chapters, c. 31], appears to remove them from accusation, saying thus:

C. LII. Nisi inreprehensibiles in maiorum accusatione non recipiantur.

Item Yginus Papa. [epist. I.] Criminationes maiorum natu per alios non fiant, nisi per ipsos, qui crimina intendunt, si tamen ipsi digni et inreprehensibiles aparuerint, et actis publicis docuerint omni suspicione carere et inimicitia, et inreprehensibilem fidem habere ac conuersationem ducere. Gratian. Colligitur itaque ex his omnibus, quod subditi in accusatione prelatorum sunt admittendi. Nunc uidendum est, an monachi in accusatione episcoporum sint audiendi? Adrianus Papa [in capitulis c. 3I.] uidetur eos ab accusatione remouere, ita dicens:

C. LIII. Monks cannot accuse priests or testify against them.

It was resolved to obstruct the plea of accusing priests and testifying against them for those whom we know to be dead not by human declarations but by divine ones, because a deadly voice ought rather to be prohibited than heard. GRATIAN. Likewise, in the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 4], it is prescribed that monks shall not presume to handle ecclesiastical actions.

C. LIII. Monachi sacerdotes accusare uel in eos testificari non possunt.

Placuit eorum accusandi sacerdotes et testificandi in eos uocem obstruere, quos non humanis uocibus, sed diuinis mortuos esse scimus, quia funestam uocem potius interdici quam audiri oportet. Gratian. Item in Concilio Calcedonensi [c. 4.] precipitur, ut ecclesiasticas actiones monachi attrectare non presumant.

C. LIV. Monks are not to be heard in an accusation.

Likewise Pope Pelagius II, [to the Bishops of Italy]. Let no monk undertake such things anywhere or presume to disturb secular or ecclesiastical business, because their voice is dead in such matters. GRATIAN. But it is one thing which is assumed from a presumption of rashness, another which is conducted from a necessity of charity. For monks cannot accuse bishops from presumption; from charity they can. Hence it is also prescribed in the canons that the chamberlains of a bishop shall be either religious clerics or chosen monks, so that they may be able to give testimony concerning his life. GRATIAN. Part VII. § 1. Likewise, that statement of Pope Eleutherius, [in the letter to the provinces of Gaul], is said generally to all:

C. LIV. Monachi in accusatione non sunt audiendi.

Item Pelagius Papa. [II. Episcopis Italiae.] Nullus monachus talia usquam arripiat, nec secularia aut ecclesiastica negotia perturbare presumat, quia mortua est in talibus uox eorum. Gratian. Sed aliud est, quod ex presumptione assumitur temeritatis: aliud, quod ex necessitate geritur karitatis. Monachi enim ex presumptione episcopos accusare non possunt: ex karitate possunt. Unde et in canonibus precipitur, ut cubicularii episcopi sint uel religiosi clerici, uel electi monachi, ut de eius uita testimonium dicere possint. VII. Pars. §. 1. Item illud Eleuterii Papae [in epist. ad Galliae prouincias] omnibus generaliter dicitur:

C. LV. One who, although able, neglects to oppose the depraved is convicted of consenting.

To neglect to disturb the depraved when you can is nothing other than to foster them. Nor is one free from the scruple of hidden association who ceases to oppose a manifest crime. Likewise Jerome writes concerning himself as well as other monks in the first prologue of the Library, saying:

C.LV. Consentire conuincitur, qui cum possit, peruersis negligit obuiare.

Negligere, peruersos cum possis perturbare, nichil est aliud quam fouere. Nec caret scrupulo societatis occultae qui manifesto facinori desinit obuiare. Item Ieronimus tam de se, quam de aliis monachis in primo prologo bibliotecae scribit, dicens:

C. LVI. The life of one who does not resist those who destroy is convicted of benefiting the Church too little.

For holy rusticity benefits only itself; and as much as it builds the Church of Christ by the merit of its life, so much does it harm it if it does not resist those who destroy.

> C. LVI. Ecclesiae parum prodesse conuincitur eius uita, qui destruentibus non resistit.
> Sancta quippe rusticitas solum sibi prodest, et quantum ex uitae merito edificat ecclesiam Christi, tantum nocet, si destruentibus non resistat.

C. LVII. Subjects shall endeavor to reprove the vices of prelates.

Likewise Gregory. Subjects are to be admonished not to be subject more than is expedient, lest, when they strive to subject themselves to men more than is necessary, they be compelled to venerate their vices. The same, presiding over a general synod, said, [c. 2]:

> C. LVII Subditi uicia prelatorum reprehendere studeant.
> Item Gregorius. Ammonendi sunt subditi, ne plus quam expedit sint subiecti, ne, cum student plus quam necesse est hominibus subici, conpellantur eorum uicia uenerari. Idem generali Sinodo presidens dixit: [c. 2.]

C. LVIII. Clerics or chosen monks shall be the chamberlains of a bishop.

Since the life of a shepherd ought to be an example to the disciples, clerics very often do not know what the life of their pontiff is like in private, although secular boys know it. Concerning this matter, we establish by the present decree that certain chosen persons from the clerics or even from the monks shall serve in the ministry of the pontifical chamber, so that one who is in the position of governance may have such witnesses as see his true manner of life in private and take from assiduous observation an example of advancement. Likewise to Virgil, Bishop of Arles, [book IX, letter 49]:

> Cum pastoris uita in exemplo debeat esse discipulis, plerumque clerici qualis in secreto sit uita sui pontificis nesciunt, quam tamen, seculares pueri sciunt. De qua re presenti decreto constituimus, ut quidam ex clericis, uel etiam ex monachis electi, in ministerio cubiculi pontificalis obsequantur, ut is, qui in loco regiminis est, tales habeat testes, qui ueram eius in secreto conuersationem uideant, et ex sedula uisione exemplum profectus sumant. Item Virgilio Episcopo Arelatensi: [lib. IX. ep. 49]

C. LIX. A bishop ought not to have depraved men in his company.

It has reached us that our brother and fellow bishop Serenus of Marseille has altogether depraved men in his company, to such a degree indeed that he has as a familiar a certain priest who, after a fall, is said still to wallow in his iniquities. This is to be investigated minutely by you; and if it has been established thus, let it be your care to correct him in our place in such a manner that one who receives such a man may learn not to foster him with familiarity but rather to restrain him with vengeance, and that the one who is received may learn to wash away sins with tears, not to heap up iniquity with uncleannesses.

> C. LIX. Prauos in sua societate episcopus habere non debet.
> Peruenit ad nos, fratrem et coepiscopum nostrum Serenum Masiliensem prauos homines omnino in societate sua habere, ita denique, ut presbiterum quemdam, qui post lapsum in suis adhuc dicitur iniquitatibus uolutari familiarem habeat. Quod a uobis subtiliter est requirendum, et si ita constiterit, curae uobis sit nostra eum sic uice corrigere, ut qui talem recipit non familiaritate fouere, sed discat potius ultione conprimere, et qui receptus est discat lacrimis peccata diluere, non iniquitatem inmundiciis cumulare.

C. LX. Bishops shall always have with them men of good testimony.

Likewise Pope Paschal. Let bishops devote themselves to reading and prayer, and always have with them priests and deacons or other clerics of good testimony, so that, according to the Apostle and the institutes of the holy Fathers, they may be able to be found irreproachable. GRATIAN. Likewise John the Baptist, although he led the eremitical life, refuted with harsh rebuke the scribes and Pharisees, priests and Levites of the Jews, who came to him. § 1. Likewise it is determined from the canons: "Those who are able to ascend to the same grade can accuse priests." Therefore, since monks can praiseworthily attain to the grade of the priesthood, it is evident that they too can freely accuse priests.

C. LX. Viros boni testimonii episcopi semper secum habeant.

Item Pascalis Papa. Episcopi lectioni et orationi uacent, et semper secum presbiteros et diaconos, aut alios boni testimonii clericos habeant, ut secundum apostolum et sanctorum Patrum instituta possint inreprehensibiles inueniri. Gratian. Item Iohannes Baptista, cum heremiticam uitam, duceret, scribas et Phariseos, sacerdotes et Leuitas Iudeorum ad se uenientes aspera increpatione redarguit. §. 1. Item ex canonibus diffinitur: "Illi sacerdotes accusare possunt, qui ad eundem gradum conscendere ualent." Cum ergo monachi ad sacerdotii gradum laudabiliter pertingere ualeant, patet, quod et ipsi sacerdotes libere accusare possunt.

Question VIII

GRATIAN. Part I. Concerning accusations, how they ought to be made is openly determined in the canons. For Pope Callistus says, [to the Bishops of Gaul, letter II]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. De accusationibus uero, qualiter fieri debeat in canonibus aperte discernitur. Ait enim Calixtus Papa: [ad Episcopos Galliae, ep. II.]

C. I. An accusation shall always be made in writing.

The persons of accusers shall never be received without a writing, nor shall any persons be permitted to accuse while the person whom they wish to accuse is absent.

C. I. Accusatio semper fiat in scriptis.

Accusatorum personae sine scripto numquam recipiantur nec absente eo, quem accusare uoluerint, quibuslibet accusare permittatur.

[C. II.]

From book IV of the Code, under the title On Proofs, [final law]. Let all accusers know that they ought to bring into public cognizance a matter which is fortified by suitable witnesses, instructed by the clearest documentary proofs, or furnished with indications which are undoubted for proof and clearer than light.

[C. II.]

Codice libro IV. titulo De probationibus. [l. fin.] Sciant cuncti accusatores, eam rem se deferre debere in publicam notionem, que munita sit testibus idoneis, uel instructa apertissimis documentis, uel indiciis ad probationem indubitatis et luce clarioribus expedita.

C. III. An accusation ought always to be made in writing.

Likewise Pope Eutychian, [to the Bishops of Sicily, letter II]. Whoever he is who alleges a crime, let him come into judgment, indicate the name of the defendant, undertake the bond of formal inscription, and submit to a corresponding custody—with an appraisal of dignity nevertheless maintained. Let him know that he has no license to lie, since the likeness of the punishment calls calumniators to vengeance. But those who have recourse to diviners and magicians shall by no means be admitted to an accusation.

C. III. Accusatio semper debet fieri in scriptis.

Item Euticianus Papa. [Episcopis Siciliae, ep. II.] Quisquis ille est, qui crimen intendit, in iudicium ueniat, nomen rei indicet, uinculum inscriptionis arripiat, custodiae similitudinem (habita tamen dignitatis estimatione) potiatur, nec sibi nouerit licentiam mentiendi, cum calumpniantes ad uindictam poscat similitudo suplicii. Qui uero ad sortilegos magosque concurrunt, nullatenus ad accusationem sunt admittendi.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Sixtus III, [in the letter to the Eastern Bishops, c. 4]. One who alleges a crime shall write that he will prove it. And one who has not proved what he alleged shall himself suffer the punishment which he sought to inflict. But Pope Stephen appears to write to the contrary, saying, [letter II, c. 4]:

C. IV. De eodem.

Item Sixtus Papa. [III. in epist. ad Episcopos orientales, cap. 4.] Qui crimen obicit, scribat se probaturum. Et qui non probauerit quod obiecit, penam, quam intulerit, ipse patiatur. Sed Stephanus Papa contra uidetur scribere, dicens: [ep. II. c. 4.]

C. V. Concerning the same.

No person's accusation shall be received through writings, but by his own voice—if the person of the accuser is lawful and worthy—with, of course, the person whom he desires to accuse present, because no one can accuse while absent or be accused by an absent person. GRATIAN. But Pope Callistus prescribed that, with the person whom he accuses present, an accuser shall offer his accusation to the judge in writing and read the letters of his accusation in his own voice. Stephen, however, prohibits an absent person from daring to accuse anyone by a letter.

GRATIAN. Part II. § 1. But what the form of an accusation is and what the method of composing petitions is, Paul shows in the Digest, in the book On Public Judgments, under the title On Accusations and Formal Inscriptions, [law 3], saying: § 2. "The composition of petitions of formal inscription is as follows: the consul and the day. Before that praetor or consul, Lucius Titius declared that he was denouncing Maeva as a defendant under the Julian Law on Adulteries because he says that she committed adultery with Gaius Seius in the city N., in that man's house, in the month N., when N. were consuls. For both the place in which the adultery was committed and the person with whom it is said to have been admitted, and the month, are certainly to be designated. This is provided by the Julian Law on Public Judgments and is generally prescribed for all who denounce anyone as a defendant. But they shall not be compelled unwillingly to include either the day or the hour. But if the petitions of formal inscription have not been lawfully arranged, the name of the defendant is erased and the power to prosecute the defendant anew will arise. § 3. Likewise, the person who gives the petition ought to subscribe that he has made the declaration, or another for him if he does not know letters. But if he alleges another crime—for example, that the person provided his own house so that a matron might suffer illicit intercourse, that he released an adulterer who had been caught, that he received a price for discovered illicit intercourse, or anything similar—that very thing will have to be included in the petition. If the accuser has died or another cause has impeded him so that he cannot accuse, or anything similar has occurred, the name of the defendant is erased upon the defendant's petition. This is also provided by the Julian Law on Violence and by a decree of the Senate, in such a manner that another is permitted to prosecute the defendant anew. But within what time, we shall consider; and indeed thirty available days are to be observed."

C. V. De eodem.

Per scripta nullius accusatio suscipiatur, sed propria uoce (si legitima et condigna accusatoris persona fuerit) presente uidelicet eo, quem accusare desiderat, quia nullum absens accusare potest, nec ab aliquo accusari. Gratian. Sed Calixtus Papa precepit, ut accusator presente eo, quem accusat, in scriptis accusationem iudici offerat, et propria uoce litteras suae accusationis legat. Stephanus autem prohibet, ne absens aliquem per epistolam accusare audeat. II. Pars. §. 1. Que uero sit forma accusationis, quis modus concipiendorum libellorum, Paulus in Digestis, libro de publicis iudiciis, titulo de accusationibus et inscriptionibus, [lege 3.] ostendit, dicens: §. 2. "Libellorum inscriptionis conceptio talis est: Consul et dies. Apud illum pretorem uel consulem Lucius Titius professus est, se Meuiam lege Iulia de adulteriis ream deferre quod dicat eam cum Gaio Seio in ciuitate N, domo illius, mense N, consulibus N, commisisse adulterium. Utique enim et locus designandus est, in quo adulterium commissum est, et persona, cum qua admissum dicitur, et mensis. Hoc enim lege Iulia publicorum cauetur, et generaliter precipitur omnibus, qui aliquem reum deferunt. Neque autem diem, neque horam inuitus conprehendant. Quod si libelli inscriptionum legitime ordinati non fuerint, rei nomen aboletur, et ex integro repetendi reum potestas fiet. §. 3. Item subscribere debebit is, qui dat libellum, se professum esse, uel alius pro eo, si litteras nesciat. Sed si aliud crimen obiciat, ueluti quod domum suam prebuit, ut stuprum materfamilias pateretur, quod adulterum deprehensum dimiserit, quod pretium pro conperto stupro acceperit, et si quid simile, id ipsum libello conprehendendum erit. Si accusator decesserit, aliaue causa eum inpedierit, quo minus accusare possit, et si quid simile, nomen rei aboletur postulante reo, idque et lege Iulia de ui, et senatusconsulto cautum est, ita ut liceat alii ex integro repetere reum. Sed intra quod tempus, uidebimus; et utique XXX. dies utiles obseruandi sunt."

Causa III

GRATIAN. A certain bishop was cast down from his own see and petitions to be restored. After restoration he is brought into a case and requests periods of delay. At last a certain person not lawfully joined, two infamous persons, and three religious persons proceed to his accusation. The accusers produce witnesses from their own household, and others hostile to him outside his province. The defendant is brought before a criminal judge to be heard and judged by only one person. Certain absent accusers and witnesses strive to accuse him and testify against him by letter. When many heads were alleged against him, the accusers fail on the first. Finally the accusation is turned against the accuser.

(Question I.) Here it is first asked whether restoration is to be given to any persons whatsoever who have been despoiled. (Question II.) Second, concerning periods of delay: whether they are to be granted to any persons whatsoever only after restoration, or also after summons to a case. (Question III.) Third, for what number of months they are to be granted to both parties. (Question IV.) Fourth, whether infamous persons and persons not lawfully joined are to be admitted to an accusation. (Question V.) Fifth, whether witnesses from the household of the accusers are to be produced, or the plea of enemies is to be heard. (Question VI.) Sixth, whether the defendant is to be produced outside the province. (Question VII.) Seventh, whether the sentence of one whom malice equal to that of the defendant infects is to be heard. (Question VIII.) Eighth, whether a bishop is to be heard or judged by only one person. (Question IX.) Ninth, whether accusers or witnesses are able to utter the plea of accusation or testimony against an absent person. (Question X.) Tenth, whether those who fail under the first head are to be admitted to the following ones. (Question XI.) Eleventh, whether the accused is permitted to turn an accusation against the accuser.

> GRATIANUS. Quidam episcopus a propria sede deiectus est, petit restitui; post restitutionem ducitur in causam, inducias postulat, tandem ad eius accusationem procedit quidam non legitime coniunctus, et duo infames, et tres religiosi; accusatores testes de domo sua producunt, et alios sibi inimicos extra suam prouinciam; reus criminoso iudici offertur ab uno tantum audiendus et iudicandus. Quidam de accusatoribus et testibus absentes per epistolam illum accusare, et in eum testificari contendunt; cum multa capitula ei obicerentur, in primo accusatores deficiunt; demum accusatio in accusatorem uertitur. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, an restitutio danda sit quibuslibet expoliatis? (Qu. II.) Secundo, de induciis, an post restitutionem tantum, an etiam post uocationem ad causam quibuslibet concedendae sint? (Qu. III.) Tertio, quo spatio mensium utrique sint concedendae? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, an infames et non legitime coniuncti ad accusationem sint admittendi. (Qu. V.) Quinto, an testes de domo accusatorum sint producendi, uel inimicorum uox sit audienda? (Qu. VI.) Sexto, an extra prouinciam reus sit producendus? (Qu. VII.) Septimo, an sit audienda eius sententia, quem cum reo par inficit malicia? (Qu. VIII.) Octauo, an ab uno tantum episcopus sit audiendus uel iudicandus? (Qu. IX.) Nono, an accusatores uel testes in absentem uocem accusationis uel testificationis exhibere ualeant? (Qu. X.) Decimo, an deficientes in primo capitulo sint admittendi ad sequentia? (Qu. XI.) Undecimo, an accusato liceat accusationem in accusatorem uertere?

Question I

GRATIAN. That restoration is to be given to any persons whatsoever is proved by many authorities. For Pope Gaius says, [sole letter to Bishop Felix, c. 3]:

> GRATIANUS. Quod restitutio quibuslibet danda sit, multis auctoritatibus probatur. Ait enim Gaius papa: [epist. unica ad Felicem Episcopum, cap. 3.]

C. I. All things are to be restored to bishops who have been despoiled or cast out.

To bishops despoiled of their property or cast out of their own sees, all things which were taken from them are to be restored under the laws, because no crime can be alleged against them before this has been done.

> C. I. Expoliatis uel eiectis omnia sunt redintegranda.

Episcopis suis rebus expoliatis uel a propriis sedibus eiectis omnia, que eis ablata sunt, legibus sunt redintegranda, quia priusquam factum fuerit hoc, nullum crimen eis obici potest.

C. II. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Fabian, [letter II to the Eastern Bishops]. If bishops have been expelled from their own sees or churches without the authority of the Roman Pontiff, their own place and all their things are to be restored before they are summoned to a synod. For no reason permits anything to be alleged against them while their goods, or those of their church, and their property are held for a time by rivals or by any persons whatsoever. Nor can anyone among greater or lesser persons allege anything against them while they lack their churches, property, or powers.

GRATIAN. But it is to be noted that a sentence of restoration alone does not suffice unless all things are restored actually by the office of the judge, so that one who has been cast out or despoiled may also receive natural possession, whether by his own intent and another's body, as through a procurator, or by his own intent and body. All things which had been taken from him under whatever condition are also to be brought back to the same place from which they had been carried away. Hence John, Bishop of the city of Rome, writes to Archbishop Zacharias, [letter I]:

C. II. De eodem.

Item Fabianus Papa. [ep. II. Episcopis orientalibus.] Episcopi, si a propriis sedibus aut ecclesiis sine auctoritate Romani Pontificis expulsi fuerint, antequam ad sinodum uocentur, proprius locus et sua omnia redintegranda sunt. Nulla enim ratio permittit, dum ad tempus eorum bona, uel ecclesiae, atque res ab emulis aut a quibuscumque detinentur, ut aliquid illis obici debeat. Nec quicquam potest eis quilibet maiorum uel minorum obicere, dum suis ecclesiis, uel rebus, uel potestatibus carent. Gratian. Sed notandum est, quod restitutionis sententia sola non sufficit, nisi presentialiter omnia iudicis offitio restituantur, ut eiectus uel expoliatus etiam naturalem possessionem recipiat, siue animo suo et corpore alieno, ueluti per procuratorem, siue animo et corpore suo. Cuncta quoque, que sibi ablata fuerant quacumque conditione, in eodem loco, unde surrepta fuerant, sunt reuocanda. Unde Iohannes urbis Romae Episcopus scribit Zachariae Archiepiscopo: [epist. I.]

C. III. Concerning the same.

All things are to be restored actually, by the ordinance of pontiffs, to bishops who have been despoiled or cast out, and are to be brought back entirely to the place from which they had departed, under whatever condition of time, captivity, deceit, or violence of evil persons, and through whatever unjust causes they are known to have lost the property of the church or their own property, that is, their own substances.

C. III. De eodem.

Redintegranda sunt omnia expoliatis uel eiectis episcopis presentialiter ordinatione pontificum, et in eo loco unde abscesserant, funditus reuocanda, quacumque conditione temporis, aut captiuitate, aut dolo, aut uiolentia malorum, et per quascumque iniustas causas res ecclesiae, uel proprias, id est suas substantias perdidisse noscuntur.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Eusebius, Bishop of the Apostolic See, to all bishops. All things are to be restored to bishops who have been despoiled or cast out, etc., as far as "are to be brought back entirely," in the same manner as above.

> C. IV. De eodem.
> Item Eusebius apostolicae sedis Episcopus, omnibus episcopis. Redintegranda sunt omnia expoliatis uel eiectis episcopis, etc. usque funditus reuocanda, eodem modo, ut supra.

C. V. One who withdraws himself from the service of his brothers is not a priest but a schismatic.

Likewise Pope Alexander, [letter II, at the beginning]. No one doubts that the good are always persecuted and troubled by the evil. On this account, we ought to be humbled under the mighty hand of God, so that he may free us in the time of tribulation. For the devil does not cease to go about, seeking whom he may devour and seeking which of the faithful he may destroy, and especially those whom he has found more ardent in the service of the Savior and familiar with him. I call familiar those whom he wished to be consecrated and constituted in the order of the apostolate. For they intercede for the people and eat the sins of the people, because by their prayers and offerings they wipe away and consume them. And below: But anyone of your college who has withdrawn himself from your aid will be proved to be a schismatic rather than a priest. "Behold," says the Prophet, "how good and how pleasant it is for brothers to dwell as one." But those who withdraw themselves from the assistance of their brothers do not dwell as one, or, what is worse, those who lay ambushes or snares for their brothers. And below: Those who persecute the Lord in his priests crucify him, because cross is named from torment. But one who suffers violence sustains great torment.

> C. V. Non est sacerdos, sed scismaticus, qui fratrum se obsequio subtrahit.
> Item Alexander Papa. [epist. II. in princip.] Nulli dubium est, quia boni a malis semper persecuntur et tribulantur. Propter quod nos oportet humiliari sub potenti manu Dei, ut liberet nos in tempore tribulationis. Nam diabolus non cessat circumire, querens quem deuoret, et querere quos ex fidelibus perdat, et maxime illos, quos ardentiores in seruitio saluatoris eique familiares inuenerit. Familiares dico eos, quos sacrari, et in ordine apostolatus constitui uoluit. Ipsi enim pro populo interpellant, et peccata populi comedunt, quia suis precibus et oblationibus ea delent atque consumunt. Et infra: Qui autem ex uestro fuerit collegio, et ab auxilio uestro se subtraxerit, magis scismaticus quam sacerdos esse probabitur. "Ecce" (inquit Propheta) "quam bonum et quam iucundum habitare fratres in unum." Illi uero non habitant in unum, qui fratrum se solatio subtrahunt, aut (quod deterius est) fratribus insidias aut laqueos ponunt. Et infra: Dominum crucifigunt, qui eum in sacerdotibus suis persecuntur, quia crux a cruciatu dicitur. Magnum uero cruciatum sustinet qui uim patitur.

C. VI. Let those who inflict reproach and calumny upon priests be excommunicated.

Likewise Pope Fabian, [letter II to the Eastern Bishops]. Therefore, brothers, God foreordained you and all who perform the highest priesthood for this purpose: that you remove injustices, cut off presumptions, assist those laboring in the priesthood, and give no place to their reproaches and calamities, but bear aid to the one who suffers calumny or reproach; and cut off the one who commits calumny or reproach, and bear assistance to the Lord in his priests.

GRATIAN. It is evident, therefore, that the despoiled are first to be actually restored before they are summoned to a case. But it is objected: where there was no lawful institution, there cannot be restoration. For one who was never established is not proved to have been removed, and therefore he cannot demand restoration. Therefore, those whose election is vitiated, who were not elected by the clergy or sought by the people, or who crept in through simony are not to be held among bishops; and therefore, if they have been expelled from the sees which they appeared to hold, they cannot seek restoration before they are summoned to a case. Hence above in the tract concerning persons to be ordained: "If anyone by money or human favor, or by a popular or military tumult, etc." But this is understood only in the case in which the Apostolic See is occupied through violence, in which case no judge is found by whose office that apostate can be excluded. But it has no place in other cases, since violent possession cannot be taken away from a violent possessor except by the sentence of a judge. But if the true lord, by war not continued but renewed, has cast him out of possession by force, he will, by authority of the judge, restore possession to the robber. Therefore, if bishops have been violently cast out from the sees which they appeared in any manner to hold, not by a judge, they are to be restored after the expulsion before a regular summons to a synod.

C. VI. Excommunicentur qui obprobrium et calumpniam inferunt sacerdotibus.

Item Fabianus Papa. [ep. II. ad Episcopos orientales] Deus ergo, fratres, ad hoc preordinauit uos et omnes, qui summo sacerdotio funguntur, ut iniusticias remoueatis, et presumptiones abscidatis, et in sacerdotio laborantibus succurratis, et obprobriis et calamitatibus eorum locum non prebeatis, sed ei, qui calumpniam uel obprobrium patitur, adiutorium feratis; illum uero, qui calumpniam uel obprobrium facit, abscidatis, et Domino in suis sacerdotibus opem feratis. Gratian. Patet ergo, quod expoliati prius sunt presentialiter restituendi, antequam ad causam sint uocandi. Sed obicitur, ubi non fuit legitima institucio, ibi non potest esse restitucio. Non enim probatur destitutus qui prius non fuit institutus, ac per hoc nec restaurationem postulare potest. Illi ergo, quorum electio uiciosa est, uel qui a clero non sunt electi, uel a populo expetiti, uel qui per symoniam inrepserunt, non sunt habendi inter episcopos, et ideo, si a sedibus, quas tenere uidebantur, expulsi fuerint, non possunt restitutionem petere ante, quam uocentur ad causam. Unde supra in tractatu ordinandorum: "Si quis pecunia uel gratia humana, seu populari uel militari tumultu, etc." Sed hoc in eo tantum casu intelligitur, quo apostolica sedes per uiolentiam occupatur, quo casu iudex non inuenitur, cuius offitio ille apostaticus possit excludi. In aliis autem locum non habet, cum uiolenta possessio, nisi per iudicis sententiam, uiolento detentori detrahi non possit. Si autem uerus dominus, bello non continuato, sed renouato, ui illum eiecerit de possessione, iudicis auctoritate predoni possessionem restituet. Si ergo episcopi a sedibus, quas quoquomodo tenere uidebantur, non per iudicem, sed uiolenter eiecti fuerint, post eiectionem restituendi sunt ante regularem ad sinodum uocationem.

Question II

GRATIAN. Part I. Concerning periods of delay to be furnished after restoration, and for what space of time they are to be granted, Pope John writes, [letter I to Archbishop Zacharias], saying:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. De induciis autem post restitutionem prestandis, et quo spatio temporis concedendae sint, scribit Iohannes Papa, [epist. I. ad Zachariam Archiepiscopum] dicens:

C. I. Periods of delay after restoration are granted according to the time of despoiling.

For as much time as they appeared to have been despoiled or expelled, the same space of time shall be granted them as a period of delay before they are summoned to a synod.

C. I. Secundum tempus expoliationis conceduntur induciae restitutionis.

Quanto expoliati tempore uel expulsi esse uidebantur ante, quam ad sinodum conuocentur, sub eodem spatio temporis eis induciae indulgeantur.

C. II. While the possessions or property of a bishop are detained, nothing can be alleged against him.

Likewise Pope Pelagius II, [to the Bishops of Italy]. When the churches, possessions, or property of some bishop are detained by his rivals or by any others not of his own will, nothing ought or can be alleged against him by anyone before the restoration of all his property. Rather, all things are first to be restored to him under the laws, and afterwards the appointed business is to be argued at the time defined by the Fathers.

C. II. Dum possessiones uel res episcopi detinentur, aliquid sibi obici non potest.

Item Pelagius Papa. [II. Episcopis Italiae] Cum ecclesiae alicuius episcopi, aut possessiones uel res ab emulis eius uel a quibuscumque aliis non sua sponte detinentur, aliquid illi non debet aut potest a quoquam ante redintegrationem omnium suarum rerum obici. Sed prius illi legibus redintegranda sunt omnia, et postea tempore a Patribus prefinito prefinita negotia sunt uentilanda.

C. III. Things violently taken away shall be restored before joinder of issue.

Likewise Stephen V to Gerard of Lodi. You ought first to cause yourselves to be reinvested with the invaded cities, monasteries, and manors, as well as all the other property generally, because we ought neither to contend naked nor to oppose ourselves unarmed to enemies.

C. III. Ante litem contestatam uiolenter ablata restituantur.

Item Stephanus V. Gerardo Lodicensi. Oportet, ut primum uos tam de inuasis ciuitatibus, et monasteriis, et mansis, quamque et de reliquis generaliter rebus reinuestire faciatis, quia nec nudi contendere, nec inermes inimicis nos debemus obponere.

C. IV. Those who have invaded the places of expelled persons with adulterous foulness shall be cast out from the clergy and become infamous.

Likewise Pope Evaristus, [letter II]. We have heard that certain bishops defamed and torn to pieces by you have been driven from their own cities—for bishops cannot be constituted elsewhere except in cities that are not very small—and that others have been constituted while they are living. Therefore we write these things to you so that you may know that this is not lawful; rather, their proper bishops ought to be recalled and restored most completely. But those who with adulterous foulness hold their brides—whom, according to the foregoing tenor, we understand to be their wives—we command to be cast out, to be made adulterers and infamous, and to be barred from ecclesiastical honors. But if you have any complaint against them, after these things have been completed it will have to be investigated and terminated by authority of this holy See.

C. IV. Deiciantur a clero et infames fiant, qui loca expulsorum adulterina feditate inuaserunt.

Item Euaristus Papa. [epist. II.] Audiuimus quosdam a uobis infamatos et dilaceratos episcopos a ciuitatibus propriis pulsos (quia alibi constitui episcopi non possunt, nisi in ciuitatibus non minimis), et alios ipsis uiuentibus constitutos. Ideo hec uobis scribimus, ut sciatis hoc fieri non licere, sed proprios reuocari et integerrime restitui debere. Illos uero, qui adulterina feditate suas sponsas (quas et uxores eorum prefixo tenore esse intelligimus) tenent, eici, et adulteros atque infames fieri, eosque ab ecclesiasticis honoribus arceri iubemus. Si autem aduersus eos aliquam querelam habueritis, his peractis inquirendum erit et auctoritate huius sanctae sedis terminandum.

C. V. Periods of delay of six months are furnished to persons cast out or despoiled.

Likewise Gaius, [letter I to Felix]. After complete restoration, an annual period of delay or one of six months is to be granted to persons cast out or despoiled.

C. V. Induciae sex mensium eiectis uel expoliatis prestantur.

Item Gaius. [epist. I. ad Felicem] Eiectis uel expoliatis post integram restaurationem anniuersariae induciae uel sex mensium indulgendae sunt.

C. VI. Periods of delay are to be furnished after restoration.

Likewise Pope Eusebius, [letter II]. Therefore it is first necessary that all things be restored under the laws to the despoiled, and that the churches taken from them be restored to them with every privilege; and afterwards a space shall be granted them not under a narrow time but for as long as they appeared to have been despoiled or expelled before they are summoned to a synod.

C. VI. Post restitutionem induciae prestandae sunt.

Item Eusebius. [Papa epist. II.] Prius ergo oportet omnia expoliatis legibus redintegrari, et ecclesias, que sibi sublatae sunt, cum omni priuilegio sibi restitui, et postmodum non sub angusto tempore spatium eis indulgeatur, sed quantum expoliati uel expulsi uidebantur ante, quam ad sinodum conuocentur.

C. VII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Felix II, [in the rescript to the Bishops of Egypt, c. 8]. Let him reside peacefully and with power in his own see, arranging all acts, for as long as he appeared, while expelled or despoiled, to have lacked his property.

C. VII. De eodem.

Item Felix Papa. [II. in rescripto ad Episcopos Egipti, cap. 8.] Tamdiu in sede propria pacifice et potestatiue cuncta acta disponens resideat, quamdiu expulsus uel expoliatus suis carere uisus est rebus.

C. VIII. No one ought to be summoned to a case before restoration.

The same, [Pope Felix I, letter II to the Bishops of Gaul]. If a bishop has been despoiled of his own property or that of the church committed to him, or—which God forbid and ought to be alien to all the faithful—has been cast out from his own see, or has been separated from his sheep in some detention, then canonically let him first be restored to his former status with every privilege of his honor, and let all his things which had been taken from him through the ambushes of his enemies be restored under the laws. For he will not be able to be summoned or prejudged unless, for his own necessity—though by no means to be judged—he has voluntarily chosen to come. Therefore, let him by no means be compelled by anyone before all things which he had lost through the suggestions of his enemies are most completely restored to his power by an honorable council in lawful order. § 1. But let the prelate be returned to his former status with every honor; and, after he has freely and securely arranged and ordered his affairs for a long time, then, when regularly summoned, let him come to the case at the appointed time in a lawful and canonical council within four, five, six, or seven months, according as his capacity permits, and not before; and, if it thus appears just, let him answer the allegations of the accusers.

GRATIAN. Part II. But if a bishop, by living badly, has dissipated the resources of the church, he is to be removed from its patrimony until cognizance is taken concerning the dissipation of ecclesiastical property, after the example of tutors and curators who, when they are suspect, are removed from a tutorship or curatorship until cognizance is taken concerning the suspicion. Hence Pope Pelagius to Peter the priest:

> Idem. [Felix Papa I. epist. II. ad Episcopos Galliae] Si episcopus suis fuerit aut ecclesiae sibi commissae rebus expoliatus, aut (quod absit, quod alienum ab omnibus esse debet fidelibus) a sede propria eiectus aut in detentione aliqua a suis ouibus fuerit sequestratus, tunc canonice ante in pristino statu restituatur cum omni priuilegio sui honoris, et sua omnia, que insidiis inimicorum suorum ei ablata fuerant, legibus redintegrentur. Non enim conuocari uel preiudicari poterit, nisi ipse pro sua necessitate (minime tamen iudicandus) aduenire sponte elegerit. Nullatenus ergo a quoquam cogatur ante, quam integerrime omnia, que per suggestiones suorum inimicorum amiserat, potestati eius ab honorabili concilio legali ordine redintegrentur. §. 1. Presul uero cum omni honore statui pristino reddatur, et ipse dispositis ordinatisque libere ac secure diu suis, tunc regulariter infra quatuor, uel quinque, uel sex, aut septem menses, iuxta quod possibilitas ei fuerit, et non ante conuocatus, ad tempus in legitimo concilio et canonico conueniat ad causam, et si ita iuste uidetur, accusantium propositionibus respondeat. II. Pars. Gratian. Quod si male uiuendo ecclesiae facultates dispersit episcopus, quousque ab eius patrimonio, de dilapidatione rerum ecclesiasticarum cognoscatur, submouendus est, exemplo tutorum et curatorum, qui, dum sunt suspecti, a tutela, uel cura remouentur, donec de suspecto cognoscitur. Unde Pelagius Papa Petro presbitero.

C. IX. One who by living badly dissipates the property of the church shall be removed from administration.

Because those things which have reached our ears concerning the frauds of Maximilian through the lamentable report of petitioners could not readily be known according to the truth unless the resources of the church—which he dissipated by badly converting them to his own uses—were set apart from his power until the case is heard, we therefore wish you in the meantime to remove him from the patrimony of the aforesaid church and to have the periods for its examination kept within your governance.

> Quia ea, que de fraudibus Maximiliani flebili ad aures nostras suplicum relatione uenerunt, non facile secundum ueritatem agnosci potuerunt, nisi facultas ecclesiae, quam in usus suos male conuertendo dispersit, ab eius potestate, donec causa cognoscatur, seponatur: idcirco uos eum a supradictae ecclesiae patrimonio uolumus interim submouere, et in uestro discussionis ipsius tempora moderamine detineri.

Question III

GRATIAN. Part I. That periods of delay are not to be denied after summons to one coming to judgment is attested by the same Pope Felix II, [in the letter to the brothers of Egypt, c. 8], who says:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod uero post uocationem uenienti ad iudicium induciae negandae non sint, idem Felix Papa [II. in epistola ad fratres Egipti cap. 8.] testatur, dicens:

C. I. Periods of delay shall not be denied to one coming to judgment.

When the accused has come to judgment, if he wishes, the periods of delay established by the Fathers shall be granted without impediment to him when he requests them, and judges chosen by him shall be assigned to him.

C. I. Venienti ad iudicium induciae non negentur.

Cum accusatus ad iudicium uenerit, si uoluerit, induciae ei petenti a Patribus constitutae absque inpedimento concedantur, et iudices a se electi sibi tribuantur.

C. II. Periods of delay of how many months are to be furnished to bishops.

Likewise from the letter of Felix II to the brothers of Egypt, [c. 20]. Concerning periods of delay for bishops, about which you consulted us, we find diverse rules instituted by the Fathers. For certain Fathers commanded that a year and six months be granted for repelling the devices of assailants, preparing their responses, confirming witnesses, and seeking the counsel of bishops and friends. Others commanded a year, in which very many agree. But I have not found less than six months, because these have been granted even to laymen; how much more to the Lord's priests? And below: § 1. Periods of delay are to be granted not under a narrow time but over a long space, so that the accused may be able to prepare themselves, meet all communicants situated in the provinces, prepare witnesses, and arm themselves fully against ambushers.

C. II. Quot mensium induciae episcopis prestandae sint.

Item ex epistola Felicis II. fratribus Egiptiorum. [c. 20.] De induciis uero episcoporum, super quibus consuluistis, diuersas a Patribus regulas institutas inuenimus. Quidam enim ad repellenda machinamenta inpetitorum, et suas preparandas responsiones, et testes confirmandos, et consilia episcoporum atque amicorum querenda, annum et sex menses mandauerunt concedi. Quidam autem annum, in quo plurimi concordant. Minus uero quam sex menses non reperi, quia et laicis hec indulta sunt, quanto magis Domini sacerdotibus? Et infra: §. 1. Induciae non sub angusto tempore, sed sub longo spatio concedendae sunt, ut accusati se preparare, et uniuersos communicatores in prouinciis positos conuenire, et testes preparare, atque contra insidiatores se pleniter armare ualeant.

C. III. Concerning periods of delay to be furnished.

Likewise Pope Eleutherius, [in the letter to the provinces of Gaul]. Periods of delay that are not small are to be given for making inquiry, lest anything appear to be done prematurely by either party, because many things happen through surreption.

[PALEA.

C. III. De induciis prestandis.

Item Eleuterius Papa. [in epist. ad Galliae prouincias] Induciae non modicae ad inquirendum dandae sunt, ne aliquid prepropere agi a quacumque parte uideatur, quia per subreptionem multa proueniunt.

[PALEA.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Damasus, letter III to Archbishop Stephen. Periods of delay of six months, or longer if necessary, are to be granted to accused persons in criminal cases.]

GRATIAN. Part II. But the span of delays, as is found in book III of the Code under title 11, On Delays, is to be moderated on this basis: if either a person or instruments are requested from the same province in which the litigation is conducted, not more than three months shall be granted. But if they are requested from adjoining provinces, justice requires six months to be observed. In a transmarine delay, however, nine months will have to be computed. Judges, however, shall understand that by this rule there has not been granted to them a discretion for giving delay. Rather, they shall know that the same delay—if a most urgent basis in the matters has demanded it and the necessity of the desired instruction has required it—is not easily to be granted more than once, nor by any artifice for protraction.

§ 1. But a delay is to be entirely denied to one who has brought back a rescript to an extraordinary judge. It is to be given, however, to the person summoned to judgment for proving falsehoods in the petitions or producing some instruments or witnesses, because one who is drawn contrary to expectation before an alien judgment could not have been prepared. § 2. But when a rescript has been made by the prince concerning an appeal or consultation, whether a delay was requested in the first judgment and not granted or was not even requested, it will not be lawful to give it to anyone, on the same basis by which delay is not customarily granted in judgments of imperial cognizance. It is not proper to request a delay from a judge while he is proceeding, even if it be granted with both parties present, since it can be granted only after the cause has been heard, and the hearing of the cause is lawfully assembled not by a full formal challenge but rather while the judge is sitting, so that, if perhaps the petition for delay has been rejected, the question undertaken may be decided by the judge's sentence.

From the seventh Novel Constitution, in collation VIII. § 4. But the plaintiff shall direct the petition only after he first furnishes security, both to the person whom he says is bound and to the executor of the business, that he will either join issue within two months or restore every loss befalling the person who is brought to trial. In collation V: GRATIAN. Part III. § 5. Let the petition be offered to the person summoned to judgment, and thereafter, after the sportulae have been furnished and surety given, let him enjoy a delay of twenty days, in which he may deliberate whether to yield or contend, to request that another be joined to the judge, or to reject that judge, unless the latter is the judge whom he himself requested after already rejecting another. Finally, let him be asked in person whether this time has passed. This shall be made manifest not only by his own response but also by his subscription of the petition, which he ought to make at the beginning. Therefore, joinder of issue conducted contrary to this grant is held as nothing.

From Novel Constitution VI, in collation VI. § 6. This ought not to be done unless the plaintiff has given sufficient security, promising that he will give a fixed amount if he does not pursue the case, or, pursuing it, does not win the case. Therefore, if after the prescribed time he does not appear within ten days while the defendant is present, let the defendant be dismissed after exacting what was promised and whatever more he swears, subject to the judge's assessment, that he spent concerning the litigation. [§ 7. An exception concerning the forum is dilatory and therefore ought to be opposed and proved at the beginning of the litigation. But it is sufficient that peremptory exceptions, such as prescriptions of a long period, be pleaded at the beginning of the litigation.]

> Item Damasus Papa epistola III. ad Stephanum Archiepiscopum. Induciae accusatis in criminalibus causis sex mensium uel eo amplius, si necesse fuerit, concedendae sunt.] II. Pars. Gratian. Spatium uero dilationum, sicut in III. libro Codicis titulo [11.] de dilationibus inuenitur, hac ratione moderandum est, ut, si ex ea prouincia, ubi lis agitur, uel persona, uel instrumenta poscentur, non amplius quam tres menses indulgeantur. Si uero ex continentibus prouinciis, sex menses custodiri iustitia est. In transmarina autem dilatione nouem menses conputari oportebit. Iudicantes autem hac ratione non sibi concessum intelligant dandae dilationis arbitrium, sed eandem dilationem (si rerum urgentissima ratio flagitauerit, et necessitas desideratae instructionis exegerit) non amplius facile quam semel, nec ulla trahendi arte sciant esse tribuendam. §. 1. Ei autem dilatio penitus est deneganda, qui rescriptum ad extraordinarium iudicem reportauerit. Illi uero, qui in iudicium uocatur, danda est ad probanda precum mendacia, uel proferenda aliqua instrumenta uel testes, quoniam instructus esse non potuit qui preter spem ad alienum iudicium trahitur. §. 2. Cum uero ad appellationem siue consultationem a principe rescriptum fuerit siue sit primo iudicio petita dilatio nec tributa, siue nec petita quidem, eam dare cuiquam non licebit eadem ratione, qua nec in iudiciis cognitionum inperialium dilatio tribui solet. A iudice procedente dilationem postulari non conuenit, etiam si utraque parte presente tribuatur, cum non alias, nisi causa cognita, indulgeri queat, et cognitio causae non interpellatione plenaria, sed considente magis iudice legitime colligatur, ut si forte dilationis peticio inprobata fuerit, suscepta questio per sententiam iudicis dirimatur. Constitutione nouella septima, in collatione VIII. §. 4. Libellum uero non alias actor dirigat, nisi prius et in ipsum, quem dicit obnoxium, et in negotii executorem exponat cautionem, se uel intra duos menses litem contestaturum, uel omne dampnum ei, qui conuenitur, contingens restituturum. In collatione V.: III. Pars. §. 5. Offeratur ei, qui uocatur in iudicium, libellus, et exinde prebitis sportulis, data fideiussione, XX. dierum gaudeat induciis, in quibus deliberet, an cedat, an contendat, atque alium iudici petat sociari, uel recuset eum, nisi sit ille, quem ipse iam alio recusato petiuit. Denique presens interrogetur, an hoc tempus transierit? Quod non modo ipsius responsione, sed etiam libelli manifestetur subscriptione, quam in initio facere debet. Litis ergo contestatio contra hoc indultum habita pro nichilo est. Constitutione nouella VI. in Collatione VI.: §. 6. Quod fieri non debet, nisi actor satisdederit, certam promittens quantitatem se daturum, si non exequatur, aut exequens non uincat causam. Si ergo post tempus prestitutum intra decem dies reo presente non occurrat, dimittatur reus exacto eo, quod promissum est, et si quid plus circa litem inpendisse cum taxatione iudicis iurauerit. [§. 7. Exceptio fori dilatoria est, atque ideo in initio litis debet opponi et probari. Peremptorias autem exceptiones, ut sunt prescriptiones longi temporis, sufficit in initio litis contestari.]

Question IV

GRATIAN. That infamous persons and those not lawfully joined ought not to be admitted to accusation, and what persons are generally to be removed from accusation, is clear from the authorities of many. For Pope Hyginus says, [letter II]:

> GRATIANUS. Quod uero infames et non legitime coniuncti ad accusationem admitti non debeant, et qui generaliter ab accusatione remouendi sint, multorum auctoritatibus claret. Ait enim Iginus Papa: [epist. II.]

C. I. Infamous persons cannot accuse those who are of good reputation.

We cannot receive a person who follows the association of an alien error, or departs from the path of his own purpose, or is disobedient to the commands of the Apostolic See; nor do we permit them to impede those believing rightly or obeying the commands of the holy Fathers, because there ought to be a great distinction between the faithful and the unfaithful.

> C. I. Infames eos, qui sunt bonae famae, accusare non possunt.
> Alieni erroris societatem sectantem, uel a sui propositi tramite recedentem, aut apostolicae sedis iussionibus inobedientem suscipere non possumus, nec inpedire recte credentes, uel sanctorum Patrum iussionibus obtemperantes permittimus, quia inter fideles et infideles magna debet esse discretio.

C. II. One who voluntarily transgresses his own law cannot accuse those acting rightly before his return.

Likewise Anacletus in the first decretal. Our blessed predecessor Clement, an apostolic man and full of the Spirit of God, established together with his other holy colleagues, saying: License to accuse or testify shall be denied to those who have neglected the dignity of the Christian religion and name, the norm of their own law or purpose, or things regularly prohibited. For voluntary transgressors of their own law, and its violators, are called apostates. Every apostate is to be rejected before his return, and he is not to be received into an accusation or testimony against those acting rightly.

> C. II. Qui legem suam sponte transgreditur, ante suam reuersionem recte agentes accusare non potest.
> Item Anacletus in primo decretali. Beatus predecessor noster Clemens, uir apostolicus et spiritu Dei plenus, una cum reliquis sanctis collegis suis statuit dicens: Accusandi uel testificandi licentia denegetur his, qui Christianae religionis et nominis dignitatem, et suae legis uel sui propositi normam aut regulariter prohibita neglexerint. Transgressores enim sponte legis suae, eiusque uiolatores, apostatae nominantur. Omnis enim apostata refutandus est ante reuersionem suam, nec in accusationem recte agentium aut testimonium suscipiendus est.

C. III. Those departing from their purpose become infamous.

Likewise Pope Pius, [letter I]. If anyone has strayed backward from his purpose and willingly transgressed the commands of the Apostolic See, he becomes infamous. Therefore, the refutations of those who are suspect in the right faith ought to be rejected. But faith and manner of life are first to be scrutinized, and afterwards those who have appeared irreproachable are to be received, and not before.

> C. III. A suo proposito discedentes fiunt infames.
> Item Pius Papa. [epist. I.] Si quis uero a suo proposito retrorsum exorbitauerit, et iussa apostolicae sedis libenter transgressus fuerit, infamis efficitur. Reprobari ergo oportet eorum redargutiones, qui in recta fide suspecti sunt. Fides autem et conuersatio primum scrutanda est, et denuo qui inreprehensibiles aparuerint sunt recipiendi, et non prius.

C. IV. Incestuous persons not lawfully joined cannot accuse priests or lawfully joined persons.

Likewise Pope Callistus, [to the Bishops of Gaul, letter II, c. 4]. Unions of blood relatives are neither lawful nor able to remain, but are to be repelled. § 1. Therefore, whoever is shown to be joined unlawfully, or coupled without a dotal title and the blessing of a priest, can by no means charge priests or lawfully joined persons with a crime or testify against them, because everyone polluted by the stain of incest is infamous and is not permitted to accuse the aforesaid persons. Therefore, not only are these persons to be repelled and made infamous, but also all those consenting to them. § 2. We determine that the same shall be done concerning abductors or those who assail their elders. For the laws of the world kill these persons, but we, with mercy going before, receive them to penance under the mark of infamy.

> C. IV. Incestuosi non legitime coniuncti sacerdotes uel legitime coniunctos accusare non possunt.
> Item Calixtus Papa. [ad Episcopos Galliae, ep. II. c. 4.] Consanguineorum coniunctiones nec legitimae sunt, nec manere possunt, sed sunt repellendae. §. 1. Quisquis ergo non legitime coniunctus, uel absque dotali titulo ac benedictione sacerdotis constat copulatus, sacerdotes uel legitime coniunctos criminari, uel in eos testificari minime potest, quoniam omnis incesti macula pollutus infamis est et accusare supradictos non permittitur. Non solum ergo hii repellendi sunt et infames efficiuntur, sed etiam omnes eis consentientes. §. 2. Similiter de raptoribus, uel eis, qui seniores inpetunt, fieri censemus. Hos enim seculi leges interficiunt, sed nos misericordia preeunte sub infamiae nota ad penitentiam recipimus.

C. V. Who are not to be received in an accusation.

The same, [in the same letter]. Conspirators are to be received in no person's accusation, nor can their voice, or that of anathematized persons, harm or injure anyone.

> C. V. Qui non sunt recipiendi in accusatione.
> Idem. [in eadem epistola] Conspiratores in nullius accusatione sunt recipiendi, nec eorum uel anathematizatorum uox ullum nocere aut ledere potest.

C. VI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Stephen, [letter II]. Let none of the anathematized be received, nor let the things which are said or written by them be believed by anyone. I call those persons anathematized whom bishops have anathematized by their writings, or whom their statutes anathematize.

> C. VI. De eodem.
> Item Stephanus Papa. [epist. II.] Nullus anathematizatorum suscipiatur, nec a quoquam credantur que ab eis dicuntur uel conscribuntur. Eos dico anathematizatos esse, quos episcopi suis scriptis anathematizauerunt, aut eorum statuta anathematizant.

C. VII. Anathematized persons cannot accuse the faithful.

Likewise Pope Fabian, [letter I to the ministers of the Church]. We remove all whom the statutes of the holy Fathers anathematize in past as well as future times, and we exclude them from every accusation of the faithful.

> C. VII. Anathematizati fideles accusare non possunt.
> Item Fabianus Papa. [ep. I. ad ecclesiae ministros] Omnes, quos sanctorum Patrum statuta tam preteritis quamque futuris temporibus anathematizant, submouemus, et ab omni fidelium accusatione alienamus.

C. VIII. A cleric who has accused a bishop becomes infamous.

Likewise Pope Stephen, [letter II, c. 8]. But a cleric who has accused his bishop or proved to be an ambusher against him is not to be received, because he has become infamous and ought to withdraw from his grade and be handed over to serve the curia.

> C. VIII. Clericus, qui episcopum accusauerit, infamis efficitur.
> Item Stephanus Papa. [epist. II. c. 8.] Clericus uero, qui episcopum suum accusauerit, aut ei insidiator extiterit, non est recipiendus, quia infamis effectus est, et a gradu debet recedere, ac curiae tradi seruiturus.

C. IX. Those who persecute bishops shall become infamous and exiles.

Likewise Pope Alexander, [letter I, c. 1]. Those who persecute bishops and unjustly strive to remove them contrary to apostolic authority, although they are kept from death by the Lord's saying, "I do not wish the death of the sinner, but that he be converted and live," are nevertheless without doubt marked with perpetual infamy and judged worthy of exile nearby. Concerning them we hold from the times of the Apostles and below, and we possess decrees: we obstruct the plea of accusing bishops or testifying against them for those whom we know to be dead not by human but by divine acts.

> C. IX. Infames et exules fiant qui episcopos persecuntur.
> Item Alexander Papa. [epist. I. c. 1.] Hii qui episcopos persecuntur et amouere nituntur iniuste contra apostolicam auctoritatem, etsi a morte prohibentur, dicente Domino: "Nolo mortem peccatoris, sed ut conuertatur et uiuat," perpetua tamen procul dubio notantur infamia, et exilio digni iudicantur finitimo; de quibus a temporibus apostolorum et infra tenemus, atque decreta habemus, eorum accusandi episcopos uel testificandi in eos uocem obstruimus, quos non humanis sed diuinis actibus mortuos scimus.

C. X. Detractors and instigators of enemies shall not accuse bishops.

Likewise Pope Zephyrinus, [letter I to the Bishops of Sicily]. We remove from an episcopal accusation or testimony detractors, who are to be eradicated by divine authority, and instigators of enemies.

> C. X. Detractores et inimicorum auctores episcopos non accusent.
> Item Zepherinus Papa. [ep. I. ad Episcopos Sicilienses] Detractores, qui diuina auctoritate eradicandi sunt, et auctores inimicorum ab episcopali submouemus accusatione uel testimonio.

C. XI. An infamous or sacrilegious person cannot accuse a religious Christian.

Likewise Pope Eutychian, [letter II to the Bishops of Sicily]. Let it never be lawful for any infamous or sacrilegious person, concerning any business whatsoever, to give testimony against a religious Christian—even if he is a humble and servile person—or for any reason or by formal inscription to assail a Christian. GRATIAN. It is to be noted, however, that excommunication is one thing and anathematization another. Hence John VIII writes to a certain bishop:

> C. XI. Infamis uel sacrilegus religiosum Christianum accusare non potest.
> Item Euticianus Papa. [ep. II. ad Episc. Siciliae] Nulli umquam infami aut sacrilego de quocumque negotio liceat aduersus religiosum Christianum (quamuis humilis seruilisque persona sit) testimonium dicere, nec de qualibet ratione uel inscriptione Christianum inpetere. Gratian. Notandum uero est, quod aliud sit excommunicatio, et aliud anathematizatio. Unde Iohannes VIII. scribit cuidam Episcopo:

C. XII. Excommunication is one thing, anathematization another.

Know that Engeltrude, wife of Boso, was struck repeatedly not only with excommunication, which separates from fraternal fellowship, but also with anathema, which cuts one off from the body of Christ itself, which is the Church. GRATIAN. From this it is given to be understood that the anathematized are to be understood not simply as entirely separated from fraternal fellowship, but from the body of Christ, which is the Church.

C. XII. Aliud est excommunicatio, aliud anathematizatio.

Hengiltrudam uxorem Bosonis noueris non solum excommunicatione, que a fraterna societate separat, sed etiam anathemate, quod ab ipso corpore Christi (quod est ecclesia) recidit, crebro percussam. Gratian. Unde datur intelligi, quod anathematizati intelligendi sunt non simpliciter a fraterna societate omnino separati, sed a corpore Christi (quod est ecclesia).

Question V

GRATIAN. That witnesses are not to be produced from the household of accusers, and that the plea of enemies is not to be heard, is shown by many authorities. For Pope Callistus says, [letter II to the Bishops of Gaul]:

GRATIANUS. Quod uero testes de domo accusatorum producendi non sint, et quod inimicorum uox audienda non sit, multorum auctoritatibus monstratur. Ait enim Calixtus Papa: [ep. II. ad Episcopos Galliae]

C. I. Blood relatives or familiars shall not give testimony against strangers.

Blood relatives who are accusers shall not give testimony against strangers, nor shall familiars or persons coming from their household; but, if they wish and mutually consent, relatives may testify among themselves, and not against others.

C. I. Consanguinei uel familiares aduersus extraneos testimonium non dicant.

Consanguinei accusatores aduersus extraneos testimonium non dicant, nec familiares, uel de domo prodeuntes, sed, si uoluerint et inuicem consenserint, inter se parentes testificentur, et non in alios.

C. II. Those who were recently enemies cannot be accusers or witnesses.

Likewise Pope Anacletus, [letter III, c. 5]. Those who were enemies before yesterday or the day before yesterday cannot be accusers and witnesses, lest, being angry, they desire to harm, or, having been injured, wish to avenge themselves. Therefore, an unoffended and unsuspected disposition of accusers and witnesses is to be sought.

C. II. Nuper inimici accusatores uel testes esse non possunt.

Item Anacletus Papa. [epist. III. c. 5.] Accusatores et testes esse non possunt, qui ante hesternum diem aut nudius tertius inimici fuerint, ne irati nocere cupiant, ne lesi se ulcisci uelint. Inoffensus igitur accusatorum et testium affectus querendus est, et non suspectus.

C. III. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Symmachus, [in the Fifth Roman Synod held under him]. Let no credence be given to accusers who are enemies, who come from the household of an enemy, who dwell with enemies, or who are suspect, lest, being angry, they desire to harm, or, having been injured, wish to avenge themselves. § 1. If anyone has attempted to infringe those things which have today been prohibited in this holy synod, or presumed voluntarily to transgress them, if he is a cleric, let him be entirely deprived of his own grade; but if he has been a monk or layman, let him be deprived of communion, and, if he has not amended the vice, let him be struck with anathema. But if anyone has brought to ecclesiastical notice secret or manifest ambushes laid by any persons against pontiffs, or the matters which the sentence of this holy synod embraces, let him obtain honor; and let those who devise adversities against them, as was long ago established by the holy Fathers and is today confirmed by synodal and apostolic authority, be entirely cast out and handed over to perpetual exile with all their things taken away.

> C. III. De eodem.
> Item Simacus Papa. [in V. Sinodo Romana, sub ipso habita] Accusatoribus uero inimicis, uel de inimici domo prodeuntibus, uel qui cum inimicis morantur, aut suspectis, non credatur, ne irati nocere cupiant, ne lesi ulcisci se uelint. §. 1. Si quis hec, que hodie in hac sancta sinodo prohibita sunt, infringere temptauerit, aut uoluntarie transgredi presumpserit, si clericus est, gradu proprio penitus careat, si uero monachus aut laicus fuerit, communione priuetur, et si non emendauerit uicium, anathemate feriatur. Secretas uero insidias uel manifestas pontificibus a quibuscumque illatas, uel ea, que huius sanctae sinodi sententia conplectitur, si quis ad ecclesiasticam pertulerit noticiam, potiatur honore, et hi, qui aduersa eis moliuntur, sicut a sanctis Patribus dudum statutum est, et hodie sinodali et apostolica auctoritate firmatum, penitus abiciantur, et exilio suis omnibus sublatis perpetuo tradantur.

C. IV. Who cannot be accusers or witnesses.

Likewise Pontianus, Bishop of the holy and universal Church, [letter II to all Christians]. Our predecessors the Apostles prohibited suspect persons, enemies, persons readily engaging in litigation, those who are not of good manner of life, those whose life is open to accusation, and those who neither hold nor teach the right faith from being accusers and witnesses. We remove them by the Apostles' authority and exclude them for future times.

> C. IV. Qui non possunt esse accusatores uel testes.
> Item Pontianus sanctae et uniuersalis ecclesiae Episcopus. [epist. II. omnibus Christianis] Suspectos, aut inimicos, aut facile litigantes, et eos, qui non sunt bonae conuersationis, aut quorum uita est accusabilis, et qui rectam non tenent et docent fidem, accusatores esse et testes antecessores nostri apostoli prohibuerunt et nos eorum auctoritate submouemus atque temporibus futuris excludimus.

C. V. Those whom the laws of the world do not admit shall be repelled from accusations of clerics.

Likewise Eusebius to the Bishops of Gaul, [letter I]. Concerning accusations of clerics, about which you commanded, know that it has been observed in this holy City from the time of the Apostles that accusers and accusations which the laws of foreign customs do not adopt are removed from the accusation of clerics. And below: Therefore, following the footsteps of the Fathers for the salvation of God's servants, we also remove the license to assail another from all persons whom the public laws do not admit to an accusation, and let no accusations be heard by ecclesiastical judges which are prohibited by the laws of the world.

> Item Eusebius Episcopis Galliarum. [epist. I.] De accusationibus clericorum, super quibus mandastis, scitote, a tempore apostolorum in hac sancta Urbe seruatum esse, accusatores et accusationes, quas exterarum consuetudinum leges non asciscunt, a clericorum accusatione submotas. Et infra: Idcirco et nos sequentes Patrum uestigia pro saluatione seruorum Dei quascumque ad accusationem personas leges publicae non admittunt, his inpugnandi alterum et nos licentiam submouemus, et nullae accusationes a iudicibus audiantur ecclesiasticis, que legibus seculi prohibentur.

C. VI. Foreigners, and those whom the divine declarations call dead, cannot accuse bishops.

Likewise Pope Pelagius II, [to the Bishops of Italy]. Following and strengthening the canonical statutes of the holy Fathers, we entirely remove from every accusation of bishops all infamous persons, all suspect persons or enemies, those who are not of the same nation, those whose faith, life, and freedom are unknown, those who are not of good manner of life, and those whose life is open to accusation. We likewise judge that all whom the divine laws call dead are to be removed from the same accusation and subjected to public penance.

> C. VI. Alienigenae, et quos diuinae uoces mortuos appellant, episcopos accusare non possunt.
> Item Pelagius Papa. [II. Episcopis Italiae] Canonica sanctorum Patrum statuta sequentes ac roborantes, omnes infames, cunctosque suspectos, uel inimicos, et eorum, qui non sunt eorum gentis, uel quorum fides, uita et libertas nescitur, et qui non sunt bonae conuersationis, uel quorum uita est accusabilis, ab omni accusatione episcoporum funditus submouemus. Similiter et omnes, quos diuinae leges mortuos appellant, submouendos esse ab eadem accusatione et publicae penitentiae submittendos iudicamus.

C. VII. Accusations which the laws of the world do not adopt are repelled from clerics.

Likewise from the Roman Synod held under Pope Hadrian. We determine that accusations and accusers and their business which the secular laws do not adopt are to be entirely repelled from clerics by divine and synodal authority, because it is unworthy for superiors to suffer from inferiors things which inferiors disdain to suffer from them.

> C. VII. A clericis repelluntur accusationes, quas leges seculi non adsciscunt.
> Item ex Sinodo Romana, sub Adriano Papa habita. Accusationes et accusatores, atque eorum negotia, que seculares non adsciscunt leges, diuina ac sinodica funditus a clericis repellare auctoritate censemus, quia indignum est superiores pati ab inferioribus que inferiores ab eis pati despiciunt.

C. VIII. Neither a slave, a freedman, nor an infamous person shall presume to accuse bishops.

Likewise Stephen, Bishop of the Roman Church, to all Bishops, [letter II, On Accusations of Priests, c. 3]. Accusers and accusations which the laws of the world do not admit, and which our predecessors prohibited, we also remove. Let no foreigner become either their accuser or their judge. Hence it is written concerning Lot: "You entered as a stranger; surely not so that you may judge?" Let no slave or freedman be an accuser of our bishops, nor any suspect or infamous person.

C. VIII. Nec seruus, nec libertus, nec infamis episcopos accusare presumant.

Item Stephanus Romanae ecclesiae Episcopus omnibus Episcopis. [ep. II. de accusationibus sacerdotum, c. 3.] Accusatores et accusationes, quas leges seculi non admittunt, et antecessores nostri prohibuerunt, et nos submouemus. Nullus alienigena aut accusator fiat eorum, aut iudex. Unde et de Loth scriptum est: "Ingressus es ut aduena, numquid ut iudices?" Accusator autem nostrorum nullus sit seruus aut libertus, nullaque suspecta aut infamis persona.

C. IX. Infamous persons who have recourse to sorcerers and diviners can be neither accusers nor witnesses.

Likewise Pope Eusebius, [letter III to the Bishops of Tuscany]. We establish, together with all the bishops who are with us, that homicides, thieves, practitioners of magic, sacrilegious persons, abductors, adulterers, incestuous persons, poisoners, suspect persons, criminals, members of the household, perjurers, those who committed abduction, those who gave false testimony, those who had recourse to sorcerers and diviners, and persons similar to them shall by no means be admitted to an accusation or testimony, because they are infamous and are justly to be repelled, since their voice is deadly.

C. IX. Infames, qui ad sortilegos et diuinos concurrunt, nec accusatores, nec testes esse possunt.

Item Eusebius Papa. [epist. III. ad Episcopos Thusciae] Constituimus cum omnibus, qui nobiscum sunt, episcopis, ut homicidae, fures, malefici, sacrilegi, raptores, adulteri, incesti, uenefici, suspecti, criminosi, domestici, periuri, et qui raptum fecerunt, uel qui falsum testimonium dixerunt, seu qui ad sortilegos diuinosque concurrerint, similesque eorum, nullatenus ad accusationem uel ad testimonium sint admittendi, quia infames sunt et iuste repellendi, quia funesta est eorum uox.

C. X. Suspect or favored persons shall not be admitted to an accusation.

Likewise Pope Julius, [in the rescript to the Easterners, c. 33]. It was similarly decreed in the aforesaid synod that suspect, infamous, criminal, favored, calumniating, related, wicked, or readily litigious persons shall not be received as accusers, but only such as are free from every suspicion.

C. X. Suspecti aut gratiosi ad accusationem non admittantur.

Item Iulius Papa. [in rescripto ad Orientales, c. 33.] Similiter in prefixa sinodo est decretum, ne suspecti, aut infames, aut criminosi, aut gratiosi, aut calumpniatores, uel affines, aut scelerati, aut facile litigantes suscipiantur accusatores, sed tales, qui careant omni suspicione.

C. XI. One who devotes himself to enmities and readily litigates can be neither an accuser nor a witness.

Likewise Pope Felix II, [letter I, c. 14]. Let no slave, freedman, unfaithful person, person entangled in crimes, calumniator, one who devotes himself to enmities, one who frequently litigates and is ready to accuse or detract, or infamous person—and, indeed, let none of all those whom the public laws do not admit to accuse public crimes—be permitted to accuse bishops.

C. XI. Qui inimicitiis studet et facile litigat, nec accusator nec testis esse potest.

Item Felix Papa. [II. epist. I. c. 14.] Nullus seruus, nullus libertus, nullus infidus, nullus criminibus inretitus, nullus calumpniator, nullus, qui inimicitiis studet, nullus frequenter litigans, et ad accusandum uel detrahendum facilis, nulla infamis persona, uel omnes, quos ad accusanda publica crimina leges publicae non admittunt, permittantur episcopos accusare.

C. XII. Members of a household, suspect persons, and those coming from the household shall not be received in an accusation.

Likewise Pope Callistus, [letter II to the Bishops of Gaul]. Suspect accusers or witnesses shall not be received, nor members of the household or those coming from the household; nor shall blood relatives of the accuser give testimony against strangers, because the affection arising from kinship, familiarity, and lordship is accustomed to impede the truth. Carnal love, fear, and avarice very often dull human senses and pervert judgments, so that people think gain to be piety, and money to be, as it were, the reward of prudence.

> C. XII. Familiares, suspecti, de domo prodeuntes, non recipiantur in accusatione.
> Item Calixtus Papa. [epist. II. ad Episcopos Galliae] Accusatores uel testes suspecti non recipiantur, nec familiares uel de domo prodeuntes, nec etiam consanguinei accusatoris aduersus extraneos testimonium dicant, quia propinquitatis et familiaritatis ac dominationis affectio ueritatem inpedire solet. Amor carnalis et timor atque auaritia plerumque sensus hebetant humanos, et peruertunt opiniones, ut questum pietatem putent, et pecuniam quasi mercedem prudentiae.

C. XIII. Those who are enemies or suspect, and those who pursue any persons with hatred, shall be removed from an accusation.

Likewise Gelasius, [Pope II, letter VIII, c. 4]. We judge all who take up arms against the Fathers to be infamous as assailants of the Fathers. Therefore, the authors or perpetrators of these vices are not to be received in the accusation of pontiffs, but are to be entirely repelled, because the canonical decrees of the Fathers command that the accusation or testimony of those who pursue any persons with hatred, or who are regarded as enemies or suspect, shall in no way be received.

[PALEA.

C. XIV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Paschal: Let none of the bishops be permitted to repel from an accusation against himself those whom, before he was assailed by them, he neglected to separate from his common familiarity.] GRATIAN. But enemies are prohibited from an accusation because innocence is frequently oppressed by their cunning.

But when Athanasius is commanded to be restored to his see because he complained of the enmity of his patriarch toward him, it is evident that, even if someone's crimes are manifest, he is nevertheless not to be condemned upon an enemy's accusation. Hence Nicholas writes to Emperor Michael, [in the letter which begins, “We had proposed”]:

> C. XIV. De eodem.

Item Pascalis Papa: Nulli episcoporum ab accusatione sua repellere liceat, quos ante, quam ab eis inpeteretur, a sua communi familiaritate neglexerit separare.] Gratian. Quod uero inimici ab accusatione prohibentur, inde est, quia eorum calliditate innocentia frequenter obprimi solet.

Sed cum Athanasius suae cathedrae reddi precipitur, quia de inimicitia in sui patriarchae conquestus est, patet, quod etsi manifesta sunt crimina alicuius, non tamen accusatione inimici condempnandus est. Unde Nicolaus scribit Michaeli Inperatori: [in epistola, quae incipit: "Proposueramus."]

C. XV. Those who are enemies cannot be judges.

Both reason itself dictates and very many examples prove that suspect persons and enemies ought not to be judges. § 1. For what more welcome and pleasing thing can anyone give to an enemy than if he entrusts to him for assailing a person whom perhaps he has wished to harm? The Synod of Constantinople is known providently to prohibit this in the sixth chapter of its canons. § 2. Let us also come to the holy Synod of Chalcedon and hear what it relates to us concerning Athanasius, bishop of Perrha. For that prelate, having been summoned a third time and not appearing, had been canonically condemned by his patriarch; but solely because, when he was summoned to the synod, he cried out that the very person who was judging was his enemy, he was reserved by the holy Synod of Chalcedon for an examination of the charges brought against him, and it was adjudged that he should receive his own church unless he were convicted anew. If Athanasius, deposed by his patriarch, because he complained of the latter's enmity, is sent back for the judgment to be renewed and, even if manifest crimes weigh against him, is commanded to be restored to his church, how much more ought Ignatius—who was deposed not by a patriarch but was himself the patriarch—not to have been deprived of his own church and despoiled by the decisions of hostile and suspect judges? § 3. Let our most eloquent Pope Gelasius also come, the most valiant vanquisher of heretics, and let him explain to us now as well what he said concerning the bishops of Constantinople who were then ailing in their customary manner. “I ask,” he says, “where can the judgment which they put forward be conducted? Is it before those very persons, so that the same men are enemies, witnesses, and judges? But not even human affairs ought to be entrusted to such a judgment.” But if even human judgments ought not to be entrusted to a judgment in which the same enemies are the judges, how much less divine affairs, that is, ecclesiastical ones? Let one who is wise understand. § 4. And truly, for this reason the pious Emperor Justinian is known to have promulgated in his laws, saying: “Let one who thinks a judge suspect to him be permitted, before the suit is begun, to challenge him, so that recourse may be had to another.” For it is in a certain manner natural to avoid the snares of suspect judges and to wish to flee the judgment of enemies. § 5. For this reason Saint John Chrysostom refused to enter the assembly of the council gathered against him. GRATIAN. It is evident that, even if someone's crimes are manifest, he is nevertheless not to be condemned upon an enemy's accusation.

C. XV. Qui inimici sunt, iudices esse non possunt.

Quia suspecti et inimici iudices esse non debeant, et ipsa ratio dictat, et plurimis probatur exemplis. §. 1. Nam quid gratius et amabilius dare quis inimico potest, quam si ei ad inpetendum commiserit, quem ledere forte uoluerit? Quod prouide Constantinopolitana sinodus canonum suorum sexto dinoscitur prohibere capitulo. §. 2. Veniamus et ad S. Calcedonensem sinodum, et quid nobis de Athanasio Perenorum referat episcopo audiamus. Is enim antistes tertio euocatus, quia non occurrit, a patriarcha suo canonice condempnatus extiterat, sed solum quia, cum uocaretur ad sinodum, quod inimicus esset ipse, qui iudicabat, clamauit, a S. Calcedonensi sinodo ad causas illatas sibi examinandas reseruatur, et nisi denuo conuinceretur, recipere ecclesiam propriam iudicatur. Si Athanasius a patriarcha suo depositus, quia de inimicitia eius conquestus est, iterato ad iudicium renouandum dirigitur, etsi manifesta sibi crimina officiant, suae ecclesiae reddi precipitur: quanto magis Ignatius, qui non a patriarcha, sed ipse potius existens patriarcha, minime debuit ecclesia propria priuari et inimicis et suspectis iudicibus decernentibus expoliari? §. 3. Veniat et facundissimus Papa noster Gelasius, hereticorum expugnator fortissimus, et quod de Constantinopolitanis episcopis more solito tunc egrotantibus dixit, etiam nunc nobis edisserat. "Quero," inquit, "iudicium, quod pretendunt, ubinam possit agitari? an apud ipsos, ut idem sint inimici testes et iudices? Sed tali iudicio nec humana debent committi negotia." Quod si iudicio, ubi idem sunt inimici qui iudices, nec humana debent committi iudicia, quanto minus diuina, id est ecclesiastica? Qui sapiens est intelligat. §. 4. Et reuera hinc Iustinianus inperator pius legibus suis promulgasse dinoscitur, dicens: "Liceat ei, qui suspectum sibi iudicem putat, antequam lis inchoetur, eum recusare, ut ad alium recurratur." Nam quodammodo naturale est suspectorum iudicum insidias declinare et inimicorum iudicium uelle refugere. §. 5. Hinc S. Iohannes, os aureum, concilii contra se congregati renuit intrare collegium. Gratian. Patet quod, etsi manifesta sunt crimina alicuius, non tamen accusatione inimici condempnandus est.

Question VI

GRATIAN. Part I. A defendant, however, is by no means to be produced outside the province. Hence Pope Fabian writes to Bishop Hilary, [letter III, c. 4]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Extra prouinciam autem reus nullatenus est producendus. Unde Fabianus Papa scribit Ylario Episcopo: [ep. III. cap. 4.]

C. I. Where a crime is committed, there the case shall be argued.

Let a case always be conducted where the crime is committed, and let one who has not proved what he charges suffer the penalty which he sought to impose.

C. I. Ubi crimen admittitur, ibi causa uentiletur.

Ibi semper causa agatur, ubi crimen admittitur, et qui non probauerit quod obicit, penam, quam intulerit, ipse patiatur.

C. II. An accused person shall be heard only in his own forum.

The same, [in the same letter, c. 2]. If any one of the bishops is accused concerning certain crimes, let him be heard by all the bishops who are in his province, because an accused person ought not to be heard anywhere other than in his own forum. GRATIAN. An exception concerning forum is dilatory, and therefore it ought to be pleaded and proved at the beginning of the suit. It is sufficient, however, that peremptory exceptions—as are prescriptions of long time—be formally pleaded at the beginning of the suit.

C. II. Accusatus nonnisi in foro suo audiatur.

Idem. [eadem epist. c. 2.] Si quis episcoporum super certis accusatur criminibus, ab omnibus audiatur, qui sunt in prouincia sua, episcopis, quia non oportet accusatum alibi quam in foro suo audiri. Gratian. Exceptio fori dilatoria est, atque ideo in inicio litis debet opponi et probari. Peremptorias autem exceptiones (ut sunt prescriptiones longi temporis) sufficit in inicio litis contestari.

C. III. Concerning the same.

The same, [Fabian in the same place]. Let one who is impleaded plead his case before his own judge; one impleaded before a judge who is not his own may, if he wishes, remain silent. But whenever those impleaded have appealed, let delays be granted them. GRATIAN. What has been said concerning place is to be understood when the truth of the case can be discovered only in the place where the crime was committed, or unless either party has invoked the judgment of a greater person, whether by declining the judgment or by seeking relief from the sentence. Hence Stephen, Bishop of the holy, apostolic, and universal Roman Church, writes to all Bishops, [letter II, c. 7]:

> C. III. De eodem.
> Idem. [Fabianus ibidem] Pulsatus ante suum iudicem causam dicat, non ante suum iudicem pulsatus, si uoluerit, taceat. Pulsatis uero, quociens appellauerint, induciae dentur. Gratian. Hoc autem, quod de loco dictum est, tunc intelligendum est, cum ueritas causae nonnisi in loco admissi criminis deprehendi potest, aut nisi altera pars iudicium maioris personae interpellauerit, siue declinando iudicium, siue releuando sententiam. Unde Stephanus, sanctae et apostolicae atque uniuersalis ecclesiae Romanae Episcopus, scribit omnibus Episcopis: [epist. II. cap. 7.]

C. IV. A case is to be heard within the province and only by the coprovincials.

Let the license to accuse not extend beyond the boundaries of the provinces, but let every accusation be heard within the province and concluded by the coprovincials, unless an appeal has been made to the apostolic see.

> C. IV. Intra prouinciam, et a conprouincialibus tantum causa est audienda.
> Ultra prouinciarum terminos accusandi licentia non progrediatur, sed omnis accusatio intra prouinciam audiatur, et a conprouincialibus terminetur, nisi tantum ad apostolicam sedem fuerit appellatum.

C. V. One accused or judged by the coprovincials shall appeal to the apostolic see.

Likewise Pope Sixtus, [letter I to Bishop Gratus]. A bishop accused or judged by the coprovincials in any case may freely appeal and approach the Pontiff of the apostolic see, who shall take care to review his business either personally or through his vicars. And while the Pontiff conducts his case in a repeated judgment, another bishop shall not be placed or ordained in his place, because, although the coprovincial bishops are permitted to investigate the case of an accused bishop, they are nevertheless not permitted to determine it without consulting the Roman Pontiff.

A metropolitan, together with all his coprovincials, so that none of them is absent and all agree in the business of each one, is permitted to examine bishops and the highest causes of ecclesiastical business; but he is by no means permitted to determine their chief complaints and those of ecclesiastical causes, or to condemn bishops, without the authority of this holy see, to which all ought to appeal if necessary and by whose aid they ought to be supported.]

C. VII. Coprovincials and metropolitans can hear the case of bishops, but cannot determine it.

Likewise Pope Eleutherius, [writing to the provinces of Gaul, c. 2]. Although accusations or criminal charges against bishops may be argued before provincials, metropolitans, and primates, they nevertheless may not be determined without the authority of this holy see, as has already been determined by the Apostles and their successors with the consent of many bishops. Nor shall others be set over or ordained in their churches before their business is justly concluded here. But the cases of the remaining clerics may both be argued and justly concluded before coprovincials, metropolitans, and primates.

> Item Eleuterius Papa. [scribens ad Galliae prouincias, cap. 2.] Quamuis liceat apud prouinciales, et metropolitanos, atque primates episcoporum uentilare accusationes uel criminationes, tamen non licet diffinire sine huius sanctae sedis auctoritate, sicut ab apostolis eorumque successoribus multorum consensu episcoporum iam diffinitum est. Nec in eorum ecclesiis alii aut preponantur, aut ordinentur, antequam hic eorum iuste terminentur negotia. Reliquorum uero clericorum causas apud conprouinciales, et metropolitanos, et primates et uentilare, et iuste finire licet.

C. VIII. A definitive sentence is not to be rendered in the cases of bishops before apostolic censure.

Likewise Leo, Bishop of the city of Rome, to Anastasius, Bishop of Thessalonica, [letter LXXXII, otherwise LXXXIV, c. 1]. I am greatly astonished, dearest brother, but grieve much more, that you could have been moved so atrociously and so violently against one concerning whom you had judged nothing more than that, after being summoned, he delayed appearing and offered sickness as an excuse, especially since, even if he deserved something of this sort, you ought to have awaited what we would write back in response to your consultations. But even if he committed something grave and intolerable, our censure was to be awaited, so that you yourself would determine nothing before you learned what pleased us. For we entrusted our place to your charity in such a manner that you were called into a share of the solicitude, not into the fullness of the power. Hence, just as the things which have been piously attended to by you greatly gladden us, so the things which have been wrongly done grieve us exceedingly.

C. VIII. Ante apostolicam censuram in causis episcoporum non est diffinitiua sententia ferenda.

Item Leo Episcopus urbis Romae Anastasio Episcopo Tessalonicensi. [ep. LXXXII. al. LXXXIV. c. 1.] Multum stupeo, frater karrissime, sed plurimum doleo, quod in eum, de quo nichil amplius iudicaueras, quam quod euocatus adesse differret et excusationem infirmitatis obtenderet, tam atrociter et tam uehementer potueris conmoueri, presertim cum, etiam si tale aliquid mereretur, expectandum tibi fuerat quid ad tua consulta rescriberemus. Sed etiam si quid graue intolerandumque conmitteret, nostra erat expectanda censura, ut nichil prius ipse decerneres quam quid nobis placeret agnosceres. Vices enim nostras ita tuae credidimus karitati, ut in partem sis uocatus sollicitudinis, non in plenitudinem potestatis. Unde, sicut multum nos ea, que a te pie sunt curata, letificant, ita nimium ea, que perperam sunt gesta, contristant.

C. IX. Neither councils ought to be celebrated nor a bishop condemned without the knowledge of the Roman Pontiff.

Likewise Pope Julius to the Eastern Bishops, [letter I]. It was decreed long ago by the holy Apostles and their successors in the ancient statutes—which the holy and universal apostolic Church has maintained until now—that councils ought not to be celebrated or a bishop condemned without the sentence of the Roman Pontiff, because they willed the holy Roman Church to be the primate of all the churches; and just as blessed Peter the Apostle was the first of all the Apostles, so also, by the Lord's institution, let this Church consecrated in his name be the first and the head of the others, and let all the greater ecclesiastical cases and judgments of bishops recur to it as to a mother and summit, and take their end according to its sentence; nor ought anything concerning these matters to be decreed apart from the Roman Pontiff. Part II. GRATIAN. Sometimes many bishops are found to have been condemned without the Roman Pontiff being consulted and others substituted in their place, whose condemnation and substitution the Church is read to have tolerated by dispensation for the good of peace. Hence Pope Nicholas to Solomon, King of the Bretons:

C. IX. Preter conscientiam Romani Pontificis nec concilia celebrari, nec episcopum dampnari oportet.

Item Iulius Papa orientalibus Episcopis. [ep. I.] Dudum a sanctis apostolis successoribusque eorum in antiquis decretum est statutis, que hactenus sancta et uniuersalis apostolica tenet ecclesia, non oportere preter sententiam Romani Pontificis concilia celebrari uel episcopum dampnari, quoniam sanctam Romanam ecclesiam primatum omnium ecclesiarum esse uoluerunt; et sicut B. Petrus apostolus primus fuit omnium apostolorum, ita et hec ecclesia suo nomine consecrata (Domino instituente) prima sit et caput ceterarum, et ad eam quasi ad matrem atque apicem omnes maiores ecclesiae causae et iudicia episcoporum recurrant, et iuxta eius sententiam terminum sumant, nec extra Romanum quicquam ex his decerni Pontificem debere. II. Pars. Gratian. Aliquando inconsulto Romano Pontifice plerique episcoporum dampnati inueniuntur, et alii in eorum subrogati locum, quorum dampnationem et subrogationem pro bono pacis ex dispensatione tollerasse legitur ecclesia. Unde Nicolaus Papa Salomoni Regi Brittorum:

C. X. For the sake of peace, the Church tolerated the deposition of certain persons made without the knowledge of the Roman Pontiff.

For this is the ordinance of God your Father, and this is the law of the Church your mother: namely, that you do not refuse to send all the bishops of your kingdom to the Archbishop of Tours or disdain to seek his judgment. For he is the metropolitan, and all the bishops of your kingdom are his suffragans, as the writings of my predecessors manifestly show. Those predecessors endeavored to rebuke your predecessors with a forceful invective because they had withdrawn those bishops from his care, although our own writings sent concerning this matter also do not appear to be lacking. And when a council has been celebrated before the designated prelate of the Church of Tours and the full number of colleagues, that is, twelve bishops, and the expelled bishops have been examined according to rule, and it has appeared that they were canonically expelled, then, while they remain in their deposition, those who were consecrated in their places will certainly be able to possess the honor of the episcopate. But if the expelled bishops have been declared innocent, let those who were substituted for them be removed, and let the former receive their churches. For my predecessors, the prelates, neither admitted nor approved the expulsions of those bishops who were driven from their churches, nor, while the former were alive, did they call those substituted for them legitimate bishops. If, however, you perhaps disdain to send the aforesaid bishops to the Archbishop of Tours, take care to transmit two of the expelled bishops and two of those substituted, together with a legate of your church, to the apostolic see of blessed Peter, where, after a fitting examination has first been made, it may appear who are the legitimate bishops, so that they do not irregularly lose their churches. For I am able to determine nothing else in the present business. But because there is great contention among the Bretons about who is the metropolitan, although no one's memory holds that you have had any metropolitan church in your region, nevertheless, if you wish, after almighty God establishes peace between you and our beloved son, the glorious King Charles, you will easily be able to attend to this. But if you believe that you must proceed more contentiously, endeavor to send to our apostolate, so that by our weighing it may become clearer than light which church among you was anciently the archiepiscopal one, and thereafter, all ambiguity having been cut away, your bishops may know without hesitation whom they ought to follow. For it is not necessary that the churches of the Lord suffer any losses of division through the discords of kings, since, insofar as it lies with them, they strive to preserve among themselves and toward all the peace which they preach. Part III. GRATIAN. Otherwise, however, the sentence of the bishops will be void and is to be reviewed by a synod. Hence Pope Felix, [letter I to Paternus]:

> Hec quippe est ordinatio Dei patris tui, et hec est lex ecclesiae matris tuae, uidelicet ut omnes episcopos regni tui ad Turonensem archiepiscopum mittere non detrectes, ipsiusque iudicium postulare non dedigneris. Ipse enim est metropolitanus, omnesque episcopi tui regni eius suffraganei sunt, sicut conscriptiones predecessorum meorum euidenter ostendunt, qui predecessores tuos, quia illos ab ipsius cura subtraxerant, forti inuectione corripere studuerunt, quamuis nec nostra scripta super hac re missa deesse uideantur. Cumque coram designato Turonicae ecclesiae presule et integro numero collegarum, id est duodecim episcoporum, celebrato conuentu fuerint eiecti episcopi regulariter examinati, aparueritque quod canonice fuerint eiecti, ipsis in sua deiectione manentibus, qui in locis eorum consecrati sunt poterunt utique episcopatus honore potiri. Quod si eiecti episcopi insontes fuerint declarati, his amotis, qui illis subrogati sunt, ecclesias suas ipsi recipiant. Nam cum antecessores mei presules eiectiones eorum episcoporum, qui ab ecclesiis suis expulsi sunt, nec admiserunt, nec approbauerunt, nec ipsos, qui eis subrogati sunt, uiuentibus illis legitimos episcopos dixerunt. Sane si ad Turonensem forte archiepiscopum mittere prefatos episcopos dedignaris, stude duos episcopos de expulsis et duos de subrogatis una cum ecclesiae tuae legato ad apostolicam B. Petri sedem transmittere, ubi, digna examinatione premissa, qui legitimi episcopi sunt pareat, et suas ecclesias inregulariter non amittant. Nichil enim queo aliud in presenti negotio diffinire. Quia uero magna quis sit metropolitanus apud Brittannos est contentio, licet nullius memoria teneat uos in uestra regione ullam habuisse metropolitanam ecclesiam, tamen si libet (postquam Deus omnipotens pacem inter uos et dilectum filium nostrum, Karolum regem gloriosum, constituet) facile hoc poteritis aduertere. Quod si adeo contentiosius agere creditis, ad nostrum apostolatum destinare contendite, quatinus nostro libramine que fuerit apud uos antiquitus archiepiscopalis ecclesia luce clarius innotescat, et deinceps omni ambiguitate recisa quem sequi episcopi uestri debeant incunctanter agnoscant. Neque enim ecclesias Domini per discordias regum diuisionis aliqua pati dampna necesse est, cum (quantum ex se est) pacem, quam predicant, seruare studeant inuicem et in omnes. III. Pars. Gratian. Alias autem irrita erit episcoporum sententia et a sinodo retractanda. Unde Felix Papa: [I. epist. I. ad Paternum]

C. XI. An unjust condemnation is void and is to be reviewed in a synod.

We judge a condemnation by bishops that is unjust to be void and for that reason to be reviewed by a synod, so that those oppressed may be aided by all in every case. GRATIAN. But Pope Sixtus III attests, [in the letter to the Eastern Bishops, c. 3], that no one is permitted to contemn his metropolitan and seek the judgment of others, saying:

C. XI. Dampnatio iniusta inrita est et in sinodo retractanda.

Inritam esse episcoporum dampnationem et iniustam censemus et idcirco a sinodo retractandam, ita ut obpressis ab omnibus in cunctis subueniatur causis. Gratian. Quod autem metropolitanum suum contempnere, et aliorum iudicium alicui expetere non liceat, Sixtus Papa [III.] testatur [in epist. ad orientales Episcopos, c. 3.] dicens:

C. XII. Foreign judgments are to be removed.

With apostolic authority preserved in all matters, we prohibit foreign judgments by a general sanction, because it is unworthy that those who ought to have coprovincials and judges chosen by themselves should be judged by outsiders.

C. XII. Peregrina iudicia sunt submouenda.

Peregrina iudicia, salua in omnibus apostolica auctoritate, generali sanctione prohibemus, quia indignum est ut ab extraneis iudicentur qui conprouinciales et a se electos debent habere iudices.

C. XIII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Anacletus, [Pope, letter I, c. 3]. We confirm the laws of the Church by apostolic authority and remove foreign judgments. Hence also the Lord, making mention of Lot, speaks through Moses, saying: “You entered indeed as a stranger; surely not so that you might judge?”

C. XIII. De eodem.

Item Anacletus. [Papa epist. I. c. 3.] Leges ecclesiae apostolica auctoritate firmamus, et peregrina iudicia submouemus. Unde et Dominus, mentionem faciens Loth, per Moisen loquitur, dicens: "Ingressus es quidem ut aduena, numquid ut iudices?"

C. XIV. Let no one be permitted to seek the judgment of other provinces.

Likewise Innocent, [Pope, to Victricius, Bishop of Rouen, letter II, c. 3]. Without prejudice, however, to the Roman Church, to which reverence is owed in all cases, let no one be permitted, after abandoning those priests who by divine direction govern the churches of God in the same province, to fly to other provinces, or to seek or submit to the judgments of the bishops of other provinces. But if anyone has presumed to do so, let him be removed from clerical office and judged by all to be guilty of injury. GRATIAN. The reverence which is owed to the apostolic Church and its authority are to be understood when either an appeal has been made to it or judges chosen by it are granted. Hence Pope Sixtus, after saying, "They ought to have coprovincials and judges chosen by themselves," immediately adds, "unless an appeal has been made."

> C. XIV. Nulli liceat aliarum prouinciarum iudicium expetere.
> Item Innocentius. [Papa ad Victricium Rothomagensem Episcopum, epist. II. c. 3.] Non liceat cuiquam, sine preiudicio tamen Romanae ecclesiae, cui in omnibus causis reuerentia debetur, relictis his sacerdotibus, qui in eadem prouincia Dei ecclesias nutu diuino gubernant, ad alias conuolare prouincias uel aliarum prouinciarum episcoporum iudicia expeti uel pati. Quod si quis presumpserit, ab offitio cleri submotus et iniuriae reus ab omnibus iudicetur. Gratian. Reuerentia autem, que apostolicae debetur ecclesiae, et eius auctoritas intelligenda est, cum uel ad ipsam appellatum fuerit, uel ab ea iudices electi conceduntur. Unde Sixtus Papa, cum diceret: "Conprouinciales et a se electos debent habere iudices," statim subiungit: "nisi fuerit appellatum."

C. XV. Without a decree of the apostolic see, we cannot approach outside judges.

Likewise Anacletus, [Pope, letter I, c. 3]. Every province, according both to ecclesiastical laws and to the laws of the world, ought to have its own just and not unjust judges, and not outsiders, unless the authority of this apostolic see has decreed it.

> C. XV. Absque apostolicae sedis decreto extraneos iudices adire non possumus.
> Item Anacletus. [Papa, epist. I. c. 3.] Unaqueque prouincia tam iuxta ecclesiasticas quam iuxta seculi leges suos debet iustos et non iniquos habere iudices, et non extraneos, nisi apostolicae huius sedis decreuerit auctoritas.

C. XVI. Upon the appeal of another province, one ought not to approach judges of that province.

Likewise from the Roman Synod. No one ought to be produced from province to province or from county to county except upon the report of the judge, so that the plaintiff follows the defendant's forum. And below: § 1. Let the synod of that province administer those matters which arise throughout each province, as is established to have been decreed in the Council of Nicaea. § 2. Let the license to accuse not extend beyond the boundaries of a province. Let every accusation be heard within the province and concluded by the coprovincials.

> C. XVI. Super appellationem alterius prouinciae iudices adire non oportet.
> Item ex Romana Sinodo. Neminem exhiberi de prouincia ad prouinciam uel de comitatu ad comitatum oportet, nisi ad relationem iudicis, ita ut actor rei forum sequatur. Et infra: §. 1. Illa que sunt per unamquamque prouinciam, ipsius prouinciae sinodus dispenset, sicut in Niceno constat esse decretum concilio. §. 2. Ultra prouinciae terminos accusandi licentia non progrediatur. Omnis accusatio intra prouinciam audiatur et a conprouincialibus terminetur.

[C. XVII.]

Likewise. If any cleric has been accused concerning any crimes, let him prosecute his actions in the province in which the person who is impleaded resides, and let his accuser not think that he is to be drawn to judgment elsewhere or farther away.

[C. XVII.]

Item. Si quis clericus super quibuslibet criminibus accusatus fuerit, in prouincia, in qua consistit ille, qui pulsatur, suas exerat actiones, nec estimet eum accusator suus alibi aut longius ad iudicium pertrahendum.

C. XVIII. Where a crime is committed, there the case shall be argued.

Likewise from a decree of Pope Hadrian. Let one who charges a crime know that he must prove it. Let the case indeed be conducted where the crime is committed.

C. XVIII. Ubi crimen admittitur, ibi causa uentiletur.

Item ex decreto Adriani Papae. Qui crimen obicit sciat se probaturum. Reuera ibi causa agatur ubi crimen admittitur.

Question VII

GRATIAN. Part I. That one whom an equal or greater stain with the defendant infects cannot be a judge is proved by many authorities. For the holy Roman Synod says:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod iudex esse non possit quem cum reo par aut maior macula inficit, multis auctoritatibus probatur. Dicit enim sancta Romana Sinodus:

C. I. Infamous persons cannot be judges.

An infamous person can be neither a procurator nor a cognitor. GRATIAN. There are three things by which some persons are impeded from becoming judges. By nature: a deaf person, a mute, one permanently insane, and a minor below puberty, because they lack judgment. By law: one who has been removed from the senate. By custom: women and slaves, not because they do not have judgment, but because it has been received as custom that they do not discharge civil offices. Yet if a slave, while he was thought to be free, rendered a sentence by delegation, although he was afterward reduced to slavery, the sentence rendered by him possesses the firmness of a matter adjudged.

C. I. Infames iudices esse non possunt.

Infamis persona nec procurator potest esse, nec cognitor. Gratian. Tria sunt, quibus aliqui inpediuntur ne iudices fiant: Natura, ut surdus, mutus et perpetuo furiosus, et inpubes, quia iudicio carent. Lege, qui senatu motus est. Moribus, feminae et serui, non quia non habent iudicium, sed quia receptum est ut ciuilibus non fungantur offitiis. Verum, si seruus, dum putaretur liber, ex delegatione sententiam dixit, quamuis postea in seruitutem depulsus sit, sententia ab eo dicta rei iudicatae firmitatem tenet.

[C. II.] In the Digest, under the title On Pleading.

Infamous persons cannot be procurators or advocates in cases. There are three classes of those who are prohibited from pleading. § 1. To plead is to set forth one's own desire or that of one's friend before the person who presides over the jurisdiction, or to oppose the desire of another. § 2. As we stated before, there are three classes of those who do not plead. Certain persons are prohibited from pleading altogether, either on account of age, as those less than seventeen years old, or on account of an accident, as a deaf person who does not hear at all. Others are prohibited from pleading for other persons, either on account of sex, as women, or on account of an accident, as those deprived of both eyes, or on account of a mark of turpitude, as those who have submitted to the part of a woman with their body, unless perhaps they are proved to have been violated by force by robbers or enemies. Similarly, those who have been condemned for a capital crime or for calumny in a public judgment, or who hired out their services to fight with beasts in the arena, are prohibited from pleading for others. These persons are permitted to argue for themselves and prohibited from doing so for another, unless perhaps they administer a guardianship of minors below puberty or a curatorship of adolescents that was not sought but was necessary. For they are permitted to plead for those whose care they bear. All other persons who are marked as infamous can plead only for themselves and for certain persons, unless they have received restitution in full. § 3. They are permitted to plead for a parent; for a patron or patroness; for the children and parents of a patron and patroness; also for their own children, a brother, a sister, a father-in-law, a mother-in-law, a son-in-law, a daughter-in-law, a stepfather, a stepmother, a stepson, a stepdaughter, a male ward, a female ward, an insane man, an insane woman, a simple-minded man, a simple-minded woman, a deaf person, a spendthrift, and an adolescent. § 4. Likewise, for those to whom curators are customarily given on account of infirmity and who, because of some permanent disease, cannot attend to their own business. § 5. But all who discharge an office not voluntarily but necessarily can plead without offense, even if they are among those who are permitted to plead only for themselves. § 6. By affinities, however, we ought to understand not those which once existed, but those presently existing. § 7. Under the designation of daughter-in-law and son-in-law are also included father-in-law and mother-in-law and those more remote, for whom the prefix "great-" is customarily added.

Part II. § 8. Those who, under the name of honoraria, are found demanding for themselves as compensation a fixed share of the very suits they have undertaken to defend, with grave loss to the litigant and plundering of him, are also excluded from the profession of advocates, as is found in book II of the Code, under the title On Pleading. § 9. Likewise, if anyone has been so insolent that he thinks the contest is to be conducted not by reason but by insults, he will suffer diminution of his reputation. § 10. Furthermore, an advocate is not permitted to enter any contract or make any compact with the litigant whom he has received under his own protection, nor deliberately to prolong the dispute. § 11. At the city of Rome, even men of honored rank who have thought this ought to be chosen may plead as long as they wish, provided, namely, that this occasion is not seized for shameful profit and a dishonorable stipend. For if they are captivated by gain and money, they will be numbered among the vilest as abject and degenerate men. § 12. But if in one court there have been only two, or more than the others, whose reputation is more distinguished, it shall belong to the office of the judge that an equal distribution of advocates be made and the assistance of each side be rendered equal. § 13. But if anyone, after being admonished by the judge, has denied his advocacy to either party on an excuse which cannot be proved, let him be barred from the forum; and let him know that the opportunity to act can never be restored to him. § 14. But if any litigant has been discovered to have consulted separately with several advocates and to have taken from his adversary the opportunity of equal defense, he will show beyond doubt that an unjust suit is being fostered by him, and he will experience that the judicial authority has been mocked by him. § 15. Likewise, although those who have conducted a case for the fisc are prohibited from providing advocacy against the fisc, nevertheless today they can provide advocacy for private persons even against the fisc, provided they decline to undertake the case which they handled while they were advocates of the fisc. § 16. Likewise, if you conducted a case against the father of a ward, after you have been appointed tutor or curator you are not prohibited from defending the same case. § 17. Cognitors are understood to act by office, not by choice. For it makes no difference whether one who undertakes an arbitration is of unimpaired reputation or ignominious. § 18. A son can also be an arbiter in his father's matter. For it is also held by very many that he can be a judge. § 19. But if anyone is a judge, he is prohibited from undertaking arbitration of the same matter in which he is judge and ordering that the compromise be made with himself; and if he has rendered a sentence, enforcement of the penalty is not to be granted. A slave cannot be an arbiter; a freedman can. § 20. Infamy, moreover, is imposed in many ways. Sometimes it is incurred by the kind of delict declared through a sentence, as when a judge pronounces: "You committed injury; you plundered an inheritance; you brought a calumnious accusation." Sometimes by the kind of punishment, as in the case of those who are condemned to public labor: they indeed retain their former status, but are also subjected to the penalty of infamy even after the time has been fulfilled. Sometimes by the kind of punishment and of delict declared through a sentence, as when, after someone has been beaten with clubs, it is said by the herald: "Thus to sycophants," that is, "to a calumniator." Sometimes by the very kind of deed, as in the case of those who practice wicked usury and unlawfully exact interest upon interest, and a woman who contracts marriage within the period in which it is customary to mourn a husband, and a man who knowingly married her. [GRATIAN.] Pope Felix attests the same, and in the same words. § 1. Likewise, in the Gospel the one who bears a beam in his eye is proved unable to draw out the speck from his brother's eye. § 2. Likewise David in the book of Psalms: "But to the sinner God said: Why do you recount my justices? etc." § 3. Likewise Gregory: "When a person's life is despised, it remains that his preaching be contemned."

Infames non possunt esse procuratores uel patroni causarum. Sunt autem tres ordines eorum, qui postulare prohibentur. §. 1. Est autem postulare desiderium suum uel amici sui in iure apud cum, qui iurisdictioni preest, exponere, uel alterius desiderio contradicere. §. 2. Non postulantium, ut premisimus, tres ordines sunt. Quidam prohibentur omnino postulare uel propter etatem, ut minores decem et septem annis, uel propter casum, ut surdus, qui prorsus non audit. Alii prohibentur ne pro aliis postulent uel propter sexum, ut feminae, uel propter casum, ut utroque lumine orbati, uel propter notam turpitudinis, ut hii, qui corpore suo muliebria passi sunt, nisi forte ui predonum uel hostium stuprati probentur. Similiter qui capitali crimine uel calumpniae publici iudicii sunt dampnati, uel qui operas suas locauerunt ut cum bestiis depugnarent in arena, pro aliis postulare prohibentur. His personis pro se allegare permittitur, pro alio prohibetur, nisi forte tutelam inpuberum uel curam adolescentium non affectatam, sed necessariam administrent. Pro his enim, quorum curam gerunt, eis postulare conceditur. Alii enim omnes, qui ut infames notantur, nisi pro se et pro certis personis postulare non possunt, nisi in integrum restitutionem acceperint. §. 3. Permittitur autem eis postulare pro parente, pro patrono, patrona, liberis et parentibus patroni et patronae; pro liberis etiam suis, fratre, sorore, socero, socru, genero, nuru, uitrico, nouerca, priuigno, priuigna, pupillo, pupilla, furioso, furiosa, fatuo, fatua, surdo, prodigo, et adolescente. §. 4. Item pro his, quibus propter infirmitatem curatores dari solent, et qui negotiis suis aliquo perpetuo morbo superesse non possunt. §. 5. Omnes autem, qui non sponte, sed necessario funguntur offitio, sine offensa postulare possunt, etiamsi hii sunt, quibus non nisi pro se postulare permittitur. §. 6. Affinitates uero non eas accipere debemus, que quondam fuerunt, sed presentes. §. 7. Nurus et generi appellatione et soceri, et socrus, et ulteriores, quibus pro prepositio solet accedere, continentur. II. Pars. §. 8. Arcentur etiam a professione aduocatorum (sicut in secundo libro Codicis, titulo de postulando inuenitur) qui sub nomine honorariorum ex ipsis negotiis, que tuenda susceperint, emolumentum sibi certae partis cum graui dampno litigatoris et depredatione poscentes inueniuntur. §. 9. Item, si quis adeo procax fuerit, ut non ratione, sed probris putet esse certandum, opinionis suae inminutionem patietur. §. 10. Preterea non licet aduocato ullum contractum inire, ullam pactionem conferre cum eo litigatore, quem in propriam recepit fidem, nec ex industria iurgium protrahere. §. 11. Apud urbem Romam etiam honoratis, qui hoc putauerint eligendum, eousque liceat orare, quousque maluerint, uidelicet ut non ad turpe conpendium et stipem deformem hec arripiatur occasio. Nam si lucro pecuniaque capiantur, ueluti abiecti atque degeneres inter uilissimos numerabuntur. §. 12. Si uero in uno auditorio duo tantum uel plures pre ceteris fuerint, quorum fama sit hilarior, in iudicantis offitio sit ut par causidicorum distributio fiat et exequetur pro partibus auxilium singulorum. §. 13. Si quis uero monitus a iudice ea excusatione, que nequeat conprobari cuicumque parti patrocinium denegauerit, careat foro; sciat etiam sibi numquam agendi copiam posse restitui. §. 14. Si quis autem ex litigatoribus detectus fuerit separatim tractasse cum pluribus, et aduersario suo subtraxisse paris defensionis copiam, ostendet proculdubio iniquam a se litem foueri, et auctoritatem iudiciariam a se elusam experietur. §. 15. Item, quamuis illi, qui causam fisci egissent, prohibeantur aduersus fiscum patrocinium prestare, tamen hodie etiam aduersus fiscum patrocinium possunt exhibere priuatis, dum eam causam declinent suscipere, quam tractauerant, dum fisci aduocati fuerunt. §. 16. Item, si contra patrem pupilli causam egisti, tutor uel curator datus eandem causam defendere non prohiberis. §. 17. Cognitores uero ex offitio intelliguntur, non ex arbitrio. Nichil enim refert, eum, qui arbitrium suscipit, an sit integrae famae, an ignominiosus. §. 18. Filius etiam in re patris arbiter esse potest. Nam et iudicem eum esse posse plerisque placet. §. 19. Si quis uero iudex sit, arbitrium recipere eiusdem rei, de qua iudex est, et in se compromitti iubere prohibetur, et si sententiam dixerit, non est danda penae persecutio. Seruus arbiter esse non ualet, libertinus potest. §. 20. Porro infamia multipliciter irrogatur. Aliquando enim contrahitur genere delicti declarati per sententiam, ueluti cum iudex pronunciat: iniuriam fecisti, hereditatem expilasti, calumpniatus es. Aliquando genere penae, sicut illi, qui dampnantur in opus publicum, qui pristinum quidem statum obtinent, sed dampno infamiae etiam post inpletum tempus subiciuntur. Aliquando genere penae, et delicti declarati per sententiam, ueluti dum fustibus ceso per preconem dicitur: sicophantis, id est: "calumpniator." Aliquando ipso genere facti, ut exercentes inprobum fenus et illicite exigentes usuras usurarum, et que intra tempus, quo moris est lugere maritum, matrimonium contrahit, et qui sciens eam uxorem duxit. [Gratian.] Idem testatur Felix Papa, et eisdem uerbis. §. 1. Item in euangelio ille qui trabem gestat in oculo probatur non posse educere festucam de oculo fratris sui. §. 2. Item Dauid in libro Psalmorum: "Peccatori autem dixit Deus: quare tu enarras iusticias meas? etc." §. 3. Item Gregorius: "Cuius uita despicitur, restat, ut eius predicatio contempnatur."

C. III. Those who punish the vices of others shall take care first to correct their own.

The same in the Moralia, [book XIV, on Job, c. 15]. Part III. "Let the one among you who is without sin cast the first stone at her." For they were going to punish the sins of others and had left their own behind. Therefore, let them be called back inwardly to conscience, so that they first correct their own and then rebuke those of others. Hence it is that, when the tribe of Benjamin had been overwhelmed by a crime of the flesh, all Israel assembled and wished to avenge the iniquity, but nevertheless Israel itself was overthrown once and again in the contest of battle. For when the Lord was consulted whether they ought to go to avenge it, they were commanded to go; the people who proceeded according to the command of the divine voice lost once and a second time, and then at last, striking the sinful tribe very severely, almost entirely extinguished it. What does it mean that the people are inflamed in vengeance for a crime and yet are themselves overthrown first, except that those through whom the faults of others are struck must first be purified, so that those who hasten to correct the vices of others may themselves, now clean, come to vengeance?

C. III. Qui aliorum uicia puniunt sua prius corrigere studeant.

Idem in Moralibus. [lib. XIV., in Iob. cap. 15.] III. Pars. "Qui sine peccato est uestrum, primus in illam lapidem mittat." Ad aliena quippe peccata punienda ibant, et sua reliquerant. Reuocentur itaque intus ad conscientiam, ut prius propria corrigant, et tunc aliena reprehendant. Hinc est, quod cum tribus Beniamin in carnis scelere fuisset obruta, collectus omnis Israel ulcisci iniquitatem uoluit, sed tamen semel et iterum in belli certamine ipse prostratus est. Consulto enim Domino, si ad ulciscendum ire debuissent, iussum est ut irent, qui iuxta diuinae uocis inperium perrexit, et semel et secundo perdidit, et tunc demum peccatricem tribum ualde feriens pene funditus extinxit. Quid est, quod in ultione sceleris inflammatur, et tamen ipse prius prosternitur, nisi quod prius ipsi purgandi sunt, per quos aliorum culpae feriuntur, ut ipsi iam mundi per ultionem ueniant, qui aliorum uicia corrigere festinant?

C. IV. Let one judge the life of another who has nothing in himself that he must punish.

Likewise Ambrose upon "Blessed are the undefiled," [sermon XX, on the verse "Your mercies, O Lord"]. Let that person judge another's error who has nothing which he condemns in himself. Let that person judge who does not do the same things which he has thought ought to be punished in another, lest, when he judges another, he render sentence against himself. Let that person judge who is led to pronounce by no hatred, no offense, and no fickleness. And a little later: § 1. A good judge does nothing from his own discretion and from the purpose of his private will, but pronounces according to laws and rights, obeys the known rules of law, does not indulge his own will, brings forth from home nothing prepared and premeditated, but judges just as he hears and determines just as the nature of the matter stands; he complies with the laws, does not oppose them, examines the merits of the case, does not alter them. Learn, judges of the world, what disposition you ought to maintain in judging, what sobriety, what sincerity. And a little later: § 2. One who judges ought not to obey his own will, but to maintain what belongs to the laws. And a little later: § 3. In judging, the guardianship of truth is more dear to the heart than obedience to will.

C. IV. Ille de uita alterius iudicet, qui non habet in se ipso quod puniat.

Item Ambrosius super: "Beati inmaculati". [sermone XX. ad uers. Miserationes tuae, Domine] Iudicet ille de alterius errore, qui non habet quod in se ipso condempnet. Iudicet ille, qui non agat eadem, que in alio putauerit punienda ne, cum de alio iudicat, in se ferat sententiam. Iudicet ille, qui ad pronunciandum nullo odio, nulla offensione, nulla leuitate ducatur. Et post pauca: §. 1. Bonus iudex nichil ex arbitrio suo facit et domesticae proposito uoluntatis, sed iuxta leges et iura pronunciat, scitis iuris obtemperat, non indulget propriae uoluntati, nichil paratum et meditatum de domo defert, sed sicut audit, ita iudicat, et sicut se habet natura, decernit; obsequitur legibus, non aduersatur, examinat causae merita, non mutat. Discite iudices seculi, quem in iudicando tenere debeatis affectum, quam sobrietatem, quam sinceritatem. Et paulo post: §. 2. Qui iudicat, non uoluntati suae obtemperare debet, sed tenere quod legum est. Et post pauca: §. 3. In iudicando cordi magis est custodia ueritatis, quam obedientia uoluntatis.

C. V. One burdened by crimes is unable to judge those of another.

Likewise Gregory, [preface to Job, c. 3, otherwise 6]. When anyone is placed amid grave sins, while he is pressed down by his own, he does not wipe away those of another. § 1. For it is clear to all that, when the person sent to intercede is displeasing, the mind of the angry person is without doubt provoked to worse things. § 2. For it is written: "The sacrifices of the impious are abominable to God; the vows of the just are pleasing." For in the judgment of almighty God, not what is given, but by whom, is considered. § 3. Hence it is that it is written: "God had regard to Abel and to his gifts, but to Cain and his gifts he had no regard." For, about to say that the Lord had regard to the gifts, Scripture carefully prefaced that he had regard to Abel. From this it is plainly shown that the offerer did not please because of the gifts, but the gifts because of the offerer. § 4. "For the Most High does not approve the gifts of the iniquitous, nor does he regard their offerings, nor by the multitude of their sacrifices will he be propitiated for their sins." § 5. Likewise: "The Lord is far from the impious, and he will hear the prayers of the just."

C. V. Grauatus criminibus aliena iudicare non ualet.

Item Gregorius. [praefationis in Iob c. 3. al. 6.] In grauibus peccatis quis positus, dum suis premitur, aliena non diluit. §. 1. Cunctis enim liquet, quia, cum is displicet, qui ad intercedendum mittitur, irati animus proculdubio ad deteriora prouocatur. §. 2. Scriptum quippe est: "Victimae inpiorum abhominabiles sunt Deo, uota iustorum placabilia." Neque enim in omnipotentis Dei iudicio quid, sed a quo datur, inspicitur. §. 3. Hinc est enim quod scriptum est: "Respexit Deus ad Abel et ad munera eius, ad Cain uero et ad munera eius non respexit." Dicturus quippe, quia Dominus respexit ad munera, premisit sollicite, quia respexit ad Abel. Ex qua re patenter ostenditur, quia non offerens a muneribus, sed munera ab offerente placuerunt. §. 4. "Dona quippe iniquorum non probat altissimus, nec respicit in oblationibus eorum, nec in multitudine sacrificiorum eorum propitiabitur peccatis." §. 5. Item: "Longe est Dominus ab inpiis, et orationes iustorum exaudiet."

C. VI. We ought first to correct ourselves, then our neighbors.

The same. When the Lord was asked to judge concerning the sinful woman, he did not immediately give judgment, but first, bending himself downward, wrote on the earth with his finger; and only then did he judge that which he was earnestly asked to judge. He was plainly instructing us in a figure that, when we behold any errors of our neighbors, we should not judge those errors beforehand by rebuking them until, having humbly returned to our own conscience, we carefully trace it with the finger of discernment and determine by examination what in it pleases the Creator and what displeases him, according to the statement of the Apostle: "Brothers, even if a man has been overtaken in some transgression, etc." § 1. "The one among you who is without sin": that is, first fulfill the justice of the law yourselves, and thus run with innocent hands to stone the guilty woman.

C. VI. Primum nosmetipsos, deinde proximos debemus corrigere.

Idem. Postulatus Dominus de peccatrice iudicare non statim dat iudicium, sed prius se inclinans deorsum digito scribebat in terra, ac sic demum quod obnixe rogatur iudicat, nos uidelicet typice instituens, ut, cum quelibet proximorum errata conspicimus, non hec antea errata reprehendendo iudicemus, quam ad conscientiam nostram humiliter reuersi digito eam discretionis solerter exculpemus, et quid in ea conditori placeat, quidue displiceat, examinatione dirimemus, iuxta illud Apostoli: "Fratres, etsi preoccupatus fuerit homo in aliquo delicto etc." §. 1. "Qui sine peccato est uestrum:" id est primo uos ipsi iustitiam legis inplete, et sic innocentes manibus ad lapidandam ream concurrite.

C. VII. Let a priest first cleanse his own sins, then those of others.

Likewise Augustine to a certain Count. Let a priest, as a wise and perfect physician, know first how to wash away his own sins and afterward to cleanse and heal those of others, and not to make them public. GRATIAN. Likewise, in the Gospel salt which has lost its savor is said to be useful for nothing except to be cast outside and trampled by men. From all these things it is given to be understood that a criminal cannot be the judge of another person's crime and condemns himself when he renders a sentence concerning another person's crime. § 1. But it is objected: when Saul had been rejected by the Lord, he judged the people of God, and the whole people sought his judgment. Likewise David, when he was an adulterer and homicide, upon being questioned by the prophet, rendered sentence against the rich man who carried off the poor man's sheep, saying: “The judgment of death is upon this man.” Likewise Solomon, when through love of women he worshiped the gods of the gentiles, nevertheless the whole Israelite people flowed to his judgment. So too Ahab, although he worshiped Baal, nevertheless judged the ten tribes. Many others are also found both in the Old Testament and in the New whose life, although blasphemable, nevertheless had its sentence maintained because it proceeded from their office with the integrity of the judicial order preserved. Hence also the Lord says in the Gospel: “The scribes and Pharisees have sat upon the chair of Moses, etc.” From this it is clearly established that evil pastors, when they strike the crimes of others with a sentence of just examination, harm themselves when they take care to correct others' vices without the example of their own amendment; but they benefit their subjects if, corrected by their rebuke or restrained by their sentence, the subjects have learned to change their life for the better. And by this fact, while they are tolerated by the Church, it is not permitted to evade their judgment.

C. VII. Sacerdos prius sua peccata, deinde aliena detergat.

Item Augustinus ad quemdam Comitem. Sacerdos ut sapiens medicus et perfectus primum sua peccata diluere sciat, et postea aliena detergere et sanare, et non publicare. Gratian. Item, in euangelio sal infatuatum ad nichilum utile esse dicitur, nisi ut proiciatur foras et ab hominibus conculcetur. Ex quibus omnibus datur intelligi, quod criminosus alterius criminis iudex esse non potest, et se ipsum condempnat, dum in alterius crimen sententiam profert. §. 1. Sed obicitur: Saul cum a Domino esset reprobatus, populum Dei iudicabat, et eius iudicium uniuersus populus expetebat. Item, Dauid, cum esset adulter et homicida interrogatus a propheta, sententiam in diuitem dedit, qui ouem pauperis rapuit, dicens: "Iudicium mortis est uiro huic." Item, Salomon, cum amore muliercularum deos gentium coleret, tamen uniuersa plebs Israelitica ad eius iudicium confluebat. Sic et Achab, quamuis coleret Baal, tamen decem tribus iudicabat. Multi etiam alii tam in ueteri testamento quam in nouo inueniuntur, quorum uita cum esset blasphemabilis, tamen eorum sententia, quia ex offitio suo seruata iudiciarii ordinis integritate processit, inuenitur seruata. Unde et Dominus ait in euangelio. "Super cathedram Moysi sederunt scribae et Pharisei etc." Hinc liquido constat, quod mali pastores, dum sententia iusti examinis aliorum crimina feriunt, sibi ipsis nocent, dum sine exemplo suae emendationis aliorum uicia corrigere curant; subditis uero prosunt, si, eorum increpatione correcti uel sententia coherciti uitam suam in melius commutare didicerint. Ac per hoc, dum ab ecclesia tollerati fuerint, eorum iudicium subterfugere non licet.

Question VIII

GRATIAN. But Pope Zephyrinus attests that a bishop ought not to be heard or judged by one person alone, [letter I to the Bishops of Sicily], saying:

GRATIANUS. Quod autem episcopus ab uno tantum audiri uel iudicari non debeat, Zepherinus Papa testatur, [epistola I. ad Episcopos Siciliae,] dicens:

C. I. A bishop shall be heard and judged only by several persons.

Let accusers of bishops be free from every suspicion, because the Lord willed his columns to stand firmly, not to be shaken by just anyone. § 1. For let no sentence not spoken by his own judge bind any of them, because even the laws of the world command the same thing to be done. § 3. Let any accused bishop, if it is necessary, choose twelve judges by whom his case may be justly judged. Nor shall he be heard, excommunicated, or judged before they themselves have been chosen by him and, after he has first been summoned according to rule to the assembly of his bishops, his case is justly heard and reasonably decided by them. But let the conclusion of his case be referred to the apostolic see, so that it may be concluded there. § 4. Let no one who is absent be judged, "because both divine and human laws prohibit this." Likewise Bishop Felix said in the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 10]:

C. I. Episcopus non nisi a pluribus audiatur et iudicetur.

Accusatores episcoporum omni careant suspicione, quia columpnas suas Dominus firmiter stare uoluit, non a quibuslibet agitari. §. 1. Nullum namque eorum sententia a suo iudice non dicta constringat, quia et leges seculi idipsum fieri precipiunt. §. 3. Iudices duodecim quilibet episcopus accusatus (si necesse fuerit) eligat, a quibus eius causa iuste iudicetur. Nec prius audiatur, aut excommunicetur uel iudicetur, quam ipsi per se eligantur, et regulariter uocato ad suorum primo conuentum episcoporum, per eos eius causa iuste audiatur et rationabiliter discernatur. Finis uero causae eius ad sedem apostolicam deferatur, ut ibidem terminetur. §. 4. Absens uero nemo iudicetur, "quia et diuinae et humanae leges hoc prohibent." Item Felix Episcopus dixit in Concilio Cartaginensi III.: [cap. 10.]

C. II. By how many bishops shall a bishop who has fallen into guilt be heard?

I propose, according to the statutes of the ancient councils, that if any bishop—which we do not desire—has fallen into some guilt, if there is an excessive necessity for him such that he cannot assemble many, then, lest he remain under the crime, let him be heard by twelve bishops.

C. II. A quot episcopis audiatur episcopus, qui in reatum inciderit.

Suggero secundum statuta ueterum conciliorum, ut, si quis episcopus (quod non optamus) in reatum aliquem inciderit, si fuerit ei nimia necessitas non posse plurimos congregare, ne in crimine remaneat, a duodecim audiatur episcopis.

Question IX

GRATIAN. Part I. Concerning accusers or witnesses, it is clear from the authorities of many persons that they cannot present the voice of accusation or testimony against one who is absent. For Pope

Telesphorus says, [sole letter]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. De accusatoribus uero uel testibus, quod in absentem uocem accusationis uel testificationis exhibere non ualeant, multorum auctoritatibus liquet. Ait enim Telesforus Papa: [epistola unica]

C. I. Unless the defendant is present, the accuser shall not be heard.

We decree that no credence at all is to be given to an accuser who presents a case when his adversary is absent, before a just examination of both parties.

> C. I. Nisi reo presente accusator non audiatur.
> Accusatori omnino non credi decernimus, qui absente aduersario causam suggerit, ante utriusque partis iustam discussionem.

C. II. A sentence may not be rendered when the adversary is absent.

Likewise Pope Eleutherius, [in the letter to the Bishops of Gaul]. Let the judges of the Church take care not to render a sentence when the person whose case is being argued is absent, because it will be void; indeed, they will also give an account in a synod for what they have done. Neither the calumny nor the voice of a traitor shall be heard.

> C. II. Absente aduersario sententiam ferri non licet.
> Item Eleuterius Papa [in epistola ad Episcopos Galliae] Caueant iudices ecclesiae, ne absente eo, cuius causa uentilatur, sententiam proferant quia irrita erit; imo et causam in sinodo pro facto dabunt. Proditoris uero nec calumpnia, nec uox audiatur.

C. III. When the defendant is absent, the accuser shall not be heard.

Likewise Pope Callistus, [letter II to the Bishops of Gaul]. When the person whom he wishes to accuse is absent, no credence shall be given to an accuser in anything. He shall be received with difficulty without a writing, but never by means of a writing, because no one can be accused through a writing; rather, let each person pursue his accusation in his own voice and with the person whom he wishes to accuse present.

> C. III. Absente reo accusator non audiatur.
> Item Calixtus Papa. [epist. II. ad Episcopos Galliae] Absente eo, quem accusare uoluerit, quicquam accusatori non credatur, qui sine scripto difficile, per scriptum autem numquam recipiatur; quia per scripturam nullus accusari potest, sed propria uoce, et presente eo, quem accusare uoluerit, suam quisque agat accusationem.

C. IV. Things done against absent persons shall be made entirely void.

Likewise Pope Cornelius, [to Rufus, letter II, c. 2]. Let all things which in any business or place are done or adjudged against absent persons be made entirely void, because no one condemns an absent person and no law condemns him.

> C. IV. Que in absentes geruntur omnino euacuentur.
> Item Cornelius Papa. [ad Rufum, ep. II. c. 2.] Omnia, que aduersus absentes in omni negotio aut loco aguntur aut iudicantur, omnino uacuentur, quoniam absentem nullus addicit nec ulla lex dampnat.

C. V. One who is not accused or convicted in person shall not be judged.

Likewise Pope Marcellus, [to Maxentius, letter II]. No one ought to be judged or condemned before he has lawful accusers present and receives a place for defending himself in order to clear away the crimes.

> C. V. Non iudicetur qui presentialiter non accusatur uel conuincitur.
> Item Marcellus Papa. [ad Maxentium, epist. II.] Non oportet quemquam iudicari uel dampnari prius, quam legitimos habeat presentes accusatores, locumque defendendi accipiat ad abluenda crimina.

C. VI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Damasus, [to Archbishop Stephen, letter III, c. 8]. It is also held to have been sanctioned in the decrees of the holy Fathers that it is not canonical to judge or condemn any priest before he has present accusers canonically examined and receives a place for defending himself, that is, ecclesiastical delays for clearing away the crimes, etc.

[PALEA.

> C. VI. De eodem.

> Item Damasus Papa. [ad Stephanum Archiepiscopum, ep. III. cap. 8.] Habetur quoque in decretis sanctorum Patrum sancitum, non fore canonicum quemquam sacerdotum iudicare uel dampnare ante, quam accusatores canonice examinatos presentes habeat locumque defendendi accipiat, id est inducias ecclesiasticas ad abluenda crimina etc.

> [PALEA.

C. VII. The same Damasus, continuously in the same place.

Nor, without an apostolic precept, shall the accusation at the first examination be conducted outside the person's own province; reverence must be preserved toward the apostolic see in all cases, because the ancient rule of the Fathers also teaches this, and the imperial statutes accord with it. “The examination of crimes,” they say, “must be conducted where the crime was committed. For elsewhere one accused of crimes is prohibited from being heard.” And elsewhere it is commanded in the canons: “All business is to be concluded in its own place, where it arose,” and other such things similar to these, with apostolic authority nevertheless preserved in all matters, so that nothing concerning them is determined before it is known to please the apostolic see, by which it is fitting that all be supported.]

> Nec extra propriam fiat prouinciam primo discussionis accusatio, sine apostolica preceptione, cui in omnibus causis debet reuerentia custodiri, quoniam et antiqua docet hoc Patrum regula, in qua et inperialiter pariter statuta concinunt. "Criminum," inquiunt, "discussio ibi agenda est, ubi crimen admissum est. Nam alibi criminum reus prohibetur audiri." Et alibi in canonibus precipitur: "Quecumque negotia in suis locis, ubi orta sunt, finienda sunt," et reliqua talia, et his similia, salua tamen in omnibus apostolica auctoritate, ut nichil in his diffiniatur prius, quam ei placere cognoscatur, qua omnes suffultos esse oportet.]

C. VIII. Concerning the same.

The same, [to the Bishops of Italy, letter VI]. Let one who has chosen to accuse another accuse in person by himself and not through another, with a formal inscription first made. Nor shall anyone ever be judged before he has lawful accusers present and receives a place for defending himself in order to clear away the crimes.

> C. VIII. De eodem.
> Idem. [ad Episcopos Italiae, epist. VI.] Qui accusare alium elegerit, presens per se, et non per alium accuset, inscriptione uidelicet premissa. Neque ullus umquam iudicetur ante, quam legitimos accusatores presentes habeat, locumque defendendi accipiat ad abluenda crimina.

C. IX. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Sixth Council of Toledo, [c. 11]. It is fitting that the life of an innocent person be stained by no destruction wrought by an accuser. Therefore, whoever is charged with a crime by anyone shall not, after being accused, be given over to punishment before the accuser is presented and the sentence of the laws and canons is sought. But if the person is found unworthy to accuse, let no judgment be made upon his accusation.

> C. IX. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano VI. [c. 11.] Dignum est, ut uita innocentis nulla maculetur pernicie accusatoris; ideo quisquis a quolibet criminatur, non ante accusatus suplicio detur, quam accusator presentetur, atque legum et canonum sententia exquiratur. Quod si indigna ad accusandum persona inuenitur, ad eius accusationem non iudicetur.

C. X. Let one who neglects to be present for his case be struck by a sentence.

Likewise Pope Boniface to the Gauls, [letter II]. We have decreed that your judgment ought to take place within the province and that a synod is to be assembled before the kalends of November, so that, if he wishes to be present, he may, being present, answer the charges if he has confidence; but if he has neglected to be present, let him gain no delay of sentence from his absence. For it is manifest that one who does not use the opportunity of clearing himself in a judgment granted and appointed so many times confesses concerning the crime. For it makes no difference that, in the present examination, all the things which have been said are not proved, since the acknowledgment itself is established by the absence procured so many times.

> C. X. Sententia feriatur qui causae suae negligit adesse.
> Item Bonifacius Papa ad Gallos. [epist. II.] Decreuimus uestram debere intra prouinciam esse iudicium, et congregare sinodum ante kalendarum diem nouembrium, ut, si adesse uoluerit, presens, si confidit, ad obiecta respondeat; si uero adesse neglexerit, dilationem sententiae de absentia non lucretur. Nam manifestum est, confiteri eum de crimine, qui indulto et totiens delegato iudicio purgandi se occasione non utitur. Nichil enim interest, utrum in presenti examine non omnia, que dicta sunt, conprobentur, cum ipsa quoque professio ex procurata totiens constet absentia.

C. XI. One who is absent can neither be accused nor judged.

Likewise Pope Felix, [to the Bishops of Gaul, letter II]. When the adversary is absent, the accuser shall not be heard, nor will a sentence spoken by a judge when the other party is absent obtain any firmness.

C. XI. Absens nec accusari, nec iudicari potest.

Item Felix Papa [ad Episcopos Galliae, epist. II.] Absente aduersario non audiatur accusator, nec sententia absente parte alia a iudice dicta ullam obtinebit firmitatem.

C. XII. A definitive sentence shall not be rendered when the other party is absent.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to Gallino, Archbishop of Siena. Truly, one is not a just mediator who does not fear to decide the disputes arising between both litigants when one is present and the other absent. These things having been premised, we will and admonish by apostolic authority that, if the priest concerning whom the matter is conducted has wished after his excommunication to approach the apostolic see, no one shall presume to impede his journey.

C. XII. Altera parte absente diffinitiua sententia non feratur.

Item Nicolaus Papa Gallinoni Senensi Archiepiscopo. Reuera iustus mediator non est, qui uno litigante et altero absente amborum emergentes lites decidere non formidat. His ita premissis, uolumus et auctoritate apostolica monemus, ut, si presbiter, de quo agitur, post excommunicationem suam apostolicam sedem adire uoluerit, nullus iter eius inpedire presumat.

C. XIII. A sentence is not to be rendered against one who is absent.

Likewise Pope Zephyrinus, [to the Bishops of Sicily, letter I]. Let no one who is absent be judged, because both divine and human laws prohibit this. GRATIAN. Unless he is absent through contumacy. For contumacy causes him to be regarded as present.

C. XIII. In absentem non est ferenda sententia.

Item Zepherinus Papa. [ad Episcopos Siciliae, epist. I.] Absens nemo iudicetur, quia et diuinae et humanae leges hoc prohibent. Gratian. Nisi fuerit absens ex contumacia. Pro presenti namque contumacia eum haberi facit.

C. XIV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to Gallino, Archbishop of Siena. You indicate that Bishop Hermann has frequently been accused concerning certain things, for which, because the person on his side is absent, we undoubtedly cannot believe one party to the detriment of the other, although up to this point you have not said what those transgressions were, nor have you plainly shown whether that prelate was of sound mind or not when he perpetrated those transgressions. We judge it more satisfactory in the meantime to regard any infirmity whatsoever as belonging to the punishment of sin rather than to sin itself, and a person so afflicted ought rather to be cared for and treated with compassion than punished or struck in any way.

C. XIV. De eodem.

Item Nicolaus Papa Gallinoni Senensi Archiepiscopo. Indicas Hermannum episcopum super quibusdam frequenter fuisse accusatum, pro quibus (quia ex parte ipsius persona deest) nos uni parti ad discrimen alterius credere proculdubio non possumus, quamuis nec usque adhuc qui fuerint illi excessus dixeris, nec utrum sanae mentis erat idem antistes, nec ne, cum ipsos excessus perpetrabat, euidenter ostenderis, satiusque arbitramur, quamlibet interim infirmitatem ad penam peccati, quam ad ipsum pertinere peccatum, cui magis consulendum et conpatiendum sit, quam puniendum uel etiam aliquo modo feriendum.

C. XV. Let witnesses give testimony only concerning the things which they know in person.

Likewise Callistus, [Pope, to the Bishops of Gaul, letter II]. Let witnesses not give testimony through any writing whatsoever, but, being present, let them give true testimony concerning the things which they saw and knew. Nor shall they give testimony concerning other cases or business except those which are known to have been transacted in their presence. Part II. GRATIAN. Concerning things which they heard, however, they can give testimony in a civil case if they were summoned for this purpose. Hence it is read in Collation VII, under the title On Witnesses: § 1. "If a debt has been put in writing and proof of payment is offered by the litigants through witnesses without a writing, then we will that it be receivable before the judge, provided that the witnesses were assumed for this very purpose: that they should offer testimony for a payment to be made, or for the remembrance of a payment already made to someone, and for the confession of the person who received the money. But these empty testimonies, given incidentally—either by a person who, coming for another business, heard someone say that he received gold from someone or owed it to someone—we judge to have no force for any reason." Part III. § 2. It is also necessary that they see at the same time. But if one saw at one time and another at another, the diversity of the times does not admit their testimony. Hence Pope Leo:

C. XV. Testes non dicant testimonium, nisi de his, que presentialiter nouerunt.

Item Calixtus. [Papa ad Episcopos Galliae, ep. II.] Testes per quamcumque scripturam testimonium non proferant, sed presentes de his, que uiderunt et nouerunt, ueraciter testimonium dicant. Nec de aliis causis uel negotiis testimonium dicant, nisi de his, que sub eorum presentia acta esse noscuntur. II. Pars. Gratian. De his etiam, que audierunt, si ad hoc conuocati sunt, in ciuili causa testimonium dicere possunt, unde in collocatione VII. titulo de testibus, legitur: §. 1. "Si debitum scriptum sit, et probatio solutionis proferatur a litigantibus per testes sine scriptura, tunc susceptibilem eam apud iudicem esse uolumus, dum ad hoc ipsum testes assumantur, ut perhibeant testimonium pro facienda solutione, aut pro memoria facta alicui iam solutionis factae, et pro confessione eius, qui pecunias accepit. Hec autem testimonia inania et ex transitu perhibita (aut ab eo qui propter aliud opus adueniens audiuit aliquo dicente, se accepisse ab aliquo aurum, aut debere alicui) nulla ratione ualere censemus." III. Pars. §. 2. Simul autem necesse est, ut uideant. Quod si alius uno tempore et alius alio uiderit, diuersitas temporum eorum testimonium non admittit. Unde Leo Papa:

C. XVI. Those who are not established to have been present at the same business are not admitted to testimony.

Witnesses who testify to something for purposes of calumny are likewise to be punished, nor are their voices admitted as those of several persons when the diversity of the times has prevented them from being present together.

C. XVI. Non admittuntur ad testimonium quos non eidem negotio adfuisse constiterit.

Nichilominus quoque puniendi sunt testes, qui ad calumpniam aliquid testificantur, nec eorum uoces tamquam plurium admittuntur, quos temporum quidem diuersitas simul interfuisse prohibuit.

C. XVII. Let a witness add nothing of his own to the sequence of deeds.

Likewise Ambrose in the book On Paradise, [c. 12]. A pure and simple sequence of the testimony is to be disclosed. Very often, when a witness adds something of his own to the sequence of deeds, he discolors the credibility of the whole testimony by the falsehood of a part. Therefore, nothing which seems good is to be added.

> C. XVII. Ad seriem gestorum testis ex suo nichil adiciat.
> Item Ambrosius in libro de paradyso. [c. 12.] Pura et simplex testimonii series intimanda est. Plerumque testis, dum ad seriem gestorum aliquid ex suo adicit, totam testimonii fidem partis mendacio decolorat. Nichil igitur, quod bonum uidetur, addendum est.

C. XVIII. One who is absent can neither accuse nor be accused.

Likewise Pope Felix, [to the Bishops of Gaul, letter II]. An absent person cannot accuse or be accused through another, nor shall a relative by marriage be admitted as a witness. Part IV. GRATIAN. Unless it is in a crime of injuries, in which an illustrious person can prosecute and defend even through a procurator, with the remaining formalities observed, as in the Code, under the title On Injuries, final law.

> C. XVIII. Absens nec accusare, nec accusari potest.
> Item Felix Papa. [ad Episcopos Galliae, epist. II.] Absens per alium accusare aut accusari non potest, nec affinis testis admittatur. IV. Pars. Gratian. Nisi in crimine iniuriarum, in quo illustris persona etiam per procuratorem intendere et excipere potest, seruatis ceteris solempnibus, ut Codice titulo de iniuriis, lege ultima.

C. XIX. When the defendant is absent, a bill of accusation is offered in vain.

Likewise Pope Pelagius to Sindua, Master of the Soldiers. The documents which Lucidius gave us would have been valid if his adversary had been present there at that time. But because the acts which he recounted to us are read to have been done while the adversary was absent, the laws do not receive such things.

> C. XIX. Reo absente libellus accusationis frustra offertur.
> Item Pelagius Papa Sinduae Magistro militum. Cartae, quas dedit nobis Lucidius, si illo tempore aduersarius ipsius illic presens fuisset, ualidae erant. Sed quia aduersario absente gesta, que nobis recensuit, facta leguntur, talia leges non recipiunt.

C. XX. Let witnesses give testimony after an oath has been physically offered.

The same to Decoratus the Patrician. We exhort you, while preserving under fear of the Lord the accustomed sincerity of your conscience in this business also, to cause all fear to be cut away from the persons who can know the truth of this case; and, after they have been presented before you, touched the most holy Gospels, and also lawfully offered an oath, let them disclose the things which they know in the truth of the matters by the profession of their testimony, so that, after all things have been laid open, you may recognize what things are to be adjudged according to the laws and justice, and may give a conclusion consonant with the laws and the truth.

C. XX. Testes corporaliter prestito sacramento testimonium dicant.

Idem Decorato Patricio. Hortamur, ut, sub timore Domini consuetam conscientiae uestrae sinceritatem in hoc quoque negotio conseruantes, omnem personis, que ueritatem causae istius scire possunt, faciatis amputari formidinem, et uestris presentati conspectibus, tactis sacrosanctis euangeliis, prebito etiam legaliter sacramento, que in rerum ueritate norunt professione suae testificationis aperiant, ut, patefactis omnibus, que secundum leges et iustitiam censenda sint cognoscatis, et conuenientem legibus et ueritati terminum detis.

C. XXI. The accuser and the accused ought to be present together.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to Hincmar, Archbishop of Reims. According to the teachings of the sacred Scriptures and the balance of justice, it is necessary for both the accused and the accuser to be present together, and for one party, endowed with however much authority and of whatever kind, to be heard in such a manner that no prejudice at all is inflicted upon the other party.

C. XXI. Accusator et accusatus simul debent adesse.

Item Nicolaus Papa Igmaro Remorum Archiepiscopo. Necesse est secundum sacrarum scripturarum documenta ac secundum iustitiae trutinam, et accusatum et accusatorem simul adesse, et unam partem, quantacumque et qualicumque predita sit auctoritate, sic prorsus audiri, ut alteri parti nullum preiudicium inrogetur.

Question X

GRATIAN. That those who fail in the first charge are not to be admitted to the following charges is confirmed by the Seventh Council of Carthage, in which the following is read to have been established, [c. 3]:

GRATIANUS. Quod uero deficientes in primo capitulo non sint admittendi ad sequentia, ex Concilio Cartaginensi VII. confirmatur, in quo sic [cap. 3.] statutum legitur:

C. I. One who fails in the first charge shall not be admitted to the others.

It was decided that, whenever many crimes are charged against clerics by accusers and the accusers have been unable to prove one of them, concerning which they proceeded first, they shall no longer be admitted to the others. GRATIAN. The same is proved by the authority of the Third Council of Arles, in which it was determined as follows, [c. 24]:

C. I. Qui in primo capitulo deficit ad cetera non admittatur.

Placuit, ut quotiescumque clericis ab accusatoribus multa crimina obiciuntur, et unum ex his, de quo prius egerint, probare non ualuerint, ad cetera iam non admittantur. Gratian. Probatur illud idem auctoritate Arelatensis Concilii III., in quo sic [c. 24.] diffinitum est:

C. II. Those who make false charges against their brothers shall not communicate until the end.

It was decided that those who have been convicted of making false charges against their brothers shall not communicate until the end, as the great synod previously established, unless they have repented with fitting satisfaction.

C. II. Qui falsa fratribus obiciunt usque ad exitum non communicent.

Eos, qui falsa fratribus capitula obiecisse conuicti fuerint, placuit usque ad exitum non communicare, (sicut magna sinodus ante constituit), nisi digna satisfactione penituerint.

C. III. One who is unable to prove what he charges is thereafter not admitted to make an accusation, unless he wishes to assert only his own civil case.

Likewise Felix in his second decretal, to the Bishops of Gaul. If the persons of accusers have appeared culpable in the judgment of bishops, they shall thereafter not be admitted to make an accusation unless they wish to assert their own cases, but not criminal or ecclesiastical ones. GRATIAN. Therefore, since those who make false charges against their brothers are prohibited from communion until the end of life, and since those who are found culpable in the judgment of bishops are prohibited from thereafter being admitted to make an accusation, it is apparent that those who fail in the first charge cannot proceed to the following charges, as persons who make false charges.

C. III. Qui quod obicit probare non ualet, de cetero ad arguendum non admittitur, nisi propriam causam ciuilem dumtaxat asserere uoluerit.

Item Felix in secundo decretali, Episcopis Galliae. Si accusatorum personae in iudicio episcoporum culpabiles aparuerint, ad arguendum de cetero non admittantur, nisi proprias causas asserere (non tamen criminales uel ecclesiasticas) uoluerint. Gratian. Cum ergo qui falsa fratribus obiciunt usque ad exitum uitae a communione prohibeantur; cum illi, qui in episcoporum iudicio culpabiles inueniuntur, ad arguendum de cetero admitti prohibeantur: aparet, quod in primo capitulo deficientes tamquam falsorum obiectores ad sequentia procedere non ualent.

Question XI

GRATIAN. Part I. By the authority of many persons, it is prohibited that an accusation be turned by the accused against the accuser. For Pope Stephen says, [letter II, c. 7]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Ab accusato uero accusationem in accusatorem uerti, multorum auctoritate prohibetur. Ait enim Stephanus Papa: [epist. II. c. 7.]

C. I. Accused persons cannot accuse others unless they first clear themselves.

The license to charge crimes is to be denied to accused persons before they have freed themselves from the crime by which they are pressed, because no credence is to be given against others to the confession of persons entangled in crimes unless they have first proved themselves innocent, since the profession of an accused person against anyone whatsoever is dangerous and ought not to be admitted.

C. I. Accusati, nisi prius se purgauerint, alios accusare non possunt.

Neganda est accusatis licentia criminandi, priusquam se crimine, quo premuntur, exuerint, quia non est credendum contra alios eorum confessioni, qui criminibus inplicantur, nisi se prius probauerint innocentes, quoniam periculosa est et non debet admitti rei aduersus quemcumque professio.

[C. II.]

In book IX of the Code, title I, [law 19]. The Emperors Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian. The license to charge crimes of an equal or lesser gravity is to be denied to accused persons—unless they are prosecuting injuries to themselves and their own people—before they have freed themselves from the crime by which they are pressed, yet in such a manner that they too can lodge a formal inscription against those persons even while the accusation is pending.

> [C. II.]
> Libro IX. Codicis, titulo I., [l. 19.] Inppp. Valentinianus, Valens et Gratianus. Neganda est accusatis nisi suas suorumque iniurias persecuntur licentia criminandi in pari uel minori crimine, priusquam se crimine, quo premuntur, exuerint: ita tamen, ut et ipsi inscriptionem contra eos etiam pendente accusatione deponere possint.

C. III. Concerning the same.

Likewise from a decree of Pope Hadrian, [c. 33]. No credence is to be given against others to the confession of persons entangled in crimes unless they have first proved themselves innocent, because the profession of an accused person against anyone whatsoever is dangerous and ought not to be admitted. GRATIAN. This is to be understood in a crime of equal or lesser gravity. But if he wishes to accuse him of a greater crime—for example, if one accused of fornication wishes to assail his accuser for perjury, homicide, simony, or any other crime of this sort—he is not prohibited by these authorities. § 1. For sometimes a criminal question takes precedence over a civil one, and sometimes over another criminal question. Hence it is read in book III of the Code, under the title On the Order of Judgments, [law 4]: "After a civil question has been set aside, it often happens that a crime is judged first, because, as the greater matter, it is deservedly preferred to the lesser."

> C. III. De eodem.
> Item ex decreto Adriani Papae. [c. 33.] Non est credendum contra alios eorum confessioni, qui criminibus inplicantur, nisi se prius probauerint innocentes, quia periculosa est et admitti non debet rei professio aduersus quemcumque. Gratian. Hoc autem intelligendum est in pari uel minori crimine. Ceterum si de maiori crimine eum accusare uoluerit (ueluti, si accusatus de fornicatione, de periurio, uel homicidio, uel symonia, uel alio quolibet huiusmodi crimine accusatorem suum inpetere uoluerit), his auctoritatibus non prohibetur. §. 1. Aliquando enim criminalis questio preiudicat ciuili, aliquando criminali. Unde in III. libro Codicis titulo de ordine iudiciorum, [lege, 4.] legitur: "Ciuili questione intermissa sepe fit, ut prius de crimine iudicetur, quod, utpote maius, merito minori prefertur."

[C. IV.]

Likewise book IX, [Code, title On Those Who Cannot Accuse], law 1. "It is first necessary that you answer concerning the crimes of slaughter and wounds which are charged against you by your adversary as the graver matters; and then, from the outcome of the case, the judge will assess whether you are to be permitted to accuse the same person, even though you lodged the formal inscription first." Part II. [GRATIAN.] Sometimes a civil question takes precedence over another civil question, and sometimes over a criminal one. For, as it is read in book VII of the Code, under the title On the Order of Cognitions: "If there is a controversy concerning an inheritance and freedom, the case concerning freedom ought to be conducted first." Likewise: § 1. "If some crime is alleged against a person who is said to be freeborn, the proceeding concerning freedom ought first to be conducted in its order, with the governor providing his cognizance; for if the delict has been proved, it is necessary first to know whether punishment ought to be decreed against him as a free and freeborn person or as a slave." Part III. Likewise: § 2. "One who confesses that he suffers a controversy concerning his status asks in vain that the power be given to him to accuse a person whom he acknowledges to be his own master. But when the proceeding concerning freedom has been concluded, if he has been pronounced a slave, he will not be able to accuse his master." § 3. "For if anyone from the household or slaves of any house whatsoever has come forth as informer and accuser of any crime whatsoever, intending to assail the reputation, person, and fortunes of the one to whose household he adhered or whose dominion he was under, let him be struck with the avenging sword at the very exposition of the crimes and beginning of the accusation, before the production of witnesses and before the examination of the judgment. For a death-bearing voice ought to be cut off rather than heard. We except, however, the crime of treason." Similarly: § 4. "If freedmen have presumed to be accusers of those who manumitted them or of their heirs, they will be held by the same punishment as slaves, to pay the penalties before the beginning of the prohibited information."

> Item libro IX., [Cod. tit. de his, qui accus. non possunt.] lege 1. "Prius est, ut tu respondeas criminibus caedis atque uulnerum que tibi ut grauiora ab aduersario tuo obiciuntur, et tunc ex euentu causae iudex estimabit, an tibi permittendum sit eundem accusare, tamen etsi prior inscriptionem deposuisti." II. Pars. [Gratian.] Aliquando ciuilis preiudicat ciuili, aliquando criminali. Sicut enim in septimo libro Codicis, titulo de ordine cognitionum, legitur: "Si de hereditate et libertate controuersia est, prius debet agi causa libertatis." Item: §. 1. "Si crimen aliquod inferatur ei, qui ingenuus esse dicitur, liberalis causa suo ordine ante debet agi cognitionem suam preside prebente, quoniam si delictum probatum fuerit, ante sciri, necesse est, utrum ut in liberum et ingenuum, an ut in seruum constitui oportet." III. Pars. Item: §. 2. "Qui confitetur se pati controuersiam status, frustra postulat dari sibi potestatem accusandi eum, qui se suum dominum esse fatetur. Causa uero liberali terminata, si seruus pronunciatus fuerit, dominum suum accusare non poterit." §. 3. "Si quis enim ex familiaribus uel seruis cuiuslibet domus cuiuscumque criminis delator atque accusator emerserit, eius existimationem, caput atque fortunas petiturus, cuius familiaritati inheserit uel dominio, ante exhibitionem testium, ante examinationem iudicii in ipsa expositione criminum atque accusationis exordio ultore gladio feriatur. Vocem enim funestam intercidi oportet potius quam audiri. Maiestatis autem crimen excipimus." Similiter: §. 4. "Si liberti accusatores manumissorum heredumue esse presumpserint, eodem quo serui suplicio tenebuntur, luituri penas ante prohibitae delationis exordium."

Causa IV

GRATIAN. A certain man placed under excommunication intends to accuse a bishop. He brings forward an adolescent under the fourteenth year of his age for the assertion of his case. Prohibited from the accusation, he makes the adolescent the accuser and himself a witness. The adolescent desires to bear the person of accuser and witness. On the appointed day the bishop does not appear at the judgment of the chosen judges. He is suspended from communion. At length, when the judgment has been renewed, the accuser is found culpable in the accusation. Finally, he proceeds to the assertion of his own case. (Qu. I.) Here it is first asked whether one placed under excommunication is able to accuse another. (Qu. II.) Second, whether anyone under the fourteenth year can testify in a criminal case. (Qu. III.) Third, whether one prohibited from an accusation can assume the person of a witness. (Qu. IV.) Fourth, whether the same person can be accuser and witness. (Qu. V.) Fifth, whether one who does not appear on the appointed day is to be removed from communion. (Qu. VI.) Sixth, if the person of the accuser is found culpable in the judgment of bishops, whether he is thereafter to be admitted to the assertion of his own case.

> GRATIANUS. Quidam in excommunicatione constitutus episcopum accusare disponit; adolescentem infra decimum et quartum etatis suae annum ad assertionem suae causae adducit; prohibitus ab accusatione adolescentem accusatorem et se testem facit; adolescens personam accusatoris et testis gerere cupit; die statuta ad electorum iudicum iudicium episcopus minime occurrit; a communione suspenditur; tandem renouato iudicio accusator culpabilis in accusatione inuenitur; demum ad assertionem propriae causae procedit. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, an in excommunicatione constitutus alium accusare ualeat? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an infra decimum quartum annum in criminali causa testari quis possit? (Qu. III.) Tertio, utrum ab accusatione prohibitus personam testificantis possit assumere? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, an idem possit esse accusator et testis? (Qu. V.) Quinto, an die constituta non occurrens a communione sit remouendus? (Qu. VI.) Sexto, si in episcoporum iudicio accusatoris persona culpabilis inuenta fuerit, an ad assertionem propriae causae de cetero sit admittenda?

Question I

GRATIAN. Concerning the first question, the following is read to have been established in the Seventh Council of Carthage, at which Faustinus, legate of the Roman Church, was present:

> GRATIANUS. De prima questione sic statutum legitur in Concilio Cartaginensi VII., cui interfuit Faustinus Romanae ecclesiae legatus:

C. I. One who persists under excommunication is not admitted to accuse.

We determine that one is rightly not admitted to an accusation who, after he has been excommunicated and while he is still placed under that excommunication, has wished to accuse, whether he is a cleric or a layman. § 1. All who are also stained by marks of infamy—that is, stage performers or persons subject to acts of turpitude—and heretics also, whether pagans or Jews, are prohibited from an accusation.

> C. I. Ad accusandum non admittitur qui in excommunicatione perseuerat.
> Diffinimus, eum rite ad accusationem non admitti, qui posteaquam excommunicatus fuerit, in ipsa adhuc excommunicatione constitutus, siue sit clericus siue laicus, accusare uoluerit. §. 1. Omnes etiam infamiae maculis aspersi, id est histriones aut turpitudinibus subiectae personae, heretici etiam, siue pagani siue Iudei, ab accusatione prohibentur.

C. II. Those who are separated from the Church by schism or excommunication are proved to be heretics.

Likewise Pope Nicholas, [in the letter to Emperor Michael which begins, "We had proposed"]. But that those who had already been deposed, excommunicated, or anathematized by our aforesaid brother and fellow minister Ignatius could render no condemnation against him is declared from the chapter produced from the Second Universal Synod, when it is said: "But if the crime which has been alleged against a bishop is ecclesiastical, then it is necessary that the persons of the accusers be tested, so that, first, heretics may not be permitted to make accusations against orthodox bishops concerning ecclesiastical business." But lest we deny that these persons are heretics, hear what follows: “By heretics,” they say, “we mean both those who were formerly cast out by the Church and those who have afterward been anathematized by us.” Moreover, if even thus you still do not believe, hear what is added: “But besides these,” they say, “also those who feign that they confess the sound faith are schismatics if they hold assemblies apart from bishops who communicate with us. Then also, if certain persons have been rebuked by the Church concerning certain causes and cast out or excommunicated, whether from the clergy or from the lay order, neither are these permitted to accuse a bishop before they have first been freed from their own crime. Similarly, those who are under a prior accusation are not acceptable as accusers of a bishop or of other clerics before they have shown themselves innocent of the crimes alleged against them.” You are not ignorant of what peril threatens those who contemn this rule.

> Item Nicolaus Papa. [in epistola ad Michaelem Imperatorem, cuius initium est: "Proposueramus."] Quod autem hi, qui iam a fato fratre et conministro nostro Ignatio depositi uel excommunicati, uel anathematizati fuerant, nullam aduersus eum intorquere dampnationem potuerunt, ex prolato secundae uniuersalis sinodi capitulo declaratur, cum dicitur: "Si uero ecclesiasticum fuerit crimen, quod episcopo illatum fuerit, tunc probari oportet accusantium personas, ut primo quidem hereticis non liceat accusationes contra orthodoxos facere episcopos pro ecclesiasticis negotiis." Sed ne hos hereticos esse denegemus, audite sequentia: "Hereticos autem (inquiunt) dicimus tam eos, qui olim ab ecclesia proiecti sunt, quam qui post hec a nobis anathematizati sunt." Porro, si adhuc nec sic creditis, audite quod subditur: "Preter hos autem (aiunt) et eos, qui fidem simulant sanam confiteri, scismaticos esse etiam eos qui seorsum a communicantibus nobis episcopis collectas faciunt. Deinde uero, et si quidam ab ecclesia super causis quibusdam reprehensi sunt, et proiecti aut excommunicati, siue ex clero siue ex laicali ordine, nec his licere accusare episcopum ante, quam crimine proprio exuantur primitus. Similiter autem et eos, qui sub accusatione priori existunt, non ante esse acceptabiles in episcopi accusatione aut aliorum clericorum, quam innoxios semetipsos illatorum sibi ostenderint criminum." Quid autem periculi regulae huius contemptoribus inmineat, non ignoratis.

Questions II and III

GRATIAN. Part I. The second and third questions are concluded in one and the same chapter by the same Council, [the Seventh Council of Carthage]. It is as follows:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Secunda autem et tertia questio eodem Concilio [Cartaginensi VII.] uno eodemque capitulo terminatur. Illud uero est huiusmodi:

C. I. Those who are repelled from an accusation, or who have not yet reached the fourteenth year, cannot be witnesses.

We judge that those who have been ordered not to be admitted to an accusation are also not to be admitted to testimony, nor those whom the accuser himself has produced from his household. Those placed within the fourteen years of their age, however, shall not be admitted to testimony.

[PALEA.

> C. I. Qui ab accusatione repelluntur, aut ad annum XIV. nondum peruenerunt, testes esse non possunt.

> Testes autem ad testimonium non admittendos esse censemus, qui nec ad accusationem admitti iussi sunt, uel etiam quos ipse accusator de domo sua produxerit. Ad testimonium autem intra annos quatuordecim etatis suae constituti non admittantur.
> [PALEA.

C. II. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Mâcon, c. 6. It pleased the holy assembly that witnesses shall not be hired for a price to give testimony; that each of the best and more trustworthy persons shall be assumed for testimony, so that the person against whom they ought to bear testimony can bring no calumnious objection against them; and that no one shall give testimony unless fasting.] Part II. GRATIAN. Likewise, in a criminal case, "one who previously gave testimony against that defendant cannot be produced as a witness," as is found in book XXII of the Digest, under the title On Witnesses, [law 23]. Likewise under the same title, [law Ob carmen, § If witnesses]:

> C. II. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Maticensi, c. 6. Placuit sancto conuentui, ut testes ad testimonium dicendum precio non conducantur, et ut quique optimi et fideliores in testimonium assumantur, ut is, contra quem testimonium ferre debent, nullam eis possit afferre calumpniam, et ut nullus testimonium dicat nisi ieiunus.] II. Pars. Gratian. Item in criminali causa: "produci testis non potest, qui ante in eum reum testimonium dixit," sicut in 22. libro Digestionis titulo de testibus [lege 23.] inuenitur. Item titulo eodem: [l. Ob. carmen. §. Si testes:]

[C. III.]

If all the witnesses are of the same honor and reputation, and the quality of the business and the inclination of the judge concur with them, all the testimonies are to be followed. But if some of them have said something different, although they are unequal in number, that which accords with the nature of the business and is free from suspicion of enmity or favor is to be believed; and the judge will confirm the inclination of his mind from the arguments and testimonies which he has found more suitable to the matter. For one ought not to regard the multitude, but the sincere credibility of the testimonies and those testimonies with which the light of truth is more fully present. Likewise, [law 2 of the Digest, under the same title]: § 1. In witnesses, credibility, dignity, morals, and gravity are to be weighed; and therefore witnesses who waver against the credibility of their own testimony are not to be heard. Likewise, [law 3]: § 2. The credibility of witnesses is to be diligently examined, and therefore, in their person, first of all the condition of each must be investigated: whether someone is a decurion or a plebeian; whether he is of an honorable and blameless life, or is marked and blameworthy; whether he is wealthy or needy, so that he might readily admit something for the sake of gain; whether he is an enemy of the person against whom he bears testimony, or a friend of the person for whom he gives testimony. For if a testimony is free from suspicion—either on account of the person by whom it is offered, because that person is honorable, or on account of the cause, because it is for the sake of neither gain, favor, nor enmity—it is to be admitted. Likewise, [a little later in the same law]:

Part III. § 3. By the Julian Law concerning violence it is provided that the following shall not be permitted to give testimony against the defendant under that law: one who was manumitted by him or by his parent; those who are below puberty; one who has been condemned in a public judgment and has not been restored in full; one who is in chains or public custody; one who has hired himself to fight with beasts; one who openly makes or has made gain from prostitution; or one who has been judged or convicted of accepting money in order to give or not to give testimony. Likewise, [law 4]: § 4. By the Julian Law concerning public judgments it is provided that a person shall not be summoned against his will to give testimony against a father-in-law, son-in-law, stepfather, stepson, male cousin, female cousin, a male cousin's son, or those who are of the preceding degree. § 5. Likewise, neither against his own freedman, nor against a freedman of his children, his parents, his husband, or his wife. § 6. Likewise, patrons and patronesses are not to be compelled to give testimony against freedmen, nor freedmen against a patron. § 7. But when it is excepted that a son-in-law or father-in-law shall not be compelled against his will to give testimony, it is held that the daughter's betrothed is also included under the designation of son-in-law, and the betrothed woman's father under that of father-in-law. Likewise, [law 6]: § 8. Those who can be commanded to become witnesses are not regarded as suitable witnesses. Likewise, [law 7]: § 9. A slave's answer is to be believed when there is no other proof for eliciting the truth. Likewise, [law 8]: § 10. Elderly persons, persons in ill health, soldiers, those who are absent with a magistrate on public business, or those who are not permitted to come shall not be compelled against their will to give testimony. Likewise, [law 19]: § 11. Tax farmers also do not give testimony against their will. § 12. Likewise, one who is absent not for the purpose of evading testimony. § 13. Likewise, one who has contracted to furnish provisions to the army. Nor can a summons to give testimony be served upon wards. Likewise, [law 20]: § 14. An accuser ought not to summon as a witness one who is a defendant in a public judgment or one who is less than twenty years old. [Law 21.] § 15. One condemned on account of a defamatory poem will be disqualified from bearing witness. Likewise: § 16. If the matter requires, not only private persons but also magistrates, if they are present, shall give testimony. A praetor too ought to give testimony in a judgment concerning a case of adultery. § 17. But if the condition of the matter is such that we are compelled to admit an arena-fighter as a witness, or a similar person, his testimony is not to be believed without torture. Likewise, [law 24]: § 18. It was decided that witnesses whom the accuser has produced from his household shall not be questioned. [Law 25.] § 19. Advocates also shall not give testimony in a case in which they provide advocacy; this is also to be observed in agents of business. Likewise, [law 16]:

Part IV. § 20. Those who have spoken falsely or inconsistently, or who have betrayed the testimonies to either party, are fittingly punished by the judges. Likewise, [law 17]: § 21. A father and a son who is in his power, and likewise two brothers who are in the power of the same person, can both become witnesses in the same testament or in the same business, because it does no harm for several witnesses from one household to be employed in another person's business. Likewise, [law 15]: § 22. Whether a hermaphrodite can be employed as a witness to a testament is shown by the quality of the sex which predominates. Likewise, [law 9]: § 23. A father is not a suitable witness for a son, nor a son for a father. [Law 10.] § 24. No one is understood to be a suitable witness in his own matter. Likewise, [law 11]: § 25. Even one who was not asked is understood to be a witness for establishing the credibility of a transaction. Likewise, [law 12]: § 26. Where the number of witnesses is not added, even two will suffice. For a plural expression is satisfied by the number two. Likewise, [law 3]: § 27. Concerning witnesses who speak their testimony straightforwardly, it must be considered whether they bring one and the same rehearsed speech or answer extemporaneously and plausibly the things about which they are questioned. Likewise: § 28. The truth of any matter is often discovered without public records; at one time the number of witnesses, at another their dignity and authority, and at another, as it were, concordant report confirms the credibility of the matter concerning which inquiry is made. Therefore, a judge ought not to bind his cognizance to one kind of proof, but ought to assess according to the judgment of his own mind what he believes or what he considers insufficiently proved to him. Likewise: § 29. The authority of witnesses who are present is one thing; that of testimonies which are customarily recited is another. Likewise, book IV of the Code, under the title On Witnesses, [law 2]: § 30. Witnesses alone do not suffice for proof of free birth unless they are aided by instruments and arguments. Likewise, [law 3]: § 31. Even by civil law the credibility of members of the household is disapproved. Likewise, [law 4]: § 32. It is certain that testimony offered alone, with the case not approved by other lawful supports, is of no moment. Likewise, [law 5]: § 33. Those witnesses ought to be employed to assist the truth who can prefer the credibility owed to judicial solemnity above every favor and power. Likewise, [law 6]: § 34. Parents and children are not to be admitted to testimony against one another even voluntarily. Likewise, [law 7]: § 35. One who makes a claim ought to bring his own proofs for his claim, and not ask that the adversary be compelled to produce those through whom a case may be made for him. Likewise, [law 8]: § 36. Slaves can be questioned neither for nor against their master, but they can be questioned concerning their own deed. Likewise, [law 9]: § 37. Witnesses are constrained by the sanctity of an oath before they offer testimony, and credence is to be given to witnesses of higher standing. § 38. But let no judge in any case readily allow the testimony of one person to be admitted; indeed, the answer of one witness shall not be heard at all, even if he shines with the honor of the governor's court. Likewise, [law 10]: § 39. The laws have removed from everyone the power to give testimony in his own matter. Likewise, [law 11]: § 40. Let free witnesses be summoned for the cases of others if they are not said to be associates and participants in the crime, but their credibility arising from knowledge is sought. But fitting expenses shall be furnished to those coming to the judgment by the accuser or by those through whom they were summoned, even if the witnesses are to be produced by either party in a pecuniary case. Likewise, [law 12]: § 41. Let freedmen not dare to come forward voluntarily against their patrons; indeed, even when summoned, they shall not be compelled to come into judgment. Likewise, [law 17]: § 42. If anyone has used witnesses and the same witnesses are produced against him in another lawsuit, he will not be permitted to except to their persons unless he has shown that enmities later arose between himself and them from which the laws command that witnesses be repelled; his license to impugn their testimony from the depositions themselves, of course, is not to be taken away. § 43. But if he has also shown by clear proofs that they were corrupted by the giving or promise of money, that allegation also ought to be preserved whole for him. [GRATIAN.] But the example of blessed Brice is objected, who was proved innocent by the voice of a boy thirty days from birth. But divine miracles are to be admired, not drawn into an example for human action.

Question IV

GRATIAN. Part I. Concerning the fourth question, Pope Fabian established, [letter II to the Eastern Bishops], saying:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. De quarta uero questione Fabianus Papa [epist. II. ad Episcopos orientales] constituit, dicens:

C. I. No one can be accuser and witness or judge at the same time.

Let no one ever presume to be accuser and judge or witness at the same time, because in every judgment it is always necessary that there be four persons: namely, chosen judges, suitable accusers, fitting defenders, and lawful witnesses. Judges, however, ought to use equity; witnesses, truth; accusers, intention toward enlarging the case; defenders, mitigation toward diminishing the case.

C. I. Accusator, testis uel iudex aliquis simul esse non potest.

Nullus umquam presumat accusator simul esse et iudex uel testis, quoniam in omni iudicio quatuor personas semper esse necesse est, id est iudices electos, et idoneos accusatores, defensores congruos atque legitimos testes. Iudices autem debent uti equitate, testes ueritate, accusatores intentione ad amplificandam causam, defensores extenuatione ad minuendam causam.

C. II. No one can bear two persons in a case.

Likewise Pope Damasus, [letter IV, c. 7]. Let no one be introduced personally into a case, but let accusers and accused persons be heard with equal reason, according to what order requires. But let accusers and judges not be the same persons; rather, let accusers be separate, judges separate, witnesses separate, and accused persons separate, each one in his own order. Part II. § 1. Let a formal inscription always be made so that the calumniator may receive retaliation, because before an inscription no one ought to be judged or condemned, since even the laws of the world maintain these same things. GRATIAN. In book IX of the Code, under the title On Accusations, [law 7]; in the book of the Code On Adulteries, [law 6]; under the title On Cattle Thieves, [sole law]. § 1. Sometimes an accusation can also be made without a formal inscription. "For it is not unknown that those things which are reported to governors by officials can be weighed even without the formalities of accusations." § 2. Likewise, [Code, On Adulteries, law 6]. If a husband wishes to accuse his wife of adultery by a husband's right, that is, within sixty available days, he can make her a defendant from suspicion alone and is not held by the bond of a formal inscription. § 3. Likewise, [Code, On Cattle Thieves, sole law]. An accusation concerning a driven-away animal is presented not only with formal inscriptions but also without that observance. § 4. Likewise, [Code, On Accusations, law 8]. If anyone thinks that he has suffered an injury from another and wishes to bring a complaint, let him not run to the stationarii, but approach the authority of the governor, either offering written petitions or lodging his complaints in the official records. § 5. But in other criminal cases it is fitting that formal inscriptions be set forth first, which designate, namely, the magnitude of the crime and the time, so that the fitting authority of the laws may terrify either party. Part III. GRATIAN. An accuser or witness ought not to be produced from the household of the judge either, lest the judge fall into a cause of suspicion. Hence Pope Nicholas, [to Emperor Michael, in the letter which begins, "We had proposed"]:

> C. II. Quilibet in causa duas personas gerere non ualet.
> Item Damasus Papa. [epist. IV. c. 7.] Nullus introducatur personaliter ad causam, sed accusatores et accusati equa audiantur ratione, iuxta quod ordo exigit. Accusatores uero et iudices non iidem sint, sed per se accusatores, per se iudices, per se testes, per se accusati, unusquisque in suo ordine. II. Pars. §. 1. Inscriptio semper fiat ut talionem calumpniator recipiat, quia ante inscriptionem nemo debet iudicari uel dampnari, cum et seculi leges hec eadem retineant. Gratian. Codice libro IX. titulo de accusationibus. [l. 7.] Codice libro de adulteriis, [l. 6.] titulo de abigeis. [l. unica] §. 1. Aliquando etiam sine inscriptione accusatio fieri potest. "Ea enim, que per officiales presidibus nunciantur, et citra solempnia accusationum posse perpendi incognitum non est." §. 2. Item: [Codice de adulteriis, l. 6.] Si maritus iure mariti, hoc est infra sexaginta dies utiles, adulterium uxoris suae accusare uoluerit, quam ex suspicione sola ream facere ualet, non continetur uinculo inscriptionis. §. 3. Item: [Cod. de abigeis, l. unica] Abacti animalis accusatio non solum cum inscriptionibus, sed etiam sine ea obseruatione proponitur. §. 4. Item: [Cod. de accusat. l. 8.] Si quis se iniuriam ab aliquo passum putauerit, et querelam deferre uoluerit, non ad stationarios decurrat, sed presidialem adeat potestatem, aut libellos offerens, aut querelas suas apud acta deponens. §. 5. In aliis autem criminalibus causis dignum est, ut inscriptiones preponantur, que magnitudinem uidelicet criminis tempusque designent, ut alterutram partem digna legum possit terrere auctoritas. III. Pars. Gratian. De domo etiam iudicis accusator uel testis produci non debet, ne in causam suspicionis incidat iudex. Unde Nicolaus Papa: [ad Michaelem Inp., epistola, cuius initium est: "Proposueramus."]

C. III. A judge from whose household either the accuser or a witness is produced will fall under the charge of suspicion.

Contrary to ecclesiastical custom and the venerable laws, an accuser is produced from the imperial household, and one who can be commanded to give false testimony is employed. The judges become suspect, and wolves become guardians.

> C. III. Suspicionis incidet in crimen iudex, de cuius domo uel accusator uel testis producitur.
> Contra ritum ecclesiasticum, contraque uenerandas leges producitur accusator de inperialibus edibus, et cui inperari potest ad falsum dicendum testimonium adhibetur. Fiunt suspecti iudices, et lupi custodes.

Question V

GRATIAN. Concerning the fifth question, the following is found to have been determined in the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 7]:

> GRATIANUS. De quinta uero questione in Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 7.] sic inuenitur diffinitum:

C. I. One who was unable to arrive for a case on the appointed day is not to be suspended from communion.

Whoever among the bishops is accused, let the accuser refer the case to the primates of that province. Nor shall the person against whom the crime is alleged be suspended from communion unless, after being summoned by letters, he has not appeared before the chosen judges to plead his case on the appointed day, that is, within the space of a month from the day on which it is established that he received the letters. But if he has proved some true causes of necessity by which it is manifest that he was unable to appear, let him have the unimpaired faculty of pleading his case within another month. Nevertheless, after the second month, let him not communicate until he is cleared. But if he has been unwilling to appear at a universal council so that his case may at least be concluded there, let him be judged to have spoken the sentence of condemnation against himself. During the time, to be sure, in which he does not communicate, let him not communicate in his own church or parish either. But if his accuser has never been absent on the days for pleading the case by withdrawing himself, let him not be removed from communion. But if he was at some time absent by withdrawing himself, let the accuser be removed from communion when the bishop has been restored to communion, yet in such a manner that the faculty of prosecuting the case shall not be taken from the accuser himself if he has proved that he was not unwilling but was unable to appear on the appointed day.

> C. I. Non est a communione suspendendus, qui die statuta ad causam peruenire non potuit.
> Quisquis episcoporum accusatur, ad primates prouinciae ipsius causam deferat accusator. Nec a communione suspendatur cui crimen intenditur, nisi ad causam suam dicendam electorum iudicum, die statuta, litteris euocatus minime occurrerit, hoc est infra spatium mensis ex ea die, qua eum litteras accepisse constiterit. Quod aliquas ueras necessitatis causas probauerit, quibus occurrere non potuisse manifestum sit, suae causae dicendae intra alterum mensem integram habeat facultatem. Verum tamdiu post mensem secundum non communicet, donec purgetur. Si autem ad uniuersale concilium occurrere noluerit, ut uel ibi causa eius terminetur, ipse in se dampnationis sententiam dixisse iudicetur. Tempore sane, quo non communicat, nec in sua ecclesia uel parrochia communicet. Accusator autem eius, si numquam diebus causae dicendae defuerit subtrahens se, a communione non remoueatur. Si uero aliquando defuerit subtrahens se, restituto in communione episcopo, remoueatur a communione accusator, ita tamen, ut nec ipsi adimatur facultas causae peragendae, si se ad diem constitutam occurrere non uoluisse, sed non potuisse probauerit.

Question VI

GRATIAN. The sixth question is concluded by the same chapter, in which it follows:

GRATIANUS. Sexta uera questio eodem capitulo terminatur, in quo sequitur:

C. I. One who is found culpable in an accusation of a bishop is admitted to make an accusation only in his own civil business.

It was also decided that, when he has begun to proceed in the judgment of bishops, if the person of the accuser has been found condemnable, he shall thereafter not be admitted to make an accusation unless he wishes to assert his own cases, but not ecclesiastical or criminal ones.

C. I. In ciuili et proprio dumtaxat negotio ad arguendum admittitur, qui in episcopi accusatione culpabilis inuenitur.

Illud uero placuit, ut cum agere ceperit in episcoporum iudicio, si fuerit accusatoris persona dampnabilis de cetero ad arguendum non admittatur, nisi proprias causas, non tamen ecclesiasticas uel criminales, asserere uoluerit.

C. II. One who is not permitted to accuse is able to conduct his own case.

Likewise from the Seventh Council of Carthage, [c. 2, near the end]. The license to accuse in their own cases is not to be denied to all those to whom an accusation is denied.

C. II. Propriam causam agere ualet cui accusare non licet.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi VII. [c. 2. prope finem] Omnibus, quibus accusatio denegatur, in causis propriis accusandi licentia non est neganda.

C. III. One who fails in the accusation of bishops will be able to proceed only civilly.

Likewise Bishop Felix to all Bishops, [established throughout the provinces of Gaul, letter II]. If the persons of accusers have appeared culpable in the judgment of bishops, they shall not be admitted to make an accusation unless they wish to assert their own cases, but not criminal or ecclesiastical ones.

C. III. In accusatione episcoporum deficiens ciuiliter tantum experiri poterit.

Item Felix Episcopus omnibus Episcopis. [per Galliae prouincias constitutis, epistola II.] Si accusatorum personae in episcoporum iudicio culpabiles aparuerint, ad arguendum non admittantur, nisi proprias causas asserere, non tamen criminales uel ecclesiasticas, uoluerint.

[C. IV.]

Likewise Pope Hadrian, [in the capitularies, c. 5]. But if the persons of the accusers in the judgment of the bishops, etc., as above in the same words.

[C. IV.]

Item Adrianus Papa. [in capitulis, c. 5.] Quod si accusatorum personae in iudicio episcoporum etc. ut supra eisdem uerbis.

Causa V

GRATIAN. A written accusation is secretly composed to the infamy of a certain bishop; at length the accuser comes forth in public. The bishop, after being summoned once by letters and being unable to be present for his case on the appointed day, represented himself before the judge through a procurator. He is condemned without a synodal hearing. Finally, when the judgment has been renewed through an appeal, the bishop complains of the accuser's enmity; at length the accuser fails in his proof. (Qu. I.) First it is asked by what penalty one who secretly writes a defamatory libel and neglects to prove what he committed to writing is to be struck. (Qu. II.) Second, how many times he is to be summoned to the case before he receives a sentence of condemnation. (Qu. III.) Third, whether one who cannot be present for his case personally is able to conduct his case through a procurator. (Qu. IV.) Fourth, whether he is to be condemned without a synodal hearing. (Qu. V.) Fifth, whether anyone is to be regarded as an enemy for this reason, that he reports another person's crime. (Qu. VI.) Sixth, by what penalty one who is unable to prove what he alleged is to be punished.

GRATIANUS. In infamiam cuiusdam episcopi cartula accusationis occulte conscribitur; tandem accusator procedit in publicum. Episcopus semel litteris euocatus, causae suae die statuta adesse non ualens, per procuratorem iudici se representauit; absque sinodali audientia dampnatur. Demum iudicio per appellationem renouato, de accusatoris inimicitia episcopus conqueritur; tandem in probatione deficit accusator. (Qu. I.) Primo queritur, qua pena sit feriendus, qui, famosum libellum clanculo scribens, probare negligit que litteris mandauit? (Qu. II.) Secundo, quotiens sit uocandus ad causam ante, quam sententiam dampnationis excipiat? (Qu. III.) Tertio, an per procuratorem causam suam agere ualeat qui per se ipsum causae suae adesse non potest? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, an absque sinodali audientia sit dampnandus? (Qu. V.) Quinto, an ideo aliquis sit habendus inimicus, quia crimen alterius indicat? (Qu. VI.) Sexto, qua pena sit plectendus, qui quod intulit probare non ualet?

Question I

GRATIAN. Concerning the first question Pope Hadrian writes, [in the capitularies, c. 49, otherwise 50], saying:

GRATIANUS. De prima questione Adrianus Papa scribit, [in capitulis, cap. 49. al. 50.] dicens:

C. I. Let one who has neglected to prove writings against another's reputation be flogged.

One who has publicly fabricated a writing or insulting words against another's reputation and, upon being discovered, has not proved the writings shall be flogged; and let the one who first finds it tear it up, if he does not wish to incur liability for the author's deed.

C. I. Flagelletur qui scripta in alterius famam probare neglexerit.

Qui in alterius famam publice scripturam aut uerba contumeliosa confinxerit, et repertus scripta non probauerit, flagelletur, et qui eam prius inuenerit rumpat, si non uult auctoris facti causam incurrere.

C. II. Concerning the same.

Likewise Gregory, [book V, letter 30]. A certain man, filled with the counsel of a malignant spirit, in the silence of night placed in a location of the city a public declaration speaking criminally against Castorius, our notary and representative, and it also asserted to me that he craftily opposed the making of peace. If he does not come forth and publicly confess—whoever he may be who has presumed to do this or who gave his assent to the counsel of so great an iniquity—we decree by the Spirit of God and of our Lord Jesus Christ that he be deprived of participation in His holy body and blood. But if, because he is hidden and because he is unknown, he cannot be subjected to discipline, and, conscious of so great an evil and prohibited, presumes to receive the body and blood of the Lord, let him be struck by the punishment of anathema, so that, as a deceitful and pestiferous man, he may be divided from the body of holy Church. But if, upon entering that same city, he can publicly prove what he said, or, knowing for certain that he cannot demonstrate what he wrote, has openly confessed his error, let him not be deprived of participation in the Lord's body and blood, nor be regarded as estranged from the body of holy Church.

> Item Gregorius. [l. V. epist. 30.] Quidam maligni spiritus consilio repletus, contra Castorium notarium ac responsalem nostrum nocturno silentio in ciuitatis loco contestationem posuit in eius crimine loquentem, mihique etiam asserebat eum de facienda pace callide contradicentem. Qui si non exierit, neque publice confessus fuerit, quisquis ille sit qui hoc agere presumpserit, uel consensum tantae iniquitatis consilio prebuit, ex Dei et Domini nostri Iesu Christi spiritu diffinimus, ut sancti eius corporis ac sanguinis participatione priuatus sit. Sin uero, quia latet, et quoniam nescitur, teneri ad disciplinam non ualet, tanti mali conscius, et prohibitus, corpus et sanguinem Domini percipere presumit, anathematis ultione percutiatur, ut fallax ac pestifer a sanctae ecclesiae corpore sit diuisus. Sin autem in eandem ciuitatem ingressus publice potuerit docere que dixit, uel certe sciens se non posse que scripsit ostendere, errorem suum fuerit aperte confessus, dominici corporis et sanguinis participatione non sit priuatus, neque a sanctae ecclesiae corpore alienus existat.

C. III. Let those who place defamatory libels in a church be anathematized.

Likewise from the Council of Elvira, [c. 52]. Let those who are found to place defamatory libels in a church be anathematized. GRATIAN. In the Code, book IX, title On Defamatory Libels, Emperors Valentinian and Valens: If anyone, unaware of its origin, finds a defamatory libel, whether at home, in public, or in any place whatsoever, let him either destroy it before another finds it or disclose its discovery to no one. But if he does not immediately either destroy those pages or consume them by fire, but has made their force known, let him know that he is to be subjected to a capital sentence as though he were the author of an offense of this kind. Such a libel, however, shall not harm another's reputation.

> C. III. Anathematizentur qui famosos libellos in ecclesia ponunt.
> Item ex Concilio Eliberitano. [c. 52.] Hii qui inuenti fuerint libellos famosos in ecclesia ponere, anathematizentur. [Gratian.] Codice libro IX. titulo de famosis libellis, Inpp. Valentinianus et Valens: Si quis famosum libellum siue domi, siue in publico, siue quocumque loco ignarus repererit, aut corrumpat prius, quam alter inueniat, aut nulli confiteatur inuentum. Sin uero non statim easdem cartulas uel corruperit, uel igni consumpserit, sed uim earum manifestauerit, sciat, se quasi auctorem huiusmodi delicti capitali sententiae subiugandum. Huiusmodi autem libellus alterius opinionem non ledat.

Question II

GRATIAN. The summons of one who is assailed ought to be made not once, but twice and a third time, over a suitable interval, by formal writings. Hence Pope Damasus writes [to Archbishop Stephen, letter III], saying:

GRATIANUS. Vocatio autem eius, qui inpetitur, non semel, sed bis et tertia per congruum spatium rationabilibus scriptis fieri debet. Unde Damasus papa [Stephano Archiepiscopo epist. III.] scribit, dicens:

C. I. The summons to a synod of one who is assailed shall be made in writing and over a suitable interval.

In accordance with the decrees of the Fathers, the canonical summons to a synod of one who is assailed ought to be made by formal writings over a suitable and canonical interval, because, unless he has been canonically summoned at the proper time and in canonical order, although he has come to the assembly because of any necessity whatsoever, he shall in no way answer his plotters unless he has wished to do so voluntarily.

