CONCORDANCE OF DISCORDANT CANONS, AND FIRST, ON NATURAL AND POSITIVE LAW

> CONCORDIA DISCORDANTIUM CANONUM AC PRIMUM DE IURE NATURAE ET CONSTITUTIONIS

Distinction I

GRATIAN. The human race is governed by two things, namely, natural law and customs. The law of nature is that which is contained in the Law and the Gospel, by which each person is commanded to do to another what he wishes to be done to himself, and is forbidden to inflict upon another what he would not wish to be done to himself. Hence Christ in the Gospel: "All things whatsoever you wish men to do to you, do you also the same to them. For this is the Law and the Prophets." Hence Isidore says in Book V of the Etymologies [c. 2]:

> DISTINCTIO PRIMA.
> GRATIANUS. Humanum genus duobus regitur, naturali uidelicet iure et moribus. Ius naturae est, quod in lege et euangelio continetur, quo quisque iubetur alii facere, quod sibi uult fieri, et prohibetur alii inferre, quod sibi nolit fieri. Unde Christus in euangelio: "Omnia quecunque uultis ut faciant uobis homines, et uos eadem facite illis. Haec est enim lex et prophetae." Hinc Ysidorus in V. libro Ethimologiarum [c. 2.] ait:

C. I. Divine laws stand by nature, human laws by customs.

All laws are either divine or human. Divine laws stand by nature, human laws by customs, and therefore these differ, since different laws please different nations. §1. Fas is divine law; ius is human law. To pass through another's field is permitted by divine law, but is not permitted by human law.

GRATIAN. From the words of this authority it is plainly given to be understood in what divine and human law differ from one another, since everything that is permitted by divine law is understood under the name of divine or natural law, while under the name of human law are understood customs committed and handed down in juridical writing. §1. Ius, moreover, is a general term containing many species under itself. Hence Isidore says in the same book [Etymologies, c. 3]:

> C. I. Diuinae leges natura, humanae moribus constant.
> Omnes leges aut diuinae sunt, aut humanae. Diuinae natura, humanae moribus constant, ideoque he discrepant, quoniam aliae aliis gentibus placent. §. 1. Fas lex diuina est: ius lex humana. Transire per agrum alienum, fas est, ius non est. Gratianus. Ex uerbis huius auctoritatis euidenter datur intelligi, in quo differant inter se lex diuina et humana, cum omne quod fas est, nomine diuinae uel naturalis legis accipiatur, nomine uero legis humanae mores iure conscripti et traditi intelligantur. §. 1. Est autem ius generale nomen, multas sub se continens species. Unde in eodem libro [Etymolog. c. 3.] Ysidorus ait:

C. II. Ius is the genus; lex is a species of it.

Ius is a general term; lex, however, is a species of ius. Ius is so called because it is just. All ius, moreover, consists of laws and customs.

C. II. Ius genus, lex species eius est.

Ius generale nomen est; lex autem iuris est species. Ius autem est dictum, quia iustum est. Omne autem ius legibus et moribus constat.

C. III. What a law is.

[Isidore, same chapter 3.] A law is a written enactment.

C. III. Quid sit lex.

[Isidor. eod. cap. 3.] Lex est constitutio scripta

C. IV. What custom is.

[Isidore, same chapter 3 and Book II, c. 10.] Custom is a longstanding usage, drawn solely from customary practices.

C. IV. Quid sit mos.

[Isidor. eod. cap. 3. et lib. II. c. 10.] Mos autem est longa consuetudo, de moribus tracta tantumdem.

C. V. What customary usage is.

[Isidore, same chapter 3 and Book II, c. 10.] Customary usage is a certain law instituted by customs, which is received in place of law when law is lacking. §1. Nor does it matter whether it rests upon writing or upon reason, since reason also commends law. §2. Moreover, if law consists in reason, everything that rests upon reason will already be law, provided that it accords with religion, agrees with discipline, and conduces to salvation. §3. It is called customary usage because it is in common use.

GRATIAN. Therefore, when it is said, "it does not matter whether customary usage rests upon writing or upon reason," it appears that customary usage has in part been reduced to writing, and in part has been preserved only in the customs of those who use it. That which has been reduced to writing is called an enactment or law; that which has not been reduced to writing is called by the general name, namely, customary usage. §1. There is also another division of law, as Isidore attests in the same book [V, c. 4], saying thus:

C. V. Quid sit consuetudo.

[Isidor. eod. cap. 3. et lib. II. c. 10.] Consuetudo autem est ius quoddam moribus institutum, quod pro lege suscipitur, cum deficit lex. §. 1. Nec differt, an scriptura, an ratione consistat, quoniam et legem ratio commendat. §. 2. Porro si ratione lex constat, lex erit omne, iam quod ratione constiterit, dumtaxat quod religioni congruat, quod disciplinae conueniat, quod saluti proficiat. §. 3. Vocatur autem consuetudo, quia in communi est usu. Gratianus. Cum itaque dicitur: "non differt, utrum consuetudo scriptura, uel ratione consistat," apparet, quod consuetudo partim est redacta in scriptis, partim moribus tantum utentium est reseruata. Quae in scriptis redacta est, constitutio siue ius uocatur; quae uero in scriptis redacta non est, generali nomine, consuetudo uidelicet, appellatur. §. 1. Est et alia diuisio iuris, ut in eodem libro [V. c. 4.] testatur Ysidorus ita dicens:

C. VI. What the species of law are.

[Isidore, same chapter 4.] Law is either natural, civil, or of nations.

C. VI. Que sint species iuris.

> [Isidor. eod. c. 4.] Ius aut naturale est, aut ciuile, aut gentium.

C. VII. What natural law is.

[Isidore, same chapter 4.] Natural law is common to all nations, because it is held everywhere by the instinct of nature, not by any enactment, such as the union of man and woman, the succession and upbringing of children, the common possession of all things and the one liberty of all, the acquisition of those things that are taken from the sky, the earth, and the sea; likewise the restoration of a thing deposited or of money entrusted, and the repelling of violence by force. §1. For this, or anything similar to it, is never held to be unjust, but natural and equitable.

> C. VII. Quid sit ius naturale.
> [Isidor. eod. c. 4.] Ius naturale est commune omnium nationum, eo quod ubique instinctu naturae, non constitutione aliqua habetur, ut uiri et feminae coniunctio, liberorum successio et educatio, communis omnium possessio et omnium una libertas, acquisitio eorum, quae celo, terra marique capiuntur; item depositae rei uel commendatae pecuniae restitutio, uiolentiae per uim repulsio. §. 1. Nam hoc, aut si quid huic simile est, numquam iniustum, sed naturale equumque habetur.

C. VIII. What civil law is.

> C. VIII. Quid sit ius ciuile.
> [Isidor. eod. c. 5.] Ius ciuile est, quod quisque populus uel ciuitas sibi proprium diuina humanaque causa constituit.

C. IX. What the law of nations is.

[Isidore, same chapter 6.] The law of nations concerns the occupation of sites, building, fortification, wars, captivities, servitudes, rights of return, treaties of peace, truces, the religious obligation not to violate envoys, and marriages prohibited between foreigners. §1. This is accordingly called the law of nations, because almost all nations use this law.

> C. IX. Quid sit ius gentium.
> [Isidor. eod. c. 6.] Ius gentium est sedium occupatio, edificatio, munitio, bella, captiuitates, seruitutes, postliminia, federa pacis, induciae, legatorum non uiolandorum religio, conubia inter alienigenas prohibita. §. 1. Hoc inde ius gentium appellatur, quia eo iure omnes fere gentes utuntur.

C. X. What military law is.

[Isidore, same chapter 7.] Military law concerns the formalities of making war, the obligation of making a treaty, the advance against the enemy or the engagement when the signal has been given; likewise the retreat when the signal has been given; likewise the punishment of a military offense if a position is deserted; likewise the measure of stipends, the grades of dignities, and the honor of rewards, as when a crown or torque is bestowed; likewise the adjudication of booty, its just division according to the qualities and labors of persons, and the prince's share.

> C. X. Quid sit ius militare.

[Isidor. eod. c. 7.] Ius militare est belli inferendi solempnitates, federis faciendi nexus, signo dato egressio in hostem uel commissio; item signo dato receptio; item flagitii militaris disciplina, si locus deseratur; item stipendiorum modus, dignitatum gradus, premiorum honor, ueluti cum corona uel torques donantur; item predae decisio, et pro personarum qualitatibus et laboribus iusta diuisio, ac principis porcio.

C. XI. What public law is.

[Isidore, same chapter 8.] Public law concerns sacred things, priests, and magistrates.

C. XI. Quid sit ius publicum.

[Isidor. eod. c. 8.] Ius publicum est in sacris et sacerdotibus et magistratibus.

C. XII. What the law of the Quirites is.

[Isidore, same chapter 9.] The law of the Quirites belongs properly to the Romans, and none possess it except the Quirites, that is, the Romans. §1. It treats of lawful inheritances, curatorships, guardianships, and acquisitions by prescription, which laws are found among no other people but are proper to the Romans and established for them alone.

C. XII. Quid sit ius Quiritum.

[Isidor. eod. c. 9.] Ius Quiritum est proprie Romanorum, quod nulli tenent, nisi Quirites, id est Romani. §. 1. In quo agitur de legitimis hereditatibus, de curationibus, de tutelis, de usucapionibus, quae iura apud nullum alium populum repperiuntur, sed propria sunt Romanorum, et in eos solos constituta.

Distinction II

GRATIAN. Part I. The law of the Quirites consists of statutes, plebiscites, senatorial decrees, enactments of princes, edicts, or the opinions of jurists.

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Constat autem ius Quiritum ex legibus et plebisscitis et senatusconsultis et constitutionibus principum et edictis siue prudentum responsis.

C. I. What a statute is.

[Isidore, Etymologies, Book V, c. 10, and Book II, c. 10.] A statute is an enactment of the people by which the elders, together with the commons, sanctioned something.

C. I. Quid sit lex.

[Isidor. Etym. lib. V. c. 10. et l. II. c. 10.] Lex est constitutio populi, qua maiores natu simul cum plebibus aliquid sanxerunt.

C. II. What a plebiscite is.

[Isidore, same chapter 11.] Plebiscites are those things which the commons alone establish; and they are called plebiscites because the commons know them, or because they vote upon and request that they be done.

C. II. Quid plebisscitum.

[Isidor. eod. c. 11.] Plebisscita sunt, quae plebes tantum constituunt: et uocantur plebisscita, quod ea plebs sciat, uel quod sciscitatur et rogat, ut fiat.

C. III. What a senatorial decree is.

[Isidore, same chapter 12.] A senatorial decree is that which the senators alone determine in taking counsel for the peoples.

> C. III. Quid senatusconsultum.
> [Isidor. eod. c. 12.] Senatusconsultum est, quod tantum senatores populis consulendo decernunt.

C. IV. What an enactment or edict is.

[Isidore, same chapter 13.] An enactment or edict is that which a king or emperor establishes or publishes.

> C. IV. Quid constitutio uel edictum.
> [Isidor. eod. c. 13.] Constitutio uel edictum est, quod rex uel imperator constituit uel edidit.

C. V. What the opinions of jurists are.

[Isidore, same chapter 14.] The opinions of jurists are those which legal experts are said to give in answer to those consulting them; whence the Opinions of Paul are so called. For there were certain learned men and arbiters of equity who published composed institutes of civil law by which they might quiet the disputes and contentions of those at variance.

> C. V. Que sint responsa prudentum.
> [Isidor. eod. c. 14.] Responsa prudentum sunt que iurisconsulti respondere dicuntur consulentibus: unde responsa Pauli dicta sunt. Fuerunt enim quidam prudentes et arbitri equitatis, qui institutiones ciuilis iuris compositas ediderunt, quibus dissidentium lites contentionesque sopirent.

C. VI. What tribunician or consular laws are.

[Isidore, same chapter 15.] Part II. Certain laws are also named after those who established them, as consular, tribunician, Julian, and Cornelian laws. For under Caesar Octavian, the suffect consuls Papius and Pompeius enacted a law that is called the Papian-Pompeian law from their names, containing rewards for fathers for begetting children. Under the same emperor, Falcidius, tribune of the commons, also made a law that no one should bequeath more by testament to strangers than would leave a fourth part for the heirs; from his name it is called the Falcidian law.

> C. VI. Que sint tribuniciae leges uel consulares.
> [Isidor. eod. c. 15.] II. Pars. Quedam etiam leges dicuntur ab his, qui condiderunt, ut consulares, tribuniciae, Iuliae, Corneliae. Nam et sub Octauiano Cesare suffecti consules Papius et Pompeius legem tulerunt, que a nominibus eorum appellatur Papia Pompeia, continens patrum premia pro suscipiendis liberis. Sub eodem quoque imperatore Falcidius tribunus plebis legem fecit, ne quis plus extraneis testamento legaret, quam ut quarta pars superesset heredibus, ex cuius nomine lex Falcidia nominata est.

C. VII. What a lex satura is.

[Isidore, same chapter 16.] A lex satura is a law that speaks of several matters at the same time, named from the abundance of matters and, as it were, from fullness; whence to write satire is also to compose varied poems, as did Horace, Juvenal, and Persius.

C. VII. Quid sit lex satyra.

[Isidor. eod. c. 16.] Satyra uero lex est, que de pluribus simul rebus eloquitur, dicta a copia rerum et quasi a saturitate: unde et satyram scribere est poemata uaria condere, ut Oratii, Iuuenalis et Persii.

C. VIII. What the Rhodian laws are.

[Isidore, same chapter 17.] The Rhodian laws concern maritime commerce and are named after the island of Rhodes, where in antiquity there was a practice of merchants.

C. VIII. Que sint Rodiae leges.

Distinction III

GRATIAN. Part I. All these species are parts of secular laws. But since an enactment is either civil or ecclesiastical, and the civil enactment is called forensic or civil law, let us see by what name an ecclesiastical enactment is called. §1. An ecclesiastical enactment is designated by the name "canon." Isidore explains what a canon is in Book VI of the Etymologies [c. 16], saying:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Omnes he species secularium legum partes sunt. Sed quia constitutio alia est ciuilis, alia ecclesiastica: ciuilis uero forense uel ciuile ius appellatur, quo nomine ecclesiastica constitutio appellatur, uideamus. §. 1. Ecclesiastica constitutio nomine canonis censetur. Quid autem canon sit Ysidorus in libro VI. Ethimologiarum [c. 16.] declarat dicens:

C. I. What a canon is.

Canon in Greek is called regula in Latin.

C. I. Quid sit canon.

Canon grece, latine regula nuncupatur.

C. II. Whence "rule" is so called.

[Isidore, same chapter 16.] A rule is so called because it directs rightly and never draws elsewhere. Others have said that a rule is so called either because it governs, or because it provides a norm of right living, or because it corrects what is distorted and depraved.

Part II. GRATIAN. Furthermore, some canons are decrees of pontiffs, while others are statutes of councils. Of councils, some are universal and others provincial. Of provincial councils, some are celebrated by the authority of the Roman Pontiff, namely with a legate of the holy Roman Church present; others, however, by the authority of the patriarchs, primates, or metropolitans of the same province. These things are to be understood concerning general rules. §1. There are also certain private laws, both ecclesiastical and secular, which are called privileges. Concerning these, Isidore says in Book V of the Etymologies [c. 18]:

C. II. Unde regula dicatur.

[Isidor. eod. c. 16.] Regula dicta est eo quod recte ducit, nec aliquando aliorsum trahit. Alii dixerunt regulam dictam, uel quod regat, uel normam recte uiuendi prebeat, uel quod distortum prauumque est corrigat. II. Pars. Gratian. Porro canonum alii sunt decreta Pontificum, alii statuta conciliorum.

> Conciliorum uero alia sunt uniuersalia, alia prouincialia. Prouincialium alia celebrantur auctoritate Romani Pontificis, presente uidelicet legato sanctae Romanae ecclesiae; alia uero auctoritate patriarcharum, uel primatum, uel metropolitanorum eiusdem prouinciae. Hec quidem de generalibus regulis intelligenda sunt. §. 1. Sunt autem quedam priuatae leges, tam ecclesiasticae quam seculares, que priuilegia appellantur. De quibus in V. libro Ethimologiarum [cap. 18.] Ysidorus ait:

C. III. What a privilege is.

Privileges are laws concerning private persons, as though private laws. For a privilege is so called because it is enacted concerning a private person.

Part III. GRATIAN. The function of secular or ecclesiastical laws is to command what it is necessary to do, to prohibit what it is evil to do, and to permit either lawful things, such as seeking a reward, or certain unlawful things, such as giving a bill of repudiation, lest worse things be done. Hence Isidore writes in the same book [c. 19], saying:

> C. III. Quid sit priuilegium.
> Priuilegia sunt leges priuatorum, quasi priuatae leges. Nam priuilegium inde dictum est, quod in priuato feratur. III. Pars. Gratianus. Officium uero secularium siue ecclesiasticarum legum est, precipere quod necesse est fieri, prohibere quod malum est fieri; permittere uel licita, ut premium petere, uel quedam illicita, ut dare libellum repudii, ne fiant grauiora. Unde in eodem libro [C. 19.] Ysidorus scribit dicens:

C. IV. What the function of laws is.

Every law either permits something, as: “Let a brave man seek a reward”; or forbids, as: “Let it be lawful for no one to seek marriage with consecrated virgins”; or punishes, as: “Let him who has committed a killing be punished capitally”—for human life is governed by its reward or punishment; or commands, as: “Love the Lord your God.”

> C. IV. Quid sit officium legum.

> Omnis autem lex aut permittit aliquid, ut: uir fortis petat premium; aut uetat, ut: sacrarum uirginum nuptias nulli petere liceat: aut punit, ut: qui cedem fecerit, capite plectatur; eius enim premio aut pena uita moderatur humana; aut precipit, ut: "Dilige Dominum Deum tuum."

Distinction IV

GRATIAN. Part I. The reason for the establishment of laws is to restrain human audacity and to curb the capacity for doing harm, as Isidore attests in the same book [V, c. 20], saying:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Causa uero constitutionis legum est humanam cohercere audaciam et nocendi facultatem refrenare, sicut in eodem libro [V. c. 20.] Ysidorus testatur dicens:

C. I. Why laws were made.

Laws were made so that human audacity might be restrained by fear of them, innocence might be safe among the wicked, and the capacity for doing harm in the wicked themselves might be curbed through fear of punishment.

Part II. GRATIAN. Moreover, in the very establishment of laws, the quality of those to be established must especially be observed, so that they contain honorable character, justice, possibility, suitability, and the other qualities that Isidore enumerates in the same book [c. 21], saying:

> C. I. Quare leges sint factae.
> Factae sunt autem leges, ut earum metu humana coherceatur audacia, tutaque sit inter improbos inocentia, et in ipsis improbis formidato supplicio refrenetur nocendi facultas. II. Pars. Gratianus. Preterea in ipsa constitutione legum maxime qualitas constituendarum est obseruanda, ut contineant in se honestatem, iustitiam, possibilitatem, conuenientiam et cetera, quae in eodem libro Ysidorus [c. 21.] enumerat dicens:

C. II. What a law ought to be like.

A law shall be honorable, just, possible, according to nature, according to the custom of the country, suitable to place and time, necessary, useful, and also manifest, lest through obscurity it contain something unsuitable; written for no private advantage, but for the common utility of the citizens.

Part III. GRATIAN. These things must be considered in the very establishment of a law because, once laws have been established, it will not be free to judge concerning them, but it will be necessary to judge according to them. Hence Augustine says in the book On True Religion [c. 31]:

> C. II. Qualis debeat esse lex.
> Erit autem lex honesta, iusta, possibilis, secundum naturam, secundum consuetudinem patriae, loco temporique conueniens, necessaria, utilis, manifesta quoque, ne aliquid per obscuritatem inconueniens contineat, nullo priuato commodo, sed pro communi utilitate ciuium conscripta. III. Pars. Gratian. Ideo autem in ipsa constitutione ista consideranda sunt, quia cum leges institutae fuerint, non erit liberum iudicare de ipsis, sed oportebit iudicare secundum ipsas. Unde Augustinus ait in libro de uera religione: [C. 31.]

C. III. Laws are to be judged when they are established, not after they have been established.

In the case of these temporal laws, although men judge concerning them when they establish them, nevertheless, once they have been established and confirmed, it will not be lawful for a judge to judge concerning them, but according to them.

GRATIAN. Laws are established when they are promulgated; they are confirmed when they are approved by the customs of those who use them. For just as some laws today have been abrogated by the contrary customs of those who use them, so the laws themselves are confirmed by the customs of those who use them. Hence that decree of Pope Telesphorus—by which he decreed that clerics generally fast from meat and delicacies from Quinquagesima—because it was not approved by the customs of those who use it, does not accuse those acting otherwise as guilty of transgression.

> C. III. De legibus tunc est iudicandum, cum instituuntur, non cum institutae fuerint.
> In istis temporalibus legibus, quamquam de his homines iudicent, cum eas instituunt, tamen cum fuerint institutae et firmatae, non licebit iudici de ipsis iudicare, sed secundum ipsas. Gratianus. Leges instituuntur, cum promulgantur, firmantur, cum moribus utentium approbantur. Sicut enim moribus utentium in contrarium nonnullae leges hodie abrogatae sunt, ita moribus utentium ipsae leges confirmantur. Unde illud Thelesphori Papae (quo decreuit, ut clerici generaliter a quinquagesima a carnibus et deliciis ieiunent) quia moribus utentium approbatum non est, aliter agentes transgressionis reos non arguit.

C. IV. Clerics are to abstain from meat and delicacies for seven weeks before Easter.

Telesphorus, Archbishop of the city of Rome, to all bishops [sole epistle]. We establish that for seven weeks before holy Easter all clerics called to the lot of the Lord shall fast from meat; for just as the life of clerics ought to be distinguished from the manner of life of laymen, so a distinction ought also to be made in fasting. Therefore, during these seven weeks, let all clerics fast from meat and delicacies, and let them strive to cleave by day and night to hymns, vigils, and prayers.

C. IV. Septem ebdomadibus a carne et deliciis ante pascha clerici abstineant.

Thelesphorus Romae urbis Archiepiscopus omnibus Episcopis. [epist. un.] Statuimus, ut septem ebdomadas ante sanctum pascha omnes clerici in sortem Domini uocati a carne ieiunent: quia sicut discreta debet esse uita clericorum a laicorum conuersatione, ita et in ieiunio debet fieri discretio. Has ergo septem ebdomadas omnes clerici a carne et deliciis ieiunent, et ymnis et uigiliis atque orationibus inherere die noctuque studeant.

C. V. Telesphorus adds a seventh week to Lent.

Likewise Ambrose, in the book of sermons. Lent has six weeks, to which the pontiff Telesphorus added a seventh week, and this period was called Quinquagesima.

GRATIAN. The same must be understood concerning that chapter which blessed Gregory [I] writes to Augustine, bishop of the English, saying:

C. V. Septimam ebdomadam Thelesphorus quadragesimae addit.

Item Ambrosius in libro sermonum. Quadragesima sex septimanas habet, cui addidit Thelesphorus Pontifex septimam ebdomadam, et uocatum est hoc tempus quinquagesima. Gratian. Quod similiter de eo capitulo est intelligendum, quod B. Gregorius [I.] Augustino Anglorum Episcopo scribit dicens:

C. VI. Those whom the dignity of ecclesiastical rank adorns are to undertake the resolve of fasting from Quinquagesima.

Finally, priests and deacons and the others whom the dignity of ecclesiastical rank adorns shall undertake the resolve of fasting from Quinquagesima, so that they may both add something to the measure of the holy institution and surpass the observance of those who remain in the lay order in religion just as they do in station. §1. We are, however, uncertain what is to be said concerning that very Sunday, since all laymen and secular persons on that day seek foods of meat more carefully and more than usual on other days, and unless with a certain novel greed they gorge themselves until midnight, they do not otherwise think themselves to undertake the observance of this sacred season. This is certainly to be ascribed not to reason but to pleasure, indeed to a certain blindness of mind, from which they cannot be turned away from such a custom. Therefore, they are to be left to their own disposition with pardon, lest perhaps they become worse if they are prohibited from such a custom. For, as Solomon says: “He who presses hard draws blood.” And a little later. §2. It is fitting that on those days on which we abstain from the flesh of animals, we should also fast from everything that draws its origin from the seed-producing substance of flesh, namely milk, cheese, and eggs. And a little later. §3. Moreover, the eating of fish is left to a Christian in such a manner that it may provide him the solace of infirmity, not the kindling of luxury. Finally, he who abstains from meat is by no means to prepare more costly banquets of sea creatures. §4. We are also permitted to drink wine in such a manner that we altogether flee drunkenness; otherwise it remains that we should similarly do everything that pleases the body.

Part IV. GRATIAN. Although these things were established by laws, nevertheless, because they have not been approved by common usage, they do not accuse as guilty of transgression those who do not observe them. Otherwise, those not obeying these rules would be deprived of their own honor, since those who do not know how to obey the sacred canons are commanded to be entirely deprived of the office they have received—unless perhaps someone should say that these things were established not by decreeing but were written by exhorting. A decree creates necessity, whereas an exhortation arouses free will.

> Denique sacerdotes et diaconi et reliqui, quos dignitas ecclesiastici gradus exornat, a quinquagesima propositum ieiunandi suscipiant, quo et aliquid ad pensum sanctae institutionis adiiciant, et eorum, qui in laicali ordine consistunt, obseruantiam sicut loco, ita religione precellant. §. 1. De ipsa uero die dominica hesitamus, quidnam dicendum sit, cum omnes laici et seculares illa die plus solito ceteris diebus accuratius cibos carnium appetant, et nisi noua quadam auiditate usque ad medias noctes se ingurgitent, non aliter se huius sacri temporis obseruationem suscipere putant; quod utique non rationi, sed uoluptati, imo cuidam mentis cecitati asscribendum est, unde nec a tali consuetudine auerti possunt; et ideo cum uenia suo ingenio relinquendi sunt, ne forte peiores existant, si a tali consuetudine prohibeantur. Ut enim ait Salomon: "Qui multum emungit, elicit sanguinem." Et post pauca. §. 2. Par autem est, ut quibus diebus a carne animalium abstinemus, ab omnibus quoque, quae sementiuam trahunt originem carnis, ieiunemus, a lacte uidelicet, caseo et ouis. Et post pauca. §. 3. Ceterum piscium esus ita Christiano relinquitur, ut ei infirmitatis solatium, non luxuriae pariat incendium. Denique qui a carne abstinet, nequaquam sumptuosiora marinarum beluarum conuiuia preparet. §. 4. Vinum quoque ita bibere permittimur, ut ebrietates omnino fugiamus; alioquin restat, ut omnia, quae corpori libent, similiter faciamus. IV. Pars. Gratianus. Hec etsi legibus constituta sunt, tamen quia communi usu approbata non sunt, se non obseruantes transgressionis reos non arguunt; alioquin his non obedientes proprio priuarentur honore, cum illi, qui sacris nesciunt obedire canonibus, penitus officio iubeantur carere suscepto; nisi forte quis dicat, hec non decernendo esse statuta, sed exhortando conscripta. Decretum uero necessitatem facit, exhortatio autem liberam uoluntatem excitat.

Distinction V

GRATIAN. Part I. These things that have been written concerning privileges and the other matters placed below agree with both secular and ecclesiastical laws. Let us now return to the difference between natural law and the others. §1. Natural law holds primacy among all laws both in time and in dignity. For it began from the origin of the rational creature, and it does not vary with time, but remains immutable. §2. But since natural law is said above to be comprehended in the Law and the Gospel, while certain things contrary to those established in the Law are now found to be permitted, natural law does not appear to remain immutable. For in the Law it was commanded “that if a woman bore a male, she should abstain from entering the temple for forty days, but if a female, for eighty days”; now, however, she is not prohibited from entering a church immediately after childbirth. Likewise, a woman who was undergoing menstruation was accounted unclean under the Law; now, however, she is not prohibited either from entering a church or from receiving the mysteries of holy communion, just as neither the woman who gives birth nor that which is born is prohibited from being baptized immediately after childbirth. Hence Gregory [I] writes to the same Augustine, saying:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Hec, que de priuilegiis et ceteris infra positis scripta sunt, tam secularibus quam ecclesiasticis legibus conueniunt. Nunc ad differentiam naturalis iuris et ceterorum reuertamur. §. 1. Naturale ius inter omnia primatum obtinet et tempore et dignitate. Cepit enim ab exordio rationalis creaturae, nec uariatur tempore, sed immutabile permanet. §. 2. Sed cum naturale ius lege et euangelio supra dicatur esse comprehensum, quedam autem contraria his, que in lege statuta sunt, nunc inueniantur concessa, non uidetur ius naturale immutabile permanere. In lege namque precipiebatur: "ut mulier si masculum pareret, quadraginta, si uero feminam, octuaginta diebus a templi cessaret ingressu;" nunc autem statim post partum ecclesiam ingredi non prohibetur. Item mulier, que menstrua patitur, ex lege immunda reputabatur; nunc autem nec, ecclesiam intrare nec sacrae communionis misteria percipere, sicut illa, que parit, uel illud, quod gignitur, nec statim post partum baptizari prohibetur. Unde eidem Augustino Gregorius [I.] scribit, dicens:

[C. I. PALEA.

You have learned from the precept of the Old Testament after how many days a woman who has given birth ought to enter a church: because she ought to abstain for thirty-three days for a male, but for sixty-six days for a female. It must nevertheless be known that this is understood mystically.]

> [C. I. PALEA.
> Cum enixa fuerit mulier, post quot dies intrare ecclesiam debeat, testamenti ueteris preceptione didicisti: quia pro masculo XXXIII., pro femina uero LXVI. diebus debet abstinere; quod tamen sciendum, quia in misterio accipitur.]

C. II. A woman is not prohibited from entering a church to give thanks in the very hour in which she has given birth.

[Gregory, continuing in the same place.] If a woman enters a church to give thanks in the same hour in which she has given birth, she is burdened by no weight of sin; for the pleasure of the flesh, not its pain, is at fault. There is pleasure in the commingling of flesh, but groaning in the birth of offspring. Hence it is said to the first woman herself: “In pains you shall give birth.” Therefore, if we prohibit a woman who has given birth from entering a church, we turn her very punishment into a fault.

> C. II. Mulier in ipsa qua genuerit hora gratias actura ecclesiam intrare non prohibetur.
> [Gregorius ibidem continenter.] Si mulier eadem hora, qua genuerit, actura gratias intrat ecclesiam, nullo pondere peccati grauatur; uoluptas etenim carnis, non dolor in culpa est. In carnis autem commixtione uoluptas est, in partu uero prolis gemitus. Unde ipsi primae mulieri dicitur: "In doloribus paries." Si itaque enixam mulierem prohibemus intrare ecclesiam, ipsam ei penam in culpam uertimus.

C. III. Nothing prohibits a woman who has given birth, or that which has been born from her, from being baptized in the same hour.

Likewise. [The same to the same.] A woman who has given birth, or that which she has borne, is in no way prohibited from being baptized if danger of death presses, either in the very hour in which she gives birth or in that in which what is born is brought forth, lest, while time is still being sought to furnish the mystery of redemption, through the intervention of a slight delay there can no longer be found one who may be redeemed.

C. III. Mulierem enixam, uel quod ab ea genitum fuerit, eadem hora nihil prohibet baptizari.

Item. [Idem ad eundem.] Baptizari autem uel enixam mulierem, uel hoc, quod genuerit, si periculo mortis urgetur, uel ipsa hora eadem, qua gignit uel, eadem, qua natum est id quod gignitur, nullo modo prohibetur: ne, dum adhuc tempus ad prebendum redemtionis misterium queritur, interueniente paululum mora, inueniri non ualeat, qui redimatur.

C. IV. A husband is not to approach intercourse with her before the child is weaned or the mother purified.

Likewise. [Gregory, continuing in the same place.] Her husband ought not to approach intercourse with her until the child who is born is weaned. [PALEA. A depraved custom has arisen in the conduct of married persons, however, whereby women disdain to nurse the children whom they bear and hand them over to other women to be nursed. This plainly appears to have been devised from the sole cause of incontinence, because while they are unwilling to contain themselves, they disdain to suckle those whom they bear.] But if, from depraved custom, they hand their children over to others to be nursed, they ought not to be joined to their husbands unless the period of purification has passed; indeed, even apart from the cause of childbirth, when they are detained in their customary menstruation they are prohibited from joining themselves to their husbands, so that the sacred Law strikes with death if any man approaches a menstruating woman. §1. Yet a woman cannot be prohibited from entering a church while she undergoes her customary menstruation, because an excess of nature ought not to be reckoned to her as a fault, and it is unjust that she be deprived of entry into a church on account of that which she suffers unwillingly. For we know that the woman who suffered a flow of blood, humbly coming behind the Lord, touched the fringe of his garment, and immediately her infirmity departed from her. Therefore, if she who was placed in a flow of blood could laudably touch the Lord's garment, why should it not be lawful for a woman who suffers the menstruation of blood to enter a church? For if she did well to presume to touch the Lord's garment while placed in infirmity, why should what is granted to one infirm person not be granted to all women who are afflicted by the defect of their nature? §2. Nor ought she to be prohibited from receiving the mystery of holy communion on those days. If, however, from great reverence she does not presume to receive it, she is to be praised; but if she receives it, she is not to be judged. For it belongs to good minds to acknowledge their faults even where there is no fault, because often that which proceeds from fault is done without fault. Hence, even when we hunger, we eat without fault, though it came about from the fault of the first man that we hunger.

C. IV. Antequam puer ablactetur, uel mater purificetur, ad eius concubitum uir non accedat.

Item. [Gregor. ibid. continenter.] Ad eius uero concubitum uir suus accedere non debet, quousque qui gignitur ablactetur. [PALEA. Praua autem in coniugatorum moribus consuetudo surrexit, ut mulieres filios quos gignunt, nutrire contemnant, eosque aliis mulieribus ad nutriendum tradant; quod uidelicet ex sola causa incontinentiae uidetur inuentum, quia dum se continere nolunt, despiciunt lactare quos gignunt.] Si autem filios suos ex praua consuetudine aliis ad nutriendum tradunt, nisi purgationis tempus transierit, uiris suis non debent admisceri: quippe et sine partus causa cum in menstruis consuetis detinentur, uiris suis misceri prohibentur, ita ut morte lex sacra feriat, si quis uir ad menstruam mulierem accedat. §. 1. Que tamen mulier, dum consuetudinem menstruam patitur, prohiberi ecclesiam intrare non ualet, quia ei naturae superfluitas in culpam non debet reputari, et per hoc, quod inuita patitur, iniustum est, ut ecclesiae priuetur ingressu. Nouimus namque, quod mulier, que fluxum patiebatur, sanguinis post tergum Domini humiliter ueniens uestimenti eius fimbriam tetigit, atque ab ea statim infirmitas sua recessit. Si ergo in fluxu sanguinis posita laudabiliter potuit Domini uestimentum tangere, cur, que menstruam patitur sanguinis, ei non liceat ecclesiam intrare? Si enim ea bene presumsit, que uestimentum Domini in languore posita tetigit, quod uni personae infirmanti conceditur, cur non concedatur cunctis mulieribus, que naturae suae uitio infirmantur? §. 2. Sanctae autem communionis misterium in eisdem diebus percipere non debet prohiberi. Si autem ex ueneratione magna percipere non presumit, laudanda est; sed si perceperit, non est iudicanda. Bonarum quippe mentium est, etiam ibi culpas suas agnoscere, ubi culpa non est; quia sepe sine culpa agitur, quod uenit ex culpa. Unde etiam cum esurimus, sine culpa comedimus, quibus ex culpa primi hominis factum est, ut esuriamus.

Distinction VI

GRATIAN. Since discussion has begun concerning an excess of nature, it is asked whether, after the illusion that is accustomed to occur through a dream, anyone may receive the body of the Lord, or, if he is a priest, celebrate the sacred mysteries. Concerning these matters blessed Gregory [I] writes thus to Augustine, bishop of the English [response 11]:

GRATIANUS. Quia uero de naturae superfluitate sermo cepit haberi, queritur, an post illusionem, que per somnium accidere solet, corpus Domini quilibet accipere ualeat, uel si sacerdos sit, sacra misteria celebrare. De his ita scribit B. Gregorius [I.] Augustino Anglorum Episcopo: [resp. 11.]

C. I. On the manifold kind of nocturnal illusion.

The testament of the Old Law calls such a man polluted unless he has been washed with water, and does not permit him to enter a church until evening. Yet the spiritual people, understanding this otherwise, regards as though deceived through a dream the man who, having been tempted by uncleanness, is defiled in thought by true images. But he is to be washed with water, so that he may wash away the fault of thought with tears, and unless the fire of temptation has first receded, he should know himself to be guilty as though until evening. §1. But in that same illusion a discernment is very necessary by which he ought subtly to weigh from what cause it happens to the mind of the sleeper. For pollution sometimes occurs from surfeit, sometimes from an excess or infirmity of his nature, and sometimes from thought. §2. And indeed, when it has arisen from an excess or infirmity of nature, this illusion is by no means to be feared, because the mind is rather to be grieved for having unknowingly suffered it than for having done it. §3. But when the appetite of gluttony is carried beyond measure in taking food, and the receptacles of the humors are consequently burdened, the mind has some guilt from this, yet not so much as to prohibit receiving the sacred mystery or celebrating the solemnities of Masses, when perhaps either a feast day requires it or necessity itself compels him to furnish the ministry because another priest is lacking. For if others are present who are able to fulfill the ministry, an illusion caused by surfeit ought not to prohibit the reception of the sacred mystery, but he ought, as I judge, humbly to abstain from the immolation of the sacred mystery—provided, however, that it did not shake the sleeper with a shameful image. For there are some in whom the illusion commonly arises in such a way that their mind, even while situated in the sleep of the body, is not defiled by shameful images. In this matter one thing is shown: the mind itself is guilty, though it was not then free in its judgment, because, although it remembers having seen nothing while in the body of the sleeper, it nevertheless remembers having fallen into gluttony during the body's waking. §4. But if the illusion in the mind of the sleeper arises from the shameful thought of one awake, his guilt is evident to the mind. For he sees from what root that defilement proceeded, because what he knowingly thought, he unknowingly suffered. [PALEA.

> Testamentum ueteris legis hunc pollutum dicit, nisi aqua lotus fuerit, eique usque ad uesperam intrare ecclesiam non conceditur. Quod tamen aliter populus spiritualis intelligens quasi per somnium eum illudi reputat, qui temptatus immundicia ueris imaginibus in cogitatione inquinatur. Sed lauandus est aqua, ut culpam cogitationis lacrimis abluat, et nisi prius ignis tentationis recesserit, reum se quasi usque ad uesperum cognoscat. §. 1. Sed est in eidem illusione necessaria ualde discretio, qua subtiliter pensare debeat, ex qua re accidat menti dormientis. Aliquando enim ex crapula, aliquando ex naturae suae superfluitate aut infirmitate, aliquando ex cogitatione contingit pollutio. §. 2. Et quidem cum ex naturae superfluitate uel infirmitate euenerit, omnimodo hec illusio non est timenda, quia hanc animus nesciens pertulisse magis dolendus est, quam fecisse. §. 3. Cum uero ultra modum appetitus gulae in sumendis alimentis rapitur, atque idcirco humorum receptacula grauantur, habet exinde animus aliquem reatum, non tamen usque ad prohibitionem sacri misterii percipiendi, uel missarum sollempnia celebrandi, cum fortasse aut dies festus exigit, aut exhibere ministerium pro eo, quod sacerdos alius deest, ipsa necessitas compellit. Nam si adsunt alii, qui implere ministerium ualeant, illusio per crapulam facta a perceptione sacri misterii prohibere non debet, sed ab immolatione sacri misterii, ut arbitror, abstinere debet humiliter, si tamen dormientem turpi imaginatione non concusserit. Nam sunt, quibus ita plerumque illusio nascitur, ut eorum animus etiam in somno corporis positus turpibus imaginationibus non fedetur. Qua in re unum ibi ostenditur, ipsa mens rea non tunc, uel in suo iudicio libera cum se etsi in dormientis corpore nihil meminit uidisse, tamen in uigiliis corporis meminit se in ingluuiem cecidisse. §. 4. Sin uero ex turpi cogitatione uigilantis oritur illusio in mente dormientis, patet animo reatus suus. Videt enim, a qua radice inquinatio illa processerit, quia quod cogitauit sciens, hoc pertulit nesciens. [PALEA.

C. II. A sin is not said to be perpetrated by thought alone, but by delight and consent.

But it must be considered whether the thought itself occurred in suggestion, in delight, or—which is greater—in consent to the sin. For every sin is completed in three ways, namely, by suggestion, delight, and consent: suggestion is made through the devil, delight through the flesh, and consent through the spirit; for first the serpent suggested the fault, Eve was delighted as the flesh, and Adam consented as the spirit. §1. And great discernment is necessary, so that the mind, as judge of itself, may preside between suggestion, delight, and consent. For when the malignant spirit suggests sin in the mind, if no delight in the sin follows, the sin has by no means been perpetrated; but when the flesh begins to be delighted, then the sin begins to be born; and if it also descends from deliberation into consent, then the sin is known to be completed. Therefore, in suggestion is the seed of sin, in delight nourishment is given, and in consent there is completion. §2. And it often happens that what the malignant spirit sows in thought, the flesh draws into delight, yet the mind does not consent to that delight. And although the flesh cannot be delighted without the soul, the mind itself, resisting the pleasures of the flesh, is nevertheless in some way unwillingly bound in carnal delight, so that it contradicts it by reason and does not consent, and yet is bound by delight, but groans vehemently that it is bound. Hence that foremost soldier of the heavenly army groaned, saying: "I see another law in my members fighting against the law of my mind and leading me captive in the law of sin that is in my members." But if he was captive, he did not fight back at all; therefore he was both captive and fought back. Thus the law that is in his members fought against the law of his mind; but if he fought back, he was not captive. Behold, therefore, the man is, so to speak, captive and free: free by the justice that he loves; captive by the delight that he unwillingly bears.]

C. II. Peccatum non dicitur perpetratum cogitatione solum, sed delectatione et consensu.

Sed pensandum est, ipsa cogitatio utrum in suggestione, in delectatione, uel (quod maius est) peccati consensu acciderit. Tribus enim modis impletur omne peccatum, uidelicet suggestione, delectatione, consensu: suggestio quippe fit per diabolum, delectatio per carnem, consensus per spiritum; quia et primo culpam serpens suggessit, Eua uelut caro delectata est, Adam uelut spiritus consensit. §. 1. Et necessaria est magna discretio, ut inter suggestionem delectationem et consensum iudex sui animus presideat. Cum enim malignus spiritus peccatum suggerit in mente, si nulla peccati delectatio sequatur, peccatum omnimodo perpetratum non est; cum uero caro delectari ceperit, tunc peccatum incipit nasci; si autem etiam ad consensionem ex deliberatione descendit, tunc peccatum cognoscitur perfici. In suggestione igitur peccati semen est, in delectatione fit nutrimentum, in consensu perfectio. §. 2. Et sepe contingit, ut hoc, quod malignus spiritus seminat in cogitatione, caro in delectationem trahat, nec tamen animus eidem delectationi consentiat. Et cum caro sine anima delectari nequeat, ipse tamen animus carnis uoluptatibus reluctans in delectatione carnali aliquo modo ligatur inuitus, ut ei ex ratione contradicat, nec consentiat, et tamen delectatione ligatus sit, sed ligatum se uehementer ingemiscat. Unde et ille celestis exercitus precipuus miles gemebat dicens: "Video aliam legem in membris meis repugnantem legi mentis meae, et captiuum me ducentem in lege peccati que est in membris meis." Si autem captiuus erat, minime repugnabat: quapropter et captiuus erat, et repugnabat. Igitur legi mentis eius lex, que in membris est, repugnabat; si autem repugnabat, captiuus non erat. Ecce itaque homo est (ut ita dixerim) captiuus, et liber: liber ex iustitia, quam diligit; captiuus ex delectatione, quam portat inuitus.]

C. III. When it is a sin to be deceived by nocturnal images.

Likewise Isidore in the book of Sentences [Book III, Sentences on the Supreme Good, c. 6, nos. 13–14]. It is not a sin when we are unwillingly deceived by nocturnal images; but it is then a sin if, before we are deceived, we are anticipated by inclinations of thought. For images of lust that we have enacted in reality often appear in the mind while we sleep, but they are harmless if they do not occur through concupiscence. §1. Likewise: He who is polluted by a nocturnal illusion, although apart from the recollection of shameful thoughts he perceives himself to be defiled, should nevertheless attribute it to his own fault that he was tempted, and should at once wipe away his uncleanness with tears.

GRATIAN. These matters are answered thus. Natural law is contained in the Law and the Gospel; nevertheless, not everything found in the Law and the Gospel is shown to belong to natural law. For in the Law some things are moral, such as "You shall not kill," and the rest; some are mystical, such as the precepts concerning sacrifices and other things similar to them. Moral commandments belong to natural law and are therefore shown to have received no mutability. Mystical commandments, according to the surface meaning, are shown to be foreign to natural law; according to their moral understanding, however, they are found to be joined to it. And by this, although they appear to have been changed according to the surface meaning, nevertheless according to their moral understanding they are shown to know no mutability. §1. Natural law, therefore, beginning from the origin of the rational creature, as was said above, remains immovable. The law of custom, however, took its origin after natural law, from the time when men, coming together in one place, began to dwell together. This is believed to have occurred from the time when Cain is read to have built a city. Although this appears almost to have been extinguished in the flood because of the scarcity of men, afterward it is judged to have been restored, or rather altered, from the time of Nimrod, when he, together with others, began to oppress other men, and others through their weakness began to be subject to their dominion. Hence it is read concerning him: "Nimrod began to be a mighty hunter before the Lord," that is, an oppressor and destroyer of men, whom he enticed to build the tower.

> C. III. Quando sit peccatum nocturnis imaginibus illudi.
> Item Ysidorus Sententiarum libro. [Lib. III. Sent. de summo bono, cap. 6. (no. 13. 14.)] Non est peccatum, quando nolentes imaginibus nocturnis illudimur; sed tunc est peccatum, si, antequam illudamur, cogitationis affectibus preuenimur. Luxuriae quippe imagines, quas in ueritate gessimus, sepe dormientibus in animo apparent, sed innoxiae, si non concupiscendo occurrunt. §. 1. Item: Qui nocturna illusione polluitur, quamuis extra memoriam turpium cogitationum sese persentiat inquinatum, tamen hoc, ut tentaretur, culpae suae tribuat, suamque immunditiam statim fletibus tergat. Gratian. His ita respondetur. In lege et euangelio naturale ius continetur; non tamen quecunque in lege et euangelio inueniuntur, naturali iuri coherere probantur. Sunt enim in lege quedam moralia, ut: non occides et cetera, quedam mistica, utpote sacrifitiorum precepta, et alia his similia. Moralia mandata ad naturale ius spectant atque ideo nullam mutabilitatem recepisse monstrantur. Mistica uero, quantum ad superficiem, a naturali iure probantur aliena, quantam ad moralem intelligentiam, inueniuntur sibi annexa; ac per hoc, etsi secundum superficiem uideantur esse mutata, tamen secundum moralem intelligentium mutabilitatem nescire probantur. §. 1. Naturale ergo ius ab exordio rationalis creaturae incipiens, ut supra dictum est, manet immobile. Ius uero consuetudinis post naturalem legem exordium habuit, ex quo homines conuenientes in unum ceperunt simul habitare; quod ex eo tempore factum creditur, ex quo Cain ciuitatem edificasse legitur, quod cum diluuio propter hominum raritatem fere uideatur exstinctum, postea postmodum a tempore Nemroth reparatum siue potius immutatum existimatur, cum ipse simul cum aliis alios cepit opprimere; alii sua imbecillitate eorum ditioni ceperunt esse subiecti, unde legitur de eo: "Cepit Nemroth esse robustus uenator coram Domino," id est hominum oppressor et exstinctor; quos ad turrim edificandam allexit.

Distinction VII

GRATIAN. Part I. Positive law began from the judgments that the Lord handed down to Moses, saying: "If you buy a Hebrew servant," etc. Hence Isidore says in Book V of the Etymologies [c. 1]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Ius autem constitutionis cepit a iustificationibus, quas Dominus tradidit Moisi dicens: "Si emeris seruum ebreum etc." Unde Ysidorus in libro V. Ethimologiarum [c. 1.] ait:

C. I. On the founders of laws.

Moses, of the Hebrew people, first of all men set forth the divine laws in sacred writings. King Phoroneus first established laws and judgments for the Greeks. Mercury Trismegistus first handed down laws to the Egyptians. Solon first published laws for the Athenians. Lycurgus first devised laws for the Lacedaemonians by the authority of Apollo. Numa Pompilius, who succeeded Romulus in the kingdom, first published laws for the Romans. Then, when the people could not endure seditious magistrates, they created decemvirs to write the laws; these set out on twelve tables laws translated into Latin from the books of Solon.

C. I. De conditoribus legum.

Moises gentis Hebreae primus omnium diuinas leges sacris literis explicauit. Foroneus rex Grecis primus leges iudiciaque constituit. Mercurius Trismegistus primus leges Egiptiis tradidit. Solon primus leges Atheniensibus edidit. Licurgus primus Lacedemoniis iura ex Apollinis auctoritate confinxit. Numa Pompilius, qui Romulo successit in regno, primus leges Romanis edidit. Deinde cum populus seditiosos magistratus ferre non posset, decemuiros legibus scribendis creauit, qui leges ex libris Solonis in latinum sermonem translatas XII. tabulis exposuerunt.

C. II. The names of those who set out the laws of the Twelve Tables.

[Isidore, continuing in the same place.] These were Appius Claudius, Genucius, Sextius, Veturius, Julius, Manlius, Sulpicius, Curiatius, Romilius, and Postumius. These decemvirs were chosen to write the laws. The consul Pompey was the first who wished to undertake to arrange the laws in books, but he did not persevere because of fear of detractors. Caesar next began to do it, but was killed before it was done. Little by little the ancient laws became obsolete through age and neglect; although there is now no use of them, knowledge of them nevertheless appears necessary. New laws began with Caesar Constantine and the others succeeding him, and they were mixed and disordered. Afterward Theodosius the Younger, Augustus, made a code of enactments after the likeness of the Gregorian and Hermogenian Codes and arranged them from the times of Constantine under the title of each emperor; he called it Theodosian from his own name.

C. II. Nomina eorum, qui leges XII. tabularum exposuerunt.

[Isidor. ibidem continenter.] Fuerunt autem hi App. Claudius, Genutius, Sextius, Veturius, Iulius, Manlius, Sulpitius, Curiatius, Romilius, Posthumius. Hi decemuiri legum conscribendarum electi sunt. Leges autem redigere in libris primus consul Pompeius instituere uoluit, sed non perseuerauit obtrectatorum metu. Deinde Cesar cepit id facere, sed ante interfectus est. Paulatim autem antiquae leges uetustate atque incuria obsoleuerunt, quarum etsi iam nullus est usus, notitia tamen necessaria uidetur. Nouae a Constantino Cesare ceperunt et reliquis succedentibus, erantque permixtae et inordinatae. Postea Theodosius minor Augustus ad similitudinem Gregoriani et Ermogeniani codicem factum constitutionum a Constantini temporibus sub proprio cuiusque imperatoris titulo disposuit, quem a suo nomine Theodosianum uocauit.

Distinction VIII

GRATIAN. Part I. Natural law also differs from custom and positive law. For by natural law all things are common to all, which is believed to have been observed not only among those concerning whom it is read, "The multitude of believers had one heart and one soul," etc., but is also found to have been handed down by philosophers from an earlier time. Hence in Plato that city is presented as most justly ordered in which no one knows his own private attachments. By the law of custom or positive law, however, this is mine and that belongs to another. Hence Augustine says upon John [Tractate VI on John 1, §25]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Differt etiam ius naturae a consuetudine et constitutione. Nam iure naturae sunt omnia communia omnibus, quod non solum inter eos seruatum creditur, de quibus legitur: "Multitudinis autem credentium erat cor unum et anima una, etc." uerum etiam ex precedenti tempore a philosophis traditum inuenitur. Unde apud Platonem illa ciuitas iustissime ordinata traditur, in quia quisque proprios nescit affectus. Iure uero consuetudinis uel constitutionis hoc meum est, illud uero alterius. Unde Augustinus ait supra Iohannem: [tract. VI. ad c. 1. §. 25. Ioannis]

C. I. By divine law all things are common to all; by positive law, however, this is mine and that belongs to another.

By what law do you defend the estates of the Church, divine or human? We have divine law in the divine Scriptures, human law in the laws of kings. Whence does each person possess what he possesses? Is it not by human law? For by divine law, "The earth is the Lord's and its fullness." God made the poor and the rich from one clay, and one earth supports the poor and the rich. Therefore, by human law it is said: "This estate is mine, this house is mine, this servant is mine." Human laws, moreover, are the laws of emperors. Why? Because God distributed those very human laws to the human race through the emperors and kings of the world.

Likewise. §1. Take away the laws of the emperor, and who dares to say: "This estate is mine, this servant is mine, this house is mine"? But if these things are held by men, the laws of kings made it so. Do you wish us to keep silent about the laws, so that you may rejoice? etc. Likewise. §2. Let the laws be read in which the emperors manifestly commanded that those who, apart from the communion of the Catholic Church, usurp for themselves the Christian name and are unwilling peacefully to worship the author of peace should dare to possess nothing in the name of a church. §3. But you say: "What have we to do with the emperor?" Yet, as I have already said, human law is at issue. The Apostle wished kings to be served, wished kings to be honored, and said: "Revere the king." Do not say, "What have I to do with the king?" What, then, have you to do with a possession? Possessions are possessed through the laws of kings. You have said, "What have I to do with the king?" Do not call the possessions yours, because you have renounced those very human laws by which possessions are possessed.

Part II. GRATIAN. In dignity, however, natural law simply prevails over custom and positive law. For whatever things have either been received by customs or comprehended in writings, if they are opposed to natural law, are to be held vain and void. Hence Augustine says in Book II [Book III of the Confessions, c. 8]:

C. I. Iure diuino omnia sunt communia omnibus: iure uero constitutionis hoc meum, illud alterius est.

Quo iure defendis uillas ecclesiae, diuino, an humano?

Diuinum ius in scripturis diuinis habemus, humanum in legibus regum. Unde quisque possidet, quod possidet? Nonne iure humano? Nam iure diuino "Domini est terra et plenitudo eius." Pauperes et diuites Deus de uno limo fecit, et pauperes et diuites una terra supportat. Iure ergo humano dicitur: hec uilla mea est, hec domus mea est, hic seruus meus est. Iura autem humana iura imperatorum sunt: quare? Quia ipsa iura humana per imperatores et reges seculi Deus distribuit generi humano. Item. §. 1. Tolle iura imperatoris, et quis audet dicere: hec uilla mea est, meus est iste seruus, hec domus mea est? Si autem, teneantur ista ab hominibus, regum iura fecerunt, uultis reticeamus leges, ut gaudeatis? etc. Item. §. 2. Relegantur leges, ubi manifeste preceperunt imperatores, eos, qui preter ecclesiae catholicae communionem usurpant sibi nomen Christianum, nec uolunt in pace colere pacis auctorem, nihil nomine ecclesiae audeant possidere. §. 3. Sed dicitis quid nobis et imperatori? Sed ut iam dixi, de iure humano agitur. Apostolus uoluit seruiri regibus, uoluit honorari reges, et dixit: "Regem reueremini." Noli dicere, quid mihi et regi? Quid tibi ergo et possessioni? Per iura regum possidentur possessiones.

Dixisti, quid mihi et regi? Noli dicere possessiones tuas, quia ipsa iura renuntiasti humana, quibus possidentur possessiones. II. Pars. Gratianus. Dignitate uero ius naturale simpliciter preualet consuetudini et constitutioni. Quecunque enim uel moribus recepta sunt, uel scriptis comprehensa, si naturali iuri fuerint aduersa, uana et irrita sunt habenda. Unde Augustinus ait, libro II.: [lib. III. Confessionum c.8]

C. II. No one is permitted to act against natural law.

Disgraceful acts that are contrary to human customs are to be avoided according to the diversity of customs, so that the compact of a nation among itself, confirmed either by a city's custom or by law, may not be violated by the lust of any citizen or foreigner. For every part that does not accord with its whole is shameful. §1. But when God commands something contrary to the custom or compact of any people, even if it was never done there, it is to be done; if it was omitted, it is to be restored; and if it was not established, it is to be established. §2. For if a king is permitted in the city over which he reigns to command something that neither anyone before him nor he himself had ever commanded, and obedience is not contrary to the society of his city—indeed, disobedience is contrary to that society, for it is a general compact of human society to obey its kings—how much more must God, ruler of all his creation, be served without hesitation in those things that he commands? For just as among the powers of human society a greater power is placed above a lesser for obedience, so God is placed above all.

C. II. Aduersus naturale ius nulli quicquam agere licet.

Que contra mores hominum sunt flagitia, pro morum diuersitate sunt uitanda, ut pactum gentis inter se aut consuetudine ciuitatis, uel lege firmatum, nulla ciuis aut peregrini libidine uioletur. Turpis est enim omnis pars suo uniuerso non congruens. §. 1. Cum autem Deus aliquid contra morem aut pactum quorumlibet iubet, etsi numquam ibi factum est, faciendum est; et si omissum, instaurandum; et si statutum non erat, instituendum est. §. 2. Si enim regi licet in ciuitate, cui regnat, iubere aliquid, quod neque ante ipsum quisquam, nec ipse umquam iusserat, et non contra societatem ciuitatis eius obtemperatur, immo contra societatem si non obtemperatur: (generale quippe pactum est societatis humanae, obtemperare regibus suis,) quanto magis Deo regnatori uniuersae creaturae suae, ad ea, que iusserit, sine dubitatione seruiendum est? Sicut enim in potestatibus societatis humanae maior potestas minori ad obediendum preponitur, ita Deus omnibus.

C. III. An evil custom is to be uprooted entirely.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims. An evil custom, no less than a pernicious corruption, is to be avoided. Unless it is very quickly uprooted entirely, it is assumed by the impious as having the force of privileges, and transgressions and various presumptions, if not most swiftly suppressed, begin to be venerated as laws and perpetually observed in the manner of privileges.

C. III. Mala consuetudo radicitus est euellenda.

Item Nicolaus Papa Hincmaro Remensi Archiepiscopo. Mala consuetudo, non minus quam pernitiosa corruptela uitanda est, que nisi citius radicitus euellatur, in priuilegiorum ius ab impiis assumitur, et incipiunt preuaricationes et uariae presumtiones, celerrime non compressae, pro legibus uenerari et priuilegiorum more perpetuo celebrari.

C. IV. Custom is to be placed after truth and reason.

Likewise Augustine, Book II On the One Baptism [Book III On Baptism, against the Donatists, c. 6]. "When truth has been made manifest, let custom yield to truth": plainly, who would doubt that custom should yield to manifest truth? Likewise: "Let no one place custom before reason and truth, because reason and truth always exclude custom."

> C. IV. Veritati et rationi consuetudo est postponenda.
> Item Augustinus de unico baptismo libro II. [lib. III. de Baptismo, contra Donatistas, c. 6.] "Veritate manifestata cedat consuetudo ueritati": plane quis dubitet ueritati manifestatae consuetudinem cedere? Item: "Nemo consuetudinem rationi et ueritati preponat, quia consuetudinem ratio et ueritas semper excludit".

C. V. Every custom is to be placed after truth.

Likewise Gregory VII to Wimund, bishop of Aversa. If perhaps you oppose custom, it must be observed that the Lord says: "I am the truth." He did not say, "I am custom," but "the truth." §1. And certainly—to use the judgment of blessed Cyprian—every custom, however ancient, however widespread, is altogether to be placed after truth, and a usage that is contrary to truth is to be abolished.

> C. V. Quelibet consuetudo ueritati est postponenda.
> Item Gregorius VII. Wimundo Auersano Episcopo. Si consuetudinem fortassis opponas, aduertendum est, quod Dominus dicit: "Ego sum ueritas." Non dixit: ego sum consuetudo, sed "ueritas." §. 1. Et certe (ut B. Cipriani utamur sententia) quelibet consuetudo, quantumuis uetusta, quantumuis uulgata, ueritati est omnino postponenda, et usus, qui ueritati est contrarius, abolendus est.

C. VI. When truth has been revealed, custom ought to yield to it.

Likewise Augustine, in the book On the Baptism of Infants [Book III On Baptism, against the Donatists, c. 5]. He who, having despised truth, presumes to follow custom is either envious and malignant toward the brothers to whom truth is revealed, or ungrateful toward God, by whose inspiration his Church is instructed. For the Lord says in the Gospel: "I am," he says, "the truth"; he did not say, "I am custom." Therefore, when truth has been made manifest, let custom yield to truth. Thus, when revelation of truth has been made, let custom yield to truth, because Peter also, who was circumcising, yielded to Paul preaching the truth. Therefore, since Christ is the truth, we ought to follow truth rather than custom, because reason and truth always exclude custom.

> C. VI. Veritate reuelata, consuetudinem sibi cedere oportet.
> Item Augustinus in libro de baptismo paruulorum. [lib. III. de Baptismo, contra Donatistas, cap. 5.] Qui contempta ueritate presumit consuetudinem sequi, aut circa fratres inuidus est et malignus, quibus ueritas reuelatur, aut circa Deum ingratus est, inspiratione cuius ecclesia eius instruitur. Nam Dominus in euangelio: "Ego sum," inquit, "ueritas": non dixit: ego sum consuetudo. Itaque ueritate manifestata ueritati cedat, consuetudo. Reuelatione ergo facta ueritatis cedat consuetudo ueritati, quia et Petrus, qui circumcidebat cessit Paulo ueritatem predicanti. Igitur cum Christus ueritas sit, magis ueritatem quam consuetudinem sequi debemus, quia consuetudinem ratio et ueritas semper excludit.

C. VII. Custom is opposed to reason in vain.

The same, in Book IV On Baptism [against the Donatists, c. 5]. "In vain," he says, "do certain persons who are overcome by reason object custom to us, as though custom were greater than truth, or as though that which has been revealed as better by the Holy Spirit ought not to be followed in spiritual matters." This is plainly true, because reason and truth are to be placed before custom. But if truth supports custom, nothing ought to be retained more firmly.

> C. VII. Consuetudo rationi frustra opponitur.
> Idem in libro IV. de Baptismo. [contra Donatistas, cap. 5.] "Frustra", inquit, "quidam, qui ratione uincuntur, consuetudinem nobis obiiciunt, quasi consuetudo maior sit ueritate, aut non sit in spiritualibus sequendum, quod melius est a Spiritu sancto reuelatum." Hoc plane uerum est, quia ratio et ueritas consuetudini preponenda est. Sed si consuetudini ueritas suffragatur, nihil oportet firmius retineri.

C. VIII. Custom ought not to impede reason.

Likewise Cyprian [in the epistle to Pompeius against the epistle of Stephen]. A custom that had crept in among certain persons ought not to prevent truth from prevailing and conquering. For custom without truth is the antiquity of error; therefore, leaving error behind, let us follow truth, knowing that even in Esdras truth conquered, as it is written: "Truth is strong and grows strong forever, and lives and prevails for ages of ages."

The same [in the epistle to Jubaianus, around the middle]. One who errs in simplicity can be pardoned, as blessed Paul the Apostle says concerning himself: "I who formerly was a blasphemer and persecutor and injurious; but I obtained mercy because I acted ignorantly." But after inspiration and revelation have been given, he who perseveres in that in which he had erred no longer sins knowingly and prudently under the pardon of ignorance; for he relies upon a certain presumption and obstinacy when he is overcome by reason.

> C. VIII. Rationem consuetudo impedire non debet.
> Item Ciprianus. [in epistola ad Pompeium, contra epistolam Stephani.] Consuetudo, que apud quosdam irrepserat, impedire non debet, quo minus ueritas preualeat et uincat. Nam consuetudo sine ueritate uetustas erroris est: propter quod relicto errore sequamur ueritatem, scientes, quia et apud Esdram ueritas uicit, ut scriptum est: "Veritas ualet et inualescit in eternum, et uiuit et obtinet in secula seculorum." Idem. [in epistola ad Iubaianum, circa med.] Ignosci potest simpliciter erranti, sicut de seipso dicit beatus apostolus Paulus: "Qui primo fui blasphemus, et persecutor et iniuriosus; sed misericordiam merui, quia ignorans feci." Post inspirationem uero et reuelationem factam, qui in eo, quod errauerat, perseuerat, prudens et sciens iam non in uenia ignorantiae peccat: presumtione enim atque obstinatione quadam nititur, cum ratione superetur.

C. IX. God's truth, not human custom, ought to be followed.

The same [Book II, epistle 3, to Caecilius]. If Christ alone is to be heard, we ought not to attend to what someone before us thought ought to be done, but to what Christ, who is before all, first did. For human custom ought not to be followed, but God's truth, since God speaks through the prophet Isaiah and says: "In vain do they worship me, teaching the commandments and doctrines of men."

GRATIAN. It is therefore clearly apparent that custom is placed after natural law.

C. IX. Dei ueritatem, non hominum consuetudinem sequi oportet.

Idem. [lib. II. ep. 3. ad Caecilium] Si solus Christus audiendus est, non debemus attendere, quid aliquis ante nos faciendum putauerit, sed quid, qui ante omnes est, Christus prior fecerit. Neque enim hominis consuetudinem sequi oportet, sed Dei ueritatem, cum per Ysaiam prophetam loquatur Deus et dicat: "Sine causa colunt me, mandata et doctrinas hominum docentes." Gratianus. Liquido igitur apparet, quod consuetudo naturali iuri postponitur.

Distinction IX

GRATIAN. Part I. That positive law yields to natural law is proved by manifold authority. For Augustine says to Boniface [the count, epistle 50]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem constitutio naturali iuri cedat multiplici auctoritate probatur. Ait enim Augustinus ad Bonifatium: [Comitem, epist L.]

C. I. The laws of princes ought not to prevail over natural law.

[PALEA. When emperors establish evil laws for falsehood against truth, those believing rightly are tested and those persevering are crowned; but when they establish good laws for truth against falsehood, the raging are terrified and those who understand are corrected.] §1. Whoever is unwilling to obey the laws of emperors that are enacted for God's truth acquires a great punishment. Whoever, therefore, is unwilling to obey the laws of emperors that are enacted against the will of God acquires a great reward. [§2. For even in the times of the prophets, all kings who did not prohibit and overturn those things instituted among the people of God contrary to God's precepts are blamed, while those who prohibited and overturned them are praised above the merits of others. And King Nebuchadnezzar, when he was a servant of idols, established a sacrilegious law that an image should be adored; but those who refused to obey his impious enactment acted piously and faithfully. Yet the same king, corrected by a divine miracle, established for truth a pious and praiseworthy law that whoever uttered blasphemy against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego should utterly perish together with his household.]

[PALEA.

C. I. Leges principum naturali iuri preualere non debent.

[PALEA. Imperatores, quando pro falsitate contra ueritatem constituunt malas leges, probantur bene credentes et coronantur perseuerantes; quando autem pro ueritate contra falsitatem constituunt bonas leges terrentur seuientes et corriguntur intelligentes.] §. 1. Quicumque legibus imperatorum, que pro Dei ueritate feruntur, obtemperare non uult, acquirit grande supplicium. Quicumque ergo legibus imperatorum, que contra uoluntatem Dei feruntur, obtemperare non uult, acquirit grande premium. [§. 2. Nam et temporibus prophetarum omnes reges, qui in populo Dei non prohibuerunt, nec euerterunt, que contra Dei precepta fuerant instituta, culpantur, et qui prohibuerunt et euerterunt, super aliorum merita laudantur. Et rex Nabuchodonosor, cum seruus esset idolorum, constituit sacrilegam legem, ut simulacrum adoraretur; sed eius impiae constitutioni qui obedire noluerunt, pie fideliterque fecerunt. Idem tamen rex, diuino correctus miraculo, piam et laudabilem legem pro ueritate constituit, ut quicumque diceret blasphemiam in Deum Sidrac, Misac et Abdenago, cum domo sua penitus interiret.]

[PALEA.

C. II. Princes themselves are bound to live by their own laws.

Likewise from the words of Isidore, Book III of the Sentences, On the Supreme Good, c. 53. It is just for a prince to obey his own laws. For then may he consider his laws to be observed by all, when he himself also shows reverence for them. Princes are bound by their own laws, nor is it fitting that they can condemn in themselves the laws that they establish for their subjects. For the authority of their voice is just if they do not permit themselves what they prohibit to the peoples.]

> C. II. Principes tenentur et ipsi uiuere legibus suis.
> Item ex uerbis Isidori libro III. Sententiarum, de summo bono, c. 53. Iustum est, principem legibus obtemperare suis. Tunc enim iura sua ab omnibus custodienda existimet, quando et ipse illis reuerentiam prebet. Principes legibus teneri suis, nec in se conuenit, posse damnare iura, que in subiectis constituunt. Iusta est enim uocis eorum auctoritas, si quod populis prohibent, sibi licere non patiantur.]

C. III. The writings of commentators are subordinate to the canonical Scriptures.

The same, in the prologue to Book III On the Trinity. Part II. Do not be subservient to my writings as though to canonical Scriptures. Rather, in the latter, when you find even what you did not believe, believe it without hesitation; but in the former, do not hold firmly even what you held as certain unless you understand it to be certain.

> C. III. Scripturis canonicis tractatorum litterae deseruiunt.
> Idem in Prologo libri III. de Trinitate. II. Pars. Noli meis litteris quasi canonicis scripturis inseruire. Sed in illis et quod non credebas cum inueneris, incunctanter crede: in istis autem, quod certum habebas, nisi certum intellexeris, noli firme tenere.

C. IV. Many things are found in the works of commentators that are to be corrected.

The same, to Vincentius, Book II [Book IV On the Soul and Its Origin, c. 1]. I cannot and ought not deny that, just as in the greater works themselves, so also in my many works there are many things that can be faulted by a just judgment and without rashness.

> C. IV. In tractatorum opusculis multa corrigenda inueniuntur.
> Idem ad Vincentium, libro II. [lib. IV de anima et eius origine, cap. I.] Negare non possum, nec debeo, sicut in ipsis maioribus, ita multa esse in tam multis opusculis meis, que possunt iusto iudicio et nulla temeritate culpari.

C. V. Falsehoods are not admitted in the canonical Scriptures.

The same, to Jerome, epistle VIII [XIX]. I have learned to render this fear and honor only to those books of the Scriptures that are now called canonical, so that I dare not believe that any of their authors erred in writing. And if I encounter in them anything that appears contrary to truth, I do not doubt that either the manuscript is faulty, or the translator did not grasp what was said, or I myself have understood it not at all. I read others, however, in such a way that, however much they excel in holiness and learning, I do not think something true merely because they themselves thought it so, but because they were able to persuade me, through other authors or canonical Scriptures or probable reasons, that it does not depart from truth.

C. V. In scripturis canonicis mendacia non admittuntur.

Idem ad Ieronimum, epistola VIII. [XIX.] Ego solis eis scriptorum, qui iam canonici appellantur, didici hunc timorem honoremque referre, ut nullum eorum scribendo errasse audeam credere, ac si aliquid in eis offendero, quod uideatur contrarium ueritati, nichil aliud quam uel mendosum esse codicem, uel non esse assecutum interpretem, quod dictum est, uel me minime intellexisse, non ambigam. Alios autem ita lego, ut quantalibet sanctitate doctrinaque polleant, non ideo uerum putem, quia ita ipsi senserunt, sed quia mihi per alios auctores, uel canonicas uel probabiles rationes, quod a uero non abhorreat, persuadere potuerunt.

C. VI. The Hebrew volumes impart authority to the books of the Old Testament, and the Greek to those of the New.

The same. Just as the fidelity of the books of the Old Testament is to be examined from the Hebrew volumes, so that of the New requires the norm of the Greek language.

C. VI. Libris ueterum ebrea uolumina, nouis greca auctoritatem impendunt.

Idem. Ut ueterum librorum fides de ebreis uoluminibus examinanda est, ita nouorum greci sermonis normam desiderat.

C. VII. No authority will remain for the canonical Scriptures if falsehoods are admitted into them.

The same, in Epistle I to Jerome [epistle IX]. If even well-intentioned falsehoods are admitted into the holy Scriptures, what authority will remain in them? What judgment from those Scriptures will at last be pronounced whose weight may crush the wickedness of contentious falsehood?

C. VII. Nichil auctoritatis canonicis remanebit scripturis, si ad eas mendacia fuerint admissa.

Idem in Epistola I. ad Ieronimum. [epist. IX.] Si ad scripturas sanctas admissa fuerint uel offitiosa mendacia, quid in eis remanebit auctoritatis? Que tandem de scripturis illis sententia proferetur, cuius pondere contentiosae falsitatis obteretur improbitas?

C. VIII. Sacred Scripture is to be placed before the letters of all bishops.

The same, Book II On the One Baptism [likewise, On Baptism against the Donatists, Book II, c. 3]. Who does not know that holy canonical Scripture, both of the Old and the New Testament, is contained within its fixed limits, and that it is so placed before all later letters of bishops that it is altogether impossible to doubt and debate concerning it whether whatever is established as written in it is true or right? But letters of bishops that either were written or are written after the canon was confirmed may be reproved—by perhaps the wiser discourse of anyone more skilled in that matter, by the weightier authority and more learned prudence of other bishops, and by councils—if anything in them has perhaps deviated from truth.

C. VIII. Litteris omnium episcoporum sacra scriptura preponatur.

Idem de unico baptismo libro II. [Item de Baptismo contra Donatistas, lib. II. c. 3.] Quis nesciat sanctam scripturam canonicam, tam ueteris quam noui testamenti, certis terminis suis contineri, eamque posterioribus omnibus episcoporum litteris ita preponi, ut de illa omnino dubitari et disceptari non possit, utrum uerum uel utrum rectum sit, quicquid in ea scriptum constiterit esse? Episcoporum autem litteras, que post confirmatum canonem uel scriptae sunt uel scribuntur, et per sermonem forte sapientiorem cuiuslibet in ea re peritioris, et per aliorum episcoporum grauiorem auctoritatem doctioremque prudentiam, et per concilia licere reprehendi, si quid in eis forte a ueritate deuiatum est?

C. IX. Calumnies against divine commandments are not to be gathered from the sayings of any bishops whatsoever.

The same, to Vincentius [epistle XLVIII, against the Donatists]. Brother, do not wish to gather calumnies against so many, so illustrious, and so indubitable divine testimonies from the writings of bishops, whether of our own, such as Hilary, or of Cyprian and Agrippinus before the party of Donatus was separated; first, because this kind of writing is to be distinguished from the authority of the canon. For they are not read in such a way that testimony is brought forth from them as though it were unlawful to think contrary to them if anywhere they perhaps thought otherwise than truth requires. For we are in that number that does not disdain to accept as spoken also to us what was said by the Apostle: "And if in anything you think otherwise, this also God has revealed to you."

C. IX. Contra diuina mandata calumpniae non colligantur ex quorumlibet dictis episcoporum.

Idem ad Vincentium. [epist. XLVIII. contra Donatistas] Noli frater contra diuina tam multa, tam preclara, tam indubitata testimonia colligere uelle calumpnias ex episcoporum scriptis, siue nostrorum, sicut Ylarii, siue (antequam pars Donati separetur,) Cipriani et Agrippini; primo, quia hoc genus litterarum ab auctoritate canonis distinguendum est: non enim sic leguntur, tamquam ita ex eis testimonium proferatur, ut contra sentire non liceat, sicubi forte aliter sapuerint, quam ueritas postulat. In eo quippe numero sumus, ut non dedignemur etiam nobis dictum ab Apostolo accipere: "Et si quid aliter sapitis, quoque uobis Deus reuelauit".

C. X. Equal reverence is not owed to the canonical Scriptures and to expositions of them.

The same, in the epistle to Fortunatus [likewise, to Fortunatianus, epistle III]. Nor ought we to hold the disputations of any persons whatsoever, although they are Catholic and praiseworthy men, as canonical Scriptures, in such a way that it is not lawful for us—while preserving the honor due to those men—to disapprove and reject something in their writings if perhaps we find that they thought otherwise than truth stands, whether understood by others or by us with divine assistance. Such as I am in regard to the writings of others, such do I wish the readers of mine to be.

C. X. Non debetur par reuerentia canonicis scripturis et expositionibus earum.

Idem in Epistola ad Fortunatum. [Item ad Fortunatianum, epist. III.] Neque quorumlibet disputationes, quamuis catholicorum et laudatorum hominum, uelut scripturas canonicas habere debemus, ut nobis non liceat salua honorificentia, que illis debetur hominibus, aliquid in eorum scriptis inprobare atque respuere, si forte inuenerimus, quod aliter senserint quam ueritas habet, diuino adiutorio uel ab aliis intellecta uel a nobis. Talis ego sum in scriptis aliorum, quales uolo esse intellectores meorum.

C. XI. Sound reason is preferred to examples.

The same, to Casulanus [to Marcellinus, The City of God, Book I, c. 22, §2]. Sound reason is indeed to be placed even before examples. Examples also agree with it, but those examples are the more worthy of imitation to the extent that they are more excellent in piety.

GRATIAN. Since, therefore, nothing else is commanded by natural law than what God wills to be done, and nothing else is forbidden than what God prohibits from being done; finally, since nothing is found in canonical Scripture other than in the divine laws, while the divine laws stand by nature, it is clear that whatever things are shown to be contrary to the divine will or to canonical Scripture are also found to be opposed to natural law. Hence, whatever things are judged to be placed after the divine will, canonical Scripture, or divine laws, natural law must be preferred to those same things. Therefore, enactments, whether ecclesiastical or secular, if they are shown to be contrary to natural law, are to be entirely excluded.

> Idem ad Casulanum. [ad Marcellinum de ciuitate Dei lib. I. c. 22. §. 2.] Sana quippe ratio etiam exemplis anteponenda est: cui quidem et exempla concordant, sed illa, que tantum digniora sunt imitatione, quantum excellentiora pietate. Gratianus. Cum ergo naturalis iure nichil aliud precipiatur, quam quod Deus uult fieri, nichilque uetetur, quam quod Deus prohibet fieri; denique cum in canonica scriptura nichil aliud, quam in diuinis legibus inueniatur, diuine uero leges natura consistant: patet, quod quecumque diuinae uoluntati, seu canonicae scripturae contraria probantur, eadem et naturali iuri inueniuntur aduersa. Unde quecumque diuinae uoluntati, seu canonice scripture, seu diuinis legibus postponenda censentur, eisdem naturale ius preferri oportet. Constitutiones ergo uel ecclesiasticae uel seculares, si naturali iuri contrariae probantur, penitus sunt excludendae.

GRATIAN. The enactments of princes do not take precedence over ecclesiastical enactments, but are subordinate to them. Hence Pope Nicholas writes to the bishops gathered at the council at Convicinum:

> GRATIANUS. Constitutiones uero principum ecclesiasticis constitutionibus non preminent, sed obsecuntur. Unde Nicolaus Papa scribit episcopis in Concilio apud Conuicinum congregatis:

C. I. The law of emperors cannot dissolve ecclesiastical laws.

The law of emperors is not to be used in all ecclesiastical controversies, especially since it is found sometimes to oppose evangelical and canonical sanction. The same: The law of emperors is not above God's law, but beneath it. Ecclesiastical laws cannot be dissolved by an imperial judgment. §1. To demonstrate this, the testimonies of these two, namely Innocent and Gregory, are quite sufficient. Saint Innocent indeed says in his decretal epistle to Alexander, bishop of Antioch: "As to what you ask," he says, "whether, when provinces have been divided by an imperial judgment so that two metropolitan sees are created, two metropolitans ought to be named: it did not seem good to us for the Church of God to be changed according to the mutability of worldly necessities, or to suffer honors or divisions that the emperor has seen fit to make for his own purposes." Blessed Gregory, writing to the patrician Theoctista, says among other things: "If it is said that the bonds of marriage ought to be dissolved for the sake of religion, it must be known that although human law has permitted this, divine law has nevertheless prohibited it." Behold how ecclesiastical laws cannot be dissolved by an imperial judgment. Behold how divine law prohibited what human law permitted. §2. We do not say that the laws of emperors—laws which the Church often uses against heretics and by which she is often defended against tyrants and all the depraved—are to be utterly rejected; rather, we assert that they cannot inflict prejudice upon evangelical, apostolic, and canonical decrees, after which they are to be placed.

C. I. Lex imperatorum ecclesiastica iura dissoluere non potest.

Lege imperatorum non in omnibus ecclesiasticis controuersiis utendum est, presertim cum inueniantur euangelicae ac canonicae sanctioni aliquotiens obuiare. Idem: Lex imperatorum non est supra legem Dei, sed subtus. Imperiali iudicio non possunt iura ecclesiastica dissolui. §. 1. Ad quod ostendendum, duorum horum, Innocentii scilicet et Gregorii, satis sufficiunt testimonia. Sanctus quidem Innocentius in decretali epistola sua ad Alexandrum Antiochenum episcopum ait: "Quod sciscitaris," inquiens, "utrum diuisis imperiali iudicio prouinciis, ut duae metropoles fiant, si duo metropolitani debeant nominari: non uisum est nobis ad mobilitatem necessitatum mundanarum Dei ecclesiam conmutari, honoresque aut diuisiones perpeti, quas pro suis faciendis causis duxerit imperator." Beatus Gregorius scribens ad Theotistam patriciam inter cetera: "Si", inquit, "religionis causa uincula matrimonii debere dissolui dicantur, sciendum est, quia etsi hoc lex humana concessit, lex tamen diuina prohibuit." Ecce quemadmodum imperiali iudicio non possunt ecclesiastica iura dissolui. Ecce qualiter, quod lex humana concessit, lex diuina prohibuit. §. 2. Non quod imperatorum leges (quibus sepe ecclesia utitur contra hereticos, sepe contra tirannos atque contra prauos quosque defenditur) dicamus penitus rennuendas, sed quod eas euangelicis, apostolicis atque canonicis decretis (quibus postponendae sunt) non posse inferre preiudicium asseramus.

C. II. It is lawful for an emperor to do nothing that opposes the rules of the Gospel.

Likewise Symmachus [pope], in the sixth synod [the Roman synod in the time of King Theodoric]. It is not lawful for an emperor, or for anyone guarding piety, to presume anything against the divine commandments, nor to do anything that opposes the evangelical, prophetic, or apostolic rules.

C. II. Nichil quod euangelicis regulis obuiet, imperatori agere licet.

Item Simachus [Papa] in sexta Sinodo. [Romana tempore Theodorici Regis.] Non licet imperatori, uel cuiquam pietatem custodienti aliquid contra diuina mandata presumere, nec quicquam, quod euangelicis, propheticis aut apostolicis regulis obuiet, agere.

C. III. In ecclesiastical causes the royal will is not to be preferred to priests.

Likewise Pope Felix [III]. It is certain that this is salutary for your affairs: when matters of God are at issue, according to his own ordinance, you should strive to subject the royal will to Christ's priests, not prefer it; to learn sacred things through their prelates rather than teach them; to follow the form of the Church, not humanly to prescribe laws for it to follow, nor to wish to dominate its sanctions—the Church to whose clemency God willed the neck of your pious devotion to be submitted—lest, while the measure of the heavenly dispensation is exceeded, one proceed to the insult of him who orders it.

C. III. In ecclesiasticis causis regia uoluntas sacerdotibus non est preferenda.

Item Felix [III.] Papa. Certum est, hoc rebus uestris esse salutare, ut cum de causis agitur Dei, iuxta ipsius constitutum regiam uoluntatem sacerdotibus Christi studeatis subdere, non preferre, et sacrosancta per eorum presules potius discere quam docere; ecclesiae formam sequi, non huic humanitus sequenda iura prefigere, neque eius sanctionibus uelle dominari, cuius Deus uoluit clementiae tuae piae deuotionis colla submittere, ne, dum mensura celestis dispensationis exceditur, eatur in contumeliam disponentis.

C. IV. Enactments cannot be contrary to the customs and decrees of the Roman Pontiffs.

Likewise. Enactments contrary to the canons and decrees of the Roman prelates, or to good customs, are of no force.

> C. IV. Moribus et decretis Romanorum Pontificum constitutiones contraire non possunt.
> Item. Constitutiones contra canones et decreta Presulum Romanorum, uel bonos mores, nullius sunt momenti.

C. V. Kings are not permitted to usurp those things that belong to priests.

Likewise Pope Nicholas [I, in the epistle to Emperor Michael whose beginning is We had proposed]. Your empire ought to be content with its daily administrations of the commonwealth and not to usurp those things that pertain only to the Lord's priests.

> C. V. Que sacerdotum sunt, regibus usurpare non licet.
> Item Nicolaus Papa. [I. in epistola ad Michaelem Imperatorem, cuius initum est: "Proposueramus."] Imperium uestrum suis publicae rei cotidianis amministrationibus debet esse contentum, non usurpare que sacerdotibus Domini solum conueniant.

C. VI. The tribunals of kings are subject to priestly power.

Likewise Gregory Nazianzen to the emperors at Constantinople [in the oration to the citizens of Nazianzus, full of anguish, and to the angry magistrate]. Do you accept freedom of speech? Do you willingly accept that the law of Christ subjects you to priestly power and places you beneath these tribunals? For he gave power also to us; he gave a principate far more perfect than your principates. Or does it seem just to you if spirit yields to flesh, if heavenly things are overcome by earthly things, if human things are preferred to divine?

Part II. GRATIAN. Behold that enactments of princes are to be placed after ecclesiastical laws. But where they do not oppose evangelical and canonical decrees, they are to be held worthy of every reverence. Hence Augustine says in the dialogue against Petilian [that is, Book II Against the Letters of Petilian, c. 58]:

> C. VI. Tribunalia regum sacerdotali sunt potestati subiecta.
> Item Gregorius Naciancenus imperatoribus Constantinopolitanis. [in oratione ad ciues Nazianzenos angoris plenos et magistratum iratum] Suscipitisne libertatem uerbi? libenter accipitis, quod lex Christi sacerdotali uos subiicit potestati atque istis tribunalibus subdit? Dedit enim et nobis potestatem, dedit principatum multo perfectiorem principatibus uestris. Aut numquid iustum uobis uidetur, si cedat spiritus carni, si a terrenis celestia superentur, si diuinis preferantur humana? II. Pars. Gratianus. Ecce quod constitutiones principum ecclesiasticis legibus postponendae sunt. Ubi autem euangelicis atque canonicis decretis non obuiauerint, omni reuerentia dignae habeantur.
> Unde Augustinus ait in Dialogo contra Petilianum: [id est lib. II. contra literas Petiliani, c. 58.]

C. VII. It is lawful to employ the laws of emperors in aid of the Church.

If you think that the laws of the earthly empire are to be employed in your aid, we do not reprove it. Paul did this when, against those treating him unjustly, he testified that he was a Roman citizen.

C. VII. Leges imperatorum in adiutorium ecclesiae licet assumi.

Si in adiutorium uestrum terreni imperii leges assumendas putatis, non reprehendimus. Fecit hoc Paulus cum aduersus iniuriosos Romanum ciuem se esse testatur.

C. VIII. Kings need pontiffs for eternal life, and pontiffs need kings for temporal matters.

Likewise Cyprian to Julian [Pope Nicholas I, in epistle VII to Emperor Michael]. Since the one mediator of God and men is the man Jesus Christ, he distinguished the proper offices of both powers by their own acts and distinct dignities, wishing them to be raised upward by medicinal humility, not to be plunged back into the lower regions by human pride: so that Christian emperors should need pontiffs for eternal life, and pontiffs should use imperial laws only for the course of temporal affairs, in order that spiritual action might remain apart from carnal incursions, and that "one serving as God's soldier should by no means involve himself in secular affairs"; and, conversely, that he who was involved in secular affairs should not seem to preside over divine matters.

C. VIII. Reges pontificibus pro eterna uita, et pontifices regibus pro temporalibus indigent.

Item Ciprianus Iuliano. [Nicolaus Papa I. in epist. VII. ad Michaelem Imperatorem] Quoniam idem mediator Dei et hominum est, homo Iesus Christus, sic actibus propriis et dignitatibus distinctis offitia potestatis utriusque discreuit propria uolens medicinali humilitate sursum efferri, non humana superbia rursum in inferna demergi: ut etiam Christiani imperatores pro eterna uita pontificibus indigerent, et pontifices pro cursu temporalium tantummodo rerum imperialibus legibus uterentur, quatenus spiritualis actio a carnalibus distaret incursibus, et "Deo militans minime se negotiis secularibus implicaret;" ac uicissim non ille rebus diuinis presidere uideretur, qui esset negotiis secularibus implicatus.

C. IX. The laws of emperors ought to be observed.

Likewise Leo IV to Lothair Augustus. Concerning the chapters or imperial precepts of you and of your pontifical predecessors that are to be inviolably guarded and preserved, we profess that, as far as we have been and are able, with Christ's favor we shall preserve them in every way both now and forever. And if perhaps anyone has told or will tell you otherwise, know with certainty that he is a liar.

C. IX. Leges imperatorum custodiri oportet.

Item Leo IV. Lothario Augusto. De capitulis uel preceptis imperialibus uestris uestrorumque pontificum predecessorum irrefragabiliter custodiendis et conseruandis, quanto ualuimus et ualemus Christo propitio et nunc et in euum conseruaturos modis omnibus profitemur. Et si fortasse quilibet uobis aliter dixerit uel dicturus fuerit, sciatis eum pro certo mendacem.

C. X. What is done contrary to law is dissolved by the authority of law.

Likewise John VIII to Emperor Louis. You see, dearest son, that what is received contrary to the laws deserves to be dissolved through the laws.

C. X. Legis auctoritate dissoluitur quod contra eam fit.

Item Iohannes VIII. Lodouico Imperatori. Vides, fili carissime, quia quod contra leges accipitur, per leges dissolui meretur.

C. XI. It is not fitting for the laws of princes and the rules of the fathers to be despised.

Likewise Gelasius to Bishops Rufinus and Aprilis. Who would say that the laws of princes, or the rules of the fathers, or paternal admonitions ought to be despised, except one who thinks that only his own offense will pass unpunished?

> C. XI. Leges principum, et regulas patrum contempni non decet.
> Item Gelasius Rufino et Aprili Episcopis. Quis autem leges principum, aut patrum regulas, aut ammonitiones paternas debere dicat contempni, nisi qui impunitum sibi tantum estimet transire commissum?

C. XII. The laws of the Roman princes are to be observed by all.

Likewise to King Theodoric. It is certain that your magnificence wills the laws of the Roman princes, which it has commanded to be observed in human affairs, to be observed much more concerning reverence for blessed Peter the Apostle, for the increase of its own felicity.

> C. XII. Seruentur ab omnibus Romanorum principum leges.
> Item Theodorico Regi. Certum est magnificentiam uestram leges Romanorum principum, quas in negotiis hominum custodiendas esse precepit, multo magis circa reuerentiam beati Petri apostoli pro suae felicitatis augmento uelle seruari.

C. XIII. Roman law ought not to be corrupted by anyone's temerity.

Likewise Leo IV to Lothair Augustus. We implore your clemency that, just as until now Roman law has flourished without any storms and is remembered to have been corrupted for the sake of no human person, so now it may retain its proper strength and vigor.

> C. XIII. Romana lex nullius temeritate debet corrumpi.
> Item Leo IV. Lotario Augusto. Vestram flagitamus clementiam, ut sicut hactenus Romana lex uiguit absque uniuersis procellis, et quod pro nullius persona hominis reminiscitur esse corrupta, ita nunc suum robur proprium et uigorem obtineat.

Distinction XI

GRATIAN. Part I. That custom yields to laws is attested by Isidore in Book II of the Synonyms [c. 16]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod uero legibus consuetudo cedat, Ysidorus testatur in Sinonimis, libro II.: [c. 16.]

C. I. Depraved usage is to be overcome by reason and law.

Let usage yield to authority; let law and reason conquer depraved usage.

> C. I. Prauus usus ratione superetur et lege.
> Usus auctoritati cedat; prauum usum lex et ratio uincat.

C. II. No one's custom can oppose the statutes of the pontiffs.

Likewise Pope Nicholas I to Emperor Michael. It follows that what is sanctioned with full authority by the rulers of this see is not to be removed through the obstructing occasion of any custom, by merely following private wills, but is to be held more firmly and unshakenly.

> C. II. Statutis Pontificum consuetudo cuiusquam refragari non potest.
> Item Nicolaus Papa I. Michaeli Imperatori. Consequens est, ut quod ab huius sedis rectoribus plena auctoritate sancitur, nullius consuetudinis prepediente occasione, proprias sequendo tantum uoluntates remoueatur sed firmius atque inconcusse teneatur.

C. III. The members are not permitted to dissent from the custom of the Roman Church.

Likewise Pope Julius [I, to the eastern bishops, epistle I]. Do not err, my brothers; do not be led away by varied and foreign doctrines. You have the institutes of the Apostles and apostolic men and the canons; make use of these, so that, relying upon them, you may be able to stand against all the darts of enemies. For it is exceedingly unworthy for anyone among either the pontiffs or the orders following them to reject this rule, which he sees the see of blessed Peter both following and teaching. It is highly fitting that the whole body of the Church agree with itself in this observance, which has authority from the place where the Lord placed the primacy of the whole Church.

> C. III. A consuetudine Romanae ecclesiae membris dissentire non licet.
> Item Iulius Papa. [I. ad Episcopos orientales, epist. I.] Nolite errare, fratres mei, doctrinis uariis et extraneis nolite abduci. Et instituta apostolorum et apostolicorum uirorum canonesque habetis: his fruimini, ut freti, contra cuncta inimicorum iacula persistere ualeatis. Satis enim indignum est, quemquam uel pontificum uel ordinum subsequentium hanc regulam refutare, quam beati Petri sedem et sequi uiderit, et docere. Multum conuenit, ut totum corpus ecclesiae in hac sibi obseruatione concordet, que inde auctoritatem habet, ubi Dominus ecclesiae totius posuit principatum.

C. IV. Usage and custom cannot overcome law and reason.

Likewise, Book VII of the Code, title II [Emperor Constantine Augustus to Proculus, Book VIII of the Code, title What Constitutes Long Custom, title 53, enactment 2]. The authority of longstanding custom and usage is not slight; nevertheless, it will not prevail by its own weight to such a degree that it overcomes either reason or written law.

Part II. GRATIAN. But when custom is shown to oppose neither the sacred canons nor human laws, it is to be observed unshakenly. Hence Augustine, or one speaking from the sayings of Basil, says:

> C. IV. Usus et consuetudo legem et rationem uincere non potest.
> Item Codicis libro VII. titulo II. [Imp. Constantinus A. ad Proculum, lib. VIII. Cod. tit. Quae sit longa consuetudo (t. 53. const. 2.)] Consuetudinis ususque longeui non uilis auctoritas est: uerum non usque adeo sui ualitura momento, ut aut rationem uincat aut legem scriptam. II. Pars. Gratianus. Cum uero nec sacris canonibus, nec humanis legibus consuetudo obuiare monstratur, inconcussa seruanda est. Unde Augustinus ait uel ex dictis Basilii:

C. V. A custom that is shown to oppose neither human laws nor the sacred canons is inviolable.

Some ecclesiastical institutions we receive from writings, while others were confirmed by apostolic tradition through successors in ministry; still others were approved by usage strengthened by custom. To these an equal observance and the same affection of piety is owed in either case. Who, even if only slightly experienced in the sacred Scriptures, would hesitate concerning this? For if we attend to the customs of the Church handed down by the fathers apart from the Scriptures and reckon them as nothing, it will plainly be evident how much loss religion will suffer through those who contemptuously disregard them. §1. For, to begin from there, what Scripture taught the faithful to be marked with the sign of the saving cross? Or what written form commended the words of the lengthy prayer or consecration, divided threefold over the bread and cup? For we say in secret not only what is contained in the Gospel or inserted by the Apostle, but we also add many other things that commend, as it were, a great force to the mysteries. What form of writing taught us to pray facing east? We bless the baptismal font and the oil of anointing. To this is added that we anoint those whom we baptize three times with oil and instruct them with words to renounce Satan and his angels. Whence are these and not a few other things of this kind, unless by a silent and mystical tradition from the fathers, observed in the ministries according to ecclesiastical custom and with more reverent diligence, published more by silence than by writing?

> C. V. Inuiolabilis est consuetudo, que nec humanis legibus nec sacris canonibus obuiare monstratur.
> Ecclesiasticarum institutionum quasdam scripturis, quasdam uero apostolica traditione per successores in ministerio confirmatas accipimus; quasdam uero consuetudine roborata approbauit usus, quibus par ritus et idem utriusque pietatis debetur affectus; unde quis uel aliquantulum sacrarum expertus scripturarum hesitauerit? Si enim attenderimus consuetudines ecclesiae non per scripturas a Patribus traditas nichil estimare, quantum religio detrimenti sit latura, intentiuum despicientibus liquido constabit. §. 1. Que enim (ut inde ordiamur) scriptura salutiferae crucis signaculo fideles docuit insigniri? uel que trifariam digesta super panem et calicem prolixae orationis uel consecrationis uerba commendauit? Nam non modo, quod in euangelio continetur uel ab Apostolo insertum secretis dicimus, sed et alia plura adicimus magnam quasi uim commendantia misteriis. Que orientem uersus nos orare litterarum forma docuit? Benedicimus fontem baptismatis oleo unctionis. Huc accedit, quod ter oleo inungimus quos baptizamus, uerbis abrenuntiare satanae angelis eius informamus. Unde hec et alia in hunc modum non pauca, nisi tacita ac mistica traditione a Patribus ecclesiastico more ac reuerentiori diligentia sunt in ministeriis obseruata magis silentio quam publicata scripto?

C. VI. A custom that usurps nothing contrary to the faith is praiseworthy.

The same, to the priest Casulanus. We praise a custom that is nevertheless known to usurp nothing contrary to the Catholic faith.

> C. VI. Laudabilis est consuetudo, que nichil fidei contrarium usurpat.
> Idem ad Casulanum presbiterum. Consuetudinem laudamus, que tamen contra fidem catholicam nichil usurpare dignoscitur.

C. VII. Where authority is lacking, the custom of the people and the institutions of the elders are to be observed as law.

Likewise, to the same [blessed Augustine to Casulanus, epistle LXXXVI]. In those matters concerning which divine Scripture has established nothing certain, the custom of the people of God and the institutions of the elders are to be held as law. And just as transgressors of divine laws, so also contemners of ecclesiastical customs are to be restrained.

> C. VII. Ubi auctoritas deficit, mos populi et maiorum instituta pro lege seruentur.

Item ad eundem. [B. Augustinus ad Casulanum, epist. LXXXVI.] In his rebus, de quibus nihil certi statuit diuina scriptura, mos populi Dei et instituta maiorum pro lege tenenda sunt. Et sicut preuaricatores legum diuinarum, ita contemptores consuetudinum ecclesiasticarum cohercendi sunt.

C. VIII. The Church is governed by authority and by general or special tradition.

The same, in the book On the Christian Faith. The Catholic Church, spread throughout the world, is shown to exist in three ways. Whatever is held in it is either the authority of the Scriptures, a universal tradition, or certainly a proper and particular instruction. But the whole Church is bound by authority, and no less the whole by the universal tradition of the elders; by private enactments and proper instructions, however, each church subsists and is governed according to the diversity of places, as has seemed good to each.

C. VIII. Auctoritate et traditione generali uel speciali ecclesia regitur.

Idem in libro de christiana fide. Catholica ecclesia, per orbem diffusa, tribus modis probatur existere. Quicquid in ea tenetur, aut auctoritas est scripturarum, aut traditio uniuersalis, aut certe propria et particularis instructio. Sed auctoritate tota constringitur, uniuersali traditione maiorum nichilominus tota; priuatis uero constitutionibus et propriis informationibus unaqueque pro locorum uarietate, prout cuique uisum est, subsistit et regitur.

C. IX. The authority of the Catholic Church avails for faith.

The same, in the book against the Manichaeans. It is plain that in a doubtful matter the authority of the Catholic Church avails for faith, which is confirmed from the best-founded sees of the Apostles down to the present day by the succession of bishops succeeding one another and by the agreement of so many peoples.

C. IX. Valet ad fidem catholicae auctoritas ecclesiae.

Idem in libro contra Manicheos. Palam est, quod in re dubia ad fidem ualeat auctoritas ecclesiae catholicae, que ab ipsis fundatissimis sedibus apostolorum usque ad hodiernum diem succedentium sibimet episcoporum serie et tot populorum consensione firmatur.

C. X. It is not lawful to depart from apostolic institutions.

Likewise Leo [pope, to the bishops established throughout Sicily, epistle IV, c. 6]. We enjoin this upon your charity: that henceforth you depart from apostolic institutions by no transgression, because after this it cannot go unpunished if anyone believes that apostolic rules are to be neglected in any respect.

C. X. Ab apostolicis institutis non licet recedere.

Item Leo. [Papa ad Episcopos per Siciliam constitutos, epist IV. c. 6.] Hoc uestrae indicimus caritati, ut ab apostolicis institutis nullo ulterius recedatis excessu, quia inultum post hec esse non poterit, si quisquam apostolicas regulas in aliquo crediderit negligendas.

C. XI. What the Roman Church observes ought to be observed by all.

Likewise Innocent to Bishop Decentius [likewise Innocent I to Decentius, bishop of Gubbio, epistle I]. Who does not know or notice that what was handed down to the Roman Church by Peter, prince of the Apostles, and is guarded until now, ought to be observed by all, and that nothing should be added or introduced that ought to receive authority or an example from elsewhere? Especially since it is manifest that throughout all Italy, the Gauls, the Spains, Africa, Sicily, and the intervening islands, no one established churches except those whom the venerable Apostle Peter or his successors constituted priests. Let them read, however, whether another apostle is found or is read to have taught in these provinces. But if they do not read it, because they find it nowhere, they ought to follow what the Roman Church observes, from which it is not doubtful that they received their beginning, lest while they devote themselves to foreign teachings they appear to lose the head of their institutions. §1. It is not doubtful that your belovedness has often come to the City and met with us in the church, and has learned what custom it maintains either in consecrating the mysteries or in performing other sacred rites. I would judge this sufficient for the instruction or reformation of your church, if your predecessors maintained anything deficient or otherwise, and I would hold it entirely certain, had you not judged that we should be consulted concerning some matters. We therefore answer these things not because we believe that you are ignorant, but so that with greater authority you may either instruct your own people, or, if any depart from the institutions of the Roman Church, admonish them, or not delay to report them, so that we may be able to know who they are who either introduce novelties or think that the custom of a church other than the Roman Church is to be observed.

> Item Innocentius Decentio Episcopo. [it. Inn. I. ad Decentium Episcopum Eugubinum, epist. I.] Quis nesciat aut non aduertat, id quod a principe apostolorum Petro Romanae ecclesiae traditum est, ac nunc usque custoditur, ab omnibus debere seruari? nec superduci aut introduci aliquid, quod auctoritatem debeat uel aliunde accipere exemplum? presertim cum sit manifestum, in omnem Italiam, Gallias, Ispanias, Africam atque Siciliam insulasque interiacentes nullum instituisse ecclesias, nisi eos, quos uenerabilis apostolus Petrus aut successores eius constituerunt sacerdotes; legant autem, si in istis prouinciis alius apostolus inuenitur, aut legitur docuisse. Quod si non legunt, quia nusquam inueniunt, oportet eos hoc sequi, quod ecclesia Romana custodit, a qua principium eos accepisse non dubium est: ne dum peregrinis sermonibus student, caput institutionum uideantur amittere. §. 1. Sepe dilectionem tuam ad Urbem uenisse ac nobiscum in ecclesia conuenisse non dubium est, et quem morem uel in consecrandis misteriis, uel ceteris agendis arcanis teneat, agnouisse. Quod sufficere arbitrarer ad informationem ecclesiae tuae uel reformationem, si predecessores tui minus aliquid aut aliter tenuerint, satis certum haberem, nisi de aliquibus consulendos nos esse duxisset; quibus idcirco respondemus, non quod te ignorare credamus, sed ut maiori auctoritate uel tuos instituas, uel si qui a Romanae ecclesiae institutionibus errat, aut commoneas, aut indicare non differas, ut scire ualeamus, qui sint, qui aut nouitates inducunt, aut alterius ecclesiae quam Romanae existimant consuetudinem esse seruandam.

Distinction XII

GRATIAN. Part I. That it is lawful for no one to act without the discernment of justice. Hence Pope Callistus [I] to all bishops [says in Epistle I to Bishop Benedict]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod absque discretione iustitiae nulli agere licet. Unde Calixtus Papa [I.] omnibus Episcopis: [ait in Epistola I. ad Benedictum Episcopum.]

C. I. Without the discernment of justice, no one is permitted to act against the discipline of the Roman Church.

It is not fitting that the members dissent from the head, but, according to the testimony of Scripture, let all the members follow the head. It is doubtful to no one that the apostolic Church is the mother of all churches, from whose rules it is in no way fitting for you to deviate. And just as a son comes to do the will of his father, so also fulfill the will of your mother, which is the Church, whose head, as was said before, is the Roman Church. Therefore, whatever has been done without the discernment of justice against its discipline, no reason permits to be held ratified.

> C. I. Sine discretione iustitiae contra disciplinam Romanae ecclesiae nulli agere licet.
> Non decet a capite membra dissidere, sed iuxta scripturae testimonium omnia membra caput sequantur. Nulli uero dubium est, quod apostolica ecclesia mater sit omnium ecclesiarum, a cuius uos regulis nullatenus conuenit deuiare. Et sicut filius uenit facere uoluntatem patris, sic et uos uoluntatem implete uestrae matris, que est ecclesia, cuius caput, ut predictum est, Romana existit ecclesia. Quicquid ergo sine discretione iustitiae contra huius disciplinam actum fuerit, ratum habere nulla ratio permittit.

C. II. Let no one proudly resist apostolic precepts.

Likewise Gregory [Pope IV]. Let stubborn pride not resist apostolic precepts, but through obedience let those things that have been commanded by the holy Roman and apostolic authority be savingly fulfilled, if you desire to have communion with that same holy Church of God, which is your head. §1. By the present command we prescribe nothing new, but confirm those things that appear to have been granted long ago, since it is doubtful to no one that not only a pontifical case but every matter of holy religion ought to be referred to the apostolic see as to the head of the churches, and ought to take its norm from the place from which it took its beginning, lest the head of the institution appear to be omitted. Let all priests who do not wish to be torn from the solidity of the apostolic rock upon which Christ founded the universal Church hold the sanction of this authority. If anyone has not observed these precepts of the apostolic see, let there be no doubt that he is an enemy of the honor he has received.

> C. II. Apostolicis preceptis nullus superbe resistat.
> Item Gregorius. [Papa IV.] Preceptis apostolicis non dura superbia resistatur, sed per obedientiam, que a sancta Romana et apostolica auctoritate iussa sunt, salutifere impleantur, si eiusdem sanctae ecclesiae Dei, que est caput uestrum, communionem habere desideratis. §. 1. Non nouum aliquid presenti iussione precipimus, sed illa, que olim uidentur indulta, firmamus: cum nulli dubium sit, quod non solum pontificalis causatio, sed omnis sanctae religionis relatio ad sedem apostolicam quasi ad caput ecclesiarum debeat referri, et inde normam sumere, unde sumpsit exordium, ne caput institutionis uideatur omitti. Cuius auctoritatis sanctionem omnes teneant sacerdotes, qui nolunt ab apostolicae petrae, super quam Christus uniuersalem ecclesiam fundauit, soliditate diuelli. Si quis hec apostolicae sedis precepta non obseruauerit, percepti honoris esse hostis non dubitetur.

C. III. A custom to which canonical authority does not object is not to be resisted.

Likewise Nicholas to Emperor Michael [Leo IX to Michael, bishop of Constantinople, epistle I, c. 29, and Nicholas I, epistle II to Photius]. The holy Roman Church knows that diverse customs according to place and time in no way harm the salvation of believers, if canonical authority does not oppose them, on account of which we ought to oppose those customs; hence we judge that one neither ought nor is able to resist them.

> C. III. Non est resistendum consuetudini, cui canonica non obsistit auctoritas.
> Item Nicolaus Michaeli Imperatori. [Leo IX. Michaeli Episcopo Constantinopolitano, epist. I. c. 29. et Nicolaus I. epist. II. ad Photium.] Scit sancta Romana ecclesia, quod nichil obsunt saluti credentium diuersae pro loco et tempore consuetudines, si illis canonica non obsistit auctoritas, pro qua eis obuiare debeamus, unde nil iudicamus eis debere uel posse resisti.

C. IV. Customs that do not injure the faith are to be observed as they were handed down by the elders.

Likewise Jerome to Lucinus [epistle XXVIII]. I think you should briefly be admonished that ecclesiastical traditions, especially those that do not injure the faith, are to be observed as they were handed down by the elders, and that the custom of some is not to be overturned by the contrary custom of others.

> C. IV. Consuetudines, que fidei non offitiunt, ut a maioribus traditae sunt, obseruentur.
> Item Ieronimus ad Lucinum. [epist. XXVIII.] Illud breuiter te admonendum puto, traditiones ecclesiasticas, presertim que fidei non offitiant, ita obseruandas, ut a maioribus traditae sunt, nec aliorum consuetudinem aliorum contrario more subuerti.

C. V. Traditions instituted by the fathers are not to be broken.

Likewise Nicholas to Bishop Hincmar. It is ridiculous and a sufficiently abominable disgrace that we should suffer the traditions that we received from the fathers in antiquity to be broken.

> C. V. Traditiones a patribus institutae, non sunt infringendae.
> Item Nicolaus Incmaro Episcopo. Ridiculum est, et satis abominabile dedecus, ut traditiones, quas antiquitus a patribus suscepimus, infringi patiamur.

C. VI. Longstanding customs are to be held as law.

Likewise Justinian, Book I of the Constitutions, title I [Institutes, Book I, title 2, On Natural Law, §9]. Longstanding customs, unless they are opposed to law, being approved by the consent of those who use them, imitate law.

> C. VI. Mores diuturni pro lege sunt habendi.
> Item Iustinianus Constitutionum libro I. titulo I. [Institutionum lib. I. tit. 2. de iure nat. §. 9.] Diuturni mores nisi legi sunt aduersi consensu utentium approbati legem imitantur.

C. VII. Whatever is done against longstanding custom ought to be revoked.

Likewise Book VIII of the Code, c. 52, title 2 [title 53, What Constitutes Long Custom, law 1]. Preceding custom and the reason that commended the custom are to be maintained. And the governor of the province shall recall to his own solicitude whatever is done against longstanding custom.

> C. VII. Quicquid fit contra longam consuetudinem, reuocari oportet.
> Item Codicis libro VIII. c. 52. titulo 2. [tit. 53. quae sit longa consuetudo l. 1.] Consuetudo precedens et ratio, que consuetudinem suasit, tenenda est. Et quicquid contra longam consuetudinem fiet, ad sollicitudinem suam reuocabit preses prouinciae.

C. VIII. A custom that is known to usurp nothing contrary to the Catholic faith is to remain unmoved.

Likewise Gregory to all the bishops of Numidia [Book I, epistle LXXV]. We permit a custom that is known to usurp nothing contrary to the Catholic faith to remain unmoved, whether concerning the constituting of primates or concerning the other chapters, excepting those who pass from the Donatists to the episcopate. We prohibit in every way their promotion to the dignity of primate, even when their order carries them to the same place. Let it suffice for them to conduct the care of the people committed to them, but not to precede, in obtaining the summit of the primacy, those bishops whom the Catholic faith both instructed and begot in the bosom of the Church.

C. VIII. Immota maneat consuetudo, que contra fidem catholicam nichil usurpare dignoscitur.

Item Gregorius uniuersis Episcopis Numidiis. [lib. I. epist. LXXV.] Nos consuetudinem, que contra fidem catholicam nichil usurpare dignoscitur, immotam permanere concedimus, siue de primatibus constituendis, siue de ceteris capitulis, exceptis iis, qui ex Donatistis ad episcopatum perueniunt, quos prouehi ad primatus dignitatem (etiam cum ordo eos deferat ad locum eundem) modis omnibus prohibemus. Suffitiat autem illis commissae sibi plebis curam gerere, non autem illos antistites, quos catholica fides in ecclesiae sinu et edocuit et genuit, ad obtinendum culmen primatus anteire.

C. IX. Things belonging to custom are not to be denied.

Likewise Gregory [to Maximus, bishop of Salona, Book VII of the Register, epistle 81]. Just as we do not allow unlawful things to be perpetrated there, so we do not deny the things that belong to custom.

C. IX. Non negentur que consuetudinis sunt.

Item Gregorius. [ad Maximum Salonitanum Episcopum lib. VII. Regest epist. 81.] Quemadmodum illicita perpetrare non patimur, sic que consuetudinis sunt non negamus.

C. X. It is not place that commends a custom, but custom that commends a place.

Likewise to Augustine, bishop of the English [response to question 3]. Your fraternity knows the custom of the Roman Church, in which it remembers that it was nourished. But it pleases me that, whether in the Roman Church, or in that of the Gauls, or in any church, you have found something that can please almighty God more, you carefully choose it and, by a principal institution, infuse into the Church of the English, which is still new in the faith, those things that you have been able to gather from many churches. For things are not to be loved for the sake of places, but places for the sake of things. Therefore, choose from each several church the things that are pious, religious, and right, and, having gathered these as though into a bundle, establish them as a custom among the minds of the English.

C. X. Non locus consuetudinem, sed consuetudo locum commendat.

Item ad Augustino Anglorum Episcopo. [resp. ad interrog. 3.] Nouit fraternitas tua Romanae ecclesiae consuetudinem, in qua se meminit nutritam. Sed mihi placet, ut siue in Romana, siue in Gallicorum, siue in qualibet ecclesia inuenisti, quod plus omnipotenti Deo possit placere, sollicite eligas, et in Anglorum ecclesia, que adhuc in fide noua est, institutione precipua, que de multis ecclesiis colligere potueris, infundas. Non enim pro locis res, sed pro rebus loca amanda sunt. Ex singulis ergo quibusque ecclesiis que pia, que religiosa, que recta sunt, elige, et hec quasi in fasciculum collecta apud Anglorum mentes in consuetudinem depone.

C. XI. What is proved to be neither against faith nor against good morals is to be regarded as indifferent.

Likewise Augustine to Januarius [epistle CXVIII, cc. 1–2]. Those things that we guard not as written but as handed down, which indeed are observed throughout the whole world, are understood to be retained as commended and established either by the Apostles themselves or by plenary councils, whose authority in the Church is most salutary: such as the fact that the Lord's passion and resurrection and ascension into heaven, and the coming of the Holy Spirit, are celebrated by an anniversary solemnity; and if anything else of this kind occurs that is observed by the whole Church wherever it is spread. §1. Other things, however, vary throughout the regions and territories of the world, such as the fact that some fast on the Sabbath and others do not; others communicate daily in the body and blood of the Lord, while others receive on fixed days. And if anything else of this kind can be observed, this entire kind of matters admits free observances. For what is proved to be neither against faith nor against good morals is to be regarded as indifferent and observed according to the fellowship of those among whom one lives. My mother, having followed me to Milan, found a church that did not fast on the Sabbath; she had begun to waver as to what she should do. Then I consulted Bishop Ambrose of most blessed memory concerning this matter; but he said: "When I come to Rome, I fast on the Sabbath; when I am at Milan, I do not fast. So also you: to whatever church you may happen to come, observe its custom, if you do not wish to be a scandal to anyone or anyone to you." When I reported this to my mother, she willingly embraced it.

Part II. GRATIAN. This, however, is to be understood concerning that custom which is strengthened either by the usage of the universal Church or by length of time. But if varied customs are introduced according to the variety of times or minds, when an opportunity is found they are to be cut away rather than observed. Hence Augustine writes in response to the inquiries of Januarius [epistle CXIX, c. 19]:

C. XI. Quod neque contra fidem, neque contra bonos mores esse conuincitur, indifferenter est habendum.

Item Augustinus ad Ianuarium. [epist. CXVIII. cap. 1. et 2] Illa autem, que non scripta, sed tradita custodimus, que quidem toto terrarum orbe obseruantur, datur intelligi uel ab ipsis apostolis, uel plenariis conciliis, (quorum est in ecclesia saluberrima auctoritas), commendata atque statuta retineri: sicuti id quod Domini passio et resurrectio et ascensio in celum, aduentus Spiritus sancti anniuersaria solennitate celebratur: et si quid aliud tale occurrerit, quod seruetur ab uniuersis, quacunque se diffundit ecclesia. §. 1. Alia uero, que per loca terrarum regionesque uariantur, sicuti est quod alii ieiunant sabbatum, alii non: alii uero quotidie communicant corpori et sanguini domini, alii certis diebus accipiunt: et si quid aliud huiusmodi animaduerti potest, totum hoc genus rerum liberas habet obseruationes; quod enim neque contra fidem, neque contra bonos mores esse conuincitur, indifferenter habendum, et pro eorum, inter quos uiuitur, societate seruandum est. Mater Mediolanum me secuta inuenit ecclesiam sabbato non ieiunantem; ceperat fluctuare quid ageret. Tunc ego consului de hac re beatissimae memoriae Ambrosium episcopum; at ille ait: cum Romam uenio, sabbato ieiuno, cum Mediolani sum, non ieiuno. Sic et tu, ad quam forte ecclesiam ueneris, eius morem serua, si cuiquam non uis esse scandalum, nec quemquam tibi. Hoc cum matri renuntiassem, libenter amplexa est. II.

Pars. Gratianus. Hoc autem de consuetudine illa intelligendum est, que uel uniuersalis ecclesiae usu, uel temporis prolixitate roboratur. Ceterum, si pro uarietate temporum uel animorum uariae consuetudines introducantur, inuenta opportunitate, resecandae sunt potius quam obseruandae. Unde Augustinus scribit ad inquisitiones Ianuarii: [epist. CXIX. c. 19.]

C. XII. Things approved neither by authority nor by the customs of the universal Church are to be cut away.

All such things that are neither contained in the authorities of the holy Scriptures, nor found to have been established in councils of bishops, nor strengthened by the custom of the universal Church, but vary innumerably according to the diverse customs of diverse places, so that the causes which men followed in establishing them can scarcely or never at all be discovered—where the faculty is granted, I judge that they are to be cut away without any hesitation. For although it cannot be discovered how this is against faith, they nevertheless burden with servile loads the religion that the mercy of God willed to be free through the very few and most manifest sacraments of celebrations, so that the condition of the Jews is more tolerable; for although they did not recognize the time of liberty, they are nevertheless subjected to legal sacraments, not to human presumptions.

C. XII. Resecanda sunt, que neque auctoritate, neque moribus uniuersitatis comprobantur.

Omnia talia, que neque sanctarum scripturarum auctoritatibus continentur, nec in conciliis episcoporum statuta inueniuntur, nec consuetudine uniuersae ecclesiae roborata sunt, sed diuersorum locorum diuersis moribus innumerabiliter uariantur, ita ut uix aut numquam omnino inueniri possint causae, quas in eis constituendis homines secuti sunt, ubi facultas tribuitur, sine ulla dubitatione resecanda existimo. Quamuis enim neque hoc inueniri possit, quomodo contra fidem sint, ipsam tamen religionem, quam paucissimis et manifestissimis celebrationum sacramentis misericordia Dei esse uoluit liberam, ideo seruilibus oneribus premunt, ut tolerabilior sit conditio Iudeorum, qui etiamsi tempus libertatis non cognouerint, legalibus tamen sacramentis, non humanis presumtionibus subiciuntur.

C. XIII. All provincials are to maintain in psalmody the same manner that they know the metropolitan see maintains.

Likewise from the Council of Toledo [XI, c. 3]. Part III. Concerning those who, contrary to the will of the Apostle, are carried about by every wind of doctrine, it pleased the holy council that, constrained by the authority of the metropolitan see, the citizens of each province and the rulers of the churches should maintain one and the same manner in psalmody that they know to have been instituted in the metropolitan see, and should not permit themselves to be separated from the metropolitan see by any diversity of any order or office. For it is just that each person take the rules of teaching from the place from which he receives the consecration of honor, so that according to the decrees of the elders the see that is the mother of each priestly dignity may be the teacher of ecclesiastical order. With the offices granted to abbots, which they are to fulfill regularly according to the will of their bishop, let it not be lawful for them to celebrate the other public offices, that is, vespers, matins, or Mass, otherwise than in the principal church. §1. Whoever shall have been a violator of these decrees, deprived of communion for six months, shall remain with the metropolitan to be corrected under the censure of penance, so that with him he may both wash away with tears the fault of his past transgression and diligently learn the necessary doctrine of the offices. §2. Therefore, under this rule of discipline, let not only the metropolitan bind the bishops or priests of his whole province, but let the other bishops also compel the rulers of churches subject to them to obey these institutions.

> Item ex Concilio Tolletano. [XI. c. 3.] III. Pars. De his, qui contra Apostoli uoluntatem circumferuntur omni uento doctrinae, placuit sancto concilio, ut metropolitanae sedis auctoritate coacti uniuscuiusque prouinciae ciues, rectoresque ecclesiarum unum eundemque in psallendo teneant modum, quem metropolitana in sede cognouerint institutum, nec aliqua diuersitate cuiusque ordinis uel offitii a metropolitana se patiantur sede disiungi. Sic enim iustum est, ut inde unusquisque sumat regulas magisterii, unde honoris consecrationem accipit, ut iuxta maiorum decreta sedes, que uniuscuiusque sacerdotalis dignitatis est mater, sit ecclesiasticae magistra rationis. Abbatibus sane indultis offitiis, que iuxta uoluntatem sui episcopi regulariter illis implenda sunt, cetera offitia publica, id est uesperam, matutinum, siue missam, aliter quam in principali ecclesia celebrare non liceat. §. 1. Quisquis autem horum decretorum uiolator exstiterit, sex mensibus communione priuatus apud metropolitanum sub penitentiae censura maneat corrigendus: quatenus apud illum et preteritae transgressionis culpam lacrimis diluat, et necessariam offitiorum doctrinam studiose addiscat. §. 2. Sub ista ergo regula disciplinae non solum metropolitanus totius suae prouinciae pontifices uel sacerdotes adstringat, sed etiam ceteri episcopi subiectos sibi ecclesiarum rectores obtemperare institutionibus cogant.

C. XIV. One and the same order is to be observed in the offices of matins and vespers.

Likewise from the Council of Braga [I, c. 1]. It pleased all by common consent that one and the same order of psalmody should be maintained in the offices of matins or vespers, and not diverse and private orders, nor should the customs of monasteries be mixed with the ecclesiastical rule.

> C. XIV. Ordo seruetur in matutinis et uespertinis offitiis unus et idem.
> Item ex Concilio Bracarensi. [I. cap. 1.] Placuit omnibus communi consensu, ut unus atque idem psallendi ordo in matutinis uel uespertinis offitiis teneatur, et non diuerse ac priuate, neque monasteriorum consuetudines cum ecclesiastica regula sint permixtae.

Distinction XIII

GRATIAN. Part I. Likewise, no dispensation is admitted against natural law, unless perhaps two evils press in such a way that it is necessary to choose one of them. Hence it is read in the Eighth Council of Toledo [c. 2]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Item aduersus naturale ius nulla dispensatio admittitur; nisi forte duo mala ita urgeant ut alterum eorum necesse sit eligi. Unde in Concilio Tolletano VIII. [c. 2.] legitur:

C. I. The lesser of two evils is to be chosen.

Although two evils are to be guarded against with the utmost caution, nevertheless, if the necessity of danger has compelled one of them to be moderated, we ought to resolve upon that which is known to bind us with the lesser bond. Let us investigate with the acuteness of pure reason which of these is lighter and which graver. For when we are compelled to swear falsely, we indeed offend the Creator, but we stain only ourselves. But when we fulfill harmful promises, we both despise God's commands and harm our neighbors with impious cruelty, and we slaughter ourselves with the still more cruel sword of death. In the former case we are destroyed by the double weapon of faults; in the latter we are slain threefold.

> C. I. Minus malum de duobus est eligendum.
> Duo mala, licet cautissime sint precauenda tamen si periculi necessitas unum ex his temperare compulerit, id debemus resoluere, quod minori nexu noscitur obligari. Quid autem leuius ex his, quidue grauius sit, purae rationis acumine inuestigemus. Etenim dum peierare compellimur, creatorem quidem offendimus, sed nos tantummodo maculamus. Cum uero noxia promissa complemus et Dei iussa contempnimus et proximis impia crudelitate nocemus, et nos ipsos crudeliori mortis gladio trucidamus. Illic enim dupplici culparum telo perimimur, hic tripliciter iugulamur.

C. II. On the same matter.

Likewise Gregory, in the Moralia, Part VI, Book XXXV, c. XIV [on Job 40, Book XXXII, cc. 17, 18, 19, and 20]. The sinews of Leviathan's testicles are entangled, because the devices of his suggestions are bound up in intricate contrivances, so that they cause many persons to sin in such a way that, if perhaps they desire to flee sin, they cannot escape it without another snare of sin, and they commit a fault while avoiding one, and are by no means able to free themselves from one unless they consent to bind themselves in another. We show this better if we bring forth from human conduct some examples of this entanglement. §1. Behold, while a certain person seeks the friendships of this world, he binds himself by an oath to another person leading a life similar to his own that he will conceal the latter's secrets with complete silence. But the one to whom the oath was sworn is discovered to be committing adultery, so that he even attempts to kill the adulteress's husband. The one who furnished the oath, however, returns to his senses and is assailed on either side by diverse thoughts: he fears to remain silent, lest by his silence he become a participant in both the adultery and the homicide; he trembles to disclose it, lest he bind himself with the guilt of perjury. He is therefore bound by the entangled sinews of the testicles, because in whichever direction he turns, he fears that he will not be free from the contagion of transgression. §2. Another, abandoning everything that belongs to the world and seeking to break his own wills in every respect, desires to subject himself to another's governance; but with insufficiently cautious inquiry he discerns the one who ought to preside over him toward God. For perhaps the man who is chosen without judgment, once he has begun to preside, prohibits the things that are of God and commands the things that are of the world. Thus the subject, weighing both what the fault of disobedience is and what the contagion of secular life is, trembles to obey and fears not to obey, lest either by obeying he abandon God in his commandments, or, again, by not obeying he despise God in the one whom he previously chose. §3. Another, neglecting to weigh the burden of ecclesiastical honor, ascends to a place of governance by payments. But because everything that is eminent here is afflicted more by sorrows than it rejoices in honors, while his heart is pressed by tribulation, his fault is recalled to memory; he grieves that he reached this labor with fault, and, broken by the very difficulty, recognizes how wicked was what he committed. Therefore, recognizing himself as guilty through the payments expended, he wishes to abandon the place of eminence he obtained, but fears that it would be a graver offense to have abandoned the guardianship of the flock he received; he wishes to exercise the care of the flock he received, but fears that it is a worse fault to possess a pastoral government that was purchased. Thus he sees himself bound on either side by fault through the ambition for honor. For he sees that neither course is without the guilt of crime: either the flock once received is abandoned, or a sacred action purchased in worldly fashion is retained. He fears on every side and dreads every suspect direction, lest either, remaining unworthily in the governance he purchased, he lament what he does not amend by also abandoning it, or certainly, abandoning the governance while he strives to lament one thing, he commit another in turn through the very desertion of the flock.

Part II. §4. There is nevertheless something that may be subtly done to destroy the cunning devices of Behemoth: when the mind is constrained between lesser and greatest sins, if no approach whatsoever lies open without sin, the lesser are always to be chosen. For one who is enclosed on every side by the circuit of walls, lest he escape, casts himself into flight where the shorter wall confronts him. Hence Paul, when he saw certain incontinent persons in the Church, conceded the least things so that they might avoid the greater, saying: "Because of fornication, however, let each man have his own wife." And because spouses are without fault in intercourse only when they are joined not to fulfill lust but to receive offspring, in order to show that even what he had conceded was not without fault, though the fault was very slight, he immediately added: "I say this, however, according to indulgence, not according to command." For what is pardoned, not commanded, is not without vice. He certainly saw a sin that he foresaw could be indulged. But when we are constrained amid doubtful things, we are usefully subjected to the least, lest we sin in great things without pardon. §5. Thus the entanglement of this Behemoth's sinews is very often loosed when one passes to the greatest virtues through lesser offenses.

C. II. De eodem.

Item Gregorius in Moralibus parte VI. libro XXXV. c. XIV. [in c. 40. Iob. I. XXXII. c. 17. 18. 19. et 20.] Nerui testiculorum Leuiathan perplexi sunt, quia suggestionum illius argumenta implicatis inuentis alligantur, ut plerosque ita peccare faciant, quatenus si fortasse fugere peccatum appetant, hoc sine alio peccati laqueo non euadant, et culpam faciant dum uitant, atque nequaquam se ab una ualeant soluere, nisi in alia se consentiant ligare. Quod melius ostendimus, si qua ex conuersatione hominum alligationis huius exempla proferamus. §. 1. Ecce quidam, dum mundi huius amicitias appetit, cuilibet alteri similem sibi uitam ducenti, quod secreta illius omni silentio contegat, se iureiurando constringit. Sed is, cui iuratum est, adulterium perpetrare cognoscitur, ita ut etiam maritum adulterae occidere conetur. Is autem, qui iusiurandum prebuit, ad mentem reuertitur et diuersis hinc inde cogitationibus impugnatur, atque hoc silere formidat, ne silentio adulterii simul et homicidii particeps fiat, prodere trepidat, ne reatu se periurii obstringat. Perplexis ergo neruis testiculorum ligatus est, qui in quamlibet partem declinet, metuit, ne a transgressionis contagione liber non sit. §. 2. Alius cuncta, que mundi sunt, deserens, ac per omnia frangere proprias uoluntates querens, alieno se subdere regimini appetit, sed eum, qui sibi ad Deum preesse debeat, minus cauta inquisitione discernit: quia fortasse is, qui sine iudicio eligitur, cum preesse iam ceperit, agere que Dei sunt prohibet, que mundi sunt iubet. Pensans itaque subditus, uel que sit culpa inobedientiae, uel quod contagium secularis uitae, et obedire trepidat, et non obedire formidat, ne aut obediens Deum in suis preceptis deserat, aut rursus non obediens Deum in electo priore contempnat. §. 3. Alius pensare pondus honoris ecclesiastici negligens id locum regiminis premiis ascendit. Sed quia omne, quod hic eminet, plus meroribus afficitur, quam honoribus gaudet, dum cor tribulatione premitur, ad memoriam culpa reuocatur, doletque se ad laborem cum culpa peruenisse, et quam sit iniquum, quod admiserit, ex ipsa fractus difficultate cognoscit. Reum se igitur cum impensis premiis agnoscens, uult adeptae sublimitatis locum deserere, sed timet, ne grauius delictum sit suscepti gregis custodiam reliquisse; uult suscepti gregis curam gerere, sed formidat, ne deterior culpa sit, regimina pastoralis gregis empta possidere. Per honoris ergo ambitum ligatum culpa hinc inde se conspicit. Esse quippe sine reatu criminis neutrum uidet, si aut susceptus semel grex relinquitur, aut rursum sacra actio seculariter empta teneatur. Undique metuit et suspectus latus omne pertimescit, ne aut stans in empto regimine non digne, lugeat quod non etiam deserens emendat, aut certe regimen deserens, dum aliud flere nititur, rursus aliud de ipsa gregis destitutione committat. II. Pars. §. 4. Est tamen, quod ad destruendas Behemot uersutias subtiliter fiat, ut cum mens inter minora et maxima peccata constringitur, si omnino nullus sine peccato aditus patet, minora semper eligantur; quia et qui murorum undique ambitu, ne fugiat, clauditur, ibi se in fugam precipitat, ubi breuior murus ingeritur. Hinc Paulus, cum quosdam in ecclesia incontinentes aspiceret, concessit minima, ut maiora declinarent, dicens: "Propter fornicationem autem unusquisque suam uxorem habeat." Et quia tunc solum coniuges in admixtione sunt sine culpa, cum non pro explenda libidine, sed pro suscipienda prole miscentur, ut hoc etiam, quod concesserat sine culpa (quamuis minima) non esse monstraret, ilico adiunxit: "Hoc autem dico secundum indulgentiam, non secundum imperium." Non enim est sine uitio, quod ignoscitur, non precipitur. Peccatum profecto uidit, quod posse indulgeri preuidit. Sed cum in dubiis constringimur, utiliter minimis subdimur, ne in magnis sine uenia peccemus. §. 5. Itaque plerumque neruorum Behemot istius perplexitas soluitur, dum ad uirtutes maximas per commissa minora transitur.

GRATIAN. Part I. But this is understood in one and the same person. It is deservedly asked, however, whether the same dispensation has a place in diverse persons—namely, that we commit lesser offenses lest others become entangled in graver ones. Augustine writes thus concerning these matters in the book Questions on Genesis [c. 42]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Verum hoc in una eademque persona intelligitur. Ceterum an in diuersis eadem dispensatio locum habeat, uidelicet, ut committamus minora, ne alii grauioribus implicentur, merito queritur. De his ita scribit Augustinus libro Questionum super Genesim: [cap. 42.]

C. I. No offenses are to be committed by us lest others commit graver ones.

As to what Lot said to the Sodomites: "I have two daughters who have not yet known men; I shall bring them out to you; use them as it pleases you, only do no wrong to these men": since he wished to prostitute his daughters by this compensation so that his male guests might suffer nothing of this kind from the Sodomites, it is deservedly asked whether a compensation of shameful acts or of any sins whatsoever is to be admitted, so that we may do some evil lest another do a graver evil; or whether it should rather be attributed not to Lot's counsel but to the disturbance of the man who said this. And certainly this compensation is admitted most dangerously. But if it is attributed to human disturbance and to a mind agitated by so great an evil, it is in no way to be imitated.

Part II. GRATIAN. The rigor of custom or positive law, however, is sometimes relaxed. Hence Pope Leo says [to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne, epistle XC, before c. 1]:

C. II. Which enactments may be moderated, and which may not.

Just as there are certain things that can be overturned for no reason, so there are many things that ought to be moderated either because of the necessity of the times or from consideration of ages, with this condition always preserved: that in those things that are either doubtful or obscure, we know that this is to be followed which is found neither contrary to evangelical precepts nor opposed to the decrees of the holy fathers.

C. I. Non sunt a nobis aliqua committenda delicta, ne alii grauiora committant.

Quod ait Sodomitis Loth: "Sunt mihi duae filiae, que nondum nouerunt uiros; producam illas ad uos, utimini illis, sicut placuerit uobis: tantum in uiros istos ne faciatis iniquum:" quoniam prostituere uolebat filias suas hac compensatione, ut uiri hospites eius nichil a Sodomitis tale paterentur, utrum admittenda sit compensatio flagitiorum uel quorumcumque peccatorum, ut nos faciamus mali aliquid, ne alius grauius malum faciat; an potius perturbationi Loth non consilio tribuendum sit, qui hoc dixerit, merito queritur. Et nimirum periculosissime admittitur hec compensatio. Si autem perturbationi humanae tribuitur et menti tanto malo permotae, nullo modo imitanda est. II. Pars. Gratianus. Consuetudinis autem uel constitutionis rigor nonnumquam relaxatur. Unde Leo Papa ait: [ad Rusticum Narbonensem Episc. epist. XC. ante cap. 1.] C. II. Que constitutiones ualeant temperari, uel que non. Sicut quedam sunt, que nulla ratione conuelli possunt, ita multa sunt, que aut pro necessitate temporum, aut pro consideratione etatum oporteat temperari; illa semper conditione seruata, ut in his, que uel dubia fuerint aut obscura, id nouerimus sequendum, quod nec preceptis euangelicis contrarium, nec decretis sanctorum Patrum inueniatur aduersum.

GRATIAN. Part I. Thus far we have discussed natural law and positive law or custom, assigning the difference by which they are distinguished from one another. Now let us turn the pen to ecclesiastical enactments, briefly assigning their origin and authority insofar as we are able to gather them from the books of the holy fathers.

GRATIANUS I. Pars. De naturali iure et constitutione uel consuetudine hactenus disseruimus, differentiam, qua ab inuicem discernuntur, assignantes: nunc ad ecclesiasticas constitutiones stilum uertamus, earumque originem et auctoritatem, prout ex libris sanctorum Patrum colligere possumus, breuiter assignantes.

C. I. At what time the canons of general councils began.

The canons of general councils—as Isidore says in Book VI of the Etymologies, c. 16—began from the times of Constantine. For in the preceding years, while persecution raged, no faculty at all was given for teaching the peoples. Hence Christianity was torn into diverse heresies, because bishops had no permission to assemble in one place until the time of the aforesaid emperor. For he gave Christians the faculty to gather freely. Under him also, the holy fathers, assembling from the whole world at the Council of Nicaea, handed down, according to the evangelical and apostolic faith, the creed second after that of the Apostles. §1. Among the other councils, four are venerable synods that principally embrace the whole faith, like the four Gospels or the same number of rivers of paradise. §2. The first of these, the Nicene synod of 318 bishops, was held while Constantine Augustus was emperor; in it the blasphemy of Arian unbelief, which Arius himself asserted concerning the inequality of the Holy Trinity, was condemned, and through a creed the same holy synod defined the Son of God as consubstantial with God the Father. §3. The second synod, of 150 fathers, was gathered at Constantinople under Theodosius the Elder. Condemning Macedonius, who denied that the Holy Spirit is God, it demonstrated that the Holy Spirit is consubstantial with the Father and the Son, giving the form of the creed that the whole confession of Greeks and Latins proclaims in the churches. §4. The third synod, the first at Ephesus, was promulgated by 200 bishops under Theodosius the Younger, Augustus. It condemned with a just anathema Nestorius, who asserted two persons in Christ, demonstrating that the one person of the Lord Jesus Christ remains in two natures. §5. The fourth synod, of Chalcedon, was held by 630 priests under the prince Marcian. In it, by one judgment of the fathers, it condemned Eutyches, abbot of Constantinople, who pronounced that there is one nature of the Word of God and the flesh; Dioscorus, his defender and former bishop of Alexandria; and, again, Bishop Nestorius himself together with the other heretics. The same synod proclaimed that Christ the Lord was born from the Virgin in such a way that in him we confess the substance of both the divine and the human nature. §6. These are the four principal synods, most fully proclaiming the nature of the faith. But if there are also any councils that the holy fathers, filled with the Spirit of God, sanctioned, they remain established with every force after the authorities of these four; their acts are set down and contained in this work. §7. Synod is interpreted from Greek as company or assembly. The name council, however, is drawn from Roman custom. For at the time when a cause was conducted, all assembled in one place and treated it with a common intention. Hence concilium is said from common intention, as though consilium; consilium as though considium, with the letter d passing into l. Or concilium is said from common intention because all direct the whole gaze of the mind toward one thing; for the eyebrows are the supercilia of the eyes. Hence those who disagree with one another do not conduct a council, because they do not think as one. An assembly, moreover, is a meeting or gathering, from coming together, that is, from assembling in one place. Hence it is also called a meeting because men meet there. Just as a meeting is an assembly, so also a council is named from the association of many into one. Blessed Gregory also writes concerning the four councils, saying [Book I of the Register, epistle 24]:

> C. I. Quo tempore ceperint canones generalium conciliorum.
> Canones generalium conciliorum (ut Ysidorus ait libro 6. Etimologiarum c. 16.) a temporibus Constantini ceperunt. In precedentibus namque annis persecutione feruente docendarum plebium minime dabatur facultas. Inde Christianitas in diuersas hereses scissa est, quia non erat episcopis licentia conueniendi in unum, nisi tempore supradicti imperatoris. Ipse enim dedit facultatem Christianis libere congregari. Sub hoc etiam sancti Patres in concilio Niceno de omni orbe terrarum conuenientes iuxta fidem euangelicam et apostolicam secundum post apostolos simbolum tradiderunt. §. 1. Inter cetera autem concilia quatuor sunt uenerabiles sinodi, que totam principaliter fidem complectuntur, quasi quatuor euangelia, uel totidem paradisi flumina. §. 2. Harum prior Nicena sinodus CCCXVIII. episcoporum Constantino Augusto imperante peracta est: in qua Arrianae perfidiae condempnata est blasphemia, quam de inequalitate sanctae Trinitatis idem Arrius asserebat, et consubstantialem Deo Patri Dei Filium eadem sancta sinodus per simbolum diffiniuit. §. 3. Secunda sinodus CL. Patrum sub Theodosio seniore Constantinopolim congregata est, que Macedonium, Spiritum sanctum Deum esse negantem, condempnans, consubstantialem Patri et Filio Spiritum sanctum demonstrauit, dans simboli formam, quam tota Grecorum et Latinorum confessio in ecclesiis predicat. §. 4. Tertia sinodus Ephesina prima CC. episcoporum sub iuniore Theodosio Augusto edita est, que Nestorium, duas personas asserentem in Christo, iusto anathemate condempnauit, ostendens manere in duas naturas unam Domini Iesu Christi personam. §. 5. Quarta sinodus Calcedonensis DCXXX. sacerdotum sub Martiano principe habita est, in qua Euticem Constantinopolitanum abbatem uerbi Dei et carnis unam naturam pronuntiantem, et eius Dioscorum defensorem, quondam Alexandrinum episcopum, et ipsum rursum Nestorium episcopum cum reliquis hereticis, una Patrum sententia dampnauit; predicans eadem sinodus Christum Dominum sic natum de Virgine, ut in eum substantiam et diuinae et humanae confiteamur naturae. §. 6. He sunt quatuor sinodi principales, fidei naturam plenissime predicantes. Sed et si qua sunt concilia, que sancti Patres spiritu Dei pleni sanxerunt, post istorum quatuor auctoritates omni manent stabilita uigore: quorum gesta in hoc opere condita continentur. §. 7. Sinodus autem ex greco interpretatur comitatus uel cetus. Concilii uero nomen tractum est ex more

Romano. Tempore enim, quo causa agebatur, conueniebant omnes in unum, communique intentione tractabant. Unde et concilium a communi intentione dictum quasi consilium; consilium quasi considium, d in l literam transeunte; uel concilium dictum est ex communi intentione, eo quod in unum dirigant omnem mentis obtutum: supercilia enim oculorum sunt; unde qui sibimet dissentiunt, non agunt concilium, quia non sentiunt in unum. Cetus uero conuentus est uel congregatio, a coeundo, id est a conueniendo in unum. Hinc et conuentus est nuncupatus, quod ibi homines conueniunt; sicut conuentus cetus sic et concilium a societate multorum in unum appellatur. De quatuor quoque conciliis scribit B. Gregorius, ita dicens: [lib. I. Regesti Epist. 24.]

C. II. On the authority of the four councils.

Just as I confess that I receive and venerate the four books of the holy Gospel, so also the four councils: namely the Nicene, in which the perverse dogma of Arius is destroyed; also the Constantinopolitan, in which the error of Eunomius and Macedonius is convicted; also the first Ephesian, in which the impiety of Nestorius is judged; and the Chalcedonian, in which the depravity of Eutyches and Dioscorus is rejected. I embrace these with complete devotion and guard them with the most entire approval, because in them, as upon a squared stone, the structure of the holy faith rises, and the norm of every life and action exists. §1. I also venerate the fifth council, in which the letter said to be that of Ibas, full of error, is rejected; Theodore is convicted of having fallen into the unbelief of impiety by separating the person of the mediator of God and men into two substances; and the writings of Theodore, through which the faith of blessed Cyril is reproved and which were brought forth with the boldness of madness, are refuted. All persons whom the aforesaid venerable councils reject, I reject; those whom they venerate, I embrace. For because they were established by universal consent, whoever presumes either to absolve those whom they bind or to bind those whom they absolve destroys himself and not them. Pope Gelasius also writes concerning the same matters [in the council held at Rome with seventy bishops], saying:

C. II. De auctoritate quatuor conciliorum.

Sicut sancti euangelii quatuor libros, sic quatuor concilia suscipere et uenerari me fateor. Nicenum scilicet, in quo peruersum Arrii dogma destruitur: Constantinopolitanum quoque, in quo Eunomii et Macedonii error conuincitur: Ephesinum etiam primum, in quo Nestorii impietas iudicatur: Calcedonense uero, in quo Euticetis Dioscorique prauitas est reprobata; hec tota deuotione amplector, integerrima approbatione custodio, quia in his uelut in quadrato lapide sanctae fidei structura consurgit, et cuiuslibet uitae atque actionis norma existit. §. 1. Quintum concilium quoque ueneror, in quo epistola, que Ibae dicitur, erroris plena reprobatur; Theodorus personam mediatoris Dei et hominum in duabus substantiis separans, ad impietatis perfidiam cecidisse conuincitur, scripta quoque Theodori, per que beati Cirilli fides reprehenditur, ausu dementiae prolata, refutatur. Cunctas uero quas prefata ueneranda concilia personas respuunt, respuo, quas uenerantur, amplector: quia dum uniuersali sunt consensu constituta, se et non illa destruit, quisquis presumit aut absoluere quos religant, aut ligare quos absoluunt. De eisdem scribit etiam Gelasius Papa [in concilio habito Romae cum LXX. Episcopis] dicens:

C. III. Which councils the holy Roman Church receives.

After those Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments that we regularly receive, the holy Roman Church also does not prohibit these from being received: the holy Nicene synod of 318 fathers, with Maximus Constantine Augustus acting as mediator, in which the heretic Arius was condemned; the holy Constantinopolitan synod, with Theodosius the Elder, Augustus, acting as mediator, in which the heretic Macedonius received his due condemnation; the holy first Ephesian synod, in which Nestorius was condemned with the consent of most blessed Pope Celestine, with Cyril, prelate of the see of Alexandria, and Bishop Arcadius, sent from Italy, acting as mediators; the holy Chalcedonian synod, with Marcian Augustus and Anatolius, bishop of Constantinople, acting as mediators, in which the Nestorian and Eutychian heresy, together with Dioscorus and his accomplices, was condemned. But if there are also any councils instituted thus far by the holy fathers, after the authority of these four we decree that they are both to be guarded and received. §1. It must now be added concerning the works of the holy fathers that are received in the Catholic Church. §2. The works of blessed Cyprian, martyr and bishop of Carthage. §3. Likewise the works of blessed Gregory Nazianzen, bishop. §4. Likewise the works of blessed Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria. §6. Likewise the works of blessed John, bishop of Constantinople. §9. Likewise the works of blessed Hilary, bishop of Poitiers. §10. Likewise the works of blessed Ambrose, bishop of Milan. §11. Likewise the works of blessed Augustine, bishop of Hippo. §12. Likewise the works of blessed Jerome, priest. §13. Likewise the works of blessed Prosper, a most religious man. §14. Likewise the epistle of blessed Pope Leo sent to Bishop Flavian; if anyone disputes its text down to one iota and does not reverently receive it in all things, let him be anathema. §15. Likewise we decree that the works and treatises of all orthodox fathers who departed in no respect from the fellowship of the holy Roman Church, nor were separated from its faithful preaching, but by the grace of God were participants in its communion until the last day of their life, are to be read. §16. Likewise the decretal epistles that the most blessed popes gave at diverse times from the city of Rome for the consolation of diverse fathers are to be reverently received.

[PALEA. §17. Likewise the acts of the holy martyrs, who shine with the manifold torments of tortures and the marvelous triumphs of confessions. Who among Catholics doubts that this is so, that they suffered still greater things in their contests, and that they endured all things not by their own strength but by the grace and assistance of God? But according to ancient custom these are not read in the holy Roman Church without special caution, because the names of those who wrote them are utterly unknown, and because things superfluous, or less suited than the order of the matter was, are thought to have been written by unbelievers or unlearned persons—as with the passions of a certain Quiricus and Julitta, Gregory, and others of this kind, which are reported to have been written by heretics. For this reason, as was said, they are not read in the holy Roman Church, lest even a slight occasion for mockery arise. We nevertheless, together with the aforesaid Church, venerate with every devotion all the martyrs and their glorious contests, which are known to God more than to men. §18. Likewise we receive with every honor the lives of the fathers Paul, Antony, Hilarion, and all the hermits, provided that the most blessed man Jerome wrote them. §19. Likewise the acts of blessed Sylvester, prelate of the apostolic see: although we do not know the name of the one who wrote them, we nevertheless know that they are read by many Catholics in the city of Rome, and many churches imitate this from ancient usage. §20. Likewise the writings concerning the discovery of the Lord's holy cross and other writings concerning the discovery of the head of blessed John the Baptist are indeed recent revelations, and some Catholics read them; but when these come into the hands of Catholics, let the judgment of blessed Paul the Apostle precede: "Test all things; hold what is good." §21. Likewise Rufinus, a religious man, published very many books of ecclesiastical work and also translated some writings; but because blessed Jerome faulted him in certain things concerning freedom of choice, we think those things that we know the aforesaid blessed Jerome thought. This applies not only to Rufinus, but also to all whom the man so often remembered reproved out of zeal for God and the religion of the faith. §22. Likewise we receive as to be read certain works of Origen that the most blessed man Jerome does not reject; but we say that all the rest are to be refused together with their author. §23. Likewise the chronicle of Eusebius of Caesarea and the books of his Ecclesiastical History: although in the first book of his narrative he grew lukewarm, and afterward wrote one book in praise and excuse of the schismatic Origen, nevertheless, because of the singular knowledge of matters that pertain to instruction, we do not say that they are altogether to be refused. §24. Likewise we praise Orosius, a most learned man, because he arranged a history very necessary for us against the calumnies of the pagans and wove it together with marvelous brevity. §25. Likewise we bring forth with distinguished praise the venerable man Sedulius's paschal work, which he composed in heroic verses. §26. Likewise we do not despise but marvel at Juvencus's laborious work. §27. But the Catholic and apostolic Roman Church in no way receives things written or preached by heretics or schismatics. Of these we believe that a few which have come to memory and are to be avoided by Catholics should be added. §28. First, we confess that the synod of Rimini, gathered by Caesar Constantius, son of Constantine, with the prefect Taurus acting as mediator, was condemned from then, is now, and will be forever. §29. Likewise the itinerary in the name of Peter the Apostle, which is called the eighth book of Saint Clement, is apocryphal. §30. The acts in the name of Andrew the Apostle, apocryphal. §31. The acts in the name of Philip the Apostle, apocryphal. §32. The acts in the name of Peter the Apostle, apocryphal. §33. The acts in the name of Thomas the Apostle, apocryphal. §34. The Gospel in the name of Thaddaeus, apocryphal. §35. The Gospel in the name of Thomas the Apostle, which the Manichaeans use, apocryphal. §36. The Gospel in the name of Barnabas, apocryphal. §37. The Gospel in the name of Bartholomew the Apostle, apocryphal. §35. The Gospel in the name of Andrew the Apostle, apocryphal. §39. The Gospels that Lucian falsified, apocryphal. §40. The Gospels that Hesychius falsified, apocryphal. §41. The book on the infancy of the Savior, apocryphal. §42. The book on the nativity of the Savior, on holy Mary, and on the midwife of the Savior, apocryphal. §43. The book that is called The Shepherd, apocryphal. §44. All the books that Leucius, disciple of the devil, made, apocryphal. §45. The book that is called The Foundation, apocryphal. §46. The book that is called The Treasure, apocryphal. §47. The book that is called On the Daughters of Adam, or Genesis, apocryphal. §48. The cento concerning Christ, joined together from Virgilian verses, apocryphal. §49. The book that is called The Acts of Thecla and Paul the Apostle, apocryphal. §50. The book that is called Of Nepos, apocryphal. §51. The book of proverbs written by heretics and marked with the name of Saint Xystus, apocryphal. §52. The revelation that is called that of Paul the Apostle, apocryphal. §53. The revelation that is called that of Thomas the Apostle, apocryphal. §54. The revelation that is called that of Stephen, apocryphal. §55. The book that is called The Passing of Holy Mary, apocryphal. §56. The book that is called The Penance of Adam, apocryphal. §57. The book in the name of Ogias the Giant, who is reported by heretics to have fought with a dragon after the flood, apocryphal. §58. The book that is called The Testament of Jacob, apocryphal. §59. The book that is called The Penance of Origen, apocryphal. §60. The book that is called

The Penance of Saint Cyprian, apocryphal. §61. The book that is called The Penance of Jannes and Mambres, apocryphal. §62. The book that is called The Lots of the Apostles, apocryphal. §63. The book of Lusana, apocryphal. §64. The book of the canons of the Apostles, apocryphal. §65. The book Physiologus, which was written by heretics and marked beforehand with the name of blessed Ambrose, apocryphal. §66. The history of Eusebius Pamphilus, apocryphal. §67. The works of Tertullian or Africanus, apocryphal. §68. The works of Postumianus and Gallus, apocryphal. §69. The works of Montanus, Priscilla, and Maximilla, apocryphal. §70. All the works of Faustus the Manichaean, apocryphal. §71. The works of the other Clement of Alexandria, apocryphal. §72. The works of Cassian, priest of the Gauls, apocryphal. §73. The works of Victorinus of Poitiers, apocryphal. §74. The works of Faustus of Riez in Gaul, apocryphal. §75. The works of Frumentius, apocryphal. §76. The epistle of Jesus to King Abgar, apocryphal. §77. The Passion of George, apocryphal. §78. The Passion of Quiricus and Julitta, apocryphal. §79. The writing that is called The Contradiction of Solomon, apocryphal. §80. All amulets that were written not, as they pretend, by the art of angels, but rather by that of demons, apocryphal. §81. These and all things similar to them that Simon Magus, Nicolaus, Cerinthus, Marcion, Basilides, Ebion, also Paul of Samosata, Photinus, Bonosus, and those who fell away in a similar error; also Montanus with his most obscene followers; Apollinaris, Valentinus or Manichaeus, Faustus, Sabellius, Arius, Macedonius, Eunomius, Novatus, Sabbatius, Celestius, Donatus, Eustathius, Jovinian, Pelagius, Julian and Latiensis, Celestinus, Maximinus, Priscianus from Spain, Lampedius, Dioscorus, Eutyches, Peter and another Peter, of whom one defiled Alexandria and the other Antioch; Acacius of Constantinople with his associates; and also all the heresies that they and their disciples or schismatics taught or wrote, whose names are by no means retained—we confess that these are not only rejected but even eliminated from the whole Roman and apostolic Church, and together with their authors and the followers of those authors condemned forever under the indissoluble bond of anathema. §82. Moreover, we have judged that it should be noted for the edification of the faithful which books are read by some in ecclesiastical offices throughout the cycle of the year—a rite that the apostolic Church does not reprove but follows. Some place the Pentateuch at Septuagesima until the fifteenth day before Easter; on the fifteenth day they place Jeremiah until the Supper of the Lord. At the Supper of the Lord they read three readings from the Lamentation of Jeremiah: "How the city sits alone," etc.; three from Saint Augustine's treatise on Psalm 54: "Hear my prayer, O God, and do not despise it"; and three from the Apostle, where he says in the epistle to the Corinthians: "When you come together into one place." The second reading begins thus: "Likewise also the cup after he had supped," etc. The third: "Concerning spiritual things, however, we do not wish you to be ignorant, brothers." On the Parasceve, three readings from the Lamentation of Jeremiah; three from Saint Augustine's treatise on Psalm 63: "Hear my prayer, O God, when I entreat"; and three from the Apostle, where he says in the epistle to the Hebrews: "Let us hasten to enter into that rest," etc. The second reading: "For every pontiff." The third: "Concerning whom our discourse is great." On Holy Saturday, three readings from the Lamentation of Jeremiah the prophet; three from Saint Augustine's treatise on the same Psalm 63: "Hear my prayer, O God, when I entreat"; and three from the Apostle, where he says in the epistle to the Hebrews: "Christ, standing by as pontiff of future good things." The second reading: "For where there is a testament." The third: "For the law, having a shadow of future good things." At the Lord's Easter, homilies pertaining to that day; during the week, homilies. On the octave of Easter they place the Acts of the Apostles, the canonical epistles, and the Apocalypse until the octave of Pentecost. On the octave of Pentecost they place the books of Kings and Chronicles until the Kalends of August. On the first Sunday of the month of August they place Solomon until the Kalends of September. On the first Sunday of September they place Job, Tobit, Esther, and Esdras until the Kalends of October. On the first Sunday of the month of October they place the book of Maccabees until the Kalends of November. On the first Sunday of the month of November they place Ezekiel, Daniel, and the minor prophets until the Kalends of December. On the first Sunday of the month of December they place Isaiah the prophet until the Nativity of the Lord. On the Nativity of the Lord they first read three readings from Isaiah. The first reading: "At the first time the land of Zebulun was lightened," etc. The second: "Be consoled, be consoled." The third: "Arise, arise." Then sermons or homilies pertaining to that day are read. On the feast of Saint Stephen, a homily concerning that day. On the feast of Saint John, likewise. On the feast of the Innocents, likewise. On the feast of Saint Sylvester, likewise. On the octave of the Lord's Nativity, a homily concerning that day. On the first Sunday after the Lord's Nativity they place the epistles of Paul until Septuagesima. On Epiphany, three readings from Isaiah. The first reading begins: "All who thirst." The second: "Arise, be illuminated, Jerusalem." The third: "Rejoicing, I shall rejoice in the Lord." Then sermons or homilies pertaining to that day are read.]

Distinction XVI

GRATIAN. Part I. The canons of the Apostles, which are said by some to have been translated by Clement, Roman Pontiff, are fifty. Isidore writes that these are not to be received but are reckoned among the apocrypha, saying:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Apostolorum canones, qui per Clementem Romanum Pontificem, sicut quidam asserunt, dicuntur esse translati, sunt quinquaginta. Hos non recipiendos, sed inter apocrifa deputatos, Ysidorus scribit dicens:

C. I. The canons of the Apostles are rejected by apostolic authority.

The canons that are called those of the Apostles—whether because the apostolic see does not receive them, or because the holy fathers did not give their assent to them, since they are recognized as having been composed by heretics under the name of the Apostles—although useful things are found in them, nevertheless it is established that their enactments have been removed by canonical and apostolic authority and reckoned among the apocrypha.

Zephyrinus, however, writes to the bishops established throughout Sicily to the contrary [epistle I]:

C. I. Apostolorum canones apostolica reiciuntur auctoritate.

Canones, qui dicuntur apostolorum, seu quia eosdem nec sedes apostolica recipit, nec sancti Patres illis consensum prebuerunt, pro eo quod ab hereticis sub nomine apostolorum compositi dignoscuntur, quamuis in eis inueniantur utilia, auctoritate tamen canonica atque apostolica eorum gesta constat esse remota atque inter apocrifa deputata.

Zepherinus autem e contra scribit Episcopis per Siciliam constitutis: [epist. I.]

C. II. The canons of the Apostles are to be received.

The Apostles prescribed sixty judgments together with very many other bishops and judged that they were to be observed.

C. II. Apostolorum canones sunt recipiendi.

Sexaginta sententias apostoli prescripserunt cum aliis quam plurimis episcopis, et seruandas esse censuerunt.

C. III. Except for fifty chapters, the canons of the Apostles are reckoned among the apocrypha.

Likewise Pope Leo IX, against the letter of Abbot Nicetas. The fathers number Clement's book—that is, the itinerary of Peter the Apostle—and the canons of the Apostles among the apocrypha, except for fifty chapters that they decreed should be joined to the orthodox faith.

C. III. Exceptis quinquaginta capitulis canones apostolorum inter apocrifa deputantur.

> Item Leo Papa IX. contra epistolam Nicetae Abbatis. Clementis librum, id est Petri apostoli itinerarium, et canones apostolorum numerant Patres inter apocrifa, exceptis quinquaginta capitulis, que decreuerunt orthodoxae fidei adiungenda.

[C. IV. Likewise] the Sixth Synod, c. 2.

It pleased this holy synod that henceforth the eighty-five chapters of the canons of the Apostles should be confirmed and valid. The epistle of Isidore at the beginning of the canons. Isidore, servant of Christ, to his fellow servant the reader. §1. Because of their authority, we place before the other councils the canons that are called those of the Apostles, although they are called apocryphal by some, since very many receive them, and the holy fathers strengthened their judgments by synodal authority and placed them among the canonical constitutions. Likewise. §2. The first order, as was said before, is contained concerning the celebration of a council; and afterward an abridgment of the canons of the Apostles, and of the first apostolic decretals—that is, from Saint Clement down to Saint Sylvester—and of diverse councils is interposed, following its order. GRATIAN. Likewise, since Pope Adrian receives the Sixth Synod with all its canons, and since also the holy eight universal councils have been strengthened by the profession of the Roman Pontiff, while in the Seventh Synod, or in the Sixth Council, the canons of the Apostles were received and approved, it is evident that they are not to be reckoned among the apocrypha.

Pope Adrian writes to Patriarch Tarasius:

> [C. IV. Item] VI. Sinodus, c. 2.
> Placuit huic sanctae sinodo, ut amodo confirmata et rata sint canonum apostolorum LXXXV. capitula. Epistola Ysidori in capite canonum. Ysidorus seruus Christi lectori suo conseruo. §. 1. Propter eorum auctoritatem ceteris conciliis preponimus canones, qui dicuntur apostolorum, licet a quibusdam apocrifi dicantur, quoniam perplures eos recipiunt, et sancti Patres eorum sententias sinodali auctoritate roborauerunt et inter canonicas posuerunt constitutiones. Item. §. 2. Primus ordo, ut predictum est, de celebrando concilio insertus habetur, et postmodum canonum apostolorum, ac primorum apostolicorum (id est, a S. Clemente usque ad S. Siluestrum) decretorum atque diuersorum conciliorum breuiarium est interpolatum, sequens ordinem suum. Gratianus. Item cum Adrianus Papa sextam sinodum recipiat cum omnibus canonibus suis, cum etiam sancta octo uniuersalia concilia professione Romani Pontificis sint roborata, in septima autem sinodo, siue in sexto concilio, apostolorum canones sint recepti et approbati: patet, quod non sunt inter apocrifa deputandi.
> Scribit Adrianus Papa Tharasio Patriarchae:

C. V. The Sixth Synod is strengthened by the authority of Adrian.

I receive the holy Sixth Synod with all its canons. GRATIAN. But it is doubted concerning it whether it composed canons; this is easily resolved from the fourth action of the Sixth Synod. For Peter, bishop of Nicomedia, says:

> C. V. Sexta sinodus auctoritate Adriani corroboratur.
> Sextam sanctam sinodum recipio cum omnibus canonibus suis. Gratianus. Sed dubitatur de ea, an canones conscripserit, quod ex quarta actione sextae sinodi facile absoluitur. Ait enim Petrus Episcopus Nicomediae:

C. VI. The Sixth Synod composed canons.

I have a book containing the canons of the holy Sixth Synod. The patriarch said: §1. Some are scandalized through ignorance concerning these canons, saying: Did the Sixth Synod make canons? Let them therefore know that the holy Sixth Synod was gathered under Constantine against those who said that there was one operation and one will in Christ; in it the holy fathers anathematized them as heretics and expounded the orthodox faith. Part II. §2. This synod was dissolved in the fourteenth year of Constantine. But after four or five years, the same holy fathers were gathered under Justinian, son of Constantine, and promulgated the aforesaid canons, concerning which let no one doubt. For the very same men who were in the synod under Constantine subscribed to these canons under Justinian. For it was necessary that a universal synod promulgate ecclesiastical canons. Likewise: §3. The holy Sixth Synod, after the definition against the Monothelites had been promulgated by it, Constantine the emperor, who had gathered it, having died not long afterward, and his son Justinian reigning in his place. §4. The same holy synod, divinely inspired, was gathered again at Constantinople in the fourth or fifth year and promulgated 102 canons for the correction of the Church. GRATIAN. From these things, therefore, it is gathered that the Sixth Synod was convened twice: first under Constantine, and it established no canons; second under his son Justinian, and it promulgated the aforesaid canons. Hence the holy fathers, gathered a second time in the same synod, said:

> C. VI. Sexta sinodus canones conscripsit.
> Habeo librum continentem canones sanctae sinodi sextae. Patriarcha dixit: §. 1. Quidam per ignorantiam scandalizantur pro canonibus istis, dicentes: Numquid sexta sinodus canones fecit? Sciant ergo, quoniam sancta sinodus sexta sub Constantino congregata est contra eos, qui dicebant unam operationem esse et uoluntatem in Christo, in qua sancti Patres illos utpote hereticos anathematizauerunt, et orthodoxam fidem explanauerunt. II. Pars. §. 2. Soluta est hec sinodus Constantini XIV. anno. Post quatuor uero aut quinque annos iidem sancti Patres congregati sunt sub Iustiniano, filio Constantini, et predictos canones promulgauerunt, de quibus nullus dubitet. Qui enim sub Constantino in sinodo fuerunt, iidem ipsi sub Iustiniano istis canonibus subscripserunt. Oportebat enim, ut sinodus uniuersalis canones ecclesiasticos promulgaret. Item: §. 3. Sancta sinodus sexta post promulgatam ab ea diffinitionem contra Monothelitas, Constantino imperatore, qui eam congregauerat, non post multo defuncto, Iustiniano filio eius regnante pro eo. §. 4. Eadem sancta sinodus diuinitus inspirata iterum Constantinopolim quarto aut quinto anno congregata est, et canones CII. numero ad correctionem ecclesiae promulgauit. Gratian. Ex his ergo colligitur, quod sexta sinodus bis congregata est: primo sub Constantino et nullos canones constituit: secundo sub Iustiniano filio eius, et prefatos canones promulgauit. Unde sancti Patres in eadem Sinodo secundo congregati dixerunt:

C. VII. The enactments of the Sixth Synod.

Since the holy and universal synods—the Fifth under Justinian Augustus and the Sixth under his father Constantine Augustus—while disputing most fully concerning the mystery of the faith, did not make canons, as the other four universal synods did, we therefore, assembling in this imperial city, have written sacred canons. Likewise: §1. It pleased this holy synod that henceforth the eighty-five chapters of the canons of the Apostles should be confirmed and valid. Likewise: §2. We also confirm the remaining canons and synods of the saints—that is, the Nicene, Ancyrene, Neocaesarean, Gangrene, Antiochene, Laodicean, Constantinopolitan, First Ephesian, Chalcedonian, Sardican, and Carthaginian—and the works of Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria and martyr; Gregory Trismegistus, bishop of Neocaesarea; Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria; Basil, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia; Gregory, bishop of Nyssa; Gregory the Theologian; Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium; Timothy, bishop of Alexandria; Germanus, bishop of Constantinople; Cyril, bishop of Alexandria; Cyprian, bishop of Carthage; and his synod.

> C. VII. Constitutiones sinodi sextae.
> Quoniam sanctae et uniuersales sinodi, quinta sub Iustiniano Augusto, sexta sub Constantino patre suo Augusto, de misterio fidei plenissime disputantes, canones non fecerunt, sicut ceterae quatuor uniuersales sinodi: propterea nos conuenientes in hanc imperialem urbem sacros canones conscripsimus. Item: §. 1. Placuit huic sanctae sinodo, ut amodo confirmata et rata sint canonum apostolorum LXXXV. capitula. Item: §. 2. Confirmamus et ceteros sanctorum canones et sinodos, id est, Nicenam, Anchiritanam, Neocesariensem, Gangrensem, Antiocenam, Laudicensem, Constantinopolitanam, Ephesinam primam, Calcedonensem, Sardicensem et Cartaginensem, et opuscula Theophili Alexandrini episcopi et martiris, Trismegisti Gregorii, Neocesariensis episcopi, Athanasii episcopi Alexandrini, Basilii Cesareae Capadociae episcopi, Gregorii Niseni episcopi, Gregorii Theologi, Amphilochii Iconiensis episcopi, Timothei Alexandrini episcopi, Germani Constantinopolitani episcopi,
> Cirilli Alexandrini episcopi, Cipriani Cartaginensis episcopi, et sinodum suam.

C. VIII. The holy eight councils are strengthened by the authority of the Roman Pontiff.

Likewise, from the Liber Diurnus, the profession of the Roman Pontiff. I profess that I will preserve unmutilated down to one iota the holy eight universal councils—the first Nicene, the Constantinopolitan, the Ephesian, the Chalcedonian, the Fifth and the Sixth, the Constantinopolitan, likewise the Nicene, and also the Eighth Constantinopolitan—and hold them worthy of equal honor and veneration; that I will in every way follow and preach what they preached and established; and that I will condemn with mouth and heart whatsoever they condemned. Bede writes in the book On Times [c. 65] concerning the time at which the Sixth Synod, and the Second and the First, and the Fourth and the Fifth, were assembled, saying:

> C. VIII. Auctoritate Romani Pontificis sancta octo concilia roborantur.
> Item ex Libro Diurno professio Romani Pontificis. Sancta octo uniuersalia concilia, primum Nicenum, Constantinopolitanum, Ephesinum, Calcedonense quintum et sextum, Constantinopolitanum; item Nicenum; octauum quoque Constantinopolitanum usque ad unum apicem immutilata seruare, et pari honore et ueneratione digna habere, et que predicauerunt et statuerunt omnibus modis sequi et predicare, quecumque condempnauerunt ore et corde condempnare profiteor. Quo autem tempore sexta sinodus et secunda et prima, et quarta et quinta congregatae sunt, Beda in libro de temporibus [c. 65.] scribit, dicens:

C. IX. On the times of the councils.

The Sixth Universal Synod was celebrated at Constantinople and written down in the Greek language, in the time of Pope Agatho, with the most pious prince Constantine carrying it out within his palace, and at the same time with the legates of the apostolic see and 150 bishops sitting. §1. The First Universal Synod was gathered at Nicaea against Arius, of 318 fathers, in the time of Pope Julius, under the prince Constantine. §2. The Second, at Constantinople, of 150 fathers, against Macedonius and Eudoxius, in the time of Pope Damasus and the prince Gratian, when Nectarius was ordained bishop of that city. [§3. Missing.] §4. The Fourth, at Chalcedon, of 630 fathers, under Pope Leo, in the time of the prince Marcian, against Eutyches, prelate of the most wicked monks. §5. The Fifth, at Constantinople, in the time of Pope Julius, under the prince Justinian, against Theodore and all heretics.

> C. IX. De temporibus conciliorum.
> Sexta sinodus uniuersalis Constantinopolim celebrata est, et greco sermone conscripta, temporibus Papae Agathonis, exequente piissimo principe Constantino intra palatium suum, simulque legatis Apostolicae sedis, et episcopis CL. residentibus. §. 1. Prima uniuersalis sinodus in Nicea congregata est contra Arrium CCCXVIII. Patrum, temporibus Iulii Papae, sub Constantino principe. §. 2. Secunda in Constantinopolim CL. Patrum, contra Macedonium et Eudoxium, temporibus Damasi Papae et Gratiani principis, quando Nectarius eiusdem urbis episcopus est ordinatus. [§. 3. Deest.] §. 4. Quarta in Calcedone DCXXX. Patrum, sub Leone Papa, temporibus Martiani principis, contra Euticen nefandissimorum monachorum presulem. §. 5. Quinta in Constantinopolim temporibus Iulii Papae, sub Iustiniano principe. contra Theodorum et omnes hereticos.

[C. X.]

The First Synod, at Nicaea, of 318 fathers, was against Arius, an Alexandrian priest, who asserted three grades in the Trinity—the Father greater, the Son lesser, and the Holy Spirit a creature—in the time of the prince Constantine, Sylvester, Roman Pope, Macarius of Jerusalem, and Alexander of Alexandria. Having condemned that heresy, they established twenty canons, of which the aforesaid Bishop Alexander was especially the author. §1. The Second, at Constantinople, of 150 fathers, was against Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, who denied that the Holy Spirit is God, in the time of the princes Gratian and Theodosius, Damasus, Roman Pope, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Nectarius of Alexandria. Having condemned the aforesaid heresy, they established three canons, of which blessed Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople, was especially the author. §2. The Third, at Ephesus, of 300 fathers, was against Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople, who said that the blessed Virgin Mary was the mother not of God but only of a man, so that he made one person of the flesh and another of the Deity, in the time of the younger emperor, the prince Theodosius, Celestine, Roman Pope, Juvenal, bishop of Constantinople, and Cyril of Alexandria. Against the blasphemies of Nestorius they wrote, with the same Saint Cyril as author, fifteen chapters anathematizing an equal number of chapters. §3. The Fourth, at Chalcedon, of 630 fathers, was against Eutyches, abbot of Constantinople, who asserted that Christ, after the assumption of humanity, did not exist from two natures, but that the divine nature alone remained in him, in the time of the prince Marcian, Leo, Roman Pope, Juvenal of Jerusalem, and Anatolius of Constantinople. Having condemned the aforesaid heresy, they established twenty-seven canons, of which the same Saint Anatolius, bishop of Constantinople, was especially the author. §4. The Fifth, at Constantinople, was against Theodore Mosophenus and all heretics; this Theodore said that the Word of God was one and Christ another, and denied that holy Mary the Virgin was the mother of God, in the time of the prince Justinian, Vigilius, Roman Pope, Domninus of Antioch, and Eutychius of Constantinople. They wrote fourteen chapters anathematizing the blasphemies of Theodore and his companions. §5. The Sixth, at Constantinople, of 150 fathers, was against Macarius, bishop of Antioch, and his companions, who with a false supposition asserted one will and operation in Christ, in the time of the prince Constantine, Agatho, Roman Pope, and Gregory of Constantinople. Having condemned the aforesaid heresy, they wrote in anathematizing nine chapters annexed within.

[C. XI.]

The first entry is that of the Synod of Ancyra, which is reported to have been before the Nicene but is placed afterward because of the latter's greater authority; in it eighteen fathers established twenty-four canons, of which Vitalis, bishop of Antioch, was especially the author. §1. The second is the Neocaesarean, which is read to have been after the Ancyrene and Antiochene; in it eighteen fathers established fourteen canons, of which Vitalis of Salamis was especially the author. §2. The third is the Gangrene, which is read to have been after the Nicene; in it seventeen fathers established twenty canons because of certain ecclesiastical necessities, especially against Eustathius, who said that no one placed in the married state, nor any faithful person who did not renounce everything he possessed, had hope toward the Lord, and many other poisonous things that it would be lengthy to enumerate. §3. The fourth is the Sardican, in which sixty fathers established twenty-one canons, of which Hosius, bishop of Corduba, Vincent, bishop of Capua, Januarius of Benevento, and Calepodius of Naples, legates of the holy Roman Church, were especially the authors. §4. The fifth is the Antiochene, in which thirty fathers established twenty-five canons, of which Eusebius, bishop of Palestine, was especially the author. §5. The sixth is the Laodicean, in which twenty-two fathers established fifty-eight canons, of which Bishop Theodosius was especially the author. §6. The seventh is the Carthaginian, in which 208 fathers established thirty-three canons, of which Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, was especially the author. Saint Augustine, bishop of Hippo, is also read to have been in the same synod, in the time of Honorius Augustus. §7. The eighth is the African, under Theodosius the Younger, Augustus, in which 224 fathers recited and confirmed 105 canons that are read to have been written through diverse councils of the province of Africa in the time of Aurelius, bishop of Carthage. §8. The ninth is the Synod of Arles, in which 600 fathers established canons, of which Sylvester, bishop of the city of Rome, and Saint Maurinus, bishop of Arles, were especially the authors, in the time of Constantine Augustus, as some assert. §9. The tenth is likewise the Synod of Arles, in which nineteen fathers established canons, of which Caesarius, bishop of Arles, was especially the author. §10. The eleventh is likewise the Synod of Arles, in which eighteen fathers established canons. §11. The twelfth is likewise the Synod of Arles, at Vicus Ortensis, in which eleven fathers established canons, of which Saint Caesarius, bishop, was especially the author. §12. The thirteenth is likewise the Synod of Arles, in which nineteen fathers established canons, of which Sarpidius, bishop of Arles, was especially the author. §13. The fourteenth is the Synod of Orange, in which sixteen fathers established canons, of which Bishop Hilary was especially the author. §14. The fifteenth is the Synod of Epaon, in which twenty-six fathers established forty canons, of which Bishop Caesarius was especially the author. §15. The sixteenth is the Synod of Agde, in which thirty-three fathers established canons, of which Caesarius was especially the author. §16. The seventeenth is the Synod of Orléans, in which seventy-two fathers established canons, of which Aurelian, bishop of Arles, was especially the author. §17. The eighteenth is likewise the Synod of Orléans, in which thirty-one fathers established canons, of which Melanius, bishop of Rennes, was especially the author. §18. The nineteenth is likewise the Synod of Orléans, in which twenty-five fathers established canons, of which Saint Albinus, bishop of Angers, was especially the author. §19. The twentieth is the Synod of Auvergne, in which fifteen fathers established canons, of which Honoratus, bishop of Breut, was especially the author. §20. The twenty-first is the Synod of Mâcon, in which twenty-one fathers established canons, of which Priscus, bishop of Lyon, was especially the author. §21. The twenty-second is likewise the Synod of Mâcon, in which sixty-seven fathers established canons, of which the same Priscus, bishop of Lyon, was especially the author. §22. The twenty-third is the Synod of Lyon, in which seventeen fathers established canons, of which Philip, bishop of Vienne, was especially the author. §23. The twenty-fourth is likewise the Synod of Lyon, in which twenty fathers established canons, of which Priscus, bishop of Lyon, was especially the author. But the statement above that the Nicene Synod established twenty canons appears contrary to what is found in the epistle of Athanasius. For Athanasius of Alexandria writes to Pope Mark, saying thus:

> [C. XI.]

Vicesima quarta item Lugdunensis, in qua Patres XX. constituerunt canones, quorum auctor maxime Priscus Lugdunensis episcopus extitit. Sed quod Nicena sinodus XX. canones supra statuisse dicitur, contrarium uidetur ei, quod in epistola Athanasii inuenitur. Scribit enim Athanasius Alexandrinus Marco Papae, ita dicens:

C. XII. The epistle of Athanasius requesting the chapters of the Council of Nicaea.

We desire that, through the present legates, we may merit to receive from the see of your holy Church, by your authority, the seventy Nicene chapters that I brought from the aforesaid synod, at the command of my lord Alexander, as the decrees of all the bishops, and that were burned by fire. Likewise: §1. In our presence seventy chapters were treated in the aforesaid synod: thirty were published by the Greeks in the Greek language, and thirty by the Latins, similarly published in the Latin language. But it seemed good to the 318 bishops filled with the Holy Spirit, and especially to the already-mentioned Alexander and the representatives of the apostolic see, that ten chapters should be joined together and inserted in other suitable places, and that, according to the form of the seventy disciples or of the languages of the whole world, there should be seventy chapters of so great and so excellent a council, which would instruct the whole world of Christians. GRATIAN. How, therefore, are only twenty chapters said to have been established in the Nicene Synod, when seventy chapters, as Athanasius writes, are shown to have been established in it? The answer to these things is thus: Some chapters of the Nicene Synod have passed out of use; only twenty are held in the Roman Church.

Hence Pope Stephen writes, saying to Liutbert, bishop of Mainz:

> C. XII. Epistola Athanasii postulantis capitula Niceni concilii.
> Septuaginta Niceni capitula, que de prefata sinodo, iubente domino meo Alexandro, decreta omnium episcoporum attuli que sunt igne combusta, optamus, ut a sede sanctae ecclesiae uestra auctoritate percipere per presentes legatos mereamur. Item: §. 1. Presentibus nobis septuaginta in memorata sinodo capitula tractata sunt: triginta a Grecis, greca edita lingua; et triginta a Latinis, similiter latina edita lingua. Sed uisum est CCCXVIII. episcopis Spiritu sancto repletis, et maxime iam dicto Alexandro, et apostolicae sedis apocrisiariis, ut decem capitula adunarentur, aliis atque congruis locis insererentur, et ad formam LXX. discipulorum, uel totius orbis terrae linguarum, septuaginta tanti et tam excellentis concilii fierent capitula, que omnem Christianorum informarent orbem. Gratian. Quomodo ergo uiginti tantum capitula in Nicena sinodo statuta dicuntur, cum septuaginta capitula (ut Athanasius scribit) in ea statuta monstrentur? His ita respondetur: Capitula Nicenae sinodi quedam in desuetudinem abierunt: uiginti tantum in Romana ecclesia habentur.
> Unde Stephanus Papa scribit, dicens Luitberto Episcopo Maguntino:

C. XIII. Only twenty chapters of the Council of Nicaea are held.

Only twenty chapters of the Nicene Synod are held in the holy Roman Church; but through what neglect the others disappeared is uncertain. Very many think that they were inserted into the Council of Antioch. The Council of Sardica also is received by the authority of Pope Nicholas. Hence the same pope writes to the clergy of Constantinople:

> C. XIII. Niceni concilii tantum capitula habentur.
> Viginti tantum capitula Nicenae sinodi in sancta Romana ecclesia habentur; sed quo neglectu alia defecerint, ambiguum est. Plurimi arbitrantur Antioceno ea esse concilio inserta. Sardicense quoque concilium auctoritate Nicolai Papae recipitur. Unde idem scribit clero Constantinopolitano:

C. XIV. The Council of Sardica is received by apostolic authority.

As for your saying that you neither possess nor receive the Council of Sardica or the decretals of the holy fathers, the ability to believe you is not readily granted, especially since the Council of Sardica, which was held among you in your regions and which the whole Church receives—by what reasoning could it be fitting that this holy Church of Constantinople cast these things aside and, as has been said, did not receive them?

> C. XIV. Auctoritate apostolica Sardicense concilium recipitur.
> Quod dicitis, neque Sardicense concilium, neque decretalia uos habere sanctorum Patrum uel recipere, non facile uobis facultas credendi tribuitur, maxime cum Sardicense concilium, quod penes uos in uestris regionibus actum est, et omnis ecclesia recipit, qua ratione conueniat, ut hec sancta Constantinopolitana ecclesia abiceret et ut dictum est non reciperet?

Distinction XVII

GRATIAN. Part I. It was shown above in whose time general councils were celebrated, and the authority of which of them excels the other authorities of the saints. The authority to gather councils, however, belongs to the apostolic see. Hence Pope Marcellus writes to Maxentius:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Generalia concilia quorum tempore celebrata sint, uel quorum auctoritas ceteris premineat sanctorum auctoritatibus, supra monstratum est. Auctoritas uero congregandorum conciliorum penes apostolicam sedem est. Unde Marcellus Papa scribit Maxentio:

C. I. A synod ought not to be gathered without the authority of the Roman Pontiff.

You cannot regularly hold a synod of bishops without the authority of this holy see, although you may be able to gather certain bishops. [PALEA. Nor may you condemn any bishop who has appealed to this apostolic see before a definitive sentence proceeds from here. For if secular persons use written appeals in public judgments, how much more is it permitted to priests to do these same things, who are over them? Of them it was said: "I have said: You are gods."]

> C. I. Absque Romani Pontificis auctoritate congregari sinodus non debet.
> Sinodum episcoporum absque huius sanctae sedis auctoritate (quamquam quosdam episcopos possitis congregare) non potestis regulariter facere. [PALEA. Neque ullum episcopum, qui hanc appellauerit apostolicam sedem, dampnare, antequam hinc sententia definitiua procedat. Nam si seculares in publicis iudiciis libellis utuntur appellatoriis, quanto magis sacerdotibus hec eadem agere licet, qui super illos sunt? de quibus dictum est: "Ego dixi, Dii estis?"]

C. II. A council that has not been supported by the authority of the Roman Church is not valid.

Likewise Pope Julius [I] to the eastern bishops. Your rule has no force and will not be able to have it, since neither was this council conducted by orthodox bishops nor was a legation of the Roman Church present; the canons command that councils ought not to be held without its authority. Nor is any council valid, nor will any council ever be valid, unless it has been supported by its authority.

> C. II. Non est ratum concilium, quod auctoritate Romanae ecclesiae fultum non fuerit.
> Item Iulius Papa [I.] orientalibus episcopis. Regula uestra nullas habet uires nec habere poterit, quoniam nec ab orthodoxis episcopis hoc concilium actum est, nec Romanae ecclesiae legatio interfuit; canonibus precipientibus, sine eius auctoritate concilia fieri non debere. Nec ullum ratum est, aut erit unquam concilium, quod fultum fuerit auctoritate eius.

C. III. Let no one usurp the things granted to the Roman Church.

Likewise Pope Damasus [I to Stephen, epistle IV]. Let no one who does not wish to be judged unworthy of ecclesiastical honor or a contemner presume, without its counsel, to usurp the things granted to this see.

> C. III. Nullus usurpet concessa Romanae ecclesiae.
> Item Damasus Papa. [I. ad Stephanum epist. IV.] Huic sedi concessa nullus usurpare sine eius consultu presumat, qui non uult honore ecclesiastico indignus aut contemptor iudicari.

C. IV. It is not permitted to any persons to gather a synod without the authority of the apostolic see.

Likewise Gregory. It was never permitted, nor will it be permitted, for a particular synod to be gathered; but whenever any doubt concerning a universal synod arises among certain persons, in order to receive an account of what they do not understand, either those who desire the salvation of their soul should come voluntarily to the apostolic see to receive an account, or, if perhaps—as it is written concerning such persons, "When the sinner has come into the depth of evils, he contemns"—they prove so obstinate and contumacious that they do not wish to be taught, it is necessary either that they be drawn in any way to salvation by those same apostolic sees, or, lest they be able to become the ruin of others, that they be suppressed by secular powers according to the canons.

> C. IV. Absque apostolicae sedis auctoritate sinodum aliquibus congregare non licet.
> Item Gregorius. Nec licuit aliquando nec licebit particularem sinodum congregari; sed quotiens aliqua de uniuersali sinodo aliquibus dubitatio nascitur, ad recipiendam de eo, quod non intelligunt, rationem, aut sponte hi, qui salutem animae suae desiderant, ad apostolicam sedem pro percipienda ratione conueniant, aut si forte (sicut de talibus scriptum est: "Peccator, cum uenerit in profundum malorum, contempnit)", ita obstinati et contumaces extiterint, ut doceri non uelint, eos ab eisdem sedibus apostolicis aut attrahi ad salutem quoquomodo necesse est, aut (ne aliorum perditio esse possint) secundum canones per seculares opprimi potestates.

C. V. What is celebrated without the authority of the apostolic see is not a council but a conventicle.

Likewise Pelagius [Pope II] to the bishops who assembled at the illicit summons of John of Constantinople [epistle I, c. 1]. We are instructed anew by many apostolic, canonical, and ecclesiastical rules that councils ought not to be celebrated without the judgment of the Roman Pontiff. §1. Therefore, as has already been said, what is rightly annulled is not a council but your conventicle or petty council, and whatever was done in it is held null and void. See to it also henceforth that you do not presume such things at anyone's urging, if you do not wish to lack communion with the apostolic see. §2. But if questions have arisen in any province, and the reasoning among the bishops of that province begins to disagree, and no agreement is reached among those who disagree, they are then to be referred to the greater see. And if they are not readily and justly determined there, they are to be judged canonically and justly where a synod has been regularly gathered. But the greater and more difficult questions, as the holy synod established and blessed custom requires, are always to be carried to the apostolic see.

> C. V. Non est concilium, sed conuenticulum, quod sine sedis apostolicae auctoritate celebratur.
> Item Pelagius [Papa II.] Episcopis, qui conuenerunt ad illicitam uocationem Iohannis Constantinopolitani. [epist. I. cap. 1.] Multis denuo apostolicis et canonicis atque ecclesiasticis instruimur regulis, non debere absque sententia
> Romani Pontificis concilia celebrari. §. 1. Quapropter, ut iam dictum est, recte non concilium, sed uestrum conuenticulum uel conciliabulum cassatur, et quicquid in eo actum est, irritum habetur et uacuum. Vos quoque deinceps uidete, ut nullius hortatu talia presumatis, si apostolicae sedis communione carere non uultis. §. 2. Si uero in qualibet prouincia ortae fuerint questiones, et inter ipsius prouinciae episcopos discrepare ceperit ratio, atque inter ipsos dissidentes non conueniat, ad maiorem tunc sedem referantur. Et si illic facile et iuste non discernuntur, ubi fuerit sinodus regulariter congregata, canonice et iuste iudicentur. Maiores uero et difficiliores questiones (ut sancta sinodus statuit, et beata consuetudo exigit), ad sedem apostolicam semper deferantur.

C. VI. Provincial councils will lack weight without the presence of the Roman Pontiff.

Likewise Pope Symmachus. Councils of priests, decreed by ecclesiastical laws to be held yearly throughout the provinces, have lost their validity because they do not have the presence of the pope. Read, most senseless men, whether at any time anything was established in them apart from the sanction of the apostolic summit, and whether, if anything concerning greater affairs arose for consultation, it was not reserved to the judgment of the aforesaid see. Part II. GRATIAN. Hence also, when the authority of King Theodoric had commanded priests from diverse provinces to assemble in the city of Rome so that a holy council might judge concerning the things that were said by his adversaries to have been charged against the venerable Pope Symmachus, prelate of the apostolic see, the bishops of Liguria and Emilia, or of the Venetiae, represented that the very man who was said to be assailed ought to convene the synod. They knew that first the merit of Peter the Apostle, and then the authority of the venerable councils following upon the Lord's command, had handed down singular power in the churches to his see, and that the pontiff of the aforesaid see had not been subject to the judgment of inferiors. §1. To these things the most serene king, by God's inspiration, replied that it belonged to synodal judgment to prescribe what was to be followed in so great a matter, and that nothing concerning ecclesiastical affairs belonged to him beyond reverence. He also committed to the power of the pontiffs that, whether they wished to hear the proposed affair or did not wish to hear it, they should deliberate upon what they thought more useful, provided that peace was given to the Roman city by the provision of the venerable council. But the bishops sitting in the synod gathered by the authority of the same Symmachus said: "Let Pope Symmachus, prelate of the apostolic see, assailed by accusations of this kind, be immune and free insofar as regards men; we reserve his whole cause to the judgment of God." §2. "Concerning the clerics of the aforesaid pope, however, who departed from their bishop prematurely and contrary to the rules and made a schism, we decree that this be done: that by making satisfaction to their bishop they may obtain mercy and rejoice to be restored to ecclesiastical offices." §3. "Lawrence, bishop of the Church of Milan, subscribed to this our statute, in which we committed the whole cause to the judgment of God." Peter, bishop of the Church of Ravenna, subscribed with the same words, and after him sixty-five bishops. What concerned the clerics is recognized to have been done mercifully and by dispensation for the restoration of peace in the city. §4. This also is to be noted: that in this council and in another synod of Pope Symmachus, the bishop of Milan is read to have subscribed and responded before the bishop of Ravenna; from this it is also gathered that his see has precedence before the latter.

C. VI. Prouincialia concilia sine Romani Pontificis presentia pondere carebunt.

Item Simachus Papa. Concilia sacerdotum ecclesiasticis legibus quotannis decreta per prouincias, quia presentiam Papae non habent, ualetudinem perdiderunt. Legite insanissimi, aliquando in illis preter apostolici apicis sanctionem aliquid constitutum, et non de maioribus negotiis ad consultationem, si quid occurrerit, prefatae sedis arbitrio fuisse seruatum? II. Pars. Gratianus. Hinc etiam cum auctoritas Teodorici regis ex diuersis prouinciis ad urbem Romam sacerdotes conuenire precepisset, ut sanctum concilium iudicaret de his, que uenerabili Papae Simacho, presuli apostolicae sedis, ab aduersariis ipsius dicebantur impingi, Liguriae Emiliae episcopi, seu Venetiarum suggesserunt, ipsum, qui dicebatur impetitus, debere sinodum conuocare: scientes, quia eius sedi primum Petri apostoli meritum, deinde secuta iussione Domini conciliorum uenerandorum auctoritas singularem in ecclesiis tradidit potestatem, nec antedictae sedis antistitem minorum subiacuisse iudicio. §. 1. Ad hec serenissimus rex Deo inspirante respondit: Sinodalis esse arbitrii in tanto negotio sequenda prescribere, nec aliquid ad se preter reuerentiam de ecclesiasticis negotiis pertinere, committens etiam potestati pontificum, ut siue propositum uellent audire negotium, siue nollent, quod magis putarent utile, deliberarent, dummodo uenerandi prouisione concilii pax in ciuitate Romana daretur. Episcopi uero in sinodo residentes congregata auctoritate eiusdem Simachi dixerunt: "Simachus Papa sedis apostolicae presul ab huiusmodi oppositionibus impetitus quantum ad homines respicit, sit immunis et liber, cuius causam totam Dei iudicio reseruamus." §. 2. "De clericis uero memorati papae, qui ab episcopo suo ante tempus contra regulas discesserunt, et scisma fecerunt, hoc fieri decreuimus, ut satisfacientes episcopo suo misericordiam consequantur et offitiis ecclesiasticis se gaudeant restitui." §. 3. "Laurentius episcopus ecclesiae Mediolanensis huic statuto nostro, in quo totam causam Dei iudicio commisimus, subscripsit." Petrus Ecclesiae Rauennatis Episcopus sub eisdem uerbis subscripsit, et post eum LXV. episcopi. Illud de clericis pro pace in Urbe reformanda misericorditer et dispensatiue factum dignoscitur. §. 4. Hoc quoque notandum est, quod in hoc concilio et in alia sinodo Simachi Papae ante Rauennatem episcopum Mediolanensis subscripsisse et respondisse legitur: ex quo et sedis prerogatiuam ante eum habere colligitur.

[C. VII.] For Gregory I says [Book VII of the Register, epistle 112]

To Syagrius, bishop of Autun: We decree that bishops, according to the time of their ordination, should observe their places, whether for sitting in council, for subscribing, or in any other matter, and should claim for themselves the prerogative of their own ranks. GRATIAN. But the time of ordination refers not to churches but to persons, as is plainly apparent from the custom of the cardinals of the holy Roman Church and of the bishops of each province.

[C. VII.] Ait enim Gregorius I., [lib. VII. reg. epist. 112.]

Siagrio Episcopo Augustodunensi: Episcopos secundum ordinationis suae tempus siue ad considendum in concilio, siue ad suscribendum, uel in qualibet alia re, sua attendere loca decernimus, et suorum sibi prerogatiuam ordinum uindicare. Gratianus. Verum tempus ordinationis non ad ecclesias, sed ad personas refertur, sicut ex consuetudine Cardinalium sanctae Romanae ecclesiae, et episcoporum uniuscuiusque prouinciae euidenter apparet.

Distinction XVIII

GRATIAN. Part I. Councils of bishops, therefore, as appears from the foregoing, are invalid for defining and establishing, but not for correcting. For councils of bishops are necessary for exhortation and correction; although they do not have the force of establishing, they nevertheless have authority to impose and enjoin what has been established elsewhere and commanded to be observed generally or specially. [PALEA.

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Episcoporum igitur concilia, ut ex premissis apparet, sunt inualida ad diffiniendum et constituendum, non autem ad corrigendum. Sunt enim necessaria episcoporum concilia ad exortationem et correctionem, que etsi non habent uim constituendi, habent tamen auctoritatem imponendi et indicendi, quod alias statutum est et generaliter seu specialiter obseruari preceptum. [PALEA.

C. I. From the Council of Chalon, c. 6.

It pleased the council that, with the primacy of the metropolitan preserved, the other bishops should yield place one to another according to the time of their ordination.]

Hence Leo I [epistle LXXXII, c. 7] to Anastasius, bishop of Thessalonica:

> C. I. Ex Cabilonensi Concilio, c. 6.
> Placuit, ut conseruato metropolitani primatu ceteri episcopi, secundum suae ordinationis tempus, alius alii deferat locum.]
> Unde Leo I. [epist. LXXXII. c. 7. Anastasio] Thessalonicensi Episcopo:

C. II. Two meetings are to be celebrated by the bishops in each year.

Concerning episcopal councils, however, we enjoin nothing other than what the holy fathers beneficially ordained: namely, that two meetings should be held in each year, in which judgment is to be given concerning all complaints that are accustomed to arise among the diverse orders of the Church. And if perhaps among those very persons who preside there arises—which God forbid—a cause concerning greater sins that cannot be defined by a provincial examination, the metropolitan will take care to instruct your fraternity concerning the quality of the whole affair, so that if, even with the parties placed before you, the matter has not been quieted by your judgment, whatever it is may be transferred to our cognizance.

> De conciliis autem episcopalibus non aliud indicimus, quam sancti Patres salubriter ordinauerunt: scilicet bini conuentus per annos singulos habeantur, in quibus de omnibus querelis, que inter diuersos ecclesiae ordines nasci solent, iudicetur. Ac si forte inter ipsos, qui presunt, de maioribus peccatis nascitur (quod absit) causa, que prouinciali examine nequeat diffiniri, fraternitatem tuam de totius negotii qualitate metropolitanus curabit instruere, ut si coram positis partibus nec tuo fuerit res sopita iudicio, ad nostram cognitionem, quicquid illud est, transferatur.

C. III. At what time councils of bishops are to be celebrated.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea [c. 5]. Let a council be held once before the days of Lent, so that, all enmities, if there are any, having been cut away, a clean solemn offering may be made to God; but let the second be held around the time of autumn.

> C. III. Quo tempore concilia episcoporum sunt celebranda.
> Item ex Niceno Concilio. [cap. 5.] Habeatur semel concilium ante dies quadragesimae, ut omnibus, si que sunt, simultatibus amputatis, mundum solempne Deo possit offerri; secundum uero agatur circa tempus autumni.

C. IV. An episcopal council is to be held twice a year for the correction of morals and the resolution of controversies.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch [c. 20]. For the sake of ecclesiastical causes and of resolving the controversies that exist, it seemed sufficient for a council of bishops to be held twice a year throughout the individual provinces: once, indeed, after the third week of the paschal solemnity, so that the council may be completed in the fourth week that follows—that is, at mid-Pentecost. Those who dwell in the larger cities—that is, the metropolitan cities—are to admonish their fellow provincial bishops. §1. The second council, however, is to be held on the Ides of October, which day is found among the Greeks to be the tenth of the month Hyperberetaeus. In these councils both priests and deacons ought to be present, as well as all, however many, who consider themselves injured, and they are to await the synodal judgment. Nor is it permitted for any persons to hold councils among themselves without the knowledge of the metropolitan bishops, to whom it is established that judgment concerning all causes has been entrusted.

> Item ex Antioceno Concilio. [cap. 20.] Propter ecclesiasticas causas et que existunt controuersias dissoluendas, sufficere uisum est, bis in anno per singulas prouincias episcoporum concilium fieri: semel quidem post tertiam ebdomadam pascalis solempnitatis, ita ut in quarta ebdomada, que consequitur, id est media pentecoste, concilium compleatur. Admoneant autem comprouinciales episcopos hi, qui in amplioribus, id est in metropolitanis ciuitatibus degunt. §. 1. Secundum uero concilium Idib. octobris habeatur, qui dies apud Grecos yperberiti mensis decimus inuenitur. In ipsis autem conciliis et presbiteros et diaconos presentes esse oportet, et omnes, quoquot se lesos existimant, et sinodicam exspectare sententiam. Nec liceat aliquibus apud semetipsos concilia sine metropolitanorum episcoporum conscientia facere, quibus de omnibus causis constat esse permissum iudicium.

C. V. Those who, when summoned to a synod, disdain to come accuse themselves.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea [c. 40]. Bishops who have been summoned ought not to disdain a synod, but ought to attend and either teach or be taught those things that are useful for the correction of the Church and of others; if they disdain it, they appear to accuse themselves, unless perhaps they are unable to go.

> C. V. Se ipsos accusant, qui uocati ad sinodum uenire contempnunt.
> Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [cap. 40.] Non oportet uocatos episcopos ad sinodum contempnere, sed adire debere, et aut docere, aut doceri, que sunt ad ecclesiae ceterorumque correctionem utilia; quod si contempserint, se ipsos uidentur accusare, nisi ire forte non possint.

C. VI. Bishops who, when summoned to a council, refuse to come are to be reproved.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon [c. 19]. It has reached our ears that the established councils of bishops are by no means celebrated in the provinces. This is proved by the fact that many ecclesiastical matters that need correction are neglected. This holy synod therefore established, according to the rules of the fathers, that the bishops throughout the individual provinces should come together in one place twice a year, where the individual things that have arisen are to be corrected. §1. But bishops established in their cities who are unwilling to assemble—especially when they are in bodily health and are also free from all other pressing necessities and inexcusable affairs—may be reproved with the admonitions of fraternal charity.

> C. VI. Corripiantur episcopi, qui ad concilium uocati uenire recusant.
> Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [cap. 19.] Peruenit ad nostras aures, quod in prouinciis constituta episcoporum concilia minime celebrentur. Hoc ex eo probatur, quod multae, que correctione opus habent, ecclesiasticae res negligantur. Statuit ergo hec sancta sinodus, secundum Patrum regulas bis in anno in unum conuenire per singulas prouincias episcopos, ubi singula, que emerserint, corrigantur. §. 1. Qui uero noluerint conuenire episcopi constituti in suis ciuitatibus, et hoc maxime, cum sui corporis sanitate consistentes, cum etiam ab omnibus aliis urgentibus necessitatibus et inexcusabilibus negotiis liberi sint, licere eos fraternae caritatis admonitionibus corripi.

C. VII. A metropolitan who neglects to celebrate a council at least once a year is to be subject to canonical penalties.

Likewise from the Seventh Synod [c. 6]. Part II. Since there is indeed a rule that says regular inquiries ought to be made twice a year throughout the individual provinces by an assembly of bishops, because of fatigues and so that those who are to be assembled may have a suitable time for making the journey, the holy fathers of the Sixth Synod defined that, every excuse being removed, they are by all means to be held once a year and the things that have been corrupted are to be corrected. We too therefore renew this canon; and if any prince is found to prohibit this, let him be deprived of communion. But if any of the metropolitans neglects to do this without necessity or force or some reasonable occasion, let him be subject to canonical penalties. Moreover, while a synod is being held concerning canonical and evangelical affairs, the assembled bishops ought to be engaged in meditation and solicitude for guarding the divine and life-giving commandments of the Lord. §1. Further, let the metropolitan not have license to demand any of the things that a bishop brings with him, whether a beast of burden or any kind of object. But if he is convicted of having done this, let him pay fourfold.

C. VII. Canonicis subiaceat penis metropolitanus, qui saltem semel in anno celebrare concilium negligit.

Item ex Septima Sinodo. [cap. 6.] II. Pars. Quoniam quidem regula est, que dicit, bis in anno per singulas prouincias oportere fieri per conuentum episcoporum regulares inquisitiones, propter fatigationes et ut oportune habeantur ad iter agendum hi, qui congregandi sunt, diffinierunt sextae sinodi sancti Patres, omni excusatione remota, omnibus modis semel in anno fieri, et deprauata corrigi. Hunc ergo canonem et nos renouamus, et si quisquam princeps inuentus fuerit hoc prohibere, communione priuetur. Si quis uero metropolitanorum hoc neglexerit agere absque necessitate uel ui seu aliqua rationabili occasione, canonicis penis subiaceat. Dum autem sinodus agitur super canonicis et euangelicis negotiis, oportet congregatos episcopos in meditatione et sollicitudine fieri custodiendorum diuinorum et uiuificorum Domini mandatorum. §. 1. Porro non habeat metropolitanus licentiam ex his, que defert episcopus secum, siue iumentum siue aliquam speciem expetendi. Quod si hoc egisse conuictus fuerit, soluat quadruplum.

C. VIII. Priests are not to be compelled to bring sacerdotal eulogiae to a council.

Likewise Leo IV [to the bishops of Britain, c. 3]. Concerning eulogiae to be brought to sacred councils, we find nothing determined by our predecessors, but it is to be as it pleases each priest. For if it is established that blessings are to be brought at that time, perhaps they will attend synods less willingly and will object still more to coming. These, as I judge, are neither reasonably to be required nor, if brought voluntarily, to be refused.

C. VIII. Non cogantur presbiteri sacerdotalia eulogia ad concilium deferre.

Item Leo IV. [ad Episcopos Britanniae, c. 3.] De eulogiis ad sacra concilia deferendis nihil inuenimus a maioribus terminatum: sed sicut unicuique presbitero placuerit. Nam si constitutum fuerit, illo in tempore benedictiones afferre, forsitan minus libenter ad sinodos occurrent, et magis uenire obtrectabunt. Que, ut arbitror, non sunt rationabiliter requirendae, nec ultro delatae respuendae.

C. IX. Without grave necessity, a bishop is not to delay going to a synod.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage [c. 21]. A bishop is not to delay going to a synod unless he is hindered by a sufficiently grave necessity, yet in such a way that he sends a legate in his own person, being prepared, with the truth of the faith preserved, to receive whatever the synod shall establish.

C. IX. Sine graui necessitate episcopus ad sinodum ire non tardet.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 21.] Episcopus ad sinodum ire non tardet, si non satis graui necessitate inhibeatur: sic tamen, ut in persona sua legatum mittat, suscepturus salua fidei ueritate quicquid sinodus statuerit.

C. X. Those who, being burdened, cannot go to a synod are to send letters of excuse.

Likewise from the Fifth Council of Carthage [c. 10]. It pleased the council that, whenever a council is to be assembled, the bishops who are hindered neither by age, illness, nor another graver necessity should attend fittingly. §1. But if they cannot attend, they are to subscribe their excuses in writing; and unless they render an account of their impediment to their primate, they ought to be content with the communion of their own church.

[PALEA.

C. X. Excusatorias litteras dirigant, qui grauati ad sinodum ire non possunt.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi V. [c. 10.] Placuit, ut quotienscumque congregandum est concilium, episcopi, qui neque etate, neque egritudine, neque alia grauiori necessitate impediuntur, competenter occurrant. §. 1. Quod si non potuerint occurrere, excusationes suas litteratorie subscribant; nisi autem rationem impedimenti sui apud primatem suum reddiderint, ecclesiae suae communione debent esse contenti.

[PALEA.

C. XI. Likewise from the Council of Tours [c. 2].

C. XI Item ex Concilio Turonensi. [cap. 2.]

Episcopus non debet abbatem cogere ad sinodum ire, nisi aliqua rationabilis causa existat] .

C. XII. Let one who showed contempt be excluded from communion.

Likewise from the Second Council of Arles [c. 19]. But if anyone has neglected to be present, or has believed that the assembly of the brothers should be abandoned before the council is dissolved, let him recognize himself as alienated from the communion of the brothers; nor may he be received unless he has been absolved in the following synod.

C. XII. A communione sit alienus, qui contempsit.

Item ex Concilio Arelatensi II. [c. 19] Si quis autem adesse neglexerit; uel cetum fratrum, antequam concilium dissoluatur, crediderit deserendum alienatum se a fratrum communione agnoscat; nec eum recipi liceat, nisi in sequenti sinodo fuerit absolutus.

C. XIII. Until the next synod, one who, summoned by the metropolitan, disdained to be present at the synod without grave necessity is to abstain from communion.

Likewise from the Council of Agde [c. 35]. If a metropolitan bishop sends letters to his fellow provincial bishops in which he invites them either to the ordination of the supreme pontiff or to a synod, laying all things aside—except grave bodily illness and a royal command—let them not delay being present on the appointed day. But if they are absent, as the ancient authority of the canons commands, let them be deprived of the charity of the brothers and the communion of the Church until the next synod.

C. XIII. Usque ad proximam sinodum a communione abstineat, qui a metropolitano uocatus absque graui necessitate sinodo adesse contempsit.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [cap. 35.] Si episcopus metropolitanus ad comprouinciales episcopos epistolas direxerit, in quibus eos aut ad ordinationem summi pontificis, ut ad sinodum inuitet, postpositis omnibus (excepta graui infirmitate corporis, ac preceptione regia) ad constitutum diem adesse non differant. Quod si defuerint (sicut prisca canonum precipit auctoritas) usque ad proximam sinodum a caritate fratrum et ecclesiae communione priuentur.

C. XIV. A bishop who, summoned by the metropolitan, disdains to come to a synod is to be deprived of communion.

Likewise from the Council of Tarragona [c. 6]. If any of the bishops, admonished by the metropolitan to come to a synod, disdains to come when no grave bodily necessity intervenes, as the statutes of the fathers sanctioned, let him be deprived until the future council of the communion of charity of all the bishops.

C. XIV. Communione priuetur episcopus, qui a metropolitano uocatus ad sinodum uenire contempnit.

Item ex Concilio Tarragonensi. [cap. 6.] Si quis episcoporum commonitus a metropolitano ad sinodum, nulla graui intercedente necessitate corporali, uenire contempserit, sicut statuta Patrum sanxerunt, usque ad futurum concilium cunctorum episcoporum caritatis communione priuetur.

C. XV. Priests and deacons, and all who consider themselves injured, are to assemble at the metropolitan synod.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin. For the sake of ecclesiastical causes and the resolution of disputes, it pleased the council that a council should be held twice a year throughout the individual provinces, with the metropolitan bishop summoning all the provincial bishops, so that all priests and deacons, or those who consider themselves injured, may come to the council, in order that the causes examined in the council may be brought to a just judgment. And if any bishops, priests, or deacons are manifestly found in an offense, let them be excommunicated according to reason for as long as it pleases the common consent to give judgment concerning them. But no bishop may hold his own councils among his own people, except those to whom metropolitan sees have been entrusted.

C. XVI. Likewise from the Council of Bylon.

Every year a bishop is to hold a synod in his diocese composed of his clerics as well as abbots, and is to examine the other clerics and monks.] GRATIAN. But the individual bishops are to take care to make known to their churches the things that are established in councils. Hence in the Council of Toledo [XVI, c. 6]:

> C. XVI. Item ex Concilio Bylonensi.

C. XVII. The individual bishops are to make known to their churches the things that are established in councils.

We decree that, while a council is being conducted in any province, each of the bishops should by his admonitions make no delay, within the space of six months, in gathering all the abbots, priests, deacons, and clerics, and also the whole assembly of the city over which he is recognized to preside, and also the entire people of his diocese, so that before them he may disclose most fully all the things known to have been enacted or defined in the council in that year. §1. But if anyone believes that these things are to be treated as of little account, let him remain punished everywhere by a sentence of excommunication for the course of two months.

Distinction XIX

GRATIAN. Part I. Concerning decretal epistles, however, it is asked whether they possess the force of authority, since they are not found in the body of the canons. Pope Nicholas writes thus concerning them to the archbishops and bishops established throughout Gaul:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. De Epistolis uero decretalibus queritur, an uim auctoritatis obtineant, cum in corpore canonum non inueniantur. De his ita scribit Nicolaus Papa archiepiscopis et episcopis per Gallias constitutis.

C. I. Decretal epistles have the force of authority.

If by the decree of the Roman pontiffs the works of other expositors are approved or disapproved, so that what the apostolic see truly approved is held accepted today and what it rejected is held ineffective to this day, how much more ought the things that it itself wrote at diverse times for the Catholic faith, for sound doctrines, for the various and manifold necessities of the Church, and for the morals of the faithful to be preferred with every honor and to be reverently taken up by absolutely everyone in any appropriate circumstances, with discretion or dispensation as guide? Although some of you have written that those decretals of the ancient pontiffs are not written down in the whole body of the codex of canons, and therefore are not to be taken up among the canons, they themselves use them indiscriminately where they perceive them to support their intention, and only now declare that they have been accepted to a lesser degree for the diminution of the power of the apostolic see and as an argument for their own privileges. Likewise: §1. If they say that the decretal epistles of the ancient Roman pontiffs are not to be admitted because they are not found written in the codex of canons, then neither is any institution or writing of Saint Gregory, or of anyone else who was before him or is after him, to be received, because it is not found written in the codex of canons. Then let them erase from their books the teaching and sanctions of those men, which are venerated by every tongue, because they are not found written in the codex of canons. For what purpose do they occupy parchments after they are no longer held accepted? But why should we linger long, since we shall no longer receive even the divine Scriptures themselves of the Old and New Testament if we say that those men are to be heard? For neither of these is found inserted in the codex of ecclesiastical canons. But those who are prepared to resist rather than to obey will reply, saying that among the canons there is found a chapter of Saint Pope Innocent, by whose authority it is taught that both Testaments are to be received by us, although neither of them is contained as a whole within those paternal canons. To them it must be asserted in response that if the Old and New Testaments are to be received, not because they are annexed as a whole to the codex of canons, but because a judgment of Saint Pope Innocent appears to have been delivered concerning their reception, it assuredly remains that the decretal epistles of the Roman pontiffs are to be received even if they are not joined to the codex of canons, since it is established that among those canons a single chapter of blessed Leo is intermingled, by which all decretal enactments of the apostolic see are commanded to be observed in such a way that, if anyone transgresses against them, he is to know that pardon is denied him. [PALEA. For he says in c. 10 of his decretals: "But lest there perhaps be anything that is believed to have been passed over by us, we command that all decretal enactments, both of Innocent of blessed memory and of all our predecessors, which were promulgated concerning ecclesiastical orders and the disciplines of the canons, be observed by your charity in such a way that, if anyone transgresses against them, he is to know that pardon is thereafter denied him."]

But by saying "all decretal enactments," he omitted none of the decretal enactments that he did not command to be observed. And again, by asserting "of all our predecessors," he excepted none of the Roman pontiffs who were before him, whose decretal enactments he did not command to be observed by all in such a way that, if anyone transgresses against them, he is to know that pardon is thereafter denied him. Thus it makes no difference whether all the decretal enactments of the apostolic see have or have not been intermingled among the canons of the councils, since all cannot be joined together in one body, and among them are those that assign firmness and their own force to those that are absent, especially since the synodal acts among which the canons themselves were established are not found in the codex of canons but are venerated by us with all due reverence. Moreover, Saint Gelasius, most eloquent in his decrees and most blessed pope, agrees with this most blessed Pope Leo, saying thus: "We decree that the decretal epistles that the most blessed popes gave at diverse times from the city of Rome in response to the consultation of diverse fathers are to be reverently received." In this it is to be noted that he did not say, "The decretal epistles that are found among the canons," or only, "that the modern pontiffs issued," but "that the most blessed popes gave at diverse times from the city of Rome." Moreover, in saying "at diverse times," the holy man comprehended even those times when the persecutions of the pagans were multiplying and only with the greatest difficulty permitted the causes of bishops to be carried to the apostolic see. The divine grace favoring us, by setting forth these things in this way we show that there is no difference between those decrees of the prelates of the apostolic see that are found in the body of the canons and those that, because of their multitude, are scarcely found throughout individual bodies of volumes; for we have proved that the eminent prelates—namely Leo and Gelasius—commanded that all decretal enactments of all their predecessors, and the decretal epistles that the most blessed popes gave at diverse times from the city of Rome, were to be reverently received and observed.

C. I. Decretales epistolae uim auctoritatis habent.

Si Romanorum Pontificum decreto ceterorum opuscula tractatorum approbantur uel reprobantur, ita ut, quod uere sedes apostolica probauit, hodie teneatur acceptum, et quod illa repulit, hactenus inefficax habeatur: quanto potius, que ipsa pro catholica fide, pro sanis dogmatibus, pro uariis et multifariis ecclesiae necessitatibus et fidelium moribus diuerso tempore scripsit, omni debent honore preferri, et ab omnibus prorsus in quibuslibet oportunitatibus discretione uel dispensatione magistra reuerenter assumi? Quamquam quidam uestrum scripserint, haud illa decretalia priscorum Pontificum in toto canonum codicis corpore esse descripta et ideo inter canones esse assumenda, cum ipsi, ubi suae intentioni hec suffragari conspiciunt, illis indifferenter utantur, et solum nunc ad imminutionem sedis apostolicae potestatis, et ad suorum argumentum priuilegiorum minus accepta esse perhibeant. Item: §. 1. Si ideo non esse decretales epistolas priscorum Pontificum Romanorum admittendas dicunt, quia in codice canonum non habentur adscriptae, ergo nec Gregorii S., nec ullius alterius, qui ante fuit uel post ipsum est, aliquod institutum uel scriptum est recipiendum, eo quod in codice canonum non habeatur adscriptum. Ergo doctrinam eorum et sanctiones, que ab omni lingua uenerantur, quia in codice canonum non habentur adscriptae, de codicibus suis eradant. Ut quid uel membranas occupant, postquam non habentur acceptae? Sed quare multum immoremur, cum nec ipsas diuinas scripturas ueteris et noui testamenti iam recipiemus, si istos dixerimus audiendos? Etenim neutrum horum in codice canonum ecclesiasticorum habetur insertum. Sed responsuri sunt isti, qui ad resistendum potius quam ad obediendum parati sunt, aientes quod inter canones inueniatur capitulum S. Papae Innocenti, cuius auctoritate doceatur, a nobis utrumque testamentum esse recipiendum, quamquam in ipsis paternis canonibus nullum eorum ex toto contineatur insertum. Quibus ad hec asserendum est, quoniam si uetus nouumque testamentum sunt recipienda, non quod codici canonum ex toto habeantur annexa, sed quod de his recipiendis S. Papae Innocentii prolata uideatur esse sententia, restat nimirum quod decretales epistolae Romanorum Pontificum sunt recipiendae, etiamsi non sint codici canonum compaginatae, quoniam inter ipsos canones unum B. Leonis capitulum constat esse permixtum, quo ita omnia decretalia constituta sedis apostolicae custodiri mandantur, ut si quis in illa commiserit, nouerit sibi ueniam denegari. [PALEA. Ait enim c. 10. suarum decretalium: "Ne quid uero sit, quod pretermissum a nobis forte credatur, omnia decretalia constituta, tam beatae recordationis Innocentii, quam omnium decessorum nostrorum, que de ecclesiasticis ordinibus et canonum promulgata sunt disciplinis, ita a uestra dilectione custodiri mandamus, ut si quis in illa commiserit, ueniam sibi deinceps nouerit denegari."]

Dicendo uero: "omnia decretalia constituta," nullum de decretalibus constitutis pretermisit, quod non mandauerit esse custodiendum. Et rursus asserendo: "omnium predecessorum nostrorum," nullum Pontificum Romanorum, qui ante se fuerunt, excepit, cuius ita non preceperit decretalia constituta ab omnibus custodiri, ut si quis in illa commiserit ueniam sibi deinceps nouerit denegari. Itaque nihil interest, utrum sint omnia necne decretalia sedis apostolicae constituta inter canones conciliorum immixta, cum omnia in uno corpore compaginari non possint, et illa eis intersint, que firmitatem his, que desunt, et uigorem suum assignant, presertim cum sinodalia gesta inter que ipsi canones statuti sunt, in codice canonum non habeantur, sed a nobis omni cultu debito uenerentur. Consonat autem huic beatissimo Leoni Papae sanctus et facundissimus in decretis suis Papa Gelasius, ita inquiens: "Decretales epistolas, quas beatissimi Papae diuersis temporibus ab urbe Roma pro diuersorum Patrum consultatione dederunt, uenerabiliter suscipiendas decernimus." In quo notandum est, quod "Decretales," non dixit, "epistolas, que inter canones habentur," uel tantum: "quas moderni Pontifices ediderunt;" sed: "quas beatissimi Papae diuersis temporibus ab urbe Roma dederunt." Dicens autem: "diuersis temporibus" etiam illa tempora uir sanctus comprehendit, que crebrescentibus paganorum persecutionibus ad sedem apostolicam deferri causas episcoporum difficillime permittebant. His ita diuina fauente gratia prelibatis ostendimus, nullam differentiam esse inter illa decreta, que in corpore canonum habentur, sedis apostolicae presulum, et ea, que pre multitudine uix per singula uoluminum corpora reperiuntur; cum omnia et omnium decessorum suorum decretalia constituta atque decretales epistolas, quas beatissimi Papae diuersis temporibus ab urbe Roma dederunt, fore uenerabiliter suscipiendas et custodiendas, eximios presules, Leonem scilicet et Gelasium, mandasse probauimus.

C. II. All sanctions of the apostolic see are to be observed irrefragably.

Likewise Pope Agatho to all bishops. All the sanctions of the apostolic see are to be accepted just as though they had been confirmed by the divine voice of Peter himself.

C. II. Omnes sanctiones apostolicae sedis irrefragabiliter sunt obseruandae.

Item Agato Papa omnibus Episcopis. Sic omnes apostolicae sedis sanctiones accipiendae sunt, tanquam ipsius uoce diuina Petri firmatae.

C. III. The yoke imposed by the holy see is to be endured, although it may seem unbearable.

Likewise from a capitulary of Emperor Charles. In memory of blessed Peter the Apostle, let us honor the holy Roman and apostolic see, so that, as it is for us the mother of priestly dignity, it ought to be the ecclesiastical teacher of reason. Therefore humility is to be maintained with gentleness; and although a yoke scarcely bearable is imposed by that holy see, nevertheless let us bear it and endure it with pious devotion. §1. But if—which is not fitting—anyone, whether he is a priest or a deacon, is accused, while contriving some disturbance and lying in wait for our ministry, of having brought a false epistle from the apostolic see, or something else that did not come from there, with faith preserved and humility toward the Apostolic intact, let it be in the bishop's power whether to cast him into prison or into another custody until he appeals to the apostolic sublimity by a letter or through suitable legates of his own party, so that it may deign to decide especially through its holy legation and to define what Roman law establishes concerning such persons, in order that this man may be corrected and a limit imposed upon others.

> C. III. Tolerandum est iugum, quod a sancta sede imponitur, licet importabile uideatur.
> Item ex Capitulo Caroli Imperatoris. In memoriam B. Petri apostoli honoremus sanctam Romanam et apostolicam sedem, ut, que nobis sacerdotalis mater est dignitatis, esse debeat ecclesiasticae magistra rationis. Quare seruanda est cum mansuetudine humilitas, et licet uix ferendum ab illa sancta sede imponatur iugum, tamen feramus et pia deuotione toleremus. §. 1. Si uero (quod non decet) quilibet, siue sit presbiter siue diaconus aliquam perturbationem machinando et nostro ministerio insidiando redarguatur falsam ab apostolica sede detulisse epistolam, uel aliud quod inde non uenerit salua fide et integra erga Apostolicum humilitate penes episcopum sit potestas, utrum eum in carcerem, aut in aliam detrudat custodiam, usquequo per epistolam, aut per idoneos suae partis legatos apostolicam interpellet sublimitatem, ut potissimum sua sancta legatione dignetur decernere, et quod de talibus lex Romana statuat diffinire, ut et is corrigatur, et ceteris modus imponatur.

C. IV. Whatever the Roman Church establishes or ordains is to be observed by all.

Likewise Stephen V says. Indeed, because the holy Roman Church, over which Christ willed us to preside, has been placed as a mirror and example, whatever it establishes, whatever it ordains, is to be observed perpetually and irrefragably by all.

> C. IV. Quicquid Romana ecclesia statuit uel ordinat, ab omnibus est obseruandum.
> Item Stephanus ait. V. Enimuero, quia in speculum et exemplum sancta Romana ecclesia, cui nos Christus preesse uoluit, posita est, omnibus, quicquid statuit, quicquid ordinat, perpetuo irrefragabiliter obseruandum est.

C. V. One who does not wish to obey apostolic precepts is to be excluded from pontifical offices.

Likewise Gregory [IV]. It is lawful for no one either to will or to be able to transgress the precepts of the apostolic see, nor the ministry of our disposition, which your charity ought to follow. Part II. §1. Therefore, let whoever has willed to oppose apostolic decrees be laid low by the grief of his own ruin; nor let him thereafter have a place among the priests, but let him be banished from the holy ministry. Let no one afterward have concern for his judgment, since it is not doubted by anyone that he has already been condemned by the holy and apostolic Church through his disobedience and presumption; for he to whom the discipline of the holy Church has been entrusted, who ought not only to have obeyed the commands of the holy Church placed over him but also to have made them known to others lest they pass them by, is to be cast down by the overthrow of the greater excommunication. And let one who was unwilling to obey apostolic precepts be excluded from divine and pontifical offices.

> C. V. A pontificalibus sit alienus offitiis, qui apostolicis non uult obedire praeceptis.
> Item Gregorius. [IV.] Nulli fas est uel uelle uel posse transgredi apostolicae sedis precepta nec nostrae dispositionis ministerium, quod uestram sequi oportet caritatem. II. Pars. §. 1. Sit ergo ruinae suae dolore prostratus, quisquis apostolicis uoluerit contraire decretis, nec locum deinceps inter sacerdotes habeat, sed extorris fiat a sancto ministerio, non de eius iudicio quisquam postea curam habeat, quoniam iam dampnatus a sancta et apostolica ecclesia sua inobedientia atque presumptione a quoquam esse non dubitatur: quia maioris excommunicationis deiectione est abiciendus, cui sanctae ecclesiae commissa fuerit disciplina, qui non solum prelatae sanctae ecclesiae iussionibus parere debuit, sed etiam aliis ne preterirent insinuare. Sitque alienus a diuinis et pontificalibus offitiis, qui noluit preceptis obtemperare apostolicis.

C. VI. Decretal epistles are numbered among the canonical Scriptures.

Likewise Augustine, On Christian Doctrine, Book II [c. 8]. Among the canonical Scriptures, the most diligent investigator of the divine Scriptures is to follow as much as possible the authority of the Catholic churches; among these indeed let there be those epistles that the apostolic sees possess and have merited to receive from it. §1. He will therefore maintain this measure in the canonical Scriptures: he is to place those that are received by all churches before those that some do not accept. But among those that are not accepted by all, he is to place those that the more numerous and weightier churches accept before those that the fewer churches of lesser authority hold. §2. But if he finds that some are held by more churches and others by weightier churches—although this cannot be found—I nevertheless think that they are to be held of equal authority.

C. VI. Inter canonicas scripturas decretales epistolae connumerantur.

Item Augustinus de doctrina Christiana, libro II. [cap. 8.] In canonicis scripturis ecclesiarum catholicarum quamplurimum diuinarum scripturarum sollertissimus indagator auctoritatem sequatur, inter quas sane illae sint, quas apostolicas sedes habere et ab ea meruerunt accipere epistolas. §. 1. Tenebit igitur hunc modum in scripturis canonicis, ut eas, que ab omnibus recipiuntur ecclesiis, preponat eis, quas quidam non accipiunt. In eis uero, que non accipiuntur ab omnibus, preponat eas, quas plures grauioresque accipiunt, eis, quas pauciores minorisque auctoritatis ecclesiae tenent. §. 2. Si autem alias inuenerit a pluribus, alias a grauioribus haberi (quamquam hoc inueniri non possit) equalis tamen auctoritatis eas habendas puto.

C. VII. Let one who withdraws from the solidity of Peter understand himself to be banished from the divine ministry.

Likewise Leo [Pope Leo I to the bishops of Vienne, epistle LXXXVII]. Our Lord Jesus Christ, Savior of the human race, instituted it thus: that the truth, which previously was contained in the proclamation of the law and the prophets, should go forth through the apostolic trumpet for the salvation of the whole world, as it is written: "Their sound has gone forth into all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world." But the Lord willed the sacrament of this office to pertain to the office of all the Apostles in such a way that he placed it principally in most blessed Peter, the chief of all the Apostles, so that from him, as from a certain head, his gifts might be diffused as into the whole body, and so that whoever had dared to withdraw from the solidity of Peter might understand himself to be banished from the divine mystery. For he willed that this man, assumed into the fellowship of indivisible unity, should be called what he himself was, saying: "You are Peter, and upon this rock I shall build my Church," so that the building of the eternal temple might, by the marvelous gift of God's grace, stand upon the solidity of Peter, strengthening his Church with this firmness so that neither human rashness could assail it nor the gates of hell prevail against it. But whoever attempts to break his power, by favoring his own desires and by not following what he received from the ancients, wills with exceedingly impious presumption to violate this most sacred firmness of that rock, built by the Lord, as we have said. GRATIAN. This, however, is to be understood concerning those sanctions or decretal epistles in which nothing is found contrary either to the decrees of the preceding fathers or to evangelical precepts. For Anastasius II, through favor toward Emperor Anastasius, decreed that those whom Acacius had ordained priests or Levites after the sentence pronounced against himself ought duly to perform the offices they had received, saying thus:

> C. VII. Ministerii diuini se extorrem intelligat, qui a soliditate Petri recedit.
> Item Leo. [Papa I. ad Episcopos Viennenses, epist. LXXXVII.] Ita Dominus noster Iesus Christus humani generis saluator instituit, ut ueritas, que antea legis et prophetarum preconio continebatur, per apostolicam tubam in salutem uniuersitatis exiret, sicut scriptum est: "In omnem terram exiuit sonus eorum, et in fines orbis terrae uerba eorum." Sed huius muneris sacramentum ita Dominus ad omnium apostolorum offitium pertinere uoluit, ut in beatissimo Petro apostolorum omnium summo principaliter collocaret, ut ab ipso quasi quodam capite dona sua uelut in corpus omne diffunderet, ut extorrem se diuini misterii intelligeret esse, qui ausus fuisset a Petri soliditate recedere. Hunc enim in consortium indiuiduae unitatis assumptum, id quod ipse erat, uoluit nominari, dicendo: "Tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram edificabo ecclesiam meam" ut eterni templi edificatio mirabili munere gratiae Dei in Petri soliditate consisteret, hac ecclesiam suam firmitate corroborans, ut illam nec humana temeritas posset appetere, nec portae inferi contra illam preualerent. Verum hanc petrae istius sacratissimam firmitatem, Domino, ut diximus, edificante constructam, nimis impia uult presumptione uiolare, quisquis eius potestatem temptat infringere, fauendo cupiditatibus suis, et id, quod accepit a ueteribus, non sequendo. Gratian. Hoc autem intelligendum est de illis sanctionibus uel decretalibus epistolis in quibus nec precedentium Patrum decretis, nec euangelicis preceptis aliquid contrarium inuenitur. Anastasius enim secundus fauore Anastasii imperatoris, quos Acatius post sententiam in se prolatam sacerdotes uel Leuitas ordinauerat, acceptis offitiis rite fungi debere decreuit, ita inquiens:

C. VIII. Let no share of injury touch one who is ordained by heretics already condemned.

[Anastasius II to Anastasius Augustus, epistle I, cc. 7 and 8.] According to the custom of the Catholic Church, let the most sacred heart of your serenity acknowledge that no share of injury from the name of Acacius touches any of those whom Acacius baptized, or whom he ordained as priests or Levites according to the canons, lest perhaps the grace of the sacrament handed down through an unrighteous man appear less firm. §1. For even if baptism—which God keep far from the Church—has been given either by an adulterer or by a thief, the gift reaches the recipient undefiled, because that voice which sounded through the dove excludes every stain of human pollution. This is declared when it is said: “This is he who baptizes in the Holy Spirit and fire.” For if the rays of this visible sun, when they pass through the foulest places, are stained by no defilement from contact, much more is the power of him who made this visible sun constrained by no unworthiness of a minister. For although Judas was sacrilegious and a thief, whatever he did among the Apostles by virtue of the dignity entrusted to him—the benefits given through an unworthy man suffered no detriment from this, as the Lord himself declared with the clearest voice: “The scribes,” he says, “and the Pharisees sit upon the chair of Moses; do what they say, but do not do what they do, for they say and do not do.” §2. Therefore, whatever any ministers in the Church appear to perform for the advancement of men by virtue of their office, all this is accomplished by the effect of divinity. Thus Paul, through whom Christ speaks, affirms: “I planted, Apollo watered, but God gave the increase. Therefore neither is he who plants anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the increase.” §3. Moreover, God does not ask who or of what sort the preacher is, but what he preaches, so that he confirms that even the envious preach Christ well; by this evil the devil himself was cast down, and yet he himself does not cease to preach this. Therefore this man also, whose name we say should be suppressed, by ministering good things badly harmed only himself. For the inviolable sacrament that was given to others through him obtained the perfection of its power. §4. This indeed is true generally, unless the curious suspicion of some should extend itself so far as to imagine that, after judgment was pronounced by Pope Felix, Acacius thereafter acted ineffectively in the sacraments that he usurped, and consequently that those who received the ministries handed down either in consecrations or in baptism ought to fear lest the benefits appear void. GRATIAN. Therefore, because he gave these rescripts illicitly and uncanonically, and contrary to the decrees of God, of his predecessors, and of his successors—as is proved by Felix and Gelasius, who excommunicated Acacius before Anastasius, and by Hormisdas, who, the third after Anastasius himself, afterward condemned the same Acacius—he is therefore rejected by the Roman Church and is read to have been struck by God in this manner:

> [Anastasius II. ad Anastasium Augustum, epist. I. c. 7. et 8.] Secundum ecclesiae catholicae consuetudinem sacratissimum serenitatis tuae pectus agnoscat, quod nullum de his, quos baptizauit Acatius, uel quos sacerdotes siue Leuitas secundum canones ordinauit aliqua ex nomine Acatii portio lesionis attingat, quo forsitan per iniquum tradita sacramenti gratia minus firma uideatur. §. 1. Nam et baptisma (quod procul sit ab ecclesia) siue ab adultero siue a fure datum fuerit, ad percipientem munus peruenit illibatum, quia uox illa, que sonuit per columbam omnem maculam humanae pollutionis excludit quod declaratur cum dicitur: "Hic est, qui baptizat in Spiritu sancto et igne." Nam si uisibilis solis istius radii, cum per loca fedissima transeunt, nulla contactus inquinatione maculantur, multo magis illius, qui istum uisibilem fecit, uirtus nulla ministri indignitate constringitur. Nam et Iudas, cum fuerit sacrilegus atque fur, quicquid egit inter apostolos pro dignitate commissa, beneficia per indignum data nulla ex hoc detrimenta senserunt, declarante hoc ipsum Domino manifestissima uoce: "Scribae, inquit, et Pharisei super cathedra Moysi sedent; que dicunt, facite: que autem faciunt, nolite facere; dicunt enim et non faciunt." §. 2. Quicquid ergo ad hominum profectum quilibet in ecclesia ministri pro offitio suo uidentur operari, hoc totum contineri implente diuinitatis effectu. Ita ille, per quem loquitur Christus, Paulus affirmat: "Ego plantaui, Apollo rigauit: sed Deus incrementum dedit. Itaque neque qui plantat, est aliquid neque qui rigat, sed qui incrementum dat, Deus." §. 3. A Deo autem non queritur, quis, uel qualis predicet, sed que predicet, ut inuidos etiam bene Christum confirmet predicare, quo malo diabolus ipse deiectus est, et hoc ipse predicare non desinit. Ideo ergo et hic, cuius nomen dicimus reticendum, male bona ministrando sibi tantum nocuit. Nam inuiolabile sacramentum, quod per illum datum est aliis, perfectionem suae uirtutis obtinuit. §. 4. Quod quidem uerum est generaliter, aliquorum nisi tantum se extenderit curiosa suspicio, ut imaginetur, prolato a Papa Felice iudicio, postea inefficaciter in sacramentis, que Acatius usurpauit, egisse; ac proinde eos oportet metuere, qui uel in consecrationibus, uel in baptismate ministeria tradita susceperunt, ne irrita beneficia uideantur. Gratian. Quia ergo illicite et non canonice, sed contra decreta Dei, predecessorum et successorum suorum hec rescripta dedit, (ut probat Felix et Gelasius, qui Acatium ante Anastasium excommunicauerunt, et Hormisda, qui ab ipso Anastasio tertius eundem Acatium postea dampnauit), ideo ab ecclesia Romana repudiatur, et a Deo percussus fuisse legitur hoc modo:

C. IX. Anastasius, rejected by God, was struck by divine command.

Anastasius II, a Roman by nation, lived in the time of King Theodoric. At that time many clerics withdrew themselves from communion with him because, without a council of bishops or priests and clerics of the whole Catholic Church, he had communicated with a Thessalonian deacon named Photinus, who had communicated with Acacius; and because he secretly wished to recall Acacius and could not, he was struck by divine command. Hence also concerning Bishop Maximus it was established in the Synod of Constantinople [c. 6]:

C. IX. Anastasius a Deo reprobatus, nutu diuino percussus est.

Anastasius II., natione Romanus, fuit temporibus Teoderici regis. Eodem tempore multi clerici se a communione ipsius abegerunt, eo quod communicasset sine concilio episcoporum uel presbiterorum et clericorum cunctae ecclesiae catholicae diacono Tessalonicensi, nomine Fotino, qui communicauerat Acatio; et quia occulte uoluit reuocare Acatium et non potuit, nutu diuino percussus est. Hinc etiam de Maximo Episcopo in Constantinopolitana Sinodo statutum est: [c. 6.]

C. X. Things done concerning undisciplined persons, or by them, are to be rendered void.

Because of the teaching of all his indiscipline, which arose at Constantinople, it was established that Maximus should not be thought to have been or now to be a bishop, nor should those ordained by him hold any grade of the clerical state; all things, namely, that were done concerning him or by him having been rendered void.

C. X. Que circa indisciplinatos, uel ab eis geruntur, in irritum reuocentur.

Propter totius indisciplinationis eius doctrinam, que Constantinopoli orta est, statutum est, ne Maximus fuisse aut esse iam putetur episcopus, neque hi, qui ab eo sunt ordinati, qualemcumque gradum clericatus obtineat; omnibus scilicet, que circa eum, uel ab eo gesta sunt, in irritum reuocatis.

Distinction XX

GRATIAN. Part I. Decretal epistles, therefore, are equal in law to the canons of councils. But now it is asked concerning the expositors of sacred Scripture whether they are equal to them or are subject to them. For the more anyone relies upon reason, the greater the authority his words appear to have. But very many of the commentators, excelling others just as in a fuller grace of the Holy Spirit, so also in more extensive knowledge, are proved to have adhered more closely to reason. Hence, to some persons, the sayings of Augustine, Jerome, and other commentators appear to be preferred to the enactments of certain pontiffs. Part II. §1. But it is one thing to impose an end upon causes and another to expound sacred Scriptures diligently. For defining affairs, not only knowledge but also power is necessary. Hence Christ, when about to say to Peter, "Whatever you bind upon earth shall be bound also in heaven," etc., first gave him the keys of the kingdom of heaven: in one giving him the knowledge of discerning between leprosy and leprosy, and in the other giving him the power of casting some persons out of the Church or receiving them. Therefore, since any affairs receive an end either in the absolution of the innocent or in the condemnation of offenders, while absolution or condemnation requires not only knowledge but also the power of those who preside, it is apparent that the commentators on the divine Scriptures, although they excel pontiffs in knowledge, nevertheless, because they have not attained the summit of their dignity, are placed before them in expositions of the sacred Scriptures, but in defining causes merit the second place after them. Hence Leo IV writes to the bishops of Britain:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Decretales itaque epistolae canonibus conciliorum pari iure exequantur. Nunc autem queritur de expositoribus sacrae scripturae, an exequentur, an subiciantur eis? Quo enim quisque magis ratione nititur, eo maioris auctoritatis eius uerba esse uidentur. Plurimi autem tractatorum, sicut pleniori gratia Spiritus sancti, ita ampliori scientia aliis precellentes, rationi magis adhesisse probantur. Unde nonnullorum Pontificum constitutis Augustini, Ieronimi atque aliorum tractatorum dicta eis uidentur esse preferenda. II. Pars. §. 1. Sed aliud est causis terminum imponere aliud scripturas sacras diligenter exponere. Negotiis diffiniendis non solum est necessaria scientia, sed etiam potestas. Unde Christus dicturus Petro: "Quodcumque ligaueris super terram, erit ligatum et in celis, etc." prius dedit sibi claues regni celorum: in altera dans ei scientiam discernendi inter lepram et lepram, in altera dans sibi potestatem eiciendi aliquos ab ecclesia, uel recipiendi. Cum ergo quelibet negotia finem accipiant uel in absolutione innocentium, uel in condempnatione delinquentium, absolutio uero uel condempnatio non scientiam tantum, sed etiam potestatem presidentium desiderant: aparet, quod diuinarum scripturarum tractatores, etsi scientia Pontificibus premineant, tamen, quia dignitatis eorum apicem non sunt adepti, in sacrarum scripturarum expositionibus eis preponuntur, in causis uero diffiniendis secundum post eos locum merentur. Unde Leo IV. scribit Brittanniae Episcopis:

C. I. The writings of others are not to be placed before the decrees of the Roman pontiffs.

It is not fitting for any persons to judge from the little books and commentaries of others and to abandon the canons of the holy councils or the rules of the decretals that are held among us together with the canons. We use all of these in ecclesiastical judgments, namely those of the Apostles, the Nicene, Ancyrene, Neocaesarean, Gangrene, Sardican, Carthaginian, and African councils, and with them the rules of the Roman prelates Sylvester, Siricius, Innocent, Zosimus, Celestine, Leo, Hilary, Gelasius, Hormisdas, and Gregory the Younger. These altogether are those both through which a bishop judges and through which bishops and clerics together are judged. For if an unusual affair of such a kind emerges or occurs that can by no means be settled through these, then the sayings of those whom you mentioned—Jerome, Augustine, Isidore, or the rest of the holy doctors like them—if they are found, are to be retained and promulgated magnanimously, or the matter is to be referred to the apostolic see. §1. For this reason I do not fear to proclaim more clearly and with a loud voice that one who is proved not to receive without distinction those statutes of the holy fathers that we have mentioned, which among us are entitled canons—whether he is a bishop, cleric, or layman—is proved neither to retain nor believe the Catholic and apostolic faith or the holy four Gospels usefully and efficaciously unto their effect.

C. I. Aliorum scripturae Romanorum Pontificum decretis non sunt preponendae.

De libellis et commentariis aliorum non conuenit aliquos iudicare, et sanctorum conciliorum canones relinquere uel decretalium regulas, que habentur apud nos simul cum canonibus. Quibus in omnibus ecclesiasticis utimur iudiciis, id est apostolorum, Nicenorum, Anciranorum, Neocesariensium, Gangrensium, Sardicensium, Cartaginensium, Affricanensium, et cum illis regulae presulum Romanorum, Siluestri, Siricii, Innocentii, Zosimi, Celestini, Leonis, Ylarii, Gelasii, Ormisdae, et Gregorii iunioris. Isti omnino sunt, et per quos iudicat episcopi, et per quos episcopi simul et clerici iudicantur. Nam si tale emerserit uel contigerit inusitatum negotium, quod minime possit per istos finiri tunc illorum quorum meministis dicta Ieronimi, Augustini, Ysidori uel ceterorum similiter sanctorum doctorum similium si reperta fuerint, magnanimiter sunt retinenda ac promulganda, uel ad apostolicam sedem referatur de talibus. §. 1. Quam ob causam luculentius et magna uoce pronunciare non timeo: quia, qui illa, que diximus sanctorum patrum statuta, que apud nos canones pretitulantur (siue sit episcopus, siue clericus, siue laicus), non indifferenter recipere conuincitur, nec catholicam et apostolicam fidem, nec sancta quatuor euangelia utiliter et efficaciter ad effectum suum retinere uel credere probatur.

C. II. Those who either do not possess or do not observe the decrees of the Roman pontiffs are to be reproved.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to the clergy of Constantinople. If you do not possess the decrees of the Roman pontiffs, you are to be accused of neglect and carelessness. But if you possess them and do not observe them, you are to be reproved and rebuked for rashness.

C. II. Corripiendi sunt, qui decreta Romanorum Pontificum uel non habent, uel non obseruant.

Item Nicolaus Papa clero Constantinopolitano. Si decreta Romanorum Pontificum non habetis, de neglectu atque incuria estis arguendi. Si uero habetis et non obseruatis, de temeritate estis corripiendi et increpandi.

C. III. To whom recourse is to be had when the authority of sacred Scripture does not present itself.

Likewise Pope Innocent. Concerning causes for which no authority to loose and bind appears in the books of the Old Testament, the four Gospels, together with all the writings of the Apostles, let recourse not be had to the Greek divine writings. If it is not found in those either, lay your hand upon the Catholic histories of the Catholic Church written by Catholic doctors. If it is not found in those either, recall with discernment the examples of the saints. But if, after all these have been examined, the nature of this question is not clearly investigated, gather the elders of the province and question them. For what is sought by more elders is found more readily. The Lord, the true promiser, also says: “If two or three of you agree upon earth in my name concerning any matter whatsoever that they ask, it shall be done for them by my Father.”

C. III. Ad quos recurrendum sit, cum sacrae scripturae auctoritas non occurrit.

Item Innocentius Papa. De quibus causis nulla soluendi ligandique auctoritas in libris ueteris testamenti, quatuor euangeliorum cum totis scriptis apostolorum apareat, non ad diuina recurratur scripta greca. Si nec in illis, ad catholicae ecclesiae historias catholicas, a doctoribus catholicis scriptas, manum mitte. Si nec in illis, sanctorum exempla perspicaciter recordare. Quod si in his omnibus inspectis huius questionis qualitas non lucide inuestigatur, seniores prouinciae congrega et eos interroga. Facilius namque inuenitur, quod a pluribus senioribus queritur. Verus etiam repromissor Dominus ait: "Si duo ex uobis uel tres conueniunt super terram in nomine meo, de omni re, quamcunque petierint, fiet illis a patre meo."

Distinction XXI

GRATIAN. Part I. Ecclesiastical affairs, therefore, as was shown above, are settled by the decrees of the Roman pontiffs and the sacred canons of councils. But the ministers of the sacred canons and of the decrees of the pontiffs are the supreme pontiffs and, below them, the prelates and the remaining priests, whose institution was begun in the Old Testament and more fully completed in the New. §1. For the supreme pontiffs and the lesser priests were instituted by God through Moses, who at the Lord’s command anointed Aaron as supreme pontiff and his sons as lesser priests. Afterward David, when he enlarged the ministries of the house of the Lord, instituted doorkeepers and singers.

Further, Solomon discovered a certain method of exorcizing by which demons, when adjured, were driven from possessed bodies; those assigned to this office were called exorcists. Concerning them the Lord says in the Gospel: "If I cast out demons in Beelzebub, in whom do your sons"—the exorcists, namely—"cast them out?" Imitating all these things in the New Testament, the Church has her doorkeepers, whom we call ostiaries. In place of the singers she instituted readers together with singers. Exorcists, however, she received with their ancient name and their office remaining. In place of the sons of Aaron, all those administering the priesthood below the supreme pontiff were consecrated. §2. Among them a certain distinction was preserved, so that some are called simply "priests," some "archpriests," some "chorepiscopi," some "bishops," some "archbishops" or "metropolitans," some "primates," some "patriarchs," and some "supreme pontiffs." §3. The distinction among these was especially introduced by the gentiles, who called some of their flamines simply flamines, others archflamines, and others protoflamines. But the distinction simply between greater and lesser priests took its origin in the New Testament from Christ himself, who instituted the twelve Apostles as though greater priests and the seventy-two disciples as though lesser priests. He chose Peter as though to be supreme priest when, before all and for all, he bestowed upon him the keys of the kingdom of heaven, imposed upon him the name Peter from himself, the rock, testified that he had prayed specially for his faith, and added that he should confirm the others, saying: "I have prayed for you, Peter, that your faith may not fail; and you, once converted, confirm your brothers." Following this same form, the Apostles ordained bishops and priests in individual cities. Moreover, we read that Levites were ordained by the Apostles, of whom blessed Stephen was the greatest; in the course of time the Church established subdeacons and acolytes for herself. Blessed Isidore also writes concerning these things in Book VII of the Etymologies, c. 12, explaining their names and the causes of the names, saying thus:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Decretis ergo Romanorum Pontificum et sacris canonibus conciliorum ecclesiastica negotia, et supra monstratum est, terminantur. Ministri uero sacrorum canonum et decretorum Pontificum sunt summi Pontifices et infra presules atque reliqui sacerdotes, quorum institutio in ueteri testamento est inchoata, et in nouo plenius consummata. §. 1. Summi enim Pontifices et minores sacerdotes a Deo sunt instituti per Moysen, qui ex precepto Domini Aaron in summum pontificem, filios uero eius unxit in minores sacerdotes. Postea Dauid, cum ministeria domus Domini ampliaret, ianitores et cantores instituit. Porro Salomon quendam modum exorzizandi inuenit, quo demones adiurati ex obsessis corporibus pellebantur; huic offitio mancipati exorcistae uocati sunt, de quibus Dominus in euangelio: "Si ego in Beelzebub eicio demonia, filii uestri (exorcistae uidelicet) in quo eiciunt?" Hec omnia in nouo testamento ecclesia imitata habet suos ianitores, quos hostiarios appellamus. Pro cantoribus lectores simul et cantores instituit. Exorcistas autem nomine antiquo et offitio permanente recepit. Pro filiis uero Aaron omnes infra summum pontificem sacerdotium administrantes sunt consecrati. §. 2. Inter eos quedam discretio seruata est, ut alii appellentur simpliciter "sacerdotes," alii "archipresbiteri," alii "corepiscopi," alii "episcopi," alii "archiepiscopi" seu "metropolitae," alii "primates," alii "patriarchae," alii "summi Pontifices." §. 3. Horum discretio a gentilibus maxime introducta est, qui suos flamines alios simpliciter flamines, alios archiflamines, alios protoflamines appellabant. Simpliciter uero maiorum et minorum sacerdotum discretio in nouo testamento ab ipso Christo sumpsit exordium, qui XII. apostolos tanquam maiores sacerdotes, et LXXII. discipulos quasi minores sacerdotes instituit. Petrum uero quasi in summum sacerdotem elegit, dum ei pre omnibus et pro omnibus claues regni celorum tribuit, et a se petra petri sibi nomen imposuit, atque pro eius fide se specialiter rogasse, testatus est, et ut ceteros confirmaret subiunxit dicens: "Ego pro te rogaui, Petre, ut non deficiat fides tua, et tu aliquando conuersus confirma fratres tuos." Hanc eandem formam apostoli secuti in singulis ciuitatibus episcopos et presbiteros ordinauerunt. Leuitas autem ab apostolis ordinatos legimus, quorum maximus fuit B. Stephanus: subdiaconos et acolithos procedente tempore ecclesia sibi constituit. De his etiam scribit B. Ysidorus libro VII. Ethimologiarum c. 12. nomina illorum et nominum causas exponens, ita inquiens:

C. I. From where the name of the ecclesiastical grades is taken.

We believe that the clergy and clerics are so called because Matthias, whom we read to have been the first ordained through the Apostles, was chosen by lot. For kleros in Greek is called sors or inheritance in Latin. Therefore they are called clerics because they are of the Lord's lot or because they have the Lord as their portion. Generally, however, all who serve in the Church of Christ are named clerics; their grades and names are these: ostiary, psalmist, reader, exorcist, acolyte, subdeacon, deacon, priest, bishop. §1. The order of bishops is fourfold: that is, in patriarchs, archbishops, metropolitans, and bishops. §2. Patriarch is interpreted in the Greek language as highest of the fathers, because he holds the first—that is, the apostolic—place; and because he exercises the highest honor, he is designated by such a name, as the Roman, the Antiochene, and the Alexandrian. §3. An archbishop is so called by a Greek word because he is the highest of the bishops; for he holds the apostolic place and presides over both metropolitans and the other bishops. §4. Metropolitans, however, are called from the measure of cities; for they preside over the individual provinces, and the other priests are subject to their authority and teaching. Without them the remaining bishops are permitted to do nothing, for the solicitude of the whole province is committed to them. §5. All the orders designated above, however, are named by the one and same designation "bishops"; but certain ones use a particular name because of the distinction of powers that they individually received. §6. A patriarch is the prince of the fathers, for archon means prince; an archbishop is the prince of bishops; a metropolitan is named from the measure of cities. §7. The word episcopate is so called because one who is made a bishop superintends, namely by bearing care for his subjects; for skopein in Greek is called intendĕre in Latin. Bishops in Greek are interpreted as overseers in Latin; for the overseer is said to be one placed over the Church because he watches and observes the morals and life of the peoples placed below him. §8. A pontiff is the prince of priests, as though the way of those who follow. He is also named the supreme priest and the chief pontiff. For he makes priests and Levites; he disposes all ecclesiastical orders; he shows what each one ought to do. Before this, however, pontiffs were also kings. For this was the custom of the ancients: that a king should also be a priest and a pontiff. Hence the Roman emperors too were called pontiffs. §9. A seer is named from the force of the mind; the signification of the word is manifold, for sometimes it signifies a priest, sometimes a prophet, and sometimes a poet. §10. A prelate is called a priest from the fact that he stands before, for he is first in the order of the Church, so that he has no one above him. Or, in Latin, a priestly leader. §11. Sacerdos, moreover, has a name compounded from Greek and Latin, because it is "one giving a sacred thing"; for just as a king is so called from ruling, so a priest is so called from sacrificing, for he consecrates and sacrifices. The priests of the gentiles, however, were called flamines. They had upon the head a cap in which there was a short rod, having some wool above it. Because on account of the heat they could not bear this, they began to bind only a thread upon the head; for it was unlawful for them to walk with their heads entirely bare. Hence they were called flamines from the thread that they used, as though filamines. But on feast days, after putting aside the thread, they placed the cap upon the head because of the eminence of the priesthood. §12. Presbyter in Greek is interpreted "elder" in Latin. They are named presbyters not only on account of age or decrepit old age, but because of the honor and dignity that they received. Priests, moreover, are also called sacerdotes because they give a sacred thing, as bishops do. Although they are priests, they nevertheless do not have the summit of the pontificate, because they neither sign the forehead with chrism nor give the Paraclete Spirit, which the reading of the Acts of the Apostles demonstrates to be owed to bishops alone. Hence among the ancients bishops and priests were the same, because that name is one of dignity and not of age. §13. Levites are called from the name of their founder. For the Levites arose from Levi, and by them the ministries of the mystical sacrament were fulfilled in the temple of God. They are called deacons in Greek and ministers in Latin, because just as consecration is vested in the priest, so the dispensation of ministry is vested in the deacon. §14. Hypodeacons in Greek are those whom we call subdeacons; they are so called because they are subject to the precepts and offices of the Levites. For they themselves receive the offerings from the faithful in the temple of God and carry them to the Levites to be placed upon the altars; among the Hebrews they are called Nathinaeans. §15. Readers are called from reading, and psalmists from singing psalms; for the former proclaim to the peoples what they are to follow, while the latter sing so that they may stir the minds of the hearers to compunction—although some readers pronounce so piteously that they compel certain persons to weeping and lamentation. They are also called pronouncers because they announce from afar. For their voice will be so great and so clear that they fill the ears even of those placed far away. §16. A singer, however, is so called because he modulates the voice in song. Two kinds of him are named in the art of music, as most learned men were able to say them in Latin: precentor and succentor; the precentor, namely, who sends the voice ahead in song, and the succentor, who responds by singing afterward. One is called a concentor because he sounds together; but one who does not sound together neither sings together nor will be a concentor. §17. Acolytes in Greek are called candle-bearers in Latin from carrying candles when the Gospel is to be read or the sacrifice offered. For then lights are kindled by them and carried, not to put darkness to flight while the sun gleams at the same time, but to demonstrate a sign of gladness, so that under the figure of bodily light that light may be shown concerning which it is read in the Gospel: "He was the true light who illuminates every man coming into this world." §18. Exorcists are called adjurers or rebukers when rendered from Greek into Latin, for over catechumens, or over those who have an unclean spirit, they invoke the name of the Lord Jesus, adjuring through him that it depart from them. §19. Ostiaries are the same as doorkeepers, who in the Old Testament were chosen for the guardianship of the temple so that no one unclean in any respect might enter it. They are called ostiaries because they preside over the doors of the temple. For they themselves, holding the key, guard all things within and without; and, having judgment between the good and the evil, they receive the faithful and reject unbelievers.

C. I. Unde nomen ecclesiasticorum graduum sumatur.

Cleros et clericos hinc appellatos credimus, quia Mathias sorte electus est, quem primum per apostolos legimus ordinatum. KLEROS enim grece, latine sors uel hereditas dicitur. Propterea ergo dicti sunt clerici, quia de sorte sunt Domini, uel quia Domini partem habent. Generaliter autem clerici nuncupantur omnes, qui in ecclesia Christi deseruiunt, quorum gradus et nomina sunt hec: Hostiarius, psalmista, lector, exorcista, acolithus, subdiaconus, diaconus, presbiter, episcopus. §. 1. Ordo episcoporum quadripartitus est, id est in patriarchis, archiepiscopis, metropolitanis atque episcopis. §. 2. Patriarcha summus Patrum greca lingua interpretatur: quia primum, id est apostolicum retinet locum, et ideo, quia summo honore fungitur tali nomine censetur, sicut Romanus, Antiocenus, Alexandrinus. §. 3. Archiepiscopus greco uocabulo quod sit summus episcoporum: tenet enim uicem apostolicam, et presidet tam metropolitanis quam ceteris episcopis. §. 4. Metropolitani autem a mensura ciuitatum uocantur; singulis enim prouinciis preminent, quorum auctoritati et doctrinae ceteri sacerdotes subiecti sunt, sine quibus nihil reliquis episcopis agere licet; sollicitudo enim totius prouinciae ipsis commissa est. §. 5. Omnes autem superius designati ordines uno eodemque uocabulo episcopi nominantur; sed ideo priuato nomine quidam utuntur, propter distinctionem potestatum quam singulariter acceperunt. §. 6. Patriarcha Patrum princeps: ARCHON enim princeps: archiepiscopus princeps episcoporum, metropolitanus a mensura ciuitatum. §. 7. Episcopatus autem uocabulum inde dictum est, quod ille, qui episcopus efficitur, superintendat, curam scilicet subditorum gerens: SKOPEIN enim grece, latine intendere dicitur. Episcopi autem grece, latine speculatores interpretantur; nam speculator est prepositus in ecclesia dictus, eo quod speculetur atque perspiciat populorum infra se positorum mores et uitam. §. 8. Pontifex princeps sacerdotum est, quasi uia sequentium. Ipse et summus sacerdos, ipse et pontifex maximus nuncupatur. Ipse enim sacerdotes et Leuitis efficit: ipse omnes ordines ecclesiasticos disponit: ipse quid unusquisque facere debeat ostendit. Ante autem pontifices et reges erant. Nam maiorum hec erat consuetudo, ut rex esset et sacerdos et pontifex. Unde et Romani imperatores pontifices dicebantur. §. 9. Vates a ui mentis appellatus cuius significatio multiplex est: nam modo sacerdotem, modo prophetam significat, modo, poetam. §. 10. Antistes sacerdos dictus est ab eo, quod antestat: primus enim est in ordine ecclesiae; ut supra se nullum habeat. Siue latine sacerdos dux. §. 11. Sacerdos autem nomen habet compositum ex greco et latino, quod est sacrum dans; sicut enim rex a regendo, ita sacerdos a sacrificando dictus est: consecrat enim et sacrificat. Sacerdotes autem gentilium flamines dicebantur. Hi in capite habebant pileum, in quo erat breuis uirga, desuper habens lanae aliquid quod cum propter estum ferre non possent filum tantum in capite religare ceperunt; nam nudis eos penitus capitibus incedere nefas erat. Unde et a filo quo utebantur flamines dicti sunt, quasi filamines. Verum festis diebus filo deposito pileum imponebant pro sacerdotii eminentia. §. 12. Presbiter grece, latine senior interpretatur: non modo pro etate uel decrepita senectute, sed propter honorem et dignitatem, quam acceperunt presbiteri nominantur: ideo autem et presbiteri sacerdotes uocantur, quia sacrum dant, sicut episcopi; qui licet sint sacerdotes, tamen pontificatus apicem non habent quia nec crismate frontem signant, nec paraclitum spiritum dant, quod solis deberi episcopis, lectio actuum apostolorum demonstrat. Unde et apud ueteres idem episcopi et presbiteri fuerunt, quia illud nomen dignitatis est, et non etatis. §. 13. Leuitate ex nomine auctoris uocati. De Leui enim Leuitae exorti sunt, a quibus in templo Dei mistici sacramenti ministeria explebantur Hi grece diaconi, latine ministri dicuntur, quia sicut in sacerdote consecratio, ita in diacono ministerii dispensatio habetur. §. 14. Ypodiacones grece, quos nos subdiaconos dicimus, qui ideo sic appellantur, quia subiacent preceptis et offitiis Leuitarum. Oblationes enim in templo Dei a fidelibus ipsi suscipiunt, et Leuitis altaribus superponendas deferunt; hi apud Ebreos Nathinei uocantur. §. 15. Lectores a legendo, psalmistae a psalmis canendis uocati; illi enim predicant populis, quid sequantur; isti canunt, ut excitent ad compunctionem animos audientium; licet quidam lectores ita miserabiliter pronuntient, ut quosdam ad luctum lamentacionemque compellant. Idem etiam pronuntiatores uocantur, quod porro annuntient. Tanta enim et tam clara erit eorum uox, ut quamuis longe positorum aures adimpleant. §. 16. Cantor autem uocatus qui uocem modulatur in cantu. Huius duo genera dicuntur in arte musica, sicut ea doctissimi homines latine dicere potuerunt, precentor et succentor: precentor scilicet, qui uocem premittit in cantu, succentor autem, qui subsequenter canendo respondet. Concentor autem dicitur, quia consonat; qui autem non consonat nec concinit, nec concentor erit. §. 17. Acolithi grece, latine ceroferarii dicuntur a deportandis cereis, quando legendum est euangelium, aut sacrificium offerendum; tunc enim accenduntur luminaria ab eis, et deportantur, non ad effugandas tenebras, dum sol eodem tempore rutilat, sed ad signum leticiae demonstrandum, ut sub tipo luminis corporalis illa lux ostendatur, de qua legitur in euangelio: "Erat lux uera, que illuminat omnem hominem uenientem in hunc mundum." §. 18. Exorcistae ex greco in latinum adiurantes siue increpantes uocantur, inuocant enim super cathecuminos, uel super eos, qui habent spiritum immundum, nomen Domini Iesu, adiurantes per eum, ut egrediatur ab eis. §. 19. Hostiarii, idem et ianitores, qui in ueteri testamento electi sunt ad custodiam templi, ut non ingrederetur in illud immundus in omni re. Dicti autem hostiarii, quod presint hostiis templi. Ipsi enim tenentes clauem omnia intus, extraque custodiunt, atque inter bonos et malos habentes iudicium, fideles recipiunt et respuunt infideles.

C. II. The Roman Church received the primacy from Christ.

Likewise Anacletus [to the bishops of Italy, epistle II]. In the New Testament, after Christ the Lord, the priestly order began from Peter, because the pontificate in the Church of Christ was first given to him, the Lord saying to him: "You are," he says, "Peter, and upon this rock I shall build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; and I shall give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven." He therefore first received from the Lord the power of binding and loosing and was the first to lead the people to the faith by the power of his preaching. But the other Apostles received honor and power together with him in an equal fellowship and willed him to be their prince; at the Lord's command, they too were dispersed throughout the whole world and preached the Gospel. §1. When they died, bishops arose in their place, whose ordination ought to be made according to the order and manner stated above. One who receives them and their words receives God; but one who spurns them spurns him by whom they were sent and whose embassy they discharge, and he himself will undoubtedly be spurned by the Lord. §2. Moreover, the Apostles themselves, seeing that the harvest was great and the laborers few, asked the Lord of the harvest to send laborers into his harvest. Hence seventy-two disciples were chosen by them; priests bear their figure and are established in their place in the Church.

C. II. Romana ecclesia a Christo primatum accepit.

Item Anacletus. [ad Episcopos Italiae epist. II.] In nouo testamento post Christum Dominum a Petro sacerdotalis cepit ordo, quia ipsi primo pontificatus in ecclesia Christi datus est, Domino dicente ad eum: "Tu es," inquit, "Petrus, et super hanc petram edificabo ecclesiam meam, et portae inferi non preualebunt aduersus eam: et tibi dabo claues regni celorum." Hic ergo ligandi atque soluendi potestatem primus accepit a Domino, primusque ad fidem populum uirtute suae predicationis adduxit. Ceteri uero apostoli cum eodem pari consortio honorem et potestatem acceperunt, ipsumque principem eorum esse uoluerunt, qui etiam, iubente Domino, in toto orbe dispersi euangelium predicauerunt. §. 1. Ipsis quoque decedentibus in locum eorum surrexerunt episcopi, quorum ordinatio pretaxato fieri debet ordine et modo, quos qui recipit et uerba eorum, Deum recipit; qui autem spernit eos, eum, a quo missi sunt et cuius funguntur legatione, spernit, et ipse indubitanter spernetur a Domino. §. 2. Videntes autem ipsi apostoli messem esse multam et operarios paucos, rogauerunt dominum messis, ut mitteret operarios in messem suam: unde ab eis electi sunt LXXII. discipuli, quorum tipum gerunt presbiteri atque in eorum loco sunt constituti in ecclesia.

C. III. No synod, but Christ, instituted the primacy of the Roman Church.

Likewise Gelasius, bishop of the city of Rome, to all the orthodox. Although all the Catholic churches throughout the world are one bridal chamber of Christ, nevertheless the holy Roman Catholic and apostolic Church was placed before the other churches by no synodal enactments, but obtained the primacy by the evangelical voice of our Lord and Savior: "You are," says the Lord, "Peter, and upon this rock I shall build my Church." To him was also given the fellowship of most blessed Paul, the vessel of election, who—not at a different time, as the heretics prattle, but at one time, on one and the same day—contending in the city of Rome under Caesar Nero, was crowned with a glorious death together with Peter. They equally consecrated the aforesaid Roman Church to Christ the Lord and, by their presence and venerable triumph, placed it before all the cities in the whole world. The first see of the Apostle Peter, therefore, is the Roman Church, having neither spot nor wrinkle nor anything of this kind. Part III. GRATIAN. In all these, the more elevated the grade, the greater the authority is found. For in superiors there is the power of ruling and commanding; in inferiors, the necessity of obeying. Hence Pope Nicholas [I] writes to the bishop of Constantinople, saying:

C. III. Primatum Romanae ecclesiae non aliqua sinodus, sed Christus instituit.

Item Gelasius urbis Romae Episcopus omnibus orthodoxis. Quamuis uniuersae per orbem catholicae ecclesiae unus thalamus sit Christi, tamen sancta Romana ecclesia catholica et apostolica nullis sinodicis constitutis ceteris ecclesiis prelata est, sed euangelica uoce Domini et saluatoris nostri primatum obtinuit: "Tu es (inquiens dominus) Petrus et super hanc petram edificabo ecclesiam meam." Cui dati est societas etiam beatissimi Pauli uasis electionis, qui non diuerso (sicut heretici garriunt) sed uno tempore, uno eodemque die, gloriosa morte cum Petro in urbe Roma sub Cesare Nerone agonizans coronatus est, et supradictam Romanam ecclesiam pariter Christo Domino consecrarunt, eamque omnibus urbibus in uniuerso mundo sua presentia atque uenerando triumpho pretulerunt. Est ergo prima apostoli Petri sedes Romana ecclesia, non habens maculam neque rugam, nec aliquid huiusmodi. III. Pars. Gratianus. In his omnibus, quanto celsior gradus, tanto maior auctoritas inuenitur. In maioribus siquidem est regendi et iubendi potestas, in minoribus obsequendi necessitas. Unde Nicolaus Papa [I.] scribit Constantinopolitano episcopo dicens:

C. IV. Inferiors are to be judged by superiors.

An inferior see cannot absolve a superior. For only a superior fittingly absolves an inferior. From this it is clearly discerned that an inferior cannot bind in judgment the superior whom it cannot absolve. Hence the Prophet says: “Shall the axe glory against him who cuts with it? Or shall the saw be exalted against him who draws it?” Having thus recalled these things from divine Scripture, we have shown more clearly than the sun that no one of lesser authority can consign to his own judgments, or subjugate to his own determinations, one who is of greater power.

C. IV. Inferiores a superioribus iudicandi sunt.

Inferior sedes potiorem absoluere non potest. Sola enim potior inferiorem conuenienter absoluit. Hinc liquido prouidetur, quia quem non potest absoluere, nec potest iudicio inferior potiorem ligare. Unde Propheta ait: "Numquid gloriabitur securis contra eum, qui secat in ea? aut exaltabitur serra contra eum, qui trahit eam?" His ita ex diuina scriptura commemoratis, sole clarius exhibuimus, non posse quemquam, qui minoris auctoritatis est, eum, qui maioris est potestatis, iudiciis suis addicere, aut propriis diffinitionibus subiugare.

C. V. On the same matter.

The same [in the same epistle]. Do not suppose that we wish to defend in any of our neighbors those things that are worthy of reproof, but that I wish sons to be so devoted and sober toward a spiritual father, and disciples toward a master, that with absolutely no rashness should they leap forward, I do not say to judge their life, but even to reprove it lightly.

C. V. De eodem.

Idem. [eadem epistola.] Nolite nos existimare cuiuscumque proximorum nostrorum, ea que sunt digna reprehensione, uelle defendere, sed quod ita uelim filios circa patrem spiritualem, et discipulos erga magistrum deuotos esse ac sobrios, ut nulla penitus temeritate ad eorum uitam, ut non dicamus diiudicandam, sed nec saltem tenuiter reprehendendam prosiliant.

C. VI. Inferiors can neither bless nor curse superiors.

Likewise Pope Nicholas [in the same epistle]. Finally, if we read in the epistle to the Hebrews that the lesser is blessed by the greater, it certainly remains that, when reason requires, he is also cursed by him. For those who were before us, foreknowing these perilous times, handed down a provident custom in the churches; and today it is preserved without omission in the Roman Church, which is the teacher of all churches, so that no priest, unless his fellow priest who is his superior has given the sign, attempts to give a blessing of any matter. But one standing before him to pronounce some reading indeed asks for a blessing, yet no inferior dares to bless him. Why is this? Is blessing a sin? Far from it. For the Apostle says of those who curse, not those who bless, "that they shall not possess the kingdom of God." But through this it is indicated by how great a bridle of censure all inferiors are to be restrained from judging their prelates, if they possess absolutely no right even to bless them.

C. VI. Inferiores maioribus nec benedicere nec maledicere possunt.

Item Nicolaus Papa. [eadem epistola.] Denique si in epistola ad Ebreos legimus, quod minor a maiore benedicitur, restat profecto, ut exigente ratione etiam maledicatur. Siquidem prenoscentes hec periculosa tempora illi, qui ante nos fuerunt, prouidam in ecclesiis consuetudinem tradiderunt, hodieque in Romana ecclesia, que magistra est omnium ecclesiarum, impretermissa seruatur, ita ut nullus sacerdos, maiore suo non innuente consacerdote, cuiuslibet rei benedictionem dare nitatur; sed anterior stans ad pronuntiandam aliquam lectionem, benedictionem quidem postulat, sed ei quilibet inferior non audet benedicere. Cur hoc? numquid benedicere peccatum est? absit. De maledicis enim, non benedicis dicit Apostolus: "quia regnum Dei non possidebunt;" sed per hoc innuitur, quantae censurae freno inferiores quique a suis prepositis iudicandis cohercendi sunt, si hi nec etiam benedicendi ius ullum penitus obtineat.

C. VII.

The same to Emperor Michael. Now, however, by divine inspiration, it will neither weary us nor be impossible for us to show you—if only you wish to hear—that no one can rightly be subjected to judicial determinations by those who are of inferior dignity or order. For in the time of the Augusti Diocletian and Maximian, Marcellinus, bishop of the city of Rome, who afterward was made a distinguished martyr, was so far compelled by the pagans that he entered their temple and placed grains of incense upon the coals. Because of this matter, when a council of numerous bishops had been gathered and an inquiry made, this same pontiff confessed that he had done it. Yet none of them dared pronounce sentence against him, while they all said to him repeatedly: "Judge your cause by your own mouth, not by our judgment." And again: "Do not be heard in our judgment, but gather your cause into your bosom." And again they say: "For from yourself you shall be justified, or from your mouth you shall be condemned." And again they say: "The first see shall be judged by no one." Likewise in the same epistle: §1. But also when certain persons at one time had attempted to charge certain things of evil report against Pope Xystus, and it had been said in a council at which Valentinian Augustus was present that it was not permitted to give sentence against the pontiff, the same emperor immediately arose and entrusted the judgment of his own case to the decision of the aforesaid pontiff. For no pontiff of lesser or inferior cities is found subjected to judgments.

> C. VII.
> Idem Michaeli Imperatori. Nunc autem diuina inspiratione non nos pigebit, nec nobis impossibile erit, ostendere uobis (si tamen audire uelitis), non posse quemquam rite ab his, qui inferioris dignitatis uel ordinis sunt, iudicialibus submitti diffinitionibus. Siquidem tempore Diocletiani et Maximiani Augustorum Marcellinus episcopus urbis Romae, qui postea insignis martir effectus est, adeo compulsus est a paganis, ut templum eorum ingressus grana thuris super prunas imponeret: cuius rei gratia collecto, numerosorum episcoporum concilio, et inquisitione facta hoc idem Pontifex se egisse confessus est. Nullus tamen eorum proferre sententiam in eum ausus est dum ei sepissime omnes dicerent: "Tuo ore iudica causam tuam, non nostro iudicio." Et iterum: "Noli, audiri in nostro iudicio, sed collige in sinu tuo causam tuam." Et rursum: "Quoniam ex te," inquiunt, "iustificaberis, aut ex ore tuo condempnaberis." Et iterum dicunt: "Prima sedes non iudicabitur a quoquam." Item in eadem: §. 1. Sed et cum quidam tempore quodam contra Sixtum Papam temptassent quedam mali rumoris obicere, et in concilio, cui Valentinianus Augustus intererat, dictum fuisset, non licere aduersus Pontificem sententiam dare, surrexit idem protinus imperator, et in arbitrio prefati Pontificis tribuit iudicare iudicium suum. Etenim nullus Pontificum minorum uel inferiorum urbium subactus iudiciis inuenitur.

C. VIII. Superiors cannot be judged by inferiors.

Likewise Nicholas [in the same epistle]. Ignatius is subjected to the deliberations of lesser, inferior, and subject persons, although the sacred canons command, and the examples of the holy fathers show, that one must always go where the greater authority is, and that in all controversies recourse is to be directed to the judgments of the superior see. It is established that this was observed not only by Catholics but even by the heretics themselves. Otherwise it is evident that a council is headless where a person of such importance is treated and the judgment of the superiors is not awaited, since even in the cause of clerics of an inferior grade the judgment of their bishop alone is not merely to be sought.

> C. VIII. Maiores a minoribus iudicari non possunt.
> Item Nicolaus. [eadem epistola.] Submittitur Ignatius minorum, inferiorum et subiectorum deliberationibus, sacris canonibus precipientibus et exemplis sanctorum Patrum, semper, ubi est maior auctoritas, eundum esse, et in omnibus controuersiis ad potioris sedis iudicia dirigatur. Quod non solum a catholicis, uerum etiam ab ipsis constat obseruatum hereticis. Alioquin acephalum liquet esse concilium, ubi de tanta persona agitur, et maiorum non expectatur sententia, cum nec in causa clericorum inferioris gradus solius episcopi sui iudicium tantummodo postulandum sit.

C. IX. The sentence of inferiors cannot condemn superiors.

The same to Emperor Michael. The holy fathers at Chalcedon so greatly detested this presumption that, among other things, they condemned Dioscorus, prelate of Alexandria, without any restoration especially for this reason: that, placing his mouth in heaven while his tongue passed over the earth, he dictated an excommunication against Saint Leo the pope. Thus, in the sentence pronounced against him, they appear to recall this especially, saying: “Because by his second transgressions he greatly surpassed his former iniquity; for he presumed even to dictate an excommunication against the most holy and blessed archbishop Leo of great Rome,” etc. Is it read there that an inquiry was made whether Dioscorus had dictated that excommunication justly? Certainly not; but without any controversy they avenged this upon him because, although he was an inferior, he attempted to assail a superior with injuries of any kind, as Anatolius, prelate of Constantinople, testifies, saying: “Dioscorus was not condemned because of the faith, but because he made an excommunication against the lord Archbishop Leo.”

> C. IX. Minorum sentencia maiores dampnare non ualent.
> Idem Michaeli Imperatori. In tantum hac presumptionem sancti Patres apud Calcedonem detestati sunt, ut Dioscorum Alexandrinum antistitem inter cetera idcirco potissimum sine ulla restitutione dampnauerint, quia ponens in celum os suum, lingua eius transeunte super terram, excommunicationem in S. Leonem Papam dictauit; ita ut in sententia contra ipsum prolata hoc uideantur memorare precipue, dicentes: "Quoniam secundis excessionibus, priorem iniquitatem ualde transcendit: presumpsit enim et excommunicationem dictare aduersus sanctissimum et beatissimum archiepiscopum magnae Romae Leonem etc." Numquid ibi legitur inquisitionem factam fuisse, utrum iuste, Dioscorus ipsam excommunicationem dictasset? Non plane; sed absque omni controuersia hoc in eo ulti sunt, quia cum esset inferior, potiorem quibuslibet conatus est lacessere iniuriis, teste Anatolio Constantinopolitano presule, qui dicit: "Propter fidem non est dampnatus Dioscorus, sed quia excommunicationem fecit domino archiepiscopo Leoni."

Distinction XXII

GRATIAN. Part I. Since, therefore, a superior ought not to be judged by an inferior, it must be seen which church among the others holds the first place, which the second, and which the third. The Roman Church, as was said above, holds the first place among the others; the Church of Alexandria the second; and the Church of Antioch received from it the third place. Hence Pope Nicholas [II] writes to the Milanese:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quia ergo maior a minori iudicari non debet uidendum est, que inter ceteras ecclesias primum locum, que secundum, uel tertium obtineat. Romana ecclesia (sicut supra dictum est) primum locum inter ceteras obtinet, Alexandrina ecclesia secundum, Antiocena ecclesia tercium ab ea locum accepit. Unde Nicolaus Papa [II.] scribit Mediolanensibus:

C. I. The Roman Church obtained the primacy over the others.

The Roman Church instituted all patriarchs at the summit of any see, all primacies of metropolises, all episcopal chairs, or every dignity of churches of any order. But he alone founded her and raised her upon the rock of the faith just being born, who entrusted the rights of the earthly and at the same time the heavenly empire to the blessed key-bearer of eternal life. Therefore no earthly judgment whatsoever, but that Word by whom heaven and earth were constructed and by whom, finally, all the elements were created, founded the Roman Church. She certainly exercises his privilege and is supported by his authority. Hence there is no doubt that whoever detracts from the right of any church commits injustice. §1. But one who endeavors to take away the privilege of the Roman Church, handed down by the supreme head of all the churches himself, undoubtedly falls into heresy; and while the former is marked as unjust, this one is to be called a heretic. For one who acts against her who is the mother of the faith violates the faith, and is found contumacious toward him who is known to have placed her before all the churches. And below: §2. Hence Saint Ambrose himself also professes that in all things he follows the holy Roman Church as his teacher.

> C. I. Romana ecclesia ceterarum primatum obtinuit.

> Omnes siue patriarchae in cuiuslibet apicem siue metropoleon primatus, aut episcopatuum cathedras, uel ecclesiarum cuiuslibet ordinis dignitatem instituit Romana ecclesia. Illam uero solus ipse fundauit, et super petram fidei mox nascentis erexit, qui beato eternae uitae clauigero terreni simul et celestis imperii iura commisit. Non ergo quelibet terrena sententia, sed illud uerbum, quo constructum est celum et terra, per quod denique omnia condita sunt elementa, Romanam fundauit ecclesiam. Illius certe priuilegio fungitur, illius auctoritate fulcitur. Unde non dubium est, quia, quisquis cuilibet ecclesiae ius suum detrahit, iniusticiam facit. §. 1. Qui autem Romanae ecclesiae priuilegium ab ipso summo omnium ecclesiarum capite traditum auferre conatur, hic proculdubio in heresim labitur; et cum ille notetur iniustus, hic est dicendus hereticus. Fidem quippe uiolat, qui aduersus illam agit, que est mater fidei: et illi contumax inuenitur, qui eam cunctis ecclesiis pretulisse cognoscitur. Et infra: §. 2. Unde et ipse S. Ambrosius se in omnibus sequi magistram sanctam Romanam profitetur ecclesiam.

C. II. The Roman Church obtained the primacy not from the Apostles but from the Lord himself.

Likewise Anacletus, servant of Christ Jesus [to all bishops, epistle III, c. 3]. The sacrosanct Roman and apostolic Church obtained the primacy not from the Apostles but from our Lord and Savior himself, as he said to blessed Peter the Apostle: "You are Peter," and the rest down to: "loosed in heaven." §1. The fellowship of most blessed Paul the Apostle, the vessel of election, was added in that same city of Rome. On one day and at the same time he was crowned with a glorious death together with Peter; and both consecrated the holy Roman Church and placed her before all other cities in the whole world, both by their presence and by their venerable triumph. And although the continual prayer of all the saints is poured out before God for everyone, nevertheless in these words most blessed Paul promises the Romans in his own handwriting, saying: "For God is my witness, whom I serve in my spirit in the Gospel of his Son, that without interruption I always make remembrance of you in my prayers." §2. Therefore the first see by heavenly beneficence is the Roman Church, which, as has been recalled, most blessed Peter and Paul consecrated by their martyrdom. §3. The second see, however, at Alexandria, was consecrated in the name of blessed Peter by Mark, his disciple and evangelist. §4. The third see, at Antioch, is held honorable by reason of the same blessed Peter, because he held it there before he came to Rome and established Ignatius as bishop; and there the name of Christians first arose. And a little afterward: §5. Among the blessed Apostles there was a certain distinction; and afterward, although all were Apostles, it was nevertheless granted to Peter by the Lord—and they themselves willed this same thing among themselves—that he should preside over all the remaining Apostles and should hold the place of Cephas, that is, the head and beginning of the apostolate. They also handed down that this same form was to be maintained by their successors and by the other bishops. And this was established not only in the New Testament but also in the Old. Hence it is written: "Moses and Aaron among his priests," that is, they were the first among them. And a little afterward: §6. This apostolic see was established as the head and hinge, as was said before, by the Lord and not by another; and just as a door is governed by its hinge, so all the churches, by the Lord's ordering, are governed by the authority of this holy apostolic see.

GRATIAN. By this authority the Church of Alexandria is judged to have the second place after the first. But afterward, in the Synod of Constantinople, the Church of Constantinople received the second place after the apostolic see. Hence in the same synod [that is, Constantinople I, c. 5] it was established thus:

> C. II. Non ab apostolis, sed ab ipso Domino Romana ecclesia primatum obtinuit.

Item Anacletus Seruus Christi Iesu. [ad omnes episcopos, epistola III. c. 3.] Sacrosancta Romana et apostolica ecclesia non ab apostolis, sed ab ipso Domino saluatore nostro primatum obtinuit, sicut B. Petro apostolo dixit: "Tu es Petrus," et reliqua usque: "soluta in celo." §. 1. Adhibita est societas in eadem Romana urbe beatissimi Pauli apostoli, uasis electionis, qui uno die eodemque tempore cum Petro gloriosa morte coronatus est, et ambo sanctam ecclesiam Romanam consecrauerunt, atque aliis urbibus omnibus in uniuerso mundo tam sua presentia quam uenerando triumpho pretulerunt. Et licet pro omnibus assidua apud Deum omnium sanctorum effundatur oratio, his tamen uerbis Paulus beatissimus Romanis proprio cirographo pollicetur, dicens: "Testis enim mihi est Deus, cui seruio in spiritu meo in euangelio Filii eius, quod sine intermissione memoriam uestri facio semper in orationibus meis." §. 2. Prima ergo sedes est celesti beneficio Romana ecclesia, quam (ut memoratum est) beatissimi Petrus et Paulus suo martirio consecrarunt. §. 3. Secunda autem sedes apud Alexandriam B. Petri nomine a Marco, eius discipulo atque euangelista, consecrata est. §. 4. Tercia uero sedes apud Antiochiam eiusdem, B. Petri habetur honorabilis: quia illic, priusquam Romam ueniret, habuit, et Ignatium episcopum constituit; et illic primum nomen Christianorum exortum est. Et post pauca. §. 5. Inter beatos apostolos quedam fuit discretio, et post licet omnes essent apostoli, Petro tamen a Domino concessum est (et ipsi inter se uoluerunt id ipsum), ut reliquis omnibus preesset apostolis, et Cephas, id est caput et principium teneret apostolatus; qui et eandem formam suis successoribus et reliquis episcopis tenendam tradiderunt. Et non solum hoc in nouo testamento est constitutum, sed etiam in ueteri fuit; unde scriptum est: "Moyses et Aron in sacerdotibus eius," id est primi inter eos fuerunt. Et post pauca: §. 6. Hec uero apostolica sedes caput et cardo (ut prefatum est) a Domino, et non ab alio constituta est; et sicut cardine ostium regitur, sic huius sanctae apostolicae sedis auctoritate omnes ecclesie (Domino disponente) reguntur.

Gratian. Hac auctoritate Alexandrina ecclesia secundum a prima locum habere censetur. Sed postea in Constantinopolitana sinodo ecclesia Constantinopolitana secundum a sede apostolica locum accepit. Unde in eadem Sinodo [id est Constantinop. I. c. 5.] constitutum est ita:

C. III. The bishop of Constantinople holds the place second after the Roman Pontiff.

The bishop of the city of Constantinople ought to have the honor of primacy after the bishop of Rome because it is new Rome.

C. III. Secundum a Romano Pontifice Constantinopolitanus obtinet locum.

Constantinopolitanae ciuitatis episcopum habere oportet primatus honorem post Romanum episcopum, propter quod sit noua Roma.

C. IV. It is established that Constantinople is subject to the apostolic see.

Likewise Gregory to John, bishop of Syracuse [Book VII, epistle 63]. Concerning the Church of Constantinople, as to what they say, who doubts that it is subject to the apostolic see? Yet if it or another church possesses something good, I am prepared to imitate in good even my inferiors, whom I prohibit from illicit things. For foolish is one who considers himself first in such a way that he disdains to learn the good things he has seen. The same to the same [epistle 64]. For as to the fact that the primate of Byzantium says he subjects himself to the apostolic see, if any fault is found in bishops, I do not know who is not subject to it; but when fault does not require it, we are all equals according to the principle of humility.

C. IV. Apostolicae sedi Constantinopolitanam constat esse subiectam.

Item Gregorius Iohanni episcopo Siracusano. [lib. VII. epist. 63.] De Constantinopolitana ecclesia quod dicunt, quis eam dubitet sedi apostolicae esse subiectam! Si tamen quid boni uel ipsa, uel altera ecclesia habet, ego et minores meos, quos ab illicitis prohibeo, in bono imitari paratus sum. Stultus est enim, qui in eo se primum existimat, ut bona, que uiderit, discere contempnat. Idem eidem: [epist. 64.] Nam quod primas Bizanzenus sedi se apostolicae dicit subici si qua culpa in episcopis inuenitur nescio quis ei subiectus non sit; cum uero culpa non exigit, omnes secundum rationem humilitatis equales sumus.

C. V. The bishop of Constantinople is deposed by authority.

Likewise Gelasius [Pope Gelasius I to Faustus, master of the legation]. By what tradition of the elders do they call the apostolic see into judgment? Or ought the prelates of the second and third sees, and the other priests well conscious of their conduct, to have been driven out, while one who proved an enemy of religion ought not to have been driven out? Let them therefore see whether they have other canons by which they may carry out their follies. But these that are celebrated as sacred, ecclesiastical, and legitimate cannot call the apostolic see into judgment. Yet ought the bishop of the city of Constantinople—which assuredly received no name among the sees through the canons—not to have been removed when he fell back into the communion of the faithless?

C. V. Constantinopolitanus episcopus auctoritate deponitur.

Item Gelasius. [Papa I. ad Faustum magistrum legationis.] Qua traditione maiorum apostolicam sedem in iudicium uocant? An secundae sedis antistites et terciae, ceterique bene conscii sibi sacerdotes depelli debuerunt, et qui extitit religionis inimicus, depelli non debuit? Viderint ergo, si alios habent canones, quibus suas ineptias exequantur. Ceterum isti, qui sacri, qui ecclesiastici, qui legitimi celebrantur, sedem apostolicam ad iudicium uocare non possunt, Constantinopolitanae uero ciuitatis episcopus, que utique per canones inter sedes nullum nomen accepit, in communionem recidens perfidorum non debuit submoueri?

C. VI. The Church of Constantinople holds the place second after the Roman Church.

Likewise from the Sixth Synod [c. 36]. Renewing the decrees of the holy Council of Constantinople, we ask that the see of Constantinople receive privileges similar to those that elder Rome possesses, yet that it not be magnified in ecclesiastical matters as the latter is; so that, existing second after it, it may be numbered before the see of Alexandria, then Antioch, and after it Jerusalem. GRATIAN. From this it is given to be understood that the Church of Alexandria was made third from second, and Antioch was made fourth from third—unless perhaps someone should contend that there are two second sees, so that he would have Constantinople and Alexandria hold a place equal in their dignity. Hence it is read in the Eighth Synod [canon 21]:

C. VI. Constantinopolitana ecclesia secundum a Romana obtinet locum.

Item ex VI. Sinodo. [cap. 36.] Renouantes sancti Constantinopolitani concilii decreta, petimus, ut Constantinopolitana sedes similia priuilegia, que superior Roma habet, accipiat, non tamen ecclesiasticis rebus magnificetur, ut illa; ut hec secunda post illam existens, prius quam Alexandrina sedes numeretur; deinde Antiocena, et post eam Ierosolimitana. Gratian. Hinc datur intelligi, quod Alexandrina ecclesia de secunda facta sit tercia, et Antiocena de tercia sit facta quarta: nisi forte quis duas contendat esse secundas, ut Constantinopolitanam et Alexandrinam parem suae dignitatis uelit locum obtinere. Unde in VIII. Sinodo legitur: [can. 21.]

C. VII. Which of the patriarchal sees holds the first place and which the succeeding places.

We define that absolutely none of the powerful persons of the world is to dishonor any of those who preside over patriarchal sees or attempt to move him from his own throne: first, indeed, the most holy pope of elder Rome; afterward, the patriarch of Constantinople; then those of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem.

> C. VII. Que patriarchalium sedium primum uel deinceps teneat locum.
> Diffinimus, neminem prorsus mundi potentum quemquam eorum, qui patriarchalibus sedibus presunt, inhonorare, aut mouere a proprio throno temptare; precipue quidem sanctissimum Papam senioris Romae, deinceps autem Constantinopoleos patriarcham, deinde uero Alexandriae, ac Antiociae, ac Ierosolimorum.

Distinction XXIII

GRATIAN. Part I. We have briefly shown what difference there is among ecclesiastical offices. Now, beginning from the highest and descending from these to the last grade, let us show by the authorities of the saints how each of them ought to be ordained.

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Breuiter que inter ecclesiastica offitia sit differentia monstrauimus. Nunc a summo incipientes, et iisque ad ultimum gradum descendentes, qualiter quisque eorum debeat ordinari, sanctorum auctoritatibus ostendamus.

C. I. Decree of Pope Nicholas concerning the election of the Roman Pontiff.

In the name of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. In the year 1059 from his Incarnation, in the month of April, in the twelfth indiction, with the sacrosanct Gospels set forth, and with the most reverend and blessed Pope Nicholas presiding in the basilica of the Lateran patriarchate that is surnamed the Constantinian, and with the most reverend bishops, abbots, priests, and deacons also sitting together, the same venerable pontiff, decreeing by apostolic authority concerning the election of the supreme pontiff, said: §1. Your blessedness knows, most beloved brothers and fellow bishops, and it has not escaped the lower members either, how many adversities this apostolic see, which by God's authorship I serve, endured after the death of our lord Stephen of pious memory, our predecessor; and finally how many times, through the money changers of the simoniacal heresy, it was subjected to repeated hammers and frequent blows, so that the pillar of the living God already appeared almost to waver and the net of the supreme fisherman was compelled, as the storms swelled, to sink into the depths of shipwreck. Hence, if it pleases your fraternity, with God's aid we ought prudently to meet future occurrences and provide for the ecclesiastical state hereafter, lest revived evils—which God forbid—prevail. §2. Therefore, instructed by the authority of our predecessors and of the other holy fathers, we decree and establish that, when the pontiff of this universal Roman Church dies, first the cardinal bishops, treating the matter together with the most diligent consideration, should soon summon the cardinal clerics to themselves; and thus the rest of the clergy and the people should approach to give consent to the new election, plainly taking care lest the disease of venality creep in on any occasion. Let the most religious men be the leaders in advancing the election of the pontiff, and let the rest be followers. §3. This order of election is recognized as certain and legitimate if, after the rules or acts of diverse fathers have been examined, that judgment of blessed Leo, our predecessor, is also recalled. "No reason," he says, "permits those to be held among the bishops who were neither elected by the clerics, sought by the peoples, nor consecrated by the fellow provincial bishops with the judgment of the metropolitan." Because the apostolic see is placed before all the churches throughout the world, and therefore cannot have a metropolitan over it, the cardinal bishops undoubtedly discharge the office of the metropolitan; they, namely, are to advance the elected prelate to the summit of the apostolic height. §4. Let him be chosen from the bosom of that Church itself if a suitable man is found; but if one is not found from it, let him be taken from another, with the due honor and reverence of our beloved son Henry preserved, who at present is held as king and, God granting it, is hoped to be the future emperor, as we have already conceded to him and to those of his successors who personally obtain this right from this apostolic see. §5. But if the perversity of depraved and wicked men should grow so strong that a pure, sincere, and gratuitous election cannot take place in the city, let the cardinal bishops, together with religious clerics and Catholic laymen, although few, have the right and power to elect the pontiff of the apostolic see wherever it shall be fitting. §6. Clearly, after the election has been made, if the tempest of war or any endeavor of men through the zeal of malignity should resist so that the elected man cannot be enthroned in the apostolic see according to custom, nevertheless let the elect, as true pope, possess authority to govern the Roman Church and the faculty to dispose all its possessions; we know that blessed Gregory did this before his consecration. §7. But if anyone contrary to this our decree, promulgated by synodal judgment, shall have been elected or even ordained or enthroned through sedition, presumption, or any contrivance, by divine authority and that of the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, let him, together with his authors, supporters, and followers, be cast out, separated by perpetual anathema from the thresholds of the holy Church of God, as an antichrist, invader, and destroyer of all Christianity. Nor is any hearing concerning this ever to be reserved for him, but without reconsideration let him be deposed from every ecclesiastical grade, whatever he had previously been. Whoever adheres to him, displays reverence of any kind toward him as pontiff, or presumes to defend him in any respect is to be subjected to an equal sentence. §8. Whoever proves a violator of this our decretal sentence and attempts, contrary to this statute, to confound and disturb the Roman Church by his presumption, let him be condemned by perpetual anathema and excommunication and "be numbered with the impious who shall not rise in judgment"; let him feel against himself the wrath of the Almighty, and in this life and the future let him feel the fury of the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, whose Church he presumes to confound. "Let his habitation become desolate, and let there be no one who dwells in their tents. Let his sons become orphans and his wife a widow. Let him and his sons be moved and removed; let them beg and be cast out from their habitations. Let the moneylender search out all his substance, and let strangers plunder his labors. Let the globe of the earth fight against him, and let all the elements be contrary to him"; let the merits of all the saints at rest confound him and show open vengeance upon him in this life. §9. But may the grace of the Almighty protect the observers of this our decree, and may the authority of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul absolve them from the bonds of all sins. Part II. GRATIAN. Let us show, from the authority of the Fourth Council of Carthage [c. 1], at which Augustine was present in the time of Honorius Augustus, how bishops and the others established in an order below them ought to be ordained, beginning with their examination:

> C. I. Decretum Nicolai Papae de electione Romani Pontificis.

In nomine Domini nostri et saluatoris Iesu Christi. Ab incarnatione eius anno MLIX. mense Aprili, indictione XII., propositis sacrosanctis euangeliis, presidente quoque reuerendissimo ac beatissimo Nicolao Papa, in basilica Lateranensis patriarchii, que cognominatur Constantiniana, considentibus etiam reuerendissimis episcopis, abbatibus, presbiteris, diaconibus, idem uenerabilis Pontifex apostolica auctoritate decernens de electione summi Pontificis, inquit: §. 1. Nouit beatitudo uestra, dilectissimi fratres et coepiscopi, inferiora quoque membra non latuit, defuncto piae memoriae domino Stephano predecessore nostro hec apostolica sedes, cui auctore Deo deseruio, quot aduersa pertulerit, quot denique per simoniacae heresis trapezitas repetitis malleis crebrisque tunsionibus subiacuerit, adeo ut columna Dei uiuentis iam pene uideretur nutare, et sagena summi piscatoris procellis intumescentibus cogeretur in naufragii profunda submergi. Unde, si placet fraternitati uestrae, debemus auxiliante Deo futuris casibus prudenter occurrere, et ecclesiastico statui, ne rediuiua mala (quod absit) preualeant, in posterum prouidere. §. 2. Quapropter instructi predecessorum nostrorum aliorumque sanctorum Patrum auctoritate, decernimus atque statuimus, ut, obeunte huius Romanae ecclesiae uniuersalis Pontifice, inprimis cardinales episcopi diligentissima simul consideratione tractantes, mox sibi clericos cardinales adhibeant: sicque reliquus clerus et populus ad consensum nouae electionis accedant, nimirum precauentes, ne uenalitatis morbus aliqua occasione subrepat. Religiosissimi uiri preduces sint in promouenda Pontificis electione, reliqui autem sequaces. §. 3. Certus uero atque legitimus hic electionis ordo perpenditur, si, perspectis diuersorum Patrum regulis siue gestis, etiam illa B. predecessoris nostri Leonis sententia recolatur. "Nulla," inquit, "ratio sinit, ut inter episcopos habentur, qui nec a clericis sunt electi, nec a plebibus expetiti, nec a comprouincialibus episcopis cum metropolitani iudicio consecrati." Quia sedes apostolica cunctis in orbe terrarum prefertur ecclesiis atque ideo super se metropolitanum habere non potest, cardinales episcopi proculdubio metropolitani uice funguntur, qui uidelicet electum antistitem ad apostolici culminis apicem prouehant. §. 4. Eligatur autem de ipsius ecclesiae gremio, si reperitur idoneus; uel si de ipsa non inuenitur, ex alia assumatur; saluo debito honore et reuerentia dilecti filii Henrici, qui in presentiarum rex habetur, et futurus imperator Deo concedente speratur, sicut iam sibi concessimus et successoribus illius, qui ab hac apostolica sede hoc ius personaliter impetrauerint. §. 5. Quod si prauorum atque iniquorum hominum ita peruersitas inualuerit, ut pura, sincera atque gratuita fieri in Urbe non possit electio, cardinales episcopi cum religiosis clericis catholicisque laicis, licet paucis, ius potestatis obtineat, eligere apostolicae sedis Pontificem, ubi congruerit. §. 6. Plane, postquam electio fuerit facta, si bellica tempestas uel qualiscumque hominum conatus malignitatis studio restiterit, ut is, qui electus est, in apostolica sede iuxta consuetudinem inthronizari non ualeat, electus tamen, sicut uere Papa, auctoritatem obtineat regendi Romanam ecclesiam, et disponendi omnes facultas illius; quod beatum Gregorium ante consecrationem suam fecisse cognouimus. §. 7. Quod si quis contra hoc nostrum decretum sinodali sententia promulgatum per seditionem, uel presumptionem, aut quolibet ingenio electus aut etiam ordinatus, seu inthronizatus fuerit, auctoritate diuina et sanctorum apostolorum Petri et Pauli, perpetuo anathemate cum suis auctoribus, fautoribus et sequacibus a liminibus sanctae Dei ecclesiae separatus abiciatur sicut antichristus, et inuasor et destructor totius Christianitatis; nec aliqua super hoc audientia aliquando reseruetur ei: sed ab omni ecclesiastico gradu, in quocumque fuerat prius, sine retractatione deponatur: cui quisquis adheserit, uel qualemcumque tamquam Pontifici reuerentiam exhibuerit, aut in aliquo eum defendere presumpserit, pari sententia sit mancipatus. §. 8. Quisquis huius nostrae decretalis sententiae temerator extiterit, et Romanam ecclesiam sua presumptione confundere et perturbare contra hoc statutum temptauerit, perpetuo anathemate atque excommunicatione dampnetur, "et cum impiis, qui non resurgent in iudicio," deputetur, omnipotentis contra se sentiat iram, et sanctorum apostolorum Petri et Pauli (quorum presumit ecclesiam confundere), in hac uita et in futura furorem sentiat "fiat habitatio eius deserta, et non sit, qui inhabitet in tabernaculis eorum, fiant filii eius orphani et uxor eius uidua, commotus amoueatur ipse et eius filii, et mendicent, et eiciantur de habitationibus suis, scrutetur fenerator omnem substantiam eius, et diripiant alieni labores eius, orbis terrarum pugnet contra eum, et cuncta elementa sint ei contraria," et omnium sanctorum quiescentium merita illum confundant, et in hac uita super eum apertam uindictam ostendant. §. 9. Obseruatores autem huius nostri decreti omnipotentis gratia protegat, et auctoritas beatorum, apostolorum Petri et Pauli ab omnium uinculis peccatorum absoluat. II. Pars. Gratian. Episcopi uero et ceteri ordinem infra constituti qualiter ordinari debeant, ex auctoritate Cartaginensis concilii IV., [cap. I.] cui interfuit Augustinus tempore Honorii Augusti, ostendamus, ab eorum examinatione incipientes:

C. II. How one who is elected as bishop is to be examined.

One who is to be ordained a bishop is first to be examined: whether he is prudent by nature; whether teachable; temperate in morals; chaste in life; sober; always cautious in his own affairs; humble; affable; merciful; literate; instructed in the law of the Lord; cautious in the meanings of the Scriptures; exercised in ecclesiastical doctrines; and, before all things, whether he asserts the teachings of the faith in simple words—that is, confirming that the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are one God, and preaching the whole deity of the Trinity as coessential, consubstantial, coeternal, and co-omnipotent; whether he confesses each individual person in the Trinity as fully God and all three persons together as one God; whether he believes that the divine incarnation was effected neither in the Father nor in the Holy Spirit but in the Son alone, so that he who in divinity was the Son of God the Father should be true God from the Father and true man from his mother, having flesh from his mother's womb and a rational human soul; with both natures together in him, that is, God and man, one person, one Son, one Christ, one Lord, creator and author of all things that exist, Lord and ruler of all creatures together with the Father and the Holy Spirit; who suffered for our salvation by the true reception of his flesh and the true resumption of his soul, in which he is to come to judge the living and the dead. §1. It is also to be asked of him whether he believes that the one and same God is the author of the New and Old Testament—that is, of the law, the prophets, and the Apostles—and whether the devil was made evil not by creation but by choice. §2. It is also to be asked of him whether he believes in the resurrection of this flesh that we bear and not of another; whether he believes in the future judgment and that each will receive either punishments or rewards for the things that they did in this flesh; whether he does not prohibit marriages; does not condemn second marriages; does not censure the receiving of meats; communicates with penitents who have been reconciled; believes that in baptism all sins are forgiven, that is, both that original sin contracted and those voluntarily committed; and believes that no one is saved outside the Catholic Church. §3. When, having been examined in all these things, he has been found fully instructed, then, with the consent of the clerics and laymen and with the assembly of the bishops of the whole province, and especially with the authority or presence of the metropolitan, let him be ordained a bishop. Having received the episcopate in the name of Christ, let him acquiesce not in his own pleasure or his own morals, but in these definitions of the fathers.

C. II. Quomodo sit examinandus, qui in episcopum eligitur.

Qui episcopus ordinandus est, antea examinetur, si natura sit prudens, si docibilis, si moribus temperatus si uita castus, si sobrius, si semper suis negociis cauens si humilis, si affabilis, si misericors, si litteratus, si in lege Domini instructus, si in scripturarum sensibus cautus, si in dogmatibus ecclesiasticis exercitatus; et ante omnia, si fidei documenta uerbis simplicibus asserat, id est Patrem et Filium et Spiritum sanctum unum Deum esse confirmans, totamque trinitatis deitatem coessentialem et consubstantialem et coeternalem et coomnipotentem predicans; si singulas quasque in trinitate personas plenum Deum, et totas tres personas unum Deum, si incarnationem diuinam non in Patre, neque in Spiritu sancto factam, sed in Filio tantum credat, ut, in diuinitate qui erat Dei Patris Filius, Deus uerus ex Patre esset et homo uerus ex matre, carnem ex matris uisceribus habens, et animam humanam rationabilem, simul in eo utriusque naturae, id est Deus et homo, una persona, unus Filius, unus Christus, unus Dominus, creator omnium que sunt et auctor, Dominus et rector cum Patre et Spiritu sancto omnium creaturarum; qui passus sit pro salute nostra uera carnis suae receptione et uera animae resumptione, in qua ueniat iudicare uiuos et mortuos. §. 1. Querendum est etiam ab eo, si noui et ueteris testamenti, id est legis et prophetarum et apostolorum unum eundemque credat auctorem Deum, si diabolus non per conditionem, sed per arbitrium factus sit malus. §. 2. Querendum etiam ab eo, si credat huius, quam gestamus, et non alterius carnis resurrectionem, si credat iudicium futurum, et recepturos singulos pro his, que in hac carne gesserunt, uel penas, uel premia, si nuptias non prohibeat, si secunda matrimonia non dampnet, si carnium perceptionem non culpet, si penitentibus reconciliatis communicet, si in baptismo omnia peccata, id est tam illud originale peccatum contractum, quam illa, que uoluntarie admissa sunt, dimittantur, si extra ecclesiam catholicam nullus saluetur. §. 3. Cum in his omnibus examinatus inuentus fuerit plene instructus, tunc cum consensu clericorum et laicorum et conuentu totius prouinciae episcoporum, maximeque metropolitani uel auctoritate, uel presentia ordinetur episcopus. Suscepto in nomine Christi episcopatu, non suae delectationi, nec suis moribus, sed his Patrum diffinitionibus acquiescat.

C. III. Of what sort the manner of life of clerics ought to be.

Likewise Isidore, on the life of clerics. Part III. The law of the fathers therefore provides that they, separated from common life, should abstain from the pleasures of the world; should be present neither at spectacles nor at processions; should flee public banquets and cultivate private ones that are not only chaste but also sober; should by no means devote themselves to usury or to occupations of shameful profits; should not seek zealously after frauds against anyone; should flee the love of money as the material of all crimes; should refuse secular offices and affairs; should not receive grades of honor through ambition; should not accept gifts in return for the benefits of God's medicine; should beware of deceits and conspiracies; should flee hatred, rivalries, detraction, and envy; should walk neither with wandering eyes, an unbridled tongue, nor with wantonness and a dissolute gesture, but should show the modesty and shamefastness of the mind by simple dress and gait; should utterly abhor obscenity of members and words as they do that of deeds; should flee the frequent company of widows and virgins; should in no way seek the companionship of unrelated women; should strive to preserve perpetually the chastity of an inviolate body, or at least be joined by the bond of one marriage; should also furnish due obedience to elders and should not exalt themselves by any zeal for vainglory; finally, should devote themselves continually to readings of doctrine, psalms, hymns, songs, and constant exercise. For those who strive to bind themselves to divine worship ought to be such, namely so that, while they devote labor to knowledge, they may administer the grace of doctrine to the peoples.

C. III. Qualis esse debeat clericorum conuersatio.

Item Ysidorus de uita clericorum. III. Pars. His igitur lege Patrum cauetur, ut a uulgari uita seclusi a mundi uoluptatibus sese abstineant; non spectaculis, non pompis intersint; conuiuia publica fugiant, priuata non tantum pudica, sed et sobria colant; usuris nequaquam incumbant, neque turpium occupationibus lucrorum, non fraudibus cuiusquam studium appetant; amorem pecuniae quasi materiam cunctorum criminum fugiant, secularia offitia negotiaque abnuant; honoris gradus per ambitionem non suscipiant; pro beneficiis medicinae Dei munera non accipiant; dolos et coniurationes caueant; odium, emulationes, obtrectationem atque inuidiam fugiant; non uagis oculis, non effreni lingua, aut petulantia fluidoque gestu incedant, sed pudorem et uerecundiam mentis simplici habitu incessuque ostendant; obscenitatem etiam membrorum et uerborum, sicut et operum, penitus exsecrentur; uiduarum et uirginum frequentaciones fugiant; contubernia extranearum feminarum nullatenus appetant; castimoniam quoque inuiolati corporis perpetuo conseruare studeant, aut certe unius matrimonii uinculo federentur; senioribus quoque debitam prebeant obedientiam, neque ullo iactantiae studio semetipsos attollant; postremo doctrinae lectionibus, psalmis, imnis, canticis, exercitio iugi incumbant. Tales enim esse debent, qui diuinis cultibus sese mancipandos studeant, scilicet ut, dum scientiae operam dant, doctrinae gratiam populis administrent.

C. IV. Those who cannot worthily handle the sacraments are not to be chosen for the divine ministry.

Likewise Clement [to James, the brother of the Lord, epistle II]. Let such clerics be chosen for the ministry as can worthily handle the Lord's sacraments. For it is better for a priest of the Lord to have a few ministers who can worthily perform the work of God than many useless ones who bring a heavy burden upon the ordainer.

C. IV. Qui digne sacramenta tractare non possunt, ad ministerium non eligantur diuinum.

Item Clemens. [ad Iacobum fratrem Domini, epist. II.] Tales ad ministerium eligantur clerici, qui digne possint dominica sacramenta tractare. Melius est enim Domini sacerdoti paucos habere ministros, qui possint digne opus Dei exercere, quam multos inutiles, qui onus graue ordinatori adducant.

C. V. If any charges are brought against one elected as bishop, five or six bishops are to come for his purgation.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage. This is to be established: when we assemble to elect a bishop, if any contradiction has arisen—as such things have occurred among us—let only three not presume to purge the one who is to be ordained, but let two or three be requested in addition to the aforesaid number; and among that same people for whom he is to be ordained, let the persons of those contradicting first be examined, and finally let the things that are charged also be discussed; and when he has been purged in public view, only then let him be ordained. If this agrees with the mind of your holiness, let it be confirmed by the response of your dignity. It was said by all the bishops: "It pleases us sufficiently."

C. V. Si electo in episcopum aliqua obiciuntur, quinque uel sex episcopi ad eius purgationem perueniant.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. Illud statuendum est, ut, quando ad eligendum episcopum conuenerimus, si qua contradictio oborta fuerit (quia talia sunt facta apud nos), non presumant ad purgandum eum, qui ordinandus est, tres tantum, sed postulentur ad numerum supradictorum duo uel tres, et in eadem plebe, cui ordinandus est, discutiantur primo personae contradicentium, postremo etiam illa, que obiciuntur, pertractentur, et, cum purgatus fuerit sub conspectu publico, ita demum ordinetur. Si hoc cum uestrae sanctitatis animo concordat, roboretur uestrae dignitatis responsione. Ab uniuersis episcopis dictum est: "Satis placet".

C. VI. Those whom ecclesiastical discipline promotes are to pledge the vows of their promise.

Likewise from the Eleventh Council of Toledo [c. 10]. Although all who are bound to sacred orders are held fast by canonical rules, it is nevertheless expedient that those whom ecclesiastical discipline approves for grades of promotion should pledge the vows of their promise under a guarantee. For what is promised individually is usually feared more than what is included in a general pledge. §1. And therefore it pleased this holy council that each one who is about to approach ecclesiastical grades should not receive the consecration of honor before he promises by a declaration of his agreement that, guarding the Catholic faith with sincere devotion of heart, he ought to live justly and piously, contradict the canonical rules in none of his works, and render in all things the honor owed and the reverence of obedience to the one set over him, according to that edict of Pope Leo: "One who knows himself to be placed over certain persons should not bear it grievously that another is placed over him, but should himself also render the obedience that he demands." Nevertheless, according to the manner of ecclesiastical custom, a penalty is to be imposed upon agreements of this kind and paid by those who are transgressors.

Thereafter it is arranged how ecclesiastical offices are to be ordained.

> C. VI. Vota suae promissionis spondeant, quos ecclesiastica promouet disciplina.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano XI. [c. 10.] Quamquam omnes, qui sacris mancipantur ordinibus, canonicis regulis teneantur astricti, expedibile tamen est, ut promissionis suae uota sub cautione spondeant, quos ad promotionis gradus ecclesiastica probat disciplina. Solet enim plus timeri, quod singulariter pollicetur, quam quod generali sponsione concluditur. §. 1. Et ideo placuit huic sancto concilio, ut unusquisque, qui ad ecclesiasticos gradus est accessurus, non ante honoris consecrationem accipiat, quam placiti sui innotacione promittat, ut fidem catholicam sincera cordis deuotione custodiens iuste et pie uiuere debeat, et in nullis operibus suis canonicis regulis contradicat, atque ut debitum per omnia honorem atque obsequii reuerentiam preminenti sibi unusquisque dependat, iuxta illud Papae Leonis edictum: "Qui se scit aliquibus esse prepositum, non moleste ferat aliquem sibi esse prelatum, sed obedientiam, quam exigit, etiam ipse dependat." Pena tamen iuxta ecclesiasticae consuetudinis morem et placitis talium inferenda, et ab his, qui transgressores fuerint, persoluenda est.
> Dehinc disponitur, qualiter ecclesiastica offitia ordinentur.

C. VII. How a bishop is to be ordained.

When a bishop is ordained, let two bishops place and hold the codex of the Gospels over his head and neck; and while one pours the blessing over him, let all the other bishops who are present touch his head with their hands.

> C. VII. Qualiter ordinetur episcopus.
> Episcopus cum ordinatur, duo episcopi ponant et teneant euangeliorum codicem super caput et ceruicem eius, et uno super eum fundente benedictionem, reliqui omnes episcopi, qui adsunt, manibus suis caput eius tangant.

C. VIII. How a priest is to be ordained. [From the same, c. 3.]

When a priest is ordained, while the bishop blesses him and holds a hand over his head, let all the priests who are present also hold their hands over his head beside the bishop's hands. But just as on the day of his ordination a priest is surrounded over both shoulders by the stole, so at the time of consecration he ought constantly to use the same stole. Hence it is read in the Council of Braga [III, c. 3]:

> C. VIII. Qualiter ordinetur presbiter. [Ex eodem c. 3.]
> Presbiter cum ordinatur, episcopo eum benedicente et manum super caput eius tenente, etiam omnes presbiteri, qui presentes sunt, manus suas iuxta manus episcopi super caput illius teneant. Sicut autem in die ordinationis suae sacerdos orario utroque humero ambitur, ita tempore consecrationis eodem orario instanter uti debet. Unde in Concilio Bracharensi [III. c. 3.] legitur:

C. IX. What each person received at the time of consecration, let him bear at the time of oblation.

We know that it was prescribed by ecclesiastical institution that every priest, when he is ordained, should be surrounded over both shoulders by the stole: namely, so that one who is commanded to stand untroubled amid prosperity and adversity may always appear surrounded over both shoulders by the ornament of the virtues. By what reasoning, therefore, does he not take up at the time of sacrifice what he does not doubt that he received in the sacrament? Hence it is fitting in every way that what each person received in the consecration of honor he should retain also in the oblation or reception of his salvation; namely, that when a priest approaches the solemn rites of the Mass, either about to offer sacrifice to God himself or about to receive the sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, he should be surrounded over both shoulders by the stole in no other manner than that in which he is recognized to have been consecrated at the time of his ordination, so that, pressing his neck and both shoulders together with one and the same stole, he may form the sign of the cross upon his breast. §1. But if anyone acts otherwise, he will be subject to the due excommunication. Part IV. GRATIAN. Neither bishops nor deacons, however, are permitted to use dalmatics without apostolic license. Hence Gregory to Aregius, bishop of the Franks [Book VII, epistle 111]:

> C. IX. Quod quisque accepit tempore consecrationis, ferat tempore oblationis.
> Ecclesiastica institucione prefixum nouimus, ut omnis sacerdos, cum ordinatur, orario utroque humero ambiatur: scilicet, ut qui imperturbatus precipitur consistere inter prospera et aduersa uirtutum semper ornamento, utroque circumseptus apareat humero. Qua ergo ratione tempore sacrificii non assumit, quod se in sacramento accepisse non dubitat? Proinde modis omnibus conuenit, ut, quod quisque percepit in consecratione honoris, hoc retineat et in oblatione uel perceptione suae salutis; scilicet, ut, cum sacerdos ad solempnia missarum accedit, aut per se Deo sacrificium oblaturus, aut sacramentum corporis et sanguinis Domini nostri Iesu Christi sumpturus, non aliter, quam orario utroque humero circumseptus, sicut et tempore ordinationis suae dignoscitur consecratus, ita ut de uno eodemque orario ceruicem pariter et utrumque humerum premens signum in suo pectore preparet crucis. §. 1. Si quis autem aliter egerit, debitae excommunicationi subiacebit IV. Pars. Gratianus. Dalmaticis autem nec episcopis, nec diaconibus absque apostolica licentia uti permittitur. Unde Gregorius Aregio Episcopo Francorum: [lib. VII. epist. 111.]

C. X. Without apostolic license, neither bishops nor deacons may use dalmatics.

Our common son, the deacon Peter, made known to us that your fraternity, at the time when he was here, requested that we grant you and your archdeacon license to use dalmatics. But because he was compelled by the infirmity of his men and departed hastily, so that neither did the sorrow pressing upon him permit him to remain long, as was fitting and as the desired matter required, nor did consideration of ecclesiastical principle permit us, entangled in many affairs, to grant this new thing without counsel and suddenly, the effect of the requested matter was therefore delayed. Now, however, recalling to mind the good qualities of your charity, by the tenor of this our authority we grant the things requested; and we have conceded that you and your archdeacon are to be adorned with the use of dalmatics, and have transmitted those dalmatics with our most beloved son Cyriacus the abbot carrying them.

> Communis filius diaconus Petrus nobis innotuit, quod fraternitas uestra tempore, quo hic fuit, poposcerit, ut sibi et archidiacono suo utendi dalmaticis licentiam preberemus. Sed quia hominum suorum infirmitate compulsus festinanter abcessit, ut nec ipse meror incumbens diu (ut dignum erat et res desiderata poscebat) sineret manere, et nos in multis inplicatos, ut ecclesiasticae rationis est consideratio, nouum hoc inconsulte et subito non permitteret indulgere, idcirco postulatae rei prolongatus effectus est. Nunc uero, caritatis tuae bona reuocantes ad animum, huius auctoritatis nostrae serie petita concedimus, atque te et archidiaconum tuum dalmaticarum usu decorandos esse concessimus, easdemque dalmaticas dilectissimo filio nostro Ciriaco abbate deferente transmisimus.

C. XI. How a deacon is to be ordained.

[From the Fourth Council of Carthage, c. 4.] When a deacon is ordained, only the bishop who blesses him is to place his hands over his head, because he is consecrated not to the priesthood but to the ministry. Part V. GRATIAN. It is asked, however, whether after the blessing the hands of priests and deacons ought to be anointed with the liquid of chrism. Pope Nicholas [I] writes thus concerning these things to Radulf, archbishop of Bourges:

> C. XI. Qualiter ordinetur diaconus.
> [Ex Conc. Carth. IV. c. 4.] Diaconus cum ordinatur, solus episcopus, qui eum benedicit, manus super caput illius ponat quia non ad sacerdotium, sed ad ministerium consecratur. V. Pars. Gratianus. Queritur autem, an post benedictionem manus presbiterorum et diaconorum crismatis liquore debeant perungi. De his ita scribit Nicolaus Papa [I.] Radulpho Bituricensi Archiepiscopo:

C. XII. The hands of neither priests nor deacons are to be anointed with chrism at consecration.

Furthermore, you ask whether the hands of priests alone, or also those of deacons, ought to be anointed with the liquid of chrism when they are ordained. In the holy Roman Church, which by God's authorship we serve, this is done to neither. But we nowhere read—unless forgetfulness deceives us—that it was done by the ministers of the new law. We therefore direct your holiness to the canonical decrees of blessed Pope Innocent, and the opening portions of the page sent to Decentius, bishop of Gubbio, will teach you abundantly what things are to be observed by you in consecrations and orders.

[PALEA.

C. XIII. From the Second Council of Seville, c. 5.

> C. XII. Nec presbiteris, nec diaconibus in consecratione crismate manus perungantur.

> Preterea sciscitaris, utrum solis presbiteris, an et diaconibus debeant, cum ordinantur, manus crismatis liquore perungi. Quod in sancta Romana ecclesia, cui auctore Deo deseruimus, neutris agitur. Sed quia sit a nouae legis ministris actum, nusquam (nisi nos fallat obliuio) legimus. Ergo ad B. Innocentii Papae canonica decreta sanctitatem tuam transmittimus, et que sint tibi in consecrationibus et ordinibus obseruanda, principia paginae ad Decentium Eugubinum episcopum missae te affatim edocebunt.

> [PALEA.

From the epistle of Pope Simplicius directed to Bishops Severus and Florentinus. It came to the cognizance of our examination through the report of a Gabrensian deacon concerning certain clerics of that Church. When one of them was being consecrated to the priesthood and two to the ministry of the Levites, their bishop, detained by pain of the eyes, is reported only to have placed his hand over them, and a certain priest, contrary to ecclesiastical order, to have given them the blessing. Because of the audacity of so great a presumption, this priest could have been accused and condemned in the present judgment if, while still placed in the body, he had not been forestalled by the summons of death. But because he, now left to divine examination, cannot be accused by human judgment, we have decreed that those who survive, and received from him not the title of consecration but rather a written attestation of disgrace, should be deposed and cast out by equitable judgment from the grade of the priestly or Levitical order that they perversely obtained, lest such usurpation make a license for itself hereafter. For such persons were deservedly judged to be removed because they were found to have been perversely established.] GRATIAN. Likewise it is asked whether the ordination of those upon whom a bishop, impeded by a weakness of the eyes, imposes hands while a priest says the prayer over them is to be held valid. Concerning these things it was established thus in the Council of Toledo:

> C. XIII. Ex Concilio Hispalensis II. c. 5.
> Ex epistola Simplicii Papae Seuero et Florentino Episcopis directa. Ad cognitionem nostri examinis Gabrenensis diaconi relatu peruenit de quibusdam ipsius ecclesiae clericis, quorum cum unus ad presbiterium, duo ad Leuitarum ministerium consecrarentur, episcopus eorum, oculorum dolore detentus, fertur manum suam super eos tantum posuisse, et presbiter quidam illis contra ecclesiasticum ordinem benedictionem dedisse; qui propter tantam presumptionis audaciam poterat accusatus iudicio presenti dampnari, si adhuc in corpore positus, non fuisset mortis uocatione preuentus. Sed quia iam ille examini diuino relictus humano iudicio accusari non potest, hi, qui supersunt, et ab eo non consecrationis titulum, sed ignominiae potius elogium acceperunt, ne sibi licentiam talis ultra usurpatio faciat, decreuimus, ut a gradu sacerdotalis uel leuitici ordinis, quem peruerse adepti sunt, depositi equo iudicio abiciantur. Tales enim merito iudicati sunt remouendi, quia praue inuenti sunt constituti.] Gratian. Item queritur, an eorum ordinatio sit rata habenda, quibus episcopus, oculorum languore impeditus manus, imponit, et presbiter super eos orationem dicit. De his ita statutum est in Concilio Tolletano:

C. XIV. Both the ordainer and the ordained are to undergo the penalty of condemnation when the bishop imposes a hand and another says the prayer.

While certain clerics—one to the priesthood and two to the ministry of the Levites—were being consecrated, their bishop, detained by pain of the eyes, is reported only to have placed his hand over them, and a certain priest, contrary to ecclesiastical order, to have given them the blessing. But because the latter, already left to divine examination, cannot be accused by human judgment, let those who survive lose the grade of the priesthood or Levitical order that they perversely obtained.

C. XIV. Et ordinator, et ordinatus dampnationis subeat penam, cum episcopus manum imponit, et alius orationem dicit.

Quorumdam clericorum, dum unus ad presbiterium, duo ad Leuitarum ministerium sacrarentur, episcopus, oculorum dolore detentus, fertur super eos manum suam tantum posuisse, et presbiter quidam illis contra ecclesiasticum ordinem benedictionem dedisse. Sed quia ille iam examini diuino relictus humano iudicio accusari non potest, hi, qui supersunt, gradum sacerdotii uel leuitici ordinis, quem peruerse adepti sunt, amittant.

C. XV. How a subdeacon is to be ordained.

Part VI. When a subdeacon is ordained, because he does not receive the imposition of a hand, let him receive from the hand of the bishop an empty paten and an empty chalice; but from the hand of the archdeacon let him receive an ewer together with a basin and a hand towel.

C. XV. Qualiter ordinetur subdiaconus

VI. Pars. Subdiaconus cum ordinatur, quia manus impositionem non accipit, patenam de manu episcopi accipiat uacuam et calicem uacuum; de manu uero archidiaconi accipiat urceolum cum aquamanile et manutergium.

C. XVI. How an acolyte is to be ordained.

When an acolyte is ordained, let him indeed be taught by the bishop how he ought to act in his office; but let him receive from the archdeacon a candlestick with a candle, so that he may know himself to be assigned to kindling the lights of the Church. Let him also receive an empty small pitcher for supplying wine for the Eucharist of the blood of Christ.

C. XVI. Qualiter ordinetur acolitus.

Acolitus cum ordinatur, ab episcopo quidem doceatur, qualiter in offitio suo debeat agere: sed ab archidiacono accipiat ceroferarium cum cereo, ut sciat se ad accendenda ecclesiae luminaria mancipari; accipiat et urceolum uacuum ad suggerendum uinum in eucharistiam sanguinis Christi.

C. XVII. How an exorcist is to be ordained.

When an exorcist is ordained, let him receive from the hand of the bishop a little book in which the exorcisms are written, with the bishop saying to him: “Receive this and commit it to memory, and have the power of imposing hands upon a possessed person, whether baptized or a catechumen.”

C. XVII. Qualiter ordinetur exorcista.

Exorcista cum ordinatur, accipiat de manu episcopi libellum, in quo scripti sunt exorcismi, dicente sibi episcopo: "Accipe, et commenda memoriae, et habeto potestatem inponendi manus super energuminum, siue baptizatum, siue catecuminum."

C. XVIII. How a reader is to be ordained.

When a reader is ordained, let the bishop address the people concerning him, indicating his faith, life, and ability. After this, while the people look on, let him hand to the reader the codex from which he is to read, saying: "Receive this and be a reporter of the word of God, destined, if you faithfully and usefully fulfill the office, to have a portion with those who have ministered the word of God."

C. XVIII. Qualiter ordinetur lector.

Lector cum ordinatur, faciat de illo uerbum episcopus ad plebem, indicans eius fidem ac uitam atque ingenium; post hoc spectante plebe tradat ei codicem, in quo lecturus est, dicens: "Accipe et esto relator uerbi Dei, habiturus, si fideliter et utiliter impleueris offitium, partem cum eis, qui uerbum Dei ministrauerint."

C. XIX. How an ostiary is to be ordained.

When an ostiary is ordained, after he has been instructed by the archdeacon how he ought to conduct himself in the house of God, at the recommendation of the archdeacon let the bishop hand him the keys of the church from the altar, saying to him: "Act in such a way as one who will render an account to God for those things that are unlocked with these keys."

C. XIX. Qualiter hostiarius.

Hostiarius cum ordinatur, postquam ab archidiacono instructus fuerit, qualiter in domo Dei debeat conuersari, ad suggestionem archidiaconi tradat ei episcopus claues ecclesiae de altario, dicens ei: "Sic age, quasi redditurus Deo rationem pro his rebus, que his clauibus recluduntur."

C. XX. How a psalmist is to be ordained.

A psalmist, that is, a singer, can receive the office of singing without the knowledge of the bishop, solely at the command of a priest, with the priest saying to him: "See that what you sing with your mouth you believe with your heart, and that what you believe with your heart you prove by works." GRATIAN. Clerics are prohibited from growing their hair; their head ought to be shaved above in the manner of a sphere. Hence Pope Anicius [to the bishops of Gaul]:

C. XX. Qualiter psalmista.

Psalmista, id est cantor, potest absque scientia episcopi, sola iussione presbiteri offitium suscipere cantandi, dicente sibi presbitero: "Vide, ut, quod ore cantas, corde credas, et quod corde credis, operibus comprobes." Gratian. Clerici comam nutrire prohibentur, quorum caput desuper in modum spherae rasum esse debet. Unde Anicius Papa. [Episcopis Galliae.]

C. XXI. Clerics are to be prohibited from growing their hair.

Prohibit, brothers, throughout all the churches of your regions, that clerics, according to the Apostle, should not grow their hair, but should shave the head above in the manner of a sphere.

C. XXI. Clerici comam nutrire prohibeantur.

Prohibete, fratres, per uniuersas regionum uestrarum ecclesias, ut clerici, iuxta apostolum, comam non nutriant, sed desuper caput in modum spherae radant.

C. XXII. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Agde [c. 20]. Clerics who grow their hair are to be shorn by the archdeacon, even if they are unwilling, against their will. Nor may they use or possess garments or footwear other than such as befits religion.

C. XXII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 20.] Clerici, qui comam nutriunt, ab archidiacono, etiamsi noluerint, inuiti detondeantur. Vestimenta etiam uel calceamenta eis, nisi que religionem deceat, uti aut habere non liceat.

C. XXIII. On the same matter.

Likewise Gregory II [in the council held at Rome in the Basilica of Saint Peter, c. 17]. If any cleric lets his hair grow long, let him be anathema.

C. XXIII. De eodem.

Item Gregorius II. [in Concilio Romae habito in Basilica S. Petri, c. 17.] Si quis ex clericis comam relaxauerit, anathema sit.

C. XXIV. In what garments a religious woman is to be consecrated.

When a religious virgin is presented to her bishop for consecration, let her appear in such garments as she will always use, suitable to religious life and profession. GRATIAN. Women dedicated to God are prohibited from touching consecrated vessels and the vestments of the altar and from carrying incense about the altars. Hence Pope Soter to the bishops of Italy [epistle II]:

C. XXIV. Quibus uestibus induta sanctimonialis est consecranda.

Sanctimonialis uirgo, cum ad consecrationem suo episcopo offertur, in talibus uestibus applicetur, qualibus semper usura est, sanctimoniae et professioni aptis. Gratian. Vasa sacrata et uestimenta altaris mulieres

Deo dedicatae contingere, et incensum circa altaria deferre prohibentur. Unde Sother Papa Episcopis Italiae: [epist. II.]

C. XXV. Women are to be prohibited from touching the vestments of the altar and consecrated vessels.

It has been reported to the apostolic see that women consecrated to God or nuns among you touch sacred vessels or consecrated altar cloths and carry incense about the altars. No one who rightly understands doubts that all these things are full of blame and reproof. Therefore, by the authority of this holy see, we judge that you are utterly to cut away all these things as quickly as you can. And lest this pest be spread more widely, we command that it be wiped away most swiftly throughout all the provinces.

C. XXV. Vestimenta altaris et uasa sacrata mulieres tangere prohibeantur.

Sacratas Deo feminas uel monachas sacra uasa uel sacratas pallas penes uos contingere, et incensum circa altaria deferre, perlatum est ad apostolicam sedem: que omnia uituperatione et reprehensione plena esse, nulli recte sapientum dubium est. Quapropter huius sanctae sedis auctoritate hec omnia uobis resecare funditus, quanto citius poteritis, censemus. Et ne pestis hec latius diuulgetur, per omnes prouincias abstergi citissime mandamus.

C. XXVI. Subdeacons are not permitted to enter the sacristy.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea [c. 21]. Subdeacons ought not to have license to enter the secretarium or sacristy—which the Greeks call the diaconium—and to touch the Lord's vessels.

C. XXVI. Sacrarium subdiaconibus ingredi non licet.

Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 21.] Non oportet subdiaconos licentiam habere in secretarium siue sacrarium (quod Greci diaconium appellant) ingredi, et contingere uasa dominica.

[C. XXVII.]

Likewise. A minister ought not to use stoles or to abandon the doors.

[C. XXVII.]

Item. Ministrum non oportet orariis uti, nec ostia derelinquere.

[C. XXVIII.]

Likewise. Readers and psalmists ought not to use stoles and thus to read or sing psalms.

[C. XXVIII.]

Item. Non oportet lectores atque psalmistas orariis uti, et sic legere aut psallere.

C. XXIX. A woman is not permitted to teach men in an assembly.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage [cc. 99 and 98]. A woman, although learned and holy, is not to presume to teach men in an assembly. A layman, however, when clerics are present, is not to dare to teach unless they request it.

C. XXIX. Mulieri in conuentu uiros docere non permittitur.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 99. et 98.] Mulier, quamuis docta et sancta, uiros in conuentu docere non presumat. Laicus autem presentibus clericis (nisi ipsis rogantibus) docere non audeat.

C. XXX. Ministers who have not been consecrated are not permitted to touch the Lord's vessels.

Likewise from the Council of Agde [c. 66]. Unconsecrated ministers ought not to have license to enter the secretarium—which the Greeks call the diaconium—and to touch the Lord's vessels.

C. XXX. Ministris non sacratis uasa dominica contingere non licet.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 66.] Non oportet insacratos ministros licentiam habere in secretarium (quod Greci diaconium appellant) ingredi, et contingere uasa dominica.

C. XXXI. None of the readers is permitted to carry sacred vessels.

Likewise from the First Council of Braga [c. 10]. None of the readers, nor any others except those who have been ordained subdeacons by the bishop, may carry the sacred vessels of the altar.

C. XXXI. Cuilibet ex lectoribus uasa sacra portare non licet.

Item ex Concilio Bracarensi I. [c. 10.] Non liceat cuilibet ex lectoribus sacra altaris uasa portare, nec aliis, nisi his, qui ab episcopo subdiaconi fuerint ordinati.

C. XXXII. On the same matter, and that clerics are not to grow their hair.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin [c. 41]. No one except a subdeacon or an acolyte may touch the ministries—the Lord's vessels—in the secretarium. §1. Nor ought clerics to grow their hair and minister in that manner, but they are to have a shorn head, exposed ears, and to put on a garment down to the ankles according to Aaron, so that they may be adorned in habit.

C. XXXII. De eodem, et ut clerici comam non nutriant.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 41.] Non liceat quemlibet ministeria tangere, nisi subdiacono aut acolito, in secretario uasa dominica. §. 1. Nec oportet clericos comam nutrire, et sic ministrare: sed atonso capite, patentibus auribus, et secundum Aaron talarem uestem induere, ut sint in habitu ornato.

C. XXXIII. How the bridegroom and bride are to be blessed.

When a bridegroom and bride are to be blessed by a priest, let them be presented by their parents or by the attendants of the bridal pair; and when they have received the blessing, let them remain in virginity that same night out of reverence for that blessing.

C. XXXIII. Qualiter sponsus et sponsa sint benedicendi.

Sponsus et sponsa cum benedicendi sunt a sacerdote, a parentibus suis uel a paranimphis offerantur, qui cum benedictionem acceperint, eadem nocte pro reuerentia ipsius benedictionis in uirginitate permaneant.

Distinction XXIV

GRATIAN. Part I. It has been briefly shown how a bishop is to be examined and how he, together with the others established below him, is to be ordained. But now it must be seen concerning priests and the others whether they are to be promoted without examination. Concerning these things Paul the Apostle writes thus to Timothy: “Impose hands hastily upon no one, and do nothing without prior judgment by inclining to the other side.” [PALEA.

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Qualiter episcopus sit examinandus, qualiter ipse simul cum reliquis infra ipsum constitutis sit ordinandus, breuiter monstratum est. Nunc autem uidendum est de sacerdotibus et reliquis, an sine examinatione sint promouendi. De his ita scribit Paulus Apostolus ad Timotheum: "Manus cito nemini imposueris, et nichil sine preiudicio facias in alteram partem declinando." [PALEA.

C. I. On the same matter.

From the decrees of Pope Sylvester in the Roman Synod, c. 9. Let none of the acolytes or subdeacons offer to others a thing consecrated by a priest, because a minister is one thing and an assistant another, but let him only support what the priest has placed upon him, blessed by his own mouth.]

C. I. De eodem.

Ex decretis Siluestri Papae in Sinodo Romana c. 9. Nullus acolitorum uel subdiaconorum rem consecratam a presbitero aliis porrigat, (quia aliud est minister, aliud assistens), nisi tantum supportet, quod ei sacerdos imposuerit suo ore benedictum.]

C. II. No cleric is to be ordained before probation.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, c. 22. No cleric is to be ordained unless proved either by the examination of the bishops or by the testimony of the people.

C. II. Ante probationem nullus ordinetur clericus.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III., c. 22. Nullus ordinetur clericus, nisi probatus uel episcoporum examine, uel populi testimonio.

C. III. Clerics of the same church are to be promoted to its ministry.

Likewise Pope Gelasius to Bishop Celestine. The priests, deacons, and all clerics of the city of Stonium suggested to us by a petition presented that in the church of blessed Eleutherius, bishop and martyr—which is proved to have been constructed in the parish of the aforesaid city—the priest who had been established there had died, and that Julian, deacon of that church, ought as swiftly as possible to be ordained in his place because of the renown of that place. And therefore, most beloved brother, if there is nothing in his life or morals that runs contrary to the enactments of the canons, you will adorn the aforesaid man with the honor of the priesthood, knowing that we created you under the name of a visitor, not of a cardinal pontiff. Likewise, you will also substitute the deacon Felicissimus in the ministry of that church, if his manner of life permits, so that a most celebrated place of procession may lack neither a priest nor a minister for the consecration of the mysteries.

> C. III. Ad ministerium alicuius ecclesiae clerici eiusdem promoueantur.
> Item Gelasius Papa Celestino episcopo. Presbiteri, diacones et uniuersi clerici Stoniensium ciuitatis petitorio nobis suggessere porrecto, in ecclesia beati martiris Eleuterii episcopi (que in supradictae ciuitatis parrochia probatur esse constructa) presbiterum, qui constitutus fuerat, defecisse, atque in eius locum Iulianum, diaconem ipsius ecclesiae pro celebritate ipsius loci quamtocius debere ordinari. Et ideo, frater karrissime, si de eius uita uel moribus nichil est, quod contra canonum ueniat constituta, suprascriptum presbiterii honore decorabis, sciturus, uisitatoris, nomine te, non cardinalis creasse pontificis. Pariter etiam Felicissimum diaconem in eius ecclesiae ministerio, si conuersatio eius patitur, subrogabis, ut locus processionis celeberrimus ad misteriorum consecrationem nec sacerdote indigeat, nec ministro.

C. IV. The other bishops are to be promoted by the examination of the metropolitans and bishops.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea [c. 12]. Let bishops be advanced to ecclesiastical dignity by the judgment of the metropolitans and of those bishops who are round about, namely those who over a very long time are proved both in the word of faith and by the example of an upright manner of life. Part II. GRATIAN. Since, therefore, no one is to be ordained without examination, it must be considered in what manner and at what time the examination of priests and of the others placed below them ought to take place. Concerning these things it is read that it was established thus in the Council of Nantes [c. 11]:

> C. IV. Metropolitanorum et episcoporum examine promoueantur ceteri episcopi.
> Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 12.] Episcopi iudicio metropolitanorum et eorum episcoporum, qui circumcirca sunt, prouehantur ad ecclesiasticam dignitatem, hi uidelicet, qui plurimo tempore probantur tam uerbo fidei quam rectae conuersationis exemplo. II. Pars. Gratianus. Cum itaque sine examinatione nullus sit ordinandus, quemadmodum, et quo tempore sacerdotum et ceterorum infra positorum examinatio fieri debeat, considerandum est. De his in Concilio Nannetensi [c. 11.] sic statutum legitur:

C. V. Those who are to be ordained are to assemble for examination on Wednesday.

When a bishop arranges to perform ordinations, all who wish to approach the sacred ministry are to be summoned to the city on the Wednesday before the ordination itself, together with the priests who ought to present them. Then the bishop ought to choose from his side priests and other prudent men, knowledgeable in divine law and exercised in ecclesiastical sanctions, who are diligently to investigate, before all things, the lineage, life, homeland, age, education, and place where those to be ordained were brought up; whether they are well educated; whether instructed in the law of the Lord; whether they firmly hold the Catholic faith and are able to assert it in simple words. §1. Those to whom the care is entrusted, however, ought to beware lest, enticed either by reason of favor or by desire for any gift, they deviate from the truth, so that they present to the bishop's hands one unworthy and less suitable to receive sacred grades. But if they do this, both the one who approached unworthily will be removed from the altar, and those who attempted to sell the gift of the Holy Spirit, already condemned before God, will lack ecclesiastical dignity. §2. Therefore let them be examined diligently for three continuous days, and thus on Saturday let those who have been approved be presented to the bishop. GRATIAN. But in other respects, namely without the counsel of the clerics and the testimony of the people, let no bishop presume to ordain anyone. Hence it is read in the Fourth Council of Carthage [c. 22]:

> Quando episcopus ordinationes facere disponit, omnes, qui ad sacrum ministerium accedere uolunt, feria quarta ante ipsam ordinationem euocandi sunt ad ciuitatem, una cum presbiteris, qui eos representare debent; et tunc episcopus a latere suo eligere debet sacerdotes et alios prudentes uiros, gnaros diuinae legis et exercitatos in ecclesiasticis sanctionibus, qui ordinandorum genus, uitam, patriam, etatem, institucionem, locum, ubi educati sunt, si sint bene litterati, si in lege Domini instructi, ante omnia diligenter inuestigent; si fidem catholicam firmiter teneant et uerbis simplicibus asserere queant. §. 1. Ipsi autem, quibus cura committitur, cauere debent, ne aut fauoris gratia, aut cuiuscumque muneris cupiditate illecti a uero deuient, ut indignum et minus idoneum ad sacros gradus suscipiendos episcopi manibus applicent. Quod si fecerint, et ille, qui indigne accesserit, ab altari remouebitur, et illi, qui donum sancti Spiritus uendere conati sunt, coram Deo iam condempnati, ecclesiastica dignitate carebunt. §. 2. Igitur per tres dies continuos diligenter examinentur, et sic sabbato qui probati sunt episcopo represententur. Gratian. Alias autem, sine clericorum concilio uidelicet et populi testimonio, nullum episcopus ordinare presumat. Unde in Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 22.] legitur:

C. VI. A bishop is not to ordain clerics without the counsel of his clerics.

A bishop is not to ordain clerics without the counsel of his clerics, so that he also seeks the acquiescence and testimony of the citizens. Part III. GRATIAN. It is asked what ought to be done concerning those who were advanced without examination. Concerning these things it is read thus in the Council of Pope Martin:

> C. VI. Sine clericorum suorum consilio episcopus clericos non ordinet.
> Episcopus sine consilio clericorum suorum clericos non ordinet, ita ut ciuium conniuentiam et testimonium querat. III. Pars. Gratian. Queritur, quid fieri debeat de his, qui sine examinatione prouecti sunt. De his ita legitur in Concilio Martini Papae:

C. VII. Concerning those who are ordained without examination and afterward confess their sins.

If any priest or deacon was ordained without any examination, or indeed, when they were examined, confessed their criminal sins, or after ordination were exposed by others, let them be cast out of the clergy. §1. Let the same also be observed concerning the whole order of clerics, for the holy Catholic Church claims for herself that which is irreproachable.

> C. VII. De his, qui sine examinatione ordinantur, et postea peccata sua confitentur.
> Si quis presbiter aut diaconus sine aliqua examinatione ordinati sunt, aut certe, cum discuterentur, criminosa peccata sua confessi sunt, aut post ordinationem ab aliis detecti, abiciantur ex clero. §. 1. Similiter uero et de uniuerso clericorum ordine seruetur; nam hoc sibi, quod irreprehensibile est, sancta ecclesia catholica defendit.

Distinction XXV

GRATIAN. Part I. It has been briefly proved that no one is to be ordained without examination. Isidore, bishop of Seville, writes in a letter to Leudefredus what pertains to a bishop and what to each inferior, saying thus:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod nullus sine examinatione ordinandus sit, breuiter probatum est. Quid autem ad episcopum, quid ad unumquemque inferiorem pertineat, Ysidorus Ispalensis episcopus in epistola ad Ludifredum scribit, ita dicens:

C. I. What the office of bishops and of the others is in the Church.

Having read through the letters of your holiness, I rejoiced that by their report I learned of your desired well-being. Concerning the things, however, that the discourse of your eloquence endeavored to intimate in what followed, I give thanks to God that you expend solicitude upon the pastoral office and inquire how ecclesiastical offices are ordered; and although all things are known to your prudence, nevertheless, because you consult me with brotherly affection, I shall explain to the degree I am able and speak concerning all the grades of the Church and what pertains to each. §1. To the ostiary belong the keys of the church, so that he may open and close the temple of God and guard all things that are within and without; receive the faithful and keep out the excommunicated and unbelievers. §2. To the exorcist belongs the memorization of the exorcisms and the imposition of hands upon possessed persons and catechumens in exorcizing them. §3. To the acolyte belongs the preparation of lights in the sacristy; he carries the candle, and he prepares the things supplied for the Eucharist of the chalice. §4. To the psalmist belongs the office of singing: to say blessings, praises, the sacrifice, responsories, and whatever pertains to skill in singing. §5. To the reader belongs the pronouncing of readings and the preaching to the peoples of the things that the prophets foretold. §6. To the subdeacon belongs the carrying of the chalice and paten to the altar of Christ and handing them to the Levites, and ministering to them; also holding the small pitcher, basin, and hand towel; and furnishing water to the bishop, priests, and Levites for washing their hands before the altar. §7. To the deacon belongs assisting the priests and ministering in all things that are conducted in the sacraments of Christ: namely in baptism, in chrism, in the paten and chalice; also bringing in the offerings and arranging them upon the altar; also preparing and clothing the table of the Lord; carrying the cross; and proclaiming the Gospel and the Apostle. For just as readers are commanded to proclaim the Old Testament, so deacons are commanded to proclaim the New. To him also belongs the office of prayers and the recitation of names; he admonishes the people to have their ears toward God; he exhorts them to cry out; he gives the peace; and he makes the announcements. §8. To the priest belongs confecting the sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord upon the altar, saying prayers, and blessing the gifts of God. §9. To the bishop belongs the consecration of basilicas, the anointing of the altar, and the confection of chrism. He distributes the aforesaid offices and ecclesiastical orders; he blesses sacred virgins; and although each one precedes in individual matters, he is nevertheless the pre-ordainer in all. §10. These are the orders and ministries of clerics, which nevertheless by pontifical authority are divided under the care of the archdeacon and the solicitude of the primicerius and treasurer. §11. For the archdeacon commands subdeacons and Levites. To him belong these ministries: ordering the clothing of the altar by the Levites; care of the incense and the necessary solicitude for the sacrifice; determining which of the Levites is to read the Apostle and the Gospel, which is to say the prayers, or which is to sing the responsories on Sundays or solemnities. The solicitude and ordering of parishes and their disputes also pertain to his care. For the repair of diocesan basilicas he makes the proposal to the priest. At the bishop's command he inspects the parishes and the ornaments or possessions of basilicas or parishes; the same man reports to the bishop the acts of ecclesiastical manumissions. He receives the money collected from the communion and carries it to the bishop; the same man distributes their own portions to the clerics. The transgressions of deacons are announced to the bishop by the archdeacon. In the sacristy he announces to the priest the days of fasts and solemnities, and this is proclaimed publicly in the church by the priest. But when the archdeacon is absent, the next deacon fulfills his office. §12. Let the archpriest, however, know that he is under the archdeacon and that he is to obey his precepts as those of his bishop; and, as pertains specially to his ministry, that he is to exercise care over all the priests placed in the order and stand continually in the church; and when the absence of his bishop occurs, he himself is to celebrate the solemn rites of the Mass in his place and say the collects, or the one to whom he himself enjoins it. §13. To the primicerius belong the acolytes, exorcists, psalmists, and readers; also the giving of the signal for the office of the clerics and for uprightness of life, and the careful singing and performance of the office; determining which cleric ought to say the readings, psalm, praises, offertory, and responsories; also the order and manner of singing psalms in choir according to the solemnity of the seasons; and also the ordering of the lights to be carried. If anything is also necessary for the repair of the basilicas that are in the city, he is to announce it to the priest. He is to direct the bishop's letters concerning days of fasting to the parishioners through the ostiaries. He himself is to discipline clerics whom he knows to be offending; but when he cannot amend them, he is to carry their transgressions to the bishop's knowledge. He is to appoint the guardians of the basilicas and arrange the registers. But when the primicerius is absent, the one who is nearest to him either by law or by learning is to attend to the things that have been stated. §14. To the treasurer belong the ordering of the ostiaries of the basilicas, the preparation of incense, care of confecting the chrism, care of ordering the baptistery, and the preparation of lights in the sacristy and at the sacrifices. Part II. GRATIAN. From this epistle it is clear what belongs to each office. There is also another distinction of bishops, priests, and deacons, which Clement made in his epistle, saying thus:

> Perlectis sanctitatis tuae litteris gauisus sum, quod optatam salutem tuam earum relatu cognoui. De his autem, que in consequentibus insinuare eloquii tui sermo studuit, gratias ago Deo, quod sollicitudinem offitii pastoralis impendis, qualiterque ecclesiastica offitia ordinentur, perquiris; et licet omnia prudentiae tuae sint cognita, tamen quia affectu fraterno me consulis, ex parte, qua ualeo, expediam, et de omnibus ecclesiae gradibus quid ad quemque pertineat eloquar. §. 1. Ad hostiarium namque pertinent claues ecclesiae, ut aperiat et claudat templum Dei et omnia, que sunt intus extraque, custodiat; fideles recipiat, excommunicatos et infideles excipiat. §. 2. Ad exorcistam pertinet exorcismos memoriter retinere, manusque super energuminos et catecuminos in exorzizando imponere. §. 3. Ad acolitum pertinet preparatio luminariorum in sacrario; ipse cereum portat, ipse suggesta pro eucharistia calicis preparat. §. 4. Ad psalmistam pertinet offitium canendi, dicere benedictiones, laudes, sacrificium, responsoria, et quicquid pertinet ad canendi peritiam. §. 5. Ad lectorem pertinet lectiones pronunciare, et ea, que prophetae uaticinauerunt, populis predicare. §. 6. Ad subdiaconum pertinet calicem et patenam ad altare Christi deferre et Leuitis tradere, eisque ministrare; urceolum quoque et aquamanile et manutergium tenere; episcopo et presbiteris et Leuitis pro lauandis ante altare manibus aquam prebere. §. 7. Ad diaconum pertinet assistere sacerdotibus, et ministrare in omnibus, que aguntur in sacramentis Christi: in baptismo scilicet, in crismate in patena et calice; oblationes quoque inferre et disponere in altari; componere etiam mensam Domini atque uestire, crucem ferre, et predicare euangelium et Apostolum. Nam sicut lectoribus uetus testamentum, ita diaconibus nouum predicare preceptum est. Ad ipsum quoque pertinet offitium precum et recitatio nominum; ipse premonet aures habere ad Deum, ipse hortatur clamare ipse donat pacem et ipse annuntiat. §. 8. Ad presbiterum pertinet sacramentum corporis et sanguinis Domini in altario conficere, orationes dicere, et benedicere dona Dei. §. 9. Ad episcopum pertinet basilicarum consecratio, unctio altaris et confectio crismatis. Ipse predicta offitia distribuit et ordines ecclesiasticos, ipse sacras uirgines benedicit, et, dum precessit in singulis unusquisque, iste tamen est preordinator in cunctis. §. 10. Hi sunt ordines et ministeria clericorum, que tamen auctoritate pontificali in archidiaconi cura, et primicerii ac thesaurarii sollicitudine diuiduntur. §. 11. Archidiaconus enim imperat subdiaconibus et Leuitis; ad quem pertinent ista ministeria: ordinatio uestiendi altaris a Leuitis, cura incensi et sacrificii necessaria sollicitudo, quis Leuitarum Apostolum et euangelium legat, quis preces dicat, seu responsoria in dominicis diebus aut solempnitatibus decantet. Sollicitudo quoque parrochiarum et ordinatio et iurgia ad eius pertinent curam, pro reparandis diocesanis basilicis ipse suggerit sacerdoti; ipse inquirit parrochias cum iussione episcopi et ornamenta uel res basilicarum uel parrochiarum, gesta libertatum ecclesiasticarum episcopo idem refert, collectam pecuniam de communione ipse accipit et episcopo defert, et clericis partes proprias idem distribuit. Ab archidiacono nuntiantur episcopo excessus diaconorum, ipse denuntiat sacerdoti in sacrario ieiuniorum dies atque solempnitatum, et ab ipso publice in ecclesia predicatur; quando uero archidiaconus absens est, uicem eius diaconus sequens adinplet. §. 12. Archipresbiter uero se esse sub archidiacono, eiusque preceptis, sicut episcopi sui, obedire sciat, et (quod ad eius specialiter ministerium pertinet), supra omnes presbiteros in ordine positos curam agere, et assidue in ecclesia stare, et, quando episcopi sui absentia contigerit, ipse eius uice missarum sollempnia celebret et collectas dicat, uel cui ipse iniunxerit. §. 13. Ad primicerium pertinent acoliti, exorcistae, psalmistae atque lectores; signum quoque dandum pro offitio clericorum, pro uitae honestate, et offitium cantandi et peragendi sollicite, lectiones, psalmum, laudes, offertorium responsoria quis clericorum dicere debeat. Ordo quoque et modus psallendi in choro pro solempnitate temporum, ordinatio quoque pro luminaribus deportandis. Si quid etiam necessarium fuerit pro reparatione basilicarum, que sunt in urbe, ipse denuntiet sacerdoti; epistolas episcopi pro diebus ieiuniorum parrochianis per hostiarios ipse dirigat; clericos, quos delinquere cognoscit, ipse distringat quos uero emendare non ualet, eorum excessus ad agnitionem episcopi deferat; basilicarios ipse constituat, et matriculas ipse disponat. Quando autem primicerius absens est, ea, que dicta sunt, ipse exquirat, qui ei aut lege est proximus aut eruditione. §. 14. Ad thesaurarium pertinent hostiarii basilicarum ordinatio, incensi preparatio, cura crismatis conficiendi, cura baptisterii ordinandi, preparatio luminariorum in sacrario et sacrificiis. II. Pars. Gratian. Ex hac epistola liquet, quid cuiusque offitii sit. Est etiam alia distinctio episcoporum, presbiterorum, diaconorum, quam fecit Clemens in epistola sua ita dicens:

C. II. What it is fitting to hear from bishops, what from priests, and what from deacons.

> C. II. Quid ab episcopis, quid a presbiteris, quid a diaconibus audire oportet.
> Audire episcopum attentius oportet, et ab ipso suscipere doctrinam fidei; monita autem uitae a presbiteris inquirere, a diaconibus uero ordinem disciplinae. Gratian. Sacerdos quoque utrumque humerum orario ambit; diaconus uero sinistrum tantum, ut ad ministerium expeditus discurrat. Unde in Tolletano Concilio IV. c. 40:

C. III. Why a Levite surrounds only one shoulder with the stole.

A Levite ought to wear one stole upon the left shoulder because he prays, that is, preaches; but he ought to have the right side free so that he may run about unencumbered for the priestly ministry. Part III. GRATIAN. Now, however, returning in order through the individual grades, let us consider briefly who can ascend from which orders into which grade; who can or cannot be restored after a fall; for which faults they deserve to be cast down from their own grade; by whose accusation and with which persons testifying they can be convicted; and by whose sentence they are to be absolved or condemned. §1. And first, beginning from the pontifical grade, let us diligently investigate what sort of man one who is to be ordained a bishop ought to be, following the rule of the Apostle that he writes to Timothy and Titus concerning a matter of this kind, saying: "A bishop ought to be irreproachable," that is, not liable to reproof. This is to Timothy. To Titus, however: "A bishop ought to be without crime," which, as Jerome writes to Oceanus, is the same thing. §2. By the name of crime, however, any sin is understood. Hence in the same epistle Jerome says: "It is a thing almost contrary to nature that anyone should be without sin; but let such a one be chosen that by comparison with him the others are called a flock." In the epistle to Titus, however, a criminal sin or criminal infamy is called crime. Hence it is read there: "A crime is a complaint, that is, a sin worthy of accusation and condemnation." §3. The command that one who is chosen as bishop be without crime is to be understood not of the time before baptism but of the time after baptism, namely so that from the time of baptism the consciousness of no crime should gnaw at his mind. §4. Elsewhere the designation "crime" extends broadly, embracing every sin that proceeds from deliberation. Hence Bede, upon the epistle of James: "He says and commands that sins committed from ignorance or human frailty be confessed one to another because they are easily forgiven; but whatever things are done from deliberation are not forgiven except through penance." Hence Augustine also says: "No sin is so venial that it does not become criminal when it pleases." Elsewhere, however, it signifies only those things that, once committed, suffice for condemnation. §5. For many things proceed from deliberation which, unless they have been repeated more often and brought into custom, although they burden a person after death, nevertheless do not destroy him eternally; because although by a certain reasoning they are called crimes, they nevertheless are not mortal and capital. Hence Augustine, in the homily On the Fire of Purgatory, expounding the words of the Apostle, "If anyone builds upon this foundation wood, hay, stubble": "There are many who, understanding this reading badly, are deceived by false security, while they believe that if they build capital crimes upon the foundation of Christ, the sins themselves can be purged through a transitory fire and they can afterward reach eternal life. This understanding, most beloved brothers, is to be corrected, because those who flatter themselves thus deceive themselves. For by that transitory fire concerning which the Apostle says, 'He himself shall be saved, yet so as through fire,' not capital but minute sins are purged. Concerning these, although not all, at least some are to be recalled, lest anyone attempt vainly to excuse himself and say that he does not know which are minute sins and which are capital crimes. §6. And although the Apostle recalled many capital crimes, we nevertheless, lest we appear to cause despair, shall say briefly what they are: sacrilege, homicide, adultery, fornication, false testimony, robbery, theft, pride, envy, avarice; and, if it is held for a long time, wrath, and if it is continual, drunkenness, are counted in their number. For whoever recognizes that any one of these sins rules in him, unless he worthily amends it, and, if he has the time, performs penance for a long time, distributes abundant alms, and abstains from those sins, will not be able to be purged by that transitory fire concerning which the Apostle speaks, but the eternal flame will slaughter him without any remedy. §7. What the minute sins are, however, although they are known to all, nevertheless, because it is lengthy to rehearse them all, it is necessary that we name at least some of them. Whenever anyone takes more food or drink than is necessary, let him know that it pertains to the minute sins; whenever he speaks more than he ought or remains silent more than is expedient; whenever he exasperates a poor person who petitions importunately; whenever, although sound in body, he wishes to dine while others fast, or, given over to sleep, rises later for church; whenever he knows his wife apart from the desire for children; whenever he inquires too late after those placed in prison or visits the sick too late; if he neglects to recall those in discord to concord; if he exasperates either a neighbor, wife, son, or servant more than he ought; if he flatters more than he ought; if he wishes to flatter any person of higher station, either voluntarily or from necessity; if, while the poor go hungry, he prepares exceedingly delightful or costly banquets; if he occupies himself either in church or outside church with idle tales, for which an account is to be rendered on the day of judgment; if, while we swear incautiously and then cannot fulfill it because of some necessity, we assuredly perjure ourselves; and when with every readiness or rashness we curse, although it is written: 'Nor shall those who curse possess the kingdom of God.'"

C. III. Quare Leuita unum tantum humerum orario ambit.

Unum orarium oportet Leuitam gestare in sinistro humero, propter quod orat, id est predicat; dexteram autem partem oportet habere liberam, ut expeditus ad ministerium sacerdotale discurrat. III. Pars. Gratian. Nunc autem per singulos gradus ordine recurrentes, qui ex quibus ordinibus, in quem gradum conscendere possint; qui post lapsum ualeant reparari, uel non; quibus culpis a proprio gradu mereantur deici; quo accusante, quibus testificantibus possint conuinci; cuius sententia sint soluendi uel dampnandi, breuiter consideremus. §. 1. Ac primum a pontificali gradu incipientes, qualem oporteat eum esse, qui in episcopum ordinandus est, diligenter inuestigemus, Apostoli regulam secuti, quam in huiusmodi re Timotheo et Tito scribit dicens: "Oportet episcopum esse inreprehensibilem": id est, non obnoxium reprehensioni. Hoc ad Timotheum. Ad Titum autem: "Oportet episcopum esse sine crimine": quod (ut Ieronimus scribit ad Oceanum) idem est. §. 2. Nomine autem criminis quodlibet peccatum intelligitur; unde in eadem epistola Ieronimus dicit: "Res pene contra naturam est, ut sine peccato aliquis sit: sed talis eligatur, cuius comparatione ceteri grex dicantur." In epistola uero ad Titum crimen uocatur criminale peccatum uel criminalis infamia: unde ibi legitur: "Crimen est querela, id est peccatum accusatione et dampnatione dignum." §. 3. Quod autem sine crimine iubetur esse qui in episcopum eligitur, non ante baptisma, sed post baptismum intelligendum est: ut a tempore uidelicet baptismatis nullius criminis conscientia mentem eius remordeat. §. 4. Criminis appellatio alias late patet, complectens omne peccatum, quod ex deliberatione procedit. Unde Beda super epistolam epistolam Iacobi: "Peccata, que ex ignorantia uel infirmitate humana committuntur, dicit et precipit alterutrum confiteri, quia facile dimittuntur: quecumque uero fiunt ex deliberatione, non nisi per penitentiam." Hinc etiam Augustinus ait: "Nullum peccatum est adeo ueniale, quod non fiat criminale, dum placet." Alias ea demum significat. que semel commissa ad dampnationem sufficiunt. §. 5. Multa enim ex deliberatione procedunt, que nisi sepius iterata et in consuetudinem fuerint deducta, quamuis grauent post mortem, non tamen eternaliter perdunt: quia etsi quadam ratione crimina appellentur, tamen mortifera, et capitalia non sunt. Unde Augustinus in omilia de igne purgatorio, exponens uerba Apostoli: "Si quis super hoc fundamentum edificaueriť, ligna, fenum stipulam. Multi sunt, qui lectionem istam male intelligentes falsa securitate decipiuntur, dum credunt, quod si supra fundamentum Christi crimina capitalia edificant, peccata ipsa per ignem transitorium possint purgari, et ipsi postea ad uitam peruenire perpetuam. Intellectus iste, fratres karissimi, corrigendus est, quia ipsi se seducunt, qui sic sibi blandiuntur. Illo enim transitorio igne, de quo dicit Apostolus: 'Ipse saluus erit, sic tamen quasi per ignem', non capitalia, sed minuta peccata purgantur: de quibus, etsi non omnia, uel aliqua commemoranda sunt, ne aliquis inaniter excusare conetur, et dicat nescire se, que sunt minuta peccata, que crimina capitalia. §. 6. Et quamuis Apostolus plura capitalia commemorauerit, nos tamen (ne desperationem facere uideamur) breuiter dicemus, que illa sunt: sacrilegium, homicidium, adulterium, fornicatio, falsum testimonium, rapina, furtum, superbia, inuidia, auaritia; et si longo tempore teneatur, iracundia, et ebrietas, si assidua sit, in eorum numero computatur. Quicumque enim aliquod de istis peccatis in se dominari cognouerit, nisi digne emendauerit, et si habuerit spatium, longo tempore penitentiam non egerit, et largas elemosinas non, erogauerit, et a peccatis ipsis non abstinuerit, illo transitorio igne, de quo Apostolus ait, purgari non poterit, sed eterna illum flamma sine remedio ullo trucidabit. §. 7. Que autem sint minuta peccata, licet omnibus nota sint, tamen quia longum est, ut omnia replicentur, opus est, ut ex eis uel aliqua nominemus. Quotiens aliquis in cibo aut potu plus accipit, quam necesse est, ad minuta peccata nouerit pertinere; quotiens plus loquitur, quam oportet, plus tacet, quam expedit; quotiens pauperem importune petentem exasperat; quotiens cum sit corpore sanus, aliis ieiunantibus prandere uoluerit, aut somno deditus tardius ad ecclesiam surgit; quotiens, excepto filiorum desiderio, uxorem suam cognouerit; quotiens in carcere positos tardius requisierit, infirmos tardius uisitauerit; si discordes ad concordiam reuocare neglexerit; si plus aut proximum, aut uxorem, aut filium, aut seruum exasperauerit, quam oportet; si amplius fuerit blanditus, quam oportet; si cuicumque maiori personae aut ex uoluntate, aut ex necessitate adulari uoluerit; si, pauperibus esurientibus, nimium deliciosa uel sumptuosa conuiuia preparauerit; si se aut in ecclesia aut extra ecclesiam fabulis otiosis (de quibus in die iudicii ratio reddenda est) occupauerit; si dum incaute iuramus, et cum hoc per aliquam necessitatem implere non poterimus, utique periuremus, et cum omni facilitate uel temeritate maledicimus, cum scriptum est: 'Neque maledici regnum Dei possidebunt.'"

C. IV. Which are the venial sins that are purged after this life.

Likewise Gregory [Dialogues, Book IV, c. 9]. As each one departs from here, so he is presented at judgment; but nevertheless it is to be believed that for certain faults there is a fire of purgation before judgment, because Truth says: “If anyone has spoken blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, it shall be forgiven him neither in this age nor in the future.” In this sentence it is given to be understood that certain faults can be remitted in this age and certain ones in the future. For when this is denied concerning one, it is evident from the consequent meaning that it is conceded concerning certain others. But nevertheless, as I said before, it is to be believed that this can be done concerning small and very minute sins, such as continual idle speech, immoderate laughter, or the sin of household care—which is scarcely conducted without fault even by those who know how they ought to avoid fault—which also burden persons after death if they were by no means remitted while they were still placed in life.

C. IV. Que sunt uenialia peccata, que post hanc uitam purgantur.

Item Gregorius. [Dialog. lib. IV. c. 9.] Qualis hinc quisque egreditur, talis in iudicio presentatur: sed tamen de quibusdam culpis esse ante iudicium purgationis ignis credendus est, pro eo, quod ueritas dicit: "Quia si quis in spiritum sanctum blasphemiam dixerit, neque in hoc seculo remittetur ei neque in futuro." In qua sententia datur intelligi, quasdam culpas in hoc seculo, quasdam in futuro posse relaxari. Quod enim de uno negatur, consequens intellectus patet, quia de quibusdam conceditur. Sed tamen, ut predixi, hoc de paruis minimisque peccatis fieri posse credendum est, sicut est assiduus otiosus sermo, immoderatus risus, uel peccatum curae familiaris, (que uix sine culpa uel ab ipsis agitur, qui culpam qualiter declinare debeant sciunt,) que etiam post mortem grauant, si adhuc in uita positis minime fuerint relaxata.

C. V. On the same matter.

Likewise Augustine in the book On True and False Penance, c. 18. One who has deferred the fruit of conversion to another age will first be purged by the fire of purgation. Although this fire is not eternal, it is nevertheless grievous in a marvelous manner. For it surpasses every punishment that anyone has ever suffered in this life or can suffer.] GRATIAN. Elsewhere, however, it signifies only those offenses for which there is perpetual infamy. Hence that saying of Jerome: "First, therefore, without crime," etc. Hence Jerome writes in the same epistle to Titus [c. 1]:

C. V. De eodem.

Item Augustinus in libro de uera et falsa penitentia c. 18. Qui in aliud seculum distulit fructum conuersionis, prius purgabitur igne purgationis. Hic autem ignis, etsi, eternus non sit, miro tamen modo grauis est. Excellit enim omnem penam, quam umquam aliquis passus est in hac uita, uel pati potest.] Gratian. Alias autem ea tantum delicta significat, quorum est perpetua infamia. Unde illud Ieronimi: primum itaque sine crimine etc. Unde Ieronimus scribit in eadem epistola ad Titum: [cap. 1.]

C. VI. From the day of baptism, one who is to be ordained as bishop ought to be found without crime.

First, therefore, a bishop is commanded to be without crime, which in another word I think is named "irreproachable" to Timothy: not that only at that time at which he is to be ordained he is without any crime and has washed away former stains by a new manner of life, but that from that time at which he was reborn in Christ he is gnawed by no consciousness of sin. For how can a ruler of the Church take evil away from its midst when he himself has fallen into a similar offense? Or with what freedom can he reprove one who sins, when the latter silently answers him that he himself committed the same things that he reproves? GRATIAN. Behold: one to be ordained as bishop ought to be immune from crime not only at the time of his ordination, but also throughout all the time after baptism.

C. VI. A die baptismi sine crimine debet inueniri, qui in episcopum est ordinandus.

Primum itaque sine crimine iubetur esse episcopus, quod alio uerbo ad Timotheum inreprehensibilem nominatum puto: non quod eo tantum tempore, quo ordinandus est, sit sine crimine ullo, et preteritas maculas noua conuersatione diluerit, sed quod ex eo tempore, quo in Christum renatus est, nulla peccati conscientia mordeatur. Quomodo enim potest preses ecclesiae auferre malum de medio eius, qui in delictum simile corruerit? aut qua libertate peccantem corripere, cum tacitus ipse sibi respondeat, eadem se admisisse, que corripit? Gratian. Ecce, quod ordinandus in episcopum, non solum tempore suae ordinationis, sed etiam omni tempore post baptisma a crimine debet esse immunis.

Distinction XXVI

GRATIAN. Part I. In both epistles there follows: "the husband of one wife," namely after baptism, not before baptism. Hence Jerome writes to Oceanus [epistle 83]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Sequitur in utraque epistola: "unius uxoris uirum" post baptisma uidelicet, non ante baptismum. Unde Ieronimus scribit ad Oceanum: [epist. 83.]

C. I. One who is to be ordained a bishop ought to have been married only once after baptism.

The husband of one wife, that is, married once, after baptism. For even if before baptism he had a wife who died, this is not imputed to one who is entirely new, whom neither fornications nor the other things that occurred before now harm.

C. I. Post baptismum debet esse monogamus, qui episcopus est ordinandus.

Unius uxoris uirum, id est monogamum, post baptismum. Si enim et ante coniugem habuerit, que obierit, non ei imputatur, cui prorsus nouo nec stupra, nec alia, que ante fuerunt, iam obsunt.

C. II. One who had one wife before baptism and another after baptism is not to be ordained.

Augustine, however, testifies to the contrary, writing on the epistle to Titus. Those understand more acutely who have judged that even one who, as a catechumen or pagan, had another wife is not to be ordained, because the matter concerns the sacrament, not sin. On account of the sanctity of the sacrament, just as a woman, if she was violated while a catechumen, cannot after baptism be consecrated among the virgins of God, so it did not appear absurd that a twice-married man had not sinned but had lost the norm of the sacrament—not with respect to the merit of life, but to the seal of ordination. "The husband of one wife": a bishop signifies the unity from all nations subjected to one husband, Christ. Part II. §1. Just as it is not permitted to serve two masters, so it is not permitted to apostatize from the one God and pass into the superstition of another.

C. II. Qui ante baptismum habuerit unam, et post baptismum alteram, ordinandus non est.

Augustinus uero econtra testatur, scribens in epistolam ad Titum. Acutius intelligunt, qui nec eum, qui catecuminus uel paganus habuerit alteram, ordinandum censuerunt, quia de sacramento agitur, non de peccato. Propter sacramenti sanctitatem sicut femina, si catecumina uitiata est, non potest post baptisma inter Dei uirgines consecrari, ita non absurde uisum est bigamum non peccasse, sed normam sacramenti amisisse non ad uitae meritum, sed ad ordinationis signaculum. Unius uxoris uir, episcopus significat ex omnibus gentibus unitatem uni uiro Christo subditam. II. Pars. §. 1. Sicut duobus dominis seruire, sic ab uno Deo apostatare, atque in alterius superstitionem ire non licet.

C. III. One who had one wife before baptism and another after baptism is proved twice-married.

Likewise Innocent [I] to Rufus and Eusebius and the other Macedonian bishops [epistle XXII, c. 2]. It is then proposed that one who as a catechumen had a wife and lost her ought not to be called twice-married if after baptism he obtained another, and that she who was joined to the new man should be regarded as the first because that marriage was taken away through the sacrament of baptism together with the other crimes. Since this is assuredly said concerning one wife, if he had three wives while placed in the old man, she who is fourth after baptism will, for those interpreting thus, be his first; and she who was taken in the fourth place will equally receive the name of virgin. Who, I ask, does not see that this is contrary to the precept of the Apostle, who says: "A man who is the husband of one wife ought to be made a priest"? But it is objected that in baptism everything whatsoever that was done in the old man was dissolved. Tell me, that I may speak with your peace: are crimes alone forgiven in baptism, or also those things that are fulfilled according to the Lord's precepts and God's institutions? Is taking a wife a crime or is it not a crime? If it is a crime, then—with the aforesaid pardon let me say it—he who commanded in paradise that crimes be committed, when he himself blessed them, will be the author of the fault. But if it is not a crime, because it is unlawful to call what God instituted a crime, and Solomon added, "For a wife is prepared for a man by God," how is that which is read to have been consummated with God as author believed to be forgiven among crimes? What is to be judged concerning the children of such persons? Will those who were born of the woman who was the wife before baptism not be admitted to fellowship in the inheritance, and will they be called either natural or spurious because there is no legitimate marriage except that which, as it seems to you, is entered after baptism? The Lord himself, when he was asked by the Jews whether it was lawful to dismiss a wife, and when he explained that it ought not to be done, added: "Therefore, what God has joined, let man not separate." And lest he be believed to have spoken concerning those marriages that are obtained after baptism, let them remember that this was both asked by the Jews and answered to Jews. §2. I ask, and anxiously ask, whether the wife of one who was formerly a catechumen and is afterward made faithful is one and the same, and whether the children whom he received from her while he was a catechumen and others afterward while faithful are to be called brothers; or whether, after their father has died, they have no fellowship in the inheritance to be divided, because spiritual regeneration is believed to have taken away from them the name of sons. Since it is absurd to think thus, what reason is there for this to be defended and tossed about more by empty opinion than strengthened by any authority, when what the law commanded and God joined cannot be reckoned among sins? §3. Suppose one who, while a catechumen, devoted himself to virtues, followed humility, maintained patience, gave alms, rescued by any means those destined for death, abhorred adulteries, and maintained chastity. I ask: when he has been made faithful, does he lose these things because through baptism everything that the old man had done is thought to be taken away? Look upon Cornelius, a gentile man devoted to prayers and alms, hearing an angel through revelation and seeing Peter himself: were these things, on account of which baptism appears to have been granted to him, taken away from him through baptism? If this is believed, believe me, the error is not small, because whatever has been done well and guarded according to the precepts of the law cannot perish for those who do it. §4. Therefore, because the bond of marriage is effected by God's command, it cannot be called a sin; and what is not a sin ought not to be believed to be dissolved among sins. It will therefore be sound to judge that the name of the former wife cannot be abolished, since what was fulfilled by God's will was not forgiven as a sin.

C. III. Bigamus probatur, qui ante baptismum habuerit unam et post baptismum alteram.

Item Innocentius [I.] Rufo et Eusebio, et ceteris Episcopis Macedonibus. [epistol. XXII. c. 2.] Deinde ponitur, non dici oportere bigamum eum, qui catecuminus habuerit uxorem atque amiserit, si post baptismum fuerit aliam sortitus, eamque primam uideri, que nouo homini copulata sit, quia illud coniugium per baptismi sacramentum cum ceteris criminibus sit ablatum. Quod cum de una utique dicitur certe, si tres habuerit in uetere positus homine uxores, erit ei, que post baptismum quarta est, sic interpretantibus prima uirginis eque nomen accipiet, que quarto ducta est loco. Quis (oro) istud non uideat contra Apostoli esse preceptum, qui ait: "unius uxoris uirum oportere fieri sacerdotem?" Sed obicitur, quod in baptismo totum, quicquid in ueteri homine gestum est, sit solutum. Dicite mihi (ut cum pace uestra loquar), crimina tantum dimittuntur in baptismo, an et illa, que secundum Domini precepta ac Dei instituta complentur? Uxorem ducere crimen est, an non est crimen? Si crimen est, ergo (ut prefata uenia dixerim) erit auctor in culpa, qui, ut crimina committerentur, in paradiso precepit, cum ipse eos benedixit. Si uero non est crimen, quia quod Deus instituit nefas est crimen appellari, et Salomon addidit: "Etenim a Deo preparatur uiro uxor," quomodo creditur inter crimina esse dimissum quod Deo auctore legitur consummatum? Quid de talium filiis percensetur? Numquid non erunt admittendi in hereditatis consortium, qui ex ea suscepti sunt, que ante baptismum fuit uxor, eruntque appellandi uel naturales, uel spurii, quia non est legitimum matrimonium, nisi illud (ut uobis uidetur), quod post baptismum assumitur? Ipse Dominus, cum interrogaretur a Iudaeis, si liceret dimittere uxorem, atque exponeret fieri non debere, addidit: "Quod ergo Deus coniunxit, homo non separet." Ac ne de his locutus esse credatur, que post baptismum sortiuntur, meminerint hoc et a Iudaeis interrogatum et Iudeis esse responsum. §. 2. Quero, et sollicitus quero, si una eademque sit uxor eius, qui ante catecuminus, postea fit fidelis, filiosque ex ea, cum esset catecuminus suscepit, ac postea, cum fidelis, alios: utrum sint appellandi fratres, an non habeant postea defuncto patre herciscundae hereditatis consortium, quibus filiorum nomen regeneratio spiritualis creditur abstulisse? Quod cum ita sentire absurdum est, que ratio est hoc defendi, et uacua magis opinione iactari, quam aliqua auctoritate roborari, cum non possit inter peccata deputari, quod lex precepit et Deus adiunxit? §. 3. Numquid qui catecuminus uirtutibus studuit humilitatem secutus est, patienciam tenuit, elemosinas fecit, morti destinatos qualibet ratione eripuit, adulteria exhorruit, castitatem tenuit, quero, si hec, cum fuerit factus fidelis, amittit, quia per baptismum totum, quod uetus homo gesserat, putatur auferri? Aspicias gentilem hominem Cornelium orationibus atque elemosinis uacantem, angelum audientem per reuelationem ipsumque Petrum uidentem; numquid per baptismum hec illi ablata sunt, propter que ei baptisma uidetur esse concessum? Si ita creditur, mihi credite, non modicum erratur, quia quicquid bene gestum fuerit et secundum precepta legalia custoditum, non potest facientibus deperire. §. 4. Nuptiarum ergo copula, quia Dei mandato perficitur, non potest dici peccatum, et quod peccatum non est, solui inter peccata credi non debet, eritque, integrum estimare aboleri non posse nomen prioris uxoris, cum non sit dimissum pro peccato, quod ex Dei uoluntate sit completum.

C. IV. In baptism fault is forgiven; the law of marriage is not abolished.

Likewise Ambrose in the book On Duties [Book I, final c. 80]. Only one bond, and not a repeated one, is permitted to us; and in marriage itself there is a law not to repeat marriage or the union of a second wife. This appears marvelous to very many, since even marriages repeated before baptism generate impediments to the election for office and the prerogative of ordination, although offenses are not accustomed to harm if they have been forgiven by the sacrament of the laver. But we ought to understand that fault can be forgiven by baptism; law cannot be abolished. In marriage there is not fault but law. What is of fault, therefore, is remitted in baptism; what is of law is not dissolved in marriage. But how can one who himself has entered marriages repeatedly be an exhorter of widowhood? GRATIAN. John the Baptist also, when he prohibited Herod from incest, saying, "It is not lawful for you to have your brother's wife," plainly showed that marriages exist among unbelievers. Hence it is given to be understood that not only those who enter marriages repeatedly after baptism are called twice-married, but also those who are proved to have had one wife before baptism and another after baptism. §1. A twice-married man, however, ought not to be ordained as priest, not because he offended by taking a second wife, but because he has been divested of the prerogative of a priest. Hence Ambrose in the epistle to the people of Vercelli [Book X, epistle 82, says]:

C. IV. In baptismate culpa dimittitur, non lex coniugii aboletur.

Item Ambrosius in libro de offitiis. [lib.I. c. ult. 80.] Una tantum, nec repetita nobis copula permittitur, et in ipso coniugio lex est, non iterare coniugium, nec secundae coniugis coniunctionem. Quod plerisque mirum uidetur, cum etiam ante baptisma iterata coniugia electioni muneris et prerogatiuae ordinationis impedimenta generent, cum etiam delicta obesse non soleant si lauacri remissa fuerint sacramento. Sed intelligere debemus, quia baptismo culpa dimitti potest, lex aboleri non potest. In coniugio non culpa, sed lex est. Quod culpae est igitur, in baptismo relaxatur: quod legis, in coniugio non soluitur. Quomodo autem potest hortator esse uiduitatis, qui ipse coniugia frequentauerit? Gratian. Iohannes etiam Baptista, dum Herodem ab incestu prohiberet dicens: "Non licet tibi habere uxorem fratris tui," euidenter ostendit, inter infideles coniugia esse. Unde datur intelligi, quod bigami dicuntur non solum qui post baptismum coniugia frequentant, sed etiam qui ante baptismum unam, et post baptismum alteram habuisse probantur. §. 1. Bigamus uero in sacerdotem ordinari non debet, non quia deliquerit secundam accipiendo uxorem, sed quia prerogatiua exutus est sacerdotis. Unde Ambrosius in epistola ad Vercellenses: [lib. X. epist. 82. ait:]

C. V. A twice-married man does not sin, but is divested of the prerogative of a priest.

One who is without crime and the husband of one wife is held to the law of receiving the priesthood. But one who has repeated marriage indeed does not have the fault of one defiled, but is divested of the prerogative of a priest.

C. V. Non peccat bigamus, sed prerogatiua sacerdotis exuitur.

Qui sine crimine unius uxoris est uir, tenetur ad legem sacerdotii suscipiendi. Qui autem iterauerit coniugium, culpam quidem non habet coinquinati, sed prerogatiua exuitur sacerdotis.

Distinction XXVII

GRATIAN. Part I. Since it is commanded that a bishop be chosen as the husband of one wife, it is asked whether this is to be understood of the time of ordination, so that during the time of his administration he can enjoy union with her whom, as his only wife and a virgin, he espoused to himself. Pope Martin prohibits this, saying:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem unius uxoris uir episcopus iubetur eligi, queritur, an de tempore ordinationis hoc sit accipiendum, ut tempore suae administrationis eius copula possit fungi, quam unicam et uirginem sibi desponsauit. Hoc Martinus Papa prohibet dicens:

C. I. A deacon is not to be ordained unless he has professed chastity.

If a deacon who is chosen has declared himself in favor of contracting marriage and has said that he cannot remain in chastity, let him not be ordained. But if he was silent at the ordination and was ordained, and afterward desired marriage, let him be excluded from the ministry and cease to belong to the clergy. GRATIAN. By this authority it is given to be understood that those who have wives or wish to take them can become neither deacons nor priests unless they profess continence. §1. But if a deacon wishes to cease from the ministry, after contracting marriage he can lawfully use it. For although at his ordination he offered a vow of chastity, nevertheless so great is the force in the sacrament of marriage that the marriage itself cannot be dissolved even because of the violation of a vow. Hence Augustine in the book On the Good of Marriage, to Julian [c. 10]:

> C. I. Non ordinetur diaconus, nisi castitatem professus fuerit.
> Diaconus qui eligitur, si contestatus fuerit pro accipiendo matrimonio, et se dixerit in castitate permanere non posse, hic non ordinetur. Quod si in ordinatione tacuerit et ordinatus fuerit, et postea matrimonium desiderauerit, alienus sit a ministerio et uacet a clero. Gratian. Hac auctoritate datur intelligi, quod illi, qui habent uxores uel accipere uolunt, nec diacones, nec sacerdotes fieri possunt, nisi continentiam profiteantur. §. 1. Si uero diaconus a ministerio cessare uoluerit, contracto matrimonio licite potest uti. Nam etsi in ordinatione sua castitatis uotum obtulerit, tamen tanta est uis in sacramento coniugii, quod nec ex uiolatione uoti potest dissolui coniugium ipsum. Unde Augustinus in libro de bono coniugali ad Iulianum: [cap. 10.]

C. II. Those marrying after a vow are not to be separated from one another.

Part II. Certain persons assert that those marrying after a vow are adulterers. But I say that those who separate such persons sin gravely.

> C. II. Nubentes post uotum non sunt abinuicem separandi.
> II. Pars. Quidam nubentes post uotum adulteros asserunt. Ego autem dico, quod grauiter peccant qui tales diuidunt.

C. III. On the same matter.

Likewise Theodore. If a man having a vow of virginity is joined to a wife, let him not afterward dismiss the wife, but let him do penance for three years. Jerome, however, writes to the contrary:

> C. III. De eodem.
> Item Theodorus. Si uir uotum uirginitatis habens adiungitur uxori, postea non dimittat uxorem, sed tribus annis peniteat. Ieronimus uero scribit econtra:

C. IV. For those who make a vow, it is damnable to wish to marry.

For those vowing virginity, not only to marry but even to wish to marry is damnable.

> C. IV. Dampnabile est uouentibus uelle nubere.
> Vouentibus uirginitatem non solum nubere, sed etiam uelle dampnabile est.

C. V. She who vowed virginity will have condemnation if she marries.

The same, Against Jovinian [Book I]. If a virgin marries, she does not sin—not that virgin who has dedicated herself to divine worship. For if any of these marries, she will have condemnation because she made her first faith void.

> C. V. Dampnationem habebit, si nupserit, que uirginitatem uouit.
> Idem contra Iouinianum. [lib. I.] Si nupserit uirgo, non peccat: non illa uirgo, que semet cultui diuino dedicauit. Harum enim si qua nupserit, habebit dampnationem, quia primam fidem irritam fecit.

C. VI. She who pretends that she is a religious woman cannot marry.

Likewise Nicholas [Pope Nicholas I to Albinus, archbishop of the Church of Vienne]. As to what you asked concerning the woman who, after the death of her husband, placed the sacred veil upon her head and pretended under that veil that she was a religious woman, but afterward returned to marriage: it seems good to me, because she wished through hypocrisy to disturb the ecclesiastical rule and did not remain lawfully in her vow, that she do penance for the unspeakable mockery, return to that which she pledged, and remain in the sacred ministry that she began.

[PALEA.

> C. VI. Que sanctimonialem se esse fingit non ualet nubere.
> Item Nicolaus. [Papa I. ad Albinum Viennens. ecclesiae Archiepiscopum.] Quod interrogasti de femina, que post obitum mariti sui sacrum uelamen super caput suum inposuit, et finxit se sub eodem uelamine sanctimonialem esse, postea uero ad nuptias rediit: bonum mihi uidetur, quia per ypocrisim ecclesiasticam regulam conturbare uoluit, et non legitime in uoto suo permansit, ut penitentiam agat de illusione nefanda, et reuertatur ad id, quod spopondit, et in sacro ministerio permaneat, quod inchoauit.
> [PALEA.

C. VII. The same in the same place.

For if we consent that anyone may pretend each of the ecclesiastical sacraments however he wishes and not perform it truly, the whole ecclesiastical order will be disturbed, neither will the laws of the Catholic faith stand, nor will the sacred canons be duly observed. For what did it profit Simon Magus to receive sacred baptism feignedly and to pretend that he would remain in Christianity, when, after his fraud was detected through the Apostle, what would befall him was foretold? For he says: "May your money be with you unto perdition, for your heart is not right before God. Therefore do penance for this wickedness of yours and ask God whether perhaps this thought of your heart may be forgiven you; for I see that you are in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity." Therefore we judge that such persons, unless they come to their senses, are to be struck with the spiritual sword. For it is not lawful to lie to the Holy Spirit, as Ananias and Sapphira lied and immediately perished.]

> C. VII. Idem ibidem.
> Nam si consenserimus, quod omnia sacramenta ecclesiastica quisque prout uult fingat et non uere faciat omnis ordo ecclesiasticus turbabitur, nec catholicae fidei iura consistunt, nec canones sacri rite obseruantur. Quid enim profuit Simoni Mago baptismum sacrum ficte suscipere, et in Christianitate permansurum se finxisse, cum per Apostolum, fraude eius detecta, quod sibi futurum esset prenunciatum fuit? Ait enim: "Pecunia tua tecum sit in perditionem: cor enim tuum non est rectum coram Deo. Penitentiam itaque age ab hac nequitia tua, et roga > Deum, si forte remittatur tibi hec cogitatio cordis tui: in felle enim amaritudinis et obligatione iniquitatis uideo te esse." Ideo tales, nisi resipiscant, spirituali gladio percutere censemus. Non enim fas est Spiritui sancto mentiri, sicut Ananias et Saphira mentiti sunt, et statim perierunt.]

C. VIII. Those established in sacred orders are not to take wives; and if they take them, they are to be separated.

Likewise Pope Callixtus [II]. We utterly forbid priests, deacons, subdeacons, and monks to have concubines or to contract marriage; we also judge, according to the definition of the sacred canons, that marriages contracted by persons of this kind ought to be dissolved and the persons brought back to penance. GRATIAN. A distinction must be made here: among those who make vows, some make vows simply, concerning whom Augustine and Theodore spoke; others are those for whom, after the vow, there follows the blessing of consecration or the profession of religious life, concerning whom Jerome, Nicholas, and Callixtus wrote. Hence Jerome, writing against the same Jovinian [Book I], says:

> C. VIII. In sacris ordinibus constituti, non ducant uxores: et si duxerint, separentur.
> Item Calixtus Papa. [II.] Presbiteris diaconibus, subdiaconibus et monachis concubinas habere, seu matrimonium contrahere penitus interdicimus; contracta quoque matrimonia ab huiusmodi personis disiungi, et personas ad penitentiam debere redigi, iuxta sacrorum canonum diffinitionem iudicamus. Gratian. Hic distinguendum est, quod uouentium alii sunt simpliciter uouentes, de quibus Augustinus et Theodorus locuti sunt, alii sunt, quibus post uotum accedit benedictio consecrationis, uel propositum religionis, de quibus Ieronimus et Nicolaus et Calixtus scripserunt. Unde contra eundem Iouinianum Ieronimus [lib. I.] scribens, ait:

C. IX. Virgins who marry after consecration are incestuous.

Virgins who marry after consecration are not so much adulterous as incestuous.

> C. IX. Incestae sunt uirgines, que post consecrationem nubunt.
> Virgines, que post consecrationem nupserint, non tam adulterae sunt, quam incestae.

Distinction XXVIII

GRATIAN. Part I. Behold, it has been shown that those unwilling to practice continence can ascend neither to the subdiaconate nor to the higher grades. Hence those approaching the subdiaconate are commanded not to be admitted without a vow of chastity, by the authority of blessed Gregory, who, writing to Peter the subdeacon [Book I, epistle 42, at the end], says:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Ecce ostensum est, quod nolentes continentiam, nec ad subdiaconatum, nec ad superiores gradus conscendere possunt. Unde ad subdiaconatum accedentes, non sine uoto castitatis iubentur admitti, auctoritate B. Gregorii, qui scribens Petro Subdiacono [lib. I. epistola 42. in fine] ait:

C. I. Let one who does not promise that he will live chastely not be made a subdeacon.

Let bishops presume to make no one a subdeacon unless he has promised that he will live chastely, because no one ought to approach the ministry of the altar unless his chastity has been approved before he receives the ministry.

C. I. Non fiat subdiaconus, qui se caste uicturum non promittit.

Nullum facere subdiaconum presumant episcopi, nisi qui se uicturum caste promiserit: quia nullus debet ad ministerium altaris accedere, nisi cuius castitas ante susceptum ministerium fuerit approbata.

C. II. Incontinent subdeacons and those established above them who take a wife or concubine are to lack ecclesiastical benefice and office.

Likewise Innocent II. We decree that those who, while in the order of the subdiaconate or above it, have taken wives or possessed concubines are to lack office and ecclesiastical benefice. For since they ought to be and to be called the temple, vessels of the Lord, and sanctuary of the Holy Spirit, it is unworthy that they serve beds and impurities.

C. II. Subdiaconus et supra constituti incontinentes, uxorem aut concubinam ducentes, ecclesiastico beneficio et offitio careant.

Item Innocentius II. Decernimus, ut hi, qui in ordine subdiaconatus et supra uxores duxerint aut concubinas habuerint, offitio atque ecclesiastico beneficio careant. Cum enim ipsi templum, uasa Domini, sacrarium Spiritus sancti debeant esse et dici, indignum est, eos cubilibus et immunditiis deseruire.

C. III. Those who are ordained as deacons or priests are to promise that they will live chastely.

Likewise from the Fifth Council of Toledo. Part II. When priests and deacons are established throughout the parishes, they ought to make a profession to their bishop that they will live chastely and purely under the fear of God, so that, while such a profession binds them, they may retain the discipline of a holy life.

C. III. Caste se uicturos promittant qui in diaconos uel presbiteros ordinantur.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano V. II. Pars. Quando Presbiteri et diacones per Parrochias constituuntur, oportet eos professionem episcopo suo facere, ut caste et pure uiuant sub timore Dei, ut, dum eos talis professio obligat, uitae sanctae disciplinam retineant.

C. IV. One who does not have long-standing continence of his body ought not to be elected as bishop.

Likewise Gregory to the noble citizens of Naples [Book VIII, epistle 40]. Part III. Before your writings came to us, we learned by the report of certain persons that the deacon John, who was elected by the other party, has a little daughter. Hence, if they had wished to attend to reason, neither ought the others to have elected him nor ought he himself to have consented. For with what presumption does one dare to approach the episcopate who, with his daughter as witness, is convicted of not yet possessing long-standing continence of his body?

C. IV. Qui longam sui corporis continentiam non habet, in episcopum eligi non debet.

Item Gregorius nobilibus ciuibus Neapolim. [lib. VIII. epist. 40.] III. Pars. Priusquam ad nos scripta uestra discurrerent, Iohannem diaconum, qui ab altera parte electus est, paruulam habere filiam, quorumdam relatione cognouimus; unde, si rationem uoluissent attendere, nec alii eum eligere, nec ipse debuerat consentire. Nam qua presumptione ad episcopatum audet accedere, qui adhuc longam corporis sui continentiam, filia teste, conuincitur non habere?

C. V. Those about to approach the subdiaconate are to profess continence.

Likewise from the Second Council of Toledo [c. 1]. Part IV. Concerning those whom the will of their parents has bound to the office of the clerical state from the first years of infancy, we establish that this is to be observed: that as soon as they have been tonsured or handed over to the ministry of readers, they ought to be educated in the house of the Church under the bishop's presence by the superior appointed over them. But when they have completed the eighteenth year of their age, their will concerning seeking marriage is to be investigated by the bishop in the sight of all the clergy and people. If, by God's inspiration, the grace of chastity pleases them, and they pledge themselves to preserve the promise of their chastity without the necessity of marriage, then, as seekers of the most narrow way, let them be subjected to the most gentle yoke of the Lord; and first, after probation of their profession, let them receive the ministry of subdeacon from the twentieth year. But if they pass twenty-five years blamelessly and without offense, they ought to be promoted to the office of the diaconate, if they are proved by the bishop able to fulfill it. Nevertheless, they must beware lest at any time, forgetful of their pledge, they voluntarily return either to earthly marriages or to secret intercourse. But if perhaps they do so, let them be held as guilty of sacrilege and estranged from the Church. Yet from those whom their own will at the time of inquiry persuades toward the desire to marry, we cannot take away the license conceded by the Apostle, provided that when, placed in marriage at an advanced age, they have pledged by equal consent that they will renounce the works of the flesh, they may aspire to sacred orders.

> C. V. Ad subdiaconatum accessuri continentiam profiteantur.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano II. [c. 1.] IV. Pars. De his, quos uoluntas parentum a primis infantiae annis clericatus offitio manciparit, id statuimus obseruandum, ut mox detonsi, uel ministerio lectorum contraditi, in domo ecclesiae sub episcopali presentia a preposito sibi debeant erudiri. At ubi octauum decimum etatis suae compleuerint annum, coram totius cleri plebisque conspectu uoluntas eorum de expetendo coniugio ab episcopo perscrutetur; quibus si gratia castitatis (Deo inspirante) placuerit, et promissionem castimoniae suae absque coniugali necessitate se spoponderint seruaturos, qui tanquam appetitores arctissimae uiae lenissimo iugo Domini subdantur, ac primum subdiaconi ministerium, habita probatione professionis suae, a uicesimo anno suscipiant. Quod si inculpabiliter ac inoffense uiginti quinque annos peregerint, ad diaconii offitium (si adimplere posse ab episcopo probantur), promoueri debent. Cauendum tamen est his, ne quando suae sponsionis inmemores aut ad terrenas nuptias aut ad furtiuos concubitus ultro recurrant. Quod si forte fecerint, ut sacrilegii rei ab ecclesia habeantur extranei. Quibus autem uoluntas propria interrogationis tempore desiderium nubendi persuaserit, concessam ab Apostolo licentiam auferre non possumus, ita ut, cum prouectae etatis in coniugio positi, renunciaturos se pari consensu operibus carnis spoponderint, ad sacros ordines aspirent.

C. VI. One established in marriage ought not to be assumed into the priesthood.

Likewise from the Second Council of Arles [c. 2]. Part V. It is not fitting for anyone established in the bond of marriage to be assumed into the priesthood unless conversion has been promised.

> C. VI. In coniugio constitutus ad sacerdotium assumi non debet.
> Item ex Concilio Arelatensi II. [c. 2.] V. Pars. Assumi aliquem ad sacerdotium in coniugii uinculo constitutum non oportet, nisi fuerit promissa conuersio.

C. VII. Deacons who do not profess chastity are not to be ordained.

Likewise from the same, III. Furthermore, it pleased the council that henceforth married deacons are not to be ordained unless they have first professed chastity with the resolve of conversion. GRATIAN. Yet by the preceding authority marriage appears to be permitted to deacons, since only married men are prohibited from being assumed into the priesthood. Further, by the following authority it appears to be permitted to subdeacons, since it is specially commanded concerning deacons that they are not to be ordained without probation of chastity. This same thing appears to have been permitted in the Synod of Ancyra, in which [c. 10] it was established thus:

> C. VII. Non ordinentur Diaconi, qui castitatem non profitentur.
> Item ex eodem III. Preterea placuit, ut deinceps non ordinentur diacones coniugati, nisi qui prius conuersionis proposito confessi fuerint castitatem. Gratian. Verum illa priori auctoritate diaconibus uidetur permitti coniugium, cum ad sacerdotium tantum coniugati prohibentur assumi. Porro sequenti uidetur permitti subdiaconibus, cum de diaconibus specialiter precipitur, ut sine probatione castitatis non ordinentur. Hoc idem in Anchiritana Sinodo uidetur esse permissum, in qua [c. 10.] sic statutum est:

C. VIII. Deacons are not to be prohibited from ministry because of marriage if at their ordination they say that they cannot remain continent.

Whatever deacons are ordained, if at the ordination itself they protested, saying that they wished to have wives and could not remain continent, then if they afterward enter marriage, let them remain in the ministry, because the bishop gave them license. But whoever remained silent and received the imposition of hands after professing continence, if they afterward enter marriage, ought to cease from the ministry.

> C. VIII. Diaconi non prohibeantur a ministerio pro nuptiis, si in ordinatione dicunt, se continere non posse.
> Diaconi quicumque ordinantur, si in ipsa ordinatione protestati sunt, dicentes, se uelle habere uxores, nec posse se continere, hi, si postea ad nuptias uenerint, maneant in ministerio, propterea quod his licentiam dederit episcopus. Quicumque sane tacuerint, et susceperint manus inpositionem professi continentiam, si postea ad nuptias conuenerint, a ministerio cessare debent.

C. IX. A priest who takes a wife is to be deposed from his order.

Likewise from the Council of Neocaesarea [c. 1]. Part VI. If a priest takes a wife, he ought to be deposed from the order. But if he has fornicated or committed adultery, he ought to be cast outside the Church and brought to penance among the laymen.

> C. IX. Presbiter ducens uxorem, ab ordine deponatur.
> Item ex Concilio Neocesariensi. [c. I.] VI. Pars. Presbiter si uxorem duxerit, ab ordine illum deponi debere. Quod si fornicatus fuerit, uel adulterium commiserit, extra ecclesiam abici et ad penitentiam inter laicos redigi oportet.

C. X. Concerning one who married the woman left by a certain deacon.

Likewise Gregory [Book XI, epistle 59]. Part VII. Because there are faults in which it is a fault to relax vengeance, the truth is always to be sought, so that inquiry should be made whether guilt condemns the accused or manifested innocence withdraws him from punishment. Thus it has reached us that the defender Fantinus wished to exercise vengeance against Peter, the bearer of the present letter, because, as is said, while he was a lessee he handed over to a husband the woman left by a certain deacon. But since this man asserts that she was not the wife of the deacon, saying that she did not come to him as a virgin and finally that she did not change her religious garment after he was promoted to sacred order, and also adding that before she came to the deacon and afterward she lived under an evil reputation, we therefore exhort your fraternity by these words to investigate this cause with an altogether subtle inquiry and with the fear of God, as is fitting. If it is established that the woman in question was in marriage with the deacon, let the aforesaid bearer be handed over in every way to the aforesaid defender and the rector of the patrimony for vengeance, and let those who were wickedly joined be separated with fitting correction. But if she was not in marriage with him, we wish you at our command to admonish the aforesaid Fantinus that he presume to do nothing to him and not burden him in any respect by a false accusation.

C. X. De eo, qui relictam cuiusdam diaconi duxit uxorem.

Item Gregorius. [lib. XI. epist. 59.] VII. Pars. Quia sunt culpae, in quibus culpa est relaxare uindictam, querenda est semper ueritas, ut inquiri debeat, utrum accusatum noxa condempnet, an a pena innocentia patefacta subducat. Itaque peruenit ad nos, Fantinum defensorem ultionem exercere in Petrum latorem presentium uoluisse, pro eo, quod (quantum dicitur) relictam cuiusdam diaconi, tempore quo conductor fuerit, marito tradiderit. Sed quoniam iste coniugem diaconi asserit non fuisse, dicens, nec eam uirginem ad eum uenisse, denique nec religiosam uestem mutasse, postquam ille in sacro ordine promotus est, adiciens etiam, priusquam ad diaconem ueniret et postea, illam praua opinione uixisse: Ideo fraternitatem tuam his hortamur affatibus, ut cum Dei, sicut decet, timore causam hanc subtili omnino inuestigatione perquiras et, si in coniugio diaconi mulierem, de qua agitur, fuisse constiterit, et suprascriptus lator memorato defensori et rectori patrimonii ad uindictam modis omnibus tradatur, et cum competenti emendatione hi, qui male sociati sunt, disiungantur. Si uero in eius coniugio non fuerit, memoratum Fantinum ex nostro mandato commonere te uolumus, ut ei facere nil presumat, nec falsa illum accusatione in aliquo pregrauet.

C. XI. Concerning the wife of a priest or deacon if she joins herself to another.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans [I, c. 13]. If a woman left by a priest or deacon joins herself to anyone in a double marriage, either let them be corrected and separated, or certainly, if they persist in the intention of the crime, let them be struck by an equal excommunication.

C. XI. De uxore presbiteri uel diaconi, si alii se coniunxerit.

Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I. c. 13.] Si se cuiquam mulier duplici coniugio presbiteri uel diaconi relicta coniunxerit, aut castigati separentur, aut certe, si in criminis intentione perstiterint, pari excommunicatione plectantur.

C. XII. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin. If any widow of a bishop, priest, or deacon takes a husband, let no cleric and no religious person take a meal with her; let her never receive communion; nevertheless, when she is dying, let the sacrament come to her aid.

C. XII. De eodem.

> Item ex Concilio Martini papae. Si qua uidua episcopi uel presbiteri aut diaconi maritum accepit, nullus clericus, nulla religiosa persona cum ea conuiuium sumat, numquam communicet; morienti tamen ei sacramentum subueniat.

C. XIII. The ordination of a certain bishop is deferred because he has a wife and children.

Likewise Pelagius to the patrician Cethegus. Part VIII. Concerning the prelate of the city of Syracuse, we had desired at the very beginning to obey the desires of your glory, had not manifold reasoning compelled us to defer the ordination of this man to the priesthood for no short time because either the quality of the person, as you too know better, or his surviving wife or children—through whom ecclesiastical property is accustomed to be endangered—suspended our minds from his ordination for a rather long time. And insofar as pertains to human caution, we deferred it for almost a whole year, supposing that the election of the Syracusans might turn out better. But because they persisted irrevocably in the resolve of their will and no other man was found in the same church unless it were deferred for still longer periods of time, lest they become somewhat more deranged, as we learned by the testimony of your son, the magnificent man who is praetor, amid uncertainties of this kind we judged it more prudent to do this: that by suitable foresight we should fortify, while preserving the disposition of the council, the cause on account of which the imperial constitution prohibits one having children and a wife from being promoted to the order of the episcopate. For this reason, with the greatest zeal, before he happened to be ordained by us, we exacted from the same bishop of the city of Syracuse a guarantee of this kind, through which, after a description of his present possessions had been made, he would both acknowledge how small his property was and would promise that neither through himself nor through his children and wife, nor through any related, domestic, or perhaps external person, would he ever dare usurp anything from the property of the Church; that he would associate all things acquired during the time of his episcopate with the dominion of his church; and that he would leave to his children or heirs nothing beyond what is now described. GRATIAN. Behold: by this authority one elected to the episcopate is prohibited from having a wife and children. But no one ought to be elected to the episcopate unless he is either a priest or a deacon; a subdeacon, however, may not be, unless necessity compels it. Therefore, whether he was a priest, deacon, or subdeacon, it appears that those established in the aforesaid orders can lawfully use marriage. §1. Therefore, because by the authority of Gregory one who handed over the woman left by a deacon to a husband is to be punished; likewise, in the Council of Neocaesarea a priest who takes a wife, not a deacon, is commanded to be deposed; likewise, in the Synod of Ancyra deacons who at their ordination say that they wish to have wives are not prohibited from ministry if they afterward enter marriage: it is evident that neither deacons nor subdeacons are to be prohibited from marriage. But as for what is objected concerning election, it is indeed true that no one is to be elected to the episcopate unless established in sacred orders; but the fact that this man has a wife and children does not conflict with the foregoing authorities concerning the continence of clerics. §2. For while in lay habit or established in the lesser orders he could have had a wife and children; afterward, having professed continence with the consent of his wife, he had attained the subdiaconate or diaconate or the grade of priest, and yet it was fitting for him to supply the necessities of life to his wife and children. §3. That passage of Gregory, however, is resolved in two ways: either because that church in which that deacon had served had not yet received the vow of continence among deacons and the other ministers, or because, as was written above concerning the man elected as bishop, the aforesaid deacon had taken her as wife before the subdiaconate. §4. But that passage of the Synods of Neocaesarea and Ancyra is understood either from the time or from the place: from the time, because the continence of ministers of the altar had not yet been introduced; from the place, because both synods are eastern and the eastern Church does not receive a general vow of chastity. It nevertheless guards this with diligent observance: that after the priesthood has been obtained and the former wife, with whom he had been made a priest, has died, if he takes another wife, he is deposed. Likewise there is objected that which is read in the Canon of the Apostles [c. 6, elsewhere 5]:

> Item Pelagius Cetego Patricio. VIII. Pars. De Siracusanae urbis antistite optaueramus in ipso initio gloriae uestrae desideriis obedire, nisi nos multiplex ratio ipsius non paucis temporibus ordinationem differre sacerdotii coegisset, ob hoc, quod uel personae qualitas (sicut et uos nostis melius), uel superstes uxor aut filii (per quos ecclesiastica solet periclitari substantia), nostros animos diutius ab eius ordinatione suspenderet. Et quantum ad cautelam humanam pertinet, integro anno pene distulimus, opinantes, quod in melius Siracusanorum prouenire posset electio. Sed quia in uoluntatis suae proposito inreuocabiliter perstiterunt, et nullus est alius repertus in ecclesia eadem, nisi longioribus adhuc temporum differretur spatiis; ne paulo amplius insanirent (sicut filii uestri uiri magnifici pretoris testificatione didicimus), inter huiusmodi ambiguitates illud consultius iudicauimus faciendum, ut congrua prouidentia causam, propter quam principalis constitutio habentem filios et uxorem ad episcopatus ordinem promoueri prohibet, salua dispositione concilii muniremus. Qua de re summo studio ab eodem Siracusanae urbis episcopo priusquam a nobis contingeret ordinari, huiusmodi exegimus cautionem, per quam et suam fateretur, quantula esset, presentis temporis habita rerum descriptione substantiam, et nichil umquam per se, aut per filios et uxorem, siue quamlibet propinquam aut domesticam uel extraneam forte personam de rebus audeat usurpare ecclesiae, et uniuersa sui episcopatus quesita tempore ecclesiae suae dominio sociaret, nichil ultra id, quod modo descriptum est, suis filiis uel heredibus relicturus. Gratian. Ecce hac auctoritate electus in episcopatum prohibetur habere uxorum et filios. Eligi autem ad episcopatum non debet, nisi aut sacerdos aut diaconus; subdiaconus uero non, nisi necessitate cogente. Siue ergo presbiter siue diaconus siue subdiaconus fuerit, apparet, quod in prefatis ordinibus constituti licite matrimonio possunt uti. §. 1. Quia ergo auctoritate Gregorii, qui relictam diaconi marito tradidit, puniendus est; item in Neocesariensi concilio presbiter ducens uxorem, non diaconus, iubetur deponi; item in Anchiritana sinodo diaconi, qui in ordinatione sua dicunt, se uelle habere uxores, si postea ad nuptias uenerint, non prohibentur a ministerio: patet, quod nec diaconi, nec subdiaconi sunt prohibendi a coniugio. Sed quod de electione obicitur, uerum quidem est in episcopatum non eligendum, nisi in sacris ordinibus constitutum; sed ipsum uxorem habere et filios, non repugnat premissis auctoritatibus de continentia clericorum. §. 2. In laicali enim habitu, uel in minoribus ordinibus constitutus potuit habere uxorem et filios: postea ex consensu uxoris continentiam professus subdiaconatum uel diaconatum uel presbiterii gradum adeptus fuerat, et tamen uxori et filiis ipsum necessaria subministrare oportebat. §. 3. Illud autem Gregorii duobus modis soluitur: uel quia ecclesia illa, cui diaconus ille militauerat, nondum continentiae uotum susceperat in diaconibus et reliquis ministris; uel quia (sicut de electo in episcopum supra scriptum est) ante subdiaconatum memoratus diaconus eam in uxorem duxerat. §. 4. Illud autem Neocesariensis et Anchiritanae sinodi uel ex tempore, uel ex loco intelligitur: ex tempore, quia nondum introducta erat continentia ministrorum altaris; ex loco quia utraque sinodus orientalis est, et orientalis ecclesia non suscipit generale uotum castitatis. Hoc tamen diligenti obseruatione custodit, ut post adeptum sacerdotium, defuncta priore uxore, cum qua sacerdos factus fuerat, si alteram duxerit, deponatur. Item opponitur illud, quod legitur in canone Apostolorum: [c. 6. al. 5.]

C. XIV. A priest is not to despise his own wife for the sake of religion.

Part IX. If anyone teaches a priest to despise his own wife under the pretext of religion, let him be anathema.

> C. XIV. Presbiter causa religionis non contempnat propriam uxorem.
> IX. Pars. Si quis docuerit, sacerdotem sub obtentu religionis propriam uxorem contempnere, anathema sit.

C. XV. Let one who makes a distinction against a married priest on the occasion of marriage be anathema.

Likewise from the Council of Gangra [c. 4]. If anyone makes a distinction against a married priest, as though on the occasion of marriage he ought not to offer, and therefore abstains from his offering, let him be anathema.

> C. XV. Anathema sit, qui presbiterum coniugatum occasione nuptiarum discernit.
> Item ex Concilio Gangrensi. [c. 4.] Si quis discernit presbiterum coniugatum, tanquam occasione nuptiarum quod offerre non debeat, et ab eius oblatione ideo abstinet, anathema sit.

C. XVI. Let a priest held in an unlawful marriage abstain from office.

Likewise from the Sixth Synod [c. 26]. Part X. We command that a priest held in an unlawful marriage is indeed to have his chair but to abstain from office. For indulgence of this kind is sufficient for him, because it does not follow that one who ought to cure his own wounds should bless others. For a blessing is the handing down of sanctification. But one who does not have this because of the offense of ignorance—how will he hand it down to others? Let him therefore bless neither publicly nor privately, nor distribute the Lord's body to others, nor minister in any other way; but let it suffice for him that he presides, and let him implore God that the iniquity of his ignorance be forgiven him. Moreover, it is manifest that this unlawful marriage too will be dissolved, and the man is in no way to have access to her on account of whom he was deprived of the sacred ministry.

> C. XVI. Ab offitio abstineat presbiter non legalibus nuptiis detentus.
> Item ex VI. Sinodo. [c. 26.] X. Pars. Presbiterum, non legalibus nuptiis detentum, cathedram quidem habere, sed ab offitio abstinere precipimus. Sufficit enim huiusmodi ei indulgentia, quia benedicere aliis eum, qui uulnera sua debet curare, consequens non est. Benedictio enim sanctificationis traditio est. Qui uero hanc non habet propter delictum ignorantiae, quomodo aliis tradet? Non enim publice neque priuate benedicat, nec corpus Domini dispenset aliis, nec alio modo ministret; sed sufficiat ei, quod presidet, et inploret a Deo, ut dimittatur ei iniquitas ignorantiae suae. Manifestum est autem, quod et huiusmodi non legitimae nuptiae soluentur, et nullatenus uir accessum habeat ad eam, propter quam sacro ministerio priuatus est.

C. XVII. Laymen are not to judge concerning priests.

Likewise Nicholas, in response to the consultations of the Bulgarians [c. 70]. Part XI. You decree that counsel is to be sought whether you ought to support and honor a priest having a wife or cast him away from you. To this we reply: although they themselves are highly blameworthy, it nevertheless befits you to imitate God, who makes his sun rise over the good and the evil. For you ought not for this reason to cast him away from you, because neither did the Lord cast Judas, although he was a deceitful disciple, from the number of the Apostles. But concerning priests, you who are laymen are neither to judge nor to investigate anything about their life; whatever it may be, it is to be reserved to the judgment of bishops.

> C. XVII. De presbiteris non est laicis iudicandum.
> Item Nicolaus ad consulta Bulgarorum. [c. 70.] XI. Pars. Consulendum decernitis utrum presbiterum habentem uxorem debeatis sustentare et honorare, an a uobis proicere. In quo respondemus: Quoniam licet ipsi sint ualde reprehensibiles, uos tamen Deum conuenit imitari, qui solem suum facit oriri super bonos et malos. Deicere enim a uobis ideo non debetis, quoniam nec Iudam Dominus, cum esset mendax discipulus, a numero apostolorum deiecit. Verum de presbiteris uobis, qui laici estis, nec iudicandum est, nec de uita eorum quicquam inuestigandum; sed episcoporum iudicio, quicquid illud sit, est reseruandum.

Distinction XXIX

GRATIAN. But it must be noted that, according to Isidore, very many chapters are to be considered according to cause, place, and time. For he says:

> GRATIANUS. Sed notandum est, quod secundum Ysidorum pleraque capitula ex causa, et loco, et tempore, consideranda sunt. Ait enim:

C. I. Let the rules of the canons be understood according to time, place, person, and cause.

It is to be known that very many chapters are to be considered according to cause, person, place, and time. Because their modes are not investigated to the marrow, some persons, becoming entangled, strike against the labyrinth of error when they judge before they understand and blame before by repeated reading they inquire. Hence Gregory also says:

> C. I. Ex tempore, et loco et persona et causa regulae canonum intelligantur.
> Sciendum est, quod pleraque capitula ex causa, ex persona, ex loco, ex tempore consideranda sunt, quorum modi, quia medullitus non indagantur, in erroris laborinthum nonnulli intricando impinguntur, cum ante iudicant, quam intelligant; ante inculpant, quam iterando lecta perquirant. Hinc etiam Gregorius ait:

C. II. The rules of the saints are moderated according to the variety of circumstances.

The rules of the holy fathers were handed down according to time, place, and person, with the necessity of the affair pressing.

> C. II. Pro uarietate rerum temperantur regulae sanctorum.
> Regulae sanctorum Patrum pro tempore, loco et persona negotio instante necessitate traditae sunt.

[C. III.] The Scriptures are to be understood according to the diversity of places, times, and persons.

Likewise Jerome in the epistle to the Ephesians. It is necessary that, according to the diversities of the times, places, and persons to whom they were written, they should also have diverse causes, arguments, and origins. And just as blessed John, writing to seven churches in his Apocalypse, in each of them specially reproves vices or approves virtues, so also the holy Apostle Paul throughout the individual churches remedies the wounds that were inflicted and does not, in the fashion of an unskilled physician, wish to cure everyone's eyes with one eye salve.

> [C. III.] Pro diuersitate locorum temporum et hominum scripturae intelligendae sunt.
> Item Ieronimus in epistola ad Ephesios. Necesse est, ut iuxta diuersitates temporum et locorum et hominum, quibus scriptae sunt, diuersas et causas et argumenta et origines habeant. Et quomodo B. Iohannes in apocalipsi sua septem scribens ecclesiis in unaquaque earum specialia uel uitia reprehendit, uel uirtutes probat, ita et S. apostolus Paulus per singulas ecclesias uulneribus medetur illatis, nec ad instar imperiti medici uno colirio omnium oculos uult curare.

Distinction XXX

GRATIAN. Part I. That which is read in the Canon of the Apostles, the Council of Gangra, and the Sixth Synod is considered according to cause and time. The cause was the heresy of the Manichaeans, which detested marriage, just as the superstition of certain others is also found to have introduced many things to the detestation of Catholics. Against them it is read that the following was established in the Council of Gangra:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Illud autem, quod in canone apostolorum, et in Gangrensi concilio, et in VI. sinodo legitur, ex causa consideratur et ex tempore. Causa fuit heresis Manicheorum, que coniugium detestabatur, sicut etiam quorumdam superstitio multa in Catholicorum detestacione introduxisse inuenitur, contra quos in Gangrensi Concilio statutum legitur:

C. I. Concerning the manifold superstition of the heretics whom the Council of Gangra anathematized.

[Council of Gangra, c. 16.] If any children abandon their parents, especially faithful parents, on the occasion of the worship of God, judging this to be just, and do not rather render the honor owed to their parents so that in them they may venerate this very fact, that they are faithful, let them be anathema.

> C. I. De multimoda supersticione hereticorum, quos Gangrense concilium anathematizauit.
> [Conc. Gangr. c. 16.] Si qui filii parentes, maxime fideles, deseruerint occasione Dei cultus, hoc iustum esse iudicantes, et non potius debitum honorem parentibus reddiderint, ut hoc ipsum in eis uenerentur, quod fideles sunt, anathema sint.

C. II. Likewise concerning the same matter. [In the same, c. 17.]

Whatever woman, judging it fitting to religion, cuts off her own hair, which God gave her as a veil and as a reminder of her subjection, as though dissolving the law of subjection, let her be anathema.

> C. II. Item de eodem. [ib. c. 17.]
> Quecumque mulier, religioni iudicans conuenire, comam sibi amputauerit, quam Deus ad uelamen eius et ad memoriam subiectionis illi dedit, tanquam resoluens ius subiectionis, anathema sit.

C. III. Concerning the same matter. Likewise from the same [c. 14].

If any woman wishes to depart after abandoning her husband, with the bond of marriage dissolved, condemning marriage, let her be anathema.

C. III. De eodem. Item ex eodem. [c. 14.]

Si qua mulier derelicto uiro discedere uoluerit, soluto uinculo coniugali, nuptias condempnando, anathema sit.

C. IV. Concerning the same matter. Likewise from the same [c. 10].

If anyone who has professed virginity for God disparages through arrogance those placed in marriage, let him be anathema.

C. IV. De eodem. Item ex eodem. [c. 10.]

Si quis propter Deum uirginitatem professus in coniugio positos per arrogantiam uituperauerit, anathema sit.

C. V. Likewise concerning the same matter. [In the same, c. 9.]

If anyone who has professed either virginity or continence judges marriage abominable and does not do so solely because the good of continence and virginity is a holy resolve, let him be anathema.

C. V. Item de eodem. [ib. c. 9.]

Si quis uel uirginitatem, uel continentiam professus, tanquam abominabiles nuptias iudicat, et non propter hoc solum, quod continentiae et uirginitatis bonum sanctum propositum sit, anathema sit.

C. VI. Likewise concerning the same matter. [In the same, c. 13.]

If any woman, judging it useful for her resolve that she use masculine clothing, imitates a man's habit for this reason, let her be anathema.

C. VI. Item de eodem. [ib. c. 13.]

Si qua mulier suo proposito utile iudicans, ut uirili ueste utatur, propter hoc uiri habitum imitetur anathema sit.

C. VII. Likewise concerning the same matter. [In the same, c. 18.]

If anyone, judging this fitting to continence, fasts on the Lord's day in contempt of that day, let him be anathema.

C. VII. Item de eodem. [ib. c. 18.]

Si quis, tanquam hoc continentiae conuenire iudicans, die dominico ieiunauerit in eiusdem diei contemptum, anathema sit.

C. VIII. Likewise concerning the same matter. [In the same, c. 19.]

If anyone among those who are in the resolve of continence is proud because of bodily necessity and thinks the common fasts are to be despised, judging the perfect principle of the whole Church to exist in his own conscience, let him be anathema.

C. VIII. Item de eodem. [ib. c. 19.]

Si quis eorum, qui in proposito sunt continentiae, propter necessitatem corporalem superbiat, et ieiunia communia putauerit contempnenda, tocius ecclesiae perfectam in sua conscientia iudicans rationem, anathema sit.

C. IX. Likewise concerning the same matter. [In the same, c. 20.]

If anyone through pride, regarding himself as perfect, either accuses the assemblies that are held in various places and in the basilicas of the holy martyrs, or believes that the offerings celebrated there are to be spurned and the memorials of the saints despised, let him be anathema.

> C. IX. Item de eodem. [ib. c. 20.]
> Si quis per superbiam, tanquam perfectum se existimans, conuentus, qui per loca et basilicas sanctorum martirum fiunt, uel accusauerit, uel etiam oblationes, que ibidem celebrantur, spernendas esse crediderit, memoriasque Sanctorum contempnendas, anathema sit.

C. X. Likewise concerning the same matter. [In the same, c. 3.]

If anyone teaches that the house of God and the congregations that are held in it ought to be despised, let him be anathema.

> C. X. Item de eodem. [ib. c. 3.]
> Si quis docet, domum Dei contemptibilem esse debere et congregationes, que in ea fiunt, anathema sit.

C. XI. Likewise concerning the same matter. [In the same, c. 6.]

If anyone, gathering peoples privately outside the Church, despises ecclesiastical sanctions and conducts the Church among his own people with a priest but without the counsel of the bishop, let him be anathema.

> C. XI. Item de eodem. [ib. c. 6.]

If anyone brings an accusation against marriage and believes that a faithful and religious woman sleeping with her husband is to be abominated or even accused, as though married persons could not enter the kingdom of God, let him be anathema.

If anyone believes that one who eats meat in faith and with religion—except blood, what is sacrificed to an idol, and what is strangled—is to be condemned as though one who eats it has no hope, let him be anathema.

If anyone abandons his own children and does not nourish them and furnish them the necessities, as is the duty of piety, but thinks they are to be neglected on the occasion of continence, let him be anathema.

C. XV. Likewise concerning the same matter. [In the same, c. 12.]

If any man thinks it fitting to the holy resolve, that is, continence, that he use a cloak as though he will have righteousness from it, and reproves or judges others who with reverence use hooded cloaks and other common clothing that is in use, let him be anathema.

C. XVI. Likewise concerning the same matter. [In the same, final chapter.]

Part II. We have written these things not cutting off those who in the Church of God choose, according to the Scriptures, the holy resolve of continence, but those who assume its habit and are raised up in pride against those who live more simply. But we also condemn those who exalt themselves against the Scriptures and the ecclesiastical canons and introduce new precepts. We, however, both admire virginity with humility, and call continence with chastity and religion most acceptable to God; and, approving, we praise renunciations of secular affairs and acts with humility; and we honor the bond of marriage that endures according to chastity; and we do not cast out the rich who possess justice and good works.

Sed et hos condempnamus, qui se extollunt aduersus scripturas et ecclesiasticos canones, et noua introducunt precepta. Nos autem et uirginitatem cum humilitate admiramur, et continentiam cum castitate et religionem Deo acceptissimam dicimus, et renunciationes secularium negotiationum atque actuum cum humilitate approbando laudamus, et nuptiarum uinculum quod secundum castitatem perdurat, honoramus, et diuites cum iustitia et operibus bonis non abicimus.

C. XVII. One who follows the superstitions of the Manichaeans is anathematized.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin. If any priest, because of public penance received from a priest, fasts without any necessity on the Lord's day out of a certain religiosity, as the Manichaeans do, let him be anathema. §1. Likewise, as the ancient canon handed down by the Apostles maintains, it pleased the council that on every Sunday and on every day of Easter until the fiftieth day, they should not prostrate themselves in the prayer of humility, but with face upright should perform the office of prayer to the Lord, because on these days we celebrate the joy of the Lord's resurrection. If anyone also abstains from foods not for abstinence but from execration, it pleased the holy council that he should first taste them and then, if he wishes to abstain, abstain. But if he spurns them so that he does not taste vegetables cooked with meat, then, as one who is disobedient and does not remove from himself the suspicion of heresy, let him be deposed from the order of the clerical state.

> C. XVII. Anathematizatur, qui Manicheorum supersticiones sequitur.
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. Si quis presbiter propter publicam penitentiam a sacerdote acceptam absque aliqua necessitate die dominica pro quadam religione ieiunauerit, sicut Manichei, anathema sit. §. 1. Similiter et quod ab apostolis traditum canon tenet antiquus, placuit, ut per omnes dominicas et per omnes dies pascae usque ad quinquagesimam non prosternant se in oratione humilitatis, sed recto uultu ad Dominum orationis fungantur offitio, quia in his diebus gaudium resurrectionis Domini celebramus. Si quis etiam non pro abstinentia, sed pro exsecratione escarum abstinet placuit sancto concilio, ut pregustet, et sic, si uult abstinere, abstineat. Si autem spernit, ita ut olera cocta cum carnibus non degustet, iste non obediens, nec suspitionem heresis a se remouens, deponatur de ordine clericatus.

Distinction XXXI

GRATIAN. Part I. As to the time: because it had not yet been instituted that priests should observe continence. Hence Gregory writes to Peter, subdeacon of Sicily [Book I, epistle 42]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Tempus quia nondum erat institutum, ut sacerdotes continentiam seruarent. Unde Gregorius scribit Petro Subdiacono Siciliae: [lib. I. epist. 42.]

C. I. One who did not promise chastity is not to be compelled to separate from his wife.

Three years ago the subdeacons of all the churches of Sicily had been prohibited from mingling in any way with their wives, according to the custom of the Roman Church. This appears harsh and unsuitable to me: that one who has not experienced the practice of continence and did not promise chastity should be compelled to separate from his wife and through this—which God forbid—fall into something worse. Hence it seems to me that from the present day all bishops should be told to presume to make no one a deacon unless he has promised that he will live chastely, so that past evils that were not sought by the resolve of the mind are not violently exacted, and future ones are cautiously guarded against. §1. But those who, after that prohibition made three years ago, have lived continently with their spouses are to be praised and rewarded, and exhorted to remain in their good practice. §2. Those, however, who after the prohibition was made were unwilling to abstain from their wives, we do not wish to be promoted to sacred order, because no one ought to approach the ministry of the altar unless his chastity has been approved before he receives the ministry. Part II. GRATIAN. The cause of this institution, however, was priestly purity, so that they could freely devote themselves to prayer on all days. For if, as the Apostle says, one must abstain from wives so that we may devote ourselves more readily to prayer, ministers of the altar, upon whom the daily necessity of prayer is incumbent, are consequently never permitted to devote themselves to the conjugal duty. Hence Bede says upon Luke [at c. 1]:

> C. I. Qui castitatem non promisit, ab uxore sua separari non cogatur.

Ante triennium omnium ecclesiarum subdiaconi Siciliae prohibiti fuerant, ut more Romanae ecclesiae suis uxoribus nullatenus misceantur. Quod mihi durum atque incompetens uidetur, ut, qui usum continentiae non inuenit, neque castitatem promisit, compellatur a sua uxore separari, atque per hoc (quod absit) in deterius cadat. Inde uidetur mihi, ut a presenti die episcopis omnibus dicatur, ut nullum facere diaconum presumant, nisi qui se uicturum caste promiserit, quatenus et preterita mala que proposito mentis appetita non sunt, uiolenter non exigantur et futura caute caueantur. §. 1. Qui uero post eandem prohibitionem, que ante triennium facta est, continenter cum suis coniugibus uixerint, laudandi atque remunerandi sunt, atque ut in bono suo permaneant exhortandi. §. 2. Eos autem, qui post prohibitionem factam a suis se uxoribus continere noluerint, ad sacrum ordinem nolumus promoueri, quia nullus debet ad altaris ministerium accedere, nisi cuius castitas ante susceptum ministerium fuerit approbata. II. Pars. Gratian. Causa uero huius institucionis mundicia fuit sacerdotalis ut libere cunctis diebus orationi possent uacare. Si enim (ut Apostolus ait) ab uxoribus est cessandum, ut expeditius orationi uacemus, ministris itaque altaris, quibus cotidiana necessitas orandi incumbit, numquam coniugali offitio uacare permittitur. Unde Beda super Lucam [ad cap. I.] ait:

C. II. Priests are commanded always to observe chastity.

Priests are commanded always to abstain from their wives and always to observe chastity, so that they may always be able to assist at the altar.

C. II. Sacerdotibus semper castitas obseruanda precipitur.

Sacerdotibus, ut semper ualeant altari assistere semper ab uxoribus continendum, semper castitas obseruanda precipitur.

C. III. Those who serve the divine sacraments ought to be continent.

Likewise in the Second Council of Carthage [c. 2]. It befits bishops, priests, and deacons, as it pleased the council, and it befits sacrosanct prelates or priests or Levites, or those who serve the divine sacraments, to be continent in all things.

C. III. Qui diuinis sacramentis deseruiunt, continentes esse oportet.

Item in Concilio Cartaginensi II. [cap. 2.] Episcopos, presbiteros diacones ita ut placuit, et decet sacrosanctos antistites aut sacerdotes, aut Leuitas, uel qui sacramentis diuinis inseruiunt, continentes esse decet in omnibus.

C. IV. Priests and Levites are not to mingle with their wives.

Likewise Innocent I to Victricius, bishop of Rouen [epistle II, c. 9]. The Church ought to maintain in every way that priests and Levites do not mingle with their wives, because they are occupied by the necessities of daily ministry. For it is written: "Be holy, because I, the Lord your God, am holy." For in ancient times they did not depart from the temple in the year of their turn—as we read concerning Zechariah—and did not touch their home at all. The use of marriage had indeed been relaxed for them because of the succession of offspring, because no one from another tribe or from a stock other than that of Aaron was commanded to approach the priesthood. How much more ought these priests and Levites to observe modesty from the day of their ordination, for whom the priesthood or ministry exists without succession, and no day passes on which they are free either from divine sacrifices or the office of baptism?

[PALEA.

C. IV. Sacerdotes et Leuitae suis non misceantur uxoribus.

Item Innocentius I. Victricio Rotomagensi Episcopo. [epist. II. cap. 9.] Tenere debet ecclesia omni modo, ut sacerdotes et Leuitae cum uxoribus suis non misceantur, quia ministerii cotidiani necessitatibus occupantur. Scriptum est enim: "Sancti estote, quoniam sanctus sum, Dominus Deus uester." Nam priscis temporibus anno uicis suae de templo non discedebant (sicut de Zacharia legimus, nec domum suam omnino tangebant, quibus utique propter sobolis successionem usus fuerat relaxatus, quia ex alia tribu et preterquam ex semine Aaron ad sacerdotium nullus accedere precipiebatur: quanto magis hi sacerdotes et Leuitae pudicitiam ex die ordinationis suae obseruare debent, quibus uel sacerdotium, uel ministerium sine successione est, nec preterit dies, qua uel a sacrificiis diuinis, uel a baptismatis offitio uacent?

[PALEA.

C. V. Likewise in the same place.

For as Paul writes to the Corinthians, saying, "Abstain for a time, so that you may devote yourselves to prayer," and he assuredly commanded this to laymen, much more will priests, for whom the sacrifice of prayer and sacrificing is continual, always have to abstain from intercourse of this kind.]

C. V. Item ibidem.

Nam sicut Paulus ad Corinthios scribit, dicens: "Abstinete uos ad tempus, ut uacetis orationi," et hoc utique laicis precepit: multo magis sacerdotes, quibus orandi et sacrificandi iuge sacrificium est, semper debebunt ab huiusmodi consortio abstinere.]

C. VI. Those who abstain from the duties of a wife are to be admitted to the sacrifices.

The same to Exsuperius, bishop of Toledo [epistle III, c. 1]. It is lawful for those to be admitted to the sacrifices who do not exercise the carnal duty even with a wife.

C. VI. Qui ab uxoris offitiis abstinent, ad sacrificia admittantur.

Idem Exsuperio Tolletano Episcopo. [epist. III. c. I.] Eos ad sacrificia admitti fas sit, qui uel cum uxore non exerceant offitium carnale.

C. VII. A priest who must always pray must always abstain from marriage.

Likewise Jerome, Against Jovinian [Book I]. If a layman and every faithful person cannot pray unless he abstains from the conjugal duty, a priest, who must always offer sacrifices, must always pray; if he must always pray, he must therefore always abstain from marriage. GRATIAN. That the passage above concerning the marriage of priests was spoken because of the Manichaeans is apparent from the Council of Gangra, in which [c. 1] it is read that it was established thus:

C. VII Sacerdoti, cui semper est orandum, semper est matrimonio carendum.

Item Ieronimus contra Iouinianum. [lib. I.] Si laicus et quisque fidelis non potest orare, nisi careat offitio coniugali, sacerdoti, cui semper offerenda sunt sacrificia, semper orandum est; si semper orandum est, semper ergo matrimonio carendum. Gratian. Quod autem Manicheorum causa de coniugio sacerdotum illud supra dictum sit, ex Gangrensi Concilio apparet, in quo [cap. I.] sic statutum legitur:

C. VIII. Let one who disparages marriage be anathema.

If anyone disparages marriage and detests or considers blameworthy a faithful and religious woman sleeping with her husband, as though she could not enter the kingdom of God, let him be anathema.

> C. VIII. Anathema sit, qui nuptias uituperat.
> Si quis uituperat nuptias, et dormientem cum uiro suo fidelem ac religiosam detestatur aut culpabilem estimat, uelut que regnum Dei introire non possit, anathema sit.

C. IX. On the same matter.

Likewise from the same [c. 9]. Whoever, preserving virginity or devoting himself to continence, assumes the name of virginity as though shuddering at marriage, and not because it is good and holy, let him be anathema. Part III. GRATIAN. That which is read in the Canon of the Apostles can also be understood in another way, so that this is the meaning of the chapter: "If anyone teaches a priest to despise his wife," not a wife whom he received while in the priesthood, but one whom, while he was still a layman or established in the lesser orders, he joined to himself and with whom he professed continence when he ascended to sacred orders. No one ought to despise her, that is, cast her out of his mind and care, so that he does not provide her necessities. This interpretation is proved by the authority of Pope Leo, who, writing to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne [epistle XC, c. 3], says:

> C. IX. De eodem.
> Item ex eodem. [cap. 9.] Quicumque uirginitatem custodiens aut continentiae studens, uelut horrescens nuptias, nec propter hoc, quod bonum et sanctum est, nomen uirginitatis assumit, anathema sit. III. Pars. Gratian. Potest et aliter intelligi illud, quod in canone apostolorum legitur, ut iste sit sensus capituli: "Si quis docet sacerdotem uxorem suam contempnere," non uxorem quam in sacerdotio accepit, sed quam, dum esset adhuc laicus uel in minoribus ordinibus constitutus, sibi copulauit, cum qua continentiam professus est, cum ad sacros ordines conscenderet quam nullus debet contempnere, hoc est, ab animo et cura sua abicere, quin ei necessaria prouideat. Probatur autem hec interpretatio auctoritate Leonis Papae, qui [epist. XC. cap. 3.] scribens Rustico Narbonensi Episcopo ait:

C. X. The law of continence is the same for ministers of the altar, bishops, and priests.

The law of continence is the same for ministers of the altar as for bishops or priests, who, while they were laymen or readers, were lawfully able both to take wives and to beget children; but when they reached the aforesaid grades, what had been lawful began to be unlawful for them. Hence, so that a spiritual marriage may be made from a carnal one, it is fitting that they should not dismiss their wives, but that those who have wives should appear to possess them as though they did not, so that both the charity of the marriages may be preserved and the works of marriage cease.

> C. X. Ministris altari episcopis et presbiteris eadem lex est continentiae.
> Lex continentiae eadem est altaris ministris, que episcopis aut presbiteris, qui cum essent laici siue lectores, licite et uxores ducere, et filios procreare potuerunt; sed cum ad predictos peruenerunt gradus, cepit eis non licere quod licuit. Unde, ut de carnali fiat spirituale coniugium, oportet eos nec dimittere uxores, sed qui habent sic habere uideantur quasi non habeant, quo et salua sit caritas conubiorum, et cessent opera nuptiarum.

C. XI. A bishop or priest is not to cast his own wife out of his care.

Likewise Leo IX, against the epistle of Abbot Nicetas. We confess altogether that a bishop, priest, or deacon is not permitted, for the sake of religion, to cast his own wife out of his care, but that he is to furnish her food and clothing, though not to lie with her carnally according to custom. Thus too we read that the holy Apostles acted, blessed Paul the Apostle saying: "Do we not have the power to lead about a woman who is a sister, as do the brother of the Lord and Cephas?" See, foolish man, that he did not say, "Do we not have the power to embrace a woman who is a sister?" but "to lead her about," namely so that by them she might be supported from the reward of preaching, yet thereafter no further carnal union would exist between them. GRATIAN. Hence also that passage of Gregory in the Dialogues: "A certain priest"—look for it below. §1. Therefore, as appears from these authorities, priests can supply necessities to the wives whom, while in lay habit or established in the lesser orders, they lawfully joined to themselves, but cannot render the marital debt. Part IV. §2. But that passage of the Tripartite History is objected [Book II, c. 14]:

> C. XI. Episcopus uel presbiter uxorem propriam a sua cura non abiciat.
> Item Leo IX. contra epistolam Nicetae Abbatis. Omnino confitemur, non licere episcopo, presbitero, diacono, propriam uxorem causa religionis abicere a cura sua, sed ut ei uictum et uestitum largiatur, sed non ut cum illa ex more carnaliter iaceat. Sic et sanctos apostolos legimus egisse, B. Paulo apostolo dicente: "Numquid non habemus potestatem sororem mulierem circumducendi, sicut frater Domini et Cephas?" Vide insipiens, quia non dixit: numquid non habemus potestatem sororem mulierem "amplectendi?" sed "circumducendi," scilicet ut mercede predicationis sustentaretur ab eis, nec tamen deinceps foret inter eos ulterius carnale coniugium. Gratian. Hinc et illud Gregorii in dialogo: "Presbiter quidam" require infra. §. 1. Ut igitur ex his auctoritatibus apparet, sacerdotes, uxoribus, quas in laicali habitu uel in minoribus ordinibus constituti sibi legitime copularunt, necessaria subministrare, debita uero reddere non ualent. IV. Pars. §. 2. Sed obicitur illud Tripartitae ystoriae: [libro II. capite 14.]

C. XII. At the persuasion of Paphnutius, the Nicene Synod did not establish that priests should not sleep with their wives.

The Nicene Synod, wishing to correct the life of men dwelling in the churches, set down laws that we call canons. In their discussion it seemed to certain persons that a law should be introduced so that bishops, priests, deacons, and subdeacons should not sleep with the spouses whom they had taken before consecration. But Paphnutius the confessor, rising, contradicted them; confessing marriage honorable and saying that intercourse with one's own spouse was chastity, he persuaded the council not to set down such a law, asserting that the matter was grave and would furnish an occasion of fornication either to them or to their wives. Paphnutius indeed explained this although he was inexperienced in marriage, and the synod praised his judgment and sanctioned nothing on this part, but permitted this to the will, not the necessity, of each person.

> C. XII. Dissuasu Pahfnucii Nicena sinodus non constituit, ne presbiteri cum suis uxoribus dormirent.
> Nicena sinodus uolens corrigere uitam hominum in ecclesiis commorantium, posuit leges, quas canones uocamus, in quorum tractatu uidebatur aliquibus introducere legem, ut episcopi, presbiteri, diaconi, subdiaconi cum coniugibus, quas ante consecrationem duxerunt non dormirent. Surgens autem Pahfnucius confessor contradixit, honorabiles confessus nuptias, et castitatem dicens esse cum propria coniuge concubitum, suasitque concilio, ne talem ponerent legem, grauem esse asserens causam, que aut ipsis aut eorum iugalibus occasio fornicationis existeret. Et hoc quidem Pahfnucius (licet nuptiarum esset inexpertus) exposuit, sinodusque laudauit sententiam eius, et nichil ex hac parte sanciuit, sed hoc in uniuscuiusque uoluntate, non necessitate permisit.