C. I. Vocatio ad sinodum eius, qui inpetitur, in scriptis, et per spatium fiat congruum.

Vocatio ad sinodum iuxta decreta Patrum canonica eius, qui inpetitur, rationabilibus scriptis per spatium debet fieri congruum atque canonicum, quia, nisi canonice uocatus fuerit suo tempore et canonica ordinatione, licet uenerit ad conuentum quacumque necessitate, nisi sponte uoluerit, nullatenus suis respondebit insidiatoribus.

C. II. At what intervals of time a defendant is to be summoned to a case.

Likewise Pope Sylvester. By the present decree we determine that first they be summoned in a paternal manner and be awaited for seven days, with permission for no ecclesiastical matter being forbidden. To this period of waiting let another seven days be added, with permission to enter a church and to hear all the divine offices being forbidden. Afterward let two days be added, during which they are to be suspended from the peace and communion of holy Church. Then let them be carried through yet another two days under the same period of waiting. When one day has been added to these, with all waiting now as it were despaired of, let the defendant immediately be struck with the sword of anathema.

C. II. Quibus temporum spatiis reus uocetur ad causam.

Item Siluester Papa. Presenti decreto censemus, ut inprimis paternaliter uocentur, et per septem dies expectentur, nullius ecclesiasticae rei interdicta licentia. Huic uero expectationi iterum addantur dies septem, interdicta licentia ecclesiam intrandi et omnia diuina offitia audiendi. Post uero adiciantur duo dies, quibus a pace et communione sanctae ecclesiae sint suspensi. Deinde uero iterum aliis duobus diebus sub eadem expectatione deportentur. Quibus uno die superaddito, omni expectatione ueluti iam desperata, reus mox anathematis gladio feriatur.

C. III. No one's accusation shall be received through writings.

Likewise Pope Damasus, [to the Bishops of Italy, letter VI]. It has been reported to the apostolic see that you receive accusations against the brethren through writings without a lawful accuser. By apostolic authority we prohibit this from being done henceforth throughout the whole world, and we take care to correct without any delay what has recently been done; nor are the cases of those who are accused ever to be examined first through writings, before, summoned canonically to a synod upon the formal institution of the complainants, they come, and one who is present truly recognizes and understands from another who is present what things are charged against him. § 1. For secular laws require accusers to be present, and not absent through writings. Hence the canonical enactments of the Fathers proclaim not once but very often that no one can offer accusations or testimony through writings, nor may any persons give testimony concerning other matters except concerning those which are known to have been done in their presence. Likewise, one who has chosen to accuse another shall accuse in person by himself and not through another, a formal inscription of the charge having, of course, first been made. Nor shall anyone ever be judged before he has lawful accusers present and receives an opportunity to defend himself in order to wash away the charges. Care must also be taken lest anger steal upon anyone and cause him very quickly to do everything that is unlawful.

> C. III. Nullius accusatio per scripta suscipiatur.
> Item Damasus Papa. [ad Episcopos Italiae, epist. VI.] Relatum est ad sedem apostolicam, uos accusationes fratrum per scripta suscipere absque legitimo accusatore. Quod deinceps in omni terrarum orbe fieri apostolica auctoritate prohibemus, et quod nuper factum est absque ulla retardatione corrigere curamus, nec umquam prius per scripta eorum, qui accusantur, causas discutere quam per querelantium institutionem uocati canonice ad sinodum ueniant, et presens per presentem agnoscat ueraciter et intelligat que ei obiciuntur. §. 1. Leges enim seculi accusatores presentes exigunt, et non per scripta absentes. Unde canonica Patrum constituta non semel, sed sepissime clamant, nec accusationes, nec testimonia ullum per scripta proferre posse, nec de aliis negotiis quicumque testimonium dicant, nisi de his, que sub eorum presentia acta esse noscuntur. Similiter et qui accusare alium elegerit presens per se, et non per alium accuset, inscriptione uidelicet premissa. Neque ullus umquam iudicetur ante, quam accusatores legitimos presentes habeat, locumque defendendi accipiat ad abluenda crimina. Curandum quoque est, ne ira cuiquam subripiat, faciatque citius omne quod non licet.

C. IV. Those expelled by force or fear, or despoiled of their possessions, shall not be summoned to a synod.

Likewise Pope Felix [II] to Athanasius and all the Eastern Bishops, [letter I, c. 3]. If the primates have been wholly unable to make peace familiarly between the accusers of bishops and those bishops, then at the lawful time let them canonically summon the bishops to a canonically convened synod, not within narrow periods of time, and not before they signify to them by writings what is charged against them, so that they may come prepared to answer. For if they have either been expelled by force or fear or despoiled of their possessions, they can neither be canonically summoned to a synod nor ought they to answer their rivals before they are canonically restored and all their property is lawfully returned to them. GRATIAN. By these authorities it is most plainly given to be understood that, unless someone has been canonically summoned, even if he comes to a synod for some occasion, he is in no way compelled to answer his plotters. A summons is canonical, however, when, after the interval of days has been observed according to the authority of blessed Sylvester, he is ordered by letters to be present for his case, in which, by the authority of Pope Felix, it is necessary that what is charged against him be signified to him.

> Item Felix Papa [II.] Athanasio, et omnibus orientalibus Episcopis. [epist. I. c. 3.] Si primates accusatores episcoporum cum eis pacificare familiariter minime potuerint, tunc tempore legitimo eos ad sinodum canonice conuocatam non infra angusta tempora canonice conuocent, et non prius, quam eis per scripta significent quid eis opponitur, ut ad responsionem preparati adueniant. Nam si aut ui, aut timore eiecti, aut suis rebus expoliati fuerint, nec canonice uocari ad sinodum possunt, nec respondere emulis debent ante, quam canonice restituantur, et sua omnia eis legaliter reddantur. Gratian. His auctoritatibus euidentissime datur intelligi, quod nisi quis canonice uocatus fuerit, etiamsi aliqua occasione ad sinodum ueniat, suis nullatenus cogitur respondere insidiatoribus. Canonica autem uocatio est, quando seruato dierum interstitio, secundum auctoritatem B. Siluestri, causae suae litteris adesse iubetur, quibus quid ei obiciatur auctoritate Felicis Papae significari oportet.

Question III

GRATIAN. That one who is impeded and is unable to be present for his case can conduct his case through a procurator appears to be proved by the authority of the Roman Synod celebrated in the time of Pope Hadrian, in which [c. 5] it is read to have been enacted thus:

> GRATIANUS. Quod autem per procuratorem causam suam agere ualeat qui inpeditus causae suae adesse non ualet, auctoritate Romanae Sinodi, que tempore Adriani Papae celebrata est, probari uidetur, in qua [c. 5.] sic statutum legitur:

C. I. Let one whom grave necessity presses send a legate for himself to a synod.

If a bishop is ill, or some grave necessity detains him, let him send a legate for himself to the synod; and let one against whom a charge is directed not be suspended from communion unless, summoned by letters to plead his case on the day appointed by the chosen judges, he has failed to appear—that is, unless an extraneous necessity has forestalled him—within the space of two or three months, or longer, as the case shall dictate. GRATIAN. In book IX of the Code, title On Accusations and Formal Inscriptions, [law 3], Emperor Alexander: The laws governing public trials permit absent defendants charged with capital crimes to be defended even through procurators. GRATIAN. § 1. Behold, a bishop, if he is impeded and unable to be present for his case, is ordered to send a legate for himself to the synod. But this legate is sent not to conduct the case, but to explain to the synod the necessity by which the impeded bishop was unable to present himself to the synod. No one, however, is permitted to conduct a case, especially a criminal one, except in person. Hence Pope Hadrian [c. 38] says:

> C. I. Pro se legatum ad sinodum mittat quem grauis necessitas premit.
> Si egrotans fuerit episcopus, aut aliqua eum grauis necessitas detinuerit, pro se legatum ad sinodum mittat, nec a communione suspendatur cui crimen intenditur, nisi ad causam suam dicendam, electorum iudicum die statuta litteris euocatus, minime occurrerit, hoc est (nisi aliena preoccupauerit necessitas) infra spatium duorum uel trium mensium, uel eo amplius, prout causa dictauerit. [Gratian.] Codicis libro IX. titulo de accusationibus et inscriptionibus [l. 3.] Inp. Alexander: Reos capitalium criminum absentes etiam per procuratores defendi leges publicorum iudiciorum permittunt. Gratian. §.

1. Ecce episcopus si inpeditus et causae suae adesse non ualens, legatum pro se iubetur mittere ad sinodum. Sed legatus iste non ad causam agendam, sed ad necessitatem sinodo exponendam mittitur, qua inpeditus episcopus sinodo presentiam suam exhibere non ualuit. Causam autem (maxime criminalem) nulli nisi per se agere licet. Unde Adrianus Papa [c. 38.] ait:

C. II. One who accuses criminally, or is accused, shall litigate in person.

In criminal cases neither can an accuser accuse anyone except in person, nor is the accused permitted to defend himself through another person.

C. II. Criminaliter accusans uel accusatus per se experiatur.

In criminalibus causis nec accusator, nisi per se, aliquem accusare potest, nec accusatus per aliam personam se defendere permittitur.

C. III. In all cases except criminal ones, bishops and priests shall have an advocate for themselves.

Likewise Pope Anacletus. Because a bishop and all priests are appointed solely for the praise of God and the performance of good works, each of them ought to have an advocate, both for ecclesiastical actions and also for his own—except, of course, in a public criminal charge—one found to be neither suspect because of an evil reputation, but of good repute and praiseworthy skill, lest, while they attend to human gains, they lose eternal rewards.

C. III. In omnibus causis, preterquam in criminalibus, episcopi et sacerdotes pro se aduocatum habeant.

Item Anacletus Papa. Quia episcopus uniuersique sacerdotes ad solam laudem Dei bonorumque operum actionem constituuntur, debet unusquisque eorum tam pro ecclesiasticis, quam etiam pro suis actionibus (excepto publico uidelicet crimine) habere aduocatum, non malae famae suspectum, sed bonae opinionis et laudabilis artis inuentum, ne, dum humana lucra attendunt, eterna premia perdant.

Question IV

GRATIAN. That he ought not to be condemned without a synodal hearing is proved by the authority of Pope Julius, who says [letter I]:

GRATIANUS. Quod autem absque sinodali audientia dampnari non debeat auctoritate Iulii Papae probatur, qui [epist. I.] ait:

C. I. A bishop ought neither to be judged nor heard except in a lawful synod.

Let no bishop assailed concerning certain criminal charges be heard, judged, or condemned except in a lawful synod convened at its proper time by apostolic authority. But if anything has been presumed otherwise by certain persons, let what they have done be reduced to nothing and in no way be reckoned among ecclesiastical statutes.

C. I. Nisi in legitima sinodo episcopus iudicari uel audiri non debet.

Nullus episcopus, nisi in legitima sinodo et suo tempore apostolica auctoritate conuocata, super quibusdam criminationibus pulsatus audiatur, uel iudicetur uel dampnetur. Sin aliter presumptum a quibusdam fuerit, in uanum deducatur quod egerint, nec inter ecclesiastica statuta ullo modo reputetur.

C. II. An accused bishop shall be heard by twelve, but the conclusion of the case shall be referred to the apostolic see.

Likewise Zephyrinus, Bishop of the city of Rome, to all Bishops, [letter I]. If it is necessary, let every accused bishop choose twelve judges by whom his case is to be judged; nor shall he be heard, excommunicated, or judged before they are chosen by him personally and, after he has been regularly summoned to the assembly first of his own bishops, his case is justly heard and reasonably decided by them. But the conclusion of his case shall be referred to the apostolic see, so that it may be terminated there, and it shall not be concluded before it is supported by its authority. GRATIAN. That a bishop is prohibited from being condemned without a synodal hearing must be understood without prejudice to the Roman see, which by its own authority is able to condemn any persons or absolve those condemned. Hence Gelasius: “They themselves are the canons, etc.” below, in the cause: “Marked by a sentence of excommunication.” § 1. Likewise Hadrian, [c. 8]: “With the primacy of the Roman Church preserved in all things, it is manifest that the synod of each province shall administer those things which are within that province, as is established to have been decreed in the Council of Nicaea.” But when the accused has come to the council, whatever is transacted in the deliberations of those sitting or is proposed by the accusing party shall be put forward not with contentious voices but with a most gentle account of words. Hence it is read in the Eleventh Council of Toledo, [c. 1]:

C. II. Episcopus accusatus a duodecim audiatur, finis uero causae ad apostolicam sedem deferatur.

Item Zepherinus Urbis Romae Episcopus [epist. I.] omnibus Episcopis. Duodecim iudices quilibet episcopus accusatus, si necesse fuerit, eligat, a quibus eius causa iudicetur, nec prius audiatur, aut excommunicetur uel iudicetur, quam ipsi per se eligantur, et regulariter uocatus ad suorum conuentum primo episcoporum, per eos eius causa iuste audiatur, et rationabiliter discernatur. Finis uero eius causae ad sedem apostolicam deferatur, ut ibidem terminetur, nec ante finiatur, quam eius auctoritate fulciatur. Gratian. Quod uero absque sinodali audientia episcopus dampnari prohibetur, sine preiudicio Romanae sedis intelligi oportet, que sua auctoritate quosque ualet dampnare uel dampnatos absoluere. Unde Gelasius: "Ipsi sunt canones etc." infra causa: "Sententia excommunicationis notatus." §. 1. Item Adrianus: [c. 8.] "Saluo Romanae ecclesiae in omnibus primatu, manifestum est, quod illa, que sunt per unamquamque prouinciam ipsius prouinciae sinodus dispenset, sicut Niceno constat esse decretum concilio." Cum uero accusatus ad concilium uenerit, quicquid considentium consultationibus agitur, aut ab accusantium parte proponitur, non contentiosis uocibus, sed mitissima uerborum relatione proferatur. Unde in Tolletano Concilio XI. [c. I.] legitur:

C. III. Contentious persons shall have no place in the cognizance of cases.

While the Lord's priests are sitting in the place of blessing, no one ought either to make a clamor with indiscreet voices or to disturb it with any tumults; no one is even to be occupied with vain tales or laughter, or—which is worse—to pour forth tumultuous voices in obstinate disputes. “For if anyone,” as the Apostle says, “thinks himself to be religious, not bridling his tongue but deceiving his heart, this man's religion is vain.” For justice loses its worship when the whirlwind of those making a clamor confounds the silences of judgment, as the Prophet says: “The worship of justice shall be silence.” Therefore, whatever is transacted in the deliberations of those sitting or is proposed by the accusing party ought to be put forward with such a most gentle account of words that neither may contentious voices disturb the understanding of the hearers nor may they weaken the vigor of judgment by tumult. Therefore, whoever in the assembly of a council believes that he may violate these things set forth above, and disturbs the council contrary to these prohibitions by tumult, insults, or laughter, in accordance with the edict of divine law which commands, "Cast out the scoffer, and contention shall go out with him," let him, dragged from the session with every disgrace, withdraw from the common assembly and bear a sentence of excommunication for three days.

> C. III. In cognitione causarum contentiosi locum non habeant.
> In loco benedictionis considentes Domini sacerdotes nullus debet aut indiscretis uocibus perstrepere, aut quibuslibet tumultibus perturbare, nullus etiam uana fabulis uel risibus agi, et (quod est deterius) obstinatis disceptationibus tumultuosas uoces effundere. "Si quis enim (ut Apostolus ait) putat se religiosum esse, non refrenans linguam suam, sed seducens cor suum, huius uana est religio." Cultum enim suum iustitia perdit, quando silentia iudicii obstrepentium turbo confundit, dicente Propheta: "Erit cultus iustitiae silentium." Debet ergo quicquid aut considentium consultationibus agitur, aut ab accusantium parte proponitur, sic mitissima uerborum relatione proferri, ut nec contentiosis uocibus sensus audientium turbent, nec iudicii uigorem de tumultu eneruent. Quicumque ergo in conuentu concilii hec, que premissa sunt, uiolanda crediderit, et contra hec interdicta aut tumultu, aut contumeliis uel risibus concilium perturbauerit, iuxta diuinae legis edictum, que precipit: "Eice derisorem, et exibit cum eo iurgium," cum omni dedecore de consessione abstractus a communi cetu secedat, et trium dierum excommunicationis sententiam ferat.

Question V

GRATIAN. But now it is asked whether anyone is to be judged malicious because he reports another's crime. Concerning this Augustine writes thus, [sermon III On the Common Life of Clerics, or rule 3, saying]:

> GRATIANUS. Nunc autem queritur, an sit aliquis iudicandus maliuolus, quia crimen alterius indicat. De hoc ita scribit Augustinus: [serm. III. de communi uita clericorum, seu regula 3., dicens]

C. I. One who conceals a crime does more harm than one who reports it amicably.

Do not judge yourselves malicious because you report another's crime. Indeed, you are more harmful if, by keeping silent, you permit your brothers—whom you can correct by reporting them—to perish. For if your brother has a wound in his body which he wishes to be concealed because he fears its being cut, is it not cruelly kept silent by you and mercifully reported? How much more, therefore, ought you to disclose it, lest it putrefy more grievously in the heart?

> C. I. Magis nocet qui crimen celat quam qui amicabiliter indicat.
> Non uos iudicetis maliuolos, quoniam crimen alterius indicatis. Magis quippe nocentes estis, quam si fratres uestros, quos indicando corrigere potestis, tacendo perire permittitis. Si enim frater tuus uulnus habet in corpore, quod uelit occultari, cum timet secari, nonne crudeliter a te siletur et misericorditer indicatur? quanto ergo potius debes manifestare, ne deterius putrescat in corde?

C. II. Neither is one who spares a friend, nor one who strikes an enemy.

The same to Vincentius, a Donatist and Rogatist, [letter XLVIII]. Not everyone who spares is a friend, nor is everyone who strikes an enemy. "The wounds of a friend are better than the voluntary kisses of an enemy." It is better to love with severity than to deceive with gentleness. § 1. Bread is more usefully taken away from a hungry person if, secure concerning food, he was neglecting justice, than bread is broken for a hungry person so that, seduced, he may acquiesce in injustice. § 2. Both one who binds a madman and one who rouses a lethargic person are troublesome to both and love both. § 3. Who can love us more than God? And yet He does not cease not only to teach us gently but also to frighten us beneficially. To the gentle fomentations by which He consoles us He often also joins the most biting medicine of tribulation; He exercises the patriarchs, even the pious and religious, by hunger; He drives a contumacious people with graver punishments; when the Apostle asks three times, He does not remove from him the thorn of the flesh, so that virtue may be perfected in infirmity. And below: § 4. You should know that at times a thief scatters fodder to turn cattle away, and at times a shepherd recalls wandering cattle to the flock with a whip.

> C. II. Nec qui parcit est amicus, nec qui uerberat inimicus.
> Idem ad Vincentium Donatistam et Rogatistam. [epist. XLVIII.] Non omnis, qui parcit, amicus est, nec omnis, qui uerberat, inimicus. "Meliora sunt uulnera amici quam uoluntaria oscula inimici." Melius est cum seueritate diligere quam cum lenitate decipere. §. 1. Utilius esurienti panis tollitur, si de cibo securus iustitiam negligebat, quam esurienti panis frangitur, ut iniustitiae seductus acquiescat. §. 2. Et qui freneticum ligat, et qui lethargicum excitat, ambobus molestus ambos amat. §. 3. Quis nos potest amplius amare quam Deus? Et tamen nos non solum docere suauiter, uerum etiam salubriter terrere non cessat. Fomentis lenibus, quibus consolatur, sepe etiam mordacissimum medicamentum tribulationis adiungit, exercet fame patriarchas, etiam pios et religiosos; populum contumacem penis grauioribus agitat; non aufert ab Apostolo stimulum carnis tertio rogatus, ut uirtutem in infirmitate perficiat. Et infra: §. 4. Noueris aliquando furem auertendis pecoribus pabulum spargere, et pastorem aliquando flagello ad gregem pecora errantia reuocare.

C. III. One who is chastised and corrected is not held in hatred but is loved.

Likewise from the sermon [LXXXIV] of Ambrose, "Perhaps More Bitter." A father does not always kiss his son, but sometimes chastises him. Therefore, when one who is loved is chastised, then dutiful affection is exercised toward him. For love too has its own wounds, which are sweeter when they are inflicted more bitterly. For religious chastisement is sweeter than flattering remission. Hence the Prophet says: "The wounds of a friend are sweeter than the voluntary kisses of an enemy." GRATIAN. From these words it is given to be understood that one who pursues a crime by accusing or judging has contributed more to a brother's benefit than one who strives to foster it by concealing it. Eusebius, however, appears to enact the contrary when he prohibits those who voluntarily confess the crimes of others from being received in the accusation of bishops, saying [letter I to the Bishops of Gaul]:

> C. III. Non odio habetur, sed diligitur, qui castigatur et corripitur.
> Item ex sermone [LXXXIV.] Ambrosii, "Amarior fortasse." Non osculatur pater filium semper sed aliquando castigat. Ergo quando castigatur qui diligitur, tunc circa eum pietas exercetur. Habet enim et amor plagas suas, que dulciores sunt, cum amarius inferuntur. Dulcior est enim castigatio religiosa quam blanda remissio. Unde ait Propheta: "Dulciora sunt uulnera amici quam uoluntaria oscula inimici." Gratian. Ex his uerbis datur intelligi, quod magis contulerit utilitati fraternae, qui crimen accusando uel iudicando persequitur, quam qui celando fouere nititur. Eusebius autem contra statuere uidetur, dum aliorum crimina sponte confitentes in episcoporum accusatione recipi prohibet dicens: [epist. I. ad Episcopos Galliae]

C. IV. Those who voluntarily confess the crimes of others shall not be admitted to an accusation.

Those who are suspect either in the Catholic faith or because of enmity shall not be admitted to the accusation of bishops. Nor shall those who voluntarily confess the crimes of others. And therefore the truth, brought forth voluntarily, must be carefully elicited anew, though it cannot have a voice in them. A religious torturer ought to exact this truth from its hiding places by diverse tortures, so that, while bodies are subjected to punishments, the things that were done may be faithfully and truthfully investigated.

C. IV. Ad accusationem non admittantur aliorum crimina sponte confitentes.

Illi, qui aut in fide catholica, aut inimicitia suspecti sunt, ad pulsationem episcoporum non admittantur. Nec illi, qui aliorum sponte crimina confitentur. Et ideo replicanda sollicite est ueritas, quam sponte prolata in illis habere uox non potest. Hanc diuersis cruciatibus e latebris suis religiosus tortor exigere debet, ut dum penis corpora subiciuntur, que gesta sunt fideliter et ueraciter exquirantur.

C. V. Concerning the same.

Likewise in Proverbs, [c. 11]. One who walks deceitfully reveals secrets; but one who is faithful conceals what was committed to his mind. And below, [c. 25]: § 1. Do not quickly bring forth in a quarrel what your eyes have seen, lest afterward you be unable to make amends when you have dishonored your friend. GRATIAN. But it is one thing to report the crimes of others out of charity, so that those whom we cannot correct by a secret admonition may, once convicted, be corrected by a judge's sentence, and another thing either to charge false things by plotting or readily to reproach true things by taunting. The former is an office of charity, but the latter of impiety. § 1. Hence it is said in the same Proverbs, [c. 12]: “The words of the impious lie in wait for blood; the mouth of the just shall deliver them.” And below: “One who speaks what he knows is a judge of justice; but one who lies is a deceitful witness.” Likewise: “The lip of truth shall be steadfast forever; but one who is a sudden witness fashions a tongue of falsehood.” Likewise, [c. 13]: “One who guards his mouth guards his soul; but one who is inconsiderate in speaking shall experience evils. The just man will detest a lying word; but the impious man confounds and shall be confounded.” § 2. Likewise Augustine on Psalm 34: “If at any time through human infirmity our feet are moved into some sin, the most iniquitous tongues of our enemies rise up; when pity ought to have been shown, the impious ridicule that for which the pious grieve.”

C. V. De eodem.

Item in Prouerbiis. [c. 11.] Qui ambulat fraudulenter, reuelat archana; qui autem fidelis est, celat animi commissum. Et infra: [c. 25.] §. 1. Que uiderunt oculi tui ne proferas in iurgio cito, ne postea emendare non possis, cum dehonestaueris amicum tuum. Gratian. Sed aliud est ex karitate aliorum crimina deferre, ut quos secreta ammonitione corrigere non possumus conuictos iudicis sententia corripiat, atque aliud insidiando falsa obicere, uel insultando uera facile exprobrare. Illud autem karitatis, hoc uero inpietatis est offitium. §. 1. Unde in eisdem prouerbiis [cap. 12.] dicitur: "Verba inpiorum insidiantur sanguini: os iustorum liberabit eos." Et infra: "Qui quod nouit loquitur, iudex iustitiae est: qui autem mentitur, testis est fraudulentus." Item: "Labium ueritatis firmum erit in perpetuum: qui autem testis est repentinus, concinnat linguam mendacii." Item: [c. 13.] "Qui custodit os suum, custodit animam suam: qui autem inconsideratus est ad loquendum, sentiet mala. Verbum mendax iustus detestabitur: inpius autem confundit et confundetur." §. 2. Item Augustinus in Psalmo 34.: "Si aliquando humana infirmitate pedes nostri in aliquod peccatum mouentur, insurgunt linguae iniquissimae inimicorum; cum fuisset miserendum, irrident inpii, unde dolent pii."

Question VI

GRATIAN. Part I. One who cannot prove what he has charged is to be punished. Hence Pope Hadrian says, [in the capitularies, c. 41]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Qui autem quod intulit probare non ualet, puniendus est. Unde Adrianus Papa ait: [in capitulis, c. 41.]

C. I. Let one who has charged false things against others be punished.

Everyone who has charged false things against others shall be punished and, on account of the falsity, shall bear infamy.

C. I. Puniatur qui aliis falsa intulerit.

Omnis, qui aliis falsa intulerit, puniatur, et pro falsitate ferat infamiam.

C. II. Concerning the same.

Likewise Gregory. One who does not prove an inflicted calumny ought to incur the penalty which the defendant would certainly have sustained if he had proved it.

C. II. De eodem.

Item Gregorius. Qui calumpniam illatam non probat, penam debet incurrere, quam, si probasset, reus utique sustineret.

C. III. With what penalty one who does not prove a charged crime is to be struck.

The same in the Register. Because, according to the canonical opinions of the Fathers, one who does not prove an inflicted calumny ought to incur a penalty, and because by this principle a subdeacon could not prove a crime against a deacon, since he did not have the imposition of the hand—which he could have been deprived of—he lacked not only priesthood but office and deserved to be chastised with blows as truly infamous. For since any crime is proved against a layman by three witnesses, it is not surprising if, when he is unable to prove what he charged, he is subjected by analogy of law to bodily infamy in the same manner as a layman. For what it would have been for a deacon to lose his grade, this it was for a subdeacon to have lacked fullness of reputation. In book I of the Code, title On Bishops and Clerics, [law 8], Emperor Theodosius:

Part II. § 1. Let priests give testimony without the injury of interrogations, yet in such a way that they do not fabricate false things. But let the other clerics who follow their grade or order, if they have been requested to give testimony, be heard as the laws command. Nevertheless, let an action for falsity remain available to litigants if perhaps priests—who in their own name have been commanded to give the testimony of a higher station without any bodily injury—have suppressed true things for the very reason that they fear nothing. For those upon whom very great honor has been conferred through our command are much more deserving of punishment if they are found in a hidden crime. In the same, book IX, in collation IX: § 2. If priests and deacons have given false testimony, then, if it was in a pecuniary matter, let them be delivered to a monastery, separated from divine ministry only for twelve years; if in a criminal matter, let them, stripped of clerical honor, be subjected to the lawful penalties. Let the other clerics be lawfully coerced without distinction of the case.

> Idem in Registro. Quia iuxta canonicas Patrum sententias qui calumpniam illatam non probat penam debet incurrere, ac per hoc, quia subdiaconus crimen diacono probare non potuit, quoniam inpositionem manus (qua carere potuisset) non habuit, non solum sacerdotio, sed offitio caruit, et tamquam reuera infamis meruit uerberibus castigari. Nam cui cum tribus testibus ueluti laico crimen quodlibet approbatur, non est mirum, quod obiecit dum probare non sufficit, si corporali infamiae quemadmodum laicus ex iuris similitudine subiugatur. Quod enim esset diacono gradum amittere, hoc fuit subdiacono famae plenitudine caruisse. Codice libro I., titulo de episcopis et clericis, [l. 8.] Inperator Theodosius:
> II. Pars. §. 1. Presbiteri citra iniuriam questionum testimonium dicant, ita tamen, ut falsa non simulent. Ceteri uero clerici, qui eorundem gradum uel ordinem secuntur, si ad testimonium dicendum petiti fuerint, prout leges precipiunt, audiantur. Salua tamen sit litigatoribus falsi actio, si forte presbiteri, qui suo nomine superioris loci testimonium dicere citra aliquam corporalem iniuriam sunt precepti, hoc ipso, quod nichil metuunt, uera suppresserint. Multo magis etenim pena sunt digni, quibus cum plurimum honoris per nostram iussionem delatum est occulto inueniuntur in crimine. Eadem IX. in collatione IX.: §. 2. Presbiteri, diaconi, si falsum testimonium dixerint, si quidem in re pecuniaria, diuino ministerio dumtaxat per XII. annos separati monasterio tradantur: si in criminali, clericatus honore nudati legitimis penis subiciantur. Ceteri clerici sine delectu causae legitime coherceantur.

C. IV. One who does not prove a charged crime shall not approach the ministry of holy communion.

The same to Bishop Januarius, [book III, letter 24]. Part III. Epiphanius the priest, criminally accused by the letters of certain priests, whose case we examined as we were able and, finding none of the things charged in him, we absolved so that he might return to his own place. Therefore, we wish you to investigate the authors of the charge against him; and unless the one who transmitted that letter is prepared to demonstrate what he charged by canonical and most rigorous proofs, let him in no way approach the ministry of holy communion.

> Idem Ianuario Episcopo. [lib. III. ep. 24.] III. Pars. Epiphanium presbiterum quorumdam sacerdotum litteris criminaliter accusatum, cuius nos, ut ualuimus, causam discutientes, nichilque in eo obiectorum reperientes, ut ad locum suum reuerteretur absoluimus. Criminis ergo eius auctores uolumus te perscrutari, et nisi qui eandem transmisit epistolam paratus fuerit hoc, quod obiecit, canonicis atque districtissimis probationibus edocere, nullatenus ad sanctae communionis ministerium accedat.

C. V. With what penalty an informer is to be struck.

Likewise from a decree of Pope Hadrian, [c. 49]. Let the tongue of an informer be cut off, or, upon his conviction, let his head be cut off. § 1. Informers, however, are those who betray others out of envy.

[PALEA.

C. V. Qua pena feriendus sit delator.

Item ex decreto Adriani Papae. [cap. 49.] Delatori autem lingua capuletur, aut conuicto caput amputetur. §. 1. Delatores autem sunt qui inuidia produnt alios.

[PALEA.

C. VI. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Elvira. If any informer has been a member of the faithful and someone has been proscribed or killed through his informing, it was resolved that he receive communion only at the end. If the case was less serious, he will be able to receive communion within five years. If he was a catechumen, let him be admitted to baptism after a period of five years.]

C. VI. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Eliberitano. Delator si quis extiterit fidelis, et per delationem eius aliquis fuerit proscriptus uel interfectus, placuit, non nisi in fine accipere communionem. Si leuior causa fuerit, infra quinquennium accipere poterit communionem. Si catecuminus fuerit, post quinquennii tempora admittatur ad baptismum.]

C. VII. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Eighth Synod. If anyone has spoken falsely or stained the person of an innocent man with a false crime, let him be purified by a long penance according to the priest's judgment.

C. VII. De eodem.

Item ex VIII. Sinodo. Si quis falsum dixerit, uel personam innocentis falso crimine maculauerit, iuxta sacerdotis arbitrium diuturna penitentia expurgetur.

C. VIII. A secular or lay person who has wearied a church or cleric through calumny shall be restrained from communion.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 32]. If any of the secular persons has presumed through calumny to weary a church or cleric and has been convicted, let him be restrained from the thresholds of the church and the communion of Catholics unless he has worthily done penance.

C. VIII. A communione coherceatur secularis, uel laicus qui ecclesiam uel clericum per calumpniam fatigauerit.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 32.] Si quis uero secularium per calumpniam ecclesiam aut clericum fatigare presumpserit et conuictus fuerit, ab ecclesiae liminibus et catholicorum communione, nisi digne penituerit, coherceatur.

Causa VI

GRATIAN. Two fornicators, marked by infamy, endeavor to accuse a certain religious bishop of simony; the defendant seeks the judgment of the archbishop of another province; at length the accuser fails in proof; the defendant is compelled to an assertion of his own innocence. (Qu. I.) First it is asked whether those ensnared by crime or marked by infamy are to be admitted to an accusation of this kind. (Qu. II.) Second, if the bishop wishes to turn the accusation against them, whether credence is to be given to his simple assertion. (Qu. III.) Third, whether it is lawful for him to seek the judgment of the archbishop of another province. (Qu. IV.) Fourth, whose judgment he is to seek if the bishops of his province happen to disagree concerning their sentence. (Qu. V.) Fifth, if the accuser fails in proof, whether the defendant is to be compelled to proof of his innocence.

> GRATIANUS. Duo fornicatores et infamia notati quendam religiosum episcopum de symonia accusare nituntur; reus alterius prouinciae archiepiscopi iudicium expetit; tandem in probatione deficit accusator; reus cogitur ad innocentiae suae assertionem. (Qu. I.) Primo queritur, an crimine irretiti uel infamia notati ad huiusmodi accusationem sint admittendi? (Qu. II.) Secundo, si episcopus in eos accusationem uertere uoluerit, an simplici assertioni suae sit fides habenda? (Qu. III.) Tertio, si liceat sibi expetere iudicium archiepiscopi alterius prouinciae? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, cuius iudicium sibi sit expetendum, si circa suam sententiam episcopos suae prouinciae discordare contigerit? (Qu. V.) Quinto, si in probatione deficit accusator, an reus sit cogendus ad probationem innocentiae suae?

Question I

GRATIAN. Part I. That those ensnared by crime cannot accuse others is attested by Pope Anacletus, [letter II to the Bishops of Italy], saying:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem crimine irretiti alios accusare non possunt, Anacletus Papa testatur, [epistola II., Episcopis Italiae] dicens:

C. I. A priest is not permitted to be accused by criminals.

If it is commanded that a priest be chosen without crime, he is in no way permitted to be accused or calumniated by criminals, nor by any other persons than those who are without crime, who can be ordained priests by a just election, and who are found in all things to be such as those commanded to be chosen as priests.

> C. I. A criminosis sacerdos accusari non permittitur.
> Si sacerdos sine crimine eligi precipitur, nullatenus a criminosis accusari aut calumpniari permittitur, nec ab aliis, quam ab his, qui sine crimine sunt, et iusta electione sacerdotes ordinari possunt, et tales per omnia inueniuntur, quales eligi sacerdotes iubentur.

C. II. Infamous persons, and those who on account of their faults cannot be advanced to the priesthood, shall not accuse priests.

Likewise Pope Hadrian, [in the capitularies, c. 21]. We say that all those whom secular laws call infamous are indeed infamous, as are all who, because their faults demand it, cannot be advanced to the priesthood. For it is unworthy that those who cannot be what these men themselves are should accuse them, because, just as greater persons are not judged by lesser ones, so neither can they be criminally charged by them.

> C. II. Infames et qui culpis exigentibus ad sacerdotium prouehi non possunt sacerdotes non accusent.
> Item Adrianus Papa. [in capitulis, cap. 21.] Omnes uero infames esse dicimus, quos leges seculi infames appellant, et omnes, qui culpis exigentibus ad sacerdotium non possunt prouehi. Indignum enim est, ut illi eos accusent, qui esse non possunt quod ipsi sunt, quoniam sicut maiores a minoribus non iudicantur, ita nec criminari possunt.

C. III. Those who cannot attain the kingdom of God are infamous.

Likewise Pope Fabian, [letter II to the Eastern Bishops]. Those who perpetrate those sins concerning which the Apostle says, "Because those who do such things shall not attain the kingdom of God," are greatly to be guarded against and, if they are unwilling voluntarily, compelled to amendment, because they are sprinkled with the stains of infamy and slide down into the abyss unless aid is given them by priestly authority. § 1. Likewise also those concerning whom he himself says, "Not even to take food with one of this kind," because they are marked by infamy before they are healed by priestly authority and reintegrated into the bosom of holy mother Church, since those who are outside us cannot communicate with us.

> C. III. Infames sunt qui regnum Dei consequi non ualent.
> Item Fabianus Papa. [epist II. Episcopis orientalibus] Illi, qui illa peccata perpetrant, de quibus Apostolus ait: "Quoniam qui talia agunt regnum Dei non consecuntur," ualde cauendi sunt, et ad emendationem, si uoluntarie noluerint, conpellendi, quia infamiae maculis sunt aspersi, et in barathrum dilabuntur, nisi eis sacerdotali auctoritate subuentum fuerit. §. 1. Similiter et illi, de quibus ipse ait: "Cum huiusmodi nec cibum sumere," quia infamia sunt notati, antequam sacerdotali auctoritate sanentur, et gremio sanctae matris ecclesiae redintegrentur, quia qui extra nos sunt nobiscum communicare non possunt.

C. IV. Those excommunicated shall not be admitted to an accusation before satisfaction.

Likewise Pope Fabian, [letter II]. All those whom the Apostle commemorates, saying, "Not even to take food with them," are to be repelled from an accusation and are not to be received before satisfaction to the Church.

> C. IV. Ante satisfactionem excommunicati ad accusationem non admittantur.
> Item Fabianus Papa. [epist. II.] Omnes illi sunt ab accusatione repellendi, quos Apostolus conmemorat, dicens: "Cum his nec cibum sumere," et ante satisfactionem ecclesiae non sunt suscipiendi.

C. V. Priests ought not to be accused except by their coequals.

Likewise Clement to James, Bishop of Jerusalem, [letter I]. Blessed Peter, as the Lord taught, prohibited homicides and adulterers and all those bound by criminal bonds, and those who were not their coequals, from the vexation and accusation of bishops; and he taught that no one except coequals ought to bring anything against them. § 1. He also asked that all infamous persons, and those whom primates and secular laws do not receive, as well as laymen, ought always to be repelled from their accusation and vexation; and he commanded all to be subject to them. He taught that the life of all priests is higher, holier, and separated from secular and lay persons, and that spiritual persons and priests ought always to be set over and to be above carnal persons and laymen, because it ought to be a very small thing to us that we are arraigned and judged by such persons or by a human day. But he said that greater persons can in no way be accused or judged by lesser ones, because he taught that not only divine laws but also secular laws prohibit this.

> C. V. Sacerdotes non nisi a coequalibus accusari debent.
> Item Clemens Iacobo, Ierosolimorum Episcopo. [epist. I.] Beatus Petrus homicidas et adulteros, ac cunctos criminalibus nexibus obligatos, et qui eis coequales non erant, ab episcoporum uexatione et accusatione, docente Domino, prohibebat, et non nisi a coequalibus aliquid sibi inferre debere docebat.

§. 1. Infames etiam omnes, et quos primates et leges seculi non suscipiunt, sed et laicos ab eorum accusatione et uexatione semper repellere debere rogabat, et cunctos sibi subditos esse precipiebat, cunctorum sacerdotum uitam superiorem sanctioremque, ac discretam a secularibus et laicis hominibus esse, et spirituales atque sacerdotes super carnales ac laicos semper constituere et fore debere docebat, quoniam pro minimo nobis esse debet, ut a talibus arguamur et iudicemur uel ab humano die. Maiores uero a minoribus nec accusari, uel iudicari nullatenus posse dicebat, quoniam non solum hoc diuinas, sed et leges seculi inhibere docebat.

C. VI. One who has been criminal cannot accuse priests.

Likewise Pope Hadrian, [in the capitularies, c. 68]. When one brings a criminal charge, it must be ascertained whether he himself was not previously criminal, because the accusation of a defendant against anyone is dangerous and ought not to be admitted. [C. 72:] § 1. Let witnesses, however, be without any infamy, having wives and children, and confessing Christ in every way. GRATIAN. But not only criminals, but also any other persons whatsoever are repelled from the accusation of bishops. Hence Pope Anacletus [letter I] says:

C. VI. Qui criminosus fuerit sacerdotes accusare non potest.

Item Adrianus Papa. [in capitulis c. 68.] Qui crimen intendit, agnoscendum est, si ipse ante non fuit criminosus, quia periculosum est et admitti non debet rei aduersus quemcumque professio. [c. 72.:] §. 1. Testes autem sine aliqua sint infamia, uxores habentes et filios, omnino Christum predicantes. Gratian. Non solum autem criminosi, sed etiam quilibet alii ab accusatione episcoporum repelluntur. Unde Anacletus Papa [epist. I.] ait:

C. VII. One who accuses His servants does not please God.

If all things were avenged in this world, there would be no place for divine judgments. One who strives to aid the sun with torches labors at superfluous expense. Therefore, if anyone thinks that in this he pleases God—because he accuses His servants and says that he does this so that they may become better—he labors in vain and is driven more by the goads of envy than of charity, because the fullness of grace does not need an addition, nor does it require any increases of commendation.

C. VII. Deo non placet qui suos seruos accusat.

Si omnia in hoc seculo uindicata essent, locum diuina iudicia non haberent. Superuacuis laborat inpendiis, qui solem certat facibus adiuuare. Ideo si aliquis putat se Deo in hoc placere, quod seruos suos accusat, et ut meliores fiant dicit se hoc agere, in uanum laborat, et plus inuidiae stimulis agitatur quam karitatis, quoniam gratiae plenitudo adiectione non indiget, nec ulla requirit conmendationis augmenta.

C. VIII. The people cannot arraign or rebuke priests.

Likewise Pope Telesphorus, [sole letter, c. 3]. Priests, who with their own mouth confect the body of the Lord, are to be obeyed and feared by all, not torn apart or disparaged, because the Lord's people ought in no way to arraign those by whom they desire to be blessed, saved, and instructed, nor shall the common people be received in their accusation. For the people are to be taught and corrected by them, not they by the people, because a disciple is not above the master. § 1. Therefore, one who accuses or desires to condemn those who are appointed priests by Him accuses God's ordinance. The same: § 2. Those who are not suitable shall not be received for an accusation; and we determine that all who take up arms against the Fathers, that is, priests, are infamous. For all Fathers, that is, priests, are to be venerated, not rejected, accused, or plotted against.

C. VIII. Populus sacerdotes arguere uel increpare non ualet.

Item Telesphorus Papa. [epistola unica, c. 3.] Sacerdotes, qui proprio ore corpus Domini conficiunt, ab omnibus sunt obediendi et timendi, non dilacerandi aut detrahendi, quia a quibus se Domini populus benedici, saluari et instrui cupit, nullatenus eos debet arguere, nec uulgus in eorum accusatione suscipi. Populus enim ab eis docendus est et corripiendus, non ipsi ab eo, quia non est discipulus super magistrum. §. 1. Dei ergo ordinationem accusat, qui eos, qui ab eo constituuntur sacerdotes, accusat uel dampnare cupit. Idem: §. 2. Hi, qui non sunt idonei, non suscipiantur ad accusationem; et omnes, qui aduersus Patres id est sacerdotes armantur, infames esse censemus. Patres enim omnes id est sacerdotes uenerandi sunt, non respuendi aut accusandi uel insidiandi.

C. IX. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Pius, [letter I]. Let sheep not rebuke their shepherd; let the people not accuse the bishop, nor the common people arraign him, because a disciple is not above the master. For bishops are to be judged by God, who chose them as eyes for Himself. For they are not to be accused, arraigned, or torn apart by subjects or persons of a depraved life. And below: § 1. No one doing good wishes to harm another by word or deed; how much less ought a faithful man to come under suspicion that he says or does those things which he does not wish to suffer? For every suspicion is to be repelled rather than approved or received. GRATIAN. But detraction itself, although it arises from the vice of those who disparage, is nevertheless sometimes stirred up against good persons by the just judgment of God, so that detraction may humble those whom either domestic presumption or the favor of others had raised on high. Hence Ambrose, [on Luke c. 22]:

C. IX. De eodem.

Item Pius Papa. [epist. I.] Oues pastorem suum non reprehendant; plebs episcopum non accuset, nec uulgus eum arguat, quia non est discipulus super magistrum. Episcopi enim a Deo sunt iudicandi, qui eos sibi oculos elegit. Nam a subditis aut prauae uitae hominibus non sunt accusandi aut arguendi aut lacerandi. Et infra: §. 1. Nemo bonum faciens alteri uerbo aut facto nocere uult; quanto minus in suspicionem debet uenire fidelis homo, ut dicat aut faciat ea, que pati non uult? quia omnis suspicio potius est repellenda quam approbanda uel recipienda. Gratian. Ipsa autem detractio, licet ex uicio detrahentium, tamen iusto Dei iudicio nonnumquam aduersus bonos excitatur, ut quos uel domestica presumptio, uel aliorum fauor in altum extulerat, detractio humiliet. Unde Ambrosius: [ad c. 22. Lucae]

C. X. Lest anyone presume concerning himself, by God's command the tongues of evil persons are stirred up against him.

Imitate Peter saying for the third time: "Lord, You know that I love You." For, because he had denied three times, he confesses three times; but he denied by night and confesses by day. These things were said so that we may know that no one ought to boast of himself. For if Peter too fell because he said, "Even if others shall have been scandalized, yet not I," who else may rightly presume concerning himself? Finally, because David had said, "I said in my abundance: I shall not be moved forever," he confesses that this boasting had harmed him, saying: "You turned Your face away from me, and I was made troubled."

C. X. Ne quis de se presumat, linguae malorum ex Dei precepto contra eum excitantur.

Imitare Petrum tertio dicentem: "Domine, tu scis, quia amo te." Etenim, quia tertio negauerat, tertio confitetur; sed negauit in nocte, confitetur in die. Hec autem ideo dicta sunt, ut sciamus, neminem iactare se debere. Nam et si Petrus lapsus est, quia dixit: "Et si alii scandalizati fuerint, sed non ego," quis alius iure de se presumat? Denique et Dauid quia dixerat: "Ego dixi in habundantia mea, non mouebor in eternum," eam sibi iactantiam obfuisse confitetur, dicens: "Auertisti faciem tuam a me, et factus sum conturbatus."

C. XI. So that good persons may be beneficially humbled, the tongues of evil persons rise against them.

Likewise Gregory, [book IX, letter 39 to Theoctista the Patrician]. There are very many who perhaps praise the life of good persons more than they ought, and, lest some elation creep in from praise, almighty God permits evil persons to burst forth into disparagement and rebuke, so that, if some fault is born in the heart from the mouth of those who praise, it may be suffocated by the mouth of those who censure. Hence it is that the teacher of the gentiles attests that he runs in preaching amid infamy and good reputation, who also says: "As deceivers, and truthful." GRATIAN. But by this authority spiritual persons are prohibited from being accused by carnal persons, not carnal persons by spiritual ones. This is given to be understood from the words of the same author, which he added in the same chapter, saying: "When the head is ailing, the remaining members of the body are infected more easily, as it is written: Every head is ailing, and every heart grieving; from the sole of the foot even to the crown there is no health in it." Therefore it is manifest that the devil—who goes about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour—persuades the hearts of the common people to inflict detractions upon or accuse their own teachers and pastors, so that the ailing peoples, when their pastors do not hold their reins, may run wanton and rush into the depths, so that at least in this way they can be endangered. But damage to morals is very distant from damage to temporal things, since the latter are outside us, the former in us. And below: "I do not think that there is a worse evil than for Christians to envy their priests." Hence also Felix II says [to the Bishops gathered in the Synod of Alexandria]:

C. XI. Ut boni salubriter humilientur, linguae malorum contra eos insurgunt.

Item Gregorius. [lib. IX. epist. 39. ad Theoctistam Patriciam] Sunt plurimi, qui uitam bonorum fortasse amplius quam debent laudant, et ne qua elatio de laude subripiat permittit omnipotens Deus malos in obtrectationem et obiurgationem prorumpere, ut si qua culpa ab ore laudantium in corde nascitur, ab ore uituperantium suffocetur. Hinc est, quod doctor gentium se in predicatione currere testatur inter infamiam et bonam famam, qui etiam dicit: "Ut seductores et ueraces." Gratian. Verum hac auctoritate prohibentur spirituales a carnalibus accusari, non carnales a spiritualibus. Quod ex uerbis eiusdem datur intelligi, quibus in eodem capitulo subiunxit, dicens: "Capite languescente facilius reliqua corporis membra inficiuntur, sicut scriptum est: Omne caput languidum, et omne cor merens; a planta pedis usque ad uerticem non est in eo sanitas." Quapropter manifestum est, diabolum (qui sicut leo rugiens circuit, querens quem deuoret) cordibus plebium suadere, ut doctoribus atque pastoribus suis detractiones irrogent, uel accusent, ut plebes languescentes (non tenentibus pastoribus frena eorum) lasciuiant, atque in ima ruant, ut saltim sic periclitari possint. Multum uero distant dampna morum a dampnis rerum temporalium, cum ista extra nos sint, illa in nobis. Et infra: "Peius malum fore non existimo, quam Christianos suis inuidere sacerdotibus." Hinc etiam Felix II. ait: [Episcopis in Alexandrina Sinodo congregatis]

C. XII. It is not lawful to persecute those rightly serving God.

Cease, says the holy Synod of Nicaea, and do not persecute those who rightly serve God, who with a sincere will keep the heavenly commandments of God and are subjected to our laws, because it is not fitting for carnal persons to persecute spiritual ones.

> C. XII. Deo recte famulantes persequi non licet.
> Quiescite, inquit sancta sinodus Nicena, et nolite persequi eos, qui recte Deo famulantur, et sincera uoluntate superna Dei mandata custodiunt, et nostris legibus subiugantur; quia non decet, ut carnales spirituales persequantur.

C. XIII. Subjects ought not to accuse their prelates.

Likewise Pope Anterus, [sole letter]. Bishops are sometimes depraved because of the deserts of the people, so that those who follow may fall more readily. When the head is ailing, the other members of the body are infected. Those who corrupt the life and morals of good persons are worse than those who plunder the substance and estates of others. Let everyone beware lest either his tongue or his ears itch, that is, lest either he disparage others or hear others disparaging. "While sitting," he says, "you spoke against your brother" by disparaging, "and against the son of your mother you placed a stumbling block," etc. Let every person abstain from detraction of the tongue and guard his words, and let him know that all the things he says about others will be judged by his own sentence. No one willingly reports to an unwilling hearer. Let the duty of every person be, most beloved, to preserve not only chaste eyes but also the tongue, and let another household never know through them what is done in anyone's household. Let all have the simplicity of the dove, lest they devise deceits against anyone, and the cunning of the serpent, lest they be overthrown by the plots of others. Likewise Pope Lucius, [sole letter, writing to the Bishops of Gaul and Spain]:

> C. XIII. Subditi prelatos suos accusare non debent.
> Item Anterius Papa. [epistola unica] Ex merito plebis nonnumquam episcopi deprauantur, quatinus procliuius cadant qui secuntur. Capite languescente cetera corporis membra inficiuntur. Deteriores sunt, qui uitam moresque bonorum corrumpunt, his, qui substantias aliorum prediaque diripiunt. Caueat unusquisque, ne aut linguam, aut aures habeat prurientes, id est, ne aut ipse aliis detrahat, aut alios detrahentes audiat. "Sedens," inquit, "aduersus fratrem tuum loquebaris" detrahendo, "et aduersus filium matris tuae ponebas scandalum," etc. Parcant singuli detractioni linguae, custodiantque sermones suos, et sciant, quia cuncta que de aliis loquuntur, sua sententia iudicabuntur. Nemo inuito auditori libenter refert. Offitium singulorum sit, dilectissimi, non solum oculos castos seruare, sed et linguam, nec quid in cuiusquam domo agatur alia domus umquam per eos nouerit. Habeant omnes simplicitatem columbae, ne cuiquam machinentur dolos et serpentis astutiam, ne aliorum subplantentur insidiis. Item Lucius Papa: [epist. unica, Episcopis Galliae et Hispaniae scribens]

C. XIV. A good person does not desire to harm.

Not everyone who harms is wise.

> C. XIV. Bonus nocere non cupit.
> Sapiens non est omnis qui nocet.

C. XV. Detractors of bishops are worse than robbers.

Likewise Pope Anacletus, [letter III]. Those who corrupt the life and morals of teachers are worse than those who plunder the substance and estates of others. For the latter take away those things which, although ours, are outside us; but our detractors, the corrupters of our morals, or those who take up arms against us, properly deceive our very selves, and therefore they are justly infamous and deservedly made exiles from the Church. Therefore, pastors of the Church are often depraved because of the deserts of the people, so that those who follow may collapse more readily.

> C. XV. Raptoribus deteriores episcoporum sunt detractores.
> Item Anacletus Papa. [epist. III.] Deteriores sunt, qui doctorum uitam moresque corrumpunt, his, qui substantias aliorum prediaque diripiunt. Ipsi enim ea, que extra nos, licet nostra sint, auferunt; nostri quoque detractores, et morum corruptores nostrorum, siue qui aduersus nos armantur, proprie nos ipsos decipiunt, et ideo iuste infames sunt, et merito ab ecclesia extorres fiunt. Pro meritis ergo plebis sepe pastores deprauantur ecclesiae, ut procliuius corruant qui secuntur.

C. XVI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Alexander, [letter III]. It is the highest iniquity to disparage and accuse brothers. Hence it is written: "Everyone who disparages his brother is a homicide, and every homicide has no part in the kingdom of God." GRATIAN. It is therefore evident, as was set forth above, that carnal persons are prohibited from the accusation of spiritual persons, not spiritual persons from the accusation of carnal ones. Part II. § 1. Therefore, since criminals and infamous persons are prohibited from accusations, it must be seen whom the sacred authority of the canons calls infamous. Concerning these Stephen, Bishop of the Roman Church, writes to Hilary, [letter I, c. 1], saying:

> C. XVI. De eodem.
> Item Alexander. [epist. III.] Summa iniquitas est fratres detrahere et accusare. Unde scriptum est: "Omnis, qui detrahit fratri suo, homicida est, et omnis homicida non habet partem in regno Dei." Gratian. Patet ergo, ut premissum est, quod carnales prohibentur ab accusatione spiritualium, non spirituales ab accusatione carnalium. II. Pars. §. 1. Cum itaque criminosi et infames ab accusationibus prohibeantur, uidendum est, quos canonum sacra auctoritas infames appellet. De his Stephanus Romanae Ecclesiae Episcopus scribit Ylario, [ep. I. c. 1.] dicens:

C. XVII. Which persons are regarded as infamous.

We say that those persons are infamous who are marked by infamy for some fault, that is: all who cast aside the norm of Christian law and contemn ecclesiastical statutes; likewise thieves, the sacrilegious, and those ensnared by all capital crimes; violators of tombs also, and all who take up arms against the Fathers, who throughout the whole world are marked by infamy; likewise the incestuous, homicides, perjurers, abductors, sorcerers, poisoners, adulterers, those fleeing from public wars, those who seek to hold places unworthy of themselves, or who unjustly take away the resources of the Church, those who calumniate or accuse brothers and do not prove it, those who provoke the mind of princes to anger against innocent persons, and all who are anathematized or repelled from the Church for their crimes, and all whom ecclesiastical or secular laws pronounce infamous. All these persons, certainly, as well as slaves before lawful freedom, penitents, bigamists, those who serve the curia, those who are not sound in body, those who do not have a sound mind or understanding, those who are disobedient to the decrees of the saints, or those who are shown to be insane—all these, I say, ought neither to be advanced to sacred grades; nor can these persons, nor freedmen, nor suspect persons, nor those who do not possess right faith or worthy conduct, accuse the highest priests, nor can they in any way justly be received for an accusation or testimony.

C. XVII. Que personae infames habeantur.

Infames esse eas personas dicimus, que pro aliqua culpa notantur infamia, id est omnes, qui Christianae legis normam abiciunt, et statuta ecclesiastica contempnunt; similiter fures, sacrilegos et omnibus capitalibus criminibus irretitos; sepulcrorum quoque uiolatores, et omnes, qui aduersus patres armantur, qui in omni mundo infamia notantur; similiter et incestuosos, homicidas, periuros, raptores, maleficos, ueneficos, adulteros, de bellis publicis fugientes, et qui indigna sibi petunt loca tenere, aut facultates ecclesiae auferunt iniuste, et qui fratres calumpniantur, aut accusant et non probant, et qui contra innocentes principum animum ad iracundiam prouocant, et omnes anathematizatos uel pro suis sceleribus ab ecclesia repulsos, et omnes, quos ecclesiasticae uel seculi leges infames pronunciant. Hii nimirum omnes, nec serui ante legitimam libertatem, nec penitentes, nec bigami, nec illi, qui curiae deseruiunt, uel non sunt integri corpore, aut sanam non habent mentem uel intellectum, aut inobedientes sanctorum decretis existunt, aut furiosi manifestantur, hi omnes, inquam, nec ad sacros gradus debent prouehi, nec isti, nec liberti neque suspecti, neque rectam fidem uel dignam conuersationem non habentes, summos sacerdotes possunt accusare, nec ad accusationem seu ad testimonium ullatenus iuste recipi possunt.

C. XVIII. One who knowingly presumes to swear falsely is made infamous.

Likewise Pope Fabian. Part III. Whoever, knowing it, has perjured himself shall do penance for forty days on bread and water and for the following seven years, and shall never be without penance and never be received as a witness; nevertheless, after these things let him receive communion.

C. XVIII. Infamis efficitur qui sciens deierare presumit.

Item Fabianus Papa. III. Pars. Quicumque sciens se periurauerit, quadraginta dies in pane et aqua, et septem sequentes annos peniteat, et numquam sit sine penitentia, et numquam in testimonium recipiatur; communionem tamen post hec percipiat.

C. XIX. Ecclesiastical laws also repel accusers and persons whom secular laws do not admit.

Likewise Pope Eusebius, [letter I to the Bishops of Gaul]. Following the footsteps of the Fathers for the salvation of the servants of God, we remove from all persons whom public laws do not admit to an accusation the license to assail another; and let no accusations which are prohibited by secular laws be heard by ecclesiastical judges. GRATIAN. But although infamous persons are prohibited from the accusation of bishops, these persons are nevertheless not to be prohibited from the accusation of this man. For infamous persons are not prohibited from accusing heretics, as was evident above in the cause where the accusation of lesser persons against greater ones was discussed.

C. XIX. Accusatores et personas, quas leges seculi non admittunt, ecclesiasticae quoque repellunt.

Item Eusebius Papa. [epist. I. ad Episcopos Galliae] Nos sequentes Patrum uestigia pro saluatione seruorum Dei, quascumque ad accusationem personas leges publicae non admittunt, his inpugnandi alterum nos licentiam submouemus, et nullae accusationes a iudicibus audiantur ecclesiasticis, que legibus seculi prohibentur. Gratian. Sed licet infames ab accusatione episcoporum prohibeantur, non tamen isti ab huius accusatione prohibendi sunt. Hereticos namque accusare infamibus non prohibetur, ut supra patuit in ea causa, ubi de accusatione minorum aduersus maiores disputatum est.

[C. XX.]

Likewise. Since those greater in knowledge and morals are prohibited from being accused by lesser persons, but equals are not prohibited from being accused by equals, nor lesser persons by greater ones, these persons are not to be prohibited from accusations against this man, since a heretic is lesser than a Catholic. But Augustine does not determine whether this is to be understood generally, [book IV On Baptism against the Donatists, c. 5], saying:

[C. XX.]

Item. Cum maiores scientia et moribus a minoribus accusari prohibeantur, non equales ab equalibus, uel minores a maioribus, ab huius accusationibus non sunt hii prohibendi, cum hereticus catholico minor sit. Sed hoc an generaliter accipiendum sit, Augustinus non diffinit, [lib. IV. de Baptismo contra Donatistas, c. 5.] dicens:

C. XXI. It is doubtful whether a knowing avaricious person or an unknowing heretic sins more gravely.

I ask, therefore, who sins more gravely: one who has unknowingly fallen into heresy, or one who knowingly has not withdrawn from avarice, that is, from idolatry? According to that rule by which the sins of those who know are set above sins of ignorance, the avaricious person overcomes in wickedness through knowledge. But if perhaps the magnitude of the wickedness in heresy accomplishes what the commission of one who knows accomplishes in avarice, the unknowing heretic is made equal to the knowing avaricious person. Likewise, [c. 20 of the same book]: § 1. Whether we ought to set a Catholic of the worst morals above some heretic in whose life people find nothing to rebuke apart from the fact that he is a heretic, I do not dare to hasten a sentence. Part IV. GRATIAN. But this statement of Augustine and that statement concerning the accusation by infamous persons must be understood of those who are established to be heretics, not of those who deny that they have fallen into heresy. But this man, appearing religious in all things, while he denies that he was ever infected with the stain of heretical communion, himself repels infamous persons and others of this kind from his accusation. § 1. Although these things appear to rest upon reason, they are nevertheless understood to be vain by the example of injured majesty; for, when an accomplice in an undertaken faction is admitted to an accusation of that crime, it is not asked whether to think against the prince's life is to injure his majesty, but whether someone has treated concerning his death. Hence Emperors Honorius and Arcadius are read to have written in the ninth book of the Code, title On the Julian Law of Majesty, [law 5]:

C. XXI. Dubium est, an sciens auarus, an nesciens hereticus grauius peccet.

Quero ergo, quis peccet grauius, qui nesciens heresim incurrerit, an qui sciens ab auaritia, id est ab ydolatria non recesserit? Secundum illam regulam, qua peccata scientium peccatis ignorantiae preponuntur, auarum conscientia uincit in scelere. Sed si, forte hoc faciat in heresi ipsius sceleris magnitudo, quod facit in auaritia scientis admissio hereticus nesciens auaro scienti coequatur. Item: [c. 20. eiusdem libri] §. 1. Utrum catholicum pessimis moribus alicui heretico, in cuius uita, preter id, quod hereticus est, non inueniunt homines quod reprehendant, preponere debeamus, non audeo precipitare sententiam. IV. Pars. Gratian. Verum hoc Augustini, et illud de infamium accusatione, de his intelligendum est, quos constat esse hereticos, non de his, qui se negant in heresim lapsos. Hic autem in omnibus religiosus aparens, dum se negat hereticae communionis aliquando macula infectum, infames atque alios huiusmodi a sua accusatione ipse repellit. §. 1. Hec licet ratione niti uideantur, exemplo tamen lesae maiestatis uana intelliguntur, ad cuius accusationem dum socius initae factionis admittitur, non queritur, an cogitare contra animam principis sit maiestatem ledere, sed an aliquis de nece eius tractauerit. Unde Inpp. Honorius et Arcadius in nono libro Codicis, titulo ad legem Iuliam maiestatis, [leg. 5.,] scripsisse leguntur:

[C. XXII.]

"If anyone has entered into a wicked faction with soldiers or private persons, even with barbarians, or has received or given the oath of that faction itself, or has devised the death of illustrious men who take part in our counsels and consistory, or even of senators—for they too are part of our body—or, finally, of anyone who serves us—for the laws willed the intention of wickedness to be punished with the same severity as its effect—let him indeed, as one guilty of injured majesty, be struck with the sword, all his goods being assigned to our fisc. But as for his sons, to whom by special imperial clemency we grant life—for they ought to perish by their father's punishment, since in them examples of the paternal, that is, hereditary, crime are feared—let them be regarded as strangers to the succession of all their nearest relatives; let them take nothing by the testaments of strangers; let them be perpetually needy and poor; let their father's infamy always accompany them; let them never come to any honors or to any oaths at all; finally, let them be such that, while they are made squalid by perpetual need, death may be a consolation to them and life a punishment. Finally, we command that those who ever attempt to intercede before us for such persons are also to be marked by infamy without pardon. § 1. Certainly, if any of these persons at the beginning of the undertaken faction, kindled by zeal for true praise, has himself betrayed the faction, he shall be presented by us with both a reward and an honor. But one who has participated in the faction, if late, yet while the secrets of its counsels are still unknown, he has disclosed them, shall be regarded as worthy only of absolution and pardon." GRATIAN. Moreover, an accusation of simony ought to proceed after the pattern of injured majesty, as Emperor Leo is read to have decreed in book I of the Code, title On Bishops and Clerics, law If Anyone—it ought to proceed. This must be understood concerning the accusation, not concerning the penalty. Hence Emperors Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian in book IX of the Code, title On the Julian Law of Majesty, [law Let No One]:

"Si quis cum militibus uel priuatis, barbaris etiam, scelestam inierit factionem, aut factionis ipsius susceperit sacramentum uel dederit, de nece etiam uirorum illustrium, qui consiliis et consistorio nostro intersunt, senatorum etiam (nam et ipsi pars nostri corporis sunt) uel cuiuslibet postremo, qui nobis militat, cogitauerit, (eadem enim seueritate uoluntatem sceleris, qua effectum, puniri iura uoluerunt), ipse quidem, utpote maiestatis reus, gladio feriatur, bonis eius omnibus fisco nostro addictis. Filii uero eius, quibus uitam inperatoria specialiter lenitate concedimus, (paterno enim deberent perire suplicio, in quibus paterni, hoc est hereditarii, criminis exempla metuuntur), a successione omnium proximorum habeantur alieni, testamentis extraneorum nichil capiunt, sint perpetuo egentes et pauperes, infamia eos semper paterna comitetur, ad nullos umquam honores, nulla prorsus sacramenta perueniant, sint postremo tales, ut his perpetua egestate sordentibus et sit mors solatium et uita suplicium. Denique iubemus etiam notabiles esse infamia sine uenia, qui pro talibus umquam apud nos interuenire temptauerint. §. 1. Sane, si quis ex his in exordio initae factionis, studio uerae laudis accensus, ipse prodiderit factionem, et premio a nobis et honore donabitur. Is uero, qui usus fuerit factione, si sero, tamen incognita adhuc consiliorum archana patefecerit, absolutione tantum ac uenia dignus habebitur." [Gratian.] Porro symoniae accusatio ad instar lesae maiestatis procedere debet, sicut Leo inperator in I. libro Codicis decreuisse legitur, titulo de episcopis et clericis, 1. Si quenquam procedere debet. Quod de accusatione, non de pena intelligi oportet. Unde Inppp. Valentinianus, Valens et Gratianus libro IX. Codicis titulo ad legem Iuliam maiestatis: [l. Nullus]

[C. XXIII.]

"Let absolutely no one to whom, without our having been consulted and without our knowledge, the torments of cords are applied be prohibited from using the defense of military service, birth, or dignity, with only the case of injured majesty excepted, in which alone the condition is equal for all." GRATIAN. But since all those who can accuse concerning the crime of injured majesty are admitted in an accusation of simony, it is established that, just as there no doubt is raised concerning the crime of injured majesty, but whether the defendant committed it, so also here heresy is not denied, but the accused is assailed as to whether he committed heresy.

[C. XXIII.]

"Nullus omnino, cui inconsultis ac nescientibus nobis fidicularum tormenta offeruntur, militiae, uel generis, aut dignitatis defensione uti prohibeatur, excepta tantum maiestatis causa, in qua sola equa omnibus conditio est." Gratian. Sed cum omnes illi assumuntur in accusatione symoniae, qui possunt accussare de crimine maiestatis, constat, quod sicut ibi non dubitatur de crimine maiestatis, sed an reus commiserit illud, sic et hic non negatur heresis, sed inpetitur accusatus, an conmiserit heresim.

Question II

GRATIAN. But the question whether, if a bishop wishes to turn an accusation against the accuser, credence is to be given to his simple assertion is easily resolved if the authority of the holy Fathers is diligently inspected. For, as the holy Fathers determine, credence is to be given to no person's confession, however practiced that person may be, unless he adduces competent proofs. Hence it is read in the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 29]:

GRATIANUS. Quod autem queritur, si episcopus accusationem in accusatorem uertere uoluerit, an suae simplici assertioni fides sit habenda? facile soluitur, si sanctorum Patrum auctoritas diligenter inspiciatur. Ut enim sancti patres diffiniunt, nullius personae, quantumlibet exercitatae, confessioni fides est adhibenda, nisi conpetentes probationes adhibeat. Unde in IV. Cartaginensi Concilio [c. 29.] legitur:

C. I. A bishop who charges a crime against someone shall prove in a synod what he charges.

If a bishop has imposed a criminal charge upon a cleric or layman, let him be brought to proof in a synod. GRATIAN. But it is objected: If he knows himself alone to be aware of another's wickedness, he cannot prove it by witnesses. What, therefore, is then to be done by him is determined thus from the Council of Vaison, [I, c. 8]:

C. I. Episcopus, crimen alicui obiciens, in sinodo probet quod obicit.

Episcopus, si clerico uel laico crimen inposuerit, deducatur ad probationem in sinodum. Gratian. Sed obicitur: Si se solum alieni sceleris conscium nouerit, probare illud testibus non ualet; quid ergo tunc sibi faciendum sit, ex Concilio Vasensi [I. c. 8.] sic diffinitur:

C. II. A bishop shall not bring forth what he cannot prove.

If the bishop alone knows himself to be aware of another's wickedness, as long as he cannot prove it, let him bring forth nothing, but let him labor with the man by secret corrections for his compunction. But if perhaps the man, after being corrected, has become more obstinate and has thrust himself into public communion, even if the bishop lacks proof in reproving the one whom he judges guilty, that man, uncondemned—although before those who know nothing he may be ordered, on account of the authority of the greater person, to withdraw for a time—shall nevertheless, as long as the bishop can prove nothing, remain in the communion of all except the one who judges him guilty.

C. II. Episcopus non proferat quod probare non potest.

Si tantum episcopus alieni sceleris se conscium nouit, quamdiu probare non potest, nichil proferat, sed cum ipso ad conpunctionem eius secretis correctionibus elaboret. Quod si forte correptus pertinacior fuerit, et se communioni publicae ingesserit, etiam si episcopus in redarguendo illum, quem reum iudicat, probatione deficiat, indempnatus (licet his qui nichil sciunt, secedere ad tempus pro personae maioris auctoritate iubeatur) ille tamen, quamdiu nichil probare potest, in communione omnium, preterquam eius, qui eum reum iudicat, permanebit.

C. III. Concerning a bishop who says that someone confessed his own crime to him alone.

It was resolved that, if at any time a bishop says that someone confessed his own crime to him alone, and that person denies it, the bishop shall not think it pertains to his injury that he alone is not believed. And if, because of a scruple of his own conscience, he says that he is unwilling to communicate with the man who denies it, let the other bishops not communicate with that bishop for as long as his own bishop has not communicated with the excommunicated man, so that the bishop may take greater care not to say against anyone what he cannot convict by other proofs.

C. III. De episcopo, qui sibi soli dicit aliquem suum crimen fuisse confessum.

Placuit, ut si quando episcopus dicit aliquem sibi soli proprium crimen fuisse confessum, atque ille neget, non putet ad iniuriam suam episcopus pertinere, quod illi soli non creditur. Et si scrupulo propriae conscientiae se dicit neganti nolle communicare, quamdiu excommunicato non communicauerit suus episcopus, eidem episcopo ab aliis non communicetur episcopis, ut magis caueat episcopus, ne dicat in quemquam quod aliis documentis conuincere non potest.

Question III

GRATIAN. It is not lawful, however, for anyone to seek the judgment of the archbishop of another province.

Hence Gregory says, [response IX to Augustine, Bishop of the English]:

GRATIANUS. Iudicium uero archiepiscopi alterius prouinciae alicui expetere non licet.

Unde Gregorius ait: [respons. IX. ad Augustinum Anglorum Episcopum]

C. I. It is not lawful for anyone to judge another's parishioner.

It is written in the law: “When passing through another's harvest, you ought not to put in a sickle, but to rub the ears with your hand and eat.” For you ought not to put the sickle of judgment into that crop which is seen to have been entrusted to another; but through the affection of a good work strip the Lord's grains of the chaff of their vices, and by admonishing and persuading, as though by chewing, convert them into the body of the Church.

> C. I. Alterius parrochianum alicui iudicare non licet.
> Scriptum est in lege: "Per alienam messem transiens falcem mittere non debes, sed manu spicas conterere et manducare." Falcem enim iudicii mittere non debes in ea segete, que alteri uidetur esse conmissa, sed per affectum boni operis frumenta dominica uiciorum suorum paleis expolia, et in ecclesiae corpus admonendo et persuadendo, quasi mandendo, conuertere.

C. II. How many cities each province is to have.

Likewise Pope Pelagius [II, letter VIII] to all Bishops. Know that a province is established which has ten or eleven cities, and one king, and as many lesser authorities under him, and one metropolitan, and ten or eleven other suffragan bishops as judges, to whose judgment all cases of bishops, of the other priests, and of cities are to be referred, so that they may be justly decided by them all with a concordant voice, unless an appeal has been made to a greater authority by those who are to be judged. Hence it is not fitting that each province be degraded or dishonored, but let it have among its own people judges, priests, and bishops, each, of course, according to their own orders; and whoever has a case shall be judged by his own judges and not by outsiders, that is, by the just judges of his own province and not by strangers, unless—as has already been touched upon—an appeal has been made by those who are to be judged.

> C. II. Quot ciuitates unaqueque prouincia habeat.
> Item Pelagius Papa [II. ep. VIII.] omnibus Episcopis. Scitote certam esse prouinciam, que habet X. aut XI. ciuitates, et unum regem, et totidem minores potestates sub se, et unum metropolitanum, aliosque suffraganeos X. uel XI. episcopos iudices, ad quorum iudicium omnes causae episcoporum, et reliquorum sacerdotum, ac ciuitatum referantur, ut ab his omnibus iuste consona uoce discernatur, nisi ad maiorem auctoritatem fuerit ab his, qui iudicandi sunt, appellatum. Unde non oportet, ut degradetur uel dehonoretur unaqueque prouincia; sed apud semetipsam habeat iudices, sacerdotes et episcopos, singulos uidelicet secundum ordines suos, et quicumque causam habuerit a suis iudicibus iudicetur, et non ab alienis, id est a suae iustis iudicibus prouinciae, et non ab extraneis, nisi (ut iam est prelibatum) a iudicandis fuerit appellatum.

C. III. Let every bishop subject himself to the judgment not of others, but of his own primate.

Likewise Pope Nicholas. Finally, if Suffredus knew that there was in him such a crime by which he could rightly be deprived of the episcopate, or perhaps felt himself weighed down by an infirmity by which, being impeded, he could benefit none of his neighbors through his prelacy, he ought to have awaited the judgment of his own primate and not that of the bishops of other dioceses. But if any ambiguity or perhaps any contention concerning his examination or renunciation of the episcopate had arisen, it would have been fitting for it to be referred according to custom to the apostolic see, and all ought in these matters to have awaited our decrees entirely. Because this was omitted, as we have grieved until now, I vehemently implore your glory, most beloved by me, that the aforesaid Bishop Suffredus be restored to his own episcopate; and if he did anything deserving of rebuke, it shall afterward be determined by either correction or a worthy punishment.

GRATIAN. There is nevertheless a case in which a bishop can excommunicate the parishioner of another. Hence in the Council at Compiègne, [c. 5]:

> C. III. Non aliorum, sed primatis sui iudicio quisque se subiciat episcopus.
> Item Nicolaus Papa. Denique si Suffredus, tale in se crimen nouerat, quo recte posset episcopatu priuari, uel infirmitate se sentiebat forsitan pregrauari, qua inpeditus nullis posset proximis sua prelatione prodesse, primatis sui debuerat et non aliorum dioceseon antistitum prestolari iudicium. Quod si quelibet ambiguitas, uel aliqua fortasse super eius examinatione, uel episcopatus abrenunciatione oborta fuisset contentio, ex more ad apostolicam sedem referri conuenerat, et nostra in his omnibus debuerant cuncti decreta penitus expectare. Quod quia omissum hactenus dolemus, dilectissimam mihi gloriam uestram uehementer efflagito, ut iam dictus Suffredus episcopus proprio restituatur episcopio, et si quid reprehensione dignum gessit, postea uel correctione, uel digna animaduersione diffinietur.
> Gratian. Est tamen casus, in quo episcopus alterius parrochianum excommunicare ualet. Unde in Concilio apud Conpendium: [c. 5.]

C. IV. When a bishop can excommunicate another's parishioner.

It was resolved for the common benefit that no bishop take it grievously if another bishop has excommunicated his parishioner for a cause of depredation.

[PALEA.

> C. IV. Quando episcopus parrochianum alterius excommunicare ualet.
> Placuit pro communi utilitate, ut nullus episcoporum grauiter ferat, si eius parrochianum pro depredationis causa alter episcopus excommunicauerit.
> [PALEA.

C. V. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Meaux, c. 2. Concerning those who have a benefice or inheritance within a parish, but are parishioners of another bishop, and who journey from place to place and commit rapine and depredations, it was resolved that they be excommunicated and not depart from the diocese before they worthily amend what they have perpetrated. Their excommunication is to be signified to their lord and to their own bishop, lest he receive them before they return to the place where they committed the rapine and there amend all things fully.]

> C. V. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Meldensi, c. 2. De illis autem, qui intra parrochiam beneficium aut hereditatem habent, et alterius episcopi parrochiani sunt, et de loco ad locum iter faciunt, et rapinam et depredationes peragunt, placuit, ut excommunicentur, nec ante ex parecia exeant, quam que perpetrarunt digne emendent. Quorum excommunicatio seniori eorum et proprio episcopo significanda est, ne eos recipiat ante, quam illuc redeant, ubi rapinam fecerunt, et ibi omnia pleniter emendent.]

Question IV

GRATIAN. Moreover, whose judgment he is to seek if the chosen judges have begun to disagree among themselves is found to have been determined thus in the Council of Laodicea, [c. 14]:

> GRATIANUS. Porro cuius iudicium sibi expetendum sit, si iudices electi inter se discordare ceperint, in Laudicensi Concilio [c. 14.] sic inuenitur diffinitum:

C. I. By whom a sentence is to be rendered when coprovincial bishops disagree.

If any bishop has been criminally accused in the judgment of bishops, but it happens that the bishops of the province who have assembled hold diverse opinions, some indeed pronouncing him innocent and others guilty, in order to cut away a controversy of this kind it was resolved by the holy synod that the metropolitan bishop of another neighboring province be called in, and certain other bishops with him, who, sitting together, shall settle whatever the question may be, so that the judgment promulgated by the bishops of one province may thereby be firm.

> C. I. A quo sit ferenda sententia, quando conprouinciales episcopi discordant.
> Si quis episcopus criminaliter in iudicio episcoporum fuerit accusatus, contingat autem episcopos prouinciae, qui conuenerint, diuersas habere sententias, et alios quidem innocentem eum pronunciare, alios reum, propter huiusmodi controuersiam amputandam placuit sanctae sinodo metropolitanum episcopum alterius uicinae prouinciae aduocari, et aliquantos cum eo episcopos alios, qui pariter residentes quecumque fuerit dirimant questionem, propter hoc, ut sit firmum iudicium, quod ab unius prouinciae episcopis fuerit promulgatum.

C. II. When the chosen judges have disagreed among themselves concerning the sentence, the archbishop shall be called from a neighboring province.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin. If any bishop is judged in any matters and sees that those bishops who are in his province differ among themselves in judgment, so that some appear to justify the man who is judged and others to condemn him, for the determination of this dissension it was resolved by the holy synod that another metropolitan bishop be summoned from a neighboring province, so that through him what has been resolved according to the right canon may be confirmed. GRATIAN. Unless that same province has a primate, to whom affairs which cannot be terminated by the metropolitan are to be referred. Hence Pope Boniface to the Bishops of Gaul:

> C. II. Quando electi iudices inter se de sententia discordes extiterint, de uicina prouincia archiepiscopus aduocetur.
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. Si quis episcopus in aliquibus iudicatur, et uiderit ipsos episcopos, qui in prouincia sua sunt, inter se iudicio discrepare, ut alii uideantur eum, qui iudicatur, iustificare, alii condempnare, pro diffinitione huius dissensionis hoc placuit sanctae sinodo, ut de prouincia uicina alter metropolitanus conuocetur episcopus, ut per eum confirmetur quod secundum rectum placuerit canonem. Gratian. Nisi eadem prouincia primatem habuerit, ad quem negotia, que per metropolitanum terminari non ualent, referenda sunt. Unde Bonifatius Papa Episcopis Galliae:

C. III. Affairs which the metropolitan cannot resolve shall be referred to the primate.

If among the bishops of the same council a doubt has arisen concerning ecclesiastical law or other affairs, first let their metropolitan, considering the matter with certain others in the council, adjudicate it; and if both parties do not acquiesce in the things adjudged, then let the primate of the region hear the matter between them and determine what is consonant with the ecclesiastical canons and our laws, and let neither party be able to contradict his vote.

[PALEA.

> C. III. Primati deferantur negotia, que metropolitanus explicare non ualet.
>
> Si inter episcopos eiusdem concilii dubitatio emerserit de ecclesiastico iure uel de aliis negotiis, primum metropolitanus eorum cum aliis quibusdam in concilio considerans rem diiudicet, et si non adquiescat utraque pars iudicatis, tunc primas regionis inter ipsos audiat, et quod ecclesiasticis canonibus et legibus nostris consentaneum sit, hoc diffiniat, et nulla pars calculo eius ualeat contradicere.
> [PALEA.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Alexander. If a metropolitan, after an appeal has been made to him by any coprovincial bishop in the bishop's own case, has delayed hearing him, let him have license to prosecute his business in the next synod; and whatever has been enacted with justice by his coprovincials ought to be observed.] GRATIAN. But if he has been condemned by the concordant sentence of all the coprovincials, the censure shall remain immovable against him. Hence it is read in the Council of Laodicea, [c. 15]:

> C. IV. De eodem.
> Item Alexander Papa. Si metropolitanus a quocumque conprouinciali episcopo in causa propria appellatus eum audire distulerit, in proxima sinodo negotii sui habeat licentiam exercendi, et quicquid per iustitiam a conprouincialibus suis fuerit statutum debet custodiri.] Gratian. Sed si omnium conprouincialium concordi sententia fuerit dampnatus, manebit erga eum inmobilis censura. Unde in Laudicensi Concilio [cap. 15.] legitur:

C. V. A bishop who has received a concordant sentence from the bishops of his province will not be able to be judged by others.

If any bishop criminally accused has received one concordant sentence from all the bishops who are within the province, he will not be able to be judged further by others, but the sentence put forth by all ought to remain firm and ratified concerning him as a fitting sentence. GRATIAN. It must be understood, however, unless an appeal has been made to a judge of greater authority. For then the sentence, dissolved through the appeal, does not obtain firmness. Hence Pope Nicholas says, [in the letter to King Charles which begins, "It Never Produces Grief"]:

> C. V. Episcopus, qui ab episcopis suae prouinciae consonam sententiam reportauerit, ab aliis iudicari non poterit.
> Si quis episcopus criminaliter accusatus ab omnibus, qui sunt intra prouinciam, episcopis exceperit unam consonamque sententiam, ab aliis ulterius iudicari non poterit, sed manere circa eum oportet tamquam conuenientem, que ab omnibus prolata est, firmam ratamque sententiam. Gratian.

Subintelligendum uero est, nisi ad iudicem maioris auctoritatis fuerit prouocatum. Tunc enim per appellationem soluta sententia firmitatem non obtinet. Unde Nicolaus Papa ait: [in epist. ad Carolum Regem, cuius initium: "Numquam dolorem generat."]

C. VI. What has once been determined may not be reconsidered, except where there is a greater authority.

What has once been well determined and decided with oaths interposed ought not to be reconsidered by any repetition, unless perhaps where there is a greater authority.

C. VI. Semel difinitum retractari non licet, nisi ubi maior auctoritas fuerit.

Quod bene semel diffinitum est et interpositis iuramentis deliberatum, nulla debet iteratione, nisi fortassis ubi fuerit maior auctoritas, retractari.

C. VII. In the renewal of a judgment the memory of blessed Peter is to be honored.

Likewise from the Council of Sardica, [c. 4]. Bishop Hosius said: "But if any bishop has been adjudged in some case and thinks that he has a good case, let another judgment be renewed. If it pleases you, let us honor the memory of Saint Peter the Apostle, so that those who examined the case, or also other bishops who dwell in the neighboring province, may write to the Roman bishop. And if he has judged that the judgment is to be renewed, let it be renewed and let him give judges. But if he has approved the case as being of such a kind that the things which were done should not be stirred anew, the things which the Roman bishop decrees shall be confirmed. Therefore, if this pleases all, let it be enacted." The synod responded: It pleases us. In book IV of the Code, title On Proofs: A plaintiff who declares that he is unable to prove what he asserts does not bind the defendant by a necessity of demonstrating the contrary, since by the nature of things there is no proof of a fact for one who denies it.

C. VII. In renouatione iudicii memoria B. Petri est habenda.

Item ex Concilio Sardicensi. [c. 4.] Osius episcopus dixit: "Quod si aliquis episcopus adiudicatus fuerit in aliqua causa, et putat se bonam causam habere, alterum iudicium renouetur, si uobis placet, S. Petri apostoli memoriam honoremus, ut scribatur uel ab his, qui examinauerunt, uel etiam ab aliis episcopis, qui in prouincia proxima morantur, Romano episcopo. Et si iudicauerit renouandum esse iudicium, renouetur et det iudices. Si autem probauerit talem causam ut ea non refricentur, que acta sunt, que decreuerit Romanus episcopus confirmata erunt. Si hoc ergo omnibus placet, statuatur." Sinodus respondit: Placet. Codicis libro IV. titulo de probationibus: Actor, quod asseuerat profitendo se probare non posse, reum necessitate monstrandi contrarium non astringit, cum per rerum naturam factum negantis probatio nulla sit.

Question V

GRATIAN. That, when the accuser fails, the defendant is not to be compelled to proof is proved by the authority of Gregory, who, [book V, letter 25], writing to Maximus, says:

GRATIANUS. Quod autem deficiente accusatore reus non sit cogendus ad probationem, auctoritate Gregorii probatur, qui [lib. V. epist. 25.] scribens Maximo ait:

C. I. The burden of proof does not lie upon the defendant.

As for your request that we ought to direct a person there through whom there can be proof concerning the things that are said, it would in some measure be excusable if legal reason ever imposed a necessity of proof upon the one who is accused. But since this burden lies not upon you but upon the accusers, do not fail to come to us without delay, as we said before. GRATIAN. The accused ought to prove not his denial but his exception:

> C. I. Onus probationis reo non incumbit.
> Quod autem postulas, ut illuc personam dirigere debeamus, qua de his, que dicuntur, possit esse probatio, esset utcumque excusabile, si umquam ratio ei, qui accusatur, necessitatem probationis inponeret. At postquam non tibi, sed accusantibus hoc onus incumbit, ad nos, sicut prefati sumus, dilatione cessante uenire non desinas. Gratian. Accusatus non negationem, sed exceptionem probare debet:

[C. II.]

GRATIAN. This, however, is to be observed when public report does not vex the defendant. For then, by the authority of the same Gregory, in order to remove scandal, the defendant ought to purge his reputation.

> [C. II.].

Causa VII

GRATIAN. A certain bishop, weighed down by a long illness, asked that another be substituted for him; the Supreme Pontiff assented to his prayers and granted him what he had asked. But afterward that same bishop recovered, and he desires that what he had previously done be rescinded; he raises a question against the one who had joined him and reclaims his chair as though it were owed to him. (Qu. I.) Here it is first asked whether, while a bishop is living, another can be ordained in the same church. (Qu. II.) Second, whether this man can reclaim the chair which another received through his intercession.

> GRATIANUS. Quidam longa inualetudine grauatus episcopus alium sibi substitui rogauit, cuius precibus summus Pontifex annuit, et quod rogauerat ei concessit. Postea uero conualuit idem episcopus, et quod prius fecerat cupit rescindi; aduersus eum, qui sibi accesserat, questionem mouet, suam cathedram tamquam sibi debitam reposcit. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, utrum uiuente episcopo alius possit in ecclesia eadem ordinari? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an iste ualeat reposcere cathedram, quam sua intercessione alter accepit?

Question I

GRATIAN. Part I. That, while a bishop is living, another cannot be placed or ordained over him was determined by the council celebrated at Auvergne, in which it is read: “Let no other bishop be placed or ordained over a bishop while he is living, unless perhaps into the place of one whom a capital fault has cast down.”

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod uiuente episcopo alius superponi aut superordinari non possit, ex concilio apud Aluerniam celebrato diffinitum est, in quo legitur: "ut nullus uiuente episcopo alius superponatur aut superordinetur episcopus, nisi forsitan in eius locum, quem capitalis culpa deiecerit."

C. I. A bishop shall not be deprived of his honor because of bodily affliction.

Likewise from the Register of Pope Gregory, [book IX, letter 41], to Anatolius, Deacon of Constantinople. Your love wrote to me that I should command a bishop to succeed my most reverend brother John, bishop of Justiniana Prima, because of the sickness of the head from which he suffers, lest perhaps, while that city does not have the rights of a bishop—which God forbid—it perish at the hands of the enemy. But the canons nowhere command that a bishop succeed because of the sickness of a bishop, and therefore it is unjust that, if a bodily affliction has assailed him, the sick man be deprived of his honor. But it is to be proposed that, if anyone in governance is sick, such an administrator be sought for him who can conduct all his care and preserve his place in the governance of the Church, without his being deposed, so that neither is almighty God offended nor is the city found to have been neglected.

C. I. Pro molesti corporis suo honore non priuetur episcopus.

Item ex Registro Gregorii Papae, [lib. IX. epist. 41.] ad Anatolium Constantinopolitanum Diaconem. Scripsit mihi dilectio tua, me reuerentissimo fratri meo Iohanni primae Iustinianae episcopo pro egritudine capitis, quam patitur, episcopum precipere succedi, ne fortasse, dum episcopi iura eadem ciuitas non habeat, (quod absit) ab hoste depereat. Et quod nusquam canones precipiunt, ut pro egritudine episcopi episcopus succedat, et ideo iniustum est, ut, si molestia corporis irruit, honore suo priuetur egrotus. Sed suggerendum est, ut si quis, in regimine, egrotat, dispensator illi talis requiratur, qui possit eius curam omnem agere, et locum illius in regimine ecclesiae (ipso non deposito) conseruare, ut neque Deus omnipotens offendatur, neque ciuitas neglecta esse inueniatur.

C. II. Affliction ought not to be added to those scourged by the Lord.

The same, [book II], in the letter [5] to Candidus. When a bodily blow threatens, whether it happens for purification or for vengeance, God's judgment in this matter is unknown; and therefore affliction ought not to be added by us to those scourged, lest the offense of their fault—which God forbid—look back upon us.

C. II. Flagellatis a Domino afflictio addi non debet.

Idem [lib. II.] in epistola [5.] ad Candidum. Cum percussio corporalis inminet, utrum pro purgatione, an pro uindicta contingat, Dei in hoc iudicium ignoratur, et ideo non debet a nobis flagellatis addi afflictio, ne nos culpae (quod absit) offensa respiciat.

C. III. One ought not to be deprived of his place because of infirmity.

Likewise Gregory to Bishop Clementius, Primate of Byzacena. Although the text of the petition submitted to you explains the complaint of Adeodatus, bearer of the present letters, who says that he was improperly expelled from the place of his priesthood, nevertheless we have judged that it should be unfolded a little more openly. For he asserts that our brother and fellow bishop Quincianus granted him leave from his place in order to arrange certain affairs of his, and that because of sickness he was absent from his church for a period of two months; and he asserts that our aforesaid brother, seizing upon the occasion of this matter, ordained another priest there in his place. Therefore, we exhort your fraternity to investigate his case solicitously and rigorously; and if you find that he was absent from his church because of manifest sickness, as is said, permit no prejudice to be generated against him from the ordination of another priest, but cause him to be restored to his place without any doubt. And below: § 1. But we specially admonish your love that, if his representation was true and he has been restored to his order, you ought to be carefully and rigorously solicitous concerning the priest who was ordained in his place. And if indeed he came to that order without any payment, so that he could not have fallen into the simoniacal heresy, we wish him to be ordained to any other vacant church. But if anything of this kind—which may the Lord avert—has been found in him, let him be deprived even of the order of priesthood, which he is proved to have received not for the cause of fulfilling the necessity of the Church but from ambition alone.

> C. III. Infirmitatis causa loco suo quis priuari non debet.
> Item Gregorius Clementio Episcopo Primati Vizanzeno. Presentium latoris Adeodati querelam, qui se sui presbiteratus loco incongrue dicit expulsum, licet subditae tibi textus explanet petitionis, tamen paulo iudicauimus apertius retexendam. Asserit namque a Quinciano fratre et coepiscopo nostro in loco suo quibusdam se suis ordinandis negotiis relaxatum, egritudinisque causa per duorum mensium spatium suae se ecclesiae defuisse; cuius rei occasionem captantem predictum fratrem nostrum alium loco eius presbiterum illic ordinasse. Hortamur itaque fraternitatem tuam, ut causam eius sollicite districteque perquiras, et, si manifestae egritudinis causa, sicut dicitur, ecclesiae suae eum defuisse repereris, nullum ei ex ordinatione alterius presbiteri permittas preiudicium generari, sed in loco suo eum fac sine aliqua dubietate restitui. Et infra: §. 1. Illud autem karitatem tuam specialiter ammonemus, ut, si uera fuerit huius suggestio, atque in suo ordine fuerit restitutus, de presbitero, qui in loco eius ordinatus est, subtiliter districteque esse sollicitus debeas. Et si quidem sine datione aliqua ad eundem ordinem uenit, ut in symoniacam heresim non potuisset incidere, in aliam quamcumque ecclesiam uacantem eum uolumus ordinari. Sin autem in eum quippiam (quod auertat Dominus) tale fuerit repertum, ipso etiam presbiteratus priuetur ordine, quem non causa replendae necessitatis ecclesiae, sed sola conprobatur ambitione suscepisse.

C. IV. Pontiffs are not to be cast aside because of infirmity or sickness, nor are others to be substituted in their place.

Likewise Nicholas to Alwin, Archbishop of Salzburg. Pontiffs who are occupied by some infirmity or sickness are not to be cast aside, nor ought others to be consecrated in their place unless they have been taken from this light. But if they complain concerning the ministry conceded to them, let priests fulfill the things which are lawful. In those things, however, which it is not lawful for them to presume, let the assistance of neighboring bishops be substituted until health is recovered, and let them perform this with zealous caution, lest ambition arising from presumption sprout through the occasion of necessity. But bishops who undertake the care and solicitude of the Lord's flock ought not to withdraw from their administration, so that the beauty of the talent received may not be effaced, but may be beneficially increased and tripled through their striving.

> C. IV. Pro infirmitate uel egritudine pontifices non sunt abiciendi, nec in eorum loco alii substituendi.
> Item Nicolaus Aluino Iouauiensi Archiepiscopo. Pontifices, qui aliqua occupantur infirmitate uel egritudine, abiciendi non sunt, nec alios in eorum loco consecrari oportet, nisi ex hac fuerint luce subtracti. Quod si de ministerio sibi concesso conqueruntur, que licita sunt sacerdotes expleant. In his uero, que his presumere non licet, uicinorum usque ad recipiendam sanitatem episcoporum auxilia subrogentur, et hoc cum cautelae studio peragant, ne per necessitatis occasionem presumptionis pullulet ambicio. Episcopos uero, qui dominici gregis suscipiunt curam atque sollicitudinem, ab amministratione eorum discedere non oportet, ut accepti talenti pulcritudo non deleatur, sed certamine eorum salubriter augeatur et triplicetur.

C. V. While a bishop is living, another cannot succeed him.

Likewise from a letter of Cyprian, Bishop and Martyr. Cornelius was made bishop by the judgment of God and His Christ, by the testimony of almost all the clerics, by the vote of the people who were then present, and by the consent of ancient priests and good men, when no one had been made before him, when the place of Fabian—that is, the place of Peter and the grade of the priestly chair—was vacant. Once that place had been occupied and confirmed by God's will and by the agreement of us all, whoever should thereafter wish to be made a bishop must be made one outside, and one who does not hold the unity of the Church does not have ecclesiastical ordination. Whoever he may be, although greatly boasting of himself and claiming very much for himself, he is profane, he is an outsider, he is outside. And since there cannot be one after the first, whoever has been made after the one who alone ought to be bishop is now not the second, but no bishop at all.

C. V. Viuente episcopo alius sibi succedere non ualet.

Item ex epistola Cipriani Episcopi et Martiris. Factus est Cornelius episcopus de Dei et Christi eius iudicio, de clericorum pene omnium testimonio, de plebis, que tunc affuit, suffragio, de sacerdotum antiquorum et bonorum uirorum consensu cum nemo ante se factus esset, cum Fabiani locus, id est cum locus Petri et gradus cathedrae sacerdotalis uacaret, quo occupato et de Dei uoluntate, atque omnium nostrum consensione firmato, quisquis iam episcopus fieri uoluerit, foris fiat necesse est, nec habeat ecclesiasticam ordinationem, qui ecclesiae non tenet unitatem. Quisquis ille fuerit, licet de se multum iactans et plurimum sibi uendicans, profanus est, alienus est, foris est. Et cum post primum esse non possit, quisquis post unum, qui solus esse debet factus est, iam non secundus ille, sed nullus est.

C. VI. One who has crept into the place of a living bishop is not a bishop.

Likewise from the same. Novatian is not a bishop: after Cornelius was made bishop in the Church by sixteen fellow bishops, Novatian strives through ambition to be made by deserters an adulterous and extraneous bishop. And although there is one Church from Christ throughout the whole world, divided into many members, and likewise one episcopate, diffused through the concordant multitude of many bishops, that man, after God's tradition and after the connected and everywhere joined unity of the Catholic Church, attempts to make a human church; and he sends his new apostles through very many cities so that he may establish certain recent foundations of his own institution. And although bishops have long since been ordained throughout all the provinces and individual cities, ancient in age, sound in faith, proved under pressure, and proscribed in persecution, that man dares to create other pseudo-bishops over them, as though he could either traverse the whole world by the obstinacy of a new attempt or tear apart the fabric of ecclesiastical order by the sowing of his discord, not knowing that schismatics always burn hot at their beginnings but cannot have growth or increase what they began unlawfully, but immediately fail together with their depraved rivalry. And below: § 1. Therefore, one who observes neither the unity of the Spirit nor the bond of peace, and separates himself from the bond of the Church and from the college of priests, can have neither the power nor the honor of a bishop, since he wished to have neither the unity nor the peace of the episcopate.

> Item eiusdem. Nouatianus episcopus non est, qui Cornelio episcopo in ecclesia a sedecim coepiscopis facto, adulter atque extraneus episcopus fieri a desertoribus per ambitum nititur, et cum sit a Christo una ecclesia per totum mundum in multa membra diuisa, item episcopatus unus, multorum episcoporum concordi numerositate diffusus, ille post Dei traditionem, post connexam et ubique coniunctam catholicae ecclesiae unitatem, humanam conatur ecclesiam facere, et per plurimas ciuitates nouos suos apostolos mittit, ut quedam recentia institutionis suae fundamenta constituat; cumque iampridem per omnes prouincias et per urbes singulas ordinati sint episcopi in etate antiqui, in fide integri in pressura probati, in persecutione proscripti, ille super eos creare alios pseudoepiscopos audet, quasi possit aut totum orbem noui conatus obstinatione peragrare, aut ecclesiastici ordinis conpaginem discordiae suae seminatione rescindere, nesciens scismaticos semper inter initia feruere, incrementa uero habere non posse, nec augere quod illicite ceperint, sed statim cum praua sua emulatione deficere. Et infra: §. 1. Qui ergo nec unitatem Spiritus, nec coniunctionem pacis obseruat, et se ab ecclesiae uinculo atque a sacerdotum collegio separat, episcopi nec potestatem potest habere, nec honorem, qui episcopatus nec unitatem uoluit habere, nec pacem.

C. VII. One who does not have peace with the bishop is not in the Church.

The same to Puppianus, [in the same book IV, letter 6]. You ought to know that the bishop is in the Church and the Church in the bishop, and that, if anyone is not with the bishop, he is not in the Church; and that those who, not having peace with the priests of God, creep in and believe that they secretly communicate among certain persons flatter themselves in vain, since the Church, which is one and catholic, has not been torn or divided.

> C. VII. Non est in ecclesia qui cum episcopo pacem non habet.
> Idem ad Pappianum. [eodem lib. IV. epist. 6.] Scire debes episcopum in ecclesia esse, et ecclesiam in episcopo, et si quis cum episcopo non sit, in ecclesia non esse, et frustra sibi blandiri eos, qui pacem sacerdotibus Dei non habentes obrepunt, et latenter apud quosdam communicare se credunt, quando ecclesia, que catholica una est, scissa non sit neque diuisa.

C. VIII. One ought not to yield his own right.

The same, [to Jubaianus]. Holy Scripture declares how dangerous it is in divine matters for anyone to yield his own right and power, since Esau thereby lost his rights of primacy and could not afterward receive what he had once yielded.

> C. VIII. Suo iure quis cedere non debet.
> Idem. [ad Iubaianum] Quam periculosum sit in diuinis rebus ut quis cedat iure suo et potestate, scriptura sancta declarat, cum Esau primatus suos inde perdidit, nec recipere postmodum potuit, quod semel cessit.

C. IX. Those who withdraw from bishops and tear apart the unity of the Church acquire perdition for themselves.

The same, [book I, letter 6 to Magnus]. Finally, divine Scripture in the books of Kings declares how inseparable is the sacrament of unity, and how those who make a schism and, after abandoning the bishop, establish another pseudo-bishop for themselves outside are without hope and acquire the greatest perdition for themselves from God's indignation. There the ten tribes were torn away from the tribe of Judah and Benjamin and, after abandoning their own king, established another for themselves outside. "And the Lord," it says, "was indignant with all the seed of Israel, and He destroyed them and gave them over to plunder until He cast them away from His face, because Israel was scattered from the house of David, and they established for themselves Jeroboam, son of Nebat, as king." It said that God was indignant and that He gave them over to perdition because, scattered from unity, they had established another king for themselves. And so great was the Lord's indignation against those who made the schism that, even when a man of God had been sent to Jeroboam to reproach him with his sins and foretell the vengeance to come, he was forbidden to eat bread and drink water among them. When he did not observe this and dined contrary to the Lord's command, he was immediately struck by divine censure, so that, while returning thence, he was killed on the road by a lion's attack and bite. § 1. But still in His Gospel the Lord manifests a greater light of His meaning: those same persons who had then torn themselves away from the tribe of Judah and Benjamin and, after abandoning Jerusalem, had withdrawn to Samaria were numbered among false prophets and gentiles. For when He first sent the disciples into the ministry of salvation, He commanded and said: "Do not go into the way of the gentiles, and do not enter into the cities of the Samaritans." Sending them first to the Jews, He commands that the gentiles still be passed by. But by adding that the city of the Samaritans also ought to be omitted, where the schismatics were, He shows that schismatics are equated with gentiles. And a little later: § 2. But the fact that they are said to know the same whom we know as God the Father, the same Son, and the same Holy Spirit cannot assist such persons. For Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, together with Aaron the priest and Moses, knew the same God; living by an equal law and religion, they invoked the one and true God who was to be worshiped and invoked. Nevertheless, because they transgressed the ministry of their place and against Aaron the priest—who had received the lawful priesthood by God's favor and ordination—claimed for themselves license to sacrifice, when struck divinely they immediately paid penalties for their unlawful attempts; nor could the sacrifices irreligiously and unlawfully offered contrary to the law of divine disposition be valid and profitable. The censers themselves also, in which incense had been offered unlawfully, were melted by the Lord's command and purified by fire and drawn out into beaten plates and affixed to the altar, so that they might not thereafter be in use by the priests, but rather present to posterity a memory of divine indignation and vengeance for their correction, according to what divine Scripture says: "A memorial," it says, "for the children of Israel, so that no stranger who is not of the seed of Aaron may approach to place incense before the Lord, lest he be like Korah." And yet those men had not made a schism or, going outside, rebelliously risen in an impudent and hostile manner against the Lord's priests, which those who now tear apart the Church and rebel against the peace and unity of Christ attempt to do, establishing a chair for themselves, assuming primacy, and claiming the license to baptize and offer, etc.

C. IX. Perditionem sibi adquirunt qui ab episcopis recedentes unitatem ecclesiae scindunt.

Idem. [lib. I. epist. 6. ad Magnum] Denique quam sit inseparabile unitatis sacramentum, et quam sine spe sint, et perditionem sibi maximam de indignatione Dei adquirant qui scisma faciunt et relicto episcopo alium sibi foris pseudoepiscopum constituunt, declarat scriptura diuina in libris Regnorum, ubi a tribu Iuda et Beniamin decem tribus scissae sunt, et relicto rege suo alterum sibi foris constituerunt. "Et indignatus est," inquit, "Dominus semini omni Israel, et demoliuit eos, et dedit eos in direptionem, donec abiceret eos a facie sua, quia dissipatus est Israel a domo Dauid, et constituerunt sibi regem Ieroboam, filium Nabath." Indignatum esse Deum dixit, et eos in perditionem dedisse, quia ab unitate dissipati alterum sibi regem constituissent. Et tanta indignatio Domini extitit aduersus illos, qui scisma fecerunt, ut etiam cum homo Dei ad Ieroboam missus esset, qui ei peccata sua exprobraret atque ultionem futuram prediceret, panem apud illos edere et aquam bibere uetaretur. Quod cum non custodisset et contra preceptum Domini prandisset, statim diuina censura percussus est, ut inde regrediens inpetu ac morsu leonis in itinere necaretur. §. 1. Sed adhuc in euangelio suo Dominus, maiorem suae intelligentiae lucem manifestat, quod idem, qui tunc se a tribu Iuda et Beniamin sciderant, et Ierosolimis relictis Samariam secesserant, inter pseudoprophetas et gentiles conputarentur. Nam cum primum discipulos in ministerium salutis mitteret, mandauit et dixit: "In uiam gentium ne abieritis, et in ciuitates Samaritanorum ne intraueritis." Ad Iudeos prius mittens gentiles adhuc preteriri iubet. Addendo autem et ciuitatem Samaritanorum debere omitti, ubi erant scismatici, ostendit scismaticos gentibus adequari. Et post pauca: §. 2. Quod uero eundem, quem nos Deum Patrem, eundem Filium, eundem Spiritum sanctum nosse dicuntur, nec hoc adiuuare tales potest. Nam et Chore, et Dathan, et Abiron cum sacerdote Aaron et Moyse eundem Deum nouerant, pari lege et religione uiuentes unum et uerum Deum, qui colendus atque inuocandus fuerat, inuocabant: tamen quia loci sui ministerium transgressi et contra Aaron sacerdotem, qui sacerdotium legitimum dignatione Dei atque ordinatione perceperat, sacrificandi sibi licentiam uendicauerunt, diuinitus percussi penas statim pro illicitis conatibus penderunt, nec potuerunt rata esse et proficere sacrificia irreligiose et illicite contra ius diuinae dispositionis oblata. Thuribula quoque ipsa, in quibus incensum illicite fuerat oblatum, ne in usu de cetero essent sacerdotibus, sed potius indignationis et ultionis diuinae memoriam corrigendi posteris exhiberent, iussu Domini conflata atque igne purgata, in laminas ductiles producuntur, et affiguntur altari, secundum quod loquitur diuina scriptura: "Memoriale," inquit, "filiis Israel, ut non accedat quisquam alienigena, qui non est ex semine Aaron, inponere incensum ante Dominum ut non sit sicut Chore." Et tamen illi scisma non fecerant, nec foras egressi contra Domini sacerdotes inpudenter atque hostiliter rebellauerant, quod nunc hi ecclesiam scindentes, et contra pacem atque unitatem Christi rebelles, cathedram sibi constituere, et primatum assumere, et baptizandi atque offerendi licentiam uendicare conantur etc.

C. X. One who invades the place of a living man is not to be defended.

Likewise Leo IV to Nomenoe, Duke of Brittany. You ought no longer, on account of the gifts of any reward, to defend the thief and robber that we perceive Gislard to be in the see of Nantes, who did not fear to usurp the place of a living man, which was not lawful.

C. X. Non est defendendus qui uiuentis locum inuadit.

Item Leo IV. Nomenio, Duci Britanniae. Non furem, et latronem, qualem Gislardum esse sentimus in Nannetica sede, qui uiuentis (quod non licuit) non timuit locum usurpare, pro cuiuscumque muneris donis ultra debes defensare.

C. XI. A bishop is not permitted to abandon his church.

Likewise Pope Evaristus, [letter II], to all Bishops. Just as a man ought not to commit adultery against his wife, so neither ought a bishop to commit adultery against his church, that is, by abandoning the one to which he was consecrated. And just as a wife is not permitted to abandon her husband so that, while he is living, she may join herself to another in marriage and thus commit adultery against him, although her husband has fornicated, but according to the Apostle she ought either to be reconciled to her husband or remain unmarried, so a church is not permitted to abandon her bishop or separate herself from him so that, while he is living, she may receive another; but let her either have him or remain unmarried, that is, let her not receive another bishop while her own is living, lest she incur the crime either of fornication or of adultery. But if she has committed adultery, that is, if she has joined herself to another, has brought another bishop over herself, or has caused or desired him to be bishop, let her either be reconciled to her own bishop through the most severe penance or remain unmarried. § 1. A bishop, however, ought in season and out of season, and without interruption, to teach his church and prudently to govern and love her, so that she may abstain from vices and be able to attain eternal salvation. And she ought to receive his teaching with such reverence and to love and cherish him as a legate of God and herald of truth. GRATIAN. Behold, by these authorities it is plainly shown that, while a bishop is living, another cannot be ordained over him, not even because of his sickness. But that statement of Gregory must be understood when the one who is sick does not ask for another to be substituted for him. Otherwise, when anyone weighed down by either old age or infirmity cannot administer the office undertaken, if he has asked for another to be substituted for him, it can reasonably be done. Hence it follows in the same chapter: "But if that same John has perhaps asked on account of his affliction that he ought to be released from the honor of bishop, it is to be granted when he submits the petition in writing; otherwise we are unable to do it." Hence also blessed Augustine received the episcopal chair while his bishop was not yet dead but weighed down by old age. Hence it is read in the [sole] letter of Paulinus to Romanianus:

C. XI. Non licet episcopo ecclesiam suam dimittere.

Item Euaristus Papa. [epist. II.] omnibus Episcopis. Sicut uir non debet adulterare uxorem suam, ita nec episcopus ecclesiam suam, id est ut illam dimittat, ad quam consecratus est. Et sicut uxori non licet dimittere uirum suum, ut alteri se uiuente eo matrimonio societ ut eum adulteret, licet fornicatus sit eius uir, sed iuxta Apostolum aut uiro suo debet reconciliari, aut manere innupta, ita ecclesiae non licet dimittere episcopum suum, aut se ab eo segregare, ut alterum uiuente eo accipiat; sed aut ipsum habeat, aut innupta maneat, id est alterum episcopum suo uiuente non accipiat, ne aut fornicationis aut adulterii crimen incurrat. Si uero adulterata fuerit, id est si se alteri iunxerit, aut super se alterum episcopum adduxerit, aut esse fecerit uel desiderauerit, per acerrimam penitentiam aut suo reconcilietur episcopo, aut innupta permaneat. §. 1. Episcopo uero oportet oportune et inportune, atque sine intermissione ecclesiam suam docere, eamque prudenter regere et amare, ut a uiciis se abstineat et salutem consequi possit eternam. Et illa cum tanta reuerentia eius doctrinam debet suscipere, eumque amare et diligere ut legatum Dei et preconem ueritatis. Gratian. Ecce his auctoritatibus patenter ostenditur, quod episcopo uiuente alius superordinari non potest, nec etiam pro eius egritudine. Sed illud Gregorii intelligendum est, quando ille, qui egrotat, alium sibi substitui non rogat. Ceterum, quando aliquis uel senectute, uel infirmitate grauatus susceptum offitium amministrare non ualet, si alium sibi substitui petierit, rationabiliter fieri potest. Unde in eodem capitulo sequitur: "Si uero idem Iohannes fortasse pro molestia sua petierit, ut ab episcopi honore debeat uacare, eo petitionem dante scripto, concedendum est; aliter id facere non ualemus." Hinc etiam B. Augustinus episcopo suo nondum defuncto, sed senectute grauato, cathedram episcopalem suscepit. Unde in epistola Paulini [unica] ad Romanum legitur:

C. XII. Augustine did not so much succeed as accede.

But we wrote that not only this was to be a cause for rejoicing, that Augustine had received the episcopate, but that by God's grace he had merited this care for the African Church, so that it might receive heavenly words through Augustine's mouth; for he was advanced to the greater grace of the Lord's gift in a new manner and was consecrated in such a way that he did not succeed the bishop in the chair, but acceded to him. For while Valerius, bishop of the church of Hippo, was still alive, Augustine was his fellow bishop. GRATIAN. This same thing is proved by the authority of blessed Gregory, who substituted another for the bishop of Rimini when he was suffering pain of the head, writing thus in his Register, [book VII, indiction 2, letter 49], chapter 238:

> C. XII. Augustinus non tam successit quam accessit.
> Non autem hoc tantum scripsimus gratulandum, quod episcopatum Augustinus acceperit, sed quod hanc curam Dei gratia meruerit Africanae ecclesiae ut uerba celestia Augustini ore perciperet, qui ad maiorem dominici muneris gratiam nouo more prouectus ita consecratus est, ut non succederet in cathedra episcopo, sed accederet. Nam incolumi Valerio Ipponensis ecclesiae episcopo coepiscopus Augustinus est. Gratian. Hoc idem probatur auctoritate B. Gregorii, qui Ariminensi episcopo, dolore capitis laboranti, alterum subrogauit, ita scribens in [VII. libr.] Registro suo, [Indict. 2., ep. 49.] capitulo 238.:

C. XIII. Another can be substituted for a bishop weighed down by infirmity.

Your fraternity learned long ago how, because bodily affliction impeded the priest ordained by us, as is known, the church of Rimini has thus far been destitute of pastoral and priestly governance. Moved by the prayers of the inhabitants of that place, we have often exhorted him that, if he felt himself to have improved from that same affliction of the head by which he was detained, he should return to his church with God's aid. After intervals had been granted, he has been awaited during these four years. While we were exhorting him more insistently, both when clerics or citizens came here and when they pressed us with prayers, that, if he was able, he should return with them with the Lord's aid, he sought from us by a written petition that, because on account of the same affliction by which he is detained he was entirely unable to rise to the governance of that church or the office undertaken, we ought to ordain a bishop for Christ's Church. Hence, because the enjoined care and solicitude of all the churches constrains us lest pastoral custody be absent any longer from the flock of the faithful, compelled by their prayers and by this man's renunciation arising from his inability, it seemed to us that a bishop ought to be ordained for that same church of Rimini; and, after precepts had been given according to custom, we did not cease to admonish the clergy and people of that same church to come together with concordant providence to choose a bishop for themselves. Therefore, we exhort your fraternity to cause the man whom all have chosen with one consent to be summoned to you, as they themselves are known to have requested from us. Examine him by a careful examination in all respects; and if, with the Lord's aid, the things contained in the text of the Heptateuch have in no way been found in him, and if his life has also pleased you upon the report of faithful persons, send him to us with the document of your decree, with a letter of attestation also added, so that, with the Lord disposing, he may be consecrated by us as bishop of that same church.

> C. XIII. Episcopo grauato infirmitate alius subrogari potest.

Qualiter ordinati a nobis sacerdotis, corporis, quia notum est, inpediente molestia, Ariminensis ecclesia pastorali hactenus ac sacerdotali sit regimine destituta, dudum fraternitas uestra cognouit. Quem dudum habitatorum illius loci precibus permoti sepius hortati sumus, ut si de eadem capitis, qua detinebatur, molestia, melioratum esse se sentiret, ad suam auxiliante Deo reuerteretur ecclesiam. Qui datis induciis in hoc quadriennio expectatur. Quem, dum cleri, uel ciuium huc uenientium, nosque precibus arguentium instantius hortaremur, ut, si ualeret, cum eis auxiliante Domino remearet, datis scriptis suplicatione nos petit, ut quia ad eiusdem ecclesiae regimen uel susceptum offitium pro eadem, qua detinetur, molestia assurgere nullatenus posset, ecclesiae Christi episcopum ordinare deberemus. Unde, quia cunctarum ecclesiarum iniuncta cura sollicitudinis nos constringit, ne diutius gregi fidelium desit pastoralis custodia, illorum precibus huius ex sui inpossibilitate renunciatione conpulsi, uisum est nobis eidem Ariminensi ecclesiae debere episcopum ordinari, et datis ex more preceptis, clerum plebemque eiusdem ecclesiae non destitimus ammonere, quatinus ad eligendum sibi antistitem concordi prouisione concurrant. Hortamur ergo, ut fraternitas uestra eum, quem uno consensu omnes elegerint, sicut et ipsi a nobis poposcisse noscuntur, ad se faciat euocari, quem cauta ex omnibus examinatione discutite, et si, in eo, que in textu Eptatici continentur, minime Domino opitulante fuerint reperta, atque fidelium personarum relatione eius quoque uita uobis placuerit, ad nos eum cum decreti uestri pagina, addita quoque testificationis epistola destinate, quatinus eiusdem a nobis ecclesiae Domino disponente consecretur antistes.

C. XIV. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the same chapter 232, to Bishop Eleutherius. Although what we say is very grievous to us and reproves us through brotherly compassion rather than permits us to determine anything concerning what has been heard, nevertheless the solicitude of the governance undertaken strikes our heart with an urgent goad, so that with great care we may provide for the churches, lest any benefit of theirs be able to perish. It has therefore come to us, through the reports of certain persons, that a certain bishop has incurred so severe an affliction of the head that what he is accustomed to do with his mind deranged is to be heard with groaning and weeping. Therefore, lest, while the shepherd is languishing, the flock—which God forbid—be exposed to be torn by the teeth of the plotter, or the benefits of that church perish, it is necessary for us to deliberate with cautious provision. And therefore, because the necessity of infirmity, not a crime, withdraws the living bishop from his office, no reason permits another to be ordained in his place unless he refuses it; but if he is accustomed to have intervals in his illness, let him himself, upon giving a petition, confess that he is no longer able to rise to this ministry because infirmity overthrows him, and let him request that another be ordained in his place. When this has been done, by the solemn election of all let another who shall have been worthy be ordained bishop, yet in such a way that, for as long as life holds that bishop in this world, the support owed to him is supplied from the same church. But if at no time he returns to the functioning of a sound mind, a faithful person of approved life is to be chosen, one who can be suitable for the governance of the church, take thought for the benefit of souls, bind the restless under the bond of discipline, exercise care for ecclesiastical affairs, and show himself mature and effective in all things; and if he survives the bishop who is now ill, he ought to be consecrated in his place. PART II. GRATIAN. But lest, when priests are suddenly seized by afflictions of this kind, an office begun remain unfinished, it has been established that a priest, whether singing psalms or offering sacrifice, have others with him who, if a case of this kind intervenes, may be able to complete the mysteries begun. Hence in the Eleventh Council of Toledo, [c. 14]:

C. XIV. De eodem.

Item ex eodem capitulo 232. ad Eleutherium Episcopum. Quamuis triste nobis sit ualde quod loquimur, atque fraterna nos conpassione potius arguat, quam aliquid de auditis diffinire permittat, suscepti tamen sollicitudo regiminis cor nostrum instanti pulsat aculeo, magna nos ecclesiis cura prospicere, ne qua earum possit utilitas deperire. Peruenit igitur ad nos quibusdam referentibus, quemdam episcopum ita passionem capitis incurrisse, ut quod mente alienata agere soleat gemitus et fletus audire sit. Ne ergo languente pastore grex (quod absit) insidiatoris laniandus dentibus exponatur, uel ecclesiae ipsius utilitates depereant, cauta nos necesse est prouisione tractare. Et ideo, quia uiuentem episcopum ab offitio suo necessitas infirmitatis, non crimen abducit, alium loco eius (nisi recusante eo) nulla sinit ratio ordinari; sed si interualla egritudinis habere est solitus, ipse data petitione non se ulterius ad hoc ministerium subuertente infirmitate posse fateatur assurgere, et alium loco suo expetat ordinandum. Quo facto omnium solempniter electione alter, qui dignus fuerit, episcopus ordinetur, sic tamen, ut quousque eundem episcopum in hoc seculo uita tenuerit, sumptus ei debiti de eadem ecclesia ministrentur. Enimuero si nullo tempore ad sanae mentis redit offitium, persona fidelis ac uitae probabilis est eligenda, que ad regimen ecclesiae idonea possit existere, atque de animarum utilitate cogitare, inquietos sub disciplinae uinculo constringere, ecclesiasticarum rerum curam gerere, et maturum atque efficacem in omnibus se exhibere, qui etiam episcopo, qui nunc egrotat, superstes, loco eius debeat consecrari. II. Pars. Gratian. Ne autem huiuscemodi passionibus sacerdotibus subito occupatis ceptum offitium inexpletum remaneat, institutum est, ut sacerdos, siue psallens siue sacrificans, alios secum habeat, qui, si huiusmodi casus interuenerit, inchoata misteria perficere ualeant. Unde in Tolletano Concilio XI. [c. 14.]

C. XV. Let every priest offering sacrifice have a neighboring priest who may complete the sacraments begun if some necessity befalls him.

With each person keeping in mind that saying of the divine oracle in which it is written, "Woe to one who is alone, because, when he falls, he has no one to raise him up," it must be most greatly feared and guarded against by us lest, at those hours and times in which psalms are sung or sacrifice is offered to the Lord, a dangerous affliction or any bodily malady befall anyone attending alone to the divine offices, one which either causes the body suddenly to collapse or confounds the mind by derangement or terror. Therefore, guarding against cases of this kind, we have thought it necessary to establish that, wherever an abundance of time, place, or clergy affords it, whoever is singing to God and offering sacrifice have behind him a helper from nearby as a solace, so that, if by some accident the one who approaches to complete the offices is disturbed or dashed to the ground, he may always have behind him one who will execute his function without fear.

C. XV. Quisque sacrificans sacerdotem sibi uicinum habeat, qui cepta sacramenta expleat, si ei aliqua necessitas ingruerit.

Illud diuini oraculi mente singuli precauentes, quo scribitur: "Vae soli, quia, cum ceciderit, non habet subleuantem," summopere nobis uerendum est et cauendum, ne horis illis atque temporibus, quibus Domino psallitur uel sacrificatur, unicuique diuinis offitiis singulariter insistenti perniciosa passio uel quelibet corporis ualitudo occurrat, que aut corpus subito obrui faciat, aut mentem alienatione uel terrore confundat. Huiusmodi ergo casibus precauentes necessarium duximus instituere, ut ubi temporis, uel loci, siue clerici copia suffragatur habeat quisquis ille canens Deo atque sacrificans post se uicini solaminis adiutorem, ut si aliquo casu ille, qui offitia inpleturus accedit, turbatus fuerit uel ad terram elisus, a tergo semper habeat qui eius uicem exequatur intrepidus.

C. XVI. If a priest has been forestalled by necessity, let the sacraments begun be completed by another.

Likewise from the Eighth Council of Toledo, [c. 2]. Let nothing contrary to the statute of the order be presumed by an act of rashness, nor let those things which are held in the highest veneration be dissolved by any presumption, since they were commanded to be done for this purpose alone: that they may not be known to have been interrupted, lest through the occurrence of illness nature be deprived of the strength of salvation. Therefore, not only is provision made for human frailty, but care is also taken for the sacred ministries of God with solicitude. We have therefore judged it fitting that, when the holy mysteries are consecrated by priests during Masses, if an occurrence of any illness happens by which one cannot complete the ministry of consecration begun, it shall be permitted to another bishop or priest to carry out the consecration of the office begun. For nothing else is fitting for the completion of mysteries that have been initiated except that they be completed by the blessing either of the priest who began or of one who follows, because they cannot appear perfected unless they are completed according to the order of perfection. For since we are all one in Christ, difference forms nothing contrary where the unity of faith makes present the efficacy of prosperity. And let the clerics of every order not doubt that this provision is indivisible for them, but, as was stated before, let others gladly succeed those preceding them for the sake of completion. Nevertheless, let not what is provided because of the infirmity of nature be turned to the ruin of presumption: let no one celebrate Masses after taking food or any drink, however little; let no minister or priest, after he has begun, presume to leave the offices wholly incomplete without a manifest occurrence of illness. If anyone rashly presumes this, he shall sustain a sentence of excommunication. PART III. GRATIAN. Behold, it is plainly shown that, at the request of a bishop weighed down by infirmity, another may be substituted, also through the prayers of the people. But to one weighed down by old age there ought to be given not a successor but a coadjutor, who will succeed to his place of governance when he dies. Thus Augustine is said to have acceded to, not succeeded, the bishop of the people of Hippo. Hence Pope Zacharias also writes to Boniface, Archbishop of Mainz:

C. XVI. Si sacerdos necessitate preoccupatus fuerit, cepta sacramenta per alium expleantur.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano VIII. [c. 2.] Nichil contra ordinis statutum temeritatis ausu presumatur, neque illa, que summa ueneratione censentur, ulla presumptione soluantur, cum ad hoc tantum fieri iussa sunt, ne interrupta noscantur, ne languoris prouentu robore salutis natura priuetur. Non ergo solum fragilitati consulitur humanae, sed sacris etiam ministeriorum Dei prouidetur sollicitudine. Censuimus ergo conuenire, ut cum a sacerdotibus missarum tempore sancta misteria consecrantur, si egritudinis accidat cuiuslibet euentus, quo ceptum nequeat consecrationis explere ministerium, sit liberum episcopo uel presbitero alteri consecrationem exequi cepti offitii. Non enim aliud ad supplementum initiatis misteriis conpetit, quam aut incipientis aut subsequentis benedictione conpleta sint sacerdotis, quia nec perfecta uideri possunt, nisi perfectionis ordine conpleantur. Cum enim simus omnes in Christo unum, nichil contrarium diuersitas format, ubi efficaciam prosperitatis unitas fidei representat. Quod etiam consultum cuncti ordinis clerici indiuiduum sibi esse non ambigant, sed, ut premissum est, precedentibus alii libenter pro conplemento succedant. Nec tamen quod naturae languoris causa consulitur in presumptionis perniciem conuertatur, nullus post cibum potumque quemlibet minimum sumptum missas facere, nullus absque patenti prouentu molestiae minister uel sacerdos, cum ceperit, inperfecta offitia presumat relinquere omnino. Si quis hoc temerarie presumpserit, excommunicationis sententiam sustinebit. III. Pars. Gratian. Ecce, quod episcopo petente, precibus etiam populi, infirmitate grauato alius possit subrogari, patenter monstratur. Senectute autem grauato non successor, sed coadiutor dari debet, qui ei decedenti in locum regiminis succedat. Sic Augustinus dicitur accessisse, non successisse Ypponensium episcopo. Hinc etiam Zacharias Papa scribit Bonifatio Maguntino Archiepiscopo:

C. XVII. A coadjutor is to be given to one weighed down by old age, who shall succeed him when he dies.

You requested that, with our counsel, because old age and bodily weakness have come upon you, if you can find another, you ought to place him in the same see over which you preside in place of your person. But, with God as helper, we offer this counsel to your holiness: that, for the salvation of rational souls, with Christ as patron, you in no way leave the see of the church of Mainz which you hold. But if the Lord, in accordance with your petition, shall give a perfect man who can have solicitude and care for the salvation of souls, you will ordain him bishop in place of your person, and he will be one who seeks out and strengthens the church of God in every place in the Gospel entrusted to you and in bearing the ministry of Christ. Likewise: § 1. If divine clemency wills him to survive after the day of your passing, if you know him to be suitable and it has been determined in your will, at that hour when you know that you are about to migrate from the present world, designate him your successor in the presence of all, so that he may come here to be ordained. We do not allow to any other the thing which, under the compulsion of charity, we have judged should be granted to you. Likewise: § 2. But concerning him whom you said you wished to establish as your successor, so that at your command he might be elected bishop in your place, we do not allow this under any reasoning, because it is shown to be contrary to every ecclesiastical rule and the institutions of the Fathers; but we wish him to minister to you and to be your helper in the Gospel of Christ. § 3. For it is manifest that it would be exceedingly blameworthy for us to substitute another for you while you are living; but we admonish this: that you not cease to pray that God grant you that successor who can be pleasing to Him and be able to govern the people irreproachably.

C. XVII. Senectute grauato coadiutor est dandus, qui morienti succedat.

Petisti, ut cum nostro consultu pro superueniente tibi senectute atque corporis inbecillitate, si inuenire poteris alium in eandem sedem, in qua prees, pro tua persona debeas collocare. Nos uero adiutore Deo consilium prebemus tuae sanctitati, ut pro salute animarum rationabilium fautore Christo sedem, quam obtines, Maguntinae ecclesiae nequaquam relinquas. Sin uero Dominus dederit iuxta tuam petitionem hominem perfectum, qui possit sollicitudinem habere, et curam pro salute animarum pro tui persona ordinabis illum episcopum, eritque in euangelio tibi credito et ministerio Christi portando in omni loco requirens et confortans ecclesiam Dei. Item: §. 1. Si eundem uoluerit diuina clementia post diem tui transitus superesse, si eum aptum cognoueris, et in tua uoluntate fuerit diffinitum, ea hora, qua te de presenti seculo migraturum cognoueris, presentibus cunctis tibi successorem designa, ut huc ueniat ordinandus. Hoc nulli alii concedi patimur, quod tibi karitate cogente largiri censuimus. Item: §. 2. De eo autem, quem tibi successorem constituere dixisti, ut te iubente in tuo loco eligatur episcopus, hoc nulla ratione concedi patimur, quia contra omnem ecclesiasticam regulam uel instituta Patrum esse monstratur; sed uolumus, ut tibi ministret, et sit in euangelio Christi adiutor. §. 3. Nimis enim reprehensibile esse manifestum est, ut te uiuente alium tibi substituamus; sed hoc conmonemus, ut orare non cesses, ut tibi Deus illum successorem concedat, qui ei possit esse placabilis, et populum irreprehensibiliter regere ualeat.

C. XVIII. Not a successor but a coadjutor is given to a living bishop.

Likewise Pope Pelagius to the Clergy of Narni. Because our brother and fellow bishop John, persuaded by concern for ecclesiastical utility and, with praiseworthy consideration, by the simplicity of his nature, confesses himself by no means suitable for exercising the care of governing the patrimony or for preserving ecclesiastical discipline, he requested for this reason that the person of the priest Constitutus be applied to him for carrying these things out, so that, with what is necessary being arranged by competent solicitude, nothing indecent or useless may be permitted to be done. And therefore by the present command we instruct you that, with reverence first preserved toward the aforesaid bishop, which it befits us to show blamelessly, you offer competent obedience in all things pertaining to the service of divine worship or which care for ecclesiastical utility has urged should be performed, so that, resisting his arrangements in nothing with a contumacious spirit, but rather fulfilling with a competent effort of your vigilance those things which he has admonished should be done for ecclesiastical utility, with these matters thus arranged both your customary stipends may be supplied to you and whatever is necessary in the patrimony of the aforesaid church or in recovering the things pertaining to it may be completed. GRATIAN. But that statement of Cyprian is to be understood concerning heretics who strive to usurp the churches of Catholics for themselves. § 1. But that statement of Pope Evaristus is to be understood when neither an unavoidable necessity—of persecutors, namely—nor an apostolic or regular transfer, but ambition alone compels a bishop to pass from church to church. § 2. Hence, when at the beginning of his chapter he had said, "A bishop ought not to leave his church," he afterward added: "Apart from unavoidable necessity or an apostolic or regular transfer, and to join himself to another through a desire for advancement."

PART IV. § 3. For whoever, because of ambition, has despised the modest size of his own church and has wished to transfer to a greater church ought to be recalled to his own. But if he has despised returning, let him lack both the other and his own. Hence it is read in the Council of Nicaea, [c. 15]:

C. XVIII. Non successor, sed coadiutor uiuenti episcopo datur.

Item Pelagius Papa Clero Narniensi. Quia frater et coepiscopus noster Iohannes, ecclesiasticae utilitatis studio suadente, et naturae suae simplicitate laudabili consideratione tractata, ob hoc, quod se in gerenda patrimonii gubernandi cura uel in disciplina ecclesiastica conseruanda minime fatetur idoneum, Constituti presbiteri ad hec explenda sibi poposcit adhiberi personam, ut ea, que sunt necessaria, conpetenti disponente sollicitudine, nichil indecens uel inutile fieri permittatur. Ideoque presenti uobis iussione precipimus, ut seruata primo in loco memorato episcopo reuerentia, quam nos conuenit inculpabiliter exhibere, in omnibus, que ad diuini cultus obsequium pertinent, uel ecclesiasticae utilitatis cura peragere suaserit, prebeatis obedientiam conpetentem, ut in nullo dispositionibus eius spiritu contumaci resultantes, imo conpetenti uigilantiae uestrae studio, que pro ecclesiastica utilitate gerenda monuerit, adinplentes, ut his ita dispositis et consueta uobis stipendia ministrentur, et quecumque in prefato ecclesiae patrimonio uel de rebus ad eam pertinentibus repetendis sunt necessaria, conpleantur. Gratian. Illud uero Cipriani de hereticis intelligendum est, qui catholicorum ecclesias sibi usurpare contendunt. §. 1. Illud uero Euaristi Papae tunc intelligendum est, quando nec ineuitabilis necessitas (persecutorum uidelicet) nec apostolica aut regularis mutacio, sed sola ambicio episcopum de ecclesia ad ecclesiam transire cogit. §. 2. Unde cum in principio sui capituli diceret: "Episcopus non debet dimittere ecclesiam suam," subsequenter adiunxit: "Absque ineuitabili necessitate, aut apostolica uel regulari mutacione, et alteri se ambitus causa coniungere."

IV. Pars. §. 3. Ambicionis enim causa quicumque ecclesiae suae mediocritate despecta ad maiorem ecclesiam transire uoluerit, debet reuocari ad propriam. Quod si redire contempserit, careat aliena et propria. Unde in Niceno Concilio [cap. 15.] legitur:

C. XIX. A bishop or any cleric ought not to pass to another church after leaving his own.

A bishop or the remaining orders ought not to migrate from city to city; let neither bishop, nor priest, nor deacon pass over. But if anyone after the determination of the holy and great council has attempted to do any such thing and has bound himself to an undertaking of this kind, let this deed be regarded as altogether void, and let him be restored to the church of which he was ordained bishop, priest, or deacon.

C. XIX. Episcopus uel quilibet clericus relicta sua ecclesia non debet ad aliam transire.

Non oportet episcopum uel reliquos ordines de ciuitate ad ciuitatem migrare; non episcopus, non presbiter, non diaconus transeat. Si quis autem post diffinitionem sancti et magni concilii tale quid agere temptauerit, et se huiusmodi negotio mancipauerit, hoc factum prorsus in irritum ducatur, et restituatur ecclesiae, cuius fuit episcopus, aut presbiter, aut diaconus ordinatus.

C. XX. Let a bishop who despises residing in his own church be assigned to a monastery.

Likewise Gregory to the Subdeacon Anthemius, [book V, letter 23]. It has come to us that Pimenium, bishop of the city of Amalfi, is not content to reside in his church but wanders outside through various places. Therefore by this authority we instruct you that he not presume to do this henceforth but reside in his church in priestly fashion. If, after your threat, you find that he has not corrected himself, take care to assign him to a monastery and by every means report it to us, so that you may learn by another command from us what you ought to do.

C. XX. In monasterio deputetur episcopus, qui in ecclesia sua residere contempnit.

Item Gregorius Anthemio Subdiacono. [lib. V. epist. 23.] Peruenit ad nos, Pimenium Amalfitanae ciuitatis episcopum in ecclesia residere non esse contentum, sed foris per diuersa loca uagari. Idcirco hac tibi auctoritate precipimus, quatinus hoc de cetero facere non presumat, sed in ecclesia sua sacerdotali more resideat. Quem si forte non emendare post tuam interminationem cognoueris, in monasterium eum deputare, et nobis curabis modis omnibus indicare, ut quid facere debeas nostra iterum preceptione cognoscas.

C. XXI. No bishop is permitted to leave his principal chair and betake himself to another church.

Likewise from the Fifth Council of Carthage, [c. 100]. It was resolved that no one have the power, after leaving his principal chair, to betake himself to some church established in his diocese, or, by remaining on his own property longer than is fitting, to neglect the care or attendance of his own chair.

C. XXI. Episcoporum nulli conceditur principalem cathedram relinquere, et ad aliam ecclesiam se conferre.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi V. [c. c.] Placuit, ut nemini sit facultas, relicta principali cathedra ad aliquam ecclesiam in diocesi constitutam se conferre, uel in re propria diucius, quam oportet, constitutum curam uel frequentationem propriae cathedrae negligere.

C. XXII. An interim administrator is not permitted to retain the chair to which he was given.

Likewise from the same, [Fifth Council of Carthage, c. 8]. It has been established that no interim administrator be permitted to retain the chair to which he was given as interim administrator through any popular zeal or seditions, but that he take care to provide them a bishop within a year. But if he has neglected this, after the year has elapsed let another interim administrator be assigned.

C. XXII. Intercessori cathedram, cui datus est, tenere non licet.

Item ex eodem. [Cartaginensi V. c. 8.]. Constitutum est, ut nulli intercessori sit licitum, cathedram, cui intercessor datus est, quibuslibet populorum studiis uel seditionibus retinere, sed dare operam, ut intra annum eisdem episcopum prouideat. Quod si neglexerit, anno exempto interuentor alius tribuatur.

C. XXIII. Let clerics who have left their own church and refuse to return to it be excommunicated.

Likewise from the same. But if any, acting without regard for God, not having the fear of God before their eyes and not observing the ecclesiastical statutes, have withdrawn from their church, whether a priest or a deacon, or those placed in any ecclesiastical order whatsoever, they ought not to be received in another church, but must by every necessity be compelled to return to their own church. But if they persist, they ought to be excommunicated.

C. XXIII. Excommunicentur clerici, qui relicta sua ecclesia ad eam redire noluerint.

Item ex eodem. Si qui uero sine respectu Dei agentes, et timorem Dei ante oculos non habentes, neque ecclesiastica statuta custodientes, recesserint ab ecclesia sua, siue presbiter siue diaconus, uel in quocumque ecclesiastico ordine positi fuerint, non debent suscipi in ecclesia, sed omni necessitate cogantur, ut redeant ad ecclesiam suam. Quod si permanserint, excommunicare eos oportet.

C. XXIV. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, [c. 3]. If any priest, deacon, or any cleric, after deserting his own church, has believed that he should pass to another, and there, to which he has migrated, gradually attempts to remain permanently, he ought not to minister any longer, especially if he has been exhorted by his own bishop to return. But if after the summons of his bishop he has not obeyed but has persevered in disobedience, he ought by every means to be deposed from his office and never afterward to have hope of restoration. But if another bishop receives one deposed for this fault, he too will merit the penalty of rebuke from the common synod as one dissolving ecclesiastical laws.

C. XXIV. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Antioceno. [c. 3.] Si quis presbiter, uel diaconus, uel quilibet clericus, deserta sua ecclesia, ad aliam transeundum esse crediderit, et ibi paullatim temptet, quo migrauit, perpetuo permanere, ulterius ministrare non debet, presertim si ab episcopo suo ad reuertendum fuerit exhortatus. Quod si post euocationem sui episcopi non obedierit, sed inobediens perseuerauerit, omnimodis ab offitio suo deponi debere, nec aliquando spem restitutionis habere. Si uero propter hanc culpam depositum alius episcopus susceperit, et ipse a communi sinodo penam merebitur increpationis tamquam ecclesiastica iura dissoluens.

C. XXV. A bishop is not permitted to leave his own church and pass to another.

Likewise from the same, [Council of Antioch, c. 21]. A bishop ought not to pass from diocese to diocese, neither if he has thrust himself in, nor if he has been violently drawn by the people, nor even if this is advised to him by the bishops; but he ought to remain in the church of God which he obtained from the beginning and not migrate from it elsewhere, in accordance with the rule long ago established on this matter by the Fathers.

> C. XXV. Non licet episcopo ecclesiam suam relinquere et ad aliam transire.
> Item ex eodem. [Antioceno, c. 21.] Episcopum de diocesi ad diocesim non debere transire, neque si se ipsum ingesserit, neque si a populis fuerit uiolenter attractus, neque si etiam hoc ei ab episcopis suadeatur; manere autem eum debere in ecclesia Dei, quam ab initio sortitus est, et non ab ea alibi demigrare, secundum regulam super hoc olim a Patribus constitutam.

C. XXVI. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 5]. On account of those bishops or clerics who pass from city to city, it was resolved that the determinations given by the holy Fathers possess their proper force.

> C. XXVI. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 5.] Propter eos episcopos siue clericos, qui de ciuitate ad ciuitatem transeunt, placuit diffinitiones datas a sanctis Patribus habere propriam firmitatem.

C. XXVII. The congregations of another are not to be usurped by a bishop.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 20]. It was resolved that the congregations of another be usurped by no bishop, nor let any bishop overstep into the diocese of his colleague.

> C. XXVII. Alienae plebes ab episcopo non usurpentur.
> Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 20.] Placuit, ut a nullo episcopo usurpentur plebes alienae, nec aliquis episcoporum supergrediatur in diocesim collegam suum.

C. XXVIII. A bishop is not permitted to ordain the clerics of another or consecrate altars.

Likewise Anacletus. A bishop ought not to intrude into another's diocese to ordain another's clerics or consecrate altars. But if he has done so, those whom he ordained being removed and only the consecration of the altar remaining, the transgressor of the canons shall cease from the celebration of Masses for a year.

> C. XXVIII. Alienos clericos ordinare uel altaria consecrare episcopo non licet.
> Item Anacletus. Episcopus in diocesi aliena ad alienos clericos ordinandos uel altaria consecranda inruere non debet. Quod si fecerit, amotis his, quos ordinauit, altaris tantum consecratione manente, transgressor canonum anno a missarum celebritate cessabit.

C. XXIX. On solemn days a cleric ought not to be absent from his church.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 64]. If anyone established among the clergy has been absent from his church on solemn days—that is, on the Nativity of the Lord, Epiphany, Easter, or Pentecost —because he applies himself to secular gains rather than obeying the service of God, it is fitting that he be suspended from communion for three years. § 1. Likewise, if a deacon or priest has been absent from his church for three weeks, let them be subject to this condemnation.

C. XXIX. Diebus solempnibus clericus ecclesiae suae deesse non debet.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 64.] Si quis in clero constitutus ab ecclesia sua diebus solempnibus defuerit, id est Natiuitate Domini, Epiphania, Pasca, uel Pentecoste dum potius secularibus lucris studet quam seruitio Dei parere, conuenit, ut triennio a communione suspendatur. §. 1. Similiter diaconus uel presbiter, si per tres ebdomadas ab ecclesia sua defuerit, huic dampnationi succumbant.

C. XXX. A bishop is to be removed from the church into which he has crept and compelled to return to his own.

Likewise Pope Hilary, [to the Bishops of Tarragona, c. 3]. Once Bishop Irenaeus has been removed from the church of Barcelona and sent back to his own, and the inclinations which through ignorance of ecclesiastical laws desire to obtain what is not permitted have been calmed by priestly moderation, let a bishop of such a kind be ordained immediately for the people of Barcelona from their own clergy as it especially befits you, brother Ascanio, to elect and becomes you to consecrate; lest, if perhaps it is done otherwise, our command, especially with the rebuke of your name, strike down what we shall have learned was committed to the injury of God, from whom in particular comes the grace of priestly dignities.

C. XXX. Remouendus est episcopus ab ecclesia, cui inrepserit et ad suam redire cogendus.

Item Ylarius Papa. [Episcopis Tarracon. c. 3.] Remoto ab ecclesia Barchinonensi atque ad suam remisso Yreneo episcopo, sedatis per sacerdotalem modestiam uoluntatibus, que per ecclesiasticarum legum ignorantiam desiderant quod non licet obtinere, talis protinus de clero proprio Barchinonensibus ordinetur episcopus, qualem te precipue, frater Ascani, oporteat eligere et deceat consecrare, ne si aliter forte factum sit non sine obiurgatione maxime tui nominis retundat nostra preceptio, quod in iniuriam Dei (a quo specialiter sacerdotalium est gratia dignitatum) didicerimus admissum.

C. XXXI. One who seeks another's chair, once expelled from it, shall also lack his own.

Likewise Leo, Bishop of the city of Rome, to Anastasius, Bishop of Thessalonica, [letter LXXXII, otherwise LXXXIV, c. 8]. If any bishop, having despised the modest size of his own city, has aspired to the administration of a more celebrated place and by any reasoning has transferred himself to a greater people, let him indeed be driven from the chair of another, and he shall also lack his own, so that he preside neither over those whom he coveted through avarice nor over those whom he despised through pride. Therefore let each be content with his own boundaries and not desire to be enlarged beyond the measures of his right.

C. XXXI. Qui alienam cathedram appetit, ab ea expulsus etiam propria careat.

Item Leo Episcopus urbis Romae Anastasio, Thessalonicensi Episcopo. [ep. LXXXII. al. LXXXIV. c. 8.] Si quis episcopus suae ciuitatis mediocritate despecta amministrationem celebrioris loci ambierit, et ad maiorem se plebem quacumque ratione transtulerit, a cathedra quidem pellatur aliena, carebit etiam propria, ut nec illis presideat, quos per auariciam concupiuit, nec illis, quos per superbiam spreuit. Suis igitur terminis quisque contentus sit, nec supra mensuras iuris sui affectet augeri.

C. XXXII. One who aspires from a lesser church to a greater out of contempt shall lack both churches.

Likewise from the Council of Meaux, [c. 30]. If anyone of the priestly order, out of contempt for a lesser church, has ambitiously and wickedly aspired to a more powerful one, let the canonical determination be observed toward him, namely, that he lack both. GRATIAN. But one who has entered a vacant church for a price is to be deposed from his office, as is read in the Council of Rouen:

> C. XXXII. Qui contemptu minoris ad maiorem aspirat utraque careat ecclesia.
> Item ex Concilio Meldensi. [c. 30.] Si quis de ordine sacerdotali contemptu minoris ecclesiae ambitiose et inprobe ad potiorem aspirauerit, canonica erga eum diffinitio conseruetur, hoc est ut utraque careat. Gratian. Qui uero precio ecclesiam uacantem ingressus fuerit, ab offitio suo deponendus est, sicut in Rotomagensi Concilio legitur:

C. XXXIII. Let one who attempts to acquire a church by gifts be cast down from the clergy.

It has been decreed and prohibited by every means that, if any priest is found to give or to have given gifts to any cleric or layman, or to bestow other money so that, through cupidity, rapine, or presumption, he might buy at a price the vacant church of another priest for the sake of shameful gain, he is to be cast down from the clergy and shall be foreign to the rule. PART V. GRATIAN. But Pope Anterus demonstrates that transfers of bishops can be made by common counsel and for the benefit of others, and that, while they are living, others can be substituted in the churches from which they have withdrawn, writing [letter VII] to all the Bishops:

> C. XXXIII. Deiciatur a clero qui muneribus ecclesiam adquirere temptat.
> Sancitum est atque omnibus modis prohibitum, ut si quis presbiter inuentus fuerit alicui clerico uel laico munera dare uel dedisse, aut aliam pecuniam tribuere, ut alterius presbiteri ecclesiam uacantem precio redimat, pro cupiditate, seu rapina, seu presumptione turpis lucri gratia, deiciatur a clero et alienus existat a regula. V. Pars. Gratian. Quod uero communi consilio atque aliorum utilitate mutaciones episcoporum fieri possint et in ecclesiis, a quibus recesserint, eis uiuentibus alii substitui ualeant, Anterius Papa demonstrat, [epistola VII.] scribens omnibus Episcopis:

C. XXXIV. Transfers of bishops can be made for the sake of necessity or utility.

Know that transfers of bishops are permitted to be made for common utility and necessity, but not by anyone's own will or domination. Saint Peter, our teacher and prince of the apostles, was transferred from the city of Antioch to Rome for the sake of utility, so that he might be able to profit more there. Eusebius also was transferred by apostolic authority from a certain small city to Alexandria. Likewise Felix, from the city in which he had been ordained, through the election of the citizens because of the teaching and good life which he possessed, was transferred to Ephesus by authority of this holy see and the common counsel of the bishops, the remaining priests, and the peoples. For one does not pass from city to city, nor is one transferred from a lesser to a greater, who does this neither from a desire for advancement nor by his own will, but who, either driven by force from his own see, or compelled by necessity, or for the utility of the place or people, has been transferred by others not proudly but humbly. § 1. For just as bishops have the power regularly to ordain bishops and the remaining priests, so, whenever utility or necessity requires it, they have power both to transfer in the aforesaid manner and to enthrone, yet not without the authority and permission of the sacrosanct Roman see. § 2. For the cause of utility is one thing; that of avarice, presumption, and one's own will is another.

> Mutaciones episcoporum scitote communi utilitate atque necessitate fieri licere, sed non propria cuiusquam uoluntate aut dominacione. Petrus sanctus magister noster et princeps apostolorum de Antiochia ciuitate utilitatis causa est translatus Romam, ut ibidem proficere potius posset. Eusebius quoque de quadam ciuitate parua apostolica auctoritate mutatus est in Alexandriam. Similiter Felix de ciuitate, in qua ordinatus erat, electione ciuium propter doctrinam et bonam uitam, quam habebat, auctoritate huius sanctae sedis et communi episcoporum et reliquorum sacerdotum ac populorum consilio translatus est Ephesum. Non enim transit de ciuitate ad ciuitatem, nec transfertur de minori ad maiorem, qui hoc non ambitu, nec propria uoluntate facit, sed aut ui a propria sede pulsus, aut necessitate coactus, aut utilitate loci uel populi, non superbe, sed humiliter ab aliis translatus est. §. 1. Nam sicut episcopi habent potestatem ordinare regulariter episcopos et reliquos sacerdotes, sic quociens utilitas aut necessitas exegerit supradicto modo et mutare et intronizare potestatem habent, non tamen sine sacrosanctae Romanae sedis auctoritate et licentia. §. 2. Alia etenim causa est utilitatis, alia auariciae et presumptionis atque propriae uoluntatis.

C. XXXV. Transfers of bishops can be made for the sake of necessity.

Likewise Pope Pelagius [II] to Archbishop Benignus, [letter II]. Know, most beloved brother, that the cause of necessity and utility is one thing, and that of presumption and one's own will is another. Therefore one who does not change his mind does not change his see—that is, one who migrates from city to city not for the sake of avarice, domination, his own will, or his own preference, but is transferred for the sake of necessity and utility. For the utility of many is also to be preferred to the utility or will of one. For it is one thing to transfer, and another to be transferred. § 1. For it is one thing to pass voluntarily, and another to come by compulsion or necessity. Hence these do not change a city, but are changed, because they do this not voluntarily but by compulsion. § 2. Therefore those who deny that this can be done for the sake of utility or necessity, whenever common necessity or utility has persuaded it, do not understand the ecclesiastical rules well.

> C. XXXV. Causa necessitatis mutaciones episcoporum fieri possunt.
> Item Pelagius Papa [II.] Benigno Archiepiscopo. [epist. II.] Scias, frater dilectissime, aliud esse causam necessitatis et utilitatis, aliud presumptionis ac propriae uoluntatis. Non ergo mutat sedem qui non mutat mentem, id est qui non auariciae causa, aut dominacionis, aut propriae uoluntatis uel dilectionis suae migrat de ciuitate ad ciuitatem, sed causa necessitatis et utilitatis mutatur. Nam et plurimorum utilitas unius utilitati uel uoluntati preferenda est. Aliud est enim mutare, et aliud mutari. §. 1. Nam aliud est sponte transire, et aliud coacte aut necessitate uenire. Unde non isti mutant ciuitatem, sed mutantur, quia non sponte, sed coacte hoc agunt. §. 2. Non ergo bene intelligunt ecclesiasticas regulas, qui hoc negant causa utilitatis uel necessitatis fieri posse, quociens communis necessitas aut utilitas persuaserit.

C. XXXVI. One who does not extend mercy to those suffering necessity is proved to deny Christ.

The same to the same. Everyone who groaned and who was troubled by Saul fled and came to David. If the most pious and just king David had known that it was a sin to receive those fleeing persecution and passing from place to place and from city to city, he would by no means have received such persons, nor kept them with himself, nor placed them in other cities. For those who persecute the Lord's bishops and compel them to pass from cities to cities persecute not so much them as our Lord Jesus Christ, whose embassy they discharge. Nor do the bishops themselves sin in this, since they do it not voluntarily but by compulsion; rather, those who persecute them sin, nor can this be imputed to the bishops themselves, but to those who compel them to do it. § 1. But those who deny that mercy is to be shown to fugitives and to those suffering necessity deny Christ Himself, who is mercy and truth. § 2. Those who refuse, for the sake of utility and necessity, to transfer from another city—even if it is lesser—to a city that does not have a bishop a more learned or more useful bishop, not passing voluntarily but through the exhortation of superiors, by better counsel, for peoples who need divine ministries and do not have their own bishop to instruct them, or refuse to enthrone a bishop who has been expelled and is suffering persecution for the sake of utility or necessity, deny mercy to those suffering necessity.

> C. XXXVI. Christum negare conuincitur qui necessitatem patientibus misericordiam non inpendit.
> Idem ad eundem. Omnis, qui gemebat et qui uexabatur a Saul, fugiebat et ueniebat ad Dauid. Si rex piissimus atque iustissimus Dauid sciret peccatum esse, persecutionem fugientes et transeuntes de loco ad locum et de ciuitate ad ciuitatem recipere, tales nequaquam reciperet, nec secum teneret, neque in aliis ciuitatibus eos collocaret. Qui enim persecuntur Domini episcopos, eosque de ciuitatibus ad ciuitates transire conpellunt, non eos tantum persecuntur, quantum Dominum nostrum Iesum Christum, cuius legatione funguntur. Nec ipsi in hoc peccant episcopi, quoniam non sponte, sed coacte hoc agunt, sed ipsi, qui eos persecuntur, nec ipsis episcopis hoc inputari potest, sed illis, qui hoc agere eos cogunt. §. 1. Qui autem negant misericordiam faciendam fugientibus et necessitatem patientibus, ipsum Christum negant, qui est misericordia et ueritas. §. 2. Negant misericordiam necessitatem patientibus, qui populis indigentibus diuinis ministeriis, et non habentibus proprium episcopum, qui eos instruat, causa utilitatis atque necessitatis ut ex alia ciuitate, licet minor sit, in ea, que non habet episcopum doctiorem uel utiliorem, meliori consilio, non sponte transeuntem, sed maiorum exhortacione mutare, aut episcopum eiectum et persecutionem patientem causa utilitatis aut necessitatis intronizare nolunt.

C. XXXVII. Let a bishop pass from church to church not through ambition but by synodal authority.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 27]. Let a bishop not pass through ambition from an obscure place to a renowned one, nor any cleric of a lower order. Certainly, if the utility of the church demands it, with a decree on his behalf by clergy and laity presented to the bishops, let him be transferred in the presence of the synod, with another bishop nevertheless substituted in his place. Priests of lower rank or other clerics can migrate to other churches with the permission of their own bishops.

> C. XXXVII. Non ambicione, sed sinodali auctoritate de ecclesia ad ecclesiam episcopus transeat.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 27.] Episcopus de loco ignobili ad nobilem per ambicionem non transeat, nec quisquam inferioris ordinis clericus. Sane si utilitas ecclesiae poposcerit, decreto pro eo clericorum et laicorum episcopis porrecto, in presentiam sinodi transferatur, nichilominus alio in loco eius episcopo subrogato. Inferioris uero gradus sacerdotes uel alii clerici concessione suorum episcoporum possunt ad alias ecclesias transmigrare.

C. XXXVIII.

Likewise from the same, [Fourth Council of Carthage, c. 33]. If bishops or priests have come for the sake of visiting to the church of another bishop, let them be received in their own rank and be invited both to give the word and to consecrate the offering.

C. XXXVIII.

Item ex eodem. [Cartaginensi IV. c. 33.] Episcopi uel presbiteri si causa uisitandi ad ecclesiam alterius episcopi uenerint, in gradu suo suscipiantur, et tam ad uerbum faciendum quam ad oblationem consecrandam inuitentur.

C. XXXIX. The church of one bishop ought not to be administered by another.

Likewise Pope Callistus to all the Bishops, [letter II, c. 3]. Just as the wife of another is not permitted to be violated by anyone, or judged or administered except by her own husband while he is living, so neither is the wife of a bishop—which is understood without doubt to be his church or parish—while he is living, permitted to another to judge or administer without his counsel and will, or to enjoy intercourse with her, that is, ordination. Hence the Apostle says: "A wife is bound to the law of her husband for as long as her husband lives, but when he is dead she is released from the law of her husband." Likewise the bride of a bishop—because the church is called his bride and wife—is bound to him while he is living and released when he is dead. "And let her marry whom she wishes, only in the Lord," that is, regularly. For if, while he is living, she has married another, she will be judged an adulteress. Likewise he also, if he has voluntarily taken another bride, will be regarded as an adulterer and will be deprived of communion. But if he has been persecuted in his own church, he must flee to another and be joined to it, the Lord saying: "If they persecute you in one city, flee into another." But if he is to be transferred for the sake of utility, let him not do this by himself, but let him do it when invited by his brothers, with the authority of this holy see; not, however, for the sake of a desire for advancement, but for utility or necessity, as has been said. PART VI. GRATIAN. This is to be understood not only concerning bishops but also concerning any ministers of the church, namely, lest another creep into the place of one living. Hence blessed Gregory writes to the Bishop of Salona concerning one who had consented to be promoted to another's archdiaconate, [book II, indiction 10, letters XIV and XVI]:

C. XXXIX. Ecclesia unius episcopi ab alio disponi non debet.

Item Calixtus Papa omnibus Episcopis. [epist. II. c. 3.] Sicut alterius uxor nec adulterari ab aliquo, uel iudicari, aut disponi, nisi a proprio uiro eo uiuente permittitur, sic nec uxor episcopi, que eius ecclesia uel parrochia indubitanter intelligitur, eo uiuente absque consilio eius et uoluntate alteri iudicare, uel disponere, aut eius concubitu, id est ordinatione, frui, non conceditur. Unde ait Apostolus: "Alligata est uxor legi uiri, quamdiu uir eius uiuit, eo uero defuncto soluta est a lege uiri." Similiter sponsa episcopi (quia sponsa uxorque eius dicitur ecclesia) illo uiuente ei alligata, eo defuncto soluta est. "Et cui uoluerit nubat, tantum in Domino," id est regulariter. Si enim eo uiuente alteri nupserit, adultera iudicabitur. Similiter et ille, si aliam sponte duxerit, adulter estimabitur, et communione priuabitur. Si autem persecutus in sua fuerit ecclesia, fugiendum est illi ad alteram, eique sociandum, dicente Domino: "Si persecuti uos fuerint in una ciuitate fugite in aliam." Si autem utilitatis causa fuerit mutandus non per se hoc agat, sed fratribus inuitantibus cum auctoritate huius sanctae sedis faciat, non tamen ambitus causa, sed aut utilitate aut necessitate, ut dictum est. VI. Pars. Gratian. Hoc non solum de episcopis uerum etiam de quibuslibet ecclesiae ministris intelligitur, ne uidelicet in locum uiuentis alter obrepat. Unde B. Gregorius scribit Salonitano Episcopo, de eo, qui in archidiaconatum alterius se promoueri consenserat: [lib. II. Indict. 10. epist. XIV. et XVI.]

C. XL. Let one who does not fear to invade the place of another be deposed.

We depose from the honor of that archdiaconate the one who, contrary to the rule of justice, consented to be advanced into another's archdiaconate. If he presumes afterward to minister in the same place, let him know that he is deprived of participation in holy communion.

C. XL. Deponatur qui locum alterius inuadere non timet.

Eum, qui contra iustitiae regulam in archidiaconatum alterius se prouehi consensit, ab eiusdem archidiaconatus honore deponimus. Qui si ulterius in loco eodem ministrare presumpserit, se participatione sacrae communionis nouerit esse priuatum.

C. XLI. There ought not to be two prelates in one church.

The same to the Monk Rusticus, [letter IV]. Among bees there is one prince; cranes follow one in lettered order; there is one emperor, one judge of a province. Rome, when founded, could not have two brothers as kings at the same time and is dedicated by parricide. In Rebecca's womb Esau and Jacob waged wars; individual bishops of churches, individual archbishops, individual archdeacons, and every ecclesiastical order rests upon its own rulers. PART VII. GRATIAN. Behold the cases in which another can be substituted for a bishop while he is living, although according to the truth of the matter such a person is proved to succeed a bishop who is not living. For one transferred from one city to another ceases to be bishop of that city from which he is transferred, and therefore one who succeeds him is proved to be substituted not for a living bishop but for one who, in a certain manner, is dead. But between one who is transferred by the necessity of enemy attack and one who is transferred for the sake of utility there is this difference: one who passes to another place through fear of enemy attack ought to return to his former place if it happens at some time to be freed from the enemy. Hence Pope Gregory writes to James, Bishop of Squillace, chapter 25:

C. XLI. In una ecclesia duo prelati esse non debent.

Idem ad Rusticum Monachum. [ep. IV.] In apibus princeps unus est; grues unam secuntur ordine litterato; inperator unus, iudex unus prouinciae. Roma condita duos fratres simul habere reges non potuit et parricidio dedicatur. In Rebeccae utero Esau et Iacob bella gesserunt; singuli ecclesiarum episcopi, singuli archiepiscopi, singuli archidiaconi, et omnis ordo ecclesiasticus suis rectoribus nititur. VII. Pars. Gratian. Ecce in quibus casibus episcopo uiuente alius potest ei substitui, quamquam secundum rei ueritatem non uiuente episcopo talis probetur succedere. Translatus enim ab una ciuitate ad aliam desinit esse episcopus illius ciuitatis, a qua transfertur, atque ideo qui huic succedit non uiuenti, sed defuncto quodammodo episcopo probatur substitui. Sed inter eum, qui hostilitatis necessitate, et eum, qui utilitatis causa transfertur, hoc interest, quod ille, qui metu hostilitatis ad aliam transit, si priorem contigerit aliquando ab hostibus liberam fieri, ad eandem illum redire oportet. Unde Gregorius Papa scribit Iacobo Episcopo Squillatino capitulo 25.:

C. XLII. One who has passed to another place through fear of enemy attack ought afterward to return to his own church.

The care of the pastoral office admonishes us to establish proper priests for destitute churches who ought to govern the Lord's flock with pastoral solicitude. For this reason we have thought it necessary to establish you, John, bishop of the city of Lesina, captured by enemies, as cardinal priest in the church of Squillace, so that with regard for future recompense you may fulfill the care of souls once undertaken. And although you have been driven from your own place by the imminence of the enemy, you ought to govern another church which lacks a shepherd, yet in such a way that, if it happens that that city is made free from enemies and, with the Lord protecting it, restored to its former state, you return to the church in which you were first ordained; but if the aforesaid city is oppressed by the calamity of continuing captivity, you ought to remain in this church in which you have been incardinated by us. GRATIAN. But one who is transferred for the sake of utility is by no means compelled to return to the former church. There is also another case in which a bishop is substituted while a bishop is living. For when anyone, after leaving his former chair, has passed to another by his own authority, if another has been substituted for him, although the former does not cease to be bishop of his former church, nevertheless the substituted one will possess the episcopate. Hence Damasus, Bishop of the city of Rome, writes to all the bishops:

C. XLII. Qui metu hostilitatis ad alium locum transierit postea ad suam ecclesiam redire oportet.

Pastoralis offitii cura nos ammonet, destitutis ecclesiis proprios constituere sacerdotes, qui gregem dominicum pastorali sollicitudine gubernare debeant. Propterea te Iohannem ab hostibus captiuatum Lesimanae ciuitatis episcopum in Squillitana ecclesia cardinalem necesse duximus statuere sacerdotem, ut et susceptam semel animarum curam intuitu futurae retributionis inpleas. Et licet tua sis hoste inminente depulsus, aliam, que a pastore uacat, debes ecclesiam gubernare, ita tamen, ut si ciuitatem illam hostibus liberam effici et Domino protegente ad priorem statum contigerit reuocari, in eam, in qua prius ordinatus es, ecclesiam reuertaris; sin autem predicta ciuitas continua captiuitatis calamitate premitur, in hac, in qua es incardinatus a nobis, debeas ecclesia permanere. Gratian. Qui uero causa utilitatis transfertur nequaquam ad priorem redire cogitur. Est etiam alius casus, in quo episcopus uiuente episcopo substituitur. Cum enim aliquis relicta priori cathedra sua auctoritate ad aliam transierit, si alius ei substitutus fuerit, licet ille prioris ecclesiae episcopus esse non desierit, substitutus tamen episcopatum habebit. Unde Damasus, urbis Romae Episcopus, scribit omnibus episcopis:

C. XLIII. Concerning priests who have migrated from their own churches to others.

We have held those priests who have migrated from churches to churches foreign to communion until they return to those cities in which they were established. But if, when one has migrated elsewhere, another has been ordained in the place of the living man, let the one who deserted his own city lack priestly dignity for as long as his successor rests in the Lord. GRATIAN. Transfers of episcopal sees are also sometimes accustomed to be made when fear of enemy attack intervenes.

Hence Gregory writes to John, Bishop of Velletri, [book II, letter 11]:

C. XLIII. De sacerdotibus, qui relictis ecclesiis suis ad alias migrarunt.

Eos sacerdotes, qui de ecclesiis ad ecclesias migrauerunt, tamdiu a communione habuimus alienos, quamdiu ad eas redierint ciuitates, in quibus sunt constituti. Quod si alius alio transmigrante in locum uiuentis est ordinatus, tamdiu uacet a sacerdotii dignitate qui suam deseruit ciuitatem, quam diu successor eius quiescat in Domino. Gratian. Episcopalium etiam sedium mutaciones metu hostilitatis interueniente nonnumquam fieri solent.

Unde Gregorius scribit Iohanni, Episcopo Belitrano: [lib. II. epist. 11.]

C. XLIV. Transfers of episcopal sees can be made because of the necessity of the time.

The character of the time admonishes us to transfer the sees of bishops, established in antiquity in certain cities, to other places in the same diocese which we consider safer, so that the inhabitants may both be able to live securely and more easily avoid barbarian danger. For this reason we instruct you, John, our brother and fellow bishop of the city of Velletri, to transfer your see to the place once called Arenata, at Saint Andrew the Apostle, so that you may be able to exist more freely from the incursion of enemy attack and there arrange the custom of solemnities festively. PART VIII. GRATIAN. Likewise, when anyone for the sake of humility, by apostolic concession, has descended from an episcopal see to monastic subjection, another can be substituted in his place; but he will by no means be able to rise again to the pontificate. Hence in the fifth action of the Synod of Constantinople of 383 Fathers, under Pope John VIII, over which Peter, cardinal priest, Paul, Bishop of Ancona, and Eugenius, Bishop of Ostia, legates of the Pope, presided, they said:

C. XLIV. Necessitate temporis episcopalium sedium mutaciones fieri possunt.

Temporis qualitas nos ammonet episcoporum sedes, constitutas antiquitus certis ciuitatibus, ad alia, que securiora putamus, eiusdem diocesis loca transponere, quo et habitatores securi ualeant degere, et barbaricum possit periculum facilius declinari. Propterea te Iohannem fratrem et coepiscopum nostrum Belitrensis ciuitatis, sedemque tuam in loco quondam Arenata ad S. Andream apostolum precipimus transmigrare, quatinus ab hostilitatis incursu liberior existere ualeas, et illic consuetudinem solempnium festiue disponas. VIII. Pars. Gratian. Item cum aliquis causa humilitatis apostolica concessione de episcopali sede ad monachalem descenderit subiectionem, alius loco eius subrogari poterit; ille uero ad pontificatum resurgere nequaquam ualebit. Unde in quinta actione Constantinopolitanae Sinodi, CCCLXXXIII. Patrum, sub VIII. Iohanne Papa, cui prefuit Petrus presbiter cardinalis, et Paulus Anchonitanus episcopus, et Eugenius Hostiensis episcopus, apocrisarii Papae dixerunt:

C. XLV. A bishop who becomes a monk for the sake of humility cannot return to the pontificate.

It is by no means held among us that anyone who has descended from the pontifical order to the life of monks can afterward return to the pontificate. Likewise: § 1. The holy synod commanded that whoever has descended from pontifical dignity to the life of monks and a place of penance shall by no means rise again to the pontificate. For the life of monks possesses the character of subjection and discipleship, not of teaching, presiding, or feeding others. GRATIAN. This is granted to certain persons for doing penance, not for preserving repose. Hence Pope Liberius writes to all the Bishops, [letter II]:

C. XLV. Episcopus, qui causa humilitatis monachus efficitur, ad pontificatum redire non ualet.

Hoc nequaquam apud nos habetur, ut quicumque de pontificali ordine ad monachorum descenderit uitam, ulterius possit ad pontificatum reuerti. Item: §. 1. Precepit sancta sinodus, ut quicumque de pontificali dignitate ad monachorum uitam et penitentiae descenderit locum, nequaquam ad pontificatum resurgat. Monachorum enim uita subiectionis uerbum habet et discipulatus, non docendi, uel presidendi, uel pascendi alios. Gratian. Hoc ad penitentiam agendam, non ad quietem seruandam quibusdam conceditur. Unde Liberius Papa scribit omnibus Episcopis: [ep. II.]

C. XLVI. A bishop is not permitted to leave the flock undertaken because of the harassments of evil persons.

It has been suggested to us that, because of past labors and harassments, some of you leave the congregations assigned to themselves and committed to them by God, and that in the future more wish to leave the churches which they ought to protect, neglect to labor for the sheep committed to them, hasten to consign themselves to the repose of monasteries, choose release from the labors of the episcopate, and desire rather to lead a life in silence and leisure than to persevere in those things committed to them, although the Lord says: "Blessed is he who has persevered to the end." For whence is blessed perseverance except from the virtue of patience? Since, according to the apostolic preaching, "all who wish to live piously in Christ suffer persecution." Therefore, dearest brothers, let not the bitterness of afflictions compel you to withdraw from the pious purpose of your mind. Consider how much our creator, lord, and redeemer endured for our absolution and liberation, and to what insults He handed Himself over to be subjected, so that He might free us from the bonds of diabolical power. Attend, therefore, to yourselves and to the whole flock, in which the Holy Spirit established you as bishops to govern the church of God, which He acquired with His own blood, so that there may be no one to deceive or seduce you by subtlety of speech, causing you to leave the congregations committed to you and to surrender yourselves to some repose because of the reproach of evil men, so that you save only yourselves and leave your children orphans.

C. XLVI. Pro infestationibus malorum non licet episcopo susceptum gregem relinquere.

Suggestum nobis est, quod pro preteritis laboribus et infestationibus nonnulli uestrum assignatas sibimet et a Deo conmissas relinquant plebes et in futurum plures relinquere uelint ecclesias eas, quas tueri debent, et pro ouibus sibi conmissis laborare negligant, et monasteriorum se quieti tradere festinent, et uacationem ab episcopatus laboribus eligere, et silentio atque otio uitam ducere magis appetant, quam in his, que sibi conmissa sunt, permanere, dicente Domino: "Beatus qui perseuerauerit usque in finem." Unde namque est beata perseuerantia, nisi de uirtute patientiae? quoniam secundum apostolicam predicationem, "omnes, qui uolunt pie in Christo uiuere, persecutionem patiuntur." Ideo fratres karissimi, non uos afflictionum amaritudo a pio mentis uestrae proposito coartet recedere. Considerantes, quanta pro absolutione nostri et liberatione creator noster dominus ac redemptor pertulerit, quibusue se contumeliis afficiendum tradiderit, ut nos a uinculis potestatis dyabolicae liberaret. Attendite itaque uobis et omni gregi, in quo uos Spiritus sanctus constituit episcopos regere ecclesiam Dei, quam acquisiuit proprio sanguine, ut non sit qui uos decipiat aut seducat in subtilitate sermonis, ut plebes uobis conmissas relinquatis, et alicui propter obprobrium malorum hominum quieti uos tradatis, ut uos solummodo saluetis, et filios orphanos relinquatis.

C. XLVII. In persecutions a bishop shall not desert his church.

Likewise Nicholas to Unifred, Bishop of the church of Moriana. You ask, therefore, through the priest Galdagar, whether, when you are driven from your bishopric by the Normans, you ought henceforth to live in a monastery. In this matter know, dearest brother, that, if it is dangerous for a helmsman to desert a ship in calm weather, how much more in the waves? Here we do not say that we should not flee the plots of persecutors—and especially of pagans—when they rage for a time and, because of the multitude of our transgressions, are divinely permitted the power to do harm, particularly since we ought not to advance against them voluntarily, and it is clearer than light that many prophets and apostles, and the Lord Himself, fled persecutors of this kind; rather, we say that it certainly befits especially us, who like rams provide leadership to the flocks—indeed, who are also their shepherds—with God as author to persevere with them in dangers according to our strength, and when tranquility has been restored by divine mercy and the harassment of those raging has been quieted, immediately to seek the flock, gather it into one, and raise up its spirits by preaching the peace and especially the security of the heavenly homeland. And it is fitting for us to be solicitous for their protection so long that, if perhaps by God's judgment they lose the advantages of the present times, they may hope without doubt to receive the eternal joys of the future life.

C. XLVII. In persecutionibus episcopus ecclesiam suam non deserat.

Item Nicolaus Unifredo Moriensis ecclesiae Episcopo. Sciscitaris itaque per Galdagarium presbiterum, utrum, cum a Normannis episcopio depelleris, debeas de cetero in monasterio conuersari. In quo scias, frater karissime, quia, si perniciosum est proretam in tranquilitate nauim deserere, quanto magis in fluctibus? Ubi non dicimus, quod persecutorum non fugiamus (maximeque paganorum) insidias, cum ad tempus seuiunt, et ob multitudinem delictorum nostrorum nocendi facultatem diuinitus assecuntur, presertim cum eis prodire ultro non debeamus, et multos prophetas, et apostolos, ipsum quoque Dominum huiusmodi fugisse insecutores luce clarius constet, sed quod precipue nos, qui tamquam arietes ducatum gregibus prebemus, imo qui et horum pastores sumus, Deo auctore cum eis in periculis pro uiribus persistere pro certo conueniat, et cum tranquillitas reddita diuina fuerit pietate, sopitaque furentium infestatio mox gregem requirere, in unum colligere, et eius animos celestis patriae pace ac potissimum securitate predicata sursum erigere debemus. Et tamdiu super eorum cautela oportet nos esse sollicitos, ut, si Dei iudicio presentis temporibus commoda fortassis amittunt, futurae uitae sperent se gaudia absque ambiguitate percipere sempiterna.

C. XLVIII. The adversity of the good is not a reprobation but a trial of virtue.

Likewise Gregory, [book VII, letter 126, to King Reccared]. Adversity which is placed in the way of good desires is a trial of virtue, not a judgment of reprobation. For who does not know how prosperous it was that the blessed apostle Paul was coming to Italy to preach, and yet in coming he suffered shipwreck? But nevertheless the ship of his heart stood intact amid the waves of the sea. PART IX. GRATIAN. This is understood to be observed when among the subjects there are found some whom the life of the prelates benefits, when the prelate is not sought personally and the safety of the church cannot be secure through others, lest, if he begins to desert those whom he can benefit, it be said of him: "But the hireling, and he who is not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, sees the wolf coming and leaves the sheep and flees." But when he is sought personally, let him flee after the example of Christ, who fled from the face of Herod into Egypt; let him flee after the example of Paul, who was lowered by the brothers through the wall in a basket. Hence Augustine says: "Let the minister of Christ flee, as Christ fled into Egypt; let one who is sought personally flee, provided that the safety of the church is secured through others." Hence He also says to the disciples: "If they persecute you in one city, flee into another." Hence He also hid Himself and went out from the temple when the Jews took up stones to cast at Him. Hence Augustine also says concerning the same in Psalm 54: "Behold, I have gone far off in flight; this touches upon the fact that He avoided His persecutors, so that He might remove the occasion of anger, and remained in deserted places praying, in which He taught us to rest in the secrecy of conscience when we are oppressed by evil persons." But when not only the safety of the prelates but that of the whole church is sought, and the faith is attacked, it is necessary that they ascend against the adversary and in the day of battle set themselves as a wall for the house of the Lord, laying down their souls for their sheep, so that by the example of their own suffering they may kindle those whom they cannot confirm any longer by the word of teaching. And this concerning manifest persecutions. § 1. There is also another kind of persecution under which the Apostle labored, saying: "Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is scandalized, and I do not burn? etc." Hence Augustine also says in Psalm 101: "The bones, that is, the strong, whose frying pan is those who are scandalized; the good person is fried to the extent that he loves." Hence the same in Psalm 30: "The just man is angry at the sins of the chaff, yet he does not hate, in which the eye would be extinguished; and the belly stands for the inner things, which are disturbed when the impious cannot even be corrected. He does not cry out to them, because his life has failed in sorrow, when he sees that what he preaches does not profit." § 2. Hence the same in Psalm 69, distinguishing both kinds of persecution: "The voice of those suffering tribulation with Christ, that is, of the martyrs, endangered amid sufferings but presuming upon the head. With them is the voice of every just person for whom, out of abounding charity, the iniquity of Christians is a suffering, just as Lot endured bodily persecution from no one in Sodom, but suffered from the evils of those with whom he dwelt. There is therefore persecution of the just either from a lion in assault or from a dragon in plots, whence let all cry out: O God, attend unto my help." § 3. But when a prelate is afflicted by the vices of his subjects, sometimes there is one incurable obstinacy of all, and sometimes the evil are found mingled with the good. When the good dwell together with the evil, the good are not to be deserted because of the evil, lest, by perversely avoiding the evil, we surpass those whom we flee in going to hell; rather, let the evil be tolerated because of the good. Hence Gregory: "One refuses to be Abel whom the malice of Cain does not exercise"; for the iron of our mind cannot come to the sharpness of truth unless the file of another's depravity has scraped it. Hence also Augustine: "You who are good, tolerate the evil, etc.," below, concerning the toleration of the evil, in the first cause of heretics. Hence the same says: "We commit a greater evil in the separation of the good than we flee in the association of the evil. § 4. God does not impute to such a person his own sins, because he did not commit them; those of others, because he did not approve them; negligence, because he was not silent; pride, because he remained in unity." Hence the same in Psalm 54: "Who will give me wings like a dove? Not like a raven. The dove seeks to fly away from troubles, but does not lose love and always groans. Thus a good person wishes to separate himself in body, not in love, from those whom he cannot benefit. § 5. But sometimes he is bound not by the birdlime of cupidity but by care and office, so that he cannot desert them. Then let him say: 'I desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ; but to remain is necessary on account of you'; and thus there is merit from desire. § 6. 'Behold, I have gone far off in flight,' not in place, lest the charity of the good be broken, lest he lose the exercise afforded by the evil, whom God mingles in, as He mingled Judas with the apostles," whom, although He knew him to be a thief, He nevertheless sent to preach and gave him the Eucharist, teaching that the evil are to be tolerated in the church and that association with the evil does not harm the good. But when there is an obstinate malice of all the subjects and the presence of the prelates does not benefit them, then it is permitted even bodily to withdraw from them, lest both their wickedness always advance for the worse and the prelates lose the fruit which they could find from the advancement of others. Thus the blessed Benedict is read to have deserted those whom he had seen conspire with one mind for his death. Hence also blessed Gregory, when Peter the Deacon asked whether it is permitted for a prelate to desert a flock once undertaken, responded in book II of the Dialogues, c. 3, saying:

> C. XLVIII. Non est reprobatio, sed uirtutis probatio bonorum aduersitas.
> Item Gregorius. [lib. VII. epist. 126. ad Recaredum Regem.] Aduersitas, que bonis uotis obicitur, probatio uirtutis est, non iudicium reprobationis. Quis enim nesciat, quam prosperum fuit quod B. Paulus apostolus predicaturus ad Italiam ueniebat, et tamen ueniens naufragium pertulit? Sed tamen nauis cordis in maris fluctibus integra stetit. IX. Pars. Gratian. Hoc tunc seruandum intelligitur, quando inter subditos aliqui inueniuntur, quibus prelatorum uita proficiat, quando nec specialiter prelatus queritur, nec per alios tuta potest esse ecclesiae salus, ne, si deserere incipiat quibus prodesse potest, dicatur de eo: "Mercenarius autem, et qui non est pastor, cuius non sunt oues propriae, uidet lupum uenientem, et dimittit oues et fugit." Cum uero specialiter queritur, fugiat exemplo Christi, qui a facie Herodis fugit in Egiptum; fugiat exemplo Pauli, qui a fratribus per murum submissus est in sporta. Unde Augustinus ait: "Fugiat minister Christi, sicut Christus in Egiptum fugit; fugiat quis specialiter queritur, dum per alios firmatur ecclesiae salus." Hinc etiam ait discipulis: "Si uos persecuti fuerint in unam ciuitatem, fugite in aliam." Hinc etiam idem abscondit se, et exiuit de templo, quando Iudei tulerunt lapides, ut iacerent in eum. Hinc etiam Augustinus ait de eodem in Psalmo 54.: "Ecce elongaui fugiens illud tangit, quod uitabat persequentes, ut occasionem irae demeret, et manebat in desertis orans, in quo docebat nos in secreto conscientiae quiescere, cum a malis premimur." Cum uero non prelatorum tantum, sed totius ecclesiae salus queritur, fides inpugnatur, necesse est, ut ex aduerso ascendant, et in die belli se ipsos murum obponant pro domo Domini, animas suas ponant pro ouibus suis, ut exemplo suae passionis accendant quos sermone doctrinae diutius confirmare non ualent. Et hoc quidem de manifestis persecutionibus. §. 1. Est et aliud genus persecutionis quo Apostolus laborabat, dicens: "Quis infirmatur, et ego non infirmor? quis scandalizatur, et ego non uror? etc." Hinc etiam Augustinus in Psalmo 101.: "Ossa, id est fortes, quorum frixorium sunt qui scandalizantur; tantum frigitur bonus quantum amat." Hinc idem in Psalmo 30.: "Irascitur iustus peccatis palearum, non tamen odit, in quo exstingueretur oculus; et uenter pro interioribus, que turbantur, quando nec corripi possunt inpii, quibus non clamat, quia defecit in dolore uita, uidens non proficere quod predicat." §. 2. Hinc idem in Psalmo 69. utrumque genus persecutionis distinguens: "Vox contribulatorum Christo, id est martirum, inter passiones periclitantium, sed de capite presumentium. Cum illis uox omnis iusti, cui ex karitate habundans iniquitas Christianorum est passio, ut Loth corporalem persecutionem a nullo in Sodomis sustinuit, sed a malis eorum, cum quibus habitabat. Est ergo persecutio iusti, uel a leone in inpetu, uel a dracone in insidiis, unde omnes clament: Deus in adiutorium meum intende." §. 3. Cum autem a uiciis subditorum prelatus affligitur, aliquando omnium est una et insanabilis obstinatio, aliquando inueniuntur mali bonis admixti. Quando boni simul cum malis habitant, non sunt deserendi boni propter malos, ne peruerse malos euitando uincamus quos fugimus ad gehennam, sed potius mali tollerentur propter bonos. Unde Gregorius: "Abel esse rennuit quem Cain malicia non exercet;" ferrum quippe nostrae mentis ad acumen non potest peruenire ueritatis, nisi hoc alterius eraserit lima prauitatis. Hinc etiam Augustinus: "Tu bonus tollera malum etc." infra, de tollerandis malis, in prima causa hereticorum. Hinc idem ait: "Maius malum in separatione bonorum conmittimus, quam in coniunctione malorum fugimus. §. 4. Tali non inputat Deus peccata sua, quia non fecit; aliena, quia non approbauit; negligentiam, quia non tacuit; superbiam, quia in unitate permansit." Hinc idem in Psalmo 54.: "Quis dabit michi pennas sicut columbae? non sicut coruo.