C. XIII. Priests are to abstain from the embrace of their wives not perpetually but at the time of oblation.

Likewise the Sixth Synod [c. 13]. Since we have learned that it is handed down in the order of the Roman canon that those who have been ordained deacons or priests profess that they are no longer to be joined to their wives, we, following the ancient canon of apostolic diligence and constitution, wish the lawful marriages of sacred men to remain valid henceforth, in no way dissolving their marriages with their wives or depriving them of familiarity with one another at an opportune time. Therefore, whoever is found worthy of ordination as subdeacon, deacon, or priest is in no way to be prohibited from ascending to such a grade because of cohabitation with his wife; nor are they to be compelled at the time of their ordination to profess that they ought to abstain from familiarity with a lawful wife. Likewise: §1. Those who minister at the altar ought to be continent in all things at the time of the oblation of the sacred things, so that they may be able to obtain from God the things they simply ask. §2. Therefore, if anyone has presumed, contrary to the apostolic canons, to deprive any priest or deacon of contact and communion with his lawful wife, let him be deposed. §3. Likewise, let a priest or deacon who casts out his wife for the sake of religion be excommunicated; but if he persists in this, let him be deposed. GRATIAN. This, however, is to be understood according to place. For the eastern Church, for which the Sixth Synod prescribed the rule of living, did not receive a vow of chastity among ministers of the altar. Hence Pope Stephen says [in the first action of the synod gathered by him in the Lateran Basilica]:

C. XIII. Non in perpetuum, sed tempore oblationis a complexu suarum uxorum sacerdotes abstineant.

Item VI. Sinodus. [cap. 13.] Quoniam in Romani ordine canonis esse traditum cognouimus, eos, qui ordinati sunt diaconi uel presbiteri, confiteri, quod iam non suis copulentur uxoribus: antiquum sequentes canonem apostolicae diligentiae et constitucionis, sacrorum uirorum legales nuptias amodo ualere uolumus, nullo modo cum uxoribus suis eorum conubia dissoluentes, aut priuantes eos familiaritate ad inuicem in tempore oportuno. Quicumque ergo dignus inuentus fuerit subdiaconali ordinatione, aut diaconali, aut sacerdotali, hi nullo modo prohibeantur ad talem ascendere gradum pro uxoris suae cohabitatione; nec in tempore ordinationis suae profiteri cogantur, quod abstinere debeant a legalis uxoris familiaritate. Item: §. 1. Oportet eos, qui altari ministrant, in tempore oblationis sanctorum continentes esse in omnibus, ut a Deo possint consequi que simpliciter postulant. §. 2. Si quis igitur presumpserit contra apostolicos canones aliquos presbiterorum, diaconorum priuare a contactu et communione legalis uxoris suae, deponatur. §. 3. Similiter et presbiter aut diaconus, qui religionis causa uxorem suam expellit, excommunicetur; si uero in hoc permanserit, deponatur. Gratian. Hoc autem ex loco intelligendum est. Orientalis enim ecclesia, cui VI. sinodus regulam uiuendi prescripsit, uotum castitatis in ministris altaris non suscepit. Unde Stephanus papa ait: [in I. actione Sinodi, ab ipso in basilica Lateranensi congregatae]

C. XIV. The western, not the eastern Church offered the vow of chastity.

Part V. The tradition of the eastern churches is one thing, and that of this holy Roman Church another. For their priests, deacons, and subdeacons are joined in marriage; but in this Church, or among the western churches, no priest from subdeacon up to bishop has license to obtain marriage.

Part VI. GRATIAN. Likewise, the chapter of Nicholas is considered according to place, because the nation of the Bulgarians, newly converted to the faith, had not yet learned to assume in its entirety the resolve of sacred religion. §1. As for the fact that in c. 6 of the synod a priest held in unlawful marriage is punished, second marriages are to be understood as unlawful, from which every priest ought by canonical authority to be immune. That passage of the Council of Gangra, however—"If anyone makes a distinction against a married priest," etc.—is similarly to be understood either as handed down locally or as calling him married by the woman whom he had taken before the time of his ordination. §2. That passage of Pope Martin too—"If a subdeacon takes a second wife"—is to be understood no differently. For he is permitted to have a first wife before the subdiaconate, and after she has died or professed chastity, he is promoted to the subdiaconate. But after being promoted, if he desires a second marriage, he will be subject to the sentence of Pope Martin.

> V. Pars. Aliter se habet orientalium ecclesiarum traditio, aliter huius sanctae Romanae ecclesiae. Nam eorum sacerdotes, diaconi atque subdiaconi matrimonio copulantur; istius autem ecclesiae uel occidentalium nullus sacerdotum a subdiacono usque ad episcopum licentiam habet coniugium sortiendi. VI. Pars. Gratian. Similiter et capitulum Nicolai ex loco consideratur, quia gens Bulgarorum nouiter conuersa ad fidem propositum sacrae religionis ex integro assumere nondum didicerat. §. 1. Quod autem in c. VI. sinodi presbiter non legitimis nuptiis detentus punitur, non legales nuptiae secundae intelligendae sunt, a quibus auctoritate canonica quilibet sacerdos debet esse inmunis. Illud autem Gangrensis concilii: "Si quis discernit presbiterum coniugatum, etc." similiter intelligendum est uel localiter traditum, uel coniugatum ab ea appellatum, quam ante tempus suae ordinationis duxerat. §. 2. Illud quoque Martini papae: "Si subdiaconus secundam duxerit uxorem," non dissimiliter intelligendum est. primam enim uxorem ante subdiaconatum habere permittitur, qua defuncta uel castitatem professa promouetur iste ad subdiaconatum. Promotus autem, si secundas desiderauerit nuptias, sententiae Martini Papae subiacebit.

Distinction XXXII

GRATIAN. Part I. Continence is therefore to be observed by all established in sacred orders. Hence Pope Leo [to Anastasius, epistle LXXXII, cc. 3 and 4] says:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Seruanda est ergo continentia ab omnibus in sacris ordinibus constitutis. Unde Leo Papa [ad Anastasium epist. LXXXII. cap. 3. et 4.] ait:

C. I. Carnal marriage is not conceded even to subdeacons.

Since the selection of priests is so excellent that those things which in other members of the Church are not accounted as fault are nevertheless held illicit in them. For although it is free for those established outside the order of clerics to devote themselves to the partnership of marriage and the procreation of children, nevertheless, for displaying the purity of perfect continence, not even carnal marriage is conceded to subdeacons, so that both those who have wives may be as though not having them, and those who do not have wives may remain single. If it is worthy that this be guarded in this order, which is fourth from the head, how much more is it to be observed in the first, second, or third, lest anyone should be considered suitable either for Levitical or priestly honor or for episcopal excellence who is discovered not yet to have restrained himself from the pleasure of lust.

[PALEA.

C. I. Neque etiam subdiaconis conubium conceditur.

Cum sacerdotum tam excellens est electio, ut hec, que in aliis membris ecclesiae non uocantur ad culpam in illis tamen habeantur illicita. Cum enim extra clericorum ordinem constitutis nuptiarum societati et filiorum procreationi studere sit liberum, ad exhibendam tamen perfectae continentiae puritatem nec subdiaconibus carnale quidem conubium conceditur, ut et qui habent sint tamquam non habentes, et qui non habent permaneant singulares. Quod si in hoc ordine, qui quartus extat a capite, dignum est custodiri, quanto magis in primo, uel secundo tertioue seruandum est, ne aut leuitico aut presbiterali honore, aut episcopali excellentia quisquam idoneus existimetur qui se a uoluptate luxuriae nec dum refrenasse detegitur.

[PALEA.

C. II. Likewise Gregory to Leo, bishop of Catania, Book III, epistle 34.

We have learned from the report of many that this custom was maintained among you long ago, that subdeacons lawfully mingled with their wives. Lest anyone presume this again, it was prohibited in this manner by Servusdei, deacon of our see, by the authority of our predecessor: that at that time those who had already been joined to wives should choose one of two things, that is, either abstain from their wives or certainly in no way presume to minister. And as is said, Speciosus, then a subdeacon, on account of this matter suspended himself from the office of administration and, until the time of his death, indeed discharged the office of notary and ceased from the ministry that a subdeacon ought to have displayed. And after some things: §1. But henceforth let your fraternity be altogether solicitous that, concerning those who happen now to be promoted to this office, it especially inspects this diligently, lest, if they have wives, they obtain license to mingle with them; but let it establish by its own strictness that, after the likeness of the apostolic see, they are nevertheless to observe all things.]

C. II. Item Gregorius Leoni Episcopo Catinensi, libro III. epistola 34.

Multorum relatione comperimus, hanc apud uos olim consuetudinem tenuisse, ut subdiaconi suis licite miscerentur uxoribus. Quod ne denuo quisquam presumeret a Seruo dei sedis nostrae diacono ex auctoritate nostri decessoris est isto modo prohibitum, ut eodem tempore ii, qui iam uxoribus fuerant copulati, unum e duobus eligerent, id est, aut a suis uxoribus abstinerent, aut certe ministrare nulla ratione presumerent. Et quantum dicitur, Speciosus tunc subdiaconus pro hac re ab administrationis se suspendit offitio, et usque in obitus sui tempus notarii quidem gessit offitium, et a ministerio, quod subdiaconum oportuerat exhibere, cessauit. Et post aliqua: §. 1. De cetero uero fraternitas tua sit omnino sollicita, ut quos ad hoc iam offitium contigerit promoueri, hoc quam maxime diligenter inspiciat, ne si uxores habent, miscendi se cum eis licentia potiantur, sed ad similitudinem sedis apostolicae eos cuncta obseruare sua nichilominus districtione constituat.]

C. III. Those established outside sacred orders are to take wives and receive stipends from the Church.

Likewise Gregory to Augustine, bishop of the English [c. 2, to the second question]. But if there are any clerics established outside sacred orders who cannot remain continent, they ought to take wives and receive their stipends outside, because we also know it to have been written concerning those same fathers that it was divided to each one according as each had need. Therefore thought and provision are to be made concerning their stipend, and they are to be held under the ecclesiastical rule so that they may live with good morals, be vigilant in singing psalms, and, with God as author, preserve heart, tongue, and body from all illicit things.

> Item Gregorius Augustino Anglorum Episcopo. [cap. 2. ad secundam interrogationem] Si qui uero sunt clerici extra sacros ordines constituti, qui se non possunt continere, sortiri uxores debent, et stipendia sua exterius accipere, quia et de eisdem Patribus nouimus scriptum, quod diuidebatur singulis, prout cuique opus erat. De eorum ergo stipendio cogitandum atque prouidendum est, et sub ecclesiastica regula tenendi sunt, ut bonis moribus uiuant, et canendis psalmis inuigilent, et ab omnibus illicitis et cor et linguam et corpus Deo auctore conseruent.

C. IV. A subdeacon is not permitted to take a wife.

Likewise Pope Nicholas [I] to Ado, archbishop of Vienne. Concerning that cleric named Alwic, whom you say lived through the ecclesiastical orders as far as the subdiaconate, we wonder why by your authority he took a wife, since we grant no one license to take a wife, except those whom the ecclesiastical rule permits to have one.

> C. IV. Subdiacono uxorem ducere non licet.
> Item Nicolaus Papa [I.] Adoni Viennensi Archiepiscopo. De illo clerico Alwico nomine, quem per ordines ecclesiasticos usque ad subdiaconatum uixisse dicitis, cur uestra auctoritate uxorem duxerit, miramur, eo quod nulli umquam (exceptis illis, quibus ecclesiastica regula habere permittit) uxorem ducendi licentiam damus.

C. V. The Mass of a priest having a concubine is not to be heard.

Likewise Pope Nicholas [II] to all bishops. Part II. Let no one hear the Mass of a priest whom he knows undoubtedly to have a concubine or a woman secretly introduced. Hence the holy synod itself also established this chapter under excommunication, saying: "Whoever of the priests or deacons," etc., as is contained in the following c. of Alexander [II].

> C. V. Non audiatur missa presbiteri concubinam habenti.
> Item Nicolaus Papa [II.] omnibus Episcopis. II. Pars. Nullus missam audiat presbiteri, quem scit concubinam indubitanter habere aut subintroductam mulierem. Unde etiam ipsa sancta sinodus hoc capitulum sub excommunicatione statuit, dicens: Quicumque sacerdotum diaconorum etc., sicut in subsequenti c. Alexandri [II.] continetur.

C. VI. The Mass of a priest who has a concubine is not to be heard.

Likewise Alexander II. Beyond this, however, we command by precept that no one hear the Mass of a priest whom he knows undoubtedly to have a concubine or a woman secretly introduced. Hence the holy synod also established the following from its beginning under excommunication, saying: §1. Whoever among priests, deacons, or subdeacons, after the enactment of our predecessor of blessed memory, holy Pope Leo or Nicholas, concerning the chastity of clerics, has openly taken a concubine or has not abandoned one already taken, by the authority of almighty God and the authority of the princes of the Apostles Peter and Paul, we command and altogether prohibit him from singing Mass, reading the Gospel, or reading the Epistle at Mass; from remaining in the presbytery for the divine offices with those who have obeyed the aforesaid enactment; and from receiving a portion from the Church. §2. We also command and establish that those of the aforesaid orders who, obeying these our predecessors, have preserved chastity are, beside the churches as befits religious clerics, to eat and sleep together and to possess in common whatever is due to them from the Church. Then, that tithes and first fruits or offerings of the living and dead are faithfully to be rendered to the churches of God by laymen, and are to be in the disposition of the bishops; those who retain them are to be separated from the communion of the holy Church. Part III. GRATIAN. Yet the beginnings of these authorities appear to contradict Jerome, Augustine, and the others who demonstrate that the sacraments of Christ are to be shunned neither in a good nor in an evil man, as the following causa concerning simoniacs shows more fully. But Urban II, in an epistle sent to the provost of Saint Vincent, determines this contradiction, saying: §1. As to what is added in the same epistle, namely whether ordinations and the other sacraments displayed by criminals, as by adulterers, violators of religious women, or persons of this kind, are to be used, to this, I say, we reply: If they are not separated from the Church by schism or heresy, we do not deny that their ordinations and other sacraments are holy and venerable, following blessed Augustine, who upon John discusses persons of this kind as copiously as truthfully. For he says: "A good servant baptizes or an evil servant baptizes; let the one who is baptized know himself to be baptized by no one except him who gave that servant the power of baptizing." And a little afterward: "Let the dove not shudder at the ministry of evil men; let it look to the Lord's power." §2. Nevertheless our predecessors Nicholas and Gregory decreed that the faithful should abstain from the Masses of priests who are established truly to be such persons, both to take away from others the license of sinning and to recall persons of this kind to the lamentations of worthy penance. For our predecessor Gregory writes, among other things, to the dukes Rudolf and Berthold: "Knowingly receive in no way the office of simoniacs and of those lying in fornication, and, insofar as you can, prohibit such persons from the sacred ministries, as may be fitting," etc. §4. Further, as to these things that are objected to you syllogistically in the same epistle —if they are not the body and blood of Christ, and if the other things we said before do not have the effect of their power, how do they harm those performing them? But if they have it, why are they spurned if they are presumed by the unworthy?—to these things, I say, we reply thus: They indeed possess the dignities of their own power, as the aforesaid Augustine says upon John against the Donatists; but those same sacraments so greatly harm those performing or receiving them contrary to the enactments of the aforesaid pontiffs—unless perhaps death alone intervenes, namely lest anyone depart from human affairs without baptism or communion—that, I say, they are true idolaters, since both the confection of ordinations and sacraments with such persons and their knowing reception otherwise than was set forth above are vehemently prohibited by the holy canons. For Samuel the prophet says: "For to resist is as the sin of divination, and to be unwilling to acquiesce is like the crime of idolatry." These things concern evil Catholics who are within the Church. §4. But we profess that the sacraments of schismatics and heretics, since they are outside the Church, according to the traditions of the holy fathers—namely Pelagius, Gregory, Cyprian, Augustine, and Jerome—indeed have the form of sacraments but not the effect of their power, unless they themselves, or those initiated by their sacraments, return to Catholic unity through the imposition of a hand. It is to be known, however, that the canons of the Apostles—whose authority the eastern Church uses, and the Roman Church in part—and the distinguished martyr Cyprian and eighty bishops with him call the baptism of heretics the bath of the devil. But Stephen and Cornelius, martyrs and Roman pontiffs, and the venerable Augustine in the book On Baptism vehemently reprove the same Cyprian and the aforesaid bishops for this cause, affirming that baptism celebrated in the ecclesiastical manner, whether by a heretic or schismatic, is valid; and deservedly, because there is one consideration in baptism and another in the remaining sacraments, since it is both prior in order and more necessary. For one who is about to die suddenly is aided by baptism before the communion of the Lord's body or the other sacraments, and when perhaps no Catholic is found, it is better to receive the sacrament of baptism from a heretic than to perish eternally. Siricius, Innocent, Leo, Anastasius, Gregory the Great, and the whole Catholic Church followed this judgment of the aforesaid pontiffs Cornelius and Stephen and of Augustine. Part IV. §5. Therefore the reception of sacraments from the hands of such priests is prohibited, not because they are not true as to form and effect, but because, when priests of this kind see themselves despised by the people, they are more readily provoked to penance by the blush of shame.

C. VI. Non est audienda missa presbiteri, qui concubinam habet.

Item Alexander II. Preter hoc autem precipiendo mandamus, ut nullus missam audiat presbiteri, quem scit concubinam habere indubitanter uel subintroductam mulierem. Unde etiam sancta sinodus hec a capite sub excommunicatione statuit, dicens: §. 1. Quicumque sacerdotum, diaconorum, subdiaconorum post constitutum beatae memoriae predecessoris nostri sancti Papae Leonis aut Nicolai de castitate clericorum, concubinam palam duxerit, uel ductam non reliquerit, ex parte omnipotentis Dei et auctoritate apostolorum principum Petri et Pauli precipimus et omnino contradicimus, ut missam non cantet, nec euangelium legat nec epistolam ad missam neque in presbiterio cum his ad diuina offitia, qui prefatae constitucioni obedientes fuerint, maneat, neque partem ab ecclesia suscipiat. §. 2. Precipientes etiam statuimus, ut hi predictorum ordinum, qui eisdem predecessoribus nostris obedientes castitatem seruauerint, iuxta ecclesias (sicut oportet religiosos clericos) simul manducent et dormiant, et quicquid eis ab ecclesia competit, hoc communiter habeant. Deinde, ut decimae et primitiae seu oblationes uiuorum et mortuorum ecclesiis Dei fideliter reddantur a laicis, et ut in dispositione episcoporum sint, quas qui retinuerint, a sanctae ecclesiae communione separentur. III. Pars. Gratian. Verum principia harum auctoritatum contraire uidentur Ieronimo, Augustino et ceteris, qui Christi sacramenta neque in bono, neque in malo homine fugienda demonstrant, sicut subsequens causa simoniacorum plenius ostendit. Sed Urbanus II. in epistola destinata preposito S. Vincentii hanc contrarietatem determinat dicens: §. 1. Ad hoc uero, quod subiungitur in eadem epistola, id est, utrum sit utendum ordinationibus et reliquis sacramentis a criminosis exhibitis, ut ab adulteris uel sanctimonialium uiolatoribus uel huiusmodi? ad hoc, inquam, respondemus: Si scismate uel heresi ab ecclesia non separantur, eorumdem ordinationes et reliqua sacramenta sancta et ueneranda non negamus, sequentes B. Augustinum, qui super Iohannem de huiusmodi tam copiose quam ueraciter disserit. Ait enim: "Baptizat seruus bonus, siue seruus malus: nesciat se ille, qui baptizatur, baptizari, nisi ab eo, qui dedit sibi baptizandi potestatem." Et paulo post: "Non horreat columba ministerium malorum, respiciat Domini potestatem." §. 2. Attamen decessores nostri Nicolaus et Gregorius a missis sacerdotum, quos tales reuera esse constiterit, fideles abstinere decreuerunt, et ut peccandi licentiam ceteris auferrent, et huiusmodi ad dignae penitentiae lamenta reuocarent. Scribit enim predecessor noster Gregorius Radulfo et Bertolfo ducibus inter cetera: "Offitium simoniacorum et in fornicatione iacentium scienter nullo modo recipiatis, et quantum potestis tales a sanctis ministeriis, ut oportuerit, prohibeatis," etc. §. 4. Porro ad hec, que tibi silogistice in eadem epistola obiciuntur, et si corpus et sanguis Christi non sunt, et alia, que prediximus, suae uirtutis effectum non habent, quid agentibus obsunt? quod si habent, cur spernuntur, si ab indignis presumuntur? Ad hec, inquam, respondemus ita: proprias quidem habent uirtutis dignitates, ut prefatus Augustinus ait super Iohannem contra Donatistas; sed agentibus uel suscipientibus eadem sacramenta contra prefatorum Pontificum instituta, (nisi forte sola morte interueniente, utpote ne sine baptismate uel communione quilibet humanis rebus excedat), eis, inquam, in tantum obsunt, ut ueri ydololatrae sint, cum talibus et ordinationum, et sacramentorum confectio, et aliter quam premissum est scienter susceptio uehementer a sanctis canonibus prohibeantur. Ait enim Samuel propheta: "Quoniam peccatum ariolandi est repugnare, et quasi scelus ydololatriae nolle adquiescere." Hec de malis catholicis, qui intra ecclesiam sunt. §. 4. Ceterum scismaticorum et hereticorum sacramenta, quoniam extra ecclesiam sunt, iuxta sanctorum Patrum traditiones, scilicet Pelagii, Gregorii, Cipriani, Augustini, Ieronimi, formam quidem sacramentorum, non autem uirtutis effectum habere profitemur, nisi cum ipsi uel eorum sacramentis initiati per manus inpositionem ad catholicam redierint unitatem. Sciendum uero est, quod canones apostolorum (quorum auctoritate orientalis et ex parte utitur Romana ecclesia), et insignis martir Ciprianus, et LXXX. episcopi cum eodem baptisma hereticorum lauacrum diaboli appellant. Stephanus uero et Cornelius martires et Pontifices Romani, et uenerabilis Augustinus in libro de baptismate, eundem Ciprianum et prefatos episcopos ob hanc causam uehementer redarguunt, affirmantes baptisma siue ab heretico siue scismatico ecclesiastico more celebratum ratum esse; et merito, quia alia in baptismo, et alia in reliquis sacramentis consideratio est, quippe cum et ordine prior, et necessarior sit. Subito enim morituro prius baptismate, quam dominici corporis communione uel aliis sacramentis consulitur, et dum forte catholicus non inuenitur, satius est ab heretico baptismi sacramentum sumere, quam in eternum perire. Et hanc sententiam prescriptorum Pontificum Cornelii et Stephani et Augustini, secuti sunt Siricius, Innocentius, Leo, Anastasius et M. Gregorius et omnis catholica ecclesia. IV. Pars. §. 5. Prohibentur ergo de manibus talium sacerdotum sacramenta suscipi, non quin sint uera quantum ad formam et effectum, sed quia, dum huiusmodi sacerdotes se a populo contemptos uiderint, rubore uerecundiae facilius ad penitentiam prouocantur.

C. VII. One who wishes to take a wife is to do this before the order of the subdiaconate.

Likewise from the Sixth Synod [c. 6]. If anyone among those who approach the clergy wishes to be joined to a woman by the law of marriage, let him do this before the order of the subdiaconate.

C. VII. Qui uxorem ducere uoluerit, ante ordinem subdiaconatus hoc faciat.

Item ex VI Sinodo. [cap. 6.] Si quis eorum, qui ad clerum accedunt, uoluerit nuptiali iure mulieri copulari, hoc ante ordinem subdiaconatus faciat.

C. VIII. Readers are either to take wives or to profess continence.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage [c. 19]. When readers reach the years of puberty, let them be compelled either to take wives or to profess continence.

C. VIII. Lectores aut uxores ducant, aut continentiam profiteantur.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [cap. 19.] Lectores cum ad annos pubertatis ueniunt, cogantur aut uxores ducere, aut continentiam profiteri.

C. IX. Subdeacons ought to observe continence.

Likewise Gregory to Boniface, bishop of Reggio [Book III, epistle 5]. We have decreed that this which we established concerning the individual subdeacons is to be observed by your subdeacons; nor are you to permit that determination of ours to be corrupted by anyone's contumacy or rashness.

C. IX. Subdiaconos continentiam obseruare oportet.

Item Gregorius Bonifatio Episcopo Regitano. [lib. III. epist. 5.] Subdiaconibus tuis hoc, quod de singulis statuimus, decreuimus obseruari, nec illam diffinitionem nostram cuiusquam contumatia sinas aut temeritate corrumpi.

C. X. Those who devote themselves to wives after the diaconate are to lack benefice and office.

Likewise Urban II in the Synod at Melfi [c. 12]. We remove from every sacred order those who after the diaconate have wished to devote themselves to wives, and decree that they are to lack the office and benefice of the Church. But if, after being admonished by the bishop, they do not correct themselves, we grant license to princes to subject their women to servitude. If, however, the bishops consent to their depravities, let them themselves be punished by interdiction from office.

C. X. Beneficio et offitio careant, qui post diaconatum uxoribus uacant.

Item Urbanus II. in Sinodo apud Melfiam. [cap. 12.] Eos, qui post diaconatum uxoribus uacare uoluerint, ab omni sacro ordine remouemus, offitio atque beneficio ecclesiae carere decreuimus. Quod si ab episcopo commoniti non se correxerint, principibus indulgemus licentiam, ut eorum feminas mancipent seruituti. Si uero episcopi consenserint eorum prauitatibus, ipsi offitii interdictione mulctentur.

C. XI. Subdeacons and those above them, if they are unwilling to be continent, are to be excluded from the dignity of their grades.

Likewise to Dominicus, patriarch of Grado. Let the impious blush and understand openly that, by the judgment of the Holy Spirit, those who, placed in the three sacred grades—priesthood, diaconate, and subdiaconate—have not cast off their women and have not lived chastely are to be excluded from the dignity of those grades. We indeed speak concerning manifest things; God, however, is the knower and judge of secret things. The same, presiding over the Synod of Meaux, says [c. 3]:

C. XI. Excludendi sunt a suorum graduum dignitate subdiaconi, et deinceps, si continentes esse noluerint.

Item Dominico Grandensi patriarchae. Erubescant impii, et aperte intelligant iudicio Spiritus sancti eos, qui in tribus sacris gradibus, presbiteratu, diaconatu, subdiaconatu positi, mulierculas non abiecerint et caste non uixerint, excludendos ab eorundem graduum dignitate. De manifestis quidem loquimur: secretorum autem cognitor et iudex est Deus. Idem Meldensi Sinodo presidens ait: [cap. 3.]

C. XII. Let no one approach sacred orders unless a virgin or of proved chastity.

Let no one be permitted to approach sacred order unless either a virgin or of proved chastity, and one who up to the subdiaconate had one wife and a virgin.

C. XII. Ad sacros ordines non accedat, nisi uirgo, aut probatae castitatis.

Nemo ad sacrum ordinem permittatur accedere, nisi aut uirgo, aut probatae castitatis, et qui usque ad subdiaconatum unicam et uirginem uxorem habuerit.

C. XIII. Those established in the three grades are to abstain even from their wives.

Likewise in the Council of Carthage [V, c. 3]. It pleased the council that bishops, priests, deacons, and subdeacons, according to the preceding enactments, are to abstain even from their wives; and unless they do so, let them be removed from ecclesiastical office. But the other clerics are not to be compelled to this, and the custom of each church ought to be observed.

C. XIII. In tribus gradibus constituti etiam ab uxoribus abstineant.

Item in Cartaginensi Concilio. [V. c. 3.] Placuit episcopos, presbiteros, diaconos subdiaconos secundum priora instituta etiam abstinere ab uxoribus: quod nisi fecerint ab ecclesiastico remoueantur offitio, ceteros uero clericos ad hoc non cogi sed uniuscuiusque ecclesiae consuetudinem obseruari debere.

C. XIV. Those established in the lesser orders may take wives unless they are prohibited by a vow and religious habit.

Likewise Leo [IX], against the epistle of Abbot Nicetas. Let us set forth in order and openly what the holy Roman Church says concerning the grades of clerics. It permits clerical ostiaries, readers, exorcists, and acolytes, if they are found outside a vow and the habit of a monk and are unwilling to profess continence, to take a virgin as wife with a priestly blessing, but not a widow or a repudiated woman, because on account of this they will thereafter be unable to be advanced to the subdiaconate. Nor can a layman, unless he has obtained a virgin as wife, or a twice-married man, be advanced to the clerical state; nor, if any of the aforesaid orders desires it, can he ascend to the subdiaconate without the consent of his wife, so that thereafter a spiritual marriage may be made from the carnal one, with no one compelling them. Nor is the wife afterward permitted to be joined carnally to the same husband or to marry anyone during his life or after his death.

C. XIV. In minoribus ordinibus constituti uxores ducant, nisi uoto et religioso habitu prohibeantur.

Item Leo [IX.] contra epistolam Nicetae Abbatis. Seriatim et aperte prosequamur, quod sancta Romana ecclesia in gradibus clericorum ait. Clericos hostiarios, lectores, exorcistas, acolitos, si extra uotum et habitum monachi inueniantur et continentiam profiteri noluerint, uxorem ducere uirginem cum benedictione sacerdotali permittit, non autem uiduam aut repudiatam, quia propter hoc deinceps nec ad subdiaconatum prouehi poterunt, nec laicus nisi uirginem sortitus uxorem aut bigamus ad clericatum, uel si quis ex prefatis ordinibus desiderat, ad subdiaconatum ascendere non potest sine consensu uxoris suae, ut fiat de carnali deinceps spirituale coniugium, nemine eos cogente. Neque permittitur postea uxor iungi eidem marito suo carnaliter, nec cuiquam nubere in uita aut post mortem illius.

C. XV. Clerics are not permitted to take a wife of another sect.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon [c. 14]. Since in certain provinces it is conceded to readers and psalmists to take wives, the holy synod established that none of them is permitted to take a wife of another sect.

C. XV. Non liceat clericis alterius sectae uxorem accipere.

Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [cap. 14.] Quoniam in quibusdam prouinciis concessum est lectoribus et psalmistis uxores ducere, constituit sancta sinodus, non licere cuiquam ex his accipere sectae alterius uxorem.

C. XVI. Women are not to dwell with clerics unless by a natural bond they exclude all suspicion.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea [c. 3]. Part V. The holy synod entirely prohibited a bishop, priest, deacon, subdeacon, or absolutely anyone who is in the clergy from being permitted to have a woman secretly introduced, unless perhaps a mother, sister, paternal aunt, or also those suitable persons who escape suspicion.

> Item Niceni Concilii. [c. 3.] V. Pars. Interdixit per omnia sancta sinodus, non episcopo, non presbitero, non diacono, non subdiacono non alicui omnino, qui in clero est, licere subintroductam mulierem habere, nisi forte aut matrem, aut sororem, aut amitam, aut etiam eas idoneas personas, que fugiant suspiciones.

C. XVII. Likewise Jerome to Nepotian concerning the life of clerics, and elsewhere.

Let the feet of women tread your little lodging either rarely or never. §1. One who is joined to the visits of women cannot dwell with God with his whole heart. §2. A woman burns the conscience of the one dwelling together with her. §3. Never discuss the beauty of women. §4. Let women know your name; let them not know your face. §5. Love in your mind a woman whom you have seen conducting herself well, not by bodily frequentation. §6. If it is good not to touch a woman, it is therefore evil to touch one.]

C. XVIII. Let a priest love his wife as a sister and flee her as an enemy.

Likewise Gregory in Book IV of the Dialogues [c. 2]. A certain priest governed the church committed to him with great fear of the Lord. From the time he received his order, loving his presbytera as a sister but guarding against her as an enemy, he did not permit her to approach him more closely; permitting her to draw near him on no occasion, he utterly cut off from her the communion of familiarity with himself. GRATIAN. The Council of Laodicea [c. 11] shows whom we ought to understand as a presbytera, saying:

> C. XVIII. Presbiter uxorem suam quasi sororem diligat et quasi hostem fugiat.
> Item Gregorius in Dialogorum libro IV. [cap. 2.] Presbiter quidam commissam sibi regebat ecclesiam cum magno timore Domini, qui ex tempore accepti ordinis presbiteram suam ut sororem diligens, sed quasi hostem cauens, ad se propius non sinebat accedere, eamque sibi appropinquare nulla occasione permittens, ab ea sibi communionem funditus familiaritatis abscidit. Gratianus. Presbiteram uero quam debeamus accipere, Laudicense Concilium [c. II.] ostendit, dicens:

C. XIX. Widows or elder women are called presbyterae.

Women who among the Greeks are called presbyterae, but among us are called widows, elder women, women of one husband, and matriculariae, ought not to be established in the Church as though ordained.

> C. XIX. Viduae uel seniores presbiterae appellantur.
> Mulieres que apud Grecos presbiterae appellantur, apud nos autem uiduae, seniores, uniuirae et matricuriae appellantur, in ecclesia tamquam ordinatas constitui non debere.

Distinction XXXIII

GRATIAN. Part I. Behold: those established in sacred orders cannot have wives, or if any are found twice-married, they cannot ascend to sacred orders. But it is asked whether one who has had a concubine besides a wife can be promoted to the priesthood. Such a person is prohibited from sacred orders by the authority of the Canons of the Apostles, in which [c. 17] it is read that it was established thus:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Ecce, quod in sacris ordinibus constituti uxores habere non possunt, uel si bigami aliqui inuenti fuerint, ad sacros ordines ascendere non ualent. Sed queritur, si quis preter uxorem concubinam habuerit, utrum in sacerdotem promoueri ualeat? Talis a sacris ordinibus auctoritate canonum Apostolorum prohibetur, in quibus [cap. 17.] sic statutum legitur:

C. I. One joined to a second marriage after baptism, or having a concubine, cannot ascend to sacred order.

If anyone after receiving sacred baptism has been joined to a second marriage or has had a concubine, he cannot be made a bishop, priest, or deacon, or be at all from the number of those who serve in the sacred ministry. GRATIAN. Those serving in the sacred ministry are understood to be subdeacons, who offer the chalice to the deacon, and acolytes, who precede deacons with candles, from which they are called candle-bearers, and who also minister to the chalice by preparing wine and water. A concubine is to be understood as in addition to a wife, so that this is the meaning of the chapter: "If anyone after receiving sacred baptism has been joined to a second marriage or has had a concubine"; a distinction is to be made whether it was before he took a wife or after the death of his wife. Hence blessed Gregory says:

> C. I. Secundis nuptiis post baptisma copulatus, aut concubinam habens, ad sacrum ordinem conscendere non ualet.
> Si quis post acceptum sacrum baptisma secundis fuerit nuptiis copulatus aut concubinam habuerit, non potest fieri episcopus, nec sacerdos, nec diaconus, aut prorsus ex numero eorum, qui ministerio sacro deseruiunt. Gratian. Deseruientes sacro ministerio intelliguntur subdiaconi, qui calicem diacono offerunt, et acoliti, qui cum cereis diacones precedunt, unde ceroferarii dicuntur, qui etiam uinum et aquam preparando calici subministrant. Concubina intelligenda est preter uxorem, ut iste sit sensus capituli: "Si quis post acceptum sacrum baptisma secundis fuerit nuptiis copulatus, aut concubinam habuerit": distinguendum est, antequam uxorem duxerit, siue post mortem uxoris. Unde B. Gregorius ait:

C. II. The husband of two matrons after baptism is not to be ordained a cleric.

We have judged that the husband of two matrons after baptism is not to be ordained a cleric; nor one who took one concubine or prostitute in marriage; nor one who, cutting himself, mutilated any member when overcome by some anger or by a just or unjust course; nor those who are convicted of having received usury or are known to have acted on the stage; nor one who bewailed mortal crimes by public penance; nor one who, having at some time been turned to fury, became insane or was tormented by diabolical affliction; nor one who, through purchase in imitation of Simon Magus, offered money.

> C. II. Duarum matronarum maritus post baptismum clericus non ordinetur.
> Maritum duarum matronarum post baptismum clericum non ordinandum censuimus; neque eum, qui unam quidem concubinam, uel meretricem in matrimonio assumpsit; nec illum, qui semetipsum abscidens quodlibet membrum indignatione aliqua uel iusto, uel iniusto tenore superatus truncauerit; nec illos qui usuras accepisse conuincuntur, aut in scena lusisse noscuntur; nec eum, qui publica penitentia mortalia crimina defleuit; neque illum, qui in furiam aliquando uersus insaniuit, uel afflictione diabolica uexatus est; neque eum, qui per emptionem ad imitationem Simonis Magi pecuniam obtulerit.

C. III. Demoniacs or epileptics are not to minister at the sacred altars.

Likewise Pope Pius. Part II. We define in common that none of those who either are dashed to the ground when seized by demons or are carried away in any manner by the assaults of an affliction may dare to minister at the sacred altars or thrust themselves without examination into the divine sacraments. An exception is made for those who, given over to bodily infirmity without passions of this kind, are proved to have been dashed to the ground; yet they too will be suspended from their office, order, and place until, over the space of one year, by the discernment of the bishop they are found to have been freed from the assault of demons.

> C. III. Arrepticii uel epileptici sacris altaribus non ministrent.
> Item Pius Papa. II. Pars. Communiter diffinimus, ut nullus de his, qui aut in terra arrepti a demonibus eliduntur aut quolibet modo uexationis incursibus efferuntur, uel sacris audeant ministrare altaribus, uel indiscusse se ingerant sacramentis diuinis, exceptis illis, qui corporum incommoditati dediti sine huiusmodi passionibus in terra probantur elisi: qui tamen et ipsi tamdiu erunt ab offitii sui et ordine et loco suspensi, quousque unius anni spatio per discretionem episcopi inueniantur ab incursu demonum liberati.

C. IV. On the same matter.

Likewise Pope Nicholas. Clerics who are known to have been possessed by demons in adolescence cannot approach a higher grade of sacred governance.

> C. IV. De eodem.
> Item Nicolaus Papa. Clerici, qui in adolescentia a demonibus cognoscuntur obsessi, ad superiorem sacri regiminis gradum accedere non possunt.

C. V. On the same matter.

Likewise Pope Gelasius [I, epistle to all the bishops established throughout Lucania, 19]. We have indeed learned that all manner of illicit things burst forth to such a degree there that it is granted to those ensnared by demons and similar passions to handle the sacrosanct ministries. If, while they are placed in this work, something of their own necessity occurs to them, which of the faithful trusts in his salvation when he has seen the ministers themselves of human healing tormented by so great a calamity? And therefore they must necessarily be removed, lest scandal be generated for any of the weak for whom Christ died. Finally, if divine law by no means permitted one wounded or perhaps disabled in body to touch the sacred things, how much more is it unfitting for those struck in mind—which is worse—to be dispensers of the heavenly gift?

> C. V. De eodem.
> Item Gelasius Papa. [I. epist. ad uniuersos Episcopos per Lucaniam constitutos, 19.] Usque adeo sane comperimus illicita queque prorumpere, ut demonibus similibusque passionibus irretitis ministeria sacrosancta tractare tribuatur. Quibus si in hoc opere positis aliquid propriae necessitatis occurrat, quis fidelium de sua salute confidit, ubi ministros ipsos humanae curationis tanta prospexerit calamitate uexari? Atque ideo necessario remouendi sunt, ne quibuslibet, pro quibus Christus mortuus est, scandalum generetur infirmis. Postremo, si corpore sauciatum fortassis aut debilem nequaquam sancta contingere lex diuina permisit, quanto magis doni celestis dispensatores esse non conuenit (quod est deterius) mente percussos?

C. VI. Those who have wives at the time of baptism are not prohibited from becoming clerics if they afterward live religiously.

Likewise Pope Innocent [I to Felix, bishop of Nocera, epistle IV, c. 4]. Part III. Laymen who were baptized while having wives and so established themselves that their reputation wavers in no respect, or who were joined to clerics or adhered to monasteries from the time they were baptized, if they have known neither a concubine nor a mistress and have been vigilant in good works, persons of this kind are not prohibited from being assumed to the lot of the clerical state. Part IV. GRATIAN. But we read that certain persons had a concubine before receiving sacred order, whom the sacred canons nevertheless do not reject if after sacred order they preserve themselves unstained from intercourse with her. Hence Gregory to Andrew, bishop of Taranto [Book II, epistle 44]:

> C. VI. Qui tempore baptismi uxores habent, si postea religiose uixerint, clerici fieri non prohibentur.
> Item Innocentius Papa. [I. Felici Episcopo Nucerino, epist. IV. c. 4.] III. Pars. Laici, qui habentes uxores baptizati sunt, ac sic se instituerunt ut in nullo opinio eorum uacillet, aut clericis iuncti sunt, aut monasteriis, ex quo baptizati sunt, adheserunt, si non concubinam, si non pellicem norunt, si in bonis operibus uigilauerint, non prohibentur huiusmodi ad clericatus sortem assumi. IV. Pars. Gratian. Ceterum ante susceptum sacrum ordinem quosdam legimus concubinam habuisse, quos tamen sacri canones non reiciunt, si post sacrum ordinem ab eius commixtione se immaculatos custodiunt. Unde Gregorius Andreae Tarentino Episcopo: [lib. II. epist. 44.]

C. VII. Concerning a certain bishop who had a concubine before the summit of his episcopate.

judgment ought not to be absolute in ambiguous matters, we choose to commit this to your conscience. For this reason, if you recall that, while established in sacred order, you were stained by intercourse with her, after laying aside the honor of the priesthood, presume in no way to approach to minister. Know that you minister at the peril of your soul and will without doubt render an account to our God if, conscious of this crime, you wish to remain in the order in which you are by concealing the truth.

> Habuisse te concubinam manifesta ueritate comperimus, et te illius criminis participationem habere de qua etiam contraria est quibusdam nata suspicio. Sed quia in rebus ambiguis absolutum non debet esse iudicium, hoc tuae conscientiae committendum eligimus. Qua de re, si in sacro ordine constitutus eius te recolis permixtione maculatum, sacerdotii honore deposito ad ministrandum nullo modo presumas accedere: sciturus in animae tuae periculo te ministrare, et Deo nostro te sine dubio reddere rationem, si huius sceleris conscius in eo quo es ordine celans ueritatem permanere uolueris.

Distinction XXXIV

GRATIAN. Part I. A bishop ought also to avoid immoderate familiarity with persons of his household. Hence Pope Nicholas to Archbishop Adalwin:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Domesticarum quoque personarum immoderatam familiaritatem episcopum uitare oportet. Unde Nicolaus papa Adaluino Archiepiscopo:

C. I. A bishop ought to avoid immoderate familiarity even with female blood relatives.

It has been intimated to our ears by the report of certain faithful persons that Bishop Lanfred, who is also said to be young, is devoted to hunting. This vice entangles very many even from the clerical catalogue—Germans and Gauls, namely—in irreverence. But this man, if the matter is as we have heard, is deservedly called young, because, occupied by youthful desires, he is restrained by no gravity. For, as blessed Jerome says, we never read of a hunter who was holy. It has likewise been reported to our apostolate concerning this bishop that he maintains immoderate familiarity with a certain daughter of his and that an evil reputation has arisen against him on this account. For this matter he has been admonished and reproved by your holiness and his other fellow bishops, but has in no way amended himself. This matter is especially displeasing in this respect and renders the opinion concerning him worse and worse: that he does not obey the reasonings of your blessedness and his fellow bishops and through disobedience falls back into the fault of the first-created man. §1. Your fraternity therefore ought to summon a synodal council with your bishops and suffragans, address this bishop with salutary words, and command him by pastoral authority to remain entirely alien from hunting any beasts or birds and altogether restrain himself from immoderate familiarity with his daughter. But if he disdains to obey and, when you admonish him both to renounce hunting and to avoid immoderate association with his daughter, delays obedience, let him depart excommunicated from your college.

But if he still appears contumacious in this, he will have to cease from the ministry.

C. I. Etiam consanguinearum inmoderatam familiaritatem uitare episcopum oportet.

Quorumdam relatione fidelium nostris auribus intimatum est, quod Lanfredus episcopus, qui et iuuenis esse dicitur, uenationi sit deditus, quod uitium plurimos etiam de clericali catalogo, genere dumtaxat Germanos et Gallos, irreuerentes implicat. Verum iste (si ita est, ut audiuimus) merito iuuenis dicitur, qui iuuenilibus desideriis occupatus nulla grauitate constringitur. Nam (ut B. dicit Ieronimus) uenatorem numquam legimus sanctum. Nichilominus autem de hoc episcopo relatum est apostolatui nostro, quod cum quadam filia sua immoderatam teneat familiaritatem, et ob id mala fama ei orta sit, pro qua re a sanctitate tua ceterisque coepiscopis suis ammonitus atque correptus est, sed nullatenus emendatus; que res in hoc maxime displicet, et magis ac magis de se deteriorem reddit opinionem, in quo beatitudini tuae et coepiscoporum suorum rationibus non obedit, et per inobedientiam in culpam protoplasti relabitur. §. 1. Oportet ergo fraternitatem tuam sinodale cum episcopis et suffraganeis tuis conuocare concilium, et hunc salutaribus eloquiis episcopum conuenire, atque illi pastorali auctoritate precipere, quatenus ab omnium bestiarum uel uolucrum uenatione penitus alienus existat, atque ab inmoderata filiae suae familiaritate semet omnino coherceat. Quod si parere contempserit, et tam pro uenationis declinatione quam pro inmoderata filiae suae conuersatione uitanda uobis ammonentibus obedire distulerit, a uestro collegio excommunicatus abscedat.

Quod si in hoc adhuc contumax apparuerit, a ministerio cessare debebit.

C. III.

We prohibit all servants of God from hunts and woodland wanderings with dogs and from having hawks or falcons.] Part II. GRATIAN. A concubine here, however, is understood as a woman who, in the absence of legal instruments, has been united and is taken with marital affection; affection makes her a spouse, while the law names her a concubine. Concerning her it is said in the Council of Toledo [I, c. 17]:

C. III.

Omnibus seruis Dei uenationes et siluaticas uagationes cum canibus, et ut accipitres aut falcones habeant interdicimus.] II. Pars. Gratian. Concubina autem hic ea intelligitur, que cessantibus legalibus instrumentis unita est, et coniugali affectu asciscitur; hanc coniugem facit affectus, concubinam uero lex nominat. De hac dicitur in Concilio Tolletano: [I. c. 17.]

C. IV. One who does not have a wife is permitted to have a concubine in her place.

One who does not have a wife and has a concubine in place of a wife is not to be repelled from communion, provided that he is content with union with one woman, either a wife or a concubine.

> C. IV. Qui non habet uxorem, loco illius concubinam licet habere.
> Is, qui non habet uxorem, et pro uxore concubinam habet, a communione non repellatur: tamen ut unius mulieris, aut uxoris aut concubinae, sit coniunctione contentus.

C. V. On the same matter.

Likewise Isidore, On the Difference of the Old and New Testaments. A Christian is permitted to have, I shall not say many women, but not even two at the same time; only one wife, or certainly in place of a wife, if a spouse is lacking, one concubine.

C. VI. From the sayings of Augustine in Book VII of the Homilies, homily 49.

Hear, most beloved members of Christ and sons of mother Catholic Church! Let penitents hear what I say to the competent and faithful. What I say to the faithful I say also to the competent and the penitents. Let the catechumens hear; let all hear; let all fear; let no one despise it. Let your hearing be a consolation to me, lest my grief be a testimony against you. I say to the competent: you are not permitted to fornicate; let your wives suffice for you. Let God hear if you are deaf; let the angels hear if you despise it. You are not permitted to have concubines; and if you do not have wives, you will nevertheless not be permitted to have concubines whom you afterward dismiss and take wives. So much greater will your condemnation be if you wish to have wives and concubines.]

Part III. GRATIAN. But if she was not a concubine of this kind and the age of the man in question is recognized to remove the suspicion of future incontinence, by apostolic concession he can be advanced to the order of the diaconate. Hence Pope Pelagius writes to Bishop Florentinus:

> C. VI. Ex dictis Augustini in libro VII. homiliarum, homilia 49.
> Audite carissimi membra Christi et matris catholicae ecclesiae filii! Quod dico competentibus et fidelibus audiant penitentes. Quod dico fidelibus, dico et competentibus, et penitentibus. Audiant catecumini, audiant omnes, omnes timeant, nemo contempnat; sit mihi in consolationem uester auditus, ne uobis sit in testimonium dolor meus. Competentibus dico, fornicari uobis non licet, sufficiant uobis uxores; audiat Deus, si uos surdi estis, audiant angeli, si uos contempnitis. Concubinas uobis habere non licet; et si non habetis uxores, tamen non licebit uobis habere concubinas, quas postea dimittatis et ducatis uxores, tanto magis dampnatio uobis erit, si uolueritis habere uxores et concubinas.] III. Pars. Gratian. Ceterum, si non talis concubina fuerit, et etas illius, de quo agitur, futurae incontinentiae suspicionem auferre dignoscitur, apostolica concessione ad ordinem diaconatus prouehi potest. Unde Pelagius Papa scribit Florentino Episcopo:

C. VII. One who had children by a female slave after the death of his wife is permitted to become a deacon.

Having received the report of your fraternity, we learned that the bearer of it had indeed not experienced a second marriage, yet you indicated that he had not preserved chastity toward his former marriage. And although there are many things that the authority of canonical sublimity commands to be observed in cases of this kind, nevertheless, because the deficiency of our time, in which not only the merits but the very bodies of men have failed, does not permit the censure of that strictness to remain, and the age of the man in question is recognized to remove the suspicion of future incontinence, know that we have conceded that he can be advanced to the order of the diaconate. §1. But we command that Micina, his female slave, by whom he confessed that he had children after the passing of his wife, be handed over under your direction to any monastery to profess continence. GRATIAN. This is from a dispensation of mercy; but that passage of the Council of Orléans is understood from the rigor of discipline:

> C. VII. Qui post mortem uxoris de ancilla filios habuerit diaconus fieri permittitur.
> Fraternitatis tuae relatione suscepta, eius latorem secundas quidem nuptias expertum non fuisse didicimus, castitatem tamen eum priori non seruasse coniugio designasti. Et quamuis multa sint, que in huiusmodi casibus obseruari canonicae iubeat sublimitatis auctoritas: tamen quia defectus nostri temporis, quibus non solum merita, sed corpora ipsa hominum defecerunt, districtionis illius non patitur manere censuram, et etas istius, de quo agitur, futurae incontinentiae suspicionem auferre dignoscitur, ut ad diaconatus ordinem possit prouehi, concessisse nos noueris. §. 1. Micinam uero ancillam eius, de qua se post uxoris transitum filios habere confessus est, iubemus, ut tua dispositione cuicumque monasterio continentiam professura tradatur. Gratian. Hoc ex dispensatione misericordiae; ceterum ex rigore disciplinae intelligitur illud Aurelianensis Concilii:

C. VIII. One who has known another woman besides his wife is not to be admitted to the clergy.

If any layman after his wife has known another woman of any condition, let him in no way be admitted to the clergy. Part IV. GRATIAN. Therefore, what is written concerning a mistress and prostitute in Gregory and Innocent is believed to have been established because of the expectation of future incontinence, because one who does not fear to stain himself by illicit intercourse preserves continence with difficulty. Or one who has known a mistress or prostitute with marital affection is prohibited from being ordained, either because, having been corrupted, she had lost the flower of virginity, or because she does not cease to prostitute herself although she is taken as wife. For either impediment prevents anyone from being able to attain sacred orders. Hence Pope Hilary [in the Roman Synod, c. 2] writes, saying:

> C. VIII. Non admittatur ad clerum, qui preter uxorem aliam cognouerit.
> Si quis de laicis post uxorem suam aliam cuiuscumque conditionis cognouerit mulierem, in clerum nullatenus admittatur. IV. Pars, Gratian. Quod ergo de pellice et meretrice apud Gregorium et Innocentium scribitur, propter spem futurae incontinentiae constitutum esse creditur, quia difficile continentiam seruat, qui se illicito concubitu maculare non metuit. Vel prohibetur ordinari, qui pellicem uel meretricem cognouerit maritali affectu, uel quia corrupta florem uirginitatis amiserat uel quia meretricari non desinit, licet in uxorem ducatur. Utrumque enim inpedimentum cuilibet prestat, quo minus ad sacros ordines pertingere ualeat. Unde Ylarius papa [in Sinodo Romana, cap. 2.] scribit, dicens:

C. IX. One who did not take a virgin as wife is not to approach sacred orders.

Care is therefore first to be taken that no one who did not take a virgin as wife should aspire to sacred orders, as was prescribed above in the earlier acts.

> C. IX. Qui uirginem non duxit uxorem, ad sacros ordines non accedat.
> Curandum ergo inprimis est, ne ad sacros ordines (sicut gestis prioribus ante prescriptum est) quisquam, qui uxorem uirginem non duxerit, aspiret.

C. X. A twice-married man, a penitent, one impaired in body, one ignorant of letters, or one bound to the curia or to a condition is not to be made a cleric.

Likewise Gregory, prelate of the city of Rome, to the bishop of Squillace [Book II, epistle 25]. We command you never to perform illicit ordinations or permit a twice-married man, one who did not obtain a virgin as wife, one ignorant of letters, one impaired in any part of the body, a penitent, or one bound to the curia or to any condition to approach sacred orders. But if you find any persons of this kind, do not dare to promote them.

> C. X. Bigamus, uel penitens, corpore uitiatus, litteras ignorans, curiae uel conditioni obnoxius, clericus non fiat.
> Item Gregorius urbis Romae Presul Scillacino Episcopo. [lib. II. epist. 25.] Precipimus, ne umquam illicitas ordinationes facias, nec bigamum aut qui uirginem sortitus non est uxorem, aut ignorantem litteras, uel qualibet parte corporis uitiatum, uel penitentem, uel curiae aut cuilibet conditioni obnoxium, ad sacros ordines permittas accedere: sed si quos huiusmodi repereris, non audeas promouere.

C. XI. One whose wife is plainly established to have committed adultery is not to be made a priest.

Likewise in the Council of Neocaesarea [c. 8]. If anyone's wife is plainly proved to have committed adultery while he was a layman, he cannot be admitted to ecclesiastical ministry. But if she committed adultery when he was already established in the clerical state, he ought to dismiss her after giving a repudiation. But if he wishes to retain her companionship, he cannot enjoy the ministry he received.

> C. XI. Non fiat sacerdos, cuius euidenter uxorem constat adulterium admisisse.
> Item in Neocesariensi Concilio. [cap. 8.] Si cuius uxorem adulterium commisisse, cum esset laicus, euidenter fuerit comprobatum, hic ad ministerium ecclesiasticum admitti non potest. Quod si in clericatu eo iam constituto adulterauit, dato repudio dimittere eam debet. Si uero retinere eius consortium uelit, non potest suscepto ministerio perfrui.

C. XII. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin. If the wife of a layman has been caught in adultery, a man of this kind is in no way to be brought to ecclesiastical ministry. But if the wife of any cleric commits adultery after his ordination, let him dismiss her. If, however, he wishes to remain with her, let him be excluded from the ministry. GRATIAN. By the foregoing authorities, twice-married men and those who did not obtain virgins as wives are prohibited from sacred orders. But it is asked: if anyone before baptism took a widow as wife, is he on that account to be prohibited from sacred orders? Concerning these things Pope Innocent writes thus to Victricius, bishop of Rouen [epistle II, cc. 5 and 6]:

> C. XII. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Martini papa. Si laici uxor in adulterio fuerit deprehensa, hic talis ad ministerium ecclesiasticum nullo modo adducatur. Si autem post ordinationem alicuius clerici uxor adulterata fuerit, dimittat eam. Si autem cum ipsa uoluerit permanere, a ministerio alienus sit. Gratian. Premissis auctoritatibus bigami et qui uirgines non sunt sortiti uxores a sacris ordinibus prohibentur. Sed queritur, si quis ante baptisma uiduam duxerit uxorem, an propterea sit prohibendus a sacris ordinibus? De his ita scribit Innocentius Papa Victricio Rotomagensi Episcopo: [epist. II. cap. 5. et 6.]

C. XIII. One who took a widow as wife, whether before or after baptism, is not to be admitted to the clergy.

If anyone, although a layman, took a widow as wife, whether before baptism or after baptism, let him not be admitted to the clergy, because he appears excluded by the same defect. For crimes are forgiven in baptism; the partnership of a wife already received is not relaxed. §1. But if the woman taken before baptism is not thought to be counted as a wife, then neither are the children begotten before baptism to be held as children. GRATIAN. Twice-married men are also prohibited from every order of the clerical state, according to that passage of Ambrose [epistle LXXXII] to the people of Vercelli:

> C. XIII. Qui ante baptisma, seu post baptisma uiduam uxorem duxerit, non admittatur ad clerum.
> Si quis uiduam (licet laicus) duxerit uxorem, siue ante baptismum, siue post baptismum, non admittatur ad clerum, quia eodem uitio uidetur exclusus. In baptismate enim crimina dimittuntur, non acceptae uxoris consortium relaxatur. §. 1. Quod si non putatur uxor esse computanda, que ante baptismum ducta est, ergo nec filii, qui ante baptismum geniti sunt, pro filiis habeantur. Gratian. Prohibentur etiam bigami a quolibet ordine clericatus, iuxta illud Ambrosii [epist. LXXXII.] ad Vercellenses.

C. XIV. One who obtains a second marriage is not to become a cleric.

Let us recognize that not only did the Apostle establish this concerning a bishop and priest, but the fathers also added in the deliberation of the Nicene Council that no one who had obtained a second marriage ought to be a cleric. Part V. GRATIAN. Likewise, husbands of widows, female slaves, or prostitutes cannot become clerics. Hence it is read in the Canons of the Apostles [c. 18]:

> C. XIV. Qui secunda coniugia sortitur, clericus non fiat.
> Cognoscamus, non solum de episcopo et presbitero Apostolum statuisse, sed etiam Patres in concilii Niceni tractatu addidisse, clericum quemquam non debere esse, qui secunda coniugia sit sortitus. V. Pars. Gratian. Similiter etiam uiduarum mariti, uel ancillarum, uel meretricum, clerici fieri non possunt. Unde in canonibus Apostolorum [c. 18.] legitur:

C. XV. One who takes as wife a woman bound to public spectacles, a woman cast out, or a female slave is not to become a deacon.

If anyone receives a widow or a woman cast out, or a prostitute, or a female slave, or any one of those who are bound to public spectacles, he cannot be a bishop, priest, or deacon, or from the number of those who serve in the sacred ministry. Part VI. GRATIAN. Jerome [epistle CXXVIII] to Fabiola, On the Priestly Vestment, shows who is a widow, a woman cast out, or a prostitute, saying:

> C. XV. Spectaculis publicis mancipatam, uel eiectam, uel ancillam ducens uxorem, diaconus non fiat.
> Si quis uiduam aut eiectam acceperit, aut meretricem, aut ancillam, uel aliquam de his, que publicis spectaculis mancipantur, non potest esse episcopus, aut presbiter, aut diaconus, aut ex eorum numero, qui ministerio sacro deseruiunt. VI. Pars. Gratian. Que autem sit uidua, que eiecta, uel meretrix, Ieronimus [epist. CXXVIII.] ad Fabiolam de ueste sacerdotali ostendit dicens:

C. XVI. Who is a widow, a woman cast out, or a prostitute.

A widow is one whose husband has died. A woman cast out is one who is expelled while her husband is living. A prostitute is one who lies open to the lust of many. Part VII. GRATIAN. But afterward, condescending to the deficiency of the times, Pope Martin permitted them to be established in the lesser orders, saying:

> C. XVI. Que sit uidua, uel eiecta, uel meretrix.
> Vidua est, cuius maritus mortuus est. Eiecta, que a marito uiuente proicitur. Meretrix, que multorum libidini patet. VII. Pars. Gratian. Sed postea temporum defectui condescendens Papa Martinus in minoribus ordinibus eos constitui permisit, dicens:

C. XVII. A subdeacon who takes a second wife is to be numbered among readers or ostiaries.

If a subdeacon takes a second wife, let him be held among readers or ostiaries, yet so that he does not read the Apostle. GRATIAN. Nevertheless, when necessity requires, twice-married men can be promoted as far as the subdiaconate.

Hence Pope Martin says:

> C. XVII. Inter lectores uel hostiarios deputetur subdiaconus, secundam ducens uxorem.
>
> Si subdiaconus secundam uxorem duxerit, inter lectores uel hostiarios habeatur, ita ut Apostolum non legat. Gratian. Necessitate tamen exigente bigami usque ad subdiaconatum possunt promoueri.
> Unde Martinus Papa ait:

C. XVIII. One who takes a widow as wife can become a subdeacon.

If a reader takes the widow of another as wife, let him remain in the readership, or, if there is necessity, let him become a subdeacon, but nothing above it. Likewise also if he is twice-married. Part VIII. GRATIAN. Those who are prohibited from their own marriages are also forbidden to be present at wedding banquets. Hence it is read in the Council of Agde [c. 39]:

> C. XVIII. Viduam ducens uxorem, subdiaconus fieri potest.
> Lector, si uiduam uxorem alterius acceperit, in lectoratu permaneat, aut si necessitas fuerit, subdiaconus fiat, nichil autem supra. Similiter et si bigamus fuerit. VIII. Pars. Gratian. Quibus autem propria coniugia prohibentur, interdicitur etiam nuptialibus conuiuiis interesse. Unde in Agatensi Concilio [cap. 39.] legitur:

C. XIX. Priests ought not to be present at wedding banquets.

Priests, deacons, subdeacons, or those thereafter who do not have license to take wives are also to avoid the banquets of others' weddings and not mingle with those assemblies where amorous and shameful songs are sung or obscene movements of bodies are displayed in choruses and dances, lest hearing and sight deputed to the sacred mysteries be polluted by the contagion of shameful spectacles and words. Part IX. GRATIAN. A widow, however, is to be understood as one who after the solemn covenant of marriage was separated from her husband by the intervention of death. But if before they come together they are divided from one another by fatal necessity, although she is called a wife by reason of the betrothal, nevertheless after the death of the betrothed she is not called a widow, even if she was led into his house and veiled with him; nor is anyone prohibited from sacred orders by union with her. Hence Pope Pelagius writes:

C. XIX. Nuptiarum conuiuiis presbiteri interesse non debent.

Presbiteri, diacones, subdiacones uel deinceps, quibus ducendi uxores licentia non est, etiam alienarum nuptiarum euitent conuiuia, nec his cetibus misceantur, ubi amatoria cantantur et turpia, aut obsceni motus corporum choris et saltacionibus efferuntur, ne auditus et obtutus sacris misteriis deputatus turpium spectaculorum atque uerborum contagione polluantur. IX. Pars. Gratian. Vidua uero intelligenda est, si post solempne fedus nuptiarum morte interueniente a uiro suo diuisa fuerit. Ceterum si antequam conueniant fatali necessitate ab alterutro diuisi fuerint, licet ex sponsalibus uxor sit appellata, non tamen post mortem sponsi, et si in proprio sit ducta, et cum eo uelata, uidua appellatur, nec ex eius copula a sacris ordinibus aliquis prohibetur. Unde Pelagius Papa scribit:

C. XX. One who took as wife a woman veiled with another but not married to him is not prohibited from becoming a priest.

Let no obstacle be generated in promoting the cleric Valentinus, to whom a woman who was previously veiled with another but not married to him, and who remained a virgin, was joined by a conjugal bond after the death of the betrothed with whom she had been veiled, because she received the veil a second time; for, insofar as pertains to this article, there is nothing in the canonical enactments that stands against him.

C. XX. Qui cum alio uelatam, non tamen illi nuptam, uxorem duxit, sacerdos fieri non prohibetur.

Valentino clerico, cui mulier cum alio ante uelata, non tamen illi nupta, sed uirgo permanens, post mortem eius, cum quo uelata erat sponso, coniugali est copula sociata, quia iterum uelamen accepit, nullum in promouendo generetur obstaculum, quia nichil est (quantum ad hunc articulum pertinet) quod ei de canonicis obuiet constitutis.

Distinction XXXV

GRATIAN. Part I. From which orders twice-married men are prohibited, whether those who had one wife before baptism and another after baptism are reckoned twice-married, and whether those established in sacred orders are permitted to obtain wives have been shown briefly by many authorities. §1. There follows in that apostolic description that one who is to be ordained is to "be sober," "not given to wine," which was introduced from the authority of the Old Testament. For ministers of the temple are prohibited from freely drinking wine and strong drink, lest their hearts be weighed down by drunkenness, so that their sense may always be vigorous and subtle, or because a belly heated with wine quickly foams forth into lusts. Hence Noah in drunkenness bared his thighs; wines conquered Lot, whom Sodom did not conquer. §2. The prohibition against being given to wine is to be understood not as being filled with wine once, but frequently. Hence it is also read in the Canons of the Apostles [canons 43 and 42]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. A quibus ordinibus bigami prohibeantur, et utrum reputentur bigami, qui ante baptismum habuerunt unam, et post baptismum alteram, et an liceat sortiri uxores in sacris ordinibus constitutis, multorum auctoritatibus breuiter monstratum est. §. 1. Sequitur autem in descriptione illa apostolica: "ut sit sobrius," qui ordinandus est, "non uinolentus," quod ex auctoritate ueteris testamenti introductum est. Ministri enim templi prohibentur uinum et siceram libere, ne ebrietate grauentur corda eorum, ut sensus eorum uigeat semper et tenuis sit, uel quia uenter mero estuans facile despumat in libidines. Unde Noe in ebrietate nudauit femora; Loth, quem Sodoma non uicit, una uicerunt. §. 2. Quod autem uinolentus esse prohibetur, non semel, sed frequenter uino repletus debet intelligi. Hinc etiam in canonibus Apostolorum [can. 43. et 42.] legitur:

C. I. A deacon, priest, or bishop serving drunkenness and gambling, unless they desist, are to be deposed.

Let a bishop, priest, or deacon serving gambling and drunkenness either desist or certainly be condemned. But let a subdeacon, reader, or singer doing similar things either desist or be deprived of communion. Likewise also a layman.

> C. I. Diaconus, presbiter et episcopus ebrietati et aleae deseruientes, nisi desierint, deponantur.
> Episcopus, aut presbiter, aut diaconus, aleae atque ebrietati deseruiens, aut desinat, aut certe dampnetur, Subdiaconus autem, aut lector, aut cantor similia faciens, aut desinat, aut communione priuetur. Similiter et laicus.

C. II. The eating of meat and drinking of wine are read to have been conceded after the flood and inhibited after the coming of Christ.

Likewise Jerome [Book I, Against Jovinian]. From the beginning of the creation of the human race, we neither fed upon meats, gave a repudiation, nor had our foreskins taken from us as a sign, and by this course we arrived at the flood. But after the flood, together with a giving that no one could fulfill, meats were offered to be eaten, the hardness of repudiation was conceded, and the knife of circumcision was applied, as though God's gift had created in us more than was necessary. But after Christ came at the end of the times and the Omega revealed the Alpha—that is, drew the end back to the beginning—we are neither permitted to give a repudiation, are circumcised, nor eat meats, the Apostle saying: "It is good not to drink wine and not to eat meat." For wine together with meats was dedicated after the flood.

> C. II. Esus carnium et uini potus post diluuium concessus legitur, post Christi aduentum inhibitus.
> Item Ieronimus. [lib. I. contra Iouianum.] Ab exordio conditionis humanae nec carnibus uescebamur, nec dabamus repudium, nec prepucia nobis eripiebantur in signum, et hoc cursu usque ad diluuium peruenimus. Post diluuium autem cum datione, quam nullus implere potuit, carnes ingestae sunt ad uescendum, et repudii concessa duricia, et cultellus circumcisionis est appositus, quasi Dei munus plus in nobis creauerit quam necesse est. Postquam autem Christus uenit in fine temporum, et OMEGA reuelat ad ALPHA, id est extremitatem retraxit ad principium, nec repudium nobis dare permittitur, nec circumcidimur, nec comedimus carnes, dicente Apostolo: "Bonum est uinum non bibere, et carnes non comedere." Et uinum enim cum carnibus post diluuium dedicatum est.

C. III. It is alien to a wise man to devote himself to drinking bouts and drunkenness.

Likewise from the epistles of the same. Wine is a luxurious thing and drunkenness full of reproach; but everyone who mingles with these will not be wise.

C. III. Alienum est a sapiente potationibus et ebrietatibus uacare.

Item ex epistolis eiusdem. Luxuriosa res uinum, et contumeliosa ebrietas; omnis autem, qui cum his miscetur, non erit sapiens.

C. IV. It is ignominious for a priest to abound in delicacies.

The same, on the prophet Micah [at c. 2]. The prophetic discourse describes the princes of the Church who abound in delicacies and believe that they preserve modesty amid feasts and wanton pleasures, “that they are to be cast out of spacious houses, sumptuous banquets, and foods sought with great labor because of their evil thoughts and works.” And if you wish to know where they are to be cast, read the Gospel: “into the outer darkness, namely, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth.” Is it not confusion and ignominy to preach Jesus crucified, poor and hungry, with stuffed bodies? And to bring forth the doctrine of fasts with reddened cheeks and swollen faces? If we are in the place of the Apostles, let us imitate not only their discourse but their manner of life and abstinence.

[PALEA.

C. IV. Ignominiosum est sacerdoti affluere deliciis.

Idem in Michea propheta. [ad. c. 2.] Ecclesiae principes, qui deliciis affluunt, et inter epulas atque lasciuias pudicitiam seruare se credunt, propheticus sermo describit, "quod eiciendi sint de spatiosis domibus lautisque conuiuiis et multo labore conquisitis epulis propter malas cogitationes et opera sua." Et si uis scire, quo eiciendi sunt, euangelium lege: "in tenebras scilicet exteriores, ubi erit fletus et stridor dentium." An non confusio et ignominia est Iesum crucifixum, pauperem et esurientem, farsis predicare corporibus? et ieiuniorum doctrinam rubentes buccas tumentiaque ora proferre? Si in loco apostolorum sumus, non solum sermonem eorum imitemur, sed conuersationem et abstinentiam.

[PALEA.

C. VI. On the same matter.

The same to Nepotian, On the Life of Clerics. Both the Apostle condemns a priest given to wine and the old law prohibits one. Priests who minister in the temple of God are prohibited from drinking wine and strong drink, lest their hearts be weighed down in surfeiting and drunkenness. In the Hebrew language every drink that can intoxicate is named strong drink. And below: Flee whatever intoxicates and overturns the state of the mind, just as you flee wine. "Do not," says the Apostle, "be drunk with wine, wherein is luxury." And above: Let those who serve the altar not drink wine and strong drink. Let the bride of Christ flee wine as poison. Wine and drunkenness are a conflagration.]

[PALEA.

C. VI. De eodem.

Idem ad Nepotianum, de uita clericorum. Vinolentum sacerdotem et Apostolus dampnat, et uetus lex prohibet. Sacerdotes, qui ministrant in templo Dei, prohibentur uinum et siceram bibere, ne in crapula et ebrietate aggrauentur corda eorum. Sicera hebreo sermone omnis potio nuncupatur, que inebriare potest. Et infra: Quicquid inebriat et statum mentis euertit, fuge similiter ut uinum. "Nolite, ait Apostolus, inebriari uino, in quo est luxuria." Et supra: Qui altario deseruiunt, uinum et siceram non bibant. Sponsa Christi uinum fugiat ut uenenum. Vinum et ebrietas incendium est.]

[PALEA.

C. VII. On the same matter.

Likewise Prosper, On the Contemplative Life, Book II, c. 22. It is excessive reception of wine, not its nature, that causes and nourishes luxury.]

C. VII. De eodem.

Item Prosper de uita contemplatiua, libro II. capitulo 22. Luxuriam facit et nutrit uini perceptio nimia, non natura.]

C. VIII. In paradise there was abstinence; after paradise the wantonness of eating began.

Likewise Ambrose in the sermon On Fasting. The divine oracle resounds toward the Father. On the sixth day beasts were created, and with the beasts arose the power of eating and the use of foods. Where food began, there the end of the world was made. Where it began not to know its own increases, there the divine works concerning it began to cease. By this sign it was declared that the world would be diminished through those foods through which it ceased to be increased. And below: §1. That we may know fasting is not new, he established there the first law concerning fasting. And below: Up to that point no one had known how to transgress, since the first transgression had not yet arisen. Fasting was enjoined, a law of abstinence by the Lord God; transgression of the law by the devil; fault through food, a hiding place after food; knowledge of infirmity in food, the virtue of strength in fasting. The serpent counsels gluttony; the Lord determines fasting. Thus gluttony expelled the one reigning in paradise; abstinence recalled the wandering one to paradise. And below: §2. At the beginning of the human race drunkenness was unknown. Noah first planted a vineyard; he gave it nature but did not know its power. Thus wine did not spare even its own author. But his drunkenness counsels sobriety to us. For Noah was intoxicated once. When he recognized the evil of drunkenness, he moderated his beast for a remedy; he did not pour it out for vice. §3. Before wine was discovered, however, liberty remained unshaken for all; no one knew how to exact the obedience of servitude from a sharer of his own nature. Envy of a brother's precedence had indeed already crept in, yet reverence for paternal piety still remained. Piety was injured when drunkenness was mocked. Therefore wines harm not only those whom they tempt, but even more those before whose eyes the drunken members of intoxicated persons are bared. And below: §4. We also read that Lot's daughters intoxicated their father on the mountain to which they had fled in fear of the conflagration of the Sodomites, and they dwelt in a cave. §5. Thus drunkenness was the origin of incest, the worse offspring of a most wicked mother. §6. But Abraham did not minister wines at his banquet; rather, he sacrificed a calf and displayed butter and milk even to his angelic guests. Rightly, indeed, was the material of sin absent where there was remission of sins. Finally, John announced the Lord, "neither eating bread nor drinking wine." For one who announces Christ ought to keep himself alien from every incentive of vices.

C. VIII. In paradyso abstinentia, post paradysum edendi lasciuia cepit.

Item Ambrosius in sermone de ieiunio Diuinum ad patrem resultat oraculum. Sexto die bestiae sunt creatae, et cum bestiis orta edendi potestas est et usus escarum. Ubi cibus cepit, ibi finis factus est mundi: ubi cepit sua incrementa nescire, ibi ceperunt diuina circa eum opera feriari. Quo indicio declaratum est, quod per cibos mundus haberet imminui, per quos desiit augeri. Et infra: §. 1. Ut sciamus, non esse nouellum ieiunium, primam illic legem constituit de ieiunio. Et infra: Eousque nemo preuaricari nouerat ut adhuc orta non esset, que prima est preuaricatio. Indictum est ieiunium, abstinentiae lex a Domino Deo: preuaricatio legis a diabolo; culpa per cibum, latebra post cibum; cognitio infirmitatis in cibo, firmitatis uirtus in ieiunio. Serpens gulae suadet, Dominus ieiunare decernit. Itaque gula paradyso regnantem expulit, abstinentia ad paradysum reuocauit errantem. Et infra: §. 2. In principio generis humani ignorabatur ebrietas; primus Noe uineam plantauit, dedit naturam, sed ignorauit potentiam. Itaque uinum nec suo pepercit auctori. Sed illius ebrietas nobis suadet sobrietatem. Semel enim inebriatus est Noe. Ubi malum ebrietatis agnouit, iumentum suum ad remedium temperauit, non ad uicium effudit. §. 3. Manebat autem, antequam uinum inueniretur, omnibus inconcussa libertas; nemo sciebat a consorte naturae suae obsequia seruitutis exigere. Non esset hodie seruitus, si ebrietas non fuisset. Obrepserat quidem iam fraternae prelationis inuidia, manebat tamen paternae pietatis adhuc reuerentia. Lesa pietas est, dum irridetur ebrietas. Non illis itaque solis nocent uina, quos temptant; sed etiam illis amplius, quorum oculis temulenta ebriorum membra nudantur. Et infra: §. 4. Legimus etiam, quod patrem Loth inebriauerunt filiae in monte, ad quem timentes incendium Sodomitarum confugerant, et habitabant in spelunca. §. 5. Fuit itaque ebrietas origo incesti, pessimae regeneratricis partus deterior. §. 6. At non Abraham uina in suo conuiuio ministrabat, sed immolabat uitulum, butirum et lac etiam angelis hospitibus exhibebat. Recte enim illic deerat materia peccati, ubi erat remissio peccatorum. Denique annuntiauit Dominum Iohannes, "non manducans panem, neque bibens uinum." Qui enim Christum annuntiat, ab omni uitiorum incentiuo prestare se debet alienum.

C. IX. A cleric who is established to have been drunk is to abstain from communion for thirty days.

Likewise from the Council of Agde [c. 41]. Before all things drunkenness, which is the kindling and nurse of all vices, is to be forbidden to clerics. Therefore one who is established to have been drunk is either to be removed from communion for the space of thirty days, as his order permits, or subjected to corporal punishment.

C. IX. Triginta diebus a communione clericus abstineat, quem ebrium fuisse constiterit.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [cap. 41.] Ante omnia clericis uetetur ebrietas, que omnium uitiorum fomes ac nutrix est. Itaque eum, quem ebrium fuisse constiterit, (ut ordo patitur) aut triginta dierum spatio a communione submoueatur, aut corporali subdatur suplicio.

Distinction XXXVI

GRATIAN. Part I. One who is to be ordained must also be prudent. This is to be noted against those who excuse the foolishness of priests under the name of simplicity. A bishop ought to be understood as prudent not only in skill in letters but also in the administration of secular affairs. Hence in the epistle of Pope Gelasius [to the bishops throughout Lucania, c. 18]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Oportet etiam esse ordinandum prudentem. Quod contra eos notandum est, qui sub nomine simplicitatis excusant stulticiam sacerdotum. Prudentem autem oportet episcopum intelligi non solum litterarum peritia, uerum etiam secularium negotiorum dispensatione. Unde in epistola Gelasii Papae: [ad Episcopos per Lucaniam, cap. 18.]

C. I. The illiterate and those impaired in body are not to be promoted to the clergy.

Let no one presume to promote to the clergy the illiterate or those diminished in any part of the body, because one lacking sacred letters cannot be fit for sacred offices, and the precepts of the law sanctioned that absolutely nothing defective is to be offered to God. §1. Likewise those who cut themselves.

C. I. Illitterati et corpore uitiati non promoueantur ad clerum.

Illitteratos aut aliqua parte corporis imminutos, nullus presumat ad clerum promouere, quia litteris carens sacris non potest esse aptus offitiis, et uitiosum nichil Deo prorsus offerri legalia precepta sanxerunt. §. 1. Similiter, qui se ipsos abscidunt.

C. II. Let one who is not instructed for divine service not aspire to the supreme priesthood.

Likewise Pope Zosimus [epistle to Hesychius, bishop of Salona]. Let one who has not been imbued in order with ecclesiastical disciplines and, through the approval of periods of time, instructed for divine service by no means presume to aspire to the supreme priesthood of the Church. And not only is ambition to be held ineffective in him, but his ordainers are also to lack that order which they believed they could presume contrary to the precepts of the fathers. GRATIAN. Behold: a bishop must have skill in the sacred letters. Hence in the Old Testament, among the other ornaments, the pontiff bore the breastpiece upon his breast, on which were written manifestation and truth, because manifest knowledge of the truth ought to be in the breast of the pontiff. §1. Hence also the poles by which the ark was carried were continually inserted into the rings so that, when the ark had to be carried, no delay would occur from putting the poles in, because preachers, through whom the Church is carried about, ought always to devote themselves to the sacred letters, lest they seek to learn at the time when by reason of their office they ought to teach others. §2. Hence also David first received by the grace of the Holy Spirit the gift of knowledge and afterward attained the administration of the kingdom. §3. Solomon too sought from God and obtained not riches, not long periods of this life, but wisdom. §4. Hence also the Lord first places his words in the mouth of the prophet and afterward establishes him over nations and kingdoms, saying to Jeremiah: “Behold, I have given my words in your mouth. Behold, I have established you today over nations and over kingdoms,” etc. §5. Hence Malachi also says: “The lips of the priest guard knowledge, and they seek the law from his mouth, because he is the angel of the Lord of hosts.” §6. Hence our same Savior first sat in the midst of the doctors, hearing and questioning them, and afterward began to preach, because each person ought first to learn and afterward assume the office of preaching. §7. Hence Solomon also first says, “a time for being silent,” and afterward, “for speaking,” because truth is first learned by being silent and afterward preached by speaking. §8. Hence the same Lord says: “Let one who hears say: Come.” §9. Hence also he first taught the Apostles and then sent them to preach, saying: “Be prudent as serpents and simple as doves.” Thus also after the resurrection he first opened their understanding and explained the Scriptures, and afterward said to them: “Going into the whole world,” etc. Hence, when he wished to refresh five thousand men from five loaves, first, taking the loaves, he broke them, and afterward gave them to the disciples, and finally through them set them before the crowds, because by discussing he first expounded the sacraments of the law and the prophets, afterward gave their knowledge to the disciples, and finally through them dispensed it to the faithful. §10. And hence Peter, when he wrote to the rulers of the Church, said: “Prepared to render an account to everyone asking you for satisfaction concerning that faith and hope which is in you.” §11. Hence also Paul, writing to Timothy, says: “Attend to reading, exhortation, and doctrine.” §12. From all these things it is clearly gathered that a good manner of life and uprightness of morals do not suffice for prelates unless knowledge of doctrine is added. §13. Hence priests about to enter the tabernacle were first washed in the bronze laver that Moses had made from the mirrors of the women. §14. Hence also in the Song of Songs the eyes, by which the prelates of the Church are understood, are likened to doves that sit beside the fullest streams. Hence Jerome also, on Leviticus [c. 8]:

> C. II. Ad summum sacerdotium non aspiret, qui diuinis stipendiis non est eruditus.
> Item Zosimus Papa. [epist. ad Hesychium Episcopum Salonitanum] Qui ecclesiasticis disciplinis per ordinem non est inbutus, et temporum approbatione diuinis stipendiis eruditus, nequaquam ad summum ecclesiae sacerdotium aspirare presumat; et non solum in eo ambitio inefficax habeatur, uerum etiam ordinatores eius careant eo ordine, quem contra precepta Patrum crediderant presumendum. Gratian. Ecce, quod sacrarum litterarum oportet episcopum habere peritiam: unde in ueteri testamento inter cetera ornamenta pontifex rationale ferebat in pectore, in quo scribebatur manifestatio et ueritas, quia in pectore pontificis manifesta debet esse cognitio ueritatis. §. 1. Hinc etiam uectes, quibus archa portabatur, iugiter annulis erant inserti, ut, cum archa esset portanda, nulla fieret mora de intromittendis uectibus, quia predicatores, per quos ecclesia circumfertur, sacris litteris semper debent insistere, ne tunc querant discere, cum ex offitio alios docere debeant. §. 2. Hinc etiam Dauid prius ex gratia Spiritus sancti donum scientiae percepit, et postea regni administrationem assecutus est. §. 3. Salomon quoque non diuitias, non longa tempora huius uitae, sed sapientiam a Deo petiit et inpetrauit. §. 4. Hinc etiam Dominus prius ponit uerba sua in ore prophetae, et postea constituit eum super gentes et regna, dicens ad Ieremiam: "Ecce, dedi uerba mea in ore tuo. Ecce, constitui te hodie super gentes et super regna etc." §. 5. Hinc etiam Malachias ait: "Labia sacerdotis custodiunt scientiam, et legem exquirunt de ore eius, quia angelus Domini exercituum est." §. 6. Hinc idem saluator noster prius in medio doctorum sedit, audiens illos et interrogans, et postea predicare cepit, quia prius quisque debet discere, et postea predicandi offitium usurpare. §. 7. Hinc et Salomon prius ait: "tempus tacendi," et postea: "loquendi," quia ueritas prius tacendo discitur, et postea loquendo predicatur. §. 8. Hinc idem Dominus ait: "Qui audit, dicat, ueni." §. 9. Hinc etiam prius apostolos docuit, deinde eos ad predicandum misit, dicens: "Estote prudentes sicut serpentes, et simplices sicut columbae." Sic etiam post resurrectionem prius illis sensum aperuit et scripturas explanauit, et postea dixit eis: "Euntes in mundum uniuersum, etc." Unde cum de quinque panibus quinque milia hominum uellet reficere, prius panes accipiens fregit, et postea discipulis dedit, et per eos demum turbis apposuit, quia sacramenta legis et prophetarum prius disserendo exposuit, et postea eorum scientiam discipulis dedit, et tandem per eos illam fidelibus dispensauit. §. 10. Et hinc Petrus cum rectoribus ecclesiae scriberet ait: "Parati reddere rationem omni poscenti uos satisfactionem de ea fide et spe, que in uobis est." §. 11. Hinc etiam Paulus scribens ad Timotheum ait: "Attende lectioni et exhortationi et doctrinae." §. 12. Ex quibus omnibus liquido colligitur, quod non sufficit prelatis bona conuersatio et morum honestas, nisi addatur scientia doctrinae. §. 13. Unde sacerdotes ingressuri tabernaculum prius lauabantur in labro eneo, quod fecerat Moyses ex speculis mulierum. §. 14. Hinc etiam in Canticis Canticorum oculi, per quos prelati ecclesiae intelliguntur, assimilantur columbis, que resident iuxta fluenta plenissima. Hinc etiam Ieronimus in Leuitico: [c. 8.]

C. III. It belongs to a priest to possess knowledge of the law and to devote labor not to wars but to prayers.

If anyone wishes to be a pontiff not so much in designation as in merit, let him imitate Moses; let him imitate Aaron. For what is said concerning them? That they do not depart from the tabernacle of the Lord. Moses therefore was continually in the tabernacle of the Lord. But what work did he have? Either to learn something from God or himself to teach the people. These are the two works of a pontiff: that he learn from God by reading the divine Scriptures and meditating often, or that he teach the people. But let him teach those things that he himself learned from God, not from his own heart or from human sense, but the things that the Holy Spirit teaches. §1. There is also another work that Moses does: he does not go to wars; he does not fight against enemies. But what does he do? He prays, and as long as he prays, his people conquer; if he relaxes and lowers his hands, his people are conquered and put to flight. Let the priest of the Church therefore pray continually, so that the people who are under him may conquer the invisible enemies, the Amalekites, who are the demons attacking those who wish to live piously in Christ.

C. III. Sacerdotis est legis scientiam habere, non bellis, sed orationibus operam dare.

Si quis uult pontifex non tam uocabulo esse quam merito, imitetur Moysen, imitetur Aaron. Quid enim dicitur de eis? quia non discedunt de tabernaculo Domini. Erat ergo Moyses indesinenter in tabernaculo Domini. Quod autem ei opus erat? ut aut a Deo aliquid disceret aut ipse populum doceret. Hec duo sunt pontificis opera, ut a Deo discat legendo diuinas scripturas et sepius meditando, aut populum doceat. Sed illa doceat, que ipse a Deo didicerit, non ex proprio corde uel ex humano sensu, sed que Spiritus sanctus docet. §. 1. Est et aliud opus, quod facit Moyses: ad bella non uadit, non pugnat contra inimicos. Sed quid facit? orat, et donec orat, uincit populus eius; si relaxauerit et dimiserit manus, populus eius uincitur et fugatur. Oret ergo sacerdos ecclesiae indesinenter, ut uincat populus, qui sub ipso est, hostes inuisibiles Amalechitas, qui sunt demones inpugnantes eos, qui uolunt pie uiuere in Christo.

Distinction XXXVII

GRATIAN. Part I. But it is asked whether they ought to be instructed in secular letters. Concerning these things it is written thus in the Fourth Council of Carthage [c. 16]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Sed queritur, an secularibus litteris oporteat eos esse eruditos? De his ita scribitur in Concilio Cartaginensi IV.: [cap. 16.]

C. I. A bishop is not to read the books of the gentiles.

Let a bishop not read the books of the gentiles, but those of heretics according to necessity or occasion.

C. I. Libros gentilium non legat episcopus.

Episcopus libros gentilium non legat, hereticorum autem pro necessitate aut tempore.

C. II. Priests who, leaving aside the Gospels, read comedies are reproved.

Likewise Jerome to Damasus, On the Prodigal Son [epistle CXLVI]. We see priests of God, leaving aside the Gospels and the Prophets, read comedies, sing the amorous words of bucolic verses, hold Virgil, and make in themselves a crime of pleasure that which in boys is a matter of necessity.

C. II. Reprehenduntur sacerdotes, qui omissis euangeliis legunt comedias.

Item Ieronimus ad Damasum de prodigo filio. [epist. CXLVI.] Sacerdotes Dei omissis euangeliis et propheciis uidemus comedias legere, amatoria bucolicorum uersuum uerba cantare, tenere Virgilium, et id, quod in pueris est causa necessitatis, crimen in se facere uoluptatis.

C. III. Those occupied by secular disciplines walk in vanity and obscurity of understanding.

The same [commentary on c. 4 of the epistle to the Ephesians, Book II]. Does one not appear to you to walk in vanity of understanding and obscurity of mind who is tormented day and night in the dialectical art? Who, an investigator of nature, lifts his eyes beyond heaven and sinks beyond the depth of the earth and the abyss into a certain void? Who burns over the iamb? Who studiously distinguishes and amasses so great a forest of meters in his heart? And, that I may pass to the other side, who seeks riches by right and wrong? Who flatters kings, hunts after the inheritances of others, and gathers wealth that he does not know to whom he will leave in a moment?

C. III. In uanitate et obscuritate sensus ambulant, qui secularibus disciplinis occupantur.

Idem. [ad cap. 4. epist. ad Ephesios, lib. II. comment.] Nonne uobis uidetur in uanitate sensus et obscuritate mentis ingredi, qui diebus ac noctibus in dialectica arte torquetur? qui phisicus perscrutator oculos trans celum leuat, et ultra profundum terrarum et abissi in quoddam inane demergitur? qui iambum feruet? qui tantam metrorum siluam in suo studiosus corde distinguit et congerit? et (ut ad alteram partem transeam) qui diuitias per fas et nefas querit? qui adulatur regibus, hereditates captat alienas, et congregat opes, quas in momento cui sit relicturus ignorat?

C. IV. Those who understand the sacred Scriptures badly, or misuse secular wisdom, are intoxicated with wine and strong drink.

The same, on Isaiah. Those who understand the sacred Scriptures badly and pervert them are intoxicated with wine; with strong drink, those who misuse secular wisdom and the snares of dialecticians, which ought to be called not so much bonds as phantasms—that is, certain shadows and images that quickly perish and are dissolved. The same: §1. According to the tropological sense, we ought to understand as pseudo-prophets those who receive the words of the Scriptures otherwise than the Holy Spirit sounds them, and as diviners those who, by the conjecture of their own mind, pronounce the uncertainties of future things as though true without the authority of the divine words. The same: §2. Whoever does not understand the Scriptures as the truth of the matter holds eats a sour grape.

> C. IV. Qui scripturas sacras male intelligunt, uel seculari sapientia abutuntur, uino inebriantur et sicera.
> Idem in Ysaia. Vino inebriantur, qui scripturas sanctas male intelligunt atque peruertunt: sicera, qui abutuntur seculari sapientia et dialecticorum tendiculis, que non tam uincula sunt appellanda quam fantasmata, id est umbrae quedam et imagines, que cito pereunt et soluuntur. Idem: §. 1. Secundum tropologiam pseudoprophetas eos debemus accipere, qui aliter scripturarum uerba accipiunt, quam Spiritus sanctus sonat, et diuinos eos, qui coniectura mentis suae incerta futurorum quasi uera pronuntiant absque diuinorum auctoritate uerborum. Idem: §. 2. Quicumque scripturas non ita intelligit, ut rei ueritas habet, uuam acerbam comedit.

C. V. Bishops who instruct their sons in secular letters are reproved.

The same [Book III, at c. 6], in the epistle to the Ephesians. Let bishops and priests read this, who instruct their sons in secular letters and make them read comedies and sing the shameful writings of mimes, perhaps instructing them from ecclesiastical expenditures. And that which a virgin or widow, or any poor person pouring out all his substance, had offered into the treasury for sin, the grammarian and orator turns into a New Year's gift for the Kalends, a Saturnalian present, and a Minerval gift, or into domestic expenses, temple contributions, or filthy profit. Eli himself was a holy priest; but because he did not instruct his sons in every discipline and correction, he fell backward and died.

Heretics establish all the force of their poisons in dialectical disputation, which by the judgment of philosophers is defined as having not the power of constructing but the zeal of destroying. C. VII. Blessed Jerome is beaten by an angel because he read the books of Cicero.

Likewise Rabanus, On Ecclesiastical Afflictions. We read concerning blessed Jerome that, when he was reading a book of Cicero, he was reproved by an angel because, although a Christian man, he devoted himself to the fabrications of the pagans. GRATIAN. Hence also that prodigal son in the Gospel is reproved who wished to fill his belly from the husks that the swine ate. §1. Hence Origen also understands the gnats and frogs with which the Egyptians were struck as the vain garrulity of dialecticians and sophistical arguments. From all these things it is gathered that skill in secular letters is not to be sought by ecclesiastics. §2. But to the contrary it is read that Moses and Daniel were instructed in all the knowledge of the Egyptians and Chaldeans. It is also read that the Lord commanded the children of Israel to despoil the Egyptians of gold and silver, morally instructing that, whether we find the gold of wisdom or the silver of eloquence among poets, we should turn it to the use of salutary instruction. §3. In Leviticus we are also commanded to offer to the Lord the first fruits of honey, that is, the sweetness of human eloquence. §4. The Magi too offered three gifts to the Lord, in which certain persons wish the three parts of philosophy to be understood. §5. Finally, as Cassiodorus testifies in the exposition of the Psalter, all the splendor of rhetorical eloquence, all the modes of poetic speech, and every variety of becoming pronunciation took their origin from the divine Scriptures. §6. Hence Ambrose also says upon the epistle to the Colossians: "Every principle of heavenly knowledge or of earthly creation is in him who is their head and author, so that one who knows him seeks nothing beyond him, because he is perfect power and wisdom; whatever is sought elsewhere is found perfectly here. In Daniel and Solomon he shows to the unbelievers that he is the author of all wisdom. The unbelievers do not think this because they do not read in the Gospels and Prophets astrology and other things of this kind, which are despised because they avail nothing for salvation but send persons into error, and, while they study these things, they have no care for the soul. But one who knows Christ finds the treasure of wisdom and knowledge, because he knows that which is useful." Hence Bede also says in [Book II] of Kings [c. 9, in the allegorical expositions of Samuel]:

C. VII. B. Ieronimus ab angelo uerberatur, quia Ciceronis libros legebat.

Item Rabanus de pressuris ecclesiasticis. Legimus de B. Ieronimo, quod, cum librum legeret Ciceronis, ab angelo correptus est, eo quod uir Christianus paganorum figmentis intenderet. Gratian. Hinc etiam filius prodigus ille in euangelio reprehenditur, qui de siliquis, quas porci manducabant, uentrem suum replere cupiebat. §. 1. Hinc etiam Origenes cinifes et ranas, quibus Egiptii percussi sunt, uanam dialecticorum garrulitatem et sophistica argumenta intelligit. Ex quibus omnibus colligitur, quod non est ab ecclesiasticis secularium litterarum querenda peritia. §. 2. Sed econtra legitur, quod Moyses et Daniel omni scientia Egiptiorum et Caldeorum eruditi fuerint. Legitur etiam, quod precepit Dominus filiis Israel, ut spoliarent Egiptios auro et argento, moraliter instruens, ut siue aurum sapientiae, siue argentum eloquentiae apud poetas inueniremus, in usum salutiferae eruditionis uertamus. §. 3. In Leuitico etiam primitias mellis, id est dulcedinem eloquentiae humanae Domino iubemur offerre. §. 4. Magi quoque tria munera Domino obtulerunt, in quibus nonnulli tres partes philosophiae uolunt intelligi. §. 5. Denique, ut in expositione Psalterii Cassiodorus testatur, omnis splendor rethoricae eloquentiae, omnes modi poeticae locutionis, quelibet uarietas decorae pronuntiationis a diuinis scripturis sumpsit exordium. §. 6. Hinc etiam Ambrosius ait super epistolam Colosensium: "Omnis ratio supernae scientiae uel terrenae creaturae in eo est, qui est caput earum et auctor, ut, qui hunc nouit, nichil ultra querat, quia hic est perfecta uirtus et sapientia; quicquid alibi queritur, hic perfecte inuenitur. In Daniele et Salomone ostendit infidelibus esse se auctorem totius sapientiae. Quod infideles non putant, quia non legunt in euangeliis et prophetis astrologiam, et alia huiusmodi, que despecta sunt, quia nichil ualent ad salutem, sed mittunt in errorem, et, dum his student, curam animae non habent. Qui uero Christum nouit, thesaurum sapientiae et scientiae inuenit, quia id nouit, quod utile est." Hinc etiam Beda ait in [lib. II.] Regum: [c. 9. in Samuelis allegoricis expositionibus]

C. VIII. Clerics are not to be prohibited from reading secular letters.

One who thinks that readers are to be prohibited in every way from reading all secular books disturbs their acuteness and compels it to fail; if any useful things are found in these books, it is lawful to take them as one's own. Otherwise Moses and Daniel would not have permitted themselves to be instructed in the wisdom and letters of the Egyptians and Chaldeans, although they abhorred both their superstitions and their delicacies. Nor would the teacher of the gentiles himself have inserted certain verses of the poets into his writings or sayings. Part II. GRATIAN. Why, therefore, are those things prohibited from being read that are proved so reasonably to be read? But some read secular letters for pleasure, delighted by the fabrications of the poets and the ornament of words; others learn them for instruction, so that by reading they may detest the errors of the gentiles and devotedly turn the useful things they find in them to the use of sacred instruction. Such persons laudably learn secular letters. Hence blessed Gregory did not reprove a certain bishop because he had learned them, but because, contrary to the episcopal office, he expounded grammar to the people in place of a reading from the Gospel. Hence Ambrose also writes upon Luke [in the explanation of the proem]:

C. VIII. Non prohibeantur clerici seculares litteras legere.

Turbat acumen legentium et deficere cogit, qui eos a legendis secularibus libris omnibus modis existimat prohibendos, in quibus si qua inuenta sunt utilia, quasi sua sumere licet. Alioquin Moyses et Daniel sapientia et litteris Egiptiorum Caldeorumque non paterentur erudiri, quorum tamen supersticiones simul et delicias horrebant. Nec ipse magister gentium aliquot uersus poetarum suis uel scripturis indidisset, uel dictis. II. Pars. Gratian. Cur ergo legi prohibentur, que tam rationabiliter legenda probantur? Sed seculares litteras quidam legunt ad uoluptatem, poetarum figmentis et uerborum ornatu delectati; quidam uero ad eruditionem eas addiscunt, ut errores gentilium legendo detestentur, et utilia, que in eis inuenerint, ad usum sacrae eruditionis deuote inuertant. Tales laudabiliter seculares litteras addiscunt. Unde B. Gregorius quendam episcopum non reprehendit, quia eas didicerat, sed quia contra episcopale offitium pro lectione euangelica grammaticam populo exponebat. Hinc etiam Ambrosius scribit super Lucam: [in explanatione prooemii]

C. IX. Secular letters are to be read so that they are not unknown.

We read certain things lest they be read; we read lest we be ignorant; we read not to retain but to repudiate.

C. IX. Seculares litterae legendae sunt, ut non ignorentur.

Legimus aliqua, ne legantur; legimus, ne ignoremus, legimus, non ut teneamus, sed ut repudiemus.

C. X. Grammar is to be read so that the sacred Scriptures may be understood through it.

Likewise Jerome upon the epistle to Titus. If anyone knows the grammatical art or dialectic so that he may possess a principle of speaking correctly and judge between false and true things, we do not disapprove. §1. Geometry, arithmetic, and music, however, possess truth in their knowledge, but that knowledge is not the knowledge of piety. The knowledge of piety is to read the Scriptures and understand the Prophets, to believe the Gospel, and not to be ignorant of the Apostles. §2. The doctrine of grammarians, however, can advance toward life when it has been taken up for better uses.

> C. X. Gramatica legenda est, ut per eam sacrae scripturae intelligantur.
> Item Ieronimus super epistolam ad Titum. Si quis gramaticam artem nouit uel dialecticam, ut recte loquendi rationem habeat, et inter falsa et uera diiudicet, non inprobamus. §. 1. Geometria autem et aritmetica et musica habent in sua scientia ueritatem, sed non est scientia illa pietatis. Scientia autem pietatis est legere scripturas et intelligere prophetas, euangelio credere, apostolos non ignorare. §. 2. Gramaticorum autem doctrina potest proficere ad uitam, dum fuerit in meliores usus assumpta.

C. XI. By the example of Daniel it is proved that being instructed in secular letters is not a sin.

Likewise. Those who refuse to eat from the king's table and wine lest they be polluted—assuredly, if they had known that the wisdom and doctrine of the Babylonians was a sin, they would never have acquiesced in learning what was unlawful. But they learn not to follow but to judge and convict, just as anyone who wishes to write against astrologers while unskilled in astrology lies open to ridicule, as does one disputing against philosophers if he is ignorant of the doctrines of the philosophers. They therefore learn Chaldean doctrine with the mind with which Moses too had learned all the wisdom of the Egyptians. The same: §1. If at any time we are compelled to recall secular letters and to learn some of those things that we once omitted, this is not of our will, but, so to speak, of the gravest necessity, so that we may prove that the things foretold by the holy prophets many ages before are contained in the letters of the Greeks, the Latins, and other nations.

> C. XI. Exemplo Danielis probatur, non esse peccatum secularibus litteris erudiri.
> Item. Qui de mensa et uino regis nolunt comedere, ne polluantur, utique si sapientiam atque doctrinam Babiloniorum scirent esse peccatum, numquam adquiescerent discere quod non licebat. Discunt autem, non ut sequantur, sed ut iudicent atque conuincant, quomodo si quispiam aduersus mathematicos uelit scribere inperitus matheseos, risui pateat, et aduersus philosophos disputans, si ignorat dogmata philosophorum. Discunt ergo ea mente doctrinam Caldaicam, qua et Moyses omnem sapientiam Egiptiorum didicerat. Idem: §. 1. Si quando cogimur litterarum secularium recordari et aliqua ex his discere, que olim omisimus non est nostrae uoluntatis, sed, ut ita dicam, grauissimae necessitatis ut probemus ea, que a sanctis prophetis ante secula multa predicta sunt, tam Grecorum, quam Latinorum et aliarum gentium litteris contineri.

C. XII. Let bishops establish masters and doctors in suitable places.

Likewise from the Synod of Pope Eugenius [II, c. 34]. It is reported to us concerning certain places that neither masters nor care for the study of letters is found. Therefore let all bishops exercise altogether care and diligence among the peoples subject to them and in other places where necessity occurs, so that masters and doctors may be established who continually teach the studies of letters and the doctrines of the liberal arts, because in these especially the divine commandments are manifested and explained.

C. XII Magistros et doctores episcopi congruis locis constituant.

Item ex Sinodo Eugenii Papae. [II. c. 34.] De quibusdam locis ad nos refertur, neque magistros, neque curam inueniri pro studio litterarum. Idcirco ab uniuersis episcopis subiectis plebibus, et aliis locis in quibus necessitas occurrerit, omnino cura et diligentia habeatur, ut magistri et doctores constituantur, qui studia litterarum liberaliumque artium dogmata assidue doceant, quia in his maxime diuina manifestantur atque declarantur mandata.

C. XIII. By the authorities of the gentiles their vanity is blunted and convicted.

Likewise Augustine, Against the Manichaeans [Book XIII, c. 15]. If the Sibyl, Orpheus, or other seers or philosophers of the gentiles are reported to have foretold anything true concerning God, this indeed avails something for convicting the vanity of the pagans, but not for embracing their authority. For as great as is the distance concerning the coming of Christ between the preaching of angels and the confession of demons, so great is that between the authority of prophets and the curiosity of sacrilegious persons.

C. XIII. Auctoritatibus gentilium eorum uanitas retunditur atque conuincitur.

Item Augustinus contra Manicheos. [lib. XIII. cap. 15.] Si quid ueri de Deo Sibilla, uel Orpheus, aliiue gentium uates aut philosophi predixisse perhibentur, ualet quidem aliquid ad paganorum uanitatem reuincendam, non tamen ad istorum auctoritatem complectendam. Quantum enim de Christi distat aduentu inter predicationem angelorum, et confessionem demonum, tantum inter auctoritatem prophetarum, et curiositatem sacrilegorum.

C. XIV. Skill in secular letters is necessary for understanding the sacred Scriptures.

Likewise Clement [Pope Clement I, epistle V to his disciples]. Part III. It has been reported to us that certain persons dwelling in your regions oppose sound doctrines and, as it seems to them, teach not according to the tradition of the fathers but according to their own understanding. For, as we have heard, certain ingenious men of your regions grasp many semblances of truth from the things they read. And therefore it must be diligently observed that, when the law of God is read, it should not be read or taught according to the understanding of one's own ability. For there are many words in the divine Scriptures that can be drawn to that meaning which each person voluntarily presumes for himself, but this ought not to be. For you ought not to seek an alien and foreign meaning from outside so that in any way you may confirm it from the authority of the Scriptures, but to grasp the meaning of truth from the Scriptures themselves. And therefore one must learn knowledge of the Scriptures from one who preserves it as handed down to him according to truth by his elders, so that he himself may competently assert what he rightly received. For when anyone has received from the divine Scriptures an integral and firm rule of truth, it will not be absurd if he also brings something from common instruction and the liberal studies that perhaps he touched upon in childhood to the assertion of true doctrine, yet in such a way that, where he has learned true things, he avoids false and feigned ones.

C. XIV. Ad intelligentiam sacrarum scripturarum secularium peritia est necessaria.

Item Clemens. [Papa I. epist. V. ad suos discipulos] III. Pars. Relatum nobis est, quod quidam in uestris partibus commorantes sanis doctrinis aduersantur, et prout eis uidetur non secundum traditionem patrum, sed iuxta suum sensum docere uidentur. Multas enim quidam, ut audiuimus, uestrarum partium ingeniosi homines ex his, que legunt, uerisimilitudines capiunt. Et ideo diligenter obseruandum est, ut lex Dei cum legitur, non secundum propriam ingenii intelligentiam legatur uel doceatur. Sunt enim multa uerba in diuinis scripturis, que possunt trahi ad eum sensum, quem sibi unusquisque sponte presumit; sed non oportet. Non enim sensum, extrinsecus alienum et extraneum debetis querere ut quoquo modo ipsum ex scripturarum auctoritate confirmetis, sed ex ipsis scripturis sensum capere ueritatis. Et ideo oportet ab eo scientiam discere scripturarum, qui eam a maioribus secundum ueritatem sibi traditam seruat, ut et ipse possit eam, quam recte suscepit, competenter asserere. Cum enim ex diuinis scripturis integram quis et firmam regulam ueritatis susceperit, absurdum non erit, si aliquid etiam ex eruditione communi ac liberalibus studiis, que forte in pueritia attigit, ad assertionem ueri dogmatis conferat, ita tamen, ut, ubi uera didicerit, falsa et simulata declinet.

C. XV. Why a Christian is prohibited from reading poetic fabrications.

Likewise Isidore in Book [III] of the Sentences [On the Supreme Good, c. 13]. Part IV. A Christian is prohibited from reading the fabrications of poets because through the enticements of their tales they stir the mind too greatly toward the incentives of lusts. For persons sacrifice to demons not only by offering incense, but also by receiving their sayings more willingly. Part V. GRATIAN. Thus, as appears from the foregoing authorities, lack of skill ought always to be opposed to priests, since, when those blinded by ignorance begin to provide leadership to others, both fall into the pit. Hence it is said in the Psalm: "Let their eyes be darkened so that they do not see, and bend their back always." For when those who go before are darkened, those following are readily inclined to bear the burdens of sins. Priests must therefore labor to cast ignorance away from themselves as a kind of pest. For although a servant who does not know his lord's will and does not do it is said to be beaten with few blows, this is nevertheless not understood generally concerning all. For as the Apostle says, "One who is ignorant will be ignored." This is to be understood concerning the one "who was unwilling to understand so that he might act well." Hence Augustine says in the Book of Questions [of the Old and New Testament, question 67]:

C. XV. Quare prohibetur Christianus poetica figmenta legere.

Item Ysidorus in libro [III.] Sententiarum. [de summo bono cap. 13.] IV. Pars. Ideo prohibetur Christianus legere figmenta poetarum, quia per oblectamenta fabularum nimium mentem excitant ad incentiua libidinum. Non enim solum thura offerendo demonibus immolant, sed etiam eorum dicta libentius capiendo. V. Pars. Gratian. Ut itaque ex premissis auctoritatibus apparet, inperitia sacerdotibus semper debet esse aduersa, quoniam, cum per ignorantiam cecati aliis ducatum prestare ceperint, ambo in foueam cadunt; unde dicitur in Psalmo: "Obscurentur oculi eorum, ne uideant, et dorsum eorum semper incurua." Cum enim obscurantur illi, qui preeunt, ad ferenda onera peccatorum facile sequentes inclinantur. Elaborandum est itaque sacerdotibus, ut ignorantiam a se quasi quandam pestem abiciant. Licet enim seruus nesciens uoluntatem domini sui, et non faciens, dicatur uapulare paucis, non tamen hoc de omnibus generaliter intelligitur. Ut enim ait Apostolus "Qui ignorat, ignorabitur." Quod de eo intelligendum est, "qui noluit intelligere, ut bene ageret". Unde Augustinus ait in libro Questionum: [ueteris ac noui testamenti, quaest. 67.]

[C. XVI.]

Not every ignorant person is immune from punishment. For that ignorant person who found no one from whom he could learn can be excused from punishment. But this cannot be forgiven to those who, having someone from whom they could learn, gave no effort.

> [C. XVI.]
> Non omnis ignorans est immunis a pena. Ille enim ignorans potest excusari a pena, qui quod disceret non inuenit. Illis autem hoc ignosci non poterit, qui, habentes a quo discerent, operam non dederunt.

Distinction XXXVIII

GRATIAN. Part I. Since, therefore, voluntary ignorance is harmful to everyone, it is dangerous to priests.

Hence it is read in the Council of Toledo [IV, c. 24]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Cum itaque uoluntaria ignorantia omnibus sit noxia sacerdotibus est periculosa.
> Unde in Tolletano Concilio [IV., cap. 24.] legitur:

C. I. Ignorance is especially to be avoided by priests.

Ignorance, the mother of all errors, is especially to be avoided in the priests of God, who have undertaken the office of teaching among the people of God. For priests are admonished to read the sacred Scriptures, the apostle Paul saying to Timothy: "Attend to reading, exhortation, doctrine," and: "Always remain in these things." Let priests therefore know the sacred Scriptures and the canons, and let their entire work consist in preaching and doctrine, and let them build up everyone both by knowledge of the faith and by discipline of works.

> C. I. Sacerdotibus maxime ignorantia est uitanda.
> Ignorantia mater cunctorum errorum maxime in sacerdotibus Dei uitanda est, qui docendi offitium in populo Dei susceperunt. Sacerdotes enim legere sanctas scripturas admonentur, Paulo apostolo dicente ad Timotheum: "Adtende lectioni, exhortationi, doctrinae," et: "semper permane in his." Sciant ergo sacerdotes scripturas sacras et canones, et omne opus eorum in predicatione et doctrina consistat, atque edificent cunctos tam fidei scientia quam operum disciplina.

C. II. When priests are ordained, let them receive the official book from the bishop.

Likewise from the same [Council of Toledo IV, c. 25]. When priests are ordained in parishes, let them receive the official book from their bishop, so that they may proceed instructed to the churches assigned to them, lest through ignorance they offend even in the divine sacraments themselves. But when they come to litanies or to a council, let them render an account to their bishop of how they celebrate the office they have undertaken, or baptize.

> C. II. Offitialem libellum ab episcopo accipiant presbiteri, cum ordinantur.
> Item ex eodem. [Toletano IV. c. 25.] Quando presbiteri in parrochiis ordinantur, libellum offitialem a sacerdote suo accipiant, ut ad ecclesias sibi deputatas instructi succedant, ne per ignorantiam etiam in ipsis diuinis sacramentis offendant. Cum uero ad letanias uel ad concilium uenerint, rationem episcopo suo reddant, qualiter susceptum offitium celebrent, uel baptizent.

C. III. The ignorance of priests is worthy neither of excuse nor of pardon.

Likewise Leo to the Bishops of Constantinople. If ignorance appears intolerable in laypeople, how much more in those who preside? It is worthy neither of excuse nor of pardon.

> C. III. Inscientia sacerdotum nec excusatione digna est nec uenia.
> Item Leo Episcopis Constantinopolitanis. Si in laicis uidetur intolerabilis inscientia, quanto magis in his qui presunt, nec excusatione est digna, nec uenia?

C. IV. Priests are not permitted to be ignorant of the canons.

Likewise Celestine to all orthodox Bishops. Let none of the priests be permitted to be ignorant of the canons or to do anything that can oppose the rules of the Fathers. For what worthy thing will be preserved by us if the norm of decretal constitutions is broken by license permitted to the peoples at the pleasure of others?

> C. IV. Canones non licet sacerdotibus ignorare.
> Item Celestinus omnibus orthodoxis Episcopis. Nulli sacerdotum liceat canones ignorare, nec quicquam facere, quod possit Patrum regulis obuiare. Que enim a nobis res digna seruabitur, si decretalium norma constitutorum pro aliorum libitu licentia populis permissa frangatur?

C. V. What things are necessary for priests to learn.

Likewise from the sayings of St. Augustine. The things necessary for priests themselves to learn are these: the book of the sacraments, the lectionary, the antiphonary, the baptismal book, computus, the penitential canons, the Psalter, and homilies suitable for Sundays and for the several feasts throughout the cycle of the year. If one of all these is lacking, the name of priest will scarcely stand in him, because the evangelical threats are very dangerous, in which it is said: "If the blind offers guidance to the blind, both fall into the pit."

> C. V. Que sacerdotibus necessaria sunt ad discendum.
> Item ex dictis S. Augustini. Que ipsis sacerdotibus necessaria sunt ad discendum, id est sacramentorum liber, lectionarius, antiphonarius baptisterium, computus, canones penitentiales, psalterium, omeliae per circulum anni dominicis diebus et singulis festiuitatibus aptae. Ex quibus omnibus si unum defuerit, sacerdotis nomen uix in eo constabit, quia ualde periculosae sunt euangelicae minae, quibus dicitur: "Si cecus ceco ducatum prestet, ambo in foueam cadunt."

C. VI. What one who is to be ordained bishop ought to know.

Likewise from the Seventh Synod [c. 2]. All of us who chant promise God: "I will meditate upon your justifications; I will not forget your words." It is indeed most salutary for all Christians to observe this, but especially for those who have obtained ecclesiastical dignity. Hence we determine that everyone who is to be advanced to the grade of the episcopate must by all means know the Psalter, so that from this all the clergy who will be under him may also be admonished and imbued. Let him, however, be diligently examined by the metropolitan as to whether he is ready to read searchingly and not cursorily both the sacred canons and the holy Gospel, as well as the book of the divine Apostle and all divine Scripture, and to conduct himself according to the commandments and teach the people committed to him. For the substance of our high priesthood is the divinely handed-down utterances, that is, the true discipline of the divine Scriptures, as the great Dionysius declares. But if he has objected and has by no means promised that he will willingly do and teach in this way, let him under no circumstances be consecrated. For God says prophetically: "You have rejected knowledge, and I will reject you, so that you do not exercise the priesthood for me."

C. VI. Que oportet scire eum, qui episcopus est ordinandus.

Item ex VII. Sinodo. [cap. 2.] Omnes psallentes repromittimus Deo: "In iustificationibus tuis meditabor, non obliuiscar sermones tuos." Quod omnes quidem Christianos obseruare saluberrimum est, sed precipue hos, qui ecclesiasticam consecuti sunt dignitatem. Unde diffinimus omnem, qui ad episcopatus prouehendus est gradum, modis omnibus psalterium nosse, ut ex hoc etiam omnis clerus, qui sub eo fuerit, ita moneatur et inbuatur. Inquiratur autem diligenter a metropolitano, si in promtu habeat legere scrutabiliter et non transitorie tam sacros canones et sanctum euangelium, quam diuini Apostoli librum et omnem diuinam scripturam atque secundum mandata conuersari, et docere populum sibi commissum. Substantia enim summi sacerdotii nostri sunt eloquia diuinitus tradita, id est uera diuinarum scripturarum disciplina, quemadmodum magnus perhibet Dionisius. Quod si disceptauerit, et ita libenter facere et docere minime spoponderit, nullatenus consecretur. Ait enim prophetice Deus: "Tu scientiam repulisti, et ego repellam te, ne sacerdotio fungaris michi."

C. VII. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage [c. 3]. It was resolved that, when bishops or clerics have been ordained, their ordainers should first impress the decrees of the councils upon their ears, lest they come to regret having done something against the statutes of the council.

C. VII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 3.] Placuit, ut ordinatis episcopis uel clericis prius ab ordinatoribus suis decreta conciliorum auribus eorum inculcentur, ne se aliquid contra statuta concilii fecisse peniteat.

C. VIII. Those adhering to sacred Scripture are not obscured by worldly iniquity.

Likewise Pope Zephyrinus [epistle I to the Bishops of Sicily]. Just as night does not extinguish the stars of heaven, so worldly iniquity does not obscure the minds of the faithful adhering to the firmament of sacred Scripture.

C. VIII. Sacrae scripturae inherentes non obscurantur iniquitate mundana.

Item Zepherinus Papa. [epist. I. ad Episcopos Siciliae] Sicut stellas celi non extinguit nox, sic mentes fidelium inherentes firmamento sacrae scripturae non obscurat mundana iniquitas.

C. IX. Ignorance of the Scriptures is ignorance of Christ.

Likewise Jerome on Isaiah. If, according to the apostle Paul, Christ is the power of God and the wisdom of God, ignorance of the Scriptures is ignorance of Christ.

C. IX. Ignorantia scripturarum est ignorantia Christi.

Item Ieronimus in Isaia. Si iuxta apostolum Paulum Christus Dei uirtus est et Dei sapientia est, ignoratio scripturarum est ignoratio Christi.

C. X. Those who know, or are ignorant of, the things of God are known, or not known, by the Lord.

Likewise Gregory in the Moralia. Those who know the things that are God's are known by the Lord, and those who do not know the things that are God's are not known by the Lord, as Paul testifies, who says: "If anyone is ignorant, he will be ignored." The same: Whoever is foolish in guilt will be wise in punishment.

> C. X. A Domino sciuntur, uel ignorantur, qui ea, que Dei sunt, sapiunt, uel ignorant.
> Item Gregorius in Moralibus. Qui ea, que Dei sunt sapiunt, a Domino sapiuntur, et qui ea, que Dei sunt, nesciunt, a Domino nesciuntur, Paulo testante, qui ait: "Si quis ignorat, ignorabitur." Idem: Quicumque stultus est in culpa, sapiens erit in pena.

C. XI. Not one who does not know something, but one who thinks he knows what he does not know, is proved to err.

Likewise Augustine [in the Enchiridion to Laurence, c. 17]. Part II. Although error must be guarded against with as much care as we can, not only in greater but also in lesser matters, and although one can err only through ignorance of things, it does not, nevertheless, follow that everyone who does not know something immediately errs, but rather if anyone thinks that he knows what he does not know. For he approves the false as true, which is proper to error. Nevertheless, it matters very much in what matter each person errs. For in one and the same matter, one who knows is by right reason preferred to one who does not know, and one who does not err to one who errs. But in different matters—that is, when this person knows some things and that person others, and this person more useful things while that person knows less useful or even harmful things—who would not, in the things the latter knows, prefer to him the one who does not know? For there are certain things that it is better not to know than to know. Part III. GRATIAN. But although bishops or priests may through ignorance of grammatical art utter something faulty, they are not on that account to be despised by scholars, because faults of morals are to be guarded against more than faults of words. Hence Augustine in the book On Catechizing the Uninstructed [c. 9]:

> C. XI. Non qui aliquid nescit, sed qui putat se scire quod nescit, errare probatur.
> Item Augustinus. [in Enchiridio ad Laurentium, cap. 17.] II. Pars. Quamuis errare quanta possumus cura cauendum sit, non solum in maioribus, uerum etiam in minoribus rebus, nec nisi rerum ignorantia possit errari, non est tamen consequens, ut continuo erret quisquis aliquid nescit, sed si quis se existimet scire quod nescit. Pro uero quippe approbat falsum, quod erroris est proprium. Verumtamen in qua re quisque erret, interest plurimum. Nam in una eademque re et nescienti sciens, et erranti non errans recta ratione preponitur. In diuersis autem rebus, id est cum iste scit alia, ille alia, et iste utiliora, ille minus utilia uel etiam noxia: quis non in eis, que ille scit, ei preferat nescientem? Sunt enim quedam, que nescire melius est quam scire. III. Pars. Gratian. Sed licet per ignorantiam gramaticae artis aliquid uitiosum proferant episcopi uel presbiteri, non tamen ideo a scolasticis sunt despiciendi, quia morum uitia magis quam uerborum sunt precauenda. Unde Augustinus in libro de catezizandis rudibus: [c. 9.]

C. XII. Let scholars not despise ecclesiastical simplicity.

Scholars must be diligently admonished that, clothed with Christian humility, they learn not to despise those whom they have recognized as avoiding faults of morals more than faults of words, and that they not dare to compare an exercised tongue with a chaste heart, much less prefer it, as they had been accustomed to do. For it is especially useful for these persons to know that meanings are to be preferred to words just as the soul is preferred to the body. From this it follows that they ought to prefer to hear discourses that are truer rather than more eloquent, just as they ought to prefer to have friends who are more prudent rather than more handsome. Let them also know that there is no voice to the ears of God except the affection of the soul. Thus they will not ridicule if perhaps they notice some prelates and ministers of the Church either invoking God with barbarisms and solecisms, or not understanding the very words they pronounce, and dividing them confusedly—not because these things should by no means be corrected, so that the people may say "Amen" to what they plainly understand, but because they are to be piously tolerated by those who have learned that, just as blessing is given by sound in the forum, so it is given by intention in the Church. And so that forensic diction may perhaps sometimes be good diction, yet it can never be called benediction.

> C. XII. Non contempnant scolastici ecclesiasticam simplicitatem.
> Sedulo monendi sunt scolastici ut humilitate induti Christiana, discant non contempnere quos cognouerint morum uitia quam uerborum amplius deuitare, sed cordi casto linguam exercitatam nec conferre audeant, quam etiam preferre consueuerant. His enim maxime utile est nosse, ita esse preponendas uerbis sententias, ut preponitur animus corpori. Ex quo fit, ut ita malle debeant ueriores quam dissertiores audire sermones, sicut malle debent prudentiores quam formosiores habere amicos. Nouerint etiam, non esse uocem ad aures Dei, nisi animi affectum. Ita enim non irridebunt, si aliquos antistites et ministros ecclesiae forte animaduerterint uel cum barbarismis et soloecismis Deum inuocare, uel eadem uerba, que pronunciant, non intelligere, perturbateque distinguere, non quia ista minime corrigenda sunt, ut populus ad id, quod plane intelligit, dicat "Amen"; sed quia pie toleranda sunt ab eis, qui didicerint ut sono in foro, sic uoto in ecclesia benedici. Itaque forensis illa nonnumquam forte bona dictio numquam tamen benedictio dici potest.

C. XV. Likewise Jerome to Pammachius, epistle LII, whose beginning is: It is sometimes a mark of Christian modesty.

Ecclesiastical interpretation, even if it possesses elegance of expression, ought to conceal and flee it, so that it may speak not to the idle schools of philosophers and to a few disciples, but to the whole race of humankind.]

C. XV. Item Ieronimus ad Pammachium, epistola LII., cuius initium est: Christiani interdum pudoris est.

Ecclesiastica interpretatio etiamsi habet eloquii uenustatem, dissimulare eam debet et fugere, ut non otiosis philosophorum scolis paucisque discipulis, sed uniuerso loquatur hominum generi.]

C. XVI. Let a bishop not blush, on account of the reproach of old age, to learn from children and from the least.

Likewise Pope Clement [epistle III]. Let no bishop, on account of the reproach of old age or nobility of birth, neglect to inquire from educated children or the least whether there is perhaps anything of utility or salvation. For one who lives rebelliously and refuses to learn and to do good things is shown to be a member of the devil rather than of Christ, and is revealed as an unbeliever rather than a believer.

C. XVI. Episcopus propter obprobrium senectutis a paruulis et a minimis discere non erubescat.

Item Clemens Papa. [epist. III.] Nullus episcopus propter obprobrium senectutis uel nobilitatem generis a paruulis uel minimis eruditis, si quid forte est utilitatis aut salutis, inquirere negligat. Qui enim rebelliter uiuit, et discere atque bona agere recusat, magis diaboli quam Christi membrum esse ostenditur, et potius infidelis quam fidelis monstratur.

Distinction XXXIX

GRATIAN. Behold, it has been shown fully that priests ought to be skilled in both sacred and secular letters. It is now asked whether they ought to have skill in secular affairs. That this is necessary for prelates is proved by many reasons. For prelates ought to minister to their subjects not only spiritual but also carnal assistance, by the example of Christ, who not only taught the crowds following him by the word but also healed them by power and refreshed them with bodily foods. But so that prelates can accomplish all these things fully, they ought to have shrewdness in secular affairs, so that by their caution both the churches may be preserved unharmed and necessary things may be supplied to each person according to his measure. Hence a certain man elected bishop was rejected by blessed Gregory on account of his simplicity, lest on his account the goods of the Church be squandered. Hence the same writes to the noble citizens of Naples [Book VIII, epistle 40]:

GRATIANUS. Ecce plenarie monstratum est, quod sacerdotes oportet litterarum tam sacrarum quam secularium esse peritos. Nunc queritur, an secularium negotiorum oporteat eos habere peritiam? Hanc prelatis esse necessariam, multis rationibus probatur. Debent namque prelati subditis non solum spiritualia, sed etiam carnalia subsidia ministrare, exemplo Christi, qui turbas sequentes non solum uerbo docebat, sed etiam uirtute sanabat et corporalibus alimentis reficiebat. Ut autem prelati hec omnia plene perficere possint, secularium negotiorum oportet eos habere sollertiam, ut eorum cautela et ecclesiae seruentur indempnes, et cuique necessaria pro suo modo subministrentur. Unde quidam in episcopum electus a B. Gregorio pro sua simplicitate repellitur, ne eius occasione res ecclesiae dilapidarentur. Unde idem scribit nobilibus ciuibus Neapolim: [lib. VIII. epist. 40.]

C. I. Those unskilled in secular affairs are not to be ordained bishops.

Peter the deacon, whom you declare was elected by you, is altogether simple, as is said, and you know that in this time such a person ought to be established at the summit of governance who knows how to be solicitous not only concerning the salvation of souls but also concerning external utility and caution.

C. I. Secularium negotiorum inperiti non sunt in episcopos ordinandi.

Petrus diaconus, quem a uobis electum asseritis, omnino (ut dicitur) simplex est, et nostis, quia hoc tempore talis in regiminis debet arce constitui, qui non solum de salute animarum, uerum etiam de extrinseca utilitate et cautela sciat esse solicitus.

Distinction XL

GRATIAN. Part I. A bishop also ought to be adorned and hospitable. The episcopal ornaments ought to be understood as the virtues that are promised to them by the Lord when it is said: “I will clothe his priests with salvation.” Hence in the Old Testament priests are read to have been adorned with various garments at the Lord’s command, because the life of a pontiff ought to shine with manifold virtues, so that he may confer adornment upon the grade from which he did not receive it. For places do not make a priest holy, but life and morals do. Hence they should know that from the office they have undertaken they have obtained not a license to sin but a necessity of living well. Hence Pope Symmachus says:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Oportet quoque episcopum esse ornatum et hospitalem. Ornamenta episcopalia uirtutes debent intelligi, que a Domino eis repromittuntur, dum dicitur: "Sacerdotes eius induam salutari." Unde in ueteri testamento uariis uestibus ex precepto Domini sacerdotes ornati leguntur, quia multimodis uirtutibus splendere debet uita pontificis, ut gradui conferat decorem, quem ab eo non accepit. Non enim loca, sed uita et mores sanctum faciunt sacerdotem. Unde ex offitio suscepto non licentiam peccandi, sed necessitatem bene uiuendi se nouerint assecutos. Unde Simacus Papa ait:

C. I. The office of the priesthood does not confer but removes license to transgress.

We do not judge that blessed Peter, as you say, received from the Lord, together with the privilege of the see, a license to sin, nor that his successors did. He transmitted to posterity a perpetual endowment of merits together with the inheritance of innocence. What was conceded to him through the light of his deeds pertains to those whom an equal splendor of conduct illuminates. For who would doubt that one whom the summit of so great a dignity raises up is holy? If acquired goods through merit are lacking in him, those that are attested from the predecessor of the place suffice. For either it raises illustrious men to these heights, or it makes illustrious those who are raised.

C. I. Offitium sacerdotii non confert, sed adimit licentiam delinquendi.

Non nos beatum Petrum (sicut dicitis) a Domino cum sedis priuilegio, uel successores eius, peccandi iudicamus licentiam suscepisse. Ille perhennem meritorum dotem cum hereditate innocentiae transmisit ad posteros. Quod illi concessum est per actuum lucem, ad illos pertinet, quos par conuersationis splendor illuminat. Quis enim sanctum esse dubitet, quem apex tantae dignitatis attollit? In quo si desint bona acquisita per meritum, sufficiunt, que a loci predecessore testantur. Aut enim claros ad hec fastigia erigit, aut qui eriguntur, illustrat.

C. II. The sons of the saints are those who practice their works.

Likewise Jerome [to Heliodorus, epistle I]. It is not easy to stand in the place of Peter and Paul and to hold the chair of those reigning with Christ, because on this account it is said: those who hold the places of the saints are not the sons of the saints, but those who practice their works.

C. II. Filii sanctorum sunt, qui exercent opera eorum.

Item Ieronimus. [ad Heliodorum, epist. I.] Non est facile stare in loco Petri et Pauli et tenere cathedram regnantium cum Christo, quia hinc dicitur: non sanctorum filii sunt, qui tenent loca sanctorum, sed qui exercent opera eorum.

C. III. Let nobility of morals, not of place or birth, make priests known.

Likewise Gregory. We who preside ought to become known not from the dignity of places or birth, but from nobility of morals; nor from the renown of cities, but from purity of faith.

C. III. Morum nobilitas, non loci uel generis, sacerdotes notificet.

Item Gregorius. Nos, qui presumus, non ex locorum uel generis dignitate, sed morum nobilitate innotescere debemus, nec urbium claritate, sed fidei puritate.

C. IV. Not places or orders, but merits, join us to God.

The same to Anastasius the Priest [Book VI, epistle 29]. Places or orders do not make us near to our Creator, but either good merits join us or evil ones separate us.

C. IV. Non loca uel ordines, sed merita nos Deo coniungunt.

Idem Anastasio Presbitero. [lib. VI. epist. 29.] Non loca uel ordines creatori nostro nos proximos faciunt, sed nos aut merita bona coniungunt, aut mala disiungunt.

C. V. The greatness of sin or of dignity casts each person down mightily.

Likewise John Chrysostom [that is, the author of the Unfinished Work on Matthew, homily 40, at c. 21]. Part II. A Christian person falls mightily into sin on account of two causes: either on account of the greatness of the sin or on account of the height of dignity.

C. V. Magnitudo peccati uel dignitatis quemque fortiter deicit.

Item Iohannes Crisostomus. [id est, auctor operis imperfecti in Matthaeum, homilia 40. ad c. 21.] II. Pars. Homo Christianus fortiter cadit in peccatum propter duas causas: aut propter magnitudinem peccati, aut propter altitudinem dignitatis.

C. VI. An apostolic pontiff who is negligent of his own and his brother's salvation is condemned.

Likewise from the acts of Boniface the Martyr. Part III. If the pope, negligent of his own and his brother's salvation, is reproved as useless and remiss in his works, and is moreover silent concerning the good—a thing that harms himself and everyone more—he nevertheless leads innumerable peoples in crowds with himself to the first bondage of hell, to be beaten together with him for eternity with many blows. No mortal presumes to reprove his faults here, because he who will judge everyone is to be judged by no one, unless he is found deviating from the faith. The whole body of the faithful prays for his perpetual condition the more urgently, the more attentively they perceive their own salvation after God to depend upon his well-being.

> C. VI. Dampnatur Apostolicus, qui suae et fraternae salutis est negligens.
> Item ex gestis Bonifacii Martiris. III. Pars. Si papa suae et fraternae salutis negligens reprehenditur inutilis et remissus in operibus suis, et insuper a bono taciturnus, quod magis officit sibi et omnibus, nichilominus innumerabiles populos cateruatim secum ducit, primo mancipio gehennae cum ipso plagis multis in eternum uapulaturus. Huius culpas istic redarguere presumit mortalium nullus, quia cunctos ipse iudicaturus a nemine est iudicandus, nisi deprehendatur a fide deuius; pro cuius perpetuo statu uniuersitas fidelium tanto instantius orat, quanto suam salutem post Deum ex illius incolumitate animaduertunt propensius pendere.

C. VII. Not orders, but merits of life, commend us to God.

Likewise Augustine to Valerius [epistle CXLVIII]. Part IV. Before all things I ask that your religious prudence consider that there is nothing in this life, and especially in this time, easier and lighter and more acceptable to people than the office of bishop, priest, or deacon, if the matter is conducted perfunctorily and flatteringly; but nothing before God is more wretched, sorrowful, and damnable. §1. Likewise: There is nothing in this life, and especially in this time, more difficult, laborious, and dangerous than the office of bishop, priest, or deacon; but before God there is nothing more blessed, if service is performed in that manner in which our commander orders. What that manner is, however, I learned neither from my boyhood nor from my adolescence; and at the time when I had begun to learn, force was done to me by the merit of my sins. For I do not know what else I should think: the second place at the rudders was handed to me, who did not know how to hold an oar.

> C. VII. Non ordines, sed uitae merita nos Deo commendant.
> Item Augustinus ad Valerium. [epist. CXLVIII.] IV. Pars. Ante omnia peto, ut cogitet religiosa prudentia tua, nichil esse in hac uita et maxime in hoc tempore facilius et leuius et hominibus acceptabilius episcopi, aut presbiteri, aut diaconi offitio, si perfunctorie atque adulatorie res agatur, sed nichil apud Deum miserius et tristius et dampnabilius. §. 1. Item: Nichil est in hac uita et maxime in hoc tempore difficilius et laboriosius et periculosius episcopi, aut presbiteri, aut diaconi offitio, sed apud Deum nichil beatius, si eo modo militetur, quo noster imperator iubet. Quis autem sit modus, nec a pueritia, nec ab adolescentia mea didici, et eo tempore, quo discere ceperam, uis mihi facta est merito peccatorum meorum. Nam quid aliud existimem nescio, ut secundus locus gubernaculorum mihi traderetur, qui remum tenere non noueram.

C. VIII. The priesthood is corrupted and dragged to earth unless it is preserved lawfully and justly.

Likewise Isidore. Just as the worthy union of a man and a woman makes one marriage, and just as the coupling of two perfects one body, so the clerical state and the priesthood make one priest, and election and consecration make one bishop. All these things effect one body, which is very quickly corrupted and dragged to earth unless it is lawfully preserved, unless it is praised by living justly.

> C. VIII. Corrumpitur et ad terram sacerdotium trahitur, nisi legaliter et iuste seruetur.
> Item Ysidorus. Sicut uiri et mulieris digna coniunctio unum facit matrimonium, et sicut duorum copulatio unum perficit corpus, ita clericatus et sacerdotium unum faciunt presbiterum, et electio et consecratio unum faciunt episcopum: que omnia unum efficiunt corpus, quod citius corrumpitur et ad terram trahitur, nisi legaliter conseruetur, nisi iuste uiuendo laudetur.

C. IX. Grace, not place, saves the soul.

Likewise Ambrose [Book On Paradise, c. 4]. Part V. Observe this, however: the man was made outside paradise, the woman inside paradise, so that you may observe that each person acquires grace for himself not by nobility of place or of birth, but by virtue. Finally, the man made outside paradise—that is, in an inferior place—is found better, and she who was made in a better place—that is, in paradise—is found inferior.

> C. IX. Gratia, non locus saluat animam.
> Item Ambrosius. [lib. de paradiso, c. 4.] V. Pars. Illud autem aduerte, quia extra paradisum uir factus est, mulier intra paradisum, ut aduertas, quod non loci, non generis nobilitate, sed uirtute unusquisque gratiam sibi comparat. Denique extra paradisum, hoc est in inferiori loco, uir factus melior inuenitur, et illa, que in meliori loco, hoc est in paradiso, facta est, inferior inuenitur.

C. X. Concerning the same.

Likewise Gregory [Book VI of the Register, epistle 5]. No secluded places whatsoever can save the soul without grace, something we sometimes behold even in the wanderings of the elect themselves. For Lot was righteous in the perverse city itself; on the mountain he sinned. But why do we say these things, when we know greater ones? For what is more delightful than paradise? What is safer than heaven? And yet man fell from paradise, and an angel from heaven, by sinning.

> C. X. De eodem.
> Item Gregorius. [lib. VI. Reg. epist. 5.] Quelibet occulta loca sine gratia animam saluare non possunt, quod aliquando in ipsis quoque conspicimus erratibus electorum. Nam Loth in ipsa peruersa ciuitate iustus fuit: in monte peccauit. Sed ista cur dicimus, cum maiora nouerimus? Quid enim paradiso iucundius? quid celo securius? et tamen homo ex paradiso, et angelus de celo peccando cecidit.

C. XI. Concerning the same.

The same. Adam, the first man, was cast out of paradise for sin; that is, he who cast away from himself the nobility of God was deprived of nobility of place.

> C. XI. De eodem.
> Idem. Adam primus homo de paradiso pro peccato eiectus est: hoc est, qui Dei nobilitatem a se deiecit, nobilitate loci priuatur.

C. XII. Not everyone who is called a priest is truly a priest.

Likewise John Chrysostom [that is, the author of the Unfinished Work on Matthew, homily 43, at c. 23]. Part VI. Many priests, and few priests: many in name, and few in work. See, therefore, how you sit upon the chair, because the chair does not make the priest, but the priest the chair; the place does not sanctify the person, but the person the place; not every priest is holy, but every holy person is a priest. One who has sat well upon the chair receives the honor of the chair; one who has sat badly does injury to the chair. Therefore an evil priest acquires from his priesthood an accusation, not dignity. For when sitting in judgment, if indeed you have lived well and taught well, you instruct the people; but if you have taught well and lived badly, you will be the condemner of yourself alone. For by living well and teaching well you instruct the people how they ought to live; but by teaching well and living badly you instruct God how he ought to condemn you. The same: §1. Whoever has desired primacy on earth will find confusion in heaven, nor will one who has treated of primacy be numbered among the servants of Christ. Let not each of them hasten to appear greater than others, but to appear lower than all, because it is not the one who is greater in honor who is more righteous; rather, the one who is more righteous is greater.

> C. XII. Non est uere sacerdos omnis, qui nominatur sacerdos.
> Item Iohannes Crisostomus. [id est, auctor operis imperfecti in Matth. hom. 43. ad c. 23.] VI. Pars. Multi sacerdotes, et pauci sacerdotes; multi nomine, et pauci in opere. Videte ergo quomodo sedeatis super cathedram, quia non cathedra facit sacerdotem, sed sacerdos cathedram; non locus sanctificat hominem, sed homo locum; non omnis sacerdos sanctus, sed omnis sanctus sacerdos est. Qui bene sederit super cathedram honorem accipit cathedrae; qui male sederit, iniuriam facit cathedrae; ideoque malus sacerdos de sacerdotio suo crimen adquirit, non dignitatem. In iudicio enim sedens, si quidem bene uixeris et bene docueris, populum instruis; si uero bene docueris et male uixeris, tui solius condempnator eris. Nam bene uiuendo et bene docendo populum instruis, quomodo uiuere debeat: bene autem docendo et male uiuendo Deum instruis, quomodo te debeat condempnare. Idem: §. 1. Quicumque desiderauerit primatum in terra, inueniet confusionem in celo, nec inter seruos Christi computabitur, qui de primatu tractauerit, nec unusquisque eorum festinet, quomodo appareat aliis maior, sed quomodo omnibus inferior uideatur, quoniam non qui maior fuerit in honore, ille est iustior, sed qui fuerit iustior, ille maior est.

Distinction XLI

GRATIAN. Part I. Behold with what morals a priest ought to be adorned. In addition, of course, he ought to be adorned in external things, namely in habit and gait: in habit, so that he adorns himself with neither splendid nor filthy garments. For, as Jerome says, neither affected filth nor exquisite luxury produces praise, which is to be understood both of garments and of foods. Hence Augustine says in Book [III] of Christian Doctrine [c. 12]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Ecce, quibus oporteat sacerdotem esse ornatum moribus. Scilicet preterea oportet illum esse ornatum in exterioribus, habitu uidelicet et incessu: habitu, ut nec fulgidis, nec sordidis se uestibus ornet. Ut enim ait Ieronimus nec affectatae sordes, nec exquisitae deliciae laudem pariunt, quod tam de uestibus, quam de cibis intelligendum est. Unde Augustinus ait in libro [III.] de doctrina Christiana: [cap. 12.]

C. I. We ought to use foods in accordance with the morals of those with whom we live.

Whoever uses passing things more restrictively than the customs of those with whom he lives allow is either intemperate or superstitious. But whoever uses them in such a way that he exceeds the limits of the custom of the good persons among whom he dwells either signifies something or is shameful. For in all such matters it is not the use of things but lust that is at fault. §1. Therefore, what is fitting to places, times, and persons must be diligently attended to, nor should we rashly reprove disgraceful acts. For it can happen that without any fault of cupidity or voracity a wise person uses the most costly food, while a foolish person burns with a most foul flame of gluttony for the cheapest; and someone may more healthfully prefer to feed upon fish after the Lord's manner than upon lentils after the manner of Esau, Abraham's grandson, or upon barley after the manner of beasts of burden. For most beasts are not on that account more continent than we are because they are fed on cheaper foods. For in all matters of this kind, what we do is to be approved or disapproved not from the nature of those things we use but from the cause of using and the manner of desiring.

> Quisquis rebus pretereuntibus restrictius utitur quam sese habent mores eorum, cum quibus uiuit, aut intemperans, aut supersticiosus est. Quisquis uero sic eis utitur, ut metas consuetudinis bonorum, inter quos uersatur, excedat, aut aliquid significat, aut flagitiosus est. In omnibus enim talibus non usus rerum, sed libido in culpa est. §. 1. Quid igitur locis, et temporibus, et personis conueniat, diligenter adtendendum est, nec temere flagitia reprehendamus. Fieri enim potest, ut sine aliquo uitio cupidinis uel uoracitatis preciosissimo cibo sapiens utatur, insipiens autem fedissima gulae flamma in uilissimum ardescat, et sanius quisque maluerit more Domini pisce uesci, quam lenticula more Esau, nepotis Abraham, aut hordeo more iumentorum. Non enim propterea continentiores sunt nobis pleraeque bestiae, quia uilioribus escis aluntur. Nam in omnibus huiuscemodi rebus non ex earum rerum natura, quibus utimur, sed ex causa utendi et modo appetendi uel probandum est, uel inprobandum quod facimus.

C. II. Not food, but appetite, is at fault.

Likewise Augustine on the epistle of John. Any delicacies, if received without desire, do not harm, and cheap foods received with appetite impede the progress of abstinence. For David poured out water he had desired, and Elijah ate meat.

> C. II. Non cibus, sed appetitus in culpa est.
> Item Augustinus super epistolam Iohannis. Deliciae quelibet, si absque desiderio percipiantur, non officiunt, et uiles cibi appetenter accepti inpediunt profectum abstinentiae. Dauid enim aquam concupitam effudit, et Elias carnes comedit.

C. III. The rich are not to be compelled to use certain foods contrary to the custom of their infirmity.

The same in the book On the Words of the Lord [according to Matthew c. 7, sermon V]. Let the rich not be compelled to eat the foods of the poor. Let them use the custom of their infirmity, but let them grieve that they cannot do otherwise: if they change their custom, they become ill. Let them use superfluous things; let them give necessary things to the needy. Let them use costly things; let them give cheap things to the poor.

C. III. Contra suae infirmitatis consuetudinem aliquibus cibis non cogantur diuites uti.

Idem in libro de uerbis Domini. [secundum Mattheum c. 7. serm. V.] Non cogantur diuites pauperum cibis uesci, utantur consuetudine infirmitatis suae, sed doleant se aliter non posse: si consuetudinem mutant, egrotant. Utantur superfluis, dent inopibus necessaria; utantur preciosis, dent pauperibus uilia.

C. IV. Equanimity in bearing, not the use of or abstinence from food, makes righteousness.

The same in Book [II] of Questions on the Gospels [c. 11]. That the Lord says in the Gospel, "Wisdom is justified by all her children," shows that the children of wisdom understand that righteousness lies neither in abstaining nor in eating, but in equanimity in bearing want and in temperance that is not corrupted through abundance, and in taking or not taking at the appropriate time those things whose use is not reproved, but whose coveting is. For it makes no difference at all what foods you take to relieve the necessity of the body, provided that in the kinds of foods you conform to those with whom you must live. Nor does it make much difference how much you take, since we see that the stomach of some is satiated more quickly and that they nevertheless gape ardently, intolerably, and altogether shamefully after that very little by which they are satiated; while others are indeed satiated by a somewhat larger cup, but bear want tolerably and, if at the time this is either useful or necessary, look calmly upon feasts set before them even before the hour and do not touch them. It matters more, therefore, not what or how much food someone receives in conformity with people and with his own person and according to the necessity of his health, but with how much ease and serenity of mind he goes without these things when it is either fitting or necessary to go without them, so that there may be fulfilled in the mind of the Christian what the Apostle says: "I know both how to have less and how to abound; everywhere and in all things I am instructed: both to be filled and to hunger, both to abound and to suffer want. I can do all things in him who strengthens me."

C. IV. Equanimitas tolerandi, non usus, uel abstinentia cibi iustitiam facit.

Idem in libro [II.] questionum euangeliorum. [c. 11.] Quod dicit Dominus in euangelio: "Iustificata est sapientia ab omnibus filiis suis," ostendit filios sapientiae intelligere, nec in abstinendo, nec in manducando esse iusticiam, sed in equanimitate tolerandi inopiam, et temperancia per abundantiam non se corrumpendi, atque oportune sumendi uel non sumendi ea, quorum non usus, sed concupiscentia reprehendenda est. Non enim interest omnino, quid alimentorum sumas, ut succurras necessitati corporis, dummodo congruas in generibus alimentorum his, cum quibus tibi uiuendum est. Neque quantum sumas multum interest, cum uideamus aliorum stomachum citius saturari, et eos tamen illi ipsi paruo, quo saciantur, ardenter et intolerabiliter et omnino turpiter inhiare; alios autem plus paulo poculo saciari quidem, sed tolerabiliter inopiam perpeti, et uel ante horam positas epulas, si id in tempore aut opus sit aut necesse sit, cum tranquillitate aspicere, neque tangere. Magis ergo interest, non quid uel quantum alimentorum pro congruentia hominum atque personae suae, et pro suae ualetudinis necessitate quis accipiat, sed quanta facilitate et serenitate animi careat, cum his uel oportet, uel necesse est carere; ut illud in animo Christiani conpleatur, quod Apostolus dicit: "Scio et minus habere, scio et habundare; ubique et in omnibus inbutus sum: et saciari, et esurire, et habundare, et penuriam pati, omnia possum in eo, qui me confortat."

C. V. Temperance in foods and garments, not looseness in them, is praised.

Likewise from the Council of Gangra [last c.]. We do not reprove frugality together with humble clothing, just as we also praise adornment that is unpainted, apart from care of the body. But we do not receive those who are dissolute and effeminate in garments and gait. Not confining piety within private houses, we honor every place built in the name of the Lord; and we receive a congregation made in the church for the common utility, and we call blessed the good works that are exercised beyond one's means toward poor brethren according to ecclesiastical traditions, and we desire that all things conforming to the apostolic traditions and precepts of the holy Scriptures be done in the Church.

> C. V. Temperantia ciborum et uestium, non dissolutio eorum laudatur.
> Item ex Concilio Gangrensi. [c. ultimo.] Parsimoniam cum ueste humili non reprobamus, sicut etiam ornatum preter corporis diligentiam infucatum laudamus. Dissolutos autem et fractos uestibus et incessu non recipimus; pietatem in priuatis domibus non concludentes, omnem locum in nomine Domini edificatum honoramus; et congregationem in ecclesia factam ad utilitatem communem recipimus, et bona opera, que supra uires in fratres pauperes exercentur, secundum ecclesiasticas traditiones beatificamus, et omnia, que conueniunt tradicionibus apostolicis et sanctarum scripturarum preceptis, in ecclesia fieri exoptamus.

C. VI. Vices often insinuate themselves under the appearance of virtues.

Likewise Gregory [to John of Constantinople, Book I of the Register, epistle 24]. Vices often falsely claim to be virtues, so that stinginess wishes to appear as frugality, prodigality as generosity, cruelty as zeal for justice, and laxity as piety.

> C. VI. Sub specie uirtutum sepe se uicia ingerunt.
> Item Gregorius. [Iohanni Constantinopolitano, lib. I. Reg. epist. 24.] Sepe uicia esse se uirtutes mentiuntur, ut tenacia parsimonia, effusio largitas, crudelitas zelus iusticiae, remissio pietas uelit uideri.

C. VII. Episcopal authority is sought by merits of faith and life, not by riches.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage [c. 15]. Let a bishop have cheap household goods, a poor table and sustenance, and let him seek the authority of his dignity by faith and the merits of life. §1. Let him also have a small lodging not far from the church.

> C. VII. Meritis fidei et uitae, non diuitiis episcopalis auctoritas queritur.
> Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 15.] Episcopus uilem supellectilem, et mensam ac uictum pauperem habeat, et dignitatis suae auctoritatem fide et uitae meritis querat. §. 1. Hospiciolum quoque non longe ab ecclesia habeat.

[C. VIII.]

Likewise from the same [c. 45]. Let a cleric prove his profession even by his habit and gait, and therefore let him seek adornment neither in garments nor in shoes. GRATIAN. Therefore, just as we are admonished in foods to observe the customs of those with whom we live, so this is also to be understood concerning clothing. For, as is said elsewhere: "Whoever, despising those with whom he lives, seeks for himself finer or more austere clothing or food than the rest is either intemperate toward himself or superstitious." A priest ought, however, to be adorned in gait, so that by the gravity of his journey he may show the maturity of his mind. For disorderedness of the body, as Augustine says, indicates the quality of the mind. Hence that historian, when he described the mutability of the man whose conscience, stirred by cares, was laying waste his mind, indicated this also among the other noteworthy things: “His gait was now swift, now slow.”

[C. VIII.]

Item ex eodem. [c. 45.] Clericus professionem suam etiam habitu et incessu probet, et ideo nec uestibus, nec calciamentis decorem querat. Gratian. Sicut ergo in cibis mores eorum, cum quibus uiuimus, obseruare monemur, sic et de indumentis intelligendum est. Ut enim alibi dicitur: "quisquis contemptis his, cum quibus uiuit, lautiora sibi uel austeriora pre ceteris indumenta uel alimenta querit, aut intemperans sui est, aut supersticiosus." Incessu autem debet esse sacerdos ornatus, ut grauitate itineris mentis maturitatem ostendat. Incompositio enim corporis (ut Augustinus ait) qualitatem indicat mentis. Unde istoriographus ille, cum mutabilitatem eius describeret, cuius conscientia excita curis uastabat mentem, inter cetera etiam hoc notabile indicauit: "Incessus eius modo citus modo tardus".

Distinction XLII

GRATIAN. Part I. A priest, however, ought to be hospitable, lest he be among the number of those to whom it will be said in the judgment: “I was a stranger, and you did not receive me.” For how will one who, following the Apostle, ought to invite others to hospitality be able to be an exhorter to hospitality if he closes his own house to guests? For if a priest ought first to exact from himself and from his domestic church what he afterward commands the peoples; if first, in imitation of Christ, he himself ought to do the things that he afterward teaches the people, it is necessary that he receive the poor in hospitality, so that by his example he may more easily draw his subjects to hospitality. §1. Therefore, let one who is to be ordained priest recall to memory how Abraham and Lot merited to please God through works of hospitality and to receive angels as guests; how the angels, having entered the hospitable house in Sodom, delivered Lot with his family; how fire entered the houses closed to guests and destroyed them; how also, according to Jerome, one who is proved to retain for himself more than what is necessary is convicted of seizing the property of another; and so let him train himself through works of piety, so that he may receive from the Lord both the supports of the present life and the rewards of eternal glory, for both are promised to piety. §2. Hence the Apostle, writing to Timothy, says: “Train yourself in piety. For bodily exercise is indeed useful for a little; but piety is useful for all things, having the promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come.” Whoever is alien to this cannot be ordained a priest. §3. For if a widow is prohibited from being received in the Church when she has not received the poor in hospitality, has not washed the feet of the saints, and has not pursued every good work, much more are those proved alien to the work of piety to be prohibited from the priesthood. §4. Hence certain persons who despised works of hospitality are excommunicated in the Council of Gangra. For it was established in it thus [c. 11]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Hospitalem uero sacerdotem esse oportet, ne sit in numero eorum, quibus in iudicio dicetur: "Hospes eram non suscepistis me." Qui enim Apostolum secutus alios ad hospitalitatem debet inuitare, quomodo hospitalitatis exhortator poterit esse, qui domum propriam hospitibus claudit? Si enim sacerdos primum a se ipso et a domestica sua ecclesia debet exigere quod postea populis imperet; si primum, imitando Christum, ipse debet facere que postea populum doceat: necesse est, ut pauperes hospitio recipiat, quo ad hospitalitatem facilius suo exemplo subditos attrahat. §. 1. Ordinandus itaque sacerdos ad memoriam reuocet, quomodo Abraham et Loth per hospitalitatis opera Deo placere, et angelos hospitio recipere meruerunt; quomodo angeli, Sodomis hospitalem domum ingressi, Loth cum familia sua liberauerint; quomodo clausas domos cum hospitibus ignis ingressus perdiderit; quomodo etiam secundum Ieronimum aliena rapere conuincitur, qui ultra necessaria sibi retinere probatur; ac sic per opera pietatis instituat ut etiam presentis uita subsidia, et eternae claritatis premia a Domino percipiat: utrumque enim pietati promittitur. §. 2. Unde Apostolus scribens ad Timotheum ait: "Exerce te ipsum ad pietatem. Nam corporalis quidem exercitatio ad modicum utilis est; pietas autem utilis est ad omnia, habens promissionem uitae, que nunc est, et futurae." Ab hac quisquis alienus fuerit, in sacerdotem ordinari non poterit §. 3. Si enim uidua in ecclesia recipi prohibetur, que pauperes non recipit in hospitio, que pedes sanctorum non lauit, que omne opus bonum non est executa: multo magis sunt prohibendi a sacerdotio, qui ab opere pietatis probantur alieni. §. 4. Unde quidam hospitalitatis opera despicientes in Gangrensi Concilio excommunicantur. Sic enim in eo statutum est: [c. 11.]

C. I. Those who provide banquets for the poor are not to be despised.

If anyone despises those who faithfully provide agapae, that is, banquets, for the poor and summon brethren for the honor of the Lord, and is unwilling to participate in invitations of this kind, making little of what is done, let him be anathema. GRATIAN. Hence John the Evangelist in his epistle also excommunicates a certain Diotrephes, who neither received the poor and cast those who received them out of the Church. In hospitality, however, there is to be no selection of persons; rather, we ought without distinction to show ourselves hospitable to any whom we are able to assist.

Hence John Chrysostom in the epistle to the Hebrews [homily XI, toward the end, on c. 6]:

C. I. Non sint despiciendi, qui conuiuia pauperibus exhibent.

Si quis despicit eos, qui fideliter agapas, id est conuiuia, pauperum exhibent et propter honorem Domini conuocant fratres, et noluerit communicare huiuscemodi uocationibus, paruipendens quod geritur, anathema sit. Gratian. Hinc etiam Iohannes Euangelista in epistola sua quendam Diotrepem excommunicat, qui nec pauperes recipiebat, et recipientes de ecclesia eiciebat. In hospitalitate autem non est habendas delectus personarum, sed indifferenter quibuscumque sufficimus hospitales nos exhibere debemus.

Unde Iohannes Crisostomus in epistola ad Ebreos: [hom. XI. ad c. 6. circ. fin.]

C. II. There ought to be no distinction in receiving guests.

Part II. Let us desist from this absurd, diabolical, and destructive curiosity. For if someone says that he has been elected among the clergy, if he calls himself a priest, examine him; for in such matters unexamined communion is not without danger. Danger is involved in greater matters, for you do not give, but receive. But if he asks for nourishment, do not examine him concerning these things. How did Abraham show himself hospitable toward everyone? If he had been an examiner of those taking refuge with him, he would never have received angels as guests. For perhaps he would not have thought them angels but would have repelled them with the rest; but because he received everyone, he received angels also. For God will repay you a reward not from the life of those whom you receive, but from your will, from great honor shown, from mercy, and from goodness. Part III. GRATIAN. But although the banquets themselves are not to be despised, nevertheless they ought neither to be celebrated in churches nor clerics summoned to them to take portions from them for themselves.

C. II. In recipiendis hospitibus nulla debet esse distinctio.

II. Pars. Quiescamus ab hac absurda curiositate, et diabolica, et peremptoria. Si enim in clero electum se esse dicat, si sacerdotem se nominet, scrutare: non enim sine periculo in talibus indiscussa communicatio est; circa maiora periculum uertitur: non enim das, sed accipis. Si uero pro nutrimento postulat, ne in his examines. Quomodo Abraham hospitalem se circa omnes ostendebat. Si scrutator esset circa refugientes ad se, numquam angelos hospitio recepisset. Fortassis enim non putasset eos angelos, sed cum reliquis repelleret; sed quoniam omnes recipiebat, suscepit et angelos. Non enim ex uita eorum, quos accipis, mercedem tibi retributurus est Deus, sed ex uoluntate et ex honorificentia multa, ex misericordia, et bonitate. III. Pars. Gratian. Sed licet ipsa conuiuia despicienda non sint, nec tamen in ecclesiis celebrari, nec clericos ad ea conuocatos partes sibi ex eis tollere oportet.

C. III. Clerics summoned to an agape are not to take a portion for themselves.

Ministers of the altar or any clerics summoned to an agape ought not to take portions, because of the injury that from this occasion could be imputed to the ecclesiastical order.

C. III. Clerici ad agapen uocati partem sibi non tollant.

Non oportet ministros altaris uel quoslibet clericos ad agapen uocatos partes tollere, propter iniuriam que ex hac occasione ecclesiastico ordini poterit deputari.

C. IV. In places consecrated to God it is permitted neither to eat nor to spread dining couches.

Likewise [c. 28]. Part IV. It is not fitting to hold an agape in basilicas or churches and to eat inside, or to spread dining couches.

C. IV. In locis Deo sacratis nec comedere, nec accubitus sternere liceat.

Item. [c. 28.] IV. Pars. Non oportet in basilicis seu in ecclesiis agapen facere et intus manducare, uel accubitus sternere.

C. V. Unless compelled by necessity, clerics are not to banquet in a church.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage [c. 30]. Let no bishops or clerics banquet in a church, unless perhaps those passing through are refreshed there by the necessity of lodgings. Let the people also be prohibited from banquets of this kind as far as can be done.

[PALEA.

C. V. Nisi necessitate coacti in ecclesia clerici non conuiuentur.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 30.] Nulli episcopi uel clerici in ecclesia conuiuentur, nisi forte transeuntes hospitiorum necessitate illic reficiantur. Populi etiam ab huiusmodi conuiuiis quantum fieri potest prohibeantur.

Distinction XLIII

GRATIAN. Part I. A priest ought also to be modest, so that he may unceasingly display modesty both in morals and in words. Hence in the Song of Songs the cheeks of the bride, that is, preachers, are compared to a turtledove. §1. He ought also to have the grace of teaching, because, as Jerome says: "An innocent manner of life without speech does as much harm by its silence as it profits by its example. For wolves are to be driven away by the barking of dogs and by the staff." In teaching itself, however, a ruler ought to be discerning, lest he either utter things that should be kept silent or keep silent about things that should be said. Hence Gregory says in chapter XV [Part II] of his Pastoral Rule [c. 4]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Pudicus quoque debet esse sacerdos, ut et moribus, et uerbis pudorem indesinenter exhibeat. Unde in Canticis Canticorum genae sponsae, id est predicatores, turturi comparantur. §. 1. Debet etiam gratiam docendi habere, quia ut Ieronimus ait: "Innocens absque sermone conuersatio, quantum exemplo prodest, tantum silentio nocet. Nam latratu canum et baculo lupi sunt arcendi." In ipsa autem doctrina discretum oportet esse rectorem, ne aut tacenda proferat, aut dicenda taceat. Unde Gregorius in XV. capitulo [Part. II.] sui Pastoralis [c. 4.] ait:

C. I. Concerning discretion in preaching and silence.

Let a ruler be discerning in silence and useful in speech, lest he either utter what should be kept silent or keep silent about what should be uttered. For just as incautious speech drags into error, so indiscreet silence leaves in error those who could have been instructed. For often improvident rulers, fearing to lose human favor, are afraid to speak right things freely; and, according to the voice of Truth, they no longer serve the guardianship of the flock with the zeal of shepherds, but in the manner of hirelings, because when the wolf comes they flee by hiding themselves beneath silence. Hence the Lord, reproving them through the Prophet, says in Isaiah: "Mute dogs, unable to bark." Hence again he complains, saying in Ezekiel: "You have not gone up against the enemy, nor have you set up a wall for the house of Israel, that you might stand in battle on the day of the Lord." For to go up against the enemy is to oppose the powers of this world with a free voice in defense of the flock. And to stand in battle on the day of the Lord is to resist those fighting perversely out of love of justice. For what else is a pastor's fear of speaking right things than to have offered his back by keeping silent? If indeed he opposes himself for the flock, he sets a wall against the enemies for the house of Israel. Hence again it is said to the delinquent people in Jeremiah: "Your prophets saw false and foolish things for you, and they did not lay open your iniquity, that they might provoke you to repentance." For in sacred eloquence teachers are sometimes called prophets, who, while they point out that present things are fleeting, reveal the things that are to come. The divine word reproves them for seeing false things because, while they fear to correct faults, they vainly flatter the delinquent with promised security. They by no means lay open the iniquity of sinners because they keep silent from the voice of reproof. For the word of correction is the key of opening, because by reproving it uncovers a fault that often even the one who committed it does not know. Hence Paul says to Titus: "That he may be able to exhort in sound doctrine and to reprove those who contradict." Hence it is said through Malachi: "The lips of the priest guard knowledge, and they seek the law from his mouth, because he is the angel of the Lord of hosts." Hence through Isaiah the Lord admonishes, saying: "Cry out; do not cease; lift up your voice like a trumpet." For whoever approaches the priesthood undertakes the office of a herald, so that by crying out he may himself go before the coming of the judge who follows terribly. Therefore, if a priest is ignorant of preaching, what voice of crying out will the mute herald give? Hence in the Acts of the Apostles it is said that the Holy Spirit rested upon the first pastors in the form of tongues, because, assuredly, he immediately makes those whom he has filled speak concerning him. Hence Moses is commanded in Exodus that, when the priest enters the tabernacle, he should be surrounded by bells, so that he may have the voices of preaching and not offend the judgment of the heavenly inspector through silence. For it is written: "That the sound may be heard when he enters the sanctuary in the sight of the Lord, and that he may not die." For a priest entering or leaving dies if no sound is heard from him, because he summons against himself the wrath of the hidden judge if he proceeds without the sound of preaching. Appropriately, moreover, the bells are described as inserted in his garments. For what else ought we to understand by the garments of the priest than right works? The Prophet bears witness, who says in Psalm CXXXVI: "Let your priests be clothed with justice." Therefore bells adhere to his garments so that the works of the priest themselves, together with the sound of his tongue, may proclaim the way of life. But when a ruler prepares himself to speak, let him attend with how great a zeal of caution he speaks, lest, if he is swept into speaking inordinately, the hearts of the hearers be struck by the wound of error and, while perhaps he desires to appear wise, he foolishly cut apart the bond of unity. Hence Truth says in Mark: "Have salt in yourselves, and have peace among yourselves." By salt, indeed, the wisdom of the word is designated. Therefore, let one who strives to speak wisely greatly fear lest the unity of the hearers be confounded by his speech. Hence Paul says to the Romans: "Not to be wise beyond what it is fitting to be wise, but to be wise unto sobriety." In Exodus, according to the divine voice, pomegranates are joined to the bells on the priest's garment. For what is designated by pomegranates except the unity of faith? For just as many seeds within are protected by a single rind outside in one pomegranate, so the unity of faith covers the innumerable peoples of the holy Church, whom a diversity of merits holds within. Therefore, lest an incautious ruler rush forth to speak, Truth herself proclaims to the disciples in Mark what we have already set forth: "Have salt in yourselves, and have peace among yourselves," as if she were figuratively saying through the vestment of the priest: Join pomegranates to the bells, so that in everything you say you may hold the unity of faith with cautious observance. §1. It must also be provided with solicitous attention by rulers that not only perverse things but not even right things be uttered by them excessively and inordinately, because often the force of things said is lost when it is cheapened in the hearts of hearers by the incautious importunity of loquacity; and this same loquacity, which does not know how to serve the hearers for the use of advancement, defiles its author. Hence it is well said through Moses in Leviticus: “The man who suffers a flow of seed shall be unclean.” For in the mind of hearers the even quality of speech that is heard is the seed of a thought that will follow, because, while a discourse is conceived through the ear, a thought is generated in the mind. Hence the distinguished preacher was called a “word-sower” by the wise men of this world in the Acts of the Apostles. Therefore, one who sustains a flow of seed is declared unclean because, subjected to much speaking, he defiles himself by that which, if he uttered it in an orderly manner, could have brought forth the offspring of right thought in the heart of the hearers; and while he flows away incautiously through loquacity, he pours out seed not for the use of generation but unto uncleanness. Hence Paul also, when he admonished his disciple concerning persistence in preaching, said in the Second Epistle to Timothy: “I testify before God and Christ Jesus, who will judge the living and the dead, and by his coming and his kingdom: preach the word; be urgent in season, out of season.” Before he said “out of season,” he placed “in season,” because, assuredly, in the mind of the hearer he destroys himself by his own cheapness if his importunity does not know how to possess timeliness.

C. I. De discretione predicationis, et silentii.

Sit rector discretus in silentio, utilis in uerbo, ne aut tacenda proferat, aut proferenda reticescat. Nam sicut incauta locutio in errorem pertrahit, ita indiscretum silentium hos, qui erudiri poterant, in errorem derelinquit. Sepe namque rectores improuidi, humanam amittere gratiam formidantes, loqui libere recta pertimescunt, et iuxta ueritatis uocem nequaquam iam gregis custodiae pastorum studio, sed mercenariorum uice deseruiunt, quia ueniente lupo fugiunt, dum se sub silentio abscondunt. Hinc namque eos per Prophetam Dominus increpans ait in Ysaia: "Canes muti, non ualentes latrare." Hinc rursum queritur dicens in Ezechiele: "Non ascendistis ex aduerso, neque opposuistis murum pro domo Israel, ut staretis in prelio in die Domini." Ex aduerso quippe ascendere est pro defensione gregis uoce libera huius mundi potestatibus contraire. Et in die Domini in prelio stare est prauis decertantibus ex iustitiae amore resistere. Pastori enim recta timuisse dicere, quid est aliud quam tacendo terga prebuisse? qui nimirum, si pro grege se obicit, murum pro domo Israel hostibus opponit. Hinc rursus delinquenti populo dicitur in Hieremia: "Prophetae tui uiderunt tibi falsa et stulta, nec aperiebant iniquitatem tuam, ut te ad penitentiam prouocarent." Prophetae quippe in sacro eloquio nonnunquam doctores uocantur, qui dum fugitiua esse presentia indicant, que sunt uentura manifestant; quos diuinus sermo falsa uidere redarguit, quia, dum culpas corripere metuunt, incassum delinquentibus promissa securitate blandiuntur, qui iniquitatem peccantium nequaquam aperiunt, quia ab increpationis uoce conticescunt. Clauis quippe apertionis est sermo correctionis quia increpando culpam detegit, quam sepe nescit ipse etiam qui perpetrauit. Hinc Paulus ait ad Titum: "Ut potens sit ad exhortandum in doctrina sana et eos qui contradicunt, redarguere." Hinc per Malachiam dicitur: "Labia sacerdotis custodiunt scientiam, et legem requirunt ex ore eius, quia angelus Domini exercituum est." Hinc per Ysaiam Dominus ammonet dicens: "Clama, ne cesses, sicut tuba exalta uocem tuam." Preconis quippe offitium suscipit, quisquis ad sacerdotium accedit, ut ante aduentum iudicis, qui terribiliter sequitur, ipse scilicet clamando gradiatur. Sacerdos ergo, si predicationis est nescius, quam clamoris uocem daturus est preco mutus? In Actibus Apostolorum: hinc est enim, quod super pastores primos in linguarum specie Spiritus sanctus insedit, quia nimirum, quos repleuerit, de se protinus loquentes facit. Hinc Moysi precipitur in Exodo, ut tabernaculum sacerdos ingrediens tintinnabulis ambiatur, ut uidelicet predicationis uoces habeat, ne superni inspectoris iudicium ex silentio offendat. Scriptum quippe est: "Ut audiatur sonitus, quando ingreditur sanctuarium in conspectu Domini, et non moriatur."

Sacerdos namque ingrediens uel egrediens moritur, si de eo sonitus non audiatur, quia iram contra se occulti iudicis exigit, si sine predicationis sonitu incedit. Apte autem tintinnabula uestimentis illius describuntur inserta. Vestimenta etenim sacerdotis quid aliud quam recta opera debemus accipere? Propheta attestante, qui ait in Psalmo CXXXVI.: "Sacerdotes tui induantur iusticia." Vestimentis itaque illius tintinnabula inherent, ut uitae uiam cum linguae sonitu ipsa quoque opera sacerdotis clament. Sed cum rector se ad loquendum preparat, sub quanto cautelae studio loquatur, attendat, ne, si inordinate ad loquendum rapitur, erroris uulnere audientium corda feriantur, et cum fortasse sapientem se uideri desiderat, unitatis compagem insipienter abscidat. Hinc namque ueritas dicit in Marco: "Sal in uobis, et pacem habete inter uos." Per sal quippe uerbi sapientia designatur. Qui ergo sapienter loqui nititur, magnopere metuat, ne eius eloquio audientium unitas confundatur. Hinc Paulus ait ad Romanos: "Non plus sapere, quam oportet sapere, sed sapere ad sobrietatem." In Exodo in sacerdotis ueste iuxta diuinam uocem tintinnabulis mala Punica coniunguntur. Quid enim per mala Punica nisi fidei unitas designatur? Nam sicut in malo Punico uno exterius cortice multa interius grana muniuntur, sic innumeros sanctae ecclesiae populos unitas fidei contegit, quos intus diuersitas meritorum tenet. Ne igitur rector incautus ad loquendum proruat, hoc, quod iam premisimus, per semetipsam discipulis clamat ueritas in Marco: "Habete sal in uobis, et pacem habete inter uos": ac si figurate per habitum sacerdotis dicat: Mala Punica tintinnabulis iungite, ut per omne, quod dicitis, unitatem fidei cauta obseruatione teneatis. §. 1. Prouidendum quoque est sollicita intentione rectoribus, ut ab eis nullo modo non solum praua, sed nec recta quidem nimie et inordinate proferantur, quia sepe dictorum uirtus perditur, cum apud corda audientium loquacitatis incauta inportunitate leuigatur, et auctorem suum hec eadem loquacitas inquinat, que seruire auditoribus ad usum profectus ignorat. Unde bene per Moysen dicitur in Leuitico: "Vir, qui fluxum seminis patitur, inmundus erit." In mente quippe audientium semen secuturae cogitationis est audita equalitas locutionis, quia, dum per aurem sermo concipitur cogitatio in mente generatur. Unde ab huius mundi sapientibus in Actibus Apostolorum predicator egregius semiuerbius uocatus est. Qui ergo fluxum seminis sustinet, inmundus asseritur, quia multiloquio subditus ex eo se inquinat; quod si ordinate promeret, prolem rectae cogitationis edere in audientium corde potuisset, dumque incautus per loquacitatem diffluit, non ad usum generis, sed ad inmundiciam semen fundit. Unde Paulus quoque, cum de instancia predicationis discipulum admoneret, dixit ad Timotheum Ep. II.: "Testificor coram Deo et Christo Iesu, qui iudicaturus est uiuos et mortuos et aduentum ipsius et regnum eius, predica uerbum, insta oportune, inportune." Dicturus: "inportune," premisit: "oportune," quia scilicet apud auditoris mentem ipse sua uilitate se destruit, si habere inportunitas oportunitatem nescit.

C. II. Sacred things are not to be entrusted to swine and dogs.

Likewise Origen. Part II. We have it among the commandments that, when coming to a city, we should first learn who in it is worthy for us to take food with him. How much more ought one to know who and of what quality is the person to whom the words of immortality are to be entrusted? For we ought to be solicitous lest we cast our pearls before swine. But for other reasons it is useful for me to have knowledge of this man. For if I know that he is corrected and blameless in those things concerning which it cannot be doubted that they are good—that is, if he is sober, merciful, just, meek, and humane, things no one doubts are good—then it will appear consequent that what is lacking in faith and knowledge should also be conferred upon one who possesses the goods of the virtues, and that he should be corrected in the things in which his life, otherwise approved in the remaining matters, appeared to be stained. But if he remains enveloped and defiled in sins that are manifest, I ought not to utter anything to him concerning the more secret and remote things of the divine judgment; rather, I should protest and admonish him to cease sinning and to correct his deeds from vices. But if he thrusts himself forward and provokes us to say things that it is not fitting for one acting less rightly to hear, we ought prudently to elude him. For to answer absolutely nothing does not appear useful on account of the hearers, lest perhaps they think that we decline the contest from lack of an answer and the faith of those who do not understand our purpose be injured.

C. II. Porcis et canibus sacra non sunt committenda.

Item Origenes. II. Pars. In mandatis habemus, ut uenientes ad ciuitatem discamus prius, quis in ea dignus sit, ut apud eum cibum sumamus; quanto magis nosse oportet, quis qualisue sit is, cui inmortalitatis uerba credenda sunt? Solliciti enim esse debemus, ne margaritas nostras mittamus ante porcos. Sed ob alias causas utile est uiri huius me habere noticiam. Si enim sciam, quia in his, de quibus non potest dubitari quod bona sint, emendatus est et inculpabilis, (hoc est, si sobrius, si misericors, si iustus, si mitis, et humanus est, que utique bona nullus ambigit,) tunc consequens uidebitur, ut ei, qui obtinet bona uirtutum, etiam quod deest fidei et scientiae conferatur, et in quibus maculari eius uita uidebatur, que est in reliquis probabilis, emendetur. Si uero in his, que palam sunt, peccatis inuolutus permanet et inquinatur, non me oportet aliquid de secretioribus et remotis diuinae sententiae proloqui, sed magis protestari, et conuenire eum, ut peccare desinat et actus suos a uiciis emendet. Quod si ingesserit se, et prouocabit nos dicere, que eum minus recte agentem non oporteat audire, prudenter eum debemus eludere. Nam nichil omnino respondere auditorum causa utile non uidetur, ne forte estiment, nos responsionis penuria declinare certamen, et fides eorum ledatur non intelligentium propositum nostrum.

C. III. Prelates are not to withhold the words of preaching from their persecutors.

Likewise Anacletus [epistle I to all Bishops]. Part III. We know, however, that many harass teachers for this reason, so that they may destroy them and fulfill the resolutions of their own will. Nevertheless, teachers ought not on that account, insofar as their powers suffice, to withdraw from right emulation and good intention, knowing that blessed are those who suffer persecution for justice.

C. III. Verba predicationis persecutoribus suis prelati non subtrahant.

Item Anacletus. [epist. I. omnibus Episcopis.] III. Pars. Scimus autem, multos ob id infestare doctores, ut eos perdant, et propriae uoluntatis placita adinpleant. Non propterea tamen doctores (in quantum uires suppetunt) a recta emulatione et bona intentione recedere debent, scientes, quia beati, qui persecutionem patiuntur propter iusticiam.

C. IV. One who does not announce God's counsel to his subjects is not clean from their blood.

Likewise Gregory to Bishop Venantius [Book I, epistle 33]. Paul says to the Ephesians: "My hands are clean from the blood of all of you, for I did not shrink from announcing to you the whole counsel of God." Therefore, he would not be clean from their blood if he had been unwilling to proclaim God's counsel to them, because when a pastor is unwilling to reprove delinquents, he undoubtedly kills them by keeping silent.

C. IV. Non mundus est a sanguine subiectorum, qui Dei consilium illis non annunciat.

Item Gregorius Venantio Episcopo. [lib. I. epist. 33.] Ephesiis Paulus dicit: "Mundae sunt manus meae a sanguine omnium uestrum: non enim subterfugi, quominus annunciarem omne consilium Dei uobis."

Mundus ergo a sanguine eorum non esset, si eis Dei consilium pronunciare noluisset, quia, cum increpare delinquentes noluerit, eos proculdubio tacendo pastor occidit.

C. V. A preacher who does not scatter the seed of the divine word incurs the penalty of eternal damnation.

Likewise Pope Nicholas [to Emperor Michael, in the epistle whose beginning is We had proposed]. The dispensation of heavenly seed has been enjoined upon us: "Woe to us if we do not scatter it; woe if we keep silent." Since the vessel of election fears this and cries out, how much more is it to be feared by any insignificant person? Accordingly, just as no slight danger lies upon pontiffs for having kept silent about what is fitting, so no moderate peril—may it be absent—belongs to those who, although they ought to obey, despise. Part IV. GRATIAN. A priest ought equally to observe that he not begin by his preaching to disclose secret mysteries to the unworthy and those who do not understand. For one who teaches things that cannot be understood by the hearers effects not their utility but his own ostentation. Hence in the exposition of "Blessed are the undefiled" it is said: "It is a vice of the mind to divulge secrets to the unworthy, which happens either through incautious loquacity, when an irrevocable word flies without judgment; or through flattery, so that he may please the one to whom he reveals secrets; or through boasting of knowledge, so that he may appear to know more things." In all these things it is indeed given to be understood how great discretion there ought to be in a priest's preaching. If perhaps he lacks it, he is judged unworthy of the priestly office as though with a twisted nose.

C. V. Eternae dampnationis penam incurrit predicator, qui semen diuini uerbi non spargit.

Item Nicolaus Papa. [ad Michaelem Imperatorem in epistola, cuius initium est: "Proposueramus."] Dispensatio est nobis celestis seminis iniuncta; "uae si non sparserimus, uae si tacuerimus." Quod cum electionis uas formidet et clamet, quanto magis cuilibet exiguo metuendum est? Proinde, sicut non leue discrimen incumbit pontificibus, siluisse quod congruit, ita his (quod absit) non mediocre periculum est, qui cum debeant parere, despiciunt. IV. Pars. Gratian. Pariter quoque obseruare debet sacerdos, ne indignis et non intelligentibus secreta misteria sua predicatione reserare incipiat. Qui enim ea docet, que ab auditoribus intelligi non ualent, non eorum utilitatem, sed sui ostentationem facit. Unde in expositione: "Beati inmaculati," dicitur: "Vicium animi est, indignis secreta uulgare, quod fit uel loquacitate incauta, dum sine iudicio uolat irreuocabile uerbum, uel adulatione, ut ei placeat, cui secreta reuelat, uel iactatione scientiae, ut plura scire uideatur." In quibus omnibus profecto datur intelligi, quanta debeat esse discretio in predicatione sacerdotis, qua si forte caruerit, tanquam torto naso, sacerdotalis offitii iudicatur indignus.

Distinction XLIV

GRATIAN. Part I. When he is prohibited from being given to wine, he is by no means permitted to have intemperance of gluttony; for drunkenness is not prohibited while voracity is permitted. The Apostle numbers both among the works of darkness, writing to the Romans: "Not in revelings and drunkenness." For the voracity of the belly easily provokes toward lust and dissolves every good work. Hence the belly and the genitals are near to one another, so that from the proximity of the members the alliance of the vices may be understood. Hence also Nebuzaradan, the chief of the cooks, is read to have destroyed the walls of Jerusalem, because the belly, which the multitude of cooks serves, levels the edifices of the virtues to the ground. Therefore, let a priest seek to live from the altar, not to live luxuriously. Hence Jerome says: "You, O priest, are permitted to live from the altar, not to live luxuriously." §1. Revelings, moreover, are harmful not only to priests but also to laypeople, who think that they celebrate festive and solemn days worthily in no other way unless they serve revelings. Hence Augustine writes to Bishop Aurelius [epistle LXIV]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Cum autem uinolentus esse prohibetur, gulae intemperantiam nequaquam habere permittitur; neque enim ebrietas prohibetur, et uoracitas permittitur. Utrumque enim inter opera tenebrarum Apostolus connumerat, scribens Romanis: "Non in comessationibus et ebrietatibus." Ventris namque ingluuies ad luxuriam facile prouocat, et omne bonum opus dissoluit. Unde uenter et genitalia sibimetipsis uicina sunt, ut ex uicinitate membrorum confederatio intelligatur uitiorum. Hinc etiam Nabusardan princeps cocorum muros Ierusalem destruxisse legitur, quia uenter, cui multitudo cocorum deseruit, edificia uirtutum ad solum redigit. Sacerdos itaque de altario uiuere, non luxuriari querat. Unde Ieronimus ait: "Tibi o sacerdos de altario uiuere, non luxuriari permittitur." §. 1. Sunt autem comessationes non solum sacerdotibus, sed etiam laicis noxiae qui festiuos et solempnes dies non aliter se digne celebrare putant, nisi comessationibus deseruiant. Unde Augustinus scribit ad Aurelium Episcopum: [epist. LXIV.]

C. I. One must not give oneself to revelings and drunkenness.

Revelings and drunkenness are thought to be so conceded and lawful that in honor of the most blessed martyrs they are celebrated not only on solemn days—something that everyone who does not behold these things with fleshly eyes sees is to be lamented—but even daily. And a little later: Therefore, as I judge, these things are removed not harshly, not severely, not in an imperious manner, but more by teaching than by commanding, more by admonishing than by threatening. For one must act thus with a multitude. Severity, however, is to be exercised against the sins of a few. And if indeed we threaten, let it be done with sorrow, by threatening the future vengeance from the Scriptures, so that not we ourselves in our power but God in our discourse may be feared. Thus the spiritual, or those near to the spiritual, will first be moved, and by their authority and indeed very gentle but most persistent admonitions the remaining multitude may be broken.

> C. I. Non est uacandum comessationibus et ebrietatibus.
> Comessationes et ebrietates ita concessae putantur et licitae, ut in honorem beatissimorum martirum non solum per dies solempnes, (quod unus quisque non lugendum uideat, qui hec non carneis oculis inspicit?), sed etiam cotidie celebrentur. Et post pauca: Non ergo aspere, quantum estimo, non duriter, non modo imperiose ista tolluntur: magis docendo quam iubendo, magis monendo quam minando. Sic enim agendum est cum multitudine. Seueritas autem exercenda est in peccata paucorum. Et si quidem minamur, cum dolore fiat, de scripturis comminando uindictam futuram, ne nos ipsi in nostra potestate, sed Deus in nostro sermone timeatur. Ita prius mouebuntur spirituales uel spiritualibus proximi, quorum auctoritate et lenissimis quidem, sed instantissimis admonicionibus cetera multitudo frangatur.

C. II. None of the clerics or continent persons is permitted to enter taverns.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea [c. 24]. Clerics serving from priests down to subdeacons, and thereafter all of ecclesiastical order down to ministers, or readers, or exorcists, or ostiaries, or psalmists, or even those who are in a profession of continence, ought not to enter taverns.

> C. II. Nulli clericorum aut continentium licet tabernas intrare.

Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 24.] Non oportet clericos seruientes a presbiteris usque ad subdiaconos et deinceps ordinis ecclesiastici omnes usque ad ministros, aut lectores, aut exorcistas, aut hostiarios, aut psalmistas, aut etiam eos, qui in proposito continentiae sunt, tabernas intrare.

C. III. Let a cleric who wishes to keep a tavern or workshop be deposed.

Likewise from the Sixth Synod [c. 9]. No cleric is permitted to keep a tavern or workshop. For if he is prohibited from entering a tavern of this kind, how much more from ministering to others in it? But if anyone does such a thing, let him either cease or be deposed.

C. III. Deponatur clericus, qui tabernas aut ergasterium habere uoluerit.

Item ex VI. Sinodo. [cap. 9.] Nulli licet clerico tabernam aut ergasterium habere. Si enim huiusmodi tabernam ingredi inhibetur, quanto magis aliis ministrare in ea? Si quis uero tale quid fecerit, aut cesset, aut deponatur.

C. IV. Unless compelled by necessity, clerics are not to enter taverns.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage [c. 27]. Let clerics not enter taverns for the sake of eating or drinking unless compelled by the necessity of travel.

C. IV. Nisi necessitate compulsi clerici tabernas non ingrediantur.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 27.] Clerici edendi uel bibendi causa tabernas non ingrediantur, nisi peregrinationis necessitate compulsi.

C. V. A bishop who is occupied with banquets is to be corrected.

Likewise Gregory to Bishop Natalis [Book II of the Register, indiction X, epistle 14]. Part II. From many persons coming from your city, dearest brother, I learned that, having abandoned pastoral care, you are occupied only with banquets. I would not believe the things heard unless I proved them by the evidence of your actions. For the fact that you by no means devote yourself to reading, by no means watch over exhortation, but are ignorant even of the very practice of ecclesiastical order, is testified by the fact that you do not know how to preserve reverence toward those under whom you are placed.

C. V. Corripiendus est episcopus, qui conuiuiis occupatur.

Item Gregorius Natali Episcopo. [lib. II. Reg. Indict. X. epist. 14.] II. Pars. Multis ab urbe tua uenientibus, frater karissime, didici, pastorali cura derelicta solis te conuiuiis occupatum. Que audita non crederem, nisi hec actionum tuarum experimentis approbarem. Nam quia nequaquam lectioni studeas, nequaquam exortationi inuigiles, sed ipsum quoque usum ecclesiastici ordinis ignores, hoc est in testimonium, quod eis, sub quibus positus es, seruare reuerentiam nescis.

C. VI. Concerning the same.

Likewise to the same [Book II, epistle 37]. Your fraternity rightly praises in its letters banquets that are held with the intention of expending charity. Yet it must be known that they truly proceed from charity when the life of no absent person is bitten in them, no one is reproved in mockery, and in them not the empty tales of secular affairs but the words of sacred reading are heard; when the body is served no more than necessary, but only its infirmity is refreshed, so that it may be maintained for the exercise of virtue. Therefore, if you do these things at your banquets, I confess that you are masters of those who abstain.

[PALEA.

C. VI. De eodem.

Item ad eundem. [ib. II. epist. 37.] Conuiuia, que ex intentione impendendae karitatis fiunt, recte uestra fraternitas in suis epistolis laudat. Sed tamen sciendum est, quia tunc ex karitate ueraciter prodeunt, cum in eis nulla absentium uita mordetur, nullus ex irrisione reprehenditur, nec in eis inanes secularium negotiorum fabulae, sed uerba sacrae lectionis audiuntur; cum non plus, quam necesse est, seruitur corpori, sed sola eius infirmitas reficitur, ut ad usus exercendae uirtutis habeatur. Hec itaque si uos in uestris conuiuiis agitis, abstinentium, fateor, magistri estis.

[PALEA.

C. VII. Likewise from the Council of Nantes.

Let none of the priests, when he has gathered at the annual day, the thirtieth, seventh, or third day of any deceased person, or when priests have gathered at a collection by any invitation, presume in any way to become intoxicated, nor, having been entreated, to drink for love of the saints or of the soul itself, or to compel others to drink, or to gorge himself at another's entreaty. Nor let him presume to make disorderly applause and laughter, to recount empty tales there, or to sing; or permit shameful entertainments to be performed before him either by a bear or by dancing women; nor consent that masks of demons be carried before him, because this is diabolical and prohibited by the sacred canons.]

[PALEA

C. VII. Item ex Concilio Nanetensi.

Nullus presbiterorum, quando ad anniuersarium diem, trigesimum, aut septimum, uel tertium alicuius defuncti, aut quacumque uocatione ad collectam presbiteri conuenerit, se inebriare ullatenus presumat, nec precatus amore sanctorum uel ipsius animae bibere, aut alios ad bibendum cogere, uel se aliena precatione ingurgitare; nec plausus et risus inconditos, et fabulas inanes ibi referre, aut cantare presumat, aut turpia ioca uel urso, uel tornatricibus ante se fieri patiatur; nec laruas demonum ante se ferri consentiat, quia hoc diabolicum est et a sacris canonibus prohibitum.]

[PALEA

C. VIII. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the same. When priests gather at any banquet, let one who is their prior begin a verse before the table and bless the food. Then let them sit according to order, one offering honor to another; and let them bless the food and drink by turns, and let one of their clerics read something from holy Scripture. And after the refreshment, let them similarly say a holy hymn after the example of the Lord, as he is read to have done at the supper; and let all priests conduct themselves in such a way, especially in places of this kind, that their ministry may not be reviled.]

[PALEA

C. VIII. De eodem.

Item ex eodem. Quando autem conuenerint presbiteri ad aliquod conuiuium, aliquis prior illorum uersum ante mensam incipiat et cibum benedicat. Et tunc secundum ordinem sedeant, alter alteri honorem prebentes; et per uices cibum et potum benedicant, et aliquis de illorum clericis aliquid de sancta scriptura legat. Et post refectionem similiter sanctum ymnum dicant ad exemplum Domini, sicut in cena fecisse legitur, et sic se contineant omnes presbiteri, maxime in talibus locis, ut non uituperetur ministerium illorum.]

[PALEA

C. IX. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the same. When priests gather together at the Kalends, after the divine mystery has been completed, for a necessary conference, let them sit there at the tables not as though for a full refreshment but as though for a breakfast, lest through such dishonorable banquets they burden one another, because this is unbecoming and burdensome. Often, moreover, when they return late to the church they obtain greater loss from reproof, contracted from the burden they impose upon one another, than the profit they make there. For concerning an assembly of this kind Paul reproves the Corinthians, who came together to eat the Lord's supper in an unfitting manner. So also those who come together for the Lord's supper, that is, for a conference upon the word, under that pretext, while in truth they unite for the sake of the belly, are held reprehensible before God and human beings. And therefore, when all things have been completed, let those who wish break bread with charity in the house of their brother together with the brethren, and let each cause each to drink, and especially let them not touch the cup beyond a third time; and so let them return to the churches.]

C. IX. De eodem.

Item ex eodem. Quando presbiteri per calendas simul conueniunt post peractum diuinum misterium ad necessariam collationem, non quasi ad plenam refectionem, sed quasi ad prandium ibi ad tabulas resideant, ne per talia inhonesta conuiuia se inuicem grauent, quia indecens est et onerosum. Sepe etiam tarde ad ecclesiam redeuntes maius damnum de reprehensione consequuntur, quod de grauedine mutua contrahunt, quam lucrum ibi faciant. Nam de huiusmodi conuentu Paulus Corinthios reprehendit, qui inconuenienter cenam dominicam manducare conueniebant. Sic et qui ad cenam dominicam, id est ad collationem uerbi, sub occasione conueniunt, et ex ueritate uentris causa coniunguntur, reprehensibiles coram Deo et hominibus habentur. Et ideo peractis omnibus, qui uoluerint panem cum caritate in domo fratris sui simul cum fratribus frangant, et singuli singulos bibere faciant, et maxime ultra tertiam uicem poculum non contingant, et sic ad ecclesias redeant.]

C. X. Christians are not to celebrate banquets from contributions.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea [c. 55]. Part III. Ministers of the altar or any clerics, or even Christian laypeople, ought not to celebrate banquets from contributions, which the common people call drinking parties.

C. X. Christiani ex simbolis conuiuia non celebrent.

Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 55] III. Pars. Non oportet ministros altaris uel quoslibet clericos, aut etiam laicos Christianos ex simbolis, que uulgus comissalia appellat, conuiuia celebrare.

C. XI. A reading from the sacred Scriptures is always to be mingled with priestly banquets.

Likewise from the Third Council of Toledo [c. 7]. For reverence toward God and the priests, the universal synod established that, because idle tales are frequently accustomed to be interposed at tables, a reading from the divine Scriptures should be mingled with every priestly banquet. For through this both souls are built up toward the good and unnecessary tales are prohibited.

C. XI. Sacrarum scripturarum lectio sacerdotalibus conuiuiis semper admisceatur.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano III. [c. 7.] Pro reuerentia Dei et sacerdotum id uniuersa constituit sinodus, ut (quia solent crebro mensis ociosae fabulae interponi) in omni sacerdotali conuiuio lectio diuinarum scripturarum misceatur. Per hoc enim et animae edificantur ad bonum, et fabulae non necessariae prohibentur.

C. XII. Clerics are permitted neither to hold banquets from contributions nor to eat before the third hour of the day.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin [cc. 61 and 66]. Let priests or clerics, or even religious laypeople, not be permitted to hold banquets from contributions. §1. Nor ought clerics or religious laypeople to enter banquets before the sacred third hour of the day, nor at any time ought clerics to eat bread unless a hymn has been said, and after food to return thanks to God the author. GRATIAN. Therefore, if revelings are damnable for laypeople, much more are they imputed to priests unto Gehenna. For a fat belly, as Jerome says, generates a gross understanding, whereas priestly understanding ought, on the contrary, to be watchful and subtle; and therefore those subject to the vice of gluttony ought not to be anointed as priests. For those, as Gregory says in the Moralia, who are still subject to the warfare of vices ought by no means to preside over the teaching of others through the practice of preaching.

C. XII. De confertis nec conuiuia facere, nec ante horam diei tertiam clericis comedere licet.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 61. et 66.] Non liceat sacerdotes uel clericos, sed nec religiosos laicos conuiuia facere de confertis. §. 1. Nec oportet clericos uel laicos religiosos ante sacram horam diei tertiam inire conuiuia, neque aliquando clericos, nisi ymno dicto edere panem, et post cibos gratias auctori Deo referre. Gratian. Si ergo laicis comessationes dampnabiles sunt, multo magis sacerdotibus inputantur ad gehennam. Venter enim pinguis (ut ait Ieronimus) crassum sensum generat, cum sacerdotalis sensus econtra uigil debeat esse et tenuis; atque ideo edacitatis uitio obnoxii in sacerdotes ungi non debent. Hi enim (ut ait Gregorius in Moralibus), qui adhuc uiciorum bello subiacent, nequaquam per predicationis usum preesse magisterio ceterorum debent.

Distinction XLV

GRATIAN. Part I. It follows: "not a striker." For a bishop ought not to be so irascible and disturbed in understanding that he strikes, since he ought to be patient; rather, let him follow the one who set his back before scourges. Hence Gregory writes to John, Bishop of Constantinople [Book I, epistle 52]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Sequitur: "non percussorem". Non enim oportet episcopum ita esse irascibilem et perturbati sensus, ut percutiat, qui debet esse patiens: sed sequatur eum, qui dorsum posuit ad flagella. Unde Gregorius scribit Iohanni Episcopo Constantinopolitano: [lib. I. epist. 52.]

C. I. Bishops ought to be feared for correction by words, not by blows.

What the canons say concerning bishops who wish to be feared by blows your fraternity knows well. For we have been made shepherds, not strikers. The distinguished preacher says: "Reprove, entreat, rebuke with all patience and doctrine." But this preaching that exacts faith by blows is new and unheard of.

C. I. Verborum correctione, non uerberibus timeri debent episcopi.

Quid autem de episcopis, qui uerberibus uolunt timeri, canones dicant, bene fraternitas uestra nouit. Pastores enim facti sumus, non percussores. Egregius predicator dicit: "Argue, obsecra, increpa cum omni patientia et doctrina." Noua uero atque inaudita est ista predicatio, que uerberibus exigit fidem.

[C. II.]

Likewise in a certain Council [the Roman under Sylvester, c. 17]. Let no one touch any sinning cleric with a beating; let no priest bring a deacon, nor a bishop a cleric or servant of the Church, to a beating. But if the cause so requires—that is, if the cleric has proved incorrigible—let him be deprived of his honor for three days, so that, repenting, he may return to mother Church.

[C. II.]

Item in quodam Concilio. [Romano sub Siluestro, c. 17.] Neminem quisquam peccantem clericum cede attingat, non presbiter diaconum, non episcopus clericum uel seruitorem ecclesiae ad cedem perducat. Quod si ita causa exigit, id est, si incorrigibilis extiterit clericus, triduo priuetur honore, ut penitens redeat ad matrem ecclesiam.

C. III. Certain persons are to be provoked to faith not by harsh but by gentle words.

Likewise to Paschasius, Bishop of Naples [Book XI, epistle 15]. Those who with sincere intention desire to lead persons alien to the Christian religion to the right faith ought to devote themselves to blandishments, not harshness, lest adversity drive far away those whose mind an explanation rendered calmly could have provoked. For whoever act otherwise and under this covering wish to remove them from the customary observance of their rite are proved to attend there to their own causes more than God's. §1. The Jews dwelling at Naples have indeed complained to us, asserting that certain persons strive unreasonably to prohibit them from certain solemnities of their feast days, so that it may not be lawful for them to observe the solemnities of their feasts as it has been lawful for them and their parents to observe them until now for long periods in the past. If the truth stands thus, they appear to devote their labor to a superfluous matter. For what utility is there when, even if they have been prohibited contrary to long usage, it profits nothing toward their conversion to the faith? Or why do we set rules for the Jews concerning how they ought to observe their ceremonies if through this we cannot gain them? Therefore one must act so that, provoked rather by reason and meekness, they may wish to follow us, not flee us, so that by showing them from their own books the things we say we may, with God's help, convert them to the bosom of mother Church. And so, as your fraternity is able, let it by admonitions and with God's help kindle them toward conversion, and let it not permit them again to be disturbed concerning their solemnities; rather, let them have free license to observe and celebrate all their festivals and feast days, just as both they and their parents, observing them through long periods in the past, have maintained them until now.

C. III. Non asperis, sed blandis uerbis ad fidem sunt aliqui prouocandi.

Item Pascasio Episcopo Neapolim. [lib. XI. epist. 15.] Qui sincera intentione extraneos a Christiana religione ad fidem cupiunt rectam adducere, blandimentis debent, non asperitatibus studere, ne quorum mentem reddita a plano ratio poterat prouocare, pellat procul aduersitas. Nam quicumque aliter agunt, et eos sub hoc uelamine a consueta ritus sui uolunt cultura remouere, suas illic magis, quam Dei probantur causas attendere. §. 1. Iudei siquidem Neapolim habitantes questi nobis sunt asserentes, quod quidam eos a quibusdam feriarum suarum sollempnitatibus irrationabiliter nitantur arcere, ne illis sit licitum festiuitatum suarum sollempnia colere, sicut eis nunc usque et parentibus eorum longis retro temporibus licuit obseruare. Quod si ita se ueritas habet, superuacuae rei uidentur operam dare. Nam quid utilitatis est, quando, etsi contra longum usum fuerint uetiti, ad fidei illis conuersionem nil proficit? Aut cur Iudeis qualiter ceremonias suas colere debeant regulas ponimus, si per hoc eos lucrari non possumus? Agendum est ergo, ut potius ratione et mansuetudine prouocati sequi nos uelint, non fugere, ut eos, ex eorum codicibus ostendentes que dicimus, ad sinum matris ecclesiae Deo possimus adiuuante conuertere. Itaque fraternitas tua eos monitis prout potuerit, Deo adiuuante ad conuertendum accendat, et de suis illos solempnitatibus inquietari denuo non permittat, sed omnes festiuitates feriasque suas, sicut hactenus tam ipsi quam parentes eorum per longa colentes retro tempora tenuerunt, liberam habeant obseruandi celebrandique licentiam.

C. IV. Prelates are to correct subjects not with severity but with benevolence.

The same to all the Bishops established throughout Gaul, Europe, and Germany. Although things that are to be reproved frequently happen among priests, nevertheless let benevolence accomplish more toward those to be corrected than severity, exhortation more than agitation, charity more than power, since none of us lives without reproof or without sin. For if the Lord had judged blessed Peter, our teacher and apostle, immediately after his threefold denial, he would not have received so much fruit from him as he did. Therefore, rulers of the Church are rather to be awaited and corrected than immediately judged. Hence it is necessary that every ecclesiastical affair, after the evidence of many causes, be considered more solicitously and guarded more diligently, so that through the spirit of charity and peace every material of scandals, presumption of the Jews, and oppression of simple brethren may be removed from the churches of the Lord. And just as none of the brethren wishes himself to be weighed down by the judgment of others, so let him not dare to inflict upon another what he does not wish to be done to himself. Jews are not to be compelled to the faith; nevertheless, if they have received it unwillingly, they are to be compelled to retain it. Hence in the Fourth Council of Toledo [c. 56] it was established:

C. IV. Non seueritate, sed beniuolentia subditos prelati corripiant.

Idem uniuersis Episcopis per Galliam et Europam et Germaniam constitutis. Licet plerumque accidant sacerdotibus que sunt reprehendenda, plus tamen erga corrigendos agat beniuolentia quam seueritas, plus cohortatio quam commotio, plus karitas quam potestas, cum nemo nostrum sine reprehensione aut sine peccato uiuat. Nam si Dominus statim post trinam negationem B. Petrum preceptorem nostrum apostolum iudicasset, non tantum ex eo fructum, sicut fecit, recepisset. Expectandi ergo atque corrigendi magis sunt rectores ecclesiae, quam statim iudicandi. Unde necesse est queque negotia ecclesiastica post multarum experimenta causarum sollicitius perspici, et diligentius precaueri, quatinus per spiritum karitatis et pacis omnis materia scandalorum et presumptio Iudeorum atque oppressio simplicium fratrum de ecclesiis Domini auferantur. Et sicut non uult quisquam fratrum se aliorum iudicio pregrauari, ita non audeat alii inferre quod sibi non uult fieri. Iudei non sunt cogendi ad fidem, quam tamen si inuiti susceperint, cogendi sunt retinere. Unde in Tolletano Concilio IV. [c. 56.] statutum est:

C. V. Just as Jews are not to be compelled to the faith, so those converted are not permitted to withdraw from it.

Concerning the Jews, however, the holy synod commanded that henceforth no one inflict force upon them for believing. “For God has mercy upon whom he wills, and whom he wills he hardens.” For persons of this kind are not to be saved unwillingly but willingly, so that the form of justice may remain integral. For just as a human being, obeying the serpent by the will of his own choice, perished, so, when the grace of God calls him, each person is saved by believing through the conversion of his own mind. Therefore, they are to be persuaded, not rather driven, to be converted, not by force but by the free capacity of choice. Those, however, who were formerly compelled to Christianity, as was done in the times of the most religious prince Sisebut, because it is now established that they were associated with the divine sacraments, received the grace of baptism, were anointed with chrism, and became participants in the body of the Lord, ought to be compelled to maintain the faith they received by force or necessity, lest the name of the Lord be blasphemed and the faith they received be held cheap and contemptible.

> C. V. Sicut non sunt Iudei ad fidem cogendi, ita nec conuersis ab ea recedere permittitur.
> De Iudeis autem precepit sancta sinodus, nemini deinceps uim ad credendum inferre. "Cui enim uult Deus miseretur, et quem uult indurat." Non enim tales inuiti saluandi sunt, sed uolentes, ut integra sit forma iusticiae. Sicut enim homo propria arbitrii uoluntate serpenti obediens periit, sic uocante se gratia Dei propriae mentis conuersione quisque credendo saluatur. Ergo non ui, sed libera arbitrii facultate ut conuertantur suadendi sunt, non potius inpellendi. Qui autem iampridem ad Christianitatem coacti sunt, (sicut factum est temporibus religiosissimi principis Sisebuti), quia iam constat eos sacramentis diuinis associatos, et baptismi gratiam suscepisse, et crismate unctos esse, et corporis Domini extitisse participes, oportet, ut fidem, quam ui uel necessitate susceperint, tenere cogantur, ne nomen Domini blasphemetur, et fides, quam susceperunt, uilis ac contemptibilis, habeatur.

C. VI. Let benevolence accomplish more toward those to be corrected than severity.

Likewise Bishop Leo [epistle LXXXII to Anastasius, Bishop of Thessalonica, c. 1]. Although things that are to be reproved sometimes happen in priestly persons, nevertheless let benevolence accomplish more toward those to be corrected than severity, exhortation more than agitation, charity more than power. But those who seek the things that are their own, not the things of Jesus Christ, easily depart from this law; and while it pleases them to dominate subjects rather than counsel them, honor inflates pride, and that which was provided for concord tends toward harm.

> C. VI. Beniuolentia plus quam seueritas erga corrigendos agat.
> Item Leo Episcopus. [epist. LXXXII. ad Anastasium Episcopum Thessalonicensem, c. I.] Licet nonnumquam accidant, que in sacerdotalibus sunt reprehendenda personis, plus tamen erga corrigendos agat beniuolentia quam seueritas, plus cohortacio quam commotio, plus karitas quam potestas. Sed ab his, qui que sua querunt, non que Iesu Christi, facile ab hac lege disceditur; et dum dominari magis quam consulere subditis placet honor inflat superbiam, et quod prouisum est ad concordiam, tendit ad noxam.

C. VII. Let a deacon, priest, or bishop who seeks to be feared by blows be cast down from office.

Likewise from a canon of the Apostles [canon 28, according to the old version]. We command that a bishop, priest, or deacon who strikes delinquent believers or unbelievers acting unjustly, and through this wishes to be feared, be cast down from his office, because the Lord never taught us this. On the contrary, he himself, "when he was struck, did not strike back; when he was cursed, did not curse; when he suffered, did not threaten."

C. VII. Deiciatur ab offitio diaconus presbiter et episcopus uerberibus timeri querens.

Item ex canone Apostolorum. [can. 28. (juxta priscam uersionem)] Episcopum, aut presbiterum, aut diaconum percutientem fideles delinquentes aut infideles inique agentes, et per huiusmodi uolentem timeri, ab offitio suo deici precipimus, quia numquam nos Dominus hoc docuit. E contrario uero ipse, "cum percuteretur, non repercutiebat, cum malediceretur, non maledicebat, cum pateretur, non comminabatur."

C. VIII. Bishops are to correct subjects not by blows but by words.

Likewise from the Council of Braga [III, c. 7]. Since the blessed Apostle commands one to reprove, entreat, or rebuke with all patience, we have learned that, outside this teaching, certain of the brethren rage with such great beatings against those without honor as the persons of brigands could deserve. And therefore, it is not worthy that those who have now merited ecclesiastical grades—that is, priests, abbots, or Levites, who, except for graver and mortal faults, ought to be subject to no blows—should everywhere be subjected to blows and pain by each prelate as he wishes and as it pleases him, lest, while he incautiously strikes the subject members, he also take away the reverence owed to him by his subjects, according to what a certain wise person says: “One lightly chastised displays reverence to the chastiser, but a reproof of excessive harshness receives neither reproof nor salvation.” And therefore, if anyone, exalted by the license of the power he has received, believes that the aforesaid honorable subjects are to be beaten out of malice alone otherwise than has been said, he will sustain a sentence of both excommunication and exile according to the measure of the blows he has inflicted. Part II. GRATIAN. Solomon, however, admonishes to the contrary, saying: “Strike your son with the rod, and you will deliver his soul from death.” Hence blessed Gregory also writes in the Dialogues that blessed Benedict healed by striking with a rod a certain monk whom he could not cure by frequent admonition. Hence also the Lord, having made a scourge from little cords, scourged those conducting themselves badly in the temple and cast them out of the house of prayer. Hence also the Apostle handed that fornicator over to Satan to be vexed bodily, and condemned that magician with bodily blindness. Hence also in the canons boys who before the rational years conduct themselves irrationally are commanded to be chastised by blows. Virgins also, if they have put aside the garment of religion and joined themselves to others, are commanded to be confined in workhouses. Hence Gregory also writes in the Moralia, Book XX, part 4, chapter 11:

C. VIII. Non uerberibus, sed uerbis subditos episcopi corripiant.

Item ex Concilio Bracarensi. [III. c. 7.] Cum beatus Apostolus arguere, obsecrare uel increpare in omni patientia precipiat, extra hanc doctrinam nouimus quosdam ex fratribus tantis cedibus in honoratos efferuescere, quanto poterant latrocinantium promereri personae. Et ideo, qui gradus iam ecclesiasticos meruerunt, id est presbiteri, abbates siue leuitae, qui, exceptis grauioribus et mortalibus culpis, nullis debent uerberibus subiacere, non est dignum, ut passim unusquisque prelatus honorabilia membra sua prout uoluerit et ei placuerit uerberibus subiciat et dolori, ne dum incaute subdita percutit membra, ipse quoque debitam sibi subditorum reuerentiam subtrahat, iuxta illud, quod quidam sapiens dicit: "Leuiter castigatus reuerentiam exhibet castiganti, asperitatis autem nimiae increpatio nec increpationem recipit, nec salutem." Et ideo, si quis aliter, quam dictum est, predictos honorabiles subditos, licentia perceptae potestatis elatus, malicia tantum crediderit uerberandos, iuxta uerberum modum, quem intulerit, excommunicationis pariter et exilii sententiam sustinebit. II. Pars. Gratian. Salomon uero econtra ammonet, dicens: "Percute filium tuum uirga, et liberabis animam eius a morte." Hinc etiam B. Gregorius scribit in Dialogo, B. Benedictum quendam monachum uirga percutiendo sanasse, quem crebra ammonitione curare non poterat. Hinc etiam Dominus flagello facto de resticulis male uersantes in templo flagellauit et de orationis domo eiecit. Hinc etiam Apostolus fornicatorem illum satanae corporaliter uexandum tradidit, et magum illum corporali cecitate dampnauit. Hinc etiam in canonibus pueri, qui ante rationales annos irrationabiliter uersantur, uerberibus castigari iubentur. Virgines quoque, si religionis ueste deposita aliis se copulauerint, ergastulis retrudi precipiuntur. Hinc etiam Gregorius in Moralibus scribit libro XX. parte 4. capitulo 11.:

C. IX. Discipline is not to be preserved without mercy, nor mercy without discipline.

Discipline or mercy is greatly deprived if one is maintained without the other. But toward subjects there ought to be in rulers both mercy that counsels justly and discipline that rages piously. Hence it is that both wine and oil are applied to the wounds of that half-dead man who was led by the Samaritan into the inn, so that through wine the wounds may be bitten, and through oil they may be soothed; so that everyone who presides over the healing of wounds may apply in wine the bite of strictness and in oil the softness of piety. Through wine putrid things are cleansed; through oil things to be healed are soothed. Gentleness, therefore, is to be mingled with severity; a certain tempering is to be made from both, so that subjects may neither be ulcerated by much harshness nor loosened by excessive kindness. This is certainly signified by that ark of the tabernacle in which the rod is together with the tablets and the manna, because when knowledge of sacred Scripture is in the breast of a good ruler, if there is the rod of strictness, let there also be the manna of sweetness. Hence David also says: "Your rod and your staff, they have consoled me." For by the rod we are struck, and by the staff we are sustained. Therefore, if there is the strictness of justice that strikes, let there also be the consolation of the staff that sustains. Accordingly, let there be love, but not one that softens; let there be vigor, but not one that exasperates; let there be zeal, but not one that rages immoderately; let there be piety, but not one that spares more than is expedient. It is pleasing to behold in the breast of Moses mercy joined together with severity. Let us see him loving piously and raging strictly. §1. Certainly, when the Israelite people had contracted before the eyes of God an almost unpardonable offense, so that its ruler heard: "Go down; your people have sinned," as if the divine voice said to him: "He who has fallen into such sin is not mine," and added: "Let me alone, that my fury may be angry against them and that I may destroy them, and I will make you into a great nation," he, once and again opposing himself for the people over whom he presided as a barrier against the onslaught of the angry God, said: "Either forgive them this offense, or, if you do not, blot me out of your book that you have written." Let us therefore consider with what inward affection he loved that people, for whose life he asked to be blotted from the book of life. Yet let us consider with how great a zeal for rectitude this man, who is bound by so great a love for that people, was inflamed against its faults. For immediately after he obtained that the pardon of the fault be granted, kindled by zeal for rectitude, he said: "Let every man place his sword upon his thigh; go and return from gate to gate through the midst of the camp, and let each kill his brother and friend and neighbor"; and on that day about twenty-three thousand persons fell. Behold, the one who sought the life of the people even by his own death extinguished by the sword the life of a few. Within he burned with the fire of love; without he was kindled with the zeal of severity. So great was his piety that he did not hesitate to offer himself to death before the Lord for them; so great his severity that those whom he had feared would be struck divinely he himself struck with the sword of judgment. Thus he loved those over whom he presided so that for them he did not spare even himself; and nevertheless he so pursued the delinquents whom he loved that he laid them low even when the Lord spared them. A strong legate in both matters, an admirable mediator in both, he pleaded the cause of the people before God by prayers and the cause of God before the people by swords. Loving inwardly, he opposed the divine wrath by supplication; raging outwardly, he consumed the fault by striking. Therefore, in governance Moses mingled both, so that neither mercy would be absent from discipline nor discipline from mercy. Hence here also it is said according to both virtues: "And when I sat as though a king with the army standing around me, I was nevertheless the consoler of those who mourned." For to sit with the army standing around is the vigor of the discipline of governance; but to console the hearts of those who mourn is the ministry of piety.

C. IX. Disciplina non est seruanda sine misericordia, nec misericordia sine disciplina.

Disciplina uel misericordia multum destituitur, si una sine altera teneatur. Sed circa subditos inesse debet rectoribus et iuste consulens misericordia, et pie seuiens disciplina. Hinc est, quod semiuiui illius uulneribus, qui a Samaritano in stabulum ductus est, et uinum adhibetur et oleum, ut per uinum mordeantur uulnera, per oleum foueantur: quatinus unusquisque, qui sanandis uulneribus preest, in uino morsum districtionis adhibeat, in oleo molliciem pietatis; per uinum mundantur putrida, per oleum sananda fouentur. Miscenda ergo est lenitas cum seueritate, faciendum est quoddam ex utroque temperamentum, ut neque multa asperitate exulcerentur subditi, neque nimia benignitate soluantur. Hoc nimirum illa tabernaculi archa significat, in qua cum tabulis uirga simul et manna est, quia cum scripturae sacrae scientia est in boni rectoris pectore si est uirga districtionis, sit et manna dulcedinis. Hinc etiam Dauid ait:

"Virga tua et baculus tuus ipsa me consolata sunt." Virga enim percutimur, et baculo sustentamur. Si ergo est districtio iusticiae, que feriat, sit et consolatio baculi, que sustentet. Sit itaque amor, sed non emolliens, sit uigor sed non exasperans, sit zelus, sed non inmoderate seuiens; sit pietas, sed non plus quam expediat parcens. Intueri libet in Moysi pectore misericordiam simul cum seueritate sociatam. Videamus amantem pie et districte seuientem. §. 1. Certe cum Israeliticus populus ante Dei oculos pene inueniabilem contraxisset offensam, ita ut eius rector audisset: "Descende, peccauit populus tuus," ac si ei diuina uox diceret: "qui in tali peccato lapsus est, meus non est," atque subiungeret: "Dimitte me, ut irascatur furor meus contra eos, et deleam eos, faciamque te in gentem magnam," ille semel et iterum pro populo, cui preerat, obicem se ad impetum Dei irascentis opponens ait: "Aut dimitte eis hanc noxam, aut si non facis, dele me de libro tuo, quem scripsisti." Pensemus ergo, quibus uisceribus eundem populum amauit, pro cuius uita de libro uitae deleri se petiit. Sed tamen iste, qui tanto amore eius populi constringitur, contra eius culpas pensemus quanto zelo rectitudinis accendatur. Mox enim, ut culpae uenia delerentur obtinuit zelo rectitudinis succensus ait: "Ponat uir gladium super femur suum, ite et redite de porta usque ad portam per medium castrorum, et occidat unusquisque fratrem et amicum et proximum suum; ceciderunt que in die illo quasi uiginti tria milia hominum." Ecce, qui uitam hominum etiam cum sua morte petiit, paucorum uitam gladio extinxit. Intus arsit igne amoris: foris accensus est zelo seueritatis. Tanta fuit pietas, ut se pro illis coram Domino morti offerre non dubitaret; tanta seueritas, ut eos, quos diuinitus feriri timuerat, ipse iudicii gladio feriret. Sic amauit eos, quibus prefuit, ut pro eis nec sibi parceret, et tamen delinquentes sic persecutus est, quos amauit, ut eos etiam parcente Domino prosterneret. Utrobique legatus fortis, utrobique mediator admirabilis, causam populi apud Deum precibus, causam Dei apud populum gladiis allegauit. Intus amans diuinae irae suplicando obstitit: foris seuiens culpam feriendo consumpsit. In regimine ergo utrumque Moyses miscuit, ut nec disciplinae deesset misericordia, nec misericordiae disciplina. Unde hic quoque iuxta utramque uirtutem dicitur: "Cumque sederem quasi rex circumstante exercitu, eram tamen merentium consolator." Sedere quippe circumstante exercitu uigor est disciplinae regiminis: merentium uero corda consolari ministerium pietatis.

C. X. One judging justly preserves mercy together with justice.

The same. Everyone who judges justly carries a balance in his hand; in each weight he carries justice and mercy. But through justice he renders sentence upon sins; through mercy he moderates the punishment of sin, so that by a just balance he may correct certain things through equity and forgive others through compassion. One who sets the judgments of God before his eyes, always fearing and trembling, dreads in every affair lest, deviating from the path of justice, he fall and be condemned rather by that from which he is not justified.

C. X. Iuste iudicans misericordiam cum iusticia seruat.

Idem. Omnis, qui iuste iudicat, stateram in manu gestat; in utroque penso iusticiam et misericordiam portat; sed per iusticiam reddit peccatis sententiam, per misericordiam peccati temperat penam, ut iusto libramine quedam per equitatem corrigat, quedam uero per miserationem indulgeat. Qui Dei iudicia oculis suis proponit, semper timens et tremens in omni negotio formidat, ne de iusticiae tramite deuians cadat, et unde non iustificatur, inde potius condempnetur.

C. XI. Both one who forgives and one who corrects show mercy.

Likewise Augustine in the Enchiridion [c. 72]. One who corrects by a blow the person over whom power is given, or restrains him by some discipline, and nevertheless forgives from the heart the sin by which he was injured or offended by him, or prays that it be forgiven him, gives alms not only in that he forgives and prays, but also in that he corrects and strikes with some corrective punishment, because he furnishes mercy. For many goods are furnished to unwilling persons when counsel is taken for their utility, not their will, because they are found to be enemies to themselves. GRATIAN. For there are many kinds of alms, concerning which Albinus says:

C. XI. Qui remittit, et qui corripit, uterque miseretur.

Item Augustinus in Enchiridion. [c. 72.] Et qui emendat uerbere, in quem potestas datur, uel cohercet aliqua disciplina, et tamen peccatum eius, quo ab illo lesus aut offensus est, dimittit ex corde, uel orat ut ei dimittatur, non solum in eo, quod dimittit atque orat, uerum etiam in eo, quod corripit et aliqua emendatoria pena plectit, elemosinam dat, quia misericordiam prestat. Multa enim prestantur inuitis bona, quando eorum consulitur utilitati, non uoluntati, quia ipsi sibi inueniuntur esse inimici. Gratian. Sunt enim multa genera elemosinarum, de quibus Albinus ait:

C. XII. Concerning the manifold kind of alms.

There are three kinds of alms: one bodily, to give a needy person whatever you can; another spiritual, to forgive one by whom you have been injured; the third, to correct a delinquent and lead those who err into the way of truth.

C. XII. De multiplici genere elemosinarum.

Tria sunt genera elemosinarum: una corporalis, egenti dare quicquid poteris: altera spiritualis, dimittere a quo lesus fueris; tercia, delinquentem corrigere, et errantes in uiam ducere ueritatis.

C. XIII. Alms of the heart are preferred to bodily alms.

Likewise Augustine [Book of Fifty Homilies, homily 6]. There are two alms, one of the heart, the other of money. Alms of the heart are to forgive one by whom you have been injured. For sometimes you seek to give something to a needy person and do not have it; to forgive one who sins abounds to you as much as you wish. Alms of the heart are much greater than alms of the body. §2. The alms of charity suffice without earthly substance; but those that are given bodily, if bestowed without a kindly heart, are altogether insufficient. Part III. GRATIAN. From all these things it appears that neither the gentleness of meekness without the rectitude of severity nor zeal for rectitude without meekness ought to be found in prelates. Therefore, the strikers who are removed from episcopal office by the foregoing authorities are to be understood not as any who corporally scourge, but as those who, having omitted meekness, are always ready for blows and desire through scourges not to correct vices but to be feared. Peter writes to them: "Do not be domineering among the clergy, but be made a pattern of the flock from the heart." Hence Gregory also writes in the Moralia, Book XIX, part 4, chapter 23:

> C. XIII. Elemosinae corporali prefertur elemosina cordis.
> Item Augustinus. [lib. L. homiliarum, hom. 6.] Duae sunt elemosinae, una cordis, alia pecuniae. Elemosina cordis est dimittere, a quo lesus es. Nam dare aliquid indigenti aliquando queris, et non habes; indulgere peccanti quantum uolueris redundat tibi. Elemosina cordis multo maior est quam elemosina corporis. §. 2. Caritatis elemosina sine terrena substantia sufficit: illa uero, que corporaliter datur, si sine benigno corde tribuitur, omnino non sufficit. III. Pars. Gratian. Ex his omnibus apparet, quod nec lenitas mansuetudinis sine rectitudine seueritatis, nec zelus rectitudinis sine mansuetudine in prelatis debet inueniri. Percussores ergo, qui premissis auctoritatibus ab episcopali offitio remouentur, non quilibet corporaliter flagellantes, sed pretermissa mansuetudine ad uerbera semper parati intelligendi sunt, qui per flagella non uicia corrigere, sed timeri appetunt; quibus Petrus scribit: "Ne sitis dominantes in clero, sed forma facti gregis ex animo." Hinc etiam Gregorius scribit in Moralibus, libro XIX. parte 4. capitulo 23.:

C. XIV. Meekness and strictness are not to be separated from one another.

For there are some so strict that they lose even all meekness of kindness; and there are some so meek that they lose the rights of strict governance. Hence both are to be maintained with the greatest care by all rulers, so that they neither abandon the kindness of meekness in the vigor of discipline nor, again, the strictness of discipline in meekness, so that they may neither grow hard against the compassion of piety when they correct the contumacious nor soften the vigor of discipline when they console the minds of the weak. Therefore let the vigor of discipline rule meekness, and let meekness adorn vigor in speech; and thus let one be commended by the other, so that neither vigor is rigid nor meekness lax.

> C. XIV. Mansuetudo et districtio ab inuicem non separentur.
> Sunt namque nonnulli ita districti, ut omnem etiam mansuetudinem benignitatis amittant; et sunt nonnulli ita mansueti, ut perdant districti iura regiminis. Unde cunctis rectoribus utraque summopere sunt tenenda, ut nec in disciplinae uigore benignitatem mansuetudinis, nec rursum in mansuetudine districtionem deserant disciplinae, quatinus nec a compassione pietatis obdurescant, cum contumaces corrigunt nec disciplinae uigorem molliant, cum infirmorum animos consolantur. Regat ergo disciplinae uigor mansuetudinem, et mansuetudo ornet sermone uigorem, et sic alterum commendetur ex altero, ut nec uigor sit rigidus, nec mansuetudo sit dissoluta.

C. XV. One who is truly just has compassion upon the wretched and is indignant at delinquents.

The same [homily XXXIV on the Gospels, near the beginning]. True justice has compassion; false justice, disdain, although the just also are accustomed rightly to be indignant at sinners. But it is one thing when this is done in the form of pride, another when it is done from zeal for discipline. For they are indignant, yet not disdainful. §1. But, on the contrary, those who are accustomed to take pride in false justice despise everyone else, descend with no mercy to those who are weak, and the more they do not believe themselves to be sinners, the worse sinners they become.

C. XV. Vere iustus miseris compatitur, delinquentibus indignatur.

Idem. [homil. XXXIV. in euangel. (circa init.] Vera iusticia compassionem habet, falsa dedignationem, quamuis et iusti soleant recte peccatoribus indignari. Sed aliud est, quod agitur tipo superbiae, aliud, quod zelo disciplinae. Dedignantur etenim, sed non dedignantes. §. 1. At contra hi, qui de falsa iusticia superbire solent, ceteros quosque despiciunt, nulla infirmantibus misericordia condescendunt, et quo se peccatores esse non credunt, eo deterius peccatores fiunt.

C. XVI. Sinners are to be provoked by meekness, not cast away by austerity.

Likewise Jerome on Jeremiah. "Withdraw," they say, "you polluted persons; withdraw, depart; do not touch us; do not communicate with us." Such speech does not illuminate the blind, does not heal the sick, does not cure the weak, but rather kills him and casts the person in peril into despair. For good rulers, weighing the weaknesses of others from their own weakness, strive to rescue sinners from the snare of error through the relief of humility and meekness rather than to drive those wavering into the pit of perdition through austerity. Hence the teacher of the gentiles says: "I became weak to the weak."

C. XVI. Peccantes mansuetudine prouocentur, non austeritate abiciantur.

Item Ieronimus in Ieremia. Recedite (inquiunt) polluti, recedite, abite, nolite nos tangere, nolite nobis communicare. Talis loquela non illuminat cecum, non sanat egrotum, non curat infirmum, sed magis occidit, atque in desperationem periclitantem mittit. Boni etenim rectores ex sua infirmitate aliorum infirmitates pensantes magis per humilitatis et mansuetudinis leuamentum student peccantes ab erroris laqueo eruere, quam per austeritatem in foueam perditionis nutantes propellere. Unde doctor gentium: "Factus sum," inquit, "infirmus infirmis."

C. XVII. God's wrath rages against the people when a preacher flatters delinquents and does not correct them.

The same. But this is not to be passed over idly, that when one person sins wrath comes upon the whole people. How does this happen? When priests who preside over the people wish to appear benevolent toward delinquents and, fearing the tongues of sinners lest perhaps they speak badly of them, forget priestly severity and are unwilling to fulfill what is written: "Reprove the sinner before everyone, so that the rest may have fear," and again: "Remove the evil from among yourselves." Nor, kindled with zeal for God, do they imitate the Apostle saying: "I handed such a person over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, so that the spirit may be saved." Nor do they strive to fulfill that evangelical command that, if they see one sinning, they should first admonish him secretly, afterward also with two or three witnesses; but if he shows contempt and is not amended after the correction of the Church, they should cast him out of the Church and hold him as a gentile and publican. And while they spare one, they contrive the destruction of the universal Church. What goodness is this, what mercy, to spare one and bring everyone into danger? For the people are polluted by one sinner. Just as the whole flock is infected by one diseased sheep, so also, when one person either fornicates or commits any other crime whatsoever, the whole people are polluted. GRATIAN. Hence it is also said elsewhere: "Let piety exhibit the ruler as a mother to subjects, but discipline as a father." Part IV. One who wounds the conscience of the weak with useless speech is also called a striker. Hence Pope Anacletus [epistle II to the Bishops of Italy]:

> C. XVII. In populum ira Dei deseuit, cum predicator delinquentes palpat, non corripit.
> Idem. Sed illud non ociose transcurrendum est, quod uno peccante ira super omnem populum uenit. Hoc quomodo accidit? quando sacerdotes, qui populo presunt, erga delinquentes beniuoli uideri uolunt, et uerentes peccantium linguas, ne forte male de eis loquantur, sacerdotalis seueritatis inmemores nolunt complere quod scriptum est: "Peccantem coram omnibus argue, ut ceteri metum habeant," et iterum: "Auferte malum de uobis ipsis." Nec zelo Dei succensi imitantur Apostolum dicentem: "Tradidi huiusmodi hominem satanae in interitum carnis, ut spiritus saluus fiat." Neque illud euangelicum inplere student, ut si uiderint peccantem, primo secrete conueniant, post etiam duobus uel tribus testibus; quod si contempserit, et post ecclesiae correptionem non fuerit emendatus, de ecclesia expulsum uelud gentilem habeant ac publicanum; et dum uni parcunt, uniuersae ecclesiae moliuntur interitum. Que ista bonitas, que ista misericordia est, uni parcere, et omnes in discrimen adducere? Polluitur enim ex uno peccatore populus. Sicut ex una oue morbida uniuersus grex inficitur, sic etiam uno uel fornicante uel aliud quodcunque scelus committente plebs uniuersa polluitur. Gratian. Hinc etiam alibi dicitur: "Rectorem subditis pietas matrem, disciplina uero patrem exhibeat." IV. Pars. Percussor quoque dicitur, qui sermone inutili infirmorum conscientiam uulnerat. Unde Anacletus Papa: [epist. II. ad Episcopos Italiae]

C. XVIII. One who strikes the conscience of the weak with incautious speech is called a striker.

That teacher is indeed called a striker who strikes the conscience of the weak with useless speech. Therefore, it is fitting that you and all the faithful hold to the faithful word that is according to doctrine, so that one may be able to console in sacred doctrine, reprove those who contradict, and strengthen those who live rightly and hold the right faith.

> C. XVIII. Qui sermone incauto conscientiam percutit infirmorum, percussor uocatur.
> Sane percussor ille dicitur doctor, qui sermone inutili conscientiam percutit infirmorum. Ideo tenere uos et omnes fideles oportet eum, qui secundum doctrinam est, fidelem sermonem, ut potens sit consolari in doctrina sacra, et contradicentes redarguere, et recte uiuentes atque rectam fidem tenentes consolidare.

Distinction XLVI

GRATIAN. Part I. It follows: "not contentious." For nothing is more shameless than the arrogance of the unlearned, who think garrulity is authority and, ready for quarrels, thunder proudly against subjects, which manifestly proceeds from the arrogance of pride. Hence Gregory writes in the Moralia, Book XXIII, part 5, chapter 12 [c. 13, §23 and 24, on c. 33 of Job]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Sequitur: "Non litigiosum." Nichil est enim impudentius arrogancia rusticorum, qui garrulitatem auctoritatem putant, et parati ad lites in subiectos tumide intonant, quod ex arrogancia superbiae prouenire manifestum est. Unde Gregorius scribit in Moralibus, libro XXIII. parte 5. capitulo 12.: [c. 13. §. 23. et 24. ad c. 33. Iob.]

C. I. The arrogant do not know how to present humbly the things they teach.

The teaching of the arrogant has this as its peculiar characteristic: they do not know how to present humbly what they teach, and they cannot minister rightly the right things they know. For in their words it is disclosed that, when they teach, they seem to themselves to reside as though upon a certain summit of loftiness, and they look down upon those whom they teach as though placed far beneath them in the depths; they deign to speak to them not by counseling but scarcely even by dominating. But the Lord rightly says to these through the Prophet: "You commanded them with austerity and with power." For those command with austerity and power who hasten not to correct their subjects calmly by reasoning but to bend them harshly by dominating. On the contrary, true teaching flees this vice of exaltation in thought all the more vehemently, the more ardently it pursues with the darts of its words the very master of exaltation. For it guards against preaching by exalted morals the one whom it assails in the hearts of hearers with sacred discourses. Part II. GRATIAN. Behold why contentious persons are prohibited from being ordained bishops. There is also another cause of this prohibition. For contentious persons either reconcile to themselves the minds of princes by flatteries, or by disparaging their brethren impose upon them the mark of infamy, or, by sowing discord among brethren, never cease making seditions; all of these things are proved damnable in prelates.

Hence Gregory writes in the Moralia, Book XVIII, part 4, chapter 3 [on c. 27 of Job]:

C. I. Arrogantes nesciunt humiliter inferre que docent.

Hoc habet proprium doctrina arrogantium, ut humiliter nesciant inferre quod docent, et recta, que sapiunt, recte ministrare non possunt. In uerbis enim eorum proditur, quod, cum docent, quasi in quodam sibi uidentur summitatis culmine residere, eosque, quos docent, ut longe infra se positos uelut in imo respiciunt, quibus non consulendo, sed uix dominando dignantur loqui. Recte autem his per Prophetam Dominus dicit: "Vos autem cum austeritate inperabatis eis et cum potentia." Cum austeritate enim et potentia inperant, qui subditos suos non tranquille corrigere ratiocinando, sed aspere inflectere dominando festinant. At contra doctrina uera tanto uehementius hoc elationis uicium fugit per cogitationem, quanto ardentius suorum uerborum iaculis ipsum magistrum elationis insequitur. Cauet enim, ne eum moribus elatis predicet, quem in cordibus audientium sacris sermonibus insectatur. II. Pars. Gratian. Ecce, quare litigiosi prohibentur in episcopos ordinari. Est et alia causa huius prohibitionis. Litigiosi namque uel adulationibus animos principum sibi conciliant, uel fratribus suis detrahendo infamiae notam ingerunt, uel inter fratres discordiam seminando seditiones numquam facere cessant; que omnia in prelatis dampnabilia esse probantur.

Unde Gregorius scribit in Moralibus, in libro XVIII. parte 4. capitulo 3.: [ad cap. 27. Iob.]

C. II. Concerning those who flatter sinners.

There are some who, while they extol the misdeeds of human beings with praises, increase the things they ought to have reproved. Hence it is said through the Prophet: "Woe to those who sew cushions beneath every elbow of the hand and make pillows beneath the head of every age." For a cushion is placed beneath the elbow, or a pillow beneath the head of one lying down, for this purpose: that he may rest softly. Therefore, whoever flatters those acting badly places a cushion or pillow beneath the head or elbow of one lying down, so that the one who ought to have been corrected for a fault may, supported by praises, rest softly in it. §1. Hence again it is written: “He built the wall, but they plastered it.” For by the name of a wall the hardness of sin is designated. Therefore, to build a wall is for someone to construct against himself the obstacles of sin. But those who flatter persons committing sins plaster the wall, so that what those persons build by acting perversely the flatterers render, as it were, shining. §2. But just as a holy man does not judge evil things concerning the good, so he refuses to judge good things concerning the evil, saying: “Far be it from me that I should judge you righteous; until I fail, I will not depart from my innocence.” Hence it is also read in the Fourth Council of Carthage [c. 56]:

C. II. De his, qui peccantibus adulantur.

Sunt nonnulli, qui, dum malefacta hominum laudibus efferunt, augent que increpare debuerunt. Hinc enim per Prophetam dicitur: "Vae qui consuunt puluillos sub omni cubito manus, et faciunt ceruicalia sub capite uniuersae etatis." Ad hoc quippe sub cubito puluillus uel ceruical sub capite iacentis ponitur, ut molliter quiescatur. Quisquis ergo male agentibus adulatur, puluillum uel ceruical sub capite uel cubito iacentis ponit, ut qui corripi ex culpa debuerat, in ea fultus laudibus molliter quiescat. §. 1. Hinc rursum scriptum est: "Ipse edificabat parietem, illi autem liniebant eum." Parietis quippe nomine peccati duricia designatur. Edificare ergo parietem est contra se quempiam obstacula peccati construere. Sed parietem liniunt, qui peccata perpetrantibus adulantur, ut, quod illi peruerse agentes edificant, ipsi adulantes quasi nitidum reddant. §. 2. Sed sanctus uir sicut mala de bonis non estimat, ita iudicare bona de malis recusat, dicens: "Absit a me, ut iustos uos iudicem: donec deficiam, non recedam ab innocentia mea." Hinc etiam in Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 56.] legitur:

C. III. Let a cleric who is a flatterer or betrayer be degraded from office.

Let a cleric who is found to devote himself to flatteries and betrayals be degraded from office.

C. III. Adulator uel proditor clericus ab offitio degradetur.

Clericus, qui adulationibus et prodicionibus uacare deprehenditur, degradetur ab offitio.

C. IV. Let those who cast unproved accusations against their brethren be excommunicated by the bishop.

Likewise [from the same Council, c. 55]. Let the bishop excommunicate accusers of the brethren; and if they amend the vice, let him receive them into communion, but not into the clergy.

C. IV. Excommunicentur ab episcopo, qui fratribus non probanda obiciunt.

Item. [ex eodem Concilio, c. 55.] Accusatores fratrum episcopus excommunicet, et si emendauerint uicium, recipiat eos ad communionem, non ad clerum.

C. V. Let an abusive cleric be removed from office; let a buffoon who envies the advancement of his brethren not be promoted.

Likewise from the same [Council, c. 57]. Let an abusive cleric, especially among priests, be compelled to ask pardon. If he is unwilling, let him be degraded and never recalled to office without satisfaction.

C. V. Remoueatur ab offitio clericus maledicus; scurra fratrum a profectibus inuidens non promoueatur.

Item ex eodem. [Concilio, c. 57.] Clericus maledicus (maxime in sacerdotibus) cogatur ad postulandam ueniam. Si noluerit, degradetur, nec umquam ad offitium absque satisfactione reuocetur.

C. VI. Concerning the same.

Likewise [from the same Council, c. 60]. An irreverent cleric and jester with shameful words is to be withdrawn from office.

C. VI. De eodem.

Item. [ex eodem Concilio, c. 60.] Clericum scurrilem et uerbis turpibus ioculatorem ab offitio retrahendum.

C. VII.

Likewise [from the same, c. 54]. Let a cleric who envies the advancement of his brethren not be promoted while he remains in the vice.

C. VII.

Item. [ex eodem c. 54.] Clericus inuidens fratrum profectibus, donec in uicio est, non promoueatur.

C. VIII. Those who devote themselves to seditions are not to be ordained.

Likewise [from the same, c. 67]. We establish that seditious persons are never to be ordained clerics, just as neither usurers nor avengers of their own injuries are to be ordained.

C. VIII. Non sunt ordinandi, qui sedicionibus uacant.

Item. [ex eodem, c. 67.] Sedicionarios statuimus numquam ordinandos clericos, sicut nec usurarios, uel iniuriarum suarum ultores.

C. IX. Clerics are by no means permitted to exact usury.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea [c. 5]. Part III. Ministers of the altar, or those established in priestly order, are not permitted to lend at interest or to receive usury or profits that are called sesquiples.

C. IX. Usuras exigere clericis minime licet.

Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 5.] III. Pars. Non licet fenerari ministris altaris, uel in sacerdotali ordine constitutis uel usuras, uel lucra, que sescupla dicuntur, accipere.

C. X. Let a cleric be a lender at interest neither in his own name nor another's.

Likewise Pope Leo [to the Bishops throughout Campania, epistle I, c. 4]. Let no cleric attempt to practice lending at interest in another's name, just as he may not in his own. For it is unbecoming to expend and practice one's own crime for the advantages of others. But we ought to regard and practice only this interest: that we may be able to receive from the Lord, who bestows things that remain manifoldly and perpetually, what we mercifully give here.

C. X. Nec suo nomine, nec alieno clericus fenerator existat.

Item Leo Papa. [Episcopis per Campaniam, epist. I. c. 4.] Sicut non suo, ita nec alieno nomine aliquis clericorum exercere fenus attemptet. Indecens enim est crimen suum commodis alienis inpendere et exercere. Fenus autem hoc solum aspicere et exercere debemus, ut quod hic misericorditer tribuimus, a Domino, (qui multipliciter et in perpetuum mansura tribuit), recipere ualeamus.

Distinction XLVII

GRATIAN. The reason usurers are prohibited from being ordained at the end of this chapter is that those who practice usury are proved to serve cupidity; but the covetous are prohibited by the Apostle from being ordained, because such persons would easily deviate from what is just. Hence it is read in the Canons of the Apostles [c. 44]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem in fine huius capituli usurarii ordinari prohibentur, inde est, quia usuram exercentes cupiditati deseruire probantur; cupidi autem ab Apostolo ordinari prohibentur, quia tales facile a iusto deuiarent. Unde in canonibus Apostolorum [c. 44.] legitur:

C. I. Unless he ceases, a deacon, priest, or bishop exacting usury is to be deposed.

Let a bishop, priest, or deacon exacting usury from debtors either cease or certainly be deposed.

C. I. Diaconus, presbiter et episcopus exigens usuras, nisi desierit, deponatur.

Episcopus aut presbiter aut diaconus usuras a debitoribus exigens, aut desinat, aut certe deponatur.

C. II. Let one exacting usury, whether a cleric or one subject to a rule, be cast down.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea [c. 17]. Since many established under a rule pursue avarice and shameful profits and, forgetful of divine Scripture, which says, "He has not given his money at usury," exact hundredths when making a loan, the holy and great synod justly decreed that, if anyone after this definition is found receiving usury, or pursuing some invention or transacting business in any manner whatsoever, or exacting hemiolia, that is, sesquiples, or devising absolutely any such thing for the sake of shameful profit, he is to be cast down from the clergy and held alien to the rule. Hence Gregory also writes concerning lovers of the world in Book XIX of the Moralia, part IV, chapter 35, saying:

C. II. Usuras exigens siue clericus, siue regulae subiectus, deiciatur.

Item ex Concilio Niceno. [c.] 17. Quoniam multi sub regula constituti auaritiam et turpia lucra sectantur, oblitique diuinae scripturae, dicentis: "Qui pecuniam suam non dedit ad usuram," mutuum dantes centesimas exigunt: iuste censuit sancta et magna sinodus, ut, si quis inuentus fuerit post hanc diffinitionem usuras accipiens, aut aliquam adinuentionem uel quolibet modo negotia transigens, aut emiolia, id est sescupla exigens uel aliquid tale prorsus excogitans turpis lucri gratia, deiciatur a clero et alienus existat a regula. Hinc etiam Gregorius in libro XIX. Moralium, parte IV. capitulo 35. de dilectoribus seculi scribit, dicens:

C. III. Those serving temporal profits are proved by no means to serve God.

All lovers of this world are strong in earthly matters, weak in heavenly ones. For temporal glory they desire to labor even unto death, and for perpetual hope they do not persist even a little in labor. For earthly profits they tolerate any injuries, and for a heavenly reward they refuse to bear the insults of even the slightest word. They are strong enough to stand before an earthly judge even for the whole day, but in prayer before the Lord they grow weary in the space of even one hour. Often they tolerate nakedness, abasement, and hunger to acquire riches and honors, and through abstinence they torment themselves for those things they hasten to attain; but they conceal themselves from laboriously seeking heavenly things all the more, the more slowly they think those things will be repaid. §1. Therefore, after the manner of other trees, they are broad below and narrow above, because they remain strong in lower things but fail in higher ones. On the contrary, by the quality of palms is designated the advancing life of the just, who are by no means strong in earthly desires and weak in heavenly ones, but show themselves zealous for God by a longer and more extended measure than they remember having been for the world. §2. For when it is said to certain persons through our preacher, "I speak in human terms because of the weakness of your flesh. For just as you presented your members to serve uncleanness and iniquity unto iniquity, so now present your members to serve justice unto sanctification," he undoubtedly condescends to their weakness, as if it were said to them more openly: If you can do no more, at least be such in the fruit of good works as you formerly were in the practice of vices, lest the holy freedom of charity hold you weaker than the practice of earthly pleasure held you strong in the flesh.

C. III. Temporalibus lucris deseruientes Deo nequaquam militare probantur.

Omnes huius seculi dilectores in terrenis rebus fortes sunt, in celestibus debiles. Nam pro temporali gloria usque ad mortem desudare appetunt, et pro spe perpetua nec parum quidem in labore subsistunt; pro terrenis lucris quaslibet iniurias tollerant, et pro celesti mercede uel tenuissimi uerbi ferre contumelias recusant; terreno iudici toto etiam die assistere fortes sunt, in oratione uero coram Domino uel unius horae momento lassantur; sepe nuditatem, deiectionem, famem pro acquirendis diuitiis atque honoribus tollerant, et earum rerum se per abstinentiam cruciant, ad quas adipiscendas festinant; superna autem laboriose querere tanto magis dissimulant, quanto ea tardius putant retribui. §. 1. Hi itaque quasi aliarum arborum more deorsum uasti sunt, sursum angusti, quia fortes in inferiora subsistunt, sed ad superiora deficiunt. At contra ex qualitate palmarum designatur proficiens uita iustorum, qui nequaquam sunt in terrenis desideriis fortes et in celestibus debiles, sed longius atque distantius studiosos se Deo exhibent, quam seculo fuisse meminerint. §. 2. Nam cum quibusdam per predicatorem nostrum dicitur; "Humanum dico propter infirmitatem carnis uestrae. Sicut enim exhibuistis membra uestra seruire inmundiciae et iniquitati ad iniquitatem, ita nunc, exhibete membra uestra seruire iusticiae in sanctificationem," eorum proculdubio infirmitati condescenditur, ac si eis apertius diceretur: Si nequaquam amplius potestis, saltem tales estote in fructu bonorum operum, quales fuistis dudum in actione uiciorum, ne debiliores uos habeat sancta libertas karitatis, quos in carne ualidos habuit usus terrenae uoluptatis.

C. IV. Usurers ought not to be promoted to sacred orders.

Likewise Gregory to the citizens of Naples [Book VIII, epistle 40]. Know, moreover, that it has reached us concerning Peter that he gave solidi at usury. You ought to investigate this with all subtlety; and if it is established thus, elect another and withdraw yourselves from a person of this kind without delay. For we impose hands upon lovers of usury for no reason. But if, after a subtle investigation has been held, you judge this to be false—because his person is unknown to us, and we do not know whether what has been reported to us concerning his simplicity is so—it is necessary for him to come to us with a decree made by you, so that, examining his life and morals more solicitously, we may also learn his understanding, and so that, if he proves suitable for this judgment, with the Lord's help we may fulfill your desires concerning him.

C. IV. Ad sacros ordines usurarii promoueri non debent.

Item Gregorius ciuibus Neapolim. [lib. VIII. epist. 40.] De Petro insuper ad nos peruenisse cognoscite, quia solidos dederit ad usuras. Quod uos oportet cum omni subtilitate perquirere, et si ita constiterit, alium eligite, et ab huiusmodi persona uos suspendite sine mora. Nam nos amatoribus usurarum nulla ratione manus inponimus. Si uero subtili habita inquisitione hoc falsum esse putaueritis, (quia persona eius nobis ignota est, et utrum ita sit de simplicitate, quod ad nos perlatum est, ignoramus) cum decreto a uobis facto ad nos eum uenire necesse est ut uitam moresque ipsius sollicitius requirentes sensum quoque pariter agnoscamus, ut, si huic iudicio aptus extiterit, uestra in eum (adiuuante Domino) desideria conpleamus.

C. V. Let a cleric who is discovered receiving usury be degraded.

Likewise from the Council of Elvira [c. 20]. If any cleric has been discovered receiving usury, it was resolved that he be degraded and made to abstain.

C. V. Degradetur clericus, qui usuras accipere detegitur.

Item ex Concilio Elibertano. [c. 20.] Si quis clericorum detectus fuerit usuras accipere, placuit degradari et abstinere.

C. VI. A priest ought neither to be entangled in error nor violated by cupidity.

Likewise Bishop Leo [to Anatolius, Bishop of Constantinople, epistle LI]. Part II. Just as a catholic man, and especially a priest of the Lord, ought to be entangled in no error, so he ought to be violated by no cupidity, holy Scripture saying: "Do not go after your desires." A mind greedy for power knows neither how to abstain from prohibited things, nor to rejoice in things conceded, nor to grant consent to piety.

C. VI. Nec implicari errore, nec cupiditate sacerdotem uiolari oportet.

Item Leo Episcopus. [Anatolio Episcopo Constantinopol., epist. LI.] II. Pars. Virum catholicum et precipue Domini sacerdotem sicut nullo errore inplicari, ita nulla oportet cupiditate uiolari, dicente sancta scriptura: "Post concupiscentias tuas non eas." Mens etiam potentiae auida nec abstinere nouit uetitis, nec gaudere concessis, nec pietati adhibere consensum.

C. VII. One who does not cut cupidity away from himself cannot adhere to the author of goods.

Likewise Gregory [Book VII, epistle 100]. We cannot adhere to the author of goods in any other way unless we cut away from ourselves cupidity, which is the root of all evils.

C. VII. Qui cupiditatem a se non abscidit, bonorum auctori inherere non ualet.

Item Gregorius. [I. VII. epist. 100.] Bonorum auctori inherere aliter non ualemus, nisi cupiditatem a nobis (que omnium malorum radix est) abscidamus.

C. VIII. An avaricious person invades the goods of all whose necessities he is able to relieve.

Likewise Ambrose [Sermon LXXXI] concerning what is written in the Gospel: "The field of a certain rich man brought forth abundant fruits." Just as those who through madness have been transported in mind no longer see the things themselves but the phantasms of their passion, so also the mind of the avaricious person, once bound by the chains of cupidity, always sees gold, always silver, always calculates revenues, gazes upon gold more gladly than upon the sun; his very prayer and supplication to the Lord seeks gold. And a little later: §1. Sometimes also, by the most wicked art of usury, gold is born from gold itself. But neither satiety nor an end will ever come to cupidity. And below: §2. But he says: What injustice is there if, while I do not invade another's possessions, I preserve my own more diligently? O shameless thing to say! You call them your own? Which things? From what stores did you bring them into this world? When you entered this light, when you came forth from your mother's womb, with what resources, I ask, and with what assistance did you enter, provided? And a little later: §3. Let no one call his own what is common, when more than would suffice has been taken and violently obtained. And below: §4. Is God unjust, so that he does not distribute the supports of life equally to us, so that you indeed should be affluent and abounding while others should lack and be in need? Or is it rather for this reason: because he wished both to confer upon you proofs of his kindness and to crown another through the virtue of patience? But you, having received the gifts of God and gathered them into your bosom, think you do nothing unjust if you alone possess the supports of the lives of so many? For who is so unjust, so avaricious, as one who makes the nourishment of many not his use but his abundance and luxuries? For it is no less a crime to take from one who has than, when you can and abound, to deny the needy. The bread you retain belongs to the hungry; the garment you shut away belongs to the naked; the money you bury in the earth is the redemption and release of the wretched. Therefore, know that you invade the goods of as many persons as you could furnish with what you wish. Part III. GRATIAN. It is also necessary that one who is to be ordained "preside well over his own house"; that is, if in the lay habit he has had a wife or children, let him provoke them from vices toward the pursuit of virtues both by word and example, so that he may first exact from his household what he will afterward command the peoples. Hence the Apostle writes to the Ephesians that they should love their wives as their own bodies and not provoke their children to wrath, but nourish them in every discipline and correction of the Lord. Hence when, writing to Timothy, he had said, "one presiding well over his own house," he immediately added: "having children subject to him in all chastity, not under an accusation of luxury." For one who dwells together with such persons does not have the boldness to reprove others. Hence it is read concerning blessed Job that he offered daily sacrifices to God for his children, offering holocausts for each of them; he bound them together into one by so great a perfection of charity that each of them on his own day prepared a banquet for his brethren and equally invited his three sisters to feast with him. Because Eli neglected to do this and, overcome by false piety, was unwilling to strike his delinquent sons, as is read in the Book of Kings, before the strict judge he struck himself together with his sons by a cruel condemnation; hence it is said to him by the divine voice: "You honored your sons more than me." Hence David also, exercising kindness and not the severity of discipline toward his sons, learned by experience that the youth of those whose boyhood he had permitted to be wanton through wandering license was destructive. For one of them, corrupting his sister by rape, was slain by her brother, namely Absalom, amid the feast that he had deceitfully prepared for his brethren. But Absalom, after he obtained pardon from his father, expelled him from the kingdom, went in to his concubines, and finally, pursuing his father through the pathless places of the wilderness, became caught in an oak and thus perished suspended. Hence Paul also writes to Timothy, saying: "One who has no care for his own and especially those of his household has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever." Rightly, therefore, one who does not know how to preside over his own house is prohibited from being ordained bishop, because if he is not faithful in the least matter, concerning which a more familiar care ought to be in him, how will he display solicitous diligence in the Church of God, where there are so many persons and strangers? Hence Jerome says: "For the just person is not polluted by the vices of his children; rather, freedom is reserved by the Apostle for the ruler of the Church, so that he may be such a person as does not fear to reprove outsiders on account of the vices of his children." Part IV. §1. This will happen when there is nothing imputed to him. For since the steps of a person are directed by the Lord and his ways are not in the person, he can indeed reprove, but he cannot correct; he can knock, but not open; restrain the hands, but not change the mind. Hence Augustine to Vincentius the Donatist [epistle CXXXVII]:

C. VIII. Auarus omnium bona inuadit, quorum necessitatibus subuenire ualet.

Item Ambrosius [Serm. LXXXI.] de eo, quod scriptum est in euangelio: "Hominis cuiusdam diuitis fructus uberes ager attulit". Sicut hi, qui per insaniam mente translati sunt, non iam res ipsas, sed passionis suae fantasias uident, ita etiam mens auari semel uinculis cupiditatis astricta semper aurum, semper argentum uidet, semper redditus computat, gratius aurum intuetur quam solem; ipsa eius oratio et supplicatio ad Dominum aurum querit. Et post pauca: §. 1. Interdum etiam usurae arte nequissima ex ipso auro aurum nascitur. Sed nec sacietas unquam, nec finis aderit cupiditati. Et infra: §. 2. Sed ait: quid iniustum est, si cum aliena non inuadam, propria diligentius seruo? O inpudens dictu! Propria dicis? que? ex quibus reconditis in hunc mundum detulisti? Quando in hanc ingressus es lucem, quando de uentre matris existi, quibus queso facultatibus quibusque subsidiis stipatus ingressus es? Et post pauca: §. 3. Proprium nemo dicat, quod est commune plus quam sufficeret sumptum et uiolenter obtentum est. Et infra: §. 4. Numquid iniquus est Deus, ut nobis non equaliter distribuat uitae subsidia, ut tu quidem esses affluens et habundans, aliis uero deesset et egerent? an idcirco magis, quia et tibi uoluit benignitatis suae experimenta conferre, et alium per uirtutem patientiae coronare? Tu uero susceptis muneribus Dei, et in sinum tuum redactis, nichil te putas agere iniquum, si tam multorum uitae subsidia solus obtineas? Quis enim tam iniustus tam auarus, quam qui multorum alimenta suum non usum, sed habundantiam et delicias facit? Neque enim minus est criminis habenti tollere, quam, cum possis et habundas, indigentibus denegare. Esurientium panis est, quem tu detines; nudorum indumentum est, quod tu recludis; miserorum redemptio est et absolutio pecunia, quam tu in terra defodis. Tantorum te ergo scias inuadere bona, quantis possis prestare quod uelis. III. Pars. Gratian. Necesse est etiam, ut ille, qui ordinandus est, "suae domui sit bene prepositus," id est, si in laicali habitu uxorem habuerit uel filios, a uiciis ad uirtutum studia et uerbo et exemplo prouocet, ut quod postea precepturus est populis, prius exigat a domesticis. Unde Apostolus Ephesiis scribit, ut uxores suas sicut sua corpora diligant, et filios suos non ad iracundiam prouocent, sed enutriant illos in omni disciplina et correctione Domini. Unde cum ad Timotheum scribens, dixisset: "suae domui bene prepositum," statim subiunxit: "habentem sibi subditos filios in omni castitate, non in accusatione luxuriae." Non enim talium cohabitator frontem habet alios redarguendi. Unde de B. Iob legitur, quod pro filiis suis cotidiana Deo offerrebat sacrificia, offerrens olocausta per singulos, quos tanta karitatis perfectione in unum constrinxit, ut quisque eorum in suo die conuiuium fratribus pararet, et ad epulandum secum tres sorores suas pariter inuitaret. Quod quia Heli facere dissimulauit, ac falsa pietate superatus filios delinquentes ferire noluit, (sicut in libro Regum legitur) apud districtum iudicem semetipsum cum filiis crudeli dampnatione percussit, unde ei diuina uoce dicitur: "Honorasti filios tuos plus, quam me." Hinc etiam Dauid erga filios bonitatem, non disciplinae seueritatem exercens, eorum iuuentutem experimento didicit perniciosam, quorum puericiam uaga licentia permisit esse uoluptuosam. Unus quippe eorum sororem suam stupro corrumpens, a fratre eius, Absalone uidelicet, inter epulas, quas fratribus suis fraudulenter parauerat, obtruncatus est. Absalon uero, postquam ueniam a patre obtinuit, regno illum expulit; ad concubinas eius ingressus est; demum per inuia deserti patrem persequens, quercui inhesit, atque ita suspensus interiit. Hinc etiam Paulus ad Timotheum scribit, dicens: "Qui suorum et maxime domesticorum curam non habet, fidem negauit et est infideli deterior." Iure ergo, qui domui suae preesse nescit in episcopum ordinari prohibetur, quia qui in re minima, et de qua sibi familiarior debet cura inesse, fidelis non est, quomodo in ecclesia Dei (ubi tot sunt et alieni) sollicitam diligentiam exhibebit? Unde Ieronimus: "Non enim iustus polluitur ex uiciis filiorum, sed libertas ab Apostolo ecclesiae principi reseruatur, ut talis fiat, qui non timeat propter uicia liberorum extraneos reprehendere." IV. Pars. §. 1. Quod tunc fiet, si non erit quod sibi inputetur. Cum enim gressus hominis a Domino dirigantur nec sint in homine uiae eius, corripere quidem potest, corrigere autem non ualet; pulsare potest, non aperire, manus conprimere, non animum mutare. Unde Augustinus ad Vincentium Donatistam: [epist. CXXXVII.]

C. IX. The discipline of the good cannot change the morals of everyone.

However much the discipline of my house may keep watch, I am a human being and live among human beings; nor do I dare arrogate to myself that my house is better than Noah's ark, where nevertheless among eight human beings one reprobate was found, or better than the house of Abraham, where it was said: "Cast out the bondwoman and her son," or better than the house of Isaac, to whom it was said concerning the two twins: "I loved Jacob, but Esau I hated." §1. But I confess simply to your charity before the Lord our God, who is witness over my soul, that since I began to serve God, just as I have with difficulty experienced persons better than those who advanced in monasteries, so I have not experienced persons worse than those who fell away in monasteries.

C. IX. Bonorum disciplina omnium mores inmutare non ualet.

Quantumlibet uigilet disciplina domus meae, homo sum et inter homines uiuo; nec mihi arrogare audeo, ut domus mea melior sit quam archa Noe, ubi tamen inter octo homines unus reprobus inuentus est, aut melior sit quam domus Abrahae, ubi dictum est: "Eice ancillam et filium eius," aut melior sit quam domus Ysaac, cui de duobus geminis dictum est: "Iacob dilexi, Esau autem odio habui." §. 1. Simpliciter autem fateor karitati uestrae coram Domino Deo nostro, qui testis est super animam meam, ex quo Deo seruire cepi, quoniam difficile sum expertus meliores quam qui in monasteriis profecerunt ita non sum expertus peiores quam qui in monasteriis defecerunt.

C. X. The insults of the lost ought not to move us from the way of rectitude.

Likewise Pope Cornelius to Cyprian. As far as pertains to us, it befits our conscience, brother, to take care lest anyone perish from the Church through our fault. But if anyone has perished voluntarily and by his own crime, and has been unwilling to do penance and return to the Church, we believe that we, who counsel their health, will be blameless on the day of judgment, and that those alone will remain in punishments who were unwilling to be healed by the healthfulness of our counsel. Nor ought the insults of the lost to move us to depart from the right way and the certain rule, as the Apostle also instructs, saying: "If I pleased human beings, I would not be Christ's servant."

C. X. Conuicia perditorum a uia rectitudinis nos mouere non debent.

Item Cipriano Cornelius Papa. Quod ad nos adtinet, conscientiae nostrae conuenit, frater, dare operam, ne quis culpa nostra de ecclesia pereat; si autem quis ultro et crimine suo perierit, et penitenciam agere atque ad ecclesiam redire noluerit, nos in iudicii die inculpatos futuros credimus, qui eorum consulimus sanitati; illos solos in penis remansuros, qui noluerint consilii nostri salubritate sanari. Nec mouere nos debent conuicia perditorum, quo minus a uia recta, et a certa regula non recedamus, quam et Apostolus instruit, dicens: "Si hominibus placerem, Christi seruus non essem."

Distinction XLVIII

GRATIAN. Part I. "Neophytes" are also prohibited from being ordained bishops, so that one who yesterday was a catechumen may not today become a bishop; one who yesterday was in the theater may not today sit in the church; one who in the evening was in the circus may not today minister at the altar; one who a short time ago was a patron of actors may not today be a consecrator of virgins. The cause of this prohibition, according to the Apostle, is lest, exalted in pride as though the Christian religion had very great need of him, he fall into the ruin of the devil. For the priest made in a moment does not know humility, the manners of persons, or how to despise himself; he has not fasted, has not wept, has not corrected himself, has not distributed to the poor. Those who in a point of an hour become masters before they have yet become disciples fall into arrogance, which is the ruin of the devil; and, as Innocent says, "it is wretched for one to be made a master who has not yet learned to be a disciple." Hence it is read concerning the same persons in the Council of Nicaea [c. 2]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Prohibentur etiam "neophiti" in episcopos ordinari, ut qui heri erat catecuminus, hodie non fiat episcopus, qui heri erat in teatro, hodie non sedeat in ecclesia, qui uespere erat in circo, hodie non ministret altario, qui dudum fuerat fautor istrionum, hodie non sit consecrator uirginum. Causa autem huius prohibitionis est secundum Apostolum, ne elatus in superbiam tamquam religio Christiana plurimum eo egeret, incidat in ruinam diaboli. Momentaneus namque sacerdos nescit humilitatem, modos personarum uel se contempnere; non ieiunauit, non fleuit non se correxit non pauperibus erogauit. In arrogantiam (que est ruina diaboli) incidunt, qui puncto horae necdum discipuli fiunt magistri, et sicut Innocentius ait, "miserum est, eum fieri magistrum, qui necdum didicit esse discipulus." Unde de eisdem in Niceno Concilio [c. 2.] legitur:

C. I. A neophyte is not to be ordained bishop.

Since many things have been done contrary to the rule, whether through necessity or from any cause whatsoever, so that persons recently from a gentile life, still catechumens or newly instructed, immediately came to spiritual baptism and, as soon as they were baptized, were also advanced to the episcopate or priesthood, it has therefore rightly seemed good that henceforth no such thing be done. For time is needed for one to be a catechumen, and after baptism he needs much probation. For the apostolic precept is evident, saying: "Not a neophyte, lest perhaps, exalted in pride, he fall into the judgment and snare of the devil." But if, in the preceding time, he committed some mortal sin and is convicted by two or three witnesses, one of this kind will cease from the clergy. If anyone acts beyond these things, as one acting contrary to the statute of the holy council, he himself will also endanger the status of his clergy. GRATIAN. Today, however, those newly approaching the profession of sacred religion are called neophytes. Hence blessed Gregory writes [Book VII, epistle 110], saying:

C. I. Neophitus in episcopum non est ordinandus.

Quoniam multa siue per necessitatem, siue ex quacumque causa, contra regulam gesta sunt, ita ut homines ex uita gentili nuper adhuc cathecumini uel instructi statim ad spirituale baptisma uenissent, et continuo, cum baptizati sunt etiam ad episcopatum uel presbiterium prouecti sunt: recte igitur uisum est, de cetero nil tale fieri. Nam et tempore opus est, ut sit catecuminus, et post baptismum multa probatione indiget. Euidens namque est preceptum apostolicum, dicens: "Non neophitum, ne forte elatus in superbiam in iudicium incidat et in laqueum diaboli." Si uero precedente tempore mortale aliquod peccatum admiserit, et conuictus duobus uel tribus testibus fuerit, cessabit a clero qui huiusmodi est. Si quis uero preter hec fecerit, tanquam contraria statuti sancti concilii gerens, etiam ipse periclitabitur de statu sui cleri. Gratian. Neophiti uero hodie appellantur ad propositum sacrae religionis nouiter accedentes. Unde B. Gregorius scribit, [lib. VII. epist. 110.] dicens:

C. II. Who are called neophytes.

Just as one who at the beginning of the holy faith had been planted by instruction was called a neophyte, so now one is to be held a neophyte who, suddenly planted in the habit of religion, has crept in to canvass for sacred orders. §1. Therefore, one must ascend to orders in an ordered manner. For one who, setting aside the steps, seeks an ascent over precipices to the heights of the highest place seeks a fall. We know, moreover, that walls that have been built do not receive the weight of beams before they have dried from the moisture of their newness, lest, if they receive the weights before they are made firm, they bring the whole structure to the ground at once.

C. II. Qui dicantur neophiti.

Sicut neophitus dicebatur, qui in initio sanctae fidei erat erudicione plantatus, sic modo neophitus habendus est, qui repente in religionis habitu plantatus ad ambiendos sacros ordines irrepserit. §. 1. Ordinate ergo ad ordines ascendendum est. Nam casum appetit, qui ad summi loci fastigia postpositis gradibus per abrupta querit ascensum. Scimus autem, quod edificati parietes non prius tignorum pondus accipiant, nisi a nouitatis suae humore siccentur, ne, si ante pondera, quam solidentur, accipiant, cunctam simul fabricam ad terram deponant.

Distinction XLIX

GRATIAN. Behold from which vices those who are to be ordained bishop ought to be immune. For those who are prepared as intercessors for the people before God must merit his grace by living well. For, as Gregory says in the Pastoral Rule: §1. "It must be solicitously feared lest the one who is believed able to placate the wrath of God should himself merit it by his own guilt. For we all clearly know that, when one who displeases is sent to intercede, the mind of the angry person is provoked to worse things. Therefore, let one who is bound by earthly desires take care lest, more grievously kindling the wrath of the strict judge, while he delights in a place of glory, he become for his subjects an author of ruin. Accordingly, let each person carefully measure himself and not dare to assume a place of governance if a vice still reigns damnably in him; nor let one whom his own crime corrupts desire to become an intercessor for the faults of others."

GRATIANUS. Ecce a quibus uiciis debeant esse immunes qui in episcopum sunt ordinandi. Qui enim intercessores pro populo ad Deum parantur necesse est ut eius gratiam bene uiuendo mereantur. Ut enim ait Gregorius in Pastorali. §. 1. "Sollicite formidandum est, ne, qui placare posse iram Dei creditur, hanc ipse ex proprio reatu mereatur. Cuncti enim liquido nouimus quia is, qui displicet, cum ad intercedendum mittitur, irati animus ad deteriora prouocatur. Qui ergo desideriis terrenis astringitur, caueat, ne districti iram iudicis grauius accendens, dum loco delectatur gloriae, fiat subditis auctor ruinae. Sollerter ergo se quisque metiatur, nec locum regiminis assumere audeat, si adhuc in se uicium dampnabiliter regnat; nec is, quem crimen deprauat proprium, intercessor fieri appetat pro culpis aliorum."

C. I. One who is stained by vices must not offer sacrifice to God.

Hence indeed it is said to Moses by the heavenly voice in Leviticus: "Speak to Aaron: A man of your seed throughout their families who has a blemish shall not offer bread to his God, nor approach his ministry." There it is also immediately added: "If he is blind, if lame, if with a small or large or crooked nose, if with a broken foot, if maimed, if hunchbacked, if bleary-eyed, if having a white film in his eye, if he has chronic scabies, if impetigo on his body, or if he is burdened." §1. For blind is one who does not know the light of heavenly contemplation, who, pressed by the darkness of the present life, while he does not at all behold by loving it the light that is to come, does not know in what direction to extend the steps of his work. Hence indeed it is said as Hannah prophesies in the Book of Kings: "He will preserve the feet of his saints, and the impious will be silent in darkness." §2. Lame, however, is one who indeed sees where he ought to go but, through weakness of mind, is not able perfectly to hold to the way of life that he sees; because, evidently, while someone is not raised to the state of virtue from a wavering habit, the step of his work does not effectively follow where his desire strives. Hence indeed Paul says to the Hebrews: "Raise up the hands that hang down and the weakened knees, and make straight steps for your feet, so that what is lame may not go astray, but rather be healed." §3. One with a small nose, moreover, is one who is not fit to preserve the measure of discretion. For by the nose we distinguish fragrances and stenches. Therefore discretion is rightly expressed by the nose, through which we choose virtues and reject offenses. Hence also in praise of the bride it is said in the Song of Songs: "Your nose is like the tower that is in Lebanon," because assuredly holy Church, through discretion, perceives from what particular causes temptations arise and from on high detects the coming wars of the vices. But there are some who, while unwilling to be thought dull, often exercise themselves more than is necessary in certain investigations and are deceived by excessive subtlety. Hence here too it is added: "or with a large or crooked nose." For a large and crooked nose is immoderate subtlety of discretion, which, while it grows more than is fitting, itself confounds the rectitude of its action. §4. One with a broken foot or hand, moreover, is one who is altogether unable to go upon the way of the Lord and, wholly devoid of good acts, remains idle, so that he does not hold to them at least with weakness, as the lame man does, but exists as one entirely alien to them. §5. Hunchbacked, however, is one whom the weight of earthly solicitude presses down, so that he never looks toward heavenly things but attends only to those things that are trodden upon below; and even if he should at some time hear something of the good of the heavenly homeland, weighed down, assuredly, by the weight of perverse habit, he does not lift the face of his heart, since he is unable to erect the posture of his thought, whom the practice of earthly solicitude keeps bent. From the likeness of these the Psalmist says in Psalm XXXVII: "I am bowed down and humbled in every way." Truth herself also reproves their fault when she says in Luke: "But the seed that fell among thorns—these are those who have heard and, going on, are choked by the cares and riches and pleasures of life, and they bring forth no fruit." §6. Bleary-eyed, however, is one whose natural capacity indeed flashes forth toward knowledge of the truth, but carnal works nevertheless obscure it. In bleary eyes the pupils are healthy, but the eyelids, weakened by a flowing humor, grow thick; and because the pupil is worn by their continual discharge, even its keenness is impaired. And there are some whose practice of carnal life wounds their perception, who by natural capacity could have seen right things subtly, but through the practice of depraved acts grow dim. Therefore one is bleary-eyed whose perception nature has sharpened but whose depravity of conduct confounds; to such a one it is well said through the Angel in the Apocalypse: "Anoint your eyes with eye-salve, so that you may see." For we anoint our eyes with eye-salve so that we may see when, for knowing the brightness of the true light, we aid the keenness of our understanding with the medicine of good work. §7. One has a white film in his eye, however, who is not permitted to see the light of truth because he is blinded by arrogance concerning his wisdom or justice. For the pupil of the eye, being black, sees; while bearing a white film it sees nothing, because evidently the perception of human thought, if it understands itself to be foolish and sinful, apprehends knowledge of inward brightness. But if it attributes to itself the whiteness of justice or wisdom, it excludes itself from the light of heavenly knowledge, and it by no means penetrates the brightness of the true light to the degree that it exalts itself before itself through arrogance, as is said of certain persons in Romans: "For, saying themselves to be wise, they became fools." §8. One has chronic scabies, however, over whom the wantonness of the flesh rules without cessation. For in scabies the heat of the inner organs is drawn to the skin, by which lust is rightly designated, because if the temptation of the heart leaps forth as far as action, assuredly the inward heat breaks forth as far as the scabies of the skin, and now wounds the body outwardly, because while pleasure is not restrained in thought, it rules also in action. For Paul was, as it were, taking care to wipe away the itching of the skin when he said to the Corinthians: "Let no temptation take hold of you except what is human," as if he were saying openly: It is indeed human to suffer temptation in the heart, but demonic to be overcome in the contest with temptation and in action. §9. Whoever is ravaged in mind by avarice also has impetigo on the body, which, if it is not checked in small things, assuredly spreads without measure. For impetigo occupies the body without pain and, growing without the weariness of the one occupied, disfigures the beauty of the limbs, because avarice both delights, as it were, and ulcerates the mind it has captured; while it sets before thought whatever things are to be acquired, it kindles it toward enmities, and it causes no pain in the wound, because it promises abundance from the fault to the agitated mind. But the beauty of the limbs is lost, because through it the beauty of the other virtues also is corrupted; and it makes, as it were, the whole body rough, because it trips up the mind through all things, as Paul bears witness, who says to Timothy: "The root of all evils is covetousness." §10. Burdened, however, is one who does not practice baseness in deed but is nevertheless weighed down in mind by continual thought of it without restraint; one who is indeed by no means dragged as far as the wicked deed, but whose spirit delights in the pleasure of lust without any goad of resistance. For the defect of being burdened occurs when the humor of the inner organs descends to the genitals, which indeed swell with troublesome disgrace. Therefore burdened is one who, flowing down with all his thoughts toward wantonness, carries the weight of baseness in his heart; and although he does not perform depraved works, he nevertheless is not lifted from them in mind, nor is he able to rise openly to the practice of good work, because a base weight burdens him in secret. §11. Therefore, whoever is subdued by any of these vices is prohibited from offering loaves to the Lord, lest indeed one whose own offenses still devastate him be able to wash away the offenses of others. §12. Since, therefore, we have shown in a few words how a worthy man may come to the pastoral office of teaching, and how an unworthy man should fear it, let us now show how one who has worthily attained it ought to live in it.

C. I. Qui uiciis maculatus est sacrificium Deo offerre non debet.

Hinc etenim superna uoce ad Moysen dicitur in Leuitico: "Loquere ad Aaron: homo de semine tuo per familias, qui habuerit maculam, non offerat panem Deo suo, nec accedat ad ministerium eius." Ubi et repente subiungitur; "Si cecus fuerit, si claudus, si uel paruo uel grandi uel torto naso, si fracto pede, si mancus, si gibbus, si lippus, si albuginem habens in oculo, si iugem scabiem, si impetiginem in corpore, uel ponderosus." §. 1. Cecus quippe est, qui supernae lumen contemplationis ignorat, qui presentis uitae tenebris pressus, dum lucem uenturam nequaquam diligendo conspicit, quo gressus operis porrigat nescit. Hinc etenim prophetante Anna dicitur in libro Regum: "Pedes sanctorum suorum seruabit, et impii in tenebris conticescent." §. 2. Claudus uero est, qui quidem quo pergere debeat aspicit, sed per infirmitatem mentis uitae uiam perfecte non ualet tenere quam uidet; quia uidelicet quis ad uirtutis statum dum fluxa consuetudine non erigitur, quo desiderium innititur, illuc gressus operis efficaciter non sequitur. Hinc etenim Paulus dicit ad Ebreos: "Remissas manus et dissoluta genua erigite, et gressus rectos facite pedibus uestris, ut non claudicans erret, magis autem sanetur". §. 3. Paruo autem naso est, qui ad tenendam mensuram discretionis idoneus non est. Naso quippe odores fetoresque discernimus. Recte ergo per nasum discretio exprimitur, per quam uirtutes eligimus, delicta reprobamus. Unde et in laude sponsae dicitur in canticis canticorum: "Nasus tuus sicut turris, que est in Libano," quia nimirum sancta ecclesia que ex causis singulis temptamenta prodeant per discretionem conspicit, et uentura uiciorum bella ex alto deprehendit. Sed sunt nonnulli, qui, dum estimari hebetes nolunt, sepe se in quibusdam inquisitionibus plus quam necesse est exercentes ex nimia subtilitate falluntur. Unde hic quoque subditur: "uel grandi uel torto naso." Nasus etenim grandis et tortus est discretionis subtilitas inmoderata, que, dum plus quam decet excreuerit, actionis suae rectitudinem ipsa confundit. §. 4. Fracto autem pede uel manu est, qui uiam Domini pergere omnino non ualet, atque a bonis actibus funditus exors uacat, quatenus hec non ut claudus saltem cum infirmitate teneat, sed ab his omnimodo alienus existat. §. 5. Gibbus uero est, quem terrenae sollicitudinis pondus deprimit, ne umquam ad superna respiciat, sed solis his, que in infimis calcantur, intendat, quid et si quando aliquid ex bono patriae celestis audierit ad hoc, nimirum peruersae consuetudinis pondere pregrauatus, cordis faciem non attollit, qui cogitationis statum erigere non ualet, quem terrenae usus sollicitudinis curuum tenet. Ex horum quippe specie Psalmista dicit in Psalmo XXXVII.: "Incuruatus sum et humiliatus sum usquequaque." Quorum culpam quoque per semetipsam ueritas reprobans ait in Luca: "Semen autem, quod in spinis cecidit, hi sunt, qui audierunt et a sollicitudinibus et diuiciis et uoluptatibus uitae euntes suffocantur, et non referunt fructum." §. 6. Lippus uero est, cuius quidem ingenium ad cognitionem ueritatis emicat, sed tamen hoc carnalia opera obscurant. In lippis quippe oculis pupillae sanae sunt, sed humore defluenti infirmantes palpebrae grossescunt, quorum quia infusione crebra atteritur, etiam acies pupillae uitiatur. Et sunt nonnulli, quorum sensum carnalis uitae operatio sauciat, qui uidere recta subtiliter per ingenium poterant, sed usu prauorum actuum caligant. Lippus itaque est, cuius sensum natura exacuit, sed conuersationis prauitas confundit, cui bene per Angelum dicitur in Apocalypsi: "Colirio inunge oculos tuos, ut uideas." Colirio quippe oculos ut uideamus inungimus, cum ad cognoscendam ueri luminis claritatem intellectus nostri aciem medicamine bonae operationis adiuuamus. §. 7. Albuginem uero habet in oculo, qui ueritatis lucem uidere non sinitur, quia arrogantia sapientiae seu iusticiae cecatur. Pupilla namque oculi nigra uidet, albuginem, tollerans nichil uidet, quia uidelicet sensus humanae cogitationis, si stultum se peccatoremque intelligit, cognitionem intimae claritatis apprehendit. Si autem candorem sibi iusticiae seu sapientiae tribuit, a luce se supernae cognitionis excludit, et eo claritatem ueri luminis nequaquam penetrat, quo se apud se per arrogantiam exaltat, sicut de quibusdam dicitur ad Romanos: "Dicentes enim se esse sapientes, stulti facti sunt." §. 8. Iugem uero habet scabiem, cui carnis petulantia sine cessatione dominatur. In scabie etenim feruor uiscerum ad cutem trahitur, per quam recte luxuria designatur, quia si cordis temptatio usque ad operationem prosilit, nimirum feruor intimus usque ad cutis scabiem prorumpit, et foris iam corpus sauciat, quia dum in cogitatione uoluptas non reprimitur, etiam in actione dominatur. Quasi enim cutis pruriginem Paulus curabat abstergere, cum dicebat ad Corinthios: "Temptatio non apprehendat uos, nisi humana," ac si aperte diceret: Humanum quidem est in corde temptationem perpeti, demoniacum uero est temptationis certamine et operatione superari. §. 9. Impetiginem quoque habet in corpore quisquis auaricia uastatur in mente, que si in paruis non compescitur, nimirum sine mensura dilatatur. Inpetigo quippe sine dolore corpus occupat et absque occupati tedio excrescens membrorum decorem fedat, quia et auaritia capti animum, dum quasi delectat, exulcerat, dum adipiscenda queque cogitationi obicit, ad inimicicias accendit, et dolorem in uulnere non facit, quia estuanti animo ex culpa habundantiam promittit. Sed decor membrorum perditur, quia aliarum quoque uirtutum per hanc pulcritudo deprauatur, et quasi totum corpus exasperat, quia per uniuersa animum subplantat, Paulo adtestante, qui ait ad Timotheum: "Radix omnium malorum est cupiditas." §. 10. Ponderosus uero est, qui turpitudinem non exercet opere, sed tamen ab hac cogitacione continua sine moderamine grauatur in mente; qui nequaquam quidem usque ad opus nefarium rapitur, sed eius animus uoluptate luxuriae sine ullo repugnationis stimulo delectatur. Vicium quippe est ponderis, cum humor uiscerum ad uirilia labitur, que profecto cum molestia dedecoris intumescunt. Ponderosus ergo est, qui totis cogitacionibus ad lasciuiam defluens, pondus turpitudinis gestat in corde; et quamuis praua non exerceat opera, ab his tamen non eleuatur mente, nec ad usum boni operis in aperto ualet assurgere, quia grauat hunc in abditis pondus turpe. §. 11. Quisquis ergo quolibet horum uitio subigitur, panes Domino offerre prohibetur, ne profecto aliena delicta ualeat diluere is, quem adhuc propria deuastant. §. 12. Quia igitur paucis ad pastorale magisterium dignus qualiter ueniat, atque indignus hoc qualiter pertimescat, ostendimus, nunc is, qui ad illud digne peruenerit, in eo qualiter uiuere debeat, demonstremus.

C. II. One who is unlearned, seeks earthly gains, or is vicious must not be ordained.

Likewise Jerome on Malachi [on c. 1, vv. 7–8]. Priests despise the name of the Lord and, insofar as it lies with them, offer polluted bread, who approach the altar unworthily and who presume to obtain the priesthood after a gift has been given. One also pollutes the bread who distributes the doctrine of the Lord badly among the people, and one who honors the powerful and despises the poor. And below: §1. "If you offer what is blind for sacrifice, is it not evil?" etc. Accused above concerning the loaves, they are now accused concerning the victims. One offers a blind animal who ordains an unlearned man in place of a learned one and makes a master of one who could scarcely have been a disciple. One offers a lame animal who appoints one seeking earthly gains, as one who sets a foot in different directions, one in divine matters and the other in carnal matters, against whom that statement from the Book of Kings may be brought: "How long do you limp between two sides?" One offers a sick animal who regards a vicious man as religious and who approves a slow and idle man as patient, saying that he should be reproved for negligence. For it is unworthy to give to God what a human being disdains.

C. II. Indoctus, terrena lucra quaerens, uitiosus ordinari non debet.

Item Ieronimus super Malachiam. [ad c. 1. u. 7. 8.] Sacerdotes nomen Domini despiciunt, et, quantum ad se, panem pollutum offerunt, qui ad altare indigne accedunt, quique dato munere sacerdotium presumunt. Panem quoque polluit, qui doctrinam Domini in populo male dispertit, et qui honorat potentem et despicit pauperem. Et infra: §. 1. "Si offeratis cecum ad immolandum, nonne malum est?" etc. Superius accusati de panibus nunc accusantur de uictimis. Cecum animal offert, qui ordinat indoctum in loco docti, magistrumque facit, qui uix discipulus esse poterat. Claudum offert, qui lucra terrena querentem locat, utpote pedem in diuersa ponentem, unum in diuinis, alterum in carnalibus, cui potest inferri illud de libro Regum: "Usquequo claudicas in duas partes?" Languidum offert, qui uitiosum pro religioso habet, quique tardum et pigrum probat pacientem, dicens illum negligentiae redarguendum. Indignum est enim dare Deo quod dedignatur homo.

Distinction L

GRATIAN. Part I. From the foregoing authorities it has been clearly demonstrated that those entangled in various crimes cannot be ordained as priests. But it is now asked concerning the same persons whether, after penance has been performed, they are able either to remain in their own orders or to ascend to higher grades. By many authorities those entangled in various crimes are cast down from their own orders and prohibited from access to higher ones. Hence Gregory says to Constantine, Bishop of Milan [Book IV, epistle 17]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Ex premissis auctoritatibus liquido demonstratum est, quod uariis criminibus irretiti in sacerdotes ordinari non possunt. Nunc autem de hisdem queritur, utrum post actam penitenciam, uel in propriis ordinibus remanere, aut ad maiores gradus conscendere ualeant? Multorum auctoritatibus deiciuntur uariis criminibus irretiti a propriis ordinibus, et ab accessu maiorum prohibentur. Unde Gregorius ait Constantino Mediolanensi Episcopo: [lib. IV. epist. 17.]

C. I. Those who have fallen cannot be restored to their order.

If permission to return to their order is granted to those who have fallen, the force of canonical discipline is undoubtedly broken, while someone does not fear to conceive desires for depraved action because of hope of returning. And a little later: §1. Endeavor before all things that no supplication move you in any way to recall to sacred order those who have fallen, lest punishment of this kind be believed not to have been established, but merely postponed for a time.

> C. I. Lapsi in suum ordinem reparari non possunt.
> Si lapsis ad suum ordinem reuertendi licentia conceditur uigor canonicae proculdubio frangitur disciplinae, dum pro reuersionis spe prauae actionis desideria quis concipere non formidat. Et post pauca: §. 1. Illud pre omnibus studete, ut lapsos in sacro ordine nullius uobis supplicatio aliquo modo reuocare studeat, ne huiusmodi non statuta, sed temporaliter dilata credatur esse uindicta.

C. II. One who falls after ordination shall remain deposed.

Likewise Pope Martin [I] to Bishop Amandus. One who has once fallen into a lapse after his ordination shall thereafter already be deposed and will be able to obtain no grade of the priesthood.

> C. II. Qui post ordinationem labitur, depositus permanebit.
> Item Martinus Papa. [I.] Amando Episcopo. Qui semel post suam ordinationem in lapsum ceciderit deinceps iam depositus erit, nullumque gradum sacerdotii poterit adipisci.

C. III. A priest can by no reason be restored to sacred order after a lapse.

Likewise Pope Gregory to Bishop Sabinus [Book VII, epistle 25]. Let your fraternity know that the priest concerning whom it consulted us through the mission of the bearer of these presents can by no reason either remain in sacred order after his lapse or be recalled to it. Nevertheless, he is to be dealt with more mildly, because he is said to have confessed the crime committed with ready acknowledgment.

> C. III. Presbiter post lapsum nulla ratione in sacro ordine reparari ualet.
> Item Gregorius Papa Sabino Episcopo. [lib. VII. epist. 25.] Presbiterum, de quo nos fraternitas tua latoris presentium legatione consuluit, nulla ratione in sacro ordine post lapsum aut permanere, aut reuocari posse cognoscat. Circa quem tamen mitius agendum est, quia commissum facinus facili dicitur professione confessus.

C. IV. After homicide has been committed, priestly office cannot be administered.

Likewise John VIII to Cennemocus, Bishop of Nantes. I marvel that your poorly instructed knowledge thinks that a priest can minister in the priesthood after committing homicide and, what is more inept, wishes to persuade us to furnish assent to such presumption. For who, so demented and of such perverse judgment, would think that such a thing should be granted even after however great a penance, since it is contrary to all canonical discipline?

Therefore, deprived of the priesthood, he ought to wash away so enormous a crime with a fountain of tears, so that, healed at least by such remedies, he may be able to find the aid of salvation.

C. IV. Post peractum homicidium sacerdotale offitium amministrari non potest.

Item Iohannes VIII. Cennemoco Nanneticensi Episcopo. Miror minus doctam scientiam tuam sacerdotem putare et post perpetratum homicidium posse in sacerdotio ministrare, immo (quod est ineptius) nobis suadere uelle, ut ipsi tali presumptioni preberemus assensum. Quis enim tam demens tamque peruersi sensus tale quid existimaret uel post quantamcumque penitenciam concedendum, cum omni sit canonicae disciplinae contrarium?

Debet ergo sacerdotio priuatus lacrimarum fonte flagitium tam immane diluere, ut talibus saltem remediis curatus salutis possit inuenire suffragium.

C. V. A cleric who has killed a pagan cannot be advanced to a higher grade.

Likewise Pope Nicholas. A cleric who has killed a pagan ought not to be advanced to a higher grade; he ought even to be deprived of the grade acquired, for he is a homicide. For since the soldiers of the world are distinct from the soldiers of the Church, it is not fitting for a soldier of the Church to serve the world as a soldier, through which it is necessary to arrive at the shedding of blood.

C. V. Ad maiorem gradum prouehi non potest clericus, qui paganum occiderit.

Item Nicolaus Papa. Clericum, qui paganum occiderit, non oportet ad maiorem gradum prouehi, qui carere debet etiam acquisito, homicida enim est. Nam cum discreti sint milites seculi a militibus ecclesiae, non conuenit militem ecclesiae militare seculo, per quod ad effusionem sanguinis necesse sit peruenire.

C. VI. One who has killed a pagan in defending himself shall lack priestly office.

The same to Osbald, the Quadrantine chorepiscopus. Concerning those clerics about whom you consulted us—namely, those who killed a pagan while defending themselves—whether, afterward corrected through penance, they can return to their former grade or ascend to a higher one, know that we give them no occasion and grant no license to kill any human being in any manner whatsoever. But if it should happen that a cleric of priestly order has killed even a pagan, he takes great counsel for himself if he withdraws from priestly office; and it is more satisfactory for him to serve the Lord blamelessly in this life under a lower habit than, by improperly seeking high things, to be plunged damnably into the depths.

C. VI. Qui se defendendo paganum occiderit, sacerdotali careat offitio.

Idem Osbaldo Corepiscopo Quadrantino. De his clericis, pro quibus consuluistis, scilicet, qui se defendendo paganum occiderunt, si postea per penitenciam emendati ad pristinum possint gradum redire, aut ad altiorem ascendere, scito, nos nullam occasionem dare nec ullam tribuere licentiam eis quemlibet hominum quolibet modo occidendi. Verum si contigerit, ut clericus sacerdotalis ordinis saltim paganum occiderit, multum sibi consulit, si ab offitio sacerdotali recesserit; satiusque illi est in hac uita Domino sub inferiori habitu inreprehensibiliter famulari, quam alta indebite appetendo in profundum dampnabiliter dimergi.

C. VII. A bishop, priest, or deacon committing a capital crime shall fall from office.

Likewise from the Council of Agde. If a bishop, priest, or deacon has committed a capital crime, or falsified a document, or given false testimony, let him be deposed from the honor of office, be thrust into a monastery, and there, as long as he lives, receive only lay communion.

C. VII. Episcopus, presbiter, aut diaconus capitale crimen committens cadat ab offitio.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. Si episcopus, presbiter, aut diaconus capitale crimen commiserit, aut cartam falsauerit, aut falsum testimonium dixerit, ab offitii honore depositus in monasterio detrudatur et ibi quamdiu uixerit laicam tantummodo communionem accipiat.

C. VIII. One who, after baptism, has been privy to homicide by deed, command, counsel, or defense shall not be ordained a cleric.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin [c. 26]. If anyone has married a widow or one left by another, let him not be admitted to the clergy. But if he has slipped in, let him be cast down. Likewise, if after baptism he has been privy to homicide by deed, command, counsel, or defense and has come to clerical status through some surreption, let him be cast down and receive communion at the end of his life.

C. VIII. Qui homicidii facto aut precepto, aut consilio post baptismum conscius fuerit, clericus non ordinetur.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 26.] Si quis uiduam aut ab alio relictam duxerit, non admittatur ad clerum. Quod si irrepserit, deiciatur. Similiter si homicidii aut facto, aut precepto, aut consilio, aut defensione post baptismum conscius fuerit et per aliquam subreptionem ad clericatum uenerit, deiciatur, et in fine uitae suae communionem accipiat.

C. IX. Those who have fallen from sacred orders cannot be restored.

Likewise Gregory to Januarius, Bishop of Cagliari [Book III, epistle 26]. It has come to us that some who have fallen from sacred orders are recalled to the office of their ministry either after penance or before penance. This we altogether prohibit, and the most sacred canons also contradict it in this matter. Therefore, one who has fallen into a sin of the flesh after receiving sacred order shall lack sacred order and shall not approach the ministry of the altar.

C. IX. De sacris ordinibus lapsi reparari non possunt.

Item Gregorius Ianuario Episcopo Caralitano. [lib. III. epist. 26.] Peruenit ad nos, quosdam de sacris ordinibus lapsos uel post penitenciam, uel ante penitenciam ad ministerii sui offitium reuocari; quod omnino prohibemus, et in hac re sacratissimi quoque canones contradicunt. Qui igitur post acceptum sacrum ordinem lapsus in peccatum fuerit carnis, sacro ordine careat, et ad ministerium altaris non accedat.

C. X. Concerning the same.

The same to Venantius, Bishop of Luni [Book IV, epistle 5]. When your fraternity comes to the island of Gorgona, let it investigate what has been reported to us concerning Saturninus, a former priest. For it has come to us that, after he had fallen from sacred orders and had been cast down from his priestly order, he presumed to approach the performance of the ministry of the priesthood and to offer sacrifices to almighty God. If your fraternity finds that this was so done, let it deprive him of participation in the sacred body and blood of the Lord and reduce him to penance, so that he may remain in that excommunication until his last day and receive only viaticum at the time of his departure. But if your fraternity knows him to perform such penance that it ought justly to show him mercy by receiving him into communion among the laity even before his departure, we place this within the power of your fraternity. And below: §1. Moreover, responding to the inquiries of your fraternity, we decree that the deacon and abbot from Porto Venere whom you indicate to have fallen ought not and cannot in any manner be recalled to sacred order. It is fitting that, deprived of sacred order, he be assigned by you to penance; and if his subsequent deeds and manner of life merit it, let him obtain the first place for standing among the other monks wherever you decree. The subdeacons also whom a similar fault binds, irrevocably deposed from their office, shall receive communion among the laity. At Porto Venere, moreover, you will ordain in place of the fallen deacon another who ought to fulfill this office. But we have decreed to ensure in writing that Saturninus, the former priest, never presume to approach the ministry of sacred order; yet we have permitted him to exercise solicitude for the monasteries on the islands of Gorgona and Capraia and to remain in his present state without opposition from anyone.

C. X. De eodem.

Idem Venantio Lunensi Episcopo. [lib. IV. epist. 5.] Accedens ad Gorgonam insulam fraternitas uestra discutiat id, quod ad nos de Saturnino expresbitero est perlatum. Peruenit namque ad nos, quia postquam de sacris ordinibus lapsus a sui sacerdotii ordine deiectus est, ad explendum ministerium presbiterii presumpsit accedere, et omnipotenti Deo hostias immolare. Quod si ita factum uestra fraternitas repererit, eum sacri corporis et sanguinis domini participatione priuatum in penitenciam redigat, ita ut usque ad diem ultimum in eadem excommunicatione permaneat et uiaticum tantummodo exitus sui tempore percipiat. Sin autem eum talem penitenciam agere fraternitas uestra cognouerit, ut ei iuste ad recipiendam inter laicos communionem etiam ante exitum debeat misereri, hoc in tuae fraternitatis ponimus potestate. Et infra: §. 1. Preterea ad fraternitatis tuae consulta respondentes statuimus, diaconem et abbatem, quem de portu Veneris indicas cecidisse, ad sacrum ordinem non debere uel posse aliquo modo reuocari. Quem quidem sacro ordine priuatum in penitenciam deputare te conuenit; cuius si postea actus conuersatioque meruerit, priorem inter alios monachos, ubi decreueris, standi locum obtineat. Subdiaconi quoque, quos similis culpa constringit, ab offitio suo irreuocabiliter depositi, inter laicos communionem accipiant. In portu autem Veneris loco lapsi diaconi alium, qui hoc offitium inplere debeat, ordinabis. Saturninum uero expresbiterum, ut numquam ad sacri ordinis ministerium presumat accedere, scriptis cauere decreuimus; sed eum in insula Gorgona atque Capraria sollicitudinem de monasteriis gerere, et in quo est statu sine cuiusquam aduersitate manere permisimus.

C. XI. Another is to be ordained in place of one who has fallen.

The same [to Marinianus, Bishop of Ravenna, Book VI, epistle 39]. Since no reason permits anyone falling criminally to be recalled to the place from which he fell, and the statutes of the sacred canons do not permit a church to be vacant of a pontiff beyond three months, lest, when the shepherd has fallen, the ancient enemy by lying in wait tear apart the Lord's flock—which God forbid—your fraternity ought to consent to their entreaty and ordain a bishop in the place of the fallen one.

> C. XI. Loco lapsi alius ordinandus est.
> Idem. [Mariniano Episcopo Rauennae, lib. VI. epist. 39.] Postquam quemquam criminaliter cadentem in locum, quo lapsus est, nulla permittit ratio reuocari, et ultra tres menses ecclesiam uacare pontifice statuta sacrorum canonum non permittunt, ne cadente pastore dominicum gregem hostis (quod absit) antiquus insidiando dilaniet, fraternitas uestra deprecationi eorum consentire et in lapsi loco debet episcopum ordinare.

C. XII. One who has fallen after ordination must not handle the sacred mysteries.

Likewise Pope Martin [I, in the epistle to Amandus]. If anyone has fallen into a lapse after his ordination and has been found liable to the sin of transgression, he must be prohibited in every way from handling the mysteries of our salvation with muddy and polluted hands. Part II. GRATIAN. To the contrary, it is proved by examples and authority that after penance has been performed persons may lawfully administer their own grades and ascend to higher ones. For Miriam, Aaron's sister, after she was struck with leprosy because she had murmured against Moses, was cleansed when penance had been performed and received her former grace of prophesying. After the calf had been cast, Aaron was even consecrated as high priest. After adultery and homicide David received the spirit of prophecy and remained in his own grade. After the death of Naboth, that most holy man, Ahab, humbled through penance, remained on the royal throne. And, that we may pass over many examples of the Old Testament, Peter denied Christ and nevertheless was afterward made prince of the apostles; Paul stoned Stephen and nevertheless was chosen by God as an apostle. Many also, returning from heresy to the unity of the catholic faith, were received in their orders, while others were even promoted to the episcopal grade, such as Augustine and very many others.

[PALEA.

> C. XII. Qui post ordinationem in lapsum ceciderit, sacra misteria non debet tractare.
> Item Martinus Papa. [I. in epistola ad Amandum.] Si post ordinationem suam quispiam in lapsum ceciderit, et preuaricationis peccato fuerit deprehensus obnoxius omnimodo prohibendum est, eum manibus lutulentis atque pollutis misteria nostrae salutis tractare. II. Pars. Gratian. Econtra exemplis et auctoritate probatur, post actam penitenciam proprios gradus licite posse administrare, et ad maiores conscendere. Maria enim, soror Aaron, postquam lepra percussa est, quia in Moysen murmurauerat, acta penitencia mundata est, et pristinam gratiam prophetandi recepit. Aaron post conflatum uitulum etiam in summum sacerdotem est consecratus. Dauid post adulterium et homicidium spiritum prophetiae recepit, et in proprio gradu permansit. Achab post mortem Nabuthae uiri sanctissimi per penitenciam humiliatus in regia sede remansit. Et, ut pretereamus multa exempla ueteris testamenti, Petrus negauit Christum, et tamen postea princeps apostolorum factus est; Paulus Stephanum lapidauit, et tamen a Deo in apostolum electus est. Multi quoque ab heresi ad unitatem catholicae fidei reuertentes in suis ordinibus recepti sunt, alii uero ad episcopalem etiam gradum sunt promoti, utpote Augustinus et alii quam plures.

[PALEA.

C. XIII. Concerning the same.

John Chrysostom was condemned by two synods of orthodox bishops, but was again restored. Marcellus, Bishop of Ancyra in Galatia, was deposed, but afterward received his own episcopate. Asclepius, condemned by a synod, afterward received his church. Lucius, Bishop of Adrianople, condemned by Pope Julius, received the church of his episcopate. Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem, was deposed and afterward was reconciled to his church.

In a similar manner Pope Sixtus condemned Polychronius, pontiff of the same church of Jerusalem, and again he himself reconciled him. Pope Innocent condemned Bishop Photinus, but afterward restored him to his proper place in his church. Pope Gelasius, the successor of Pope Felix, reconciled Misenus, a bishop condemned by Felix, and restored him to his church. Leontius, while he was a priest, was deposed, but afterward became patriarch at Antioch. Pope Gregory IV, moreover, consecrated as bishop of the holy church of Segni Theodosius, whom Eugene his predecessor had deprived of the honor of the priesthood. Bishop Ibas, indeed, was condemned, but a holy canonical synod restored his church to him. Pope Nicholas reconciled both Rothad, bishop of the holy church of Soissons, condemned by a synod at which Charles was present, and Sophronius, Bishop of Piacenza, deservedly rejected.] Moreover, Pope Callistus [I] writes as follows concerning persons of this kind [epistle II to the Bishops of Gaul]:

C. XIII. De eodem.

Iohannes Crisostomus a duabus sinodis orthodoxorum episcoporum fuit diiudicatus, sed iterum fuit restitutus. Marcellus episcopus Ancirae Galatiae depositus fuit, sed postmodum proprium recepit episcopatum. Asclepius diiudicatus a sinodo ecclesiam suam postea recepit. Lucius episcopus Adrianopolites dampnatus a Papa Iulio recepit ecclesiam sui episcopatus. Cirillus episcopus Ierosolimitanus depositus fuit, postea reconciliatus est ecclesiae suae.

Simili modo Polichronium eiusdem ecclesiae Ierosolimitanae pontificem Sixtus Papa dampnauit et iterum ipse eum reconciliauit. Innocentius Papa Fotinum episcopum dampnauit, sed postea eum in proprium locum restituit ecclesiae suae. Misenum episcopum a Felice Papa dampnatum Gelasius Papa successor illius reconciliauit et ecclesiae suae restituit. Leontius, dum esset presbiter, depositus fuit, sed postea in Antiochia patriarcha extitit. Gregorius uero quartus Papa Theodosium, quem Eugenius eius antecessor presbiterii honore priuauerat, sanctae ecclesiae Signinae consecrauit episcopum. Ibas namque episcopus diiudicatus fuit, sed sancta sinodus canonica suam illi restituit ecclesiam. Rothadum uero episcopum sanctae Suessionensis ecclesiae, a sinodo, cui Carolus interfuit, condempnatum, et Sophronium Placentinum episcopum merito reprobatum, Nicolaus Papa ambos reconciliauit.] Preterea Calixtus Papa [I.] de huiusmodi ita scribit: [epist. II. ad Episcopos Galliarum]

C. XIV. Clerics can be restored in their orders after a lapse.

Let each person weigh his words, and let him not say to another what he does not wish to be said to himself. Hence sacred Scripture well says: "What you do not wish to be done to you, do not do to another." For we need time in order that we may do something more maturely, lest we make our counsels and works precipitous and corrupt order. §1. But if anyone has fallen in any manner, let us bear him and correct him with brotherly affection, as the blessed Apostle says: “If a man has been overtaken in any offense, you who are spiritual instruct one of this kind in a spirit of gentleness. Bear one another’s burdens, and so you will fulfill the law of Christ.” §2. Moreover, holy David performed penance for deadly crimes and nevertheless remained in honor. §3. Blessed Peter also poured out most bitter tears when he repented of having denied the Lord, but nevertheless remained an apostle. And the Lord promises through the Prophet, saying: “On whatever day the sinner is converted and groans, I shall no longer remember all his iniquities.” Therefore those err who think that priests after a lapse, if they have performed worthy penance, cannot minister to the Lord and enjoy their honors, if thereafter they lead a good life and worthily guard their priesthood. And those who think this not only err, but also seem to despise the keys handed down to the Church, concerning which it is said: “Whatever you loose on earth shall be loosed also in heaven.” Otherwise, this sentence either is not the Lord’s or is true. §4. But we believe without doubt that both priests of the Lord and the rest of the faithful can return to honors after worthy satisfaction, as the Lord bears witness through the Prophet: “Will not one who sleeps add that he may rise?” And the prophet David, performing penance, said: “Restore to me the joy of your salvation, and strengthen me with a principal spirit.” For after penance he both taught others and offered sacrifice to God, giving an example to the teachers of holy Church that, if they have fallen and have performed worthy penance to God, they can do both. For he taught when he said: “I shall teach the wicked your ways, and the impious will be converted to you.” He offered sacrifice to God for himself when he said: “A sacrifice to God is a contrite spirit.” For seeing his crimes cleansed through penance, the Prophet did not hesitate, by preaching and making offering to the Lord, to care for those of others. §5. Therefore a man is changed from sin, rises from his fall by the grace of God, and remains in his former office according to the aforesaid authorities. Let him see that he does not lie down any further, but that the evangelical sentence remain in him which says: “Go, and now sin no more.” Hence the Apostle says: “Therefore let not sin reign in your mortal body, so that you obey its concupiscences.” §6. Flee, brethren, not only from holding but even from hearing a sentence that forbids mercy, because mercy is preferable to all holocausts and sacrifices.

C. XIV. Clerici post lapsum in suis ordinibus reparari possunt.

Ponderet unusquisque sermones suos, et quod sibi loqui non uult alteri non loquatur. Unde bene sacra scriptura ait: "Quod tibi non uis fieri, alteri ne facias". Nos enim tempore indigemus, ut aliquid maturius, agamus, ne precipitemus consilia et opera nostra, neque ordinem corrumpamus. §. 1. Sed si aliquis lapsus quo modo fuerit, portemus eum et fraterno corripiamus affectu, sicut ait B. Apostolus: "Si preoccupatus fuerit homo in aliquo delicto, uos, qui spirituales estis, instruite huiusmodi in spiritu lenitatis. Alter alterius onera portate, et sic adinplebitis legem Christi." §. 2. Porro S. Dauid de mortiferis criminibus penitenciam egit, et tamen in honore permansit. §. 3. B. quoque Petrus amarissimas lacrimas fudit, quando Dominum negasse penituit, sed tamen apostolus permansit. Et Dominus per Prophetam pollicetur, dicens: "Peccator in quacumque die conuersus fuerit et ingemuerit, omnium iniquitatum eius non recordabor amplius." Errant itaque, qui putant, sacerdotes post lapsum, si condignam egerint penitenciam, Domino non posse ministrare, et suis honoribus frui, si bonam uitam deinceps duxerint, et suum sacerdotium digne custodierint. Et ipsi, qui hoc putant, non solum errant, sed etiam traditas ecclesiae claues despicere uidentur, de quibus dicitur: "Quecunque solueritis in terra, erunt soluta et in celo." Alioquin hec sentencia aut Domini non est, aut uera est. §. 4. Nos uero indubitanter tam Domini sacerdotes quam reliquos fideles post dignam satisfactionem posse redire ad honores credimus, testante Domino per Prophetam:

"Numquid qui dormit, non adiciet, ut resurgat"? Et propheta Dauid penitenciam agens dixit: "Redde mihi leticiam salutaris tui, et spiritu principali confirma me." Ipse namque post penitenciam et alios docuit, et sacrificium Deo obtulit, dans exemplum doctoribus sanctae ecclesiae, si lapsi fuerint et condignam penitenciam Deo gesserint, utrumque facere posse. Docuit enim, quando dixit; "Docebo iniquos uias tuas, et inpii ad te conuertentur." Sacrificium Deo obtulit pro se, dum dicebat: "Sacrificium Deo spiritus contribulatus". Videns enim Propheta scelera sua mundata per penitenciam, non dubitauit predicando et Domino libando curare aliena. §. 5. Mutatur ergo homo a peccato et gratia Dei resurgit a lapsu et in pristino manet offitio iuxta predictas auctoritates. Videat, ne amplius iaceat, sed euangelica sentencia in eo maneat que ait: "Vade et amplius noli peccare." Unde ait Apostolus: "Non ergo regnet peccatum in uestro mortali corpore, ut obediatis concupiscentiis eius". §. 6. Sentenciam, que misericordiam uetat, non solum tenere, fratres, sed etiam audire refugite, quia potior est misericordia omnibus holocaustomatibus et sacrificiis.

C. XV. Priests can be recalled to their former grade after penance.

Likewise Jerome [on c. 3 of Malachi]. "And he will purify the sons of Levi; for it is time that judgment begin from the house of God," and elsewhere it is written: "Begin from my holy ones." In the sons of Levi, moreover, understand every priestly dignity. But if priests are to be purified and strained so that pure gold and silver may remain, what is to be said of the rest? When they have been cleansed and strained, then they will offer just sacrifices to the Lord, and their sacrifice that they offer for Judah and Jerusalem will please the Lord—that is, for those who confess the Lord and behold his peace in the mind—as in the days of the age and as in ancient years, so that, just as they pleased God in the beginning, so after sin and penance they may begin to please him when they have been purified from every filth of sins.

C. XV. In pristinum gradum post penitenciam sacerdotes reuocari possunt.

Item Ieronimus. [ad cap. 3. Malachiae.] "Et purgabit filios Leui; tempus est enim, ut iudicium incipiat a domo Dei," et alibi scribitur: "A sanctis meis incipite." In filiis autem Leui omnem sacerdotalem intellige dignitatem. Si autem sacerdotes purgandi sunt et colandi, ut purum aurum remaneat et argentum, quid est de ceteris dicendum? Qui cum emundati fuerint et colati, tunc offerent Domino iusta sacrificia et placebit sacrificium eorum Domino, quod offerunt pro Iuda et Ierusalem, (hoc est pro his, qui Dominum confitentur et pacem eius mente conspiciunt, sicut dies seculi et sicut anni antiqui), ut quomodo in principio placuerunt Deo, sic post peccatum et penitenciam placere incipiant, cum omni fuerint peccatorum sorde purgati.

C. XVI. Those who have fallen can be restored.

Likewise Gregory to Secundinus [Book VII, epistle 53]. Your Holiness asked that we write to you authority concerning rising again to priestly office after a lapse, since you say that you have read diverse sentences of diverse canons concerning this, some allowing one to rise again and others not at all. Therefore, beginning generally from the Nicene Synod, we venerate it together with the other four, because in all their sentences they agree unanimously. But we follow the preceding Fathers because, with God as author, we do not disagree with their sacred teaching. Therefore, beginning from the head down to the fourth ministry of the altar, we have learned that this form is to be observed: just as the greater precedes the lesser in honor, so also in crime; and he whom a greater fault follows is bound by a greater punishment, and afterward penance is believed to be fruitful. §1. For what does it profit to sow wheat and not gather its fruit, or to construct a house and not dwell there? Therefore, after worthy satisfaction, we believe that one can return to honor. §2. Running back to the fountain of mercy, let us produce the evangelical sentence: "I rejoice," he says, "over one sinner performing penance more than over ninety-nine just persons who have no need of penance." And the Lord himself bears witness that the lost sheep, the ninety-nine who had not gone astray being left behind, was to be carried back to the sheepfold on the shoulders of the pious shepherd. If the lost, wandering sheep after being found is carried on his shoulder to the sheepfold, the aforesaid ninety-nine who had not gone astray being left in the desert, why should one who has fallen not be recalled after penance to the ministry of the Church? As is said in the Apocalypse concerning a minister of the Church: "Remember whence you have fallen, and perform penance, and do your first works." For what is more grave: to commit a carnal offense, without which few are found, or to deny the Son of God by an oath? We know that the blessed Peter himself, prince of the apostles, at whose sacred body we unworthy ones sit, fell by this word. But penance followed after the denial, and mercy was given after penance, because he who foretold that Peter would deny him did not remove him from the apostolate.

> C. XVI. Lapsi reparari possunt.
> Item Gregorius Secundino. [lib. VII. epist. 53] Tua sanctitas requisiuit, ut tibi de sacerdotali offitio post lapsum resurgendi auctoritatem scriberemus, dum dicis de hoc canonum diuersorum te legisse diuersas sentencias, alias resurgendi, alias nequaquam: ideo nos generaliter a Nicena sinodo incipientes, cum reliquis quatuor ueneramur, quia in cunctis sentenciis unanimiter concordant. Nos uero precedentes Patres sequimur quia (auctore Deo) a sacra doctrina illorum non discordamus. A capite itaque incipientes usque in quartum altaris ministerium, hanc formam seruandam cognouimus, ut sicut minorem maior precedit honore, ita et crimine, et quem maior sequitur culpa, maiori inplicetur uindicta et post penitencia credatur esse fructuosa. §. 1. Quid enim prodest triticum seminare, et fructum illius non colligere? aut domum construere, et non illic habitare? Post dignam itaque satisfactionem credimus posse redire ad honorem. §. 2. Ad fontem misericordiae recurrentes euangelicam proferamus sentenciam: "Gaudeo," inquit, "super uno peccatore penitenciam agente quam super nonaginta nouem iustis, qui non indigent penitencia." Et ouem perditam, nonaginta nouem non errantibus relictis, humero pii pastoris ad ouile reportandam Dominus ipse testatur. Si ouis perdita errans post inuentionem ad ouile humero deportatur, predictis nonaginta nouem non errantibus relictis in deserto cur post penitenciam ad ecclesiae ministerium lapsus non reuocetur? Sicut in Apocalipsi dicitur de ministro ecclesiae: "Memento unde cecideris, et age penitenciam, et prima opera fac." Quid est enim grauius, aut carnale delictum admittere, sine quo pauci inueniuntur, aut Dei filium iureiurando negare? In quo uerbo hunc ipsum B. Petrum apostolorum principem, ad cuius sacrum corpus indigni sedemus, lapsum esse cognouimus. Sed post negationem penitencia secuta est, et post penitenciam misericordia data, quia ab apostolatu eum non distulit, qui ante ipsum se negare predixit.

C. XVII. After most severe penance those who have fallen are restored.

The same [on Ezekiel, homily IX, on c. 2]. What is this, that it is said to the Prophet lying down: "Stand upon your feet, and I shall speak with you"? He who spoke to him while lying down, why does he promise that he will speak when he is standing? But it must be known that there are some things that we ought to hear while lying down and others while standing. For it is said to one lying down that he should rise; but one standing is commanded that he ought to set out to preach. For authority to preach ought not to be furnished to us while we are still lying in the confusion of weakness. But when we now rise in good work, when we now begin to stand upright, it is fitting that we ought to be sent to preach for the gaining of others. Therefore, standing, the Prophet saw a spiritual vision and fell; falling, however, he received words of admonition that he should rise; and rising he heard the command that he should preach. For we who still stand at the summit of pride, when we have now begun to perceive something concerning fear of eternity, ought fittingly to fall to penance. And while, subtly recognizing our weakness, we lie humbly, let us rise through the consolation of the divine word to stronger works.

C. XVII. Post acerrimam penitenciam lapsi reparantur.

Idem. [super Ezechielem, hom. IX. ad c. 2.] Quid est hoc, quod Prophetae iacenti dicitur: "Sta supra pedes tuos, et loquar tecum?" Qui enim iacenti loquebatur, cur stanti promittit se esse locuturum? sed sciendum est, quia alia sunt, que iacentes, alia que stantes audire debemus. Iacenti enim dicitur, ut surgat; stanti autem precipitur, ut ad predicationem proficisci debeat. Adhuc enim nobis in infirmitatis confusione iacentibus preberi non debet auctoritas predicationis. Sed cum iam in bono opere surgimus, cum iam recti stare ceperimus, dignum est, ut ad lucrandos alios in predicatione mitti debeamus. Stans ergo Propheta uisionem spiritualem uidit, et cecidit; cadens uero admonitionis uerba suscepit, ut surgeret; surgens autem preceptum audiuit, ut predicaret. Nam qui adhuc ex superbiae uertice stamus, cum iam de eternitatis timore aliquid sentire ceperimus, dignum est, ut ad penitenciam cadamus. Et dum infirmitatem nostram subtiliter agnoscentes humiliter iacemus, per diuini uerbi consolationem ad fortiora opera surgamus.

C. XVIII. Concerning the same.

The same [Book XVIII of the Moralia, c. 16, on c. 28 of Job]. Iron is taken from the earth when a strong defender of the Church is separated from the earthly activity that he previously maintained. Therefore he ought not to be despised for what he was, because he now begins to be what he was not.

C. XVIII. De eodem.

Idem. [lib. XVIII. Moral. c. 16. ad cap. 28. Iob.] Ferrum de terra tollitur, cum fortis propugnator ecclesiae a terrena, quam prius tenuit, actione separatur. Non ergo in eo debet despici, quod fuit, quia iam incipit esse quod non fuit.

C. XIX. After worthy penance former offices are received again.

Likewise Augustine. When I shall have heard them, I shall give them the strength of my spirit, and I shall fill them with my judgment and strength. Observe that in the present passage someone can teach after sin, if nevertheless he has washed away his former vices by worthy penance. Hence David, after adultery and homicide, speaks in the Psalm: “You will sprinkle me, Lord, with hyssop, and I shall be cleansed; you will wash me, and I shall be made whiter than snow.” Nor is he content only with his own purity, but adds: “Restore to me the joy of your salvation, and strengthen me with a principal spirit,” and when you have done this, “I shall teach,” he says, “the wicked your ways, and the impious will be converted to you.”

C. XIX. Post condignam penitenciam pristina recipiuntur offitia.

Item Augustinus. Cum exaudiero eos, dabo eis uirtutem spiritus mei, et inplebo eos iudicio meo et fortitudine mea. Animaduertite, in presenti loco posse docere aliquem post peccatum, si tamen uicia pristina digna penitencia diluerit. Unde Dauid post adulterium et homicidium loquitur in Psalmo: "Asperges me, Domine, ysopo, et mundabor; lauabis me, et super niuem dealbabor." Nec sua tantum puritate contentus est, sed infert: "Redde mihi leticiam salutaris tui, et spiritu principali confirma me," cumque hoc feceris, "docebo, ait, iniquos uias tuas, et inpii ad te conuertentur."

C. XX. Concerning the same.

Likewise Jerome [Book II Against Jovinian]. Jesus son of Josedech, the high priest, although as a type he preceded the coming of the Savior, who bore our sins and joined to himself a foreign Church from the gentiles, nevertheless according to the letter is introduced as defiled after the priesthood, and the devil stands at his right hand, and afterward white garments are restored to him.

C. XX. De eodem.

Item Ieronimus. [lib. II. contra Iouinianum.] Ihesus filius Iosedech sacerdos magnus quamquam in tipo precesserit aduentum saluatoris, qui nostra peccata portauit et alienigenam ex gentibus sibi copulauit ecclesiam, tamen secundum litteram post sacerdotium sordidatus inducitur, et stat diabolus a dexteris eius, et candida illi deinceps uestimenta redduntur.

C. XXI. Clerics corrected through penance shall receive their grade and dignity.

Likewise from the Council of Agde [c. 2]. Contumacious clerics shall be corrected by the bishops as the order of dignity permits; and if any, elated by pride in their former grade, should perhaps have despised communion, or neglected to frequent the church or fulfill their office, foreign communion shall be allotted to them, so that when penance has corrected them, being written again in the register, they may receive their grade and dignity.

C. XXI. Per penitenciam clerici correcti gradum suum et dignitatem recipiant.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 2.] Contumaces clerici, prout dignitatis ordo permiserit, ab episcopis corrigantur, et si qui prioris gradus elati superbia communionem fortasse contempserint, aut ecclesiam frequentare uel offitium suum inplere neglexerint, peregrina eis communio tribuatur; ita, ut cum eos penitencia correxerit, rescripti in matricula gradum suum dignitatemque recipiant.

C. XXII. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin [c. 17]. If any priest or deacon is found to have sold anything from the ministries of the Church, because he has committed sacrilege it has been resolved that he not be retained in ecclesiastical order. Nevertheless, he is to be left to the judgment of the bishop as to whether he ought to be received in his grade, because many times this very matter concerning what has been contaminated from the sacrosanct altar has been left within the bishop's power.

[PALEA.

C. XXII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 17.] Si quis presbiter aut diaconus inuentus fuerit aliquid de ministeriis ecclesiae uenundasse, quia sacrilegium commisit, placuit eum in ordinatione ecclesiastica non haberi. Iudicio tamen episcopi dimittendus est, si in suo debeat recipi gradu, quia multociens hoc ipsum, quod de sacrosancto altario contaminatum est, in episcopi potestate dimissum est.

[PALEA.

C. XXIII. Likewise Augustine to Boniface.

A priest is well able to be restored to his honor after penance has been performed, although on this matter diverse persons think diverse things, saying that he cannot be restored to honor. But this was said because of the feigned penances of certain persons and because of dignities of honors deliberately sought.]

[PALEA.

> C. XXIII. Item Augustinus ad Bonifacium.
>
> Bene ualet sacerdos restitui ad honorem suum post peractam penitenciam, licet in hoc diuersi diuersa sentiant, dicentes, non posse restitui ad honorem. Sed sic dictum est propter simulatas penitencias quorundam, et propter affectatas honorum dignitates.]
> [PALEA.

C. XXIV.

Indeed, if a priest falls, he is able and has a place of restoration to his honor after worthy penance has been performed, as the Prophet bears witness, who says: "Will not one who falls add that he may rise?" And blessed Gregory says this to Secundinus the recluse, his friend: We have an argument for this even from the Prophet himself, who, although after committing adultery he perpetrated homicide, nevertheless afterward, when worthy penance had been performed, was restored by God's grace to his former office.] Part III. GRATIAN. Let us therefore consider briefly how the dissonance of authorities of this kind may be recalled to concord. There are some whom not hatred of the crime, but fear of lowliness, loss of their own grade, and ambition for a higher one compel to penance. The sacred canons cast these persons down irrecoverably, because one who seeks pardon by a simulation of penance or desire for honor does not obtain it from God, nor does he merit restoration from the Church. Hence Augustine writes to Boniface [epistle L]:

> C. XXIV.
> Sacerdos quidem si cadit, ualet, et habet restitutionis locum post dignam peractam penitenciam in honorem suum, Propheta attestante, qui ait: "Numquid qui cadit non adiciet, ut resurgat?" Et B. Gregorius hoc dicit ad Secundinum inclusum, amicum suum: Etiam ab ipso Propheta in hoc argumentum habemus, qui, cum post peractum adulterium et homicidium perpetrauit, tamen postea peracta digna penitencia per Dei gratiam ad pristinum offitium restituitur.] III. Pars. Gratian. Quomodo igitur huiusmodi auctoritatum dissonantia ad concordiam reuocari ualeat, breuiter inspiciamus. Sunt quidam, quos non odium criminis, sed timor uilitatis, amissio proprii gradus et ambitio celsioris ad penitenciam cogit. Hos sacri canones irrecuperabiliter deiciunt, quia qui simulatione penitenciae uel affectione honoris adeo non consequitur ueniam, nec ab ecclesia meretur reparationem. Unde Augustinus scribit ad Bonifacium: [epist. L.]

C. XXV. Why it was established in the Church that after penance someone should not return to clerical status.

That it should be established in the Church that no one, after penance for some crime, should receive clerical status, return to clerical status, or remain in clerical status, was done not from despair of indulgence but from the rigor of discipline. Otherwise one will argue against the keys given to the Church, concerning which it was said: "Whatever you loose on earth shall be loosed also in heaven." But lest perhaps a spirit swollen with hope of ecclesiastical honor should perform penance proudly even for other crimes, it was most severely resolved that, after penance performed for a damnable crime, no one should be a cleric, so that through despair of temporal elevation the medicine of humility might be greater and truer. For holy David performed penance for deadly crimes and nevertheless persisted in his honor; and blessed Peter, when he poured out most bitter tears, certainly repented of having denied the Lord, and nevertheless remained an apostle. But the diligence of those who came later is not therefore to be thought superfluous: where nothing was subtracted from salvation, they added something to humility, by which salvation might be more safely fortified, having experienced, I believe, the feigned penances of certain persons through their deliberate pursuit of the powers of honors. For experiences of many diseases compel the discovery of many medicines. Yet in causes of this kind, where through grave ruptures of dissensions there lies not the danger of this or that man, but the slaughter of peoples, something must be subtracted from severity, so that sincere charity may come to the aid of curing greater evils.

> Ut constitueretur in ecclesia, ne quisquam post alicuius criminis penitenciam clericatum accipiat, uel ad clericatum redeat, uel in clericatu maneat, non desperatione indulgentiae, sed rigore factum est disciplinae. Alioquin contra claues datas ecclesiae disputabitur, de quibus dictum est: "Quecumque solueritis in terra, soluta erunt et in celo." Sed ne forte etiam de ceteris criminibus spe honoris ecclesiastici animus intumescens superbe ageret penitenciam, seuerissime placuit, ut post actam de crimine dampnabili penitenciam nemo sit clericus, ut desperatione temporalis altitudinis medicina maior et uerior esset humilitatis. Nam et S. Dauid de criminibus mortiferis egit penitenciam, et tamen in honore suo perstitit, et B. Petrum, quando amarissimas lacrimas fudit, utique Dominum negasse penituit, et tamen apostolus mansit. Sed non ideo putanda est superuacua posteriorum diligentia, qui ubi saluti nichil detrahebatur, humilitati aliquid addiderunt, quo salus tucius muniretur, experti, credo, aliquorum fictas penitencias per affectatas honorum potentias. Cogunt enim multas inuenire medicinas multorum experimenta morborum. Verum in huiusmodi causis, ubi per graues dissensionum scissuras non huius aut illius hominis periculum, sed populorum strages iacent, detrahendum est aliquid seueritati, ut maioribus malis sanandis karitas sincera subueniat.

C. XXVI. The benefit of restoration ought not to be granted except after penance.

Likewise from the epistle of the Roman Clergy sent to Pope Cyprian. Far be it from the Roman Church to abandon its vigor with so profane a facility and dissolve the sinews of severity after the majesty of the faith has been overturned, so that, while the ruins of the overthrown brethren still not only lie but even fall, remedies of communion, assuredly destined to be of no profit, should be furnished with excessive haste. For where will the medicine of penance be able to proceed, if even the physician himself, by cutting short the penance, indulges the dangers? This is not to heal but, if we wish to speak the truth, to kill.

> C. XXVI. Reparationis beneficium non nisi post penitenciam debet concedi.
> Item ex epistola Cleri Romani missa Papae Cipriano. Absit a Romana ecclesia uigorem suum tam profana facilitate dimittere, et neruos seueritatis euersa fidei maiestate dissoluere, ut, cum adhuc non tantum iaceant, sed etiam cadant euersorum fratrum ruinae, properata nimis remedia communicationum utique non profutura prestentur. Ubi enim poterit penitenciae medicina procedere, si etiam ipse medicus intercepta penitencia indulget periculis? Hoc non est curare, sed (si dicere uerum uolumus) occidere.

C. XXVII. Pardon cannot be granted to the impenitent.

Likewise Cyprian, On the Lapsed. If anyone with rash and disorderly haste thinks that he can give remission of sins to all, or dares to annul the precepts of the Lord, he not only profits the lapsed nothing but harms them. It is to have provoked wrath, not to have kept the sentence; not to entreat the mercy of the most pious Lord, but, with the Lord despised, to presume upon one's own facility. And below: §1. The martyrs command that certain things be done; if they are just, if lawful, if not contrary to the Lord himself and to God's priest, they are to be done; if the confession of the one obeying is ready and prompt, if the moderation of the penitent is religious. The martyrs command that certain things be done; but if what they command is not written in the law of the Lord, it comes first that we know that they have obtained from God the things they ask, and then that we do what they command. For what was promised by a human promise cannot immediately be seen to have been granted by the divine majesty. For Moses also petitioned for the sins of the people, and nevertheless, when he petitioned, he did not obtain pardon for the sinners.

> C. XXVII. Inpenitentibus uenia concedi non potest.
> Item Ciprianus de lapsis. Si quis prepostera festinatione temerarius remissionem peccatorum cunctis putat dare se posse, aut audet Domini precepta rescindere, non tantum nichil prodest, sed obest lapsis. Prouocasse est iram, non seruasse sententiam, nec misericordiam piissimi Domini deprecari, sed contempto Domino de sua facilitate presumere. Et infra: §. 1. Mandant martires aliqua fieri, si iusta, si licita, si non contra ipsum Dominum ac Dei sacerdotem sunt facienda; si obtemperantis facilis et prona confessio, si penitentis fuerit religiosa moderatio. Mandant martires aliqua fieri; sed si scripta non sunt in Domini lege, que mandant, ante est, ut sciamus illos de Deo inpetrasse que postulant, tunc facere quod mandant. Neque enim statim uideri potest de diuina maiestate concessum, quod fuerit humana pollicitatione promissum. Nam et Moyses pro peccatis populi petiit, nec tamen peccantibus ueniam, cum petisset, accepit.

C. XXVIII. Who are to be restored after a lapse, and who are not.

Likewise Isidore to Bishop Massanus. Isidore the Bishop to the lord holy and blessed in merits, brother Massanus the bishop. Concerning what your venerable fraternity made known in its letters—namely, that in canon XIX of Ancyra it is read that after a bodily lapse the grade of honor is to be restored after penance, but elsewhere it is read that after an offense of this kind the merit of the ancient order is by no means to be restored—this diversity is resolved in this manner. For the canons command those to return to their former grades whom the satisfaction of penance or a worthy confession of sins has preceded. By contrast, those who are neither corrected from the vice of corruption and who strive with a certain superstitious rashness to vindicate that very carnal offense which they commit receive neither the grade of honor nor the grace of communion. Therefore the sentence is to be determined in such a way that it is necessary for those to be restored to the place of honor who through penance merit the reconciliation of divine piety. Those who through the correction of penance are known to have received the remedy of life not undeservedly obtain the state of the dignity they had acquired. But lest this perhaps be more ambiguous, the sentence is confirmed by divine authority. The prophet Ezekiel, under the figure of transgressing Jerusalem, shows that after the satisfaction of penance the former honor is restored: "Be confounded," he says, "O Judah, and bear your ignominy." And a little later: "And you," he says, "and your daughters, return to your antiquity." §1. When he said "be confounded," he showed that after the work of sin each person ought to blush and, after confession for the crimes admitted, sink a shamefaced brow prostrate to the ground, because he perpetrated a work worthy of confusion. Then he commanded that after ignominy —that is, the casting down of his name or dignity—he return to his antiquity. Therefore, while each person after the work of his confusion is confounded and, bearing ignominy, mourns his deposition with humility, he will be able, according to the Prophet, to be recalled to his prior state. Likewise John the Evangelist, among certain other things, writes similar words to the Angel of the church of Ephesus: "Remember whence you have fallen, and perform penance, and do your first works; otherwise I shall come to you and move your lampstand from its place." §2. Behold, insofar as I was able, I have explained through sacred testimonies the plainly ancient sentence of the Council of Ancyra, full of authority, showing that one can be restored in his own order who knows how to bewail his own offenses through the satisfaction of penance. But know that one who neither mourns the things he has done but commits things to be mourned without any shame of religion or fear of divine judgment can in no manner be restored to his former grade. §3. At the end of this epistle, moreover, I thought this should be added: whenever a discordant sentence is found in the acts of councils, the sentence of that council whose authority stands as more ancient and more powerful should rather be held. GRATIAN. Therefore, whoever has worthily offered penance to God for his crimes can, by the authority of Gregory, Jerome, Augustine, and Isidore, receive the grade of his former dignity. But those who offer false penances to God not from hatred of the crime but from fear of lowliness or ambition for honor will in no way be able to be restored to the grade of former honor. But that statement of Pope Hormisdas is objected, who writes to all the Bishops throughout the provinces:

> Item Ysidorus ad Massanum Episcopum. Domino sancto meritisque beato fratri Massano episcopo Ysidorus Episcopus. Quod in epistolis uenerabilis fraternitas tua innotuit, uidelicet quod in canone Anquiritano c. XIX. legitur, post lapsum corporalem restaurandum honoris gradum post penitenciam, alibi uero legitur, post huiusmodi delictum nequaquam reparandum antiqui ordinis meritum: hec diuersitas hoc modo soluitur. Illos enim ad pristinos gradus redire canones precipiunt, quos penitenciae precessit satisfactio uel condigna peccatorum confessio. At contra hi, qui neque a uicio corruptionis emendantur, atque hoc ipsum carnale delictum, quod admittunt, uendicare quadam supersticiosa temeritate nituntur, nec gradum utique honoris, nec gratiam recipiunt communionis. Ergo ita est determinanda sentencia, ut necesse sit illos restaurari in loco honoris, qui per penitenciam reconciliationem merentur diuinae pietatis. Hi non inmerito consequuntur adeptae dignitatis statum, qui per emendationem penitenciae recepisse noscuntur remedium uitae. Id autem, ne forte magis sit ambiguum, diuinae auctoritatis sentencia confirmatur. Ezechiel quidem propheta sub tipo preuaricatricis Ierusalem ostendit, post penitenciae satisfactionem pristinum restaurari honorem: "Confundere," inquit, "o Iuda, et porta ignominiam tuam." Et post Paululum: "Et tu," inquit, "et filiae tuae reuertimini ad antiquitatem tuam". §. 1. Quod dixit, "confundere," ostendit, post opus peccati debere quemquam erubescere, et post confessionem pro admissis sceleribus uerecundam frontem humo prostratam demergere, pro eo quod dignum confusione perpetrauit opus. Deinde precepit, ut post ignominiam id est deiectionem sui nominis siue dignitatis reuertatur ad suam antiquitatem. Ergo dum quisque post opus confusionis suae confunditur, atque ignominiam portans depositionem suam cum humilitate luget, reuocari secundum Prophetam ad priorem poterit statum. Item Iohannes euangelista Angelo Ephesi ecclesiae inter cetera quedam similia scribit: "Memor esto unde cecideris, et age penitenciam, et prima opera fac; alioquin ueniam tibi, et mouebo candelabrum tuum de loco suo". §. 2. Ecce in quantum ualui concilii Anquiritani antiquam plane et plenam auctoritate sentenciam sacris testimoniis explanaui, ostendens, eum posse restaurari in proprio ordine, qui per penitenciae satisfactionem nouit propria delicta deflere. Qui uero nec luget que gessit, sed lugenda sine ullo pudore religionis uel timore diuini iudicii committit, nullo modo eum posse ad pristinum gradum restaurari cognoscas. §. 3. In fine autem huius epistolae hoc adiciendum putaui, ut quotiescumque in gestis conciliorum discors sentencia inuenitur, illius concilii magis teneatur sentencia, cuius antiquior et potior extat auctoritas. Gratian. Quicumque igitur pro criminibus suis digne Deo penitenciam obtulerint, auctoritate Gregorii et Ieronimi et Augustini et Ysidori gradum pristinae dignitatis recipere possunt. Qui autem non odio criminis, sed timore uilitatis uel ambitione honoris falsas Deo penitencias offerunt, in pristini honoris gradum reparari minime poterunt. Sed obicitur illud Hormisdae Papae, qui scribit omnibus Episcopis per uniuersas prouincias:

C. XXIX. A deacon or priest found in adultery cannot be restored.

If any deacon or priest, after receiving the Levitical blessing, is found incontinent with his wife, let him be cast from his office. §1. Behold, it is manifestly established that, according to the rubrics of the ancient Fathers composed at the prompting of the Holy Spirit, and according to the sentences of the 318 bishops—which the Gallican canons also seem to contain—clerics found in adultery, whether themselves confessed or convicted by others, cannot return to honor. Because perhaps there are some to whom, from excessive piety, the severity of the holy Fathers written above is not pleasing, let them know that they reprove or condemn the sentences of the 318 bishops who also established the other canons. But perhaps there is greater piety in them than in the aforesaid 318 bishops? Is there greater mercy in them than in holy Pope John? Greater charity than in the other holy priests who, by their determinations, considered remedies for the churches according to this example? And therefore let them either consent with ready will to their precepts or know that they are contrary and hostile to them all. What is this goodness hostile to justice—to caress criminals and keep their wounds unhealed until the day of judgment? §2. But if we saw them perform the most rigorous penance through many years, then we could both take counsel for their salvation and ought to temper the statutes of the canons. But when in some there appears neither compunction of humility nor persistence in prayer, nor do they imitate blessed David, who says: "I shall wash my bed each night; with my tears I shall water my couch"; and that: "I ate ashes like bread and mingled my drink with weeping"; nor do we see them devote themselves to fasts or readings, we can recognize with how great a negligence, with how great a torpor and security hostile to their own soul they would remain if they returned to their former grades or honors, believing that God has forgiven them without worthy penance having been performed, just as the priests seem to have indulged them. Truly I say that those very persons whom we seem to indulge with dangerous and false mercy, when they come before the tribunal of Christ to be condemned for such great sins, will plead their case against us, saying that, while we either feared the harshness of their tongue or willingly accepted their false blandishments and dangerous flatteries, we unprofitably permitted them to remain in the same sins or allowed them to increase the sins themselves, not remembering what is written in the Old Testament: that when one person sinned, God's wrath raged against all.

C. XXIX. Diaconus aut presbiter in adulterio deprehensi reparari non possunt.

Si quis diaconus aut presbiter post acceptam benedictionem Leuiticam cum uxore sua incontinens inuenitur, ab offitio suo abiciatur. §. 1. Ecce manifeste constat, quia secundum titulos antiquorum Patrum sancto Spiritu suggerente conscriptos, et secundum sentencias CCCXVIII. episcoporum, (quas etiam Gallicani canones continere uidentur), clerici in adulterio deprehensi, aut ipsi confessi, aut ab aliis conuicti, ad honorem redire non possunt. Quia forte non desunt, quibus pro nimia pietate suprascripta sanctorum Patrum seueritas minime placeat, sciant, se CCCXVIII. episcoporum, qui et reliquos canones statuerunt, sentencias reprehendere uel dampnare. Sed forte maior est in illis pietas, quam in supradictis CCCXVIII. episcopis? maior est in illis misericordia, quam in S. Iohanne Papa? maior karitas, quam in reliquis sanctis sacerdotibus, qui hoc exemplo remedia ecclesiarum suis diffinicionibus deliberauerunt? Et ideo aut prona uoluntate preceptis illorum consentiant, aut omnibus illis contrarios se et inimicos esse cognoscant. Que est ista iusticiae inimica bonitas, palpare criminosos, et uulnera eorum usque ad diem iudicii incurata seruare? §. 2. Quod si eos durissimam penitenciam per plures annos uideremus agere, tunc nos et saluti eorum possemus consulere, et statuta canonum deberemus temperare. Cum uero in aliquibus nec compunctio humilitatis, nec instancia orandi apareat, nec beatum Dauid imitentur, qui dicit: "Lauabo per singulas noctes lectum meum; lacrimis meis stratum meum rigabo;" et illud: "Cinerem tamquam panem manducabam et potum meum cum fletu miscebam;" nec eos ieiuniis uel lectionibus uacare uideamus, possumus agnoscere, si ad pristinos gradus uel honores redirent, cum quanta negligentia et cum quanto torpore et inimica suae animae securitate permanerent, credentes, quod sic eis non acta digna penitencia dimiserit Deus, quomodo sacerdotes indulsisse uidentur. Vere dico, quia illi ipsi, quibus cum periculosa et falsa misericordia indulgere uidemur, cum ante tribunal Christi pro tantis peccatis dampnandi aduenerint, contra nos causam dicturi sunt, dicentes, quod dum aut asperitatem linguae eorum expauimus, aut falsa blandimenta et periculosas adulationes ipsorum libenter accepimus, in eisdem peccatis permanere eis inutiliter indulgemus, aut ipsa peccata augere permittimus, non recordantes illud, quod in ueteri testamento scriptum est: quia uno peccante contra omnes ira Dei deseuit.

C. XXX. It is difficult to return to one's former grade after a lapse.

Likewise Jerome. Whoever does not guard the dignity of the divine grade, let him be content to save his soul. For it is difficult to return to the former grade.

C. XXX. Difficile est post lapsum ad pristinum gradum redire.

Item Ieronimus. Quicumque dignitatem diuini gradus non custodiunt, contenti fiant animam saluare. Reuerti enim in pristinum gradum difficile est.

C. XXXI. One who has fallen, after penance, shall minister only at the altar.

Likewise Basil. One who has fallen while holding a grade, after penance, let him be content to baptize, give communion to the sick, and minister only at the altar.

C. XXXI. Lapsus post penitenciam altario tantummodo ministret.

Item Basilius. Qui sub gradu ceciderit post penitenciam, contentus fiat baptizare, communionem infirmis dare, et altario ministrare tantummodo.

C. XXXII. Concerning priests, deacons, and laypersons who offer incense to idols.

Likewise from the Council of Ancyra [c. 1 and following]. Concerning priests who sacrificed and afterward entered the contest again, if they struggled from faith and did not do this by arrangement, for show, so that they might be presented, it was resolved that they should indeed retain the honor of their proper seat, but that it is not permitted to them to offer, to deliver a discourse to the people, or to perform any priestly offices. §1. Likewise deacons who sacrificed but afterward again resisted ought indeed otherwise to have honor, but they ought to cease from every sacred ministry, so that they neither offer bread nor the cup nor make proclamation, unless perhaps some of the bishops, conscious of their labor, humility, and gentleness, should wish to grant or apply something more to them. The power concerning these matters, therefore, will rest with them. §2. But those who, while fleeing, were seized or betrayed by members of their households, or who, after their property was taken away, sustained torments, or who, having been thrust into custody, proclaimed themselves to be Christians, and who were bound to such a point that, seizing their hands, men violently dragged them and applied them to deadly sacrifices, so that they were compelled by necessity to consume some of the polluted food, while they confessed in all abasement, garb, and humility of life—these, as persons situated outside an offense, we decree are not to be prohibited from the grace of communion. §3. But if they have been prohibited by some persons because of greater caution or because of the ignorance of certain persons, let them be received immediately. §4. It is fitting that this likewise be observed concerning clerics and the other laypersons. §5. That question also was investigated, whether laypersons who fell into these straits of necessity can also be promoted to the order of clerical status. It was therefore resolved that these also, as persons who sinned in nothing, should be advanced to this office if their preceding life has approved them. §6. But concerning those who denied without necessity, without loss of property, without danger, or anything of this kind—which happened under the tyranny of Licinius—it was resolved by the synod that, although they are proved unworthy of humane treatment, benevolence should nevertheless be extended to them. GRATIAN. But that statement of Pope Hormisdas prohibits the idle and negligent, not those truly penitent, from being restored. §1. Jerome's statement, moreover, confesses that this is difficult, not impossible. §2. Basil, however, shows that the rigor of justice is to be observed toward delinquents, which others affirm is mercifully to be relaxed toward penitents. §3. The foregoing authorities can also be distinguished in another way. Those whose crimes are manifest before or after ordination are to be cast down from sacred orders; but those whose sins are hidden and have been purged by secret satisfaction according to the decree of a priest can remain in their own orders. Hence Pope Nicholas to Archbishop Charles and his suffragans:

> Item ex Concilio Ancirano. [c. 1. et seqq.] Presbiteros, qui immolauerunt, et postea certamen iterum inierunt, si ex fide luctati sunt, et non ex compacto ad ostentacionem ut offerrentur ipsi fecerunt, hos placuit honorem quidem sedis propriae retinere, offerre autem illis et sermonem ad populum facere, aut aliquibus sacerdotalibus offitiis fungi non liceat. §. 1. Diacones similiter, qui immolauerunt, postea uero iterum reluctati sunt, alias quidem honorem habere oportet; cessare autem debent ab omni sacro ministerio, ita ut nec panem, nec calicem offerant, nec pronuncient, nisi forte aliqui episcoporum conscii laboris eorum et humilitatis et mansuetudinis, uoluerint eis aliquid amplius tribuere uel adhibere. Penes ipsos ergo de his erit potestas. §. 2. Qui autem fugientes comprehensi sunt, uel a domesticis traditi, uel ademptis facultatibus sustinuere tormenta, aut in custodia trusi proclamauerunt se Christianos esse, et eousque astricti sunt, ut manus eorum comprehendentes uiolenter adtraherent et funestis sacrificiis admouerent, ut aliquid polluti cibi per necessitatem sumere cogerentur, in omni deiectione et habitu et humilitate uitae confitentes, hos uelud extra delictum constitutos a communionis gratia non prohiberi decernimus. §. 3. Si uero prohibiti sunt ab aliquibus propter ampliorem cautelam, uel propter quorundam ignorantiam, statim, recipiantur. §. 4. Hoc autem similiter et de clericis et de laicis ceteris obseruare conuenit. §. 5. Perquisitum est autem et illud, si possunt etiam laici, qui in has necessitatis angustias inciderunt ad clericatus ordinem promoueri. Placuit ergo et hos tamquam qui nichil peccauerint, si precedens eorum uita probauerit, ad hoc offitium prouehi. §. 6. De his autem, qui negauerunt preter necessitatem, aut preter ablationem facultatum, aut preter periculum, uel aliquid huiuscemodi (quod factum est sub tirannide Licinii), placuit sinodo, quamuis humanitate probentur indigni, tamen eis beneuolentiam commodari. Gratian. Sed illud Hormisdae Papae desidiosos et negligentes, non uere penitentes reparari prohibet. §. 1. Illud autem Ieronimi fatetur hoc esse difficile, non inpossibile. §. 2. Basilius autem circa delinquentes rigorem iusticiae seruandum ostendit, quem circa penitentes alii relaxandum misericorditer affirmant. §. 3. Possunt et aliter distingui premissae auctoritates. Quorum crimina manifesta sunt ante uel post ordinationem, a sacris ordinibus deiciendi sunt; quorum autem peccata occulta sunt et secreta satisfactione secundum sacerdotis edictum purgata, in propriis ordinibus remanere possunt. Unde Nicolaus Papa Carolo Archiepiscopo, et eius suffraganeis:

C. XXXIII. One whose crime was manifest cannot be restored as a priest.

If priests have fallen into the snare of fornication and the act of the crime was manifest or demonstrated, they cannot possess the honor of the priesthood according to the authority of canonical institution. Likewise Archbishop Rabanus writes to Heribald:

C. XXXIII. Non potest restitui in sacerdotem, cuius fuerit manifestum crimen.

Sacerdotes, si in fornicationis laqueum ceciderint, et criminis manifestus siue ostensus fuerit actus, sacerdocii non possunt habere honorem secundum canonicae institucionis auctoritatem. Item Rabanus Archiepiscopus scribit ad Heribaldum:

C. XXXIV. Who are to be restored after a lapse, and who are not.

Concerning those, moreover, who hold sacred orders and profess themselves to have been contaminated by capital crimes before or after ordination, it has seemed to us that this should be written. Among them, as it seems to me, this distinction ought to exist: those who have been publicly detected or caught in perjury, theft, fornication, and other crimes of this kind shall fall from their own grade according to the institutes of the sacred canons, because it is a scandal to the people of God to have such persons set over them as are established to be vicious beyond measure. Indeed, from this people disparage the sacrifice of God (just as they are read once to have done when the sons of Eli were sinning, and, becoming rebellious and contrary from this, they daily become worse through their depraved examples. But those who, through hidden confession before the angels of God, with the priest also present who is to enjoin penance upon them, confess the aforesaid sins secretly committed by themselves and lament that they have gravely offended—if they strive to purify themselves through fasts, alms, vigils, and sacred prayers, hope of pardon from God's mercy is to be promised to these even with their grade preserved. Part IV. GRATIAN. Concerning those who have fallen into heresy also, this is to be observed: before the sentence of a council no one is to communicate with them. Hence Pope Cyprian to Antonianus, among other things [Book IV, epistle 2]:

C. XXXIV. Qui sint reparandi post lapsum, uel qui non.

De his uero uisum nobis est scribendum esse, qui sacros ordines habent et ante uel post ordinationem contaminatos in capitalibus criminibus se esse profitentur. In quibus, ut mihi uidetur, hec distancia esse debet, ut hi, qui deprehensi uel capti fuerint publice in periurio, furto atque fornicatione et ceteris huiusmodi criminibus, secundum sacrorum canonum instituta a proprio gradu decidant, quia scandalum est populo Dei tales personas superpositas habere, quas ultra modum uitiosas esse constat.

Nempe inde detrahunt homines sacrificio Dei (sicut quondam, filiis Hely peccantibus fecisse leguntur, et rebelles hinc atque contrarii existentes eorum prauis exemplis cotidie peiores fiunt. Qui autem de predictis peccatis absconse a se admissis per occultam confessionem coram angelis Dei, presente etiam sacerdote, qui eis indicturus est penitenciam, confitentur, et semetipsos grauiter deliquisse queruntur, si se per ieiunia et elemosinas uigiliasque et sacras orationes purgare certauerint, his etiam gradu seruato spes ueniae de misericordia Dei promittenda est. IV. Pars. Gratian. De lapsis etiam in heresim hoc obseruandum est, ut ante sentenciam concilii nullus eis communicet. Unde Ciprianus Papa Antoniano inter cetera: [lib. IV. epist. 2.]

C. XXXV. Let one who communicates with the lapsed before restoration abstain from communion.

Concerning what should be established about the cause of the lapsed, however, I deferred, so that when quiet and tranquility had been given and divine indulgence permitted the bishops to come together as one, then, after counsel had been shared and weighed through the deliberation of all, I might establish what ought to be done. But if anyone before our counsel and before a sentence established by the counsel of all should rashly wish to communicate with the lapsed, let him abstain from communion. Part V. GRATIAN. But what is read above as established concerning homicides is to be understood when the opportunity of escaping is given and they are not enclosed by the necessity of a siege. Otherwise, when constrained by necessity they cannot escape, if they then commit homicide, after being purified through penance they will be restored both to office and to communion.

Hence in the Council of Lérida [c. 1] it is read:

C. XXXV. A communione abstineat, qui lapsis ante restitutionem communicat.

De eo tamen, quod statuendum esset circa causam lapsorum, distuli, ut cum quies et tranquillitas data esset, et episcopos in unum conuenire indulgentia diuina permitteret, tunc communicato et librato de omnium collatione consilio statuerem quid fieri oporteret. Si quis uero ante consilium nostrum et ante sentenciam de omnium consilio statutam temere lapsis communicare uoluisset, ipse a communione abstineret. V. Pars. Gratian. Quod uero supra de homicidiis statutum legitur, intelligendum est, quando facultas datur effugiendi, nec necessitate clauduntur obsidionis. Ceterum, cum necessitate angustati effugere non possunt, si tunc homicidium admiserint, purgati per penitenciam et offitio, et communioni reddentur.

Unde in Ilerdensi Concilio [cap. 1.] legitur:

C. XXXVI. Clerics placed under siege who shed blood from necessity shall, after two years' penance, be restored to office and communion.

Concerning those clerics who have been placed under siege through necessity, this has been established: those who minister at the altar and deliver the body and blood of Christ, or handle vessels appointed to sacred office, are to abstain from all human blood, even that of an enemy. But if they have fallen into this, let them be deprived of both office and communion of the Lord's body for two years, so that for two years they may expiate themselves by vigils, fasts, prayers, and alms according to the strength that the Lord has given; and only then shall they be restored to office or communion, yet with the provision that they not thereafter be promoted to more powerful offices. But if during the defined time they have been more negligent concerning their salvation, let the power to prolong the time of that penance remain with the priest. GRATIAN. If a cleric has committed homicide by accident, moreover, by dispensation he is permitted to remain in his own grade. Hence Urban II writes to Warner, Bishop of Merseburg:

C. XXXVI. Clerici in obsidionibus positi necessitate si sanguinem fuderunt, post duorum annorum penitenciam offitio et communioni restituantur.

De his clericis, qui in obsessionibus positi necessitate fuerint, id statutum est, ut qui altario ministrant et Christi corpus et sanguinem tradunt, uel uasa sacro offitio deputata contrectant, ut ab omni humano sanguine etiam hostili se abstineant. Quod si in hoc inciderint, tam offitio quam communione corporis Domini duobus annis priuentur, ita ut duobus annis uigiliis, ieiuniis, orationibus et elemosinis pro uiribus, quas Dominus donauerit, expientur; et ita demum offitio uel communioni reddantur, ea tamen ratione, ne ulterius ad offitia potiora promoueantur. Quod si in diffinito tempore negligentiores circa salutem suam extiterint, protelandi ipsius penitenciae tempus in potestate maneat sacerdotis. Gratian. Casu quoque si clericus homicidium fecerit, in proprio gradu ex dispensatione remanere permittitur. Unde Urbanus II. scribit Guarnerio Merseburgensi Episcopo:

C. XXXVII. One who commits homicide by accident shall by dispensation remain in his order.

A boy is said to have been killed when a cleric threw a stone. For love of you we permit him to remain in his order, provided that he always remain in penance and fear.

C. XXXVII. Qui casu homicidium facit, ex dispensatione in suo ordine permaneat.

Clerico iaciente lapidem puer interemptus dicitur. Nos pro amore tuo in suo ordine eum permanere permittimus, ut tamen semper in penitencia et timore permaneat.

C. XXXVIII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Stephen V to Sichibert, Bishop of Corsica. Because you judge yourself, as it were, liable in that, having been captured by the Saracens, you seem to have killed men, you do well. But since you are known not to have done it of your own accord, you are by no means judged canonically on that account. GRATIAN. But if, moved by anger, a priest has killed someone, even if he did not have the intention of killing, he will nevertheless be perpetually deposed. Hence Pope Nicholas writes to Osbald, the Quadrantine chorepiscopus:

C. XXXVIII. De eodem.

Item Stephanus V. Sichiberto Corsicae Episcopo. Quia te quasi obnoxium iudicas, eo quod a Sarracenis captus homines interfecisse uideris, bene facis. Sed quoniam non tua sponte id fecisse cognosceris inde canonice nullo modo iudicaris. Gratian. Si uero ira conmotus aliquem presbiter interfecerit, etsi animum occidendi non habuerit, perpetuo tamen depositus erit. Unde Nicolaus Papa scribit Osbaldo Corepiscopo Quadrantino:

C. XXXIX. A priest who, moved by anger, has killed someone, although without intention, shall perpetually lack office.

Let your Holiness endeavor to persuade your bishop to associate with himself the canonical number of colleagues—that is, six brothers and fellow bishops from neighboring provinces. When they are joined with you and deciding, take care diligently to investigate and scrutinize with every exertion, so that you may be able to discover whether that deacon, as is reported, died from the blow of the priest already named or from the breaking of his neck. And if indeed he was not struck to death by the aforesaid priest, but died after falling from a horse and breaking his neck, according to your judgment enjoin suitable penance upon the priest for having acted incautiously by striking him, and let him be suspended for some time from the solemnities of Mass, thereafter to return again to priestly office. But if that deacon truly died from any blow whatsoever by the priest, we decree that he minister in no way according to the custom of a priest, because, even if he did not have the will to kill, nevertheless the fury and indignation from which that deadly movement issued are in every person, and especially in God's ministers, prohibited and condemned in many ways. But if perhaps the priest should manifestly prove liable through your inquiry, we command that such a benefice from his church be granted to him that both he and his household may be able to have sufficient aid for their sustenance.

Clericus et laicus VII. annis peniteat, tres ex his in pane et aqua, et ad gradum cuiuslibet sacerdocii accedere non presumat.]

C. XLII. Those who commit homicide by accident shall abstain from communion for five years.

Likewise from the Council of Neocaesarea. As for those who committed homicide not by will but by accident, the former rule indeed joined them to communion only after seven years' penance according to the established grades; but this humane determination allots a period of five years.

C. XLII. Quinquennio a communione abstineant, qui casu homicidium faciunt.

Item ex Concilio Neocesariensi. Eos uero, qui non uoluntate, sed casu homicidium fecerint, prior quidem regula post septem tantum annorum penitenciam communioni sociauit secundum gradus constitutos; hec uero humana diffinicio quinquennii tempus tribuit.

C. XLIII. For what periods one who has killed her maidservant by will or accident shall abstain from communion.

Likewise from the Council of Elvira [c. 4]. If a woman, inflamed by the fury of jealousy, has beaten her maidservant with whips so that within the third day she emits her soul with torment, because it is uncertain whether she killed her by will or accident, it was resolved that, after lawful penance has been performed, she be admitted to communion after seven years if by will, and after a period of five years if by accident. But if she becomes ill within the established periods, let her receive communion.

C. XLIII. Quibus temporum spaciis a communione abstineat que uoluntate uel casu ancillam suam interfecerit.

Item ex Concilio Eliberitano. [c. 4.] Si qua femina furore zeli accensa flagellis uerberauerit ancillam suam, ita ut infra tertium diem animam cum cruciatu emittat, eo quod incertum sit, uoluntate, an casu occiderit: si uoluntate, post septem annos, si casu, post quinque annorum tempora (acta legitima penitencia) ad communionem placuit admitti. Quod si infra tempora constituta fuerit infirmata, accipiat communionem.

C. XLIV. Concerning those who commit homicide deliberately or by accident.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin. If anyone has committed homicide voluntarily, let him always lie at the door of the catholic church and receive communion at the departure of his life. But if he committed any homicide not by will but by accident, the earlier canon ordered him to perform penance for seven years; the second canon commanded five.

C. XLIV. De his, qui sponte homicidium uel casu faciunt

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. Si quis uoluntarie homicidium fecerit, ad ianuam ecclesiae catholicae semper iaceat, et communionem in exitu uitae suae recipiat. Si autem non uoluntate, sed casu homicidium aliquod fecerit, prior canon septem annis agere penitenciam iussit, secundus canon quinque mandauit.

[C. XLV.] Likewise in the Digest, title Concerning Thefts [law He Who a Sack].

One who stole a sack containing money is liable for theft also in the name of the sack, although he did not have the intention of stealing the sack. Conversely, that intention, not the deed, is punished is gathered in Book IX of the Code, title On the Cornelian Law Concerning Assassins [law 5], by the example of sacred letters of Diocletian and Maximian:

[C. XLV.] Item Digestis titulo de furtis. [I. Qui saccum.]

Qui saccum habentem pecuniam subripuit, furti etiam sacci nomine tenetur, quamuis non sit ei animus sacci subripiendi. Contra animum, non opus puniri, libro IX. Codicis titulo ad legem Corneliam de sicariis [l. 5.] exemplo sacrarum litterarum Diocletiani et Maximiani colligitur:

C. XLVI.

The one who asserts that he committed homicide not by will but by a fortuitous accident, since an occasion of death appears to have been furnished by the blow of a heel—if this is so and there can be no doubt concerning it—we wish, according to what is contained in our annotation, to be freed from every fear and suspicion that he sustains from the peril of the deed committed.

Hence Pope Pelagius also:

C. XLVII. Item Imperator Antoninus. [C. ad leg.

Cornel. de sicar. l. 1.] Frater uester rectius fecerit, si se presidi prouinciae obtulerit, qui, si probauerit, non occidendi animo hominem a se esse percussum, remissa homicidii pena secundum militarem disciplinam sentenciam proferet. Hinc etiam Pelagius Papa:

C. XLVIII. Concerning the same.

Insofar as this Placidus says, last year it was said concerning his wife that she was suddenly found among the horses and, while the horses were being driven, she was struck and suffered a miscarriage. If this is so, perhaps if he took another's horses, he is culpable on that account. For concerning the woman who was crushed by accident among the horses, where his will is not known to have been pernicious, he cannot and ought not to be condemned according to the laws.

> C. XLVIII. De eodem.
> Quantum dicit iste Placidus, anno preterito dictum est de uxore ipsius, quia subito inter caballos inuenta et dum traherentur caballi, collisa est illa, et abortum fecit. Nam de muliere, que casu inter caballos confracta est, ubi uoluntas illius non agnoscitur perniciosa fuisse, non potest nec debet addici per leges.

C. XLIX. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Nicholas. Those who appear to be cutting down a tree, if it should happen that the falling tree kills a person, are blameless and innocent, because the homicide was perpetrated neither by their will nor their desire. But if the death of the person who died is known to have occurred through some fault or neglect of theirs, they are to be cast from their grade and by no means received into sacred order.

> C. XLIX. De eodem.
> Item Nicolaus Papa. Hii, qui arborem incidere uidentur, si contigerit, ut cadens arbor occiderit hominem, inculpabiles sunt atque innoxii, quia nec uoluntate eorum, nec desiderio homicidium perpetratum est. Si uero aliqua eorum culpa uel neglectu morientis hominis interitus cognoscitur aduenisse, abiciendi sunt a gradu, et in sacro ordine nullatenus suscipiendi.

C. L. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Worms. It often happens that, while someone intent upon necessary work cuts down a tree, someone coming beneath it is crushed. And therefore, if it was done by the will or negligence of the one cutting the tree, he ought altogether to be subjected to the penance of a homicide. But if it happened not by his will, not by his lack of care, and finally not with his knowledge, but while he perhaps applied himself to necessary work, the other unexpectedly came beneath the tree and was crushed under it, the cutter of the tree is not held as a homicide.

> C. L. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Guarmatiensi. Sepe contingit, dum quis operi necessario insistens arborem inciderit, ut aliquis subtus ipsam ueniens deprimatur. Et iccirco, si uoluntate uel negligentia incidentis arborem factum est, ut homicida penitenciae debet omnino submitti. Quod si non uoto, non incuria illius, non denique scientia contigit, sed dum ille operi necessario fortassis incumberet, iste insperatus occurrit sub arbore et sub ipsa oppressus est, incisor arboris non tenetur pro homicida.

C. LI. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur [c. 36, but there more fully]. If two brothers have felled trees in a forest and, as one tree was about to fall, brother said to brother, "Beware," and he, fleeing, ran into the pressure of the tree and died, let the surviving brother be judged innocent of his brother's blood.

GRATIAN. By the foregoing authorities it is permitted to those who have fallen that after penance they may be restored in their own orders; but that they should ascend to a higher order after a lapse is permitted to them by no authority—indeed, it is altogether prohibited. Hence in the Council of Lérida [c. 5] it is read:

> C. LI. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. [cap. 36. Sed ibi copiosius.] Si duo fratres in silua arbores succiderint, et appropinquante casura unius arboris frater fratri dixerit, caue, et ille fugiens in pressuram arboris inciderit, et mortuus fuerit, uiuens frater innocens de sanguine germani diiudicetur. Gratian. Premissis auctoritatibus, lapsis permittitur, ut post penitenciam in suis ordinibus reparari ualeant; ad maiorem autem conscendere post lapsum nulla eis auctoritate permittitur, immo penitus prohibetur. Unde in Ilerdensi Concilio [c. 5.] legitur:

C. LII. Those who have fallen can be restored in their own orders, but cannot ascend to higher ones.

Those who serve the holy altar, if they suddenly fall through the lamentable frailty of the flesh and, with the Lord regarding them, worthily repent, so that with the body mortified they offer to God the sacrifice of a contrite heart, let it remain within the pontiff's power either not to suspend for long those who are truly afflicted, or to separate the idle from the body of the Church for a more extended time; yet in such a way that they receive again the places of their offices, but cannot thereafter be promoted to higher offices. [PALEA. §1. But if a second time, like dogs, they return to their vomit and, like swine, lie in wallows of mud, let them not only lack the dignity of office, but also not receive holy communion except at their departure.] GRATIAN. But by the example of blessed Peter—who, after he washed away the stains of his threefold denial by a confession of love, not only remained in the grade of his apostolate but even merited to be instituted by Christ as pastor of the whole Church—it is proved that after worthy penance those who have fallen not only retain their own offices but can also ascend to higher ones. That blessed Peter was instituted by the Lord as pastor of the Church after the denial is proved by the authority of blessed Gregory, who writes in a homily on the Lord's resurrection concerning that same prince of the apostles, saying:

> C. LII. Lapsi in suis ordinibus reparari possunt, sed non ad maiora conscendere.
> Hii, qui altario sancto deseruiunt, si subito flenda carnis fragilitate corruerint, et Domino respiciente digne penituerint, ita ut mortificato corpore cordis contriti sacrificium Deo offerant, maneat in potestate pontificis uel ueraciter afflictos non diu suspendere, uel desidiosos prolixiori tempore ab ecclesiae corpore segregare; ita tamen, ut sic offitiorum suorum loca recipiant, ne possint ad altiora offitia ulterius promoueri. [PALEA. §. 1. Quod si iterato uelut canes ad uomitum reuersi fuerint, et ueluti sues in uolutabris luti iacuerint, non solum dignitate offitii careant, sed etiam sanctam communionem nisi in exitu non percipiant.] Gratian. Sed exemplo B. Petri (qui postquam trinae negationis maculas confessione diluit amoris, non solum in gradu sui apostolatus remansit, uerum etiam in pastorem totius ecclesiae a Christo institui meruit,) probantur lapsi post dignam penitenciam non solum propria offitia retinere, sed etiam ad maiora posse conscendere. Quod autem B. Petrus post negationem pastor ecclesiae a Domino sit institutus, probatur auctoritate B. Gregorii, qui in omelia dominicae resurrectionis de eodem principe apostolorum scribit, dicens:

C. LIII. Peter, after the fault of denial, was instituted by the Lord as prince of the apostles.

We must consider why almighty God permitted the one whom he had resolved to set over the whole Church to fear the voice of a maidservant and deny him. We know that this was assuredly done by a dispensation of great piety, so that one who was to be pastor of the Church might learn in his own fault how he ought to have mercy on others. Therefore he first showed him to himself, and then set him over the others, so that from his own weakness he might know how mercifully he should tolerate the weaknesses of others.

> C. LIII. Petrus post culpam negationis princeps apostolorum a Domino est institutus.
> Considerandum est nobis, cur omnipotens Deus eum, quem cunctae ecclesiae preferre disposuerat, ancillae uocem pertimescere et se ipsum negare permisit. Quod nimirum magnae actum pietatis dispensatione cognoscimus, ut is, qui futurus erat pastor ecclesiae, in sua culpa disceret, qualiter aliis misereri debuisset. Prius itaque eum ostendit sibi, et tunc preposuit ceteris, ut ex sua infirmitate cognosceret, quam misericorditer aliena infirma tolleraret.

C. LIV. After his denial Peter advanced in faith and grade.

Likewise Ambrose in homily L. Peter was made more faithful after he wept that he had lost his faith; and therefore he found greater grace than he lost. For, as a good shepherd, he received the flock to be guarded, so that he who previously had been weak for himself might become a support for all, and he who had wavered under the temptation of questioning might establish others by stability of faith. Finally, because of the solidity of his devotion he is called the rock of the churches, just as the Lord says: “You are Peter,” and the rest. For he is called rock because he first laid the foundations of faith among the nations and, like an immovable rock, holds together the structure and mass of the whole Christian work. Part VI. GRATIAN. It is likewise objected that penitents ought not to be promoted to sacred orders; therefore, after penance, those who have fallen cannot attain higher ones.

Hence in the Fourth Council of Carthage [cc. 68 and 69] it is read:

> C. LIV. Post negationem in fide et gradu Petrus profecit.
> Item Ambrosius in omelia L. Fidelior factus est Petrus, postquam fidem se perdidisse defleuit; atque ideo maiorem gratiam reperit quam amisit. Tamquam bonus enim pastor tuendum gregem accepit, ut qui sibi ante infirmus fuerat, fieret omnibus firmamentum, et qui se interrogationis temptacione nutauerat, ceteros fidei stabilitate fundaret. Denique pro soliditate deuotionis ecclesiarum petra dicitur, sicut ait Dominus: "Tu es Petrus et cetera." Petra enim dicitur, eo quod primus in nationibus fidei fundamenta posuerit, et tamquam saxum immobile totius operis Christiani compagem molemque contineat. VI. Pars. Gratian. Item obicitur, penitentes ad sacros ordines promoueri non debent: non ergo lapsi post penitenciam ad maiora pertingere possunt.
> Unde in Cartaginensi Concilio IV. [cap. 68. et 69.] legitur:

C. LV. A cleric shall not be ordained from among penitents.

One from among penitents, although he is good, shall nevertheless not be ordained a cleric. If it has been done through the ignorance of the bishop, let him be deposed from the clergy, because at the time of ordination he did not disclose that he had been a penitent. But if the bishop knowingly ordained such a person, let him too be deprived only of the power of ordaining in his episcopate. A bishop shall be subject to a similar sentence if he knowingly ordained a cleric who had a widow, or a wife repudiated by another, or a second wife.

C. LV. Non ordinetur clericus ex penitentibus.

Ex penitentibus, quamuis sit bonus, tamen clericus non ordinetur. Si per ignorantiam episcopi factum fuerit, deponatur a clero, quia se ordinationis tempore non prodidit fuisse penitentem. Si autem sciens episcopus ordinauerit talem, etiam ipse ab episcopatu suo ordinandi dumtaxat potestate priuetur. Simili sententiae subiacebit episcopus, si sciens ordinauerit clericum, qui uiduam aut repudiatam uxorem habuerit, aut secundam.

C. LVI. A bigamist, a penitent, or the husband of a widow who has intruded himself into sacred service shall remain in his order without hope of promotion.

Likewise Pope Siricius to Bishop Himerius [epistle I, c. 15]. Whoever, being a penitent, a bigamist, or the husband of a widow, has improperly and incompetently slipped into sacred service, let him understand that pardon has been relaxed to him by us on this condition: that he ought to count it as a great benefit if, with every hope of promotion taken from him, he remains with perpetual stability in the order in which he is found.

C. LVI. Bigamus, penitens, uiduae maritus, sacrae militiae se ingerens, sine spe promotionis in suo ordine permaneat.

Item Siricius Papa Himerio Episcopo. [epist. I. c. 15.] Quicumque penitens, quicumque bigamus, quicumque uiduae maritus ad sacram miliciam indebite et incompetenter irrepserit, hac sibi condicione a nobis ueniam intelligat relaxatam, ut in magno debeat computare beneficio, si adempta sibi omni spe promocionis in hoc quo inuenitur ordine perpetua stabilitate permaneat.

C. LVII. One who, oppressed by illness, received the blessing of penance through communion shall not be prohibited from the clergy.

Likewise from the Council of Girona [c. 9]. One who, oppressed by the weakness of sickness, received through communion the blessing of penance that we call viaticum and, recovering afterward, did not publicly submit his head to penance in the church, shall be admitted to the clergy if he is not held liable to prohibited vices.

C. LVII. Non prohibeatur a clero, qui pressus languore per communionem penitenciae benedictionem accepit.

Item ex Concilio Gerondensi. [c. 9.] Is uero, qui egritudinis languore depressus penitenciae benedictionem, quam uiaticum dicimus, per communionem acceperit, postmodum reconualescens caput penitenciae in ecclesia non subdiderit publice, si prohibitis uiciis non detinetur obnoxius, admittatur ad clerum.

C. LVIII. One who is enclosed in a monastery to perform penance shall not be ordained a priest.

Likewise Pope Hormisdas to all the Bishops throughout the provinces. If one who voluntarily seeks penance, although he performs it perfectly, cannot be ordained bishop or priest, so that even if he was ordained through ignorance and afterward is convicted of having received penance, he is cast down, by what conscience is one who is sent unwillingly into a monastery to perform penance—who surely is to be called nothing other than a penitent—permitted to attain the priesthood? Let no one set before me any other enactments whatsoever against the authority of the Apostolic See, of the 318 bishops, or of the remaining canons, because I do not doubt that it is not only rash but also dangerous to receive whatever has been said against their determination, in which we believe the Holy Spirit spoke.

C. LVIII. Qui ad penitenciam agendam in monasterio recluditur, presbiter non ordinetur.

Item Hormisda Papa omnibus Episcopis per uniuersas prouincias. Si ille, qui ultro petit penitenciam, quamuis eam perfecte agat, non potest episcopus aut presbiter ordinari, ita ut, etiamsi per ignoranciam ordinatus fuerit et postea conuincitur penitenciam accepisse, deiciatur: ille, qui inuitus ad penitenciam agendam mittitur in monasterio, (qui utique nichil aliud, quam penitens dicendus est), qua consciencia ad sacerdocium peruenire permittitur? Nemo mihi alia quelibet contra auctoritatem sedis apostolicae uel CCCXVIII. episcoporum, uel reliquorum canonum constituta obiciat; quia quicquid contra illorum diffinicionem (in quibus Spiritum sanctum credimus locutum) dictum fuerit, recipere non solum temerarium, sed etiam periculosum esse non dubito.

C. LIX. Bigamists or any persons after penance shall not be assigned to sacred ministries.

Likewise Gelasius, Bishop of the City of Rome, to all the Bishops [throughout Lucania, etc., c. 5]. Let no pontiff trust that it is lawful to assign to divine ministries, as destined to serve in them, bigamists, those taking spouses left by others, any persons after penance, persons without letters, persons impaired in body, persons of dependent condition, persons entangled in the bonds of the curia and public affairs, or persons examined indiscriminately with no observance of a fitting interval of time.

C. LIX. Bigami, uel quilibet post penitenciam sacris non applicentur ministeriis.

Item Gelasius Urbis Romae Episcopus omnibus Episcopis. [per Lucaniam, etc. cap. 5.] Non confidat quisquam pontificum fas esse, digamos aut coniugia sortientes ab aliis derelicta, siue quoslibet post penitenciam, uel sine litteris, uel corpore uiciatos, uel condicionarios, aut curiae publicarumque rerum nexibus inplicatos, aut passim nulla temporis congruentis expectatione discussos, diuinis seruituros applicare ministeriis.

C. LX. Penitents cannot even become clerics.

Likewise Innocent [to Agapitus and the others, epistle VI]. The canons established at Nicaea exclude penitents even from the lowest offices of clerics. GRATIAN. This is understood not concerning any penitents whatsoever, but only those who after penance receive the belt of secular military service. Concerning them Bishop Innocent writes to Victorius, Bishop of Rouen [epistle II, c. 2]:

C. LX. Penitentes nec etiam clerici fieri possunt.

Item Innocentius. [Agapito et ceteris, epist. VI.] Canones apud Niceam constituti penitentes etiam ab infimis offitiis clericorum excludunt. Gratian. Hoc non de quibuslibet penitentibus intelligitur, sed de illis tantum, qui post penitenciam secularis militiae cingulum accipiunt. De quibus Innocentius Episcopus scribit Victorio Rotomagensi Episcopo. [epist. II. c. 2.]

C. LXI. One who held the belt of military service after the remission of sins ought not to become a cleric.

If anyone after the remission of sins held the belt of secular military service, he ought altogether not to be admitted to clerical status. GRATIAN. It can also be understood in another way. There is a certain penance called solemn, which is granted only once in the Church, concerning which Ambrose says: "Just as there is one baptism, so there is one penance." Likewise: "There is no second place of penance." Likewise: "Very many are found who think that penance is to be performed repeatedly, who luxuriate in Christ. For if they truly performed penance, they would never afterward think it was to be repeated."

> C. LXI. Non debet fieri clericus, qui post remissionem peccatorum miliciae cingulum habuit.
> Si quis post remissionem peccatorum cingulum miliciae secularis habuerit, ad clericatum omnino admitti non debet. Gratian. Potest et aliter intelligi. Est quedam penitencia, que solempnis appellatur, que semel tantum in ecclesia conceditur, de qua Ambrosius ait: "Sicut unum est baptisma, ita unica est penitencia." Item: "Non est secundus locus penitenciae." Item: "Reperiantur quam plurimi, qui sepius agendam penitenciam putant, qui luxuriantur in Christo. Nam si uere penitenciam agerent, numquam iterandam postea putarent."

[C. LXII.]

Likewise Augustine to Macedonius [epistle LIV]. Although it was cautiously and salubriously provided that the place of most humble penance be granted only once in the Church, lest a medicine exceedingly useful be held less valuable, nevertheless pardon through penance is never denied to those who sin daily.

GRATIAN. How this penance is to be imposed, moreover, is read in the Council of Agde, in which it was established as follows [c. 15]:

> [C. LXII.]
>
> Item Augustinus ad Macedonium. [epist. LIV.] Quamuis caute et salubriter prouisum sit, ut locus humillimae penitenciae semel tantum in ecclesia concedatur, ne medicina nimis utilis minus uilis haberetur, tamen cotidie peccantibus numquam per penitenciam uenia negatur.
> Gratian. Hec autem penitencia quomodo inponenda sit in Agatensi Concilio legitur, in quo sic statutum est: [c. 15.]

C. LXIII. How penitents are to approach penance.

At the time when penitents seek penance, let them receive from the priest the imposition of hands and haircloth upon their heads, just as has been established everywhere. But if they have not cut off their hair or changed their clothing, let them be cast out and, unless they worthily repent, not received. Penance is also not easily to be assigned to young persons because of the frailty of their age. Nevertheless, viaticum is not to be denied to anyone placed at the point of death.

> C. LXIII. Quomodo penitentes ad penitenciam accedant.
> Penitentes tempore, quo penitenciam petunt, inpositionem manuum et cilicium super capita a sacerdote (sicut ubique statutum est) consequantur. Si autem comas non deposuerint, aut uestimenta non mutauerint, abiciantur et nisi digne penituerint, non recipiantur. Iuuenibus etiam penitencia propter etatis fragilitatem non facile committenda est. Viaticum tamen omnibus in morte positis non est negandum.

C. LXIV. What things are to be observed in solemn penance.

Likewise from the same. At the beginning of Lent, all penitents who undertake or have undertaken public penance shall present themselves before the doors of the church to the bishop of the city, clothed in sackcloth, barefoot, with faces cast down to the ground, professing by their very bearing and countenance that they are guilty. The deans—that is, the archpriests of the parishes—and the priests of the penitents, who ought diligently to inspect their conduct and enjoin penance according to the measure of the fault through the aforesaid grades, ought to be present there. After this, let him lead them into the church and, prostrate on the ground with the whole clergy, chant with tears the seven penitential psalms for their absolution. Then, rising from prayer, according as the canons command, let him impose hands upon them, sprinkle blessed water over them, first cast ashes, and then cover their heads with haircloth; and with groaning and frequent sighs let him announce to them that, just as Adam was cast out of paradise, so they too are cast out of the Church for their sins. Afterward let him command the ministers to expel them outside the door of the church, while the clergy follow them with the responsory, "In the sweat of your face you shall eat your bread," etc., so that, seeing holy Church terrified and moved because of their crimes, they may not make little of penance. On the sacred Supper of the Lord, however, let them again be presented at the thresholds of the church by their deans and their priests. GRATIAN. No cleric is ever permitted to perform this penance, and therefore penitents of this kind are prohibited from being admitted to the clergy.

Hence in the Fifth Council of Carthage [c. 11] it is read to have been established:

C. LXIV. Que sint obseruandas in solempni penitencia.

Item ex eodem. In capite quadragesimae omnes penitentes, qui publicam suscipiunt aut susceperunt penitenciam, ante fores ecclesiae se representent episcopo ciuitatis, sacco induti, nudis pedibus, uultibus in terram demissis reos se esse ipso habitu et uultu protestantes. Ibi adesse debent decani, id est archipresbiteri parrochiarum et presbiteri penitencium, qui eorum conuersationem diligenter inspicere debent, et secundum modum culpae penitenciam per prefatos gradus iniungere. Post hec eos in ecclesiam introducat, et cum omni clero septem penitenciae psalmos in terram prostratus cum lacrimis pro eorum absolutione decantet; tunc resurgens ab oratione, iuxta quod canones iubent, manus eis inponat, aquam benedictam super eos spargat, cinerem prius mittat, deinde cilicio capita eorum operiat, et cum gemitu et crebris suspiriis denunciet eis, quod sicut Adam proiectus est de paradiso, ita et ipsi pro peccatis ab ecclesia abiciuntur; postea iubeat ministris, ut eos extra ianuam ecclesiae expellant, clerus uero prosequatur eos cum responsorio: "In sudore uultus tui uesceris pane tuo, etc." ut, uidentes sanctam ecclesiam pro facinoribus suis tremefactam atque commotam, non paruipendant penitenciam. In sacra autem Domini cena rursus ab eorum decanis et eorum presbiteris ecclesiae liminibus represententur. Gratian. Hanc penitenciam nulli umquam clericorum agere conceditur, atque ideo huiuscemodi penitentes ad clerum admitti prohibentur.

Unde in Cartaginensi Concilio V. [cap. 11.] statutum legitur:

C. LXV. Hands shall not be imposed upon clerics as upon penitents.

It is to be confirmed that, if priests or deacons are at any time convicted of some graver fault for which it is necessary that they be removed from ministry, hands shall not be imposed upon them as upon penitents or as upon faithful laypersons; nor is it ever to be permitted that those rebaptized be promoted to the grade of clerical status. Likewise Pope Siricius [to Himerius, epistle I, c. 14]:

> C. LXV. Clericis non inponatur manus tamquam penitentibus.
> Confirmandum est, ut, si quando presbiteri uel diaconi in aliqua grauiori culpa conuicti fuerint, qua eos a ministerio necesse sit remoueri, non eis manus tamquam penitentibus uel tamquam fidelibus laicis inponatur, neque umquam permittendum est, ut rebaptizati ad clericatus gradum promoueantur. Item Siricius Papa: [Himerio, epist. I. c. 14.]

C. LXVI. Neither is a cleric permitted to perform penance, nor a penitent to approach clerical status.

It was also right for us to provide that, just as no cleric is ever permitted to perform penance, so after penance and reconciliation no layperson is permitted to obtain the honor of clerical status, because although they have been cleansed from the contagion of all sins, those who formerly were vessels of vices ought nevertheless to receive no instruments for carrying out the sacraments.

> C. LXVI. Nec clerico penitenciam agere, nec penitenti ad clericatum accedere permittitur.
> Illud quoque nos par fuit prouidere, ut sicut penitenciam agere nulli umquam conceditur clericorum, ita post penitudinem ac reconciliationem cuiquam laicorum non liceat honorem clericatus adipisci, quoniam quamuis sint omnium peccatorum contagione mundati, nulla tamen debent gerendorum sacramentorum instrumenta suscipere, qui dudum fuerint uasa uiciorum.

C. LXVII. Hands ought not to be imposed upon priests and deacons as upon penitents.

Likewise Pope Leo [to Rusticus of Narbonne, epistle XC, c. 2]. It is alien to ecclesiastical custom that those who have been consecrated in the honor of the priesthood or the grade of the diaconate should receive, for some crime of their own, the remedy of performing penance through the imposition of hands. This descends without doubt from apostolic tradition, according to what is written: "If a priest sins, who will pray for him?" Hence those who have fallen in this manner, in order to merit the mercy of God, must seek private seclusion, where, if their satisfaction has been worthy, it may also be fruitful for them. GRATIAN. By the authority of the Council of Toledo also it is proved that penitents of this kind are not to be admitted to the clergy, in which [c. 2] it was established thus:

> C. LXVII. Presbiteris et diaconibus tamquam penitentibus manus inponi non debent.
> Item Leo Papa. [Rustico Narbonensi, epist. XC. cap. 2.] Alienum est a consuetudine ecclesiastica, ut qui in presbiterali honore aut diaconii gradu fuerint consecrati, hi pro crimine aliquo suo per manus inpositionem remedium accipiant penitendi; quod sine dubio ex apostolica tradicione descendit, secundum quod scriptum est: "Sacerdos si peccauerit, quis orabit pro illo?" Unde huiusmodi lapsis ad promerendam misericordiam Dei priuata est expetenda secessio, ubi illis, si satisfactio fuerit digna, sit etiam fructuosa. Gratian. Probantur etiam auctoritate Tolletani Concilii huiuscemodi penitentes ad clerum non admittendi, in quo [c. 2.] sic statutum est:

C. LXVIII. Because of necessity penitents may be admitted to the clergy.

It was resolved that penitents not be admitted to the clergy, except only if necessity or use should require it; then let them be assigned among the doorkeepers or among the readers, yet so that they do not read the Apostle or the Gospel. §1. But if any have been ordained as deacons, let them be held among the subdeacons, so that they neither impose a hand nor touch sacred things. §2. When, however, we say "penitent," we mean one who after baptism, whether for homicide or for diverse crimes and most grave sins, performed public penance and, under haircloth, was reconciled to the divine altar. Part VII. GRATIAN. Apostates also ought not to be admitted to the office of clerical status. Hence in the Second Council of Arles [c. 25]:

> C. LXVIII. Causa necessitatis ad clerum penitentes admittantur.
> Placuit, ut penitentes non admittantur ad clerum, nisi tantum si necessitas aut usus exegerit; tunc deputentur inter hostiarios uel inter lectores, ita ut apostolum uel euangelium non legant. §. 1. Si qui autem ordinati sunt in diacones, inter subdiacones habeantur, ita ut manum non inponant nec sacra contingant. §. 2. Cum uero penitentem dicimus, qui post baptisma aut pro homicidio, aut pro diuersis criminibus grauissimisque peccatis publicam penitenciam gerens sub cilicio diuino fuerit reconciliatus altario. VII. Pars. Gratian. Apostatae quoque ad clericatus offitium admitti non debent. Unde in Concilio Arelatensi II.: [cap. 25.]

C. LXIX. Apostates shall not be admitted to the office of clerical status.

Those who apostatize after the holy profession of religion and return to the world, and afterward do not seek the remedies of penance, shall receive no communion at all without penance. We also command that they not be admitted to the office of clerical status. And whoever he may be, after penance let him not presume to take the secular habit. But if he has presumed to do so, let him be held as alien from the Church.

> C. LXIX. Ad clericatus offitium non admittantur apostatae.
> Hii, qui post sanctam religionis professionem apostatant et ad seculum redeunt, et postmodum penitenciae remedia non requirunt, sine penitencia communionem penitus non accipiant. Quos etiam iubemus ad clericatus offitium non admitti. Et quicumque ille sit, post penitenciam habitum secularem accipere non presumat. Quod si presumpserit, ab ecclesia alienus habeatur.

Distinction LI

GRATIAN. Part I. Behold, criminals, those not truly penitent, or those performing public penance are prohibited from sacred orders. Holy mother Church also added that curiales, those serving as soldiers after baptism, or those contending in the forum should be prohibited from sacred orders. Hence Innocent says [Pope to the Bishops assembled in the Synod of Toledo, epistle XXIV, c. 2]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Ecce, quod criminosi, uel non uere penitentes, uel publicam penitenciam agentes, a sacris prohibentur ordinibus. Adiecit quoque sancta mater ecclesia, ut curiales, aut post baptisma militantes, aut in foro decertantes, a sacris prohibeantur ordinibus. Unde Innocentius ait: [Papa Episcopis in Toletana. Sinodo constitutis, epist. XXIV. c. 2.]

C. I. Those serving as soldiers after baptism or contending in the forum are prohibited from sacred orders.

We have learned that a number of those who, after receiving the grace of baptism, were engaged in forensic practice and undertook the obstinacy of prevailing have been enrolled into the priesthood; some of their number are said to have been taken up into the priesthood; some from military service, who obeyed powers and necessarily executed savage commands; some from among the curiales, who, while obeying powers, did the things commanded them; and some who celebrated the entertainments and public shows of the people attained the honor of the highest priesthood. Not one of all these ought even to have attained fellowship in the clerical order. If we command each of these matters to be investigated, we shall induce no small commotions or scandals upon the Spanish provinces, which we desire to heal through a zeal for correction; therefore we think these matters should rather be remitted. But lest similar things be committed thereafter, the maturity of your charity will have to provide that a necessary end now be imposed upon so great a usurpation, with this evidently established: whoever are ordained as such shall be deposed together with their ordainers.

> C. I. Post baptisma militantes, uel in foro decertantes, a sacris prohibentur ordinibus.
> Aliquantos ex his, qui post acceptam baptismi gratiam in forensi exercitacione sunt uersati et obtinendi pertinaciam susceperunt, adscitos ad sacerdotium esse comperimus, quorum numero aliqui perhibentur ad sacerdotium assumi; aliquantos ex milicia, qui cum potestatibus obedierunt, seua necessario precepta sunt exsecuti; aliquantos ex curialibus, qui, dum parerent potestatibus, que sibi sunt inperata fecerunt; aliquantos, qui uoluptates et editiones populi celebrarunt, ad honorem summi sacerdocii peruenisse, quorum omnium neminem ad societatem quidem ordinis clericorum oportuerat peruenire. Que singula si discutienda mandemus, non modicos motus aut scandala Ispaniensibus prouinciis, quibus mederi cupimus, de studio emendationis inducemus; idcirco remittenda potius hec putamus. Sed ne deinceps similia committantur dilectionis uestrae maturitas prouidere debebit, ut tantae usurpationis nunc finis necessarius inponatur, eo uidelicet constituto, ut, quicumque tales ordinati fuerint, cum ordinatoribus suis deponantur.

C. II. From what classes of laypersons men cannot attain clerical status.

The same to Felix, Bishop of Nocera [epistle IV, c. 3]. The classes of laypersons from which some cannot attain clerical status have been designated: that is, if any faithful person has held an administration. The reason concerning curiales, moreover, is manifest, because even if men of this kind are found who ought to become clerics, nevertheless, since they are rather often reclaimed for the curia, caution is to be exercised concerning them because of the tribulation that often comes to the Church from them.

> C. II. De quibus laicis ad clericatum non possunt peruenire.
> Idem Felici Episcopo Nuceriano. [epist. IV. c. 3.] Designata sunt genera laicorum, de quibus ad clericatum aliqui peruenire non possunt, id est, si quis fidelis administrauerit. De curialibus autem manifesta ratio est, quoniam etsi inueniantur huiusmodi uiri, qui clerici debeant fieri, tamen quoniam sepius ad curiam repetuntur, cauendum est ab his propter tribulationem, que sepe de his ecclesiae prouenit.

C. III. Curiales shall not be admitted to clerical office.

The same [to Victricius, Bishop of Rouen, epistle II, c. 11]. Moreover, certain of our brethren frequently strive to make clerics of curiales or those occupied in any public functions; concerning them there is afterward greater sadness when something is commanded by the emperor about recalling them than grace arises from the person enrolled. For it is established that in those very duties they also furnish entertainments, which there is no doubt were invented by the devil, and either preside over or perhaps take part in the preparations for games and shows. Let the solicitude and sadness of the brethren that we have often endured in the emperor's presence certainly be an example, when we petitioned him rather often on their behalf, as you yourself knew while placed with us. Concerning them, an immense trouble insisted that not only the lower clerics from among the curiales, but even those already established in the priesthood, be returned.

C. III. Non admittantur curiales ad clericale offitium.

Idem. [Victricio Episcopo Rothomagensi, epist. II. cap. 11.] Preterea frequenter quidam ex fratribus nostris curiales uel quibuslibet publicis functionibus occupatos, clericos facere contendunt, pro quibus postea maior est tristicia, cum de reuocandis eis aliquid ab inperatore precipitur, quam gratia nascitur de ascito. Constat enim eos in ipsis muneribus etiam uoluptates exhibere, quas a diabolo inuentas esse non dubium est, et ludorum et munerum apparatibus aut preesse, aut forsitan interesse. Sit certe in exemplum sollicitudo et tristicia fratrum, quam sepe pertulimus inperatore presente, cum pro his sepius rogaremus, quam ipse nobiscum positus cognouisti, quibus non solum inferiores clerici ex curialibus, uerum etiam iam in sacerdotio constituti ingens molestia ut redderentur instabat.

C. IV. One who after baptism was girded for killing the faithful shall not be promoted to the diaconate.

Likewise from the First Council of Toledo [c. 8]. If anyone after receiving baptism served as a soldier and took up the military cloak and belt for killing the faithful, even if he did not commit grave acts, if he has been admitted to the clergy, let him not receive the dignity of the diaconate.

C. IV. Non promoueatur ad diaconatum, qui post baptismum ad fideles necandum accinctus fuerit.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano I. [cap. 8.] Si quis post acceptum baptismum militauerit, et clamidem sumpserit ac cingulum ad necandum fideles, etiamsi grauia non admiserit, si ad clerum admissus fuerit, diaconii non accipiat dignitatem.

C. V. From what things one who is to be ordained as a bishop ought to be free.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo [c. 19]. Those who are held in any crime; those sprinkled with the mark of infamy; those who have confessed through public penance that they committed any crimes; those who have fallen into heresy; those who are known to have been baptized or rebaptized in heresy; those who have cut themselves, or those who are known to lack some part of their members through a natural defect; those who have entered a union with a second wife or frequented numerous marriages; those who married a widow or one left by her husband, or who were husbands of women who had been corrupted; those who had concubines or prostitutes; those who are liable to a servile condition; those who are unknown; those who are neophytes or laymen; those devoted to secular military service; those bound by the obligations of the curia; those unskilled in letters; those who have not yet reached thirty years; those who have not ascended through the ecclesiastical grades; those who seek honor through canvassing; those who endeavor to obtain honor by gifts; those who are chosen for the priesthood by their predecessors. §1. Nor thereafter shall he be a priest whom neither the clergy nor the people of his own city elected, or whose election neither the authority of the metropolitan nor the assent of the comprovincial priests ratified. Therefore, whoever is thereafter proposed for the order of the priesthood, investigated concerning the things aforesaid, found in none of them, and upon examination shown to possess an approved life and doctrine, shall then, according to synodal or decretal enactments, be consecrated priest on the Lord's day by all the comprovincial bishops, or certainly by three, with the will of all the clerics or citizens, the others who are absent concurring by their letters, and especially with the authority or presence of the one established as metropolitan bishop. A comprovincial bishop, moreover, is to be consecrated where the metropolitan chooses; but a metropolitan only in the metropolitan city, with the comprovincials assembling there. §2. But if anyone thereafter, contrary to the aforesaid prohibitions of the canons, strives unworthily to aspire to the grade of the priesthood, he, together with his ordainers, shall be subject to the peril of the honor obtained.

> Item ex Tolletano Concilio IV. [cap. 19.] Qui in aliquo crimine detenti sunt, qui infamiae nota aspersi sunt, qui scelera aliqua per publicam penitenciam se admisisse confessi sunt, qui in heresim sunt lapsi, qui in heresi baptizati aut rebaptizati esse noscuntur, qui semetipsos absciderunt aut qui naturali defectu membrorum aliquid minus habere noscuntur, qui secundae uxoris coniunctionem sortiti sunt aut numerosa coniugia frequentauerunt, qui uiduam uel a marito relictam duxerunt aut corruptarum mariti fuerunt, qui concubinas aut fornicarias habuerunt, qui seruili condicioni obnoxii sunt qui ignoti sunt, qui neophiti uel laici sunt, qui seculari miliciae dediti sunt, qui curiae nexibus obligati sunt, qui inscii litterarum sunt, qui nondum ad triginta annos peruenerunt, qui per gradus ecclesiasticos non ascenderunt, qui ambitu honorem querunt, qui honorem muneribus obtinere moliuntur, qui a decessoribus in sacerdotium eliguntur. §. 1. Sed nec ille deinceps sacerdos erit, quem nec clerus, nec populus propriae ciuitatis elegit, uel auctoritas metropolitani, uel conprouincialium sacerdotum assensus non exquisiuit. Quicumque ergo deinceps ad ordinem sacerdocii postulatus, et in his, que predicta sunt, exquisitus, in nullo horum deprehensus fuerit, et examinatus probabili uita atque doctrina exstiterit, tunc secundum sinodalia uel decretalia constituta cum omnium clericorum uel ciuium uoluntate ab uniuersis conprouincialibus episcopis, aut certe a tribus, in sacerdotem die dominico consecrabitur, conuenientibus ceteris, qui absentes sunt, suis litteris, et magis auctoritate uel presencia eius, qui metropolitanus Episcopus constitutus est. Episcopus autem conprouincialis ibi consecrandus est, ubi metropolitanus elegerit; metropolitanus autem non nisi in ciuitate metropoli, conprouincialibus ibidem conuenientibus. §. 2. Si quis autem deinceps contra predicta uetita canonum ad sacerdotii gradum indignus aspirare contenderit, cum ordinatoribus suis adepti honoris periculo subiacebit.

Distinction LII

GRATIAN. But one who, having passed over some grades, has ascended to higher ones not from pride but from negligence shall abstain from the higher ones until at the fitting time he receives those passed over. Hence Alexander II writes to Grimaldus, Bishop of Constance:

> GRATIANUS. Qui uero pretermissis aliquibus gradibus non superbia, sed negligentia ad maiores conscenderit, tamdiu a maioribus abstineat, quousque congruo tempore pretermissos accipiat. Unde Alexander II. scribit Grimaldo Constantiensi Episcopo:

C. I. Concerning one who, the order of the subdiaconate having been passed over, was ordained deacon and priest.

The solicitude of your charity took care to consult whether the bearer of these letters is fit to perform the office of the diaconate and priesthood or not, since he is known to have ascended to it in an excessively hasty course, with the order of the subdiaconate passed over, from negligence rather than pride. Hence, taking counsel for your charity, we command you to prohibit him from priestly office until at the next Ember fast you duly impose upon him the ministry of the subdiaconate, and thereafter permit him to return to the higher offices.

> C. I. De eo, qui subdiaconatus ordine postposito diaconus et presbiter est ordinatus.
> Sollicitudo dilectionis tuae studuit consulere, utrum portitor istarum litterarum diaconatus et presbiteratus offitium idoneus sit peragere nec ne, cum ad id prepropero cursu, subdiaconatus ordine postposito, negligentia potius quam superbia cognoscatur ascendisse. Unde nos consulendo caritati tuae mandamus, ut ab offitio sacerdotali eum prohibeas, donec proximo quatuor temporum ieiunio subdiaconatus ministerium sibi rite imponas, et sic deinceps ad maiora offitia eum redire concedas.

Distinction LIII

GRATIAN. Curiales, moreover, as was written above, are prohibited from being ordained because frequently, when they are reclaimed from the Church, very many disadvantages follow for the Church, or because those same curiales transfer themselves to churches not from a vow of religion but so that they may escape the accountings of their offices. Hence Gregory, in Book VIII of the Register [Indiction I, epistle 11], writes to all the Bishops concerning the law of Emperor Maurice:

> GRATIANUS. Curiales autem, ut supra scriptum est, ideo ordinari prohibentur, quia frequenter, dum ab ecclesia repetuntur, plurima incommoda ecclesia sequitur, uel quia iidem curiales non uoto religionis, sed ut offitiorum suorum ratiocinia fugiant, ad ecclesias se transferunt. Unde Gregorius scribit libro VIII. Registro [Indict. I. epist. 11.] omnibus Episcopis de lege Mauritii Augusti:

C. I. Why it was established that curiales should not be ordained.

I have taken care to transmit to your fraternity the law that the most pious emperor issued, lest perhaps those who are bound to military service or public accounts, while fleeing the peril of their causes, should come to the ecclesiastical habit or be converted in monasteries, especially for this reason: those who are entangled in the affairs of the world are not to be received precipitously among the clergy of the Church, because while they live in the ecclesiastical habit no differently than they had lived before, they by no means strive to flee the world, but to change it. But if any such persons also seek a monastery, they are by no means to be received unless first released from public business. §1. But if any from among military men hasten to be numbered in monasteries, they are not to be received rashly unless their life has been subtly investigated. And when they have been tested for three years in their own habit according to the norm of the rule, then, with God as author, let them receive the monastic habit.

> C. I. Quare sit constitutum, ne curiales ordinentur.
> Legem, quam piissimus inperator dedit, ne forte hi, qui miliciae uel rationibus sunt publicis obligati, dum causarum suarum periculum fugiunt, ad ecclesiasticum habitum ueniant uel in monasteriis conuertantur, uestrae studui fraternitati transmittere, maxime ob hanc causam, quod hi, qui seculi actionibus inplicati sunt, in clero ecclesiae prepropere suscipiendi non sunt, quia, dum in ecclesiastico habitu non dissimiliter quam prius uixerant uiuunt, nequaquam student seculum fugere, sed mutare. Distinction LIV

GRATIAN. Part I. Slaves, moreover, are prohibited from being ordained unless they obtain lawful freedom from their own masters. Hence Bishop Leo writes to all the Bishops:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Serui autem ordinari prohibentur, nisi a propriis dominis libertatem legitimam consequantur. Unde Leo Episcopus omnibus scribit Episcopis:

C. I. A slave shall not be promoted to clerical office.

Let no bishop presume to promote another's slave to clerical office unless perhaps the petition or will of those who claim some power over him has been added. For one who is to be enrolled in the divine military service ought to be free from others, so that he is not drawn away by the bonds of any necessity from the Lord's camp in which his name is inscribed.

C. I. Seruus ad clericatus offitium non promoueatur.

Nullus episcoporum seruum alterius ad clericatus offitium promouere presumat, nisi forte eorum peticio aut uoluntas accesserit, qui aliquid sibi in eo uendicant potestatis. Debet enim esse inmunis ab aliis, qui diuinae miliciae est aggregandus, ut a castris dominicis, quibus nomen eius asscribitur, nullius necessitatis uinculis abstrahatur.

C. II. No one of servile condition shall approach sacred orders.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur. Let none of servile condition be promoted to sacred orders unless first they obtain lawful freedom from their own masters; let the charter of that freedom be read publicly from the ambo before ordination, and, if no one contradicts, they shall be duly consecrated. Moreover, a slave not canonically consecrated, after he has fallen from his grade, shall be of the condition that he had been before the grade.

[PALEA.

C. II. De seruili condicione ad sacros ordines nullus accedat.

Item ex Triburiensi Concilio. Nulli de seruili condicione ad sacros ordines promoueantur, nisi prius a dominis propriis legitimam libertatem consequantur; cuius libertatis charta ante ordinationem in ambone publice legatur, et, si nullus contradixerit rite consecrabuntur. Porro seruus non canonice consecratus, postquam de gradu deciderit, eius condicionis sit, cuius fuerat ante gradum.

C. III. From the First Council of Carthage, c. 8.

Magnus, the Astiagensian bishop, said: What seems good to your charity? Ought procurators, agents and executors, or guardians of wards, to be ordained? Bishop Gratus said: If, after everything has been laid down and their accounts rendered, the deeds of their life have been approved in all things, they ought, if requested and with the praise of the clergy, to be rewarded with honor. For if before freedom from their business or offices they have been ordained by someone without consideration, the Church is defamed. All said: Your Holiness has rightly established all things, and therefore this also is our sentence.]

C. III. Ex Concilio Cartaginensi I. c. 8.

Magnus episcopus Astiagensis dixit, quid dilectioni uestrae uidetur, procuratores, actores et executores, seu curatores pupillorum si debeant ordinari? Gratus episcopus dixit: si post deposita uniuersa et reddita ratiocinia actus uitae ipsorum fuerint conprobati in omnibus, debent et cum laude cleri, si postulati fuerint, honore munerari. Si enim ante libertatem negociorum uel offitiorum ab aliquo sine consideratione fuerint ordinati, ecclesia infamatur. Uniuersi dixerunt: Recte omnia statuit sanctitas tua, ideoque ita est et nostra ista quoque sentencia.]

C. IV. After the gift of freedom, servants of the Church may be called into the clergy.

Likewise from the Ninth Council of Toledo [c. 11]. Those from among the servants of the Church who are called by their bishops to serve in the clergy must receive the gift of freedom; and if they shine by the merits of an honorable life, then at length, aided by these, let them perform higher offices. But let the perpetual servitude of their condition bind in a chain those whom the incorrigible guilt of a crime has defiled. GRATIAN. Those who obtain freedom from their masters so that they may be ordained ought, moreover, to be altogether alien from their patronage, so that they are found liable to their services in no respect. Hence in the Fourth Council of Toledo [c. 73] it is read:

C. IV. Post donum libertatis famuli ecclesiae deuocentur in clerum.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano IX. [c. 11.] Qui ex famulis ecclesiae seruituri deuocantur in clerum ab episcopis suis, necesse est, ut libertatis percipiant donum, et si honestae uitae claruerint meritis adiuti tunc demum maioribus fungantur offitiis. Quos uero flagitii sordidauerit incorrigibilis noxa, perpetua seruitus condicionis religet in catena. Gratian. Qui autem a dominis suis ordinandi libertatem consequuntur, ab eorum patrocinio penitus debent esse alieni, ut in nullo eorum obsequiis inueniantur obnoxii. Unde in Concilio Tolletano IV. [c. 73.] legitur:

C. V. Those who receive freedom from their masters with no service retained shall be received into clerical status.

Whoever receive freedom from their masters in such a way that the patron retains no service for himself from them—these, if they are without crime, shall be received as free persons into the clerical order, because they are known to have been released by direct manumission. But those who were manumitted with service retained, because they are still held liable by service to the patron, are by no means to be promoted to ecclesiastical order, lest, whenever their masters wish it, they be made slaves from clerics.

[PALEA.

C. V. Ad clericatum suscipiantur qui nullo obsequio retento a dominis suis libertatem percipiunt.

Quicumque libertatem a dominis suis ita percipiunt, ut sibi in eis nullum obsequium patronus retentet, isti, si sine crimine sunt, ad clericatus ordinem liberi suscipiantur, quia directa manumissione absoluti noscuntur. Qui uero retento obsequio manumissi sunt, pro eo, quod adhuc patroni seruitute tenentur obnoxii, nullatenus sunt ad ecclesiasticum ordinem promouendi, ne, quando uoluerint eorum domini, fiant ex clericis serui.

[PALEA.

C. VI. From the Council of Toledo [c. 82].

Concerning the ordination of slaves who are indiscriminately promoted to ecclesiastical grades, it was resolved by all that agreement with the sacred canons ought to be maintained, and it was established that henceforth no bishop presume to promote them to sacred orders unless they first obtain freedom from their own masters. §1. And if any slave, fleeing his master, attains ecclesiastical grades either through letters, through witnesses hired or corrupted by a gift, or through any cunning or fraud, it is decreed that he be deposed and his master receive him. §2. But if a grandfather or father, migrating from one country to another, begets a son in that province, and the son himself was raised there and promoted to ecclesiastical grades, and it is unknown whether he is a slave, and afterward his master comes and acquires him according to the laws, it is sanctioned that, if his master wishes to give him freedom, he shall remain in his grade. §3. But if he wishes to draw him away from the Lord's camp by the chain of servitude, let him lose his grade, because, according to the sacred canons, while remaining a person of low condition he cannot exercise the dignity of the priesthood.]

Et si quilibet seruus dominum suum fugiens aut per litteras, aut adhibitis testibus munere conductis uel corruptis, aut qualibet calliditate uel fraude ad gradus ecclesiasticos peruenerit, decretum est, ut deponatur, et dominus eius eum recipiat. §. 2. Si uero auus uel pater ab alia patria in aliam migrans in eadem prouincia filium genuerit, et ipse filius ibidem educatus et ad gradus ecclesiasticos promotus fuerit, et utrum seruus sit ignotum sit, et postea ueniens dominus illius legibus eum acquisierit, sancitum est, ut, si dominus eius illi libertatem dare uoluerit, in gradu suo permaneat. §. 3. Si uero eum catena seruitutis a castris dominicis abstrahere uoluerit, gradum amittat, quia iuxta sacros canones uilis persona manens sacerdotii dignitate fungi non potest.]

C. VII. One who is bound by the patronage of anyone shall not be ordained without the patron's consent.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin. If anyone is bound by servile tribute, by any condition, or by the patronage of any household, he is not to be ordained a cleric unless he has been of approved life and the patron's consent has been added. [PALEA.

> C. VII. Sine consensu patroni non ordinetur, qui patrocinio cuiuslibet est obligatus.

C. VIII. From the Council of Toledo, c. 2.

Concerning the property or peculium of those who are given freedom by their own masters so that they may lawfully be promoted to ecclesiastical grades, it was established that whatever they possessed before freedom shall rest within the masters' power, whether they wish to grant it to them or retain it for themselves.] GRATIAN. Otherwise, if they have not obtained freedom from their masters and have in any way slipped into ecclesiastical orders, a priest shall be punished by the loss of his peculium, while a deacon shall either furnish a substitute for himself or be recalled into servitude; the other grades cannot free anyone from the bond of servitude.

Hence Gelasius writes to Bishops Martinus and Justus:

> C. VIII. Ex Concilio Tolletano c. 2.
>
> De rebus uero illorum uel peculiari, qui a propriis dominis libertate donantur, ut ad gradus ecclesiasticos iure promoueantur, statutum est, ut in potestate dominorum consistat, quicquid ante libertatem habuerunt utrum illis concedere, an sibi retinere uoluerint.] Gratian. Ceterum, si a dominis suis libertatem consecuti non fuerint, et ad ecclesiasticos ordines aliquo modo irrepserint, presbiter peculii amissione mulctetur, diaconus uero aut uicarium pro se prestabit, aut in seruitutem reuocabitur; ceteri uero gradus non possunt quemquam a nexu seruitutis absoluere.
> Unde Gelasius scribit Martino et Iusto Episcopis:

C. IX. If a slave has secretly slipped into the priesthood, let him be punished by loss of his peculium.

It has been comprehended from the ancient rules and the recent synodal explanation that dependent persons are not to be girded with the belt of heavenly military service. But I do not know whether you are carried away by ignorance or willfulness, so that scarcely any of the bishops seems exempt from this cause. For the frequent complaint of very many resounds around us in such a way that it is thought that nothing at all has been established in this respect. §1. Indeed, the agents of our son, the illustrious man Amandianus, complain gravely that some men owing service to his jurisdiction have now been ordained clerics and others deacons, although not only ought persons of this kind not to have been received after the recent council—which is established to have been perfected by the assembly of so many pontiffs under the assent of everyone's most salutary provision—but even if any perhaps had previously been received into the military service of divine worship through ignorance, they ought justly to have been expelled altogether, stripped of religious privilege, and compelled by admonition to return to the possessions of their masters. And therefore, dearest brothers, examine those whom the aforesaid man's agents show to be detained in clerical office and, when they have been proved liable, restore them without interruption while preserving the course of the laws, yet so that if any one of these is now found to be a priest, he shall remain in the same grade, punished only by the loss of his peculium. A deacon, however, shall either furnish a substitute or, if he has none, shall himself be returned. But let those in the remaining offices know that no one, if convicted, can be vindicated from liability, so that, with this order preserved, neither the rights of masters nor privileges are disturbed in any way.

> C. IX. Seruus si latenter irrepserit ad sacerdotium, peculii amissione multetur.
> Ex antiquis regulis et nouella sinodali explanatione conprehensum est, personas obnoxias cingulo celestis miliciae non precingi. Sed nescio utrum ignorantia aut uoluntate rapiamini, ita ut ex hac causa nullus pene episcoporum uideatur extorris. Ita enim nos frequens et plurimorum querela circumstrepit, ut ex hac parte nichil penitus putetur constitutum. §. 1. Actores siquidem illustris uiri filii nostri Amandiani grauiter conqueruntur, homines suo iuri debitos alios iam clericos, alios iam diaconos ordinatos, cum non solum post modernum concilium (quod tantorum collectione pontificum sub omnium saluberrimae prouisionis assensu constat esse perfectum) huiusmodi personae suscipi non deberent, uerum etiam, si qui forte in diuinae cultu miliciae ante fuerint ignorantia faciente suscepti, eliminari prorsus et exuti religioso priuilegio, ad dominorum suorum possessiones iusta debuerint ammonitione compelli. Et ideo, fratres karissimi, eos, quos supradicti uiri actores in clericatus offitio monstrauerint detineri, discussos et obnoxios adprobatos, custodito legum tramite sine intermissione restituite, ita ut si quis iam ex his presbiter reperitur, in eodem gradu peculii sola amissione multatus maneat. Diaconus uero aut uicarium prestet, aut, si non habuerit, ipse reddatur. Reliqua uero offitia sciant, neminem posse ab obnoxietate, si conuincitur, uendicari, quatenus hoc ordine custodito nec dominorum iura, nec priuilegia ulla ratione turbentur.

C. X. A slave made a cleric shall remain liable to servitude.

The same to Bishops Herculentius, Stephanus, and Justus. A frequent and continual complaint indeed resounds around us concerning those pontiffs who, considering neither the ancient rules nor our decrees recently directed, do not reject persons bound and tied to landholders when they come to the clerical belt. §1. For recently the stewards of the illustrious woman Placidia complained by the presentation of a petition that Sabinus, bishop of the city of Marcelliana or Casilinum, taking advantage of the absence of the mistress, advanced Antiochus, a slave under the jurisdiction of their patroness, even to the honor of the priesthood and adorned his brother Leontius with the privilege of clerical office. And therefore, dearest brothers, by our authority we assign to you the adjudication between the aforesaid stewards and those who are reclaimed on the allegation of the lowest condition, so that, after all the truth has been investigated, if he truly cannot wash away the stain alleged against him by the reason of a just rebuttal, you shall in every way return the cleric Leontius, whom the grade determined by the laws does not protect, to following the necessity of his condition. Antiochus, however, because he can no longer be taken back on account of the priesthood, if his mistress desires to station him in her church in the honor in which he is, let her possess him not as though returned to her, but as received for the celebration of the ministries.

C. X. Seruus clericus factus seruituti maneat obnoxius.

Idem Herculentio, Stephano et Iusto Episcopis. Frequens quidem et assidua nos querela circumstrepit de his pontificibus, qui nec antiquas regulas, nec decreta nostra nouiter directa cogitantes, obnoxias possessoribus illigatasque personas uenientes ad clericale cingulum non refutant. §. 1. Nuper etenim rectores illustris feminae Placidiae petitorii oblatione conquesti sunt, Sabinum Marcellianensis siue Cusilinatis urbis antistitem Antiochum seruum iuris patronae suae (absentis dominae occasione captata) ad presbiterii honorem usque perductum, eiusque fratrem Leoncium clericalis offitii priuilegio decorasse. Et ideo, fratres carissimi, inter supradictos actores, et eos, qui extremae condicionis repetuntur obiectu, cognitionem uobis nostra auctoritate deputamus, ut omni ueritate discussa, si reuera obiectam sibi maculam iustae refragationis non poterit ratione diluere, Leoncium clericum, quem gradus prefinitus legibus non defendit, ad sequendam condicionis suae necessitatem modis omnibus redibete. Antiochum uero, quia propter sacerdotium iam retolli non potest, si in sua ecclesia in hoc in quo est honore collocare desiderat, non uelud redditum sibi habeat, sed pro ministeriorum celebratione susceptum.

C. XI. Concerning the same.

The same to Bishops Rufinus and Aprilis. Who would say that either the laws of princes, the rules of the fathers, or recent admonitions ought to be despised, except one who thinks that only an offense committed by himself passes unpunished? Indeed, the agents of our daughter, the illustrious and magnificent woman Maxima, complained to us by the presentation of a petition that Silvester and Candidus, persons belonging by origin to her, were illegitimately ordained deacons by the bishop of Luceria contrary to the constitutions mentioned above, even after an objection had first been made. And therefore, dearest brothers, know that the excess of so great a transgression is to be investigated more sagaciously, and if it is established that the complaint is supported by truth, let those who were illegitimately created after an objection had first been made be immediately repelled from sacred offices.

> C. XI. De eodem.
> Idem Rufino et Aprili Episcopis. Quis aut leges principum, aut patrum regulas, aut ammonitiones modernas dicat debere contempni, nisi qui inpunitum sibi tantum existimat transire commissum? Actores siquidem filiae nostrae illustris et magnificae feminae Maximae petitorii nobis insinuatione conquesti sunt, Siluestrum atque Candidum, originarios suos, contra constituciones, que supra dictae sunt, etiam contradictione preeunte a Lucerino pontifice diacones non legitime ordinatos. Et ideo, fratres karissimi, tantae preuaricationis excessus noueritis sagacius inquirendos, et, si constiterit querelam ueritate fulciri, continuo, qui contradictione preeunte non legitime sunt creati, a sacris offitiis repellantur.

C. XII. Without their masters' consent, slaves shall be admitted neither to the profession of religious life nor to clerical office.

Likewise to the same. The presumption involved in a general complaint is also to be avoided, by which nearly all complain that slaves and bound tenants indiscriminately flee the rights and possession of their masters and, under the pretext of religious conversion, either betake themselves to monasteries or, with prelates also conniving, are indiscriminately admitted to ecclesiastical service. This destruction is to be removed in every way, lest through the institution of the Christian name either another's property seem to be invaded or public discipline overturned; especially since it is not fitting that the dignity of clerical ministry itself be stained by this obligation and compelled to litigate concerning the status and condition of those serving in its ranks, or seem—God forbid—to be itself liable. When these matters have been competently prohibited by a solicitous interdiction, let any bishop, priest, deacon, or any of those who are known to preside over monasteries who think that persons of this kind whom they retain are not to be restored to their patrons, or that they are thereafter to be assigned either to the service of the Church or to religious congregations, have no doubt that they will undergo peril to their own honor and communion if a truthful complaint from anyone reaches us concerning this matter, unless perhaps the persons were first released by the will of their masters, attested by subscription, or granted by a lawful transaction. §1. For with great efforts, according to the blessed Apostle Paul, care must be taken lest the faith and discipline of the Lord be blasphemed. The same: §2. We believe that nothing is lost to ecclesiastical interests if things belonging to others are returned. Part II. GRATIAN. This is to be observed when the master and his slave are found to be of the same profession. Otherwise, if a Jew has bought a Christian slave, even against the Jew's will the slave ought to be brought to freedom by the authority of a judge or bishop. Hence Gregory to Bishop Libertinus:

> C. XII. Nec ad religiosae uitae propositum, nec ad clericatus offitium sine dominorum consensu serui admittantur.
> Item eisdem. Generalis etiam querelae uitanda presumptio est, qua propemodum causantur uniuersi, passim seruos et originarios dominorum iura possessionemque fugientes, sub religiosae conuersationis obtentu uel ad monasteria sese conferre, uel ad ecclesiasticum famulatum conniuentibus quoque presulibus indifferenter admitti. Que modis omnibus est amouenda pernicies, ne per Christiani nominis institutum aut aliena peruadi, aut publica uideatur disciplina subuerti; precipue cum nec ipsam ministerii clericalis hac obligatione fuscari dignitatem conueniat, cogaturque pro statu militantium sibi condicioneque iurgari, aut uideri (quod absit) obnoxia. Quibus sollicita competenter interdictione prohibitis, quisquis episcopus, presbiter, diaconus, uel eorum, qui monasteriis preesse noscuntur, huiusmodi personas apud se tenentes non restituendas patronis, aut deinceps uel ecclesiae seruituti, uel religiosis congregationibus putauerint applicandas, nisi uoluntate forsitan dominorum subscriptionis testimonio primitus absolutas uel legitima transactione concessas, periculum se proprii honoris non ambigant communionisque subituros, si super hac re cuiusquam uerax nos querela pulsauerit. §. 1. Magnis quippe studiis secundum B. Paulum Apostolum precauendum est, ne fides et disciplina Domini blasphemetur. Idem: §. 2. Nichil perire credimus ecclesiasticis utilitatibus, si que sunt aliena reddantur. II. Pars. Gratian. Hoc tunc obseruandum est, cum dominus et serus eiusdem professionis inueniuntur. Ceterum Iudeus Christianum mancipium emerit, iudicis uel episcopi auctoritate, etiam eo inuito, ad libertatem debet perduci. Unde Gregorius Libertino Episcopo:

C. XIII. Christian slaves purchased by Jews shall be brought to freedom.

Whatever Christian slaves a Jew is shown to have purchased, bring them to freedom without hesitation according to the precepts of the laws, lest—God forbid—the Christian religion be polluted by being subjected to Jews.

C. XIII. Ad libertatem perducantur mancipia Christiana a Iudeis conparata.

Mancipia Christiana, quecumque Iudeum conparasse patuerit, ad libertatem iuxta legum precepta sine ambiguitate perducite, ne, quod absit, religio Christiana Iudeis subiecta polluatur.

C. XIV. Public offices are not to be entrusted to Jews.

Likewise from the Third Council of Toledo [c. 14]. Let no public offices be imposed upon Jews through which an occasion is given to them to inflict punishment upon Christians. But if any Christians have been stained by them in the rite of Judaism or even circumcised, let them return to freedom and the Christian religion without repayment of the price. GRATIAN. Concerning those, however, who, bought in unbelief, desire to come to the grace of baptism, Gregory writes to Fortunatus, Bishop of Naples, what ought to be done [Book V, epistle 31]:

C. XIV. Offitia publica Iudeis non sunt committenda.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano III. [c. 14.] Nulla offitia publica Iudeis iniungantur, per que eis occasio tribuatur penam Christianis inferre. Si qui uero Christiani ab eis in Iudaismo ritu sunt maculati uel etiam circumcisi, non reddito pretio ad libertatem et religionem redeant Christianam. Gratian. De his autem, qui in infidelitate empti ad gratiam baptismi uenire desiderant, quid fieri debeat, Gregorius scribit Fortunato Neapolitano Episcopo: [lib. V. epist. 31.]

C. XV. Slaves who come from unbelief to the faith shall be vindicated into freedom.

Your fraternity ought to be solicitous that, if not only a Jew but also any pagan in servitude to Jews wishes to become a Christian, after his will has been disclosed, there be no power under any device or argument to sell him to any Jew; rather, let the one who desires to be converted to the Christian faith be vindicated into freedom in every way by your defense. §1. But lest those who must lose slaves of this kind perhaps think that their interests are unreasonably impeded, it is fitting that you observe this with solicitous consideration: if pagans whom they bought from foreign lands for the sake of trade should happen within three months—while a buyer to whom they might be sold is not found—to flee to a church and say that they wish to become Christians, or even disclose such a will outside the church, let their owners receive their price, evidently from a Christian buyer. But if after the appointed three months any of these Jewish slaves declares his will and wishes to become a Christian, and no one has afterward bought him, let his master not dare to sell him under the appearance of any occasion; rather, let him undoubtedly be brought to the rewards of freedom, because the master is said to have bought him not for selling but for serving himself.

Hi uero, quos huiuscemodi oportet seruos amittere, ne forsitan utilitates suas irrationabiliter existiment inpediri, sollicita uos hoc conuenit consideratione seruare, ut, si paganos, quos mercimonii causa de externis finibus emerint, infra tres menses, dum emptor, cui uenditi fuerant, non inuenitur, fugere ad ecclesiam forte contigerit, et uelle se dixerint Christianos fieri, uel etiam extra ecclesiam hanc talem uoluntatem prodiderint, pretium eorum a Christiano scilicet emptore percipiant. C. XIX. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the First Council of Orléans [c. 5]. Part III. If a slave, while his master is absent or ignorant, has been ordained priest or deacon by a bishop who knew that he was a slave, with the slave remaining in clerical office, let the bishop recompense his master with double satisfaction for him. But if the bishop did not know that he was a slave, those who furnished testimony or petitioned that he be ordained shall be held liable to a similar repayment.

C. XIX. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I. c. 5.] III. Pars. Si seruus, absente aut nesciente domino, episcopo sciente quod seruus sit, presbiter aut diaconus ordinatus fuerit, ipso in clericatus offitio permanente, episcopus eum domino duplici satisfactione recompenset. Si uero episcopus eum seruum nescierit, qui testimonium perhibent, aut eum supplicauerint ordinari, simili redibitione teneantur obnoxii.

C. XX.

A new constitution. If a slave has been ordained among the clergy with his master's knowledge and without his objection, by this very fact he will be free and freeborn. But if without the master's knowledge, it is permitted to him within the span of one year both to prove the servile condition and to receive his slave. Yet even if, after being tested in a lawful trial, he becomes a monk, he escapes the yoke of servitude. For they ought to remain in the monastery for three years before becoming monks; but afterward, if they have become monks, they are made free. The episcopal order frees from servile or adscripta condition, but not from curial or official condition, for that endures even after ordination. Episcopal dignity also dissolves the right of paternal power. We permit registered tenants on the estates themselves to become clerics even without the will of their masters, yet so that, after becoming clerics, they fulfill the agriculture imposed upon them.

> C. XX.

> Constitutio noua. Si seruus sciente et non contradicente domino, in clero fuerit ordinatus, ex hoc ipso liber et ingenuus erit. Sed si ignorante domino, licet, ei intra spatium unius anni et seruilem fortunam probare, et seruum suum accipere. Verum et si legitimo probatus experimento monachus efficiatur, euadit iugum seruitutis. Debent enim per triennium antequam monachi efficiantur in monasterio permanere, postea uero si monachi effecti fuerint, liberi efficiuntur. Episcopalis ordo liberat a fortuna seruili uel ascriptitia, sed non a curiali siue offitiali, nam et post ordinationem durat. Sed et ius patriae potestatis soluit episcopalis dignitas. Inscripticios uero in ipsis possessionibus clericos etiam preter uoluntatem dominorum fieri permittimus, ita tamen, ut clerici facti inpositam sibi agriculturam adinpleant.

C. XXI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Leo to all the Bishops [epistle I, c. 1]. Persons are indiscriminately admitted to sacred order whom no dignity of birth and no dignity of morals supports; and those who were by no means able to obtain freedom from their masters are advanced to the summit of the priesthood, as though servile lowliness might take this honor. Therefore, dearest brothers, let all the priests of your province abstain from these; and we wish them to refrain not only from these but also from other bound tenants or persons obligated to any condition, unless perhaps the petition or will of those who claim some power over them has been added. Part IV. GRATIAN. Concerning slaves of a monastery it is asked whether they can be joined to ecclesiastical offices or not. But servants of churches are not to be ordained, as was said above, unless they obtain freedom from their own bishops. Moreover, a slave of a monastery is unable to obtain freedom; therefore, it is not permitted him to approach clerical status. That he cannot be made free is proved by the authority of the Eighth Synod, in which it is read to have been established thus:

> C. XXI. De eodem.
> Item Leo omnibus Episcopis. [epist. I. c. 1.] Admittuntur passim ad sacrum ordinem, quibus nulla natalium, nulla morum dignitas suffragatur, et qui a dominis suis consequi libertatem minime potuerunt, ad fastigium sacerdotii (tamquam seruilis uilitas hunc honorem capiat) prouehuntur. Ab his itaque, fratres karissimi, omnes uestrae prouinciae abstineant sacerdotes, et non tantum ab his, sed etiam ab aliis originariis, uel qui alicui conditioni obligati sunt, uolumus temperari, nisi forte eorum peticio aut uoluntas accesserit, qui aliquid sibi in eos uendicant potestatis. IV. Pars. Gratian. De seruis monasterii queritur, an ecclesiasticis offitiis possint aggregari, an non. Sed famuli ecclesiarum non sunt ordinandi, sicut supra dictum est, nisi a propriis episcopis libertatem consequuntur. Porro serus monasterii libertatem consequi non ualet, non ergo ad clericatum sibi accedere licet. Quod autem liber fieri non possit, probatur auctoritate octauae Sinodi, in qua sic statutum legitur:

C. XXII. It is not permitted to an abbot or monk to make a monastery's slave free.

It shall not be permitted to an abbot or monk to make a monastery's slave free. For one who has nothing of his own cannot give freedom to another's property, since, as the secular laws also have sanctioned, a possession cannot be alienated except by its own master. GRATIAN. By this authority slaves are prohibited from obtaining freedom to withdraw from the service of a monastery, but they are not prohibited from obtaining freedom to be promoted to sacred orders. For one established in sacred orders can perpetually serve the services of the monastery, and thus a slave of a monastery is able both to obtain freedom and to be associated with sacred offices. Hence in another chapter of the aforesaid constitution this reason is given: "For it is unjust that, while monks perform rural work, their slaves should grow sluggish in idleness and abound in delights." Part V. GRATIAN. That the slaves of churches—by which name we understand slaves of a monastery also to be signified—ought to be assumed into the profession of sacred religion is proved by the authority of blessed Gregory, who, presiding in a general Synod, said:

> C. XXII. Monasterii seruum abbati uel monacho non licet facere liberum.
> Abbati uel monacho monasterii seruum non licebit facere liberum. Qui enim nichil proprium habet, libertatem rei alienae dare non potest, nam, sicut et seculi leges sanxerunt, non potest alienari possessio, nisi a proprio domino. Gratian. Hac auctoritate prohibentur serui adipisci libertatem recedendi ab obsequio monasterii, sed non prohibentur nancisci libertatem promouendi ad sacros ordines. Potest enim in sacris ordinibus constitutus monasterii obsequiis perpetuo deseruire, ac sic seruus monasterii et libertatem adipisci et sacris offitiis ualet associari. Unde in alio capitulo prefatae constitucionis hec causa redditur: "Iniustum est enim, ut monachis rurale opus facientibus serui eorum otio torpeant ac deliciis affluant." V. Pars. Gratian. Quid autem serui ecclesiarum (quo nomine etiam monasterii seruos significari intelligimus) ad sacrae religionis propositum debeant assumi, auctoritate beati Gregorii probatur, qui generali Sinodo residens dixit:

C. XXIII. If a servant of the Church has been of approved conduct, he can be ordained.

We know that many from the household of the Church hasten to the service of the Almighty, so that, free from human servitude, they may be able to live in monasteries in divine service. If we permit this indiscriminately, we furnish to all an occasion for fleeing the dominion of ecclesiastical right. But if we incautiously retain those hastening to the service of the Almighty, we are found to deny certain things to him who gave all things. Hence it is necessary that, if anyone from servitude under ecclesiastical right or secular military service desires to be converted to God's service, he first be tested while established in the lay habit. And if his morals and conduct bear testimony to his good desire, let him be permitted without any reconsideration to serve the almighty Lord in a monastery, so that one who from divine love seeks to undergo a stricter servitude may depart free from human servitude. But if he has also lived blamelessly in the monastic habit according to the rules of the Fathers, after the times prescribed by the sacred canons let him now be advanced to any ecclesiastical office, provided nevertheless that he was not stained by those crimes which in the Old Testament are punished by death. GRATIAN. Behold how slaves may be assumed into clerical status, or how they are not admitted. Freedmen also are not to be promoted to the clergy unless they have been released from services to their patron. Hence in the Council of Elvira [c. 80]:

> C. XXIII. Si conuersationis probatae fuerit famulus ecclesiae, potest ordinari.
> Multos ex ecclesiastica familia nouimus ad omnipotentis seruitium festinare, ut ab humana seruitute liberi in diuino seruitio ualeant in monasteriis conuersari. Quod si passim dimittimus, omnibus fugiendi ecclesiastici iuris dominium occasionem prebemus. Si uero festinantes ad omnipotentis seruitium incaute retinemus, illi inuenimur negare quedam, qui dedit omnia. Unde necesse est, ut si quis ex iuris ecclesiastici uel secularis miliciae seruitute ad Dei seruitium conuerti desiderat, probetur prius in laicali habitu constitutus. Et si mores eius atque conuersatio bono desiderio illius testimonium ferunt, absque ulla retractione in monasterio omnipotenti Domino seruire permittatur, ut ab humano seruitio liber recedat, qui diuino amore districtiorem appetit subire seruitutem. Si autem et in monachico habitu secundum Patrum regulas irreprehensibiliter fuerit conuersatus, post prefixa sacris canonibus tempora iam ad quodlibet ecclesiasticum offitium prouehatur, si tamen illis non fuerit criminibus maculatus, que in testamento ueteri morte mulctantur. Gratian. Ecce, quomodo serui ad clericatum ualeant assumi, uel quomodo non admittantur. Liberti quoque non sunt promouendi ad clerum, nisi ab obsequiis sui patroni fuerint absoluti. Unde in Concilio Eliberitano: [c. 80.]

C. XXIV. Without the patron's consent a freedman shall not be promoted to the clergy.

It is to be prohibited that freedmen whose patrons are in the world be promoted to the clergy.

C. XXIV. Absque patroni consensu libertus non promoueatur ad clerum.

Prohibendum est, ut liberti, quorum patroni in seculo fuerint, ad clerum non promoueantur.

Distinction LV

GRATIAN. Part I. Those impaired in body are likewise prohibited from sacred offices. Hence Pope Gelasius writes [to the Bishops established throughout Lucania and Bruttium, epistle I, cc. 2 and 3], saying:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Corpore uero uitiati similiter a sacris offitiis prohibentur. Unde Gelasius Papa [Episcopis per Lucaniam et Brutios constitutis, epist. I. c. 2. et 3.] scribit, dicens:

C. I. The prior life of one who comes from monastic disciplines to a clerical function, and of one from the laity, shall be examined.

Therefore, with the ancient institutes remaining in force because of the reverence due them—which, where no straitness of affairs or times presses, it is fitting to observe according to rule—since churches have been deprived of all or of sufficient ministries to such an extent that they are unable to supply divine services to the congregations belonging to them, we grant that, if anyone instructed in monastic disciplines approaches a clerical function, his prior life be investigated, even if he is from the laity: §1. that he not be infected by some crime, or illiterate, or a bigamist, or one who has taken a wife from adolescence, or impaired in body, or of servile or bound-tenant condition, or entangled in the obligations of the curia or of public affairs, or marked by public penance, or examined with no observance of a fitting interval of time.

C. I. Qui de monasterialibus disciplinis ad clericale munus accedit et de laicis, anteacta eius uita examinetur.

Priscis igitur pro sua reuerentia manentibus institutis, (que, ubi nulla rerum uel temporum perurget angustia, regulariter conuenit custodiri), quia eatenus ecclesiae uel cunctis uel sufficientibus priuatae sunt ministeriis, ut plebibus ad se pertinentibus diuina munera subplere non ualeant, concedimus, ut, si quis monasterialibus disciplinis eruditus ad clericale munus accedit, etiam de laicis, anteacta eius uita requiratur, §. 1. ne sit aliquo facinore infectus, uel illitteratus, uel bigamus, uel ab adolescentia sortitus, uel corpore uitiatus, uel seruilis uel originariae condicionis, uel curiae uel publicarum nexibus rerum inplicatus, uel publica penitencia notatus, uel nulla congruentis temporis expectatione discussus.

C. II. One who ordains someone contrary to the form of the canons shall be subject to a year's suspension.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Arles [c. 3]. Let no one dare to ordain a penitent, a bigamist, or a husband of widows in the aforesaid honors. And although the institutes of nearly all the canons already contain these things, nevertheless, lest the importunity or wicked suggestion of petitioners, as we have already said, steal upon any of the priests, it was necessary that the Lord's priests now will to impose a stricter rule upon themselves. And therefore, whoever from this day presumes to ordain a cleric contrary to the things comprehended above shall not presume to celebrate Masses for a whole year from the day when this can be proved against him. If anyone is unwilling to observe this matter and, acting contrary to the enactment, presumes to celebrate Masses, let him be deprived of the communion of the Church and know himself alien from the communion of all the brethren, because it is worthy that one who despises observing the things salubriously established by the holy Fathers should feel the severity of ecclesiastical discipline.

> C. II. Annuae suspensioni subiaceat, qui preter canonum formam aliquem ordinat.
> Item ex Concilio Arelatensi IV. [c. 3.] Nullus penitentem, nullus digamum, nullus uiduarum maritos in predictis honoribus audeat ordinare. Et licet hec iam prope omnium canonum instituta contineant, tamen ne cuicumque sacerdotum supplicantium (sicut iam diximus) inportunitas uel suggestio iniqua subripiat, necesse fuit, ut nunc seueriorem regulam sibi uelint Domini sacerdotes inponere. Et ideo, quicumque ab hac die contra ea, que superius conprehensa sunt, clericum ordinare presumpserit, ab ea die, qua hoc ei potuerit approbari, anno integro missas cantare non presumat. Quam rem si quis obseruare noluerit, et contra constitutum fratrum faciens missas celebrare presumpserit, ecclesiae communione priuetur, et ab omnium fratrum communione se nouerit alienum, quia dignum est, ut seueritatem ecclesiasticae disciplinae sentiat, qui salubriter a sanctis Patribus instituta obseruare contempnit.

C. III. Penitents or those unskilled in letters shall not be ordained.

Likewise Pope Hilary [from the Roman Council held by him, c. 3]. Let penitents, those unskilled in letters, or those who have suffered some injuries to their members not dare to aspire to sacred orders. But whoever has been the consecrator of such persons shall himself undo his deed. GRATIAN. Those impaired in body, however, are understood as those cut not by accident but by their own will. Hence in the Canons of the Apostles [cc. 22 and 23] it is read:

> C. III. Non ordinentur penitentes, uel inscii litterarum.
> Item Ylarius Papa. [ex Concilio Romano ab ipso habito, cap. 3.] Penitentes uel inscii litterarum, aut aliqua membrorum dampna perpessi, ad sacros ordines aspirare non audeant. Quisquis autem talium consecrator extiterit, factum suum ipse dissoluet. Gratian. Corpore autem uitiati intelliguntur non casu, sed propria uoluntate abscisi. Unde in canonibus Apostolorum [c. 22. et 23.] legitur:

C. IV. One who has cut himself shall not be ordained.

If anyone has cut himself—that is, if anyone has amputated his own genitals—let him not become a cleric, because he is his own murderer and an enemy of God's creation. §1. If anyone, when he was a cleric, has cut himself, let him be condemned altogether, because he is his own murderer.

> C. IV. Qui semetipsum abscidit, non ordinetur.

Si quis abscidit semetipsum, (id est, si quis amputauerit sibi uirilia), non fiat clericus, quia suus est homicida, et Dei condicionis inimicus. §. 1. Si quis, cum clericus fuerit, absciderit semetipsum, omnino dampnetur, quia suus est homicida.

C. V. Those who cut themselves shall not be brought forward to the clergy.

Likewise from the Second Council of Arles [c. 7]. Those who, not knowing how to resist carnal vice, cut themselves cannot attain the clergy. Likewise Innocent writes to Felix, Bishop of Nocera [epistle IV, c. 1]:

C. V. Non producantur ad clerum, qui se ipsos abscidunt.

Item ex Concilio Arelatensi II. [c. 7.] Hii, qui se carnali uicio repugnare nescientes abscidunt, ad clerum peruenire non possunt. Item Innocentius scribit Felici Nuceriano Episcopo: [epist. IV. cap. 1.]

C. VI. One who intentionally cut off part of his finger is not to be ordained.

The canons do not admit to the clergy one who intentionally cut off part of any finger from himself. But those to whom it happened by some accident, while either applying care to rural work or doing something and striking themselves involuntarily, the canons command both to become clerics and, if they are found in the clergy, not to be cast out. For in the former the will that dared to apply the blade to itself is judged; but in the latter the accident merited pardon. GRATIAN. It is to be understood similarly concerning those who because of sickness are cut by physicians, are mutilated by barbarians, or are castrated by their masters. Hence in the Council of Nicaea [c. 1] it is read:

C. VI. Non est ordinandus, qui partem digiti sui uolens abscidit.

Qui partem cuiuslibet digiti sibi ipsi uolens abscidit, hunc ad clerum canones non admittunt. Cui uero casu aliquo contigerit, dum aut operi rustico curam inpendit, aut aliquid faciens se non sponte percutit, hos canones precipiunt et clericos fieri, et, si in clero reperti fuerint, non abici. In illis enim uoluntas est iudicata, que sibi ausa fuerit ferrum inicere; in istis uero casus ueniam meruit. Gratian. Similiter intelligendum est de his, qui per languorem a medicis secantur, aut a barbaris absciduntur, aut a dominis castrantur. Unde in Niceno Concilio [c. 1.] legitur:

C. VII. One who is cut by physicians because of sickness can be admitted to the clergy.

If anyone was cut by physicians because of sickness or mutilated by barbarians, let him remain in the clergy. But if anyone, while healthy, cut himself, it will be fitting that one established in the clergy abstain, and that henceforth none of such persons ought to be promoted. Just as it is clear that this was said concerning those who deliberately seek this thing and dare to cut themselves, so the Church receives into the clergy those whom either barbarians or masters castrated, if they are found otherwise most worthy.

C. VII. Qui per languorem a medicis dissecatur, ad clerum ualet admitti.

Si quis a medicis propter languorem desectus est aut a barbaris abscisus, hic in clero permaneat. Si quis autem se sanus abscidit, hunc in clero constitutum abstineri conueniet, et deinceps nullum talium debere promoueri. Sicut autem hoc claret, quod de his, qui hanc rem affectant audentque semetipsos abscidere, dictum sit, sic eos, quos aut barbari, aut domini castrauerunt, inueniuntur autem alias dignissimi, tales ad clerum suscipit ecclesia.

C. VIII. One who is made a eunuch through the plots of men may lawfully be ordained bishop.

Likewise from a Canon of the Apostles [c. 21]. If a eunuch was made so through the plots of men, or if his genitals were amputated in persecution, or if he was born thus, and he is worthy, let him become a bishop.

C. VIII. Licite ordinetur episcopus, qui per hominum insidias eunuchizatur.

Item ex canone Apostolorum. [21.] Eunuchus, si per insidias hominum factus est, uel si in persecutione eius sunt amputata uirilia, uel si ita natus est, et est dignus, fiat episcopus.

C. IX. Those who are cut by physicians, barbarians, or their masters are not excluded from the clergy.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin. If anyone because of illness had his natural parts cut by physicians, likewise those who were castrated by barbarians or their masters and are found worthy in morals, the canon admits these to be promoted to the clergy. But if anyone healthy thinks that carnal concupiscences can be cut away from himself not through the discipline of religion and abstinence but through the cutting of the body fashioned by God, and has therefore castrated himself, we decree that he not be admitted to any clerical office. But if he had already been promoted to the clergy before, let him be prohibited from his ministry and deposed.

C. IX. Non excluduntur a clero, qui a medicis, uel a barbaris, uel a dominis suis exsecantur.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. Si quis pro egritudine naturalia a medicis secta habuerit, similiter et qui a barbaris aut a dominis suis castrati fuerint, et moribus digni inueniuntur, hos canon admittit ad clerum promoueri. Si quis autem sanus non per disciplinam religionis et abstinentiae sed per abscissionem a Deo plasmati corporis, existimat, posse a se carnales concupiscentias amputari, et ideo se castrauerit, non eum admitti decernimus ad aliquod clericatus offitium. Quod si iam ante fuerit promotus ad clerum, prohibitus a suo ministerio deponatur.

C. X. One who is made lame by a physician's incision is not prohibited from sacred orders.

Likewise from the Council of Lérida. If any cleric placed in sickness is made lame by a physician's incision, we do not deny that he may be promoted to sacred orders.

C. X. Non prohibetur a sacris ordinibus qui medicorum incisione claudus efficitur.

Item ex Concilio Ilerdensi. Si quis in infirmitate positus clericus in medicorum incisione claudus efficitur, promoueri ad sacros ordines eum non denegamus.

C. XI. One who lost a finger by accident is not prohibited from the clergy.

Likewise Stephen to Robert, Bishop of Metz. The bearer of these presents, namely the cleric Flavinus, coming to the holy Apostolic See, brought us an epistle directed by you, in which you took care to report that, very recently captured by the Normans, he had a finger of his left hand cut off, and you ask whether on this account he can be promoted to ecclesiastical order or not. And since we have found that your diligence, especially solicitous concerning this matter, demands to be instructed by the Apostolic See, we who desire always to follow the norm of justice deservedly praise the zeal of your Holiness, wishing your Reverence to know that, if it is so that the finger itself was cut off by the Normans, this will harm him nothing for being promoted, if he is otherwise worthy, because we do not believe it escapes your Charity what the sacred canons decree concerning those who involuntarily suffer such a thing from masters, physicians, or pagans.

> C. XI. Non prohibetur a clero, qui digitum casu sibi abscidit.
> Item Stephanus Roberto Metensi Episcopo. Lator presentium, Flauinus scilicet clericus, ad sanctam sedem apostolicam ueniens, detulit a te directam nobis epistolam, qua indagare studuisti, eum a Normannis nuperrime captum sinistrae manus digitum habere abscisum, sciscitaris, si ob hoc ad ecclesiasticum ordinem ualeat promoueri, an non. Quod et nos reperientes, quia sollertia tua, magis super hoc sollicita, a sede apostolica doceri flagitat, normam iusticiae semper sequi desideramus, studium tuae sanctitatis merito collaudamus, reuerentiam tuam scire uolentes, quoniam si ita est, quod a Normannis digitum ipsum habeat abscisum, ad promouendum (si alias dignus fuerit) nil ei nocebit, eo quod quid de his, qui a dominis, uel a medicis, siue a paganis non sponte tale quid patiuntur, sacri censeant canones, dilectionem tuam latere non credimus.