Columba a molestiis querit auolare, sed non dilectionem amittit, et semper gemit. Sic bonus uult se separare corpore, non amore, ab his, quibus non potest prodesse. §. 5. Sed aliquando ligatur non uisco cupiditatis, sed cura et offitio, ut deserere non possit. Tunc dicat: 'Cupio dissolui, et esse cum Christo: Sed manere necesse est propter uos:' et sic est meritum ex desiderio. §. 6. 'Ecce elongaui fugiens,' non loco, ne rumpatur karitas bonorum, ne perdat exercitium malorum, quos Deus admiscet, ut Iudam apostolis," quem quamuis sciret furem esse, tamen ad predicandum misit, et ei eucharistiam dedit, docens, in ecclesia tollerari malos, nec obesse bonis consortia malorum. Quando uero omnium subditorum est obstinata malicia, nec prodest eis prelatorum presentia, tunc etiam corpore licet ab eis recedere, ne et illorum nequicia semper in deterius proficiat, et isti quidem fructum amittant, quem de aliorum profectu possent inuenire. Sic B. Benedictus deseruisse legitur quos in necem suam unanimiter uiderat conspirasse. Hinc etiam B. Gregorius Petro Diacono interroganti, an liceat prelato gregem semel susceptum deserere? in libro II. Dialogorum c. 3. respondit, dicens:

C. XLIX. When it is permitted for prelates to desert their subjects, or not.

The evil are to be borne with equanimity together in a place where some good persons are found who may be helped. For where fruit from the good is entirely lacking, labor upon the evil sometimes becomes superfluous, especially if nearby causes are available which may be able to bear better fruit for God. § 1. Something often occurs in the mind of the perfect which ought not to be passed over in silence, because, when they consider their labor to be without fruit, they migrate to labor with fruit in another place. Hence that distinguished preacher also, who desires to be dissolved and to be with Christ, for whom to live is Christ and to die is gain, who not only himself sought the contests of sufferings but also kindled others to endure them—when he suffered persecution at Damascus, so that he might be able to escape, sought a wall, a rope, and a basket and wished himself to be lowered secretly. Surely we do not say that Paul feared death, which he himself testifies that he seeks for the love of Jesus? But when he perceived that less fruit was available to him in the same place, he preserved himself for grievous labor with fruit elsewhere; for the strong warrior of God refused to be held within enclosures and sought the field of contest. GRATIAN. From the authorities of many it appears when others can be substituted while bishops are living, and when they cannot.

C. XLIX. Quando liceat prelatis subditos deserere, uel non.

Ibi adunati equanimiter portandi sunt mali, ubi inueniuntur aliqui, qui adiuuentur boni. Nam ubi omnimodo fructus de bonis deest, fit aliquando de malis labor superuacuus, maxime si e uicino causae suppetant, que fructum Deo ualeant ferre meliorem. §. 1. Sepe agitur in animo perfectorum quod silentio pretereundum non est, quia, cum laborem suum sine fructu esse considerant in loco alio cum fructu ad laborem migrant. Unde ille quoque egregius predicator, qui dissolui cupit et esse cum Christo, cui Christus est uiuere et mori lucrum, qui certamina passionum non solum ipse appetiit, sed ad tolleranda hec etiam alios accendit, Damasci persecutionem passus, ut potuisset euadere, murum, funem sportamque quesiuit, seque latenter deponi uoluit. Num quidnam Paulum mortem timuisse dicimus, quam se ipse pro Iesu amore testatur appetere? Sed cum in eodem loco minorem sibi fructum adesse conspiceret, grauem ad laborem se alibi cum fructu seruauit; fortis enim Dei preliator teneri intra claustra noluit, certaminis campum quesiuit. Gratian. Multorum auctoritatibus apparet, quando uiuentibus episcopis alii possint substitui, et quando non.

Question II

GRATIAN. But that this man, once his health has been recovered, seeks his chair again is held valid by no authority. Yet if he left off the celebration of sacrifices because of infirmity, he is not prohibited from carrying it out once his health has been recovered. Hence Alexander II writes to Gebhard, Archbishop of Salzburg:

> GRATIANUS. Quod autem iste ualetudine recepta suam repetit cathedram, nulla auctoritate ratum habetur. Celebrationem uero sacrificiorum, si causa infirmitatis dimiserit, ualitudine recuperata exequi non prohibetur. Unde Alexander II. scribit Gebonardo Iuuauiensi Archiepiscopo:

C. I. Concerning a certain priest who suffered from the falling sickness.

The following was contained in your letters: This cleric possesses the order of priest; but because he suffers from the falling sickness, and we ourselves have recognized this at the present time, we did not dare to permit him to offer or celebrate Mass. But because illness is not a fault, we have resolved that counsel should be given on this matter by the decree of our authority. We therefore counsel that, if he is frequently touched by this illness, he be prohibited by every means from the offering and the celebration of Masses. For it is indecent and dangerous that, overcome by the epileptic illness, he should fall during the consecration of the Eucharist. But if by the mercy of God he recovers, since not fault but infirmity is the cause, we no longer forbid him to offer sacrifice.

> C. I. De quodam presbitero, qui caduco morbo laborabat.
> In litteris tuis continebatur sic: Hic clericus ordinem habet presbiteri; sed quia caduco morbo laborat, et ipsi hoc in presentiarum agnouimus, non ausi fuimus sibi concedere ut offerret uel missam celebraret. Quia uero languor non in culpa est, super hac re auctoritatis nostrae decreto consulendum deliberauimus. Consulimus itaque, ut, si frequenter hoc morbo tangitur, ab oblatione et missarum celebratione omnimodis prohibeatur. Indecens enim est et periculosum, ut in consecratione eucharistiae morbo uictus epilentico cadat. Si uero Dei misericordia conualuerit, quandoquidem non culpa, sed infirmitas est in causa, eum sacrificare iam non interdicimus.

C. II. Let one who is frequently dashed to the ground be suspended from the governance of a church.

Likewise Pope Gelasius to Bishops Rusticus and Fortunatus. Recently the clerics of the church of Foropopoli, together with the laymen Sabinus and Pelagius, disclosed by their own report that their prelate was troubled by a certain grave necessity, by the onset of which they said that he was frequently dashed down. Lest this appear to introduce scandal among the faithful and disturb the church of God established everywhere by this offense, especially since they affirmed that with the same man willing they had proceeded here, we directed writings to your affection so that you might render an appropriate visitation to the church whose ruler is held bound by such a misfortune. But because the same pontiff has now come here and proclaims that all the things spread abroad concerning him are false, with regard for the contemplation of divine judgment and for your conscience and estimation, let the truth of the matters be most carefully investigated—namely, whether he is proved at any time, either in a house, in a procession, or in any other place whatsoever, suddenly to have collapsed, uttered confused cries, and cast foam from his mouth; let it be inquired into with as great an examination as can be made. Yet whether this cannot be confirmed by the testimony of any persons or is said never to have happened, it must not be thought that this can suffice; rather, let there be certain and manifest proof, because a matter so great is not to be handled too sluggishly. Let your affection, brother Rusticus, make the affair characteristic of itself and suitable for a great pontiff, so that you establish him with you for at least thirty days and compel him, as a necessary test, to eat meats without distinction.

C. II. A regimine ecclesiae suspendatur qui in terram frequenter eliditur.

Item Gelasius Papa Rustico et Fortunato Episcopo. Nuper Foropopulensis ecclesiae clerici una cum Sabino et Pelagio laicis, propria suggestione reserarunt, presulem suum graui quadam necessitate uexari, cuius eum dicerent incursione frequenter elisum. Quod ne scandalum fidelibus uideretur ingerere, et ecclesiam Dei ubique positam hac offensione turbare, precipue cum eodem ipso uolente huc se perrexisse firmarent, ad dilectionem uestram scripta direximus, ut ecclesiae, cuius rector tali casu tenetur astrictus, uisitationem congruam redderetis. Verum, quia nunc idem ipse uenit huc pontifex, falsaque omnia de se iactata disseminat, sub diuini contemplatione iudicii, uestraeque conscientiae estimationisque respectu, rerum fide sollertissime perquisita, scilicet si aliquando, uel in domo, uel in processione, uel in alio quocumque loco probatur repente collapsus, uocesque dedisse confusas, et spumas ore iactasse, quanta fieri potest examinatione queratur. Quod tamen siue non possit aliquorum factum testificatione firmari siue numquam contigisse dicatur, non putandum est posse sufficere, sed certum manifestumque documentum, quia de tanta re non segnius agendum est. Faciat rem tua dilectio, frater Rustice, sui moris, et aptam magno pontifici, ut eum uel triginta diebus tecum esse constituas, eumque carnibus indifferenter uti necessaria probatione conpellas.

Causa VIII

GRATIAN. A certain bishop, acting at the point of death, appointed a successor for himself by testament; afterward, through the patronage of his friends, he is elected to that episcopate; after the election he furnished an oath to the canons for the indemnity of the church; he is accused of simony, as though he had furnished a gift from service; before the time of sentence he is deserted by his clerics; without letters from the apostolic pontiff the bishop returns to his own church. (Qu. I.) Here it is asked first whether a bishop is permitted to appoint a successor for himself. (Qu. II.) Second, whether the patronage of friends ought to prevail in an election. (Qu. III.) Third, whether one who furnishes an oath of this kind to the canons after election is to be held a simoniac. (Qu. IV.) Fourth, whether clerics are permitted to withdraw from their bishop before the time of sentence. (Qu. V.) Fifth, whether without letters from the apostolic pontiff he ought to return to his own church.

GRATIANUS. In extremis agens quidam episcopus successorem sibi ex testamento instituit; inde suorum amicorum patrocinio in eundem episcopatum eligitur; post electionem pro indempnitate ecclesiae canonicis iuramentum prebuit; accusatur de symonia, tamquam munus ab obsequio prestiterit; ante tempus sententiae a clericis suis derelinquitur; sine litteris apostolici ad ecclesiam suam episcopus reuertitur. (Qu. I.) Hic primo queritur, an liceat episcopo successorem sibi instituere? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an amicorum patrocinia in electione debeant conualescere? (Qu. III.) Tertio, an habendus sit symoniacus qui post electionem huiuscemodi iuramentum canonicis prestat? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, an liceat clericis ante sententiae tempus ab episcopo suo discedere? (Qu. V.) Quinto, an sine litteris apostolici debeat redire ad propriam ecclesiam?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. That a bishop is permitted to appoint a successor for himself is inferred from the words of Pope Zacharias, by which he permitted the Archbishop of Mainz to establish a helper for himself who, after he had died, would succeed to the fullness of power. § 1. Likewise from the words of Pope Symmachus, who says, "If the Pope's passing occurs unexpectedly, so that he cannot determine beforehand concerning the election of his successor," it appears that bishops can appoint successors for themselves. § 2. Likewise the same is proved by the example of blessed Peter, who appointed blessed Clement as his successor. Hence John III writes to the Bishops of Germany and Gaul, [sole letter, c. 2]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem episcopo successorem sibi instituere liceat, ex uerbis Zachariae Papae conicitur, quibus Maguntino archiepiscopo permisit adiutorem sibi statuere, qui ei defuncto in plenitudinem succederet potestatis. §. 1. Item ex uerbis Symachi Papae dicentis: "Si transitus Papae inopinatus euenerit, ut de sui electione successoris non possit ante decernere" apparet, quod episcopi successores sibi instituere possunt. §. 2. Item exemplo B. Petri illud idem probatur, qui B. Clementem sibi successorem instituit. Unde Iohannes III. scribit Episcopis Germaniae et Galliae: [epistola unica, c. 2.]

C. I. That Peter took Linus and Cletus to himself as helpers.

If Peter, the prince of the apostles, took Linus and Cletus to himself as helpers, he nevertheless delivered to them neither the power of the pontificate nor the rule of binding and loosing, but delivered it to his successor Clement, who merited to hold after him the apostolic see and the pontifical power handed over to him by blessed Peter. But Linus and Cletus ministered in external matters; Peter, the prince of the apostles, devoted himself to the word and prayer.

> C. I. Quod Petrus sibi adiutores asciuit Linum et Cletum.
> Si Petrus princeps apostolorum adiutores sibi asciuit Linum et Cletum, non tamen potestatem pontificii, aut ligandi aut soluendi normam eis tradidit, sed successori suo Clementi, qui sedem apostolicam post eum et potestatem pontificalem tradente sibi B. Petro tenere promeruit. Linus uero et Cletus ministrabant exteriora; princeps autem apostolorum Petrus uerbo et orationi instabat.

[PALEA C. II.

Hence Clement himself, in the letter sent to James of Jerusalem, writes among other things that Peter, while still living, elected Clement as bishop: "In those very days in which Simon Peter foresaw the end of his life, suddenly rising after taking my hand, in the ears of the whole church he brought forth these words: I ordain this Clement as bishop for you, to whom alone I hand over the chair of my preaching and teaching, whom beyond the others I have found to worship God, love men, be chaste, devoted to the pursuits of learning, sober, kind, just, patient, and one who knows how to bear the injuries even of some of those who are instructed in the word of God."] GRATIAN. But in the Council of Antioch this is altogether prohibited from being done, in which [c. 23] the following statute is read:

> [PALEA C. II.
> Unde ipse Clemens in epistola ad Iacobum Ierosolomitanum missa inter cetera scribit, quod Petrus adhuc uiuens Clementem in episcopum elegit: "Simon Petrus in ipsis diebus, quibus uitae finem sibi presensit, apprehensa manu mea repente consurgens, in auribus totius ecclesiae hec protulit uerba: Clementem hunc episcopum uobis ordino, cui soli meae predicationis et doctrinae cathedram trado, quem pre ceteris expertus sum Deum colentem, homines diligentem, castum, discendi studiis deditum, sobrium, benignum, iustum, patientem, et scientem ferre nonnullorum etiam ex his, qui in uerbo Dei instituuntur, iniurias."] Gratian. Sed in Antioceno Concilio hoc omnino fieri prohibetur, in quo [c. 23.] sic statutum legitur:

C. III. A bishop ought not to establish a successor for himself.

We decree that a bishop is not permitted to establish another as successor for himself, even if he reaches the end of life. But if anything of this kind has been done, let an appointment of this kind be void. Let ecclesiastical law be preserved, which contains that it ought to be done in no other way except with a synod and the judgment of the bishops and the election of the clergy, who after the death of the one resting have the power to elect and promote him who shall have been found worthy.

C. III. Episcopus successorem sibi constituere non debet.

Episcopo non licere decernimus pro se alterum sibi successorem constituere, licet ad exitum uitae perueniat. Quod si tale aliquid factum fuerit, irritum sit huiusmodi constitutum. Seruetur autem ius ecclesiasticum, id continens, non aliter oportere fieri, nisi cum sinodo et iudicio episcoporum et electione clericorum, qui post obitum quiescentis potestatem habent eum, qui dignus extiterit, eligere et promouere.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 8]. Let a bishop not be permitted before the end of his life to establish another as successor in his place. But if anyone has attempted to usurp this power, such an appointment will be void. Therefore, it ought not to be done otherwise than with the counsel and judgment of the bishops, who after the departure of the predecessor have the power to elect one worthy.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 8.] Episcopo non liceat ante finem uitae alium in loco suo constituere successorem. Si quis autem hoc usurpare temptauerit talis constitutio irrita erit. Non ergo aliter fieri oportet, nisi cum consilio et iudicatu episcoporum qui post exitum predecessoris potestatem habent dignum eligere.

C. V. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Hilary, [in the Roman Synod, c. 5]. Many priests established at the boundary of death are said to substitute others in their own place by designating their names, evidently so that a lawful election is not awaited but the favor of the deceased is held as the consent of the people. Judge how grave this is. It was acclaimed by all: Let this presumption never occur. The things which are God's cannot be given by man.

C. V. De eodem.

Item Ylarius Papa. [in Synodo Romana, c. 5.] Plerique sacerdotes in mortis confinio constituti in locum suum feruntur alios designatis nominibus subrogare, scilicet ut non legitima expectetur electio, sed defuncti gratificatio pro populi habeatur assensu. Quod quam graue sit estimate. Ab uniuersis acclamatum est: Hec presumptio numquam fiat. Que Dei sunt ab homine dari non possunt.

C. VI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Jerome, [on Titus, c. 1]. Moses, the friend of God, to whom God spoke face to face, could certainly have made his own sons successors to his principate and left his own dignity to his posterity; but Joshua, a stranger from another tribe, is chosen, so that we might know that principate over peoples is to be granted not to blood but to life. And now we see that very many make this thing a benefice, so that they seek to erect as pillars in the church not those whom they know can profit the church more, but those whom they themselves love, or by whose services they have been won over, or for whom one of their superiors has asked, and—to keep silent about worse things—those who obtained by gifts that they be made clerics.

> C. VI. De eodem.
> Item Ieronimus. [ad Titum, c. 1.] Moises amicus Dei, cui facie ad faciem locutus est Deus, potuit utique successores principatus filios suos facere, et posteris propriam relinquere dignitatem; sed extraneus de alia tribu eligitur Iesus, ut sciremus, principatum in populos non sanguini deferendum esse, sed uitae. Ac nunc cernimus plurimos hanc rem beneficium facere, ut non querant eos in ecclesia columpnas erigere, quos plus cognoscant ecclesiae prodesse, sed quos uel ipsi amant, uel quorum sunt obsequiis deliniti, uel pro quibus maiorum quispiam rogauerit, et (ut deteriora taceam) qui ut clerici fierent muneribus inpetrarunt.

C. VII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Innocent II, [in the Roman Council, c. 16]. By apostolic authority we prohibit anyone from having power to claim or presume to demand churches and prebends, provostships, chaplaincies, or any ecclesiastical offices by hereditary right. But if any wicked person or one guilty of ambition presumes to attempt this, he will be punished with the due penalty and will lack the things sought. GRATIAN. By all these authorities bishops are prohibited from appointing successors for themselves. But it is one thing to deliberate with the brothers concerning the election of one's successor, and another to seek for oneself by testament, as though an heir to one's own dignity. The former is permitted to be done, but the latter is utterly prohibited. But that deed of blessed Peter can validly be taken as an argument by those who substitute for themselves such persons as the successor blessed Peter sought for himself. But because office began to be granted not to life but to blood, and each began to seek for himself as successors to the episcopate persons who would be found either hateful to the peoples or needing to be taught by the congregation, it was established by the sacred canons that no one seek a successor for himself in his office, but that by the election of the people one be sought who worthily serves their utility, who seeks their utility and not his own gains, who wishes to raise up seed for Christ and not to gather riches for himself. One who has despised doing this is rightly rejected by the church. Hence Augustine in the book against the Manichaeans, [book XXXII, c. 10]:

> C. VII. De eodem.
> Item Innocentius Papa II. [in Concilio Romano, c. 16.] Apostolica auctoritate prohibemus, ne quis ecclesias et prebendas, preposituras, capellanias, aut aliqua ecclesiastica offitia hereditario iure ualeat uendicare aut expostulare presumat. Quod si quis inprobus aut ambitionis reus attemptare presumpserit, debita pena mulctabitur et postulatis carebit. Gratian. His omnibus auctoritatibus prohibentur episcopi successores sibi instituere. Sed aliud est de sui successoris electione cum fratribus deliberare, et aliud est ex testamento tamquam suae dignitatis heredem sibi querere. Illud fieri permittitur: hoc autem penitus prohibetur. Illud autem B. Petri ab illis ualet in argumentum assumi, qui tales sibi substituunt, qualem sibi successorem B. Petrus quesiuit. Verum, quia offitium non uitae, sed sanguini cepit deferri, atque ad episcopatum tales quisque successores sibi querere cepit, qui uel odiosi populis uel a plebe docendi inuenirentur, sacris canonibus constitutum est ne quisquam sibi sui offitii querat successorem, sed populi electione queratur qui eorum utilitati digne deseruiat, qui illorum utilitatem, non sua lucra querat, qui Christo semen uelit suscitare, non sibi diuitias congregare. Quod qui facere contempserit iure ab ecclesia repudiatur. Unde Augustinus in libro contra Manicheos: [lib. XXXII. c. 10.]

C. VIII. One who benefits both himself and the church is understood to be shod on both feet.

PART II. Of old a brother was commanded to take the wife of his brother who had died before him, so that he might raise up offspring not for himself but for him, and what was born from her might be called by his name. But if he refused, he was accustomed to be unshod on one foot and spat upon in the face. Now every preacher of the Gospel ought so to labor in the church that he raises up seed for his dead brother, that is, for Christ, who died for us, and what has been raised up receives His name. But one who, having been elected by the church, has refused the ministry of evangelizing is worthily and deservedly despised by the church itself. For one who benefits both himself and the church is well understood to be shod on both feet. Hence this: "How beautiful are the feet of those who announce good things." But one who flees the care of gaining others has borne in himself, fulfilled and not merely figured, the reproach of that unshod man.

C. VIII. Qui sibi et ecclesiae prodest utroque pede calciatus intelligitur.

II. Pars. Olim iussus est frater premortui fratris uxorem ducere, ut non sibi, sed illi suscitaret sobolem, eiusque nomine uocaret quod inde nasceretur. Quod si recusaret, discalciatus uno pede conspui solebat in facie. Nunc euangelii quisque predicator ita debet in ecclesia laborare, ut defuncto fratri, id est Christo, suscitet semen, qui pro nobis mortuus est, et quod suscitatum fuerit eius nomen accipiat. At uero qui electus ab ecclesia ministerium euangelizandi rennuerit, ab ipsa ecclesia digne meritoque contempnitur. Qui enim et sibi prodest, et ecclesiae, bene intelligitur utroque pede calciatus. Unde illud: "Quam speciosi pedes euangelizantium bona." Qui autem lucrandorum curam refugit aliorum, discalciati illius non figuratum significauit, sed in se inpletum portauit obprobrium.

C. IX. Just as a position of governance is to be denied to those desiring it, so it is to be offered to those fleeing it.

Likewise Gregory in the Register, [book VI, letter 5, to Bishop Cyriacus]. In your writings you relate that you greatly sought repose, but through this you show that you have fittingly come to pastoral solicitude, because, just as a position of governance is to be denied to those desiring it, so it is to be offered to those fleeing it. And as it is written: "Nor does anyone take honor to himself, but he who is called by the Lord, as Aaron was," and again the same distinguished preacher says: "If one died for all, therefore all died; and Christ died for all, so that those who live may now live not for themselves but for Him who died for them and rose again," and it is said to the shepherd of holy Church: "Simon, son of John, do you love me? Feed my sheep." From these words it is gathered that if one who is capable refuses to feed the sheep of almighty God, he shows that he loves the supreme shepherd not at all. For if the only-begotten Son of the Father went forth from the Father's secret place into our public realm to fulfill the utility of all, what are we going to say if we prefer our secret place to the utility of our neighbors? § 1. Repose, therefore, is both to be sought by us from the heart and yet sometimes to be postponed for the gain of many. For just as we ought to flee occupation with our whole desire, so, if there is no one to preach, it is necessary to undertake the burden of occupation with a willing shoulder. We are taught this from the action of two prophets, one of whom attempted to avoid the office of preaching and the other sought it. For Jeremiah answered the Lord who was sending him, saying: "Ah, ah, ah, Lord God, I do not know how to speak, because I am a boy." And when almighty God sought a person to preach, saying, "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" Isaiah voluntarily offered himself, saying: "Behold, I; send me." Behold, an outwardly different voice proceeded from each, but it did not emanate from a different source of love. For there are two precepts of charity, love of God and love of neighbor. Therefore Isaiah, desiring through the active life to benefit his neighbors, seeks the office of preaching. But Jeremiah, through the contemplative life desiring to adhere continually to the love of the Creator, objects that he ought not to be sent to preach. What one laudably sought, therefore, the other laudably feared; the latter, lest by speaking he lose the gains of silent contemplation, the former, lest by keeping silent he suffer the losses of zealous work. But in both this must be subtly observed: that the one who refused did not fully resist, and the one who wished to be sent saw himself first purified by the coal of the altar, lest either anyone not purified dare to approach the sacred mysteries or one whom heavenly grace chooses proudly object under the appearance of humility.

C. IX. Locus regiminis sicut desiderantibus est negandus, ita fugientibus est offerendus.

Item Gregorius in Registro. [lib. VI. epist. 5. Cyriaco Episcopo.] In scriptis uestris uos magnopere requiem quesisse narratis, sed per hoc ad pastoralem sollicitudinem uos congrue uenisse ostenditis, quia, sicut locus regiminis desiderantibus negandus est, ita fugientibus offerendus. Et sicut scriptum est: "Nec quisquam sumit sibi honorem, sed qui uocatur a Domino tamquam Aaron," et rursus idem egregius predicator dicit: "Si unus pro omnibus mortuus est, ergo omnes mortui sunt: et pro omnibus Christus mortuus est, superest ut qui uiuunt non iam sibi uiuant, sed ei, qui pro ipsis mortuus est et resurrexit," et pastori sanctae dicitur ecclesiae: "Simon Iohannis amas me? Pasce oues meas." Ex quibus uerbis colligitur, quia si is, qui ualet, omnipotentis Dei oues pascere rennuit, ostendit se pastorem summum minime amare. Si enim unigenitus Patris pro explenda utilitate omnium de secreto Patris ad publicum nostrum egressus est, nos quid dicturi sumus, si secretum nostrum preponimus utilitati proximorum? §. 1. Quies itaque nobis et ex corde appetenda est, et tamen pro multorum lucro aliquando postponenda. Nam, sicut toto desiderio debemus occupationem fugere, ita si desit qui predicet, occupationis onus libenti necesse est humero subire. Quod ex duorum prophetarum opere docemur, quorum unus predicationis offitium uitare conatus est, et alter appetiit. Nam mittenti se Domino

Ieremias respondit, dicens: "A, a, a, Domine Deus, nescio loqui, quia puer ego sum." Et cum omnipotens Deus personam ad predicandum quereret, dicens: "Quem mittam, et quis ibit nobis?" ultro se ysaias obtulit, dicens: "Ecce ego, mitte me." En ab utrisque exterius diuersa uox prodiit, sed non a diuerso fonte dilectionis emanauit. Duo quippe sunt precepta karitatis, amor Dei et proximi. Per actiuam igitur uitam prodesse proximis cupiens Ysaias offitium predicationis appetit. Per contemplatiuam uero Ieremias amori conditoris sedule inherere desiderans, ne mitti ad predicandum debeat, contradicit. Quod laudabiliter ergo unus appetiit, hoc laudabiliter alter expauit; iste, ne tacitae contemplationis lucra loquendo perderet, ille, ne dampna studiosi operis tacendo sentiret. Sed hoc in utrisque est subtiliter intuendum, quia et is, qui recusauit, plene non restitit, et is, qui mitti uoluit, ante se per altaris calculum purgatum uidit, ne aut non purgatus adire quisque sacra misteria audeat, aut quem superna gratia eligit sub humilitatis specie superbe contradicat.

C. X. A position of abasement belongs in one's desire; one of dignity is always undertaken from necessity.

The same in the Moralia, [book XXXV, c. 13, on Job 42]. It must above all be known that sometimes obedience, if it possesses something from its own inclination, is nothing; sometimes, if it possesses nothing from its own inclination, it is minimal. For when success in this world is commanded, when a higher position is ordered, one who obeys in order to receive these things empties for himself the virtue of obedience if he pants for these things from his own inclination. For one who serves the desire of his own ambition in order to receive the prosperous things of this life does not direct himself under obedience. Again, when contempt of the world is commanded, when reproaches and insults are ordered to be acquired, unless the mind seeks them from itself, it diminishes for itself the merit of obedience, since it descends unwillingly and reluctantly to those things which are despised in this life. And a little above: § 1. Obedience is rightly preferred to sacrifices, because through sacrifices the flesh of another is slain, but through obedience one's own will. Contrary to this, disobedience is shown to be the sin of divination. From its opposite, therefore, it is better shown what should be thought of its praise. For if "to resist is as the sin of divination, and to refuse to acquiesce is as the crime of idolatry," obedience alone possesses the merit of faith, without which everyone is proved to be unfaithful even if he appears to be faithful.

C. X. Locus deiectionis in uoto, dignitatis semper fit in necessitate.

Idem in Moralibus. [lib. XXXV. c. 13. ad c. 42. Iob.] Sciendum est summopere, quod obedientia aliquando, si de suo aliquid habuerit, nulla est; aliquando, si de suo aliquid non habuerit, minima. Nam cum huius mundi successus precipitur, cum locus superior inperatur, is, qui ad percipienda hec obedit, obedientiae sibi uirtutem euacuat, si ad hec ex proprio anhelat. Neque enim se sub obedientia dirigit qui ad percipienda huius uitae prospera libidini propriae ambicionis seruit. Rursum, cum mundi despectus precipitur, cum probra adipisci et contumeliae iubentur, nisi ex semet ipso animus appetat, obedientia sibi meritum minuit, qui ad ea, que in hac uita sunt despecta, inuitus nolensque descendit. Et paulo superius: §. 1. Obedientia uictimis iure preponitur, quia per uictimas aliena caro, per obedientiam uero uoluntas propria mactatur Quo contra ariolandi peccatum inobedientia esse monstratur. Ex aduerso ergo melius ostenditur quid de eius laude sentiatur. Si enim "quasi peccatum ariolandi est repugnare, et quasi scelus ydolatriae, nolle adquiescere," sola est, que fidei meritum possidet obedientia sine qua quisque infidelis esse conuincitur, etiamsi fidelis esse uideatur.

C. XI. One who desires to preside, not to benefit, ought not to be a bishop.

Likewise Augustine, [book XIX of The City of God, c. 19]. "One who desires the episcopate desires a good work." He wished to explain what the episcopate is, because it is the name of a work, not of an honor. For the word is Greek and is derived from the fact that one who is placed over others superintends those over whom he is placed, namely by exercising care for them; for skopos is attention. Therefore, if we wished, we could say in Latin that bishops are "superintendents," so that he may understand that one who loves to preside, not to benefit, is not a bishop. Accordingly, no one is prohibited from the pursuit of knowing the truth, which pertains to praiseworthy leisure. But a higher position, without which a people cannot be governed, although it is held and administered as is fitting, is nevertheless sought indecently. Therefore the charity of truth seeks holy leisure; the necessity of charity undertakes just business. If no one imposes this burden, one must be free for perceiving and contemplating the truth; but if it is imposed, it must be undertaken because of the necessity of charity. Yet not even then is the delight of truth to be abandoned altogether, lest that sweetness be withdrawn and just necessity become oppressive.

C. XI. Qui preesse, non prodesse desiderat, non debet episcopari.

Item Augustinus. [lib. XIX. de ciuit. Dei, c. 19.] "Qui episcopatum desiderat, bonum opus desiderat."

Exponere uoluit quid sit episcopatus, quia nomen est operis, non honoris. Grecum est enim, atque inde ductum uocabulum, quod ille, qui preficitur, illis, quibus preficitur, superintendit, curam eorum scilicet gerens; SKOPOS quippe intentio est. Ergo episcopos, si uelimus, latine superintendentes possumus dicere, ut intelligat non se esse episcopum qui preesse dilexerit, non prodesse. Itaque a studio cognoscendae ueritatis nemo prohibetur, quod ad laudabile pertinet otium. Locus uero superior, sine quo regi populus non potest, etsi ita teneatur atque administretur, ut decet, tamen indecenter appetitur. Quamobrem otium sanctum querit karitas ueritatis, negotium iustum suscipit necessitas karitatis, quam sarcinam si nullus inponit, percipiendae atque intuendae uacandum est ueritati; si autem inponitur, suscipienda est propter necessitatem karitatis. Sed nec sic omnimodo ueritatis delectatio deserenda est, ne subtrahatur illa suauitas, et obprimatur iusta necessitas.

C. XII. Let a teacher moderate the words of teaching according to the capacity of those learning.

Likewise Peter. PART III. It is fitting that one who teaches and instructs untrained souls be such that he can adapt himself according to the capacity of those learning and direct the order of his words according to the capacity of the hearer. Therefore he ought above all to be learned and taught, irreproachable, mature, fearful, just as you yourselves have proved this Clement will be after me.

C. XII. Pro ingenio discentium doctor moderetur uerba doctrinae.

Item Petrus. III. Pars. Oportet eum, qui docet et instruit animas rudes, esse talem, ut pro ingenio discentium semet ipsum possit aptare, et uerbi ordinem pro audientis capacitate dirigere. Debet ergo adprime esse eruditus et doctus, inreprehensibilis, maturus, pauidus, sicut ipsi probastis fore Clementem hunc post me.

C. XIII. Let one who presides over all strive to relieve individuals.

Likewise from the same. Clement, since you have wished to preside over all, help individuals as you are able and relieve individuals, for you bear the burden and solicitude of individuals.

C. XIII. Qui omnibus preest singulos releuare contendat.

Item eiusdem. Clemens tamquam omnibus preesse uolueris singulos, prout potueris, iuua, et singulos releua, qui et singulorum onus ac sollicitudinem portas.

C. XIV. Those who grant an ecclesiastical rank from favor, not merits, act against Christ.

Likewise Jerome, [on Titus, c. 1]. “One who despises you despises me.” From this it is manifest that those who, after despising the law of the Apostle, have wished to confer an ecclesiastical rank on someone not for merits but from favor act against Christ, who through His Apostle subsequently explained what kind of person is to be established as priest in the church.

C. XIV. Contra Christum faciunt qui gratiae, non meritis gradum ecclesiasticum tribuunt.

Item Ieronimus. [ad Titum, c. 1.] Qui uos spernit me spernit. Ex quo manifestum est, quod, qui Apostoli lege contempta ecclesiasticum gradum non meritis uoluerint alicuius deferre, sed gratiae, contra Christum facere, qui qualis in ecclesia presbiter constituendus sit per Apostolum suum in sequentibus executus est.

C. XV. Let no one be elected to the priesthood unless he is held both holier and more learned than the rest.

Likewise Jerome in the book of Leviticus. Therefore, although the Lord had commanded concerning the appointment of a prince, and the Lord had chosen him, nevertheless the synagogue too is summoned. For the presence of the people is also required in ordaining a priest, so that all may know and be certain that he who is more excellent than all the people, who is more learned, who is holier, who is more eminent in every virtue, is elected to the priesthood, and this with the people standing by, lest afterward any reconsideration remain for anyone, or any scruple. This, moreover, is what the Apostle too commands in the ordination of a priest, saying: "But he must also have good testimony from those who are outside." Yet I see something more in what it says: "because Moses summoned the whole synagogue," that is, to gather all the powers of the mind and assemble the virtues into one, so that, when there is discourse concerning the priestly sacraments, all the powers of the mind may be vigilant and intent, nothing of wisdom, nothing of knowledge, nothing of diligence may be lacking in them, but the whole multitude of the senses may be present, the whole assembly of holy thoughts may be present, so that, examining within the sanctuary of his heart what the pontiff is, what the anointing is, and what his vestments are, he may be able to perceive it.

C. XV. Ad sacerdotium non eligatur, nisi qui ceteris et sanctior et doctior habeatur.

Item Ieronimus in libro Leuitici. Licet ergo Dominus de constituendo principe precepisset, et Dominus elegisset, tamen conuocatur et sinagoga. Requiritur enim in ordinando sacerdote et populi presentia, ut sciant omnes et certi sint, quia qui prestantior est ex omni populo, qui doctior, qui sanctior, qui in omni uirtute eminentior, ille eligitur ad sacerdotium, et hoc astante populo, ne qua postmodum retractatio cuiquam, ne quis scrupulus resideret. Hoc autem est, quod et Apostolus precipit in ordinatione sacerdotis, dicens: "Oportet autem illum et testimonium habere bonum ab his, qui foris sunt." Ego tamen et amplius aliquid uideo in eo, quod dicit: "quia conuocauit Moyses omnem sinagogam," hoc sit, colligere omnes animi uires et in unum congregare uirtutes, ut cum sermo de sacerdotalibus habetur sacramentis, uigilent omnes animi uirtutes, et intentae sint, nichil in eis sapientiae, nichil scientiae, nichil desit industriae, sed adsit omnis multitudo sensuum, adsit omnis congregatio sanctarum cogitationum, ut quid sit pontifex, quid unctio, quid indumenta eius, conferens intra sacrarium cordis sui possit aduertere.

C. XVI. Let the governance of a people be furnished by divine election.

Likewise from the book of Numbers. If therefore so great and such a man as Moses does not permit his own judgment concerning the election of a prince of the people and the appointment of a successor, who will there be who dares—either from the congregation, which is often accustomed to be moved by acclamations, perhaps roused toward favor or for a price, or even from among the priests themselves—who will there be who judges himself suitable for this, unless it be one to whom it is revealed by the Lord as he prays and asks? As God also says to Moses: "Take to yourself Joshua the son of Nun, a man who has the Spirit of God in himself, and you shall lay your hands upon him, and you shall set him before Eleazar the priest; and give commands to him in the sight of the whole synagogue, and command concerning him before them, and you shall give your glory upon him, so that the sons of Israel may hear him." You hear the ordination of the prince of the people described so manifestly that it scarcely needs exposition. Here there is no acclamation of the people, no account of blood relationship, no regard had for kinship. Let an inheritance of fields and estates be left to relatives. Let the governance of the people be handed over to him whom God has chosen, namely, such a man who has—as you have heard written—the Spirit of God in himself, and before whose sight the precepts of God are, and who is very well known and familiar to Moses, that is, in whom there is clarity of the law and knowledge, so that the sons of Israel may be able to hear him.

> C. XVI. Populi gubernatio diuina electione prestetur.
> Item ex libro Numerorum. Si ergo tantus ille ac talis Moyses non permittit iudicio suo de eligendo populi principe, de constituendo successore, quis erit qui audeat, uel ex plebe, que sepe clamoribus ad gratiam aut ad precium fortasse excitata moueri solet, uel ex ipsis etiam sacerdotibus quis erit, qui se ydoneum ad hoc iudicet, nisi si cui oranti et petenti a Domino reueletur? Sicut et Deus dicit ad Moysen: "Assume ad temetipsum Iesum filium Naue, hominem qui habet Spiritum Dei in semetipso, et inpones manus tuas super eum, et statues eum coram Eleazaro sacerdote et precepta dato ei in conspectu totius sinagogae, et precipe de ipso coram eis, et dabis claritatem tuam super illum, ut audiant illum filii Israel." Audis euidenter ordinationem principis populi tam manifeste descriptam, ut pene expositione non egeat. Nulla hic populi adclamatio, nulla consanguinitatis ratio, nulla propinquitatis habita contemplatio est. Propinquis agrorum et prediorum relinquatur hereditas. Gubernatio populi illi tradatur, quem Deus elegerit, homini scilicet tali, qui habet (sicut scriptum audistis) in semetipso spiritum Dei, et precepta Dei in conspectu eius sunt, et qui Moysi ualde notus et familiaris sit, id est in quo sit claritas legis et scientia, ut possint eum audire filii Israel.

C. XVII. An election ought to come not from favor but from judgment.

Likewise Gregory to the citizens of Naples, [book VIII, letter 40]. It is neither new nor blameworthy for the votes of the people to be divided into two parties in electing a bishop; but it is grave when, in cases of this kind, the election comes not from judgment but from favor alone. GRATIAN. But when the governance of the people is ordered to be handed over to one whom God chooses, it is given to be understood that it is sometimes handed over to some whom God has not chosen.

Hence Jerome:

> C. XVII. Non ex fauore, sed ex iudicio debet uenire electio.
>
> Item Gregorius ciuibus Neapolim, [lib. VIII. ep. 40.] Nec nouum, nec reprehensibile est in eligendo episcopo populi se uota in duas partes diuidere, sed graue est quando in huiusmodi causis non ex iudicio, sed ex solo fauore uenit electio. Gratian. Cum autem gubernatio populi ei tradi iubetur, quem Deus eligit, datur intelligi, quod aliquando quibusdam traditur, quos Deus non elegit.
> Unde Ieronimus:

C. XVIII. Sometimes a prince of the church is given not by the judgment of God.

PART IV. Perhaps we say something boldly, but we say what is written. A prince of the people and judge of the church is not always given by the judgment of God, but as our merits demand. If our deeds are evil and we work malicious things in the sight of God, princes are given to us according to our heart. And I shall prove this to you from the Scriptures. For hear what the Lord says: "They made a king for themselves, and not through me; a prince, and not through my counsel." And this appears to have been said concerning that Saul whom the Lord Himself had indeed chosen and commanded to be made king. But because he had been chosen not according to the will of God but according to the merit of a sinful people, He denies that he was appointed with His will or counsel. Therefore, let us understand that something of this kind is also done in the churches: that in accordance with merits, either a ruler of the church powerful in word and deed is bestowed by God, or, if the people does what is malignant in the sight of the Lord, such a judge of the church is given under whom the people suffers hunger and thirst—not hunger for bread nor thirst for water, but hunger for hearing the word of God.

> C. XVIII. Non ex arbitrio Dei aliquando datur princeps ecclesiae.
> IV. Pars. Audacter fortasse aliquid dicimus, tamen quod scriptum est dicimus. Non semper princeps populi et iudex ecclesiae per Dei arbitrium datur, sed prout merita nostra deposcunt. Si mali sunt actus nostri et operamur maligna in conspectu Dei, dantur nobis principes secundum cor nostrum. Et hoc tibi de scripturis probabo. Audi namque quid dicat Dominus: "Fecerunt sibi regem, et non per me; principem, et non per consilium meum." Et hoc dictum uidetur de Saule illo quem utique ipse Dominus elegerat, et regem fieri iusserat. Sed quoniam non secundum Dei uoluntatem, sed secundum peccatoris populi meritum fuerat electus, negat eum cum sua uoluntate uel consilio constitutum. Tale ergo aliquid intelligamus etiam in ecclesiis fieri, quod pro meritis, aut in uerbo aut in opere potens a Deo tribuitur rector ecclesiae, aut si malignum faciat populus in conspectu Domini, talis ecclesiae iudex datur, sub quo famem et sitim populus patiatur, non famem panis, neque sitim aquae, sed famem audiendi uerbum Dei.

C. XIX. Those who seek honors from men are not sons but hirelings.

Likewise Augustine, [tractate XLVI on John 10]. There are certain rulers in the church of whom the apostle Paul says: "Seeking their own things, not the things of Jesus Christ." What is "seeking their own things"? Not loving Christ freely, not seeking God for God's sake, pursuing temporal advantages, panting after gains, seeking honors from men. When these things are loved by a ruler and God is served for this reason, whoever is such is a hireling; let him not count himself among the sons. GRATIAN. Therefore those who are set over others are not always understood to be better than the rest. Hence Jerome, [on Titus, c. 1]:

> C. XIX. Non sunt filii, sed mercenarii, qui honores ab hominibus appetunt.
> Item Augustinus. [tractatu XLVI. ad c. 10. Ioannis] Sunt quidam in ecclesia prepositi, de quibus apostolus Paulus dicit: "Sua querentes, non que Iesu Christi." Quid est: "sua querentes?" non Christum gratis diligentes, non Deum propter Deum querentes, temporalia commoda consequentes lucris inhiantes, honores ab hominibus appetentes. Hec quando amantur a preposito, et propter hoc seruitur Deo, quisque talis est, mercenarius est, inter filios se non conputet. Gratian. Non ergo qui preficiuntur semper ceteris meliores intelliguntur. Unde Ieronimus: [ad Titum, c. 1.]

C. XX. Bishops are not made superior by election but are approved.

This must be inferred against those who are puffed up concerning the episcopate and think that they have obtained not a stewardship of Christ but an empire: that whoever have been ordained bishops are not immediately better than all those who have not been, and they should not regard themselves as the more approved because they themselves have been elected. But if the sins of sons prevent a just man from the episcopate, how much more will each man, considering himself and knowing that the powerful will powerfully suffer torments, withdraw himself from this, not so much an honor as a burden, and not hesitate to occupy the place of others who are more worthy?

C. XX. Ex electione non preficiuntur episcopi, sed conprobantur.

Illud inferendum est aduersus eos, qui de episcopatu intumescunt, et putant, se non dispensationem Christi, sed inperium consecutos, quia non statim omnibus his meliores sint, quicumque episcopi non fuerint ordinati, et ex eo, quod ipsi electi sunt, se magis existiment conprobatos; si autem peccata filiorum ab episcopatu iustum prohibent quanto magis se unusquisque considerans, et sciens, quia potentes potenter tormenta patientur, retrahet se ab hoc, non tam honore quam onere, et aliorum locum, qui magis digni sunt, non ambiget occupare.

C. XXI. According to the rank of his office, each person ought to be better.

Likewise from the same, [on Titus, c. 2]. For what kind of edification will there be for a disciple if he understands himself to be greater than his teacher? Hence not only bishops, priests, and deacons ought greatly to take care that they surpass in conduct and speech the whole people over whom they preside, but also the lower rank—exorcists, readers, sacristans, acolytes, and absolutely all who serve the house of God—because it greatly destroys the church of Christ for laymen to be better than clerics.

C. XXI. Pro gradu sui offitii quemque meliorem esse oportet.

Item eiusdem. [ad Titum, c. 2.] Qualis enim edificatio erit discipuli, si intelligat se esse maiorem magistro? Unde non solum episcopi, presbiteri et diacones magnopere debent prouidere, ut cunctum populum, cui president, conuersatione et sermone preeant, uerum etiam inferior gradus, exorcistae, lectores, editui, acoliti, et omnes omnino, qui domui Dei deseruiunt, quia uehementer ecclesiam Christi destruit meliores laicos esse quam clericos.

C. XXII. The people will judge a bishop who does not perform his offices.

The same, [on Titus, c. 1]. I fear that, just as the queen of the south, coming from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon, will judge the men of her time, and the men of Nineveh, having done penance at the preaching of Jonah, will condemn those who despised a savior greater even than Jonah, so very many among the peoples may judge bishops who withdraw themselves from ecclesiastical rank and do not exercise the things which befit a bishop.

C. XXII. Populus iudicabit episcopum sua offitia non agentem.

Idem. [ad Titum, c. I.] Vereor, quomodo regina austri, ueniens a finibus terrae audire sapientiam Salomonis, iudicatura est homines sui temporis, et uiri Niniuitae acta penitentia ad predicationem Ionae condempnabunt eos, qui maiorem etiam Iona saluatorem contempserunt, sic plurimi in populis episcopos iudicent subtrahentes se ab ecclesiastico gradu, et ea, que episcopo conueniunt, non exercentes.

C. XXIII. One who does not correct his own clerics cannot correct the people.

Likewise Ambrose in his rebuke to the people, [sermon 83]. But why do I rebuke you, when you can convict me with one statement? For I am convicted when in this respect I see the clerics to be more negligent than you. For how can I correct sons when I cannot amend brothers? Or with what confidence shall I become angry with laymen when I am silenced before my associates by the shame of modesty? But I, brothers, do not speak concerning all; there are certainly some who are devoted, and there are also others who are negligent. But I name no one: let his own conscience address each.

C. XXIII. Qui clericos suos non corrigit populum corrigere non ualet.

Item Ambrosius in increpatione ad populum. [serm. 83.] Quid autem ego uos arguo, cum possitis uno sermone me conuincere? conuincor enim, cum in hac parte clericos uobis magis uideo negligentes. Quomodo enim possum corrigere filios, cum fratres emendare non possim? aut qua fiducia succenseam laicis, cum a consortibus pudoris uerecundia conticescam? Ego autem, fratres, non de omnibus loquor, sunt certe qui deuoti sunt, sunt et alii negligentes. Ego autem neminem nomino: conscientia sua unumquemque conueniat.

C. XXIV. For salvation it does not suffice a bishop to be equal to the people in morals and life.

Likewise Bede on Matthew. Nor should we judge it sufficient for our salvation if we are equal in faith or deeds to crowds of the negligent or of any unlearned persons, since one rule of believing and living alike has been prescribed for them in the sacred writings. GRATIAN. Therefore, lest, as was said above, someone seek such successors for himself in his own office, bishops are prohibited from establishing another as successor for themselves and substituting another in their own place by designating names.

C. XXIV. Episcopo ad salutem non sufficit moribus et uita populo adequari.

Item Beda super Mattheum. Nec sufficere ad salutem nobis arbitremur, si turbis negligentium uel quorumlibet indoctorum fide uel actibus adequemur, quibus sacris litteris unica est credendi pariter et uiuendi regula prescripta. Gratian. Ne ergo, ut supra dictum est, tales sui offitii successores sibi aliquis quereret, prohibentur episcopi alterum pro se successorem sibi statuere, ac designatis nominibus in locum suum alium subrogare.

Question II

GRATIAN. That the patronage of friends ought not to prevail in the election of any persons is proved by the authority of blessed Pope Gregory, who in the third book of the Register, [indiction 11, letter 22], writes to the Subdeacon Antonius, saying:

GRATIANUS. Quod autem amicorum patrocinia in aliquorum electione conualescere non debeant, auctoritate B. Gregorii Papae probatur, qui in tertio libro Registri [Indict. 11. ep. 22.] scribit Antonio Subdiacono, dicens:

C. I. In the election of a bishop let neither the giving of gifts nor the patronage of any persons prevail.

Before all else, let this be your care: that in this election neither the giving of rewards intervene by any means nor the patronage of any persons prevail. For if anyone has been elected through the patronage of certain persons, when he has been ordained he is compelled by the requirement of reverence to obey their wills, and thus it happens that the property of that church is diminished and the ecclesiastical order is not preserved. Therefore, at your admonition, they ought to elect such a person as serves no one's improper will but, adorned in life and morals, can be found worthy of so great an order.

C. I. In electione episcopi nec munerum datio, nec aliquorum patrocinia conualescant.

Illud quidem pre omnibus curae tibi sit, ut in hac electione nec datio quibuscumque modis interueniat premiorum, nec quarumlibet personarum patrocinia conualescant. Nam si quorumdam patrocinio quisquam fuerit electus, uoluntatibus eorum, cum fuerit ordinatus, reuerentia exigente obedire conpellitur, sicque fit, ut res illius minuantur ecclesiae, et ordo ecclesiasticus non seruetur. Talem ergo te admonente debent personam eligere que nullius incongruae uoluntati deseruiat, sed uita et moribus decorata tanto ordine ualeat digna inueniri.

C. II. In the election of a bishop let each look to the common utility, not to his own gain.

The same to the Clergy of Milan, [book II, indiction 11, letter 29]. Most beloved sons, admonished by the discipline of our office, we counsel that, in the matter of receiving a bishop, none of you, with the common utility neglected, look to his own gain, lest, if anyone seeks his own advantages, he be deceived by a frivolous estimation, because a mind which cupidity binds does not examine with free judgment the person to be preferred over it. Therefore, considering the things which are expedient for all, always furnish in all things the most complete obedience to him whom divine grace shall have preferred over you. For one once set over you ought no longer to be judged by you, but he is to be judged so subtly now to the extent that afterward he is not to be judged.

C. II. In electione antistitis communi utilitati, non suo lucro quisque prospiciat.

Idem ad Clerum Mediolanensem. [lib. II. Indict. 11. ep. 29.] Dilectissimi filii, offitii nostri censura conmoniti suademus, ut in suscipiendi antistitis causa nullus uestrum neglecta utilitate conmuni suo lucro prospiciat, ne, si quisquam propria commoda appetit, friuola estimatione fallatur, quia nec libero iudicio preferendam sibi personam examinat mens, quam cupiditas ligat. Pensantes ergo que cunctis expediunt, ei, quem uobis diuina gratia pretulerit, integerrimam semper in omnibus obedientiam prebete. Iudicari namque a uobis ultra non debet semel prelatus, sed tanto nunc subtiliter iudicandus est, quanto postmodum iudicandus non est.

Question III

GRATIAN. But that one who, after election, has furnished an oath for the indemnity of the church is not to be held a simoniac is easily proved. For it is one thing to make an oath before election or to agree that one will make it for this purpose, so that one may be elected; it is another, with no preceding agreement, to offer an oath of this kind after election. The former casts him down from office as one who has bestowed a gift; but the latter generates no impediment for the one to be consecrated. Concerning the former case Pelagius writes to the Clergy of Catania:

GRATIANUS. Quod autem symoniacus habendus non sit qui post electionem pro indempnitate ecclesiae iuramentum prestitit, facile probatur. Aliud est enim ante electionem iuramentum facere, uel se facturum pacisci ad hoc, ut eligatur: aliud est nulla precedenti conuentione post electionem huiuscemodi iuramentum offerre. Illud ab offitio tamquam munus inpensum deicit: hoc autem consecrando nullum inpedimentum generat. De priori casu scribit Pelagius Clero Catinensi:

C. I. One elected as bishop shall give no one any security concerning ecclesiastical property.

Some time ago we directed writings of this kind to our brother and fellow bishop Eucarpus concerning the visitation of the church of Catania, so that you could recognize our judgment in them. Nevertheless, because we have learned, also from your report, that certain persons there, with no sound intention but through depraved pursuits, stir up dissensions—persons who, knowing that they cannot be advanced to the episcopate by age, knowledge, or merits of life, wish to disturb the church only for this purpose: that the future bishop may promise them impunity concerning those things which were seized from it, and that ambition for the episcopate may become security for rapine—we have therefore judged that you too should be admonished to hasten, God favoring, to bring to us the decree made concerning the deacon Elpidius and subscribed by all those whom your report designated, together with the letter of the aforesaid visitor and with the same deacon. And a little later: When this son of ours, the magnificent man Leo the praetor, had come here, he reported to us concerning the individual things which were set in motion there, and how the wishes of nearly the whole city agreed upon the deacon Elpidius. Hence, because we can have no doubt at all concerning the testimony of the aforesaid man, therefore cause the deacon Elpidius, as was said, to hasten to us, and do not wait any longer for our admonition to have to be sent to him. Nevertheless, by the present command, through your affection, we specially admonish him not to promise anyone that he will give or is going to give anything, nor dare to give or promise anyone any security concerning past ecclesiastical matters, nor, as though already made bishop, freely permit those things which were plundered to remain so, knowing that, if he has done or does anything of this kind, not only is the promise itself not permitted by us to have force, but, with injury to our judgment which we held concerning him, he will not be able to merit the order of pastoral consecration. GRATIAN. But concerning the second case it is read in the acts of Urban II:

> C. I. Qui in episcopum eligitur de rebus ecclesiasticis aliquam securitatem nulli facit.
> Talia quidem iamdudum ad fratrem et coepiscopum nostrum Eucarpum de uisitatione Catinensis ecclesiae scripta direximus, ut in eis iudicium nostrum potuissetis agnoscere. Verumtamen, quia quosdam ibi non sana intentione, sed prauis studiis dissensiones suscitare uestra etiam relatione cognouimus, qui scientes se ad episcopatum nec etate, nec scientia, nec uitae meritis posse perduci, ad hoc tantummodo inquietare ecclesiam uolunt, ut sibi de his, que ex ipsa presumpta sunt, inpunitatem futurus promittat episcopus, et fiat rapinae securitas, episcopatus ambicio: hec etiam uos duximus conmonendos, ut decretum in Elpidium diaconum factum, et subscriptum ab omnibus, quos uestra relatio designauit, ad nos cum predicti uisitatoris epistola, et cum eodem diacono maturetis Deo propitiante perducere. Et post pauca: Cum hic filius noster, uir magnificus, Leo pretor uenisset, retulit nobis de singulis, que illic mota sunt, et quomodo prope uota totius ciuitatis in Elpidio diacone concordarent. Unde, quia de memorati uiri testimonio dubitare omnino non possumus, idcirco, Elpidium sicut dictum est, diaconem ad nos facite properare, nec expectetis ulterius, ut ammonitio ad eum debeat nostra destinari. Quem tamen per uestram dilectionem presenti iussione specialiter ammonemus, ne cui se aliquid dare uel daturum esse promittat, sed neque de ecclesiasticis preteritis causis aliquam securitatem cuiquam facere audeat siue promittere, aut quasi factus episcopus ea, que direpta sunt, permanere libere patiatur, sciens quod si tale aliquid fecerit uel fecit, nec a nobis omni permittitur ipsa ualere promissio, et cum iudicii nostri, quod de ipso habuimus, dampno pastoralis consecrationis ordinem promereri non poterit. Gratian. De secundo uero casu in gestis Urbani II. legitur:

C. II. After election, one elected may furnish an oath for the indemnity of the church.

Artaldus, Bishop of Arles and suffragan of the church of Narbonne, came to Rome to be consecrated by the lord Pope Urban; for his archbishop refused to consecrate him because after his election he swore to the canons for preserving the goods of the church. He was therefore consecrated by the lord Pope Urban after first being cleared concerning an oath of this kind: "Before my election I made no agreement, so that I might be elected, concerning the oath which after election I made to the canons of our church. But the Archbishop of Narbonne omitted my consecration for no charge other than this, to my knowledge, nor am I conscious of any charge on account of which he might repel me from the priesthood."

> C. II. Post electionem pro indempnitate ecclesiae licet electo iuramentum prestare.
> Artaldus Arelatensis episcopus, Narbonensis ecclesiae suffraganeus, Romam consecrandus ad dominum Papam Urbanum uenit; suus quippe archiepiscopus eum consecrare nolebat, quoniam post electionem suam propter bona ecclesiae conseruanda canonicis iurauit. Consecratus itaque est a domino Papa Urbano, ante purgatus huiusmodi iuramento: "De iuramento, quod canonicis feci nostrae ecclesiae post electionem, nullam conuentionem ante ut eligerer feci. Narbonensis uero archiepiscopus nullius preter id criminis causa consecrationem nostram omisit, me sciente, neque michi criminis conscius sum, propter quod a sacerdotio me repellat."

Question IV

GRATIAN. That clerics are not permitted to withdraw from their own bishop before the time of sentence is proved by the authority of Pope Symmachus, who says:

> GRATIANUS. Quod autem ante clericis tempus sententiae ab episcopo suo discedere non liceat, probatur auctoritate Simaci Papae, dicentis:

C. I. Before the time of sentence clerics are not permitted to withdraw from their own bishop.

Are not the words of the canons direct: "If any of the clerics has withdrawn from his own bishop before the time of sentence because of a doubtful suspicion, does not a manifest censure remain upon him?"

§ 1. For ecclesiastical law requires that a pontiff accused by others not be abandoned before the charges have been established in the light.

> C. I. Ante tempus sententiae non licet clericis ab episcopo suo discedere.
> Nonne directa sunt uerba canonum: "Qui clericorum ab episcopo suo ante tempus sententiae pro dubia suspicione discesserit, manifestam in eum manere censuram?"
> §. 1. Lex enim ecclesiastica pontificem ab aliis accusatum prius, quam sub luce obiecta constiterint exigit non relinqui.

Question V

GRATIAN. Without letters from the apostolic pontiff, a bishop who has been accused and summoned by the holy see shall not return to his own church. Hence Pope Sixtus [I] says, [letter II, c. 2]:

GRATIANUS. Sine litteris apostolici episcopus accusatus, et a sancta sede uocatus ad suam non reuertatur ecclesiam. Unde Sixtus Papa [I.] ait: [epist. II. c. 2.]

C. I. A bishop summoned by the holy apostolic see shall not return home unless cleared and furnished with apostolic letters.

Any one of the brothers who has been assailed and summoned by this holy see, when he has presented himself to us, shall not return before he has been fully furnished from here with apostolic or formal letters and has been cleared, if there was anything from which to clear him; and after he has returned home, let his neighbors learn how he concluded his own case and that of others here, so that he may be able to announce and proclaim it to all without any uncertainty. For the bishops were commanded by the holy apostles to be protected, defended, and freed by this holy see, so that, just as they were first established by their arrangement under the ordinance of the Lord, so by the protection of this holy see—to whose disposition they reserved their cases and judgments—they may in future times be always free from all perversities. Hence those who have acted otherwise concerning the brothers than they knew would please the rulers of this see are blamed.

C. I. A sede sancta apostolica uocatus episcopus ad domum non reuertatur, nisi purgatus et apostolicis litteris instructus.

Quilibet fratrum pulsatus, atque ab hac sancta sede uocatus, cum se nobis representauerit non prius reuertatur, quam hinc litteris apostolicis uel formatis pleniter instructus atque purgatus sit, si fuerit unde, et, postquam domum reuersus fuerit, cognoscant uicini sui qualiter suam aliorumque causam hic finierit, quatinus illam absque ulla ambiguitate nunciare et predicare omnibus possit. Ab hac enim sancta sede a sanctis apostolis tueri, defendi et liberari episcopi iussi sunt, sicut eorum dispositione ordinante Domino primitus constituti sunt, sic huius sanctae sedis (cuius dispositioni eorum causas et iudicia seruauerunt) protectione futuris temporibus sint ab omnibus peruersitatibus semper liberi. Unde culpantur hii, qui circa fratres aliter egerint, quam huius sedis rectoribus placere cognouerint.

Causa IX

GRATIAN. A certain archbishop marked by a sentence of excommunication ordained several clerics of another metropolitan; he deposed a certain chaplain of his suffragan without consulting him and ordained another in his place. (Qu. I.) It is asked whether an ordination performed by excommunicated persons can in any way be held valid. (Qu. II.) Second, whether a bishop, archbishop, primate, or patriarch is permitted to ordain the clerics of another without their proper letters. (Qu. III.) Third, whether an archbishop can condemn the clerics of his suffragan without consulting him or absolve those condemned.

GRATIANUS. Sententia excommunicationis notatus quidam archiepiscopus aliquot clericos alterius metropolitani ordinauit; quendam capellanum sui suffraganei illo inconsulto deposuit, atque alium in loco eius ordinauit. (Qu. I.) Queritur, an ordinatio, que ab excommunicatis facta est, aliquo modo possit rata haberi? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an liceat episcopo, archiepiscopo, primati uel patriarchae clericos alterius sine litteris propriis ordinare? (Qu. III.) Tertio, an archiepiscopus clericos suffraganei sui illo inconsulto dampnare ualeat, uel dampnatos absoluere?

Question I

GRATIAN. That an ordination celebrated by excommunicated persons possesses absolutely no force and is not even to be called a consecration is attested by Gregory, [book III, letter 20], who says:

> GRATIANUS. Quod ordinatio, que ab excommunicatis celebratur, nullas omnino uires obtineat, nec etiam consecratio appellanda sit, testatur Gregorius, [lib. III. epist. 20.] dicens:

C. I. What is performed by excommunicated persons cannot be called a consecration.

We can in no way call that a consecration which was celebrated by excommunicated men.

> C. I. Non potest appellari consecratio, que fit ab excommunicatis.
> Nos consecrationem nullo modo dicere possumus, que ab excommunicatis hominibus est celebrata.

[PALEA C. II.

Excommunicated persons lay on hands illicitly, because they do not possess the power of ordaining. But where the laying on of hands is illicit, a wound is inflicted. Hence it is necessary to repeat what is by no means proved to have been conferred.]

> [PALEA C. II.
> Excommunicati illicite manus inponunt, quia potestatem ordinandi non habent. Ubi autem illicita est manus inpositio, uulnus infigitur. Unde reiterari necesse est quod minime probatur esse collatum.]

[PALEA C. III.

Hence Pope Damasus says in letter IV: Through an illicit laying on of hands, those who appeared to have received something had a wounded head; and where a wound has been inflicted, it is necessary to apply medicine by which the inflicted blemish may be healed—that is, it is necessary to repeat what is by no means proved to have been lawfully performed or conferred, if it ought to be perfect. For how one who received an honor from one who did not possess the power to give it lawfully can retain that honor I cannot discover.] GRATIAN. But "excommunicated persons" are here to be understood as those who contracted the penalty of excommunication in their very ordination, who were never among the number of Catholics. But those who were first reckoned among Catholics, if they were afterward marked by a sentence of excommunication, nevertheless their ordinations are mercifully tolerated by the church. Hence Urban II writes, saying:

> [PALEA C. III.
> Unde Damasus Papa epistola IV. ait. Per illicitam manus inpositionem uulneratum caput illi, qui uidebantur aliquid accepisse, habebant, et ubi uulnus infixum est, necesse est medicinam adhibere, qua infixa sanetur macula, id est, reiterari necesse est quod legitime actum aut collatum minime probatur, si perfectum esse debebit. Nam quomodo honorem possit retinere qui ab illo acceperit, qui potestatem dare legitime non habuit, inuenire non possum.] Gratian. Sed excommunicati hic intelligendi sunt, qui in ipsa sua ordinatione penam excommunicationis contraxerunt, qui numquam in numero catholicorum fuerunt. Ceterum, qui inter catholicos prius deputati sunt, si postea excommunicationis sententia notati fuerint, ordinationes tamen eorum ab ecclesia misericorditer tollerantur. Unde Urbanus II. scribit, dicens:

C. IV. Ordinations performed by excommunicated persons, not simoniacally, are tolerated from mercy.

Those ordained by excommunicated bishops who were nevertheless formerly Catholics, if indeed they did not receive the orders themselves simoniacally, and if it shall be established that the bishops themselves were not simoniacs, and in addition if their more religious life and prerogative of learning shall have appeared to merit it, you may permit, after imposing the penance you judge fitting, to remain in the orders which they received. But we do not permit them to ascend to higher ones unless the greatest necessity and utility demand it and their holy conduct merits it. GRATIAN. But that statement of Gregory too is to be understood concerning those excommunicated by name, whose ordinations are void if their condemnation was not unknown to those being ordained. Hence the same Urban says, [in the Synod of Piacenza, c. 9 and following]:

> C. IV. Ordinationes ab excommunicatis non symoniace factae ex misericordia tollerantur.
> Ab excommunicatis quondam tamen catholicis episcopis ordinatos, si quidem non symoniace ordines ipsos acceperunt, et si ipsos episcopos symoniacos non fuisse constiterit, ad hoc, si eorum religiosior uita et doctrinae prerogatiua uisa fuerit promereri, penitentia indicta, quam congruam duxeris, in ipsis, quos acceperunt, ordinibus permanere permittas. Ad superiores autem conscendere non concedimus, nisi necessitas et utilitas maxima flagitauerit, et ipsorum sancta conuersatio promeruerit. Gratian. Sed et illud Gregorii de nominatim excommunicatis intelligitur, quorum ordinationes sunt irritae, si eorum dampnatio non erat ordinandis incognita. Unde idem Urbanus ait: [in Sinodo Placentina, cap. 9. et sequentibus]

C. V. Those excommunicated by name and those who invade the sees of others cannot ordain others.

We judge void the ordinations performed by heresiarchs excommunicated by name and by those who invaded the sees of Catholic bishops still living, unless they can prove that, when they were ordained, they did not know those men had been condemned. § 1. But those who were consecrated by bishops once indeed ordained in Catholic fashion but separated from the Roman Church in schism, we command, when they return to the unity of the church, to be received mercifully with their proper orders preserved, if life and knowledge commend them. § 2. But henceforth whoever permits himself to be ordained by the aforesaid schismatics, adversaries of the holy Roman Church, shall in no way be held worthy of this pardon. § 3. Although, from regard for mercy and under the compulsion of great necessity, we have established this dispensation in sacred orders, nevertheless we wish no prejudice to be done to the sacred canons, but let them retain their proper strength, and when necessity ceases let that also cease which was done because of necessity. For where the slaughter of many lies, something must be withdrawn from severity. GRATIAN. An election too, unless it was made by Catholics, is proved to be void. Hence Gregory writes to the people of Milan, [book VIII, letter 65]:

> C. V. Qui nominatim excommunicati sunt, et qui aliorum sedes inuadunt, alios ordinare non possunt.
> Ordinationes, que ab heresiarchis factae sunt nominatim excommunicatis, et ab eis, qui catholicorum adhuc uiuentium episcoporum sedes inuaserunt, irritas esse iudicamus nisi probare ualuerint, se, cum ordinarentur, eos nescisse dampnatos. §. 1. Qui uero ab episcopis quondam quidem catholice ordinatis, sed in scismate a Romana ecclesia separatis consecrati sunt, eos, nimirum cum ad ecclesiae unitatem redierint, seruatis propriis ordinibus misericorditer suscipi iubemus, si uita et scientia eos conmendat. §. 2. Amodo uero quicumque a predictis scismaticis sanctae Romanae ecclesiae aduersariis se ordinari permiserit, nullatenus hac uenia dignus habeatur. §. 3. Quamuis autem misericordiae intuitu magnaque necessitate cogente hanc in sacris ordinibus dispensationem constituerimus, nullum tamen preiudicium sacris canonibus fieri uolumus, sed obtineant proprium robur, et cessante necessitate illud quoque cesset, quod factum est pro necessitate. Ubi enim multorum strages iacet, subtrahendum est aliquid seueritati. Gratian. Electio quoque, nisi a catholicis facta fuerit, irrita esse probatur. Unde Gregorius scribit Mediolanensibus: [lib. VIII. epist. 65.]

C. VI. Let an election which is proved not to have been made by Catholics be void.

We offer our consent under no reasoning to a man who is not elected by Catholics, nor, if it was done by anyone's usurpation, do we receive him into the place or order of priest.

C. VI. Irrita sit electio, quae non a catholicis facta probatur.

Nos in hominem, qui non a catholicis eligitur, nulla prebemus ratione consensum, nec, si alicuius usurpatione factum fuerit, in locum uel ordinem illum sacerdotis suscipimus.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. That a bishop or any of his superiors ought not to ordain the clerics of another without proper letters, Pope Callistus writes, [letter II to the Bishops of Gaul], saying:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem episcopus uel quilibet superiorum clericos alterius sine propriis litteris ordinare non debeat, Calixtus papa scribit, [ep. II. ad Episcopos Galliae,] dicens:

C. I. Let no one presume to judge or excommunicate a parishioner of another church.

Let no one usurp the boundaries of another, nor presume to judge, ordain, or excommunicate the parishioner of another, because such a judgment, ordination, excommunication, or condemnation will neither be valid nor possess any force, since no one will be bound or condemned by the sentence of another judge, but only by that of his own. Hence the Lord also speaks in the Gospel, saying: “Do not transgress the ancient boundaries which your fathers established.”

C. I. Alterius ecclesiae parrochianum nullus iudicare presumat uel excommunicare.

Nullus alterius terminos usurpet, nec alterius parrochianum iudicare, uel ordinare aut excommunicare presumat, quia talis iudicatio, uel ordinatio, aut excommunicatio uel dampnatio nec rata erit, nec uires ullas habebit, quoniam nullus alterius iudicis, nisi sui, sententia tenebitur aut dampnabitur. Unde et Dominus in Euangelio, loquitur dicens: "Ne transgrediaris terminos antiquos, quos posuerunt patres tui."

[PALEA. C. II.

Hence Pope Urban: It was resolved that henceforth no priest be permitted to receive for penance anyone committed to another priest without the consent of the one to whom he first committed himself, except through the ignorance of the one to whom the penitent first confessed. But one who has presumed to act contrary to these statutes will lie under danger to his rank.]

[PALEA. C. II.

Unde Urbanus Papa: Placuit, ut deinceps nulli sacerdotum liceat quemlibet conmissum alteri sacerdoti recipere ad penitentiam sine eius consensu cui prius se conmisit, nisi per ignorantiam illius cui penitens prius confessus est. Qui uero contra hec statuta facere presumpserit, gradus sui periculo iacebit.]

C. III. No one is permitted to do anything in the church of another unless that person summons him.

The same, [Callistus, letter II]. Let no primate, no metropolitan, and none of the remaining bishops approach another's city or enter a possession which does not pertain to him, and, over the parish of another bishop, arrange, ordain, or judge anything there unless summoned by him to whose right it is known to belong, if he wishes to possess the honor of his rank. But if he has presumed otherwise, he will be condemned, and not only he but those cooperating with and consenting to him, because just as ordination, so also judgment and the administration of other matters are prohibited to them. For one who will not be able to ordain, how will he judge? Without doubt he will by no means judge or be able to judge.

[PALEA.

C. III. In alterius ecclesia, nisi eo uocante, nulli aliquid agere licet.

Idem. [Calixtus epist. II.] Nullus primas, nullus metropolitanus, nullusque reliquorum episcoporum alterius adeat ciuitatem, aut ad possessionem accedat, que ad eum non pertinet, et alterius episcopi parrochiam, super eius dispositionem nisi uocatus ab eo, cuius iuris esse cognoscitur, ut quicquam ibi disponat, uel ordinet, aut iudicet, si sui gradus honore potiri uoluerit. Sin aliter presumpserit, dampnabitur, et non solum ille, sed cooperantes et consentientes ei, quia sicut ordinatio, ita eis et iudicatio et aliarum rerum dispositio prohibetur. Nam qui ordinare non poterit quo modo iudicabit? nullatenus proculdubio iudicabit aut iudicare poterit.

[PALEA.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Nantes, c. 1. On Sundays or feast days, before priests celebrate Masses, let them ask the congregation whether there is a parishioner of another in the church who, having despised his own priest, wishes to hear Mass there. If they find him, let them immediately cast him out of the church and compel him to return to his own parish.]

[PALEA.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Nannetensi, c. 1. In dominicis uel festis diebus presbiteri ante, quam missas celebrent, plebem interrogent, si alterius parrochianus in ecclesia sit, qui proprio contempto presbitero ibi missam uelit audire. Quem si inuenerint, statim ab ecclesia abiciant, et ad suam parrochiam redire conpellant.]

[PALEA.

C. V. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the same Council of Nantes, c. 2. Let no priest or deacon dare to receive at Mass one belonging to another congregation, unless he is on a journey or has an appointed proceeding there.]

C. V. De eodem.

Item ex eodem Concilio Nannetensi, c. 2. Nullus presbiter aut diaconus alterius plebanum (nisi in itinere fuerit, uel placitum ibi habuerit) ad missam recipere audeat.]

C. VI. Let a bishop not approach the ordination of the clerics or churches of another bishop unless invited by him.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, [c. 13]. No bishop ought to dare to make passage from one province to another and ordain any persons in churches or bring them forward to sacred ministry. Nor shall a bishop be drawn there by others unless perhaps he goes after being requested by letters not only from the metropolitan but from all the bishops of that province who are with him. But if, with no one inviting him, he arrives inordinately and presumes either to ordain any persons or attempts to usurp any persons belonging to that church who do not pertain to him, all that he has done will indeed be void and empty, while he himself shall pay worthy penalties for this undisciplined act and irrational undertaking, as one deposed by the holy synod and already condemned for presumption of this kind.

C. VI. Ad ordinationem clericorum uel ecclesiarum alterius episcopi, nisi ab eodem inuitatus, non accedat episcopus.

Item ex Concilio Antioceno. [c. 13.] Nullum episcopum audere debere ex alia prouincia ad aliam transitum facere, et ordinare aliquos in ecclesiis aut proferre ad sacrum ministerium. Nec ab aliis illuc trahatur episcopus, nisi forte per litteras rogatus abierit non solum a metropolitano, sed ab his, qui cum eo sunt, omnibus ipsius prouinciae episcopis. Quod si nullo inuitante inordinate superueniat, et aliquos uel ordinare presumpserit, uel quoslibet illi ecclesiae conpetentes, qui ad se minime pertinent, usurpare temptauerit, uacua quidem et inania erunt omnia, que gesserit, ipse uero huius indisciplinati ausus et irrationabilis cepti dignas causas expendat, tamquam depositus a sancta sinodo et propter huiuscemodi presumptionem iam dampnatus.

C. VII. Let a bishop by no means approach the ordination of a church which was not committed to him.

Likewise from the same, [c. 22]. A bishop ought not to intrude into another city which is proved not to be subject to him, nor into a region which is known by no means to pertain to his care, to ordain anything or establish priests or deacons pertaining to other bishops, except perhaps with the will and testimony of the bishop of the proper region. But if anyone of these has wished to do such a thing, an ordination of this kind will indeed be void, and let the things which he wickedly usurped be reproved by the synod. For if he could not ordain, let him by no means presume to judge one belonging to others.

C. VII. Ad ordinationem ecclesiae, que sibi conmissa non fuerit, minime accedat episcopus.

Item ex eodem. [c. 22.] Episcopum non debere irruere in alienam ciuitatem, que illi probatur non esse subiecta, neque in regionem, que ad eius curam minime noscitur pertinere, ad aliquid ordinandum, neque presbiteros aut diaconos constituere ad alios episcopos pertinentes, nisi forte cum uoluntate et testimonio propriae regionis episcopi. Quod si quispiam horum tale facere uoluerit, irrita quidem erit huiusmodi ordinatio, et que male usurpauerit a sinodo arguantur. Nam si ordinare non potuerit, nullatenus ad alios pertinentem iudicare presumat.

C. VIII. Let bishops not approach churches which are outside their diocese.

Likewise from the Synod of Constantinople, [I, c. 2]. Let bishops who are outside a diocese not approach churches which are outside their boundaries, nor confound and intermingle the churches. According to the established rules, let the bishops of Alexandria govern only the things which are in Egypt; but let the bishops of the East exercise care only for the East, with the honors of the primacy of the church of Antioch, which are contained in the rules of the Nicene Synod, preserved. And let the bishops of the Asian diocese govern the things which are in Asia and which pertain only to the Asian diocese. But let the bishops of Pontus have care only for the Pontic diocese, and those of Thrace only for Thrace itself.

> C. VIII. Non accedant episcopi ad ecclesias, que sunt extra earum diocesim.
> Item ex Sinodo Constantinopolitana. [I., c. 2.] Episcopi, qui extra diocesim sunt, ad ecclesias, que extra terminos eorum sunt, non accedant, neque confundant et permisceant ecclesias. Secundum regulas constitutas Alexandriae quidem episcopi ea, que sunt in Egipto, tantum gubernent; orientis autem episcopi solius orientis curam gerant, seruatis honoribus primatus ecclesiae Antiocenae, qui in regulis Nicenae sinodi continentur. Sed et Asianae diocesis episcopi ea, que sunt in Asia et que ad Asianam tantummodo diocesim pertinent, gubernent. Ponti autem episcopi Pontiae tantum diocesis habeant curam. Traciae uero ipsius tantummodo Traciae.

C. IX. Concerning the same.

Likewise. Bishops who have not been invited ought not to pass beyond a diocese for the ordaining of any persons or the administration of any ecclesiastical cases, with the rule written above concerning each diocese preserved. For it is manifest that throughout each individual province the provincial synod ought to administer and govern all things, according to those things which were determined in the Nicene Synod. PART II. GRATIAN. By these authorities all bishops are prohibited from ordaining the clerics of another. But it is asked: if it happens that they distribute sacred orders to any persons, can those ordained be received by their own bishops in their proper orders? Concerning these matters Pope Urban writes thus to Hugh, Archbishop of Lyon:

> C. IX. De eodem.
> Item. Non inuitati episcopi ultra diocesim accedere non debent super ordinandis aliquibus, uel quibuscumque disponendis ecclesiasticis causis, seruata regula, que supra scripta de unaquaque diocesi est. Manifestum est namque, quod per singulas quasque prouincias prouincialis sinodus amministrare et gubernare omnia debeat, secundum ea, que sunt in Nicena sinodo diffinita. II. Pars. Gratian. His auctoritatibus prohibentur quilibet episcopi clericos alterius ordinare. Sed queritur, si contingat eos aliquibus sacros ordines distribuere, an ordinati ab episcopis suis in propriis ordinibus recipi possint? De his ita scribit Urbanus Papa Hugoni, Lugdunensi Archiepiscopo:

C. X. Clerics ordained by the bishop of another parish can be received by their own bishop in their orders.

Your religious prudence can receive with the honor of their ranks the clerics of the parish of Lyon whom, as you showed by the information in your letters, bishops of another parish ordained contrary to the statutes of the canons, if it shall be established that otherwise they were ordained canonically and without any depravity, provided that you perceive their approved life to merit this indulgence.

For we read that Saint Epiphanius, a bishop, ordained certain clerics from the diocese of Saint John Chrysostom, which the holy man would by no means have done if he had weighed that harm would come to them. Therefore, after recognizing the penance imposed as a satisfaction because of the church which they offended, those whom your moderation has judged should be received you shall receive, from regard for compassion, each in his own honor, with the discipline of the holy canons preserved in all things.

> C. X. Clerici ab episcopo alterius parrochiae ordinati a proprio in suis ordinibus recipi possunt.
> Lugdunensis parrochiae clericos, quos contra statuta canonum ab alterius parrochiae episcopis ordinatos litterarum tuarum significatione monstrasti, cum graduum suorum honore recipere prudentia religionis tuae poterit, si eos alias canonice et sine prauitate aliqua ordinatos constiterit, si tamen eorum uitam probabilem id indulgentiae perspexeris promereri. Legimus quippe, S. Epiphanium episcopum ex diocesi S. Iohannis Crisostomi quosdam clericos ordinasse, quod sanctus uir omnino non fecisset, si eis detrimentum fore perpenderet. Quos igitur recipiendos moderatio tua arbitrata fuerit iniuncta satisfactionis gratia propter ecclesiam, quam offenderunt, cognita penitentia, miserationis intuitu in suo quoque honore recipies, salua in omnibus sanctorum canonum disciplina.

Question III

GRATIAN. That an archbishop can condemn the clerics of his suffragan without consulting him or absolve them seems able to be proved as follows. Just as the churches of an entire episcopate are in the power of the bishop, so the churches of an entire archiepiscopate pertain to the diocese of the archbishop. For bishops are called by the metropolitan into a share of solicitude, not into the fullness of power. For he thus imparts his functions to them without taking his own power away from himself. Hence they are permitted to do nothing without his counsel, as is read in the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 4]:

> GRATIANUS. Quod archiepiscopus clericos sui suffraganei illo inconsulto dampnare ualeat uel absoluere, sic uidetur posse probari. Sicut totius episcopatus ecclesiae in potestate sunt episcopi, sic et ecclesiae totius archiepiscopatus ad diocesim pertinent archiepiscopi. Vocantur enim episcopi a metropolitano in partem sollicitudinis, non in plenitudinem potestatis. Sic quippe uices suas eis inpertit, ut potestatem suam sibi non adimat. Unde et sine eius consilio nichil eis agere licet, sicut in Concilio Martini Papae legitur: [c. 4.]

C. I. Neither should bishops do anything without the consent of the metropolitan, nor he without their consent.

Throughout the individual provinces the bishops ought to acknowledge their metropolitan and he to undertake the care of the primacy, while the remaining bishops are to do nothing apart from him, according to what is contained in the canon established by our Fathers in antiquity. For this reason the metropolitan too shall presumptuously undertake nothing without the counsel of the others.

> C. I. Nec episcopi sine metropolitani consensu, nec ille sine eorum consensu aliquid agere debet.
> Per singulas prouincias oportet episcopos cognoscere metropolitanum suum, et ipsum primatus curam suscipere, nichil autem agere reliquos episcopos preter eum, secundum quod antiquitus a patribus nostris constitutum continetur in canone. Propter quod et metropolitanus nichil presumptiue assumat absque consilio ceterorum.

C. II. Without the knowledge of the metropolitan a bishop shall do nothing outside his own diocese.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, [c. 9]. Throughout the individual provinces each bishop ought to know that the metropolitan bishop who presides has undertaken the care and solicitude of the whole province. For this reason let those who have cases assemble at the metropolitan city. Therefore it was resolved both that he excel in honor and that the remaining bishops do nothing beyond their bounds without him, according to the ancient canon of our Fathers, except only what pertains to each individual church throughout its own diocese. For each bishop ought to possess power over his own diocese, so that he may rule and govern according to the reverence fitting to each and exercise providence for the whole region which is under his city, so that he is also permitted to ordain priests and deacons by approved judgment and to adjudicate the individual cases of his region with moderation and weight. But he is permitted to do nothing beyond this without the knowledge of the metropolitan bishop, nor shall the metropolitan conduct anything without the counsel of the remaining priests.

GRATIAN. Unless perhaps the bishops have neglected to ordain stewards in their church. Hence it is read in the Seventh Synod, [c. 11]:

> C. II. Sine metropolitani conscientia extra suam diocesim nichil agat episcopus.
> Item ex Concilio Antioceno. [c. 9.] Per singulas prouincias episcopos singulos scire oportet, episcopum metropolitanum, qui preest, curam et sollicitudinem totius prouinciae suscepisse. Propter quod ad metropolitanam ciuitatem ab his, qui causas habent, concurratur. Quapropter placuit eum et honore precellere, et nichil ultra sine ipso reliquos episcopos agere secundum antiquum Patrum nostrorum canonem, nisi hoc tantum, quod uniuscuiusque ecclesiae per suam diocesim conpetit. Unumquemque enim episcopum oportet habere suae diocesis potestatem, ut regat et gubernet secundum conpetentem singulis reuerentiam, et prouidentiam gerat omnis regionis, que sub ipsius est ciuitate, ita ut etiam ordinare ei presbiteros et diaconos probabili iudicio liceat, et de singulis ipsius regionis causis cum moderatione et pondere disceptare. Ultra autem nichil agere permittitur citra metropolitani episcopi conscientiam, nec metropolitanus sine ceterorum aliquid gerat consilio sacerdotum.
> Gratian. Nisi forte episcopi yconomos in ecclesia sua ordinare contempserint. Unde in VII. Sinodo [c. 11.] legitur:

C. III. Let the metropolitan appoint stewards whom a bishop has neglected to have.

Since we are debtors to observe all the sacred rules, we ought by every means to preserve inviolate the one which says that there ought to be stewards in each church. And if indeed each metropolitan has appointed a steward in his own church, it is surely well. But if not, by their own authority the bishops of Constantinople have permission to place stewards over his church. Likewise metropolitans too have this permission if the bishops who are under them have not taken care to establish stewards in their churches. The very same is also to be observed in monasteries. GRATIAN. The same is proved by the example of the Apostle, who handed the impenitent Corinthian fornicator over to Satan and afterward reconciled him, once penitent, to the church, writing only this to the Corinthians in the first and second letter: that they not communicate with the excommunicated man and, when he had been reconciled, be joined to him in associated charity. But the contrary is proved by the authority of many. For Pope Hyginus says, [letter I, c. 2]:

C. III. Metropolitanus constituat yconomos, quos episcopus habere neglexerit.

Cum simus debitores omnes sacras regulas custodire, et eam, que dicit in unaquaque ecclesia yconomos esse debere, modis omnibus inuiolabilem conseruare debemus. Et si quidem unusquisque metropolitanus in sua ecclesia constituerit yconomum, bene utique. Sin autem, ex auctoritate propria Constantinopoleos episcopis licentia est preponendi yconomos in eius ecclesia. Similiter et metropolitanis, si episcopi, qui sub eis sunt, non sategerint yconomos statuere in suis ecclesiis. Id ipsum autem seruandum est etiam in monasteriis. Gratian. Probatur illud idem exemplo Apostoli, qui fornicatorem Corinthium satanae inpenitentem tradidit, postea penitentem ecclesiae reconciliauit, hoc tantum scribens Corinthiis in prima et secunda epistola, ut excommunicato non communicarent, et reconciliato socia karitate copularentur. Sed contra probatur auctoritate multorum. Ait enim Iginus Papa: [epist. I. c. 2.]

C. IV. A metropolitan shall not hear the cases of any of the bishops without their presence.

With the privilege of the Roman Church preserved in all things, let no metropolitan hear the cases of any of the bishops without the attendance of all the remaining bishops of the province, because proceedings otherwise conducted than those examined in the sight of all of them will be void; and if he has done it, let him be restrained by his brothers.

C. IV. Metropolitanus sine episcoporum presentia alicuius eorum non audiat causas.

Saluo in omnibus Romanae ecclesiae priuilegio nullus metropolitanus absque ceterorum omnium conprouincialium episcoporum instantia aliquorum audiat causas eorum, quia irritae erunt aliter actae, quam in conspectu omnium eorum uentilatae, et ipse, si fecerit, coherceatur a fratribus.

C. V. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Anicius, [to the Bishops of Gaul, c. 1]. In accordance with the statutes of the apostles, an archbishop shall do nothing concerning the cases of the bishops or other common cases without the counsel of all of them, nor shall they undertake anything, except to the extent that it pertains to their own parishes, without his consent, because the Most High rejoices in such concord and is glorified in His members.

C. V. De eodem.

Item Anicius Papa [Episcopis Galliae c. 1.] Archiepiscopus nichil de episcoporum causis aut aliis communibus causis iuxta statuta apostolorum absque cunctorum illorum agat consilio, nec illi assumant, nisi quantum ad suas pertinet parrochias, sine suo consensu, quoniam tali gaudet concordia Altissimus, et gloriatur in membris suis.

C. VI. Concerning the same.

The same, [in the same letter, c. 3]. But if any of the metropolitans has become swollen with pride and wishes, without the presence or counsel of all the bishops of the province, to conduct either their cases or other cases—except only those which pertain to his own parish—or to burden them, let him be strictly corrected by all, lest he dare to presume such things henceforth. But if he appears incorrigible and disobedient to them, let his contumacy be reported to this apostolic see, to which it has been commanded that all judgments of bishops be referred, so that vengeance may be exacted from him and the others may have fear.

C. VI. De eodem.

Idem. [in eadem epist. c. 3.] Si autem aliquis metropolitanorum inflatus fuerit et sine omnium conprouincialium presentia uel consilio episcoporum aut causas eorum, aut alias causas (nisi eas tantum, que ad propriam suam pertinent parrochiam) agere, aut eos grauare uoluerit, ab omnibus districte corrigatur, ne talia deinceps presumere audeat. Si uero incorrigibilis eisque inobediens apparuerit, ad hanc apostolicam sedem, cui omnia episcoporum iudicia referri precepta sunt, eius contumacia referatur, ut uindicta de eo fiat, et ceteri timorem habeant.

C. VII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Callistus, [to the Bishops of Gaul, letter II, c. 3]. Let no primate or metropolitan presume to excommunicate or judge a diocesan's church or parish, or anyone from his parish, or to do anything without his counsel or judgment; rather, let him observe what was established by the apostles, the Fathers, and our predecessors and confirmed by us, namely: if any metropolitan bishop attempts to do anything beyond his own proper parish—except what pertains solely to it—without the counsel and will of all the bishops of the province, he will lie under danger to his rank, and what he has done will be void and empty. But whatever it shall be necessary to do or arrange concerning the cases of the bishops of the province and their churches and clerics, and the necessities of secular persons, let this be done with the consent of all the bishops of the province, not with any haughtiness of domination but with the most humble and concordant administration, as the Lord says: "I came not to be ministered to but to minister," and elsewhere: "He who is greater among you shall be your minister." Likewise, let the bishops of the province themselves do all things with his counsel—except to the extent that they pertain to their own parishes—in accordance with the statutes of the holy Fathers, so that with one mind and one mouth the holy Trinity may concordantly be glorified forever.

C. VII. De eodem.

Item Calixtus Papa. [Episcopis Galliae, epist. II. c. 3.] Nullus primas, nullus metropolitanus diocesiani ecclesiam uel parrochiam, aut aliquem de eius parrochia presumat excommunicare uel iudicare, aliquidue agere absque eius consilio uel iudicio; sed hoc obseruet, quod ab apostolis, ac patribus et decessoribus nostris est statutum, et a nobis confirmatum; id est: si quis metropolitanus episcopus (nisi quod ad suam solummodo propriam pertinet parrochiam) sine consilio et uoluntate omnium conprouincialium episcoporum extra aliquid agere temptauerit, gradus sui periculo subiacebit, et quod egerit irritum erit et uacuum. Sed quicquid de conprouincialium episcoporum causis, eorumque ecclesiarum, et clericorum, atque secularium necessitatibus agere aut disponere necesse fuerit, hoc cum omnium consensu conprouincialium agatur pontificum non aliquo dominationis fastu, sed humillima et concordi administratione, sicut Dominus ait: "Non ueni ministrari, sed ministrare," et alibi: "Qui maior est uestrum erit minister uester." Similiter et ipsi conprouinciales episcopi cuncta cum eius consilio (nisi quantum ad proprias pertinet parrochias) agant iuxta sanctorum constituta Patrum, ut uno animo, uno ore concorditer sancta glorificetur Trinitas in secula.

C. VIII. Let a metropolitan do nothing in the parish of a suffragan without his counsel.

Likewise Nicholas to Rudolf, Archbishop of Bourges. Our brother Sigebod, Archbishop of Narbonne, has complained to our apostolate that, against his will, you compel his clerics to come to your judgment and, without consulting him, arrange matters concerning property pertaining to his church as though by the right of your patriarchate, although neither does antiquity—to which the Fathers decreed reverence—possess this practice, and the authority of the sacred canons utterly prohibits it, unless perhaps they have appealed to you as to their patriarch concerning cases which cannot be terminated before him, or, if their bishop has died, they have wished the property of their church to be administered by your judgment. For we determine that primates or patriarchs possess no privilege beyond the remaining bishops except to the extent that the sacred canons grant and ancient custom conferred upon them in antiquity, so that in accordance with the Nicene rules their privileges may be preserved for the churches, except if the apostolic see shall have decreed to honor some church or its ruler with any special privilege.

> C. VIII. In suffraganei parrochia nichil absque eius consilio metropolitanus agat.
> Item Nicolaus Rodulfo, Bituricensi Archiepiscopo. Conquestus est apostolatui nostro frater noster Sigebodus archiepiscopus Narbonensis, quod clericos suos eo inuito ad iudicium tuum uenire conpellas, et de rebus ad ecclesiam suam pertinentibus eo inconsulto quasi iure patriarchatus tui disponas, cum hoc nec antiquitas (cui Patres sanxere reuerentiam) habeat, et auctoritas sacrorum canonum penitus interdicat, nisi forte pro causis, que apud se terminari non possunt, ad te quasi ad patriarcham suum prouocauerint per appellationes, uel si episcopus suus decesserit, res ecclesiae suae tuo iudicio dispensare uoluerint. Primates enim uel patriarchas nichil priuilegii habere pre ceteris episcopis, nisi quantum sacri canones concedunt et prisca consuetudo illis antiquitus contulit, diffinimus, ita ut secundum Nicenas regulas sua priuilegia seruentur ecclesiis, preterquam si apostolica sedes aliquam ecclesiam uel rectorem ipsius quolibet speciali priuilegio decreuerit honorare.

C. IX. Concerning the same.

Likewise Bede on the Apocalypse: "And write to the angel of the church of Ephesus." He writes to the bishop, from whose hand the sins of his subjects are required, and the subjects ought not to be judged without his counsel. GRATIAN. For the Roman Church alone is able by its authority to judge concerning all; but no one is permitted to judge concerning it. Hence Pope Nicholas, [to Emperor Michael, in the letter whose beginning is "We Had Proposed"]:

> C. IX. De eodem.
> Item Beda super Apocalipsin: "Et angelo ecclesiae Ephesi scribe." Episcopo scribit, de cuius manu peccata requirit subditorum, nec sine eius consilio subditos iudicare debeat. Gratian. Sola enim Romana ecclesia sua auctoritate ualet de omnibus iudicare; de ea uero nulli iudicare permittitur. Unde Nicolaus Papa: [ad Michaelem Inperatorem in epistola, cuius initium: "Proposueramus"]

C. X. The judgment of the apostolic see is to be reconsidered by no one.

It is certainly evident that the judgment of the apostolic see—than whose authority there is none greater—is to be reconsidered by no one, nor is anyone permitted to judge concerning its judgment, according to what Pope Innocent says when writing to Rufus and the other bishops established throughout Thessaly: "No one ever boldly brought opposing hands against the apostolic summit—concerning whose judgment it is not permitted to reconsider—no one remained rebellious in this except one who wished judgment to be given concerning himself"; and blessed Pope Gelasius: "Nor did the canons ever command that judgment be given concerning its judgment"—that is, the judgment of the Roman Church—"and they established that its sentence ought not to be dissolved, whose decrees they commanded rather to be followed."

C. X. Apostolicae sedis iudicium a nemine est retractandum.

Patet profecto sedis apostolicae (cuius auctoritate maius non est) iudicium a nemine fore retractandum, neque cuiquam de eius liceat iudicare iudicio, iuxta quod Innocentius Papa Rufo et ceteris episcopis per Thessaliam constitutis scribens ait: "Nemo umquam apostolico culmini (de cuius iudicio non licet retractari manus obuias audacter intulit, nemo in hoc rebellis extitit, nisi qui de se uoluit iudicari," et B. Papa Gelasius: "Nec de eius (id est Romanae ecclesiae) canones umquam preceperunt iudicari iudicio, sententiamque illius constituerunt non oportere dissolui, cuius potius sequenda decreta mandauerunt."

C. XI. Apostolic authority releases those condemned or excommunicated by others.

Likewise Patriarch Anastasius to Pope Felix [II]. Your apostolic see has always possessed the permission authoritatively to restore by its own authority those unjustly condemned or excommunicated, to return all their things to them, and to punish by apostolic privilege those who condemned or excommunicated them, just as we know was also done in our own and earlier times.

C. XI. Ab aliis dampnatos uel excommunicatos apostolica soluit auctoritas.

Item Anastasius Patriarcha Felici Papae. [II.] Fuit semper uestrae apostolicae sedis licentia iniuste dampnatos uel excommunicatos potestatiue sua auctoritate restituere, et sua eis omnia reddere, et illos, qui eos condempnauerunt aut excommunicauerunt, apostolico punire priuilegio, sicut etiam nostris et anterioribus nouimus factum temporibus.

C. XII. Concerning the same.

Likewise, [in the same place a little below]. It was decreed by the ancient rules that whatever was done concerning their complaints or accusations, although in provinces situated remotely or far away, was not first to be examined or accepted before it was brought to the knowledge of your nurturing see, so that by its authority, according to what the pronouncement had been, it might be invalidated or confirmed.

C. XII. De eodem.

Item. [ibidem paulo inferius] Antiquis regulis censitum est, ut quicquid (quamuis in remotis aut in longinquo positis prouinciis) super eorum querelis aut accusationibus ageretur, non prius tractandum uel accipiendum esset, quam ad notitiam almae sedis uestrae esset deductum, ut huius auctoritate, iuxta quod fuisset pronunciatio infirmaretur aut firmaretur.

C. XIII. Let the first see be subject to no one's judgment.

Likewise Pope Innocent. No one will judge the first see, which desires to temper justice. For the judge will be judged neither by the emperor, nor by all the clergy, nor by kings, nor by the people.

C. XIII. Prima sedes nullius iudicio subiaceat.

Item Innocentius Papa. Nemo iudicabit primam sedem, iustitiam temperare desiderantem. Neque enim ab augusto, neque ab omni clero, neque a regibus, neque a populo iudex iudicabitur.

C. XIV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Symmachus. God wished the cases of other men to be terminated through men, but He reserved the prelate of this see to His own judgment without question. He wished the successor of the blessed apostle Peter to owe his innocence to heaven alone and to possess an inviolate conscience for the investigation of the most subtle examiner. Do not suppose that those souls have no fear of an investigator which God, beyond the rest, reserved for His own examination. Before Him the guilty man has no aid from the splendor of his pleading when he uses as witness of the very deeds the one whom he has as judge. You may perhaps say, "Such will be the condition of all souls in that adjudication." I will reply: to one it was said, "You are Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, and whatever you loose upon earth will be loosed also in heaven." And again, by the voice of the saints, the dignity of the pontiffs of his see was made venerable throughout the whole world, since whatever belongs to the faithful everywhere is subjected to it, since it is designated the head of the whole body. Concerning this it appears to me to have been said through the Prophet: "If this is humbled, to whose aid will you flee? And where will you leave your glory?"

C. XIV. De eodem.

Item Symacus. Aliorum hominum causas Deus uoluit terminare per homines, sedis istius presulem suo sine questione reseruauit arbitrio. Voluit B. Petri apostoli successore celo tantum debere innocentiam, et subtilissimi discussoris indagini inuiolatam habere conscientiam. Nolite existimare eas animas inquisitoris non habere formidinem, quas Deus pre ceteris suo reseruauit examini. Non habet apud illum reus de allegationis nitore subsidium, quando ipsorum factorum utitur teste quo iudice. Dicas forsitan, talis erit conditio animarum omnium in illa disceptatione; replicabo, uni dictum: "Tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram edificabo ecclesiam meam, et quecumque solueris super terram erunt soluta et in celis." Et rursus sanctorum uoce, pontificum dignitatem sedis eius factam toto orbe uenerabilem, dum illi quicquid fidelium est ubique submittitur, dum totius corporis caput esse designatur. De hac mihi per Prophetam dictum uidetur: "Si hec humiliatur, ad cuius fugietis auxilium? et ubi relinquetis gloriam uestram?"

C. XV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Anterus, [to the Bishops of the Provinces of Baetica and Toledo]. The deeds of our subjects are judged by us, but our deeds are judged by the Lord. § 1. Those who corrupt the life and morals of the good are worse than those who plunder the substance and estates of others.

C. XV. De eodem.

Item Anteros Papa. [ad Episcopos prouinciarum Beticae et Toletanae] Facta subditorum iudicantur a nobis: nostra uero a Domino iudicantur. §. 1. Deteriores sunt qui uitam moresque bonorum corrumpunt his, qui substantias aliorum prediaque diripiunt.

C. XVI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Gelasius, [to the legate Faustus]. These are the canons which wished appeals of the whole church to be carried to the examination of this see. But they decreed that appeal ought never at all to be made from it, and through this that it should judge concerning the whole church, that it should come to no one's judgment, nor did they ever command that judgment be given concerning its judgment; and they established that its sentence ought not to be dissolved, whose decrees they commanded rather to be followed.

C. XVI. De eodem.

Item Gelasius. [ad Faustum legatum] Ipsi sunt canones, qui appellationes totius ecclesiae ad huius sedis examen uoluerunt deferre. Ab ipsa uero numquam prorsus appellare debere sanxerunt, ac per hoc illam de tota ecclesia iudicare, ipsam ad nullius conmeare iudicium, nec de eius umquam preceperunt iudicari iudicio, sententiamque eius constituerunt non oportere dissolui, cuius potius sequenda decreta mandauerunt.

C. XVII. Concerning the same.

The same to all the Bishops. The whole church throughout the world knows that the sacrosanct Roman Church possesses the right to judge concerning all and that no one is permitted to judge concerning its judgment. Indeed, appeal is to be made to it from any part of the world, but no one is permitted to appeal from it. § 1. Nor do we pass over the fact that the apostolic see, without any preceding synod, possessed the faculty both of releasing those whom an iniquitous synod had condemned and of condemning, with no synod existing, those whom it was fitting to condemn; and this assuredly on account of its primacy, which the blessed apostle Peter both always held and will hold by the voice of the Lord.

C. XVII. De eodem.

Idem omnibus Episcopis. Cuncta per mundum nouit ecclesia, quod sacrosancta Romana ecclesia fas de omnibus habet iudicandi, neque cuiquam de eius liceat iudicare iudicio. Siquidem ad illam de qualibet mundi parte appellandum est: ab illa autem nemo est appellare permissus. §. 1. Sed nec illa preterimus, quod apostolica sedes sine ulla precedente sinodo et soluendi quos sinodus iniqua dampnauerat, et dampnandi, nulla existente sinodo, quos oportuit habuerit facultatem, et hoc nimirum pro suo principatu, quem B. Petrus apostolus Domini uoce et tenuit semper et tenebit.

[C. XVIII.]

The same to the Bishops established throughout Dardania. The whole church throughout the world knows that the see of the blessed apostle Peter has the right to release those bound by the sentences of any pontiffs whatsoever, inasmuch as it possesses the right to judge concerning every church, etc.

[C. XVIII.]

Idem Episcopis per Dardaniam constitutis. Cuncta per mundum nouit ecclesia, quoniam quorumlibet sententiis ligata pontificum sedes B. Petri apostoli ius habeat resoluendi, utpote que de omni ecclesia fas habeat iudicandi etc.

C. XIX. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Sixtus [II] to the Bishops of the Spaniards, [letter II, c. 4]. Know that the brothers whom you unjustly condemned through earthly fear have been justly restored by us, and by authority we command that all things which were taken from them be returned to them in their entirety, if you do not wish both you and your princes to be separated from our college and the members of the church.

C. XIX. De eodem.

Item Sixtus Papa [II.] Ispaniorum Episcopis. [epist. II. cap. 4.] Fratres quos timore terreno iniuste dampnastis, scitote a nobis iuste esse restitutos, quibus ex auctoritate omnia, que eis ablata sunt, integerrime reddi precipimus, si non uultis et uos et principes uestri a collegio nostro et membris ecclesiae separari.

C. XX. The Pope can ordain the clerics of any church.

Likewise Bishop Stephen to Patriarch Walbert. But now we write to you again, not wishing to infringe the privilege of any church, although by apostolic prerogative we can ordain a cleric from any church: cease now, through jealousy of someone, to delay the bishop of the church of Cumae, because, if you delay and do not hasten to consecrate him after now having been admonished so many times, without doubt he will depart consecrated.

> C. XX. Cuiuslibet ecclesiae clericos Papa ualet ordinare.
> Item Stephanus Episcopus Walberto patriarchae. Nunc uero iterato scribimus tibi, nolentes alicuius ecclesiae priuilegium infringere, licet apostolica prerogatiua possimus de qualibet ecclesia clericum ordinare: desine iam cuiuspiam zelo Cumensis ecclesiae antistitem protelare, quia, si protelaueris et eum consecrare iam tociens monitus non maturaueris, proculdubio consecratus abibit.

C. XXI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to Emperor Michael, [in the letter whose beginning is "We Had Proposed"]. Therefore, through the principal power of the blessed Peter and Paul, concerning which we explained above, we possess the power and right, whenever it shall be necessary, not only to summon to us monks but also any clerics from any diocese whatsoever, and to invite them when ecclesiastical opportunities require it. GRATIAN. But what is undertaken from the rashness of presumption is one thing; what is conducted from the necessity of charity is another. When the suffragans of archbishops have begun to favor the evil of their subjects and have been negligent concerning their correction, then metropolitans are permitted, apart from their will, both to condemn those to be bound and to absolve those to be reconciled. But when bishops, kindled by zeal for divine charity, edify the good by word and example and reprove the vices of the evil with harsh rebuke, metropolitans are not permitted to do or arrange anything in their parish without the counsel of such bishops. Hence at the end of the chapter of Pope Martin it is not said simply, "let him do nothing," but with the qualification, "let him presumptuously undertake nothing without their counsel," so that the vice of presumption, not the office of charity, appears to be condemned. Thus the Apostle too, because he saw the Corinthians negligent concerning the correction of the fornicator, condemned him by his own authority. But John, because he saw the Bishop of Ephesus prepared to correct the vices of his subjects, refused to correct them without his authority, but admonished only him concerning their correction.

> C. XXI. De eodem.
> Item Nicolaus Papa Michaeli Inperatori: [in epistola, cuius initium: "Proposuerainus"] Per principalem igitur beatorum Petri et Pauli, de qua supra exposuimus, potestatem et ius habemus non solum in monachos, uerum etiam in quoslibet clericos de quacumque diocesi, cum necesse fuerit, ad nos conuocare, atque ecclesiasticis exigentibus oportunitatibus inuitare. Gratian. Sed aliud est quod ex temeritate assumitur presumptionis, aliud quod ex necessitate geritur karitatis. Cum suffraganei archiepiscoporum subditis suis ad malum fauere ceperint, atque circa eorum correctionem negligentes extiterint, tunc licet metropolitanis preter illorum uoluntatem et ligandos dampnare, et reconciliandos absoluere. Cum uero episcopi zelo diuinae karitatis accensi bonos uerbo et exemplo edificant, malorum uicia aspera increpatione redarguunt, absque talium consilio non licet metropolitanis in eorum parrochia aliquid agere uel disponere. Unde in fine capituli Martini Papae non simpliciter dictum est: "nichil agat," sed cum determinatione "nichil presumptiue assumat absque eorum consilio," ut uicium presumptionis uideatur inprobatum, non offitium karitatis. Sic et Apostolus, quia Corinthios uidit negligentes circa correctionem fornicatoris, sua auctoritate illum dampnauit. Iohannes uero, quia episcopum Ephesiorum uidit paratum ad corrigenda uicia subditorum, sine eius auctoritate illos corrigere noluit, sed illum tantum de eorum correctione admonuit.

Causa X

GRATIAN. A certain layman seeks to separate from diocesan law a basilica built by him; the bishop contends that the church with its entire endowment pertains to his administration; at length the bishop prevails, and, accompanied through the parishes by soldiers, rages cruelly; he strives to usurp as owed to himself those things which belong to the churches. (Qu. I.) First it is now asked whether the basilica with its entire endowment pertains to the bishop's ordination. (Qu. II.) Second, whether a bishop is permitted to usurp the property of churches. (Qu. III.) Third, what he can exact from his priests under the name of the cathedraticum.

GRATIANUS. Quidam laicus basilicam a se factam a diocesiana lege segregare querit; episcopus ecclesiam cum omni dote sua ad suam dispositionem pertinere contendit; tandem euincit episcopus, per parrochias militibus comitatus crudeliter deseuit; que ecclesiarum sunt tamquam sibi debita usurpare contendit. (Qu. I.) Modo primum queritur, an basilica cum omni dote sua ad episcopi ordinationem pertineat? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an res ecclesiarum episcopis usurpare liceat? (Qu. III.) Tertio, quid nomine cathedratici a suis sacerdotibus exigere ualeat?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. Concerning the first question it is determined thus in the Council of Lérida, [c. 3]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. De prima questione sic diffinitur in Concilio Ylerdensi: [cap. 3.]

C. I. Let a basilica which is consecrated not be separated from diocesan law.

If any of the laity desires a basilica built by him to be consecrated, let him by no means dare to separate it from diocesan law under the appearance of a monastery where no congregation assembles.

C. I. Basilica, que consecratur, a diocesiana lege non segregetur.

Si ex laicis quisquam se factam basilicam consecrari desiderat, nequaquam eam sub monasterii specie, ubi congregatio non colligitur, a diocesiana lege audeat segregare.

C. II. Let churches with their endowments remain under the bishop's power.

Likewise from the Third Council of Toledo, [c. 19]. Certain persons, contrary to all authority, request churches which they have built to be consecrated in such a way that they judge the endowment which they conferred upon the same church not to pertain to the bishop's ordination. Let what was done in this manner in the past be corrected, so that it may be prohibited from being done in the future, and let all things pertain to the bishop's ordination and power in accordance with the ancient constitution.

C. II. Ecclesiae cum dotibus suis in episcopi potestate consistant.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano III. [c. 19.] Sic quidam contra omnem auctoritatem ecclesias, quas edificauerint, postulant consecrari, ut dotem, quam eidem ecclesiae contulerint, censeant ad episcopi ordinationem non pertinere. Quod factum taliter in preterito corrigatur, ut et in futuro ne fiat prohibeatur, et omnia secundum constitutionem antiquam ad episcopi ordinationem et potestatem pertineant.

C. III. Churches and all their rights pertain to the bishop's ordination.

Likewise from the Second Council of Chalon. It was decreed that all churches with their endowments, tithes, and all their possessions shall remain under the bishop's power and always pertain to his ordination.

C. III. Ecclesiae et omnia iura earum ad episcopi ordinationem pertinent.

Item ex Concilio II. Cabillonensi. Decretum est ut omnes ecclesiae cum dotibus suis, et decimis, et omnibus suis, in episcopi potestate consistant, atque ad ordinationem suam semper pertineant.

C. IV. Let each parish be governed by the bishop's provision.

Likewise Leo IV, [in the letter to the Bishops of Britain, c. 2]. Each parish is to be governed under the provision and protection of the bishop through priests or other clerics whom he himself shall have provided with the fear of God; and it appears to pertain to him by right also to travel around, as shall have appeared necessary to him when ecclesiastical utility compels it.

C. IV. Unaqueque parrochia episcopi prouisione regatur.

Item Leo IV. [in epistola ad Episc. Britanniae, c. 2.] Regenda est unaqueque parrochia sub prouisione ac tuitione episcopi per sacerdotes uel ceteros clericos, quos ipse cum Dei timore preuiderit cui iure pertinere uidetur, et circuire, ut sibi necessarium uisum fuerit ecclesiastica utilitate cogente.

C. V. Let ecclesiastical property be governed by the bishop's judgment and power.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, [c. 24]. Whatever ecclesiastical property there is ought to be governed and administered with all diligence and the good faith owed to God, who foresees all things and judges all, under the judgment and power of the bishop, to whom the souls of the whole congregation appear to have been committed.

C. V. Iudicio et potestate episcopi res ecclesiasticae gubernentur.

Item ex Concilio Antioceno. [c. 24.] Quecumque res ecclesiasticae sunt conuenit cum omni diligentia et bona fide, que Deo debetur, qui omnia preuidet et cuncta iudicat, gubernari et dispensari cum iudicio et potestate episcopi, cui totius plebis animae uidentur esse conmissae.

C. VI. Let founders of basilicas know that they possess no power over church property.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 32]. Let founders of basilicas know that they possess no power over the property which they confer upon those churches, but that, in accordance with the institutions of the canons, just as the church, so also its endowment pertains to the bishop's ordination.

C. VI. Basilicarum conditores in rebus ecclesiarum nullam se potestatem habere cognoscant.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano IV. [c. 32.] Nouerint conditores basilicarum, in rebus, quas eisdem ecclesiis conferunt, nullam se potestatem habere, sed iuxta canonum instituta sicut ecclesiam, ita et dotem eius ad ordinationem episcopi pertinere.

C. VII. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, [I, c. 17]. Concerning those things which any of the faithful have offered to parishes in lands, vineyards, bondservants, and peculia, let the statutes of the ancient canons be preserved, so that they remain under the bishops' power. Nevertheless, of those things which come to the altar, let a third part be faithfully conveyed to the bishops.

C. VII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I. c. 17.] De his, que parrochiis in terris, uineis, mancipiis atque peculiis quicumque fideles obtulerint, antiquorum canonum statuta seruentur, ut in episcoporum potestate consistant. De his tamen, que altario accesserint, tertia pars fideliter episcopis deferatur.

C. VIII. Of those things which are offered at the altar, let the bishop claim half for himself.

Likewise from the same, [c. 16]. Reading again the ancient canons, we believe that earlier statutes are to be renewed, so that, of those things which are conferred upon the altar as offerings of the faithful, the bishop claims half for himself, and the clergy of the second rank receives half to be administered by it, both from their own estates and from every advantage remaining under the bishops' power.

C. VIII. De his, que altario offeruntur, medietatem sibi episcopus uendicet.

Item ex eodem. [c. 16.] Antiquos canones relegentes priora statuta credimus renouanda, ut de his, que in altario oblationes fidelium conferuntur, medietatem sibi episcopus uendicet, et medietatem sibi dispensandam secundi gradus clerus accipiat tam de propriis prediis, quam de omni commoditate in episcoporum potestate durantibus.

C. IX. Concerning bishops who despise visiting their diocese and compel clerics to redeem the lodgings owed to visitors.

Likewise from the Council of Toledo. A complaint of the congregations was reported before the holy synod that there are certain bishops who refuse to travel around their parishes during the year to preach or confirm, but who nevertheless demand that those who ought to prepare the lodgings which they would have had to use on the journey redeem them at another price. This twofold infamy of negligence and avarice was a great horror to the holy synod. They therefore established that no one afterward exercise this contrivance of cupidity and that bishops be more solicitous about visiting their flocks.

C. IX. De episcopis, qui diocesim suam uisitare contempnunt et ad redimendas mansiones, que uisitantibus debentur, clericos cogunt.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano. Relata est coram sancta sinodo querimonia plebium, quod sint quidam episcopi nolentes ad predicandum uel ad confirmandum suas per annum parrochias circuire, qui tamen exigunt, ut mansiones, quibus in profectione uti debuerant, alio precio redimant qui parare debent. Que duplex infamia, negligentiae et auaritiae sanctae sinodo magno fuit horrori. Statuerunt itaque, ne quis ultra exerceat id cupiditatis ingenium, et ut solicitiores sint episcopi de suis gregibus uisitandis.

C. X. Let churches be visited by bishops annually.

Likewise from the Council of Tarragona, [c. 8]. We decree that the order of ancient custom be preserved and the dioceses be visited annually by the bishop; and if perhaps any basilica is found destitute, let its ordainer be instructed to repair it, but let a third part from all things be received by the bishops, as we know was established by ancient tradition. PART II. GRATIAN. But if a bishop, impeded by ill health, cannot visit his dioceses personally, let him commit the office of visitation to others. Hence it is read in the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 35]:

> C. X. Annuis uicibus ecclesiae ab episcopis uisitentur.
> Item ex Concilio Terraconensi. [c. 8.] Decreuimus, ut antiquae consuetudinis ordo seruetur, et annuis uicibus ab episcopo dioceses uisitentur, et si qua forte basilica fuerit reperta destituta, ordinatori eius reparari precipiatur, ab episcopis autem tertia pars ex omnibus accipiatur sicuti antiqua traditione nouimus esse statutum. II. Pars. Gratian. Si autem episcopus inualitudine inpeditus dioceses suas per semetipsum uisitare non poterit uisitationis offitium aliis conmittat. Unde in Tolletano Concilio IV. [c. 35.] legitur:

C. XI. Let a bishop weighed down by ill health commit the office of visitation to others.

A bishop ought to travel through all his dioceses and parishes in individual years so that he may inquire into what each basilica needs for its repair. But if he himself, either detained by illness or entangled in other occupations, cannot fulfill this, let him send approved priests or deacons to inquire into the revenues and repairs of the basilicas and the life of those ministering. PART III. GRATIAN. But what visiting bishops ought to inquire from their clerics and what they ought to teach them is read to have been established thus in the Second Council of Braga, [c. 1]:

> C. XI. Inualitudine grauatus episcopus uisitationis offitium aliis conmittat.
> Episcopum per cunctas dioceses parrochiasque suas per singulos annos ire oportet, ut exquirat, quo unaqueque basilica in reparatione sui indigeat. Quod si ipse aut languore detentus aut aliis occupationibus inplicatus adinplere nequiuerit, presbiteros probabiles aut diacones mittat, qui et redditus basilicarum, et reparationes, et uitam ministrantium inquirant. III. Pars. Gratian. Visitantes autem episcopi quid a clericis suis exquirere debeant, et quid eos docere, in Concilio Bracarensi II. [cap. I.] sic statutum legitur:

C. XII. What visiting bishops ought to inquire from their clerics.

It was resolved by all the bishops that, as the bishops travel through the individual churches and dioceses, they first examine the clerics as to how they preserve the order of baptism or of Masses and how they perform each office in the church. And if they indeed find it correct, thanks be to God; but if not, they ought to teach the ignorant and by every means command this, as the ancient canons order: that for twenty days before baptism the catechumens submit to the purification of exorcism, in which twenty days the catechumens are above all to be specially taught the creed, which is, "I believe in God the Father almighty." Therefore, after the bishops have examined or taught their clerics in this way, on another day, when the congregation of that church has been summoned, let them teach them to flee the errors of idols or various crimes, that is, homicide, adultery, perjury, false testimony, and the remaining mortal sins, not to do to another what they do not wish to be done to themselves, and to believe in the resurrection of all and the day of judgment, in which each will receive according to his works. And thus afterward let the bishop depart from that church to another. Likewise Jerome to Pope Damasus, [concerning the offerings of the altar]:

C. XII. Que uisitantes episcopi a clericis suis exquirere debent.

Placuit omnibus episcopis, ut per singulas ecclesias episcopi et per dioceses ambulantes primum discutiant clericos, quomodo ordinem baptismi teneant uel missarum, et qualiter quecumque offitia in ecclesia peragant. Et si recte quidem inuenerint, Deo gratias; sin autem minime, docere debent ignaros, et hoc modis omnibus precipere, sicut antiqui canones iubent, ut ante dies uiginti baptismi ad purgationem exorcismi cathecumini currant, in quibus uiginti diebus omnino cathecumini symbolum, quod est "Credo in Deum Patrem omnipotentem," specialiter doceantur. Postquam ergo hoc suos clericos discusserint uel docuerint episcopi, alia die, conuocata plebe ipsius ecclesiae, doceant illos, ut errores fugiant ydolorum, uel diuersa crimina, id est homicidium, adulterium, periurium, falsum testimonium et reliqua peccata mortifera, et quod nolunt sibi fieri alteri ne faciant, et ut credant resurrectionem omnium et diem iudicii, in quo unusquisque secundum opera sua recepturus sit. Et sic postea episcopus de ecclesia illa proficiscatur ad aliam. Item Ieronimus ad Damasum Papam: [de oblationibus altaris]

C. XIII. Laymen are not permitted to usurp the offerings of a church.

PART IV. Because priests are accustomed to pray for all whose alms and offerings they receive, with what effrontery do laymen presume either themselves to eat the offerings which Christians offer for their sins or to grant them to others, since they ought not by office to pray for the people? For this reason, glorious Pope, it is fitting to send those presumptuous persons into perpetual excommunication, so that others may have fear and these things may no longer be done in the church.

C. XIII. Oblationes ecclesiae laicis usurpare non licet.

IV. Pars. Quia sacerdotes pro omnibus orare solent, quorum elemosinas et oblationes accipiunt, qua fronte presumunt laici oblationes, quas Christiani pro peccatis suis offerunt, uel ipsi comedere, uel aliis concedere, cum ipsi non debeant ex offitio pro populo orare? Ob hoc, Papa gloriose, mittere oportet illos presumptores in excommunicationem perpetuam, ut ceteri metum habeant, et amplius hec in ecclesia non fiant.

C. XIV. Let offerings made to altars or crosses by no means be taken away by laymen.

Likewise Pope Callistus [II]. Establishing things consonant with the canons of the holy Fathers, we utterly forbid offerings to be taken away by laymen from the most sacred and most reverend altar of blessed Peter, that of the Savior, and that of Saint Mary Rotunda, or from other altars or crosses of churches; and under the strictness of anathema we prohibit it, and by apostolic authority we prohibit churches from being fortified by laymen or reduced to servitude.

C. XIV. Minime auferantur a laicis oblationes altaribus uel crucibus factae.

Item Calixtus Papa. [II.] Sanctorum Patrum canonibus consona sancientes oblationes de sacratissimo et reuerentissimo altari B. Petri, et Saluatoris, et S. Mariae rotundae, aut de aliis ecclesiarum altaribus siue crucibus, a laicis auferri penitus interdicimus et sub districtione anathematis prohibemus, et ecclesias a laicis incastellari aut in seruitutem redigi auctoritate apostolica prohibemus.

C. XV. Let the offerings of churches not be held under the dominion of laymen.

Likewise Pope Damasus. We altogether prohibit this custom which appears to be increasing against the holy catholic Church: that in no way, ever, at any time, are the offerings which are offered within holy Church to be held under the dominion of laymen. Rather, only priests who appear to serve the Lord daily are permitted to eat and drink them, because in the Old Testament the Lord prohibited the sons of Israel from eating the holy loaves, except only Aaron and his sons, who were far from those loaves which are now offered in holy Church, because those men were under the shadow of the law, while those who now, under the grace of the Holy Spirit, with the Gospel shining throughout the whole world, appear to be brighter. With what effrontery or with what conscience do you wish to receive offerings, you who are scarcely able to offer prayers to God for yourselves, much less for others? For one who attempts to do what is granted to him under no reasoning does what is depraved and contrary to the Lord's command and brings harm to his own soul. Because it pleased all the holy Fathers and our predecessors that this sanction be made, we similarly wish to persevere in those same things, so that no one dare make void what was established, if he does not wish to persevere in perpetual condemnation. But if anyone has been a rash presumptuous person contrary to this rule of ours and contrary to the rule of the three hundred holy Fathers who established this in the Council of Nicaea, and has afterward attempted to take offerings from sacred churches, let him be bound and condemned under the bond of anathema. All responded: Let it be done, let it be done. GRATIAN. By the foregoing authorities churches with all their property are shown to pertain to the bishop's ordination, and both the churches and their offerings and resources are proved to be immune from the administration of laymen.

> C. XV. Ecclesiarum oblationes sub laicorum dominio non detineantur.
> Item Damasus Papa. Hanc consuetudinem, que contra sanctam ecclesiam catholicam augeri uidetur, omnino interdicimus, ut nullo modo umquam ullo tempore oblationes, que intra sanctam ecclesiam offeruntur, sub dominio laicorum detineantur. Sed tantummodo sacerdotibus, qui cottidie Domino seruire uidentur, illis solis licet comedere et bibere, quia in ueteri testamento prohibuit Dominus panes sanctos comedere filiis Israel, nisi tantummodo Aaron et filiis eius, qui longe erant ab istis panibus, qui nunc in sancta ecclesia offeruntur, quia illi sub umbra legis erant, qui uero modo sub gratia Spiritus sancti toto mundo euangelio coruscante lucidiores esse uidentur. Qua fronte aut qua consciencia oblationes uultis accipere, qui uix ualetis pro uobis, nedum pro aliis Deo preces offerre? quia prauum est et contra preceptum dominicum detrimentum suae animae infert qui illud agere conatur, quod ei nulla ratione conceditur. Quia omnibus sanctis Patribus nostrisque prioribus placuit hanc sanctionem fieri, et nos similiter in eisdem persistere uolumus, ut nullus audeat irritum facere hoc, quod constitutum est, si in perpetua dampnatione noluerit persistere. Si quis uero contra hanc regulam nostram et contra regulam sanctorum Patrum CCC., qui in Niceno concilio hoc constituerunt, temerarius presumptor fuerit, et ulterius oblationes de sacris ecclesiis molitus auferre fuerit, sub anathematis uinculo sit colligatus et condempnatus. Responderunt omnes: Fiat, fiat. Gratian. Premissis auctoritatibus ecclesiae cum omnibus rebus suis ad episcopi ordinationem pertinere monstrantur, et tam ecclesiae quam oblationes et facultates earum a laicorum dispositione probantur esse inmunes.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. But when the resources of a church are said to be placed under the power of bishops, the power of administering is to be understood, not of alienating or squandering. Hence it is read in the Council of Agde, [c. 7]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Sed cum in episcoporum potestate facultates ecclesiae constitutae esse dicantur, potestas dispensandi intelligenda est, non distrahendi uel dilapidandi. Unde in Agatensi Concilio [c. 7.] legitur:

C. I. Bishops are not permitted to alienate church property in any way.

Let bishops possess the cottages or bondservants of a church, as the ancient authority of the canons commands, or the vessels of a monastery, as things entrusted to a faithful steward, with the right of the church intact—that is, so that they presume neither to sell nor through any contracts to alienate the property from which the poor live. But if necessity has compelled that, for the necessity or utility of the church, something be alienated either in usufruct or by an indirect sale, let the cause for which it is necessary to sell first be approved before two or three bishops of the province or neighboring bishops, so that, after priestly examination has been held, the sale or transaction which is made may be confirmed by their subscription. A sale or transaction made otherwise will not be valid. But we permit less useful possessions to be furnished for use to strangers or clerics, with the right of the church preserved. [GRATIAN.] In book I of the Code, On the Most Sacred Churches, Emperor Justinian: with the cause of captivity evidently excepted.

> C. I. Res ecclesiae aliquo modo alienare episcopis non licet.
> Casellas uel mancipiola ecclesiae episcopi, sicut prisca canonum precepit auctoritas, uel uasa monasterii quasi conmendata fideli preposito, integro ecclesiae iure possideant, id est ut neque uendere, neque per quoscumque contractus res, unde pauperes uiuunt, alienare presumant. Quod si necessitas conpulerit, ut pro ecclesiae necessitate aut utilitate uel in usufructu, uel indirecta uenditione aliquid distrahatur, apud duos uel tres conprouinciales aut uicinos episcopos causa, que necesse sit uendendi primitus conprobetur, ut, habita discussione sacerdotali, eorum subscriptione que facta fuerit uenditio uel transactio roboretur. Aliter facta uenditio uel transactio non ualebit. Minus uero utiles possessiones peregrinis uel clericis saluo iure ecclesiae in usum prestare permittimus. [Gratian.] Codicis libro I. de sacrosanctis ecclesiis, Inp. Iustinianus: excepta uidelicet causa captiuitatis.

[C. II.]

Emperor Leo. For it is fitting that those things which pertain to the rights of the most blessed Church be venerably preserved untouched, just as the sacrosanct and religious Church itself. A new constitution. This law has been extended to every venerable place and every college which a pious action established, so that they may not be pledged and may be preserved in perpetuity among those immovable things which are assigned from the imperial house to the aforesaid places. Among other things an exception is made only to the extent that a debt presses. § 1. And if it has surplus vessels and cannot pay from elsewhere, lest any immovable thing be alienated or sold, let them, after proceedings have been held before the one to whom ordination of the place belongs, be sold to other venerable places, or, once melted down, to anyone. But one who receives these things apart from this observance shall be subject to the same penalties which were set forth concerning immovable property. But if the debt cannot be paid from movable things, first let immovable property be given as a special pledge, the creditor reckoning its fruits to himself both toward the principal and toward interest up to the fourth part of one percent. But if he refuses, then let the administrator of the house, after proceedings have been held without expense before the one by whom he is ordained, swear, with the greater part of those serving there consenting, both that the debt is pressing and that it cannot be paid from movable things. When this has followed, for twenty days let it be publicly known that the property of the church is for sale, so that it may be given to the one offering more, with the price by every means being given for the debt. Otherwise the property is not granted to the buyer, and let this be inscribed: that nothing has been done in this matter to the harm of the divine house. If no buyer is found, let the property, strictly appraised, be given to the creditor in payment, a tenth part of the entire valuation being added to the price and the consent of the ordainer and of the greater part of those serving there being added. Nevertheless, let that property be moderate among the others, with regard given to its quality, quantity, and burden. And let that person be understood here as a creditor who proves that what he loaned proceeded to the utilities of the religious house. § 2. But just as alienation of the property of a church is forbidden, so it is prohibited that any sterile possession or one otherwise burdensome be given to it, as under the name of fiscal burdens. § 3. Likewise, an estate useless because of the burden of fiscal payments is alienated, with proceedings to be completed as above and the same oath furnished, namely, that it is alienated for no other cause except that the immunity of the same venerable house may be preserved. § 4. But they can also exchange with the prince for property greater or equal, if the commonwealth demands this, with a pragmatic form preceding concerning it. § 5. Likewise, they rightly exchange among themselves with the indemnity of each, evidently with the consent of those who are also mentioned above.

PART II. § 6. Perpetual emphyteusis is also permitted concerning this property if the matter is conducted in the presence of those to whom this is assigned by law, with those whose interest is involved swearing that from that contract nothing is done to the injury of the divine house, and with the customary rent of the property itself which existed when it was dedicated to divine right not being diminished except by a sixth part; or if it has been diminished by disaster, then, with the present rent being established, let it be given in emphyteusis. But if the property is indeed valuable yet furnishes little or no rent, it is to be carefully appraised, so that from this a just rent may be established. Only those things, however, are given in emphyteusis which appear suitable for this to the steward and the other governors. § 7. One who makes worse property of this kind which has been leased or received in emphyteusis, or has not paid the canon for two years, can be expelled, yet in such a way that he pays the rent for the whole time and repairs that in which he damaged the property, not to recover anything he expended under the name of improvement. § 8. But if the aforesaid houses possess any ruins which they cannot rebuild, let them be given in perpetual emphyteusis, with the emphyteuta to use the material of the house whose habitation has collapsed, so that the rent may be reduced by a third part from that which was collected while the habitations still stood; or, if he first builds, let half of the rents added there by appraisal be given to the religious house. § 9. But one who receives the aforementioned property, not by a gratuitous title of alienation, apart from the form of the law, shall indeed restore the property with every increase from the intervening time; but concerning what he gave, he shall have no action against the venerable place but against the one who alienated it. But a donee shall restore both the property with every appurtenance and as much again. A creditor also, once the pledged property has been restored, has no action on the loan. One who receives an emphyteusis shall fall from it and not recover what he gave; indeed, he shall immediately pay what he would have paid if he had contracted lawfully. § 10. But it is said better that actions of this kind are altogether to be denied to the receiver. In book I of the Code, On the Most Sacred Church, Emperor Leo: § 11. If the steward of a church foresees that it is expedient that temporary possession in usufruct of certain possessions and estates—urban or rural—pertaining to ecclesiastical right be furnished to anyone desiring it, let its term, which shall have been agreed between the two, or to the day of the life of the one who desires it, be sought; let the steward enter into and record agreements with him who has chosen this, by which both the time within which it was resolved that this be furnished is established and what each has received in exchange is manifest.

Inp. Leo. Ea enim, que ad beatissimae ecclesiae iura pertinent, tamquam ipsam sacrosanctam et religiosam ecclesiam intacta uenerabiliter conuenit custodiri. Constitutio noua. Hoc ius porrectum est ad omnem locum uenerabilem omneque collegium, quod actio pia constituit, ut nec pignorentur, et perpetuo seruentur in his inmobilibus, que ab inperiali domo predictis locis applicantur. In ceteris eatenus excipitur, si debitum urget. §. 1. Et habet superflua uasa, nec aliunde soluere ualet, ne quid inmobile alienetur uel distrahatur, ea, gestis habitis coram eo, cuius est loci ordinatio, aliis scilicet locis uenerabilibus, uel conflata cuilibet uendantur. Qui autem hec accipit citra hanc obseruationem, hisdem penis subiaceat, que in rebus inmobilibus proditae sunt. Si autem debitum ex mobilibus solui non ualet, primo res inmobiles speciali dentur pignori, cuius fructus creditor sibi reputet tam in sortem quam in usuras usque ad quartam centesimae. Quod si nolit, tunc ordinator domus apud eum, a quo ordinatur, habitis absque dispendio gestis iuret, maiore parte ibidem seruientium consentiente, et debitum urgere, nec ex mobilibus solui posse. Quo subsecuto, per uiginti dies rem ecclesiae esse uenalem sit publice notum, ut plus offerenti detur, precio modis omnibus pro debito dando. Aliter enim res emptori non conceditur, et hoc inscribatur nil esse factum in ea re ad dampnum diuinae domus. Emptore non inuento, res estimata districte creditori detur in solutum, addita in precio decima parte uniuersae estimationis et accedente consensu ordinatoris et maioris partis ibidem seruientium. Sit tamen ea res mediocris inter ceteras, inspecta ipsius qualitate, et quantitate, et onere. Et is creditor hic intelligatur, qui quod credidit probat in utilitates religiosae domus processisse. §. 2. Sicut autem alienatio rerum ecclesiae interdicitur, ita prohibetur, ne qua sterilis ei detur possessio aut alias onerosa, ueluti nomine fiscalium. §. 3. Item predium propter onus fiscalium inutile alienatur gestis ut supra conficiendis, et eodem iuramento prestito, id est quod alia de causa non alienatur, nisi ut inmunitas eiusdem uenerandae domus seruetur. §. 4. Sed et permutare principi possunt pro re maiori, uel equali, si respublica hoc exposcit, pragmatica forma super hoc precedente. §. 5. Item sibi inuicem recte permutant cum utriusque indempnitate, eorum scilicet consensu, qui et supra referuntur.

II. Pars. §. 6. Perpetua quoque emphiteosis in his rebus permittitur, si res in eorum geritur presentia, quibus hoc assignatur lege, iurantibus his, quorum interest, ex eo contractu nichil ad lesionem diuinae domus effici, solito redditu ipsius rei, qui fuit, cum diuino iuri dedicaretur, non inminuendo nisi in sextam partem, aut si ob cladem diminuta fuerit, tunc constante nunc pensione in emphiteosim detur. Quod si res preciosa quidem est, parum tamen aut nichil prestet pensionis res subtiliter estimanda est, ut ex hoc iusta pensio constituatur. Ea tamen sola dantur in emphiteosim, que ad hoc congrua uidentur yconomo et aliis gubernatoribus. §. 7. Qui rem huiusmodi conductam uel in emphiteosim acceptam fecerit deteriorem, aut canonem per biennium non soluerit, repelli potest, ut tamen soluat totius temporis pensionem, et id, in quo rem lesit, resarciat non repetiturus si quid inpendit nomine meliorationis. §. 8. Si quas uero ruinas habent memoratae domus, quas reedificare non ualent in emphiteosim dentur perpetuam, emphiteota usuro materia depositae habitationis domus, ut pensio minuatur in tertiam partem ab ea, que stantibus adhuc habitationibus colligebatur, aut, prius eo edificante, ex additis illic per estimationem pensionibus medietas detur religiosae domui. §. 9. Qui uero res iam dictas non gratuito alienationis titulo citra formam legis accipit, rem quidem cum omni incremento medii temporis restituat: eius autem, quod dedit, nullam aduersus uenerabilem locum, sed aduersus eum, qui alienauit, actionem habeat. Donatarius autem et rem cum omni causa restituat, et aliud tantum. Creditor quoque, restituta re pignorata, crediti actionem non habet. Emphiteosis acceptor ab ea cadat nec quod dedit repetat, imo statim soluat quod soluturus esset, si iure contraxisset. §. 10. Sed melius dicitur omnino denegandas esse actiones huiusmodi acceptori. Codice libro I. de sacrosancta ecclesia Inp. Leo: §. 11. Si yconomus ecclesiae prospexerit expedire, ut cuiquam desideranti certarum possessionum atque prediorum (urbanorum uel rusticorum) ad ius ecclesiasticum pertinentium temporalis ususfructus possessio prestetur, eius tempus, quod inter utrosque conuenerit, siue in diem uitae suae ab eo, qui desiderat, postuletur, pacta cum eo, qui hoc elegerit, ineat yconomus, atque conscribat, per que et tempus, intra quod hoc prestari placuerit, statuatur, et manifestum sit quod quisque acceperit adinuicem.

[PALEA. C. III.

By furnishing the grace of a benefice of this kind, namely the usufruct of an ecclesiastical estate for a time, but after the established time and their agreement have ended, with the ownership returning to ecclesiastical dominion and right.] But when the period established between them has been completed, or at the time of his death, if this too was agreed, the one who, with a compact intervening, received possession of ecclesiastical property and the usufruct of other revenues for the sake of holding it shall leave to the church, together with the ownership of those estates, the immovable property, their tenant farmers, and bondservants, revenues not less than those of another quantity as great as what he had received. For unless the agreements were entered into under this condition, we decree that they too are not valid. § 1. A new constitution. This furnishing of use has a place in every religious house. When it has ended, let both properties come by full right to the aforesaid house, and let not even the property which is given in exchange be burdened with greater tribute. § 2. Under whatever other modes it is permitted, certain persons are forbidden to receive property of this kind, such as its steward and his relatives.

[PALEA. C. III.

Huiusmodi beneficii gratia prestando quidem ecclesiastici predii pro tempore usum fructum, post statutum autem tempus et placitum ipsorum redditum proprietate ad dominium et ius ecclesiasticum recurrente firmiter.] Conpleto uero spatio, quod inter eos fuerit constitutum, seu mortis suae tempore (si hoc quoque conuenerit) is, qui possessionem ecclesiasticam et ceterorum reddituum usumfructum habendi gratia pacto interueniente susceperit, non minus quam alterius tantae quantitatis, quantae acceperat, redditus, cum ipsorum prediorum dominio, et rebus inmobilibus, eorumque colonis et mancipiis ecclesiae derelinquat. Nisi enim hac conditione pacta inita fuerint, ea quoque non decernimus ualere. §. 1. N. C. Hec usus prestatio locum habet in omni domo religiosa. Quo finito res utraque pleno iure perueniat in domum iam dictam, nec tributis quidem sit grauata maioribus ea res, que datur inuicem. §. 2. Quibuscumque modis aliis permittitur, interdicitur certis personis rem huiusmodi accipere, ut yconomo eiusque cognatis.

C. IV. In what manner precarial grants of ecclesiastical property ought to be made.

Likewise from the Council of Mettis. Let no one presume to make precarial grants from ecclesiastical property unless, to the extent that a suitable quality is given from his own property, they receive double from the property of the church, in the name only of those who gave it, if they wish to hold their own and ecclesiastical property in usufruct. But if they relinquish their own property at present, let each take threefold from ecclesiastical property in usufruct, in his own name only, because it is fitting for each so to treat it as an administrator of another's property, not as a giver of his own. § 1. The holy synod also decreed, and the imperial authority announces, that no one be compelled by any power to make a precarial grant from property dedicated to God and His saints, since reason and practice maintain that no one is compelled, against utility and reason, to make a benefice from his own property for one to whom he does not wish it. § 2. Nor shall any person presume to make exchanges of ecclesiastical property or bondservants without permission and royal consent.

Si autem res proprias ad presens dimiserint, ex rebus ecclesiasticis triplum fructuario usu in suo tantum quis nomine sumat, quia sic eas quemque tractare, ut alienarum dispensatorem conuenit, non propriarum largitorem. §. 1. C. VII. Let the bishop possess the power to administer the property of the church.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 16]. PART III. Let the bishop possess power over the property of the church, so that he may administer it to those having necessity with all reverence and fear of God. It is also fitting for him to participate in the things which are necessary, if nevertheless he or the brothers who are with him need anything, so that they may suffer necessity in no way, according to the holy Apostle, who says: "With food and covering, we are content with these." But if the bishop wishes to usurp ecclesiastical property for his own desires, or gives power to brothers, sons, or any of his relatives so that through them the property of the church is secretly harmed, he ought to be answerable to the council. If otherwise, the bishop or the priests or deacons who are with him are to be accused because they gather for their own uses those things which come from revenue or from any act of the church, defraud the poor, and destroy them with hunger; these are to be corrected in accordance with what shall have been ordained by the holy council. PART IV. GRATIAN. But if, contrary to this prohibition, it happens that a bishop sells any of the church's property, it is decreed both that the property itself is to be restored to the church and that he himself is to be cast from his rank. Hence it is read in the same Council of Pope Martin, [c. 14]:

> C. VII. Res ecclesiae dispensandi potestatem habeat episcopus.
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 16.] III. Pars. Episcopus habeat potestatem in rebus ecclesiae, ut dispenset necessitatem habentibus cum omni reuerentia et timore Dei. Participare etiam eum oportet que necessaria sunt. Si tamen ipse aut qui cum eo sunt fratres indiguerint aliquo, ut necessitatem nullo modo patiantur, secundum Apostolum sanctum dicentem: "Victu et tegumento, his contenti sumus." Si autem res ecclesiasticas episcopus in suas uoluntates usurpare uoluerit, aut fratribus uel filiis, uel quibuscumque propinquis suis dederit potestatem, ut per eos latenter res ledantur ecclesiae, hunc oportet obnoxium esse concilio; sin aliter, episcopus uel qui cum eo sunt presbiteri aut diaconi accusentur, quia ea, que ex redditu, uel ex quolibet actu ecclesiae ueniunt, in suos usus colligunt, et pauperes fraudant et fame conficiunt, hos corripi oportet secundum quod ordinatum fuerit a sancto concilio. IV. Pars. Gratian. Si uero contra hanc prohibitionem aliquam de rebus ecclesiae episcopum uendere contigerit, et res ipsa ecclesiae restauranda, et ipse gradu suo eiciendus decernitur. Unde in eodem Concilio Martini Papae [c. 14.] legitur:

C. VIII. Concerning a bishop who sells the property of a church under no necessity.

If any bishop, compelled by no necessity of ecclesiastical reasoning, has presumed to sell any ecclesiastical property in his clergy, or where perhaps there is no priest, let him be compelled to restore the property itself to his own church and, once heard and convicted, be cast down in the judgment of bishops; and as one guilty of theft or robbery, let him be deprived of his honor.

C. VIII. De episcopo, qui nulla necessitate res ecclesiae uendit.

Si quis episcopus nulla ecclesiasticae rationis necessitate conpulsus in suo clero, aut ubi forte presbiter non est, de rebus ecclesiasticis presumpserit aliquid uendere, res ipsas ecclesiae propriae restaurare cogatur, et in iudicio episcoporum deiciatur auditus et conuictus, et tamquam furti aut latrocinii reus suo priuetur honore.

Question III

GRATIAN. PART I. But what a bishop ought to exact under the name of the cathedraticum is read in the Second Council of Braga, [c. 2]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quid uero nomine cathedratici episcopus exigere debeat, in secundo Concilio Bracarensi [c. 2.] legitur:

C. I. Apart from the honor of the cathedraticum, let a bishop exact nothing throughout the dioceses.

It was resolved that no bishop, traveling throughout his dioceses, take anything else throughout the churches apart from the honor of his chair, that is, two solidi, nor usurp for himself a third part from any offering of the people made in parochial churches; rather, let it be preserved for the repair of the church and let an account be made to the bishop in individual years. For if the bishop takes that third part, he has taken away the light and sacred roofs of the church. Likewise, let parochial clerics not be compelled in servile fashion to serve the bishop in any works, because it is written: "Not as lording it over the clergy."

C. I. Preter honorem cathedratici nichil per dioceses exigat episcopus.

Placuit, ut nullus episcoporum, per suas dioceses ambulans, preter honorem cathedrae suae, id est duos solidos, aliud aliquid per ecclesias tollat, neque tertiam partem ex quacumque oblatione populi in ecclesiis parrochialibus facta sibi usurpet; sed ecclesiae reparationi seruetur, et singulis annis episcopo ratio fiat. Nam si tertiam partem illam episcopus tollit, lumen et sacra tecta ecclesiae abstulit. Similiter etiam parrochiales clerici seruili more in aliquibus operibus episcopo seruire non cogantur, quia scriptum est: "Neque ut dominantes in clero."

C. II. Let the third part which the bishop was accustomed to receive be used for the repair of basilicas.

Likewise from the Council at Marech. It was indeed decreed by the ancient canons that the bishop should obtain a third from the parochial churches, although his own resources can most fully suffice for him. It was resolved by this holy council that no bishop of the province of Lusitania presume to take a third from any parochial church, but let those things which he could have obtained from there be used for the repair of basilicas.

C. II. Basilicarum reparationi proficiat tertia pars, quam accipere consueuerat episcopus.

Item ex Concilio apud Marech. Priscis quidem canonibus erat decretum, ut episcopus de parrochianis ecclesiis tertiam sequeretur, cui sua plenissime sufficere possunt. Placuit huic sancto concilio, ut nullus prouinciae Lusitaniae episcopus a qualibet parrochiana ecclesia tertiam auferre presumat, sed que exinde consequi potuerat reparationi basilicarum proficiant.

C. III. Let bishops not receive the third unless they wish to repair ruined churches.

Likewise from the Council of Toledo, [XVI, c. 5]. The unity of our assembly decrees and establishes that, if bishops believe that the thirds which the ancient canons judged bishops should have from their parishes are to be exacted, the ruined churches are to be repaired by the bishops themselves. But if they prefer to yield them, the repair of the same basilicas is to be applied by the ministers of those churches under the care and solicitude of their pontiff. But if all the churches have either been unharmed or those which were ruined have been repaired, if each bishop wishes to obtain the thirds owed to him in accordance with the institutions of the ancient canons, he will have complete power to do so, yet in such a way that, apart from those thirds, no bishop exact anything from the parochial churches for royal requisitions, nor presume to give anyone anything from the estates of those churches as a stipend. § 1. But we have also judged it necessary to establish this: that several churches are by no means to be committed to one priest, because by himself he is able neither to discharge the office throughout all the churches nor to expend the necessary care upon their property. We command this under the following reasoning: that a church which has up to ten bondservants shall have a priest over it, but one which has fewer shall be joined to other churches. If any of the bishops despises this institution of ours, let him know that he is punished with excommunication for the space of two months.

> C. III. Non accipiant episcopi tertiam, nisi dirutas ecclesias reparare uoluerint.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano. [XVI., c. 5.] Unio nostrae congregationis decernit atque instituit, ut tertias, quas antiqui canones de parrochiis suis habere episcopos censuerunt, si eas exigendas crediderint, ab ipsis episcopis dirutae ecclesiae reparentur. Si uero eas maluerint cedere, ab earundem ecclesiarum cultoribus sub cura et sollicitudine sui pontificis reparatio eisdem est adhibenda basilicis. Quod si omnes ecclesiae aut incolumes fuerint, aut que dirutae erant reparatae extiterint, secundum antiquorum canonum instituta, si tertias sibi debitas unusquisque episcopus assequi uoluerit, facultas illi omnimoda erit, ita uidelicet, ut citra ipsas tertias nullus episcoporum quippiam pro regiis inquisitionibus a parrochitanis ecclesiis exigat, nichilque de prediis ipsarum ecclesiarum cuiquam causa stipendii dare presumat. §. 1. Sed et hoc necessarium instituere duximus, ut plures ecclesiae uni nequaquam conmittantur presbitero, quia solus per totas ecclesias nec offitium ualet persoluere, nec rebus earum necessariam curam inpendere, ea scilicet ratione precipimus, ut ecclesia, que usque ad decem habuerit mancipia, super se habeat sacerdotem, que uero minus aliis coniungatur ecclesiis. Si quis sane episcoporum hanc nostram institutionem paruipenderit, duorum mensium spatio se nouerit excommunicatione mulctari.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pelagius to the illustrious Cresconius. We wish you by every means to guard this: that no bishop of Sicily presume to receive more than two solidi under the name of the cathedraticum from the parishes pertaining to him, nor compel the priests or clergy of their parishes to prepare banquets for them beyond their means.

> C. IV. De eodem.
> Item Pelagius Cresconio Illustri. Illud te modis omnibus uolumus custodire, ne quis episcoporum Siciliae de parrochiis ad se pertinentibus nomine cathedratici amplius quam duos solidos presumat accipere, neque conpellere presbiteros aut clerum parrochiarum suarum supra uires suas eis conuiuia preparare.

C. V. Let no number be imposed upon those to be baptized, nor let the cathedraticum be exacted beyond ancient custom.

Likewise Pope Gelasius to Bishop Fabian. Nor is it justly believed that a number is to be imposed upon those to be baptized, since as many as have sought it or hastened to regeneration are not to be repelled according to the will of another. And therefore, brother, you will by every means remove a superfluous constitution of this kind, so that each may be baptized either in the church neighboring him or in one chosen according to the judgment of his own mind. Know also that the cathedraticum is to be exacted from the priest of that place no further than shall be established to belong to ancient custom, and concerning those things which on the day of dedication shall have been conferred by the devotion of those making offerings, you will preserve the custom which is generally prescribed for all churches. PART II. GRATIAN. The cathedraticum which by these authorities bishops are permitted to exact is to be understood as apart from the half or third part of the offerings which, according to the varied custom of the churches, is owed to the bishop by the foregoing authorities; nor is that part to be understood generally concerning all offerings, but either those of the anniversary of dedication or also those of certain solemn days, according to what shall have been agreed between the bishop and the priest at the time of dedication. But concerning those bishops who rage cruelly through their parishes, it was established thus in the Third Council of Toledo, [c. 20]:

> C. V. Baptizandis numerus non inponatur, nec cathedraticum ultra morem uetustum exigatur.
> Item Gelasius Papa Fabiano Episcopo. Nec numerus baptizandis iuste creditur inponendus, cum quanti petierint uel ad regenerationem festinauerint non sint pro alterius uoluntate repellendi. Et ideo, frater, huiusmodi superfluam constitutionem modis omnibus remouebis, ut unusquisque aut in uicina sibi ecclesia, aut in electa pro suae mentis baptizetur arbitrio. Cathedraticum etiam non amplius, quam uetusti moris esse constiterit, ab eius loci presbitero noueris exigendum, et de his, que die dedicationis fuerint offerentium deuotione collata, consuetudinem, que generaliter omnibus ecclesiis est prescripta, seruabis. II. Pars. Gratian. Cathedraticum, quod his auctoritatibus episcopis permittitur exigere, preter medietatem uel tertiam partem oblationum, que pro uaria ecclesiarum consuetudine ex premissis auctoritatibus episcopo debetur, intelligendum est, nec illa pars oblationum omnium generaliter intelligenda est, sed uel anniuersariae dedicationis, uel quorumdam etiam solempnium dierum, prout inter episcopum et sacerdotem tempore dedicationis conuenerit. De his uero episcopis, qui per parrochias suas crudeliter deseuiunt, sic statutum est in tertio Concilio Tolletano: [c. 20.]

C. VI. Let bishops exact nothing from parochial priests beyond ancient custom.

Because we have learned that bishops rage through their parishes not in a priestly manner but cruelly, and since it is written, "Be an example to the flock, not as lording it over the clergy," but they inflict exactions or losses upon their diocese, we therefore judge that—except for what the constitutions of the ancients command bishops to have from the parishes—the other things which have hitherto been presumed be denied to them; that is, let neither priests nor deacons be wearied by forced services or any assessments, lest we appear to be called exactors rather than pontiffs of God in the church of God. But let those clerics, both local and diocesan, who know themselves to be burdened by the bishop not delay in carrying their complaints to the metropolitan, and let the metropolitan not delay in turning away presumptions of this kind.

> C. VI. Ultra morem antiquum a parrochianis presbiteris nichil episcopi exigant.

Quia cognouimus episcopos per parrochias suas non sacerdotaliter, sed crudeliter deseuire, et dum scriptum sit: "Forma estote gregi, non ut dominantes in clerum" qui exactiones diocesi suae uel dampna infligunt ideo censemus (excepto, quod ueterum constitutiones a parrochiis habere iubent episcopos), ut alia illis, que hucusque presumpta sunt, denegentur, hoc est, neque in angariis presbiteri aut diacones, neque aliquibus fatigentur indictionibus, ne uideamur in ecclesia Dei exactores potius quam Dei pontifices nominari. Hii uero clerici, tam locales quam diocesiani, qui se ab episcopo grauari cognouerint, querelas suas ad metropolitanum non differant deferre, et metropolitanus non moretur eiusmodi presumptiones auertere.

C. VII. Let bishops exact provisions from parishioners only with charity.

Likewise from the Second Council of Chalon, [c. 14]. Certainly care must be taken lest, when bishops travel through their parishes, they exercise a certain tyranny not only toward subjects but also toward associates; lest—which God forbid—they exact provisions from them not with charity but with a certain rashness of boasting, nor with the giving of thanks but with a certain judicial contrivance. It must by every means be observed that, if at any time the necessity of traveling through the parishes falls upon them, they apply themselves, in confirming men, inquiring into matters worthy of amendment, preaching the word of God, and gaining souls, rather than in plundering and despoiling men and scandalizing brothers. And if at any time something is to be received by them from their subjects or brothers for carrying out their ministry, they ought above all to observe this: that they scandalize or burden no one. Such discretion, therefore, is to be maintained in this matter that a preacher of the word of God, where his own resources are lacking, receives from the brothers, and the same brothers are not burdened by his power, after the example of the apostle Paul, who, lest he burden anyone, sought his sustenance by craft and by his hands.

C. VII. A parrochianis stipendia non nisi cum karitate episcopi exigant.

Item ex Concilio Cabillonensi. [II. c. 14.] Cauendum sane est, ne, cum episcopi per parrochias suas peragrant, quandam non solum erga subditos sed erga socios tyrannidem exerceant, ne (quod absit, cum karitate, sed cum quadam iactantiae temeritate nec cum gratiarum actione, sed cum quadam iudiciaria in inuentione stipendia ab eis exigant. Obseruandum modis omnibus est, ut, si quando eis peragrandae parrochiae necessitas incumbit, in confirmandis hominibus, in inquirendis rebus emendatione dignis, in predicatione uerbi Dei, in lucris animarum potius quam in depredandis et spoliandis hominibus et scandalizandis fratribus operam dent. Et si quando eis ad peragendum ministerium suum a subditis aut a fratribus aliquid accipiendum est, hoc summopere obseruare debent, ne quem scandalizent aut grauent. Tanta ergo discretio in hac re tenenda est, ut uerbi Dei predicator, ubi proprii sumptus desunt, a fratribus accipiat, et idem fratres illius potentia non grauentur, exemplo apostoli Pauli, qui, ne quem grauaret, arte et manibus uictum querebat.

C. VIII. Let a bishop not presume to receive more than two solidi from parochial churches.

Likewise from the Eighth Council of Toledo, [c. 4]. Finally, among the other things which it fittingly became us to consider by common consent, it was also fitting most carefully to discern the complaints of the parochial priests of the province of Galicia, which necessity, as we have learned, finally compelled to be brought to public examination against the rapacity of their pontiffs. For these pontiffs, as a manifest inquiry disclosed, burdening the parochial churches with indiscriminate governance, while they frequently persist in superfluous exactions, are proved to have brought certain basilicas almost to the emptying of their last strength. Therefore, lest what is established to have hitherto been presumed inordinately be done henceforth, let each bishop of the aforesaid province request that no more than two solidi be furnished to him by an annual payment throughout the individual dioceses or basilicas, in accordance with the Synod of Braga, yet with the basilicas of monasteries separated from the expense of this payment. § 1. But when a bishop visits a diocese, let him be burdensome to no one through the multitude of his company, nor ever exceed a number of fifty for his transport, or have permission to remain in each basilica for more than one day. § 2. But whichever of the same pontiffs presumes that action is to be taken otherwise than we have decreed will without doubt lie under the correction of the canons, as a transgressor of synodal constitutions and a corrupter of the edicts of the ancient Fathers.

C. VIII. Ultra duos solidos a parrochianis ecclesiis episcopus non presumat accipere.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano VIII. [c. 4.] Inter cetera denique, que communi consensu nos conferre conpetenter oportuit, querimonias etiam parrochialium presbiterorum Gallitiae prouinciae sollertissime discernere decuit, quas contra pontificum suorum rapacitates necessitas, ut conperimus, tandem conpulit in publicum examen deferri. Hii enim pontifices, ut euidens inquisitio patefecit, indiscreto moderamine parrochitanas ecclesias pregrauantes, dum in exactionibus superfluis frequenter existunt, pene usque ad exinanitionem extremae uirtutis quasdam basilicas perduxisse probantur. Ne ergo fiat de cetero quod constat hactenus inordinate presumptum, non amplius quam duos solidos unusquisque episcoporum prefatae prouinciae per singulas dioceses uel basilicas iuxta sinodum Bracarensem annua illatione sibi expetet inferri, monasteriorum tamen basilicis ab hac solutionis expensione seiunctis. §. 1. Cum uero episcopus diocesim uisitat, nulli pre multitudine onerosus existat, nec umquam quinquagenarium numerum euectionis excedat, aut amplius quam una die per unamquamque basilicam remorandi licentiam habeat. §. 2. Quicumque uero pontificum eorundem aliter quam decreuimus agendum presumpserit, correctioni proculdubio canonum subiacebit tamquam constitutionum sinodalium transgressor et priscorum Patrum edictorum corruptor.

C. IX. Let priests not be burdened beyond measure by their bishops.

Likewise Gregory to the Bishops of Sicily, [book XI, letter 20]. It was reported to us that, in the times of my predecessor of holy memory, it was arranged through the deacon Servusdei, who then exercised care for the ecclesiastical patrimony, that the priests established throughout all your dioceses ought by no means to be burdened beyond measure whenever you go forth to sign infants. For a sum had been fixed, with you consenting, as I hear, which ought to be given by those priests for the labor of the clerics. And what was resolved then, as is now said, is by no means observed. Hence I admonish your fraternity not to endeavor to be burdensome to your subjects.

C. IX. Sacerdotes ab episcopis suis ultra modum non grauentur.

Item Gregorius Episcopis Siciliae. [lib. XI. ep. 20.] Relatum est nobis, sanctae memoriae decessoris mei temporibus per Seruum dei diaconem, qui tunc ecclesiastici patrimonii curam gessit, fuisse dispositum, ut sacerdotes per uniuersas uestras dioceses constituti, quociens ad consignandos infantes egredimini, ultra modum grauari minime debuissent. Summa enim prefixa fuerat, uobis, ut audio, consentientibus, que ab eis sacerdotibus pro labore clericorum dari debuisset. Atque hoc, quod tunc placuit, sicut nunc dicitur, minime custoditur. Unde fraternitatem uestram admoneo, ut subiectis uestris graues non studeatis existere.

C. X. Let banquets be prepared for bishops according to the modest means of the place.

Likewise Pope Pelagius to the illustrious Cresconius. We by no means wish your greatness to be ignorant that the Bishop of the city of Syracuse, among the other things which he pledged on the page of his guarantees, is read also to have specially promised this under the interposition of a lawful penalty: that he would never seek from any priest of his diocese more than two solidi under the name of the cathedraticum, nor through any other occasion would he do anything to his detriment. Let your greatness not cease to guard this with competent solicitude not only concerning the aforesaid bishop but concerning the persons of all the bishops of Sicily; nor let the dinners themselves be made enormous, but let a banquet of reception be prepared for each bishop who comes for confirmation according to the modest means of the place, because we neither wish losses to be inflicted upon the poor under that pretext nor permit it under any reasoning.

> C. X. Secundum loci mediocritatem episcopis conuiuia parentur.
> Item Pelagius Papa Cresconio Illustri. Illud magnitudinem tuam minime uolumus ignorare, quod Siracusanae ciuitatis episcopus inter alia, que in cautionum suarum pagina spopondit, hoc etiam specialiter sub interpositione penae legitime promisisse legitur, numquam se a quolibet diocesis suae presbitero ultra duos solidos cathedratici nomine petiturum, nec per quamlibet aliam occasionem quicquam in eius dispendio se esse gesturum. Quod magnitudo tua non solum a predicto episcopo, sed de omnium episcoporum Siciliae personis conpetenti sollicitudine custodire non desinat, nec ipsa quoque prandia enormia fieri, sed secundum mediocritatem loci uniuscuiusque episcopo ad consignationem uenienti susceptionis parare conuiuium, quia nec eo pretextu pauperibus incuti dampna uolumus aut qualibet ratione permittimus.

Causa XI

GRATIAN. A cleric conducted a dispute concerning estates against another cleric, whom he wished to bring before a civil judge; the defendant wished to stand only before an ecclesiastical judge. But the plaintiff, through the power of the civil judge, cast him from his possession. When the bishop heard this, he suspended him from office; he, despising the sentence of his bishop, administered his office. When this was learned, the bishop gave a sentence against him without hope of restoration. (Qu. I.) Here it is first asked whether a cleric is to be brought before a civil judge. (Qu. II.) Second, if he is not to be brought, whether this fault is worthy of suspension. (Qu. III.) Third, if it was not worthy, whether one who despises the sentence of his bishop ought to be irreparably deposed.

> GRATIANUS. Clericus aduersus clericum questionem de prediis agitauit, quem ad ciuilem iudicem producere uoluit reus non nisi ante iudicem ecclesiasticum stare uolebat; actor uero potentia ciuilis iudicis illum a possessione sua deiecit. Quo audito episcopus eum ab offitio suspendit; ille contempta episcopi sui sententia offitium suum administrauit. Hoc conperto episcopus sine spe restitutionis in eum sententiam dedit. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, utrum clericus ante ciuilem iudicem sit producendus? (Qu. II.) Secundo, si producendus non est, an hec culpa sit digna suspensione? (Qu. III.) Tertio, si digna non fuerit, an contemptorem sententiae sui episcopi inreparabiliter oporteat deponi?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. That a cleric is not to be accused before secular judges Pope Caius writes, [letter to Bishop Felix, c. 2], saying:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod clericus apud seculares iudices accusandus non sit, Caius Papa [epistola ad Felicem Episcopum cap. 2.] scribit, dicens:

C. I. Let no cleric be summoned before a secular judge.

Let no one ever presume to accuse a bishop or the remaining clerics before a secular judge.

> C. I. Apud secularem iudicem nullus clericus conueniatur.
> Nemo umquam episcopum aut reliquos clericos apud iudicem secularem accusare presumat.

[PALEA. C. II.

Let none of the judges by himself distrain or presume to condemn a priest, deacon, any cleric, or juniors of the church without the pontiff's permission. But if he has done so, let him be sequestered from the church to which he is known to have inflicted injury until he recognizes and amends his guilt.]

> [PALEA. C. II.
> Nullus iudicum neque presbiterum, neque diaconum, aut clericum ullum, aut iuniores ecclesiae sine licentia pontificis per se distringat aut condempnare presumat. Quod si fecerit, ab ecclesia, cui iniuriam inrogare dinoscitur, tamdiu sit sequestratus, quousque reatum suum agnoscat et emendet.]

C. III. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Marcellinus, [letter II]. Let no one presume to draw a cleric of any order to secular judgment without the permission of his pontiff, nor let a layman be permitted to accuse any cleric.

> C. III. De eodem.
> Item Marcellinus Papa. [epist. II.] Clericum cuiuslibet ordinis absque pontificis sui permissu nullus presumat ad seculare iudicium attrahere, nec laico quemlibet clericum liceat accusare.

C. IV. Each person is to be judged by those whom he has chosen as judges for himself.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea. There ought to be no other judges except those whom the one who is assailed has personally chosen, or those whom this holy see with his consent, or its primates by authority of this holy see, have delegated.

> C. IV. Ab eis quisque iudicandus est, quos sibi iudices elegerit.
> Item ex Concilio Niceno. Iudices alii non debent esse, nisi quos ipse, qui inpetitur, elegerit, aut quos suo consensu hec sancta sedes aut eius primates auctoritate huius sanctae sedis delegauerint.

C. V. No cleric is to be dragged to secular judgments.

Likewise Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius. By a perpetual law we decree that no bishops or those who serve the necessities of the church be dragged to the judgments either of ordinary or extraordinary judges. They have their own judges, nor do they share anything with these public laws.

Likewise: § 1. Constantine, presiding in the holy synod which was assembled at Nicaea, when he perceived that the complaint of certain persons was to be brought before him, said: You can be judged by no one, because you are reserved for the judgment of God alone.

[PALEA.

> C. V. Ad secularia iudicia nullus clericus est pertrahendus.
> Item Valentinianus, Theodosius et Archadius. Continua lege sancimus, ut nullus episcoporum uel eorum, qui ecclesiae necessitatibus seruiunt, ad iudicia siue ordinariorum siue extraordinariorum iudicum pertrahantur. Habent illi suos iudices, nec quicquam his publicis est commune cum legibus. Item: §. 1. Constantinus presidens in sancta sinodo, que apud Nicenam congregata est, cum querelam quorumdam conspiceret coram se deferendam, ait: Vos a nemine diiudicari potestis, quia ad Dei iudicium solius reseruamini.
> [PALEA.

C. VI. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the First Council of Mâcon, c. 8. Let no cleric presume in any way to accuse another cleric before a secular judge or draw him to plead a case; rather, let every matter of clerics be concluded either before his bishop or before priests in the presence of the archdeacon. But if any cleric has delayed fulfilling this, if he is of lower rank, let him receive one less than forty blows; but if he is more honorable, let him be punished with confinement for thirty days.]

[PALEA.

> C. VI. De eodem.
>
> Item ex Concilio Matisconensi I., c. 8. Nullus clericus alium clericum ad iudicem secularem accusare, aut ad causam dicendam trahere quocumque modo presumat, sed omne negotium clericorum aut in episcopi sui, aut presbiterorum cum archidiaconi presentia finiatur. Quod si quis clericus hoc adinplere distulerit, si minor fuerit, uno minus de quadraginta ictus accipiat, si uero honoratior, triginta dierum inclusione mulctetur.]
> [PALEA.

C. VII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Marcellinus, letter II to the Eastern Bishops. Whatever contentions have arisen among Christians, let them be carried to the church and terminated by ecclesiastical men. And if they refuse to obey, let them be excluded from the thresholds of the church until they obey.]

> C. VII. De eodem.
>
> Item Marcellinus epistola II. ad Episcopos orientales. Quecumque contentiones inter Christianos ortae fuerint, ad ecclesiam deferantur, et ab ecclesiasticis uiris terminentur. Et si obedire noluerint, quousque obediant a liminibus ecclesiae excludantur.]

C. VIII. A bishop shall be brought before a civil judge neither for a civil nor a criminal case.

Likewise Boniface to the Bishops of Gaul. Let no bishop be brought or presented before any judge, whether civil or military, either for a civil or a criminal case. For a magistrate who has dared to order this will be struck with condemnation by loss of his belt of office.

C. VIII. Neque pro ciuili, neque pro criminali causa episcopus apud ciuilem iudicem producatur.

Item Bonifatius ad Episcopos Galliae. Nullus episcopus neque pro ciuili, neque pro criminali causa apud quemuis iudicem siue ciuilem siue militarem producatur uel exhibeatur. Magistratus enim, qui hoc iubere ausus fuerit, amissione cinguli condempnatione plectetur.

C. IX. No cleric is to be examined in public.

Likewise Pope Sylvester, [in the Roman Synod, c. 14]. Let no one receive the testimony of a cleric against a layman; let no one presume to examine any cleric in public, but only in the church. [GRATIAN.] In book I of the Code, title On Bishops and Clerics, Emperor Theodosius: Let a bishop be demanded for testimony neither by honor nor by the laws. § 1. Likewise: It is not fitting that a bishop be admitted for giving testimony, for both his person is honored and, when his dignity is excepted, that of a priest is confounded. A new constitution. Let him not be demanded for testimony under oath, but only with the Gospels placed before him. § 1. Likewise: But let the judge send to him some of his ministers, so that, with the sacrosanct Gospels placed before them, they may say what they know, in the manner fitting priests.

C. IX. Quilibet clericus non est in publico examinandus.

Item Siluester Papa. [in Sinodo Romana, c. 14.] Testimonium clerici aduersus laicum nemo recipiat nemo clericum quemlibet in publico examinare presumat nisi in ecclesia. [Gratian.] Codicis libro I. titulo de episcopis et clericis, Inperator Theodosius: Nec honore, nec legibus episcopus ad testimonium flagitetur. §. 1. Item: Episcopum ad testimonium dicendum admitti non decet nam et persona honoratur, et dignitas sacerdotis excepta confunditur. Nouella Constitutio. Non flagitetur ad testimonium iureiurando sed euangeliis tantum coram positis. §. 1. Item: Sed iudex mittat ad eum ex suis ministris, ut propositis sacrosanctis euangeliis, secundum quod decet sacerdotes, dicant que nouerunt.

C. X. Let a cleric who brings another cleric before a civil judge be anathema.

The same. If any cleric, accusing a cleric, has entered the court, let him be anathema. GRATIAN. It is to be understood: if he has sought cognizance of public judgments; for it does no harm to request an episcopal judgment from the emperor. Hence it is read in the Eighth Council of Carthage:

C. X. Clericus ad ciuilem iudicem clericum producens anathema sit.

Idem. Si quis clericus accusans clericum in curiam introierit, anathema sit. Gratian. Subaudiendum est, si publicorum iudiciorum cognitionem petierit; episcopale namque iudicium nichil obest ab inperatore postulare. Unde in Cartaginensi Concilio VIII. legitur:

C. XI. Let one who seeks cognizance of a public judgment from the emperor be deprived of his proper honor.

It was resolved that whoever seeks cognizance of public judgments from the emperor be deprived of his proper honor. But if he has sought an episcopal judgment from the emperor, let it not harm him. GRATIAN. Thus also the following authorities are to be understood, by which it is commanded that only clerics take cognizance of the cases of clerics. Hence Pope Gelasius writes to Count Zeia:

C. XI. Proprio priuetur honore publici iudicii cognitionem ab inperatore postulans.

Placuit, ut quicumque ab inperatore cognitionem publicorum iudiciorum petierit, honore proprio priuetur. Si autem episcopale iudicium ab inperatore postulauerit, nichil ei obsit. Gratian. Sic et sequentes auctoritates intelligendae sunt, quibus clericorum causas non nisi clerici cognoscere iubentur. Unde Gelasius Papa scribit Zeiae Comiti:

C. XII. A cleric is not to be heard by a secular judge.

It ought always to be pleasing to Christians that what is requested from their dignity be furnished, because it is not fitting to deny a benefit to those serving God. Sylvester and Faustinian, who confess that they have been clerics from their cradles, complain that they are oppressed by Theodora through violence: that although they say that they are freeborn and, with God as author, absolved from the bonds of their former condition, they are being consigned again to the lot of the worst servitude; and that by royal authority, contrary to the public laws, although they were long ago bound by the clerical belt, they were summoned through the archdeacon of the city of Grumentum, although it is established that one who assails a soldier of heaven ought to follow only his tribunal. And therefore, beloved, with the expression of the salutation due, I commend the aforesaid clerics to you, so that, if their adversaries despise coming to the judgment of the delegates, they may be fortified by the protection of your highness, lest either deception or violence hostile to the laws impose anything of necessity upon them, because one who flees judgment appears to distrust justice.

C. XII. A seculari iudice clericus non est audiendus.

Christianis gratum semper debet esse, quod ab eorum poscitur dignitate prestandum, quia Deo seruientibus beneficium negare non conuenit. Siluester atque Faustinianus, qui se a cunabulis clericos confitentur, a Theodora se obprimi conqueruntur per uiolentiam, quod dicant se ingenuos atque auctore Deo pristinae conditionis nexibus absolutos, in sortem deterrimae iterum seruitutis addici, ac per auctoritatem regiam contra leges publicas, cum clericali cingulo olim tenerentur astricti, per archidiaconem urbis Grumentinae esse conuentos, cum constet eum, qui celestem militem pulsat, non nisi eius forum debere sectari. Et ideo, dilecte, depensae salutationis affatu, supradictos clericos tibi conmendo, ut, si ad delegatorum iudicium eorum aduersarii uenire contempserint, sublimitatis tuae tuitione uallentur, ne quid illis aut subreptio, aut inimica legibus uiolentia necessitatis inponat, quia qui iudicium refugit apparet eum de iustitia diffisum.

C. XIII. Let a cleric be summoned only to the judgment of bishops.

The same to Bishops Crispus and Sabinus. Sylvester and Faustinian, clerics of the church of Grumentum, complained to us in a tearful disclosure that the freedom granted to them by the kindness of their master is assailed by the oppression of his heirs, and that they, having served in the office of the clericate almost from their cradles and, even while the manumitter was living, nevertheless having remained established in the same status, are not permitted to devote service to the divine ministries; although, if truth supports their petition, inheritance is taken away by the laws from those opposing the deed of their father and author as unworthy persons, nor are those taking the inheritance permitted to rise up against the judgment of their author. And therefore, dearest brothers, because they also complain that they are oppressed by the archdeacon of the aforesaid church, who, during their absence, promised that they would follow the judgment of a governor, with all things trampled underfoot, and thought his own tribunal was being taken away from those assailed contrary to divine and public laws, let whoever he is who has assailed a cleric come to your judgment, so that the rights of the church, which ancient princes confirmed by continual sanction, may not be denied to the clerics assailed.

> C. XIII. Non nisi ad episcoporum iudicium clericus deuocetur.
> Idem Crispo et Sabino Episcopis. Siluester et Faustinianus ecclesiae Grumentinae clerici lacrimosa nobis insinuatione conquesti sunt, libertatem sibi domini sui benignitate concessam heredum eius obpressione pulsari, sibique in clericatus offitio pene a cunabulis seruientibus, etiam manumissore uiuente, in eodem actu nichilominus constitutis, diuinis ministeriis inpendere seruitium non licere, cum, si petitionem ueritas subsequatur, contra patris et auctoris sui factum uenientibus ut indignis hereditas legibus auferatur, nec eis liceat hereditatem capientibus contra auctoris sui prosilire iudicium. Et ideo, fratres karissimi, quoniam se etiam ab archidiacono predictae ecclesiae queruntur obpressos, qui per eorum absentiam moderatoris iudicium promisit eos esse secuturos, calcatis omnibus, et que contra leges diuinas et publicas pulsatis forum suum putauit auferri, in uestro iudicio, quisquis ille est, qui clericum lacesserit, adueniat, ut ecclesiae iura, que uetusti principes assidua sanctione firmauerunt, inpetitis clericis non negentur.

C. XIV. Let priests not be accused before a civil judge.

Likewise Alexander to all the orthodox serving Christ the Lord throughout the various provinces, [letter I, c. 1]. It has been reported to the summit of this holy and apostolic see, to which the arrangements of the greatest cases and the affairs of all churches were entrusted by the Lord Himself, as to the head, He Himself saying, "You are Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church," that certain rivals of Christ and plotters against His holy church presume to accuse the priests of God before public judges, although the Apostle commands rather that the cases of Christians be brought to the churches and terminated there. Those transgressing in such a manner have transgressed against their God and do not obey His commands.

> C. XIV. Ante ciuilem iudicem sacerdotes non accusentur.
> Item Alexander omnibus orthodoxis, per diuersas prouincias Christo Domino famulantibus. [ep. I. c. 1.] Relatum est ad huius sanctae et apostolicae sedis apicem, cui summarum dispositiones causarum et omnium negotia ecclesiarum ab ipso Domino tradita sunt, quasi ad caput, ipso dicente: "Tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram edificabo ecclesiam meam," quod quidam emuli Christi, eiusque sanctae ecclesiae insidiatores, sacerdotes Dei ad iudices publicos accusare presumant, cum magis apostolus Christianorum causas ad ecclesias deferri et ibidem terminari precipiat. Taliter preuaricantes preuaricauerunt in Deum suum, et non obediunt preceptis eius.

C. XV. Let the plaintiff follow the forum of the defendant.

Likewise Pelagius to Benegestus the Defender. By the present authority we command your Experience that, in cases in which any person holding ecclesiastical office stands as plaintiff and is about to sue any layman, he not fail to present his actions before the judge of his own province.

But in those matters in which a person holding ecclesiastical office is sued, with every obstacle to the suit removed, let him resort without distinction to the examination of the bishop or of the priests established in the place where the question is being litigated.

> C. XV. Actor forum rei sequatur.
> Item Pelagius Benegesto Defensori. Experientiae tuae presenti auctoritate mandamus, ut in causis, in quibus quelibet ecclesiastici offitii persona loco petitoris existit quemquam laicum pulsatura, apud suae prouinciae iudicem suas proponere non deserat actiones.

In his uero negotiis, in quibus ecclesiastici offitii persona pulsatur, totius submoto pulsationis obstaculo ad episcopi uel presbiterorum, in loco, ubi questio uertitur, constitutorum, occurrat indifferenter examen.

C. XVI. Concerning the same.

The same to Sergius the Chancellor. If any cleric, whether of lower or higher rank, stands as plaintiff and directs his actions against a lay person, he shall by every means resort to state his case nowhere other than before the judge of the province. But if any layman has determined that a cleric of any rank is to be sued, let him present before the judgment of the bishops established in that city or territory those actions which he considers himself to possess. That rule which commands the plaintiff always to follow the forum of the one sued makes manifest that this order is demonstrated to be in every respect fitting and consonant with the laws. And the authority of imperial enactments also declares that the forum for clerics who are sued lies in episcopal judgment. Likewise it is read in the Council of Agde, [c. 32]:

C. XVI. De eodem.

Idem Sergio Cancellario. Si quisquam clericus, siue inferioris siue potioris gradus, petitor existat, et contra laicam personam suas dirigat actiones, iste modis omnibus non alibi quam apud prouinciae iudicem negotium suum dicturus occurrat. Si quis autem laicus clericum cuiuscumque gradus duxerit esse pulsandum, ad episcoporum iudicium in eadem ciuitate uel territorio constitutorum proponat eas quas se existimat habere actiones. Quem ordinem legibus per omnia conuenientem atque consentaneum demonstrari illa regula manifestat, que precipit actorem forum semper sequi pulsati. Clericis uero pulsatis in episcopali iudicio forum conpetere, principalium quoque sanctionum designat auctoritas. Item in Concilio Agatensi [c. 32.] legitur:

C. XVII. Unless the bishop permits it, a cleric ought not to be sued before a secular judge.

Let no one presume to sue a cleric before a secular judge when the bishop does not permit it; but if he has been sued, let him neither answer nor plead, nor dare to present a criminal matter in secular judgment.

C. XVII. Episcopo non permittente apud secularem iudicem clericus pulsari non debet.

Clericum nullus presumat apud secularem iudicem episcopo non permittente pulsare; sed, si pulsatus fuerit, non respondeat uel proponat, nec audeat criminale negotium in iudicio seculari proponere.

C. XVIII. A cleric disobedient to his bishop shall be deposed and handed over to the curia.

Likewise Pope Pius, [letter II]. If any of the priests or remaining clerics has been disobedient to his bishop, or has prepared snares for him, or inflicted insult, calumny, or abuse upon him, and can be convicted, let him immediately be deposed and handed over to the curia, and let him receive what he has unjustly done.

C. XVIII. Clericus suo inobediens episcopo depositus curiae tradatur.

Item Pius Papa. [epist. II.] Si quis sacerdotum uel reliquorum clericorum suo episcopo inobediens fuerit, aut ei insidias parauerit, aut contumeliam, aut calumpniam, uel conuicia intulerit, et conuinci potuerit, mox depositus curiae tradatur, et recipiat quod inique gessit.

C. XIX. Let imperial authority restrain one who has refused to abandon the congregation he invaded.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 38]. We request that you deign to give us confidence whereby, when necessity itself compels, we may be free, in accordance with the statutes of the most glorious princes, to approach the governor of the province against that man who, though admonished even to this day, refuses to relinquish the congregation which he had invaded, as had been established, so that one who has refused to acquiesce in the mild admonition of your holiness and to amend what is illicit may immediately be excluded by judicial authority. Bishop Aurelius said: With the form of discipline preserved, he will not be judged to have been assailed if, after being modestly admonished by your charity, he has refused to withdraw, since through his own contempt and contumacy he has caused himself to be summoned by judicial authority. Bishops Honoratus and Urban said: This therefore pleases all.

C. XIX. Principalis coherceat auctoritas qui plebem inuasam deserere noluerit.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 38.] Petimus, ut dignemini dare fiduciam, qua necessitate ipsa cogente liberum nobis sit rectorem prouinciae secundum statuta gloriosissimorum principum aduersus illum adire, qui plebem, quam inuaserat, usque hodie conmonitus, secundum quod statutum fuerat, relinquere contempnit, ut qui miti admonitioni sanctitatis uestrae acquiescere noluerit et emendare illicitum, auctoritate iudiciaria protinus excludatur. Aurelius episcopus dixit: Seruata forma disciplinae non existimabitur inpetitus, si uestra karitate modeste conuentus recedere detrectauerit, cum fuerit suo contemptu et contumacia faciente iudiciaria auctoritate conuentus. Honoratus et Urbanus episcopi dixerunt: Hoc ergo omnibus placet.

C. XX. Let those whom the church is unable to correct be corrected by princes.

Likewise Gregory. This is what we requested from you and now request again: that you send Paulinus, the pseudo-bishop of Aquileia, and that Bishop of Milan to the most merciful prince under suitable custody, so that the former, who can in no way be a bishop because he was made contrary to every canonical custom, may no longer destroy others, and the latter, who presumed to ordain him contrary to ancient custom, may be subjected to the vengeance of the canons.

C. XX. A principibus corrigantur quos ecclesia corrigere non ualet.

Item Gregorius. Istud est, quod a uobis poposcimus et nunc iterum postulamus, ut Paulinum Aquileiensem pseudoepiscopum, et illum Mediolanensem episcopum ad clementissimum principem sub digna custodia dirigatis, ut et iste, qui episcopus esse nullatenus potest, quia contra omnem canonicam consuetudinem factus est, alios ultra non perdat, et ille, qui contra morem antiquum eum ordinare presumpsit, canonum uindictae subiaceat.