C. XII. Dignity received in a time of soundness is not lost through subsequent disability.

Likewise Pope Gelasius to Bishop Palladius. Just as the precepts of the canons by which ecclesiastical discipline is governed do not permit those weak in body to come to the priesthood, so, if anyone was established in it in actuality and was then wounded, he cannot lose what he received in the time of his soundness. §1. Indeed the priest Stephen, in a petition offered to us that is contained below, lamented that the dignity of the priesthood was conferred upon him long ago and many years before, which he truly had received when his body was judged unblemished; but recently, because of the devastation of the province—which the uncertainty of minds and barbarians following diverse sects brought upon Tuscany above all—while he strove to escape threatening swords by the protection of flight, in leaping over fences that met him, he impaled the lower parts of his body upon sharp stakes, which scarcely could be healed after treatment had been applied for two years. And therefore, dearest brother, restore to the aforesaid man his place and dignity, so that he may exercise the sacrosanct mysteries as he was accustomed. For it is not fitting on this account to take away the order received before, in which he is proved afterward to have fallen into bodily invalidity by an accident. Part II. GRATIAN. This, however, is not to be understood concerning all members. For one who has lost an eye by accident, although will is absent, nevertheless cannot obtain the priesthood. Hence Pelagius writes to Bishop Rufinus:

> C. XII. Tempore sinceritatis dignitas accepta sequenti debilitate non amittatur.
> Item Gelasius Papa Palladio Episcopo. Precepta canonum, quibus ecclesiastica regitur disciplina, sicut non paciuntur uenire ad sacerdotium debiles corpore, ita si quis in eo fuerit constitutus actu, ac tunc fuerit sauciatus, amittere non potest quod tempore suae sinceritatis accepit. §. 1. Stephanus siquidem presbiter petitorio nobis defleuit oblato, quod habetur in subditis, olim sibi et ante annos plurimos collatam presbiterii dignitatem, quam reuera inmaculati corporis iudicio suscepisset; sed nuper propter prouinciae uastitatem (quam Thusciae pre omnibus barbarorum diuersa sectantium, et ambiguitas inuexit animorum), dum inminentes gladios euadere fugae presidio niteretur, acutis sudibus occurrentia sibi septa transsiliens, inferiores partes corporis inseruisse suggessit, que uix adhibita curatione biennio potuisset abstergi. Et ideo, frater karrissime, supradicto locum suum dignitatemque restitue, quatenus sacrosancta misteria, sicut consueuit, exerceat. Nec enim conuenit ob hoc auferri ante susceptum ordinem, in quo postmodum in inualitudine corporis casu probatur faciente prolapsus. II. Pars. Gratian. Hoc autem non de omnibus membris intelligendum est. Qui enim oculum casu amiserit, licet desit uoluntas, tamen sacerdotium adipisci non potest. Unde Pelagius scribit Rufino Episcopo:

C. XIII. The rights of the priesthood are not to be furnished to one whose eye has been torn out.

If the evangelical admonition does not permit anger raging even as far as a word to leap forth, lest, if anyone has said "Raca" to his brother, he be liable to the fire of Gehenna, by what punishment do we think one is to be struck who not only impiously struck with his fist a man serving in the ministry of Levitical office, but, as if his hands did not suffice for the beating, was so carried away into anger at the devil's instigation that with a staff he not only struck but even tore out his brother's eye? And although an excess of this kind was to be struck by a graver penalty, your fraternity nevertheless did well to remove him from the office of the priesthood. Yet let this belong to your solicitude: establish also a place of penance and thrust him into some monastery, with only lay communion granted to him. In his place, moreover, it is necessary for you to ordain another priest, for according to the canons the rights of the priesthood cannot be granted to the one whose eye was torn out. Nor does it profit him that he lost his eye involuntarily, since no one is to be believed to have wished to lose an eye, and we do not find that the most sacred canons excepted in their rules any accident in the loss of an eye that would not impede one seeking to obtain the priesthood; rather, we see that they made this solely as a prohibition, so that one who lacks an eye cannot obtain priestly office. But neither can sacred order be granted in any way, as though in compensation for the injury, to the one who was able to provoke his own priest to so great an anger that the latter lost the office in which he was and the former lost the possibility of his own advancement.

C. XIII. Non sunt prestanda iura sacerdotii, cui oculus est erutus.

Si euangelica admonitio iracundiam nec usque ad uerbum furentem prosilire permittit, ne, si Racha fratri suo quis dixerit, reus sit gehennae ignis: quali putamus pena plectendum esse, qui non solum pugno inpie percussit hominem in Leuitici offitii ministerio seruientem, quasi non sufficeret ad cedem manus, ita (instigante se diabolo) raptus ad iracundiam est, ut fuste non solum percuteret, sed etiam erueret oculum fratris? Et quamuis huiusmodi excessus grauiori esset pena plectendus, bene tamen fraternitas tua fecit ab offitio eum presbiterii remouere. Hoc tamen sollicitudinis tuae sit, ut locum etiam penitenciae constituas, et in aliquo eum monasterio retrudas, laica sibi tantum communione concessa. In loco autem illius alium te necesse est ordinare presbiterum, nam illi, cui erutus est oculus, non possunt iuxta canones sacerdotii iura concedi. Neque enim aliquid ei prodest, quod oculum inuitus amisit, cum nec uolens quisquam oculum amisisse credendus est, nec sacratissimos canones aliquem casum in amissione oculi, ei qui ad sacerdotium adipiscendum non inpediret, suis excepisse regulis inuenimus; sed hoc tantummodo ad prohibitionem fecisse uidemus, ut qui caret oculo, sacerdotii offitium adipisci non possit. Sed nec illi ullatenus quasi in conpensatione iniuriae sacratus ordo concedi poterit, qui ad tantam sacerdotem proprium potuit iracundiam prouocare, ut ille et offitium, in quo erat, amitteret, et iste prouectus sui perderet facultatem.

Distinction LVI

GRATIAN. Part I. The sons of priests also are not to be admitted to sacred offices. Hence Pope Urban II says:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Presbiterorum etiam filii ad sacra offitia non sunt admittendi. Unde Urbanus Papa II. ait:

C. I. The sons of priests are removed from sacred ministries.

We remove the sons of priests from sacred ministries unless they have been proved to live religiously either in monasteries or among canons. Part II. GRATIAN. But this is to be understood concerning those who were imitators of their father's incontinence. Yet if honesty of morals has made them commendable, by examples and authority they can become not only priests but even high priests.

Sed hoc intelligendum est de illis, qui paternae incontinentiae imitatores fuerint. Verum si morum honestas eos commendabiles fecerit, exemplis et auctoritate non solum sacerdotes, sed etiam summi sacerdotes fieri possunt.

C. II. Hence Pope Damasus writes:

Pope Hosius was the son of Stephen the subdeacon. Pope Boniface was the son of Jocundus the priest. Pope Felix was the son of Felix, priest of the title of Fasciola. Pope Agapitus was the son of Gordian the priest. Pope Theodore was the son of Theodore, bishop of the city of Jerusalem. Pope Silverius was the son of Silverius, Bishop of Rome. Pope Deusdedit was the son of Stephen the subdeacon.] For Felix III, a Roman by nation, was born of his father Felix the priest. Likewise Gelasius, an African by nation, was born of his father, Bishop Valerius. Likewise Agapitus, a Roman by nation, drew his origin from his father Gordian the priest. Very many others also are found who, born of priests, presided over the Apostolic See. Hence Augustine says [Book On the Good of Marriage, c. 16]:

> C. II. Unde Damasus Papa scribit:
> Osius Papa fuit filius Stephani subdiaconi. Bonifacius Papa fuit filius Iucundi presbiteri. Felix Papa filius Felicis presbiteri de titulo Fasciolae. Agapitus Papa filius Gordiani presbiteri. Theodorus Papa filius Theodori episcopi de ciuitate Ierosolima. Siluerius Papa filius Siluerii episcopi Romae. Deusdedit Papa filius Stephani subdiaconi.] Felix enim tertius, natione Romanus, ex patre Felice presbitero fuit. Item Gelasius, natione Afer, ex patre episcopo Valerio natus est. Item Agapitus, natione Romanus, ex patre Gordiano presbitero originem duxit. Quamplures etiam alii inueniuntur, qui de sacerdotibus nati apostolicae sedi prefuerunt. Hinc Augustinus ait: [libro de bono coniug. c. 16.]

C. III. The vices of parents shall not be imputed to their children.

From whatever source human beings are born, if they do not follow the vices of their parents, they will be honorable and saved. For the seed of a human being from whatever human being is God's creation, and it will go badly for those who use it badly; it itself will never be evil. Just as the good children of adulterers are no defense of adulterers, so the bad children of married persons are no crime of marriages.

C. III. Vicia parentum filiis non inputentur.

Undecumque homines nascuntur, si parentum uitia non sectantur, honesti et salui erunt. Semen enim hominis ex qualicumque homine Dei creatura est, et eo male utentibus male erit, non ipsum aliquando malum erit. Sicut autem boni filii adulterorum nulla est defensio adulterorum, sic mali filii coniugatorum nullum crimen est nuptiarum.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise John Chrysostom, above on Matthew, homily III [c. 1]. Let us never blush at the vices of our parents, but let us seek that one thing and always embrace it, namely virtue. For a person of this kind, even if he has a foreign mother, even if one polluted by fornication or defiled by any disgrace of this kind, will nevertheless be darkened neither by her lowliness nor polluted by her crime. For if his prior life by no means stains the fornicator himself when converted to better things, much more is one born of a prostitute and adulteress not discolored by the reproaches of his parents if he is adorned by his own virtue. Likewise: §1. One is altogether not—not at all—to be praised or blamed either for the virtue or the vice of one's parents; no one is truly obscure or illustrious from that. Indeed, let us say something even more considered and explicit: I do not know how, but one shines more who, though from parents altogether alien to virtues, has himself nevertheless been wonderful by the power of God.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item Iohannes Crisostomus supra Mattheum homilia III. [c. 1.] Numquam de uiciis erubescamus parentum, sed unum illud queramus semperque amplectamur, uirtutem uidelicet. Huiusmodi enim, etiamsi alienigenam habet matrem, etiamsi fornicatione pollutam uel quolibet huiusmodi dedecore sordidatam, nichil tamen de eius aut uilitate fuscabitur, aut crimine polluetur. Quod si fornicatorem ipsum ad meliora conuersum nequaquam uita conmaculat prior, multo magis ex meretrice natus et adultera, si propria uirtute decoretur, parentum suorum non decoloratur obprobriis. Item: §. 1. Non est omnino, non est nec de uirtute nec de uicio parentum aut laudandus aliquis, aut culpandus, nemo inde uere aut obscurus, aut clarus est, imo etiam considerantius aliquid dicamus ac expressius, nescio, quomodo ille magis resplendet, qui ex parentibus a uirtutibus prorsus alienis, ipse tamen fuerit Dei uirtute mirabilis.

C. V. Not the fault of parents, but one's own, condemns each person.

Likewise Jerome in the epistle against Rufinus. To be born from adultery is not the fault of the one born, but of the one who begets. Just as in seeds the earth that warms them does not sin, nor the seed that is cast into the furrows, nor the moisture and heat by which the tempered grains sprout into a shoot, but, for example, the thief and robber who by fraud and force seizes the seeds, so the earth—that is, the womb—receives the human kind, receives what is its own and warms it; what has been warmed it gives bodily form; what has been given bodily form it distinguishes into members; and amid those straits of the sacred belly the hand of God always works, and the same one is creator of body and soul. Do not despise the goodness of the potter who fashioned you and made you as he willed. He is the power of God and the wisdom of God, who built for himself a house in the womb of the Virgin. Jephthah, numbered among holy men by the Apostle's voice, is the son of a prostitute.

Esau from Rebecca and Isaac, hairy in mind as in body, degenerates like good wheat into darnel and oats, because the cause of vices and virtues is not in seeds but in the will of the one born.

> C. V. Non parentum, sed propria culpa quemque condempnat.
> Item Ieronimus in epistola contra Rufinum. Nasci de adulterio non est eius culpa, qui nascitur, sed illius, qui generat. Quomodo in seminibus non peccat terra, que confouet non semen, quod in sulcis iacitur, non humor et calor, quibus temperata frumenta in germen pullulant, sed, uerbi gratia, fur et latro, qui fraude et ui eripit semina: sic genus humanum recipit terra, id est uulua, quod suum est et receptum confouet, confotum corporat, corporatum in membra distinguit, et inter illas sacri uentris angustias Dei manus semper operatur, idemque est corporis creator et animae. Noli despicere bonitatem figuli, qui te plasmauit et fecit ut uoluit. Ipse est Dei uirtus et Dei sapientia, qui in utero uirginis edificauit sibi domum. Iepte, inter uiros sanctos Apostoli uoce numeratus, meretricis est filius. Esau de Rebecca et Isaac, hispidus tam mente quam corpore, quasi bonum triticum in lolium auenasque degenerat, quia non in seminibus, sed in uoluntate nascentis causa uiciorum est atque uirtutum.

C. VI. The iniquities of parents cannot harm their children.

Likewise Augustine [Against Faustus, Book XXII, c. 64]. That bridegroom who was to call the good and the bad to the wedding, corresponding to those invited, willed also to be born of the good and the bad, so that by his example they might learn that the iniquities of their parents cannot harm them.

> C. VI. Iniquitates parentum filiis obesse non possunt.
> Item Augustinus. [contra Faustum, lib. XXII. c. 64.] Sponsus ille, qui uocaturus erat ad nuptias bonos et malos, congruens inuitatis, nasci etiam uoluit de bonis et malis, quo exemplo discant parentum suorum iniquitates sibi obesse non posse.

C. VII. Not another's fault, but one's own, casts anyone down from the grade in which he serves.

Likewise Gregory [to Columbus, Bishop of Numidia, Book X, epistle 8]. It is proved sufficiently perverse and contrary to ecclesiastical judgment that anyone should be deprived in vain because of the desires of certain persons, when his own fault or crime does not cast him down from the office or grade in which he serves.

> C. VII. Non aliena culpa, sed propria aliquem ab eo, quo fungitur, deicit gradu.
> Item Gregorius. [ad Columbum Episcopum Numidiae, lib. X. epist. 8.] Satis peruersum et contra ecclesiasticam probatur esse censuram, ut frustra pro quorundam uoluntatibus quis priuetur, quem sua culpa uel facinus ab offitiis, quo fungitur, gradu non deicit.

C. VIII. One born from adultery is not prohibited from the priesthood.

Likewise Jerome. Our Lord Jesus Christ willed to be born not only from foreigners but even from adulterous unions, furnishing great confidence to us that, in whatever manner we are born, provided that we imitate his footsteps, we are not separated from his body, whose members we have been made through faith. And just as he, the true pontiff, was born from adulterous unions, so anyone, in whatever order he was born, provided that he has perfect faith, fulfills in works what he holds by faith, is lettered, and is the husband of one wife, is by no means repelled from the priesthood. For Judah the patriarch lay with Tamar his daughter-in-law, and from that intercourse were born Perez and Zerah; from there afterward Salmon, who was a leader in the desert; from there Obed and from there Boaz; from there afterward Jesse, who was the father of David. From that progeny, moreover, the origin of Christ, who is the true priest, is drawn; and therefore, if we are his sons, we ought to imitate the things he did.

> C. VIII. Ex adulterio natus a sacerdotio non prohibetur.
> Item Ieronimus. Dominus noster Iesus Christus uoluit, non solum de alienigenis, sed etiam de adulterinis conmixtionibus nasci, nobis magnam fiduciam prestans, ut qualicumque modo nascamus, tantum ut eius uestigia imitemur, ab ipsius corpore non separemur, cuius per fidem membra effecti sumus. Et sicut ille uerus est pontifex ex adulterinis natus coniunctionibus, ita, qualicumque ordine natus sit aliquis, tantum ut fidem perfectam habeat, et quod fide tenet inpleat operibus, sitque litteratus, et uir unius uxoris, nequaquam a sacerdotio repellitur. Iudas enim patriarcha concubuit cum Thamar nuru sua, et ex illo coitu nati sunt Phares et Zaran, inde postea Salmon, qui fuit dux in deserto, inde Obeth indeque Booz, inde postea Isai, qui fuit pater Dauid. Ex progenie autem illa origo ducitur Christi, qui uerus sacerdos est; ideoque si filii eius sumus, que ipse fecit imitari debemus.

C. IX. A mother's condition does not separate anyone from the people of God, but one's own fault does.

Likewise Augustine, On the One Baptism [Against the Donatists, Book I, c. 15]. That Ishmael was separated from the people of God was not caused by his mother being a slave woman, but by fraternal discord; nor did the power of the wife, whose son he rather was, profit him, because by her marital rights he was both sown in the slave woman and received from the slave woman. Part III. GRATIAN. To the contrary, Boniface the Martyr to the King of the English:

> C. IX. A populo Dei non separat aliquem materna condicio, sed propria culpa.
> Item Augustinus de unico baptismo. [contra Donatistas, lib. I. c. 15.] Ismael ut separaretur a populo Dei, non obfuit mater ancilla, sed obfuit fraterna discordia; nec profuit potestas uxoris, cuius magis filius erat, quia per ipsius iura coniugalia et in ancilla seminatus erat, et ex ancilla susceptus. III. Pars. Gratian. Contra Bonifacius Martir Regi Anglorum:

C. X. The vices of parents pass even to their descendants.

If the nation of the English—as has been divulged throughout these provinces, is cast against us as a reproach in Francia and Italy, and is set before us as a reproach by the pagans themselves—has lived a foul life after the likeness of the Sodomite nation, despising lawful marriages, committing adultery, and luxuriating, it is to be thought that from such a mingling of prostitutes degenerate and ignoble peoples, raging with lust, are to be begotten; and that at last the whole people, inclining toward worse and more ignoble things, is finally to come forth neither strong in secular war, nor steadfast in faith, nor honorable to human beings, nor lovable to God, just as happened to other nations of Spain and to the peoples of Provence and the Burgundians, who, departing from God in this way, fornicated until the judge of such crimes permitted avenging punishments to come and rage through ignorance of God's law and through the Saracens. Hence the same Urban, making a distinction at the end of the preceding chapter, added:

> C. X. Vicia parentum etiam ad posteros transeunt.
> Si gens Anglorum (sicut per istas prouincias diuulgatum est, et nobis in Francia et in Italia inproperatur, et ab ipsis paganis inproperium nobis obicitur, spretis legalibus conubiis adulterando et luxuriando ad instar Sodomiticae gentis fedam uitam uixerit, de tali commixtione meretricum estimandum est degeneres populos et ignobiles, et furentes libidine fore procreandos, et ad extremum uniuersam plebem ad deteriora et ignobiliora uergentem, et nouissime nec bello seculari fortem, nec in fide stabilem, et nec honorabilem hominibus, nec Deo esse amabilem uenturam, sicut aliis gentibus Ispaniae et Prouinciae et Burgundionum populis contigit, que sic a Deo recedentes fornicatae sunt, donec iudex talium criminum ultrices penas per ignorantiam legis Dei, et per Sarracenos, uenire et seuire permisit. Unde idem Urbanus in fine superioris capituli distinguendo subiunxit:

C. XI. If the sons of priests are found religious, let them be ordained.

Unless they have been proved to live religiously either in monasteries or among canons.

C. XI. Si religiosi inuenti fuerint filii sacerdotum, ordinentur.

Nisi aut in cenobiis, aut in canonicis religiose probati fuerint conuersari.

C. XII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Alexander II. By apostolic authority we command you that, if you prove the one who was elected by the Church to be worthier than the other and his election to be canonical, supported by our authority you shall consecrate him. For because he is called the son of a priest, if the other virtues converge in him, we do not reject him, but, his merits supporting him, receive him with forbearance. GRATIAN. What is said concerning the sons of priests, however, seems to have been introduced by dispensation of the Church, and what is introduced by dispensation cannot be drawn into the consequence of a rule. Hence Urban [Pope II] writes to Bartholomew, Archbishop of Tours:

C. XII. De eodem.

Item Alexander II. Apostolica uobis auctoritate precipimus, ut si eum, qui ecclesia electus est, digniorem altero esse, canonicamque eius electionem probaueritis, nostra fulti auctoritate consecretis. Nam pro eo, quod filius sacerdotis dicitur, si ceterae uirtutes in eum conueniant, non reicimus, sed suffragantibus meritis conniuendo eum recipimus. Gratian. Hoc autem, quod de filiis sacerdotum dicitur, ex dispensatione ecclesiae introductum uidetur, et quod ex dispensatione introducitur, ad consequentiam regulae trahi non poterit. Unde Urbanus [Papa II.] scribit Bartholomeo Thuronensi Archiepiscopo:

C. XIII. The sons of priests are not prohibited from the episcopate if the other virtues are found in them.

We do not reject the bishop-elect of Le Mans because he is called the son of a priest, if the other virtues converge in him; rather, his merits supporting him, we receive him patiently—not, however, so that this be assumed as a rule for the future, but counsel is being taken for the Church's peril for the present time. GRATIAN. Therefore, when those born of priests are read above to have been promoted to the highest pontificate, they are to be understood as born not of fornication but of lawful marriages, which were permitted to priests everywhere before the prohibition and are proved to be permitted to them in the Eastern Church even to the present day. §1. But that the vice of origin is denied to be imputed to the offspring seems contrary to that sentence, "The children of adulterers are an abomination to the Lord." Yet just as was said above concerning the sons of priests, so this also seems to be understood concerning the children of adulterers: those are said to be an abomination to the Lord to whom their fathers' crimes descend by hereditary succession. Similarly that statement of Urban is to be understood which he writes to Patronus, Bishop of León:

C. XIII. Filii sacerdotum non prohibentur ab episcopatu, si ceterae uirtutes in eis inueniantur.

Cenomanensem electum, pro eo, quod filius sacerdotis dicitur, si ceterae uirtutes in eum conueniant, non reicimus, sed suffragantibus meritis patienter suscipimus: non tamen, ut pro regula in posterum assumatur, sed ad tempus ecclesiae periculo consulitur. Gratian. Cum ergo ex sacerdotibus nati in summos Pontifices supra leguntur esse promoti, non sunt intelligendi de fornicatione, sed de legitimis coniugiis nati, que sacerdotibus ante prohibitionem ubique licita erant, et in orientali ecclesia usque hodie eis licere probatur. §. 1. Quod autem uicium originis semini inputari negatur, uidetur esse contrarium illi sententiae "Adulterorum filii abominatio sunt Domino." Sed sicut supra dictum est de presbiterorum filiis, ita et hoc de filiis adulterorum intelligendum uidetur, ut illi dicantur esse abhominatio Domino, ad quos paterna flagitia hereditaria successione descendunt. Similiter et illud Urbani intelligendum est, quod ipse scribit Patrono Legionensi Episcopo:

C. XIV. Concerning the same.

Because, coming in simplicity to the Apostolic See, you humbly confessed a sin that seemed to impede the office of your pontificate—namely, that you were begotten of an unlawful mother whom your father is known to have known while his own wife was living—we, admonished by the grace of apostolic gentleness, recognizing you to be free from the other crimes that impede the priesthood both by your profession and by the testimony of the brethren who are with you, and hearing that your life is religious, absolve you from the bond of this sin and confirm you in the priestly office received.

C. XIV. De eodem.

Quia simpliciter ad sedem apostolicam ueniens humiliter peccatum confessus es, quod pontificii tui uidebatur offitium inpedire, uidelicet quod ex matre non legitima procreatus sis, quam uiuente propria uxore pater tuus cognouisse cognoscitur, nos apostolicae mansuetudinis gratia admonente a ceteris que sacerdotium inpediunt criminibus tam tui professione quam fratrum testimonio, qui tecum sunt, inmunem te agnoscentes, et uitam tuam religiosam audientes, ab huius te peccati uinculo absolutum in suscepto sacerdotali offitio confirmamus.

Distinction LVII

GRATIAN. Likewise, one who is baptized while placed in sickness ought not to be ordained a priest. Hence in the Council of Neocaesarea [c. 12] it is read:

GRATIANUS. Item, qui in egritudine constitutus baptizatur, presbiter ordinari non debet. Unde in Neocesariensi Concilio [c. 12.] legitur:

C. I. One who is baptized while placed in sickness shall not be ordained a priest.

If anyone has been baptized while placed in sickness, he ought not to be ordained a priest—for his faith is not voluntary but from necessity—unless perhaps afterward his zeal and faith have been approved, or a scarcity of men has required it.

C. I. Non ordinetur presbiter, qui in egritudine constitutus baptizatur.

Si quis in egritudine constitutus baptizatus fuerit, presbiter ordinari non debet, (non enim fides illius uoluntaria sed ex necessitate est), nisi forte postea ipsius studium et fides probabilis fuerit, aut hominum raritas exegerit.

Distinction LVIII

GRATIAN. Likewise, no one shall be assumed from the monastic habit to ecclesiastical office unless he has been offered by the will of his own abbot. Hence Gregory writes [to Marinianus, Bishop of Ravenna, Book VII, epistle 18]:

> GRATIANUS. Item ex monachali habitu nullus assumatur ad ecclesiasticum offitium, nisi fuerit oblatus uoluntate proprii abbatis. Unde Gregorius scribit: [Mariniano Episcopo Rauennati, lib. VII. epist. 18.]

C. I. A monk shall not be ordained a cleric unless he was offered to the bishop by the abbot's will.

No monk shall be brought forth from a monastery to ecclesiastical office unless the abbot of the place, having been admonished, offers him to the bishop by his own will.

> C. I. Monachus non ordinetur clericus, nisi uoluntate abbatis episcopo fuerit oblatus.
> Ad ecclesiasticum uero offitium nullus ex monasterio producatur monachus, nisi quem abbas loci admonitus propria uoluntate obtulerit episcopo.

C. II. Concerning the same.

Likewise from the Fifth Council of Carthage [c. 13]. If anyone wishes either to promote to clerical status one found in another's monastery or to establish him as superior of the monastery in his own monastery, let the bishop who did this, separated from the communion of the others, be content only with the communion of his own people, and let the man continue neither as cleric nor as provost.

> C. II. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi V. [c. 13.] Si quis de alterius monasterio repertum uel ad clericatum promouere uoluerit, uel in suo monasterio maiorem monasterii constituere, episcopus, qui hoc fecerit, a communione ceterorum seiunctus, suae tantummodo plebis communione contentus sit, et ille neque clericus neque prepositus perseueret.

Distinction LIX

GRATIAN. Likewise, those who are not imbued with ecclesiastical disciplines and examined by the testing of time shall not aspire to the highest priesthood.

Hence Pope Zosimus [to Hesychius, Bishop of Salona, epistle I]. [PALEA.

> GRATIANUS. Item qui ecclesiasticis disciplinis inbuti, et temporum approbatione discussi non sunt ad summum sacerdotium non aspirent.
> Unde Zosimus Papa: [ad Hesichium Salonitanum Episcopum, epist. I.] [PALEA.

C. I. One who is not imbued with ecclesiastical disciplines shall not aspire to the highest priesthood.

One who has not been imbued with ecclesiastical disciplines in order and instructed in divine service by the testing of time shall by no means presume to aspire to the highest priesthood of the Church; and not only shall his ambition be held ineffective, but action shall also be taken against his ordainers, so that they lack that order which, contrary to the precepts of the Fathers, they believed was to be presumed without order.]

C. I. Non aspiret ad summum sacerdotium qui ecclesiasticis disciplinis non est inbutus.

Qui ecclesiasticis disciplinis inbutus per ordinem non est et temporum approbatione diuinis stipendiis eruditus, nequaquam ad summum ecclesiae sacerdotium aspirare presumat, et non solum in eo ambitio inefficax habeatur, uerum etiam in ordinatores eius, ut careant eo ordine, quem sine ordine contra precepta Patrum crediderant presumendum.]

C. II. No one shall approach priestly office unless tested through the individual grades.

If secular offices confer the chief place not upon those who have entered the vestibule of activity, but upon those examined through many grades, who is found so arrogant, so shameless, that in the heavenly military service—which is to be weighed more carefully and, like gold, tested by repeated fires—he desires immediately to be a leader when he had not first been a recruit, and wishes to teach before learning? Let him first grow accustomed in the Lord's camp, in the grade of readers, to the rudiments of divine service; nor let it be cheap in his eyes to become in order an exorcist, acolyte, subdeacon, and deacon—not by a leap, but through the periods established for ordination by the elders. Then let such a one approach the summit of the priesthood, so that he both fulfills the name of the age and his prior periods of service bear witness to the merit of his probity. From there he will rightly be able to hope for the place of the supreme pontiff. The excessive laxity of our fellow priests causes this: they seek the display of a multitude and think that some dignity is acquired for themselves from this crowd. Hence a numerous populace of such persons is found indiscriminately even in places where there is solitude, while they desire their parishes to be extended or lavish divine orders upon those to whom they can furnish nothing else. This ought always to be a matter of strict judgment. For everything great is rare.

C. II. Ad sacerdotale offitium nullus, nisi per singulos gradus probatus, accedat.

Si offitia secularia principalem locum non uestibulum actionis ingressis, sed per plurimos gradus examinatis deferunt, quis tam arrogans, tam impudens inuenitur, qui in celesti milicia, que propensius ponderanda est, et sicut aurum repetitis ignibus exploranda, statim dux esse desiderat, cum tiro ante non fuerit, et prius uelit docere quam discere? Assuescat in Domini castris in lectorum primitus gradu diuini rudimenta seruicii, nec illi uile sit exorcistam, acolithum, subdiaconum, diaconum per ordinem fieri, nec hoc saltu, sed statutis maiorum ordinatione temporibus. Iam uero ad presbiterii fastigium talis accedat, ut et nomen etatis inpleat, et meritum probitatis stipendia anteacta testentur. Inde summi pontificis iure locum sperare debebit. Facit hoc nimia remissio consacerdotum nostrorum, qui pompam multitudinis querunt, et putant ex hac turba aliquid sibi dignitatis acquiri. Hinc passim numerosa popularitas etiam in his locis, ubi solitudo est, talium reperitur, dum parrochias extendi cupiunt, aut quibus aliud prestare non possunt diuinos ordines largiuntur. Quod oportet districti semper esse iudicii. Rarum est enim omne quod magnum est.

C. III. A layman of whatever merit shall not aspire to the highest priesthood.

Likewise Gregory [Book VII of the Register, epistle 110]. It is fitting to embrace with no dissimilar detestation what has reached us: that certain men inflamed by desire for honor are tonsured when bishops die and suddenly become priests from laymen, and shamelessly seize the leadership of a religious profession though they have not yet learned even to be soldiers. What do we think—what will these furnish to their subjects, who do not fear to hold the place of governance before they touch the threshold of discipleship? Concerning this matter, it is necessary that, although each one is of blameless merit, he nevertheless first be exercised through the distinct offices of ecclesiastical order.

C. III. Cuiuslibet meriti laicus ad summum non aspiret sacerdotium.

Item Gregorius. [lib. VII. Reg. epist. 110.] Hoc ad nos peruenisse non dissimili dignum est detestacione complecti, quod quidam desiderio honoris inflammati defunctis episcopis tonsurantur, et fiunt repente ex laicis sacerdotes, atque inuerecunde religiosi propositi ducatum arripiunt, qui nec esse adhuc milites didicerunt. Quid putamus, quid isti subiectis prestaturi sunt, qui antequam discipulatus limen attingant tenere locum regiminis non formidant? Qua de re necesse est, ut, quamuis inculpati quisque sit meriti, ante tamen per distincta ecclesiastici ordinis exerceatur offitia.

C. IV. One who is not imbued with ecclesiastical disciplines shall not aspire to the highest priesthood.

Likewise Celestine to the Bishops of Gaul [epistle II, c. 3]. Dearest brothers, we have learned that certain men have been ordained bishops and established at the summit of so great a dignity, contrary to the decrees of the Fathers, though they had held no ecclesiastical orders, by the usurpation of the one who recognizes that he did this, although the episcopate ought to be reached through those grades concerning which caution has very frequently been given, so that those initiated in lesser offices may be strengthened for greater ones. For whoever desires to be a teacher ought first to be a disciple, so that he may be able to teach what he has learned; every training of life strengthens itself by this method toward that for which it strives. One who has by no means applied himself to letters cannot be a teacher of letters. One who has not grown through the individual periods of service cannot attain the order belonging to the merited period of service. Among these things, I ask, is the priesthood alone more worthless? Why is it granted more easily when it is fulfilled with greater difficulty?

C. IV. Non aspiret ad summum sacerdotium qui ecclesiasticis non est inbutus disciplinis.

Item Celestinus Episcopis Galliarum. [epist. II. c. 3.] Ordinatos uero quosdam, fratres karissimi, episcopos, qui nullis ecclesiasticis ordinibus ad tantae dignitatis fastigium fuerint constituti contra Patrum decreta, huius usurpatione, qui se hoc recognoscit fecisse, didicimus, cum ad episcopatum his gradibus, quibus frequentissime cautum est, debeat perueniri, ut minoribus initiati offitiis ad maiora firmentur. Debet enim ante esse discipulus, quisquis doctor esse desiderat, ut possit docere quod didicit: omnis uitae institutio hac, ad id quod tendit, se ratione confirmat. Qui minime litteris operam dederit preceptor esse non potest litterarum. Qui non per singula stipendia creuerit ad meritum ordinem stipendii non potest peruenire. Solum sacerdotium inter ista, rogo, uilius est, cur facilius tribuitur, cum difficilius inpleatur?

Distinction LX

GRATIAN. Behold, it has been shown in part who can be promoted to the order of the priesthood and who cannot. Now it is to be considered from what orders persons are to be chosen as archpriest, provost, bishop, or archbishop. Concerning these it was established as follows in the Council of Pope Urban celebrated in Auvergne:

GRATIANUS. Ecce, ex parte ostensum est, qui possint ad sacerdotii ordinem promoueri, et qui non. Nunc autem considerandum et, ex quibus ordinibus in archipresbiterum, uel prepositum, uel episcopum, uel archiepiscopum sint eligendi. De his ita statutum est in Concilio Urbani Papae celebrato Aluerniae:

C. I. An archpriest, dean, or archdeacon shall be ordained only if a priest or deacon.

Let no bishop presume to institute an archdeacon in his church unless he is a deacon, nor to ordain an archpriest or dean unless they are priests. That this may be held more strictly, we prohibit and forbid it by apostolic authority.

C. I. Archipresbiter, uel decanus, aut archidiaconus non nisi presbiter aut diaconus ordinetur.

Nullus episcopus in ecclesia sua, nisi diaconus sit, archidiaconum instituere, nec archipresbiterum aut decanum, nisi presbiteri sint, ordinare presumat. Quod, ut districtius teneatur, auctoritate apostolica prohibemus et interdicimus.

C. II. No one shall be ordained as provost, archbishop, archpriest, or archdeacon unless a priest or deacon.

Likewise Pope Callistus [II]. Let no one be ordained as provost, no one as archbishop or archpriest, no one as dean, unless he is a priest or deacon; no one as archdeacon unless he is a deacon.

C. II. Nullus in prepositum, uel archiepiscopum, uel archipresbiterum, uel archidiaconum nisi presbiter, uel diaconus ordinetur.

Item Calixtus Papa. [II.] Nullus in prepositum, nullus in archiepiscopum uel archipresbiterum, nullus in decanum nisi presbiter uel diaconus, nullus in archidiaconum nisi diaconus ordinetur.

C. III. Concerning the same.

Likewise Innocent II [in the Roman Council, c. 10]. We renew and command that no one be ordained archdeacon or dean unless he is a deacon or priest.

But archdeacons, deans, or provosts who are below the orders named above, if, being disobedient, they have despised being ordained, shall be deprived of the honor received. We prohibit, moreover, that the aforesaid honors be granted to young men or to those established below sacred orders, but they shall be granted to those who shine by prudence and merit of life. GRATIAN. One of these rules was established because of the forwardness of certain persons who, having obtained the name of a provostship, despise the office and are unwilling to become priests; otherwise, however, it would be empty, since even those established in the subdiaconate can be elected bishop according to that statement of Pope Urban:

C. III. De eodem.

Item Innocentius II. [in Concilio Romano, c. 10.] Innouamus autem et precipimus, ut nullus in archidiaconum uel decanum nisi diaconus uel presbiter ordinetur.

Archidiaconi uero, uel decani, uel prepositi, qui infra ordines prenominatos existunt, si inobedientes ordinari contempserint, honore suscepto priuentur. Prohibemus autem, ne adolescentibus, uel infra sacros ordines constitutis, sed qui prudentia et merito uitae clarescant, predicti concedantur honores. Gratian. Horum unum propter procacitatem quorumdam statutum est, qui nomen prepositurae adepti offitium contempnunt, nolentes fieri sacerdotes; alias autem inane esset, cum etiam in episcopum eligi possint in subdiaconatu constituti, iuxta illud Urbani Papae:

C. IV. No one shall be elected bishop unless established in sacred orders.

Let no one be elected to the episcopate unless he has been found living religiously in sacred orders. By sacred orders, moreover, we mean the diaconate and priesthood, for the primitive Church is read to have had these alone; but because subdeacons also minister at altars, we grant them when necessity requires it, provided that they are of proven religion and knowledge. We do not permit this itself to be done without the knowledge of the Roman Pontiff or metropolitan. GRATIAN. The other rule—that no one be elected bishop or archbishop unless established in sacred orders—was established because of the dignity of the order.

> C. IV. Non eligatur in episcopum nisi in sacris ordinibus constitutus.
> Nullus in episcopatum eligatur, nisi in sacris ordinibus religiose uiuens inuentus fuerit. Sacros autem ordines dicimus diaconatum et presbiteratum. Hos siquidem solos primitiua legitur habuisse ecclesia, subdiacones uero, quia et ipsi altaribus ministrant, oportunitate exigente concedimus, si tamen spectatae sint religionis et scientiae. Quod ipsum non sine Romani Pontificis uel metropolitani scientia fieri permittimus. Gratian. Alterum uero, ut in episcopum uel archiepiscopum nisi in sacris ordinibus constitutus non eligatur, propter dignitatem ordinis statutum est.

Distinction LXI

GRATIAN. Part I. Likewise, laymen are not to be elected bishop, but are first to be tested through the individual orders. Hence Gregory to Brunhild, Queen of the Franks [Book VII of the Register, epistle 113]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Item laici non sunt in episcopum eligendi, sed per singulos ordines prius sunt probandi. Unde Gregorius Brunichildae Reginae Francorum: [lib. VII. Reg. epist. 113.]

C. I. Priests are not to be ordained from laymen.

Priestly office in your regions has, as we have learned, been brought into such canvassing that, what is exceedingly grave, priests are suddenly ordained from laymen.

> C. I. Sacerdotes ex laicis non sunt ordinandi.
> Sacerdotale offitium uestris in partibus in tanta (sicut didicimus) est ambitione perductum, ut sacerdotes, quod nimis graue est subito, ex laicis ordinentur.

C. II. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Hormisdas to all the Bishops [established throughout Spain, epistle III, c. 1]. Care ought to be perspicacious in choosing or ordaining priests. For it is fitting that those who must preside over persons to be corrected be blameless. §1. One to whom the governance of the Church is entrusted ought to show his life by long testing.

> C. II. De eodem.
>
> Item Hormisda Papa omnibus Episcopis. [per Hispaniam constitutis, epist. III. c. 1.] In sacerdotibus eligendis uel ordinandis curam oportet esse perspicuam. Inreprehensibiles enim esse conuenit, quos preesse necesse est corrigendis. §. 1. Longa debet uitam suam probatione monstrare, cui gubernacula committuntur ecclesiae.

[C. III. The same continuously in the same place.]

We do not deny that there are morals pleasing to God among laymen, but the institutes of the faithful seek for themselves tested soldiers. One ought to learn before teaching and to furnish to others from oneself, rather than receive, an example of religious conduct. It is fitting that one who must pray for the people be more corrected than the people. Let religious worship be handed on after long observance, so that he may shine; and let one who is to be instructed serve in clerical services, so that, when brought to the summit of the venerable grade, he may show what is the fruit of humility. §1. Nor do we prohibit only the consecration of laymen; rather, let no profane violator from among penitents even aspire to a grade of this kind. Let it be enough for him when he petitions that pardon is granted. With what conscience can one absolve a guilty person who knows that he confessed his own sins with the people as witness? For who who sees one lying prostrate a little before would venerate him as bishop? Bearing the stain of a memorable crime, he does not possess the shining dignity of the priesthood.

> [C. III. Idem eodem loco continenter.]
> Non negamus in laicis esse Deo placitos mores, sed milites suos probatos sibi querunt instituta fidelium. Discere quis debet antequam doceat, et exemplum religiosae conuersationis de se potius aliis prestare quam sumere. Emendatiorem esse conuenit populo, quem necesse est orare pro populo. Longa obseruatione religiosus cultus tradatur, ut luceat, et clericalibus obsequiis erudiendus inseruiat, ut, ad uenerandi gradus summa perductus, quis sit fructus humilitatis ostendat. §. 1. Nec tantum consecrare de laicis inhibemus, sed ne de penitentibus quidem quisquam ad huiusmodi gradum profanus temerator aspiret. Satis illi sit postulanti ueniam concedi; qua conscientia absoluat reum, qui se peccata sua populo scit teste confessum? Quis enim quem paulo ante iacentem uideat ueneretur antistitem? Perferens memorandi criminis labem non habet lucidam sacerdotii dignitatem.

C. IV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Innocent [to Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, epistle XII]. It is wretched for one who was never a disciple to be made a master, and for one who had never served a priest in any grade to be made high priest.

> C. IV. De eodem.
>
> Item Innocentius Papa. [ad Aurelium Cartaginensem Episcopum, epist. XII.] Miserum est, eum fieri magistrum, qui numquam fuit discipulus; eumque summum sacerdotem fieri, qui in nullo gradu umquam obsecutus fuerat sacerdoti.

C. V. Concerning the same.

Likewise Bishop Leo [to the African Bishops, epistle LXXXV, otherwise LXXXVII, c. 1]. We marvel that, among you, either the presumption of those canvassing or popular tumult has prevailed so greatly by occasion of the disturbed time that the pastoral summit and governance of the Church were entrusted to all manner of unworthy persons established far outside priestly merit. This is not to take counsel for the people, but to harm them; not to furnish governance, but to increase peril. For the integrity of those presiding is the salvation of their subjects, and where obedience is unharmed, there the form of doctrine is sound. §1. But primacy, etc. And below. §2. But if in any grades of the Church care is to be taken providently and knowingly that in the house of the Lord nothing be disordered and nothing inverted, how much more must one labor that there be no error in the election of the one who is established above all grades? For the state and order of the Lord's whole household will totter if what is required in the body is not found in the head. Where is that precept of the blessed Apostle Paul sent forth through the Spirit of God, by which in the person of Timothy the whole number of Christ's priests is instructed and from there it is said to each one of us: "Impose hands hastily upon no one, nor communicate in the sins of others"? What is it to impose hands hastily? etc. And below. §3. For just as one who maintains right judgment in choosing a priest acquires for himself the fruit of a good work, so one who elevates an unworthy man into the college of his own dignity afflicts himself with grave loss. For what is contained in general institutes is not to be passed over in the person of anyone, nor is that honor to be thought lawful which was conferred contrary to the precepts of divine law. §4. Deservedly the venerable sanctions of the blessed Fathers, when they spoke of the election of priests, judged only those fit for sacred administrations whose whole age, from the beginnings of boyhood to more perfect years, had run through the periods of ecclesiastical discipline, so that prior life might furnish testimony for each one, and there can be no doubt concerning the advancement of one to whom the reward of a higher place is owed for many labors, chaste morals, and vigorous acts. §5. For if it is unworthy to attain the honors of the world without the support of time and without the merit of labor, and those whom proofs of probity do not aid are accustomed to be marked for canvassing, how diligent and how prudent must the dispensation of divine gifts and heavenly dignities be?

C. V. De eodem.

Item Leo Episcopus. [ad Episcopos Africanos, epist. LXXXV. al. LXXXVII. c. 1.] Miramur tantum apud uos per occasionem temporis impacati aut ambientium presumptionem aut tumultum ualuisse popularem, ut indignis quibusque et longe extra sacerdotale meritum constitutis pastorale fastigium et gubernatio ecclesiae crederetur. Non est hoc consulere populo, sed nocere, nec prestare regimen sed augere discrimen. Integritas enim presidentium salus est subditorum, et ubi est incolumitas obedientiae, ibi sana est forma doctrinae. §. 1. Principatus autem, etc. et infra. §. 2. Quod si in quibuslibet ecclesiae gradibus prouidenter scienterque curandum est, ut in domo Domini nichil sit inordinatum nichilque preposterum, quanto magis elaborandum est, ut in electione eius, qui supra omnes gradus constituitur, non erretur? Nam totius familiae Domini status et ordo nutabit, si quod requiritur in corpore non inuenitur in capite. Ubi est illa B. Pauli apostoli per Spiritum Dei emissa preceptio? qua in persona Timothei omnium sacerdotum Christi numerus eruditur, et inde unicuique nostrum dicitur: "Manus cito nemini inposueris, neque communices peccatis alienis." Quid est cito manus inponere? etc. et infra. §. 3. Sicut enim boni operis sibi conparat fructum, qui rectum tenet in eligendo sacerdote iudicium, ita graui semetipsum afficit dampno, qui ad suae dignitatis collegium sublimat indignum. Non enim in cuiusquam persona pretermittendum est quod institutis generalibus continetur, nec putandus est honor ille legitimus, qui fuerit contra diuinae legis precepta collatus. §. 4. Merito Patrum beatorum uenerabiles sanctiones, cum de sacerdotum electione loquerentur, eos demum sacris amministrationibus idoneos censuerunt, quorum omnis etas a puerilibus exordiis usque ad perfectiores annos per disciplinae ecclesiasticae stipendia cucurrisset, ut unicuique testimonium prior uita preberet, nec potest de eius prouectione dubitari, cui pro laboribus multis, pro moribus castis, pro actibus strenuis celsioris loci premium debetur. §. 5. Si enim ad honores mundi sine suffragio temporis, sine merito laboris indignum est peruenire, et notari ambitus solent, quos probitatis documenta non adiuuant, quam diligens et quam prudens habenda est dispensatio diuinorum munerum et celestium dignitatum?

C. VI. None are to be chosen for the episcopate except those commended by an approved life.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea [c. 12]. A bishop ought not to be established in the primacy of a church apart from the judgment of the metropolitans and neighboring bishops. Nor shall any be elected except those whom a life long known and approved commends, and likewise if they have been proved in the word of faith and in right reason through their conduct.

> C. VI. Non sunt eligendi ad episcopatum, nisi quos probabilis uita commendat.
> Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 12.] Episcopum non oportet preter iudicium metropolitanorum et finitimorum episcoporum constitui ad ecclesiae principatum. Nec eligantur nisi hi, quos multo ante nota probabilisque uita commendat, et nichilominus si in sermone fidei et recta ratione per suam conuersationem probati fuerint.

C. VII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Celestine to all the orthodox [to the Bishops of Apulia and Calabria, epistle III, c. 2]. What will it profit clerics to have served through the individual periods of service and spent their whole life in the Lord's camp, if those who are to be priests are sought from the laity—persons who, serving the world and knowing nothing of the whole ecclesiastical order, strive with immoderate cupidity to leap across into another's honor by an excessively hasty leap and, with reverence for ecclesiastical discipline trampled, to pass into another kind of life? Therefore, dearest brothers, it is necessary that we oppose such persons, and by these decrees we admonish your fraternity that no one admit a layman to clerical order and permit that to be done by which he both deceives the layman and generates for himself causes by which he is made guilty under the established decretals.

> C. VII. De eodem.
> Item Celestinus omnibus orthodoxis. [ad Episcopos Apuliae et Calabriae, epist. III. cap. 2.] Quid proderit per singula stipendia clericos militasse et omnem egisse in dominicis castris etatem, si hii, qui futuri sunt sacerdotes, ex laicis requirantur, qui uacantes seculo et omnem ecclesiasticum ordinem nescientes saltu prepropero in alienum honorem ambiunt inmoderata cupiditate transscendere, et in aliud uitae genus (calcata reuerentia ecclesiasticae disciplinae) transire? Talibus itaque, fratres karissimi, necesse est obuiemus, hisque fraternitatem uestram decretis commonemus, ne quis laicum ad clericatus ordinem admittat, et sinat fieri unde et illum decipiat, et sibi causas generet, quibus reus constitutorum decretalium fiat.

C. VIII. The governance of the Church is not to be entrusted to the untaught and inexperienced.

Likewise Leo [I, epistle LXXXV, otherwise LXXXVII, c. 1, to the African Bishops]. We establish that apostolic and canonical decrees be violated in no respect, and that the Church of the Lord not be entrusted for governance to those who, ignorant of lawful institutes and knowing nothing of all humility, do not wish to take their increase from the lowest things but to have their beginning from the highest, since it is exceedingly unjust and absurd that the inexperienced be preferred to masters, the new to the ancient, and the untaught to the meritorious. GRATIAN. By all these authorities laymen are prohibited from being elected to the episcopate. Part II. §1. To the contrary, blessed Nicholas was elected bishop from the laity; blessed Severus was assumed from wool-working to the archiepiscopate; blessed Ambrose, when he was not yet baptized, was elected archbishop. §2. But it must be known that ecclesiastical prohibitions have their own causes, and when these cease, the prohibitions themselves also cease. For the cause why a layman should not be elected bishop was this: lay life, not instructed in ecclesiastical disciplines in order, does not know how to furnish others examples of religion that it has not learned in itself by experience. Therefore, when any layman by the merit of his perfection surpasses clerical life, his election can be held valid by the example of blessed Nicholas, Severus, and Ambrose.

C. VIII. Rudibus et inperitis gubernacula ecclesiae non sunt committenda.

Item Leo. [I., epist. LXXXV. al. LXXXVII. c, 1. ad Episcopos Africanos.] Statuimus ne in aliquo apostolica et canonica decreta uiolentur, et his regenda ecclesia Domini credatur, qui legitimarum institucionum nescii, et totius humilitatis ignari, non ab infimis sumere incrementum, sed a summis uolunt habere principium, cum ualde iniquum sit absurdumque, ut inperiti magistris noui antiquis rudes preferantur emeritis. Gratian. His omnibus auctoritatibus laici prohibentur in episcopatum eligi. II. Pars. §. 1. Econtra B. Nicolaus ex laico est electus in episcopum, B. Seuerus ex lanificio assumptus est in archiepiscopum, B. Ambrosius, cum nondum esset baptizatus, in archiepiscopum est electus. §. 2. Sed sciendum est, quod ecclesiasticae prohibitiones proprias habent causas, quibus cessantibus cessant et ipsae. Ut enim laicus in episcopum non eligeretur, hec causa fuit, quia uita laicalis ecclesiasticis disciplinis per ordinem non erudita nescit exempla religionis de se prestare aliis, que in se ipsa experimento non didicit. Cum ergo quilibet laicus merito suae perfectionis clericalem uitam transscendit, exemplo B. Nicolai et Seueri et Ambrosii eius electio potest rata haberi.

[C. IX.] Hence the same Ambrose in the epistle [LXXXII] to the people of Vercelli [says concerning himself]: "A neophyte is prohibited from being ordained, lest he be lifted up by pride. But if the humility fitting for the priesthood is not lacking, where the cause does not adhere, the vice is not imputed. Therefore, the western bishops approved my ordination by judgment, and the eastern bishops also by example."

[C. IX.] Unde idem Ambrosius in epistola [LXXXII.]

ad Vercellenses. [ait de se ipso] "Neophitus prohibetur ordinari, ne extollatur superbia Sed si non deest humilitas competens sacerdotio, ubi causa non adheret, uicium non inputatur. Ordinationem itaque meam occidentales episcopi iudicio, orientales etiam exemplo probarunt."

C. X. A scholasticus from the forum or a man from an administration can be requested as bishop.

Likewise that statement of the Council of Sardica is objected [c. 13]. Bishop Hosius said: And I judge this also necessary, that it be treated most diligently: if perhaps either a rich man or a scholasticus from the forum or a man from an administration has been requested as bishop, let him not be ordained before he has first discharged the function of reader and the office of deacon or priest, and thus let him ascend through the individual grades, if he is worthy, to the summit of the episcopate. Part III. GRATIAN. But it is one thing to be requested, another to be elected. One bound by the obligations of the curia is requested from the emperor; a cleric of another city, from his own bishop. But no one is elected unless established in sacred orders. For an election is made with the solemnity of a decree strengthened by the subscriptions of all; but a request is made by a simple petition. Blessed Gregory indicates this distinction in the Register [Book II, epistle 19], writing to a certain Bishop:

C. X. Scolasticus ex foro aut ex administratione potest postulari episcopus.

Item obicitur illud Sardicensis Concilii: [c. 13.] Osius episcopus dixit: Et hoc necessarium arbitror, ut diligentissime tractetur, si forte aut diues, aut scolasticus de foro aut ex administratore episcopus fuerit postulatus, ut non prius ordinetur, nisi ante lectoris munere, et offitio diaconi aut presbiteri fuerit perfunctus, et ita per singulos gradus (si dignus fuerit) ascendat ad culmen episcopatus. III. Pars. Gratian. Sed aliud est postulari, aliud eligi. Postulatur nexibus curiae adstrictus ab inperatore, clericus alterius ciuitatis a suo episcopo; sed non eligitur aliquis nisi in sacris ordinibus constitutus. Fit enim electio cum solempnitate decreti omnium subscriptionibus roborati: postulatio uero simplici peticione. Quam distinctionem B. Gregorius innuit in registro [lib. II. epist. 19.] scribens cuidam Episcopo:

C. XI. The election of a bishop ought to be made with the solemnity of a decree strengthened by the subscriptions of all.

When the bishop has been requested, let him come to us to be consecrated with the solemnity of a decree strengthened by the subscriptions of all and with the testimony of your Charity's letters. GRATIAN. Thus blessed Ambrose, before receiving baptism, was requested by the emperor, not elected. Part IV. GRATIAN. Likewise, clerics of one church are not to be preferred in an election to those who serve well in their own church. Hence Pope Celestine [to the Bishops of Gaul, epistle II, c. 4]:

C. XI. Electio episcopi debet fieri cum solempnitate decreti omnium subscriptionibus roborati.

Episcopus, dum fuerit postulatus, cum solempnitate decreti omnium subscriptionibus roborati, et dilectionis tuae testimonio litterarum ad nos sacrandus occurrat. Gratian. Sic B. Ambrosius ante susceptum baptisma ab inperatore postulatus, non electus est. IV. Pars. Gratian. Item clerici unius ecclesiae non sunt preferendi in electione his, qui bene militant in propria ecclesia. Unde Celestinus Papa: [ad Episcopos Galliae, epist. II. c. 4.]

C. XII. Foreigners shall not be preferred to those who have merited well in their own churches.

Nor shall outsiders, strangers, and those previously unknown be preferred to those who have merited well in their own churches, to the exclusion of those who worthily receive the testimony of their own citizens.

C. XII. Extranei emeritis in suis ecclesiis non preponantur.

Nec emeritis in suis ecclesiis peregrini et extranei, et qui ante ignorati sunt, ad exclusionem eorum, qui bene ciuium suorum merentur testimonium, preponantur.

C. XIII. Concerning the same.

Likewise [the same epistle, c. 5]. Let no bishop be given to the unwilling. Only then let another be elected from another church, if from the clergy of that city for which a bishop is to be ordained no worthy person—which we do not believe will happen—can be found. For those men must first be rejected, so that some from other churches may deservedly be preferred. Let each person have the fruit of his service in the church in which he has spent his life through all the offices. Let another by no means creep into another's periods of service, nor let one dare to claim for himself the reward owed to another. Let clerics have the faculty of resisting if they see themselves overburdened, and let them not fear to reject one whom they see thrust upon them from the side. For although they do not have a reward as their due, they ought to have free judgment concerning the one who is to rule them.

[PALEA.

C. XIII. De eodem.

Item. [eadem epist. c. 5.] Nullus inuitis detur episcopus. Tunc alter de altera ecclesia eligatur, si de ciuitatis ipsius clero, cuius est episcopus ordinandus, nullus (quod euenire non credimus) dignus poterit reperiri. Primum enim illi reprobandi sunt, ut aliqui de alienis ecclesiis merito preferantur. Habeat unusquisque suae fructum miliciae in ecclesia, in qua suam per omnia offitia transegit etatem. In aliena stipendia minime alter obrepat, nec alii debitam alter audeat sibi uendicare mercedem. Sit facultas clericis renitendi, si se uiderint pregrauari, et quem sibi ingeri ex transuerso uiderint non timeant refutare. Qui etsi non debitum premium, uel liberum de eo, qui eos recturus est, debent habere iudicium.

[PALEA.

C. XIV.

In the ordination of a provost, this principle shall always be considered: that the one be established whom the whole congregation in concord, according to the fear of God, or even a part of the congregation, although small, has chosen by sounder counsel. The one to be ordained shall be chosen by merit of life and wisdom, even if he was last in the order of the congregation. But if even the whole congregation—God forbid—by common counsel chooses a person consenting to its vices, and the vices themselves in any way become known to the bishop to whose diocese that place belongs, or to other neighboring provosts or Christians, let them prohibit the consent of the depraved from prevailing and establish a worthy steward for the house of God.]

C. XIV.

In ordinatione prepositi illa semper consideretur ratio, ut hic constituatur, quem sibi omnis concors congregatio secundum timorem Dei siue etiam pars congregationis (quamuis parua) saniori consilio elegerit. Vitae autem merito et sapientia eligatur qui ordinandus est, etiamsi ultimus fuerit in ordine congregationis. Quod si etiam omnis congregatio uiciis suis (quod absit) consentientem personam pari consilio elegerit, et uicia ipsa aliquatenus in notitiam episcopi, ad cuius diocesin pertinet locus ipse, uel ad alios uicinos prepositos uel Christianos claruerint, prohibeant prauorum preualere consensum, et domui Dei constituant dignum dispensatorem.]

C. XV. Concerning the same.

Likewise Gregory to the citizens of Naples [Book VIII of the Register, epistle 40]. Let it belong to your zeal to provide also another who is suitable, so that, if perhaps Peter, whom you assert was elected by you, does not appear fit for this order, there may be one to whom your election can turn. For it will be a grave reproach to that clergy if, should this man perhaps not be approved, they say that they have no other who ought to be elected.

C. XV. De eodem.

Item Gregorius ciuibus Neapolim. [I. VIII. Reg. epist. 40.] Studii uestri sit, etiam alium, qui aptus sit, prouidere ut, si forte Petrus, quem a uobis electum asseritis, huic ordini non uideatur ydoneus, sit, in quo uestra declinari possit electio. Nam graue cleri illius erit obprobrium, ut, si hic fortasse probatus non fuerit, alium se dicant qui eligi debeat non habere.

C. XVI. Concerning the same.

Likewise Gregory in the Register [Book XI, epistle 16]. A report directed to us disclosed the death of Victor, bishop of the city of Palermo. Therefore we solemnly delegate the work of visitation of the destitute church to your fraternity. And so let your fraternity hasten to go to the aforesaid church and take care by continual exhortations to admonish the clergy and people of that same church that, with partisanship removed, by one and the same consent they should seek to have set over them as priest one who can be found worthy of so great a ministry and is by no means rejected by the venerable canons. §1. We also admonish your fraternity not to permit anyone from another church to be elected unless perhaps among the clerics of that city in which you exercise the office of visitation no one worthy of the episcopate—which we do not believe will happen—can be found. Before all things, you will provide that laypersons of whatever merit of conduct do not presume to aspire, lest they both fail to obtain the effect of their own will and you—God forbid—incur peril to your order. But whatever monasteries are established in that parish, we grant shall be under your care and ordering until its own bishop has been ordained there.

> C. XVI. De eodem.
> Item Gregorius in Registro. [I. XI. epist. 16.] Obitum Victoris Panormitanae ciuitatis antistitis directa relatio patefecit. Quapropter uisitacionis destitutae ecclesiae fraternitati tuae operam solempniter delegamus. Et ideo fraternitas tua ad predictam ecclesiam ire properet et assiduis adhortationibus clerum plebemque eiusdem ecclesiae ammonere festinet, ut, remoto studio, uno eodemque consensu talem preficiendum sibi expetant sacerdotem, qui tanto ministerio ualeat dignus reperiri, et a uenerandis canonibus nullatenus respuatur. §. 1. Commonemus etiam fraternitatem tuam, ut nullum de altera eligi permittas ecclesia, nisi forte inter clericos ipsius ciuitatis, in qua uisitacionis inpendis offitium, nullus ad episcopatum dignus (quod euenire non credimus) poterit inueniri, prouisurus ante omnia, ne ad cuiuslibet conuersationis meritum laicae personae aspirare presumant, ne et illi suae uoluntatis effectum non inueniant et tu in periculum ordinis tui (quod absit) incurras. Monasteria autem, si qua sunt in ipsius constituta parrochia, sub tua cura dispositioneque, quousque illic proprius fuerit ordinatus episcopus, esse concedimus.

C. XVII. Concerning the same.

Likewise Pope Pelagius [II] to Eucarpus, Bishop of Messina. We enjoin upon you the visitation of the church of Catania, whose bishop we learned from a report received from the clergy to have passed from this light. For it is impossible for us to entrust the causes that pertain to the Lord to anyone else in that province, at least in the regions of Syracuse, unless perhaps through you God should now will to choose in the church of Catania such a one concerning whose conscience we can be secure, so that we may remove these labors a little from you. Therefore, let your Charity proceed immediately to the aforesaid church of Catania and, with God's aid, compel and persuade them to elect a man from the clergy who has neither wife nor children nor any crime hostile to the canons; and immediately transmit him to the city of Rome with the decree and the testimony of your report.

> C. XVII. De eodem.
> Item Pelagius Papa [II.] Eucarpo Messanensi Episcopo. Cathenensis ecclesiae uisitacionem tibi iniungimus, cuius episcopum de hac luce transiisse suscepta cleri relatione didicimus. Inpossibile enim est, ut nos in prouincia illa dumtaxat in Siracusanis partibus alii cuilibet causas, que ad Dominum pertinent, committamus, nisi forte talem per te Deus nunc in Cathenensi ecclesia eligere uoluerit, de cuius conscientia possimus esse securi, ut a te labores istos paululum remouere possimus. Mox ergo dilectio tua ad supradictam Cathenensem ecclesiam pergat, et hominem de clero, qui nec uxorem habeat, nec filios, nec crimen aliquod canonibus inimicum, eligi cum Dei auxilio conpellat atque suadeat; et statim eum ad urbem Romam cum decreto et testificatione relationis tuae transmitte.

C. XVIII. One who is elected bishop shall not be guilty of crimes that the sacred law punishes by death.

Likewise Gregory to Bishop Passivus [Book X, epistle 13]. Your fraternity well knows for how long Aprutium has been destitute of pastoral solicitude; there we long sought who ought to be ordained and were by no means able to find anyone. But because Opportunus has been greatly praised to me in his morals, zeal for psalmody, and love of prayer, and is said to lead a religious life in every way, we wish your fraternity to cause him to come to you and to admonish him concerning his soul, so that he may grow in good pursuits. And if no crimes meet him that are to be punished by death according to the rule of sacred law, then he is to be exhorted either to become a monk or to be made a subdeacon by you; and after a little time, if it pleases God, he himself ought to be promoted to pastoral care. GRATIAN. One to whom a visitation is enjoined shall not permit anything concerning the property of that church to be presumed by anyone. Hence Gregory [to Bishop Gaudentius, Book IV, epistle 12]:

C. XVIII. Qui in episcopum eligitur, non sit reus criminum, que sacra lex morte punit.

Item Gregorius Passiuo Episcopo. [lib. X. epist. 13.] Bene nouit fraternitas tua, quam longo tempore Aprutium pastorali sit sollicitudine destitutum; ubi diu quesiuimus, quis ordinari debuisset, et nequaquam potuimus inuenire. Sed quia Opportunus mihi in moribus suis, in psalmodiae studio, in amore orationis ualde laudatus, religiosam uitam omnimodo dicitur agere, hunc uolumus fraternitas uestra ad se faciat uenire, et de anima sua admoneatur, quatenus in bonis studiis crescat. Et si nulla ei crimina, que per legis sacrae regulam morte mulctanda sunt, obuiant, tunc hortandus est, ut uel monachus, uel a uobis subdiaconus fiat; et post aliquantulum temporis, si Deo placuerit, ipse ad pastoralem curam debeat promoueri. Gratian. Cui autem uisitacio iniungitur, nichil de rebus eiusdem ecclesiae a quoquam presumi patiatur. Unde Gregorius: [Gaudentio Episc., I. IV. epist. 12.]

C. XIX. One to whom visitation of a church has been enjoined shall not permit anything concerning its property to be presumed by anyone.

Since Festus, bishop of the church of Capua, passed from this light while situated in the city of Rome, it was our care—which is expended upon all churches—to direct the present writings to your fraternity, so that you may approach as visitor of the church mentioned, yet in such a way that you permit nothing concerning promotions of clerics, revenue, ornaments and ministries, or whatever can belong to the aforesaid place, to be presumed by anyone. Rather, it is fitting that you exhibit all vigilance and caution concerning the clergy and people of that church, so that they ought diligently and devoutly to serve in vigils and ecclesiastical service.

C. XIX. Non patiatur a quoquam presumi de rebus ecclesiae, cui eius uisitatio fuerit iniuncta.

Quoniam Festus Capuanae ecclesiae episcopus in Romana ciuitate positus de hac luce migrauit, curae nobis fuit (que uniuersis ecclesiis inpenditur, fraternitati tuae presentia scripta dirigere, ut memoratae ecclesiae uisitator accedas, sic tamen, ut nichil de prouectionibus clericorum, redditu, ornatu ministeriisque, uel quicquid prefati loci esse poterit, a quoquam presumi patiaris; sed omnem uigilantiam atque cautelam circa clerum plebemque eiusdem ecclesiae exhibere te conuenit, ut in uigiliis obsequioque ecclesiastico sedule ac deuote debeant seruire.

Distinction LXII

GRATIAN. Part I. It has been shown briefly from what orders persons are to be chosen for what grades. Now it is to be seen by whom they are to be chosen and consecrated. Election belongs to the clerics, consent to the people. Hence Pope Leo [to Rusticus, Bishop of Narbonne, epistle XC to XCII, c. 1]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Breuiter monstratum est, ex quibus ordinibus in quos gradus sunt eligendi. Nunc uidendum est, a quibus sunt eligendi et consecrandi. Electio clericorum est, consensus plebis. Unde Leo Papa: [Rustico Narbonensi Episcopo, epist. XC. ad XCII. c. 1.]

C. I. Those who are neither elected by clerics nor sought by the people are not to be held among the bishops.

No reason permits those to be held among the bishops who were neither elected by clerics, nor sought by the people, nor consecrated by the comprovincial bishops with the metropolitan's judgment. Hence, since a question concerning an honor badly received often arises, who doubts that what is not shown to have been conferred cannot be bestowed by these men? But if any clerics were ordained by these pseudo-bishops in their churches, etc.; below, in the cause of the simoniacs [C. 1 q. 1 c. 40].

C. II. The people ought not to go before, but to follow.

Likewise Celestine [Pope to the Bishops of Apulia and Calabria, epistle III, c. 3]. The people are to be taught, not followed; and we also, if they do not know, ought to admonish them what is permitted and what is not permitted, not to furnish assent to them. Whoever has attempted to try prohibited things will feel that the censure of the Apostolic See will by no means be lacking. For the things we do not correct by the authority of admonition alone, it is necessary that we punish through severity consonant with the rules. Therefore, we wish this to become known throughout all churches that lack their own rulers, so that no one perhaps deceive himself with flatteries of some hope. GRATIAN. But unless he has been canonically elected, he ought not to be consecrated. Hence Pope Callistus [II]:

C. I. Non sunt habendi inter episcopos, qui nec a clericis eliguntur, nec a plebibus expetuntur.

Nulla ratio sinit, ut inter episcopos habeantur, qui nec a clericis sunt electi, nec a plebibus expetiti, nec a conprouincialibus episcopis cum metropolitani iudicio consecrati. Unde cum sepe questio de male accepto honore nascitur, quis ambigat nequaquam ab istis esse tribuendum quod nec docetur fuisse collatum? Si qui autem clerici ab istis pseudoepiscopis in eorum ecclesiis ordinati sunt, etc. infra causa simoniacorum. [C. 1. q. 1. c. 40.] C. II. Populus non debet preire, sed subsequi. Item Celestinus. [Papa ad Episcopos Apuliae et Calabriae, epist. III. c. 3.] Docendus est populus, non sequendus, nos quoque, si nesciunt, eos quid liceat quidue non liceat commonere, non his consensum prebere debemus. Quisquis conatus fuerit temptare prohibita, sentiet censuram sedis apostolicae minime defuturam. Que enim sola ammonitionis auctoritate non corrigimus, necesse est, per seueritatem congruentem regulis uindicemus. Per totas ergo hoc, que propriis rectoribus carent, ecclesias uolumus innotescat, ut nullus sibi aliqua spe forsitan blandiciis illudat. Gratian. Nisi autem canonice electus fuerit, consecrari non debet. Unde Calixtus Papa: [II.]

C. III. No one is to be consecrated as bishop unless canonically elected.

Let no one consecrate as bishop anyone who has not been canonically elected. But if this has been presumed, both the one consecrating and the one consecrated are to be deposed without hope of restoration.

> C. III. Non consecretur in episcopum nisi canonice electus.
> Nullus in episcopum nisi canonice electum consecret. Quod si presumtum fuerit, et consecrans, et consecratus absque recuperationis spe deponatur.

Distinction LXIII

GRATIAN. Part I. Laymen, however, ought in no way to insert themselves into an election. Hence Pope Adrian, [in the Eighth Synod celebrated at Constantinople under him, c. 22]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Laici uero nullo modo se debent inserere electioni. Unde Adrianus Papa: [in VIII. Sinodo Constantinopoli sub ipso celebrata c. 22.]

C. I. Laymen are not to insert themselves into the election of pontiffs.

Let no one among lay princes or powerful men insert himself into the election or promotion of a patriarch, metropolitan, or any bishop, lest, namely, a disorderly and incongruous confusion or contention arise, especially since it is fitting that no one among those possessing power or the other laymen have any power in such matters. And below: Whoever among secular princes or powerful men, or whatever layman of another dignity, shall attempt to act against the common, concordant, and canonical election of the ecclesiastical order, let him be anathema until he obeys and consents to whatever the Church has shown itself to will concerning the ordination and election of its own prelate.

> C. I. Laici electioni pontificum se ipsos non inserant.
> Nullus laicorum principum uel potentum semet inserat electioni uel promotioni patriarchae, metropolitae, uel cuiuslibet episcopi, ne uidelicet inordinata et incongrua fiat confusio uel contentio, presertim cum nullam in talibus potestatem quemquam potestatiuorum uel cetero laicorum habere conueniat. Et infra: Quisquis secularium principum uel potentum, uel alterius dignitatis laicus aduersus communem ac consonantem atque canonicam electionem ecclesiastici ordinis agere temptauerit, anathema sit, donec obediat et consentiat, quicquid ecclesia de ordinatione atque electione proprii presulis se uelle monstrauerit.

C. II. On the same.

Likewise from the Eighth Synod, [action I]. Pope Adrian II—according to what Nicholas his predecessor had arranged—sent his envoys, namely Donatus, Bishop of Ostia, Stephen, Bishop of Nepi, and Marinus, deacon of the holy Roman Church, to Emperor Basil and his sons, the Augusti Constantine and Leo, at Constantinople. Anastasius, librarian of the Roman see, skilled in both languages, namely Greek and Latin, also went with them. When a synod had been assembled—which those meeting there called the eighth universal synod—they quieted the schism that had arisen over the deposition of Ignatius and the ordination of Photius, anathematizing Photius and restoring Ignatius. In it the following was enacted: In agreement with the earlier councils, this holy and universal synod has defined, enacted, and promulgated by law that the consecrations and promotions of bishops are to be made by the election and decree of the clergy and by the college of bishops, and that no one among lay princes or powerful men is to insert himself into the election or promotion of a patriarch, metropolitan, or any bishop, lest, namely, disorderly and incongruous contention or confusion arise from this, especially since it is fitting that no one among those possessing power or the other laymen have any power in such matters, but that he remain silent and attend to his own affairs until the election of the future pontiff duly receives its completion from the college of the Church. But if one of the laymen is invited by the Church to take counsel and cooperate, it is permissible for such a man, with reverence, to comply with those inviting him, if he should wish. For in this way he duly promotes a worthy pastor for himself, unto his own salvation and that of the Church.

> Item ex VIII. Sinodo. [actione I.] Adrianus Papa secundus (quod Nicolaus decessor eius disposuerat) missos suos, Donatum scilicet Hostiensem episcopum, et Stephanum Nephesinum episcopum, et Marinum diaconem sanctae Romanae ecclesiae, ad Basilium inperatorem et ad filios eius Constantinum et Leonem Augustos Constantinopolim direxit, cum quibus et Anastasius bibliothecarius Romanae sedis, utriusque linguae, graecae scilicet et latinae, peritus, perrexit, et sinodo congregata (quam octauam uniuersalem sinodum illuc conuenientes appellauerunt) exortum scisma de Ignatii depositione et Fotii ordinatione sedauerunt, Fotium anathematizantes et Ignatium restituentes. In qua sic statutum est: Consecrationes et promotiones episcoporum, concordans prioribus conciliis, clericorum electione ac decreto et episcoporum collegio fieri hec sancta et uniuersalis sinodus diffiniuit et statuit atque iure promulgauit, neminem laicorum principum uel potentum semet inserere electioni uel promotioni patriarchae, uel metropolitani, aut cuiuslibet episcopi, ne uidelicet inordinata et incongrua hinc fiat contentio uel confusio, presertim cum nullam in talibus potestatem quemquam potestatiuorum uel laicorum ceterorum habere conueniat, sed silere et attendere sibi, usquequo regulariter a collegio ecclesiae suscipiat finem electio futuri pontificis. Si uero quis laicorum ad concertandum et cooperandum inuitatur ab ecclesia, licet huiusmodi cum reuerentia, si forte uoluerit, obtemperare se asciscentibus. Taliter enim dignum pastorem sibi regulariter ad suam et ecclesiae salutem promouet.

C. III. The emperor ought not to take part in the election of bishops.

Likewise from the Tripartite History, [book VII, c. 8]. When Emperor Valentinian came from the East to the western regions—as the ecclesiastical history relates—Auxentius having died, the teacher of Arian perfidy who had ravaged the church of Milan like a wolf, and when he wished, by God's ordering, that a catholic bishop be consecrated there, he summoned the bishops and addressed them as follows: "You who are learned in the divine utterances know plainly what sort of man a pontiff ought to be, and that it befits him to govern his subjects not by word alone but also by his manner of life, to show himself an imitator of every virtue, and to have a good manner of life as the witness of his teaching. Therefore establish such a man in the pontifical see, one to whom even we, who govern the empire, may sincerely submit our heads and whose admonitions, whenever we sin as men, we may necessarily receive as the medicines of one who heals." When the emperor had said these things, the synod asked that he himself, rather, make the determination, since he was wise and pious. But he said: "Such an election is above us. For you, who have obtained divine grace and shine with that splendor, will be better able to elect." Then the priests, going out from the episcopal residence, deliberated. § 1. But when, by divine ordering, Ambrose, though not yet baptized, had been elected, the exultant emperor said: "I give thanks to you, almighty Lord and our Savior, because I had entrusted bodies to this man, but you have entrusted souls, and you have shown my judgment to accord with your justice." And when Saint Ambrose was grieved at what had happened—as he himself wrote in his letters—the emperor strengthened him and said: "Do not fear, because the God who elected you will always help you, and I shall always be your helper and defender, as befits my rank."

C. III. Electioni episcoporum inperator interesse non debet.

Item ex Istoria tripartita. [lib. VII. c. 8.] Valentinianus inperator ueniens ab oriente ad esperias partes (ut refert istoria ecclesiastica) mortuo Auxentio, Arrianae perfidiae magistro, qui Mediolanensem ecclesiam ut lupus dilaniauerat, cum uellet catholicum, Deo ordinante, ibi consecrari episcopum, euocans episcopos hec eis locutus est: Nostis aperte, eruditi diuinis eloquiis, qualem oporteat esse pontificem, et quia non decet eum uerbo solo, sed etiam conuersacione gubernare subiectos, et totius semetipsum imitatorem uirtutis ostendere, testemque doctrinae conuersacionem bonam habere. Talem itaque in pontificali constituite sede, cui et nos, qui gubernamus inperium, sincere nostra capita submittamus et eius monita, dum tanquam homines delinquimus necessario ueluti curantis medicamina suscipiamus. Hec autem, cum dixisset inperator, petiit sinodus, ut magis ipse discerneret sapiens et pius existens. At ille, supra nos, inquit, est talis electio. Vos enim diuina gratia potiti et illo splendore fulgentes, melius poteritis eligere. Tunc sacerdotes egressi de episcopali sede tractabant. §. 1. Cum autem ordinatione diuina Ambrosius nondum baptizatus electus fuisset, exultans inperator ait: Gratias tibi ago Domine omnipotens et saluator noster, quoniam huic uiro ego commiseram corpora, tu autem animas, et meam sentenciam ostendisti tuae iustitiae conuenire. Cumque sanctus Ambrosius contristaretur de hoc, quod acciderat, (ut idem ipse in suis epistolis scripsit), confortauit eum inperator et ait: Noli timere, quia et Deus, qui te elegit, semper adiuuabit te, et ego adiutor et defensor tuus (ut meum ordinem decet) semper existam.

C. IV. A bishop is to be elected by apostolic authority, not by royal favor.

Likewise Pope Nicholas [I] to King Lothar. Moreover, know that it has been reported to us that you permit no one who is to be promoted to the episcopate in your kingdom to be elected unless he favors you. Therefore, by apostolic authority and under adjuration of the divine judgment, we enjoin you not to permit anyone to be elected in the city of Trier or in Cologne before a report about this is made to our apostolate.

C. IV. Apostolica auctoritate, non regio fauore episcopus est eligendus.

Item Nicolaus Papa [I.] Lothario Regi. Porro scias, quia relatum est nobis, quod, quicumque ad episcopatum in regno tuo prouehendus est, non nisi fauentem tibi permittas eligi. Idcirco apostolica auctoritate sub diuini iudicii obtestacione iniungimus tibi, ut in Treuerensi urbe et in Agrippina Colonia nullum eligi patiaris, antequam relatum super hoc nostro apostolatui fiat.

C. V. One who attains the summit of the episcopal honor by royal appointment is not to be received by the comprovincial bishops.

Likewise from the Council of Paris, [I, c. 8]. If anyone, with excessive temerity, shall presume to seize the summit of this honor through royal appointment, let him in no way deserve to be received by the bishops of that place's province, who recognize that he was unduly appointed. If any one of the comprovincial bishops shall presume to receive him contrary to the prohibitions, let him be separated from all the brothers and removed from the charity of them all.

C. V. Non recipiatur a conprouincialibus qui regia ordinatione episcopale culmen adipiscitur.

Item ex Concilio Parisiensi. [I. cap. 8.] Si per ordinationem regiam honoris istius culmen peruadere aliquis nimia temeritate presumpserit, a conprouincialibus ipsius loci episcopis recipi nullatenus mereatur, quem indebite ordinatum agnoscunt. Si quis de conprouincialibus recipere eum contra interdicta presumpserit, sit a fratribus omnibus segregatus et ab ipsorum omnium karitate submotus.

C. VI. On the same.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea, [c. 13]. The crowds are not to be permitted to conduct the election of those who are to be promoted to the priesthood.

C. VI. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 13] Non est permittendum turbis electionem eorum facere, qui sunt ad sacerdotium promouendi.

C. VII. The election of a bishop or priest made by princes is to be void.

Likewise from the second action of the Sixth Synod of 350 bishops, [c. 3]. Every election of a bishop, priest, or deacon made by princes is to remain void according to the rule which says: "If any bishop, making use of secular powers, shall obtain churches through them, let him be deposed and separated, together with all who communicate with him."

C. VII. Irrita sit electio episcopi aut presbiteri a principibus facta.

Item ex secunda actione VI. sinodi CCCL. Episcoporum, [c. 3.] Omnis electio episcopi, uel presbiteri, aut diaconi a principibus facta irrita maneat secundum regulam, que dicit: "Si quis episcopus, secularibus potestatibus usus, ecclesias per ipsas obtinuerit, deponatur, et segregetur omnesque, qui illi communicant."

C. VIII. Those who are to be promoted to the clergy are not to be elected by the people.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 1]. It is not permissible for the people to make the election of those who are promoted to the priesthood, but let it rest in the judgment of the bishops, so that they themselves may test whether the man is instructed in discourse, faith, and spiritual life. GRATIAN. By all these authorities laymen are excluded from the election of priests, and the necessity of obeying is enjoined upon them, not the liberty of commanding. Part II. To the contrary, however, Blessed Gregory writes to John, Bishop of First Justiniana in Illyricum, [book IV, epistle 15]:

C. VIII. Non eligantur a populo, qui sunt promouendi ad clerum.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 1.] Non liceat populo facere electionem eorum, qui ad sacerdotium promouentur, sed in iudicio episcoporum sit, ut ipsi eum probent, si in sermone et fide et spirituali uita edoctus sit. Gratian. His omnibus auctoritatibus laici excluduntur ab electione sacerdotum, atque iniungitur eis necessitas obediendi, non libertas inperandi. II. Pars. Econtra uero scribet B. Gregorius Iohanni Episcopo primae Iustinianae Iliricae: [lib. IV. epist. 15.]

C. IX. The will of the prince is desired in the ordination of a pontiff.

Since, therefore, the report received from the brothers and fellow bishops declares that, by the united consent of the entire council and the will of the most serene prince, you have been summoned to the station of the priesthood, we have rendered thanks to our Savior with great exultation. We too consent in all things to the person of your fraternity, and we beseech almighty God that, just as his grace has elected your charity, so he may guard it in all things by his protection.

C. IX. Voluntas principis in ordinatione pontificis desideratur.

Quia igitur suscepta fratrum atque coepiscoporum relatio ad locum uos sacerdotii totius concilii unito consensu et serenissimi principis uoluntate declarat accersiri, gratias saluatori nostro magna cum exultatione retulimus. Nos quoque in persona fraternitatis tuae per omnia consentimus, atque omnipotentem Dominum deprecamur, ut karitatem uestram sicut sua gratia elegit, ita in omnibus sua protectione custodiat.

C. X. The clergy and people are to take part in the election of a pontiff.

Likewise Gregory to John the Subdeacon, [book II, indiction 11, epistle 30]. Inasmuch as it is established that the apostolic see is set above all churches in authority, so, among our manifold cares, we are also greatly concerned about that place where our judgment is awaited for the consecration of a bishop. Therefore, upon the death of Laurence, Bishop of Milan, the clergy made known to us by their report that they had unanimously consented to the election of our son Constantius, their deacon. But because that report was not subscribed, lest we omit anything that pertains to caution, it is therefore necessary for you, supported by the authority of this precept, to proceed to Genoa. And because many of the Milanese dwell there, driven by barbarian savagery, you must summon them all together and examine their wishes. And if no diversity separates them from unity in the election—if indeed you learn that the wishes and consent of all persist in favor of our aforesaid son Constantius—then, with the Lord's aid, you are to cause him to be consecrated by his own bishops, as the custom of antiquity requires, with the assent of our authority, so that, this custom having been preserved, both the apostolic see may retain its proper vigor and may not diminish rights granted by it to others.

C. X. Clerus et populus pontificis electioni intersit.

Item Gregorius Iohanni Subdiacono. [lib. II. Indict. 11. epist. 30.] Quanto apostolica sedes auctoritate cunctis prelata constat ecclesiis, tanto inter multiplices curas et illa nos ualde sollicitat, ubi ad consecrandum antistitem nostrum spectatur arbitrium. Defuncto igitur Laurentio, Mediolanensi episcopo, sua nobis relatione clerus innotuit, in electione se filii nostri Constancii, diaconi sui, unanimiter consensisse. Sed quoniam eadem non fuit subscripta relatio, ne quid, quod ad cautelam pertinet, omittamus, idcirco huius precepti auctoritate suffultum Genuam te proficisci necesse est. Et quia illic multi Mediolanensium coacti barbarica feritate consistunt, eorum te uoluntates oportet eis in commune conuocatis perscrutari. Et si nulla eos diuersitas ab electionis unitate disterminat, siquidem in predicto filio nostro Constancio omnium uoluntates atque consensum perdurare cognoscis, tunc eum a propriis episcopis, sicut antiquitatis mos exigit, cum nostrae auctoritatis assensu, solatiante Domino, facias consecrari, quatinus huiusmodi seruata consuetudine et apostolica sedes proprium uigorem retineat, et a se concessa aliis iura non minuat.

C. XI. The people ought to be present in the election of a bishop.

Likewise Pope Gelasius to Bishops Philip and Gerontius. By a petition presented to us, the people of Dictrensis lamented that they had long been scattered without the governance of a ruler of their own. And, as is asserted, the man said already to have been approved by us is now thought to have been elected by a few persons of little standing, although it pertains to us to compel everyone by repeated admonition that they consent as one to whomever they see to be worthy of the priesthood and without any reproach. And therefore, dearest brothers, you must repeatedly summon priests and deacons from all the parishes of the aforesaid place and the whole multitude, so that, not according as it has pleased each person, but with concordant minds, and with your admonition, they may seek for themselves, solely with regard for the divinity, such a person as no opposition can recall from the prescribed statutes.

> C. XI. In electione episcopi populus debet adesse.
> Item Gelasius papa Philippo et Gerontio Episcopis. Plebs Dictrensis data nobis peticione defleuit, diu se sine rectoris proprii gubernatione dispergi. Ac, sicut asseritur, is qui a nobis iam probatus dicitur, a paucis et tenuibus iam putatur electus, cum ad nos pertineat, uniuersos assidua admonitione compellere, ut omnes in unum, quem dignum sacerdotio uiderint et sine aliqua reprehensione, consentiant. Et ideo, fratres karissimi, diuersos ex omnibus sepe dicti loci parrochiis presbiteros, diaconos et uniuersam turbam uos oportet sepius conuocare, quatinus non prout cuilibet libuerit, sed concordantibus animis talem, uobis ammonentibus, sibi querant sola diuinitatis attentione personam, quam nulla contrarietas a constitutis possit reuocare prescriptis.

C. XII. On the same.

Likewise Stephen, Bishop, servant of the servants of God, to Romanus, Archbishop of Ravenna. We wish your fraternity to know that it has reached our ears that the Bishop of Imola has departed from this light; and we have heard that division among the people has arisen in the election of his successor. Since this often happens, as individual men seek the things that are their own, not those of Jesus Christ, we do not greatly marvel at it. Nevertheless, your solicitude must be applied especially to this, that, when the clergy and people have been summoned, such a man may be elected there through God's mercy as is not opposed by the sacred canons. For the election belongs to the priests, and the consent of the faithful people is to be applied, because the people are to be taught, not followed.

> C. XII. De eodem.
> Item Stephanus Episcopus seruus seruorum Dei, Romano Archiepiscopo Rauennati. Nosse tuam fraternitatem uolumus, ad nostras aures fore peruentum, Immolensem episcopum ab hac luce migrasse; in cuius successoris electione populi diuisionem prouenisse audiuimus. Quod quia sepe contingere solet, querentibus singulis que sua sunt, non que Iesu Christi, non adeo miramur. Verumtamen in hoc plurimum oportet tuam adhiberi sollicitudinem, ut conuocato clero et populo talis ibi eligatur per Dei misericordiam, cui sacri non obuient canones. Sacerdotum quippe est electio, et fidelis populi consensus adhibendus est; quia docendus est populus, non sequendus.

C. XIII. On the same.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to John, Archbishop of Ravenna. Do not consecrate bishops throughout Emilia except after the election of the clergy and people.

> C. XIII. De eodem.
> Item Nicolaus papa Iohanni Rauennati Archiepiscopo. Episcopos per Emiliam non consecres, nisi post electionem cleri et populi.

C. XIV. On the same.

Likewise Pope Pelagius to Tullianus, Bishop of Grumentum. We have received the letters of your charity, by which you signify that Latinus your deacon is requested for the episcopate of the church of Marcelliana by the clergy and all who assemble there. Therefore we say this: if all elect him, and you are willing to grant him, know that it is pleasing to us; and, if he can, let him hasten to arrive before the holy day, so that on the very Saturday of the great night, after the baptism, he may, with God's grace, be ordained.

> C. XIV. De eodem.
> Item Pelagius Papa Tulliano Episcopo Grumentino. Litteras karitatis tuae suscepimus, quibus significas, Latinum diaconum tuum ad episcopatum ecclesiae Marcellianensis a clero et omnibus, qui illic conueniunt, postulari. Hoc itaque dicimus, ut si eum omnes eligunt, et uis eum concedere, gratum nobis esse cognosce; et si potest, ante diem sanctum festinet occurrere, ut uel sabato ipso noctis magnae post baptismum cum Dei gratia ualeat ordinari.

C. XV. The prince's rescript is necessary for those to be ordained.

The same to Laurence, Bishop of Centumcellae. By an official report of the most devoted soldiers who are stationed there in the city of Centumcellae, sent to us, they make known that they have obtained a rescript of the most clement prince, which commanded that a priest, deacon, and subdeacon be made for them. Therefore we exhort your affection to see the persons themselves and inquire diligently lest they have committed anything against the canons; and if you find them blameless and see that the testimony concerning their life is praiseworthy, when the middle week of Easter comes—if the Lord wills and if we live—do not delay in promoting each one through the offices that we have foretold.

> C. XV. Sacra principis ordinandis est necessaria.
> Idem Laurentio Episcopo Centumcelensi. Principali deuotissimorum militum, qui illic in ciuitate Centumcelensi consistunt, relatione ad nos directa, sacram insinuant se clementissimi principis inpetrasse, que eis presbiterum, diaconum et subdiaconum fieri debere precepit. Ideo hortamur dilectionem tuam, ut personas ipsas uideas, et diligenter requiras, ne aliquid contra canones commisissent; et si eos inculpabiles repereris, et uitae ipsorum testimonium laudabile uideris, ueniente mediana ebdomada pascae, (si Dominus uoluerit, et si uixerimus) unumquemque per offitia, que prediximus promouere non differas.

C. XVI. The Pope asks the Augusti that they deign to grant the church of Rieti to a certain elected man.

Likewise Leo IV to the Augusti Lothar and Louis. The church of Rieti, which has remained destitute of pastoral care through the span of so many years, deserves to be raised up by the arm of your greatness and protected by the covering of governance. Hence, after first addressing you with a greeting, we beseech your clemency that you deign to grant that church to the humble deacon Colonus to govern, so that, your permission having been received, we may be able, with God's help, to consecrate him bishop there. But if you do not wish him to be appointed bishop in the aforesaid church, may your serenity deign to grant him the church of Ascoli, which remains widowed, so that, having been consecrated by our pontificate, he may be able to render thanks to almighty God and to your empire.

C. XVI. Papa rogat Augustos, ut Reatinam ecclesiam cuidam electo dignentur concedere.

Item Leo IV. Lothario et Lodeuico Augustis. Reatina ecclesia, que per tot annorum spatia pastoralibus curis destituta consistit, dignum est, ut brachio amplitudinis uestrae subleuetur, ac gubernationis tegmine protegatur. Unde salutationis alloquio premisso uestram mansuetudinem deprecamur, quatinus Colono humili diacono eandem ad regendum ecclesiam concedere dignemini, ut, uestra licentia accepta, ibidem eum Deo iuuante consecrare ualeamus episcopum. Si autem in predicta ecclesia nolueritis ut preficiatur episcopus Ausculanam ecclesiam, que uiduata existit, illi uestra serenitas dignetur concedere, ut consecratus a nostro presulatu Deo omnipotenti uestroque inperio grates peragere ualeat.

C. XVII. By the king's precept Colonus is ordained bishop of the church of Rieti by the Apostolic Lord.

Likewise to Countess Rita. The lord emperor and empress directed to us by their letters that we ought to make Colonus bishop in the church of Rieti, which had appeared destitute of the office of a pastor for a long time already, as indeed we have done.

C. XVII. Regis precepto ab Apostolico Colonus Reatinae ecclesiae ordinatur episcopus.

Item Ritae Comitissae. Nobis dominus inperator et inperatrix per suas epistolas direxerunt, ut Colonum in Reatina ecclesia, que pastoris offitio per longa iam tempora destituta uidebatur, episcopum facere deberemus, sicut et fecimus.

C. XVIII. The emperor's letter is desired in the confirmation of an election.

Likewise Stephen to Count Guido. Having read the writings of your sagacity, which declared that, upon the death of the bishop of the church of Rieti, its clergy and people had elected their future bishop and that through your solicitude he had been sent to us to be consecrated, lest that church remain long without its own pastor, we—grieving at the death of his predecessor—have for the present omitted to ordain the elected man so very quickly, notwithstanding the unanimity and canonical election of that church, as you commanded, because he brought us no imperial letter of release, as is customary. This matter is, of course, doubtful to us; therefore we deferred obeying your will in this, lest the imperial mind take it most harshly in any way. But knowing that the church of the Lord ought not to remain long without its own pastor, we command your glory—since we ought not to have acted otherwise—that your solicitude obtain imperial permission, as ancient custom dictates, and that an imperial letter be directed to us, in the manner we believe you know. Then we shall obey your will in this and, with the Lord's help, shall consecrate that elected man. Dearest son, may you in no way receive this with displeasure.

C. XVIII. Inperatoris epistola in electionis confirmatione desideratur.

Item Stephanus Guidoni Comiti. Lectis sagacitatis uestrae apicibus, que defuncto ecclesiae Reatinae antistite clerum et plebem eiusdem elegisse futurum sibi antistitem, nobis consecrandum uestro studio directum esse, ne ipsa ecclesia diu sine proprio constet pastore, fatebantur; nos, de obitu prioris dolentes, nunc ipsum electum unanimitate et canonica ipsius ecclesiae electione, ut mandastis, tam citissime ordinare omisimus, quod inperialem nobis, ut mos est, absolutionis minime detulerit epistolam. Pro qua scilicet re ambiguum nobis est; ideo uoluntati uestrae in hoc parere distulimus, ne augustalis animus durissime quocumque modo perciperet. Sed scientes, ecclesiam Domini sine proprio pastore diu non debere consistere, gloriae uestrae mandamus, quoniam nos aliter agere non debuimus, ut uestra sollertia inperiali (ut prisca consuetudo dictat) percepta licentia, et nobis, quemadmodum uos scire credimus, inperatoria directa epistola, tunc uoluntati uestrae parebimus de hoc, eundemque electum Domino adiuuante consecrabimus; quod, karissime fili, moleste nullo modo suscipiatis.

C. XIX. A metropolitan is to be ordained by the will of the clergy and citizens.

Likewise Pope Leo [I, to Anastasius, Bishop of Thessalonica, epistle LXXXII, otherwise LXXXIV, c. 6]. When a metropolitan has died and another is to be substituted in his place, the bishops of the province ought to assemble at the metropolitan city, so that, after the will of all the clergy and citizens has been examined, the best man among the priests or deacons of that church may be ordained.

C. XIX. Clericorum et ciuium uoluntate metropolitanus est ordinandus.

Item Leo papa [I. ad Anastasium Thessalonicensem Episcopum, epist. LXXXII. al. LXXXIV. c. 6.] Metropolitano defuncto, cum in loco eius alius fuerit subrogandus, prouinciales episcopi ad ciuitatem metropolim conuenire debent, ut omnium clericorum atque ciuium uoluntate discussa ex presbiteris eiusdem ecclesiae uel ex diaconibus optimus ordinetur.

C. XX. The election of an archpriest is to be made with the clergy and people.

Likewise Isidore in the book On Offices. If archpriests in the parishes have died or have been expelled from there for some offense, let the archdeacon proceed there as quickly as possible and conduct an election with the clerics and people of that parish, so that a worthy pastor may be established for the house of God and, while he is being ordained, that parish may be guarded by the archdeacon's providence.

C. XX. Cum clero et populo archipresbiteri fiat electio.

Item Ysidorus in libro Offitiorum. Si in plebibus archipresbiteri obierint aut pro aliquo reatu exinde eiecti fuerint archidiaconus quantocius proficiscatur illuc, et cum clericis et populis ipsius plebis electionem faciat, quatinus dignus pastor domui Dei constituatur, et, dum ordinatur, eius prouidentia ipsa plebs custodiatur.

C. XXI. One elected as Roman Pontiff is not to be ordained unless the decree concerning him is first presented to the emperor.

Likewise from the deeds of the Roman Pontiffs. Agatho, a Sicilian by nation—during whose legation John, Bishop of Porto, celebrated public masses in Latin on the Sunday within the octave of Easter in the church of Saint Sophia before the prince and patriarch—received, according to his petition, an imperial rescript by which the sum customarily given for effecting a pontiff's ordination was remitted, yet on this condition: that if, after his passing, an election should happen to be made, the man elected ought not to be ordained unless the general decree were first brought into the royal city according to ancient custom, so that the ordination ought to prosper with their knowledge and command. § 1. Likewise Vitalian, a native of Segni, sent his representatives with a synodical letter, according to custom, to the most pious princes in the royal city, giving notice of his ordination.

C. XXI. Electus in Romanum pontificem non ordinetur, nisi eius decretum inperatori primum representetur.

Item ex gestis Romanorum Pontificum. Agatho natione Siculus, cuius legatione fungens Iohannes episcopus Portuensis dominico die octaua pascae in ecclesia S. Sophiae publicas missas coram principe et patriarcha latine celebrauit, hic suscepit diualem secundum suam postulationem, per quam reuelata est quantitas, que solita erat dari pro ordinatione pontificis facienda, sic tamen, ut, si contigerit post eius transitum electionem fieri, non debeat ordinari qui electus fuerit, nisi prius decretum generale introducatur in regiam urbem secundum antiquam consuetudinem, ut cum eorum conscientia et iussione debeat ordinatio prosperari. §. 1. Item Vitalianus natione Signensis direxit responsales suos cum sinodica iuxta consuetudinem in regiam urbem apud piissimos principes, significans de ordinatione sua.

C. XXII. The emperor has the right to elect the pontiff.

Likewise from the Ecclesiastical History. Pope Adrian asked King Charles to come to Rome to defend the possessions of the Church. Charles, coming to Rome, besieged Pavia, and, leaving his army there, was honorably received by Pope Adrian at Rome on the holy Resurrection. After the holy Resurrection he returned to Pavia and captured King Desiderius; then, returning to Rome, he convened a synod there with Pope Adrian in the Lateran patriarchium, in the church of the Holy Savior, which synod was celebrated by 153 religious bishops and abbots. Pope Adrian and the entire synod handed over to Charles the right and power to elect the Pontiff and to ordain the apostolic see. They also granted him the dignity of the patriciate. Furthermore, the synod determined that the archbishops and bishops throughout the individual provinces were to receive investiture from him, and that no bishop was to be consecrated by anyone unless approved and invested by the king; and it bound with the bond of anathema whoever should be against this decree and commanded that, unless he came to his senses, his goods be confiscated.

C. XXII. Inperator ius habet eligendi pontificem.

Item ex Historia ecclesiastica. Adrianus Papa Romam uenire Karolum regem ad defendendas res ecclesiae postulauit. Karolus uero Romam ueniens Papiam obsedit, ibique relicto exercitu in sancta resurrectione ab Adriano Papa Romae honorifice susceptus est. Post sanctam uero resurrectionem reuersus Papiam, cepit Desiderium regem; deinde Romam reuersus, constituit ibi sinodum cum Adriano papa in patriarchio Lateranensi in ecclesia S. Saluatoris, que sinodus celebrata est a CLIII episcopis religiosis et abbatibus. Adrianus autem Papa cum uniuersa sinodo tradiderunt Karolo ius et potestatem eligendi Pontificem, et ordinandi apostolicam sedem. Dignitatem quoque patriciatus ei concesserunt. Insuper archiepiscopos et episcopos per singulas prouincias ab eo inuestituram accipere diffiniuit, et ut, nisi a rege laudetur et inuestiatur episcopus, a nemine consecretur, et quicumque contra hoc decretum esset, anathematis uinculo eum innodauit, et nisi resipisceret, bona eius publicari precepit.

C. XXIII. The election of the Roman Pontiff pertains to the emperor's right.

Likewise Pope Leo, in the synod assembled at Rome in the church of the Holy Savior. Following the example of Blessed Adrian, bishop of the apostolic see, who granted to the lord Charles, most victorious king of the Franks and Lombards, the dignity of the patriciate, the ordination of the apostolic see, and the investiture of bishops, I too, Leo, servant of the servants of God, bishop, together with all the clergy and the Roman people, enact, confirm, and corroborate, and through our apostolic authority grant and bestow on the lord Otto I, king of the Germans, and his successors in this kingdom of Italy, in perpetuity, the power to elect his successor and to ordain the Pontiff of the supreme apostolic see, and also through him the archbishops or bishops, so that they may receive investiture from him and consecration from those from whom they ought, excepting those whom the emperor has conceded to the Pontiff and archbishops; and that henceforth no one, of whatever dignity or religious status, is to have the power to elect either a patrician or the Pontiff of the supreme apostolic see, or to ordain any bishop, without the consent of the emperor himself—provided, nevertheless, that it be done without any payment—and that he himself be patrician and king. But if someone is elected bishop by the clergy and people, let him not be consecrated unless he is approved and invested by the aforesaid king. If anyone shall attempt anything against this apostolic authority, we decree that he is to be subject to excommunication and, unless he comes to his senses, is to be punished by irrevocable exile or struck with the ultimate penalties.

> C. XXIII. Electio Romani Pontificis ad ius pertinet inperatoris.
> Item Leo Papa. In sinodo congregata Romae in ecclesia S. Saluatoris. Ad exemplum B. Adriani apostolicae sedis antistitis, qui domino Karolo, uictoriosissimo regi Francorum ac Longobardorum, patriciatus dignitatem, ac ordinationem apostolicae sedis, et inuestituram episcoporum concessit, ego quoque Leo, seruus seruorum Dei, episcopus, cum cuncto clero ac Romano populo constituimus, confirmamus et corroboramus, et per nostram apostolicam auctoritatem concedimus atque largimur domino Ottoni primo, regi Teutonicorum, eiusque successoribus huius regni Italiae, in perpetuum sibi facultatem eligendi successorem, atque summae sedis apostolicae Pontificem ordinandi, ac per hoc archiepiscopos seu episcopos, ut ipsi ab eo inuestituram accipiant et consecrationem, unde debent, exceptis his, quos inperator Pontifici et archiepiscopis concessit; et ut nemo deinceps cuiusque dignitatis uel religionis eligendi uel patricium uel Pontificem summae sedis apostolicae, aut quemcumque episcopum ordinandi habeat facultatem absque consensu ipsius inperatoris, (quod tamen fiat absque omni pecunia), et ut ipse sit patricius et rex. Quod si a clero et populo quis eligatur episcopus, nisi a supradicto rege laudetur, et inuestiatur, non consecretur. Si quis contra hanc apostolicam auctoritatem aliquid molietur, hunc excommunicacioni subiacere decernimus, et nisi resipuerit, inreuocabili exilio puniri uel ultimis suppliciis feriri.

C. XXIV. At the command of the princes, Maximus is remitted the fact that he was ordained without apostolic authority.

Likewise Gregory [book IV of the Register, epistle 34, to the Empress Constantina]. The bishop of the city of Salona was ordained without the knowledge of me or my representative, and a thing was done that occurred under no previous princes. On hearing this, I immediately sent to that same transgressor, who was irregularly ordained, that he was in no way to presume to celebrate the solemnities of masses at all unless I first learned from the most serene lords whether they had commanded this to be done; and I commanded this to him with the imposition of excommunication. But, holding me in contempt and despising me, and emboldened by certain secular men to whom, it is said, he gave many rewards after stripping his church bare, he has presumed to celebrate masses up to the present and has refused to come to me according to the command of the lords. But I, obeying the command of their piety, have so remitted from my heart to that same Maximus, who was ordained without my knowledge, the fact that at his ordination he presumed to pass over me or my representative, as though he had been ordained with me as the author. Yet his other perverse acts—namely the bodily crimes of which I have learned, or that he was elected with payments, or that he presumed to celebrate masses while excommunicated—I cannot, for God's sake, pass by without inquiry. And if he delays long in coming to me, I shall in no way cease to exercise canonical severity against him.

C. XXIV. Precepto principum Maximo remittitur, quod absque apostolica auctoritate ordinatur.

Item Gregorius [lib. IV. Reg. epist. 34. ad Constantiam Augustam.] Salonitanae ciuitatis episcopus me ac responsale meo nesciente ordinatus est, et facta res est, que sub nullis anterioribus principibus euenit. Quod ego audiens, ad eundem preuaricatorem, qui inordinate ordinatus est, protinus misi, ut omnino missarum solempnia nullo modo celebrare presumeret, nisi prius a serenissimis dominis cognoscerem, si hoc fieri iussissent; quod ei sub excommunicacionis interpositione mandaui. Qui contempto me atque despecto, in audacia quorumdam secularium hominum, quibus denudata sua ecclesia premia multa prebere dicitur, nunc usque missas facere presumit, atque ad me uenire secundum iussionem dominorum noluit. Ego autem preceptioni pietatis eorum obediens, eidem Maximo, qui me nesciente ordinatus est, hoc, quod in ordinatione sua me uel responsalem meum pretermittere presumpsit, ita ex corde laxaui, ac si me auctore fuerit ordinatus. Alia uero peruersa illius, scilicet mala corporalia, que cognoui, uel quia cum pecuniis electus est, uel quod excommunicatus missas facere presumpsit, propter Deum inrequisita preterire non possum. Et si ad me diu distulerit uenire, exercere in eo districtionem canonicam nullo modo cessabo.

C. XXV. The prince's assent is desired in the election of bishops.

Likewise from the Council of Toledo, [XII, c. 6]. Since the speed of messengers traveling across lands spread far and wide is impeded, with the result either that the death of a prelate cannot be reported with the kings hearing of it or that the prince's free choice concerning the successor of a dying bishop cannot be awaited, there often arises either a difficulty for our order in reporting such matters or an incalculable burden for the royal power while it awaits our counsel concerning the substitution of pontiffs. Hence it pleased all the pontiffs of Spain and Gaul that, with the privilege of each province preserved, it remain permissible henceforth for the pontiff of Toledo to appoint as bishops in the sees of their predecessors, in any provinces whatsoever, whomever the royal power has elected and the judgment of the aforesaid Bishop of Toledo has proved to be worthy, and to elect successors when bishops die, yet so that whoever has been ordained, within the space of three months after the time of his ordination, is to approach in order to see the presence of his own metropolitan. GRATIAN. The elections of the supreme pontiffs and of other lesser prelates were also once presented to the emperors, as is read concerning the election of Blessed Ambrose and Blessed Gregory. From these examples and the aforesaid authorities it is plainly gathered that laymen are not to be excluded from an election, nor princes rejected from the ordering of churches. But when the people are commanded to take part in an election, they are not directed to be summoned to make the election, but to give consent to the election. For the election belongs to the priests—as is read at the end of the preceding chapter of Pope Stephen—and it belongs to the faithful people humbly to consent. Therefore, the desire of the people is sought as to whether it accords with the election of the clerics. For then will a bishop be duly appointed in the Church of God, when the people together acclaim the one whom the clergy have elected by a common vote. Hence Pope Celestine says, [to the Bishops of Gaul, epistle II, c. 5]:

C. XXV. In episcoporum electione principis desideratur assensus.

Item ex Tolletano Concilio. [XII. c. 6.] Cum longe lateque tractu terrarum diffuso commeantium inpeditur celeritas nunciorum, quo aut non queat regibus audientibus decedentis presulis transitus notificari, aut de successore morientis episcopi libera principis electio expectari, nascitur sepe aut nostro ordini de relatione talium difficultas, aut regiae potestati, dum consultum nostrum pro subrogandis pontificibus sustinet, innumerosa necessitas. Unde placuit omnibus pontificibus Yspaniae atque Galliae, ut, saluo priuilegio uniuscuiusque prouinciae, licitum maneat deinceps Tolletano pontifici, quoscumque regalis potestas elegerit, et iam dicti Tolletani episcopi iudicium dignos esse probauerit, in quibuslibet prouinciis in precedentium sedibus preficere presules, et decedentibus episcopis eligere successores, ita tamen, ut, quisquis ille fuerit ordinatus, post ordinationis suae tempus infra trium mensium spatium metropolitani proprii presentiam uisurus accedat. Gratian. Electiones quoque summorum pontificum atque aliorum infra presulum quondam inperatoribus representabantur, sicut de electione B. Ambrosii et B. Gregorii legitur. Quibus exemplis et premissis auctoritatibus liquido colligitur, laicos non excludendos esse ab electione, neque principes esse reiciendos ab ordinatione ecclesiarum. Sed quod populus iubetur electioni interesse, non precipitur aduocari ad electione faciendam, sed ad consensum electioni adhibendum. Sacerdotum enim (ut in fine superioris capituli Stephani papae legitur) est electio, et fidelis populi est humiliter consentire. Desiderium ergo plebis requiritur an clericorum electioni concordet. Tunc enim in ecclesia Dei rite preficietur antistes, cum populus pariter in eum acclamauerit, quem clerus communi uoto elegerit. Unde Celestinus papa ait: [ad Episcopos Galliae, epist. II. c. 5.]

C. XXVI. It belongs to the people not to elect, but to consent to the election.

The consent and desire of the clergy and people are to be sought.

C. XXVI. Plebis non est eligere, sed electioni consentire.

Cleri, plebisque consensus et desiderium requiratur.

C. XXVII. On the same.

Likewise Leo I, [to the Bishops of the province of Vienne, epistle LXXXVII, otherwise LXXIX]. In the ordinations of priests, let the wishes of the citizens, the testimonies of the peoples, the judgment of the honored men, and the election of the clerics be established. And below: Let those who are to be priests be requested through peace and quiet; let the subscription of the clerics, the testimony of the honored men, and the ranks of the assembly and people be obtained. Part III. GRATIAN. Usage and enactment, however, handed down that the elections of Roman Pontiffs and other bishops were to be reported to princes and emperors because of the dissensions of schismatics and heretics, by which the Church of God, shaken at times, was placed in danger; against them the Church is frequently read to have been fortified by the laws of the most faithful emperors. Therefore, the election of catholics was presented to the princes, so that, strengthened by their authority, none of the heretics or schismatics would dare oppose it, and so that the princes themselves, as most devoted sons, would consent to him whom they saw elected as a father for themselves and would stand forth as his supporters in all things, just as Valentinian is read to have said to Blessed Ambrose: "Do not fear, because the God who elected you will always help you, and I shall always stand forth as your helper and defender, as befits my rank." Hence Pope Stephen enacted, saying:

C. XXVII. De eodem.

Item Leo I. [ad Episcopos Viennensis prouinciae, epist. LXXXVII. al. LXXCIX.] Vota ciuium, testimonia populorum, honoratorum arbitrium, electio clericorum in ordinationibus sacerdotum constituantur. Et infra: Per pacem et quietem sacerdotes, qui futuri sunt, postulentur, teneatur subscriptio clericorum, honoratorum testimonium, ordines conuentus et plebis. III. Pars. Gratian. Principibus uero atque inperatoribus electiones Romanorum Pontificum atque aliorum episcoporum referendas usus et constitutio tradidit pro scismaticorum atque hereticorum dissensionibus, quibus nonnumquam ecclesia Dei concussa periclitabatur, contra quos legibus fidelissimorum inperatorum frequenter ecclesia munita legitur. Representabatur ergo electio catholicorum principibus, ut eorum auctoritate roborata nullus hereticorum uel scismaticorum auderet contraire, et ut ipsi principes tamquam deuotissimi filii in eum consentirent, quem sibi in patrem eligi uiderent, et ei in omnibus suffragatores existerent, sicut Valentinianus B. Ambrosio legitur dixisse: "Noli timere, quia Deus, qui te elegit, semper adiuuabit te, et ego adiutor et defensor tuus, ut meo ordini decet, semper existam." Unde Stephanus papa statuit dicens:

C. XXVIII. The Roman Pontiff is to be ordained in the presence of the emperor's legates.

Because the holy Roman Church, over which by God's authorship we preside, suffers many acts of violence when a Pontiff dies—which are inflicted for this reason, that the Pontiff's consecration occurs without imperial knowledge and envoys have not been sent by the emperor according to canonical rite and custom to prevent scandals from occurring—we will that, when a Pontiff is to be instituted, the one who is to be ordained be elected by the bishops assembling and by all the clergy, in the presence of the senate and people, and that, having thus been elected, he be consecrated by all in the presence of the imperial legates; and let no one, at his peril, dare by a new invention to extort any oaths or promises except those which ancient custom requires, lest either the Church be scandalized or the imperial honor be diminished. Part IV. GRATIAN. But because emperors, sometimes not knowing their measure, wished to be numbered not among those who consented but as the foremost of those who distributed—or rather exterminated—and because, having frequently fallen into the perfidy of heretics, they tried to assault the unity of the catholic mother Church, the enactments of the holy Fathers were issued against them, so that they were not to insert themselves into an election, and whoever obtained a church by their support was to be bound by the bond of anathema. Divine Scripture likewise says that after Hezekiah destroyed the high places, shattered the statues, cut down the groves, and broke apart the bronze serpent that Moses made—namely, because God had commanded that serpent to be made lest the people perish by the death of serpents, the people themselves had begun to worship and venerate it, and for that reason the former man destroyed what the latter had made at God's command. And by this, this authority is to be regarded as great in the Church: that if some of our predecessors and superiors did certain things that at that time could be without fault, but afterward are turned into error and superstition, they are to be destroyed by their successors without any delay and with great authority. Finally, elections of Roman Pontiffs are read to have been celebrated both in the presence of imperial legates and without their being consulted, and at last the emperors themselves, with a religious affection of mind, renounced the aforesaid privileges, conferring in addition many gifts upon the Church of God.

C. XXVIII. Presentibus legatis inperatoris ordinetur pontifex Romanus.

Quia sancta Romana ecclesia, cui Deo auctore presidemus, a plurimis patitur uiolentias Pontifice obeunte, que ob hoc inferuntur, quia absque inperiali noticia Pontificis fit consecratio, nec canonico ritu et consuetudine ab inperatore directi sunt nuncii, qui scandala uetent fieri: uolumus, ut, cum instituendus est Pontifex, conuenientibus episcopis et uniuerso clero eligatur presente senatu et populo qui ordinandus est, et sic electus ab omnibus presentibus legatis inperialibus consecretur, nullusque sine sui periculo iuramenta uel promissiones aliquas noua adinuentione audeat extorquere, nisi que antiqua exigit consuetudo, ne uel ecclesia scandalizetur, et inperialis honorificentia minuatur. IV. Pars. Gratian. Verum, quia inperatores quandoque modum suum ignorantes non in numero consentientium, sed primi distribuentium, immo exterminantium esse uoluerunt, frequenter etiam in hereticorum perfidiam prolapsi catholicae matris ecclesiae unitatem inpugnare conati sunt, sanctorum Patrum statuta aduersus eos prodierunt, ut semet electioni non insererent, et quisquis eorum suffragio ecclesiam obtineret anathematis uinculo innodaretur, sicut scriptura quoque diuina dicit, quod postquam Ezechias dissipauit excelsa, et contriuit statuas, et succidit lucos, confregitque serpentem eneum, quem fecit Moyses; uidelicet, quia illum serpentem Deus fieri iusserat, ne serpentina morte populus interiret, ideo ipse populus colere et uenerari eum ceperat, et idcirco destruxit iste, quem iubente Deo fecerat ille. Ac per hoc magna auctoritas ista habenda est in ecclesia, ut, si nonnulli ex predecessoribus et maioribus nostris fecerunt aliqua, que illo tempore potuerunt esse sine culpa, et postea uertuntur in errorem et superstitionem, sine tarditate aliqua et cum magna auctoritate a posteris destruantur. Postremo presentibus legatis inperatorum et inconsultis electiones Romanorum Pontificum leguntur celebratae, et tandem idem inperatores religioso mentis affectu prefatis priuilegiis renunciauerunt, multa insuper donaria ecclesiae Dei conferentes.

C. XXIX. Adrian [II] is elected to the pontificate without the emperor's legates being consulted.

When Adrian II was being drawn from the church of the Mother of God our Lady, which is called "At the Manger," to the Lateran patriarchium upon his election to the Roman pontificate, he was borne along eagerly by the people, clergy, and leading men. When the envoys of Emperor Louis heard this, they took it ill, indignant, namely, that although they were present, they had not been invited and had not deserved to take part in the election of the future prelate, which they desired. Having accepted the explanation that this had been done not from contempt of the Augustus but with a view to the future—namely, lest by a precedent of this kind the custom of waiting for the legates of princes in the election of Roman prelates should grow established—they calmed all their indignation from the heart and themselves also humbly approached to salute the elected man.

C. XXIX. Inconsultis legatis inperatoris Adrianus [II.] ad pontificatum eligitur.

Cum Adrianus secundus ad Romanum pontificatum ab ecclesia Dei genitricis dominae nostrae, que dicitur "Ad presepe", traheretur ad Lateranense patriarchium, certatim a populo et clero et proceribus deportatus est. Quod audientes missi Lodoici inperatoris moleste tulerunt, indignati scilicet, quod, dum presentes essent, non fuerunt inuitati, nec optatae a se futuri presulis electioni interesse meruerunt. Qui accepta ratione, quod non causa Augusti contemptus, sed futuri temporis prospectu hoc commissum fuerat (ne uidelicet legatos principum in electione Romanorum presulum mos expectandi per huiusmodi fomitem inolesceret), omnem indignationem medullitus sedauerunt, et ad salutandum electum etiam ipsi humiliter accesserunt.

C. XXX. The election of the Roman Pontiff is conceded to the Romans by Louis.

Likewise the pact of the constitution of the first Emperor Louis with the Roman Pontiffs. I, Louis, Roman Emperor Augustus, enact and grant by this pact of our confirmation to you, Blessed Peter, prince of the apostles, and through you to your vicar, the lord Paschal, supreme Pontiff, and to his successors in perpetuity, as you and your predecessors have held and disposed in your power and dominion until now, the city of Rome with its duchy, all its suburbs and villages, its mountainous territories, seacoasts, and ports, and all the cities, castles, towns, and estates in the regions of Tuscany. The same: § 1. When, by divine calling, the Pontiff of this most sacred see has migrated from this world, let no one from our kingdom—whether Frank, Lombard, or a man of any nation placed under our power—have license to come against the Romans publicly or privately, or to make the election, and let no one presume to do any evil on this account in the cities or territories belonging to the power of the church of Blessed Peter the Apostle; but let the Romans be permitted, with all veneration and without any disturbance, to provide an honorable burial for their Pontiff, and canonically to consecrate, without any uncertainty or contradiction, the man whom all the Romans, by one counsel and concord, without any promise, shall have elected to the order of the pontificate through divine inspiration and the intercession of Blessed Peter. And when he has been consecrated, let legates be directed to us or to our successors, the kings of the Franks, to join friendship, charity, and peace between us and him.

C. XXXIII. The oath of Otto, which he made to the lord Pope John.

Likewise the Constitution of Otto. To you, lord Pope John, I, King Otto, cause a promise and oath to be made by the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, and by this wood of the life-giving cross, and by these relics of the Saints, that if, with God's permission, I come to Rome, I shall exalt the holy Roman Church and you, its ruler, according to my ability, and never by my will, consent, counsel, or exhortation shall you lose your life or limbs, or the very honor that you have; and at Rome I shall hold no judicial assembly or make any ordinance concerning any of the things that pertain to you or to the Romans without your counsel; and whatever of the land of Saint Peter shall come into our power, I shall restore to you. Whomever I entrust with the Italian kingdom, I shall cause him to swear that he will be your helper in defending the land of Saint Peter according to his ability.

> C. XXXIII. Iuramentum Ottonis, quod fecit domino Papae Iohanni.
> Item Constitucio Ottonis. Tibi domino Iohanni Papae ego rex Otto promittere et iurare facio per Patrem et Filium et Spiritum sanctum, et per hoc lignum uiuificae crucis, et per has reliquias Sanctorum, quod, si (permittente Deo Romam uenero, sanctam Romanam ecclesiam et te rectorem ipsius exaltabo secundum meum posse, et numquam uitam, aut membra, neque ipsum honorem quem habes, mea uoluntate, aut meo consensu, aut meo consilio, aut mea exortacione perdes, et in Roma nullum placitum aut ordinationem faciam de omnibus, que ad Te aut ad Romanos pertinent, sine tuo consilio, et quicquid de terra S. Petri ad nostram potestatem uenerit, tibi reddam. Cuicumque regnum Italicum commisero, iurare faciam illum, ut adiutor tui sit ad defendendam terram S. Petri secundum suum posse.

C. XXXIV. Let the clergy and people be free to elect a bishop from their own diocese.

Likewise from the first book of the Capitularies of Charles and Louis, [Emperors, c. 84]. Not ignorant of the sacred canons, in order that in God's name the holy Church may more freely possess its honor, we furnish our assent to the ecclesiastical order, so that bishops, through the election of clergy and people, may be elected from their own diocese according to the statutes of the canons, with acceptance of persons and gifts removed, on account of merit of life and the gift of wisdom, so that they may be able in every way to benefit those subject to them by example and word. GRATIAN. From these constitutions and the pact of Emperor Louis, it is perceived that the emperors renounced those privileges concerning the election of the supreme Pontiff which Pope Adrian had granted Emperor Charles, and Pope Leo, in imitation of him, had granted Otto I, king of the Germans. Since, therefore, from the foregoing authorities it is clear to all that the election belongs to clerics alone, it is asked: to which clerics does the election itself belong—to those of the greater church alone, or also to other religious clerics who are in the same city? But—as is found in the abridgment of the canons by Fulgentius, deacon of the church of Carthage—it was enacted at the Seventh Council of Nicaea and the Council of Macerata that the judgment of the mother church suffices for electing a bishop. Now, however, just as the election of the supreme pontiff is to be made not only by the Cardinals but also by other religious clerics, by the authority of Pope Nicholas, so too the election of bishops is to be made not only by canons but also by other religious clerics, as was enacted in the general synod of Pope Innocent held at Rome. For he says:

> C. XXXIV. Liberum sit clero et populo de propria diocesi episcopum eligere.
> Item ex primo libro Capitulorum Caroli et Lodowici. [Imperatorum c. 84.] Sacrorum canonum non ignari, ut in Dei nomine sancta ecclesia suo liberius potiatur honore, assensum ordini ecclesiastico prebemus, ut scilicet episcopi per electionem cleri et populi secundum statuta canonum de propria diocesi, remota personarum et munerum acceptione, ob uitae meritum et sapientiae donum eligantur, ut exemplo et uerbo sibi subiectis usquequaque prodesse ualeant. Gratian. Ex his constitutionibus et pacto Lodowici inperatoris deprehenditur, inperatores illis renunciasse priuilegiis, que de electione summi Pontificis Adrianus Papa Karolo inperatori, et ad imitacionem eius Leo papa Ottoni I. regi Theutonicorum fecerat. Cum ergo ex premissis auctoritatibus cunctis liqueat electionem clericorum tantummodo esse, queritur, quorum sit ipsa electio, an clericorum maioris ecclesiae tantum, an etiam religiosorum aliorum, qui in eadem ciuitate fuerint? Sed (sicut in breuiatione canonum Fulgentii, Cartaginensis ecclesiae diaconi, inuenitur) septimo concilio Nicensi et Macerensi concilio statutum est, ut ad eligendum episcopum sufficiat ecclesiae matricis arbitrium. Nunc autem sicut electio summi pontificis non a Cardinalibus tantum, immo etiam ab aliis religiosis clericis auctoritate
> Nicolai Papae est facienda, ita et episcoporum electio non a canonicis tantum, sed etiam ab aliis religiosis clericis, sicut in generali sinodo Innocentii Papae Romae habita constitutum est. Ait enim:

C. XXXV. The canons of the greater church are not to elect a bishop without the counsel of religious men.

Indeed, when bishops die, since the sanctions of the holy Fathers forbid a church to be vacant beyond three months, under anathema we forbid the canons of the episcopal see to exclude religious men from the election of bishops; rather, with their counsel let them elect an upright and suitable person as bishop. But if an election has been made with the religious excluded, let what was done without their consent and acquiescence be regarded as null and void. GRATIAN. It is now therefore asked: if the votes of the electors divide into two parties, which of them is to be preferred to the other? Concerning these matters Bishop Leo writes as follows, [to Anastasius, Bishop of Thessalonica, epistle LXXXII, otherwise LXXXIV, c. 5]:

> C. XXXV. Absque religiosorum uirorum consilio canonici maioris ecclesiae episcopum non eligant.
> Obeuntibus sane episcopis, quoniam ultra tres menses uacare ecclesiam sanctorum Patrum prohibent sanctiones, sub anathemate interdicimus, ne canonici de sede episcopali ab electione episcoporum excludant religiosos uiros, sed eorum consilio honestam et idoneam personam in episcopum eligant. Quod si exclusis religiosis electio facta fuerit, quod absque eorum consensu et conniuentia factum fuerit, irritum habeatur et uacuum. Gratian. Nunc ergo queritur, si uota eligentium in duas se diuiserint partes, quis eorum sit preferendus alteri? De his ita scribit Leo Episcopus: [ad Anastasium Thessalonicensem Episcopum, epist. LXXXII al. LXXXIV. cap. 5.]

C. XXXVI. When the votes of the electors have divided into two parties, which is to be preferred to the other.

If perchance—which we judge neither reprehensible nor irreligious—the votes of the electors divide into two parties, let him be preferred to the other by the judgment of the metropolitan who is supported by greater zeal and merits, provided only that no one be given to those unwilling and not requesting him, lest an unwilling people contemn or hate an undesired bishop.

> C. XXXVI. Cum uota eligentium in duas se diuiserint partes, quis sit preferendus alteri.
> Si forte, quod nec reprehensibile, nec inreligiosum iudicamus, uota eligentium in duas se diuiserint partes, is metropolitani iudicio alteri preferatur, qui maioribus iuuatur studiis et meritis; tantum ut nullus detur inuitis et non petentibus, ne plebs inuita episcopum non optatum contempnat, aut oderit.

Distinction LXIV

GRATIAN. Part I. From here it is to be considered by whom or at what time holy orders are to be distributed, or in what places patriarchs, primates, archbishops, bishops, chorepiscopi, and the remaining priests are to be ordained. By whom bishops are to be ordained was defined at the Council of Nicaea, where it reads as follows, [c. 4]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Hinc considerandum est, a quibus uel qua tempore sacri ordines sint distribuendi, uel quibus in locis patriarchae, primates, archiepiscopi, episcopi, corepiscopi et reliqui sacerdotes sint ordinandi. A quibus ordinentur episcopi, in Niceno Concilio diffinitum est, in quo sic legitur, [c. 4.]

C. I. Bishops are to be ordained by all the comprovincial bishops.

Bishops ought to be ordained by all those who are in their province. But if this is difficult, either because of pressing necessity or the length of the journey, three bishops ought to assemble together, in such a way that they possess by letters the consent of the others who are absent. The authority, however, or confirmation will pertain in each province to the metropolitan bishop.

> C. I. Ab omnibus conprouincialibus episcopi ordinentur.
> Episcopi ab omnibus, qui sunt in sua prouincia, debent ordinari. Si uero hoc difficile fuerit, uel urgente necessitate, uel itineris longitudine, tres episcopi debent in unum congregari, ita ut ceterorum, qui absentes sunt, consensum litteris teneant. Potestas sane uel confirmatio pertinebit per singulas prouincias ad metropolitanum episcopum.

C. II. On the same.

Likewise Pope Anacletus, [to the Bishops of Italy, epistle II]. By apostolic authority, episcopal ordinations are to be celebrated by all the bishops who are in the same province. § 1. But if all have been wholly unable to assemble together, let them nevertheless furnish assent by their prayers, so that they are not absent in mind from the ordination itself.

[PALEA.

C. II. De eodem.

Item Anacletus Papa. [ad Episcopos Italiae, epist. II.] Ordinationes episcoporum auctoritate apostolica ab omnibus, qui in eadem prouincia sunt, episcopis celebrandae sunt. §. 1. Quod si omnes simul minime conuenire potuerint, assensum tamen suis prebeant precibus, ut ab ipsa ordinatione animo non desint.

[PALEA.

C. III. From the First Council of Orange, c. 21.

Concerning the rejection of one whom two bishops have presumed to ordain in our provinces, it has pleased us concerning the presumptuous persons that, wherever it happens that two bishops ordain a third, both he and the authors are to be condemned, so that those things instituted in antiquity may be observed more cautiously.]

C. III. Ex Concilio Arausicano I. c. 21.

De abiectione eius, quem duo presumpserint ordinare episcopi in nostris prouinciis, placuit de presumptoribus, ut sicubi contigerit duos episcopos tertium ordinare, et ipse, et auctores dampnabuntur quo cautius ea, que sunt antiquitus instituta, seruentur.]

C. IV. With the others assenting, a bishop is to be ordained by three comprovincial bishops.

Likewise Pope Anicius, [in the epistle to the Bishops of Gaul]. If it is necessary, comprovincial bishops, with the others consenting, may be consecrated by three bishops at the archbishop's command.

C. IV. Ceteris assentientibus cum tribus conprouincialibus ordinetur episcopus.

Item Anicius Papa. [in epistola ad Episcopos Galliae.] Conprouinciales episcopi, si necesse fuerit, ceteris consentientibus a tribus episcopis iussu archiepiscopi consecrari possunt.

C. V. A bishop is not to be ordained without the metropolitan's knowledge.

Likewise Innocent, [Pope, to Victricius, Bishop of Rouen, epistle II, c. 1]. Let no one dare to ordain a bishop without the knowledge of the metropolitan. For a judgment that is confirmed by the opinions of many is complete. Nor let one bishop presume to ordain a bishop, lest a benefit bestowed by stealth seem to have been granted. For the Synod of Nicaea both enacted this and defined it by enactment.

C. V. Non ordinetur episcopus extra conscientiam metropolitani.

Item Innocentius. [Papa ad Victricium Episcopum Rothomagensem epist. II. c. I.] Extra conscientiam metropolitani nullus audeat ordinare episcopum. Integrum enim est iudicium, quod plurimorum sententciis confirmatur. Nec unus episcopus presumat ordinare episcopum, ne furtiuum beneficium prestitum uideatur. Hoc enim et sinodus Nycena constituit atque constituendo diffiniuit.

C. VI. Bishops are to be consecrated by their metropolitan, and he by those same bishops.

Likewise Gelasius to all the bishops throughout Dardania. Part II. Because, through unlawful ambitions, certain persons are not ashamed to disturb the rights of churches and, with rash presumption, to invade the privileges which antiquity decreed to metropolitan or provincial bishops —on account of which they also desire to maintain a breach of apostolic communion, so that, separated from its authority, they may exercise their own usurpations with impunity, not considering that they will have to render an account to the eternal Judge, both for the injury to catholic sincerity and for the prejudices done to paternal traditions, not without the destruction of perpetual condemnation if they persist in this obstinacy—we have thought your charity should be instructed that all of you in common, brothers established throughout Dardania or any contiguous province, who remember that you are under your metropolitans and who determine that bishops are to be substituted by those same men, as ancient custom demands, should unanimously strive to obtain bishops; and in turn, if a metropolitan departs by the lot of the human condition, you are to judge in every way that he is to be consecrated by the bishops of the province, as the form has handed down, and you are not to suffer him to claim for himself what was granted to you by ancient arrangement, so that, even amid the very storms of adverse wills, you may by no means cease to guard the ancient rules, just as there is no doubt that our fathers steadfastly did in the time of diverse persecutions.

C. VI. Episcopi a suo metropolitano, et ipse ab eisdem consecretur.

Item Gelasius uniuersis episcopis per Dardaniam. II. Pars. Quia per ambitiones illicitas non pudet quosdam ecclesiarum iura turbare, ac priuilegia, que metropolitanis uel prouincialibus episcopis decreuit antiquitas, temeraria presumptione peruadere, propter quod etiam communionis apostolicae desiderant tenere dissidium, quod scilicet ab eius auctoritate diuisi uel inpune proprias usurpationes exerceant, non respicientes, quia eterno iudici rationem tam de catholicae sinceritatis iniuria, quam de traditionum preiudiciis paternarum non sine perpetuae sint dampnationis interitu reddituri, si in hac obstinatione permanserint, karitatem uestram duximus instruendam, ut uos omnes in commune fratres, per Dardaniam, siue per contiguam quamque prouinciam constituti, qui uos sub metropolitanis uestris esse meministis, et ab eisdem substitui decernentes, sicut uetus consuetudo deposcit, unanimiter studeatis antistites, et uicissim, si metropolitanus humanae condicionis sorte recesserit, a conprouincialibus episcopis, sicut forma transmisit, sacrari omnibus modis censeatis, neque sibi quod uobis antiqua dispositione concessum est patiamini uendicare; quatinus et inter ipsas aduersantium uoluntatum procellas ueterum regulas nullatenus custodire cessetis, sicut persecutionum tempore diuersarum patres nostros constanter fecisse non dubium est.

C. VII. On the same.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin. Part III. A bishop ought most especially to be constituted by the entire council. But if this is difficult either because of necessity or the length of the journey, three are to be gathered from all, and the subscriptions of all present or absent are to be obtained, and thus afterward the ordination is to be made. § 1. The authority over this matter in every province, however, pertains to the metropolitan bishop.

> C. VII. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. III. Pars. Episcopum oportet maxime quidem ab omni concilio constitui. Sed si hoc aut pro necessitate, aut pro longinquitate itineris difficile fuerit, ex omnibus tres colligantur, et omnium presentium uel absentium subscriptiones teneantur, et sic postea ordinatio fiat. §. 1. Huius autem rei potestas in omni prouincia ad metropolitanum pertinet episcopum.

C. VIII. He who has been ordained without the metropolitan's knowledge will not be a bishop.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea, [I, c. 6]. This is generally clear: if anyone has been made bishop apart from the metropolitan's judgment, the great synod has defined that this man ought not to be a bishop.

> C. VIII. Non erit episcopus, qui preter metropolitani conscientiam fuerit ordinatus.
> Item ex Concilio Niceno. [I. cap. 6.] Illud generaliter est clarum, quod, si quis preter sententiam metropolitani factus fuerit episcopus, hunc magna sinodus diffiniuit episcopum esse non oportere.

Distinction LXV

GRATIAN. Part I. The consent of the comprovincial bishops is universally desired in the ordination of a bishop. But if some, led by animosity, wish to contradict, let the judgment of the greater number prevail. Hence in the Council of Nicaea, [c. 6]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Conprouincialium episcoporum uniuersaliter desideratur consensus in ordinatione episcopi. Quod si aliqui animositate ducti contradicere uoluerint, obtineat sentencia plurimorum. Unde in Niceno Concilio: [c. 6.]

C. I. If, while the others consent to the ordination of bishops, two or three contradict, let the judgment of the greater number prevail.

Indeed, if, when the common consent of all has been reasonably proved according to the ecclesiastical rule, two or three, led by animosity, contradict contentiously, let the judgment of the greater number of priests prevail.

> C. I. Si ceteris consentientibus ordinationi episcoporum duo uel tres contradicant, obtineat sentencia plurimorum.
> Sane, si communi omnium consensu rationabiliter probato secundum ecclesiasticam regulam, duo uel tres animositate ducti per contentionem contradicant, obtineat plurimorum sentencia sacerdotum.

C. II. On the same.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin. A bishop ought not to be ordained without the counsel and presence of the metropolitan bishop. All the priests who are in the province ought to be present, and the metropolitan ought to summon them by his letter. And indeed, if all come, it is well; but if this is difficult, the greater number ought to come. Those who do not assemble, however, are to make their presence known through their letters, and thus, when the consent of all has been given, the ordination of the bishop ought to be made. But if it is done otherwise than was determined by us, we decree that such an ordination has no validity. Part II. § 1. But if the ordination of a bishop has been made according to the canons and someone with his malice contradicts it in some respect, let the consent of the greater number prevail.

C. II. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. Non debet ordinari episcopus absque consilio et presentia metropolitani episcopi. Adesse autem oportet omnes, qui sunt in prouincia sacerdotes, quos per suam debet epistolam conuocare metropolitanus. Et quidem si omnes occurrant, bene; si hoc autem difficile fuerit, pluriores oportet occurrere. Qui autem non conueniunt, presentiam sui per epistolas suas faciant, et sic omnium facto consensu ordinationem episcopi fieri oportet. Si autem aliter, preter quod a nobis terminatum est, fuerit factum, talem ordinationem nichil preualere decernimus. II. Pars. §. 1. Si autem secundum canones ordinatio episcopi fuerit facta, et aliquis cum sua malicia in aliquo contradixerit, plurimorum consensus obtineat.

C. III. On the same.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, [c. 19]. A bishop is not to be ordained without the counsel and presence of the metropolitan bishop; it will be better for him if the bishops assemble from the whole province. But if this cannot be done, let those who cannot be present indicate by their own letters their consent concerning the man, and then at last, after the consent of the greater number, whether through presence or through letters, let him be ordained by a concordant judgment. But if it is done otherwise than has been enacted, let an ordination of this kind have no validity. § 1. But if an ordination is celebrated even according to the defined rules, while some contradict because of their own private enmities, let the judgment of the greater number concerning him prevail, with those men disregarded. GRATIAN. But if it is established that a province has a primate, it will not be permissible even for the metropolitan to consecrate a bishop without his knowledge. Hence Pope Leo of the city of Rome to Bishop Anastasius, [epistle LXXXII, otherwise LXXXIV, c. 6]:

C. III. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Antioceno. [c. 19.] Episcopum non ordinandum sine consilio et presentia metropolitani episcopi, cui melius erit, si ex omni prouincia congregentur episcopi. Quod si fieri non potest, hi, qui adesse non possunt, propriis litteris consensum suum de ipso designent, et tunc demum post plurimorum siue per presentiam siue per litteras consensum sententia consona ordinetur. Quod si aliter, quam statutum est, fiat, nichil ualere huiusmodi ordinationem. §. 1. Si uero etiam secundum diffinitas regulas ordinatio celebretur, contradicant autem aliqui propter proprias et domesticas simultates, his contemptis sentencia de eo obtineat plurimorum. Gratian. Si autem prouinciam primatem habere constiterit, nec etiam metropolitano absque eius conscientia episcopum consecrare licebit. Unde Leo Papa urbis Romae Anastasio Episcopo: [epist. LXXXII. al. LXXXIV. c. 6.]

C. IV. The metropolitan is not to ordain a bishop without the primate's consent.

Concerning the person of the bishop to be consecrated, and the consent of the clergy and people, let the metropolitan bishop report to your fraternity, and let him make known to you what has found good pleasure in the province, so that your authority too may confirm the ordination that is duly to be celebrated. This authority ought to bring no delay or difficulty to proper arrangements, lest the care of pastors be long absent from the Lord's flocks.

C. IV. Absque primatis consensu metropolitanus episcopum non ordinet.

De persona autem consecrandi episcopi, et de cleri plebisque consensu metropolitanus episcopus ad fraternitatem tuam referat, quodque in prouincia bene placuit scire te faciat, ut ordinationem rite celebrandam tua quoque confirmet auctoritas. Que rectis dispositionibus nichil morae aut difficultatis debebit afferre, ne gregibus Domini diu desit cura pastorum.

C. V. On the same.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 12]. It pleases all that, without consulting the primate of the province in question, no one is to presume so readily, even with many others, to ordain a bishop in any place without his precept, as was said. § 1. But if necessity exists, three bishops, wherever they may be, ought to ordain a bishop with the primate's precept.

C. V. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 12.] Placet omnibus, ut inconsulto primate cuiuslibet prouinciae tam facile nemo presumat, licet cum multis, in quocumque loco sine eius (ut dictum est) precepto episcopum ordinare. §. 1. Si autem necessitas fuerit, tres episcopi, in quocumque loco sint, cum primatis precepto ordinare debebunt episcopum.

C. VI. Its proper honor is to be preserved for each church.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea, [c. 6]. Let the ancient custom endure in Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, so that the Bishop of Alexandria may have authority over all these, since indeed a parallel custom exists for the Bishop of Rome. § 1. Similarly, at Antioch and throughout the other provinces, let its own honor be preserved for each church.

C. VI. Unicuique ecclesiae proprius honor seruetur.

Item ex Niceno Concilio. [c. 6.] Mos antiquus perduret in Egipto, uel Libia et Pentapoli, ut Alexandrinus episcopus horum omnium habeat potestatem, quoniam quidem et Romano episcopo parilis mos est. §. 1. Similiter autem et apud Antiochiam ceterasque prouincias honor suus unicuique seruetur ecclesiae.

C. VII. On the same.

Likewise from the same, [c. 7]. Since ancient custom and venerable tradition have prevailed that honor be deferred to the bishop of Aelia, that is, Jerusalem, let him accordingly have honor, while the proper dignity of the metropolitan city nevertheless remains. GRATIAN. But one who has been ordained by his comprovincial bishops with the metropolitan's permission is to present himself before him within the established times. Hence it reads in the Council of Tarragona, [c. 5]:

C. VII. De eodem.

Item ex eodem. [cap. 7.] Quoniam mos antiquus obtinuit et uetusta traditio, ut Eliae, id est Ierosolimorum episcopo, honor deferatur, habeat consequenter honorem, manente tamen metropolitanae ciuitatis propria dignitate. Gratian. Qui uero a conprouincialibus suis cum metropolitani licentia fuerit ordinatus, infra constituta tempora eius se representet conspectibus. Unde in Tarraconensi Concilio [c. 5.] legitur:

C. VIII. On the same.

If a bishop has not been ordained in the metropolitan city, after he has received the blessing and obtained the episcopal honor through letters of the metropolitan, we have decreed it to be best that afterward, at the established time—that is, when two months have been completed—he present himself before his metropolitan, so that, having been instructed by him in ecclesiastical admonitions, he may recognize more fully what he ought to observe. But if perchance he neglects to fulfill this, let him be rebuked and corrected by the brothers in the synod. And if he has been prevented by some illness from fulfilling it, let him take care to indicate this to the metropolitan by his letters. Part III. GRATIAN. By these authorities it is given to be understood that bishops ought to be ordained by their comprovincial bishops. But it is asked: if there are many bishops in a province and it happens that one bishop alone remains, what ought to be done? Because he is alone, he cannot ordain a bishop; he has no comprovincial bishops with whom he may consecrate a bishop. Therefore, when such necessity exists, what is to be done is defined in the Council of Sardica, where it reads as enacted as follows, [c. 5]:

> C. VIII. De eodem.
> Si quis in metropolitana ciuitate episcopus non fuerit ordinatus, posteaquam suscepta benedictione per metropolitani litteras honorem episcopi fuerit adeptus, id optimum esse decreuimus, ut postmodum statuto tempore, id est inpletis duobus mensibus, se metropolitani sui presentet aspectibus, ut ab illo monitis ecclesiasticis instructus plenius quid obseruare debeat recognoscat. Quod si forte hoc implere neglexerit, in sinodo increpatus a fratribus corrigatur. Et si forte infirmitate aliqua ne hoc inpleat fuerit inpeditus, hoc suis litteris metropolitano indicare procuret. III. Pars. Gratian. His auctoritatibus datur intelligi, quod episcopi a conprouincialibus suis debent ordinari. Sed queritur, si in prouincia fuerint plurimi episcopi, et contigerit forte unum remanere episcopum, quid fieri debeat? Ille, quia solus est, non potest ordinare episcopum; conprouinciales non habet, cum quibus consecrare episcopum ualeat. Cum ergo talis necessitas fuerit, quid faciendum sit, in Sardicensi Concilio diffinitur, in quo [cap. 5.] sic statutum legitur:

C. IX. If only one bishop remains in a province, bishops from a neighboring province are to be summoned for the consecration of a bishop.

If perchance it happens that only one bishop remains in a province, let the surviving bishop summon bishops from a neighboring province and with them ordain bishops as his comprovincials. But if he neglects to do this, let the peoples approach the bishops of a neighboring province, and let those bishops first admonish the bishop who dwells in that province, and let them show that the peoples request a ruler for themselves and teach that it is just that he himself come and with them ordain a bishop. But if, after being approached by letters, he remains silent and dissimulates and writes nothing in reply, then the peoples are to be satisfied, so that bishops may come from a neighboring province and ordain a bishop.

> C. IX. Si unus tantum in prouincia remanserit episcopus, ad consecrationem episcopi de uicina prouincia episcopi conuocentur.
> Si forte in prouincia unum tantum remanere episcopum contigerit, superstes episcopus conuocet episcopos uicinae prouinciae, et cum eis ordinet conprouinciales sibi episcopos. Quod si facere neglexerit, populi conueniant episcopos uicinae prouinciae, et illi prius commoneant episcopum, qui in eadem prouincia commoratur, et ostendant, quod sibi petant populi rectorem, et doceant iustum esse, ut ueniat ipse, et cum eis ordinet episcopum. Sed si litteris conuentus tacuerit et dissimulauerit, nichilque rescripserit, tunc satisfaciendum est populis, ut ueniant ex uicina prouincia, et episcopum ordinent.

Distinction LXVI

GRATIAN. Part I. Archbishops, however, ought to be ordained by all the bishops of their province. Hence Pope Anicius says, [in the epistle to the Bishops of Gaul]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Archiepiscopi autem ab omnibus suae prouincia episcopis debent ordinari. Unde Anicius Papa ait: [in epist. ad Episcopos Galliae]

C. I. An archbishop is to be ordained by all the suffragan bishops.

Let an archbishop be ordained by all the bishops of his province. § 1. What has been commanded concerning the consecration of an archbishop—that all the suffragans ordain him—may in no way be changed, because the one who presides over all the bishops over whom he presides ought to be constituted by them all. But if it has been presumed otherwise, there is no doubt that it lacks force, because the ordination transacted otherwise will be void. Part II. GRATIAN. Concerning bishops not to be ordained by fewer than three bishops, Anacletus writes, [epistle II to the Bishops of Italy], saying:

C. I. Ab omnibus suffraganeis episcopis archiepiscopus ordinetur.

Archiepiscopus ab omnibus suae prouinciae episcopis ordinetur. §. 1. Hoc autem, quod de archiepiscopi consecratione preceptum est, ut omnes suffraganei eum ordinent, nullatenus licet inmutari, quia ille qui preest ab omnibus episcopis, quibus preest debet constitui. Sin autem aliter presumptum fuerit, uiribus carere non dubium est, quia irrita erit secus acta ordinatio. II. Pars. Gratian. De episcopis non ordinandis a paucioribus quam a tribus episcopis, scribit Anacletus [ep. II. ad episcopos Italiae] dicens:

[C. II.]

Moreover, Blessed James, the first archbishop of Jerusalem, who was called the Just and was named the Lord's brother according to the flesh, was ordained by the apostles Peter, James, and John; they plainly gave a form to their successors that in no way is a bishop to be ordained by fewer than three bishops, with all the others furnishing assent, and that the ordination is to be celebrated by a common vote.

[C. II.]

Porro et Ierosolimitarum primus archiepiscopus B. Iacobus, qui Iustus dicebatur, et secundum carnem Domini frater nuncupatus est, a Petro, Iacobo et Iohanne apostolis ordinatus est, successoribus uidelicet dantibus formam eorum, ut minus quam a tribus episcopis, reliquisque omnibus assensum prebentibus, nullatenus episcopus ordinetur, et communi uoto ordinatio celebretur.

Distinction LXVII

GRATIAN. Part I. Priests and chorepiscopi, however, can be ordained by one bishop. Hence Anacletus, [epistle II to the Bishops of Italy]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Presbiteri uero et corepiscopi ab uno episcopo ordinari possunt. Unde Anacletus: [epist. II. ad Episcopos Italiae]

C. I. Priests can be ordained by one bishop.

Let the remaining priests be ordained by their own bishop, in such a way that the citizens and other priests furnish assent and celebrate the ordination while fasting. Let deacons be ordained similarly. But for the distribution of the other grades, the testimony of three truthful men, with the bishop's approval, can suffice. Likewise it reads in the Second Council of Seville, [c. 6]:

> C. I. Sacerdotes ab uno possunt ordinari episcopo.
> Reliqui sacerdotes a proprio ordinentur episcopo, ita ut ciues et alii sacerdotes assensum prebeant, et ieiunantes celebrent ordinationem. Similiter et diaconi ordinentur. Ceterorum autem graduum distributioni trium ueracium testimonium episcopi scilicet approbatione sufficere potest. Item in Spalensi [Concilio II., c. 6.] legitur:

C. II. On the same.

Part II. A bishop alone can give the honor to priests and ministers; he cannot take it away alone.

> C. II. De eodem.
>
> II. Pars. Episcopus sacerdotibus ac ministris solus honorem dare potest, solus auferre non potest.

Distinction LXVIII

GRATIAN. Part I. It is asked concerning those who are ordained by men not established to have been bishops, whether they are to be consecrated again or not. That they are not to be consecrated is proved by the authority of Gregory, who, writing to John, Bishop of Ravenna, [book II, epistle 32], says:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Queritur de illis, qui ordinantur ab eis, quos non constat fuisse episcopos, an sint iterum consecrandi, an non? Quod uero consecrandi non sint, probatur auctoritate Gregorii, qui scribens Iohanni Episcopo Rauennati, [lib. II. epist. 32.] ait:

C. I. One who has once been consecrated ought not to be consecrated again.

Just as one who has once been baptized ought not to be baptized again, so one who has once been consecrated cannot be consecrated again. But if anyone came to the priesthood with a slight fault, penance ought to be imposed for the fault, and yet the order is to be preserved. To the contrary, the same Gregory testifies, writing to a certain bishop:

> C. I. Semel consecratus iterum consecrari non debet.
> Sicut semel baptizatus iterum baptizari non debet, sic et semel consecratus iterum consecrari non potest. Sed si quis cum leui culpa ad sacerdotium uenit, pro culpa penitencia debet indici, et tamen ordo seruetur. Econtra idem Gregorius testatur scribens cuidam episcopo:

C. II. Concerning priests who are ordained by men established not to have been bishops.

As for the priests whom you found: if those men by whom they are ordained are unknown, and it is doubtful whether those who ordained them were bishops or not, then, if the priests themselves are men of good conduct and catholic, and are instructed in the ministry of Christ and in every holy law, let them receive the blessing of the priesthood from their bishop and be consecrated, and thus let them discharge the sacred ministry. GRATIAN. Therefore, the prohibition against a consecrated person being consecrated again in the same order is to be understood of one who was consecrated by a man whom it was certain had the right of consecrating. But one who is consecrated by a man not established to have had the right of consecrating is to be consecrated again, because if that man did not have the right of consecrating, the present man received nothing of consecration from the outpouring of oil. And because he was not consecrated in that order, now, coming to consecration as though for the first time, he obtains the priestly blessing and consecration from the bishop. But if the man did have the right of consecrating, in the first anointing he obtained consecration; in the second consecration is not repeated, but only the anointing, just as one concerning whom it is doubtful whether he has been baptized or not ought to be baptized. If he had not been baptized before, he obtains the grace of baptism; but if he had been baptized, he receives nothing in the second anointing, nor does this pertain to a repetition of baptism, but to the safeguarding of salvation. This is likewise to be observed concerning churches to be consecrated. Hence in the Council of Nicaea:

> Presbiteri, quos reperisti, si incogniti fuerint uiri illi, qui ordinantur, et dubium est, eos episcopos fuisse, an non, qui eos ordinauerunt, si bonae actionis uirique catholici sunt ipsi presbiteri, et in ministerio Christi omnique sancta lege edocti, ab episcopo suo benedictionem presbiteratus suscipiant et consecrentur, et sic ministerio sacro fungantur. Gratian. Quod ergo consecratus in eodem ordine iterum consecrari prohibetur, de eo intelligendum est, qui consecratus est ab illo, quem certum erat ius consecrandi habere. Qui autem ab illo consecratur, quem non constat ius consecrandi habuisse, iterum consecrandus est, quia si ille ius consecrandi non habuerit iste ex olei effusione nichil consecrationis accepit. Et quia in ipso ordine consecratus non erat, nunc quasi primum ad consecrationem ueniens ab episcopo sacerdotalem benedictionem et consecrationem consequitur. Si autem ius consecrandi habuerit, in prima unctione consecutus est consecrationem; in secunda uero non reiteratur consecratio, sed sola unctio, sicut de quo dubium est, an sit baptizatus an non, debet baptizari; qui si prius baptizatus non fuerat, consequitur gratiam baptismi, si autem baptizatus erat, nichil accipit in secunda unctione, nec pertinet hoc ad reiteracionem baptismi, sed ad cautelam salutis. Hoc etiam de ecclesiis consecrandis similiter obseruandum est. Unde in Niceno Concilio:

C. III. A church once consecrated ought not to be consecrated again.

Consecration ought not to be applied again to churches once consecrated to God unless they have been burned by fire or polluted by the shedding of blood or by the seed of anyone; because, just as an infant once baptized by any priest in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit ought not to be baptized again, so too a place dedicated to God is not to be consecrated again, except for those causes that we named above, provided nevertheless that those who consecrated it held the faith of the Holy Trinity. Part II. GRATIAN. Between bishops and chorepiscopi, however, there is this difference: bishops can be ordained only in cities, while chorepiscopi can also be ordained in villages. Bishops grant canonical letters, while chorepiscopi can give only commendatory and pacific letters. Bishops have the right of consecrating; chorepiscopi confer only the lesser orders, but they cannot furnish the Levitical and priestly blessing. Bishop Leo writes as follows concerning them to all the Bishops, [epistle LXXXVI, otherwise LXXXVIII]:

> C. III. Non debet iterum consecrari ecclesia semel consecrata.

Ecclesiis semel Deo consecratis non debet iterum consecratio adhiberi, nisi aut ab igne exustae, aut sanguinis effusione, aut cuiuscumque semine pollutae fuerint: quia sicut infans a qualicumque sacerdote in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus sancti semel baptizatus, non debet iterum baptizari, ita nec locus Deo dicatus iterum consecrandus est, nisi propter eas causas, quas superius nominauimus, si tamen fidem sanctae Trinitatis tenuerunt, qui eum consecrauerunt. II. Pars. Gratian. Inter episcopos autem et corepiscopos hec differentia est, quod episcopi non nisi in ciuitatibus, corepiscopi etiam in uicis ordinari possunt. Episcopi formatas tribuunt, corepiscopi non nisi commendaticias et pacificas dare ualent. Episcopi ius consecrandi habent, corepiscopi minores tantummodo ordines tribuunt, Leuiticam autem et sacerdotalem benedictionem prestare non ualent. De his ita scribit Leo Episcopus omnibus Episcopis: [epist. LXXXVI. al. LXXXVIII.]

C. IV. In what respects chorepiscopi differ from bishops.

Although chorepiscopi and priests share with bishops the dispensation of many ministries, nevertheless let them know that certain things are prohibited to them, such as the consecration of priests, deacons, and virgins; the establishment, blessing, or anointing of an altar. Indeed, it is not permissible for them to erect altars or consecrate churches, nor through the imposition of hands to impart the Paraclete, the Holy Spirit, to baptized faithful or converted heretics, nor to prepare chrism, nor to sign with chrism the foreheads of the baptized, nor publicly at mass to reconcile anyone doing penance, nor to send canonical letters to anyone. [PALEA. For all these things are unlawful for chorepiscopi, who are known to correspond to the example and form of the seventy-two disciples, or for priests, who bear the same figure.] For although they have consecration, they nevertheless do not have the summit of the pontificate. Part III. GRATIAN. But these men, because of their insolence by which they usurped the offices of bishops for themselves, are today prohibited by the Church. Hence Pope Damasus says, [to the Bishops of Africa, epistle V]:

C. IV. In quibus corepiscopi ab episcopis differant.

Quamuis corepiscopis et presbiteris plurima cum episcopis ministeriorum communis sit dispensatio, quedam tamen sibi prohibita nouerint, sicut est presbiterorum et diaconorum, et uirginum consecratio, constitutio altaris, ac benedictio uel unctio. Si quidem nec erigere altaria, nec consecrare ecclesias eis licitum est, nec per inpositionem manuum fidelibus baptizatis uel conuersis hereticis paracletum Spiritum sanctum tradere, nec crisma conficere, nec crismate baptizatorum frontes signare, nec publice quidem in missa quemquam penitentem reconciliare, nec formatas cuilibet epistolas mittere. [PALEA. Hec enim omnia illicita sunt corepiscopis, qui ad exemplum et formam LXXII. discipulorum esse noscuntur, uel presbiteris, qui eandem gestant figuram.] Quoniam, quamquam consecrationem habeant, pontificatus tamen apicem non habent. III. Pars. Gratian. Hi uero propter insolentiam suam, qua episcoporum offitia sibi usurpabant, ab ecclesia hodie prohibiti sunt. Unde Damasus papa ait: [ad Episc. Africae, epist. V.]

C. V. The order of chorepiscopi is rejected by the holy see.

Chorepiscopi are prohibited both by this holy see and by the bishops of the whole world. For their institution is exceedingly dishonorable and exceedingly depraved, because it lacks all authority for them to presume anything from the ministry of the supreme priest. § 1. For we have learned that there are no more than two orders among the disciples of the Lord, namely, the twelve apostles and the seventy-two disciples. Whence this third has proceeded, we do not know. And what lacks reason must be rooted out. Part IV. § 2. But that those who were ordained by fewer than three bishops are not bishops is plain to all. For it was prohibited by the holy Fathers that those who were ordained by one or two bishops be called bishops. If they do not have the name, how will they have the office? Likewise Urban, [Pope II]:

> C. V. Ordo corepiscoporum a sacra sede reprobatur.
> Corepiscopi tam ab hac sacra sede, quam ab episcopis totius orbis prohibiti sunt. Nimis enim eorum institucio inproba, nimis est et praua, quia, ut de summo sacerdotis ministerio aliquid presumant, omni auctoritate caret. §. 1. Nam non amplius, quam duos ordines inter discipulos Domini esse cognouimus, id est duodecim apostolorum, et LXXII. discipulorum. Unde iste tertius processerit, ignoramus. Et quod ratione caret exstirpare necesse est. IV. Pars. §. 2. Quod autem episcopi non sint, qui minus quam a tribus episcopis ordinati sunt, omnibus patet. Prohibitum, est enim a sanctis Patribus, ut qui ab uno uel a duobus sunt ordinati episcopis non nominentur episcopi. Si nomen non habent, qualiter offitium habebunt? Item Urbanus. [Papa II.]

C. VI. Bishops hold the place of the apostles in the Church.

Whose vicars bishops are in the Church, and who ought to give them this dignity, Saint Augustine shows, saying:

"In place of your fathers, sons have been born to you. The fathers who were sent are the apostles; in place of the apostles sons were born and were constituted bishops. For whence were the bishops who are throughout the whole world born today? The Church herself calls those men fathers; she herself begot them, and she herself established them in the seats of the fathers. Therefore do not think yourself deserted because you do not see Paul, because you do not see Peter, because you do not see those through whom you were born: from your offspring fatherhood has grown for you. In place of your fathers, sons have been born to you; you will constitute them princes over all the earth. The Church begot sons; she established them as princes in place of her fathers over all the earth."

> C. VI. Apostolorum in ecclesia locum tenent episcopi.
> Quorum uices in ecclesia episcopi habeant, et quis eis hanc dignitatem dare debeat, S. Augustinus ostendit, inquiens:
> "Pro patribus tuis nati sunt tibi filii. Patres missi sunt apostoli: pro apostolis filii nati sunt, constituti sunt episcopi. Hodie enim episcopi, qui sunt per totum mundum, unde nati sunt? Ipsa ecclesia patres illos appellat ipsa illos genuit, et ipsa illos constituit in sedibus patrum. Non te ergo putes desertam, quia non uides Paulum, quia non uides Petrum, quia non uides illos, per quos nata es: de prole tua creuit tibi paternitas. Pro patribus tuis nati sunt tibi filii: constitues eos principes super omnem terram. Filios genuit ecclesia, constituit eos pro patribus suis principes super omnem terram."

Distinction LXIX

GRATIAN. Part III. A cleric's tonsure, however, can be received from the hand of an abbot, if it is known that the imposition of hands was made upon that abbot by a bishop. Hence it reads in the Seventh Synod, [c. 14]:

> GRATIANUS. III. Pars. Tonsura uero clerici de manu abbatis suscipi potest, si eidem abbati manus inpositio ab episcopo facta noscatur. Unde in Septima Sinodo [c. 14.] legitur:

C. I. Abbots upon whom hands are imposed by bishops can tonsure certain persons.

Since we see many receiving the cleric's tonsure from a tender age without the imposition of hands, and, though they have not yet received the imposition of hands from a bishop, irregularly reading from the ambo in the assembly, we command that from now on this is by no means to be done. The same thing is also to be observed among monks. Part II. § 1. Every abbot, however, has license to make a reader by imposition of hands only in his own monastery, provided that it is known that the imposition of hands was made upon that abbot by a bishop according to the custom for appointing abbots, so long as it is established that he is a priest. § 2. In like manner, according to ancient custom, a chorepiscopus ought to promote readers by the bishop's precept.

> C. I. Abbates, quibus ab episcopis manus inponitur, aliquos tonsurare possunt.
> Quoniam uidemus multos sine manus inpositione a paruula etate tonsuram clerici accipientes, nondumque ab episcopo manus inpositione percepta super ambonem irregulariter in collecta legentes, precipimus amodo id minime fieri. Id ipsum quoque conseruandum est etiam inter monachos. II. Pars. §. 1. Lectoris autem manus inpositione licentia est unicuique abbati solummodo in proprio monasterio faciendi, si dumtaxat eidem abbati manus inpositio facta noscatur ab episcopo secundum morem preficiendorum abbatum, dum constet illum presbiterum esse. §. 2. Simili modo secundum antiquam consuetudinem corepiscopum preceptione oportet episcopi promouere lectores.

C. II. Those who have not been advanced by the bishop are not to exorcize.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea, [c. 26]. Those who have not yet been advanced by bishops ought not to exorcize, either in churches or in houses.

> C. II. Non exorcizent qui ab episcopo prouecti non sunt.
> Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 26.] Non oportet exorcizare eos, qui necdum ab episcopis sunt prouecti, neque in ecclesiis, neque in domibus.

Distinction LXX

GRATIAN. A cleric cannot be ordained by bishops of another city, nor even is he to be ordained absolutely by his own bishop. Absolute ordination is prohibited by the Council of Chalcedon and is commanded to have a void imposition of hands; there it was enacted as follows, [canon 6]:

> GRATIANUS. Ab episcopis alterius ciuitatis clericus ordinari non poterit, nec etiam a proprio absolute ordinandus est: absoluta autem ordinatio Calcedonensi Concilio prohibetur et uacuam habere manus inpositionem precipitur; in quo sic statutum est: [can. 6.]

C. I. No one is to be ordained absolutely.

We command that no one be ordained absolutely as priest or deacon, nor anyone constituted in an ecclesiastical order, unless the one who is ordained manifestly earns the designation of a public appointment in a church of a city or an estate, or at a martyr's shrine, or in a monastery. Concerning those who are ordained absolutely, however, the holy synod has decreed that they have a void imposition of hands and that no such act has validity, to the injury of the very man who ordained him.

> C. I. Nullus est absolute ordinandus.

Neminem absolute ordinari presbiterum iubemus, uel diaconum, nec quemlibet in ecclesiastica ordinatione constitutum, nisi manifeste in ecclesia ciuitatis, siue possessionis, aut in martirio, aut in monasterio, hic, qui ordinatur, mereatur ordinationis publicae uocabulum. Eorum autem, qui absolute ordinantur, decreuit sancta sinodus uacuam habere manus inpositionem, et nullum tale factum ualere ad iniuriam ipsius, qui eum ordinauit.

C. II. An ordination made without a title is to be void.

Likewise from the synod of Urban [II] held at Piacenza, [c. 15]. Enacting things consonant with the statutes of the holy canons, we decree that an ordination made without a title is to be regarded as void, and that in whatever church a man is given a title, he is to persevere in it perpetually. § 1. It is altogether impermissible, however, for anyone to be given a title in two churches, but let each man be regarded as a canon only in the church in which he is enrolled. For although by a bishop's arrangement one person can preside over diverse churches, he nevertheless ought not to be a prebendary canon except of the one church in which he is enrolled. § 1. If, however, there are chapels that cannot support clerics from their own revenues, let the care and arrangement of them fall to the provost of the greater church to which the chapels appear to be subject, and let him provide both for the possessions and for the ecclesiastical offices of the chapels. GRATIAN. At the same council a tenth preface was also added to the ancient nine, which reads thus: "It is right and salutary, she who conceived your only-begotten Son by the overshadowing of the Holy Spirit, and, the glory of virginity remaining, poured forth the eternal light upon the world, Jesus Christ our Lord."

C. II. Irrita sit ordinatio sine titulo facta.

Item ex sinodo Urbani [II.] habita Placentiae. [c. 15.] Sanctorum canonum statutis consona sanctientes decernimus, ut sine titulo facta ordinatio irrita habeatur, et in qua ecclesia quilibet titulatus est, in ea perpetuo perseueret. §. 1. Omnino autem in duabus aliquem titulari non liceat, sed unusquisque, in qua titulatus est, in ea tantum canonicus habeatur. Licet enim episcopi dispositione unus diuersis preesse possit ecclesiis, canonicus tamen prebendarius, nisi unius ecclesiae, in qua conscriptus est, esse non debet. §. 1. Si que tamen capellae sunt, que suis redditibus clericos sustentare non possunt, ea cura ac dispositio preposito maioris ecclesiae, cui capellae subditae esse uidentur, inmineat, et tam de possessionibus quam de ecclesiasticis capellarum offitiis ipse prouideat. Gratian. In eodem etiam concilio antiquis nouem prefationibus decima addita est, que ita se habet: "Equum et salutare, que et unigenitum tuum S. Spiritus obumbratione concepit, et uirginitatis gloria permanente lumen eternum mundo effudit, Iesum Christum Dominum nostrum."

Distinction LXXI

GRATIAN. Concerning clerics not to be ordained by a bishop of another city, it was enacted in the Council of Sardica, [cc. 18 and 19], where Bishop Januarius is read to have said:

GRATIANUS. De clericis uero non ordinandis ab episcopo alterius ciuitatis, in Sardicensi Concilio [c. 18. et 19.] statutum est, in quo Ianuarius Episcopus legitur dixisse:

C. I. Clerics are not to be ordained by a bishop of another city.

Let your holiness also enact this: that no bishop be permitted to solicit an ecclesiastic of another city and ordain him as a cleric in his own diocese. For discords are accustomed to arise from these contentions; and therefore let the judgment of all prohibit anyone from daring to do this. § 1. Bishop Hosius said: And we all enact this also: that whoever wishes to ordain a minister belonging to another parish without the consent and will of that minister's bishop, his ordination is not to be valid.

C. I. Clerici ab episcopo alterius ciuitatis non ordinentur.

Illud quoque sanctitas uestra statuat, ut nulli episcopo liceat alterius ciuitatis ecclesiasticum sollicitare et in sua diocesi clericum ordinare. Quia ex his contentionibus solent nasci discordiae, et ideo prohibeat omnium sentencia, ne quis hoc facere audeat. §. 1. Osius episcopus dixit: Et hoc uniuersi constituimus, ut quicumque ex alia parrochia uoluerit alienum ministrum sine consensu ipsius et sine uoluntate ordinare, non sit rata eius ordinatio.

C. II. On the same.

Likewise Innocent, [to Victricius, Bishop of Rouen, epistle II, c. 7]. Let no one presume to ordain a cleric from another church unless that cleric's bishop, having been entreated by prayers, is willing to grant him.

C. II. De eodem.

Item Innocentius. [ad Victricium Rothomagensem Episcopum, epist. II. c. 7.] De aliena ecclesia ordinare clericum nullus presumat nisi eius episcopus precibus exoratus concedere uoluerit.

C. III. If one is ordained without the consent of his own bishop, let his ordination be void.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea, [c. 16, at the end]. If anyone shall dare to ordain in a church someone who belongs to another, when he does not have the consent of the bishop from whom the cleric withdrew, let such an ordination be void.

C. III. Qui sine episcopi sui consensu ordinatur, irrita sit eius ordinatio.

Item ex Niceno Concilio. [c. 16. in fin.] Si quis ausus fuerit aliquem, qui ad alterum pertinet, in ecclesia ordinare, cum non habeat consensum illius episcopi, a quo recessit clericus, irrita sit huiusmodi ordinatio.

C. IV. A cleric of one church is not to be ordained in another.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 20]. It is not permissible for clerics established in individual churches, as we have already defined, to be ordained in the churches of another city; rather, let them remain in the one in which they first earned the right to minister, excepting those who have lost their own cities and by necessity have migrated to other churches. But if any bishop, after this definition, receives a cleric belonging to another bishop, it has pleased the holy synod that both the one who received and the one received are to remain excommunicated until the cleric himself returns to his own church.

C. IV. Clericus unius ecclesiae in alia non ordinetur.

Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 20.] Clericos in singulis ecclesiis constitutos non liceat, sicut iam diffiniuimus, in alterius ciuitatis ecclesiis ordinari; sed quiescant in ea, in qua ab initio ministrare meruerunt, exceptis illis, qui proprias ciuitates perdiderunt, et ex necessitate ad alias ecclesias migrauerunt. Si uero quicumque episcopus post diffinitionem istam ad alium episcopum pertinentem clericum susceperit, placuit sanctae sinodo, et hunc, qui suscepit, et eum, qui susceptus est, tamdiu excommunicatos manere, quamdiu ipse clericus reuertatur ad propriam ecclesiam.

C. V. With apostolic permission, a cleric of one church can be ordained in another.

Likewise Gregory to Fortunatus, Bishop of Naples, [book V, epistle 11]. We recall that your fraternity requested of us that we grant Gratian, deacon of the church of Enafrenum, to be ordained for your church. And since his own church has no bishop whom he ought to obey—the enemy, namely, preventing him from rendering his ministry where he ought—we did not foresee that your petition should be deferred. Therefore, by these present writings we have thought it necessary to grant him to you, so that, with our authority intervening, you will have license, with God's favor, to establish that deacon as a cardinal cleric of your church.

C. V. Apostolica permissione unius ecclesiae clericus in altera ualet ordinari.

Item Gregorius Fortunato Episcopo Neapolitano. [lib. V. epist. 11.] Fraternitatem tuam a nobis petisse recolimus, ut Gratianum ecclesiae Enafrenae diaconem tuae concederemus ecclesiae ordinandum. Et quoniam nec episcopum, cui obsecundare debeat, propria habet ecclesia, hoste scilicet prohibente, quo suum debeat ministerium exhibere, peticionem tuam non preuidimus differendam. Idcirco scriptis tibi presentibus eum necessario duximus concedendum, habiturus licentiam illum diaconum nostra interueniente auctoritate ecclesiae tuae, Deo propitio, constituere cardinalem.

C. VI. A cleric is not to be received in any church without letters from his bishop.

Likewise from the Council of Carthage, [c. 5]. Primatus, Bishop of Begesela, said: I suggest to your holiness that you enact that it is not permissible for another's cleric to be received by anyone without letters from his bishop, or to be retained with him, or for a layman to usurp for himself someone from another people so that he may possess him without the knowledge of the bishop from whose people he is. Bishop Gratus said: This observance guards peace; for I remember that it was similarly enacted at the most holy Council of Sardica that no one usurp a man of another people; but if perchance he is needed, let him request the man from his colleague and have him through the consent of his bishop.

C. VI. Sine litteris sui episcopi in aliqua ecclesia clericus non suscipiatur.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi. [c. 5.] Primatus episcopus Begeselitanus dixit: Suggero sanctitati uestrae, ut statuatis, non licere clericum alienum ab aliquo suscipi sine litteris episcopi sui, neque apud se retinere, nec laicum usurpare sibi de plebe aliena, ut eum obtineat sine conscientia eius episcopi, de cuius plebe est. Gratus episcopus dixit: Hec obseruantia pacem custodit; nam et memini in sanctissimo concilio Sardicensi similiter statutum, ut nemo alterius plebis hominem usurpet: sed si forte erit necessarius, petat a collega suo, et per consensum sui episcopi habeat.

C. VII. A cleric is not to minister outside his own church without commendatory letters.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 13]. It is wholly impermissible for a foreign cleric or reader to minister anywhere outside his own city without commendatory letters from his own bishop.

C. VII. Sine litteris commendaticiis extra suam ecclesiam clericus non ministret.

Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 13.] Extraneo clerico et lectori extra suam ciuitatem sine commendaticiis litteris proprii episcopi nusquam penitus liceat ministrare.

C. VIII. On the same.

Likewise from a sermon of Saint Augustine to the people. We exhort your Christian devotion that, according to the institutes of the holy canons, a priest coming from elsewhere not be received in churches founded by you unless he was consecrated by the bishop of your church or is received by him through commendatory letters.

C. VIII. De eodem.

Item ex sermone S. Augustini ad populum. Hortamur Christianitatem uestram, ut iuxta sanctorum canonum instituta, in ecclesiis a uobis fundatis aliunde ueniens presbiter non suscipiatur, nisi a uestrae fuerit ecclesiae episcopo consecratus, aut ab eo per commendaticias litteras suscipiatur.

C. IX. Pilgrim clerics are not to be received without a canonical letter.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, [c. 7]. No one ought to receive pilgrim clerics without a formata, which the Greeks call an epistle.

C. IX. Absque formata clerici peregrini non suscipiantur.

Item ex Concilio Antioceno. [c. 7.] Nullum absque formata, quam Greci epistolam dicunt, suscipi peregrinorum clericorum oportet.

Distinction LXXII

GRATIAN. A bishop, however, is to grant dimissory letters only when requested, as was enacted in the Synod held at Rome.

GRATIANUS. Dimissorias uero litteras episcopus non nisi rogatus tribuat sicut statutum est in Sinodo habita Romae.

C. I. Dimissory letters are not to be furnished to anyone unless he himself requests them.

Let a bishop not make dimissory letters for a priest subject to him or another cleric unless requested by that very man, lest the sheep be found as though lost or wandering.

C. I. Nisi eodem petente, nulli dimissoriae litterae prestentur.

Episcopus subiecto sibi sacerdoti, uel alii clerico, nisi ab ipso postulatus, dimissorias non faciat, ne ouis quasi perdita aut errans inueniatur.

C. II. On the same.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 21]. Let no one dare either to retain another's cleric, unless his bishop grants him, or to promote him in the church entrusted to himself. Readers, psalmists, and doorkeepers also retain the name of clerics.

C. II. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 21.] Clericum alienum, nisi concedente episcopo, nemo audeat uel retinere, uel promouere in ecclesiam sibi creditam. Clericorum autem nomen etiam lectores et psalmistae et hostiarii retinent.

C. III. One ordained in one church is not to be received in another.

Likewise from the Council of Milevis, [II, c. 15]. It has pleased us that whoever is elected even once in a church is not to be held for the clerical state by another church.

[PALEA.

C. III. In una ecclesia ordinatus in alia non suscipiatur.

Item ex Concilio Mileuitano. [II. c. 15.] Placuit, ut quicumque in ecclesia uel semel eligitur ab alia ecclesia ad clericatum non teneatur.

[PALEA.

Distinction LXXIII

GRATIAN. It is to be seen how a commendatory, dimissory, or canonical epistle is to be made. For Greek letters ought to be inserted in that epistle, and not without cause. No one who has even a slight knowledge of the Greek language is ignorant that the elements of Greek letters also express numbers. Therefore, lest any fraud of falsity be rashly presumed in making canonical epistles, which Latin custom calls formatae, it was most salutarily devised and enacted by the 318 Fathers assembled at Nicaea that canonical epistles have the following method of calculation or computation: namely, that there be taken into the computation the first Greek elements of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, that is, PI, GAMMA, ALPHA, which elements signify the numbers eighty, four hundred, and one. Also the first letter of the apostle Peter, that is, PI, which signifies the number eighty; also the first letter of the bishop who writes, the second letter of the one to whom it is written, the third letter of the one receiving it, the fourth letter of the city from which it is written, and the number of whatever indiction pertains to that time are to be taken. And thus, when all these Greek letters, which, as we have said, express numbers, have been brought together into one, let the epistle contain the one total, whatever has been collected; let the one who receives it inquire after this expressly with every caution. In addition, let him add separately in the epistle the ninety-ninth number also, which it signifies according to the Greek elements.

GRATIANUS. Qualiter uero commendaticia, uel dimissoria seu formata epistola facienda sit, uidendum est. Debent namque litterae grecae interponi in ea epistola, et non sine causa. Greca enim elementa litterarum numeros etiam exprimere, nullus, qui uel tenuiter greci sermonis noticiam habet, ignorat. Ne igitur in faciendis epistolis canonicis, quas mos latinus "Formatas" uocat, aliqua fraus falsitatis temere presumeretur, hoc a Patribus CCCXVIII. Niceae congregatis saluberrime inuentum est et constitutum, ut formatae epistolae hanc calculationis seu supputationis habeant rationem, id est, ut assumantur in supputationem prima greca elementa Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti, hoc est, PI. GAMMA. ALPHA. que elementa octogenarium et quadringentesimum et primum significant numerum. Petri quoque apostoli prima littera, id est PI., que numerum octoginta significat; eius quoque, qui scribit, episcopi prima littera; cui scribitur, secunda littera; accipientis, tertia littera; ciuitatis quoque, de qua scribitur, quarta, et indictionis, quecumque est illius temporis, numerus assumatur. Atque ita his omnibus grecis litteris, que, ut diximus, numeros exprimunt, in unum ductis, unam, quecumque fuerit collecta, summam epistola teneat; hanc qui suscipit, omni cum cautela requirat expresse. Addat preterea separatim in epistola etiam nonagenarium et nonum numerum, qui secundum greca elementa significat.

C. I. A specimen of the canonical epistle that was made by the 318 Fathers in the Synod of Nicaea.

In the name of the Father, PI, and of the Son, GAMMA, and of the Holy Spirit, ALPHA. PI. To Walter, Bishop of Speyer: I, Burchard, devoted servant of Christ's flock of the holy church of Worms, wish in the true God the blessedness of supreme felicity. Although the holy catholic Church is ready to follow the evangelical teachings which say, "He who receives a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward, and he who receives a just man in the name of a just man shall receive a just man's reward, etc.," and the Apostle commands that hospitality be pursued and that one share in the necessities of holy men; nevertheless, because of those who have a seared conscience, who say that they are simple although they are filled with diabolical cunning, and who say that they pass from place to place for a work of piety although they are fugitives through the action of their own malice, and who say that they have been inserted into the sacred ministry although they have not, it was enacted by the holy Fathers that no foreign and unknown cleric is to be received by any bishop and enthroned in his church unless he has from his own bishop an epistle which in the canons is called a formata. Therefore we make known to your fraternity that our present brother, the bearer of these letters, named Hermann, was not expelled from us for his wickedness, but, at the brothers' request, because he was of our household and was baptized as ours, we made him a free man, his manumission received canonically at the horn of the altar, and ordained him to the grade of the priesthood. For him we also make these dimissory or commendatory letters and direct him to your beloved fraternity, so that he may be able to remain in your parish under your sacred governance and defense. I, I say, Burchard, humble bishop, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and in the unity of the holy Church, in which the right of binding and loosing was given to Peter, release the priest Hermann from the city of Worms in indiction X, and I give you license to enthrone him in whatever church of your parish you wish. We therefore have decreed that this epistle be fortified here and there with Greek letters, and have judged that it be confirmed with the ring of our church. May Christ preserve your fraternity unharmed for us. PI. GAMMA. ALPHA. PI. BETA. ETA. ZETA. AMEN. Given at Worms on the Ides of March, in the year 1012 of the Lord's incarnation, indiction X.

C. I. Exemplar formatae epistolae, que in Nicena Sinodo a CCCXVIII. Patribus facta est.

In nomine Patris PI., et Filii GAMMA., et Spiritus sancti ALPHA. PI. Walterio Spirensi episcopo ego Burchardus sanctae Vormaciensis ecclesiae deuotus gregis Christi famulus, in Deo uero summae felicitatis beatitudinem. Cum sancta catholica ecclesia prompta sit sequi documenta euangelica, que dicunt: "Qui recipit prophetam in nomine prophetae, accipiet mercedem prophetae, et qui recipit iustum in nomine iusti, mercedem iusti accipiet, etc." et Apostolus iubeat hospitalitatem sectari, et necessitatibus sanctorum uirorum communicare; tamen propter eos, qui cauteriatam habent suam conscientiam, dicentes se esse simplices, cum sint astutia diabolica repleti, et pro opere pietatis dicunt se de loco ad locum transire, cum sint sua malicia faciente fugitiui, et dicunt se esse ministerio sacro insertos, cum non sint: statutum est a sanctis Patribus, neminem clericum alienum et ignotum recipi ab aliquo episcopo, et inthronizari in sua ecclesia, nisi habeat a proprio episcopo epistolam, que in canonibus nominatur Formata. Ideo notum facimus fraternitati uestrae, quod presens frater noster, harum litterarum portitor, nomine Hermannus, non pro sua nequicia expulsus est a nobis, sed postulantibus fratribus, eo quod ex familia nostra fuit et noster baptizatus, fecimus ei libertatem receptam in cornu altaris canonice, et ordinauimus eum ad gradum presbiterii. Cui etiam has dimissorias siue commendaticias litteras facimus, et eum ad uestram dilectam fraternitatem dirigimus, ut in uestra parrochia sub uestro sacro regimine et defensione consistere ualeat. Ego, inquam, Burchardus humilis episcopus, in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti, et in unitate sanctae ecclesiae, in qua Petro datum est ius ligandi atque soluendi, absoluo Hermannum presbiterum de ciuitate Vormaciensi indictione X., et licentiam do uobis inthronizandi eum in quacumque ecclesia uultis uestrae parrochiae. Hanc ergo epistolam grecis litteris hinc inde munire decreuimus, et annulo nostrae ecclesiae firmare censuimus. Fraternitatem uestram Christus nobis incolumem conseruet. PI. GAMMA. ALPHA. PI. BETA. ETA. ZETA. AMEN. Data Vormaciae Idibus Marcii, anno Dominicae incarnationis MXII. Indictione X.

C. II. Here begins a canonical epistle issued by the 318 Bishops and by Atticus, Bishop of the city of Constantinople:

To the most holy brother in Christ, to be embraced with the highest sweetness of charity, ALPHA, bishop of that city: GAMMA, prelate of that church, wishes perpetual health in Christ. OMEGA. GAMMA. ALPHA. OMEGA. For the rest, let your holy fraternity know that this cleric, Hermann by name, instructed and tonsured in our parish, requested our littleness that we draw up for him commendatory letters by which, commended to your highness, he could dwell under the protection of your governance. Consenting to his will, according to canonical authority we gave him dimissory letters, through which we both grant him that, persisting in divine service under your teaching, he may serve his own benefit, and give you license, if you judge him worthy, to promote him to sacred orders. Therefore receive him commended to your care, and guard him—released from our territory—among the number of your sheep. In order that these letters, confirmed by the force of truth, may be received by you without doubt, we have taken care to confirm them with Greek letters, as canonical authority teaches. May the Holy Trinity grant that your blessedness long fare well for the governance of his holy Church, AMEN. (Or thus: ETA. THETA (which express the same total), indiction X. This canonical epistle contains a total of the number 1,315. We place the Greek GAMMA first in the name of that man because the Greeks in some places put it for the consonantal GAMMA, as in DAVID and EVANGELION.)]

Distinction LXXIV

GRATIAN. Part I. It is asked concerning those who scorn to be promoted by their bishops, whether they are to be elevated unwillingly or not. Concerning them it is found to have been enacted as follows in the Third Council of Orléans, [c. 7]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Queritur de his qui ab episcopis suis promoueri contempnunt, an inuiti sint sublimandi, an non? De his ita statutum inuenitur in Concilio Aurelianensi III.: [cap. 7.]

C. I. A bishop who presumes to ordain an unwilling man is to be subject to suspension for a year.

A bishop who presumes to ordain one who is unwilling or protests, being subjected to a year's penance, is not to presume to celebrate masses.

C. I. Annuae suspensioni subiaceat episcopus, qui inuitum ordinare presumit.

Episcopus, qui inuitum aut reclamantem ordinare presumpserit, annuali penitenciae subditus missas facere non presumat.

C. II. No one is to be promoted unwillingly.

Likewise Gregory to Bishop Natalis, [of Salona, in book I of the Register, epistle 19]. We have learned that the records which you sent us, drawn up in the council's registry, in which Archdeacon Honoratus is implicated, are full of the seed of quarrels, since at one and the same time a single person, unwilling, is advanced to the order of the priesthood, while he is removed from the office of the diaconate as though unworthy. And just as it is just that no one be compelled to rise unwillingly, so I think it must be judged that no innocent person be cast down unjustly from the ministry of his order. To the contrary it is found in the Council of Carthage, [c. 31]:

C. II. Nullus promoueatur inuitus.

Item Gregorius Natali Episcopo. [Salonitano, in lib. I. Reg. epist. 19.] Gesta, que nobis consilii uestri secretario confecta direxistis, in quo archidiaconus Honoratus adicitur, plena esse semine iurgiorum cognouimus, cum uno eodemque tempore una persona nolens ad sacerdotii ordinem prouehitur, que tamquam inmerita a diaconatus offitio remoueatur. Et sicut iustum est, ut nemo crescere conpellatur inuitus, ita censendum puto, ne quisquam insons ab ordinis sui ministerio deiciatur iniuste. Econtra inuenitur in Concilio Cartaginensi: [c. 31.]

C. III. Those who scorn to be promoted by their bishops are to be cast down from their place.

If any clerics have scorned to be promoted by their bishops, let them not remain there from which they refused to depart.

C. III. Qui ab episcopis suis promoueri contempnunt, a loco suo deiciantur.

Si qui clerici ab episcopis suis promoueri contempserint, nec illic maneant, unde recedere noluerunt.

C. IV. Likewise on the same.

It has pleased us that any clerics or deacons who, because of the necessities of ecclesiastical affairs, have not obeyed their bishops wishing to promote them to a higher honor in their church, are not to minister there in their own grade, from which they refused to depart.

> C. IV. Item de eodem.
> Placuit, ut quicumque clerici uel diaconi pro necessitatibus ecclesiasticarum rerum non obtemperauerint episcopis suis, uolentibus eos ad honorem ampliorem in ecclesia sua promouere, nec illic ministrent in gradu suo, unde recedere noluerunt.

C. V. Later bishops are not to be set before earlier ones.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 23]. Let no one set a later bishop before an earlier one among bishops whose life is not reproved, unless perhaps, lifted up by pride, he scorns to fulfill what the bishop commanded for the necessity of the Church. Part II. § 1. Certainly, if because of a simpler nature he is unable to fulfill or discharge the office of the archdiaconate, let the one whom the bishop has elected to be set above him hold the name of his place and the ordering of the church.

> C. V. Posteriores prioribus episcopi non preponantur.
> Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 23.] Episcoporum etiam, quorum uita non reprehenditur, posteriorem priori nullus preponat, nisi forte superbia elatus quod pro necessitate ecclesiae episcopus iusserit inplere contempnat. II. Pars. §. 1. Sane si offitium archidiaconatus propter simpliciorem naturam inplere aut expedire nequiuerit, ille loci sui teneat nomen et ordinationem ecclesiae, quem elegerit episcopus preponendum.

C. VI. A person ought not to be held unwillingly in the place in which he was ordained.

Likewise Gregory to John, Bishop of Syracuse, [book XI, epistle 34]. By the report of certain persons it has reached us that Cosmas—who, from being a monk of the monastery of Saint Lucy, was made a subdeacon in the church of Syracuse by your predecessor Maximian of venerable memory, and is afterward said to have been ordained by you as a priest on the estate called Juliana—is so vehemently afflicted by excessive sadness and by the character of the place that he regards his life as a punishment and seeks the aid of flight for his contrition. And therefore, because we ought to show ourselves toward our subjects as we, if we had been subjects, would wish our prelates to be toward us, it is an act of great kindness if your holiness takes care to bring him back to the church where he discharged the office of the subdiaconate and to establish him there as a cardinal cleric. And, as far as we judge, you ought to do this if there is nothing that justly exasperates your mind against him. But if there is some fault, let your fraternity make this known to us by your letters, so that we may be able to know it. Part III. GRATIAN. But that text of Gregory is to be understood of those who, not from a cause of necessity but from a cause of ingratitude, cunningly seek to be promoted by their bishops. The text of the Council of Carthage, however, is to be understood of those who are unwilling to obey their bishops when, because of the necessity of the Church, they wish to promote them to higher things. Anyone can corroborate this distinction from the decree of Pope Simplicius, who, writing to John, Archbishop of Ravenna, [epistle II], says among other things:

> C. VI. In quo loco quis ordinatus est inuitus teneri non debet.

Item Gregorius Iohanni Episcopo Siracusano. [lib. XI. epist. 34.] Quorumdam ad nos relatione peruenit, Cosmam, qui ex monacho monasterii S. Luciae a decessore tuo uenerandae memoriae Maximiano in ecclesia Siracusana subdiaconus factus, atque a te postea in possessione, que Iuliana uocatur, presbiter dicitur ordinatus, ita nimia tristicia et loci qualitate uehementer afflictum, ut uitam sibi penam existimet, et contricioni suae fugae querat auxilium. Et ideo, quia tales erga subiectos nostros debemus existere, quales nos, si subiecti fuissemus, nostros uellemus esse prepositos, magnae benignitatis est, si eum in ecclesia, ubi subdiaconii est functus offitio, sanctitas tua reducere atque illic studuerit constituere cardinalem. Quod et facere, quantum arbitramur, debes, si nichil est, quod iuste contra eum animos tuos exasperet. Si uero aliqua culpa est, suis nobis epistolis hoc fraternitas uestra, ut scire possimus, insinuet. III. Pars. Gratian. Verum illud Gregorii de his intelligendum est, qui non causa necessitatis, sed causa ingratitudinis callide ab episcopis suis promoueri queruntur. Illud autem Cartaginensis concilii de his intelligitur, qui nolunt obtemperare episcopis suis propter necessitatem ecclesiae uolentibus eos ad altiora promouere. Hanc distinctionem ex decreto Simplicii Papae quilibet ualet corroborare, qui scribens Iohanni Archiepiscopi Rauennati, [epist. II.] ait inter cetera:

C. VII. No one is to be dragged unwillingly to the episcopate.

Where did you learn those things which you perpetrated against Gregory, our bishop and fellow brother, not from affection but from envy? You suffered him to be dragged before you with inexcusable violence and to be harassed, so that you imposed so great an honor upon him not through tranquility of mind but through madness, as it must be said. For such things could not have been done with soundness of counsel. We are unwilling to aggravate what was done, lest we be compelled to judge what is deserved; for one who abuses the power permitted to him deserves to lose his privilege. But we give notice that, if after these things you presume something of this kind and perchance believe that you can make anyone a bishop, priest, or deacon against his will, know that the ordinations of the church of Ravenna or of Emilia are to be taken away from you.

C. VII. Non est aliquis inuitus ad episcopatum pertrahendus.

Ubi ista didicisti, que in episcopum et confratrem nostrum Gregorium non dilectione, sed inuidia perpetrasti? quem inexcusabili uiolentia pertrahi ad te passus es atque uexari, ut ei tantum honorem non per animi tranquillitatem, sed per amentiam, sicut dicendum est, irrogares? Neque enim talia potuissent fieri sanitate consilii. Nolumus exaggerare quod gestum est, ne cogamur iudicare quod dignum est; nam priuilegium meretur amittere, qui permissa sibi abutitur potestate. Denunciamus autem, quod, si post hec aliquid tale presumpseris, et aliquem seu episcopum, uel presbiterum, uel diaconum inuitum facere forte credideris, ordinationes tibi Rauennatis ecclesiae uel Emiliensis noueris auferendas.

C. VIII. On the same.

Likewise Gregory to Antoninus the Subdeacon, [book II, epistle 16, indiction 10]. Honoratus, archdeacon of the church of Salona, had requested by a supplication sent to my predecessor of holy memory that he in no way be compelled by his bishop, against custom and unwillingly, to be promoted to the order of a higher grade. For he declared that this was being done to him not for the sake of advancement but because of ill will. For this reason our predecessor of holy memory had even then forbidden by his writings Natalis, our brother and fellow bishop, to promote the aforesaid Archdeacon Honoratus unwillingly or to retain in his heart the pain of the ill will he had conceived. And when these same things had also been most earnestly forbidden by me, he, not only neglecting

God's commands but also contemning our writings, attempted cunningly to degrade the aforesaid archdeacon under the guise of promoting him to a higher honor. Hence it was brought about that, when the latter had been removed from the place of the archdiaconate, he brought in another who could comply with his conduct. We judge that this Archdeacon Honoratus cannot be displeasing to his bishop for any other reason than that he prohibited him from giving sacred vessels to his relatives. Both my predecessor of holy memory then and I now wished to investigate this cause with subtle inquiry, but, conscious of himself and his deeds, he deferred sending his person to judgment. Hence we have thought your experience should be strengthened by the authority of the present precept, so that, coming to Salona, it may take care to exhort Natalis, our brother and fellow bishop, admonished by at least so many writings, to receive the above-mentioned archdeacon in his status. But if, as is his custom, he should perhaps contumaciously defer doing this, you shall, by authority of the apostolic see, forbid him the use of the pallium which had been granted him by this see. If you perceive that even after losing the pallium he still perseveres in the same obstinacy, you shall deprive that bishop of participation in the Lord's body and blood. GRATIAN. Discipline is also to be applied by which those unwilling to be promoted to sacred orders are impelled to obey their bishops. For those constituted in the lesser orders are to be promoted gradually through the individual grades, so that those who scorn to obey their bishops may grieve that men whom they formerly had as subjects have been set above them. Hence Gelasius writes to Bishop Victor:

C. VIII. De eodem.

Item Gregorius Antonino Subdiacono. [lib. II. epist. 16. Indict. 10.] Honoratus, archidiaconus Salonitanae ecclesiae a sanctae memoriae decessore meo missa supplicatione poposcerat, ut ab antistite suo inuitus prouehi ad fortioris gradus ordinem contra morem nullo modo cogeretur. Hoc enim fieri sibi non causa prouehendi, sed causa ingratitudinis perhibebat. Pro qua re tunc etiam sanctae memoriae predecessor noster scriptis suis Natali fratri coepiscopoque nostro interdixerat, ne Predictum Honoratum archidiaconum inuitum proueheret, neue dolorem conceptae ingratitudinis in corde retineret. Cumque etiam a me hec eadem summopere fuerint interdicta, non solum mandata Dei negligens, sed etiam scripta nostra contempnens, prefatum archidiaconem quasi ad fortiorem honorem prouehens conatus est callide degradare. Unde actum est, ut, eodem archidiaconatus loco submoto, alium adsciscerat, qui eius obtemperare moribus potuisset. Quem Honoratum archidiaconem arbitramur antistiti suo aliunde displicere non posse, nisi quod eum uasa sacra suis parentibus dare prohibebat. Quam causam subtili uolumus et tunc sanctae memoriae decessor meus, et nunc ego indagatione perquirere, sed sui suorumque actuum conscius personam suam ad iudicium postposuit destinare. Unde experientiam tuam presentis precepti auctoritate duximus fulciendam, quatinus, conueniens in Salonia, Natalem fratrem nostrum et coepiscopum nostrum saltim tot scriptis ammonitum studeat adhortari, ut supra memoratum archidiaconem in suo statu suscipiat. Quod si facere hoc contumaciter, ut consueuit, forte distulerit, usum pallii ei, qui ab hac sede concessus sibi fuerat, ex auctoritate sedis apostolicae contradices. Quem si etiam amisso pallio adhuc in eadem pertinacia perseuerare perspexeris, dominici corporis et sanguinis eundem antistitem participatione priuabis. Gratian. Adhibenda est etiam disciplina, qua nolentes promoueri ad sacros ordines ad obediendum episcopis suis pronocentur. In minoribus siquidem ordinibus constituti paulatim per singulos gradus sunt prouehendi, ut contempnentes suis obedire episcopis doleant sibi esse prelatos, quos prius habebant subiectos. Unde Gelasius scribit Victori Episcopo:

C. IX. When those in the greater orders have scorned to be ordained, men are to be promoted from the lesser orders.

Your affection has consulted us concerning the promotion of its clerics, declaring that the deacons refuse to come to the grade of the priesthood, of which you recall your church to be in need.

Therefore, because ecclesiastical moderation and gravity do not permit men to be made against their will, that ordination can be effected so as to make willing men from the unwilling if you take care to promote to the priesthood those whom you have among the acolytes or subdeacons who are more mature in age and whose life is approved, so that those who were unwilling to advance among their own may be rendered later than their inferiors among the lesser men. Let these men obtain the advantages of a priest more abundantly than the deacons, so that, constrained at least by this reason, the latter may strive to seek both the honor which they had fled and its gain.

> C. IX. Cum maiores ordinari contempserint, de minoribus promoueantur ordinibus.
> Consuluit dilectio tua de suorum promotione clericorum, perhibens, quod diaconi ad presbiterii gradum (quo ecclesiam tuam memoras indigere) uenire detrectant.
> Quapropter, quia inuitos fieri ecclesiastica moderatio grauitasque non patitur, ut ex nolentibus fiant uolentes ordinatio illa potest perficere, si quos habes in acolitis, uel subdiaconibus maturiores etate, et quorum sit uita probabilis, hos in presbiterium studeas promouere, ut, qui in suis proficere noluerunt, reddantur suis inferioribus post minores. Ipsa commoda presbiteri propensius quam diaconi consequantur, ut hac saltem ratione constricti et honorem, quem refugerant, appetere nitantur, et questum.

Distinction LXXV

GRATIAN. Part I. According to what is contained in the Roman Order, no particular time of consecration is chosen for the blessing of a bishop. For they are blessed at every time, provided that they receive the blessing while fasting and at the third hour. Hence Anacletus, Bishop of the city of Rome, writes to all the Bishops, [epistle II, at the beginning]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Tempus autem consecrationis, sicut in Ordine Romano habetur, ad episcopi benedictionem non eligitur. Omni enim tempore benedicuntur, dummodo ieiunii et hora tertia benedictionem accipiant. Unde Anacletus urbis Romae Episcopus scribit omnibus Episcopis: [epist. II. in princ.]

C. I. At what hour the ordinations of bishops ought to be made.

By apostolic authority the ordinations of bishops are to be celebrated by all the bishops who are in the same province. Assembling together, let them celebrate the scrutiny with prayers, imposing hands with the holy Gospels, praying on the Lord's day at the third hour, and anointing them with sacred anointing in the manner of the apostles and Moses, after the example of the prophets who anointed the heads of kings; because all sanctification is established to be in the Holy Spirit, whose invisible power is mingled with the holy chrism. And by this rite let them celebrate the solemn ordination. Part II. GRATIAN. The time of consecration, however, is confined within the space of three months, beyond which, unless necessity compels, the consecrations of bishops may not be deferred after election. Hence it reads in the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 25]:

> C. I. Ordinationes episcoporum qua hora fieri debeant.

Ordinationes episcoporum auctoritate apostolica ab omnibus, qui in eadem fuerint prouincia, episcopis sunt celebrandae. Qui simul conuenientes scrutinium cum precibus, celebrent, manus cum sanctis euangeliis inponentes, dominica die, hora tertia orantes, sacraque unctione prophetarum exemplo regum capita perungentium, eos more apostolorum et Moysi ungentes; quia omnis sanctificatio constat esse in Spiritu sancto, cuius uirtus inuisibilis sancto est crismati permixta, et hoc ritu solempnem celebrent ordinationem. II. Pars. Gratian. Tempus autem consecrationis trium mensium spatio clauditur, ultra quod, nisi necessitate cogente, episcoporum consecrationes post electionem differri non licet. Unde in Calcedonensi Concilio [c. 25.] legitur:

C. II. The ordination of bishops is not to be deferred beyond three months.

Since certain metropolitans, as has been reported to us, neglect the flocks entrusted to them and defer making the ordinations of bishops, it has pleased the holy synod that the ordinations of bishops be made within three months, unless perhaps an inexcusable necessity compels the time of ordination to be prolonged further. But if any bishop does not observe this, we judge that he ought to be subject to ecclesiastical condemnation, while the revenues of the same widowed church are to be preserved intact with the steward of that church. Part III. GRATIAN. The ordinations of the others, however, especially of priests and Levites, ought to be made only at certain times and days, namely on Saturday evening or on the morning of the Lord's day, with the fast continued. Hence Zephyrinus, Archbishop of the city of Rome, writes to all the Bishops, [epistle II]:

C. II. Ultra tres menses non differatur episcoporum ordinatio.

Quoniam quidam metropolitanorum, sicut ad nos perlatum est, negligunt greges sibi creditos, et differunt ordinationes facere episcoporum, placuit sanctae sinodo, intra tres menses fieri ordinationes episcoporum, nisi forte inexcusabilis necessitas coegerit tempus ordinationis amplius protelari. Si autem episcoporum quis hoc non obseruauerit, ipsum debere ecclesiasticae condempnationi subiacere, redditus uero eiusdem uiduatae ecclesiae integros reseruari apud economum eiusdem ecclesiae censemus. III. Pars. Gratian. Ceterorum uero ordinationes non nisi certis temporibus et diebus, maxime sacerdotum et Leuitarum, fieri debent, uespera uidelicet sabati, uel mane diei dominicae continuato ieiunio. Unde Zepherinus urbis Romae Archiepiscopus scribit omnibus Episcopis: [epist. II.]

C. III. At what hour priests and Levites are to be ordained.

Perform the ordinations of priests and Levites solemnly at a suitable time, with many standing by in their presence, and promote approved and learned men to this work, so that you may rejoice greatly in their fellowship and assistance.

C. III. Presbiteri et Leuitae qua hora ordinentur.

Ordinationes presbiterorum Leuitarumque tempore congruo, multis coram astantibus, solempniter agite, et probabiles ac doctos uiros ad hoc opus prouehite, ut de eorum societate et adiumento plurimum gaudeatis.

C. IV. On the same.

Likewise Bishop Leo to Dioscorus, Bishop of Alexandria, [epistle LXXIX, c. 1]. What we know to have been observed by our Fathers with more attentive care, we also wish to be guarded by us: that priestly or Levitical ordination not be celebrated indiscriminately on every day, but that the beginnings of consecration be chosen after the Sabbath day and its night, which dawns upon the first day of the week, in which the sacred blessing is to be conferred upon those to be consecrated while they are fasting and by those who are fasting. It will belong to the same observance if the ordination is celebrated in the morning on the Lord's day itself, with the Sabbath fast continued, since it does not depart from the beginnings of the preceding night, which without doubt pertain to the day of the resurrection, as is also declared in the Lord's Pasch.

> C. IV. De eodem.
> Item Leo Episcopus Dioscoro Alexandrino Episcopo. [epist. LXXIX. cap. 1.] Quod a Patribus nostris propensiori cura nouimus esse seruatum, a nobis quoque uolumus custodiri, ut non passim diebus omnibus sacerdotalis uel leuitica ordinatio celebretur, sed post diem sabati eiusque noctis, que in prima sabati lucescit, exordia consecrandi eligantur, in quibus his, qui consecrandi sunt, ieiunis et a ieiunantibus sacra benedictio conferatur. Quod eiusdem obseruantiae erit, si mane ipso die dominico, continuato sabati ieiunio, ordinatio celebretur, a quo tempore precedentis noctis initia non recedunt, quod ad diem resurrectionis (sicut etiam in pasca Domini declaratur) pertinere non dubium est.

C. V. Why ordinations of priests are celebrated on the Lord's day.

Likewise, [in the same chapter]. Part IV. That ordinations of priests are celebrated on the Lord's day, we know to come not only from custom but also from apostolic teaching, Scripture making manifest that, when the apostles sent Paul and Barnabas at the command of the Holy Spirit to preach the Gospel to the gentiles, they imposed hands upon them while fasting and praying, so that we may understand with how great a devotion both of those giving and of those receiving care must be taken lest the sacrament of so great a blessing appear to have been fulfilled negligently. And therefore you will have piously and laudably complied with the apostolic institutes if you yourself also preserve this form of ordaining priests throughout the churches over which the Lord willed you to preside, so that the blessing is never granted to those to be consecrated except on the day of the Lord's resurrection, to which it is established that the beginning is assigned from the evening of the Sabbath, a day consecrated by so many mysteries of the divine dispensations that whatever distinguished thing was instituted by the Lord was accomplished in the dignity of this day. On it the world took its beginning; on it, through the resurrection, both death received its destruction and life its beginning.

C. VII. Concerning the times of ordination.

Likewise Gelasius to all the Bishops, [epistle I, c. 13]. Part V. The ordinations of priests and deacons ought not to be performed except at certain times and days, that is, at the fast of the fourth month, the seventh, and the tenth, but also at the beginning of Lent and the middle week, on the Sabbath fast toward evening. Let them know that the ordinations themselves are to be celebrated then, and let them not dare, for the sake of any advantage, to prefer either a priest or a deacon to those who were ordained before them.

Distinction LXXVI

GRATIAN. Part I. At what times fasts are to be celebrated Pope Callistus determines, writing to Bishop Benedict, [epistle I]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quibus temporibus ieiunia celebranda sint, Calixtus Papa determinat, scribens Benedicto Episcopo: [epist. I.]

C. I. At what times the fasts are to be celebrated.

We now decree that the fast which you learned was celebrated among us three times in the year is more fittingly to be held at four seasons, so that, just as the year revolves through four seasons, so we too may perform the solemn fourfold fast through the four seasons of the year.

> C. I. Quibus temporibus ieiunium celebrentur.
> Ieiunium, quod ter in anno apud nos celebrare didicisti, conuenientius nunc per quatuor tempora fieri decernimus, ut, sicut annus per quatuor uoluitur tempora, sic et nos solempne quaternum agamus ieiunium per quatuor anni tempora.

C. II. On the same.

Likewise from the Council of Mainz, [I, c. 34]. We enact that the four seasons of the year be observed by all persons with fasting, that is, in March, the first week; in June, the second; in September, the third; and in December, the fourth.

> C. II. De eodem.
>
> Item ex Concilio Magontiensi. [I. cap. 34.] Constituimus, ut quatuor tempora anni ab omnibus hominibus cum ieiunio obseruentur, id est in Martio, hebdomada prima; in Iunio, secunda; in septembri, tertia; in decembri, quarta.

C. III. On the same.

Likewise from the Council held at Seligenstadt, [c. 2]. Concerning the fast of the four seasons, we establish this certainty: if the Kalends of March occur on Wednesday or earlier, let the fast be celebrated in that same week. § 1. But if the Kalends of March extend to Thursday, Friday, or Saturday, let the fast be deferred to the following week. In like manner also, if the Kalends of June occur on Wednesday or earlier, let the fast be celebrated in the following week; and if they occur on Thursday, Friday, or Saturday, let the fast be reserved for the third week. § 2. And this is to be known: if at any time, according to the aforesaid rule, the fast of the month of June occurs on the vigil of Pentecost, it is not to be celebrated there, but in the solemn week of Pentecost itself, because a vigil and a fast ought not to be celebrated together. Even then, because of the solemnity of the Holy Spirit, let the deacons be clothed in dalmatics, let "Alleluia" be sung, and let "Let us bend the knees" not be said. § 3. It has been enacted in the same manner concerning the fast of the seventh month that, if the Kalends of September occur on Wednesday or earlier, let the fast be celebrated in the third week; and if they occur on Thursday, Friday, or Saturday, fasting is to take place in the fourth week. § 4. In December, however, this is to be observed: that the fast be celebrated on the Saturday immediately before the vigil of the Lord's Nativity, because if the vigil occurs on a Saturday, it is not fitting that the vigil and the fast be celebrated together. To the contrary, Urban, [II, in the Council of Piacenza, c. 14]:

> C. III. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Salegunstat habito. [cap. 2.] De ieiunio autem quatuor temporum hanc certitudinem statuimus, ut si kalendae Martii in feria quarta siue antea euenerint eadem hebdomada ieiunium celebretur. §. 1. Sin autem kalendae Martii in quintam feriam, aut in sextam, aut in sabatum distenduntur, in sequenti hebdomada ieiunium differatur. Simili quoque modo, si kalendae Iunii in quarta feria aut antea euenerint, in subsequenti hebdomada ieiunium celebretur; et si in quinta, aut in sexta feria, aut sabato contigerit, ieiunium in tertia hebdomada reseruetur. §. 2. Et hoc sciendum est, quod, si quando ieiunium mensis Iunii in uigilia pentecostes secundum predictam regulam euenerit, non ibi celebrandum erit, sed in ipsa hebdomada solempni pentecostes, quia uigilia simul et ieiunium celebrari non debent, etiam tunc propter solempnitatem sancti Spiritus diacones dalmaticis induantur, et "Alleluia" cantetur, et "Flectamus genua" non dicatur. §. 3. Eodem modo de septimi mensis ieiunio constitutum est, ut, si kalendae septembris in quarta feria euenerint aut antea, in tertia hebdomada ieiunium celebretur, et si in quinta, aut sexta, aut sabato contigerit, in quarta hebdomada ieiunandum erit. §. 4. In decembri uero illud obseruandum erit, ut proximo sabato ante uigiliam natalis Domini celebretur ieiunium, quia, si uigilia in sabato euenerit, simul uigiliam et ieiunium celebrari non conuenit. Contra Urbanus: [II. in Concilio Placentino, c. 14.]

C. IV. On the same.

We also enact that the fasts of the four seasons be celebrated in this order: let the first fast take place at the beginning of Lent, the second in the week of Pentecost, and the third and fourth in September and December in the customary manner.

> C. IV. De eodem.
>
> Statuimus etiam, ut ieiunia quatuor temporum hoc ordine celebrentur: primum ieiunium in initio quadragesimae, secundum in hebdomada pentecostes, tertium uero et quartum in septembri et decembri more solito fiat.

C. V. On the same.

Likewise from a sermon of Pope Leo, [I, sermon I on the fast of Pentecost]. Therefore, after the days of holy gladness which we have passed in honor of the Lord rising from the dead and then ascending into heaven, and after the gift of the Holy Spirit has been received, the custom of fasting was salutarily and necessarily ordained, so that, if negligent freedom and immoderate license perchance presumed anything amid the very joys of the festivity, the censure of religious abstinence may chastise it.

> C. V. De eodem.
>
> Item ex sermone Leonis Papae. [I. sermone I. de ieiunio pentecostes.] Igitur post sanctae leticiae dies, quos in honorem Domini a mortuis resurgentis ac deinde in celum ascendentis exegimus, postque acceptum sancti Spiritus donum, salubriter et necessarie consuetudo est ordinata ieiunii, ut, si quid forte inter ipsa festiuitatis gaudia negligens libertas et licentia inmoderata presumpserit, hoc religiosae abstinentiae censura castiget.

C. VI. On the same.

Likewise, [sermon VIII on the fast of the tenth month]. The usefulness of this observance, dearest brothers, has been established especially in the ecclesiastical fasts, which from the teaching of the Holy Spirit are distributed through the circuit of the whole year in such a way that the law of abstinence is assigned to all seasons. Indeed, we celebrate the spring fast in Lent, the summer fast at Pentecost, the autumn fast in the seventh month, and the winter fast in this one, which is the tenth, understanding that nothing in the divine precepts is empty and that all the elements serve the word of God for our instruction, since through the cardinal points of the world itself, as though through the four Gospels, we learn with an unceasing trumpet what we both preach and practice. Part II. GRATIAN. The first, fourth, seventh, and tenth months, however, we ought to understand not according to the reckoning of the Hebrews, but according to ours. For the first month among them is April, the fourth July, the seventh October, and the tenth January. Jerome, commenting above on Zechariah, explains what cause of fasting they had in these months and, in addition, in the fifth month, which is August, saying:

> C. VI. De eodem.
> Item. [sermone VIII. de ieiunio decimi mensis.] Huius obseruantiae utilitas, dilectissimi fratres, in ecclesiasticis precipue est constituta ieiuniis, que ex doctrina sancti Spiritus ita per totius anni circulum distributa sunt, ut lex abstinentiae omnibus sit asscripta temporibus. Siquidem ieiunium uernum in quadragesima, estiuum in pentecosten, autumpnale in mense septimo, hiemale in hoc, qui est decimus, celebremus, intelligentes diuinis nichil esse uacuum preceptis, et uerbo Dei ad erudicionem nostram omnia elementa seruire, dum per ipsius mundi cardines quasi per quatuor euangelia incessabili tuba discimus quod et predicamus, et agimus. II. Pars. Gratian. Primum uero mensem, quartum, septimum, et decimum, non Ebreorum ratione debemus accipere, sed nostra. Primus enim mensis apud illos est

Aprilis, quartus Iulius, septimus October, decimus Ianuarius. In quibus, et preterea in quinto mense, qui est Augustus, que fuerit eis causa ieiunii, Ieronimus supra Zachariam exponit, dicens:

C. VII. Why the law commanded fasts in the aforesaid months.

"The fast of the fourth, the fast of the fifth, the fast of the seventh, and the fast of the tenth"—understand "month"—"shall be turned for the house of Judah and Jerusalem into feast days and gladness." In this place many of our writers have said many things discordant among themselves. § 1. We are therefore compelled to have recourse to the Hebrews and to seek the truth of knowledge from the fountain rather than from the streams. § 2. The fast of the fourth month, which among the Latins is called July, on the seventeenth day of the same month, we judge to be that occasion when Moses, descending from Mount Sinai, cast down and shattered the tablets of the law, and, according to Jeremiah, the walls of the city were first breached. In the fifth month, which among us is called August, when sedition had arisen among the people because of the spies of the Holy Land, they were commanded not to ascend the mountain but to wander far from the Holy Land for forty years with lengthy losses, so that, except for two men, Caleb and Joshua, all would fall in the wilderness. In this month the temple at Jerusalem was also burned and destroyed both by Nebuchadnezzar and, many centuries afterward, by Titus and Vespasian; the city of Bethel, to which many thousands of Jews had fled, was captured.

In the seventh month, which among us is called October, Gedaliah was killed, and the tribe of Judah and the remnants of Jerusalem were scattered. In the tenth month—which among us is called January, because it is the gateway and beginning of the year—Ezekiel, placed in captivity, and all the people of the captives heard that the temple had been overthrown in the fifth month, which we learn most fully in the same prophet. This, therefore, is the whole of what is said: know that the days of lamentation and fasts which until now you have held for mourning—because "I have purposed to do good to Jerusalem and the house of Judah"—are to be turned for you into gladness, joy, and solemnities, provided only that you love truth and peace. According to the anagogical sense, because we fast when the bridegroom is taken from us and we do not deserve to have his presence, when the Lord has returned to us and purposed to do good to us, every sadness will be turned into joy, and the former famine of the word of God will be compensated by the presence of his teachings and the fullness of heavenly bread. Part III. GRATIAN. The fasts of the fourth month, however, do not appear capable of being celebrated before the day of Pentecost. For from the day of the Lord's resurrection until the day of Pentecost they are not induced to observe fasts. Hence Ambrose, in the sermon of the same day, [LXI], which begins thus:

C. VII. Quare in supradictis mensibus ieiunia lex inperauit.

Ieiunium quarti, et ieiunium quinti, et ieiunium septimi, et ieiunium decimi subaudiatur mensis domui Iudae et Ierusalem in dies festos uertetur in gaudium. Hoc loco nostrorum multi multa dixerunt inter se dissonantia. §. 1. Cogimur igitur ad Ebreos recurrere, et scientiae ueritatem de fonte magis quam de riuulis querere. §. 2. Ieiunium quarti mensis, qui apud Latinos uocatur Iulius, die septimo et decimo eiusdem mensis illud arbitramur, quando descendens Moyses de monte Synai tabulas legis abiecit atque confregit, et iuxta Ieremiam muri primum rupti sunt ciuitatis. In quinto mense, qui apud nos uocatur Augustus, cum propter exploratores terrae sanctae seditio esset orta in populo, iussi sunt non ascendere montem, sed per quadraginta annos longis a terra sancta circumire dispendiis, ut exceptis duobus, Caleph et Iosue, omnes in solitudine caderent. In hoc mense et a Nabuchodonosor, et multa post secula a Tito et Vespasiano templum Ierosolimis incensum est atque destructum; capta urbs Bethel, ad quam multa milia confugerant Iudeorum.

In septimo uero, qui apud nos appellatur October, occisus est Godolias, et Iudae tribus, ac Ierusalem reliquiae dissipatae sunt. Mense decimo (qui apud nos Ianuarius dicitur, eo quod ianua anni sit atque principium), Ezechiel in captiuitate positus audiuit et cunctus populus captiuorum, quinto mense templum esse subuersum, quod plenissime in eodem propheta cognoscimus. Hoc est igitur omne, quod dicitur, dies planctus et ieiuniorum, quos hactenus habuistis in luctum, sciatis (quia cogitaui, ut benefaciam Ierusalem et domui Iuda) uobis in leticiam et gaudium et solempnitates esse uertendos; ita dumtaxat, si ueritatem diligatis et pacem. Iuxta anagogem, quia tunc ieiunamus, quando sponsus aufertur a nobis, et non meremur eius habere presentiam, cum reuersus fuerit ad nos Dominus, et cogitauerit, ut benefaciat nobis, omnis tristicia uertetur in gaudium, et fames pristina sermonis Dei presencia doctrinarum eius et celestis panis saturitate conpensabitur. III. Pars. Gratian. Non autem uidentur ieiunia quarti mensis posse celebrari ante diem pentecostes. A die enim dominicae resurrectionis usque in diem pentecostes non inducuntur ad obseruanda ieiunia. Unde Ambrosius in eiusdem diei sermone [LXI.,] qui sic incipit:

[C. VIII.]

Your holiness ought to know: "Throughout these fifty days there is for us a continual and uninterrupted festivity, such that throughout this whole time we neither proclaim fasts to be observed nor bend our knees to entreat God." "And below: § 1. Therefore, after the likeness of the Lord's resurrection, the entire courses of fifty days are celebrated, and all these days are reckoned as Lord's days. For the resurrection is the Lord's. Rising on the Lord's day, the Savior returned to men, and after the resurrection he conversed with men throughout the whole fifty-day period. It is therefore necessary that the festivity of those things be equal whose holiness is also equal. Therefore we do not fast during the fifty days, because in these days the Lord dwells with us." The same in the Apology for David: "We celebrate this number—namely, the fiftieth—with joy after the Lord's passion, the debt of all guilt having been remitted and the bond having been canceled, free from every bond, and we receive the grace of the Holy Spirit coming upon us; on the day of Pentecost fasts cease, praise is spoken to God, and Alleluia is sung." [GRATIAN.] Necessarily, therefore, the Church established that fasts be celebrated after the day of Pentecost. But the denial that one is to fast during those fifty days is understood with respect to the necessity of observance.

Hence in the sermon of the same day, [LX], which begins thus:

[C. VIII.]

Scire debet sanctitas uestra: "per hos quinquaginta dies nobis est iugis et continuata festiuitas, ita ut hoc omni tempore neque ad obseruandum indicamus ieiunia, neque ad exorandum Deum genibus succedamus." "Et infra: §. 1. "Ad instar ergo dominicae resurrectionis tota quinquaginta dierum curricula celebrantur, et omnes isti dies uelud dominici deputantur. Resurrectio enim dominica est. In dominica resurgens saluator reuersus ad homines est, et post resurrectionem tota quinquagesima cum hominibus conuersatus est. Equalis ergo eorum necessarium est ut sit festiuitas, quorum equalis est et sanctitas. Non igitur ieiunamus in quinquagesima, quia in his diebus nobiscum Dominus conmoratur". Idem in apologia Dauid: "Hunc numerum (quinquagesimum uidelicet) leti celebramus post Domini passionem, remisso culpae totius debito cyrographoque euacuato ab omni nexu liberi, et suscipimus aduenientem in nos gratiam sancti Spiritus; die pentecostes uacant ieiunia, laus dicitur Deo, Alleluia cantatur." [Gratian.] Necessario ergo ecclesia constituit, ut post diem pentecostes ieiunia celebrentur. Sed quod in illis quinquaginta diebus ieiunandum esse negatur, ex obseruantiae necessitate intelligitur.

Unde in eiusdem diei sermone, [LX.,] qui sic incipit:

[C. IX.]

I believe you know, brothers: "We celebrate the day of Pentecost with no less gladness than we took care to celebrate the holy day of Pasch. For then, just as we have now done, we fasted on the Sabbath, celebrated vigils, and persisted through the night in prayers; hence it is necessary that a like observance follow a like gladness." [GRATIAN.] The observance, however, is like with respect to the deed, not with respect to necessity. Likewise Isidore, [book I On Ecclesiastical Offices, c. 42]:

[C. IX.]

Nosse credo uos fratres: "Non minore leticia celebramus diem pentecostes, quam sanctum diem pascae curauimus. Tunc enim, sicut modo fecimus, ieiunauimus sabbato, uigilias celebrauimus, orationibus pernoctanter institimus: unde necesse est, similem obseruantiam similis leticia subsequatur." [Gratian.] Obseruantia uero similis quod ad factum, non quod ad necessitatem. Item Ysidorus: [lib. I. de ecclesiasticis offitiis, cap. 42.]

[C. X.]

"From Pasch until Pentecost, although the tradition of the churches has relaxed the rigor of abstinence at meals, nevertheless, if any monks or clerics desire to fast, they are not to be prohibited, because Antony and Paul and the other ancient fathers are read to have abstained even on these days in the wilderness and not to have relaxed abstinence except only on the Lord's day."

[C. X.]

"Post pasca usque ad pentecosten, licet traditio ecclesiarum abstinentiae rigorem prandiis relaxauerit, tamen si quis monachorum uel clericorum ieiunare cupit, non sunt prohibendi, quia et Antonius et Paulus et ceteri patres antiqui etiam in his diebus in heremo leguntur abstinuisse, neque soluisse abstinentiam, nisi tantum die dominico."

[C. XI.]

Likewise Jerome to Lucinus, [epistle XXVIII]. "Would that we could fast at every time, which in the Acts of the Apostles we read the Apostle Paul and the believers with him to have done on the days of Pentecost and on the Lord's day. Nor do I say this because I think one should fast on feast days and would take away the continuous holidays and solemnities of fifty days; rather, let each province abound in its own judgment and regard the precepts of its elders as apostolic laws."

[C. XI.]

Item Ieronimus ad Lucinum, [ep. XXVIII.] "Utinam omni tempore ieiunare possemus, quod in Actibus apostolorum diebus pentecostes et die dominico apostolum Paulum et cum eo credentes fecisse legimus. Nec hoc dico, quod festis diebus ieiunandum putem, et contextas quinquaginta diebus ferias et solempnitates auferam; sed unaqueque prouincia habundet in suo sensu, et precepta maiorum leges apostolicas arbitretur."

C. XII. A bishop can be ordained on Holy Saturday after the hour of baptism.

Likewise Pelagius to Peter, Bishop of Potenza. We have received the writings of your affection, by which you signify that Latinus, deacon of the church of Grumentum, was elected by all to the episcopate of the church of Marcelliana or Clusium, which you already reported before this time; and we commanded that he come, believing that they had received from his bishop a dimissory letter concerning his person. But if they have now done this, cause him to come quickly to the city of Rome so that, if God commands, he may be ordained on Holy Saturday after the hour of baptism. For if he does not arrive before the aforesaid day, he will be compelled to wait until the fasts of the fourth month.

> C. XII. Sabato magno post horam baptismatis episcopus ualet ordinari.
> Item Pelagius Petro Episcopo Potentino. Dilectionis tuae scripta suscepimus, quibus significas, Latinum ecclesiae Grumentinae diaconem ad episcopatum Marcellianensis ecclesiae siue Clusitanae ab omnibus fuisse electum, quod iam ante hoc tempus retulistis; et iussimus, ut ueniret, credentes eos de persona eius ab episcopo suo dimissoriam accepisse. Quod si modo fecerunt, facite eum uelociter ad urbem Romam occurrere, ut, si Deus iusserit, in magno sabato post horam baptismi ordinetur. Quia si ante memoratum diem non occurrerit, cogetur usque ad quarti mensis ieiunia sustinere.

Distinction LXXVII

GRATIAN. At these times, according to Anacletus, Zephyrinus, Gelasius, and Pelagius, bishops, priests, and deacons are to be ordained. According to Pope Leo, however, the best man among the priests or deacons of the same church is to be ordained metropolitan. But no one from among monks or laymen ought to arrive at the supreme priesthood except through the grades of the Church. Hence Pope Gelasius:

> GRATIANUS. His temporibus secundum Anacletum, Zepherinum, Gelasium et Pelagium episcopi, presbiteri et diaconi sunt ordinandi. Metropolitanus autem iuxta Leonem papam ex presbiteris eiusdem ecclesiae uel ex diaconibus optimus ordinetur. Ex monachis autem uel laicis nullus nisi per gradus ecclesiae ad summum sacerdotium debet peruenire. Unde Gelasius Papa:

C. I. No one is to aspire to the priesthood except through the distinct grades.

Enacting this, we command you and all to observe it: that those who deserve to be ordained are to approach ecclesiastical orders in the Church in this way; that is, if anyone deserves to be a bishop, let him first be a doorkeeper, then a reader, thereafter an exorcist, from there let him be consecrated an acolyte, and finally a subdeacon, then a deacon, and afterward a priest; from there, if he deserves it, let him be ordained bishop. Likewise Zosimus, Bishop of the city of Rome, says, [to Hesychius, epistle I, c. 3]:

> C. I. Non nisi per distinctos gradus quisquam ad sacerdotium aspiret.
> Illud nos statuentes uobis et omnibus seruare mandamus, ut ad ordines ecclesiasticos sic accedant in ecclesia, qui ordinari merentur: id est, si quis episcopus esse meretur, sit primo hostiarius, deinde lector preterea exorcista, inde sacretur acolitus, demum uero subdiaconus, deinde diaconus, et postea presbiter, exinde, si meretur, episcopus ordinetur. Item Zosimus Episcopus urbis Romae ait: [ad Hesychium, epist. I. cap. 3.]

C. II. What intervals of time are to be observed in the individual grades.

In the individual grades these periods are to be observed if a man has given his name to ecclesiastical ministries from infancy: he is to be held among the readers and exorcists for five years; thereafter let him be made an acolyte or subdeacon for fourteen years, and thus, if he deserves it, let him approach the blessing of the diaconate, in which order he ought to adhere for five years if he has conducted himself blamelessly. Thereafter, with his years of service supporting him and proofs of his own faith having been given through so many grades, he will be able to merit the priesthood; from which place, if a more exacting life has led him to good conduct, he ought to hope for the supreme pontificate. § 1. Let the defenders of the Church also, who are made from laymen, be held to the aforesaid observance if they deserve to be in the clerical order.

C. II. Que interualla temporis in singulis gradibus sint obseruanda.

In singulis gradibus hec tempora sunt obseruanda, si ab infantia ecclesiasticis ministeriis nomen dederit, ut inter lectores et exorcistas quinquennio teneatur, exinde acolitus uel subdiaconus quatuordecim annis fiat, et sic ad benedictionem diaconatus, si meretur, accedat, in quo ordine quinque annis, si inculpate gesserit, adherere debebit. Exinde suffragantibus stipendiis, per tot gradus datis propriae fidei documentis, sacerdotium poterit promereri, de quo loco, si eum exactior uita ad bonos mores perduxerit, summum pontificatum sperare debebit. §. 1. Defensores etiam ecclesiae, qui ex laicis fiunt, supradicta obseruatione teneantur, si meruerint in ordine esse clericatus.

C. III. On the same.

Likewise Pope Siricius, [to Himerius of Tarragona, epistle I, c. 9]. Whoever therefore has devoted himself to the services of the Church from his infancy ought to be baptized before the years of puberty and joined to the ministry of the readers. If from the beginning of adolescence until the thirtieth year of age he has lived commendably, content with only one wife—and she a virgin whom he received with the common blessing through the priest—he ought to be an acolyte and subdeacon, after which let him approach the grade of the diaconate if he has first proved himself worthy, with continence going before. There, if he has ministered laudably for more than five years, let him fittingly obtain the presbyterate. Thereafter, after ten years, he will be able to attain the episcopal chair, provided nevertheless that through these periods the integrity of his life and faith has been approved. But one who, already advanced in age, is stirred by the manner of life of a better purpose and hastens to pass from the lay state to the sacred soldiery will obtain the fruit of his desire in no other way than if, at the time when he is baptized, he is immediately joined to the number of readers or exorcists, provided nevertheless that it is established that he has had or has one wife and received her as a virgin. When he has been initiated, after two years have been completed, let him be made an acolyte and subdeacon for another five years, and thus let him be promoted to the diaconate if through these periods he has been judged worthy. Thereafter, with the passage of the required periods, let him not undeservedly be joined to the presbyterate or episcopate if the election of the people and clergy has summoned him.

C. III. De eodem.

Item Siricius Papa. [ad Himerium Tarraconensem, epist. I. cap. 9.] Quicumque itaque se ecclesiae uouit obsequiis a sua infantia, ante pubertatis annos baptizari et lectorum debet ministerio sociari; qui ab accessu adolescentiae usque ad trigesimum etatis annum si probabiliter uixerit, una tantum, et ea, quam uirginem communi per sacerdotem benedictione percepit, uxore contentus, acolitus et subdiaconus esse debebit, postquam ad diaconii gradum (si se ipsum primitus, continentia preeunte, dignum probauerit) accedat. Ubi si ultra quinque annos laudabiliter ministrauerit, congrue presbiteratum consequatur. Exinde post decennium episcopalem cathedram poterit adipisci, si tamen per hec tempora integritas suae uitae ac fidei eius fuerit approbata. Qui uero iam etate grandeuus, melioris propositi conuersatione prouocatus, ex laico ad sacram miliciam peruenire festinat, desiderii sui fructum non aliter obtinebit, nisi eo quo baptizatur tempore statim lectorum aut exorcistarum numero societur, si tamen eum unam habuisse uel habere, et hanc uirginem accepisse constet uxorem. Qui, dum initiatus fuerit, expleto biennio, per quinquennium aliud acolitus et subdiaconus fiat, et sic ad diaconatum, si per hec tempora dignus iudicatus fuerit, prouehatur. Exinde iam accessu temporum presbiterio uel episcopatui, si eum plebis ac cleri euocauerit electio, non inmerito societur.

C. IV. On the same.

Likewise from the Sixth Synod, [c. 15]. Let a subdeacon be ordained at no less than twenty years of age. § 1. But if anyone has been ordained in some priestly order outside the established periods, let him be deposed.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item ex Sexta Sinodo. [c. 15.] Subdiaconus non minor uiginti annorum ordinetur. §. 1. Si quis uero in aliquo ordine sacerdotali preter constituta tempora ordinatus fuerit, deponatur.

C. V. On the same.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 4]. It has pleased us that deacons are not to be ordained, nor virgins consecrated, before twenty-five years of age, and that readers are not to salute the people.

C. V. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 4.] Placuit, ut ante uiginti quinque annos etatis nec diaconi ordinentur, nec uirgines consecrentur, et ut lectores populum non salutent.

C. VI. The Levitical blessing is not to be furnished to those younger than twenty-five years.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [cc. 16 and 17]. Let a bishop by no means entrust the blessing of the diaconate to persons younger than twenty-five years. § 1. Certainly, if married young men have consented to be ordained, the will of their wives is also to be sought in such a way that, with the sleeping chamber of the dwelling set apart and religious life promised, they may be ordained after they have together been converted. § 2. But let no metropolitan presume to ordain a priest or bishop before thirty years, that is, before he reaches the age of a perfect man, lest through his age—as sometimes happens—he be blamed for some error.

C. VI. Minoribus XXV. annis leuitica non prestetur benedictio.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 16. et 17.] Episcopus benedictionem diaconatus minoribus quam uiginti quinque annorum penitus non committat. §. 1. Sane si coniugati iuuenes consenserint ordinari, etiam uxorum uoluntas ita requirenda est, ut sequestrato mansionis cubiculo, religione promissa, posteaquam pariter conuersi fuerint, ordinentur. §. 2. Presbiterum uero uel episcopum ante triginta annos, id est antequam ad uiri perfecti etatem perueniat, nullus metropolitanorum ordinare presumat, ne per etatem (quod aliquociens euenit) aliquo errore culpetur.

C. VII. On the same.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 20]. In the old law the Levites are commanded to serve the tabernacle from the twenty-fifth year, whose authority the holy Fathers also followed in the canons. Forgetful both of divine law and of the precepts of the canons, we make infants and boys Levites before the lawful age or experience of life. And therefore both divine law and the canonical judgments admonish us that this is not to be done by us any longer, but that Levites be consecrated from their twenty-fifth year of age and priests ordained from their thirtieth.

C. VII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Toletano IV. [c. 20.] In ueteri lege ab anno uicesimo et quinto Leuitae tabernaculo seruire iubentur, cuius auctoritatem in canonibus et sancti Patres secuti sunt. Nos et diuinae legis, et praeceptorum canonum inmemores, infantes et pueros Leuitas facimus ante legitimam etatem, aut experientiam uitae; ideoque ne ulterius fiat a nobis, et diuina lege, et canonicis ammonemur sententiis, sed a uicesimo quinto anno etatis suae Leuitae consecrentur, et a tricesimo presbiteri ordinentur.

C. VIII. Through what intervals of time one who is elected from among monks into the clerical state is to be ordained.

Likewise Gelasius, [Pope, to the Bishops throughout Lucania, epistle I, c. 3]. If anyone instructed in a religious purpose and monastic disciplines approaches the clerical office, first let his past life be investigated: whether he is proved to be stained by no grave crime, whether perhaps he has not had a second wife, and whether he is shown not to have taken a woman rejected by her husband.

C. VIII. Per que interualla temporum ordinetur qui de monachis in clericatum eligitur.

Item Gelasius. [Papa ad Episcopos per Lucaniam, epist. I. cap. 3.] Si quis de religioso proposito et disciplinis monasterialibus eruditus ad clericale munus accedit, inprimis eius uita acta inquiratur, si nullo graui facinore probatur infectus; si secundam fortasse non habuerit uxorem, nec a marito reiectam sortitus ostenditur.

[C. IX.]

The same, [in the same and the following chapter]. Let a novice monk supported by uprightness of conduct be made immediately a reader, notary, or certainly a defender; after three months let him be an acolyte, especially if age also supports him in this. In the sixth month let him receive the name of subdeacon, and, if he is of modest manner of life and upright will, in the ninth month let him be a deacon, and when the year has been completed let him be a priest; for the devotion of a holy purpose voluntarily undertaken is shown to have furnished him what the intervals of years would have conferred. § 1. But if any layman is to be aggregated to ecclesiastical offices, it is fitting to examine a person of this kind in each of the matters comprehended above so much more carefully as it is established that there is a difference between worldly and religious life, because ecclesiastical ministries are in any event to be assigned to suitable persons, not thrust upon unsuitable merits. And what can be fit for sacred services is to be sought in their qualities so much more as time is cut away from the period within which they would be attained, so that uprightness of conduct may be shown to possess what a more extended course of practice has not conferred, lest through the occasion of supplying a scarcity of clergy we be reckoned to have introduced vices into divine worship rather than to have procured lawful advantages for the Lord's household. For their promotions we nevertheless add six months beyond the limits of a year, since, as has been said, a distinction ought to exist between a person devoted to divine worship and one coming from the manner of life of laymen. Yet we believe these things are to be indulged only to such an extent that, when this occasion has ceased for the churches, the ancient form of the paternal canons is preserved.

> [C. IX.]

> Idem. [eodem capite et sequenti] Monachus uero nouitius morum honestate fulcitus, continuo lector, uel notarius, aut certe defensor effectus, post tres menses existat acolitus, maxime si huic etiam etas suffragatur; sexto mense subdiaconi nomen accipiat, ac si modeste conuersationis honestaeque uoluntatis existat, nono mense diaconus, conpletoque anno sit presbiter; cui tamen, quod annorum fuerant interstitia collatura, sancti propositi sponte suscepta docetur prestitisse deuotio. §. 1. Si uero laicus quispiam ecclesiasticis est aggregandus offitiis, tanto sollicitius in singulis, que superius conprehensa sunt, huiusmodi decet examinare personam, quantum inter mundanam religiosamque uitam esse constat discriminis, quia utique conuenientia ecclesiae ministeria deputanda sunt, non inconuenientibus meritis ingerenda, tantoque magis quod sacris aptum possit esse seruitiis in eorum querendum est institutis, quantum de tempore, quo fuerint assequenda, decerpitur, ut morum hoc habere doceatur probitas, quod prolixior consuetudo non contulit, ne per occasionem supplendae penuriae clericatus uitia potius diuinis cultibus intulisse, non legitimae familiae Domini conputemur procurasse conpendia. Quorum promotionibus super anni metas sex menses nichilominus subrogamus, quoniam, sicut dictum est, distare debet inter personam diuino cultui deditam, et de laicorum conuersatione uenientem. Que tamen eatenus indulgenda credimus ut ecclesiis ab hac occasione cessantibus canonum paternorum uetus forma seruetur.

Distinction LXXVIII

GRATIAN. At what age priests ought to be ordained Pope Boniface defines, saying:

> GRATIANUS. Qua uero etate sacerdotes ordinari debeant, Bonifatius Papa diffinit, dicens:

C. I. A priest is not to be ordained before thirty years.

If anyone has not completed thirty years of his age, let him in no way be ordained a priest, even if he is very worthy.

[PALEA.

> C. I. Ante XXX. annos presbiter non ordinetur.

> [PALEA.

C. II. On the same.

Likewise in the Novels, in the Authenticum, Concerning the Most Holy Bishops, § "Clerics," in Julian the Antecessor, constitution CXV, c. 19. Let no one be consecrated a priest who is younger than thirty years; let no one be made a deacon or subdeacon who is younger than twenty-five years; let no one be numbered among the readers who is younger than eighteen years; let no woman be consecrated among the deaconesses of the most holy Church who is younger than forty years or has come to a second marriage.]

C. II. De eodem.

Item in Nouellis in Authentica de sanctissimis episcopis §. Clericos, apud Iulianum Antecessorem constitutione CXV. c. 19. Nemo presbiter consecretur, qui minor triginta annis sit; nemo diaconus uel subdiaconus fiat, qui minor uigintiquinque annis sit; nemo lectoribus connumeretur, qui minor decem et octo annis fuerit; nemo inter diaconissas consecretur sacrosanctae ecclesiae, que minor sit quadraginta annis, uel ad secundum matrimonium peruenerit.]

C. III. No one is to be ordained a priest unless approved by a lengthy examination.

Likewise Pope Leo, [to the African Bishops, epistle LXXXV, c. 1]. What is it to impose hands quickly, if not to grant priestly honor to unapproved persons before the age of maturity, before the time of examination, before the merit of obedience, and before experience of discipline? And what is it to share in another's sins, if not for the one ordaining to be made such as is the man who did not deserve to be ordained?

C. III. Non est ordinandus sacerdos, nisi longo probatus examine.

Item Leo papa. [ad Episcopos Africanos, epist. LXXXV. cap. 1.] Quid est: manus cito inponere, nisi ante etatem maturitatis, ante tempus examinis, ante meritum obedientiae, ante experientiam disciplinae sacerdotalem honorem tribuere non probatis? Et quid est: communicare peccatis alienis, nisi talem effici ordinantem, qualis ille est, qui non meruit ordinari?

C. IV. A priest is not to be ordained before thirty years.

Likewise from the Council of Neocaesarea, [c. 11]. Let a priest not be ordained before thirty years of age, although he may be of approved life; rather, let him be kept until the predetermined time. For the Lord was baptized in his thirtieth year and then preached. GRATIAN. This is regular, whence Christ, John the Baptist, Ezekiel, and certain of the prophets are not read to have preached or prophesied before this. But because Jeremiah and Daniel are read to have received the spirit of prophecy before youthful age; David and Solomon also are found to have been anointed in adolescence; John the Evangelist, while still an adolescent, is found to have been elected by the Lord as an apostle and sent with the others to preach; and the Apostle Paul also is asserted to have been elected by the Lord and sent to preach in adolescence, the Church likewise, when necessity demands, has been accustomed to ordain certain persons before the thirtieth year. Hence Pope Zacharias to Bishop Boniface, [epistle VI, whose beginning is "Blessed be God"]:

C. IV. Ante XXX. annos presbiter non ordinetur.

Item ex Concilio Neocesariensi. [c. 11.] Presbiter ante triginta annorum etatem non ordinetur, quamuis sit probabilis uitae; sed obseruetur usque ad prefinitum tempus. Dominus enim tricesimo anno baptizatus est, et tunc predicauit. Gratian. Hoc regulariter, unde et Christus, et Iohannes Baptista, et Ezechiel, et nonnulli prophetarum non leguntur predicasse uel prophetasse. Verum, quia et Ieremias et Daniel ante iuuenilem etatem spiritum prophetiae accepisse leguntur, Dauid quoque et Salomon in adolescentia uncti inueniuntur, Iohannes etiam Euangelista, cum adhuc esset adolescens, a Domino in apostolum electus et cum aliis ad predicandum missus inuenitur; Paulus quoque apostolus in adolescentia a Domino electus, et ad predicandum missus asseritur: ecclesia similiter necessitate exigente nonnullos ante trigesimum annum ordinare consueuit. Unde Zacharias papa Bonifatio Episcopo: [epist. VI. cuius initium: "Benedictus Deus"]

C. V. When necessity compels, priests of twenty-five years are to be ordained.

If men of thirty years are not found and necessity demands it, let priests be ordained from twenty-five years.

C. V. Necessitate cogente XXV. annorum sacerdotes ordinentur.

Si triginta annorum non reperiuntur, et necessitas exposcit, a uiginti quinque annis sacerdotes ordinentur.

Distinction LXXIX

GRATIAN. Part I. The Apostolic Lord, however, is to be enthroned only by the Cardinals and religious clerics. Hence Pope Nicholas [II] says, [in the epistle in which he reports the synod held by him at Rome, c. 1]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Apostolicus autem non nisi a Cardinalibus et religiosis clericis est intronizandus. Unde Nicolaus papa [II.] ait: [in epistola, qua sinodum a se Romae habitam refert, cap. 1.]

C. I. Concerning one who is enthroned without the concordant election of the Cardinals.

If anyone is enthroned in the apostolic see without the concordant and canonical election of its Cardinals and thereafter of the religious clerics following them, let him be regarded not as Pope or Apostolic Lord, but as an apostate.

C. I. De eo qui sine concordi electione Cardinalium intronizatur.

Si quis apostolicae sedi sine concordi et canonica electione Cardinalium eiusdem ac deinde sequentium clericorum religiosorum intronizatur, non Papa uel Apostolicus, sed apostaticus habeatur.

C. II. While the Pope survives, let no one dare to speak about the election of a future Pontiff without consulting him.

Likewise Pope Symmachus, [in the First Roman Synod, cc. 3 and 5]. If anyone, while the Pope survives, is convicted of furnishing favor to anyone in any manner for the Roman pontificate, let him be deprived of the honor of his place. And below: If any priest, deacon, or cleric, while the Pope is unharmed and without consulting him, shall attempt either to lend his subscription for the Roman pontificate, to promise written pledges, to furnish an oath, certainly to promise any support, or, with private meetings held concerning this cause, to deliberate or determine anything, let him be deprived of the dignity of his place or of communion. And below: Because of the hidden frauds and secret snares of conspiracies which the judgment of this severity pursues, if anyone brings to ecclesiastical notice the counsels of those who have acted contrary to this synod concerning the ambition for the pontificate, and convicts them by reasonable proof, although a participant in an action of this kind, let him not only be purged of every fault but also be raised up by a reward that is not unworthy.

C. II. Papa superstite, eo inconsulto de electione futuri Pontificis nemo audeat loqui.

Item Simacus Papa. [in Sinodo Romana I. cap. 3. et 5.] Si quis superstite Papa pro Romano Pontificatu cuiquam quolibet modo fauorem prestare conuincitur, loci sui honore priuetur. Et infra: Si quis presbiter, aut diaconus, aut clericus, Papa incolumi et eo inconsulto, aut subscriptionem pro Romano Pontificatu commodare, aut pitacia promittere, aut sacramentum prebere temptauerit, aut aliquod certe suffragium polliceri, uel de hac causa priuatis conuenticulis factis deliberare aliquid atque decernere presumpserit, loci sui dignitate, uel communione priuetur. Et infra: Propter occultas fraudes et coniurationum secretas insidias, quas sententia huius districtionis consequitur, si quis ad ecclesiasticam pertulerit noticiam consilia eorum, qui contra hanc sinodum de pontificali egerint ambitu, et rationabili probatione conuicerit, particeps actionis huiusmodi non solum purgatus ab omni culpa sit, sed etiam remuneratione, que non indigna sit, subleuetur.

C. III. No one is to be promoted to the summit of the apostolate unless from among the Cardinals.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Stephen, [III]. It was fitting that this most sacred lady, our Roman Church, be duly ordered according to what was instituted by Blessed Peter and his successors, and that one of the cardinal priests or deacons be consecrated to the summit of the apostolate.

C. III. In apostolatus culmen nisi ex Cardinalibus non promoueatur.

Item ex Concilio Stephani Papae. [III.] Oportebat, ut hec sacrosancta domina nostra Romana ecclesia (iuxta quod a B. petro et eius successoribus institutum est) rite ordinaretur, et in apostolatus culmen unus de cardinalibus presbiteris aut diaconibus consecraretur.

C. IV. On the same.

Likewise from the same. Let no layman, nor one from another order, ever presume to be promoted to the sacred pontifical honor unless, ascending through the distinct grades, he has been made a cardinal deacon or priest.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item ex eodem. Nullus umquam laicorum neque ex alio ordine presumat nisi per distinctos gradus ascendens diaconus aut presbiter factus fuerit cardinalis, ad sacrum pontificalem honorem promoueri.

C. V. Let a bishop, monk, or layman who invades the Roman Church and breaks into the grade of her sons be anathematized.

Likewise from the same. If anyone from among bishops, monks, or laymen, breaking contrary to the institutes of the canons and holy Fathers into the grade of the sons of the holy Roman Church, that is, of the cardinal priests and deacons, shall presume to enter it; and if anyone from among the aforesaid shall attempt to invade this apostolic see and shall wish to ascend to the supreme pontifical honor, let a perpetual anathema be made against him and those favoring him. And below: § 1. If anyone presumes to resist the priests and primates of the Church or all the clergy in electing a Roman Pontiff for themselves according to canonical tradition, let him be anathema.

C. V. Anathematizetur episcopus uel monachus uel laicus Romanam ecclesiam inuadens, et in gradum filiorum eius prorumpens.

Item ex eodem. Si quis ex episcopis, uel monachis, uel laicis contra canonum et sanctorum Patrum instituta prorumpens in gradum filiorum sanctae Romanae ecclesiae, id est presbiterorum cardinalium et diaconorum ire presumpserit, et hanc apostolicam sedem inuadere quilibet ex supradictis temptauerit, et ad summum pontificalem honorem ascendere uoluerit, ipsi et sibi fauentibus fiat perpetuum anathema. Et infra: §. 1. Si quis resistere presumpserit sacerdotibus atque primatibus ecclesiae, uel cuncto clero ad eligendum sibi Romanum Pontificem secundum canonicam tradicionem, anathema sit.

C. VI. Let him be anathema who presumes to contradict the canonical election of the Roman Pontiff.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Leo, [IV]. If anyone presumes to oppose the priests, the noble primates, or all the clergy of this holy Roman Church in the election of the Roman Pontiff, as is read to have been enacted in the council of the most blessed Popes Boniface and Stephen, let him be anathema.

C. VI. Anathema sit, qui canonicae electioni Romani pontificis contradicere presumpserit.

Item ex Concilio Leonis Papae. [IV.] Si quis sacerdotibus, seu primatibus nobilibus, seu cuncto clero huius sanctae Romanae ecclesiae, electionem Romani pontificis contradicere presumpserit, sicut in concilio beatissimi Bonifatii et Stephani Papae legitur statutum, anathema sit.

C. VII. No bishop's election is to be made until after the third day following the burial of the other.

Likewise from the Council of Boniface, [Pope III]. Part II. While the Roman Pontiff or the bishop of his city is living, let no one presume to speak or make parties for himself until the third day after his burial, when the clergy and sons of the Church have been assembled; and then let the election be made. Part III. GRATIAN. But it is asked: if two men have been ordained through the temerity of the contenders, which of them is to be preferred to the other? Concerning them Honorius Augustus writes as follows to Pope Boniface:

C. VII. Nullius episcopi fiat electio, nisi post diem tercium depositionis alterius.

Item ex Concilio Bonifatii. [Papae III.] II. Pars. Nullus Pontifice Romano uiuente aut episcopo ciuitatis suae presumat loqui, aut partes sibi facere, nisi tercio die depositionis eius, adunato clero et filiis ecclesiae, et tunc electio fiat. III. Pars. Gratian. Sed queritur, si duo temeritate concertantium ordinati fuerint, quis eorum alteri sit preferendus? De his ita scribit Honorius Augustus ad Bonifatium Papam:

C. VIII. If two have been ordained through the temerity of the contenders.

If perhaps two men have been ordained contrary to divine law through the temerity of the contenders, we permit neither of them to be the future priest; rather, we judge that he alone is to remain in the apostolic see whom divine judgment and the consent of the whole body shall elect from the number of the clerics by a new ordination. Part IV. GRATIAN. This chapter, however, is not to be understood of one who, when one man has been ordained through apostasy, is enthroned in the apostolic see by the Cardinals and religious clerics, even if that apostate has violently held the chair of Blessed Peter in such a way that a canonical election cannot be made within the City. Hence Pope Nicholas [II, in the Roman Council] enacted, saying:

C. VIII. Si temeritate concertantium duo fuerint ordinati.

Si duo forte contra fas temeritate concertancium fuerint ordinati, nullum ex eis futurum sacerdotem permittimus, sed illum solum in sede apostolica permansurum censemus, quem ex numero clericorum noua ordinatione diuinum iudicium et uniuersitatis consensus elegerit. IV. Pars. Gratian. Hoc autem capitulum non de eo intelligendum est, qui uno per apostasiam ordinato a Cardinalibus et religiosis clericis apostolicae sedi intronizatur, etiamsi ille apostaticus ita cathedram B. Petri uiolenter tenuerit, ut canonica electio intra Urbem fieri non ualeat. Unde Nicolaus papa [II. in Concilio Romano] statuit, dicens:

C. IX. Concerning one who is ordained by money or popular tumult, not by canonical election.

If anyone is enthroned in the apostolic see by money, human favor, popular tumult, or military tumult, without the canonical and concordant election of the Cardinals and the religious clerics following them, let him be regarded not as the Apostolic Lord but as an apostate; and let it be permissible for the Cardinals and other God-fearing clerics and laymen to anathematize the invader and drive him from the apostolic see with human aid. But if they are unable to accomplish this within the City, having assembled by apostolic authority outside the City in whatever place pleases them, let them make the election, with authority granted to the elected man to govern and dispose the affairs and advantage of the holy Roman Church according to the character of the time, as though he had been enthroned. Part V. GRATIAN. The election of the Roman Pontiff, however, ought also to be made with the deliberation of his predecessor. Hence Symmachus says, [in the First Roman Synod, c. 4]:

C. IX. De eo, qui pecunia uel populari tumultu, non canonica electione ordinatur.

Si quis pecunia uel gratia humana, aut populari tumultu seu militari, sine canonica et concordi electione cardinalium, et sequentium religiosorum clericorum fuerit apostolicae sedi intronizatus, non Apostolicus, sed apostaticus habeatur, liceatque cardinalibus et aliis clericis timentibus Deum et laicis inuasorem anathematizare et humano auxilio a sede apostolica pellere. Quod si intra Urbem perficere nequiuerint, apostolica auctoritate extra urbem congregati in loco, quo eis placuerit, electionem faciant, concessa electo auctoritate regendi et disponendi res et utilitatem sanctae

Romanae ecclesiae iuxta qualitatem temporis, quasi intronizatus sit. V. Pars. Gratian. Electio uero Romani pontificis etiam cum deliberatione predecessoris fieri debet. Unde Simacus ait: [in Sinodo Romana I. cap. 4.]

C. X. If the Pope is unable to determine concerning the election of his successor.

If the Pope's passing occurs unexpectedly, so that he cannot first determine concerning the election of his successor as was approved above, then, if the election of the whole ecclesiastical order has come together upon one man, let the elected man be consecrated bishop. But if, as is customary, the interests of those among whom the contest arises begin to be diverse, let the judgment of the greater number prevail; yet in such a way that one who, captured by a promise, determined concerning the election by a judgment that was not upright is to lack the priesthood. Part VI. GRATIAN. As was shown above, the election of supreme priests ought to be made by Cardinals and religious clerics, but their removal is reserved to divine judgment. Hence Pope Anacletus says, [to the Bishops of Italy, epistle II, c. 2]:

C. X. Si Papa de electione sui successoris decernere non poterit.

> Si transitus Papae inopinatus euenerit, ut de sui electione successoris, ut supra placuit, non possit ante decernere, siquidem totius in unum conuenerit ecclesiastici ordinis electio, consecretur electus episcopus. Si uero, ut fieri solet, studia ceperint esse diuersa eorum, de quibus certamen emerserit, conuincat sententia plurimorum: sic tamen, ut sacerdotio careat, qui captus promissione non recto iudicio de electione decreuerit. VI. Pars. Gratian. Sicut supra monstratum est, electio summorum sacerdotum a Cardinalibus et religiosis clericis debet fieri: eiectio uero eorum diuino iudicio est reseruata. Unde Anacletus Papa ait: [ad Episcopos Italiae, epist. II. cap. 2.]

C. XI. The Lord has reserved to himself the removal of supreme priests.

The Lord has reserved to himself the removal of supreme priests, although he granted their election to good priests and spiritual peoples.

> C. XI. Summorum sacerdotum eiectionem sibi Dominus reseruauit.
> Eiectionem summorum sacerdotum sibi Dominus reseruauit, licet electionem eorum bonis sacerdotibus et spiritualibus populis concessisset.

Distinction LXXX

GRATIAN. Part I. According to Popes Lucius, Clement, and Anacletus, the places in which primates, patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, and priests are to be ordained are these. For Pope Lucius says:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Loca uero, in quibus primates, patriarchae, archiepiscopi, episcopi, presbiteri sunt ordinandi, hec sunt secundum Lucium Papam, ac Clementem, atque Anacletum. Ait enim Lucius Papa:

C. I. In what places primates or patriarchs ought to be ordained.

The cities and places in which primates ought to preside were established not in modern times but many times before Christ's advent; even the gentiles appealed to their primates for greater affairs. § 1. In those very cities, however, after Christ's advent, the apostles and their successors placed patriarchs and primates, to whom episcopal affairs and, after the apostolic see, the greater causes are to be referred, with apostolic authority preserved in all things.

> C. I. In quibus locis primates uel patriarchae debeant ordinari.
> Urbes et loca, in quibus primates presidere debent, non modernis, sed multis ante aduentum Christi sunt statutae temporibus quarum primates gentiles etiam pro maioribus negotiis appellabant. §. 1. In ipsis uero urbibus post aduentum Christi apostoli et eorum successores patriarchas et primates posuerunt, ad quos episcoporum negotia, salua in omnibus apostolica auctoritate, et maiores causae post apostolicam sedem sunt referendae.

C. II. On the same.

Likewise Pope Clement, [to James, epistle I]. In those cities in which formerly among the gentiles there were their first flamens and first doctors of the law, Blessed Peter commanded that primates of bishops or patriarchs be placed, who would handle the causes of the remaining bishops and the greater affairs in the faith. § 1. But in those cities in which, among the aforesaid gentiles, there were of old their archflamens, whom nevertheless they held as lesser than the aforementioned primates, he commanded that archbishops be instituted. § 2. In all the other individual cities he commanded that one bishop, and not several, be constituted, who would possess only the title of bishop, since even among the apostles themselves the institution was not equal, but one presided over all.

C. II. De eodem.

Item Clemens Papa. [ad Iacobum epist. I.] In illis ciuitatibus uero, in quibus olim apud ethnicos primi flamines eorum atque primi legis doctores erant, episcoporum primates uel patriarchas poni B. Petrus precepit, qui reliquorum episcoporum causas et maiora negotia in fide agitarent. §. 1. In illis autem, in quibus dudum apud ethnicos predictos erant eorum archiflamines, quos tamen minores tenebant quam memoratos primates, archiepiscopos institui precepit. §. 2. In singulis uero reliquis ciuitatibus singulos, et non plures episcopos constitui precepit, qui episcoporum tantum uocabulo potirentur; quoniam nec inter ipsos apostolos par fuit institucio, sed unus prefuit omnibus.

C. III. On the same.

Likewise Anacletus, [epistle III, c. 2]. Bishops ought not to be constituted in castles or small cities, but priests ought to be ordained and placed by bishops throughout castles, small cities, and estates, yet one in each of their individual titles. A bishop ought to be ordained not by one but by several bishops and, as was said, not to a small city, lest the name of bishop become cheap, but he is to be titled and named for an honorable one. A priest, however, is to be set over a church established in any place whatsoever.

C. III. De eodem.

Item Anacletus. [epist. III. cap. 2.] Episcopi non in castellis neque in modicis ciuitatibus debent constitui, sed presbiteri per castella et modicas ciuitates atque uillas debent ab episcopis ordinari et poni, singuli tamen per singulos titulos suos. Episcopus non ab uno, sed a pluribus episcopis debet ordinari, et, ut dictum est, non ad modicam ciuitatem, ne uilescat nomen episcopi, sed ad honorabilem titulandus et denominandus est. Presbiter uero ad qualemcumque locum in eo constitutae ecclesiae est preficiendus.

C. IV. On the same.

Likewise Pope Leo, [to the Bishops of Africa, epistle LXXXV, c. 2]. Certainly, as to what pertains to priestly dignity, among all the statutes of the canons we wish this to be observed: that bishops are not to be consecrated in just any places, nor in just any castles, and where they have not been before, since, where the peoples and assemblies are smaller, the care of priests suffices, while it is fitting for episcopal governance to preside only over larger populations and more populous cities, lest the priestly summit be granted to villages and estates or to obscure and solitary towns, which the divinely inspired decrees of the holy Fathers forbade.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item Leo Papa. [ad Episc. Africae, epist. LXXXV. c. 2.] Illud sane, quod ad sacerdotalem pertinet dignitatem, inter omnia uolumus canonum statuta seruari, ut non in quibuslibet locis, nec quibuscumque castellis, et ubi ante non fuerunt, episcopi consecrentur, cum, ubi minores sunt plebes minoresque conuentus, presbiterorum cura sufficiat episcopalia autem gubernacula non nisi in maioribus populis et frequentioribus ciuitatibus oporteat presidere, ne, quod sanctorum Patrum diuinitus inspirata uetuerunt decreta, uiculis et possessionibus, uel obscuris et solitariis municipiis tribuatur sacerdotale fastigium.

C. V. On the same.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea, [c. 57]. Bishops ought not to be ordained in villages and estates, but visitors—that is, those who travel around—are to be constituted. But we judge that those who were ordained before this are to do nothing without the knowledge of the bishop of the city. Priests likewise are to do nothing without the bishop's precept and counsel. Part II. GRATIAN. The sees of bishops, however, ought not to be separated by a long interval, so that they can assemble without difficulty for the consecration of their comprovincial bishop. Hence Gregory to Augustine, Bishop of the English, [response 8]:

> C. V. De eodem.
>
> Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 57.] Non debere in uicis et uillis episcopos ordinari, sed uisitatores, id est qui circumeant, constitui; his autem qui ante hoc ordinati sunt, nichil agere censemus sine conscientia episcopi ciuitatis. Similiter autem presbiteri sine precepto et consilio episcopi nichil agant. II. Pars. Gratian. Sedes autem episcoporum non longo interuallo debent disiungi, ut ad consecrationem sui conprouincialis sine difficultate possint occurrere. Unde Gregorius Augustino Anglorum Episcopo: [resp. 8.]

C. VI. Episcopal sees ought not to be separated from one another by a long interval.

We wish your fraternity to ordain bishops in such a way that the bishops themselves are by no means separated from one another by a long interval, so that there may be no necessity by which they are unable to assemble at the ordination of a bishop. For the ordination of bishops ought in no way to be made without three or four bishops having been gathered.

> C. VI. Episcopales sedes non longo interuallo a se disiungi debent.
> Fraternitatem tuam ita uolumus ordinare episcopos, ut sibi ipsi episcopi longo interuallo minime disiungantur, quatinus nulla sit necessitas, ut in ordinatione episcopi conuenire non possint. Nam episcoporum ordinatio sine aggregatis tribus aut quatuor episcopis fieri nullatenus debet.

Distinction LXXXI

GRATIAN. Part I. Let it suffice us to have said these things concerning those to be ordained and those ordaining, and concerning the distinctions and offices of the individual grades. But because we have lingered upon these matters somewhat more extensively, let us bring certain things coherent with the foregoing under an epilogue for remembrance. One who is to be ordained as bishop ought, as the Apostle writes, to be "without crime," that is, without mortal sin, which must be understood not only of a bishop but also of anyone elected to some prelacy of the Church. Hence Augustine writes upon John:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Hec de ordinandis et ordinatoribus atque de singulorum graduum distinctionibus et offitiis dixisse nos sufficiat. Verum quia aliquantulum diffusius in his immorati sumus, precedentibus coherentia quedam sub epilogo ad memoriam subiciamus. Debet autem ordinandus in episcopum, (ut Apostolus scribit esse "sine crimine," id est sine peccato mortifero, quod non solum de episcopo, sed etiam de quolibet electo ad aliquam preposituram ecclesiae oportet intelligi. Unde Augustinus scribit supra Iohannem:

C. I. One who is ordained bishop ought to be without crime, that is, without grave sin.

When the Apostle Paul selected priests or deacons to be ordained, and anyone who is to be ordained to a prelacy of the Church, he did not say, "If anyone is without sin"—for if he had said this, every man would be rejected and no one would be ordained—but he said, "If anyone is without crime," such as homicide, adultery, some uncleanness of fornication, theft, fraud, sacrilege, and other things of this kind. § 1. A crime, however, is a grave sin most worthy of accusation and condemnation. Part II. GRATIAN. Therefore, anyone entangled in any of these ought not to be ordained; or, if, when already ordained, he is convicted of having committed any of them before or after the time of his ordination, he will be deprived of the office of the grade he received. Hence Pope Symmachus says:

> C. I. Sine crimine id est sine graui peccato debet esse qui ordinatur episcopus.
> Apostolus Paulus, quando elegit ordinandos uel presbiteros, uel diacones, et quicumque ordinandus est ad prepositurам ecclesiae, non ait: "Si quis sine peccato est," (hoc enim si diceret, omnis homo reprobaretur, et nullus ordinaretur,) sed ait: "Si quis sine crimine est:" sicut est homicidium, adulterium, aut aliqua inmunditia fornicationis, furtum, fraus, sacrilegium et cetera huiusmodi. §. 1. Crimen autem est graue peccatum, accusatione et dampnatione dignissimum. II. Pars. Gratian. Quolibet itaque horum inplicatus ordinari non debet; uel si iam ordinatus ante tempus uel post tempus suae ordinationis aliquid eorum admisisse conuincitur, suscepti gradus offitio priuabitur. Unde Simacus Papa ait:

C. II. One who teaches by words, not by deeds, does not rightly assume the person of an admonisher.

No one rightly assumes the person of an admonisher unless by his deeds he condemns errors and by his manner of life demonstrates love of innocence.

> C. II. Monitoris personam recte non suscipit, qui uerbis, non operibus docet.
> Nemo recte monitoris personam suscipit, nisi qui actibus suis errata condempnat, et amorem innocentiae conuersatione demonstrat.

C. III. Let one who does not fear to elevate an unworthy man lack the order which he bestows.

Likewise Pope Celestine, [to the Bishops of Gaul, epistle II, c. 3]. Daniel, burdened by so many testimonies of crimes, assailed by so great an accusation, and, as is said, polluted by incest with sacred virgins, is asserted to have been ordained bishop. And, as is contained in the records of our archive, copies of which we also directed to you, he crept into the dignity of the pontificate at that very time when he was being summoned to plead his cause by letters sent by us. Let injury be absent from the sacred name. It is easier that the ordainer lost this dignity by giving it to such a man than that the ordained man obtained it. The one who believed that, by bestowing the pontificate, this man should be joined to himself will be associated with him when he is convicted. For whoever ordained such men shows what sort of man he himself is.

> C. III. Careat ordine, quem prestat, qui indignum sublimare non metuit.
> Item Celestinus Papa. [ad Episcopos Galliae, epist. II. c. 3.] Tantis Daniel grauatus testimoniis facinorum, tanta accusatione pulsatus sacrarum, ut dicitur uirginum pollutus incestu episcopus asseritur ordinatus. Et, ut in nostri libellis scrinii continetur, quorum ad uos quoque exemplaria direximus, in pontificii dignitatem hoc tempore, quo ad causam dicendam missis a nobis litteris uocabatur, obrepsit. Sacro nomini absit iniuria. Facilius est, ut hanc dignitatem tali dando amiserit ordinator, quam eam obtineat ordinatus; cui conuicto sociabitur, qui eum sibi credidit largiendo pontificium sociandum. Qualis enim ipse sit, quisquis tales ordinauerit, ostendit.

C. IV. The ecclesiastical order does not receive one who, in the examination or afterward, confessed and is ordained.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea, [c. 9]. If any priests were promoted without examination and, when afterward examined, confessed their sins, and when they had confessed, men came and, contrary to the rule, imposed hands upon them, the ecclesiastical order does not receive these men. For in all things the Church defends what is irreproachable.

C. IV. Non recipit ordo ecclesiasticus, qui in examinatione, uel postea confessus ordinatur.

Item ex Concilio Niceno. [cap. 9.] Si qui sine examinatione promoti presbiteri sunt, et postea examinati confessi sunt peccata sua, et, cum confessi fuissent, homines uenientes contra regulam eis manus inposuerunt, hos ecclesiasticus ordo non recipit. In omnibus enim quod inreprehensibile est defendit ecclesia.

C. V. Fallen men tonsured through the ignorance or contempt of those ordaining are to be cast down.

Likewise from the same Council, [c. 10]. As for any of those who have fallen who were already ordained through ignorance or through the contempt of those who ordained them, this does not prejudice the ecclesiastical rule. For when it has been discovered, they will be deposed.

C. V. Lapsi, per ignorantiam aut contemptu ordinantium tonsorati, deiciantur.

Item eiusdem Concilii. [cap. 10.] Quicumque ex his, qui lapsi sunt, per ignorantiam iam ordinati sunt, uel contemptu eorum, qui eos ordinauerunt, hoc non preiudicat regulae ecclesiasticae. Cum enim compertum fuerit, deponentur.

C. VI. Let one who pollutes the ministry by living unlawfully be made foreign to it.

Likewise Innocent, [to Maximus and Severus, epistle V]. The attached sequence of the petition declares what sort of complaint our son Maximilian brought. Led by zeal for faith and discipline, he does not suffer the Church to be polluted by unworthy priests, whom he asserts to have begotten sons while in the presbyterate. And therefore, brothers, after examining the tenor of this petition, which is appended, you ought to place in your midst those who are said to have perpetrated such things; and, when the objections charged against these priests have been examined, if they can be convicted, let them be removed from the priestly office—because those who are not holy cannot handle holy things—and let them be made foreign to the ministry which they polluted by living unlawfully.

C. VI. Alienus fiat a ministerio, qui illud uiuendo illicite polluit.

Item Innocentius. [ad Maximum et Seuerum, ep. V.] Maximilianus filius noster qualem querelam detulerit, libelli eius series adnexa declarat. Qui zelo fidei ac disciplinae ductus, non patitur ecclesiam pollui ab indignis presbiteris, quos in presbiterio filios asserit procreasse. Et ideo, fratres, huius libelli, qui subiectus est, tenore perspecto, eos, qui talia perpetrasse dicuntur, debetis in medio collocare, discussisque obiectionibus, que ipsis presbiteris inpinguntur, si conuinci potuerint, a sacerdotali remoueantur offitio, (quia qui sancti non sunt sancta attractare non possunt,) atque alieni efficiantur a ministerio, quod uiuendo illicite polluerunt.

C. VII. Through the bishop's providence a place of penance is to be assigned to anyone being deposed from an order.

Likewise Pope Eugenius, [II]. If a priest or anyone else advanced in an ecclesiastical order is found in a crime by which he is proved deserving of rejection, once deposed, let him be established through the bishop's providence in a well-considered place, where he may lament the sin and not commit it further.

C. VII. Cuilibet ab ordine deponendo episcopi prouidentia locus penitenciae deputetur.

Item Eugenius Papa. [II.] Sacerdos, aut quis alius in ordine ecclesiastico prouectus, si in eo scelere inuenitur, quo abiciendus conprobetur, depositus prouidentia episcopi bene prouiso loco constituatur, ubi peccatum lugeat et ulterius non committat.

C. VIII. Priests who scorn to do penance are to be confined in a monastery.

Likewise from the Council of Mainz. We have been told that priests canonically degraded because of their negligence live in secular fashion after losing their grade and neglect the good of doing penance. Hence we enact that, once their grade has been lost, they be sent to a monastery or a regular canonry for the sake of doing penance. But if any cause prohibits this from being done, wherever they are, let them not cease to do penance. But if, after losing their grade, they wish to live in secular fashion and neglect to do penance, let them be separated from the communion of the Church.

C. VIII. Retrudantur in monasterio presbiteri, qui penitenciam agere contempnunt.

Item ex Concilio Magontiensi. Dictum est nobis, presbiteros propter suam negligentiam canonice degradatos et seculariter gradu amisso uiuere, et penitenciae agendae bonum negligere. Unde statuimus, ut gradu amisso agendae penitenciae gratia in monasterium aut canonicam regularem mittantur. Si uero hoc fieri causa quelibet prohibuerit, ubicumque sint, penitenciam agere non desistant. Si autem amisso gradu seculariter uiuere uoluerint, et penitenciam agere neglexerint, ab ecclesiae communione separentur.

C. IX. A change of place benefits those converted to penance.

Likewise Isidore, [Sentences, On the Supreme Good, book II, c. 10]. A change of place sometimes benefits converts for the salvation of the soul; for frequently, when the place is changed, the affection of the mind is changed. It is therefore fitting for a man also to be bodily uprooted from the place where he served enticements. For the place where anyone lived wickedly places before the sight of the mind what he often either thought or did there.

C. IX. Mutatio loci ualet conuersis ad penitenciam.

Item Ysidorus. [Sentenciarum, de summo bono, lib. II. c. 10.] Valet interdum conuersis pro animae salute mutatio loci; plerumque enim, dum mutatur locus, mutatur mentis affectus. Congruum est ergo, inde etiam corporaliter euelli ubi quisque illecebris deseruiuit. Nam locus, ubi praue quisque uixit, in aspectu mentis apponit quod sepe ibi uel cogitauit, uel gessit.

C. X. A cleric convicted of or confessing adultery is to be confined in a monastery.

Likewise from the Seventh Synod of Orléans, [c. 7]. If any cleric has either confessed adultery or been convicted of it, once deposed from office, with communion granted, let him be confined in a monastery for the whole time of his life.

> C. X. Clericus adulterasse conuictus uel confessus in monasterio retrudatur.
> Item ex VII. Sinodo Aurelianensi. [c. 7.] Si quis clericus adulterasse aut confessus fuerit, aut conuictus, depositus ab offitio communione concessa in monasterio toto uitae suae tempore trudatur.

C. XI. On the same.

Likewise Pelagius to the Defender Constantine. Romanus, a cleric of the church of Tiano, was deposed from the clerical order for the crime of adultery which he is reported to have committed and, at our command, was confined in a monastery here in the city of Rome to do penance.

> C. XI. De eodem.
> Item Pelagius Constantino Defensori. Romanus ecclesiae Thianensis clericus pro crimine adulterii, quod admisisse perhibetur, a clericatus ordine depositus in monasterio hic in urbe Romana ad agendam penitenciam ex nostra iussione retrusus est.

C. XII. A priest or deacon caught in a crime is to be deposed, but not deprived of communion.

Likewise from the canon of the Apostles, [c. 25]. Let a priest or deacon who is caught in fornication, theft, perjury, or homicide be deposed, but not deprived of communion; for Scripture says: "God does not judge twice for the same thing."

> C. XII. In crimine captus presbiter uel diaconus deponatur, sed communione non priuetur.
> Item ex canone Apostolorum. [c. 25.] Presbiter aut diaconus, qui in fornicatione, aut furto, aut periurio, aut homicidio captus est, deponatur, non tamen communione priuetur; dicit enim scriptura: "Non iudicat Deus bis in id ipsum."

C. XIII. On the same.

Likewise. If any bishop, priest, or deacon has fornicated or committed adultery after receiving the grades of his diaconate, let him be deposed and, cast out from the Church, let him do penance among the laymen.

> C. XIII. De eodem.
>
> Item. Si quis episcopus, aut presbiter, aut diaconus post diaconii sui gradus acceptos fuerit fornicatus aut mechatus, deponatur, et ab ecclesia proiectus inter laicos agat penitenciam.

C. XIV. On the same.

Likewise from the First Council of Orléans, [cc. 9 and 12]. If a deacon or priest commits a capital crime, let him be expelled both from office and from communion. But if, because of his offense, he has removed himself from communion at the altar under profession as a penitent, even these men, if others are lacking and a cause of certain necessity arises, are permitted to baptize one requesting baptism.

C. XIV. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I. c. 9. et 12.] Si diaconus aut presbiter crimen capitale commiserit, simul et ab offitio, et communione pellatur. Si uero pro reatu suo se ab altaris communione sub penitentis professione submouerit, his quoque, si alii defuerint, et causa certae necessitatis exoritur, poscentem baptismum liceat baptizare.

C. XV. Priests, deacons, and subdeacons who lie in the crime of fornication are not to enter churches.

Likewise Gregory [VII] to all throughout the kingdom of Italy and of the Germans. If there are any priests, deacons, or subdeacons who lie in the crime of fornication, on behalf of almighty God and by the authority of Saint Peter we forbid them entrance to the church until they repent and amend. But if any prefer to persevere in their sin, let none of you presume to hear their office, because their blessing is turned into a curse and their prayer into sin, as the Lord bears witness through the Prophet: "I shall curse," he says, "your blessings." But those who are unwilling to obey this most salutary precept will incur the sin of idolatry, as Samuel bears witness and Blessed Gregory teaches: "Not to obey is the sin of divination, and not to acquiesce is the crime of idolatry." Therefore, whoever, while asserting himself to be a Christian, scorns to obey the apostolic see incurs the sin of paganism.

C. XV. Non ingrediantur ecclesias presbiteri, diaconi, subdiaconi, qui in fornicationis crimine iacent.

Item Gregorius [VII.] omnibus per regnum Italicum et Teutonicorum. Si qui sunt presbiteri, diaconi, uel subdiaconi, qui in crimine fornicationis iacent, interdicimus eis ex parte Dei omnipotentis et S. Petri auctoritate ecclesiae introitum, usque dum peniteant et emendent. Si qui uero in peccato suo perseuerare maluerint, nullus uestrum eorum audire presumat offitium quia benedictio eorum uertitur in maledictionem et oratio in peccatum, testante Domino per Prophetam: "Maledicam," inquit, "benedictionibus uestris." Qui uero huic saluberrimo precepto obedire noluerint, ydolatriae peccatum incurrent, Samuele teste, et B. Gregorio instruente: "Peccatum ariolandi est non obedire, et scelus ydololatriae non adquiescere." Peccatum igitur paganitatis incurrit, quisquis, dum Christianum se esse asserit, apostolicae sedi obedire contempnit.

C. XVI. A bishop, priest, or deacon who takes a wife or retains one already taken is to be deprived of office and benefice.

Likewise Alexander II to the Bishops and King of Dalmatia. If from now on any bishop, priest, or deacon takes a woman or retains one already taken, let him fall from his proper grade until he comes to satisfaction; let him neither remain in the choir of those singing psalms nor have any portion of ecclesiastical property.

C. XVI. Offitio et beneficio priuetur episcopus, presbiter, diaconus uxorem suscipiens, uel susceptam retinens.

Item Alexander II. Episcopis et Regi Dalmatiae. Si quis amodo episcopus, presbiter, diaconus feminam acceperit uel acceptam retinuerit, proprio gradu decidat, usque dum ad satisfactionem ueniat, nec in choro psallentium maneat, nec aliquam portionem de rebus ecclesiasticis habeat.

C. XVII. On the same.

The same to the Clergy of Milan. If anyone among the priests, deacons, or subdeacons, contumaciously deserting his office, chooses a woman for himself instead, just as he voluntarily relinquishes the office because of fornication, so because of transgression let him be compelled, even unwillingly, also to relinquish the benefice.

> C. XVII. De eodem.
> Idem Clero Mediolanensi. Si quis sacerdotum, uel diaconorum, uel subdiaconorum offitium contumaciter deserens feminam sibi potius elegerit, sicut sponte ob fornicationem dimittit offitium, ita ob preuaricationem dimittere cogatur etiam inuitus beneficium.

C. XVIII. On the same.

The same to the people of Milan. Those also who, so that they may be permitted to fornicate, abandon the divine office and, withdrawing from God, serve the devil and his works, just as they most justly make themselves foreign to the office, so we adjudge them to be deprived of the benefice of churches.

> C. XVIII. De eodem.
> Idem populo Mediolanensi. Eos etiam, qui, ut fornicari eis liceat, diuinum offitium derelinquunt, a Deo recedentes diabolo et operibus eius seruiunt, sicut se iustissime ab offitio alienos faciunt, ita beneficio ecclesiarum priuatos esse adiudicamus.

C. XIX. On the same.

Likewise Pope Lucius. Let such ministers of the altar, whether priests or deacons, be chosen for the Lord's offices as preserve continence. § 1. But if after his ordination it happens that a minister enters the bed of his own wife, let him not enter the thresholds of the sacristy, nor be the porter of the sacristy, nor touch the altar, nor receive from those offering the oblation of the sacrifice, nor approach or administer the portion of the Lord's body, nor perform the lesser offices without the authority of an elder. Certainly, let him not bring a ewer or chalice to the altar.

> C. XIX. De eodem.
> Item Lucius Papa. Ministri altaris presbiteri siue diaconi ad offitia dominica tales eligantur, qui continenciam seruent. §. 1. Si uero post ordinationem suam ministro contigerit propriae uxoris inuadere cubile, sacrarii non intret limina, nec sacrarii portitor fiat nec altare contingat, nec ab offerentibus holocausti oblationem suscipiat, nec ad dominici corporis portionem accedat, nec propinet, neque sine maioris natu auctoritate minora gerat offitia; urceum sane uel calicem ad altare non suggerat.

C. XX. A cleric who frequents the homes of matrons is to be deposed.

The same. Part III. Let a cleric not approach a woman's dwelling alone, nor hasten there without the command of an elder priest; let a priest not mingle conversation alone with a woman alone; nor let an archdeacon, under the pretext of humility or office, frequently enter the homes of matrons or perhaps secretly send some message to a matron through clerics or servants. If this has become known, let the former be deposed and the latter be barred from the thresholds of the church.

[PALEA.

C. XX. Clericus matronarum domicilia frequentans deponatur.

Idem. III. Pars. Clericus solus ad feminae tabernaculum non accedat, nec properet sine maioris natu sacerdotis iussione; nec solus presbiter cum sola femina fabulas misceat, nec archidiaconus sub pretextu humilitatis aut offitii frequenter intret domicilia matronarum, aut forte per clericos aut domesticos matronae mandet aliquid secrete. Si agnitum fuerit, et ille deponatur, et ille a liminibus ecclesiae arceatur.

[PALEA.

C. XXI. On the same.

The same. But if perhaps there has been some intercession, let it be reported to the bishop. And if it is such a matter that he ought to go there by a pious intervention, let him himself proceed; but if not, let him direct someone from his side with two or three witnesses. Nevertheless, let no one dwell with an unrelated woman unless she is a close relative or sister. And let this be done with great solicitude. For we are not ignorant of the malice of Satan.]

[PALEA.

C. XXI. De eodem.

Idem. Sed si forte aliqua intercessio fuerit, episcopo suggeratur. Et si talis est, ad quam debeat ire pio interuentu, ipse pergat: sin autem, de latere suo dirigat cum duobus aut tribus testibus. Nemo tamen cum extranea habitet femina, nisi proxima aut soror fuerit. Et hoc cum magna sollicitudine fiat. Non enim ignoramus malicias satanae.]

[PALEA.

C. XXII. On the same.

From a decree of Pope Eugenius. If any of the priests—that is, a priest, deacon, or subdeacon—suspected of the crime of fornication with any woman is found after a first, second, and third admonition speaking with her or associating with her in any manner, let him be excommunicated, and let the woman be judged canonically.]

C. XXII. De eodem.

Ex decreto Eugenii Papae. Si quispiam sacerdotum, id est presbiter, uel diaconus, uel subdiaconus, de quacumque femina crimine fornicationis suspectus post primam, secundam et tertiam admonitionem inueniatur fabulari cum ea uel aliquo modo conuersari, excommunicetur, femina uero canonice iudicetur.]

C. XXIII. Priests are not permitted to dwell together with women.

Likewise Gregory. Part IV. Priests to whom the Lord's people are entrusted ought with great steadfastness to keep watch over the Lord's sheep, lest they be torn by wolfish bites, that is, by the goads of the devil. § 1. Nor indeed ought I to keep silent about what I say with grave sadness of mind: I observe priests dwelling with women, which is impious to say or hear and is contrary to the enactments of the holy canons. For wherever there is such cohabitation of those dwelling together, the goads of the ancient enemy are not absent. And therefore they are to be admonished not to be deceived by the fraud of the ancient enemy, so that, according to the Apostle's voice, our ministry may not be reviled. For we ought, brothers, to guard ourselves from unlawful things so that we may be able to lift pure hands to God. For it is written: “Be holy, because I am holy.” But if anyone presumes to act otherwise, let him be deprived of the honor of his priesthood. Whence in every way we must guard, brothers, lest we deceive the people and that saying of the Prophet be fulfilled in us: “My priests contaminate holy things and reject the law.” Another Prophet also rebukes them, saying: “You, O priests, who deceive my name, and you have said: In what thing do we deceive your name?” To whom it was answered: “Offering polluted loaves upon my altar. I have no good will in you, says the Lord, and I shall not receive sacrifice from your hands, because you are polluted.”

C. XXIII. Simul cum mulieribus sacerdotes habitare non licet.

Item Gregorius. IV. Pars. Oportet sacerdotes, quibus populus Domini commissus est, cum magna constantia uigilare desuper dominicas oues, ne lupinis morsibus id est diaboli stimulis lanientur. §. 1. Neque enim hoc silere debeo, quod cum graui animi tristicia dico: sacerdotes cum feminis habitare conspicio; quod nefarium est dicere uel audire, et contra sanctorum canonum sancita. Ubi enim talis fuerit commorantium cohabitacio, antiqui hostis stimuli non desunt. Ideoque ammonendi sunt, ut non antiqui hostis decipiantur fraude, quatinus iuxta Apostoli uocem non uituperetur ministerium nostrum. Cauere enim nos oportet, fratres, ab illicitis, ut mundas ualeamus ad Deum leuare manus. Scriptum est enim: "Sancti estote, quoniam ego sanctus sum." Si quis uero presumpserit aliter agere, sacerdotii sui honore priuetur. Unde omnimodo cauendum est, fratres, ne fallamus populum, et inpleatur in nobis illud Prophetae dictum: "Sacerdotes mei contaminant sancta et reprobant legem," quos et alius Propheta increpat, dicens: "Vos o sacerdotes, qui fallitis nomen meum, et dixistis, in qua re fallimus nomen tuum? quibus responsum est: offerentes ad altare meum panes pollutos. Non mihi uoluntas in uobis, dicit Dominus, et sacrificium non accipiam de manibus uestris, quia polluti estis."

C. XXIV. On the same.

The same to the Defender Symmachus, [book I of the Register, indiction IX, epistle 50]. We will that priests ought to be prohibited from associating with women, with the exception only of a mother, sister, or wife, who is to be governed chastely.

C. XXIV. De eodem.

Idem Simaco. [Defensori, lib. I. Reg. Indict. IX. ep. 50.] Volumus, ut sacerdotes Prohiberi debeant, ne cum mulieribus conuersentur: excepta dumtaxat matre, uel sorore, uel uxore, quae caste regenda est.

C. XXV. On the same.

The same in the Register, [book VII, epistle 39]. It is read that Blessed Augustine did not consent even to dwell with his sister, saying: “Those who are with my sister are not my sisters.” Therefore, the great caution of a learned man ought to be an instruction for us.

C. XXV. De eodem.

Idem in registro. [lib. VII. epist. 39.] Legitur, quod B. Augustinus nec cum sorore habitare consenserit, dicens: Que cum sorore mea sunt sorores meae non sunt. Docti ergo uiri cautela magna nobis debet esse instructio.

C. XXVI. On the same.

Likewise from the Eighth Synod. In all things it is fitting to observe that it should be determined who the cleric is, and that he ought to appear before or speak to women at a determined time, in a determined place, and with determined persons, so that every impious suspicion may be excluded.

Certainly, no principle of religion permits one man alone to approach one woman alone. “For two are better than one.” For at the same time the matter is conducted both more faithfully and more safely. “For woe to one, because if he falls, there is no one to raise him.”

C. XXVI. De eodem.

Item ex VIII. Sinodo. In omnibus obseruare conuenit, ut certus quis, et certo tempore, et certo loco, et certis personis uel apparere clericus, uel loqui debeat mulieribus, ut excludatur omnis nefanda suspicio. Certe solum ad solam accedere nulla religionis ratio permittit. "Melius enim duo, quam unus." Simul enim et fidelius, et tutius res geritur. "Ve enim uni, quia si ceciderit, non est qui erigat eum."

C. XXVII. On the same.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 17]. Let unrelated women by no means cohabit with any clerics, but only mothers, grandmothers, maternal and paternal aunts, sisters, daughters of brothers or sisters, and any women from the household who, by domestic necessity, were already dwelling with them even before they were ordained; or if their sons, after their parents were already ordained, have taken wives; or if necessity required wives to be brought from elsewhere for servants who do not have women in the household whom they might marry.

C. XXVII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 17.] Cum omnibus omnino clericis extraneae feminae non cohabitent, sed solae matres, auiae et materterae, amitae, sorores et filiae fratrum aut sororum, et quecumque ex familia domestica necessitate, etiam antequam ordinarentur, iam cum eis habitabant, uel si filii eorum iam ordinatis parentibus uxores acceperunt, aut seruis, non habentibus in domo quas ducant, aliunde ducere necessitas fuerit.

C. XXVIII. On the same.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea, [c. 30]. Ministers of the altar, or indeed any clerics, those practicing continence, and Christians altogether ought not to have baths in common with women. For this is the foremost reproach among the gentiles.

C. XXVIII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 30.] Non oportet ministros altaris, uel etiam clericos quoslibet, aut se continentes, et omnino Christianum cum mulieribus lauacra habere communia. Hec enim est apud gentiles prima reprehensio.

C. XXIX. On the same.

Likewise Gregory to Januarius, Bishop of Cagliari, [book III, epistle 26]. As I hear, you prohibited your archdeacon from dwelling with women, and up to now you are despised in that prohibition. Unless he obeys your command, we will that he be deprived of sacred order.

C. XXIX. De eodem.

Item Gregorius Ianuario Episcopo Caralitano. [lib. III. epist. 26.] Archidiaconum tuum, ut audio, habitare cum mulieribus prohibuisti, et nunc usque in ea prohibitione despiceris; qui nisi iussioni tuae paruerit, eum sacro ordine uolumus esse priuatum.

C. XXX. Women who seek illicit companionship with clerics are to be sold by the bishop.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 42]. Certain clerics, not having a lawful marriage, seek the prohibited companionship of unrelated women or their own female servants. And therefore, whatever women are joined to clerics in this manner are to be taken away and sold by the bishop, while those whom they infected by their lust are for a time bound over to penance.

> C. XXX. Venundentur ab episcopo que appetunt illicita clericorum consortia.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano. [IV. c. 42.] Quidam clerici, legitimum non habentes coniugium, extranearum mulierum uel ancillarum suarum que interdicta sunt consortia appetunt. Ideoque, quecumque clericis taliter coniunctae sunt, ab episcopo auferantur et uenundentur, illis pro tempore religatis ad penitenciam, quos sua libidine infecerunt.

C. XXXI. Let no women dwell with clerics except those whom kinship excuses.

Likewise Pope Siricius to Bishop Himerius, [epistle I, c. 12]. We suffer no women to be in the house of clerics except only those whom the Synod of Nicaea permitted to dwell with them for the sole reasons of kinship.

> C. XXXI. Non habitent cum clericis, nisi quas necessitudo excusat.
> Item Siricius Papa Imerio Episcopo. [ep. I. c. 12.] Feminas non alias in domo clericorum esse patimur, nisi eas tantum, quas propter solas necessitudinum causas habitare cum eisdem sinodus Nicena permisit.

C. XXXII. Clerics are not to approach the homes of women except at the command of their superiors.

Likewise from the Third African Council, [c. 5]. Let clerics or those practicing continence not approach widows or virgins except at the command or permission of bishops or priests. And let them not do this alone, but with clerics or with those whom the bishop or priest has commanded. Nor are bishops or priests themselves to have access alone to women of this kind, but where either clerics are present or some Christians of grave character.

> C. XXXII. Nisi maiorum iussione ad feminarum domicilia clerici non accedant.
> Item ex Concilio Affricano III. [c. 5.] Clerici uel continentes ad uiduas uel uirgines nisi ex iussu uel permissu episcoporum aut presbiterorum non accedant. Et hoc non soli faciant, sed cum clericis, uel cum quibus episcopus aut presbiter iusserit. Nec ipsi episcopi aut presbiteri soli habeant accessum ad huiusmodi feminas, sed ubi aut clerici presentes sunt, aut graues aliqui Christiani.

C. XXXIII. Bishops are to provide that virgins not be joined to familiar associations with clerics on the occasion of temporal needs.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 102]. It pertains to the guilt of the bishop or priest who presides over the parish if, for the sake of sustaining the present life, younger widows or consecrated women are subjected to familiar associations with clerics.

> C. XXXIII. Episcopi prouideant, ne occasione temporalium clericorum familiaritatibus uirgines socientur.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 102.] Ad reatum episcopi pertinet uel presbiteri, qui parrochiae preest, si sustentandae uitae presentis causa adolescentiores uiduae uel sanctimoniales clericorum familiaritatibus subiciantur.

[C. XXXIV.]

Likewise from the same, [c. 103]. Widows who are sustained by a stipend of the Church ought to be so assiduous in the work of God that they aid the Church by their merits and prayers.

[C. XXXIV.]

Item ex eodem. [c. 103.] Viduae, que stipendio ecclesiae sustentantur, tam assiduae in Dei opere esse debent, ut et meritis, et orationibus suis ecclesiam adiuuent.

Distinction LXXXII

GRATIAN. Part I. A bishop is also generally to provide necessities for the poor and for those who cannot labor with their own hands. Hence it reads in the First Council of Orléans, [c. 18]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Generaliter etiam pauperibus et his, qui suis manibus laborare non possunt, episcopus necessaria prouideat. Unde in Aurelianensi Concilio [I. c. 18.] legitur:

C. I. On the same.

Let a bishop bestow food and clothing—as far as it is possible for him—upon the poor or infirm who, because of weakness, cannot labor with their own hands.

C. I. De eodem.

Episcopus pauperibus uel infirmis, qui debilitate faciente suis manibus laborare non possunt, uictum et uestitum (in quantum sibi possibile fuerit) largiatur.

C. II. One who has preferred pleasure to office is to be removed in every way.

Likewise Innocent to Exsuperius, Bishop of Toledo, [epistle III, c. 1]. Part II. You have proposed what ought to be observed concerning those placed in the ministry of the diaconate or the office of the presbyterate whom children begotten by them have disclosed to be or to have been incontinent. Concerning these men also the discipline of the divine laws is manifest, and the evident admonitions of Bishop Siricius of blessed memory have circulated: that incontinent men placed in such offices are to be deprived of every ecclesiastical honor and not admitted to such a ministry, which ought to be fulfilled by continence alone. For the authority of the sacred law is very ancient and has been guarded from the beginning: priests were commanded to dwell in the temple during the year of their turn, so that, serving the sacred oblations, they might claim the divine mysteries for themselves while pure and cleansed from every stain, and so that it might not be lawful to admit to sacred offices those who exercise carnal intercourse even with a wife, because it is written: "Be holy, because I, the Lord your God, am holy." The use of marriage had assuredly been relaxed for them for the succession of offspring because no one from another tribe had been commanded to approach the priesthood. How much more ought the priests or Levites themselves to preserve chastity from the day of their ordination, for whom the priesthood or ministry is without succession, and no day passes on which they are free either from divine sacrifices or from the office of baptism? For if Paul writes to the Corinthians, saying, "Abstain for a time, so that you may be free for prayer," and assuredly commanded this to laymen, how much more, therefore, will priests, whose continual office is both sacrificing and praying, always be obliged to abstain from intercourse of this kind? If a priest has been contaminated by carnal concupiscence, by what merit does he believe that he can be heard, when it has been said: "All things are clean to the clean, but to the defiled and unbelieving nothing is clean; rather, their mind or conscience is defiled"? But perhaps he believes this is permitted to him because it is written: "The husband of one wife." He did not say this so that the man might remain in the concupiscence of begetting, but because of future incontinence. He declares this more openly, saying: "But those who are in the flesh cannot please God. You, however, are no longer in the flesh but in the spirit." Yet that judgment is clearly unequal and different. For if the form of ecclesiastical life and discipline which circulated from Bishop Siricius to all the provinces is not proved to have reached some persons, pardon will not be denied to those who were ignorant, on condition that henceforth they begin wholly to abstain and retain their grades in which they were found, in such a way that it is not permissible for them to ascend to higher ones. It ought to be counted as a benefice for them that they do not lose this very place which they retain. § 1. But if any are disclosed to have known the form of living sent by Siricius and not immediately to have cast away the desires of lust, those men are to be removed in every way who, after the admonition had become known, judged that pleasure was to be preferred.

C. II. Qui uoluptatem offitio preposuerit, modis omnibus submoueatur.

Item Innocentius Exsuperio Tolletano Episcopo. [epist. III. c. 1.] II. Pars. Proposuisti, quid de his obseruari debeat, quos in diaconii ministerio aut in offitio presbiterii positos incontinentes esse aut fuisse generati filii prodiderunt. De his etiam manifesta diuinarum legum est disciplina, et beatae recordationis Siricii episcopi monita euidentia commearunt, ut incontinentes in offitiis talibus positi omni honore ecclesiastico priuarentur, nec admittantur ad tale ministerium, quod sola continentia oportet inpleri. Est enim uetus admodum sacrae legis auctoritas iam inde ab initio custodita, quod in templo anno uicis suae habitare precepti sunt sacerdotes, ut seruientes sacris oblationibus puros et ab omni labe purgatos sibi uendicent diuina misteria, neque eos ad sacra offitia fas sit admitti, qui exercent uel cum uxore carnale consortium, quia scriptum est: "Sancti estote, quia ego sanctus sum Dominus Deus uester." Quibus utique propter sobolis successionem propterea usus fuerat relaxatus, quia de alia tribu, ad sacerdotium nullus fuerat iussus accedere. Quo magis ipsi sacerdotes uel Leuitae pudicitiam ex die ordinationis suae seruare debent, quibus et sacerdotium, uel ministerium sine successione est, nec preterit dies, qua uel a sacrificiis diuinis, uel baptismatis offitio uacent? Nam si Paulus ad Corinthios dicens scribit: "Abstinete uos ad tempus, ut uacetis orationi," et hoc utique laicis precepit, multo magis igitur sacerdotes, quibus et sacrificandi et orandi iuge offitium est, semper debebunt ab huiusmodi consortio abstinere; qui, si contaminatus fuerit carnali concupiscentia, quo merito exaudiri se posse credit, cum dictum sit: "Omnia munda mundis, coinquinatis autem et infidelibus mundum nichil est; sed coinquinata est eorum mens uel conscientia?" Sed fortasse hoc licere sibi credit, quia scriptum est: "Unius uxoris uirum." Non dixit hoc, ut permaneat in concupiscentia generandi, sed propter incontinentiam futuram. Quod apertius declarat dicens: "Qui autem in carne sunt, Deo placere non possunt. Vos autem iam non estis in carne, sed in spiritu." Sed ea plane dispar et diuersa sententia est. Nam si ad aliquos forma ecclesiasticae uitae pariter et disciplinae, que ab episcopo Siricio ad omnes prouincias comeauit, non probatur peruenisse, his ignorantibus uenia non negabitur, ita ut de cetero penitus incipiant abstinere et ita gradus suos, in quibus fuerint inuenti, retentent, ut eis non liceat ad potiora conscendere; quibus in beneficio esse debet, quod hunc ipsum locum, quem retinent, non amittunt. §. 1. Si qui autem scisse formam uiuendi missam a Siricio deteguntur, neque statim cupiditates libidinis abiecisse, illi sunt modis omnibus submouendi, qui post admonitionem cognitam preponendam arbitrati sunt uoluptatem.

C. III. On the same.

Likewise Pope Siricius, [to Himerius, Bishop of Tarragona, epistle I, c. 7]. We have learned that very many priests of Christ and Levites, after long periods of their consecration, have begotten offspring both from their own wives and from shameful intercourse, and defend their crime by this prescription: that in the Old Testament the faculty of begetting is read to have been attributed to priests and ministers. Let whoever he is who follows lusts and teaches vices now tell me: if he thinks that in the law of Moses the reins of luxury were indiscriminately loosened by our God for the sacred orders, why does he admonish those to whom the holy of holies were entrusted, saying, "Be holy, because I, the Lord your God, am holy"? Why also were priests commanded to dwell in the temple far from their own homes during the year of their turn? Clearly for this reason: lest they be able to exercise carnal intercourse even with their wives, so that, shining with integrity of conscience, they might offer a gift acceptable to God. When the time of their service had been completed, use of a wife had been relaxed for them solely for the sake of succession, because no one except from the tribe of Levi had been commanded to be admitted to God's ministry.

C. III. De eodem.

Item Siricius Papa. [ad Himerium Tarraconensem Episcopum, epist. I. cap. 7.] Plurimos sacerdotes Christi atque Leuitas post longa consecrationis suae tempora tam de coniugibus propriis, quam etiam de turpi coitu sobolem didicimus procreasse, et crimen suum hac prescriptione defendere, quia in ueteri testamento sacerdotibus ac ministris generandi facultas legitur attributa. Dicat mihi nunc, quisquis ille est sectator libidinum preceptorque uitiorum, si existimat quod in lege Moysi sacris ordinibus passim a Deo nostro laxata sunt frena luxuriae, cur eos, quibus committebantur sancta sanctorum, premonet, dicens: "Sancti estote, quia ego sanctus sum Dominus Deus uester?" Cur etiam procul a suis domibus anno uicis suae in templo habitare iussi sunt sacerdotes? Hac uidelicet ratione, ne uel cum uxoribus possent carnale exercere commercium, ut conscientiae integritate fulgentes acceptabile Deo munus offerrent. Quibus expleto deseruitionis suae tempore uxoris usus solius successionis causa fuerat relaxatus, quia non ex alia tribu, nisi ex Leui, quisquam ad Dei ministerium fuerat preceptus admitti.

[C. IV.]

Likewise. Because certain of those concerning whom we speak, as your holiness reported, lament that they fell through ignorance, we say that mercy is not to be denied to them on this condition: that, without any increase of honor, they persevere as long as they live in this office into which they were reduced, provided nevertheless that after this they take care to show themselves continent. But those who rely upon the excuse of an unlawful privilege and assert that this was granted to them in the old law are to know that by authority of the apostolic see they have been cast down from every ecclesiastical honor which they used unworthily and can never handle the venerable mysteries from which they deprived themselves while panting after obscene desires. And because present examples admonish us to take caution for the future, if any bishop, priest, or deacon—which we do not desire—is hereafter found to be such, let him understand now that every approach to indulgence has been closed to him through us, because wounds which have not felt the medicine of poultices must be cut away with iron. Part III. GRATIAN. But one who is commanded to be deposed because of sin will be able, after worthy penance, to be restored in his order. Hence it reads in the Council of Gangra:

[C. IV.]

Item. Quia aliquanti, de quibus loquimur, (ut tua sanctitas retulit), ignorantia lapsos se esse deflent, his hac condicione misericordiam dicimus non negandam, ut sine ullo honoris augmento, in hoc, quo deiecti sunt, quamdiu uixerint, offitio perseuerent: si tamen post hoc continentes se studuerint exhibere. Hi uero, qui illiciti priuilegii excusatione nituntur, et sibi asserunt ueteri hoc lege concessum, nouerint se ab omni ecclesiastico honore, quo indigne usi sunt, apostolicae sedis auctoritate deiectos, nec umquam posse ueneranda attractare misteria, a quibus se ipsi, dum obscenis cupiditatibus inhiant, priuauerunt. Et quia exempla presentia cauere nos premonent in futurum, si quilibet episcopus, presbiter atque diaconus (quod non optamus) fuerit talis inuentus, iam nunc sibi omnem per nos indulgentiae aditum intelligat obseratum, quia ferro necesse est ut abscidantur uulnera, que fomentorum non senserint medicinam. III. Pars. Gratian. Qui autem propter peccatum iubetur deponi, post condignam penitenciam in suo ordine poterit reparari. Unde in Gangrensi Concilio legitur:

C. V. What penance is to be imposed upon a priest who has been convicted of fornication.

If a priest commits fornication, although according to the canons of the Apostles he ought to be deposed, nevertheless, according to the authority of Blessed Pope Sylvester, if he has not persisted in the vice, if, having confessed of his own accord, he has applied himself to rise again, let him do penance for ten years in this manner: for three continuous months, removed from the others, let him use bread and water from evening to evening, but on Lord's days and principal feasts let him be refreshed by a little wine, small fish, and legumes, without meat and lard, eggs, and cheese; clothed in sackcloth, let him remain upon the ground and continually implore the mercy of almighty God by day and night. When the three continuous months have been completed, let him come out, yet let him not proceed in public, lest the faithful flock suffer scandal in him; for a priest ought not to do public penance as a layman does. Afterward, when his strength has been recovered for a time, let him complete one year and a half on bread and water, excepting Lord's days and principal festivities, on which he will be able to use wine and lard, eggs, and cheese according to the canonical measure. When the first year and a half have been completed, lest he become hardened, let him become a participant in the Lord's body and blood and come to the peace; let him sing psalms with the brothers as the last in the choir; let him not approach the horn of the altar; according to the voice of Blessed Clement, let him perform the lesser offices. Thereafter, until the completion of the seventh year, at every time except the paschal days, let him fast on the three lawful weekdays in each week on bread and water. When the circuit of the seventh year has been completed, if the brothers among whom he did penance have praised his worthy penance, the bishop will be able to recall him to his former honor according to the authority of Blessed Pope Callistus. Certainly, it is to be known that he will be able to redeem Monday by singing one psalter or, if need exists, by giving one denarius to the poor. When seven years have been completed, thereafter until the end of the tenth year let him observe Friday on bread and water, with no redemption intervening. § 1. The same penance will also belong to a priest for all other sins and crimes which lead him to deposition. Nor let this seem burdensome to anyone, if a priest, after a fall, worthily doing penance as was said above, returns to his former honors.

C. V. Que penitentia sit inponenda sacerdoti, qui de fornicatione conuictus fuerit.

Presbiter, si fornicationem fecerit, quamquam secundum canones Apostolorum debeat deponi, tamen iuxta auctoritatem B. Siluestri Papae, si non in uitio perduraverit, si sua sponte confessus adiecit, ut resurgeret, decem annis in hunc modum peniteat: tribus siquidem mensibus a ceteris remotus pane et aqua a uespera in uesperam utatur, diebus autem dominicis et precipuis festis modico uino et pisciculis atque leguminibus recreetur, sine carne et sagimine, ouis et caseo; sacco indutus humi adhereat, die ac nocte iugiter misericordiam Dei omnipotentis inploret. Finitis tribus mensibus continuis exeat: tamen in publicum non procedat, ne grex fidelis in eo scandalum patiatur; nec enim debet sacerdos publice penitere, sicut laicus. Postea aliquantisper resumptis uiribus, unum annum et dimidium in pane et aqua expleat, exceptis dominicis diebus et precipuis festiuitatibus, in quibus uino et sagimine, ouis et caseo iuxta canonicam mensuram uti poterit. Finito primo anno et dimidio, corporis et sanguinis Domini, ne indurescat, particeps fiat, et ad pacem ueniat, psalmos cum fratribus in choro ultimus canat, ad cornu altaris non accedat, iuxta B. Clementis uocem minora gerat offitia. Deinde uero usque ad expletionem septimi anni omni quidem tempore, exceptis pascalibus diebus, tres legitimas ferias in unaquaque ebdomada in pane et aqua ieiunet. Expleto septimi anni circulo, si fratres apud quos penituit, eius condignam penitentiam laudauerint, episcopus in pristinum honorem iuxta B. Calixti Papae auctoritatem eum reuocare poterit. Sane sciendum est, quia secundam feriam unum psalterium canendo, aut unum denarium pauperibus dando, si opus est, redimere poterit. Finitis septem annis, deinde usque ad finem decimi anni sextam feriam (nulla interueniente redemptione) obseruet in pane et aqua. §. 1. Eadem quoque penitentia erit sacerdoti de omnibus aliis peccatis et criminibus, que eum in depositionem adducunt. Neque hoc cuilibet uideatur onerosum, si sacerdos post lapsum digne, ut supra dictum est, penitens ad pristinos redeat honores.

Distinction LXXXIII

GRATIAN. Part I. It is also to be provided that one who is elected to ordination, even if he appears foreign to his own vice, is not defiled by consenting to the vices of others. For as Pope Symmachus says: “There is no great difference whether you inflict death or permit it. For one is proved to inflict death upon the sick who, although he can, does not exclude it.” Hence Gregory VII says, [in the Register, book VI, c. 12, of the Roman Synod celebrated in the year of the Lord 1080, otherwise 1078]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Prouidendum quoque est, ne is, qui ad ordinandum eligitur, etsi a proprio uitio uideatur alienus, consentiendo alienis inquinetur. Ut enim Simacus Papa ait: "Non est grandis differentia, utrum lethum inferas, uel admittas. Mortem enim languentibus probatur infligere, qui hanc, cum possit, non excludit." Hinc Gregorius VII. ait: [in Reg. lib. VI. c. 12. Romanae Sinodi, celebratae Anno Domini 1080. al. 1078.]

C. I. A bishop who consents to the fornication of his clerics is to be suspended from office.

If any bishop, with payment or entreaties intervening, consents to the fornication of priests or deacons, or to the crime of incest, in his parish, or does not attack the crime committed by authority of his office, let him be suspended from office.

C. I. Suspendatur ab offitio, clericorum suorum fornicationi consentiens episcopus.

Si quis episcopus fornicationem presbiterorum, diaconorum, uel crimen incestus in sua parrochia precio uel precibus interueniente consenserit, uel commissum auctoritate sui offitii non inpugnauerit, ab offitio suspendatur.

C. II. One who sins under the name of holiness harms the Church most of all.

Likewise Augustine. Certainly no one in the Church harms more than one who, acting perversely, has the name or order of holiness and of a priest. For no one presumes to rebuke him when he sins, and the fault is vehemently extended as an example, since the sinner is honored because of reverence for the order. Therefore, a bishop who does not correct the crimes of such men is to be called a shameless dog rather than a bishop.

> C. II. Maxime ecclesiam ledit sub nomine sanctitatis delinquens.
> Item Augustinus. Nemo quippe in ecclesia amplius nocet, quam qui peruerse agens nomen uel ordinem sanctitatis et sacerdotis habet. Delinquentem namque hunc nullus redarguere presumit, et in exemplum culpa uehementer extenditur, quoniam pro reuerentia ordinis peccator honoratur. Episcopus itaque, qui talium crimina non corrigit, magis dicendus est canis inpudicus quam episcopus.

C. III. One who does not resist error consents to it.

Likewise Innocent. An error which is not resisted is approved, and truth, when it is by no means defended, is oppressed. For to neglect to trouble perverse men when you can is nothing other than to foster them.

Nor is he free from the scruple of hidden association who ceases to oppose a manifest crime.

> C. III. Qui non resistit errori, consentit.
>
> Item Innocentius. Error, cui non resistitur, approbatur, et ueritas, cum minime defensatur, obprimitur. Negligere quippe, cum possis perturbare peruersos, nichil est aliud quam fouere.
> Nec caret scrupulo societatis occultae, qui manifesto facinori desinit obuiare.

C. IV. It does not benefit one not to be polluted by his own error if he consents to another's.

Likewise Pope Pius, [epistle I to all Christ's faithful]. For what does it benefit him not to be polluted by his own error, if he furnishes consent to one who errs?

> C. IV. Non prodest suo errore non pollui, qui alieno consentit.
>
> Item Pius Papa. [epist. I. ad omnes Christi fideles] Quid enim prodest illi suo errore non pollui, qui consensum prestat erranti?

C. V. One who does not intervene consents.

Likewise Gregory. One who does not intervene to cut away the things that ought to be corrected appears to consent to one who errs. GRATIAN. But just as one ought not to flatter the vices of others, so neither ought one to delight in the praises of evil men. Hence Anacletus to all the faithful:

> C. V. Qui non occurrit, consentit.
> Item Gregorius. Consentire uidetur erranti, qui ad resecanda, que corrigi debent, non occurrit. Gratian. Sicut autem aliorum uitia palpare non debet, ita nec malorum laudibus delectari. Unde Anacletus cunctis fidelibus:

C. VI. Most wretched is the bishop who glories in the praises of evil men.

Nothing is more wretched than that pastor who glories in the praises of wolves. If he wishes to please them and chooses to be loved by them, great destruction will come from this upon the sheep. Therefore, no pastor can please both wolves and flocks of sheep. For a mind bound by earthly prisons loses the memory of labors. But just as diligence is found to be the mother of the arts in each one's work, so negligence is the stepmother of learning. Part II. GRATIAN. Although a priest ought to be immune both from his own crimes and from those of others, nevertheless, if he has conducted himself otherwise, the words of his preaching ought not for that reason to be contemned. For as Jerome says: just as lye flowing through damp ashes washes and is not washed, so good teaching through an evil teacher washes the souls of believers from the filth of sins.

> C. VI. Miserrimus est episcopus, qui malorum gloriatur laudibus.
> Nichil illo pastore miserius, qui luporum gloriatur laudibus. Quibus si placere uoluerit, atque ab his amari delegerit, erit hinc ouibus magna pernicies. Nullus igitur pastorum placere lupis et gregibus ouium potest. Perdit enim memoriam laborum mens terrenis obligata carceribus. Sicut autem artium in suo quoque opere inuenitur mater instantia, ita nouerca erudicionis est negligentia. II. Pars. Gratian. Quamquam sacerdotem tam a suis, quam ab alienis criminibus oporteat esse imunem, tamen si aliorsum sese habuerit, non ideo uerba suae predicationis debent contempni. Sicut enim Ieronimus ait: ut lixiuium per cinerem humidum fluens lauat, et non lauatur, ita bona doctrina per malum doctorem animas credentium lauat a sorde peccatorum.

Distinction LXXXIV

GRATIAN. Part I. A bishop also ought to be solicitous and vigilant concerning the defense of the poor, the relief of the oppressed, and the protection of monasteries. But if they neglect to do this, they are to be harshly corrected. Hence Gregory to Anthemius, Subdeacon of Campania, [book XI, epistle 29]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Sollicitum quoque ac uigilantem oportet esse episcopum circa defensionem pauperum, releuationem obpressorum, tuicionem monasteriorum. Quod si facere neglexerint, aspere sunt corripiendi. Unde Gregorius Antemio Subdiacono Campaniae: [lib. XI. epist. 29.]

C. I. A bishop who has been negligent concerning his office is to be corrected.

It has reached us that Paschasius, our brother and fellow bishop, is so idle and negligent in all things that in no respect is he recognized as a bishop, to such an extent that neither his church nor the monasteries, nor his sons or the oppressed poor, feel the zeal of his affection toward them; nor does he furnish any aid of defense to those supplicating him in matters in which it is just; and—what is still more grievous to say—he does not suffer in any way the counsels of wise men and those persuading what is right to be received, so that he might at least be able to learn from another what he is unable to attend to by himself. If this is so, know that you are not without fault, since you deferred rebuking and restraining him as is fitting. Therefore, we will that you ought, in the presence of other priests or certain noble men among his sons, to call him to account concerning this matter and exhort him. But if—which we do not believe—after this our exhortation he still attempts to be negligent in his customary manner, he is in every way to be sent to us, so that, placed here, he may be able to learn what and in what manner it befits a priest to do according to the fear of God.

C. I. Corripiatur episcopus, qui circa offitium suum negligens extiterit.

Peruenit ad nos, fratrem et coepiscopum nostrum Pascasium ita desidem et negligentem in cunctis existere, ut in nullo quia est episcopus agnoscatur, adeo ut neque ecclesia ipsius, neque monasteria, siue filii uel obpressi pauperes eius erga se dilectionis studium sentiant, nec aliquam supplicantibus sibi in quibus iustum est opem defensionis accommodet, et (quod adhuc dici est grauius) consilia sapientum et recta suadentium nulla patiatur ratione suscipere, ut quod per se nequit attendere ab altero saltim possit addiscere. Quod si ita est, non sine culpa tua esse cognoscas, qui eum obiurgare atque cohercere ut dignum est, distulisti. Volumus itaque, ut eum coram aliis sacerdotibus uel quibusdam de filiis suis nobilibus contestari pro hac re debeas et hortari. Si uero (quod non credimus) post hanc adhortationem nostram solito adhuc more negligens esse temptauerit, ad nos est modis omnibus transmittendus, ut hic positus discere possit, quid uel qualiter secundum Dei timorem agere conueniat sacerdotem.

C. II. On the same.

The same to the same, [in the same book, epistle 33]. It has been reported to us that the bishops of Campania are so negligent and unmindful of their honor that they display neither the care of paternal vigilance toward the churches or toward their sons, nor exercise solicitude for the monasteries, nor devote themselves to the protection of the oppressed or of the poor. And therefore by this authority we command you that, when they have been summoned to you, you strictly admonish them by our mandate, so that they may be vigilant in those things which it is fitting for them justly to do according to God, lest any complaint concerning them provoke us again. But if after these things you know any one of them to be negligent, send him to us without any excuse, so that he may be able to feel in himself, by regular strictness, how grave it is to be unwilling to be corrected from those things which are reprehensible and greatly deserving of censure. Part II. GRATIAN. But what is commanded to priests concerning the purity of chastity is also to be understood concerning any persons serving at the altar. Hence in the Second Council of Carthage, [c. 2], Bishop Aurelius is read to have said:

C. II. De eodem.

Idem ad eundem. [eod. lib. epist. 33.] Nunciatum est nobis, Campaniae episcopos ita negligentes existere, et inmemores honoris sui, ut neque erga ecclesias, neque erga filios paternae uigilantiae curam exhibeant, uel monasteriorum sollicitudinem gerant, seu in obpressorum siue pauperum se tuicionem inpendant. Ideoque hac tibi auctoritate precipimus, ut, eis ad te conuocatis, ex nostro illos mandato districte commoneas, quatinus ita in his, que eos iuste secundum Deum agere conuenit, uigilantes existant, ut nullum nos de eis denuo murmur exasperet. Si quem uero eorum post hec negligentem esse cognoueris, ad nos eum sine aliqua excusatione transmitte, ut quam sit graue nolle ab his, que reprehensibilia et ualde uituperanda sunt, corrigi, regulari in se ualeat districtione sentire. II. Pars. Gratian. Quod autem de munditia castitatis sacerdotibus inperatur, hoc etiam de quibuslibet altari deseruientibus intelligendum est. Unde in Cartaginensi Concilio II. [cap. 2.] Aurelius Episcopus dixisse legitur:

C. III. Those who serve the divine sacraments are to preserve continence in all things.

When in the previous council the rule of continence and chastity was treated, these three grades were bound by a certain written enactment of chastity through their consecrations; I say bishops, priests, and deacons: it pleased us that, as befits sacred prelates and priests of God, as well as Levites and those who serve the divine sacraments, they be continent in all things, whereby they may obtain without hindrance what they ask from the Lord, so that we too may guard what the apostles taught and antiquity itself preserved. It was said by all the bishops: It pleases all that bishops, priests, deacons, and those who handle the sacraments, as guardians of chastity, abstain even from their wives. It was said by all: It pleases us that chastity be guarded in all things and by all who serve the altar.

C. III. Qui sacramentis diuinis deseruiunt continentiam in omnibus seruent.

Cum in preterito concilio de continentiae et castitatis moderamine tractaretur, gradus isti tres conscriptione quadam castitatis per consecrationes adnexi sunt; episcopos inquam, presbiteros et diacones ita placuit, ut condecet sacros antistites ac Dei sacerdotes, nec non et Leuitas, uel qui sacramentis diuinis inseruiunt, continentes esse in omnibus, quo possint simpliciter quod a Domino postulant inpetrare, ut quod apostoli docuerunt et ipsa seruauit antiquitas nos quoque custodiamus. Ab uniuersis episcopis dictum est: Omnibus placet, ut episcopi, presbiteri, diaconi, uel qui sacramenta contrectant, pudicitiae custodes etiam ab uxoribus abstineant. Ab omnibus dictum est: Placet, ut in omnibus et ab omnibus pudicitia custodiatur, qui altario deseruiunt.

C. IV. On the same.

Likewise from the Fifth Council of Carthage, [c. 3]. When the incontinence of certain clerics, although with their own wives, was reported, it pleased the council that bishops, priests, and deacons, according to the prior statutes, abstain even from their wives; and unless they do this, they are to be removed from ecclesiastical office. The other clerics, however, are not to be compelled to this, but the custom of each church ought to be observed. Part III. GRATIAN. Likewise, what commands that a bishop be the husband of one wife ought also to be extended to the other ecclesiastical orders. Hence Bishop Siricius writes to Himerius, Bishop of Tarragona, [epistle I, c. 11]:

C. IV. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi V. [cap. 3.] Cum de quorumdam clericorum, quamuis erga uxores proprias, incontinentia referretur, placuit episcopos et presbiteros et diaconos secundum statuta priora etiam ab uxoribus continere: quod nisi fecerint, ab ecclesiastico remoueantur offitio; ceteros autem clericos ad hoc non cogi, sed secundum uniuscuiusque ecclesiae consuetudinem obseruari debere. III. Pars. Gratian. Similiter, quod monogamus episcopus esse iubetur, etiam ad reliquos ordines ecclesiasticos deriuari oportet. Unde Siricius Episcopus scribit Ymerio Tarraconensi Episcopo: [epist. I. c. 11.]

C. V. Let a cleric who takes a widow or a second wife be content with lay communion only.

Whichever cleric takes a widow or a second wife shall immediately be stripped of every privilege of ecclesiastical dignity, with lay communion alone conceded to him. He will then be able to possess it only if afterward he commits nothing for which he ought to lack it. Part IV. GRATIAN. Although the name of priests is taken from old age, nevertheless it indicates maturity of wisdom rather than grayness of body. Hence Anacletus, [to the Bishops of Italy, epistle II]:

C. V. Laica sit tantum communione contentus clericus, uiduam aut secundam ducens uxorem.

Quisquis clericus aut uiduam, aut secundam uxorem duxerit, omni ecclesiasticae dignitatis priuilegio mox denudetur, laica tantum sibi communione concessa. Quam ita demum poterit possidere, si nichil postea, propter quod hac carere debeat, admittat. IV. Pars. Gratian. Presbiterorum uero nomen quamquam a senectute sit sumptum, magis tamen maturitatem indicat sapientiae, quam caniciem corporis. Unde Anacletus: [ad Episcopos Italiae, epist. II.]

C. VI. Priests are called elders not so much by age as by wisdom.

Moreover, Moses is commanded to choose priests, that is, elders. Hence it is also said in Proverbs: "Gray hair is the glory of old men." But this gray hair designates wisdom, concerning which it is written: "The gray hair of men is prudence." And although we read that men lived nine hundred and more years from Adam down to Abraham, no other man was earlier called a priest, that is, an elder, except Abraham, who is shown to have lived far fewer years. Therefore they are called priests not because of decrepit old age but because of wisdom.

C. VI. Presbiteri seniores dicuntur, non tam etate, quam sapientia.

Porro Moysi precipitur, ut eligat presbiteros id est seniores. Unde et in Prouerbiis dicitur: "Gloria senum est canicies." Hec uero canicies sapientiam designat, de qua scriptum est: "Canicies hominum prudentia est." Cumque nongentis et amplius annis ab Adam usque ad Abraham uixisse homines legamus, nullus alius prius appellatus est presbiter, id est senior, nisi Abraham qui multo paucioribus uixisse annis conuincitur. Non ergo propter decrepitam senectutem, sed propter sapientiam presbiteri nominantur.

Distinction LXXXV

GRATIAN. Hospitality is so necessary to bishops that, if they are found to be strangers to it, they are rightly prohibited from being ordained. Hence Gregory writes to Bishop John, [book XII, epistle 6]:

GRATIANUS. Hospitalitas uero usque adeo episcopis necessaria est, ut, si ab ea inueniantur alieni, iure prohibeantur ordinari. Unde Gregorius scribit Iohanni Episcopo: [lib. XII. epist. 6.]

C. I. One who does not know hospitality is not to become a bishop.

We have learned that Florentinus, archdeacon of the church of Ancona, who had been elected to the episcopate, indeed has knowledge of sacred Scripture, but is now so broken by the old age of his years that he cannot rise to the office of governance; they also add that he is so tenacious that a friend never enters his house for charity. But Rusticus, a deacon of the same church, who similarly had been elected, is said indeed to be a vigilant man, but, as is asserted, he does not know the psalms. We know that Florentinus, a deacon of the church of Ravenna, who is recalled to have been elected by all, is solicitous, but we are entirely ignorant of what he is like inwardly. And therefore let your fraternity, together with our brother and fellow bishop Armenius, visitor of the aforesaid church of Ancona, hasten to go there and inquire diligently concerning the life and conduct of each, whether they are conscious of no crime that would prohibit them from approaching this office. It must likewise be inquired whether what was said concerning the aforesaid archdeacon—that a friend has never entered his house—is true, and whether he is such from necessity or from tenacity; or whether he is so old that he cannot rise to govern; or whether, touching the sacrosanct Gospels, as has been reported to us, he gave an oath that he would never approach the episcopate. But it must also be investigated how many psalms the deacon Rusticus does not know. As for Florentinus, the deacon of Ravenna, if there is no crime, as we have said, which stands in the way, it is necessary to treat with his bishop that he ought to grant him permission; yet not by our mandate or edict, lest he seem to grant him against his will.

C. I. Hospitalitatem nesciens non fiat episcopus.

Florentinum archidiaconum ecclesiae Anchonitanae, qui ad episcopatum electus fuerat, scripturae quidem sacrae scientiam habere, sed ita etatis senio iam confractum accepimus, ut ad regiminis offitium non possit assurgere; adicientes etiam, illum ita tenacem existere, ut in domo eius amicus ad karitatem numquam introeat. Rusticus autem diaconus eiusdem ecclesiae, qui similiter electus fuerat, uigilans quidem homo dicitur, sed, quantum asseritur, psalmos ignorat. Florentinum uero diaconum ecclesiae Rauennatis, qui electus ab omnibus memoratur, sollicitum esse nouimus, sed qualis sit interius omnino nescimus. Ideoque fraternitas tua una cum fratre nostro et coepiscopo nostro Armenio, suprascriptae ecclesiae Anchonitanae uisitatore, illuc festinet accedere, et diligenter de uita ac moribus singulorum requirere si nullo sint crimine conscii, quod eos ad hoc offitium uetet accedere. Pariter etiam requirendum est, si hoc, quod de prefato archidiacono dictum est, quia numquam amicus domum eius ingressus est, ita se ueritas habet, et utrum ex necessitate, an ex tenacia talis sit; aut si ita senex est, ut ad regendum non possit assurgere, uel si tactis sacrosanctis euangeliis (sicut nobis nunciatum est) iusiurandum prebuerit, numquam se ad episcopatum accedere. Sed et de Rustico diacono quantos psalmos minus tenet scrutandum est. Florentino autem diacono Rauennati, si nullum, sicut diximus, crimen est, quod obsistat, apud episcopum eius necesse est, agere ut ei debeat concessionem concedere; non tamen ex nostro mandato uel edicto, ne contra suam uoluntatem eum concedere uideatur.

Distinction LXXXVI

GRATIAN. Part I. A bishop ought to be a teacher, lest the faults of his inferiors be poured back upon him who has received the office of teaching, which he does not know how to execute or neglects to execute. Hence Bishop Leo writes to the Bishop of Aquileia, [epistle III and LXXXIV, or LXVI]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Doctorem autem episcopum oportet esse, ne inferiorum culpae in eum refundantur, qui docendi offitium accepit, quod exequi nescit uel negligit. Unde Leo Episcopus scribit Aquilegensi Episcopo: [epist. III. et LXXXIV. seu LXVI.]

C. I. The faults of inferiors are imputed to the negligence of rulers.

The faults of the inferior orders are to be referred to no persons more than to idle and negligent rulers, who often nurture much pestilence while they dissemble from applying a more severe medicine.

C. I. Negligentiae rectorum inputantur culpae inferiorum.

Inferiorum ordinum culpae ad nullos magis referendae sunt, quam ad desides negligentesque rectores, qui multam sepe nutriunt pestilentiam, dum austeriorem dissimulant adhibere medicinam.

C. II. Men are to be loved; sins are to be held in hatred.

Likewise Bishop Leo to Rusticus, Bishop of Narbonne, [epistle XC, or XCII, at the beginning]. Let sins, not men, be held in hatred; let the swollen with pride be corrected, and the weak tolerated; and what it is necessary to chastise more severely is not to be punished with the mind of one raging, but of one healing.

C. II. Homines sunt diligendi, peccata odio habenda.

Item Leo Episcopus Rustico Narbonensi Episcopo. [epist. XC. seu XCII. in princip.] Odio habeantur peccata, non homines; corripiantur tumidi, tolerentur infirmi; et quod seuerius castigare necesse est non seuientis plectatur animo, sed medentis.

C. III. One who neglects to amend what he can has the guilt of the doer.

Likewise John VIII. Without doubt, he who neglects to amend what he can correct has the guilt of the doer. For it is written: "Not only those who do them, but also those who consent," are judged to be participants. § 1. And he offers prosperous things to the Lord who drives adverse things from the afflicted. And to neglect to cast down the perverse when one can is nothing other than to foster them. Nor is he free from the scruple of hidden consent who ceases to oppose a manifest crime. And he proves that he hates vices who condemns those who err. Nor does he leave himself a place for straying who has not spared one who transgresses. And the first grade of innocence is to hate wicked things. And he opens wide an entrance to delinquents who joins consent with depravity. And it profits no one not to be punished for his own sin when he is to be punished for another's sin. Part II. GRATIAN. But if anyone exceeds the measure in correcting, let him ask pardon not from his subjects but from the Lord. Hence Augustine, On the Life of Clerics:

C. III. Qui negligit emendare quod ualet, facientis culpam habet.

Item Iohannes VIII. Facientis proculdubio culpam habet, qui quod potest corrigere negligit emendare. Scriptum quippe est: "Non solum qui faciunt, sed etiam qui consentiunt," participes iudicantur. §. 1. Et libat Domino prospera, qui ab afflictis pellit aduersa. Et negligere, cum possit deturbare peruersos, nichil est aliud quam fouere. Nec caret scrupulo consensionis occultae, qui manifesto facinori desinit obuiare. Et probat se odisse uitia, qui condempnat errantes. Nec relinquit sibi locum deuiandi, qui non pepercerit excedenti. Et primus innocentiae gradus est odisse nefanda. Et latum pandit delinquentibus aditum, qui iungit cum prauitate consensum. Et nichil prodest alicui non puniri proprio, qui puniendus est alieno peccato. II. Pars. Gratian. Si autem in corripiendo quisque modum excesserit, non a subditis, sed a Domino ueniam petat. Unde Augustinus de uita clericorum:

C. IV. One who exceeds the measure in correcting is not to ask pardon from his subjects.

When the necessity of discipline compels you to speak harsh words for restraining conduct, even if you yourselves perceive that you have exceeded the measure, it is not required of you that you ask pardon for yourselves from your subjects, lest, while humility is observed too greatly among those who ought to be subject, the authority of governing be broken. And yet pardon is to be sought from the Lord of all, who knows with what benevolence you love those whom perhaps you correct beyond what is just. Part III. GRATIAN. In the teaching of sacred Scripture, however, he ought to set authority before all else, not to make a display of skill in secular letters. For it is not the office of a bishop to expound grammar, lest the praises of Jupiter resound in the mouth of a pontiff.

Hence Gregory writes to Bishop Desiderius, [book IX, epistle 48]:

C. IV. Veniam a subditis non petat qui in corripiendo modum excedit.

Quando necessitas disciplinae moribus cohercendis dicere uos dura uerba conpellit, si etiam ipsi modum uos excessisse sentitis, non a uobis exigitur, ut uobis a subditis ueniam postuletis, ne apud eos, quos oportet esse subiectos, dum nimium seruatur humilitas, regendi frangatur auctoritas. Et tamen petenda est uenia ab omnium Domino, qui nouit eos, quos plus iusto forte corripitis, quanta beneuolentia diligatis. III. Pars. Gratian. In doctrina uero sacrae scripturae debet auctoritatem preferre, non secularium litterarum peritiam ostentare. Non enim est episcopalis offitii grammaticam exponere, ne laudes Iouis personent ore pontificis.

Unde Gregorius scribit Desiderio Episcopo: [lib. IX. epist. 48.]

C. V. A bishop ought to expound sacred Scripture, not grammar.

When many things had been reported to us concerning your studies, such gladness arose in our heart that we were quite unable to deny those things which your fraternity requests to be granted to it. But after these things it came to us—which we cannot recall without shame—that your fraternity expounds grammar to certain persons. We received this matter so grievously and rejected it so vehemently that we turned those things which had been said before into groaning and sorrow, because the praises of Christ do not fit in one mouth together with the praises of Jupiter. And consider how grave and wicked it is for bishops to sing what is not fitting even for a religious man. Part IV. GRATIAN. A priest also ought to be generous to those suffering need; otherwise he will bear the empty name of bishop. Hence Gregory writes, [book V, epistle 29], to Secundus, servant of God, among other things:

C. V. Sacram scripturam, non grammaticam debet episcopus exponere.

Cum multa nobis de uestris studiis fuissent nunciata, ita nostro cordi est nata leticia, ut negare ea, que sibi uestra fraternitas concedenda deposcit, minime ualeremus. Sed post hec peruenit ad nos, (quod sine uerecundia memorare non possumus) fraternitatem tuam grammaticam quibusdam exponere. Quam rem ita moleste suscepimus, ac sumus uehementius aspernati, ut ea, que prius dicta fuerant, in gemitum et tristiciam uerteremus, quia in uno se ore cum Iouis laudibus Christi laudes non capiunt. Et quam graue nefandumque sit episcopis canere, quod nec religioso conueniat, considera. IV. Pars. Gratian. Liberalem quoque necessitatem patientibus sacerdotem esse oportet; alias autem uacuum portabit nomen episcopi. Unde Gregorius scribit [lib. V. epist. 29.] Secundo seruo Dei inter cetera:

C. VI. Without generosity the name of bishop is borne in vain.

Stir our brother Bishop Marianus with whatever words you can, because I suspect that he has fallen asleep. Tell him, therefore, that with his place he is to change his mind. Let him not believe that reading and prayer alone suffice for him, so that in seclusion he strives to make nothing fruitful from his hand; rather, let him have an open hand, come to the aid of those suffering need, and reckon another's poverty as his own, because, if he does not have this, he holds the empty name of bishop. Part V. GRATIAN. But in generosity itself a measure of things and persons is to be applied: of things, so that not all things are bestowed upon one person, but certain things upon each, so that we may be able to profit more persons, according to that saying of the Prophet: "He dispersed, he gave to the poor"; of persons, so that first to the just, and then to sinners—to whom, nevertheless, we are prohibited from giving, not because they are men, but because they are sinners. Hence Augustine, On John, Part II:

C. VI. Sine liberalitate inane portatur nomen episcopi.

Fratrem nostrum Marianum episcopum uerbis, quibus uales, excita, quia eum obdormisse suspicor. Dic ergo illi, ut cum loco mutet et mentem. Non sibi credat solam lectionem sufficere et orationem, ut remotus nichil studeat de manu fructificare: sed largam manum habeat, necessitatem patientibus concurrat, alienam inopiam suam credat, quia, si hoc non habet, uacuum episcopi nomen tenet. V. Pars.

Gratian. In ipsa autem liberalitate modus adhibendus est rerum et personarum: rerum, ut non omnia uni, sed singulis quedam prestentur, ut pluribus prodesse possimus, iuxta illud prophetae: "Dispersit, dedit pauperibus;" personarum, ut primum iustis, deinde peccatoribus: quibus tamen dare prohibemur, non quia homines sunt, sed quia peccatores. Unde Augustinus supra Iohannem parte II.:

C. VII. It is a monstrous sin to give one's property to actors.

To give one's property to actors is a monstrous vice, not a virtue. And you know how frequent among such persons is fame accompanied by praise, because "the sinner is praised in the desires of his soul, and he who does unjust things is blessed."

C. VII. Inmane peccatum est res suas istrionibus donare.

Donare res suas istrionibus uitium est inmane, non uirtus. Et scitis de talibus, quam sit frequens fama cum laude, quia, "laudatur peccator in desideriis animae suae, et qui iniqua gerit benedicitur."

C. VIII. Those who give anything to hunters sin gravely.

The same, on Psalm CII, [at the verse, "Who works mercies"]. Why do those who give to hunters give? Let them tell me: why do they give to a hunter? They love this in him, wherein he is most wicked; they feed this in him and clothe this in him—wickedness itself, made public by spectacles before all. Why do those who give to actors and those who give to prostitutes give? Do they not also give to human beings? Yet there they regard not the nature that is God's work, but the wickedness that is man's work.

C. VIII. Grauiter delinquunt qui uenatoribus aliquid donant.

Idem in Psalmo CII. [ad uers. Faciens misericordias.] Qui uenatoribus donant, quare donant? dicant mihi, quare dant uenatori? Hoc in illo amant, in quo nequissimus est hoc in illo pascunt, hoc in illo uestiunt, ipsam nequitiam publicam spectaculis omnium. Qui donant istrionibus qui donant meretricibus, quare donant? numquid non et ipsa hominibus donant: Non tamen naturam ibi attendunt operis Dei, sed nequitiam operis humani.

[C. IX.]

Likewise. One who gives to a hunter gives not to a man but to a most wicked art. For if he were only a man and were not a hunter, you would not give to him: in him you honor vice, not nature.

[C. IX.]

Item. Qui uenatori, donat, non homini donat, sed arti nequissimae. Nam si homo tantum esset, et uenator non esset, non ei donares: honoras in eo uitium, non naturam.

[C. X.]

The same, on Psalm CXLVII. Men see hunters and are delighted: woe to the wretched, if they do not correct themselves. For those who see a hunter and are delighted will see the Savior and be grieved.

[C. X.]

Idem in Psalmo CXLVII. Vident homines uenatores, et delectantur: ue miseris, si non se correxerint. Qui enim uident uenatorem et delectantur, uidebunt Saluatorem et contristabuntur.

[C. XI.]

Likewise Jerome, on Psalm XC, [at the verse, "I will hope in the Lord"]. Esau was a hunter because he was a sinner. And we do not find at all in the holy Scriptures any holy hunter; we find holy fishermen.

> [C. XI.]
>
> Item Ieronimus in Psalmo XC. [ad uers. Sperabo in Domino] Esau uenator erat, quoniam peccator erat. Et penitus non inuenimus in scripturis sanctis sanctum aliquem uenatorem: piscatores inuenimus sanctos.

[C. XII.]

Likewise Ambrose, in a homily, [XXXIII, On Lent]. What does it profit to fast in one's entrails and to luxuriate in hunts? To abstain from foods, but to wander in sins?

> [C. XII.]
>
> Item Ambrosius in omelia. [XXXIII. de Quadragesima] Quid prodest ieiunare uisceribus, et luxuriari uenatibus? abstinere a cibis, errare peccatis?

[C. XIII.]

Likewise. Do you think, brothers, that he fasts who at first dawn does not keep vigil at the church, does not seek out the holy places of the blessed martyrs, but rises, gathers his servants, arranges nets, brings forth dogs, and traverses glades and forests? He drags his servants with him, I say, who perhaps are hastening rather to church, and by his pleasures he heaps up the sins of others, not knowing that he will be guilty both for his own transgression and for the destruction of his servants.

> [C. XIII.]
> Item. An putatis illum ieiunare, fratres, qui primo diluculo non ad ecclesiam uigilat non beatorum martirum sancta loca perquirit, sed surgens congregat seruulos, disponit retia, canes producit, saltus siluasque perlustrat? Seruulos, inquam, secum pertrahit, fortasse magis ad ecclesiam festinantes, et uoluptatibus suis peccata accumulat aliena, nesciens reum se futurum tam de suo delicto, quam de perdicione seruorum.

C. XIV. What things are to be observed in generosity.

Likewise Ambrose, in the book On Duties. It is not enough to will well, but also to do well. Nor, again, is it enough to do well unless it proceeds from a good source, that is, from a good will. Likewise: § 1. Perfect generosity is commended by faith, cause, place, and time, so that first you act toward the household of faith. It is a great fault if, with your knowledge, a believer is in need; if you know him to be without means, to endure hunger, to suffer distress—especially one who is ashamed to be in need—if he has fallen into a case involving either the captivity of his own people or calumny, and you do not help; if he is in prison and is tortured by pains and punishments and, being just, on account of some debt—for although mercy is owed to all, more is owed to the just; if in the time of his affliction he obtains nothing from you; if, in the time of danger when he is being dragged to death, your money has more value with you than the life of one about to die: it is no light sin.

> C. XIV. Que sint in liberalitate seruanda.

> Item Ambrosius in libro de offitiis. Non satis est bene uelle, sed etiam bene facere. Nec satis est iterum bene facere, nisi id ex bono fonte, hoc est ex bona uoluntate proficiscatur. Item: §. 1. Perfecta liberalitas fide, causa, loco, tempore commendatur, ut primum opereris circa domesticos fidei. Grandis culpa, si sciente te fidelis egeat, si scias eum sine sumptu esse, famem tollerare, erumpnam perpeti, qui presertim egere erubescit, si in causam ceciderit aut captiuitatis suorum, aut calumpniae, et non adiuues, si sit in carcere et penis et suppliciis et propter debitum aliquod iustus excrucietur, (nam etsi omnibus debetur misericordia, iusto amplius), si tempore suae afflictionis nichil a te inpetret, si tempore periculi, quo rapitur ad mortem, plus apud te pecunia tua ualeat quam uita morituri, non est leue peccatum.

[C. XV.]

Likewise. The Lord does not will resources to be poured out all at once, but to be dispensed—unless perhaps as Elisha, who killed his oxen and fed the poor from what he had, so that he might be held by no domestic care, but, all things having been left behind, might give himself to prophetic instruction.

> [C. XV.]
>
> Item. Dominus non uult simul effundi opes, sed dispensari, nisi forte, ut Helyseus, qui boues suos occidit, et pauit pauperes ex eo, quod habuit, ut nulla cura teneretur domestica, sed relictis omnibus in disciplinam se propheticam daret.

[C. XVI.]

Likewise. That generosity is also to be approved whereby you do not despise those near to you by kinship, if you know them to be in need. For it is better that you yourself come to the aid of your own, who are ashamed to request expense from others or to ask anyone for relief of their need. Yet they ought not to wish to become richer from that which you are able to confer upon the needy; for nature furnishes a cause, not favor. For you did not dedicate yourself to God for this purpose, that you make your own people rich, but that you acquire eternal life for yourself by the fruit of good work and redeem your sins by the price of compassion. Do they think that they ask little? They seek your price; they strive to take away the fruit of your life, and they accuse you because you have not made them rich, when they wish to defraud you of the reward of eternal life.

> [C. XVI].
> Item. Est etiam illa probanda liberalitas, ut proximos seminis tui ne despicias, si egere cognoscas. Melius enim est, ut ipse subuenias tuis, quibus pudor est ab aliis sumptum deposcere, aut alicui postulare subsidium necessitatis; non tamen illi ditiores fieri uelint, ex eo quod tu potes conferre inopibus: causam enim natura prestat, non gratia. Neque enim propterea te Deo dicasti, ut tuos diuites facias, sed ut tibi uitam perpetuam fructu boni operis adquiras, et precio miserationis peccata tua redimas. Putant parum se poscere? precium querunt tuum, uitae tuae adimere contendunt fructum, et accusant, quod eos diuites non feceris, cum te uelint illi eternae uitae fraudare mercede?

[C. XVII.]

Likewise. Age and weakness must also be considered in giving, and sometimes modesty as well, which reveals freeborn birth, so that you give more to the aged, who can no longer seek a livelihood for themselves. Weakness of body is likewise to be assisted more readily; so too if anyone has fallen from riches into want, especially without fault of his own, but has lost what he had either through robberies, proscription, or calumnies.

> [C. XVII.]
>
> Item. Consideranda est etiam in largiendo etas atque debilitas, nonnumquam etiam uerecundia, que ingenuos prodit natales, ut senibus plus largiaris, qui sibi iam uictum non queunt querere. Similiter et debilitas corporis est promptius adiuuanda; tamen si quis ex diuitiis cecidit in egestatem, et maxime, sine uitio suo, sed aut latrociniis, aut proscriptione, aut calumpniis que habebat amisit.

[C. XVIII.]

Likewise. It is also beautiful generosity to keep measure even in the gift to a poor person, so that you may abound for more persons, and not flow beyond measure for the sake of procuring favor. For whatever is brought forth from a pure and sincere affection is becoming: not to undertake superfluous buildings, nor to omit necessary ones. And this is especially fitting for priests: to adorn the temple of God with fitting honor, so that the hall of the Lord may shine also in its worship; to make expenditures of mercy frequent; to bestow upon strangers as much as is fitting—not superfluous things but suitable ones. Likewise: § 1. Let us therefore suffer together with the calamities of others; let us assist the necessities of others as much as we can, and sometimes more than we can. For it is better to furnish grounds for mercy and suffer ill will than to put forward inclemency. We ourselves once incurred ill will because we broke the mystic vessels in order to redeem captives.

> [C. XVIII.]
> Item. Pulcra etiam liberalitas est, in ipso quoque pauperis dato mensuram tenere, ut habundes pluribus, non conciliandi fauoris gratia ultra modum fluere. Quicquid enim ex affectu puro et sincero promitur, hoc est decorum: non superfluas edificationes aggredi, nec pretermittere necessarias. Et maxime sacerdotibus hoc conuenit, ornare Dei templum honore congruo, ut etiam cultu aula Domini resplendeat, inpensas misericordiae frequentare, quantum oporteat largiri peregrinis, non superfluas, sed conpetentes. Item: §. 1. Conpatiamur itaque alienis calamitatibus, necessitates aliorum quantum possumus iuuemus, et plus interdum quam possumus. Melius est enim causas prestare pro misericordia et inuidiam perpeti, quam pretendere inclementiam; nos aliquando in inuidiam incidimus, quod confregimus uasa mistica, ut captiuos redimeremus.

[C. XIX.]

Likewise, on Luke. To each class of men Saint John the Baptist also gave a fitting response, one to all in this manner: to publicans, that they exact nothing beyond what was prescribed; to soldiers, that they commit no calumny and seek no plunder—teaching that stipends were established for military service for this reason, lest, while expenses are sought, the robber range abroad. But these and the other precepts of duties are proper to individuals; the practice of mercy is common. Therefore the precept is common to all duties, necessary to all ages, and to be rendered by all. Neither publican nor soldier is excepted, neither countryman nor townsman, rich nor poor; all in common are admonished to confer upon one who does not have. For mercy is the fullness of virtues, and therefore the form of perfect virtue has been set forth for all, that they not spare their garments and food. Nevertheless, in mercy itself a measure is to be observed according to the possibility of the human condition, so that each person does not take everything away from himself but shares what he has with the poor person.

[C. XIX.]

Item super Lucam. Singulis quoque generibus hominum conueniens tribuit S. Baptista responsum unum omnibus ita: publicanis, ne ultra prescriptum exigant, militibus, ne calumpniam faciant, predam requirant; docens idcirco stipendia constituta miliciae, ne, dum sumptus queritur, predo grassetur. Sed hec et alia offitiorum precepta propria sunt singulorum, misericordia communis est usus. Ideo commune preceptum omnibus offitiis, omnibus etatibus necessaria, et ab omnibus deferenda. Non publicanus, non miles excipitur, non agricola, uel urbanus, diues et pauper, omnes in commune admonentur, ut conferant non habenti. Misericordia enim plenitudo uirtutum est, et ideo omnibus est proposita forma perfectae uirtutis, ne uestimentis alimentisque suis parcant. Misericordiae tamen ipsius pro possibilitate conditionis humanae mensura seruetur, ut non sibi unusquisque totum eripiat, sed quod habet cum paupere partiatur.

[C. XX.]

The same. Moreover, it is God's tradition that you feed your parents first. For if, according to the divine oracle, an insult to a parent is expiated by death, how much more hunger, which is much graver? In this place the Lord checks insolent boasting.

[C. XX.]

Idem. Ceterum Dei traditio est, ut prius pascas parentes. Nam si iuxta diuinum oraculum contumelia parentis morte luitur, quanto magis fames, que multo grauior est? Quo loco insolentem Dominus infrenat iactantiam.

[C. XXI.]

The same, in the book On Duties. Feed one dying of hunger. For whoever is able to preserve a man by feeding him, if you have not fed him, you have killed him.

[C. XXI.]

Idem in libro de offitiis. Pasce fame morientem. Quisquis enim pascendo hominem seruare poteris, si non paueris, occidisti.

[C. XXII.]

Likewise Jerome. One who does not have clemency and is not clothed with the inward parts of mercy and tears, although he be spiritual, has not fulfilled the law of Christ. Part VI. GRATIAN. Likewise, a bishop also ought not to be a striker, that is, one quick to vengeance. Hence Gregory writes to John, Bishop of the Corinthians, [book XI, epistle 49]:

[C. XXII.]

Item Ieronimus. Qui clementiam non habet, nec indutus est uiscera misericordiae et lacrimarum, quamuis spiritalis sit, non adinpleuit legem Christi. VI. Pars. Gratian. Similiter etiam oportet episcopum non esse percussorem, id est ad uindictam facilem. Unde Gregorius scribit Iohanni Episcopo Corintiorum: [libro XI., epist. 49.]

C. XXIII. A bishop ought not to be quick to vengeance.

But if anything concerning any cleric comes to your ears that could justly offend you, do not readily believe it, nor let an unknown matter inflame you to vengeance; rather, in the presence of the elders of your church, the truth is to be diligently investigated, and then, if the character of the matter demands it, let canonical strictness strike the fault of the delinquent.

> C. XXIII. Ad uindictam facilis episcopus esse non debet.
> Si quid uero de quocumque clerico ad aures tuas peruenerit, quod te iuste possit offendere, facile non credas, nec ad uindictam te res accendat incognita; sed presentibus ecclesiae tuae senioribus diligenter ueritas est perscrutanda et tunc, si qualitas rei poposcerit, canonica districtio culpam feriat delinquentis.

C. XXIV. Concerning a certain bishop who, before the solemnities of the masses on the Lord's day, went to plough up someone's harvest.

The same to Bishop Januarius, [book VII, indiction 2, epistle 1]. Such wickedness concerning your old age has come to my ears that, unless we took account of it humanely, we would strike it with a curse now fixed. For it was told to me that on the Lord's day, before celebrating the solemnities of the masses, you went to plough up the harvest of the bearer of the present letter, and after ploughing it up you celebrated the solemnities of the masses; and after the solemnities of the masses you also did not in the least fear to uproot the boundary markers of his possession. All who hear know what penalty ought to follow this deed. We had doubts concerning so great a perversity, but our son Abbot Cyriacus, when questioned by us, declared that he had learned it to be so. And because we still spare your gray hairs, we exhort you: come to your senses at last, wretched old man, and restrain yourself from such levity of conduct and perversity of works. And the nearer you are brought to death, the more solicitous and fearful you ought to be. Indeed, a sentence of penalty ought to have been hurled at you; but because we know your simplicity together with your old age, for the present we are silent. Those, however, by whose counsel you did this, we have decreed to be excommunicated for two months, in such a way that, if any human contingency befalls them within the space of two months, they are to be deprived of the blessing of the viaticum. Henceforth, however, be cautious of their counsels. Part VII. GRATIAN. Or he is prohibited from being a striker, so that he not, namely, strike anyone with his own hands.

Hence it reads in the Council of Agde:

> C. XXIV. De quodam episcopo, qui ante missarum solempnia, die dominico ad exarandam messem cuiusdam profectus est.
> Idem Ianuario Episcopo. [lib. VII. Indict. 2. epist. 1.] Tanta nequitia ad aures meas de tua senectute peruenit, ut eam, nisi humanitus pensaremus, fixa iam maledictione feriremus. Dictum quippe est mihi, quod dominicorum die, priusquam missarum solempnia celebrare, ad exarandam messem latoris presentium perrexisti, et post exarationem eius missarum solempnia celebrasti; post missarum solempnia etiam terminos possessionis illius eradicare minime timuisti. Quod factum que pena debeat sequi, omnes, qui audiunt, sciunt. Dubii autem de tanta peruersitate fueramus, sed filius noster Cyriacus abbas a nobis requisitus, ita se cognouisse perhibuit. Et quia adhuc canis tuis parcimus, hortamur, aliquando resipisce miser senex, atque a tanta leuitate morum et operum peruersitate compescere. Et quanto morti uicinior efficeris, tanto sollicitior atque timidior esse debes. Et quidem penae sententia in te fuerat iaculanda; sed quia simplicitatem tuam cum senectute cognouimus, interim tacemus. Eos uero, quorum consilio hoc egisti, in duobus mensibus excommunicatos esse decreuimus: ita ut, si quid eis intra duorum mensium spatium humanitus euenerit, benedictione uiatici priuentur. Deinceps autem ab eorum consiliis cautus existe. VII. Pars. Gratian. Vel percussor esse prohibetur, ne uidelicet propriis manibus aliquem cedat.

Unde in Agatensi Concilio legitur:

C. XXV. A bishop is not permitted to strike anyone with his own hands.

A bishop is not permitted to strike anyone with his own hands. For this ought to be foreign to a priest. Part VIII. GRATIAN. A bishop is also prohibited from being desirous of shameful gain, lest by any dishonorable business he seek a livelihood or other necessities for himself. This ought to be understood generally concerning all persons bound to divine worship, that is, clerics and monks. Hence it reads in the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 3]:

C. XXV. Non liceat episcopo propriis manibus aliquem cedere.

Non liceat episcopo manibus suis aliquem cedere. Hoc enim alienum a sacerdote esse debet. VIII. Pars. Gratian. Prohibetur etiam episcopis turpis lucri esse cupidus, ne aliquo inhonesto negotio uictum uel cetera necessaria sibi querat. Quod generaliter de omnibus diuino cultui mancipatis, id est clericis et monachis, intelligi oportet. Unde in Calcedonensi Concilio [cap. 3.] legitur:

C. XXVI. Those numbered among the clergy are not to serve shameful gains.

It has come to the holy synod that, among those numbered among the clergy, certain persons, for the sake of shameful gain, undertake leases of the possessions of others and the causes of secular persons, and through idleness separate themselves from sacred offices, but run to the houses of secular persons and undertake the administration of their property for the sake of avarice. Therefore the holy and great synod has decreed that henceforth none of these—that is, bishop, cleric, or monk—may lease possessions or become involved in secular administrations, except perhaps those who by the laws are drawn into inexcusable guardianships or curatorships of minors, or one to whom the bishop of the city itself has committed the government of ecclesiastical property, and of orphans and widows who are without defense, or of those persons who especially need ecclesiastical aid, for the fear of God. But if anyone transgresses these precepts, let him be subject to ecclesiastical correction.

C. XXVI. Qui connumerantur in clero, turpibus non deseruiant lucris.

Peruenit ad sanctam sinodum, quia de his qui in clero connumerantur, quidam propter turpis lucri gratiam aliorum possessionum conductiones, et causas secularium suscipiunt, et a sacris offitiis se per desidiam separant, ad domos autem secularium concurrunt, et substantiarum eorum gubernationes auaritiae causa suscipiunt. Decreuit igitur sancta et magna sinodus, neminem horum deinceps, hoc est episcopum, siue clericum, aut monachum, conducere possessiones, aut misceri secularibus procurationibus posse, nisi forte, qui legibus ad minorum etatum tutelas siue curationes inexcusabiles attrahuntur, aut cui ipsius ciuitatis episcopus ecclesiasticarum rerum commiserit gubernacula, et orphanorum atque uiduarum, que indefensae sunt, aut earum personarum, que maxime ecclesiastico indigent amminiculo propter timorem Dei. Si quis uero transgressus fuerit hec precepta, ecclesiasticae correctioni subiaceat.

Distinction LXXXVII

GRATIAN. Part I. Bishops ought to be present for widows and orphans who implore the aid of the Church, and they ought not to deny them the patronage of protection against the violence of wicked men. Hence Gelasius to Bishops Gerontius and Peter:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Viduis autem et orphanis ecclesiae presidium inplorantibus episcopi debent adesse, et contra inproborum uiolentias protectionis patrocinium eis negare non debent. Unde Gelasius Gerontio et Petro Episcopis:

C. I. Bishops ought to be present for those imploring the patronage of the Church.

Although we ought not, insofar as we are able, to deny ourselves to any who hope in us, nevertheless we consider that the causes of widows are to be prosecuted all the more and more earnestly, since the divine declaration manifests that they are to be protected by us, or by all.

> C. I. Inplorantibus patrocinium ecclesiae episcopi debent adesse.
> Licet omnibus de nobis sperantibus non debeamus in quantum possumus nos negare, plus tamen uiduarum causas et inpensius ducimus exequendas, quas tueri a nobis uel ab omnibus diuina manifestat assertio.

C. II. On the same.

The same to Bishop Anastasius. It befits a pontiff, when entreated, to assist those who are deprived of the aid of their own defense and who, because of the weakness of age, cannot benefit themselves by their own actions, because divinity also commanded that protection be bestowed upon wards. And therefore you will, by our delegation, furnish aid to Maximus and Januarius of the clerical office, who assert that they have been deprived of the assistance of parents or relatives, so that, protected against the wicked acts of their adversaries by the exertion of your execution, they may not experience harmful contrivances.

> C. II. De eodem.
> Idem Anastasio Episcopo. Desolatis propriae defensionis auxilio, et qui suis actibus prodesse pro etatis infirmitate non possunt exoratum decet Pontificem subuenire, quia pupillis tuicionem etiam diuinitas iussit inpendi. Et ideo Maximo et Ianuario clericalis offitii (qui se solatiis parentum uel propinquorum asserunt destitutos) auxilium ex nostra delegatione prestabis, ut aduersus inprobitates aduersariorum suorum protecti tuae executionis annisu noxia commenta non sentiant.

C. III. On the same.

The same to Bishops Leontius and Peter. Whoever hopes that remedies can be conferred upon him in his affairs by the intercession of our name, it befits us to furnish them with a ready spirit.

> C. III. De eodem.
>
> Idem Leontio et Petro Episcopis. Quisquis in negociis suis nostri nominis intercessione sperat sibi remedia posse conferri, prona nos conuenit animositate prestare.

C. IV. On the same.

The same to Bishop Honorius. Mindful of divine recompense, do not doubt that it pertains to the pontifical conscience not to deny pious solicitude for the advantage of the needy.

> C. IV. De eodem.
> Idem Honorio Episcopo. Diuinae retributionis memor ad pontificalem conscientiam non ambigas pertinere, egentium commodis piam sollicitudinem non negare.

C. V. Let the Church protect those whom it has received under its defense.

The same to Bishop Fortunatus. We judge it altogether irreligious and execrable if anyone, even a stranger, has not brought up with all fidelity and with the entire sanctity of his mind those received under his protection. And since the deacon Olympius of your affection is reported to be the maternal uncle of Felix and Olympius, and to have received them as little children to be nourished in the place of a guardian, we judge it to be beyond robbery that he has left them bereft of the small goods of their parents, as they assert, retaining some things and selling others contrary to laws and rights.

> C. V. Tueatur ecclesia, quos in sui defensione suscepit.
> Idem Fortunato Episcopo. Irreligiosum prorsus et execrabile iudicamus, si quisquam uel extraneus in sua tuicione susceptos non omni fide et tota animi sui educauerit sanctitate. Ac cum Olimpius diaconus dilectionis tuae Felicis atque Olimpii suggeratur auunculus, eosque paruulos tutelae uice susceperit nutriendos, ultra latrocinium esse iudicamus, quod eos bonusculis parentum (sicut asserunt) reliquit extorres, alia retinendo, alia contra leges et iura uendendo.

C. VI. It is not permitted to drag out those who flee to a church.

Likewise from the Council of Orange, [I, c. 5 and following]. Those who flee to a church ought not to be surrendered, but are to be defended by reverence for the holy place and by intercession. § 1. But if anyone believes that the slaves of clerics are to be seized in return for his own slaves who flee to a church, let him be struck with the strictest condemnation throughout all the churches. § 2. If anyone attempts to recall into servitude or service or the condition of a tenant farmer those manumitted in the church and commended to the Church by testament, let him be restrained by ecclesiastical punishment.

> C. VI. Confugientes ad ecclesiam extrahere non licet.
>
> Item ex Concilio Aurasico. [I. c. 5. et seqq.] Eos, qui ad ecclesiam confugerint, tradi non oportet, sed loci sancti reuerentia et intercessione defendi. §. 1. Si quis autem mancipia clericorum pro suis mancipiis ad ecclesiam confugientibus crediderit occupanda, per omnes ecclesias districtissima dampnatione feriatur. §. 2. In ecclesia quoque manumissos, et per testamentum ecclesiae commendatos si quis in seruitutem uel obsequium, uel ad colonariam conditionem reuocare temptauerit, animaduersione ecclesiastica coherceatur.

C. VII. Let the Church protect freedmen in their freedom.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 29]. Part II. Let the Church, if necessity demands, protect freedmen lawfully made free by their lords; but if anyone, before a hearing, presumes either to seize them or to despoil them, let him be repelled from the Church.

C. VII. In libertate ecclesia tueatur libertos.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 29.] II. Pars. Libertos legitime a dominis suis factos, ecclesia, si necessitas exegerit, tueatur; quod si quis ante audientiam aut peruadere, aut expoliare presumpserit, ab ecclesia repellatur.

C. VIII. Freedmen who are recalled into servitude are to be defended by priests.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 72]. Freedmen who have been manumitted by any persons and are commended to the patronage of the Church, as the rules of the ancient Fathers established, are to be protected by priestly defense from the insolence of anyone, whether in their status of freedom or in the peculium which they are known to have.

C. VIII. A sacerdotibus defendantur liberti, qui in seruitutem reuocantur.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano IV. [c. 72.] Liberti, qui a quibuscumque manumissi sunt, atque ecclesiae patrocinio commendati existunt, sicut regulae antiquorum patrum constituerunt, sacerdotali defensione a cuiuslibet insolentia protegantur, siue in statu libertatis eorum, seu in peculio, quod habere noscuntur.

C. IX. Let the Church defend exposed children if anyone arises as their claimant.

Likewise from the Council of Toledo. Part III. If an exposed child is taken up before a church by the compassion of anyone, let a written attestation be posted, so that if the one taken up has not been sought and recognized within ten days, the one who took him up may possess him securely. Certainly, one who arises as a claimant after the aforesaid time will be condemned by ecclesiastical strictness as a murderer, as the authority of the Fathers sanctioned.

C. IX. Expositos defendat ecclesia, si quis eorum calumpniator extiterit.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano. III. Pars. Si expositus ante ecclesiam cuiuscumque sit miseratione collectus, contestationis ponatur epistola, ut si is, qui collectus est, intra decem dies quesitus agnitusque non fuerit, securus habeat qui collegit. Sane, qui post predictum tempus calumpniator extiterit, ut homicida ecclesiastica districtione dampnabitur, sicut Patrum sanxit auctoritas.

Distinction LXXXVIII

GRATIAN. Part I. Clerics, therefore, are prohibited from undertaking the affairs of cupidity, not from bestowing pious care upon widows and orphans. Hence Pope Miltiades:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Prohibentur ergo clerici cupiditatis negocia suscipere, non pietatis curam uiduis et orphanis inpendere. Unde Melciades papa:

C. I. On the same.

The holy synod has decreed that henceforth no cleric is either to lease possessions or to involve himself in secular affairs, except on account of the care of wards, orphans, or widows, or if perhaps the bishop of the city commands him to have solicitude for ecclesiastical property. Here it is evident that secular affairs are one thing, ecclesiastical affairs another. Was Moses not in the world when he repeatedly entered the tabernacle and went out—he who within was carried away in contemplation, and without was pressed by the affairs of the weak? Thus Jacob too saw angels ascending and descending, because the rulers of the Church not only ascend by contemplation but also descend by compassion to her members below. And while priests imitate the deeds of these men, they both guard themselves and bear the burdens of their subjects.

C. I. De eodem.

Decreuit sancta sinodus, nullum deinceps clericum aut possessiones conducere, aut negociis secularibus se miscere, nisi propter curam aut pupillorum aut orphanorum aut uiduarum, aut si forte episcopus ciuitatis ecclesiasticarum rerum sollicitudinem eum habere precipiat. Ubi patet, quia alia sunt negocia secularia, alia ecclesiastica. Nonne Moyses in seculo erat, cum crebro intraret tabernaculum, et exiret, qui intus contemplatione rapiebatur, foris infirmantium negociis urgebatur? Sic et Iacob ascendentes et descendentes angelos uidit, quia rectores ecclesiae non solum contemplando ascendunt, sed deorsum quoque ad membra illius miserando descendunt. Et dum sacerdotes horum facta imitantur, et se custodiunt, et subditorum onera portant.

C. II. On the same.

Likewise Gelasius, [Pope, to the Bishops throughout Lucania, c. 17]. It follows that we also considered that those things which a report recently sent to us from the districts of Picenum announced were not to be passed over, namely that very many clerics apply themselves to dishonest trading and shameful gains, taking no heed through any sense of shame of the Gospel reading in which the Lord himself is declared to have expelled the merchants from the temple after beating them, nor recalling the words of the Apostle in which he says: "No one serving as a soldier of God entangles himself in secular affairs"; and dissembling with a deaf ear the Psalmist David as he sings: "Because I have not known business dealings, I will enter into the powers of the Lord." Accordingly, let persons of this sort know either that they must henceforth abstain from unworthy gains and cease from every contrivance and cupidity of any trading, or, in whatever grade they have been placed, that they are immediately to be compelled to abstain from clerical offices, because the house of God both ought to be and to be called a house of prayer, lest through the offices of trading it be instead a den of robbers.

C. II. De eodem.

Item Gelasius. [Papa ad Episcopos per Lucaniam c. 17.] Consequens est, ut illa quoque, que de Piceni partibus nuper ad nos missa relatio nuntiauit, non pretereunda putaremus, id est, plurimos clericorum negotiationibus inhonestis et turpibus lucris inminere, nullo pudore censentes euangelicam lectionem, qua ipse Dominus negotiatores ex templo uerberatos asseritur expulisse, nec Apostoli uerba recolentes, quibus ait: "Nemo militans Deo implicat se negociis secularibus;" psalmistam quoque Dauid surda dissimulantes aure, cantantem: "Quoniam non cognoui negotiationes, introibo in potentias Domini." Proinde huiusmodi aut ab indignis posthac questibus nouerint abstinendum, et ab omni cuiuslibet negotiationis ingenio cupiditateque cessandum, aut, in quocumque gradu sint positi, mox a clericalibus offitiis cogantur abstinere, quoniam domus Dei domus orationis et esse debet et dici, ne per offitia negotiationis potius sit latronum spelunca.

C. III. Those constituted in sacred orders ought not to assume secular cares.

Likewise from the [Seventh] Canon of the Apostles. Let a bishop, priest, or deacon by no means assume secular cares; otherwise, let them be deposed.

C. III. In sacris ordinibus constituti, seculares curas assumere non debent.

Item ex [Septimo] canone Apostolorum. Episcopus, aut sacerdos, aut diaconus nequaquam seculares curas assumant; sin aliter, deiciantur.

C. IV. A bishop ought not to be occupied with secular causes.

Likewise Gregory to Romanus the Defender, [book VIII, epistle 11]. It has been brought to us that our most reverend brother Bishop Basil is occupied in secular causes just like one of the laity and unprofitably attends the law courts. Since this matter both renders him contemptible and annihilates priestly reverence, as soon as your experience receives this precept, compel him by strict execution to return, so that, with you pressing him there, he may not be permitted under any excuse to remain for five days, lest, if you permit him in any manner to remain there longer, you begin to be gravely culpable before us together with him.

C. IV. Episcopus secularibus causis non debet occupari.

Item Gregorius Romano Defensori. [l. VIII. ep. 11.] Perlatum est ad nos, reuerentissimum fratrem nostrum Basilium episcopum uelud unum de laicis in causis secularibus occupari, et pretoriis inutiliter obseruare. Que res quoniam et ipsum uilem reddit, et reuerentiam sacerdotalem adnichilat, statim ut experientia tua hoc preceptum susceperit, ad reuertendum eum districta executione conpellat, quatinus ei illic te insistente quinque diebus sub qualibet excusatione inmorari non liceat, ne, si quolibet modo eum ibidem amplius moram habere permiseris, cum ipso apud nos grauiter incipias esse culpabilis.

C. V. A bishop is not to undertake the guardianship of testaments and the care of household property.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 18]. A bishop is not to undertake the guardianship of testaments.

C. V. Testamentorum tuicionem et curam familiaris rei episcopus non suscipiat.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 18] Episcopus tuicionem testamentorum non suscipiat.

[C. VI.]

Likewise from the same, [c. 20]. A bishop is to recall no care of household property to himself, but is to be at leisure only for reading, prayer, and the word of preaching.

[C. VI.]

Item ex eodem. [c. 20.] Episcopus nullam rei familiaris curam ad se reuocet, sed lectioni et orationi et uerbo predicationis tantummodo uacet.

[C. VII.]

Likewise from the same, [c. 17]. A bishop is to administer the governance of widows, wards, and strangers not through himself but through the archpriest or archdeacon.

[C. VII.].

Item ex eodem. [c. 17.] Episcopus gubernationem uiduarum et pupillorum ac peregrinorum non per se ipsum, sed per archipresbiterum aut archidiaconem agat.

C. VIII. A cleric ought not to assume causes involving accounts.

Likewise Gregory to Prefect Quertinus, [epistle 30, book X]. It is unprofitable and exceedingly laborious for a learned man to assume causes involving accounts and to bind himself in them to what is not expedient.

> C. VIII. Ratiociniorum causas clericus non debet assumere.
> Item Gregorius Quertino prefecto. [epist. 30. lib. X.] Inutile et ualde laboriosum est, hominem litteratum ratiociniorum causas assumere, et in eis, quod non expedit, se obligare.

C. IX. A cleric who is a merchant is to be shunned.

Likewise Jerome, [to Nepotian, On the Life of Clerics]. Shun as certain plagues a cleric who is a merchant, rich from being needy and glorious from being ignoble.

> C. IX. Fugiendus est clericus negotiator.
> Item Ieronimus. [ad Nepotianum de uita clericorum] Negotiatorem clericum, ex inope diuitem et ex ignobili gloriosum, quasi quasdam pestes fuge.

C. X. A cleric is not permitted to engage in trade.

Likewise Augustine, in the book Questions of the Old and New Testament, [c. 127]. Men are never permitted to fornicate, but sometimes they are permitted to engage in trade, and sometimes they are not; for before anyone is an ecclesiastic, he is permitted to engage in trade; once made one, he is not permitted.

[PALEA.

> C. X. Clerico negotiari non licet.
>
> Item Augustinus in libro questionum ueteris et noui testamenti. [cap. 127.] Fornicari hominibus semper non licet, negotiari uero aliquando licet, aliquando non licet; antequam enim ecclesiasticus quis sit, licet ei negotiari; facto iam non licet.
>
> [PALEA.

C. XI. On the same.

Likewise John Chrysostom, on Matthew, (that is, the author of the Incomplete Work, homily XXXVIII, on Matthew c. 21). By casting those selling and buying out of the temple, the Lord signified that a merchant can scarcely or never please God. And therefore no Christian ought to be a merchant; or, if he should wish to be one, let him be cast out of the Church of God, as the Prophet says: "Because I have not known business dealings, I will enter into the powers of the Lord." For just as one who walks between two enemies, wishing to please both and commend himself to both, cannot be without evil speech—for it is necessary that he speak evil of this one to that one, and of that one to this one—so one who buys and sells cannot be without lying and perjury. And with a few things interposed: § 1. But their property is neither stable, nor does what is gathered from evil advance toward good. For just as, if you sift wheat or another such thing in a sieve, while it is tossed here and there all the grains gradually fall downward, and at last nothing remains in the sieve except the refuse alone, so at the end nothing remains from the property of merchants except sin alone. § 2. But all men seem to be merchants; I will therefore show who is not a merchant, so that you may understand one who is not such to be a merchant. Whoever purchases a thing not in order to sell that same thing whole and unchanged, but so that it may be material for him to work something from it, is not a merchant; but one who purchases a thing in order to profit by giving away that same thing whole and unchanged is a merchant, who is cast out of the temple of God. § 3. Hence above all merchants the usurer is more accursed; for he sells a thing given by God, not one purchased, as the merchant does, and after the interest he demands his own thing back, taking another's things together with his own; but the merchant does not demand back the thing sold. § 4. Someone still says: Is one who leases a field so that he may receive a field-rent, or a house so that he may receive rents, not like one who gives money at usury? Far from it. First, because money is arranged for no use except buying; second, because one who has a field receives fruit from it by ploughing, and one who has a house takes from it the use of dwelling. Therefore one who leases a field or house is seen to give his own use and receive money, and in a certain way is seen to exchange gain for gain; you take no use from stored money. Third, a field or house grows old through use. But when money has been lent, it is neither diminished nor grows old. § 5. "And he overturned the tables of the money changers." Spiritually, money is understood as men, because, just as a coin has the imprint of Caesar, so a man has the imprint of God. And just as a solidus which does not have the imprint of Caesar is rejected, so also a man who does not show the image of God in himself is judged rejected. Hence Isaiah said to Jerusalem: "Your money is rejected; your taverners mix wine with water, etc." Therefore he overturned the tables of the money changers, signifying that in the temple of God there ought not to be coins except spiritual ones, that is, those which bear the image of God, not of the devil. Or certainly by the tables of the priestly money changers he means the Scriptures. For when the New Testament succeeded the former, their Scriptures were overturned.]

C. XI. De eodem.

Item Iohannes Chrysostomus super Matthaeum. (id est auctor operis imperfecti, hom. XXXVIII. ad c. 21. Matth.) Eiciens Dominus uendentes et ementes de templo, significauit, quia homo mercator uix aut numquam potest Deo placere. Et ideo nullus Christianus debet esse mercator, aut, si uoluerit esse, proiciatur de ecclesia Dei, dicente Propheta: "Quia non cognoui negotiationes, introibo in potentias Domini." Quemadmodum enim qui ambulat inter duos inimicos, ambobus placere uolens et se commendare, sine maliloquio esse non potest (necesse est enim, ut isti male loquatur de illo, et illi male de isto), sic qui emit et uendit sine mendacio et periurio esse non potest. Et paucis interiectis: §. 1. Sed est nec stabilis substantia eorum, neque ad bonum proficit, quod de malo congregatur. Quemadmodum enim, si triticum aut aliud tale cernas in cribro, dum huc et illuc iactatur, grana omnia paulatim deorsum cadunt, et tandem in cribro nichil remanet, nisi stercus solum: sic de substantia negotiatorum nouissime nil remanet, nisi solum peccatum. §. 2. Sed omnes homines uidentur esse mercatores; ostendam ergo, quis non est negotiator, ut qui talis non fuerit, eum intelligas esse negotiatorem. Quicumque rem conparat, non ut ipsam rem integram et inmutatam uendat, sed ut materia sibi sit inde aliquid operandi, ille non est negotiator; qui autem conparat rem, ut illam ipsam integram et inmutatam dando lucretur, ille est mercator, qui de templo Dei eicitur. §. 3. Unde super omnes mercatores plus maledictus est usurarius; ipse namque rem datam a Deo uendit, non conparatam, ut mercator, et post fenus rem suam repetit, tollens aliena cum suis, mercator autem non repetit rem uenditam. §. 4. Adhuc dicit aliquis: Qui agrum locat, ut agrariam recipiat, aut domum, ut pensiones recipiat, nonne est similis ei, qui pecuniam dat ad usuram? Absit. Primum quidem, quoniam pecunia non ad aliquem usum disposita est, nisi ad emendum; secundo, quoniam agrum habens, arando accipit ex eo fructum, habens domum, usum mansionis capit ex ea. Ideo qui locat agrum uel domum, suum usum dare uidetur, et pecuniam accipere, et quodammodo quasi commutare uidetur cum lucro lucrum; ex pecunia reposita nullum usum capis. Tertio ager uel domus utendo ueterascit. Pecunia autem cum fuerit mutuata, nec minuitur, nec ueterascit. §. 5. "Et mensas nummulariorum subuertit." Pecunia spiritualiter homines intelliguntur, quia sicut nummus habet caragma Cesaris, sic homo habet caragma Dei. Et quemadmodum solidus, qui non habet caragma Cesaris, reprobus est, ita et homo, qui non ostendit in se imaginem Dei, reprobus estimatur. Unde Ysaias dicebat ad Ierusalem: "Pecunia tua reproba est, caupones tui miscent uinum cum aqua, etc." Ideo ergo mensas nummulariorum euertit, significans, quia in templo Dei non debent esse nummi, nisi spirituales, id est, qui Dei imaginem, non diaboli, portant. Aut certe mensas nummularioum sacerdotum dicit scripturas. Nouo enim testamento succedente priori, euersae sunt scripturae illorum.]

C. XII. On the same.

Likewise from the words of Augustine, (collected from here and there and reduced to a summary, on Psalm LXX, at the verse, "Because I have not known"). "Because I have not known literature": some codices have "business dealings"; in this the diversity of interpreters shows the sense and does not introduce error. Therefore, if this man speaks the praise of God all day for this reason, that he has not known business dealings, let Christians correct themselves and not engage in trade. But the merchant says to me: I bring goods from far away; I seek the reward of my labor, whence I may live: "the laborer is worthy of his reward." The matter concerns lying and perjury, not business. For I lie, not the business. For I could say: I bought it for so much; I shall sell it for so much; if it pleases you, buy it. How, therefore, do you call me back from trade? All artisans lie—shoemakers and farmers. Do you wish me to desire a time of high prices, so that I may be able to sell the grain that I preserved? But good farmers, you say, do not do this, nor do good merchants do those things. What then? Is it also evil to have children because, when their head hurts, evil and unbelieving mothers seek sacrilegious amulets and incantations for them? All these are sins of men, not of things. Therefore seek, O bishop, the merchant says to me, how you are to understand the Psalmist, and do not prohibit me from trade; for trade does not make me evil, but my iniquity and my lying. Let us therefore seek the merchants who presume to glory in their own works, whether they are against that grace which this Psalmist commends, so that no one glories in his own works. And just as, against proud physicians who promise health, this saying keeps watch: "All day long your salvation," so, against merchants glorying in their works, this saying keeps watch: "My mouth will announce your justice." Hence the Lord also expelled from the temple those who wished to establish their own justice and were ignorant of the justice of God. Business is rightly called negotium, because it denies leisure—otium—which is evil, and does not seek the true rest which is God.]

C. XII. De eodem.

Item ex uerbis Augustini. (hinc inde collectis, et in summam redactis ad Psal. LXX. uers. Quoniam non cognoui.) "Quoniam non cognoui litteraturam:" Aliqui codices habent "negotiationes:" in quo diuersitas interpretum sensum ostendit, non errorem inducit. Ergo si propterea iste tota die laudem Dei dicit, quia non cognouit negotiationes, corrigant se Christiani, non negotientur. Sed ait mihi negotiator: Affero ex longinquo merces, mercedem laboris mei, unde uiuam, peto: "dignus est operarius mercede sua." De mendacio, de periurio agitur, non de negotio. Ego enim mentior, non negotium. Possem enim dicere, tanto emi, tanto uendam: si placet, eme. Quomodo ergo reuocas a negotiatione? omnes artifices mentiuntur, sutores, agricolae. Vis, ut optem carum tempus, ut possim uendere annonam, quam seruaui? sed non hoc faciunt, inquis, agricolae boni, nec illa negotiatores boni. Quid enim? etiam et filios habere malum est, quia, quando eis caput dolet, malae et infideles matres ligaturas sacrilegas et incantationes querunt? Omnia ista hominum, non rerum peccata sunt. Quere ergo episcope, (dicit mihi negotiator) quomodo Psalmistam intelligas, et noli me prohibere a negotiatione: negotiatio enim me non facit malum, sed iniquitas mea et mendacium meum. Queramus ergo negotiatores, qui presumunt gloriari ex suis operibus, si sunt contra illam gratiam, quam hic Psalmista commendat, ut nemo de suis operibus glorietur. Et sicut contra medicos superbos salutis pollicitatores uigilat hoc, quod dictum est: "Tota die salutem tuam," sic contra negotiatores de operibus suis gloriantes uigilat hoc, quod dictum est: "Os meum annunciabit iustitiam tuam." Unde et Dominus expulit illos de templo, uolentes suam iustitiam statuere et ignorantes iustitiam Dei. Merito dictum negotium, quia negat otium, quod malum est, neque querit ueram quietem, que est Deus.]

[PALEA.

C. XIII. On the same.

Likewise Cassiodorus, on the same Psalm LXX, at the same verse. What else is business than to wish to sell more dearly things which can be bought more cheaply? And below: Therefore those merchants are judged abominable who, giving no consideration to the justice of God, are polluted by the immoderate pursuit of money, loading their merchandise more with perjuries than with prices. Such persons the Lord cast out of the temple, saying: "Do not make the house of my Father a house of business."]

C. XIII. De eodem.

Item Cassiodorus in eundem Psalmum LXX. in eundem uersiculum. Quid est aliud negotium, nisi que possint uilius conparari carius uelle distrahere? Et infra: Negotiatores ergo illi abhominabiles existimantur, qui iustitiam Dei minime considerantes per inmoderatum pecuniae ambitum polluuntur, merces suas plus periuriis onerando quam preciis. Tales eiecit Dominus de templo, dicens: "Nolite facere domum patris mei domum negotiationis."]

C. XIV. Let him lack the name of priest who calls the ministers of God away from their offices.

Likewise Cyprian, [to the Clergy and People of Furni, book I, epistle 9]. Part II. Nor do those men deserve to be named at the altar of God in the prayer of the priests who have wished to call priests and ministers away from the altar. And therefore, since Victor, contrary to the form recently given by the priests in council, dared to appoint the priest Geminus Faustinus as guardian, let no offering be made among you for his falling asleep, nor let any supplication for his name be repeated in the church, so that the decree of the priests, made religiously and necessarily, may be observed by us.

C. XIV. Nomine sacerdotis careat, qui Dei ministros a suis euocat offitiis.

Item Cyprianus. [ad Clerum et plebem Furnitanorum, lib. I. epist. 9.] II. Pars. Neque apud altare Dei merentur nominari in sacerdotum prece, qui ab altari sacerdotes et ministros uoluerint auocare. Et ideo Victor, cum contra formam nuper in concilio a sacerdotibus datam Geminum Faustinum presbiterum ausus sit tutorem constituere, apud uos ob dormicionem eius non fiat oblatio, aut aliqua deprecatio pro nomine eius frequentetur in ecclesia, ut sacerdotum decretum religiose aut necessarie factum seruetur a nobis.

Distinction LXXXIX

GRATIAN. Part I. It is also necessary that one be well set over his own house, so that from it certain proofs, as it were, of his future administration may be taken. But in the administration of the Church let him know that this rule is to be observed: that he commit no two offices at the same time to any person, however experienced, nor commit ecclesiastical property to secular men to govern.

Hence Gregory writes to all the Bishops:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Domui quoque suae oportet bene esse prepositum, ut quedam inde quodammodo futurae dispensationis argumenta assumantur. In dispensatione uero ecclesiae hanc regulam obseruandam nouerit, ut nulli quantumlibet exercitatae personae duo simul offitia committat, neque secularibus uiris res ecclesiasticas gubernandas committat.
> Unde Gregorius scribit omnibus Episcopis:

C. I. Two offices are not to be committed to one person.

We command that the individual offices of ecclesiastical law be committed individually to each individual person. For just as in one body we have many members, but all the members do not have the same action, so in the body of the Church, according to the truthful saying of Paul, in one and the same spiritual body this office is to be conferred upon one person and that one committed to another. For the offices of two affairs are not to be committed at one time to one person, however experienced: because, if the whole body were the eye, where would be the hearing? For just as the variety of members through diverse offices both preserves the strength of the body and represents its beauty, so the variety of persons, with diverse offices distributed among them, likewise manifests both the strength and the comeliness of the holy Church of God. And just as it is unbecoming that in the human body one member perform the office of another, so it is undoubtedly harmful and at the same time most shameful if the individual ministries of affairs are not distributed among just as many persons.

> C. I. Uni personae duo non committantur offitia.
> Singula ecclesiastici iuris offitia singulis quibusque personis singillatim committi iubemus. Sicut enim in uno corpore multa membra habemus, omnia autem membra non eundem actum habent, ita in ecclesiae corpore secundum ueridicam Pauli sententiam in uno eodemque spirituali corpore conferendum est hoc offitium uni, alii committendum est illud, neque enim quantumlibet exercitatae uni personae uno tempore duarum rerum offitia committenda sunt: quia si totum corpus oculus, ubi auditus? Sicut enim uarietas membrorum per diuersa offitia et robur corporis seruat, et pulcritudinem representat, ita uarietas personarum diuersa nichilominus distributa offitia et fortitudinem et uenustatem sanctae Dei ecclesiae manifestat. Et sicut indecorum est, ut in corpore humano alterius fungatur offitio alterum membrum, ita nimirum noxium simulque turpissimum, si singula rerum ministeria personis totidem non fuerint distributa.

C. II. Every bishop is to have a vice-lord and a steward.

Likewise Gregory to the Subdeacon Anthemius, [book IX, epistle 66]. Part II. We will that our brother Paschasius appoint for himself both a vice-lord and a master of the household, so that he may be able to stand capable and prepared both for arriving guests and for the causes which arise. But if you perceive him to be negligent, or deferring to fulfill those things which we say, all his clergy ought to be assembled, so that by common counsel they may themselves choose those whose persons can be appointed to the things we have said before. GRATIAN. The office of the vice-lord is to order the episcopal household. Hence Gregory to the Patrician Clementina, [book I, epistle 11], after other things:

C. II. Quilibet episcopus uicedominum et yconomum habeat.

Item Gregorius Antemio Subdiacono. [lib. IX. epist. 66.] II. Pars. Volumus, ut frater noster Pascasius et uicedominum sibi ordinet et maiorem domus, quatinus possit uel hospitibus superuenientibus, uel causis, que eueniunt, idoneus et paratus existere. Si uero negligentem eum prospicis, uel ea, que dicimus, inplere differentem, omnis eius clerus adhiberi debet, ut communi consilio ipsi eligant, quorum personae ad ea, que prediximus ualeant ordinari. Gratian. Offitium uicedomini est episcopium disponere. Unde Gregorius Clementinae Patriciae [lib. I. epist. 11.] post alia:

C. III. What the office of a vice-lord is.

But as for the deacon Anatolius, whom you requested to be sent to you, the nature of the cause rather than the authority of severity makes us unable to do this. For we appointed him vice-lord, to whose judgment we committed the ordering of the episcopal household.

C. III. Quid sit offitium uicedomini.

Diaconum uero Anatholium, quem ad uos dirigi poposcistis, hoc nos facere non posse, causae magis modus quam rigoris auctoritas facit. Vicedominum enim eum constituimus, cuius arbitrio episcopium commisimus disponendum.

C. IV. On the same.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 26]. Because in certain churches, as has come to us, bishops handle ecclesiastical property without a steward, it has pleased the council that all churches having bishops also have stewards from their own clergy, who are to govern the property of the Church according to the judgment of their bishop, so that the governance of the ecclesiastical property itself be not without testimony, and so that it not thereby happen that the property of the same Church is dispersed and disparagement is engendered against the priestly dignity. But if anyone does not observe this, let him be subject to the divine rules.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 26.] Quia in quibusdam ecclesiis, sicut ad nos peruenit, sine yconomo episcopi res ecclesiasticas tractant, placuit, omnes ecclesias habentes episcopos etiam yconomos habere de proprio clero, qui gubernent res ecclesiae cum arbitrio sui episcopi, ut non sine testimonio sit gubernatio ipsarum rerum ecclesiasticarum, neque ex hoc eueniat res eiusdem ecclesiae dispergi, et sacerdotali dignitati obtrectatio generetur. Si uero quis hoc non obseruauerit, diuinis subiaceat regulis.

C. V. Ecclesiastical property is not to be committed to secular men.

Likewise Gregory to John, Bishop of Cagliari, [book VII, epistle 66]. It has been indicated to us that you committed the care of your patrimony to certain laymen, who afterward were detected in plundering and in wearing down your peasants. If this is so, it is fitting that the matter be strictly examined by you and that the cause between them and the peasants of your Church be investigated more subtly. And whatever fraud is found, let them be compelled to restore it with the penalty established by the laws. But henceforth your fraternity must beware lest the property of any church be committed to secular men and those not living under your rule, but rather to approved clerics from your office, in whom, if anything of depravity can be found, you may, as in subjects, be able to amend what has been done unlawfully; so that, namely, among you they may administer the office of their habit more fittingly than bring it under accusation. Part III. GRATIAN. Let him not dare to commit ecclesiastical offices to relatives or even to those joined to him by favor. Hence in the Tenth Council of Toledo, [c. 3]:

> C. V. Secularibus uiris res ecclesiasticae non committantur.
> Item Gregorius Iohanni Carolitano Episcopo. [lib. VII. epist. 66.] Indicatum est nobis, quod laicis quibusdam curam uestri patrimonii commiseritis, qui postmodum in rusticorum uestrorum depredationibus atque ex fatigationibus fuerunt deprehensi. Quod si ita est, districte a uobis discuti conuenit, atque inter eos ecclesiaeque uestrae rusticos causam examinare subtilius. Et quicquid fraudis inuentum fuerit, cum pena legibus statuta reddere conpellantur. De cetero uero cauendum est a fraternitate uestra, ne secularibus uiris atque sub regula uestra non degentibus cuiuslibet res ecclesiae committantur, sed probatis de offitio uestro clericis, in quibus, si quid reperiri poterit prauitatis, ut in subditis emendare quod illicite gestum fuerit ualeatis: quo uidelicet apud uos habitus sui offitium magis conuenienter amministrent, quam accusent. III. Pars. Gratian. Propinquis, uel etiam fauore sibi coniunctis, ecclesiastica offitia committere non audeat. Unde in Tolletano Concilio X.: [c. 3.]

C. VI. A bishop is not to commit ecclesiastical offices to relatives or to those joined by favor.

It fittingly pleases all that such a deed be rescinded in the present and not be done hereafter. Therefore, whichever of the pontiffs henceforth attempts to entrust such gains either to blood relatives or to any persons bound to him by favor, to the ruin of his wicked presumption, let what was commanded be revoked as void, and let the one who appointed them be subject to excommunication for a year. But whatever things may perhaps have been taken are to be restored twofold by him who took them.

GRATIAN. Moreover, why the offices themselves are so to be distinguished and all not committed to one person is given to be understood from the authority of Gregory and from the authority of Pope Boniface, who says:

> C. VI. Ecclesiastica episcopus non committat offitia propinquis uel fauore coniunctis.
>
> Decenter omnibus placet, in presenti tale rescindere factum, et non esse de cetero faciendum. Quicumque igitur pontificum deinceps aut sanguine propinquis, aut fauore personae quibuscumque deuinctis talia lucra commendare temptauerit, ad suum nefandae presumptionis excidium et quod iussum fuerit deuocetur in irritum, et qui ordinauerit annuae excommunicationi subiaceat. Que uero ablata fortasse fuerint, ab eo, qui tulit, reddantur in duplum.
> Gratian. Porro ipsa offitia quare ita sint distinguenda nec uni personae omnia committenda ex auctoritate Gregorii et ex auctoritate Bonifatii Papae datur intelligi, qui ait:

C. VII. The distribution of grades and orders preserves ecclesiastical unity.

For this purpose the foresight of ordering established that diverse grades and orders be distinct, so that, while lesser persons displayed reverence toward greater persons and greater persons bestowed affection upon lesser persons, a true concord might be made, a weaving from diversity, and the administration of the individual offices might be rightly conducted. Nor could the whole subsist by any other reason unless a great order of difference of this kind preserved it. That a creature cannot be governed or live in one and the same quality, the example of the heavenly hosts instructs us, because, while there are angels and there are archangels, it is evident that they are not equal, but one differs from another in power and order, as you know.

> C. VII. Graduum et ordinum distributio ecclesiasticam unitatem conseruat.
> Ad hoc dispositionis prouisio gradus diuersos et ordines constituit esse distinctos, ut, dum reuerentiam minores potioribus exhiberent, et potiores minoribus dilectionem inpenderent, uera concordia fieret ex diuersitate contextio, et recte offitiorum gereretur administratio singulorum. Neque uniuersitas alia poterat ratione subsistere, nisi huiusmodi magnus eam differentiae ordo seruaret. Quia uero creatura in una eademque qualitate gubernari uel uiuere non potest, celestium miliciarum exemplar nos instruit, quia dum sunt angeli, sunt archangeli, liquet, quia non equales sunt, sed in potestate et ordine (sicut nostis) differt alter ab altero.

Distinction XC

GRATIAN. Part I. A litigious man is also prohibited from being ordained, because one who by his power ought to draw the discordant to concord, and who is prohibited from receiving the offerings of those at dissension, ought by no means, through readiness to litigate, to provoke others to dissension. Hence it reads in the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 59]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Litigiosus quoque prohibetur ordinari, quia qui sua potestate discordantes ad concordiam debet attrahere, qui oblationes dissidentium prohibetur recipere, nequaquam litigandi facilitate alios ad discidium debet prouocare. Unde in Cartaginensi Concilio IV. [c. 59.] legitur:

C. I. Discordant clerics are to be recalled to concord or cast down to concord.

Let a bishop draw discordant clerics to concord either by reason or by authority; let the synod condemn the disobedient through a hearing.

> C. I. Clerici discordantes reuocentur ad concordiam uel deiciantur ad concordiam.
> Discordantes clericos episcopus uel ratione, uel potestate ad concordiam trahat; inobedientes sinodus per audientiam dampnet.

C. II. The offerings of brothers at dissension are not to be received in the church.

Likewise from the same, [cc. 93 and 94]. Let the offerings of brothers at dissension be received neither in the sacristy nor in the treasury. Likewise: § 1. The gifts of those who oppress the poor are to be rejected by priests.

> C. II. Dissidentium fratrum oblationes in ecclesia non recipiantur.
> Item ex eodem. [c. 93. et 94.] Oblationes dissidentium fratrum neque in sacrario, neque in gazophilacio recipiantur. Similiter: §. 1. Dona eorum, qui pauperes obprimunt, a sacerdotibus refutanda sunt.

C. III. One who does not have peace with his neighbor is proved to be outside the Church.

Likewise Cyprian, [On the Unity of the Church]. God had regard neither for Cain nor for his gifts; for he could not have God at peace with him who had not peace with his brother but the discord of jealousy. What peace, therefore, do enemies of brothers promise themselves? What sacrifices do rivals of priests believe themselves to celebrate? Do those who gather outside the Church of Christ think that Christ is with them when they have gathered? Even if such persons have been killed in confession of the name of Christ, this stain is not washed away even by blood. The inexpiable and grave fault of discord is not cleansed even by suffering.

> C. III. Extra ecclesiam esse probatur, qui pacem cum proximo non habet.
> Item Ciprianus. [de unitate ecclesiae] Neque ad Cain neque ad munera eius respexit Deus; neque enim habere pacatum Deum poterat, qui cum fratre non pacem sed zeli discordiam habebat. Quam sibi igitur pacem promittunt inimici fratrum? que sacrificia celebrare se credunt emuli sacerdotum? Secum esse Christum, cum collecti fuerint, opinantur hii, qui extra Christi ecclesiam colliguntur? Tales etiamsi occisi in confessione nominis Christi fuerint, macula ista nec sanguine abluitur. Inexpiabilis et grauis culpa discordiae nec passione purgatur.

C. IV. Let murmurers be made strangers to the unity of the brothers.

Likewise from the Eighth Synod. Let one who murmurs be a stranger to the unity of the brothers, and let the work of one who has proved to be murmuring be cast away, lest he incur the penalty of the murmurers, concerning which the Apostle says: "Neither shall you murmur, as certain persons murmured and perished by the destroyer." Therefore, according to the measure of his work, let the sinner—who is fully disclosed in this saying of the Apostle—do penance at the judgment of the priest.

> C. IV. Murmurantes a fratrum unitate alieni efficiantur.
> Item ex Octaua Sinodo. Alienus sit a fratrum unitate, qui murmurat, et opus eius abiciatur, qui murmurans extiterit, ne penam murmurantium incurrat, de qua dicit Apostolus: "Neque murmuraueritis, sicut quidam murmurauerunt, et perierunt ab exterminatore." Iuxta mensuram itaque operis peccator (qui in hac sententia Apostoli pleniter declaratur) sacerdotis iudicio peniteat.

C. V. Those who love quarrels and contentions are to be corrected.

Likewise from the same. If any monk loves contentions or quarrels, or inflicts a manifest insult upon a brother, let him expiate it by prolonged penance according to the judgment of the ruler and the measure of the sin. Likewise: § 1. One who has proved contentious or murmuring is to do penance according to the judgment of the prior for as long as the character of the fault remains.

> C. V. Corripiantur, qui rixas et contenciones amant.
> Item ex eodem. Si quis monachus contenciones uel rixas amauerit, uel manifestum conuitium intulerit fratri, iuxta arbitrium rectoris modumque peccati diuturna expietur penitentia. Item: §. 1. Qui contentiosus aut murmurans extiterit, secundum arbitrium prioris tamdiu peniteat, quamdiu qualitas culpae extat.

C. VI. Bishops at dissension are to be compelled to return to concord.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 25]. If fear of God does not reconcile bishops at dissension, let the synod do so.

> C. VI. Dissidentes episcopi ad concordiam redire cogantur.
> Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 25.] Dissidentes episcopos, si non timor Dei, sinodus reconciliet.

C. VII. On the same.

Likewise from the same, [c. 26]. Bishops are to take care that they exhort brothers at dissension, whether clerics or laymen, to peace rather than to judgment.

> C. VII. De eodem.
>
> Item ex eodem. [c. 26.] Studendum est episcopis, ut dissidentes fratres, siue clericos, siue laicos, ad pacem magis quam ad iudicium cohortentur.

C. VIII. The gifts of those who oppress the poor are not to be received.

Likewise from the same, [c. 94]. The gifts of those who oppress the poor are to be rejected by priests.

> C. VIII. Non recipiantur dona eorum, qui pauperes obprimunt.
> Item ex eodem. [c. 94.] Eorum, qui pauperes obprimunt, dona a sacerdotibus sunt refutanda.

C. IX. Those who scorn to return to concord are to be removed from the assembly of the faithful.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 31]. It also pleased the council that, as often happens, whoever have dissented from one another through hatred or a protracted lawsuit, and through prolonged obstinacy have been unable to be recalled to peace, are first to be reproved by the priests of the city. But if with pernicious intention they are unwilling to lay aside their enmities, let them be expelled from the assembly of the Church by a most just excommunication.

> C. IX. A cetu alienentur fidelium, qui ad concordiam redire contempnunt.
> Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 31.] Placuit etiam, ut (sicut plerumque fit) quicumque odio aut longinqua inter se lite dissenserint, et ad pacem reuocari diuturna nequiuerint obstinatione, a sacerdotibus ciuitatis primitus arguantur. Qui si inimicitias deponere pernitiosa intentione noluerint, de ecclesiae cetu iustissima excommunicatione pellantur.

C. X. One who is unwilling to be reconciled to his brother is to be afflicted with most severe fasts.

Likewise Pope Fabian. If anyone who has been grieved is unwilling to be reconciled to his brother, when the one who grieved him has made satisfaction, let him be afflicted with the most severe fasts until he receives the satisfaction with a grateful spirit.

> C. X. Inediis maceretur acerrimis, qui fratri suo reconciliari non uult.
> Item Fabianus Papa. Si quis contristatus noluerit reconciliari fratri suo, satisfaciente eo qui contristauerit, acerrimis maceretur inediis, usque dum gratanti animo satisfactionem recipiat.

C. XI. Bishops are mutually to furnish counsel and aid to one another for firmly maintaining peace.

Likewise Innocent II. Part II. We command that bishops, having regard for God alone and the salvation of the people, with all lukewarmness set aside, mutually furnish counsel and aid to one another for firmly maintaining peace, and not omit this through love or hatred of anyone. But if anyone is found lukewarm in this work of God, let him incur the loss of his own dignity.

> C. XI. Episcopi ad pacem firmiter tenendam uicissim sibi consilium et auxilium prestent.
> Item Innocentius II. II. Pars. Precipimus, ut episcopi, ad solum Deum et salutem populi habentes respectum, omni tepiditate seposita, ad pacem firmiter tenendam mutuum sibi consilium et auxilium prebeant, neque hoc alicuius amore uel odio pretermittant. Quod si quis in hoc Dei opere tepidus fuerit inuentus, dampnum propriae dignitatis incurrat.

C. XII. Those who are unwilling to be reconciled to one another are to be driven from the communion of the faithful.

Likewise Pope Victor, [to the Africans, epistle II]. It has been reported to the apostolic see that some among you wish to harm their brothers and strive that they fall, similarly that they disagree in the sacraments, and that on account of this contentions and rivalries arise among you. We command you to turn away from these dissensions, to agree in all these things, and mutually to bear aid. For if you quickly neglect to do this and do not strive to be reconciled to one another, do not doubt that you will be driven from the communion of the apostolic see and of the whole Church.

> C. XII. Pellendi sunt a communione fidelium, qui sibi inuicem reconciliari nolunt.
>
> Item Victor Papa. [ad Afros, epist. II.] Perlatum est ad sedem apostolicam, aliquos uestrum nocere fratribus uelle, et ut cadant decertare, similiter in sacramentis discrepare, et ob id contentiones et emulationes inter uos fieri, a quibus dissensionibus uos auertere, et in his omnibus concordare, et opem ferre uicissim mandamus. Nam si hoc agere cito neglexeritis, et uicissim reconciliari non studueritis, ab apostolicae sedis et totius ecclesiae communione uos pelli non dubitetis.

Distinction XCI

GRATIAN. Part I. But one who is prohibited from seeking a livelihood for himself by shameful gain or dishonorable business is to obtain stipends from the offerings of the Church. But if the Church cannot suffice for him, let him find necessities for himself by his own craft or by agriculture, after the example of the Apostle, who lived from the labor of his hands, yet in such a way that by occasion of his work he not be absent from the vigils of the Church, something which is permitted to no one with impunity without bodily infirmity.

Hence Pope Pelagius:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Qui autem turpi lucro uel inhonesto negocio uictum sibi querere prohibetur, de oblationibus ecclesiae stipendia consequatur. Quod si ecclesia ei sufficere non poterit, proprio artificio uel agricultura (exemplo Apostoli, qui de labore manuum uiuebat) sibi necessaria inueniat, ita tamen, ut occasione sui operis uigiliis ecclesiae non desit, quod absque inequalitate sui corporis inpune nulli conceditur.
> Unde Pelagius papa:

C. I. Clerics who withdraw themselves from the morning or evening offices are to be corrected.

Eleutherius, our brother and fellow bishop, complains that his clerics act proudly against him contrary to the canons, and that, although he promised by a pledge made in the archive at our command that vigils would be celebrated daily in his church, he cannot fulfill it because they scorn it, but rather each attends to his own business with the service of the Church set aside. And therefore, by due rebuke restrain those whom he shows you to be contumacious, and compel them in every way to devote themselves to vigils.

[PALEA.

C. I. Corripiantur clerici, qui offitiis matutinis uel uespertinis se subtrahunt.

Eleuterius frater et coepiscopus noster queritur, clericos suos sibi contra canones superbire, et id, quod nobis iubentibus facta in scrinio cautione promisit, ut cottidianis diebus uigiliae in eius celebrentur ecclesia, illis contempnentibus inplere non posse, sed magis unumquemque suis (postposito ecclesiae seruitio) uacare negotiis. Et ideo experientia tua eos, quos tibi esse ostenderit contumaces, debita obiurgatione conpesce, et modis omnibus uigiliis uacare conpelle.

[PALEA.

C. II. On the same.

Likewise from the Council of Nantes. In the morning, when the morning office has been completed, let the priest discharge the due burden of his service by chanting prime, terce, sext, and none, yet in such a way that afterward, at the fitting hours and when the signals designate them, they are publicly completed, according to possibility, either by himself or by the scholars. Then, when the hours have been completed and the sick visited, if he wishes, let him go out fasting to rural work, so that he may again be able to come to the aid of the needs of pilgrims and guests or of various travelers, and also of the sick and dead, until the hour established according to the character and suitability of the time. Likewise from the sayings of Saint Benedict: § 1. The Prophet says: “Seven times in the day I have spoken praise to you.” This sacred number seven will thus be fulfilled by us if we discharge the offices of our service at the time of matins, prime, terce, sext, none, vespers, and compline, because concerning these the Prophet said: “Seven times in the day I have spoken praise to you.” For concerning the nocturnal vigils the same Prophet says: “At midnight I arose to confess to you.” Therefore at these times let us return praises to our Creator for the judgments of his justice.]

C. II. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Nannetensi. Presbiter mane, matutinali offitio expleto, pensum seruitutis suae canendo primam, tertiam, sextam nonamque persoluat, ita tamen, ut postea horis conpetentibus et signis designantibus iuxta possibilitatem aut a se, aut a scolaribus publice conpleantur. Deinde peractis horis, infirmis uisitatis, si uoluerit, ad opus rurale exeat ieiunus, ut iterum necessitatibus peregrinorum et hospitum siue diuersorum commeantium, infirmorum quoque atque defunctorum succurrere possit usque ad statutam horam pro qualitate temporis et opportunitate. Item ex dictis S. Benedicti: §. 1. Propheta dicente: "Septies in die laudem dixi tibi," qui septenarius sacratus numerus a nobis sic inplebitur si matutinae, primae, tertiae, sextae, nonae, uesperae conpletoriique tempore nostrae seruitutis offitia persoluamus, quia de his dixit Propheta: "Septies in die laudem dixi tibi." Nam de nocturnis uigiliis idem ipse Propheta ait: "Media nocte surgebam ad confitendum tibi." Ergo his temporibus referamus laudes creatori nostro super iudicia iustitiae suae.]

C. III. Without detriment to his office, let a cleric seek necessities for himself by a little craft.

Hence it reads in the same Council of Carthage, [IV, cc. 52 and 49]. Let a cleric prepare food and clothing for himself by a little craft or by agriculture, provided only that it be without detriment to his office. § 1. For a cleric who, without bodily infirmity, is absent from vigils is to be deprived of his stipend and excommunicated.

> C. III. Sine offitii detrimento artificiolo sibi clericus necessaria querat.
> Unde in Concilio eodem Cartaginensi [IV., c. 52. et 49.] legitur. Clericus uictum et uestimentum sibi artificiolo uel agricultura, absque offitii sui dumtaxat detrimento, preparet. §. 1. Clericus enim, qui absque corpusculi sui inequalitate uigiliis deest, stipendio priuatus excommunicetur.

C. IV. On the same.

Likewise from the same, [cc. 51, 53, 48, and 50]. Let every cleric instructed in the word of God seek his livelihood by a craft. Likewise: § 1. Let all clerics who are able to work learn both little crafts and letters. But those who walk about in fairs or in the market not for the purpose of buying anything are to be degraded from their office. Those, however, who amid temptations turn aside from their office or act more negligently are to be removed from that office.

> C. IV. De eodem.
>
> Item ex eodem. [c. 51. 53. et 48. et 50.] Clericus quilibet uerbo Dei eruditus artificio uictum querat. Item: §. 1. Omnes clerici, qui ad operandum ualidi sunt, et artificiola, et litteras discant. Qui uero non pro emendo aliquid in nundinis uel in foro deambulant, ab offitio suo degradentur. Inter temptaciones autem ab offitio declinantes uel negligentius agentes ab ipso offitio remoueantur.

C. V. On the same.

Likewise from the First Council of Orléans, [c. 28]. But clerics who scorn to be present for the holy work are to receive ecclesiastical discipline according to the judgment of the bishop.

> C. V. De eodem.
>
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I. c. 28.] Clerici uero, qui ad opus sanctum adesse contempserint, secundum arbitrium episcopi ecclesiasticam suscipiant disciplinam.

Distinction XCII

GRATIAN. Part I. But when they come to church, let them remember that one is to sing to God more with the heart than with the voice. Hence Jerome, in the epistle to the Ephesians:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Cum autem ad ecclesiam uenerint, corde magis quam uoce Deo cantandum meminerint. Unde Ieronimus in epistola ad Ephesios:

C. I. We ought to praise God with the heart, not with the voice.

"Singing and making melody in your hearts to the Lord." Let the young men hear these things; let those whose office in the church is to chant psalms hear them: one is to sing to God not with the voice but with the heart, nor are the throat and jaws to be smeared with medicine after the manner of tragedies, so that theatrical melodies and songs are heard in the church. GRATIAN. Deacons, however, are found to be excepted from the office of singing and chanting psalms, lest, while they devote themselves to the modulation of the voice, they neglect the ministries of the altar. Hence Gregory, [book IV, epistle 44, and book XII after the end of the epistles, in a Council held by him]:

> C. I. Corde, non uoce Deum laudare debemus.
> "Cantantes et psallentes in cordibus uestris Domino." Audiant hec adolescentuli, audiant hi, quibus in ecclesia est psallendi offitium: Deo non uoce, sed corde cantandum, nec in tragediarum modum guttur et fauces medicamine liniendae sunt, ut in ecclesia teatrales moduli audiantur et cantica. Gratian. Ab offitio autem cantandi et psallendi diaconi inueniuntur excepti, ne, dum uocis modulationi student altaris ministeria negligant. Unde Gregorius: [lib. IV. epist. 44. et I. XII. post finem epistolarum, in Concilio ab ipso habito]

C. II. Let deacons not usurp the office of singing for themselves.

In the holy Roman Church there arose some time ago a custom exceedingly deserving of censure, that certain singers are chosen for the ministry of the sacred altar and, constituted in the order of the diaconate, devote themselves to modulation of the voice, though it was fitting for them to be at leisure for the office of preaching and the pursuit of almsgiving. Hence it frequently happens that in the sacred ministry, while a pleasing voice is sought, a fitting life is neglected, and the singer who is a minister provokes God by his conduct while he delights the people with his voice. For this reason, by the present decree I establish that in this see the ministers of the sacred altar ought not to sing, but are to discharge only the office of the Gospel reading during the solemnities of the masses; but I decree that the psalms and the other readings are to be provided through subdeacons or, if necessity demands, through the lesser orders. But if anyone attempts to go against this decree of mine, let him be anathema. Part II. GRATIAN. It has been shown briefly from what things those to be ordained ought to be immune. But from whose hands they ought to receive their orders is readily evident. For a priest and all constituted below him ought to be ordained by bishops. Hence it reads in the Council of Pope Martin:

> C. II. Cantandi offitium sibi diacones non usurpent.
> In sancta ecclesia Romana dudum consuetudo est ualde reprehensibilis exorta, ut quidam ad sacri altaris ministerium cantores eligantur, et in diaconatus ordine constituti modulationi uocis inseruiant, quos ad predicationis offitium et elemosinarum studium uacare congruebat. Unde fit plerumque ut in sacro ministerio, dum blanda uox queritur, congrua uita negligatur, et cantor minister Deum moribus stimulet, cum populum uocibus delectet. Qua de re presenti decreto constituo, ut in sede hac sacri altaris ministri cantare non debeant, solumque euangelicae lectionis offitium inter missarum solempnia exsoluant; psalmos uero ac reliquas lectiones censeo per subdiaconos uel, si necessitas exigit, per minores ordines exhiberi. Si quis autem contra hoc decretum meum uenire temptauerit, anathema sit. II. Pars. Gratian. A quibus ordinandos oporteat esse inmunes, breuiter monstratum est. De quorum uero manibus suos ordines suscipere debeant, facile patet. Sacerdos enim et cuncti infra ipsum constituti ab episcopis debent ordinari. Unde in Concilio Martini Papae legitur:

C. III. Those who are not ordained by a bishop are not to chant psalms or read in the pulpit.

It is not permitted to chant psalms or read in the pulpit unless they are readers ordained by a bishop. GRATIAN. Concerning the bishops by whom, or in what places, they ought to be ordained, it was determined above. Part III. § 1. But now it is asked concerning those who, after being ordained, are not received by their own parish, or for some cause are unwilling to go to it, whether they can celebrate episcopal office in the parish of another. Concerning these it is found to have been established thus in the Council of Pope Martin:

> C. III. Qui ab episcopo non ordinantur, in pulpito non psallant uel legant.
> Non liceat in pulpito psallere aut legere, nisi qui ab episcopo ordinati sunt lectores. Gratian. De episcopis autem, a quibus uel in quibus locis ordinari debeant, supra diffinitum est. III. Pars. §. 1. Nunc autem queritur de his, qui ordinati a parrochia sua non recipiuntur, uel pro aliqua causa eas adire noluerint, an in alterius parrochia episcopale possint offitium celebrare? De his in Concilio Martini Papae sic statutum inuenitur:

C. IV. Let a bishop whom his parish does not receive exercise only the office of a priest.

If any ordained bishop, because of the contempt of the people or for some reason, and not through his own fault, does not go into the parish which had been given to him, it is fitting that he attain only the honor of the priesthood, so that he presume nothing concerning the property of the church into which he comes, but await what the holy council wills to judge concerning him.

> C. IV. Sacerdotis tantum offitium gerat episcopus, quem sua parrochia non recipit.
> Si quis ordinatus episcopus pro contemptione populi aut pro aliqua ratione, non pro sua culpa, in parrochiam, que ei fuerit data, non ierit, hunc oportet honorem sacerdotii tantummodo contingere, ita ut de rebus ecclesiae, in quam conuenit nichil presumat, sustineat autem, quid de eo sanctum concilium iudicare uoluerit.

C. V. Concerning an ordained bishop whom his parish does not receive.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, [c. 18]. If any bishop after being ordained does not go to the parish for which he was elected—not through his own fault, but because either the people prohibit him, or for another cause not perpetrated through his fault—let him be a participant both in honor and in ministry, provided that he prove troublesome in nothing to the property of the church where he is known to minister. It is also fitting that he observe whatever the synod of the full province decrees by its judgment.

> C. V. De episcopo ordinato, quem sua parrochia non recipit.
> Item ex Concilio Antioceno. [c. 18.] Si quis episcopus ordinatus ad parrochiam, cuius est electus, minime accesserit, non suo uitio, sed quod eum aut populus uetet, aut propter aliam causam, non tamen eius uitio perpetratam, hic et honoris sit et ministerii particeps, dummodo rebus ecclesiae, ubi ministrare cognoscitur, in nullo molestus existat. Quem etiam obseruare conuenit, quicquid sinodus perfecte prouinciae iudicando decreuerit.

C. VI. Those not received by their own parish are not to inflict trouble upon others.

Likewise from the Council of Ancyra, [c. 28]. If any bishops have been ordained and not received by the parish in which they had been designated, and should wish to occupy other parishes and inflict violence upon their prelates by stirring up seditions against them, it pleased the council that they be cast out. But if they wish to reside as priests in the order of the priesthood where they had been before, they are not to be cast out from their own dignity. If, however, they stir up seditions against the bishops established there, let the honor of the priesthood also be taken away from such persons, and let them be marked by condemnation.

> C. VI. A sua parrochia non recepti aliis molestiam non inferant.
> Item ex Concilio Ancirano. [c. 28.] Si qui episcopi ordinati sunt, nec recepti ab illa parrochia, in qua fuerant denominati, uoluerintque alias occupare parrochias, et uim presulibus earum inferre, seditiones aduersus eos excitando, eos abici placuit. Quod si uoluerint in presbiterii ordine, ubi prius fuerant, ut presbiteri residere, non abiciantur a propria dignitate. Si autem seditiones commouerint ibidem constitutis episcopis, presbiterii quoque honor talibus auferatur, fiantque dampnatione notabiles.

C. VII. Let a bishop who has neglected to go to the church committed to him be deprived of communion.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, [c. 17]. If any bishop receives the episcopate through the imposition of hands and neglects to undertake the ministry committed to him, and does not consent to go to the church committed to him, it is fitting that he be deprived of communion until, under compulsion, he undertakes the office, or certainly until the synod of the priests of the same province fully decrees something concerning him.

> C. VII. Communione priuetur episcopus, qui ecclesiam sibi commissam adire neglexerit.
> Item ex Concilio Antioceno. [c. 17.] Si quis episcopus per manus inpositionem episcopatum acceperit, et sibi commissum ministerium subire neglexerit, nec acquieuerit ire ad ecclesiam sibi commissam, hunc oportet communione priuari, donec susceperit coactus offitium, aut certe de eo aliquid integre decreuerit eiusdem prouinciae sinodus sacerdotum.

C. VIII. Without the counsel of a full order, let a bishop not approach a vacant church.

Likewise from the same, [c. 16]. If any bishop who is without a see rushes into a church which has no bishop, surreptitiously winning over the people, without the counsel of the full order, it is fitting that he be alien to the Church, even if the people whom he led astray desire him. But we call that council full and perfect in which the metropolitan bishop has participated. Part IV. GRATIAN. But what was commanded above, that clerics withdrawing themselves from vigils are to be excommunicated, is to be understood concerning those who, frequently admonished by the bishop, scorn to correct their negligence. Hence it reads in the Council of Pope Martin:

> C. VIII. Sine consilio integri ordinis uacantem ecclesiam episcopus non adeat.
> Item ex eodem. [c. 16.] Si quis episcopus uacans in ecclesiam non habentem episcopum, subripiens populos, sine consilio integri ordinis irruerit, etiamsi populus, quem seduxit, desideret illum, alienum eum ab ecclesia esse oportet. Integrum autem et perfectum concilium dicimus illud, cui metropolitanus episcopus interfuerit. IV. Pars. Gratian. Quod autem supra clerici se uigiliis subtrahentes excommunicari iubentur, de his intelligendum est, qui ab episcopo frequenter admoniti, negligentiam suam corrigere contempnunt. Unde in Concilio Martini Papae legitur:

C. IX. Let a cleric who, after being admonished by the bishop, neglects to be present at the morning or evening hours be excommunicated.

If any priest or deacon, or any cleric deputed to a church, is in any place in which there is a church and does not come to the church for the daily office of chanting psalms at the morning or evening hours, let him be deposed from the clergy, provided that, after being chastised, he has been unwilling to merit pardon from the bishop through satisfaction.

C. IX. Excommunicetur clericus, qui ab episcopo commonitus matutinis uel uespertinis horis adesse neglexerit.

Si quis presbiter aut diaconus uel quilibet clericus ecclesiae deputatus, si in quolibet loco fuerit, in quo ecclesia est, et ad cottidianum psallendi offitium matutinis uel uespertinis horis ad ecclesiam non conuenit, deponatur a clero, si tamen castigatus ueniam ab episcopo per satisfactionem noluerit promereri.

Distinction XCIII

GRATIAN. Part I. Inferiors owe obedience according to order to superiors. For such obedience is owed to the Supreme Pontiff by all that no one is permitted to communicate with a person toward whom, because of that person's acts, he has proved hostile, nor will one who deserts his chair be able to be in the Church. Hence blessed Peter, prince of the Apostles, addressing the people at the ordination of Clement, says among other things:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Obedientiam autem inferiores ex ordine superioribus debent. Summo enim Pontifici ea debetur ab omnibus obedientia, ut nulli liceat ei communicare, cui pro actibus suis ipse inimicus extiterit, nec in ecclesia esse poterit, qui eius cathedram deserit. Unde B. Petrus princeps apostolorum in ordinatione Clementis populum alloquens, inter cetera ait:

C. I. We ought not to communicate with one toward whom the Apostolic is hostile because of his depraved acts.

If this Clement is an enemy to anyone because of that person's acts, do not yourselves wait for him to tell you, "Do not be friends with that man," but you ought prudently to observe it, comply with his will without communication, and turn yourselves away from one whom you perceive to be opposed to him; and you are not even to speak with those with whom he does not speak, so that each person who is at fault, while he desires to have the friendship of you all, may hasten more quickly to be reconciled to the one who presides over all, and through this may return to salvation when he begins to obey the admonitions of the presider. But if anyone is a friend to those with whom he does not speak, he himself is one of those who wish to destroy the Church of God; and although he may seem to be with you in body, in mind and spirit he is against you. And this enemy is much more wicked than those who are outside and manifestly are enemies; for through the appearance of friendship he conducts hostile things and scatters and devastates the Church. And therefore, admonishing you by apostolic institutions of this kind, we instruct you so that, when your charity has been rendered more certain, it may strive hereafter to act more solicitously and cautiously, lest perverse and faithless men have the ability to harm the faithful and benevolent.

C. I. Cui pro actibus prauis Apostolicus inimicatur, communicare non debemus.

Si inimicus est iste Clemens alicui pro actibus suis, et uos nolite expectare, ut ipse uobis dicat: cum illo nolite amici esse, sed prudenter obseruare debetis, et uoluntati eius absque communicatione obsecundare, et auertere uos ab eo, cui ipsum sentitis aduersum; sed nec loqui his, quibus ipse non loquitur, ut unusquisque, qui in culpa est, dum cupit omnium uestrum amicicias habere, festinet cicius reconciliari ei, qui omnibus preest, et per hoc redeat ad salutem, cum obedire ceperit monitis presidentis. Si uero quis amicus fuerit his, quibus ipse non loquitur, unus est ipse ex illis, qui exterminare ecclesiam Dei uolunt, et cum corpore uobiscum esse uideatur, mente et animo contra uos est. Et est multo nequior hostis hic, quam illi, qui foris sunt, et euidenter sunt inimici; hic enim per amiciciarum speciem que inimica sunt gerit, et ecclesiam dispergit et uastat. Ideoque huiusmodi apostolicis institutis uos monentes instruimus, ut effecta certior karitas uestra sollicitius deinceps agere studeat et cautius, ne peruersi et infideles homines ledendi fideles et beniuolos habeant facultatem.

C. II. One whom the Roman Church repels ought to be received by no one.

Likewise Gregory, [book V, epistle 26]. I was greatly astonished that among so great a clergy and people of the church of Salona scarcely two from the sacred orders were found—namely my brother and fellow bishop Paulinus and my most beloved son Honoratus, archdeacon of the same church—who would by no means consent to communicate with Maximus as he seized the priesthood, and who recognized that they were Christians. For you ought, most beloved sons, to have considered your orders and to have recognized as repelled the one whom the apostolic see repelled, so that he might first, if he could, be cleansed of the charges brought against him, and then your affection might communicate with him, lest it become a participant in his obligation.

C. II. A nullo debet suscipi, quem Romana repellit ecclesia.

Item Gregorius. [I. V. epist. 26.] Miratus ualde sum, quia in tanto Salonitanae ecclesiae clero uel populo uix duo ex sacris ordinibus inuenti sunt, frater scilicet et coepiscopus meus Paulinus, et dilectissimus filius meus Honoratus archidiaconus eiusdem ecclesiae, qui communicare Maximo sacerdotium rapienti minime consentirent, et se Christianos esse cognoscerent. Debuistis enim, karissimi filii, pensare ordines uestros, et quem sedes apostolica repellebat repulsum cognoscere, ut prius, si posset, ab illatis criminibus mundaretur, et tunc ei uestra dilectio communicaret, ne particeps obligationis existeret.

C. III. One who does not follow the chair of Peter is not in the Church.

Likewise Cyprian, [On the Unity of the Church]. Let one who deserts the chair of Peter, upon which the Church was founded, not trust that he is in the Church. GRATIAN. Bishops who are subject to apostolic ordination also owe this reverence: that every year they present themselves at the thresholds of the Apostles. Hence Popes Anacletus and Zacharias:

C. III. Non est in ecclesia, qui cathedram Petri non sequitur.

Item Ciprianus. [de unitate ecclesiae] Qui cathedram Petri, super quam ecclesia fundata est, deserit, in ecclesia se esse non confidat. Gratian. Episcopi uero, qui apostolicae ordinationi subiacent, etiam hanc reuerentiam debent, ut singulis annis apostolorum liminibus sese representent. Unde Anacletus et Zacharias Papa:

C. IV. Let bishops who are subject to apostolic ordination visit the thresholds of the Apostles every year.

According to the institutions of the holy Fathers and canons, let all bishops who are subject to the ordination of this apostolic see and who are nearby present themselves annually, around the Ides of May, at the thresholds of the holy princes of the Apostles Peter and Paul, with every excuse set aside. But let those who are far away fulfill this according to their written undertaking. But one who has proved a contemner of this constitution, unless he has been detained by illness, is to know that he is subject to canonical sentences. Part II. GRATIAN. But the remaining lesser persons in the Church ought always to be subject to the greater, as it reads in the Synod of Saint Sylvester, [c. VII]:

C. IV. Singulis annis apostolorum limina uisitent episcopi, qui apostolicae ordinationi subiacent.

Iuxta sanctorum Patrum et canonum instituta episcopi omnes, qui huius apostolicae sedis ordinationi subiacent, qui propinqui sunt, annue circa idus magi sanctorum principum apostolorum Petri et Pauli liminibus presententur omni occasione seposita. Qui uero de longinquo, iuxta cyrographum suum inpleant. Qui autem constitutionis huius contemptor extiterit, preterquam si egritudine fuerit detentus, sciat se canonicis subiacere sententiis. II. Pars. Gratian. Reliqui uero in ecclesia minores semper debent maioribus subesse, sicut in Sinodo S. Siluestri [c. VII.] legitur:

C. V. Let lesser persons display obedience to greater persons.

From the subdeacon down to the readers, let all be subject to the cardinal deacon, a most reverend man, displaying honor to him in the church. Moreover, in every place, whether in public or in the bosom of the church, let the priest display service to the pontiff, the deacon to the priest, the subdeacon to the deacon, the acolyte to the subdeacon, the exorcist to the acolyte, the reader to the exorcist, the porter to the reader, the abbot to the porter, and the monk to the abbot.

C. V. Maioribus minores obedientiam exhibeant.

A subdiacono usque ad lectores omnes subditi sint diacono cardinali uiro reuerentissimo, in ecclesia representantes ei honorem. Porro pontifici presbiter, presbitero diaconus, diacono subdiaconus, subdiacono acolithus, acolitho exorcista, exorcistae lector, lectori hostiarius, hostiario abbas, abbati monachus in omni loco representet obsequium, siue in publico, siue in gremio ecclesiae.

C. VI. What the office of deacons is.

Likewise from the [First] Epistle of Pope Clement, [to James, brother of the Lord]. Let the deacons of the Church be like the eyes of the bishop, wandering about and looking all around with modesty upon the acts of the whole Church, and examining more diligently whether they see anyone approaching a precipice and being near to sin, so that they may report these things to the bishop. And below: § 1. Let it be the care of the deacons to report to the bishop those things which pertain to the worship of the Church and its discipline.

C. VI. Quid sit diaconorum offitium.

Item ex epistola [I.] Clementis Papae. [ad Iacobum fratrem Domini] Diaconi ecclesiae sint tanquam oculi episcopi, oberrantes et circumlustrantes cum uerecundia actus totius ecclesiae, et perscrutantes diligentius, si quem uideant uicinum fieri precipicio et proximum esse peccato, ut referant hec ad episcopum. Et infra: §. 1. Episcopo suggerere que ad cultum ecclesiae et disciplinam eius pertinent, diaconibus cura sit.

[C. VII.]

Likewise in the same. But blessed Peter said that priests were the salt of the earth and the light of the world, teaching them to glorify God the Father in the splendor of their works, concerning whom the Lord says: “Blessed are you when men curse you,” and the rest; and again: “You are the salt of the earth.”

[C. VII.]

Item in eadem. Sacerdotes uero dicebat B. Petrus sal terrae et mundi lumen docens, eos in splendore operum glorificare patrem Deum, de quibus Dominus ait: "Beati estis, cum maledixerint uobis homines" et reliqua, et iterum: "Vos estis sal terrae."

C. VIII. Those who are not governed by episcopal discipline are not to be held as clerics.

Likewise from the Council of Paris. By no reason are those to be held as clerics or priests who are governed under the discipline and foresight of no bishop. Ancient custom called such persons acephalous, that is, without a head.

> C. VIII. Non sunt habendi clerici, qui episcopali non gubernantur prouidentia.
>
> Item ex Concilio Parisiensi. Nulla ratione clerici aut sacerdotes habendi sunt, qui sub nullius episcopi disciplina et prouidentia gubernantur. Tales enim acephalos, id est sine capite, prisca consuetudo nuncupauit.

[C. IX.]

Likewise, [from the Third Epistle of Clement]. Those who do not obey their bishops undoubtedly exist as guilty and reprobate. Moreover, those who gladly obey their teachers, who are rightly understood to be bishops, obtain from God the gift of the highest reward.

> [C. IX.]
>
> Item. [ex epist. III. Clementis] Qui suis episcopis non obediunt, indubitanter rei et reprobi existunt. Porro ipsi a Deo donum summi muneris consecuntur, qui suis doctoribus, qui recte episcopi intelliguntur, libenter obediunt.

C. X. Those who do not obey their bishop are scandalized against God.

Likewise Anacletus, [epistle I]. Without doubt, he is scandalized against God who does not teach rightly, and he who scandalizes his bishop or priest.

> C. X. In Deum scandalizantur, qui suo non obediunt episcopo.
>
> Item Anacletus. [epist. I.] Ille proculdubio scandalizatur in Deum, qui recte non docet, et qui eius scandalizat episcopum uel sacerdotem.

C. XI. There ought to be seven deacons in each city.

Likewise Evaristus to all the Bishops. Deacons, who are seen to be, as it were, the eyes of the bishop, ought to be seven in each city. They are to guard the bishop as he preaches, lest he be harassed in any way by plotters, or be harmed by his own people, or the divine words be polluted or despised through detraction or plotting; but let the truth be fragrant with spiritual fervor, and let the peace preached by the lips accord with the will of the mind.

> C. XI. Septem debent esse diaconi in unaquaque ciuitate.
> Item Euaristus omnibus Episcopis. Diaconi (qui quasi oculi uidentur esse episcopi) septem debent esse in unaquaque ciuitate, qui custodiant episcopum predicantem, ne ipse ab insidiatoribus quoquo modo infestetur, aut ledatur a suis, aut uerba diuina detrahendo aut insidiando polluantur uel despiciantur: sed ueritas spirituali redoleat feruore; pax predicata labiis cum uoluntate animi concordet.

C. XII. On the same.

Likewise from the Council of Neocaesarea, [c. 14]. According to the rule there ought to be seven deacons, although the city be not great. But the authority of the rule is this: that the book of the Acts of the Apostles also indicates the same. Part III. GRATIAN. As is evident from the preceding authorities, deacons owe obedience to priests, just as priests also do to bishops. But deacons growing proud sought to be equated with priests, or rather to be preferred to them. Against their insolence the authorities of many issued forth, repressing their haughtiness and decreeing that they display fitting obedience to priests. Hence Pope Gelasius says, [in the epistle to the Bishops throughout Lucania, cc. 9 and 10]:

C. XII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Neocesariensi. [c. 14.] Diaconi septem debent esse secundum regulam, quamuis non magna sit ciuitas. Regulae autem auctoritas ista est, quod et liber actuum apostolorum idem insinuat. III. Pars. Gratian. Ut ex premissis auctoritatibus apparet, diaconi debent obedientiam presbiteris, sicut et presbiteri episcopis. Sed diaconi superbientes sacerdotibus exequari, uel potius preferri querebant, contra quorum insolentiam multorum auctoritates manauerunt, eorum supercilium reprimentes, atque ut sacerdotibus condignam obedientiam exhibeant decernentes. Unde Gelasius Papa [in epist. ad Episcopos per Lucaniam, c. 9. et 10.] ait:

C. XIII. Let deacons claim for themselves none of those things which have been decreed for the first orders.

We establish that deacons observe their proper measure, nor do we permit them to attempt anything beyond the tenor assigned by the paternal canons, or to apply to their own ministry any of those things which antiquity properly decreed for the first orders. Let them not dare to baptize without a bishop or priest, unless perhaps, when the aforesaid orders are situated rather far away, extreme necessity compels them. This is also frequently conceded to Christian laymen to do. § 1. Let them not have the right to exercise the prerogative of the sacred body in the sight of a bishop or priest, unless these are absent.

C. XIII. Nichil eorum, que sunt decreta primis ordinibus, uendicent sibi diaconi.

Diaconos propriam constituimus obseruare mensuram, nec ultra tenorem paternis canonibus deputatum quidpiam temptare permittimus, et nichil eorum suo ministerio penitus applicare, que primis ordinibus proprie decreuit antiquitas. Absque episcopo uel presbitero baptizare non audeant, nisi predictis ordinibus fortassis longius constitutis necessitas extrema conpellat. Quod etiam laicis Christianis facere plerumque conceditur. §. 1. Sacri corporis prerogationem sub conspectu episcopi seu presbiteri (nisi his absentibus) ius non habeant exercendi.

C. XIV. Let deacons recognize themselves to be inferior to priests.

Likewise in the Council of Nicaea, [c. 14, or 18]. It has come to the holy council that in certain places and cities deacons present the sacraments to priests. Neither rule nor custom has handed down that those who do not have the power of offering the sacrifice should present the body of Christ to those who offer it. But this also became known: that certain deacons even receive the sacraments before the bishops. Therefore let all these things be cut off, and let deacons remain within their measure, knowing that they are indeed the ministers of bishops, but are to be held inferior to priests. Therefore, in order after the priests, let them receive the grace of holy communion, with either the bishop or priest presenting it to them. Nor is a deacon permitted to sit in the midst of priests, because, if this occurs, it is proved to exist outside the rule. But if anyone after these determinations is unwilling to obey, he ought to cease from ministry.

C. XIV. Inferiores presbiteris se diaconi cognoscant.

Item in Niceno Concilio. [c. 14. seu 18.] Peruenit ad sanctum concilium, quod in locis quibusdam et ciuitatibus presbiteris sacramenta diaconi porrigant. Hoc neque regula, neque consuetudo tradidit, ut hi, qui offerendi sacrificii non habent potestatem, his, qui offerunt, corpus Christi porrigant. Sed et illud innotuit, quod quidam diacones etiam ante episcopos sacramenta sumant. Hec ergo omnia amputentur, et in sua diaconi mensura permaneant, scientes, quod episcoporum quidem ministri sunt, inferiores autem presbiteris habeantur. Per ordinem ergo post presbiteros gratiam sacrae communionis accipiant, aut episcopo, aut presbitero porrigente eis. Sed nec sedere in medio presbiterorum diacono liceat, quia si hoc fiat, preter regulam probatur existere. Si quis autem post has diffinitiones obedire noluerit, a ministerio cessare debebit.

C. XV. Let a deacon display honor to a priest, and let him himself be honored by inferiors.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea, [c. 20]. A deacon ought not to sit in the presence of a priest, but let him sit at the priest's command. Likewise, however, let the deacon have honor from those who follow, that is, from subdeacons and from all clerics.

C. XV. Diaconus honorem exhibeat presbitero, et ipse ab inferioribus honoretur

Item ex Concilio Laodicensi. [c. 20] Non oportet diaconum coram presbitero sedere, sed iussione presbiteri sedeat. Similiter autem diaconus honorem habeat a sequentibus, id est a subdiaconibus et ab omnibus clericis.

C. XVI. A deacon is not permitted to bless the chalice and give the bread.

Likewise from the same, [c. 25]. Deacons ought not to give the bread or bless the chalice.

C. XVI. Calicem benedicere et panem dare diacono non licet.

Item ex eodem. [c. 25.] Non oportet diacones panem dare, nec calicem benedicere.

C. XVII. Let deacons minister to priests just as they do to bishops.

Likewise from the [Fourth] Council of Carthage, in which Pope Zosimus participated through vicars, [c. 37]. Let deacons recognize that they are the ministers of the priest just as of the bishop.

[C. XVIII.] Likewise in the same, [c. 38]. In the presence of a priest, let a deacon, if necessity compels, distribute the Eucharist of the body of Christ to the people when commanded.

C. XVII. Sicut episcopis, ita et presbiteris diaconi ministrent.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi [IV.] cui Papa Zosimus interfuit per uicarios. [c. 37.] Diaconi ita se presbiteri, sicut episcopi ministros esse cognoscant.

[C. XVIII.] Item in eodem. [c. 38.] Presente presbitero diaconus eucharistiam corporis Christi populo, si necessitas cogit, iussus eroget.

[C. XIX.]

Likewise in the same, [cc. 39, 40, and 41]. Let a deacon sit at the command of a priest in any place. Likewise, in an assembly of priests let a deacon speak when questioned. But let him use an alb only at the time of the oblation and reading.

[C. XIX.]

Item in eodem. [c. 39. 40. et 41.] Diaconus sedeat iubente presbitero quolibet loco. Item diaconus in conuentu presbiterorum interrogatus loquatur. Alba uero tantum tempore oblationis et lectionis utatur.

C. XX. Let deacons recognize priests to be superior to themselves.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 39]. Certain deacons erupt into such pride that they set themselves before priests and presume to stand first in the first choir, with the priests placed in the second choir. Therefore, so that they may acknowledge priests to be higher than themselves, let both these and those stand in both choirs. Part IV. GRATIAN. Deacons are not permitted to be shod with compagi without the permission of the Apostolic, just as any clerics are not conceded the use of mappulae without his authority. Hence Gregory to John, Bishop of Syracuse, [book VII, epistle 28, indiction I]:

C. XX. Diacones presbiteros se superiores cognoscant.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano IV. [c. 39.] Nonnulli diacones in tantam erumpunt superbiam, ut se presbiteris anteponant, atque in primo choro ipsi priores stare presumant, presbiteris in secundo choro constitutis. Ergo, ut sublimiores se presbiteros agnoscant, tam hii quam illi in utroque consistant. IV. Pars. Gratian. Compagis uero calciari absque apostolici licentia diaconibus non permittitur, sicut nec mapulis uti absque eiusdem auctoritate quibuslibet clericis conceditur. Unde Gregorius Iohanni Episcopo Siracusano: [lib. VII. epist. 28. indict. I.]

C. XXI. Without apostolic permission let deacons by no means presume to use compagi.

It has come to us that a deacon of the church of Catania had presumed to proceed shod with compagi. You recall well that until now this has been permitted to no one throughout the whole of Sicily except only the deacons of the church of Messina, to whom it is not doubted that this was once conceded by our predecessors. Therefore, because the daring of so great a temerity is not to be regarded lightly, let your fraternity inquire into this with all subtlety, so that it may be made known to us precisely whether he presumed this through himself or by someone's authority. For if we negligently omit those things which are evilly usurped, we open the way of transgression to others.

C. XXI. Absque apostolica licentia compagis diacones uti minime presumant.

Peruenit ad nos, quod diaconus ecclesiae Catenensis calciatus compagis procedere presumpsisset, quod quia hactenus nulli per totam Siciliam licuit, nisi solis tantummodo diaconibus Messanensis ecclesiae, quibus olim a predecessoribus nostris non dubitatur esse concessum, bene recolitis. Quia ergo tantae temeritatis ausus leuiter non est attendendus, cum omni hoc fraternitas uestra subtilitate perquirat, ut an per se, uel alicuius hoc auctoritate presumpserit, nobis subtiliter innotescat. Nam si negligenter ea, que male usurpantur, omittimus, excessus uiam aliis aperimus.

C. XXII. Clerics ought not to use mappulae without the permission of the Apostolic.

The same to John, Bishop of Ravenna, [book II, epistle 54, near the end]. But that which you wrote concerning the use of mappulae by your clergy has been vigorously opposed by our clerics. They say that this was never conceded to any other church whatsoever, that the clerics of Ravenna have not presumed any such thing either there or in the city of Rome with their knowledge, and that, if it had been attempted, no prejudice is generated for them from a furtive usurpation. Rather, even if this has been presumed in any church, they assert that what is presumed not by concession of the Roman Pontiff but by surreption alone is to be amended.

> C. XXII. Mapulis clerici sine apostolici licentia uti non debent.
> Idem Iohanni Rauennati Episcopo. [lib. II. epist. 54. circa finem] Illud autem, quod pro utendis a clero uestro mapulis scripsistis, a clericis nostris est fortiter obuiatum, dicentibus, nulli hoc umquam alii cuilibet concessum fuisse ecclesiae, nec Rauennates clericos uel illic, uel in Romana ciuitate tale aliquid cum sua conscientia presumpsisse, nec, si temptatum esset, ex furtiua usurpatione sibi preiudicium generari, sed etiam si in qualibet ecclesia hoc presumptum fuerit, asserunt emendandum, quod non concessione Romani Pontificis, sed sola subreptione presumitur.