C. XXI. Let clerics who enter conjurations or conspiracies lose their proper rank.

Likewise in the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 18]. The crime of conjurations and conspiracies, which among the Greeks is called a phratria, is certainly also altogether prohibited by the public laws. Much more is it fitting to banish its occurrence in the holy church of God. But if any clerics or monks are found entering conjurations or conspiracies, or forming phratriae or any factions against their bishops or others, let them by every means fall from their proper rank.

C. XXI. Proprium gradum amittant clerici coniurantes uel conspirantes.

Item in Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 18.] Coniurationum et conspirationum crimen, quod apud Grecos dicitur fratria, publicis etiam legibus certum est penitus inhiberi. Hoc multo magis in sancta Dei ecclesia ne fiat conuenit abdicari. Si qui uero clerici seu monachi inuenti fuerint coniurantes aut conspirantes, aut fratrias uel factiones conponentes aliquas suis episcopis aut aliis, omnimodo cadant de proprio gradu.

C. XXII. Let conspiring clerics, after losing their proper rank, be confined in prison; let the others be excommunicated.

Likewise Pope Callistus, [letter II to the Bishops of Gaul]. We have heard that the crimes of conspiracy flourish in your regions, and it has been reported to us that congregations conspire against their bishops. The cunning of this crime is abominable not only among Christians but also among pagans, and it is prohibited by external laws. Therefore not only ecclesiastical laws but also secular laws condemn those guilty of this crime, and not only the conspirators but also those consenting to them. Moreover, our predecessors, together with a very great multitude of bishops, commanded that any of them who are placed in priestly honor or are clerics be deprived of the honor which they exercise; but they ordered the others to be deprived of communion and made exiles from the church, and they judged all the men of both orders together to be infamous—not only those committing the deeds, but also those consenting to them.

C. XXII. Clerici conspirantes proprio gradu amisso retrudantur in carcerem ceteri excommunicentur.

Item Calixtus Papa. [Episcopis Galliae, epist. II.] Conspirationum crimina uestris in partibus uigere audiuimus, et, plebes contra episcopos suos conspirare nobis mandatum est; cuius criminis astutia non solum inter Christianos abhominabilis est, sed etiam inter ethnicos, et ab exteris legibus prohibita. Et idcirco huius criminis reos non solum ecclesiasticae, sed etiam seculi dampnant leges, et non solum conspirantes, sed etiam consentientes eis. Antecessores uero nostri cum plurima turba episcoporum, quicumque eorum in sacerdotali honore sunt positi aut existunt clerici, honore, quo utuntur, carere preceperunt; ceteros uero communione priuari et ab ecclesia extorres fieri iusserunt, omnesque simul utriusque ordinis uiros infames esse censuerunt, et non solum facientes, sed et eis consentientes.

C. XXIII. Let clerics or monks who enter conjurations be deprived of their proper honor.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 18]. If any clerics or monks are found entering conjurations or conspiracies, or laying snares for bishops or clerics, let them be cast entirely from their proper rank.

C. XXIII. Clerici aut monachi coniurantes proprio priuentur honore.

Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 18.] Si qui clerici uel monachi reperti fuerint coniurantes aut conspirantes, aut insidias ponentes episcopis aut clericis, gradu proprio penitus abiciantur.

C. XXIV. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Toledo. If clerics or monks are found entering conspiracies or contriving calumny against bishops or clerics through a conjuration, let them lose their proper rank.

> C. XXIV. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano. Si clerici aut monachi inuenti fuerint conspirantes, aut per coniurationem calumpniam machinantes episcopis uel clericis, proprium amittant gradum.

C. XXV. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, [III, c. 21]. If any of the clerics—as has most manifestly appeared to have been done recently in many places through pride at the devil's instigation—have gathered themselves into one body by rebellious authority through an intervening conspiracy, or if it has become evident that oaths were given among them or a document was drawn up, their presumption shall escape by no excuses; but when the matter has been disclosed and the synod has convened, let it be avenged upon the presumptuous persons, according to the quality of their persons and orders, by the pontiffs who shall then have assembled together, because just as charity, according to the divine precepts, is to be shown from the heart and not by the drafting of a document or by a conspiracy, so those things which are undertaken against the sacred scriptures are to be repressed by pontifical authority and severity.

> C. XXV. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [III. c. 21.] Si qui clericorum (ut nuper in multis locis per superbiam diabolo instigante actum fuisse perpatuit) rebelli auctoritate se in unum coniuratione intercedente collegerint, aut sacramenta inter se data, aut cartulam conscriptam fuisse patuerit, nullis excusationibus presumptio labetur; sed res detecta, cum in sinodum uentum fuerit, in presumptores iuxta personam et ordinum qualitatem a pontificibus, qui tunc in unum collecti fuerint, uindicetur, quia sicut karitas ex preceptis diuinis corde, non cartulae conscriptione uel coniuratione est exhibenda, ita que supra sacras admittuntur scripturas auctoritate et districtione pontificali sunt reprimenda.

C. XXVI. Let cases arising between clerics and laymen be heard by bishops.

Likewise Pope Innocent, [to Victricius of Rouen, letter II, c. 3]. If any cases or contentions have arisen between clerics and laymen, of both higher and also lower rank, it was resolved that judgment be terminated in accordance with the Nicene Synod, with all the bishops of the same province assembled. GRATIAN. Since, therefore, by all these authorities it is forbidden that clerics be produced before a civil judge, and since they are not to be presented to the curia unless they have first been deposed or stripped of office, it is evident that clerics are not to be dragged to secular judgments. PART II. § 1. The response to these things is as follows: clerics are subject to the bishop by reason of their office; by reason of possession of estates they are answerable to the emperor. From the bishop they receive anointing, tithes, and first fruits; but from the emperor they obtain possession of estates. Hence Augustine says on John: "By what law do you defend estates? By divine or human law, etc.?" Seek this at the beginning, where the difference between natural law and the law of enactment is designated. Because, therefore, it was brought about by imperial law that estates may be possessed, it is evident that clerics are answerable to the emperor by reason of possession of estates.

C. XXVI. Inter clericos et laicos causae exortae ab episcopis audiantur.

Item Innocentius Papa. [ad Victricium Rothomagensem, epist. II. cap. 3.] Si que causae uel contentiones inter clericos et laicos tam superioris ordinis quam etiam inferioris fuerint exortae, placuit, ut secundum sinodum Nicenam congregatis omnibus eiusdem prouinciae episcopis iudicium terminetur. Gratian. Cum ergo his omnibus auctoritatibus clerici ante ciuilem iudicem denegentur producendi, cum (nisi prius depositi, uel nudati fuerint) curiae non sunt representandi, patet, quod ad secularia iudicia clerici non sunt pertrahendi. II. Pars. §. 1. His ita respondetur: Clerici ex offitio sunt subpositi episcopo, ex possessionibus prediorum inperatori sunt obnoxii. Ab episcopo unctionem, decimationes et primitias accipiunt; ab inperatore uero prediorum possessiones nanciscuntur. Unde Augustinus ait super Iohannem: "Quo iure uillas defendis? diuino, an humano etc.?" Require in principio, ubi differentia designatur inter ius naturae et ius constitutionis. Quia ergo ut predia possideantur inperiali lege factum est, patet, quod clerici ex prediorum possessionibus inperatori sunt obnoxii.

C. XXVII. The church ought not to deny tribute to the emperor. Likewise Ambrose against Auxentius, [in the oration On Handing Over the Basilicas].

If the emperor seeks tribute, we do not deny it: let the fields of the church pay tribute. If the emperor desires the fields, he possesses the power to vindicate them. Let him take them, if it pleases him: I do not give them to the emperor, but I do not deny them.

C. XXVII. Imperatori tributum denegare ecclesia non debet. Item Ambrosius contra Auxentium. [in oratione de tradendis basilicis.]

Si tributum petit inperator, non negamus: agri ecclesiae soluant tributum. Si agros desiderat inperator, potestatem habet uendicandorum. Tollat eos, si libitum est: inperatori non dono, sed non nego.

C. XXVIII. Tributes are not to be denied to the powers.

The same, [in the commentaries on Luke c. 5, book IV, penultimate chapter]. It is indeed a great and spiritual lesson by which Christian men are taught that they ought to be subject to higher powers, lest anyone think that the enactment of an earthly king is to be dissolved. For if the Son of God paid the tax, who are you, so great that you think it is not to be paid? [GRATIAN.] Likewise the Apostle: “Let every soul be subject to the higher powers.” Likewise the apostle Peter writes generally to all the faithful: “Be subject to your lords, whether to the king as preeminent, or to governors as sent by him for the punishment of evildoers but the praise of the honorable.”

C. XXVIII. Potestatibus tributa non sunt deneganda.

Idem. [in commentariis ad c. 5. Lucae lib. IV. c. penult.] Magnum quidem est et spiritale documentum, quo Christiani uiri sublimioribus potestatibus docentur debere esse subiecti, ne quis constitutionem terreni regis putet esse soluendam. Si enim censum Filius Dei soluit, quis tu tantus es, qui non putas esse soluendum? [Gratian.] Item Apostolus: "Omnis anima sublimioribus potestatibus subdita sit." Item Petrus Apostolus generaliter fidelibus omnibus scribit: "Estote subditi dominis uestris siue regi, quasi precellenti, siue ducibus, tanquam ab eo missis ad uindictam malefactorum, laudem uero honorum."

C. XXIX. A bishop ought not to take cognizance of secular affairs.

Likewise from the letter of Clement, [I, to James the brother of the Lord]. You indeed ought to live blamelessly and strive with the greatest zeal to cast aside all occupations of this life: do not become a surety, do not become an advocate in lawsuits, nor be found at all entangled in any occupation by occasion of worldly business. For Christ does not wish to ordain you today either as judge or as examiner of secular affairs, lest, suffocated by the present cares of men, you be unable to devote yourself to the word of God. Therefore let laymen who are free for such things furnish one another these works which we have said are less fitting for you, and let no one occupy you away from those pursuits through which salvation is given to men.

C. XXIX. De secularibus negotiis episcopus cognoscere non debet.

Item ex epistola [I.] Clementis. [ad Iacobum fratrem Domini] Te quidem oportet inreprehensibiliter uiuere, et summo studio niti, ut omnes uitae huius occupationes abicias: ne fideiussor existas, ne aduocatus litium fias, neue in ulla aliqua occupatione prorsus inueniaris mundialis negotii occasione perplexus. Neque enim iudicem neque cognitorem secularium negotiorum hodie te ordinare uult Christus, ne prefocatus presentibus hominum curis non possis uerbo Dei uacare. Hec ergo opera, que minus tibi congruere diximus, exhibeant sibi inuicem uacantes laici et te nemo occupet ab his studiis, per que salus hominibus datur.

C. XXX. In those matters which pertain to the use of common life, let laymen furnish assistance to one another.

Likewise from the same. For just as it is a crime of impiety for you, O Clement, to undertake secular cares while neglecting the pursuits of the word of God, so it is a sin for each of the laity unless they faithfully furnish assistance to one another even in those things which pertain to the use of common life. But let all labor in common to make you free from those things to which you ought not to attend. But if perhaps the laity do not understand this by themselves, they are to be instructed through the deacons, so that they may leave to you the cares of the church alone. GRATIAN. From all these things it is given to be understood that in a civil case a cleric is to be convened before a civil judge. For just as an ecclesiastical judge is the administrator of ecclesiastical laws, so none but a civil judge ought to be the executor of civil laws. For just as he alone possesses the right to interpret the canons who possesses the power to establish them, so he alone ought to be the interpreter of civil laws who imparts their right and authority. But in a criminal case a cleric is to be examined only before a bishop. And this is what was defined above by laws and canons: namely, that in a criminal case no cleric is to be produced before a civil judge, unless perhaps with the consent of his bishop; as when they are found incorrigible, then, after their office has been taken from them, they are to be handed over to the curia. Hence Pope Fabian says, [letter II to the Eastern Bishops]:

C. XXX. In his, que ad communis uitae usum pertinent, laici sibi inuicem operam dent.

Item ex eodem. Sicut enim inpietatis crimen est tibi, o Clemens, neglectis uerbi Dei studiis sollicitudines seculares suscipere, ita unicuique laicorum peccatum est, nisi inuicem sibi etiam in his, que ad communis usum uitae pertinent, operam fideliter dederint. Te uero securum facere ex his, quibus non debes instare, omnes communiter elaborent. Quod si forte a semetipsis hoc laici non intelligunt, per diacones edocendi sunt, ut tibi solius ecclesiae sollicitudines relinquant. Gratian. Ex his omnibus datur intelligi quod in ciuili causa clericus ante ciuilem iudicem est conueniendus. Sicut enim ecclesiasticarum legum ecclesiasticus iudex est administrator, ita et ciuilium non nisi ciuilis debet esse executor. Sicut enim ille solus habet ius interpretandi canones, qui habet potestatem condendi eos, ita ille solus legum ciuilium debet esse interpres, qui eius ius et auctoritatem inpertit. In criminali uero causa non nisi ante episcopum clericus examinandus est. Et hoc est illud, quod legibus et canonibus supra diffinitum est, ut in criminali uidelicet causa ante ciuilem iudicem nullus clericus producatur, nisi forte cum consensu episcopi sui; ueluti, quando incorrigibiles inueniuntur, tunc detracto eis offitio curiae tradendi sunt. Unde Fabianus Papa ait: [ep. II. Episc. orientalibus]

C. XXXI. Let one who plots against his bishop be removed from the clergy and handed over to the curia.

We establish that, if any cleric has proved hostile to or a plotter against his bishops, immediately, before judgment has been examined, let him be removed from the clergy and handed over to the curia, which he shall serve for the days of his life, and let him remain infamous without any hope of restoration. GRATIAN. Because, therefore, this man produced a cleric before a civil judge not in a criminal but in a civil case, he is not to be judged a transgressor of the canons, nor is he to be said to have dragged the defendant before a judge who was not his own, because none but a civil judge ought to take cognizance of a civil case. PART III. § 1. On the contrary, those things which were said in defense of the plaintiff indeed appear probable, but lack weight. For by sacred canons and forensic laws a cleric is forbidden to be dragged before a civil judge in both a civil and a criminal case. Hence it is read in the letter of Clement, [I, to James]:

C. XXXI. Qui episcopo insidiatur semotus a clero curiae tradatur.

Statuimus, ut, si quis clericorum suis episcopis infestus aut insidiator extiterit, mox ante examinatum iudicium submotus a clero curiae tradatur, cui diebus uitae suae deseruiat, et infamis absque ulla spe restitutionis permaneat. Gratian. Quia ergo iste non in criminali, sed in ciuili causa clericum ante ciuilem iudicem produxit, non est iudicandus transgressor canonum, nec est dicendus pertraxisse reum ad iudicem non suum, quia de ciuili causa non nisi ciuilis iudex cognoscere debet. III. Pars. §. 1. Econtra ea, que in actoris defensione dicta sunt, uerisimilia quidem uidentur, sed pondere carent. Sacris enim canonibus et forensibus legibus tam in ciuili quam in criminali causa clericus ad ciuilem iudicem pertrahendus negatur. Unde in epistola [I.] Clementis [ad Iacobum] legitur:

C. XXXII. Let brothers be judged before priests.

If any of the brothers have disputes among themselves, let them not be judged before secular examiners, but let whatever it is be decided before the priests of the church.

C. XXXII. Apud presbiteros iudicentur fratres.

Si qui ex fratribus negotia habeant inter se, apud cognitores seculi non iudicentur, sed apud presbiteros ecclesiae quicquid illud est dirimatur.

C. XXXIII. Let no cleric enter the curia on account of any case.

Likewise Pope Sylvester, [in the epilogue of the Roman Council]. Let no cleric, priest, or deacon enter the curia on account of any case whatsoever, nor presume to plead his case before a civil judge.

C. XXXIII. Nullus clericus propter aliquam causam intret curiam.

Item Siluester Papa. [in epilogo Concilii Romani] Nullus clericus, uel presbiter uel diaconus, propter quamlibet causam intret in curiam, nec ante ciuilem iudicem causam dicere suam presumat.

C. XXXIV. Let a penitent seek ecclesiastical, not forensic, judgment.

Likewise Pope Leo, [to Rusticus, letter XC, otherwise XCII, c. 9]. It is one thing to demand back just things that are owed, another to despise one's own things from love of perfection. But one seeking pardon for unlawful things ought also to abstain from many lawful things, as the Apostle says: "All things are lawful for me, but not all things are expedient." Hence, if any penitent has a case which perhaps he ought not to neglect, let him seek ecclesiastical judgment rather than forensic judgment. GRATIAN. He does not say "on account of a criminal case" only, but generally "on account of any case," understanding both civil and criminal. Likewise Emperor Theodosius:

C. XXXIV. Ecclesiasticum, non forense iudicium penitens expetat.

Item Leo Papa. [ad Rusticum, epist. XC. al. XCII. c. 9.] Aliud quidem est debita iusta reposcere, aliud propria perfectionis amore contempnere. Sed illicitorum ueniam postulantem oportet etiam a multis licitis abstinere, dicente Apostolo: "Omnia michi licent, sed non omnia expediunt." Unde si quis penitens habet causam, quam negligere forte non debeat, melius expetet ecclesiasticum quam forense iudicium. Gratian. Non ait propter criminalem tantum, sed generaliter propter quamlibet, tam ciuilem quam criminalem intelligens. Item Theodosius Inperator:

C. XXXV. Let it be permitted to anyone to choose the judgment of the bishop of the sacrosanct see.

Whoever has a lawsuit, whether he is plaintiff at the beginning of the suit or after courses of time have elapsed, whether when the case is being fully pleaded or when sentence has already begun to be pronounced, if he has chosen the judgment of the bishop of the sacrosanct law, immediately, without any doubt, even if the other party objects, let him be directed to the judgment of the bishops together with the declaration of the litigants.

C. XXXV. Cuicumque liceat sacrosanctae sedis antistitis iudicium eligere.

Quicumque litem habens, siue petitor fuerit, uel in initio litis uel decursis temporum curriculis, siue cum negotium peroratur, siue cum iam ceperit promi sententia, si iudicium elegerit sacrosanctae legis antistitis, illico sine aliqua dubitatione, etiamsi alia pars refragatur, ad episcoporum iudicium cum sermone litigantium dirigatur.

[C. XXXVI.]

The same. Therefore let all cases which are conducted by praetorian or civil law, once terminated by the sentences of bishops, be confirmed by the right of perpetual stability, nor let it thereafter be permitted to reconsider a matter which the sentence of bishops has decided. Let all judges without doubt accept even testimony furnished by one bishop, and let no other person be heard when the testimony of a bishop has been promised by either party. For let that be held confirmed by the authority of truth, and let that be held incorrupt which has been brought forth by a sacrosanct man from the conscience of an unblemished mind. We confirm this by a salutary edict and judge that it is to be observed by perpetual law. GRATIAN. If anyone contends that these things have become obsolete because they are not found inserted in Justinian's Code, let him recognize that they were renewed by Charlemagne, who says, among other things, in his Capitularies, [book VI, c. 281]:

[C. XXXVI.]

Idem. Omnes itaque causae, que pretorio uel ciuili iure tractantur, episcoporum sententiis terminatae perpetuo stabilitatis iure firmentur, nec ulterius liceat retractari negocium, quod episcoporum sententia deciderit. Testimonium etiam, ab uno licet episcopo perhibitum, omnes iudices indubitanter accipiant, nec alius audiatur, cum testimonium episcopi a qualibet parte fuerit repromissum. Illud enim ueritatis auctoritate firmatum, illud incorruptum habeatur, quod a sacrosancto homine conscientia mentis illibatae fuerit prolatum. Hoc nos edicto salubri firmamus, et perpetua lege tenendum esse censemus.

Gratian. Hec si quis antiquata contendat, quia in Iustiniani codice non inueniuntur inserta, per Karolum renouata cognoscat, qui in suis Capitularibus [l. VI. c. 281.,] ait inter cetera:

[C. XXXVII.]

"We will and command that all subject to our dominion—Romans as well as Franks, Alemanni, Bavarians, Saxons, Thuringians, Frisians, Gauls, Burgundians, Britons, Lombards, Gascons, Beneventans, Goths, Spaniards, and all others subject to us, by whatever bond of law they appear bound or by whatever customary practice connected—shall all hold by perpetual law this sentence from the sixteenth book of Emperor Theodosius, namely chapter eleven, in response to the inquiries of Duke Ablavius, which we sent in writing to them and to all and, with the counsel of all our faithful, placed among our capitularies to be observed as law, that is: Whoever has a lawsuit, whether he is plaintiff, etc., as above." Likewise Gregory, [book XI, letter 54], in admonishing John the Defender as he went to Spain, says:

[C. XXXVII.]

"Volumus atque precipimus, ut omnes nostrae ditioni subiecti, tam Romani quam Franci, Alemanni, Bawari, Saxones, Toringi, Fresones, Galli, Burgundiones, Britones, Longobardi, Guascones, Beneuentani, Gothi, Hispani, ceterique omnes nobis subiecti quocumque uideantur legis uinculo stricti uel consuetudinario conexi more, hanc sententiam, quam ex sextodecimo Theodosii inperatoris libro, capitulo uidelicet undecimo, ad interrogata Ablauii ducis, quam illis et omnibus per scripturam misimus, et inter nostra capitula pro lege tenenda consultu omnium fidelium nostrorum, posuimus, lege cuncti perpetua teneant, id est: Quicumque litem habens, siue petitor fuerit, etc. ut supra. Item Gregorius [lib. XI. epist. 54.] Iohanni defensori eunti in Yspaniam ammonendo dicit:

C. XXXVIII. A priest ought to be judged only before his bishop.

Concerning the person of a priest this is to be observed: if anyone has a case against him, he ought not to be detained by another, but his bishop ought to be approached, as the Novel constitution makes manifest, which speaks thus concerning the most holy and God-beloved and most reverend bishops, clerics, and monks: "The Emperor Augustus Justinian to Peter, most glorious praetorian prefect, chapter LIII. If anyone has any action against a cleric or monk, or a deaconess, or a nun, or a female ascetic, let him first inform the most holy bishop to whom each of them is subject. But let him adjudicate the case between them. And if indeed both parties do not acquiesce in the things judged, we command that full execution be entrusted through the judge of the place." § 1. But lest it be objected that this speaks of a cleric, not of a priest, it is to be known that above, in the same constitution, book L, chapter 1, it is read that priests and deacons are also contained under the appellation of clerics. The words of the law are these: "Priests, deacons, readers, and singers, all of whom we call clerics," and the rest.

C. XXXVIII. Presbiter apud episcopum tantum iudicari debet.

De persona presbiteri hoc attendendum est, si quam causam habuerit, non ab alio teneri, sed episcopus ipsius adiri debuit, sicut nouellarum constitutio manifestat, que ita loquitur de sanctissimis et Deo amabilibus, ac reuerentissimis episcopis et clericis ac monachis: "Inp. Augustus Iustinianus Petro gloriosissimo prefecto pretorio capitulo LIII. Si quis contra aliquem clericum aut monachum, aut diaconissam, aut monastriam, aut assistriam habet aliquam actionem, doceat prius sanctissimum episcopum, cui horum unusquisque subiaceat. Ille uero causam inter eos diiudicet. Et si quidem utraque pars his, que iudicata sunt, non adquieuerit iubemus per loci iudicem executioni perfecte contradi." §. 1. Ne uero obiciatur, quia hoc de clerico loquitur, non de presbitero, sciendum est, quia superius in eadem constitutione libro L. capitulo 1. legitur appellatione clericorum etiam presbiteros et diacones contineri. Verba autem legis ista sunt: "Presbiteros autem et diaconos, et lectores et cantores, quos omnes clericos appellamus," et reliqua.

C. XXXIX. Let a cleric not drag another cleric to public judgments.

Likewise Gregory, [book IX, letter 32], to Romanus, Defender of Sicily. It has reached us that, if anyone has a case against any clerics, you cause those clerics, with their bishops despised, to be presented at your judgment. If this is so, it is established to be exceedingly incongruous. But by this authority we command you not to presume to do this again; rather, if anyone has a case against any cleric, let him approach that cleric's bishop, so that either the bishop himself may take cognizance of it, or judges may at least be appointed by him, or, if perhaps recourse is to be made to arbiters, an executor appointed by him may compel the parties to choose judges. But if any cleric or layman has a case against a bishop, then you ought to intervene, so that either you yourself may take cognizance between them, or at least, upon your admonition, they may choose judges for themselves. For if his own jurisdiction is not preserved for each bishop, what else is done except that through us, through whom that ecclesiastical order ought to have been preserved, it is confounded? And the rest.

C. XXXIX. Clericus clericum ad publica iudicia non pertrahat.

Item Gregorius [lib. IX. epist. 32.] Romano, Defensori Siciliae. Peruenit ad nos, quod si quis contra quoslibet clericos causam habeat, despectis eorum episcopis eosdem clericos tuo facias iudicio exhiberi. Quod si ita est, ualde esse constat incongruum. Sed hac tibi auctoritate precipimus, ut hoc denuo facere non presumas; sed si quis contra quemlibet clericum causam habuerit, episcopum ipsius adeat, ut aut ipse cognoscat, aut certe ab ipso iudices deputentur, aut si fortasse ad arbitros eundum est, partes ad eligendum iudices ab ipso executio deputata conpellat. Si quis uero clericus uel laicus contra episcopum causam habuerit, tunc te interponere debes, ut inter eos aut ipse cognoscas, aut certe te admonente sibi iudices eligant. Nam si sua unicuique episcopo iurisdictio non seruatur, quid aliud agitur, nisi ut per nos, per quos ecclesiasticus ille ordo custodiri debuit, confundatur? et cetera.

C. XL. Clerics are not to be oppressed by lay judges.

The same to Januarius, Bishop of Cagliari, [book III, letter 26]. We have learned from the report of our brother and fellow bishop Felix and of Abbot Cyriacus that priests are oppressed by lay judges on the island of Sardinia and that your ministers despise your fraternity; and while simplicity alone is pursued by you, as far as we see, discipline is neglected.

C. XL. A laicis iudicibus clerici non sunt obprimendi.

Idem Ianuario Episcopo Karalitano. [lib. III. epist. 26.] Fratris et coepiscopi nostri Felicis, et Quiriaci abbatis relatione cognouimus eo quod in insula Sardinia sacerdotes a laicis iudicibus obprimantur, et fraternitatem tuam ministri tui despiciant, dumque solum simplicitati a uobis studetur, quantum uidemus disciplina negligitur.

C. XLI. Priests are to be honored by kings, not judged.

Likewise Gregory to Maurice, [the Emperor, book IV, letter 31]. But let our lord not be quickly angered against priests from his earthly power; rather, from excellent consideration for Him whose servants they are, let him so rule over them that he also renders the reverence owed. For in the divine utterances priests are sometimes called gods and sometimes angels. For concerning one who is to be brought to an oath it is said to Moses: “Bring him to the gods,” that is, to the priests. And again it is written: “You shall not disparage the gods,” namely, the priests. And the Prophet says: “The lips of the priest guard knowledge, and they seek the law from his mouth, because he is the angel of the Lord of hosts.” What wonder is it, therefore, if your Piety deigns to honor those to whom God Himself, granting them honor in His own utterance, also calls either angels or gods? § 1. Ecclesiastical history also testifies that, when accusations against bishops had been offered in writing to the prince Constantine of pious memory, he indeed received the documents of accusation; and, summoning the same bishops who had been accused, he burned in their sight the documents which he had received, saying: “Go, and arrange your cases among yourselves, because it is not fitting that we judge gods.” In this sentence he furnished something to himself more from humility than to them from the reverence rendered. For before him there were pagan princes in the commonwealth who, not knowing the true God, worshiped wooden and stone gods, and nevertheless granted the greatest honor to their priests. What wonder is it, therefore, if a Christian emperor honors the priests of the true God, when pagan princes, as we have said, knew how to render honor to their priests, who served wooden and stone gods? § 2. Therefore we assert this not so much specially as generally for all priests, since we do not yet know what sort each person will be in the terrible judgment of God. For Paul, the distinguished preacher, says: “Do not judge before the time, until the Lord comes,” and the rest. For there are many things concerning His judgment which men do not know, because perhaps He reproves the things which you praise, and He will praise the things which you reprove.

C. XLI. Sacerdotes a regibus sunt honorandi, non iudicandi.

Item Gregorius Mauricio. [Imperatori, lib. IV. ep. 31.] Sacerdotibus autem non ex terrena potestate dominus noster citius indignetur, sed excellenti consideratione propter eum, cuius serui sunt, ita eis dominetur, ut etiam debitam reuerentiam inpendat. Nam in diuinis eloquiis sacerdotes aliquando Dii, aliquando angeli uocantur. Nam et ad Moysen de eo, qui ad iuramentum deducendus est, dicitur: "Applica illum ad Deos," uidelicet ad sacerdotes. Et rursum scriptum est: "Diis non detrahes," scilicet sacerdotibus. Et propheta ait: "Labia sacerdotis custodiunt scientiam, et legem requirunt ex ore eius, quia angelus Domini exercituum est." Quid igitur mirum, si illos uestra pietas dignetur honorare, quibus in suo eloquio honorem tribuens, eos aut angelos, aut Deos ipse etiam appellat Deus? §. 1. Ecclesiastica quoque testatur ystoria, quia cum piae memoriae Constantino principi scripto oblatae accusationes contra episcopos fuissent, libellos quidem accusationis accepit, et eosdem, qui accusati fuerant, episcopos conuocans, in eorum conspectu libellos, quos acceperat, incendit, dicens: "Ite, et inter uos causas uestras disponite, quia dignum non est ut nos iudicemus Deos." In qua sententia sibi magis ex humilitate, quam illis aliquid prestitit ex reuerentia inpensa. Ante eum quippe pagani in republica principes fuerunt, qui uerum Deum nescientes deos ligneos et lapideos colebant, et tamen eorum sacerdotibus honorem maximum tribuebant. Quid igitur mirum, si Christianus inperator ueri Dei sacerdotes honoret dum pagani, ut prediximus, principes honorem inpendere eorum sacerdotibus nouerunt, qui ligneis Diis et lapideis seruiebant? §. 2. Hoc ergo non tantum specialiter, quantum generaliter pro omnibus asserimus sacerdotibus, quoniam adhuc nescimus quis in terribili Dei iudicio qualis futurus sit. Etenim Paulus egregius predicator dicit? "Nolite ante tempus iudicare, quoadusque ueniat Dominus," et reliqua. Nam sunt multa que de iudicio illius ignorant homines, quia fortasse que uos laudatis ille reprehendit, et que uos reprehenditis ille laudabit.

C. XLII. With what penalty a cleric who drags another cleric to secular judgments is to be struck.

Likewise from the Council of Milevis. Unaccustomed presumption has opened an approach to unlawful attempts to such an extent that clerics, abandoning their own pontiff, drag clerics to public judgments. We therefore establish that this not be presumed henceforth. If anyone has presumed to do this, when summoned, let him both lose his case and be made a stranger to communion.

> C. XLII. Qua pena feriatur clericus clericum ad secularia iudicia pertrahens.
> Item ex Concilio Mileuitano. Inolita presumptio usque adeo illicitis ausibus aditum patefecit, ut clerici clericos, relicto suo pontifice, ad iudicia publica pertrahant. Proinde statuimus ut hoc de cetero non presumatur. Si quis hoc presumpserit facere, conuentus et causam perdat, et a communione efficiatur extraneus.

C. XLIII. A cleric ought not to be judged before a civil judge.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 9]. It was resolved that if any bishop, priest, deacon, or cleric, when a crime has been charged against him in the church or a civil case has been raised, should abandon ecclesiastical judgment and wish to be cleared in public judgments, even if sentence has been given in his favor, he shall lose his place. And this in a criminal action. But in a civil action, let him lose what he obtained if he prefers to retain his place, since one who, by thinking ill of the whole church, seeks assistance from secular judgment judges wickedly concerning the fellowship of the church in choosing judges, although the Apostle commands that even the cases of private persons be brought to the church and determined there.

> C. XLIII. Clericus apud ciuilem iudicem iudicari non debet.
> Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 9] Placuit, ut quisquis episcoporum, presbiterorum et diaconorum, seu clericorum, cum in ecclesia ei crimen fuerit intentum, uel ciuilis causa fuerit conmota, si derelicto ecclesiastico iudicio publicis iudiciis purgari uoluerit, etiamsi pro ipso fuerit lata sententia, locum suum amittat. Et hoc in criminali actione. In ciuili uero perdat quod euicit, si locum suum obtinere maluerit, siquidem ad eligendos iudices inique de ecclesiae consortio iudicat qui de uniuersa ecclesia male sentiendo de iudicio seculari poscit auxilium, cum priuatorum etiam causas Apostolus ad ecclesiam deferri atque ibi determinari precipiat.

C. XLIV. Let a cleric not be accused except before an ecclesiastical judge.

Likewise from the same. If anyone among those of the various orders serving the church has fallen into an accusation of crime and has refused ecclesiastical judgment, he ought to be put in peril.

> C. XLIV. Clericus non accusetur, nisi ante ecclesiasticum iudicem.
> Item ex eodem. De diuersis ordinibus ecclesiae seruientibus si quis in causam criminis incurrerit, et abnuerit iudicium ecclesiasticum, debet periclitari.

C. XLV. Let one who has litigation with a cleric approach that cleric's bishop.

Likewise Constitution LXXIV, c. 1. If anyone has litigation with a cleric, if indeed concerning a pecuniary case, let him first approach the bishop to whose judgment the cleric is subject. But the bishop shall impose a suitable end upon the litigation without expense and without delay. But if the bishop is unwilling to decide the litigation, then let the adjudication of the case reach the civil judges.

But where the bishop wishes to decide it, let all things proceed without writing, and let definitive sentence be given by him without writings. § 1. But if litigation has arisen concerning a criminal case, then let the competent persons, once addressed, impose an end upon the case consonant with the laws, yet in such a way that the adjudication of the litigation does not exceed the space of two months, to be reckoned from joinder of issue. [§ 2.] [PALEA. But in criminal cases one ought never to proceed without writing.] A cleric shall not, however, be punished otherwise unless, after being found liable, he has been stripped of the priesthood or the honor of the clericate by his bishop. But if the crime is ecclesiastical, then let examination of the case and punishment proceed according to the canons from his bishop, with other judges possessing no participation in cases of this kind.

> C. XLV. Qui cum clerico litigium habet episcopum ipsius adeat.
> Item constitutio LXXIV. c. 1. Si quis cum clerico litigium habuerit, si quidem de causa pecuniaria, adeat prius episcopum, cuius iudicio clericus subpositus est. Ille autem sine dampno et sine dilatione conpetentem finem liti inpositurus est. Sin autem noluerit episcopus litem dirimere, tunc ad ciuiles iudices disceptatio causae perueniat. Ubi autem dirimere episcopus uult, sine scriptura omnia procedant, et diffinitiua sententia ab eo sine scripturis feratur. §. 1. Quod si de criminali causa litigium emerserit, tunc conpetentes interpellati, consentaneum legibus terminum causae inponant, ita tamen, ut disceptatio litis duorum mensium spatium non excedat, a litis contestatione numerandum. [§. 2.] [PALEA. In criminalibus uero causis numquam sine scriptura procedere debet.] Non autem aliter puniatur clericus, nisi obnoxius repertus sacerdotio nudatus fuerit ab episcopo suo uel clericatus honore. Sin autem crimen ecclesiasticum est, tunc secundum canones ab episcopo suo causae examinatio et pena procedat, nullam communionem aliis iudicibus in huiusmodi causis habentibus.

C. XLVI. Let a cleric having a dispute against another cleric not pursue secular judgments.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 9]. If a cleric has a dispute against a cleric, let him not abandon his own bishop and have recourse to secular judgments, but let the dispute first be conducted before his own bishop; or at least, if it is the bishop's own dispute, let the dispute be heard before arbiters chosen by each party. But if anyone acts contrary to this, let him lie under the corrections of the canons. § 1. And if a cleric has a case against his own bishop or another, let him complain before the hearing of the provincial synod. § 2. But if a bishop or cleric has a controversy against the metropolitan bishop of that province, let him proceed to the primates of that diocese, or at least to the see of the royal city of Constantinople, so that their dispute may be terminated there.

[PALEA.

> C. XLVI. Clericus aduersus clericum negotium habens secularia iudicia non exerceat.
> Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 9.] Si clericus aduersus clericum habet negotium, non relinquat suum episcopum et ad secularia iudicia concurrat, sed prius negocium agitetur apud episcopum proprium; uel certe si fuerit negocium ipsius episcopi, apud arbitros ex utraque parte electos audiatur negocium. Si quis uero contra hoc fecerit, canonum subiaceat correctionibus. §. 1. Et si clericus aduersus suum seu alium episcopum habeat causam, apud audientiam sinodi prouinciae conqueratur. §. 2. Si uero contra ipsius prouinciae metropolitanum episcopum episcopus siue clericus habeat controuersiam, pergat ad ipsius diocesis primates, aut certe ad Constantinopolitanae ciuitatis regiae sedem, ut eorum ibi negotium terminetur.
> [PALEA.

C. XLVII. Likewise from the Council of Agde, c. 32.

Let no one presume to sue a cleric before a secular judge when the bishop does not permit it. But if he has been sued, let him neither answer nor plead, nor dare to present a criminal matter in secular judgment.] GRATIAN. From all these things it is given to be understood that a cleric is not to be produced at public judgments in either a civil or a criminal case, unless perhaps the bishop has refused to decide a civil case or in a criminal case has stripped him of the belt of his honor. § 1. But what was said in the letter of Clement—"God does not wish you to be an examiner of secular affairs"—is to be understood from episcopal anointing. For he is not anointed as bishop so that he may sit as examiner of secular affairs, but so that he may exist as a guardian of souls and distributor of spiritual things. Therefore he is prohibited from being occupied in secular affairs, not from becoming an arbiter for a time. Or "secular judgments" are to be understood not concerning secular things, but as judgments of secular men. Judgments concerning secular things are called secular according to that statement of the Apostle: "Therefore, if you have secular judgments, appoint those who are contemptible in the church." But judgments of secular men are called secular in the letter of Clement, as is given to be understood from what follows, when it is said: "Let laymen who are free for such things furnish one another these works which we have said are less fitting for you." Clerics are therefore prohibited from taking cognizance of the affairs of secular men, not of secular cases. For the affairs of clerics, whether criminal or civil, are to be litigated only before an ecclesiastical judge. Hence Pope Hadrian says, [c. 35]:

> C. XLVII. Item ex Concilio Agatensi, c. 32.
> Clericum nullus presumat apud secularem iudicem episcopo non permittente pulsare. Sed si pulsatus fuerit, non respondeat, nec proponat, nec audeat criminale negotium in iudicio seculari proponere.] Gratian. Ex his omnibus datur intelligi, quod clericus ad publica iudicia nec in ciuili, nec in criminali causa est producendus, nisi forte ciuilem causam episcopus decidere noluerit, uel in criminali sui honoris cingulo eum nudauerit. §. 1. Illud autem quod in epistola Clementis dictum est: "Non cognitorem secularium negotiorum te uult Deus esse," ex episcopali unctione intelligendum est. Non enim in episcopum ungitur, ut cognitor secularium negotiorum resideat, sed ut procurator animarum et distributor spiritualium existat. Prohibetur ergo secularibus negotiis occupari, non ad tempus sequester fieri. Vel secularia iudicia non de rebus secularibus sed secularium uirorum intelligenda sunt. Iudicia de rebus secularibus secularia appellantur iuxta illud Apostoli: "Secularia igitur iudicia si habueritis, contemptibiles qui sunt in ecclesia constituite." Iudicia uero secularium secularia appellantur in epistola Clementis, quod ex subsequentibus datur intelligi, cum dicitur: "Hec opera, que tibi minus congruere diximus, exhibeant sibi inuicem uacantes laici." Prohibentur ergo Clerici a cognitione negotiorum secularium uirorum, non secularium causarum. Negotia quippe clericorum, siue criminalia siue ciuilia fuerint, non nisi apud ecclesiasticum iudicem uentilanda sunt. Unde Adrianus Papa ait: [c. 35.]

C. XLVIII. Let a cleric be heard only in his own forum.

If a cleric or layman has been assailed by a criminal charge or lawsuit, when summoned let him be heard nowhere other than in his own forum.

> C. XLVIII. Non nisi in foro suo clericus audiatur.
> Clericus siue laicus, si crimine aut lite pulsatus fuerit, non alibi quam in foro suo prouocatus audiatur.

C. XLIX. Concerning the same.

The same, [in the same place, c. 40]. In a case of clerics let this form be preserved: that a sentence pronounced against them by one who is not their own judge shall by no means bind them. GRATIAN. But a thing placed in litigation ought not at all to be transferred to any person before the lawful outcome of the cognizance. Hence Pope Gelasius to Bishop Quingesius:

> C. XLIX. De eodem.
> Idem. [ibidem c. 40.] In clericorum causa huiusmodi forma seruetur, ut nequaquam eorum sententia non a suo iudice dicta constringat. Gratian. Res uero in litigio posita ante legitimum cognitionis euentum in nullam omnino debet transferri personam. Unde Gelasius Papa Quingesio Episcopo:

C. L. Let a thing placed in litigation not be transferred to any person before the outcome of the cognizance.

Because a thing placed in litigation can in no way be transferred to any person until, through the outcome of a lawful cognizance, it can be recognized by judicial adjudication to whom it is owed more rightfully, let no one be permitted to exact rents from that same thing; rather, with that same thing placed in the same condition in which, as was said, it appears to have been established before, whoever thinks that anything can belong to him shall bring suit in a legal examination, with all prejudgments concerning it removed.

> Quia res in litigio posita in nullam transferri potest omnino personam, donec legitimae cognitionis euentu, cui potius debeatur, iudiciaria disceptatione possit agnosci, ex eadem re quispiam non sinatur exigere pensiones, sed in eodem statu re eadem posita, in quo uidetur (sicut dictum est) ante constituta, quisquis sibi putat quippiam posse conpetere, iuridico pulset examine, preiudiciis omnibus inde submotis.

Question II

GRATIAN. That fault is worthy of suspension, as is clearly established by that chapter of the Council of Milevis. For if one who has believed that a cleric should be dragged before a civil judge is to be deprived of communion, much more is one worthy of suspension who did not hesitate to drag to secular judgment one who invoked the judgment of his own bishop.

> GRATIANUS. Quod uero culpa illa suspensione digna sit, ex capitulo illo Mileuitani concilii liquido constat. Si enim communione priuandus est qui clericum ad ciuilem iudicem crediderit protrahendum, multo magis suspensione dignus est qui sui episcopi iudicium interpellantem ad iudicium seculare protrahere non dubitauit.

Question III

GRATIAN. PART I. But let it be supposed that this fault was not worthy of suspension; it is asked whether one who dared to celebrate his office contrary to the prohibition of the bishop is to be deposed. But that the sentence of a bishop, whether it was just or unjust, is to be feared, Gregory testifies, [homily XXVI on the Gospels], saying:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Sed ponatur, quod hec culpa suspensione digna non fuerit; queritur, utrum sit deponendus qui offitium contra prohibitionem episcopi celebrare ausus est? Sed quod sententia episcopi, siue iusta sine iniusta fuerit, timenda sit, Gregorius [homil. XXVI. in euangelia] testatur, dicens:

C. I. The sentence of the shepherd is to be feared by the flock.

The sentence of a shepherd, whether it was just or unjust, is to be feared.

C. I. Gregi timenda est sententia pastoris.

Sententia pastoris, siue iusta siue iniusta fuerit, timenda est.

C. II. One excommunicated by his own bishop is not to be received by another.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, [c. 6]. If anyone has been excommunicated by his own bishop, he ought not first to be received by others, unless either he has been received by his own bishop or, after a council has been held, he encounters the bishops and answers, and, if he has satisfied the synod and it has so established, he is received under another sentence. This is also fitting to be observed concerning laymen, priests, deacons, and all who are in the clergy.

C. II. A suo episcopo excommunicatus non est ab alio recipiendus.

Item ex Concilio Antioceno. [c. 6.] Si quis a proprio episcopo excommunicatus est, non eum prius ab aliis debere suscipi, nisi aut a suo fuerit receptus episcopo, aut concilio facto episcopis occurrat et respondeat, et si sinodo satisfecerit et statuerit, sub alia eum sententia recipi. Quod etiam circa laicos, et presbiteros, et diacones, et omnes, qui in clero sunt, conuenit obseruari.

C. III. One who communicates with excommunicated persons merits a sentence of excommunication.

Likewise Nicholas to King Lothair, [in the letter whose beginning is "Having Heard"]. Above all, avoid communion with Waldrada, your concubine and long ago repudiated by you; for she has been excommunicated and, until she appears before us, separated from all fellowship of Christians. Therefore care must be taken lest you be struck with the equal edge of the sentence together with her and, bound and obligated through passion for one little woman, be dragged to perpetual destruction. For prelates sin more grievously among the peoples, and by this they themselves are punished more cruelly than the rest, as blessed Gregory says: "Prelates ought to know that, if they ever perpetrate perverse things, they are worthy of as many deaths as the examples of perdition which they transmit to their subjects. Hence it is necessary that they guard themselves from fault the more cautiously, the more through the depraved things which they do they do not die alone." And below. § 1. Moreover, take care lest at some time, in accordance with the Lord's command, we bring two or three witnesses against you—or rather tell this to the holy church—and, what we do not desire, henceforth you become to all as a heathen and a publican.

C. III. Excommunicationis sententiam meretur qui excommunicatis communicat.

Item Nicolaus ad Lotharium Regem. [in epistola, cuius initium: "Audito"] Precipue Waldradae pellicis tuae et dudum a te repudiatae communionem declina; excommunicata est enim et usque ad presentiam nostram ab omni contubernio Christianorum sequestrata. Quamobrem cauendum est ne cum ea pari mucrone percellaris sententiae, ac pro unius mulierculae passione uinctus et obligatus ad perhenne traharis exitium. Deterius quippe in populis prelati delinquunt, ac per hoc ipsi crudelius quam ceteri puniuntur, ut ait B. Gregorius: "Scire prelati debent, quia, si peruersa umquam perpetrant, tot mortibus digni sunt, quot ad subditos suos perditionis exempla transmittunt. Unde necesse est, ut tanto se cautius custodiant a culpa, quanto per praua, que faciunt, non soli moriuntur." Et infra. §. 1. Ceterum precaue, ne quando nobis secundum Domini preceptum duos aut tres testes adhibeamus, imo uero hoc sanctae ecclesiae dicamus, et (quod non optamus) de cetero fias cunctis sicut ethnicus et publicanus.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Sardica, c. 17. If a bishop, perhaps irascible—which he ought not to be—is quickly and harshly moved against a priest or deacon and wishes to drive him from the church, provision must be made lest an innocent man be condemned or lose communion. And therefore let the one who has been cast out possess the power to appeal to the neighboring bishops, and let his case be heard and treated more diligently. But let the bishop who justly or unjustly cast him out patiently accept that the matter be examined, so that his sentence may either be approved by several or amended. Nevertheless, before all things are diligently and faithfully examined, let no one presume to associate in communion, before cognizance, the one who had been deprived of communion.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Sardicensi, c. 17. Si episcopus forte iracundus (quod non debet esse) cito et aspere conmouetur aduersus presbiterum siue diaconum, et eum de ecclesia exterminare uoluerit, prouidendum est, ne innocens dampnetur aut perdat communionem. Et ideo habeat potestatem is, qui abiectus est, ut episcopos finitimos interpellet, et causa eius audiatur ac diligentius tractetur. Ille uero episcopus, qui iuste uel iniuste eum abiecit, patienter accipiat, ut negotium discutiatur, uel probetur eius sententia a pluribus, uel emendetur. Tamen prius, quam omnia diligenter ac fideliter examinentur, eum, qui fuerat communione priuatus, ante cognitionem nullus debet presumere ut communioni societ.

C. V. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Second Council of Carthage, [c. 8]. If any priest has been corrected by his bishop, he ought certainly to complain before the neighboring bishops, so that his case may be heard by them and through them he may be reconciled to his bishop. But if he has not done this, but, swollen with pride—which God forbid—has determined that he is to be separated from the communion of his bishop and, making a schism separately with certain persons, has offered sacrifice to God, let him be held anathema and nonetheless lose his place. But if he has a just complaint against the bishop, it is to be investigated.

C. V. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi. [II. c. 8.] Si quis presbiter ab episcopo suo correptus fuerit, debet utique apud uicinos episcopos conqueri, ut ab ipsis eius causa possit audiri, ac per ipsos suo episcopo reconciliari. Quod nisi fecerit, sed superbia (quod absit) inflatus secernendum se ab episcopi sui communione duxerit, ac separatim cum aliquibus scisma faciens sacrificium Deo obtulerit, anathema habeatur et nichilo minus locum amittat. At si querimoniam iustam aduersus episcopum habuerit, inquirendum est.

C. VI. Concerning those who, after being condemned by a synod, handle the sacred mysteries.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, [c. 4]. If any bishop is condemned by a synod, or if a priest or deacon is condemned by his own bishop, and they have dared to handle anything of the sacred ministry—whether the bishop according to the preceding custom, or the priest or deacon—let it in no way be permitted to him, even in another synod, to possess hope of restoration or a place of satisfaction; rather, all those communicating with him ought also to be cast from the church, especially if, after learning that a sentence had been pronounced against the aforesaid persons, they have attempted to communicate with them.

> C. VI. De his, qui dampnati a sinodo sacra misteria contingunt.
> Item ex Concilio Antioceno. [c. 4.] Si quis episcopus dampnatur a sinodo, uel si presbiter aut diaconus a suo episcopo, et ausi fuerint aliquid de ministerio sacro contingere, siue episcopus iuxta precedentem consuetudinem, siue presbiter aut diaconus, nullo modo liceat ei, nec in alia sinodo, spem restitutionis aut locum satisfactionis habere, sed et communicantes ei omnes abici de ecclesia oportet, et maxime si postquam didicerint aduersus memoratos prolatam fuisse sententiam, eisdem communicare temptauerint.

C. VII. Let one who presumes to communicate with excommunicated persons be without hope of reconciliation.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 37]. If any bishop has been excommunicated in a council, or a priest or deacon by his own bishop, and after excommunication that bishop, priest, or deacon has presumed to make the oblation or to perform the morning or evening sacrifice as though in his office as before, let him not be permitted either to possess hope of reconciliation in another council or to be reconciled thereafter; rather, let all those who communicated with him also be repelled from the church, especially those who knew that he had been cast down. But if he has persisted in disturbing and stirring up the church through external power, he ought to be expelled from the whole congregation as a seditious person.

> C. VII. Sine spe sit reconciliationis qui communicare presumit excommunicatis.
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 37.] Si quis episcopus in concilio excommunicatus fuerit, siue presbiter aut diaconus a suo episcopo, et post excommunicationem presumpserit siue episcopus ille, aut presbiter uel diaconus facere oblationem, uel matutinum uel uespertinum sacrificium quasi in offitio suo agere sicut prius, non liceat ei nec in alio concilio spem reconciliationis habere, nec ultra reconciliari, sed etiam eos, qui ei communicauerint, omnes ab ecclesia respui, maxime eos, qui sciebant eum esse deiectum. Si autem permanserit turbans et concitans ecclesiam per forasticam potestatem, oportet eum sicut seditionarium ab omni plebe expelli.

C. VIII. Concerning bishops who excommunicate innocent persons or those guilty of the slightest causes.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 3]. If bishops, after setting aside priestly moderation, have presumed to excommunicate innocent persons or those guilty of the slightest causes, or perhaps have refused to receive those hastening to the grace of baptism, let them be admonished by letters from the neighboring bishops of the same province; and if they refuse to obey, let communion be denied to them by the remaining bishops until the time of the synod, lest perhaps those excommunicated be overtaken by death during a long period through the sin of excommunication.

C. VIII. De episcopis, qui innocentes aut minimis causis culpabiles excommunicant.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 3.] Episcopi, si sacerdotali moderatione postposita innocentes aut minimis causis culpabiles excommunicare presumpserint, aut ad gratiam baptismi festinantes fortasse recipere noluerint, a uicinis episcopis eiusdem prouinciae litteris moneantur, et si parere noluerint, communio illis usque ad tempus sinodi a reliquis episcopis denegetur, ne forte per excommunicationis peccatum excommunicati longo tempore morte preueniantur.

C. IX. Concerning those who presume to communicate during the time of their excommunication.

Likewise from the African Council. It pleased the whole council that one who has been excommunicated for his own neglect, whether any bishop or cleric, and during the time of his excommunication has presumed to communicate before a hearing, shall be judged to have pronounced a sentence of condemnation against himself.

C. IX. De his, qui tempore excommunicationis suae communicare presumunt.

Item ex Concilio Affricano. Placuit uniuerso concilio, ut qui excommunicatus fuerit pro suo neglectu, siue episcopus quilibet siue clericus, et tempore suae excommunicationis ante audientiam communicare presumpserit, ipse in se dampnationis iudicetur protulisse sententiam.

C. X. Let bishops who communicate with excommunicated persons be deposed.

Likewise Pope Nicholas. Teugald of Trier, primate of the province of Belgica, and Guntarius, Archbishop of Cologne—now before you and the holy synod, presenting, under a disclosure of the proceedings, a writing confirmed on this matter by their own hands concerning how they reconsidered and judged the case of King Lothair and his two women, namely Theberga and Gualdrada, and affirming with their own mouths before many persons present that they had done nothing more or less or otherwise, and publicly confessing with living voice that they had violated the sentence which our most holy brother Thado, Archbishop of Milan, and our other fellow bishops had sought from the apostolic see to be issued against Engiltrude, the wife of Boso, and which we, kindled by divine zeal, had canonically pronounced under the attestation of anathema—in all of which we have found that they transgressed apostolic and canonical enactments in many respects and wickedly violated the norm of equity, we judge to remain altogether alien from every office of the priesthood, defining by the judgment of the Holy Spirit and the authority of blessed Peter through us that they stand stripped of the governance of the episcopate. But to the aforesaid deposed men we grant permission to enter the church, communicate as laymen, and speak concerning their own interests; but we do not grant them the faculty of stirring up disturbances or seeking scandal. But as regards what specially pertains to episcopal ministry, let them possess no permission to handle it, as it is now established that we have decreed together with the holy synod.

C. X. Deponantur episcopi, qui excommunicatis communicant.

Item Nicolaus Papa. Teugaldum Treuerensem et primatem Belgicae prouinciae, et Guntarium Agrippinae Coloniae archiepiscopos, nunc coram uobis et sancta sinodo, sub gestorum insinuatione, qualiter causam Lotharii regis, et duarum mulierum eius, Thebergae scilicet et Gualdradae, recognouerint et iudicauerint, scriptum super hoc propriis manibus roboratum offerentes, nichilque se plus uel minus aut aliter egisse ore proprio multis coram positis affirmantes, et sententiam, quam a sede apostolica in Engiltrudam uxorem Bosonis sanctissimus frater noster Mediolanensis archiepiscopus Thado et ceteri coepiscopi nostri petiuerant emittendam, et nos diuino succensi zelo sub anathematis attestatione canonice protuleramus, publice uiua uoce se uiolasse confitentes, in quibus omnibus inuenimus eos apostolicas atque canonicas sanctiones in pluribus excessisse, et equitatis normam nequiter temerasse, ab omni iudicamus sacerdotii offitio manere penitus alienos, sancti Spiritus iudicio et B. Petri per nos auctoritate episcopatus exutos regimine consistere diffinientes. Predictis autem depositis licentiam concedimus ecclesiam ingrediendi, et communicandi sicut laici, et loquendi suas utilitates, non autem turbas concitandi uel scandalum sollicitandi illis tribuimus facultatem. Quantum autem ad episcopale ministerium specialiter pertinet, nulla eis sit licentia contingendi, sicut nos cum sancta sinodo decreuisse iam constat.

C. XI. Clerics and laymen who do not obey bishops are made infamous.

Likewise Clement, [letter III to all his Fellow Bishops]. But if all priests and the remaining clerics, all rulers both of higher and lower order, and the remaining peoples do not obey you bishops, they will be not only infamous but also exiles from the kingdom of God and from the fellowship of the faithful, and strangers to the thresholds of the holy church of God.

C. XI. Clerici et laici, qui non obediunt episcopis, infames efficiuntur.

Item Clemens. [epist. III. omnibus Coepiscopis] Si autem uobis episcopis non obedierint omnes presbiteri, et reliqui clerici, omnesque principes tam maioris ordinis quam inferioris, atque reliqui populi, non solum infames, sed etiam extorres a regno Dei et a consortio fidelium, et a liminibus sanctae Dei ecclesiae alieni erunt.

C. XII. One who saddens a teacher of truth sins against Christ.

Likewise Peter in the ordination of Clement. Whoever saddens a teacher of truth sins against Christ and exasperates God, the Father of all, on account of which he will also be deprived of life.

C. XII. In Christum peccat qui ueritatis doctorem contristat.

Item Petrus in ordinatione Clementis. Quicumque contristauerit doctorem ueritatis peccat in Christum, et patrem omnium exacerbat Deum, propter quod et uita carebit.

C. XIII. Obedience is not to be denied to a bishop through a simulated affection for virtues.

Likewise Ambrose in book II On Duties, [c. 24]. If anyone does not obey the bishop, desiring to raise and exalt himself, seeking also to overshadow the merits of the bishop by a simulated pursuit of learning, humility, or mercy, he strays from the truth and acts proudly, since this is the rule of truth: that one do nothing for the sake of commending oneself whereby another may be made lesser, nor, if you possess some good work, should you exercise it for the disfigurement and disparagement of another. § 1. Do not defend a wicked man, and do not judge that holy things are to be entrusted to one unworthy. § 2. Nor again accuse and attack one whose crime you have not detected.

C. XIII. Simulata uirtutum affectione non denegetur obedientia episcopo.

Item Ambrosius in libro [II.] de offitiis. [c. 24.] Si quis non obediat episcopo, sese extollere atque exaltare desiderans, querens etiam obumbrare merita episcopi simulata affectatione doctrinae, aut humilitatis, aut misericordiae, is a uero deuius superbit, quoniam ueritatis ea regula est, ut nichil faciat conmendandi sui causa, quo minor alius fiat, neque si quid boni operis habeas, id ad deformationem alterius et uituperationem exerceas. §. 1. Non defendas inprobum, et sancta indigno conmittenda non arbitreris. §. 2. Neque iterum arguas et inpugnes cuius crimen non deprehenderis.

C. XIV. One who does not obey the bishop is torn apart by the mouth of demons.

Likewise Pope Anterus, [to the Bishops of Spain]. Far be it from us to judge anything sinister concerning those who, succeeding to the apostolic rank, confect the body of Christ with their sacred mouth, through whom we are Christians, and who, possessing the keys of the kingdom of heaven, judge before the day of judgment. Indeed, in the old law it is held that whoever did not obey the priests either was placed outside the camp and stoned by the people, or, with his neck subjected to the sword, expiated his contempt with blood. But now the disobedient man is cut off by spiritual punishment, or, cast from the church, is torn apart by the ravenous mouth of demons.

C. XIV. Episcopo non obediens demonum ore decerpitur.

Item Anterus Papa. [Episcopis Hispaniae] Absit, ut quicquam sinistrum de his arbitremur, qui apostolico gradui succedentes Christi corpus sacro ore conficiunt, per quos nos Christiani sumus, qui claues regni celorum habentes ante iudicii diem iudicant. In ueteri quidem lege habetur: quicumque sacerdotibus non obtemperasset, aut extra castra positus lapidabatur a populo, aut gladio ceruice subiecta contemptum expiabat cruore. Nunc uero inobediens spirituali animaduersione truncatur, aut eiectus de ecclesia rapido ore demonum decerpitur.

C. XV. We ought not even to speak to those to whom the Pope is an enemy.

Likewise Peter in the ordination of Clement. If this Clement is an enemy to anyone because of his deeds, do not wait for him himself to tell you, etc., as above in the tract concerning those to be ordained, where the obedience of inferiors toward superiors is treated.

C. XV. Quibus Papa est inimicus, his nec loqui debemus.

Item Petrus in ordinatione Clementis. Si inimicus est iste Clemens alicui pro actibus suis, uos nolite expectare, ut ipse uobis dicat etc. ut supra in tractatu ordinandorum, ubi agitur de obedientia minorum erga maiores.

C. XVI. One who communicates with excommunicated persons is excommunicated.

Likewise Bishop Fabian, [letter I]. As the apostles established, saying: "One must not communicate with excommunicated persons; and if anyone, knowingly turning aside the rules, has at least spoken or prayed together in a house with an excommunicated person, let him be deprived of communion."

C. XVI. Excommunicatus est qui excommunicatis communicat.

Item Fabianus Episcopus. [epist. I.] Sicut apostoli statuerunt dicentes: "Cum excommunicatis non est communicandum, et si quis cum excommunicato auertendo regulas scienter saltim in domo simul locutus fuerit uel orauerit, ille communione priuetur."

C. XVII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Callistus, [letter II, c. 2]. Let no one receive any persons excommunicated by priests before a just examination of both parties, nor communicate with them in prayer, food, drink, or a kiss, nor say "Hail" to them, because whoever knowingly communicates with excommunicated persons in these or other prohibited things shall, in accordance with the institution of the apostles, himself lie under a like excommunication.

C. XVII. De eodem.

Item Calixtus Papa. [epist. II. c. 2.] Excommunicatos quosque a sacerdotibus nullus recipiat ante utriusque partis examinationem iustam, nec cum eis in oratione, aut cibo, uel potu, aut osculo communicet, nec Aue eis dicat, quia quicumque in his uel aliis prohibitis scienter excommunicatis communicauerit, iuxta apostolorum institutionem et ipse simili excommunicationi subiaceat.

C. XVIII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Isidore, [in the Rule of Monks, c. 18]. It is permitted neither to pray nor to speak with an excommunicated person—except for things which pertain to that same excommunication—nor to eat with him. For if anyone has spoken with him either openly or secretly, he shall immediately contract together with him the common penalty of excommunication.

C. XVIII. De eodem.

Item Ysidorus. [in regula monachorum, c. 18.] Cum excommunicato neque orare, neque loqui (nisi que ad eandem excommunicationem pertinent) neque uesci licet. Si quis enim cum eo aut palam, aut absconse fuerit locutus, communem statim cum eo excommunicationis contrahet penam.

C. XIX. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 73]. One who communicates with an excommunicated person, if he is a layman, shall be excommunicated; if a cleric, he shall be deposed.

C. XIX. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi. [IV. c. 73.] Qui communicauerit cum excommunicato, si laicus est, excommunicetur, si clericus deponatur.

C. XX. Let the names of excommunicated persons be announced openly and publicly to all their neighbors.

Likewise from a decree of Pope Honorius. Let all bishops take care to make known the names of all excommunicated persons equally to neighboring bishops and to their own parishioners and, after placing them in a prominent place before the doors of the church, to impress them upon all who assemble, so that through diligence in both respects ecclesiastical access may everywhere be closed to excommunicated persons and the ground of excuse taken away from all. PART II. GRATIAN. But this concerns those excommunicated by name. For we undergo the penalty of excommunication in two ways: both when we incur guilt and when we are marked by a sentence. Hence Jerome in the book of Judges, [homily II]:

C. XX. Excommunicatorum nomina uicinis omnibus palam et publice annuncientur.

Item ex decreto Honorii Papae. Curae sit omnibus episcopis, excommunicatorum omnino nomina tam uicinis episcopis, quam suis parrochianis pariter indicare, eaque in celebri loco posita pre foribus ecclesiae cunctis conuenientibus inculcare, quatinus in utraque diligentia excommunicatis ubique ecclesiasticus aditus excludatur, et excusationis causa omnibus auferatur. II. Pars. Gratian. Verum hoc de nominatim excommunicatis. Excommunicationis enim penam duppliciter subimus, et dum reatum incurrimus, et dum sententia notamur. Unde Ieronimus in libro Iudicum: [homil. II.]

C. XXI. In two ways someone is handed over to Satan.

Hear, finally, the Apostle speaking concerning him who had sinned: "I have handed," he says, "such a man over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, so that the spirit may be saved." You see, therefore, that even now God has handed offenders into the hands of enemies not only through His apostles, but sinners are also handed over for the destruction of the flesh through those who preside over the church and possess the power not only of loosing but also of binding, when they are separated from the body of Christ for their offenses. And, as it appears to me, men are even now handed over from the church into the power of the Devil in two ways. In this way, which we stated above: when his offense becomes manifest to the church and he is expelled from the church through the priests, so that, marked by all, he may blush, and after his conversion there may happen to him what follows: "so that the spirit may be saved on the day of our Lord Jesus Christ." But in another way someone is handed over to the Devil when his sin is not manifest to men, but God, who sees in secret, beholding his mind and dispositions serving vices and passions, and that in his heart not He but either avarice, lust, boasting, or other things of this kind are loved, Himself hands such a man over to Satan. How does He hand him over to Satan? He departs from his mind, turns Himself away, withdraws from his evil thoughts and unworthy desires, and leaves the house of his heart empty. GRATIAN. Therefore, when someone has been named by a sentence, we ought not to communicate with him. But when by guilt alone he has secretly contracted the penalty of excommunication, one must not cease from communion with him. Hence in the Gospel the Lord then at last said that the sinner was to be held as a heathen and a publican when he had despised hearing the church. The Apostle too does not say, "If anyone is a brother and a fornicator," but "if anyone is named a brother and a fornicator, etc.," understanding the naming of a sentence. Hence also Urban to Bishop Vilimund: "Indeed, concerning Richard," and the rest. Seek this below in the causa "A Certain Bishop Fell into Heresy." Hence also Christ in the Gospel said that the tares are to be tolerated until the harvest. Hence also Jerome in the same book of Judges:

C. XXI. Duobus modis aliquis sathanae traditur.

Audi denique apostolum dicentem de eo, qui peccauerat: "Tradidi," inquit, "huiusmodi hominem sathanae in interitum carnis, ut saluus fiat spiritus." Vides ergo, quia et modo non solum per apostolos suos Deus tradidit delinquentes in manus inimicorum, sed et per eos, qui ecclesiae president, et potestatem habent non solum soluendi, sed et ligandi, traduntur peccatores in interitum carnis, cum pro delictis suis a Christi corpore separantur. Et (ut michi uidetur) duppliciter etiam nunc traduntur homines de ecclesia in potestatem Zabuli. Hoc modo, quo superius diximus, cum delictum eius manifestum fit ecclesiae, et per sacerdotes de ecclesia pellitur, ut notatus ab omnibus erubescat, et conuerso eueniat ei illud, quod sequitur: "ut spiritus saluus fiat in die Domini nostri Iesu Christi." Alio autem modo quis traditus est Zabulo, cum peccatum eius non est manifestum hominibus, Deus autem, qui uidet in abscondito, perspiciens eius mentem et animos, uiciis ac passionibus seruientes, et in corde eius non se diligi, sed aut auaritiam, aut libidinem, aut iactantiam, uel alia huiusmodi: istum talem ipse Dominus tradit sathanae. Quomodo eum tradit sathanae? Discedit a mente eius, et auertit se, et refugit a cogitationibus eius malis et desideriis indignis, et relinquit domum cordis eius uacuam. Gratian. Cum ergo per sententiam quis nominatus fuerit, cum eo communicare non debemus. Cum autem solo reatu occulte excommunicationis contraxerit penam, non est ab eius communione cessandum. Unde Dominus in euangelio tunc demum peccatorem dixit habendum sicut ethnicum et publicanum, cum ecclesiam audire contempserit. Apostolus quoque non ait: "Si quis frater est fornicator," sed: "si quis frater nominatur fornicator etc.," sententiae nominationem intelligens. Hinc etiam Urbanus Vilimundo episcopo: "Sane quod super Richardo" et cetera. Require infra causam: "Quidam episcopus in heresim lapsus." Hinc etiam Christus in euangelio zizania dixit esse tolleranda usque ad messem. Hinc etiam Ieronimus in eodem libro iudicum:

C. XXII. The evil cannot be separated entirely from the good.

"Do not withdraw from the Lord even to the present day"—that is, while the world stands. Therefore let him show me how the Jebusite dwells with the sons of Judah in Jerusalem while the world stands, since not even the sons of Judah themselves dwell in Jerusalem. Therefore neither will it be possible for this to be true, that the Jebusites dwell with the Jews in Jerusalem, when not even they themselves dwell in it. But let us understand this spiritually, taking up the parable of the Gospel which says concerning the tares: "Permit both to grow, lest perhaps, wishing to uproot the tares, you uproot the wheat together with them." And below: § 1. Hear, therefore, the scripture saying that the sons of Judah were unable to destroy the Jebusites, but they dwelt with them in Jerusalem even to the present day. Hence I beseech you who are faithful to preserve your life and conduct in such a way that in no respect either you yourselves suffer scandal or cause scandal to others; but let it be your highest pursuit and greatest caution that no polluted person enter this congregation of the saints, that no Jebusite dwell among you. For you see that scripture says that the sons of Judah were unable to cast the Jebusites from Jerusalem. But "Jebusite" is interpreted "a trampling." Suppose, therefore, that we cannot cast out those who trample us; let us at least cast out those whom we can, whose sins are manifest. For where sin is not evident, we can cast no one from the church, lest perhaps in uprooting the tares we uproot the wheat together with them. Nevertheless, I am moved by the statement that they were unable to cast out the Jebusites, that is, those who are interpreted as "a trampling." And therefore let us see who are those who trample in the church. Without doubt they are those concerning whom the Lord said in the Gospels: "Do not give what is holy to dogs, nor your pearls before swine, lest perhaps they trample them under their feet and, turning, rend you." Therefore this is the Jebusite, "a trampling": those who, though unworthy, hear the word of God, and, when they have heard it, neither withdraw as unbelievers nor remain as faithful persons, but, after receiving knowledge of the mysteries and examining the more secret things of our faith, afterward turn and attack us and rend our hearts with their contradictions, trampling the pearls of the Lord's word and staining the ornaments of faith. Therefore concerning these it is said that the sons of Judah were unable to cast the Jebusite from Jerusalem even to the present day.

C. XXII. Mali a bonis penitus separari non possunt.

Nolite recedere a Domino usque in hodiernum diem hoc est donec seculum stat; ostendat ergo michi, quomodo Iebuseus, donec seculum stat, habitet cum filiis Iuda in Ierusalem, quippe cum nec ipsi quidem filii Iuda habitent in Ierusalem. Ideo ergo nec istud uerum esse poterit, quod Iebusei cum Iudeis habitent in Ierusalem, quando nec ipsi quidem habitent in ea. Sed nos intelligamus hoc spiritualiter, assumentes euangelii parabolam, que dicit de zizaniis: "Sinite utraque crescere, ne forte, uolentes zizania eradicare, eradicetis cum ipsis et triticum." Et infra: §. 1. Audi ergo scripturam dicentem, quia non potuerunt filii Iuda disperdere Iebuseos, sed habitauerunt cum ipsis in Ierusalem usque in hodiernum diem. Unde deprecor uos, qui fideles estis, ut ita uitam uestram et conuersationem seruetis, ne in aliquo uel ipsi scandalum patiamini, uel aliis scandalum faciatis: sed sit uobis summi studii summaeque cautelae, ne quis in hanc sanctorum congregationem pollutus introeat, ne quis Iebuseus habitet in uobis. Vides enim, quia dicit scriptura, quod non potuerunt eicere filii Iuda Iebuseos de Ierusalem. Iebuseus autem interpretatur conculcatio. Esto ergo quia non possumus eicere istos, qui nos conculcant, eos saltim, quos possumus, quorum peccata manifesta sunt, eiciamus. Ubi enim peccatum euidens non est, eicere de ecclesia neminem possumus, ne forte eradicantes zizania eradicemus simul cum illis et triticum. Mouet me tamen, quod dixit, quia non potuerunt eicere Iebuseos, id est eos, qui interpretantur conculcatio. Et ideo uideamus qui sint in ecclesia conculcantes. Illi sine dubio, de quibus Dominus in euangeliis dicebat: "Nolite mittere sanctum canibus, neque margaritas uestras ante porcos, ne forte conculcent eas pedibus suis et conuersi disrumpant uos." Iste est ergo Iebuseus conculcatio, qui indigni audiunt uerbum Dei, et, cum audierint, neque ut infideles discedunt, neque permanent ut fideles, sed percepta misteriorum notitia, et fidei nostrae secretioribus perscrutatis, conuersi postmodum inpugnant nos, et contradictionibus suis corda nostra disrumpunt, conculcantes uerbi dominici margaritas, et ornamenta fidei maculantes. De istis ergo dicitur, quia non potuerunt filii Iuda eicere Iebuseum de Ierusalem usque in hodiernum diem.

C. XXIII. Holy things are not to be entrusted to swine and dogs.

The same on the Twelve Prophets. Therefore, when an ecclesiastical man who is prudent and understanding has recognized that many impieties exist in what is called the house of God—and not only many but also powerful ones, which can oppress justice—and that the madness of teachers has advanced to such an extent that they receive a price in judgment and do all things for gifts, avoid the poor at the gates, and despise hearing them, let him be silent at that time, lest he give what is holy to dogs and cast pearls before swine, who turn and trample them; and let him imitate Jeremiah, who says: “I sat alone, because I was filled with bitterness.”

C. XXIII. Porcis et canibus sancta non sunt committenda.

Idem super duodecim Prophetas. Quando ergo ecclesiasticus uir, et prudens, atque intelligens, multas impietates in ea, que uocatur domus Dei, esse cognouerit, et non solum multas, sed et fortes, et que obprimere iustitiam possint, et in tantum rabiem doctorum processisse, ut accipiant pretium in iudicio, et omnia pro muneribus faciant, pauperes deuitent in portis, et audire contempnant, taceat in illo tempore, ne det sanctum canibus, et mittat margaritas ante porcos, qui conuersi conculcent eas; et imitetur Ieremiam dicentem: "Solus sedebam, quia amaritudine repletus sum."

C. XXIV. It is permitted to eat with a pagan, but by no means with an excommunicated person.

Likewise John Chrysostom, on the Epistle to the Hebrews. For if you wish to go to the table of pagans, we permit it without any prohibition. § 1. “For if anyone,” he says, “is named a brother among you.” In this place understand “brother” simply as every faithful person, not only a monk. But what is it that he calls brotherhood except the washing of regeneration, which makes it possible for God to be called Father? § 2. “If anyone,” he says, “has been named a brother who is a fornicator, or avaricious, or a drunkard, do not even take food with such a person.” But when he treated of pagans, he did not speak thus, but: “If anyone of the unbelievers”—meaning pagans—“invites you, and you wish to go, eat everything which is set before you. If anyone is named a brother who is a drunkard, etc.” O how great the integrity! We not only do not flee drunkards, but even go to them, participating with them. GRATIAN. Therefore it appears evidently from the foregoing that we are not compelled to avoid the communion of those who have not been marked by a sentence. But the marking of the sentence itself is also understood in several ways. § 1. For sometimes someone is barred from the thresholds of the church and from communion in the body and blood of Christ, either with conscience as witness, according to that statement of the Apostle: “Let a man prove himself, and thus let him eat of that bread and drink from the cup, because one who eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment for himself"; likewise that statement of Prosper: "More easily they will appease God for themselves, etc." Seek this below in the causa "Impeded by Sorceries," question 1, concerning penance; or by an ecclesiastical sentence, as penitents are, upon whom at a predetermined time the benefit of reconciliation is bestowed. And the sentence is called excommunication because it prohibits the person marked from communion in the body and blood of Christ, just as Adam also was excommunicated from eating of the tree of life, the Lord saying: "See that he not perhaps take of the tree of life." By this sentence someone is not separated from the fellowship of the faithful. There is also another sentence which is called anathema, by which someone is separated from the fellowship of the faithful, concerning which above: "Do not communicate with excommunicated persons." § 2. Anyone is permitted to notice this distinction from the authority of Pope John: "Engeltrude, the wife of Boso, etc." Seek this above in the causa "A Certain Bishop Cast from His Own See." Likewise from the authority of the same: "If anyone has violated the house of God, etc." Seek this below in the causa "A Certain Priest Weighed Down by Illness." Likewise from the authority of Pope Sylvester: "By the present decree we judge, etc." Seek this above in the causa "Concerning the Infamy of a Certain Bishop." § 3. According to this distinction, therefore, that authority of Innocent is to be understood: "If anyone, at the devil's persuasion, etc.," as below in the causa "A Certain Priest," so that, according to the etymology of the word, one who falls under that edict lies under anathema, that is, separation, because one who has dared to lay impious hands upon a cleric makes himself a stranger to the body and blood of Christ and to entry into the church. He also cannot be absolved by any bishop, that is, reconciled in the manner of penitents, unless he has first taken care to present himself before the apostolic presence. § 4. But that statement of Peter concerning Clement—"If this Clement is an enemy, etc."—is to be understood of those marked by sentence, as is also that statement of Urban: "Those with whom bishops do not communicate, etc.," as below in the same causa. Otherwise, that statement of the Second Council of Vaires would be false: "If only the bishop knows himself to be conscious of another's crime." Likewise also this: "It was resolved that if at any time a bishop, etc." Seek this above in the causa "Two Fornicators and Persons Marked by Infamy."

C. XXIV. Cum pagano comedere, sed cum excommunicato minime licet.

Item Iohannes Crisostomus, in epistola ad Ebreos. Ad mensam quippe paganorum si uolueris ire, sine ulla prohibitione permittimus. §. 1. "Si enim quis frater," inquit, "nominatur inter uos." Fratrem in hoc loco omnem fidelem simpliciter intellige, non monachum tantum. Quid autem est quod fraternitatem uocat, nisi lauacrum regenerationis, quod facit posse uocari Deum patrem? §. 2. "Si quis," inquit, "nominatus fuerit frater fornicator, aut auarus, aut ebriosus, cum huiusmodi neque cibum sumere." Cum autem de paganis ageret, non ita, sed: "Si quis uos uocauerit ex infidelibus," (paganos significans), "et uultis ire, omne, quod adponitur uobis, comedite. Si quis frater nominatur ebriosus etc." O quanta integritas! Nos non solum non fugimus ebriosos, sed etiam imus ad eos, participantes cum eis. Gratian. Euidenter itaque ex premissis apparet, quod eorum communionem uitare non cogimur, qui sententia notati non sunt. Sed et ipsius sententiae notatio multipliciter intelligitur. §. 1. Aliquando enim arcetur quis a liminibus ecclesiae et a communione corporis et sanguinis Christi, uel teste conscientia iuxta illud Apostoli: "probet se homo, et sic de pane illo edat et de calice bibat, quia qui indigne manducat et bibit, iudicium sibi manducat et bibit;" item illud Prosperi: "Facilius sibi Deum placabunt etc.," require infra causa: [XXXIII.] "Maleficiis inpeditus", questione 1. de penitentia; uel sententia ecclesiastica, sicut penitentes, quibus tempore prefinito beneficium reconciliationis inpenditur. Hec sententia excommunicatio uocatur, quia a communione corporis et sanguinis Christi notatum prohibet, sicut et

Adam ab esu ligni uitae excommunicatus est, Domino dicente: "Videte, ne forte sumat de ligno uitae." Qua sententia non separatur quis a consortio fidelium. Est et alia sententia, que anathema uocatur, qua quisque separatur a consortio fidelium, de qua supra: "Cum excommunicatis nolite communicare." §. 2. Hanc distinctionem cuique licet aduertere ex auctoritate Iohannis Papae: "Engiltrudam uxorem Bosonis etc." Require supra in causa: "Quidam episcopus a propria sede deiectus." Item ex auctoritate eiusdem: "Si quis domum Dei uiolauerit etc." Require infra causa: [XVII.] "Quidam presbiter infirmitate grauatus." Item ex auctoritate Siluestri Papae: "presenti decreto censemus etc." Require supra in causa: "In infamia cuiusdam episcopi." §. 3. Iuxta hanc ergo distinctionem intelligenda est illa auctoritas Innocentii: "Si quis suadente diabolo, etc." ut infra causa: "Quidam presbiter," ut iuxta ethimologiam uocabuli anathemati, id est separationi subiaceat qui in edictum illud inciderit, quia a corpore et sanguine Christi et ab ingressu ecclesiae se alienum facit, qui inpias manus in clericum inicere ausus fuerit; qui etiam a nullo episcoporum absolui, id est more penitentium reconciliari, poterit, nisi primum apostolico conspectui se representare curauerit. §. 4. Illud autem Petri de Clemente: "Si inimicus est iste Clemens etc." de sententia notatis intelligendum est, sicut et illud Urbani: "Quibus episcopi non communicant etc." ut infra in eadem causa. Ceterum falsum esset illud Varensis concilii II.: "Si tantum episcopus alieni sceleris se conscium nouit." Item et illud: "placuit, ut si quando episcopus etc."

require supra in causa: "Duo fornicatores et infamia notati."

C. XXV. It is not permitted to communicate with those who communicate with excommunicated persons.

Likewise Gregory to the Clergy and People of Salona. I ask and admonish that no one among you presume, against his own soul, to communicate with any priest who communicates with the above-written Maximus.

C. XXV. Communicare non licet his, qui excommunicatis communicant.

Item Gregorius Clero et populo Salonitano. Rogo et moneo, ne cuiquam sacerdoti, suprascripto Maximo communicanti, contra animam suam quisquam uestrum communicare presumat.

C. XXVI. Let no cleric or layman approach the house of an excommunicated person.

Likewise from the First Council of Toledo, [c. 15]. If any layman is suspended from communion, let no cleric or religious person approach his house. Similarly, if a cleric is suspended from communion, let him be avoided by clerics. If anyone is detected speaking or feasting with him, let him also be suspended from communion. But let this pertain to those clerics who belong to his bishop and to all who have been admonished concerning the person suspended from communion, whether any layman or cleric. PART III. GRATIAN. But this is specially the case concerning those who communicate with persons excommunicated by name. Hence Urban below: “Indeed, concerning Richard, etc.” Causa: “A Certain Bishop Fell into Heresy.” Likewise Pope Nicholas, “Most Excellent King Charles,” below near the end of this causa.

C. XXVI. Nullus clericorum uel laicorum ad domum excommunicati accedat.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano I. [c. 15.] Si quis laicus abstinetur, ad domum eius uel clericorum uel religiosorum nullus accedat. Similiter et clericus si abstinetur, a clericis deuitetur. Si quis cum illo colloqui aut conuiuari fuerit deprehensus, etiam ipse abstineatur. Sed hoc pertineat ad eos clericos, qui episcopi eius sunt, et ad omnes, qui conmoniti fuerint de eo, qui abstinetur, siue laico quolibet siue clerico. III. Pars. Gratian. Sed hoc specialiter in his, qui nominatim excommunicatis communicant.

Unde infra Urbanus: "Sane quod super Richardo etc." Causa: "Quidam episcopus in heresim lapsus." Item Nicolaus Papa "Excellentissimus rex Karolus" infra circa finem huius causae.

C. XXVII. The sentence of a shepherd is to be feared, even if he binds unjustly.

Likewise Urban, [to all Bishops, c. 5]. Do not communicate with those with whom bishops do not communicate, and do not receive those whom they have cast out. For the sentence of a bishop is greatly to be feared, even if he binds unjustly.

C. XXVII. Sententia pastoris timenda est, licet iniuste liget.

Item Urbanus. [omnibus Episcopis c. 5.] Quibus episcopi non communicant non communicetis, et quos eiecerint non recipiatis. Valde enim timenda est sententia episcopi, licet iniuste liget.

C. XXVIII. One who communicates with excommunicated persons contracts the penalty of excommunication.

Likewise from the Eighth Synod. If any brother has spoken with an excommunicated person either openly or secretly, or has been joined to him in communion, let him immediately contract together with him the penalty of excommunication.

C. XXVIII. Excommunicationis contrahit penam qui excommunicatis communicat.

Item ex VIII. Sinodo. Si quis frater aut palam, aut absconse cum excommunicato fuerit locutus, aut iunctus communione, statim cum eo excommunicationis contrahat penam.

C. XXIX. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Second Council of Carthage, [c. 7]. If those who have deservedly been driven from the church for their crimes are received into communion by any bishop, priest, or cleric, let that person also be held liable for an equal crime with them, since they flee the regular judgment of their own bishop.

C. XXIX. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi II. [c. 7.] Qui merito facinorum suorum ab ecclesia pulsi sunt, si ab episcopo aliquo, aut presbitero, uel clerico fuerint in communione suscepti, etiam ipse pari cum eis crimine teneatur obnoxius, refugientes sui episcopi regulare iudicium.

C. XXX. Let one who thinks the bishop's sentence unjust have recourse to the synod.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 66]. A cleric who thinks the bishop's severity toward him unjust shall have recourse to the synod.

C. XXX. Qui sententiam episcopi putat esse iniustam recurrat ad sinodum.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 66.] Clericus, qui episcopi districtionem circa se putat iniustam, recurrat ad sinodum.

C. XXXI. Ecclesiastical bonds are not to be despised.

Likewise John Chrysostom, on the Epistle to the Hebrews. Let no one despise ecclesiastical bonds. For it is not man who binds, but Christ, who gave this power and made men lords of so great an honor.

C. XXXI. Vincula ecclesiastica non sunt contempnenda.

Item Iohannes Crisostomus, super epistolam ad Ebreos. Nemo contempnat uincula ecclesiastica. Non enim homo est qui ligat, sed Christus, qui hanc potestatem dedit, et dominos fecit homines tanti honoris.

C. XXXII. One who is excommunicated by the church is handed over to Satan.

Likewise Augustine, On the Words of the Apostle, sermon LXXIX. Every Christian, most beloved, who is excommunicated by priests is handed over to Satan. How? Namely, because the devil is outside the church, just as Christ is in the church, and through this one who is removed from ecclesiastical communion is, as it were, handed over to the devil. Hence those whom the Apostle then declares to have been handed over to Satan he shows to have been excommunicated by himself.

C. XXXII. Sathanae traditur qui ab ecclesia excommunicatur.

Item Augustinus de uerbis apostoli, sermone LXXIX. Omnis Christianus, dilectissimi, qui a sacerdotibus excommunicatur, sathanae traditur: quomodo? scilicet, quia extra ecclesiam est diabolus, sicut in ecclesia Christus, ac per hoc quasi diabolo traditur qui ab ecclesiastica communione remouetur. Unde illos, quos tunc Apostolus sathanae esse traditos predicat, excommunicatos a se esse demonstrat.

[C. XXXIII.] The same on John.

Nothing ought a Christian to fear so much as to be separated from the body of Christ. For if he is separated from the body of Christ, he is not His member. If he is not His member, he is not enlivened by His spirit. “But whoever,” says the Apostle, “does not have the spirit of Christ, he is not His.” GRATIAN. Likewise Jerome: “Whose sins you shall forgive, etc.,” that is, those whom you have barred from the church, unless they have been reconciled through satisfaction, for them also the gate of the heavenly kingdom will be closed.

[C. XXXIII.] Idem super Iohannem.

Nichil sic debet formidare Christianus quam separari a corpore Christi. Si enim separatur a corpore Christi, non est membrum eius. Si non est membrum eius, non uegetatur spiritu eius. "Quisquis autem," inquit Apostolus, "spiritum Christi non habet, hic non est eius." Gratian. Item Ieronimus: "Quorum dimiseritis peccata etc.", id est quibus ecclesiam interdixeritis, nisi reconciliati per satisfactionem fuerint, ipsis et ianua celestis regni clausa erit.

C. XXXIV. Let neighboring bishops hear those who complain concerning the judgments of their own bishops.

Likewise from the Council of Milevis, [c. 22]. If priests, deacons, or other lower clerics complain concerning the judgments of their own bishops in cases which they have, let neighboring bishops hear them and, having been engaged by them with the consent of their own bishops, determine whatever lies between them. But if they think an appeal is to be made even from them, let them appeal only to African councils or to the primates of their provinces. But those who think an appeal is to be made to places across the sea shall be received in communion by no one within Africa.

C. XXXIV. Vicini episcopi audiant eos, qui de iudiciis episcoporum suorum queruntur.

Item ex Concilio Mileuitano. [c. 22.] Presbiteri, diaconi, uel ceteri inferiores clerici, si in causis, quas habuerint, de iudiciis episcoporum suorum conquesti fuerint, uicini eos episcopi audiant, et inter eos quicquid est diffiniant, adhibiti ab eis ex consensu suorum episcoporum. Quod si et ab eis prouocandum putauerint, non prouocent nisi ad Affricana concilia, uel ad primates suarum prouinciarum. Ad transmarina autem qui putauerint appellandum, a nullo intra Affricam in communione suscipiantur.

C. XXXV. The unjust condemnation of bishops is judged to be void.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 28]. We judge the unjust condemnation of bishops to be void and therefore to be reconsidered by a synod.

C. XXXV. Iniusta episcoporum dampnatio irrita esse censetur.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 28.] Irritam esse iniustam episcoporum dampnationem censemus, et idcirco a sinodo retractandam.

C. XXXVI. Let one who wishes to appear in his own case and assert his innocence do this within a year of excommunication.

Likewise from the Fifth Council of Carthage, [c. 12]. It was again established that, whenever clerics have been convicted or have confessed concerning some crime, whether because of those whose modesty is spared, or because of the reproach to the church or the mockery of heretics and gentiles, if perhaps they wish to appear in their own case and assert their innocence, let them do this within a year of excommunication. But if within a year they have despised clearing their case, let no voice of theirs thereafter be heard at all.

C. XXXVI. Qui suae causae adesse et innocentiam suam asserere uoluerit, intra annum hoc faciat excommunicationis.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi V. [c. 12.] Rursus constitutum est, ut quociens clericis conuictis uel confessis in aliquo crimine, uel propter eorum, quorum uerecundiae parcitur, uel propter ecclesiae obprobrium, aut insultationem hereticorum atque gentilium, si forte causae suae adesse uoluerint et innocentiam suam asserere, intra annum excommunicationis hoc faciant. Si uero intra annum causam suam purgare contempserint, nulla eorum uox penitus audiatur.

C. XXXVII. One who neglects to conduct the case of his excommunication within a year denies himself a hearing.

Likewise Gelasius. Whoever within the space of a year has not concluded his case civilly or publicly before those who excommunicated him shall appear to have closed the approach to a hearing against himself. But if they have died without communion with an obstinate mind, we, reserving their case to divine judgment in accordance with the sentence of blessed Leo our predecessor, ought not to communicate with them when dead when we did not communicate with them when alive.

C. XXXVII. Audientiam sibi negat qui excommunicationis suae causam agere intra annum dissimulat.

Item Gelasius. Quicumque intra anni spatium ciuiliter siue publice causam suam coram suis excommunicatoribus non peregerint, ipsi sibi aditum audientiae clausisse uideantur. Quod si obstinato animo sine communione defuncti fuerint, nos, illorum causam iuxta B. Leonis predecessoris nostri sententiam diuino iudicio reseruantes, quibus uiuis non communicauimus nec mortuis communicare debemus.

[PALEA. C. XXXVIII.

But one who knowingly communicates with an excommunicated person and from now on even prays together in a house, and furnishes him hiding places so that he may not be brought to satisfaction, shall know himself to be deprived of communion in the body and blood of the Lord until he receives penance from the excommunicator.]

[PALEA. C. XXXVIII.

Qui uero excommunicato scienter communicauerit, et amodo saltem in domo simul orauerit, atque latebras quo minus ad satisfactionem perducatur prebuerit, donec ab excommunicatore penitentiam accipiat, corporis et sanguinis Domini communione priuatum se esse cognoscat.]

C. XXXIX. Let one who, when ordered by a priest, despises leaving the church be received to pardon more slowly.

Likewise from the Council of Lleida, [c. 10]. One who, when ordered by a priest to leave the church for any fault, has despised doing so shall, for the offense of contumacy, be received to pardon more slowly. GRATIAN. But it is asked: if it happens that the bishop dies before the absolution of the condemned man, can the condemned man afterward be absolved? Concerning these things it was established thus in the Council of Épaone, [c. 28]:

C. XXXIX. Tardius recipiatur ad ueniam qui sacerdote iubente de ecclesia contempnit exire.

Item ex Concilio Ylerdensi. [c. 10.] Qui iubente sacerdote pro quacumque culpa ab ecclesia exire contempserit, pro noxa contumeliae tardius recipiatur ad ueniam. Gratian. Sed queritur, si ante dampnati absolutionem episcopum mori contigerit, utrum dampnatus postea ualeat absolui? De his ita statutum est in Concilio Epaunensi: [cap. 28.]

C. XL. Let one who remains bound after the death of a bishop be loosed by his successor.

If a bishop is carried off by death before the absolution of a condemned man, his successor will be permitted to absolve him when corrected or penitent. GRATIAN. The response to the foregoing authorities, by which we are commanded to obey an unjust sentence until the examination of both parties, is as follows: Gregory does not say that a sentence unjustly rendered is to be observed, but that it is to be feared. So too Urban. Therefore it is to be feared, that is, it is not to be despised from pride. But the remaining authorities speak concerning excommunicated persons who either, after being summoned to a synod, despised coming; or, not knowing how to meet the cunning devices of their adversaries, received an unjust sentence from the judge; or, by permitting a sinister opinion concerning themselves to arise through neglect of their lives, received a sentence against themselves. For these alone are permitted to be struck with a sentence of excommunication. Hence in the Council of Meaux, [c. 56]:

C. XL. A successore soluatur qui post mortem episcopi remanet ligatus.

Si episcopus ante dampnati absolutionem obitu rapiatur, correctum aut penitentem successori licebit absoluere. Gratian. Premissis auctoritatibus, quibus iniustae sententiae usque ad examinationem utriusque partis parere iubemur, ita respondetur: Gregorius non dicit sententiam iniuste latam esse seruandam, sed timendam. Sic et Urbanus. Timenda ergo est, id est non ex superbia contempnenda. Reliquae uero auctoritates de excommunicatis locuntur, qui uel uocati ad sinodum uenire contempserunt, uel calliditatibus aduersantium occurrere nescientes iniustam sententiam a iudice reportauerunt, uel qui, neglectu suae uitae sinistram de se opinionem nasci permittentes, sententiam in se exceperunt. Hos siquidem solos excommunicationis sententia ferire licet. Unde in Meldensi Concilio: [c. 56.]

C. XLI. For what compelling faults someone is to be deprived of communion.

Let none of the bishops deprive anyone of ecclesiastical communion without a certain and manifest cause of sin. But let no one presume to place anyone under anathema without the knowledge of the archbishop or fellow bishops, except for a cause concerning which canonical authority teaches, because anathema is the condemnation of eternal death and ought to be imposed only for a mortal crime and upon those who could not otherwise be corrected.

C. XLI. Quibus exigentibus culpis aliquis sit communione priuandus.

Nemo episcoporum quemlibet sine certa et manifesta peccati causa communione priuet ecclesiastica. Sub anathemate autem sine conscientia archiepiscopi, aut coepiscoporum nullum presumat ponere, nisi unde canonica docet auctoritas, quia anathema eterna est mortis dampnatio, et non nisi pro mortali debet inponi crimine, et illis qui aliter non poterint corrigi.

C. XLII. Let no one be deprived of communion for small and light causes.

Likewise from the Council of Clermont. Let none of the priests suspend from communion any man of right faith for small and light causes, except for those faults for which the ancient Fathers commanded those committing them to be barred from the church.

C. XLII. Pro paruis et leuibus causis nullus communione priuetur.

Item ex Concilio Aruernensi. Nullus sacerdotum quemquam rectae fidei hominem pro paruis et leuibus causis a communione suspendat, preter eas culpas, pro quibus antiqui patres arceri ab ecclesia iusserunt conmittentes.

C. XLIII. Let anyone be deprived of communion for these three crimes.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur. It is certain that someone ought to be excommunicated for these three crimes: when, canonically summoned to the synod, he despises coming; or if, after he has come there, he refuses to obey priestly commands; or if he presumes to depart from the synod before the examination of his case has been completed. PART IV. GRATIAN. The foregoing authorities, I say, speak concerning these and similar persons, not concerning those suspended unjustly. But that an unjust sentence is not to be obeyed is proved by many authorities. The first of these is that of Jerome on Matthew, [book III]:

C. XLIII. Pro his tribus criminibus quilibet communione priuetur.

Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. Certum est, pro his tribus criminibus aliquem excommunicari debere, cum ad sinodum canonice uocatus uenire contempnit, aut si postquam illuc uenerit, sacerdotalibus respuit obedire preceptis, aut si ante finitam suae causae examinationem a sinodo abire presumit. IV. Pars. Gratian. De his, inquam, et huiusmodi premissae auctoritates locuntur, non de iniuste suspensis. Quod autem iniustae sententiae parendum non sit, multis auctoritatibus probatur. Quarum prima est illa Ieronimi super Matheum: [libro III.]

C. XLIV. The sentence of a shepherd does not establish or make a person guilty or innocent.

Just as a priest does not make a leper clean, so a bishop or priest does not bind those who are innocent or loose the guilty; but, according to his office, when he has heard the varieties of sins, he knows who is to be bound and who loosed. [PALEA.

C. XLIV Sententia pastoris reum uel innocentem non constituit uel facit.

Quomodo sacerdos mundum leprosum non facit, sic episcopus uel presbiter non alligat eos, qui insontes sunt, nec, soluit noxios, sed pro offitio suo cum peccatorum uarietates audierit, scit qui ligandus sit, qui soluendus. [PALEA.

C. XLV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Augustine on Matthew. It is ridiculous that we say that man is clean who is bound by the bonds of his sins, solely because a bishop is said to possess power of this kind, so that those loosed by him are loosed in heaven and those bound on earth are bound in heaven. Therefore let the one who binds or looses another be blameless.]

C. XLV. De eodem.

Item Augustinus super Mattheum. Ridiculum est, ut eum mundum esse dicamus, qui uinculis peccatorum suorum ligatus est, propter hoc solum, quod episcopus dicitur habere huiusmodi potestatem, ut soluti ab eo soluti sint in celo, et ligati in terris ligati sint in celo. Sit ergo inreprehensibilis qui alterum ligat aut soluit.]

C. XLVI. Absolution is not to be sought when an iniquitous sentence is rendered.

Likewise Pope Gelasius to the Eastern Bishops concerning the condemnation of Dioscorus. Let one against whom a sentence has been brought put away his error; but the sentence is void if it is unjust, and he ought to care for it the less, inasmuch as an iniquitous sentence can burden no one before God and His church. Therefore let him not desire to be absolved from that by which he perceives himself in no way bound.

C. XLVI. Non est petenda solutio, cum iniqua fertur sententia.

Item Gelasius Papa Episcopis orientalibus de dampnatione Dioscori. Cui est illata sententia deponat errorem, et uacua est; si iniusta est, tanto curare eam non debet, quanto apud Deum et eius ecclesiam neminem potest grauare iniqua sententia. Ita ergo ea se non absolui desideret, qua se nullatenus perspicit obligatum.

C. XLVII. God neither harms nor permits anyone to be harmed unjustly.

Likewise Augustine, On the Highest Good. According to the catholic faith, no one can harm the nature of God, nor can the nature of God unjustly harm anyone, nor does it permit anyone to be harmed unjustly.

"For one who harms," as the Apostle says, "will receive that which he has harmed."

C. XLVII. Deus non nocet, nec noceri patitur aliquem iniuste.

Item Augustinus de summo bono. Secundum catholicam fidem, nec Dei naturae quisquam nocere potest, nec natura Dei nocere iniuste cuiquam potest nec noceri iniuste patitur quemquam.

"Qui enim nocet (ut ait Apostolus) recipiet hoc quod nocuit."

C. XLVIII. Justice breaks unjust bonds.

The same, [sermon 16], On the Words of the Lord. You have begun to hold your brother as a publican: you bind him on earth, but see that you bind justly. For justice breaks unjust bonds. "Whomever you loose," He says, "on earth will be loosed in heaven."

C. XLVIII. Iniusta uincula disrumpit iustitia.

Idem [sermone 16.] de uerbis Domini. Cepisti habere fratrem tuum tamquam publicanum: ligas illum in terra, sed ut iuste alliges uide. Nam iniusta uincula disrumpit iustitia. "Quem solueris," inquit, "in terra, solutus erit in celo."

C. XLIX. Rashness in judging harms not the one who is judged, but the judge.

The same, On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, [book II, c. 29]. A rash judgment very often harms the one concerning whom judgment is rashly made in no way. But it is necessary that rashness itself harm the one who judges rashly.

C. XLIX. Temeritas iudicandi non ei, qui iudicatur, sed iudici nocet.

Idem de sermone Domini in monte. [l. II. c. 29.] Temerarium iudicium plerumque nichil nocet ei, de quo temere iudicatur. Ei autem, qui temere iudicat, ipsa temeritas necesse est ut noceat.

C. L. An unjust sentence does not harm a man.

The same to the Clergy of Hippo, [letter CXXXVII]. What harm is it to a man that human ignorance wishes to erase him from that tablet, if an iniquitous conscience does not erase him from the book of the living?

C. L. Non obest homini iniusta sententia.

Idem ad Clerum Yponiensem. [epist. CXXXVII.] Quid obest homini, quod ex illa tabula uult eum delere humana ignorantia, si de libro uiuentium non eum deleat iniqua conscientia?

[C. LI.]

The same to Secundinus the Manichaean, [c. 1]. Think of Augustine whatever you please: only let my conscience not accuse me in the eyes of God.

[C. LI.]

Idem ad Secundinum Manicheum. [c. 1.] Senti de Augustino quicquid libet: sola me in oculis Dei conscientia non accuset.

C. LII. Let those whom conscience justifies not fear the curses of others.

Likewise Gregory to Constantius, Bishop of Milan, [book VI, letter 14]. In all adversities which happen in this life, as you know, the severity of almighty God alone is to be weighed, and one must always have recourse to one's own heart, so that no person's tongue may entangle where conscience does not accuse. For one whom conscience defends is free amid accusations, and one cannot be free without accusation if conscience alone, which accuses inwardly, accuses him. Far be it, therefore, from judgment concerning your Holiness that those things which we believe fabricated by the rumors of slanderous men be brought into any measure of suspicion, because we also possess the testimony of sacred utterance that, when perhaps greater evils are spoken, they ought not to be believed unless proved, but, when proved, ought swiftly to be avenged. § 1. I have therefore said these things to show that it is a mark of excessive levity if anyone endeavors to believe grave evils which cannot be proved. Hence your Holiness ought to separate your mind from the rumors and detraction of slanderous men and to think only of those things which belong to the interior life and advance the utility of subjects.

C. LII. Quos conscientia iustificat, aliorum maledicta non timeant.

Item Gregorius Constantino, Episcopo Mediolanensi. [lib. VI. epist. 14.] In cunctis, que in hac uita aduersa proueniunt, sola est, sicut nostis, omnipotentis Dei districtio pensanda, atque ad cor proprium semper recurrendum, ut nullius ibi lingua inplicet, ubi conscientia non accusat. Quem enim conscientia defendit liber est inter accusationes, et liber sine accusatione esse non potest, si sola, que interius addicit, conscientia accuset. De uestra igitur sanctitate absit a Christianorum iudicio ea, que maledicorum hominum rumoribus conficta credimus, in qualicumque modulo suspicionis adduci, quia et sacri eloquii testimonium tenemus, ut mala maiora cum forsitan dicuntur, nisi probata credi non debeant, sed citius probata ulcisci. §. 1. Hec igitur dixi, ut nimiae leuitatis esse ostenderem, si quis mala grauia credere studeat, que probari non possunt. Unde sanctitas uestra debet mentem suam a maledicorum hominum rumoribus atque obtrectatione disiungere, et sola quae internae uitae sunt atque ad utilitatem subditorum proficiunt cogitare.

C. LIII. One whom God justifies is despised by man in vain.

Likewise Augustine on Psalm XXXVI, [discourse 3, at the verse "Nor Will He Condemn Him"]. Even if you are condemned for a time by man, even if you recite the proconsul's sentence against Cyprian, the earthly chair is one thing, the heavenly tribunal another. From the inferior he receives a sentence; from the superior, a crown.

C. LIII. Frustra aspernatur ab homine quem Deus iustificat.

Item Augustinus in Psalmo XXXVI. [concione 3. ad uers. Nec dampnabit eum] Et si dampnaris ad tempus ab homine, et si dixeris sententiam proconsulis in Ciprianum, aliud est sella terrena, aliud est tribunal celeste. Ab inferiori accipit sententiam, a superiori coronam.

[C. LIV.]

The same on Psalm XXXVII, [at the verse "Because I Have Hoped in You"]. Guard your innocence within, where no one oppresses your case. False testimony will prevail against you, but among men. Surely it will not prevail before God, where your case is to be pleaded? When God is judge, there will be no witness other than your conscience. Between the just judge and your conscience, fear nothing except your case.

[C. LIV.]

Idem in Psalmo XXXVII. [ad uers. Quoniam in te speraui.] Custodi intus innocentiam tuam, ubi nemo obprimit causam tuam. Preualebit in te falsum testimonium, sed apud homines. Numquid apud Deum ualebit, ubi causa tua dicenda est? Quando Deus erit iudex, alius testis quam conscientia tua non erit. Inter iudicem iustum et conscientiam tuam noli timere nisi causam tuam.

C. LV. We ought to care for consciences, not the tongues of men.

Likewise Pope Gregory, [to the priest Palladius, book VIII, letter 45]. Amid the words of those praising or disparaging us, one must always have recourse to the mind; and if the good which is said concerning us is not found in it, this ought to generate great sorrow; and again, if the evil which men speak concerning us is not found in it, we ought to leap into great joy. For what if not all praise us and conscience demonstrates us to be free? We have Paul saying: "Our glory is this, the testimony of our conscience." Job too says: "Behold, my witness is in heaven." Therefore, if there is for us a witness in heaven and a witness in the heart, let us permit fools outside to say what they wish. § 1. For what else do detractors do except blow into dust and stir earth into their own eyes, so that the more they blow detraction from there, the more they see nothing of the truth? Nevertheless, even they are to be summoned and calmly admonished, and satisfaction ought to be given to them by every means, knowing what the Truth says concerning the Jews: "Lest perhaps we scandalize them." But if they are unwilling to be satisfied by the truth, you possess consolation which you may behold in the Gospel. For when it had been said to the Lord, "Do you know that, upon hearing this word, the Jews were scandalized?" He answered: "Let them alone; they are blind leaders of the blind." The apostle Paul also admonishes, saying: "If it is possible, insofar as it is from you, having peace with all men." Being about to say, "Let us have peace with all," and perceiving that this is difficult, he first said, "if it is possible." And he added what is possible when he says, "insofar as it is from you," because if we desire to preserve charity in our mind toward those who hate us, although they do not have peace with us, we nevertheless without doubt have peace with them. GRATIAN. This is to be observed among those who are ready to suspect what they do not see, always ready to reprove, never to imitate. But among others conscience is necessary for us, reputation for them. Hence Augustine, [book On the Good of Widowhood, c. 22]:

C. LV. Non hominum linguas, sed conscientias curare debemus.

Item Gregorius Papa. [Palladio Presbitero, lib. VIII. epist. 45.] Inter uerba laudantium siue uituperantium ad mentem semper recurrendum est, et si in ea non inuenitur bonum, quod de nobis dicitur, magnam tristitiam generare debet; et rursum si in ea non inuenitur malum, quod de nobis homines locuntur, in magnam debemus letitiam prosilire. Quid enim, si non omnes laudant et conscientia liberos nos demonstret? Habemus Paulum dicentem: "Gloria nostra hec est, testimonium conscientiae nostrae." Iob quoque dicit: "Ecce in celo testis meus." Si ergo nobis est testis in celo, testis in corde, dimittamus stultos foris loqui quod uolunt. §. 1. Quid enim aliud detrahentes faciunt, nisi in puluerem sufflant, et in oculos suos terram excitant, ut unde plus detractionis perflant, inde magis ueritatis nichil uideant? Vocandi tamen sunt etiam ipsi et tranquille admonendi, eisque satisfieri modis omnibus debet, scientes quod de Iudeis ueritas dicit: "Ne forte scandalizemus eos." Si autem satisfieri sibi ex ueritate noluerint, habes consolationem, quam in euangelio aspicias. Cum enim Domino dictum fuisset: "Scis, quia audito hoc uerbo scandalizati sunt Iudei?" Respondit: "Sinite illos, ceci sunt duces cecorum." Paulus quoque apostolus ammonet, dicens: "Si fieri potest, quod ex uobis est, cum omnibus hominibus pacem habentes." Dicturus, "cum omnibus pacem habeamus," hoc difficile esse perspiciens premisit: "si fieri potest." Et subiunxit: "quod fieri potest," cum dicit, "quod ex uobis est:" quia si nos in mente karitatem erga odientes seruare cupimus, etsi illi nobiscum pacem non habent, nos tamen cum illis sine dubio habemus. Gratian. Hoc inter eos obseruandum est, qui parati sunt suspicari quod non uident, parati semper reprehendere, numquam imitari. Apud alios autem conscientia est necessaria nobis, fama illis. Unde Augustinus: [lib. de bono uiduit. c. 22.]

C. LVI. Conscience is necessary for us, reputation for our neighbors.

Neither holy men nor women are to be heard when, after being reproved for some negligence through which it happens that they come under an evil suspicion from which they know their life to be far removed, they say that conscience before God suffices for them, shamelessly and also cruelly despising the estimation of men, since they kill the souls of others: either of those blaspheming the way of God, to whom, according to their suspicion, the life of the saints, which is chaste, is displeasing as though it were shameful; or also of those who imitate, with an excuse, not what they see but what they suppose. Therefore, whoever guards his life from the crimes of outrages and misdeeds benefits himself; but whoever also guards his reputation is merciful toward others. For our life is necessary for us; our reputation, for others.

> C. LVI. Conscientia nobis, fama proximis necessaria est.
> Non sunt audiendi, siue uiri sancti siue feminae, qui quando reprehenduntur in aliqua negligentia, per quam fit ut in malam ueniant suspicionem, unde suam uitam longe abesse sciunt, dicunt coram Deo sufficere sibi conscientiam, existimationem hominum non solum inpudenter, uerum etiam crudeliter contempnentes, cum occidant animas aliorum, siue blasphemantium uiam Dei, (quibus secundum suam suspicionem quasi turpis, que casta est, displicet uita sanctorum), uel etiam cum excusatione imitantium non quod uident, sed quod putant. Proinde quisquis a criminibus flagiciorum atque facinorum uitam suam custodit, sibi benefacit; quisquis autem etiam famam, et in aliis est misericors. Nobis enim necessaria uita nostra est, aliis fama nostra.

C. LVII. Before God one who pronounces a sentence discordant with conduct is accursed.

Likewise Jerome on Paul's Epistle to Philemon. If anyone has said that the just man is unjust and the unjust man just, each is abominable before God. Similarly, one who calls a holy man unholy and, again, asserts that an unholy man is holy is abominable before God.

> C. LVII. Apud Deum maledicitur qui moribus dissonam profert sententiam.
> Item Ieronimus super epistola Pauli ad Philemonem. Si quis dixerit iustum iniustum, et iniustum iustum, abhominabilis est uterque apud Deum. Similiter qui sanctum dicit non sanctum, et rursus non sanctum asserit sanctum, abhominabilis apud Deum est.

C. LVIII. One who believes a holy person to be unholy, or an unholy person holy, violates Christ.

The same, [in the same place a little above]. If anyone has believed that a man who is not holy is holy and has joined him to the fellowship of God, he violates Christ, whose members we are. And below: § 1. According to the Apostle, all who believe are made the body of Christ. One who errs and slips in the body of Christ, asserting that a member of it is holy when it is not, or is not holy when it is, see to what crime he becomes liable. Isaiah says: "Woe to those who call sweet bitter, and bitter sweet, placing darkness as light and light as darkness." I think holiness is sweet; what is contrary to holiness, bitter.

> C. LVIII. Christum uiolat qui sanctum non sanctum, uel non sanctum sanctum esse crediderit.
> Idem. [ibidem paulo superius.] Si quis hominem, qui sanctus non est, sanctum esse crediderit, et Dei eum iunxerit societati, Christum uiolat, cuius membra sumus. Et infra: §. 1. Omnes credentes secundum Apostolum Christi corpus efficimur. Qui in corpore Christi errat et labitur, asserens membrum eius sanctum esse, cum non sit, uel non esse sanctum, cum sit, uide quali crimine obnoxius fiat: Ysaias ait: "Vae his qui dicunt dulce amarum, et amarum dulce, ponentes tenebras lucem, et lucem tenebras." Dulce puto esse sanctimoniam; amarum quod sanctimoniae contrarium est.

C. LIX. One who calls the good evil and the evil good will find the penalty of eternal condemnation.

Likewise Isaiah, [c. 5]. Woe to you who call good evil and evil good, placing darkness as light and light as darkness. § 1. Therefore my people were led captive because they had no knowledge, and their nobles perished by hunger, and their multitude dried up by thirst. Therefore hell enlarged its soul and opened its mouth without any limit; and its mighty men, its people, and its lofty and glorious men descended to it; and man will be bowed down, and the man will be humbled, and the eyes of the lofty will be cast down; and the Lord will be exalted in judgment, and the holy God will be sanctified in justice.

C. LIX. Eternae dampnationis inueniet penam qui bonos malos, et malos bonos dixerit.

Item Ysaias. [c. 5] Vae, qui dicitis bonum malum, et malum bonum, ponentes tenebras lucem, et lucem tenebras. §. 1. Propterea captiuus ductus est populus meus, quia non habuit scientiam, et nobiles eius interierunt fame, et multitudo eius siti exaruit. Propterea dilatauit infernus animam suam, et aperuit os suum absque ullo termino, et descenderunt fortes eius, et populus eius, et sublimes gloriosique eius ad eum, et incuruabitur homo, et humiliabitur uir, et oculi sublimium deprimentur, et exaltabitur Dominus in iudicio, et Deus sanctus sanctificabitur in iustitia.

C. LX. One who exercises the power of binding or loosing unjustly deprives himself of it.

Likewise Gregory in homily XXVI, [on the Gospels]. One who exercises the power of binding and loosing according to his own wishes and not according to the conduct of his subjects deprives himself of this power.

C. LX. Ligandi uel soluendi potestate se priuat qui hanc iniuste exercet.

Item Gregorius in omelia XXVI. [in Euang.] Ipse ligandi atque soluendi se potestate priuat qui hanc pro suis uoluntatibus, et non pro subditorum moribus exercet.

C. LXI. Concerning the same.

The same, [in the same place a little below]. Those who follow their own hatreds or favor in the cases of their subjects are unable to judge their subjects worthily.

C. LXI. De eodem.

Idem. [ibidem paulo inferius] Iudicare digne de subditis nequeunt qui in subditorum causis sua uel odia, uel gratiam secuntur.

C. LXII. The absolution of the one presiding is not true unless it follows the judgment of the internal judge.

The same, [in the same place a little below]. Then the absolution of the one presiding is true when it follows the judgment of the internal judge. This is well signified by that resurrection of the man dead for four days, which plainly demonstrates that the Lord first raised and enlivened the dead man, saying, “Lazarus, come forth,” and afterward he who had been dead, having come forth alive, was loosed by the disciples, as it is written.

C. LXII. Non est uera presidentis absolutio, nisi sequatur arbitrium interni iudicis.

Idem. [ibidem paulo inferius] Tunc uera est absolutio presidentis, cum interni sequitur arbitrium iudicis. Quod bene quatriduani mortui resuscitatio illa significat, que uidelicet demonstrat, quia Dominus prius mortuum suscitauit et uiuificauit, dicens: "Lazare, ueni foras," et postmodum is, qui uiuus fuerat, egressus a discipulis est solutus, sicut scriptum est.

C. LXIII. One who abuses a privilege merits being stripped of it.

The same in the Register. One who abuses the power permitted to him altogether merits losing the privilege.

C. LXIII. Priuilegio meretur exui qui eodem abutitur.

Idem in Registro. Priuilegium omnino meretur amittere qui permissa sibi abutitur potestate.

C. LXIV. One against whom a canonical sentence is not rendered ought not to bear a canonical penalty.

The same, [Gregory to the subdeacon Anthony, book II, indiction XI, letter 9]. One in whose condemnation a canonical sentence was not pronounced ought not to sustain a canonical penalty.

GRATIAN. From these things it is given to be understood that an unjust sentence binds no one before God, nor is anyone burdened by an iniquitous sentence before His church, as is held from the chapter of Gelasius. Therefore one must not abstain from the communion of a person against whom an iniquitous sentence is known to have been pronounced, nor must he cease from his office. Why, therefore, do the chapters of the Councils of Carthage and Africa and of other councils prohibit one unjustly condemned from being received into communion before examination of the judgment? Why also was that statute of the Council of Mainz established:

C. LXIV. In quem canonica non fertur sententia, penam non debet ferre canonicam.

Idem. [Gregorius Antonio Subdiacono, lib. II. Indict. XI. epist 9.] Non debet is penam sustinere canonicam, in cuius dampnatione non est canonica prolata sententia.

Gratian. Ex his datur intelligi, quod iniusta sententia nullum alligat apud Deum, nec apud ecclesiam eius aliquis grauatur iniqua sententia, sicut ex Gelasii capitulo habetur. Non ergo ab eius communione abstinendum est, nec ei ab offitio cessandum, in quem cognoscitur iniqua sententia prolata. Cur ergo capitula Cartaginensis et Affricani, atque aliorum conciliorum prohibent iniuste dampnatum in communione recipi ante iudicii examinationem? Cur et illud Magontiensis Concilii statutum est:

C. LXV. How one condemned by a synod is restored as innocent in a second synod.

A bishop, priest, or deacon unjustly cast from his rank, if he is found innocent in a second synod, cannot be what he was unless he receives the lost insignia of rank before the altar from the hands of the bishops: if he is a bishop, the orarium, staff, and ring; if a priest, the orarium and chasuble; if a deacon, the orarium and alb; if a subdeacon, the paten and chalice. Thus also let the remaining ranks in their restoration receive those things which they had received when they were ordained. PART V. GRATIAN. If, therefore, even those unjustly cast down cannot be restored by bishops unless they receive from their hands what they had lost, how is anyone permitted by his own authority to communicate with persons unjustly bound and for them to celebrate their offices without absolution having been sought, as Gelasius appears to think? To these things it must be answered that a sentence is sometimes unjust from the disposition of the one pronouncing it, but just from its order and cause; sometimes it is just from disposition and cause, but not from order; sometimes it is just from disposition and order, but not from cause. But when it has been unjust from cause, sometimes there is in him no offense at all which is worthy of condemnation; sometimes that concerning which the sentence is rendered is not in him, but he is to be marked for another matter. It is unjust from disposition when someone, with the integrity of the judicial order preserved, pronounces a sentence against an adulterer or any criminal, induced not by love of justice but by the spite of hatred, a price, or favor toward the adversaries. Hence Bede says on the Epistle of James: "For the anger of man does not work the justice of God," because one who pronounces a sentence against someone in anger, although the latter, as regards himself, receives a just sentence, nevertheless the former, who gave sentence against him not from love of justice but from the spite of hatred, does not imitate the justice of God, upon whom disturbance does not fall.

C. LXV. Qui dampnatur a sinodo quomodo in secunda innocens reparetur.

Episcopus, presbiter aut diaconus a gradu suo iniuste deiectus, si in secunda sinodo innocens inueniatur non potest esse quod fuerat, nisi gradus amissos recipiat coram altari de manu episcoporum: si episcopus est, orarium, et baculum et anulum; si presbiter, orarium et planetam; si diaconus, orarium et albam; si subdiaconus, patenam et calicem. Sic et reliqui gradus in reparatione sua recipiant ea, que, cum ordinarentur, perceperant. V. Pars. Gratian. Si ergo iniuste deiecti nec etiam per episcopos reparari possunt, nisi de manibus eorum recipiant quod amiserant: quomodo sua auctoritate cuique licet iniuste ligatis communicare, et eis, non petita absolutione, sua celebrare offitia, sicut Gelasius uidetur sentire? Ad hec respondendum est, quod sententia aliquando est iniusta ex animo proferentis, iusta uero ex ordine et causa; aliquando est iusta ex animo et causa, sed non ex ordine; aliquando est iusta ex animo et ex ordine sed non ex causa. Cum autem ex causa iniusta fuerit, aliquando nullum in eo omnino delictum est, quod sit dampnatione dignum: aliquando non est in eo illud, super quod fertur sententia, sed ex alio nominandus est. Ex animo est iniusta, cum aliquis seruata integritate iudiciarii ordinis in adulterum uel in quemlibet criminosum non amore iustitiae, sed liuore odii, uel precio, aut fauore aduersariorum inductus sententiam profert. Unde Beda super epistolam Iacobi ait: "Ira enim uiri iustitiam Dei non operatur:" quia qui iratus in aliquem sententiam profert, etsi ille quantum ad se iustam reportet sententiam, iste tamen, qui non amore iustitiae, sed liuore odii in eum sententiam dedit, iustitiam Dei, in quem perturbatio non cadit, non imitatur.

C. LXVI. A sentence of justice is not to be rendered for rewards.

Likewise Gregory. One who judges rightly and expects a reward of recompense perpetrates fraud against God, because by accepting money he sells the justice which he ought to impart freely. Those who judge justly for temporal gain use good things badly.

For it is not the defense of justice but love of reward that provokes such men toward the truth; if the hope of money is taken from them, they immediately withdraw from the confession of justice. The acceptance of money is a transgression of truth. Hence it is also said concerning the just man: "He who shakes his hands free from every gift will dwell on high."

C. LXVI. Sententia iustitiae non est pro premiis ferenda.

Item Gregorius. Qui recte iudicat, et premium remunerationis expectat, fraudem in Deo perpetrat, quia iustitiam, quam gratis inpertire debuit, acceptione pecuniae uendit. Bonis male utuntur qui pro temporali lucro iuste iudicant.

Tales quippe ad ueritatem non iustitiae defensio, sed amor premii prouocat; quibus si spes nummi subtrahitur, confestim a iustitiae confessione recedunt. Acceptio nummorum preuaricatio ueritatis est. Unde et pro iusto dicitur: "Qui excutit manus suas ab omni munere, iste in excelsis habitabit."

C. LXVII. In the works of rulers let reason claim everything for itself.

The same to Emperor Maurice. That solicitude of rulers is useful, that caution praiseworthy, in which reason does everything and fury claims nothing for itself. Power is to be restrained under reason, nor is anything to be done before the agitated mind returns to tranquility. For in a time of agitation it thinks everything it has done just.

C. LXVII. In prepositorum operibus totum sibi ratio uendicet.

Idem Mauricio inperatori. Illa prepositorum sollicitudo utilis est, illa est cautela laudabilis, in qua totum ratio agit, et furor sibi nichil uendicat. Restringenda sub ratione potestas est, nec quid agendum prius, quam concitata ad tranquillitatem mens redeat. Nam conmotionis tempore iustum putat omne quod fecerit.

C. LXVIII. One who pronounces a sentence from anger sins gravely.

Likewise Ambrose, On Saint Joseph, [c. 13]. Anger also often brings innocent persons under accusation, because while we are angry beyond what is just and wish to restrain the sins of others, we commit graver ones. Therefore the Apostle says: “Do not avenge yourselves, dearest ones, but give place to anger”; that is, let us avoid it, lest it seize us. Hence the Lord Jesus, sending the disciples to evangelize, sent them without gold, without silver, without money, without a staff, so that He might take away both incentives to strife and instruments of vengeance.

C. LXVIII. Grauiter delinquit qui ex ira sententiam profert.

Item Ambrosius de sancto Ioseph. [c. 13.] Ira etiam sepe innocentes in crimen adducit, quia, dum iusto amplius irascimur, et uolumus aliena cohercere peccata, grauiora conmittimus. Ideo Apostolus ait: "Non uos uendicantes, karissimi; sed date locum irae;" hoc est declinemus eam, ne nos illa corripiat. Unde Dominus Iesus, mittens ad euangelizandum discipulos, misit eos sine auro, sine argento, sine pecunia, sine uirga, ut et incentiua litis et instrumenta eriperet ultionis.

C. LXIX. Reason ought to correct what was promulgated in fury.

Likewise from book XI of the Ecclesiastical History. When a sedition arose at Thessalonica and a certain military man had been killed by the onrush of the raging people, Theodosius, inflamed by the atrocity of the sudden report, ordered that the people be invited to the circus games, that soldiers unexpectedly surround them, and that they slaughter indiscriminately with the sword whomever each encountered, giving vengeance not to the crime but to fury. When he was reproved for this by the priests of Italy, he acknowledged his offense and, confessing his fault with tears, undertook public penance in the sight of the whole church and patiently completed the time assigned to him for this without royal pomp. To all these things he also marvelously added this: he established laws for the future that sentences of princes pronounced concerning punishment be delayed by their executors until the thirtieth day, so that a place for mercy or, if the matter required it, for repentance would not perish.

C. LXIX. Ratio debet corrigere quod furore promulgatum est.

Item ex libro [XI.] ecclesiasticae ystoriae. Cum apud Tessalonicam, seditione exorta, quidam ex militaribus uir inpetu fuisset populi furentis exstinctus, Theodosius, repentini nuncii atrocitate succensus, ad ludos Circenses inuitari populum, eique ex inprouiso circumfundi milites, atque obtruncare passim, ut quisque occurrisset, gladio iubet, et uindictam dare non crimini, sed furori. Ob hoc cum a sacerdotibus Italiae redargueretur, agnouit delictum, culpamque cum lacrimis professus, publicam penitenciam in conspectu totius ecclesiae exegit, et in hoc sibi tempus ascriptum absque regali fastigio patienter inpleuit. Quibus omnibus illud quoque mirabiliter adiecit; leges sanxit in posterum, ut sententiae principium super animaduersione prolatae in diem tricesimum ab executoribus differrentur, quo locus misericordiae, uel, si res tulisset, penitenciae non periret.

C. LXX. In dictating sentences let rulers be led by no fury.

Likewise Gregory. It must above all be guarded that rulers of the church and those who exercise public judgments are in no way precipitate through being led by levity or fury in dictating sentences. Rather, after the cases have first been diligently examined and the matter which was unknown has come fully to knowledge, let divine and human law then be unfolded, and let definitive sentence be pronounced according to what was established there, with acceptance of persons removed. Hence it is that Moses, after entering the tabernacle, always referred the complaints of the people to the Lord and pronounced judgments according to what the Lord commanded, clearly instructing us to pronounce a sentence of condemnation or justification not from our own heart but from divine command.

C. LXX. In dictandis sententiis rectores nullo furore ducantur.

Item Gregorius. Summopere precauendum est ut rectores ecclesiae et qui publica iudicia exercent, in dictandis sententiis nullatenus leuitate aut furore ducti sint precipites, sed causis prius diligenter uentilatis, cum res, que ignorabatur, pleniter ad notitiam uenerit, diuina tunc et humana lex resoluatur, et secundum quod ibi constitutum est, remota personarum acceptione, diffinitiua proferatur sententia. Hinc est quod Moises querelas populi semper tabernaculum ingressus ad Dominum referebat, et iuxta quod Dominus inperabat iudicia proponebat, nimirum nos instituens, ut non ex corde nostro, sed ex precepto diuino condempnationis uel iustificationis sententiam proferamus.

C. LXXI. A just judgment cannot be sold.

Likewise Augustine to Macedonius, [letter LIV]. A judge is not permitted to sell a just judgment, although an advocate is permitted to sell just advocacy and a jurisconsult right counsel.

C. LXXI. Iustum iudicium uendi non potest.

Item Augustinus ad Macedonium. [epist. LIV.] Non licet iudici uendere iustum iudicium, etsi liceat aduocato uendere iustum patrocinium, et iurisconsulto rectum consilium.

C. LXXII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Isidore, [book III On the Highest Good, c. 58]. While the poor man does not have anything to offer, he is not only despised without being heard but is also oppressed contrary to the truth. Justice is quickly violated by gold, and a guilty man fears no fault which he thinks he can redeem with money. GRATIAN. Therefore this sentence, which is rendered against someone not from love of justice but from any other cause, is to be obeyed humbly. Hence in the Council of Nicaea, [c. 5]:

C. LXXII. De eodem.

Item Ysidorus. [lib. III. de summo bono, c. 58.] Pauper dum non habet quod offerat, non solum audiri contempnitur, sed etiam contra ueritatem obprimitur. Cito uiolatur auro iustitia, nullamque reus pertimescit culpam, quam redimere nummis existimat. Gratian. Huic itaque sententiae, que non amore iustitiae, sed ex alia qualibet causa fertur in quemquam, humiliter obediendum est. Unde in Niceno Concilio: [c. 5.]

C. LXXIII. Let those who incur the displeasure of their bishops not be received by others.

Let this sentence also be preserved: that those who are excommunicated by some are not received into communion by others. Let inquiry indeed be made lest perhaps any persons have been suspended from communion because of some indignation of mind, contention, or any similar agitation of their bishop's stomach, so that then at last those who have deservedly incurred the displeasure of their bishops for their own faults may worthily be held likewise excommunicated even by the others, until it has appeared good to their own bishop to render a more humane sentence concerning them. GRATIAN. Likewise, a sentence is unjust from order when anyone is condemned for his fault without the judicial order having been preserved.

Hence Gregory writes to Constantius, Bishop of Milan, [book VIII, letter 30]:

C. LXXIII. Non recipiantur ab aliis qui suorum episcoporum contrahunt offensas.

Seruetur et ista sententia, ut hi, qui ab aliis excommunicantur, ab aliis ad communionem non recipiantur. Requiratur sane, ne forte quis ex aliqua indignatione animi aut contentione, aut qualibet tali conmotione stomachi episcopi sui abstenti sint. Ut ita demum hi, qui ob culpas suas episcoporum suorum offensas merito contraxerunt, digne etiam a ceteris excommunicati similiter habeantur, quousque episcopo suo uisum fuerit humaniorem circa eos ferre sententiam. Gratian. Item sententia est iniusta ex ordine, quando non seruato iudiciali ordine quilibet pro culpa sua dampnatur.

Unde Gregorius scribit Constantino, Mediolanensi Episcopo: [lib. VIII. epist. 30.]

C. LXXIV. A doubtful matter is not to be determined by a certain sentence.

It is sufficiently grave and unseemly that a certain sentence be given in a doubtful matter.

C. LXXIV. Res dubia non diffiniatur certa sententia.

Graue satis est et indecens, ut in re dubia certa detur sententia.

C. LXXV. Things which are not demonstrated by certain proofs are not to be believed.

Likewise Augustine in the book On Penance, [c. 3]. Although certain things may be true, nevertheless they are not to be believed by a judge unless they are demonstrated by certain proofs.

C. LXXV. Non credantur que certis iudiciis non demonstrantur.

Item Augustinus in libro de penitencia. [c. 3.] Quamuis uera sint quedam, tamen iudici non sunt credenda, nisi certis indiciis demonstrentur.

C. LXXVI. Let persons not be judged before they are examined.

Likewise Pope Damasus, [letter VI]. It is not permitted to examine the cases of those who are accused before they have been canonically summoned to the synod and come, and one present truly recognizes and understands from another present the things objected against him. This is also said through the wisdom of Solomon: "Before you investigate, do not reprove. First understand, and then rebuke. Before you hear, do not reprove." And although the reproof of the opposing matters may be most manifest, nevertheless the order ought to be preserved by those who have been appointed to examine them.

> C. LXXVI. Ante, quam examinentur, aliqui non iudicentur.
> Item Damasus Papa. [epist. VI.] Eorum, qui accusantur, causas discutere non licet prius, quam canonice uocati ad sinodum ueniant, et presens per presentem agnoscat ueraciter et intelligat que ei obiciuntur. Quod et per sapientiam Salomonis dicitur: "Ante, quam scruteris, ne reprehendas. Intellige prius, et tunc increpa. Ante, quam audias, non reprehendas." Et licet apertissima sit contrariorum reprehensio, uerumtamen oportet ab his, qui dati sunt ad eorum examinationem, ordinem seruari.

C. LXXVII. Both one who brings forth falsehood concerning another and one who believes accusations are guilty.

Likewise from the Eighth Synod. Not only is the one guilty who brings forth falsehood concerning another, but also he who quickly lends an ear to accusations. PART VI. GRATIAN. Therefore, when a sentence is unjust from order, even then one must not withdraw from it, because even before the sentence was given against him, according to the character of his guilt he was held bound before God. It sometimes happens that an adulterer receives a sentence for sacrilege, the guilt of which he does not possess in his conscience. Although this sentence is unjust because the crime concerning which it was rendered is not in him, nevertheless it was justly received by him, who through the guilt of adultery had already long been excommunicated before God. And in this case that authority of Gregory is to be understood: "The sentence of a shepherd, etc." § 1. He calls a sentence just when the crime concerning which it is rendered underlies it; unjust, when that crime does not underlie it, which nevertheless is to be feared or observed because the man was already long ago to be condemned for another matter. Hence, after Gregory had first said, "Whether the shepherd binds justly or unjustly, nevertheless the sentence of the shepherd is to be feared by the flock," he continued and added: "Lest the one who is subject and perhaps is bound unjustly merit the very sentence of his binding from another fault. Therefore let the shepherd fear either to absolve or to bind without discretion. But let the one who is under the shepherd's hand fear to be bound, even unjustly, and not rashly reprove the judgment of his shepherd, lest, even if he was bound unjustly, from the very fault of the pride of his swollen reproof that which was not a fault become one." § 2. Sometimes no crime underlies it, and nevertheless either through the hatred of the judge or the faction of enemies he receives against himself a sentence of condemnation opposed to him. Hence Gregory says:

> C. LXXVII. Qui falsum de alio profert, et qui crimina credit, uterque reus est.
> Item ex VIII. Sinodo. Non solum ille reus est, qui falsum de alio profert, sed et is, qui aurem cito criminibus prebet. VI. Pars. Gratian. Cum ergo sententia ex ordine iniusta est, nec tunc ab ea recedendum est, quia etiam ante, quam sententia daretur in eum pro qualitate sui reatus ligatus apud Deum tenebatur. Contingit aliquando, ut adulter sententiam pro sacrilegio reportet, cuius reatum in conscientia non habet. Hec sententia, etsi iniusta sit, quia non est in eo crimen, super quod lata est sententia, tamen ab eo iuste reportata est, qui ex reatu adulterii iamdiu apud Deum excommunicatus fuerat. Et in hoc casu intelligenda est auctoritas illa Gregorii: "Sententia pastoris etc." §. 1. Iustam sententiam uocat, quando crimen subest, super quod fertur: iniustam, quando illud non subest, que tamen timenda uel seruanda est, quia ex alio iam dudum dampnandus erat. Unde, cum premisisset Gregorius: "Utrum iuste an iniuste obliget pastor, pastoris tamen sententia timenda est gregi," subsecutus adiecit: "Ne is, qui subest, et cum iniuste forsitan ligatur, ipsam obligationis suae sententiam ex alia culpa mereatur. Pastor ergo uel absoluere indiscrete timeat, uel ligare. Is autem, qui sub manu pastoris est ligari timeat uel iniuste nec pastoris sui iudicium temere reprehendat: ne, etsi iniuste ligatus est, ex ipsa tumidae reprehensionis superbia culpa, que non erat, fiat." §. 2. Aliquando nullum subest crimen, et tamen uel odio iudicis, uel factione inimicorum obpositam sibi sententiam dampnationis in se excipit. Unde Gregorius ait:

C. LXXVIII. In how many ways human judgment is perverted.

Human judgment is perverted in four ways: by fear, when through dread of someone's power we fear to speak the truth; by cupidity, when we corrupt someone's mind with a reward; by hatred, when we contrive against any adversary; by love, when we strive to favor a friend or relative. GRATIAN. But how grave it is to pervert judgment by hatred, friendship, a gift, fear, or any means, Augustine testifies, saying:

C. LXXVIII. Quot modis humanum iudicium peruertitur.

Quatuor modis humanum iudicium peruertitur: timore, dum metu potestatis alicuius ueritatem loqui pertimescimus; cupiditate, dum premio animum alicuius corrumpimus; odio, dum contra quemlibet aduersarium molimur; amore, dum amico uel propinquo prestare contendimus. Gratian. Quam graue uero sit uel odio, uel amicitia, uel munere, uel metu, uel quolibet modo iudicium peruertere Augustinus testatur dicens:

C. LXXIX. Concerning those who pervert judgment in any way.

Whoever is led in judging either by consanguinity, friendship, hostile hatred, or enmities perverts the judgment of Christ, who is justice, and turns its fruit into bitterness.

C. LXXIX. De his, qui aliquo modo iudicium peruertunt.

Quicumque aut consanguinitate, aut amicitia, uel hostili odio, uel inimicitiis in iudicando ducitur, peruertit iudicium Christi, qui est iustitia, et fructum illius uertit in amaritudinem.

C. LXXX. Concerning those who conceal the truth from fear of power.

The same to Casulanus. Whoever conceals the truth through fear of any power provokes the wrath of God upon himself, because he fears man more than God. And a little later: § 1. Each is guilty: both the one who conceals the truth and the one who speaks a lie, because the former does not wish to benefit and the latter desires to harm.

C. LXXX. De his, qui metu potestatis ueritatem occultant.

Idem ad Casulanum. Quisquis metu cuiuslibet potestatis ueritatem occultat, iram Dei super se prouocat, quia magis timet hominem quam Deum. Et post pauca: §. 1. Uterque reus est, et qui ueritatem occultat, et qui mendacium dicit, quia et ille prodesse non uult, et iste nocere desiderat.

C. LXXXI. Concerning the same. Likewise.

Let none of the skilled or prudent think that there is less danger in lying with words of the tongue than in shedding blood with the hands. But it is better to suffer punishment for the truth than a benefit for flattery.

C. LXXXI. De eodem. Item.

Nemo peritorum aut prudentium putet, quod minus sit periculum in uerbis lingua mentiendo, quam manibus sanguinem fundendo. Melius est autem pro ueritate pati supplicium, quam pro adulatione beneficium.

[C. LXXXII.]

Likewise Pelagius to Archbishop Benignus. Each person must take care lest he persecute, judge, and punish anyone unjustly, lest he persecute, judge, and punish Jesus. GRATIAN. One who denies the truth for money, or speaks false testimony against someone, is also proved here to deny or sell God. Hence Bede on Mark:

[C. LXXXII.]

Item Pelagius Benigno Archiepiscopo. Unicuique prouidendum est, ne aliquem iniuste persequatur, iudicet et puniat, ne Iesum persequatur, iudicet et puniat. Gratian. Hic quoque, qui ueritatem pro pecunia negat, uel falsum testimonium contra aliquem dicit, Deum negare uel uendere probatur. Unde Beda super Marcum:

C. LXXXIII. Those who speak false testimony and deny the truth for money become participants in the crime of Judas.

Judas went to the chief priests, and they agreed to give him money. Many today abhor as monstrous and nefarious the crime of Judas because he sold his Lord and teacher and God for money, yet they do not guard against it. For when they speak false testimony against anyone for gifts, assuredly, because they deny the truth for money, they sell God for money. For He Himself said: "I am the truth." When they defile the fellowship of brotherhood with any plague of discord, they betray God, because God is charity. Therefore those who despise the commands of charity and truth betray God, who is charity and truth, especially when they sin not from weakness or ignorance, but, in the likeness of Judas, seek an opportunity whereby, with witnesses absent, they may change truth into falsehood and virtue into accusation.

C. LXXXIII. Qui falsum testimonium dicunt, et ueritatem pro pecunia negant, sceleris Iudae participes fiunt.

Abiit Iudas ad summos sacerdotes, et constituerunt ei pecuniam se daturos. Multi hodie scelus Iudae, quia Dominum ac magistrum suum, deumque pecunia uendiderit, uelut inmane et nefarium exhorrent, nec tamen cauent. Nam cum pro muneribus falsum contra quemlibet testimonium dicunt, profecto, quia ueritatem pro pecunia negant, Deum pecunia uendunt. Ipse enim dixit: "Ego sum ueritas." Cum societatem fraternitatis aliqua discordiae peste conmaculant, Deum produnt, quia Deus karitas est. Qui ergo karitatis et ueritatis iussa spernunt, Deum utique, qui karitas est et ueritas, produnt maxime cum non infirmitate uel ignorantia peccant, sed in similitudinem Iudae querunt oportunitatem, qualiter arbitris absentibus mendacio ueritatem, uirtutem crimine mutent.

C. LXXXIV. One who makes himself an associate of perverse persons denies Christ.

Likewise Jerome, [on the Epistle to Titus, c. I, at the end]. Certain persons think that God is denied only in this: if someone seized by the gentiles in persecution has refused to confess that he is a Christian. Behold, the Apostle asserts that God is denied by all deeds which are perverse. Christ is wisdom, justice, truth, holiness, fortitude. Wisdom is denied through foolishness, justice through iniquity, truth through falsehood, holiness through shamefulness, fortitude through weakness of mind. As often as we are conquered by vices and sins, so often do we deny God; and conversely, as often as we do something good, we confess God. Nor is it to be judged that on the day of judgment only those who denied Christ in martyrdom will be denied by the Son of God, but also all those by whose work, speech, or thought Christ is denied—one denies Him, or, having confessed Him, confesses Him. I think it is concerning this confession that He commanded the disciples, saying: "You will be witnesses to me in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria and even to the farthest part of the earth."

C. LXXXIV. Christum negat qui peruersis socium se facit.

Item Ieronimus [in epistolam ad Titum, c. I. in extremo.] Existimant quidam in eo tantum negari Deum, si in persecutione quis a gentibus conprehensus se confiteri rennuerit esse Christianum. Ecce Apostolus omnibus, que peruersa sunt, factis Deum asserit negari. Christus sapientia est, iustitia, ueritas, sanctitas, fortitudo. Negatur per insipientiam sapientia, per iniquitatem iustitia, per mendacium ueritas, per turpitudinem sanctitas, per inbecillitatem animi fortitudo. Quocienscumque uincimur uiciis atque peccatis, tociens Deum negamus, et e contrario, quociens bene quid agimus, Deum confitemur. Nec arbitrandum est in die iudicii illos tantum a Dei filio denegandos, qui in martirio Christum negauerunt, sed et illos omnes, quorum opere, uel sermone, uel cogitatione Christus negatur, negat uel confessus confitetur. De hac puto confessione quod discipulis precepit dicens: "Eritis michi testes in Ierusalem, et in omni Iudea, et Samaria, et usque ad ultimum terrae."

C. LXXXV. One who denies that he is a Christian is convicted of denying Christ.

Likewise Augustine, [tractate CXIII on John c. 18]. Not only does one deny Christ who says that He is not the Christ, but also one who, although he is, denies that he is a Christian. For the Lord did not say to Peter, "You will deny that you are my disciple." Therefore he denied Him when he denied that he was His disciple. But what else did he deny himself to be in this manner than a Christian? The same, [tractate LXVI]. § 1. By fearing the death of your flesh, you will give death to your soul.

For as great life as it is to confess Christ, so great a death it is to deny Christ. Did the apostle Peter—as those who strive to excuse him through perverse favor say—not deny Christ because, when questioned by the maidservant, he answered that he did not know the man?

C. LXXXV. Qui Christianum se negat Christum negare conuincitur.

Item Augustinus. [tractatu CXIII. ad cap. 18. Ioannis.] Non solum abnegat Christum qui dicit eum non esse Christum, sed ille etiam qui, cum sit, negat se esse Christianum. Dominus enim non ait Petro, "discipulum meum te esse negabis." Negauit ergo ipsum, cum se negauit eius esse discipulum. Quid autem aliud isto modo, quam se negauit esse Christianum? Idem: [tractatu LXVI.] §. 1. Timendo carnis tuae mortem mortem dabis animae tuae.

Quanta enim uita est confiteri Christum, tanta mors negare Christum. An Apostolus Petrus (sicut eum qui fauore peruerso excusare nituntur) Christum non negauit quia interrogatus ab ancilla hominem se nescire respondit?

C. LXXXVI. Not only one who speaks falsehood in place of truth betrays the truth, but also one who does not freely preach the truth.

Likewise John Chrysostom, [that is, the author of the Incomplete Work on Matthew, homily 25]. "Do not fear those who kill the body," lest perhaps through fear of death you do not freely say what you have heard, nor confidently preach to all what you have heard alone in the ear. Therefore, just as it is shown from these words, not only is he a betrayer of the truth who, transgressing the truth, openly speaks falsehood in place of truth; but one who does not freely pronounce the truth which ought to be freely pronounced, or does not freely defend the truth which it is fitting to defend freely, is also a betrayer of the truth. For just as a priest is a debtor to preach freely the truth which he has heard from God, so a layman is a debtor confidently to defend the truth which he has heard from priests and which has indeed been proved in the scriptures. But if he has not done this, he has betrayed the truth. "For with the heart one believes unto justice, but with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." GRATIAN. This sentence harms the judge rather than the one against whom it is rendered. Hence Augustine says:

C. LXXXVI. Veritatem prodit non solum qui pro ueritate mendacium loquitur, sed etiam qui ueritatem non libere predicat.

Item Iohannes Crisostomus. [id est, Auctor operis imperfecti, in Matth. hom. 25.] "Nolite timere eos, qui occidunt corpus," ne forte propter timorem mortis non libere dicatis quod audistis, nec fiducialiter predicetis omnibus quod in aure soli audistis. Sicut ergo ex his uerbis ostenditur non solum ille proditor est ueritatis, qui transgrediens ueritatem palam pro ueritate loquitur mendacium, sed etiam ille, qui non libere pronunciat ueritatem, quam libere pronunciare oportet, aut non libere ueritatem defendit, quam libere defendere conuenit, proditor est ueritatis. Nam sicut sacerdos debitor est, ut ueritatem, quam audiuit a Deo, libere predicet, sic laicus debitor est, ut ueritatem, quam audiuit a sacerdotibus probatam quidem in scripturis, defendat fiducialiter. Quod si non fecerit, prodidit ueritatem. "Corde enim creditur ad iustitiam, ore autem confessio fit ad salutem." Gratian. Hec sententia potius iudicem ledit quam eum, in quem fertur. Unde Augustinus ait:

C. LXXXVII. One who unjustly anathematizes another harms himself, not the other.

I would plainly not say this rashly: that if any of the faithful has been anathematized unjustly, it will harm the one who does it rather than the one who suffers this injury. For the Holy Spirit dwelling in the saints, through whom each person is bound or loosed, inflicts an undeserved penalty upon no one. For through Him charity is poured into our hearts, and it does not act perversely. The peace of the church forgives sins and retains the sins of those alien from the church's peace, not according to the judgment of men but according to the judgment of God. The rock retains, the rock forgives; the dove retains, the dove forgives. [GRATIAN.] Likewise Solomon: "Just as a bird flying uncertainly and a sparrow going anywhere, so a curse pronounced in vain comes upon the one who sent it."

C. LXXXVII. Iniuste aliquem anathematizans sibi, non alii nocet.

Illud plane non temere dixerim, quod si quisquam fuerit fidelium anathematizatus iniuste, ei potius oberit, qui facit, quam ei qui hanc patitur iniuriam. Spiritus enim sanctus habitans in sanctis, per quem quisque ligatur aut soluitur, inmeritam nulli ingerit penam. Per eum quippe diffunditur karitas in cordibus nostris, que non agit perperam. Pax ecclesiae dimittit peccata, et ab ecclesiae pace alienis tenet peccata non secundum arbitrium hominum, sed secundum arbitrium Dei. Petra tenet, petra dimittit; columba tenet, columba dimittit. [Gratian.] Item Salomon: "Sicut auis in incertum uolans, et passer quolibet uadens, sic maledictum frustra prolatum uenit super eum, qui misit illud."

C. LXXXVIII. One whose life does not accord with his office, though himself bound, looses others.

Likewise Gregory in homily XXVI. It very often happens that one holds the place of a judge whose life accords very little with the place, and it often happens that he either condemns the undeserving or, himself bound, looses others; frequently in loosing and binding subjects he follows the movement of his own will and not the merits of the cases. Hence it happens that he deprives himself of the power of binding and loosing, etc. And below: § 1. It often happens that a shepherd is moved toward any neighbor by hatred or favor. But to judge subjects worthily, etc. And below: Hence it is rightly said through the Prophet: “They were putting to death souls which do not die, and making alive souls which do not live.” For one puts to death a person who is not dying when he condemns a just man, and strives to make one live who will not live when he attempts to release a guilty man from punishment. § 2. Therefore the cases are to be weighed, and then the power of binding and loosing is to be exercised. One must see what fault preceded and what penance followed the fault, so that the sentence of the shepherd may absolve those whom almighty God visits through the grace of compunction. For then the absolution is true, etc. And below: § 3. From this consideration one must recognize that through pastoral authority we ought to loose those whom we know our Author makes alive through awakening grace. And below: § 4. Therefore let the dead man come forth, that is, let the sinner confess his fault. But the disciples loose him when he comes forth, because the shepherds of the church ought to remove the penalty which he merited from one who did not blush to confess what he did. § 5. We have said these things briefly concerning the order of loosing, so that under great moderation the shepherds of the church ought either to loose or to bind.

C. LXXXVIII. Cuius uita offitio non congruit, alios ligatus soluit.

Item Gregorius in omelia XXVI. Plerumque contingit, ut iudicis locum teneat, cui ad locum uita minime concordat, ac sepe agitur, ut uel dampnet inmeritos, uel alios ipse ligatus soluat, sepe in soluendis ac ligandis subditis suae uoluntatis motus, non autem causarum merita sequitur. Unde fit, ut ipse ligandi et soluendi potestate se priuet et cet. Et infra: §. 1. Sepe fit, ut erga quemlibet proximum odio uel gratia moueatur pastor. Iudicare autem de subditis digne etc. Et infra: Unde recte per prophetam dicitur: "Mortificabant animas, que non moriuntur, et uiuificabant animas, que non uiuunt." Non morientem quippe mortificat qui iustum dampnat, et non uicturum uiuificare nititur qui reum a supplicio soluere conatur. §. 2. Causae ergo pensandae sunt, et tunc ligandi ac soluendi potestas exercenda. Videndum est, que culpa precessit, et que sit penitentia secuta post culpam, ut quos omnipotens Deus per conpunctionis gratiam uisitat, illos pastoris sententia absoluat. Tunc enim uera est absolutio etc. Et infra: §. 3. Ex qua consideratione intuendum est, quod illos debemus nos per pastoralem auctoritatem soluere, quos auctorem nostrum cognoscimus per suscitantem gratiam uiuificare. Et infra: §. 4. Veniat itaque foras mortuus, id est culpam confiteatur peccator. Venientem uero foras discipuli soluunt, quia pastores ecclesiae ei debent penam amouere, quam meruit qui non erubuit confiteri quod fecit. §. 5. Hec de solutionis ordine breuiter diximus, ut sub magno moderamine pastores ecclesiae uel soluere debeant, uel ligare.

C. LXXXIX. A sentence unjustly pronounced lacks force.

Likewise Pope Callistus, [letter I to Bishop Benedict]. Let an unjust judgment and an unjust determination, arranged or enacted by judges through royal fear and command, or that of any bishop or powerful man, not be valid. § 1. For a religious man it ought to be too little not to exercise or increase the enmities of others by speaking evilly, unless he also endeavors to extinguish them by speaking well. § 2. A humble confession concerning evil deeds is better than proud glorying concerning good ones.

> C. LXXXIX. Viribus caret sententia iniuste prolata.
> Item Calixtus Papa. [epist. I. ad Benedictum Episcopum]. Iniustum iudicium et diffinitio iniusta, regio metu et iussu, aut cuiuscumque episcopi aut potentis a iudicibus ordinata uel acta, non ualeat. §. 1. Homini religioso parum esse debet inimicitias aliorum non exercere, uel augere male loquendo, nisi etiam eas extinguere bene loquendo studuerit. §. 2. Melior est in malis factis humilis confessio quam in bonis superba gloriatio.

C. XC. One who is unjustly cursed merits a reward.

Likewise Augustine on Psalm CII, [at the verse "The Lord Who Works Mercies"]. One who is just and is unjustly cursed receives a reward. GRATIAN. Although, as was said, he is not held bound before God, he nevertheless ought to obey the sentence, lest one who was previously held absolved by the purity of his conscience be bound through pride. PART VII. § 1. Likewise, there is the case in which a sentence is rendered contrary to equity, as when subjects cannot be compelled to evil, knowing that obedience is not to be preserved toward prelates in unlawful things.

Hence Pope Eutychian says:

> C. XC. Premium meretur qui iniuste maledicitur.
>
> Item Augustinus super Psalmo CII. [ad uers. Faciens misericordias Dominus.] Qui iustus est, et iniuste maledicitur premium illi redditur. Gratian. Hic etsi, ut dictum est, non teneatur ligatus apud Deum, sententiae tamen parere debet, ne ex superbia ligetur qui prius ex puritate conscientiae absolutus tenebatur. VII. Pars. §. 1. Item est quando contra equitatem sententia fertur, ueluti quando subditi non possunt cogi ad malum, scientes obedientiam non esse seruandam prelatis in rebus illicitis.
> Unde Euticianus Papa ait:

C. XCI. A bishop who commands Mass to be sung for heretics is not to be obeyed.

If any bishop or abbot commands his priest or monk to sing Masses for heretics, it is not permitted. For it is not expedient to obey them.

> C. XCI. Non est obediendum episcopo, qui pro hereticis missam canere iubet.
> Si quis episcopus aut abbas presbitero aut monacho suo iusserit missas pro hereticis cantare, non licet. Non enim expedit obedire eis.

C. XCII. It is often expedient not to obey commands.

Likewise Augustine. It is not always evil not to obey a command; for when a lord commands those things which are contrary to God, then he is not to be obeyed.

> C. XCII. Preceptis non obedire multociens expedit.

Item Augustinus. Non semper malum est non obedire precepto; cum enim Dominus iubet ea, que Deo sunt contraria, tunc ei obediendum non est.

C. XCIII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Jerome on the Epistle to the Ephesians. If a master commands those things which are not contrary to the sacred scriptures, let the servant be subject to the master. But if he commands contrary things, let the spirit obey rather than the lord of the body. And below, [c. 3]: § 1. If what the emperor commands is good, carry out the will of the one commanding; if evil, answer: "One ought to obey God rather than men." The same applies to servants under masters, wives under husbands, and children under fathers: that they ought to be subject to masters, husbands, and parents only in those things which are not contrary to the commands of God.

C. XCIII. De eodem.

Item Ieronimus in epistola ad Ephesios. Si dominus iubet ea, que non sunt contraria sacris scripturis, subiciatur domino seruus. Sin uero contraria precipit, magis obediat spiritus quam corporis domino. Et infra: [c. 3.] §. 1. Si bonum est quod precipit inperator, iubentis exsequere uoluntatem; si malum responde: "Oportet Deo magis quam hominibus obedire." Hoc ipsum et de seruis apud dominos, et de uxoribus apud uiros, et de filiis apud patres quod in illis tantum debeant dominis, uiris, parentibus esse subiecti, que contra Dei mandata non sunt.

C. XCIV. Those who command anything contrary to God are not to be heard.

Likewise Ambrose. Although Emperor Julian was an apostate, he nevertheless had Christian soldiers under him. When he said to them, "Bring forth the battle line for the defense of the commonwealth," he was obeyed. But when he said to them, "Bring forth arms against Christians," then they recognized the Emperor of heaven.

C. XCIV. Non sunt audiendi qui contra Deum aliquid iubent.

Item Ambrosius. Iulianus inperator, quamuis esset apostata, habuit tamen sub se Christianos milites, quibus cum dicebat, producite aciem pro defensione reipublicae, obediebatur ei. Cum autem diceret eis, producite arma in Christianos, tunc cognoscebant inperatorem celi.

C. XCV. One who is proved to fear God does not command anything unjust.

Likewise Pope Fabian, [letter II to all Bishops]. One who fears almighty God in no way consents to do anything contrary to the Gospel, the apostles, the prophets, or the institutions of the holy Fathers.

C. XCV. Non iubet aliquid iniustum qui Deum timere probatur.

Item Fabianus Papa. [epist. II. omnibus Episcopis] Qui omnipotentem Deum metuit, nec contra euangelium nec contra apostolos, nec contra prophetas uel sanctorum Patrum instituta agere aliquid ullomodo consentit.

C. XCVI. Both one who sins and one who consents to the sinner are condemned.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to King Lothair. You so consented to the impulses of your body and, with the reins of pleasures loosened, cast yourself into the pit of misery and the mire of forbidden filth, that you who had been placed for the governance of peoples were made the ruin of many. The lawful fall of Teugald and Guntarius, formerly bishops, proves this: because they instructed you very incompetently—indeed, rather, because they strove to conceal your transgression with their arguments and to bury equity under a certain appearance of justice by means of certain embellished and elaborate inventions—they were deposed by our apostolic authority and regularly separated from all governance of the episcopate.

> C. XCVI. Et qui peccat, et qui peccanti consentit uterque dampnatur.
> Item Nicolaus Papa Lothario Regi. Ita corporis tui cedere motibus consensisti, et relaxatis uoluptatum habenis temetipsum in lacum miseriae et in lutum fecis prohibitum deiecisti, ut qui positus fueras ad gubernacionem populorum effectus sis ruina multorum. Probat hoc Teugaldi et Guntarii dudum episcoporum legitimus casus, qui pro eo, quod te minime conpetenter erudierunt, quin stet imo quia preuaricationem tuam tegere argumentis suis, et sub quadam iustitiae specie, fucatis quibusdam exquisitis adinuentionibus, equitatem obruere studuerunt, nostra sunt apostolica auctoritate depositi, et ab omni episcopatus regimine regulariter sequestrati.

C. XCVII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Augustine, [sermon VI On the Words of the Lord]. One who resists power resists the ordinance of God. But what if it commands that which you ought not to do? Here certainly despise the power. Attend to the very ranks of human laws. If a curator commands something, is it not to be done? Yet if he commands contrary to the proconsul, you certainly do not despise the power, but choose to serve the greater. Nor ought the lesser be angry on this account if the greater is preeminent. Again, if the proconsul himself commands one thing and the emperor another, or if the emperor commands one thing and God another, what do you judge? God is the greater power. Pardon me, O emperor: you threaten prison; He, hell. Here now your faith is to be taken up by you as a shield, by which you may extinguish all the fiery darts of the enemy.

> C. XCVII. De eodem.
> Item Augustinus. [sermone VI. de uerbis Domini] Qui resistit potestati Dei ordinationi resistit. Sed quid si illud iubeat, quod non debeas facere? Hic sane contempne potestatem. Ipsos humanarum legum gradus aduerte. Si aliquid iusserit curator, non faciendum est? Tamen, si contra proconsulem iubeat, non utique contempnis potestatem, sed eligis maiori seruire. Nec hinc debet minor irasci, si maior prelatus est. Rursum si aliquid ipse consuli iubeat, et aliud iubeat inperator, si uel aliud inperator et aliud Deus, quid iudicatis? Maior potestas Deus. Da ueniam, o inperator: tu carcerem, ille gehennam minatur. Hinc iam tibi assumenda est fides tua tamquam scutum, in quo possis omnia ignita iacula inimici extinguere.

[C. XCVIII.]

The same to the Donatists, [letter CLXVI]. If emperors were in error—which God forbid—they would enact laws for their error against the truth, through which the just would both be proved and crowned by not doing what they commanded, because God prohibits it. Thus Nebuchadnezzar commanded that a golden statue be adored, and those who refused to do it pleased God, who prohibits such things. But when emperors hold the truth, they command for it against error. Whoever despises this acquires judgment for himself. For he pays penalties among men and will not possess a forehead before God, because he refused to do what Truth itself commanded him through the heart of the king. Thus Nebuchadnezzar himself, moved and changed after the miracles of the deliverance of the three boys, issued an edict for the truth against error: that whoever blasphemed the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego should go to destruction and their house to dispersion. And do you not wish Christian emperors to command something like this against you, when they know that Christ is breathed out by you from those whom you rebaptize? The same in the Psalms: § 1. Julian arose as an unbelieving emperor. Did he not arise as an apostate, unjust, an idolater? Christian soldiers served the unbelieving emperor. When it came to the cause of Christ, they recognized no one except Him who was in heaven. When he wished them to worship idols and offer incense, they placed God before him. But when he said, "Bring forth the battle line; go against that nation," they immediately obeyed and distinguished the eternal God from the temporal lord.

[C. XCVIII.]

Idem Donatistis. [epist. CLXVI.] Inperatores, si in errore essent (quod absit), pro errore suo contra ueritatem leges darent, per quas iusti et probarentur, et coronarentur, non tamen faciendo quod illi iuberent, quia Deus prohibet. Sicut iusserat Nabuchodonosor, ut aurea statua adoraretur, quod qui facere noluerunt Deo talia prohibenti placuerunt. Quando autem inperatores ueritatem tenent pro ipsa contra errorem iubent. Quod quisquis contempserit ipse sibi iudicium acquirit. Nam inter homines penas luit, et apud Deum frontem non habebit, quia hoc facere noluit, quod ei per cor regis ipsa ueritas iussit. Sicut ipse Nabuchodonosor, post miracula salutis trium puerorum conmotus atque mutatus, pro ueritate contra errorem edictum proposuit, ut quicumque blasphemarent deum Sidrac, Misac et Abdenago, in interitum irent, et domus eorum in dispersionem. Et non uultis, ut aliquid tale contra uos iubeant inperatores Christiani, cum sciant a uobis, quos rebaptizatis, Christum exsufflari? Idem in Psalmis: §. 1. Iulianus extitit infidelis inperator. Nonne extitit apostata, iniquus, ydolatra? Milites Christiani seruierunt inperatori infideli. Ubi ueniebatur ad causam Christi, non agnoscebant nisi illum, qui in celo erat. Quando uolebat, ut ydola colerent, ut turificarent, preponebant illi Deum. Quando autem dicebat, producite aciem, ite contra illam gentem, statim obtemperabant et distinguebant deum eternum a domino temporali.

C. XCIX. Through obedience it is permitted to abandon a good, but never to do evil.

Likewise Gregory, [book XXXV on Job, c. 12]. What wonder is it, therefore, if sinful man subjects himself to obedience in the brevity of the present life, when the mediator of God and men does not abandon it even when He rewards the obedient? Nevertheless, it is to be known that evil is never to be done through obedience, but sometimes a good which is being done ought to be discontinued through obedience. For the tree in paradise which God forbade man to touch was not evil; but so that well-created man might grow better through the merit of obedience, it was fitting that he be prohibited even from a good, so that what he did would be a virtue the more truly, the more humbly, by ceasing even from a good, he showed himself subject to his Author.

C. XCIX. Per obedientiam bonum deserere, numquam malum facere licet.

Item Gregorius. [c. 12. lib. XXXV. in Iob.] Quid ergo mirum, si peccator homo obedientiae in presentis uitae breuitate se subicit, quando hanc mediator Dei et hominum, et cum obedientes remunerat, non relinquit? Sciendum tamen est, numquam per obedientiam malum fieri, aliquando autem debet per obedientiam bonum, quod agitur, intermitti. Neque enim mala arbor in paradiso extitit, quam Deus homini ne contingeret interdixit; sed ut melius per obedientiae meritum homo bene conditus cresceret, dignum fuerat, ut etiam a bono prohiberetur quatinus tanto uerius hoc, quod ageret, uirtus esset, quanto et a bono cessans auctori suo se subditum humilius exhiberet.

C. C. One who consents to sinners is accursed before God.

Likewise Isidore. One who consents to sinners and defends another who offends will be accursed before God and men and will be corrected with the severest rebuke. Hence also a certain most holy Father says: "If anyone defends a sinner, let him be restrained more harshly than the one who sinned." Hence another Father also says: "If anyone consents to the error of another, let him know that he is to be judged guilty in a like manner with him."

> C. C. Apud Deum maledicitur qui peccantibus consentit.
> Item Ysidorus. Qui consentit peccantibus, et defendit alium delinquentem, maledictus erit apud Deum et homines, et corripietur increpatione seuerissima. Hinc et quidam sanctissimus Pater ait: "Si quis peccantem defendit, acrius quam ille, qui peccauit, coherceatur." Hinc etiam alius Pater ait: "Si quis alterius errori consentit, sciat se cum illo simili modo culpabilem iudicandum."

C. CI. That which is commanded contrary to God is not to be obeyed.

Likewise Isidore. If one who presides has done, or has commanded anyone to do, what is prohibited by the Lord, or has passed over or commanded to be passed over what is commanded, the sentence of the holy apostle Paul is to be brought against him, saying: "Even if we or an angel from heaven has evangelized to you other than what we evangelized to you, let him be anathema." The same: § 1. If anyone prohibits us from what is commanded by the Lord, or again commands to be done what the Lord prohibits from being done, let him be execrable to all who love God. The same: § 2. If one who presides either says or commands anything beyond the will of God or beyond what is manifestly commanded in the holy scriptures, let him be held as a false witness of God or as sacrilegious. GRATIAN. Therefore, when subjects are excommunicated because they cannot be compelled to evil, then the sentence is not to be obeyed, because according to that statement of Gelasius, "An iniquitous sentence burdens no one either before God or before His church." PART VIII. § 1. But the command above that those communicating with excommunicated persons be cast from the church is not to be understood concerning those communicating in just any manner. Hence Pope Nicholas to Hincmar, Archbishop of Reims:

> C. CI. Non est obediendum quod contra Deum precipitur.
> Item Ysidorus. Si is, qui preest, fecerit, aut cuiquam quod a Domino prohibitum est facere iusserit, uel quod preceptum est preterierit aut preterire mandauerit, S. Pauli apostoli sententia ingerenda est, dicentis: "Etiamsi nos aut angelus de celo euangelizauerit uobis anathema sit, preterquam quod uobis euangelizauimus." Idem: §. 1. Si quis prohibet nobis quod a Domino preceptum est, uel rursum inperat fieri quod Dominus fieri prohibet, execrabilis sit omnibus, qui diligunt Deum. Idem: §. 2. Is, qui preest, si preter uoluntatem Dei, uel preter quod in scripturis sanctis euidenter precipitur, uel dicit aliquid, uel inperat tamquam falsus Dei testis aut sacrilegus habeatur. Gratian. Cum ergo subditi excommunicantur, quia ad malum cogi non possunt, tunc sententiae non est obediendum, quia iuxta illud Gelasii: "Nec apud Deum, nec apud ecclesiam eius, quemquam grauat iniqua sententia." VIII. Pars. §. 1. Quod autem supra communicantes excommunicatis de ecclesia abici iubentur, non de quolibet modo communicantibus intelligendum est. Unde Nicolaus Papa Igmaro, Remorum Archiepiscopo:

C. CII. Concerning those who communicate with excommunicated persons.

The most excellent King Charles consulted our apostolate as to what is to be done concerning those who communicate with those who communicate with the woman Engiltrude, so often condemned, since it is established that she is bound by an equal bond of anathema together with those communicating with and favoring her. Therefore we now enjoin your Beatitude that, relying upon our authority concerning this, you endeavor to take care concerning them. And because your Holiness, divinely taught, knows well that one thing is committed from necessity, another from ignorance, and another deliberately, and that this last is to be punished more strictly than the first two, therefore let it keep skillful watch and judge the circumstances of individuals with cautious severity, so that those who offend from necessity or ignorance may be absolved by you through our authority—provided, nevertheless, that their ignorance or necessity was true and not simulated and did not proceed from will, because, as you well know, there are very many who indeed can but do not wish to know right things. Hence the Psalmist says concerning persons of this kind: "He did not wish," he says, "to understand, that he might act well." But those who are bound by their own deliberate action and through contempt set aside our prohibitions, we wish by no means to be absolved by you unless worthy satisfaction precedes.

C. CII. De his, qui cum excommunicatis communicant.

Excellentissimus rex Karolus apostolatum nostrum consuluit, quid sit agendum de his, qui communicant cum his, qui cum Engiltruda sepe dampnata communicant femina, quoniam eam cum communicatoribus suis et fautoribus pari uinculo anathematis constat esse astrictam. Quapropter nunc beatitudini tuae iniungimus, ut, super hoc nostra auctoritate fretus, curam de his sumere studeas, et quia docta diuinitus sanctitas tua ualde nouit, aliud esse ex necessitate, aliud ex ignorantia, atque aliud, quod studio delinquitur, istudque posterius duobus prioribus strictius esse puniendum, idcirco sollerter inuigilet, et cauta districtione singulorum modos diiudicet, quatinus hi qui ex necessitate uel ignorantia delinquunt auctoritate nostra per te absoluantur: si tamen ipsa eorum ignorantia, uel necessitas uera, et non simulata, uel non ex uoluntate processerit, quia, ut bene nosti, sunt plerique qui possunt quidem, sed nolunt recta nosse. Unde Psalmista de huiusmodi: "Noluit," inquit, "intelligere, ut bene ageret." Illos autem, qui studio suo obligantur, et contemptu interdicta nostra postponunt, non nisi digna satisfactione preueniente uolumus a te prorsus absolui.

C. CIII. Concerning those who communicate with excommunicated persons without fault.

Likewise Gregory VII, [book V of the Register, in the Council held at Rome]. Because we perceive that many, as our sins demand, perish daily on account of excommunication—some conquered by ignorance, some by excessive simplicity, some by fear, and some also by necessity—moved by mercy, we temper the sentence of anathema for a time, insofar as we can. Therefore by apostolic authority we withdraw from the bond of anathema the following: wives, sons, male and female servants or bondservants, as well as peasants and servants, and also all others who are not courtiers to such an extent that crimes are perpetrated by their counsel; those who unknowingly communicate with excommunicated persons; and those who communicate with those who communicate with excommunicated persons. But whoever, whether an orator, pilgrim, or traveler, comes into the land of excommunicated persons where he cannot buy or does not have the means to buy, we grant permission to receive from excommunicated persons. And if anyone wishes to give something to excommunicated persons not for the sustenance of pride but for the sake of humanity, we do not prohibit it.

C. CIII. De his, qui sine culpa excommunicatis communicant.

Item Gregorius VII. [lib. V. Regesti, in Concilio Romae habito] Quoniam multos peccatis nostris exigentibus pro causa excommunicationis perire cottidie cernimus, partim ignorantia, partim nimia simplicitate, partim timore, partim etiam ex necessitate, deuicti misericordia anathematis sententiam ad tempus, prout possumus, temperamus. Apostolica itaque auctoritate ab anathematis uinculo hos subtrahimus, uidelicet uxores, filios, seruos, ancillas, seu mancipia, nec non rusticos et seruientes nec non et omnes alios, qui non adeo curiales sunt, ut eorum consilio scelera perpetrentur, et eos, qui ignoranter excommunicatis communicant, siue illos, qui communicant cum illis, qui excommunicatis communicant. Quicumque autem aut orator, siue peregrinus, aut uiator in terram excommunicatorum deuenerit, ubi non possit emere uel non habeat unde emat, ab excommunicatis accipiendi damus licentiam. Et si quis excommunicatis non in sustentatione superbiae, sed humanitatis causa dare aliquid uoluerit, non prohibemus.

C. CIV. Concerning Boniface, who swore that he would not communicate with excommunicated persons and pseudo-bishops.

Likewise Boniface the Martyr to Pope Zachary, [in the letter which begins "Of Paternal"]. Gregory of venerable memory, the predecessor of your predecessor, when he ordained me, unworthy as I am, and sent me to preach the word of God to the German peoples, bound me by an oath to become a supporter and helper in word, deed, and consent to canonical and just bishops and priests. With divine grace I endeavored to fulfill this; but as for false priests, hypocrites, and seducers of the peoples, I was either to correct them to the way of salvation or to avoid them and abstain from their communion. I preserved this in part, and in part I was unable to guard and fulfill it; but I fulfilled the oath spiritually, because my soul did not enter into their consent and counsel, though bodily I could not altogether abstain from them. For when, under the compulsion of the churches' necessity, I had come to the prince of the Franks, I did not find there such men as I wished, but nevertheless I did not communicate with them in the holy communion of Christ's body.

C. CIV. De Bonifatio, qui excommunicatis et pseudoepiscopis se non communicaturum iurauit.

Item Bonifatius Martir Zachariae Papae. [in epist., quae incipit: "Paternae."] Antecessor predecessoris uestri uenerandae memoriae Gregorius, dum me indignum ordinauit et ad predicandum uerbum Dei Germanicis gentibus misit, sacramento me astrinxit, ut canonicis et iustis episcopis et presbiteris in uerbo et facto et consensu astipulator et adiutor fierem. Hoc autem cum diuina gratia inplere studui; falsos autem sacerdotes ypocritas et seductores populorum uel corrigerem ad uiam salutis, uel declinarem et abstinerem a communione ipsorum; quod ex parte seruaui, et ex parte custodire et inplere non potui; sed spiritualiter inpleui sacramentum, quia in consensum et in consilium eorum non uenit anima mea, corporaliter autem ab eis omnino abstinere non potui. Dum enim uenissem ad principem Francorum cogente ecclesiarum necessitate, non tales ibi reperi quales uolui, sed tamen in sancta communione corporis Christi illis non communicaui.

C. CV. One who does not consent to excommunicated persons in his mind does not communicate with them.

Likewise Pope Zachary to Boniface the Martyr, [in the letter whose beginning is "Blessed Be God"]. Our predecessor Gregory of blessed memory, ruler of this apostolic see, when he sent your fraternity to preach the word of the Gospel in the regions of Germany and among those pagan peoples, wished it to be fortified beforehand by a word of promise, so that you would further confirm and communicate with whatever orthodox bishops, priests, or others you could find perfect in the word of exhortation—which was done; but if you found any seducing bishops or pseudo-priests straying from the right path of faith, you were to have no communion with them. You have confessed that, with God assisting you, you have preserved this spiritually even to the present; or, if you were altogether unable to abstain from them bodily on account of the princely and human favor of the Frankish people when you approached them, under the compulsion of the necessity of God's churches, your soul nevertheless was not defiled in their counsel and consent of communion. Therefore, because you associated with them without consenting to their iniquity, there is no detriment to you before God. PART IX. GRATIAN. But the form and manner of excommunication and of reconciliation is this:

C. CV. Excommunicatis non communicat qui eis animo non consentit.

Item Zacharias Papa Bonifatio Martiri. [in epistola, cuius initium est: "Benedictus Deus."] Quod predecessor noster beatae memoriae Gregorius, huius sedis apostolicae presul, dum ad predicandum uerbum euangelii tuam misisset fraternitatem in Germaniae partibus et gentibus illis paganis, et uerbo pollicitationis illam uoluit esse ante munitam, ita ut orthodoxos episcopos, presbiteros, uel quoscumque reperire potuisses in uerbo exhortationis perfectos, amplius confirmares, et eis communicares (quod et factum est); si quos uero seductores episcopos aut pseudopresbiteros a recto fidei tramite deuiantes reperisses, nulla tibi cum eis esset communio, quod te, Deo solatiante, usque ad presens spiritualiter seruasse confessus es, uel, si omnino propter principalem et humanum fauorem gentis Francorum, dum ad eos accessisses, corporaliter abstinere non ualuisti cogente ecclesiarum Dei necessitate, et tamen in eorum consilio et communionis consensu anima tua non est coinquinata: itaque propter hoc, quod cum eis conuersatus es, non consentiens iniquitati eorum, nullum tibi est detrimentum coram Deo. IX. Pars. Gratian. Excommunicationis autem forma et modus, atque reconciliationis hic est:

C. CVI. The manner and form of excommunication.

Twelve priests ought to stand around the bishop and hold burning lamps in their hands, which at the conclusion of the anathema or excommunication they ought to cast upon the ground and trample underfoot. Then let a letter be sent through the parishes containing the names of the excommunicated persons and the cause of excommunication.

C. CVI. Modus et forma excommunicationis.

Debent duodecim sacerdotes episcopum circumstare, et lucernas ardentes in manibus tenere, quas in conclusione anathematis uel excommunicationis proicere debent in terram et conculcare pedibus; deinde epistola per parrochias mittatur, continens excommunicatorum nomina et causam excommunicationis.

C. CVII. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Orange. Following the canonical institutions and examples of the holy Fathers, by the authority of God and the judgment of the Holy Spirit we remove N., violators of the churches of God, from the bosom of holy mother church and from the fellowship of all Christianity until they come to their senses and make satisfaction to the church of God.

C. CVII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Aurasico. Canonica instituta et sanctorum Patrum exempla sequentes, ecclesiarum Dei uiolatores N. auctoritate Dei et iudicio sancti Spiritus a gremio sanctae matris ecclesiae et a consortio totius Christianitatis eliminamus, quoadusque resipiscant et ecclesiae Dei satisfaciant.

C. CVIII. The manner of reconciling excommunicated persons.

Likewise from the same. When someone who has been excommunicated or anathematized, led by penance, seeks pardon and promises amendment, the bishop who excommunicated him ought to come before the doors of the church, and twelve priests with him, who ought to stand around him on this side and that. And if the man, prostrate upon the ground, seeks pardon and pledges caution for the future, then let the bishop, taking his right hand, lead him into the church, restore him to Christian communion, and chant the seven penitential psalms with these prayers: Lord, have mercy. Our Father. Save your servant. Prayer: Grant, we beseech You, O Lord, to this Your servant the worthy fruit of penance, so that, by obtaining pardon for the things committed, he may be restored guiltless to Your holy church, from whose integrity he had strayed by sinning. Through the Lord.

PART X. GRATIAN. But what penance is to be imposed upon priests who, while excommunicated, presume to handle the sacred ministry, John VIII determines when writing to the Clergy and Order of Salona, saying:

> C. CVIII. Modus reconciliationis excommunicatorum.
> Item ex eodem. Cum aliquis uel excommunicatus, uel anathematizatus, penitencia ductus ueniam postulat et emendationem promittit, episcopus, qui eum excommunicauit, ante ianuas ecclesiae uenire debet, et duodecim presbiteri cum eo, qui eum hinc et inde circumstare debent. Et si ille terrae prostratus ueniam postulat, et de futuris cautelam spondet, tunc episcopus apprehensa manu eius dextera, in ecclesiam illum introducat, et communioni Christianae reddat, et septem psalmos penitenciales decantet cum istis precibus: Kyrie eleison, Pater noster, saluum fac seruum tuum. Oratio: Presta, quesumus Domine, huic famulo tuo dignum penitenciae fructum, ut ecclesiae tuae sanctae, a cuius integritate deuiauerat peccando, admissorum ueniam consequendo reddatur innoxius. Per Dominum.
> X. Pars. Gratian. Presbiteris uero, qui excommunicati sacrum ministerium contingere presumunt, que penitencia sit inponenda, Iohannes VIII. Clero et ordini Salonitano scribens diffinit, dicens:

C. CIX. What the penance is for priests who, while excommunicated, presume to exercise the sacred ministry.

Concerning those priests who, after being excommunicated in the time of our most holy predecessor, the lord Pope Nicholas, presumed to handle the sacred ministry: they brought upon themselves a sentence of condemnation, as the canons establish. Nevertheless, because apostolic compassion is accustomed to furnish pardon to those corrected, from the multitude of mercy we show them this indulgence: that, fattened by holy communion, for three continuous years they endeavor to fast entirely from wine and meat on every Monday and Friday throughout the week and by no means commit further things to be lamented. GRATIAN. But those who communicate with excommunicated persons shall receive a measure of penance according to the measure of the sin. Hence Urban II to Genebald, Bishop of Constance:

> C. CIX. Que sit penitencia sacerdotum, qui excommunicati sacrum ministerium presumunt.
> De illis presbiteris, qui tempore sanctissimi predecessoris nostri domini Papae Nicolai excommunicati sacrum ministerium contingere presumpserunt, ipsi in se dampnationis (sicut canones statuunt) sententiam intulerunt. Tamen, quia miseratio apostolica ueniam solet prestare correctis, ob multitudinem misericordiae illis hanc indulgentiam exhibemus, ut, sancta communione saginati, studeant tribus annis continuis per ebdomadam omni secunda et sexta feria a uino et a carne penitus ieiunare, et ultra lugenda nequaquam committere. Gratian. Qui autem excommunicatis communicant pro modo peccati penitenciae modum accipiant. Unde Urbanus II. Genebaldo Constantiensi Episcopo:

C. CX. Let those who communicate with excommunicated persons be punished according to the measure of the sin.

It is established that provision was made by the sacred canons that whoever communicates with excommunicated persons shall be excommunicated. Nevertheless, we determine the measures of that penance and absolution with this moderation: that whoever has contaminated himself by their feasting, prayer, greeting, or kiss, whether through ignorance, fear, or the necessity of some very great and especially necessary business, shall obtain participation in our fellowship with the remedy of a lesser penance. But those who have fallen into it either voluntarily or negligently we wish to be received under such coercion of discipline that fear may be instilled in the others.

C. CX. Pro modo peccati puniantur qui excommunicatis communicant.

Sanctis quippe canonibus cautum constat, ut quicumque excommunicatis communicauerit excommunicetur. Ipsius tamen penitenciae atque absolutionis modos eo moderamine decernimus, ut quicumque seu ignorantia seu timore, seu necessitate negocii cuiusquam maximi et maxime necessarii eorum se conuictu, oratione, salutatione osculoue contaminauerint, cum minoris penitenciae medicina societatis nostrae participium sortiantur. Eos uero, qui aut spontanee, aut negligenter inciderint, sub ea uolumus disciplinae cohercione suscipi, ut ceteris metus incutiatur.

Causa XII

GRATIAN. Certain clerics wish to relinquish their own property; they make testaments concerning their own property and that of the church; they bestow certain things from the property of the church. (Qu. I.) First it is now asked whether clerics are permitted to possess property of their own. (Qu. II.) Second, whether the property of the church which was given by them can possess any validity for those who received it. (Qu. III.) Third, if before the time of their ordination they appeared to possess nothing and after ordination are known to have acquired certain things, whether they can leave those things to whomever they wish or not. (Qu. IV.) Fourth, if they are known to have acquired certain things from their own property and that of the church, whether by right they accrue to both in common or separately to the church or the priest. (Qu. V.) Fifth, whether they are permitted to make testaments.

GRATIANUS. Quidam clerici propria relinquere uolunt; de suis et ecclesiae rebus testamenta conficiunt; de rebus ecclesiae nonnulla largiuntur. (Qu. I.) Modo primum queritur: Utrum clericis liceat proprium habere? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an res ecclesiae, que ab eis datae sunt, possint constare aliqua firmitate eis, qui eas acceperunt? (Qu. III.) Tertio, si ante tempus suae ordinationis, qui nichil habere uidebantur et post ordinationem aliqua inuenisse noscuntur, an possint ea quibus uoluerint, relinquere an non? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, si de suis et ecclesiae rebus aliqua acquisisse noscuntur, an utrique communiter, an singulariter ecclesiae uel sacerdoti iure proueniant? (Qu. V.) Quinto, si testamenta eis liceat conficere?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. Clerics are commanded by many authorities to possess nothing. For the Council of Toledo says, [IV, c. 23]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Clericos nichil possidere multis auctoritatibus iubetur. Ait enim Tolletanum Concilium: [IV. c. 23.]

C. I. Let boys and adolescents remaining in one enclosure be assigned to a most approved elder.

Every age from adolescence is inclined toward evil. Nothing is more uncertain than the life of adolescents. On this account it was necessary to establish that, if there are any boys or adolescents in the clergy, all shall dwell together in one enclosure of the atrium, so that they may pass the years of their unstable age not in luxury but in ecclesiastical disciplines, assigned to a most approved elder whom they may have both as master of learning and witness of life. § 1. But if any of these are wards, let them be fostered by priestly guardianship, so that both their life may be untouched by crimes and their property by the injury of the impious. But those who resist these commands shall be assigned to monasteries, so that wandering and proud souls may be constrained by a stricter rule.

> C. I. Inpuberes et adolescentes, in uno conclaui manentes, probatissimo seniori deputentur.
> Omnis etas ab adolescentia in malum prona est. Nichil incertius quam uita adolescentium. Ob hoc constituere oportuit, ut, si qui inpuberes, aut adolescentes in clero existunt, omnes in uno conclaui atrii conmaneant ut lubricae etatis annos non in luxuria, sed in disciplinis ecclesiasticis agant, deputati probatissimo seniori, quem et magistrum doctrinae, et testem uitae habeant. §. 1. Quod si aliqui ex his pupilli existunt, sacerdotali tutela foueantur, ut et uita eorum a criminibus intacta sit, et res ab iniuria inpiorum. Qui autem his preceptis resultauerint, monasteriis deputentur, ut uagantes animae et superbae seueriori regula distringantur.

C. II. A common life is to be preserved by all clerics.

Likewise Clement in letter IV. Bishop Clement to his most beloved brothers and fellow disciples dwelling at Jerusalem with the most dear brother James and fellow bishop. A common life is necessary for all, brothers, and especially for those who desire to serve God blamelessly and wish to imitate the life of the apostles and their disciples. § 1. For the common use of all things which are in this world ought to have belonged to all men. But through iniquity one said that this was his and another that, and thus division was made among mortals. § 2. Finally, a certain most wise man among the Greeks, knowing that these things are so, says that all things ought to be common among friends. But among "all things" are without doubt even spouses. "And just as the air cannot be divided," he says, "nor the splendor of the sun, so neither ought the remaining things which were given in common for all to possess be divided, but they ought to be possessed in common." Hence also the Lord speaks through the Prophet, saying: "Behold how good and how pleasant," and the rest. § 3. For with the practice of this custom retained, the apostles and their disciples also, as was said before, led a common life together with us and you. For as you well know, the heart of their multitude was one and the soul one, and none among them or us said that anything from what he possessed was his own, but all things were common to them and us, and no one among us was needy. § 4. But all who possessed houses or fields sold them and offered their prices and the remaining things which they possessed, placing them before the feet of the apostles—as certain persons among you recognized and saw together with us—and they distributed to each person according as each had need. § 5. But Ananias, an austere man, and his wife Sapphira, because they lied to the apostles concerning the price of their fields which they had sold, were both, while we were present, carried out dead from the sight of the apostles in the sight of all standing around because of their sin and the falsehood which they committed. Therefore we command you to guard against these things and order you to obey the teachings and examples of the apostles, because those who set aside their commands become not only guilty but also exiles. These things are not only to be guarded against by you, but are also to be preached to all. § 6. Hence, giving counsel, we exhort your prudence not to withdraw from the apostolic rules, but, leading a common life and rightly understanding the sacred scriptures, to endeavor to fulfill those things which you know well.

> C. II. Omnibus clericis communis est uita seruanda.
> Item Clemens in epistola IV. Dilectissimis fratribus et condiscipulis, Ierosolimis cum karissimo fratre Iacobo et coepiscopo habitantibus, Clemens episcopus. Communis uita, omnibus est necessaria, fratres, et maxime his, qui Deo inreprehensibiliter militare cupiunt, et uitam apostolorum eorumque discipulorum imitari uolunt. §. 1. Communis enim usus omnium, que sunt in hoc mundo, omnibus hominibus esse debuit. Sed per iniquitatem alius hoc dixit esse suum, et alius istud et sic inter mortales facta est diuisio. §. 2. Denique Grecorum quidam sapientissimus, hec ita esse sciens, communia debere, ait, esse amicorum omnia. In omnibus autem sunt sine dubio et coniuges. "Et sicut non potest," inquit, "diuidi aer, neque splendor solis, ita nec reliqua, que communiter omnibus data sunt ad habendum, diuidi debere, sed habenda esse communia." Unde et Dominus per Prophetam loquitur, dicens: "Ecce quam bonum et quam iucundum, et reliqua." §. 3. Istius enim consuetudinis more retento etiam apostoli eorumque discipuli, ut predictum est, una nobiscum et uobiscum communem uitam duxerunt. Ut enim bene nostis, erat multitudinis eorum cor unum et anima una, nec quisquam eorum aut nostrum de his, que possidebat, aliquid suum esse dicebat, sed omnia illis et nobis erant communia, nec quisquam egens erat inter nos. §. 4. Omnes uero, qui domos uel agros possidebant, uendebant eos, et precia eorum et reliquas res, quas habebant, offerebant, ponentes ante pedes apostolorum (sicut nobiscum quidam uestrum cognouerunt et uiderunt), et diuidebant singulis, prout cuique opus erat. §. 5. Ananias autem uir austerus, et Saphira uxor eius, quia mentiti sunt apostolis de precio agrorum suorum, quos uendiderant, nobis presentibus, in conspectu omnium circumstantium a conspectu apostolorum propter peccatum eorum et mendacium, quod fecerunt, mortui delati sunt ambo. Quapropter hec cauenda uobis mandamus, et doctrinis et exemplis apostolorum obedire precipimus, quia hi, qui mandata eorum postponunt, non solum rei, sed etiam extorres fiunt. Que non solum uobis cauenda, sed etiam omnibus predicanda sunt. §. 6. Unde consilium dantes uestram prudentiam hortamur, ut ab apostolicis regulis non recedatis, sed communem uitam ducentes, et scripturas sacras recte intelligentes, que bene nouistis adinplere satagatis.

C. III. Let cloisters for clerics be established beside the church.

Likewise Pope Eugenius II and Leo IX. For it is a necessary thing that cloisters be established beside the church in which clerics may devote themselves to ecclesiastical disciplines. Therefore let there be one refectory and dormitory for all, and the other workshops necessary for the uses of clerics. But after the bishop let ministers be chosen over them whose life and learning may adorn rather than dishonor them. GRATIAN. Nor shall other buildings be placed in the atrium of the church except those of clerics. Hence Pope Nicholas:

> C. III. Iuxta ecclesiam clericorum claustra constituantur.

Item Eugenius Papa [II.] et Leo IX. Necessaria etenim res existit, ut iuxta ecclesiam claustra constituantur, in quibus clerici disciplinis ecclesiasticis uacent. Itaque omnibus sit unum refectorium ac dormitorium, seu ceterae officinae ad usus clericorum necessariae. Ministri uero post episcopum super eos eligantur, quorum uita atque doctrina illos potius exornet quam dehonestet. Gratian. Nec in atrio ecclesiae alia edificia nisi clericorum ponantur. Unde Nicolaus Papa:

C. IV. Let no buildings except those of clerics be placed in the atrium of a church.

Let no buildings be placed in the atrium of a church except only those of clerics.

C. IV. In atrio ecclesiae nisi clericorum edificia minime ponantur.

Nulla edificia in atrio ecclesiae ponantur nisi tantum clericorum.

C. V. Let a cleric possess nothing secular.

Likewise Jerome to Nepotian. Let a cleric who serves the church of Christ first interpret his own designation and, after the definition of the name has been stated, strive to be what he is called. For if klēros in Greek is called "lot" in Latin, clerics are therefore so called because they are of the Lord's lot, or because the Lord Himself is the lot, that is, the portion, of clerics. And because either he himself is the Lord's portion or has the Lord as his portion, he ought to show himself such that he possesses the Lord and is himself possessed by the Lord. One who possesses the Lord and says with the Prophet, "The Lord is my portion," can possess nothing outside the Lord. But if he possesses anything else besides the Lord, the Lord will not be his portion; for example, if gold, silver, possessions, or varied furnishings, the Lord does not deign to become his portion with these portions. But if I am the Lord's portion and the cord of His inheritance, I do not receive portions among the other tribes, but live as a Levite and priest from tithes, and, serving the altar, I am sustained by the altar's offering. Having food and clothing, I will be content with these and, naked, follow the naked cross.

C. V. Clericus nichil seculare possideat.

Item Ieronimus ad Nepotianum. Clericus, qui Christi ecclesiae seruit, interpretetur primum uocabulum suum, et, nominis diffinitione prolata, nitatur esse quod dicitur. Si enim KLEROS grece latine sors appellatur, propterea clerici dicuntur, quia de sorte Domini sunt, uel quia ipse Dominus sors, id est pars, clericorum est. Et quia uel ipse pars Domini est, uel Dominum partem habet, talem se exhibere debet, ut ipse possideat Dominum, et ipse possideatur a Domino. Qui Dominum possidet et cum Propheta dicit: "Pars mea Dominus," nichil extra Dominum habere potest. Quod si quippiam aliud habuerit preter Dominum, pars eius non erit Dominus; uerbi gratia, si aurum, si argentum, si possessiones, si uariam suppellectilem, cum istis partibus Dominus non dignatur fieri pars eius. Si autem ego pars Domini sum, et funiculus hereditatis eius, non accipio partes inter ceteras tribus, sed quasi Leuita et sacerdos uiuo de decimis, et altari seruiens altaris oblatione sustentor. Habens uictum et uestitum, his contentus ero, et nudam crucem nudus sequor.

C. VI. Let one who is chosen into God's lot possess nothing besides God.

Likewise Ambrose, On Flight from the World, [c. 2]. One whose portion is God ought to care for nothing except God, lest he be impeded by the duty of another necessity. For what is conferred upon other offices is taken away from the worship of religion and from this office of ours. For this is the true flight of a priest: renunciation of household members and a certain estrangement from the most beloved, so that one who desires to serve God may deny himself to his own.

C. VI. Nichil preter Deum habeat qui in eius sortem eligitur.

Item Ambrosius de fuga seculi. [c. 2.] Cui portio Deus est nichil debet curare nisi Deum, ne alterius inpediatur necessitatis munere. Quod enim ad alia offitia confertur, hoc religionis cultui atque huic nostro offitio decerpitur. Hec enim uera est sacerdotis fuga, abdicatio domesticorum, et quedam alienatio karissimorum, ut suis se abneget qui Deo seruire gestit.

C. VII. Clerics and those devoted to God are permitted neither to conduct lawsuits nor to possess anything of their own.

Likewise Jerome to a certain Levite of his, On the Two Kinds of Men. There are two kinds of Christians. One kind is that which, bound to divine office and devoted to contemplation and prayer, ought to cease from every clamor of temporal things, as are clerics and those devoted to God, namely converts. For klēros in Greek is "lot" in Latin. Hence men of this kind are called clerics, that is, chosen by lot. For God chose all of them as His own. These indeed are kings, that is, ruling themselves and others in virtues, and thus they possess a kingdom in God. And this is designated by the crown on the head. They possess this crown by the institution of the Roman Church as a sign of the kingdom which is awaited in Christ. But the shaving of the head is the laying aside of all temporal things. For they, content with food and clothing and possessing no property among themselves, ought to possess all things in common. § 1. But the other kind of Christians consists of the laity. For laos is "people." They are permitted to possess temporal things, but only for use. For nothing is more wretched than to despise God on account of money. They are permitted to take a wife, cultivate land, judge between man and man, conduct lawsuits, place offerings upon altars, render tithes, and thus they will be able to be saved, provided they avoid vices by doing good.

C. VII. Clericis et Deo deuotis nec causas agere, nec aliquid proprium habere licet.

Item Ieronimus ad quendam suum Leuitam, de duobus generibus hominum. Duo sunt genera Christianorum. Est autem genus unum, quod mancipatum diuino offitio, et deditum contemplationi et orationi, ab omni strepitu temporalium cessare conuenit, ut sunt clerici, et Deo deuoti, uidelicet conuersi. KLEROS enim grece latine sors. Inde huiusmodi homines uocantur clerici, id est sorte electi. Omnes enim Deus in suos elegit. Hi namque sunt reges, id est se et alios regentes in uirtutibus, et ita in Deo regnum habent. Et hoc designat corona in capite. Hanc coronam habent ab institutione Romanae ecclesiae in signo regni, quod in Christo expectatur. Rasio uero capitis est temporalium omnium depositio. Illi enim uictu et uestitu contenti nullam inter se proprietatem habentes, debent habere omnia communia. §. 1. Aliud uero est genus Christianorum, ut sunt laici. LAOS enim est populus. His licet temporalia possidere, sed non nisi ad usum. Nichil enim miserius est quam propter nummum Deum contempnere. His concessum est uxorem ducere, terram colere, inter uirum et uirum iudicare, causas agere, oblationes super altaria ponere, decimas reddere, et ita saluari poterunt, si uicia tamen benefaciendo euitauerint.

C. VIII. Let clerics possess nothing of their own.

Likewise Gregory to Augustine, Bishop of the English, [responses cc. 1 and 2]. Because your fraternity, instructed in monastic rules, ought not to be separated from your clerics in the church of the English, which under God as author was recently led to the faith, it ought to institute that manner of life which existed at the beginning among our Fathers, among whom none possessed as his own anything from the things which he possessed, but all things were common to them. § 1. But if there are any clerics established outside sacred orders who cannot contain themselves, they ought to take wives and receive their stipends externally, because concerning the same Fathers we also know it to be written "that they distributed according as each had need." Thought and provision must also be given concerning their stipend, and they are to be held under ecclesiastical rule, so that they may live with good conduct, keep watch in chanting psalms, and, with God as author, preserve heart, tongue, and body from all unlawful things. § 2. But concerning those living in common, what is there for us now to say about making portions, furnishing hospitality, and fulfilling mercy, since everything which remains beyond necessities is to be expended upon pious and religious causes? The Lord and Master says to all: "Give what remains as alms, and all things are clean for you."

> C. VIII. Clerici nichil possideant proprium.
> Item Gregorius Augustino Anglorum Episcopo. [responsionum c. 1. et 2.] Quia tua fraternitas monasterii regulis erudita seorsum non debet fieri a clericis suis in ecclesia Anglorum, que auctore Deo nuper ad fidem perducta est, hanc debet instituere conuersationem, que in inicio fuit Patribus nostris, in quibus nullus eorum ex his, que possidebat, proprium habebat, sed erant illis omnia communia. §. 1. Si qui uero sunt clerici extra sacros ordines constituti, qui se non possunt continere, sortiri uxores debent, et stipendia sua accipere exterius, quia et de eisdem Patribus nouimus scriptum: "quod diuidebant prout cuique opus erat." De eorum quoque stipendio cogitandum atque prouidendum est, et sub ecclesiastica regula sunt tenendi, ut bonis moribus uiuant, et canendis psalmis inuigilent, et ab omnibus illicitis cor, et linguam, et corpus Deo auctore conseruent. §. 2. Communiter autem uiuentibus iam de faciendis porcionibus, uel exhibenda hospitalitate, et adinplenda misericordia a nobis quid erit loquendum, cum omne, quod superest necessitatibus in causis piis ac religiosis erogandum est? Domino magistro omnibus dicente: "Quod superest date elemosinam, et omnia munda sunt uobis."

C. IX. All things ought to be common to clerics.

Likewise Pope Urban to all Catholics, [sole letter, c. 1]. We know that you are not ignorant that until now a common life flourished among all Christians, and by God's grace still flourishes, especially among those who are chosen in the Lord's lot, that is, clerics, as is read in the Acts of the Apostles: "But the multitude of believers had one heart and one soul, nor did anyone say that anything among the things he possessed was his own, but all things were common to them." And below: § 1. Whoever among you has undertaken a common life and vowed that he would possess nothing of his own, let him see that he does not make his promise void, but faithfully guard what he promised the Lord, lest he acquire condemnation for himself rather than reward, since it is better not to vow than not to fulfill the vow as well as one can. For those who made a vow or received the faith and did not fulfill the vow or ended their lives in evils are punished more gravely than those who died without a vow or faith and nevertheless performed good works.

> C. IX. Clericis omnia communia esse debent.
> Item Urbanus Papa omnibus catholicis. [epistola unica, c. 1.] Scimus uos non ignorare, quia hactenus uita communis inter omnes Christianos uiguit, et adhuc Dei gratia uiget, et maxime inter eos, qui in sorte Domini sunt electi, id est clericos, sicut in Actibus apostolorum legitur: "Multitudinis autem credentium erat cor unum, et anima una, nec quisquam eorum, que possidebat, aliquid suum esse dicebat, sed erant illis omnia communia." Et infra: §. 1. Quicumque uestrum communem uitam susceptam habet, et uouit se nichil proprium habere, uideat ne pollicitationem suam irritam faciat, sed hoc, quod Domino pollicitus est, fideliter custodiat, ne dampnationem sibi, sed premium acquirat quoniam satius est non uouere, quam uotum, prout melius potest, non perficere. Grauius enim puniuntur qui uotum fecerunt aut fidem perceperunt, et uotum non perfecerunt aut in malis uitam finierunt, quam illi, qui sine uoto aut fide mortui sunt, et tamen bona egerunt opera.

C. X. Concerning the same.

Likewise Augustine in the sermon On the Common Life of Clerics. I do not wish anyone to find in us an occasion for living badly. For, as the Apostle says, we provide good things not only before God but also before all men. On account of ourselves our conscience is necessary for us; on account of you our reputation ought not to be polluted but to flourish among you. There are two things: conscience and reputation. Conscience is necessary for you, reputation for your neighbor. One who, trusting in conscience, neglects his reputation is cruel. And below: § 1. No one in our community is permitted to possess anything of his own; but perhaps some do possess something. No one is permitted, but those who possess do what is not permitted. And a little later: § 2. It is not permitted to possess a reserve fund. It is not for bishops to preserve gold and draw back the hand of one begging from them. Daily so many seek, so many groan, so many needy persons address us, that we leave more of them sorrowful because we do not possess what we could give to all. Therefore we possess no reserve fund. And below: § 3. One who possesses property of his own or wishes to possess it and live from his own property and act contrary to these precepts—it is little for me to say that he will not remain with me; rather, he will not even be a cleric. For I had said, and I know that I said it, that if they were unwilling even to undertake a communal life with me, I would not take the clericate from them; let them remain separately, let them live separately. For I preferred to possess even lame men rather than mourn dead ones. For one who is a hypocrite is dead. Therefore, just as I would not take the clericate from whoever had wished to remain outside and live from his own property, so now, because by God's favor this communal life has pleased them, whoever lives in hypocrisy, whoever is found possessing property of his own, I do not permit him to make a testament concerning it, but I will erase him from the tablet of clerics. Likewise: § 4. One who does not wish to remain with me and live in common may have liberty, but let him see whether he can possess the inheritance of felicity.

C. X. De eodem.

Item Augustinus in sermone de communi uita clericorum. Nolo, ut aliquis de nobis inueniat male uiuendi occasionem. Prouidemus enim bona, ut ait Apostolus, non solum coram Deo, sed etiam coram omnibus hominibus. Propter nos conscientia nostra nobis necessaria est, propter uos fama nostra non pollui, sed pollere debet in uobis. Duae sunt res, conscientia et fama. Conscientia necessaria est tibi, fama proximo tuo. Qui fidens conscientiae negligit famam suam, crudelis est. Et infra: §. 1. Nulli in societate nostra licet aliquid habere proprium; sed forte aliqui habent, nulli licet, sed qui habuerint faciunt quod non licet. Et post pauca: §. 2. Enthecam habere non licet. Non est episcoporum aurum seruare, et a se reuocare mendicantis manum. Cottidie tam multi petunt, tam multi gemunt, tam multi inopes nos interpellant, ut plures tristes relinquamus, quia quod dare omnibus possimus non habemus. Non habemus ergo enthecam. Et infra: §. 3. Qui habuerit proprium, uel habere uoluerit, et de proprio uiuere, et contra precepta ista facere, parum est ut dicam, non mecum manebit, sed nec clericus erit. Dixeram enim, et scio me dixisse, ut si nollent etiam suscipere socialem uitam mecum, non illis tollerem clericatum, seorsum manerent, seorsum uiuerent. Malui enim habere uel claudos, quam plangere mortuos. Qui enim ypocrita est mortuus est. Quomodo ergo, quicumque uoluisset extra manere, et de suo uiuere, non tollerem clericatum ei? ita modo, quia placuit eis Deo propitio hec socialis uita, quisquis cum ypocrisi uixerit, quisquis inuentus fuerit habens proprium, non illi permitto, ut inde faciat testamentum, sed delebo eum de tabula clericorum. Item: §. 4. Qui non uult mecum manere et in communi uiuere, habeat libertatem, sed uideat, utrum habere possit felicitatis hereditatem.

C. XI. Those who renounce their own property and promise to live in common are not permitted to possess anything.

The same, [sermon III On the Common Life of Clerics]. Do not say that you possess anything of your own, but let all things be common to you. And below: § 1. But whoever has advanced into so great an evil that he secretly receives letters or any gift from someone, if he confesses this voluntarily, let him be spared and let prayer be made for him. But if he is detected and convicted, let him be amended more gravely according to the judgment of the priest or superior. And below: § 2. Since the brothers of this congregation of ours renounced not only their resources but also their own wills in the very reception of the order and subjected themselves entirely through promised obedience to the power and commands of others in Christ and for Christ, it is certain that they ought to possess, hold, give, or receive nothing without the superior's permission. § 3. But if a relative, friend, or any person wishes to offer something to any of the brothers, let it first be disclosed to the prior and then received if he himself has commanded it. Nevertheless, let nothing else be done with it except what has pleased the prior.

C. XI. Non licet aliquid habere his, qui suis renunciant et communiter uiuere spondent.

Idem. [serm. III. de communi uita clericorum] Non dicatis uos aliquid habere proprium, sed sint uobis omnia communia. Et infra: §. 1. Quicumque autem progressus in tantum fuerit malum, ut occulte litteras ab aliquo uel quodlibet munus accipiat, si hoc ultro confitetur, parcatur illi, et oretur pro illo. Si autem deprehenditur atque conuincitur, secundum arbitrium presbiteri uel prepositi grauius emendetur. Et infra: §. 2. Cum huius nostrae congregationis fratres non solum facultatibus, sed uoluntatibus propriis in ipsa ordinis susceptione renunciauerint, et se per promissam obedientiam penitus aliorum potestati, et inperiis in Christo et pro Christo subdiderint, certum est eos nichil habere, possidere, dare, uel accipere sine superioris licentia debere. §. 3. Quod si propinquus, uel amicus, uel quilibet fratrum cuiquam aliquid offerre uoluerit, primo quidem priori insinuetur, et sic suscipiatur, si ipse mandauerit. De quo tamen nichil aliud fiat, nisi quod priori placuerit.

C. XII. Concerning the same.

The same, [tractate L on chapter 12 of John]. Take the example of the Lord dwelling upon earth. Why did He have a purse, He whom angels ministered to, unless because His church was going to have a purse? Why did He admit a thief, unless so that His church might remove thieves when she suffers them?

C. XII. De eodem.

Idem. [tractatu L. ad c. 12. Iohannis] Exemplum Domini accipite conuersantis in terra. Quare habuit loculos cui angeli ministrabant, nisi quia ecclesia ipsius loculos habitura erat? Quare furem admisit, nisi ut eius ecclesia fures cum patitur tolleret?

C. XIII. The prelates of churches are made dispensers of those churches' goods.

Likewise Prosper, [On the Contemplative Life, book II, c. 9]. It is expedient that the resources of the church be possessed and that one's own be despised for love of perfection. For they are not one's own resources, but the common resources of the church; and therefore whoever, after all the things which he possessed have been relinquished or sold, becomes a despiser of his own property, when he has been made prelate of a church, is made dispenser of all the things which the church possesses. Finally, Saint Paulinus, as you yourselves know better, sold the immense estates which had been his and distributed the proceeds to the poor; but when he had been made bishop, he did not despise the resources of the church, but dispensed them most faithfully. By this deed he sufficiently showed both that one's own possessions ought to be despised for the sake of perfection and that the resources of the church, which are indeed common possessions, can be possessed without impediment to perfection. What of Saint Hilary? Did he not himself either leave all his possessions to his relatives or sell them and distribute the proceeds to the poor? Nevertheless, when by the merit of his perfection he was made bishop of the church of Arles, he not only possessed the things which that church then had, but even enlarged them by the numerous inheritances of the faithful which he received. And so, if men most learned beyond ambiguity in both secular and divine letters had known that the goods of the church ought to be despised, they who had relinquished all things ought never to have received them.

C. XIII. Ecclesiarum prepositi rerum earundem dispensatores efficiuntur.

Item Prosper. [de uita contemplatiua, lib. II. c. 9.] Expedit facultates ecclesiae possideri, et proprias perfectionis amore contempni. Non enim propriae sunt, sed communes ecclesiae facultates, et ideo quisquis omnibus, que habuit, dimissis aut uenditis fit rei suae contemptor, cum prepositus factus fuerit ecclesiae, omnium, que habet ecclesia, efficitur dispensator. Denique S. Paulinus, ut ipsi melius nostis, ingentia predia, que fuerunt sua, uendita pauperibus erogauit; sed cum factus esset episcopus, non contempsit ecclesiae facultates, sed fidelissime dispensauit. Quo facto satis ostendit, et propria debere propter perfectionem contempni, et sine impedimento perfectionis posse ecclesiae facultates, que sunt profecto communia, possidere. Quid S. Ylarius? nonne et ipse omnia sua aut parentibus reliquit, aut uendita pauperibus erogauit? Is tamen, cum merito perfectionis suae fieret ecclesiae Arelatensis episcopus, que illa tunc habebat ecclesia non solum possedit, sed etiam acceptis fidelium numerosis hereditatibus ampliauit. Itaque homines tam secularium quam diuinarum litterarum sine ambiguitate doctissimi, si scirent res ecclesiae contempni debere, nunquam eas debuerant suscipere, qui omnia reliquerant.

C. XIV. Let deacons or any religious persons be compelled to lead a regular life.

Likewise Gregory to Felix, Bishop of Acropolis, [book II, letter 29]. Since the churches of Velina, Vicenza, and Blandina are situated near you, we therefore solemnly enjoin upon your fraternity the work of visiting them, admonishing this before all things: that, wherever deacons or religious persons of the aforesaid churches or of their dioceses are found, they live strictly and canonically.

C. XIV. Diaconi uel quelibet religiosae personae regularem uitam ducere cogantur.

Item Gregorius Felici Episcopo de Acropoli. [lib. II. ep. 29.] Quoniam Velina, Vixentina, et Blandina ecclesiae, tibi in uicino constitutae sunt, propterea fraternitati tuae earum solempniter operam uisitationis iniungimus, illud pre omnibus conmonentes, ut, ubicumque prefatarum ecclesiarum, siue dioceseos earum, uel diaconi uel religiosae personae inuentae fuerint, districte ac canonice uiuant.

C. XV. Why estates were sold in the primitive church.

Likewise Pope Melchiades. The apostles foresaw the future church among the gentiles; for that reason they acquired no estates in Judea, but only prices for sustaining the needy. But when the church grew amid the tempests and adversities of the world, it reached the point that not only the gentiles, but even the Roman princes, who held the monarchy of the whole world, hastened to the faith of Christ and the sacraments of baptism. Of these the most religious man Constantine, the first openly to attain the faith of the truth, gave permission throughout the whole world to those dwelling under his rule not only to become Christians, but also to construct churches, and decreed that estates be granted. Finally, that aforesaid prince bestowed immense gifts and founded the fabric of the temple of the first see of blessed Peter, to such a degree that he relinquished the imperial seat and granted it to blessed Peter and his successors, to benefit them. § 1. And he himself, presiding over the holy synod which was assembled at Nicaea, when he perceived that the complaint of certain persons was to be brought before him, said: "You can be judged by no one, because you are reserved for the judgment of God alone. For you have been called gods, and for that reason you cannot be judged by men." From that time onward, religious men consecrated to the Lord not only the possessions and estates which they had possessed, but even themselves, building basilicas on their lands in honor of the holy martyrs throughout the cities, as well as innumerable monasteries, in which a company of those serving the Lord might assemble.

C. XV. Quare in primitiua ecclesia predia uendebantur.

Item Melciades Papa. Futuram ecclesiam in gentibus apostoli preuidebant; idcirco predia in Iudea minime sunt adepti, sed precia tantummodo ad fouendos egentes. At uero, cum inter turbines et aduersa mundi succresceret ecclesia, ad hoc usque peruenit, ut non solum gentes, sed etiam Romani principes, qui totius orbis monarchiam tenebant, ad fidem Christi et baptismi sacramenta concurrerent. E quibus uir religiosissimus Constantinus, primus fidem ueritatis patenter adeptus, licentiam dedit per uniuersum orbem suo degentibus inperio non solum fieri Christianos, sed etiam fabricandi ecclesias, et predia constituit tribuenda. Denique idem prefatus princeps donaria inmensa contulit, et fabricam templi primae sedis B. Petri instituit, adeo ut sedem inperialem relinqueret, et B. Petro suisque successoribus profuturam concederet. §. 1. Idem uero presidens sanctae sinodo, que apud Nicenam congregata est, cum querelam quorumdam coram se conspiceret deferendam, ait: "Vos a nemine diudicari potestis, quia Dei solius iudicio reseruamini. Dii etenim uocati estis, et idcirco non potestis ab hominibus iudicari." Ab illo etenim tempore, et deinceps, uiri religiosi non solum possessiones et predia, que possederant, sed etiam semetipsos Domino consecrarunt, edificantes basilicas in suis fundis in honore sanctorum martirum per ciuitates ac monasteria innumera, in quibus cetus Domino seruientium conueniret.

C. XVI. Why the estates of the faithful are not to be alienated from the church today.

Likewise Pope Urban, [sole letter, c. 1]. But the chief priests and others, as well as the Levites and the rest of the faithful, seeing that they could confer more benefit if they delivered to the churches over which bishops presided the inheritances and fields which they were selling, because from their revenues more and finer things could be supplied, both in present and future times, to the faithful leading a common life than from their price, began to deliver to the mother churches the estates and fields which they had been accustomed to sell, and to live from their revenues. § 1. But those goods were, and remain even until now, under the dominion of the bishops of the individual parishes, who hold the place of the apostles, and ought always to remain so in future times. From them the bishops and their faithful dispensers ought to supply all necessities to all who wish to live a common life, as well as they can, so that no needy person may be found among them. § 2. For those goods are called the offerings of the faithful, which are offered to the Lord by the faithful. § 3. Therefore, through the aforesaid increases, with the Lord assisting, the churches over which the bishops preside have grown to such a degree, and the greater part of them abound in such extensive goods, that no one leading a common life in them is needy, but receives all necessities from the bishop and his ministers. § 4. Therefore, if anyone should arise in present or future times who endeavors to tear this away, let him be struck by the already-stated condemnation.

> C. XVI. Quare predia fidelium hodie ab ecclesia non alienentur.
> Item Urbanus Papa. [epistola unica, c. 1.] Videntes autem summi sacerdotes, et alii, atque Leuitae, et reliqui fideles, plus utilitatis posse conferre, si hereditates et agros, quos uendebant, ecclesiis, quibus presidebant episcopi, traderent, eo quod ex sumptibus eorum tam presentibus quam futuris temporibus plura et elegantiora possent ministrare fidelibus communem uitam ducentibus, quam ex precio ipsorum, ceperunt predia et agros, quos uendere solebant, matricibus ecclesiis tradere, et ex sumptibus eorum uiuere. §. 1. Ipsae uero res in ditione singularum parrochiarum episcoporum (qui locum tenent apostolorum) erant, et sunt usque adhuc, et futuris semper debent esse temporibus. Ex quibus episcopi et fideles dispensatores eorum omnibus communi uita degere uolentibus ministrare cuncta necessaria debent, prout melius potuerint, ut nemo in eis egens inueniatur. §. 2. Ipsae enim res oblationes fidelium appellantur, que a fidelibus Domino offeruntur. §. 3. Memoratis augmentationibus ergo in tantum ecclesiae, quibus episcopi president, Domino adminiculante creuerunt, et in tantis maxima pars earum habundant rebus, ut nullus sit in eis communem uitam degens indigens, sed omnia necessaria ab episcopo suisque ministris percipiat. §. 4. Ideo, si aliquis extiterit modernis aut futuris temporibus qui hoc auellere nitatur, iam dicta dampnatione feriatur.

[C. XVII.]

Likewise Augustine, [tractate LXII on John]. The Lord had a purse, preserving the things offered by the faithful, and He gave from it both for the necessities of His own and to other needy persons. Then for the first time the form of ecclesiastical money was instituted, so that we might understand that what He commanded—that no thought be taken for tomorrow—was not commanded for the purpose that no money should be preserved by the saints, but lest God be served for the sake of those things and justice be abandoned through fear of poverty. PART II. GRATIAN. From all these things it is clear that clerics are in no way permitted to possess anything of their own; but if they have possessed something, they will not be clerics, yet the clericate is not to be taken from them. Hence Augustine says in the same sermon:

> [C. XVII.]
>
> Item Augustinus. [tractatu LXII. in Iohannem] Habebat Dominus loculos, a fidelibus oblata conseruans, et suorum necessitatibus, et aliis indigentibus tribuebat: Tunc primum ecclesiasticae pecuniae forma est instituta, ut intelligeremus quod precepit, non esse cogitandum de crastino, non ad hoc fuisse preceptum, ut nichil pecuniae seruetur a sanctis, sed ne Deo propter ista seruiatur, et propter inopiae timorem iustitia deseratur. II. Pars. Gratian. His omnibus claret, quod clericis nullo modo licet habere quid proprium; quod si habuerint, non clerici erunt, non tamen clericatus eis tollendus est. Unde Augustinus ait in eodem sermone:

C. XVIII. The clericate is not taken away from those who wish to possess something of their own.

Certainly it was I who had established that I would ordain no cleric unless he wished to remain with me, so that if he wished to depart from his purpose I might rightly take the clericate from him. Behold, in the sight of God and yours I change my counsel. Those who wish to possess something of their own, for whom God and His church do not suffice, may remain where they wish and where they can; I do not take the clericate from them. I do not wish to possess hypocrites. Who does not know that it is evil? It is evil to fall from one's purpose, but it is worse to feign the purpose. And a little later: § 1. If he does not preserve holiness outwardly, he has fallen by half; if he has inwardly maintained a pretense, he has fallen wholly. I do not wish him to have a necessity of pretending. I know how men love the clericate. I take it from no one unwilling to live in common with me. GRATIAN. On the contrary, there are other authorities by which it is conceded that not only others, but even bishops, may possess property of their own. Hence it is read in the Council of Agde, [c. 8]:

> C. XVIII. Clericatus non tollitur eis, qui uolunt habere aliquid proprium.
> Certe ego sum qui statueram, nullum ordinare clericum, nisi qui mecum uellet manere, ut si uellet a proposito discedere, recte illi tollerem clericatum. Ecce in conspectu Dei et uestro muto consilium. Qui uolunt aliquid habere proprium, quibus non sufficit Deus et ecclesia eius, maneant ubi uolunt et ubi possunt, non eis aufero clericatum, nolo habere ypocritas. Malum esse quis nesciat? Malum est cadere a proposito, sed peius est simulare propositum. Et post pauca: §. 1. Si non seruat sanctitatem foris, dimidius cecidit: si intus habuerit simulationem, totus cecidit. Nolo, ut habeat necessitatem simulandi. Scio, quomodo homines amant clericatum. Nemini eum tollo nolenti mecum communiter uiuere. Gratian. Econtra sunt aliae auctoritates, quibus conceditur propria habere, non solum aliis sed etiam episcopis. Unde in Concilio Agatensi [c. 8.] legitur:

C. XIX. Let bishops leave to their heirs their own or acquired goods.

Let bishops, if they wish, leave to their heirs their own or acquired goods, or whatever they possess of their own. But whatever has come from the provision of their church, whether from fields, fruits, or offerings, we have decreed that all of it be reserved under the right of the church.

> C. XIX. De rebus propriis uel acquisitis episcopi heredibus suis reliquant.
> Episcopi de rebus propriis uel acquisitis, uel quicquid de proprio habent, heredibus suis, si uoluerint, derelinquant. Quidquid uero de prouisione ecclesiae suae fuerit siue de agris, siue de frugibus, siue de oblationibus, omnia in iure ecclesiae reseruare censuimus.

C. XX. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 15]. The things which pertain to the church ought to be manifest to the priests and deacons who are around the bishops, so that if an unexpected passing should happen to the bishop, the goods of the church can in no way be diminished and perish; nor should the bishop's own goods suffer interference on account of the goods of the church, so that neither the church incurs loss nor the bishop is proscribed in his own goods on account of the goods of the church. The same was established in the Canons of the Apostles, [c. 40], in which it is read:

> C. XX. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 15.] Manifesta autem debent esse que ad ecclesiam pertinent his, qui circa episcopos sunt, presbiteris et diaconis, ut, si episcopo contigerit inopinatus transitus, res ecclesiae nullo modo possint minui et perire; neque res propriae episcopi inportunitatem patiantur pro rebus ecclesiae, ut nec ecclesia dampnum incurrat, nec episcopus in suis rebus pro rebus ecclesiae proscribatur. Idem statutum est in canonibus Apostolorum, [c. 40.] in quibus legitur:

C. XXI. Concerning the same.

Let the bishop's own goods be manifest, if indeed he has goods of his own, and let the Lord's goods be manifest, so that, when dying, the bishop may have the power to leave his own goods as he wishes and to whom he wishes, and lest, under the pretext of ecclesiastical goods, those things which are proved to belong to the bishop be placed under interdict. For perhaps he has a wife, or children, or relatives, or servants. And this is just before God and men: that neither the church suffer detriment through ignorance of the pontiff's goods, nor the bishop or his relatives be proscribed under the pretense of the church, and those who pertain to him fall into lawsuits and be defamed by the injuries of his death.

C. XXI. De eodem.

Sint manifestae res propriae episcopi (si tamen habet proprias), et manifestae dominicae, ut potestatem habeat de propriis moriens episcopus sicut uoluerit et quibus uoluerit derelinquere, nec sub occasione ecclesiasticarum rerum ea, que episcopi probantur esse, interdicantur. Fortassis enim aut uxorem habet, aut filios, aut propinquos, aut seruos. Et iustum est hoc apud Deum et homines, ut nec ecclesia patiatur detrimentum ignorantia rerum pontificis, nec episcopi uel eius propinqui sub obtentu ecclesiae proscribantur, et in causas incidant qui ad eum pertinent, mortisque eius iniuriis infamentur.

C. XXII. If a bishop is in need, let him take necessities for himself and his own from the goods of the church.

Likewise in the same canons, [c. 41]. But from those things which the bishop needs, if indeed he is in need, let him also receive for his own necessities and for the use of pilgrim brothers, so that nothing at all can be lacking to him. For the law of God commands that those who serve the altar be fed from it.

C. XXII. Ex rebus ecclesiae, si episcopus indiget, sibi et suis necessaria sumat.

Item in eisdem canonibus. [c. 41.] Ex his autem, quibus episcopus indiget, (si tamen indiget), in suas necessitates et peregrinorum fratrum usus et ipse percipiat, ut nichil ei possit omnino deesse. Lex enim Dei precipit, ut qui altario deseruiunt pascantur ex ipso.

C. XXIII. Let the bishop dispense ecclesiastical goods.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, c. 25. Let the bishop have power over ecclesiastical goods for dispensing to all who are in need, with the greatest reverence and fear of God. But let him himself also partake of those things which he needs, if indeed he is in need, both for his own necessary uses and those of the brothers who are received by him, in such a way that they are defrauded on no occasion whatever, according to the holy Apostle saying thus: "Having food and covering, with these we are content." But if he is by no means content with these, but turns the goods of the church to his own domestic uses, and does not manage its income or the fruits of its fields with the knowledge of the priests and deacons, but commits power over these things to his domestics, relatives, brothers, or sons, so that through persons of this kind the goods of the church are secretly harmed, let that man pay the penalties to the synod of the province. But if the bishop or the priests who are with him are accused in another manner also, because they usurp for themselves those things which pertain to the church, whether from fields or from any other ecclesiastical resource, so that the poor are thereby afflicted, while both the word of preaching and those who dispense are exposed to accusation and blasphemies, this also ought to be corrected, with the holy synod approving what is fitting.

> C. XXIII. Res ecclesiasticas episcopus dispenset.
> Item ex Concilio Antioceno, c. 25. Episcopus ecclesiasticarum rerum habeat potestatem ad dispensandum erga omnes, qui indigent; cum summa reuerentia et timore Dei. Participet autem et ipse quibus indiget, (si tamen indiget), tam in suis quam fratrum, qui ab eo suscipiuntur, necessariis usibus profuturis, ita ut nulla qualibet occasione fraudentur, iuxta sanctum Apostolum sic dicentem: "Habentes uictum et tegumentum, his contenti sumus." Quod si contentus istis minime fuerit, conuertat autem res ecclesiae in suos domesticos usus, et eius commoda uel agrorum fructus non cum presbiterorum diaconorumque conscientia pertractet, sed horum potestatem domesticis suis, aut propinquis, aut fratribus filiisque conmittat, ut per huius modi personas occulte res ledantur ecclesiae, sinodo prouinciae penas iste persoluat. Si autem et aliter accusatur episcopus, aut presbiteri, qui cum ipso sunt, quod ea, que pertinent ad ecclesiam, uel ex agris, uel ex alia qualibet ecclesiastica facultate sibimet usurpent, ita ut ex hoc pauperes affligantur, criminationi uero et blasphemiis tam sermo predicationis, quam hii, qui dispensant, taliter exponantur, et hoc oportet corrigi, sancta sinodo id quod condecet conprobante.

C. XXIV. Let the goods of the church be in the bishop's power.

Likewise in the Canons of the Apostles, [c. 41]. We command that the bishop have the goods of the church in his own power. For if the precious souls of men have been entrusted to him, much more ought he to exercise care concerning money, so that by his power all things may be dispensed to the needy through priests and deacons and administered with fear and all solicitude. But from those things which he needs, etc., as above. GRATIAN. Therefore, since in the Council of Agde and that of Pope Martin, and in the Canons of the Apostles, it is said, "Let the bishop's own goods be manifest," while in the same canons and in the Council of Antioch it is commanded that the bishop partake of the goods of the church, if indeed he is in need, is it not openly shown that the bishop may freely possess goods of his own? For by saying, "if he is in need of the goods of the church," it indicates that he possesses goods of his own, which perhaps do not suffice for his necessities. How, therefore, will a cleric, if he wishes to possess something of his own, not be a cleric, while a bishop possessing goods of his own not only does not cease to be a bishop, but is even commanded to have all ecclesiastical resources in his power? § 1. But it must be noted that eastern bishops have wives and children, while certain bishops from our regions, when established in the laity or in minor orders, have wives and children and, either when the wife's death intervenes or when continence is preserved by an equal vow, advance to sacred orders. It is conceded to all these to possess goods of their own for their own use and that of their people. But those who have been handed over to the sacred soldiery from infancy are in no way permitted to possess goods of their own, because there is no excuse for property in their case, unless perhaps, by retaining their own goods, they abstain from the expenditures of the church. Prosper testifies that this can be done, [On the Contemplative Life, book II, c. 12], saying:

> C. XXIV. Res ecclesiae sint in episcopi potestate.

Item in canonibus Apostolorum. [c. 41.] Precipimus, ut in potestate sua ecclesiae res episcopus habeat. Si enim animae hominum preciosae illi sunt creditae, multo magis oportet eum curam de pecuniis agere ita ut potestate eius indigentibus omnia dispensentur per presbiteros et diacones, et cum timore et omnia sollicitudine ministrentur. Ex his autem, quibus indiget etc. ut supra. Gratian. Cum ergo in concilio Agatensi, et Martini Papae, et in canonibus Apostolorum dicatur: "Sint manifestae res propriae episcopi," cum in eisdem canonibus, et in concilio Antioceno precipiatur, ut episcopus participet res ecclesiae, si tamen indiget, nonne patenter ostenditur, quod episcopus habeat libere propria? Dicendo enim: "si indiget rebus ecclesiae," notat eum habere propria, que forte suis necessitatibus non sufficiunt. Quomodo ergo clericus, si proprium habere uoluerit, clericus non erit, et episcopus habens propria non solum non desinit esse episcopus, uerum etiam cunctas ecclesiasticas facultates in sua iubetur habere potestate? §. 1. Sed notandum est, episcopos orientales uxores habere et filios, quosdam autem ex nostris partibus, cum in laicatu siue in minoribus ordinibus constituti habeant uxores et filios, siue morte uxoris interueniente siue continentia pari uoto seruata, ad sacros ordines accedere. His omnibus conceditur habere propria ad suos et suorum usus. Qui autem ab infantia sacrae miliciae traditi sunt, nullo modo eis permittitur habere propria, quia nulla est eis excusatio proprietatis, nisi forte retinendo sua a sumptibus ecclesiae abstineant. Quod fieri posse Prosper [de uita contemplatiua, lib. II. cap. 12.] testatur dicens:

C. XXV. Concerning those who are so infirm that they cannot renounce their own goods.

But those who are so infirm that they cannot renounce their possessions possess their own goods without sin if they leave to the dispenser, to be conferred upon those who possess nothing, the things which they were going to receive, because they too relinquish their own things in a certain manner when, content with their own goods, they receive none of the things which they judge to be owed to their labor or order. GRATIAN. But concerning the goods of the church it is asked whether it is permissible for them to be divided through prebends, so that each person may claim the annual revenues specially for himself. That this cannot be done is proved by argument and authority. Clerics are the successors of those concerning whom it is said: “But the multitude of believers had one heart and one soul.” It is therefore necessary that they follow the life of those whose rank they administer in the church. Therefore they shall not claim anything as their own for themselves, but all things will be common to them. Likewise Pope Urban says, [sole letter, c. 2]:

C. XXV. De his, qui tam infirmi sunt, quod rebus suis renunciare non possunt.

Illi autem, qui tam infirmi sunt, ut possessionibus suis renunciare non possint, si ea, que accepturi erant, dispensatori relinquant, nichil habentibus conferenda, sine peccato possident sua, quia et ipsi quodammodo sua relinquunt, quando propriis contenti rebus nichil eorum, que labori uel ordini suo deberi arbitrantur, accipiunt. Gratian. De rebus uero ecclesiae queritur, an liceat eas per prebendas diuidi, ut annuos redditus quisque sibi specialiter uendicet? Hoc non posse fieri, argumento et auctoritate probatur. Clerici successores sunt eorum, de quibus dicitur. "Multitudinis autem credentium erat cor unum et anima una." Necesse est ergo, ut eorum consequantur uitam, quorum in ecclesia gradum administrant. Non ergo aliquid propriam sibi uendicabunt, sed erunt eis omnia communia. Item Urbanus Papa ait: [in epistola unica, c. 2.]

C. XXVI. Let the bishop dispense the goods of the church as common goods.

The goods of the church are faithfully to be dispensed with the greatest fear, not as one’s own but as common goods and things offered to the Lord, and for no uses other than those aforesaid.

C. XXVI. Res ecclesiae quasi communes episcopus dispenset.

Res ecclesiae non quasi propriae, sed ut communes et Domino oblatae cum summo timore non in alios, quam in prefatos usus sunt fideliter dispensandae.

C. XXVII. A bishop is not permitted to turn the goods of churches to his own uses.

Likewise from the synod held at Rome by Pope Eugenius, [II, c. 16]. Let none of the bishops be permitted to possess for his own use movable or immovable goods from the subject congregations and other pious places, lest the greater churches be enriched beyond measure and the lesser be found poor through such a deed. Let one acting contrary to this be held under restraint by canonical authority. GRATIAN. Therefore, if the goods of the church are to be held not as one's own but as common, since no one says concerning a common possession, "This is mine," neither can anyone say concerning the goods of the church, "This is mine," lest he appear not to imitate the charity of those among whom nothing belonged to anyone as his own, but all things were common to them. § 1. To these things the answer is thus: Just as, while the perfection of charity remains, the distribution of ecclesiastical resources is made according to the distinction of churches when the possessions of this church are committed to some persons to dispense, from which, although the goods of the church ought to be common to all, he may nevertheless first supply necessities to himself and to those serving his church, intending to minister the remainder which is left over to the uses of the faithful, so too the prebends of churches, while the same charity remains, can be distributed piously and religiously. Nor does he then serve the goods of the church as his own, but as goods for common uses, so that from those things which are assigned to him he may first receive necessities for himself; but if any things remain beyond his necessities, he may expend them for the common uses of the church. Hence Augustine to Boniface, [the Count, letter L]:

C. XXVII. Non liceat episcopo res ecclesiarum in proprios usus conuertere.

Item ex Sinodo habita Romae ab Eugenio Papa: [II. c. 16.] Nulli episcoporum liceat res mobiles aut inmobiles de subiectis plebibus aliisque piis locis in proprio usu habere, ne maiores enormiter locupletentur, et minores tali facto pauperes inueniantur. Contra agens canonica auctoritate coartatus existat. Gratian. Si ergo res ecclesiae non quasi propriae, sed quasi communes habendae sunt, cum de communi nullus dicat, hoc meum est, nec de rebus ecclesiae, hec mea est, potest aliquis dicere, ne uideatur non imitari karitatem illorum, in qua nulli aliquid erat proprium, sed erant illis omnia communia. §. 1. His ita respondetur: Sicut perfectione karitatis manente secundum discretionem ecclesiarum ecclesiasticarum facultatum distributio fit dum aliis possessiones huius ecclesiae ad dispensandum conmittuntur, ex quibus, licet res ecclesiae omnibus debeant esse communes, primum tamen sibi et suae ecclesiae deseruientibus necessaria subministret, reliqua, que supersunt, fidelium usibus ministraturus, ita et prebendae ecclesiarum eadem karitate manente pie et religiose possunt distribui, nec tunc rebus ecclesiae ut propriis, sed ut communibus utilitatibus deseruiturus ut ex his, que sibi assignata sunt, primum necessaria sibi percipiat; si qua uero suis necessitatibus supersunt, in communes usus ecclesiae expendat. Unde Augustinus ad Bonifatium: [Comitem, ep. L.]

C. XXVIII. Concerning the same.

If we privately possess what suffices for us, those things are not ours of which we in a certain manner conduct the administration; we do not claim ownership of them for ourselves by damnable usurpation. GRATIAN. It has been shown in what manner clerics are permitted to possess property of their own, and in what manner they are not. Likewise, in what manner the goods of the church can be divided through prebends.

> C. XXVIII. De eodem.
> Si priuatum possidemus, quod nobis sufficiat, non illa nostra sunt, quorum procurationem quodammodo gerimus, non proprietatem nobis usurpatione dampnabili uendicamus. Gratian. Ostensum est, quomodo liceat clericis habere proprium, quomodo non. Item, quomodo res ecclesiae per prebendas diuidi possunt.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. It is now asked: if priests are known to have given some things from the goods of the church, will those goods remain with any validity for those who received them? That the goods of the church can in no way be alienated, and that those alienated cannot be possessed, is proved by many authorities. For Pope Stephen says:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Nunc queritur, si sacerdotes aliqua de rebus ecclesiae dedisse noscuntur, an his, qui eas acceperunt aliqua firmitate constabunt? Quod res ecclesiae nullo modo distrahi possunt et distractae possideri, multis auctoritatibus probatur. Ait enim Stephanus Papa:

C. I. One who takes away the money of the church is condemned as a murderer.

One who takes away, defrauds, and seizes the moneys of Christ and the church will be reckoned as a murderer in the sight of the Judge.

> C. I. Ecclesiae pecuniam auferens uelut homicida dampnatur.
> Qui Christi pecunias et ecclesiae aufert, fraudat et rapit, ut homicida in conspectu iudicis deputabitur.

C. II. Whatever has been usurped from sacred vessels or furnishings by any cleric is to be restored to the church.

Likewise Pelagius to Bishop Hostilius. At the suggestion of Augustus, notary of our see, we learned that your affection had indicated to him by letters that certain men of your clergy, and especially of the parishes pertaining to you, had alienated not a few sacred vessels or furnishings and had perpetrated certain things of this kind which are foreign to a religious purpose. But you desire your charity to be fortified by the authority of our command, so that it ought to pursue or avenge these things with appropriate solicitude. Concerning this matter we command by the present words that, with the appropriate urgency of vigilance, you do not fail to exact without the intervention of anyone's delay whatever you discover to have been usurped or alienated from sacred vessels or furnishings by any of the clerics, and to restore it to ecclesiastical uses.

> C. II. Quicquid de sacratis uasis uel ministeriis a quolibet clero usurpatum fuerit, ecclesiae restituatur.
> Item Pelagius Hostilio Episcopo. Augusto sedis nostrae notario suggerente didicimus, quod ei dilectio tua directis apicibus indicasset, quosdam de clero tuo, et maxime parrochiarum ad te pertinentium, non pauca sacrata uasa uel ministeria distraxisse, et aliqua huiusmodi perpetrasse, que aliena a religioso sunt proposito. Karitatem uero tuam, ut hec conpetenti sollicitudine debeat insequi uel ulcisci, nostrae preceptionis auctoritate cupis conmuniri. Qua de re presentibus mandamus affatibus, ut conpetenti uiuacitatis instantia quicquid de sacratis uasis uel ministeriis a quolibet clericorum usurpatum fuisse uel distractum conpereris, sine cuiusquam morae interuentu exigere non dimittas et ecclesiasticis usibus reformare.

C. III. Whatever is consecrated to the Lord pertains to the right of priests.

Likewise Pope Boniface. Let no one be permitted to be ignorant that everything consecrated to the Lord—whether it be a man, an animal, a field, or whatever has once been consecrated—will be holy of holies to the Lord and pertains to the right of priests. For this reason everyone who takes away, devastates, invades, or seizes it from the Lord and the church to which it belongs will be inexcusable; let him be judged as sacrilegious until amendment and satisfaction to the church, and if he is unwilling to make amendment, let him be excommunicated.

C. III. Quicquid Domino consecratur ad ius pertinet sacerdotum.

Item Bonifatius Papa. Nulli liceat ignorare, omne, quod Domino consecratur, siue fuerit homo, siue animal, siue ager, uel quicquid semel fuerit consecratum, sanctum sanctorum erit Domino, et ad ius pertinet sacerdotum. Propter quod inexcusabilis erit omnis, qui a Domino et ecclesia, cui conpetunt, aufert, uastat, inuadit uel eripit, et usque ad emendationem ecclesiaeque satisfactionem ut sacrilegus iudicetur, et, si emendare noluerit, excommunicetur.

C. IV. Let one who invades ecclesiastical estates be subject to excommunication.

Likewise Gregory VII, [book VI of the Register, in the council, c. 1]. Whoever among soldiers, or any person of whatever order or profession, receives ecclesiastical estates from any king or secular prince, or from unwilling bishops or abbots or any rulers of churches, or invades them or holds them with their consent, shall be subject to excommunication unless he restores those estates to the churches.

C. IV. Excommunicationi subiaceat qui ecclesiastica predia inuadit.

Item Gregorius VII. [lib. VI. Regesti, in concilio c. 1.] Quicumque militum, uel cuiuscumque ordinis uel professionis persona, predia ecclesiastica a quocumque rege, seu seculari principe, uel ab episcopis inuitis, seu abbatibus, aut ab aliquibus ecclesiarum rectoribus susceperit, uel inuaserit, uel eorum consensu tenuerit, nisi eadem predia ecclesiis restituerit, excommunicationi subiaceat.

C. V. One who molests ecclesiastical estates incurs the crime of sacrilege.

Likewise Pope Pius, [letter II]. Certain persons apply to human uses estates handed over to divine uses and withdraw from our God, to whom they were handed over, those things so that they may serve themselves. Therefore the affront of that usurpation is to be repelled by all, lest estates dedicated to the uses of the heavenly mysteries be molested by certain persons rushing upon them. But if anyone has presumed to do this, let him be judged as sacrilegious.

C. V. Sacrilegii crimen incurrit qui predia ecclesiastica uexat.

Item Pius Papa. [epist. II.] Predia diuinis usibus tradita quidam humanis applicant usibus, et Deo nostro, cui tradita sunt, ea subtrahunt, ut sibi inseruiant. Quapropter ab omnibus illius usurpationis contumelia depellenda est, ne predia usibus secretorum celestium dicata a quibusdam inruentibus uexentur. Quod si quis presumpserit, ut sacrilegus iudicetur.

C. VI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Anacletus, [Pope, letter I]. One who takes anything from father or mother and says that this is not a sin is a participant with a murderer. Without doubt God, who created us, is our Father; but our mother is the church, which regenerated us in baptism. Therefore one who seizes, takes away, and defrauds the moneys of Christ and the church is a murderer.

> C. VI. De eodem.
>
> Item Anacletus. [Papa, epist. I.] Qui abstulerit patri uel matri aliquid, dicetque hoc peccatum non esse, homicidae particeps est. Pater noster sine dubio Deus est, qui nos creauit: mater uero nostra ecclesia est, que nos in baptismo regenerauit. Ergo, qui Christi pecunias et ecclesiae rapit, aufert et fraudat, homicida est.

C. VII. Let one who invades the goods of the church make fourfold restitution.

Likewise Pope John III, [to Archbishop Zachary]. It was decreed in the ancient statutes of the church that one who invades the goods of another shall not go unpunished, but shall restore all things with multiplication. Hence it is written in the Gospel: "If I have defrauded anyone of anything, I restore fourfold." And provision is made in the laws of the world: "One who takes away another's property, etc." (as below in the authority of Pope Eusebius).

> C. VII. In quadruplum restituat qui res inuadit ecclesiae.
> Item Iohannes Papa III. [ad Zachariam Archiepisc.] In antiquis ecclesiae statutis decretum est, ut qui aliena inuadit non exeat inpunitus, sed cum multiplicatione omnia restituat. Unde in euangelio scriptum est: "Quod si aliquid defraudaui, reddo quadruplum." Et in seculi legibus cautum habetur: "Qui rem subripit alienam etc." (ut infra in auctoritate Eusebii Papae).

C. VIII. Let invaders of ecclesiastical goods be punished according to the tenor of secular laws.

Likewise Gregory to Constantia, Queen of Gaul, [book IV, letter 33]. Since I know that the most devoted lady thinks assiduously about heavenly life and the remedy of her soul, I consider that I commit a fault grievously if I remain silent concerning those things which are to be suggested for fear of almighty God and do not assiduously admonish you, most holy lady, concerning ecclesiastical peace. The outcry of Julian, our brother and fellow bishop, recently saddened me exceedingly, especially since the estates of his own—that is, of the church—were plundered by most wicked robbers and burned by nocturnal fires in the manner of thieves; and since those same wicked men, in accordance with the decrees of our predecessor Boniface, were unwilling to make amendment for the immunity; and since the laws of the world also wished these matters to stand in the same way, as the common law bears witness, in which it is written thus: "If anyone with armed hand, with up to four men, comes into another's village to do evil, the one who is first shall pay nine hundred solidi for the unlawful presumption, but each one of his followers eighty solidi. But if he has set a fire, he shall pay ninefold; and he shall restore the plunder fourfold."

> C. VIII. Pro tenore secularium legum puniantur inuasores ecclesiasticarum rerum.
> Item Gregorius ad Constantiam Reginam Galliae. [lib. IV. epist. 33.] Cum deuotissimam dominam sciam de celesti uita atque remedio animae suae sedulo cogitare, culpam me conmittere uehementer estimo, si ea, que pro timore omnipotentis Dei sunt suggerenda, siluero, et te sanctissimam de ecclesiastica pace sedule non conmonuero. Nimis me Iuliani fratris nostri et coepiscopi proclamatio nuper contristauit, maxime cum uillae suae, uidelicet ecclesiae, a nequissimis predonibus sint depredatae, atque nocturnis incendiis more furum conbustae, et dum idem maligni iuxta nostri predecessoris Bonifatii decreta pro emunitate illud emendare noluerint, et dum seculi leges hec eadem ita se habere uoluerint, lege uulgari teste, in qua sic scribitur: "Si quis manu armata usque ad quatuor homines in uicum alterius ad malefaciendum uenerit, ille, qui prior est, pro illicita presumptione conponat solidos nongentos, sequaces uero eius unusquisque solidos octoginta. Si uero incendium fecerit, nouies conponat: predam uero in quadruplum restituat."

[C. IX.]

If the laws of the world wished to possess such justice, why ought divine law to be inferior, when in the presence of Truth Himself it was praised in Zacchaeus that, if he had defrauded anyone, he would restore fourfold? And because the highest good in affairs is to cultivate justice, to preserve each person's rights for him, and not to permit that which belongs to power to be done against subjects but to preserve what is equitable—and we altogether trust both that you love this and that you strive for it—we therefore transmit Peter, our brother and fellow bishop, from the bosom of the holy Roman Church to your Excellency in the month of November of the present year, in the second indiction, so that, when the brothers of that province have been assembled into one, immunity, presumption, and sacrilege may receive such an end by canonical authority and your royal dignity that afterward the members of the devil, the sons of wickedness, may not presume such things against holy church while you also reign there.

[C. IX.]

Si seculi leges talem iustitiam habere uoluerunt, lex diuina cur inferior esse debebit, cum in ipsius ueritatis presentia a Zacheo collaudatum sit, ut, si aliquem defraudaret, in quadruplum restitueret? Et quia summum in rebus bonum est iustitiam colere, ac sua cuique iura seruare, et in subiectos non sinere quod potestatis est fieri, sed quod equum est custodiri (quod et uos diligere, et omnino confidimus studere): quapropter excellentiae uestrae mense nouembrio presentis anni, secunda indictione, Petrum fratrem et coepiscopum nostrum a gremio sanctae Romanae ecclesiae transmittimus, ut, fratribus eiusdem prouinciae in unum congregatis, emunitas et presumptio, et sacrilegium canonica auctoritate et uestra regia dignitate talem terminum accipiant, ne post hac membra diaboli, filii nequam, in sancta ecclesia te etiam ibi regnante talia presumant.

C. X. One who takes away property of the church shall restore elevenfold what he took.

Likewise Pope Eusebius, [letter II]. Provision is made in the laws of the world: "One who takes away the property of another shall restore elevenfold to the person from whom the property was seized the things that were taken." And in divine law it is read: "Accursed is everyone who moves the boundaries of his neighbor." Therefore let such things not be presumed without vengeance, nor practiced without condemnation. Accordingly, if anyone seizes ecclesiastical offerings and what has been consecrated to God, or consents to those doing so, let him be judged as sacrilegious, restore the loss fourfold, and do canonical penance. GRATIAN. On the contrary, Gregory, writing [c. 4 of the responses] to Augustine, Bishop of the English, concerning those who secretly take something from the church:

C. X. Ecclesiae rem subripiens in undecuplum restituat quod abstulit.

Item Eusebius Papa. [epist. II.] In legibus seculi cautum habetur: "Qui rem subripit alienam, illi, cui res direpta est, in undecuplum que sublata sunt restituat." Et in lege diuina legitur: "Maledictus omnis, qui transfert terminos proximi sui." Talia ergo non presumantur absque ultione, nec exerceantur absque dampnatione. Proinde si quis ecclesiasticas oblationes et quod Deo consecratum est rapuerit, uel consenserit facientibus, ut sacrilegus diiudicetur, et dampnum in quadruplum restituat, et canonice peniteat. Gratian. Econtra Gregorius scribens [cap. 4. responsionum] Augustino Anglorum Episcopo, de his, qui furtim auferunt aliquid de ecclesia:

C. XI. The church ought to receive what was taken from it without increase.

Your fraternity can judge from the person of the thief how he may be corrected. For there are some who, possessing means of support, perpetrate theft, and there are others who offend in this matter from poverty. Hence it is necessary that some be corrected by losses and others by lashes. And when action is taken somewhat more strictly, it is to be done from charity and not from fury, because this is furnished to the very person who is corrected, lest he be handed over to the fires of Gehenna. § 1. You also add with what increase they ought to return those things which they have taken by theft from churches. But far be it that the church should receive with increase what it appears to lose from earthly goods and seek gains from losses. GRATIAN. But the statement of Eusebius is understood to have been made concerning the severity of the laws, and this statement of Gregory concerning ecclesiastical gentleness.

C. XI. Sine augmento sibi ablata ecclesiam recipere oportet.

Fraternitas tua ex persona furis pensare potest, qualiter ualeat corrigi. Sunt enim quidam, qui habentes subsidia furtum perpetrant: et sunt alii, qui in hac re ex inopia delinquunt. Unde necesse est, ut quidam dampnis, quidam uero uerberibus corrigantur. Et cum paulo districtius agitur, ex karitate agendum est, et non ex furore, quia ipsi hoc prestatur, qui corrigitur, ne gehennae ignibus tradatur. §. 1. Addis etiam, quo augmento ea, que furto de ecclesiis abstulerint, reddere debeant. Sed absit, ut ecclesia cum augmento recipiat quod de terrenis rebus uidetur amittere, et lucra de dampnis querere. Gratian. Verum illud Eusebii de legum seueritate, istud Gregorii de ecclesiastica mansuetudine dictum intelligitur.

C. XII. Things acquired in the episcopate are not to be alienated.

Likewise Deusdedit, Bishop of Milan. Priests have no permission to alienate goods acquired in the episcopate.

C. XII. Non sunt alienanda in episcopatu adquisita.

Item Deusdedit Episcopo Mediolanensi. Res in episcopatu adquisitas sacerdotibus nulla est alienandi licentia.

C. XIII. Sacred vessels are not to be alienated except for the redemption of captives.

Likewise from the Sixth Universal Synod, [c. 15]. Renewing the apostolic and paternal canons, this holy and universal synod has determined that absolutely no bishop may sell or in any way alienate treasures and sacred vessels, except for the cause once ordained by the ancient canons, namely for the redemption of captives; nor may he deliver the revenues of churches under emphyteutic agreements, nor sell other rural possessions and through this harm ecclesiastical revenues, which we decree to exist for their proper utility and for the food of the poor and sustenance of pilgrims. And a little later:

§ 1. But whoever after this our determination has attempted to do anything contrary to this holy see and universal synod shall be deposed as a transgressor of divine goods and commands; the sale or emphyteutic conveyance or any other alienation of the treasures and revenues of the places made by the bishop, whether in writing or without writing, is of course to be made altogether void. But one who has received or bought anything from the aforesaid treasures or revenues and has not restored to the church again the things which belong to the church, and has not returned the charter of sale or emphyteusis to be cut up, shall be anathema until he has done what was confirmed by this holy and universal synod. § 2. But if a bishop has been convicted of constructing a monastery from ecclesiastical revenues, let him deliver that monastery itself to the same church.

> C. XIII. Vasa sacra, nisi pro redemptione captiuorum non sunt alienanda.
> Item ex VI. Sinodo uniuersali, [c. 15.] Apostolicos et paternos canones renouans hec sancta et uniuersalis sinodus diffiniuit, neminem prorsus episcopum uendere uel utcumque alienare cimilia et uasa sacrata, excepta causa olim ab antiquis canonibus ordinata, uidelicet pro redemptione captiuorum; sed nec tradere salaria ecclesiarum in emphiteotica pacta, nec alias rusticas possessiones uenundare, ac per hoc, ecclesiasticos redditus ledere, quos ad propriam utilitatem, et ob escam pauperum et peregrinorum sustentationem esse decernimus Et paulo post: §. 1. Quisquis autem post hanc diffinitionem nostram contrarium quid huic sanctae sedi ac uniuersali sinodo agere temptauerit, deponatur ut preuaricator diuinarum rerum et preceptorum, cassata uidelicet omnino que facta est in scriptis uel sine scriptis ab episcopo uenditione uel emphiteotica traditione, uel alia qualibet alienatione, cimiliorum et salariorum locorum. Qui uero perceperit aut emerit aliquid ex predictis cimiliis uel salariis, et non restituerit ecclesiae iterum que ecclesiae sunt, et non reddiderit ad incidendum cartam uenditionis uel emphiteoseos, sit anathema, usque dum fecerit quod ab hac sancta et uniuersali sinodo confirmatum est. §. 2. Si autem episcopus conuictus fuerit construxisse monasterium de ecclesiasticis redditibus, tradat eidem ecclesiae ipsum monasterium.

C. XIV. Sacred vessels are not prohibited from being alienated for the redemption of captives.

Likewise Gregory, [book VI, letter 35], to Lord Bishop of Messina. Both the sacred canons and legal statutes permit the furnishings of the church to be sold for the redemption of captives.

> C. XIV. Pro redemptione captiuorum uasa sacra non prohibentur alienari.
> Item Gregorius [lib. VI. epist. 35.] Domino Episcopo Messano. Et sacrorum canonum, et legalia statuta permittunt, ministeria ecclesiae pro captiuorum esse redemptione uendenda.

C. XV. The goods of the church are lawfully expended for the redemption of captives.

The same to Demetrius and Valerian, Clerics of Fermo, [book VII, indiction 2, letter 14]. The statutes of the sacred canons and legal authority permit ecclesiastical goods lawfully to be expended in the redemption of captives. And therefore, since we have been informed by you that eighteen years ago Favius, bishop of the church of Fermo, expended eleven pounds of silver from the same church to the enemy for the redemption of you and of your father Passivus, our brother and fellow bishop but then a cleric, as well as of your mother, and that from this you possess a certain fear lest at some time what was given be demanded back from you, by the authority of this command we have provided that your suspicion be removed, establishing that neither you nor your heirs shall at any time sustain vexation from a demand for repayment on this account, nor shall any question be raised against you by anyone.

C. XV. Res ecclesiae licite inpenduntur pro captiuorum redemptione.

Idem Demetrio et Valeriano Clericis Firmianis. [lib. VII. Indict. 2. epist. 14.] Sacrorum canonum statuta et legalis permittit auctoritas, licite res ecclesiasticas in redemptione captiuorum inpendi. Et ideo, cum edocti a uobis simus, ante annos scilicet XVIII. Fauium, episcopum ecclesiae Firmianae, XI. libras argenti de eadem ecclesia pro redemptione uestra, ac patris uestri Passiui fratris et coepiscopi nostri, tunc uero clerici, nec non matris uestrae hostibus inpendisse, atque ex hoc quandam formidinem uos habere, ne hoc, quod datum est, a uobis quolibet tempore repetatur, precepti huius auctoritate suspicionem uestram preuidimus auferendam, constituentes, nullam uos exinde heredesque uestros quolibet tempore repetitionis molestiam sustinere, nec a quoquam uobis aliquam obici questionem.

C. XVI. The goods of a desolate church are not to be preferred to captives.

The same, [book VI, letter 35, to Lord Bishop]. Just as it is altogether grave to sell ecclesiastical furnishings without cause, so again it is a fault, when a necessity of this kind is imminent, to prefer to one's captives the goods of an especially desolate church and to cease from their redemption. PART II. GRATIAN. But Pope Nicholas determines what penance is to be imposed upon invaders and robbers of this kind, who seize with polluted hands sacred vessels and the other things dedicated to divine worship and handle them as though profane, writing to Frontarius, Archbishop of Bordeaux.

C. XVI. Res desolatae ecclesiae non preponantur captiuis.

Idem. [lib. VI. epist. 35. ad Dominum Episcopum] Sicut omnino graue est frustra ecclesiastica ministeria uenundare, sic iterum culpa est inminente huiusmodi necessitate res maxime desolatae ecclesiae captiuis suis preponere, et in redemptione eorum cessare. II. Pars. Gratian. Que uero penitencia huiusmodi inuasoribus atque predonibus, qui uasa sacra et reliqua diuino cultui dedicata pollutis manibus arripiunt et quasi profana contractant, sit indicenda, Nicolaus Papa diffinit scribens Frontario Archiepiscopo Burdegalensi.

C. XVII. What penance is to be imposed upon invaders of ecclesiastical goods.

Concerning the nefarious man named Burgandus, who, moved by insane rage, did not doubt to entangle himself in diabolical snares and, after the manner of gentiles, lying in ambush along precipitous roads and crossroads, presumed with demonic daring to inflict nefarious invasions and violent plunder upon you—while you remained with your clerics in a village of your church and strove to instruct the people with the salutary admonitions of doctrines, refreshed the empty hearts of men with the bread of the spiritual word, and possessed the praiseworthy desire of your own salvation to visit the holy thresholds of the apostles Peter and Paul—after gathering the followers of his malice and accomplices of iniquity; and, as the text of your letter declares, he presumed to seize with polluted hands the sacred altar, the sacred vessels of the Lord's body and blood, and moreover the holy chrism, as though they were cheap things and suited to common use: your affection consulted us whether, if he or those who were with him in so impious and iniquitous a crime should at some time, drawn by divine grace, wish to come to penance, by what bond of penance you should constrain them, and you took care to request the determination of our institution. Concerning them, if indeed it is so, we command that, when they have hastened to return to penance, they remain outside the church of God for one year, because they did not doubt to carry off its most sacred vessels by plundering outside the rite of the Christian faith. But in the second year let them remain before the doors of the church without communion. In the third year let them enter the church of God and stand among the hearers without an offering, eating no meat and drinking no wine except on the days of the Lord's Nativity and Resurrection. Moreover, in the fourth year, if during those preceding three their labor of penance has been fruitful, let them be restored to the communion of the faithful and, promising with the whole intention of their mind that they will never do such things thereafter, let them merit to receive the body and blood of the Lord; and until the seventh year let them remain penitents three days in the week without eating meat or drinking wine.

C. XVII. Inuasoribus rerum ecclesiasticarum que penitencia sit inponenda.

De uiro nefando, Burgando nomine, qui rabie insana conmotus diabolicis se irretire laqueis non dubitauit, atque gentilium more per abrupta itinera et conpita insidians, uobis in uestrae ecclesiae uilla una cum clericis uestris manentibus, et populum salubribus instruere dogmatum monitis decertantibus, paneque spiritualis uerbi uacua hominum corda reficientibus, atque laudabile salutis propriae desiderium habentibus sancta apostolorum Petri et Pauli limina uisitare, collectis maliciae suae sequacibus et iniquitatis conplicibus, nefarias inuasiones et depredationes inferre uiolentas demoniaco ausu presumpserit, et, ut epistolae uestrae textus eloquitur, sacrum altare sacraque dominici corporis et sanguinis uasa, insuper et sanctum crisma pollutis arripere manibus quasi uilia et ad usum communem apta presumpsit, dilectio nos uestra consuluit, si ipse, uel qui cum eo in tam inpio et iniquo scelere fuerunt, ad penitenciam quandoque gratia tracti diuina uenire uoluerint, quo eos penitenciae uinculo constringatis, nostrae institutionis censuram exposcere curastis. De quibus (si tamen ita est) iubemus, cum ad penitenciam reuerti accelerauerint, uno anno extra ecclesiam Dei consistere, cuius sacratissima uasa extra ritum fidei Christianae diripiendo auferre non dubitauerunt. Secundo uero anno ante fores ecclesiae sine communione maneant. Tertio uero anno ecclesiam Dei ingrediantur, et inter audientes astent sine oblatione, non manducantes carnem neque bibentes uinum, preter natalis et resurrectionis dominicae dies. Quarto preterea anno, si his prioribus tribus eorum fructuosus fuerit penitenciae labor, communioni fidelium restituantur, totaque mentis intentione spondentes, talia se ulterius numquam facturos, corpus et sanguinem Domini suscipere mereantur, et usque ad septimum annum tribus in ebdomada diebus sine esu carnium et uini potatione maneant penitentes.

C. XVIII. Let a bishop not presume to alienate or usurp the goods of the church.

Likewise in the Council of Pope Leo IV. PART III. We admonish and affirm irrefragably that no bishop or priest presume to usurp the property of his title, nor attempt to take away because of friendship, fear, or a gift the revenue offered by Christians to holy places, lest the church of God be reduced to nothing. Any bishop or priest who has presumed to do this shall without doubt undergo canonical vengeance and be compelled to return what was unjustly taken from the church, in such a way that thereafter they can possess no force for litigating or possessing these things.

C. XVIII. Res ecclesiae episcopus alienare uel usurpare non presumat.

Item in Concilio Leonis Papae IV. III. Pars. Monemus et inrefragabiliter affirmamus, ut nullus episcoporum uel sacerdotum rem tituli sui usurpare presumat, sed neque salarium a Christianis sanctis locis oblatum causa amicitiae, uel timoris, aut muneris pertemptet auferre, ne ecclesia Dei ad nichilum redigatur. Quod qui facere presumpserit episcopus uel sacerdos, canonicam sine dubio subeat ultionem, et quod ecclesiae iniuste ablatum est reddere conpellatur, ita ut deinceps nullas uires pro his ad litigandum uel possidendum habere possint.

C. XIX. A bishop or abbot is not permitted to alienate the goods of the church.

Likewise from the history of Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea, chapter XII. Whatever bishop or abbot wishes to transfer anything from the revenues of the bishopric or monastery into the hands of princes, or even to confer it upon another person, let what is established to have been given be void, according to the canon of the holy Apostles, which says: "Let the bishop possess solicitude for all ecclesiastical goods and dispense them as though God were watching. But he is not permitted to defraud anything from them, or to give to his own relatives the things which are God's. But if they are poor, let him distribute to them as to poor persons, yet let the things which belong to the church not be defrauded under their pretext." § 1. But if the bishop offers the excuse that the field causes loss and exists to no profit, even so let the field or place not be given to princes, but to clerics or cultivators. § 2. But if a prince has employed cunning and has bought the field from a tenant or from the clergy, let the sale be void and let it be restored to the bishopric and monastery. Let a bishop or abbot doing this be cast out, as one who scattered the things which he did not gather.

C. XIX. Episcopo uel abbati res ecclesiae alienare non licet.

Item ex hystoria Eusebii Episcopi Cesariensis capitulo XII. Quisquis episcopus uel abbas de salariis episcopii uel monasterii quicquam transferre in principum manus, uel etiam alii personae conferre uoluerit, irritum sit quod datum esse constiterit, secundum canonem sanctorum Apostolorum, qui dicit: "Omnium ecclesiasticarum rerum episcopus habeat sollicitudinem, et dispenset eas tamquam Deo contemplante. Non liceat autem ei fraudare quicquam ex illis, uel cognatis propriis donare que Dei sunt. Quod si pauperes fuerint, ut pauperibus largiatur, sed non sub horum occasione que sunt ecclesiae defraudentur." §. 1. Quod si excusationem pretenderit episcopus dampnum facere et nichil ad profectum agrum existere, nec sic principibus tribuatur ager uel locus, sed clericis uel agricultoribus. §. 2. Quod si calliditate usus fuerit princeps, et uel a colono uel a clero agrum emerit, sit irrita uenditio, et restituatur episcopio et monasterio. Episcopus uel abbas hoc faciens abiciatur, tamquam qui dispersit que non collegit.

C. XX. The pope is not permitted to alienate the estates of the church.

Likewise Pope Symmachus, [in Synod III, c. 4 and following through c. 9]. The pope is not permitted to alienate an estate of the church in any manner for any necessity, nor to give rural lands in usufruct, except only houses which are maintained at no small expense in any cities whatsoever. Let all guardians be bound by this law, so that the giver, the assenter, and the seller lose their honor. And let one who has subscribed be anathema together with the one who gave or received, unless it is restored. Let any ecclesiastical persons also be permitted to object and to reclaim alienated goods with their fruits. It is said to be fitting that this be observed not only in the apostolic church but also in all churches throughout the provinces.

C. XX. Predia ecclesiae Papae alienare non licet.

Item Simacus Papa. [in Sinodo III. c. 4. et seqq. usque ad c. 9.] Non liceat Papae predium ecclesiae alienare aliquo modo pro aliqua necessitate, nec in usufructu rura dare, nisi tantummodo domus, que in quibuslibet urbibus non modica inpensa sustentantur. Qua lege omnes custodes astringantur, ut donator, assentator, uenditor honorem perdat. Et qui subscripserit anathema sit cum eo, qui dederit uel qui receperit, nisi restituatur. Liceat etiam quibuslibet ecclesiasticis personis contradicere, et cum fructibus alienata reposcere. Quod non modo in apostolica seruandum est ecclesia, uerum etiam in uniuersis ecclesiis per prouincias quidem dicitur conuenire.

C. XXI. One who sells ecclesiastical goods shall not dare to approach the altar.

Likewise, [in Synod VI]. One who dares to invade ecclesiastical goods, to possess them unjustly, or to persist in an iniquitous or unjust defense of them is unworthily permitted to hasten to the altar of the Lord. § 1. Concerning these things there ought to be such provision that admonition precedes vengeance, and, with equity as patron, let the person who took away goods unjustly, or retains goods unjustly taken, restore the goods usurped unjustly in accordance with the laws. But if he has neglected this and necessity has compelled it, let matured priestly severity finally strike the robber. § 2. For it is exceedingly iniquitous and an immense sacrilege that whatever each person conferred upon or certainly left to a venerable church, whether for the remedy of sins or for the salvation and repose of their souls, should be transferred or converted to another purpose by those by whom it especially ought to be preserved, that is, by Christians and men who fear God. Therefore one who has not provided against these things and, otherwise than has been written, has sought, received, or possessed estates delivered to the church, unless he corrects himself quickly, shall be struck by the anathema by which an angered God strikes souls; and let there be anathema for the receiver and giver or possessor, and perpetual fellowship with the appointed penalty. Nor before the tribunal of Christ shall he fortify himself with any obstacle who, contrary to divine law and without any consideration of piety, dissipates the things left by religious souls for the sustenance of the poor.

C. XXI. Qui res ecclesiasticas uendit ad altare non audeat accedere.

Item. [in Sinodo VI.] Indigne ad altare Domini properare permittitur, qui res ecclesiasticas audet inuadere aut iniuste possidere, aut iniqua uel iniusta defensione in eis perdurare. §. 1. De quibus tanta debet esse prouisio, ut uindictam ammonitio precedat, et res usurpatas iniuste qui abstulit, aut iniuste ablatas retinet, equitate patrocinante legibus restituat. Quod si neglexerit, et necessitas conpulerit, demum predonem sacerdotalis districtio maturata percellat. §. 2. Valde enim iniquum et ingens sacrilegium est, ut quecumque uel pro remedio peccatorum, uel pro salute ac requie animarum suarum unusquisque uenerabili ecclesiae contulerit aut certe reliquerit, ab his quibus maxime seruari conuenit, id est Christianis et Deum timentibus hominibus, in aliud transferri uel conuerti. Propterea, qui hec non preuiderit, et aliter quam scriptum est predia ecclesiae tradita petierit, uel acceperit, aut possederit, nisi se cito correxerit, quo iratus Deus animas percutit anathemate feriatur, sitque accipienti, et donanti, uel possidenti anathema, et institutae penae contubernium assiduum. Nec aliquo se ante tribunal Christi obstaculo muniat qui a religiosis animabus ad substantiam pauperum derelicta contra fas sine aliqua pietatis consideratione dispergit.

C. XXII. Let those who invade the goods of the church by the authority of princes be excommunicated.

Likewise Nicholas to Ado, Archbishop of Vienne, [in the letter whose beginning is "Because of Your Holiness"]. Concerning goods which were once contributed and dedicated to God and afterward are invaded and plundered by certain persons under the pretext of a grant from princes, we decree that you first consult the prince in order to cut off so presumptuous a faction and to learn whether the grant belongs to him or the presumption to the invader. But if the bestowal of the prince was disordered, let the prince himself be reproved for amendment. But if the presumption is shown to belong to the invader, let him be restrained by the vengeance of excommunication until amendment.

C. XXII. Excommunicentur qui auctoritate principum res inuadunt ecclesiae.

Item Nicolaus Adoni, Viennensi Archiepiscopo. [in epistola, cuius initium: "Quia sanctitatis uestrae"] De rebus, que semel Deo contributae atque dicatae sunt, et postea sub occasione concessionis principum a quibusdam inuaduntur atque diripiuntur, sancimus, ut prius consulatis principem ad resecandam tam presumptiuam factionem, et cognoscendum, utrum illius sit concessio, an inuasoris presumptio. Quod si principis inordinata fuerit largitio, ipse sit princeps pro emendatione redarguendus. Si autem inuasoris declaratur presumptio, usque ad emendationem excommunicationis sit uindicta cohercendus.

C. XXIII. Nothing from the goods of the church is to be alienated.

Likewise Gelasius to Justin the Archdeacon and Faustus the Defender. PART IV. For we have considered it prudent for you and your reputation that someone be substituted with you in the place of your pontiff by the same man, who may dispose all things equally in his name, so that you may recall all estates to your administration and not think that any land of the church is to be assigned to any cleric for his portion, lest it be diminished through carelessness and negligence; rather, you shall carry to the bishop the entire sum of rent collected from all rural and urban estates. From this collection, however, let account be taken of what is perceived to be necessary for matters or expenses of needs that arise, so that it may be sequestered from the common fund; and let four portions be made in every way either from the offering of the faithful or from this rent, so that the bishop takes one for himself, distributes another to the clerics according to his judgment and choice, causes a third to be distributed to the poor with the knowledge of all, and as to the portion which belongs to the buildings, we decree that it be paid by your expenditure according to the bishop's ordering. If anything should perhaps remain from the annual expenditure, after a suitable custodian has been chosen by each party, let it be deposited in reserves, so that, if a greater building project arises, what the diligence of a different time was able to preserve may be a subsidy, or else let a possession be purchased which has regard for common utilities.

C. XXIII. De rebus ecclesiae non est alienandum aliquid.

Item Gelasius Iustino Archidiacono et Fausto Defensori. IV. Pars. Vobis enim et famae uestrae consultum duximus, ut pontificis uestri loco uobiscum ab eodem aliquis subrogetur, qui eius nomine pariter uniuersa disponat, quatinus omnia predia ad uestrum reuocetis studium, nec cuiquam clerico pro portione sua aliquod solum ecclesiae putetis esse deputandum, ne per incuriam et negligentiam minuatur, sed omnem pensionis summam ex omnibus prediis rusticis urbanisque collectam ad antistitem deferatis. Ex qua tamen collectione habeatur ratio, quid ad causas uel expensas accedentium necessitatum opus esse perspicitur, ut de medio sequestretur, et quatuor portiones uel de fidelium oblatione, uel de hac fiant modis omnibus pensione, ita ut unam sibi tollat antistes, aliam clericis pro suo iudicio et electione dispertiat, tertiam pauperibus sub omnium conscientia faciat erogari, fabricis uero que conpetit ad ordinationem pontificis, erogatione uestra decernimus esse pendendam. Si quid forte sub annua remanebit expensa, electo idoneo ab utraque parte custode, condatur enthecis, ut, si maior emerserit fabrica, sit subsidio quod diuersi temporis diligentia potuerit custodiri, aut certe ematur possessio, que utilitates respiciat communes.

C. XXIV. Let one who tramples ecclesiastical privileges be deprived of participation in the divine gift.

The same to Bishops Majoricus, Serenus, and John. Those who, with human laws trampled by an uncivil condemnation and reverence for religion cast aside, either strive to trample ecclesiastical privileges or anywhere leap forth to the loss of the poor, and who, even when admonished and convicted of this, do not consent to suppress their wickedness and repair the losses inflicted upon sacred goods, are deservedly to be deprived of participation in the divine gift, so that they may lack the reception of that which they held in contempt by sacrilegious daring. But Celestinus, priest of Serenus our brother and fellow bishop, who, breaking forth against pontifical judgment and against the mandates of the apostolic see, presumed to minister sacred communion to the aforesaid men although he could not have been ignorant of the sentence of his own priest, is to be driven immediately from ecclesiastical office, so that no minister of the church may strive to come against pontifical institutions.

C. XXIV. Diuini muneris participatione priuetur qui ecclesiastica priuilegia calcat.

Idem Maiorico, Sereno et Iohanni Episcopis. Qui et humanis legibus inciuili dampnatione calcatis, et reuerentia religionis abiecta, uel ecclesiastica priuilegia calcare contendunt, uel ubilibet in pauperum prosilire dispendium, nec huiusmodi saltem conmoniti conuictique nequiciam sopire consentiunt atque illata sacris rebus detrimenta sarcire, merito diuini muneris sunt participatione priuandi, ut huius perceptione careant, quod sacrilegis ausibus habuere despectui. Celestinus uero presbiter fratris et coepiscopi nostri Sereni, qui contra pontificale iudicium contraque apostolicae sedis mandata prorumpens, supradictis communionem sacram ministrare presumpsit, cum non potuerit ignorare sententiam proprii sacerdotis, ab offitio protinus ecclesiastico repellatur, ut nullus ecclesiae ministrorum contra pontificalia instituta uenire contendat.

C. XXV. Concerning the same.

The same to the same men. We have decreed that the administration or patrimony of the church of Volterra, which we have learned has hitherto been forsaken after the condemnation of Eucharistus, by whose depravity it had been dispersed, is to be delegated to your care, so that by the diligence with which we judge you to be vigilant for the utilities of the church, you may restore the estates to their ancient cultivation and recall any slaves who have been sold or given away. Let the possessions also which you see to be held by Bishops Eumachius and Opilio, or by others under any right whatsoever, be recalled nonetheless, because against the statutes of the synod the estates could not be alienated by bishops by any contrivance. Let purchasers have recourse against the person who presumed to alienate anything from the goods of the church by an unlawful sale, in such a way that you carry the annual rents to the pontiff, for whom it is fitting that his privileges be preserved intact in every respect, so that by his dispensation the customary portions may proceed, in such a way that the pontiff by his own ordering distributes the fourth portion which pertains to them, according as he recognizes the position and merit of each person. The same is likewise to be done from the offering of the faithful, so that the bishop may distribute a fourth to the clerics according to the consideration of his choice. Let the portion for buildings also be paid by your expenditure with the bishop knowing and directing, so that you permit absolutely nothing to be generated to the detriment of any property.

C. XXV. De eodem.

Idem eisdem. Volateranae ecclesiae actus uel patrimonium, quod hactenus conperimus destitutum, post dampnationem Eucharisti, quo fuerat deprauante dispersum, curae uestrae decreuimus esse delegandum, ut diligentia (qua uos pro utilitatibus ecclesiae estimamus esse uigilantes) predia culturae restituatis antiquae, reuocetis si qua sunt uendita aut donata mancipia. Possessiones etiam, quas ab Eumacio et Opilione episcopis, uel ceteris quouis iure uideritis teneri, quia contra constituta sinodi ab episcopis predia alienari nullo potuerunt conmento, nichilominus reuocentur. Sit emptoribus ad eum recursus, qui presumpsit aliquid de ecclesiae rebus illicita uenditione distrahere, ita ut pensiones annuas ad pontificem deferatis, cui priuilegia sua integra conuenit omni ratione seruari, ut eius dispensatione portiones proueniant consuetae, ita ut portionem quartam, que ad eos pertinet, sua pontifex ordinatione distribuat, prout cuiusque locum meritumque cognoscit. Pariter etiam ex fidelium oblatione est faciendum, ut quartam clericis eroget pro consideratione suae electionis antistes. Fabricarum etiam portio episcopo sciente et disponente uestra erogatione pendatur, quatinus nichil penitus in detrimentum alicuius rei patiamini generari.

C. XXVI. Let two portions of revenues and offerings be committed to the clerics.

The same to the clergy, order, and people of Brindisi. Since the bishop whom you sought, Julian, now my brother and fellow bishop, has been granted to you, it was necessary, when he was immediately sent back to his church, that our writings likewise be directed to you, by which you might know that he had been commanded never to presume unlawful ordinations. And below: § 1. Let him divide the revenues and offerings of the faithful into four parts, of which he himself is to retain one, distribute another to the clerics for the assiduity of their offices, possess a third to be faithfully expended upon the buildings, and a fourth upon the poor and pilgrims; he will have to render an account of these to the divine examination.

C. XXVI. Reddituum et oblationum duae portiones clericis conmittantur.

Idem Clero, et ordini, et plebi Brundusii. Concesso uobis quem petistis antistite, fratre iam et coepiscopo meo Iuliano, necessarium fuit (eodem ad ecclesiam suam mox remisso) ad uos nostra scripta pariter destinari, quibus agnosceretis eidem fuisse preceptum, ne umquam ordinationes presumat illicitas. Et infra: §. 1. Redditus et oblationes fidelium in quatuor partes diuidat, quarum unam sibi ipse retineat, alteram clericis pro offitiorum suorum sedulitate distribuat, fabricis tertiam, quartam pauperibus et peregrinis habeat fideliter erogandam, quarum rationem diuino est redditurus examini.

C. XXVII. How many portions are to be made from the offerings of the faithful, and which is to come to whom.

The same, [in the letter to the bishops throughout Lucania and Bruttium, c. 29]. But it is fitting that four portions be made both from the revenue and from the offering of the faithful, insofar as the resources of each church allow, just as was reasonably decreed long ago: one of these is to belong to the pontiff, another to the clerics, a third to the poor, and a fourth is to be applied to the buildings. Just as it will pertain to the priest to pay the aforesaid amount intact to the ministers of the church, so let the cleric know that he is insolently to demand nothing beyond the sum delegated to him. But let the manifest restoration of holy places show that those things attributed to ecclesiastical buildings have truly been expended upon this work, because it is impious if, when the sacred buildings have been left destitute, the prelate turns to his own gain the expenditures assigned to them. Likewise, although he is seen as one who will have to show by divine accounts that he dispensed the portion itself assigned to the poor, nevertheless, according to what is written, "That they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven," it ought also to be proclaimed by present testimony and not passed over in silence by the praises of good reputation. Therefore let none of the clerics, etc.

C. XXVII. De oblationibus fidelium quot portiones fiant, et que cui proueniat.

Idem. [in epistola ad episcopos per Lucaniam et Brutios, c. 29.] Quatuor autem tam de redditu quam de oblatione fidelium, prout cuiuslibet ecclesiae facultas admittit (sicut dudum rationabiliter est decretum), conuenit fieri portiones quarum una sit pontificis, altera clericorum, tertia pauperum, quarta fabricis est applicanda. De quibus sicut sacerdotis intererit integram ministris ecclesiae memoratam dependere quantitatem, sic clericus ultra delegatam sibi summam nichil insolenter nouerit expetendum. Ea uero, que ecclesiasticis edificiis attributa sunt, huic operi ueraciter prerogata locorum doceat instauratio sanctorum manifesta, quia nefas est, si sacris edibus destitutis in lucrum suum presul inpendia his deputata conuertat. Ipsam nichilominus ascriptam pauperibus portionem quamquam diuinis rationibus se dispensasse monstraturus esse uideatur, tamen iuxta quod scriptum est: "Ut uideant opera uestra bona, et glorificent patrem uestrum, qui in celis est," oportet etiam presenti testificatione predicari, et bonae famae preconiis non taceri. Quapropter nec clericorum quispiam etc.

C. XXVIII. Let three portions of the offerings and revenues of churches be entrusted to the priest to dispense.

Likewise Pope Simplicius to Bishops Florentius and Equitius, [letter III]. From the revenues of the church or the offering of the faithful, only one portion from them is to be remitted to the bishop; let two, intended to benefit ecclesiastical buildings and the distribution to the poor, be administered by the priest at the peril of his order; let the last be divided among the clerics according to the merits of individuals. And below: § 1. To him, that is Bishop Gaudentius, we specially command this: that he restore those three portions which he is said to have claimed for himself alone for three years.

C. XXVIII. Oblationum et reddituum ecclesiarum tres portiones presbitero dispensandae credantur.

Item Simplicius papa Florentio, et Equitio Episcopis. [epist. III.] De redditibus ecclesiae uel oblatione fidelium sola episcopo ex his una portio remittatur, duae ecclesiasticis fabricis, et erogationi pauperum profuturae a presbitero sub periculo sui ordinis ministrentur; ultima clericis pro singulorum meritis diuidatur. Et infra: §. 1. Cui (id est Gaudentio episcopo), specialiter hoc precipimus, ut tres illas portiones, quas triennio sibi tantummodo dicitur uendicasse, restituat.

C. XXIX. From the revenues of the church, even those newly acquired, let a fourth part be distributed to the clerics.

Likewise Gregory to Maximian, Bishop of Syracuse, [book III, letter 11]. We have learned that the canonical disposition of fourths does not arise from the newly acquired revenues of the church, but that the bishops of the places distribute only a fourth of the old revenues and retain for their own uses the things now acquired. Let your fraternity hasten vigorously to amend this depraved and surreptitiously introduced custom, so that fourths may be dispensed according to canonical distribution both from past revenues and from those which have arisen or will arise. For it is unfitting that one and the same substance of the church should be assessed under, as it were, a double law.

C. XXIX. De redditibus ecclesiae etiam nouiter adquisitis quarta pars clericis erogetur.

Item Gregorius Maximiano Episcopo Siracusano. [lib. III. epist. 11.] Cognouimus de redditibus ecclesiae nouiter adquisitis canonicam dispositionem quartarum minime prouenire, sed episcopos locorum tantummodo distribuere quartam antiquorum reddituum, nunc uero quesita suis usibus retinere. Quam rem prauam subintroductamque consuetudinem fraternitas tua uiuaciter emendare festinet, ut siue de preteritis redditibus siue de his, que obuenere, uel obuenientibus, quartae secundum distributionem canonicam dispensentur. Incongruum namque est unam eandemque ecclesiae substantiam dupplici quodammodo iure censeri.

C. XXX. Four portions ought to be made from the stipend of the church.

The same to Augustine, Bishop of the English, [in the response to the first question]. It is the custom of the apostolic see to hand down commands to an ordained bishop that four portions ought to be made from every stipend which arises: one, namely, to the bishop and his household on account of hospitality and reception; another to the clergy; a third to the poor; and a fourth for repairing churches.

[PALEA.

C. XXX. De stipendio ecclesiae quatuor debent fieri portiones.

Idem Augustino Episcopo Anglorum. [in respons. ad Primam interrogationem] Mos est apostolicae sedis ordinato episcopo precepta tradere, ut de omni stipendio, quod accidit, quatuor debeant fieri portiones, una uidelicet episcopo et familiae eius propter hospitalitatem atque susceptionem, alia clero, tertia pauperibus, quarta ecclesiis reparandis.

[PALEA.

C. XXXI. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Toledo. We decree that care for the laity presses upon all bishops, so that if they find any persons in the faith of Christ, they love them with exceeding affection. Moreover, we confirm that, if they receive any gifts from them, they shall immediately divide them into four parts, so that the first part, according to the commands of the apostles, is diligently assigned to the restoration of title churches as well as cemeteries; the second to the clerics; the third to all the poor; and the fourth to strangers.]

C. XXXI. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano. Sancimus omnibus episcopis curam laicorum instare, ut, si quos in fide Christi inuenerint, nimio affectu diligant. Insuper confirmamus, ut, si aliqua ab ipsis accipiant dona, statim in quatuor diuidant partes, ita, ut prima pars secundum apostolorum precepta titulorum, nec non cimiteriorum restaurationibus diligenter attribuatur, secunda clericis, tertia cunctis pauperibus, quarta uero aduenis.]

C. XXXII. Let all priests endeavor to dispense the goods of the church according to the bishop's command.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 22]. PART V. We establish, as all command, that priests or clerics of the city or diocese, with the right of the church preserved, shall hold the property of the church as the bishops permit, but shall by no means presume to sell or give it. But if they have done so, both the completed sale will not be valid and, from their resources, if they possess any of their own, they shall render the church indemnified, and they shall be deprived of communion.

C. XXXII. Omnes presbiteri secundum iussionem episcopi res ecclesiae dispensare studeant.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 22.] V. Pars. Statuimus (quod omnes iubent) ut ciuitatenses siue diocesiani presbiteri uel clerici, saluo iure ecclesiae, rem ecclesiae, sicut permiserint episcopi, teneant, uendere autem aut donare penitus non presumant. Quod si fecerint, et facta uenditio non ualebit, et de facultatibus, si quas habent proprias, indempnem ecclesiam reddant, et communione priuentur.

C. XXXIII. Concerning clerics who suppress the documents of the church or deliver them to adversaries.

Likewise from the same, [Council, c. 26]. If any cleric has presumed with condemnable and punishable obstinacy either to suppress or deny the documents by which the possession of the church is confirmed, or perhaps to deliver them to adversaries, let him repay from his own resources whatever loss was inflicted upon the church through the absence of the documents, and let him be deprived of communion. But those who, impiously solicited to the loss of the church, receive anything from the betrayers shall be held by the preceding sentence.

C. XXXIII. De clericis, qui documenta ecclesiae subprimunt aut aduersariis tradunt.

Item ex eodem. [Concilio, c. 26.] Si quis de clericis documenta, quibus ecclesiae possessio firmatur, aut subprimere, aut negare, aut aduersariis fortasse tradere dampnanda et punienda obstinatione presumpserit, quicquid per absentiam documentorum dampni ecclesiae illatum est de propriis facultatibus reddat, et communione priuetur. Hi autem, qui in dampno ecclesiae inpie sollicitati, a traditoribus aliquid susceperint, superiori sententia teneantur.

C. XXXIV. Let a bishop who has no heirs appoint no one other than the church as his heir.

Likewise from the same, [c. 33]. If a bishop who has no sons or grandsons leaves someone other than the church as his heir, whatever he presumed concerning the church's goods for a cause or necessity not belonging to the church, what he alienated or gave shall be held void. But if he has sons, provision for the indemnity of the church shall be made from the goods which he left by his heirs.

C. XXXIV. Episcopus heredes non habens non alium quam ecclesiam sibi heredem instituat.

Item ex eodem. [c. 33.] Episcopus, qui filios aut nepotes non habens, alium quam ecclesiam relinquit heredem, si quid de ecclesia non in ecclesiae causa aut necessitate presumpsit, quod distraxit aut donauit irritum habeatur. Qui uero filios habet, de bonis, que reliquit ab heredibus eius indempnitatibus ecclesiae consulatur.

C. XXXV. Let those who are constituted in the clergy presume to alienate nothing from the goods of the church.

Likewise from the same, [c. 49]. Deacons or priests established in a parish shall dare to exchange, sell, or give nothing from the goods of the church entrusted to them, because they are known to be goods consecrated to God. Likewise, priests shall presume to alienate nothing from the goods of the church committed to them, as was stated above. But if they have done so, having been convicted in a council and deposed from honor, let them restore from their own property another amount equal to that which they are seen to have presumed upon. § 1. We also command that freedmen whom priests or deacons wish to make from the church committed to them perform the services of the church. But if they have disdained to do so, it was resolved that they return to their former servitude.

C. XXXV. Qui in clero constituti sunt de rebus ecclesiae nichil alienare presumant.

Item ex eodem. [c. 49.] Diaconi uel presbiteri in parrochia constituti de rebus ecclesiae sibi creditis nichil audeant conmutare, uendere uel donare, quia res sacratae esse Deo noscuntur. Similiter et sacerdotes nichil de rebus ecclesiae sibi conmissae (ut superius conprehensum est) alienare presumant. Quod si fecerint, conuicti in concilio, et ab honore depositi, de suo proprio aliud tantum restituant, quantum uisi sunt presumpsisse. §. 1. Libertos etiam quos sacerdotes uel diacones de ecclesia sibi conmissa facere uolunt, actus ecclesiae prosequi iubemus. Quod si facere contempserint, placuit eos ad proprium reuerti seruitium.

C. XXXVI. Whatever is alienated by a priest from a possession under ecclesiastical right shall be held null and void.

Likewise from the same, [c. 53]. Whatever a parish priest has alienated from a possession under ecclesiastical right shall be held null and void, as regards both the purchase of the buyer and the action of the seller.

C. XXXVI. De possessione ecclesiastici iuris quicquid a presbitero distrahitur, inane habeatur et uacuum.

Item ex eodem. [c. 53.] Quicquid parrochiarum presbiter de ecclesiastici iuris possessione distraxerit, inane habeatur et uacuum uenditione conparantis et actione uendentis.

C. XXXVII. Alienations made by intruders and ordinations made without the consent of the clerics are void.

Likewise Pope Urban. We judge void all alienations made in any manner by those who obtained through intrusion, or were canonically elected under the name of bishop or abbot who is to be consecrated according to the usage of his church, as well as ordinations of persons made by the same men without the common consent of the clerics of the church, or likewise made through simony. § 1. We also prohibit this in every respect: that no cleric presume to alienate his prebend or any ecclesiastical benefice in any manner. But if this was presumed long ago or shall be at any time, it will be void and subject to canonical vengeance.

C. XXXVII. Alienationes factae ab intrusis et ordinationes sine consensu clericorum irritae sunt.

Item Urbanus Papa. Alienationes omnium per intrusionem, seu canonice electorum sub episcopi nomine, aut abbatis, qui secundum usum ecclesiae suae consecrandus est, alienationes quocumque modo factas, nec non personarum ordinationes ab eisdem sine communi consensu clericorum ecclesiae, siue per symoniam itidem factas, irritas iudicamus. §. 1. Illud etiam per omnia interdicimus, ut nullus clericus prebendam suam seu beneficium aliquod ecclesiasticum aliquo modo alienare presumat. Quod si presumptum olim fuit uel aliquando fuerit, irritum erit, et ultioni canonicae subiacebit.

C. XXXVIII. When a bishop is dead, or is still at his last extremity, nothing from his goods is to be usurped.

Likewise from the Council of Lérida, [c. 16]. It was resolved among us that this rule be preserved by the constitution of this decree: that when a bishop is dead, or even still at his last extremity, no cleric, of whatever order, office, or grade he may be, shall presume upon anything from his house or endeavor to invade anything from the property known to be the equipment of the house, that is, movable and immovable ecclesiastical property, suppressing, taking away, and concealing nothing by theft and nothing by deceit. Rather, the person to whom the house is committed, after one or two most faithful men have been joined to him, ought to preserve everything until the time when a pontiff is substituted, and to administer the customary sustenance to the clerics who are found in the house. But the substituted bishop shall order the resources of the see which he has received as God commands that he ought to use them with those whom he has learned faithfully obeyed the discipline and charity of his predecessor. But if after this any cleric of whatever order, as was said above, has been proved on any occasion to have taken anything from all the resources, or perhaps to have suppressed it by some deceit, let him be condemned as guilty of sacrilege by a more prolonged anathema, and let foreign communion scarcely be conceded to him, because it is harsh that those who are established to have toiled in the service of the Lord with the bishop of the first see should be afflicted in any measure through contempt by those who are known to have been brooding over their own property or serving and devoting themselves to their own advantages.

C. XXXVIII. Episcopo defuncto, uel adhuc in supremis agente, de rebus eius nichil est usurpandum.

Item ex Concilio Ylerdensi. [c. 16.] Hec huius placiti constitutione inter nos censura placuit custodiri, ut defuncto antistite, uel etiam adhuc in supremis agente, nullus clericorum, cuiuslibet ordinis offitii gradusue sit, quicquam de domo eius presumat, uel de utilitate que instrumenti domus esse noscitur, id est mobilis et inmobilis rei ecclesiasticae conetur inuadere, nichil furto, nichil dolo subprimens auferens atque abscondens; sed is, cui domus conmissa est, subiunctis sibi uno uel duobus fidelissimis, omnia usque ad tempus substituendi pontificis debet conseruare, uel his, qui in domo inueniuntur, clericis consuetam alimoniam administrare. Substitutus autem antistes susceptae sedis commoda ordinabit uelut Deus inperabit, ut eis uti debeat cum his, quos cognouerit disciplinae et karitati predecessoris sui fideliter paruisse. Quod si quisquam post hec cuiuslibet ordinis (ut superius dictum est) clericus quacumque occasione uel de omni facultate quippiam probatus fuerit abstulisse uel forsitan dolo aliquo subpressisse, reus sacrilegii prolixiori anathemate condempnetur, et uix ei peregrina communio concedatur, quia durum est, ut hi, quos constat in seruitio Domini cum primae sedis antistite desudasse, ab his, qui suarum rerum incubatores uel utilitatibus seruientes atque uacantes fuisse noscuntur, despecti aliquatenus crucientur.

C. XXXIX. Let bishops who confer nothing upon the church not grant its servants to liberty.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 66]. And if those who distribute none of their own goods to Christ's poor will be condemned in the future by the voice of the eternal Judge, how much more those who take from the poor what they did not give? Therefore let bishops who have contributed nothing from their own property to the church of Christ fear this divine sentence and not presume, to their own condemnation, to make free persons from the servants of the church. For it is impious that one who has not conferred his own goods upon the church of Christ should inflict loss and strive to alienate the right of the church. Therefore the succeeding bishop shall recall such freedmen to the right of the church without any opposition, because not equity but wickedness absolved them.

C. XXXIX. Episcopi, qui nichil ecclesiae conferunt, famulos eius libertati non donent.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano IV. [c. 66.] Et si illi, qui nulla ex rebus suis pauperibus Christi distribuunt, eterni iudicis uoce in futuro condempnabuntur, quanto magis hi, qui auferunt pauperibus quod non dederunt? Quapropter episcopi, qui nichil ex suo proprio ecclesiae Christi conpensauerunt, hanc diuinam sententiam metuant, et liberos ex famulis ecclesiae ad condempnationem suam non presumant facere. Inpium enim est, ut qui res suas ecclesiae Christi non contulerit dampnum inferat, et ius ecclesiae alienare contendat. Tales igitur liberos successor episcopus absque ulla oppositione ad ius ecclesiae reuocabit, quia eos non equitas, sed inprobitas absoluit.

C. XL. Concerning clerics who suppress or deny the documents of the church or culpably deliver them to others.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans. If any cleric has presumed with culpable and punishable obstinacy either to suppress, deny, divert, or perhaps deliver the documents by which the possession of the church is held secure, let him repay from his own resources whatever was inflicted upon the church through the absence of the documents.

C. XL. De clericis, qui documenta ecclesiae subprimunt, aut negant, aut aliis dampnabiliter tradunt.

Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. Si quis de clericis documenta, quibus ecclesiae possessio firma tenetur, aut subprimere, aut negare, aut auertere, aut fortasse tradere dampnabili et punienda obstinatione presumpserit, quicquid pro absentia documentorum ecclesiae illatum est de propriis facultatibus reddat.

C. XLI. Ministers of the church are permitted to alienate nothing from its goods without the bishop's permission.

Likewise from the same. Let abbots, priests, and other ministers be permitted to alienate or encumber nothing from ecclesiastical goods or those dedicated to sacred ministry without the bishop's permission and subscription. But if they have presumed to do so, let them be degraded with communion conceded, and let what was rashly alienated be recalled by the bishop's ordering.

C. XLI. Ministris ecclesiae de rebus eiusdem absque episcopi permissu alienare nichil licet.

Item ex eodem. Abbatibus, presbiteris, aliisque ministris de rebus ecclesiasticis uel sacro ministerio deditis alienare uel obligare absque permissu et subscriptione episcopi nichil liceat. Quod si presumpserint degradentur communione concessa, et quod temere alienatum est ordinatione episcopi reuocetur.

C. XLII. Let goods of the church which are alienated in the bishop's absence be recalled to ecclesiastical right.

Likewise from the Synod of Ancyra, [c. 15]. If priests have sold any goods of the church when there is no bishop, it was resolved that, with the contract rescinded, the goods be recalled to ecclesiastical right. But it will be established in the bishop's judgment whether the price ought to be received or not, because it often happens that the income of the alienated goods returns a greater sum in proportion to the price received.

C. XLII. De rebus ecclesiae, que absente episcopo distrahuntur, ad ius ecclesiasticum reuocentur.

Item ex Sinodo Anchiritana. [c. 15.] Si qua de rebus ecclesiae, cum episcopus non est presbiteri uendiderint, placuit rescisso contractu ad ius ecclesiasticum reuocari. In iudicio autem erit episcopi constitutum, si precium debeat recipi necne, propter quod sepe contingit distractarum rerum redditus ampliorem summam pro accepto precio reddi.

C. XLIII. After the bishop's death let clerics not seize the goods pertaining to him.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 22]. Clerics are not permitted after the death of their bishop to seize the goods pertaining to him, as is held to have been established by the preceding rules. But if they have done this, let them know that they endanger their own grade.

> C. XLIII. Post mortem episcopi res ad eum pertinentes clerici non rapiant.
> Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 22.] Non licet clericis post mortem episcopi sui rapere res pertinentes ad eum, sicuti precedentibus regulis constitutum habetur. Si uero hec fecerint, periclitari se nouerint a proprio gradu.

C. XLIV. Let grants at will and exchanges made by invaders be rescinded.

Likewise from the Council of Metz. Let grants at will and exchanges made during the time of widowed churches by those who occupied the places of bishops be rescinded, and if they are to be made, let them be made with ecclesiastical or civil authority. Likewise Gregory to Maximian, Bishop of Syracuse, [book III, letter II]:

> C. XLIV. Rescindantur precariae et commutationes ab inuasoribus factae.
> Item ex Concilio Mediomatricis. Precariae et conmutationes tempore uiduatarum ecclesiarum factae ab his, qui loca episcoporum occupauerant, rescindantur, et cum auctoritate ecclesiastica uel ciuili, si faciendae sunt, fiant. Item Gregorius Maximiano Siracusano Episcopo: [lib. III. epist. II.]

C. XLV. Let stewards take nothing from the goods of the church for the labor of making an inventory.

We have taken care to admonish your charity that, if any bishop has migrated from this light or, which God forbid, has been removed for his excesses, when the stewards and all the leading clerics have assembled and make an inventory of the goods of the church in his presence, all things which are found are to be described precisely, and no particular object or anything else from the goods of the church is to be taken, as it was said was done before, as though for the labor of making the inventory. § 1. With you directing, let visitors of churches and their clerics, who are wearied with them not throughout the parishes of their own city, take something as a subsidy for their labor. For it is just that those who are found to render their service for a time should obtain a stipend.

> C. XLV. Pro labore inuentarii nichil accipiant yconomi de rebus ecclesiae.
> Karitatem tuam curauimus conmonere, ut, si quispiam episcoporum de hac luce migrauerit, uel (quod absit) pro suis remotus fuerit excessibus, conuenientibus yconomis cunctisque clericis prioribus, atque in sui presentia inuentarium ecclesiae rerum facientibus, omnia, que reperta fuerint, subtiliter describantur, nec (sicut antea fieri dicebatur) species quedam aut aliud quodlibet de rebus ecclesiae quasi pro faciendi inuentarii labore tollatur. §. 1. Visitatores ecclesiarum clericique earum, qui cum ipsis non per suae ciuitatis parrochias fatigantur, aliquid laboris sui capiant te disponente subsidii. Iustum namque est, ut illi consequantur stipendium, qui pro tempore suum conmodare reperiuntur obsequium.

C. XLVI. Let laymen who dare to plunder the goods of dying clerics be excommunicated.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Urban held in Auvergne. A question was raised concerning laymen who, when bishops or other clerics are dying, invade the goods of the deceased and take them away from the church and the poor. Against them the common anathema of the whole council was pronounced, the pope himself promulgating a sentence of this kind: "If anyone, after knowledge of the present prohibition, invades the goods of bishops, priests, or other clerics, let him be excommunicated until satisfaction. § 1. But let the goods of bishops who are dying be dispensed through the hands of archpriests or archdeacons, either in alms for their salvation according to the judgment of the dead, or be reserved for the successor who is to come. Let the very same thing be done concerning the goods of priests or other clerics through the bishop or the aforesaid persons, or through those to whom the dying persons have committed them. But if anyone has presumed against these things, let him be anathema."

> C. XLVI. Excommunicentur laici, qui morientium clericorum audent bona diripere.
> Item ex Concilio Urbani Papae Aluerniae habito. De laicis questio facta est, qui morientibus episcopis siue aliis clericis res defunctorum inuasas ecclesiae pauperibusque subripiunt. Contra quos commune totius concilii anathema prolatum est, ipso Papa huiusmodi sententiam promulgante: "Si quis post interdicti presentis cognitionem episcoporum, seu presbiterorum, aut clericorum aliorum res inuaserit, usque ad satisfactionem excommunicetur. §. 1. Episcoporum uero deficientium res per archipresbiterorum seu archidiaconorum manus, aut secundum mortuorum iudicium pro ipsorum salute in elemosinas dispensentur, aut successori, qui futurus est, reseruentur. Id ipsum de presbiterorum seu clericorum aliorum rebus per episcopum, uel supradictas personas, aut cui deficientes conmiserint, fiat. Si quis autem aduersus ista presumpserit, anathema sit."

C. XLVII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Innocent II, [in the Lateran Council, c. 4]. We command that what was established in the holy Council of Chalcedon be preserved irrefragably: namely, that the goods of deceased bishops be plundered by absolutely no man, but remain under the free power of the steward and clerics for the use of the church and of his successor. But if anyone from now on has presumed to attempt this, let him be subject to excommunication. Those who seize the goods of dying priests or clerics shall be subjected to a similar sentence. GRATIAN. This is to be understood not only concerning laymen, but also concerning metropolitans and any other clerics, as is read in the Sixth Synod, [c. 35]:

> C. XLVII. De eodem.
> Item Innocentius II. [in Concilio Lateranensi, cap. 4.] Illud, quod in sacro Calcedonensi concilio constitutum est, inrefragabiliter conseruari precipimus, ut uidelicet decedentium bona episcoporum a nullo omnino hominum diripiantur, sed ad opus ecclesiae et successoris sui in libera yconomi et clericorum permaneant potestate. Si quis autem hoc amodo attemptare presumpserit, excommunicationi subiaceat. Qui uero morientium presbiterorum uel clericorum bona rapuerint simili sententiae subiciantur. Gratian. Hoc non solum de laicis, uerum etiam de metropolitanis et quibuslibet aliis clericis intelligendum est: sicut Sexta Sinodo [c. 35.] legitur:

C. XLVIII. A metropolitan is not permitted to invade the goods of a dying bishop.

No metropolitan is permitted, when a bishop who is under him dies, to take away either his goods or the goods of his church; rather, let them be under the custody of the clergy of the deceased bishop's church until another bishop is ordained. But if there are no clerics in the church, then let the metropolitan return all things unimpaired to the bishop who will be ordained there. GRATIAN. Just as no one is permitted to usurp the goods of the church, so the church is not permitted to invade the goods of others. Hence Gregory, [book II, letter 43, to Bishop Boniface]:

> C. XLVIII. Res episcopi morientis metropolitano non licet inuadere.
> Non liceat alicui metropolitano moriente episcopo qui sub eo est, aut res suas aut ecclesiae suae auferre, sed sint sub custodia cleri ecclesiae defuncti episcopi, usque dum alius ordinetur episcopus. Si uero clerici in ecclesia non fuerint, tunc metropolitanus illibata omnia episcopo, qui ibi ordinabitur, reddat. Gratian. Sicut autem res ecclesiae nulli usurpare licet, ita ecclesiae aliena inuadere non permittitur. Unde Gregorius: [lib. II. epist. 43. ad Bonifatium Episcopum]

C. XLIX. The church is not permitted to invade the goods of others.

Just as the church ought not to lose its own goods, so it ought not to invade those of others with the ardor of rapacity. GRATIAN. By all these authorities it is clearly shown that no priest is permitted to deliver ecclesiastical goods to anyone and that one who has received the resources of the church from a priest's hand will be able to claim them under no right. Rather, he will be compelled to restore what he received unlawfully. § 1. But it must be noted that, when certain causes require it, the goods of the church can be alienated. For because of necessity, with the counsel of the clerics, or so that they may provide better things, the goods of the church can be alienated by priests. Hence it is read in the African Council:

> C. XLIX. Aliena ecclesiae non licet inuadere.
> Sicut ecclesia proprias res amittere non debet, ita eam rapacitatis ardore alienas inuadere non oportet. Gratian. His omnibus auctoritatibus perspicue monstratur, quod nulli sacerdotum res ecclesiasticas alicui tradere licet, et ille, qui de manu sacerdotis facultates ecclesiae acceperit, nullo iure eas uendicare poterit. Potius cogetur restituere quod illicite accepit. §. 1. Sed notandum est, quod quibusdam causis exigentibus res ecclesiae distrahi possunt. Causa enim necessitatis cum consilio clericorum, uel ut meliora prospiciant, res ecclesiae a sacerdotibus distrahi possunt. Unde in Affricano Concilio legitur:

C. L. Unless there is a cause of necessity, not even a bishop is permitted to usurp property of the church.

Not even a bishop who has no necessity is permitted to usurp for his title property of the mother church.

> C. L. Nisi causa necessitatis nec episcopo liceat rem ecclesiae usurpare.
> Non habenti necessitatem nec episcopo liceat matricis ecclesiae rem sui tituli usurpare.

C. LI. Neither may priests sell property of the church while the bishops are ignorant, nor bishops while the council is ignorant.

Likewise from the Council of Carthage, [sole council, final c.]. It was resolved that priests shall not sell property of the church where they are established without their bishops knowing, just as bishops are not permitted to sell estates of the church, without any necessity, unless the council or the whole presbyterate has been consulted.

> C. LI. Nec presbiteri episcopis ignorantibus, nec episcopi ignorante concilio rem ecclesiae uendant.
> Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi. [unico, c. ult.] Placuit, ut presbiteri non uendant rem ecclesiae, ubi sunt constituti nescientibus episcopis suis, quomodo nec episcopis licet uendere predia ecclesiae inconsulto concilio uel cuncto presbiterio sine ulla necessitate.

C. LII. A bishop is not permitted to alienate property of the church unless he provides better things.

Likewise from the letter of Pope Leo to all the Bishops established throughout Sicily. We decree without exception that no bishop shall dare to give, exchange, or sell anything from the goods of his church, unless perhaps he does one of these things so that he may provide better things and, with the deliberation and consent of the whole clergy, chooses that which is undoubtedly going to benefit the church. And below: § 1. Let the bishop use the goods of the church as things entrusted to him, not as his own. For a sale or exchange of ecclesiastical property by bishops will be void without the connivance and subscription of the clerics. GRATIAN. Likewise, rulers of churches are permitted to sell or exchange houses in cities or fortified towns which bring more disadvantage than utility to the church, as is contained in the preceding chapter of Symmachus, "The pope is not permitted, etc." Likewise, as is read in the Council of Agde, [c. 45]:

> C. LII. Nisi ut meliora prospiciat, rem ecclesiae distrahere non licet episcopo.
> Item ex epistola Leonis Papae, uniuersis Episcopis per Siciliam constitutis. Sine exceptione decernimus, ne quis episcopus de rebus ecclesiae suae quicquam donare, uel conmutare, uel uendere audeat, nisi forte aliquid horum faciat, ut meliora prospiciat, et cum totius cleri tractatu atque consensu id eligat, quod non sit dubium profuturum ecclesiae. Et infra: §. 1. Episcopus rebus ecclesiae tamquam conmendatis, non tamquam propriis utatur. Irrita enim episcoporum uenditio et conmutatio rei ecclesiasticae erit absque conniuentia et subscriptione clericorum. Gratian. Item domus urbium uel castrorum, que ecclesiae plus incommodi quam utilitatis afferunt, licet rectoribus ecclesiarum (sicut in superiori capitulo Simaci: "Non liceat Papae etc." continetur) uendere uel conmutare. Item, sicut in Agatensi Concilio [c. 45.] legitur.

[C. LIII.]

PART VI. "The bishop shall have power, without the counsel of the brothers if there is necessity, to alienate small plots of land or little vineyards which are less useful to the church, or small ones situated far away." [GRATIAN.] Bishops are likewise permitted to alienate fugitive servants who cannot be retained when recalled. Hence it is read in the same Council, [c. 46]:

> [C. LIII.]
> VI. Pars. "Terrulas aut uineolas exiguas, et ecclesiae minus utiles, aut longe positas paruas, episcopus sine consilio fratrum (si necessitas fuerit) distrahendi habeat potestatem." [Gratian.] Seruos quoque fugitiuos, qui reuocati retineri non possunt, similiter episcopis distrahere licet. Unde in eodem Concilio legitur: [c. 46.]

C. LIV. Let fugitives who cannot be held be alienated.

Fugitives abandoning their houses or households who cannot be held even if they are recalled may for the same reason be alienated by bishops, if they wish or if those persons have so deserved.

[PALEA.

> C. LIV. Alienentur fugitiui, qui teneri non possunt.
>
> Fugitiui domos suas aut familias deserentes, qui, etiamsi reuocati fuerint, teneri non possunt, simili ratione ab episcopis, si uoluerint, aut si ita meruerint distrahantur.
>
> [PALEA.

C. LV. Likewise from the Council at Trosly, c. 2.

It appears unjust and impious that bondservants whom faithful men or women have consecrated to God and His saints for the redemption of their soul should be reduced again to secular servitude for the price of any gift or through the transaction of an exchange, since canonical authority permits only fugitive servants to be alienated. And therefore let all rulers of churches take the greatest care lest the alms of one become the sin of another; and it is absurd that a servant departing from ecclesiastical dignity should be subject to human servitude.] PART VII. GRATIAN. Likewise, if rulers of a church wish to restore to the church the same amount from their own goods, they can freely give ecclesiastical resources, and they will remain for those to whom they were given with perpetual validity. Hence it is read in the Council of Agde, [c. 49]:

> C. LV. Item ex Concilio apud Tansiacum c. 2.
> Iniustum uidetur et inpium, ut mancipia, que fideles uiri seu feminae pro redemptione animae suae Deo et sanctis eius consecrauerint, cuiuscumque muneris precio uel conmutationis commercio iterum in secularem seruitutem redigantur, cum canonica auctoritas seruos fugitiuos tantummodo distrahi permittat. Et ideo omnes rectores ecclesiarum summopere caueant, ne unius elemosina alterius peccatum fiat, et est absurdum, ut ecclesiastica dignitate seruus decedens humanae obnoxius sit seruituti.] VII. Pars. Gratian. Item si rectores ecclesiae de rebus propriis tantumdem ecclesiae restituere uoluerint, ecclesiasticas facultates libere dare possunt, et constabunt his, quibus datae fuerint, perpetua firmitate. Unde in Agatensi Concilio [c. 49.] legitur:

C. LVI. How an alienation from the goods of the church will be able to be valid.

If anyone under any condition has presumed to alienate something from the goods of the church, if he has conferred upon the church from his own property as much as he is seen to have taken away, then at last this will be permitted to stand. PART VIII. GRATIAN. Likewise, if a bishop grants servants of the church to liberty, the things which had been given to them at manumission will possess perpetual validity, provided, nevertheless, that the things given did not exceed the quantity fixed by the canons. Hence it is read in the same Council, [c. 7]:

> C. LVI. Alienatio de rebus ecclesiae quomodo rata esse poterit.
> Si quis qualibet conditione de rebus ecclesiae aliquid alienare presumpserit, si de suo proprio tantum ecclesiae contulerit, quantum uisus est abstulisse, tunc demum istud stare licebit. VIII. Pars. Gratian. Item si seruos ecclesiae libertati episcopus donauerit, ea, que in manumissione data illis fuerant perpetua firmitate tenebunt, si tamen quantitatem canonibus prefixam data non excesserint. Unde in eodem Concilio [c. 7.] legitur:

C. LVII. Concerning the same.

If a bishop has granted to liberty any servants of the church who have deserved well from him, it was resolved that the freedom conferred be preserved by his successors together with that which the manumitter had conferred upon them in freedom. Nevertheless, we command that this keep the number and measure of twenty solidi in a small plot of land, little vineyard, or small dwelling. But what has been given beyond this shall be recalled to the church after the manumitter's death. GRATIAN. But it must be noted that servants of churches cannot be manumitted without ecclesiastical patronage being retained, unless perhaps the manumitter wishes to confer upon the church two persons of the same merit and the same personal property. Hence it is read in the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 86]:

C. LVII. De eodem.

Si quos de seruis ecclesiae bene meritos sibi episcopus libertati donauerit, collatam libertatem a successoribus custodiri cum hoc, quod manumissor eis in libertatem contulerat placuit. Quod tamen iubemus uiginti solidorum numerum et modum in terrula, uineola uel hospitiolo tenere. Quod autem amplius datum fuerit post manumissoris mortem ecclesiae reuocetur. Gratian. Sed notandum est, quod serui ecclesiarum manumitti non possunt, non retento ecclesiastico patrocinio, nisi forte manumissor duos eiusdem meriti et eiusdem peculii ecclesiae conferre uoluerit. Unde in Concilio Tolletano IV. [c. 86.] legitur:

C. LVIII. Concerning a bishop who manumits servants of the church without retaining patronage.

A bishop who desires that a bondservant under the right of the church be manumitted without ecclesiastical patronage being retained shall offer before the council, by exchange, two persons of the same merit and personal property to the church over which he presides, with the priests subscribing, so that the determination of the one making the exchange may be found valid and just. For then he will be able to grant free manumission without the patronage of the church, because he has now acquired under his own right the person whom he determined to deliver to liberty. § 1. But let permission to accuse or testify against the church under whose right he existed be denied to a freedman of this kind. But if he has presumed to do so, it is resolved that, while the exchange remains in force, he be recalled into servitude of his own church, which he endeavors to harm. GRATIAN. For a freedman is not permitted to summon his patron into court unless permission has been obtained. Hence in book II of the Digest, under the title On Summoning into Court, [final law]: "If a freedman has summoned his patron into court without obtaining the edict's permission, upon the complaint of the patron he either pays the aforesaid penalty, that is, fifty aurei, or is chastised by the prefect of the city as undutiful, if he is known to labor under poverty." § 1. But if anyone has been manumitted by a college, he owes reverence not to the individuals but to the corporate body. Hence in the same book, under the same title, [law But If in This]: "One who is manumitted by any corporate body, college, or city will summon individuals into court. For he is not their freedman, but he ought to hold the commonwealth in honor. And if he wishes to proceed against the commonwealth or corporate body, he ought to seek the edict's permission, although he is going to summon their appointed representative into court." § 2. But if the prince makes him freeborn, he does not owe reverence to the patron. § 3. But in a criminal matter, if he has summoned his patron into court intending to seek his life and fortunes, he is to be punished capitally before the beginning of the suit. The crime of treason is excepted, or if he discovers his patroness engaging in unlawful intercourse with a servant, in which case even the servant is permitted to accuse his mistress with the reward of liberty, just as in book IX of the Code, under the title Concerning Women Who Have Relations with Their Own Servants, [sole law], Emperor Constantine is read to have established: "If any woman is discovered secretly to have relations with her own servant, let her be subjected to capital sentence, the scoundrel being handed over to the flames. And let there be opportunity for all to prosecute the public crime, let there be opportunity for the office to report it, and let there also be permission for the servant to denounce it; when the crime has been proved, liberty will be given to him." § 4. They also cannot testify against patrons except in certain cases in which even servants are commanded to be tortured against their masters. Hence in the book of the Code, under the title Concerning Tortures, [first law], Emperor Antoninus:

> C. LVIII. De episcopo, qui non retento patrocinio seruos ecclesiae manumittit.
> Episcopus, qui mancipium iuris ecclesiae, non retento ecclesiastico patrocinio, manumitti desiderat, duos eiusdem meriti et peculii coram concilio ecclesiae, cui preminet, per conmutationem subscribentibus sacerdotibus offerat, ut rata et iusta inueniatur diffinitio conmutantis. Tunc enim liberam manumissionem sine patrocinio ecclesiae concedere poterit, quia eum, quem libertati tradere disposuit, iam iuri proprio adquisiuit. §. 1. Huiusmodi autem liberto aduersus ecclesiam, cuius iuris extitit, accusandi uel testificandi denegetur licentia. Quod si presumpserit, placet, ut stante conmutatione in seruitutem propriae ecclesiae reuocetur, quam nocere conatur. Gratian. Libertus enim (nisi uenia inpetrata) patronum in ius uocare non permittitur. Unde in libro 2. Digestorum, titulo de in ius uocando: [l. fin.] "Si sine uenia edicti inpetrata libertus patronum in ius uocauerit, ex querela patroni uel supradictam penam, id est quinquaginta aureos, dat, uel a prefecto urbis quasi inofficiosus castigatur, si inopia dinoscitur laborare." §. 1. Si uero a collegio quis manumissus fuerit, non singulis, sed uniuersitati reuerentiam debet. Unde in eodem libro, titulo eodem: [l. Sed si hac] "Qui manumittatur a corpore aliquo, uel collegio, uel ciuitate, singulos in ius uocabit. Nam non est illorum libertus, sed reipublicae honorem habere debet. Et si aduersus rempublicam uel uniuersitatem uelit experiri, ueniam edicti petere debet, quamuis actorem eorum constitutum in ius sit uocaturus." §. 2. Si uero ingenuum princeps facit, patrono reuerentiam non debet. §. 3. In criminali uero, si patronum in ius uocauerit, caput eius et fortunas petiturus, ante litis exordium capite puniendus est. Crimen maiestatis excipitur, uel si patronam illicito serui concubitu uti deprehenderit, quo casu etiam seruo cum munere libertatis dominam accusare permittitur, sicut in 9. libro Codicis titulo de mulieribus, que seruis propriis, [l. unica] inperator Constantinus constituisse legitur: "Si qua cum seruo suo occulte rem habere detegitur, capitali sententiae subiugetur, tradendo ignibus uerberone. Sitque omnibus facultas crimen publicum arguendi, sit offitio copia nunciandi, sit etiam seruo licentia deferendi, cui probato crimine libertas dabitur." §. 4. In patronos etiam testificari non possunt, nisi in quibusdam casibus, in quibus etiam serui in dominos torqueri iubentur. Unde in libro Codicis, titulo de questionibus, [l. prima] Inp. Antoninus:

[C. LIX.]

"Judicial torture of servants against their masters ought not to be held, except in accusations of crimes of adultery, likewise of a defrauded census, and of the crime of treason which pertains to the safety of the prince. § 1. But in other matters, although the things which a servant said against his master ought not to form the sentence of those who will judge, nevertheless, if the credibility of truth is investigated through other proofs also, the prejudice of the objection vanishes. § 2. But in pecuniary cases it is manifest that servants cannot be interrogated against their master even through a lack of proofs."

> [C. LIX.]
> "Questionem de seruis contra dominos haberi non oportet, exceptis adulterii criminibus, item fraudati census accusationibus, et crimine maiestatis, quod ad salutem principis pertinet. §. 1. In ceteris autem, quamquam ea, que seruus contra dominum dixit, iudicaturi sententiam formare non debeant tamen, si aliis quoque probationibus fides ueritatis inuestigetur, prescriptionis inuidia euanescit. §. 2. In pecuniariis uero causis nec inopia probationum seruos contra dominum interrogari posse manifestum est."

[C. LX.]

The same. "It is unusual and grave as a precedent that servants be heard against the guardians or mother of their masters, unless an action concerning the guardianship is brought." [GRATIAN.] But if a freedman has departed from the patronage of the church by his own authority, if after being admonished he has disdained to return, he will be recalled into servitude. Hence it is read in the same Council:

> [C. LX.]
> Idem. "Insolitum est et graue exemplo, audiri seruos aduersus tutores uel matrem dominorum suorum, nisi tutelae agatur." [Gratian.] Si uero libertus sua auctoritate a patrocinio ecclesiae recesserit, si admonitus redire contempserit, in seruitutem reuocabitur. Unde in eodem Concilio legitur:

C. LXI. Concerning freedmen of the church who depart from its patronage.

Freedmen of the church who, departing from its patronage, adhere to any persons whatsoever: if after being admonished they have disdained to return, let their manumission be void, because through contempt of disobedience they are held by an action for ingratitude.

> C. LXI. De libertis ecclesiae, qui ab eius patrocinio discedunt.
> Liberti ecclesiae, qui a patrocinio eius discedentes quibuscumque personis adheserint, si admoniti redire contempserint, manumissio eorum irrita sit, quia per in obedientiae contemptum ingrati actione tenentur.

C. LXII. Let freedmen who grow proud against churches be recalled into their servitude.

Likewise from the Second Council of Seville, [c. 8]. An eighth discussion was held concerning a certain Elisep from the household of the church of Cabra, who, having been delivered to liberty by his bishop, immediately leapt from liberty into the disease of contumacy and thus through pride not only wished to harm the safety of the same bishop by evil or treacherous arts, but, forgetful of his freedom, even condemned beforehand the church his patroness. Against him an action for ingratitude is justly directed by authority of the canons and laws, namely, that, punished by the loss of undeserved liberty, he be forcibly recalled to the bond of servitude. For it is fitting that the status of such persons who strive against their bishop or the church their patroness be cut down rather than preserved, so that those whose liberty is pernicious may have a salutary servitude, and those who learned to grow proud when liberty had been obtained may, once exposed, learn to obey in subjection.

C. LXII. Reuocentur in seruitutem ecclesiarum liberti, qui contra eas superbiunt.

Item ex Concilio Spalensi. [II., c. 8.] Octaua discussio agitata est de quodam Elisep ex familia Egabrensis ecclesiae, qui ab episcopo suo traditus libertati de libertate confestim ad contumaciae morbum transsiliit, sicque per superbiam non solum eiusdem episcopi malis uel insidiosis artibus salutem ledere uoluit, sed etiam patronam ecclesiam libertatis inmemor predampnauit. Aduersus quem ingrati actio canonum ac legum auctoritate iuste dirigitur, scilicet, ut inmeritae libertatis dampno mulctatus ad seruitutis nexum coactus reuocetur. Talium enim status, qui contra episcopum suum uel patronam ecclesiam nituntur, decidi potius quam conseruari conuenit, ut quorum libertas perniciosa est sit salutifera seruitus, et qui superbire nouerint adepta libertate, proditi discant obedire subiecti.

C. LXIII. Let freedmen promoted to sacred orders not depart from the patronage of the church.

Likewise from the Third Council of Toledo, [c. 6]. Concerning freedmen, however, the holy synod commanded this: that if any have been made priests or deacons by bishops according to the manner in which the ancient canons give permission, let them be free, and nevertheless let neither they nor those begotten by them depart from the patronage of the church. § 1. Let those delivered to liberty by others and commended to churches also be gathered under the bishop's patronage, and let the bishop request from the prince that they not be given to anyone. GRATIAN. But lest the condition of their origin be obscured by length of time, at the time of their manumission let freedmen write a profession in which they profess that they are from the household of the church and that they will never depart from its service. Hence it is read in the same Council:

C. LXIII. A patrocinio non discedant ecclesiae liberti ad sacros ordines promoti.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano III. [c. 6.] De libertis autem hoc precepit sancta sinodus, ut, si qui presbiteri uel diaconi ab episcopis facti sunt secundum modum, quo canones antiqui dant licentiam, sint liberi, et tamen a patrocinio ecclesiae tam ipsi quam ab eis progeniti non recedant. §. 1. Ab aliis quoque libertati traditi et ecclesiis conmendati patrocinio episcopi colligantur, et ne cuiquam donentur hoc a principe episcopus postulet. Gratian. Ne uero longinquitate temporis obscuretur conditio originis, tempore suae manumissionis scribant liberti professionem, qua se profiteantur de familia esse ecclesiae, et ab eis obsequio se numquam recessuros. Unde in eodem Concilio legitur:

C. LXIV. Let freedmen of the church make a profession of their condition.

It often happens through length of time that the condition of origin is not manifest. Hence it was already decreed in an earlier canon of the universal council that freedmen of the church ought to make their profession, in which they profess both that they are from the household of the church and that they will never relinquish its service. Hence we also add this for them: that whenever a priest has completed the course of life and migrated from this life, as soon as his successor has arrived, all freedmen of the church, or those begotten by them, ought publicly to present their charters to the pontiff who is substituted, in the sight of all, and renew their profession in the sight of the church, so that both they may retain the force of their status and the church may not lack their obedience. But if within a year of the new pontiff's ordination they have disdained to manifest the writings of their liberty or have been unwilling to renew their professions, let those charters remain void and empty, and let them, returned to their origin, be servants in perpetuity.

C. LXIV. Professionem suae conditionis liberti ecclesiae faciant.

Longinquitate sepe fit temporis, ut non pateat conditio originis. Unde iam decretum est in anteriori uniuersalis concilii canone, ut professionem suam liberti ecclesiae debeant facere, qua profiteantur se et de familia ecclesiae esse, et eius obsequium numquam relicturos. Unde his quoque nos adicimus, ut quociens cursum uitae sacerdos inpleuerit, et de hac uita migrauerit, mox, cum successor eius aduenerit, omnes liberti ecclesiae, uel ab eis progeniti cartulas suas in conspectu omnium debent ipsi qui substituitur pontifici publicare, et professionem in conspectu ecclesiae renouare, quatinus status sui uigorem et illi obtineant et obedientia eorum ecclesia non careat. Si autem scripturas libertatis suae intra annum ordinationis noui pontificis manifestare contempserint, aut professiones renouare noluerint, uacuae et inanes cartulae ipsae remaneant, et illi origini suae redditi sint perpetuo serui.

C. LXV. Let neither freedmen nor their posterity depart from the patronage of the church.

Likewise from the same. Because the patroness of freedmen of the church never dies, let them never depart from the patronage of the church, nor indeed their posterity, as the preceding canons decreed. And lest perhaps their liberty not be manifest in future offspring and that posterity withdraw itself from the church's patronage, it is necessary that both those freedmen themselves and those begotten by them make a profession to their bishop through which they acknowledge that they were made freedmen from the household of the church and do not relinquish its patronage, but furnish it service or obedience according to their ability. GRATIAN. Ecclesiastical goods can also be usefully given as recompense for service rendered. Hence it is read in the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 36]:

C. LXV. Nec liberti, nec eorum posteri a patrocinio discedant ecclesiae.

Item ex eodem. Liberti ecclesiae, quia numquam eorum moritur patrona, a patrocinio ecclesiae numquam discedant, nec posteritas quidem eorum, sicut priores canones decreuerunt. Ac ne forte libertas eorum in futura prole non pateat, ipsaque posteritas sese ab ecclesiae patrocinio non subtrahat, necesse est, ut tam idem liberti, quam ab eis progeniti professionem episcopo suo faciant, per quam ex familia ecclesiae libertos effectos se esse fateantur, eiusque patrocinium non relinquant, sed iuxta uirtutem suam obsequium ei uel obedientiam prebeant. Gratian. Pro remuneratione etiam inpensi obsequii res ecclesiasticae utiliter possunt donari. Unde in IV. Concilio Tolletano [c. 36.] legitur:

C. LXVI. Things furnished from the goods of the church as recompense for service will remain valid.

Whoever, by anyone's support, has provided something of ecclesiastical utility, and in return they have promised him any advantage as recompense, the payment of what was promised ought to release them, in such a way that it is referred to the council of the province, so that it may be confirmed by their assembly, because, as Paul says, the laborer is worthy of his wages.

C. LXVI. Que de rebus ecclesiae in remuneratione obsequii prestantur rata permanebunt.

Quicumque suffragio cuiuslibet aliquid ecclesiasticae utilitatis prouiderint, et pro eo quodcumque commodum in remuneratione promiserint, promissi solutionem eos absoluere oportebit, ita ut ad concilium conprouinciale deferatur, ut eorum conuentu confirmetur, quia (sicut Paulus ait) dignus est mercenarius mercede sua.

C. LXVII. Servants of churches can be transferred into the dominion of those who serve ecclesiastical utilities.

Likewise Gregory, [book II, indiction 11, letter 18, to Theodore the Counselor]. It is fitting that those who labor for ecclesiastical utilities rejoice in ecclesiastical recompense, so that those who willingly subject themselves to the voluntary necessities of services may worthily be consoled by our provisions. Therefore, because we have learned that Theodore, a most eloquent man and our counselor, is destitute of the ministry of bondservants, we command that a boy named Acosimus, a Sicilian by nation, be given and delivered to his right and dominion. Because he now possesses the boy delivered by our will, it was necessary that this gift be fortified by authority as testimony and confirmation for the future, so that, with the Lord protecting, he may securely be able always to possess him as master without suspicion of anyone's reconsideration. GRATIAN. Servants of churches can also be granted to liberty in consideration of mercy. Hence Gregory to Montana and Thomas, [book V, letter 12]:

> C. LXVII. Serui ecclesiarum in eorum dominium transferri possunt, qui ecclesiasticis deseruiunt utilitatibus.
> Item Gregorius. [lib. II. Indict. 11. epist. 18. Theodoro Conciliario] Ecclesiasticis utilitatibus desudantes ecclesiastica dignum est remuneratione gaudere, ut qui se uoluntariis obsequiorum necessitatibus sponte subiciunt digne nostris prouisionibus consolentur. Quia igitur Theodorum uirum eloquentissimum, consiliarium nostrum, mancipiorum cognouimus ministerio destitutum ideo puerum nomine Acosimum, natione Siculum, iuri dominioque suo dari tradique precipimus, quem quoniam traditum ex nostra uoluntate iam possidet, huius necesse fuit pro futuri testimonio ac robore largitatis auctoritate fulciri, quatinus Domino protegente secure eum semper sine ullius retractationis suspicione, ut dominus, ualeat possidere. Gratian. Miserationis quoque intuitu serui ecclesiarum libertati donari possunt. Unde Gregorius Montanae et Thomae: [lib. V. epist. 12.]

C. LXVIII. In consideration of mercy and piety servants of churches can be manumitted.

Since our Redeemer, the Creator of every creature, being propitiated wished to assume human flesh for this purpose—that, after the bond of servitude by which we were held captive had been broken by the grace of His divinity, He might restore us to our original liberty—it is salutarily done if men whom nature brought forth free from the beginning and the law of nations subjected to the yoke of servitude are restored by the benefit of the manumitter to that liberty in which they had been born. And therefore, moved by consideration of piety and reflection upon this matter, we make you, Montana and Thomas, servants of the holy Roman Church which by God as author we serve, free persons and Roman citizens from this day, and we remit to you all your servile peculium. § 1. We dictated that this page of manumission be written by Paterius the notary and, for the fullest validity, subscribed it with our own hand together with three leading priests and three deacons, and we delivered it to you. Enacted in the city of Rome. GRATIAN. Likewise, servants of churches ought not to be wearied by public compulsory services. Hence it is read in the Third Council of Toledo, [c. 21]:

> C. LXVIII. Miserationis et pietatis intuitu serui ecclesiarum possunt manumitti.
> Cum redemptor noster, totius conditor creaturae, ad hoc propiciatus humanam uoluit carnem assumere, ut diuinitatis suae gratia dirupto, quo tenebamur captiui, uinculo seruitutis, pristinae nos restitueret libertati, salubriter agitur, si homines, quos ab initio natura liberos protulit, et ius gentium iugo substituit seruitutis, in ea, qua nati fuerant, manumittentis beneficio libertati reddantur. Atque ideo pietatis intuitu, et huius rei consideratione permotus, uos, Montanam atque Thomam, famulos sanctae Romanae ecclesiae, cui Deo auctore deseruimus, liberos ex hac die ciuesque Romanos efficimus, omneque uestrum uobis relaxamus seruitutis peculium. §. 1. Hanc autem manumissionis paginam Paterio notario scribendam dictauimus, et propria manu una cum tribus presbiteris prioribus et tribus diaconibus pro plenissima firmitate subscripsimus, uobisque tradidimus. Actum in urbe Roma. Gratian. Item serui ecclesiarum publicis angariis fatigari non debent. Unde in III. Tolletano Concilio [c. 21.] legitur:

C. LXIX. Let servants of churches not be wearied by public compulsory services.

We grieve that servants of churches and of bishops or of all clerics are wearied by judges or public officers in various compulsory services. On account of this the whole council requested from the piety of our most glorious lord that he prohibit such practices hereafter, but that the servants of the aforesaid offices labor for their uses or those of the church. But if any judge or public officer has wished to occupy a cleric or the servant of a cleric or church in public and private business, let him be made a stranger to the ecclesiastical communion which he impedes. GRATIAN. Likewise, for the sustenance of the poor and the redemption of captives, sacred goods may be alienated.

Hence Ambrose says in book [II] On Duties, [c. 28]:

C. LXIX. Serui ecclesiarum publicis angariis non fatigentur.

Ecclesiarum seruos, et episcoporum, uel omnium clericorum, a iudicibus uel actoribus publicis in diuersis angariis fatigari dolemus. Propter quod omne concilium a pietate gloriosissimi domini nostri poposcit, ut tales usus deinceps inhibeat, sed serui suprascriptorum offitiorum in eorum usibus uel ecclesiae laborent. Si quis uero iudicum uel actorum clericum aut seruum clerici uel ecclesiae in publicis ac priuatis negotiis occupare uoluerit, a communione ecclesiastica, cui inpedimentum facit, efficiatur extraneus. Gratian. Item pro alimonia pauperum, pro redemptione captiuorum res sacras distrahi licet.

Unde Ambrosius ait in libro [II.] de offitiis: [c. 28]

C. LXX. For what causes sacred goods ought to be alienated.

The church possesses gold not so that it may preserve it, but so that it may expend it and give aid in necessities. What need is there to guard what helps nothing? Do we not know how much gold and silver the Assyrians took from the temple of the Lord? Is it not better that a priest melt it down for the sustenance of the poor if other subsidies are lacking, than that a sacrilegious enemy contaminate and carry it away? Will the Lord not say: Why did you allow so many needy persons to die of hunger? And surely you possessed gold; you should have supplied sustenance. Why were so many captives led into commerce and, not redeemed, killed by the enemy? It would have been better that you preserve vessels of living beings than vessels of metals. No answer could be returned to these things. For what would you say? I feared lest ornament be lacking to the temple of God? He answers: The sacraments do not seek gold, nor are things which are not bought with gold pleasing because of gold. The redemption of captives is the ornament of sacred things, and those are truly precious vessels which redeem souls from death. That is the true treasure of the Lord which works what His blood worked. And a little later: § 1. No one can say: Why does a poor man live? No one can complain because captives have been redeemed. No one can accuse because a temple of God has been built. No one can be indignant because spaces have been enlarged for burying the remains of the faithful. No one can grieve because the rest of the dead is in the tombs of Christians. In these three kinds of cases it is permitted even to break, melt down, and sell the consecrated vessels of the church. It is necessary that the form of the mystical people not depart from the church, nor that the ministry of the sacred chalice be transferred to nefarious uses. Therefore vessels within the church which were not consecrated were sought first, then broken into pieces, and finally melted down; distributed to the needy through small expenditures, they also availed for the prices of captives. But if new vessels and those which appear by no means to have been consecrated are lacking, I judge that all things can piously be converted to uses of this kind which I stated above.

> Aurum ecclesia habet, non ut seruet, sed ut eroget et subueniat in necessitatibus. Quid est opus custodire quod nihil adiuuat? An ignoramus, quantum auri atque argenti de templo Domini Assirii sustulerunt? Nonne melius conflat sacerdos propter alimoniam pauperum, si aliqua subsidia desunt, quam si sacrilegus contaminat et asportat hostis? Nonne dicturus est Dominus: Cur passus es tot inopes fame mori? Et certe habebas aurum, ministrasses alimoniam. Cur tot captiui in commercium ducti nec redempti, ab hoste occisi sunt? Melius fuerat, ut uasa uiuentium seruares quam metallorum. His non posset responsum referri. Quid enim diceres? Timui, ne templo Dei ornatus deesset? Respondet: Aurum sacramenta non querunt, neque auro placent que auro non emuntur. Ornatus sacrorum redemptio captiuorum est, et uere illa sunt uasa preciosa, que redimunt animas a morte. Ille uerus est thesaurus Domini, qui operatur quod sanguis eius operatus est. Et post pauca: §. 1. Nemo potest dicere, cur pauper uiuit? Nemo potest queri, quia captiui redempti sunt. Nemo potest accusare, quia templum Dei edificatum est. Nemo potest indignari, quia humandis fidelium reliquiis spatia laxata sunt. Nemo potest dolere, quia in sepulcris Christianorum requies defunctorum est. In his tribus generibus uasa ecclesiae etiam initiata confringere, conflare, uendere licet. Opus est, ut de ecclesia mistici populi forma non exeat, nec ad usus nefarios sacri calicis ministerium transferatur. Ideo primum intra ecclesiam quesita sunt uasa, que initiata non essent, denique conminuta, postremo conflata, per minutas erogationes dispensata egentibus captiuorum quoque preciis profecerunt. Quod si desunt noua et que nequaquam initiata uideantur, in huiusmodi, quos supra dixi usus, arbitror omnia pie posse conuerti.

C. LXXI. The glory of a bishop is not to adorn the walls of a temple, but to provide for the poor.

Likewise Jerome, [to Nepotian On the Life of Clerics]. The glory of a bishop is to provide for the resources of the poor; the ignominy of a priest is to devote himself to his own riches. Born in a poor house and in a rustic hut, I who could scarcely satisfy my rumbling stomach with millet and coarse bread now disdain fine flour and honey. From the same: § 1. Many build walls and remove the columns of the church; marbles gleam, ceilings shine with gold, the altar is distinguished with gems, and there is no selection of Christ's ministers. Nor indeed let anyone object to me the rich temple in Judea, the table, lamps, censers, dishes, cups, mortars, and the other things wrought from gold.

These things were then approved by the Lord when priests sacrificed victims and the blood of cattle was the remission of sins, although all these things preceded as a figure; but they were written on account of us, upon whom the ends of the ages have come. But now, since the poor Lord has dedicated the poverty of His house, let us bear the cross and reckon delights as mud. From the same: § 2. To seize something from a friend is theft; to defraud the church is sacrilege. To have received something to be distributed to the poor and, when very many are hungry, to preserve it is either cautious or fearful; or, what belongs to most manifest crime, to withdraw something from it exceeds the cruelty of all robbers. Likewise from the same, [to Paulinus, On the Institution of a Monk]: § 3. That Crates of Thebes, once a most wealthy man, when he proceeded to Athens to philosophize, cast away a great weight of gold and did not think that he could possess virtues and riches at the same time. We, laden with gold, follow the poor Christ and, brooding over our former resources under the pretext of alms, how can we faithfully distribute the goods of others when we fearfully preserve our own? A full belly readily discusses fasts. It is not having been at Jerusalem, but having lived well at Jerusalem, that is praiseworthy. GRATIAN. Likewise, by the bishop's generosity it is also permitted to give clerics a stipend from the goods of the church, a profession of which ought to be made under the name of a grant at will. Hence it is read in the Seventh Council of Toledo:

> C. LXXI. Non parietes ornare templi, sed pauperibus prouidere gloria episcopi est.
> Item Ieronimus. [ad Nepotianum de uita clericorum] Gloria episcopi est pauperum opibus prouidere; ignominia sacerdotis est propriis studere diuiciis. Natus in paupere domo et in tugurio rusticano, qui uix milio et cibario pane rugientem uentrem saturare poteram, nunc similam et mella fastidio. Eiusdem: §. 1. Multi edificant parietes, et columpnas ecclesiae subtrahunt, marmora nitent, auro splendent laquearia, gemmis altare distinguitur, et ministrorum Christi nulla est electio. Neque uero michi aliquis obponat diues in Iudea templum, mensam, lucernas, turibula, patellas, cyphos, mortariola, et cetera ex auro fabrefacta.
> Tunc hec probabantur a Domino, quando sacerdotes hostias inmolabant, et sanguis pecudum erat remissio peccatorum, quamquam hec omnia precesserint in figuram; scripta sunt autem propter nos, in quos fines seculorum deuenerunt. Nunc uero, cum paupertatem domus suae pauper Dominus dedicauit, portemus crucem et delicias lutum putemus. Eiusdem: §. 2. Amico rapere quippiam furtum est, ecclesiam fraudare sacrilegium est; accepisse pauperibus erogandum et esurientibus plurimis illud reseruare, uel cautum uel timidum est aut, quod apertissimi sceleris est, exinde aliquid subtrahere, omnium predonum crudelitatem superat. Item eiusdem: [ad Paulinum, de institutione monachi] §. 3. Crates ille Thebanus, homo quondam ditissimus, cum ad philosophandum Athenas pergeret, magnum auri pondus abiecit, nec putauit, se posse et uirtutes simul et diuicias possidere. Nos suffarcinati auro Christum pauperem sequimur, et, sub pretextu elemosinae pristinis incubantes opibus, quomodo possumus aliena fideliter distribuere qui nostra timide reseruamus? Plenus uenter de ieiuniis facile disputat. Non Ierosolimis fuisse, sed Ierosolimis bene uixisse laudandum est. Gratian. Item largitate etiam episcopi stipendium de rebus ecclesiae clericis dare licet, cuius professio sub precariae nomine fieri debet. Unde in VII. Concilio Tolletano legitur:

C. LXXII. Let one who has received a benefice from the church make a profession concerning it under the name of a grant at will.

It often happens that length of time opposes original ownership. Therefore, providing against this, we decree that if any cleric receives a stipend from the goods of the church by the generosity of any bishop, he ought to write a profession under the name of a grant at will, lest through lengthy retention he bring prejudice upon the church; and he ought usefully to work whatever he has received for use, so that neither may goods under divine right appear to be neglected on any occasion, and clerics may be able to receive support from the church which they serve. But if any of them has disdained to do this, he will be seen to deprive himself of his stipend. GRATIAN. In consideration of religion, those things in which the church suffers no detriment can also be delivered to monasteries. Hence it is read in the First Council of Toledo, [c. 4]:

C. LXXII. Qui beneficium ab ecclesia accepit, eius professionem nomine precariae faciat.

Sepe fit, ut proprietati originis obsistat longinquitas temporis. Quapropter prouidentes decernimus, ut si quis clericorum stipendium de rebus ecclesiae cuiuscumque episcopi percipit largitate, sub precariae nomine debeat professionem scribere, ne per retentionem diuturnam preiudicium afferat ecclesiae, et quecumque in usu perceperit debet utiliter laborare, ut nec res diuini iuris uideantur aliqua occasione negligi, et subsidium ab ecclesia, cui deseruiunt, percipere possint clerici. Quod si quis eorum contempserit facere, ipse se stipendio suo uidebitur priuare. Gratian. Religionis quoque intuitu ea, in quibus ecclesia detrimentum non patitur, monasteriis tradi possunt. Unde in Tolletano Concilio I. [c. 4.] legitur:

C. LXXIII. It is permitted to alienate goods of the church in consideration of religion.

If a bishop wishes to dedicate one of his parish churches as a monastery so that a congregation of monks may live regularly in it, let him have permission to do this with the consent of his council. And if he has given to the same place from the goods of the church for their substance something which presents no detriment to the church, let it be stable. For the holy council gives consent for establishing a good thing.

C. LXXIII. Licet religionis intuitu res ecclesiae alienare.

Si episcopus unam de parrochitanis ecclesiis suis monasterium dicare uoluerit, ut in ea monachorum congregatio regulariter uiuat, hoc de consensu concilii sui licentiam habeat faciendi. Qui etiam, si de rebus ecclesiae pro eorum substantia aliquid, quod detrimentum ecclesiae non exhibeat, eidem loco donauerit, sit stabile. Rei enim bonae statuendae sanctum concilium dat consensum.

C. LXXIV. A bishop is not permitted to confer upon a monastery which he constructs more than a fiftieth part of the goods of the church.

Likewise in the Tenth Council of Toledo, [c. 5]. To give counsel for a good thing is both held to be a support of the present life and seen to await the reward of eternal recompense. Therefore, whichever of the bishops should perhaps wish to establish a monastery in his parish and decree to enrich it from the goods of the church over which he presides ought to give no more than a fiftieth part there, so that, with this equity of moderation preserved, he may both confer fitting support upon that to which he gives and not inflict grave losses upon that from which he takes. But upon a church which will not be formed by monastic rules, or which he wishes to enlarge for his own burials, it will be permitted to confer there no more than a hundredth part of the revenue of the church over which he presides, with this caution nevertheless preserved: that he assume only one of these two recompenses, whichever has pleased him.

C. LXXIV. Non ultra quinquagesimam partem rerum ecclesiae monasterio, quod construit, episcopo licet conferre.

Item in eodem concilio Tolletano X. [c. 5.] Bonae rei dare consultum et presentis habetur uitae subsidium, et eternae remunerationis expectare cernitur premium. Quisquis itaque episcoporum in parrochia sua monasterium constituere forte uoluerit, et hoc ex rebus ecclesiae, cui presidet, ditare decreuerit, non amplius ibidem quam quinquagesimam partem dare debebit, ut, hac temperamenti equitate seruata, et cui tribuit conpetens subsidium conferat, et cui tollit dampna grauia non infligat. Ecclesiam uero, que monasticis non informabitur regulis, aut quam pro suis magnificare uoluerit sepulturis, non amplius quam centesimam partem census ecclesiae, cui presidet, ibidem conferre licebit, ea tamen cautela seruata, ut unam tantummodo, que placuerit, ex his duabus remunerationem assumat.

C. LXXV. It is permitted to deliver goods of the church by right of ownership for the buildings of monasteries.

Likewise Gregory, [book II, indiction 11, letter 17, to Gratiosus the Subdeacon]. It is fitting that we provide with appropriate consideration for those choosing the religious life, lest the occasion of some necessity either make them idle or, which God forbid, break the strength of their manner of life. Therefore by the present authority we command you to deliver to the same woman, undoubtedly to be possessed by right of ownership, the house situated in this city in the fourth region beside the place which is called White Hens, or the garden under the right of the holy Roman Church over which, by God as author, we preside, in which Campana, formerly of Patricius, is known to have dwelt, together with the garden and the lodgings which the gate enclosed within the same house, so that in that house, with Christ assisting, she may construct a monastery where she can dwell with her congregation, and so that both she herself and the woman who shall succeed in her honor and place may be able to possess with quiet and unshaken right the aforesaid house and garden with all things pertaining to them, granted by us, as we have said, in consideration of piety. GRATIAN. Behold, it has been shown how the goods of the church can be given without fault and remain valid for those to whom they were given.

C. LXXV. Iure proprietatis res ecclesiae monasteriorum edificiis tradere licet.

Item Gregorius. [lib. II. Indict. 11. epist. 17. Gratioso Subdiacono] Religiosam uitam eligentibus nos oportet congrua consideratione prospicere, ne cuiusdam necessitatis occasio aut desides faciat, aut robur (quod absit) conuersationis infringat. Idcirco presenti tibi auctoritate precipimus, quatinus domum positam in hac urbe, regione quarta, iuxta locum, qui appellatur gallinas albas, uel ortum iuris sanctae Romanae, cui auctore Deo presidemus ecclesiae, in qua Campana quondam Patricii mansisse dinoscitur, simul et ortum atque hospitia, que intra eandem domum ianua conclusit, eidem debeas tradere proprietatis iure proculdubio possidendam, in qua domo monasterium ubi cum congregatione sua habitare possit, Christo adiuuante construere, et tam ipsa quam que in eius honore locoque successerit predictam domum et ortum cum omnibus ad se pertinentibus (sicut diximus) quieto et inconcusso iure a nobis pietatis consideratione concessam ualeat possidere. Gratian. Ecce ostensum est, quomodo res ecclesiae sine culpa dari possunt, et constare his, quibus datae fuerint.

Question III

GRATIAN. PART I. It is now asked: if before the time of their ordination they appeared to possess nothing, what ought to be done concerning the things which they are known to have acquired after their ordination? Concerning these things it was established thus in the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 49]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Nunc queritur, si ante tempus suae ordinationis nichil habere uidebantur, quid de his fieri debeat, que post ordinationem suam inuenisse noscuntur. De his ita statutum est in Concilio Cartaginensi III.: [c. 49]

C. I. Concerning those who, possessing nothing at first, acquire something during the time of their administration.

It was resolved that bishops, priests, deacons, or any clerics who are ordained while possessing nothing and during the time of their episcopate or clericate purchase fields or any estates in their own name shall be held as though by the crime of invasion of the Lord's goods, unless after being admonished they confer those same things upon the church. But if something has come to them personally through someone's liberality or succession by kinship, let them do with it what accords with their purpose. But if they have strayed backward from their purpose, let them be judged unworthy of ecclesiastical honor as reprobates.

> C. I. De his qui, primum nichil habentes, tempore suae administrationis aliqua adquirunt.
> Placuit, ut episcopi, presbiteri, diaconi, uel quicumque clerici, qui nichil habentes ordinantur, et tempore episcopatus uel clericatus sui agros uel quecumque predia suo nomine conparant, tamquam rerum dominicarum inuasionis crimine teneantur, nisi ammoniti ecclesiae eadem contulerint. Si autem ipsis proprie aliquid liberalitate alicuius uel successione cognationis euenerit, faciant inde quod eorum proposito congruit. Quod si a suo proposito retrorsum exorbitauerint, honore ecclesiastico indigni tanquam reprobi iudicentur.

C. II. Concerning ministers who acquire something for their own utility and through no occasion belonging to the church.

Likewise from the Eleventh Council of Toledo. Whatever any of the priests or ministers have merited to receive from anyone in any manner, or through the sequence of a document, for their own utility and friendship, cannot be numbered among the goods of the church; rather, what they wish to do with it will be subject to the judgment of their own will. But if this should perhaps remain unordered after their death, the church over which he presided or of which he was a minister will claim it for itself in perpetuity. GRATIAN. Behold, he can give to whomever he wishes those things which he gained not from ecclesiastical office but from some furnishing of his own utility. PART II. § 1. But it is asked concerning those things which are offered to him jointly with the church or separately for the remedy of a soul, or concerning the third part which he receives as owed to him from the goods of parish churches, whether he can leave them to whomever he wishes. Concerning these matters it is determined thus in the Council of Agde, [c. 6]:

> C. II. De ministris, qui nulla ecclesiae occasione, sed utilitate sui aliqua adquirunt.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano XI. Quicumque de sacerdotibus uel ministris pro sui utilitate atque amicitia, quocumque modo, aut per scripturae seriem aliquid meruerint ab aliquo percipere, in rebus ecclesiae non poterit numerari, sed quod exinde uoluerint facere ipsorum uoluntatis arbitrio subiacebit. Quod si hoc post eorum mortem inordinatum fortasse remanserit, ecclesia, cui prefuit uel minister extitit, hoc sibi in perpetuum uendicabit. Gratian. Ecce quod illa, que non ex offitio ecclesiastico, sed ex aliqua prestatione suae utilitatis lucratus est, potest dare quibus uoluerit. II. Pars. §. 1. Sed queritur de his, que sibi communiter cum ecclesia uel sequestratim pro remedio animae offeruntur, uel de tertia parte, quam de rebus parrochialium ecclesiarum sibi debitam accipit, si ea potuerit dimittere quibus uoluerit. De his ita diffinitur in Concilio Agatensi: [c. 6.]

C. III. Concerning pontiffs to whom something is left or given by outsiders, either together with the church or separately.

Pontiffs to whom, while they are established in the highest priesthood, something is left or given by outsiders either together with the church or separately—because the person who gives it is proved to offer it for the redemption of his soul, not for the advantage of the priest—shall reckon it among the resources of the church, not as their own property but as something left to the church, because it is just that, just as the priest possesses what is left to the church, so the church also possesses what is left to the priest. § 1. Certainly, whatever is perhaps left through a trust either to the priest or to the church, afterward to benefit any other person, the church will not be able to reckon or retain among its own resources.

> C. III. De pontificibus, quibus ab extraneis uel cum ecclesia, uel sequestratim aliquid dimittitur.
> Pontifices, quibus in summo sacerdotio constitutis aliquid ab extraneis aut cum ecclesia, aut sequestratim dimittitur, aut donatur, (quia hoc ille, qui donat, pro redemptione animae suae, non pro commodo sacerdotis offerre probatur), non quasi suum proprium, sed quasi dimissum ecclesiae inter facultates ecclesiae conputabunt, quia iustum est, ut sicut sacerdos habet quod ecclesiae dimissum est, ita et ecclesia habeat quod relinquitur sacerdoti. §. 1. Sane quicquid per fidei commissum aut sacerdoti, aut ecclesiae fortasse dimittitur, cuicumque alii postmodum profuturum, id inter facultates suas ecclesia conputare aut retinere non poterit.

C. IV. A bishop will be able to leave to the church the third part owed to him.

Likewise from the Ninth Council of Toledo, [c. 6]. If a bishop has decreed to confer the third part which he knows to be owed to him from the goods of parish churches upon the church whose property it will be manifestly shown to be, or upon another church, let it remain lawful, and let his sentence possess irrevocable force.

> C. IV. Episcopus tertiam partem sibi debitam ecclesiae relinquere poterit.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano. [IX., c. 6.] Episcopus, si tertiam partem, quam de rebus parrochialium ecclesiarum sibi debitam nouit, ecclesiae, cuius res esse patebit, aut alteri ecclesiae, conferre decreuerit, licitum maneat, et inreuocabile robur eius sententia ferat.

Question IV

GRATIAN. But as to what is asked—if they are known to have acquired something from their own goods and those of the church, to whom do those things come?—it is determined thus in the same Council.

> GRATIANUS. Quod autem queritur, si de suis et ecclesiae rebus aliqua acquisisse noscuntur, cui proueniant? ita diffinitur in eodem Concilio.

C. I. Concerning those who are known to have acquired something from their own goods and those of the church.

Let priests, or any persons to whom care of ecclesiastical goods is committed, concerning whatever they have purchased during the time of their administration, if they possessed anything cheap or costly from their own goods, take care to execute the instruments of the charters in the name of the church over which they preside; for it is not just that the church should make wealthy in another's goods one whom it received as an outsider and retain him as a defrauder in its own. § 1. But those who are known to possess an income from their own property: concerning every property which they are seen to have acquired after the day of their ordination, whether no instruments or some have been executed, after an accounting has been made of both their own right and the ecclesiastical goods, if the quantity of each property is equal, the acquisition will pertain by equal right to the church and to the heirs of the deceased. GRATIAN. But if anyone has inflicted detriment upon the goods of the church for the advantage of his own property, or if on account of ecclesiastical goods he has suffered detriment in his own property, in turn the goods which experience the gain shall make reparation to those suffering the losses. Hence it is read in the Third Council of Braga, [c. 8]:

> C. I. De his, qui de suis et ecclesiae rebus aliqua adquisisse noscuntur.
> Sacerdotes, uel quilibet quibus ecclesiasticarum rerum cura conmissa est, quecumque amministrationis suae tempore emerint, si de rebus propriis uel uile uel karum habuerint, ad ecclesiae nomen, cui presunt, cartarum conficere instrumenta procurent, non enim iustum est, ut ecclesia quem suscepit externum efficiat in alieno diuitem, et in suo retineat fraudatorem. §. 1. Hii uero, qui suarum rerum noscuntur habere conpendium, ex omni re, quam post ordinationis suae diem uisi sunt conquisisse, siue nulla siue aliqua sint instrumenta confecta, conpensatione tam sui iuris quam ecclesiasticarum rerum habita, si se utriusque rei quantitas exequauerit, inter ecclesiam et decedentis heredes equo iure conquisitio pertinebit. Gratian. Si quis uero pro conpendio suarum rerum ecclesiae rebus detrimentum intulerit, uel si occasione rerum ecclesiasticarum in rebus propriis detrimentum passus fuerit, uicissim que lucrum sentiunt detrimenta patientibus resarcient. Unde in Bracarensi Concilio [III. c. 8.] legitur:

C. II. Let losses which either a priest or the church has experienced on account of the other be repaired.

Whoever through this neglect has allowed divine goods to suffer is to be constrained by a special decree, so that if from the goods or increases of the church he has increased his own gain by his labors and from this has either exhibited neglect of labor toward ecclesiastical goods or introduced diminution or loss, he shall restore to it whatever he diminished in the goods of the church, from whose goods and supports he has been convicted of enlarging his own labors. But if he expended anything for the utilities or substance of the church, or sustained anything of expense or loss, if he can prove this, all of it will be restored to him from the goods of the same church, for whose utility he is proved to have expended it. GRATIAN. But if they are known to have acquired something only from the goods of the church, they both ought to draw up the instruments in the name of the church and will not be able to give those things to anyone. Hence it is read in the Council of Agde, [c. 54]:

> C. II. Resarciantur detrimenta sacerdoti uel ecclesiae, que alterius occasione alter senserit.
> Quicumque sub hoc neglectu res diuinas laborare distulerit, speciali placito distringendus est, ut si de rebus seu augmentis ecclesiae questum laboribus suis proprie auxit, et ex hoc ecclesiasticis rebus aut neglectum laboris exhibuit, aut minorationem uel perditionem induxit, quicquid in rebus ecclesiae minuit illi restituat, ex cuius rebus atque suffragiis suos conuictus fuerit ampliasse labores. Quod si aliquid pro utilitatibus ecclesiae aut substantiae expendit, aut dispendii uel perditionis quippiam pertulerit, si hoc conprobare potuerit, totum illi a rebus ecclesiae eiusdem reformabitur, pro cuius utilitate id expendisse probatur. Gratian. Si uero de rebus ecclesiae tantummodo aliqua adquisisse noscuntur, et ad nomen ecclesiae instrumenta debent conponere, nec aliquibus poterunt illa donare. Unde in Agatensi Concilio [c. 54.] legitur:

C. III. Concerning the things which priests purchase, let them make the document in the name of the church.

When a priest holds a diocese, let him make the document concerning the things which he purchases in the name of the church, or let him depart from the governance of the church which he holds.

> C. III. De hiis, que sacerdotes emunt, ad ecclesiae nomen faciant scripturam.
> Presbiter, cum diocesim tenet, de his, que emerit, ad ecclesiae nomen scripturam faciat, aut ab eius, quam tenet, ecclesiae ordinatione discedat.

Question V

GRATIAN. PART I. They are not permitted to make testaments except concerning their own goods. Hence Gregory writes to Bishop Lucidus, [book X, letter 42]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Testamenta uero non licet eis conficere, nisi de propriis rebus. Unde Gregorius scribit Lucido Episcopo: [lib. X. epist. 42.]

C. I. How priests may make a testament concerning the goods of the church.

It is doubtful to no one that, just as priests have no permission to alienate goods acquired in the episcopate, so they are not prohibited from judging whatever they wish concerning those which they possessed before. And so we recall that your fraternity, at the time when it was with us, complained that your predecessor Constantius had left to Luminosa, a handmaid of God, and to his brothers, by the sequence of a testament under the title of a legacy, certain movable goods which he had acquired while already a bishop; and we decreed that, if this is established, your church should suffer no prejudice from them. You too ought to recall this, not cause any vexation to the aforesaid handmaid of God, nor take anything from her without an inquiry concerning the things which she possesses.

> C. I. Quomodo de rebus ecclesiae sacerdotibus testari liceat.
> Nulli dubium est, quod sicut sacerdotibus res in episcopatu acquisitas nulla est alienandi licentia, ita de eis, quas ante habuerint, quicquid iudicare uoluerint non uetentur. Itaque fraternitatem tuam tempore, quo ad nos fuit, conquestam esse recolimus, quod quedam mobilia, que Constantius decessor uester Luminosae ancillae Dei, et fratribus suis, testamenti serie legati titulo dereliquit, iam episcopus adquisisset, decreuissetque nos, ut, si hoc constat, nullum ex his ecclesia uestra preiudicium pateretur. Quod et uos oportet recolere, et molestiam aliquam predictae ancillae Dei non facere, nec ei sine cognitione de his, que possidet, quicquam auferre.

C. II. Concerning the same.

The same, [book IV, letter 22, to Cyprian the Deacon]. We believe that your affection has already learned of the death of Bishop Theodore. But because he is said to have made a testament, you ought to inquire carefully whether he consumed anything from the goods of his church. And if indeed you learn that he diminished anything from them improperly, act in such a way that the goods are by every means repaired by the person whose interest it is.

> C. II. De eodem.
> Idem. [lib. IV. epist. 22. Cypriano Diacono] Obitum Theodori episcopi dilectionem tuam iam credimus cognouisse. Sed quia testamentum dicitur condidisse, subtiliter te ne quid de rebus ecclesiae suae consumpsisset oportet inquirere. Et siquidem eum exinde aliquid incongrue minuisse didiceris, ita age, ut res ab eo, cuius interest, modis omnibus reparentur.

C. III. Things conferred upon monasteries by a bishop ought not to be recalled.

Likewise Gregory to Marinianus, Bishop of Ravenna, [book V, letter 1]. Because John, your former predecessor, very often requested of us that we ought by our authority to confirm those things which he had conferred upon that monastery which he himself had constructed beside the church of Saint Apollinaris, and we promised that we would do this, we foresaw that it was necessary to exhort your fraternity that it permit nothing from the things which he conferred and established there to be diminished in any manner, but endeavor that all things be preserved with firm stability. Because he is known to have made mention of this monastery and the goods collected there in the testament which he made, you ought to know that we confirmed these things not because we follow his last will, but because we promised this to him while he was living, as we have said. Therefore let your fraternity hasten solicitously to fulfill all these things in such a way that both the things which he established in the aforesaid monastery and which were confirmed by us are preserved, and those things which he decreed by his testament to be given or done to the detriment of his church obtain no validity, since the law prohibits it.

C. III. Que monasteriis ab episcopo conferuntur reuocari non debent.

Item Gregorius Mariniano Episcopo Rauennati. [lib. V. epist. 1.] Quia Iohannes quondam decessor tuus sepius a nobis expetiit, ut ea, que in monasterio illo contulerat, quod iuxta ecclesiam S. Apollinaris ipse construxerat, nostra debuissemus auctoritate firmare, et hec facturos nos esse promisimus, fraternitatem uestram necessarium preuidimus adhortandam, ut nichil de his, que illic contulit atque constituit, aliquo modo patiatur inminui, sed omnia firma stabilitate studeat seruari. Huius igitur monasterii et collectarum illic rerum quia in testamento, quod condidit, fecisse noscitur mentionem, sciendum uobis est, non nos ideo ea confirmasse, quoniam suppremam eius sequimur uoluntatem, sed quia hoc ei (sicut diximus) uiuenti promisimus. Hec itaque omnia sic sollicite fraternitas uestra inplere festinet, quatinus et que in suprascripto monasterio constituit et a nobis sunt firmata seruentur, et illa, que in dampno dari uel fieri per testamentum suae decreuerit ecclesiae, nullam, prohibente lege, obtineant firmitatem.

C. IV. Let a bishop leave to whomever he wishes the things which he acquired before his ordination or afterward by hereditary succession.

Likewise from the Council of Seville. We have decreed that it be fixed henceforth and remain perpetually that a bishop may confer upon whom he wishes the goods under his own right which he acquired either before the episcopate or indeed during the episcopate by hereditary succession, according to canonical authority, and do with them whatever he wishes. But after he has been made bishop, whatever goods he has purchased from the resources of the church either in his own or another's name, we have decreed that they come under the rights not of his relatives but of the church over which he presides. GRATIAN. But a bishop is permitted to make a testament concerning ecclesiastical goods if he restores as much from his own. Hence it was established in the Council of Agde, [c. 51]:

C. IV. Que ante suam ordinationem, uel post, hereditaria successione quesiuit episcopus, cui uult derelinquat.

Item ex Concilio Spalensi. Fixum abhinc et perpetuo mansurum esse decreuimus, ut episcopus res sui iuris, quas aut ante episcopatum, aut certe in episcopatu hereditaria successione acquisiuit, secundum auctoritatem canonicam cui uult conferat et quicquid de eis uult, faciat. Postquam autem episcopus factus est, quascumque res de facultatibus ecclesiae aut suo, aut alterius nomine conparauerit, decreuimus, ut non in propinquorum suorum, sed ecclesiae, cui preest, iura deueniant. Gratian. De rebus uero ecclesiasticis testari licet episcopo, si tantumdem de propriis restituat. Unde in Agatensi Concilio [c. 51.] statutum est:

C. V. How those things which are bequeathed by testament from the property of the church can be valid.

If a bishop, having made a testament, bequeaths anything from property belonging to ecclesiastical right, it shall not be valid otherwise, unless he supplies as much from resources belonging to his own right. PART II. GRATIAN. But if a bishop or anyone from an ecclesiastical rank dies intestate, and no persons are found who succeed him by right of kinship, let the church succeed him in the whole, nor shall it be lawful for anyone to presume anything from his goods.

Hence it was established in the Council of Tarragona [c. 12]:

C. V. Quomodo possint esse rata que de ecclesiae proprietate testamento legantur.

Si episcopus condito testamento aliquid de ecclesiastici iuris proprietate legauerit, aliter non ualebit, nisi tantum de proprii iuris facultate suppleuerit. II. Pars. Gratian. Sed si episcopus uel quilibet ex gradu ecclesiastico intestatus defunctus fuerit, nec aliqui inuenti fuerint, qui iure cognationis ei succedant, ecclesia ei succedat in integrum, nec licebit alicui aliqua ex rebus eius presumere.

Unde in Terraconensi Concilio [c. 12.] statutum est:

C. VI. Let the church succeed in full to an intestate bishop.

Wherever a bishop has died intestate, after this determination let a written inventory of his goods be made by his priests and deacons, from the least to the greatest—that is, of utensils and all household furnishings—yet in such a way that, if anyone is convicted either of having presumed anything from them or of having taken anything secretly, he shall restore everything according to the tenor of theft.

C. VI. Episcopo intestato ecclesia succedat ex integro.

Sicubi defunctus fuerit episcopus intestatus, post hanc diffinitionem a presbiteris eius et diaconibus de rebus ipsius breuis conscriptio fiat a minimo usque ad maximum, id est de utensilibus et omni supellectile, ita tamen, ut si quis exinde uel presumpsisse aliquid, uel occulte tulisse fuerit conuictus, secundum furti tenorem restituat uniuersa.

C. VII. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur. Whoever from an ecclesiastical rank dies without a testament and without kindred, let his inheritance devolve upon the church where he served. Likewise concerning nuns.

C. VII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. Quicumque ex gradu ecclesiastico sine testamento et sine cognatione decesserit, hereditas eius ad ecclesiam, ubi deseruiuit, euoluatur. Similiter de sanctimonialibus.

Causa XIII

GRATIAN. Certain parishioners of a baptismal church, oppressed by the calamities of wars and compelled by fear of the enemy, transferred their domiciles into another diocese, yet they did not cease to cultivate their old estates; they began to pay tithes to that church into whose diocese they passed, and they chose their places of burial at it. After fifty years had elapsed, the clerics to whom they had formerly paid tithes began to raise a question against those who receive first fruits and tithes from these persons; they come to trial. (QUESTION I.) First it is asked whether those whose domiciles are in the diocese of this baptismal church ought to pay tithes and celebrate their obsequies at that church in which these things were formerly done by their parents. (QUESTION II.) Second, whether the right of receiving tithes and conducting funerals is removed by prescription of time.

> GRATIANUS. Diocesiani cuiusdam baptismalis ecclesiae, cladibus bellorum pressi, hostili metu conpulsi domicilia sua transtulerunt in aliam diocesim, predia tamen antiqua non desierunt colere; ceperunt persoluere decimas illi ecclesiae, in cuius diocesim transierunt, et apud eam sibi elegerunt sepulturas. Transactis quinquaginta annis clerici, quibus quondam persoluerant decimas, ceperunt mouere questionem in eos, qui ab istis accipiunt primicias et decimas; ueniunt ad causam. (Qu. I.) Modo primum queritur, si illi, quorum domicilia sunt in diocesi huius baptismalis ecclesiae, an debeant persoluere decimas, et celebrare suas exequias apud eam ecclesiam, in qua quondam hec fiebant a parentibus eorum? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an prescriptione temporis ius percipiendi decimas et funerandi tollatur?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. That all these things are by right to be paid to the former church, the plaintiffs strive to prove by these arguments. It is established that every baptismal church has a diocese lawfully assigned to it, just as parochial churches also have parishes apportioned to them. Hence Dionysius the Bishop to Bishop Severus, [letter II]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod priori ecclesiae hec omnia iure persoluenda sint, actores his argumentis probare contendunt. Constat unamquamque baptismalem ecclesiam habere diocesim sibi legitime assignatam, sicut et parrochiales ecclesiae habent parrochias distributas. Unde Dionisius Episcopus Seuero Episcopo: [ep. II.]

C. I. Individual priests ought to have their own churches.

We have given individual churches to individual priests; we have divided parishes and cemeteries among them, and we have established that each is to have his own right, in such a way, namely, that no one invade the boundaries or right of another's parish, but let each be content with his own boundaries and so guard the church and people committed to him that before the tribunal of the eternal Judge he may render an account for all things committed to him and receive not judgment but glory for his deeds. GRATIAN. Moreover, from whatever estates are cultivated in the designated diocese, the revenue of the tithes assigned to the baptismal church ought to be paid. Therefore, because these estates are contained within the boundaries of our diocese, the revenue of the tithes lawfully assigned to us is to be paid to our church. PART II. § 1. To these matters reply is thus made: Tithes were established by God through Moses so that they might be paid by the people to the sons of Levi for the ministry in which they served Him in the tabernacle. The sons of Levi did not receive tithes except from those for whom they offered prayers and sacrifices. Therefore, because we serve the Lord in the tabernacle by offering prayers and sacrifices for these persons, they also ought to pay us tithes and first fruits. § 2. Likewise, when tithes were given to the sons of Levi, they were not paid according to the choice of the offerer, so that, after despising the Levite who was with him, he might himself choose to whom he wished to give the tithes. For it was said: "The Levite who sojourns with you and dwells within the walls of your city shall eat them." For that reason also they received cities for habitation from each of the tribes, so that each tribe might pay tithes to those who were with it. For Moses commanded the children of Israel, as is read in Deuteronomy: "In the place which the Lord your God shall choose, that His name may be therein, thither you shall bring all the things that I command: holocausts and sacrifices and tithes and first fruits of your hands, and whatever is foremost among the gifts which you have vowed to the Lord. There you shall feast before the Lord your God, you and your sons and your daughters, your menservants and maidservants, and the Levites who sojourn in your cities. For he has no other part and possession among you." And below: § 3. "The tithe of grain and wine and oil, the firstborn of herds and flocks, and all things that you shall vow and wish to offer spontaneously, and the first fruits of your hands, you shall eat before the Lord your God in the place which the Lord your God shall choose—you and your son and your daughter, your manservant and maidservant, and the Levites who remain in your cities." § 4. Therefore, because we reside within the walls of the city of these persons and are joined to them by habitation, we rightly receive tithes from them. Likewise the Prophet says: "Bringing forth hay for beasts of burden, and grass for the service of men." Hay and grass are brought forth from the earth—but for whom? For the beasts of burden that water it, for the men who cultivate it and in this serve Him. Likewise the Apostle: "But let him who is catechized in the word communicate with him who catechizes him." This he says to the Galatians. But to the Corinthians he proves that support is specially owed to him because he ministered spiritual things to them, saying: "If we have sown spiritual things for you, is it a great thing if we reap your carnal things?" Likewise: "If others have become sharers in your power, why not we rather?" Likewise: "Who plants a vineyard and does not eat of its fruit?" We planted the vineyard, and do you wish to eat its fruits? Likewise the Lord commanded Moses that no one put his sickle into another's harvest. This harvest is ours, and do you wish to put your sickle into it? Likewise: "You shall not bind the mouth of the ox that treads out the grain." We are the oxen treading out the grain; do you seek to bind our mouth and seek sustenance for yourselves from our threshing? Likewise the Apostle: "Let those who serve the altar live from the altar." But surely not from that altar which they do not serve? Likewise: "Those who work in the sanctuary share with the sanctuary." But surely not with that in which they do not work? We serve the altar; do you wish to share in it, while seeking to dismiss us empty and destitute? Likewise the Apostle: "It is fitting that the laboring husbandman first partake of his fruits"; but do you seek the contrary? We are the laboring husbandmen; do you wish first to partake of our fruits? Indeed, not first, because you do not wish to leave even the last portion to us. For, beginning from the first things, you creep forward little by little and strive to usurp the whole, so that it may appear to have been said of you: "Bit by bit the wolf eats the lamb." Likewise: "Who ever serves as a soldier at his own expense? Who feeds a flock and does not eat of its milk?" We serve as soldiers, and do you seek for yourselves the stipends of our military service? We feed the flock, and do you wish to receive its milk and wool for yourselves? It is wisdom to seek sustenance from another's labor—if it is wisdom to will what you cannot obtain. § 5. Likewise the Lord said to His disciples: "Into whatever house you enter, remain in that same house, eating and drinking the things that are among them. But when you enter, first say: Peace to this house." We entered this house; we offered peace to it. But do you rejoice to be fed as idle men by another's food? See lest this be turned against you: "See what idleness and another's food may do." § 6. Likewise the Prophet: "Take up a psalm and give the timbrel." These persons take up the psalm from us, and do you seek the timbrel from them? § 7. Likewise Leo IV: "Concerning tithes, not only to us but also to our predecessors it seemed by a just order that they ought to be given only to parish churches where the most sacred baptisms are administered." § 8. But to which parish churches are they owed: to those from which they receive baptism, or to others? We baptize them, and do you take tithes from them? It is an honorable interpretation; would that you might find those who interpret thus for you. Therefore, because we water this people, ministering to it the rain of doctrine, and because we cultivate it with the ploughshare of preaching, opening its hearts to the faith, if you are unwilling to permit it, at least suffer it to bear fruit for us, and beware of inflicting upon us such things as you do not wish to be done to you, lest, if you persist in saying what you wish, you hear what you do not wish.

PART III. § 9. To these arguments: With a crafty and indeed manifold argumentation you strive to take away our rights, in such a way that, if credence were given to words, you would carry back not words for words but things for words. But, God being favorable, if you have given words, you will receive words. § 10. You charge us with seeking to steal away those things which are owed to you, because we pursue our own things. A judgment indeed wise and uttered by a philosophical mouth: is pursuing one's own to plunder another's? From where has this judgment flowed to you, unless because you covet our things with such ardor that you think your own things are taken away from you when we obtain ours? Hence, when our case has attained its due end, you will exclaim: "Ah, wretched me, I am tortured that so great a morsel has been snatched from my jaws." But see lest you seek to obtain compensation for the loss of the ointment poured out. You have appointed yourselves planters of vineyards, diggers of fields, threshers of threshing floors, waterers of fields; you have assumed for yourselves many other offices of this kind and have complained that services owed to you are withdrawn from you by us. But we do not deny what is yours. Straw and coverings are preserved for the ox that treads out grain. Let these be yours, and leave the kernels to us. Cultivators of vineyards, diggers of fields, and waterers of fields, once they have received a daily wage, leave the fruits that arise to the owners. Therefore, having received the recompense for your work in the daily offerings and the other services which are daily brought in return for the spiritual things they receive from you, leave to us the resulting fruits of tithes and first fruits. § 11. Likewise the Lord commanded His disciples to eat and drink the things that were among their hearers, but He did not command them to cast the owners out of their houses and despoil them of their goods. You will not easily find those who willingly receive such guests. A mouse in a purse, fire in the bosom, a serpent in the lap reward their hosts badly. Hence it is said in Proverbs: "He who nourishes a serpent in his bosom will be struck by it." May you find such hosts for yourselves as you wish to be for us. It is not enough for you to eat and drink the things that are in our house while you receive the daily fruits of offerings, from which you may have food and clothing, with which you ought to be content with the Apostle; but you are unwilling, because you are not imitators of him. Rather, you strive to expel us from our house and wholly despoil us of our goods when you do not wish to leave us even the tithes of these things. § 12. But in order that all things may be gathered universally, we refer everything that has been introduced on your behalf—whether concerning the laboring husbandman or concerning him who does not serve as a soldier at his own expense—to this point: that you receive in the offerings and daily services of these persons the fruit of your work which you so greatly strive to receive, but leave untouched to us their tithes, which are owed to us, lest, while you seek to usurp what is not yours, by just punishment you be compelled also to lose that which seemed in some manner to belong to you. § 13. But that these tithes are owed to you by no right, we shall easily prove. For it is said in a certain council: "If any layman or cleric, or a person of either sex, the places of his property, etc.," as they are found noted in the same chapter in the cause concerning monks. Therefore, if a layman or cleric or any person, when selling or donating places belonging to his property, can in no way withdraw the revenue of the tithes from the church to which it was lawfully assigned, neither can these persons, by passing from diocese to diocese, take away from us the tithes of their estates which are contained within the boundaries of our parish. For, so far as the right of receiving tithes is concerned, it is the same thing for the possessor to pass from diocese to diocese as for the possession to be transferred from one diocesan to another.

C. I. Singuli sacerdotes proprios debent habere ecclesias.

Ecclesias singulas singulis presbiteris dedimus; parrochias et cimiteria eis diuisimus, et unicuique ius proprium habere statuimus, ita uidelicet, ut nullus alterius parrochiae terminos aut ius inuadat, sed unusquisque terminis suis sit contentus, et taliter ecclesiam et plebem sibi conmissam custodiat, ut ante tribunal eterni iudicis ex omnibus sibi conmissis rationem reddat, et non iudicium, sed gloriam pro suis actibus percipiat. Gratian. In diocesi autem designata quecumque predia coluntur, prouentus decimationum baptismali ecclesiae assignatus debet persolui. Quia ergo predia hec intra terminos nostrae diocesis continentur, et prouentus decimationum nobis legitime assignatus nostrae persoluendus est ecclesiae. II. Pars. §. 1. His ita respondetur: Decimae a Deo constitutae sunt per Moysen, ut persoluerentur a populo filiis Leui pro ministerio, in quo deseruiebant ei in tabernaculo. Non accipiebant filii Leui decimas, nisi ab eis, pro quibus offerebant preces et sacrificia. Quia ergo nos seruimus Domino in tabernaculo, offerendo pro istis preces et sacrificia, et ipsi debent nobis persoluere decimas et primicias. §. 2. Item, cum decimae darentur filiis Leui, non electione offerentis persoluebantur, ut contempto Leuita, qui secum erat, ipse eligeret cui uellet decimas dare. Nam dictum est; "Leuita, qui tecum moratur et intra muros urbis tuae habitat, comedet eas." Ideo etiam ex singulis tribubus ciuitates ad habitandum acceperunt, ut unaqueque tribus illis persolueret decimas, qui secum erant. Nam Moyses precepit filiis Israel, (sicut legitur in Deuteronomio): "In loco, quem elegerit dominus Deus uester, ut sit nomen eius in eo, illuc omnia, quae precipio, conferetis holocausta, et hostias, et decimas, et primicias manuum uestrarum, et quicquid precipuum est in muneribus que uouistis Domino. Ibi epulabimini coram Domino Deo uestro uos et filii ac filiae uestrae famuli et famulae uestrae, atque Leuites, qui in uestris urbibus conmorantur. Neque enim habet aliam partem atque possessionem inter uos." Et infra: §. 3. "Decimam frumenti et uini et olei primogenita armentorum et pecorum, et omnia, que uoueris, et sponte offerre uolueris, et primicias manuum tuarum coram Domino Deo tuo comedes ea in loco, quem elegerit Dominus Deus tuus, tu, et filius tuus, et filia tua, seruus et ancilla, atque Leuites, qui manent in urbibus tuis." §. 4. Quia ergo nos intra muros urbis istorum sedemus, et eis habitatione iuncti sumus, rite ab eis decimas accipimus. Item ait Propheta: "Producens fenum iumentis, et herbam seruituti hominum." Fenum et herba ex terra producitur: sed quibus? iumentis rigantibus eam, hominibus colentibus eam, et in hoc seruientibus ipsi. Item Apostolus: "Communicet autem is, qui cathezizatur uerbo, ei, qui se cathezizat." Hoc Galatis. Corinthiis autem probat specialiter sibi deberi sumptus, quia eis spiritualia ministrauit, dicens: "Si seminauimus uobis spiritualia, magnum est si uestra carnalia metamus?" Item: "Si alii participes uestrae potestatis facti sunt, cur non magis et nos?" Item: "Quis plantat uineam, et de fructu eius non edit?" Nos plantauimus uineam, et uos uultis edere fructus eius? Item precepit Dominus Moysi, ut nemo mittat falcem in alienam messem. Hec messis nostra est, et uos uultis in eam falcem mittere? Item: "Non alligabis os boui trituranti." Nos sumus boues triturantes: queritis uos alligare os nostrum, et de nostra tritura uictum uobis queritis? Item Apostolus: "Qui altario seruiunt de altario uiuant." Sed numquid de eo, cui non seruiunt? Item: "Qui in sacrario operantur cum sacrario participant." Sed numquid cum illo, in quo non operantur? Nos seruimus altario, uos ei participare uultis, nos uero uacuos et inanes dimittere queritis? Item Apostolus: "Laborantem agricolam prius oportet suscipere de fructibus suis:" uos autem econtra queritis? Nos sumus agricolae laborantes, uos primum uultis percipere de fructibus nostris? immo non primum, quia nec ultimum nobis relinquere uultis. A prioribus enim incipientes paullatim serpitis, et totum usurpare contenditis, ut pro uobis uideatur dictum: "frustatim lupus comedit agnum." Item: "Quis umquam suis militat stipendiis? quis pascit gregem, et de lacte eius non edit?" Nos militamus: et uos stipendia nostrae miliciae uobis queritis? Nos gregem pascimus: et uos lac eius et lanam accipere uobis uultis? Sapere est de alieno labore uictum querere, si sapere est uelle quod non possis. §. 5. Item Dominus dixit discipulis suis: "In quamcumque domum intraueritis, in eadem manete, edentes et bibentes que apud illos sunt. Cum autem intraueritis, primum dicite: pax huic domui." Nos domum hanc ingressi sumus, ei pacem obtulimus: uos autem alieno cibo quasi otiosi pasci gaudetis? Videte, ne in uobis uertatur illud: "Videte quid faciat otium et alienus cibus." §. 6. Item Propheta: "Sumite psalmum et date tympanum." Isti a nobis sumunt psalmum: et uos ab eis queritis tympanum? §. 7. Item Leo IV.: "De decimis non tantum nobis, sed etiam maioribus iusto ordine uisum est plebibus tantum, ubi sacrosancta baptismata dantur, debere dari." §. 8. Quibus autem plebibus debentur? illis, a quibus baptisma accipiunt an aliis? Nos eos baptizamus, et uos ab eis decimas sumitis? Honesta interpretatio est: utinam inueniatis qui sic pro uobis interpretentur. Quia nos ergo rigamus populum hunc, imbrem doctrinae ei ministrantes, quia colimus eum uomere predicationis, corda eius ad fidem aperientes, si non uultis sinere, uel patimini eum nobis fructificare, et qualia uobis fieri non uultis nobis inferre cauete, ne, si pergitis dicere que uultis, audiatis que non uultis. III. Pars. §. 9. Ad hec: Callida quidem et multiplici argumentatione nostra iura auferre contenditis, ita ut, si fides uerbis adhiberetur; non uerba pro uerbis, sed res pro uerbis reportaretis. Sed Deo propicio, si uerba dedistis, uerba recipietis. §. 10. Arguitis nos, quod ea, que uobis debentur, subripere querimus, quia nostra persequimur. Sapientis quidem et philosophico ore prolata sententia; suum persequi est aliena rapere? Unde ad uos hec sententia manauit, nisi quia tanto ardore nostra concupiscitis, ut uestra putetis uobis auferri, cum nos nostra consequimur? Unde, cum causa nostra debitum finem sortita fuerit, exclamabitis: "Ah miser, crucior tantum bolum esse ereptum ex faucibus." Sed uidete, ne dampnum effusi unguenti uobis recompensare queratis. Constituistis uos plantatores uinearum, fossores agrorum, trituratores arearum, rigatores camporum, multa alia offitia huiusmodi uobis assumpsistis, et debita uobis obsequia a nobis subtrahi conquesti estis. Sed non negamus quod uestrum est. Boui trituranti paleae et integumenta seruantur. Sint hec uobis, et grana nobis relinquite. Pastinatores uinearum, fossores agrorum, rigatores camporum, diurna mercede accepta, prouenientes fructus dominis relinquunt. Vos ergo recepta mercede uestri operis in cottidianis oblationibus, et aliis obsequiis, que pro spiritualibus, que a uobis accipiunt, cottidie deferuntur prouenientes fructus decimationum et primiciarum nobis relinquite. §. 11. Item precepit Dominus discipulis suis, ut comederent et biberent ea, que apud auditores suos erant, sed non iussit eis, ut dominos de domibus suis eicerent, et rebus suis expoliarent. Non facile inuenies qui tales hospites libenter suscipiant. Mus in pera, ignis in sinu, serpens in gremio male suos remunerant hospites. Unde in prouerbiis dicitur: "Qui serpentem in sinu suo nutrit, percutietur ab eo." Tales inueniatis uobis hospites, quales nobis esse uultis. Non sufficit uobis edere et bibere que in domo nostra sunt, dum cottidianos fructus oblationum percipitis, ex quibus uictum et uestitum habeatis, quibus cum Apostolo deberetis esse contenti; sed non uultis, quia imitatores eius non estis; potius de domo nostra expellere, et rebus nostris nos penitus expoliare contenditis, dum nec etiam horum decimationes nobis relinquere uultis, §. 12. Ut autem uniuersaliter omnia colligantur, cuncta, que pro uobis inducta sunt, siue de laborante agricola, siue de eo, qui suis stipendiis non militat, ad hunc articulum deferimus, ut fructum uestri operis, quem adeo recipere contenditis, in oblationibus et cottidianis obsequiis istorum recipiatis, decimationes uero eorum, que nobis debentur, intactas nobis relinquite, ne, dum queritis usurpare quod uestrum non est, iusta animaduersione etiam illud cogamini amitterre, quod uobis aliquo modo uidebatur conpetere. §. 13. Quod autem hae decimationes nullo iure uobis debeantur, facile probabimus. Dicitur enim in quodam concilio: "Si quis laicus, uel clericus, seu utriusque sexus persona proprietatis suae loca etc." sicut in eodem capitulo in causa monachorum notata inueniuntur. Si ergo laicus, uel clericus, uel quelibet persona, loca suae proprietatis uendens aut donans, prouentum decimationum ab ecclesia, cui legitime assignatus est, nullo modo potest abstrahere, nec isti de diocesi transeuntes ad diocesim decimas suorum prediorum, que intra terminos nostrae parrochiae continentur, nobis auferre possunt. Quantum enim ad ius percipiendarum decimarum attinet, idem est possessorem de diocesi ad diocesim transire, quod possessionem de diocesiano ad diocesianum transferre.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. To these arguments: Even if these tithes were owed to you by right, as you assert, nevertheless an objection of thirty years imposes silence upon you. For every possession is removed by a prescription of thirty years, or of forty years, as are the possessions of religious houses, or of a hundred years, as are the estates of the holy Roman Church. Hence Pope Gelasius says, [to the Bishops of Sicily, letter II, c. 2]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Ad hec: Decimationes istae, etsi uobis iure deberentur, ut asseritis, tamen tricennalis obiectio uobis silentium inponit. Omnis enim possessio tricennaria prescriptione tollitur, uel quadragenaria (sicut possessiones religiosarum domorum) uel centenaria, sicut predia sanctae Romanae ecclesiae. Unde Gelasius Papa ait: [Episcopis Siciliae. ep. II. c. 2.]

C. I. Those things which are possessed by bishops for thirty years are claimed by them by right.

Let bishops claim by right for themselves the resources of the church, and also dioceses, which are possessed by some of them and which the law of thirty years has concluded, because the authority of our sons the princes has also issued in such a way that beyond thirty years no one is permitted to appeal concerning that which the period of the laws has excluded. GRATIAN. But they argue to the contrary: By the authority by which you impose silence upon us, by that authority we close your mouths. For the same Gelasius says: “By no presumption the status of parishes, etc.” Therefore, if a temporal objection cannot tear apart a diocese once constituted, it is evident that it will not protect you either, so that, by changing the status of our parish, you may claim for yourselves by a claimable usurpation tithes once lawfully assigned to us. But how these authorities are to be distinguished will be found in the cause concerning monks. PART II. § 1. Now it is asked concerning the right of conducting funerals: which of these churches has the right of burying these persons? As Jerome writes, married persons appear to be placed in one tomb. For he says:

C. I. Que triginta annis ab episcopis possidentur iure ab eis uendicantur.

Facultates ecclesiae, nec non et dioceses, que ab aliquibus possidentur episcopis, iure sibi uendicent, quod tricennalis lex conclusit, quia et filiorum nostrorum principum ita emanauit auctoritas, ut ultra XXX. annos nulli liceat pro eo appellare, quod legum tempus exclusit. Gratian. At illi econtra: Cuius auctoritate nobis silentium inponitis, eius auctoritate claudimus uestra ora. Ait enim idem Gelasius: "Nulla presumptione statum parrochiarum etc." Si ergo temporalis obiectio diocesim semel constitutam diuellere non potest, patet, quod nec uobis patrocinabitur, ut, statum nostrae parrochiae mutantes, decimationes quondam nobis legitime assignatas uindicabili usurpatione uobis uendicetis. Quomodo autem distinguendae sint hae auctoritates, in causa monachorum inuenietur. II. Pars. §. 1. Nunc queritur de iure funerandi, que harum ecclesiarum habeat ius tumulandi istos? Sicut Ieronimus scribit, coniugati in uno sepulcro uidentur esse ponendi. Ait enim:

C. II. Children are to be placed in the tomb of their parents.

Hebron is said to be the city of three men, because three patriarchs were buried in it, in the double cave with their three wives, that is, Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, Jacob and Leah, besides Adam himself and Eve his wife. Tobias says to his son: "When God has received my soul, you shall bury my body, and you shall honor your mother all her days; and when she has completed her time, you shall bury her beside me in one tomb." The same: § 1. Let one tomb join those whom one marriage joined, because they are one flesh, and let man not separate those whom God joined.

C. II. In sepulcro parentum filii sunt collocandi.

Ebron dicitur esse ciuitas trium uirorum, quia in ea sepulti sunt tres patriarchae, in spelunca duplici cum tribus uxoribus suis, id est Abraham et Sara, Ysaac et Rebecca, Iacob et Lia, preter ipsum Adam et Euam uxorem suam. Tobias dicit ad filium suum: "Cum acceperit Deus animam meam, corpus meum sepelies, et honorem habebis matri tuae omnibus diebus, et cum ipsa conpleuerit tempus suum, sepelies eam iuxta me in uno sepulcro." Idem: §. 1. Quos coniunxit unum coniugium coniungat unum sepulcrum, quia una caro sunt, et quos Deus coniunxit homo non separet.

[C. III.]

Likewise Augustine. PART III. Let every woman follow her husband, whether in life or in death. Likewise Gregory: § 1. The sister of Saint Benedict was buried in the tomb which he had prepared for himself, so that burial might not separate the bodies of those whose mind had always been one in the Lord. GRATIAN. Likewise Joseph, dying in Egypt, asked his brothers that at the time of His visitation they should carry his bones with them and place them in the tomb of his fathers. § 1. Likewise, it was said to the prophet who, contrary to the command of the Lord, had eaten in Bethel after being forbidden: "Your corpse shall not be brought into the tomb of your fathers." § 2. Likewise, it is read of certain persons in the Book of Kings: "He died and was laid with his fathers," that is, in the tomb of his fathers. § 3. Likewise, in the New Testament it is read that blessed Philip built himself a tomb in which he and his daughters rested. § 4. Likewise, blessed Severus, Archbishop of Ravenna, ordered a tomb to be made, in which he placed himself, his wife, and his daughter. § 5. From all these examples it is gathered that the bodies of children are to be placed in the burial place of their parents. Therefore, because the parents of these persons are buried at the former churches, these persons also ought to be buried at the same churches. § 6. To the contrary, Adam, as you assert, was buried in the city of Arba. But were all his children buried there? So great a multitude of the human race could not so easily be enclosed in so small a tomb. § 7. Likewise Abraham was buried there. But were Ishmael and Midian and the others whom he begot from Keturah buried there? § 8. Likewise Isaac was placed there. But was Esau buried with him? § 9. Likewise Jacob was placed there. But was any of his sons besides Joseph buried with him? Rachel also is read to have been buried not in Hebron but near Bethlehem. From the example of these persons, therefore, it is evident that children are free to be buried in the tombs of their fathers, and they are free to find lodging elsewhere for their bodies according to the suitability of places and times. Therefore, by this example these persons are not compelled to be buried in the tombs of their fathers. § 10. Likewise, it is not permitted to change things defined by laws. But things not expressed by laws follow the judgment of human will. Yet it is defined by laws to whom tithes are to be paid, and therefore the giver is not permitted to change this. But where each person is to be buried is not expressed by laws, and therefore it rests in the will of the person to be buried. Hence blessed Gregory says:

> [C. III.]
> Item Augustinus. III. Pars. Unaqueque mulier sequatur uirum suum, siue in uita siue in morte. Item Gregorius: §. 1. Soror sancti Benedicti sepulta est in sepulcro, quod ipse sibi preparauerat, ut quorum mens una fuit semper in Domino, eorum quoque corpora sepultura non separaret. Gratian. Item Ioseph, moriens in Egypto, rogauit fratres suos, ut tempore suae uisitationis ossa sua secum deferrent, et in sepulcro patrum suorum ea collocarent. §. 1. Item, dictum est Prophetae, qui contra preceptum Domini prohibitus comederat in Bethel: "Non inferetur cadauer tuum in sepulcro patrum tuorum." §. 2. Item. De nonnullis legitur in libro Regum: "Obiit et appositus est ad patres suos," hoc est in sepulcro patrum suorum. §. 3. Item. In nouo testamento legitur B. Philippus edificasse sibi sepulcrum, in quo ipse et filiae eius quieuerunt. §. 4. Item. B. Seuerus Rauennatum archiepiscopus tumulum fieri iussit, in quo se, et uxorem, et filiam collocauit. §. 5. His omnibus exemplis colligitur, quod in sepultura parentum corpora filiorum collocanda sunt. Quia ergo parentes istorum apud priores ecclesias sepulti sunt, et hi apud easdem debent tumulari. §. 6. Econtra Adam, ut asseritis, in ciuitate Arbeae tumulatus est. Sed numquid omnes filii eius sepulti sunt ibi? tanta multitudo humani generis tam breui tumulo non tam facile posset includi. §. 7. Item Abraham ibi sepultus est. Sed numquid Ismahel, et Madai, et alii, quos de Cethura genuit, ibi sepulti sunt? §. 8. Item Ysaac ibi positus est. Sed numquid Esau cum eo tumulatus est? §. 9. Item Iacob ibi collocatus est. Sed numquid aliquis filiorum eius preter Ioseph cum eo sepultus est? Rachel quoque non in Ebron, sed iuxta Bethleem tumulata legitur. Exemplo igitur istorum liquet, quod liberum est filiis sepeliri in sepulcris patrum suorum, et liberum est eis alibi pro locorum et temporum oportunitate corpori suo hospitium inuenire. Non ergo hoc exemplo isti coguntur sepeliri in sepulcris patrum suorum. §. 10. Item, que legibus diffinita sunt mutare non licet. Que autem legibus expressa non sunt arbitrium secuntur humanae uoluntatis. At legibus diffinitum est, quibus decimae sint persoluendae, et ideo danti mutare non licet. Ubi autem quisque tumulandus sit, legibus expressum non est, et ideo in uoluntate tumulandi consistit. Unde B. Gregorius ait:

C. IV. The last will of the deceased ought to be observed. The last will of the deceased is to be preserved in every way.

PART IV. GRATIAN. This is to be understood concerning a free man and not concerning a slave. For a slave cannot compose the written instrument of a testament. Hence Pope Gelasius writes to Bishop Honorius:

> C. IV. Ultima uoluntas defuncti seruari debet. Ultima uoluntas defuncti modis omnibus conseruetur.
> IV. Pars. Gratian. Quod de libero et non de seruo intelligendum est. Seruus enim testamenti paginam condere non potest. Unde Gelasius Papa scribit Honorio Episcopo:

C. V. A slave cannot make a testament.

We also wish it not to escape your sincerity that it has been reported to us that Ampliatus the leaseholder—who is established not only to be a slave of the church, but to be so entangled in accounts from many years that, even if he were freeborn, he would in every way be held liable until he had rendered all the accounts—has endeavored with rash daring to compose the written instrument of a testament, although all his peculium is not doubted to be bound by the laws to ecclesiastical right. Therefore let your fraternity oppose these presumptions in our place, and permit absolutely nothing to be done by any surreption. And if by chance anything human should befall him, since he is said to be advanced in years, let your unanimity immediately command, without delay, that his substance be delivered under a faithful inventory only to those sons of his to whom the patrimony is proved to have been committed, until he is compelled to render the lord's portions unimpaired for all the periods during which he is known to have administered this patrimony. PART V. GRATIAN. Therefore, because according to Gregory the last will of the deceased is to be preserved, their bodies are to be buried according to the will of these persons, not according to the judgment of your disposition. Likewise it is read in the Council of Tribur:

> C. V. Seruus testamentum facere non potest.
> Illud etiam sinceritatem tuam uolumus non latere, ad nos fuisse perlatum, quod Ampliatus conductor, quem non solum seruum constat esse ecclesiae, sed ita rationibus a multis temporibus inplicatum, ut, etiam si esset ingenuus, donec ratiocinia cuncta deduceret, modis omnibus obnoxius haberetur, ausu temerario molitus fuerit paginam condere testamenti, cuius omne peculium ecclesiastico iuri legibus non dubitetur obstrictum. Quapropter his presumptionibus uice nostra tua fraternitas contradicat, nec fieri prorsus aliqua subreptione permittat. Ac si eidem quicquam humanitus forte contigerit, quia grandeuus esse memoratur mox eius sine dilatione substantiam precipiat unanimitas tua filiis eius dumtaxat, quibus patrimonium probatur esse conmissum, sub fideli descriptione contradi, donec temporibus uniuersis, quibus hoc patrimonium gubernasse cognoscitur, partes dominicas reddere cogatur indempnes. V. Pars. Gratian. Quia ergo secundum Gregorium ultima uoluntas defuncti conseruanda est, pro istorum uoluntate corpora eorum sunt tumulanda, non pro arbitrio uestrae dispositionis. Item in Triburiensi Concilio legitur:

C. VI. Where each person ought to choose burial for himself.

Wherever the possibility of times or places permits, let burials be celebrated at the greater church where the seat of the bishop is. But if this appears difficult because of the harshness of the time or place, let him be buried at the church where a religious congregation of religious canons, monks, or nuns dwells in common. But if this also appears unsuitable, where anyone paid tithes while alive, there let him be buried when dead. GRATIAN. Therefore, because he paid the tithe to us while alive, he is also to be buried among us when dead. Likewise, if anyone should cross from province to province and establish a domicile for himself there, having been freed from the authority of the former judge, he would be subjected to the jurisdiction of that judge in whose province he chose a seat for himself. Therefore, because these persons passed from your diocese into ours, having been freed from your authority, they are subjected to our right. Therefore the right of conducting their funerals is ours. But that statement of Pope Melchiades is objected:

> C. VI. Ubi quisque eligere sepulturam sibi debet.

Ubicumque temporum uel locorum facultas tulerit, apud maiorem ecclesiam, ubi sedes est episcopi, sepulturae celebrentur. Si autem propter temporis uel loci asperitatem hoc difficile uisum fuerit, apud ecclesiam, quo religiosorum canonicorum, uel monachorum, uel sanctimonialium religiosa congregatio communiter degerit, sepeliatur. Si autem et hoc ineptum uisum fuerit, ubi quis decimas persoluebat uiuus, ibi sepeliatur mortuus. Gratian. Quia ergo decimam nobis persoluebat uiuus, et apud nos sepeliendus est mortuus. Item, si quis de prouincias ad prouinciam transiret, et ibi domicilium sibi collocaret, liber factus a ditione prioris iudicis, iurisdictioni illius iudicis subiceretur, in cuius prouincia sedem sibi eligeret. Quia ergo isti a uestra diocesi in nostram transierunt, liberi a uestra ditione nostro iuri subiciuntur. Nostrum ergo est ius funerandi eos. Sed obicitur illud Melciadis Papae:

C. VII. It is not permitted by one's own rashness to forsake the burial place of one's parents.

It pleased the great council in all respects that no one, by the rashness of his own judgment, take care to resort for the sake of burial to any church other than the one to which the usage of his ancient parents is reported to be subject by canonical institution, unless, hindered by illness, he has advanced into another region for any business. In addition to these things, if any prelate strives to act against them, let him know that he subjects himself to the ecclesiastical bond. GRATIAN. But it is one thing not to follow the usage of one's ancient parents from the pride of rashness, and another to choose a new burial place for oneself on a reasonable occasion. One strives against the authority of Pope Melchiades who, led by pride or hatred, or enticed by vain persuasions or various little gifts, disdains to follow the burial place of his parents. But according to Gregory, one who for a certain reason seeks a new lodging for his body has a free last will. § 1. Or, as certain persons distinguish, the last will of each person is free not in choosing burial for himself but in making a testament. Hence it is also called a testament, because by it each person freely testifies what he wishes to be done with his own goods after his death. § 2. But the will of the testator does not appear free when, according to Augustine, a testamentary distribution of resources ought to be made according to the number of children; for example, if anyone has one son, let him reckon Christ as another; but if two, let him make Christ the third, and so in order. And according to Leo, each person is ordered to leave half of the things which he bequeaths to Christ to the church at which he received the sacraments of the faith. But that statement of Augustine is not the statement of one commanding but of one dissuading, lest anyone in anger disinherit his son and leave the whole to Christ. For he says in his second sermon on the life of clerics:

C. VII. Propria temeritate sepulturam parentum relinquere non licet.

Placuit per omnia magno concilio, ut nullus proprii arbitrii temeritate aliam ecclesiam, nisi cui usus antiquorum parentum canonica institutione subiacere perhibetur, sepulturae causa adire procuret, nisi infirmitatis causa prepeditus in aliam fuerit regionem quolibet negotio progressus. Ad hec, si quis prelatus contra hec agere sategerit, ecclesiastico uinculo se subdi cognoscat. Gratian. Sed aliud est ex temeritatis superbia usum antiquorum parentum non sequi, atque aliud rationabili occasione nouam sibi sepulturam eligere. Contra Melciadis Papae auctoritatem nititur qui superbia uel odio ductus, siue uanis persuasionibus aut uariis munusculis illectus, sepulturam suorum parentum sequi contempnit. Secundum Gregorium autem liberam habet ultimam uoluntatem qui certae rationis causa nouum suo corpori querit hospitium. §. 1. Vel, ut quidam distinguunt, libera est ultima uoluntas cuiusque, non in sepultura sibi eligenda, sed in testamento conficiendo. Unde et testamentum appellatur, quia eo libere quisque testatur quid post suum decessum de propriis rebus fieri uelit. §. 2. Sed non uidetur libera testatoris uoluntas, cum secundum Augustinum pro numero filiorum debeat fieri testamentaria distributio facultatum, ueluti, si quis habet unum filium, Christum putet alterum; si uero duos, Christum faciat tertium, et sic per ordinem. Et secundum Leonem quisque medietatem eorum, que Christo testatur, ecclesiae iubetur relinquere, apud quam fidei sacramenta suscepit. Sed illud Augustini non est iubentis, sed dehortantis, ne quis iratus filium suum exheredaret, atque totum Christo relinqueret. Ait enim in II. sermone de uita clericorum:

C. VIII. A portion of the inheritance is to be offered to God according to the number of children.

If anyone is angry with his son and, dying, disinherits him, if he were living, would I not appease him? Ought I not reconcile his son to him? How, therefore, do I wish him to have peace with his son when I covet his inheritance? But plainly let him do as I have often exhorted. He has one son: let him reckon Christ as another; he has two: let him reckon Christ as the third; he has ten: let him make Christ the eleventh, and I receive it. GRATIAN. By this authority, of course, a measure is fixed for the testator, not one which he is compelled to discharge but one which he is prohibited from exceeding. PART VI. § 1. But those who are unwilling to render the offerings of the deceased are to be excommunicated.

Hence in the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 95]:

C. VIII. Pro numero filiorum pars hereditatis Deo offeratur.

Si quis irascitur filio suo, et moriens exheredat eum, si uiueret, non eum placarem? non ei filium reconciliare deberem? Quomodo ergo uolo ut cum filio suo habeat pacem, cuius appeto hereditatem? Sed plane sic faciat quod sepe hortatus sum. Unum filium habet: putet Christum alterum; duos habet: putet Christum tertium; decem habet: faciat Christum undecimum, et suscipio. Gratian. Hac nimirum auctoritate mensura testatori prefigitur, non quam cogatur exsoluere, sed quam prohibetur transscendere. VI. Pars. §. 1. Oblationes uero defunctorum qui reddere noluerint excommunicentur.

Unde in Cartaginensi Concilio IV.: [c. 95.]

C. IX. Let those who deny offerings of the deceased to churches be excommunicated.

Let those who either deny offerings of the deceased to churches or render them with difficulty be excommunicated as murderers of the needy.

C. IX. Excommunicentur qui defunctorum oblationes ecclesiis negant.

Qui oblationes defunctorum aut negant ecclesiis, aut difficulter reddunt, tanquam egentium necatores excommunicentur.

C. X. Let those faithless persons who retain offerings of the deceased be cast out of churches.

Likewise from the Council of Vaison, [I, c. 4]. Those who retain the offerings of the deceased and delay delivering them to churches are to be cast out of the church as faithless persons, because it is certain that this provocation of divine piety reaches even to the emptying of the faith, since both the faithful departing from the body are defrauded of the fulfillment of their vows and the poor of the solace of food and necessary support. Therefore such persons are to be regarded as murderers of the needy and as not believing the judgment of God. Hence one of the Fathers also inserted this into his writings, in a fitting judgment, in which he says: "To seize something from a friend is theft, but to defraud the church is sacrilege."

C. X. Ut infideles eiciantur ab ecclesiis, qui oblationes retinent defunctorum.

Item ex Concilio Varensi. [I., c. 4.] Qui oblationes defunctorum retinent, et ecclesiis tradere demorantur, ut infideles sunt ab ecclesia abiciendi, quia usque ad exinanitionem fidei peruenire certum est hanc pietatis diuinae exacerbationem, quia et fideles de corpore recedentes uotorum plenitudine et pauperes consolatu alimoniae et necessaria sustentatione fraudantur. Hii ergo tales quasi egentium necatores, nec credentes iudicium Dei habendi sunt. Unde et quidam Patrum hoc scriptis suis inseruit, congruente sententia, qua ait: "Amico quippiam rapere furtum est, ecclesiae uero fraudare sacrilegium est."

C. XI. Let those who have presumed to retain things offered to churches or left by testament be excommunicated.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 4]. Let clerics or secular persons who persist in retaining the offerings of parents, whether donated or left by testament, or who have believed that what they themselves donated to churches or monasteries is to be taken away, just as the holy synod has established, be excluded from the churches as murderers of the poor until they restore them. § 1. But if any cleric has committed theft against the church, let foreign communion be assigned to him. PART VII. GRATIAN. It is likewise asked whether anything is to be exacted for the burial of the dead. Concerning these matters Gregory writes thus in the Register to Januarius, Bishop of Sardinia:

C. XI. Qui oblata ecclesiis aut testamento relicta retinere presumpserint excommunicentur.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 4.] Clerici uel seculares, qui oblationes parentum aut donatas, aut testamento relictas retinere perstiterint, aut id, quod ipsi donauerint ecclesiis uel monasteriis, crediderint auferendum, sicut sinodus sancta constituit, uelut necatores pauperum quousque reddant ab ecclesiis excludantur. §. 1. Si quis autem clericus furtum ecclesiae fecerit, peregrina ei tribuatur conmunio. VII. Pars. Gratian. Item queritur, an pro sepultura mortuorum aliquid sit exigendum? De his ita scribit Gregorius in Registro, Ianuario, Episcopo Sardiniae:

C. XII. No gift is to be exacted for burial.

Nereida, a most illustrious woman, complained to us that your fraternity wished to exact solidi from her for the burial of her daughter. But after, by God's authorship, we attained the honor of the episcopate, we altogether forbade this vice also from our church, and we did not permit it to be usurped again through a depraved custom, mindful that when Abraham requested from the sons of Ephron, that is, from the sons of Seor, a tomb at a price for burying the body of his wife, he refused to accept a recompense, lest he appear to have obtained profit from a corpse. Therefore, if a pagan man was of such great consideration, how much more ought we, who are called priests, not to do this? Hence I admonish that this vice of avarice not be presumed to be attempted again against others. § 1. But if at any time you permit someone to be buried in your church, if indeed his parents, kinsmen, or heirs should spontaneously wish to offer anything for lights, we do not forbid it to be accepted. But we altogether prohibit anything from being requested or exacted, lest—something exceedingly irreligious—the church be said, which God forbid, to be venal, or you appear to rejoice in human deaths if you endeavor to seek gain in any way from their corpses.

C. XII. Pro sepultura nichil muneris exigendum est.

Questa est nobis Nereida clarissima femina, quod ab ea solidos pro filiae suae sepultura fraternitas uestra exigere uelit. Hoc autem uicium et nos, postquam, Deo auctore ad episcopatus honorem accessimus, de ecclesia nostra omnino uetuimus, et per prauam denuo consuetudinem nequaquam usurpari permisimus, memores, quia dum Abraham a filiis Ephron, hoc est a filiis Seor, sepulcrum precio ad humandum corpus coniugis postularet, premium accipere rennuit, ne commodum uideretur de cadauere consecutus. Si ergo tantae considerationis paganus uir fuit, quanto magis nos, qui sacerdotes dicimur, hoc facere non debemus? Unde hoc auaritiae uicium ne in alienis denuo temptari presumatur, ammoneo. §. 1. Sed si quando aliquem in ecclesia uestra sepeliri conceditis, siquidem parentes ipsius, proximi uel heredes pro luminaribus sponte quid offerre uoluerint, accipere non uetamus. Peti uero aut aliquid exigi omnino prohibemus, ne (quod ualde irreligiosum est) aut uenalis (quod absit) dicatur ecclesia, aut uos de humanis uideamini mortibus gratulari, si ex eorum cadaueribus studetis querere quolibet modo conpendium.

C. XIII. Even when compelled, we ought not to accept a price for burial.

Likewise Jerome on Genesis. After Ephron was overcome by the price, so that he sold the tomb and accepted silver, although Abraham compelled him, the letter waw, which among them is read as o, was removed from his name, and instead of Ephron he was called Ephran, Scripture signifying that he was not of consummate and perfect virtue, who was able to sell the memorial of the dead. § 1. Therefore let those who voluntarily sell tombs and are not compelled to accept a price, but extort something from the unwilling, know that their name is changed and something of their merit perishes, since even he who accepted unwillingly is secretly reproved.

C. XIII. Etiam coacti de sepultura precium accipere non debemus.

Item Ieronimus super Genesim. Postquam precio uictus est Ephron, ut sepulcrum uenderet et acciperet argentum, licet cogente Abraham, uau littera, que apud illos pro o legitur, ablata est de eius nomine, et pro Ephron appellatus est Ephran, significante scriptura, non eum fuisse consummatae perfectaeque uirtutis, qui potuerit uendere memoriam mortuorum. §. 1. Sciant igitur qui sepulcra uendunt uoluntarie, nec coguntur ut accipiant precium, sed a nolentibus quicquam extorquent, mutari nomen suum, et perire quiddam de merito eorum, cum etiam ille reprehendatur occulte, qui inuitus accepit.

C. XIV. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur, [c. 16]. For it is written in the ecclesiastical book: "Do not withhold grace from the dead, knowing that we shall all die." And likewise: "All things which have sprung from earth shall be turned back into earth." Why do you sell earth to earth? Remember that you are earth and shall return to earth, and that death is to be yours and draws near, even if it delays. Recall that the earth belongs not to man but, as the Psalmist commemorates, "The earth is the Lord's, and its fullness." If you sell the earth, you will be held guilty of invasion of property. Freely you received from God; freely give on His behalf. Therefore let it be forbidden to absolutely all Christians to sell earth to the dead and to deny the burial that is owed, unless perhaps the kinsmen and friends of the deceased should wish freely to give something for the sake of the man's name and the redemption of his soul.

C. XIV. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. [c. 16.] In ecclesiastico namque libro scriptum est: "Mortuo non prohibeas gratiam, sciens, quia omnes moriemur." Et item: "Omnia, que de terra orta sunt, in terram conuertentur." Quid terra terram uendis? memento, quod terra es, et in terram reuerteris, et quoniam mors tibi futura est, et appropiat, et si tardat. Recordare, quia non hominis terra est, sed, ut Psalmista conmemorat: "Domini est terra, et plenitudo eius." Si terram uendis, inuasione rei reus teneberis. Gratis accepisti a Deo, gratis da pro eo. Quare interdictum sit omnibus omnino Christianis terram mortuis uendere, et debitam sepulturam denegare, nisi forte proximi et amici defuncti propter nomen et redemptionem animae uiri gratis aliquid dare uelint.

C. XV. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Vaison. It is to be commanded according to the authority of the canons that they exact no gift for tombs and for persons to be buried, unless perhaps the one who is buried, while living, ordered something from his goods to be bestowed upon the church in whose churchyard he is buried, or even after his death those to whom the making of his alms was committed should wish spontaneously to give something from his goods; and nevertheless nothing shall in any way be exacted from them by the priests or by those who preside over the places and villages. § 1. It is also to be forbidden according to the institutions of our predecessors that persons be buried in no way in the church, but in the churchyard, or in the portico, or in the exedrae of the church. But within the church, or near the altar where the body and blood of the Lord are confected, let them in no way be buried.

C. XV. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Varensi. Precipiendum est secundum canonum auctoritatem, ut de sepulcris et hominibus sepeliendis nichil muneris exigant, nisi forte qui sepelitur uiuens iusserit ecclesiae, in cuius atrio sepelitur, aliquid de suis rebus tribuere, aut etiam post mortem illius, quibus conmissum est eius elemosinam facere, de rebus illius aliquid sponte dare uoluerint; et tamen nullatenus a presbiteris illis aliquid exigatur, siue ab illis, qui locis et uillis presunt. §. 1. Prohibendum est etiam secundum maiorum instituta, ut in ecclesia nullatenus sepeliantur, sed in atrio, aut in porticu, aut in exedris ecclesiae. Infra ecclesiam uero, aut prope altare, ubi corpus Domini et sanguis conficitur, nullatenus sepeliantur.

C. XVI. Those whose sins have not been forgiven are not helped after death by sacred places.

Likewise Augustine. PART VIII. Those whose sins have not been forgiven cannot be helped after death by sacred places, because, if those whom graver sins weigh down cause themselves to be buried in sacred places, it remains that they be judged for their own presumption, since the sacred places do not free them, but the guilt of rashness accuses them.

C. XVI. A sacris locis non iuuantur post mortem, quibus peccata dimissa non sunt.

Item Augustinus. VIII. Pars. Quibus peccata dimissa non sunt, a sacris locis post mortem adiuuari non possunt, quia quos peccata grauiora deprimunt, si in sacris locis se sepelire faciunt, restat, ut de sua presumptione iudicentur, quatinus eos sacra loca non liberant, sed culpa temeritatis accusat.

C. XVII. To whom it is profitable to be buried in a church.

Likewise Gregory, [book IV of the Dialogues, c. 50]. When grave sins do not weigh them down, then it profits the dead if they are buried in churches, because, whenever their kinsmen come to those same sacred places, they also behold the burial place of their own, remember them, and pour out prayers to the Lord for them. For the bodies of those whom grave sins weigh down are placed in churches for a greater accumulation of condemnation rather than for their release.

C. XVII. Quibus prosit in ecclesia sepeliri.

Item Gregorius. [lib. IV. Dial. c. 50.] Cum grauia peccata non deprimunt, tunc prodest mortuis, si in ecclesiis sepeliantur, quia eorum proximi, quociens ad eadem sacra loca ueniunt, suorum quoque sepulturam aspiciunt, recordantur et preces pro eis Domino fundunt. Nam quos peccata grauia deprimunt ad maiorem cumulum dampnationis potius quam ad solutionem eorum corpora in ecclesiis ponuntur.

C. XVIII. Who may be buried in a church.

Likewise from the Council of Mainz, [I, c. 52]. Let no dead person be buried within a church unless bishops, abbots, worthy priests, or faithful laymen. GRATIAN. But what profits the dead from being buried beside a church, and what reaches them, Augustine shows in the book On the Care to Be Taken for the Dead, [last chapter], saying:

C. XVIII. Qui sepeliantur in ecclesia.

Item ex Concilio Magunciensi. [I. c. 52.] Nullus mortuus infra ecclesiam sepeliatur, nisi episcopi, aut abbates, aut digni presbiteri, uel fideles laici. Gratian. Quid uero mortuis prosit iuxta ecclesiam sepeliri quidue ad eos perueniat, Augustinus in libro de agenda cura pro mortuis [cap. ult.] ostendit, dicens.

C. XIX. Why the dead are buried beside a church.

Let us not think that anything reaches the dead for whom we take care except that which we solemnly supplicate for them by the sacrifices either of the altar, of prayers, or of alms, although these do not profit all for whom they are done, but only those who, while they live, cooperate so that they may profit them. But because we do not discern who they are, it is fitting that these things be done for all the regenerated, so that none of those to whom these benefits can and ought to reach may be passed over. For it is better that these things be superfluous to those whom they neither harm nor profit than that they be wanting to those whom they profit. § 1. Nevertheless, each person acts more diligently for his own necessary ones, so that the like may be done for him by his own. § 2. But whatever is expended upon burying the body is not a safeguard of salvation but an office of humanity, according to the affection by which no one ever hates his own flesh. Hence it is fitting that one take whatever care he can for the flesh of his neighbor when he who took care of it has departed from it. And if those who do not believe the resurrection of the flesh do these things, how much more ought those who believe to do them, so that an office of this kind expended upon the body—yet upon it as one that will rise again and remain in eternity—may also be in some manner a testimony of the same faith. § 3. But as to the fact that each person is buried at the memorials of the martyrs, this alone appears to me to profit the deceased: that, by commending him also to the patronage of the martyrs, the affection of supplication for him may be increased. GRATIAN. To the contrary Jerome, [on the Epistle to the Galatians, c. 6, upon the words "Each shall bear his own burden"]:

C. XIX. Quare mortui iuxta ecclesiam sepeliantur.

Non estimemus ad mortuos, pro quibus curam gerimus, peruenire, nisi quod pro eis siue altaris, siue orationum, siue elemosinarum sacrificiis solempniter supplicamus, quamuis non omnibus prosint pro quibus fiunt, sed his tantum, pro quibus dum uiuunt, cooperantur ut prosint. Sed quia non discernimus, qui sint, oportet ea pro regeneratis omnibus facere, ut nullus eorum pretermittatur, ad quos hec beneficia possint et debeant peruenire. Melius enim supererunt ista his, quibus nec obsunt, nec prosunt, quam eis deerunt, quibus prosunt. §. 1. Diligentius tamen facit quisque pro necessariis suis, quo pro illo fiat similiter a suis. §. 2. Corpori autem humando quicquid inpenditur non est presidium salutis, sed humanitatis offitium, secundum affectum, quo nemo umquam carnem suam odio habet. Unde oportet, ut quam potest pro carne proximi curam gerat, cum ille inde recesserit, qui gerebat. Et si hec faciunt qui carnis resurrectionem non credunt, quanto magis debent facere qui credunt? ut corpori, sed tamen ut resurrecturo et in eternitate mansuro, inpensum huiusmodi offitium sit etiam quodammodo eiusdem fidei testimonium. §. 3. Quod uero quisque apud memorias martirum sepelitur, hoc tantum michi uidetur prodesse defuncto, ut conmendans eum etiam martirum patrocinio affectus supplicationis pro illo augeatur. Gratian. Contra Ieronimus: [in epistolam ad Galat. c. 6. ad ea uerba: Unusquisque onus suum.]

C. XX. After death the prayers of the living do not profit.

In the present age we know that we can help one another either by prayers or by counsels. But when we have come before the tribunal of Christ, neither Job nor Daniel nor Noah will be able to entreat for anyone, but each shall bear his own burden. GRATIAN. But this is to be understood concerning the impenitent, of whom the Prophet says: "He shall not give his propitiation to God, nor the price of the redemption of his soul, and therefore a brother shall not redeem him, but he shall labor forever and shall live unto the end." But it cannot be understood concerning others.

Hence Gregory to Archbishop Boniface:

C. XX. Post mortem orationes non prosunt uiuentium.

In presenti seculo scimus siue orationibus siue consiliis inuicem posse nos adiuuari. Cum autem ante tribunal Christi uenerimus, nec Iob, nec Daniel, nec Noe rogare posse pro quoquam, sed unumquemque portare onus suum. Gratian. Verum hoc de inpenitentibus accipiendum est, de quibus propheta: "Non dabit Deo placationem suam, nec precium redemptionis animae suae, et ideo frater non redimet eum, sed laborabit in eternum, et uiuet in finem." De aliis autem intelligi non potest.

Unde Gregorius Bonifatio Archiepiscopo:

C. XXI. The good works of the living profit those who died in penitence.

For you are known to have consulted concerning those who are dying, whether it is permitted that offerings be offered for them. Holy church holds thus: that each person offer offerings for the truly Christian dead and that the priest make commemoration of them; and although we are all subject to sins, it is fitting that a priest make commemoration and intercede for the Catholic dead. Nevertheless it shall not be permitted to do any such thing for the impious, although they had been Christians.

C. XXI. In penitencia defunctis bona prosunt uiuentium.

Pro obeuntibus quippe consuluisse cognosceris, si liceat pro eis oblationes offerri. Sancta sic tenet ecclesia, ut quisque pro mortuis uere Christianis offerat oblationes, atque presbiter eorum faciat memoriam, et quamuis peccatis omnes subiaceamus, congruit, ut sacerdos pro mortuis catholicis memoriam faciat et intercedat; non tamen pro inpiis (quamuis Christiani fuerint) tale quid agere licebit.

C. XXII. The souls of the dead are released in four ways.

The same. The souls of the deceased are released in four ways: either by the offerings of priests, or by the prayers of saints, or by the alms of dear ones, or by the fasting of kinsmen. § 1. But the care of the funeral, the condition of burial, and the pomp of the obsequies are consolations of the living rather than aids of the dead. If a costly burial profits an impious man, a cheap burial or none will harm a pious man. § 2. Yet the bodies of the deceased, and especially of the righteous, are not therefore to be despised and cast away. § 3. There it is also salutarily learned how great the recompense can be for the alms which we furnish to the living and sentient, if even that which the diligence of duty renders to the limbs of men devoid of life does not perish before God.

C. XXII. Quatuor modis soluuntur animae mortuorum.

Idem. Animae defunctorum quatuor modis soluuntur, aut oblationibus sacerdotum, aut precibus sanctorum, aut karorum elemosinis, aut ieiunio cognatorum. §. 1. Curatio uero funeris, conditio sepulturae, pompa exequiarum, magis sunt uiuorum solatia quam subsidia mortuorum. Si aliquid prodest inpio sepultura preciosa, oberit pio uilis aut nulla. §. 2. Nec ideo tamen contempnenda sunt corpora et abicienda defunctorum, maximeque iustorum. §. 3. Ubi et illud salubriter discitur, quanta possit esse remuneratio pro elemosinis, quas uiuentibus et sentientibus exhibemus si neque hoc apud Deum perit, quod exanimis hominum membris offitii diligentia persoluitur.

C. XXIII. Before the day of judgment the dead are aided by sacrifices and alms.

Likewise Augustine in the Enchiridion, [cc. 109 and 110]. The time placed between the death of a man and the final resurrection contains souls in hidden receptacles, according as each is worthy either of rest or of distress, on account of what it obtained in the flesh while it lived. Nor is it to be denied that the souls of the deceased are relieved by the piety of their living kin when the sacrifice of the Mediator is offered for them or alms are made in the church. But these things profit those who, when they lived, merited that afterward these things could profit them. § 1. For there is a certain manner of living neither so good that it does not require these things after death nor so evil that these things do not profit it after death. But there is a manner so good that it does not require these things, and there is again a manner so evil that it cannot be aided by them when this life has passed. Therefore every merit is acquired here by which someone can be relieved or burdened after this life. And a little later: § 2. When sacrifices of the altar or of any alms whatsoever are offered for all the baptized, they are thanksgivings for the very good, propitiations for those who are not very evil, and for the very evil, even if they are no aid to the dead, nevertheless they are consolations of the living. But for those whom they profit, they profit either so that there may be full remission or certainly so that the condemnation itself may be made more tolerable.

PART IX. GRATIAN. But concerning the observance of the third, seventh, thirtieth, or fortieth day, it is asked whence it took its origin. Ambrose in the book On the Death of Emperor Theodosius:

C. XXIII. Ante diem iudicii sacrificiis et elemosinis mortui iuuantur.

Item Augustinus in Enchiridion. [c. 109. et 110.] Tempus, quod inter hominis mortem et ultimam resurrectionem interpositum est, animas abditis receptaculis continet, sicut queque digna est uel requie, uel erumpna, pro eo quod sortita est in carne dum uiueret. Neque negandum est, defunctorum animas pietate suorum uiuentium releuari, cum pro illis sacrificium mediatoris offertur, uel elemosinae fiunt in ecclesia. Sed eis hec prosunt, qui, cum uiuerent, hec sibi ut postea possent prodesse meruerunt. §. 1. Est enim quidam uiuendi modus, nec tam bonus, ut non requirat ista post mortem, nec tam malus, ut ei ista post mortem non prosint. Est uero talis in bono, ut hec non requirat, et est rursus talis in malo, ut nec his ualeat, cum hec uita transierit, adiuuari. Quocirca omne hic meritum conparatur, quo possit post uitam releuari quispiam uel grauari. Et post pauca: §. 2. Cum sacrificia altaris siue quarumcumque elemosinarum pro baptizatis omnibus offeruntur, pro ualde bonis gratiarum actiones sunt, pro non ualde malis propiciationes sunt, pro ualde malis, etiam si nulla sunt adiumenta mortuorum, tamen uiuorum consolationes sunt. Quibus autem prosunt aut ad hoc prosunt, ut sit plena remissio, aut certe, ut tollerabilior fiat ipsa dampnatio.

IX. Pars. Gratian. De obseruatione autem tertii, septimi, tricesimi uel quadragesimi diei queritur, unde exordium sumpserit? Ambrosius in libro de obitu Theodosii Inperatoris:

C. XXIV. Why certain days are observed in the commemoration of the dead.

Because some have been accustomed to observe the third day, others the seventh, others the thirtieth, and others the fortieth in the offices of the dead, let us consider what the reading teaches. "When Jacob died," it says, "Joseph commanded his servants the embalmers that they should bury him, and the embalmers buried Israel, and forty days were fulfilled. For thus the days of burial are numbered. And he mourned him for seven days." Therefore that solemn observance which the reading prescribes is to be followed. But it is also written in Deuteronomy: "The children of Israel mourned Moses for thirty days, and the days of mourning were completed." Therefore each observance has authority, by which the necessary office of piety is fulfilled. PART X. GRATIAN. But Cyprian forbids mourning and being sorrowful both for our own death and for that of others, saying:

C. XXIV. Quare certi dies in mortuorum conmemoratione seruentur.

Quia alii tertium diem, alii septimum, alii tricesimum, alii quadragesimum obseruare consueuerunt in offitiis mortuorum, quid doceat lectio consideremus. "Defuncto, inquit, Iacob, precepit Ioseph pueris suis sepultoribus, ut sepelirent eum, et sepelierunt sepultores Israel, et repleti sunt quadraginta dies. Sic enim dinumerantur dies sepulturae. Et luxit eum septem diebus." Hec ergo sequenda sollempnitas, quam prescribit lectio. Sed etiam in Deuteronomio scriptum est: "Quia planxerunt filii Israel Moysen triginta diebus, et consummati sunt dies luctus." Utraque ergo obseruatio habet auctoritatem, qua necessarium pietatis inpletur offitium. X. Pars. Gratian. Lugere autem et tristari tam pro nostra quam pro aliorum morte Ciprianus prohibet dicens.

C. XXV. We ought to be sorrowful neither for our own death nor for that of others.

How preposterous and how perverse it is that, when we ask that the will of God be done, when He calls and summons us from this world, we do not immediately obey the command of His will, but resist and struggle, and after the manner of obstinate servants are brought to the sight of the Lord with sadness and grief, departing from here by the bond of necessity, not by the obedience of will, and wish to be honored with heavenly rewards by Him to whom we come unwillingly. The same: § 1. To us also, the least and last, how often has it been revealed, how frequently and manifestly has it been commanded by God's condescension that I should testify continually and preach publicly that brothers set free from the world by the Lord's summons are not to be mourned, since we know that they are not lost but sent ahead, that in departing they precede us, as those setting out, as those sailing, are accustomed to do.

C. XXV. Nec pro nostra, nec pro morte aliorum tristari debemus.

Quam preposterum est quamque peruersum, ut cum Dei uoluntatem fieri postulemus, quando euocat nos et accersit de hoc mundo, non statim uoluntatis eius inperio pareamus, obnitimur et reluctamur, et peruicacium more seruorum ad conspectum Domini cum tristitia et merore perducimur, exeuntes istinc necessitatis uinculo, non uoluntatis obsequio, et uolumus ab eo premiis celestibus honorari, ad quem uenimus inuiti. Idem: §. 1. Nobis quoque ipsis minimis et extremis quociens reuelatum est, quam frequenter atque manifeste de Dei dignatione preceptum est, ut contestarer assidue, ut publice predicarem, fratres non esse lugendos accersione dominica de seculo liberatos, cum sciamus non amitti, sed premitti, recedentes precedere, ut proficiscentes, ut nauigantes solent.

C. XXVI. Mourning the dead occurs from faintheartedness.

Likewise John Chrysostom, on the Epistle to the Hebrews. Wherever we may be buried, the earth is the Lord's and its fullness. Let that, namely, which ought to be done be accomplished. But to mourn, deplore, and lament those who depart from this life occurs from faintheartedness.

GRATIAN. But this is understood of despair concerning the future resurrection. Hence the Apostle also does not say simply, "We do not wish you to be ignorant concerning those who sleep, that you may not be sorrowful," but adds, "as also the others who have no hope." For we are not prohibited from mourning the dead from an affection of piety and a regard for humanity, just as we read that some of the saints expended pious tears upon the obsequies of others. Hence Pope Anastasius also, [letter II to Nerius]:

C. XXVI. Ex pusillanimitate mortuos lugere contingit.

Item Iohannes Crisostomus, in epistola ad Ebreos. Ubicumque sepeliamur, Domini est terra et plenitudo eius. Scilicet quod oportet fieri efficiatur. Lugere autem et deplorare et lamentari eos, qui de hac uita decedunt, ex pusillanimitate contingit.

Gratian. Hoc autem ex desperatione futurae resurrectionis intelligitur. Unde et Apostolus non simpliciter ait: "Nolumus uos ignorare de dormientibus, ut non contristemini," sed addidit: "sicut et ceteri, qui spem non habent." Pietatis namque affectu et humanitatis intuitu mortuos lugere non prohibemur, sicut nonnullos sanctorum aliorum exequiis pias lacrimas inpendisse legimus. Hinc etiam Anastasius Papa: [ep. II. ad Nerianum]

C. XXVII. Those who have hope of the future resurrection ought not to be excessively sorrowful concerning the dead.

Perhaps those who do not know another life, who do not trust that the passage from this world is to something better, have a just excuse for prolonged grief. But we who believe and teach this ought not to be excessively sorrowful concerning the dying, lest that which among others bears the appearance of piety should rather be a fault in us. For it is in some manner a kind of distrust to lament, contrary to that which each person preaches, while loving justice, as the Apostle says: "But we do not wish you to be ignorant concerning those who sleep, that you may not be sorrowful as also the others who have no hope."

C. XXVII. Qui spem futurae resurrectionis habent de mortuis nimium tristari non debent.

Habent forsitan illi iustam longi doloris excusationem, qui uitam alteram nesciunt, qui de hoc seculo ad melius esse transitum non confidunt. Nos autem, qui hoc credimus et docemus, contristari nimium de obeuntibus non debemus, ne quod apud alios pietatis tenet speciem, hoc magis nobis in culpa sit. Nam diffidentiae quodammodo genus est contra hoc, quod quisque predicat, querere, iustitiam amans, dicente Apostolo: "Nolumus autem uos ignorare de dormientibus, ut non contristemini, sicut et ceteri, qui spem non habent."

C. XXVIII. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Third Council of Toledo, [c. 22]. Those who depart from this life by divine summons ought to be carried to the tomb only with psalms and the voices of those singing psalms. But let it suffice that the service of divine canticles is expended upon the bodies of Christians in hope of the resurrection. The holy Apostle forbids us to mourn the deceased, saying: "But concerning those who sleep, I do not wish you to be sorrowful, as also the others who have no hope." And the Lord did not weep for the dead Lazarus, but wept for him who was to be raised again to the miseries of this life. If a bishop can forbid this to all Christians, let him not delay to act. Nevertheless, we judge that it ought in no way to be done otherwise for religious persons. For thus the bodies of deceased Christians ought to be buried throughout the whole world. PART XI. GRATIAN. It is also asked concerning the dead whether they know the things which are done here by the living. Isaiah says in the person of the afflicted people: "Abraham our father did not know us." Augustine also testifies to the same in the book On the Care to Be Taken for the Dead, saying, [c. 15]:

> C. XXVIII. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano III. [c. 22.] Qui diuina uocatione ab hac uita recedunt, cum psalmis tantummodo et psallentium uocibus debent ad sepulcrum deferri. Sufficiat autem, quod in spe resurrectionis Christianorum corporibus famulatus diuinorum inpenditur canticorum. Prohibet nos sanctus Apostolus lugere defunctos, dicens: "De dormientibus autem nolo uos contristari, sicut et ceteri, qui spem non habent." Et Dominus non fleuit mortuum Lazarum, sed ad huius uitae erumpnas plorauit resuscitandum. Si autem potest hoc episcopus omnibus Christianis prohibere, non moretur agere. Religiosis tamen omnino aliter fieri non debere censemus. Sic enim Christianorum per omnem mundum humari oportet corpora defunctorum. XI. Pars. Gratian. De mortuis etiam queritur, utrum sciant ea, que hic a uiuis geruntur? Ysaias ex persona populi afflicti ait: "Abraham pater noster nesciuit." Augustinus quoque in libro de agenda cura pro mortuis illud idem testatur, dicens: [c. 15.]

C. XXIX. The dead do not know of themselves the things which are done here.

It must be confessed that the dead indeed do not know what is done here while it is done here; but afterward they hear from those who proceed from here to them by dying—not indeed all things, but those things which these are permitted to remember and which it is fitting that those to whom they report them should hear. The dead can also hear something from the angels who are present at the things which are done here, according as He to whom all things are subject judges that each of them ought to hear. § 1. Many also believe that some of the dead come to the living, just as, conversely, divine Scripture testifies that Paul was caught up from the living into paradise. PART XII. GRATIAN. But concerning those who are suspended on gibbets, it is asked whether they are to be buried beside a church. Concerning them it was established thus in the Council of Mainz, [II, under Rabanus, c. 27]:

> C. XXIX. Mortui ex se nesciunt que hic geruntur.
> Fatendum est, nescire quidem mortuos quid hic agatur, sed dum hic agitur; postea uero audire ab eis, qui hinc ad eos moriendo pergunt, non quidem omnia, sed que sinuntur etiam isti meminisse et que illos quibus hec indicant, oportet audire. Possunt et ab angelis, qui rebus, que hic aguntur, presto sunt, audire aliquid mortui, quod unumquemque illorum audire debere iudicat cui cuncta subiecta sunt. §. 1. Multi quoque ad uiuos aliquos ex mortuis uenire credunt, sicut e contrario Paulum ex uiuis in paradisum raptum esse diuina scriptura testatur. XII. Pars. Gratian. De his autem, qui in patibulis suspenduntur, queritur, an iuxta ecclesiam sint sepeliendi? De quibus in Magonciensi Concilio [II. sub Rab ano, c. 27.,] ita statutum est:

C. XXX. Communion is not to be denied to those who are suspended on gibbets.

It was asked by some brothers concerning those who are suspended on gibbets for their crimes after confession made to God, whether their corpses are to be carried to churches, offerings are to be offered for them, and Masses are to be celebrated, or not. To them we respond: If communion is to be given at the end, according to the precepts of the canons, to all who make pure confession of their sins and worthily repent, why do the canons interdict communion or burial to those who have paid the final penalty for their sins and confess or desire to confess? For it is written: "God does not judge twice for the same thing."

C. XXX. Non est deneganda communio his, qui in patibulis suspenduntur.

Quesitum est ab aliquibus fratribus de his, qui in patibulis suspenduntur pro suis sceleribus post confessionem Deo peractam, utrum cadauera eorum ad ecclesias deferenda sint, et oblationes pro eis offerendae, et missae celebrandae, an non? Quibus respondemus, si omnibus de peccatis suis puram confessionem agentibus et digne penitentibus communio in fine secundum canonum precepta danda est, cur canones communionem uel sepulturam eis interdicunt, qui pro peccatis suis penam extremam persoluerunt et confitentur, uel confiteri desiderant? Scriptum est enim: "Non iudicat Deus bis in id ipsum."

[PALEA. C. XXXI.

Thieves and robbers, if they are killed while stealing or plundering, it has seemed good that prayer not be made for them. If, after being captured or wounded, they have confessed to a priest or deacon, we do not deny them communion.]

[PALEA.

[PALEA. C. XXXI.

Fures et latrones, si in furando aut depredando occidantur, uisum est pro eis non orandum. Si conprehensi aut uulnerati presbitero uel diacono confessi fuerint, communionem eis non negamus.]

[PALEA.

C. XXXII. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans. If a thief or robber caught in plunder can be captured without killing, and nevertheless he is killed, because they were created in the image of God and baptized in His name, their killers shall not enter the church for forty days. Clothed in woolen garments, let them abstain from foods and drinks which are forbidden, from the marriage bed, from the sword, and from riding. On Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday let them use in turn and temperately some kind of legumes or vegetables, fruits, and small fish, with moderate beer.

But if it is proved by truthful witnesses that, without premeditation of hatred, in freeing themselves and their own they killed members of the devil who could not be captured, we do not impose penance for homicide upon them, unless they themselves should wish to do something that belongs to humanity. But if he is a priest, let him not be deposed; nevertheless let him do penance all the days of his life.]

> C. XXXII. De eodem.
>
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. Si fur aut latro captus in preda absque occisione potest conprehendi, et tamen interficitur, quia ad imaginem Dei creati et in nomine eius baptizati sunt, interfectores eorum quadraginta diebus non intrent ecclesiam. Lanea ueste induti ab escis et potibus, qui interdicti sunt, a toro, a gladio, ab equitatu se abstineant. In tertia, quinta feria et sabbato aliquo genere leguminum uel olerum, et pomis, paruisque pisciculis, cum mediocri cereuisia uicissim utantur et temperate.
> Sin autem a ueridicis conprobatur testibus, quod sine odii meditatione se suaque liberando diaboli membra interfecerint, et capi non poterant, penitenciam pro homicidio eis non iniungimus, nisi ipsi uoluerint aliquid quod humanitatis est facere. At si presbiter est, non deponatur; cunctis tamen diebus uitae suae penitenciam agat.]

Causa XIV

GRATIAN. The canons of a certain church raise a question concerning estates; they produce witnesses from their own brothers; they lent money to merchants so that they might receive profits from their wares. (QUESTION I.) It is asked whether it is permitted for them to reclaim their own things. (QUESTION II.) Second, whether those witnesses are to be heard. (QUESTION III.) Third, whether that is to exact usury. (QUESTION IV.) Fourth, whether clerics or laymen are permitted to demand usury from anyone. (QUESTION V.) Fifth, whether alms can be made from usury. (QUESTION VI.) Sixth, whether usurers are able to do penance unless they restore what they received evilly.

> GRATIANUS. Canonici cuiusdam ecclesiae questionem mouent de prediis; testes ex fratribus suis producunt; negociatoribus pecuniam crediderunt, ut ex eorum mercibus emolumenta acciperent. (Qu. I.) Queritur, an liceat eis repetere sua? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an illi testes sint audiendi? (Qu. III.) Tertio, an illud sit usuras exigere? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, an liceat clericis uel laicis a quolibet usuras expetere? (Qu. V.) Quinto, an elemosinae de usuris fieri possint? (Qu. VI.) Sexto, an usurarii penitenciam agere ualeant, nisi quod male acceperunt restituant.

Question I

GRATIAN. That they cannot reclaim their own things appears capable of being proved easily. For the Lord says in the Gospel: “If you wish to be perfect, go and sell all that you have and give to the poor.” Therefore, because these persons undertake the way of perfection, it is not permitted for them to have things of their own. Much less, therefore, is it permitted for them to reclaim them, because that which it is not permitted to possess ought not to be reclaimed. § 1. Likewise: “If anyone wishes to take away your tunic and contend with you in judgment, leave him your cloak also.” § 2. Likewise the Apostle in the Epistle to the Corinthians: “Therefore, if you have secular judgments, it is altogether a sin in you.” § 3. Likewise Gregory, expounding “All things are lawful for me, but I shall be brought under the power of none,” says: “When the mind follows desires that have been conceived, it is convicted of serving the things by whose love it is overcome.”

> GRATIANUS. Quod sua repetere non possint, facile posse probari uidetur. Ait enim Dominus in euangelio: "Si uis perfectus esse, uade, et uende omnia, que habes, et da pauperibus." Quia ergo isti iter perfectionis arripiunt, non licet eis sua habere. Multo ergo minus licet eis repetere, quia non debet repeti quod possideri non licet. §. 1. Item: "Si quis uoluerit tunicam tuam tollere, et in iudicio tecum contendere, dimitte ei et pallium." §. 2. Item Apostolus in epistola ad Corinthios: "Secularia igitur iudicia si habueritis, omnino peccatum est in uobis." §. 3. Item Gregorius exponens: "Omnia mihi licent, sed ego sub nullius redigar potestate," inquit: "Cum mens concepta desideria sequitur, seruire rebus conuincitur, quarum amore superatur."

C. I. Let a bishop, even when summoned, not litigate for transitory things.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 19]. Let a bishop, even when summoned, not litigate for transitory things. GRATIAN. Therefore, because those who are perfect are prohibited generally from contending in judgment, it is evident that these persons are not permitted to stand before a judge. § 1. To these matters reply is thus made: One who is perfect is prohibited from standing in judgment for the purpose of capturing gain, but not for avoiding loss. Or otherwise: It is one thing to possess one's own things and another to be the procurator of things held in common. Canons do not possess things of their own, because things offered to God belong to no individual. For they use the goods of the church not as their own but as things entrusted to them for dispensation. Hence Prosper in the book On the Contemplative Life: "The priest to whom the care of dispensation has been committed, etc." Seek this in the cause of him from whom money was exacted for entry into a monastery. Therefore, just as these persons do not possess their own things, so neither do they reclaim their own things, but the goods of the church whose administration they conduct. Similarly, the fact that they are prohibited from contending in judgment is to be understood thus: namely, that they do not stand before a judge for themselves, but for others. But we read that some of the saints stood before a judge for others and petitioned the judge for them. These persons, however, stand not for themselves but for the poor, for whose necessities they reclaim things that will be profitable; and thus they are not prohibited from standing before a judge. § 2. But that statement of the Gospel, "If anyone takes your tunic from you, etc.," belongs not to one commanding but to one exhorting. Hence Augustine says, [book XIX Against Faustus, c. 25]:

C. I. Pro rebus transitoriis episcopus prouocatus non litiget.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 19.] Episcopus nec prouocatus pro rebus transitoriis litiget. Gratian. Quia ergo generaliter perfectis prohibetur in iudicio contendere, patet, quod istis non licet stare coram iudice. §. 1. His ita respondetur: prohibetur perfecto in iudicio stare captando lucrum, sed non euitando dampnum. Vel aliter: Aliud est sua possidere, aliud est communium procuratorem esse. Canonici non possident sua, quia res Deo oblatae non sunt alicuius. Utuntur enim rebus ecclesiae, non ut suis, sed tamquam ad dispensandum sibi creditis. Unde Prosper in libro de uita contemplatiua: "Sacerdos, cui dispensationis cura conmissa est, etc." require in causa eius, a quo pro ingressu monasterii pecunia exigebatur. Sicut ergo isti non sua possident, ita nec sua repetunt, sed res ecclesiae, quarum procurationem gerunt. Similiter quod in iudicio prohibentur contendere sic intelligendum est, uidelicet, ut non sibi stent coram iudice, sed aliis. Aliis autem coram iudice astitisse, et pro eis iudicem interpellasse nonnullos sanctorum legimus. Hi autem non sibi stant, sed pauperibus, quorum necessitatibus profutura repetunt, et ita non prohibentur stare coram iudice. §. 2. Illud uero euangelii: "Si quis abstulerit tibi tunicam, etc." non precipientis est, sed exhortantis. Unde Augustinus ait: [lib. XIX. contra Faustum, c. 25.]

C. II. One who exacts beyond what is owed sins, not one who reclaims what is owed to him.

What is owed, although it is kindly remitted, is nevertheless not unjustly reclaimed. But one who exacts beyond what is owed sins, and therefore the law, fixing a measure, established the penalty of retaliation. But you are as far from the sin of an unjust exactor as you do not exact at all what is owed, and therefore the good Master says: "To him who strikes you on the cheek, offer the other also," especially lest we ourselves also be compelled to render what is owed by Him who owes nothing. [GRATIAN.] Thus you will understand the other things also.

> C. II. Peccat, qui ultra debitum exigit, non qui sibi debita reposcit.
> Quod debetur, etsi benigne remittitur, non tamen inique repetitur. Peccat autem qui exigit ultra debitum, ideoque lex modum figens penam talionis instituit. Sed tu eo longe es a peccato iniusti exactoris, quo omnino non exigis debitum, ideoque bonus magister ait: "Qui te percutit in maxillam, prebe ei et alteram," presertim ne cogamur et ipsi reddere debitum ab eo, qui nullum habet debitum. [Gratian.] Sic et cetera accipies.

[C. III.]

The same, On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount. Whoever does not obey precepts is guilty and liable to punishment. And a little later: § 1. Not to obey a precept of the Lord is a sin; and if you are unwilling to use a counsel, you will attain less good. Likewise Gregory in the letter to Jovinian: § 2. That which is prescribed is commanded; that which is commanded must necessarily be done; if it is not done, it has punishment. § 3. Where counsel is given, there is the choice of the one making an offering; where there is a precept, there is the necessity of the one serving.

> [C. III.]
>
> Idem de sermone domini in monte. Quisquis preceptis non obtemperat, reus est et debitor penae. Et paulo post: §. 1. Precepto Domini non obedire peccatum est; et consilio si uti nolueris, minus boni adipisceris. Item Gregorius in epistola ad Iouinianum: §. 2. Quod precipitur inperatur; quod inperatur necesse est fieri; si non fiat, penam habet. §. 3. Ubi consilium datur, offerentis arbitrium est; ubi preceptum, necessitas seruientis.

Question II

GRATIAN. But concerning what is asked, whether they can produce witnesses from their own brothers, it appears to be prohibited by many authorities. For the laws both of the sacred canons and of secular princes prohibit a witness from one's own household from being produced against another. For each person can testify against himself, but by no means for himself. Therefore, because these persons are produced so that they may bear testimony for themselves—for they do not think that they will be wholly exempt from the utility of their church—it is evident that their voice in such matters is not to be heard. But this distinction and examination of witnesses is to be observed in criminal causes; in civil causes, however, not in every respect. For in a criminal cause it is not permitted for a witness from one's own household to be produced, but in a civil cause it is permitted to prelates of the church. Hence Paschal II writes to Guy, Archbishop of Vienne and legate of the apostolic see, saying:

GRATIANUS. De eo autem, quod queritur, an de suis fratribus testes possint producere, multis auctoritatibus uidetur esse prohibitum. Leges enim tam sacrorum canonum quam secularium principum prohibent aduersus alium testem de sua domo produci. Contra se enim quisque testari potest, pro se uero minime. Quia ergo isti producuntur, ut pro se ipsis testimonium ferant, (non enim suae utilitatis ecclesiae se penitus inmunes arbitrantur futuros, patet, quod eorum uox in talibus non est audienda. Sed distinctio hec et testium examinatio in criminalibus causis seruanda est; in ciuilibus autem non usquequaque. In criminali enim causa non licet testem de domo propria produci, in ciuili autem prelatis ecclesiae licet. Unde Pascalis II. Guidoni, Archiepiscopo Viennensi, apostolicae sedis Legato scribit, dicens:

C. I. Clerics can bear testimony for their church.

We wonder greatly at your prudence because in the matter of blessed Stephen you were unwilling to accept the testimony of those clerics themselves. For the kinds of causes are diverse, nor are crimes treated in all causes. In crimes, indeed, that strictness concerning accusers and witnesses which is contained in the canons is to be observed, lest members of the household be assumed for proof. But in matters of possessions or affairs of this kind, those especially are to be assumed who conducted those same affairs, concerning whose hearing and sight there ought to be no hesitation. Therefore, if those same clerics are suitable for the assertion of that cause, let them in no way be removed, but, as was determined by other letters, let that dispute between the canons of Saint John and Saint Stephen be decided more fully. GRATIAN. It can also be understood otherwise. Let members of a household not be admitted for proof, namely so that they bear testimony for those whose household members they are. But let these persons, just as was said above concerning plaintiffs, give testimony not for members of their household but for the church, which is the mother of all the poor. But in the making of instruments of secular transactions, let priests not be called as witnesses; but if by chance it should happen that they were present at a contract, let them give testimony at the command of the bishop. Hence it was established in the synod held at Rome by Pope Eugene [II, c. 13]:

C. I. Clerici pro sua ecclesia testimonium ferre possunt.

Super prudentia tua plurimum admiramur, quod in negocio B. Stephani clericorum ipsorum acceptare nolueris testimonium. Diuersae sunt namque species causarum, nec in omnibus causis crimina agitantur. In criminibus siquidem accusatorum et testium illa districtio obseruanda est, que in canonibus continetur, ne qui ad probationem domestici assumantur. Ceterum in possessionum uel huiusmodi negociis hi potissimum assumendi sunt, qui eadem negocia tractauerunt, de quorum auditu et uisu hesitatio esse non debeat. Si ergo idem clerici idonei sunt ad assertionem causae illius, nullatenus remoueantur, sed, sicut aliis litteris deliberatum est, inter S. Iohannis et S. Stephani canonicos lis illa plenius decidatur. Gratian. Potest etiam intelligi aliter. Domestici ad probationem non admittantur, ut pro his uidelicet, quorum sunt domestici, testimonium ferant. Hii autem (sicut supra de actoribus dictum est) non pro domesticis, sed pro ecclesia, que mater est omnium pauperum, testimonium dicant. In conficiendis autem instrumentis secularium negociorum presbiteri non uocentur ad testimonium, sed, si casu contractui eos interfuisse acciderit, iubente episcopo testimonium dicant. Unde in Sinodo habita Romae ab Eugenio Papa [II.] statutum est: [cap. 13.]

C. II. Priests are not to be called as witnesses in the making of instruments.

Although the testimony of priests is held credible, nevertheless they are not to be asked as witnesses in secular transactions themselves for the making of instruments, because it is not fitting for them to be involved in such matters. But if by some event they have been involved in a cause and have seen or heard something, where no suitable secular persons are found, lest the truth be concealed and an evil man be esteemed as good, let it be within the providence of their own bishop that they testify honorably to the truth either before him and competent judges or in another manner.

> C. II. In conficiendis instrumentis sacerdotes ad testimonium non uocentur.
> Quamquam sacerdotum testimonium credibile habeatur, tamen in ipsis secularibus negociis pro conficiendis instrumentis ad testimonium non rogentur, quia eos talibus rebus interesse non conuenit. Si autem euentu aliquo causae interfuerint, et aliquid uiderint uel audierint, ubi nullae idoneae secularium personae inueniantur, ne ueritas occultetur, et malus ut bonus estimetur, in prouidentia proprii sit episcopi, ut aut coram se et conpetentibus iudicibus, aut aliter ueritatem honorifice testificentur.

Question III

GRATIAN. But that to pursue profits beyond the principal is to exact usury is proved by the authority of Augustine, who writes on Psalm 36, [at the verse "All day long"], saying:

> GRATIANUS. Quod autem preter summam emolumenta sectari sit usuras exigere, auctoritate Augustini probatur, qui in psalmo XXXVI. [ad. uers. "Tota die"] scribit, dicens:

C. I. One who seeks more than he gave receives usury.

If you lend at interest to a man—that is, if you give your money as a loan—from whom you expect more than you gave, not money alone but anything more than you gave, whether it be wheat, wine, oil, or anything else, if you expect to receive more than you gave, you are a usurer and in this are to be condemned, not praised.

> C. I. Qui plus quam dederit expetit usuras accipit.
>
> Si feneraueris hominem, id est si tu mutuum dederis pecuniam tuam, a quo plus quam dedisti expectes, non pecuniam solam, sed aliquid plus quam dedisti, siue illud triticum sit, siue uinum, siue oleum, siue quodlibet aliud, si plus quam dedisti expectes accipere, fenerator es, et in hoc inprobandus, non laudandus.

C. II. Whatever is exacted above what was given is usury.

Likewise Jerome on Ezekiel, book VI, [at c. 18]. Certain persons think that usury exists only in money. Foreseeing this, divine Scripture removes the excess of every thing, so that you do not receive more than you gave. Likewise: § 1. Others are accustomed to receive little gifts of various kinds for money lent at interest, and they do not understand that Scripture calls usury and excess whatever it is, if they have received more than what they gave.

> C. II. Quicquid supra datum exigitur, usura est.
> Item Ieronimus super Ezechielem, libro VI. [ad. c. 18.] Putant quidam usuras tantum esse in pecunia. Quod prouidens diuina scriptura omnis rei superhabundantiam aufert, ut plus non recipias quam dedisti. Item: §. 1. Alii pro pecunia fenerata solent munuscula diuersi generis accipere, et non intelligunt scripturam usuram appellare et superhabundantiam quicquid illud est, si ab eo, quod dederint, plus acceperint.

C. III. Whatever accrues to the principal is usury.

Likewise Ambrose, On Naboth. Many, evading the precepts of the law, when they have given money to merchants, do not exact usury in money, but receive profits from their wares as though they were interest. Therefore let them hear what the law says: "You shall accept neither usury," it says, "of foods, nor of any things." Likewise: § 1. Food is usury, clothing is usury, and whatever accrues to the principal is usury; and whatever name you wish to impose upon it, it is usury. Likewise: § 2. If anyone thinks that a banquet is to be furnished, he sends to a merchant so that he may bring him freely a small cup of absinthe wine; he directs a request to an innkeeper for Picene or Tyrian wine; to a butcher, so that he may procure a sow's womb for him; to another, so that he may prepare fruits for him.

> C. III. Quicquid sorti accidit usura est.
> Item Ambrosius de Nabuthe. Plerique refugientes precepta legis cum dederint pecuniam negotiatoribus, non in pecunia usuras exigunt, sed de mercibus eorum tamquam usurarum emolumenta percipiunt. Ideo audiant quid lex dicat: "Neque," inquit, "usuram, escarum accipies, neque omnium rerum." Item: §. 1. Esca usura est, et uestis usura est, et quodcumque sorti accidit usura est; et quodcumque uelis ei nomen inponas, usura est. Item: §. 2. Si quis instaurandum conuiuium putet, ad negociatorem mittit, ut absinthiati cupellam sibi gratis deferat, ad cauponem dirigit, ut Picenum uinum aut Tiriacum requirat; ad lanium, ut uuluam sibi procuret; ad alium, ut sibi poma adornet.

C. IV. When more is exacted than is given, usury is received.

Likewise from the Council of Agde. Usury exists where more is sought than what is given. For example, if you give ten solidi and seek more, or give one modius of grain and exact something in addition. GRATIAN. Behold, it is shown evidently that whatever is exacted beyond the principal is usury.

> C. IV. Quando amplius exigitur quam detur, usura accipitur.
> Item ex Concilio Agatensi. Usura est, ubi amplius requiritur quam quod datur. Verbi gratia, si solidos decem dederis, et amplius quesieris, uel dederis frumenti modium unum, et super aliquid exegeris. Gratian. Ecce euidenter ostenditur, quod quicquid ultra sortem exigitur usura est.

Question IV

GRATIAN. But that neither clerics nor laymen are permitted to exact usury is proved by the authority of Gelasius and others. For Pope Gelasius says, writing to the clerics throughout Lucania and Sicily, [c. 17]:

> GRATIANUS. Quod uero nec clericis, nec laicis liceat usuras exigere, probatur auctoritate Gelasii et aliorum. Ait enim Gelasius Papa, scribens clericis per Lucaniam et Siciliam: [c. 17.]

C. I. Let clerics abstain from the gains of trade.

Let clerics know that they are to abstain from unworthy gains and to cease from every contrivance or cupidity of any kind of trade. But in whatever rank they may be, if they are unwilling to cease, let them soon be compelled to abstain from clerical offices.

> C. I. A questibus negociationis clerici abstineant.

Clerici ab indignis questibus nouerint abstinendum, et ab omni cuiuslibet negociationis ingenio uel cupiditate cessandum. In quocumque uero gradu sint, si cessare noluerint, mox a clericalibus offitiis abstinere cogantur.

C. II. Let ministers who lend at interest be excommunicated.

Likewise from the First Council of Arles, which Pope Sylvester confirmed, [c. 12]. Concerning ministers who lend at interest, it has pleased us, according to the form divinely given, that they abstain from communion.

C. II. Excommunicentur ministri, qui fenerantur.

Item ex Concilio Arelatensi I., quod confirmauit Siluester Papa. [c. 12.] Ministri, qui fenerantur, placuit iuxta formam diuinitus datam eos a communione abstinere.

C. III. Let those who wish to be in the clergy abstain from the pursuit of trade.

Likewise from the Council of Tarragona, [c. 2]. It has been confirmed by the statutes of the canons that whoever wishes to be in the clergy shall not employ the pursuit of buying more cheaply and selling more dearly. But if he wishes to practice it, let him be restrained from the clergy.

C. III. Qui uolunt esse in clero a studio negociationis abstineant.

Item ex Concilio Terraconensi. [c. 2.] Canonum statutis firmatum est, ut quicumque in clero esse uoluerit emendi uilius et uendendi karius studio non utatur. Quod si exercere uoluerit, cohibeatur a clero.

C. IV. Let one exacting usury or excess be removed from the clergy.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 62]. If anyone, having forgotten the fear of the Lord and of the sacred Scriptures, which say, "He did not give his money at usury," after this recognition of the great council lends at interest or exacts a hundredth, or seeks shameful profit from any transaction, or through diverse kinds of wine or produce or any thing receives any increases by buying or selling, let him, cast down from his rank, be regarded as alien to the clergy.

C. IV. Alienetur a clero usuras aut superhabundantiam exigens.

Item ex Concilio Martini papae. [c. 62.] Si quis oblitus timorem Domini, et sacrarum scripturarum, que dicunt: "Pecuniam suam non dedit ad usuram, post hanc cognicionem magni concilii fenerauerit uel centesimam exegerit, aut ex quolibet negocio turpis lucri quesierit, aut per diuersas species uini, uel frugis, uel cuiuslibet rei, emendo uel uendendo aliqua incrementa susceperit, de gradu suo deiectus alienus habeatur a clero.

C. V. For money which he gave as a loan, let a cleric receive commodities at a just price.

Likewise from the same. If any cleric has loaned a solidus in a time of necessity, let him receive from wine or grain that which at the appointed time shall have been determined to be sold for the sake of trading. But if he has not had the necessary commodity, let him receive that very thing which he gave, without any increase.

C. V. Pro pecunia, quam dedit mutuo clericus, iusto precio species recipiat.

Item ex eodem. Si quis clericus in necessitate solidum prestiterit, hoc de uino uel frumento accipiat, quod mercandi causa tempore statuto decretum fuerit uenundare. Ceterum si speciem non habuerit necessariam, ipsum quod dedit, sine ullo augmento recipiat.

C. VI. Let a cleric not receive more than he lent.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 16]. Let none of the clerics receive more than he lent; if money, let him receive money; if a commodity, let him receive the same commodity that he gave; and whatever else, let him receive as much as he gave.

C. VI. Clericus non plus accipiat quam conmodauit.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 16.] Nullus clericorum amplius accipiat quam conmodauit; si pecuniam, pecuniam accipiat, si speciem, eandem speciem, quam dedit, accipiat, et quicquid aliud tantum, quantum dedit, accipiat.

C. VII. [VIII.] Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea, [c. 17]. Since many clerics, pursuing shameful gains for the sake of avarice, have forgotten the divine precept in which it was said, "He did not give his money at usury," this holy council has established that, if anyone is found after this determination to receive usury, or to pursue shameful gains from any such transaction, or even to give kinds of grain at one and a half times their amount, everyone who has attempted anything of this kind for gain shall be cast down from the clergy and regarded as alien to ecclesiastical rank.

C. VII. [VIII.] De eodem.

Item ex Niceno Concilio. [c. 17.] Quoniam multi clerici, auaritiae causa turpia lucra sectantes, obliti sunt diuini precepti, quo dictum est: "Qui pecuniam suam non dedit ad usuram," statuit hoc sanctum concilium, ut, si quis inuentus fuerit post hanc diffinitionem usuras accipere, uel ex quolibet tali negotio turpia lucra sectari, uel etiam species frumentorum ad sescuplum dare, omnis, qui tale aliquid conatus fuerit ad questum, deiciatur a clero, et alienus habeatur ab ecclesiastico gradu.

C. VIII. [VII.] Usury is condemnable even in laymen.

Likewise Pope Leo, [letter I, c. 3]. Nor have we thought that this also should be passed over: there are certain persons captured by cupidity for shameful gain who employ money at usury and wish to become rich by interest. We grieve that this applies, not to say only to those established in clerical order, but even to laymen who desire to be called Christians. We decree that this be avenged more sharply upon those who have been convicted, so that every opportunity of sinning may be taken away.

C. VIII. [VII.] Etiam laicis usura dampnabilis est.

Item Leo Papa. [epist. I. c. 3.] Nec hoc quoque pretereundum duximus, esse quosdam turpis lucri cupiditate captos qui usurariam exercent pecuniam, et fenore uolunt ditescere. Quod nos ut non dicamus in eos, qui sunt in clericali ordine constituti, sed etiam in laicos cadere, qui se Christianos dici capiunt, condolemus. Quod uindicari acrius in eos, qui fuerint confutati, decernimus, ut omnis peccandi oportunitas adimatur.

C. IX. One who buys for less so that he may sell for more pursues shameful profit.

Likewise Pope Julius. Whoever, in the time of harvest or vintage, purchases grain or wine not from necessity but because of cupidity—for example, purchases one modius for two denarii and preserves it until it may be sold for four or six denarii or more—this we call shameful profit.

> C. IX. Turpe lucrum sequitur, qui minus emit, ut plus uendat.
> Item Iulius Papa. Quicumque tempore messis uel uindemiae non necessitate, sed propter cupiditatem conparat annonam uel uinum, uerbi gratia de duobus denariis conparat modium unum, et seruat, usque dum uendatur denariis quatuor aut sex, aut amplius, hoc turpe lucrum dicimus.

C. X. One who receives usury commits robbery.

Likewise Ambrose in the book On the Good of Death, [c. 12]. If anyone receives usury, he commits robbery; he does not live life.

> C. X. Rapinam facit qui usuram accipit.
> Item Ambrosius in libro de bono mortis. [c. 12.] Si quis usuram accipit, rapinam facit, uita non uiuit.

C. XI. One who slaughters a poor man by interest is no less cruel than one who seizes something from a rich man.

Likewise Augustine to Macedonius, [letter LIV]. What shall I say concerning usuries, which even the laws themselves and judges command to be repaid? Is one who withdraws or seizes something from a rich man more cruel than one who slaughters a poor man by interest? These things indeed, and things of this kind, are certainly possessed evilly, and I would wish that they be restored, but there is no judge before whom they may be reclaimed. But now let us consider prudently what is written: "For a faithful man the whole world is riches, but for an unfaithful man not even a small coin"; do we not convict all those who seem to themselves to rejoice in things acquired and do not know how to use them of possessing what belongs to another? For certainly that which is possessed by right does not belong to another; but that is possessed by right which is possessed justly, and that justly which is possessed well. Therefore everything that is possessed evilly belongs to another; but one who uses evilly possesses evilly. GRATIAN. Moreover, from whom usury is to be exacted Ambrose testifies, saying, [in the book On Tobit, c. 15]:

> C. XI. Non minus crudelis est qui pauperem trucidat fenore, quam qui diuiti aliqua rapit.
> Item Augustinus ad Macedonium. [ep. LIV.] Quid dicam de usuris, quas etiam ipsae leges et iudices reddi iubent? An crudelior est qui subtrahit aliquid uel eripit diuiti, quam qui trucidat pauperem fenore? Hec utique atque huiusmodi male utique possidentur, et uellem ut restituerentur, sed non est quo iudice repetantur. Iam uero prudenter intueamur quod scriptum est: "Fideli homini totus mundus diuitiarum est: infideli autem nec obolus," nonne omnes, qui uidentur sibi gaudere conquisitis, eisque uti nesciunt, alienum possidere conuincimus? Hoc enim certe alienum non est, quod iure possidetur, hoc autem iure, quod iuste, et hoc iuste, quod bene. Omne igitur, quod male possidetur, alienum est; male autem possidet qui male utitur. Gratian. Porro, a quo usurae exigendae sint, Ambrosius testatur, dicens: [in libro de Tobia, c. 15.]

C. XII. We can exact usury from one whom we harm by right.

Exact usury from him whom you deservedly desire to harm; upon him against whom arms are brought by right, usury is lawfully brought; exact usury from him whom you cannot conquer in war, whom it is no crime to kill. One who demands usury fights without iron; one who has been the usurious exactor of an enemy avenges himself upon the enemy without a sword. Therefore where there is the right of war, there is the right of usury.

> C. XII. Ab illo usuram exigere possumus, cui iure nocemus.
> Ab illo exige usuram, cui nocere merito desideras; cui iure inferuntur arma, huic legitime inferuntur usurae; quem bello uincere non potes, ab hoc usuram exige, quem non sit crimen occidere. Sine ferro dimicat qui usuras flagitat, sine gladio se de hoste ulciscitur qui fuerit usurarius exactor inimici. Ergo ubi ius belli, ibi ius usurae.

Question V

GRATIAN. PART I. But that alms are not to be made from interest or usury, nor from anything acquired evilly, Augustine testifies in the book On the Words of the Lord, tractate XXXV:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod uero elemosinae non sint faciendae ex fenore uel usuris, nec ex quolibet male acquisito, Augustinus testatur in libro de uerbis Domini tractatu XXXV.:

C. I. Alms cannot be made from usury.

Do not wish to make alms from interest and usury.

> C. I. De usuris elemosinae fieri non possunt.
> Nolite uelle elemosinas facere de fenore et usuris.

C. II. One who offers from robbery is rejected by God.

Likewise Augustine. One who sacrifices from iniquity makes a stained offering. The Most High does not approve the gifts of the iniquitous, nor does He regard the offerings of the iniquitous, nor will He be propitiated for their sins by the multitude of their sacrifices. One who offers sacrifice from the substance of the poor is as one who sacrifices the son in the sight of his father. The bread of the needy is the life of the poor man. One who defrauds him is a man of blood. One who sheds blood and one who commits fraud against a person in need are brothers.

> C. II. Oblatis de rapina reprobatur a Deo.
> Item Augustinus. Inmolans ex iniquo oblatio est maculata. Dona iniquorum non probat altissimus, nec respicit in oblationibus iniquorum, nec in multitudine sacrificiorum eorum propitiabitur peccatis. Qui offert sacrificium ex substantia pauperum, quasi qui uictimat filium in conspectu patris sui. Panis egentium uita pauperis est. Qui defraudat illum homo sanguinis est. Qui effundit sanguinem, et qui fraudem facit necessario, fratres sunt.

C. III. Nothing is to be seized from the rich so that it may be given to the needy.

Likewise Augustine in a homily. Perhaps someone thinks and says: "There are many rich Christians, avaricious and covetous; I have no sin if I take from them and give to the poor. For since they do nothing good, I shall be able to have a reward." But a thought of this kind is suggested to him by the cunning of the devil. For if he should bestow the whole of what he took, he adds to sin rather than diminishes it.

[PALEA.

> C. III. Non est aliquid rapiendum diuitibus, ut detur egenis.
>
> Item Augustinus in Omelia. Forte aliquis cogitat et dicit: Multi sunt Christiani diuites, auari, cupidi; non habeo peccatum, si illis abstulero, et pauperibus dedero. Unde enim illi nil boni agunt, mercedem habere potero. Sed huiusmodi cogitatio ei Diaboli calliditate suggeritur. Nam si totum tribuat quod abstulerit, potius peccatum addit quam minuat.
>
> [PALEA.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Jerome. No one who plunders is saved when dying if he has the means from which to make restitution. If he is unable to find those to whom it belonged, let him bestow it upon the church or the poor.]

[PALEA.

> C. IV. De eodem.
>
> Item Ieronimus. Nemo, qui rapit, moriens, si habet unde reddat, saluatur. Si eos, quorum fuit, inuenire non poterit, ecclesiae uel pauperibus tribuat.]
>
> [PALEA.

C. V. Concerning the same.

Likewise Ambrose. It is not permitted to purchase plunder except with the intention that it be restored to the one from whom it was taken.]

> C. V. De eodem.
>
> Item Ambrosius. Rapinam emere non licet, nisi ea intentione, ut cui est ablata reddatur.]

C. VI. One who does not return what was found commits theft.

Likewise from the same. If you found something and did not return it, you plundered it; you did as much as you could, because you did not find more. One who denies another's property would also take it if he could. § 1. God questions the heart, not the hand.

> C. VI. Furtum committit qui inuentum non reddit.
> Item eiusdem. Si quid inuenisti, et non reddidisti, rapuisti; quantum potuisti fecisti. Quia plus non inuenisti. Qui alienum negat, si posset et tolleret. §. 1. Deus cor interrogat, non manum.

C. VII. When one expends alms from permitted and well-acquired goods, it pleases God.

Likewise Gregory, [book VII, letter 110, to Syagrius]. That alms pleases the eyes of our Redeemer which is not heaped up from illicit things and iniquity, but which is expended from permitted and well-acquired goods.

C. VII. Qui de rebus concessis et bene quesitis elemosinam inpendit, illa placet Deo.

Item Gregorius. [lib. VII. epist. 110. ad Syagrium.] Elemosina redemptoris nostri oculis illa placet, que non ex illicitis et iniquitate congeritur, sed que de rebus concessis et bene acquisitis inpenditur.

C. VIII. One who does not return a thing found sins.

Likewise Jerome in the book on Leviticus. Many think that it is without sin if they retain another's property which they have found, and they say, "God gave it to me; to whom have I to return it?" Let them learn that, if anyone does not return things found, this sin is similar to robbery.

C. VIII. Peccat qui rem inuentam non reddit.

Item Ieronimus in libro Leuitici. Multi sine peccato putant esse, si alienum, quod inuenerint, teneant, et dicunt, Deus michi dedit, cui habeo reddere? Discant hoc peccatum simile esse rapinae, si quis inuenta non reddat.

C. IX. Good use does not justify things acquired unjustly.

Likewise Augustine, [book On the Good of Marriage, c. 14]. For neither, if anyone so uses fields unjustly and wrongly invaded that he makes generous alms from their fruits, does he thereby justify the robbery. § 1. Nor, if another avariciously broods over a paternal estate or one justly acquired, is the rule of civil law by which he became the lawful possessor therefore to be blamed. § 2. Nor will the perversity of a tyrannical faction be praiseworthy if it treats tyrants subjected to it with royal clemency. § 3. Nor is the order of royal power to be censured if a king rages with tyrannical cruelty. For it is one thing to wish to use an unjust power justly, and another to wish to use a just power unjustly.

C. IX. Bonus usus non iustificat iniuste quesita.

Item Augustinus. [lib. de bono coniugali, c. 14.] Neque enim si agris inique ac perperam inuasis ita quisque utatur, ut ex eorum fructibus elemosinas largas faciat, ideo rapinam iustificat. §. 1. Neque si alius ruri paterno, uel iuste quesito auarus incumbat, ideo culpanda est iuris ciuilis regula, qua possessor legitimus factus est. §. 2. Nec tirannicae factionis peruersitas laudabilis erit, si regia clementia tirannos subditos tractet. §. 3. Nec uituperetur ordo regiae potestatis, si rex tirannica crudelitate seuiat. Aliud namque est iniusta potestate iuste uelle uti, et aliud est iusta potestate iniuste uelle uti.

C. X. It is not permitted to aid one person with loss to another.

Likewise Ambrose in book [III] On Duties, [c. 9]. Finally, if one cannot be aided unless another is harmed, it is more advantageous that neither be aided than that one be burdened. And therefore it is not priestly to intervene in pecuniary causes in which it cannot happen that frequently one who is defeated is not harmed, since he thinks himself defeated by the benefit of the intercessor. Therefore it belongs to a priest to harm no one and to wish to profit all; but to be able to do so belongs to God alone.

C. X. Cum alterius detrimento alteri subuenire non licet.

Item Ambrosius in libro [III.] de offitiis. [c. 9.] Denique, si non potest alteri subueniri, nisi alter ledatur, commodius est neutrum iuuari quam alterum grauari. Ideoque in causis pecuniariis interuenire non est sacerdotale in quibus non potest fieri, quin frequenter alter ledatur, qui uincitur, quoniam intercessoris beneficio se uictum arbitratur. Sacerdotis igitur est nulli nocere, prodesse uelle omnibus; posse autem solius Dei est.

C. XI. Alms and sacrifices which are offered from crime do not please God.

Likewise Gregory in the Register, [book VII, indiction 2, letter 126, to King Reccared]. It is written: "The victims of the impious are abominable to God; the vows of the righteous are pleasing"; for in the judgment of almighty God, not what is given but by whom it is given is considered. Hence it is written: "God regarded Abel and his gifts, but He did not regard Cain and his gifts." For when Scripture was about to say that the Lord regarded the gifts, it first carefully stated that He regarded Abel. From this matter it is plainly shown that it was not the offerer who pleased because of the gifts, but the gifts because of the offerer. "For the Most High does not approve the gifts of the iniquitous, nor does He regard their offerings, nor will He be propitiated for their sins by the multitude of their sacrifices." Likewise: "The Lord is far from the impious, and He will hear the prayers of the righteous." PART II. GRATIAN. To the contrary, it is read in Exodus that the children of Israel, when about to depart from Egypt, received golden and silver vessels as a loan from their neighbors, from which they afterward built the tabernacle for the Lord. Augustine replies to these matters in the book Questions on Exodus, [question 39]:

> C. XI. Elemosinae et sacrificia non placent Deo, que offeruntur ex scelere.
> Item Gregorius in Registro. [lib. VII. Indict. 2. epist. 126. Reccaredo Regi.] Scriptum est: "Victimae inpiorum abhominabiles sunt Deo: uota iustorum placabilia;" neque enim in omnipotentis Dei iudicio quid, sed a quo detur inspicitur. Hinc est enim quod scriptum est: "Respexit Deus ad Abel, et ad munera eius; ad Cain autem et ad munera eius non respexit." Dicturus quippe, quia Dominus respexit ad munera, premisit sollicite, quia respexit ad Abel. Ex qua re patenter ostenditur, quia non offerens a muneribus, sed munera ab offerente placuerunt. "Dona quippe iniquorum non probat altissimus, nec respicit in oblationibus eorum, nec in multitudine sacrificiorum propiciabitur peccatis eorum." Idem: "Longe est Dominus ab inpiis, et orationes iustorum exaudiet." II. Pars. Gratian. Contra in Exodo legitur, quod filii Israel, exituri de Egypto, a uicinis suis acceperunt mutuo uasa aurea et argentea, ex quibus postea edificauerunt tabernaculum Domino. His respondet Augustinus in libro questionum Exodi: [quest. 39.]

C. XII. It is not permitted to seize another's property by the example of the Israelites despoiling the Egyptians.

The Lord said to Moses: "Let a man ask from his male neighbor and a woman from her female neighbor vessels of gold and silver and clothing." No one ought to think that an example is to be taken from this for despoiling a neighbor in this manner. For God commanded this, who knew what it was fitting for each person to suffer. Nor did the Israelites commit theft, but they furnished ministry to God who commanded it. PART III. GRATIAN. Likewise it is objected: To seize another's property is not against a precept, since robbery appears to be prohibited by no command of God. But by the name of theft every illicit usurpation of another's property is understood. Hence Augustine in the same book, [question 71]:

> C. XII. Non licet aliena rapere exemplo Israelitarum spoliantium Egyptios.
> Dixit Dominus ad Moysen: "Petat uir a proximo, et mulier a proxima, uasa aurea et argentea, et uestem." Non hinc quisque sumendum exemplum putare debet ad exspoliandum isto modo proximum. Hoc enim Deus iussit, qui nouerat quid quemque pati oporteat. Nec Israelitae furtum fecerunt, sed Deo iubenti ministerium prebuerunt. III. Pars. Gratian. Item obicitur: Aliena rapere non est contra preceptum: nullo siquidem Dei mandato rapina uidetur prohibita. Sed nomine furti omnis illicita usurpatio rei alienae intelligitur. Unde Augustinus in eodem libro: [quest. 71.]

C. XIII. To seize something violently is of greater punishment than to steal.

To take away secretly is punishable; to seize openly is of much greater punishment. Therefore to take from an unwilling person, whether secretly or openly, has its own precept. For by the name of theft every illicit usurpation of another's property is well understood. For He who prohibited theft did not permit robbery, but surely willed robbery also to be understood by the name of theft in the law of the Old Testament. For by the part He signified the whole: whatever of a neighbor's property is taken illicitly. GRATIAN. By these authorities it is proved that no one can make alms either from things found or from things evilly acquired. PART IV. § 1. But Augustine testifies to the contrary, [sermon XXXV On the Words of the Lord], saying:

> C. XIII. Maioris penae est uiolenter aliquid eripere, quam furari.
> Penale est occulte auferre: multo maioris penae est uisibiliter eripere. Auferre ergo nolenti, siue occulte siue palam, habet preceptum suum. Furti enim nomine bene intelligitur omnis illicita usurpatio rei alienae. Non enim rapinam permisit qui furtum prohibuit, sed utique furti nomine in lege ueteris testamenti et rapinam intelligi uoluit. A parte enim totum significauit, quicquid illicite rerum proximi aufertur. Gratian. His auctoritatibus probatur, quod neque ex rebus inuentis, neque ex male conquisitis elemosinam quisquam facere potest. IV. Pars. §. 1. Sed Augustinus contra testatur [serm. XXXV. de uerbis Domini] dicens:

C. XIV. Good can be made from things acquired evilly.

You who have something from evil, make good from it. You who have nothing from evil, do not acquire from evil. Be good, you who make good from evil; and when you have begun to do something good from evil, do not remain evil yourself. Your coins are converted into good, and do you remain evil? GRATIAN. But this is understood in many ways. For one who restores what he took illicitly makes good from evil. By the name of evil, the care and solicitude of mortals is also expressed. Therefore one makes good from evil who dispenses to the poor what he acquired with labor and solicitude, according to that saying of the Gospel: "Make friends for yourselves from the mammon of iniquity." Or that is acquired from evil which is possessed from a shameful cause, as when an astrologer profits something from the art which he teaches or from the future things which he predicts. But things which are thus acquired from evil can be converted into good. Some things are also sometimes acquired from sin which are justly expended upon the poor.

Hence Augustine to Macedonius, [letter LIV]:

> C. XIV. De male adquisitis bonum fieri potest.
> Qui habetis aliquid de malo, facite inde bonum. Qui non habetis de malo, nolite acquirere de malo. Esto tu bonus, qui facis de malo bonum, et cum ceperis aliquid boni facere de malo, noli remanere tu malus. Nummi tui conuertuntur in bonum, et tu remanes malus? Gratian. Sed hoc multipliciter intelligitur. Facit enim de malo bonum qui reddit quod illicite abstulit. Nomine etiam mali cura et sollicitudo mortalium exprimitur. De malo ergo bonum facit qui pauperibus dispensat quod cum labore et sollicitudine acquisiuit, iuxta illud euangelii: "Facite uobis amicos de mammona iniquitatis." Vel ex malo acquiritur quod ex turpi causa possidetur, ueluti cum mathematicus ex arte, quam docet, uel ex futuris, que pronunciat, nonnulla lucratur. Que uero de malo sic acquiruntur in bonum possunt conuerti. De peccato etiam aliqua nonnumquam acquiruntur, que pauperibus iuste erogantur.
> Unde Augustinus ad Macedonium: [epist. LIV.]

C. XV. Things which are acquired evilly can sometimes be expended well.

Certainly not everything that is taken from an unwilling person is taken away injuriously. For many are unwilling to render either his honor to a physician or his wage to a workman; nevertheless, those who receive these things from an unwilling person do not receive them through injury, for they would rather not be given without injury. § 1. But a judge ought not therefore to sell a just judgment, or a witness true testimony, because an advocate sells just patronage and a jurist true counsel. For the former are employed for examination between both parties; the latter stand on one side. But when judgments and testimonies, which ought not to be sold even when just and true, are sold when iniquitous and false, money is certainly received much more wickedly, because it is also given wickedly, although by willing persons. Nevertheless, one who bought a just judgment is accustomed to reclaim money badly taken from him, because the judgment ought not to have been for sale. But one who gave money for an iniquitous judgment would indeed wish to reclaim it, unless he feared or was ashamed that he had bought it. § 2. There are other persons of inferior station who not improperly receive from both parties, such as the official who is removed and the one to whom an office is assigned. Things extorted by immoderate dishonesty are accustomed to be reclaimed from these persons; and we blame those who have reclaimed such things contrary to custom more than those who received them according to custom, because many persons necessary to human affairs are either invited by benefits of this kind or retained by them. § 3. If these persons have changed their way of life or ascended to a more excellent degree of holiness, they more readily bestow upon the poor as their own the things which they acquired in this manner than restore them as another's property to those from whom they were received. § 4. But if anyone has taken anything contrary to the right of human society by thefts, robberies, calumnies, oppressions, or invasions, we judge that it is to be restored rather than donated, according to the example of Zacchaeus the publican.

> C. XV. Que male acquiruntur aliquando bene possunt expendi.
> Non sane quicquid ab inuito sumitur iniuriose aufertur. Nam plerique nec medico uolunt reddere honorem suum, nec operario mercedem; nec tamen hec qui ab inuito accipiunt, per iniuriam accipiunt, que potius per iniuriam non darentur. §. 1. Sed non ideo debet iudex uendere iustum iudicium, aut testis uerum testimonium, quia uendit aduocatus iustum patrocinium et iurisperitus uerum consilium. Illi enim inter utramque partem ad examen adhibentur: isti ex una parte consistunt. Cum autem iudicia et testimonia, que nec iusta et uera uendenda sunt, iniqua et falsa uenduntur, multo sceleratius utique pecunia sumitur, quia scelerate etiam, quamuis a uolentibus, datur. Ille tamen solet male sibi ablatam pecuniam repetere, qui iustum iudicium emit, quoniam uenale esse non debuit. Qui uero pro iniquo iudicio dedit, uellet quidem repetere, nisi timeret uel puderet emisse. §. 2. Sunt aliae personae inferioris loci, que ab utraque parte non insolenter accipiunt, sicut offitialis, et qui amouetur, et cui admouetur offitium. Ab his extorta per inmoderatam inprobitatem repeti solent; magisque reprehendimus qui talia inusitate repetiuerunt, quam qui ea de more sumpserunt, quoniam multae necessariae personae rebus humanis uel inuitantur huiusmodi commodis, uel tenentur. §. 3. Isti, si uiam uitae mutauerint, aut excellentioris conscenderint sanctitatis gradum, facilius ea, que hoc modo acquisierunt, tanquam sua pauperibus largiuntur, quam eis, a quibus accepta sunt, tamquam aliena restituant. §. 4. Qui uero contra ius societatis humanae furtis, rapinis, calumpniis, obpressionibus, inuasionibus aliqua abstulerit, reddenda potius quam donanda censemus, Zachei publicani exemplo.

Question VI

GRATIAN. PART I. But that penance cannot be done unless another's property is restored Augustine testifies in letter [LIV] to Macedonius.

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod uero penitencia agi non possit, nisi res aliena reddatur, testatur Augustinus in epistola [LIV.] ad Macedonium.

C. I. Penance is not done if another's property is not restored.

If another's property, on account of which sin was committed, can be returned and is not returned, penance is not done but feigned. But if penance is truly done, the sin will not be remitted unless what was taken is restored—if, as I have said, it can be restored. For often one who takes loses what he took, whether by suffering other evil persons or by living evilly himself, and he has nothing else from which he may make restitution. § 1. To him we certainly cannot say, "Return what you took," unless we believe that he has it and denies it. In such a case, indeed, if he suddenly undergoes certain torments while he is thought to have what he should return, there is no iniquity, because, even if he has nothing from which to return the money taken, nevertheless, while he is compelled by bodily afflictions to return it, he pays the penalties of the sin by which it was taken evilly. § 2. But it is not inhuman to intercede even for such persons, not so that another's property should by no means be restored, but lest man rage against man in vain. And a little later: § 3. But I would say this most confidently: one who intervenes for a man so that he does not restore things evilly taken, and one who does not compel a person fleeing to him to make restitution, insofar as he honorably can, is an associate in the fraud and crime. For we more mercifully withdraw our help from such persons than expend it upon them. For one who helps another to sin does not furnish help; indeed, he does not help but resists by overthrowing and suppressing. § 4. But surely we neither can nor ought on that account either to exact or to hand him over to be exacted from? We act insofar as episcopal ability grants, threatening sometimes human judgment but especially and always divine judgment. But those unwilling to make restitution whom we know both to have taken evilly and to have the means from which they may restore, we accuse, rebuke, and adjure—some privately, some publicly—according as the diversity of persons appears able to receive a diverse medicine. PART II. GRATIAN. But if anyone has consecrated another's property, he ought to restore not that same thing but its assessed value. Hence Gregory, [book VII, indiction 2, letter 58, to Fantinus the Defender]:

> C. I. Penitencia non agitur, si res aliena non restituitur.
> Si res aliena, propter quam peccatum est, reddi possit, et non redditur, penitencia non agitur, sed simulatur. Si autem ueraciter agitur, non remittetur peccatum, nisi restituatur ablatum; si, ut dixi, restitui potest. Plerumque enim qui aufert amittit, siue alios patiendo malos siue ipse male uiuendo, nec aliud habet unde restituat. §. 1. Huic certe non possumus dicere, redde quod abstulisti, nisi cum habere credimus et negare. Ubi quidem si aliquos sustinet cruciatus repente, dum existimatur habere quod reddat, non est iniquitas, quia, si non est unde reddat ablatam pecuniam, tamen, dum eam per molestias corporales reddere conpellitur, peccati quo male ablata est, penas luit. §. 2. Sed non inhumanum est etiam pro talibus intercedere non ad hoc ut minime restituantur aliena, sed ne frustra homo in hominem seuiat. Et paulo post: §. 3. Illud uero fidentissime dixerim, eum, qui pro homine ad hoc interuenit, ne male ablata restituat, et qui ad se confugientem (quantum honeste potest) ad reddendum non conpellit, socium esse fraudis et criminis. Nam misericordius opem nostram talibus subtrahimus quam inpendimus. Non enim opem fert qui ad peccandum adiuuat, ac non potius adiuuat sed obuiat subuertendo atque obprimendo. §. 4. Sed numquid nos ideo aut exigere aut exigendum tradere uel possumus uel debemus? Agimus, quantum episcopalis facultas dat, et humanum quidem nonnumquam, sed maxime ac semper diuinum iudicium comminantes. Nolentes autem reddere, quos nouimus et male abstulisse, et unde reddant habere, arguimus, increpamus, obtestamur, quosdam clam, quosdam palam, sicut diuersitas personarum diuersam uidetur posse uel accipere medicinam. II. Pars. Gratian. Si uero rem alienam quis consecrauerit, non eandem, sed estimationem eius restituere debet. Unde Gregorius: [lib. VII. Indict. 2. epist. 58. Fantino Defensori]

C. II. Let one who consecrates another's property restore its assessed value.

We have discovered that no cause existed on account of which their goods could reasonably have been occupied, and that they were consecrated without counsel and rashly. Therefore we command your Experience that, because what has once been consecrated cannot any longer be restored to them, it be the object of your diligence that the bishop himself ought to give the price. PART III. GRATIAN. But the church ought to intercede before princes for evil persons, not defend them with rash daring. Hence Gregory to Romanus the Defender, [book VII, indiction 2, letter 24]:

C. II. Qui rem alienam consecrat, eius estimationem restituat.

Conperimus, nullam extitisse causam, pro qua res eorum potuissent rationabiliter occupari, atque eas inconsulte ac temere consecrari. Idcirco experientiae tuae precipimus, ut, quia quod semel consecratum est eis non ualet ultra restitui, studii tui sit ut ipse episcopus debeat precium dare. III. Pars. Gratian. Pro malis autem apud principes ecclesia debet intercedere, non eos temerario ausu defendere. Unde Gregorius Romano Defensori: [lib. VII. Indict. 2. epist. 24.]

C. III. Let the church intercede for evil persons, not rashly defend them.

Let those who are implicated in public thefts not appear to be defended unjustly by us, lest by the daring of an indiscriminate defense we in any way transfer to ourselves the reputation of evildoers; but, insofar as befits the church, by admonishing and by employing a word of intercession, succor those whom you can, so that you both bring help to others and do not stain the reputation of holy church.

PART IV. GRATIAN. But theft is considered not so much in the quantity of the thing as in the disposition of the thief. Hence Jerome in the letter to Titus, [at c. 2]:

C. III. Ecclesia pro malis intercedat non eos temere defendat.

Hii, qui in furtis publicis inplicati sunt, a nobis non uideantur iniuste defendi, ne opinionem male agentium ex indiscretae defensionis ausu in nos ullo modo transferamus; sed quantum decet ecclesiam ammonendo, uerbum intercessionis adhibendo quibus ualetis succurrite, ut et aliis opem feratis, et opinionem sanctae ecclesiae non inquinetis.

IV. Pars. Gratian. Furtum autem non tam in quantitate rei quam in affectu furantis consideratur. Unde Ieronimus in epistola ad Titum: [ad c. 2.]

C. IV. Theft is committed not only in greater but also in lesser things.

A thief is judged not only in greater but also in lesser things. For not what was taken by theft but the mind of the thief is considered. Just as in fornication the fornication is not different on this account—whether the woman is beautiful or deformed, a maidservant or freeborn, poor or wealthy—but, whatever sort she may have been, there is one fornication, so in theft, however much anyone has taken, he incurs the crime of theft.

> C. IV. Non solum in maioribus sed etiam in minoribus furtum conmittitur.
>
> Fur autem non solum in maioribus, sed in minoribus etiam iudicatur. Non enim, quod furto ablatum est, sed mens furantis attenditur. Quomodo in fornicatione non idcirco diuersa sit fornicatio si mulier pulcra aut deformis, ancilla aut ingenua, paupera aut opulenta sed qualiscumque illa fuerit, una est fornicatio ita in furto, quantumcumque quis abstulerit, furti crimen incurrit.

Causa XV

GRATIAN. A certain cleric is said to have fallen into a carnal crime before he obtained the priestly blessing. But after he attained the priesthood, having been turned to madness, he killed a certain man. Upon recovering his health, however, he is accused before the bishop by the woman with whom he is said to have fallen. The bishop examines the case on Sunday. The priest denies the crime charged against him; he seeks the patronage of certain clerics for himself, but they furnish patronage to him not without a price. At last the bishop extorts a confession by tortures; finally, alone and without a synodal hearing, he strikes him with a sentence. (QUESTION I.) It is asked whether things done with an alienated mind are to be imputed. (QUESTION II.) Second, whether clerics are permitted to exact gifts for patronage furnished. (QUESTION III.) Third, whether he is to be condemned from the confession of the woman. (QUESTION IV.) Fourth, whether his case is to be ventilated on Sunday. (QUESTION V.) Fifth, whether compurgation is to be offered to him when he denies the charge. (QUESTION VI.) Sixth, whether his confession is to be extorted by tortures. (QUESTION VII.) Seventh, whether a bishop is able to condemn a priest without a synodal hearing. (QUESTION VIII.) Eighth, if he has confessed spontaneously or has been convicted by others that he sinned before ordination, whether he is permitted to exercise the office of the order received.

> GRATIANUS. Clericus quidam crimine carnis lapsus esse perhibetur ante, quam sacerdotalem benedictionem consequeretur. Postquam uero sacerdotium adeptus est, in furorem uersus quendam interfecit. Recuperata uero sanitate apud episcopum accusatur ab ea, cum qua lapsus esse dicitur. Episcopus autem die dominico causam examinat. Sacerdos inficiatur crimen sibi illatum; quorundam clericorum sibi patrocinia querit; illi uero non sine precio sibi patrocinantur; tandem episcopus questionibus confessionem extorquet; demum solus et absque sinodali audientia illum sententia ferit. (Qu. I.) Queritur autem, an ea, que mente alienata fiunt, sint inputanda? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an pro inpensis patrociniis liceat clericis munera exigere? (Qu. III.) Tertio, an ex mulieris confessione iste sit condempnandus? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, an die dominico eius causa sit uentilanda? (Qu. V.) Quinto, an sibi neganti purgatio sit deferenda? (Qu. VI.) Sexto, an eius confessio cruciatibus sit extorquenda? (Qu. VII.) Septimo, an absque sinodali audientia episcopus ualeat sacerdotem dampnare? (Qu. VIII.) Octauo, si sponte confessus aut ab aliis conuictus fuerit, quod ante ordinationem peccauerit, an suscepti ordinis offitium sibi exequi liceat?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. But that things done with an alienated mind are not to be imputed appears capable of being proved easily. For some sins appear to consist in the will of the mind, others in an infirmity of nature. But will, as Augustine says in book I of the Retractations, [c. 15], is a movement of the mind toward either not losing or attaining something. This was said so that by this definition one who wills might be distinguished from one who is unwilling. § 1. Therefore sins proceed from the will when they are committed by the free judgment of the mind and with the purpose of transgressing. § 2. Moreover, one infirmity is of the mind, another of the flesh. Infirmity of the mind is ignorance; infirmity of the flesh is concupiscence. But the things which proceed from either infirmity are imputed to punishment. Hence it was said of certain ignorant persons: "If anyone is ignorant, he shall be ignored." Such were those concerning whom Christ said to the Apostles: "They will put you out of the synagogue, because they will think that they offer service to God." Concerning the same persons the Apostle also writes in the Epistle to the Romans: "I bear them witness that they have zeal for God, but not according to knowledge." Nevertheless, this ignorance excuses none of them who persists in his perfidy. Things which are done through the languor of nature proceed from infirmity of the flesh; and if they were not imputed to punishment, the Apostle, burdened by the law of the flesh, would by no means say: "Unhappy man that I am, who will deliver me from the body of this death? etc." Therefore, whether sins consist in the will or in infirmity, they are always imputed to punishment. § 3. That statement of Augustine in On True Religion, [c. 14], appears contrary to this judgment: "To such an extent is sin a voluntary evil that, unless it is voluntary, it is in no way sin; and this is indeed so manifest that no scarcity of the learned and no multitude of the unlearned dissents from it." Therefore either it is to be denied that sin is committed, or it must be confessed that it is committed with the will. § 4. But the same Augustine shows in book I of the Retractations, [c. 13], that this is not to be understood generally concerning all sins, saying: "To such an extent is sin a voluntary evil that it is in no way sin if it is not voluntary. § 5. This definition can appear false; but if it is examined diligently, it is found to be most true. For that sin which is only sin must be considered, not that which is also the punishment of sin. Although even those things which not without merit are called involuntary sins, because they are perpetrated either by those who do not know or by those who are compelled, cannot be said to be altogether involuntary." The same in the same work, [book I, c. 15]: "The definition of sin which we stated—'Sin is the will to retain or obtain what justice forbids, from which it is free to abstain'—is true for this reason: because that which is only sin has been defined, not that which is also the punishment of sin."

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem ea, que alienata mente fiunt, non sint inputanda, facile uidetur posse probari. Peccata namque alia penes uoluntatem animi, alia circa naturae infirmitatem uidentur consistere. Est autem uoluntas, ut Augustinus ait in libro 1. retractationum, [cap. 15.] animi motus ad aliquid uel non amittendum, uel adipiscendum. Quod propterea dictum est, ut hac diffinitione uolens a nolente discerneretur. §. 1. Ex uoluntate itaque peccata procedunt, que libero mentis arbitrio et delinquendi proposito conmittuntur. §. 2. Porro infirmitas alia est animi, alia carnis. Infirmitas animi est ignorantia; carnis infirmitas est concupiscentia. Ex utraque autem infirmitate que procedunt inputantur ad penam. Unde de quibusdam ignorantibus dictum est: "Si quis ignorat, ignorabitur." Tales erant illi, de quibus Christus ait apostolis: "Extra sinagogam facient uos, quia arbitrabuntur obsequium se prestare Deo." De eisdem etiam Apostolus scribit in epistola ad Romanos: "Testimonium illis perhibeo, quia zelum Dei habent, sed non secundum scientiam." Nullum tamen eorum in sua perfidia perseuerantem hec ignorantia excusat. Ex carnis infirmitate procedunt que naturae languore fiunt, que, nisi inputarentur ad penam, nequaquam Apostolus lege carnis grauatus diceret: "Infelix ego homo, quis me liberabit de corpore mortis huius? etc." Siue ergo penes uoluntatem, siue penes infirmitatem peccata consistant, semper inputantur ad penam. §. 3. Cui sententiae illud Augustini de uera religione [C. 14.] contrarium esse uidetur: "Usque adeo peccatum uoluntarium malum est, ut nisi sit uoluntarium nullo modo sit peccatum, et hoc quidem adeo manifestum est, ut nulla hinc doctorum paucitas, nulla indoctorum turba dissentiat." Quare aut negandum est peccatum conmitti, aut fatendum est cum uoluntate conmitti. §. 4. Sed hoc non generaliter de omnibus peccatis intelligendum esse, idem Augustinus in 1. libro retractionum [cap. 13.] ostendit, dicens: "Usque adeo peccatum uoluntarium malum est, ut nullo modo sit peccatum, si non sit uoluntarium. §. 5. Potest uideri falsa hec diffinitio; sed si diligenter excutiatur, inuenitur uerissima. Peccatum illud quippe cogitandum est, quod tantummodo peccatum est, non quod etiam pena peccati. Quamuis et illa, que non inmerito non uoluntaria peccata dicuntur, quia uel a nescientibus, uel coactis perpetrantur, non omnino possint non uoluntaria dici." Idem in eodem: [libro c. 15.] "Diffinitio peccati quam diximus: Peccatum est uoluntas retinendi uel consequendi quod iustitia uetat unde liberum est abstinere, propterea uerum est, quia id diffinitum est, quod tantummodo peccatum est, non quod etiam pena peccati."

C. I. There are no sins of the unwilling except those of the ignorant.

The same in the book [IV] of Questions, [question 24, at c. 15 of Numbers]. It is deservedly asked: What are the sins of the unwilling? Are they those which are committed by persons who do not know, or can that which one is compelled to do also rightly be called the sin of an unwilling person? For this also is accustomed to be said to be against the will; but surely he wills that for the sake of which he does it. For example, if a person is unwilling to perjure himself, yet does so because he wishes to live when someone threatens him with death unless he does it. Therefore he wills to do it because he wills to live, and consequently he does not seek in itself to swear falsely, but to live by swearing falsely. But if this is so, I do not know whether these can be called sins of the unwilling, of the kind which here are said to be expiated. For if the matter is diligently examined, perhaps no one wills the sinning itself, but sins for the sake of something else which he wills. For all men who knowingly do what is not permitted would wish it to be permitted. To such a degree does no one seek the sinning itself for its own sake, but for that which follows from it. If these things are so, there are no sins of the unwilling except those of the ignorant, which are distinguished from sins of the willing.

C. I. Non sunt peccata uolentium, nisi nescientium.

Idem in libro [IV.] questionum. [qu. 24. ad c. 15. Numerorum] Merito queritur, que sunt peccata nolentium? utrum que a nescientibus conmittuntur, an etiam possit recte dici peccatum esse nolentis, quod facere conpellitur? Nam et hoc contra uoluntatem dici solet; sed utique uult propter quod facit; tamquam si periurare nolit, et facit cum uult uiuere, si quisquam, nisi fecerit, mortem minetur. Vult ergo facere, quia uult uiuere, et ideo non per se ipsum appetit, ut falsum iuret, sed ut falsum iurando uiuat. Quod si ita est, nescio, utrum possint ista dici peccata nolentium, qualia hic dicuntur expianda. Nam si diligenter inspiciatur, forte ipsum peccare nemo uelit, sed propter aliud quod uult peccat. Omnes quippe homines, qui scientes faciunt quod non licet, uellent licere. Usque adeo ipsum peccare nemo appetit propter hoc ipsum, sed propter illud, quod ex eo consequitur. Hec si ita se habent, non sunt peccata nolentium, nisi nescientium, que discernuntur a peccatis uolentium.

[C. II.]

From the title of the Digest concerning injuries, [law 3]. That which has been reported is equally true: those who can suffer an injury can also commit one. Certainly there are some who cannot commit one, such as a madman and a minor who is not capable of fraud. For these are accustomed to suffer injury, not to commit it. For since injury consists in the disposition of the one acting, it will follow that these persons, whether they strike someone or utter an insult, do not appear to have committed an injury. Therefore someone can suffer an injury even if he does not perceive it; but no one can commit one unless he knows that he is committing an injury, even if he does not know to whom he does it. Hence, if anyone strikes another in play or while competing, he is not held liable for injuries. If anyone has beaten a free man while he thinks him his own slave, he is in such a position that he is not held liable for injuries. GRATIAN. Therefore, as appears from the foregoing, whether sins proceed from the will or from infirmity, it is manifest that they are imputed. But infirmity of the flesh is understood in two ways. For there is a languor of nature which is called the concupiscence of the flesh, which can more truly be called an infirmity of the soul; but it is called an infirmity of the flesh for this reason, because it happens to the soul from the corruption of the flesh joined to it. Moreover, there is another infirmity which is properly called of the flesh, by which, when the harmony of the elements or humors has been disturbed, the flesh itself is afflicted and at last dissolved. § 1. Similarly infirmity of the mind is twofold: one which is called vice, by which the soul is separated from God, such as anger, hatred, and other things of this kind; another infirmity of the soul which, although it is not itself sin, is nevertheless a punishment and a cause of sin, such as forgetfulness and ignorance. But madness, although it is not sin, is nevertheless a punishment of sin, as are fever and the other passions which we properly say are of the flesh; the movements of these, that is, the things which are done while they disturb a person, are imputed to no one for punishment. § 2. But an objection is raised concerning Lamech, who, when he was blind, killed Cain, and the infirmity of blindness did not excuse him. Hence it was said: "Sevenfold vengeance shall be given for Cain; for Lamech, seventy-sevenfold." But blindness is similar to ignorance. § 3. For from each certain things are done which are imputed, but certain others which are by no means imputed. For if a blind man, believing that he renders the debt to his own wife, defiles another woman, he is not guilty of adultery. But if, while throwing a javelin in play, in an exercise of strength, or in hunting, he kills someone, because this ought to be altogether foreign to him, he is held guilty of homicide. But a mind alienated by madness, since it is not in possession of itself, does not contract guilt for the things which it commits, because it did not have the capacity to deliberate. Hence aid is given to a ward and to a madman in cases of wrongdoing, so that things which did not proceed from mental deliberation are not imputed to them for punishment. This is known to be approved not only by human laws but also by divine laws. For Augustine says concerning little children, [in the book On Faith to Peter the Deacon, c. 30]:

[C. II.]

Digestorum titulo de iniuriis. [I. 3.] Illud relatum pereque est, eos, qui iniuriam pati possunt, et facere posse. Sane sunt quidam, qui facere non possunt, utputa furiosus, et inpubes, qui doli capax non est. Namque hi pati iniuriam solent, non facere. Cum enim iniuria ex affectu facientis consistat, consequens erit dicere, hos, siue pulsent siue conuicium dicant, iniuriam fecisse non uideri. Itaque pati quis iniuriam, etiamsi non sentiat, potest; facere uero nemo, nisi qui scit se iniuriam facere, etiam si nesciat cui faciat. Quare si quis per iocum percutiat, aut dum certat, iniuriarum non tenetur. Si quis liberum hominem ceciderit, dum putat seruum suum, in ea causa est, ne iniuriarum teneatur. Gratian. Ut itaque, ex premissis apparet, siue ex uoluntate siue ex infirmitate peccata procedant, palam est illa inputari. Sed carnis infirmitas dupliciter intelligitur. Est enim languor naturae, qui carnis concupiscentia appellatur, que uerius animae infirmitas dici potest, sed ideo carnis infirmitas dicitur, quia accidit animae ex coniunctae carnis corruptione. Porro alia est infirmitas, que proprie carnis dicitur, qua (elementorum seu humorum concordia turbata) caro ipsa afficitur, et tandem dissoluitur. §. 1. Similiter animi infirmitas duplex est: una, que uicium appellatur, qua anima a Deo separatur, ut est ira, odium, et alia huiusmodi; alia infirmitas animae, que, cum ipsa non sit peccatum, est tamen pena, et causa peccati, ut est obliuio et ignorantia. Furor autem, cum non sit peccatum, est tamen pena peccati, ut febris et ceterae passiones, quas proprie carnis dicimus esse, quarum motus, id est ea, que illis perturbantibus fiunt, nulli inputantur ad penam. §. 2. Sed obicitur de Lamech, qui, cum cecus esset, Cain interfecit, nec eum excusauit cecitatis infirmitas. Unde dictum est: "Septuplum ultio dabitur de Cain; de Lamech septuagies septies." Sed cecitas ignorantiae similis est. §. 3. Ex utraque enim quedam fiunt, que inputantur, quedam uero que minime. Cecus namque, si debitum suae uxori se credens reddere alienam polluit, non est reus adulterii. Si autem ludo, uel exercitatione uirium, uel uenatione iaculum mittens aliquem perimat, quia ab eo hoc penitus debet esse alienum, homicidii reus habetur. Mens uero alienata furore, cum sui conpos non sit, eorum, que admittit, reatum non contrahit, quia facultatem deliberandi non habuit. Unde pupillo et furioso in maleficiis subuenitur, ut non eis inputentur ad penam que ex mentis deliberatione non processerunt. Quod non solum humanis, sed etiam diuinis legibus noscitur adprobatum. Ait enim Augustinus de paruulis: [in lib. de fide ad Petrum Diaconum, cap. 30.]

[C. III.]

"Hold most firmly and doubt in no way that, except for those who are baptized in their own blood for the name of Christ, no man will receive eternal life who has not here been converted from his evils through penance and faith and freed through the sacrament of faith and penance, that is, through baptism; and that for adults it is indeed necessary both to do penance for their evils, to hold the Catholic faith according to the rule of truth, and to receive the sacrament of baptism; but for little children, who are not yet able by their own will to believe or to do penance for the sin which they draw by origin, the sacrament of faith, which is holy baptism, suffices for salvation so long as their age cannot be capable of reason." [GRATIAN.] But from what is said at the end of this authority —"so long, namely, as their age cannot be capable of reason"—it is evidently given to be understood that sins are imputed to no one after baptism, whether he is an adult or a minor, unless he is capable of reason. Hence concerning brute animals also the same reason is rendered by Augustine in the same book, [c. 3], why their deeds are not imputed to them: "For the animals," he says, "complete the course or adornment of the present age according to the incomprehensible will of the Creator; they will render no account concerning their deeds, because they are not rational. For is God concerned about oxen? But men, because they were made rational, will render account to God both concerning themselves and concerning all the things which they received for the use of the present life, and according to the quality of their acts they will receive either punishment or glory." Nevertheless, by the authority of sacred law animals are ordered to be killed, not because of a consciousness of sin, but because they renew the memory of the deed. Hence Augustine on Leviticus, [at c. 20, question 74]:

[C. III.]

"Firmissime tene et nullatenus dubites, exceptis illis, qui pro nomine Christi suo sanguine baptizantur, nullum hominem accepturum uitam eternam, qui non hic a malis suis fuerit per penitenciam fidemque conuersus, et per sacramentum fidei et penitenciae, id est per baptismum, liberatus; et maioribus quidem necessarium esse et penitenciam de malis suis agere et fidem catholicam secundum regulam ueritatis tenere, et sacramentum baptismatis accipere: paruulis uero, qui necdum propria uoluntate credere, nec penitenciam pro peccato, quod originaliter trahunt, agere possunt, sacramentum fidei, quod est sanctum baptisma, quamdiu rationis eorum etas capax esse non potest, sufficere ad salutem." [Gratian.] Ex eo autem, quod in fine huius auctoritatis dicitur: "Quamdiu scilicet rationis eorum etas capax esse non potest," euidenter datur intelligi, nulli post baptismum peccata inputari, siue sit adultus siue inpubes, nisi rationis sit capax. Unde etiam de brutis animalibus eadem ratio ab Augustino in eodem libro [c. 3.] redditur, quare sua facta eis non inputentur: "Animalia, inquit, enim seculi presentis cursum aut ornatum secundum creatoris incomprehensibilem uoluntatem peragunt, que de suis factis nullam rationem redditura sunt, quia rationabilia non sunt. Numquid enim de bubus cura est Deo? Homines uero, quia rationales sunt facti, et de se, et de omnibus rebus, quas in usum uitae presentis acceperunt, rationem reddituri sunt Deo et pro suorum actuum qualitate recipient aut penam aut gloriam." Sacrae tamen legis auctoritate animalia iubentur interfici, non propter conscientiam peccati, sed quia refricant memoriam facti. Unde Augustinus super Leuiticum: [ad. c. 20. quaest. 74.]

C. IV. The beast to which a woman approaches is killed not because of guilt but because of the memory of the deed.

"A woman who approaches any beast to be mounted by it: you shall kill the woman and the beast; let them die by death. For they are guilty." § 1. It is asked how the beast is guilty, since it is irrational and is in no way capable of law. Likewise: It is to be believed that beasts were ordered to be killed for this reason: because, contaminated by such a disgraceful act, they renew an unworthy memory of the deed. PART II. GRATIAN. But concerning madmen Augustine writes most clearly in the book Questions of the Old and New Testament, [question 2, at the end], saying thus:

C. IV. Non propter culpam, sed propter memoriam facti pecus occiditur, ad quod mulier accedit.

Mulier que accesserit ad omne pecus ascendi ab eo, interficietis mulierem et pecus; morte moriatur. Rei enim sunt. §. 1. Queritur, quomodo sit reum pecus, cum sit irrationabile, nec ullo modo capax legis est? Item: Pecora inde credendum est iussa interfici, quia tali flagitio contaminata indignam refricant facti memoriam. II. Pars. Gratian. De furiosis autem euidentissime scribit Augustinus in libro questionum ueteris et noui testamenti, [qu. 2. in fine] ita dicens:

C. V. Guilt binds a guilty person not by necessity but by will.

We know that certain persons, suddenly made insane, have harmed many with iron, a club, stones, and bites, and have even killed some; but after being captured by contrivance and brought before judgments, they were by no means made guilty, because they did these things unknowingly, not by will but under the impulse of some force unknown to me. For how is one established as guilty who does not know what he has done?

C. V. Culpa non necessitate, sed uoluntate reum constringit.

Aliquos scimus subito dementes factos ferro, fuste, lapidibus, morsibus, multos nocuisse, quosdam et occidisse, captos autem industria et iudiciis oblatos minime reos factos, eo quod non uoluntate, sed inpellente ui nescio qua hec gesserint nescientes. Quomodo enim reus constituitur qui nescit quod fecerit?

C. VI. A guilty person is bound by will, not by necessity.

Likewise Ambrose in the Hexaemeron, in the tractate on the first day. Those things are to be guarded against which proceed from our will: the offenses of youth and the irrational passions of the body. Therefore, of the things whose masters we are, let us not seek the beginnings outside ourselves or divert them onto others, but let us acknowledge the things that are properly ours. Because we can refrain from doing this if we wish, we ought to ascribe the choice of this evil to ourselves rather than to others. Therefore also in judgments of this kind, guilt binds the voluntarily guilty, not those compelled by necessity; punishment condemns them. For if anyone kills an innocent person through madness, he is not liable to death; indeed, by an oracle of the divine law itself, if anyone inflicts death through imprudence, he receives hope of impunity and the possibility of refuge, so that he may be able to escape. Let this, therefore, be said concerning that which appears properly evil. For those things are not evils which neither entangle the mind in crime nor bind the conscience. Hence no wise person would call poverty, ignobility, illness, or death evils, nor would he number them in the lot of evils.

C. VI. Reus uoluntate, non necessitate constringitur.

Item Ambrosius in Exameron, in tractatu primi diei. Illa cauenda sunt, que ex nostra uoluntate prodeunt delicta iuuentutis et irrationabiles corporis passiones. Quorum igitur nos sumus domini, eorum principia extrinsecus non requiramus, nec deriuemus in alios, sed agnoscamus ea, que proprie nostra sunt. Quod possumus non facere, si uolumus, huius electionem mali potius nobis debemus ascribere quam aliis. Ideo etiam in iudiciis istiusmodi uoluntarios reos, non necessitate conpulsos culpa constringit, pena condempnat. Neque enim, si per furorem aliquis innocentem perimat, obnoxius morti est, quin etiam ipsius legis diuinae oraculo, si quis per inprudentiam intulerit necem, accipit inpunitatis spem, refugii facultatem, ut possit euadere. Hoc igitur de eo, quod proprie malum uidetur, dictum sit. Mala enim non sunt, que nec crimine mentem inplicant, nec conscientiam ligant. Unde paupertatem et ignobilitatem, egritudinem, mortem, nemo sapiens mala dixerit, nec in malorum sorte numerauerit.

C. VII. Things which drunken persons commit ignorantly have pardon.

The same in the book On the Patriarchs, [c. 6 of the book On Abraham]. Certainly we learn that drunkenness is to be avoided, through which we cannot beware of crimes. For the things which we beware of when sober we commit ignorantly through drunkenness. § 1. Those who indulge excessively in wine do not know what they say; they lie buried, and therefore, if they have transgressed in anything through wine, they are indeed granted pardon before wise judges, but as authors they are condemned for their levity.

C. VII. Veniam habent que ignorantes ebrii conmittunt.

Idem in libro de patriarchis. [c. 6. libro de Abraham.] Sane discimus uitandam ebrietatem, per quam crimina cauere non possumus. Nam que sobrii cauemus per ebrietatem ignorantes conmittimus. §. 1. Nesciunt quid loquantur qui nimio uino indulgent, iacent sepulti, ideoque, si qua per uinum deliquerint, apud sapientes iudices uenia quidem facta donantur, sed leuitatis dampnantur auctores.

C. VIII. Disobedience or concupiscence has no guilt in the body of one who does not consent.

Likewise Augustine in book I of The City of God, [c. 25]. If concupiscence or disobedience, which still dwells in mortal members, is moved as though by its own law contrary to the law of our will, if it is without guilt in the body of one sleeping, how much more is it without guilt in the body of one not consenting?

C. VIII. Inobedientia uel concupiscentia non habet culpam in corpore non consentientis.

Item Augustinus I. libro de ciuitate Dei. [c. 25.] Si concupiscentia uel inobedientia, que adhuc in membris moribundis habitat, preter nostrae uoluntatis legem quasi lege sua mouetur, si absque culpa est in corpore dormientis, quanto magis absque culpa est in corpore non consentientis.

C. IX. Lot is blamed not for incest but for drunkenness.

The same, Against Faustus, book II. His daughters made Lot drunk and mingled with him while he was unaware. Therefore he is indeed to be blamed, yet not so much as that incest but as much as that drunkenness merits.

C. IX. Loth non de incestu, sed de ebrietate culpatur.

Idem contra Faustum, libro II. Inebriauerunt Loth filiae eius, et se nescienti miscuerunt. Quapropter culpandus est quidem, non tamen quantum ille incestus, sed quantum ebrietas illa meretur.

C. X. No one is drawn into guilt unless led by his own will.

Likewise Ambrose, On the Blessed Life. There is no reason for us to ascribe our distress to anyone except our will. None of us is held to guilt unless he has turned aside by his own will. Things inflicted upon those who resist have no crime. The odium of offenses, which we divert onto others, follows only voluntary acts. Christ chose for Himself a voluntary soldier; the devil claims for himself a voluntary servant. He possesses no one bound by the yoke of servitude unless the sinner has first sold himself to him for the bronze of sins.

C. X. Nemo trahitur ad culpam, nisi ductus propria uoluntate.

Item Ambrosius de beata uita. Non est quod cuiquam nostram ascribamus erumpnam, nisi nostrae uoluntati. Nemo nostrum tenetur ad culpam, nisi uoluntate propria deflexerit. Non habent crimen que inferuntur reluctantibus. Voluntaria tantum conmissa sequitur delictorum inuidia, quam in alios deriuamus. Voluntarium sibi militem elegit Christus, uoluntarium sibi seruum diabolus actionatur. Neminem iugo seruitutis astrictum possidet, nisi se ei prius peccatorum ere uendiderit.

C. XI. One who unwillingly commits homicide is a minister of God.

The same in the book On Paradise. Nor is one who has unwillingly committed a homicide outside the ministry. For the law says concerning him: "Because God delivered him into his hands." Therefore his hands, after the manner of an instrument, furnished ministry to divine vengeance. The Levite, therefore, is a minister of remission. But the striker who has committed homicide not by plan but contrary to his will is a minister of divine vengeance. § 1. Consider this also: when the impious man is killed, Christ is poured in, and where abomination is abolished, sanctification is consecrated, because the Lord said: "On that day on which I shall have killed all Israel." This is referred not to one day of the affliction of Egypt but to all time. GRATIAN. Therefore, since one who has unwillingly killed a man is a minister of God, since one who kills an innocent person in madness is by no means liable to death, and since those suddenly made insane bear no guilt for the things they do, it is evident that this priest is not guilty of homicide, and therefore he ought not to be deprived of the priesthood. § 1. But that which is found in the penitential of Theodore is objected:

C. XI. Minister Dei est qui inuitus homicidium facit.

Idem de paradiso in libro. Nec is, qui inuitus fecerit aliquod homicidium, extra ministerium est. Siquidem lex ait de eo: "Quia Deus dedit eum in manus eius." Manus ergo eius instrumenti modo diuinae ultioni ministerium prebuerunt. Leuita igitur minister remissionis est. Percussor autem, qui non ex dispositione, sed preter uoluntatem fecerit homicidium, diuinae minister est ultionis. §. 1. Illud quoque specta, quia, cum interficitur inpius, Christus infunditur, et, ubi abhominatio aboletur, sanctificatio consecratur, quia Dominus dixit: "In ea die, qua interfecero omne Israel." Quod non refertur ad unum diem afflictionis Egypti, sed ad omne tempus. Gratian. Cum itaque qui inuitus hominem interfecerit minister Dei sit, cum innocentem furore perimens morti nequaquam obnoxius sit, cum subito dementes eorum, que faciunt, reatum minime gestent, patet hunc sacerdotem homicidii reum non esse, unde nec sacerdotio priuari debet. §. 1. Obicitur autem illud, quod inuenitur in penitenciali Theodori:

C. XII. Let one who while insane killed someone do penance when restored to himself.

If anyone while insane has killed someone, if he has returned to a sound mind, a lighter penance is to be imposed upon him. GRATIAN. But perhaps this is understood concerning one whom his own fault brought to madness. § 1. Likewise it is objected: There are certain things which, even if they are not imputed to punishment, nevertheless impede the seal of the sacrament. For the ambition of parents is not imputed to the son for punishment, yet it hinders him from receiving an office of the church. Thus things done with an alienated mind, even if they are not imputed to punishment, nevertheless impede the exercise of a sacred office. Hence Jerome says:

C. XII. In se reuersus penitenciam agat qui insaniens aliquem occiderit.

Si quis insaniens aliquem occiderit, si ad sanam mentem peruenerit, leuior ei penitencia inponenda est. Gratian. Sed hoc forte de eo intelligitur, quem propria culpa ad furorem perduxit. §. 1. Item obicitur: Sunt quedam, que, etsi non inputentur ad penam, tamen inpediunt sacramenti signaculum. Ambicio namque parentum filio non inputatur ad penam, cui tamen obest ad ecclesiae munus accipiendum. Sic que mente alienata fiunt, etsi non inputentur ad penam, tamen sacri muneris executionem inpediunt. Unde Ieronimus ait:

C. XIII. One who not in anger but for discipline kills someone by accident is innocent.

If anyone, not in anger but for the sake of discipline, gives someone a blow with the palm and kills him by accident, as is accustomed to happen, in respect of grace he is innocent, because it considers the will, not the deed. But in respect of the law he is guilty, because it considers deeds. § 1. Likewise, if a virgin has been oppressed during persecution, she is rejected by the law because it looks at the deed, not the will; but in grace she is received as a virgin, because it considers not deeds but the will. GRATIAN. Therefore, just as one who commits homicide by accident for the sake of discipline is guilty in respect of the law but innocent in respect of grace, so this priest who committed homicide in madness is innocent in respect of guilt but is proved guilty in respect of the exercise of the office received. § 1. To these matters reply is thus made: Not all things which impede one who is to be ordained cast down one who has been ordained; for one who was at some time insane cannot be advanced to the priesthood. Nevertheless, if he begins to be mad after the priesthood, he will not for that reason lack the priesthood, unless perhaps it should happen that he never returns to the function of a sound mind. As Gregory writes concerning a certain bishop in the Register to Bishop Eleutherius: "Although it is sad for us, etc.," as above: "A bishop burdened by prolonged illness."

C. XIII. Innocens est qui non iratus, sed propter disciplinam aliquem casu perimit.

Si quis non iratus, sed propter disciplinam palmam alicui dederit, et casu occiderit, sicut fieri solet, quantum ad gratiam, innocens est, quia uoluntatem, non opus requirit. Quantum autem ad legem, reus est, quia opera querit. §. 1. Item si in persecutione uirgo fuerit obpressa, repellitur lege, quia opus > inspicit, non uoluntatem; in gratia autem quasi uirgo suscipitur, quia non opera querit, sed uoluntatem. Gratian. Sicut ergo qui propter disciplinam casu homicidium facit, quantum ad legem, reus est, quantum ad gratiam, innocens, sic iste sacerdos, qui furore homicidium fecit, quantum ad culpam, innocens est, quantum ad suscepti muneris executionem, reus probatur. §. 1. His ita respondetur: Non omnia, que ordinandum inpediunt, ordinatum deiciunt; non enim potest ad sacerdotium prouehi qui aliquando insaniuit. Verumtamen, si post sacerdotium furere ceperit, non ideo sacerdotio carebit, nisi forte numquam ad sanae mentis offitium illum redire contingat. Sicut de quodam episcopo Gregorius scribit in registro ad Eleuterium Episcopum: "Quamuis triste sit nobis etc." ut supra: "Longa inualetudine grauatus episcopus".

Question II

GRATIAN. But clerics are prohibited by the Council of Tarragona from exacting gifts for patronage furnished, in which it is read to have been established thus, [c. 10]:

> GRATIANUS. Pro inpensis uero patrociniis Terraconensi Concilio clerici munera exigere prohibentur, in quo sic statutum legitur: [c. 10.]

C. I. A cleric ought not to exact gifts for patronage furnished.

We also decree that it is to be observed that no priest or cleric, after the manner of secular judges, dare to accept gifts for patronage furnished, except things offered freely in the church, which may appear to have been received not from favor for a gift but brought by a contribution of devotion. But if he is proved to accept things sought by him, let him know that he is to be degraded according to the statutes of the Fathers, as an exactor of interest or possessor of usury. GRATIAN. But this is to be understood concerning those who, having professed the canonical life, resolved that they would live according to the rule. For it is received by the general custom of the church and approved by usage that clerics, after the manner of advocates, furnish patronage, exact gifts for patronage to be furnished, and receive them for patronage furnished.

> C. I. Pro patrociniis inpensis clericus munera exigere non debet.
> Obseruandum quoque decernimus, ne quis sacerdotum uel clericorum more secularium iudicum pro inpensis patrociniis munera audeat accipere, nisi in ecclesia gratuito oblata, que non fauore muneris uideantur accepta, sed collatione deuotionis illata. Quod si quesita probatur accipere, ueluti exactor fenoris aut usurarum possessor secundum statuta Patrum se nouerit degradandum. Gratian. Hoc autem de illis intelligendum est, qui canonicam uitam professi regulariter se uicturos proposuerunt. Generali namque ecclesiae consuetudine receptum est et moribus approbatum, ut clerici more aduocatorum patrocinia inpendant, et pro inpendendis munera exigant, et pro inpensis suscipiant.

Question III

GRATIAN. Third, it is asked whether this man is to be condemned from the confession of the woman. In this it must first be seen whether a woman is able to accuse a priest. This appears to be altogether prohibited by the sacred canons. For it is established generally from the decrees of Pope Fabian that those who are not and cannot be of their order shall not accuse the priests of the Lord or testify against them. But women can be advanced not only not to the priesthood but not even to the diaconate; hence they can neither accuse priests nor testify against them. Provision is also made by the laws that, on account of the modesty of her sex, a woman may not intercede before the praetor for another, unless perhaps she prefers to prosecute injuries to herself or her own. But this woman, who prosecutes neither injuries to herself nor to her own, ought not to be admitted to this accusation. § 1. To the contrary, one who is able to bear the person of a judge is not removed from the office of an accuser. But whoever has read the Book of Judges cannot be ignorant that women judged the people in the Old Testament. Therefore those who are established frequently to have borne even the person of a judge cannot be removed from accusation, nor are they prohibited from accusation by any sequence of the divine Scriptures. § 2. To these matters reply is thus made: In the Old Law many things were permitted which today have been abolished by the perfection of grace. For when it was permitted to women to judge the people, today, on account of the sin which woman introduced, they are enjoined by the Apostle to show modesty, to be subject to a man, and to have a veiled head as a sign of subjection. Therefore she who by all these things is shown to be subject to a man and who is not permitted to petition for another does not appear to be admitted to accusation.

§ 3. To the contrary, although a woman is not admitted to accusation generally and indiscriminately, nevertheless there are certain crimes whose accusation a woman is not prohibited from undertaking. Hence in book IX, title 1, law 12 of the Code, Emperor Diocletian writes, saying:

> GRATIANUS. Tertio queritur, an ex mulieris confessione iste sit condempnandus? In quo primum uidendum est, an mulier sacerdotem accusare ualeat? Quod sacris canonibus omnino uidetur esse prohibitum. Generaliter enim statutum est ex decretis Fabiani Papae, ut sacerdotes Domini non accusent, nec in eos testificentur, qui sui ordinis non sunt, nec esse possunt. Mulieres autem non solum ad sacerdotium, sed nec etiam ad diaconatum prouehi possunt, unde nec sacerdotes accusare, nec in eos testificari ualent. Legibus quoque cautum est, ut ob uerecundiam sui sexus mulier apud pretorem pro alio non intercedat, nisi forte suas uel suorum iniurias persequi maluerit. Hec autem, que nec suas, nec suorum iniurias persequitur, ad hanc accusationem admitti non debet. §. 1. Econtra qui iudicis personam gerere ualet ab accusatoris offitio non remouetur. Mulieres autem in ueteri testamento populum iudicasse, quicumque librum Iudicum legerit ignorare non poterit. Non itaque ab accusatione remoueri possunt quas etiam iudicis personam frequenter gessisse constat, nec ulla serie diuinarum scripturarum ab accusatione prohibentur. §. 2. His ita respondetur: In ueteri lege multa permittebantur, que hodie perfectione gratiae abolita sunt. Cum enim mulieribus permitteretur populum iudicare, hodie pro peccato, quod mulier induxit, ab Apostolo eis indicitur uerecundari, uiro subditas esse, in signum subiectionis uelatum caput habere. Que ergo his omnibus uiro subiecta ostenditur, cui pro alio postulare non conceditur, ad accusationem admittenda non uidetur.
> §. 3. Econtra, quamquam passim et indifferenter ad accusationem mulier non admittatur, sunt tamen quedam crimina, quorum accusationem mulier subire non prohibetur. Unde in libro Codicis [IX., tit. 1. l. 12.] Inp. Diocletianus scribit, dicens:

[C. I.]

"A woman is not permitted to accuse concerning a crime which belongs to public judgments, except for certain causes, that is, if she prosecutes an injury to herself and her own, according only to the statutes of ancient law concerning those matters which have been specially conceded to them, without the subscription being exacted. Hence the provincial governor who is approached will first examine whether the crime is such that a woman is not prohibited from undertaking its accusation."

> [C. I.]

"De crimine, quod publicorum fuerit iudiciorum, mulieri accusare non permittitur, nisi certis ex causis, id est si suam suorumque iniuriam persequatur, secundum antiqui iuris statuta tantum, de quibus specialiter eis concessum est, non exacta subscriptione. Unde aditus preses prouinciae in primis examinabit an tale sit crimen, cuius accusationem mulier subire non prohibetur".

[C. II.]

Likewise in the book of the Digest, Paul in book II On Adulteries, [title On Witnesses, law 18]. "From the fact that the Julian law on adulteries prohibits a condemned woman from giving testimony, it is gathered that women also have the right of giving testimony in judgment." Likewise from the title On Accusations and Inscriptions, law 1: § 1. "It is not permitted for a woman to make anyone a defendant in a public judgment unless, namely, she prosecutes the death of parents and children, patron or patroness, their son or daughter, grandson or granddaughter."

[C. II.]

Item in libro Digestorum, Paulus libro II. de adulteriis. [tit. de testibus, l. 18.] "Ex eo, quod prohibet lex Iulia de adulteriis testimonium dicere condempnatam mulierem, colligitur etiam mulieres testimonium dicendi in iudicio ius habere." Item de accusationibus et inscriptionibus, lege 1.: §. 1. "Non est permissum mulieri publico iudicio quemquam reum facere, nisi scilicet parentum liberorumque, et patroni et patronae, et eorum filii filiaeue, nepotis neptisue mortem exequatur."

[C. III.]

Paul in book I On Adulteries. "For certain causes a public accusation has been conceded to women, as if they prosecute the death of those men and women against whom under the law they do not give public testimony unwillingly." § 1. The senate established the same thing also in the Cornelian testamentary law; but women are also permitted to speak in a public judgment concerning the testament of a paternal or maternal freedman. § 2. "It has been conceded by the testamentary law to male wards, with the counsel of their guardians, to prosecute the death of their father, and likewise to a female ward to prosecute the death of her grandfather. For the divine Vespasian permitted male wards to bring an action concerning their father's testament. But even if the tablets are not produced, they can proceed by interdict." From the Code, title Who Can Accuse or Not, the same Augustus to Dionysius: "If your wife thinks that the killing of her cousin is to be avenged, let her approach the governor of the province." From the Digest, at the Julian Law of Majesty, [law 8], Papinian in book XII of Responses: § 3. "In investigations of injured majesty, women also are heard. § 4. A woman named Julia disclosed the conspiracy of Sergius Catiline and instructed Marcus Tullius the consul concerning his trial." [GRATIAN.] But whatever person is admitted to an accusation in public judgments or of injured majesty is not prohibited from undertaking an accusation of simony. Hence in the first book of the Code, Emperor Leo Augustus to Armasius, Praetorian Prefect:

[C. III.]

Paulus libro 1. de adulteriis. "Certis de causis concessa est mulieribus publica accusatio, ueluti si mortem exequantur eorum earumque, in quos ex lege testimonium publicorum inuitae non dicant." §. 1. Idem et in lege Cornelia testamentaria senatus statuit; sed et de testamento paterni liberti uel materni mulieribus publico iudicio dicere permissum est. §. 2. "Pupillis ex consilio tutorum patris mortem, item pupillae aui sui mortem exequi, concessum est lege testamentaria. Nam de patris quidem testamento pupillis agere diuus Vespasianus permisit. Sed etsi non exhibeantur tabulae, per interdictum possunt experiri." Codice qui accusare possunt uel non, idem Augustus Dionisio: "Uxor tua, si consobrini sui necem uindicandam existimat, adeat presidem prouinciae." Digestis ad legem Iuliam maiestatis, [lege 8.,] Papinianus libro 12. Responsorum: §. 3. "In questionibus lesae maiestatis etiam mulieres audiuntur. §. 4. Coniurationem Sergii Catilinae Iulia mulier detexit, et M. Tullium consulem iudicium eius instruxit." [Gratian.] Quecumque uero persona ad accusationem publicorum iudiciorum uel lesae maiestatis admittitur, eadem accusationem symoniae subire non prohibetur. Unde in primo Codicis libro Inp. Leo Augustus Armasio, Prefecto Pretorii:

C. IV. Let an accusation of injured majesty, of public judgments, and of simony be proposed equally.

Indeed, whoever is discovered to have attained this holy and venerable episcopal see through the intervention of money, or if anyone is discovered to have accepted something so that he might ordain or elect another, when an accusation has been proposed after the pattern of a public crime and of injured majesty, let him be withdrawn from the priestly rank. We decree that he shall not only henceforth be deprived of honor but also condemned to perpetual infamy, so that a similar punishment may accompany both whom an equal crime stains and makes equal. GRATIAN. But when accusations which the laws of the world do not admit are altogether removed by the sacred canons, conversely those which are not prohibited by the laws of the world appear to be admissible. Yet this does not follow. For those clerics whom the sacred canons prohibit from contracting marriages are also prohibited by the laws of emperors. But it does not consequently follow that the laws admit the union of all those whose union the sacred canons do not prohibit; for by the laws only cantors and readers can take wives, but by the canons even acolytes can. Therefore, although accusations which the laws of the world do not admit are removed by the sacred canons, whatever accusations the laws of princes admit are not therefore consequently received. § 1. But, as was premised near the beginning of this work, the laws of emperors are to be used in ecclesiastical affairs as often as they are not found to oppose the sacred canons. Hence either let the woman be shown to be specially prohibited by the sacred canons from an accusation of injured majesty and simony, or by the foregoing reasons she is proved to be admissible to an accusation of this kind. § 2. Nor let anyone seek to distinguish that in this case of simony women are to be admitted to the accusation of others but not of priests. For since this is found to be permitted to them generally by the laws, unless someone shows it to be specially prohibited by some law, his distinction will have no place. Yet, because against the general rules certain crimes are specially excepted in which a woman is permitted to accuse, among which fornication is not numbered, it is evident that her accusation is weakened in two ways: both because she alleges the crime of fornication and because, while she confesses concerning herself, she ought not to be believed concerning the crime of another. Hence Pope Julius writes, [in the decrees, c. 18], saying:

C. IV. Lesae maiestatis, et publicorum iudiciorum, et symoniae accusatio equaliter proponatur.

Sane quisquis hanc sanctam et uenerandam antistitis sedem pecuniae interuentu subisse, aut si quis, ut alterum ordinaret uel eligeret, aliquid accepisse detegitur, ad instar publici criminis et lesae maiestatis accusatione proposita, a gradu sacerdotis retrahatur. Nec hoc solum deinceps honore priuari, sed perpetuae quoque infamiae dampnari decernimus, ut facinus quos par coinquinat et equat, utrosque similis pena comitetur. Gratian. Cum autem sacris canonibus accusationes omnino submoueantur, quas leges seculi non asciscunt, e diuerso uidentur admittendae que legibus seculi non prohibentur. Verum hoc non infertur. Quicumque enim clericorum nuptias sacris canonibus contrahere prohibentur, et legibus inperatorum. Non autem consequenter omnium copulam leges admittunt, quorum coniunctionem sacri canones non prohibent; legibus enim soli cantores et lectores, canonibus autem etiam acoliti uxores ducere possunt. Quamuis igitur sacris canonibus submoueantur accusationes, quas leges seculi non asciscunt, non ideo consequenter recipiuntur quascumque leges principum admittunt. §. 1. Sed (sicut circa huius operis initium premissum est) tociens legibus inperatorum in ecclesiasticis negociis utendum est, quociens sacris canonibus obuiare non inueniuntur. Unde aut specialiter sacris canonibus mulier ab accusatione lesae maiestatis et symoniae ostendatur prohibita, aut premissis rationibus ad huiuscemodi accusationem admittenda probatur. §. 2. Nec quisquam distinguere querat, ad aliorum, non ad sacerdotum accusationem in hoc casu symoniae mulieres esse admittendas. Cum enim generaliter legibus hoc eis permissum inueniatur, nisi quis specialiter aliqua lege hoc prohibitum ostenderit, eius distinctio locum non habebit. Verum, cum contra regulas generales quedam crimina specialiter excepta sint, in quibus mulieri accusare permittitur, inter que fornicatio non numeratur, patet, quod huius accusatio duppliciter infirmatur, et quia fornicationis crimen intendit, et quia, dum de se confitetur, super alienum crimen ei credi non oportet. Unde Iulius Papa scribit, [in decretis, c. 18.,] dicens:

C. V. The confession of a guilty person ought not to be admitted against anyone.

It is fitting that no one who has confessed concerning himself—except concerning the crime of majesty—be believed concerning the crime of another, because the confession of him and of every guilty person is dangerous and ought not to be admitted against anyone. GRATIAN. Therefore, because this woman confesses concerning herself, she cannot be believed concerning the crime of another, but her confession is to be interpreted against her.

C. V. Rei professio aduersus quemlibet admitti non debet.

Nemini (preterquam de crimine maiestatis) de se confesso super alienum crimen credi oportet, quoniam eius atque omnis rei professio periculosa est, et admitti aduersus quemlibet non debet. Gratian. Quia ergo ista de se confitetur, super alienum crimen ei credi non potest, sed contra eam sua confessio interpretanda est.

Question IV

GRATIAN. But that neither a bishop nor a priest is permitted to ventilate any case on Sunday is prohibited in the Council of Tarragona, in which it was established thus, [c. 4]:

GRATIANUS. Quod uero die dominico nec episcopo, nec presbitero causam uentilare aliquam liceat in Terraconensi Concilio prohibetur in quo sic statutum est: [c. 4.]

C. I. Ministers of the church ought not to ventilate cases on Sunday.

Let no bishop, priest, or cleric dare on Sunday to ventilate the business proposed in any case, except only that they perform the solemn rites established for God. But on other days, when the persons have assembled, they have permission to judge the things that are just, except in a criminal matter.

C. I. Ministri ecclesiae die dominico causas uentilare non debent.

Nullus episcoporum aut presbiterorum uel clericorum die dominico propositum cuiuscumque causae negocium audeat uentilare, nisi hoc tantum, ut Deo statuta solempnia peragant. Ceteris uero diebus, conuenientibus personis, illa, que iusta sunt, habent licentiam iudicandi, excepto criminali.

C. II. Secular pleas are not to be conducted on solemn days and the days of lawful fasts.

Likewise from the council held at Erfurt in the presence of King Henry. We have decreed that secular pleas are by no means to be conducted on Sundays or other principal feasts, or also on those days on which lawful fasts are celebrated, according to canonical institution. Moreover, the holy synod has also decreed that no judicial power shall have permission by its own authority to summon Christians under ban to a plea on the aforesaid days, that is, during the seven days before the Nativity of the Lord through the octave of Epiphany, from Quinquagesima through the octave of Easter, and during the seven days before the Nativity of Saint John the Baptist, so that there may more freely be the opportunity of going to church and devoting oneself to prayers.

> C. II. Sollempnibus diebus et ieiuniorum legitimorum secularia placita non agantur.
> Item ex Concilio apud Erphesfurt, habito presente Rege Heinrico. Placita secularia dominicis diebus, uel aliis precipuis festis, seu etiam in his diebus, in quibus legitima ieiunia celebrantur, secundum canonicam institutionem minime decreuimus fieri. Insuper etiam sancta sinodus decreuit, ut nulla iudiciaria potestas licentiam habeat sua auctoritate Christianos ad placitum bannire in supradictis diebus, id est septem diebus ante natale Domini usque in octauas epiphaniae, et a quinquagesima usque ad octauas pascae, et septem diebus ante natiuitatem sancti Iohannis Baptistae, quatinus adeundi ecclesiam orationibusque uacandi liberius habeatur facultas.

C. III. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Hadrian, [in the capitularies, c. 64]. Let no bishop or person placed beneath him presume to judge cases on Sunday.

> C. III. De eodem.
>
> Item Adrianus Papa. [in capitulis, c. 64.] Nullus episcopus uel infra positus die dominico causas iudicare presumat.

Question V

GRATIAN. But that compurgation is to be furnished to one who denies the charge Stephen writes to Leo, Bishop of Tiana:

> GRATIANUS. Purgationem uero neganti prestandam, Stephanus scribit Leoni, Thianensi Episcopo:

C. I. If a deacon cannot be convicted of a crime, let him clear himself secretly before the bishop.

Your deacon most truly declared that he was innocent of the crime charged against him. Nevertheless, if suspicion is entertained and suitable accusers and witnesses of the kind ordained by the sacred canons are found, when a fixed number of bishops has been summoned with you, let the accusers come; let the deacon Aldericus himself also be called; and if he denies it, let the case be ventilated canonically, and if he has either confessed spontaneously or been proved guilty by lawful witnesses, let him be struck by a canonical sentence. But if he neither confesses spontaneously nor lawful accusers and witnesses are found, and an evil reputation grows prevalent, let him clear himself by an oath secretly, not in a public examination, before you and several most reverend priests and deacons of your church. And thereafter proclaim him to be of good testimony, and restrain and admonish the sons of your church not to presume further to defame a priest of God, fearing that Ham, who mocked the shameful parts of his father, was accursed.

C. I. Diaconus, si de crimine conuinci non poterit, apud episcopum se ipsum secreto purificet.

De crimine sibi illato diaconus tuus uerissime fatebatur se inmunem. Verumtamen si suspicio habetur, et accusatores ydonei reperiuntur, et testes, quales sacri canones sanciunt, accito tecum certo episcoporum numero ueniant accusatores, uocetur et ipse Aldericus diaconus, et, si negauerit, uentiletur causa canonice, et, si uel sponte confessus, uel legitimis testibus fuerit approbatus, canonica feriatur sententia. Quod si nec sponte confitetur, nec accusatores et testes legitimi reperti fuerint, et mala fama crebrescit, non publico examine, sed coram te, et aliquantis reuerentissimis presbiteris et diaconibus tuae ecclesiae secreto iuramento se purificet. Et deinceps boni testimonii eum annuncia, et conpesce et conmone ecclesiae tuae filios, ne sacerdotem Dei ulterius infamare presumant, timentes, quod Cam maledictus est, qui uerenda patris derisit.

C. II. A priest or deacon is not to be despoiled unless he has confessed spontaneously or has been lawfully convicted.

Likewise Nicholas to Solomon, Bishop of Constance. A priest or deacon whom you assert to be unwilling to confess crimes publicly but to wish to defend himself with an oath—even if it is nevertheless known to the bishop that his crime was perpetrated—cannot through any penance possess the priestly or diaconal office. But it is to be wondered, if he himself has not confessed, how the crime perpetrated by him can be known to the bishop, unless perhaps a suitable accuser proves it through suitable witnesses. Hence, if, when the bishop examines the case of a priest or deacon, the priest or deacon has not perhaps been convicted by the proof of witnesses, the crime is not lawfully manifest to the bishop unless he confesses it of his own accord. Unless he does this, in the meantime we do not see that the priest or deacon ought to be deprived of his office. Therefore voluntary confession alone, and the canonical number or quality of witnesses—with the bishops deciding and the accuser proving what he alleged—deprives a cleric of his own rank.

C. II. Non est spoliandus presbiter uel diaconus, nisi sponte confessus aut legitime conuictus fuerit.

Item Nicolaus Salomoni Constantiensi Episcopo. Presbiter aut diaconus, quem asseris crimina nolle publice confiteri, sed uelle cum sacramento defendere se, et si tamen notum sit episcopo esse scelus ipsius perpetratum, non potest per aliquam penitenciam sacerdotali uel diaconali offitio potiri. Sed mirandum, si ipse confessus non fuerit, quomodo notum possit esse episcopo scelus ab ipso perpetratum, nisi accusatore forte ydoneo per testes ydoneos approbante. Unde si examinante episcopo causam presbiteri uel diaconi non fuerit per testium approbationem presbiter uel diaconus forte conuictus, non est scelus episcopo legitime manifestum, nisi sua sponte ipsum confiteatur. Quod nisi fecerit, interim non uidemus suo debere presbiterum uel diaconum offitio priuari. Sola ergo spontanea confessio, et canonicus numerus, uel qualitas testium (decernentibus episcopis, et accusatore quod obiecerat conprobante) clericum priuat proprio gradu.

Question VI

GRATIAN. PART I. But that a confession is not to be extorted by tortures Pope Alexander testifies, writing to all the orthodox, [letter I, c. 2]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod uero confessio cruciatibus extorquenda non sit, Alexander Papa testatur, scribens omnibus orthodoxis: [epist. I. cap. 2.]

C. I. The confession of ministers is not to be extorted but spontaneous.

If certain writings have in any way been extorted from priests or authorities of the church through fear or fraud or through force, or if in order that they might be able to free themselves writings have by any contrivance been composed or confirmed by them, we judge that these have no force to their prejudice or injury; nor, by the authorship of God and the holy Apostles and their successors, do we permit them ever to sustain any infamy or calumny or sequestration from their goods. For confession in such matters ought to be not compelled but spontaneous. § 1. For every confession which is made from necessity is not faith. § 2. Therefore confession in such matters ought not to be extorted but professed spontaneously. For it is most wicked to judge anyone from suspicion or an extorted confession, since the Lord is the inspector of the heart more than of the deed. § 3. But one whom the Lord has reserved for His own judgment cannot be condemned by human examination. For if all things were avenged in this age, divine judgments would have no place. Likewise: § 4. This also has been reported to the holy see—which I am ashamed to say, and which is inimical not only to the priestly name but also to every Christian name—namely, that some either compel bishops or priests by fear, or extort by force, or deceive by fraud, to write certain letters of their confession toward a different side than they ought, whether for the non-investigation of their own cases or, what is worse, to make writings belonging to a sect of another's error, to confirm them with their own hands, and to recite and confess them before the people. They say that others are thrust into prisons and workhouses, so that, terrified at least by these snares, the priests of the Lord may favor their wills. Likewise: § 5. But confession in such matters ought to be not compelled but spontaneous, as He Himself testifies who says: "From the heart proceed homicides, adulteries," and the other things which pertain to these. § 6. Nor are the things which are done to be considered so much as the mind with which they are done. § 7. For God regards thoughts and spontaneous wills more than acts which are done through simplicity or necessity.

C. I. Ministrorum confessio non sit extorta, sed spontanea.

Si sacerdotibus uel auctoribus ecclesiae quedam scripturae quoquo modo per metum aut fraudem, aut per uim extortae fuerint, uel, ut se liberare possint, quocumque ab eis conscriptae aut roborate fuerint ingenio, ad nullum eis preiudicium uel nocumentum ualere censemus, neque ullam eos infamiam uel calumpniam, aut a suis sequestrationem bonis umquam, Deo auctore et sanctis apostolis eorumque successoribus, sustinere permittimus. Confessio enim in talibus non conpulsa, sed spontanea fieri debet. §. 1. Omnis enim confessio, que fit ex necessitate, fides non est. §. 2. Confessio ergo in talibus non debet extorqueri, sed sponte profiteri. Pessimum enim est de suspicione aut extorta confessione quemquam iudicare, cum magis cordis inspector sit Dominus, quam operis. §. 3. Non potest autem humano condempnari examine quem Dominus suo reseruauit iudicio. Si omnia namque in hoc seculo uindicata essent, locum diuina iudicia non haberent. Item: §. 4. Est etiam hoc perlatum ad sanctam sedem (quod pudeo dicere, et non solum sacerdotali, sed etiam omni Christiano nomini est inimicum), id est quod nonnulli episcopos uel sacerdotes aut metu conpellunt, aut ui extorquent, aut fraude decipiunt, aliquas confessionis suae in alteram partem, quam debeant, litteras scribere, aut pro suarum non requisitione causarum, aut (quod deterius est) alieni erroris sectae scripturas facere, et propriis manibus roborare, et coram populis recitare atque confiteri. Alios dicunt carceribus et ergastulis retrudi, ut saltem his territi insidiis Domini sacerdotes, suis faueant uoluntatibus. Item: §. 5. Confessio uero in talibus non conpulsa, sed spontanea fieri debet, ipso testante, qui ait: "Ex corde procedunt homicidia, adulteria," et cetera, que sunt ad hec pertinentia. §. 6. Nec tantum, attendenda sunt que fiant, quantum quo animo fiant. §. 7. Amplius enim respicit Deus ad cogitationes et spontaneas uoluntates, quam ad actus, qui per simplicitatem aut necessitatem fiunt.

C. II. Apostolic authority renders entirely void oaths that are illicit.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to the Bishops of Gaul. Following the authority of our venerable predecessors, and by name that of the most blessed pope and martyr Alexander, fifth from blessed Peter, we absolve from all oaths and obligations of whatever kind by which those men had bound themselves when compelled by the violence of the impious; and we forbid that they be observed by both the aforesaid Archbishop of Trier and his provost and all who, being captured at that time, bound themselves to them in any way. Nor, by the authorship of God and the holy Apostles and our predecessors, do we permit them ever to sustain any infamy or calumny or sequestration from their goods on that account, just as the Lord says through the Prophet: "Loose the bonds of impiety and the other things." Indeed, we also give this by command to our aforesaid brother and the sons of the church of Trier and its defenders: that with the spiritual and material sword together they pursue those wicked men and their supporters for so long, until the possessions or whatever ecclesiastical goods were alienated or seized by this deed or by any compact are recovered in their integrity. PART II. GRATIAN. The Roman Pontiff also absolves certain persons from an oath of fidelity when he deposes some from their dignities. Hence Pope Gelasius to Emperor Anastasius:

C. II. Auctoritas apostolica penitus illicita in irritum deducit iuramenta.

Item Nicolaus Papa Episcopis Galliae. Auctoritatem uenerabilium predecessorum nostrorum secuti, et nominatim beatissimi Papae et martiris Alexandri a beato Petro quinti, ab omnibus iuramentis et cuiuscumque modi obligationibus, quibus illi se coacti inpiorum uiolentia obligauerant, absoluimus, et ne illa seruentur uetuimus tam prefatum archiepiscopum Treuerensem, quam eius prepositum, et omnes, qui tunc temporis capti se illis quoquo modo obligauerunt, neque ullam eos proinde infamiam uel calumpniam, aut a suis bonis sequestrationem umquam, Deo auctore, et sanctis apostolis et nostris predecessoribus, sustinere permittimus, sicut per Prophetam Dominus dicit: "Dissolue colligationes inpietatis et cetera." Quin etiam prefato fratri nostro, filiisque Treuerensis ecclesiae, illiusque defensoribus hec in mandatis damus, ut spirituali simul et materiali gladio tamdiu malignos illos eorumque fautores insequantur, quousque cum integritate possessiones, uel quecumque res ecclesiasticae hoc facto uel quocumque pacto distractae sunt seu direptae reuocentur. II. Pars. Gratian. A fidelitatis etiam iuramento Romanus Pontifex nonnullos absoluit, cum aliquos a suis dignitatibus deponit. Unde Gelasius Papa Anastasio Inperatori:

C. III. Pontifical authority absolves certain persons from an oath of fidelity.

Likewise another Roman Pontiff—namely, Zachary—deposed the king of the Franks from the kingdom, not so much for his iniquities as because he was useless for so great a power; and he substituted Pepin, father of Emperor Charles, in his place and absolved all the Franks from the oath of fidelity. Holy church also acts by frequent authority in this way when it absolves soldiers from the bond of an oath which was made to those bishops who are deposed from pontifical rank by apostolic authority.

C. III. Pontificalis auctoritas a iuramento fidelitatis nonnullos absoluit.

Alius item Romanus Pontifex, Zacharias scilicet regem Francorum non tam pro suis iniquitatibus, quam pro eo, quod tantae potestati erat inutilis, a regno deposuit, et Pipinum, Karoli inperatoris patrem, in eius loco substituit, omnesque Francigenas a iuramento fidelitatis absoluit. Quod etiam ex frequenti auctoritate agit sancta ecclesia, cum milites absoluit a uinculo iuramenti, quod factum est his episcopis, qui apostolica auctoritate a pontificali gradu deponuntur.

C. IV. Those bound to excommunicated persons are not held liable by the bond of fidelity.

Likewise Gregory VII, presiding over the Roman Synod, said: We, holding the statutes of our holy predecessors, absolve by apostolic authority from their oath those who are bound to excommunicated persons by fidelity or oath, and in every way prohibit them from observing fidelity to them until those persons come to satisfaction.

C. IV. Excommunicati uinculo fidelitatis non tenentur obnoxii.

Item Gregorius VII. Romanae Sinodo presidens dixit. Nos, sanctorum predecessorum nostrorum statuta tenentes, eos, qui excommunicatis fidelitate aut sacramento constricti sunt, apostolica auctoritate a sacramento absoluimus, et ne sibi fidelitatem obseruent modis omnibus prohibemus, quousque ipsi ad satisfactionem ueniant.

C. V. Before excommunicated persons are reconciled, no one is compelled to preserve fidelity to them.

Likewise Urban II to the Bishop of Gap. Prohibit the sworn soldiers of Count Hugh from serving him so long as he is excommunicated. If they put forward their oaths, let them be admonished that it is fitting to serve God more than men. For they are restrained by no authority from refusing to discharge to one who opposes God and His saints and tramples their commands the fidelity which they swore to a Christian prince.

C. V. Ante, quam reconcilientur, fidelitatem excommunicatis nullus seruare cogitur.

Item Urbanus II. Episcopo Vapicensi. Iuratos milites Hugoni Comiti, ne ipsi, quamdiu excommunicatus est, seruiant, prohibeto. Qui si sacramenta pretenderint, moneantur, oportere Deo magis seruire quam hominibus. Fidelitatem enim, quam Christiano principi iurarunt, Deo eiusque sanctis aduersanti, et eorum precepta calcanti, nulla cohibentur auctoritate persoluere.

Question VII

GRATIAN. PART I. That a priest is prohibited from being condemned without a synodal hearing is stated thus in the Council of Seville, at which Isidore was present, [c. 6]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Absque sinodali uero audientia sacerdotem dampnari, in Spalensi Concilio, cui Ysidorus interfuit, [cap. 6.] sic prohibetur:

C. I. A priest or deacon is not to be cast down without the examination of a council.

In the sixth action we discovered that Fragitanus, a priest of the church of Córdoba, was once unjustly cast down by his pontiff and, though innocent, condemned to exile. Having decreed that he be restored again to his order, we further decree this against your presumption: that according to the synodal judgment of the holy Fathers, none of you shall think that any priest or deacon is to be cast down without the examination of a council. For there are many who condemn the unexamined by tyrannical power, not by canonical authority. And just as they exalt some by the favor of partiality, so they abase others by hatred and envy, and condemn by the light breeze of opinion those whose crime they do not prove. For a bishop alone can give honor to priests and ministers; he cannot alone take it away. For if those who in this age attained the honor of freedom from their lords are not returned to the bond of servitude unless they have been publicly accused before praetors in the tribunal of the forum, how much more those who are consecrated to the divine altars and adorned with ecclesiastical honor? They surely can neither be condemned by one nor be stripped of the privilege of their honor with one man judging; but, having been presented to a synodal judgment, it is fitting that whatever the canon has commanded concerning them be determined.

> C. I. Sine concilii examine presbiter uel diaconus non deiciatur.
> Sexta actione conperimus, Fragitanum Cordubensis ecclesiae presbiterum iniuste olim a pontifice suo deiectum, et innocentem exilio condempnatum. Quem rursus ordini suo restitutum esse, id denuo aduersus presumptionem uestram decreuimus, ut iuxta sanctorum Patrum sinodalem sententiam nullus uestrum sine concilii examine quemlibet presbiterum uel diaconum deiciendum putet. Nam multi sunt, qui indiscussos potestate tirannica, non auctoritate canonica dampnant. Et sicut nonnullos gratia fauoris sublimant ita quosdam odio inuidiaque humiliant, et leui opinionis aura condempnant quorum crimen non approbant. Episcopus enim sacerdotibus ac ministris solus honorem dare potest, solus auferre non potest. Si enim hi, qui in hoc seculo a dominis suis honorem adepti sunt libertatis, in seruitutis nexum non reuoluuntur, nisi publice apud pretores tribunali foro accusati fuerint, quanto magis hii, qui diuinis altaribus consecrati honore ecclesiastico decorantur? Qui profecto nec ab uno dampnari, nec uno iudicante poterunt honoris sui priuilegio exui, sed, presentati sinodali iudicio, quod omnino de illis canon preceperit oportet diffiniri.

C. II. Let a bishop hear cases of clerics only with the elders of the church.

Likewise Gregory to John, Bishop of Palermo, [book XI, letter 49]. Therefore, if anything concerning any cleric has reached your ears which could justly offend you, do not readily believe it, nor let an unknown matter inflame you to vengeance; but in the presence of the elders of your church the truth is to be investigated diligently, and then, if the quality of the matter demands it, let canonical severity strike the guilt of the delinquent.

> C. II. Causas clericorum episcopus non nisi cum senioribus ecclesiae audiat.
> Item Gregorius Iohanni Episcopo Panormitano. [lib. XI. epist. 49.] Si quid igitur de quocumque clerico ad aures tuas peruenerit, quod te iuste possit offendere, facile non credas, nec te ad uindictam res accendat incognita, sed presentibus ecclesiae tuae senioribus diligenter est perscrutanda ueritas, et tunc, si qualitas rei poposcerit, canonica districtio culpam feriat delinquentis.

C. III. By how many bishops priests or deacons are to be heard.

Likewise from the First Council of Carthage, [c. 11]. If anyone has appeared swollen with pride or contumelious toward one older than himself, or has any cause, let him be heard by three neighboring bishops if the one accused is a deacon, by six if he is a priest, and by twelve fellow bishops if he is a bishop. All the bishops said: Contumacy must be crushed and pride broken in all. But let cases be heard by these persons in the appointed number according to the persons involved.

C. III. A quot episcopis presbiteri uel diaconi sunt audiendi.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi I. [c. 11.] Si quis tumidus uel contumeliosus extiterit in maiorem natu, uel aliquam causam habuerit, a tribus uicinis episcopis, si diaconus est, qui arguitur, si presbiter est, a sex, si episcopus, a duodecim consacerdotibus audiatur. Uniuersi episcopi dixerunt: Contundi debet contumacia et superbia in omnibus frangi. Causae uero pro personis ab his statuto numero audiantur.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Second Council of Carthage, [c. 10]. Felix, Bishop of Selemsela, said: I also add this according to the statutes of the ancient councils: if any bishop—which we do not wish—has happened to incur some charge, and if there should be so great a necessity for him that many bishops cannot assemble, lest he remain under accusation, let him be heard by twelve bishops, a priest by six, and a deacon by three, together with his own bishop.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi II. [c. 10] Felix episcopus Selemselitanus dixit: Etiam hoc adicio secundum statuta ueterum conciliorum, ut, si quis episcopus (quod non optamus) fieri reatum aliquem incurrerit, et si fuerit ei nimia necessitas non posse plurimos congregare episcopos, ne in crimine maneat, a duodecim episcopis audiatur, et a sex presbiter, et a tribus diaconus, cum proprio suo episcopo.

C. V. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 8]. But if priests or deacons have been accused, let their own bishop, having joined to himself from neighboring places the lawful number of colleagues whom the accused request from him—that is, together with himself six in the case of a priest and three in that of a deacon—examine their cases, with the same form preserved between the accusers and those who are accused concerning days and postponement, removal from communion, and examination of causes. But let even the bishop of the place alone take cognizance of and decide the cases of the other clerics. PART II. GRATIAN. "Alone" is said to the exclusion of other bishops, but not of his own clerics, without whose presence his sentence will be void. Hence it is read in the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 23]:

C. V. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 8.] Si autem presbiteri uel diaconi fuerint accusati, adiuncto sibi ex uicinis locis proprius episcopus legitimo numero collegarum, quos ab eodem accusati petierint, id est una secum in presbiteri nomine sex, in diaconi tres qui ipsorum causas discutiant eadem dierum et dilatione, et a communione remotionum, et discussione causarum, inter accusatores et eos, qui accusantur, forma seruata. Reliquorum uero clericorum causas etiam solus episcopus loci agnoscat et finiat. II. Pars. Gratian. Solus autem ad exclusionem aliorum episcoporum, non suorum clericorum dicitur, sine quorum presentia eius sententia irrita erit. Unde in Cartaginensi Concilio IV. [c. 23.] legitur.

C. VI. Let a bishop hear no one's case without the presence of his clerics.

Let a bishop hear no one's case without the presence of his clerics; otherwise the bishop's sentence will be void unless it is confirmed by the presence of the clerics.

C. VI. Absque clericorum presentia episcopus nullius causam audiat.

Episcopus nullius causam audiat absque presentia suorum clericorum; alioquin irrita erit sententia episcopi, nisi presentia clericorum firmetur.

C. VII. Priests canonically summoned cannot be condemned except in a synod.

Likewise from the Second Council of Seville, [c. 6]. A bishop alone can give honor to priests and ministers, but he cannot alone take it away. For if those who in the world attained the honor of freedom from their lords are not returned to the yoke of servitude unless they have been publicly accused before praetors and governors in the tribunal of the forum, how much more those who, consecrated to the divine altars, are adorned with ecclesiastical honor? They surely can neither be condemned by one nor, with one man judging, be stripped of the privileges of their honor; but, having been presented to a synodal judgment, what the canon has commanded concerning them is to be determined.

C. VII. Nisi in sinodo canonice uocati sacerdotes dampnari non possunt.

Item ex Concilio Spalensi II. [c. 6.] Episcopus sacerdotibus ac ministris solus honorem dare potest, sed solus auferre non potest. Si enim hii, qui in seculo a dominis suis honorem libertatis adepti sunt, in seruitutis iugum non reuoluuntur, nisi publice apud pretores ac presides tribunali foro fuerint accusati, quanto magis hii, qui diuinis altaribus consecrati, honore ecclesiastico decorantur? Qui profecto nec ab uno dampnari, nec uno iudicante poterunt honoris sui priuilegiis exui, sed, presentati sinodali iudicio, quid canon de illis preceperit diffiniri.

Question VIII

GRATIAN. But concerning the last question it was established thus in the Council of Neocaesarea, [cc. 9 and 10]:

GRATIANUS. De ultima uero questione sic statutum est in Concilio Neocesariensi: [c. 9. et 10.]

C. I. Let a priest who confesses that he fell bodily before ordination not offer thereafter.

One who committed a bodily sin and afterward was ordained a priest, if he has confessed that he sinned before his ordination, indeed let him not offer, but let him remain in the other offices because of the utility of his zeal. But concerning the other sins, many have judged that he is to be deprived even of ordination. But if he has not confessed concerning these things, nor can he be manifestly convicted by any persons, the power concerning himself is to be entrusted to him. Similarly, if a deacon has been entangled in the same kind of guilt, he shall restrain himself from ministry.

C. I. Presbiter, qui confitetur, se ante ordinationem corporaliter lapsum, postea non offerat.

Qui admiserit corporale peccatum, et hic postea presbiter ordinatus est, si confessus fuerit quod ante ordinationem suam peccauerit, non quidem offerat, maneat autem in aliis offitiis propter eius studii utilitatem. Cetera uero, peccata censuerunt plurimi etiam ordinatione priuari. Quod si de his non fuerit confessus, nec aliquibus potest manifeste conuinci, huic ipsi potestas de se est conmittenda. Similiter et diaconus, si in eodem culpae genere fuerit inuolutus, sese a ministerio cohibebit.

C. II. If those serving the altar transgress through the frailty of the flesh, they shall be subject to the judgment of the bishop.

Likewise from the Council of Lleida, [c. 5]. If those who serve the altar of God suddenly fall into the lamentable frailty of the flesh and, with God regarding them, worthily repent, so that with the body mortified they offer to God the sacrifice of a contrite heart, let it remain within the power of the pontiff either not to suspend for long those who are truly afflicted, or to segregate the slothful from the body of the church for a more prolonged time; nevertheless, in such a way that they resume the places of their offices so that they cannot afterward be advanced to higher offices. But if a second time, like dogs returning to vomit, they have turned back, let them not only lack the dignity of office but also not receive holy communion except at their departure.

> C. II. Deseruientes altario si carnis fragilitate deliquerint, episcopi arbitrio subiacebunt.
> Item ex Concilio Ylerdensi. [c. 5.] Hii, qui altario Dei deseruiunt, si subito in flenda fragilitate carnis corruerint, et Deo respiciente digne penituerint, ita ut mortificato corpore cordis contriti Deo sacrificium offerant, maneat in potestate pontificis uel ueraciter afflictos non diu suspendere, uel desidiosos prolixiore tempore ab ecclesiae corpore segregare; ita tamen, ut sic offitiorum suorum loca recipiant, ne possint ad altiora offitia ulterius promoueri. Quod si iterato uelut canes ad uomitum reuersi fuerint, non solum dignitate offitii careant, sed etiam sanctam communionem, nisi in exitu, non percipiant.

C. III. Let those begotten from ministers of the church be consigned to its servitude.

Likewise from the Ninth Council of Toledo, [c. 10]. Although many judgments of the Fathers concerning the innocence of the order of clerics have hitherto issued and correction of their morals could in no way be effected, the offenses of their faults have drawn out the sentence of those judging to such an extent that vengeance should be brought not only upon the perpetrators of crimes but also upon the progeny of the condemned. And therefore, if from this point forward anyone from a bishop down to a subdeacon, while established in honor, begets children in a detestable union either from a female slave or from a freeborn woman, those from whom they are proved to have been begotten shall indeed be condemned by canonical censure; but the offspring born from another's pollution shall not only never receive an inheritance, but shall also remain by perpetual right in the servitude of that church from the disgrace of whose priest or minister they were born.

> C. III. Ex ministris ecclesiae geniti in seruitutem eiusdem deuocentur.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano IX. [c. 10.] Cum multae super innocentiam ordinis clericorum hactenus emanauerint sententiae Patrum, et nullatenus ipsorum formari quiuerit correctio morum, usque adeo sententiam iudicantium protraxere conmissa culparum, ut non tantum ferretur ultio in actores scelerum, uerum etiam in progeniem dampnatorum. Ideoque quilibet ab episcopo usque ad subdiaconum deinceps uel ex ancillae uel ex ingenuae detestando conubio in honore constituti filios procreauerint, illi quidem, ex quibus geniti probabuntur, canonica censura dampnentur; proles autem, aliena pollutione nata, non solum hereditatem numquam accipiet, sed etiam in seruitute eius ecclesiae, de cuius sacerdotis uel ministri ignominia nati sunt, iure perhenni manebunt.

C. IV. One who confesses that he sinned before ordination shall not sacrifice; but one convicted shall be deposed.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 35]. If any priest sinned before ordination, let him not offer, but let him bear the name of priest only for the sake of religion. But if he himself did not confess but was publicly convicted by another, let him not have even this, that he bear the name of priest. The same is to be observed concerning deacons, so that if they themselves have confessed, they shall receive the order of subdeacon.

> C. IV. Qui confitetur se ante ordinationem peccasse non sacrificet; conuictus autem deponatur.
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 35.] Si quis presbiter ante ordinationem peccauerit non offerat, sed tantum pro religione nomen presbiteri portet. Si autem non ipse confessus fuerit, sed ab alio publice conuictus, nec hoc ipsum habeat ut nomen presbiteri portet. Similiter et de diaconibus obseruandum est, ut, si ipsi confessi fuerint, ordinem subdiaconi accipiant.

C. V. Sacraments are lawfully received from the hand of a priest who is tolerated by the church.

Likewise Nicholas in the responses to the Bulgarians, [c. 71]. When you ask whether you ought to receive communion from a priest who has been caught in adultery or merely besprinkled by rumor concerning it, we respond: No one, however polluted he may be, can pollute the divine sacraments, which exist as purgatives of all contagions. For whatever sort the priest may be, the holy things cannot be defiled. Therefore communion is to be received from him until he is rejected by the judgment of the bishops, because evil men, by ministering good things, harm only themselves; and a burning waxen torch indeed causes loss to itself, but ministers light to others in darkness, and from that from which it furnishes benefit to others it provides loss to itself. § 1. Therefore receive the mysteries of Christ fearlessly from every priest, because all things are purified in the faith of Christ. For it is faith which conquers this world; and because faith belongs not to the giver but to the receiver, as blessed Jerome says: "For believing, baptism is perfect for every soul, and in every priest the body is perfect." He again, agreeing with sacred Scripture, says: "Before you hear, do not judge anyone"; and before proof of the accusation brought, suspend no one from your communion, because not everyone who is accused is immediately guilty, but he who is convicted is criminal.

> C. V. De manu sacerdotis, qui ab ecclesia tolleratur, licite sacramenta sumuntur.
> Item Nicolaus ad consulta Bulgarorum. [c. 71.] Sciscitantibus uobis, si a sacerdote, qui fuerit conprehensus in adulterio, siue de hoc sola fama respersus est, debeatis communionem suscipere, necne? respondemus: Non potest aliquis, quantumcumque pollutus sit, sacramenta diuina polluere, que purgatoria cunctarum contagionum existunt. Qualiscumque enim sacerdos sit, que sancta sunt coinquinari non possunt. Idcirco ab eo, usquequo episcoporum iudicio reprobetur, communio percipienda est, quoniam mali bona ministrando se tantummodo ledunt, et cerea fax accensa sibi quidem detrimentum prestat, aliis uero lumen in tenebris administrat, et unde aliis commodum exhibet inde sibi dispendium prebet. §. 1. Sumite ergo ab omni sacerdote intrepide Christi misteria, quoniam omnia in fide Christi purgantur. Fides enim est, que uincit hunc mundum, et quia non dantis, sed accipientis sit, dicente B. Ieronimo: "Ad credendum omni animae baptismum perfectum esse et in omni sacerdote corpus est perfectum." Qui rursus sacrae scripturae concordans ait: "Prius, quam audias, ne iudicaueris quemquam," atque ante probationem accusationis illatae neminem a communione tua suspendas, quia non statim qui accusatur reus est, sed qui conuincitur criminosus.

Causa XVI

GRATIAN. A certain abbot had a parochial church; he instituted a monk there to celebrate the office for the people; he possessed it for forty years without any challenge. At last a complaint is raised against the abbot by the clerics of the baptismal church in whose diocese that parochial church was situated. (QUESTION I.) Here it is first asked whether monks are permitted to celebrate offices for peoples, give penance, and baptize. (QUESTION II.) Second, if it should happen that they have chapels by episcopal benefice, whether they are to be instituted by them or by the bishops. (QUESTION III.) Third, whether the rights of churches are removed by prescription. (QUESTION IV.) Fourth, if a church prescribes against a church, whether a monastery also can prescribe against a church. (QUESTION V.) Fifth, whether it is able to claim for itself by territorial right a chapel built in its territory. (QUESTION VI.) Sixth, if an archpriest or bishop, by his own authority and not by a judicial sentence, has usurped that chapel, whether he falls from the cause, so that the church over which he presides no longer has the right to reclaim what its pastor illicitly usurped. (QUESTION VII.) Seventh, it is asked: if laymen held that chapel, as is the custom of certain persons, and resigned it into the hands of the abbot and delivered it to be ordered, whether with the consent of the bishop and clerics the abbot can hold it.

> GRATIANUS. Quidam abbas habebat parrochitanam ecclesiam; instituit ibi monachum, ut offitium celebraret populo; possedit eam per quadraginta annos sine aliqua interpellatione; tandem querela aduersus abbatem mouetur a clericis baptismalis ecclesiae, in cuius diocesi parrochitana ecclesia illa consistebat. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, utrum monachis liceat offitia populis celebrare, penitenciam dare et baptizare? (Qu. II.) Secundo, si contigerit eos capellas habere episcopali beneficio, an ab eis sint instituendae, an ab episcopis? (Qu. III.) Tertio, an iura ecclesiarum prescriptione tollantur? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, si ecclesia aduersus ecclesiam prescribat, an etiam monasterium aduersus ecclesiam prescribere possit? (Qu. V.) Quinto, si capellam in suo territorio edificatam iure territorii sibi uendicare ualeat? (Qu. VI.) Sexto, si archipresbiter uel episcopus sua auctoritate, non iudiciaria sententia capellam illam inrepserit, an cadat a causa, ut ecclesia, cui presidet, non ultra habeat ius reposcendi quod suus pastor illicite usurpauit? (Qu. VII.) Septimo queritur, si laici capellam illam tenebant (ut quibusdam moris est) et in manibus abbatis eam refutauerint, et ordinandam tradiderint, an consensu episcopi et clericorum abbas possit eam tenere?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. That monks cannot celebrate offices for peoples is proved by many authorities, the first of which is that of the holy Synod of Nicaea, in which it is said:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod monachi offitia populis celebrare non possint, multis auctoritatibus probatur, quarum prima est illa sanctae Nicenae Sinodi, qua dicitur:

C. I. The manner of life of monks ought to be separate from all.

It pleased all those sitting in the holy Synod of Nicaea that the manner of life and conduct of monks differ from all according to the etymology of the name. For monachus in Greek means "solitary" in Latin, whence it is fitting that a monk act solitarily in all things. Therefore we command all firmly and inviolably that no monk give penance to anyone except mutually, as is just; that he not bury a dead person unless a monk dwelling with him in the monastery, or unless by chance it should happen that one of the visiting brothers dies there.

C. I. Monachorum conuersatio ab omnibus debet esse discreta.

Placuit omnibus residentibus in sancta Nicena sinodo, ut monachorum conuersatio et uita secundum ethimologiam nominis ab omnibus discrepet. Monachus enim grece, latine singularis, unde monachum per omnia singulariter agere oportet. Quamobrem firmiter et insolubiliter omnes precipimus, ut aliquis monachus penitenciam nemini tribuat, nisi inuicem, ut iustum est; mortuum non sepeliat, nisi monachum in monasterio secum conmorantem, uel si fortuitu quemquam aduenientium fratrum ibi mori contigerit.

C. II. No one can simultaneously maintain the discipline of a monastery and an ecclesiastical ministry.

Likewise Gregory to John, Archbishop of Ravenna, [book IV, letter 1]. No one can serve ecclesiastical duties and persist in an ordered manner in the monastic rule, so that the same person maintains the discipline of the monastery who is compelled daily to remain in an ecclesiastical monastery.

C. II. Monasterii districtionem et ecclesiasticum ministerium quilibet simul tenere non potest.

Item Gregorius Iohanni, Rauennati archiepiscopo. [lib. IV. epist. 1.] Nemo potest ecclesiasticis obsequiis deseruire, et in monachica regula ordinate persistere, ut ipse monasterii districtionem teneat, qui cottidie in monasterio ecclesiastico cogitur permanere.

C. III. Monks who are advanced to the clerical state ought not to depart from their former purpose.

Likewise Innocent, [to Victricius, letter II, c. 10]. Concerning monks who, after remaining for a long time in monasteries, later attain the orders of the clerical state, we establish that they ought not to depart from their former purpose. GRATIAN. Therefore, if, as Innocent determines, they are not permitted to depart from their purpose, and, as Gregory testifies, they cannot both persist devotedly in the monastic rule and serve ecclesiastical duties, it is evident that monks cannot be placed over parochial churches.

C. III. Monachi, qui ad clericatum promouentur, a priori proposito discedere non debent.

Item Innocentius. [ad Victricium, ep. II. c. 10.] De monachis, qui diu morantes in monasteriis si postea ad clericatus ordines peruenerint, statuimus, non debere eos a priori proposito discedere. Gratian. Si ergo, sicut Innocentius diffinit, a suo proposito eis discedere non licet, et, sicut Gregorius testatur, in monastica regula deuote persistere et ecclesiasticis obsequiis simul deseruire non possunt: patet, quod parrochitanis ecclesiis monachi prefici non possunt.

C. IV. A monk has the office not of one teaching but of one mourning.

Likewise Jerome to Riparius and Desiderius. A monk has the office not of a teacher but of one mourning, who mourns either himself or the world and awaits the advent of the Lord in fear.

C. IV. Monachus non habet docentis offitium sed plangentis.

Item Ieronimus ad Riparium et Desiderium. Monachus non doctoris, sed plangentis habet offitium, qui uel se, uel mundum lugeat, et Domini pauidus prestoletur aduentum.

C. V. Monks ought not to be amid a popular multitude.

The same to Paulinus, [On the Formation of a Monk, letter XIII]. If you desire to be what you are called —a monk, that is, alone—what are you doing in cities, which indeed are not habitations of solitary persons but of many? And below: § 1. Have the simplicity of a dove, lest you devise deceits against anyone, and the cunning of a serpent, lest you be supplanted by the snares of others. It does not differ greatly in vice either to be able to deceive or to be deceived. Regard a Christian whom you perceive to speak to you always or frequently about coins as a trader rather than a monk, excepting alms, which are open indiscriminately to all. Beyond food, clothing, and manifest necessities, bestow nothing upon anyone, lest dogs eat the bread of the children.

> C. V. In populari frequentia monachi esse non debent.
> Idem ad Paulinum. [de institutione monachi, epist. XIII.] Si cupis esse quod diceris, monachus, id est solus, quid facis in urbibus, que utique non sunt solorum habitacula, sed multorum? Et infra: §. 1. Habeto simplicitatem columbae, ne cuiquam machineris dolos, et serpentis astutiam, ne aliorum subplanteris insidiis. Non multum distat in uicio uel decipere posse uel decipi. Christianum, quem senseris tibi aut semper aut crebro de nummis loquentem, excepta elemosina, que indifferenter omnibus patet, institorem potius habeto quam monachum. Preter uictum, et uestitum, et manifestas necessitates nichil cuiquam tribuas, ne filiorum panes canes comedant.

C. VI. A monk is fed; clerics feed.

The same to Bishop Heliodorus. The case of a monk is one thing, that of a cleric another. Clerics feed the sheep; I am fed. They live from the altar; the axe is placed as though at the root of an unfruitful tree for me if I do not bring a gift to the altar. § 1. I am not permitted to sit before a priest. If I sin, he is permitted to hand me over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, so that the spirit may be saved on the day of the Lord.

> C. VI. Monachus pascitur, clerici pascunt.
> Idem ad Eliodorum episcopum. Alia causa est monachi, alia clerici. Clerici oues pascunt: ego pascor; illi de altari uiuunt: michi securis quasi ad radicem infructuosae arboris ponitur, si munus ad altare non defero. §. 1. Michi sedere ante presbiterum non licet. Illi, si peccauero, licet me tradere satanae in interitum carnis, ut spiritus sit saluus in die Domini.

C. VII. Monks are not permitted to do anything without the counsel of priests.

The same to Rusticus. The church has a senate, the assembly of priests, without whose counsel monks are permitted to do nothing. Rehoboam, son of Solomon, lost the kingdom for this reason: because he was unwilling to hear his priests. The Romans also had a senate, by whose counsel they did all things; and we have our senate, the assembly of priests.

> C. VII. Non licet aliquid monachis agere sine presbiterorum consilio.
> Idem ad Rusticum. Ecclesia habet senatum cetum presbiterorum, sine quorum consilio nichil monachis agere licet. Roboam filius Salomonis ideo perdidit regnum, quia audire noluit presbiteros suos. Senatum quoque Romani habebant, quorum consilio cuncta agebant, et nos habemus senatum nostrum cetum presbiterorum.

C. VIII. According to the etymology of the name, let a monk lead a solitary life.

Likewise Pope Eugene. It pleased our common council that no monk presume with most wicked daring to depart from the monastery for earthly gain, nor give penance, nor receive a son from baptism, nor baptize, nor visit a sick person, nor bury a dead person, nor pass over to a secular church, nor entangle himself in transactions of any kind. Let him be content with his cloister, because, just as a fish lacks life without water, so does a monk without a monastery. Therefore let him sit solitary and be silent, because he is dead to the world but lives to God. § 1. Let him recognize his name, for monos in Greek is "one" in Latin; agos in Greek is "sad" in Latin. Hence he is called a monachus, that is, "one sad man." Therefore let him sit sad and attend to his office.

C. VIII. Secundum ethimologiam nominis monachus solitariam uitam ducat.

Item Eugenius Papa. Placuit communi nostro concilio, ut nullus monachorum pro lucro terreno de monasterio exire nefandissimo ausu presumat, neque penitenciam dare, neque filium de baptismo accipere, neque baptizare, neque infirmum uisitare, neque mortuum sepelire, neque ad ecclesiam transire secularem, neque qualibuscumque negociis sese inplicare; sit claustro suo contentus, quia sicut piscis sine aqua caret uita, ita sine monasterio monachus. Sedeat itaque solitarius, et taceat, quia mundo mortuus est, Deo autem uiuit. §. 1. Agnoscat nomen suum, MONOS enim grece, latine unus: AGOS grece, latine tristis. Unde dicitur monachus, id est unus tristis. Sedeat igitur tristis, et offitio suo uacet.

C. IX. Let monks not usurp episcopal rights without the consent of bishops.

Likewise Paschal II to Victor, Bishop of Bologna. It has reached us, concerning which we greatly wonder, that certain monks and abbots in your parish arrogantly claim for themselves episcopal rights and offices contrary to the decrees of the holy Fathers—namely, penance, remission of sins, reconciliation, tithes, and churches—when without the permission of their own bishop or the authority of the apostolic see they ought in no way to presume this, as provision concerning matters of this kind was made by the holy Fathers in the Council of Chalcedon and prohibited to all monks under the bond of anathema. Therefore we command your Dilection that you convene them and altogether prohibit them from presuming such things thereafter.

C. IX. Absque episcoporum consensu episcopalia iura monachi non usurpent.

Item Pascalis II. Victori, Bononiensi Episcopo. Peruenit ad nos, unde ualde miramur, quod quidam monachi et abbates in parrochia uestra contra sanctorum patrum decreta episcopalia iura et offitia sibi arroganter uendicant uidelicet penitenciam, remissionem peccatorum, reconciliationem, decimas, et ecclesias, cum absque proprii episcopi licentia uel apostolicae sedis auctoritate hoc nullatenus presumere debeant, sicut in Calcedonensi concilio a sanctis Patribus de huiusmodi cautum est et sub anathematis uinculo monachis omnibus prohibitum. Mandamus itaque dilectioni tuae, ut eos conuenias, et ne talia deinceps presumant omnino prohibeas.

C. X. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Callistus [II]. We also interdict abbots and monks from giving public penances, visiting the sick, performing anointings, and singing public Masses. Let them receive chrism and oil, consecrations of altars, and ordinations of clerics from the bishops in whose parishes they remain.

C. X. De eodem.

Item Calixtus Papa. [II.] Interdicimus etiam abbatibus et monachis publicas penitencias dare, infirmos uisitare, et unctiones facere, et publicas missas cantare. Crisma et oleum, consecrationes altarium, ordinationes clericorum ab episcopis accipiant, in quorum parrochiis manent.

C. XI. Let monks remaining within cloisters not administer the offices of clerics outside.

Likewise Alexander II. According to the tenor of the excellent Council of Chalcedon, we command monks, although religious, to remain within the cloister according to the rule of Saint Benedict; we prohibit them from traversing villages, castles, and cities; we have judged that they are altogether to cease from preaching to peoples, unless perhaps someone, solicitous for the salvation of his soul, should wish to consult them within the cloister in order to assume their habit.

> C. XI. Monachi intra claustra morantes clericorum offitia exterius non administrent.
> Item Alexander II. Iuxta Calcedonensis tenorem optimi concilii monachis quamuis religiosis ad normam S. Benedicti intra claustrum morari precipimus; uicos, castella, ciuitates peragrare prohibemus, a populorum predicatione omnino cessare censuimus, nisi forte quis, de suae animae salute sollicitus, ut eorum habitum assumat eos intra claustrum consulere uoluerit.

C. XII. Monks who are in cities ought to be subject to the bishop.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 4]. Those who truly and purely choose the solitary life are worthy of suitable honor. § 1. But those who are in monasteries throughout the several cities or estates, it pleases us that they be subject to the bishop, devote themselves to quiet, and observe fasts and prayers, remaining in the places in which they once devoted themselves to God; and that they neither take part in ecclesiastical actions nor handle any secular actions, leaving their own monasteries, unless perhaps they are ordered by the bishop of that city on account of urgent necessities. And let no one's slaves be received into a monastery so that one may be a monk with them except with the permission of his own lord. But we have decreed that one who transgresses these things be outside communion, lest the name of the Lord be blasphemed. § 2. But it is fitting that the bishop of the city furnish necessary care and solicitude to the monasteries. GRATIAN. To these matters reply is thus made: That authority of the Synod of Nicaea prohibits monks from leaving their monasteries and celebrating the burials of the dead throughout chapels, namely from assembling after the manner of clerics to celebrate the obsequies of anyone. But if anyone wishes to be buried at a monastery, he is not to be prohibited. Hence Gregory writes to John, Bishop of Civitavecchia, [book I, letter 12]:

> C. XII. Monachi, qui sunt in ciuitatibus, episcopo debent esse subiecti.
> Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 4.] Qui uere et pure solitariam eligunt uitam digni sunt conuenienti honore. §. 1. Eos uero, qui per singulas ciuitates seu possessiones in monasteriis sunt, placet nobis episcopo subiectos esse, et quieti operam dare, atque obseruare ieiunia et orationes, in locis, in quibus semel se Deo deuouerint, permanentes, et neque communicare ecclesiasticas, neque seculares aliquas attrectare actiones, relinquentes propria monasteria, nisi forte iubeantur propter urgentes necessitates ab ipsius ciuitatis episcopo. Et neminem seruorum suscipi in monasterium, ut sit cum eis monachus, nisi cum domini proprii licentia. Pretereuntem uero hec decreuimus extra communionem esse, ne nomen Domini blasphemetur. §. 2. Conuenit uero ciuitatis episcopo curam et sollicitudinem necessariam monasteriis exhibere. Gratian. His ita respondetur: Auctoritas illa Nicenae sinodi prohibet monachos de monasteriis exire, et per capellas sepulturas mortuorum celebrare, confluere uidelicet more clericorum ad cuiuslibet exequias celebrandas. Ceterum si apud monasterium aliquis semetipsum tumulari uoluerit, non est prohibendus. Unde Gregorius scribit Iohanni, Episcopo de urbe ueteri: [lib. I. epist. 12.]

C. XIII. Let the celebration of Masses and burial of the dead in a monastery not be prohibited.

Abbot Agapitus of the monastery of Saint George informed us that he sustains many burdens from your Holiness, because you prohibit Masses from being celebrated in the same monastery and also interdict the dead from being buried. We exhort you to refrain from this inhumanity and to permit the dead to be buried there and Masses to be celebrated without any further contradiction.

> C. XIII. Missae celebrari, et mortui sepeliri in monasterio non prohibeantur.
> Agapitus abbas monasterii S. Georgii insinuauit nobis, plurima se a uestra sanctitate grauamina sustinere, quod in eodem monasterio missas prohibeas celebrari, mortuos etiam interdicas sepeliri. A qua inhumanitate uos hortamur suspendi, et sepeliri ibidem mortuos, missas celebrari, nulla ulterius habita contradictione permittas.

C. XIV. The pious wills of the deceased are not to be annulled.

The same to Venerius, Bishop of Cagliari, [book III, letter 9]. We wish to admonish you lest the pious wills of the deceased be annulled by your neglect—which God forbid.

> C. XIV. Non sunt cassandae piae uoluntates defunctorum.
> Idem Caralitano Episcopo Venerio. [lib. III. ep. 9.] Ammonere te uolumus, ne piae defunctorum uoluntates tua (quod absit) remissione cassentur.

C. XV. The judgment of the testator ought to be observed.

Likewise Gelasius. Consideration of ecclesiastical utility demands this: that by a just dispensation the judgment of the testator is to be observed.

> C. XV. Testatoris arbitrium seruari oportet.
> Item Gelasius. Consideratio ecclesiasticae utilitatis hoc postulat, ex iusta dispensatione testatoris seruandum arbitrium.

[C. XVI.]

Likewise from the Council of Tribur, [c. 15]. Wherever resources and the suitability of the times suffice, etc. As is read above in the same chapter in the cause of those who passed from diocese to diocese. GRATIAN. Behold, from these authorities it is evident that, if anyone wishes to choose burial for himself at a monastery, he can freely be buried by the monks. Hence it is clearly gathered that that prohibition of the Synod of Nicaea was made because of the dishonesty of those wandering about. Hence it is said in the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 23]:

> [C. XVI.]
> Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. [c. 15.] Ubicumque facultas rerum et oportunitas temporum suppetit, etc. Sicut in eodem capite supra legitur in causa eorum, qui de diocesi ad diocesim transierunt. Gratian. Ecce his auctoritatibus patet, quod, si quis apud monasterium sepulturam sibi eligere uoluerit, libere a monachis potest sepeliri. Unde liquido colligitur prohibitionem illam Nicenae sinodi propter inprobitatem circumuagantium factam esse. Unde in Calcedonensi Concilio [c. 23.] dicitur:

C. XVII. Let monks who wander without the permission of the bishop be compelled to return to their own places.

Certain monks who have had nothing enjoined upon them by their own bishop—and sometimes even those who had been excommunicated by him—come to the city of Constantinople, bring disturbances upon ecclesiastical tranquility there, and corrupt the houses of various persons. Therefore this holy synod has established that they first be admonished to depart from the imperial city; then that they be cast out unwilling and compelled through the defender to reach their own places.

> C. XVII. Monachi, qui sine licentia episcopi uagantur, ad propria loca redire cogantur.
> Quidam monachi nichil habentes sibi iniunctum a proprio episcopo, interdum uero etiam illi, qui ab eo fuerant excommunicati, ueniunt ad ciuitatem Constantinopolitanam, et in ea perturbationes tranquillitati ecclesiasticae inferunt, et diuersorum domos corrumpunt. Statuit igitur hec sancta sinodus, hos primum conmoneri, ut exeant de regia ciuitate; demum eos inuitos deici, ac per defensorem conpelli, ut ad sua loca perueniant.

C. XVIII. Monks wandering about are to be compelled through the defender.

Likewise Pope Pelagius to Paulinus the Solitary. We command John the Defender that he ought to detain Probinus of Sabaria, Milianus and Probianus, or other false monks, so that, if they desire to know any account of their contention, they ought to be presented to us to be instructed. Certainly, if they have been severed from the ecclesiastical body by obstinacy alone, we have judged that it is to be enjoined upon the aforesaid defender that they be exiled on the island of Rieti, as you requested.

> C. XVIII. Monachi circumuagantes per defensorem sunt conpellendi.
>
> Item Pelagius Papa Paulino Solitario. Probinum Sabariae, et Milianum atque Probianum, uel alios pseudomonachos Iohanni defensori precipimus ut eos debeat detinere, quatinus, si quam desiderant suae contentionis rationem cognoscere, ad nos ut informentur debeant exhiberi. Certe si sola obstinatione ab ecclesiastico corpore sunt scissi, in Reatina (sicut petisti) insula ut exulentur, predicto defensori duximus iniungendum.

C. XIX. Let no monk except the priests of the Lord dare to preach.

Likewise Pope Leo, [to Theodoret, Bishop of Cyprus, letter LXI, otherwise LXIII]. We also add that which you commanded us by word through our vicars because of the dishonesty of certain monks of your religious body, specially establishing this: that no one except the priests of the Lord dare to preach, whether he be a monk or a layman who boasts in the name of any knowledge. GRATIAN. Behold, in this chapter both the vice is expressed and it is annulled by a general constitution. But the fact that a monk is prohibited from giving penance arises from this: that none of the priests is permitted to bind or loose the parishioner of another. But monks, even if at the dedication of their priesthood, just as the other priests, they rightly receive the power of preaching, baptizing, giving penance, remitting sins, and enjoying ecclesiastical benefices, so that they may do more fully and perfectly the things which are proved by the constitutions of the holy Fathers to belong to the priestly office, nevertheless do not have the exercise of their power unless they have been elected by the people and ordained by the bishop with the consent of the abbot. But they are prohibited from handling ecclesiastical and secular actions, so that they do not presume for themselves patronage of cases unless they have been admonished by the bishop, and are not occupied by secular cases so that they sit as cognitors for the deciding of disputes. Hence Pelagius writes to the patrician Antonina and Decia:

> C. XIX. Nullus monachus preter Domini sacerdotes audeat predicare.
> Item Leo Papa. [ad Theodoritum, Episcopum Cypri, epist. LXI. al. LXIII.] Adicimus illud etiam, quod nobis propter inprobitatem quorumdam monachorum religionis uestrae uerbo mandastis per uicarios nostros, hoc specialiter statuentes, ut preter Domini sacerdotes nullus audeat predicare, siue monachus siue laicus ille sit, qui cuiuslibet scientiae nomine glorietur. Gratian. Ecce in hoc capitulo et uicium est expressum, et generali constitutione euacuatum. Quod uero penitenciam dare prohibeatur, inde est, quod nulli sacerdotum licet parrochianum alterius ligare uel soluere. Monachi autem, et si in dedicatione sui presbiteratus (sicut et ceteri sacerdotes) predicandi, baptizandi, penitenciam dandi, peccata remittendi, beneficiis ecclesiasticis perfruendi rite potestatem accipiant, ut amplius et perfectius agant ea, que sacerdotalis offitii esse sanctorum Patrum constitutionibus conprobantur: tamen executionem suae potestatis non habent, nisi a populo fuerint electi, et ab episcopo cum consensu abbatis ordinati. Ecclesiasticas uero atque seculares actiones attractare prohibentur, ut non presumant sibi patrocinia causarum, nisi ab episcopo conmoniti fuerint, nec secularibus causis occupentur, ut resideant cognitores dirimendarum litium. Unde Pelagius scribit Antoninae Patriciae, et Deciae:

C. XX. A monk ought not to be made a defender.

Concerning the bearer of the present letters, let there be no distress of mind to you because he was not made a defender, since I regard it as altogether exceedingly bitter that men be led from that purpose to an office in which the things promised to God by monks can in no way be fulfilled. For there is every kind of difference between that habit and this office. There are quiet, prayer, and labor of the hands; but here there are the cognizance of causes, summonses, legal proceedings, public litigations, and whatever ecclesiastical institutions or the necessity of petitioners demands. But may God bring it about that those who either are nurtured by us in that habit or grow in monasteries may be such that, at an advanced age and with a proven life, they may be able to be advanced not to offices of litigation but to the priesthood. GRATIAN. Nevertheless Gelasius, as is found in the tractate on the promotions of clerics, in that chapter "A novice monk, etc.," permits them to be made defenders by dispensation. PART II. But that they possess the power of priestly offices Ambrose testifies, saying:

> C. XX. Monachus defensor fieri non debet.
> De presentium portitore, quod defensor factus non est, nulla uobis animi molestia sit, quia satis ualde amarissimum habeo de isto proposito ad illud offitium homines deduci, in quo nullo modo que a monachis Deo promissa sunt ualeant adinpleri. Omnimoda enim est illius habitus et istius offitii diuersitas. Illic enim quies, oratio, labor manuum: at hic causarum cognitio, conuentiones, actus, publica litigia, et quecumque uel ecclesiastica instituta, uel supplicantium necessitas poscit. Faciat autem Deus, ut tales sint hii, qui uel a nobis in isto habitu nutriuntur, uel in monasteriis crescunt, ut prouecta etate et probata uita non ad litigiorum offitia, sed ad sacerdotium ualeant promoueri. Gratian. Gelasius tamen (sicut in tractatu de promotionibus clericorum inuenitur) in capitulo illo: "Monachus nouicius, etc." permittit illos ex dispensatione defensores fieri. II. Pars. Quod uero sacerdotalium offitiorum potestatem habeant, testatur Ambrosius, dicens:

C. XXI. Let monks who are priests not be prohibited from celebrating the offices of clerics.

We commend by a moderate dispensation that learned and upright monks dedicated with the honor of the priesthood ought to preach, baptize, give penance, remit debts to the wretched, and enjoy a just portion of tithes, first fruits, and offerings of the living and the dead, so that, according to the Apostle, living from the altar which they serve, through service to the Lord's people they may transform bread and wine by an immaculate blessing into the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ.

> C. XXI. Clericorum offitia celebrare monachi presbiteri non prohibeantur.
> Doctos ac probos monachos, presbiterii honore dedicatos, predicare, baptizare, penitenciam dare, debita miseris relaxare, decimarum, primiciarum, oblationum uiuorum et mortuorum portione iusta perfrui debere, moderata dispensatione conmendamus, ut, iuxta Apostolum de altario, cui seruiunt, uiuentes, per obsequium dominicae plebis panem et uinum inmaculata benedictione transforment in corpus et sanguinem Domini nostri Iesu Christi.

C. XXII. Let a monk who is a priest freely enjoy ecclesiastical benefices.

Likewise Pope Innocent. If a monk is advanced to the clerical state, let benefices, provisions, and tithes be granted to him fully, without any diminution or delay, so that, as well as he can according to his ability, when necessity arises, he may furnish aid for ecclesiastical works and for restoring the church itself.

> C. XXII. Beneficiis ecclesiasticis monachus libere perfruatur presbiter.
> Item Innocentius Papa. Si monachus ad clericatum promoueatur, beneficia ei pleniter, et annonae, et decimae donentur absque ulla minoratione et dilatione, ut, quanto melius possit iuxta possibilitatem quando necessitas extiterit, ad opera ecclesiastica et ipsam restaurandam ecclesiam adiutorium faciat.

C. XXIII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Gregory. By the governance of apostolic authority we decree that monks, if they have been dedicated with the honor of the priesthood, together with the power of binding and loosing may laudably claim for themselves, by a just canon and no less than other priests, a portion of tithes, first fruits, offerings, and donations which are made for the living and the deceased, for their own utility and that of their neighbors by the merit of a more perfect justice.

> C. XXIII. De eodem.
> Item Gregorius. Moderamine apostolicae auctoritatis decernimus, ut monachi, si presbiterii honore dedicati sunt, cum ligandi soluendique potestate decimarum, primiciarum, oblationum, donationum, que fiunt pro uiuis et defunctis, portionem iusto canone ad suam proximorumque utilitatem merito perfectioris iustitiae non minus quam ceteri sacerdotes laudabiliter sibi uendicent.

C. XXIV. Let monks who are priests freely administer the offices of clerics.

The same. By the authority of this decree, which has been established by us through apostolic governance and the office of piety, let priest-monks who bear the figure of the Apostles be permitted to preach, baptize, give communion, pray for sinners, impose penance, and loose sins.

C. XXIV. Clericorum offitia monachi presbiteri libere administrent.

Idem. Ex auctoritate huius decreti (quod apostolico moderamine et pietatis offitio a nobis est constitutum) sacerdotibus monachis apostolorum figuram tenentibus liceat predicare, baptizare, communionem dare, pro peccatoribus orare, penitenciam inponere, atque peccata soluere.

C. XXV. Monks adorned with the honor of the priesthood have the power of binding and loosing.

Likewise from the decree of Pope Boniface. There are some persons supported by no teaching who assert most audaciously, inflamed by a zeal of bitterness rather than of charity, that monks, because they are dead to the world and live to God, are unworthy of the power of the priestly office and cannot grant either penance or Christianity or absolve through the power divinely enjoined upon them by the priestly office. But they err altogether. § 1. For neither was blessed Benedict, the beneficent teacher of monks, in any way a prohibitor of a matter of this kind; rather, he decreed only that they would be free of secular transactions. This indeed is greatly commanded by apostolic documents and the institutions of all the holy Fathers not only to monks but also to canons. "For no one serving as a soldier for God entangles himself in secular transactions." § 2. Therefore, instructed by the examples of so many Fathers, whom it is exceedingly dangerous to oppose, we believe that the office of binding and loosing is worthily administered by God working through priest-monks, if it should happen that they are worthily elevated to this ministry. § 3. Therefore, as for those striving to restrain priests of monastic profession from the office of priestly power, we command in every way that they be restrained from attempts of this kind hereafter, because the more elevated anyone is, the more powerful he will be in these matters. GRATIAN. By all these authorities it is plainly shown that monks can give penance, baptize, and lawfully administer the other priestly offices. But that they are able to exercise their power by election of the people, institution of the bishops, and consent of the abbot is proved by the authority of Jerome, Gelasius, and Gregory. For Jerome says to Rusticus the Monk, [letter IV]:

C. XXV. Monachi presbiterii honore decorati potestatem habent ligandi et soluendi.

Item ex decreto Bonifatii Papae. Sunt nonnulli nullo dogmate fulti, audacissime quidem, zelo magis amaritudinis quam dilectionis inflammati, asserentes monachos, quia mundo mortui sunt et Deo uiuunt, sacerdotalis offitii potentia indignos, neque penitenciam, neque Christianitatem largiri, neque absoluere posse per sacerdotalis offitii diuinitus sibi iniunctam potestatem. Sed omnino labuntur. §. 1. Neque enim B. Benedictus, monachorum preceptor almificus, huiuscemodi rei aliquo modo fuit interdictor, sed eos secularium negociorum edixit expertes fore tantummodo. Quod quidem apostolicis documentis, et omnium sanctorum Patrum institutis non solum monachis, sed etiam canonicis magnopere inperatur. "Nemo enim militans Deo inplicat se negociis secularibus." §. 2. Tantorum igitur Patrum instituti exemplis (quibus periculosissimum est refragari) credimus a sacerdotibus monachis ligandi soluendique offitium Deo operante digne administrari, si eos digne contigerit hoc ministerio sublimari. §. 3. Decertantes igitur monachicae professionis presbiteros sacerdotalis potentiae arcere offitio, omnimodo precipimus, ut ab huiuscemodi ausibus reprimantur in posterum, quia quanto magis quisque est celsior tanto illis erit potentior. Gratian. His omnibus auctoritatibus perspicue monstratur, monachos posse penitenciam dare, baptizare, et cetera sacerdotalia offitia licite administrare. Quod uero populi electione, episcoporum institutione, et abbatis consensu potestatem suam exequi ualeant, Ieronimi, Gelasii et Gregorii auctoritate probatur. Ait enim Ieronimus ad Rusticum Monachum: [epist. IV.]

C. XXVI. One living worthily in a monastery can be advanced to the clerical state through election of the people.

Live in the monastery in such a way that you may merit to be a cleric. § 1. Learn for a long time the things which you may afterward teach, and among good men always follow those who are better. But if the people or the bishop elects you as a cleric, do the things which belong to clerics.

C. XXVI. Digne in monasterio uiuens per populi electionem ad clericatum poterit promoueri.

Sic uiue in monasterio, ut clericus esse merearis. §. 1. Multo tempore disce que postmodum doceas, et inter bonos semper sectare meliores. Quod si populus uel episcopus te in clericum elegerit, age ea, que clerici sunt.

C. XXVII. Monks can be advanced into the order of the clerical state.

The same to the same, [in the same letter above]. If desire for the clerical state tickles you, learn what you can teach and offer a rational sacrifice to God, lest you be a soldier before a recruit, lest you be a master before a disciple. § 1. It does not belong to my humility or measure to judge concerning others and to say anything sinister concerning ministers of churches. Let them possess their own order and rank; if you hold it, the book published to Nepotian will be able to teach you how you must live in it. § 2. Now we discuss the cradle and conduct of a monk, and of that monk who, educated in the liberal studies, placed the yoke of Christ upon his neck in adolescence. And first it must be treated whether you ought to live alone or with others in a monastery. It pleases me that you have the companionship of holy men, that you do not teach yourself, and that you not enter without a teacher upon a way which you have never entered.

C. XXVII. In ordinem clericatus promoueri monachi possunt.

Idem ad eundem. [eadem epistola superius] Si clericatus titillat desiderium, discas quod possis docere, et rationabilem hostiam offeras Deo, ne miles ante quam tiro, ne prius magister sis quam discipulus. §. 1. Non est humilitatis meae neque mensurae iudicare de ceteris, et de ministris ecclesiarum sinistrum quippiam dicere. Habeant illi ordinem suum et gradum, quem si tenueris, quomodo in eo tibi uiuendum sit editus ad Nepocianum liber docere te poterit. §. 2. Nunc monachi cunabula moresque discutimus, et eius monachi, qui liberalibus studiis eruditus in adolescentia iugum Christi collo suo inposuit. Primumque tractandum est, utrum solus, an cum aliis in monasterio uiuere debeas. Michi placet, ut habeas sanctorum contubernium, nec ipse te doceas, et absque doctore ingrediaris uiam, quam numquam ingressus es.

C. XXVIII. In the place where the abbot shall judge, let a monk be chosen and ordained priest by the bishop.

Likewise Pope Gelasius. If there shall be any monk who, by the merit of a venerable life, is foreseen to be worthy of the priesthood, and the abbot under whose command he serves Christ the King shall request that he be made a priest, he ought to be chosen by that abbot and ordained in the place where the abbot shall judge, providently and justly performing all things that pertain to the priestly office, whether by election of the people or of the bishop.

C. XXVIII. In loco, quo abbas iudicauerit, monachus eligatur, et ab episcopo sacerdos ordinetur.

Item Gelasius Papa. Si quis monachus fuerit, qui uenerabilis uitae merito sacerdotio dignus preuideatur, et abbas, sub cuius inperio regi Christo militat, illum fieri presbiterum petierit, ab ipso debet eligi, et in loco, quo iudicauerit, ordinari, omnia, que ad sacerdotii offitium pertinent, uel populi uel episcopi electione prouide ac iuste acturus.

C. XXIX. At the time of maturity monks are to be promoted to ecclesiastical orders.

Likewise Pope Siricius, [to Himerius, letter I, c. 13]. We both desire and will that monks whom gravity of conduct and a holy formation of life and faith commend be joined to the offices of clerics, in such a way that those under thirty years of age who are worthy are promoted in the minor orders, advancing through the individual grades with the passage of time, and thus arrive at the insignia of the diaconate or priesthood through consecration at mature age; nor are they to ascend by a leap to the summit of the episcopate unless the same periods which we prescribed above for the individual dignities have been observed in their cases.

C. XXIX. Tempore maturitatis ecclesiasticis monachi promoueantur ordinibus.

Item Siricius Papa. [ad Himerium, ep. I. c. 13.] Monachos quoque, quos morum grauitas et uitae ac fidei institutio sancta conmendat, clericorum offitiis aggregari et optamus et uolumus, ita, ut qui intra tricesimum annum etatis sunt digni in minoribus, per gradus singulos crescentes tempore promoueantur ordinibus, et sic ad diaconatus uel presbiterii insignia maturae etatis consecratione perueniant nec saltu ad episcopatus culmen ascendant nisi in his eadem, que singulis dignitatibus superius prefiximus, fuerint tempora custodita.

C. XXX. Let monks neither undertake ecclesiastical offices with greedy exaltation nor reject them through flattering idleness.

Likewise Augustine to Eudoxius, [letter LXXXI]. But we exhort you, brothers, in the Lord, to preserve your purpose and persevere to the end; and if mother church shall desire any works of yours, neither undertake them with greedy exaltation nor reject them through flattering idleness, but obey God with a meek heart, bearing with gentleness Him who rules you, who directs the meek in judgment, who teaches the gentle His ways. Nor prefer your leisure to the necessities of the church; for if no good persons wished to minister to her as she labors in childbirth, you would not find how you might be born.

C. XXX. Ecclesiastica offitia nec auida elatione monachi suscipiant, nec blandiente desidia respuant.

Item Augustinus ad Eudoxium. [ep. LXXXI.] Vos autem fratres exhortamur in Domino, ut propositum uestrum custodiatis, et usque ad finem perseueretis, ac si qua opera uestra mater ecclesia desiderauerit, nec elatione auida suscipiatis, nec blandiente desidia respuatis, sed miti corde obtemperetis Deo, cum mansuetudine portantes eum, qui uos regit, qui dirigit mites in iudicio, qui docet mansuetos uias suas. Nec uestrum ocium ecclesiae necessitatibus preponatis, cui parturienti si nulli boni ministrare uellent, quomodo nasceremini non inueniretis.

C. XXXI. Gelasius commands that a certain monk Rufinus be made a priest and ordained in a certain basilica.

Likewise Pope Pelagius to Bonus, Bishop of Sabina. We have learned that in your parish the office of priest is lacking at the basilica of Saint Lawrence, which was founded on the possession of our son and counselor, the magnificent man Theodore. And because our aforesaid son reported to us that he had found a certain monk Rufinus, long approved by him in life and conduct, and requests that this man be consecrated priest there—which we did not agree should be done suddenly without the prescribed observance—for that reason, when your belovedness has received these things, let it cause him to be made a deacon on the coming Saturday; and, if God wills and we live, we shall make him a priest in the middle of the week, so that, when the paschal solemnity arrives, the sacred mysteries may be fulfilled in the aforesaid basilica by a suitable person.

C. XXXI. Gelasius quendam Rufinum monachum iubet sacerdotem fieri, et in quadam basilica ordinari.

Item Pelagius Papa Bono Episcopo Sauinati. In parrochia tua, basilica S. Laurentii, que in possessione filii et consiliarii nostri uiri magnifici Theodori fundata est, offitium presbiteri deesse cognouimus. Et quia prefatus filius noster nobis retulit, inuenisse se Rufinum quendam monachum, olim sibi uita et moribus conprobatum, et hunc postulat ibi presbiterum consecrari (quod subito fieri nos prerogata obseruantia non adquieuimus), ideoque dilectio tua his acceptis sabbato ueniente faciat eum diaconum, et, si Deus uoluerit et uixerimus, mediana ebdomada presbiterum faciemus, quatinus superueniente pascali festiuitate sacra misteria in memorata basilica a persona conpetenti ualeant adinpleri.

C. XXXII. One who becomes a monk from being a cleric can be chosen and consecrated when his own bishop ordains him.

Likewise Gregory in the Register. If it happens that any persons come from the clerical state to the monastic way of life, if a monk shall be of such a life that the bishop whom he had previously served foresees him to be worthy of the priesthood, he can be chosen and ordained in the place where the bishop shall judge.

C. XXXII. Qui de clerico monachus efficitur proprio episcopo ordinante poterit eligi et consecrari.

Item Gregorius in Registro. Si quos a clericatu in monachicam conuersationem uenire contigerit, si talis uitae monachus fuerit, ut episcopus, cui ante militauerat, eum dignum sacerdotio preuideat, in loco, quo iudicauerit, eligi poterit et ordinari.

C. XXXIII. Without the testimony of the abbot, monks are not to be chosen for the clerical office.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 27]. Wandering monks are not to be ordained to the clerical office, either in parishes or in cities, unless their abbot shall have given testimony for them. § 1. For if it shall be necessary that a cleric be ordained from among the monks, let the bishop presume to do so with the consent and will of the abbot.

C. XXXIII. Sine testimonio abbatis ad clericatus offitium monachi non eligantur.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 27.] Monachi uagantes ad offitium clericatus (nisi eis testimonium abbas suus dederit), nec in parrochiis, nec in ciuitatibus ordinentur. §. 1. Si enim necesse fuerit clericum de monachis ordinari, cum consensu et uoluntate abbatis presumat episcopus.

C. XXXIV. With the abbot's will, let those monks be ordained whom the bishop wishes to ordain for the utility of the church.

Likewise from the Council of Lleida, [c. 3]. When, for the utility of the church, the bishop shall have approved that some of the monks ought to be promoted to clerical office, they ought to be ordained with the will of the abbot. But those things which are offered from resources under the right of the monastery are in no respect to be touched by the bishops under diocesan law.

> C. XXXIV. Cum abbatis uoluntate monachi ordinentur, quos pro utilitate ecclesiae episcopus ordinare uoluerit.
> Item ex Concilio Ylerdensi. [c. 3.] Cum pro utilitate ecclesiae aliquos monachorum in clericatus offitio episcopus probauerit promouendos, cum abbatis uoluntate debent ordinari. Ea uero, que in iure monasterii de facultatibus offeruntur, in nullo diocesiana lege ab episcopis contingantur.

C. XXXV. Without the abbot's command, monks are not to presume to celebrate ecclesiastical ministries.

Likewise from the Council of Tarragona, [c. 11]. We forbid monks going outside the monastery to presume to perform any ecclesiastical ministry, except perhaps at the abbot's command. Likewise, let none of them—that is, of the monks—be an undertaker or executor of external business, except that which the utility of the monastery demands, with the abbot nevertheless commanding him.

> C. XXXV. Sine abbatis inperio ecclesiastica non presumant celebrare ministeria monachi.
> Item ex Concilio Terraconensi. [c. 11.] Monachi a monasterio foras egredientes ne aliquod ministerium ecclesiasticum presumant agere prohibemus, nisi forte cum abbatis inperio. Similiter, ut nullus eorum, id est monachorum, forensis negocii susceptor uel executor existat, nisi id quod monasterii exposcit utilitas, abbate sibi nichilominus inperante.

C. XXXVI. Deserters of monasteries are not to be chosen for clerical service.

Likewise Augustine to Aurelius, [letter LXXVI]. I read the letter of your kindness concerning Donatus and his brother, and for a long time I wavered over what I should answer. Yet, upon considering again and again what is useful for the salvation of those whom we serve by nourishing them in Christ, nothing else could occur to me except that a way is not to be given to servants of God by which they might think themselves more easily chosen for something better if they shall have become worse. For a fall becomes easier for them, and a most unworthy injury is done to the order of clerics, if deserters of monasteries are chosen for clerical service, since from those who remain in the monastery we are accustomed to take into the clergy only the more approved and better men—unless perhaps, just as common people say, "A bad flute-player is a good symphonist"; in the same way those same common people will jest about us, saying, "A bad monk is a good cleric." It is exceedingly to be lamented if we raise monks up to such ruinous pride and deem clerics, among whose number we are, worthy of such grave insult, since sometimes even a good monk scarcely makes a good cleric if sufficient continence is present in him but necessary instruction or the integrity proper to his person is nevertheless lacking. But concerning these men, I believe your blessedness judged that they had departed from the monastery with our will, so that they might instead be useful to those of their own region. But this is false: they went away of their own accord, they deserted of their own accord, while we resisted as much as we could for the sake of their salvation. PART III. GRATIAN. By all these authorities it is shown that monks who have been elected by the people and ordained by the bishop with the consent of their abbot can lawfully exercise their power. But that statement of Gregory, "No one can serve ecclesiastical duties, etc.," is to be understood of those who, having been ordained among the cardinals or bishops, contend that the administration of their monastery is to be reserved to themselves. Hence the same Gregory writes to Marinianus, Bishop of Ravenna, [book VI, letter 40]:

C. XXXVI. Ad clericatus miliciam non eligantur desertores monasteriorum.

Item Augustinus ad Aurelium. [ep. LXXVI.] Legi epistolam benignitatis tuae de Donato et fratre eius, et quid responderem diu fluctuaui. Sed tamen etiam atque etiam cogitanti quid sit utile saluti eorum, quibus nutriendis in Christo seruimus, nichil mihi aliud occurrere potuit, nisi non esse uiam dandam seruis Dei, ut se facilius putent eligi ad aliquid melius, si facti fuerint deteriores. Etenim ipsis facilior lapsus, et ordini clericorum fit indignissima iniuria, si desertores monasteriorum ad miliciam clericatus eligantur, cum ex his qui in monasterio permanent, non tamen nisi probatiores atque meliores in clerum assumere soleamus, nisi forte (sicut uulgares dicunt) malus coraula bonus simphoniacus est; ita idem ipsi uulgares de nobis iocabuntur, dicentes: malus monachus bonus clericus est. Nimis dolendum est, si ad tam ruinosam superbiam monachos subrigimus, et tam graui contumelia clericos dignos putamus, in quorum numero sumus, cum etiam aliquando bonus monachus uix bonum clericum faciat, si adsit ei sufficiens continentia, et tamen desit instructio necessaria, aut personae regularis integritas. Sed de istis credo arbitrata sit beatitudo tua, quod nostra uoluntate (ut suis potius conregionalibus utiles essent) de monasterio recessissent. Sed falsum est; sponte abierunt sponte deseruerunt, nobis, quantum potuimus, pro eorum salute renitentibus. III. Pars. Gratian. His omnibus auctoritatibus monstratur, quod monachi, qui a populo sunt electi et ab episcopo cum consensu sui abbatis sunt ordinati, legitime potestatem suam exequi ualent. Illud uero Gregorii: "Nemo potest ecclesiasticis obsequiis deseruire, etc." de illis intelligendum est, qui, in numero cardinalium uel episcoporum ordinati, monasterii sui dispensationem sibi reseruare contendunt. Unde idem Gregorius scribit Mariniano Episcopo Rauennati: [lib. VI. epist. 40.]

C. XXXVII. Monasteries are not to be burdened because of the promotion of an abbot or monk.

Lest monasteries perhaps sustain some burden because of the promotion of any monk or abbot, it must be our care that, if any of the monks from any monastery shall advance to a clerical office or sacred order, he is thereafter to have no power there.

C. XXXVII. Pro abbatis uel monachi promotione monasteria non grauentur.

Ne pro cuiuslibet monachi aut abbatis promotione onus aliquod fortasse monasteria sustineant, studendum nobis est, ut, si quispiam monachorum ex quocumque monasterio ad clericatus offitium uel ordinem sacrum accesserit, non ibi aliquam ulterius habeat potestatem.

C. XXXVIII. Those who serve churches in any manner cannot be abbots.

The same to Maximianus, Bishop of Syracuse, [book III, letter 11]. Do not permit priests, deacons, and others of any order who serve churches in any manner to be abbots in monasteries; but either, having undertaken clerical service, let them not be promoted to monastic ranks, or, if they have resolved to remain in the place of an abbot, let them by no means be permitted to have clerical service. For it is sufficiently incongruous if, when someone cannot diligently fulfill one of these because of its magnitude, he is considered suitable for both. GRATIAN. This can be understood to have been said either generally or by a special privilege, just as this is also read concerning a certain monastery in the Register of Gregory:

C. XXXVIII. Qui ecclesiis quoquomodo militant abbates esse non possunt.

Idem Maximiano Siracusano Episcopo. [lib. III. epist. 11.] Presbiteros, diaconos, ceterosque cuiuslibet ordinis qui ecclesiis quoquo modo militant, abbates per monasteria esse non permittas; sed aut admissa clericatus milicia monachicis non promoueantur ordinibus, aut, si in abbatis loco permanere decreuerint, clericatus nullatenus permittantur habere miliciam. Satis enim incongruum est, si, cum unum ex his pro sui magnitudine diligenter quis non possit explere, ad utrumque uideatur ydoneus. Gratian. Hoc uel generaliter, uel speciali priuilegio dictum potest intelligi, sicut etiam de quodam monasterio in registro Gregorii legitur hoc modo:

C. XXXIX. Concerning a certain hospice whose abbot is forbidden to be chosen for the episcopate.

Hence it is also that, desiring to free from the perversity of evil persons a hospice or monastery established in the same kingdom of the Franks, because it was being managed uncanonically through the ambitions and contentions of certain persons, he commanded that no abbot ever be introduced there by any surreption without royal provision and the election of the monks. He also commanded that the abbot of the same monastery should never be chosen for the episcopate, lest perhaps the abbey suffer some detriment by occasion of the episcopate. This privilege belongs to that church in such a way that it can by no means give a common law to kings or abbots. For what is conceded individually to one does not immediately befit all. GRATIAN. By the preceding authority abbots are not forbidden to be made priests, since blessed Benedict commands the abbot to give a blessing to brothers departing and returning, which belongs to priests alone. He likewise assigns to the abbot the reading of the Gospel lesson, and to read it with the prayer that follows is similarly an act of the priestly office. But he forbids such men to be made priests or deacons as are compelled to remain continually in ecclesiastical service. § 1. Likewise, those statements of Jerome to Riparius and Desiderius, "A monk has the office not of teaching but of mourning"; and to Heliodorus, "The condition of a monk is one thing, that of a cleric another"; and to Rusticus, "Without the counsel of priests monks are permitted to do nothing," are not to be understood so generally that no monk is permitted to undertake the office of teaching, lest we be compelled to deny that blessed Gregory, or Augustine, bishop of the English, or also blessed Martin, and innumerable others whom Scripture testifies were promoted from the monastic way of life to the highest grade of the priesthood, possessed the office of teaching; or lest we assert that on the day of their consecration they departed from their former purpose, which, as Innocent testifies, no one is permitted to do. Therefore Jerome wished to distinguish between the person of a monk and of a cleric, showing what befits each from his proper office. § 2. For one thing befits each insofar as he is a monk, another insofar as he is a cleric. Insofar as he is a monk, he has the office of lamenting his own sins and those of others; insofar as he is a cleric, of teaching and feeding the people. § 3. But ecclesiastical history testifies that until the time of Eusebius, Zosimus, and Siricius, monks were simply monks and not clerics. Jerome himself also relates that the monks of Scythia came together as one in order that they might find a priest for themselves who would celebrate for them the solemnities of the Masses.

C. XXXIX. De quodam senodochio, cuius abbas ad episcopatum eligi prohibetur.

Hinc est etiam, quod senodochium seu monasterium, quod in eodem Francorum regno constitutum est, quia per ambiciones et contenciones quorumdam non canonice tractabatur, a peruersitate malorum liberare cupiens precepit, ut sine regali prouidentia, et monachorum electione nullus ibi abbas aliqua umquam subreptione introduceretur. Precepit etiam, ut eiusdem monasterii abbas numquam ad episcopatum eligeretur, ne forte occasione episcopatus abbatia aliquid detrimenti pateretur. Quod priuilegium ita est illius ecclesiae, ut communem legem regibus uel abbatibus omnino dare non possit. Non enim quod uni singillatim conceditur statim omnibus conuenit. Gratian. Superiori auctoritate non prohibentur abbates sacerdotes fieri, cum B. Benedictus iubeat abbatem fratribus egredientibus et regredientibus benedictionem dare, quod non est nisi sacerdotum. Lectionem quoque euangelii similiter ad legendum abbati tribuit, quam subsequenti oratione legere similiter sacerdotalis offitii est. Sed tales sacerdotes uel diacones fieri prohibet, qui in ecclesiastica milicia cogantur iugiter permanere. §. 1. Item illud Ieronimi ad Riparium et Desiderium: "Monachus non doctoris, sed plangentis offitium habet," et ad Eliodorum: "Alia causa est monachi, alia clerici," et ad Rusticum: "Sine consilio presbiterorum monachis nichil agere licet," non ita generaliter intelligendum est, ut nulli monachorum liceat docendi offitium assumere, ne B. Gregorium, aut Augustinum Anglorum episcopum, beatum quoque Martinum, innumeros etiam, quos de monachica conuersatione ad summum sacerdotii gradum scriptura testatur esse promotos, cogamur negare offitium docendi habuisse, aut in die consecrationis suae asseramus eos a proposito priori discessisse, quod (ut Innocentius testatur) nulli facere licet. Voluit ergo Ieronimus distinguere inter personam monachi et clerici, ostendens quid cuique ex proprio offitio conueniat. §. 2. Aliud enim conuenit cuique ex eo, quod monachus est: aliud ex eo, quod clericus est. Ex eo, quod monachus est, sua et aliorum peccata deflendi habet offitium: ex eo, quod clericus, docendi et pascendi populum. §. 3. Monachos autem usque ad tempus Eusebii, Zosimi et Siricii, monachos simpliciter, et non clericos fuisse, ecclesiastica testatur ystoria. Idem etiam Ieronimus refert, monachos Scithiae conuenisse in unum, ut sacerdotem sibi inuenirent, qui eis missarum solempnia celebraret.

C. XL. All clerics or monks ought to have immunity from guardianship.

Likewise Emperor Leo, [book I of the Code, title On Bishops and Clerics, law 51]. We decree generally that all most reverend bishops, as well as priests or deacons and subdeacons, and especially monks, although they are not clerics, have by the law itself immunity from every guardianship, whether testamentary, statutory, or assigned; and that they are not only exempt from guardianship but also from curatorship, not only of wards and minors but of a madman, a mute, a deaf person, and other persons to whom guardians or curators are given by the ancient laws. § 1. Nevertheless, we decree that those clerics and monks have a benefit of this kind who remain attached to the sacrosanct churches or monasteries, neither wandering nor idle concerning the divine ministries, since we grant them this benefit for this very reason: that, having abandoned all other things, they may cleave to the ministries of almighty God. § 2. And we decree that this shall obtain not only in old Rome or in this royal city, but in every land wherever the Christian name is worshiped. GRATIAN. § 3. They also received immunity from new assessments and base public burdens. Hence Constantine writes to all clerics, [in the same title, the first law]: "According to the enactment which you are said to have merited long ago, no one shall bind your lands and slaves to new assessments, but you shall enjoy exemption." Likewise Emperors Honorius and Theodosius, [in the same book, title On the Sacrosanct Churches, law: § 4]: "It pleases us, after the tenor of a reasonable counsel has been weighed, to prescribe by strict moderation from which necessities especially the churches of the individual cities are to be held immune. First, indeed, the insult of that usurpation must be repelled, lest estates dedicated to the uses of the heavenly mysteries be vexed with the dregs of base public burdens; henceforth let nothing extraordinary or additionally imposed be demanded, let no obligation of transport be assigned, and finally let nothing be ascribed to their public obligations beyond the canonical payment, except what a sudden burden of an unforeseen necessity shall have demanded. If anyone contravenes this, after the severity of the penalty due—which is lawfully to be brought forth against the sacrilegious—let him be consumed by exile in perpetual deportation." [GRATIAN.] The same is given to be understood from the words of blessed Sylvester, who, assigning the obedience of inferiors toward superiors, says: "Let the abbot be subject to the doorkeeper, the monk to the abbot," above in the tract on those to be ordained. Jerome therefore shows that monks simply as such are permitted to do nothing without the counsel of priests. Nor are they permitted to assume the office of teaching for themselves without the authority of clerics, except perhaps when inwardly admonished by divine grace, as blessed Gregory relates in the dialogue concerning blessed Benedict, who brought the people of Monte Cassino to the faith and overthrew the altar of Apollo which had been erected there; and concerning a certain Equitius, to whom an angel appeared in dreams and sent him to preach; and when he complained of a defect of his tongue, the angel touched his tongue with a lancet and cured that entire defect. § 1. But Jerome's numbering himself among such persons is like that statement of the Apostle to the Philippians, "As many of us as are imperfect, let us think this," numbering himself among the imperfect. Hence the same Jerome says elsewhere, "Born in a poor house and rustic hut." And below: "We, laden with gold," numbering himself, who was hungry, among those who disdain honey, and himself, who was poor, among the rich, above where clerics who do not wish to relinquish their own property are treated, in the chapter "The glory of a bishop." § 2. Behold, it has been sufficiently shown that monks adorned with the honor of the priesthood, elected by the people, and instituted by the bishop are permitted the same things as other priests. This is also proved from the similarity of consecration. For one thing is not said in their consecration and another in the consecration of others. For the bishop earnestly asks that a blessing be poured out by the Lord upon both in common. And when he consecrates, he says individually to all priests: "May these hands be consecrated and sanctified, O Lord, so that whatever they shall consecrate may be consecrated, and whatever they shall bless may be blessed." Behold, the blessing is common. Whence, then, the separation between them? Therefore, just as in the blessing both obtain a common power, so in institution they commonly attain the exercise of that power. § 3. But without the permission of bishops, the exercise of power is forbidden not only to monks but also generally to all clerics. Hence Clement, [letter III]:

> Item Leo Augustus. [lib. I. Codicis, de Episcopis et Clericis, lege 51.] Generaliter sanccimus, omnes uiros reuerentissimos episcopos, nec non presbiteros seu diaconos et subdiaconos, et precipue monachos, licet non sint clerici, inmunitatem ipso iure omnis habere tutelae, siue testamentariae siue legitimae, siue datiuae, et non solum tutelae esse eos expertes, sed etiam curae, non solum pupillorum et adultorum, sed furiosi, et muti, et surdi, et aliarum personarum, quibus tutores uel curatores a ueteribus legibus dantur. §. 1. Eos tamen clericos et monachos huiusmodi habere beneficium sanccimus, qui ad sacrosanctas ecclesias uel monasteria permanent, non deuagantes, neque circa ministeria diuina desides, cum propter hoc ipsum beneficium eis indulgemus, ut, aliis omnibus derelictis, Dei omnipotentis inhereant ministeriis. §. 2. Et hoc non solum in ueteri Roma uel in hac regia ciuitate, sed in omni terra, ubicunque Christianorum colitur nomen, obtinere sanccimus. Gratian. §. 3. Nouarum etiam collationum et sordidorum munerum inmunitatem acceperunt. Unde Constantinus cunctis scribit clericis: [tit. eodem, lege prima] "Iuxta sanctionem, quam dudum meruisse perhibemini, fundos et mancipia uestra nullus nouis collationibus obligabit, sed uacatione gaudebitis." Item Inperator Honorius et Theodosius: [eodem libro, titulo de sacrosanctis ecclesiis, lege: §. 4.] "Placet, rationabilis consilii tenore perpenso, districta moderatione perscribere, a quibus specialiter necessitatibus ecclesiae urbium singularum habeantur inmunes. Prima quippe illius usurpationis contumelia depellenda est, ne predia usibus celestium secretorum dedicata, sordidorum munerum fece uexentur, nichil extraordinarium abhinc superindictumue flagitetur, nulla sollicitudo translationis signetur, postremo nichil preter canonicam illationem preter quam aduenticiae necessitatis sarcina repentina poposcerit, eius functionibus asscribatur. Si quis contra uenerit, post debitae ulcionis acrimoniam, que erga sacrilegos iure promenda est, exilio perpetuae deportationis uratur." [Gratian.] Hoc idem datur intelligi ex uerbis B. Siluestri, qui obedientiam minorum erga maiores assignans ait: "Abbas hostiario, monachus abbati sit subditus," supra in tractatu ordinandorum. Ostendit ergo Ieronimus, quod simpliciter monachis nichil liceat agere sine consilio presbiterorum. Nec offitium docendi sibi assumere liceat sine auctoritate clericorum, nisi forte diuina gratia intus conmoniti, sicut B. Gregorius refert in dialogo de B. Benedicto, qui homines montis Cassini ad fidem adduxit, et aram Apollinis, que ibi erat erecta, subuertit; et de quodam Equicio, cui angelus in somniis apparuit, et eum ad predicandum misit, qui, cum de uicio linguae conquereretur, angelus flebotomo linguam eius tetigit, et totum uicium illud curauit. §. 1. Quod uero Ieronimus se ipsum talibus connumerat, tale est, quale est illud Apostoli ad Philippenses: "Quicumque inperfecti sumus," hoc sentiamus, se ipsum inperfectis connumerans. Hinc idem Ieronimus alibi ait: "Natus in paupere domo et tugurio rusticano." Et infra: "Nos suffarcinati auro," se famelicum fastidientibus mella, pauperem diuitibus connumerans, supra ubi agitur de clericis, qui propria relinquere nolunt, capitulo "Gloria episcopi." §. 2. Ecce sufficienter monstratum est, quod monachis presbiterii honore decoratis, a populo electis, ab episcopo institutis, eadem liceant, que et aliis sacerdotibus. Probatur hoc etiam ex similitudine consecrationis. Non enim in consecratione eorum aliud dicitur, et aliud in consecratione aliorum. Utrisque enim in commune a Domino benedictionem infundi episcopus obnixe deposcit. Et dum consecrat, cunctis sacerdotibus singillatim dicit: "Consecrentur et sanctificentur, Domine, manus istae, ut quicquid consecrauerint consecratum sit, et quecumque benedixerint benedicta sint." Ecce communis est benedictio. Unde igitur diuortium? Sicut ergo in benedictione utrique communem nanciscuntur potestatem, ita in institutione communiter assecuntur potestatis executionem. §. 3. Ceterum absque episcoporum licentia non solum monachis, sed etiam omnibus generaliter clericis potestatis executio interdicitur. Unde Clemens: [epist. III.]

C. XLI. Priests are not to perform priestly offices without the permission of the bishops.

It must be attended to by all the faithful and especially by all priests and deacons and the other clerics that they do nothing without the permission of their own bishop; certainly let no priest celebrate Masses in his parish without his command, nor baptize, nor do anything without his permission. PART IV. GRATIAN. But concerning those who remain within the cloisters of a monastery, to whom a people is not committed to be governed, it is asked whether they ought to give or receive tithes. In their case this distinction is to be observed: that from fields and vineyards which are cultivated for their own maintenance they retain the tithes for themselves. For if tithes were rendered by the people to the sons of Levi for the ministry by which they served the Lord in the tabernacle, offering sacrifices and burnt offerings for the people, it is evident that monks are no more compelled to pay tithes from their own estates than are other priests. § 1. But it is said that the estates of monks, whether bought for a price or offered for the salvation of souls, used to pay first fruits and tithes to baptismal churches or to any other churches before they came under the monks' right, and those churches cannot be deprived of their right. Hence it is found to have been enacted at the Council of Mainz:

C. XLI. Sacerdotalia offitia sine permissu episcoporum non agant presbiteri.

Cunctis fidelibus et summopere omnibus presbiteris, et diaconibus, et reliquis clericis attendendum est, ut nichil absque episcopi licentia proprii agant; non utique missas sine eius iussu quisquam presbiterorum in sua parrochia agat, non baptizet, nec quicquam absque eius permissu faciat. IV. Pars. Gratian. De his uero, qui intra monasterii claustra consistunt, quibus populus ad regendum non conmittitur, queritur, utrum decimas debeant dare uel accipere? In quibus hec discretio seruanda est, ut de agris et uineis, que ad proprium stipendium coluntur, decimas sibi retineant. Si enim decimae a populo filiis Leui reddebantur pro ministerio, quo Domino deseruiebant in tabernaculo, offerendo sacrificia et holocausta pro populo, patet, quod monachi de propriis prediis non magis quam alii sacerdotes decimas soluere coguntur. §. 1. Sed dicitur, predia monachorum, siue precio sint empta siue pro salute animarum oblata, antequam in ius eorum uenirent, baptismalibus ecclesiis siue quibuslibet aliis primicias et decimas persoluebant, illae autem ecclesiae suo iure priuari non possunt. Unde in Maguntiensi Concilio statutum inuenitur:

C. XLII. One who shall have assigned his property to anyone cannot take the revenue from tithes away from the former church.

If any layman or cleric, or person of either sex, shall have assigned places or property belonging to him to anyone, he is to have no power to withdraw from that property the revenue from tithes lawfully assigned to the former church. But if he shall attempt to do this, let such a conveyance be deemed wholly void, and let him be constrained to amendment by ecclesiastical censure.

C. XLII. Qui res suas alicui delegauerit, decimationum prouentum priori ecclesiae auferre non poterit.

Si quis laicus, uel clericus, seu utriusque sexus persona, proprietatis suae loca uel res alicubi dare delegauerit, decimationum prouentum priori ecclesiae legitime assignatum inde abstrahere nullam habeat potestatem. Quod si facere temptauerit, talis traditio irrita prorsus ducatur, et ipse ad emendationem ecclesiastica coherceatur censura.

C. XLIII. Older churches are not to be deprived of either tithes or any possession.

Likewise from the Council of Chalon. Churches established in ancient times are not to be deprived of either tithes or any possession, so that they are given to new oratories.

C. XLIII. Antiquiores ecclesiae nec decimis, nec ulla possessione priuentur.

Item ex Concilio Cabillonensi. Ecclesiae antiquitus constitutae nec decimis, nec ulla possessione priuentur, ita ut nouis oratoriis tribuantur.

C. XLIV. Older churches are not to lose their right because of new ones.

Likewise from the Council of Worms. Whoever shall wish to build a church on his own property, and shall have the consent and will of the bishop in whose parish it is, is permitted to do so. Nevertheless, the bishop must take care in every way that other, older churches do not lose their right or tithe because of new ones, but that these are always paid to the older churches. GRATIAN. But Leo IV affirms that tithes are to be paid to baptismal churches, saying:

C. XLIV. Antiquiores ecclesiae propter nouas iusticiam suam non perdant.

Item ex Concilio Guarmaciensi. Quicumque uoluerit in sua proprietate ecclesiam edificare, et consensum et uoluntatem episcopi habuerit, in cuius parrochia est, licitum sit. Verumtamen omnino prouidendum est episcopo, ut aliae ecclesiae antiquiores propter nouas suam iusticiam aut decimam non perdant, sed semper ad antiquiores ecclesias persoluantur. Gratian. Decimas autem baptismalibus ecclesiis persoluendas, Leo IV. affirmat, dicens:

C. XLV. Tithes ought to be given to baptismal churches.

Concerning tithes, it seemed justly not only to us but also to our predecessors that they ought to be given only to the parishes where sacrosanct baptisms are administered. GRATIAN. Therefore, if no one is permitted to withdraw the revenue from tithes from the former church to which it had been assigned; if the right of an older church is not to be given to new ones; if tithes are to be given only to baptismal churches: it is evident that monks are compelled to give tithes from their own estates. But that authority of the Council of Mainz speaks of a seller or donor, determining that he who sells or gives cannot take the revenue from tithes away from the church to which it had previously been lawfully assigned. Monks, however, retain tithes and first fruits not by the authority of the seller or donor but by the authority of the same council and Pope Paschal, by whom it was determined that monks do not pay tithes from their own estates. For thus it was enacted at the Council of Mainz:

C. XLV. Baptismalibus ecclesiis decimae dari debent.

De decimis iusto ordine non tantum nobis, sed etiam maioribus uisum est plebibus tantum, ubi sacrosancta baptismata dantur, debere dari. Gratian. Si ergo nulli licet decimationum prouentum a priori ecclesia, cui assignatus fuerat, abstrahere; si ius antiquioris ecclesiae nouis tribuendum non est; si decimae tantummodo baptismalibus ecclesiis dandae sunt: patet, quod monachi ex propriis prediis decimas dare coguntur. Sed illa auctoritas Magontiensis concilii de uenditore uel donatore loquitur, diffiniens, quod ille, qui uendit aut donat, non potest prouentum decimationum illi ecclesiae detrahere, cui prius fuerat legitime assignatus. Monachi autem decimas et primicias non auctoritate uendentis aut donantis, sed auctoritate eiusdem concilii et Pascalis Papae detinent, a quibus difinitum est, ut monachi de propriis prediis decimas non soluant. Sic enim in Magontiensi Concilio statutum est:

C. XLVI. Abbots and bishops are not to pay tithes from their own estates.

Moreover, certain brothers complained that there were some bishops and abbots who did not permit tithes to be given to the church where their tenants hear Mass. Accordingly, this sacred assembly decreed that bishops and abbots are to cause tithes from the fields and vineyards which they have for the maintenance of themselves and their brothers to be brought to their own churches, but that their households are to give their tithes where their infants are baptized and where they hear Masses throughout the whole course of the year.

C. XLVI. De propriis prediis abbates et episcopi decimas non persoluant.

Questi sunt preterea quidam fratres, quod essent aliqui episcopi et abbates, qui decimas non sinerent dari ad ecclesiam, ubi illorum coloni missam audiunt. Proinde decreuit sacer iste conuentus, ut episcopi et abbates de agris et uineis, que ad suum et fratrum stipendium habent, ad ecclesias suas deferri faciant, familiae uero ibi dent decimas suas, ubi eorum infantes baptizantur, et ubi per totum anni circulum missas audiunt.

C. XLVII. Monks and canons are by no means to be compelled to pay tithes from their own labors.

Likewise Paschal II. The authority of divine law decreed that tithes are to be rendered by the people to priests and Levites. But no reason permits soldiers, bishops, or any persons whatsoever to extort tithes from monks or clerics living in common out of their own labors or sustenance. Hence blessed

Gregory says thus: “For those living a common life, what will there be for us to say now concerning the making of portions, or the furnishing of hospitality, and the fulfilling of mercy?” since everything that remains is to be expended on pious and religious causes, as the Lord says: “Give what remains as alms, and behold, all things are clean for you.” PART V. GRATIAN. But the statement that older churches are to be deprived neither of tithes nor of any possession because of new ones is not to be understood in such a way that it is believed in no way permissible for a bishop to grant for a time some part of the possessions or tithes of one church to another. For just as the Pope can unite two episcopates into one, so one episcopate can, with the consent of its own bishop, be divided into two; or even any church can, against the will of the metropolitan, be exempted from his jurisdiction by apostolic authority. Hence Pope Gregory writes to Bishop Benenatus, chapter XXV:

> C. XLVII. De propriis laboribus monachi et canonici decimas minime soluere cogantur.
> Item Pascalis II. Decimas a populo sacerdotibus ac Leuitis esse reddendas, diuinae legis sanxit auctoritas. Ceterum a monachis siue clericis communiter uiuentibus nulla ratio sinit ut milites aut episcopi, aut personae quelibet decimas de laboribus seu nutrimentis suis propriis extorquere debeant. Unde B. Gregorius sic ait: "Communi uita uiuentibus iam de faciendis portionibus, uel exhibenda hospitalitate, et adinplenda misericordia nobis quid erit loquendum?" cum omne, quod superest, in causis piis et religiosis erogandum sit, dicente Domino: "Quod superest date elemosinam, et ecce omnia munda sunt uobis." V. Pars. Gratian. Quod autem dicitur, ut antiquiores ecclesiae, nec decimis, nec ulla possessione priuentur propter nouas, non ita intelligendum est, ut nullo modo credatur licere episcopo aliquam partem possessionum uel decimationum unius ecclesiae alteri pro tempore tribuere. Sicut enim Papa duos episcopatus in unum potest redigere, ita et unus consentiente proprio episcopo in duos potest diuidi, uel etiam metropolitano inuito quelibet ecclesia ab eius iurisdictione apostolica eximi auctoritate. Unde Gregorius Papa scribit Benenato Episcopo, capitulo XXV.

C. XLVIII. Two episcopates can be united into one by apostolic authority.

Both the quality of the time and the proximity of the places invite us to unite the churches of Cumae and Misenum, since they are not separated from one another by a long interval of journey, nor—because of sins—is there so great a multitude of people that they ought to have two bishops, as formerly they did. Therefore, because the bishop of the fortress of Cumae has completed the course of this life, know that by the page of the present authority we have united both churches and committed them to you, and know also that you are the proper pontiff of both churches. And therefore, whatever things concerning either their patrimony or the ordination or promotion of the clergy you shall see fit to order and dispose according to the statutes of the canons, you shall have free license to do, as truly their proper bishop, by the consent and permission of our authority. Reside where you shall perceive it to be more convenient and useful, yet in such a way that you dispose with solicitous and provident care of the other church where you are not bodily present, so that the divine mysteries may be solemnly performed there with the Lord’s aid.

> C. XLVIII. Duo episcopatus in unum redigi possunt apostolica auctoritate.
> Et temporis qualitas, et uicinitas locorum nos inuitat, ut Cumanam atque Musinatium unire debeamus ecclesias, quoniam nec longe, a se itineris interuallo seiunctae sunt, nec (peccatis facientibus) tanta multitudo populi est, ut, sicut olim fuit debeant duos habere sacerdotes. Quia igitur Cumani castri sacerdos cursum uitae huius expleuit, utrasque nos ecclesias presentis auctoritatis pagina unisse tibique conmississe cognoscas, utrarumque etiam ecclesiarum scito te esse proprium pontificem. Et ideo quecumque uel de earum patrimonio uel cleri ordinatione promotioneue iuxta canonum statuta uisa fuerint ordinare atque disponere, habebis ut proprius reuera sacerdos liberam ex nostrae auctoritatis consensu atque permissione licentiam. Ubi uero commodius ac utilius esse perspexeris, habitato, ita sane, ut alteram ecclesiam cui corporaliter presens non es, sollicita prouidentique cura disponas, quatinus illic diuina misteria solempniter Domino prestante peragantur.

C. XLIX. Apostolic authority has power to unite two episcopates into one.

The same to Bishop John, [of Velletri, book II, letter 35]. After hostile impiety—because of sins—so desolated the churches of different cities that, with the people lacking, no hope of repairing them remained, we are constrained by very great care lest, when their bishops have died, the remnants of the people, with no governance of a pastor ruling them, be snatched away through the trackless places of faith by the snares of the crafty enemy—which may it not be. Therefore, often admonished by solicitude for this matter, this counsel settled in our heart: that we should entrust them to neighboring pontiffs to be governed. And therefore we have foreseen that the care and government of the church of Tres Tabernae is to be committed to your fraternity, which it is necessary to aggregate and unite to your church, so that, with Christ's aid, you can properly be bishop of both churches and have free license by our present permission, as their proper pontiff, to dispose with vigilant and canonical care whatever things concerning its patrimony or the ordination or promotion of the clergy shall seem fit to you.

C. XLIX. Duos episcopatus in unum redigere apostolica ualet auctoritas.

Idem Iohanni Episcopo. [Veliterno, lib. II. epist. 35.] Postquam hostilis inpietas diuersarum ciuitatum ita (peccatis facientibus) desolauit ecclesias, ut reparandi eas spes nullo modo populo deficiente remanserit, maiori ualde cura constringimur, ne defunctis earum sacerdotibus reliquiae plebis nullo pastoris moderamine gubernante per inuia fidei hostis callidi rapiantur (quod absit) insidiis. Huius ergo rei sollicitudine sepe conmoniti, hoc nostro sedit cordi consilium, ut uicinis eas mandaremus pontificibus gubernandas. Ideoque fraternitati tuae curam gubernationemque Triumtabernensium ecclesiae preuidimus conmittendam, quam tuae ecclesiae aggregari unirique necesse est, quatinus utrarumque ecclesiarum sacerdos recte Christo adiuuante possis existere, queque tibi de eius patrimonio, uel cleri ordinatione seu promotione uigilanti ac canonica uisa fuerint cura disponere, quippe ut pontifex proprius liberam habeas ex presenti nostra permissione licentiam.

C. L. Let dioceses which never had a bishop not have one.

Likewise from the Second Council of Carthage, [c. 5]. Felix, Bishop of Selemsela, said: If this also pleases you, I intimate to your holiness that dioceses which never had bishops are not to have them, and that a diocese which once had one is to have its own. According to this exposition, it belongs to your holiness to judge what ought to be done. It was said by all: It pleases us.

C. L. Non habeant episcopum dioceses, que numquam habuerunt.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi II. [c. 5.] Felix episcopus Selemselitanus dixit: Etiam si hoc placet, sanctitati uestrae insinuo, ut dioceses, que numquam episcopos habuerunt, non habeant, et illa diocesis, que aliquando habuit, habeat proprium. Secundum hanc prosecutionem sanctitatis uestrae est estimare quid fieri debeat. Ab uniuersis dictum est: Placet.

C. LI. Unless with the will of the bishop, dioceses which are held by them are not to receive their own bishops.

Likewise from the Third African Council. It has been enacted in many councils by the assembly of priests that communities which are retained in dioceses by bishops and which have never had bishops are not to receive their own rulers except with the will of that bishop by whom they are held.

> C. LI. Nisi cum uoluntate episcopi dioceses, que ab eis retinentur, non accipiant proprios episcopos.
> Item ex Affricano Concilio III. Multis conciliis hoc statutum est a cetu sacerdotali, ut plebes, que in diocesibus ab episcopis retinentur, que episcopos numquam habuerunt, non nisi cum uoluntate eius episcopi, a quo tenentur, proprios accipiant rectores.

C. LII. Apostolic authority has power to exempt bishops from the jurisdiction of an archbishop.

Likewise Gregory to John, Bishop of Larissa, [book II, indiction 11, letter 7]. Our brother Adrian, bishop of the city of Thebes, coming to the city of Rome, lamentably complained that he had been unjustly condemned by your fraternity, as well as by John, prelate of the city of Prima Justiniana, on certain charges. § 1. But with the Lord's aid we shall treat elsewhere of his most wicked judgment and its condemnation. We found, however, that Bishop Adrian had suffered both from your hatred contrary to priestly conduct and from having been condemned without any right by the sentence of your fraternity in pecuniary cases. § 2. Therefore, because he could not be deprived of the grade of his honor by being deposed contrary to law and the canons by the aforesaid John, bishop of Prima Justiniana, we decreed that he be restored in his church and recalled to the rank of his proper dignity. And although it would have been fitting that you be deprived of communion in the Lord's body because, after the removal effected by my predecessor of holy memory—by which he exempted Adrian and his church from the jurisdiction of your power—you presumed again to reserve some jurisdiction over them for yourself, nevertheless, deciding more humanely and preserving for you in the meantime the sacrament of communion, we decree that your fraternity abstain from every power of its former jurisdiction over him and his church; and, in accordance with the writings of our predecessor, if any case of faith, crime, or money can arise against our aforesaid fellow bishop Adrian, let it be examined through those who are or shall be our representatives in the royal city, if the question is of moderate importance, or let it be brought here to the apostolic see, if it is difficult, so that it may be determined by the sentence of our hearing.

But if at any time, by any occasion or surreption, you shall attempt to act against these things which we have established, we decree that you are deprived of sacred communion and that you are not to receive it, except at the final time of your life, unless permission of the Roman Pontiff has been granted. § 3. Moreover, let your fraternity restore to him without any delay the sacred or other movable and immovable property of his church which you are said to retain until now, a list of which, presented to us, we append to the present letters. If any question concerning these things arises between you, we will that it be ventilated before our representative in the royal city. GRATIAN. But if those places have not yet been assigned in the diocese of any bishop, let them receive their own bishop by the authority of the apostolic see. Hence Gregory the Younger writes to Boniface, [Bishop, final letter]:

> C. LII. Apostolica auctoritas a iurisdictione archiepiscopi episcopos ualet eximere.

Item Gregorius Iohanni Episcopo Lariseo. [lib. II. Indict. 11. epist. 7.] Frater noster Adrianus Thebanae ciuitatis episcopus, ad Romanam urbem ueniens, lacrimabiliter est conquestus de quibusdam se capitulis a fraternitate tua, nec non a Iohanne, primae Iustinianae urbis antistite, iniuste condempnatum. §. 1. De nequissimo autem eius iudicio dampnandoque alias tractaturi sumus iuuante Domino. Adrianum uero episcopum reperimus et tuo contra sacerdotales mores odio laborasse, et nullo iure pecuniariis in causis eum fraternitatis tuae condempnatum fuisse sententia. §. 2. Quia igitur et ab antefato Iohanne primae Iustinianae episcopo contra ius canonesque depositus honoris sui gradu carere non potuit, in sua eum reformari ecclesia atque in propriae dignitatis ordine decreuimus reuocari. Et cum oportuisset te ex eo dominici corporis communione priuari, quod post ammotionem sanctae memoriae decessoris mei (per quam eum ecclesiamque eius de tuae iurisdictione potestatis exemit) rursus in eis aliquid tibi iurisdictionis seruare presumpseris, tamen nos humanius decernentes, communionisque tibi sacramentum interim conseruantes decernimus, ut fraternitas tua ab eo ecclesiaque eius omnem ante habitae suae potestatem iurisdictionis abstineat, et secundum scripta decessoris nostri, si qua causa uel fidei uel criminis, uel pecuniaria aduersus prefatum Adrianum consacerdotem nostrum potuerit euenire, per eos, qui nostri sunt uel fuerint in urbe regia responsales, si mediocris est questio, cognoscatur, uel huc ad apostolicam sedem, si est ardua, deducatur, quatinus nostrae audientiae sentencia decidatur.

Quod si contra hec, que statuimus, quolibet tempore qualibet occasione uel subreptione uenire temptaueris, sacra te communione priuatum, nec eam te, excepto ultimo uitae tuae tempore, nisi cum concessa Romani Pontificis iussione decernimus percipere. §. 3. Res autem siue sacras, siue alias mobiles inmobilesque eius ecclesiae, quas hactenus dicitur retinere, (quarum noticiam nobis oblatam presentibus adnectimus litteris), sine aliqua ei fraternitas tua dilacione restituat. De quibus si qua inter uos questio uertitur, uolumus, ut apud responsalem nostrum in urbe regia uentiletur. Gratian. Si autem necdum in diocesi alicuius episcopi loca illa assignata fuerint, ex uigore apostolicae sedis proprium episcopum accipiant. Unde Gregorius iunior scribit Bonifatio: [Episcopo, epist. ult.]

C. LIII. Where the multitude of the faithful increases, bishops are to be ordained.

We command that, according to the statutes of the canons, where the multitude of the faithful has increased, you ought by the authority of the apostolic see to ordain bishops, yet with pious consideration, so that the dignity of the episcopate may not become cheap. GRATIAN. Just as two episcopates can be united into one in the manner written above, and one can be divided into two, so also a bishop can do this with baptismal and parochial churches, with the consent of his clerics. When this has been done, that part of the people which is subjected to the new churches is released from the right of the former church. If this could not be done, the multitude of churches would be reduced to fewness. But he cannot make several baptismal churches within one boundary. Hence it is read in the Council of Toledo:

C. LIII. Ubi multitudo excrescit fidelium, episcopi sunt ordinandi.

Precipimus, ut iuxta canonum statuta, ubi multitudo excreuit fidelium, ex uigore apostolicae sedis debeas ordinare episcopos, pia tamen contemplatione, ut non uilescat dignitas episcopatus. Gratian. Sicut duo episcopatus suprascripto modo in unum possunt redigi, et unus in duobus ualet diuidi, sic etiam episcopus de baptismalibus et parrochitanis ecclesiis facere potest cum consensu suorum clericorum. Quod cum factum fuerit, illa pars populi, que nouis ecclesiis subponitur, a iure prioris ecclesiae absoluitur. Hoc nisi fieri posset, multitudo ecclesiarum ad paucitatem redigeretur. Plures autem baptismales ecclesias in una terminatione facere non potest. Unde in Tolletano Concilio legitur.

C. LIV. Several baptismal churches cannot exist within one boundary.

Several baptismal churches cannot exist within one boundary, but only one with its chapels. And if there shall be a contention concerning the boundary of two mother churches, let the communities of both determine it; and if they do not agree, let the dispute be determined by the judgment of God. PART VI. GRATIAN. Therefore the right of churches is to be interpreted in such a way that, unless it shall have been assigned to other churches by the bishop's disposition, they suffer no diminution of their former revenues. Hence Pope Anastasius:

> C. LIV. In una terminatione plures baptismales ecclesiae esse non possunt.
> Plures baptismales ecclesiae in una terminatione esse non possunt, sed una tantummodo cum capellis suis. Et si contentio fuerit de terminatione duarum matricum, plebes utrarumque discernant, et si non conueniunt, lis Dei iudicio discernatur. VI. Pars. Gratian. Ius ergo ecclesiarum ita interpretandum est, ut, nisi episcopo disponente aliis ecclesiis fuerit assignatum, in nullo priorum reddituum diminutionem patiantur. Unde Anastasius Papa:

C. LV. Let one who wishes to retain tithes or offerings without the bishop's knowledge be deprived of communion.

We establish that if anyone shall contend for the offerings of a church or the tithes which the people ought to give, or shall wish to give them outside the baptismal church, without the knowledge of the bishop or of him to whom offices of this kind have been committed, and shall not wish to act with their counsel, let him pay our ban and be deprived of communion. GRATIAN. When he adds, "without the knowledge of the bishop," he leaves it to be understood that with the bishop's consent they can be given to other churches.

> C. LV. Communione priuetur qui decimas uel oblationes extra episcopi conscientiam tenere uoluerit.
> Statuimus, ut si quis oblationes ecclesiae, uel decimas, quas populus dare debet, contenderit, uel extra baptismalem ecclesiam dare uoluerit, preter conscientiam episcopi, uel eius, cui huiuscemodi offitia conmissa sunt, nec cum eorum uoluerit agere consilio, bannum nostrum conponat, et communione priuetur. Gratian. Cum addit: "extra conscientiam episcopi," intelligendum relinquit, quod episcopo consentiente aliis ecclesiis dari possunt.

C. LVI. Let tithes be distributed according to the bishop's disposition.

Likewise. It is prescribed in the sacred canons that tithes are to be distributed according to the bishop's disposition. But certain laymen who have basilicas of their own, either as their property or as benefices, disregard the bishop's disposition and give their tithes not to the churches where they receive baptism, preaching, the imposition of hands, and the other sacraments of Christ, but bestow them according to their own pleasure either upon their own basilicas or upon other churches; this is known to be contrary in every way to divine law and the sacred canons. Hence we call upon your power to correct them. GRATIAN. But when they are reproved because they do this in disregard of the bishop's disposition, it is understood that, if they shall do this at the bishop's disposition, they will be found irreproachable.

> C. LVI. Iuxta dispositionem episcopi decimae distribuantur.
> Item. In sacris canonibus prefixum est, ut decimae iuxta episcopi dispositionem distribuantur. Quidam autem laici, qui uel in propriis, uel in beneficiis suas habent basilicas, contempta episcopi dispositione non ad ecclesias, ubi baptismum, et predicationem, et manus inpositionem, et alia Christi sacramenta percipiunt, decimas suas dant, sed uel propriis basilicis, uel aliis ecclesiis pro suo libitu tribuunt, quod omnimodis diuinae legi et sacris canonibus constat esse contrarium. Unde uestram potestatem ut eos corrigatis expetimus. Gratian. Cum autem reprehenduntur, quia contempta episcopi dispositione hoc faciunt, intelligitur, quod, si episcopo disponente hoc fecerint, inreprehensibiles inueniantur.

C. LVII. Let one who wishes to dispense tithes or offerings without the bishop's knowledge be anathema.

Likewise Symmachus, Bishop of the Catholic Church of the city of Rome, said, [in the Sixth Roman Synod]. In the canons established with apostolic authority in the church of Gangra, it is written concerning offerings of fruits which are owed to the ministers of the church and concerning those things which are conferred for the uses of the poor: "If anyone shall wish to receive or give offerings of the church without the knowledge of the bishop or of him to whom offices of this kind have been committed, and shall not wish to act with his counsel, let him be anathema." And again in the same Council of Gangra: "If anyone shall give or receive things offered to God apart from the bishop or the consent of him who was appointed by the bishop to dispense mercy to the poor, let both the giver and the receiver be anathema." § 1. Therefore it is exceedingly iniquitous and an enormous sacrilege for anything that each person shall have conferred or indeed left to a venerable church, either for the remedy of sins or for the salvation or repose of souls, to be transferred or converted to another use by those by whom it is especially fitting that it be preserved—that is, by Christians and God-fearing persons, and above all by princes and the foremost persons of regions. And below:

§ 2. But in general, whoever shall presume by his perilous harassment to confiscate, claim, or seize the property of a church, [§ 3.] and likewise those who shall retain the property of a church by the command or largesse of princes or certain powerful persons, or by some invasion or tyrannical power, and shall leave it to their sons or heirs as though hereditary—as we have heard has already been done by certain persons—unless, when admonished by the pontiff and the truth acknowledged, they quickly restore the property of God, let them be struck with perpetual anathema. For we judge it iniquitous that we should be regarded as custodians of charters rather than defenders of property entrusted to us, as was commanded. And below: § 4. For wounds which do not feel soothing applications must be cut away with iron. § 5. Likewise, those who are not corrected by priestly admonition ought also to be made exiles from the church, as the Lord says: "Remove the evil from among you." The entire synod, rising, acclaimed: We ask that it be done thus. This was said eight times. Hear us, O Christ; life to Pope Symmachus. This was said twelve times.

C. LVII. Anathema sit qui preter conscientiam episcopi decimas uel oblationes dispensare uoluerit.

Item Simacus Episcopus Ecclesiae catholicae urbis Romae dixit. [in Sinodo sexta Romana] In canonibus, in Gangrensi ecclesia apostolica auctoritate conditis, de fructuum oblationibus, que ministris ecclesiae debentur, et de his, que in usus pauperum conferuntur, scriptum habetur: "Si quis oblationes ecclesiae accipere uel dare uoluerit preter episcopi conscientiam, uel eius, cui huiuscemodi offitia sunt conmissa, nec cum eius uoluerit agere consilio, anathema sit." Et iterum in eodem concilio Gangrensi: "Si quis oblata Deo dederit uel acceperit preter episcopum, uel eius consensum qui ab eo constitutus est ad dispensandam misericordiam pauperibus, et qui dat, et qui accipit anathema sit." §. 1. Valde ergo iniquum et ingens sacrilegium est, quecumque uel pro remedio peccatorum, uel pro salute, aut requie animarum suarum unusquisque uenerabili ecclesiae contulerit aut certe reliquerit, ab his, a quibus maxime seruari conuenit, id est Christianis et Deum timentibus hominibus, et super omnia a principibus et primis regionum, in aliud transferri uel conuerti. Et infra:

§. 2. Generaliter uero quicumque res ecclesiae confiscare, aut conpetere, uel peruadere periculosa sua infestatione presumpserit, [§. 3.] similiter et hi, qui res ecclesiae iussu uel largitione principum uel quorumdam potentum, aut quadam inuasione aut tirannica potestate retinuerint, et filiis uel heredibus suis (ut a quibusdam iam factum audiuimus) quasi hereditarias reliquerint, nisi cito res Dei, ammoniti a pontifice agnita ueritate reddiderint, perpetuo anathemate feriantur. Iniquum enim esse censemus, ut pocius custodes cartarum quam defensores rerum creditarum (ut preceptum est) iudicemur. Et infra: §. 4. Ferro enim abscidenda sunt uulnera, que fomenta non sentiunt. §. 5. Similiter et illi extorres debent fieri ab ecclesia, qui sacerdotali ammonitione non corriguntur dicente Domino: "Auferte malum ex uobis." Uniuersa sinodus surgens acclamauit. Ut ita fiat rogamus. Dictum est octies. Exaudi Christe, Simaco Papae uita. Dictum est duodecies.

C. LVIII. One who seizes the property of a church and the goods of bishops shall be punished by the same penalty.

The same. Likewise, by the exhortation and judgment of you all, we decree that this also shall come to the knowledge of all churches and be firmly maintained by all: because the property of bishops is not doubted to belong to the church, if an assault shall have been made upon their resources with like cruelty, let the plunderers of the aforesaid property be struck by the aforesaid severity of the canons, so that those who are corrected neither by their own conduct nor by any chastisement of conscience may at least be pierced by the goads of ecclesiastical and canonical vengeance.

C. LVIII. Eadem plectetur pena qui res ecclesiae et episcoporum bona inuadit.

Idem. Similiter et hoc ad omnium ecclesiarum noticiam uestra cunctorumque exortatione et iudicio censemus peruenire, et ab omnibus firmiter teneri, quia res episcoporum ecclesiae esse non dubitantur, si in eorum facultatibus simili fuerit crudelitate grassatum, peruasores rerum memoratarum predicta canonum districtione feriantur, ut qui moribus propriis ac nulla conscientiae castigatione corriguntur saltim ecclesiasticae et canonicae uindictae perfodiantur aculeis.

C. LIX. Ecclesiastical property cannot be distributed by the authority of princes.

Likewise from the book of Capitularies of the Emperors Charles and Louis, [c. 83]. Because, according to the tradition of the holy Fathers, we know that the property of the church is the vows of the faithful, the prices of sins, and the patrimonies of the poor, we endeavor not only to preserve for each what is possessed but also, with God's aid, to add to it. But so that we may remove entirely the suspicion long conceived by ecclesiastics concerning the division of ecclesiastical property, we establish that neither in our times, nor those of our sons, nor, by God's dispensation, those of our successors, shall it suffer any division or loss at all.

GRATIAN. Therefore, since anyone is forbidden to distribute the offerings of the church without the knowledge of the bishop or of him to whom offices of this kind have been committed, it plainly appears that with the bishop's consent they can be distributed to any churches. § 1. That authority of the Council of Toledo, [IV, c. 32], appears contrary to this interpretation.

C. LIX. Res ecclesiastica principum auctoritate distribui non possunt.

Item ex libro Capitulorum Karoli et Lodowici Inperatorum. [c. 83.] Quia iuxta sanctorum Patrum traditionem nouimus res ecclesiae uota fidelium esse, precia peccatorum, et patrimonia pauperum, cuique non solum habita conseruare, uerum etiam, Deo opitulante, conferre temptamus. Ut autem ab ecclesiasticis de diuidendis rebus ecclesiae suspicionem dudum conceptam penitus amoueamus, statuimus, ut neque nostris, neque filiorum, et, Deo dispensante, successorum nostrorum temporibus, ullam penitus diuisionem aut iacturam patiantur.

Gratian. Cum ergo preter conscientiam episcopi, uel eius, cui huiuscemodi offitia conmissa sunt, quilibet prohibetur oblationes ecclesiae distribuere, liquido apparet, quod cum episcopi consensu quibuslibet ecclesiis possint distribui. §. 1. Huic interpretationi uidetur contraire auctoritas illa Tolletani Concilii. [IV., c. 32.]

C. LX. Let bishops presume to take nothing from the right of their diocese.

It was established by the present council that bishops are to govern their dioceses in such a way that they presume to take nothing from their right, but, according to the authority of earlier councils, receive a third part both of offerings and of tributes and fruits. But if anything more than this shall have been presumed by them, let it be restored through the council, with the founders themselves appealing, or certainly their relatives, if the founders have already departed from this world.

C. LX. Nichil de iure suae diocesis episcopi presumant auferre.

Constitutum est a presenti concilio, episcopos dioceses suas ita regere, ut nichil ex earum iure presumant auferre, sed iuxta priorum auctoritatem conciliorum tam de oblationibus quam de tributis ac frugibus tertiam consequantur. Quod si amplius quippiam ab eis presumptum extiterit, per concilium restauretur, appellantibus ipsis conditoribus, aut certe propinquis eorum, si iam illi a seculo discesserunt.

C. LXI. Let no one have license to alienate possessions left to a church.

Likewise Pope Symmachus, [to his brother Caesarius, c. 1]. We do not permit possessions which anyone gave or left to a church by his own judgment to be alienated under any titles and conveyances or under any pretext, unless perhaps to clerics of good merit, to monasteries in consideration of religion, or certainly to pilgrims, if necessity shall counsel that they be bestowed; yet in such a way that these persons enjoy the same possessions not perpetually but temporarily. GRATIAN. But that statement of the Council of Toledo is to be understood in such a way that bishops touch nothing beyond the fourth or third part which is owed to them according to the diversity of places. Hence it was enacted in a council of Pope Leo IV, [c. 26]:

C. LXI. Possessiones ecclesiae derelictas nulli sit licentia alienandi.

Item Simacus Papa. [ad Caesarium fratrem c. 1.] Possessiones, quas unusquisque ecclesiae proprio dedit aut reliquit arbitrio, alienare quibuslibet titulis atque distractionibus, uel sub quocumque argumento non patimur, nisi forte aut clericis bonorum meritis, aut monasteriis religionis intuitu, aut certe peregrinis, si necessitas largiri suaserit; sic tamen, ut hec ipsa non perpetuo, sed temporaliter perfruantur. Gratian. Sed illud Tolletani concilii ita intelligendum est, ut episcopi preter quartam uel tertiam, que secundum locorum diuersitates eis debetur, nichil contingant. Unde in Concilio Leonis Papae [IV. c. 26.] statutum est:

C. LXII. Let a bishop exact nothing from clerics and pious places beyond the statutes of the Fathers.

Let none of the bishops be permitted to exact contributions beyond the statutes of the Fathers from a subject priest or any other cleric and from pious places, or to impose additional compulsory services. But since he ought to be an excellent overseer, let him oversee in such a way that all the sheep committed to him are especially nourished by him and aided in their necessities, not oppressed by illicit exactions, because the Lord taught us to feed and teach and to minister to all, not to delight in earthly gains and avarice.

> C. LXII. A clericis et piis locis ultra statuta Patrum aliquid episcopus non exigat.
> Nulli episcoporum liceat a subiecto sacerdote, uel alio quolibet clerico, et piis locis dationes ultra statuta Patrum exigere, aut superposita in angariis inferre. Sed cum optimus sit perspector, ita perspiciat, ut uniuersae sibi oues conmissae a se maxime alantur, atque in necessitatibus adiuuentur, non illicitis exactionibus obprimantur, quia Dominus pascere et docere nos docuit et omnibus ministrare, non terrenis lucris et auaritiis delectari.

C. LXIII. A fourth part of the revenues of a church is to be distributed to the clerics.

Likewise Gregory to Leo, Bishop of Catania, [book VII, letter 8]. The gradation of places and the order of reason distinguished and established that there should be judgments for this purpose: so that superiors may not be able to occupy themselves fruitlessly in oppressing those subject to them, nor, in turn, may there be an unbridled license for subjects to rebel against their superiors. § 1. Therefore we will that, from whatever shall perhaps accrue to your church from revenue or any other title, you ought to set aside a fourth portion without any diminution and distribute it discreetly, as shall seem fit to you, among the priests, deacons, and clergy according to the fear of God.

> C. LXIII. De redditibus ecclesiae quarta pars clericis distribuenda est.
> Item Gregorius Leoni Episcopo Cathinensi. [lib. VII. epist. 8.] Ad hoc locorum gradus rationis ordo distinxit et iudicia esse constituit, ut nec prepositi in obprimendos se frustra ualeant occupare subiectos, nec subiectis iterum contra suos prepositos effrenata sit resultandi licentia. §. 1. Volumus ergo, ut quicquid ecclesiae tuae ex redditu uel quolibet alio titulo fortassis accesserit, quartam exinde portionem sine diminutione aliqua debeas segregare, atque eam secundum Dei timorem presbiteris, diaconibus ac clero (ut tibi uisum fuerit) discrete diuidere.

C. LXIV. Bishops ought to exact nothing from their monks or clerics for the sake of shameful gain.

Likewise from the Seventh Synod, [c. 4]. The divine Apostle Paul, preacher of the church, as though laying down a canon for the priests of the Ephesians—indeed, for every consecrated multitude and fullness—testified thus confidently: "I coveted no one's silver or gold or garment. I showed you all things, because by laboring thus it is necessary to support the weak, judging it more blessed to give than to receive." For this reason we also, taught by him, determine that a bishop shall by no means, for the sake of shameful gain, devise excuses to excuse sins and demand gold or silver or another kind of property from the priests or clerics or monks who are under him. For the Apostle says: "Children ought not to lay up treasure for parents, but parents for children." And the Apostle Peter: "Feed the flock of God which is among you, not under compulsion but willingly according to God, not for the sake of shameful gain, nor as lording it over the clergy, but having been made an example to the flock. And when the prince of shepherds shall appear, you shall receive the unfading crown of glory." GRATIAN. But that which is placed at the end of the chapter of Symmachus, "Let these persons enjoy the same possessions not perpetually but temporarily," is to be referred only to personal possessions—namely, those of clerics and the poor—not to monastic possessions. PART VII. § 1. But how grave it is before God not to pay tithes, offerings, and first fruits to priests appears from the authority of Jerome and Augustine. For Jerome says on Malachi:

> C. LXIV. Episcopi turpis lucri gratia nichil a monachis uel clericis suis exigere debent.
> Item ex VII. Sinodo. [c. 4.] Predicator ecclesiae Paulus diuinus apostolus, ac si canonem ponens Ephesiorum presbiteris, imo uero et omni sacratae multitudini ac plenitudini, ita fiducialiter perhibuit: "Argentum et aurum, aut uestem nullius concupiui. Omnia ostendi uobis, quoniam sic laborantes oportet suscipere infirmos, beatius existimans dare quam accipere." Propter quod et nos docti ab eo diffinimus, nullatenus episcopum turpis lucri gratia excogitare ad excusandas excusationes in peccatis expetere aurum uel argentum, aut aliam speciem a presbiteris, uel clericis, uel monachis, qui sub ipso sunt. Ait enim Apostolus: "Non debent filii thesaurizare parentibus, sed parentes filiis." Et apostolus Petrus: "Pascite, qui in uobis est, gregem Dei, non coacte, sed spontanee secundum Deum, non turpis lucri gratia, neque ut dominantes in clero sed forma facti gregis. Et cum aparuerit princeps pastorum, percipietis inmarcescibilis gloriae coronam." Gratian. Illud autem, quod in fine capituli Simaci ponitur: "Hec ipsa non perpetuo, sed temporaliter perfruantur," ad personales tantum possessiones, clericorum uidelicet et pauperum, non ad monasteriales referendum est. VII. Pars. §. 1. Quam uero sit graue apud Deum decimas, et oblationes, ac primicias sacerdotibus non soluere, auctoritate Ieronimi et Augustini apparet. Ait namque Ieronimus super Malachiam:

C. LXV. One who has not paid tithes to priests is held guilty before God.

"Return to me, and I shall return to you, says the Lord of hosts; and you have said, In what shall we return? Will a man defraud God? For you defraud me; and you have said, In what do we defraud you? In tithes and first fruits. And you are accursed in want, and the whole nation defrauds me." Now let us follow the order of the prophet: "Because you have not rendered tithes and first fruits to me, therefore you are accursed with hunger and want, and you have supplanted or defrauded me." Behold, the year is completed, and you have carried nothing into my treasuries, but into your own barns; and in exchange for the tithes and first fruits, which were small things to be given by you, you have lost the abundance of your possessions and the entire plenty of your crops. But so that you may know that this was accomplished while I was angry because you defrauded me of my portion, I exhort and admonish you to bring tithes into the barns—that is, into the treasuries of the temple—and let the priests and Levites who minister to me have food; and test me, whether I shall not pour out such rains that the floodgates of heaven may be believed to have been opened, "and I shall pour out a blessing for you even unto abundance." The word "pouring out" indicates the designation of largesse. But it is possible that, when rains irrigate the fields, there may indeed be fertility, yet either the locust will come, or the caterpillar, or blight, or the cankerworm, and they will devastate the labors of men. Therefore he adds and says: "And I shall rebuke the devourers for your sake," namely the locust and the other things we have mentioned, "and they shall not corrupt the fruit of your land." § 1. Whenever famine, want, and a scarcity of all things oppress the world, let us know that this descends from the anger of God, who says that He is defrauded in the poor if they do not receive alms; and we can interpret His possessions as tithes and first fruits. § 2. If anyone learned and instructed in the law of the Lord can instruct others, he ought not to assign to his own prudence and talent what he possesses, but let him give thanks first to the Lord, who bestows all things, and then to His priests and ministers by whom he was taught. For if he shall not give thanks but shall claim knowledge for himself, he shall be accursed in want.

But if, understanding God to be the giver and giving thanks to those through whom he was instructed by God, he shall humble himself and bring food into God's barn—that is, shall minister the nourishment of Scripture to the peoples in the church—the floodgates of heaven shall immediately be opened over him, spiritual rain shall be poured out, and He shall command His clouds to rain a shower over him, and he shall enjoy an abundance of all things.

> C. LXV. Reus apud Deum habetur qui sacerdotibus decimas non soluerit.
> "Reuertimini ad me, et ego reuertar ad uos, dicit Dominus exercituum; et dixistis, in quo reuertemur? Si homo affiget Deum, quia uos configitis me, et dixistis, in quo configimus te? in decimis et in primiciis. Et in penuria uos maledicti estis, et me configitis tota gens." Nunc sequamur ordinem prophetae: "Quia michi non reddidistis decimas et primicias, idcirco in fame et penuria maledicti estis, et me uos subplantastis, siue defraudastis." Ecce annus expletus est, et nichil in meos thesauros, sed in uestra horrea conportastis et pro decimis et primiciis, que parua erant, ut a uobis darentur, ubertatem possessionum uestrarum et omnem frugum habundantiam perdidistis. Ut autem sciatis, me hoc irascente perfectum, quia fraudastis me parte mea, hortor uos atque conmoneo, ut inferatis decimas in horrea hoc est in thesauros templi, et habeant sacerdotes atque Leuitae, qui michi ministrant, cibos, et probate me, si non tantas pluuias effudero, ut catheractae celi apertae esse credantur, "et effundam uobis benedictionem usque ad habundantiam." Verbum effusionis nomen largitatis ostendit. Sed fieri potest, ut agros irrigantibus pluuiis sit quidem fertilitas, uerum aut locusta ueniet, aut brucus, aut erugo, aut eruca, et labores hominum uastabunt. Propterea subiungit et dicit: "Et increpabo pro uobis deuorantes," locustam uidelicet, et reliqua, que diximus, "et non corumpent fructum terrae uestrae." §. 1. Si quando fames, et penuria, et rerum omnium egestas obprimit mundum, sciamus, hoc ex Dei ira descendere, qui se in pauperibus, si non accipiant elemosinam, fraudari loquitur, et suas possessiones possumus decimas et primicias interpretari. §. 2. Si quis doctus et eruditus lege Domini potest alios erudire, non debet suae adsignare prudentiae ingenioque quod possidet, sed gratias agat Domino primum, qui cuncta largitur, deinde sacerdotibus eius ac ministris, a quibus doctus est. Si enim non egerit gratias, sed sibi scientiam uendicauerit, in penuria maledicetur.
> Quod si intelligens largitorem Deum, et agens his gratias, per quos a Deo eruditus est, humiliauerit se, et in horreum Dei intulerit cibos, hoc est scripturae alimenta in ecclesia populis ministrauerit, statim aperientur super eum catheractae celi, et effundetur pluuia spiritualis, et mandabit nubibus suis, ut pluant super eum imbrem, et habundantia rerum omnium perfruetur.

C. LXVI. Tithes are to be rendered to priests.

Likewise Augustine, [sermon CCXIX, On Time]. Tithes are the tribute of needy souls. But if you shall give a tithe, you will not only receive an abundance of fruits but also obtain health of body. Therefore the Lord God does not demand a reward but honor. For our God, who deigned to give the whole, deigned to receive a tithe from us, doubtless to profit not Himself but us. But if it is a sin to give late, how much worse a sin is it not to have given? Render tithes from military service, from business, and from craftsmanship. For since by giving tithes you can merit both earthly and heavenly rewards, why through avarice do you defraud yourself of a double blessing? For this is the Lord's most just custom: that if you shall not give Him a tithe, you shall be reduced to a tenth. You will give to an impious soldier what you are unwilling to give to a priest. God is always prepared to do good, but He is hindered by the wickedness of men. For tithes are demanded as a debt, and those who are unwilling to give them seize the property of others. And however many poor persons shall have died of hunger in the places where he dwells because he did not give tithes, he shall appear guilty of that many homicides before the tribunal of the eternal Judge, because he reserved for his own uses property assigned by the Lord to the poor. Therefore, let one who desires either to procure a reward for himself or to merit forgiveness of sins render the tithe; and let him also endeavor to give alms to the poor from the nine parts.

C. LXVI. Decimae sacerdotibus sunt reddendae.

Item Augustinus. [serm. CCXIX. de tempore] Decimae tributa sunt egentium animarum. Quod si decimam dederis, non solum habundantiam fructuum recipies, sed etiam sanitatem corporis consequeris. Non igitur Dominus Deus premium postulat, sed honorem. Deus enim noster, qui dignatus est totum dare, decimam a nobis dignatus est accipere, non sibi, sed nobis sine dubio profuturam. Sed si tardius dare peccatum est, quanto magis peius est peccatum non dedisse? De milicia, de negocio et de artificio redde decimas. Cum enim decimas dando et terrena et celestia possis premia promereri pro auaritia duplicem benedictionem fraudas? Hec est enim Domini iustissima consuetudo, ut si tu illi decimam non dederis, tu ad decimam reuoceris. Dabis inpio militi quod non uis dare sacerdoti. Benefacere Deus semper paratus est, sed hominum malicia prohibetur. Decimae etenim ex debito requiruntur, et qui eas dare noluerint res alienas inuadunt. Et quanti pauperes in locis suis ubi ipse habitat, illo decimas non dante fame mortui fuerint, tantorum homicidiorum reus ante tribunal eterni iudicis apparebit, quia rem a Domino pauperibus delegatam suis usibus reseruauit. Qui ergo sibi aut premium conparare, aut peccatorum desiderat indulgentiam promereri, reddat decimam; etiam de nouem partibus studeat elemosinam dare pauperibus.

C. LXVII. One who withholds necessities from those who preach the Gospel condemns himself.

Likewise Jerome, [in the commentary at the end of chapter 3 of the Epistle to Titus]. To be unwilling to contribute to apostolic men and evangelists of Christ for their necessary uses is to condemn oneself. But that tithes may lawfully be bestowed on monks with the consent of bishops, blessed Jerome writes to Pope Damasus, saying:

C. LXVII. Se ipsum condempnat qui euangelizantibus necessaria subtrahit.

Item Ieronimus. [in comm. ad c. 3. epistolae ad Titum in fine.] Apostolicis uiris et euangelizatoribus Christi in necessariis usibus nolle tribuere, se ipsum condempnare est. Quod autem decimae episcoporum consensu monachis licite tribuantur B. Ieronimus Damaso Papae scribit, dicens.

C. LXVIII. Clerics are free to grant tithes to monks.

Because whatever clerics have belongs to the poor, and their houses ought to be common to all, they ought to devote attention to receiving pilgrims and guests; they must take special care to expend from tithes and offerings upon monasteries and hospices whatever support they wish and are able to provide. For it is free to grant to monks and spiritual men who fear and worship God tithes and offerings and all means of relief, and to transfer them from their own right into the ownership and use of those men, and to regard in the poor not so much poverty as religion. § 1. But as to what your blessedness asked, whether the use of tithes and offerings can accrue to secular persons, your holiness knows that this is by no means permissible, as all the divine authorities of the paternal canons attest. Wherefore, if at any time things which are known to belong to divine right shall have been wrongfully detained by these persons, and shall have passed into the use of monks and servants of God, with the bishop of that place nevertheless giving consent, all things shall remain with them, supported by perpetual firmness and stability. § 2. But it is fitting that those clerics be sustained by stipends of the church whom no parents or relatives support. Those, however, who can be sustained by the goods and resources of their parents, if they receive what belongs to the poor, plainly incur and commit sacrilege, and through the misuse of such things eat and drink judgment upon themselves. GRATIAN. But concerning estates which are cultivated by their tenants, it was determined thus at the Council of Mainz: "Moreover, certain persons complained, etc."

C. LXVIII. Liberum est clericis monachis decimas concedere.

Quoniam quicquid habent clerici pauperum est, et domus illorum omnibus debent esse communes, susceptioni peregrinorum et hospitum inuigilare debent, maxime curandum est illis, ut de decimis et oblationibus cenobiis et senodochiis qualem uoluerint et potuerint sustentacionem inpendant. Liberum est enim monachis et spiritualibus uiris Deum timentibus et colentibus decimas et oblaciones cunctaque remedia concedere, et de iure suo in dominium illorum et usum transferre, nec tam in pauperibus paupertatem quam religionem attendere. §. 1. Quod autem beatitudo tua quesiuit, utrum usus decimarum et oblationum secularibus prouenire possit, nouit uestra sanctitas omnino non licere, protestantibus hoc omnibus diuinis auctoritatibus paternorum canonum. Quamobrem, si aliquando fuerint ab his male detenta, que diuini iuris esse noscuntur, et in usum monachorum transierint et seruorum Dei, episcopo tamen loci illius prebente consensum, constabunt eis omnia perpetua firmitate et stabilitate subnixa. §. 2. Clericos autem illos conuenit ecclesiae stipendiis sustentari, quibus parentum et propinquorum nulli suffragantur. Qui autem bonis parentum et opibus sustentari possunt, si quod pauperum est accipiunt, sacrilegium profecto incurrunt et conmittunt, et per abusionem talium iudicium sibi manducant et bibunt. Gratian. De prediis autem, que a colonis eorum coluntur, sic diffinitum est in Magontiensi concilio: "Questi sunt preterea etc."

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. But concerning the chapels possessed by them, Pope John proves that they are to be governed by priests through their institution, writing to Isaac, Bishop of Syracuse.

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. De capellis uero, que ab eis possidentur, quod per eorum institutionem a sacerdotibus sint gubernandae, Iohannes Papa probat, scribens Ysaac Siracusano Episcopo.

C. I. Priests are to be instituted in the churches of monasteries by the abbots.

Having seen the letters of your charity, from which it is sufficiently perceived with how much zeal you show reverence to this holy see, we rejoiced not a little. Now, therefore, concerning those things on which you consulted us, we give kindly a considered counsel to our most beloved brother. For your pious gentleness referred to us the question whether churches handed over to monks for their quiet by holy councils and catholic bishops ought to be instituted through priests ordained and invested by them. Your fraternity also added that no small dispute and sedition had arisen between clerics and monks from this cause; no one doubts that this is done by the instigation of the crafty enemy. For he has a thousand ways of doing harm, and we are not ignorant of his cunning. For from the beginning of his fall he strives to rend the unity of the church, to wound charity, to infect the sweetness of holy works with the gall of envy, and in every way to overturn and disturb the human race. For he greatly grieves and blushes that men formed from muddy matter maintain on earth the charity which he could not have in heaven. Hence it is fitting, insofar as it is granted to our frailty, that we fortify all approaches against his harmful craftiness, lest death enter through our gates. § 1. Therefore, after the counsel of many brothers has been diligently sought, we decree that henceforth churches handed over to monks are to be instituted through their own priests. For divine and secular laws provide that the institution belongs to him whose possession it is; and if charity was ready in giving that which is greater, let holy largesse be readier in conceding that which is lesser. For it was a greater thing to give possession than it is to grant investiture. How will the rights of the possessor be acknowledged, and the revenues of his own property be rendered to him, where what is his is given through another and, whenever the other wills, is taken away? It belongs to human custom to revere him by whose judgment and will one is now raised up, now cast down. Hence it happens that the priest becomes more inclined to serve the bishop's interest, and thus by a certain feigned authority the bishop draws back to himself what he had given piously and religiously. Thus, therefore, he is deprived of the reward which he had obtained: both because with feigned charity he takes away what he had given, and because, made excessively credulous by the words of depraved priests who love discord and schisms, he endeavors by a certain usurpation to take away altogether, after the fraud has been uncovered, what he had previously contrived under a false appearance to gain. Turning away their cunning and the persuasions of the crafty enemy, we henceforth grant them full license to be the investers of their own churches, yet in such a way that, if they shall presume to act contrary to the priesthood, they are punished by the judgment of a synod, and the offenses of the priests are cut away by the happy sword of the bishop. PART II. GRATIAN. By this authority the investiture of their churches is conceded to monks. But Pope Urban II appears contrary, saying:

> C. I. Presbiteri in monasteriorum ecclesiis instituantur per abbates.
> Visis litteris karitatis uestrae, quibus satis perpenditur, quanto studio huic sanctae sedi reuerentiam exhibetis, non modice gauisi sumus. Nunc itaque super ea, que consuluistis, ut karissimo fratri benigne discretum consilium damus. Delegauit enim nobis pia mansuetudo uestra, utrum ecclesiae pro quiete monachorum a sanctis conciliis catholicisque episcopis eis traditae per sacerdotes ab eis ordinatos et inuestitos debeant institui. Addidit quoque fraternitas tua, litem et seditionem inter clericos monachosque ex hac causa non modicam esse ortam; quod instigatione uersuti hostis nemo fieri ambigat. Habet enim mille nocendi modos, nec ignoramus astutiam eius. Conatur namque a principio ruinae suae unitatem ecclesiae rescindere, karitatem uulnerare, sanctorum operum dulcedinem inuidiae felle inficere, et omnibus modis humanum genus euertere et perturbare. Dolet enim satis et erubescit karitatem, quam in celo nequiuit habere, homines constantes ex lutea materia in terra tenere. Unde oportet (quantum fragilitati nostrae conceditur) ut omnes aditus nocendi eius uersuciae muniamus, ne mors ingrediatur per portas nostras. §. 1. Consilio itaque multorum fratrum diligenter exquisito decernimus, ut amodo ecclesiae monachis traditae per suos sacerdotes instituantur. Diuinae enim leges habent et seculares, ut cuius est possessio eius fiat institutio, et si in dando quod maius est facilis fuit karitas, sit facilior in concedendo quod minus est sancta largitas. Maius enim fuit possessionem dare quam sit inuestituram concedere. Quomodo possessoris iura cognoscentur, et suarum rerum sibi tributa reddentur, ubi quod suum est per alterum datur, et, cum uoluerit, aufertur? Humani moris est illum uereri, cuius iudicio et uoluntate nunc erigitur, nunc deprimitur. Unde fit, ut in partem episcopi ad seruiendum sacerdos procliuior fiat, et sic episcopus quod sancte et religiose dederat quadam simulata auctoritate ad se trahat. Sic itaque priuatur mercede, quam consecutus fuerat, tum quia ficta karitate aufert quod dederat, tum quia prauorum sacerdotum discordias, et scissuras amantium, uerbis nimis factus credulus, quod prius fucate moliebatur lucrari post detecta fraude conatur quadam usurpatione ex toto auferre. Quorum auertentes calliditates et hostis uersuti suasiones, deinceps omnino licentiam damus suarum ecclesiarum inuestitores fieri, ita tamen, ut iudicio sinodi, si contra sacerdotium agere presumpserint, multentur, et felici mucrone episcopi sacerdotum piacula resecentur. II. Pars. Gratian. Hac auctoritate monachis conceditur inuestitura suarum ecclesiarum. Sed uidetur contraire Urbanus papa II., dicens:

[PALEA. C. II.

We admonish and command that the giving of tithes to God not be neglected at all, which God Himself established are to be given, because it is to be feared that, if anyone withholds from God what is owed to Him, God may perhaps through his sin take away his necessities from him.]

[PALEA.

[PALEA. C. II.

[PALEA.

C. III. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise Pope Nicholas II, sole letter, c. 5. We command that tithes and first fruits, or offerings of the living and the dead, be faithfully rendered by laymen to the churches of God, and that they be in the disposition of the bishops. Let those who shall retain them be separated from the communion of holy church.]

C. III. De eodem.

Item Nicolaus Papa II. epistola unica, c. 5. Precipimus, ut decimae et primiciae, seu oblationes uiuorum et mortuorum ecclesiis Dei fideliter reddantur a laicis, et ut in dispositione episcoporum sint. Quas qui retinuerint, a sanctae ecclesiae communione separentur.]

[PALEA.

C. IV. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise Pope Leo. Let no one receive tithes belonging to another.]

[PALEA.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item Leo Papa. Nullus decimas ad alium pertinentes accipiat.]

[PALEA.

C. V. Likewise Ambrose in sermon I On Lent.

For one who is unwilling to render to God the tithes which he has retained, and does not endeavor to render to a man what he unjustly took away from him, does not yet fear God and does not know what true penance and true confession are. Such a man cannot perform true almsgiving.]

C. V. Item Ambrosius sermone I. de Quadragesima.

Nam qui Deo non uult reddere decimas, quas retinuit, et homini non studet reddere quod iniuste ab eo abstulit, non timet adhuc Deum, et ignorat quid sit uera penitencia ueraque confessio. Iste talis homo non potest ueram facere elemosinam.]

C. VI. Let abbots not ordain priests in parochial churches without the bishop's counsel.

Indeed, because certain monks contend that they may take away from bishops their right, we establish that in the parochial churches which they hold they are not to place priests without the counsel of the bishops; but let the bishops, with the consent of the abbots, commit the care of the parish to a priest, so that priests of this kind render an account to the bishops concerning the care of the people, but show due subjection to the abbot concerning temporal property pertaining to the monastery, and thus the rights of each are preserved. The same: § 1. In parochial churches let priests be appointed by the bishops who shall answer to them concerning the care of souls and those things which pertain to the bishop.

C. VI. Abbates in parrochialibus ecclesiis absque episcopi consilio presbiteros non ordinent.

Sane quia monachorum quidam episcopis ius suum auferre contendunt, statuimus, ne in parrochialibus ecclesiis, quas tenent, absque episcoporum consilio presbiteros collocent, sed episcopi parrochiae curam cum abbatum consensu sacerdoti conmittant, ut eiusmodi sacerdotes de populi quidem cura episcopis rationem reddant, abbati uero pro rebus temporalibus ad monasterium pertinentibus debitam subiectionem exhibeant, et sic sua cuique iura seruentur. Idem: §. 1. In parrochialibus ecclesiis presbiteri per episcopos constituantur qui eis respondeant de animarum cura, et his, que ad episcopum pertinent.

C. VII. Let the churches of any monks whatsoever be subjected to the governance of bishops.

Likewise from the council held at Flavigny. It is to be established that the churches of any monks whatsoever situated in the individual parishes are, as is fitting, divinely subjected to the governance of the bishops and show them the services owed. GRATIAN. Behold, Pope Urban forbids the investitures of parochial churches to be made by monks, which Pope John conceded to them. But that statement of Pope John is to be understood concerning those chapels which, with all their right, are conceded to monks by bishops. This statement of Urban, however, is to be understood concerning those which abbots build on their own estates in their villages or fortresses.

C. VII. Quorumcumque monachorum ecclesiae episcoporum subdantur regimini.

Item ex Concilio apud Flauentiam habito. Statuendum est, quatinus ecclesiae quorumcumque monachorum in singulis parrochiis sitae episcoporum, ut decet, diuinitus subdantur regimini, eisque debita obsequia exhibeant. Gratian. Ecce Urbanus Papa prohibet inuestituras parrochialium ecclesiarum per monachos fieri, quas Iohannes Papa eis concessit. Sed illud Iohannis Papae intelligendum est de illis capellis, que cum omni iure suo ab episcopis monachis conceduntur. Istud autem Urbani intelligendum est de illis, quas abbates in propriis prediis edificant in uillis uel in castellis suis.

Question V

[QUESTION V.]

GRATIAN. Such persons, even if they have the right of the territory, nevertheless do not have the power of governing the people and ministering spiritual things. This is also to be understood concerning a bishop. Hence Pope Nicholas says:

> [QUESTIO V.]
> GRATIANUS. Tales, etsi ius territorii habeant, tamen potestatem gubernandi populum, et spiritualia ministrandi non habent. Quod etiam de episcopo intelligendum est. Unde Nicolaus Papa ait:

C. VIII. [I.] Let a bishop who builds a church in the diocese of another not dare to claim its consecration for himself.

If any of the bishops, for any convenience of his own people, arranges to build a church in the territory of another city, let him not presume to perform the dedication which belongs to him in whose territory the church arises. But let this favor be reserved to the bishop who is the builder: that those clerics whom he desires to be ordained on his property are to be ordained by him whose territory it is; or, if they have already been ordained, let him agree to have them; and all governance of that church will pertain to him in the territory of whose city the church shall have arisen.

> C. VIII. [I.] Episcopus, qui in alterius diocesi ecclesiam edificat, eius consecrationem sibi uendicare non audeat.
> Si quis episcoporum in alienae ciuitatis territorio pro quacumque suorum opportunitate ecclesiam edificare disponit, non presumat dedicationem, que illius est, in cuius territorio ecclesia assurgit. Edificatori uero episcopo hec gratia reseruetur, ut quos desiderat clericos in re sua ordinari, ipsos ordinet is, cuius territorium est, uel si ordinati iam sunt, ipsos habere adquiescat, et omnis ecclesiae ipsius gubernatio ad eum, in cuius ciuitatis territorio ecclesia surrexerit, pertinebit.

C. IX. [II.] Newly founded basilicas pertain to the bishop whose judicial district they are known to be in.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 34]. Possession of territory does not remove the judicial district, and therefore new basilicas which shall have been founded will without doubt pertain to that bishop whose judicial district they are known to be in.

> C. IX. [II.] Basilicae nouiter conditae ad episcopum pertinent, cuius conuentus constiterit esse.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano IV. [c. 34.] Possessio territorii conuentum non adimit ideoque nouae basilicae, que conditae fuerint, ad eum proculdubio pertinebunt episcopum, cuius conuentus esse constiterit.

C. X. [III.] A bishop who is the builder is not permitted to consecrate a church in the diocese of another.

Likewise Gregory, [book XI, letter 19, to John the Subdeacon]. John, the bearer of the present letters, our brother and fellow bishop, indicated to us that a certain Bishop Exsuperantius with rash daring constructed an oratory in his diocese and, contrary to custom, presumed to dedicate it without the authority of a precept, and did not fear to celebrate Masses there. It is fitting that you amend this matter with the greatest speed and severity and not permit any such thing to be attempted further.

GRATIAN. This is to be understood concerning the right of ordaining, not of possessing. From these authorities it can easily be perceived that if either abbots or bishops shall build churches in their fortresses or villages, the judicial district is not thereby taken away from the bishop in whose diocese they shall be; and therefore priests, according to that statement of Urban and Nicholas, can be ordained in them only by the bishops, yet with the consent and election of the builders.

> C. X. [III.] Edificatori episcopo in diocesi alterius ecclesiam consecrare non licet.
> Item Gregorius. [lib XI. epist. 19. ad Iohannem Subdiaconum] Lator presentium Iohannes, frater et coepiscopus noster, indicauit nobis, quod quidam Exsuperantius episcopus ausu temerario in diocesi ipsius oratorium construxerit, eumque sine precepti auctoritate contra morem presumpserit dedicare, missasque illic celebrare non metuit. Quam rem cum summa te celeritate ac districtione conuenit emendare, nec ulterius tale aliquid attemptare permittere. Gratian. Quod de iure ordinandi, non possidendi intelligendum est. His auctoritatibus facile potest perpendi, quod siue abbates siue episcopi in suis castellis uel uillis ecclesias edificauerint, non ideo episcopo, in cuius diocesi fuerint, conuentus adimitur, et ideo sacerdotes, iuxta illud Urbani et Nicolai, in eis non nisi per episcopos, cum consensu tamen et electione edificantium, ordinari possunt.

Question III

GRATIAN. PART I. But that all rights are taken away by prescription of time is proved by the authority of the Council of Chalcedon, of Pope Gelasius, and of the Council of Toledo. The first is this:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem prescriptione temporis omnia iura tollantur, probatur auctoritate Calcedonensis Concilii et Gelasii Papae, et Tolletani Concilii. Prima hec est:

C. I. Rural parishes are to remain immovably with the bishops who possess them for thirty years without violence.

We have decreed that in the individual churches rural parishes are to remain immovably with the bishops who hold them, especially if they have governed them without violence for thirty years. But if a dispute concerning them shall have arisen within thirty years, let those who shall say that they were injured on that account be permitted to initiate a contest before the provincial synod.

> C. I. Rusticanae parrochiae apud episcopos, qui eas possident triginta annis sine uiolentia permaneant inmobiles.
> Per singulas ecclesias rusticanas parrochias, permanere inmobiles apud eos, qui eas tenent, episcopos decreuimus, et maxime si eas sine uiolentia per triginta annos gubernauerunt. Si uero intra triginta annos facta fuerit de eis dubitatio, liceat eis, qui se dixerint lesos propterea, mouere apud sinodum prouinciae certamen.

C. II. Dioceses possessed by bishops for thirty years are to remain immovable.

Likewise Gelasius, [letter II to the Sicilians, c. 1]. The authority of our predecessors has issued forth that bishops are to have power to govern the resources of the church, yet in such a way that they ought to distribute stipends to widows, wards, and the poor, as well as to clerics. We establish that this, which has hitherto been decreed, is to be granted to them; let the bishops claim the remainder for themselves, so that, as we said before, they can be generous toward pilgrims and captives. § 1. It also pleased us to add that if—which may it not be—the resources of a church, as well as dioceses, are possessed by any bishops, let them lawfully claim for themselves what the thirty-year law has concluded, because the authority of our sons the princes has also issued forth thus.

C. II. Dioceses triginta annis ab episcopis possessae inmobiles permaneant.

Item Gelasius. [epist. II. ad Siculos, c. 1.] Presulum nostrorum auctoritas emanauit, ut facultates ecclesiae episcopi ad regendum habeant potestatem, ita tamen, ut uiduarum et pupillorum atque pauperum, necnon et clericorum stipendia distribuere debeant. Hoc eis statuimus dari, quod hactenus decretum est; reliquum sibi episcopi uendicent, ut, sicut antea diximus, peregrinorum atque captiuorum largitores esse possint. §. 1. Illud etiam annecti placuit, ut si, quod absit, facultates ecclesiae, nec non dioceses ab aliquibus possidentur episcopis, iure sibi uendicent quod tricennalis lex conclusit, quia et filiorum nostrorum principum ita emanauit auctoritas.

C. III. Possession of territory does not remove the judicial district.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 34]. Just as possession for thirty years takes away another's diocese, so it does not remove the judicial district of a territory.

C. III. Territorii possessio conuentum non adimit.

Item ex Tolletano Concilio IV. [c. 34.] Sicut diocesim alienam tricennalis possessio tollit, ita territorii conuentum non adimit.

C. IV. Possession for thirty years ought to be observed within one province.

Likewise from the same, [c. 33]. Whatever bishop shall have possessed the diocese of another bishop for thirty years without any challenge, although according to the rule of law the diocese does not appear to be his, nevertheless an action to reclaim it is not to be admitted against him. But this applies within one province, and by no means outside it, lest, while a diocese is defended, the boundaries of provinces be confused. PART II. GRATIAN. Behold, by these authorities it is proved that the rights of possession and governance are taken away by prescription. But the same Gelasius testifies to the contrary, writing to Bishops Maximus and Eusebius:

C. IV. Tricennalis possessio intra unam prouinciam seruari debet.

Item ex eodem. [c. 33.] Quicumque episcopus alterius episcopi diocesim per triginta annos sine aliqua interpellatione possederit, quamuis secundum ius legis eius non uideatur esse diocesis, admittenda tamen non est contra eum actio reposcendi. Sed hoc intra unam prouinciam, extra uero nullo modo, ne, dum diocesis defenditur, prouinciarum termini confundantur. II. Pars. Gratian. Ecce his auctoritatibus probatur, quod possessionis et gubernationis iura prescriptione tolluntur. Sed idem Gelasius contra testatur, scribens Maximo et Eusebio Episcopis:

C. V. The status of parishes can be changed neither by presumption nor by prescription of time.

Although it is contained in the ancient rules that parishes assigned to each church by the original arrangement can be torn away for no reason, lest through a most wicked custom, as the rashness of a bad example increases, universal confusion arise, nevertheless by our decrees dispatched not long ago we also commanded that all things which had been invaded in this manner be restored. But because the rashness of usurpers thinks that a law can be generated for itself if it adds obstinacy of retention to its crime, we desire that those things which we decreed between our brother and fellow bishop Constantius, bishop of the Camiscana church, and those sent by the pontiff of Ancona be fulfilled through you; we then prescribed the form to be followed in other examinations. Therefore we do not permit the status of parishes, which has endured with the firmness of perpetual age, to be changed by any presumption, because neither the negligence of pontiffs, nor a plea of time which is perhaps generated through carelessness, nor consent furnished through sloth, nor a precept obtained by surreptitious petition can tear apart a diocese once established, from which the devout people always assemble for regeneration and confirmation. It is also known to have been established long ago that territory does not make a diocese. GRATIAN. This is distinguished in several ways. There are certain dioceses which are distinguished by fixed boundaries; these can in no way be prescribed against. But others, which are not distinguished by fixed boundaries and concerning which a definite determination did not issue long ago, are taken away by prescription. Hence Pope Innocent says:

> C. V. Status parrochiarum nec presumptione, nec temporis prescriptione mutari potest.
> Licet regulis contineatur antiquis, parrochias unicuique ecclesiae pristina dispositione deputatas nulla posse ratione conuelli, ne per consuetudinem pessimam, exempli mali temeritate crescente, uniuersalis confusio nasceretur: tamen etiam decretis nostris ante non multum temporis destinatis omnia iussimus, que taliter fuerant inuasa, restitui. Sed quia temeritas peruadentium legem sibi posse putat generari, si sceleri suo pertinaciam retentionis adiungat, ea, que inter fratrem et coepiscopum nostrum Constantium, Camiscanae ecclesiae sacerdotem, et directos ab Anconitano pontifice decreuimus, per uos inpleri cupimus, tunc formam in ceteris cognitionibus, que sit sequenda, perscripsimus. Nulla igitur presumptione statum parrochiarum, qui perpetuae etatis firmitate durauit, patimur inmutari, quia nec negligentia pontificum, nec temporalis obiectio (que per incuriam forte generatur), neque ignauia faciente consensus adhibitus, nec subripiente supplicatione preceptio diuellere potest semel diocesim constitutam, ex qua semper ad regenerationem atque consignationem plebs deuota conuenit. Territorium etiam non facere diocesim, olim noscitur ordinatum. Gratian. Hoc multipliciter distinguitur. Sunt quedam dioceses, quae certis limitibus distinctae sunt; hae nullo modo prescribi possunt. Aliae uero, que non sunt certis limitibus distinctae, et de quibus certa diffinitio non olim processit, prescriptione tolluntur. Unde Innocentius Papa ait:

C. VI. Possession of a boundary cannot be prescribed against.

An examination was conducted between our aforesaid brothers, Fulgentius, bishop of Astigi, and Honorius, bishop of Córdoba, concerning the parish of a certain basilica, which one of them asserted to belong to Cellas and the other to Regina. And because until now a boundary action has been ventilated between both parties, the retention of which, however ancient, would bring no prejudice of law, therefore, lest our sentence be called further into doubt between them, the synodal decrees were read aloud when the canons had been produced. Their authority admonishes that greed ought to be restrained in such a way that no one usurps another's boundaries. On this account it pleased us that men as inspectors are to be sent between the opposing parties, so that the perpetual dominion over the diocese of the possessor—if, however, the established boundary shall show by true signs that the basilica belongs to the church which has the right of retention—shall belong to that church. But if the lawful boundary does not enclose that basilica, and the plea of prescription for so long a time is proved, the appeal of the present bishop will not prevail, because the plea of thirty years imposes silence upon him. This is also commanded by the edicts of secular princes and decreed by the authority of the Roman pontiffs. But if, within the limits of thirty years, an unjust retention of the basilica outside the boundaries of another is found, it shall be restored without delay to the right of the bishop who reclaims it.

C. VI. Limitis possessio prescribi non potest.

Inter memoratos fratres nostros, Fulgentium Astigitanum et Honorium Cordubensem episcopos, discussio agitata est propter parrochiam basilicae cuiusdam, quam horum alter Cellacensem, alter Reginensem asseruit. Et quia inter utrasque partes hactenus limitis actio uentilatae est, cuius quamuis uetusta retentio nullum iuris preiudicium afferret, ideoque, ne in dubium ultra inter eos nostra deuocaretur sentencia, prolatis canonibus sinodalia decreta perlecta sunt. Quorum auctoritas premonet, ita oportere inhiberi cupiditatem, ut ne quis terminos alienos usurpet; ob hoc placuit inter alternas partes inspectores uiros mittendos, ita ut diocesis possidentis (si tamen basilicam ueris signis limes prouisus monstrauerit) ecclesiae, cuius est ius retentionis, sit eternum dominium. Quod si limes legitimus eandem basilicam non concludit, et tam longi temporis probatur obiecta prescriptio, appellatio presentis episcopi non ualebit, quia illi tricennalis obiectio silentium inponit. Hoc etiam et secularium principum edicta precipiunt, et presulum Romanorum decreuit auctoritas. Si uero infra metas tricennalis temporis extra alienos terminos basilicae iniusta retentio reperitur, repetentis episcopi iuri sine mora restituetur.

C. VII. Territories which have been defined cannot be prescribed against by time.

Likewise Gelasius to Bishop Justus. Let your belovedness take care, when the truth of all matters has been faithfully sought, that if a definite determination concerning the territories from which the aforesaid contention arose was issued long ago, it is to be preserved inviolate; otherwise, if nothing was ever established as having been delimited, then concerning the prescription of periods of time, if either party has confidence in it, let that party furnish an oath, yet in such a way that the party which is proved to have possessed until now is permitted to offer the oath. PART III. GRATIAN. It can also be distinguished in another way. Those things which anyone usurps by his own authority cannot be prescribed for, because he begins to possess them under no title; and in this case that authority of Gelasius is to be understood: "A plea of time which is perhaps generated through carelessness cannot tear apart a diocese once established." It is to be understood if he began to possess it under no title but by usurpation alone. But if he began to possess it by the authority of a judge and the long custom of privileges, then the plea of time imposes silence on the claimant. Hence Pope Gelasius says:

C. VII. Spatia, que diffinita fuerint, tempore prescribi non possunt.

Item Gelasius Iusto Episcopo. Dilectio tua studeat, quesita omnium fideliter rerum ueritate, ut si de spaciis, de quibus memoratur orta contentio, diffinito dudum certa processerit, intemerata seruetur; alioquin, si nichil umquam constiterit terminatum, tunc de prescriptione temporum, si qua pars confidit, prebeat sacramentum, ut tamen que hactenus possedisse probabitur, iusiurandum sinatur offerre. III. Pars. Gratian. Potest et aliter distingui. Que quisque sua auctoritate usurpat, quia nullo titulo possidere incipit, prescribere non potest, et in hoc casu intelligenda est illa auctoritas Gelasii: "Temporalis obiectio, que per incuriam forte generatur, non potest diuellere diocesim semel constitutam." Intelligendum est, si nullo titulo, sed sola usurpatione eam possidere cepit. Si uero iudicis auctoritate, et priuilegiorum longa consuetudine possidere cepit, tunc temporalis obiectio actori silentium inponit. Unde Gelasius Papa ait:

C. VIII. Privileges possessed for thirty years ought to be preserved immovable.

It pleased this holy and great synod that property or privileges which pertain to the churches of God by long custom, and which were given in writing either by emperors of divine memory or by other worshipers of God and have been possessed by them for thirty years, are by no means to be withdrawn from the power of their prelates by any secular person through force or taken away by any devices; but let everything which is known to have been possessed by churches within the span of thirty years remain under the power and command of the prelate of the church. Therefore, whoever among secular persons shall act against the present determination is to be judged as sacrilegious; and until he shall correct himself and restore to the church its own privileges or property, let him be anathema. The same to the Bishops of Dardania.

> C. VIII. Priuilegia per XXX. annos possessa inmobilia seruari debent.
> Placuit huic sanctae et magnae sinodo, ut res uel priuilegia, que Dei ecclesiis ex longa consuetudine pertinent, et siue a diuae recordationis inperatoribus, siue ab aliis Dei cultoribus in scriptis donata, et ab eis XXX. per annos possessa sunt, nequaquam a potestate presulum eorum quecumque persona secularis per potestatem subtrahat, aut per argumenta quelibet auferat; sed sint omnia in potestate ac iussu presulis ecclesiae, quecumque intra XXX. annorum spacia ab ecclesiis possessa fuisse noscuntur. Quisquis ergo secularium contra presentem diffinitionem egerit, tamquam sacrilegus iudicetur, et donec se correxerit, et ecclesiae propria priuilegia seu res restituerit. anathema sit. Idem Episcopis Dardaniae.

C. IX. Things which are possessed peacefully for thirty years cannot be reclaimed.

Among other things he says: I hear that certain persons wish after five hundred years to overthrow the ordinances of Christ, although a thirty-year law of men cannot be broken. PART IV. GRATIAN. Likewise, if a controversy concerning ecclesiastical property has been initiated and a determination has followed, even if it is unjust, nevertheless, because he began to possess not by his own authority but by that of the person determining, the prescription of thirty years imposes silence upon the claimant, yet in such a way that the reckoning of prescription takes its beginning not from the time of the determination but from the death of the person determining. Hence it was enacted at the Council of Toledo, [IX, c. 8]:

> C. IX. Repeti non possunt que XXX. annis quiete possidentur.
> Inter cetera inquit: Post quingentos annos constituta Christi quosdam audio uelle subuertere, cum XXX. annorum lex hominum non possit abrumpi. IV. Pars. Gratian. Item si de rebus ecclesiae controuersia mota est, et diffinitio subsecuta, etsi iniusta sit, tamen quia non sua, sed diffinientis auctoritate possidere cepit, tricennalis prescriptio petitori silentium inponit, ita tamen, ut subputacio prescriptionis non a tempore diffinicionis, sed a decessu diffinientis exordium sumat. Unde in Tolletano Concilio [IX. c. 8.] statutum est:

C. X. The lifetime of one who disposes invalidly cannot pertain to the thirty-year period.

If priests or ministers, while they appear to administer the governance of churches, are known to have determined anything concerning ecclesiastical property contrary to the most holy enactments of the Fathers, the order of reckoning will be established not from the day on which they decreed such things in writing but from the time when by dying they left such things determined. For the lifetime of one judging invalidly can nowhere pertain to the thirty-year period, because the status of the transactions did not take its beginning from the origin of equity. PART V. GRATIAN. Likewise, those things which are possessed as benefices, or which were possessed for a longer time because fear of hostilities intervened, cannot be prescribed for. Hence it was determined at the Council of Agde, [c. 59]:

> C. X. Vita irrite disponentis non poterit pertinere ad tricennium temporis.
> Si sacerdotes uel ministri, dum gubernacula ecclesiarum amministrare uidentur, contra Patrum sanctissimas sanctiones de rebus ecclesiae diffinisse aliqua dinoscuntur, non ex die, quo talia scribendo decreuerunt, sed ex quo talia moriendo diffinita reliquerunt, subputacionis ordo substabit. Nusquam etenim poterit ad tricennium temporis pertinere uita irrite iudicantis, quia status contractuum non sumpsit inicia ab origine equitatis. V. Pars. Gratian. Item ea, que in beneficiis possidentur, siue que metu hostilitatis interueniente diutius possessa fuerint, prescribi non possunt. Unde in Agatensi Concilio [c. 59.] diffinitum est:

C. XI. Things which are possessed as benefices cannot be prescribed for.

Whatever clerics shall have possessed anything from the bounty of the church for however great a length of time, let those things not be called into their own right by prescription of time, provided it is evident that the property belonged to the church, lest bishops of a lengthy administration also appear either not to have been required to make precarial instruments when they were ordained or to be able to transfer resources retained for a long time into the right of their own property.

> C. XI. Que in beneficiis possidentur prescribi non possunt.
> Clerici quilibet quantacumque diuturnitate temporis de ecclesiae remuneratione aliqua possederint, in ius proprium prescriptione temporis non uocentur, dummodo pateat ecclesiae rem fuisse, ne uideantur etiam episcopi administrationis prolixae aut precatorias, cum ordinati sunt, facere non debuisse, aut diu retentas facultates in ius proprietatis suae posse transscribere.

C. XII. Things granted to certain persons in consideration of humanity cannot be prescribed for.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, [I, c. 25]. If a bishop in consideration of humanity shall have granted little slaves, little vineyards, or little lands to clerics or monks, or to any persons, to be cultivated or held for a time, even if long spans of years are proved to have passed, let the church suffer no prejudice, nor let a prescription of secular law which might impede the church be pleaded against it.

> C. XII. Que humanitatis intuitu aliquibus prestantur prescribi non possunt.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I., c. 25.] Si episcopus humanitatis intuitu mancipiola, uineolas uel terrulas clericis aut monachis, uel quibuslibet prestiterit excolendas uel tempore tenendas, etiamsi longa transisse annorum spatia conprobentur, nullum ecclesia preiudicium patiatur, nec secularis legis prescriptio, que ecclesiam aliquam inpediat obponatur.

C. XIII. Prescription of time is not pleaded where fear of hostilities has intervened.

Likewise from the Council of Seville, [II], at which Isidore was present, [c. 1]. PART VI. At the first proceeding, a petition of Theodulf, prelate of the church of Málaga, was presented to us, asserting that the ancient parish of the same city was once severed by the danger of military hostility, and that some part of it was retained by the churches of the cities of Astigi, Elvira, and Cabra. Concerning this matter it pleased us that every parish which anyone proved his church to have retained by ancient dominion before the military hostility should be restored to its privilege. For just as by worldly law ancient possession is restored by the right of postliminy to those whom barbarian severity carried away under the necessity of captivity when they return, so no differently will the church also receive back the parish which it held before, together with its property, whether it is possessed by other churches or has passed into the possession of anyone whatever. For prescription of time is not to be pleaded where necessity of hostilities has intervened.

> C. XIII. Temporis prescriptio non obicitur ubi hostilitatis metus interuenerit.
> Item ex Concilio Spalensi, [II.] cui interfuit Ysidorus. [cap. 1.] VI. Pars. Prima actione Theodulfi Malachitanae ecclesiae antistitis ad nos oblata precatio est, asserentis antiquam eiusdem urbis parrochiam militaris quondam hostilitatis discrimine fuisse decisam, et ex parte aliqua ab ecclesiis Astigitanae, Eliberitanae atque Egabrensis urbium esse retentam. Pro qua re placuit, ut omnis parrochia quam antiqua ditione ante militarem hostilitatem retinuisse ecclesiam suam quisque conprobaret, eius priuilegio restitueretur. Sicut enim per legem mundialem his, quos barbarica seueritas captiua necessitate transuexit, postliminium reuertentibus redditur antiqua possessio, non aliter et ecclesia receptura est parrochiam, quam ante tenuit cum rebus suis, siue ab aliis ecclesiis possideatur, siue in cuiuslibet possessionem transfusa sit. Non enim erit obicienda prescriptio temporis, ubi necessitas intererit hostilitatis.

C. XIV. Prescription of time does not run where the fury of hostilities presses.

Likewise Pope John [VIII] to Bishop Paul, serving as legate in Germany and Pannonia. Moreover, if perhaps a claim is made concerning the number of years, let him know that a fixed number has been appointed among Christians and those who are of one faith. But where the fury of pagans and unbelievers is in question, however much time may pass, it does not prejudice the right of churches, which, knowing nothing of bodily arms, patiently await only the Lord and their defender, whenever it shall please Him to show mercy. But if length of years impedes in such matters, God Himself is to be reproved, who after four hundred and thirty years freed the children of Israel from the harshest servitude of Pharaoh and the iron furnace; and the Redeemer Himself also, by Himself, after thousands of years rescued the human race from the enclosures of hell. PART VII. GRATIAN. Those dioceses which, while their own bishops were negligent, others recalled from heresy to the integrity of faith are also taken away by prescription. Hence it is read in the Ninth African Council, [c. 88]:

> C. XIV. Temporis non currit prescriptio, ubi furor hostilitatis incumbit.
> Item Iohannes Papa [VIII.] Paulo Episcopo, fungenti legatione in Germaniam et Pannoniam. Porro si de annorum numero forte causatur, sciat, quia inter Christianos et eos, qui unius fidei sunt, numerus certus affixus est. Ceterum, ubi paganorum et incredulorum furor in causa est, quantalibet pretereant tempora, iuri non preiudicat ecclesiarum, que corporalia nescientes arma solum Dominum et propugnatorem suum, quando ei placuerit misereri, pacienter expectant. Verum si annorum prolixitas in talibus inpediat, Deus ipse reprehendendus est, qui post quadringentos et triginta annos filios Israel de durissima seruitute Pharaonis et fornace ferrea liberauit; sed et ipse per se redemptor, hominum genus post annorum milia de inferni claustris eripuit. VII. Pars. Gratian. Tolluntur etiam prescriptione illae dioceses, quas propriis episcopis negligentibus alii ab heresi ad fidei integritatem reuocauerunt. Unde in IX. Affricano Concilio [c. 88.] legitur:

C. XV. If any bishops neglect to gain their dioceses for God, after three years they shall belong to those bishops by whose zeal they were reconciled to the faith.

It pleased us that whoever neglects to gain for catholic unity the places pertaining to his see is to be approached by diligent neighboring bishops, so that he may not delay in doing this. But if within six months from the day of the approach he shall not have accomplished it, let those places pertain to him who shall have been able to gain them; yet in such a way that, if he to whom they appeared to pertain shall be able to prove that his negligence was chosen by the heretics so that they might remain there with impunity, and that his diligence was forestalled so that his more solicitous care might thereby be avoided, when the bishop-judges shall have learned this, let them restore the places to his see. GRATIAN. That prescription of long time by which Gelasius denies that the status of parishes can be changed can also be understood in another way. For long time, as is held from the laws, is understood as ten or twenty years. Therefore, by the authority of Gelasius and secular laws, this prescription of long time cannot be pleaded against churches. PART VIII. § 1. Some prescriptions were introduced out of disfavor toward the claimant and favor toward the possessor; others solely out of disfavor toward the claimant. For one who in good faith and under a just title shall have held the property of a person present for ten years, but that of an absent person for twenty years, will be protected by a perpetual defense, not only against others but also against creditors to whom that property had been pledged, and even against the true owner. But if by some event he shall have fallen from possession, he will be able effectively to vindicate the property even against the true owner. But if under no title, yet in good faith, he shall have possessed another's property for thirty years, he will enjoy a similar protection. Good faith, however, is referred not to the course of the intermediate time but to the beginning of possession. For it is sufficient that at the beginning anyone commenced possession in good faith, even if in the intermediate time he shall have had knowledge that the property belonged to another. § 2. These prescriptions were introduced in favor of the possessor and out of disfavor toward the claimant, because the law favors those who possess in good faith and under a just title, or in good faith alone, but disfavors and punishes those who are negligent and idle concerning their own property. § 3. But if anyone shall have begun to possess another's property in bad faith, after thirty years he will be protected by a defense against every claimant. But if by some event he shall have fallen from possession, he will have no action, because this prescription was introduced not in favor of a possessor in bad faith but solely out of disfavor toward one who neglects to pursue his own property. But if the property shall come to its creditor or owner, he will have the advantage of detention; if, however, it shall come to another person, the creditor or owner will be able to proceed against him, nor will the defense of the intermediate possessor profit him, because he did not have his basis of possession from that possessor. But if possession shall have come to them violently, the possessor in bad faith will receive the advantage of possession without distinction. § 4. These things are to be understood concerning prescriptions of ten, twenty, or thirty years, if the things are proved to have been possessed without interruption. But if possession shall have been interrupted by actual detention, a new thirty years for prescription will in all cases be counted from the day possession was recovered.

If it was interrupted through joinder of issue, forty years will be counted from the final day of the litigation. But if anyone obtains possession from one who was in a position to prescribe, he will be able to join the preceding time with the time of his own possession. § 5. But if the person whose property is being prescribed for shall be unable to join issue, either because of the absence, infancy, or madness of his adversary when that adversary has no guardian or curator, or because the adversary is established in great power, let him approach the provincial governor within the established periods, present a petition to him, bring this into complaint, and thus effect an interruption of time. But if he shall be unable to approach the governor, let him at least go to the bishop of the places or the defender of the city and hasten to manifest his will in writing. But if the governor, bishop, or defender shall be absent, let him be permitted to post it publicly where the possessor has his domicile, either with the subscriptions of public notaries or, if the city does not have public notaries, with the subscriptions of three witnesses; and let this suffice for every interruption of time, whether the prescription is of three years, of long time, or of thirty or forty years. § 6. These things concern prescriptions between private persons. But against religious places only a prescription of forty years runs. Hence in the Authentics: "Actions which a prescription of thirty years bars are barred in forty years if they belong to a religious place." And in the Novels: "Neither of ten years nor of twenty years, etc." But in the canons a church is permitted to prescribe against a church in thirty years, and a monastery against a church only in forty years. But if a private person shall have possessed first fruits and tithes either under a title or without a title, he will be able to be protected by no prescription of time. For things which cannot obtain effect in law from the beginning do not acquire validity through the course of time. § 7. Hence, if a free man is held as a slave for a long time, even if the courses of forty years shall have been exceeded, the rights of liberty will by no means be mutilated by length of time alone. § 8. Furthermore, as the church stands in relation to the commonwealth, first fruits and tithes have the character of civil public obligations. § 9. Moreover, public obligations cannot be prescribed against. Hence in book VII of the Code, title On the Prescription of Thirty or Forty Years, Emperor Anastasius:

> C. XV. Si qui episcopi dioceses suas Deo lucrari negligunt post triennium constabunt eis episcopis, quorum studio fidei sunt reconciliatae.
> Placuit, ut quicumque negligunt loca ad suam cathedram pertinentia in catholica unitate lucrari, conueniantur a diligentibus uicinis episcopis, ut id agere non morentur. Quod si intra sex menses a die conuentionis non effecerint qui potuerit eas lucrari, ad ipsum pertineant, ita sane, ut si ille, ad quem pertinuisse uidebantur, probare potuerit, magis illius electam negligentiam ab hereticis, ut inpune ibi sint, et suam diligentiam fuisse preuentam, ut eo modo eius cura sollicitior uitaretur cum hoc iudices episcopi cognouerint, suae cathedrae loca restituant. Gratian. Potest etiam aliter intelligi prescriptio illa longi temporis qua Gelasius negat statum parrochiarum posse mutari. Longum enim tempus, sicut ex legibus habetur, decennium uel uicennium intelligitur. Huius ergo longi temporis prescriptio auctoritate Gelasii et secularium legum ecclesiis obici non potest. VIII. Pars. §. 1. Prescriptionum aliae sunt odio introductae petentis et fauore possidentis: aliae tantum odio petentis. Qui enim bona fide et iusto titulo rem presentis per decennium, absentis uero per uicennium tenuerit, perpetua exceptione tutus erit, non solum aduersus alios, sed etiam aduersus creditores, quibus res ipsa obligata fuerat, etiam aduersus uerum dominum. Si uero aliquo casu a possessione ceciderit, etiam aduersus uerum dominum utiliter rem uendicare poterit. Si autem nullo titulo, bona tamen fide, per tricennium rem alicuius possederit, simili gaudebit presidio. Bona uero fides non ad tractum medii temporis, sed ad inicium possessionis refertur. Sufficit enim in inicio cuique bona fide possidere cepisse, etiamsi medio tempore conscientiam rei alienae habuerit. §. 2. Hae prescriptiones sunt introductae fauore possidentis et odio petentis, quia lex fauet his, qui bona fide et iusto titulo, uel bona tantum fide possident, odit autem et punit circa rem suam negligentes et desides. §. 3. Quod si mala fide rem alienam quis possidere ceperit, post XXX. annos aduersus omnem petentem exceptione tutus erit. Si uero aliquo casu a possessione ceciderit, actionem non habebit, quia prescriptio hec non fauore malae fidei possessoris, sed odio tantum rem suam persequi negligentis introducta est. Si autem res ad creditorem suum uel ad dominum peruenerit, detentionis commodum habebit; si uero ad alium, creditor uel dominus aduersus eum experiri poterit, nec sibi proderit exceptio medii possessoris, quia non ab eo habuerit causam possidendi. Quod si uiolenter possessio ad eos peruenerit, malae fidei possessor indistinctae possessionis commodum recipiet. §. 4. Hec de prescriptionibus decennii, uel uicennii, uel tricennii intelligenda sunt, si sine interruptione possessa probentur. Quod si per naturalem detentionem possessio interrupta fuerit, a die recuperatae possessionis noui triginta anni in omnibus prescriptionis numerabuntur.

Si per litis contestationem, ab ultimo die litigii quadraginta anni conputabuntur. Quod si ab eo, qui in causa prescribendi erat, possessionem aliquis nanciscatur, tempus precedens cum tempore suae possessionis continuare poterit. §. 5. Is autem, cuius res prescribitur, si litem contestari non poterit, uel propter aduersarii absentiam, uel infantiam, uel furoris laborem cum neminem tutorem uel curatorem habeat, uel quia in magna potestate constitutus est, intra constituta tempora presidem adeat libellum ei porrigat, et hoc in querimoniam deducat, et sic temporis interruptionem faciat. Si autem presidem adire non poterit, saltem ad episcopum locorum uel defensorem ciuitatis eat, et suam manifestare uoluntatem in scriptis deproperet. Quod si preses, uel episcopus, uel defensor abfuerit, liceat ei publice proponere, ubi domicilium habet possessor, seu cum tabulariorum subscriptione, uel, si ciuitas tabularios non habeat, cum trium testium subscriptione; et hoc sufficiat ad omnem temporalem interruptionem siue triennii, siue longi temporis, siue triginta, uel quadraginta annorum sit. §. 6. Hec de prescriptionibus inter priuatos. Ceterum aduersus loca religiosa non nisi quadraginta annorum prescriptio currit. Unde in Autenticis: "Quas actiones tricennalis prescriptio secludit, si loco religioso conpetant, quadraginta annis clauduntur." Et in Nouellis: "Neque decennii, neque uicennii, etc." In canonibus uero ecclesia aduersus ecclesiam triginta annis, monasterium aduersus ecclesiam non nisi quadraginta annis prescribere permittitur. Quod si priuatus primicias et decimas siue titulo siue sine titulo possederit, nulla temporis prescriptione tutus esse poterit. Que enim ab inicio de iure effectum sortiri non possunt tractu temporis non conualescunt. §. 7. Unde si liber homo longo tempore pro seruo detineatur, etiamsi quadraginta annorum curricula excesserint, sola temporis longinquitate libertatis iura minime mutilabuntur. §. 8. Ad hec ecclesia reipublicae: primitiae, decimationes ciuilium functionum instar obtinent. §. 9. Porro publicae functiones prescribi non possunt. Unde VII. libro Codicis, titulo de triginta uel quadraginta annorum prescriptione, Inp. Anastasius:

[C. XVI.]

"We command that those who have possessed any property through the continuous course of forty years without any lawful challenge are by no means to be removed from possession or ownership of the property; but that they are to be compelled to pay the public obligations, either the civil canon or any other public assessment imposed upon them, and that a prescription of any period pleaded against this part is not to be admitted." [GRATIAN.] Although estates, whether of a private person or of a church, can be prescribed for, the revenue of first fruits and tithes cannot be taken away by prescription, even if any layman shall have obtained a rescript concerning them from the Roman Pontiff. § 1. For rescripts obtained contrary to written law, unless they are of such a kind that they profit some and harm no one, are judged to be of no force. § 2. Likewise: Tithes were set apart for priests and Levites by God's command, so that those who are numbered in the Lord's lot might live from the Lord's lot. Therefore they cannot be conceded to laymen by anyone's privilege, lest human authority bring prejudice upon divine commands. § 3. Hence Emperors Valentinian and Theodosius: "We command that all lands which were sold or alienated by any other compact in any province by tenants or emphyteutic lessees from imperial domains, the right of the commonwealth, or temples be restored by those who hold them wrongly and contrary to the laws, with no prescription of long time standing in the way, in such a manner that it is not even permitted to reclaim the price from the unjust purchasers." PART IX. § 4. But concerning prescriptions of long time, it is found in the Authentics, collection VIII, constitution six: "Actions which otherwise a prescription of thirty, ten, or twenty years bars are barred in forty years if they belong to a religious place, while those which have their place by usucaption have prescription of four years." PART X. [GRATIAN.] But only by prescription of thirty years and thereafter, from which prescription, however, the privileges of the Roman Church are excluded, which can be prescribed for only by a period of one hundred years. Hence John VIII writes to King Louis:

[C. XVI.]

"Iubemus eos, qui rem aliquam per continuum quadraginta annorum curriculum sine quadam legitima interpellatione possederunt, de possessione quidem rei seu dominio nequaquam remoueri; functiones autem, seu ciuilem canonem, uel aliam quandam publicam collationem inpositam eis dependere conpelli, nec huic parti cuiusque temporis prescriptionem obpositam admitti." [Gratian.] Licet predia, sine sint priuati siue ecclesiae, possunt prescribi. Prouentus primiciarum decimationum prescriptione tolli non potest, etiamsi a Romano Pontifice quilibet laicus super his rescriptum inpetrauerit. §. 1. Rescripta enim, que contra ius scriptum inpetrata fuerint, nisi talia sint, que aliquibus prosint, et nulli obsint, nullius momenti esse censentur. §. 2. Item: Decimae Deo mandante sacerdotibus et Leuitis separatae sunt, ut de sorte Domini uiuerent qui in eius sorte connumerantur. Non ergo cuiusquam priuilegio laicis concedi possunt, ne diuinis mandatis auctoritas humana preiudicium inferat. §. 3. Unde Inp. Valentinianus et Theodosius: "Uniuersas terras, que a colonis, siue emphiteoticariis dominicis iuris, reipublicae uel templorum in qualibet prouincia uenditae uel ullo alio pacto alienatae sunt, ab his, qui perperam atque contra leges eas detinent, nulla longi temporis prescriptione officiente, iubemus restitui, ita, ut nec precium quidem iniquis conparatoribus reposcere liceat." IX. Pars. §. 4. De prescriptionibus uero longi temporis in Autenticis inuenitur collatione VIII., constitutione sexta: "Quas actiones alias tricennalis, decennalis, uicennalis prescriptio secludit, si loco religioso conpetunt, quadraginta annis clauduntur usucapione quadriennii prescriptione suum locum habentibus." X. Pars. [Gratian.] Sed sola prescriptione XXX. annorum et deinceps, a qua tamen prescriptione priuilegia Romanae ecclesiae sunt exclusa, que non nisi centum annorum spatio prescribi possunt. Unde Iohannes VIII. scribit Regi Lodouico:

C. XVII. The privileges of the Roman Church are taken away only by prescription of one hundred years.

Let no one take support for resistance from the number of years, because the privileges which the holy Roman Church—which by God's authorship we serve—received upon the firm rock of Peter's stability are narrowed by no periods of time and prejudiced by no divisions of kingdoms. But the venerable Roman laws, promulgated divinely through the mouths of princes, admit prescription of its property only after one hundred years.

C. XVII. Priuilegia Romanae ecclesiae non nisi centum annorum prescriptione tolluntur.

> Nemo de annorum numero resultandi sumat fomentum, quia sancta Romana (cui Deo auctore seruimus) ecclesia priuilegia, que in firma Petri stabilitatis petra suscepit, nullis temporibus angustantur, nullis regnorum partitionibus preiudicantur. Sed uenerandae Romanae leges, diuinitus per ora principum promulgatae, rerum eius prescriptionem non nisi per centum annos admittunt.

Question IV

GRATIAN. It has been shown when a church can prescribe against a church. Now it is to be seen whether a monastery has power to prescribe against a church. Urban II forbade this, saying:

> GRATIANUS. Ostensum est, quando ecclesia aduersus ecclesiam prescribere possit. Nunc uidendum est, si monasterium aduersus ecclesiam prescribere ualeat? Quod Urbanus II. prohibuit, dicens:

C. I. Monks cannot prescribe for anything by a period of thirty years.

We forbid in every way that abbots or monks have possessions of churches and bishops by thirty-year prescription. GRATIAN. But if thirty-year possession is taken away from them, prescription of forty years is conceded to them by blessed Gregory. For he says to Peter the Subdeacon, [book I, c. 9]:

> C. I. Tricennio temporis aliquid monachi prescribere non ualent.
> Possessiones ecclesiarum et episcoporum tricennales abbates uel monachos habere omnimodis prohibemus. Gratian. Sed si tollitur eis tricennalis possessio, a B. Gregorio conceditur eis quadragenalis prescriptio. Ait enim Petro Subdiacono: [l. I. c. 9.]

C. II. Prescription of forty years is conceded to religious houses.

We will that, when you arrive at the city of Palermo, you examine the question itself by this reasoning—with ownership of the property meanwhile remaining with the possessor, just as it has been possessed until now—so that, if you shall find that the aforesaid monastery of Saint Theodore possessed without disturbance for forty years the boundaries concerning which the claim was initiated, you are thereafter to permit it to sustain no calumny, even if something could have belonged to the holy Roman Church, but procure their undisturbed peace in every way. But if the agents of the church shall show that they did not possess them for forty years with undisturbed right, but that some question concerning those boundaries was at some time initiated within that period, let it be quietly and lawfully settled by chosen arbiters.

> C. II. Quadraginta annorum prescriptio religiosis domibus conceditur.
> Volumus accedente te ad Panormitanam ciuitatem questionem ipsam tali ratione discutere (dominio rei apud possessorem, sicut hactenus possessum est, uidelicet permanente), ut, si monasterium prefatum S. Theodori fines, de quibus causatio mota est, inconcussos quadraginta annis possedisse repereris, nullam deinceps (etiam si quid sanctae Romanae ecclesiae conpetere potuit) patiaris sustinere calumpniam, sed quietem eorum inconcussam omnibus modis procurate. Sin uero actores ecclesiae non eos possedisse quadraginta annis inconcusso iure monstrauerint, sed aliquam intra tempora hec motam fuisse aliquando questionem eorundem finium, electis arbitris tranquille et legaliter sopiatur.

C. III. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise from the Novels of Justinian, [Novel CXXXI]. Let neither prescription of ten, twenty, or thirty years, but only courses of forty years, be pleaded against religious houses, not only in other property but also in legacies and inheritances. GRATIAN. Therefore, just as by law only a forty-year prescription is to be pleaded against religious houses, so also by Gregory's authority they can prescribe against other churches by the same span of time.

> C. III. De eodem.
>
> Item ex Nouellis Iustiniani. [Nouella CXXXI.] Neque decennii, neque uicennii, uel XXX. annorum prescriptio, sed sola XL. annorum curricula religiosis domibus obponantur, non solum in ceteris rebus, sed etiam in legatis et hereditatibus. Gratian. Sicut ergo religiosis domibus ex lege non nisi quadragenaria est obicienda prescriptio, ita et auctoritate Gregorii aduersus alias ecclesias prescribere possunt eodem spacio temporis.

Question V [VI]

QUESTION V. [VI.]

GRATIAN. PART I. But blessed Gregory testifies that the rulers of a church cannot by their own authority, with judicial proceedings omitted, reclaim the things which are owed to the church, [book IV, c. 38], saying:

> QUESTIO V. [VI.]
> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem ea, que ecclesiae debentur, rectores eiusdem sua auctoritate iudiciis pretermissis repetere non ualeant, B. Gregorius testatur, [lib. IV. c. 38.] dicens:

C. I. Let the property of a church be defended by judgment, not by hands.

A new and very reprehensible custom has erupted in this church: when the administrators of its patrimony suspect that urban or rural estates can belong to its right, they impress titles after the manner of the fisc and defend by hands, not by judgment, that which they judge can belong to the poor; and although the truth commands its preachers to do "nothing through contention," even the evil of litigious contention itself is surpassed, and any property, when it is judged that it can belong to the church, is held by force. Therefore it was established by the present decree that if any ecclesiastical person shall ever presume of his own accord to place titles upon either a rural or an urban estate, let him be anathema. And all responded: "Let him be anathema." § 1. But if he who presides over the church shall either command this to be done himself or neglect to punish with worthy chastisement what was done without his command, let him be anathema. And all responded: "Let him be anathema."

> C. I. Iudicio, non manibus, res ecclesiae defendantur.
> Consuetudo noua in hac ecclesia et ualde reprehensibilis erupit, ut, cum rectores eius patrimonii urbana uel rusticana predia iuri illius conpetere posse suspicantur, fiscali more titulos inprimant, atque, quod conpetere pauperibus existimant, non iudicio, sed manibus defendant, et, cum predicatores suos ueritas: "nichil per contentionem" agere precipiat, etiam ipsum litigiosae contentionis malum transcenditur, et res quelibet, cum estimatur ecclesiae posse conpetere, per uim tenetur. Proinde presenti decreto constituto, ut, si quis ecclesiasticorum umquam titulos ponere siue in rustico siue in urbano predio sua sponte presumpserit, anathema sit. Et responderunt omnes: "Anathema sit." §. 1. Is autem, qui ecclesiae preest, si hoc uel ipse fieri preceperit, uel sine sua preceptione factum digna punire animaduersione neglexerit, anathema sit. Et responderunt omnes: "Anathema sit."

Question VI

GRATIAN. PART II. GRATIAN. But that whoever usurps by his own authority the things which he thinks are owed to him, and does not claim the property through a judge, loses his case is held from the authority of the Council of Milevis, in which it is read to have been established thus, [c. 21]:

> GRATIANUS. II. Pars. Gratian. Quod autem quisquis sua auctoritate que sibi deberi putat usurpat, nec per iudicem res poscit cadit a causa ex auctoritate Mileuitani Concilii habetur in quo ita statutum legitur: [c. 21.]

C. I. [II.] Let a bishop who seeks to take possession by his own authority of his churches retained by another suffer detriment to his case.

It pleased us that whatever bishops shall reclaim churches or communities which they judge to pertain to their see, not in such a way that they conduct their cases with bishops judging, but shall rush in while another retains them, whether the communities are unwilling or willing, are to suffer detriment to their case. And whoever have already done this, if the contention between the bishops has not yet been ended but they still contend concerning it, let the one who is established to have rushed in with ecclesiastical judges omitted depart from it. § 1. Nor let anyone flatter himself if he shall have obtained letters from the primate permitting him to retain it; but whether he has letters or does not have them, let him meet with the one who holds it and receive his letters, so that it may appear that he held peacefully the church pertaining to him. But if the other shall raise any question, let the case be ended through bishop-judges, either those whom the primate shall have given them or those neighboring bishops whom they themselves shall have chosen with the counsel of the primate. PART III. GRATIAN. To the contrary Gregory writes to John the Defender, going to Spain, [book XI, letter 50], saying:

> C. I. [II.] Causae suae detrimentum patiatur episcopus, qui ecclesias suas ab alio retentas propria auctoritate querit adire.
> Placuit, ut quicumque episcopi ecclesias uel plebes, quas ad suam cathedram existimant pertinere, non ita repetierint, ut causas suas episcopis iudicantibus agant, sed alio retinente irruerint, siue nolentibus siue uolentibus plebibus, causae suae detrimentum patiantur. Et quicumque hoc iam fecerint, si nondum inter episcopos finita est contentio, sed adhuc inde contendunt, ille inde discedat, quem constiterit pretermissis iudicibus ecclesiasticis irruisse. §. 1. Nec sibi quisque blandiatur, si a primate, ut retineat, litteras inpetrauerit, sed, siue habeat litteras siue non habeat, conueniat eum qui tenet, et eius litteras accipiat, ut eum appareat pacifice tenuisse ecclesiam ad se pertinentem. Si autem ille aliquam questionem retulerit, per episcopos iudices causa finiatur siue quos eis primas dederit, siue quos ipsi uicinos cum consultu primatis delegerint. III. Pars. Gratian. Contra Gregorius Iohanni Defensori, eunti in Yspaniam, scribit [lib. XI. epist. 50.,] dicens:

C. II. [III.] The offense of a person cannot be turned to the loss of a church.

If it shall be established that the bishop—which may it not be—committed such a fault that it is evident he was not unreasonably deposed, let his deposition be confirmed, and let all the property of his church which had been taken away be restored, because the offense of a person is not to be turned to the loss of a church. But if it is said that Comitiolus is dead, let those things which were unjustly taken away by him be rendered by his heir without excuse.

C. II. [III.] Delictum personae in dampnum ecclesiae conuerti non potest.

Si episcopum (quod absit) talem culpam conmisisse constiterit, ut constet eum non irrationabiliter esse depositum, eadem eius depositio confirmetur, et omnes res suae ecclesiae que ablatae fuerant, restituantur, quia delictum personae in dampnum ecclesiae non est conuertendum. Si autem dicitur, quia Comitiolus defunctus est, ab herede eius que ab illo iniuste ablata sunt sine excusatione reddantur.

C. III. [IV.] Let vengeance proceed against the person of the offender, not against his resources.

The same to Peter the Subdeacon, [book I, letter 42]. We have learned that if anyone from the household commits a fault, vengeance is taken not upon him but upon his substance. Concerning this matter we command that whoever shall commit a fault is indeed to be punished in his own person, as is worthy, but that his property is to be spared entirely.

C. III. [IV.] In personam deliquentis, non in facultates eius ultio procedat.

Idem Petro Subdiacono. [lib. I. epist. 42.] Cognouimus, quod si quis ex familia culpam fecerit, non in ipso, sed in eiusdem substantia uindicetur. De qua re precipimus, ut quisquis culpam fecerit, in ipso quidem, ut dignum est, uindicetur; a commodo eius autem omnino abstineatur.

C. IV. [V.] Let the property of those who fall from the clergy be handed over to a monastery together with them.

The same, [in the same letter]. Concerning fallen priests or anyone from the clergy, we will you to observe that you do not involve yourself with any contamination in their property; but seek out the poorest regular monasteries which know how to live according to God, hand the fallen over to penance in those monasteries, and let the property of the fallen profit the place in which they are handed over to do penance, so that those who bear solicitude for their correction may have support from their property. But if they have relatives, let their property be given to the lawful relatives, yet in such a way that the maintenance of those who shall have been given over to penance ought to be sufficiently provided. § 1. But if any priests or Levites, monks or clerics, or any others from the ecclesiastical household shall have fallen, we will that they be given over to penance, but that their property not be withdrawn from ecclesiastical right. Nevertheless, let them receive for their own use that from which they may subsist for penance, lest, if they are stripped bare, they be burdensome to the places in which they shall have been placed.

C. IV. [V.] Res eorum, qui ex clero labuntur simul cum ipsis monasterio tradantur.

Idem. [in eadem epistola] De lapsis sacerdotibus, uel quolibet ex clero obseruare te uolumus, ut in rebus eorum nulla contaminatione miscearis: sed pauperrima regularia monasteria require, que secundum Deum uiuere sciunt, et in eisdem monasteriis lapsos trade ad penitenciam, et res lapsorum in eo loco proficiant, in quo agere penitenciam traduntur, quatinus ipsi ex rebus eorum subsidium habeant, qui de correptione eorum sollicitudinem gerunt. Si uero parentes habent, res eorum legitimis parentibus dentur, ita autem, ut eorum stipendia, qui in penitenciam dati fuerint, sufficienter debeant procurari. §. 1. Si qui uero ex familia ecclesiastica sacerdotes uel Leuitae, uel monachi, uel clerici, uel quilibet alii lapsi fuerint, dari eos in penitenciam uolumus, sed res eorum ecclesiastico iuri non subtrahi. Ad usum tamen suum accipiant unde ad penitenciam subsistant, ne, si nudentur, locis, in quibus dati fuerint, sint onerosi.

C. V. [VI.] A useless priest does not deprive his church of its dignity.

Likewise Leo IV to King Charles. If perhaps—which we do not believe—we are judged useless among you, nevertheless the church over which, by the Lord's permission, we preside is not useless, but is deservedly called by all together the head and beginning of all.

> C. V. [VI.] Inutilis sacerdos ecclesiam suam dignitate non priuat.
> Item Leo IV. Karolo Regi. Si fortassis (quod non credimus) apud uos inutiles iudicamur, ecclesia tamen, cui permittente Domino presumus, non inutilis, sed caput principiumque omnium merito simul ab omnibus uocatur.

C. VI. [VII.] A bishop is not permitted to take away the possessions of a monastery because of the abbot's sin.

Likewise in the Council of Mainz. A bishop is not permitted to take away the possession of a monastery, although the abbot has sinned; but let him subject the abbot to the power of the abbot of another monastery. [PALEA.

> C. VI. [VII.] Possessiones monasterii pro peccato abbatis episcopo tollere non licet.
> Item in Magontiensi Concilio. Episcopo non licet possessionem monasterii tollere, quamuis abbas peccauerit; sed subiciat eum potestati abbatis alterius monasterii. [PALEA.

C. VII. [VIII.] Let subsequent pontiffs by no means presume to take away the things which priests have given.

Likewise Gelasius. We have judged that this is to be established: whatever benefactions preceding priests shall have given to clerics or those serving them, from the property of the church for use or from their own property for ownership, let subsequent pontiffs by no means presume to take them away. But if there shall have been any fault, let severity be exercised against the person according to the quality of the persons or the rule of the preceding canons, not against the property.] GRATIAN. Therefore, if the offense of a person cannot be turned to the loss of a church, since an administrator can make the condition of the church better, not worse; if the possessions of a monastery are not permitted to be taken away because of an abbot's sin: how will the offense of a bishop be turned to the loss of a church, so that it should suffer detriment to its case on that account? But to suffer detriment to the case is not to be understood in such a way that the church is deprived of its right; rather, when the clerics stand before the judge, the bishop will be silent and will be fined for the injury inflicted, if he shall have property of his own.

> C. VII. [VIII.] Que sacerdotes dederunt subsequentes pontifices nullatenus auferre presumant.
> Item Gelasius. Illud statuendum censuimus, ut quascumque munificentias clericis aut sibi seruientibus de rebus ecclesiae in usum, aut de propriis in proprietatem precedentes dederint sacerdotes, subsequentes pontifices nullatenus auferre presumant. Si quid tamen culpae extiterit, pro qualitate personarum uel regula precedentium canonum in persona habeatur, non in facultate districtum.] Gratian. Si ergo delictum personae in dampnum ecclesiae conuerti non potest, quin procurator condicionem ecclesiae potest facere meliorem, non deteriorem; si peccato abbatis possessiones monasterii auferri non licet: quomodo delictum episcopi uertetur in dampnum ecclesiae, ut inde detrimentum causae suae patiatur? Sed detrimentum causae pati non sic est accipiendum, ut ecclesia suo iure priuetur, pocius, quia clericis coram iudice stantibus episcopus tacebit, et pro iniuria illata multabitur, si propria habuerit.

Question VII

GRATIAN. PART I. But the authority of all the canons testifies that neither an abbot nor anyone else is permitted to receive churches from the hand of laymen. For in general both churches and the property of churches remain under the power of bishops. But laymen can possess neither tithes nor churches by their own authority or that of bishops. Hence, if bishops shall have given churches or tithes to laymen either as a benefice or for a price, they make the house of prayer a house of business and a den of thieves. Hence, after the overthrow of their see, separated from the assembly of the faithful, they shall be scourged by the Lord with an eternal lash. Hence Gregory VII says, [in the Lateran Council, c. 7, book VI of the Register]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem ecclesias de manu laicorum nec abbati, nec alicui liceat accipere, omnium canonum testatur auctoritas. Generaliter enim tam ecclesiae quam res ecclesiarum in episcoporum potestate consistunt. Laici autem nec sua, nec episcoporum auctoritate decimas uel ecclesias possidere possunt. Unde episcopi, siue beneficio siue precio ecclesias uel decimas laicis dederint, domum orationis domum negociacionis et speluncam latronum faciunt. Unde post euersionem cathedrae a cetu fidelium segregati eterno uerbere a Domino flagellabuntur. Unde Gregorius VII. ait: [in Concilio Lateranensi, cap. 7. lib. VI. Regesti]

C. I. Let tithes not be possessed by laymen.

By apostolic authority we forbid tithes, which canonical authority demonstrates were conceded for the use of piety, to be possessed by laymen. For whether they received them from bishops, kings, or any persons, unless they shall restore them to the church, let them know that they commit the crime of sacrilege and incur the danger of eternal damnation. § 1. But it is more fitting that we receive from all the people the tithes and first fruits which we decree by right belong to priests, which the faithful offer at the Lord's command, according to that prophecy of Malachi the prophet: "Bring the whole tithe into my barn, so that there may be food in my house." § 2. But we decree that these tithes are to be under the bishop's hand, so that he who presides over the others may distribute them justly to all and not furnish anything more honorably to one person, from which others might be moved with a scrupulous heart; but let all things be common, because it appears dishonorable that some priests should have while others suffer loss; but just as there is one catholic faith, so it is necessary that he who is provider of the place, although the churches are many, nevertheless distribute faithfully to all.

[PALEA.

> C. I. Decimae a laicis non possideantur.
> Decimas, quas in usum pietatis concessas esse canonica auctoritas demonstrat, possideri a laicis apostolica auctoritate prohibemus. Siue enim ab episcopis, uel regibus, uel quibuslibet personis eas acceperint, nisi ecclesiae reddiderint, sciant, se sacrilegii crimen conmittere, et eternae dampnationis periculum incurrere. §. 1. Oportet autem congruentius nos decimas et primicias, quas iure sacerdotum esse sancimus, ab omni populo accipere, quas fideles Domino precipiente offerunt, iuxta uaticinium illud Malachiae prophetae: "Inferte omnem decimationem in horreum meum, ut sit cibus in domo mea." §. 2. Has uero decimas sub manu episcopi fore censemus, ut ille, qui ceteris preest, omnibus iuste distribuat, nec quicquam personae honorabilius exhibeat, unde alii scrupuloso corde moueantur, sed sint omnia communia, quia inhonestum uidetur, ut alii sacerdotes habeant, alii uero detrimentum patiantur, sed sicut una est fides catholica, ita necesse est, ut ille, qui prouisor est loci, quamuis multae sint ecclesiae, omnibus tamen fideliter distribuat.

[PALEA.

C. II. Concerning the same matter.

Hence Urban II: When a synodal assembly of many bishops was gathered at the city of Clermont, a question was proposed to us by certain of them concerning churches or ecclesiastical possessions acquired until the present by clerics or monks without consulting the bishops. But we, employing the sounder counsel of those same bishops, yielding for the time and providing for ecclesiastical peace, and because otherwise a question of this kind could not proceed without danger of inevitable scandal, decreed by apostolic authority that those things which were acquired up to today by clerics or monks, or by any persons, as they were able, are to remain perpetually ratified and undisturbed, yet with this tenor: that henceforth they are not to presume such things without consulting the bishops.]

C. II. De eodem.

Unde Urbanus II.: Congregato apud Claromontensem urbem multorum episcoporum sinodali conuentu, proposita nobis est a quibusdam eorum questio de ecclesiis uel de ecclesiasticis possessionibus, a clericis uel monachis usque in presentiarum inconsultis episcopis adquisitis. Nos autem usi saniori consilio eorumdem episcoporum, condescendentes pro tempore prouidentesque ecclesiasticae paci, uel quia aliter absque ineuitabilis scandali periculo huiusmodi questio non poterat procedere, apostolica auctoritate decreuimus, ut ea, que a clericis uel monachis, uel a quibuscumque personis, prout potuerint, usque hodie fuerint acquisita, rata perhenniter et inconcussa permaneant, hoc tamen tenore, ne in posterum inconsultis episcopis talia presumant.]

[C. III.]

Likewise Gregory [VII]. A sinister report has reached us that certain bishops confer the tithes and offerings of Christians not upon the priests of their own diocese but rather upon lay persons—namely, soldiers or servants or, what is graver, blood relatives. Hence, if from now on any bishop shall be found a transgressor of this divine precept, let him be held not the least among the greatest heretics and antichrists; and, just as the Synod of Nicaea decreed concerning simoniacs, let both the bishop who gives and the laymen who receive from him, whether for a price or as a benefice, be assigned to the fires of eternal burning.

[C. III.]

Item Gregorius. [VII.] Peruenit ad nos fama sinistra, quod quidam episcoporum non sacerdotibus propriae diocesis decimas atque Christianorum oblationes conferant, sed pocius laicalibus personis, militum uidelicet, siue seruitorum, uel (quod grauius est) consanguineis. Unde, si quis amodo episcopus inuentus fuerit huius precepti diuini transgressor, inter maximos hereticos et antichristos non minimus habeatur, et, sicut Nicena sinodus de symoniacis censuit, et qui dat episcopus, et qui recipiunt ab eo laici, siue precio siue beneficio, eterni incendii ignibus deputentur.

C. IV. One who pays tithes from all his possessions gives tithes faithfully.

Likewise Ambrose in the sermon On Lent, [whose beginning is: "Behold, now is the time"]. Whoever shall recognize in himself that he did not faithfully give his tithes, let him now amend what he did insufficiently. What is it to give faithfully, except that he at no time offer either what is worse or less, from grain, wine, the fruits of trees, livestock, a garden, business, or his own hunting?

C. IV. Fideliter decimas dat qui omnium suorum decimas soluit.

Item Ambrosius in sermone Quadragesimae. [cuius initium: Ecce nunc tempus] Quicumque recognouerit in se, quod fideliter non dederit decimas suas, modo emendet quod minus fecit. Quid est fideliter dare, nisi ut nec peius, nec minus aliquando offerat, de grano, aut de uino, aut de fructibus arborum, aut de pecoribus, aut de horto, aut de negocio, aut de ipsa uenatione sua?

C. V. Let those who are unwilling to give tithes to priests be excommunicated.

Likewise from the Council of Rouen. All tithes of the land, whether from crops or the fruits of trees, belong to the Lord and are sanctified to Him. [PALEA. Oxen, sheep, and goats which pass under the shepherd's rod: whatever comes tenth shall be sanctified to the Lord. Neither good nor bad shall be chosen, nor shall it be exchanged for another. If anyone shall exchange it, both that which was exchanged and that for which it was exchanged shall be sanctified to the Lord, and it shall not be redeemed.]

But because many are now found unwilling to give tithes, we establish that, according to the precept of our Lord, they are to be admonished once, a second time, and a third. If they shall not amend themselves, let them be struck with the bond of anathema until suitable satisfaction and amendment.

C. V. Excommunicentur qui sacerdotibus decimas dare noluerint.

Item ex Concilio Rothomagensi. Omnes decimae terrae, siue de frugibus siue de pomis arborum, Domini sunt, et illi sanctificantur. [PALEA. Boues, et oues, et caprae, que sub pastoris uirga transeunt; quicquid decimum uenerit sanctificabitur Domino. Non eligetur nec bonum, nec malum, nec altero conmutabitur. Si quis mutauerit, et quod mutatum est, et pro quo mutatum est, sanctificabitur Domino, et non redimetur.]

Sed quia modo multi inueniuntur, decimas dare nolentes statuimus, ut secundum Domini nostri preceptum admoneantur semel, et secundo, et tertio. Qui si non emendauerint, anathematis uinculo feriantur, usque ad satisfactionem et emendationem congruam.

C. VI. Tithes are paid according to the example of the ancients.

Likewise from the Council of Mainz. Abraham intimates by deeds and Jacob by promises that tithes are to be given to God and the priests of God, and all the holy priests commemorate this. GRATIAN. But they are not to be bought back from the people if the people shall have been unwilling to give them otherwise. Hence it is read in the same council:

C. VI. Veterum exemplo decimae soluuntur.

Item ex Concilio Magontiensi. Decimas Deo et sacerdotibus Dei dandas, Abraham factis, Iacob promissis insinuat, et omnes sancti sacerdotes conmemorant. Gratian. Non autem sunt redimendae a populo, si aliter eas dare noluerint. Unde in eodem Concilio legitur:

C. VII. Tithes are not to be bought back from the people.

It is to be forbidden by the bishops that tithes which the people are unwilling to give unless they are bought back from them by some payment be treated in this way.

C. VII. Decimae non sunt redimendae a populo.

Decimas, quas populus dare non uult, nisi quolibet munere ab eo redimantur, ab episcopis prohibendum est, ne fiat.

C. VIII. Because tithes are not rendered, the assessment of the fisc has increased.

Likewise Augustine, [book L of the homilies, homily 48]. Our forefathers abounded in all resources for this reason: that they gave tithes to God and rendered the census to Caesar. But now, because devotion to God has departed, the assessment of the fisc has increased. We are unwilling to divide tithes with God, but now the whole is taken away. The fisc takes what Christ does not receive.

C. VIII. Quia decimae non redduntur, indictio fisci accessit.

Item Augustinus. [lib. L. homiliarum, hom. 48.] Maiores nostri ideo copiis omnibus habundabant, quia Deo decimas dabant, et Cesari censum reddebant. Modo autem, quia discessit deuocio Dei, accessit indictio fisci. Nolumus cum Deo partiri decimas, modo autem tollitur totum. Hoc tollit fiscus, quod non accipit Christus.

C. IX. One who commits a church to undisciplined persons sells doves.

Likewise Origen, [homily 15 on chapter 21 of Matthew]. And we have said these things according to the simple understanding. But according to the moral understanding we shall say such things, and first indeed concerning the temple, about which the Lord said through the Prophet: "My house shall be called a house of prayer." Therefore, in accordance with the bodily circumcision of the flesh and the bodily feasts and sacrifices of the law, the temple of God, which was constructed from insensible stones, will consequently also be understood: first constructed by Solomon, then repaired by Ezra, but afterward, after Christ's advent, destroyed by the Romans; and that house is the house of prayer. When it has been destroyed, it is necessary that the Jews, as now no longer having a house of prayer, no longer have the privilege of God's watchman and cannot serve God according to the law. § 1. When this was done, therefore, Christ cast out all things in the ministry of His spiritual acts; and what He then did, He enacted visibly, casting those who sold and bought out of the temple, overturning the tables of the money-changers and the seats of those who sold doves, for the correction of the people: that they are not to celebrate feasts in God's name for worldly purposes, nor devote themselves to purchases and sales in an unsuitable place in which they ought not to buy and sell, but to devote themselves only to prayers and to assemble as though in a house of prayer. § 2. But now I judge the church of Christ to be the temple of God constructed from living stones. There are many in it, however, who do not live spiritually, as is fitting, but serve according to the flesh, and by their acts, which are not worthy of the church of God but of a den of thieves, they make the house of prayer constructed from living stones into a den of thieves. For one who considers in many churches the sins of such Christians, who judge piety to be gain, and who, although they ought to live from the Gospel in the manner fitting for servants of God, do not do this but acquire riches and many possessions—will you not say that under them the church has been made a den of thieves, so that Christ rightly says to them because of the dissipation of His church: "What profit is there in my blood while I descend into corruption?" Likewise He Himself through Hosea in this manner: "Woe is me, because I have become like one who gathers straw at harvest and like a cluster at the vintage, when there are no bunches to eat the first fruits. Woe to my soul, because the God-fearing man has perished from the earth, and there is no one among all men who corrects." And when you shall have understood Jesus saying such things and mourning our sins, behold at the same time also that which is written in the Gospel: “When He saw Jerusalem, He wept over it and said: If only you also had known.” And if He reasonably wept over Jerusalem, He wept more reasonably over the church, built indeed to be a house of prayer but made through shameful gains into a den of thieves. § 3. And I judge that the word concerning the sellers of doves befits those who hand churches over to avaricious, tyrannical, undisciplined, and irreligious bishops or priests. For this reason also the Evangelist stated that only the seats were overturned by Jesus. And would that those who glory in the seats of Moses upon which they sit, and sell all the seats of doves and hand them over to such superiors, would hear these things together with the admonition of Scripture as it speaks; to them it is rightly said by the Lord through Jeremiah the prophet: “The rulers of my people have not known me. For they are foolish and without understanding; they are wise to do evil, but they do not know how to do good.” GRATIAN. Therefore, since churches and their offerings remain only under the power of bishops, it is certainly evident that they are to be received from no one other than from their hand. Hence it was established in the Council of Orléans, [I, c. 19]:

C. IX. Columbas uendit qui ecclesiam indisciplinatis conmittit.

Item Origenes. [homil. 15. ad c. 21. Matthaei.] Et hec diximus secundum simplicem intellectum. Iuxta moralem autem talia dicemus, et primum quidem de templo, de quo per Prophetam dixit Dominus: "Domus mea domus orationis uocabitur." Ergo secundum corporalem circumcisionem carnis, et secundum corporales legis festiuitates et sacrificia, consequenter et templum Dei estimabitur, quod in lapidibus insensatis erat constructum; primum quidem a Salomone, deinde reparatum ab Esdra, postea uero post Christi aduentum a Romanis destructum, et illa domus est orationis; qua destructa necesse est ut Iudei, quasi iam non habentes domum orationis, iam non habeant priuilegium speculatoris Dei nec possint secundum legem Deo seruire. §. 1. Hoc ergo facto, omnia Christus eiecit in ministerio spiritualium actuum suorum, et quod tunc fecit uisibiliter egit eiciens uendentes et ementes de templo, et mensas nummulariorum euertens, et cathedras uendentium columbas ad correctionem populi, ut non pro mundanis festiuitates in nomine Dei celebrent, nec emptionibus et uendicionibus uacent in loco non conpetenti, in quo non debent emere et uendere, sed orationibus tantum uacare, atque congregari quasi in domo orationis. §. 2. Nunc autem arbitror templum Dei ex lapidibus uiuis constructum ecclesiam Christi. Sunt autem multi in ea, non, sicut condecet, spiritualiter uiuentes, sed secundum carnem militantes, qui et domum orationis de lapidibus uiuis constructam faciunt speluncam esse latronum, actibus suis non ecclesia Dei dignis, sed spelunca latronum. Qui enim considerat in multis ecclesiis talium Christianorum peccata, qui arbitrantur questum esse pietatem, et cum deberent de euangelio uiuere, secundum quod uiuere decet seruos Dei, hoc non faciunt, sed diuicias et multas possessiones acquirunt, nonne dices, speluncam latronum factam esse sub illis ecclesiam? ut recte dicat Christus ad eos propter dissipationem ecclesiae suae: "Que utilitas in sanguine meo, dum descendo in corruptionem?" Item ipse per Oseae tali modo: "Vae michi, quia factus sum sicut qui colligit stipulam in messe, et sicut racemum in uindemia, cum non sint botri ad manducandum primogenita. Vae animae meae, quia periit timoratus a terra, et qui corrigat in omnibus hominibus non est." Et cum intellexeris Iesum dicentem talia, et lugentem peccata nostra, aspice simul et illud, quod in euangelio scribitur: "Cum uidisset Iherusalem, fleuit super eam, et dixit, quia si cognouisses et tu." Et si rationabiliter fleuit super Iherusalem, fleuit super ecclesiam, rationabilius edificatam quidem, ut esset domus orationis, factam autem propter turpia lucra, speluncam latronum. §. 3. Et arbitror conuenire uerbum de uenditoribus columbarum eis, qui tradunt ecclesias auaris, et tirannicis, et indisciplinatis, et irreligiosis episcopis aut presbiteris. Propter que et cathedras tantummodo appellauit Euangelista euersas esse ab Iesu. Et utinam audirent hec cum dicentis ammonitione scripturae qui gloriantur de cathedris Moisi, in quibus sedent, et uendunt omnes cathedras columbarum et tradunt eas talibus prepositis, ad quos recte dicitur a Domino per Iheremiam prophetam: "Principes populi mei me non cognouerunt. Filii enim sunt insipientes, et non intelligentes: sapientes sunt ad male faciendum, bene autem facere nesciunt." Gratian. Cum ergo ecclesiae et oblationes earum non consistant, nisi in potestate episcoporum, patet profecto, quod non sunt ab alio recipiendae, quam de manu eorum. Unde in Aurelianensi Concilio [I. c. 19.] statutum est:

C. X. All basilicas pertain to the bishop in whose territory they are situated.

Let all basilicas which have been constructed in various places or are constructed daily remain under the power of the bishop in whose territory they are situated.

C. X. Omnes basilicae ad eum pertinent episcopum, in cuius territorio positae sunt.

Omnes basilicae, que per diuersa loca constructae sunt uel cottidie construuntur, in episcopi potestate consistant, in cuius territorio positae sunt.

C. XI. Let neither an archdeacon, archpriest, provost, nor dean grant ecclesiastical offices or benefices without the bishop's consent.

Likewise Pope Callixtus. Let absolutely no archdeacon, archpriest, provost, or dean grant to anyone the care of souls or prebends of a church without the judgment or consent of the bishop; rather, just as was established by the holy canons, let the care of souls and the dispensation of ecclesiastical monies remain under the bishop's judgment and power. But if anyone shall presume to act contrary to this or to claim for himself the power which pertains to the bishop, let him be barred from the thresholds of the church. Likewise Gregory VII, presiding in a general synod, said, [cc. 1 and 2]:

C. XI. Archidiaconus, archipresbiter, prepositus, uel decanus, nec offitia, nec beneficia ecclesiastica tribuat sine consensu episcopi.

Item Calixtus Papa. Nullus omnino archidiaconus, aut archipresbiter, siue prepositus, uel decanus animarum curam uel prebendas ecclesiae sine iudicio uel consensu episcopii alicui tribuat; immo, sicut sanctis canonibus constitutum est, animarum cura et pecuniarum ecclesiasticarum dispensatio in episcopi iudicio et potestate permaneat. Si quis uero contra hoc facere, aut potestatem, que ad episcopum pertinet, sibi uendicare presumpserit, ab ecclesiae liminibus arceatur. Item Gregorius VII. in generali Sinodo residens dixit: [cap. 1. et 2.]

C. XII. An episcopate or abbey ought not to be received from the hand of a layman.

If anyone shall henceforth receive an episcopate or abbey from the hand of any lay person, let him by no means be held among the bishops or abbots, nor let any hearing be conceded to him as bishop or abbot. Moreover, we forbid him the grace of blessed Peter and entry into the church until, coming to his senses, he abandons the place which he took under the crime both of disobedience and of ambition, from which the crime of idolatry arose. We establish the same also concerning inferior ecclesiastical dignities. Likewise, [c. 2]: § 1. If any of the emperors, kings, dukes, margraves, counts, or any secular powers or persons shall presume to give investiture of episcopates or of any ecclesiastical dignity, let him know that he is bound by the bond of the same sentence.

C. XII. De manu laici episcopatus uel abbatia suscipi non debet.

Si quis deinceps episcopatum uel abbatiam de manu alicuius laicae personae susceperit, nullatenus inter episcopos uel abbates habeatur, nec ulla ei ut episcopo seu abbati audientia concedatur. Insuper gratiam B. Petri, et introitum ecclesiae interdicimus, quousque locum, quem sub crimine tam inobedientiae quam ambitionis ex qua scelus idolatriae cepit, resipiscendo non deserit. Similiter etiam de inferioribus ecclesiasticis dignitatibus constituimus. Item: [c. 2.] §. 1. Si quis inperatorum, regum, ducum, marchionum, comitum, uel quilibet secularium potestatum aut personarum inuestituram episcopatuum uel alicuius ecclesiasticae dignitatis dare presumpserit, eiusdem sentenciae uinculo se obstrictum esse sciat.

C. XIII. Let one who receives a church from the hand of a layman be subject to excommunication and experience no fruit of the investiture.

The same, [in the same place, c. 3]. Because we have learned that investitures are made by laymen in many regions contrary to the authority of the holy Fathers, and that from this arise very many disturbances in the church—indeed, the ruin of holy religion—by which the religious order of Christian discipline is disturbed, we decree that no cleric receive investiture of an episcopate, abbey, or church from the hand of an emperor, king, or any lay person, male or female. But if he shall presume to do so, let him recognize that investiture to be void by apostolic authority and himself to be subject to excommunication until worthy satisfaction.

C. XIII. Excommunicationi subiaceat, nec inuestiturae sentiat fructum, qui de manu laici ecclesiam susceperit.

Idem. [ibidem, cap. 3.] Quoniam inuestituras contra sanctorum Patrum auctoritatem a laicis in multis partibus cognouimus fieri, et ex eo plurimas perturbationes in ecclesia, immo ruinam sanctae religionis oriri, ex quibus Christianae censurae religio conturbatur, decernimus, ut nullus clericorum inuestituras episcopatus, uel abbatiae, uel ecclesiae de manu inperatoris, uel regis, uel alicuius laicae personae, uiri uel feminae, suscipiat. Quod si presumpserit, recognoscat inuestituram illam apostolica auctoritate irritam esse, et se usque ad dignam satisfactionem excommunicationi subiacere.

C. XIV. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise from the Canons of the Apostles, [31]. If any bishop, using secular powers, obtains a church through them, let him be deposed and separated, and all who communicate with him.

C. XIV. De eodem.

Item ex Canone Apostolorum. [31.] Si quis episcopus secularibus potestatibus usus ecclesiam per ipsos obtineat, deponatur et segregetur, omnesque, qui illi communicant.

C. XV. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise from the Chronicle of Anastasius. Indeed, the bishops of Thessalonica, because of fear of Emperor Anastasius, consented to Timothy, Bishop of Constantinople, who had anathematized the Council of Chalcedon. But forty bishops of Illyria and Greece, assembling as one, by a declaration made in writing departed from him as from their own metropolitan, and, sending to Rome, professed in writing that they communicated with the Roman bishop. And shortly afterward: § 1. When Dioscorus the Younger had received the imposition of hands, multitudes of peoples withdrew, saying that, according to what is contained in the canons of the holy Apostles, he was not made a bishop and therefore would not be received. For the princes enthrone him.

C. XV. De eodem.

Item ex Cronica Anastasii. Sane Thessalonicenses episcopii ob metum inperatoris Anastasii Timotheo Constantinopolitano episcopo consenserunt, qui concilium Calcedonense anathematizauerat. Quadraginta uero episcopi Illiricae et Greciae conuenientes in unum, per professionem in scriptis factam, ut a proprio metropolitano, discesserunt ab eo, et Romam mittentes Romano episcopo communicare in scriptis professi sunt. Et paulo post: §. 1. Cum Dioscorus (iunior) manus inpositionem accepisset recesserunt multitudines populorum dicentes quia secundum quod continent canones sanctorum Apostolorum non est factus episcopus et ideo non recipietur. Principes enim inthronizant eum.

C. XVI. Let one who obtains churches through laymen be excommunicated.

Likewise Pope Paschal [II]. If any cleric, abbot, or monk shall obtain churches through laymen, according to the canons of the holy Apostles and a chapter of the Council of Antioch, let him be subject to excommunication.

C. XVI. Excommunicetur qui per laicos ecclesias obtinet.

Item Pascalis Papa. [II.] Si quis clericus, abbas uel monachus per laicos ecclesias obtinuerit, secundum Apostolorum sanctorum canones et Antioceni capitulum concilii excommunicationi subiaceat.

C. XVII. Let one who obtains churches through laymen, and one who lays a hand upon him, be deprived of communion.

The same. Following the constitutions of the holy canons, we establish that whatever cleric from this hour shall receive investiture of a church or ecclesiastical dignity from the hand of a layman, and the one who shall lay a hand upon him, shall be subject to danger of his rank and be deprived of communion.

C. XVII. Qui per laicos ecclesias obtinet, et qui ei manus inponit, communione priuetur.

Idem. Constitutiones sanctorum canonum sequentes statuimus, ut quicumque clericorum ab hac hora inuestituram ecclesiae uel ecclesiasticae dignitatis de manu laici acceperit, et qui ei manum inposuerit, gradus sui periculo subiaceat, et communione priuetur.

C. XVIII. Concerning the same matter. The same.

Let no layman occupy or dispose of churches or the goods of churches. But let one who shall act otherwise be barred from the thresholds of the church according to the chapter of blessed Alexander.

C. XVIII. De eodem. Idem.

Nullus laicorum ecclesias uel ecclesiarum bona occupet uel disponat. Qui uero secus egerit, iuxta B. Alexandri capitulum ab ecclesiae liminibus arceatur.

C. XIX. Concerning the same matter. The same.

Just as the Lord's garment was not torn, but lots were cast for it, so the church also ought not to be torn, because it consists wholly in unity. Therefore let churches be restored to the power of their own bishop and be ordered by him, as is provided in the sacred canons. Otherwise, let both the churches themselves and their clerics be deprived of divine offices.

C. XIX. De eodem. Idem.

> Sicut Domini uestimentum scissum non est, sed de eo sortiti sunt, ita nec ecclesia scindi debet, quia in unitate tota consistit. In potestate ergo proprii episcopi ecclesiae reducantur, et ab ipso (sicut in sacris canonibus cautum est) ordinentur. Alioquin et ecclesiae ipsae, et clerici earundem diuinis destituantur offitiis.

C. XX. Let no cleric obtain a church through laymen.

Likewise Alexander [II]. Let no cleric or priest in any way obtain a church through laymen, either gratis or for a price. § 1. Let no one assume the habit of a monk while having the hope or promise that he will become abbot. § 2. Let no priest have two churches.

> C. XX. Nullus clericus per laicos ecclesiam obtineat.
> Item Alexander. [II.] Per laicos nullo modo quilibet clericus aut presbiter obtineat ecclesiam nec gratis, nec precio. §. 1. Nullus habitum monachi suscipiat, spem aut promissionem habens, ut abbas fiat. §. 2. Nullus presbiter duas habeat ecclesias.

C. XXI. Let individual bishops have their own stewards.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 26]. Because in certain churches, as we have learned by report, bishops manage the resources of the church without stewards, it pleased us that every church having a bishop is to have a steward from its own clergy who shall dispense ecclesiastical property according to the judgment of his own bishop, so that the administration of the church may not be without testimony, ecclesiastical resources may not thereby be dispersed, and disparagement and a curse may not be procured for the priesthood. But if he shall by no means do this, he will be subject to the divine constitutions.

> C. XXI. Singuli episcopi suos habeant yconomos.
> Item Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 26.] Quoniam in quibusdam ecclesiis, ut rumore conperimus, preter yconomos episcopi facultates ecclesiae tractant, placuit, omnem ecclesiam habentem episcopum habere yconomum de clero proprio, qui dispenset res ecclesiasticas secundum sententiam proprii episcopi, ita, ut ecclesiae dispensatio preter testimonium non sit, et ex hoc dispergantur ecclesiasticae facultates, et sacerdotio maledictionis derogatio procuretur. Quod si hoc minime fecerit, diuinis constitutionibus subiacebit.

C. XXII. Laymen are not to be appointed stewards.

Likewise from the Second Council of Seville, at which Isidore was present, [c. 9]. At the ninth proceeding we learned that certain persons from our college, contrary to ecclesiastical customs, have laymen appointed as stewards over divine property. Therefore, treating the matter together, we have chosen that each of us, according to the edicts of the Fathers of Chalcedon, appoint for himself a steward from his own clergy. For it is indecorous for a layman to be the bishop's vicar and to judge ecclesiastical men. For in one and the same office the profession ought not to be unlike. This is also forbidden in divine law, when Moses says: "You shall not plow with an ox and an ass together," that is, you shall not associate men of different professions together in one office. Hence it is fitting for us to obey both the divine books and the precepts of the holy Fathers, establishing that those who are associated with pontiffs in administrations differ neither in profession nor habit. For those whose pursuits and vows are different cannot adhere and be joined. § 1. But if after this any bishop shall choose a lay agent to administer ecclesiastical property, or shall not entrust it to be governed with the testimony of a steward, truly, as a contemner of the canons and defrauder of ecclesiastical property, he will not only be judged guilty by Christ concerning the property of the poor but will also remain answerable to the council.

C. XXII. Laici non sunt constituendi yconomi.

Item ex Concilio Spalensi, [II.] cui interfuit Ysidorus. [c. 9.] Nona actione didicimus, quosdam ex nostro collegio contra mores ecclesiasticos laicos habere in rebus diuinis constitutos yconomos. Proinde pariter tractantes elegimus, ut unusquisque nostrum secundum Calcedonensium Patrum edicta ex proprio clero yconomum sibi constituat. Indecorum est enim laicum uicarium episcopi, esse et uiros ecclesiasticos iudicare. In uno enim eodemque offitio non debet dispar esse professio. Quod etiam in lege diuina prohibetur, dicente Moyse: "Non arabis in boue simul et asino," id est: homines diuersae professionis in uno offitio simul non sociabis. Unde oportet nos et diuinis libris, et sanctorum Patrum obedire preceptis, constituentes, ut qui in administrationibus pontificibus sociantur, nec professione discrepent, nec habitu. Nam coherere et coniungi non possunt quibus et studia, et uota sunt diuersa. §. 1. Si quis autem episcopus posthec ecclesiasticam rem aut laicalem procurationem administrandam elegerit, aut si testimonio yconomi gubernandam non crediderit, uere ut contemptor canonum et fraudator ecclesiasticarum rerum non solum a Christo de rebus pauperum iudicabitur reus, sed etiam concilio manebit obnoxius.

C. XXIII. A layman does not have power to establish anything in a church.

Likewise in the Synod of Pope Symmachus, Lawrence, Bishop of Milan, said: It did not please us that a layman should have any power of establishing matters in a church, since the necessity of following remains for him, not the authority of commanding. Likewise in the same council Eulalius, Bishop of the church of Syracuse, said:

C. XXIII. Laicus in ecclesia aliquid statuendi facultatem non habet.

Item in Sinodo Simaci Papae Laurentius Mediolanensis episcopus dixit: Non placuit, laicum statuendi in ecclesia habere aliquam potestatem, cui subsequendi manet necessitas, non auctoritas inperandi. Item in concilio eodem Eulalius, Episcopus Siracusanae ecclesiae, dixit:

C. XXIV. Laymen ought not to dispose of ecclesiastical dignities.

No power to dispose of anything concerning ecclesiastical dignities is read to have been attributed to laymen, however religious they may be.

C. XXIV. Ecclesiasticas dignitates laici disponere non debent.

Laicis quamuis religiosis nulla de ecclesiasticis dignitatibus aliquid disponendi legitur facultas attributa.

C. XXV. A layman who usurps the disposition or dominion of ecclesiastical property is held to be sacrilegious.

Likewise Pope Callixtus [II]. If any of the princes or other laymen shall claim for himself the disposition or dominion of ecclesiastical property or possessions, let him be judged sacrilegious.

C. XXV. Laicus sacrilegus habetur qui dispositionem uel dominationem rerum ecclesiasticarum usurpat.

Item Calixtus Papa. [II.] Si quis principum uel aliorum laicorum dispositionem seu dominationem rerum siue possessionem ecclesiasticarum sibi uendicauerit, ut sacrilegus iudicetur.

C. XXVI. In a church which someone builds, let him claim nothing for himself beyond others.

Likewise Gelasius to Bishop Senecio. PART III. The devotion of a pious mind is to be embraced, by which Senilius declares to us that he founded a church on the Viviana estate belonging to his right, which he desires to be consecrated in his name in honor of Saint Vitus the Confessor. Therefore, dearest brother, if you do not doubt that this church pertains to your diocese, it is fitting that it be dedicated according to custom, after the solemn donation has first been conferred which the giver of the aforesaid gift testifies that he destined for the ministers of the church; he is to know without doubt that, apart from access to the procession, which is owed to every Christian, he will have nothing of his own right there.

> C. XXVI. In ecclesia, quam quis edificat, nichil sibi pre ceteris uendicet.
> Item Gelasius Senecioni Episcopo. III. Pars. Piae mentis amplectenda est deuotio, qua Senilius nobis in re Viuiana sui iuris fundasse perhibet ecclesiam, quam in honore S. Viti confessoris eius nomine cupit consecrari. Hanc igitur, frater karissime, si ad tuam diocesim pertinere non ambigis, ex more conuenit dedicari, collata primitus donatione solempni, quam ministris ecclesiae destinasse prefati muneris testatur oblator, sciturus sine dubio preter processionis aditum, qui omni Christiano debetur, nichil ibidem se proprii iuris habiturum.

C. XXVII. Concerning the same matter. The same.

But Trigetius suggested to us by a petitionary representation that on his estate, which is called Sextilianum, he founded for his protection a basilica of the saints Michael the Archangel and Mark the Confessor. And therefore, dearest brother, if it pertains to your parish, render the blessing of the aforesaid basilica with solemn veneration. Nevertheless, let the founder know that he is to claim nothing for himself from this basilica except access to the procession, which is owed in common to all Christians.

> C. XXVII. De eodem. Idem.
> Trigetius uero petitoria nobis insinuatione suggessit, in re sua, quod Sextilianum uocatur, basilicam se sanctorum Michaelis archangeli, et Marci confessoris pro sua defensione fundasse. Et ideo, frater karissime, si ad tuam pertinet parrochiam, benedictionem supra memoratae basilicae solempni ueneratione depende. Nichil tamen sibi fundator ex hac basilica nouerit uendicandum, nisi processionis aditum, qui Christianis omnibus in commune debetur.

C. XXVIII. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise Clement, [letter II to James]. Build churches in suitable and useful places, which ought to be consecrated by divine prayers and burdened by no one.

> C. XXVIII. De eodem.
>
> Item Clemens. [epist. II. ad Iacobum] Ecclesias per congrua et utilia facite loca, que diuinis precibus sacrari oportet, et non a quoquam grauari.

C. XXIX. Let laymen not cast priests out of churches.

Likewise Leo IV to King Charles. It appears to be contrary to the decrees of the holy Fathers if a secular or lay person is seen to expel priests from the churches in which they were designated or introduced at the time of their ordination. GRATIAN. But if the founders of churches begin to incline toward poverty, let them receive from those same churches support for temporal life. Hence it is read in the Council of Toledo, [IV, c. 37]:

> C. XXIX. Laici presbiteros de ecclesiis non eiciant.
>
> Item Leo IV. Karolo Regi. Contra sanctorum patrum censuras uidetur existere, si secularis uel laicus presbiteros ab ecclesiis, in quibus tempore ordinationis eorum denominati uel introducti fuerint, uidetur expellere. Gratianus. Si uero fundatores ecclesiarum ad inopiam uergere ceperint, ab eisdem ecclesiis temporalis uitae suffragia percipiant. Unde in Tolletano Concilio [IV. c. 37.] legitur:

C. XXX. If the founders of churches begin to be needy, let them receive sustenance from those churches.

Whoever among the faithful from their own devotion shall have conferred something from their resources upon a church, if perhaps they themselves or their children shall have been reduced to need, let them receive support for life from the same church for the need of the time. GRATIAN. Therefore, if they do not have power to dispense ecclesiastical resources, much less can they commit the churches themselves to any persons to be governed or take them away from others. § 1. But here it is to be distinguished what right founders of churches have in them, and what they do not have. They have the right of providing, counseling, and finding a priest; but they do not have the right of selling, giving, or using them as their own. Hence it is found in the Canons:

> C. XXX. Fundatores ecclesiarum, si inopes esse ceperint, ab eisdem alimenta accipiant.
> Quicumque fidelium propria deuotione de facultatibus suis aliquid ecclesiae contulerint, si forte ipsi aut filii eorum redacti fuerint ad inopiam, ab eadem ecclesia suffragium uitae pro temporis usu percipiant. Gratian. Si ergo ecclesiasticas facultates potestatem dispensandi non habent multo minus ipsas ecclesias quibuslibet ad regendum conmittere uel aliis auferre ualent. §. 1. Hic autem distinguendum est, quid iuris fundatores ecclesiarum in eis habeant, uel quid non? Habent ius prouidendi, et consulendi, et sacerdotem inueniendi; sed non habent ius uendendi, uel donandi, uel utendi tamquam propriis. Unde in Canonibus inuenitur.

C. XXXI. The heirs of one who constructed a church ought to bear nothing other than solicitude for it.

Let it be permitted to the sons, grandsons, and more honorable relatives of him who constructed or enriched a church to have this diligence: if they shall foresee that the priest is defrauding anything from the property conferred, let them either restrain him by an honorable agreement or report the matter to the bishop or judge to be corrected. But if the bishop should attempt to do such things, let them take care to intimate them to his metropolitan. But if the metropolitan does such things, let them not delay in bringing them to the ears of the king. § 1. Nevertheless, let the heirs themselves not be permitted to assert the power of their own right over that property, to bring in plunder and fraud, or to presume any violence, but to employ only this much in salutary solicitude: that either no harmful action may attain its harmful end, or that it may receive a penalty or some part of a salutary reward. § 2. But if anyone henceforth shall wish to violate these admonitions, he will restore with disgrace the things wickedly plundered and sustain a sentence of excommunication for one year.

> C. XXXI. Heredes eius, qui ecclesiam construxit, nichil aliud quam pro ea sollicitudinem gerere debent.

Filiis, uel nepotibus, ac honestioribus propinquis eius, qui construxit uel ditauit ecclesiam, licitum sit hanc habere sollertiam, ut, si sacerdotem aliquid ex collatis rebus defraudare preuiderint, aut honesta conuentione conpescant, aut episcopo uel iudici corrigenda denuncient. Quod si talia episcopus agere temptet, metropolitano eius hec insinuare procurent. Si autem metropolitanus talia gerat, regis hec auribus intimare non differant. §. 1. Ipsis tamen heredibus in eisdem rebus non liceat quasi proprii iuris potestatem preferre, non rapinam et fraudem ingerere, non uiolentiam quamcumque presumere, sed hoc solum in salutarem sollicitudinem adhibere, quod aut nullam operatio noxam nocens attingat, aut mulctam uel aliquam partem salutaris mercedis assumat. §. 2. Si quis uero deinceps hec monita temerare uoluerit, et male rapta cum confusione restituet, et excommunicationis annuae sentenciam sustinebit.

C. XXXII. Let founders of a church present to the bishop those to be ordained in it.

Likewise from the Council of Toledo, [IX, c. 2]. We decree that as long as the founders of churches shall survive in this life, they are to have solicitous care for those places, and those same persons are to present suitable rulers to the bishop to be ordained in those basilicas. But if, in disregard of those founders, the bishop shall presume to ordain rulers there, let him know that his ordination is void and that, to his shame, others whom the founders themselves shall have chosen as worthy are to be ordained in their place.

C. XXXII. Fundatores ecclesiae ordinandos in ea episcopo offerant.

Item ex Tolletano Concilio. [IX. c. 2.] Decernimus, ut quamdiu fundatores ecclesiarum in hac uita superstites fuerint, pro eisdem locis curam habeant sollicitam, atque rectores ydoneos in eisdem basilicis idem ipsi offerant episcopo ordinandos. Quod si spretis eisdem fundatoribus episcopus ibidem rectores presumpserit ordinare, et ordinationem suam irritam nouerit et ad uerecundiam sui alios in eorum loco (quos ipsi fundatores condignos elegerint) ordinari.

C. XXXIII. An oratory is not to be taken away from the dominion of its builder.

Likewise from the Roman Synod, [of Eugene II and Leo IV, c. 21]. Let a monastery or oratory canonically constructed not be taken away from the dominion of the builder against his will; and let it be permitted to him to entrust it for its sacred office to whatever priest he shall wish from that diocese, with the bishop's consent, lest he be evil.

C. XXXIII. A dominio constructoris oratorium non est auferendum.

Item ex Romana Sinodo. [Eugenii II. et Leonis IV. c. 2I.] Monasterium uel oratorium canonice constructum a dominio constructoris eo inuito non auferatur, liceatque illi presbitero, cui uoluerit, pro sacro offitio illius diocesis cum consensu episcopi, ne malus existat, conmendare.

C. XXXIV. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise Pope Gregory, [book VII, indiction I, to Secundinus, Bishop of Taormina]. The order of reason does not permit that anyone ought, against the will of the founders, to claim a monastery from their disposition for his own judgment. GRATIAN. Nevertheless, churches ought to be honored by their founders according to the providence and admonition of the bishop. Hence Gregory:

C. XXXIV. De eodem.

Item Gregorius Papa. [lib. VII. Indict. I. Secundino Episcopo Taurominitano] Rationis ordo non patitur, ut monasterium contra uoluntatem fundatorum ab eorum dispositione ad arbitrium suum quis debeat uendicare. Gratian. Prouidentia tamen et ammonitione episcopi a fundatoribus ecclesiae honorari debent. Unde Gregorius:

C. XXXV. Let churches be honored by their founders according to the providence of bishops.

It is to be considered that, if the coheirs themselves shall wish to retain them according to the providence and admonition of the bishop, let them cause them to be honored. But if they shall oppose this, let it remain under the bishop's power whether he permits them to remain or wishes to remove the relics from them.

C. XXXV. Episcoporum prouidentia a fundatoribus ecclesiae honorentur.

Considerandum est quatinus si secundum prouidentiam et ammonitionem episcopi ipsi coheredes eas uoluerint tenere, et honorare faciant. Si autem hoc contradixerint, in episcopi potestate maneat utrum eas consistere permittat, aut reliquias inde auferre uelit.

C. XXXVI. Let the relics be removed from churches if several heirs contend concerning them.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur, [c. 32]. If several heirs shall contend concerning a common church, let the bishop command the sacred relics to be removed and the church to be closed until by common consent and the bishop's counsel they establish a priest there and that from which he may live. PART IV. GRATIAN. Therefore, as is gathered from these authorities, churches are not to be received from the hand of laymen except with the consent of the bishops, according to that statement of the Council of Mainz:

C. XXXVI. Reliquiae auferantur ecclesiarum, si plures heredes de eis contendunt

Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. [c. 32.] Si plures heredes contenderint de communi ecclesia, auferri iubeat episcopus reliquias sacras, et ecclesiam claudi, donec communi consensu et consilio episcopi ibi presbiterum statuant, et unde uiuat. IV. Pars. Gratian. Ut ergo ex his auctoribus colligitur, de manu laicorum ecclesiae non sunt recipiendae, nisi cum consensu episcoporum, iuxta illud Concilii Magontinensis:

C. XXXVII. Let laymen not cast priests out of a church.

Let laymen not cast priests out of a church, nor establish them in churches without the consent of their bishops.

C. XXXVII. Non liceat laicis de ecclesia eicere presbiteros.

Laici presbiteros de ecclesia non eiciant, neque in eis constituant sine consensu suorum episcoporum.

C. XXXVIII. Without the consent of bishops, let laymen not cast priests out of churches.

Likewise from the Second Council of Chalon, [c. 42]. It has been found that many persons, by the rashness of their own judgment and—what is graver—led by greed, give churches to or take them away from any priests without the consent of their bishops. Hence it is fitting, with the canonical rule preserved, that no one give a church to any priest without the consent of his bishop; and if the priest shall have obtained it justly, let him lose it only for a grave fault before the bishop by canonical severity. GRATIAN. Therefore, just as by the authority of Jerome it is permitted, with the bishop consenting, for monks to receive from the hand of laymen tithes badly possessed by laymen and to hold them with perpetual stability, so also it is permitted for monks, with the consent of the bishops, to receive churches badly detained by laymen in order to put them in order and to provide for them in perpetuity. Hence Urban II:

> C. XXXVIII. Absque episcoporum consensu laici presbiteros de ecclesiis non eiciant.
> Item ex Concilio Cabilonensi. [II. c. 42.] Inuentum est, quod multi arbitrii sui temeritate, et (quod est grauius) ducti cupiditate, presbiteris quibuslibet absque consensu suorum episcoporum ecclesias dant uel auferunt. Unde oportet, ut canonica regula seruata nullus absque consensu episcopi sui cuilibet presbitero ecclesiam det; quam si iuste adeptus fuerit, hanc non nisi graui culpa coram episcopo canonica seueritate amittat. Gratian. Sicut ergo auctoritate Ieronimi decimas male possessas a laicis episcopo consentiente licet monachis de manu laicorum recipere, et eas perpetua stabilitate tenere, sic et ecclesias a laicis male detentas cum consensu episcoporum licet monachis ad ordinandum accipere, et eis in perpetuum prouidere. Unde Urbanus II:

C. XXXIX. Without the will of bishops, let monks not receive tithes or churches from laymen.

Let monks not receive tithes and churches from laymen without the consent and will of the bishops. But if anything shall have been presumed otherwise, let them be subject to canonical vengeance.

> C. XXXIX. Sine uoluntate episcoporum decimas uel ecclesias a laicis monachi non suscipiant.
> Decimas et ecclesias a laicis monachi non suscipiant absque consensu et uoluntate episcoporum. Quod si aliter presumptum fuerit, canonicae ultioni subiaceant.

C. XL. Let no one be permitted to convert a monastery into his own right; nevertheless, he has power to hand it over to another for putting in order.

Likewise from a decree of Pope Sylvester. Let no king or any person be permitted to hand a monastery into his own right, except to another monastery, or to exchange it except with another monastery, or to sell it by any contrivance. But if this shall have been done, it will not be valid, but let the monastery itself be restored to its former state.

> C. XL. Nulli liceat in suum ius monasterium conuertere; ad ordinandum tamen alii tradere illud ualet.
> Item ex decreto Siluestri Papae. Nemini regum aut cuiquam hominum in proprium ius liceat monasterium tradere, nisi ad aliud monasterium, uel conmutare, nisi cum alio monasterio, uel quocumque conmento uendere. Quod si factum fuerit, non ualebit, sed ipsum monasterium in pristinum reformetur statum.

C. XLI. No one is forbidden, with the counsel of the bishop and the brothers, to subject a monastery to another for its improvement.

Likewise from a decree of Boniface. PART V. If anyone wishes to place his monastery in another place for its improvement, let it be done with the counsel of the bishop and his brothers, and let him leave a priest in the former place for the ministries of the church.

[PALEA.

C. XLI. Episcopi et fratrum consilio monasterium ad meliorandum alii subponere quisque non prohibetur.

Item ex decreto Bonifatii. V. Pars. Si quis uult monasterium suum ad meliorandum in alium locum ponere, fiat cum consilio episcopi et fratrum suorum, et dimittat presbiterum in priori loco ad ministeria ecclesiae.

[PALEA.

C. XLII. Let those who presume to tonsure persons by deceiving them be subjected to public penance.

Likewise from the Council of Mainz. PART VI. This sacred assembly indeed established that bishops or abbots who, intent not upon the fruit of souls but upon avarice and shameful gain, have tonsured any persons by deceiving them and have taken away their property by such persuasion are to be subjected to canonical penance as followers of shameful gain. But let those who, having been enticed, laid aside their hair be compelled to persevere in what they began, and let their property be restored to their heirs.]

C. XLII. Publicae penitenciae subiciantur qui circumueniendo aliquos tondere presumunt.

Item ex Concilio Moguntinensi. VI. Pars. Constituit sane sacer iste conuentus, ut episcopi siue abbates, qui, non in fructum animarum, sed in auaritiam et turpe lucrum inhiantes, quoslibet homines circumueniendo totonderunt, et res eorum tali persuasione subripuerunt, penitenciae canonicae utpote turpis lucri sectatores subiaceant. Hi uero, qui illecti comam deposuerunt, in eo, quod ceperunt, perseuerare cogantur, res uero eorum heredibus reddantur.]

C. XLIII. Without the will of the brothers, an abbot cannot substitute for himself anyone from his relatives.

Likewise from the same. The congregation ought to elect an abbot for itself after the death of its abbot, or while he is living if he has departed or sinned. For the bishop ought not violently to retain an abbot in his place. But he himself cannot ordain anyone from his relatives or friends without the will of the brothers.

C. XLIII. Sine uoluntate fratrum aliquem de suis propinquis abbas sibi substituere non ualet.

Item ex eodem. Congregatio debet eligere sibi abbatem abbatis sui post mortem, uel eo uiuente, si ipse discesserit uel peccauerit. Episcopus enim non debet abbatem uiolenter retinere in locum suum. Ipse autem non potest aliquem ordinare de suis propinquis uel amicis sine uoluntate fratrum.

Causa XVII

GRATIAN. A certain priest, weighed down by illness, said that he wished to become a monk; he renounced the church and benefice into the hand of the advocate. After he recovered, he immediately denied that he would become a monk and reclaimed the church and benefice. (Question I.) Here it is asked first whether he is bound as liable to a vow, or whether he is permitted to depart from the purpose of his heart. (Question II.) Second, whether the church and benefice which he previously rejected by his free will are to be restored to him. (Question III.) Third, if it had happened that he handed himself and his property over to the monastery, whether with the abbot's permission he would be permitted to return to his own property. (Question IV.) Fourth, if he went back without the abbot's permission, whether his property is to be restored to him by the abbot.

> GRATIANUS. Quidam presbiter infirmitate grauatus fieri se uelle monachum dixit; ecclesiae et beneficio in manu aduocati renunciauit. Postquam conualuit, mox se futurum monachum negauit, ecclesiam et beneficium reposcit. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, utrum reus uoti teneatur, an liceat ei a proposito sui cordis discedere? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an ecclesia et beneficium ei reddenda sint que prius libera uoluntate refutauit? (Qu. III.) Tertio, si contigisset eum se et sua monasterio tradidisse, an licentia abbatis liceret ei ad propria redire? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, si sine licentia abbatis retro abierit, an sua sibi abbate reddenda sint?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. That one is not permitted to depart from a vow is proved by many authorities. For the Prophet says: "Vow, and render to the Lord your God."

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod a uoto discedere non liceat, multis auctoritatibus probatur. Ait enim Propheta: "Vouete, et reddite Domino Deo uestro."

C. I. Things which are vowed to God are necessarily to be rendered.

Likewise Augustine. There are certain things which we owe even when we do not vow them; certain others which we do not owe unless we vow them, but after we promise them to God, we are necessarily constrained to render them.

> C. I. Que Deo uouentur necessario reddantur.
> Item Augustinus. Sunt quedam, que etiam non uouentes debemus; quedam etiam, que nisi uouerimus, non debemus, sed postquam ea Deo promittimus, necessario reddere constringimur.

[C. II.] Likewise Jerome.

For those who have vowed, not only to marry but even to wish to marry is damnable.

> [C. II.] Item Ieronimus.
> Vouentibus non solum nubere, sed etiam uelle dampnabile est.

C. III. One who withdraws himself from God by recoiling from a vow is worthy of punishment.

Likewise Gregory in book I of the Register, [book I, letter 33, to Venantius]. Ananias had vowed to God monies which, afterward conquered by the devil's persuasion, he withheld. But you know with what death he was punished. Therefore, if he who took away from God the coins which he had given was worthy of danger of death, consider how great a danger you will be worthy of in the divine judgment, you who withdrew from almighty God not coins but yourself, whom you had devoted to Him under the monastic habit.

> C. III. Dignus est supplicio qui se ipsum Deo subtrahit a uoto resiliens.
>
> Item Gregorius in I. libro Registri. [lib. I. epist. 33. ad Venantium] Ananias Deo pecunias uouerat, quas post diaboli uictus persuasione subtraxit. Sed qua morte mulctatus est, scis. Si ergo ille mortis periculo dignus fuit, qui eos, quos dederat, nummos Deo abstulit, considera, quanto periculo in diuino dignus eris iudicio, qui non nummos, sed temetipsum omnipotenti Deo (cui te sub monachico habitu deuoueras) subtraxisti.

C. IV. Those who refuse to perform the good things which they conceive fall before the eyes of God.

The same on Ezekiel, [book I, homily 3]. Those who do good things, if they resolve to do better things and after resolving do not perform them, although they persevere in their former good things, have nevertheless fallen in the sight of God because of their resolution. Likewise: § 1. There are those who resolve to relinquish all things, subject themselves to God's service, and restrain themselves with the bridle of chastity; but when they see others have fallen after undertaking chastity, by withdrawing themselves they lose their merit. GRATIAN. Therefore, if after a vow each person is necessarily compelled to discharge what he vowed; if for those who have vowed not only to marry but even to wish to marry is damnable: it is evident that this priest is to be compelled to fulfill his vow, and that not only failing to become a monk but even wishing not to become a monk is damnable for him. § 1. But that he is to be numbered among those who vow is evident from the words of Augustine, who says: "I said, I shall confess, etc. Great is the mercy of God, that He forgives sins upon the promise alone. For he has not yet pronounced it with his mouth, and nevertheless God already hears in his heart; for a vow is reckoned as a deed." Therefore, just as the Prophet is reckoned among those who vow because he said, "I shall confess," so this man is also to be numbered among the same because he said, "I shall become a monk." These things are answered thus: It is one thing to conceive a purpose in the heart and also announce it with the mouth; it is another to make oneself liable to a vow by a subsequent obligation. § 2. Therefore, because this man simply announced with his mouth the purpose of his heart, but did not hand himself over to a monastery or abbot, nor did he write a promise, he is by no means held liable to a vow.

C. IV. Ante Dei oculos cadunt qui bona, que concipiunt agere recusant.

Idem super Ezechielem. [lib. I. homil. 3.] Qui bona agunt, si meliora agere deliberant, et post deliberata non faciunt, licet in bonis prioribus perseuerent, in conspectu tamen Dei ceciderunt ex deliberatione. Item: §. 1. Sunt qui cuncta relinquere, et Dei seruicio se subdere, et freno castitatis se restringere deliberant; sed cum post castitatem alios cecidisse conspiciunt, se retrahendo meritum perdunt. Gratian. Si ergo post uotum quisque necessario cogitur soluere quod uouit; si uouentibus non solum nubere, sed etiam uelle dampnabile est: patet, quod sacerdos iste ad executionem sui uoti cogendus est, et non solum non fieri, sed etiam uelle monachum non fieri sibi dampnabile est. §. 1. Quod autem inter uouentes iste conputandus sit, patet ex uerbis Augustini dicentis: "Dixi, confitebor, etc. Magna pietas Dei est, ut ad solam promissionem peccata dimittat. Nondum enim pronunciat ore, et tamen Deus iam audit in corde; uotum enim pro opere reputatur." Sicut ergo Propheta inter uouentes reputatur, quia dixit: Ego confitebor; sic et iste inter eosdem conputandus est, quia dixit: Fiam monachus. His ita respondetur: Aliud est propositum corde concipere, et etiam ore enunciare; aliud est subsequenti obligatione se reum uoti facere. §. 2. Quia ergo iste propositum sui cordis ore simpliciter enunciauit non autem monasterio aut abbati se tradidit, nec promissionem scripsit nequaquam reus uoti habetur.

Question II

GRATIAN. Hence Alexander II:

GRATIANUS. Unde Alexander II.:

C. I. No one is compelled to remain in a monastery unless he made profession into the hand of the abbot.

Cosaldus the priest, once oppressed by illness in the heat of suffering, promised that he would become a monk, yet he did not hand himself over to a monastery or abbot, nor did he write a promise, but he renounced the benefice of the church into the hand of the advocate. But after he recovered, he immediately denied that he would become a monk. Wherefore, because both the Rule of blessed Benedict and especially the canonical institution of our father and predecessor Saint Gregory the Pope forbid a man to be made a monk before a probation of one year, we judge and by apostolic authority command that the aforesaid priest receive, have, and quietly retain the benefice and altars.

> C. I. Non cogitur aliquis in monasterio manere, nisi professionem fecerit in manu abbatis.
> Cosaldus presbiter, quondam infirmitate feruore passionis pressus, monachum se fieri promisit, non tamen monasterio aut abbati se tradidit, nec promissionem scripsit, sed beneficium ecclesiae in manu aduocati refutauit. At postquam conualuit, mox se monachum negauit fieri. Quapropter quia et B. Benedicti regula, et precipue patris et predecessoris nostri S. Gregorii Papae canonica institutio interdicit monachum ante unius anni probationem effici, iudicamus et auctoritate apostolica precipimus, ut prefatus presbiter beneficium et altaria recipiat, habeat, et quiete retineat.

C. II. A wife taken after a purpose of continence ought not to be dismissed.

Likewise Augustine to Count Boniface, [letter LXX]. We know, we are witnesses, that you desired to relinquish all the public activities by which you were occupied, to betake yourself to holy leisure, and to live in that life in which the servants of God, the monks, live. Therefore, while we rejoiced that you were in this purpose, you sailed away and took a wife. If you did not have a spouse, I would say to you what we also said to the people of Tubunae: that you should live continently in chastity. But a wife is an impediment to my exhorting you to that life, without whose consent you are not permitted to live continently; because, although you ought not to have taken her after those words concerning Tubunae, nevertheless, knowing nothing of them, she innocently and simply married you. GRATIAN. Behold, this man conceived in his heart that he would become a monk and pronounced with his mouth that he wished to betake himself to holy leisure; nevertheless, he was not afterward compelled to undertake what he conceived in his heart and pronounced with his mouth. That authority of Alexander, following the institution of blessed Gregory and blessed Benedict, grants a year to those to be tested who are known; but to the unknown it concedes three years. Hence in the Council of Toledo:

> C. II. Uxor post propositum continentiae ducta dimitti non debet.
> Item Augustinus ad Bonifatium Comitem. [ep. LXX.] Nos nouimus, nos testes sumus, quod omnes actus publicos, quibus occupatus eras, relinquere cupiebas, et te in otium sanctum conferre, atque in ea uita uiuere, in qua serui Dei monachi uiuunt. Cum ergo te esse in hoc proposito gauderemus, nauigasti, uxorem duxisti. Si coniugem non haberes, dicerem tibi quod et Tubanis diximus, ut in castitate continenter uiueres. Sed ut te ad istam uitam non exhorter, coniunx est inpedimento, sine cuius consensu continenter tibi uiuere non licet, quia, et si tu eam post illa uerba Tubanensia ducere non debueras, illa tamen nichil eorum sciens innocenter tibi et simpliciter nupsit. Gratian. Ecce iste se corde concepit monachum fieri, et ore pronunciauit, se uelle in otium sanctum conferre, non tamen postea coactus est suscipere quod corde concepit, et ore pronunciauit. Auctoritas illa Alexandri, secuta institutionem B. Gregorii et B. Benedicti, probandis annum indulget, sed notis; incognitis uero triennium conceditur. Unde in Concilio Tolletano:

C. III. Let no unknown person assume the monastic habit before three years.

If any unknown person shall wish to enter a monastery, let the habit of a monk not be furnished before three years. And if within three years he is sought by his lord as either a slave, a free person, or a tenant, let him be restored to him with everything he brought, yet after a pledge of impunity has been received. But if he shall not have been sought within three years, afterward he cannot be sought, unless he is so far away that he cannot be found.

C. III. Nullus qui incognitus est monasticum habitum sumat ante triennium.

Si quis incognitus monasterium ingredi uoluerit, ante triennium monachi habitus non prestetur. Et si infra tres annos aut seruus, aut liber uel colonus queratur a domino suo, reddatur ei cum omnibus, que attulit, fide tamen accepta de inpunitate. Si autem infra triennium non fuerit requisitus, postea queri non potest, nisi sit tam longe, quod inueniri non possit.

Question III

GRATIAN. But as to the question whether after the handing over it is lawful for him, with the abbot's permission, to return to his own property, it is easily shown that this cannot be done. For returning itself is criminal. But one who ceases to oppose a manifest crime when he can do so consents to it. Yet this abbot not only does not oppose it, but even by permitting it becomes an abettor. Therefore the abbot is not permitted to give anyone permission to go back, and thus that person is not permitted to go backward, because from the time he once subjected himself to the abbot, he can do nothing without the abbot's permission.

GRATIANUS. Quod autem queritur, an post traditionem sit ei fas cum licentia abbatis ad propria redire? facile monstratur fieri non posse. Ipsum enim redire criminosum est. Qui autem manifesto facinori desinit obuiare, cum potest, consentit. Hic autem non solum non obuiat, sed etiam permittendo fautor existit. Non ergo licet abbati dare licentiam alicui retro abeundi, nec itaque illi licet retrorsum abire, quia ex quo semel se abbati subiecit, absque eius permissione nichil agere potest.

Question IV

GRATIAN. PART I. But if he shall have departed from the monastery without the abbot's permission, it is asked whether his property is to be restored to him or not. But neither an abbot nor anyone else is permitted in any way to alienate possessions and property handed over to a church. Hence Pope Symmachus: "Possessions which each person, etc." And again:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Si autem sine licentia abbatis de monasterio discesserit, queritur, utrum sua sint ei reddenda, an non? Sed possessiones et res ecclesiae traditas quolibet modo alienare nec abbati, nec alicui licet. Unde Simacus Papa: "Possessiones quas unusquisque etc." Et iterum:

C. I. Let one who presumes to alienate anything from the right of a church be deprived of honor.

Whatever bishop, priest, or deacon, forgetful of God and unmindful of this decree, acting contrary to the enactment, shall attempt to alienate a great or small estate of a church or anything from the right of a church, let the donor, alienator, and seller be punished by loss of his honor.

[PALEA.

> C. I. Honore priuetur qui de iure ecclesiae aliquid alienare presumit.
>
> Quicumque episcoporum, presbiterorum, diaconorum oblitus Dei, et decreti huius inmemor in constitutum conmittens, predium ecclesiae magnum uel exiguum, uel quicquam de iure ecclesiae alienare temptauerit, et donator, et alienator, et uenditor honoris sui amissione mulctetur.
>
> [PALEA.

C. II. Likewise Gregory to Anthemius the Subdeacon, book XI, letter 31.

No reason permits that what is known to have been given for common utility be applied to anyone's private uses.]

> C. II. Item Gregorius Anthemio Subdiacono, libro XI. epistola 31.
> Ratio nulla permittit, ut propriis cuiusquam usibus applicetur quod pro communi utilitate datum esse cognoscitur.]

C. III. One who thinks that what he conferred upon a church is to be recalled incurs the crime of sacrilege.

Likewise Ambrose in book [II] On Penance, [c. 9]. There are those who, after they conferred their resources upon a church by a tumultuous impulse of mind rather than by a perpetual judgment, later thought that they were to be recalled. For them neither the first reward nor the second is acceptable, because the first had no judgment and the second had sacrilege. There are those whom it has repented to have divided their resources among the poor. Thus those who do penance ought to fear this alone: lest they do penance for penance itself.

> C. III. Qui reuocandum putat quod ecclesiae contulit sacrilegii crimen incurrit.
>
> Item Ambrosius in libro [II.] de penitencia. [c. 9.] Sunt qui opes suas tumultuario mentis inpulsu, non iudicio perpetuo, ubi ecclesiae contulerunt, postea reuocandas putauerunt. Quibus nec prima merces grata est, nec secunda, quia nec prima iudicium habuit, et secunda habuit sacrilegium. Sunt quos penituerit opes suas diuisisse pauperibus. Sic eos, qui penitenciam agunt, hoc solum timere oportet, ne ipsius penitenciae agant penitenciam.

C. IV. One who contends to retain things left to sacred places commits sacrilege.

Likewise Gregory to Sabinus the Subdeacon, [book VIII, letter 6]. It is sacrilege and contrary to law if anyone shall attempt, by efforts of a depraved will, to retain for his own advantage what is left to venerable places.

> C. IV. Qui sacris locis derelicta retinere contendit sacrilegium conmittit.
>
> Item Gregorius Sabino Subdiacono. [lib. VIII. epist. 6.] Sacrilegium et contra legem est, si quis quod uenerabilibus locis relinquitur prauae uoluntatis studiis temptauerit conpendiis retinere.

C. V. Those who alienate the resources of a church are judged sacrilegious.

Likewise Bishop Lucius to all Bishops, [letter I, c. 6]. We anathematize all plunderers of a church and alienators of its resources, drive them from the thresholds of the same mother church by apostolic authority, condemn them, and judge them to be sacrilegious; and not only them but all who consent to them, because not only those who act are judged guilty but also those who consent to those acting. For an equal punishment embraces both actors and consenters.

> C. V. Sacrilegi iudicantur qui ecclesiae facultates alienant.
> Item Lucius Episcopus omnibus Episcopis. [epist. I. cap. 6.] Omnes ecclesiae raptores atque suarum facultatum alienatores a liminibus eiusdem matris ecclesiae anathematizamus, apostolica auctoritate pellimus, dampnamus atque sacrilegos esse iudicamus; et non solum eos, sed omnes consentientes eis, quia non solum qui faciunt rei iudicantur, sed etiam qui facientibus consentiunt. Par enim pena et agentes et consentientes conprehendit.

C. VI. Let one who shall attempt to break the boundaries of a church be excommunicated.

Likewise Nicholas to all Bishops. PART II. Just as was established in ancient times by the holy Fathers, we establish that a greater church is to have sixty paces around it, but a chapel or smaller church thirty. § 1. But whoever shall attempt to break their boundary, or shall remove from it the person of a man or his goods—unless he shall be a public robber—let him be excommunicated until he amends and restores what he plundered.

> C. VI. Excommunicetur qui confinia ecclesiae frangere temptauerit.
> Item Nicolaus omnibus Episcopis. II. Pars. Sicut antiquitus a sanctis Patribus statutum est, statuimus, ut maior ecclesia per circuitum LX passus habeat, capellae uero uel minores ecclesiae XXX. §. 1. Qui autem confinium eorum confringere temptauerit, aut personam hominis, uel bona eius inde subtraxerit, nisi publicus latro erit, quousque emendet, et quod rapuerit reddat, excommunicetur.

C. VII. Let what is paid as amends for the violated immunity of a church be paid to the altar.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur. If anyone commits a fight in the atrium of a church or shall commit homicide, whatever is to be paid as amends for the violated immunity is to be paid to the altar, to whomever that church shall belong.

> C. VII. Soluatur altario quod pro emunitate emendatur ecclesiae.
> Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. Si quis in atrio ecclesiae pugnam conmittit aut homicidium fecerit, quicquid pro emunitate uiolata emendandum est altario soluatur, cuiuscumque fuerit illa ecclesia.

C. VIII. No one is permitted to carry a man off from a church.

Likewise Augustine to Boniface, [letter CLXXXVII]. I marvel how suddenly the enemy's battering ram broke through the wall of faith. For I know with what religious reverence you have always venerated the church. At whose instigation did you do this—you carried off a man from a church? If a fugitive belonging to you had perhaps presumed to go to your friend, he could undoubtedly have merited pardon by reason of the intercessor. Therefore, if a friend is appealed to, why is God offended? But if reliance is also placed on power, consider King Nebuchadnezzar, who because of pride was changed from a man into an ox. I write these things not to confound you, but to admonish you as a most beloved son. Therefore recall unharmed to the church the man whom you, most irreligiously, carried off. But I have forbidden the offering of your household to be received by the clerics, and I forbid communion to you until, when the penance defined by me for your audacious deeds or error has been performed and pardon has been granted for this deed, you offer to God a worthy sacrifice with a contrite and humbled heart.

> Item Augustinus ad Bonifatium. [ep. CLXXXVII.] Miror, quomodo subito fidei murum aries ruperit inimici. Noui enim, qua religione semper sis ecclesiam ueneratus. Quo instigante facere hominem de ecclesia rapuisti? Tuus si tuo amico forte presumeret fugitiuus, posset proculdubio intercessoris causa ueniam promereri. Ergo si amicus intenditur, cur Deus offenditur? Sed et si de potestate presumitur, Nabucodonosor regem intende, qui causa superbiae in bouem est ex homine conmutatus. Non ut confundam te hec scribo, sed ut filium karissimum moneo. Ecclesiae igitur illesum reuoca quem irreligiosissimus rapuisti. Oblatio uero domus tuae a clericis ne suscipiatur interdixi, communionemque tibi interdico, donec peracta pro ausibus uel errore a me diffinita tibimet penitencia, tempore condonato pro hoc facto corde contrito et humiliato dignum offeras sacrificium Deo.

C. IX. Let no one dare to drag away one fleeing to a church.

Likewise from the book of Capitularies, [book V, c. 90]. Let no one dare to drag away an accused person fleeing to a church, nor to hand him over from there to punishment or to death, so that the honor of churches may be preserved; but let the rulers strive to obtain his peace, life, and limbs; nevertheless, let him lawfully pay composition for what he did unjustly.

> C. IX. Fugientem ad ecclesiam nemo audeat abstrahere.
> Item ex libro Capitularium. [V. c. 90.] Reum ad ecclesiam fugientem nemo abstrahere audeat, neque inde donare ad penam uel ad mortem, ut honor ecclesiarum conseruetur; sed rectores pacem eius, et uitam, et membra obtinere studeant; tamen legitime conponat quod inique fecit.

C. X. Let one who has violently carried anyone off from a church be barred from entering a church.

Likewise Gelasius to Bishops Victor, Constantinus, Martyrius, Felicissimus, Serenus, and Timotheus. Our brother and fellow bishop Epiphanius has reported to us in his account that Benenatus and Maurus, citizens of the city of Beneventum, sprang forth in contempt of religion with exceedingly bitter and punishable contumacy: they did not permit a member of their curia who had fled to the enclosure of a church to be safe even there or secure from their injury, daring, by an incursion of rash intent, to commit what it has never been lawful even for powers or princes to perpetrate, namely, violently to drag away a man situated in the sanctuary, struggling and crying out, after taking advantage of the priest's absence. Insofar as he disclosed by his report to us, he rightly judged them to be unworthy of holy communion. And if the commission of so great a crime is truly established, our authority also assents in this matter. For a man ought not by right to be admitted to make supplication where he did not hesitate to commit sacrilege. Indeed, let no one suppose that within thresholds appointed to such great veneration both things are lawful for him at the judgment of his own will, so that he may claim for himself both humility and fury. And therefore, dearest brothers, if a manifest complaint shows the aforesaid men to be guilty, bar them from all the churches of your parishes by the authority of our command, so that not only may those who are proved to have sprung forth in injury to holy places deservedly receive punishment according to the quality of their deed, but others also may be recalled from such presumption by fear of that vengeance.

C. X. Ab ecclesiae arceatur ingressu qui aliquem de ecclesia uiolenter rapuerit.

Item Gelasius Victori, Constantino, Martirio, Felicissimo, Sereno, et Timotheo Episcopis. Frater et coepiscopus noster Epiphanius sua nobis relatione suggessit, Benenatum et Maurum Beneuentanae municipes ciuitatis in contumeliam religionis acerba nimis et plectibili contumacia prosiluisse, qui confugientem ad ecclesiae septa curialem suum ne illic quidem tutum aut de iniuria sua securum esse siuerunt, ausi irreptione temerariae mentis admittere quod nec potestatibus quidem uel principibus umquam licuit perpetrare, ut hominem in sanctuariis constitutum (captata sacerdotis absentia) reluctantem reclamantemque uiolenter abstraherent. Quos, quantum sua nobis suggestione patefecit, merito indignos esse sacra communione iudicauit. Et si reuera tanti facinoris constat admissum, nostra etiam auctoritas in hac parte consentit. Nec enim ad supplicandum iure debet admitti ubi admittere sacrilegium non dubitauit. Nullus etenim intra limina tantae uenerationi deputata utrumque sibi licere existimet pro suae uoluntatis arbitrio, ut et humilitatem sibi uendicet et furorem. Et ideo, fratres karissimi, supradictos, si manifesta reos facit conquestio, ab omnibus parrochiarum uestrarum ecclesiis nostrae preceptionis auctoritate prohibete, ut non solum hi qui in iniuriam sanctorum locorum prosiluisse probantur, merito consequantur pro facti sui qualitate uindictam, uerum etiam ceteri a tali presumptione ultionis istius timore reuocentur.

C. XI. One who violates churches is not worthy to enter them.

The same to Bishop Epiphanius. We directed a command to the other bishops that they judge those who are reported to have violated churches to be unworthy of access to them.

C. XI. Ecclesiarum dignus non est ingressu qui eas uiolat.

Idem Epiphanio Episcopo. Ad episcopos ceteros direximus iussionem, ut eos, qui ecclesias uiolasse perhibentur, accessu earum iudicent esse indignos.

C. XII. One who lays waste God's church and persecutes its priests is judged sacrilegious.

Likewise Pope Pius, [letter II to the Italians]. Just as one who lays waste God's church and despoils and invades its estates and gifts becomes sacrilegious, so one who persecutes its priests is judged sacrilegious. § 1. Therefore fornication is not a graver sin than sacrilege. And just as the sin committed against God is greater than that committed against a man, so it is graver to commit sacrilege than to fornicate.

C. XII. Qui ecclesiam Dei uastat, et eius sacerdotes insequitur, sacrilegus iudicatur.

Item Pius Papa. [epist II. Italicis] Sicut qui ecclesiam Dei uastat, et eius predia et donaria spoliat et inuadit, fit sacrilegus sic ille, qui eius sacerdotes insequitur, sacrilegus iudicatur. §. 1. Non ergo grauius peccatum est fornicatio quam sacrilegium. Et sicut maius peccatum est, quod in Deo conmittitur, quam quod in homine, sic grauius est sacrilegium agere quam fornicari.

C. XIII. With what penalty one who has attempted to vex estates dedicated to the uses of a church is to be struck.

Likewise Urban, [in the letter to all bishops, c. 2]. All must take heed lest estates dedicated to the uses of the heavenly mysteries be vexed by certain persons rushing upon them. But if anyone shall have done this, after the bitterness of the punishment due—which by right is to be brought forth against the sacrilegious—let him be condemned to perpetual infamy and handed over to prison, or reserved for exile by perpetual deportation.

[PALEA.

C. XIII. Qua pena feriatur qui ecclesiae usibus dedicata predia uexare temptauerit.

Item Urbanus. [in epist. ad omnes episcopos, c. 2.] Adtendendum est omnibus, ne predia usibus secretorum celestium dicata a quibusdam irruentibus uexentur. Quod si quis fecerit, post debitae ultionis acrimoniam (que erga sacrilegos iure promenda est) perpetua dampnetur infamia, et carceri tradatur, aut exilio perpetuae deportationis seruetur.

[PALEA.

C. XIV. Likewise Pope Hyginus.

If anyone shall have burned a church with fire, let him do penance for fifteen years, diligently restore it, and distribute his own price to the poor.]

C. XIV. Item Hyginus Papa.

Si quis ecclesiam igne conbusserit, quindecim annis peniteat, et eam sedule restituat, et precium suum pauperibus distribuat.]

C. XV. One who steals the ornaments of a church is proved to be like Judas.

Likewise Clement, [letter II to James]. If perhaps any priest or deacon shall have sold a stolen linen cloth or veil of the sacristy, he will be reckoned like Judas Iscariot. Let one who shall have done this work because of greed know that he will undergo the punishment of the aforesaid Judas.

[PALEA.

C. XV. Iudae similis probatur qui ornamenta ecclesiae subripit.

Item Clemens. [epist. II. ad Iacobum] Si forte quispiam presbiter siue diaconus sacrarii sindonem uel uelum subtractum uendiderit, Iudae Scariotis similis estimabitur. Qui propter cupiditatem fecerit hoc opus, nouerit se supradicti Iudae penam suscepturum.

[PALEA.

C. XVI. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise from Theodore's Penitential. Ecclesiastical money that has been stolen or plundered is to be restored fourfold; that of the people, however, is to be doubled. If anyone shall have stolen anything from the ministry of the holy church, let him do penance for seven years, three on bread and water.]

[PALEA.

C. XVI. De eodem.

Item ex penitenciali Theodori. Pecunia ecclesiastica furata uel rapta reddatur in quadruplum; populi uero duplicetur. Si quis aliquid de ministerio sanctae ecclesiae furatus fuerit, septem annis peniteat, tres in pane et aqua.]

[PALEA.

C. XVII. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise from the Roman Penitential. If any cleric shall have committed a capital theft, that is, shall have stolen a quadruped, broken into a house, or stolen anything of greater value, let him do penance for seven years; a layman, for five. But if anyone shall have committed a theft of lesser things once or twice, let him restore it to his neighbor and do penance for one year on bread and water; and if he shall not have been able to restore it, let him do penance for three years.]

> C. XVII. De eodem.
>
> Item ex penitenciali Romano. Si quis clericus furtum fecerit capitale, id est quadrupedem, uel domum fregerit, aut quamlibet rem melioris precii furatus fuerit, septem annis peniteat; laicus quinque. Si quis autem de minoribus semel aut bis furtum fecerit, reddat proximo suo, et uno anno peniteat in pane et aqua, et si reddere non potuerit tribus annis peniteat.]

C. XVIII. One who plunders the money of a church commits sacrilege.

Likewise Anacletus, [letter I, c. 2]. One who plunders the money of his neighbor works iniquity; but one who shall have taken away the money or property of a church commits sacrilege.

> C. XVIII. Sacrilegium facit qui pecuniam ecclesiae rapit.
> Item Anacletus. [epist. I., c. 2.] Qui rapit pecuniam proximi sui, iniquitatem operatur; qui autem pecuniam uel res ecclesiae abstulerit, sacrilegium facit.

C. XIX. Let a cleric who presumes to beat his servant or disciple fleeing to a church be separated from the church.

Likewise from the Council of Lleida, [c. 8]. Let no cleric dare to drag away his servant or disciple who has fled to a church, or presume to flog him. But if he shall have done this, let him be separated, until he worthily does penance, from the place to which he did not give honor. § 1. But if any clerics shall have burst forth into mutual slaughter, let it be more strictly punished by the pontiff according as the dignity of their offices has suffered dishonor in such an excess.

> C. XIX. Segregetur ab ecclesia clericus, qui seruum uel discipulum suum ad eam fugientem uerberare presumit.
> Item ex Concilio Ylerdensi. [c. 8.] Nullus clericorum seruum aut discipulum suum confugientem ad ecclesiam extrahere audeat, uel flagellare presumat. Quod si fecerit, donec digne peniteat, a loco, cui honorem non dedit, segregetur. §. 1. Si qui uero clerici in mutuam cedem proruperint, prout dignitas offitiorum in tali excessu contumeliam pertulerit, a pontifice districtius uindicetur.

C. XX. Let one who drags away a fugitive from the atrium or porticoes of a church be excommunicated.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur, [c. 20]. If any contumacious or proud person shall not have fear of God or reverence for holy churches, and by force shall in any way have dragged away from the atrium of a church or from porticoes adjoining a church his fugitive servant or one whom he himself pursued, let him pay nine hundred solidi as composition for the immunity, and let him himself be punished with public penance according to judgment. GRATIAN. Therefore it is sacrilege whenever anyone violates a sacred thing, either by taking a sacred thing from a sacred place, a sacred thing from a place not sacred, or a thing not sacred from a sacred place. § 1. One who shall have laid violent and impious hands upon a cleric is also said to commit sacrilege. § 2. Moreover, sacrilege itself contains a twofold penalty, namely a monetary penalty and excommunication. The monetary penalty is to be paid to those to whom the complaint of sacrilege belongs. Hence Pope John VIII writes to all Bishops:

> C. XX. Qui de atrio uel porticibus ecclesiae fugientem abstrahit excommunicetur.
> Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. [c. 20.] Si quis contumax uel superbus timorem Dei uel reuerentiam sanctarum ecclesiarum non habuerit, et fugientem seruum suum, uel quem ipse persecutus fuerit, de atrio ecclesiae, uel de porticibus quomodolibet ecclesiae adherentibus per uim abstraxerit, pro emunitate nongentos solidos conponat, et ipse publica penitencia iuxta iudicium mulctetur. Gratian. Sacrilegium ergo est, quotiens quis sacrum uiolat, uel auferendo sacrum de sacro, uel sacrum de non sacro, uel non sacrum de sacro. §. 1. Dicitur etiam sacrilegium conmittere qui uiolentas et inpias manus in clericum iniecerit. §. 2. Porro ipsum sacrilegium duplicem continet penam, pecuniariam uidelicet et excommunicationis. Pecuniaria eis persoluenda est, ad quos querimonia sacrilegii pertinet. Unde Iohannes Papa VIII. scribit omnibus Episcopis:

C. XXI. Concerning the manifold kind of sacrilege and its penalty.

Whoever shall have been found guilty of sacrilege is to pay thirty pounds of assayed, most pure silver as composition to bishops, abbots, or the persons to whom the complaint of sacrilege shall justly belong. § 1. Sacrilege is committed if anyone shall have broken into a church, the thirty ecclesiastical paces that are around a church, or houses that shall have been within the aforesaid paces, plundering or taking anything away from there; or if anyone shall have inflicted injury or the taking away of property upon clerics not bearing arms, monks, persons devoted to God, or any ecclesiastical persons. Chapels that are within the circuit of the walls of castles are not placed under this observance of thirty paces. § 2. Similarly, sacrilege is committed by taking a sacred thing from a sacred place, a thing not sacred from a sacred place, or a sacred thing from a place not sacred. The same: § 3. If anyone shall have violated the house of God and, without the permission of him to whom it is known to have been entrusted, taken anything away from there, or shall have done injury to ecclesiastical persons, let him know that he will be deprived of communion until, having been lawfully admonished in an assembly, he makes satisfaction. But if after a second and third admonition before the bishop he shall have refused to make satisfaction, let him be held liable by all to the peril of sacrilege, so that, according to the Apostle, he is not to associate with any of the faithful. The same: § 4. Those who break into monasteries, places dedicated to God, and churches, and carry away deposits or any other things from them, are to pay the loss ninefold, the immunity threefold, and, as sacrilegious persons, are to be subjected to the canonical sentence.

> C. XXI. De multiplici genere sacrilegii, et pena eiusdem.
> Quisquis inuentus fuerit reus sacrilegii, episcopis uel abbatibus, siue personis, ad quas querimonia sacrilegii iuste pertinuerit, triginta libras examinati argenti purissimi conponat. §. 1. Sacrilegium conmittitur, si quis infregerit ecclesiam, uel triginta passus ecclesiasticos, qui in circuitu ecclesiae sunt, uel domos, que infra predictos passus fuerint, aliquid inde diripiendo uel auferendo; seu qui iniuriam uel ablationem rerum intulerit clericis arma non ferentibus, uel monachis, siue Deo deuotis, omnibusque ecclesiasticis personis. Capellae, que sunt infra ambitum murorum castellorum, non ponuntur in hac triginta passuum obseruatione. §. 2. Similiter sacrilegium conmittitur auferendo sacrum de sacro, uel non sacrum de sacro, siue sacrum de non sacro. Idem: §. 3. Si quis domum Dei uiolauerit, et aliqua sine licentia illius, cui conmissa esse dinoscitur, inde abstulerit, uel ecclesiasticis personis iniuriam fecerit, donec in conuentu ammonitus legitime satisfaciat, sciat se conmunione fore priuatum. Si uero post secundam et tertiam conuentionem coram episcopo satisfacere detrectauerit, sacrilegii periculo ab omnibus obnoxius teneatur, ita, ut secundum Apostolum nemini fidelium misceatur. Idem: §. 4. Hii qui monasteria, et loca Deo dicata, et ecclesias infringunt, et deposita uel alia quelibet exinde abstrahunt, dampnum nouies conponant, et emunitatem tripliciter, et uelut sacrilegi canonicae sententiae subigantur.

C. XXII. Let a layman who seizes a bishop who has not been canonically judged be excommunicated.

Likewise Alexander II. If henceforth any one of the chief men, or of whatever dignity or whatever order of laymen, shall have seized or struck a bishop, or by any force expelled him from his own see, unless perhaps he had been canonically judged, let the authors and helpers of so great a crime be anathematized, and let their goods be handed over perpetually to the right of that church. § 1. But if anyone shall have presumed these same things against a priest or any cleric of the lower grades, he will be subject to canonical penance and deposition. If he shall be contumacious, let him be excommunicated.

C. XXII. Nisi canonice iudicatum episcopum conprehendens laicus, excommunicetur.

Item Alexander II. Si quis deinceps priorum aut cuiuscumque dignitatis uel cuiuscumque ordinis laicorum episcopum conprehenderit, percusserit, aut aliqua ui a propria sede expulerit, nisi forte iudicatum canonice, auctores et cooperatores tanti sceleris anathematizentur, et bona eorum ecclesiae ipsius iuri perpetuo tradantur. §. 1. Si uero in presbiterum uel in quemcunque inferiorum graduum clericum hec eadem presumpserit, canonicae penitenciae atque depositioni subiacebit. Si contumax fuerit, excommunicetur.

C. XXIII. Let those who flog priests be excommunicated after a third admonition if they have not recovered their senses.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to Thado, Archbishop of Milan. Concerning the floggers, killers, and plunderers of priests—those, namely, who are by no means restrained by the secular arm—it is pleasing that, according to the Lord's precept, they be admonished a second and a third time with fraternal love. If they shall not have heard you, we grant permission, when the church has assembled, to deprive them of holy communion and—if, remaining in their obstinacy, they shall perhaps have despised priestly admonitions—to cut them off from the body of the church under the prohibition of an anathema. § 1. Know that even these, when at length they have recovered their senses and worthy satisfaction has first been made, can be recalled into the bosom of holy mother church.

[PALEA.

C. XXIII. Flagellatores presbiterorum, post tertiam ammonitionem si non resipuerint, excommunicentur.

Item Nicolaus Papa Thadoni Archiepiscopo Mediolani. De presbiterorum flagellatoribus, et occisoribus, predonibus, scilicet qui seculari brachio minime cohercentur, iuxta preceptum Domini placet fraterno amore conueniantur secundo ac tertio. Qui si te non audierint, conueniente ecclesia eos sacra conmunione priuare atque (si in sua obstinatione permanentes sacerdotalia monita forte contempserint) ab ecclesiae conpage sub anathematis interdictione resecare licentiam tribuimus. §. 1. Quos etiam resipiscentes tandem digna satisfactione premissa in gremio sanctae matris ecclesiae reuocari noueris posse.

[PALEA.

C. XXIV. Likewise from the Council of Mainz under Rabanus, c. 24.

Let a penance of twelve years be imposed according to the canons upon one who has killed a priest; or, if he shall have denied it, if he is free, let him swear with seventy-two persons; but if he is a slave, let him purge himself upon twelve glowing plowshares. If convicted of the offense, however, let him lack the military belt until the last time of his life and remain without hope of marriage.]

[PALEA.

C. XXIV. Item ex Concilio Moguntino sub Rabano, c. 24.

Qui presbiterum occiderit, duodecim annorum ei penitencia secundum canones inponatur; aut si negauerit, si liber est, cum septuaginta duobus iuret: si autem seruus, super duodecim uomeres feruentes se expurget. Conuictus uero noxae usque ad ultimum uitae tempus miliciae cingulo careat, et absque spe coniugii maneat.]

[PALEA.

C. XXV. Likewise from the Council of Tribur.

Let priests not travel unless clothed with a stole or orarium. And if on a journey they are despoiled, wounded, or killed while not clothed with a stole, let compensation be paid at the single rate; but if with a stole, at the threefold rate.]

[PALEA.

C. XXV. Item ex Concilio Triburiensi.

Ut presbiteri non uadant, nisi stola aut orario induti. Et si in itinere spoliantur, aut uulnerantur, uel occiduntur non stola uestiti, simplici emendatione soluantur, si autem cum stola triplici.]

[PALEA.

C. XXVI. Likewise from the same, c. 5.

Let all killers of priests be discharged by payment of composition to the bishop to whose parish they belong, in such a manner, namely, that the bishop give half of his wergeld to the uses of the church over which he presided and justly distribute the other half in alms for him, because no heir of his seems nearer to us than he who joined him to the Lord.]

C. XXVI. Item ex eodem, c. 5.

Omnes presbiteri interfectores conpositione episcopi, ad cuius parrochiam pertinent, soluantur, ita uidelicet, ut medietatem Vuirigeldi eius episcopus utilitatibus ecclesiae, cui prefuit, tribuat, et alteram medietatem in elemosinam illius iuste dispertiat, quia nullus nobis eius heres proximior uidetur, quam ille, qui ipsum Domino sociauit.]

C. XXVII. Let those who kill clerics be fined according to the diversity of their grades.

Likewise from book V of the Capitularies, [c. 25]. One who has killed a subdeacon is to pay three hundred solidi as composition; one who has killed a deacon, four hundred; a priest, six hundred; a bishop, nine hundred; a monk, four hundred.

C. XXVII. Pro graduum uarietate mulctentur qui clericos occidunt.

Item ex libro V. Capitularium. [c. 25.] Qui subdiaconum occiderit, CCC. solidos conponat; qui diaconum, CCCC.; qui presbiterum, DC.; qui episcopum, DCCCC.; qui monachum, CCCC.

[C. XXVIII.]

Likewise from book VI of the same. One who has killed a monk or cleric is to abandon arms and serve God in a monastery all the days of his life, never to return to the world, and is to perform public penance for seven years.

[C. XXVIII.]

Item ex eodem libro VI. Qui occiderit monachum aut clericum, arma relinquat, et Deo in monasterio seruiat cunctis diebus uitae suae, numquam ad seculum reuersurus, et septem annos publicam penitenciam agat.

[C. XXIX.]

Likewise Pope Innocent II, [in the Lateran Council, c. 15]. If anyone, at the devil's persuasion, shall have incurred the vice of this sacrilege, namely that he has laid violent hands upon a cleric or monk, let him be subject to the bond of anathema; and let no bishop presume to absolve him, unless the peril of death is urgent, until he is presented before the apostolic presence and receives its command. PART III. GRATIAN. But one who shall have removed anyone by force from a church, or brought any injury in the church itself upon its place or worship, its priests or ministers, will be accused as for a public crime and lèse-majesté; and, if convicted or having confessed, he will be struck by the rulers of the province with a capital sentence, as is read in book I of the Code, title Concerning Bishops and Clerics, in the law "If anyone shall have burst forth into this kind of sacrilege," and in the Digest, title On the Julian Law concerning Extorted Monies, in the final law. § 1. Those also commit sacrilege who either unknowingly commit acts against the sanctity of divine law, or violate and offend it through neglect; or who dispute concerning the prince's judgment, doubting whether he whom the prince has chosen is worthy; or who, within a province in which they are reckoned among the provincials and citizens, desire the office of carrying on and undertaking an administration, in book IX of the Code, title Concerning the Crime of Sacrilege. § 2. Similarly, no one is permitted to dispute concerning the judgment of the Supreme Pontiff. Hence Pope Nicholas to all Bishops:

[C. XXIX.]

Item Innocentius Papa. [II. in Concilio Lateranensi, c. 15.] Si quis suadente diabolo huius sacrilegii uicium incurrerit, quod in clericum uel monachum uiolentas manus iniecerit, anathematis uinculo subiaceat, et nullus episcoporum illum presumat absoluere, nisi mortis urgente periculo, donec apostolico conspectui presentetur, et eius mandatum suscipiat. III. Pars. Gratian. Qui autem de ecclesia ui aliquem exemerit, uel in ipsa ecclesia, uel loco, uel cultui, sacerdotibus, et ministris aliquid iniuriae inportauerit, ad instar publici criminis et lesae maiestatis accusabitur, et conuictus, siue confessus, capitali sententia a rectoribus prouinciae ferietur, sicut in primo libro Codicis legitur, titulo de episcopis et clericis et lege: "Si quis in hoc genus sacrilegii proruperit," et in Digestis titulo. Ad legem Iuliam pecuniarum repetundarum, lege ultima. §. 1. Conmittunt etiam sacrilegium qui contra diuinae legis sanctitatem aut nesciendo conmittunt, aut negligendo uiolant et offendunt; aut qui de principali iudicio disputant, dubitantes, an is dignus sit, quem princeps elegerit; uel qui intra prouinciam, in qua prouinciales et ciues habentur, offitium gerendae ac suscipiendae amministrationis desiderant, libro 9.

Codicis titulo de crimine sacrilegii. §. 2. Similiter de iudicio summi Pontificis alicui disputare non licet. Unde Nicolaus Papa omnibus Episcopis:

C. XXX. No one is permitted to judge the Roman Church or reconsider its sentence.

No one is permitted to judge concerning the judgment of the Apostolic See or to reconsider its sentence, namely because of the primacy of the Roman Church, divinely placed by Christ's gift in blessed Peter the Apostle. GRATIAN. One who entrusts public offices to Jews also incurs the guilt of sacrilege. Hence in the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 64]:

C. XXX. Nulli liceat Romanam ecclesiam iudicare, uel eius sententiam retractare.

Nemini est de sedis apostolicae iudicio iudicare, aut illius sententiam retractare permissum, uidelicet propter Romanae ecclesiae primatum, Christi munere in beato Petro apostolo diuinitus collocatum. Gratian. Sacrilegii quoque reatum incurrit qui Iudeis publica offitia conmittit. Unde in Tolletano Concilio IV: [c. 64.]

C. XXXI. Those who entrust public offices to Jews commit sacrilege.

The holy council established that Jews, or those who are from the Jews, are by no means to seek public offices, because under this occasion they do injury to Christians. Therefore let the judges of the provinces, together with their priests, suspend the surreptitious grants fraudulently left in place, and not permit them to exercise public offices. But if anyone shall have permitted this, let excommunication be pronounced against him as against a sacrilegious person, and let the one who shall have obtained the office by surreption be assigned to public beatings. PART IV. GRATIAN. But lest reverence for religion defraud masters of their right if servants fleeing to the enclosures of a church are by no means dragged away from there, it was established by the sacred canons that, after an oath of impunity has been furnished by the master, the servant is to be restored to him even against his will. Hence Pope Gelasius writes to Bishop Boniface:

C. XXXI. Sacrilegium faciunt qui Iudeis publica offitia conmittunt.

Constituit sanctum concilium, ut Iudei, aut hii, qui ex Iudeis sunt, offitia publica nullatenus appetant, quia sub hac occasione Christianis iniuriam faciunt. Ideoque iudices prouinciarum cum sacerdotibus eorum surreptiones fraudulenter relictas suspendant, et offitia publica eos agere non permittant. Si quis autem hoc permiserit, uelut in sacrilegum excommunicatio proferatur, et is, qui subrepserit, publicis cedibus deputetur. IV. Pars. Gratian. Verum ne reuerentia religionis dominos suo iure fraudaret, si famuli ad ecclesiae septa confugientes inde nequaquam abstrahantur, sacris canonibus est institutum, ut, prestito a domino sacramento inpunitatis, ei etiam reddatur inuitus. Unde Gelasius Papa scribit Bonifatio Episcopo:

C. XXXII. After security has been furnished, servants who flee to a church are to be restored to their masters.

If servants fearing their masters shall have fled to the enclosures of a church, they ought to seek intercession, not hiding places, lest this very presumption of delay increase their rashness in resisting. For our son, the distinguished man Peter, complains that his servant has remained for a rather long time in the church of Saint Clement; and when he had arranged for assurances to be furnished to him, the servant was unwilling to depart for any reason. Therefore, when the man of the aforesaid Peter who has now been sent comes together with the person whom you shall choose to send, after he has furnished assurances concerning the servant's impunity, you will cause him immediately to return to his master by every means; or, if perhaps he shall persist in this obstinacy, after an assurance has been furnished to him, let him be restored against his will.

C. XXXII. Post prestitam securitatem serui restituantur dominis, qui ad ecclesiam confugiunt.

Metuentes dominos famuli, ad ecclesiae septa si confugerint, intercessionem debent querere, non latebras, ne hec ipsa presumptio tarditatis temeritatem augeat renitendi. Filius etenim noster uir spectabilis Petrus queritur seruum suum in ecclesia S. Clementis diutius conmorari, cui cum deputasset sacramenta prestari, illum egredi nulla ratione uoluisse. Et ideo directus supradicti homo de presenti cum eo, quem elegeris esse mittendum, cum de inpunitate eius sacramenta prebuerit, eum statim facies ad dominum suum modis omnibus remeare, aut, si in hac pertinacia forte extiterit, post sacramentum sibi prestitum reddatur inuitus.

C. XXXIII. After security has been received, fugitives are to be compelled to leave a church in order to render an account.

The same to John, Bishop of Vibo. The wife and daughters of Felix have arrived at Rome, because it was fitting thus. Indeed, we commanded this same man, who first betook himself to the basilica of the Barbarians and boasted that he had good causes, to depart on this condition: that, if he faithfully and reasonably set forth his acts, we would permit absolutely nothing harsh or severe to be done to him. Otherwise, if he were proved to have acted against good faith and his master's interest, he was to impute it to himself and be subject to a fitting disposition. When our son Ortasius, a distinguished man, arrived, he was so convicted concerning every single matter that he could not open his mouth, and with his own voice he confessed that the things charged against him were true; and therefore he is held committed to custody.

C. XXXIII. Securitate accepta ad rationem reddendam fugitiui ab ecclesia exire cogantur.

Idem Iohanni, Episcopo Vibonensi. Uxor Felicis et filiae Romam, quia sic oportuit, peruenerunt. Siquidem hunc ipsum primum se ad barbarorum basilicam conferentem, seque bonas causas habere iactantem, egredi sub hac condicione precipimus, ut si actus suos fideliter et rationabiliter allegaret, nichil circa eum prorsus asperum fieri durumque pateremur. Alioquin si contra fidem et utilitatem dominicam uenisse probatur, ipse sibimet inputaret, atque ordinationi congruae subiaceret. Qui superueniente filio nostro, uiro spectabili Ortasio, sic est ad singula queque conuictus, ut os aperire non posset, et uera esse que huic obicerentur, uoce propria fateretur, ideoque tenetur custodia mancipatus.

C. XXXIV. Let a servant upon whom a Jew has impressed the sign of circumcision while he was a Christian be rescued into freedom; otherwise, let him be restored from the church to his master against his will.

The same to the Bishops of Syracuse, Constantius, and Laurentius. Judas, who is of the Jewish profession, has reported that a slave belonging to his right, whom he asserts that he purchased a few years ago, has now fled to the church of Venafrum, as the tenor of the attached petition shows, because the slave says that, though a Christian from infancy, the sign of circumcision was recently impressed upon him by the aforesaid master. Therefore let your careful concern diligently examine between the two the truth of the matters in good faith, so that neither religion may seem to have been profaned nor a servant, by falsely alleging this objection, may strive to evade the rights of the ownership properly belonging to him.

C. XXXIV. Eripiatur in libertatem seruus, cui Christiano Iudeus circumcisionis signaculum inpressit; alioquin ab ecclesia suo domino reddatur inuitus.

Idem Siracusano, Constantio, et Laurentio Episcopis. Iudas, qui Iudaicae professionis existit, mancipium iuris sui, quod ante paucos annos se asserit conparasse, nunc ad ecclesiam Venefranam confugisse suggessit, sicut petitorii tenor annexus ostendit, eo quod dicat sibi ab infantia Christiano nuper a prefato domino signaculum circumcisionis infixum. Quapropter uestra diligenter inter utrumque sollicita cura rerum fideliter examinet ueritatem, quatinus nec religio temerata uideatur, nec seruus hac obiectione mentitus conpetentis iura dominii declinare contendat.

C. XXXV. A fugitive is not to be dragged away from the atrium of a church, which is enclosed by thirty paces, unless security has first been given.

Likewise from the Twelfth Council of Toledo, [c. 10]. The holy council defined that no one is to dare to drag away those fleeing to a church or residing there, or inflict any kind of injury, loss, or spoliation upon those residing in the holy place; but rather that it is to be entirely lawful for those who seek churches to proceed thirty paces from the doors of the church, within which thirty paces reverence for each church is to be defended throughout its whole circuit—yet in such a way that those who flee to it are by no means to withdraw into foreign houses or houses far separated from the church, but, proceeding within this number of thirty paces without the shelter of foreign houses, they will obtain access by which they may go out to fitting places for the use of natural necessity, and those who have committed themselves to the Lord's enclosures to be defended may be constrained by no event of necessity. § 1. But if anyone shall have attempted to violate this decree, let him both be subject to ecclesiastical excommunication and be struck by a sentence of royal severity. § 2. But if, in accordance with the institutes of the ancient canons, those who seek the persons who made refuge at a church shall have rendered oaths, and the priest of that church shall not have drawn them away from the doors of the church, either the flight of such persons, if it shall occur, is to be charged to the priest, or a sentence for the losses is to be imposed upon priests of this kind according to the prince's choice.

C. XXXV. De atrio ecclesiae, quod triginta passibus clauditur, nisi prius data securitate fugiens non abstrahatur.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano XII. [c. 10.] Diffiniuit sanctum concilium, ut nullus audeat confugientes ad ecclesiam uel residentes inde abstrahere, aut quodcunque nocibilitatis, uel dampni, seu spolii, residentibus in loco sancto inferre; sed esse pocius his ipsis, qui ecclesias petunt, per omnia licitum, in triginta passus ab ecclesiae ianuis progredi, in quibus triginta passibus uniuscuiusque ecclesiae in toto circuitu reuerentia defendatur, sic tamen, ut hii, qui ad eam confugiunt, in extraneis uel longe separatis ab ecclesia domibus nullo modo abscedant, sed in hoc triginta passuum numero absque domorum extranearum receptaculo progredientes aditum obtinebunt; qualiter ad requisitae naturae usum debitis exeant locis, et nullo teneantur euentu necessitudinis qui dominicis se defendendos conmiserint claustris. §. 1. Si quis autem hoc decretum uiolare temptauerit, et ecclesiasticae excommunicationi subiaceat, et seueritatis regiae feriatur sentencia. §. 2. Ipsos autem, qui ad ecclesiam confugium fecerunt, si iuxta priscorum canonum instituta hii, qui eos repetunt, sacramenta reddiderint, et sacerdos ecclesiae ipsius ab ecclesiae foribus non abstraxerit, aut fuga talium, si euenerit, sacerdoti querenda est, aut dampnorum sentencia secundum electionem principis huiusmodi sacerdotibus irroganda.

C. XXXVI. Before security has been given, a fugitive is not to be compelled to leave the atrium of a church.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, [I, cc. 3 and 5]. We establish that what the ecclesiastical canons have decreed and Roman law has constituted is to be observed: that it is entirely unlawful to drag them away from the atria of a church or the bishop's house, or even to consign them to another, unless, after oaths have been given upon the Gospels, they have been made secure from death, mutilation, and every kind of punishment, so that the criminal may come to an agreement concerning satisfaction with him to whom he is liable. But if anyone shall have been convicted of violating his oaths, as guilty of perjury let him be separated not only from the communion of the church and of all clerics, but also from the common table of Catholics. But if he to whom the accused is liable shall have wished composition to be made to him while a claim is being made, and the accused himself, having been driven by fear, shall have departed from the church, let him not be sought from the clerics of the church. § 1. A servant also who has fled to a church because of any offense, if he shall have received an oath from his master concerning the offense committed, is immediately to be compelled to return to the service of his master; and after he has been consigned to his master upon the giving of an oath, if he shall be proved to have suffered some punishment for the same offense for which he is defended, let the master be held excluded from the communion and common table of Catholics for contempt of the church and violation of faith. But if a servant defended by the church for his offense, when the clerics demand it, shall have received assurances of impunity from his master, and is unwilling to depart, let it be lawful for the master to seize him. PART V. GRATIAN. For under the occasion of religion a servant ought not to despise his master and forsake his service. Hence it is read in the Council of Gangra, [c. 3]:

> C. XXXVI. Ante datam securitatem de atrio ecclesiae fugitiuus non cogatur exire.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I., c. 3. et 5.] Id constituimus obseruandum, quod ecclesiastici canones decreuerunt, et lex Romana constituit, ut ab ecclesiae atriis uel domo episcopi eos abstrahere omnino non liceat, sed nec alteri consignare, nisi ad euangelia datis sacramentis de morte, et debilitate, et omni penarum genere sint securi, ita ut ei, cui reus fuerit criminosus, de satisfactione conueniat. Quod si sacramenta sua conuictus fuerit uiolasse, reus periurii non solum a communione ecclesiae uel omnium clericorum, uerum etiam catholicorum conuiuio separetur. Quod si is, cui reus est, uoluerit sibi intentione faciente conponi, et ipse reus actus de ecclesia timore discesserit, ab ecclesiae clericis non queratur. §. 1. Seruus etiam, qui ad ecclesiam confugerit pro qualibet culpa, si a domino pro admissa culpa sacramentum susceperit, statim ad seruitium domini sui redire cogatur, et posteaquam dato sacramento domino suo fuerit consignatus, si aliquid penae pro eadem culpa, qua excusatur, probatus fuerit pertulisse, pro contemptu ecclesiae et preuaricatione fidei a communione et conuiuio catholicorum extraneus habeatur. Si uero seruus pro culpa sua ab ecclesia defensatus sacramenta domini clericis exigentibus de inpunitate perceperit, exire nolentem a domino liceat occupari. V. Pars. Gratian. Occasione namque religionis seruus dominum suum contempnere, et eius ministerium destituere non debet. Unde in Gangrensi Concilio [c. 3.] legitur:

C. XXXVII. Let a servant not dare to despise his master under the occasion of religion.

If anyone under the occasion of religion teaches another's servant to despise his master and forsake his service, and has not rather taught him to serve his master in good faith and with every honor, let him be anathema.

C. XXXVII. Religionis occasione dominum suum non audeat seruus contempnere.

Si quis seruum alienum occasione religionis docet dominum suum contempnere, et eius ministerium destituere, ac non pocius docuerit eum suo domino bona fide et cum omni honorificentia deseruire, anathema sit.

C. XXXVIII. Let one who for the sake of religion has taught a servant to despise his master be corrected most severely.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 47]. If anyone for the sake of religion should teach another's servant to despise his master and withdraw from his service, let him be reproved most severely in all things.

C. XXXVIII. Corripiatur durissime qui causa religionis docuerit seruum dominum suum contempnere.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 47.] Si quis seruum alienum causa religionis doceat contempnere dominum suum, et recedere a seruitio eius, durissime in omnibus arguatur.

C. XXXIX. Let the necessity that compels the property of a church to be alienated be made known to the primate.

Likewise from the Council of Carthage, c. 31. Let no one alienate the property of a church. But if it has no revenues and some excessive necessity compels it, we determine that this is to be made known to the primate of that province, so that with a fixed number of bishops he may judge whether it is to be done. And if so great a necessity of the church presses that it cannot consult the primate beforehand, let it at least summon the neighboring bishops, taking care to report every necessity of the church to the council. But if it shall not have done this, when his honor has been lost, let the seller be held guilty before God and the holy council.

C. XXXIX. Primati insinuetur necessitas, que res ecclesiae distrahere conpellit.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi, c. 31. Nullus res ecclesiae distrahat. Quod si redditus non habeat, et aliqua necessitas nimia cogit, hanc insinuandam esse primati ipsius prouinciae censemus, ut cum statuto numero episcoporum utrum faciendum sit arbitretur. Et si tanta urget necessitas ecclesiae, ut non possit ante primatem consulere, saltem uicinos conuocet episcopos, curans ad concilium referre omnem ecclesiae necessitatem. Quod si non fecerit, reus Deo et sancto concilio uenditor honore amisso teneatur.

C. XL. Whatever an abbot has sold without the bishop's permission is to be rendered void.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 56]. In sales which abbots presume to make, let this form be observed: whatever shall have been sold without the bishop's permission is to be recalled to the bishop's control. § 1. But it is not lawful for an abbot to manumit slaves given to monks. For we think it unjust that, while the monks perform daily rural labor, their servants should enjoy the leisure of freedom. PART VI. GRATIAN. Even if a possession of a monastery shall have been given by an abbot with the bishop's consent, the gift will be of no force, unless perhaps the gift was made for erecting the fabric of a church. In that case it is lawful for him to give only as much as the walls of the church enclose. Hence Gregory writes, [book VII, indiction 1, letter 33, to John, Bishop of Squillace]:

C. XL. Sine licentia episcopi quicquid abbas uendiderit, in irritum deducatur.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 56.] In uenditionibus, quas abbates facere presumunt, hec forma seruetur, ut quicquid sine episcopi licentia uenditum fuerit ad potestatem episcopi reuocetur. §. 1. Mancipia uero monachis donata ab abbate manumitti non licet. Iniustum enim putamus, ut, monachis cottidianum rurale opus facientibus, serui eorum libertatis otio potiantur. VI. Pars. Gratian. Etiam si episcopo consentiente monasterii possessio ab abbate data fuerit, nullius momenti erit donatio, nisi forte in ecclesiae fabricam erigendam donatio processerit. Quo casu tantum ei donare licet, quantum ecclesiae parietes concludunt. Unde Gregorius scribit: [lib. VII. Indict. 1. epist. 33., Iohanni Episcopo Scyllacaeno]

C. XLI. By no title can the property of a monastery be separated from its right.

The monks of the aforesaid monastery complained to us that their abbot, under the pretext of constructing a church, conceded to your fraternity by title of gift land within the fortress of Squillace which extends six hundred feet. Therefore we will that as much as the walls of the constructed church can surround be claimed for the right of the church. But whatever shall be outside the walls of that church is to return without any difficulty to the right of the monastery, because neither the statutes of worldly laws nor of the sacred canons permit the property of a monastery to be separated from its right by any title. On that account, restore without any delay the gift of that land, which was made contrary to reason.

C. XLI. Nullo titulo res monasterii ualent ab eius iure segregari.

Questi nobis sunt predicti monasterii monachi abbatem suum terram intra Scillacenum castrum, que in DC. pedes extenditur, sub pretextu fabricandae ecclesiae fraternitati tuae donationis titulo concessisse. Ideo uolumus, quantum parietes edificatae ecclesiae circumdare possunt, iuri ecclesiae uendicare. Quicquid uero extra parietes eiusdem ecclesiae esse potuerit, in iure monasterii sine difficultate aliqua reuertatur, quia nec mundanarum legum, nec sacrorum canonum statuta permittunt res monasterii ab eius iure quolibet titulo segregari. Ea propter donationem eiusdem terrae, que contra rationem facta est, sine aliqua dilatione restitue.

[PALEA. C. XLII.

Therefore we establish that this page of our writings is to be preserved firm and inviolate by you and by all bishops for all future time, so that, with the Lord's help, they may be content only with the right of their own church, and monasteries may in no way be subjected to ecclesiastical conditions, forced services, or any secular services; may serve under no canonical dues; but, with vexations removed, may perform the divine work with the greatest devotion.] PART VII. GRATIAN. But it is to be noted that it is one thing to convert the property of a church to one's own use or that of one's relatives—which pernicious greed the sacred canons everywhere forbid and show to be damnable—and another when, from the dispensation of charity, provision is made for human weakness, so that his former property is restored to one who disdains to remain in a sacred purpose. We read that some of the saints did this, not so much by the law of the forum as by the law of heaven. For blessed John the Evangelist restored gold and gems to two young men who repented that they had relinquished all their property for Christ and distributed it to the poor, so that they might buy back for themselves everything they had sold. But it is objected: Blessed John did not restore offerings which had already been distributed to the poor, but supplied other things in compensation, which had never been counted among the resources of the poor or of churches. Similarly, if an abbot or bishop shall have anything that is not yet numbered among ecclesiastical resources, following the example of blessed John let him give those things to the one departing, but let him retain the things offered to the church. § 2. Therefore another example follows, by which the same things that were taken away are shown to have been laudably restored. Augustine in sermon [II] On the Life of Clerics:

> [PALEA. C. XLII.
> Hanc ergo scriptorum nostrorum paginam omni in futuro tempore a te, ab omnibus episcopis firmam statuimus illibatamque seruari, ut et suae ecclesiae iuuante Domino tantummodo sint iure contenti, et monasteria ecclesiasticis condicionibus, seu angariis, siue quibuslibet obsequiis secularibus nullo modo subiaceant, nullis canonicis iuribus deseruiant, sed remotis uexationibus diuinum opus cum summa deuotione perficiant.] VII. Pars. Gratian. Sed notandum est, quod aliud est in suos uel propinquorum usus res ecclesiae conuertere (quam perniciosam cupiditatem sacri canones ubique prohibent, et dampnabilem ostendunt), aliud est quod ex dispensatione karitatis humanae infirmitati consulitur, ut quondam sua illi reddantur, qui in sacro proposito manere contempnit. Quod non tam iure fori quam iure poli nonnullos sanctorum fecisse legimus. Beatus enim Iohannes euangelista duobus iuuenibus, quos penituerat omnia sua pro Christo reliquisse, et pauperibus erogasse, aurum et gemmas reddidit, ut cuncta, que uendiderant, sibi redimerent. Sed obicitur: B. Iohannes non oblata reddidit, que pauperibus iam erogata fuerant, sed alia recompensauit, que in pauperum uel ecclesiarum facultatibus numquam conputata fuerant. Similiter si abbas uel episcopus aliqua habuerit, que in ecclesiasticis facultatibus nondum sunt annumerata, exemplo B. Iohannis det illa recedenti, oblata uero ecclesiae retineat. §. 2. Sequitur ergo aliud exemplum, quo eadem, que ablata sunt, laudabiliter reddita monstrentur. Augustinus in sermone [II.] de uita clericorum:

C. XLIII. The church ought not to receive what is offered to it after a son has been disinherited.

Whoever wishes to make the church his heir after disinheriting his son, let him seek another who will receive it, not Augustine; indeed, with God's favor, he will find no one. How praiseworthy was the deed of Saint Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage! For a certain man, when he had no children and did not expect any, gave all his property to the church, retaining the usufruct for himself. Children were born to him; the bishop restored to him, though he did not expect it, the things that he had given. The bishop had power not to restore them, but by the law of the forum, not by the law of heaven. GRATIAN. Behold, offerings are sometimes restored lawfully and laudably. Yet this example does not show that his property is to be restored to one departing. For it is one thing to persist in the profession of one's life, another to depart from the purpose of one's order. If Saint Aurelius restored the offerings to one remaining in the lay habit because he received children after the offering, it does not follow that their property is to be restored to those going into apostasy, from whom necessities would more usefully be withdrawn so that, compelled, they might return to the order from which they departed. But just as we are commanded to furnish necessities to enemies and persecutors, and just as we are admonished by the Apostle to redeem the time so that we may be free for prayer more readily, so—lest the church suffer scandal, lest the one departing plunge into worse things, lest on account of his property he blaze forth to the ruin of the monks or the burning of the monastery—it is more laudable, I do not say that his property is restored to him, but that it is permitted to be taken away, than that those things be inflicted by him.

> C. XLIII. Non debet ecclesia suscipere que filio exheredato sibi offeruntur.

Quicumque uult exheredato filio heredem facere ecclesiam, querat alterum, qui suscipiat, non Augustinum: imo, Deo propitio, neminem inueniet. Quam laudabile factum sancti Aurelii Cartaginensis episcopi? Quidam enim, cum filios non haberet, nec speraret, res suas omnes (retento sibi usufructu) donauit ecclesiae. Nati sunt illi filii, reddidit episcopus nec opinanti ea que ille donauerat. In potestate habebat episcopus non reddere, sed iure fori, non iure poli. Gratian. Ecce, quod aliquando oblata iure et laudabiliter redduntur. Verum non hoc exemplo recedenti sua reddenda monstrantur. Aliud est enim in professione suae uitae persistere, aliud a proposito sui ordinis discedere. Si S. Aurelius degenti in laicali habitu oblata reddidit, quia post oblationem filios accepit, non ideo in apostasiam euntibus sua reddenda sunt, quibus utilius necessaria subtraherentur, ut coacti redirent ad ordinem, a quo recesserant. Sed sicut inimicis et persecutoribus iubemur necessaria subministrare, sicut ab Apostolo monemur tempus redimere, ut expeditius orationi uacemus: sic, ne ecclesia scandalum patiatur, ne discedens in deteriora precipitetur, ne in perniciem monachorum aut incendium monasterii occasione suorum exardescat, laudabilius sua sibi non dico redduntur, sed auferri sinuntur, quam ab illo ista inferantur.

Causa XVIII

GRATIAN. A certain abbot who was consecrated as bishop had previously conferred much upon his monastery and afterward acquired more in the episcopate. When the brothers sought a successor for him, the bishop of the place wished to insert himself into the election so that through him an abbot might be ordained in the monastery; the brothers resisted. (Question I.) It is asked whether the monastery can seek the things acquired by the bishop, and whether the episcopal church can claim for itself the things that had been handed over to the monastery. (Question II.) Second, whether the abbot is to be elected and ordained by the bishop, or is to be instituted only by his own brothers.

GRATIANUS. Quidam abbas consecratus in episcopum prius monasterio multa contulit, postea in episcopatu plura acquisiuit; cui dum fratres successorem quererent, episcopus loci semet electioni uolebat inserere, ut per ipsum abbas in monasterio ordinaretur; fratres renituntur. (Qu. I.) Queritur, an monasterium possit petere que ab episcopo acquisita sunt? an episcopalis ecclesia possit sibi uendicare que monasterio fuerant contradita? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an per episcopum abbas sit eligendus et ordinandus, an tantummodo a propriis fratribus sit instituendus?

Question I

GRATIAN. The first question is settled in the Council held at Altheim, in which it is read to have been established thus:

GRATIANUS. Prima questio terminatur in Concilio habito apud Alteum, in quo sic statutum legitur:

C. I. One who is ordained bishop from being a monk is to leave to the monastery what he had before consecration, but to his own church what he acquired after consecration.

It was established, and reasonably confirmed by the synod according to the holy Fathers, that a monk whom canonical election releases from the yoke of the rule of monastic profession and sacred ordination makes a bishop from a monk may afterward, as a lawful heir, have power by right to claim a paternal inheritance for himself; but whatever he had acquired or appeared to possess, let him leave to the monastery and to the judgment of his abbot, who had been his abbot according to the Rule of Saint Benedict. For after he is ordained bishop, according to the sacred canons let him restore to the altar at which he is sanctified and given a title whatever he shall be able to acquire.

> C. I. Qui de monacho episcopus ordinatur quod ante consecrationem habuerit monasterio, quod uero post consecrationem acquisiuit propriae ecclesiae derelinquat.
> Statutum est et rationabiliter secundum sanctos Patres a sinodo confirmatum est, ut monachus, quem canonica electio a iugo regulae monasticae professionis absoluit, et sacra ordinatio de monacho episcopum facit, uelut legitimus heres paternam sibi hereditatem postea iure uendicandi potestatem habeat; sed quicquid acquisierat, uel habere uisus fuerat, monasterio relinquat, et abbatis sui, qui fuerat secundum regulam S. Benedicti, arbitrio. Postquam enim episcopus ordinatur, ad altare, ad quod sanctificatur et titulatur, secundum sacros canones quod acquirere poterit restituat.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. The authority of the Council of Toledo [IV, c. 50] settles the second question, saying:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Secundam uero questionem terminat auctoritas Tolletani Concilii [IV. c. 50.] dicens:

C. I. Abbots and other offices ought to be instituted and ordained by bishops.

Let bishops claim for themselves only that in monasteries which the canons command, that is, to admonish monks toward holy conduct, to institute abbots and other offices, and to correct deeds outside the rule. But if they shall presume anything against monks that is forbidden by the canons, or attempt to usurp anything from the property of a monastery, the sentence of excommunication will not be absent from them. PART II. GRATIAN. To the contrary Gregory writes to Castorius, Bishop of Rimini:

> C. I. Abbates et alia offitia per episcopos debent institui et ordinari.
> Hoc tantum sibi in monasteriis uendicent sacerdotes, quod precipiunt canones, id est monachos ad conuersationem sanctam premonere, abbates aliaque offitia instituere, atque extra regulam acta corrigere. Quod si aliquid in monachos canonibus interdictum presumpserint aut usurpare quicquam de monasterii rebus temptauerint, non deerit ab eis sentencia excommunicationis. II. Pars. Gratian. Econtra Gregorius scribit Castorio Ariminensi Episcopo:

C. II. Let the congregation of a monastery, not the bishop, institute the abbot.

Let an abbot in a monastery not be ordained by the bishop or by any outsider, nor let Mass be celebrated there by the bishop, so that it may be subject to no church.

> C. II. Congregatio monasterii, non episcopus abbatem instituat.
> Abbas in monasterio non per episcopum aut per aliquem extraneorum ordinetur, neque ab episcopo missa ibi celebretur, ut nulli ecclesiae subiciatur.

[C. III.]

The same to Bishop Castorius, [book IV, letter 43]. We will that no other be ordained abbot over any monastery except the one whom, by common consent, the congregation shall have requested as worthy in morals and in the practices of monastic discipline. But we entirely forbid public Masses to be celebrated in monasteries by bishops or clerics.

> [C. III.]
> Idem Castorio Episcopo. [lib. IV. epist. 43.] Abbatem cuilibet monasterio non alium, sed quem dignum moribus atque actibus monasticae disciplinae communi consensu congregatio poposcerit, ordinari uolumus. Missas autem publicas per episcopos uel clericos in monasteriis omnino celebrari prohibemus.

C. IV. He ought to be instituted abbot whom his congregation and the owner of the possession shall have requested to be ordained.

Likewise Pope Pelagius to Mellitus the Subdeacon. We will that he be ordained abbot in the monastery whom the election of the monks from their own congregation, the owner of the possession, and—what is to be observed more—the order and merit of his life shall have requested to be ordained over them.

> C. IV. Ille debet abbas institui, quem sua congregatio et possessionis dominus ordinari poposcerit.
>
> Item Pelagius Papa Mellito Subdiacono. Abbatem in monasterio illum uolumus ordinari, quem sibi de sua congregatione et monachorum electio, et possessionis dominus, et, quod magis obseruandum est, ordo uitae ac meritum poposcerit ordinari.

C. V. Concerning the liberty of monks.

Likewise Gregory to all Bishops. How necessary it is to provide for the quiet of monasteries, etc. And below: § 1. Therefore, in the name of our Lord, by the authority of blessed Peter, prince of the Apostles—whose place we occupy in presiding over this Roman Church—we forbid any bishop or secular person hereafter to presume in any manner or on any occasion to diminish the revenues or charters of monasteries, or the cells or estates pertaining to them, or to commit any fraud or intrusion. And below: § 2. But when the abbot of any congregation has died, let no outsider be elected, but one from the same congregation whom the concordant society of the brothers shall have elected for itself by its own will. But if they shall not have been able to find a suitable person among themselves, let them carefully choose for themselves one to be ordained from other monasteries. And below: § 3. This also is equally to be observed: that monks ought not, against the abbot's will, to be taken from there to govern other monasteries, to sacred orders, or to the office of the clergy. And below: § 4. Let no one retain a monk in any church or promote him to any honor without the testimony and concession of the abbot. § 5. Therefore we establish that this page of our writings is to be preserved firm and inviolate by all bishops for all future time, so that, with the Lord's help, they may be content only with the right of their own church, and monasteries may in no way be subjected to ecclesiastical conditions, forced services, or any secular services; may serve under no canonical dues; but, free from vexations and every burden, may perform the divine work with the greatest devotion of mind.

> C. V. De libertate monachorum.

Item Gregorius omnibus Episcopis. Quam sit necessarium monasteriorum quieti prospicere, etc. Et infra: §. 1. Interdicimus igitur in nomine Domini nostri, ex auctoritate B. Petri apostolorum principis, (cuius uice huic Romanae ecclesiae presidemus), ut episcoporum nullus aut secularium ultra presumat de redditibus, uel cartis monasteriorum, uel de cellis uel uillis, que ad ea pertinent, quocumque modo seu qualibet occasione minuere, uel dolos uel inmissiones aliquas facere. Et infra: §. 2. Defuncto uero abbate cuiuscumque congregationis non extraneus eligatur, nisi de eadem congregatione, quem sibi propria uoluntate concors fratrum societas elegerit. Quod si aptam inter se personam inuenire nequiuerint, sollerter sibi de aliis monasteriis eligant ordinandum. Et infra: §. 3. Pariter autem est custodiendum, ut inuito abbate ad ordinandum alia monasteria, aut ad ordines sacros uel clericatus offitium tolli exinde monachi non debeant. Et infra: §. 4. Nullus monachum sine testimonio et concessione abbatis in ecclesia aliqua teneat, uel ad aliquem honorem promoueat. §. 5. Hanc ergo scriptorum nostrorum paginam omni futuro in tempore ab omnibus episcopis firmam statuimus illibatamque seruari, ut et suae ecclesiae iuuante Domino tantummodo sint contenti iure, et monasteria ecclesiasticis condicionibus, seu angariis, uel quibuslibet obsequiis secularibus nullo modo subiaceant, nullis canonicis iuribus deseruiant, sed remotis uexationibus a cunctis grauaminibus diuinum opus cum summa animi deuotione perficiant.

C. VI. Let bishops not celebrate public Masses in monasteries or inflict any burden upon them.

The same to Castorius, Bishop of Rimini. From the report of Abbot Luminosus we have learned that in very many monasteries monks have suffered many prejudices and burdens from prelates. Therefore the provision of your fraternity ought to arrange for their future quiet by a salutary ordinance, so that those dwelling in them in God's service may persevere with a free mind, with grace assisting them. We also entirely forbid public Masses to be held in a monastery, lest any occasion for an assembly of the people be furnished within the retreats and dwellings of God's servants, because this is not expedient for their souls. Nor may a bishop dare to place a chair there, to exercise any power of commanding, or to make any ordinance, however slight, unless he shall have been asked by the abbot, so that the monks may always remain under the power of their abbots and, free from vexations and every burden, may perform the divine work with the greatest devotion of mind.

C. VI. Missas publicas in cenobiis episcopi non celebrent, nec aliquod eis grauamen inferant.

Idem Castorio Episcopo Ariminensi. Luminoso abbate referente plurimis in monasteriis multa a presulibus preiudicia atque grauamina monachos pertulisse cognouimus. Oportet ergo, ut tuae fraternitatis prouisio de futura quiete eorum salubri disponat ordinatione, quatinus conuersantes in illis in Dei seruitio, gratia illis suffragante, mente libera perseuerent. Missas quoque publicas in cenobio fieri omnimodo prohibemus, ne in Dei seruorum recessibus, et eorum receptaculis ulla popularis prebeatur occasio conuentus, quia non expedit animabus eorum. Nec audeat ibi episcopus cathedram collocare, uel quamlibet potestatem exercere inperandi, nec aliquam ordinationem, quamuis leuissimam, faciendi, nisi ab abbate fuerit rogatus, quatinus monachi semper maneant in abbatum suorum potestate, ut remotis uexationibus a cunctis grauaminibus diuinum opus cum summa deuotione animi perficiant.

C. VII. Let a baptistery not be permitted to be made in a monastery.

Likewise Pope Gelasius. We commanded some time ago that the baptistery ought to be removed from the monastery of Saint Andrew, which is above Mascalae, because of the disturbance of the monks, and that an altar be founded in that same place where the fonts are; the completion of this matter has been delayed until now. Therefore we admonish your fraternity to introduce no further delay after receiving our letters, but, when the place of those fonts has been filled in, let an altar be founded there without any delay, so that it may be lawful for the aforesaid monks to celebrate the work of God securely and our mind may not be stirred against your fraternity because of your negligence.

C. VII. Baptisterium in monasterio non permittatur fieri.

Item Gelasius Papa. Pridem precepimus, ut de monasterio S. Andreae, quod est super Mascalas, baptisterium propter monachorum molestias debuisset auferri, atque in eodem loco, quo sunt fontes, altare fundari, cuius rei perfectio hactenus est protracta. Admonemus igitur fraternitatem tuam, nullam iam moram post susceptas litteras nostras inserere, sed repleto loco ipsorum fontium altare illic sine aliqua dilatione fundetur, quatinus et predictis monachis opus Dei secure liceat celebrare, et de negligentia tua non contra fraternitatem tuam animus noster excitetur.

C. VIII. With the bishop's permission an abbot can leave his place.

Likewise from the Council of Mainz. An abbot may leave his place for the sake of humility and with the bishop's permission; nevertheless, let the brothers elect an abbot for themselves from among their own if they have one, but if not, from outsiders. PART III. GRATIAN. Behold, in the Council of Toledo it is said that bishops ought to institute abbots and other offices. Blessed Gregory and Pelagius forbid this, saying that an abbot is to be elected and ordained by the brothers of his congregation. How, therefore, will so great a diversity be recalled to concord? But it is to be known that certain monks are of untamed neck and unbridled pride; when their abbots wish to compel them to religion, they conspire to depose them and strive to place over themselves another agreeable to their own morals. Such were those who are read to have conspired to kill blessed Benedict. For persons of this kind it was established that abbots and other offices are to be instituted by bishops. Hence Pope Pelagius writes to Opilio the Defender, saying:

C. VIII. Cum permissione episcopi abbas locum suum potest deserere.

Item ex Concilio Magontino. Abbas pro humiliatione et cum permissione episcopi locum suum potest relinquere; tamen eligant sibi fratres abbatem de ipsis si habent, sin autem, de extraneis. III. Pars. Gratian. Ecce in Tolletano concilio dicitur, quod sacerdotes abbates et alia offitia instituere debeant. B. Gregorius et Pelagius prohibent, dicentes, abbatem a fratribus suae congregationis eligendum et ordinandum. Quomodo ergo hec tanta diuersitas ad concordiam reuocabitur? Sed sciendum est, quosdam monachos esse indomitae ceruicis et effrenatae superbiae, quos dum abbates ad religionem cogere uoluerint, in eorum deiectione conspirant, et alium moribus suis conuenientem sibi preficere contendunt, quales erant illi, qui in necem B. Benedicti conspirasse leguntur. Pro huiuscemodi constitutum est, ut abbates et alia offitia per sacerdotes instituantur. Unde Pelagius Papa scribit Opilioni Defensori dicens:

C. IX. Monks are not permitted to expel abbots at their own judgment or to ordain others.

Henceforth we leave to monks no power and no license to expel abbots at their own judgment or to ordain others over themselves—because no authority will remain to the abbot if he begins to be subject to the power of the monks—so that henceforth the solicitude of the abbot, to whom it is fitting that all power pertain, ought faithfully and diligently to fulfill all things which pertain either to reverence for divine worship or to the interests of that monastery. PART IV. GRATIAN. Hence it was also established that the clerics of individual monasteries are to be under the power of bishops and that no one is permitted to build monasteries without their knowledge. Hence it is read in the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 4]:

> C. IX. Non licet monachis abbates pro suo arbitrio expellere, aut alios ordinare.
> Nullam potestatem de cetero, nullam licentiam monachis relinquimus pro arbitrio suo aut abbates expellere, aut sibimet alios ordinare, (quia nulla auctoritas remanebit abbati, si monachorum potestati ceperit subiacere,) ut de cetero fideliter et studiose uniuersa, que uel ad diuini cultus reuerentiam, uel ad utilitates eiusdem monasterii pertinent, abbatis sollicitudo, ad quem potestas tota pertinere conuenit, debeat adinplere. IV. Pars. Gratian. Hinc etiam constitutum est, ut clerici singulorum monasteriorum sint in potestate episcoporum, nec alicui liceat extra eorum conscientiam monasteria edificare. Unde in Calcedonensi Concilio [c. 4.] legitur:

C. X. Let no one build monasteries without the bishop's knowledge.

Certain persons wearing the habit of monks indiscriminately commend both monasteries and themselves throughout the cities by their own presumption. Therefore it pleased us that no one is to build or construct monasteries or a house of prayer without the knowledge of the bishop of that city. Likewise, [c. 8]: § 1. Let clerics appointed in poorhouses, monasteries, or shrines of martyrs be under the power of the bishop who is in that city, according to the tradition of the holy Fathers, and let them not presumptuously withdraw from their bishop. § 2. But those who shall have dared to annul an institution of this kind in any manner, or who shall be unwilling to be subject to their own bishop, if indeed they are clerics, let them be subject to the condemnations of the canons according to the ordering of their persons; but if they are laymen or monks, let them be deprived of communion. Likewise: § 3. Let clerics who preside over the administration of the poor, monasteries, or shrines of martyrs remain under the power of the bishops of the individual cities according to the tradition of the canons, and let them not through their own rashness decline the governance of their bishop. But those who shall have dared to subvert an arrangement of this kind in any manner and shall not have obeyed their bishop, if indeed they are clerics, let them be subject to canonical condemnation; but if they are monks or laymen, let them be suspended from communion.

> C. X. Sine conscientia episcopi monasteria nullus edificet.
> Quidam monachorum habitu utentes indifferenter per ciuitates, necnon et monasteria et se ipsos presumptione propria conmendant. Placuit igitur neminem aut edificare aut construere monasteria, aut oratorii domum sine conscientia ipsius ciuitatis episcopi. Item: [c. 8.] §. 1. Clerici in ptochiis, monasteriis, aut martiriis constituti sub potestate sint eius, qui in ea ciuitate est episcopus, secundum traditionem sanctorum Patrum, neque per presumptionem recedant a suo episcopo. §. 2. Eos uero, qui ausi fuerint rescindere huiusmodi institutionem quocumque modo, uel si noluerint subiacere proprio episcopo, si quidem fuerint clerici, secundum, personarum ordinationem subiaceant condempnationibus canonum, si uero laici uel monachi fuerint communione priuentur. Item: §. 3. Clerici, qui pauperum dispositioni, uel monasteriorum uel martiriorum presunt, sub potestate singularum ciuitatum episcoporum secundum traditionem canonum perdurent, neque per suam temeritatem episcopi sui moderationem declinent. Qui autem huiusmodi dispositionem quolibet modo subuertere ausi fuerint, et episcopo suo non obedierint, si quidem clerici fuerint, canonicae dampnationi subiaceant, si autem monachi uel laici sunt, a communione suspendantur.

C. XI. One who is to be placed over religious women is to be examined by the bishop.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 97]. One who is to be placed over religious women is to be approved by the bishop. GRATIAN. Likewise no one is permitted to begin or found a monastery without the bishop's permission. Hence it is read in the Council of Agde, [c. 27]:

> C. XI. Examinetur ab episcopo religiosis feminis preponendus.
>
> Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 97.] Qui religiosis feminis preponendus est ab episcopo conprobetur. Gratian. Monasterium quoque absque episcopi permissione nulli incipere aut fundare licet. Unde in Agatensi Concilio [c. 27.] legitur:

C. XII. Let no one presume to begin a monastery without the bishop's permission.

Concerning monks, let no one presume to begin or found a new monastery unless the bishop either permits or approves it.

> C. XII. Sine permissione episcopi nullus monasterium presumat incipere.
> De monachis monasterium nouum (nisi episcopo aut permittente, aut probante) nullus incipere aut fundare presumat.

C. XIII. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise from the same, [c. 58]. We forbid new cells or small congregations of monks to be instituted without the bishop's knowledge.

> C. XIII. De eodem.
> Item ex eodem. [c. 58.] Cellulas nouas aut congregatiunculas monachorum absque episcopi notitia prohibemus institui.

C. XIV. Let no monk presume to construct a cell without the will of the bishop or abbot.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, [I, c. 24]. Let no monk, after abandoning the congregation of the monastery, presume under the impulse of ambition and vanity to construct a cell without the bishop's permission or the will of his abbot. PART V. GRATIAN. Likewise there are others who, for the pursuit of various cases, admit persons of any kind who loosen their strictness and disturb the quiet of religion. Concerning them it is read in the Council of Tribur:

> C. XIV. Absque episcopi uel abbatis uoluntate nullus monachorum cellulam construere presumat.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I., c. 24.] Nullus monachus, congregatione monasterii derelicta, ambitionis et uanitatis inpulsu cellulam construere sine episcopi permissione uel abbatis sui uoluntate presumat. V. Pars. Gratian. Item sunt alii, qui pro executione diuersarum causarum quoslibet admittunt, qui districtionem eorum soluant, et quietem religionis perturbent. De quibus in Concilio Triburiensi legitur:

C. XV. Let an abbot who has not been circumspect in governance be barred from his honor by his own bishop and neighboring abbots.

If any abbot shall not have been circumspect in governance, humble, chaste, merciful, discreet, and sober, and shall not have shown the divine precepts by words and examples, let him be barred from his honor by the bishop in whose territory he resides, by the neighboring abbots, and by others fearing God, even if the whole congregation, consenting to his vices, wishes to have him as abbot.

> C. XV. Abbas, qui cautus in regimine non fuerit, a proprio episcopo et a uicinis abbatibus a suo arceatur honore.
> Si quis abbas cautus in regimine, humilis, castus, misericors, discretus sobriusque non fuerit, ac diuina precepta uerbis et exemplis non ostenderit, ab episcopo, in cuius territorio consistit, et a uicinis abbatibus et ceteris Deum timentibus a suo arceatur honore, etiamsi omnis congregatio, uiciis suis consentiens, abbatem eum habere uoluerit.

C. XVI. Let abbots remain under the power of bishops.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, [I, c. 21]. PART IV. Let abbots remain under the power of bishops because of the humility of religion, and if they shall do anything outside the rule, let them be corrected by the bishops; having received a summons, let them meet once a year at the place which the bishop shall have chosen. § 1. But let monks be subject to their abbots with every obedience and devotion. But if anyone shall have proved disobedient through contumacy and presumed to wander through any places or to have anything of his own, let everything he shall have acquired be taken away by the abbots, to profit the monastery according to the rule. But those who had wandered are, wherever they shall have been found, to be recalled under custody as fugitives with the bishop's assistance. § 1. And let that abbot know that he will be held guilty who shall not have disciplined persons of this kind according to the rule, or who shall have received another's monk.

> C. XVI. In episcoporum potestate abbates consistant.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I., c. 21.] IV. Pars. Abbates pro humilitate religionis in episcoporum potestate consistant, et si quid extra regulam fecerint, ab episcopis corrigantur, qui semel in anno in loco, ubi episcopus elegerit, accepta uocatione conueniant. §. 1. Monachi autem abbatibus omni obedientia et deuotione subiaceant. Quod si quis per contumaciam extiterit indeuotus, ac per loca aliqua uagari, aut peculiare aliquid habere presumpserit, omnia, que acquisierit, ab abbatibus auferantur, secundum regulam monasterio profuturam. Ipsi autem, qui fuerant peruagati, ubi inuenti fuerint cum auxilio episcopi tamquam fugaces sub custodia reuocentur. §. 1. Et reum se ille abbas futurum esse cognoscat, qui in huiusmodi personis non regulariter animaduerterit, uel qui monachum susceperit alienum.

[C. XVII.]

Likewise from the Council of Arles. Let monasteries and the discipline of monks pertain to the bishop in whose territory they are situated.

> [C. XVII.]
> Item ex Concilio Arelatensi. Monasteria uel monachorum disciplina ad eum pertineant episcopum, in cuius sunt territorio constituta.

C. XVIII. Let no one furnish episcopal ministries to abbots who are unwilling to be subject to any bishop.

Likewise Pope Paschal II. Let absolutely no bishop furnish any episcopal ministries to abbots who are under neither a bishop, metropolitan, primate, nor patriarch. For since they profess that they are subject to no bishop at all, it follows that no bishop is to bestow upon them, as upon outsiders, the things that are his. GRATIAN. For persons of this kind it was therefore established that the affairs and interests of monasteries are to be ordered by bishops. Hence Gregory writes to Vitalis, Defender of Sardinia, [book VII, letter 65]:

> C. XVIII. Episcopalia nullus ministret abbatibus, qui alicui episcoporum nolunt subesse.
> Item Pascalis Papa. [II.] Abbatibus, qui neque sub episcopo, neque sub metropolitano, neque sub primate, neque sub patriarcha sunt, nullus prorsus episcoporum episcopalia quelibet amministret. Cum enim se nulli episcopo omnino subesse profiteantur, consequens est, ut nullus episcoporum que sua sunt eis tamquam extraneis largiatur. Gratian. Pro huiuscemodi ergo statutum est, ut causae et utilitates monasteriorum per episcopos disponantur. Unde Gregorius scribit Vitali Defensori Sardiniae: [lib. VII. epist. 65.]

C. XIX. The interests of a monastery ought to be ordered by its own bishop.

We have learned that each person at his own pleasure and for the pursuit of various cases disturbs monasteries of servants of God or of women. We receive this with no pleasure at all, and concerning it admonish your Experience that, having received our authority, you are by no means to permit this to be usurped again, but let it be the care of the bishop of that place, under whose governance they live, to order their affairs and interests. For it is exceedingly unseemly that, with him omitted, anyone else should involve himself in their affairs; rather, he ought to order their lives by fitting governance according to the rule who is compelled to render an account for their souls committed to him. PART VII. GRATIAN. For this reason blessed Gregory also forbids women indiscriminately to approach a monastery and to become co-mothers of monks, writing to Abbot Valentinus, [book III, letter 40]:

> C. XIX. Utilitates monasterii a proprio episcopo debent disponi.
> Cognouimus, quod monasteria seruorum Dei uel feminarum pro suo quisque libitu et diuersarum causarum executione perturbet. Quod omnino non grate suscipimus, tuamque ex hoc experientiam conmonemus, ut nequaquam hoc usurpare denuo accepta nostra auctoritate permittas, sed episcopo loci illius, sub cuius moderamine degunt, curae sit causas utilitatesque disponere. Valde est enim indecens, ut omisso eo alius quilibet se illorum causis admisceat, sed ille eorum uitas conpetenti regularique debet moderamine disponere, qui pro conmissis eorum animabus conpellitur rationem reddere. VII. Pars. Gratian. Pro huiusmodi etiam prohibet B. Gregorius mulieres passim ad monasterium accedere, et monachorum conmatres fieri, scribens Valentino Abbati: [lib. III. epist. 40.]

C. XX. Monks are permitted neither to make women their co-mothers nor to approach women.

It has reached us that women indiscriminately ascend into your monastery and—what is graver—that your monks make them their co-mothers and from this have incautious association with them. Therefore, lest on this occasion the enemy of the human race deceive them by his cunning—which may it not be—we admonish you by the tenor of this command that henceforth you neither permit women to ascend into your monastery on any occasion nor permit your monks to make them their co-mothers. For if this shall again reach our ears in any manner, know that you will be subjected to such exceedingly severe punishment that others will without doubt be corrected by the nature of your amendment. PART VIII. GRATIAN. Not only is incautious familiarity with other women forbidden them, but they are even prohibited from dwelling with holy nuns. Hence it is read in the Seventh Synod, [c. 20]:

> C. XX. Neque conmatres sibi facere, neque ad feminas accedere monachis licet.
> Peruenit ad nos, quod in monasterio tuo passim mulieres ascendant et (quod est grauius) monachos tuos sibi conmatres facere, et ex hoc incautam cum eis conmunionem habere. Ne ergo hac occasione humani generis inimicus sua eos (quod absit) calliditate decipiat, ideo huius te precepti serie conmonemus, ut neque mulieres in monasterio tuo deinceps qualibet occasione permittas ascendere, neque monachos tuos sibi conmatres facere. Nam si hoc denuo ad aures nostras quocumque modo peruenerit, sic te seuerissime noueris ultioni subdendum, ut emendationis tuae qualitate ceteri sine dubio corrigantur. VIII. Pars. Gratian. Non solum autem incauta familiaritas aliarum mulierum eis interdicitur, uerum etiam sancti monialium habitatione prohibentur. Unde in VII. Sinodo [c. 20.] legitur:

C. XXI. Monks are not permitted to live with nuns.

We decree that a double monastery is by no means to be made, because this becomes a scandal and stumbling block to many. But if any persons with their relatives wish to renounce the world and pursue the monastic life, the men ought to approach a monastery of men and the women to enter a monastery of women. For in this God is pleased. § 1. But those which until now have been double are to be ordered thus according to the rule and command of the holy Father Basil. Let monks and nuns not dwell in one monastery. For adultery intrudes upon cohabitation if a monk has access to a nun, or a nun to a monk, in secret for conversation. § 2. Let no monk sleep in a women's monastery or eat alone with a nun; and when the necessities of life are carried from the men's part to those under the rule, let the abbess of the women's monastery receive them outside the gate with a certain elderly nun. § 3. Moreover, if it shall happen that a monk wishes to see some female relative of his, let him converse with her in the abbess's presence in few and concise words and depart from her shortly.

> C. XXI. Cum sanctimonialibus monachis habitare non licet.
> Diffinimus minime duplex monasterium fieri, quia scandalum id et offendiculum multis efficitur. Si uero aliqui cum cognatis abrenunciare et monasticam uitam sectari uoluerint, debent uiri quidem uirorum adire cenobium, feminae uero mulierum ingredi monasterium. In hoc enim placatur Deus. §. 1. Que autem hactenus sunt dupla, secundum regulam sancti Patris Basilii et secundum preceptionem eius ita formentur. Non habitent in uno monasterio monachi et monachae. Adulterium enim intercipit cohabitationem, si habeat aditum monachus ad monacham, uel monacha ad monachum secreto ad collocutionem. §. 2. Non cubet monachus in muliebri monasterio, neque cum monacha singulariter conuiuetur; et quando necessaria uitae a uirorum parte ad regulares deferuntur, extra portam hec suscipiat abbatissa monasterii feminarum cum quadam uetula monacha. §. 3. Porro si contigerit, et aliquam propinquam suam uidere uoluerit monachus, in presentia abbatissae huic confabuletur per modica et conpendiosa uerba, et in breui ab ea discedat.

C. XXII. Let monks and nuns nowhere dwell together.

Likewise in Gregory's Register. We permit monks and nuns nowhere to dwell in one monastery, not even in those which are called double. And if there is any such monastery, let the religious bishop take care that the women remain in their own place, but compel the monks to build another monastery. But if there are many such monasteries, let the nuns be separated into some monasteries and the monks into others; and let the property which they hold in common be distributed to them according to the rights properly belonging to them.

> C. XXII. Monachi et monachae in nullo simul cohabitent loco.
> Item in Registro Gregorii. In nullo loco monachos et monachas permittimus in unum monasterium habitare, sed nec ea, que duplicia uocantur. Et si quod tale est, religiosus episcopus mulieres quidem in suo loco manere studeat, monachos autem aliud monasterium edificare cogat. Si autem plurima sint talia monasteria, separentur in aliis monasteriis monachae, et in aliis monachi; res autem, quas communes habent, secundum iura eis conpetentia distribuantur.

C. XXIII. Let monasteries of girls be situated farther away from a monastery of monks.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 28]. Let monasteries of girls be situated farther away from a monastery of monks, either because of the snares of the devil or because of the disparagement of men.

> C. XXIII. A monasterio monachorum longius constituantur monasteria puellarum.
> Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 28.] Monasteria puellarum longius a monasterio monachorum aut propter insidias diaboli, aut propter oblocutionem hominum collocentur.

C. XXIV. Let monasteries of girls be governed by the protection and administration of monks.

Likewise from the Second Council of Seville, [c. 11]. At the tenth proceeding we decreed by common consent that monasteries of virgins in the province of Baetica are to be governed by the administration and protection of monks. For we prove measures salutary for virgins dedicated to Christ when we choose spiritual fathers for them, by whose governance they can not only be protected but also be edified by their teaching—yet with this caution observed concerning the monks: that, removed from familiarity with them, they are not to have familiar permission to approach even as far as the vestibule. Nor will it be lawful for the abbot or the man placed over them to speak outside the presence of the woman who presides to Christ's virgins about anything that pertains to their instruction; nor ought they frequently to speak with the woman who presides alone, but under the witness of two or three sisters, in such a way that access is rare and conversation altogether brief. PART IX. GRATIAN. Nuns are also forbidden to have private dwellings. Hence Innocent II, [in the council held at Rome, cc. 26 and 27]:

> C. XXIV. Puellarum monasteria monachorum presidio et ministratione regantur.
> Item ex Concilio Spalensi. [II., c. 11.] In decima actione consensu communi decreuimus, ut monasteria uirginum in prouincia Bethica monachorum amministratione ac presidio gubernentur. Tunc enim salubria Christo dicatis uirginibus probamus, quando eis patres spirituales eligimus, quorum non solum gubernaculis tueri, sed etiam doctrinis edificari possint, ea tamen circa monachos cautela seruata, ut remoti ab earum familiaritate nec usque ad uestibulum habeant accedendi familiare permissum. Sed neque abbatem, uel eum, qui preficitur, extra eam, que preest, loqui uirginibus Christi aliquid, quod ad institutionem earum pertinet, licebit, nec cum ea sola, que preest, frequenter loqui eos oportet; sed sub testimonio duarum uel trium sororum, ita ut rara sit accessio, et breuis omnino locutio. IX. Pars.

Gratian. Prohibentur etiam sanctimoniales propria receptacula habere. Unde Innocentius II.: [in Concilio Romae habito, c. 26. et 27.]

C. XXV. Concerning the same matter.

We decree that the pernicious and detestable custom of certain women is to be abolished—women who, although they live neither according to the Rule of blessed Benedict nor that of Basil or Augustine, nevertheless desire commonly to be regarded as nuns. For although those living in monasteries according to the rule ought to be together in common in the church, refectory, and dormitory, they build private retreats and private dwellings for themselves, in which under the veil of hospitality they are in no way ashamed indiscriminately to receive guests who are less religious, contrary to sacred and good morals. Therefore, because everyone who does evil hates the light, and through this they, hidden within the tabernacle of the righteous, suppose that they can escape the eyes of the Judge who beholds all things, we forbid by every means and prohibit under penalty of anathema that this so dishonorable and detestable crime be done further. § 1. In a similar manner we forbid nuns to assemble together with canons and monks in one choir in the church for psalmody. PART X. GRATIAN. Likewise there are others whom bishops burden, while neglecting the salvation of their souls and desiring on any occasions to alienate the goods of monasteries. Such were certain clerics of the church of Ravenna who, with a pretense of religion, desired to be placed over monasteries without passing to the monastic habit or renouncing ecclesiastical service. Concerning them Gregory writes to John, Bishop of Ravenna, [book IV, letter 1]:

C. XXV. De eodem.

Perniciosam et detestabilem quarumdam consuetudinem mulierum (que licet neque secundum regulam B. Benedicti, neque Basilii, aut Augustini uiuant, sanctimoniales tamen uulgo censeri desiderant) aboleri decreuimus. Cum enim, iuxta regulam degentes in cenobiis, tam in ecclesia quam in refectorio atque dormitorio communiter esse debeant, propria sibi edificant receptacula et priuata domicilia, in quibus sub hospitalitatis uelamine passim hospites minus religiosos contra sacros et bonos mores suscipere nullatenus erubescunt. Quia ergo omnis, qui male agit, odit lucem, ac per hoc ipsae absconditae in iustorum tabernaculo opinantur se posse latere oculos iudicis cuncta conspicientis, hoc tam inhonestum detestandumque flagicium ne ulterius fiat omnibus modis prohibemus, et sub pena anathematis interdicimus. §. 1. Simili modo prohibemus, ne sanctimoniales simul cum canonicis et monachis in ecclesia in uno choro conueniant ad psallendum. X. Pars. Gratian. Item sunt alii, quos episcopi pregrauantes salutem ipsarum animarum negligunt, quibuslibet occasionibus bona monasteriorum distrahere cupiunt. Tales erant quidam clerici Rauennatis ecclesiae, qui simulata religione monasteriis cupiebant prefici, non transeuntes ad monachicum habitum, neque renunciantes ecclesiasticae miliciae. De quibus Gregorius scribit Iohanni Rauennati Episcopo: [lib. IV. epist. 1.]

C. XXVI. Monasteries ought not to become dwellings of clerics or laymen.

It has reached me that in the churches of your fraternity certain places long ago consecrated as monasteries have now become dwellings of clerics or even laymen; and while those who are in the churches pretend that they live religiously, they seek to be placed over monasteries, and by their life the monasteries are destroyed. For no one can in ecclesiastical offices, etc. And below: § 1. Therefore let your fraternity hasten to correct this wherever it has been done, because I shall by no means suffer sacred places to be destroyed for the ambition of clerics.

C. XXVI. Monasteria clericorum uel laicorum habitacula fieri non debent.

Peruenit ad me, quod in ecclesiis fraternitatis tuae aliqua loca dudum monasteriis consecrata nunc habitacula clericorum, aut etiam laicorum facta sunt; dumque hii, qui sunt in ecclesiis, fingunt se religiose uiuere, monasteriis preponi appetunt, et per eorum uitam monasteria destruuntur. Nemo enim potest ecclesiasticis offitiis etc. Et infra: §. 1. Proinde fraternitas tua hoc, quolibet in loco factum est, emendare festinet, quia ego nullo modo patiar, ut loca sacra pro clericorum ambitu destruantur.

C. XXVII. Let those constituted in sacred order have no power in monasteries.

The same to Marianus, Bishop of Ravenna, [book VI, letter 40]. Some time ago it had reached us through the report of many that monasteries situated in the regions of Ravenna were altogether burdened by the dominion of your clerics, such that on the occasion of governance they possess them —which is grievous to say—as though in ownership. Feeling no small grief for them, we sent letters to your predecessor that he ought to correct this. But because he was rather swiftly overtaken by the end of life, we recall that we wrote these same things to your fraternity so that this burden might not remain upon the monasteries. And because, as we have learned, correction of this matter has been neglected until now, upon hearing this we have again provided that writings be directed to you. Therefore we exhort you, with every delay and every excuse removed, to strive so to relieve those monasteries of a burden of this kind that henceforth no clerics, or those constituted in sacred order, may have license to approach them for any other reason—except only for the sake of exhortation—or unless perhaps they shall have been invited to perform the sacred mysteries of Masses. But lest because of the promotion of any monk or abbot, etc. And below: § 1. Let him have no further power there, lest monasteries under the veil of this occasion be compelled to sustain the burdens which we forbid. Therefore let your Holiness, now admonished a second time, not delay to correct all these things with vigilant care, lest, if after this we perceive that you are negligent—which we do not believe—we be compelled to provide for the quiet of the monasteries in another way. For let it be known to you that we shall not permit a congregation of God's servants to be subject to so great a necessity.

C. XXVII. Qui in sacro sunt ordine constituti in monasteriis nullam habeant potestatem.

Idem Mariano Episcopo Rauennae. [lib. VI. epist. 4o.] Dudum ad nos multorum relatione peruenerat, monasteria in Rauennatum partibus constituta omnino clericorum uestrorum dominio pregrauari, ita ut occasione regiminis ea quidem (quod dici graue est) uelud in proprietate possideant. Quibus non modicum condolentes predecessori uestro litteras misimus, ut hoc emendare debuisset. Sed quoniam uitae termino citius occupatus est, ne hoc onus monasteriis remaneat, fraternitati uestrae eadem nos scripsisse recolimus. Et quia, ut conperimus, in huius rei hactenus correctione cessatum est, hec audiens iterum preuidimus ad uos scripta dirigere. Hortamur ergo, ut omni mora omnique excusatione summota ita monasteria ipsa ab huiuscemodi studeatis grauamine releuare, quatinus nullam deinceps in eis clerici, uel, qui in sacro ordine sunt constituti, ob aliud (nisi hortandi tantummodo causa) accedendi habeant licentiam, aut si forte ad peragenda sacra missarum fuerint inuitati misteria. Sed ne pro cuiuslibet monachi aut abbatis promotione etc. Et infra: §. 1. Non illic ulterius habeat potestatem aliquam, ne monasteria huius occasionis uelamine ea, que prohibemus, sustinere onera conpellantur. Hec itaque omnia uigilanti cura emendare iam secundo conmonita sanctitas uestra non differat; ne, si post hec negligentes uos esse (quod non credimus) senserimus, aliter monasteriorum quieti prospicere conpellamur. Nam notum uobis sit, quia tantae necessitati seruorum Dei congregationem subiacere non patiemur.

C. XXVIII. A bishop may approach a monastery for the sake of visitation and exhortation.

The same, [to the same, book VII, indiction 1, letter 18]. PART XI. Let the bishop of the city approach the monastery for the sake of visitation and exhortation whenever it pleases him; but let the bishop fulfill the office of charity there in such a way that the monastery incurs no burden.

> C. XXVIII. Gratia uisitandi et exhortandi monasterium episcopus adire potest.
> Idem. [eidem, lib. VII. Indict. 1. epist. 18.] XI. Pars. Visitandi exhortandique gratia ad monasterium, quotiens placuerit, ab antistite ciuitatis accedatur; sed sic karitatis offitium illic inpleat episcopus, ut grauamen aliquod monasterium non incurrat.

C. XXIX. Let bishops visit monasteries frequently and correct the things which are to be corrected.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans. Let bishops visit monasteries of monks not once but more frequently in the year, and if anything shall need correction, let it be corrected. PART XII. GRATIAN. For persons of the kind who, having no care for souls, nevertheless desired to convert the goods of monasteries to their own uses, it was established that monasteries together with their property are to be entirely free from the power and dominion of bishops. But the statement that monasteries are subject to no canonical dues is not to be understood in such a way that nothing ought to be offered to the bishop in the name of a eulogia, either on the day of dedication or on the feast of the saints in whose name that monastery was dedicated. Hence Pope Pelagius says:

> C. XXIX. Frequenter episcopi monasteria uisitent, et que corrigenda sunt corrigant.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. Non semel, sed sepius in anno episcopi uisitent monasteria monachorum, et si quid corrigendum fuerit, corrigatur. XII. Pars. Gratian. Pro talibus, qui animarum curam non habentes, bona tamen monasteriorum in suos usus conuertere cupiebant, statutum est, ut monasteria cum suis rebus penitus sint libera a potestate et dominio episcoporum. Quod autem nullis canonicis iuribus dicuntur monasteria esse subiecta, non ita intelligendum est, quin ipsi episcopo aliquid nomine eulogiae, uel in die dedicationis, uel in natali sanctorum, quorum nomine ipsum monasterium dedicatum est, debeat offerri. Unde Pelagius Papa ait:

C. XXX. A bishop ought not to exact anything from a monastery beyond the conditions which he established at the time of dedication.

Our brother and fellow bishop Eleutherius complains that his mother constructed and dedicated an oratory on an estate called Castellum and established monks in that place, one of whom is a priest. He asserts that at the time of dedication it was agreed between Bishop Cardelus—to whose diocese it belongs—and his mother that whatever should enter through the offerings of the faithful on the day of the dedication or of the feast of the martyrs whose relics are in that monastery, the monastery itself should have half and the other half should be offered to the bishop. Contrary to that agreement, the priest Marius—whether the bishop knows it or does not know it—is said to have inflicted violence upon those monks or upon the priest who is one of them and frequently to cause disturbances, such that he nearly struck down the aforesaid priest and in no way permits him to celebrate Masses, saying that he ought to establish some payment as though in the name of a pension. Therefore we command you diligently to examine all these things; and if it shall be established before you by evident reasoning that at the time when that monastery was dedicated the conditions set forth above were agreed upon, we command by our authority that they be observed and that nothing further be exacted from there by anyone. But if no such thing shall be established, with you mediating, we will that it be defined between the monks themselves and the priest what ought to be offered to the bishop in the name of a eulogia—yet with this preserved: that the priest Gaudentius, who is also a monk, ought no longer to be prohibited by anyone from celebrating Masses in his monastery as he was accustomed.

> Eleutherius frater et coepiscopus noster queritur, quod mater eius in casa, que Castellum dicitur, oratorium construxisset ac dedicauerit, et in eodem loco monachos constituerit, ex quibus unus est presbiter. Hoc autem tempore dedicationis inter episcopum Cardelum (cuius ipsa diocesis est) et matrem suam asserit conuenisse, ut quicquid dedicationis uel natalis martirum die, quorum in eodem monasterio reliquiae sunt, per fidelium oblationes intrauerit, medietatem quidem habeat ipsum monasterium, medietas autem episcopo offeratur. Contra quam conuentionem Marium presbiterum (siue sciente siue nesciente episcopo) monachis ipsis, uel presbitero, qui ex eis est, uim dicitur intulisse, et frequenter molestias generare, ita ut memoratum presbiterum prope ceciderit, et missas eum facere nullo modo permittat, dicens, ut quasi pensionis nomine aliquid statuere debeat. Hec igitur omnia diligenter te examinare iubemus, et, si apud te euidenti ratione constiterit, quia tempore, quo dedicatum est ipsum monasterium, conditiones superius positae conuenerint, seruari eas ex nostra auctoritate precipimus, nec aliquid amplius exinde ab aliquo exigatur. Sin uero nil tale constiterit, mediante te quid ipsi episcopo nomine eulogiae offerri debeat inter ipsos monachos, et presbiterum uolumus diffiniri, saluo tamen eo, ut presbiter Gaudentius, qui etiam monachus est, missas in monasterio suo sicut consueuit facere a nullo ulterius debeat prohiberi.

C. XXXI. Let monasteries furnish customary services to bishops.

Likewise Urban II. We too concede the service which monasteries or their churches have rendered from the time of Gregory VII until the present time. GRATIAN. Therefore the canonical dues to which monasteries are not subject are understood to be synodal exactions. For an abbot is not to be compelled—as is established in the Council of Tours—to go to a synod unless some reasonable cause exists. There are also certain duties of servitude, such as forced labor, frequent receptions, annual exactions, and fines upon sinners, from all of which monasteries are free.

> C. XXXI. Consueta seruitia episcopis monasteria exhibeant.
> Item Urbanus II. Seruitium, quod monasteria aut eorum ecclesiae a tempore Gregorii VII. usque ad hoc tempus fecerunt, et nos concedimus. Gratian. Canonica ergo iura, quibus monasteria subiecta non sunt, sinodales exactiones intelliguntur. Non enim cogendus est abbas (sicut in Turonico concilio statuitur) ad sinodum ire, nisi aliqua rationabilis causa existat. Sunt etiam quedam seruitutis offitia, ut angariae operum, crebrae receptiones, annuae exactiones, mulctationes peccantium, a quibus omnibus monasteria libera sunt.

Causa XIX

GRATIAN. Two clerics wish to pass to a monastery; each sought permission from his bishop. One, having left his own church against the bishop's will, betook himself there; the other, having left a regular canonry, betook himself to a monastery. (Question I.) It is now asked whether a bishop ought to permit a cleric to enter a monastery after leaving his own church. (Question II.) Second, it is asked whether, if the bishop is unwilling to give permission, the cleric can go to a monastery against his will. (Question III.) Third, if it happened that they were regular canons, whether entrance into a monastery was to be conceded to them.

> GRATIANUS. Duo clerici ad monasterium transire uolunt; uterque licentiam ab episcopo suo petiit; unus relicta propria ecclesia eo inuito, alter dimissa regulari canonica cenobio se contulit. (Qu. I.) Modo queritur, si episcopus debeat permittere, ut relicta propria ecclesia clericus monasterium ingrediatur? (Qu. II.) Secundo queritur, si episcopus licentiam dare noluerit, an eo inuito monasterium possit adire? (Qu. III.) Tertio, si contigerit ipsos regulares canonicos fuisse, utrum concedendus esset eis monasterii ingressus?

Question I

GRATIAN. That a bishop ought to give clerics permission to go to a monastery is commanded in the [Fourth] Council of Toledo, in which it is read to have been established thus, [c. 49]:

> GRATIANUS. Quod episcopus licentiam clericis adeundi monasterium dare debeat, in Tolletano [IV.] Concilio precipitur, in quo [c. 49.] ita statutum legitur:

C. I. Entrance ought not to be denied to clerics who seek the purpose of monks.

Clerics who seek the purpose of monks—because they desire to follow a better life—ought to have free entrance into monasteries granted to them by the bishop.

> C. I. Non debet negari clericis ingressus, qui monachorum propositum appetunt.
> Clerici, qui monachorum propositum appetunt, (quia meliorem uitam sequi cupiunt,) liberos eis ab episcopo in monasteriis largiri oportet ingressus.

Question II

GRATIAN. But Bishop Leo testifies that no one is to receive another bishop's cleric against that bishop's will, writing to Rusticus, Bishop of Narbonne:

> GRATIANUS. Inuito uero episcopo clericum eius a nullo esse suscipiendum, Leo Episcopus testatur, scribens Rustico Narbonensi Episcopo:

C. I. Let no one receive another's cleric against his bishop's will.

Let no one receive another's cleric against his bishop's will. GRATIAN. But it is to be understood: unless he wishes to pass to the purpose of a better life. For then he is free to enter a monastery even when the bishop contradicts him. Hence Pope Urban II in the chapter of Saint-Ruf:

> C. I. Inuito episcopo eius clericum nemo suscipiat.
> Alienum clericum inuito episcopo ipsius nemo suscipiat. Gratian. Sed subaudiendum est, nisi ad propositum melioris uitae transire uoluerit. Tunc enim liberum est illi, etiam episcopo contradicente, monasterium ingredi. Unde Urbanus Papa [II.] in capitulo sancti Rufi:

C. II. One who seeks the purpose of monks is to be received even against the bishop's will.

There are, he says, two laws: one public and the other private. The public law is that which has been confirmed in writings by the holy Fathers, as is the law of the canons, which indeed was handed down because of transgressions. For example: it was decreed in the canons that a cleric ought not to pass from his own bishopric to another without commendatory letters from his bishop. This was established because of criminals, so that infamous persons might not be received by any bishop. For they were accustomed to celebrate their offices in another bishopric when they could not do so in their own, which has rightly been condemned by precepts and writings. § 1. But the private law is that which is written in the heart by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, as the Apostle says concerning certain persons: "Who have the law of God written in their hearts," and elsewhere: "When the gentiles do not have the law, if they naturally do the things that are of the law, they are a law to themselves." If any one of these retains a people in his church under a bishop and lives in a secular manner, but, breathed upon by the Holy Spirit, wishes to save himself in some monastery or regular canonry, because he is led by the private law no reason requires that he be constrained by the public law. For the private law is worthier than the public. Indeed, the Spirit of God is law, and those who are acted upon by the Spirit of God are led by the law of God; and who is there who can worthily resist the Holy Spirit? Therefore, whoever is led by this Spirit, even if his bishop contradicts him, may go free by our authority. For the law is not imposed upon the just, but where the Spirit of God is, there is liberty, and if you are led by the Spirit of God, you are not under the law.

> C. II. Qui monachorum propositum appetit, etiam inuito episcopo recipiendus est.
> Duae sunt, inquit, leges: una publica, altera priuata. Publica lex est, que a sanctis Patribus scriptis est confirmata, ut lex est canonum, que quidem propter transgressiones est tradita. Verbi gratia: Decretum est in canonibus, clericum non debere de suo episcopatu ad alium transire sine conmendatitiis litteris sui episcopi, quod propter criminosos constitutum est, ne uidelicet infames ab aliquo episcopo suscipiantur personae. Solebant enim offitia sua, cum non in suo episcopatu poterant, in alio celebrare, quod iure preceptis et scriptis detestatum est. §. 1. Lex uero priuata est, que instinctu S. Spiritus in corde scribitur, sicut de quibusdam dicit Apostolus: "Qui habent legem Dei scriptam in cordibus suis," et alibi: "Cum gentes legem non habeant, si naturaliter ea, que legis sunt, faciunt, ipsi sibi sunt lex." Si quis horum in ecclesia sua sub episcopo populum retinet, et seculariter uiuit, si afflatus Spiritu sancto in aliquo monasterio uel regulari canonica saluare se uoluerit, quia lege priuata ducitur, nulla ratio exigit, ut a publica lege constringatur. Dignior est enim lex priuata quam publica. Spiritus quidem Dei lex est, et qui Spiritu Dei aguntur lege Dei ducuntur; et quis est, qui possit sancto Spiritui digne resistere? Quisquis igitur hoc Spiritu ducitur, etiam episcopo suo contradicente, eat liber nostra auctoritate. Iusto enim lex non est posita, sed ubi Spiritus Dei, ibi libertas, et si Spiritu Dei ducimini, non estis sub lege.

Question III

GRATIAN. PART I. But regular canons are forbidden by many authorities to pass to a monastery. Hence it is read in the Council of Autun assembled under Gregory VII:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Canonicos autem regulares ad monasterium transire multis auctoritatibus prohibetur. Unde in Concilio Educensi, congregato sub VII. Gregorio legitur:

C. I. Regular canons ought not to become monks.

Let no abbot or monk dare to recall regular canons from the purpose of canonical profession and, drawing them to the monastic habit, receive them so that they become monks, so long as they shall have been able to find a church of their order in which, by living canonically, they can serve God and save their souls. But if they shall attempt to do this with rash daring, let them be bound by the bond of anathema.

> C. I. Regulares canonici monachi fieri non debent.
> Nullus abbas uel monachus canonicos regulares a proposito professionis canonicae reuocare, atque ad monasticum habitum trahendo suscipere audeat, ut monachi fiant, quamdiu ordinis sui ecclesiam inuenire quiuerint, in qua canonice uiuendo Deo seruire, et animam suam saluare possint. Quod si temerario ausu id agere temptauerint, anathematis uinculo obligentur.

C. II. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise Pope Urban II. We command and universally forbid any canon who has professed according to the rule to become a monk unless—which may it not be—he shall have fallen publicly. But if, presuming to act contrary to our decree, he shall attempt to do so, we command that he return to the canonical order, thereafter wear a memorial cowl, and remain last in the choir. GRATIAN. But it is to be understood: unless he assumes the purpose of religion with his father's permission. Hence Urban II writes to the Abbot of Saint-Ruf:

> C. II. De eodem.
>
> Item Urbanus Papa II. Mandamus et uniuersaliter interdicimus, ne quis canonicus regulariter professus, nisi (quod absit) publice lapsus fuerit, monachus efficiatur. Quod si decreto nostro contraire presumens agere temptauerit, ad ordinem canonicum precipimus ut redeat, et deinceps memorialem cucullam deferat, et ultimus in choro maneat. Gratian. Subaudiendum uero est, nisi cum patris sui licentia religionis propositum induerit. Unde Urbanus II. scribit Abbati sancti Rufi:

C. III. With their father's concession, regular canons can become monks.

We establish that no one of canonical profession, after in God's place he has placed a man over his own head, is to dare, at the prompting of any levity or under the pretext of a stricter religion, to depart from that cloister without the permission of his father and the whole congregation. But let no abbot, bishop, or monk receive one departing without a common guarantee of letters. PART II. GRATIAN. It is asked whether monasteries which have once been dedicated can pass into dwellings of clerics or secular persons. This is forbidden in every way in the Council of Chalcedon, c. 24:

> C. III. Patris sui concessione regulares canonici monachi possunt fieri.