C. XXIII. Just as in ministry, so in administration, let a bishop not live without deacons.

Likewise Jerome to Rusticus, Bishop of Narbonne. Part V. The deacons are those whom we read in the Apocalypse to be the seven angels of the churches; they are the seven golden lampstands; they are the voices of the thunders. § 1. Illustrious in the exercise of virtues, endowed with humility, peaceful, humble, evangelizing peace, announcing good things, cutting off dissensions, quarrels, and scandals, teaching, speaking with God alone, thinking nothing at all of the world in the temple, saying to father and mother, "We do not know you," and not acknowledging their own sons. § 2. Without these a priest has the name but does not have the office. This one is called the minister of God, because it is written: "Greater is he who ministers than he to whom ministry is rendered." And just as there is ministration in the priest, so in the minister there is administration of the sacrament. § 3. Even priests, because of presumption, are not permitted to lift the chalice from the table of the Lord unless it has been handed to them by the deacons. § 4. For our almighty God so disposed all things that one who believed himself greater would be lesser, and one who seemed lesser would prove to be greater. Finally, ponder for yourself how true this is. Levites prepare the table of the Lord; Levites stand by priests when they bless the sacraments; Levites pray before priests, so that, even if a distinction of places is believed to exist in the world, at the altar of God bishops who are proud may see deacons placed before them. If they love humility, let the deacons also recognize themselves to be greater in that they are humble. Then at last, that we may have ears directed toward God, the deacon cries out; he preaches, he exhorts, he admonishes while the priests stand by. Do not regard lightly or negligently this voice which speaks and announces peace. It suffices that so much was conceded to this order by the Lord, so that the priest may not seem to do and fulfill everything alone in the temple of God. And below: § 5. But now, from the time when avarice grew in the churches as in the Roman Empire, the law perished from the priest and vision from the prophet. Each one, through the power of the episcopal name which they unlawfully claimed for themselves without the Church, directs to his own uses everything which belongs to the Levites; and they claim for themselves not only that which was assigned, but take everything away from everyone. The unhappy clergy beg in the streets and, bound to servile work, ask public alms from anyone whatsoever. They are all the more despised by everyone because, wretchedly desolated, they are believed justly to have come to this disgrace. § 6. The bishop alone broods over the gifts; he alone uses the ministry; he alone claims all things for himself; he alone invades the shares of others; he alone kills everyone. § 7. Hence, because of the avarice of priests, hatreds often arise; hence bishops are accused by clerics; hence the beginning of litigation, hence the cause of detraction, hence the origin of crime. For if everyone in this visible world is commanded to possess something in such a way that he is content with his own possession alone and does not invade the property of others, does not take the field of a poor man, nor a vineyard, nor any beast of burden, nor servants, nor fruit, how much more ought one who presides over the Church of God so to preserve justice in all things that he claim for himself what he knows to be of his own right, not seize another's things, not touch another's things, make himself equal to the others, and, just as he does not live without them in ministry, so not live without them in administration? § 8. Certainly, as you yourself know, one who visibly invades another's right in this world is accused by the poor man and condemned by the judge. Thus in the Church of God, when anyone loses his stipends, he cries to the Lord and is heard by Christ, nor is the sentence of vengeance deferred if all things are not settled. For the moderation and piety of God seek only our return and desire that we be saved by his long goodness. If we are not converted, if we are stiff-necked, if we unlawfully persist in sins until death, God does not have mercy upon those who sin continually. Part VI. GRATIAN. In this chapter the avarice of priests is reproved, while the dignity or office of deacons is commended. But because, as was said above, deacons growing insolent thought that they should even be preferred to priests, Jerome writes against their haughtiness to the priest Evangelus, [epistle LXXXV]:

C. XXIII. Sicut in ministerio, ita in dispensatione sine diaconibus episcopus non uiuat.

Item Ieronimus ad Rusticum Narbonensem episcopum. V. Pars. Diaconi sunt, quos in Apocalipsi legimus, septem angeli ecclesiarum, hi sunt septem candelabra aurea, hi sunt uoces tonitruorum. §. 1. Virtutum operatione preclari, humilitate prediti, quieti, humiles, euangelizantes pacem, annunciantes bona, dissensiones et rixas et scandala resecantes, docentes, soli Deo conloquentes, in templo nichil de mundo penitus cogitantes, dicentes patri et matri: "non nouimus uos," et filios suos non agnoscentes. §. 2. Sine his sacerdos nomen habet offitium non habet. Hic minister Dei dicitur, quia scriptum est: "Maior est, qui ministrat, quam cui ministratur." Et sicut in sacerdote ministratio, ita in ministro dispensatio sacramenti est. §. 3. Sacerdotibus etiam propter presumptionem non licet de mensa Domini tollere calicem, nisi eis traditus fuerit a diaconibus. §. 4. Ita enim Deus noster omnipotens uniuersa disposuit, ut qui maiorem se crediderit minor esset, et qui uideretur minor maior existeret. Denique quam hoc uerum sit ipse perpende. Leuitae conponunt mensam Domini, Leuitae sacerdotibus, cum sacramenta benedicunt, assistunt, Leuitae ante sacerdotes orant, ut et si distinctio locorum credatur in mundo, etiam in altari Dei uideant sibi episcopi, qui superbi sunt, diacones anteponi. Si humilitatem diligunt et diaconi maiores se esse in eo, quod sunt humiles, recognoscant. Tunc demum, ut aures habeamus ad Deum, diaconus clamat, ipse predicat, ipse hortatur, ipse commonet astantibus sacerdotibus, nec leuiter hanc uocem, que loquitur et pacem annunciat, aut negligenter aspicias. Sufficit huic tantum ordini per Dominum concessum fuisse, ut non solum sacerdos in templo Dei totum agere et inplere uideatur. Et infra: §. 5. Nunc autem ex quo in ecclesiis, sicut in Romano inperio, creuit auaritia, periit lex a sacerdote et uisio de propheta; singuli quique per potentiam episcopalis nominis, quam sibi ipsi illicite absque ecclesia uendicarunt, totum, quod Leuitarum est, in suos usus redigunt, nec hoc solum, quod asscriptum est, sibi uendicant, sed cunctis auferunt uniuersa. Mendicat infelix in plateis clerus, et seruili operi mancipatus publicam de quolibet poscit elemosinam. Qui ex eo magis despicitur a cunctis, quo misere desolatus iuste putatur ad hanc ignominiam deuenisse. §. 6. Solus episcopus incubat donis, solus utitur ministerio, solus uniuersa sibi uendicat, solus partes inuadit alienas, solus occidit uniuersos. §. 7. Hinc propter auaritiam sacerdotum odia sepe consurgunt, hinc episcopi accusantur a clericis, hinc principium litis, hinc detractionis causa, hinc origo fit criminis. Etenim si unusquisque ita in hoc mundo uisibili aliquid possidere iubetur, ut sua tantum sit possessione contentus, ac res non inuadat alienas, non agrum pauperis tollat non uineam, non subuectorium aliquod, non famulos, non fructum; quanto magis qui ecclesiae Dei preest debet ita in omnibus seruare iusticiam, ut hoc sibi uendicet, quod sui iuris esse cognoscit, aliena non rapiat, aliena non tangat equalem ceteris se faciat, et sicut sine his in ministerio non uiuit, ita in dispensatione non uiuat? §. 8. Certe, ut ipse nosti, qui uisibiliter in hoc mundo ius inuadit alienum, accusatur a paupere, dampnatur a iudice, ita in ecclesia Dei, cum quisque stipendia perdit, clamat ad Dominum exauditur a Christo, nec differtur ultionis sententia, si non sedantur uniuersa. Moderatio enim Dei ac pietas solum nostrum reditum querit, ac nos cupit longa sua bonitate saluari. Si non conuertimur, si duri colli sumus, si in peccatis usque ad mortem illicite perduramus, assidue peccantium, non miseretur Deus. VI. Pars. Gratian. Hoc capitulo sacerdotum auaricia reprehenditur, diaconorum dignitas siue offitium commendatur. Sed quia (ut supra dictum est) diaconi insolescentes etiam presbiteris se preferendos arbitrati sunt, contra illorum supercilium scribit Ieronimus ad Euangelum presbiterum: [epist. LXXXV.]

C. XXIV. Deacons ought to be subject to priests.

We read in Isaiah: "The foolish man speaks foolish things." I hear that someone has erupted into such madness that he placed deacons before priests, that is, bishops. For since the Apostle clearly teaches that those who are bishops are the same as priests, what ails the minister of tables and widows that, swollen with pride, he raises himself above those by whose prayers the body and blood of Christ are confected? Do you seek authority? Hear the testimony: "Paul and Timothy, servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints who are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons." Do you wish another example also? In the Acts of the Apostles Paul speaks thus to the priests of one church: "Take heed to yourselves and to the whole flock, in which the Holy Spirit has placed you as bishops to govern the Church of God, which he acquired by his blood." And lest anyone contentiously maintain that there were several bishops in one church, let him hear another testimony in which it is most manifestly declared and proved that the bishop and priest are the same: "For this reason I left you in Crete, that you might correct the things that were lacking and appoint priests throughout the cities, as I commanded you: if anyone is without crime, the husband of one wife, having faithful children, not under accusation of luxury or insubordinate. For a bishop must be without crime, as a steward of God." And to Timothy: "Do not neglect the grace which was given to you through prophecy and through the imposition of the hands of the presbyterate." Peter also says in his first epistle: "I, a fellow priest and witness of the sufferings of Christ, and a participant in the future glory which is to be revealed, beseech the priests who are among you: govern the flock of Christ and exercise oversight, not from necessity but willingly according to God." This indeed is said more significantly in Greek, episkopountes, whence the name of bishop is also drawn. Do the testimonies of so many great men seem small to you? Let the trumpet of the Gospel sound, the son of thunder whom Jesus loved exceedingly, who drank the streams of doctrines from the breast of the Savior: "The priest to the elect lady and her children, whom I love in truth." And in another epistle: "The priest to the most beloved Gaius, whom I love in truth." § 1. But the fact that afterward one was elected to be set over the others was done as a remedy for schism, lest each person, drawing the Church of Christ to himself, rupture it. For even at Alexandria, from Mark the Evangelist down to the bishops Heraclas and Dionysius, the priests always elected one from among themselves and placed him in a higher grade, whom they called bishop, just as if an army were to make an emperor. But let the deacons choose from among themselves one whom they know to be industrious and call him archdeacon. For what, except ordination, does a bishop do which a priest does not do? Nor is the church of the city of Rome to be judged one thing and that of the whole world another. Both Gaul and Britain and Africa and Persia and the East and India and all the barbarian nations adore one Christ and observe one rule of truth. If authority is sought, the world is greater than the city. Wherever a bishop may be, whether at Rome, or at Gubbio, or at Constantinople, or at Reggio, or at Alexandria, or at Tanis, he is of the same merit and also of the same priesthood. The power of riches and the humility of poverty make no bishop either higher or lower; moreover, all are successors of the Apostles. § 2. But you say: How at Rome is a priest ordained upon the testimony of a deacon? Why do you bring forward to me the custom of one city? Why do you claim as laws of the Church the small number from which haughtiness arose? Everything that is rare is sought more. Among the Indians, pennyroyal is more precious than pepper. Scarcity makes deacons honorable; a multitude makes priests contemptible. Moreover, even in the church at Rome priests sit and deacons stand, although, as vices gradually multiply, in the bishop's absence we see deacons sitting among priests and giving blessings in the presence of priests at domestic banquets. Let those who do this learn that they do not act rightly; let them hear the Apostles: "It is not fitting that, leaving the word of God, we minister to tables." Let deacons know why they were established. Let them read the Acts of the Apostles; let them remember their condition. Priest and bishop: the one is a name of age, the other of dignity. Hence to Titus and Timothy there is speech concerning the ordination of a bishop and a deacon; concerning priests there is complete silence, because they are contained in the bishop and priest. One who is promoted is promoted from the lesser to the greater. Therefore either let a deacon be ordained from a priest, so that he may be proved greater than the priest, into which he grows from being lesser; or, if a priest is ordained from a deacon, let him know that he is greater than laymen but lesser than priests.

C. XXIV. Diacones presbiteris debent subesse.

Legimus in Ysaia: "Fatuus fatua loquitur." Audio quendam in tantam erupisse uecordiam, ut diaconos presbiteris id est episcopis anteferret. Nam cum Apostolus perspicue doceat, eosdem esse episcopos, quos presbiteros, quid patitur mensarum et uiduarum minister, ut supra eos se tumidus efferat, ad quorum preces Christi corpus sanguisque conficitur? Queris auctoritatem? Audi testimonium: "Paulus et Timotheus serui Iesu Christi omnibus sanctis, qui sunt Philippis, cum episcopis et diaconibus." Vis et aliud exemplum? In Actibus apostolorum ad unius ecclesiae sacerdotes ita Paulus loquitur: "Attendite uobis, et cuncto gregi, in quo uos: Spiritus sanctus posuit episcopos, ut regatis ecclesiam Dei quam adquisiuit sanguine suo." Ac ne quis contentiose in una ecclesia plures episcopos fuisse contendat, audiat aliud testimonium, in quo manifestissime declaratur uel conprobatur, eundem esse episcopum atque presbiterum: "Propter hoc reliqui te Cretae, ut que deerant corrigeres, et constitueres presbiteros per ciuitates, sicut ego tibi mandaui: si quis est sine crimine, unius uxoris uir, filios habens fideles, non in accusatione luxuriae, aut non subditos. Oportet enim episcopum: sine crimine esse, quasi Dei dispensatorem." Et ad Timotheum: "Noli negligere gratiam, que tibi data est per prophetiam et per inpositionem manuum presbiterii." Sed et Petrus in prima epistola: "Presbiteros, qui in uobis sunt, precor compresbiter, et testis passionum Christi, et futurae gloriae, que reuelanda est, particeps, regite gregem Christi, et inspicite non ex necessitate, sed uoluntarie iuxta Deum." Quod quidem grece significantius dicitur EPISCOPOUNTES unde et nomen episcopi tractum est. Parua tibi uidentur tantorum uirorum testimonia? Clangat tuba euangelica, filius tonitrui, quem Iesus amauit plurimum, qui de pectore saluatoris doctrinarum fluenta potauit: "Presbiter, Electae dominae, et filiis eius, quos ego diligo in ueritate." Et in alia epistola: "Presbiter Gaio karissimo, quem ego in ueritate diligo." §. 1. Quod autem postea unus electus est, qui ceteris preponeretur, in scismatis remedium factum est, ne unusquisque ad se trahens Christi ecclesiam rumperet. Nam et Alexandriae a Marco euangelista usque ad Eraclam et Dionisium episcopos, presbiteri ex se semper unum eligebant et in excelsiori gradu collocabant, quem episcopum nominabant, quomodo si exercitus inperatorem faciat. Diaconi autem eligant de se quem industrem nouerint, et archidiaconum nuncupent. Quid enim facit excepta ordinatione episcopus, quod non facit presbiter? Nec altera Romanae urbis ecclesia, altera totius orbis existimanda est: et Galliae, et Brittanniae, et Affrica, et Persis, et oriens et India, et omnes barbarae nationes unum Christum adorant, unam obseruant regulam ueritatis. Si auctoritas queritur, orbis maior est urbe. Ubicumque fuerit episcopus, siue Romae, siue Eugubio, siue Constantinopolim siue Regio, siue Alexandrinae, siue Thanis, eiusdem est meriti, eiusdem et sacerdotii. Potentia diuitiarum et paupertatis humilitas uel sublimiorem episcopum, uel inferiorem non facit; ceterum omnes apostolorum successores sunt. §. 2. Sed dicis, quomodo Romae ad testimonium diaconi presbiter ordinatur? Quid mihi profers unius urbis consuetudinem? Quid paucitatem, de qua ortum est supercilium, in leges ecclesiae uendicas? Omne quod rarum est plus appetitur. Pulegium apud Indos pipere preciosius est. Diacones paucitas honorabiles, presbiteros turba contemptibiles facit. Ceterum in ecclesia etiam Romae presbiteri sedent, et stant diaconi, licet paulatim crebrescentibus uitiis inter presbiteros absente episcopo diaconos sedere uideamus, et in domesticis conuiuiis benedictiones coram presbiteris dare. Discant, qui hoc faciunt se non recte facere audiant Apostolos. "Non est dignum, ut relinquentes uerbum Dei ministremus mensis." Sciant diaconi quare constituti sint. Legant Acta apostolorum, recordentur condicionis suae. Presbiter et episcopus aliud etatis, aliud dignitatis est nomen. Unde ad Titum et Timotheum de ordinatione episcopi et diaconi dicitur; de presbiteris omnino reticetur, quia in episcopo et presbiter continentur. Qui prouehitur, a minori ad maius prouehitur. Aut igitur ex presbitero ordinetur diaconus, ut presbitero maior conprobetur, in quem crescit ex paruo, aut si ex diacono ordinatur presbiter, nouerit se laicis maiorem sacerdotibus esse minorem

C. XXV. On the same.

Likewise Cyprian, [book of epistles, 9]. Our Lord Jesus Christ, our king and judge and lord, preserved honor for pontiffs and priests until the day of his Passion, although they preserved neither the fear of God nor recognition of Christ. For when he had cleansed the leper, he said to him: “Go and show yourself to the priests, and offer the gift.” The humble one taught us humility, still calling him a priest whom he knew to be sacrilegious. Likewise, subjected to suffering, when he had received a slap and it was said to him, “Do you answer the pontiff thus?” he spoke nothing insultingly against the person of the pontiff, but rather defended his innocence in this manner, saying: “If I have spoken badly, bear witness concerning the evil; but if well, why do you strike me?” All these things were done by him humbly and patiently so that we might have an example of humility and patience. For he taught that true priests are lawfully and fully to be honored, since he himself proved such toward false priests. § 1. But deacons ought to remember that the Lord chose the Apostles, that is, bishops and priests, while after the Lord’s ascension into heaven the Apostles appointed deacons for themselves as ministers of their episcopate and of the Church. If we can dare anything against God, who makes bishops, then deacons, who are made by us, can also dare against us. Part VII. GRATIAN. But what is said concerning the inferiority of deacons is to be observed everywhere, unless a deacon holds the place either of his own patriarch or of his metropolitan. Hence it reads in the Sixth Synod, [c. 7]:

C. XXV. De eodem.

Item Ciprianus. [lib. epist. 9.] Dominus noster lesus Christus, rex et iudex et dominus noster, usque ad passionis diem seruauit honorem pontificibus et sacerdotibus quamuis illi nec timorem Dei, nec agnicionem Christi seruassent. Nam cum leprosum mundasset, dixit illi: "Vade, et ostende, te sacerdotibus, et offer donum." Humilitatem nos humilis docuit, sacerdotem adhuc appellans, quem sciebat esse sacrilegum. Item subditus passioni cum alapam accepisset, et ei diceretur: "Sic respondes pontifici?" nichil contumeliose ille locutus est in personam pontificis, sed sic magis innocentiam suam tuitus est, dicens: "Si male locutus sum, exprobra de malo: si autem bene, quid me cedis?" Que omnia ab eo ideo facta sunt humiliter atque pacienter, ut nos humilitatis ac pacientiae haberemus exemplum. Docuit enim sacerdotes ueros legitimae et plene honorari, dum circa falsos sacerdotes ipse talis extitit. §. 1. Meminisse autem diaconi debent, quoniam apostolos, id est episcopos et presbiteros, Dominus elegit, diaconos autem post ascensum Domini in celum apostoli sibi constituerunt episcopatus sui et ecclesiae ministros. Quod si nos aliquid audere contra

Deum possumus, qui episcopos facit, possunt et contra nos diacones audere, a quibus fiunt. VII. Pars. Gratian. Hoc autem, quod de diaconorum minoritate dicitur, ubique seruandum est, nisi cum diaconus habuerit locum aut proprii patriarchae, aut sui metropolitani. Unde in VI. Sinodo [c. 7.] legitur:

C. XXVI. A deacon is not to be preferred to priests unless he holds the place of his metropolitan.

We command that a deacon, although he be even in a dignity, that is, in any ecclesiastical office, not sit before a priest unless he holds the place of his own patriarch or metropolitan for some matter; for then he will be honored as holding that man's place. But if anyone presumes tyrannically to do this, let him be driven from his own grade and become last of all in his order.

C. XXVI. Diaconus sacerdotibus non preferatur, nisi locum metropolitani sui obtineat.

Precipimus, ne diaconus (quamuis etiam in dignitate, hoc est in offitio quolibet ecclesiastico sit) ante presbiterum sedeat, nisi cum locum habuerit proprii patriarchae aut metropolitani pro aliquo capitulo; tunc enim sicut illius locum tenens honorabitur. Si quis uero presumpserit hoc tyrannice facere, a proprio gradu repulsus ultimus omnium fiat in ordine suo.

Distinction XCIV

GRATIAN. Part I. Even to a subdeacon the supreme patriarch can commit his vicariate. Hence Symmachus says:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Subdiacono etiam summus patriarcha uices suas committere ualet. Unde Simacus ait:

C. I. The apostolic Church commits its vicariate even to a subdeacon.

We have perceived it to be exceedingly necessary that, just as it was the judgment of our predecessors, so we commit all things to one and the same person, and that where we cannot be present, our authority be represented through him whom we command. Therefore, with God's aid, we have committed our vicariate within the province of Sicily to Peter, subdeacon of our see. For we cannot doubt the acts of one to whom, with God's aid, we are known to have committed the whole patrimony of our Church. Part II. GRATIAN. But whoever impedes a legate of the apostolic see is to be excommunicated until satisfaction. Hence Alexander, [Pope Alexander I, epistle II to all the Bishops]:

C. I. Etiam subdiacono uices suas committit apostolica ecclesia.

Valde necessarium esse perspeximus, ut sicut decessorum nostrorum fuit iudicium, ita uni eidemque personae omnia committamus, et ubi nos presentes esse non possumus, nostra per eum, cui precipimus, representetur auctoritas. Quamobrem Petro subdiacono sedis nostrae intra prouinciam

Siciliam uices nostras auxiliante Deo commisimus. Nec enim de eius actibus dubitare possumus, cui Deo auxiliante totum nostrae ecclesiae noscimur patrimonium commisisse. II. Pars. Gratian. Legatum uero apostolicae sedis quicumque inpedierit, usque ad satisfactionem excommunicetur. Unde Alexander: [Papa I. epist. II. omnibus Episcopis]

C. II. Let one who attempts to impede a legate of the apostolic see be excommunicated.

But if anyone impedes a legation, he turns aside the advancement not of one but of many; and just as he harms many, so he is to be reproved by many and deprived of the fellowship of the good. And because he impedes the cause of God and disturbs the state of the Church, he is therefore to be kept from her thresholds. Accordingly, all are to beware of such a man, and he is not to be received into the communion of the faithful until satisfaction.

Part III. GRATIAN. Archdeacons also, although by their office they ought to investigate the life of clerics by diligent examination and report to the bishop the things which they find in need of correction, are nevertheless prohibited from exercising dominion over them and exacting tribute from them. Hence it reads in the Council of Chalon, [c. 15]:

C. II. Excommunicetur, qui legatum sedis apostolicae inpedire temptauerit.

Si quis autem legationem inpedit, non unius, sed multorum profectum auertit, et sicut multis nocet, ita a multis arguendus est, et bonorum societate priuandus. Et quia Dei causam inpedit, et statum conturbat ecclesiae, ideo ab eius liminibus arceatur. Ab omnibus itaque talis est cauendus, et non in communione fidelium usque ad satisfactionem recipiendus.

III. Pars. Gratian. Archidiaconi quoque, quamuis ex offitio suo clericorum uitam diligenti examinatione debeant inquirere, et que corrigenda inueniunt episcopo nunciare, tamen dominacionem super eos exercere, et censum ab eis exigere prohibentur. Unde in Cabillonensi Concilio [c. 15.] legitur:

C. III. Let archdeacons not exercise dominion over priests.

It has been said that in very many places archdeacons exercise a certain dominion over parish priests and exact tribute from them, something which pertains more to tyranny than to the form of rectitude. § 1. For if, according to the saying of the Apostle, bishops ought not to be lords over the clergy, but to be made a form for the flock from the heart, much less ought these men to do this. Accordingly, let them be content with regular disciplines and keep their proper measure; and let them strive to exercise throughout the parishes what is enjoined upon them by the bishops, presuming nothing through cupidity and avarice.

C. III. Archidiaconi super presbiteros dominacionem non exerceant.

Dictum est, quod in plerisque locis archidiaconi super presbiteros parrochianos quandam exercent dominacionem, et ab eis censum exigunt, quod magis ad tirannidem, quam ad rectitudinis pertinet formam. §. 1. Si enim iuxta Apostoli sententiam episcopi non debent esse dominantes in clero, sed forma facti gregis ex animo, multo minus isti facere hoc debent. Sint itaque contenti regularibus disciplinis, et teneant propriam mensuram, et quod eis ab episcopis iniungitur, hoc per parrochias exercere studeant, nichil per cupiditatem et auariciam presumentes.

Distinction XCV

GRATIAN. Part I. But what commands above that priests obey bishops as subjects is not to be understood as if they were not permitted to celebrate the sacred mysteries in the presence of bishops —as, with episcopal haughtiness, certain persons wished to prohibit priests from doing—but because priests ought to obey pontiffs as sons obey parents. It is also conceded to them to touch the baptized with chrism. Hence Gregory writes to Januarius, Bishop of Cagliari, [book III, epistle 26, indiction XII]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem sacerdotes supra iubentur episcopis tamquam subditi obedire, non ita intelligendum est, quasi non liceat eis presentibus episcopis sacra misteria celebrare, (sicut episcopali supercilio quidam ab his uolebant presbiteros prohibere), sed quia presbiteri pontificibus, tamquam filii parentibus, debent obedire. Baptizatos etiam crismate eis tangere conceditur. Unde Gregorius scribit Ianuario Episcopo Caralitano: [lib. III. epist. 26. Indict. XII.]

C. I. Where bishops are absent, let priests touch the baptized on their foreheads with chrism.

It has also come to us that certain persons were scandalized because we prohibited priests from touching with chrism those who have been baptized. We indeed acted according to the ancient usage of our Church. But if some are altogether grieved concerning this matter, where bishops are absent we concede that priests also ought to touch the baptized with chrism on their foreheads. GRATIAN. Above, to the contrary, Bishop Leo in the chapter "Although to Chorepiscopi," [D. LXVIII]:

> C. I. Ubi episcopi desunt, baptizatos in frontibus presbiteri crismate tangant.
> Peruenit quoque ad nos, quosdam scandalizatos fuisse, quod presbiteros crismate tangere eos, qui baptizati sunt, prohibuimus. Et nos quidem secundum ueterem usum nostrae ecclesiae fecimus. Sed si omnino hac de re aliqui contristantur, ubi episcopi desunt, ut presbiteri etiam in frontibus baptizatos crismate tangere debeant, concedimus. Gratian. Supra econtra Leo episcopus capitulo "Quamuis corepiscopis": [Dist. LXVIII.]

C. II. Let priests not presume to strive beyond their measure.

Likewise Gelasius, [Pope, to the Bishops throughout Lucania, etc., epistle V, c. 8]. We prohibit priests from stretching beyond their measure or boldly assuming for themselves things owed to the episcopal summit; let them not seize for themselves the faculty of confecting chrism or of applying pontifical consignation.

GRATIAN. But this concession of Gregory is read to have been made once for calming scandal. The command of Leo and Gelasius, however, prevailed with practice approving it, unless perhaps the custom of certain persons has admitted this: that, in the absence of the bishop and when extreme necessity compels, priests, by the concession of Gregory, may anoint the baptized on their foreheads. But the prohibition of Leo and Gelasius is to be understood in the case when bishops are present or when ultimate necessity does not compel. They are, however, permitted to anoint the sick with sanctified oil. Hence James says: "Is anyone among you sick? Let him bring in the priests of the Church, who are to pray over him, anointing him with oil, and the prayer of faith will save the sick man." Part II. § 1. But it is asked whether bishops are permitted to anoint the sick with the same oil, or whether anointing of this kind is to be conceded to the impenitent. Concerning these things Pope Innocent writes thus, [to Decentius, Bishop of Gubbio, epistle I, final chapter]:

C. II. Presbiteri ultra suum modum contendere non presumant.

Item Gelasius. [Papa Episcopis per Lucaniam, etc. epist. V. c. 8.] Presbiteros ultra suum modum tendere prohibemus, nec episcopali fastigio debita sibimet audacter assumere, non conficiendi crismatis, non consignationis pontificalis adhibendae sibimet arripere facultatem.

Gratian. Sed istud Gregorii pro scandalo sedando semel concessum legitur. Illud autem Leonis et Gelasii usu approbante preualuit, nisi forte ubi aliquorum consuetudo hoc admisit, ut in absentia episcopi extrema necessitate cogente ex concessione Gregorii presbiteri baptizatos in frontibus liniant. Prohibitio uero Leonis et Gelasii in eo casu intelligatur, cum episcopi presentes sunt, uel cum non cogit ultima necessitas. Oleo uero sanctificato permittitur eis ungere infirmos. Unde Iacobus ait: "Infirmatur quis in uobis? inducat presbiteros ecclesiae, qui orent super eum ungentes eum oleo, et oratio fidei saluabit infirmum." II. Pars. §. 1. Sed queritur, an episcopis liceat eodem oleo ungere infirmos? uel si inpenitentibus huiuscemodi unctio sit concedenda? De his uero ita scribit Innocentius Papa: [ad Decentium Eugubinum Episcopum, epist. I. c. ult.]

C. III. A bishop is not prohibited from touching the sick with sanctified oil.

We see that it was superfluously added that there should be doubt concerning the bishop as to what it is not doubtful that priests are permitted to do. For priests were mentioned for this reason: because bishops, impeded by other occupations, cannot go to all the sick. Moreover, if the bishop either can or deems anyone worthy to be visited by him, he can without hesitation both bless and touch him with chrism, since it belongs to him to confect the chrism itself. This cannot be poured upon the impenitent because it is a kind of sacrament. For how is one kind believed able to be conceded to those to whom the other sacraments are denied? Therefore, most beloved brother, we have taken care to answer, as we were able, all these things which your affection wished to be expounded by us. Part III. GRATIAN. But let priests seek chrism from their own bishops for the sanctification of baptism. Hence in the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 36]:

C. III. Oleo sanctificato non prohibetur episcopus tangere infirmos.

Illud superfluum uidemus adiectum, ut de episcopo ambigatur, quod presbiteris licere non dubium est. Nam idcirco de presbiteris dictum est, quia episcopi occupationibus aliis inpediti ad omnes languidos ire non possunt. Ceterum si episcopus aut potest, aut dignum ducit aliquem a se uisitandum, et benedicere, et tangere crismate sine cunctatione potest, cuius est ipsum crisma conficere. Non penitentibus istud fundi non potest, quia genus est sacramenti. Nam quibus reliqua sacramenta negantur, quomodo unum genus putatur posse concedi? His igitur, frater karissime, omnibus, que tua dilectio uoluit a nobis exponi, prout potuimus respondere curauimus. III. Pars. Gratian. Crisma uero a suis episcopis ad baptismi sanctificationem presbiteri petant. Unde in Cartaginensi Concilio IV.: [c. 36.]

C. IV. Chrism is to be sought from one's own bishop every year.

Let priests who govern churches throughout the dioceses seek chrism not from any bishops whatsoever but from their own, and not through a more junior cleric, but every year, either through themselves or through the one who keeps the sacristy, before the solemnity of Easter.

C. IV. Crisma singulis annis a proprio petatur episcopo.

Presbiteri, qui per dioceses ecclesias regunt, non a quibuslibet episcopis, sed a suis, nec per iuniorem clericum, sed omni anno aut per se ipsos, aut per illum, qui sacrarium tenet, ante pascae solempnitatem crisma petant.

C. V. A priest is the same as a bishop, and bishops preside over priests by custom alone.

Likewise Jerome, on the epistle to Titus. Formerly a priest was the same as a bishop; and before factions arose in religion at the instigation of the devil and it was said among the peoples, "I am of Paul, I am of Apollo, but I am of Cephas," the churches were governed by the common counsel of the priests. But after each person thought that those whom he had baptized were his own, not Christ's, it was decreed throughout the whole world that one from among the priests be set over the others and the seeds of schisms be removed. And a little later: § 1. Therefore, just as priests know that by the custom of the Church they are subject to the one who has been set over them, so let bishops know that they are greater than priests more by custom than by the truth of the Lord's disposition, and that they ought to govern the Church in common.

> C. V. Presbiter idem est qui et episcopus ac sola consuetudine presbiteris episcopi presunt.
> Item Ieronimus supra epistolam ad Titum. Olim idem presbiter, qui et episcopus, et antequam diaboli instinctu studia in religione fierent, et diceretur in populis: "Ego sum Pauli, ego sum Apollo, ego autem Cephae," communi presbiterorum consilio ecclesiae gubernabantur. Postquam autem unusquisque eos, quos baptizauerat, suos esse putabat, non Christi, in toto orbe decretum est, ut unus de presbiteris superponeretur et scismatum semina tollerentur. Et paulo post: §. 1. Sicut ergo presbiteri sciunt, se ex ecclesiae consuetudine ei, qui sibi prepositus fuerit, esse subiectos, ita episcopi nouerint, se magis consuetudine quam dispensationis dominicae ueritate presbiteris esse maiores, et in communi debere ecclesiam regere.

C. VI. Priests are permitted to teach in the presence of bishops.

The same to Rusticus, Bishop of Narbonne, [On the Seven Grades of the Church]. Behold, I say that, while their bishops are present and standing by at the altar, priests can confect the sacraments. § 1. But because it is written, "Let priests be honored with a double honor, especially those who labor in the word of God," it is fitting for them to preach; it is useful to bless; it is appropriate to confirm; it is proper to give communion; it is necessary to visit the sick, to pray for the infirm, and to complete all the sacraments of God. § 2. Let no bishop be puffed up over this by envy of diabolical temptation or be angry if priests sometimes exhort the people, if they preach in the churches, if, as was said, they bless the people. For to one denying these things to me I shall speak thus: let one who does not wish priests to do the things commanded by God say what is greater than Christ, or what can be preferred to his body or blood. If the priest consecrates Christ when he blesses the sacraments at the altar of God, ought he not to bless the people, he who does not fear to consecrate Christ? § 3. Concerning laymen and women, at your command, O most unjust priests, the priest of God loses the offices of blessing, loses the work of the tongue, does not have confidence to preach, is mutilated in every part of the virtues, has the name of priest alone, and does not retain the fullness and perfection which belong to his consecration. § 4. What honor of yours, I ask, is here, O priests, that you inflict the injury of a hump? For when diligence worthy of God is taken from pastors through power, a certain contagion and calamity grows in the flocks, and you procure losses for the Lord's patrimony while you wish alone to exercise power in the Church. § 5. From the beginning priests were commanded to be judges of affairs; priests ought to participate in the council of priests, because priests themselves also, as we read, are called bishops, according to what was said to a bishop: "Do not neglect the grace which was given to you through the imposition of the hands of the priest"; and elsewhere to the elders: “Who placed you as bishops to govern his Church.” § 6. But proud priests hate this in the name of the presbyterate, who do not wish to be what Christ was—he who washed the feet of his disciples, who was baptized by John, although John proclaimed that he himself ought to be baptized by the Lord. I write this so that, if the error of the past time can no longer be recalled, at least now in the churches they may do what is done at Rome, what is done in Africa, what is done in the East, what is done in Spain, what is done in Britain, what is done in Gaul, what is done in all places where humility perseveres, what is done in heaven—which is greater—where their seats are read to be disposed.

> C. VI. Coram episcopis presbiteris docere licet.
> Idem ad Rusticum Narbonensem Episcopum. [de septem gradibus ecclesiae] Ecce ego dico, presentibus episcopis suis atque astantibus in altario presbiteros posse sacramenta conficere. §. 1. Sed quia scriptum est: "Presbiteri duplici honore honorentur, maxime qui laborant in uerbo Dei," predicare eos decet, utile est benedicere, congruum est confirmare, conuenit reddere communionem, necesse est uisitare infirmos, orare pro inualidis, atque omnia Dei sacramenta conplere. §. 2. Nemo hinc episcoporum inuidia diabolicae temptationis infletur, irascatur si plebem interdum presbiteri exhortentur, si in ecclesiis predicent, si plebi, ut dictum est, benedicant. Etenim abnuenti mihi ista sic dicam: qui non uult presbiteros facere que iubentur a Deo, dicat, quid maior est Christo? aut quid poterit corpori aut sanguini eius anteponi? Si presbiter Christum consecrat, cum in altario Dei sacramenta benedicit, benedicere populum non debet, qui Christum consecrare non metuit? §. 3. Circa laicos ac mulieres iubentibus uobis, iniustissimi sacerdotes, presbiter Dei benedictionis perdit offitia amittit linguae opus, non habet confidentiam predicandi, truncatus est omni parte uirtutum, solum presbiteri nomen habet, plenitudinem atque perfectionem, que consecrationi eius conpetit, non retentat. §. 4. Quis hic, rogo, sacerdotes, honor uester est, ut dampnum gibbi inferatis? Quoniam cum pastoribus per potentiam aufertur Deo digna diligentia, contagium quoddam et calamitas crescit in gregibus, ac dominici patrimonii dampna conquiritis, dum soli uultis in ecclesia potentari. §. 5. Presbiteri negotiorum ab initio, iudices esse mandati sunt, presbiteri sacerdotum interesse debent concilio, quoniam et ipsi presbiteri, ut legimus, episcopi nominantur, secundum quod dictum est ad episcopum. "Noli negligere gratiam, que tibi data est per inpositionem manuum presbiteri" et alibi ad maiores natu: "Qui uos posuit episcopos regere ecclesiam suam". §. 6. Sed oderunt hoc superbi sacerdotes in presbiterii nomine, qui nolunt hoc esse, quod Christus, qui discipulorum pedes lauit, qui baptizatus a Iohanne est licet baptizandum se esse a Domino proclamaret. Quod propterea scribo, ut, si preteriti temporis error iam non potest reuocari uel ad presens in ecclesiis faciant, quod Romae fit, quod in Affrica fit, quod in oriente fit, quod in Ispania, quod in Britannia, quod in Gallia quod in omnibus locis, ubi humilitas perseuerat, quod in celis (quod maius est), ubi sedes eorum legitur esse disposita.

C. VII. Let bishops and clerics mutually display honor to one another.

The same to Nepotian, [epistle II]. Be subject to your pontiff and love him as the parent of your soul. § 1. But let bishops also know that they are priests, not lords; let them honor clerics as clerics, so that honor may be rendered to the bishops themselves by the clerics. § 2. That saying of the orator Domitius is well known: “Why,” he says, “should I hold you as prince when you do not hold me as senator?” § 3. Let us know that what Aaron and his sons are, this are the bishop and priests. § 4. There is one Lord, one temple; let there be one ministry. § 5. Let us always remember what the blessed Apostle Peter commanded the priests: “Feed the flock of the Lord which is among you, exercising oversight not under compulsion but willingly, according to God; neither for the sake of shameful gain but voluntarily; neither as lords over the clergy but being made a form for the flock from the heart, so that when the prince of shepherds appears, you may receive the unfading crown of glory." § 6. It is of the worst custom in certain churches for priests to be silent and not to speak in the presence of bishops, as if the bishops envied them or disdained to hear them. "And if something," as the Apostle Paul says, "is revealed to another who is sitting, let the first be silent." "A wise son is the glory of his father." Let the bishop rejoice in his judgment when he has chosen such priests.

C. VII. Episcopi et clerici inuicem sibi honorem exhibeant.

Idem ad Nepotianum. [epist. II.] Esto subiectus pontifici tuo, et quasi animae parentem ama. §. 1. Sed et episcopi sacerdotes se esse sciant, non dominos, honorent clericos quasi clericos ut ipsis episcopis honor deferatur a clericis. §. 2. Scitum est illud oratoris Domicii: "Cur ego, inquit, te habeam ut principem, cum tu me non habeas ut senatorem?" §. 3. Quod Aaron et filios, hoc esse episcopum et presbiteros nouerimus. §. 4. Unus Dominus, unum templum, unum sit ministerium. §. 5. Recordemur semper, quod beatus Petrus apostolus precepit sacerdotibus: "Pascite eum, qui in uobis est, gregem Domini, prouidentes non coacte, sed spontanee, secundum Deum, neque turpis lucri gratia, sed uoluntarie, neque ut dominantes in clero, sed forma facti gregi ex animo, ut cum apparuerit princeps pastorum, percipiatis inmarcescibilem gloriae coronam." §. 6. Pessimae consuetudinis est in quibusdam ecclesiis, tacere presbiteros et presentibus episcopis non loqui quasi eis inuideant, aut eos dedignentur audire. "Et si alii," ut inquit apostolus Paulus, "fuerit reuelatum sedenti, prior taceat." "Gloria patris est filius sapiens." Gaudeat episcopus in iudicio suo, cum tales elegerit sacerdotes.

C. VIII. Let priests not precede bishops, but accompany or follow them.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea, [c. 56]. Priests ought not to enter before the entrance of the bishop and sit on the tribunals, but to enter with the bishop, unless perhaps the bishop is ill or it is established that he is occupied on a journey.

C. VIII. Presbiteri episcopos non precedant, sed comitentur uel subsequantur.

Item ex Concilio Laodicensi. [c. 56.] Non oportet presbiteros ante ingressum episcopi ingredi, et sedere in tribunalibus, sed cum episcopo ingredi, nisi forte aut egrotet episcopus, aut in peregrinationis commodo eum esse constiterit.

C. IX. Let a bishop recognize himself not as the lord but as the colleague of priests.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 34]. Let a bishop sitting in any place not permit a priest to stand.

C. IX. Episcopus non dominum, sed collegam se presbiterorum cognoscat.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 34.] Episcopus in quolibet loco sedens stare presbiterum non patiatur.

[C. X.]

Likewise from the same, [c. 35]. In the church, in the assembly of priests, let a bishop sit in the higher place. But within the house let him recognize that he is the colleague of the priests.

[C. X.]

Item ex eodem. [c. 35.] Episcopus in ecclesia in consessu presbiterorum sublimior sedeat. Intra domum uero collegam se presbiterorum esse cognoscat.

C. XI. Without the command of the bishop, let a priest not sign infants.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin. In the presence of the bishop, let a priest not sign infants unless it has been commanded to him by the bishop.

[PALEA.

> C. XI. Sine precepto episcopi presbiter non signet infantes.
>
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. Presbiter presente episcopo non signet infantes, nisi ab episcopo fuerit illi preceptum.
>
> [PALEA.

C. XII. On the same.

Likewise from the Council of Neocaesarea, c. 13. Rural priests cannot offer in the church of the city when the bishop or the priests of that city are present, nor give the consecrated bread and present the chalice. But if these truly are absent and the rural priests alone are called to make the offering, they ought to make it.]

> C. XII. De eodem.
>
> Item ex Concilio Neocesariensi, c. 13. Presbiteri ruris in ecclesia ciuitatis, episcopo presente uel presbiteris ipsius urbis, offerre non possunt, nec panem sacrificatum dare, calicemque porrigere. Si uere absentes hi fuerint, et ad dandam ordinationem uocentur soli, dare debebunt.]

Distinction XCVI

GRATIAN. But that decree of the Emperor Honorius which is read above to have been established concerning the election of the Supreme Pontiff is proved to be of no weight, since the faculty of disposing not only concerning orders but not even concerning ecclesiastical property is read ever to have been attributed to laymen. Hence whatever things are found to have been decreed by princes concerning orders or ecclesiastical property are shown to be of no authority. Hence Symmachus, Bishop of the catholic Church of the city of Rome, presiding in a Synod, said:

> GRATIANUS. Illud autem Honorii Augusti, quod de electione summi Pontificis supra constituisse legitur, nullius momenti esse probatur, cum non solum de ordinibus, sed nec etiam de rebus ecclesiasticis laicis legatur aliquando attributa disponendi facultas. Unde quecumque a principibus in ordinibus uel in ecclesiasticis rebus decreta inueniuntur, nullius auctoritatis esse monstrantur. Unde Simacus Episcopus catholicae ecclesiae urbis Romae in Sinodo residens dixit:

C. I. No faculty of disposing ecclesiastical property is left to laymen.

Your fraternity, having rightly pursued the ecclesiastical laws, under fear of divine judgment determined the things which were to be established and arrived at the summit of justice, since it sufficiently embraces all things and its fullness needs no addition, especially concerning the clerics whom love of domination has invaded and made reject the yoke of ecclesiastical discipline. § 1. It is difficult to relate their transgressions; nevertheless, I do not defer to make known to your venerable order one thing which comes to mind. Among other things, I report that Basilius of illustrious memory composed a certain document, as if from love of ecclesiastical property, in which no prelate of the Roman Church participated or subscribed, through whom it could have obtained lawful firmness. Therefore, lest I debate concerning that upon which your council can judge, let it be sought and brought into the midst, so that from its reading you may recognize what sort of substance it can have. The holy synod responded: "Let it be brought into the midst so that what sort it is may be recognized." When he had said these things, the deacon Hormisdas recited: "When, in the Mausoleum which is beside blessed Peter the Apostle, the sublime and most eminent man Basilius, prefect of the praetorium and patrician, also acting in the place of the most excellent King Odoacer, had taken his seat, he said: 'Although it pertains to your zeal and religion that concord be preserved principally for the Church in the election of the episcopate, lest through occasion of the election the state of the city be called into doubt, nevertheless, by the admonition of the most blessed man our Pope Simplicius, which we ought always to have before our eyes, you remember that this was commanded to us under entreaty: that, because of that uproar and the loss of the venerable Church, if it should happen that he pass from this light, no election of anyone be celebrated without our consultation.'" When this had been read, Cresconius, bishop of the city of Todi, rising from the assembly, said: "Here let the holy synod ponder whether, with religious persons passed over, upon whom especially rests the care concerning so great a Pontiff, they can draw his election into their own power, something which is manifestly contrary to the canons." Likewise, the deacon Hormisdas read: "And lest the venerable Church sustain any confusion or loss, we marvel that, with us passed over, anything was attempted, since while our priest was surviving nothing ought to have been undertaken. Therefore, if it pleases your amplitude and holiness, let us preserve unharmed, with religious veneration, all things which concern the election of the future prelate, setting forth especially this law, which with the devotion of a Christian mind we sanction for ourselves and our heirs: that it never be permitted for an estate, whether rural or urban, or the ornaments or ministries which now belong to the churches, or which may come by any titles into the right of the churches, to be alienated under any title or contrivance by him who is now to be ordained prelate by common election or by those who follow in future ages. And whoever wishes to do this is to be judged ineffectual and void, and let there be anathema for the one doing it, consenting, and receiving." § 2. Maximus, bishop of the church of Blera, said: "Now let the holy synod deign to declare whether a layman was permitted to dictate an anathema against the ecclesiastical order, or whether a layman could pronounce anathema against a priest and establish contrary to the canons what did not belong to him. Say what seems right to you. Was a layman permitted to give law concerning me?" The holy synod said: "He was not permitted," and added: "Read what follows." The deacon Hormisdas read: "And let one who obtains an estate, whether rural or urban, belonging to ecclesiastical right know that he is protected by no law or prescription; but whether it is the one who alienated it or one succeeding him who, with a contrary will, attempts to retain an estate alienated in this way, let the one who obtained it restore it with its fruits." § 3. When he had read these things, Stephen, bishop of the church of Venosa, rising from the assembly, said: "Let it be read through." The deacon Hormisdas read: "It has also pleased us to afflict the heirs of the recipient with this penalty. In this matter no cleric is to have free faculty to contradict. For it is unjust and akin to sacrilege that the things which each person has conferred or certainly left to the venerable Church for the salvation and rest of his soul and for the sake of the poor should be transferred to another by those whom it especially befitted to preserve them. Certainly, whatever things in gems, gold or silver, and also garments, appear less suitable for the uses or adornment of the Church and cannot be preserved and endure for a long time are to be sold under a just valuation, and the expenditure is to benefit religion." § 4.

When this had been read, Lawrence, bishop of the church of Milan, said: "That document could bind no Pontiff of the city of Rome, because laymen were not permitted to have any power of establishing things in the Church apart from the Roman Pope. The necessity of obeying remains for them, not the authority of commanding, especially since neither did the Roman Pope subscribe, nor is the assent of any metropolitan according to the canons read in it." § 5. Peter, bishop of the church of Ravenna, said: "It is manifest that the document which has been published in our congregation has no force, because it neither accords with the canons and appears to have been conceived by a lay person, especially because no prelate of the apostolic see is shown to have participated in it or to have confirmed it by his own subscription." § 6. Eulalius, bishop of the church of Syracuse, said: "It is established by the most evident proofs that the document which has been recited in the priestly council is invalid: first, because it appears to have been made contrary to the rules of the Fathers by laymen, though religious—persons to whom no faculty of disposing anything concerning ecclesiastical resources is read ever to have been attributed; next, because it is shown to have been confirmed by the subscription of no prelate of the apostolic see. For if the holy Fathers sanctioned that whatever the priests of any province treat within their own boundaries in a council held without the authority of their metropolitan ought to be void, how much more is it not doubtful that what is known to have been presumed by laymen at the apostolic see while the prelate now exists—he who, by the merit of blessed Peter the Apostle, holds the primacy of the priesthood throughout the whole world and customarily bestows firmness upon synodal statutes—lacks force and can in no way be reckoned among ecclesiastical statutes, although some bishops consented who nevertheless could not inflict prejudice upon the Pontiff by whom they are proved to have been consecrated?" § 7. The holy synod said: "Although, according to the prosecution of our venerable brothers Lawrence, Peter, Eulalius, Cresconius, Maximus, and Stephen, it is not held uncertain among us that this document is of no weight, nevertheless, even if it could subsist by some reason, it was fitting that in the synodal assembly it be enervated by the provident sentence of your blessedness and reduced to voidness in every way, lest it remain as a precedent for any laymen, though religious or powerful, to presume in any city and in any manner to decree anything concerning ecclesiastical resources, the care of disposing which is taught to have been entrusted by God indisputably to priests alone." Hence in the sixth action of the Council of Chalcedon the Emperor Marcian said among other things:

> C. I. De rebus ecclesiasticis disponendis laicis nulla facultas relinquitur.
> Bene quidem fraternitas uestra ecclesiasticis legibus assecuta, sub diuini timore iudicii que erant statuenda diffiniuit, et ad iusticiae cumulum peruenit, cum sufficienter uniuersa conplectitur, nec adiectione indiget plenitudo, maxime de clericis, quos amor dominacionis inuasit, et iugum disciplinae ecclesiasticae fecit respuere. §. 1. Quorum excessus enarrare difficile est: unum tamen, quod occurrit, uenerando ordini uestro intimare non differo. Inter alia, scripturam quandam illustris memoriae Basilium quasi pro ecclesiasticae amore substantiae conscripsisse refero, in qua nullus Romanae ecclesiae interfuit, uel subscripsit antistes, per quem potuisset sortiri legitimam firmitatem. Ne ergo disputem inde, unde potest uestrum iudicare concilium requiratur, et referatur in medium, ut ex lectione agnoscatis, cuiusmodi possit habere substantiam. Sancta sinodus respondit: "Deferatur in medium, ut cuiusmodi sit possit agnosci." Hec cum diceret, Ormisda diaconus recitauit: "Cum in Mausoleo, quod est apud B. Petrum apostolum, resedisset sublimis et eminentissimus uir prefectus pretorio atque patricius, agens etiam uices precellentissimi regis Odoacris, Basilius, dixit: "'Quamquam studii uestri et religionis intersit, ut in electione episcopatus concordia principaliter seruetur ecclesiae, ne per occasionem electionis status ciuitatis uocetur in dubium, admonitione beatissimi uiri Papae nostri Simplicii, quam ante oculos semper habere debemus, hoc nobis meministis sub obtestacione fuisse mandatum, ut propter illum strepitum et detrimentum ecclesiae uenerabilis, si eum de hac luce contigerit transire, non sine consultacione nostra cuiuslibet celebretur electio.'" Hec cum legeret, Cresconius Tudertinae ciuitatis episcopus surgens e consessu dixit: "Hic perpendat sancta sinodus, utrum pretermissis personis religiosis, quibus maxime cura est de tanto Pontifice, electionem eius in suam possint redigere potestatem, quod contra canones esse manifestum est." Item Ormisda diaconus legit: "Ac ne confusionis atque dispendii aliquid uenerabilis ecclesia sustineret, miramur, pretermissis quicquam nobis fuisse temptatum, cum sacerdote nostro superstite nichil debuisset assumi. Quare si amplitudini uestrae uel sanctitati placet, incolumia omnia, que ad futuri antistitis electionem respiciunt, religiosa ueneratione seruemus, hanc legem specialiter preferentes, quam nobis heredibusque nostris Christianae mentis deuotione sancimus: ne umquam predium, siue rusticum, siue urbanum, uel ornamenta, aut ministeria que nunc sunt ecclesiarum, uel que ex quibuslibet titulis ecclesiarum iure peruenerint, ab eo, qui nunc antistes sub electione communi fuerit ordinandus, et illis, qui futuris seculis sequuntur, quocumque titulo aut commento alienari liceat. Et quicumque hoc facere uoluerit, inefficax atque irritum iudicetur, sitque facienti, consentienti accipientique anathema." §. 2. Maximus episcopus Bleranae ecclesiae dixit: "Modo sancta sinodus dignetur edicere, si licuit laico homini anathema in ordinem ecclesiasticum dictare, aut si laicus potuit sacerdoti anathema dicere, et contra canones quod ei non conpetebat constituere? Dicite, quid uobis uidetur? De me licuit laico legem dare?" Sancta sinodus dixit: "Non licuit," et adiecit: "Lege sequentia." Ormisda diaconus legit: "Et is, qui predium seu rusticum uel urbanum iuris ecclesiastici fuerit consecutus, nouerit se nulla lege uel prescriptione munitum; sed siue is, qui alienauerit, siue qui eum sequens, uoluntate contraria predium huiusmodi alienatum retinere temptauerit, id cum fructibus restituat, qui illud fuerit consecutus." §. 3. Hec cum legeret, Stephanus Venusinae ecclesiae episcopus surgens e consessu dixit: "Perlegatur." Hormisda diaconus legit: "Qua etiam pena placuit accipientis etiam heredes afficere. In qua re cuilibet clericorum nulla contradicendi libera sit facultas. Iniquum est enim et sacrilegii instar, ut que pro salute et requie animarum suarum unusquisque uenerabili ecclesiae pauperum causa contulerit aut certe reliquerit, ab his, quos maxime seruare conuenerat, in alterum transferantur. Plane quecumque in gemmis, uel auro siue argento, nec non et uestibus minus apta usibus uel ornatui uidebuntur ecclesiae, que seruare ac diu manere non possunt, sub iusta estimatione uendantur, et erogatio religioni proficiat." §. 4. Cumque lecta fuisset, Laurentius episcopus Mediolanensis ecclesiae dixit: "Ista scriptura nullum Romanae ciuitatis potuit obligare Pontificem, qui non licuit laicis statuendi in ecclesia preter Romanum Papam habere aliquam potestatem: quos obsequendi manet necessitas, non auctoritas inperandi, maxime cum nec Papa Romanus subscripserit, nec alicuius secundum canones metropolitani legatur assensus." §. 5. Petrus episcopus Rauennatis ecclesiae dixit: "Scripturam, que in nostra congregatione uulgata est, nullas uires habere manifestum est, quia nec canonibus conuenit, et a laica persona concepta uidetur, maxime quia in ea nullus presul sedis apostolicae interfuisse, uel propria subscriptione eam confirmasse monstratur." §. 6. Eulalius episcopus Siracusanae ecclesiae dixit: "Scripturam, que in sacerdotali concilio recitata est, euidentissimis documentis constat inualidam: primum, quod contra Patrum regulas a laicis, quamuis religiosis (quibus nulla de ecclesiasticis facultatibus aliquid disponendi legitur umquam attributa facultas), facta uidetur; deinde quod nullius presulis apostolicae sedis subscriptione firmata docetur. Quod si cuiuslibet prouinciae sacerdotes intra suos terminos concilio habito quicquid sine metropolitani sui auctoritate tractauerint, irritum esse debere sancti Patres sanxerunt quanto magis quod in apostolica sede, nunc extante presule (qui, merito B. Petri apostoli per uniuersum orbem primatum obtinens sacerdotii, statutis sinodalibus consueuit tribuere firmitatem) a laicis (licet consentientibus aliquantis episcopis, qui tamen Pontifici, a quo consecrati probantur, preiudicium inferre non potuerunt) presumptum fuisse cognoscitur, uiribus carere non dubium est, nec posse inter ecclesiastica ullo modo statuta censeri?" §. 7. Sancta sinodus dixit:

"Licet secundum prosecutionem uenerabilium fratrum nostrorum Laurentii, Petri, Eulalii, Cresconii, Maximi, uel Stephani, nec apud nos incertum habetur, hanc ipsam scripturam nullius esse momenti, uerumtamen etiamsi aliqua possit ratione subsistere, modis omnibus in sinodali conuentu prouida beatitudinis uestrae sententia eneruari conueniebat et in irritum deduci, ne in exemplo remaneret presumendi quibuslibet laicis, quamuis religiosis, uel potentibus, in quacumque ciuitate quolibet modo aliquid decernere de ecclesiasticis facultatibus, quarum solis sacerdotibus disponendi indiscusse a Deo cura commissa docetur." Unde in sexta actione Calcedonensis Concilii Martianus Inperator dixit inter cetera:

C. II. Emperors ought to participate in a synod to confirm the faith, not to display power.

After the example of the most religious prince Constantine, we wish to participate in the synod to confirm the faith, not to display power, so that, when the truth has been found, the multitude drawn away by depraved doctrines may no longer be at discord.

C. II. Inperatores ad fidem confirmandam, non potenciam ostendendam sinodo interesse debent.

Nos ad fidem confirmandam, non ad potenciam ostendendam exemplo religiosissimi principis Constantini sinodo interesse uolumus, ut inuenta ueritate non ultra multitudo prauis doctrinis attracta discordet.

[C. III.]

Likewise in the same, [sixth action, at the end]. There are certain chapters which we have reserved to you for the honor of your reverence, judging it becoming that these be regularly confirmed by you through a synod rather than sanctioned by our law.

[C. III.]

Item in eadem. [VI. actione, in fine] Quedam capitula sunt, que ad honorem uestrae reuerentiae uobis seruauimus, decorum esse iudicantes, a uobis hec regulariter firmari potius per sinodum, quam nostra lege sanciri.

C. IV. It is not fitting that emperors participate in a synodal assembly except where the faith is treated.

Likewise Pope Nicholas, [in the epistle to Emperor Michael which begins, "We had proposed"]. Where have you read that your predecessor emperors participated in synodal assemblies, except perhaps in those in which the faith was treated—the faith which is universal, which is common to all, which pertains not only to clerics but also to laymen and to absolutely all Christians?

C. IV. Sinodali conuentui inperatores interesse non conuenit, nisi ubi de fide agitur.

Item Nicolaus Papa. [in epistola ad Michaelem Imp. que incipit: "Proposueramus."] Ubinam legistis, inperatores antecessores uestros sinodalibus conuentibus interfuisse, nisi forsitan in quibus de fide tractatum est, que uniuersalis est, que omnium communis est, que non solum ad clericos, uerum etiam ad laicos et ad omnes omnino pertinet Christianos?

C. V. Those who preside over human affairs cannot judge the prelates of divine affairs.

The same, [in the same epistle]. Finally, we are entirely ignorant how those who are permitted to preside only over human affairs, and not divine ones, presume to judge those through whom divine things are ministered.

> C. V. De presulibus diuinarum rerum, qui humanis rebus presunt iudicare non possunt.
> Idem. [in eadem epistola] Denique hi, quibus tantum humanis rebus, et non diuinis preesse permissum est, quomodo de his, per quos diuina ministrantur, iudicare presumant, penitus ignoramus.

C. VI. Let neither the emperor usurp the rights of the Pontiff nor the Pontiff the royal rights.

The same, [a little below]. When it came to the truth, neither did the emperor thereafter seize for himself the rights of the pontificate, nor did the Pontiff usurp the imperial name, because the one mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus, distinguished the offices of both powers by their proper acts and distinct dignities. He willed his own to be raised upward by medicinal humility, not to be plunged down again into hell by human pride, so that both Christian emperors would need Pontiffs for eternal life and Pontiffs would use imperial laws only for the course of temporal affairs, so that spiritual action would remain apart from carnal assaults, and one serving as a soldier of God would by no means entangle himself in secular affairs, and in turn he who was entangled in secular affairs would not seem to preside over divine things.

> C. VI. Nec inperator iura Pontificis, nec Pontifex iura regia usurpet.
> Idem. [paulo inferius] Cum ad uerum uentum est, ultra sibi nec inperator iura Pontificatus arripuit, nec Pontifex nomen inperatorium usurpauit, quoniam idem mediator Dei et hominum, homo Christus Iesus, actibus propriis et dignitatibus distinctis offitia potestatis utriusque discreuit, propria uolens medicinali humilitate sursum efferri, non humana superbia rursum in inferno demergi, ut et Christiani inperatores pro eterna uita Pontificibus indigerent, et Pontifices pro cursu temporalium tantummodo rerum inperialibus legibus uterentur, quatinus spiritualis actio a carnalibus distaret incursibus, et Deo militans minime se negociis secularibus inplicaret, ac uicissim non ille rebus diuinis presidere uideretur, qui esset negociis secularibus inplicatus.

C. VII. A Pontiff can be neither loosed nor bound at all by secular power.

The same, [in the same epistle, with a few things interposed]. It is shown clearly enough that a Pontiff can be neither loosed nor bound at all by secular power, since it is established that he was called God by the pious Prince Constantine, whom we recalled far above, because it is manifest that God cannot be judged by men. But Theodosius the Younger, writing to the holy First Synod of Ephesus, also said: “Therefore Candidian, the most magnificent count of the valiant household troops, has been appointed to go to your most holy synod and in no way to participate in the questions or, rather, expositions which are to be made concerning pious dogmas. For it is unlawful that one who is not in the order of the most holy bishops involve himself in ecclesiastical deliberations.” (And after a few things:) § 1. Therefore, when these things are found manifest, it appears that our fellow minister Ignatius could in no way have been altogether expelled by an imperial sentence alone. Because the assent of prelates also followed in his condemnation, it appears that this was perpetrated for the sake of flattery, not of lawful sanction.

C. VII. A seculari potestate Pontifex prorsus nec solui nec ligari ualet.

Idem. [in eadem, paucis interiectis] Satis euidenter ostenditur, a seculari potestate nec solui prorsus, nec ligari Pontificem, quem constat a pio principe Constantino (quem longe superius memorauimus) Deum appellatum, cum nec posse Deum ab hominibus iudicari manifestum sit. Sed et Theodosius minor sanctae sinodo scribens dixit Ephesinae primae. "Deputatus est igitur Candidianus, magnificentissimus comes strenuorum domesticorum, transire usque ad sanctissimam sinodum uestram, et in nullo quidem, quem faciendae sunt de piis dogmatibus questiones seu potius expositiones, communicare. Illicitum namque est eum, qui non sit in ordine sanctissimorum episcoporum, ecclesiasticis intermisceri tractatibus." (Et post pauca:) §. 1. His itaque manifestis repertis aparet conministrum Ignatium per inperialem tantummodo sententiam nullo modo potuisse prorsus expelli. In cuius dampnatione quia presulum quoque assensus est subsecutus, aparet fuisse patratum id causa adulationis, non legitimae sanctionis.

C. VIII. An emperor ought not to judge the deeds of Pontiffs.

The same to Emperor Louis. It is narrated in the Scriptures that the Emperor Constantine said: "Truly, if I saw with my own eyes a priest of God, or any one of those who are clothed around with the monastic habit, sinning, I would unfold my cloak and cover him, lest he be seen by anyone." In these things, therefore, most desired son, you are necessarily admonished that, just as you are seen to be made equal to him in faith, religion, and parity of honor, so you should likewise yearn to be equated in humility and devotion, so that you may be found in nothing inferior to him, but superior after the examples—you who displayed yourself as such before examples of this kind altogether. But we have indeed said these things wishing to render you cautious, so that, if it happens that you hear anything concerning the priests of the Lord, who are rightly called fathers, which introduces confusion into pious minds, you may imitate the modest, not the shameless, sons of Noah, and cover your father's shame thereafter, so that, with the Lord governing, you may deserve to be filled with an abundant blessing, as they also were.

C. VIII. Facta Pontificum inperator iudicare non debet.

Idem Lodouico Inperatori. In scripturis narratur Constantinus inperator dixisse "Vere si propriis oculis uidissem sacerdotem Dei, aut aliquem eorum, qui monachico habitu circumamicti sunt peccantem, clamidem meam explicarem et cooperirem eum, ne ab aliquo uideretur." In quibus igitur, desiderantissime fili, necessario commonemini, ut quemadmodum fide et religione ac honoris parilitate ei adequari uidemini, ita quoque humilitate atque deuotione equiparari nichilominus anheletis, ita ut in nullo inferior eo, sed potior inueniamini post exempla, qui talem se exhibuit ante talia prorsus exempla. Sed hec quidem diximus, cautos uos reddere cupientes, ut si de Domini sacerdotibus, qui iure patres dicuntur, aliquid contigerit uos audire, quod confusionem piis mentibus ingerat, non infronitum, sed pudoratos filios Noe imitantes, patriam de reliquo uerecundiam contegatis, ut affluenti, quemadmodum et illi, benedictione repleri moderante Domino mereamini.

C. IX. Priests are reckoned the fathers and teachers of kings and princes.

Likewise from the epistle of Gregory [VII] to Herman, Bishop of Metz, [book VIII, epistle 21]. Who doubts that the priests of Christ are reckoned the fathers and teachers of kings, princes, and all the faithful? Is it not known to be of a wretched madness if a son attempts to subjugate his father, or a disciple his teacher, to himself, and to subject by unjust obligations to his power the one by whom he believes that he himself can be bound and loosed not only on earth but also in heaven?

C. IX. Regum et principum patres et magistri sacerdotes censentur.

Item ex epistola Gregorii [VII.] ad Hermannum Metensem Episcopum, [lib. VIII. epist. 21.] Quis dubitet sacerdotes Christi regum et principum omniumque fidelium patres et magistros censeri? Nonne miserabilis insaniae esse cognoscitur, si filius patrem, discipulus magistrum sibi conetur subiugare, et iniquis obligationibus illum suae potestati subicere, a quo credit non solum in terra, sed etiam in celis se ligari posse et solui?

C. X. The sacred authority of Pontiffs and the royal power govern the rudders of this world.

Likewise Pope Gelasius to Emperor Anastasius. There are indeed two things, august Emperor, by which this world is principally governed: the sacred authority of Pontiffs and the royal power. Among these, the burden of priests is so much heavier because they will have to render an account at the divine examination even for the kings of men themselves. And after a few things: § 1. Therefore know that amid these things you depend upon their judgment, not that they can be brought back to your will. § 2. Supported by such institutions and such authorities, many Pontiffs excommunicated some kings and some emperors. For if a particular example concerning the persons of princes is sought, blessed Pope Innocent excommunicated the Emperor Arcadius because he consented that Saint John Chrysostom be driven from his see. Blessed Ambrose also, though holy yet not bishop of the universal Church, excluded the Emperor Theodosius the Great from the church by excommunicating him for a fault which did not appear so grave to other priests. In his writings he also shows that gold is not so much more precious than lead as the priestly order is higher than royal power, writing in this manner near the beginning of his Pastoral: "The honor and sublimity of a bishop, brothers, can be equated by no comparisons. If you compare it to the splendor of kings and the diadem of princes, it will be far more inferior than if you compare the metal of lead to the splendor of gold, since indeed you see the necks of kings and princes submitted to the knees of priests, and, after kissing their right hand, they trust that they are joined in their prayers."

C. X. Auctoritas sacra Pontificum et regalis potestas huius mundi gubernacula regit.

Item Gelasius Papa Anastasio Inperatori. Duo sunt quippe, inperator auguste, quibus principaliter hic mundus regitur: auctoritas sacra Pontificum, et regalis potestas. In quibus tanto grauius est pondus sacerdotum, quanto etiam pro ipso regibus hominum in diuino sunt reddituri examine rationem. Et post pauca: §. 1. Nosti itaque inter hec ex illorum te pendere iudicio, non illos ad tuam posse redigi uoluntatem. §. 2. Talibus igitur institutis, talibusque fulti auctoritatibus plerique Pontificum, alii reges, alii inperatores excommunicauerunt. Nam si speciale aliquod de personis principum requiratur exemplum, B. Innocentius Papa Archadium inperatorem (quia consensit, ut S. Iohannes Crisostomus a sua sede pelleretur), excommunicauit. B. etiam Ambrosius, licet sanctus, non tamen uniuersalis ecclesiae episcopus, pro culpa, que aliis sacerdotibus non adeo grauis uidebatur, Theodosium Magnum inperatorem excommunicans ab ecclesia exclusit; qui etiam in suis scriptis ostendit, quod aurum non tam pretiosius sit plumbo, quam regia potestate sit altior ordo sacerdotalis, hoc modo circa principium sui pastoralis scribens: "Honor, fratres, et sublimitas episcopalis nullis poterit conparationibus adequari. Si regum fulgori conpares et principum diademati, longe erit inferius quam si plumbi metallum ad auri fulgorem conpares, quippe cum uideas regum colla et principum submitti genibus sacerdotum, et osculata eorum dextera, orationibus eorum credant se communicari."

C. XI. Emperors ought to be subject to Pontiffs, not preside over them.

Likewise John. If the emperor is catholic—with his peace preserved as we say it—he is a son, not a prelate of the Church. Concerning what pertains to religion, it befits him to learn, not to teach. He has the privileges of his power which he has divinely obtained for administering public laws, and, not ungrateful for his benefits, let him usurp nothing against the disposition of the heavenly order. For God willed the things of the Church which are to be disposed to pertain to priests, not to the powers of the age, which, if they are faithful, he willed to be subject to the priests of his Church. Let him not claim for himself another's right and the ministry which was deputed to another, lest he strive to be broken away from him by whom all things were established and seem to fight against the benefits of him from whom he obtained his own power. Almighty God willed the clerics and priests of the Christian religion to be ordained, examined, and received when returning from error not by public laws or the powers of the age but by pontiffs and priests. Christian emperors ought to subject their executions to ecclesiastical prelates, not prefer them.

> C. XI. Inperatores debent Pontificibus subesse, non preesse.
> Item Iohannes. Si inperator catholicus est (quod salua pace ipsius dixerimus) filius est, non presul ecclesiae; quod ad religionem conpetit discere ei conuenit, non docere; habet priuilegia potestatis suae, que administrandis legibus publicis diuinitus consecutus est, et eius beneficiis non ingratus contra dispositionem celestis ordinis nil usurpet. Ad sacerdotes enim Deus uoluit que ecclesiae sunt disponenda pertinere, non ad seculi potestates, quas, si fideles sunt, ecclesiae suae sacerdotibus uoluit esse subiectas. Non sibi uendicet alienum ius, et ministerium, quod alteri deputatum est, ne contra eum tendat abrumpi, a quo omnia constituta sunt, et contra illius beneficia pugnare uideatur, a quo propriam consecutus est potestatem. Non a legibus publicis, non a potestatibus seculi, sed a pontificibus et sacerdotibus omnipotens Deus Christianae religionis clericos et sacerdotes uoluit ordinari, et discuti et recipi de errore remeantes. Inperatores Christiani subdere debent executiones suas ecclesiasticis presulibus, non preferre.

C. XII. On the same.

Likewise Gelasius to the Eastern Bishops. Never have judgments concerning pontiffs been made except by the Church; it does not belong to human laws to pronounce sentence concerning such men apart from the pontiffs principally established in the Church. Christian princes are accustomed to obey the decrees of the Church, not to set their own power before them. The prince is accustomed to submit his head to bishops, not to judge concerning their heads.]

The Emperor Constantine conceded the crown and every royal dignity in the city of Rome, in Italy, and in the western regions to the Apostolic. C. XIV. On the same.

On the fourth day of his baptism the Emperor Constantine conferred a privilege upon the Pontiff of the Roman Church, that throughout the whole Roman world priests should hold him as their head just as judges hold the king. In that privilege it reads thus among other things: "We have judged it useful, together with all our satraps, the whole senate, my nobles, and all the people subject to the empire of Roman glory, that, just as blessed Peter is seen to have been constituted on earth as vicar of the Son of God, so too the Pontiffs who exercise the vicariate of that prince of the Apostles should obtain from us and our empire the power of a principate greater than the clemency of our earthly imperial serenity is seen to have, choosing that prince of the Apostles himself and his vicars to be our firm patrons with God. And just as our earthly imperial power, so we have decreed that his sacrosanct Roman Church be reverently honored and that the most sacred see of blessed Peter be gloriously exalted above our empire and earthly throne, bestowing upon it power, the dignity of glory, vigor, and imperial honor. And decreeing, we sanction that it hold the principate both over the four principal sees—Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Constantinople—and also over all the churches of God in the whole world; and that the Pontiff who for the time being presides over that sacrosanct Roman Church exist as higher than and prince of all the priests of the whole world; and that whatever things are to be procured for the worship of God or the stability of the faith of Christians be disposed by his judgment." And below: § 1. For the continuation of the lamps we have conferred landed estates upon the churches of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul and enriched them with diverse property; and by our sacred imperial command we have granted these to him by our generosity both in the East and in the West and also in the northern and southern region, namely in Judea, Greece, Asia, Thrace, Africa and Italy, and in diverse islands, entirely upon this condition: that all things be disposed through the hands of our most blessed father Sylvester, the Supreme Pontiff, and his successors. And below: § 2. To blessed Sylvester, our father and Supreme Pontiff and Pope of the universal city of Rome, and to all his successor Pontiffs who will sit upon the see of blessed Peter until the end of the world, from the present we hand over our imperial Lateran palace, then the diadem, namely the crown from our head, together with the phrygium, and also the superhumeral, namely the strap which is accustomed to encircle the imperial neck; indeed also the purple cloak and the scarlet tunic and all the imperial garments; and also the dignity of the presiding imperial cavalrymen, likewise conferring the imperial scepters together with all the standards and banners and the diverse imperial ornaments and the whole procession of the imperial summit and the glory of our power. § 3. But we sanction that the most reverend men, the clerics serving that same sacrosanct Roman Church in diverse orders, have that summit of singularity, power, and preeminence by which our most ample senate is seen to be adorned with glory, that is, that they be made patricians and consuls; and we promulgate that they be adorned also with the other imperial dignities. And just as the imperial soldiery is adorned, so we decree that the clergy of the holy Roman Church be adorned. And just as imperial power is adorned by diverse offices—namely chamberlains, doorkeepers, and all the guards—so we will that the holy Roman Church be adorned. And that the pontifical splendor may shine most fully, we also decree this: that the horses of the clerics of that holy Roman Church be adorned with maniples and linens, that is, with the brightest white color, and that they ride thus. And just as our senate uses shoes with udones, that is, made splendid with white linen, so let the clerics also use them, so that earthly as well as heavenly things may be adorned to the praise of God. § 4. But before all things we grant license to our most holy father Sylvester himself and his successors by our edict, so that whomever, being favorably disposed, he wishes by his own counsel to make a cleric and number among the company of religious clerics, no one among all may presume to act proudly against it. § 5. Accordingly, we have also decreed this: that he and his successors ought to use the diadem, namely the crown which we conceded to him from our head, made from the purest gold and precious gems, and to wear it upon the head to the praise of God for the honor of blessed Peter. But because the most blessed Pope himself did not at all suffer that golden crown to be used over the crown of clerical ordination which he bears for the glory of blessed Peter, with our own hands we placed upon his most sacred head the phrygium, splendid with a shining white color and signifying the Lord's resurrection; and, holding the bridle of his horse out of reverence for blessed Peter, we performed for him the office of strator, establishing that all his successors use that same phrygium singularly in processions in imitation of our empire. § 6. Hence, so that the pontifical summit may not become contemptible but rather be adorned with glory and power beyond the dignity of the earthly empire, behold: we hand over and relinquish to our aforesaid most blessed Pontiff Sylvester, universal Pope, both our palace, as was said before, and the city of Rome and all the provinces, places, and cities of Italy and of the western regions; and by this our divine and pragmatic constitution we decree that they are to be disposed by him and his successors, and we grant that they remain under the right of the holy Roman Church. § 7. Hence we have perceived it fitting that our empire and royal power be transferred to the eastern regions, and that in an excellent place in the province of Byzantium a city be built in our name and our empire be established there, because where the principate of priests and the head of the Christian religion has been established by the heavenly Emperor, it is not just that the earthly emperor have power there. § 8. But all these things which we have established and confirmed by this our sacred imperial command and by other divine decrees, we decree to remain inviolate and unshaken until the end of the world. Hence, before the living God who commanded us to reign and before his terrible judgment, by this our imperial constitution we adjure all our successor emperors, all the nobles, the satraps also, the most ample senate, and the whole people subject to our empire throughout the whole world, now and hereafter in all future times: that none of them is permitted in any manner either to infringe these things or to tear them away in anything. But if anyone, which we do not believe, proves to be a violator or contemner in this, let him be bound under eternal condemnations; let him experience the holy princes of the Apostles of God, Peter and Paul, as contrary to him in the present and future life; and, burned in the lowest hell with the devil, let him perish with all the impious. Confirming the page of this our imperial decree with our own hands, we placed it upon the venerable body of blessed Peter, prince of the Apostles. Given at Rome on the third day before the Kalends of April, in the fourth consulship of our Lord Flavius Constantine Augustus and that of Gallicanus, most illustrious man."] C. XV. Imperial authority does not change the measure of religious administration. Likewise Gelasius, [to the Bishops of Dardania]. Just as a city, though small, does not diminish the prerogative of the present kingdom, so the imperial presence does not change the measure of religious administration. And below: § 1. It has always been effected that judgments concerning priests proceed from a priestly council. For Pontiffs of whatever kind, even if they transgress through human error occurring, yet in no way against religion, are seen in no way able to be struck by secular power.

C. XIV. De eodem.

Constantinus inperator quarta die sui baptismi priuilegium Romanae ecclesiae Pontifici contulit, ut in toto orbe Romano sacerdotes ita hunc caput habeant, sicut iudices regem. In eo priuilegio ita inter cetera legitur: "Utile iudicauimus una cum omnibus satrapis nostris, et uniuerso senatu optimatibusque meis, etiam et cuncto populo Romanae gloriae inperio subiacenti, ut sicut B. Petrus in terris uicarius Filii Dei esse uidetur constitutus, ita et Pontifices, qui ipsius principis apostolorum gerunt uices, principatus potestatem amplius quam terrena inperialis nostrae serenitatis mansuetudo habere uidetur, concessam a nobis nostroque inperio obtineant, eligentes nobis ipsum principem apostolorum uel eius uicarios firmos apud Deum esse patronos. Et sicut nostram terrenam inperialem potentiam, sic eius sacrosanctam Romanam ecclesiam decreuimus ueneranter honorari, et amplius quam nostrum inperium et terrenum thronum sedem sacratissimam B. Petri gloriose exaltari, tribuentes ei potestatem, et gloriae dignitatem atque uigorem, et honorificentiam inperialem. Atque decernentes sancimus, ut principatum teneat tam super quatuor precipuas sedes, Alexandrinam, Antiocenam, Ierosolimitanam, Constantinopolitanam, quam etiam super omnes in uniuerso orbe terrarum ecclesias Dei, et Pontifex, qui pro tempore ipsius sacrosanctae Romanae ecclesiae extiterit, celsior et princeps cunctis sacerdotibus totius mundi existat, et eius iudicio queque ad cultum Dei uel fidei Christianorum stabilitatem procuranda fuerint disponantur." Et infra: §. 1. Ecclesiis beatorum apostolorum Petri et Pauli pro continuatione luminariorum possessionum predia contulimus, et rebus diuersis eas ditauimus, et per nostram inperialem iussionem sacram tam in oriente, quam in occidente, uel etiam septentrionali et meridiana plaga, uidelicet in Iudea, Grecia, Asia, Thracia, Affrica et Italia, uel diuersis insulis, nostra largitate ei concessimus, ea prorsus ratione, ut per manus beatissimi patris nostri Siluestri summi Pontificis successorumque eius omnia disponantur. Et infra: §. 2. Beato Siluestro Patri nostro summo Pontifici et uniuersalis urbis Romae Papae, et omnibus, eius successoribus Pontificibus, qui usque in finem mundi in sede B. Petri erunt sessuri, de presenti contradimus palatium inperii nostri Lateranense, deinde diadema, uidelicet coronam capitis nostri, simulque frigium, nec non et superhumerale, uidelicet lorum, quod inperiale circumdare assolet collum; uerum etiam et clamidem purpuream, atque tunicam coccineam, et omnia inperialia indumenta; sed et dignitatem inperialium presidentium equitum, conferentes etiam et inperialia sceptra, simulque cuncta signa, atque banda, et diuersa ornamenta inperialia, et omnem processionem inperialis culminis et gloriam potestatis nostrae. §. 3. Viris autem reuerentissimis clericis in diuersis ordinibus eidem sacrosanctae Romanae ecclesiae seruientibus illud culmen singularitate, potentia et precellentia habere sancimus, cuius amplissimus noster senatus uidetur gloria adornari, id est patricios atque consules effici, nec non et ceteris dignitatibus inperialibus eos promulgamus decorari. Et sicut inperialis milicia ornatur, ita et clerum sanctae Romanae ecclesiae ornari decernimus. Et quemadmodum inperialis potentia offitiis diuersis, cubiculariorum nempe, et ostiariorum, atque omnium excubitorum ornatur, ita et sanctam Romanam ecclesiam decorari uolumus. Et ut amplissime pontificale decus prefulgeat, decernimus et hoc, clericorum eiusdem sanctae Romanae ecclesiae manipulis et linteaminibus, id est candidissimo colore, decorari equos, ita et equitare. Et sicut noster senatus calciamentis utitur cum udonibus, id est candido linteamine illustratis, sic utantur et clerici, ut sicut celestia, ita et terrena ad laudem Dei decorentur. §. 4. Pre omnibus autem licentiam tribuimus ipsi sanctissimo Patri nostro Siluestro et successoribus eius ex nostro indicto, ut quem placatus proprio consilio clericare uoluerit, et in religiosorum numero clericorum connumerare, nullus ex omnibus presumat superbe agere. §. 5. Decreuimus itaque et hoc, ut ipse et successores eius diademate, uidelicet corona, quam ex capite nostro illi concessimus, ex auro purissimo et gemmis pretiosis uti debeant, et in capite ad laudem Dei pro honore B. Petri gestare. Ipse uero beatissimus Papa, quia super coronam clericatus, quam gerit ad gloriam B. Petri, omnino ipsa ex auro non est passus uti corona, nos frigium candido nitore splendidum, resurrectionem dominicam designans, eius sacratissimo uertici manibus nostris inposuimus, et tenentes frenum equi ipsius pro reuerentia B. Petri stratoris offitium illi exhibuimus, statuentes eodem frigio omnes eius successores singulariter uti in processionibus ad imitationem inperii nostri. §. 6. Unde ut pontificalis apex non uilescat, sed magis quam terreni inperii dignitas gloria et potentia decoretur, ecce tam palatium nostrum, ut predictum est, quam Romanam urbem, et omnes Italiae seu occidentalium regionum prouincias, loca et ciuitates prefato beatissimo Pontifici nostro Siluestro uniuersali Papae contradimus atque relinquimus, et ab eo et a successoribus eius per hanc diualem nostram et pragmaticum constitutum decernimus disponenda, atque iuri sanctae Romanae ecclesiae concedimus permansura. §. 7. Unde congruum perspeximus nostrum inperium et regni potestatem in orientalibus transferri regionibus, et in Bizantiae prouinciae optimo loco nomini nostro ciuitatem edificari, et nostrum illic constitui inperium, quoniam ubi principatus sacerdotum et Christianae religionis caput ab inperatore celesti constitutum est, iustum non est, ut illic inperator terrenus habeat potestatem. §. 8. Hec uero omnia, que per hanc nostram inperialem sacram, et per alia diualia decreta statuimus atque confirmauimus, usque in finem mundi illibata et inconcussa permanere decernimus Unde coram Deo uiuo, qui nos regnare precepit, et coram terribili eius iudicio obtestamur per hoc nostrum inperiale constitutum omnes nostros successores inperatores, uel cunctos optimates, satrapas etiam, amplissimum senatum, et uniuersum populum in toto orbe terrarum nunc et in posterum cunctis retro temporibus inperio nostro subiacentem nulli eorum quoquo modo licere hec aut infringere, aut in quoquam conuellere. Si quis autem, quod non credimus, in hoc temerator aut contemptor extiterit, eternis condempnationibus subiaceat innodatus, et sanctos Dei, principes apostolorum Petrum et Paulum sibi in presenti et in futura uita sentiat contrarios, atque in inferno inferiori concrematus cum diabolo et omnibus deficiat inpiis. Huius uero inperialis decreti nostri paginam propriis manibus roborantes, super uenerandum corpus B. Petri principis apostolorum posuimus. Datum Romae 3. Calendas Aprilis, Domino nostro Flauio Constantino Augusto quater, et Gallicano V. C. Coss.] C. XV. Inperialis auctoritas religiosae dispensationis mensuram non mutat. Item Gelasius. [ad Episcopos Dardaniae] Sicut quamuis parua ciuitas prerogatiuam presentis regni non minuit, sic inperialis presentia mensuram dispensationis religiosae non mutat. Et infra: §. 1. Semper est effectum sacerdotali concilio de sacerdotibus iudicia prouenire. Nam qualescumque pontifices, etsi errore humanitus accidente, non tamen contra religionem ullatenus excedentes, nullatenus uidentur a seculari potestate posse percelli.

C. XVI. It belongs to a good prince to restore shattered churches, not to persecute Pontiffs.

Likewise Pope Marcellus to Maxentius. It belongs to a good and religious prince to restore shattered and torn churches, to build new ones, and to honor and protect the priests of God. Hence we read that the holy Apostles and their successors, constituted under divine adjuration, commanded that persecutions ought not to be made, disturbances not inflicted, those laboring in the Lord's field not envied, and the stewards of the eternal King not expelled.

> C. XVI. Ecclesias restaurare contritas, non pontifices persequi boni principis est.
>
> Item Marcellus Papa Maxentio. Boni principis est ac religiosi ecclesias contritas atque conscissas restaurare, nouasque edificare, et Dei sacerdotes honorare atque tueri. Unde sanctos apostolos eorumque successores sub diuina contestacione constitutos precepisse legimus, non debere fieri persecutiones, nec inferri fluctuaciones, nec inuidere laborantibus in agro dominico, nec expelli eterni regis dispensatores.

Distinction XCVII

GRATIAN. Part I. By this chapter it is openly shown that neither the emperor nor any layman is permitted to decree anything concerning either the election of the Pontiff or ecclesiastical property. But whatever things are established by them are to be held as not done unless they have been strengthened by the subscription of the Roman Pontiff. Hence that decree of the Emperor Honorius, as was said above, appears vain because he attempted to decree concerning the election of the Supreme Pontiff contrary to the authority of the sacred canons. But, as is held from the same chapter, at the prayers of the Church the emperor can decree against presumptuous persons, as emperors are once read to have decreed for the defense of the faith that heretics should possess nothing in the name of the Church. But when they are not invited by her, they have no faculty to dispose anything concerning ecclesiastical property. The Emperor Honorius, however, not by his own authority but at the supplication of blessed Boniface, took care to provide for ecclesiastical quiet and punish the ambition of the contenders. Hence the same Bishop Boniface sent a letter of supplication to the Emperor Honorius, saying:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Hoc capitulo patenter ostenditur, quod nec inperatori, nec cuilibet laico licet decernere uel de electione Pontificis uel de rebus ecclesiasticis. Quecumque autem ab eis constituta fuerint, pro infectis habenda sunt, nisi subscriptione Romani Pontificis fuerint roborata. Unde illud Honorii Augusti, ut supra dictum est, uanum esse uidetur, quod contra auctoritatem sacrorum canonum de electione summi Pontificis decernere temptauerit. Sed sicut ex eodem capitulo habetur, precibus ecclesiae inperator in presumptores ualet decernere, sicut pro defensione fidei quondam decreuisse leguntur, ne heretici aliquid nomine ecclesiae possiderent. Ab ea autem non inuitati de rebus ecclesiasticis aliquid disponendi non habent facultatem. Honorius uero Augustus non sua auctoritate, sed B. Bonifatio suplicante, ecclesiasticae quieti consulere et concertantium ambitionem punire curauit. Unde idem Bonifatius Episcopus suplicationis epistolam Honorio Augusto destinauit, dicens:

C. I. The letter of Boniface to the Emperor Honorius.

Care for my Church, to which our God deputed my priesthood while you govern human affairs, constrains us, lest we be judged absent before the ears of the most Christian prince from its causes, although I am still detained by bodily infirmity, because of the assemblies which are agitated by all the priests and clerics and by disturbances of the Christian people. For if it should happen otherwise than it ought, not you who compose all things with equitable moderation, but we through our silent idleness will seem to have admitted what can overthrow the quiet of the city and the peace of the Church. For since, with the Lord favoring, as a worshiper of the divine religion you provide for human affairs, it will be our fault if under your glory—which it is certain has always favored divine affairs with a more inclined spirit—that is not guarded by firm and stable law which obtained through the course of so many years even under those princes whom no care for our religion constrained: namely, that lawful things be preserved and, under the rule of your clemency, things which are unlawful be feared in no way. § 1. For the Church herself, most Christian Emperor, addresses your devotion, indeed through my speech but with her own venerable affection. Christ our God, the ruler of your faith and governor of your empire, preserves her for himself alone as a betrothed and untouched virgin, so that you may not suffer any waves of plotting storms to be dashed against her or her tranquil face to be disturbed by the swelling of an unaccustomed tempest, most glorious and tranquil Emperor, ever Augustus. She herself, who is betrothed to one yet is your mother, the Church, addresses your piety through the legation which she committed to her priests, and recalls past and present things. While you rule most religiously, she says, the people are now secure, as faithful to God as to you, a Christian prince. Behold, amid her mysteries and amid her prayers, which she renders for the felicity of your empire, with Saint Peter as witness before whom and concerning whose see the matter is treated, she cries out with solicitous voices for the observance of religion. Prayer is mingled with solicitous petition, lest discord, once torn loose while the accustomed tempter secretly solicits these men toward diverse things, rend them apart. Mother Church would be distressed by more things, most Christian prince, unless her causes were secure with you, and unless in the oppressions of idols and the correction of heretics she had conquered through your faith, with divine worship always flourishing together with the empire. § 2. She has as a pious refuge the mind of your clemency, joined with veneration of her religion, since you do whatever may profit her. Confer with my brothers and fellow priests, most approved men sent as legates by me and by all who constitute the Church; while they prosecute the cause of sacred religion, we pray that in the city of your clemency, with that spirit by which you grant petitions, you consult for the state of the universal Church and establish it in perpetuity.

C. I. Epistola Bonifatii ad Honorium Augustum.

Ecclesiae meae, cui Deus noster meum sacerdotium uobis res humanas regentibus deputauit, nos cura constringit, ne causis eius, quamuis adhuc corporis incommoditate detinear, propter conuentus, qui a sacerdotibus et clericis uniuersis et Christianae plebis perturbationibus agitantur, apud aures Christianissimi principis existimemur desse. Si enim secus quam oportet eueniat, non uos id facere, qui cuncta equa moderatione conponitis, sed nos per nostram tacentem desidiam uidebimur quod ciuitatis quietem et ecclesiae pacem peruertere ualeat admisisse. Cum enim humanis rebus diuinae cultor religionis Domino fauente prouideas, nostra culpa erit, si non id sub uestra gloria, quam certum est diuinis semper rebus animo propensiori fauisse, firmo et stabili iure custodiatur, quod per tot annorum seriem sub illis etiam principibus obtinuit, quos nulla nostrae religionis cura constrinxit, id est, ut licita seruentur, et sub uestrae inperio clementiae minime que sunt illicita formidentur. §. 1. Ipsa enim ecclesia deuotionem tuam, Christianissime inperator, meo quidem sermone, sed suo uenerabili affectu appellat, quam Christus Deus noster, uestrae fidei rector et uestri inperii gubernator, sibi uni desponsatam et intactam uirginem seruat, ne in ea aliquos patiamini insidiantium procellarum fluctus illidi, et quietam faciem tempestatis insolitae tumore turbari, gloriosissime et tranquillissime inperator semper auguste. Ipsa uero (que uni desponsata est, uestra tamen mater est) ecclesia pietatem uestram legatione, quam suis sacerdotibus commisit, appellat, preterita presentiaque repetit. Vobis, inquit, religiosissime inperantibus modo tutus est populus, tam fidus Deo quam tibi, principi Christiano. Ecce enim inter misteria, inter preces suas, quas pro uestri felicitate dependit inperii, teste, apud quem et de cuius sede agitur, sancto Petro, sollicitis pro religionis obseruantia uocibus clamat, cum sollicita peticione miscetur oratio, ne hos in uarias res solito temptatore occulte sollicitante semel euulsa discordia distrahat. Angeretur pluribus, princeps Christianissime, mater ecclesia, nisi apud te suarum esset secura causarum, et in obpressionibus idolorum, in hereticorum correctionibus, fide tua, diuino cultu pariter cum inperio semper florente, uicisset. §. 2. Habet refugium pium tuae mansuetudinis animum, cum suae religionis ueneratione coniunctum, cum, quicquid huic proficiat, uos agatis, conferatis fratribus et consacerdotibus meis, probatissimis uiris, a me et ab omnibus (qui ecclesiam faciunt legatis; quibus prosequentibus (precamur) causa sacrae religionis, ut in urbe uestrae mansuetudinis hoc animo, quo postulatis annuitis, in perpetuum statui uniuersalis ecclesiae consultatis.

C. II. The rescript of Honorius to Pope Boniface.

Victor Honorius, illustrious, triumphant, ever Augustus, to the holy and venerable Boniface, Pope of the eternal city. We received the writings of your blessedness with the due rejoicing of reverence, and, when they had been read, we gave the greatest thanks to almighty God because we learned that, after a long infirmity, your holiness had been restored to the desired health. And therefore, as the venerable men return, we mark our joy by the attestation of sacred letters and ask that your apostolate deign to bestow its zeal and prayer in daily prayers for our health and empire. But know that it has sufficiently pleased our piety that your holiness is solicitous concerning the disturbance of the churches and people. So that it cannot happen by any reason, our clemency believes that sufficient provision has been made. Finally, with your blessedness proclaiming it, we will that this come to the knowledge of all clerics: that, if by human lot anything should perhaps happen to your religious person—which we do not desire—all are to know that they must cease from ambitions. And if two contrary to divine law, etc., as above. And below: § 1. Hence this is to be observed: that all preserve a tranquil mind and peaceful spirits from the admonition of our serenity, and that they not attempt to try anything seditious through conspiracies, since it is certain that the efforts of neither party will profit it. Part II. GRATIAN. It is not the custom of the Roman Church to receive a legation from anywhere without sealed letters.

C. II. Rescriptum Honorii ad Bonifatium Papam.

Victor Honorius, inclitus, triumphator, semper augustus, sancto ac uenerabili Bonifatio Papae urbis eternae. Scripta beatitudinis uestrae debita reuerentiae gratulatione suscepimus, quibus recensitis egimus omnipotenti

Deo maximas gratias, quod sanctimoniam tuam post longum incommodum optatae redditam didicimus sanitati. Et ideo reuertentibus uenerabilibus uiris gaudium nostrum sacrorum apicum attestatione signamus, ac petimus, uti cottidianis orationibus apostolatus tuus studium ac uotum suum circa salutem atque inperium nostrum inpendere dignetur. Illud autem pietati nostrae satis placuisse cognosce, quod sanctimonia tua de ecclesiarum ac populi perturbatione sollicita est. Que ut aliqua ratione non possit euenire, satis clementia nostra credidit esse prouisum. Denique beatitudine tua predicante id ad cunctorum clericorum noticiam uolumus peruenire, ut, si quid forte religioni tuae (quod non optamus) humana sorte contigerit, sciant omnes ab ambitionibus esse cessandum. Ac si duo contra fas etc., ut supra. Et infra: §. 1. Unde id seruandum est, ut omnes tranquillam mentem et pacificos animos ex serenitatis nostrae admonicione custodiant, nec aliquid seditionis conspirationibus temptare conentur, cum certum sit, nulli partium sua studia profutura. II. Pars. Gratian. Sine signatis apicibus non est mos Romanae ecclesiae undecumque legationem suscipere.

C. III. The Roman Church is not accustomed to receive a legation from anywhere without sealed letters.

The most noble and vigorous man, the legate of your sublimity, although he brought no letter from you to our pontificate according to custom, and although it has never been the custom of the apostolic see to receive a legation from anywhere without sealed letters, nevertheless, honoring you in him and recognizing his gravity and the truthful assertions of his words, we both received him as was fitting and believed him as was honorable.

> C. III. Romana non consueuit ecclesia sine signatis apicibus legationem undecumque suscipere.
> Nobilissimus uir atque strenuus uestrae sublimitatis legatus, licet nullam epistolam iuxta consuetudinem a uobis nostro Pontificio detulisset, licet numquam apostolicae sedis moris fuerit absque signatis apicibus undecumque legationem suscipere, nos tamen uos in illa honorantes, eiusque grauitatem et eloquiorum illius ueridicas cognoscentes assertiones, nichilominus eum et sicut decuit suscepimus, et ei, sicut honestum fuit, credidimus.

Distinction XCVIII

GRATIAN. What things are to be observed concerning those to be ordained, and what things are diligently to be considered in their election, have been shown by the authorities of many. But because the truth of the matter is sometimes obscured by a change of province, it was decreed by the sacred canons that strangers are not to be ordained unless they have been commended by the written attestations of five or more of their own bishops.

Hence Pope Sylvester, presiding in a general synod, said:

> GRATIANUS. Que circa ordinandos sint obseruanda, que in eorum electione diligenter sint consideranda, multorum auctoritatibus monstrata sunt. Sed quia ueritas rei nonnumquam obscuratur mutacione prouinciae, decretum est sacris canonibus, ut peregrini, nisi quinque uel eo amplius suorum episcoporum fuerint commendati cyrographis, non ordinentur.
> Unde Siluester papa presidens in generali sinodo dixit:

C. I. Let no one receive a transmarine man into the clergy unless he is designated by the letters of five bishops.

Let no one among us for any reason receive a transmarine man into a grade of the clergy unless he is designated by written attestations of five bishops.

> C. I. Nisi quinque episcoporum litteris designatum, transmarinum hominem ad clericatum nullus suscipiat.
> Nullus aliqua ratione transmarinum hominem penes nos in clericatus gradu suscipiat, nisi quinque episcoporum designatus sit cyrographis.

C. II. On the same.

Likewise Anastasius [I], Bishop of the city of Rome, to all the Bishops, [epistle I, c. 2]. Let no one receive transmarine men into the honor of the clergy unless they have been designated by written attestations of five or more bishops, because many things customarily happen through surreption.

> C. II. De eodem.

Item Anastasius [I.] urbis Romae Episcopus omnibus Episcopis. [ep. I. cap. 2.] Transmarinos homines in clericatus honore nemo suscipiat, nisi quinque aut eo amplius episcoporum cyrographis fuerint designati, quia per subreptionem multa solent euenire.

C. III. On the same.

Likewise Gregory, prelate of the Roman Church, to the Bishop of Squillace, [book II, epistle 25]. By no reason are you to receive indiscriminately Africans and unknown strangers seeking ecclesiastical orders, because some among the Africans are Manichaeans and others have been rebaptized; but very many strangers constituted in the lesser orders have often been proved to have pretended higher honors concerning themselves.

C. III. De eodem.

Item Gregorius Romanae Ecclesiae presul Squillatiano Episcopo. [lib. II. epist. 25.] Affros passim, et ignaros peregrinos, ad ecclesiasticos ordines tendentes, nulla ratione suscipias, quia Affrorum alii quidam sunt Manichei, alii rebaptizati; peregrini uero plurimi in minoribus ordinibus constituti fortiores de se pretendisse honores sepe probati sunt.

C. IV. Those who have been baptized abroad are not to be promoted to the clergy.

Likewise from the Council of Elvira, [c. 24]. Concerning all who have been baptized abroad, because their life is not at all known, it pleased the council that they are not to be promoted to the clergy in foreign provinces.

C. IV. Non sunt promouendi ad clerum, qui inperegre fuerint baptizati.

Item ex Concilio Eliberitano. [c. 24.] Omnes, qui inperegre fuerint baptizati, eo quod eorum minime sit cognita uita, placuit ad clerum non esse promouendos in alienis prouintiis.

Distinction XCIX

GRATIAN. Part I. But concerning primates, of whom we made mention above, it is asked what grade they hold in the Church, whether they differ in anything from patriarchs, and what obedience archbishops owe them. Primates and patriarchs are of diverse names but of the same office. Whenever it is necessary, bishops appeal from archbishops to primates, but it is not permitted to appeal from primates to archbishops. Archbishops also owe obedience to primates in all things which have justly been commanded to them by the primates. Hence Pope Anacletus says, [to the Bishops of Italy, epistle II]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. De primatibus autem (quorum supra mentionem fecimus) queritur, quem gradum in ecclesia obtineant? an in aliquo a patriarchis differant? quam obedientium archiepiscopi eis debeant? primates et patriarchae diuersorum sunt nominum, sed eiusdem offitii. Ab archiepiscopis, quotiens necesse fuerit, episcopi ad primates appellant, sed a primatibus ad archiepiscopos appellari non licet. Debent quoque obedientiam primatibus archiepiscopi in omnibus, que sibi ab eis fuerint iuste inperata. Unde Anacletus Papa ait: [ad Episcopos Italiae, epist. II.]

C. I. What obedience is to be displayed to primates.

For the most part, the provinces were divided a long time before the coming of Christ, and afterward that division was renewed by the Apostles and blessed Clement our predecessor. And in the capitals of the provinces, where formerly there were the primates of secular law and the first judicial power—to whom those dwelling throughout the remaining cities fled whenever it was necessary for them, when they could not flee to the court of the emperors or kings or were not permitted to do so, because of their oppressions or injustices, and appealed to them whenever there was need, as was commanded in their law—the divine and ecclesiastical laws likewise commanded that in those same cities or places our patriarchs or primates, who keep one form although their names are diverse, be placed and exist, to whom bishops might flee if it were necessary and whom they might appeal to, and that these should enjoy the name of primacy. But the remaining metropolitan cities which had lesser judges—although they were greater than counts—were to have their own metropolitans, who would justly obey the aforesaid primates, as was also formerly ordained in the laws of the age, and who would enjoy not the name of primates but that either of metropolitans or archbishops.

> C. I. Que obedientia sit exhibenda primatibus.
> Prouintiae multo ante Christi aduentum tempore diuisae sunt maxima ex parte, et postea ab apostolis et B. Clemente predecessore nostro ipsa diuisio est renouata. Et in capite prouintiarum, ubi dudum primates erant legis seculi ac prima iudiciaria potestas, ad quos, qui per reliquas ciuitates commorabantur, quando eis necesse erat, qui ad aulam inperatorum uel regum confugere non poterant uel quibus permissum non erat, confugiebant pro obpressionibus uel iniusticiis suis, ipsosque appellabant quotiens opus erat, sicut in lege eorum preceptum erat, ipsis quoque in ciuitatibus uel locis nostris patriarchas uel primates, qui unam formam tenent, licet diuersa sint nomina, leges diuinae et ecclesiasticae poni et esse iusserunt, ad quos episcopi, si necesse fuerit, confugerent eosque appellarent, et ipsi primatum nomine fruerentur. Reliquae uero metropolitanae ciuitates, que minores iudices habebant (licet maiores comitibus essent) haberent metropolitanos suos, qui predictis iuste obedirent primatibus, sicut et in legibus seculi olim ordinatum erat, qui non primatum, sed aut metropolitanorum, aut archiepiscoporum nomine fruerentur.

C. II. Let none be called primates except those who hold the first sees.

Likewise Anicetus, [to the Bishops of Gaul]. Part II. Let no archbishops be called primates except those who hold the first sees, whose bishops the Apostles and their successors regularly established to be patriarchs or primates, unless some nation is thereafter converted to the faith for which it is necessary, because of its multitude, that a primate be established. Let the others who hold other metropolises be named metropolitans.

> C. II. Non uocentur primates, nisi qui primas sedes tenent.
> Item Anicetus. [ad Episcopos Galliae] II. Pars. Nulli archiepiscopi primates uocentur, nisi illi, qui primas sedes tenent, quarum episcopos apostoli eorumque successores regulariter patriarchas uel primates esse constituerunt, nisi aliqua gens deinceps ad fidem conuertatur, cui necesse sit pre multitudine primatem constitui. Reliqui metropolitani nominentur, qui alias metropoles tenent.

C. III. Let the bishop of the first see not be called prince of the priests or supreme priest.

Likewise from the African Council, [c. 6]. Let the bishop of the first see not be called prince of the priests, or supreme priest, or anything of this kind, but only bishop of the first see. Part II. But not even the Roman Pontiff is to be called universal. Hence Pope Pelagius to all the Bishops:

> C. III. Princeps summus sacerdotum non appelletur primae sedis episcopus.
>
> Item ex Concilio Affricano. [c. 6.] Primae sedis episcopus non appelletur princeps sacerdotum, aut summus sacerdos, aut aliquid huiusmodi, sed tantum primae sedis episcopus. II. Pars. Uniuersalis autem nec etiam Romanus pontifex appelletur. Unde Pelagius papa omnibus Episcopis:

C. IV. Not even the Roman Pontiff is to be called universal.

Let none of the patriarchs ever use the title of universality, because, if one patriarch is called universal, the name of patriarch is derogated from the others. But far be this from the faithful: that anyone should wish to seize for himself that from which he may seem to diminish the honor of his brothers in however small a part. Wherefore, let your charity never name anyone universal in its letters, lest it take away what is owed to itself when it offers undue honor to another.

> C. IV. Nec etiam Romanus Pontifex uniuersalis est appellandus.
> Nullus patriarcharum uocabulo uniuersalitatis umquam utatur, quia, si unus patriarcha uniuersalis dicitur, patriarcharum nomen ceteris derogatur. Sed absit hoc a fidelibus, hoc sibi quempiam uelle arripere, unde honorem fratrum suorum imminuere ex quantulacumque parte uideatur. Quapropter karitas uestra neminem umquam suis in epistolis uniuersalem nominet, ne sibi debitum subtrahat, cum alteri honorem offert indebitum.

C. V. On the same.

Likewise Gregory to Eulogius, Patriarch of Alexandria, [book VII, epistle 30, indiction 1]. Behold, in the preface of the letter which you directed to me—the very man who prohibited it—you took care to impress a word of proud appellation, calling me universal Pope. I ask that your most sweet holiness do this to me no more, because what is furnished to another beyond what reason demands is taken away from you. I do not seek to prosper through words but through conduct, nor do I reckon as honor that in which I know my brothers lose their honor. For my honor is that of the universal Church; my honor is the sound strength of my brothers. Then I am honored, when the honor owed to each and every one is not denied. For if your holiness calls me universal Pope, it denies itself to be that which it confesses me to be universally. But far be this; let words which inflate unity and wound charity depart.

> C. V. De eodem.
> Item Gregorius Eulogio Patriarchae Alexandrino. [lib. VII. epist. 30. Indict. 1.] Ecce in prefatione epistolae, quam ad me ipsum, qui prohibui, direxistis, superbae appellationis uerbum, uniuersalem me Papam dicens, inprimere curastis. Quod peto mihi dulcissima sanctitas uestra ultra non faciat, quia uobis subtrahitur, quod alteri plus quam ratio exigit prebetur. Ego non uerbis quero prosperari, sed moribus, nec honorem esse deputo, in quo fratres meos honorem suum perdere cognosco. Meus namque est honor uniuersalis ecclesiae, meus honor est fratrum meorum solidus uigor. Tunc ego honoratus sum, cum singulis quibusque honor debitus non negatur. Si enim uniuersalem me Papam uestra sanctitas dicit, negat se hoc esse, quod me fatetur uniuersum. Sed absit hoc, recedant uerba, que unitatem inflant, karitatem uulnerant.

Distinction C

GRATIAN. Part I. Neither an archbishop, primate, nor patriarch is permitted to ordain bishops before receiving the pallium. This is given to be understood from the authority of Pope Pelagius, although less evidently. For Pope Pelagius says:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Episcopos autem ordinare ante pallium acceptum nec archiepiscopo, nec primati, nec patriarchae licet, quod ex auctoritate Pelagii Papae (licet minus euidenter) datur intelligi. Ait enim Pelagius Papa:

C. I. Let every metropolitan strive within three months to expound his faith and request the pallium from the Roman Church.

Because certain metropolitans, refusing to expound their faith to the holy apostolic see according to ancient custom, neither seek nor receive the use of the pallium, and through this the consecration of bishops for widowed churches is prolonged not without danger, it has pleased us that whichever metropolitan does not send to the apostolic see within three months of his consecration to expound his faith and receive the pallium is to lack the dignity committed to him; and let there be license for other metropolitans, after a second and third admonition, to assist widowed churches by ordaining a bishop with the counsel of the Roman Pontiff. § 1. But if it has resulted from the negligence of the bishop to be consecrated that the church remains widowed beyond three months, let him be deprived of communion until he either yields the place or does not defer to offer himself for consecration. But if through his negligence he keeps the church widowed beyond five months, let him receive the gift of consecration neither there nor elsewhere; rather, let him yield at the judgment of his metropolitan.

C. I. Infra tres menses fidem suam exponere et pallium postulare a Romana ecclesia quisque metropolitanus studeat.

Quoniam quidam metropolitanorum fidem suam secundum priscam consuetudinem sanctae sedi apostolicae exponere detrectantes usum pallii neque expetunt, neque percipiunt, ac per hoc episcoporum consecratio uiduatis ecclesiis non sine periculo protelatur, placuit, ut quisquis metropolitanus ultra tres menses consecrationis suae ad fidem suam exponendam palliumque suscipiendum ad apostolicam sedem non miserit, commissa sibi dignitate careat, sitque licentia metropolitanis aliis, post secundam et tertiam commonitionem uiduatis ecclesiis cum consilio Romani Pontificis ordinando episcopum subuenire. §. 1. Si uero consecrandi episcopi negligentia prouenerit, ut ultra tres menses ecclesia uiduata consistat, communione priuetur, quousque aut loco cedat, aut se consecrandum offerre non differat. Quod si ultra quinque menses per suam negligentiam retinuerit uiduatam ecclesiam, neque ibi, neque alibi consecrationis donum percipiat, imo metropolitani sui iudicio cedat.

C. II. Let the honor of the pallium not be given unless the merits of the causes demand it and to one petitioning strongly.

Likewise Pope Gregory to Queen Brunhild, [book VII, epistle 5]. Part II. Ancient custom has maintained that the honor of the pallium ought not to be given unless the merits of the causes demand it and to one petitioning strongly.

[PALEA.

C. II. Honor pallii non detur nisi meritis exigentibus et fortiter postulanti.

Item Gregorius papa Brunichildae Reginae. [lib. VII. epist. 5.] II. Pars. Prisca consuetudo obtinuit, ut honor pallii nisi exigentibus causarum meritis et fortiter postulanti dari non debeat.

[PALEA.

C. III. On the same.

The same to John, Bishop of the Corinthians, book IV, epistle 55. Your holiness knows that formerly the pallium was not given unless a payment had been made. Because this was unfitting, after a council had been held before the body of blessed Peter, prince of the Apostles, we prohibited under strict interdiction that anything be received either for this or for ordinations. Therefore it is necessary that, neither through payment nor through favor or the supplication of certain persons, you consent to or permit anyone to be brought to sacred orders.] Part III. GRATIAN. But the merits of the causes are to be understood so that both the one who petitions deserves to receive, and that he first confirm the profession of his faith by an oath and likewise give assurance that he will obey apostolic decrees and synodal statutes. But no metropolitan will be permitted to use the pallium except on fixed days and within the church at the solemnities of the masses. Hence Bishop John to Willibert, Bishop of Cologne:

C. III. De eodem.

Idem Iohanni Corinthiorum Episcopo, libro 4. epistola 55. Nouit sanctitas tua quia prius pallium nisi dato commodo non dabatur. Quod quoniam incongruum erat, facto concilio ante corpus B. Petri apostolorum principis, tam de hoc quam de ordinationibus aliquid accipere sub districta interdictione uetuimus. Oportet ergo, ut neque per commodum, neque per gratiam aut quorumdam suplicationem aliquos ad sacros ordines consentiatis uel permittatis adduci.] III. Pars. Gratian. Causarum uero merita accipienda sunt, ut et is, qui postulat, mereatur accipere, et fidei suae professionem prius iuramento confirmet, et apostolicis decretis atque sinodalibus statutis se obediturum nichilominus caueat. Pallio autem non nisi certis diebus et intra ecclesiam ad missarum solempnia cuiquam metropolitano uti licebit. Unde Iohannes Episcopus Williberto Agripinensi Episcopo:

C. IV. The pallium ought not to be given except after the customary profession of faith.

We have been unable now to confer upon you the desired pallium because we found the document of your faith to contain less than it ought, since, namely, you made no mention in it according to custom of the holy universal synods in which the symbol of our faith is contained, nor of the constitutions of the decretal Roman Pontiffs; nor had you secured it by your own subscription, nor sent anyone who would confirm it by an oath.

C. IV. Nisi post consuetam fidei professionem pallium dari non debet.

Optatum tibi pallium nunc conferre nequiuimus, quia fidei tuae paginam minus quam oportet continere reperimus, cum uidelicet nullam in ea sanctarum uniuersalium sinodorum, in quibus fidei nostrae simbolum continetur, nec decretalium Pontificum Romanorum constitutorum secundum morem feceris mentionem, sed nec illam propria subscriptione munieras, nec aliquem, qui hanc iureiurando firmaret miseras.

C. V. Let one who desires to receive the pallium first promise to remove unlawful things.

Likewise Gregory to Aregius, Bishop of the Franks, [book VII, epistle III]. We will that your holiness participate in that synod which we decreed is to be assembled against the simoniacal heresy through our brother and fellow bishop Syagrius, and that the pallium which we transmitted be given to that same brother upon this condition: if he first promises that by the determination of the synod he will remove from the holy Church the unlawful things which we prohibited. Concerning that synod we will that your fraternity, by dispatching writings, announce the whole order to us in detail, so that he himself, whose holiness is exceedingly well tested by us, may render us more certain concerning all things.

> C. V. Qui pallium desiderat accipere, prius illicita a se amouere promittat.
> Item Gregorius Aregio Episcopo Francorum. [lib. VII. epist. III.] In ea sinodo, quam contra symoniacam heresim per fratrem et coepiscopum nostrum Siagrium decreuimus congregari, sanctitatem uestram uolumus interesse, atque eidem fratri ita pallium, quod transmisimus, tribui, si prius se promiserit illicita, que prohibuimus, per diffinitionem sinodi a sancta ecclesia remouere. De qua sinodo omnem nobis subtiliter ordinem tuam fraternitatem scriptis discurrentibus uolumus nunciare, ut ipse, cuius nobis sanctitas ualde experta est, nos reddat de omnibus certiores.

C. VI. An archbishop is permitted to use the pallium only at the solemnities of the masses.

The same to Vigilius, Bishop of Arles, [book IV, epistle 51]. Part IV. We have transmitted the pallium to you, which your fraternity is to use within the church only at the solemnities of the masses.

[PALEA.

> C. VI. Nonnisi ad missarum solempnia archiepiscopo uti pallio licet.
>
> Idem Vigilio Episcopo Arelatensi. [lib. IV. epist. 51.] IV. Pars. Pallium tibi transmisimus, quo fraternitas tua intra ecclesiam ad sola missarum solempnia utatur.
> [PALEA.

C. VII. On the same.

The same to John, Bishop of Ravenna, book II, epistle 54, indiction II. It is not a long interval of time since certain things concerning your fraternity were reported to us, concerning which we remember that, when Castorius, notary of the holy Church over which we preside by God's authority, came there, we indicated our mind to you in detail. For it had come to us that certain things were done in your church contrary to the path of custom and humility, which alone, as you well know, is the exaltation of priestly office. If your wisdom had received these things meekly or with episcopal zeal, it ought not to have been inflamed concerning them, but it was fitting that you correct these same things with thanksgiving.]

> C. VII. De eodem.
> Idem Iohanni Rauennati Episcopo libro II. epistola 54. Indictione II. Non multum temporis interuallum est, quod quedam nobis de tua fraternitate fuerunt nunciata, de quibus uobis, ueniente illuc Castorio, notario sanctae, cui Deo auctore presidemus, ecclesiae, subtiliter nos indicasse meminimus. Peruenerat namque ad nos quedam in ecclesia uestra contra consuetudinis atque humilitatis tramitem geri, que sola (ut bene nostis) est offitii sacerdotalis erectio. Que si sapientia uestra mansuete, uel cum episcopali suscepisset studio, non de illis accendi debuerat, sed oportuerat te hec eadem cum gratiarum actione corrigere.]

C. VIII. On the same.

The same to John, Bishop of Ravenna, [in the same epistle]. It is contrary to ecclesiastical custom if even an unjust correction is not borne most patiently—which be far from us. And below: § 1. We do not think this unknown to you, most beloved brother: that it is heard concerning almost no metropolitan in any regions of the world that he claimed for himself the use of the pallium outside the time of the masses. And that you know well this custom of the universal Church you signified to us by your most manifest letters, with which you transmitted to us, attached beneath, the precept of our predecessor Pope John of blessed memory, containing that all the customs conceded to you and your church by the privilege of our predecessors ought to be preserved. Therefore you confess that the custom of the universal Church is otherwise, since you claim by privilege those things which you perform. Therefore, as we judge, no doubt can remain for us in this matter. For either the custom of all metropolitans is also to be observed by your fraternity; or, if you say that something was especially conceded to your church by former Pontiffs of the city of Rome, a precept showing that these things were conceded to the church of Ravenna ought to be produced by you. But if this is not shown, it remains that, since you claim to do such things neither by universal custom nor by privilege, you prove that you usurped what you did. And below: § 2. Perhaps those unbecoming in conduct wish to be adorned by the pallium, though nothing shines more splendidly upon an episcopal neck than humility. Therefore, if your fraternity has proposed with a steadfast mind to defend its honors for itself by any arguments, it must either follow the universal usage from the unwritten custom or protect itself by privileges from a written instrument. But if finally there is neither of these, we are unwilling that you furnish to the other metropolitans an example of this presumption. Part V. GRATIAN. Privileges also ought always to be conceded together with the use of the pallium. Hence the same Gregory to Syagrius, Bishop of Autun, [book VII, epistle 112]:

C. VIII. De eodem.

Idem Iohanni Episcopo Rauennati. [in eadem epistola] Contra morem est ecclesiasticum, si non patientissime toleratur (quod a nobis absit) etiam iniusta correptio. Et infra: §. 1. Illud, frater karrissime, tibi non putamus ignotum, quod prope de nullo metropolitano in quibuslibet mundi patribus sit auditum, extra missarum tempus usum sibi pallii uendicasse. Et quod bene hanc consuetudinem generalis ecclesiae noueritis, uestris nobis manifestissimis epistolis significastis, quibus preceptum beatae memoriae decessoris nostri Iohannis Papae nobis in subditis transmisistis adnexum, continens omnes consuetudines ex priuilegio decessorum nostrorum concessas uobis uestraeque ecclesiae debere conseruari. Confitemini igitur aliam esse generalis ecclesiae consuetudinem, postquam ea, que geritis, uobis ex priuilegio uendicatis. Nulla ergo nobis in hac re, ut arbitramur, poterit remanere dubietas. Aut enim mos omnium metropolitanorum et tua est fraternitate seruandus, aut, si tuae ecclesiae aliquid specialiter dicis esse concessum preceptumue a prioribus Romanae urbis Pontificibus, quod hec Rauennati ecclesiae sunt concessa, a uobis oportet ostendi. Quod si hoc non ostenditur, restat, postquam talia agere neque consuetudine generali neque priuilegio uendicas, usurpasse te conprobes quod fecisti. Et infra: §. 2. Decorari pallio uolumus forsan moribus indecori, dum nichil in episcopali ceruice splendidius fulget quam humilitas. Oportet ergo fraternitatem tuam, si honores suos sibi quibuslibet argumentis stabili proposuit mente defendere, aut generalitatis usum ex non scripto sequi, aut ex scripto priuilegiis se tueri. Quod si postremo nichil horum est, aliis metropolitanis huius te prebere nolumus presumptionis exemplum. V. Pars. Gratian. Priuilegia quoque semper cum usu pallii debent concedi. Unde idem Gregorius Siagrio Episcopo Augustodunensi: [lib. VII. epist. 112.]

C. IX. On the same.

The order of reason altogether admonishes us that we ought to grant certain privileges together with the use of the pallium. But because, together with an increase of honor, the care of solicitude also ought to increase, so that the ornaments of action may accord with the cultivation of garments, it is fitting that your fraternity exercise itself more earnestly in all pursuits and be vigilant concerning the acts of its subjects.

C. IX. De eodem.

Rationis ordo omnino nos admonet, ut cum usu pallii aliqua largiri priuilegia debeamus. Sed quoniam cum honoris augmento cura quoque sollicitudinis debet excrescere, ut cultui uestium actionis quoque ornamenta conueniant, oportet, ut enixius in cunctis studiis uestra se fraternitas exerceat, et circa subiectorum actus sit uigilans.

C. X. The use of the pallium is conceded, and ancient privileges are renewed.

The same to John, Bishop of First Justiniana in Illyricum, [book IV, epistle 15]. We have transmitted the pallium to you according to custom, and by renewed repetition we decree that you exercise the vicariate of the apostolic see.

C. X. Usus pallii conceditur, et antiqua priuilegia innouantur.

Idem Iohanni Episcopo primae Iustinianae Illirici. [lib. IV. epist. 15.] Pallium uobis ex more transmisimus, et uices uos apostolicae sedis agere iterata innouatione decernimus.

C. XI. On the same.

The same to the Bishops of Epirus, [book V, epistle 7, indiction 14]. The notification of your writings, most beloved brothers, disclosed that Andrew, bishop of the city of Nicomedia, has by God's favor been solemnly ordained. Know that we have directed the pallium to him and conceded all the privileges which our predecessors conferred upon his predecessors.

C. XI. De eodem.

Idem Episcopis Epiri. [lib. V. epist. 7. Indict. 14.] Scriptorum uestrorum insinuatio, fratres karissimi, patefecit, Andream Nicomedianae ciuitatis episcopum Deo propitio solempniter ordinatum, cui pallium nos direxisse cognoscite, atque cuncta priuilegia concessisse, que predecessores nostri eius predecessoribus contulerunt.

Distinction CI

GRATIAN. But in one province there ought not to be two metropolitans, as was established in the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 12]:

GRATIANUS. In una autem prouincia duo metropolitani esse non debent, sicut in Calcedonensi Concilio [cap. 12.] statutum est:

C. I. Two metropolitans cannot exist in one and the same province.

It has come to us that certain persons, seeking power contrary to ecclesiastical ordinances, divide one province into two by a sacred pragmatic rescript, and from this two metropolitan bishops are found to exist in one and the same province. Therefore the holy synod established that henceforth nothing of this kind is to be attempted by any bishop, but that those who attempt any such thing are to fall from their own grade. GRATIAN. Thus far we have treated the election and ordination of clerics. Now let us pass to the ordinations of simoniacs; and so that it may readily be clear what the authority of the holy Fathers decreed concerning this heresy, let a case be brought into the midst whose matter contains both those knowingly ordained by simoniacs, those unknowingly consecrated by simoniacs, and ordinations which are made through money.

> C. I. Duo metropolitani in una eademque prouincia esse non possunt.
> Peruenit ad nos, quod quidam preter ecclesiasticas ordinationes affectantes potentiam per pragmaticum sacrum unam prouinciam in duas diuidant, et ex hoc inueniuntur duo metropolitani episcopi in una eademque esse prouincia. Statuit igitur sancta sinodus deinceps nichil tale attemptari a quolibet episcopo, eos uero, qui aliquid tale temptauerint, cadere de proprio gradu. Gratian. Hactenus de electione et ordinatione clericorum tractauimus. Nunc ad symoniacorum ordinationes transeamus, et ut facile liqueat, quid super hac heresi sanctorum Patrum decreuit auctoritas, causa deducatur in medium, cuius negotium et de scienter a symoniacis ordinatis, et de ignoranter a symoniacis consecratis, et de ordinationibus, que per pecuniam fiunt, contineat.

Part II

SECOND PART OF THE DECRETUM

DECRETI PARS SECUNDA

Causa I

GRATIAN. A certain man who had a son offered him to a very wealthy monastery. When ten pounds were demanded by the abbot and the brothers, he paid them so that his son might be received, the son himself, however, being unaware of this by reason of the privilege of his age. The boy grew, and through the successive stages of time and offices arrived at manhood and the grade of the priesthood. Thereafter, with his merits supporting him, he was elected bishop, service and paternal entreaties intervening; and, money also having been given to one of the archbishop's counselors, he was consecrated a prelate, unaware of his father's service and of the money offered. But as time proceeded, he ordained some persons for money, while to certain others he gave the priestly blessing gratuitously. At last, accused and convicted before his metropolitan, he received a sentence of condemnation against himself. (Q. I.) Here it is first asked whether it is a sin to buy spiritual things. (Q. II.) Second, whether money is to be demanded for entrance into a church, or, if demanded, whether it is to be paid. (Q. III.) Third, whether to buy entrance into a church or prebends is simoniacal. (Q. IV.) Fourth, whether this man is guilty of the crime that his father committed without his knowledge. (Q. V.) Fifth, whether he is permitted to remain in the church or to exercise that ordination which he obtained by his father's money. (Q. VI.) Sixth, whether those who, in ignorance, were ordained by him when he was already a simoniac are to be cast out or not. (Q. VII.) Seventh, if, upon renouncing his heresy, he is to be received in the episcopal dignity or not.

GRATIANUS. Quidam habens filium obtulit eum ditissimo cenobio: exactus ab abbate et a fratribus decem libras soluit, ut filius susciperetur, ipso tamen beneficio etatis hoc ignorante. Creuit puer, et per incrementa temporum et offitiorum ad uirilem etatem et sacerdotii gradum peruenit. Exinde suffragantibus meritis in episcopum eligitur, interueniente obsequio et paternis precibus; data quoque pecunia cuidam ex consiliariis archiepiscopi, consecratur iste in antistitem, nescius paterni obsequii et oblatae pecuniae. Procedente uero tempore nonnullos per pecuniam ordinauit, quibusdam uero gratis benedictionem sacerdotalem dedit; tandem apud metropolitanum suum accusatus et conuictus sententiam in se dampnationis accepit. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, an sit peccatum emere spiritualia? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an pro ingressu ecclesiae sit exigenda pecunia, uel si exacta fuerit, an sit persoluenda? (Qu. III.) Tertio, an ingressum ecclesiae uel prebendas emere sit symoniacum? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, an iste sit reus criminis, quod eo ignorante pater admisit? (Qu. V.) Quinto, an liceat ei esse in ecclesia, uel fungi ea ordinatione, quam paterna pecunia est assecutus? (Qu. VI.) Sexto, an illi, qui ab eo iam symoniaco ignoranter ordinati sunt, sint abiciendi, an non? (Qu. VII.) Septimo, si renuncians suae heresi sit recipiendus in episcopali dignitate, uel non?

Question I

GRATIAN. Part I. That it is a sin to buy spiritual things is proved by the authorities of many. For Pope Leo says:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem spiritualia emere peccatum sit, probatur multorum auctoritatibus. Ait enim Leo Papa:

C. I. Simoniacs do not bestow the grace which they seek to sell.

If grace is not given or received gratuitously, it is not grace. But simoniacs do not receive gratuitously; therefore they do not receive the grace which operates especially in ecclesiastical orders. But if they receive it, they do not have it; and if they do not have it, they can give it to no one, either gratuitously or non-gratuitously. What, then, do they give? Surely that which they have. But what do they have? Certainly the spirit of falsehood. How do we prove this? Because if the Spirit of truth—according to the testimony of the Truth itself, from whom it proceeds—is received gratuitously, beyond doubt that which is not received gratuitously is proved to be the spirit of falsehood.

C. I. Symoniaci gratiam non prestant, quam querunt uendere.

Gratia si non gratis datur uel accipitur, gratia non est. Symoniaci autem non gratis accipiunt: igitur gratiam, que maxime in ecclesiasticis ordinibus operatur, non accipiunt. Si autem accipiunt, non habent; si autem non habent, neque gratis neque non gratis cuiquam dare possunt. Quid ergo dant? profecto quod habent? quid autem habent? spiritum utique mendatii. Quomodo hoc probamus? quia si spiritus ueritatis (testante ipsa ueritate, de qua procedit) gratis accipitur, proculdubio spiritus mendatii esse conuincitur, qui non gratis accipitur.

C. II. Whoever is ordained simoniacally is called a priest in vain.

Likewise Gregory to Syagrius, Bishop of Autun, [book VII, epistle 110]. Whoever strives to receive holy order by the giving of a price is not a priest, but vainly desires merely to be called one.

C. II. Inaniter sacerdos dicitur, quicumque symoniace ordinatur.

Item Gregorius Siagrio Episcopo Augustodunensi. [lib. VII. epist. 110.] Quicumque studet precii, datione sacrum ordinem percipere, sacerdos non est, sed concupiscit inaniter tantummodo dici.

C. III. Let one who obtains a church through money be stripped of honor.

Likewise in the Register. If a priest has obtained a church through money, let him not only be deprived of the church but also be stripped of the honor of the priesthood, because none of the faithful is ignorant that to sell or buy the altar, tithes, and the Holy Spirit is the simoniacal heresy.

C. III. Spolietur honore, qui ecclesiam per pecuniam obtinet.

Item in Registro. Presbiter si ecclesiam per pecuniam obtinuerit, non solum ecclesia priuetur, sed etiam sacerdotii honore spolietur, quia altare, et decimas, et Spiritum sanctum uendere uel emere, symoniacam heresim esse, nullus fidelium ignorat.

[C. IV.]

The same, [Gregory I, the aforesaid epistle 110, book VII]. The blessing is converted into a curse for the one who is promoted so that he may become a heretic.

[C. IV.]

Idem. [Gregorius I. dicta epist. 110. lib. VII.] Benedictio illi in maledictionem, conuertitur, qui ad hoc ut fiat hereticus promouetur.

C. V. One who has not burned vehemently against simoniacs will have a portion with Simon.

The same in the same place. Whoever is ordained through money is promoted so that he may become a heretic. Therefore, whoever, according to the station of his office, has not burned vehemently against the simoniacal heresy and that of neophytes should not doubt that he will have a portion with the one who first committed this heinous outrage.

> C. V. Partem habebit cum Symone, qui contra symoniacos uehementer non exarserit.
> Idem in eodem. Quisquis per pecuniam ordinatur, ad hoc, ut fiat hereticus, promouetur. Quisquis ergo contra symoniacam et neophitorum heresim pro offitii sui loco uehementer non arserit, cum eo se non dubitet habiturum portionem, qui prius commisit hoc piaculare flagitium.

C. VI. The condemnation of Simon encompasses equally the giver and the receiver.

Likewise Pope Gelasius, [to the Bishops established throughout Lucania, epistle I, c. 26]. Those who are established to have bought a sacred dignity for a price, though unworthy by their merits, must, when convicted, be excluded, since they perpetrate such a crime not without peril, because the condemnation of Simon, which sacred reading attests, encompasses equally the giver and the receiver.

> C. VI. Symonis dampnatio dantem pariter et accipientem inuoluit.
> Item Gelasius Papa. [ad Episcopos per Lucaniam constitutos, epist. I. cap. 26.] Quos constiterit indignos meritis, sacram mercatos esse precio dignitatem, conuictos oportet arceri, non sine periculo facinus tale patrantes, quia dantem pariter et accipientem dampnatio Symonis, quam sacra lectio testatur, inuoluit.

C. VII. One who is ordained simoniacally is condemned by a sentence of anathema.

Likewise Ambrose in the pastoral book. Very many are found wishing, by the commerce of a gift, to buy the grace of the Holy Spirit, when they give a price to those persons so that they may receive the sublimity of the pontifical order, forgetful of the words of Peter, who said to Simon: "May your money be with you unto perdition, because you thought to possess the gift of God by money." Therefore, because so great an evil is both customary and has frequently been cut down by the blade of our forebears, we too apply to this cancerous wound the heated iron which still remains, decreeing altogether that whoever from now on is discovered to have offered any reward for receiving the dignity of the divine gift is to know himself condemned from that very time by the reproach of anathema and estranged from participation in the body and blood of Christ, from the time when it is established that he perpetrated this outrage execrable to Christ. But if anyone should arise as his accuser, the one who gained this order by the giving of gifts is both to be deprived of the grade of honor he received and to be thrust into a monastery under perpetual penance. Those, however, who were recipients of gifts in this cause, if they were clerics, are to be punished by the loss of their honor; but if laymen, they are to be condemned by perpetual anathema.

> C. VII. Anathematis sententia dampnatur, qui symoniace ordinatur.
> Item Ambrosius in libro pastorali. Reperiuntur quamplurimi, negotiatione muneris mercari, uelle gratiam Spiritus sancti, dum illi precium donant, ut pontificalis ordinis sublimitatem accipiant, obliti uerborum Petri, qui dixit ad Symonem: "Pecunia tua tecum sit in perdicione, quoniam existimasti donum Dei pecunia possidere." Proinde quia et usitatum est tantum malum, et maiorum frequenter extat mucrone succisum, nos quoque huic uulneri canceroso ignitum (quod superest adhuc) inicimus ferrum, decernentes omnino, ut, quicumque deinceps pro accipienda diuini doni dignitate quodlibet premium detectus fuerit obtulisse, ex eodem tempore se nouerit anathematis obprobrio condempnatum, atque a participatione corporis et sanguinis Christi alienum, ex quo illum constat execrabile Christo perpetrasse flagitium. Quod si aliquis eius accusator extiterit, ille, qui hunc ordinem munerum fuerit datione lucratus, et suscepto honoris gradu priuetur, et in monasterio sub perenni penitentia trudatur. Illi uero, qui hac causa munerum acceptores extiterint, si clerici fuerint, honoris sui amissione mulctentur, si uero laici, perpetuo anathemate condempnentur.

C. VIII. A bishop who performs an ordination through money is condemned.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 2]. If any bishop performs an ordination through money and reduces to a price the grace of the Holy Spirit, which cannot be sold, and ordains through money a priest or deacon, or promotes any of those who are numbered among the clergy—even a steward or defender, or anyone subject to the rule—for the advantage of his most shameful gain, he who is proved to have attempted this will be subject to the peril of his own grade; and let the one ordained derive no benefit from this ordination or promotion which was effected through commerce, but let him be estranged from the dignity or charge which he acquired by money. But if anyone was a mediator in such shameful and impious gifts or receipts, if indeed he was a cleric, let him fall from his own grade; but if a layman, let him be anathematized.

C. VIII. Dampnatur episcopus, qui per pecuniam ordinationem facit.

Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 2.] Si quis episcopus per pecuniam ordinationem fecerit, et sub precio redegerit Spiritus sancti gratiam, que uendi non potest ordinaueritque per pecuniam presbiterum aut diaconum, uel quemlibet de his, qui cognominantur in clero promouerit etiam dispensatorem, aut defensorem, uel quemlibet, qui subiectus est regulae, pro sui turpissimi lucri commodo, is, cui hoc attemptanti probatum fuerit, proprii gradus periculo subiacebit, et qui ordinatus est, nichil ex hac ordinatione uel promotione, que est per negotiationem facta, proficiat, sed sit alienus a dignitate uel sollicitudine, quam pecuniis adquisiuit. Si quis uero mediator tam turpibus et nefandis datis uel acceptis extiterit, siquidem clericus fuerit, proprio gradu decidat, si uero laicus anathematizetur.

C. IX. Let one who ordains or is ordained through money be estranged from the priesthood.

Likewise from the Eighth Synod. Let one who has consecrated anyone through money, or who has been consecrated by another, be estranged from the priesthood.

C. IX. A sacerdotio sit alienus, qui per pecunias ordinat uel ordinatur.

Item ex VIII. Sinodo. Qui per pecunias quemquam consecrauerit, uel ab alio consecratus est, alienus a sacerdotio sit.

C. X. No one may be ordained or promoted in the Church of God through money.

Likewise Pope Callistus [II]. Following the examples of the holy Fathers and renewing them by the obligation of our office, by the authority of the apostolic see we prohibit in every way that anyone be ordained or promoted in the Church of God through money. But if anyone has acquired an ordination or promotion in the Church in this manner, let him be wholly without the dignity acquired.

C. X. Nec ordinari, nec promoueri in ecclesia Dei per pecuniam aliquis ualet.

Item Calixtus Papa. [II.] Sanctorum Patrum exempla sequentes et offitii nostri debito innouantes, ordinari quemquam per pecuniam in ecclesia Dei uel promoueri, auctoritate sedis apostolicae modis omnibus prohibemus. Si quis uero in ecclesia ordinationem uel promotionem taliter adquisierit, adquisita prorsus dignitate careat.

C. XI. On the same.

Likewise Gregory Nazianzen. There is no doubt that one who strives to buy the gift of God for a price can by no reason remain in holy order thereafter or be recalled to it. Let such a man be cut off from communion in every way. For what else is buying the gift of the Holy Spirit for a price than a capital crime and simoniacal heresy? How detestably this was punished in both Testaments is readily apparent from many examples. Gehazi sold to Naaman the Syrian the grace of healing; with Elisha punishing him, he lost that same grace of healing when he was made a leper. Judas sold the Redeemer of all; soon afterward, suspended from a noose, he did not obtain that same grace of redemption—and deservedly, because no one can retain what he has sold. Simon Magus also, when he wished to buy that same grace of the Holy Spirit, heard from Peter the sentence of his condemnation: "May your money be with you unto perdition, because you thought to possess the gift of God by money." The Lord also, to show that sellers and buyers are without a share in this grace, forgave all sinners through grace in the temple, but, reproving sellers and buyers in particular, drove them from the temple with a scourge; in this it is established that sellers and buyers are destitute and empty of the grace of the Holy Spirit. For will the Spirit of Christ make those whom Christ cast out of the temple a temple for himself?

C. XI. De eodem.

Item Gregorius Nazanzenus. Qui studet donum Dei precio mercari, in sacro ordine nulla ratione de cetero permanere aut reuocari posse dubium non est. Talis a communione omnibus modis abscidatur. Nam Spiritus sancti donum precio conparari quid aliud est quam capitale crimen et symoniaca heresis? quod quam detestabiliter in utroque testamento uindicatum sit, multorum exemplis facile apparet. Giezi gratiam sanitatis Naaman Siro uendidit; eandem gratiam sanitatis Eliseo uindicante leprosus factus amisit. Iudas omnium redemptorem uendidit, mox laqueo suspensus eandem redemptionis gratiam non obtinuit, et merito, quia nemo potest retinere quod uendidit. Symon etiam magus cum eandem Spiritus sancti gratiam emere uellet, dampnationis suae sententiam a Petro audiuit: "Pecunia tua tecum sit in perdicione, quia donum Dei existimasti pecunia possidere." Dominus etiam, ut uendentes et ementes huius gratiae expertes ostenderet, cunctos peccatores per gratiam in templo dimisit, singulariter uendentes et ementes increpans et flagellans de templo eiecit, in quo uenditores et emptores suos gratia Spiritus sancti constat destitutos esse et uacuos. Quos enim Christus eiecit de templo numquid Spiritus Christi faciet sibi templum?

C. XII. Simoniacs cannot be priests.

Likewise Gregory. Those who sell or buy sacred orders cannot be priests. Hence it is written: "Anathema to the giver, anathema to the receiver: this is the simoniacal heresy." How, then, if they are anathema and are not holy, can they sanctify others? And since they are not in the body of Christ, how can they hand over or receive the body of Christ? How can one who is accursed bless?

C. XII. Symoniaci sacerdotes esse non possunt.

Item Gregorius. Qui sacros ordines uendunt aut emunt, sacerdotes esse non possunt. Unde scriptum est: "Anathema dandi, anathema accipiendi, hoc est symoniaca heresis." Quomodo ergo, si anathema sunt et sancti non sunt, sanctificare alios possunt? Et cum in Christi corpore non sunt, quomodo Christi corpus tradere uel accipere possunt? Qui maledictus est quomodo benedicere potest?

[C. XIII.]

The same, [Gregory to Syagrius and other Bishops, book VII, epistle 110]. Since it is clear that this heresy, before all others, crept in with a pestilential root and was condemned in its very origin by apostolic detestation, why is it not guarded against? Why is it not weighed that the blessing is converted into a curse for the one who is promoted so that he may become a heretic?

[C. XIII.]

Idem. [Gregorius Siagrio, et aliis Episcopis, lib. VII. epist. 110.] Cum liqueat hanc heresim ante omnes radice pestifera subrepsisse, atque in ipsa sua origine apostolica esse detestacione dampnatam, cur non cauetur? cur non perpenditur, quia benedictio illi in maledictionem conuertitur, qui ad hoc, ut fiat hereticus promouetur?

C. XIV. One who ordains for a price confers leprosy, not office.

Likewise Ambrose, On Ministries, [or On Priestly Dignity, c. 5]. When he was ordained bishop, what he gave was gold; what he lost was his soul. When he ordained another, what he received was gold; what he gave was leprosy.

C. XIV. Qui precio ordinat, lepram, non offitium confert.

Item Ambrosius de ministeriis. [seu de dignitate sacerdotali, cap. 5.] Cum ordinaretur episcopus, quod dedit aurum fuit, quod perdidit anima fuit; cum alium ordinaret, quod accepit aurum fuit, quod dedit lepra fuit.

[C. XV.]

Likewise, [in the same place]. When you were ordained, you did not receive grace, because you did not merit it gratuitously.

[C. XV.]

Item. [ibidem] Gratiam, cum ordinareris, non suscepisti, quia gratuito eam non meruisti.

[C. XVI.]

Likewise concerning Gehazi. Leprosy swiftly follows shameful payment, and money wickedly acquired stains body and soul. § 1. You see that by the deed of the author the succession of the heir is condemned. For inexpiable is the fault of a ministry sold, and vengeance for heavenly grace passes to descendants. Finally, the Moabites and others will not enter the Church of God unto the third and fourth generation—that is, so long, to interpret it more simply, until the manifold succession of a generation should abolish the fault of its authors. But since those who sinned against God by the error of idolatry appear to have been punished unto the fourth generation, surely the sentence by which the seed of Gehazi is condemned forever for the cupidity of possessing appears harsher, especially since our Lord Jesus Christ, through the washing of regeneration, has given remission of sins to all. Why, then, is the seed of Gehazi condemned forever, unless you understand the seed to be of vices rather than of lineage? For just as those who are children of the promises are reckoned as good seed, so also those who are of error are reckoned as evil seed. For even the Jews are from the devil as father, certainly not by succession of flesh but of crime. Therefore all the covetous, all the avaricious, possess the leprosy of Gehazi together with their riches, and by wickedly acquired payment they have gathered not so much an abundance of patrimony as a treasure of crimes, with eternal punishment and brief fruit. Part II. GRATIAN. Therefore, because by the authority of Pope Leo simoniacs receive nothing but the spirit of falsehood; according to Gregory, the priesthood does not subsist among simoniacs, their blessing is converted into a curse, the anathema of giving and receiving remains among them, and, since they are not holy nor constituted in the body of Christ, since they are accursed, they can neither sanctify others, nor hand over or receive the body of Christ, nor bless others; according to Ambrose, moreover, they are condemned by the reproach of anathema and estranged from participation in the body and blood of Christ, since gold is received and leprosy given, since the fault of a ministry sold is inexpiable; according to the Council of Chalcedon, they are judged to derive no benefit from such an ordination; according to Gelasius, they are encompassed by the condemnation of Simon; according to Gregory Nazianzen, by no reason can they remain in holy order or be renewed in it, they are covered with leprosy by Elisha, condemned to perdition by Peter, and driven from the temple by Christ: what else can a simoniac confer upon a simoniac in his ordination except that which Innocent attests concerning other heretics, saying, [epistle XVIII to Alexander, c. 3]:

[C. XVI.]

Item de Giezi. Cito turpem sequitur lepra mercedem, et pecunia male quesita corpus animamque commaculat. §. 1. Vides, quia facto auctoris successio dampnatur heredis. Inexpiabilis est enim uenditi culpa ministerii, et uindicta gratiae celestis transit in posteros. Denique Moabitae et ceteri non intrabunt in ecclesiam Dei usque in terciam et quartam generationem, tamdiu uidelicet, (ut simplicius interpretemur), donec culpam auctorum multiplicis successio generationis aboleret. Sed cum illi, qui in Deum ydololatriae errore deliquerunt, in quartam generationem uideantur esse mulctati, profecto durior uidetur esse sententia, qua Giezi semen usque in eternum dampnatur, pro cupiditate habendi prophetica auctoritate presertim cum Dominus noster Iesus Christus per lauacri regenerationem dederit omnibus remissionem peccatorum. Cur ergo Giezi semen in eternum dampnatur, nisi ut uitiorum magis quam generis semen intelligas? Sicut enim qui filii promissionum sunt existimantur in semen bonum, ita etiam qui erroris sunt existimantur in semen malum. Nam et Iudei ex patre diabolo sunt, non utique carnis successione, sed criminis. Ergo omnes cupidi, omnes auari Giezi lepram cum diuitiis suis possident, et male quesita mercede non tam patrimonii facultatem, quam thesaurum criminum congregarunt eterno supplicio et breui fructu. II. Pars. Gratian. Quia ergo auctoritate Leonis Papae symoniaci non nisi spiritum mendacii accipiunt; secundum Gregorium apud symoniacus sacerdotium non subsistit, benedictio eorum in maledictionem conuertitur, apud eos manet anathema dandi et accipiendi, cum sancti non sint nec in Christi corpore constituti, cum sint maledicti, nec sanctificare alios possunt, nec Christi corpus tradere uel accipere, nec benedicere aliis ualent; secundum Ambrosium uero anathematis obprobrio condempnantur, atque a participatione corporis et sanguinis Christi alienantur, cum accipiatur aurum et lepra detur, cum inexpiabilis sit culpa uenditi ministerii; secundum Calcedonense concilium ex tali ordinatione nichil proficere iudicantur; secundum Gelasium Symonis dampnatione inuoluuntur; secundum Gregorium Nazanzenum in sacro ordine permanere aut renouari nulla ratione possunt, ab Eliseo lepra perfunduntur, a Petro in perdicionem dampnantur, a

Christo uero de templo eiciuntur: quid aliud symoniacus symoniaco in sua ordinatione potest conferre, nisi quod Innocentius de ceteris hereticis testatur, dicens: [epist XVIII. ad Alexandrum, cap. 3.]

C. XVII. Those who do not have the perfection of the Spirit cannot give it.

Those who have lost the perfection of the Spirit which they had received cannot give its fullness—which operates especially in ordinations—since they lost it through their perfidy. And again: § 1. One who did not have honor could not give honor, nor did the other receive anything, because there was nothing in the giver; but through a depraved imposition of the hand he gave the condemnation which he had.

C. XVII. Qui perfectionem Spiritus non habent, ipsam dare non possunt.

Qui perfectionem Spiritus, quam acceperant, perdiderunt, non dare eius plenitudinem possunt, que maxime operatur in ordinationibus, quam per suam perfidiam perdiderunt. Et iterum: §. 1. Qui honorem non habuit, honorem dare non potuit, nec aliquid accepit ille, quia nichil erat in dante, sed dampnationem, quam habuit, per prauam manus inpositionem dedit.

C. XVIII. Through a depraved imposition of the hand, a simoniac bestows not consecration but condemnation.

The same, [to Rufus and other Bishops, epistle XXII, c. 3]. We have come to the third question, which because of its difficulty requires a longer discussion. When we say that those ordained by heretics have a head wounded through that imposition of the hand, medicine by which it may be able to recover health must be applied where the wound was inflicted. The health which follows a wound cannot be without a scar; and where the remedy of penance is necessary, there the honor of ordination cannot have a place. For as it is read, "One who touches the unclean will be unclean"; how will that which purity and cleanness customarily receive be bestowed upon him? § 1. But, to the contrary, it is asserted that one who has lost honor cannot give honor, nor did the other receive anything, because there was nothing in the giver which he could receive. We assent, and it is certainly true, because he could not give what he did not have. Indeed, through a depraved imposition of the hand he gave the condemnation which he had; and how one who was made a participant of the condemned man ought to receive honor, I cannot discover. § 2. But it is said that the true and just blessing of a lawful priest removes every vice which had been injected by a vicious man. Therefore, if this is so, let the sacrilegious and those guilty of every crime be brought to ordination, because by the blessing of ordination crimes or vices are thought to be removed. Let there be no place for penance, because ordination can bestow what long satisfaction customarily bestows. But it is the law of our Church to bestow only lay communion through the imposition of the hand upon those coming from the heretics—who nevertheless were baptized there—and not to substitute any one of these into even the least honor of the clergy. Part III. GRATIAN. But it is objected: Other heretics depart from the faith, whereas simoniacs, although they think the grace of the Holy Spirit saleable, nevertheless are not alien from the faith; and therefore what is decreed by Innocent concerning other heretics cannot consequently be understood of them. To these things the response is thus: Although simoniacs appear to hold the faith, they are nevertheless subjected to the perdition of unbelief. Hence blessed Ambrose, writing against Novatian in the first book On Penance, said:

C. XVIII. Symoniacus per prauam manus inpositionem non consecrationem, sed dampnationem prestat.

Idem. [Rufo, et aliis Episcopis, epist. XXII. c. 3.] Ventum est ad terciam questionem, que pro sui difficultate longiorem exigit disputacionem. Cum nos dicimus ab hereticis ordinatos, uulneratum per illam manus inpositionem habere caput, ubi uulnus infixum est, medicina est adhibenda, qua possit recipere sanitatem. Que sanitas post uulnus secuta sine cicatrice esse non poterit, atque ubi penitentiae remedium necessarium est, illic ordinationis honorem locum habere non posse. Nam sicut legitur, qui tetigerit inmundum inmundus erit, quomodo ei tribuetur quod munditia et puritas consueuit accipere? §. 1. Sed econtra asseritur, eum, qui honorem amisit, honorem dare non posse, nec illum aliquid accepisse, quia nichil in dante erat, quod ille posset accipere. Acquiescimus, et uerum est certe, quia quod non habuit dare non potuit. Dampnationem utique, quam habuit, per prauam manus inpositionem dedit et qui particeps factus est dampnati, quomodo debeat honorem accipere inuenire non possum. §. 2. Sed dicitur uera et iusta legitimi sacerdotis benedictio auferre omne uitium, quod a uitioso fuerat iniectum. Ergo si ita est, applicentur ad ordinationem sacrilegi, atque omnium criminum rei, quia benedictione ordinationis crimina uel uitia putentur auferri; nullus sit penitentiae locus, quia id potest prestare ordinatio, quod longa satisfactio prestare consueuit. Sed nostrae lex ecclesiae est, uenientibus ab hereticis, qui tamen illic baptizati sunt, per manus inpositionem laicam tantum tribuere communionem, nec ex his aliquem in clericatus uel exiguum subrogare honorem. III. Pars. Gratian. Sed obicitur: Alii heretici a fide exorbitant, symoniaci autem, etsi gratiam Spiritus sancti uenalem putant, tamen a fide non sunt alieni, atque ideo, quod ab Innocentio de ceteris hereticis decernitur, non ualet consequentur de illis intelligi. His ita respondetur: Symoniaci, etsi fidem tenere uideantur, infidelitatis tamen perdicioni subiciuntur. Unde B. Ambrosius in I. libro de penitentia ad Nouatianum scribens, dixit:

C. XIX. Simoniacs do not have the integrity of faith.

When Simon, depraved by the practice of magic art, had thought that he could buy the grace of Christ through the imposition of the hand and the infusion of the Holy Spirit, Peter said: "You have neither lot nor part in this faith, because your heart is not right before God." You see that by apostolic authority he condemns this man, who through magical vanity blasphemed against the Holy Spirit, and all the more because he did not have the pure conscience of faith.

C. XIX. Symoniaci fidei integritatem non habent.

Petrus, cum Symon magicae artis consuetudine deprauatus putasset, quod gratiam Christi per inpositionem manus et infusionem Spiritus sancti pecunia conpararet, ait: "Non est tibi sors neque pars, in hac fide, quia cor tuum non est rectum apud Deum." Vides, quod hunc magica uanitate condempnat apostolica auctoritate blasphemantem in Spiritu sancto, et eo magis, quod puram conscientiam fidei non habebat.

C. XX. A simoniac is proved to be an unbeliever.

Likewise Gregory in the Register. Since all avarice is the service of idols, whoever does not vigilantly guard against it, especially in the giving of ecclesiastical honors, is subjected to the perdition of unbelief, even if he appears to hold the faith which he neglects.

C. XX. Symoniacus infidelis esse probatur.

Item Gregorius in Registro. Cum omnis auaritia ydolorum sit seruitus, quisquis hanc et maxime in dandis ecclesiasticis honoribus uigilanter non precauet, infidelitatis perdicioni subicitur, etiamsi tenere fidem, quam negligit, uideatur.

C. XXI. The heresy of simoniacs is proved more damnable than the others.

Likewise from the epistle of Tarasius, Bishop of Constantinople, sent to Pope Hadrian. Those who have imposed or impose hands through money, the divine apostle Peter—whose chair your holiness has obtained—deposes like Simon Magus. § 1. For more tolerable is the impious heresy of Macedonius and of those who are around him, assailants of the Holy Spirit. For they, raving, confess the Holy Spirit to be a creature and a servant of God the Father and the Son; these men make that same Holy Spirit their own servant. For every master sells what he has if he wishes, whether a servant or any other thing among those which he possesses. Similarly also one who buys, wishing to be master of that which he has bought, acquires it through the price of money. Thus also those who carry out this iniquitous action detract from the Holy Spirit, sinning equally with those who blasphemed by saying that Christ cast out demons in Beelzebub; and, to speak more truly, they are compared to Judas the traitor, who sold Christ to the Jews who killed God. Since, therefore, the Holy Spirit is consubstantial with Christ, they will be of the same portion as Judas. And beyond doubt the grace of the Holy Spirit—that is, the holiness of the priesthood—is not in them. For they do not have what they did not receive. For Peter says to Simon: "You have neither part nor lot in this word, because you thought to possess the gift of God by money." § 2. For both the twenty-ninth canon of the holy Apostles, and their Acts, and the third and fourth books of Kings pronounce one who at any time has given or received money to be altogether alien from the priesthood, whether before the imposition of the hand or after the imposition. For to receive is to receive at any time.

> C. XXI. Symoniacorum heresis ceteris dampnabilior esse probatur.
>
> Item ex epistola Tharasii Constantinopolitani Episcopi, missa Papae Adriano. Eos, qui per pecunias manus inposuerunt uel inponunt,
> Petrus diuinus apostolus (cuius cathedram sortita est sanctitas uestra) tamquam Symonem magum deponit. §. 1. Tollerabilior enim est Macedonii et eorum, qui circa ipsum sunt, sancti Spiritus inpugnatorum inpia heresis. Illi enim creaturam et seruum Dei Patris et Filii Spiritum sanctum delirando fatentur, isti suum eundem Spiritum sanctum efficiunt seruum. Omnis enim dominus quod habet, si uult, uendit, siue seruum siue aliquid aliud eorum, que possidet. Similiter et qui emit, dominus eius uolens esse quod emerit, per precium pecuniae illud adquirit. Ita et qui hanc iniquam actionem operantur, detrahunt Spiritui sancto, equaliter peccantes his, qui blasphemauerunt, dicentes, Christum in Beelzebub eicere demonia, atque, ut uerius dicamus, Iudae conparantur proditori, qui Iudeis Dei occisoribus Christum uendidit. Cum ergo Spiritus sanctus consubstancialis sit Christo, eiusdem ipsi portionis erunt. Et proculdubio in eis non est gratia Spiritus sancti, id est sacerdotii sanctitas. Nam quod non acceperunt non habent. Ait enim Petrus Symon: "Non est pars tibi neque sors in sermone isto, quia existimasti donum Dei pecunia possidere." §. 2. Nam et uicesimus nonus canon sanctorum apostolorum, et Actus eorundem, et tercius et quartus liber Regnorum, alienum omnino a sacerdotio pronunciant eum, qui aliquando dederit uel acceperit pecuniam in aliquo tempore, siue ante manus inpositionem, siue post inpositionem. Accipere enim est quandocumque accipere.

C. XXII. Let both the one who gives and the one who receives so that sacred orders may be bestowed be anathema.

Likewise from the Second Council of Braga, [c. 3]. It has pleased the council that bishops receive no gifts for the ordination of clerics, but that, as it is written, what they receive with God giving freely they give freely. Let not the grace of God and the imposition of hands be sold for any price, because the ancient definition of the Fathers established thus concerning ecclesiastical ordinations, saying:

"Let there be anathema upon the giver and the receiver." Because some, overwhelmed by many crimes and ministering unworthily at the holy altar, obtain this not by the testimony of good works but by the profusion of gifts, clerics must be ordained not through the favor of gifts but first through diligent examination and then through the testimony of many. GRATIAN. From this authority of Ambrose and Gregory it is clear that simoniacs—just as other heretics—depart from the faith, and therefore what is decreed concerning others is consequently understood of them. Part IV. § 1. Likewise it is objected that prophecy is a gift of the Holy Spirit, but that in the Old Testament it customarily was sold by holy prophets. Hence Saul presumed to go to Samuel to seek an oracle only with a gift. The wife of Jeroboam also approached the man of God only with a gift. Likewise Christ, sold by Judas, healed the servant's ear. Thus, from the example of Saul and Jeroboam's wife it is clear that to buy or sell the gift of the Holy Spirit is not a sin. From the example of Christ it is evident that, although the Holy Spirit is unjustly thought saleable by simoniacs, he nevertheless does not forget his power, nor even when sold does he cease to bestow the effect of his grace. But concerning prophecy blessed Jerome resolves the matter suitably on [c. 3 of] Micah, declaring that only the wicked received gifts, not the good:

> C. XXII. Et qui dat, et qui accipit, ut ordines sacri prestentur, anathema sit.
>
> Item ex Concilio Bracarensi II. [c. 3.] Placuit, ut de ordinatione clericorum episcopi munera nulla suscipiant, sed, sicut scriptum est, quod gratis donante Deo accipiunt gratis dent. Non aliquo precio Dei gratia et inpositio manuum uenundetur, quia antiqua diffinitio Patrum ita de ecclesiasticis ordinationibus statuit, dicens: "Anathema sit danti et accipienti." Propterea, quia aliquanti multis sceleribus obruti, sancto altario indigne ministrantes, non hoc testimonio bonorum operum, sed profusione munerum obtinent, oportet non per gratiam munerum, sed per diligentem discussionem prius, deinde per multorum testimonium clericos ordinare. Gratian. Ex hac auctoritate Ambrosii et Gregorii patet, quod symoniaci (sicut et alii heretici) a fide exorbitant, et ideo consequenter de illis intelligitur, quod de aliis decernitur. IV. Pars. §. 1. Item opponitur, quod prophetia donum Spiritus sancti est, hec autem in ueteri testamento a sanctis prophetis uendi consueuerat. Unde Saul ad Samuelem pro uaticinio expetendo non nisi cum munere ire presumpsit. Uxor etiam Ieroboam ad hominem Dei non nisi cum munere accessit. Item Christus a Iuda uenditus auriculam serui sanauit. Exemplo itaque Saulis et uxoris Ieroboam patet, quod donum Spiritus sancti emere uel uendere non est peccatum. Exemplo Christi liquet, quod Spiritus sanctus, etsi iniuste a symoniacis uenalis putetur, uirtutis tamen suae non obliuiscitur, nec desinit effectum suae gratiae etiam uenditus prestare. Sed de prophetia B. Ieronimus in [c. 3.] Michea conpetenter soluit, malos tantum accepisse, non bonos denuncians:

C. XXIII. Wicked prophets, not good ones, sold prophecy.

"Its rulers," he says, "judged for gifts, its priests answered for payment, and its prophets divined for money, and they rested upon the Lord, saying: Is not the Lord among us? Evils will not come upon us. Therefore, because of you Zion will be plowed like a field, and Jerusalem will be like a watchtower of an orchard." Let no one doubt that Jerusalem was overthrown because of the crimes which are read in this chapter. And a little later: § 1. Peter could have sold to Simon Magus what he sought; rather, he could have feigned himself a seller—for the Holy Spirit can neither be sold nor bought—but he condemned the money offered together with the one offering it. § 2. Nor should that move anyone which we read in the first book of Kings, that Saul, wishing to go to Samuel, said to his servant that he could not go to him "because there is no price in my hand," and added: "A fourth part of a shekel is in my hand; this I will give to the man of God, and he will announce our way." For it is not written that Samuel received it or that they offered it; rather, they are fed by the prophet. But suppose that he received it: it is to be reckoned an offering for the tabernacle rather than a gift to the prophet. For a shekel has twenty obols. Therefore, a fourth part of a shekel is five obols. Thus our priests, if they wish to sell prophecy and to display the dove upon their chairs—which the Lord overturned with a scourge—should be content with the payment of only five obols. Would that they received not the price of estates but five obols. § 3. This same thing sounds forth in the third book of Kings concerning the wife of Jeroboam proceeding to the man of God, who offered only ten loaves, a little cake, and a vessel of honey. These things are to be reckoned expenses for the prophet rather than gifts for prophecy, although those who were accustomed to go to soothsayers could, from their wicked custom, have thought the same thing concerning prophets and wished to offer to holy men what they were accustomed to offer to diviners. § 4. Hence in the fourth book of Kings it is read "that Elisha came to Damascus, and Ben-hadad, king of Syria, was ill; and they announced to him, saying: The man of God has come here. The king said to Hazael: Take gifts with you and go to meet the man of God, and consult the Lord through him, saying whether I can escape from this illness. Hazael therefore went to meet him, having gifts with him and all the good things of Damascus, burdens of forty camels." But they are not to be believed to have received them, just as it is read concerning that same Elisha that Naaman, cleansed of leprosy, offered him gifts, saying: "I beseech you to receive a blessing from your servant." But he responded: "As the Lord lives, before whom I stand, I will not receive it." And although he pressed him, he did not acquiesce at all.

C. XXIII. Mali prophetae, non boni prophetiam uendebant.

"Duces," inquit, "eius in muneribus iudicabant, sacerdotes eius in mercede respondebant, et prophetae eius in pecunia diuinabant, et super Dominum requiescebant, dicentes: Nonne Dominus est in nobis? non uenient super nos mala. Idcirco propter uos Sion quasi ager arabitur et Ierusalem ut custodia pomerii erit." Nemo ambigat Ierusalem propter scelera, que in hoc capitulo leguntur fuisse subuersam. Et paulo post: §. 1. Poterat Petrus Symoni mago uendere quod petebat; imo poterat simulare uendentem, (Spiritus enim sanctus nec uendi nec emi potest); sed oblatam pecuniam cum offerente dampnauit. §. 2. Nec moueat quemquam illud, quod in primo libro Regnorum legimus, Saulem uolentem ire ad Samuelem dixisse puero suo, ad eum se ire non posse, "quia precium, non est in manu mea," et adiecit: "quarta pars sicli in manu mea est, hanc dabo uiro Dei, et adnunciabit uiam nostram." Non enim scriptum est, quod Samuel acceperit, aut quod illi obtulerint, quin potius pascuntur a propheta. Sed fac eum accepisse: stipes magis estimandae sunt tabernaculi quam munera prophetae. Siclus enim uiginti obolos habet. Quarta pars ergo sicli quinque sunt oboli. Nostri igitur sacerdotes, si uolunt uendere prophetiam, et columbam in cathedris suis proponere, quas Dominus flagello subuertit, quinque tantum obolorum sint mercede contenti, qui utinam non precium uillarum, sed quinque obolos acciperent. §. 3. Hoc ipsum sonat in tercio Regnorum libro, de uxore Ieroboam ad hominem Dei, pergente, que non nisi decem panes obtulit et crustulam et uas mellis. Hec magis in sumptus prophetae reputanda sunt quam munera prophetiae, licet potuerint hi, qui ad ariolos ire consueuerant ex mala eorum consuetudine id ipsum existimasse de prophetis, et uoluisse sanctis uiris offerre quod diuinis offerre consueuerant. §. 4. Unde in quarto libro Regum legitur: "quod Eliseus uenit Damascum, et Benadad rex Siriae egrotabat, nunciaueruntque ei, dicentes: Venit uir Dei huc, ait rex ad Azahel: Tolle tecum munera, et uade in occursum uiri Dei, et consule Dominum per eum, dicens, si euadere de hac infirmitate potero. Iuit ergo Azahel in occursum eius, habens secum munera, et omnia bona Damasci, onera quadraginta camelorum." Sed non sunt credendi accepisse, sicut de eodem Eliseo legitur, quod Naaman mundatus a lepra obtulit ei munera, dicens: "Obsecro, ut accipias benedictionem a seruo tuo.

At ille respondit: Viuit Dominus, ante quem sto, quia non accipiam. Cumque uim faceret, penitus non acquieuit."

[C. XXIV.]

The same in the same place. Divination is never taken in a good sense. They indeed appeared to themselves to be prophets, but because they received money, their prophecy was made divination. GRATIAN. Therefore, since according to Jerome good prophets received not gifts for prophecy but offerings for the tabernacle, while for the wicked who did receive them prophecy—which appeared to be a gift of God—was converted into divination, which is diabolical, what else is gathered except that no spiritual grace cooperates with simoniacs, as was said above? For since in the sacraments "neither he who plants nor he who waters is anything, but God who gives the increase," who operates in them if the Lord, who gives the increase, does not shine in them but is idle? Likewise, as to what is said concerning Christ—that just as Christ when sold restored Malchus's ear and performed miracles, so also the Holy Spirit can be sold and in that very sale operate his grace—this likeness is not valid. For the Holy Spirit does not spiritually operate in the perfidious commerce of avarice what Christ performed bodily for the sake of a certain mystery as an example of patience. For if the likeness is universal, since the Holy Spirit is believed able to be sold as Christ was, let him also be believed able to be crucified, which is impossible. It can also be understood, so that we do not depart from the likeness, that just as Christ when sold bestowed the gifts of his grace not upon the seller or buyer but upon those who were present without knowledge, for whom he also prayed upon the cross, so also the Holy Spirit is proved to bestow the effect of his grace not upon the seller or buyer but upon those who, led by ignorance, receive the Lord's sacraments from their hands. § 1. Likewise it is objected that although it is evil to buy ecclesiastical things, nevertheless sinister beginnings often arrive at happy outcomes. As Jacob arrived at the blessing through supplantation, as the crop which is sown by a leprous hand is nevertheless reaped clean, as beautiful offspring is born from adulterous intercourse, so also money which is acquired through simony has a happy outcome when it is expended to benefit the poor. But none of these things gives support to simoniacs. For Leo [the Bishop] says to the Bishops of Mauretania, [epistle LXXXV, otherwise LXXXVII]:

[C. XXIV.]

Idem in eodem. Numquam diuinatio in bonam partem accipitur. Videbantur sibi quidem esse prophetae, sed quia pecuniam accipiebant, prophetia eorum facta est diuinatio. Gratian. Cum ergo secundum Ieronimum boni prophetae non munera prophetiae accipiebant, sed stipes tabernaculi, malis autem, qui accipiebant, prophetia, que donum Dei uidebatur in diuinationem, que diabolica est, conuertebatur, quid aliud colligitur, nisi quod symoniacis (quod superius dictum est) nulla spiritualis gratia cooperatur? Cum enim in sacramentis "neque qui plantat, neque qui rigat, est aliquid sed qui incrementum dat, Deus," quis operatur in eis, si Dominus, qui incrementum dat, in eis non lucet, sed est otiosus? Item, quod dicitur de Christo, quod sicut Christus uenditus restituit auriculam Malco, et fecit miracula, sic et Spiritus sanctus possit uendi, et in ipsa uendicione gratiam suam operari, non ualet hec similitudo. Non enim hoc operatur Spiritus sanctus spiritualiter in perfidis mercimoniis auaritiae, quod Christus gessit corporaliter certi misterii causa ad exemplum patientiae. Si enim omnifaria est similitudo, cum credatur posse uendi, ut Christus, credatur etiam Spiritus sanctus posse crucifigi, quod inpossibile est. Potest etiam intelligi (ut a similitudine non recedamus), quod sicut Christus uenditus non uenditori uel ementi, sed eis, qui nescientes aderant, dona suae gratiae contulit, pro quibus etiam in cruce supplicauit, sic et Spiritus sanctus non uendenti uel ementi, sed his, qui de manibus eorum ignorantia ducti sacramenta dominica accipiunt, suae gratiae effectum largiri probatur. §. 1. Item obicitur, quod etsi malum sit ecclesiastica emere, tamen sepe sinistra principia ad felices perueniunt exitus. Ut Iacob per subplantacionem peruenit ad benedictionem, ut seges, que leprosa manu seritur, munda tamen metitur, ut ex adulterino concubitu pulcra soboles nascitur: sic et pecunia, que per symoniam acquiritur, felicem habet exitum, cum pauperibus profutura erogatur. Sed nichil horum symoniacis patrocinatur. Ait enim Leo [Episcopus] ad Mauros Episcopos: [epist. LXXXV. al. LXXXVII.]

C. XXV. Things which are begun from an evil beginning are not brought to completion with a good outcome.

A primacy which either sedition has extorted or canvassing has seized, even if it does not offend in morals and actions, is nevertheless pernicious by the example of its own vice. And it is difficult for things begun from an evil beginning to be brought to completion with a good outcome.

C. XXV. Que malo inchoantur principio, non bono peraguntur exitu.

Principatus, quem aut seditio extorsit, aut ambitus occupauit, etiamsi moribus atque actibus non offendit, ipsius tamen uitii sui est perniciosus exemplo. Et difficile est, ut bono peragantur exitu, que malo sunt inchoata principio.

C. XXVI. A good work is not built up where Christ is not the foundation.

Likewise Gregory to [Anastasius], Bishop of Antioch, [book VII, epistle 47, indiction 2]. Since Paul says, "No one can lay another foundation besides that which has been laid, which is Christ Jesus," it is consequently proved that where Christ is not the foundation there is no superstructure of a good work.

C. XXVI. Non superedificatur bonum opus, ubi Christus fundamentum non est.

Item Gregorius. [Anastasio] Antioceno Episcopo. [lib. VII. epist. 47. Indict. 2.] Cum Paulus dicat: "Fundamentum aliud nemo potest ponere, preter id, quod positum est, quod est Christus Iesus," consequenter probatur, quia ubi Christus non est fundamentum, nullum boni operis est superedificium.

C. XXVII. Alms cannot be made from money acquired simoniacally.

The same to Syagrius the Bishop, [book VII, epistle 110]. It is not to be thought alms if that which is acquired from illicit things is distributed to the poor, because one who receives wickedly with this intention, that he may distribute well, is burdened rather than helped. § 1. Hence it is also certain that even if monasteries or hospices or anything else are constructed from money which is given for sacred orders, it does not profit toward reward. § 2. Therefore, lest under the pretext of alms we strive to receive anything with sin, Scripture prohibits it, saying: "The sacrifices of the impious, which are offered from crime, are abominable." For whatever is offered in sacrifice to God from crime does not appease the wrath of almighty God, but provokes it. Hence again it is written: "Honor the Lord from your just labors." Therefore, one who takes wickedly so that he may give as if well is established beyond doubt not to honor the Lord. Hence also it is said through Solomon: "One who offers a sacrifice from the substance of a poor man is as though he sacrifices the son in the sight of the father." Let us weigh how great the father's grief is if his son is sacrificed in his sight, and from this it is easily recognized how great a grief is aggravated before God when a sacrifice from robbery is bestowed upon him. Therefore, the perpetration of sins of simoniacal heresy under the pretext of alms must be exceedingly avoided. For it is one thing to make alms because of sins, another to commit sins because of alms. And after a few words: § 3. Therefore, whoever desires to obtain the priesthood not for the pomp of exaltation but for usefulness should first measure his strength against the burden which he is about to undertake, so that, if he is unequal to it, he abstain, and approach with fear even that for which he judges himself sufficient.

> C. XXVII. Non potest fieri elemosina ex pecunia symoniace adquisita.
> Idem Siagrio Episcopo. [lib. VII. epist. 110.] Non est putanda elemosina, si pauperibus dispensetur quod ex illicitis rebus adquiritur, quia qui hac intentione male accipit, ut bene dispenset, grauatur potius quam iuuetur. §. 1. Unde etiam certum est, quia etsi monasteria uel xenodochia uel quid aliud ex pecunia, que pro sacris ordinibus datur, construantur, non proficit mercedi. §. 2. Ne ergo sub obtentu elemosinae cum peccato aliquid studeamus accipere, prohibet scriptura, dicens: "Hostiae inpiorum abhominabiles sunt, que offeruntur ex scelere." Quicquid enim in Dei sacrificio ex scelere offertur, omnipotentis Dei non placat iracundiam, sed irritat. Hinc rursus scriptum est: "Honora Dominum de tuis iustis laboribus." Qui ergo male tollit, ut quasi bene prebeat, constat sine dubio, quia Dominum non honorat. Hinc quoque per Salomonem dicitur: "Qui offert sacrificium de substantia pauperis, ac si uictimet filium in conspectu patris." Quantus autem dolor sit patris, perpendamus, si in eius conspectu filius uictimetur, et hinc facile cognoscitur, quantus apud Deum dolor exasperatur, quando ei sacrificium ex rapina tribuitur. Nimis ergo declinandum est, sub obtentu elemosinae peccata symoniacae hereseos perpetrare. Nam aliud est propter peccata elemosinas facere, aliud propter elemosinas peccata committere. Et post pauca: §. 3. Quisquis igitur sacerdotium non ad elationis pompam, sed ad utilitatem adipisci desiderat, prius uires suas cum eo, quod est subiturus, onere metiatur, ut si est inpar abstineat, et ad id cum metu etiam, cui se sufficere existimat, accedat.

C. XXVIII. A simoniacal shepherd provides no remedy for the sheep.

The same to Theodoric and Theudebert, Kings of the Franks, [book VII, epistle 114]. The simoniacal heresy—which first crept in against the Church of God by diabolical supplantation and in its very birth was struck and condemned by the zeal of apostolic vengeance—is reported to hold dominion within the boundaries of your kingdom, although faith together with life is to be chosen in priests. For if life is lacking, faith has no merit, as blessed James attests, who says: “Faith without works is dead.” For what works can there be of a priest who is proved to obtain the honors of so great a sacrament by a reward? And after a few words: § 1. Hence, therefore, a mortal wound is inflicted not only upon the soul of the ordainer and the ordained, but the governance of your excellency is also weighed down by the fault of your bishops, by whose intercessions it should rather have been helped. For if he is believed worthy of the priesthood whom not merits of action but abundance of rewards supports, it remains that gravity defend nothing for itself in ecclesiastical honors, diligence nothing, but that the profane love of gold obtain everything. And while honor rewards vices, perhaps the one who was to be punished is brought into the place of the punisher; and hence priests are judged not to advance but rather to perish. For when the shepherd is wounded, who applies medicine for curing the sheep? Or how may he protect the people with the shield of prayer who exposes himself to be struck by the missiles of the enemies? Or what fruit will he produce from himself whose root is infected by grave pestilence? Therefore, a greater calamity must be feared in those places where such intercessors are brought to the place of governance, who provoke God’s wrath against themselves more than they ought to appease it through themselves. GRATIAN. Therefore, since according to Leo simony is not brought to completion with a good outcome; according to Gregory, no superstructure of a good work follows, nor is that to be thought alms which is expended to the poor from the price of simony; medicine is not applied to cure the sheep when the shepherd is wounded; fruit is not produced from an infected root; and even a greater calamity is feared in the future—from so sinister a beginning, what happy outcome is hoped for? Hence Augustine says:

> C. XXVIII. Pastor symoniacus nullam ouibus prebet medelam.
> Idem Theodorico et Theoberto Regibus Francorum. [libro VII., ep. 114.] Fertur symoniaca heresis (que prima contra Dei ecclesiam diabolica subplantatione subrepsit, et in ipso ortu suo zelo apostolicae ultionis percussa atque dampnata est) in regni uestri finibus dominari, cum in sacerdotibus fides sit eligenda cum uita. Si enim uita deest, fides meritum non habet, B. Iacobo attestante, qui ait: "Fides sine operibus mortua est." Que enim opera esse ualeant sacerdotis, qui honores tanti sacramenti conuincitur obtinere per premium? Et post pauca: §. 1. Hinc igitur non solum in ordinatoris et ordinati anima letale uulnus infigitur, uerum etiam excellentiae uestrae regimen episcoporum uestrorum culpa (quorum magis intercessionibus iuuari debuerat) pregrauatur. Si enim is dignus sacerdotio creditur, cui non actionis merita, sed premiorum copia suffragatur, restat, ut nichil sibi in ecclesiasticis honoribus grauitas, nichil sibi defendat industria, sed totum auri profanus amor obtineat. Et, dum uitia honor remunerat, in locum ultoris is fortasse, qui fuerat ulciscendus, adducitur, atque hinc sacerdotes non proficere, sed perire potius iudicantur. Vulnerato namque pastore quis curandis ouibus adhibet medicinam? aut quomodo populum orationis clipeo tueatur, qui iaculis hostium se feriendum exponit? aut qualem fructum de se producturus est, cuius graui peste radix infecta est? Maior ergo metuenda est locis illis calamitas, ubi tales intercessores ad locum regiminis adducuntur, qui Dei in se magis iracundiam prouocent, quam per semetipsos placare debuerant. Gratian. Cum ergo secundum Leonem symonia non bono peragatur exitu, secundum Gregorium nullum boni operis sequatur edificium, nec est putanda elemosina, que ex precio symoniae erogatur pauperibus, uulnerato pastore medicina non adhibetur curandis ouibus, de infecta radice fructus non producitur, maior etiam calamitas in futuro metuitur, de tam sinistro principio quis felix exitus speratur? Hinc Augustinus ait:

C. XXIX. The sacraments of simoniacs lack the effect of grace.

Just as the eunuch who bought Joseph was one, so one who buys grace has no living seed in his dry generative organs. So also the fire of sacrifice, which had lived under water through the seventy years of the Babylonian captivity, was extinguished when Antiochus sold the priesthood to Jason; this signified that the fire of the Holy Spirit does not shine in simoniacal sacraments. GRATIAN. What did blessed Augustine wish to signify by these likenesses except that the sacraments of simoniacs, just as those of other heretics, although true as to form, are nevertheless empty and false as to effect, since they cannot engender or kindle heavenly grace in human hearts? Part V. § 1. But that saying of Augustine against the heretics is objected, [tractate V on the Gospel of John]:

> C. XXIX. Symoniacorum sacramenta effectu gratiae carent.
> Sicut eunuchus fuit, qui Ioseph conparauit, ita qui gratiam mercatur, uiuum semen non habet siccis genitalibus. Sic quoque ignis sacrificii, qui per septuaginta annos Babilonicae captiuitatis sub aqua uixerat, extinctus est, Antiocho Iasoni uendente sacerdotium, quod significauit ignem Spiritus sancti non lucere in symoniacis sacramentis. Gratian. Quid in his similitudinibus B. Augustinus notare uoluit, nisi quia sacramenta symoniacorum (sicut et ceterorum hereticorum) licet sint uera quantum ad formam, inania tamen et falsa sunt quantum ad effectum, cum non possint in cordibus hominum gignere uel accendere celestem gratiam? V. Pars. §. 1. Sed obicitur illud Augustini contra hereticos: [tractatu V. super euangelium Iohannis]

C. XXX. Whether the minister is good or evil, through either one God confers the effect of grace.

If the minister has been just, I count him with Paul, who does not seek his own glory, saying: "I planted, Apollo watered, but God gave the increase." But a minister who has been proud is counted with the devil; yet Christ's gift is not contaminated, because the pure river passes through him and comes to fertile earth. I know that a stone cannot bear fruit from water and that water passes through stony channels to the garden plots: it engenders nothing in the stony channel, but the garden brings forth very much fruit. For the spiritual power of the sacrament is received as pure light by those who are to be illuminated; but in passing through the unclean it is not defiled.

> C. XXX. Siue bonus, siue malus sit minister, per utrumque Deus effectum gratiae confert.
> Si fuerit iustus minister, conputo eum cum Paulo, qui gloriam suam non querit, dicens: "Ego plantaui, Apollo rigauit, Deus autem incrementum dedit." Qui uero superbus fuerit minister cum zabulo conputatur, sed non contaminatur donum Christi, quia per illum purus fluuius transit, et uenit ad fertilem terram. Scio, quia lapis ex aqua fructum ferre non potest, et per lapideos canales transit aqua ad areolas, in canali lapideo nichil generat; sed ortus plurimum fructum affert. Spiritualis enim uirtus sacramenti ut lux pura ab illuminandis excipitur; sed per inmundos transiens non coinquinatur.

C. XXXI. On the same.

Likewise to Vincentius the Donatist, [epistle XLVIII]. All the Lord's sacraments are from the catholic Church; you have and give them just as they were had and given before you departed from it.

> C. XXXI. De eodem.
>
> Item ad Vincentium Donatistam. [ep. XLVIII.] Ex catholica ecclesia sunt omnia sacramenta dominica, que sic habetis et datis, sicut habebantur et dabantur prius, quam inde exiretis.

C. XXXII. On the same.

Likewise to the Donatists, [book V, c. 19]. Thus God is present to his sacraments and words, through whomsoever they are administered, when their sacraments and words are right; just as evil men, whom these profit nothing, are perverse everywhere, that is, within and without.

> C. XXXII. De eodem.
>
> Item ad Donatistas. [lib. V. c. 19.] Sic autem Deus adest sacramentis et uerbis suis, per quoslibet administrentur, quorum sacramenta et uerba recta sunt, sicut mali homines, quibus nichil prosunt, ubique peruersi sunt id est intus et foris.

[C. XXXIII.]

Likewise, [book IV, On Baptism against the Donatists, c. 12]. Therefore no one, either without or within, who is on the devil's side can defile in himself or in anyone else the sacrament which is Christ's.

> [C. XXXIII.]
> Item. [lib IV. de bapt. contr. Donatistas, c. 12.] Nec foris ergo, nec intus quisquam, qui ex parte diaboli est, potest in se, uel in quoquam maculare sacramentum, quod Christi est.

C. XXXIV. Sacraments which are not changed are proved common to catholics and heretics.

The same [Augustine] to Emeritus, [epistle CLXIV]. The sacraments which you have not changed, just as you have them, are approved by us, lest perhaps, when we wish to correct your depravity, we inflict sacrilegious injury upon those ministries which have not been depraved in your depravity. Nor had Saul depraved the anointing which he had received, an anointing to which the pious David repeatedly displayed so great an honor.

> C. XXXIV. Sacramenta, que non mutantur, catholicis et hereticis communia probantur.
> Idem [Augustinus] ad Emeritum. [epist. CLXIV.] Sacramenta, que non mutastis, sicut habetis approbantur a nobis, ne forte, cum uestram prauitatem corrigere uolumus, illis ministeriis, que in uestra prauitate deprauata non sunt, sacrilegam faciamus iniuriam. Neque Saul deprauauerat unctionem, quam acceperat, cui unctioni Dauid pius exhibuit sepius tantum honorem.

C. XXXV. On the same.

The same to the Donatists. Just as the false receive true things truly, not falsely, nor is their baptism rejected, so when schismatics and heretics come to us, we do not correct but rather approve those things which they have no differently and perform no differently than the true Church.

> C. XXXV. De eodem.
> Idem ad Donatistas. Sicut ficti ueraciter non ficte recipiunt, nec eorum baptisma reprobatur, sic et illa, que scismatici et heretici, non aliter habent, nec aliter agunt quam uera ecclesia, dum ad nos ueniunt, non emendamus, sed potius approbamus.

C. XXXVI. The sacraments are not to be shunned, by whomsoever they are ministered.

The same against Petilian, [book III, c. 9]. Let no one shun God's sacraments either in a good man or in an evil man.

> C. XXXVI. Non fugiantur sacramenta, a quocumque ministrentur.
> Idem contra Petilianum. [lib. III. c. 9.] Neque in homine bono aliquis Dei sacramenta fugiat neque in homine malo.

C. XXXVII. Human wickedness does not profane the sacraments.

The same in the book On Baptism, [against the Donatists, book VI, c. 44]. Were not the Sodomites pagans, that is, gentiles? The Jews, then, were worse, to whom the Lord says: "It will be more tolerable for Sodom on the day of judgment than for you," and to whom the Prophet said: "You have justified Sodom," that is, by comparison with you she was made just. Yet were the divine sacraments which were among the Jews of the same quality as they themselves were? The Lord himself also received them, and sent the lepers whom he had cleansed to celebrate them; and an angel stood by Zechariah while he ministered them and announced that he had been heard while sacrificing in the temple. These same sacraments were both in the good men of that time and in evil men worse than the gentiles, since they were placed before the Sodomites in wickedness, and nevertheless those sacraments were integral and divine in both. For even the gentiles themselves, if they could have anything divine and right in their doctrines, were not rejected by our saints, although they were detestable because of their superstitions, idolatry, pride, and other ruined morals, and, unless corrected, were to be punished by divine judgment.

C. XXXVII. Hominum malitia sacramenta non profanat.

Idem in libro de baptismo. [contra Donatistas, l. VI. c. 44.] Nonne Sodomitae ethnici erant, id est gentiles? Peiores ergo Iudei, quibus Dominus dicit: "Tollerabilius erit Sodomis in die iudicii quam uobis," et quibus Propheta dixit: "Iustificastis Sodomam," id est, conparatione uestra iusta facta est. Numquid tamen ideo sacramenta diuina, que apud Iudeos talia erant, quales et ipsi erant? que Dominus quoque ipse suscepit, et ad ea celebranda leprosos, quos mundauerat, misit, et ea Zachariae ministranti angelus astitit, eumque in templo sacrificantem exauditum esse nuntiauit. Hec eadem sacramenta et in bonis hominibus illius temporis erant, et in malis peioribus quam sint ethnici, quandoquidem in malicia Sodomitis prelati sunt, et tamen illa sacramenta in utrisque erant integra et diuina. Nam et ipsi gentiles, si quid diuinum et rectum in doctrinis suis habere potuerunt, non inprobauerunt sancti nostri, quamuis illi per suas supersticiones, et ydololatriam, et superbiam, ceterosque perditos mores detestandi essent, et, nisi corrigerentur, diuino iudicio puniendi.

C. XXXVIII. Evil men can have sacraments, although they cannot have the power of the Holy Spirit.

The same, [book III, c. 16]. There are many operations of the Holy Spirit; when the same Apostle had commemorated them in a certain place, he concluded thus: "But one and the same Spirit operates all these things, dividing to each one his own gifts just as he wills." Therefore, since the sacrament which even Simon Magus could have is one thing, prophecy which is customarily made even in evil men, as in Saul, another, and the operation of that same Spirit which only the good can have—that is, charity—another: whatever heretics and schismatics may receive, "charity, which covers a multitude of sins," is the proper gift of catholic unity and peace, nor is his gift in all, because not all are his.

C. XXXVIII. Sacramenta mali habere possunt, licet uirtutem Spiritus sancti habere non possint.

Idem. [lib. III. cap. 16.] Multae autem operationes sunt Spiritus sancti, quas idem Apostolus cum quodam loco commemorasset, ita conclusit: "Omnia autem hec operatur unus atque idem Spiritus, diuidens propria unicuique prout uult." Cum ergo aliud sit sacramentum, quod habere etiam Symon magus potuit, aliud prophetia, que in malis etiam hominibus fieri solet, ut in Saul, aliud operatio eiusdem Spiritus, quam nisi boni habere non possunt, id est karitas; quodlibet heretici et scismatici accipiant "karitas, que operit multitudinem peccatorum," proprium donum est catholicae unitatis et pacis, nec eius donum in omnibus, quia nec omnes sunt eius.

C. XXXIX. Although evil men minister the sacraments, they do not bestow remission of sins.

The same, [in the same book, c. 18]. The avaricious do not give remission of sins; it is given through prayer, that is, through the groaning of the dove, whoever may baptize, if those to whom it is given belong to its peace. For the Lord does not say to robbers and usurers: "If you forgive anyone's sins, they are forgiven him; if you retain anyone's, they are retained." Without, indeed, no one can be bound or loosed where there is no one who can bind or loose another; but one who has made peace with the dove is loosed, and one who does not have peace with the dove is bound, whether he is openly without or appears to be within. GRATIAN. Therefore, if sacraments, after the manner of light, cannot be defiled by the unclean; if, after the manner of a pure river, they come through stony channels to fertile garden plots, it is clear that simoniacs have the sacrament of anointing uselessly and perniciously for themselves, but administer that same anointing usefully and salvifically to others. Therefore, just as the sacraments of heretics are true as to form, so they are true and not empty as to effect. Part VI. But it is to be noted that some sacraments are of dignity, others of necessity. Because necessity has no law, but makes a law for itself, those sacraments which are necessary for salvation, because they cannot be repeated, when they are true ought not to be taken away or lost, but with penance are permitted to be ratified. But those sacraments which are of dignity, unless they have been worthily administered in such a way that worthy persons are worthily advanced by worthy persons, cease to be dignities—not so that the truth of the sacrament is diminished, but so that the office of administering ceases, by reason either of place, time, or promotion. By reason of place, as Leo says, [to Rusticus, Bishop of Narbonne, epistle XC, otherwise XCII, c. 1]:

> C. XXXIX. Licet sacramenta mali ministrent, remissionem peccatorum non prestant.
> Idem. [eodem libro, c. 18.] Remissionem peccatorum auari non dant, que per orationem, id est per columbae gemitum, datur, quicumque baptizet, si ad eius pacem illi pertinent, quibus datur. Non enim raptoribus et feneratoribus dicit Dominus: "Si cui dimiseritis peccata, dimittuntur illi; si cui tenueritis, tenebuntur." Foris quidem nec ligari aliquis potest, nec solui, ubi non sit qui alium ligare possit, an soluere sed soluitur qui cum columba fecerit pacem, et ligatur qui cum columba non habet pacem, siue aperte foris sit, siue intus esse uideatur. Gratian. Si ergo sacramenta in modum lucis ab inmundis coinquinari non possunt, si in morem puri fluuii per lapideos canales ad fertiles areolas perueniunt, patet quod symoniaci sacramentum unctionis sibi quidem inutiliter et perniciose habent, aliis autem utiliter et salubriter eandem unctionem administrant. Sicut ergo sunt uera sacramenta hereticorum quantum ad formam, ita sunt uera et non inania quantum ad effectum. VI. Pars. Sed notandum est, quod sacramentorum alia sunt dignitatis, alia necessitatis. Quia enim necessitas non habet legem, sed ipsa sibi facit legem, illa sacramenta, que saluti sunt necessaria, quia iterari non possunt, cum sint uera, auferri uel amitti non debent, sed cum penitentia rata esse permittuntur. Illa uero sacramenta, que sunt dignitatis, nisi digne fuerint administrata ita ut digni digne a dignis prouehantur, dignitates esse desinunt, non ut minuatur ueritas sacramenti, sed ut cesset offitium administrandi, uel loco, uel tempore, uel promotione. Loco, ut ait Leo: [ad Rusticum Narbonensem Episcopum epistola XC. al XCII. cap. I.]

C. XL. Concerning those who are ordained by pseudo-bishops.

If any have been ordained by pseudo-bishops, such an ordination can be held ratified, provided that they remain in those same churches. Otherwise such an ordination is to be held vain. GRATIAN. Behold, if anyone ordained by pseudo-bishops changes the place of his ordination, such an ordination is vain and will be without administration. By reason of time, as Innocent says, [epistle XXII, c. 5], concerning those ordained by Bonosus:

> C. XL. De his qui a pseudoepiscopis ordinantur.
> Si qui a pseudoepiscopis ordinati fuerint, potest rata haberi talis ordinatio, ita ut in ipsis ecclesiis perseuerent. Aliter uana habenda est ordinatio talis. Gratian. Ecce aliquis a pseudoepiscopis ordinatus, si locum suae ordinationis mutauerit, uana est et sine amministratione erit talis ordinatio. Tempore, ut ait Innocentius [epist. XXII. c. 5.] de ordinatis a Bonoso:

C. XLI. Things which are conceded because of necessity will cease when that necessity ceases.

What was established because of the necessity of the time ought likewise to cease when that which pressed ceases, because lawful order is one thing, usurpation another. GRATIAN. Therefore, someone ordained at another time by one similar to Bonosus will cease from the administration which was permitted because of the necessity of that time. Likewise by reason of promotion, as Leo says, [epistle III to Julian of Aquileia]:

> C. XLI. Que pro necessitate conceduntur, eadem cessante cessabunt.
> Quod pro necessitate temporis statutum est, cessante necessitate debet cessare pariter quod urgebat, quia alius est ordo legitimus, alia usurpatio. Gratian. Ergo aliquis alio tempore ab eo, qui Bonoso sit similis, ordinatus, cessabit ab amministratione, que pro necessitate illius temporis fuit permissa. Item promotione, ut ait Leo: [epistola III. ad Iulianum Aquilegiensem]

C. XLII. Those who return from heretics can be received in their orders without hope of promotion.

If anyone has stained himself by the contagion of heretical communion, he has this as a great benefice: that, with every hope of promotion taken away, he may remain in the order in which he is found. GRATIAN. Behold, if a cleric communicates with heretics either in ordination or in any sacrament, when promotion ceases he scarcely remains in his own order. For it is not with this sacrament as with the others. For the others are either given for washing away faults, as baptism and penance, or are denied for faults not eternally but for a time, as the Eucharist, which at the moment of death is conceded to one penitent even of heinous sins. This one alone is interdicted not only because of fault but also because of infamy, and even because of the diminished prerogative of its own purity or of external or internal perfection, as it is denied to bigamists, to husbands of widows, to the illiterate, or to those defective in any part of the body, to whom nevertheless baptism or the Eucharist is not denied. Such a person can also administer all the sacraments who is unable to confer this one alone. Hence Leo says, [to the Bishops of Africa, epistle LXXXV, otherwise LXXXVII, c. 2]:

> C. XLII. Qui ab hereticis redeunt, sine spe promotionis in suis ordinibus recipi possunt.
> Si quis hereticae communionis contagione se macularit, hoc in magno beneficio habet, si adempta omni spe promotionis in quo inuenitur ordine permaneat. Gratian. Ecce si clericus uel ordinatione, uel quolibet sacramento hereticis communicat, cessans a promotione uix in suo ordine perseuerat. Non est enim de hoc sacramento ut de ceteris; cetera enim uel ad culpas abluendas dantur, ut baptismus et penitentia, uel pro culpis non in eternum, sed ad horam negantur, ut eucharistia, que in articulo mortis penitenti etiam de nefariis peccatis conceditur: hoc solum non solum pro culpa, sed etiam pro infamia interdicitur, etiam pro inminuta mundiciae suae, uel extrinsecae, uel intrinsecae perfectionis prerogatiua, ut bigamis, uel uiduae maritis, uel illiteratis, uel corporis qualibet parte uitiatis denegatur, quibus tamen baptismus uel eucharistia non negatur. Potest etiam talis cuncta sacramenta administrare, qui istud solum non ualet conferre. Unde Leo ait: [ad Episcopos Africae, epist. LXXXV. al. LXXXVII. cap. 2.]

C. XLIII. Concerning bishops who consecrate one whom it is not permitted to consecrate.

If any bishops have consecrated as priest such a man as it is not permitted to be one, even if in some way they escape the loss of their own honor, they will nevertheless no longer have the right of ordination, nor will they ever participate in that sacrament which they bestowed without merit. GRATIAN. Behold, while they escape the peril of honor so that they are permitted to administer the other sacraments in priestly fashion, they are removed from this one alone not merely for heresy or any greater fault but even for negligence. In all these things it must be carefully noted that the sacrament of priestly promotion is to be given or received more carefully and worthily than all the others, because unless it has been conferred in this way, it thereby ceases to be ratified, because it was not rightly perfected. For the other sacraments are given to each person for himself, and become for each person such as the heart or conscience with which they are received. This one alone is given not for himself alone but for others; and therefore it is necessary that, as to himself, it be received with a true heart and clean conscience, but as to others, not only without every fault but also without all infamy, because of the scandal of the brothers, for whose usefulness the priesthood is given not only that priests may preside but also that they may profit. Hence Jerome on Micah:

> C. XLIII. De episcopis, qui consecrant, qualem consecrare non licet.
> Si qui episcopi talem consecrauerint sacerdotem, qualem esse non liceat, etiamsi aliquo modo dampnum proprii honoris euaserint, ordinationis tamen ius ulterius non habebunt, nec illi umquam sacramento intererunt, quod inmerito prestiterunt. Gratian. Ecce cum honoris periculum euadant, ut cetera sacramenta sacerdotaliter administrare permittantur, ab hoc solo non modo pro heresi uel qualibet maiori culpa, sed etiam pro negligentia remouentur. In quibus omnibus sollicite notandum est, quod sacramentum sacerdotalis promotionis pre ceteris omnibus magis accurate et digne dandum uel accipiendum est, quia nisi ita collatum fuerit, eo desinet esse ratum, quo non fuerit rite perfectum. Cetera enim sacramenta unicuique propter se dantur, et unicuique talia fiunt quali corde uel conscientia accipiuntur. Istud solum non propter se solum, sed propter alias datur, et ideo necesse est, ut uero corde mundaque conscientia, quantum ad se, sumatur, quantum ad alios uero non solum sine omni culpa, sed etiam sine omni infamia, propter fratrum scandalum, ad quorum utilitatem, non solum ut presint, sed etiam ut prosint, sacerdotium datur. Unde Ieronimus in Michea:

C. XLIV. Simoniacs are guilty of the unbelief of those who are scandalized.

Those who ordain any of their followers and expose their life as a scandal to the people are guilty of the unbelief of those who are scandalized. GRATIAN. For truly those who are chosen so that they may preside over others, just as they are preordained in dignity, so ought to be preeminent in sanctity. Otherwise, why are those preferred to others who by no grace of merits are raised above the others? Hence Symmachus to Lawrence, Bishop of Milan:

> C. XLIV. Symoniaci rei sunt infidelitatis eorum, qui scandalizantur.
> Hii, quoscumque de asseclis suis ordinantes, et uitam eorum in scandalum populi exponentes, rei sunt infidelitatis eorum, qui scandalizantur. Gratian. Reuera enim qui ad hoc eliguntur, ut ceteris presint, sicut preordinantur dignitate, sic preminere debent sanctitate. Alioquin cur ceteris preferuntur, qui nulla meritorum gratia a ceteris assumuntur? Unde Simacus Laurentio Mediolanensi Episcopo:

C. XLV. Just as in honor, so each person ought to excel in knowledge.

He is to be reckoned most vile, unless he excels in knowledge and sanctity, who is more excellent in honor. Part VII. GRATIAN. Therefore it is clear that this saying of Augustine—namely, that the sacraments of Christ ministered through heretics do not lack their effect—is to be understood not generally of all but of the sacrament of baptism. Hence the same Augustine says, [tractate V on John]:

C. XLV. Sicut honore, ita et scientia quisque precellere debet.

Vilissimus conputandus est, nisi precellat scientia et sanctitate, qui est honore prestancior. VII. Pars. Gratian. Patet ergo illud Augustini (sacramenta uidelicet Christi per hereticos ministrata suo non carere effectu) non de omnibus intelligi generaliter, sed de sacramento baptismatis. Unde idem Augustinus ait: [tract. V. in Iohannem]

C. XLVI. Whether baptism is ministered by a good man or by an evil one, it ought not to be repeated.

Judas gave baptism, and there was no baptism after Judas; John gave baptism, and there was baptism after John, because that which was given by Judas was Christ's baptism, while that by John was John's. We rightly prefer not Judas to John, but Christ's baptism—even when given through the hands of Judas—to John's baptism. Likewise: § 1. Those whom Judas baptized, Christ also baptized; thus, therefore, those whom a drunkard, murderer, or adulterer baptizes, Christ baptizes. Likewise: § 2. The sacrament of the Church is so great that it is not polluted even when a murderer ministers it.

C. XLVI. Baptismus sine per bonum, siue per malum ministretur, reiterari non debet.

Dedit baptismum Iudas, et non est baptizatum post Iudam, dedit Iohannes, et baptizatum est post Iohannem, quia qui datus est a Iuda, baptismus Christi est, qui a Iohanne, Iohannis erat. Non Iudam Iohanni, sed baptisma Christi, etiam per Iudae manus datum, Iohannis baptismo recte preponimus. Item: §. 1. Quos Iudas, baptizauit et Christus, sic ergo quos baptizat ebrius, homicida, adulter, Christus baptizat. Item. §. 2. Sacramentum ecclesiae tam magnum est, ut nec homicida ministrante polluatur.

C. XLVII. On the same.

Likewise against the Donatists, [book IV, c. 4]. Just as I seem to be pressed when it is said to me, "Therefore, does a heretic forgive sin?" so I also press when I say, "Therefore, when an avaricious man, a pretender to religion, baptizes correctly, does he forgive sins?" If by the power of the sacrament, both the one and the other do; if by his own merit, neither the one nor the other does. For that sacrament is recognized to be Christ's even in evil men; but in the body of the one undefiled dove neither the one nor the other is found. It is as though someone's hand were withered: it would indeed be a true member, although without blood it would be ineffectual and dead. So also faith, though true, is nevertheless dead without works. Likewise: § 1. Thus one baptized in heresy in the name of the Holy Trinity is nevertheless not made a temple of God if he has not departed from heresy, just as one baptized in the same name while in avarice is not made a temple of God if he does not depart from avarice, which is the service of idols. Part VIII. GRATIAN. From these words, therefore, it appears that baptism which is bestowed by heretics confers remission of sins by its own power. But the same Augustine testifies to the contrary in book [VI] On Baptism [against the Donatists, c. 1], saying:

C. XLVII. De eodem.

Item contra Donatistas. [lib. IV. c. 4.] Sicut urgeri uideor, cum mihi dicitur: ergo hereticus dimittit peccatum? sic et ego urgeo, cum dico: ergo cum iuste baptizat, auarus, religionis simulator dimittit peccata? Si per uim sacramenti, sicut ille et ille; si per meritum suum, nec ille nec ille. Illud enim sacramentum et in malis hominibus Christi esse cognoscitur, in corpore autem unicae columbae, inmaculatae nec ille, nec ille inuenitur.

Ut si cuius manus esset arida, uerum quidem esse membrum, quamuis sine sanguine inefficax esset, et mortuum sic et fides cum sit uera, tamen sine operibus mortua est. Item: §. 1. Sic in heresi baptizatus in nomine sanctae Trinitatis non fit tamen templum Dei, si ab heresi non recesserit, quomodo neque in auaritia in eodem nomine baptizatus fit templum Dei, si ab auaritia non recedat, que est ydolorum seruitus. VIII. Pars. Gratian. Ex his itaque uerbis apparet, baptisma, quod ab hereticis tribuitur, uirtute sua remissionem conferre peccatorum. Sed idem Augustinus econtra testatur in libro [VI.] de baptismo [contra Donatistas, c. 1.] dicens:

C. XLVIII. Although Christ's baptism is violated by no depravity, among heretics it nevertheless lacks effect.

Even those slower of heart understand that Christ's baptism can be violated by no depravity of the giver or receiver. But because the sacrament is one thing and the effect of the sacrament another, since it is established that those who live ruinously in the very unity of the Church can neither give nor have remission of sins—because it was said not to evil sons but to good ones, "If you forgive anyone's sins, they will be forgiven; if you retain anyone's, they will be retained"—it is therefore clear that heretics only give or receive the sacrament of baptism.

C. XLVIII. Baptisma Christi, etsi nulla peruersitate uioletur, apud hereticos tamen caret effectu.

Etiam corde tardiores intelligunt, baptismum Christi nulla peruersitate dantis uel accipientis posse uiolari. Sed quia aliud est sacramentum ab effectu sacramenti, cum eos, qui in ipsa unitate ecclesiae perdite uiuunt, constet remissionem peccatorum nec dare, nec habere posse, quia non malignis, sed bonis filiis dictum est: "Si cui dimiseritis peccata, dimittentur, cui tenueritis, tenebuntur," patet ergo hereticos dare tantum uel accipere sacramentum baptismi.

[C. XLIX.]

Likewise in The Words of the Lord concerning Blasphemy against the Spirit. Bodily sacraments, which even those separated from the unity of Christ's body bear and celebrate, can have a form of piety. But the invisible and spiritual power can no more be in them than sensation follows a member when it is amputated from the body.

[C. XLIX.]

Item in uerbis Domini de blasphemia Spiritus. Corporalia sacramenta, que portant et celebrant etiam segregati ab unitate corporis Christi, formam habere pietatis possunt. Virtus uero inuisibilis et spiritualis ita in eis esse non potest, quemadmodum sensus non sequitur membrum, quando amputatur a corpore.

C. L. On the same.

Likewise Ambrose in the book On Initiating the Untaught. The baptism of the perfidious does not heal, does not cleanse, but pollutes, because in the flood of waters they will not approach God; for, as is said through the Apostle, "Whatever is not from faith is sin," and it not only does not profit those who perform it and those for whom they perform it, but is unto judgment.

C. L. De eodem.

Item Ambrosius in libro de initiandis rudibus. Non sanat baptismus perfidorum, non mundat, sed polluit, quia in diluuio aquarum ad Deum non approximabunt, quia, ut per Apostolum dicitur, "quicquid ex fide non est, peccatum est," et ipsis, qui faciunt, et quibus faciunt non solum non prodest, sed ad iudicium est.

C. LI. Those who receive baptism from heretics are confirmed through the imposition of the hand.

Likewise Pope Leo to Bishop Nicetas, [epistle LXXVII, otherwise LXXIX, c. 7]. Those who received baptism from heretics, when they had not been baptized before, are to be confirmed by the invocation of the Holy Spirit alone through the imposition of the hand, because they received only the form of baptism without the power of sanctification. And, as you know, we proclaim that this rule is to be observed in all churches: that the washing once entered upon be violated by no repetition, as the Apostle says, "One God, one faith, one baptism"; its washing is to be profaned by no repetition, but, as we have said, only the sanctification of the Holy Spirit is to be invoked, so that what no one receives from heretics he may obtain from catholic priests. Part IX. GRATIAN. But it must be noted that heretics such as Arians and Sabellians—of whom some confessed an inequality, others a lack of distinction, of the persons—ministered baptism not in the form of the Church but of their own depravity. § 1. Ambrose spoke particularly of these, saying: "The baptism of the perfidious does not heal, etc.," so that they are also rebaptized and reordained. Hence it was established in the Council of Nicaea, [c. 19]:

C. LI. Per manus inpositionem confirmantur qui ab hereticis baptisma accipiunt.

Item Leo Papa ad Nicetem Episcopum. [epist. LXXVII. al. LXXIX. c. 7.] Hi, qui baptismum ab hereticis acceperunt, cum antea baptizati non fuissent, sola Spiritus sancti inuocatione per inpositionem manus confirmandi sunt, quia formam tantum baptismi sine sanctificationis uirtute sumpserunt. Et hanc regulam, ut scitis, seruandam in omnibus ecclesiis predicamus, ut lauacrum semel initum nulla iteracione uioletur, dicente Apostolo: "Unus Deus, una fides, unum baptisma," cuius ablutio nulla iteracione temeranda est, sed, ut diximus, sola sanctificatio sancti Spiritus inuocanda, ut quod ab hereticis nemo accipit a catholicis sacerdotibus consequatur. IX. Pars. Gratian. Sed notandum est, quod heretici, ut Arriani et Sabelliani, quorum alii inequalitatem, alii indiscretionem personarum confitebantur, baptisma non in forma ecclesiae, sed suae peruersitatis ministrabant. §. 1. De his specialiter Ambrosius locutus est, dicens: "Non sanat baptismus perfidorum, etc." ut etiam rebaptizentur et reordinentur unde in Niceno Concilio [c. 19.] statutum est:

C. LII. Let those who return to the Church from the Paulianists and Cataphrygians be rebaptized and ordained.

If anyone has fled to the catholic Church from the Paulianists and Cataphrygians, let it be established that they ought altogether to be rebaptized. But if any were clerics among them, provided they were blameless and irreproachable, they are to be rebaptized, and let them again also be ordained by the bishop of the catholic Church. But if, when examined, they are discovered to be less suitable, they must be deposed. Similarly also concerning deacons and all who are found in that same clergy, the same form will be observed.

C. LII. Rebaptizentur et ordinentur qui de Paulianistis et Cathafrigis ad ecclesiam redeunt.

Si quis confugerit ad ecclesiam catholicam de Paulianistis et Cathafrigis statutum sit, rebaptizari eos omnino debere. Si qui uero clerici erant apud eos, siquidem inculpati fuerint et irreprehensibiles, rebaptizandi sunt, rursus etiam ordinentur ab episcopo ecclesiae catholicae. Si uero examinati minus apti fuerint deprehensi, deponi eos oportet. Similiter autem et circa diacones et de omnibus, qui in eodem clero inueniuntur, eadem forma seruabitur.

[C. LIII.]

Likewise Innocent, [to the Bishops of Macedonia, epistle XXII, c. 5]. The Paulianists do not at all baptize in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, while the Novatians baptize in those same dread names, nor among them has any question ever been raised concerning the unity of the divine power, that is, of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, etc.

GRATIAN. Others preserve the form of the Church in baptizing. But when those who communicate with them in heresy or schism are baptized by them, they indeed receive from them the sacrament of baptism but do not obtain its power, which no one can obtain without faith. Hence it is said concerning the Lord that in his own country he could not perform a sign because of their unbelief. Likewise Augustine in homily LXXX:

[C. LIII.]

Item Innocentius. [ad Episcopos Macedoniae, epist. XXII. c. 5] Paulianistae in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti minime baptizant et Nouatiani iisdem nominibus tremendis baptizant, nec apud istos de unitate potestatis diuinae, hoc est Patris, Filii ei Spiritus sancti, questio aliquando commota est etc.

Gratian. Alii formam ecclesiae in baptizando seruant. Sed dum ab eis baptizantur, qui in heresi uel scismate eis communicant, sacramentum quidem baptismi ab eis accipiunt, uirtutem uero non consecuntur, quam sine fide nullus consequi potest. Unde de Domino dicitur, quod in patria sua non poterat facere signum propter incredulitatem eorum. Item Augustinus in omelia LXXX:

C. LIV. When the word comes to the element, it becomes a sacrament.

Take away the word: what is the water but water? The word comes to the element, and it becomes a sacrament. § 1. Whence is there so great a power of the water that it touches the body and washes the heart, except through the word's operation? Not because it is spoken, but because it is believed. For even in the word itself the passing sound is one thing, the abiding power another. GRATIAN. Concerning those also who are baptized in heresy or schism, Augustine writes to Peter the Deacon, [c. 36], saying:

C. LIV. Dum uerbum accedit ad elementum, fit sacramentum.

Detrahe uerbum, quid est aqua nisi aqua? accedit uerbum ad elementum, et fit sacramentum. §. 1. Unde ista tanta uirtus aquae, ut corpus tangat et cor abluat, nisi faciente uerbo? non quia dicitur, sed quia creditur. Nam et in ipso uerbo aliud est sonus transiens, aliud uirtus manens. Gratian. De his etiam, qui in heresi uel scismate baptizantur, scribit Augustinus, ad Petrum Diaconum, [c. 36.] dicens:

C. LV. Those baptized outside the Church accumulate perdition for themselves if they have not returned to the Church.

Hold most firmly and doubt in no way that for those baptized outside the Church, if they have not returned to the Church, perdition is increased by baptism. For the communion of ecclesiastical fellowship avails so greatly toward salvation that one is not saved by baptism when it is not given there where it ought to be given.

C. LV. Extra ecclesiam baptizati si ad ecclesiam non redierint perniciem sibi accumulant.

Firmissime tene et nullatenus dubites, extra ecclesiam baptizatis, si ad ecclesiam non redierint, baptismo cumulari perniciem. Tantum enim ualet ecclesiasticae societatis communio ad salutem, ut baptismo non saluetur cui ibi non datur, ubi oportet ut detur.

C. LVI. Gifts which are possessed apart from the unity of the Church are useless.

The same, [tractate XIII on c. 3 of John]. Let us hold to unity, my brothers. Apart from unity, even one who performs a miracle is nothing. The people of Israel were in unity and did not perform miracles; Pharaoh's magicians were apart from unity and performed things similar to Moses. The people of Israel, as I have said, did not perform miracles. Who were to be saved before God: those who performed miracles, or those who did not? Peter the Apostle raised a dead man. Simon Magus did many things. There were certain Christians who could perform neither what Peter performed nor what Simon performed. But in what did they rejoice? Because their names were written in heaven.

C. LVI. Inutilia sunt dona, que preter ecclesiae unitatem habentur.

Idem. [tractatu XIII. ad c. 3. Iohannis] Teneamus, unitatem fratres mei. Preter unitatem et qui facit miraculum nichil est; in unitate erat populus Israel, et non faciebat miracula; preter unitatem erant magi Pharaonis, et faciebant similia Moysi. Populus Israel, ut dixi, non faciebat miracula. Qui erant saluandi apud Deum, qui faciebant miracula, an qui non faciebant? Petrus apostolus resuscitauit mortuum. Symon magus fecit multa. Erant quidam Christiani, qui non poterant facere quod faciebat Petrus, nec quod faciebat Symon. Sed inde gaudebant? quia nomina eorum scripta erant in celo.

C. LVII. Baptism once bestowed is not to be repeated.

Likewise Leo to Bishop Nicetas, [epistle LXXVII, otherwise LXIX, c. 7]. We proclaim that this rule is to be observed in all churches: that the washing once entered upon be violated by no repetition, as the Apostle says, "One God, one faith, one baptism"; its washing is to be violated by no repetition, but only the sanctification of the Spirit is to be invoked, so that what no one receives from heretics he may obtain from catholic priests. Part X. GRATIAN. "No one" is to be understood as one established in heresy or schism. But if, with integrity of faith and purity of soul, someone has received baptism from the hand of heretics in the form of the Church, then that saying of Augustine is fulfilled: "Through a stony channel the water passes to the garden plots." And again: "The spiritual power of the sacrament, etc."

C. LVII. Baptisma semel traditum non est reiterandum.

Item Leo ad Nicetem Episcopum. [epist. LXXVII. al. LXIX. c. 7.] Hanc regulam seruandam in omnibus ecclesiis predicamus, ut lauacrum semel initum nulla iteracione uioletur, dicente Apostolo: "Unus Deus, una fides, unum baptisma," cuius ablutio nulla reiteracione uiolanda est, sed, sola sanctificatio Spiritus inuocanda, ut quod ab hereticis nemo accipit a catholicis sacerdotibus consequatur. X. Pars. Gratian. Nemo in heresi uel scismate constitutus intelligendus est. Ceterum, si cum fidei integritate et animi puritate de manu hereticorum aliquis in forma ecclesiae baptisma acceperit, tunc inpletur illud Augustini: "Per lapideum canalem aqua transit ad areolas." Et iterum: "Spiritualis uirtus sacramenti, etc."

C. LVIII. Even through the evil, the good are gathered.

Likewise [Augustine], On Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit in the holy Church, even in this time in which the grain is, as it were, threshed with the chaff, operates so that he disdains no one's true confession, is deceived by no one's pretense, and so flees the reprobate that even through their ministry he gathers the upright. GRATIAN. Behold when baptism is received from heretics with its power; its administration is so necessary that even when given by pagans it cannot be repeated. Hence it is read in the Ecclesiastical History that Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria, when he was celebrating the solemn rites of Peter the Martyr, after the sacraments of the masses had been completed, saw on the seashore the play of boys imitating a bishop, as is customary, and performing the things which customarily are performed in the Church. Immediately he ordered them to be brought to him and asked what they had done. They revealed the order of the affair, confessing that certain catechumens had been baptized by them through the boy Athanasius, who had pretended to be their bishop. When he saw from their answers that all things accorded with the rite of our religion, he established that baptism ought not to be repeated for those upon whom water had been poured with the questions and answers complete, but that the things which it is customary for priests to perform should be completed. Hence Isidore also says:

> C. LVIII. Etiam per malos boni colliguntur.
> Item [Augustinus] de blasphemia Spiritus sancti. Spiritus sanctus in sancta ecclesia etiam isto tempore, quo uelud granum attrituratur cum palea, sic operatur, ut nullius ueram confessionem aspernetur, nullius simulatione fallatur, atque ita reprobos fugiat, ut etiam per illorum ministerium probos colligat. Gratian. Ecce quando ab hereticis baptisma cum sua uirtute accipitur, cuius tam necessaria amministracio est, ut nec etiam a paganis datum possit reiterari. Unde in ecclesiastica ystoria legitur, quod Alexander episcopus Alexandriae, cum Petri Martiris solempnia celebraret, post expleta missarum sacramenta uidit super oram maris puerorum ludum, imitantium, ut solet fieri, episcopum, et gerentium ea, que in ecclesia geri mos est. Mox eos ad se perduci iubet, et quid egissent percunctatur. Illi rei ordinem pandunt, baptizatos a se esse quosdam cathecuminos confitentur per Athanasium puerum, qui illis fuerat episcopus simulatus. Ubi ex responsis eorum uidit secundum religionis nostrae ritum cuncta constare, statuit illis, quibus integris interrogationibus et responsionibus aqua fuerat infusa, iterari baptismum non debere, sed adinpleri ea, que sacerdotibus est mos. Hinc etiam Ysidorus ait:

C. LIX. Concerning those who through ignorance are ordained before they are baptized.

If anyone through ignorance is ordained before he is baptized, those baptized by him ought to be baptized again, and he himself is not to be ordained thereafter. But the Roman Pontiff does not judge the man who baptizes, but believes that the Spirit of God supplies the grace of baptism, even if it is a pagan who baptizes.

[PALEA.

> C. LIX. De his, qui per ignorantiam ordinantur antequam baptizentur.
>
> Si quis per ignorantiam ordinatur antequam baptizetur, debent ab eo baptizati iterum rebaptizari, et ipse ulterius non ordinetur. Sed Romanus Pontifex non hominem iudicat, qui baptizat, sed Spiritum Dei subministrare gratiam credit baptismi, licet paganus sit, qui baptizat.
>
> [PALEA.

C. LX.

From the Council at Compiègne. If an ordained priest discovers that he has not been baptized, let him be baptized and ordained again.]

GRATIAN. That the other sacraments cannot be ministered by heretics is attested by Jerome on the Prophet Haggai, [c. 2]:

> C. LX.
> Ex Concilio apud Compendium. Si presbiter ordinatus deprehenderit se non esse baptizatum, baptizetur et ordinetur iterum.]
> Gratian. Quod autem cetera sacramenta ab hereticis ministrari non possint, testatur Ieronimus in Aggeo Propheta: [cap. 2.]

C. LXI. Things offered by heretics do not please God.

Such is this people of all heretics in my sight, says the Lord; everything they have done, everything they have offered to me—whether vows, or offerings for salvation, or peace offerings, or offerings for sin, or whole burnt offerings, or alms, or fasts, or chastity of the body—will be contaminated in my sight. For although the things offered appear holy in their form, nevertheless, because they have been handled by one who is polluted in soul, all are polluted.

> C. LXI. Non placent Deo que ab hereticis offeruntur.
> Sic populus iste hereticorum omnium est in conspectu meo, dicit Dominus, omne, quod fecerint, quod mihi obtulerint, uel uota, uel pro salute, uel pacifica, uel pro peccato, uel holocaustis siue elemosinas siue ieiunia uel corporis castitatem contaminata erunt in conspectu meo. Quamuis enim sancta uideantur specie sui que offeruntur, tamen, quia tractata sunt ab illo, qui pollutus est in anima, polluuntur omnia.

C. LXII. On the same.

Likewise on the Prophet Amos, [c. 5]. God hates the sacrifices of heretics and casts them away from himself; and whenever they have been gathered in his name, he detests their stench and closes his nostrils.

> C. LXII. De eodem.
>
> Item in Amos Propheta. [c. 5.] Odit Deus sacrificia hereticorum et a se proicit, et quotiens in nomine eius congregati fuerint, detestatur fetorem eorum et claudit nares suas.

[C. LXIII.]

Likewise on Hosea, [c. 6]. They offer sacrilegious bread and give alms, and appear to pursue humility. If these things were truly done, I would interpret them as whole burnt offerings. But since they have forsaken the knowledge of God, in vain do they boast that they possess the other members when the head of faith has been cut off.

> [C. LXIII.]
> Item in Osea. [cap. 6.] Illi offerunt panem sacrilegum, et dant elemosinas, et sectari uidentur humilitatem. Que ego, si uere fiant, holocausta interpretor. Cum autem scientiam Dei dereliquerint, frustra truncato capite fidei cetera membra habere se iactant.

C. LXIV. Without faith and charity, neither is the Gospel possessed nor do any good things profit.

The same in the epistle to the Galatians, [c. 1, v. 11]. Marcion and Basilides and the other plagues of heretics do not have the Gospel of God, because they do not have the Holy Spirit, without whom the Gospel that is taught becomes human. Nor should we think that the Gospel is in the words of the Scriptures, but in their sense; not on the surface, but in the marrow; not in the leaves of the discourses, but in the root of reason.

> C. LXIV. Sine fide et karitate nec euangelium habetur, nec prosunt aliqua bona.
> Idem in epistola ad Galatos. [c. 1. u. 11.] Marcion et Basilides, et ceterae hereticorum pestes non habent Dei euangelium, quia non habent Spiritum sanctum, sine quo humanum fit euangelium quod docetur. Nec putemus in uerbis scripturarum esse euangelium, sed in sensu; non in superficie, sed in medulla; non in sermonum foliis, sed in radice rationis.

[C. LXV.]

The same, [on c. 5 of the same epistle, v. 14]. See how great a good charity is. If we undergo martyrdom in such a way that we wish our relics to be honored by men, and if, following the opinion of the crowd, we pour out our blood fearlessly and give our substance even to the point of our own beggary, not so much a reward as a penalty is owed to this work, and there are torments of perfidy rather than a crown of victory.

> [C. LXV.]
> Idem. [ad cap. 5. eiusdem epistolae u. 14.] Vide, quantum bonum est karitas. Si ita martirium fecerimus, ut nostras uelimus ab hominibus reliquias honorari, et si opinionem uulgi sectantes intrepidi sanguinem fuderimus, et substantiam nostram usque ad mendicitatem propriam dederimus, huic operi non tam premium quam pena debetur, et perfidiae magis tormenta sunt quam corona uictoriae.

C. LXVI. The blessing of heretics is a curse.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea, [c. 32]. It is not fitting to receive the blessings of heretics, because they are curses rather than blessings.

> C. LXVI. Hereticorum benedictio maledictio est.
>
> Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 32.] Non oportet hereticorum benedictiones accipere, quoniam maledictiones magis sunt quam benedictiones.

C. LXVII. It is permitted to pray neither with heretics nor with schismatics.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 70]. Let neither clerics nor laymen be permitted to receive blessed gifts from heretics, because they are curses rather than blessings; nor let it be permitted to pray either with heretics or with schismatics.

> C. LXVII. Neque cum hereticis, neque cum scismaticis licet orare.
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 70.] Non liceat clericis uel laicis ab hereticis eulogias accipere, quia maledictiones sunt magis quam benedictiones, neque liceat aut cum hereticis, aut scismaticis orare.

C. LXVIII. Outside the Church there are no true sacrifices.

Likewise Leo to Anatolius, Bishop of Constantinople, [epistle XLVIII, c. 2]. In the Church of God, which is the body of Christ, neither are priesthoods otherwise ratified nor sacrifices true unless the true Pontiff reconciles us in the property of his own nature.

> C. LXVIII. Extra ecclesiam non sunt uera sacrificia.
>
> Item Leo ad Anatholium Constantinopolitanum Episcopum. [epist. XLVIII. cap. 2.] In ecclesia Dei, que corpus Christi est, aliter nec rata sunt sacerdotia, nec uera sacrificia, nisi in proprietate suae naturae uerus nos pontifex reconciliet.

C. LXIX. The divine sacraments withdraw themselves from the hands of the impious.

The same to Emperor Leo, [epistle LXXIII]. It is manifest that through most cruel and most insane madness all the light of the heavenly sacraments has been extinguished in the Alexandrian see. The offering of sacrifice has been intercepted; the sanctification of chrism is lacking; and all the mysteries have withdrawn themselves from the parricidal hands of the impious.

> C. LXIX. Inpiorum manibus diuina sacramenta se subducunt.
> Idem Leoni Augusto. [epist. LXXIII.] Manifestum est, per crudelissimam et insanissimam uesaniam in Alexandrina sede omne celestium sacramentorum lumen exstinctum. Intercepta est sacrificii oblatio, deficit crismatis sanctificatio, et parricidalibus manibus inpiorum omnia sese subtraxere misteria.

C. LXX. Sacraments can be ministered outside the Church, but they cannot confer salvation.

Likewise the blessed martyr Cyprian in the epistle against heretics. If anyone, he says, has departed from the Church by heretical presumption, he is condemned by himself. According to the Apostle, we ought not even to take food with one of this kind. This is declared in the book of Kings, where, when the man of God had been sent to Jeroboam to reproach his sins and foretell future vengeance, he was prohibited from eating bread and drinking water in his house. When he did not observe this, returning from there he died on the way from the bite of a lion, by divine sentence. § 1. Ought anyone to say that the saving sacrament and heavenly grace can be common with heretics, with whom neither earthly food nor secular drink ought to be common? Moreover, it is established that the oil with which the baptized are anointed cannot be sanctified, and the Eucharist cannot be made among them at all, where there is no hope and the faith is false, where all things are performed through falsehood. For the heretic, after the manner of apes which imitate the human form although they are not human beings, claims for himself the countenance, authority, and truth of the catholic Church, although he himself is not in the Church. He blesses although he is accursed by God; he promises life although he is dead; as a blasphemer he invokes God; as a profane man he administers the priesthood; as a sacrilegious man he sets up an altar. To all these things this evil also is added: that the prelate of the devil dares to make the Eucharist, although an offering cannot be sanctified there where the Holy Spirit is not, nor can the Lord profit anyone through the prayers and supplications of one who himself has violated God. For if those who violate the Church are held as gentiles and publicans, much more is it necessary that rebels and enemies, fashioning false altars, illicit priesthoods, sacrilegious sacrifices, and every adulteration, be counted among gentiles and publicans; all of these are established to have departed from the charity and unity of the catholic Church. Therefore, all things whatsoever that heretics perform are carnal, empty, and false, so that none of the things which they have performed ought to be approved by us. Things which are boasted in Christ's name are not immediately to be received and adopted, but those which are performed in Christ's truth. For how can those who attempt against God what is not permitted to them perfect the things they perform or obtain anything from God by illicit endeavors? § 2. Therefore, those who give patronage to heretics and schismatics are proved by divine censure to be destined for their crime and punishments—not only the leaders and authors but also the participants—unless they separate themselves from the communion of the wicked, as the Lord commands through Moses: "Separate yourselves from the tents of these most hard men, and do not touch any of the things which are among them, lest you perish together in their sins." And the Lord fulfilled what he had threatened through Moses, so that whoever had not separated himself from Korah, Dathan, and Abiram immediately paid the penalties for impious communion. So also the Holy Spirit testifies through the prophet Hosea, saying: "Their sacrifices are like the bread of mourning; all who eat them will be contaminated," plainly teaching and showing that absolutely all who have been contaminated by their sin are joined with the authors in punishment.

C. LXX. Sacramenta extra ecclesiam ministrari possunt, salutem uero conferre non possunt.

Item B. Martir Ciprianus in epistola contra hereticos. Si quis, inquit, de ecclesia heretica presumptione exierit, a semetipso dampnatus est. Cum huiusmodi secundum Apostolum, nec cibum quidem sumere debemus. Declaratur hoc in libro Regnorum, ubi, cum homo Dei ad Ieroboam missus esset, qui peccata sua exprobraret atque ultionem futuram prediceret, panem apud illum edere et aquam bibere prohibitus est. Quod cum non custodisset, diuina sententia inde rediens, morsu leonis in itinere interiit. §. 1. An debet quisquam dicere, sacramentum salutare, et gratiam celestem communem cum hereticis esse posse, cum quibus nec terrestris cibus, nec secularis potus debet esse communis? Constat autem oleum, unde baptizati tinguntur, sanctificari, et eucharistiam fieri apud illos omnino non posse, ubi spes nulla est et fides falsa, ubi omnia per mendacium geruntur. Nam hereticus more symiarum, que cum homines non sint, formam humanam imitantur, uultum ecclesiae catholicae et auctoritatem sibi et ueritatem uendicant, cum ipse in ecclesia non sit. Benedicit cum a Deo sit maledictus, uitam pollicetur cum sit mortuus, Deum inuocat blasphemus, sacerdotium amministrat profanus, ponit altare sacrilegus. Ad hec omnia accedit et illud malum, ut antistes diaboli audeat eucharistiam facere, cum nec sanctificari oblatio illic possit, ubi Spiritus sanctus non sit, nec cuiquam Dominus per eius preces et orationes prosit, qui Deum ipse uiolauit. Si enim qui ecclesiam uiolant ethnici, et publicani habentur, multo magis rebelles et hostes, falsa altaria, et illicita sacerdotia, et sacrificia sacrilega et omnia adulteria fingentes, inter ethnicos et publicanos necesse est ut conputentur, quos omnes constat a karitate atque unitate ecclesiae catholicae recessisse. Ergo omnia, quecumque faciunt heretici, carnalia sunt, inania et falsa, ita ut nichil eorum, que illi gesserint, a nobis probari debeat. Non statim suscipienda sunt et assumenda que iactantur in Christi nomine, sed que geruntur in Christi ueritate. Quomodo enim perficere que agunt aut inpetrare aliquid illicitis conatibus a Deo possunt, qui contra Deum quod eis non licet moliuntur? §. 2. Quare, qui hereticis et scismaticis patrocinantur, censura diuina in eorum probantur facinore et penis non solum duces et auctores, sed etiam participes destinari, nisi se a communione malorum separauerint, precipiente Domino per Moysen: "Separamini a tabernaculis hominum istorum durissimorum, et nolite tangere de omnibus, que sunt in eis, ne simul pereatis in peccatis eorum." Et quod comminatus Dominus per Moysen fuerat inpleuit, ut, quisquis se a Chore, et Dathan, et Abiron non separasset, penas statim pro inpia communione solueret. Sicut etiam per Osee prophetam Spiritus sanctus testatur dicens: "Sacrificia eorum tamquam panis luctus; omnes, qui manducant ea, contaminabuntur;" docens scilicet et ostendens omnes omnino cum auctoribus supplicio coniungi, qui fuerint peccato eorum contaminati.

C. LXXI. True sacrifices are celebrated only in the faith of the Church.

Likewise Augustine, [book of Sentences Collected by Prosper of Aquitaine, Bishop of Reggio, c. 15]. Outside the catholic Church there is no place for true sacrifice. Likewise Gregory in the third book of the Dialogues, [c. 31], says concerning King Hermenegild, son of Leovigild:

C. LXXI. Vera sacrificia non nisi in fide ecclesiae celebrantur.

Item Augustinus. [lib. Sententiarum per Prosperum Aquitanicum Episcopum Reg. collectarum c. 15.] Extra catholicam ecclesiam non est locus ueri sacrificii. Item Gregorius in III. libro Dialogorum [cap. 31.] ait de Erminigildo Rege Leouigildi filio:

C. LXXII. Communion is not to be received from the hand of heretics.

When the day of the Paschal festivity arrived, in the silence of the dead of night his perfidious father sent an Arian bishop to him so that he might receive communion of the sacrilegious consecration from his hand and through this might merit to return to his father's favor. But the man devoted to God reproached the Arian bishop who came, as he ought, and repelled his perfidy from himself with fitting rebukes.

C. LXXII. De manu hereticorum communio non est recipienda.

Superueniente pascalis festiuitatis die intempestae noctis silentio ad eum pater perfidus Arrianum episcopum misit, ut ex eius manu consecrationis sacrilegae communionem perciperet, atque per hoc ad patris gratiam redire mereretur. Sed uir Deo deditus Arriano episcopo uenienti exprobrauit ut debuit, eiusque a se perfidiam dignis increpationibus repulit.

C. LXXIII. Priests of heretics are not held worthy of Christ's honors.

Likewise Innocent, chapter VII. Moreover, Arians and the other plagues of this kind: because we receive their laymen when converted to the Lord under the form of penance and with the sanctification of the Spirit through the imposition of the hand, their clerics do not appear worthy to receive the dignity of the priesthood or of any ministry. For those to whom we permit only baptism to be ratified—which certainly is received in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit—we do not judge to have the Holy Spirit from that baptism and those ministries, because, when their authors departed from the catholic faith, they lost the perfection of the Spirit which they had received, and those who through the perfidy of their impiety lost faith in the Lord cannot give the fullness of the Spirit which operates especially in ordinations. For this reason it cannot happen that we judge their profane priests worthy of Christ's honors, when, as I have said, we receive their laymen as imperfect, under the form of penance, for receiving the grace of the Holy Spirit. Likewise: § 1. It is read, "One who touches the unclean will be unclean"; how, therefore, will that which is accustomed to receive uncleanness and filth be bestowed upon him? And below: § 2. How one who has been made a participant of a condemned man ought to receive honor, we cannot discover. GRATIAN. Moreover, from the fact that the imposition of the hand is commanded to be repeated, it is shown not to be a sacrament. Hence Augustine, in book III On Baptism, [against the Donatists, c. 16]:

C. LXXIII. Sacerdotes hereticorum Christi honoribus non habentur digni.

Item Innocentius capitulo VII. Arrianos preterea ceterasque huiusmodi pestes, quia eorum laicos conuersos ad Dominum sub imagine penitentiae ac Spiritus sanctificatione per manus inpositionem suscipimus non uidentur clerici eorum cum sacerdotii aut cuiuspiam ministerii suscipiendi esse dignitate. Quoniam quibus solum baptisma ratum esse permittimus (quod utique in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti percipitur), nec Spiritum sanctum eos habere ex illo baptismate illisque ministeriis arbitramur, quoniam, cum a catholica fide auctores eorum discederent, perfectionem Spiritus, quam acceperant, amiserunt, nec dare eius plenitudinem possunt, que maxime in ordinationibus operatur, qui per inpietatis suae perfidiam fidem domini perdiderunt. Propter quod fieri non potest, ut eorum profanos sacerdotes dignos Christi honoribus arbitremur, quorum laicos inperfectos, ut dixi, ad sancti Spiritus percipiendam gratiam cum penitentiae imagine recipimus. Item: §. 1. Legitur "Qui tetigerit inmundum inmundus erit," quomodo ergo ei tribuetur qui inmunditiam et spurcitias consueuit accipere? Et infra: §. 2. Qui particeps factus est dampnati, quomodo honorem debeat accipere, inuenire non possumus. Gratian. Ex eo autem, quod manus inpositio iterari precipitur, sacramentum non esse ostenditur. Unde Augustinus de baptismo libro III.: [contra Donatistas c. 16.]

C. LXXIV. The imposition of the hand is not a repetition of a sacrament.

The imposition of the hand is not like baptism, which cannot be repeated. For what else is it but prayer over a man? GRATIAN. Therefore, since Innocent permits only baptism to be ratified among heretics; since Gregory calls the consecration of the Arians sacrilegious; since Cyprian judges whatever things are performed by heretics to be carnal, empty, and false; since Jerome asserts that all things offered by them are contaminated in the sight of the Lord; since Leo attests that outside the Church neither are priesthoods ratified nor sacrifices true: it is clear that ecclesiastical sacraments apart from baptism, as was said above, cannot be ministered by heretics. Likewise, that saying of Jerome to the Luciferian is objected:

C. LXXIV. Manus positio non est sacramenti iteracio.

Manus inpositio non, sicut baptismus, repeti non potest. Quid enim est aliud, nisi oratio super hominem? Gratian. Cum ergo Innocentius solum baptisma hereticis ratum esse permittat; cum Gregorius sacrilegam uocet consecrationem Arrianorum; cum Ciprianus quecumque ab hereticis fiunt carnalia, inania, et falsa iudicet; cum Ieronimus omnia, que ab eis offeruntur, contaminata in conspectu Domini asserat; cum Leo extra ecclesiam nec rata esse sacerdotia, nec uera sacrificia testetur: patet, quod sacramenta ecclesiastica preter baptisma (ut supra dictum est) ac hereticis ministrari non possunt. Item obicitur illud Ieronimi ad Luciferianum:

C. LXXV. One who is holy in baptism will not be a sinner at the altar.

Just as Christ is he who baptizes, so he himself is he who sanctifies. Hence I ask you either to grant the license of sacrificing to the one whose baptism you approve, or to reject the baptism of one whom you do not think to be a priest. For it cannot happen that one who is holy in baptism is a sinner at the altar. GRATIAN. But this is to be understood only of a catholic sinner, not a heretic. Whatever he does with faith according to his office, although unworthy, is nevertheless believed ratified through the cooperation of divine grace. Otherwise, if it is understood to have been said concerning heretics, he would be contrary to himself, since he says on Hosea: “Their sacrifices, etc.” And elsewhere in the person of the Lord:

C. LXXV. Qui in baptismo sanctus est, ad altare peccator non erit.

Sicut Christus est qui baptizat, ita ipse est qui sanctificat. Unde oro te, ut aut sacrificandi licentiam ei tribuas, cuius baptisma probas, aut reprobes eius baptisma, quem non putes esse sacerdotem. Neque enim fieri potest, ut qui in baptismo sanctus est sit ad altare peccator. Gratian. Sed hoc de peccatore tantum catholico, non heretico intelligendum est. Qui quicquid cum fide pro offitio suo facit licet indignus, tamen diuina gratia cooperante ratum esse creditur. Alioquin si de hereticis dictum intelligitur, ipse sibi contrarius esset, cum dicat in Oseae: "Sacrificia eorum etc". Et alibi in persona Domini:

C. LXXVI. God curses the blessings of heretics.

"I will curse your blessings": that is, whatever is blessed by you will be accursed by me. Part XI. GRATIAN. This, therefore, is to be understood of a heretic, but that statement to the Luciferian of an ecclesiastical sinner. Concerning him Augustine says in the book On the Body of the Lord:

C. LXXVI. Benedictionibus hereticorum Deus maledicit.

"Maledicam benedictionibus uestris": hoc est, quicquid a uobis benedicetur per me erit maledictum. XI. Pars. Gratian. Hoc igitur intelligendum est de heretico, illud autem ad Luciferianum de peccatore ecclesiastico. De quo Augustinus ait in libro de corpore Domini.

C. LXXVII. Good and evil priests equally confect the body of Christ.

Within the catholic Church, in the ministry of the body and blood of the Lord, nothing greater is accomplished by a good priest, nothing less by an evil one, because it is accomplished not by the merit of the one consecrating but by the word of the Creator and the power of the Holy Spirit. For if it were accomplished by the merit of the priest, it would by no means pertain to Christ. But now, just as he himself is the one who baptizes, so he himself is the one who through the Holy Spirit makes this his flesh and transforms it into blood. For it is to be believed that the sacraments are confected in the words of Christ. Things first created by his command are certainly recreated for the better by his word.

C. LXXVII. Boni et mali sacerdotes eque corpus Christi conficiunt.

Intra ecclesiam catholicam in ministerio corporis et sanguinis Domini nichil a bono maius, nichil a malo minus perficitur sacerdote, quia non in merito consecrantis, sed in uerbo perficitur creatoris et uirtute Spiritus sancti. Si enim in merito sacerdotis, nequaquam ad Christum pertineret. Nunc autem sicut ipse est qui baptizat, ita ipse est qui per Spiritum sanctum hanc suam efficit carnem et transfundit in sanguinem. Credendum est enim, quod in uerbis Christi sacramenta conficiantur. Cuius prius creantur inperio, eius utique uerbo recreantur ad melius.

C. LXXVIII. On the same.

The same in book II Against the Epistle of Parmenian, [c. 10]. Although all the sacraments harm those who handle them unworthily, they nevertheless profit those who receive them worthily through such persons, just like the word of God. Hence it was said: "Do what they say, but do not wish to do what they do."

C. LXXVIII. De eodem.

Idem in libro II. contra epistolam Parmeniani. [c. 10.] Omnia sacramenta cum obsint indigne tractantibus, prosunt tamen per eos digne sumentibus, sicut et uerbum Dei. Unde dictum est: "Que dicunt facite, que autem faciunt facere nolite."

C. LXXIX. Concerning those who use holy things wickedly.

The same in the tractate on the epistle of John. Saul, an evil king, prophesied even while he persecuted the holy David. Therefore, let those who perhaps have a holy gift of God without charity not boast, but let them see what account they will render to God who use holy things unholily. Of these will be those who will say in the judgment: "In your name we prophesied." It will not be said to them, "You lie," but, "I do not know you, etc." GRATIAN. Therefore they are to be said to have had the spirit of prophecy, not its merit.

> C. LXXIX. De his, qui sanctis male utuntur.
> Idem tractatu epistolae Iohannis. Prophetauit Saul malus rex, cum etiam sanctum Dauid persequeretur. Non ergo se iactent qui forte sine karitate habent munus. Dei sanctum, sed uideant, qualem rationem habituri sint cum Deo, qui sanctis non sancte utuntur. Ex his erunt, qui dicturi sunt in iudicio: "In nomine tuo prophetauimus." Quibus non dicetur: "Mentimini," sed: "Non noui uos, etc." Gratian. Spiritum ergo prophetiae dicendi sunt habuisse, non meritum.

C. LXXX. Each person is not so much sanctified by the offerings as polluted by sin.

Likewise Jerome on [c. 2 of] Haggai. O prophet, who, with the altar built and my house ruined, offer victims to me upon the altar and think yourself sanctified by its sacrifices, know that what is offered upon the altar is indeed holy, but you are not so much sanctified by the offerings as polluted by dead works.

> C. LXXX. Quisque non tam sanctificatur ex hostiis, quam peccato polluitur.
> Item Ieronimus in [cap. 2.] Aggeo. Propheta, qui altari extructo tantum et domo mea diruta hostias mihi offers in altari, et uictimis eius sanctificari te putas, scito, quoniam sanctum est quidem quod offertur in altari, sed non tam sanctificaris ex hostiis, quam ex operibus mortuis pollueris.

C. LXXXI. A word is spoken against the Holy Spirit when one never returns from dispersion.

Likewise Augustine in the book On the Words of the Lord, [sermon XI, toward the end]. Thus a word is made against the Holy Spirit when one never comes from dispersion to the congregation which received the Holy Spirit for forgiving sins. If anyone with a heart not false approaches this congregation even through an evil cleric—nevertheless a catholic minister, reprobate and false—the Holy Spirit operates remission of sins in him; in the holy Church he so operates that he flees the reprobate yet gathers the upright through their ministry.

> C. LXXXI. Contra Spiritum sanctum uerbum dicitur, cum ex dispersione numquam reditur.
> Item Augustinus in libro de uerbis Domini. [serm. XI. circ. fin.] Ita fit uerbum contra Spiritum sanctum, cum ex dispersione ad congregationem numquam uenitur, que ad remittenda peccata accipit Spiritum sanctum. Ad quam congregationem etsi per malum clericum, sed tamen catholicum ministrum, reprobum et fictum, si aliquis accesserit corde non ficto, in ipso Spiritus sanctus operatur remissionem peccatorum, qui in sancta ecclesia ita operatur, ut reprobos fugiat tamen per eorum ministerium probos colligat.

C. LXXXII. Sins are forgiven not by the merits of men but by the power of the Holy Spirit.

The same in the sermon On the Remission of Sins. So that the Lord might show clearly that sins are forgiven by the Holy Spirit whom he gave to his faithful, not by the merits of men, in a certain place he said thus: "Receive the Holy Spirit"; and immediately added: "If you forgive anyone's sins, they will be forgiven him": that is, the Spirit forgives, not you. Therefore, just as one whom a priest takes up in the Church is nevertheless outside the Church and outside the body whose head is Christ if the doorkeeper is not present for him, so it does not follow that one is outside the Church and not of the body if he is compelled to be outside by the prejudgment of a shepherd.

> C. LXXXII. Non hominum meritis, sed uirtute Spiritus sancti peccata remittuntur.
> Idem in sermone de remissione peccatorum. Ut euidenter ostenderet Dominus, a Spiritu sancto quem donauit suis fidelibus, dimitti peccata, non meritis hominum, quodam loco sic ait: "Accipite Spiritum sanctum;" et continuo subiecit: "Si cui dimiseritis peccata, remittentur ei:" hoc est, Spiritus dimittit, non uos. Proinde sicut is, quem sacerdos in ecclesia tollit, est tamen extra ecclesiam, et extra corpus, cuius caput est Christus, si ei ostiarius non aderit, ita non extra ecclesiam est, et non est de corpore, si quis pastoris praeiudicio compellitur foris esse.

C. LXXXIII. The Lord considers not the merits of persons but the offices of priests.

Likewise Ambrose, On the Sacraments. Since Scripture attests that at the prayers of Jeroboam fire descended from heaven, and again, when Elijah prayed, fire was sent which consumed the sacrifices, it is given to be understood that God considers not the merits of persons but the offices of priests. § 1. That visible fire was sent so that they might believe; an invisible one operates for us who believe. § 2. Believe, therefore, that the Lord Jesus, invoked by the prayers of priests, is present, who says: "Where two or three shall have been, there I am in their midst."

> C. LXXXIII. Non merita personarum, sed offitia sacerdotum dominus considerat.
>
> Item Ambrosius de sacramentis. Cum scriptura testetur, quod ad preces Ieroboa ignis descendit de celo, et rursus precante Helia ignis missus est, qui sacrificia consumeret, datur intelligi, quod Deus non merita personarum considerat, sed offitia sacerdotum. §. 1. Ille ignis uisibilis mittebatur, ut crederent: nobis inuisibilis operatur, qui credimus. §. 2. Crede ergo, adesse Dominum Iesum inuocatum precibus sacerdotum, qui ait: "Ubi fuerint duo uel tres ibi sum in medio eorum."

C. LXXXIV. Not the merits of priests but divine power sanctifies the sacraments.

Likewise Pope Gregory. Many secular persons, when they examine the life of priests more than their own, fall into the great crime of contempt for the divine sacraments. For having eyes wounded by a great beam and neglecting it, they perceive the thin splinter in the eyes of others; while they incautiously hasten to pull it out, they slip into the pit of error, paying too little heed to the fact that the life of priests would not harm them if they themselves humbly lent an ear to the good admonitions of priests. But while, after the manner of hypocrites, they judge the reputation of those men more than their own life or the negligences of their life, they spurn holy admonitions and spiritual gifts. Hence it happens that they reject not only the things said by them but—which is worse—also despise the divine mysteries, so that they do not receive either the communion of the body or the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ confected by their ministry, thinking it less sanctified if it is made by the office of those whose life appears ignoble in their eyes. § 1. Alas, into how great a snare they fall, so that they believe divine and hidden mysteries can be made more sanctified by some than by others, although one and the same Holy Spirit, incomprehensibly throughout the Church spread over the whole world, secretly and invisibly sanctifies those mysteries by operating and blesses them by blessing. § 2. Accordingly, brothers, it is called a mystery because it has a secret and hidden dispensation; but a sacrifice, as though a sacred deed, because it is consecrated for us by a mystical prayer in memory of the Lord's Passion. § 3. A sacrament, moreover, exists in a certain celebration when the thing performed is such that we understand it to signify something which is to be received as holy. The sacraments are baptism, chrism, the body, and the blood; these are called sacraments for this reason: because beneath the covering of bodily things divine power more secretly works the salvation belonging to those sacraments. Hence sacraments are named from secret powers or sacred things. They are therefore performed fruitfully within the Church because the Holy Spirit abiding in her secretly works the same effect of the sacraments. The sacrament of the bread and cup is called eucharistia in Greek and is interpreted "good grace" in Latin. And what is better than the body and blood of Christ? § 4. Therefore, whether it is dispensed through good or evil ministers within the Church, it is nevertheless sacred, because the Holy Spirit mystically gives it life—the same who formerly appeared in visible works in apostolic times. The sacraments are neither enlarged by the merits of good dispensers nor diminished by those of evil ones, because "neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the increase." This is to be understood and held concerning the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and also concerning baptism and chrism, because divine power operates more secretly in them; and this power or potency belongs to divinity alone, not to human efficacy. We therefore pollute the bread, that is, the body of Christ, when we approach the altar unworthily and, being filthy, drink the clean blood. And below: § 5. "I will curse," he says, "your blessings": that is, the things which you now possess by my blessings, or whatever is blessed by you, either because they do not bless holy persons from a true heart, or because those who act iniquitously are blessed by them and they flatter sinners, provided that they are rich.

C. LXXXIV. Non merita sacerdotum, sed uirtus diuina sacramenta sanctificat.

Item Gregorius Papa. Multi secularium hominum, cum plus sacerdotum uitam quam suam discutiunt, in magnum contemptionis diuinorum sacramentorum crimen incurrunt. Magna enim trabe uulneratos habentes oculos, eamque negligentes festucam tenuem in aliorum conspiciunt oculis, quam dum incaute festinant auellere, erroris in foueam dilabuntur, minus quidem considerantes, quod non eos sacerdotum uita lederet, si ipsi humiliter bonis sacerdotum admonitionibus aurem accommodarent. Sed dum ypocritarum more plus illorum famam quam propriam uitam uel uitae negligentias diiudicant, spernunt sancta monita et spiritualia dona. Unde fit, ut non solum ab eis dicta respuant, sed (quod est deterius) diuina etiam misteria contempnant, ut nec corporis communionem aut sanguinis Domini nostri Iesu Christi eorum ministerio confectam assumant, putantes, hanc minus esse sanctificatam, si illorum fiat offitio, quorum uita eorum oculis uidetur ignobilis. §. 1. Heu in quam magnum laqueum incidunt, ut diuina et occulta misteria plus ab aliis sanctificata posse fieri credant, cum unus idemque Spiritus sanctus in ecclesia diffusa per totum orbem terrarum inconprehensibiliter ea misteria et occulte atque inuisibiliter et operando sanctificet et benedicendo benedicat. §. 2. Misterium itaque, fratres, ob hoc dicitur, quod secretam et reconditam habeat dispensationem; sacrifitium autem, quasi sacrum factum, quia prece mistica consecratur pro nobis in memoriam dominicae passionis. §. 3. Sacramentum uero est in aliqua celebratione, cum res gesta ita sit, ut aliquid significare accipiamus, quod sancte accipiendum est. Sunt autem sacramenta: baptisma, crisma, corpus et sanguis, que ob id sacramenta dicuntur, quia sub tegumento corporalium rerum diuina uirtus secretius salutem eorundem sacramentorum operatur. Unde a secretis uirtutibus uel sacris sacramenta dicuntur. Que ideo fructuose penes ecclesiam fiunt, quia sanctus in ea manens Spiritus eundem sacramentorum latenter operatur effectum. Cuius panis et calicis sacramentum grece eucharistia dicitur, latine bona gratia interpretatur. Et quid melius corpore et sanguine Christi? §. 4. Siue ergo per bonos, siue per malos ministros intra ecclesiam; dispensetur, sacrum tamen est, quia Spiritus sanctus mistice ille uiuificat, qui quondam apostolico in tempore uisibilibus aparebat operibus. Nec bonorum meritis dispensatorum ampliantur, nec malorum attenuantur, quia "neque qui plantat est aliquid, neque qui rigat, sed qui incrementum dat Deus." Hoc de corpore et sanguine Domini nostri Iesu Christi, hoc etiam de baptismate et crismate sentiendum est et tenendum, quia uirtus diuina secretius operatur in eis, et diuinae solummodo est hec uirtus siue potestas, non humanae efficaciae. Polluimus itaque panem, id est corpus Christi, quando indigni accedimus ad altare et sordidi mundum sanguinem bibimus. Et infra: §. 5. Maledicam, inquit, benedictionibus uestris, hoc est, his, que nunc meis benedictionibus possidetis, seu quicquid benedicitur a uobis, uel quoniam non benedicunt sanctis ex uero corde, uel quia qui inique agunt benedicuntur ab eis, adulanturque peccatoribus, dummodo diuites sunt.

C. LXXXV. We ought to consider not the life of priests but the things which they teach and minister.

Likewise Pope Fabian to the Eastern Bishops, [epistle II]. You have indicated, moreover, that very many pay attention to the fact that many persons in ecclesiastical honors themselves do not live in a manner consonant with the discourses and sacraments which are ministered through them to the peoples. O wretched men, who, while looking at these persons, forget Christ! Long before, he both foretold that the law of God was to be obeyed rather than that those who do not do the things they say should appear to be imitated, and, tolerating his betrayer to the end, sent him also to evangelize with the others. For the Apostles neither had such a custom nor taught that it should be had.

C. LXXXV. Non sacerdotum uitam, sed que docent et ministrant considerare debemus.

Item Fabianus Papa Episcopis Orientalibus. [epist. II.] Significastis insuper plerosque attendere, multos in ipsis honoribus ecclesiasticis non congruenter uiuere sermonibus et sacramentis, que per eos populis ministrantur. O miseros homines, qui hos intuendo Christum obliuiscuntur! qui et multo ante predixit, ut legi Dei potius obtemperetur quam imitandi uideantur illi, qui ea, que dicunt, non faciunt, et traditorem suum tolerans usque in finem etiam euangelizaturum cum ceteris misit.

Nam apostoli talem consuetudinem non habuerunt, ne habendam docuerunt.

C. LXXXVI. On the same.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to Emperor Michael, [in the epistle which begins, “We had proposed”]. You must take great care to consider not what sort the Lord’s priests are but what they say concerning the Lord; nor, in the vicars of blessed Peter the Apostle, must you attend to what they are, but to what they strive to accomplish for the correction of the churches and for your salvation. For you will not call them inferior to the scribes and Pharisees sitting upon the chair of Moses, concerning whom the Lord commanded, saying: “Whatever they tell you, do; according to their works, do not do.” Therefore, Emperor, consider: if he said that those who sat upon the chair of Moses were to be heard, how much more do you judge that those who sit upon the chair of Peter are to be obeyed?

C. LXXXVI. De eodem.

> Item Nicolaus papa Michaeli Inperatori. [in epist. que incipit: "Proposueramus."] Non quales sacerdotes Domini, sed quid de Domino loquantur, est uobis magnopere preuidendum, nec in uicariis B. Petri apostoli uobis est attendendum quid sint, sed quid pro correctione ecclesiarum, quid pro salute uestra satagant. Nec enim illos inferiores dicetis scribis et phariseis sedentibus super cathedram Moysi, de quibus Dominus precepit, dicens: "Quecumque dixerint uobis facite, secundum opera eorum nolite facere." Ergo, inperator, considera, si illos dixit audiendos, qui super cathedram Moysi sedebant, quanto potius, qui super cathedram Petri resident, esse existimatis obaudiendos?

C. LXXXVII. The uncleanness of priests does not pollute the sacrament.

Likewise Augustine against Petilian, [book II, c. 22]. The Lord declared that, in one assembly of persons receiving the same sacraments, the uncleanness of some does not harm the clean. § 1. Petilian said: "But if anyone should hold the formulas of a priest in memory, is he thereby a priest because with sacrilegious mouth he publishes the formula of a priest?" Augustine responded: You say this as though we were now asking who is a true priest and not what is true baptism. For in order that anyone be a true priest, he must be clothed not only with the sacrament but also with justice, as it is written: "Let your priests be clothed with justice." But one who is a priest by the sacrament alone, as was the high priest Caiaphas, persecutor of the one and truest priest, although he himself is not truthful, what he gives is nevertheless true if he gives not his own but God's. Likewise: § 2. "Cretans, evil beasts, sluggish in heart." Therefore, if the Apostle himself also bore witness to the testimony of some foreigner because he discovered it to be true, why do we not distinguish, wherever we find that which is Christ's and is true—even if the man in whom it is found is perverse and false—the truth, which he has not as his own but as Christ's, from the vice which the man has, and say, "This sacrament is true," just as he said, "This testimony is true"? Do we therefore say, "The man himself also is truthful," because we say, "This sacrament is true"? § 3. But you must always err so long as you violate God's sacraments because of the vices of men, or think that we also assume the sacrilege of your schism because, on account of God's sacraments which we do not wish to violate in you, we do not violate them. Likewise: § 4. Therefore, the purity of baptism is altogether distinct from the purity or uncleanness of the conscience either of the giver or of the receiver. Likewise: § 5. Remember that the morals of evil men do not harm the sacraments of God, so as to make them either nonexistent or less holy. Likewise: § 6. If Saul did not have the sanctity of the sacrament, what did David venerate in him? But if he had innocence, why did he persecute the innocent? For because of the sacrament of anointing David both honored him while alive and avenged him when slain. And because he cut even a little piece from his garment, he trembled when struck in heart. Behold, Saul did not have innocence and nevertheless had sanctity—not of his own life, for this cannot exist without innocence, but of God's sacrament, which is holy even in evil men. Likewise: § 7. We say that the sacrifice becomes for each person such as is the person who approaches to offer it and such as is the person who approaches to receive it, and that those eat from the sacrifices of such persons who approach it as such persons as they themselves are. Accordingly, if an evil man offers to God and a good man receives from it, it is for each such as each has been, because it is also written: "All things are clean to the clean." Through this truthful and catholic sentence, even you were not polluted by the sacrifice of Optatus if his deeds displeased you. For surely his bread was bread of mourning, under whose iniquities all Africa mourned; but the common evil of the schism of all of you makes the bread of mourning common to you all. Likewise: § 8. Thanks be to God, because at last you have confessed that the name of Christ when invoked can avail for the salvation of others, even if it is invoked by sinners. From this, therefore, understand that when Christ's name is invoked, the sins of another do not harm the salvation of others.

C. LXXXVII. Sacerdotum inmunditia sacramentum non polluit.

Item Augustinus contra Petilianum. [lib. II. c. 22.] Dominus declarauit in uno cetu hominum eadem sacramenta sumentium, non obesse mundis aliquorum inmunditiam. §. 1. Petilianus dixit: At si quisquam carmina sacerdotis memoriter teneat, numquid inde sacerdos est, quod ore sacrilego carmen publicat sacerdotis? Augustinus respondit: Ita istud dicis, quasi modo queramus, quis sit uerus sacerdos, et non quid sit uerum baptisma. Ut enim quisque uerus sit sacerdos, oportet, ut non solum sacramento, sed iustitia quoque induatur, sicut scriptum est: "Sacerdotes tui induantur iustitia." Qui autem solo sacramento sacerdos est, sicut fuit pontifex Caiphas, persecutor unius et uerissimi sacerdotis, quamuis ipse uerax non est, quod dat tamen uerum est, si non det suum, sed Dei. Item: §. 2. "Cretenses, malae bestiae, pigri corde." Si ergo apostolus nescio cuius alienigenae testimonium, quia uerum conperit, etiam ipse attestatus est, cur nos, apud quemcumque inuenerimus quod Christi est et uerum est, etiamsi ille, apud quem inuenitur, peruersus et fallax est, non discernimus propter uicium, quod homo habet, ueritatem, quam non suam, sed Christi habet, et dicimus, sacramentum hoc uerum est, sicut ille ait: "Testimonium hoc uerum est?" Numquid ideo dicimus: etiam ipse homo uerax est, quia dicimus: sacramentum hoc uerum est? §. 3. Vos autem necesse est ut semper erretis, quamdiu propter hominum uicia Dei sacramenta uiolatis, aut nos propter Dei sacramenta, que in uobis uiolare nolumus, etiam uestri scismatis sacrilegium assumere putatis.

Item: §. 4. Baptismi ergo puritas a puritate uel inmunditia conscientiae siue dantis siue accipientis omnino distincta est. Item: §. 5. Memento sacramentis Dei nichil obesse mores malorum hominum, quo illa uel non sint, uel minus sancta sint. Item: §. 6. Si non habebat Saul sacramenti sanctitatem, quid in eo Dauid uenerabatur? Si autem habebat innocentiam, quare innocentem persequebatur? Nam eum propter sacramenti unctionem et honorauit uiuum, et uindicauit occisum. Et quia uel panniculum ex eius ueste abscidit, percusso corde trepidauit. Ecce Saul non habebat innocentiam, et tamen habebat sanctitatem, non uitae suae, (nam hoc sine innocentia non potest), sed sacramenti Dei, quod et in malis hominibus sanctum est. Item: §. 7. Nos dicimus tale cuique sacrificium fieri, qualis accedit ut offerat, et qualis accedit ut sumat, et eos de sacrificiis talium manducare, qui ad illud tales accedunt, quales et illi sunt. Itaque si offerat Deo malus, et accipiat inde bonus, tale cuique est, qualis quisque fuerit, quia et illud scriptum est: "Omnia munda mundis." Per hanc sententiam ueridicam et catholicam etiam uos Optati sacrificio non estis polluti, si facta eius displicebant uobis. Nam utique panis illius panis luctus erat, sub cuius iniquitatibus Africa tota lugebat, sed panem luctus omnibus uobis esse communem omnium uestrum malum scismatis facit. Item: §. 8. Gratias Deo, quia tandem confessus es, posse ualere inuocatum nomen Christi ad aliorum salutem, etiam si a peccatoribus inuocetur. Hinc ergo intelligite, cum Christi nomen inuocatur non obesse aliorum saluti aliena peccata.

C. LXXXVIII. Even through an evil minister, the gifts of God reach those who receive them with faith.

The same in the book of Psalms. What has Christ done to you, who bore his betrayer with so great a patience that he handed to him, as to the other Apostles, the first Eucharist confected by his own hands and commended by his own mouth? What has Christ done to you, who sent that same betrayer of his—whom he named a devil, who before the betrayal of the Lord could not display faithfulness even toward the Lord's moneybags—with the other disciples to preach the kingdom of heaven, so as to show that the gifts of God reach those who receive them with faith, even if the one through whom they receive them is such as Judas was?

C. LXXXVIII. Etiam per malum ministrum dona Dei ad eos perueniunt, qui cum fide accipiunt.

Idem in libro Psalmorum. Christus quid fecit uobis, qui tanta patientia traditorem suum pertulit, ut ei primam eucharistiam confectam manibus suis et ore suo commendatam traderet, sicut ceteris apostolis? Quid uobis fecit Christus, qui eundem traditorem suum, quem diabolum nominauit, qui ante traditionem Domini nec loculis dominicis fidem potuit exhibere, cum ceteris discipulis ad predicandum regnum celorum misit, ut monstraret, dona Dei peruenire ad eos, qui cum fide accipiunt, etiam si talis sit, per quem accipiunt, qualis Iudas fuit?

C. LXXXIX. The wickedness of a bishop does not harm the sacraments. Likewise Gregory.

The wickedness of a bishop harms neither the baptism of an infant nor the consecration of a church, because baptism is given by God and does not come from man; so also the Eucharist and all other things whatsoever which are placed upon the altar receive sanctification not from man but from God. GRATIAN. But that saying of Jerome on Zephaniah is objected, [c. 3]:

C. LXXXIX. Sacramentis malitia non nocet episcopi. Item Gregorius.

Non nocet malitia episcopi, neque ad baptismum infantis, neque ad consecrationem ecclesiae, quia baptisma a Deo datur, non ab homine uenit; sic et eucharistia, et alia quecumque in altari ponuntur, non ab homine, sed a Deo sanctificationem accipiunt. Gratian. Sed obicitur illud Ieronimi in Sophonia: [c. 3.]

C. XC. Not the words but the merits of the priest make the Eucharist.

Priests who serve the Eucharist and distribute the blood of the Lord to his peoples act impiously against the law of Christ, thinking that the words of the one invoking make the Eucharist, not his life, and that only the solemn prayer is necessary and not the merits of priests, concerning whom it is said: "A priest in whom there has been any blemish is not to approach to offer oblations to the Lord."

C. XC. Sacerdotis non uerba, sed merita eucharistiam faciunt.

Sacerdotes, qui eucharistiae seruiunt, et sanguinem Domini populis eius diuidunt, inpie agunt in legem Christi, putantes eucharistiam inprecantis facere uerba, non uitam, et necessariam esse tantum solempnem orationem, et non sacerdotum merita, de quibus dicitur: "Sacerdos, in quacumque fuerit macula, non accedat offerre oblationes Domino."

C. XCI. The worthier priests are before God, the more readily they are heard.

Likewise Alexander, [epistle II]. The priests themselves intercede for the people and eat the sins of the people, because by their prayers they erase and consume them; the worthier they have been, the more readily they are heard in the necessities for which they cry out.

C. XCI. Tanto facilius sacerdotes exaudiuntur, quanto apud Deum sunt digniores.

Item Alexander. [epist. II.] Ipse sacerdotes pro populo interpellant et peccata populi comedunt, quia suis precibus ea delent atque consumunt; qui, quanto digniores fuerint, tanto facilius in necessitatibus, pro quibus clamant, exaudiuntur.

C. XCII. The Holy Spirit is not present to sacraments which are ministered through criminals.

Likewise Gelasius to Bishop Elpidius. The sacrosanct religion which contains catholic discipline claims so great a reverence for itself that no one should dare to approach it except with a pure conscience. For how will the heavenly Spirit, invoked for the consecration of the divine mystery, come if the priest who entreats him to be present is condemned as full of criminal actions?

> C. XCII. Non adest Spiritus sanctus sacramentis, que per criminosos ministrantur.
>
> Item Gelasius Elphidio Episcopo. Sacrosancta religio, que catholicam continet disciplinam, tantam sibi reuerentiam uendicat, ut ad eam quilibet nisi pura conscientia non audeat peruenire. Nam quomodo ad diuini misterii consecrationem celestis Spiritus inuocatus adueniet, si sacerdos, et qui eum adesse deprecatur, plenus actionibus criminosis reprobetur?

C. XCIII. An unclean hand contaminates, rather than cleanses, the things it touches.

Likewise Gregory in the Register, [book I, epistle 24]. The hand which takes care to wash away filth must be clean, lest, if it is filthy, it contaminate more grievously whatever it touches, holding mud after it; for it is written: "Be cleansed, you who carry the vessels of the Lord." For those carry the vessels of the Lord who undertake by the example of their conduct to lead the souls of their neighbors to interior things.

> C. XCIII. Manus inmunda tacta coinquinat, non mundat.
> Item Gregorius in Registro. [lib. I. epist. 24.] Necesse est, ut munda sit manus, que diluere sordes curat, ne tacta queque deterius inquinet, si sordida sequens lutum tenet: scriptum namque est: "Mundamini, qui fertis uasa Domini." Domini etenim uasa ferunt, qui proximorum animas ad interiora perducendas in conuersationis suae exemplo suscipiunt.

C. XCIV. The word of Christ and the body of Christ are equally to be guarded.

Likewise Augustine, [book of Fifty Homilies, homily 26]. I ask you, brothers or sisters, tell me: which seems greater to you, the body of Christ or the word of Christ? If you wish to answer truly, you ought to say that the word of God is not less than the body of Christ. And therefore, with as great a care as we observe, when the body of Christ is ministered to us, that none of it fall from our hands to the ground, with as great a care let us observe that the word of God which is dispensed to us not perish from a pure heart while we either think or speak of something else; because one who has heard the word of God negligently will be no less guilty than one who has permitted the body of Christ to fall to the ground through his negligence.

> C. XCIV. Eque seruandum est uerbum Christi et corpus Christi.
> Item Augustinus. [lib. L. homiliarum, homil. 26.] Interrogo uos, fratres uel sorores, dicite mihi, quid uobis plus esse uidetur, corpus Christi an uerbum Christi? Si uultis uerum respondere, hoc dicere debetis, quod non sit minus uerbum Dei quam corpus Christi. Et ideo, quanta sollicitudine obseruamus, quando nobis corpus Christi ministratur, ut nichil ex ipso de manibus nostris in terram cadat, tanta sollicitudine obseruemus, ne uerbum Dei, quod nobis erogatur, dum aliud aut cogitamus, aut loquimur, de corde puro depereat, quia non minus reus erit qui uerbum Dei negligenter audierit, quam ille, qui corpus Christi sua negligentia in terram cadere permiserit.

[C. XCV.]

Likewise, [book IV On the Trinity, c. 14]. For it cannot be rightly offered except through a just and holy priest, nor can that which is offered be received except by those for whom it is offered, and it must be without vice so that it can be offered for cleansing the vicious. Certainly all who wish a sacrifice to be offered to God for themselves desire this. GRATIAN. When the life of priests is said to be necessary to the Eucharist, this is to be understood not for consecration but for its effect; for it does not confer the effect of salvation upon one whom his merits make unworthy. Rather, that saying of the Apostle is fulfilled in him: "He who eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment for himself." Therefore, that saying of Jerome is understood to have been spoken against those who think they can be cleansed by the frequent offering of sacrifice while not ceasing to act impiously against the law of God. But that a priest, even if evil, nevertheless transmits grace to men according to the office of his dignity is attested by Augustine in the book Questions of the Old Testament, [c. 11]:

> [C. XCV.]
> Item. [lib. IV. de Trinitate c. 14.] Neque enim id potest rite offerri nisi per sacerdotem iustum et sanctum, nec nisi ab eis accipiatur quod offertur, pro quibus offertur, atque id sine uicio sit, ut pro uiciosis mundandis possit offerri. Hoc certe omnes cupiunt, qui pro se offerri sacrificium Deo uolunt. Gratian. Cum uita sacerdotum eucharistiae necessaria esse dicitur, non consecrationi, sed effectui intelligendum est; non enim effectum confert salutis ei, quem merita faciunt indignum; potius conpletur in eo illud Apostoli: "Qui manducat et bibit indigne, iudicium sibi manducat et bibit." Ergo contra eos, qui crebra oblatione sacrificii se putant posse mundari, non cessantes inpie agere in lege Dei, intelligitur illud esse dictum Ieronimi. Quod uero sacerdos, etiamsi malus sit, tamen pro offitio suae dignitatis gratiam transfundat hominibus, testatur Augustinus in libro questionum ueteris testamenti: [c. 11.]

C. XCVI. Priests invoke the name of the Lord, but the Lord bestows the blessing.

It was said by the Lord to Aaron in Numbers: "You place my name upon the sons of Israel; I, the Lord, will bless them," so that the transmission of grace through the ministry of an ordained person may pour it forth upon men, and neither the will of the priest may harm or profit, but the merit of the one seeking the blessing. § 1. Moreover, we perceive from this how great is the dignity of the priestly office or order. Among other things it was said concerning the most wicked Caiaphas, killer of the Savior: "He did not say this of himself; but, since he was high priest of that year, he prophesied." Through this it is shown that the Holy Spirit of graces follows not the person of the worthy or unworthy man but the order of transmission, so that although someone may be of good merit, nevertheless he cannot bless unless he has been ordained so that he may perform the office of ministry. But it belongs to God to bestow the effect of the blessing. GRATIAN. The assertion that sacraments of dignity ministered through heretics lack effect is rejected by the authority of Pope Anastasius, who approves the ordination of Acacius, although a heretic, as ratified in such a way that he asserts that the guilty person did no harm at all even to those whom Acacius baptized or ordained after his condemnation. But Felix and Gelasius, who excommunicated Acacius before Anastasius, and Hormisdas, who, third after that Anastasius, condemned the same Acacius, prove that he did this illicitly and uncanonically, indeed contrary to the decrees of his predecessors and successors. Hence he is also repudiated by the Roman Church, and is read in the deeds of the Roman Pontiffs to have been struck by God in this manner: "Anastasius the Second, a Roman by nation, etc." Seek this above in the treatise on decretal epistles.

Likewise that saying of Augustine to Parmenian concerning even condemned heretics is objected:

> C. XCVI. Sacerdotes nomen Domini inuocant, Dominus autem benedictionem prestat.
> Dictum est a Domino in Numeris ad Aaron: "Vos ponite nomen meum super filios Israel, ego Dominus benedicam eos," ut gratiam traditio per ministerium ordinati transfundat hominibus, nec uoluntas sacerdotis obesse aut prodesse possit, sed meritum benedictionem poscentis. §. 1. Quanta autem dignitas sit sacerdotalis offitii uel ordinis, hinc aduertimus. Dictum est autem de nequissimo Caipha, interfectore Saluatoris, inter cetera: "Hoc autem a semetipso non dixit, sed, cum esset pontifex sacerdotum anni illius, prophetauit." Per quod ostenditur, Spiritum sanctum gratiarum non personam sequi digni, aut indigni, sed ordinem traditionis ut, quamuis aliquis boni meriti sit, non tamen possit benedicere, nisi fuerit ordinatus, ut offitium ministerii exhibeat. Dei autem est effectum tribuere benedictionis. Gratian. Quod uero per hereticos sacramenta dignitatis ministrata dicuntur carere effectu, inprobatur auctoritate Anastasii Papae, qui ordinationem Acacii, quamuis heretici, ita ratam approbat, ut etiam eis, quos post dampnationem suam baptizauit, uel ordinauit, in nullo ream personam nocuisse asserat. Sed hoc eum illicite, et non canonice, imo contra decreta suorum predecessorum et successorum fecisse, probat Felix et Gelasius, qui Acacium ante Anastasium excommunicauerunt, et Hormisda, qui ab ipso Anastasio tertius eundem Acacium dampnauit. > Item obicitur illud Augustini ad Parmenianum de hereticis etiam dampnatis:

C. XCVII. One who departs from the Church loses neither baptism nor the power of giving it.

What certain persons say—that one who departs from the Church does not lose the baptism which he received but does lose the right of giving which he received—appears in many ways to be said fruitlessly and vainly. § 1. First, because no reason is shown why one who cannot lose baptism itself can lose the right of giving it. For each is a sacrament and each is given to a man by a certain consecration, the one when he is baptized, the other when he is ordained; therefore neither is permitted to be repeated by a catholic. § 2. For if at any time even prelates coming from that party have been received for the good of peace after the error of schism was corrected, and if it seemed needful that they should exercise the same offices which they had exercised, they are not to be ordained again; but just as baptism, so ordination remained integral in them, because the vice was in the severance—which was corrected by the unity of peace—not in the sacraments, which are the same wherever they are. And when it seems expedient to the Church that their prelates, coming to catholic fellowship, should not administer their honors there, nevertheless the sacraments of ordination themselves are not taken away from them, but remain upon them. And therefore the hand is not imposed upon them, lest injury be done not to the man but to the sacrament itself. § 3. But just as in baptism there is something which can be given through them, so in ordination there is the right of giving. They have each to their own perdition so long as they do not have the charity of unity. Nevertheless, not to have is one thing, to have perniciously another, and to have salvifically another. Whatever is not possessed must be given when there is need that it be given; but as for that which is possessed perniciously, when perdition has been driven away through correction, it must be brought about that it be possessed salvifically. If a layman, compelled by necessity, has given baptism to someone who is perishing—baptism which, when he himself received it, he learned how it was to be given—I do not know whether anyone would say that it was piously to be repeated. If it is done when no necessity compels, it is a usurpation of another's office. But if necessity presses, it is either no offense or a venial one. But if it is usurped when there is no necessity and is given by anyone to anyone, that which has been given cannot be said not to have been given, although it can rightly be said to have been given illicitly. Therefore, the disposition of one remembering and repenting corrects the illicit usurpation. But if he has not corrected it, what has been given will remain for the punishment of the usurper—either of the one who illicitly gave it or of the one who illicitly received it—yet it will not be held as not given. § 4. For if some persons, secretly and extraordinarily, not in the public mints, had stamped gold or silver by striking it, when it had been discovered, would not the recognized royal mark, after those persons had been punished or freed by indulgence, be gathered into the royal treasuries? And a little later: § 5. If perhaps one who is not serving as a soldier has fearfully recoiled from the military character upon his body, fled to the emperor's clemency, and, after obtaining pardon, then begun to serve as a soldier, is that character repeated after the man has been freed and corrected, and is it not rather recognized and approved? Or perhaps do the Christian sacraments have less than this bodily mark, when we see that even apostates do not lack baptism, which certainly is not restored when they return through penance, and therefore is judged incapable of being lost? § 6. Concerning those who are separated from the unity of the catholic Church there is now no question that they have it and can give it, but they have it perniciously and hand it on perniciously because they are outside the bond of peace. § 7. Injury is to be done to neither sacrament. § 8. Just as one who departs from unity does not have it rightly but nevertheless has it, and therefore it is not restored to him when he returns, so also one who departs from unity does not give rightly but nevertheless gives, and therefore what was received from him is not repeated when the receiver comes to unity. Below: § 1. Just as what the returning person also had outside is not restored to him, so what the arriving person had received outside is not to be repeated. Hence it is consequently understood that the perversity of men is to be corrected, but the sanctity of the sacraments is to be violated in no perverse person. For it is established that it remains unpolluted and inviolable in perverse and criminal men, whether in those who are within or those who are without; and when evil persons are said to pollute it, they are said to do so so far as lies in themselves, although the sacraments remain unpolluted. But in the good they remain unto reward; in the evil they remain unto judgment. Below: § 10. How do catholics not glorify the Lord, when they pursue his sacraments with such due veneration that, even if they have been handled by the unworthy, those men being condemned by their own perversity, the sacraments are shown to remain in undefiled sanctity?

Part XII. GRATIAN. From these words of Augustine it is established that in all persons—apostates as well as heretics or the condemned—the sacraments of Christ remain true in themselves and holy, and, unless aid has been given by penance or indulgence, they arrive at the condemnation of the usurper, whether the one possessing, giving, or receiving. What, then, does it profit that they are true and holy, when they equally destroy their usurpers as if they were evil and noxious? Crassus thirsted for gold and drank gold; he perished by true gold just as by true poison. § 1. Likewise, gold is equally true in the chest of a thief as in the treasures of a king. But it is illicitly given or received by the thief because it is illicitly possessed; by the king, however, it is licitly possessed, given, and received.

Therefore, as Gelasius attests to Emperor Anastasius, both the thief himself and the participant in the theft—unless perhaps he has cleared himself of knowledge of the theft—will justly and worthily be condemned. § 2. But the following is opposed to this sentence of Augustine: The power of giving baptism, the right of consecrating the Lord's body, and the right of bestowing sacred orders differ greatly among themselves. For when a priest has been suspended or deposed, no power of sacrificing is left to him. Nevertheless, if the sacrament of baptism has been ministered not only by a deposed priest or catholic layman but even by a heretic or pagan, it will be violated by no repetition; but no reason permits those who receive the oil of sacred—indeed, execrable—anointing from the hands of a layman or pagan to be held among priests. Therefore, it is not consequently gathered that, if the right of baptizing is left to those departing from the faith, the power of distributing sacred orders is also left to them, although each proceeds from consecration. For a degraded bishop does not have the power of bestowing sacred orders, yet he has not lost the faculty of baptizing. § 3. But lest we reject Augustine altogether in this sentence, let us understand that the power of distributing sacred orders is one thing and the execution of that power another. Those who, established within the unity of the catholic Church, receive priestly or episcopal anointing obtain from consecration both the office and the execution of their office. But those departing from the integrity of the faith retain, as far as the sacrament is concerned, the power received, but are wholly deprived of the effect of their power, just as married persons who depart from one another do not dissolve the marriage once entered upon, yet are found estranged from the conjugal work. § 4. Therefore, Augustine speaks concerning those who, after receiving priestly power, depart from the unity of the catholic Church, not concerning those who, while established in schism or heresy, receive priestly anointing. Otherwise, he would be contrary to the Council of Chalcedon, in which those ordained by simoniacs are judged to profit in nothing, and to Innocent, who attests that those ordained by other heretics obtained through a depraved imposition of the hand only condemnation and a wound of the head. § 5. Although it can be said generally that sacraments which are celebrated among heretics no differently than in the Church of God are true and ratified in themselves, but false and empty as to effect, both in those by whom they are wickedly handled and in those by whom they are wickedly received. Nor is this marvelous. For our Salvation himself gave the morsel to Judas; immediately with the morsel not a good but a malignant spirit entered. Why? Not because the good one did not give a good thing, but because the evil man received the good thing wickedly; and thus the good thing did not have a good effect because it did not find a place in which to produce it. § 6. Likewise, the Lord was present in his own country, present and true; not through an evil minister but through himself he could do nothing, because he did not find faith. Because of the perfidy of others, he did not lack his own truth but the effect of good power. § 7. To show this plainly in all the sacraments, he was transfigured twice while he was in the flesh. In one transfiguration he appeared marvelous like the sun, so that the faith of believers might be increased to contemplate heavenly glory raised above itself. In the other, as a stranger and unrecognizable to those doubting concerning him, he feigned that he was going farther, and held their eyes lest he be recognized. For what else, except that, because he was not in their hearts through faith, he showed himself departing farther from them; and because they did not believe him to be what he was, they also saw him as other than he was? Behold, in each vision there was his presence and truth; but in one, faith was exercised so that they might believe more than they believed, while in the other, unbelief was restrained lest they recognize even what they saw. Therefore, the sacrament of his body and blood is for some unto salvation, for others unto judgment.

Faith also, although true, is nevertheless dead without works. So also all ten virgins were equally virgins, but of these five were foolish and five prudent. The truth of virginity was equal, but because of the intention of that same virginity, the identity of merit was not equal in all. So also martyrdom or almsgiving which does not know charity is sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. If a blind man ministers the truth of a lamp to a blind man, nevertheless neither thereby illumines his own blindness more. So also an evil man ministers true sacraments to an evil man, but not thereby spiritual gifts, because the Holy Spirit is impeded by their evil merits from working in them that which is his own. Hence Innocent, although conceding that the baptism of heretics is ratified, nevertheless does not concede that the Holy Spirit is possessed from that baptism. And Leo does not permit those who received the form of baptism to be rebaptized, but commands that through his invocation and the imposition of the hand they obtain from catholic priests the Holy Spirit, whom no one received from heretics. It must be known, moreover, that the sacraments of heretics are called invalid, or even damnable, false, and empty, not in themselves, since they are holy and true even when celebrated by a heretic, but because, while they are unto judgment for the perfidious who give them illicitly, they do not confer the Holy Spirit upon those who receive them illicitly. They are called invalid and untrue because they do not bestow what they promise and are believed to confer, and therefore damnable, so that the giving or receiving of them from heretics is not approved but interdicted. For they are not polluted in themselves, although they are said to be polluted by heretics. Hence Gregory calls the communion of Arius an execration, and Innocent calls the ordination of Bonosus a condemnation—not because they are such in themselves, but because they effect this for those who give or receive them wickedly. So also Jerome on Hosea calls their sacrifices the bread of mourning, not in themselves but as to effect, which he himself shows, adding: "Whoever eat of it will be contaminated, because they receive it unto judgment for themselves." Hence also Augustine in book II Against the Epistle of Parmenian, [c. 5]:

C. XCVII. Qui recedit ab ecclesia, nec baptisma, nec uim dandi amittit.

Quod quidam dicunt, baptisma, quod accepit, non amittit qui recedit ab ecclesia, ius tamen dandi, quod accepit, amittit, multis modis aparet frustra et inaniter dici. §. 1. Primo, quia nulla ostenditur causa, cur ille, qui ipsum baptismum amittere non potest, ius dandi amittere possit. Utrumque enim sacramentum est, et quadam consecratione homini datur utrumque, illud, cum baptizatur, illud, cum ordinatur; ideo non licet a catholico utrumque iterari. §. 2. Nam si quando ex ipsa parte uenientes etiam prepositi pro bono pacis, correcto scismatis errore, suscepti sunt, etsi uisum est opus esse, ut eadem offitia gererent, que agebant, non sunt rursus ordinandi, sed sicut baptismus in eis, ita ordinatio mansit integra, quia in precisione fuerat uicium (quod unitate pacis est correctum), non in sacramentis, que ubicumque sunt ipsa sunt. Et cum ipsi expedire uidetur ecclesiae, ut prepositi eorum, uenientes ad catholicam societatem, honores suos ibi non administrent, non eis tamen ipsa ordinationis sacramenta detrahuntur sed manent super eos. Ideoque non eis manus inponitur, ne non homini, sed ipsi sacramento fiat iniuria. §. 3. Sicut autem in baptismo est quod per eos dari possit, sic in ordinatione ius dandi est; utrumque ad perniciem suam, quamdiu karitatem non habent unitatis; sed tamen aliud est non habere, aliud perniciose habere, aliud salubriter habere. Quicquid non habetur dandum est, cum opus est dari, quod uero perniciose habetur, per correctionem depulsa pernicie agendum est, ut salubriter habeatur. Quod si laicus alicui pereunti necessitate conpulsus baptisma dederit, quod, cum ipse acciperet, quomodo dandum esset addidicit, nescio, an quisquam dixerit pie esse repetendum. Nulla enim necessitate cogente si fiat, alieni muneris usurpatio est. Si autem necessitas urgeat aut nullam, aut ueniale delictum est. Sed si nulla necessitate usurpetur, et a quolibet cuilibet detur, quod datum fuerit non potest dici non datum, quamuis recte dici possit illicite datum. Illiciti ergo usurpationem corrigit reminiscentis et penitentis affectus. Quod si non correxerit, manebit ad penam usurpatoris quod datum est, uel eius, qui illicite dedit, uel eius, qui illicite accepit: non tamen pro non dato habebitur §. 4. Si enim aliqui furtim et extraordinarie, non in monetis publicis, aurum uel argentum percutiendo signauerint, cum fuerit deprehensum, nonne illis punitis uel indulgentia liberatis cognitum regale signum thesauris regalibus cogeretur. Et paulo post: §. 5. Si forte miliciae caracterem in corpore suo non militans pauidus exhorruerit, et ad clementiam inperatoris confugerit, et inpetrata uenia militare iam ceperit, numquid homine liberato atque correcto caracter ille repetitur, ac non potius agnitus approbatur? An forte minus habent sacramenta Christiana quam corporalis hec nota, cum uideamus, nec apostatas carere baptismo, quibus utique per penitentiam redeuntibus non restituitur, et ideo amitti non posse iudicatur? §. 6. De his, qui ab ecclesiae catholicae unitate separati sunt, nulla iam questio est, quin habeant, et dare possint, sed perniciose habeant, pernicioseque tradant, quia extra uinculum pacis sunt. §. 7. Neutri sacramento iniuria facienda est. §. 8. Sicut non recte habet qui ab unitate discedit, sed tamen habet, et ideo redeunti non redditur, sic etiam non recte dat qui ab unitate discedit, sed dat tamen, et ideo quod ab eo accepit uenienti ad unitatem non iteratur. Infra: §. 1. Sicut redeunti non redditur quod et foris habebat, sic uenienti repetendum non est quod foris acceperat. Unde consequenter intelligitur peruersitatem hominum esse corrigendam, sanctitatem autem sacramentorum in nullo peruerso esse uiolandam. Constat enim, eam in peruersis hominibus et sceleratis, siue in eis, qui intus sunt, siue in eis, qui foris, inpollutam atque inuiolabilem permanere, et quod dicuntur eam mali polluere, quantum in ipsis est dicuntur, cum illa inpolluta permaneant; sed in bonis permanent ad premium, in malis permanent ad iudicium. Infra: §. 10. Quomodo catholici non clarificant Dominum, qui sacramenta eius tam debita ueneratione prosecuntur, ut, etiam si ab indignis tractata fuerint, illi sua peruersitate dampnatis, illa intemerata sanctitate permanere demonstrantur?

XII. Pars. Gratian. Ex his uerbis Augustini constat, in omnibus tam apostatis quam hereticis uel dampnatis permanere Christi sacramenta uera, quantum ad se, et sancta, et nisi penitentia uel indulgentia subuentum fuerit, ad dampnationem usurpatoris peruenient, uel habentis, uel dantis, uel accipientis. Quid ergo prodest, quod uera et sancta sunt, cum usurpatores suos eque perimant, ac si essent mala et noxia? Crassus aurum sitiuit, aurum bibit; eque periit uero auro, sicut uero ueneno. §. 1. Item aurum eque uerum est in arca furis, sicut in thesauris regis. Sed a fure, quia illicite habetur, illicite datur uel accipitur; a rege autem licite habetur, datur et accipitur; ideo ipse fur et communicator furti (nisi forte de conscientia furti se purgauerit), ut perhibet Gelasius ad Anastasium inperatorem, uterque iuste et digne dampnabitur. §. 2. Opponitur autem huic sententiae Augustini: potestas dandi baptismum, et ius consecrandi dominicum corpus, et largiendi sacros ordines, plurimum inter se differunt. Suspenso enim uel deposito sacerdote, nulla ei relinquitur potestas sacrificandi. Sacramentum tamen baptismi non solum a sacerdote deposito uel laico catholico, uerum etiam ab heretico uel pagano si ministratum fuerit, nulla reiteratione uiolabitur; nulla autem ratio sinit, ut inter sacerdotes habeantur, qui de manibus laici uel pagani oleum sacrae (imo execrandae) unctionis assumunt. Non ergo consequenter colligitur, ut, si recedentibus a fide ius baptizandi relinquitur, potestas etiam distribuendi sacros ordines eis relinquatur, quamuis utrumque consecratione proueniat. Degradatus enim episcopus potestatem largiendi sacros ordines non habet, facultatem baptizandi tamen non amisit. §. 3. Sed ne Augustinum in hac sententia penitus reprobemus, intelligamus aliud esse potestatem distribuendi sacros ordines, aliud esse executionem illius potestatis. Qui intra unitatem catholica ecclesiae constituti sacerdotalem uel episcopalem unctionem accipiunt, offitium et executionem sui offitii ex consecratione adipiscuntur. Recedentes uero ab integritate fidei, potestatem acceptam sacramento tenus retinent, effectu suae potestatis penitus priuantur, sicut coniugati ab inuicem discedentes coniugium semel initum non dissoluunt, ab opere tamen coniugali inueniuntur alieni. §. 4. De his ergo, qui accepta sacerdotali potestate ab unitate catholicae ecclesiae recedunt, loquitur

Augustinus, non de illis, qui in scismate uel heresi positi sacerdotalem unctionem accipiunt; alioquin esset contrarius Calcedonensi concilio, in quo ordinati a symoniacis in nullo proficere iudicantur, et Innocentio, qui ordinatos a ceteris heretici per prauam manus inpositionem solam dampnationem et uulnus capitis assecutos testatur. §. 5. Quamuis possit generaliter dici, sacramenta, que apud hereticos non aliter quam in ecclesia Dei celebrantur, uera et rata esse quantum ad se, falsa uero et inania quantum ad effectum, et in his, a quibus male tractantur, et in illis, a quibus male suscipiuntur. Nec mirum, ipsa enim salus nostra bucellam Iudae dedit; statim cum bucella non bonus, sed malignus spiritus intrauit: quare? non quia bonus non daret bonum, sed quia malus male accepit bonum; sicque bonum effectum bonum non habuit, quia ubi illud faceret non inuenit. §. 6. Item Dominus in patria sua presens et uerus affuit; non per malum ministrum, sed per semet ipsum nichil potuit, quia fidem non inuenit; pro perfidia aliorum non caruit sua ueritate, sed effectus boni uirtute. §. 7. Quod ut plane in omnibus sacramentis ostenderet, bis est transfiguratus, cum esset in carne. In una transfiguratione sicut sol aparuit mirabilis ut fides credentium augeretur ad contemplandam celestem gloriam super se eleuatam. In altera ut peregrinus et incognoscibilis de se dubitantibus ire se longius finxit, et, ne agnosceretur, eorum oculos tenuit: ad quid aliud, nisi ut, quia per fidem non erat in cordibus eorum, longius se ab iis recedere ostenderet, et quia ipsum non credebant esse quod erat, uiderent etiam eum alium quam erat? Ecce in utraque uisione sua erat praesenti et ueritas: sed in una exercebatur fides, ut magis crederent quam credebant, in altera tenebatur incredulitas, ne etiam agnoscerent quod uidebant. Sacramentum ergo corporis et sanguinis sui aliis est ad salutem, aliis ad iudicium. Fides etiam, quamuis sit uera, tamen sine operibus mortua est. Sic et omnes decem uirgines equaliter erant uirgines, sed ex his erant quinque fatuae et quinque prudentes. Equa erat uirginitatis ueritas, sed pro eiusdem uirginitatis intentione non omnibus equa meriti identitas. Sic etiam est es sonans aut cymbalum tinniens martirium uel elemosina, quam nescit karitas. Si uero cecus ceco lucernae ministret ueritatem, neuter tamen ideo magis suam illuminat cecitatem. Sic et malus ministrat malo uera sacramenta, sed non ideo dona spiritualia, quia malis eorum meritis Spiritus sanctus inpeditur, ne in eis quod suum est operetur. Unde Innocentius, cum hereticorum baptisma concedat esse ratum, non tamen ex illo baptismate concedit haberi Spiritum sanctum. Et Leo hos, qui formam baptismatis acceperunt, non sinit rebaptizari, sed iubet Spiritum sanctum, quem ab hereticis nemo accepit, per eius inuocationem et manus inpositionem a catholicis sacerdotibus consequi. Sciendum uero est, quod sacramenta hereticorum dicuntur irrita, uel etiam dampnanda, falsa et inania, non quantum ad se, cum sint sancta et uera etiam ab heretico celebrata, sed quia, cum illicite dantibus perfidis sint ad iudicium, illicite ab eis accipientibus non conferunt Spiritum sanctum. Irrita et non uera dicuntur, quia quod promittunt et conferre creduntur non tribuunt, et ideo dampnanda, ut ea dari uel recipi ab hereticis non approbetur sed interdicatur. Non enim quantum ad se polluta sunt, quamuis ab hereticis pollui dicantur. Unde Gregorius communionem Arii uocat execrationem, et Innocentius uocat Bonosi ordinationem dampnationem, non quod ita in se sint, sed quia male dantibus uel accipientibus id efficiunt. Sic etiam Ieronimus in Osee sacrificia eorum panem luctus uocat non quantum ad se, sed quantum ad effectum, quod ipsemet ostendit, subiungens: "Quicumque comederint ex eo, contaminabuntur, quia sibi ad iudicium sument." Hinc etiam Augustinus in libro II. contra epistolam Parmeniani: [cap. 5.]

C. XCVIII. Although the sacraments harm those who handle them unworthily, they nevertheless profit those who receive them worthily through such persons.

Through Isaiah the Lord says: “The criminal who sacrifices a calf to me is as though he killed a dog; one who prepares fine flour, as though swine’s blood; and one who offers incense as a memorial, as though a blasphemer.” § 1. Whoever, wherever he may offer sacrifice, does so with such a heart or deeds that he merits to hear this, brings perdition upon himself, not upon those good persons who receive from such persons the same sacraments, who according to the prophet Ezekiel groan and mourn the sins and iniquities which are performed in their midst, although they do not separate themselves bodily from them. Below: § 2. The sacrifices of the impious harm those who offer impiously. For it is one and the same sacrifice because of the name of the Lord which is invoked there, and it is always holy, and it becomes for each such as the heart with which he has approached to receive it. "For he who eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment for himself"—not for others, but himself. Below: § 3. We admonish that this is to be understood in almost all questions of this kind: namely, that although all the sacraments harm those who handle them unworthily, they nevertheless profit those who receive them worthily through such persons. Below: § 4. The Holy Spirit is present in a prelate or minister of the Church in such a way that, if he is not false, he operates through him both his reward unto eternal salvation and the regeneration or edification of those who through him are either consecrated or evangelized. But if he is false, because it is most truly written, "The Holy Spirit of discipline will flee the false," although he is absent from the man's salvation and removes himself from his thoughts, which are without understanding, he nevertheless does not desert his ministry, through which he operates the salvation of others by means of him. GRATIAN. It is therefore established, as Innocent says concerning other heretics, that those ordained by simoniacs have a head wounded by the depraved imposition of the simoniacal hand. § 1. But it is objected that in the ordination of simoniacs this alone is found reprehensible: that the grace of the Holy Spirit is thought to be reduced to a price; in other respects, however, the integral form of the sacraments is preserved in all things. Therefore, when the illicit usurpation of the sacrament has been corrected through penance, so that the grace of the Holy Spirit is thought gratuitous and not saleable, the integral effect of the anointing ought to be present. Indeed, even if penance does not follow, although consecrated simoniacally, he is nevertheless to be reckoned truly consecrated, just as those who formerly were admitted to the regeneration of sacred baptism and participation in holy communion only after a price had been given, although simoniacally, nevertheless were not for that reason reckoned any less baptized or participants in holy communion. But this alone was established by the sacred canons: that thereafter the sacraments of Christ are not to be distributed simoniacally.

Hence Gelasius, [to the Bishops throughout Lucania, epistle I, c. 7]:

> C. XCVIII. Sacramenta quamuis obsint indigne tractantibus, prosunt tamen per eos digne sumentibus.
> Per Ysaiam dicit Dominus: "Facinorosus, qui sacrificat mihi uitulum, quasi canem occidat, et qui coquit similaginem, quasi sanguinem porcinum, et qui offert thus in memoriam, quasi blasphemus." §. 1. Quilibet ubilibet offert sacrificium tali corde uel factis, ut hoc mereatur audire, perniciem sibi infert, non illis bonis, qui accipiunt ab eis eadem sacramenta, qui secundum prophetam Ezechielem gemunt et merent peccata et iniquitates, que fiunt medio eorum, quamuis non se inde corporaliter separent. Infra: §. 2. Sacrificia inpiorum eis oberunt, qui offerunt inpie. Nam unum atque idem sacrificium est propter nomen Domini, quod ibi inuocatur, et semper est sanctum, et tale cuique fit, quali corde ad accipiendum accesserit. "Qui enim manducat et bibit indigne, iudicium sibi manducat et bibit;" non aliis sed sibi. Infra: §. 3. Hoc pene in omnibus talibus questionibus intelligendum admonemus, quia scilicet omnia sacramenta, cum obsint indigne tractantibus, prosunt tamen per eos digne sumentibus. Infra: §. 4. Spiritus sanctus in ecclesiae preposito uel ministro sic inest, ut, si fictus non est, operetur per eum, et eius mercedem in salutem sempiternam et eorum regenerationem uel edificationem, qui per eum siue consecrantur siue euangelizantur. Si autem fictus est, quoniam uerissime scriptum est: "Spiritus sanctus disciplinae effugiet fictum," desit quidem saluti eius, et auferat se a cogitationibus eius, que sunt sine intellectu, ministerium tamen eius non deserat, quo per eum salutem operatur aliorum. Gratian. Constat ergo, ut Innocentius ait, de ceteris hereticis, ordinatos a symoniacis per prauam manus inpositionem symoniacis uulneratum habere caput. §. 1. Sed obicitur, quod in ordinatione symoniacorum hoc solum reprehensibile inueniatur, quod gratia Spiritus sancti sub pretio redigi putetur, aliorsum autem in omnibus integra forma sacramentorum seruetur. Cum ergo illicita sacramenti usurpatio per penitentiam correcta fuerit, ut gratia Spiritus sancti gratuita et non uenalis existimetur, integer debet adesse unctionis effectus; imo etiam, si non sequatur penitentia, licet symoniace, tamen reuera consecratus reputetur, sicut illi, qui quondam nonnisi; pretio dato, ad sacri baptismatis regenerationem nec ad sanctae communionis participationem admittebantur, licet symoniace, tamen non ideo minus baptizati, uel sacrae communionis participes reputati sunt. Sed hoc tantum sacris canonibus constitutum est, ne de cetero sacramenta Christi symoniace distribuantur.

Unde Gelasius: [ad Episcopos per Lucaniam, epist. I., cap. 7.]

C. XCIX. Prices are not to be exacted from those to be baptized or signed.

Let priests set no prices for the faithful who are to be baptized and signed, nor desire to harass those being reborn by imposing any payments, because we are commanded freely to give what we freely received. And therefore let them not attempt to exact anything at all from the aforesaid persons, lest, either deterred under compulsion of poverty or turned away by indignation, they rightly despise the causes of their redemption; holding it certain that those who are discovered to have admitted prohibited things, or rather have not of their own accord corrected things committed, will undergo the peril of their own honor.

C. XCIX. A baptizandis uel consignandis pretia non exigantur.

Baptizandis consignandisque fidelibus sacerdotes pretia nulla prefigant, nec illationibus quibuslibet inpositis exagitare cupiant renascentes, quoniam quod gratis accepimus gratis dare mandamur. Et ideo nichil a predictis prorsus exigere moliantur, quo uel paupertate cogente deterriti, uel indignatione reuocati redemptionis suae causas iure despiciant, certum habentes, quod qui prohibita deprehensi fuerint admisisse, uel commissa non potius sua sponte correxerint, periculum subeant proprii honoris.

C. C. A price ought not to be exacted from one receiving the grace of communion.

Likewise from the Sixth Synod, [c. 23]. Let no bishop, priest, or deacon who dispenses sacred communion exact any price from the one receiving the grace of communion. For grace is not sold, nor do we give the grace of the Holy Spirit for a price, but we concede to the worthy that they participate in the gift without deprivation. But if any of those numbered among the clergy has exacted any price from one to whom he dispenses sacred communion, let him be deposed as an imitator of simoniacal fraud.

C. C. A percipiente gratiam communionis pretium exigi non debet.

Item de Sexta Synodo. [c. 23.] Nullus episcopus, aut presbiter, aut diaconus, qui sacram dispensat communionem, a percipiente gratiam communionis aliquod pretium exigat. Neque enim uenditur gratia, neque pro pretio Spiritus sancti gratiam damus, sed dignis munere sine defraudatione participare concedimus. Si quis uero eorum, qui connumerantur in clero, ab eo, cui sacram communionem dispensat, aliquod pretium exegerit, deponatur, sicut imitator symoniacae fraudis.

C. CI. Gifts of invisible grace are not to be acquired by profits.

Likewise from the Eleventh Council of Toledo, [c. 8]. Whatever is bestowed by the consolation of invisible grace ought never at all to be sold for profits or any rewards, as the Lord says: "Freely give what you have freely received." And therefore, whoever hereafter, being established in ecclesiastical order, has received any prices or rewards—unless voluntarily offered—for baptizing and signing the faithful, for chrism, or for promotions of grades, through ambition of this kind: indeed, if with the bishop of the place knowing it anything of this kind has been perpetrated by his subjects, that bishop is to be subjected to excommunication for two months, because by his knowledge he concealed evils and did not procure the necessary correction. But if, without his knowing it, any of his men has believed that he was to receive anything under the aforesaid heads, if he is a priest, let him be punished with four months' excommunication; if a deacon, three; but a subdeacon or cleric serving these cupidities is to be punished with a suitable penalty and the excommunication due.

> C. CI. Munera inuisibilis gratiae questibus non sunt conparanda.
>
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano XI. [c. 8.] Quicquid inuisibilis gratiae consolatione tribuitur, numquam questibus uel quibuslibet premiis uenundari penitus debet, dicente Domino: "Quod gratis accepistis gratis date." Et ideo quicumque deinceps in ecclesiastico ordine constitutus aut pro baptizandis consignandisque fidelibus, crismate, uel promotionibus graduum precia quelibet uel premia (nisi uoluntarie oblata) pro huiusmodi ambitione susceperit, equidem, si sciente loci episcopo tale quicquam a subditis perpetratum fuerit, idem episcopus duobus mensibus excommunicationi subiaceat pro eo, quod inscientia mala contexit et correctionem necessariam non acquisiuit.
> Sin autem suorum quispiam, eodem nesciente, quicquam de supradictis capitulis accipiendum sibi esse crediderit, si presbiter est, quatuor mensium excommunicatione plectatur; si diaconus, trium; subdiaconus uero uel clericus his cupiditatibus seruiens competenti pena, et debita excommunicatione plectendus est.

C. CII. Nothing is to be exacted by priests for the balsam which is placed in chrism.

Likewise from the Second Council of Braga, [c. 4]. It has pleased the council that no bishop exact anything further for the small amount of balsam, blessed for the sacrament of baptism, which is given throughout the churches—because they are accustomed individually to exact a tremissis for it—lest perhaps, just as Simon Magus wished to buy the gift of God with money, we who sell that which is consecrated for the salvation of souls through the invocation of the Holy Spirit be damnably sold.

> C. CII Nichil a sacerdotibus exigatur pro balsamo, quod in crismate ponitur.
> Item ex Concilio Bracarensi II. [c. 4.] Placuit, ut nullus episcoporum pro balsami modico, benedictum pro baptismi sacramento per ecclesias datur, quia singuli tremissem pro ipso exigere solent, aliquid ulterius exigat, ne forte quod pro salute animarum per inuocationem sancti Spiritus consecratur, sicut Symon magus donum Dei pecunia uoluit emere, ita nos uenundantes dampnabiliter uenundemur.

C. CIII. Nothing is to be exacted from those who bring their infants to be baptized.

Likewise from the same, [c. 7]. It has pleased the council that each bishop bring this about throughout his churches: that if those who offer their infants for baptism voluntarily offer anything according to their vow, it is to be received from them. But if through the necessity of poverty they do not have anything to offer, let no pledge be violently taken from them by clerics. For many poor persons, fearing this, withdraw their children from baptism; if perhaps, while it is deferred, they depart this life without the grace of baptism, it is necessary that their perdition be required from those through fear of whose depredations they withdrew themselves from the grace of baptism.

C. CIII. Non est aliquid exigendum ab his, qui infantes suos ad baptizandum adducunt.

Item ex eodem. [cap. 7.] Placuit, ut unusquisque episcopus per ecclesias suas hoc faciat, ut hi, qui infantes suos ad baptismum offerunt, si quid uoluntarie pro uoto suo offerunt, suscipiatur ab eis. Si uero per necessitatem paupertatis aliquid non habeant quod offerant nullum eis pignus uiolenter tollatur a clericis. Nam multi pauperes, hoc timentes, filios suos a baptismo retrahunt, qui forte, dum differuntur, si sine gratia baptismi de hac uita recesserint, necesse est, ut ab illis eorum perditio requiratur, quorum spolia pertimescentes a baptismi gratia se subtraxerunt.

C. CIV. Let no one compel those who are baptized to put coins into the basin.

Likewise from the Council of Elvira, [c. 48]. It has pleased the council that this be corrected: that those who are baptized not put coins into the basin, as was customarily done, lest the priest appear to sell for a price what he received freely. Nor are their feet to be washed by priests or clerics.

C. CIV. Qui baptizantur nullus in concam nummos mittere cogat.

Item ex Concilio Eliberitano. [c. 48.] Emendari placuit, ut qui baptizantur (ut fieri solebat) nummos in concam non mittant, ne sacerdos quod gratis accepit precio distrahere uideatur. Neque pedes eorum lauandi sunt a sacerdotibus uel clericis.

C. CV. Nothing ought to be exacted for the reception of chrism or baptism.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur. It was said that in certain places coins customarily are given for the reception of chrism, similarly for baptism and communion. The holy synod detested and anathematized this as simoniacal heresy, and established that thereafter they exact nothing either for ordination, chrism, baptism, balsam, burial, or communion; but let the gratuitous gifts of Christ be given by gratuitous dispensation.

C. CV. Pro perceptione crismatis uel baptismi aliquid exigi non debet.

Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. Dictum est, solere in quibusdam locis pro perceptione crismatis nummos dari, similiter pro baptismo et communione. Hoc symoniacae heresis detestata est sancta sinodus et anathematizauit, et ut de cetero nec pro ordinatione, nec pro crismate, uel baptismo, uel balsamo nec pro sepultura, uel communione quicquam exigant statuit; sed gratis dona Christi gratuita dispensatione donentur.

C. CVI. Nothing is to be exacted either for dedicating basilicas or for conferring the other sacraments.

Likewise from the Council of Chalon, [in the time of Charlemagne, c. 16]. We establish that, just as nothing is to be received for dedicating basilicas and giving orders, so also priests who are to receive chrism are to give nothing either for balsam or for buying lights. Accordingly, let bishops buy balsam from the resources of the Church, and each the lights in his churches. Part XIII. GRATIAN.

Therefore, just as these sacraments, although ministered simoniacally, nevertheless confer the effect of blessing upon the receiver, so also priestly anointing, although ministered simoniacally, nevertheless ought not to lack its effect. But, as was said above, those sacraments are of necessity, this one of dignity, and therefore their privileges cannot generate the common law of these. Simoniacs, therefore, have a wounded head through the depraved imposition of a simoniacal hand. But this is understood of those whom neither ignorance nor the violence of being dragged excuses, who are ordained by persons whom they indubitably know to be simoniacs, whether they are ordained by them simoniacally or non-simoniacally. For, as Pope Nicholas distinguishes, some are ordained simoniacally by simoniacs, others simoniacally by non-simoniacs, others non-simoniacally by simoniacs. He indicates this distinction in chapter II, saying:

C. CVI. Nec pro dedicandis basilicis nec pro ceteris sacramentis conferendis aliquid exigi debet.

Item ex Concilio Cabillonensi. [tempore Caroli M. c. 16.] Statuimus, ut, sicut pro dedicandis basilicis et dandis ordinibus nichil accipiendum est, ita etiam pro balsamo siue pro luminaribus emendis nichil presbiteri crisma accepturi dent. Episcopi itaque de facultatibus ecclesiae balsamum emant, et luminaria singuli in ecclesiis suis. XIII. Pars. Gratian. Sicut ergo hec sacramenta, licet symoniace ministrentur, tamen effectum benedictionis conferunt accipienti, sic et sacerdotalis unctio, licet symoniace ministretur, suo tamen non debet carere effectu. Sed, sicut supra dictum est, illa sacramenta sunt necessitatis, hec dignitatis, et ideo priuilegia eorum non possunt generare communem legem istorum. Habent ergo symoniaci uulneratum caput per symoniacae manus prauam inpositionem. Hoc autem de illis intelligitur, quos nec excusat ignorantia, nec attractionis uiolentia, qui ab illis ordinantur, quos indubitanter sciunt esse symoniacos, siue symoniace siue non symoniace ordinentur ab eis. Ut enim Nicolaus Papa distinguit, alii symoniace ordinantur a symoniacis, alii symoniace a non symoniacis, alii non symoniace a symoniacis. Hanc distinctionem innuit capitulo II. dicens:

C. CVII. Concerning the manifold kind of simoniacs.

We have established a decree concerning simoniacs who simoniacally ordain or are ordained, concerning simoniacs ordained simoniacally by non-simoniacs, and concerning simoniacs ordained non-simoniacally by simoniacs. § 1. Let simoniacs simoniacally ordained or ordaining fall from their own grade according to the ecclesiastical canons. Likewise, let simoniacs ordained simoniacally by non-simoniacs be removed from the office wickedly received. § 2. But simoniacs ordained non-simoniacally by simoniacs we mercifully permit, through the imposition of the hand, to remain in office because of the necessity of the time. GRATIAN. But this is to be understood of those who are ordained by simoniacs whom they did not know to be simoniacs. Not the guilt of the crime but the ordination of a simoniac makes these simoniacs. Concerning these Pope Urban [II, in the Council of Piacenza, cc. 3 and 4] says:

C. CVII. De multiplici genere symoniacorum.

Statuimus decretum de symoniacis symoniace ordinatoribus uel ordinatis et de symoniacis symoniace a non symoniacis, et symoniacis non symoniace a symoniacis. §. 1. Symoniaci symoniace ordinati uel ordinatores secundum ecclesiasticos canones a proprio gradu decidant. Symoniaci quoque symoniace a non symoniacis ordinati similiter ab offitio male accepto remoueantur. §. 2. Symoniacos autem non symoniace a symoniacis ordinatos misericorditer per manus inpositionem pro temporis necessitate in offitio concedimus permanere. Gratian. Sed hoc intelligendum est de his, qui ordinantur a symoniacis, quos ignorabant esse symoniacos. Hos facit symoniacos non reatus criminis, sed ordinatio symoniaci. De quibus Urbanus Papa [II. in Concilio Placentino, cap. 3. et 4.] ait:

C. CVIII. Concerning those who are ordained non-simoniacally by simoniacs.

If any have been ordained by simoniacs non-simoniacally, provided they can prove that when they were ordained they did not know those persons to be simoniacs, and those persons were then held as catholics in the Church, we mercifully sustain the ordinations of such persons, if nevertheless a praiseworthy life commends them. But as for those who knowingly permitted themselves to be consecrated—rather, execrated—by simoniacs, we decree that their consecration is altogether invalid.

> C. CVIII. De his, qui non symoniace a symoniacis ordinantur.
> Si qui a symoniacis non symoniace ordinati sunt, siquidem probare potuerint se, cum ordinarentur, nescisse eos symoniacos esse, et tunc pro catholicis habebantur in ecclesia, talium ordinationes sustinemus misericorditer, si tamen eos laudabilis uita commendat. Qui uero scienter se a symoniacis consecrari (imo execrari) permiserint, eorum consecrationem omnino irritam esse decernimus.

C. CIX. Concerning one who is ordained by a person whom he knows to be a simoniac.

Likewise Nicholas the Younger, [the same is Alexander II]. For the future we establish that, if anyone hereafter has permitted himself to be consecrated by one whom he does not doubt to be a simoniac, the consecrator and the consecrated are to undergo no dissimilar sentence of condemnation; but let each be deposed and perform penance, and persist deprived of his own dignity.

> C. CIX. De eo, qui ordinatur ab illo, quem scit symoniacum esse.
>
> Item Nicolaus iunior. [Hoc idem Alexander II.] De cetero statuimus, ut, si quis in posterum ab eo, quem symoniacum esse non dubitat, se consecrari permiserit, et consecrator, et consecratus non disparem dampnationis sententiam subeant; sed uterque depositus penitentiam agat, et priuatus propria dignitate persistat.

C. CX. No mercy is to be bestowed upon simoniacs in preserving their dignity.

The same, [a little below]. We have decreed that no mercy is to be shown toward simoniacs in preserving their dignity, but according to the sanction of the canons and the decrees of the holy Fathers we condemn them altogether and sanction by apostolic authority that they are to be deposed. GRATIAN. It is to be understood: unless he was dragged violently. For concerning these and those violently ordained by any heretics Innocent says, [to the Bishops of Macedonia, epistle XXII, c. 5]:

> C. CX. Symoniacis in dignitate seruanda nulla est inpendenda misericordia.
> Idem. [paulo inferius] Erga symoniacos nullam misericordiam in dignitate seruanda habendam esse decreuimus, sed iuxta canonum sanctionem et sanctorum Patrum decreta eos omnino dampnamus ac deponendos apostolica auctoritate sancimus. Gratian. Subaudiendum est, nisi uiolenter attractus fuerit. De his enim et a quibuslibet hereticis uiolenter ordinatis ait Innocentius: [ad Episcopos Macedoniae, epist. XXII. c. 5.]

C. CXI. Concerning those who unwillingly are dragged to the ordination of heretics.

It is established that many persons suffered violence and were dragged unwillingly and, while resisting, were ordained by heretics. But if any such person, after such an ordination, did not participate when they confected the sacraments, if he did not participate in their communion, if, immediately when they departed, he renounced their most evil assembly and returned to the Church, such a man can have some color of excuse. But those who returned after a month or more, when they consider themselves ordained by heretics—certainly persons who received nothing from them—are guilty of usurped dignity. GRATIAN. The imposition of a catholic hand, with satisfaction and the medicine of penance, often reforms such persons from a regard for piety. But we read the condemnation of simoniacs and of those who consented to them; we do not read of an authoritative medicine expressly named for this heresy, except that, just as it was employed among the Novatians or Donatists—lesser heretics, certainly—not canonically but from a regard for piety, so we gather that it can also be done concerning these persons, for this reason also: that in other respects they have the orthodox faith in all things, except that they believe the Holy Spirit to be saleable. And, as blessed Augustine says, when heretics return, let them be healed in that part by which they severed themselves from the Church, but recognized in that part by which they adhered to her. Hence Leo also writes to Bishop Januarius, [of Aquileia, epistle III]:

C. CXI. De his qui inuiti ad hereticorum ordinationem trahuntur.

Constat multos uim passos atque inuitos attractos, repugnantesque ab hereticis ordinatos; sed huiusmodi aliquis, si post talem ordinationem non interfuit, cum illi conficerent sacramenta, si communioni eorum participatus non est, si statim discedentibus illis pessimo conciliabulo eorum abrenunciauit et ad ecclesiam rediit, iste talis potest habere colorem aliquem excusationis. Ceterum, qui post mensem aut amplius redierunt, cum se considerent ab hereticis ordinatos, certe qui nichil ab eis acceperunt, rei sunt usurpatae dignitatis. Gratian. Tales plerumque ex intuitu pietatis reformat catholicae manus inpositio cum satisfactione et medicina penitentiae; sed dampnationem symoniacorum et eorum, qui eis consenserunt, legimus, medicinam uero autenticam ex hac heresi nominatim non legimus, nisi quod, sicut usurpatum est in Nouacianis uel Donatistis, minoribus utique hereticis, non canonice, sed ex intuitu pietatis, ita etiam ex his posse fieri colligimus, ideo etiam, quia aliorsum per omnia orthodoxam habent fidem, nisi quod Spiritum sanctum credunt esse uenalem. Et, ut ait B. Augustinus heretici cum redierint qua parte se sciderint ab ecclesia, curentur, qua uero parte adheserint, cognoscantur. Hinc et Leo scribit Ianuario Episcopo: [Aquilegiensi, epist. III.]

C. CXII. Those who return from heresy to the Church may, by benefice, remain in the order in which they are found.

Every cleric of any order who, forsaking catholic unity, has stained himself by the contagion of a heretical or schismatic association, if he returns to the Church with lawful satisfaction and condemnation of his error, is to have this as a great benefice: that, with hope of every promotion taken away, he may remain in the order in which he is found. GRATIAN. But concerning those who are ordained simoniacally by non-simoniacs—for example, those who, after giving money to the archdeacon or the bishop's counselors, with the bishop unaware, bring it about that they receive sacred orders from his hand—Gregory VII writes, [book 6 of the Register, in the Synod held at Rome, A.D. 1078, 19 November, c. 5]:

C. CXII. Qui ab heresi ad ecclesiam redeunt, in quo inueniuntur ordine ex beneficio perseuerent.

Omnis cuiuslibet ordinis clericus, qui catholicam deserens unitatem, hereticae uel scismaticae coniunctionis contagione se maculauerit, si ad ecclesiam redierit cum legitima satisfactione et erroris sui dampnatione, hoc in magno beneficio habeat, si, adempta spe omnis promotionis, in quo inuenitur ordine permaneat. Gratian. De his autem, qui ordinantur symoniace a non symoniacis (utpote illi, qui data pecunia archidiacono uel consiliariis episcopi, episcopo ignorante, hoc efficiunt, ut de manu eius sacros ordines accipiant) scribit Gregorius VII.: [lib. 6. Reg. in Synodo Romae habita, A. D. 1078. die 19. Nou. cap. 5.]

C. CXIII. Ordinations which are performed simoniacally are adjudged false.

Ordinations which are performed with a price, prayers, or service rendered to some person with that intention intervening, or which are performed without the common consent of clergy and people according to canonical sanctions and are not approved by those to whom consecration pertains, we adjudge to be false, because those who are ordained in this manner enter not through the door, that is, through Christ, but, as the Truth itself attests, are thieves and robbers. Part XIV. GRATIAN. Therefore, because simony is noted in three ways in this chapter, it must be seen in how many ways a price is given in this heresy. Blessed Gregory clearly expounds this in a tractate on the Gospels, [homily 4, at the end], saying:

C. CXIII. Ordinationes, que symoniace fiunt, diiudicantur falsae.

Ordinationes, que interueniente pretio uel precibus, uel obsequio alicui personae ea intentione inpenso, uel que non communi consensu cleri et populi secundum canonicas sanctiones fiunt, et ab his, ad quos consecratio pertinet, non conprobantur, falsas esse diiudicamus, quoniam qui taliter ordinantur non per ostium, id est per Christum, intrant, sed, ut ipsa ueritas testatur, fures sunt et latrones. XIV. Pars. Gratian. Quia ergo tripliciter symonia in hoc capitulo notatur, uidendum est, quot modis pretium in hac heresi detur. Hoc B. Gregorius in euangeliorum tractatu [hom. 4. in fine] euidenter exponit, dicens:

C. CXIV. Concerning the manifold kind of simoniacs.

There are some who indeed do not receive monetary rewards from ordination, yet bestow sacred orders for human favor and seek from that bestowal only the recompense of praise. Without doubt these do not freely give what they freely receive, because from the office of holiness bestowed they seek the coin of favor. Hence, when the Prophet described a just man, he rightly said: “One who shakes his hands free from every gift.” For he did not say only “from a gift,” but “from every gift,” because one gift is from service, another from the hand, another from the tongue. A gift from service is service unduly rendered. A gift from the hand is money; a gift from the tongue is favor. Therefore, one who bestows sacred orders shakes his hands free from every gift when in divine matters he seeks not only no money but not even human favor.

C. CXIV. De multiplici genere symoniacorum.

Sunt nonnulli, qui quidem nummorum premia ex ordinatione non accipiunt, et tamen sacros ordines pro humana gratia largiuntur, atque de ipsa largitate laudis solummodo retributionem querunt. Hi nimirum quod gratis accipiunt gratis non tribuunt, quia de inpenso offitio sanctitatis nummum expetunt fauoris. Unde bene, cum uirum iustum Propheta describeret, ait: "Qui excutit manus suas ab omni munere." Non enim dixit solum a munere, sed:

"ab omni munere," quia aliud est munus ab obsequio, aliud a manu, aliud a lingua. Munus ab obsequio est seruitus indebite inpensa. Munus a manu pecunia est; munus a lingua fauor. Qui ergo sacros ordines tribuit, tunc ab omni munere manus excutit, quando in diuinis rebus non solum pecuniam nullam, sed nec etiam humanam gratiam requirit.

C. CXV. One who approaches sacred order through any gift will find eternal condemnation.

The same in the Register. If anyone, neither excelling in holy morals nor called by the clergy and people or compelled by their insistence, shamelessly receives the episcopal or priestly dignity of Christ—already polluted by any crime, through unjust love of heart, or sordid entreaties of mouth, or attendance, or manual service, or a fraudulent little gift, supported not by the gain of souls but by avarice for empty glory—and in his life has not left it voluntarily, and unexpected death has not found him in penance, beyond doubt he will perish eternally. Hence Gregory writes to John, Bishop of Corinth, [book IV, epistle 55]:

> C. CXV. Eternam dampnationem inueniet qui quolibet munere ad sacrum ordinem accedit.
> Idem in Registro. Si quis neque sanctis pollens moribus, uel neque a clero populoque uocatus uel pulsatione coactus, inpudenter Christi sacerdotium, iam quolibet facinore pollutus, iniusto cordis amore, uel sordidis precibus oris, siue comitatu, siue manuali seruitio, siue fraudulento munusculo episcopalem seu sacerdotalem, non lucro animarum, sed inanis gloriae auaritia fultus, dignitatem acceperit, et in uita sua non sponte reliquerit, eumque insperata mors penitentia non inuenerit, proculdubio in eternum peribit. Hinc Gregorius scribit Iohanni Corinthiorum Episcopo: [lib. IV. ep. 55.]

C. CXVI. Absolutely nothing is to be received for ordinations.

We have decreed under strict prohibition that anything be received for ordinations. Therefore, you must consent or permit no persons to be brought to sacred orders either through a gift, favor, or the supplication of certain persons.

> C. CXVI. Pro ordinationibus nichil omnino accipiatur.
> De ordinationibus aliquid accipere sub districta interdictione decreuimus. Oportet ergo, ut neque per donum neque per gratiam, neque per quorundam suplicationem aliquos ad sacros ordines consentias uel permittas adduci.

C. CXVII. Let no persons approach sacred orders by price, favor, or supplication.

The same to all Bishops established throughout the province of Greece, [the same book, epistle 56]. From the accounts of certain persons I have learned that in those parts no one arrives at sacred order without the giving of a benefit. If this is so, I say with weeping and announce with groaning that, when priestly order has died inwardly, outwardly also it will not be able to stand for long. For we know from the Gospel what our Redeemer did through himself: entering the temple, he overturned the seats of those selling doves. For to sell doves is to receive a temporal benefit from the Holy Spirit, whom almighty God, consubstantial with himself, bestows upon men through the imposition of hands. From this evil, as I foretold, it is believed already to have happened that the seats of those who presumed to sell doves in the temple of God have fallen, with God as judge. § 1. This error clearly is propagated with increase among subjects. For each person who is brought to sacred order, being already corrupted in the very root of his advancement, is more ready to sell to others what he bought. And where is that which is written: "Freely you have received; freely give"? And since the simoniacal heresy arose first against the holy Church, why is it not weighed, why is it not seen, that one who ordains another with a price acts by advancing him so that he may become a heretic? And therefore we exhort that none of you permit this to be done again, nor dare to promote anyone to sacred orders either through the favor or supplication of anyone, except one whom the quality of his life and action has shown worthy for this. For if we perceive it done otherwise again, know that it will be restrained by strict and canonical vengeance.

C. CXVII. Nec pretio, nec gratia, uel suplicatione aliqui ad sacros ordines accedant.

Idem uniuersis Episcopis per Elladam prouinciam constitutis. [eod. lib. epist. 56.] Quibusdam narrantibus agnoui, quod in illis partibus nullus ad sacrum ordinem sine commodi datione perueniat. Quod si ita est, flens dico, gemens denuncio, quia, cum sacerdotalis ordo intus ortus occidit, foris quoque diu stare non poterit. Scimus quippe ex euangelio, quid redemptor noster per semetipsum fecerit, quia ingressus templum cathedras uendentium columbas euertit. Columbas enim uendere est de sancto Spiritu (quem Deus omnipotens consubstantialem sibi per inpositionem manuum hominibus tribuit) commodum temporale percipere. Ex quo, ut predixi, malo iam euenire creditur, quia, qui in templo Dei columbas uendere presumpserunt, eorum, Deo iudice, cathedrae ceciderunt. §. 1. Qui uidelicet error in subditis propagatur cum augmento. Nam ipso quoque, quisque ad sacrum ordinem perducitur, in ipsa iam prouectus sui radice uiciatus, paratior est aliis uenundare quod emit. Et ubi est quod scriptum est: "Gratis accepistis gratis date?" Et cum primo contra sanctam ecclesiam symoniaca heresis sit exorta, cur non perpenditur, cur non uidetur, quia eum, quem cum precio quis ordinat, prouehendo agit, ut hereticus fiat? Ideoque hortamur, ut uestrum nullus denuo hoc fieri patiatur, sed neque gratia alicuius neque suplicatione aliquos ad sacros ordines audeat promouere, nisi eum, quem uitae et actionis qualitas ad hoc dignum esse monstrauerit. Nam si aliter factum senserimus denuo, districta et canonica illud noueritis ultione conpesci.

C. CXVIII. Let no one approach episcopal honor through canvassing.

Likewise Symmachus, [to Caesarius, epistle I, c. 5]. Therefore, let no one be permitted to approach episcopal honor through canvassing. For since this excess is blamed in lay conduct, who doubts that it brings reproach upon religious persons and those serving God?

C. CXVIII. Ad episcopalem honorem nullus per ambitum accedat.

Item Simacus. [ad Caesarium, epist. I. c. 5.] Nullus itaque per ambitum ad episcopalem honorem permittatur accedere. Nam cum hic excessus in laicali conuersatione culpetur, quis dubitat, quin religiosis et Deo seruientibus incutiat obprobrium?

C. CXIX. On the same.

Likewise Gregory, [to Bishop Adeodatus, book II, indiction XI, epistle 48]. Be especially solicitous, therefore, in ordination, and by no means admit to sacred orders any except those more advanced in age and clean in work. First examine the life and morals of those who are to be placed in sacred order, and let not the power or supplication of any persons steal upon you against this, so that you may be able to employ persons worthy of this office. Therefore, when it is necessary to treat of these things, employ grave and experienced men as participants in your counsel, and weigh this with them by common deliberation.

C. CXIX. De eodem.

Item Gregorius. [Adeodato Episcopo, lib. II. Indict. XI. epist. 48.] Estote ergo precipue in ordinatione solliciti, et ad sacros ordines nisi prouectiores etate et mundos opere nullatenus admittatis. Eorum enim, qui in sacro ordine sunt collocandi, prius uitam moresque discutite, et ut dignos huic offitio adhibere possitis, non uobis potentia, aut suplicatio quarumlibet subripiat personarum. Quando igitur de his tractari necesse est graues expertosque uiros consilii uestri adhibete participes et cum eis communi hoc deliberatione pensate.

C. CXX. Let no one be promoted to sacred orders by favor or venality.

The same to Bishop Columbus, [book II, indiction XI, epistle 47]. Let boys by no means be admitted to sacred orders, lest they fall the more perilously the more quickly they hasten to climb to higher things. Let there be no venality in ordination; let the power or supplication of persons obtain nothing against the things which we prohibit. For beyond doubt God is offended if anyone is promoted to sacred orders not from merit but from favor—which may it not be—or venality. GRATIAN. To the contrary, that same Gregory is read to have ordained one acolyte and another deacon upon the supplication of certain persons, as he himself writes, [book VII, indiction I, epistle 2], to Peter, Bishop of Corsica, among other things:

C. CXX. Neque fauore, neque uenalitate ad sacros ordines quisquam promoueatur.

Idem Columbo Episcopo. [lib. II. Indict. XI. ep. 47.] Pueri ad sacros ordines nullatenus admittantur, ne tanto periculosius cadant, quanto citius conscendere ad altiora festinant. Nulla sit in ordinatione uenalitas; potentia uel suplicatio personarum nichil aduersus hec, que prohibemus, obtineat. Nam proculdubio Deus offenditur, si ad sacros ordines quisquam non ex merito, sed ex fauore (quod absit) aut uenalitate prouehitur. Gratian. Econtra idem Gregorius quibusdam suplicantibus unum acolitum, et alterum diaconum legitur ordinasse, sicut ipse scribit [lib. VII. Indict. I. ep. 2.] Petro Episcopo Corsicae inter cetera:

C. CXXI. With a bishop intervening, the Pope ordained a certain acolyte.

Through the intercession of your holiness we made the bearer of these presents an acolyte and have sent him for service to you, so that, if he has served more in gaining souls, he may be able to advance more.

C. CXXI. Episcopo interueniente Papa quemdam acolitum ordinauit.

Latorem presentium per intercessionem uestrae sanctitatis acolitum fecimus, quem ad obsequia tua transmisimus, ut, si in lucrandis animabus amplius seruierit, proficere amplius possit.

C. CXXII. Whoever has received sacred order in the Roman Church will thereafter be unable to depart from her.

The same to Elias, priest and abbot, [book IV, epistle 30]. You directed that we should promote your son Epiphanius to sacred order and transmit him to you. But in the one matter we heard you; in the other we could not hear you. He was indeed made a deacon; but whoever has once received sacred order in this Church thereafter has no license to depart from her. Although I was unable to see you, I have consolation from this matter, because I rest in your son. GRATIAN. Therefore, ordinations performed through the prayers of just any persons are not adjudged false, but only those which are performed through the prayers of the person to be ordained or of his friend, offered from a carnal rather than spiritual affection, when otherwise they would not have occurred—ordinations which not intervening charity but supplicating ambition extorts. Moreover, the Supreme Pontiff is able not only to ordain the clerics of any bishop in the Roman Church, but, when opportunity demands, can also summon and invite monks and any clerics whatsoever. Hence Pope Nicholas, [to Emperor Michael, in the epistle which begins, "We had proposed"]:

C. CXXII. Quisquis in Romana ecclesia ordinem sacrum acceperit, ab ea ulterius egredi non poterit.

Idem Heliae presbitero et Abbati. [lib. IV. epist. 30.] Filium uestrum Epiphanium mandastis ut ad sacrum ordinem promouere deberemus uobisque transmittere. Sed in uno uos audiuimus in altero minime potuimus audire. Diaconus quidem factus est; sed quisquis semel in hac ecclesia sacrum ordinem acceperit, egrediendi ex ea ulterius licentiam non habet. Si uero uidere uos non potui, hac ex re consolationem habeo, quia in filio uestro requiesco. Gratian. Non itaque quorumlibet precibus ordinationes factae falsae diiudicantur, sed hae demum, que precibus ordinandi uel eius amici, non spirituali, sed carnali affectu porrectis fiunt, cum alias futurae non essent; quas non karitas interueniens, sed ambitio suplicans extorquet. Non solum autem clericos cuiuslibet episcopi summus Pontifex in ecclesia Romana ualet ordinare, uerum etiam oportunitate exigente monachos et quoscumque clericos conuocare potest et inuitare. Unde Nicolaus papa: [Michaeli Imperatori in epist., quae incipit: "Proposueramus"]

C. CXXIII. On the same.

Through the preeminent power of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul, we have the right not only over monks but also, whenever it may be necessary, to summon to us any clerics from any diocese and to invite them when ecclesiastical opportunities demand it. Part XV. GRATIAN. Therefore, when any gift whatsoever intervenes, the ordination is adjudged false. And just as sacred orders are not to be bestowed when a price intervenes, so neither are they to be restored. For, as blessed Ambrose says, sacred orders are neither to be bought for a price nor bought back. Hence Gregory VII also says, [book VI of the Register, in the Council held A.D. 1078, the sixth year of his pontificate, c. 9]:

C. CXXIII. De eodem.

Per principalem beatorum apostolorum Petri et Pauli potestatem ius habemus non solum in monachos, uerum etiam in quoslibet clericos de quacumque diocesi, cum necesse fuerit, ad nos conuocare atque ecclesiasticis exigentibus oportunitatibus inuitare. XV. Pars. Gratian. Quolibet ergo munere interueniente falsa diiudicatur ordinatio. Sicut autem pretio interueniente sacri ordines non sunt tribuendi, ita nec restituendi. Ut enim ait B. Ambrosius, sacri ordines nec sunt pretio emendi; nec redimendi. Hinc etiam Gregorius VII. ait: [lib. VI. Reg. in Concilio habito A. D. 1078. Pontificatus sui VI. c. 9.]

C. CXXIV. The priestly office is not to be restored when a price intervenes.

Let no bishop impose upon his abbots or clerics a burden or servile service from custom contrary to the ecclesiastical norm, or restore an interdicted priestly office when a price intervenes. If he has done this, let him undergo the peril of his office. GRATIAN. Those who receive money so as not to bestow sacred orders upon those to be ordained, or so as not to give assent to a canonical election, or who withhold a blessed stone or consecration from churches to be built or consecrated, are proved by many arguments to be guilty and infamous by reason of the money received.

For Paschal II says:

C. CXXIV. Pretio interueniente offitium sacerdotale non restituatur.

Nullus episcopus grauamen seu seruile seruitium ex usu contra ecclesiasticam normam abbatibus seu clericis suis inponat, uel interdictum sacerdotale offitium pretio interueniente restituat. Quod si fecerit, offitii sui periculum subeat. Gratian. Qui autem pecuniam accipiunt, ut ordinandis sacros ordines non tribuant, uel ut canonicae electioni assensum non prebeant, aut ecclesiis edificandis uel consecrandis lapidem benedictum uel consecrationem subtrahant, multis argumentis acceptae pecuniae rei et infames esse probantur.

Ait enim Pascalis II:

C. CXXV. Those who do not permit churches to be ordered regularly are to be judged sacrilegious.

There are some who, either through violence or favor, do not permit churches to be ordered regularly. We decree that these also are to be judged sacrilegious.

C. CXXV. Sacrilegi sunt iudicandi qui ecclesias non permittunt regulariter ordinari.

Sunt quidam, qui uel uiolentia, uel fauore non permittunt ecclesias regulariter ordinari. Hos etiam decernimus ut sacrilegos iudicandos.

In book IX of the Code, under the Julian Law on Extortion, Emperors Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius. We command and exhort that, if perhaps anyone among honored men, decurions, possessors, or finally even tenants has for any reason been shaken down by a judge of any order; if anyone knows that a sentence at law was saleable; if anyone knows that a penalty was either remitted for a price or imposed through the vice of cupidity; if, finally, anyone has been able for any reason to prove a corrupt judge: let him come forth in public either while that man is administering or after the administration has been laid down, bring the charge, and prove what is charged; when he has proved it, he will carry away both victory and glory.

But if anyone received money because he threatened an accusation, there can be a public trial under the decrees of the senate by which those who have conspired to accuse innocent persons, or who have received money for accusing or not accusing, denouncing or not denouncing testimony, are commanded to be held under the penalty of the Cornelian Law.

The same, [in the same title, law 6]. Under the same law are held those who have received money for denouncing or not denouncing testimony. § 1. The Julian Law on Extortion commands that no one receive anything for granting, changing, or ordering a judge or arbiter, or for not granting, changing, or ordering one; or for assessing a suit, or holding or not holding a trial concerning a person or money. § 3. Today they are punished extraordinarily under the Law on Extortion, and very often are punished either by exile or even more harshly, according as they have transgressed. § 4. One condemned under this law is prohibited from giving testimony publicly, being a judge, or making a legal application.

Question II

GRATIAN. Part I. The second question follows, in which it is asked whether money is to be exacted for entrance into a monastery, or, if exacted, is to be paid. That each may licitly be done is proved by the sequence of each Testament. For it is read in the first book of Kings that Hannah brought Samuel with her, after he had been weaned, to the house of God in Shiloh, with three calves, three measures of flour, and an amphora of wine. § 1. But in the Acts of the Apostles it is read that "the multitude of believers had one heart and one soul," nor did anyone say that anything which they possessed was his own, but all things were common to them. Individuals sold their estates and placed their prices before the feet of the Apostles. One of these, named Ananias, when he reserved a part for himself, after receiving a sentence of malediction, fell dead with his wife Sapphira before the feet of the Apostle. § 2. From this it clearly appears that those about to enter a monastery ought to offer their possessions to the rulers and are not otherwise to be received unless they have offered their own things. But to offer of one's own accord is one thing, to pay things exacted another. Hannah, Samuel's mother, offered gifts to the priests not exacted or sought, but of her own accord. The believers of their own accord offered their possessions to the Apostles so that they might serve the necessities of the needy—possessions which the pressing persecution of unbelievers did not permit them to possess. Ananias also was condemned not because he did not wish to offer his possessions, but because, lying to the Holy Spirit, he fraudulently withheld part of the prices of the things which he had offered to the Apostles. Therefore, by these authorities rulers are not permitted to exact anything from those entering, but to receive things voluntarily offered, because the former is damnable but the latter by no means. Hence it is read in the Second Council of Braga, [c. 5]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Sequitur secunda questio, qua queritur, an pro ingressu monasterii pecunia sit exigenda, uel exacta persoluenda? Hoc utrumque licite fieri, utriusque testamenti serie conprobatur. Legitur enim in primo libro Regum, quod Anna detulit secum Samuelem, postquam ablactatus fuerat, in tribus uitulis, et tribus modiis farinae, et amphora uini ad domum Dei in Sylo. §. 1. In Actibus uero apostolorum legitur, quod "multitudinis credentium erat cor unum et anima una," nec aliquid eorum, que possidebant, quisquam proprium esse dicebat; sed erant illis omnia communia. Singuli uendebant predia sua, et ponebant precia eorum ante pedes apostolorum, quorum unus, nomine Ananias, dum partem sibi reseruaret, cum uxore sua Sapphira, sententia maledictionis accepta, ante pedes apostoli cecidit mortuus. §. 2. Hinc liquido aparet, quod ingressuri monasterium sua debent offerre rectoribus, nec aliter sunt recipiendi, nisi sua obtulerint. Sed aliud est sua sponte offerre, aliud exacta persoluere. Anna mater Samuelis non exacta neque petita, sed sponte munera sacerdotibus obtulit. Credentes sua sponte offerebant apostolis, ut indigentium necessitatibus deseruirent, que instante persecutione infidelium eis possidere non licebat. Ananias quoque non ideo dampnatus est, quia sua nollet offerre, sed quia, Spiritui sancto mentitus, precia eorum, que apostolis obtulerat, ex parte fraudabat. Non ergo his auctoritatibus permittitur rectoribus ab ingressuris aliquid exigere, sed sponte oblata suscipere, quia illud dampnabile est, hoc uero minime. Unde in Bracarensi Concilio II. [cap. 5.] legitur:

C. I. Nothing is to be exacted for dedicating churches.

It has pleased the council that, whenever bishops are invited by any of the faithful to consecrate churches, they do not demand any gift from the founder as though from a debt; but if he himself has offered anything according to his own vow, let it not be rejected, while if either poverty or necessity constrains him, let nothing be exacted from him. Nevertheless, let each bishop remember this: that he not dedicate a church before he has first received the endowment of the basilica and its service confirmed through a charter of donation. For this is no light rashness: that a church be consecrated like a private house without lights or substantial support for those who will serve there. Likewise Boniface, Bishop of the city of Rome, writes to all the monks of the Church of Cagliari:

> C. I. Pro dedicandis ecclesiis nichil exigatur.
> Placuit, ut, quociens ab aliquo fidelium ad consecrandas ecclesias episcopi inuitantur, non quasi ex debito munus aliquod a fundatore requirant; sed si ipse quidem aliquid ex suo uoto obtulerit, non respuatur, si uero aut paupertas illum aut necessitas retinet, nichil exigantur ab illo. Hoc tamen unusquisque episcoporum meminerit, ut non prius dedicet ecclesiam, nisi ante dotem basilicae et obsequium ipsius per donationem cartulae confirmatum accipiat. Nam non leuis est ista temeritas ut sine luminariis uel sine substantiali sustentatione eorum, qui ibidem seruituri sunt, tamquam domus priuata consecretur ecclesia. Item Bonifacius urbis Romae Episcopus scribit uniuersis Caralitanae ecclesiae cenobitis:

C. II. Nothing is to be exacted from those who approach conversion, nor is anyone to be invited to conversion for a price.

With how pious an affection of mind, most beloved brothers, the Roman Church suffers with your destitution is perhaps unknown to you, but is held not unknown to the knower of all things. But that we may give a suitable response to your doubt, God is my witness that the doubt itself also renders me anxious and unfit. For we never read that the Lord's disciples, or those converted by their ministry, incited anyone to the worship of God by the intervention of any gift—unless perhaps someone incongruously proposes the nourishment of the poor, to none of whom, of whatever profession he might be, provisions were denied. We know indeed that "every best thing given and every perfect gift is from above"; from him the one who, by the holy judgment of deliberation, resolves freely to serve God receives the gift of good will. It remains, therefore, that one who receives a gift for some reception into a church sells the gift of God which ought to descend from the Father of lights, while the one lavishing the gift buys importunately. But what follows concerning the sellers or buyers of a divine gift need not be stated in conclusion. § 1. Beware, therefore, brothers, how ambiguous is the counsel which you sought, which indeed we find confirmed by no reason according to the purpose of your will. Nevertheless, if the person whom you found is so useful for your necessity—provided that every bargain is absent, every agreement ceases, and no alienation of your church is made—let him approach, let him begin freely to serve God, and let him devotedly perform the service of his governance; and afterward the Roman Church permits you, as though for the sake of assistance, to bestow some gifts of your church for the comfort of the brothers. [Hence Pope Urban in the Council at Melfi, c. 12:

PALEA.

> C. II. Ab his, qui ad conuersionem accedunt, nichil est exigendum, nec precio aliquis ad conuersionem est inuitandus.

Quam pio mentis affectu, fratres karissimi, uestrae destitutioni Romana conpatiatur ecclesia, uobis fortassis incognitum, sed cognitori omnium non incognitum habetur. Dubitationi autem uestrae quod idoneum demus responsum, Deum testificor, ipsa quoque me dubitatio reddit anxium et ineptum. Numquam enim legimus Domini discipulos uel eorum ministerio conuersos quempiam ad Dei cultum aliquo muneris interuentu prouocasse, nisi forte de pauperum alimento quis inconcinne proponat, quorum nulli, cuiuscumque professionis esset, uictualia negabantur. Scimus equidem, quod "omne datum optimum, et omne donum perfectum desursum est," a quo bonae uoluntatis donum accipit qui sancto deliberationis arbitrio gratis Deo seruire disponit. Restat ergo, ut qui pro aliqua ecclesiae susceptione munus accipit, Dei donum, quod a patre luminum descendere debuit, uendat; munus autem largiens inportunus emat. Quid autem de diuini doni uenditoribus uel emptoribus consequatur, concludi necesse non est. §. 1. Cauete ergo, fratres, quam sit ambiguum quod petistis consilium, quod quidem secundum uestrae uoluntatis propositum nulla inuenimus ratione confirmatum. Verumtamen, si uestrae necessitati adeo est oportunus quem reperistis, dum tamen omnis absit pactio, omnis cesset conuentio, nullaque uestrae ecclesiae fiat distractio, accedat, gratis Deo seruire incipiat, suique regiminis deuote gestet obsequium ac, postmodum uos, quasi subsidii gratia, aliqua suae ecclesiae munera largiri fratrum solatio Romana permittit ecclesia. [Unde Urbanus Papa in Concilio apud Melfiam, c. 12.:

PALEA.

C. III. On the same.

Let no abbot presume, under the occasion of any bargain, to take or exact a price from those who come to conversion. Following the ancient rule, I establish that absolutely nothing is ever to be received from anyone for ordinations, neither from the giving of the pallium, nor from the delivery of charters, nor from that appellation of pastellum which a new pretense devised through ambition. For in ordaining a bishop, the Pontiff imposes the hand, the minister reads the Gospel lesson, and the notary writes the epistle of his confirmation.]

C. III. De eodem.

Nullus abbas precium sumere uel exigere ab eis, qui ad conuersionem ueniunt, aliqua pacti occasione presumat. Regulam antiquam sequens, nulli umquam de ordinationibus aliquid omnino accipiendum esse constituo, neque ex datione pallii, neque ex traditione cartarum, neque ex ea, quam noua per ambitionem simulatio inuenit, appellatione pastelli. Quia enim ordinando episcopo

Pontifex manum inponit, euangelicam lectionem minister legit, confirmationis autem eius epistolam notarius scribit.]

C. IV. Nothing ought to be exacted from one ordained, but neither is it fitting to reject things voluntarily offered.

Likewise Gregory in the Register, [book IV, epistle 44, or c. 88, in the Synod held at Rome]. Just as it is not fitting for a bishop to sell the hand which he imposes, so the minister or notary ought not to sell his voice or pen in that man's ordination. § 1. But if the one who was ordained, not from an agreement, nor having been subjected to exaction or petition, after receiving the charters and pallium wishes to offer anything to anyone among the clergy solely for the sake of gratitude, we by no means prohibit this from being received, because his offering, which did not proceed from the petition of an ambitious person, introduces no stain of fault. GRATIAN. By the authority of Boniface it is openly shown that, just as no one is to be invited to conversion for a price, so it is not fitting to grant entrance into a church to anyone by the intervention of money. But by the authority of Gregory it is given to be understood that it is not permitted to exact money for entrance into a church, but it is permitted to receive money spontaneously offered. Part II. Likewise that saying of the Apostle in [the first epistle] to Timothy is objected, [c. 5, v. 2]:

C. IV. Ab ordinato non debet aliquid exigi, sed nec uoluntarie oblata respui oportet.

Item Gregorius in Registro. [lib. IV. epist. 44. siue cap. 88. in Sinodo Romae habita.] Sicut episcopum non decet manum, quam inponit, uendere, ita minister uel notarius non debet in ordinatione eius uocem suam uel calamum uenundare. §. 1. Is autem, qui ordinatus fuerit, si non ex placito, neque exactus ac petitus, post acceptas cartas et pallium offerre aliquid cuilibet ex clero gratiae tantummodo causa uoluerit, hoc accipi nullo modo prohibemus, quia eius oblatio nullam culpae maculam ingerit, que non ex ambientis petitione processit. Gratian. Auctoritate Bonifacii patenter ostenditur, quod, sicut nullus precio est inuitandus ad conuersionem, ita nulli pecuniae interuentu ecclesiae largiri oportet ingressum. Auctoritate uero Gregorii datur intelligi, quod pro ingressu ecclesiae non licet pecuniam exigere, sed spontanee oblatam suscipere licet. II. Pars. Item opponitur illud Apostoli [1.] ad Timotheum: [cap. 5. u. 2.]

[C. V.]

"Honor widows who are truly widows. But those who are not truly widows—that is, those who can be supported by their own resources or those of their parents—are not to be received, so that the Church may suffice for those who are truly widows."

[C. V.]

"Viduas honora, que uere uiduae sunt. Que autem non sunt uere uiduae, id est que suis uel parentum opibus sustentari possunt, non recipiantur, ut ecclesia sufficiat his que uere uiduae sunt."

C. VI. Those who can be supported by their own expenses are not to receive stipends from the Church.

Likewise Jerome to Pope Damasus. But it is fitting for those clerics to be supported by the stipends of the Church whom no resources of parents or relatives support. But those who can be supported by the goods and resources of their parents, if they receive what belongs to the poor, certainly commit sacrilege and, through an abuse of such things, eat and drink judgment for themselves.

C. VI. Qui sumptibus propriis sustentari possunt, ab ecclesia stipendia non accipiant.

Item Ieronimus ad Damasum Papam. Clericos autem illos conuenit ecclesiae stipendiis sustentari, quibus parentum et propinquorum nulla suffragantur. Qui autem bonis parentum et opibus sustentari possunt, si quod pauperum est accipiunt, sacrilegium profecto committunt, et per abusionem talium iudicium sibi manducant et bibunt.

C. VII. Those whose own possessions suffice for their nourishment are not to be supported by the Church.

Likewise Prosper in the book On the Contemplative Life, chapter X. A shepherd of the Church ought not to expend anything upon those whose own possessions suffice, since to give to those who possess is nothing other than to lose. Nor do those who possess their own things and wish anything to be given to them receive, without their own grave sin, that from which the poor person was to live. Concerning clerics, indeed, the Holy Spirit says: "They eat the sins of my people." But just as those who have nothing of their own receive not sins but the nourishment which they are seen to need, so possessors receive not nourishment, in which they abound, but the sins of others. GRATIAN. But by these authorities those prohibited from being received by the Church are not those who once were rich and left all things, like Peter, Matthew, and Paul; or distributed them to the poor, like Zacchaeus; or joined them to the things of the Church, like those who sold their estates and placed the prices before the feet of the Apostles so that all things might be common to them. Rather, they are those who, remaining in the homes of their parents or unwilling to leave their own things, desire to be fed from ecclesiastical resources. Concerning these it is added below in the same book of Prosper, [c. 10]:

> C. VII. Quibus sua sufficiunt alimentis ecclesiae non sustententur.
> Item Prosper in libro de contemplatiua uita capitulo X. Pastor ecclesiae his, quibus sua sufficiunt, non debet aliquid erogare, quando nichil aliud sit habentibus dare quam perdere. Nec illi, qui sua possidentes sibi dari aliquid uolunt, sine grandi suo peccato unde pauper uicturus erat accipiunt. De clericis quidem Spiritus sanctus dicit: "Peccata populi mei comedunt." Sed sicut nichil habentes proprium, non peccata, sed alimenta, quibus indigere uidentur, accipiunt, ita possessores non alimenta, quibus habundant, sed aliena peccata suscipiunt. Gratian. Verum his auctoritatibus prohibentur ab ecclesia suscipi non illi, qui quomdam fuerunt diuites, et omnia reliquerunt, ut Petrus et Mattheus et Paulus, aut pauperibus distribuerunt, ut Zacheus, aut ecclesiae rebus adiunxerunt, sicut illi, qui predia sua uendentes ponebant precia ante pedes apostolorum, ut essent illis omnia communia: sed illi, qui in domibus parentum residentes uel sua relinquere nolentes ecclesiasticis facultatibus pasci desiderant. De quibus in eodem libro Prosperi [c. 10.] subinfertur:

C. VIII. One who does not wish to leave his own things ought not to be supported by the expenses of the Church.

If anyone for this reason does not wish to leave his own things, so that he may have from which to live, why does he receive that for which he must render an account? Why does he multiply his own sins with those of others? The same: § 1. It is not mine to say what kind of sin those incur who presumptuously receive the food of the poor; they additionally burden with their expenses the Church which they ought to have helped from their own resources, perhaps living in a congregation for this reason: lest they feed any poor persons, lest they receive strangers, or lest they diminish their own estate by daily expenses. § 2. But if they have contributed something from their fruits to the Church as though for their own expense, let them not prefer themselves with empty boasting to those whom the Church feeds and clothes although they have nothing, because one who strips himself of the things of the world, or one who, although he has had nothing, does not desire to have, is more perfect than one who has bestowed something upon the Church from the many things which he possesses and perhaps boasts of that which he has bestowed. GRATIAN. Behold those who are prohibited from being received by the Church. But those who leave all their own things, distribute them to the poor, or join them to the things of the Church are both laudably to be received by the Church and to be supported by her resources. Hence it is read in the same book, [c. 11]:

> C. VIII. Qui sua relinquere non uult sumptibus ecclessiae sustentari non debet.
> Si quis propter hoc non uult sua relinquere, ut habeat unde uiuat, ut quid accipit, unde rationem reddat? ut quid peccatis alienis sua multiplicat? Idem: §. 1. Non est meum dicere, quale peccatum cibos pauperum presumendo suscipiant; qui ecclesiam, quam iuuare de propriis facultatibus debuerant, suis expensis insuper grauant, propter hoc fortassis in congregatione uiuentes, ne aliquos pauperes pascant, ne aduenientes excipiant, aut ne suum censum cottidianis expensis inminuant. §. 2. Quod si aliquid de fructibus suis ecclesiae uelud pro ipsa sua expensa contulerint, non se preferant inani iactantia illis, quos nichil habentes pascit et uestit ecclesia, quia perfectior est ille, qui se mundi rebus expoliat, aut qui, cum nichil habuerit, nec habere desiderat, quam ille, qui ex multis, que possidet, ecclesiae aliquid prestiterit, ac se de eo, quod prestiterit, forsitan iactat. Gratian. Ecce, qui prohibentur suscipi ab ecclesia. Illi uero, qui omnia sua relinquunt, uel pauperibus distribuunt, uel ecclesiae rebus adiungunt, et ab ecclesia laudabiliter sunt suscipiendi, et eius opibus sustentandi. Unde in eodem libro [cap. 11.] legitur:

C. IX. Those who leave their own things, distribute them to the poor, or join them to the things of the Church laudably dispense ecclesiastical things.

A priest to whom the care of dispensation is committed receives from the people, not only without cupidity but also with praise for piety, things to be dispensed, and faithfully dispenses the things received, because he has either left all his own things to his parents, distributed them to the poor, or joined them to the things of the Church, and through love of poverty has placed himself among the number of the poor, so that he himself, as a voluntary poor man, may live from that from which he ministers to the poor. Clerics also whom birth made poor may, when living with perfection of virtue either in their own homes or in a congregation, receive the necessities of life, because cupidity does not lead them to receive those things, but the necessity of living compels them. § 1. The Apostle appears to speak concerning such persons: “Those who work in the sanctuary eat the things which are of the sanctuary, and those who serve the altar participate with the altar.” Unless he wished this to be understood concerning those who contemn their own resources, he would never have added what follows: “Thus also God ordained for those who announce the Gospel to live from the Gospel.” Those who wish to possess nothing of their own live from the Gospel; those who neither have nor desire to have anything are possessors not of their own things but of common things. What else is it to live from the Gospel except for the one laboring to receive the necessities of life from that in which he labors? Nevertheless, the Apostle, who preached the Gospel in such a way that he ministered necessities to himself with his own hands, confidently speaks concerning himself: “But I have used none of these things.” And why he said this he disclosed in what followed, saying: “It is better for me to die than for anyone to empty my glory.” He says that his glory would be emptied if he wished to receive the expense of temporal life from those to whom he preached. For he wished to receive the fruit of his labor not in the present but in the future.

C. IX. Qui sua relinquunt, uel pauperibus distribuunt, uel ecclesiae rebus adiungunt, laudabiliter ecclesiastica dispensant.

Sacerdos, cui dispensationis cura commissa est, non solum sine cupiditate, sed etiam cum laude pietatis accipit a populo dispensanda, et fideliter dispensat accepta, quia omnia sua aut parentibus reliquit, aut pauperibus distribuit, aut ecclesiae rebus adiunxit, et se in numero pauperum paupertatis amore constituit, ut unde pauperibus subministrat, inde et ipse tamquam pauper uoluntarius uiuat. Clerici quoque, quos pauperes natiuitas fecit, cum perfectione uirtutis uitae necessaria siue in domibus suis, siue in congregatione uiuentes accipiant, quia ad ea accipienda non eos cupiditas ducit, sed uiuendi necessitas cogit. §. 1. De talibus uidetur dicere Apostolus: "Qui in sacrario operantur que de sacrario sunt edunt, et qui altario deseruiunt cum altario participantur." Qui, nisi hoc de contemptoribus facultatum suarum uellet intelligi, numquam secutus adiungeret: "Ita et Deus ordinauit his, qui euangelium annunciant de euangelio uiuere." De euangelio uiuunt qui nichil habere proprium uolunt; qui nec habent, nec habere aliquid concupiscunt, non suorum, sed communium possessores. Quid est aliud de euangelio uiuere, nisi laborantem inde, ubi laborat, necessaria uitae percipere? Apostolus tamen, qui sic euangelium predicauit, ut necessaria sibi suis manibus ministraret, de se confidenter loquitur: "Ego autem nullo horum usus sum." Et quare dixerit, secutus aperuit, dicens: "Expedit mihi magis mori quam ut gloriam meam quis euacuet." Euacuari dicit gloriam suam, si ab eis, quibus predicabat, uoluisset accipere uitae temporalis expensam. Nolebat quippe in presenti sui laboris fructum, sed in futuro recipere.

C. X. According to the merit of their labor, let priests distribute ecclesiastical stipends to clerics.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 36]. Let all clerics who faithfully and vigilantly serve the Church obtain from priests, according to the merit of their service and through the ordinance of the canons, the stipends owed to holy labors. GRATIAN. By the authorities of many it is established more clearly than light that it is not permitted to exact money from those about to enter a monastery, lest both the one who exacts and the one who pays incur the crime of simony.

C. X. Iuxta meritum laboris sacerdotes clericis ecclesiastica stipendia distribuant.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 36.] Clerici omnes, qui ecclesiae fideliter uigilanterque deseruiunt, stipendia sanctis laboribus debita secundum seruitii sui meritum per ordinationem canonum a sacerdotibus consequantur. Gratian. Multorum auctoritatibus luce clarius constat, quod ab ingressuris monasterium non licet pecuniam exigere, ne et ille, qui exigit, et ille, qui soluit, symoniae crimen incurrat.

Question III

GRATIAN. But it is still objected that those about to enter a monastery who give money buy not the purpose of religion but participation in the stipends of the Church. Therefore, since they buy temporal things, not spiritual things, they are by no means to be held simoniacs. § 1. To these things the response is thus: Not only those who receive spiritual things for a price, but also those who receive temporal things annexed to them, are judged simoniacs. Hence Malachi, speaking in the person of the Lord, says: “Who is there among you who closes the doors and kindles my altar gratuitously? I have no will in you, says the Lord of hosts, and I will not receive a gift from your hand.” To close the doors is not an office of a sacred gift, but only annexed to it. Likewise Gregory writes to all the Bishops of Spain:

GRATIANUS. Sed adhuc obicitur, qui ingressuri monasterium pecunias tribuunt, non propositum religionis, sed participationem stipendiorum ecclesiae emunt. Temporalia ergo non spiritualia ementes, nequaquam symoniaci habendi sunt. §. 1. His ita respondetur: Non solum qui spiritualia, sed etiam qui temporalia eis annexa precio accipiunt symoniaci iudicantur. Unde Malachias loquens ex persona Domini: "Quis est," inquit, "in uobis, qui claudat ostia et incendat altare meum gratuito? Non est uoluntas mihi in uobis, dicit Dominus exercituum, et munus non suscipiam de manu uestra." Ostia claudere non est sacri muneris offitium, sed tantum sibi adiunctum. Item Gregorius scribit uniuersis Yspanis Episcopis:

C. I. Concerning those who dispense sacred orders through the acceptance of gifts.

We have heard, most beloved, what it was proper for us to hear, but certainly it was not pleasing to hear: namely, that there are certain professors of sacred orders who, through the giving or acceptance of gifts, usurp for themselves the churches of God or their benefices. We greatly marvel that you did not correct this crime sharply some time ago; for each is justly to be corrected and removed from the thresholds of holy Church: both the one who lavishes gifts for the ambition of obtaining a church and the one who presumes to accept anything in order that he may enter a church. The former indeed presumes to buy the gift of God, but the latter to sell it. I would also say that this offense is not unlike sacrilege, since that which ought to have been done freely and by the sacred judgment of deliberation is occasioned by a bargain for money. Therefore, dearest brothers, carefully undo the things done in such a manner, prevent those not yet done, and do not hesitate to strike those resisting your commands with the fitting bond of anathema.

> C. I. De his, qui sacros ordines munerum acceptione dispensant.
> Audiuimus, dilectissimi, quod nos audisse oportuit, sed audisse profecto non libuit, quosdam scilicet esse sacrorum ordinum professores, qui sub munerum datione uel acceptione Dei ecclesias, uel earum beneficia sibi usurpant. Quod quidem scelus uos iam non dudum acriter correxisse uehementer admiramur; iuste enim uterque corripiendus est et a sanctae liminibus ecclesiae submouendus, et qui pro ecclesiae ambitu munera largitur, et qui ut ecclesiam adeat quicquam presumit accipere. Iste quippe donum Dei emere, hic autem uendere presumit. A sacrilegio quoque hoc facinus non dispar dixerim, cum id, quod sponte et sacro deliberationis arbitrio gratis fieri debuit, sub pecuniae pactione causatur. Quare, fratres karissimi, que taliter facta sunt curiose refellite, infecta prohibete, uestrisque iussionibus resistentes digno anathematis uinculo percutere non dubitate.

C. II. Concerning those who sell churches or ecclesiastical benefices.

The same to the Bishop of Rouen and to all the Gallic bishops. If any giver or receiver has obtained churches of God or ecclesiastical benefices—which some call prebends—through the intervention of money, whether by giving he bought or by receiving he sold, he is not excluded from Simon's perdition. But if he has persevered, let him be punished with perpetual condemnation. For if one who wishes to serve God under the appearance of religion accepts anything, he both loses his merit and is deprived of the benefice accepted. By the force of reason, therefore, he is compelled to restore what he received unjustly and not to retain whatever he had received for the sake of base gain.

> C. II. De his, qui ecclesias uel ecclesiastica beneficia uendunt.
> Idem Rotomagensi Episcopo et Gallicis omnibus. Si quis dator uel acceptor Dei ecclesias uel ecclesiastica beneficia (que quidam prebendas uocant) sub pecuniae interuentu susceperit, siue dando emerit, siue accipiendo uendiderit, a Symonis non excluditur perditione. Sed si perseuerans fuerit, perpetua mulctetur dampnatione. Nam qui sub religionis obtentu Deo famulari uoluerit, si quid acceperit, et meritum perdit, et beneficio accepto frustratur. Rationis ergo uigore cogitur quod iniuste recepit restituere, et quicquid turpis lucri gratia receperat non tenere.

C. III. A bishop who sells benefices or ecclesiastical offices is to be suspended from office.

Likewise Pope Gregory VII, [book VI of the Register, in the Synod, c. 4]. If any bishop has sold prebends, archdeaconries, provostships, or any ecclesiastical offices, or has ordained otherwise than the statutes of the holy Fathers prescribe, let him be suspended from office. For it is fitting that, just as he received the episcopate freely, so he should distribute freely the members of that same episcopate.

C. III. Ab offitio suspendatur episcopus beneficia uel ecclesiastica offitia uendens.

Item Gregorius VII. Papa. [lib. VI. Reg. in Sinodo, cap. 4.] Si quis episcopus prebendas, archidiaconatus, preposituras uel aliqua ecclesiastica offitia uendiderit, uel aliter, quam statuta sanctorum Patrum precipiunt, ordinauerit, ab offitio suspendatur. Dignum est enim, ut, sicut gratis episcopatum accepit, ita membra eiusdem episcopatus gratis distribuat.

C. IV. Bishops are permitted to sell neither altars nor prebends.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Urban II held in Auvergne. The question was raised concerning bishops who repeatedly compelled monasteries to redeem for money altars given to them, because a certain practice of simoniacal depravity had now long grown established in parts of Gaul: churches or tithes—which among them are called "altars" in common speech—given to monasteries are repeatedly sold by bishops under cloaked avarice, whenever, to be sure, the clerics whom they call "persons" die or are changed. With God as our author, we drive every venality both from ecclesiastical things and ministries, and by apostolic authority prohibit this from being done hereafter, just as we also forbid all prebends to be sold. Moreover, whatever altars or tithes monasteries are known to have possessed for thirty years or more under redemption of this kind, we establish that they shall possess them henceforth peacefully and without any molestation. § 1. The annual due of the bishops which they were accustomed to have from those same altars is, of course, reserved.

C. IV. Nec altaria, nec prebendas episcopis uendere licet.

Item ex Concilio Urbani Papae II. habito Aluerniae. Quesitum est de episcopis, qui altaria monasteriis data frequenter redimi pecunia conpellebant, quia quidam symoniacae prauitatis usus in Galliarum partibus iam diutius inoleuit, ut ecclesiae uel decimae (que uulgari uocabulo apud eos altaria nuncupantur) monasteriis datae sepius ab episcopis sub palliata auaritia uenduntur, mortuis nimirum seu mutatis clericis, quos personas uocant. Nos auctore Deo uenalitatem omnem tam ex rebus quam ex ministeriis ecclesiasticis propellentes hoc ulterius fieri auctoritate apostolica prohibemus, sicut etiam prebendas omnes uenundandas interdicimus. Porro quecumque altaria uel decimas ab annis triginta et supra sub huiuscemodi redemptione monasteria possedisse noscuntur, quiete deinceps et sine molestia qualibet eis possidenda firmamus. §. 1. Saluo utique episcoporum censu annuo, quem ex eisdem altaribus soliti sunt habere.

C. V. Whatever is acquired in sacred orders by money given or promised is to be held void.

The same, [in the Council of Piacenza, cc. 1 and 2]. We too confirm, both by judgment and by apostolic authority, the things established by the holy Fathers concerning simoniacs. Therefore, whatever has been acquired in sacred orders or ecclesiastical things by money either given or promised, we decree to be void and never to obtain any force.

C. V. Quicquid data uel promissa pecunia in sacris ordinibus acquiritur irritum habeatur.

Idem. [in Concilio Placenti, c. 1. et 2.] Ea, que a sanctis Patribus de symoniacis statuta sunt nos quoque et iudicio, et apostolica auctoritate firmamus. Quicquid igitur in sacris ordinibus, uel in ecclesiasticis rebus uel data uel promissa pecunia acquisitum est, nos irritum esse et nullas umquam uires obtinere censemus.

C. VI.

Whatever is possessed is understood under the name of money. Likewise Augustine, On Christian Doctrine. Everything whatsoever that men have on earth, all the things of which they are masters, are called money: a slave, vessel, field, tree, cattle; whatever is among these is called money. § 1. It is called money for this reason: because the ancients had what they possessed in cattle.

C. VI.

Quicquid possidetur nomine pecuniae intelligitur. Item Augustinus de doctrina Christiana. Totum, quicquid homines habent in terra, omnia, quorum Domini sunt, pecunia uocatur, seruus, uas, ager, arbor, pecus; quicquid horum est pecunia dicitur. §. 1. Ideo autem pecunia uocata est, quia antiqui quod habebant, in pecoribus habebant.

C. VII. Those who buy ecclesiastical benefices are proved also to buy churches.

Likewise Pope Paschal. If anyone objects that consecrations are not bought, but rather the things which arise from consecration, he is proved utterly foolish. For since a corporate church, such as a bishop, abbot, or something of that kind, profits nothing without corporeal things, just as a soul does not live bodily without a body, whoever sells either one of these things, without which the other does not arise, leaves neither unsold. Therefore, let no one buy a church or prebend or anything ecclesiastical, nor pay a pastellum or a meal before or afterward for such a thing.

C. VII. Qui ecclesiastica beneficia emunt, ecclesias quoque emere probantur.

Item Pascalis Papa. Si quis obiecerit, non consecrationes emi, sed res, que ex consecratione proueniunt, penitus desipere probatur. Nam cum corporalis ecclesia, ut episcopus, aut abbas, aut tale aliquid sine rebus corporalibus in nullo proficiat, sicut nec anima sine corpore corporaliter uiuit, quisquis horum alterum uendit, sine quo nec alterum prouenit neutrum inuenditum derelinquit. Nullus ergo emat ecclesiam uel prebendam, uel aliquid ecclesiasticum, nec pastellum, nec pastum antea uel postea pro huiusmodi soluat.

C. VIII. Why investiture of a church by laymen is not prohibited by the Gospel.

Likewise Urban [II], Bishop, servant of the servants of God, to his beloved son L., Provost of the church of Saint Vincent at Pavia, greeting and apostolic blessing. The Savior foretells in the Gospel that near the end of the age false Christs and false prophets will arise and seduce many, and that his faithful will suffer many afflictions in the world, but nevertheless that the gates of hell will not prevail. Therefore—just as the Apostle says, "There must be heresies, so that those who are approved may be made manifest"—we must rise up in opposition with the Prophet and set up a wall for the house of Israel, and with the Apostle enter the kingdom of God through many tribulations, since the sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the future glory which will be revealed in us. § 1. Therefore, because you made known to us that this objection is put to you—whether it is simoniacal to sell an ecclesiastical thing—that this is simoniacal is openly gathered from what the blessed Apostle says to Simon: "May your money be with you unto perdition, because you thought the gift of God to be possessed by money." The Holy Spirit is indeed the gift of God, and a thing offered to the Church itself is a gift of God. And, if you attend carefully, Simon Magus, who approached the faith, wished to buy not the Holy Spirit, of whom he was himself unworthy—for, as it is written, "The Holy Spirit of discipline will flee the false"—but his gift, so that from the sale of the signs which would be performed through him he might gain multiplied money. Nor did the Apostle abhor in that Simon the purchase of the Holy Spirit—which he knew could not rightly be made—but the ambition for such gain and the avarice which is the service of idols, and he struck it with the dart of a curse. Therefore, whoever sells or buys ecclesiastical things—which are gifts of God, given by God to the faithful and by the faithful to God, and which are received freely from him and therefore ought to be given freely—for the sake of his own gains, thinks with that same Simon that the gift of God is possessed by money. And therefore, one who bestows or obtains them not for that for which they were instituted, but for his own gains, through a service of the tongue, an undue service, or money, is a simoniac, since Simon's principal intention was the sole cause of money, namely avarice, that is, idolatry, as the Apostle Paul says. Otherwise, why does the Synod of Chalcedon of 630 bishops so prohibit the procurator or defender of a church, or anyone subject to a rule, from being ordained through money that it also anathematizes the intermediaries of so great a crime, unless it judges them to be simoniacs? But if the aforesaid soldiers of the Church are thus struck for a crime of this kind, no wise person will deny that those not serving the Church ought to be struck much more damnably for this cause, that is, for selling or buying. But our blessed predecessor Paschal affirms concerning consecration that whoever sells either of those things without which the other does not arise leaves neither unsold, and through this he understands that one who sells or buys a thing of the Church is a simoniac. § 2. Under the name of procurator, the aforesaid synod understands any administrator of ecclesiastical things, as, for example, a provost, economist, or vidame; under the name of defender, an advocate or castellan, and a judge; under one subject to a rule, an archpriest, archdeacon, canon, monk, or anyone assigned to ecclesiastical office. § 3. But that one who sells or buys a provostship or something of this kind sells or buys the Holy Spirit, so far as lies in him, hear Augustine upon John:

"O how many provostships they divide off! Primianus has one provost at Carthage, Rogatus another in Mauretania, that man or this another in Numidia, whom we no longer suffice even to name. Therefore someone goes around to buy the dove; each praises his own provost whom he sells, etc." Behold, the venerable Augustine, treating the alienation of a provostship, understands under the name of the dove the sale or purchase of the Holy Spirit, as do all the expositors of this Gospel chapter. § 4. It must be considered with what penalty those who sell or buy things already offered to God and his Church are to be punished, if those who sold or bought the things to be offered to God were driven out of the temple of God with whips. If it was said concerning the sellers or buyers of things to be offered, "You have made my Father's house a house of business and a den of robbers," what will be said concerning the sellers or buyers of things already offered to the Church? § 5. And lest some madman object that the Lord rightly punished this so bitterly because those things were then sold in God's temple, whereas ecclesiastical things are now alienated outside the temple, attend to Augustine above: he does not delimit the place for the sale or purchase of provostships, but only says indefinitely, "Someone goes around to buy the dove; each praises his own provost whom he sells," not adding "inside the temple" or "outside the temple." Let these things suffice against the sellers or buyers of sacred things.

C. VIII. Quare euangelio non prohibeatur, inuestitura ecclesiae a laicis fieri.

Item Urbanus [II.] Episcopus, seruus seruorum Dei, dilecto filio L. Preposito ecclesiae sancti Vincentii apud Ticinum, salutem et apostolica benedictionem. Saluator predicit in euangelio, circa finem seculi pseudochristos et pseudoprophetas surgere et multos seducere, et fideles suos in mundo multas habituros pressuras, sed tamen portas inferi non preualituras. Proinde (ut ait Apostolus, oportet esse hereses, ut qui probati sunt manifesti fiant) oportet nos cum Propheta ex aduerso consurgere, et murum pro domo Israel opponere, et cum Apostolo per multas tribulationes intrare in regnum Dei, quoniam non sunt condignae passiones huius temporis ad futuram gloriam, que reuelabitur in nobis. §. 1. Igitur, quia innotuisti nobis, quod tibi obicitur, utrum uendere ecclesiasticam rem symoniacum sit, hoc symoniacum esse patenter colligitur ex hoc, quod B. apostolus ait Symoni: "Pecunia tua tecum sit in perditione quia existimasti donum Dei pecunia possideri." Donum Dei quippe est Spiritus sanctus, et donum Dei est res ipsius ecclesiae oblata. Et, si bene animaduertis, Symon magus, qui ad fidem accessit, non Spiritum sanctum quo erat ipse indignus (quoniam, ut scriptum est, Spiritus sanctus disciplinae effugiet fictum), sed donum eius emere uoluit, ut ex uenditione signorum, que per eundem fierent, multiplicatam pecuniam lucraretur. Nec Apostolus emptionem Spiritus sancti (quam bene fieri non posse nouerat), sed ambitionem questus talis et auaritiam, que est ydolorum seruitus, in eodem Symone exhorruit et maledictionis iaculo perculit. Quisquis igitur res ecclesiasticas (que Dei dona a Deo fidelibus, et a fidelibus Deo donantur, queque ab eodem gratis accipiuntur, et ideo gratis dari debent) propter sua lucra uendit uel emit, cum eodem Symone donum Dei pecunia existimat possideri. Ideoque, qui eas non ad hoc, quod institutae sunt, sed ad propria lucra munere linguae, uel indebiti obsequii, uel pecuniae largitur uel adipiscitur, symoniacus est, cum principalis intentio fuerit Symonis sola pecuniae causa, auaritia uidelicet, id est ydolatria, ut ait apostolus Paulus. Alioquin cur sinodus Calcedonensis DCXXX. episcoporum procuratorem uel defensorem ecclesiae, uel quemquam regulae subiectum adeo per pecuniam ordinari prohibet, ut interuentores quoque tanti sceleris anathematizet, nisi quod eosdem symoniacos iudicet? Quod si prefati milites ecclesiae ob huiusmodi scelus taliter percelluntur, nemo sapiens negabit, non militantes ecclesiae multo dampnabilius ob hanc causam, id est uenditionis uel emptionis, debere percelli. Sed beatus predecessor noster Pascalis de consecratione affirmat, quod quisquis eorum alterum uendiderit, sine quo alterum non prouenit, neutrum non uenditum derelinquit, ac per hoc eum, qui rem ecclesiae uendit uel emit, symoniacum esse intelligit. §. 2. In nomine uero procuratoris intelligit prefata synodus quemlibet ecclesiasticarum rerum amministratorem, ut, uerbi gratia, prepositum, yconomum, uicedominum; defensoris nomine aduocatum siue castaldum, et iudicem; in subiecto regulae archipresbiterum, archidiaconum, canonicum, monachum uel quemlibet mancipatum ecclesiastico offitio. §. 3. Quod uero Spiritum sanctum, quantum in se est, uendat uel emat qui preposituram uel huiusmodi aliquid uendit uel emit, audi Augustinum super Iohannem:

"O quot preposituras secernunt! Alterum prepositum habet Cartagini Primianus, alterum in Mauritania Rogatus, alterum habet in Numidia ille uel ille, quos iam nec nominare sufficimus. Circuit ergo aliquis emere columbam; unusquisque laudat prepositum suum, quod uendit, etc." Ecce uenerabilis Augustinus, de prepositurae distractione agens, in nomine columbae sancti Spiritus uenditionem uel emptionem accipit, sicut et omnes huius euangelici capituli tractatores. §. 4. Pensandum uero est, qua pena mulctentur qui iam Deo et ecclesiae suae oblata uendunt uel emunt, si cum flagellis eiecti sunt a templo Dei qui que Deo erant offerenda uendebant uel emebant. Si de offerendorum uenditoribus uel emptoribus dictum est: "Vos fecistis domum patris mei domum negotiationis et speluncam latronum:" quid dicetur de ecclesiae iam oblatorum uenditoribus uel emptoribus? §. 5. Et ne quis insanus obiciat, merito hoc Dominum tam acerbe uindicasse, quia tunc illa in Dei templo uendebantur, ecclesiasticae uero res modo extra templum distrahantur attende superius Augustinum non terminantem locum uenditionis uel emptionis prepositorum sed tantum indefinite dicentem: "Circuit aliquis emere columbam; unusquisque prepositum suum laudat quod uendit;" non adiciens, in templum, uel extra templum. Hec contra uenditores uel emptores rerum sacrarum sufficiant.

C. IX. The ministers and servants of a church are to be ordained by bishops without any venality.

Likewise Alexander [II], Bishop, servant of the servants of God, to the clergy and people of the church of Lucca in perpetuity. We have learned that for a long time this detestable evil has become established within your church: that an ecclesiastical benefice was never conceded to any cleric, however religious and however endowed with knowledge and morals, except to one who had endeavored to buy it with the profane gift of money; and thus the church and its property were made venal, like some earthly and cheap merchandise exposed to sale by merchants. How detestable this evil is and how contrary to God and the saints both the sacred canons teach and is manifest to nearly everyone. This sentence is found in the second chapter of the Synod of Chalcedon. § 1. For the Council of Chalcedon, one of the principal councils, condemns with a similar penalty those who acquire an ecclesiastical benefice through the intervention of money and those who are known to bargain for the sacred imposition of the hand, through which the Holy Spirit is conferred. By its unconquerable authority it commands each group to be expelled: the former from the benefice, the latter from sacred order. Hence the Redeemer of the human race, driving all buyers and sellers from the temple, overturned the seats of those selling doves and poured out the money of the money-changers, declaring by the authority of his command and saying: “Do not make my Father's house a house of business.” § 2. In that same deed consider this also carefully: nowhere through the whole text of the holy Gospel is the Lord found to have corrected sinners with such severity and so strict a censure of justice, since he not only rebuked them in speech but, also in deed, striking them with a whip of cords, drove them all from the temple, openly showing that such traders are not to be corrected like other sinners but are to be cast far from the temple of God, that is, from holy Church. For just as those who endeavor to sell the sacred imposition of the hand are denoted by the sellers of doves, so the sellers of ecclesiastical benefices are designated by the money-changers, who, as the Gospel testifies, make the house of God a den of robbers. § 3. For this reason I, Alexander, bishop—or rather unworthy minister—of the holy Roman Church and Apostolic See, perceiving so many and so great evils to be done in many churches, and especially in the church of Lucca, from wicked covetousness, have decreed to extirpate and root them out entirely, lest the blood of the wicked be required from our hand by the strict Judge. We therefore establish and confirm by the present decree, just as our predecessors are known to have done of old, that henceforth no bishop shall ever dare to confer upon clerics a benefice of a church—which some call a canonry or prebends—or even orders, for any price or gift, but that they shall take care to ordain all ministers and servants of the Church in holy Church freely and without any venality. Nor shall they choose in the house of the Lord those who bring larger sacks of money, but those who, rich in morals and knowledge, are able to sustain the Church herself according to their office. We establish and confirm in the same way that no cleric of whatever grade shall dare to contribute anything for an ecclesiastical benefice, whether for the fabric of churches, as gifts to churches, or even as something to be given to the poor, because, as Scripture testifies, one who accepts something wickedly in order to dispense it well is burdened rather than helped. But if anyone, unmindful of divine precepts and of the salvation of souls, led by wicked covetousness presumes with rash daring to buy or sell the aforesaid ecclesiastical benefice, we decree, as was defined in the Council of Chalcedon, that he shall be subject to the peril of his grade; nor may he minister in the church which he desired to make venal for money; and in addition, pierced by the blade of a terrible anathema, unless he comes to his senses, let him be severed in every way from the Church of God, which he injured.

C. IX. Ministri et seruitores ecclesiae absque ulla uenalitate ab episcopis ordinentur.

Item Alexander [II.] Episcopus, seruus seruorum Dei, Lucensis ecclesiae clero et populo in perpetuum. Ex multis temporibus hoc detestabile malum intra uestram ecclesiam inoleuisse cognouimus, ut nulli umquam clerico, quamuis religioso, quamuis scientia et moribus predito, ecclesiasticum beneficium concederetur, nisi ei, qui profano pecuniae munere illud emere studuisset, fiebatque ecclesia et res eius ita uenalis, uelud quedam terrena et uilis merces negotiatoribus ad uendendum exposita. Quod malum quam detestabile, quantum Deo sanctisque sit contrarium, et sacri canones docent, et fere omnibus manifestum existit. Ista sentencia inuenitur in II. capitulo Calcedonensis sinodi. §. 1. Calcedonense concilium namque unum ex principalibus, simili pena condempnat eos, qui ecclesiae beneficium interuentu pecuniae acquirunt, et eos, qui sacram manus inpositionem (per quam Spiritus sanctus confertur) mercari dinoscuntur. Utrosque enim auctoritate inexpugnabili, illos a beneficio, istos a sacro ordine iubet expelli. Unde humani generis redemptor omnes ementes et uendentes de templo eiciens cathedras uendentium columbas euertit, nummulariorum effudit aes, precepti sui auctoritate denuncians et dicens: "Nolite facere domum patris mei domum negotiationis." §. 2. Illud quoque in eodem facto sollicite considerate, quod per totum textum sancti euangelii nusquam reperitur, Dominum tanta seueritate, tam districta censura iustitiae peccantes corripuisse, cum non solum eloquio increpans, uerum etiam facto flagello de funiculis uerberans omnes eliminauit de templo, aperte demonstrans, quod tales negotiatores non sicut ceteri peccatores sunt corripiendi, sed a templo Dei, id est a sancta ecclesia, longius sunt proiciendi. Nam sicut per columbarum uenditores illi denotantur, qui sacram manus inpositionem uendere conantur, sic per nummularios ecclesiastici beneficii uenditores designantur, qui domum Dei euangelio teste speluncam latronum efficiunt. §. 3. Quapropter ego Alexander, sanctae Romanae ecclesiae et apostolicae sedis episcopus, imo minister indignus, tot et tanta mala in multis ecclesiis et maxime in Lucensi ecclesia ex iniqua concupiscentia fieri conspiciens, ne sanguis iniquorum a districto iudice de manu nostra requiratur, illa extirpare et penitus eradicare decreuimus. Constituimus itaque et presenti decreto firmamus (sicut olim nostri decessores fecisse noscuntur), nullum deinceps episcoporum beneficium ecclesiae (quod quidam canonicam, uel prebendas, uocant seu etiam ordines) pro aliquo precio uel munere clericis audeant umquam conferre, sed omnes ministros et seruitores ecclesiae gratis et absque ulla uenalitate in sancta ecclesia studeant ordinare. Nec eligant in domo Domini qui maiores sacculos pecuniae conferant, sed eos, qui moribus et scientia diuites pro offitio suo ipsam ualeant sustentare ecclesiam. Constituimus et eodem modo firmamus, ut nullus cuiuscumque gradus clericus pro ecclesiae beneficio audeat aliquid conferre aut fabricae ecclesiarum uel in donariis ecclesiarum, siue etiam quod pauperibus sit tribuendum, quia (teste scriptura) qui aliquid male accipit, ut dispenset bene, grauatur potius quam iuuatur. Quod si aliquis, diuinorum preceptorum et animarum salutis inmemor, prefatum beneficium ecclesiae iniqua cupiditate ductus emere uel uendere temerario ausu presumpserit, sicut in Calcedonensi concilio diffinitum est, gradus sui periculo eum subiacere decreuimus, nec ministrare possit ecclesiae quam pecunia uenalem fieri concupiuit, et insuper terribilis anathematis mucrone perfossus, nisi resipuerit, ab ecclesia Dei, quam lesit, modis omnibus abscidatur.

C. X. Those who sell or buy the gifts of God are equally condemned by God.

Likewise Gregory, homily XIII. Christ drove the sellers and buyers from the temple because he condemns either those who confer the imposition of hands for a gift or those who strive to buy the gift of God. Likewise: § 1. Sellers in the temple are those who grant for a reward what belongs to certain persons by right. For to sell justice is to observe it for the acceptance of a reward. Buyers in the temple, however, are those who, while unwilling to render to a neighbor what is just and while scorning to do a thing owed by right, purchase sin by giving a price to patrons.

> C. X. Qui dona Dei uendunt uel emunt, pariter a Deo dampnantur.
> Item Gregorius homelia XIII. Vendentes et ementes de templo eliminauit Christus, quia uel eos, qui pro munere inpositionem manuum tribuunt, uel eos, qui donum Dei emere nituntur, dampnat. Item: §. 1. In templo uendentes sunt, qui hoc, quod quibusdam iure conpetit, ad premium largiuntur. Iustitiam enim uendere est hanc pro premii acceptione seruare. Ementes uero in templo sunt, qui, dum hoc quod iustum est, proximo persoluere nolunt, dumque rem iure debitam facere contempnunt, dato patronis precio emunt peccatum.

C. XI. Those who do not exercise freely the grace which they receive from God are sellers of doves.

Likewise Bede, [on John c. 2]. Those alone are not sellers of doves and makers of the house of God into a house of business who seek sacred orders by offering a price of money, praise, or even honor; but also those who exercise a grade or spiritual grace in the Church which they received through the Lord's generosity, not with simple intention, but for the sake of any human recompense, contrary to that saying of the Apostle Peter: “Whoever speaks, as the words of God; whoever ministers, as from the power which God supplies, so that God may be honored in all things.” Therefore, whoever are such, if they do not wish to be taken from the Church when the Lord comes, let them take these things away from their deeds, lest they make the house of God a house of business. GRATIAN. Teaching that no one ought to convert to his own right, either by force or by any gift, the things of the Church which arise from consecration, Saint Urban says:

> C. XI. Qui gratiam, quam a Deo accipiunt, non gratis exercent, uenditores sunt columbarum.
> Item Beda. [ad cap. 2. Ioannis] Non solum uenditores sunt columbarum, et domum Dei faciunt domum negotiationis, qui sacros ordines, largiendo precium pecuniae, uel laudis, uel etiam honoris inquirunt; uerum hi quoque, qui gradum uel gratiam in ecclesia spiritualem, quam Domino largiente perceperunt, non simplici intentione, sed cuiuslibet humanae causa retributionis exercent contra illud Petri apostoli: "Qui loquitur, quasi sermones Dei; qui ministrat, tamquam ex uirtute, quam administrat Deus, ut in omnibus honorificetur Deus." Quicumque ergo tales sunt, si nolunt ueniente Domino de ecclesia auferri, auferant ista de actibus suis, ne faciant domum Dei domum negotiationis. Gratianus. Res ecclesiae, que uel ex consecratione proueniunt, in suum ius uel ui, uel aliquo munere aliquem conuertere non debere, docens sanctus Urbanus ait.

C. XII. No one shall convert to his own right by force or by a gift the things which arise from consecration.

Whoever sells or buys ecclesiastical things—which are gifts of God, since they are given by God to the faithful and by the faithful to God, and are received freely from him and therefore ought to be given freely—for the sake of his own gains, thinks with that same Simon that the gift of God is possessed by money.

C. XII. Que ex consecratione proueniunt, nemo in suum ius ui uel munere conuertat.

Quisquis res ecclesiasticas (que dona Dei sunt, quoniam a Deo fidelibus, et a fidelibus Deo donantur, queque ab eodem gratis accipiuntur, et ideo gratis dari debent) propter sua lucra uendit uel emit, cum eodem Symone donum Dei pecunia possideri existimat.

C. XIII. Bishops who distribute tithes and offerings to laymen, not clerics, are simoniacs.

Likewise Gregory VII. An evil report has reached us that certain bishops confer the tithes and offerings of Christians not upon priests of their own dioceses but rather upon lay persons, namely soldiers or servants, or—what is more grievous—kinsmen. Hence, if from now on any bishop is found to transgress this divine precept, let him be held not the least among the greatest heretics and antichrists; and, as the Nicene Synod decreed concerning simoniacs, both the bishop who gives and the laymen who receive from him, whether for a price or as a benefice, shall be consigned to the fires of eternal burning.

C. XIII. Symoniaci sunt episcopi, qui decimas et oblationes laicis, non clericis distribuunt.

Item Gregorius VII. Peruenit ad nos fama sinistra, quod quidam episcoporum non sacerdotibus propriae diocesis decimas atque Christianorum oblationes conferant, sed potius laicalibus personis, militum uidelicet siue seruitorum, uel (quod grauius est) consanguineis. Unde si quis amodo episcopus inuentus fuerit huius diuini precepti transgressor, inter maximos hereticos et antichristos non minimus habeatur, et, sicut Nicena sinodus de symoniacis censuit, et qui dat episcopus, et qui recipiunt ab eo laici, siue precio, siue beneficio, eterni incendii ignibus deputentur.

C. XIV. One who grants tithes for money sells the Holy Spirit.

Likewise Paschal II. No one of the faithful is ignorant that to grant an altar and tithes for money and to sell the Holy Spirit is the simoniacal heresy.

C. XIV. Spiritum sanctum uendit, qui decimas pro pecunia tribuit.

Item Pascalis II. Altare et decimas per pecuniam dare, et Spiritum sanctum uendere symoniacam heresim esse, nullus fidelium ignorat.

C. XV. Let one who has attempted to obtain ecclesiastical benefices through money lack the honor wickedly acquired.

Likewise Pope Innocent [II, in the Roman Synod, c. 2]. If anyone has acquired prebends, a priorship, a deanery, an honor, any ecclesiastical promotion, or any ecclesiastical sacrament—for example, chrism, holy oil, or consecrations of altars or churches—through money, with the execrable ardor of avarice intervening, let him lack the honor wickedly acquired, and let buyer, seller, and intermediary be struck with the mark of infamy. Let nothing be exacted either for a meal or under the appearance of any custom before or afterward, nor let him himself presume to give anything, since it is simoniacal; but let him freely enjoy the dignity and benefice conferred upon him without any diminution. GRATIAN. What the sacred canons determine concerning the second and third questions has been disclosed by the authorities brought forward on each side.

C. XV. Careat honore male acquisito, qui ecclesiastica beneficia per pecuniam inuenire temptauerit.

Item Innocentius Papa. [II. in Sinodo Romana, cap. 2.] Si quis prebendas, uel prioratum, seu decanatum, aut honorem, uel promotionem aliquam ecclesiasticam, seu quodlibet sacramentum ecclesiasticum, utputa crisma, uel oleum sanctum, consecrationes altarium uel ecclesiarum, interueniente execrabili ardore auariciae per pecuniam acquisiuit, honore male acquisito careat, et emptor atque uenditor, et interuentor nota infamiae percellantur, et nec pro pastu, nec sub obtentu alicuius consuetudinis ante uel post aliquid exigatur, uel ipse dare presumat, quoniam symoniacum est; sed libere absque diminutione aliqua collata sibi dignitate atque beneficio perfruatur. Gratian. De secunda questione et tertia quid sacri canones diffiniant, auctoritatibus hinc inde in medium deductis patefactum est.

Question IV

GRATIAN. Part I. Now, therefore, the fourth question must be treated: whether his father's crime is imputed to this man, when it is established that it was committed without his knowledge? That ignorance excuses him is proved by the authorities of many. For Augustine says, [epistle XLVIII to Vincentius]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Nunc ergo de quarta questione est pertractandum, an paternum crimen huic inputetur, quod eo ignorante constat admissum? Quod ignorantia hunc excuset, multorum auctoritatibus probatur. Ait enim Augustinus: [ep. XLVIII. ad Vincentium]

C. I. Another's crime does not stain one who is ignorant of it.

No one's crime stains one who is ignorant of it.

C. I. Alienum crimen nescientem non maculat.

Nullius crimen maculat nescientem.

[C. II.]

Likewise, [in the same epistle]. What place is left for innocence if another's crime stains one who is ignorant of it?

[C. II.]

Item. [in eadem epistola] Quis locus innocentiae relinquitur, si alienum crimen maculet nescientem?

C. III. Concerning infants who are baptized by heretics.

Likewise it is read in the African Council, [c. 14]. It was resolved concerning infants who are baptized by heretics—for they did this by no judgment of their own—that when they have returned to the Church of God with a salutary purpose, the error of their parents should not impede them from being promoted to the ministry of the sacred altar.

C. III. De infantibus, qui ab hereticis baptizantur.

Item in Affricano Concilio [c. 14.] legitur. Placuit de infantibus, qui ab hereticis baptizantur, neque suo hoc iudicio fecerunt, cum ad ecclesiam

Dei salubri proposito fuerint reuersi, ne parentum error illos inpediat, quo minus promoueantur sacri altaris ministerio.

C. IV. On the same.

Likewise in the same, [c. 24]. Those who were baptized as little children among the Donatists, when they were not yet capable of knowing the destruction of error, if, after reaching an age capable of reason, they have acknowledged the truth, abhorred the falsehood of those persons, and been received by the Church according to the ancient order through the imposition of the hand, the name of error ought not to impede such persons from receiving the office of the clergy.

> C. IV. De eodem.
> Item in eodem. [c. 24.] Qui apud Donatistas paruuli baptizati sunt, nondum scire ualentes erroris interitum, si postquam ad etatem rationis capacem peruenerint, agnita ueritate falsitatem abhorrentes eorum, ab ecclesia ordine antiquo per manus inpositionem recepti sunt, tales ad suscipiendum munus clericatus non debet inpedire nomen erroris.

C. V. The crimes of kinsmen harm clerics in no respect unless they were conscious of them.

Likewise Leo IV to Ebruinus and Adelfridus. Because the governance of our prelacy—as you well know—ought to be solicitous not only about the welfare of priests but also of secular persons, we therefore wish your fraternity to know that this priest now present has come to the Apostolic See and related to us in order the violence and his excommunication; he likewise indicated that his church had been taken from him without the just course of law, which another priest, having given a gift and led by the zeal of envy, presumed to usurp. His relatives, compelled by great grief on that account, soon seized that priest who held his church and gouged out his eyes. Yet the aforesaid priest says that this was done without his will or counsel. If this is so, as he testified to us with his own mouth, you must take great care that, if he was not canonically excommunicated, a canonical remission be made for him.

> C. V. Consanguineorum maleficia in nullo clericis obsunt, nisi conscii fuerint.
> Item Leo IV. Ebruino et Adelfrido. Quia presulatus nostri (quod bene nostis) magisterium non solum de sacerdotum, uerum etiam secularium utilitatibus debet esse sollicitum, propterea fraternitatem uestram scire uolumus, hunc presentem presbiterum ad sedem apostolicam uenisse, nobisque uiolentiam et excommunicationem suam per ordinem retulisse; quod etiam sine iusto legis tramite illi sua fuisset ablata ecclesia, similiter indicauit, quam alius dato munere sacerdos zelo ductus inuidiae usurpare presumpsit. Inde parentes eius magno dolore conpulsi presbiterum illum, qui suam tenebat ecclesiam, mox conprehenderunt, et oculos eius eruerunt. Tamen ipse sepe dictus sacerdos dicit, quod absque sua uoluntate siue consilio hoc sit peractum. Quod si ita est, ut ipse nobis suo ore testatus est, uobis magnopere prouidendum est, ut, si ipse canonice excommunicatus non est, canonica super eum fiat remissio.

[C. VI.]

[See below in Gratian's Dictum after canon 9.]

> [C. VI.]
> [Videas infra in Dicto Gratiani post can. 9.]

C. VII. The perfidy of parents ought not to harm their children.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 60]. If baptized Jews afterward have prevaricated against Christ and been condemned with any penalty, it will not be proper to exclude their faithful children from their property, because it is written: "The son will not bear the iniquity of the father."

C. VII. Perfidia parentum filiis obesse non debet.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano IV. [c. 60.] Iudei baptizati, si postea preuaricantes in Christum qualibet pena dampnati extiterint, a rebus eorum fideles filios excludi non oportebit, quia scriptum est: "Filius non portabit iniquitatem patris."

C. VIII. The sins of parents are not imputed to those who are proved personally separate from them.

Likewise Augustine to Boniface, [epistle XXIII]. Accordingly, when a man has now been made in himself another person distinct from the one who begot him, he is not held liable for another's sin without his own consent. Therefore, he drew guilt because he was one with and in him from whom he drew it when that which he contracted was committed. But one does not draw it from another when each is now living his own proper life, whence it is said: "The soul which has sinned, that one shall die." But that he may be regenerated through the office of another's will, when he is offered for consecration, the one Spirit from whom the person offered is regenerated accomplishes this. Hence Gregory also in book XXVI of the Moralia, [c. 8, on c. 35 of Job]:

C. VIII. Non inputantur peccata parentum his, qui ab eis personaliter diuisi probantur.

Item Augustinus ad Bonifatium. [epist. XXIII.] Iam itaque, cum homo in se ipso, ab eo, qui genuit alter est effectus, peccato alterius sine sua consensione non tenetur obnoxius. Traxit ergo reatum, quia unus erat cum illo et in illo, a quo traxit, quando quod contraxit admissum est. Non autem trahit alter ab altero, quando sua unoquoque propria uita uiuente iam est, unde dicatur:

"Anima, que peccauerit, ipsa morietur." Ut autem possit regenerari per offitium uoluntatis alienae, cum offertur consecrandus, facit hoc unus spiritus, ex quo regeneratur oblatus. Hinc etiam Gregorius in libro XXVI. Moralium: [c. 8, in cap. 35. Iob.]

C. IX. Another's impiety harms the one who imitates it.

"Your impiety will harm the man who is like you, and your justice will help the son of man." Human impiety harms the one whom it pollutes by perverting him, and in turn our justice helps the one whom it changes from depraved actions. For those things which cannot either corrupt a good person or change an evil person do not know how to harm or help. GRATIAN. To the contrary, the Lord says to Moses: "I am a jealous God, who visits the sins of fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation," although Augustine asserts that this was said not from inequality of judgment but from the greatness of clemency, speaking thus: "In the law the Lord threatens that he will render the sins of fathers to their children in the third and fourth generation, not from inequality of judgment, so that some sin and others are punished, but from the greatness of clemency, since he always awaits repentance and does not correct and amend what is committed in the first generation before the third and fourth generation has arrived." In the Digest, title On Penalties, [c. VI]: "The crime or penalty of a father can inflict no stain upon a son. For each person is subjected to lot from his own offense, nor is he constituted the successor of another's crime. The divine brothers also so rescripted to the people of Hierapolis." Therefore, since Innocent writes concerning those baptized by heretics, "It is the law of the Church to furnish only lay communion through the imposition of the hand to those who were baptized by heretics, and not to substitute any of them into even the slightest clerical honor," it is apparent that ignorance alone excuses infants who were baptized by heretics, so that, according to that decree of the African Council, the name of error does not impede them from receiving the clerical office. Likewise, as Augustine writes to Bishop Auxilius, [epistle 75]:

> C. IX. Ei, qui imitatur, inpietas alterius nocet.
> "Homini, qui similis tui est, nocebit inpietas tua, et filium hominis adiuuabit iustitia tua." Humana inpietas ei nocet, quem peruertendo inquinat, et rursus eum adiuuat nostra iustitia, quem a prauis actionibus inmutat. Nocere enim uel adiuuare nesciunt ea, que uel a bono corrumpere, uel a malo permutare non possunt. Gratian. Contra Dominus ad Moysen: "Ego sum Deus zelotes, qui uisito peccata patrum in filios usque tertiam generationem et quartam," licet non inequalitate iudicii, sed magnitudine clementiae Augustinus hoc dictum asserit, ita dicens: "In tertia et quarta generatione peccata patrum se Dominus comminatur in lege filiis redditurum, non inequalitate iudicii, ut alii peccent et alii puniantur, sed magnitudine clementiae, dum semper expectat penitentiam et quod in prima generatione delinquitur non prius corrigit et emendat, nisi tertia et quarta generatio euenerit." Digestis titulo de penis: [c. VI.] "Crimen uel pena paterna nullam maculam filio infligere potest. Namque unusquisque ex suo admisso sorti subicitur, nec alieni criminis successor constituitur. Idque etiam diui fratres Ierapolitanis rescripserunt." Cum ergo de baptizatis ab hereticis Innocentius scribat "Lex est ecclesiae his, qui ab hereticis baptizati sunt, per manus inpositionem laicam tantum prebere communionem, nec ex his aliquem in clericatus honorem uel exiguum subrogare": patet, quod infantes, qui ab hereticis baptizati sint, sola excusat ignorantia, ut iuxta illud Africani concilii ad suscipiendum clericatus offitium non eos impediat nomen erroris. Item sicut Augustinus scribit ad Auxilium Episcopum: [epist. 75.]

[C. X.]

"The sins of parents which are committed by the parents after their children's birth are not imputed to the children; nor are children to be struck with a spiritual penalty for the sins of their parents." [GRATIAN.] But to be deprived of an office or benefice of the Church is a spiritual penalty; therefore, the son does not merit this from the sin of his father. Likewise, if one who is ordained unknowingly by a simoniac is excused, as is read above in Urban's chapter, this man also is to be excused who is ordained simoniacally through ignorance. Part II. But that saying of Gregory is objected:

> [C. X.]
>
> "Non inputantur filiis peccata parentum, que post eorum natiuitatem a parentibus committuntur; nec pro peccatis parentum spirituali pena filii sunt plectendi." [Gratian.] Offitio autem uel beneficio ecclesiae priuari, spiritualis pena est: non igitur hanc ex patris peccato promeretur filius. Item si excusatur, qui ignoranter a symoniaco ordinatur, ut supra in capitulo Urbani legitur, et iste excusandus est, qui per ignorantiam symoniace ordinatur. II. Pars. Sed obicitur illud Gregorii:

C. XI. Concerning a church which is consecrated by a bargain.

A church which has been consecrated by a bargain ought to be called execrated rather than consecrated.

GRATIAN. Likewise, through the sin of the citizens the treasures of Jericho are read to have been anathematized. Hence Achan, who stole a golden rule and certain other precious things, is said to have taken from what was under anathema. § 1. Likewise, through the sin of the Amalekites their animals were commanded to be killed; because Saul spared them, he heard from Samuel: "Do you not know that to resist is the sin of divination, and to refuse to obey is like the crime of idolatry?" § 2. Likewise, through the sin of the Egyptians their possessions were given over to hail, and their beasts and firstborn were consumed by death. § 3. Likewise, through the sin of the Israelites the ark of the Lord was handed over to the Philistines. Therefore, if things which lack sense—such as a church, altar, the ark of the Lord, and the stones of Jericho—are either execrated, handed over to sinners, anathematized, or devastated by hail; if things which lack the power of understanding—such as the animals of the Egyptians and Amalekites—are destroyed by death for the sins of men: it is apparent that ignorance of a crime excuses no one, especially when an advantage from it is brought to the ignorant person. For example, if someone gathered riches for his ignorant son from robbery and rapine, ignorance would not excuse the son from being compelled after his father's death to return the things wickedly acquired. § 4. Likewise, through the sin of Achan the Israelite people were delivered into the hands of their enemies. § 5. Likewise, through the sin of Eli's sons the people fell into the hand of the Philistines. § 6. Through the sin of the people their elect were also often impeded, and finally the prophets were led captive with them. Part III. § 7. The reply to these things is as follows. Insensible and irrational things are either execrated, anathematized, or destroyed by death through the sin of men, not by participation in the sin, but for the sake of a mystery, in detestation of the sin, or as a scourge of the delinquents. For the sake of a mystery, as the treasures of Jericho and the animals of the Amalekites. For Jericho is interpreted "moon" and signifies this world. "Amalekites" is interpreted "those licking blood," and they signify the covetous, the avaricious, and demons. "Israelites" is interpreted "men seeing God," and they signify the multitude of the saints. Therefore, the stones and treasures of Jericho are anathematized and the animals of the Amalekites are commanded to be killed in order to test the covetousness for the treasure of this world, which is designated by the stones and treasures of Jericho; and the irrational motions of the vices, which are understood through the animals of the Amalekites, ought not to pass into the lot of the saints. But the animals of the Egyptians, their possessions, and their firstborn were consumed by hail and death, so that they might be punished in those things in whose prosperity they rejoiced and so that it might be given to be understood that the world and its substance will perish. But the land of the Israelites also was turned to salt, rains were adverse to their crops, and their animals were consumed by sterility and disease, so that at least amid punishments they might perceive their author, whom they refused to recognize through benefits. In detestation of sin, however, Simon's money was condemned, to whom it was said: "May your money be with you unto perdition, because you thought the gift of God to be possessed by money." In detestation of the same crime, also, an altar and a church which are consecrated through simony are said not so much to be consecrated as execrated, because one who pours out the oil of consecration through the intervention of money is to be believed not to consecrate but to execrate. Hence it is that blessed Gregory commanded churches consecrated by Arians to be consecrated again, because those who lacked faith could not bestow the sanctification of consecration, which is perfected only in faith in the Trinity. But the ark and the prophets were handed over to enemies through the sin of their fellow citizens. The elect also who were impeded by their murmuring suffered these things not as a penalty for crime, but as a trial and example of patience. § 8. Likewise, the people who were delivered into the hands of their enemies through the sin of Achan and the sons of Eli signify that subjects are corporally scourged so that amid those very scourges the sins of the prelates may be struck, just as Achan, discovered by lot, was overwhelmed with stones. § 9. So also Jonah's little ship is endangered so that the fugitive, discovered by lot, might be immersed in the waves. Sometimes the life of subjects is depraved through the merits of prelates, so that subjects who favor their prelates unto evil fall together with them, just as the children of Israel, long bearing the sins of the priests, finally fell with them into the hands of enemies. Likewise, David numbered the people, through which sin the sword of the Lord raged against the people. “But the glory of the king is in a broad nation; in the diminution of the people is the crushing of the prince.” He who therefore grew proud in the multitude of his nation was rightly punished in its diminution. § 10. Likewise, ignorance did not excuse the little children of the Sodomites from being consumed by heavenly fire for their fathers' crime; but through this fire the penalty was diminished for those from whom succession to their fathers' crime was taken away. At the same time, it was also demonstrated that little children are sometimes corporally scourged for the sins of their parents. The same must be understood concerning the little children who, through the sin of Dathan and Abiron, descended alive into hell. § 11. Likewise, when Ham sinned his son Canaan was cursed; when Gehazi transgressed, leprosy was transmitted to his descendants. When the Jews cried out, “His blood be upon us and upon our children,” their remnant was bound over to the penalty of the death of Christ. When Ahab sinned, his descendants also lost the throne of the kingdom; and those born of his seed in the kingdom of Judah were excluded from the Lord's genealogy until the stain of that family was purged. The hatred of Esau also, as Malachi testifies, passed to the Edomites. From all these things it is gathered that ignorance of sin excuses no one. § 12. But by these examples none are proved to be held by the sin of others except imitators of their wickedness. For whoever of the seed of Esau and of the others were converted to God and detested their fathers' wickedness experienced not hatred but God's clemency. Likewise, as Ambrose says, [sermon XI]:

> C. XI. De ecclesia, que pactione consecratur.
> Ecclesia, que pactione consecrata fuerit, potius execrata quam consecrata dici debet.
> Gratian. Item peccato ciuium thesauri Iericho anathematizati leguntur. Unde Achor, qui regulam auream et quedam alia pretiosa furatus est, de anathemate dicitur tulisse. §. 1. Item peccato Amalechitarum animalia eorum iussa sunt interfici, quibus quia Saul pepercit, audiuit a Samuele: "Nescis, quia peccatum ariolandi est repugnare, et quasi scelus ydololatriae nolle acquiescere?" §. 2. Item peccato Egyptiorum possessiones eorum grandini traditae, iumenta et primogenita eorum morte consumpta sunt. §. 3. Item peccato Israelitarum archa Domini Phylisteis tradita est. Insensibilia et irrationabilia peccato hominum uel execrantur, uel anathematizantur, uel morte perduntur, non participatione peccati, sed causa sacramenti, uel detestatione peccati, uel flagello delinquentium. Causa sacramenti, ut thesauri Iericho et animalia Amalechitarum. Iericho enim luna interpretatur, et significat istum mundum. Amalechitae interpretantur lingentes sanguinem, et Israelitae interpretantur uiri uidentes Deum, significant multitudinem sanctorum. lapides ergo et thesauri Iericho anathematizantur, animalia Amalechitarum interfici iubentur ad examinandam cupiditatem huius mundi thesauri, qui per lapides et thesauros Iericho designantur, irrationabiles quoque uiciorum motus, qui per animalia Amalechitarum intelliguntur, non debent transire in sortem sanctorum. Animalia uero Egyptiorum, et possessiones eorum, et primogenita, grandine et morte consumpta sunt, ut in illis punirentur, quorum felicitate letabantur, et ut daretur intelligi, quod mundus peribit et substantia eius. Sed et terra Israelitarum in salsuginem uersa est, et segetibus eorum imbres aduersi sunt, animalia eorum sterilitate et morbo confecta sunt, ut auctorem suum, quem per beneficia cognoscere noluerunt, saltim inter suplicia sentirent. In detestatione uero peccati pecunia Symonis dampnata est, cui dictum est: "Pecunia tua tecum sit in perditione, quia existimasti donum Dei pecunia possideri." In detestatione quoque eiusdem criminis altare et ecclesia, que per symoniam consecrantur, non tam consecrari quam execrari dicuntur, quia qui interuentu pecuniae oleum consecrationis effundit non consecrare, sed execrare credendus est. Hinc est, quod B. Gregorius ecclesias ab Arrianis consecratas iterum consecrari precepit, quia sanctificationem consecrationis non nisi in fide Trinitatis perficitur, prestare non poterant qui fide carebant. Archa uero et prophetae peccato suorum ciuium hostibus traditi sunt. Electi quoque, qui murmure eorum inpediti sunt, non in penam criminis, sed in experimentum et exemplum patientiae hec passi sunt. §. 8. Item populus, qui peccato Achor et filiorum Hely in manibus hostium traditus est significat, subditos corporaliter flagellari, ut inter ipsa flagella prelatorum peccata feriantur, sicut Achor sorte deprehensus lapidibus obrutus est. §. 9. Sic et nauicula Ionae periclitatur, ut fugitiuus sorte deprehensus, fluctibus inmergeretur. Aliquando pro meritis prelatorum deprauatur uita subditorum, ut prelatis suis subditi fauentes ad malum cum eis simul corruant, sicut filii Israel, diu portantes peccata sacerdotum, tandem cum eis ceciderunt in manibus hostium. Item Dauid populum numerauit, quo peccato gladius Domini deseuit in populum. "Sed in lata gente gloria regis est, in diminutione plebis contricio principis." Qui ergo de numerositate suae gentis superbiuit, iure in eius diminutione punitus est. §. 10. Item paruulos Sodomitarum non excusauit ignorantia, quin pro paterno scelere celesti igne consumerentur; sed hoc igne pena illis diminuta est, quibus successio paterni sceleris est adempta. Pariter etiam demonstratum est, peccatis parentum paruulos aliquando corporaliter flagellari. Illud idem intelligendum est de paruulis, qui peccato Datan et Abiron uiui descenderunt ad inferos. §. 11. Item Cam peccante filius eius Canaam maledicitur; Iezi delinquente lepra transmittitur ad posteros. Iudeis clamantibus: "Sanguis eius super nos et super filios nostros," reliquiae eorum penae mortis "Christi" addictae sunt. Achab quoque peccante posteri eius regni solium amiserunt, et qui de eius semine in regno Iudae nati sunt, usque ad purgatam labem illius familiae a genealogia Domini exclusi sunt. Odium quoque Esau (ut Malachias testatur) transiuit ad Ydumeos. Quibus omnibus colligitur, quod ignorantia peccati non excusat aliquem. §. 12. Sed his exemplis non probantur teneri peccato aliorum nisi imitatores nequiciae eorum. Quicumque enim de semine Esau et ceterorum ad Deum conuersi paternam malitiam detestati sunt, non odium, sed Dei clementiam experti sunt. Item ut ait Ambrosius: [sermone XI.]

[C. XII.]

“Peter's little ship, in which Judas was, is disturbed, because he who was firm through his own merits was disturbed by those of another.” [GRATIAN.] But Peter was ignorant of Judas's sin. Therefore, ignorance did not excuse him; yet this disturbance is understood not as pollution by sin but as bodily persecution, because through the demerits of evil persons the good are sometimes so oppressed that their infirmity is troubled. Accordingly, by these authorities those for whom money was given while they were ignorant are not proved to be simoniacs. Therefore, this man cannot be proved guilty of a crime of which he had no consciousness. Part IV. § 1. It must also be noted that not every ignorance excuses anyone. For one kind of ignorance is of fact, another of law. Ignorance of fact is of one thing which he was not bound to know, and of another which he was bound to know. Concerning what he was not bound to know, as the Apostle says: "If any unbeliever has invited you to dinner, eat whatever has been set before you, asking nothing. If anyone says to you, 'This has been sacrificed to idols,' do not eat." Behold, the one invited to dinner was not bound to know that the meats set before him had been sacrificed to idols. Concerning what he was bound to know, such is the ignorance of the Jews and the rest of the unbelievers, who are still ignorant that the things foretold by the prophets concerning Christ have been fulfilled, whence he is still awaited by the Jews as one who will come. This excuses no one. § 2. Likewise, one ignorance of law concerns natural law, another civil law. Ignorance of natural law is damnable in all adults; but some are permitted to be ignorant of civil law, others not. Ignorance of civil law harms no one in avoiding loss if a transaction has arisen from it; thus, if a minor has given money to a son under paternal power, he recovers it, but in an adult it is regarded as a delict. § 3. Likewise, if you, even as an adult, divide with another an inheritance offered to you without a judge, thinking the testament supported by law when it was not, you will obtain the whole inheritance; or if you pay or promise, as though under a written acknowledgment of debt, that which you owed under no law, or did not owe under natural law but did under civil law, you recover it; not so if it concerns a delict. For if one thinks that the law permits him to seize his own thing, he falls under the constitution If Anyone into Such.

> "Turbatur nauicula Petri, in qua erat Iudas, quia, qui suis meritis erat firmus, turbatus est alienis." [Gratian.] Ignorabat autem Petrus peccatum Iudae. Non ergo ignorantia excusauit illum, sed turbatio hec non peccati coinquinatio, sed corporalis persecutio intelligitur, quia meritis malorum nonnumquam adeo boni premuntur, ut eorum turbetur infirmitas. Non itaque his auctoritatibus symoniaci probantur, pro quibus ignorantibus pecunia data est. Non ergo potest probari iste reus criminis, cuius non habuit conscientiam. IV. Pars. §. 1. Notandum quoque est, quod non omnis ignorantia aliquem excusat. Est enim ignorantia alia facti alia iuris. Facti alia, quod non oportuit eum scire, alia, quod oportuit eum scire. Quod non oportuit eum scire, sicut ait Apostolus: "Si quis infidelium uocauerit uos ad cenam, quicquid uobis appositum fuerit comedite, nichil interrogantes. Si quis uobis dixerit, hoc ydolis immolatum est, nolite comedere." Ecce quod uocatum ad cenam non oportebat scire, carnes sibi appositas ydolis fuisse inmolatas. Quod oportuit eum scire, sicut ignorantia Iudeorum et reliquorum infidelium, qui ea, que a prophetis de Christo fuerant prenunciata, adhuc ignorant esse conpleta, unde a Iudeis adhuc expectatur uenturus. Hec neminem excusat. §. 2. Item ignorantia iuris alia naturalis, alia ciuilis. Naturalis omnibus adultis dampnabilis est; ius uero ciuile aliis permittitur ignorare, aliis non. Iuris ciuilis ignorantia nemini obest in dampno uitando, si negotium inde contigerit, ut, si minor pecuniam dederit filiofamilias, repetit; in maiore uero quasi delictum est. §. 3. Item si successionem tibi etiam maiori delatam cum alio sine iudice diuidas, putans testamentum iure subnixum, cum non esset, solidam successionem obtinebis; uel si id, quod nullo iure debuisti, aut iure naturali non debuisti, sed ciuili, tamquam ex cyrographo soluas aut promittas, repetis; non ita, si delictum. Nam si putat rem suam sibi per legem licere rapere, incidit in constitucionem: Si quis in tantam.

C. XIII. Emperor Valentinian Augustus.

If anyone has advanced into such audacity of fury that he violently invades possession of things lodged with the fisc or with any persons before the outcome of a judicial determination, then, if he was constituted owner, let him restore to the possessor the possession which he took away and lose ownership of that thing. But if he invaded possession of things belonging to another, let him not only return it to the possessors but also be compelled to restore the value of those same things.] GRATIAN. In this case, however, there was no ignorance of law but of fact, and of a fact which he was not bound to know. Therefore, ignorance of his father's offense excuses him from guilt for the crime, which, even if he had been bound to know it, he nevertheless could not discover because of the infirmity of his age.

> C. XIII. Inperator Valentinianus Augustus.

Sin uero alienarum rerum possessionem inuasit, non solum eam possidentibus reddat, uerum etiam estimationem earundem rerum restituere conpellatur.] Gratian. In hoc autem non fuit ignorantia iuris, sed facti, et illius, quod non oportuit eum scire. A reatu ergo criminis excusat eum ignorantia paterni delicti, quod etsi oportuisset eum scire, infirmitate tamen etatis deprehendere non poterat.

Question V

GRATIAN. Part I. What is asked in the fifth place—whether it is lawful for him to be in the church or to exercise the order which he obtained by his father's money—is determined by the authority of Urban, who, writing concerning simoniacs, says among other things, [in the Council of Piacenza, c. 5 and those following, and likewise in the Roman Council]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod uero quinto loco queritur, an liceat ei esse in ecclesia, uel fungi ordinatione, quam paterna pecunia est assecutus, auctoritate diffinitur Urbani, qui scribens de symoniacis ait inter cetera: [in Concilio Placentino, c. 5. et sequentibus, itemque in Concilio Romano]

C. I. Concerning little children who buy churches through their parents' covetousness.

Whoever, through their parents' covetousness, obtained churches or parts of churches through money while they were still little children, after they have wholly relinquished them, if they wish to live canonically in them, we concede out of mercy that they may remain there; nor do we remove them from sacred orders because of this deed, if they are otherwise found worthy. § 1. But those who, when they were of adult age, bought them by themselves, led by abominable covetousness, if they wish to live canonically in other churches, we permit out of great mercy that they minister there, their proper orders being preserved. But if perhaps they cannot be transferred to others and promise to live canonically in them, let them be content with minor orders and not approach sacred orders, the authority of the Apostolic See nevertheless being preserved in all things. § 2. Yet if any were catholicly ordained before the purchase, when they have relinquished the things they bought and have conducted a canonical life, let them be permitted in their own grades, unless perhaps the church is of such a kind that they ought to obtain the first place there. For we do not permit them to have the first, sole, or provost's place in churches they bought. Part II. GRATIAN. That he said this not to the prejudice of the canons but from a dispensation of mercy is gathered from an epistle of the same man sent to the priest Vitalis in these words:

> C. I. De paruulis, qui cupiditate parentum ecclesias emunt.
> Quicumque sane cupiditate parentum, cum adhuc paruuli essent, ecclesias uel ecclesiarum partes per pecunias adepti sunt, postquam eas omnino dimiserint, si canonice in eis uiuere uoluerint, pro misericordia eos ibidem esse concedimus, neque pro hoc facto a sacris ordinibus illos remouemus, si alias digni inueniantur. §. 1. Illi uero, qui per se ipsos, cum maioris etatis essent, nefanda cupiditate ducti eas emerunt, si in aliis ecclesiis canonice uiuere uoluerint, seruatis propriis ordinibus pro magna misericordia ibi eos ministrare permittimus. Quod si ad alias fortassis transferri non poterint, et in eis canonice uiuere promiserint, minoribus ordinibus contenti ad sacros ordines non accedant, salua tamen in omnibus apostolicae sedis auctoritate. §. 2. Si qui tamen ante emptionem catholice ordinati sunt, cum ea, que emerunt, dimiserint, et uitam canonicam egerint, in suis gradibus permittantur, nisi forte eiusmodi ecclesia sit, ut ibi primum locum debeant obtinere. Primum enim, uel singularem, uel prepositurae locum in emptis ecclesiis eos habere non patimur. II. Pars. Gratian. Hoc autem eum non in preiudicium canonum, sed ex misericordiae dispensatione dixisse, ex epistola eiusdem colligitur, missa Vitali Presbitero in hec uerba:

C. II. Mercy can be shown to simoniacs by preserving their dignity if their life commends them.

Those who bought a church, if the person was of such a kind that his life commends him—namely, that he lives under a rule in a monastery or among canons—we concede, mercifully condescending, that he may minister in the office of his honor, yet without prejudice to the sacred canons. Part III. GRATIAN. From this authority, therefore, it is gathered that ignorance excuses such persons from guilt for the crime, as was said above, but not from the fruit of the purchase, since it is conceded that they may remain in the churches which they obtained by their parents' money only after they have wholly relinquished them and only out of mercy. From this it is apparent that, although the sin of simony was committed without their knowledge, they nevertheless cannot carry off the fruit of their father's purchase. But that they are excused from the crime is apparent from this: they are not removed from sacred orders because of this deed. For if they were participants in that crime, they could not ascend to sacred orders. The same must be understood concerning one who obtained the dignity of the priesthood through money given not to the bishop but to one of his chief men, while both the ordainer and the ordained were ignorant of this. Urban II writes to Albert, Bishop of Metz:

> C. II. In dignitate seruanda symoniacis misericordia potest inpendi, si eos uita commendat.
> Eos, qui ecclesiam emerunt, si persona talis fuerit, quam uita commendet, uidelicet ut in monasteriis uel canonicis regulariter uiuat, in sui honoris offitio misericorditer condescendendo ministrare concedimus, absque tamen sanctorum canonum preiudicio. III. Pars. Gratian. Ex hac itaque auctoritate colligitur, quod ignorantia tales excusat a reatu criminis, ut supra dictum est, non a fructu emptionis, cum in ecclesiis, quas parentum pecunia adepti sunt, non nisi postquam eas omnino dimiserint et ex misericordia ibidem eis esse conceditur. In quo patet, quod etsi illis ignorantibus symoniae peccatum sit admissum fructum tamen paternae emptionis reportare non possunt. Quod uero a crimine excusentur, hinc patet, quia pro hoc facto a sacris ordinibus non remouentur. Si enim illius criminis participes essent, ad sacros ordines conscendere non possent. Illud idem intelligendum est de eo, qui per pecuniam est adeptus sacerdotii dignitatem, non episcopo, sed cuidam ex principibus eius datam; utroque tamen, ordinatore uidelicet et ordinato, hoc ignorante. Urbanus II. scribit Alberto Metensi Episcopo:

C. III. Concerning a certain man for whom the negligence of his parents gave money not to the bishop but to one of his chief men.

You indicated that the bearer of the present letter, through money given by the negligence of his parents not to the bishop but to one of his chief men, obtained the dignity of the priesthood against his will. Although the holy canons testify that he is to be deposed, nevertheless, because he committed this fault unknowingly and under compulsion, and because he voluntarily entreated that he be deposed from that order, applying the bowels of mercy from consideration of discretion—which is the mother of all virtues—rather than from the rigor of the canons, we counsel your fraternity that he may remain in that order; yet in such a way that, if the church which he served does not suffer a scarcity of priests, he shall remain suspended from the priestly office. But if perhaps the utility of the church requires that he assume the care of governance, let it be lawful for him, by concession of his bishop and obedience to the brethren, to exercise the priestly office.

C. III. De quodam, pro quo incuria parentum pecuniam dedit non episcopo, sed uni principum eius.

Presentium portitorem, quem parentum incuria, per pecuniam non episcopo, sed cuidam principum eius datam, inuitum sacerdotii dignitatem obtinuisse significasti, licet sancti canones deponendum esse testentur, quia tamen, culpam istam nesciens et coactus commisit, et quia ab eodem ordine ut deponeretur suplicauit ultroneus, ex consideratione discretionis (que mater est omnium uirtutum) magis quam ex rigore canonum, misericordiae uiscera adhibendo, ipsum in eodem ordine esse fraternitati tuae consulimus; ita tamen, ut, si ecclesia illa, cui deseruit, sacerdotum penuriam non patitur, suspensus a sacerdotali offitio permaneat. Quod si fortasse ecclesiae utilitas exegerit, ut curam regiminis assumat, liceat ei ex concessione episcopi sui fratrumque obedientia sacerdotali offitio fungi.

Question VI

GRATIAN. What ought to be done concerning those who were unknowingly ordained by simoniacs—which was asked in the sixth place—is to be sought above, namely in Urban's chapter which begins: “If any were ordained by simoniacs but not simoniacally.” But now the question concerns those who offer money not for ordination but for election, and who lavish rewards upon some persons so that either a decree of election may be made, or it may be confirmed by subscription, or the election may not be opposed: whether their election is to be judged vicious. For those who lavish gifts not for consecration but for election do not seem to buy the gift of the Holy Spirit, since election makes no one a participant in any spiritual grace. But just as buyers of ecclesiastical things are judged simoniacs because those things are so joined to ecclesiastical offices that the one does not come to anyone without the other, so, because one comes to consecration through election, he who lavishes rewards for election is held to be a simoniac just as if he had given gifts for consecration. Hence Symmachus writes to Bishop Caesarius, [epistle I, c. 5]:

GRATIANUS. Quid uero de his fieri debeat, qui ignoranter a symoniacis ordinati sunt (quod sexto loco quesitum est), supra, in capitulo uidelicet Urbani, quod sic incipit: "Si qui a symoniacis non symoniace ordinati sunt" requiratur. Nunc autem de illis queritur, qui non pro ordinatione pecunias offerunt, sed pro electione, ut uel decretum electionis fiat, uel ut subscriptione confirmetur, uel ut electioni non resistatur, aliquibus premia largiuntur, an eorum electio uiciosa sit iudicanda. Non enim uidentur Spiritus sancti donum emere qui non pro consecratione, sed pro electione munera largiuntur, cum nullius spiritualis gratiae aliquos faciat electio participes. Sed sicut ecclesiasticarum rerum emptores symoniaci iudicantur, quia ecclesiasticis offitiis ita adiunctae sunt, ut alterum sine altero alicui non proueniat, ita, quia per electionem uenitur ad consecrationem, perinde symoniacus habetur, qui pro electione premia largitur, ac si pro consecratione munera dedisset. Unde Simacus scribit Cesario Episcopo: [epist. I. c. 5.]

C. I. No one shall secure subscription to the election of a bishop by fear, rewards, or the support of powerful persons.

But if anyone desires the episcopate, after money has been given let him by no means employ powerful persons as supporters for himself; nor, by applying fear of any kind, let him compel clerics or citizens to subscribe in order to make a decree for him, or urge them by any rewards.

C. I. Nec timore, nec premiis, nec potentum suffragio episcopi subscribatur electioni.

Si quis autem episcopatum desiderat, data pecunia potentes personas minime suffragatrices sibi adhibeat, nec ad decretum sibi faciendum clericos, uel ciues ad subscribendum adhibito cuiuslibet generis timore conpellat, uel premiis quibuslibet exhortetur.

C. II. One who lavishes rewards in order to be elected is a simoniac.

Likewise Gregory to those dwelling at Salona, [book V, epistle 26]. But, providing for your charity and fearing the judgment of almighty God upon my soul, I desire that the cases of that same Maximus be examined carefully: whether he is oppressed by no crimes which are contrary to sacred order; whether he does not endeavor to reach the priestly office through the simoniacal heresy, that is, by furnishing rewards to certain persons who elect him. For then he will be a free intercessor before the Lord for you, if he comes to the place of intercession not bound by his own offenses.

C. II. Symoniacus est, qui ut eligatur premia largitur.

Item Gregorius Salonis consistentibus. [lib. V. ep. 26.] Ego autem uestrae dilectioni prouidens, et meae animae omnipotentis Dei iudicium pertimescens, eiusdem Maximi causas subtiliter exquiri desidero, si nullis criminibus pressus, que sacro ordini contradicunt, si non per symoniacam heresim, id est premia quibusdam se eligentibus prebendo, ad sacerdotale pertingere conatur offitium. Tunc enim liber pro uobis apud Dominum intercessor erit, si non obligatus de suis ad locum intercessionis uenerit.

C. III. Just as ordination, so election or consent ought to be offered without venality.

Likewise Gregory to Syagrius, Bishop of Autun, [and other bishops, book VII, epistle 110]. Just as one who refuses when invited and flees when sought is to be moved toward the sacred altars, so one who aspires of his own accord or thrusts himself forward importunately is without doubt to be repelled. For one who thus strives to ascend to higher things—what else does he do but diminish by growing and, by ascending outwardly, descend inwardly into the depths? And so, dearest brother, let sincerity flourish in the ordaining of priests; let the consent be simple and without venality; let a pure election be put forward, so that one promoted to the summit of the priesthood may be believed to be there not by the support of persons bought but by God's judgment. GRATIAN. But if money has been promised or paid while the elected or ordained person was wholly ignorant, and he did not come to election or ordination by that means, it appears to harm him in no respect: it pertains neither to guilt for a crime of which he had no consciousness nor to the annulment of an election or ordination which he is shown otherwise to have attained not through their depraved covetousness.

C. III. Sicut ordinatio, sic electio uel consensus sine uenalitate debet preferri.

Item Gregorius Siagrio Episcopo Augustudunensi [et aliis Episcopis, lib. VII. epist. 110.] Sicut is, qui inuitatus rennuit, quesitus refugit, sacris altaribus est admouendus, sic qui ultro ambit uel inportunum se ingerit est proculdubio repellendus. Nam qui sic nititur ad altiora conscendere, quid aliud agit, nisi ut crescendo decrescat, et ascendendo exterius interius in profundum descendat? Itaque, frater karissime, in sacerdotibus ordinandis sinceritas uigeat; sit simplex et sine uenalitate consensus; pura preferatur electio, ut ad summam sacerdotii non suffragio uenditorum prouectus, sed Dei credatur iudicio esse. Gratian. Si autem pecunia promissa fuerit uel soluta, electo uel ordinato penitus ignorante, nec eo modo ad electionem uel ordinationem peruenerit, ei nullatenus obesse uidetur, nec ad reatum criminis pertinet cuius conscientiam non habuit, nec ad electionis uel ordinationis cassationem, ad quam alias non per prauam illorum cupiditatem peruenisse docetur.

Question VII

GRATIAN. Part I. Now the seventh question must be treated: whether one renouncing his heresy is to be received in the episcopal dignity or not? Cyprian writes thus concerning these persons to Stephen, [book II, epistle 1]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Nunc autem de septima tractandum est questione, an renuncians suae heresi sit recipiendus in episcopali dignitate uel non? De his ita scribit Ciprianus ad Stephanum: [lib. II. epist. 1.]

C. I. In what orders those returning from heresy are to be received.

If any priests and deacons were first ordained in the catholic Church and afterward proved perfidious and rebellious against the Church, or among heretics were promoted by pseudo-bishops and antichrists with a profane ordination contrary to Christ's disposition, and attempted outside to offer false and sacrilegious sacrifices against the altar and the divine word, it is fitting that these also, when they return, be received on this condition: that they communicate as laymen and hold it sufficient that they are admitted to peace, they who had proved enemies of peace; nor ought they, when returning, to retain among us those weapons of ordination and honor with which they rebelled against us.

C. I. Qui redeuntes ab heresi in suis ordinibus recipiantur.

Si qui presbiteri et diaconi in ecclesia catholica prius ordinati fuerint, et postmodum perfidi et rebelles extiterint contra ecclesiam, uel apud hereticos a pseudoepiscopis et antichristis contra Christi dispositionem profana ordinatione promoti sunt, et contra altare atque diuinum uerbum sacrificia foris falsa et sacrilega offerre conati sunt, eos quoque hac conditione suscipi conuenit, cum reuertuntur, ut communicent laicis, et satis habeant, quod admittuntur ad pacem, qui hostes pacis extiterint; nec debere eos reuertentes ea apud nos ordinationis et honoris arma retinere, quibus contra nos rebellauerunt.

C. II. Concerning those who perform ordination for gifts, and those returning from heresy who are received in their own orders.

Likewise from the Seventh Synod. If anyone violates any ecclesiastical tradition, written or unwritten, let him be anathema. § 1. Let every bishop, priest, or deacon convicted of having given or received ordination for gifts fall from the priesthood. § 2. But some say: “Because we do penance for sin and God forgives it”—and so I too say that God receives every penance and through penance forgives sins which have already been done. For I know that God received David, an adulterer and murderer, through penance and said concerning him: “I have found a man according to my heart.” I know, in turn, that the same man heard from God: “You will not build a house for me, because you are a man of blood.” I know that Manasseh had his impiety forgiven through confession. I know that prostitutes and tax collectors were received through penance; yet none of those who sinned before baptism was numbered among the priests. I know that some, while they were in the world, remained in much fornication, but after becoming monks shone forth like lights of the world; yet none ascended to the priesthood. Even if this has rarely happened, it was nevertheless no law of the Church. We know Mary, the first woman sinner; after her conversion, although holy and chaste, she was nevertheless not numbered among the deaconesses. But why do I say this? Following the holy Apostles and venerable Fathers, with all confidence I cry out that whoever was ordained through simony—whether bishop, priest, or deacon—is alien to the priesthood, for the grace of the Holy Spirit is not saleable; the tradition of Caiaphas and invention of Simon are alien to the holy priesthood. § 3. And if anyone who has fallen into fornication after baptism is not received into the priesthood—for the canons prohibit this—then, if anyone has been promoted to the priesthood with this sin and afterward becomes known, let him be degraded. Likewise: § 4. Concerning the one who was ordained through money, I confess that God receives him through penance. He is good toward all, and his bowels are open to every penitent person. But because, according to the Apostle, a bishop must be irreproachable, whoever has either ordained someone or been ordained through money shall be alien to every priesthood. § 5. Patriarch Tarasius said: Whoever, through money, ordain or have ordained, or are ordained or have been ordained as bishops, priests, deacons, or any persons of the priestly number, let them be altogether repelled from the priesthood, just as Simon Magus was by Peter. Whoever through money have obtained the administration or care of monasteries, churches, religious houses, hospitals, homes for the elderly, or orphanages, let them be expelled from that administration and care with deposition. One who, having fallen into fornication after baptism, was ordained, if he afterward has confessed, let him cease from ministry; but if he has been convicted by someone, let him be deposed altogether. § 6. A bishop, priest, or deacon who strikes someone, by himself or through another, as though wishing thereby to be feared, let him be deposed. Likewise: § 7. One who has been ordained or has obtained a church through secular powers, let him be deposed; but if he has obtained a religious house, let him be expelled.

[PALEA.

C. II. De his, qui pro muneribus ordinationem faciunt, et qui redeuntes ab heresi in suis ordinibus recipiuntur.

Item ex VII. Sinodo. Si quis omnem traditionem ecclesiasticam scriptam uel non scriptam uiolat, anathema sit. §. 1. Omnis episcopus aut presbiter, aut diaconus, conuictus quod pro muneribus ordinationem dederit uel acceperit, a sacerdotio cadat. §. 2. Sed dicunt quidam, quia penitentiam agimus pro peccato, et Deus indulget illud; ita et ego dico, quia omnem penitentiam recipit Deus, et indulget per penitentiam peccata, que iam facta sunt. Noui enim, quod Dauid fornicatorem et homicidam per penitentiam receperit Deus, et dixerit de eo: "Inueni uirum secundum cor meum." Noui rursum eundem audientem a Deo: "Non edificabis mihi domum, quia uir sanguinum es." Scio Manasse per confessionem dimissam inpietatem suam. Scio meretrices et telonarios per penitentiam receptos nullum tamen horum, qui ante baptismum peccauit, sacerdotibus connumeratum. Scio quosdam, dum essent in mundo, in multa fornicatione mansisse, monachos uero factos quasi luminaria mundi resplenduisse; nullum tamen ad sacerdotium ascendisse. Quod, etsi raro contigit, nulla tamen lex ecclesiae fuit. Nouimus primum peccatricem Mariam; post conuersionem, quamuis sancta et casta, tamen inter diaconissas conputata non est. Sed quid hoc dico? Sequens sanctos apostolos et uenerabiles Patres cum omni fiducia clamo: Quod qui per symoniam ordinatus est, siue episcopus, siue presbiter, siue diaconus, alienus est a sacerdotio, neque enim uenalis est gratia Spiritus sancti; Cayphae traditio et adinuentio Symonis a sancto sacerdotio est aliena. §. 3. Et si in fornicationem lapsus aliquis post baptismum, in sacerdotium non recipitur; canones enim hoc prohibent. Si quis uero cum hoc peccato ad sacerdotium prouectus est, cognitus degradetur. Item: §. 4. Ipsum, qui per pecuniam ordinatus est, confiteor, quia per penitentiam recipit Deus. Bonus est in omnibus, et aperta uiscera eius omni homini penitenti. Sed quoniam iuxta Apostolum oportet episcopum esse inreprehensibilem, quicumque per pecuniam uel ordinauit aliquem uel ordinatus est, ab omni sacerdotio sit alienus. §. 5. Tarasius patriarcha dixit: Quicumque per pecuniam uel ordinant, uel ordinauerunt, uel ordinantur, uel ordinati sunt episcopi, uel presbiteri, uel diaconi, uel quilibet de numero sacerdotali, repellantur omnino a sacerdocio, sicut Symon magus a Petro. Quicumque per pecuniam, dispensationem uel curam sortiti sunt monasteriorum uel ecclesiarum, uel religiosarum domorum, ierocomiorum, seniorum, orphanotrophiorum, cum depositione expellantur a dispensatione illa et cura. Qui post baptismum cadens in fornicationem ordinatus est, si postmodum confessus fuerit, cesset a ministerio; si uero conuictus ab aliquo, deponatur omnino. §. 6. Percussor episcopus, aut presbiter, aut diaconus per se uel per alium aliquem, quasi timeri per hoc uolens, deponatur. Item: §. 7. Qui per seculares potestates ordinatus fuerit aut ecclesiam obtinuerit, deponatur; si uero religiosam domum, expellatur.

C. III. On the same.

Likewise from the Council of Meaux, c. 43. It must be guarded against and resisted with the greatest zeal, and, through the power of Christ's blood, interdicted to bishops and kings, to all higher powers, and to all supporters, electors, consenters, or ordainers of any persons whatsoever into an ecclesiastical grade, that no one obtain a place of governance through the simoniacal heresy by any faction, cunning, promise, advantage, or gift, either by himself or through a person put forward.]

C. III. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Meldensi c. 43. Cauendum est et summopere studendum, ac per uirtutem Christi sanguinis inter dicendum et episcopis et regibus, et omnibus sublimioribus potestatibus, atque cunctis fautoribus et electoribus quorumcumque atque consensoribus, seu ordinatoribus in gradu ecclesiastico, ut nemo per symoniacam heresim regiminis locum obtineat quacumque factione, calliditate, promissione, seu commoditate aut datione per se aut per submissam personam.]

C. IV. Which persons returning from the heretics can be received and which cannot.

Likewise from the same Synod, [the Seventh, action 1]. Part II. When they had assembled at Nicaea in Bithynia, and Peter the archbishop and Peter the priest and abbot of the monastery of Saint Sabas, holding the place of Pope Hadrian, and Tarasius, Archbishop of Constantinople, and John and Thomas, apocrisaries of the eastern apostolic sees, and the other bishops were sitting together, the bishops of Sicily said: It is fitting that we inquire concerning future matters. § 1. Likewise Basil, Bishop of Ancyra, said: The ecclesiastical constitution has things canonically handed down from antiquity by the holy Apostles and their successors, our holy Fathers and teachers, the six holy universal synods, and the orthodox local synods: that those returning from any heresy to the orthodox faith and tradition of the catholic Church ought in writing to deny their heresy and confess the catholic faith. § 2. Likewise Patriarch Tarasius said: Does it seem good to you that those returning from heresy should receive their sees? § 3. The most religious monks said: Just as the six universal synods received those returning from heresy, so also do we receive them. § 4. The holy Synod said: It pleases all of us. And Basil, Bishop of Ancyra, Theodore, Bishop of the city of Myra, and Theodosius were commanded to sit in their own grades and sees. § 5. Likewise Constantine, Bishop of Cyprus, said: It is not proper that we who are bishops should need instruction, but that we should be teachers of others. § 6. Likewise Bishop Tarasius said: The teaching of evil teachers is evil. The Church does not receive priests from evil teachers. § 7. Likewise John, apocrisary of the eastern sees, said: Heresy separates every man from the Church. § 8. Likewise Bishop Tarasius said: Behold, many canonical, synodal, and patristic books have been read and have taught us to receive those returning from heresy, if there is no other cause in them. § 9. Likewise Peter, apocrisary of the Pope, said: Macarius the heretic was exiled at Rome by the holy Sixth Synod, and our father Pope Benedict gave him an interval of forty days, and daily sent his counselor Boniface to him and instructed him with admonitory words from divine Scripture; and he was by no means willing to be corrected. But he did this so that he might receive him in his own order. § 10. Likewise Patriarch Tarasius said: What do you say concerning Anatolius? Was he not also made chief in the Fourth Synod? And behold, he was ordained by the impious Dioscorus. Therefore, let us also receive those who were ordained by heretics, just as Anatolius was received. § 11. Likewise: It truly is the voice of God that sons do not die for their fathers, but each one dies in his own sin; and that ordination is from God. § 12. Likewise Patriarch Tarasius said: We have heard the paternal commands. What, therefore? Ought we to receive those ordained by heretics? § 13. The holy Synod said: We have heard, lord, and we ought to receive them. § 14. Patriarch Tarasius said: Many of those who assembled at the Sixth Synod were ordained by Sergius, Pyrrhus, Peter, and Paul, who were chiefs of the heresy of the Monothelites, because these men sat successively in the See of Constantinople; and from the last of them, namely Peter, to the Sixth Synod there were no more than twelve years. But Thomas, John, and Constantine were made archbishops by those heretics, and nevertheless they were not rejected for this reason. § 15. The holy Synod said: This is manifest. § 16. Constantine, Bishop of Cyprus, said: It has been sufficiently shown that those coming from heretics are to be received. But if anyone goes voluntarily to a heretic and receives ordination, let him not be received. § 17. Likewise Patriarch Tarasius said: And I reject those who for a cause of this kind were ordained for the overthrow of the faith, especially when orthodox bishops were present by whom they could have been ordained. Such is the paternal understanding. But if there has been synodal concord and unity of the churches among the orthodox, whoever presumes to be ordained by unclean heretics shall be subject to deposition. The holy Synod said: This is a just judgment. Part III. GRATIAN. From this authority it is given to be understood that one who has passed from the unity of the catholic faith into the fellowship of heretics in order to receive from their hands the sacraments of ecclesiastical dignity, or one who, scorning the orthodox, has desired to be ordained by heretics, even if afterward, renouncing his heresy, he has returned to the Church, nevertheless will not be able to exercise the office received. By Cyprian's authority, however, those who, having been ordained within the catholic Church, fall away in order to attack the faith are prohibited from ecclesiastical administration. But simoniacs are neither ordained by heretics for the overthrow of the faith nor, having been ordained within the catholic Church, armed against the faith. For although they ordain some through money, they nevertheless do not attack the faith or preach that the grace of the Holy Spirit is saleable. Hence, when they have detested their heresy by true penance, they are not prohibited by the preceding authorities from being received in their own grades. Nevertheless, by that chapter of the Nicene Synod, "If anyone through money, etc.," by that other chapter of the Seventh Synod, "If anyone every tradition, etc.," and by the authorities of Innocent and many others, they are commanded to be irreparably condemned. Hence Leo IV also to the Bishops of Britain:
