> Statuimus, ne professionis canonicae quispiam postquam Dei uice supra caput sibi hominem inposuerit, alicuius leuitatis instinctu uel districtioris religionis obtentu ex eodem claustro audeat sine patris et totius congregationis permissione recedere. Discedentem uero nullus abbatum uel episcoporum, et nullus monachorum sine communi litterarum cautione suscipiat. II. Pars. Gratian. Queritur, si monasteria, que semel dedicata sunt, possint transire in clericorum uel secularium habitacula? Quod in Calcedonensi Concilio omnibus modis prohibetur c. 24.:

C. IV. Let places once dedicated as monasteries always remain monasteries.

Let places once dedicated as monasteries by the counsel of bishops remain monasteries perpetually, and the property pertaining to them ought to be reserved for the monasteries; nor can they afterward become secular dwellings. But those who shall have permitted this to be done are to be subject to those condemnations which have been established by the canons.

> C. IV. Que semel sunt dedicata, monasteria semper perseuerent.
> Que semel sunt dedicata monasteria consilio episcoporum, maneant perpetuo monasteria, et res, que ad ea pertinent, monasteriis reseruari oportet, nec posse ea ultra fieri secularia habitacula. Qui uero permiserint hec fieri, subiaceant his condempnationibus, que per canones constitutae sunt.

C. V. Let a cleric who has made sacred places into common lodging houses be deposed, and a layman be excommunicated.

Likewise in the Seventh Synod, c. 13. Because certain venerable houses, both episcopal residences and monasteries, are surreptitiously taken away by certain men and have been made common lodging houses, if those who retain them are willing to restore them so that they may be restored according to their ancient state, it is well and excellent; otherwise, if they are from the sacred catalogue, we command them to be deposed, but if they are monks or laymen, to be excommunicated. For it is evident that they have been condemned by the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit and are assigned to where their worm will not die and the fire will not be extinguished, because they oppose God, who says: "Do not make my Father's house a house of trade." PART III. GRATIAN. It is asked concerning those who come to conversion at what time they ought to be tonsured. Concerning them Pope Gregory writes thus to Fortunatus, Bishop of Naples, [book VIII, letter 23]:

> Item in Sinodo VII., c. 13. Quoniam a quibusdam uiris quedam uenerabiles domus subripiuntur, tam uidelicet episcopia quam monasteria, et facta sunt communia diuersoria, si quidem uoluerint hii, qui hec retinent, reddere ea, ut secundum antiquitatem restaurentur, bene et optime; alioquin, si de sacro catalogo fuerint, hos deponi precipimus, si uero monachi uel laici, excommunicari, quos nimirum constat condempnatos esse et Patre, et Filio, et Spiritu sancto, et deputantur ubi uermis eorum non morietur, et ignis non exstinguetur, quia Deo aduersantur, qui dicit: "Nolite facere domum patris mei domum negotiacionis." III. Pars. Gratian. Queritur de his, qui ad conuersionem ueniunt, quo tempore debeant tonsurari? De his ita scribit Gregorius Papa Fortunato Episcopo Neapolitano: [lib. VIII. epist. 23.]

C. VI. No one ought to be tonsured before he has completed two years in conversion.

Let your fraternity more strictly forbid all monasteries to dare in any way to tonsure those whom they shall have received for conversion before they have completed two years in this way of life. But during this period let their life and morals be carefully proved, lest any of them either not be content with what he desired or not hold as ratified what he chose. For since it is grave to associate untested men with services to men, who could say how much graver it is to apply the wicked to God's service? But if a soldier wishes to be converted, before he is reported to us let no one presume for any reason to receive him without our consent. PART IV. GRATIAN. It is asked whether license to make a testament is left any longer to those who have entered a monastery. Gregory forbids this, writing thus to Januarius, Bishop of Cagliari, [book VII, indiction 2, letter 7]:

C. VI. Antequam biennium in conuersione conpleuerit, aliquis tonsurari non debet.

Monasteriis omnibus fraternitas uestra districtius interdicat, ut eos, quos ad conuersionem susceperint, prius, quam biennium in conuersatione conpleuerint, nullo modo audeant tonsorare. Sed hoc spacio uita moresque eorum sollicite conprobentur, ne quis eorum aut non sit contentus, quod uoluit, aut ratum non habeat quod elegit. Nam dum graue sit, inexpertos hominum obsequiis sociari, quis possit dicere, quanto sit grauius ad Dei seruitium inprobos applicare? Miles uero, si conuerti uoluerit, prius, quam nobis renuncietur, nullus eum sine nostro consensu qualibet presumat ratione suscipere. IV. Pars. Gratian. Queritur, si ingressis monasterium ultra relinquatur licentia testandi? Hoc Gregorius prohibet, ita scribens Ianuario Caralitano Episcopo: [lib. VII. Indict. 2. epist. 7.]

C. VII. After entrance into a monastery, no one is left license to make a testament.

Because those entering a monastery for the sake of conversion are thereafter to have no license to make a testament, but their property is to belong to that monastery, this has been decreed by an express definition of law.

C. VII. Post monasterii ingressum nulli relinquitur licentia testandi.

Quia ingredientibus monasterium conuertendi gratia ulterius nulla sit testandi licentia, sed ut res eorum eiusdem monasterii sint, aperta legis diffinitione decretum est.

C. VIII. After entrance into a monastery, all things are to be conferred upon that monastery.

Likewise Gregory to Cyprian the Deacon, [book III, letter 6]. It has been reported to us that a woman named Petronilla, born in the province of Lucania, was converted through the exhortation of Bishop Agnellus and specially conferred by title of gift upon that same monastery which she entered all her property which she could possess, although it could have belonged to her by right. GRATIAN. To the contrary Paul, the first hermit, left his colobium in his testament to Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria, but his tunic to blessed Antony. But it is one thing concerning those who, after entering a monastery, handed over themselves and their property; another concerning those who, leading a solitary life, handed themselves over to no church. The former cannot give to anyone the things once handed over; the latter can freely make a testament concerning things offered to no one.

C. VIII. Post ingressum monasterii eidem monasterio omnia sunt conferenda.

Item Gregorius Cipriano Diacono. [lib. III. epist. 6.] Perlatum est ad nos Petronillam nomine, de prouincia Lucania progenitam, per exhortationem Agnelli episcopi fuisse conuersam, resque suas omnes, quas habere potuit, licet iure sibi potuissent conpetere, tamen eidem monasterio, in quod ingressa est, etiam specialiter donationis titulo contulisse. Gratian. Econtra Paulus primus heremita in testamento colobium suum Athanasio Alexandrino episcopo reliquit, tunicam uero B. Antonio. Sed aliud est de his, qui monasterium ingressi se et sua tradiderunt: aliud de his, qui solitariam uitam ducentes se nulli ecclesiae tradiderunt. Illi semel tradita nulli tradere possunt: isti nulli oblata libere testari ualent.

[C. IX.] Likewise a new constitution.

"If any woman or man shall have chosen the monastic life and entered a monastery, with no children existing, we command that his or her property belong to the monastery which they enter. § 1. But if a person who has children enters a monastery before disposing of his or her property among them, let it afterward be lawful to divide it among them, with the lawful portion of none diminished, and what shall not have been given to them will belong to the monastery. § 2. But if the person shall wish to divide the whole substance among the children, let that person, counted among the children, retain a share for himself or herself which ought to belong to the monastery. § 3. But if the person shall die after entry before dividing it among them, let the children receive their lawful portion, with the remaining substance belonging to the monastery." Constitution 5 in collection 1. § 4. "But now, since by becoming a monk he is regarded by that very act as having offered all his property, if he did not make a testament beforehand, the law thereafter disposes of it when his judgment has ceased, so that if he has children upon whom by any title of gift he conferred either nothing or less than their lawful portion, so much is to be deducted from the substance destined for the monastery that nothing unjust occurs concerning the children."

> [C. IX.] Item constitutio noua.
> "Si qua mulier aut uir monasticam elegerit uitam, et intrauerit monasterium, liberis non extantibus, monasterio, quod ingrediuntur, res eius conpetere iubemus. §. 1. Sed si persona liberos habens ante, quam de rebus suis inter eos disponat, monasterium intret, liceat ei postea inter eos diuidere, legitima nulli diminuta, et quod eis non dederit monasterio conpetet. §. 2. Sed si omnem substantiam inter filios diuidere uoluerit, sua persona filiis connumerata partem sibi retineat, que monasterio conpetere debeat. §. 3. Sed si post ingressum moriatur, ante, quam inter eos diuidat, filii legitimam percipiant, reliqua substantia monasterio conpetente." Constitutione 5. in collatione 1. §. 4. "Nunc autem, cum monachus factus esset, hoc ipso res suas omnes obtulisse uideatur, si prius testatus non sit, exinde, iudicio eius cessante, lege disponitur, ut si liberos habet, in quos aut nichil, aut minus legitima portione quoquo donandi titulo contulerit, eatenus substantiae monasterio destinatae detrahantur, ne quid contingat circa liberos iniquum."

[C. X.]

Likewise from Novel [CXXIII]. "It is not lawful for parents to exclude children who have become monks from their inheritance, or for children to exclude their parents, although while they were laypersons they fell into a cause of ingratitude." Likewise: § 1. "It is not lawful for parents to drag from a monastery their children who have passed to the solitary life."

> [C. X.]
> Item ex Nouella. [CXXIII.] "Non liceat parentibus liberos, uel liberis parentes ab hereditate sua repellere monachos factos, quamuis, dum laici fuerant, in causam ingratitudinis inciderunt." Item: §. 1. "Non liceat parentibus liberos suos ad solitariam uitam transeuntes abstrahere de monasterio."

Causa XX

GRATIAN. Two persons in the years of childhood were handed over to a monastery by their parents; one unwillingly, the other voluntarily, put on the cowl. When they reached the years of puberty, the unwilling one returned to secular military service, while the voluntary one sought a stricter monastery. (Question I.) Now it is first asked whether those handed over in the years of childhood are compelled to maintain the purpose of religion. (Question II.) Second, if anyone in childhood receives the tonsure or the garment of religion apart from the will of the parents, whether it can be taken from him or not. (Question III.) Third, whether one who put on the cowl apart from his own will is compelled to retain it or not. (Question IV.) Fourth, whether anyone is permitted to pass from one monastery to another that is stricter.

> GRATIANUS. Duo pueritiae annos agentes a parentibus monasterio traditi sunt; unus inuitus, alter spontaneus cucullam induit. Ad annos pubertatis uenientes, inuitus ad secularem miliciam redit, spontaneus monasterium districtius petit. (Qu. I.) Nunc primum queritur, si in pueritiae annis traditi cogantur religionis propositum tenere? (Qu. II.) Secundo, si preter uoluntatem parentum tonsuram uel religionis uestem quis in pueritia accipiat, an possit sibi detrahi, an non? (Qu. III.) Tertio, qui preter propriam uoluntatem cucullam induerit, an cogatur eam retinere, an non? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, si ab uno monasterio in aliud districtius liceat alicui transire?

Question I

GRATIAN. That those handed over within the years of childhood, when they shall have become adults, have free choice to remain or depart is proved by the authority of the Ninth Synod, in which it was established thus:

> GRATIANUS. Quod intra annos pueritiae traditi, cum adulti fuerint, liberum habeant arbitrium manendi uel discedendi, probatur auctoritate nonae Sinodi in qua sic statutum est:

C. I. At what time a profession of virginity begins to be firm.

A profession of virginity will then be firm when the age has begun to be adult and perfect, which is customarily judged suitable for marriage. GRATIAN. If a profession of virginity begins to be firm when the age has begun to be adult, then a profession of religion ought at length to be firm when adult age has been reached. But here the discussion concerns that profession which is offered to God by one's own judgment during the years of childhood and which the consent of the parents does not confirm. But a profession offered to God by the parents ought to be preserved inviolate. Hence Gregory writes to Augustine, Bishop of the English:

> C. I. Virginitatis professio quo tempore firma esse incipit.
> Firma autem tunc erit professio uirginitatis, ex quo adulta iam etas esse ceperit, et que solet apta nuptiis deputari ac perfecta. Gratian. Si uirginitatis professio tunc incipit esse firma, cum etas ceperit esse adulta, et religionis professio tunc demum debet esse firma, cum ad adultam etatem peruentum fuerit. Sed hic de illa professione agitur, que in annis pueritiae proprio arbitrio Deo offertur, quam non confirmat parentum consensus. Ceterum, que a parentibus Deo offertur professio, inuiolatam seruari oportet. Unde Gregorius scribit ad Augustinum Anglorum Episcopum:

C. II. One whom a father or mother caused to be placed under the rule within the years of infancy is not permitted to leave the monastery.

You further added that if a father or mother handed over a son or daughter within the enclosure of a monastery under regular discipline during the years of infancy, whether, after they have grown to the years of puberty, it is lawful for them to depart and be joined in marriage. We avoid this entirely, because it is impious that the reins of pleasure be relaxed for children offered to God by their parents.

C. II. Non licet de monasterio egredi quem pater uel mater infra annos infantiae fecerit ordinari.

Addidistis adhuc, quod si pater uel mater filium filiamue intra septa monasterii in infantiae annis sub regulari tradiderunt disciplina, utrum liceat eis postquam ad pubertatis inoleuerint annos, egredi, et matrimonio copulari. Hoc omnino deuitamus, quia nefas est, ut oblatis a parentibus Deo filiis uoluptatis frena relaxentur.

C. III. Either one's own profession or a father's devotion makes a monk.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 48]. Either a father's devotion or one's own profession makes a monk. Whichever of these it shall be, it will hold the person bound. Therefore we close off from them access to returning to the world and forbid every return to the secular life.

C. III. Aut propria professio, aut paterna deuotio monachum facit.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano IV. [c. 48.] Monachum aut paterna deuotio, aut propria professio facit. Quicquid horum fuerit, alligatum tenebit. Proinde his ad mundum reuertendi intercludimus aditum, et omnes ad seculum interdicimus regressus.

C. IV. Let those who were handed over by their parents remain perpetually in a monastery.

Likewise Isidore. Whoever shall have been assigned to a monastery by his own parents is to know that he will remain there perpetually. For in piety Anna offered to God her boy Samuel, born and weaned; he both remained in the ministry of the temple to which he had been assigned by his mother and served where he was placed.

[PALEA.

C. IV. In monasterio perpetuo maneant qui a parentibus traditi fuerint.

Item Ysidorus. Quicumque a parentibus propriis in monasterio fuerit delegatus, nouerit se ibi perpetuo mansurum. Nam Anna Samuel puerum suum natum et ablactatum Deo pietate obtulit, qui et in ministerio templi, quo a matre fuerat deputatus, permansit, et ubi constitutus est deseruiuit.

[PALEA.

C. V. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise from Gregory's Register, book I, letter 48, to Anthemius. But because the congregation of monks on islands is harsh, we forbid even boys to be received in those monasteries before the age of eighteen years; or if any are there now, let your Providence remove them and send them to the city of Rome. We will that you observe this in every respect both on Palmaria and on the other islands.]

C. V. De eodem.

Item ex Regesto Gregorii, libro I. epistola 48. ad Anthemium. Quia autem dura est in insulis congregatio monachorum, etiam pueros in eisdem monasteriis ante XVIII. annorum tempora suscipi prohibemus, uel si qui nunc sunt tua eos prouidentia auferat, et in urbem Romanam transmittat. Hoc et in Palmaria aliisque insulis te per omnia uolumus custodire.]

C. VI. One who was handed over to a monastery by his ancestors cannot depart from it.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur. One whom his ancestors handed over to a monastery and who began to sing and read in the church will be able neither to take a wife nor to leave the monastery; but if he shall have departed, let him be brought back; if he shall have let his tonsure grow out, let him be tonsured again; if he shall have taken a wife, let him be compelled to dismiss her.

[PALEA.

> C. VI. Qui a progenitoribus monasterio traditus est, de eo egredi non ualet.
> Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. Quem progenitores ad monasterium tradiderunt, et in ecclesia cepit canere et legere, nec uxorem ducere, nec monasterium deserere poterit: sed si discesserit, reducatur; si tonsuram dimiserit, rursum tondeatur; uxorem si usurpauerit, dimittere conpellatur.
> [PALEA.

C. VII. Likewise from Theodore's Penitential.

An infant can be given in a monastery for an infant, although the other was vowed. Nevertheless, it is better to discharge the vow. Similarly, livestock of equal price—if it is necessary—is to be redeemed.] PART II. GRATIAN. From these authorities it is gathered that a father's profession holds boys bound, and that they will not be permitted to depart from the purpose which they undertook in their childhood years through a father's devotion. But that statement of Pope Leo is objected, [letter XC to Bishop Rusticus, cc. 13 and 14]:

> C. VII. Item ex Penitenciali Theodori.
> Infans pro infante potest dari in monasterio, quamuis alter uocatus sit. Tamen melius est uotum soluere. Similiter et pecora equali precio (si necesse est) sunt redimenda.] II. Pars. Gratian. Ex his auctoritatibus colligitur, quod paterna professio pueros tenet obligatos, nec licebit eis a proposito discedere, quod paterna deuotione in puerilibus annis susceperint. Sed obicitur illud Leonis Papae: [epist. XC. ad Rusticum Episcopum, cap. 13. et 14.]

C. VIII. Girls who undertook the purpose of virginity by their spontaneous will are not permitted to choose marriage.

Girls who undertook the purpose and habit of virginity not when compelled by their parents' command but by spontaneous judgment, if they afterward choose marriage, transgress, even if consecration has not yet been added to them—a gift of which they would surely not be deprived if they remained in their purpose. But it cannot be doubted that a great crime is committed where both the purpose is abandoned and consecration is violated. For if human compacts cannot be trampled with impunity, what will remain for those who have corrupted the covenants of a divine sacrament? GRATIAN. Therefore, since at the beginning of this chapter it is said, "Girls who were not compelled by the command of their parents," it is given to be understood that if they assumed the habit of virginity when compelled, they can abandon it without transgression. But a girl of marriageable age is understood here, whose judgment, as is shown in what follows, is free after the twelfth year; nor in the choice of a purpose is she compelled to follow her parents' command. Thus also is to be understood what was established in the Synod held by Pope Eugene, [II, c. 32]:

C. VIII. Non licet puellis nuptias eligere, que spontanea uoluntate uirginitatis propositum susceperunt.

Puellae, que non coactae parentum inperio, sed spontaneo iudicio uirginitatis propositum atque habitum susceperint, si postea nuptias elegerint, preuaricantur, etiam si nondum eis consecratio accessit, cuius utique non fraudarentur munere, si in proposito permanerent. Ambigi uero non potest crimen magnum admitti, ubi et propositum deseritur, et consecratio uiolatur. Nam si humana facta non possunt inpune calcari quid de his manebit, qui corruperint federa diuini sacramenti? Gratian. Cum ergo in principio huius capituli dicatur: "Puellae, que non coactae inperio parentum," datur intelligi, quod si coactae uirginitatis habitum sumpserint, sine preuaricatione ipsum deserere possunt. Sed puella hic nubilis intelligitur, cuius (ut in sequentibus monstratur) post duodecimum annum liberum est arbitrium; nec in electione propositi cogitur sequi parentum inperium. Sic et illud intelligendum est, quod est statutum in Sinodo ab Eugenio Papa habita: [II. c. 32.]

C. IX. Let those confined in monasteries apart from their own will not be held there.

Just as those who chose monasteries are not permitted to depart from monasteries, so those who were admitted unwillingly without cause of a just offense are to be held only if they wish, because they observe what they do not seek. And therefore such persons are to be regarded as committing sins rather than lamenting them, as is contained most clearly in the decree of the most holy Pope Leo.

[PALEA.

C. IX. Extra uoluntatem propriam retrusi in monasteriis non teneantur.

Sicut qui monasteria elegerunt a monasteriis egredi non permittuntur, ita hii qui inuiti sine iustae offensionis causa sunt intromissi, non nisi uolentes teneantur, quia quod non petunt obseruant. Ideoque tales considerandi sunt maxime peccata conmittere quam plangere, sicut in decreto sanctissimi Leonis Papae manifestissime continetur.

[PALEA.

C. X. Hence Pope Marcellus.

But we judge that this is to be established: if sons shall have been offered to a monastery at a younger age and received the sacred tonsure or veils, we have indeed deemed it worthy that, after being admonished by the prelates in their fifteenth year, they be asked whether they desire to remain in that habit or not. But if they shall have professed that they wish to remain, they can by no means thereafter embrace a place for repentance. But if they wish to return to secular dress, permission to return is by no means to be denied, because it is sufficiently useless for compelled services to be furnished to the Lord.]

PART III. GRATIAN. But it is not lawful for the veil to be imposed upon virgins except on certain days. Hence Pope Gelasius to all the Bishops [throughout Lucania, cc. 14 and 15]:

C. X. Unde Marcellus Papa.

Illud autem statuendum esse censemus, ut, si in minori etate filii monasterio oblati fuerint, et sacram tonsuram uel uelamina susceperint, dignum quidem duximus, ut XV. anno a prelatis moniti inquirantur, utrum in ipso habitu permanere cupiant, an non? Si uero permanere professi fuerint, ulterius penitendi locum minime amplecti possunt. Sin autem ad secularem habitum reuerti uoluerint, redeundi licentia nullo modo denegetur, quia satis inutile est, ut coacta seruitia Domino prestentur.]

III. Pars. Gratian. Velamen autem uirginibus inponi non licet, nisi certis diebus. Unde Gelasius Papa omnibus Episcopis: [per Lucaniam, c. 14. et 15.]

C. XI. Let the veil be imposed upon virgins only on certain days.

Let the sacred veil by no means be imposed upon professed virgins except either on the day of Epiphany, during the Easter octave, or on the feasts of the Apostles; unless perhaps, as was said concerning baptism, they have been overtaken by grave illness, in which case it is not to be denied to those imploring it, lest they depart from the world without this gift. § 1. But let no pontiff attempt to veil widows. PART IV. GRATIAN. The time of their consecration is likewise to be observed. Hence Gregory in the Register, [book III, letter 11]:

C. XI. Non nisi certis diebus uelamen inponatur uirginibus.

Deuotis uirginibus, nisi aut in epiphaniorum die, aut in albis pascalibus, aut in apostolorum natalibus sacrum uelamen minime inponatur, nisi forsitan (sicut de baptismo dictum est) graui languore correptis ne autem sine hoc munere de seculo exeant, inplorantibus non negetur. §. 1. Viduas autem uelare pontificum nullus attemptet. IV. Pars. Gratian. Tempus quoque consecrationis earum similiter obseruetur. Unde Gregorius in Registro: [lib. III. ep. 11.]

C. XII. Let virgins not be consecrated before the sixtieth year of their age.

We most vehemently forbid young women to be made abbesses. Therefore let your fraternity permit no virgin to be veiled unless she is sixty years old and her life and morals require this.

C. XII. Ante sexagesimum etatis suae annum uirgines non consecrentur.

Iuuenculas fieri abbatissas uehementissime prohibemus. Nullam igitur fraternitas tua nisi sexagenariam uirginem, cuius uita atque mores hoc exegerint, uelare permittat.

[C. XIII.]

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage. Let nuns not be veiled before the fortieth year.

[C. XIII.]

Item ex concilio Cartaginensi III. Sanctimoniales ante annum quadragesimum non uelentur.

C. XIV. Let virgins not be consecrated before the twenty-fifth year.

Likewise from the Third African Council, [c. 4]. It pleased us that neither deacons be ordained nor virgins consecrated before twenty-five years of age, and that readers not salute the people.

[PALEA.

C. XIV. Ante uigesimum quintum annum uirgines non consecrentur.

Item ex Concilio Affricano III. [c. 4.] Placuit ut ante XXV. annos etatis nec diacones ordinentur, nec uirgines consecrentur, et ut lectores populum non salutent.

[PALEA.

C. XV. Likewise Pope Pius.

Let virgins not be veiled before twenty-five years, unless perhaps because of the necessity of virgin chastity being endangered; and they are not to be consecrated except on Epiphany, Holy Saturday, and the feasts of the Apostles, unless the cause of death is urgent.] PART V. GRATIAN. But although widows are forbidden to be veiled, nevertheless a profession of widowhood is to be made by them in writing. A garment fitting their profession is also to be handed to them, which they are to use everywhere.

Hence in the Tenth Council of Toledo, [c. 4]:

> C. XV. Item Pius Papa.
> Virgines non uelentur ante XXV. annos, nisi forte necessitate periclitantis pudicitiae uirginalis, et non sunt consecrandae nisi in epiphania, et in sabbato pascae, et in apostolorum natalitiis, nisi causa mortis urgente.] V. Pars. Gratian. Quamuis autem uiduae prohibeantur uelari, uiduitatis tamen professio in scriptis ab eis est facienda. Vestis quoque professioni conueniens est eis tradenda, qua ubique utantur.
> Unde in Concilio Tolletano X.: [c. 4.]

C. XVI. Let those who purpose to preserve chastity make a profession of widowhood and assume the habit of religion.

A widow who wishes to obtain the purpose of holy religion is to make a profession in writing to the priest or minister to whom she herself shall have come, or who happens to come to her, marked by her either with a sign or a signature, containing that she both wills the purpose of religion and will preserve it perpetually inviolate. Then, having received from the priest or minister a garment suitable for the profession of religion, whether resting upon a bed or remaining in any place, let her use it constantly; and let this garment not be notable for diverse color or diverse part, but religious and not suspect.

> Vidua, que sanctae religionis obtinere propositum uoluerit, sacerdoti uel ministro, ad quem aut ipsa uenerit, aut quem ad se uenire contigerit, scriptis professionem faciat a se aut signo, aut subscriptione notatam, continentem, se et religionis propositum uelle, et hoc perhenniter inuiolate seruare. Tunc accepta a sacerdote uel ministro apta religionis professioni ueste, seu lectulo quiescens siue in quocumque loco consistens, constanter utatur, nec diuersi coloris aut diuersae partis eadem sit notabilis uestis, sed religiosa et non suspecta.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. Concerning those who have received the tonsure or religious garment apart from their parents' will, it is defined thus in the Tenth Council of Toledo, [c. 6]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. De his uero, qui preter uoluntatem parentum tonsuram, uel religiosam uestem susceperint, sic diffinitur in concilio X. Tolletano: [c. 6.]

C. I. A tonsure or religious garment received at a younger age can be rendered void by the parents.

If at any younger age either one parent or both shall perhaps have given their children of either sex the tonsure of religion or the garment owed to religion; or if, when the children assumed it while the parents were unwilling or unaware, the parents did not repudiate it immediately upon seeing it, but either before themselves or before the bishop and openly in an assembly permitted those children to have such things, the children themselves will thereafter never be permitted to return to secular dress; but, when they are convicted of having at any time had the tonsure or religious garment, let them immediately be recalled to the worship and habit of religion and compelled to serve under the strenuous strictness of this observance. § 1. Permission for parents to hand their children over to religion can indeed extend no further than the tenth year of their age; but afterward, whether with the will of the parents or if it is the individual vow of their own devotion, it will be lawful for the children to assume the worship of religion. § 2. But whoever shall be discovered to have reached transgression either by effacing the tonsure or by assuming secular dress is both to receive the censure of excommunication and always to adhere to religion.

> C. I. Tonsura uel uestis religiosa in minori etate suscepta a parentibus irrita fieri potest.
> Si in qualibet minori etate uel religionis tonsuram uel religioni debitam uestem, in utroque sexu filiis aut unus aut ambo parentes dederint forte, aut nolentibus uel nescientibus se susceptam non mox uisam in filiis abdicauerint, sed uel coram se, uel coram episcopo, palamque in conuentu eosdem filios talia habere permiserint, ad secularem reuerti habitum ipsis filiis quandoque penitus non licebit, sed conuicti, quod tonsuram aut religiosam uestem aliquando habuerint, mox ad religionis cultum habitumque reuocentur, et sub strenua districtione huiusce obseruantiae inseruire cogantur. §. 1. Parentibus sane filios suos religioni contradere non amplius quam usque ad decimum etatis eorum annum licentia poterit esse; postea uero, an cum uoluntate parentum, an si suae deuotionis sit solitarium uotum, erit filiis licitum religionis assumere cultum. §. 2. Quisquis autem uel abolitione tonsurae, uel secularis uestis assumptione detectus fuerit attigisse transgressionem, et excommunicationis censuram accipiat, et religioni semper inhereat.

C. II. Until the age of twelve, let a girl be subject to the judgment of her father's will.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur, [c. 24]. If before twelve years of age a girl of her own accord shall have assumed the sacred veil for herself, her parents or guardians can immediately render that deed void if they wish. But if by dissembling for a year and a day they shall have consented, neither they nor she will afterward be able to change it. § 1. But if at a more mature age a young woman or young man shall have chosen to serve God, the parents have no power to prohibit it. PART II. GRATIAN. But no nun is permitted to impose the veil upon another. Hence Pope Eutychian says:

> C. II. Usque ad annos XII. paternae uoluntatis puella subiaceat arbitrio.
> Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. [c. 24.] Puella, si ante XII. etatis annos sponte sua sacrum sibi assumpserit uelamen, possunt statim parentes eius uel tutores id factum irritum facere, si uoluerint. At si annum et diem dissimulando consenserint, ulterius nec ipsi, nec ipsa mutare poterunt. §. 1. Si uero in fortiori etate adolescentula uel adolescens seruire Deo elegerint, non est potestas parentibus prohibendi. II. Pars. Gratian. Velamen autem nulli sanctimonialium alteri inponere licet. Unde Eutycianus Papa ait:

[C. III.]

We establish that if an abbess or any nun after this definition shall have burst forth into such audacity that she presumes to veil either a widow or a virgin girl, let her be subjected to canonical judgment until satisfaction. PART III. GRATIAN. By this authority it is taught that anyone in the years of childhood is bound by the aforesaid profession and that he is held by the purpose undertaken apart from his own will, unless the parents immediately repudiated the tonsure or religious garment upon seeing it. But when little children are offered, they are to be received only under the testimony of many. Hence it is read in the Ninth Synod:

> Statuimus, ut si abbatissa aut quelibet sanctimonialis post hanc diffinitionem in tantam audaciam proruperit, ut aut uiduam, aut puellam uirginem uelare presumat iudicio canonico usque ad satisfactionem subdatur. III. Pars. Gratian. Hac auctoritate predicta et paterna professione docetur astringi quilibet in puerilibus annis, et preter uoluntatem eorum proposito suscepto perhibetur teneri, nisi tonsuram uel religiosam uestem parentes mox uisam abdicauerint. Paruuli uero, dum offeruntur, nonnisi sub multorum testimonio suscipiendi sunt. Unde in nona Sinodo legitur:

C. IV. Let infants offered by their parents be received under the testimony of many.

Infants offered with the will and consent of their parents—indeed, by the parents themselves—ought to be received under the testimony of many, so that every occasion for slander by the worst of men may be excluded.

> C. IV. Infantes oblati a parentibus sub plurimorum testimonio suscipiantur.
> Oportet infantes cum uoluntate et consensu parentum, imo ab ipsis parentibus oblatos, sub testimonio plurimorum suscipi, ut omnis occasio maledicti gratia excludatur hominum pessimorum.

Question III

GRATIAN. PART I. But that one who unwillingly undertook the purpose of religion is not to be compelled to observe a purpose undertaken unwillingly is testified by Pope Leo, [letter XC, otherwise XCII, to Bishop Rusticus, c. 12], saying:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem qui inuitus propositum religionis susceperit non sit cogendus ad inuiti propositi obseruationem, testatur Leo Papa, [epist. XC. aliter XCII. ad Rusticum Episcopum, c. 12.] dicens:

C. I. The purpose of a monk undertaken voluntarily cannot be abandoned.

The purpose of a monk undertaken by one's own judgment and will cannot be abandoned without sin. For what anyone vows to God he also ought to render. Hence one who, after abandoning the profession of the solitary life, has fallen away to military service or marriage is to be purified by the satisfaction of public penance; for although military service may be innocent and marriage honorable, nevertheless to have abandoned the choice of better things is a transgression.

> C. I. Non potest deseri propositum monachi sponte susceptum.
> Propositum monachi proprio arbitrio et uoluntate susceptum deseri non potest absque peccato. Quod enim quis uouet Deo debet et reddere. Unde qui relicta singularitatis professione ad miliciam uel ad nuptias deuolutus est, publicae penitenciae satisfactione purgandus est, quia, etsi innocens milicia, et honestum potest esse coniugium, electionem tamen meliorum deseruisse transgressio est.

C. II. One who wishes to abandon a religious habit undertaken voluntarily is to be compelled to return to it.

Likewise from the Seventh Council of Toledo, [c. 6]. The course toward pleasure is ready, and nature is an imitator of vices. Therefore, whichever man or woman shall once have voluntarily put on the religious habit—or if a man shall have been dedicated to a church or a woman assigned to a monastery of girls—let the transgressor of either sex be compelled to return unwillingly, so that the man is tonsured and the girl returns to the monastery. But if through any patronage the deserters wish to remain such, let them by priestly sentence be held banished from the company of Christians, so that there may be no place of communion for them. § 1. Let widows also who desert their profession or habit be condemned by the preceding sentence, just as the universal synod established long ago.

C. II. Qui religiosum habitum sponte susceptum deserere uoluerit ad ipsum redire cogatur.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano VII. [c. 6.] Procliuis autem cursus est ad uoluptatem et imitatrix natura uiciorum. Quamobrem quisquis uirorum uel mulierum habitum semel induerit spontanee religiosum, aut si uir deditus ecclesiae, uel femina fuerit delegata puellarum monasterio, in utroque sexu preuaricator inuitus reuerti cogatur, ut uir detondeatur, et puella ad monasterium regrediatur. Si autem quolibet patrocinio desertores permanere uoluerint, sacerdotali sententia a Christianorum cetu habeantur extorres, ut nec locus eis ullus sit conmunionis. §. 1. Viduae quoque (sicut iam dudum uniuersalis statuit sinodus) professionum uel habitus sui desertrices superiori sententia condempnentur.

C. III. Those once enrolled in the clergy or assigned to monasteries are not to return to military service.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 7]. We have decreed that those who have once been enrolled in the clergy or assigned to a monastery are to come neither to military service nor to secular honors. But those who shall have dared to do this and shall have preferred not to repent of the matter by returning to that very thing which they previously purposed for themselves under the pretext of God ought to be anathematized. PART II. GRATIAN. When it is said, "the purpose of a monk undertaken by his own judgment and will," it is understood that if it was not undertaken by his own will, he is not compelled to observe it. Hence Pope Nicholas writes to all the Bishops in the Kingdom of Louis:

C. III. Semel in clero taxati, uel monasteriis deputati, ad miliciam non redeant.

Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 7.] Eos, qui semel in clero taxati fuerint, siue in monasterio deputati, decreuimus neque ad miliciam, neque ad honores seculares uenire. Eos autem, qui hoc ausi fuerint facere, et non eius rei penitere maluerint, ut ad hoc idem reuertantur, quod ante obtentu Dei sibi proposuerunt, conuenit anathematizari. II. Pars. Gratian. Cum dicitur, propositum monachi proprio arbitrio et uoluntate susceptum, intelligitur, quod si propria uoluntate susceptum non fuerit, obseruari non cogitur. Unde Nycolaus Papa scribit omnibus Episcopis in Regno Lodoici:

C. IV. Let no one be subjected unwillingly to monastic disciplines.

The present cleric, named Lambert, together with his father named Atto, formerly indeed a count but now a cleric, hastening to the thresholds of the Apostles, approached our presence, asserting how that father of his, while still in the lay order, had built two monasteries on his own estates, having the will that after his death his present son Lambert should succeed him in his place. When Lambert was still at a tender age between his eighth and tenth year, the aforesaid father by his own judgment, without an institution according to the rule and entirely against Lambert's will, put the cowl upon him. Then, after a certain interval of time—as he himself says—Bishop Solomon, together with certain others, without an offering by the father or a blessing received from an abbot, caused the same Lambert to be clothed in the monastic habit, unwillingly, as they report; and on this occasion he was deprived by his brothers of his paternal and maternal inheritance, and his father wished him, contrary to his entire will, as was said, to remain as though a monk under the rule. Investigating this matter with diligent care, we questioned his father under adjuration whether he spoke the truth. But that cleric Atto answered that he had had and still had such a will: that his son should become a true monk and succeed him in his place. Moreover, under attestation he affirmed by oath that when he first put the cowl upon him, that Lambert always resisted and never consented to become a monk; but at length he was afterward violently clothed in the monastic habit, asserting: "Because he never at any time promised the rule, nor did I, his father, offer him clothed in the altar cloth, nor, after receiving a blessing from any priest or abbot, as custom requires, did he ever promise that as a monk he would be subject to the rule." Concerning all these things the aforesaid cleric Atto testified that if at that time he had understood the monastic rule to be of such harsh observance, he would never have compelled his son Lambert to bear the cowl. § 1. Therefore, prudently recalling the words of the Psalmist by which he declares that he sacrifices himself to God voluntarily and prays that the voluntary offerings of his mouth be pleasing in God's sight, we judged that the present cleric named Lambert, as was said, ought by no means to be made a monk under such violence. For what a person does not choose or desire, he certainly does not love; but what he does not love, he easily despises. Therefore no good is good unless voluntary. For this reason the Lord also commanded that a staff, through which violence might be inflicted upon anyone, is not to be carried on the way. Therefore it is done more prudently if, by preaching contempt for the world and love of God through pious persuasions rather than by inflicting violence, you kindle him toward heavenly love. Hence we have decreed that this letter of our apostolate is to be committed to the charity of you all, admonishing and commanding that—if the truth is as these men say—no bishop, abbot, or assembly of the other monks compel him unwillingly to be subject to monastic rules; nor may his brothers on this occasion have license in any way to deprive him of his paternal or maternal inheritance. But until, pierced by divine inspiration, he subjects himself to the rule by his own will, let it be lawful for him, removed from worldly and lay wanderings or business, to live the canonical life among religious and ecclesiastical men. For we do not think—which may it not be—that religious canons are separated from the fellowship of holy monks, because each person, according to the Apostle, will receive his own reward according to his labor. PART III. GRATIAN. But if any persons, enticed by the promises of a bishop or abbot, shall have received the tonsure or religious garment, let them indeed remain in what they began, but let their property be restored to their heirs. Hence it is read in the Council of Mainz:

> C. IV. Monasterialibus disciplinis nullus subiciatur inuitus.

Presens clericus, nomine Lambertus, una cum patre suo, nomine Atto, quondam uidelicet comite, nunc autem clerico, ad limina apostolorum properans adiit presentiam nostram, asserens qualiter idem pater eius in laicali adhuc ordine in prediis propriis edificasset duo monasteria, uoluntatem gerens, ut post suum decessum presens eius filius Lambertus in locum ei succederet, quem, infra teneram etatem inter octauum et decimum annum constitutum, memoratus pater proprio arbitrio absque regulari institutione extra omnem illius uoluntatem cucullam induit. Igitur post quoddam ipsius temporis spacium (ut ipse dicit) Salomon episcopus cum quibusdam aliis absque patris oblatione uel abbatis percepta benedictione eundem Lambertum monastico induere fecit habitu (ut ferunt) inuitum, et sub hac occasione paterna seu materna hereditate a fratribus suis priuatum esse, atque contra omnem (ut dictum est) uoluntatem suam quasi regularem illum monachum permanere uoluit. Super qua re diligenti cura inuestigantes, etiam sub adiuratione patrem ipsius, si uerum diceret, interrogauimus; sed idem clericus Atto respondit, se talem habuisse et habere uoluntatem, ut filius suus uerus fieret monachus, et in locum ei succederet. Sub testificatione autem iurando firmauit, quod, quando primitus ei cucullam induit, idem Lambertus semper restitit, et numquam se fieri monachum consensit; sed demum ab insequentibus monachico est habitu uiolenter indutus, asserens, quia numquam regulam aliquando promisit, neque ego, pater eius, palla altaris indutum illum obtuli, neque a quocumque sacerdote uel abbate (ut mos poscit) benedictione percepta regulae umquam se monachum subiectum futurum promisit. Super his omnibus protestatus est prefatus clericus Atto, quia si eo tempore tam durae obseruantiae monasticam intellexisset regulam, numquam eundem filium suum Lambertum coegisset portare cucullam. §. 1. Quapropter consulte psalmographi uerba recolentes, quibus uoluntarie se Deo sacrificare pronunciat, et uoluntaria oris sui beneplacita fieri in conspectu Dei obsecrat, presentem, ut dictum est, clericum nomine Lambertum minime debere existimauimus sub tali uiolentia fieri monachum. Quod enim quis non elegit, nec optat, profecto non diligit; quod autem non diligit facile contempnit. Nullum ergo bonum nisi uoluntarium. Idcirco et Dominus non ferendam in uia uirgam, per quam uiolentia ulli inferatur, precepit. Quapropter consultius agitur, si piis suasionibus contemptum mundi et amorem Dei predicando, quam uiolentiam inferendo ad celestem amorem illum accenderitis. Unde omnium uestrum karitati hanc nostri apostolatus mandare decreuimus epistolam, monentes atque precipientes, quatinus (si ita uerum est, ut isti dicunt) nullus episcopus uel abbas, seu monachorum reliquorum conuentus, monasticis regulis inuitum illum subiacere conpellat; neque ullo modo fratres eius per hanc occasionem licentiam habeant paterna seu materna illum hereditate priuare; sed usque dum diuina inspiratione conpunctus propria uoluntate regulae se subdat, liceat eum a mundanis et laicalibus remotum uagationibus uel negociis inter religiosos et ecclesiasticos uiros in canonica degere uita. Non enim putamus (quod absit) religiosos canonicos a sanctorum monachorum consortio seiunctos, quia unusquisque secundum Apostolum propriam mercedem accipiet secundum suum laborem. III. Pars. Gratian. Si uero episcopi uel abbatis promissionibus illecti aliqui tonsuram uel religionis uestem susceperint, ipsi quidem in eo, quod ceperunt, permaneant, res uero eorum heredibus suis restituantur. Unde in Maguntiensi Concilio legitur:

C. V. Let the property of those who, deceived by bishops or abbots, laid aside their hair be restored to their heirs.

This sacred assembly indeed established that bishops or abbots who, intent not upon the fruit of souls but upon avarice and shameful gain, tonsured any persons by deceiving them and took away their property by such persuasion are to be subjected to canonical penance as followers of shameful gain. But let those who, having been enticed, laid aside their hair be compelled to persevere in what they began, and let their property be restored to their heirs.

C. V. Restituantur heredibus res eorum, qui ab episcopis uel abbatibus decepti comas deposuerunt.

Constituit sane sacer iste conuentus, ut episcopi siue abbates, qui non in fructum animarum, sed in auariciam et turpe lucrum inhiantes, quoslibet homines circumueniendo totonderunt, et res eorum tali persuasione subripuerunt, penitenciae canonicae utpote turpis lucri sectatores subiaceant. Hii uero, qui illecti comam deposuerunt, in eo, quod ceperunt, perseuerare cogantur, res uero eorum heredibus reddantur.

Question IV

GRATIAN. PART I. But that monks are free to pass from one monastery to another that is stricter is held from the Council of Tribur, in which it was established thus:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod uero ab uno monasterio in aliud districtius transire monachis liberum sit, ex Concilio Triburiensi habetur, in quo sic statutum est:

C. I. Sacred virgins who desire to go to another monastery for the sake of religion are not to be prohibited.

If sacred virgins shall have resolved to proceed to another monastery for the profit of their souls because of a stricter life, and shall have decreed to remain there, the synod concedes it. But if they shall have sought another place in flight from discipline, let them be compelled to return. GRATIAN. But what is established in this chapter concerning sacred virgins is also understood consequently concerning monks, and even concerning any cleric. PART II. § 1. But that statement of Basil is objected:

C. I. Non sunt prohibendae uirgines sacrae, que causa religionis aliud monasterium adire desiderant.

Virgines sacrae si pro lucro animae suae propter districtiorem uitam ad aliud monasterium pergere disposuerint, ibidemque conmanere decreuerint, sinodus concedit. Si uero fuga disciplinae alium locum quesierint, redire cogantur. Gratian. Quod autem de uirginibus sacris hoc capitulo statuitur de monachis etiam consequenter intelligitur, de quolibet etiam clerico. II. Pars. §. 1. Sed obicitur illud Basilii:

C. II. The vows of a monk made without the consent of his abbot are void.

A monk is not permitted to vow a vow without the consent of his abbot; but if he shall have vowed it, it will have to be broken. Likewise that statement of the Council of Agde, [c. 27]:

C. II. Vota monachi sine consensu abbatis sui irrita sunt.

Monacho non licet uotum uouere sine consensu abbatis sui; si autem uouerit, frangendum erit. Item illud Agatensis Concilii: [c. 27.]

C. III. Let no one receive or ordain a monk without his abbot's permission.

Let no abbot presume to receive or retain a monk migrating to another monastery except by the permission or will of his abbot; but wherever he shall have been found, let him be recalled to his abbot by the authority of the canons. § 1. Likewise: Let clerics without commendatory letters from their bishop have no license to wander. Let the form of the present sentence also be observed concerning monks; if a rebuke of words shall not have corrected them, we establish that they are to be restrained even by beatings. § 2. This also is to be observed concerning monks: that it is not to be lawful for them to depart from the congregation for solitary cells, unless perhaps, after their labors have been proved and completed, or because of the necessity of illness, the abbot's harsher rule is relaxed. This is then to be done in such a way that, while remaining within the enclosures of the same monastery and nevertheless under the abbot's power, they are permitted to have separate cells. Likewise, let an abbot not be permitted to have individual separate cells or several monasteries, except only to place places of refuge within walls because of an enemy incursion.

GRATIAN. But this is to be understood concerning monks living religiously, who are not permitted without the abbot's consent to vow vows of special abstinence or of some strictness exceeding the general custom of their brothers, lest the brothers be scandalized over them. This was also established because of those who, evading discipline according to the rule, assume vows of pilgrimage for themselves, which is permitted neither to a monk nor to any cleric, lest on this occasion he return to secular conduct.

> C. III. Monachum nullus suscipiat aut ordinet absque abbatis sui permissu.
> Monachum, nisi aut permissu abbatis sui aut uoluntate ad alterum monasterium conmigrantem, nullus abbas suscipere aut retinere presumat; sed ubicumque fuerit, abbati suo auctoritate canonum reuocetur. §. 1. Item: Clericis sine conmendaticiis epistolis episcopi sui licentia non pateat euagandi. In monachis quoque presentis sententiae forma seruetur, quos si uerborum increpatio non emendauerit, etiam uerberibus statuimus coherceri. §. 2. Seruandum quoque de monachis, ne eis ad solitarias cellulas liceat a congregatione discedere, nisi forte probatis post emeritos labores, aut propter infirmitatis necessitatem asperior abbatis regula remittatur. Quod ita demum fiet, ut intra eadem monasterii septa manentes, tamen sub abbatis potestate, separatas habere cellulas permittantur. Abbati quoque singulas diuersas cellulas aut plura monasteria habere non liceat, nisi tantum propter incursum hostilitatis intra muros receptacula collocare.
> Gratian. Verum hoc intelligendum est de monachis religiose uiuentibus, quibus uota specialis abstinentiae uel alicuius districtionis, que generalem consuetudinem suorum fratrum excedat, sine abbatis consensu uouere non licet, ne super eos fratres scandalizentur. Causa etiam illorum statutum est hoc, qui regularem disciplinam subterfugientes peregrinationis uota sibi assumunt, quod nec monacho, nec alicui clerico licet, ne hac occasione ad secularem conuersationem redeat.

Causa XXI

GRATIAN. The archpriest of a certain church accepted the provostship of another and is unwilling to relinquish the former; he also becomes an agent for secular business. Adorning himself in bright and shining garments, he is corrected by his bishop; after abandoning his office, he has recourse to a secular judge. (Question I.) It is asked whether a cleric can be enrolled in two churches. (Question II.) Second, if he wishes to relinquish one, whether it is lawful for him to pass to the other. (Question III.) Third, whether clerics are permitted to undertake agencies for secular business. (Question IV.) Fourth, whether it is expedient for them to be adorned with bright and shining garments. (Question V.) Fifth, whether, when corrected by the bishop, they are able to abandon their office and have recourse to a secular judge.

GRATIANUS. Archipresbiter cuiusdam ecclesiae preposituram alterius accepit, nec priorem uult relinquere; secularium quoque negociorum procurator efficitur; claris et fulgidis uestibus se exornans ab episcopo suo corrigitur; relicto suo offitio ad secularem iudicem habet confugium. (Qu. I.) Queritur, an clericus in duabus ecclesiis possit conscribi? (Qu. II.) Secundo, si unam uoluerit relinquere, an liceat ei ad aliam transire? (Qu. III.) Tertio, an procurationes secularium negociorum clericis liceat suscipere? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, an claris et fulgidis uestibus eis ornari expediat? (Qu. V.) Quinto, an ab episcopo correpti suum offitium relinquere, et ad secularem iudicem confugere ualeant?

Question I

GRATIAN. The Seventh Synod forbids anyone to be numbered in two churches, saying, [c. 15]:

GRATIANUS. In duabus ecclesiis aliquem posse connumerari, septima Sinodus prohibet, dicens: [c. 15.]

C. I. A cleric ought not to be enrolled in two churches.

From the present time let no cleric be numbered in two churches. For this is a convenience of commerce and shameful gain and altogether alien to ecclesiastical custom. For we have heard from the Lord's own voice that no one can serve two masters. For either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will sustain the one and despise the other. For each person, according to the apostolic voice, ought to remain in that in which he was called and to be placed in one church. For things done for shameful gain in ecclesiastical affairs remain alien to God; but for the necessity of this life there are diverse pursuits. Therefore, from these let him who wishes acquire the things opportune for the body. For the Apostle says: "For those things which were necessary to me and to those who are with me, these hands ministered." And these things indeed are to be observed in this city. But in villages which are outside, an indulgence is to be granted because of a scarcity of men. GRATIAN. But two churches are understood to mean churches of two cities, in which no one ought to be enrolled.

Hence it was established in the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 10]:

C. I. In duabus ecclesiis clericus conscribi non debet.

Clericus ab instanti tempore non connumeretur in duabus ecclesiis. Negotiacionis enim est hoc et turpis lucri commodum, et ab ecclesiastica consuetudine penitus alienum. Audiuimus enim ex ipsa dominica uoce, quod nemo potest duobus dominis seruire. Aut enim unum odio habebit, et alterum diliget: aut unum sustinebit, et alterum contempnet. Unusquisque enim secundum apostolicam uocem in quo uocatus est, in hoc debet manere, et in una locari ecclesia. Que enim per turpe lucrum in ecclesiasticis rebus efficiuntur aliena consistunt a Deo; ad uitae uero huius necessitatem studia diuersa sunt. Ex eis ergo, qui uoluerit, acquirat corpori opportuna. Ait enim Apostolus: "Ad ea, que michi opus erant, et his qui mecum sunt, ministrauerunt manus istae." Et hec quidem in hac seruanda urbe. Ceterum in uillis, que foris sunt, propter inopiam hominum indulgeatur. Gratian. Sed duae ecclesiae intelliguntur ecclesiae duarum ciuitatum, in quibus nullus debet conscribi.

Unde in Calcedonensi Concilio [c. 10.] statutum est:

[C. II.]

"Clerics ought not to be enrolled in the churches of two cities." [GRATIAN.] But to the contrary, sometimes the bishop of one city becomes the archbishop of another city and nevertheless does not abandon the former church; rather, the first church is left as though commended to him, while the second is held as though assigned to him by title. Hence Leo IV writes:

[C. II.]

"Clericos in duarum ciuitatum ecclesiis conscribi non oportet." [Gratian.] Sed econtra nonnumquam episcopus unius ciuitatis efficitur archiepiscopus alterius ciuitatis, nec tamen priorem ecclesiam deserit: sed prior ecclesia quasi conmendata relinquitur, secunda quasi titulata habetur. Unde Leo IV. scribit:

C. III. One who is given a title in one church can have another commended to him.

One who retains several churches ought to hold one by title but the other under commendation. Thus also is that statement of the Council of Agde, [c. 57], to be understood:

C. III. In una ecclesia titulatus alteram sibi commendatam potest habere.

Qui plures ecclesias retinet, unam quidem titulatam, aliam uero sub conmendatione tenere debet. Sic et illud Agatensis Concilii [cap. 57.] intelligendum est:

C. IV. One abbot cannot preside over two monasteries.

We forbid one abbot to preside over two monasteries. GRATIAN. He can also preside over both as though holding them by title, but by special right, not common right. Hence Gregory, [book II, letter 13, to Bishop Agnellus]:

C. IV. Duobus monasteriis unus abbas preesse non potest.

Unum abbatem duobus monasteriis presidere interdicimus. Gratian. Potest etiam utrique tamquam titulato preesse, sed iure speciali, non communi. Unde Gregorius: [lib. II. epist. 13. ad Agnellum Episcopum]

C. V. One bishop is placed over two churches.

The report of the clergy and the people dwelling at Terracina greatly gladdens us because it offers good testimony concerning your fraternity. And because, after their pontiff Peter died, they request that you be appointed their cardinal bishop, we have foreseen that their desires necessarily are to be fulfilled. § 1. Therefore hasten with the whole intention of your mind so to make a gain of souls for our Lord that a worthy reward may find you before His sight on the day of recompense. But whatever you shall have foreseen is to be ordered and done carefully and canonically concerning the property of the aforesaid church or its patrimony, the ordination or promotion of the clergy, and generally everything pertaining to it, you will have entirely free power, indeed as its own bishop.

C. V. Unus episcopus duabus preficitur ecclesiis.

Relatio cleri simul et populi Terracinae degentis nos ualde letificat, ob hoc, quod de tua fraternitate bona testatur. Et quia defuncto pontifice suo Petro sibi cardinalem postulant te constitui sacerdotem, eorum desideria necessario conplenda preuidimus. §. 1. Tota igitur mentis intentione ita lucrum animarum Domino nostro facere festinato, ut digna te merces ante eius conspectum in die retributionis inueniat. Quicquid uero de predictae rebus ecclesiae uel eius patrimonio, seu cleri ordinatione promotioneue, et omnibus generaliter ad eam pertinentibus sollerter atque canonice ordinare facereque prouideris, liberam habebis, quippe ut sacerdos proprius, modis omnibus facultatem.

[C. VI.]

It is also necessary for your fraternity to know that we have appointed you cardinal bishop of the aforesaid church of Terracina in such a way that you do not cease to be pontiff of the church of Fondi or neglect its care and governance, because we enjoin upon your fraternity the care of the often-mentioned church of Terracina in such a way that we by no means withdraw from you the rights or power of the church of Fondi. GRATIAN. For he cannot preside over both as though holding them by title, but he can preside over one as though commended to him and over the other as though held by title.

> Illud quoque fraternitatem tuam scire necesse est, quoniam sic te predictae Terracinensis ecclesiae cardinalem esse constituimus sacerdotem, ut et Fundensis ecclesiae pontifex esse non desinas, nec curam gubernationemque eius pretereas, quia ita fraternitati tuae sepe dictae Terracinensis ecclesiae curam iniungimus ut Fundensis ecclesiae tibi iura potestatemue nullo modo subtrahamus. Gratian. Non enim potest utrique presidere tamquam titulatae, sed uni tamquam conmendatae, alteri uero tamquam titulatae preesse ualet.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. But one who wishes to pass to another church after leaving his own is by no means to be received without dismissory letters from his bishop. Hence it is read in the Seventh Synod, [c. 17]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Qui uero relicta sua ecclesia ad aliam transire uoluerit nequaquam sine dimissoriis litteris sui episcopi suscipiatur. Unde in septima Sinodo [c. 17.] legitur:

C. I. Let no cleric be ordained in another's church without dismissory letters.

Because clerics of diverse churches, leaving their own churches in which they were ordained, run to other bishops and, without their own bishop's knowledge, are established in other churches, where it happens that they remain without examination of themselves, we command from now on that absolutely no cleric, in whatever grade he may be, have license to be established in another church without dismissory letters from his bishop. But whoever shall not observe this from now on is to be deposed, to the reproach of the one who ordained him—both he himself and the one who received him without reason.

> C. I. Sine dimissoriis litteris in aliena ecclesia clericus non ordinetur.
> Quoniam diuersarum ecclesiarum clerici suas, in quibus ordinati sunt, ecclesias relinquentes, ad alios concurrunt episcopos, et ignorante proprio episcopo in alienis constituuntur ecclesiis, ubi contingit eos sine sui examinatione permanere, precipimus amodo, ut nullus omnino clericorum, in quocumque gradu sit, licentiam habeat sine dimissoriis litteris sui episcopi in altera constitui ecclesia. Qui uero hoc amodo non obseruauerit, ad obprobrium eius, qui ordinauerit eum, deponatur tam ipse, quam qui eum sine ratione suscepit.

C. II. A cleric is not permitted to pass to another church if his own has been left destitute of its ministers.

Likewise from the Second Council of Seville, [c. 3]. It pleased us that if any cleric, when his own church has been left destitute of ministers, shall have made passage to another, he is to return to the church which he previously inhabited when compelled by the bishop to whom he fled. But let the one who received him and did not choose immediately, without any effort at objection, to send him back to his own church know that he is deprived of communion until he restores him. Moreover, it is fitting that a deserting cleric, stripped of the belt of his honor and order, be bound for a time to a monastery and then afterward recalled to the ministry of the ecclesiastical order. For license to wander about in such persons will not be able to be abolished unless correction shall have followed in them through the correction of discipline. GRATIAN. But that statement of the Council of Chalcedon is objected, [c. 10]:

> C. II. Ad aliam ecclesiam clerico transire non licet, si propriis ministris sua fuerit destituta.
> Item ex Concilio Spalensi. [II. c. 3.] Placuit, ut si quis clericus ministris ecclesiae propriae destitutis ad aliam transitum fecerit, conpellente, ad quem confugerit, sacerdote, ad ecclesiam, quam prius incoluerat, reuertatur. Qui uero eum susceperit, nec statim sine ullo nisu exceptionis ad propriam ecclesiam remittendum elegerit, quamdiu eum restituat, communione se priuatum cognoscat. Desertorem autem clericum cingulo honoris atque ordinis sui exutum aliquo tempore monasterio religari conuenit, sicque postea in ministerio ecclesiastici ordinis reuocari. Nam non poterit in talibus peruagationis aboleri licentia, nisi fuerit in eis per correctionem disciplinae subsecuta correctio. Gratian. Obicitur autem illud Calcedonensis Concilii: [c. 10.]

C. III. Let one who is transferred from one church to another have nothing in common with the former.

PART II. If anyone has already been transferred from one church to another, let him have nothing in common with the former, whether with the shrines of martyrs established under the church, poorhouses, hospices, or their affairs. But those who shall have dared after the ordinance of this great and universal synod to do the things which are prohibited, the holy synod established are to fall from their own grade. GRATIAN. But it is one thing to be transferred, and another to pass by one's own rashness. The former may be done by apostolic authority, but the latter is forbidden in every way. PART III. § 1. But just as one person ought not to be placed over two churches, so one church cannot be divided among several persons. Hence it is read in the Council of Reims:

> II. Pars. Si quis iam translatus est ab una ecclesia in aliam, nichil habeat commune cum priori siue sub ecclesia constitutis martiribus, siue in ptochiis, uel xenodochiis, aut eorum negociis. Eos uero, qui ausi fuerint post ordinationem huius magnae et uniuersalis sinodi agere que prohibita sunt statuit sancta sinodus cadere de proprio gradu. Gratian. Sed aliud est transferri, atque aliud propria temeritate transire. Illud apostolica auctoritate fieri licet, hoc uero omnibus modis prohibetur. III. Pars. §. 1. Sicut autem duabus ecclesiis unus preponi non debet, ita nec una ecclesia inter plures diuidi ualet. Unde in Remensi Concilio legitur:

C. IV. One church cannot be divided between two priests.

Just as there ought to be one priest in each church, so that church, which is called his bride or wife, cannot be divided among several priests, but will have only one priest who governs her chastely and sincerely. Hence we forbid anyone to presume to divide a church between two or more persons, because the church of Christ ought to be a wife and bride, not a prostitute, as Pope Callixtus testifies. PART IV. GRATIAN. A church also ought not to be committed to hired priests. Hence Innocent II, [in the Roman Synod, c. 10]:

> C. IV. Una ecclesia duobus sacerdotibus diuidi non potest.
> Sicut in unaquaque ecclesia unus presbiter debet esse, ita ipsa, que sponsa uel uxor eius dicitur, non potest diuidi inter plures presbiteros, sed unum tantummodo habebit sacerdotem, qui eam caste et sinceriter regat. Unde interdicimus, ut nullus presumat ecclesiam inter duos uel plures diuidere quia ecclesia Christi uxor et sponsa debet esse, non scortum, sicut Papa Calixtus testatur. IV. Pars. Gratian. Conductitiis quoque presbiteris ecclesia conmitti non debet. Unde Innocentius II.: [in Sinodo Romana, c. 10.]

C. V. Let churches not be committed to hired priests.

We also command that churches not be committed to hired priests and that each church which has sufficient resources have its own priest.

> C. V. Conductitiis presbiteris ecclesiae non conmittantur.
> Precipimus etiam, ne conductitiis presbiteris ecclesiae conmittantur, et unaqueque ecclesia, cui facultas suppetit, proprium habeat sacerdotem.

Question III

GRATIAN. But that clerics cannot be agents for secular business is proved by the authority of the First Council of Carthage, in which Nicasius, Bishop of Culusium, is read to have said in chapter 6:

> GRATIANUS. Quod autem clerici secularium negociorum procuratores esse non ualeant, auctoritate Cartaginensis Concilii I. probatur, in quo Nicasius Episcopus Culusitanus dixisse legitur capitulo 6.:

[PALEA. C. I.

It came to the holy synod's attention that, among those who are numbered in the clergy, certain persons, for the sake of filthy gain, undertake leases of others' possessions and secular causes; through idleness they separate themselves from sacred ministries, but they run to the houses of secular persons and undertake the management of their property for the sake of avarice. Therefore the holy and great synod decreed that henceforth none of them—that is, neither bishop, cleric, nor monk—is to lease possessions or involve himself in secular administrations, unless perhaps they are drawn by the laws to unavoidable guardianships or administrations of minors, or the bishop of that city has committed to someone the management of ecclesiastical affairs, or of orphans, or of widows who are without defense, or of those persons who especially need ecclesiastical assistance for the fear of God. But if anyone shall have transgressed these statutes, let him be subject to ecclesiastical correction.]

> [PALEA. C. I.
> Peruenit in sanctam sinodum, quia de eis, qui in clero connumerantur, quidam propter turpis lucri gratiam alienarum possessionum conductiones et seculares causas suscipiunt, et se ipsos quidem a ministeriis sanctis per desidiam separant, ad domos autem secularium concurrunt, et substantiarum eorum gubernationes auariciae causa suscipiunt. Decreuit igitur sancta et magna sinodus, neminem deinceps eorum, hoc est non episcopum, siue clericum, aut monachum, conducere possessiones, aut misceri secularibus procurationibus, nisi forte qui legibus ad minorum etatem tutelas siue procurationes inexcusabiles attrahantur, aut cui ipsius ciuitatis episcopus ecclesiasticarum rerum conmiserit gubernacula, uel orphanorum, aut uiduarum, que indefensae sunt, aut earum personarum, que maxime ecclesiastico indigent amminiculo propter timorem Dei. Si quis uero transgressus fuerit hec statuta, correctioni ecclesiasticae subiaceat.]

C. II. Let those who are attached to the clergy not become administrators of secular possessions.

I believe that my proposal pleases your holiness and that it displeases you that those who serve God and are attached to the clergy should enter upon legal agencies, administrations, or managements of households. Bishop Gratus said: "The statutes of the Apostles say: 'No one serving as a soldier for God entangles himself in secular affairs.' Therefore let them either be clerics without the agencies of households, or agents without the office of clerics." All said: "Let us observe this."

C. II. Qui annexi sunt clero secularium possessionum procuratores non fiant.

Credo placere suggestionem meam sanctitati uestrae, et displicere uobis, ut qui seruiunt Deo, et annexi sunt clero, accedant ad actiones, seu amministrationes uel ad procurationes domorum. Gratus episcopus dixit: Apostolorum statuta sunt, que dicunt: "Nemo militans Deo inplicat se negociis secularibus." Proinde aut clerici sint sine actionibus domorum, aut actores sine offitio clericorum. Uniuersi dixerunt: "Hoc obseruemus."

C. III. On the same.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 15]. It pleased us that bishops, priests, and deacons, or any clerics whatsoever, are not to be lessees or administrators, nor are they to seek a livelihood by any base or dishonorable business, because they ought to have regard to what is written: "No one serving as a soldier for God entangles himself in secular affairs."

C. III. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IIII. [c. 15.] Placuit, ut episcopi, presbiteri, et diaconi, uel quicumque clerici non sint conductores, aut procuratores, neque ullo turpi uel inhonesto negocio uictum querant, quia respicere debent scriptum esse: "Nemo militans Deo inplicat se secularibus negociis."

C. IV. Let clerics not undertake the administration of secular affairs.

Likewise from the letter of Cyprian to the priests and deacons and the people of Furni, [book I, letter 9]. Cyprian to the priests and deacons and the people abiding at Furni, greetings. Long ago it was established by a council of bishops that no one is to name any of the clerics and ministers of God as guardian or curator in his testament, since each one honored with the divine priesthood and established in the ministry of the clergy ought to serve only the altar and sacrifices and to be free for prayers and supplications. For it is written: "No one serving as a soldier for God entangles himself in secular affairs, so that he may be able to please him to whom he has approved himself." § 1. Our bishops and predecessors, considering this religiously and providing beneficially, decreed that no one departing this life should name a cleric to a guardianship or curatorship; and that if anyone had done this, no offering should be made for him, nor should a sacrifice be celebrated for his falling asleep.

For those who wish to call priests and ministers away from the altar do not deserve to be named before the altar of God in the prayer of the priests.

C. IV. Secularium negociorum procurationem clerici non suscipiant.

Item ex epistola Cipriani ad Presbiteros, et Diacones, et plebem Furnensem. [lib. I. epist. 9.] Ciprianus presbiteris, et diaconibus, plebi Furnensi consistentibus salutem. Iampridem concilio episcoporum statutum est, ne quis de clericis et Dei ministris tutorem et curatorem testamento suo nominauerit, quando singuli diuino sacerdotio honorati et in clericorum ministerio constituti non nisi altari et sacrificiis deseruire, et precibus atque orationibus uacare debeant. Scriptum est enim: "Nemo militans Deo inplicat se negociis secularibus, ut possit placere ei, cui se probauit." §. 1. Quod episcopi et antecessores nostri religiose considerantes et salubriter prouidentes censuerunt, ne quis excedens ad tutelam uel curam clericum nominaret; ac si quis hoc fecisset, non offerretur pro eo, nec sacrificium pro dormitione eius celebraretur. Neque enim ante altare Dei merentur nominari in sacerdotum prece qui ab altari sacerdotes et ministros uolunt auocare.

C. V. It is not lawful for clerics to be bound to troubles and secular affairs.

Likewise from the same. Those who are occupied with divine and spiritual affairs ought not to be bound by troubles, secular affairs, and snares, nor to be free for earthly and secular acts.

C. V. Non licet clericis molliciis et secularibus rebus obligari.

Item ex eadem. Molliciis et secularibus rebus laqueisque obligari non debent qui diuinis rebus et spiritualibus occupati sunt nec ad terrenos et seculares actus uacare.

C. VI. Let clerics not be bound to secular affairs.

Likewise from the same. Those who are promoted in the church of the Lord to ordination among the clergy are in no respect to be called away from divine administration, nor bound to secular troubles and affairs, nor to withdraw from altars and sacrifices, but are to serve heavenly and spiritual affairs by day and night.

C. VI. Secularibus negociis clerici non alligentur.

Item ex eadem. Hii, qui in ecclesia Domini ad ordinationem clericorum promouentur, in nullo ab administratione diuina auocentur, nec molestiis et negociis secularibus alligentur, nec ab altariis et sacrificiis recedant, sed die ac nocte celestibus rebus et spiritualibus seruiant.

C. VII. On the same.

Likewise, as above, Cyprian. Let the decree of the priests, religiously and necessarily made, be observed by us, and at the same time let an example be given to the other brothers, lest anyone call away priests and ministers of God, who are free for his altar and church, to secular troubles. It will be possible for this to be observed hereafter, so that no one does this further concerning the person of clerics, if what has been done is punished.

C. VII. De eodem.

Item, ut supra, Ciprianus. Sacerdotum decretum religiose et necessarie factum seruetur a nobis, simul et ceteris fratribus detur exemplum, ne quis sacerdotes et ministros Dei altari eius et ecclesiae uacantes ad seculares molestias deuocet. Obseruari de cetero poterit, ne quis ultra hoc faciat circa personam clericorum, si quod factum est fuerit uindicatum.

Question IV

GRATIAN. That it is not lawful for them to be adorned with splendid and bright garments is commanded in the Seventh Synod, in which it was established thus, [c. 16]:

> GRATIANUS. Quod uero fulgidis et claris uestibus eis ornari non liceat, in septima Sinodo iubetur, in qua sic statutum est: [c. 16.]

C. I. Let clerics who live wantonly in ointments and bright and splendid garments be corrected.

All ostentation and bodily adornment is foreign to the consecrated order. Therefore those bishops or clerics who adorn themselves with splendid and bright garments ought to be corrected. But if they persist in this, let them be subjected to a penance. Likewise also those who are anointed with ointments. § 1. But since, when a root of bitterness sprang up, contamination was produced in the catholic church by heretics who calumniated Christians, those who received this not only abominated pictorial representations but also rejected all reverence, offending those who live religiously and piously; and through this there is fulfilled in them what is written: "The worship of God is an abomination to the sinner." Therefore, if any are found deriding those who are clothed in cheap and religious garments, let them be corrected by a penance. § 2. For in ancient times every consecrated man conducted himself in modest and cheap clothing. Indeed, everything that is adopted not for its necessity but for its beauty bears the reproach of pride, as the great Basil says. Nor did anyone put on a garment variegated from silken weavings, nor did they attach ornaments of various colors at the extremity of their garments. For they had heard that "those who are clothed in soft garments are in the houses of kings."

> C. I. Corripiantur clerici, qui in unguentis et claris uestibus et fulgidis lasciuiunt.
> Omnis iactantia et ornatura corporalis aliena est a sacrato ordine. Eos ergo episcopos uel clericos, qui se fulgidis et claris uestibus ornant, emendari oportet. Quod si in hoc permanserint, epithimio contradantur. Similiter et eos, qui unguentis unguntur. §. 1. Quoniam uero radice amaritudinis exorta contaminatio facta est in ecclesia catholica, Christianos calumpniantium hereticorum, hii, qui hanc receperunt, non solum imaginarias scripturas abhominati sunt, sed et omnem reuerentiam repulerunt, eos, qui religiose ac pie uiuunt, offendentes, ac per hoc conpletur in eis quod scriptum est: "Abhominatio est peccatoris Dei cultus," igitur si inuenti fuerint deridentes eos, qui uilibus et religiosis uestimentis amicti sunt, per epithimium corrigantur. §. 2. Priscis enim temporibus omnis sacratus uir cum mediocri ac uili ueste conuersabatur. Omne quippe, quod non propter necessitatem suam, sed propter uenustatem accipitur, elationis habet calumpniam, quemadmodum magnus ait Basilius. Sed neque ex sericis texturis uestem quis uariatam induebat, neque apponebant uariorum colorum ornamenta in summitate uestimentorum. Audierant enim, quia "qui mollibus uestiuntur in domibus regum sunt."

C. II. Let clerics, whether walking on a journey or dwelling elsewhere, use garments suitable to themselves.

Likewise from the Sixth Synod, [c. 27]. Let none of those who are numbered in the clergy have an unbecoming garment, whether dwelling in a city or walking on a journey, but let him use the robes that have been granted to clerics. But if anyone shall have done any such thing, let him be suspended for one week.

C. II. Clerici siue in itinere ambulantes, siue alibi degentes, congruis sibi uestibus utantur.

Item ex VI. Sinodo. [c. 27.] Nullus eorum, qui connumerantur in clero, uestimentum indecens habeat, siue in ciuitate degens siue in itinere ambulans, sed stolis utatur, que concessae sunt clericis. Si uero quis tale quid fecerit, per unam ebdomadam suspendatur.

C. III. Let clerics use garments suitable to their order, not secular garments.

Likewise Pope Zacharias, [in the Roman Synod, c. 3]. Let bishops, priests, and deacons not use secular garments, but only, as is fitting, a priestly tunic; nor, when they walk in a city, on a road, or in public squares, are they to presume to walk without a covering, except if they are walking on a long journey, because just as a woman praying in churches with her head unveiled dishonors her head, according to the voice of the Apostle, so a priest without a covering dishonors his priesthood. But if he shall rashly presume to act contrary to the statutes, let him be deprived of communion until he hastens to fulfill what has been established.

C. III. Non secularibus uestibus, sed ordini suo conuenientibus clerici utantur.

Item Zacharias Papa. [in Sinodo Romana, c. 3.] Episcopi, presbiteri, diaconi, secularibus indumentis non utantur, nisi, ut condecet, tunica sacerdotali; sed neque dum ambulauerint in ciuitate, aut in uia, aut in plateis, sine operimento presumant ambulare, preterquam si in itinere longo ambulauerint, quia sicut mulier orans in ecclesiis non uelato capite deturpat caput suum, iuxta Apostolicam uocem, ita sacerdos sine operimento deturpat sacerdotium suum. Quod si temere presumpserit contra statuta agere, communione priuetur, donec que statuta sunt adinplere maturet.

C. IV. Let priests not appear outside their houses without their proper attire.

Likewise Pope Leo, [IV, in the Roman Synod, c. 12]. It is in no way fitting for priests to appear outside their houses without priestly attire, lest they suffer injuries like one of the secular persons. One found acting contrary to this is either to desist or to be subjected to canonical discipline.

C. IV. Extra domos sine proprio ornatu sacerdotes non appareant.

Item Leo Papa. [IV. in Sinodo Romana, c. 12.] Sine ornatu sacerdotali extra domos sacerdotes apparere nullo modo conuenit, ne, ut aliquis secularium, iniurias patiantur. Contrarius denique inuentus aut desinat, aut canonicae subiaceat disciplinae.

C. V. On the same.

Likewise Innocent II, [in the Lateran Council, c. 4]. We command that bishops as well as clerics strive to please God and men in the state of their mind and the habit of their body, and that they not offend the sight of those beholding them—whose form and example they ought to be—by excess, the cut or color of their garments, or their tonsure, but rather display what befits their holiness. But if, after being admonished by the bishops, they are unwilling to amend, let them lack ecclesiastical benefices.

C. V. De eodem.

Item Innocentius II. [in Concilio Lateranensi, cap. 4.] Precipimus, ut tam episcopi quam clerici in statu mentis, in habitu corporis, Deo et hominibus placere studeant, et nec in superfluitate, fissurae, aut colore uestium, nec in tonsura intuentium (quorum forma et exemplum esse debent) offendant aspectum, sed potius quod eorum deceat sanctitatem. Quod si moniti ab episcopis emendare noluerint, ecclesiasticis careant beneficiis.

Question V

GRATIAN. But it is lawful for no one to leave his own bishop or withdraw from his office and flee to a secular judge. Hence it is read in the Council of Agde, [c. 8]:

GRATIANUS. Suum uero episcopum relinquere, uel ab offitio suo discedere, atque ad secularem iudicem confugere nulli licet. Unde in Agatensi Concilio [c. 8.] legitur:

C. I.

It pleased us that if a cleric, after leaving his office on account of strictness, should perhaps flee to a secular judge, and the one to whom he has recourse should furnish him the assistance of defense, let him be expelled from the communion of the church together with that cleric.

C. I.

Placuit, ut clericus, si relicto offitio suo propter districtionem ad secularem iudicem fortasse confugerit, et is, ad quem recurrit, solatium ei defensionis inpenderit, cum eodem de ecclesiae communione pellatur.

C. II. Let a priest or deacon deposed by his bishop not approach the emperor.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, [c. 12]. If any priest or deacon has been deposed by his own bishop, or even if any bishop has been deprived of authority by a synod, let him not presume to bring trouble to the imperial ears, but let him turn to a synod of greater bishops, and let him allege in their council the just claims that he thinks he has, and await from them the sentence that shall have been pronounced concerning him. But if, failing through faintheartedness, he is unwilling to do this, but shall have been importunate to the emperor, let such a one have no pardon, no place for any assertion of his, and no hope of receiving his rank in the future.

C. II. Presbiter uel diaconus ab episcopo depositus inperatorem non adeat.

Item ex Concilio Antioceno. [c. 12.] Si quis a proprio episcopo depositus presbiter uel diaconus, aut etiam si a sinodo quilibet episcopus fuerit exauctoratus, molestiam inperialibus auribus inferre non presumat, sed ad maiorum episcoporum sinodum sese conuertat, et que se putat habere iusta in eorum concilio alleget, atque ab his de se expectet que fuerit deprompta sentencia. Quod si deficiens pusillanimitate hoc noluerit facere, sed inportunus fuerit inperatori, huiusmodi nullam ueniam habere, neque locum ullius assertionis suae, nec spem recipiendi gradus habeat in futurum.

C. III. Let no one defend a person who is condemned by the judgment of bishops.

Likewise from the Fifth Council of Carthage, [c. 2]. If any cleric of any honor shall have been condemned for any crime by the judgment of bishops, it is not lawful for him to be defended either by the churches over which he presided or by any person; a penalty of loss of money and honor is imposed, from which we command that neither age nor sex is to be excused.

C. III. Non defensetur ab aliquo qui episcoporum iudicio dampnatur.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi V. [c. 2.] Si quis cuiuslibet honoris clericus iudicio episcoporum quocumque crimine fuerit dampnatus, non liceat eum siue ab ecclesiis, quibus prefuit, siue a quolibet homine defensari; interposita pena dampni pecuniae atque honoris, quo nec etatem, nec sexum excusandum esse precipimus.

C. IV. Let one who presumes to defend a fugitive from the rule of ecclesiastical discipline be deprived of communion.

Likewise from the Third Council of Arles. If perhaps any of the clerics, evading the rule of ecclesiastical discipline, shall have wandered away, whoever shall have received him and shall not have reconciled him to his own bishop but rather shall have presumed to defend him is to be deprived of the communion of the church.

C. IV. Communione priuetur qui ecclesiasticae disciplinae regulam fugientem defensare presumit.

Item ex Concilio Arelatensi III. Si forte aliquis clericorum regulam disciplinae ecclesiasticae subterfugiens fuerit euagatus, quicumque eum susceperit, et illum pontifici suo non reconciliauerit, sed magis defensare presumpserit, ecclesiae communione priuetur.

C. V. Let one who, after being condemned by bishops, approaches the emperor lack hope of reconciliation.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 35]. If any bishop, priest, or deacon who has been excommunicated complains that he was unjustly condemned in a council, let him return to a council of greater bishops so that, awaiting their inquiry and judgment, he may set forth before them whatever just causes he thinks he has. But if he shall have scorned this and, thrusting himself importunately into the palace, shall have wished to trouble the ears of the princes, he will be able to attain no pardon, nor will he have hope of future reconciliation.

C. V. Spe reconciliationis careat qui ab episcopis condempnatus inperatorem adierit.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 35.] Si quis episcopus, presbiter aut diaconus excommunicatus in concilio iniuste se queritur condempnatum, ad maiorum episcoporum concilium reuertatur, ut eorum inquisitionem et iudicium expectans, si quas se iustas causas habere putat, illis exponat. Si autem contempserit, et inportans se palatio aures principum inquietare uoluerit, hic ad nullam ueniam poterit peruenire, neque spem futurae reconciliationis habebit.

C. VI. The causes of bishops ought not to be examined before princes.

Likewise Gregory to the Empress Constantina, [book IV, letter 34]. If the causes of bishops entrusted to me are disposed of before our most pious lords through the patronage of others, what am I, unhappy man, doing in this church? But that my bishops despise me and have recourse against me to secular judges, I give thanks to almighty God and ascribe it to my sins. Yet I suggest this briefly: I shall wait a little, and if they delay coming to me, I shall in no way cease to exercise canonical strictness against them.

C. VI. Episcoporum causae coram principibus examinari non debent.

Item Gregorius Constantinae Augustae. [lib. IV. epist. 34.] Si episcoporum causae michi conmissorum apud piissimos dominos aliorum patrocinio disponuntur, infelix ego in ecclesia ista quid facio? Sed ut episcopi mei me despiciant, et contra me refugium ad seculares iudices habeant, omnipotenti Deo gratias ago, peccatis meis deputo. Hoc tamen breuiter suggero, quia aliquantulum expecto, et si ad me uenire distulerint, exercere in eos districtionem canonicam nullo modo cessabo.

Causa XXII

GRATIAN. A certain bishop swore to something false which he thought true. When this was discovered, his archdeacon swore that he would never furnish obedience to him. The archdeacon is compelled by the bishop to exhibit the customary reverence to him; the bishop is accused of double perjury, both because he swore what was false and because he compels the archdeacon to commit perjury. (Question I.) First, it is asked whether an oath is to be furnished or not. (Question II.) Second, whether one who swears to something false which he thinks true is a perjurer. (Question III.) Third, whether it was lawful for the archdeacon to deny the customary obedience to the bishop. (Question IV.) Fourth, if it is established that what the archdeacon swore is unlawful, whether it is to be observed. (Question V.) Fifth, if it is established that it is to be observed, whether the bishop is guilty of perjury who compels his archdeacon to act against his oath.

GRATIANUS. Quidam episcopus iurauit falsum quod putabat uerum, quo conperto archidiaconus eius iurauit se numquam prestaturum ei obedientiam. Conpellitur archidiaconus ab episcopo ad exhibendum sibi consuetam reuerentiam; accusatur episcopus de dupplici periurio, et de eo, quod falsum iurauit, et quia archidiaconum ad peierandum conpellit. (Qu. I.) Primum queritur, an iuramentum sit prestandum, uel non? (Qu. II.) Secundo, si sit periurus qui iurat falsum quod putat uerum? (Qu. III.) Tertio, si licuit archidiacono denegare episcopo consuetam obedientiam? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, si constiterit esse illicitum quod iurauit archidiaconus, an sit seruandum? (Qu. V.) Quinto, si constiterit illud seruandum esse, an episcopus sit reus periurii, qui contra iuramentum archidiaconum suum ire conpellit?

GRATIAN. PART I. That an oath is not to be furnished is proved by the authority of canonical Scripture. For Christ says to the Apostles in the Gospel: “Let your speech be: Yes, yes; no, no; but what is more than this is from evil.” Likewise James in his epistle: “Before all things, my brothers, do not swear at all.” By both authorities we are forbidden to furnish an oath. But it is one thing to approach an oath voluntarily, and another to offer an oath either to assert one’s innocence, to confirm covenants of peace, or to persuade hearers when they are slow to believe what is useful to them. The first is prohibited; the second is conceded. For to swear is not altogether a sin. Hence it is read in the Eighth Council of Toledo, [c. 2]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod iuramentum prestandum non sit, auctoritate scripturae canonicae probatur. Ait enim Christus in euangelio apostolis: "Sit sermo uester: Est est, non non; quod autem amplius est a malo est." Item Iacobus in epistola: "Ante omnia, fratres mei, nolite iurare omnino." Utraque auctoritate iuramentum prohibemur prestare. Sed aliud est ad iurandum sponte accedere, aliud uel ad asserendam innocentiam suam, uel ad federa pacis confirmanda, uel ad persuadendum auditoribus, quando pigri sunt credere quod eis utile est, iuramentum offerre. Primum prohibetur, secundum conceditur. Non enim iurare omnino peccatum est. Unde in Tolletano Concilio VIII. [c. 2.] legitur:

C. I. An oath is to be made for a covenant of peace.

Everything that enters into covenants of peace then subsists more firmly when the interposition of an oath strengthens it. And everything that unites the minds of friends then endures more faithfully when the bonds of an oath bind them. For everything that a witness attests is established more truly when the addition of an oath affirms it. But even if a witness is lacking, the mere imposition of an oath manifests the good faith of the innocent person.

C. I. Iuramentum pro federe pacis est faciendum.

Omne, quod in federa pacis uenit, tunc solidius subsistit, cum iuramenti hoc interpositio roborat. Sed et omne, quod amicorum animos conciliat, tunc fidelius durat, cum eos sacramenti uincula ligant. Omne enim, quod testis adstipulatur, uerius constat, cum id iurationis adiectio affirmat. Quod et si testis deficiat, innocentis fidem sola iurisiurandi taxatio manifestat.

C. II. Swearing is neither to be prohibited nor sought as a good.

Likewise Augustine on the Epistle to the Galatians, [at the end of chapter 1]. An oath that is from evil—not the evil of the one swearing, but of the unbeliever by whom he is compelled to swear—is not contrary to the Lord's command. For from this it is understood that the Lord prohibited swearing in such a way that, insofar as it lies with him, each person should not swear. Many do swear, having an oath in their mouth as though it were something great and pleasant. Certainly the Apostle knew the Lord's command, and nevertheless he swore. For those who do not think these to be oaths are not to be heard. What, then, will they do with this: "Daily I die, by your glory, brothers, which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord"? The Greek exemplars show that this is a most manifest oath. Therefore we are forbidden to swear from desire or love of swearing. For although an oath is more than "yes, yes; no, no," and is therefore from evil, nevertheless it is not from your evil but from the weakness or unbelief of those who are not otherwise moved to belief.

C. II. Iuratio non est prohibenda, nec tamquam bonum appetenda.

Item Augustinus super epistolam ad Galathas. [cap. 1. in fine] Non est contra preceptum Domini iuratio, que a malo, non iurantis est, sed increduli a quo iurare cogitur. Nam hinc intelligitur, ita Dominum prohibuisse a iureiurando, ut, quantum in ipso est, quisque non iuret; quod multi faciunt, in ore habentes iurationem tamquam magnum atque suaue aliquid. Nam utique Apostolus nouit preceptum Domini, et tamen iurauit. Non enim audiendi sunt qui has iurationes esse non putant. Quid enim facient de illa: "Cottidie morior, per gloriam uestram, fratres, quam habeo in Christo Iesu Domino nostro": quam greca exemplaria manifestissimam iurationem esse ostendunt. Prohibemur ergo iurare cupiditate aut dilectione iurandi. Quamuis enim iuramentum amplius sit, quam est est, non non, et ideo a malo sit, non tamen a malo tuo, sed infirmitatis aut incredulitatis eorum, qui non aliter mouentur ad fidem.

C. III. To commit perjury is a sin, not to swear.

Likewise Augustine in his letter [154] to Publicola. In the New Testament it was said that we should not swear at all. This seems to me to have been said, not because swearing is a sin, but because committing perjury is a monstrous sin, from which he who admonished us not to swear at all wished us to be far removed.

C. III. Peierare peccatum est, non iurare.

Item Augustinus in epistola [CLIV.] ad Publicolam. In nouo testamento dictum est, ne omnino iuremus. Quod michi quidem propterea dictum uidetur, non quia iurare peccatum est, sed quia periurare inmane peccatum est, a quo nos longe esse uoluit qui omnino ne iuremus conmonuit.

C. IV. To swear truthfully in necessary matters is not a sin.

The same, [sermon 30, On the Words of the Apostle]. So that you may know that to swear truthfully is not a sin, we find that the Apostle Paul also swore: "Daily I die, by your glory, brothers, which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord." "By your glory" is an oath; for he did not say, "By your glory I die," as though your glory caused me to die, in the manner that, if it were said that someone died by poison, by the sword, by a beast, or by an enemy, it would be understood that he died through the enemy's action, the sword's action, or the poison's action.

C. IV. In necessariis uerum iurare non est peccatum.

Idem. [sermone XXX. de uerbis Apostoli] Ut noueritis, uerum iurare non esse peccatum, inuenimus etiam apostolum Paulum iurasse: "Cottidie morior ego, per uestram gloriam, fratres, quam habeo in Christo Iesu Domino nostro." Per uestram gloriam iuratio est; non enim sic ait, per uestram gloriam morior, quasi uestra gloria me facit mori, quomodo, si diceretur per uenenum, per gladium, per bestiam, per inimicum mortuus est, intelligeretur faciente inimico, faciente gladio, faciente ueneno mortuus est.

C. V. An oath is neither to be sought as a good nor avoided as an evil.

The same, On the Sermon of the Lord, [book I, c. 30]. Thus, therefore, it is understood that the Lord commanded that one should not swear, lest anyone seek an oath as a good and, through habitual swearing, slide by custom into perjury. Therefore one who understands that swearing is to be accounted not among good things but among necessary things restrains himself as much as he can so that he does not use it unless necessity compels him—namely, when he sees that men are slow to believe what it is useful for them to believe unless it is confirmed by an oath. To this certainly pertains what is said thus: "But let your speech be: Yes, yes; no, no." This is good and to be sought; "but what is more than this is from evil." That is: if you are compelled to swear, know that it comes from the necessity of the weakness of those whom you persuade of something. That weakness is certainly an evil from which we daily pray to be delivered when we say: "Deliver us from evil." And so he did not say, "What is more than this is evil." For you who make good use of an oath do not do evil.

C. V. Nec tamquam bonum appetendum, nec tamquam malum iuramentum est uitandum.

Idem de sermone Domini. [lib. I. c. 30.] Ita ergo intelligitur precepisse Dominum, ne iuraretur, ne quisquam sicut bonum appetat iusiurandum, et assiduitate iurandi ad periurium per consuetudinem delabatur. Quapropter qui intelligit non in bonis, sed in necessariis iurationem habendam, refrenat se quantum potest, ut non ea utatur, nisi necessitas cogat, uidelicet, cum uidet pigros esse homines ad credendum quod eis utile est credere, nisi iuratione firmetur. Ad hoc utique pertinet quod sic dicitur: "Sit autem sermo uester: Est est, non non." Hoc bonum est et appetendum, "quod autem amplius est a malo est;" id est: si iurare cogeris, scias de necessitate uenire infirmitatis eorum, quibus aliquid suades, que infirmitas utique malum est, unde nos cottidie liberari deprecamur, cum dicimus: "Libera nos a malo." Itaque non dixit, quod autem amplius est malum est. Tu enim non malum facis, qui bene uteris iuratione.

C. VI. To swear is not a sin.

Likewise Augustine, On the Sermon of the Lord on the Mount, book I. You do no evil when you make good use of an oath, which, although it is not good, is nevertheless necessary so that you may persuade another of what you beneficially advise. But it is from the evil of him by whose weakness you are compelled to swear.

> C. VI. Iurare non est peccatum.
> Item Augustinus de sermone Domini in monte libro I. Tu malum non facis, qui bene uteris iuratione, que, etsi non bona, tamen necessaria est, ut alteri persuadeas quod utiliter suades. Sed a malo est illius, cuius infirmitate iurare cogeris.

C. VII. Swearing by God is permitted lest one swear by idols.

Likewise Jerome on Jeremiah, [at c. 4]. "And they will swear, 'The Lord lives,' in truth, in judgment, and in justice; and the nations will bless him and praise him." How, then, does the Gospel prohibit us from swearing? But here "oath" is said for confession and for the condemnation of the idols by which Israel used to swear. Finally, stumbling blocks are removed, and he swears by the Lord. What is said —"The Lord lives"—is an oath in the Old Testament for the condemnation of the dead things by which every idolater swore.

> C. VII. Per Deum iurare permittitur, ne per idola iuretur.
> Item Ieronimus in Iheremia. [ad c. 4.] Et iurabunt, uiuit Dominus in ueritate, et in iudicio, et in iustitia, et benedicent eum gentes, ipsumque laudabunt. Quomodo ergo euangelium iurare nos prohibet? Sed hic: iuramentum, pro confessione dicitur, et ad condempnationem idolorum, per que iurabat Israel. Denique auferuntur offendicula, et iurat per Dominum, quodque dicitur: "uiuit Dominus;" in testamento ueteri iusiurandum est ad condempnationem mortuorum, per quos iurauit omnis idolatra.

C. VIII. Swearing is conceded to the weak.

Likewise Jerome on Matthew, book I, [on c. 5]. Consider that the Savior did not prohibit swearing by God, but by heaven, earth, Jerusalem, and your head. And this had been conceded by the law as though to little children, so that, just as they sacrificed victims to God lest they sacrifice them to idols, so too they were permitted to swear by God—not because they acted rightly in this, but because it was better to offer this to God than to demons.

> C. VIII. Infirmis iurare conceditur.
> Item Ieronimus super Mattheum in libro I. [in c. 5.] Considera, quod Saluator non per Deum iurare prohibuerit, sed per celum, et per terram, et per Iherosolimam, et per caput tuum. Et hoc quasi paruulis fuerat lege concessum, ut quomodo uictimas inmolabant Deo, ne eas inmolarent idolis, sic et iurare permitterentur in Deum; non quod recte hoc facerent, sed quod melius esset Deo id exhibere quam demoniis.

C. IX. Let a cleric who persistently swears by created things be excommunicated.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [cc. 61 and 62]. A cleric who swears by created things is to be rebuked most sharply; if he persists in the vice, he is to be excommunicated. But one who sings during feasts is to be restrained by the severity of the aforesaid sentence.

C. IX. Excommunicetur clericus per creaturas pertinaciter iurans.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 61. et 62.] Clericum per creaturas iurantem acerrime obiurgandum; si perstiterit in uicio, excommunicandum. Inter epulas uero cantantem supradictae sententiae seueritate cohercendum.

C. X. Let a cleric who swears by God's hair or head be deposed, and a layman anathematized.

Likewise Pope Pius. If anyone shall have sworn by God's hair or head, or shall have employed blasphemy against God in another manner, if he is of the ecclesiastical order, let him be deposed; if a layman, let him be anathematized. And if anyone shall have sworn by created things, let him be chastised most sharply and do penance according to what the synod shall have adjudged. § 1. But if anyone shall not have disclosed such a man, there is no doubt that he is to be restrained by divine condemnation. § 2. And if a bishop shall have neglected to amend these things, let him be corrected most sharply. PART II. GRATIAN. It is asked who is more bound: the one who swears by God, or the one who swears upon the sacred Gospels? John Chrysostom answers this question, saying:

C. X. Clericus deponatur, laicus anathematizetur, per capillum uel caput Dei iurans.

Item Pius Papa. Si quis per capillum Dei uel caput iurauerit, uel alio modo blasphemia contra Deum usus fuerit, si ex ecclesiastico ordine est, deponatur; si laicus, anathematizetur. Et si quis per creaturas iurauerit, acerrime castigetur, et iuxta id, quod sinodus diiudicauerit, peniteat. §. 1. Si quis autem talem hominem non manifestauerit, non est dubium, quin diuina condempnatione coherceatur. §. 2. Et si episcopus ista emendare neglexerit, acerrime corripiatur. II. Pars. Gratian. Queritur, quis magis teneatur, an ille, qui per Deum, an ille, qui super sacra euangelia iurat? Huic questioni Iohannes Crisostomus respondet, dicens:

C. XI. To swear by the Gospels is not greater than to swear by God.

If there has been some case, one who swears by God seems to do something small. But one who swears by the Gospel seems to have done something greater. To these it must be said: Fools, the Scriptures are holy because of God; God is not holy because of the Scriptures.

C. XI. Non est maius per euangelia, quam per Deum iurare.

Si aliqua causa fuerit, modicum uidetur facere qui iurat per Deum. Qui autem per euangelium, maius aliquid fecisse uidetur. Quibus dicendum est: Stulti, scripturae propter Deum sanctae sunt, non Deus propter scripturas.

C. XII. Perjury is to be avoided not only upon an altar or relics but also in common speech.

Likewise Jerome. We have it written in the law of God: "You shall not swear falsely in my name, nor pollute the name of your God in vain." Therefore all are to be admonished diligently to avoid perjury, not only upon an altar or the relics of saints but also in common speech.

C. XII. Non solum in altari uel reliquiis, sed etiam in communi loquela periurium caueatur.

Item Ieronimus. Habemus in lege Dei scriptum: "Non periurabis in nomine meo, nec pollues nomen Dei tui in uanum." Ideo ammonendi sunt omnes, ut diligenter caueant periurium, non solum in altari seu sanctorum reliquiis, sed etiam in communi loquela.

C. XIII. God does not prohibit swearing.

Likewise Isidore, Sentences, book II, [c. 31]. To swear is not contrary to God's command, but when we make a practice of swearing, we incur the crime of perjury.

> C. XIII. Non prohibet Deus iurare.
> Item Ysidorus Sententiarum libro II. [c. 31.] Non est contra Dei preceptum iurare; sed dum iurandi usum facimus, periurii crimen incurrimus.

C. XIV. Swearing is not a sin.

Likewise Augustine, On the Words of the Apostle, sermon 28, [otherwise 30]. If swearing were a sin, it would not have been said in the old law: "You shall not swear falsely; you shall render your oaths to the Lord." For a sin would not be commanded to us. Likewise: § 1. We do not tell you that we do not swear. For if we say this, we lie. So far as it pertains to me, I do not swear; but, so far as it seems to me, when compelled by great necessity—when I see that unless I do so I am not believed, and that it is not expedient for the one who does not believe me not to believe—with this reason weighed and this consideration balanced, I say with great fear: "Before God," or "God is my witness," or "Christ knows that it is thus in my mind." And I see that this is more, that is, that it is more than "yes, yes; no, no." But what is more is from evil—not from the one swearing but from the one not believing. PART III. GRATIAN. From the preceding it is gathered that to swear is not a sin; nevertheless, it is not to be sought as a good, lest by a habit of swearing we fall into perjury. But since it is said to proceed from the evil of the one who does not believe, it seems that, even if swearing is not a sin, nevertheless to receive an oath is evil. Yet by the name of evil, not wickedness but the penalty of sin is understood. For that unbelief by which we are compelled to swear proceeded from penal weakness. But just as swearing itself is not a sin, so receiving an oath from someone is not evil. Hence Augustine writes to Publicola, [letter 154]:

> C. XIV. Iuratio non est peccatum.
> Item Augustinus de uerbis Apostoli, sermone 28. [al. 30.] Si peccatum esset iuratio, nec in ueteri lege diceretur: "Non periurabis; reddes Domino iuramenta tua." Non enim peccatum preciperetur nobis. Item: §. 1. Non uobis dicimus, nos non iurare. Si enim hoc dicimus, mentimur. Quantum ad me pertinet, non iuro, sed quantum michi uidetur, magna necessitate conpulsus, cum uideo, nisi faciam, michi non credi, et ei, qui michi non credit, non expedire, quod non credit. Hac perpensa ratione et consideratione librata cum magno timore dico: "Coram Deo," aut, "testis est michi Deus," aut, "scit Christus, quod sic est in meo animo," et uideo, quod plus est, id est quod amplius est quam est est, non non. Sed hoc quod est amplius a malo est, non iurantis, sed non credentis. III. Pars. Gratian. Ex premissis colligitur, quod iurare non est peccatum; non tamen tamquam bonum est appetendum, ne consuetudine iurandi labamur in periurium. Sed cum dicatur procedere a malo non credentis, uidetur, quod, etsi iurare peccatum non sit, iuramentum tamen recipere malum sit. Sed nomine mali non malicia, sed pena peccati intelligitur. Ex penali enim infirmitate incredulitas illa processit, qua ad iurandum conpellimur. Ipsum autem iurare sicut peccatum non est, ita iuramentum ab aliquo recipere malum non est. Unde Augustinus scribit ad Publicolam: [epist. CLIV.]

C. XV. We are not forbidden to receive an oath.

Although it has been said that we should not swear, I do not remember having read anywhere in the holy Scriptures that we should not receive an oath from someone. PART IV. GRATIAN. But it is asked whether the pledged faith of one who swears by demons is to be used. Concerning these matters Augustine writes thus to Publicola, [in the same letter 154]:

> C. XV. Iuramentum accipere non prohibemur.
> Quamuis dictum sit, ne iuremus, nusquam in scripturis sanctis me legisse memini, ne ab aliquo iurationem recipiamus. IV. Pars. Gratian. Sed queritur, an sit utendum fide eius, qui per demonia iurat? De his ita scribit Augustinus [eadem epist. CLIV.] ad Publicolam:

C. XVI. It is lawful to rely upon the pledged faith of one who swears by demons that he will preserve it.

It troubles you whether the pledged faith of one who has sworn by demons that he will preserve it is to be relied upon. Here I wish you first to consider whether, if someone has sworn by false gods that he will preserve his pledge and has not preserved it, he does not seem to you to have sinned twice. For if by such an oath he preserved the pledge he had promised, he would be judged to have sinned only because he swore by false gods. But no one would rebuke the fact that he preserved his pledge. Now, however, because he both swore by those by whom he ought not and acted contrary to the pledge he had promised, he has certainly sinned twice. And through this, one who relies upon the pledged faith of a person who is known to have sworn by false gods—and relies upon it not for evil but for something lawful and good—does not associate himself with that person's sin by which he swore by demons, but with his good covenant by which he preserved his pledge. Nor here do I speak of preserving that faith by which those who are baptized in Christ are called faithful. For that is far different and far removed from the faith of human agreements and covenants. Nevertheless, without any doubt it is a lesser evil to swear truthfully by false gods than deceitfully by the true God. For the holier that by which one swears is, the more punishable the perjury is. § 1. Another question is whether one who causes an oath to be sworn to himself by false gods does not sin, because the one who swears to him swears by the false gods whom he worships. Those testimonies that you yourself recalled concerning Laban and Abimelech can support this question—if, nevertheless, Abimelech swore by his own gods, just as Laban swore by the God of Sabaoth. GRATIAN. Thus also, when the Romans are read in the Book of Maccabees to have confirmed peace with the Jews, they are to be understood to have sworn by false gods, just as the Jews swore by the true God. Thus also concerning an oath made by created things it is to be understood that swearing by created things is indeed evil, because it is prohibited by God; but to preserve what is sworn is good, so that the sin of lying and deceit may be avoided. § 1. But it is objected that Joseph, a holy man, swore by created things when he said to his brothers: "By the welfare of Pharaoh, you shall not depart from here." § 2. But it must be known that the saints swore not so much by created things as by the creator of created things, nor did they venerate anything in created things other than their Creator, as Joseph did, who, in swearing by Pharaoh, venerated in him the fact that he had been placed among the lowest by God's judgment. Hence the Apostle says: "Every power is from the Lord God." Likewise Christ to Pilate: "You would have no power over me unless it had been given to you from above." But God prohibited swearing by created things, lest either, after the manner of the gentiles, some divine power should be believed to be present in created things, or, by judging created things contemptible, we should reckon promises made by them as nothing. § 3. But it is asked which is more grave: to swear deceitfully by created things, or by the Creator? For one who swears falsely by created things is guilty in two ways: both because, contrary to the prohibition, he swears by that by which it is not lawful for him to swear—a sin from which one who swears only by the Creator is immune—and because he ensnares his neighbor by deceit, which one who swears falsely by the Creator also does. But if perjury is the more punishable the holier that by which one swears is, it appears that, although one who swears falsely by created things sins in two ways, nevertheless one who swears falsely by the Creator subjects himself to a graver penalty. PART V. § 4. But the penalty for perjury is most grave; if anyone, fearing it, is unwilling to come to confession, he is to be cast from the fellowship of the faithful. Hence Pope Eutychian:

> Mouet te, utrum eius fide utendum sit, qui, ut eam seruet, per demonia iurauerit. Ubi te uolo prius considerare, utrum si quispiam per Deos falsos iurauerit se fidem seruaturum, et eam non seruauerit, non tibi uidetur bis peccasse? Si enim tali iuratione promissam seruaret. fidem ideo tantum peccasse iudicaretur, quia per Deos falsos iurauerit. Illud autem nemo reprehenderet, quia fidem seruauit. Nunc uero, quia et iurauit per quos non debuit, et contra pollicitam fecit fidem quod non debuit, bis utique peccauit, ac per hoc qui utitur fide illius, quem constat iurasse per falsos Deos, et utitur non ad malum, sed ad licitum et bonum, non peccato illius se sociat, quo per demonia iurauit, sed bono pacto eius, quo fidem seruauit. Neque hic eam fidem dico seruari, qua fideles uocantur qui baptizantur in Christo. Illa enim longe alia est longeque discreta a fide humanorum placitorum atque pactorum. Verumtamen sine ulla dubitatione minus malum est per Deos falsos iurare ueraciter, quam per Deum uerum fallaciter. Quanto enim per quod iuratur magis sanctum est, tanto magis penale est periurium. §. 1. Alia questio est, utrum non peccet qui per falsos Deos sibi iurari facit? quia ille, qui ei iurat, iurat per falsos Deos, quos colit. Cui questioni possunt illa testimonia suffragari, que ipse conmemorasti de Laban et Abimelech, si tamen Abimelech per Deos suos iurauit, sicut Laban per Deum Sabaoth. Gratian. Sic etiam cum in libro Machabeorum Romani legantur pacem firmasse cum Iudeis, intelligendi sunt iurasse per falsos Deos, sicut et Iudei iurauerunt per Deum uerum. Sic etiam de iuramento, quod fit per creaturas, intelligendum est, quod ipsum quidem iurare per creaturas, malum est, quia a Deo prohibitum est; sed seruare quod iuratur, bonum est, ut euitetur peccatum mendacii et dolositatis. §. 1. Sed obicitur, quod Ioseph, uir sanctus, per creaturas iurauit, dum dixit fratribus suis: "Per salutem Pharaonis, non exibitis hinc." §. 2. Sed sciendum est, quod sancti non tam per creaturas, quam per auctorem creaturarum iurabant, nec in creaturis aliud quam creatorem ipsarum uenerabantur, sicut Ioseph, qui per Pharaonem iurando hoc in eo ueneratus est, quod Dei iudicio positus erat in infimis. Unde Apostolus ait: "Omnis potestas a Domino Deo est." Item Christus Pilato: "Non haberes in me potestatem, nisi esset tibi datum desuper." Deus autem per creaturas iurare prohibuit, ne uel more gentilium aliquod numen deitatis creaturis inesse crederetur, uel ne creaturas contemptibiles iudicando per eas promissa pro nichilo duceremus. §. 3. Sed queritur, quid grauius sit, an per creaturas, an per creatorem iurare fallaciter? Dupliciter enim reus est qui per creaturas iurat mendaciter, quia et contra prohibitionem iurat per quod sibi iurare non licet, (a quo peccato est inmunis, qui non nisi per creatorem iurat,) et proximum dolo capit, quod facit etiam per creatorem mendaciter iurans. Sed si periurium tanto magis penale est, quanto sanctius illud, per quod iuratur, apparet, quod, etsi per creaturas mendaciter iurans dupliciter peccet, grauiori tamen se subicit penae qui per creatorem iurat mendaciter. V. Pars. §. 4. Periurii autem pena grauissima est, quam si quis timens ad confessionem uenire noluerit, a fidelium consortio est abiciendus. Unde Euticianus Papa:

C. XVII. Let one who is unwilling to do penance for perjury lack the fellowship of the faithful.

It is also to be preached that the faithful avoid perjury and abstain from it with the greatest care, knowing that this is a great crime, prohibited in the law, the Prophets, and the Gospel. But we have heard that certain persons esteem this crime lightly and impose a somehow light measure of penance upon perjurers. They ought also to know that such a penance ought to be imposed for perjury as for adultery, fornication, homicide committed voluntarily, and the other criminal vices. § 1. But if anyone, after perpetrating perjury or any criminal sin, is unwilling to come to confession because he fears a long penance, he is to be repelled from the church, or from the communion and fellowship of the faithful, so that no one may eat or drink with him or receive him in his house.

> Predicandum est etiam, ut periurium fideles caueant, et ab hoc summopere abstineant, scientes hoc grande scelus esse, et in lege, et in Prophetis, et in euangelio prohibitum. Audiuimus autem, quosdam paruipendere hoc scelus, et leuem quodammodo periuris penitenciae modum inponere; qui etiam nosse debent, talem de periurio penitenciam inponi debere, qualem et de adulterio, de fornicatione, et de homicidio sponte conmisso, et de ceteris criminalibus uiciis. §. 1. Si quis uero perpetrato periurio aut quolibet criminali peccato, timens penitenciam longam, ad confessionem uenire noluerit, ab ecclesia repellendus est, siue a communione et consortio fidelium, ut nullus cum eo comedat, neque bibat, neque in sua domo eum recipiat.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. That perjury is to swear falsely is easily proved. For Augustine says in the Book of Psalms upon "The earth is the Lord's":

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem periurium sit falsum iurare, facile probatur. Ait enim Augustinus in libro Psalmorum super: "Domini est terra":

C. I. One who will act otherwise than he promises commits perjury.

One who will act otherwise than he promises swears deceitfully, since perjury is wickedly to deceive one who believes.

> C. I. Peierat qui aliter facturus est quam promittit.
> In dolo iurat qui aliter facturus est quam promittit, cum periurium sit nequiter decipere credentem.

C. II. What companions an oath ought to have.

Likewise Jerome on Jeremiah, book II. It is to be observed that an oath is to have these companions: truth, judgment, and justice. If these are lacking, it will by no means be an oath, but perjury. GRATIAN. Likewise, one who swears falsely lies. But to swear while lying is nothing other than to commit perjury. § 1. Therefore, since all who speak a lie are to be destroyed, according to that statement of the Psalmist, "You will destroy all who speak a lie," much more condemnable are those who are convicted of forswearing themselves by lying, because they take the name of their God in vain. § 2. But it is one thing to swear falsely, another to swear deceitfully. For not everyone who will act otherwise than he promises swears deceitfully. Although the Apostle was going to act otherwise than he promised the Corinthians in the first epistle, when he said, "I will come to you," nevertheless he did not swear deceitfully or promise falsely. For one swears deceitfully or promises falsely when it is in his mind not to act as he promises; but one who promises what is false but thinks it true neither swears deceitfully nor promises falsely. Hence Augustine, On the Words of the Apostle, sermon 28, [otherwise 30]:

> C. II. Quos debeat habere comites iusiurandum.
> Item Ieronimus super Iheremiam, libro II. Animaduertendum est, quod iusiurandum hos habeat comites, ueritatem, iudicium atque iusticiam. Si ista defuerint, nequaquam iuramentum erit, sed periurium. Gratian. Item, qui falsum iurat mentitur. Mentiendo autem iurare nichil est aliud quam peierare. §. 1. Cum ergo omnes, qui locuntur mendacium, perdendi sint, iuxta illud Psalmistae: "Perdes omnes, qui locuntur mendacium," multo magis dampnabiles sunt, qui deierare mentiendo conuincuntur, quia nomen Dei sui in uanum assumunt. §. 2. Sed aliud est falsum iurare, aliud iurare in dolo. Non enim omnis, qui aliter facturus est quam promittit, in dolo iurat. Licet enim Apostolus aliter facturus esset quam Corinthiis promitteret in prima epistola, cum ait: "Veniam ad uos," non tamen in dolo iurauit, aut mendaciter promisit. Ille enim in dolo iurat, aut mendaciter promittit, in cuius mente est, non sic se esse facturum, ut promittit; ille autem, qui promittit falsum quod putat uerum, nec iurat, in dolo nec mendaciter promittit. Unde Augustinus de uerbis Apostoli, sermone XXVIII.: [al. XXX.]

C. III. Concerning one who swears to something false which he thinks true.

Men swear falsely either when they deceive or when they are deceived. A man thinks that what is false is true and swears rashly; or he knows or thinks that it is false and nevertheless swears to it as true, and no less swears with criminality. But these perjuries that I have mentioned are different. Suppose that one swears who thinks that the thing for which he swears is true: he thinks that it is true, and nevertheless it is false. This man does not commit perjury from his intention; he is deceived. He holds as true what is false; he does not knowingly interpose an oath for a false thing. Give me another. He knows that it is false, says it is true, and swears to it as though what he knows to be false were true. You see how detestable this beast is and how it is to be exterminated from human affairs. Who would wish to become such a person? All men detest such things. Suppose another. He thinks that it is false and swears that it is true. Perhaps it is true. For example, so that you may understand: it rained in that place. You question a man, and he says that it rained, and it suits his business to say, "It rained," but he thinks that it did not rain: he is a perjurer. It matters how the word proceeds from the mind. Nothing except a guilty mind makes the tongue guilty. GRATIAN. Therefore, because this man's mind was not guilty—he did not know that what he swore was true was false—and he seemed to himself to have ascertained with great diligence, not rashly or negligently, that what he swore falsely was true, he is by no means to be judged guilty of perjury. Likewise, when it is said that one who swears falsely lies, this ought not to be understood universally. For not everyone who says what is false lies, just as not everyone who lies says what is false. Hence Augustine in the Enchiridion, [c. 22]:

> Homines falsum iurant, uel cum fallunt, uel cum falluntur. Putat homo uerum esse quod falsum est, et temere iurat; aut scit uel putat falsum esse, et tamen pro uero iurat, et nichilominus cum scelere iurat. Distant autem ista periuria, que duo conmemoraui. Fac illum iurare, qui uerum putat esse pro quo iurat; uerum putat esse, et tamen falsum est; non ex animo iste periurat, fallitur: hoc pro uero habet, quod falsum est, non pro re falsa sciens iurationem interponit. Da alium. Scit falsum esse, et dicit uerum esse, et iurat tamquam uerum sit quod scit falsum esse. Videtis, quam ista detestanda sit belua, et de rebus humanis exterminanda? Quis enim fieri uelit? Omnes homines detestantur talia. Fac alium. Putat esse falsum, et iurat tamquam uerum sit. Forte uerum est. Verbi gratia (ut intelligatis) pluit in illo loco; interrogas hominem, et dicit pluisse, et ad negocium ipsius conpetit, ut dicat, pluit, sed putat non pluisse: periurus est. Interest, quemadmodum uerbum procedat ex animo. Ream linguam non facit nisi rea mens. Gratian. Quia ergo mens huius non erat rea (nesciebat esse falsum quod iurauit uerum), nec temere uel negligenter, sed cum magna diligentia uidebatur sibi deprehendisse uerum quod iurauit falsum, periurii reus nequaquam est iudicandus. Item, quod dicitur, qui falsum iurat mentitur, non uniuersaliter hoc intelligi debet. Non enim omnis, qui falsum dicit, mentitur, sicut nec omnis, qui mentitur, falsum dicit. Unde Augustinus in Enchiridion: [c. 22.]

C. IV. To say what is false while thinking it true is not to lie.

But one who lies speaks contrary to what he perceives in his mind, with the will to deceive. § 1. And words have certainly been instituted for this reason: not that men should deceive one another through them, but that by them each person should bring his thoughts to another's knowledge. Therefore to use words for deceit, not for that for which they were instituted, is a sin. § 2. Nor for this reason is any lie to be thought not to be a sin because we can sometimes benefit someone by lying. For we can also do so by stealing, if a poor person to whom it is openly given experiences an advantage and the rich person from whom it is secretly taken experiences no disadvantage; nor for this reason would anyone say that such a theft is not a sin. And below, [c. 18]: § 3. No one is to be judged a liar who says what is false while thinking it true, because, insofar as it lies with him, he himself does not deceive but is deceived. Therefore one who too incautiously believes false things and holds them as true is to be accused not of lying but sometimes of rashness. Rather, on the contrary, insofar as it lies with him, one lies who says what is true while thinking it false. For insofar as his mind is concerned, because he does not say what he perceives, he does not say what is true, although what he says is found to be true. Nor is one in any way free from lying who unknowingly speaks truth with his mouth but knowingly lies by his will. Therefore, without considering the things themselves concerning which something is said, but only the intention of the speaker, one who unknowingly says what is false because he thinks it true is better than one who knowingly bears an intention to lie while not knowing that what he says is true.

C. IV. Non est mentiri dicere falsum quod putat uerum.

Is autem, qui mentitur, contra id, quod animo sentit, loquitur uoluntate fallendi. §. 1. Et utique uerba propterea sunt instituta, non ut per ea se inuicem homines fallant, sed ut eis quisque in alterius noticiam cogitationes suas proferat. Verbis ergo uti ad fallaciam, non ad quod sunt instituta, peccatum est. §. 2. Nec ideo ullum mendacium putandum est non esse peccatum, quia possumus aliquando alicui prodesse mentiendo. Possumus enim et furando, si pauper, cui palam datur, sentit commodum, et diues, cui clam tollitur, non sentit incommodum, nec ideo tale furtum quisquam dixerit peccatum non esse. Et infra: [c. 18.] §. 3. Nemo mentiens iudicandus est qui dicit falsum quod putat uerum, quia, quantum in ipso est, non fallit ipse, sed fallitur. Non itaque mendacii, sed aliquando temeritatis arguendus est qui falsa incautius credit ac pro ueris habet, pociusque e contrario, quantum in ipso est, ille mentitur, qui dicit uerum quod putat falsum. Quantum enim ad animum eius attinet, quia non quod sentit, hoc dicit, non uerum dicit, quamuis uerum inueniatur esse quod dicit. Nec ullo modo liber est a mendacio qui ore nesciens uerum loquitur, sciens autem uoluntate mentitur. Non consideratis itaque rebus ipsis, de quibus aliquid dicitur, sed sola intentione dicentis, melior est qui nesciens falsum dicit, quoniam id uerum putat, quam qui mentiendi animum sciens gerit, nesciens uerum esse quod dicit.

C. V. One who does not have the intention to deceive does not lie.

Likewise Pope Gelasius. The blessed Apostle Paul is not for that reason to be believed—far be it—to have deceived or to have been contrary to himself because, although he had promised that he would go to Spain, being occupied by greater causes through divine ordering, he was unable to fulfill what he promised. So far as his own will was concerned, he declared what he truly would have wished to accomplish. So far as concerns the secrets of the divine counsel—which, as a man, although full of the Spirit of God, he was unable to recognize in their entirety—he omitted these because he was forestalled by heavenly ordering. § 1. Nor because the blessed Apostle Peter, from the disposition of divine reverence, answered the Lord himself, "You shall never wash my feet," will he be thought—far be it—to have deceived or in no way to have stood by his judgment, because he soon yielded to that same divine will and, constrained by the reasons of human salvation, permitted with ready will to be done what he had said he would not do. PART II. GRATIAN. Therefore one who, by swearing to something false, lies is one who knows that what he swears is false. For a lie is, as Augustine says, "a false signification with the will to deceive." § 1. But since deceiving is always a matter of the will, while being deceived is a matter either of weakness or rashness, and since what proceeds from the will is graver than what proceeds from rashness or weakness, it sometimes happens that to be deceived is either no sin or a minimal sin, and sometimes, from the diverse consideration of the matters themselves, it is less to deceive than to be deceived. Hence the same Augustine in the Enchiridion, [c. 21]:

> C. V. Non mentitur qui animum fallendi non habet.
> Item Gelasius Papa. Beatus Paulus apostolus non ideo (quod absit) fefellisse credendus est aut sibi extitisse contrarius, quoniam, cum ad Ispanias se promisisset iturum, dispositione diuina maioribus occupatus ex causis inplere non potuit quod promisit. Quantum enim ipsius uoluntatis interfuit, hoc pronunciauit, quod reuera uoluisset efficere. Quantum enim ad diuini secreta consilii, (que, ut homo, omnia non potuit, licet spiritu Dei plenus, agnoscere) superna pretermisit dispositione preuentus. §. 1. Nec quia B. Petrus apostolus pro affectu diuinae reuerentiae ipsi Domino respondit: "Non lauabis mihi pedes in eternum," fefellisse (quod absit) aut in sua putabitur minime constitisse sententia, quia mox eidem diuinae uoluntati cesserit, et quod se dixerat non esse facturum, causis asstrictus humanae salutis, passus est prona uoluntate faciendum. II. Pars. Gratian. Ille ergo falsum iurando mentitur, qui scit falsum esse quod iurat. Est enim mendacium (ut Augustinus ait) "falsa significatio cum uoluntate fallendi." §. 1. Sed cum fallere semper sit uoluntatis, falli autem uel infirmitatis, uel temeritatis, grauius autem sit quod ex uoluntate, quam quod ex temeritate uel infirmitate procedit: aliquando contingit falli uel nullum, uel minimum esse peccatum, aliquando ex ipsa rerum uaria consideratione minus esse fallere quam falli. Unde idem Augustinus in Enchiridion: [c. 21.]

C. VI. To be mistaken in matters that do not pertain to faith is either a small sin or none.

In matters in which it makes no difference to attaining the kingdom of God whether they are believed or not, and whether they are thought true or false, to err in these—that is, to think one thing in place of another—is not to be judged a sin; or if it is, it is a minimal and most slight sin.

> C. VI. Falli in his, que ad fidem non pertinent, aut paruum, aut nullum peccatum est.
> In quibus rebus nichil interest ad capessendum regnum

Dei, utrum credantur, an non, et utrum uera putentur, an falsa; in his errare, id est aliud pro alio putare, non est arbitrandum esse peccatum, aut si est, minimum esse atque leuissimum.

C. VII. In matters that pertain to faith, to be deceived is graver than to deceive others.

In the same, [c. 18]. In consideration of the things themselves that are said, there is so great a difference that, although, so far as a person's will is concerned, it is in every case a lesser evil to be deceived than to lie, nevertheless it is far more tolerable to lie in matters separated from religion than to be deceived in those matters without faith in or knowledge of which God cannot be worshiped. PART III. GRATIAN. Likewise, what is said—"You will destroy all who speak a lie"—is not to be understood of every lie. For there are certain lies in which, even if there is some fault, they are nevertheless not condemnable; indeed, they are to be held as though they were not lies. There are also other lies that are of graver fault, of which "You will destroy all who speak a lie" is understood. § 1. But so that it may appear which lies are venial and which condemnable, it must be distinguished how many kinds of lies there are. Concerning these Augustine writes in the book On Lying, [c. 14]:

C. VII. In his, que ad fidem pertinent, grauius est falli quam alios decipere.

In eodem. [c. 18.] In ipsarum consideratione rerum, que dicuntur, tantum interest, quia, siue quisque fallatur siue mentiatur, utcumque falli quam mentiri minus est malum, quantum pertinet ad hominis uoluntatem; tamen longe tollerabilius est in his, que a religione seiuncta sunt, mentiri, quam in his, sine quorum fide uel noticia Deus coli non potest, falli. III. Pars. Gratian. Item, quod dicitur: "Perdes omnes, qui locuntur mendacium," non de omni mendacio intelligendum est. Sunt enim quedam mendacia, in quibus etsi sit aliqua culpa, non tamen dampnabilia sunt, immo tamquam non mendacia habenda sunt. Sunt et alia mendacia, que sunt grauioris culpae, de quibus intelligitur: "Perdes omnes, qui locuntur mendacium." §. 1. Ut autem appareat, que mendacia sint uenialia, et que dampnabilia, distinguendum est, quot sint genera mendacii. De quibus Augustinus scribit in libro de mendacio: [c. 14.]

C. VIII. How many kinds of lies are there?

The first is a deadly lie, to be avoided by far, which is made in the teaching of religion; no one ought to be brought to this lie under any condition. The second is one that injures someone unjustly and is such that it benefits no one and harms someone. The third benefits one person in such a way that it harms another, although it does not harm him unto bodily defilement. The fourth is made solely from a lust for lying and deceiving, which is a monstrous lie. The fifth is made from a desire to please by pleasant speech. When all these have been entirely avoided and rejected, there follows the sixth kind, which harms no one and benefits someone—as if someone, knowing where another's money that is to be unjustly taken away is located, were to lie that he does not know. The seventh harms no one and benefits someone—as if one were to lie because he is unwilling to betray a man sought for death. The eighth kind of lie harms no one and benefits someone in this respect: that it protects someone from bodily defilement. § 1. Therefore one must not lie in the teaching of piety; the first kind of detestable lie is a great crime. Therefore one must not lie by the second kind, because injury is to be done to no one. One must not lie by the third kind, because no one is to be aided with injury to another. One must not lie by the fourth kind, on account of the lust for lying, which is vicious through itself. One must not lie by the fifth kind, because not even truth itself is to be uttered to men for the sake of pleasing them; how much less a lie, which through itself, because it is a lie, is certainly base? One must not lie by the sixth kind, for the truth of testimony is not rightly corrupted for anyone's temporal advantage and safety; but no one is to be led to eternal salvation with the assistance of a lie. Nor must one lie by the seventh kind, for anyone's temporal advantage or safety is not to be preferred to the perfecting of faith, nor ought anyone to experience himself as being so badly moved by our deeds rightly done that he becomes even more dejected in spirit and more remote from piety. Nor must one lie by the eighth kind, because among goods the chastity of the mind is preferred to the chastity of the body, and among evils what we ourselves do is more condemnable for us than what we permit to be done. § 2. But among these eight kinds, the farther one withdraws from the first, the less he sins when he lies. But whoever shall think that there is any kind of lie that is not a sin will shamefully deceive himself when he judges himself an honorable deceiver of others.

C. VIII. Quot sint genera mendacii?

Primum est capitale mendacium et longe fugiendum, quod fit in doctrina religionis, ad quod mendacium nulla condicione quiuis debet adduci. Secundum, ut aliquem ledat iniuste, quod tale est, ut nulli prosit, et obsit alicui. Tertium, quod prodest alteri ita, ut obsit alteri, quamuis non ad inmundiciam obsit corporalem. Quartum, sola mentiendi fallendique libidine, quod mirum mendacium est. Quintum, quod fit placendi cupiditate de suaui eloquio. His omnibus penitus euitatis atque reiectis, sequitur sextum genus, quod et nulli obest, et prodest alicui, uelut si quispiam pecuniam alicuius iniuste tollendam, sciens ubi sit, nescire se mentiatur. Septimum, quod et nulli obest, et prodest alicui, uelut si nolens hominem ad mortem quesitum prodere, mentiatur. Octauum genus est mendacii, quod et nulli obest, et ad hoc prodest, ut ab inmunditia corporali aliquem tueatur. §. 1. Non igitur est mentiendum in doctrina pietatis; magnum scelus est, primum genus detestabilis mendacii. Non est mentiendum igitur secundo genere, quia nulli facienda est iniuria. Non est mentiendum tertio genere, quia nulli cum alterius iniuria est consulendum. Non est mentiendum quarto genere, propter mendacii libidinem, que per se ipsam uiciosa est. Non est mentiendum quinto genere, quia nec ipsa ueritas placendi causa hominibus enuncianda est; quanto minus mendacium, quod per se ipsum, quia mendacium est, utique turpe est? Non est mentiendum sexto genere, neque enim recte testimonii ueritas pro cuiusque temporali commodo ac salute corrumpitur; ad sempiternam uero salutem nullus ducendus est opitulante mendacio. Neque septimo genere mentiendum est, non enim cuiusque commoditas aut salus temporalis perficiendae fidei preferenda est, nec se quisquam in recte factis nostris tam male moueri sentiat, ut fiat etiam animo deiectior longeque a pietate remotior. Nec octauo genere mentiendum est, quia et in bonis castitas animi pudicitiae corporis prefertur, et in malis, quod ipsi facimus, eo, quod fieri sinimus, nobis dampnabilius est. §. 2. In his autem octo generibus tanto quisque minus peccat, cum mentitur, quanto magis a primo recedit. Quisquis autem esse aliquod genus mendacii, quod peccatum non sit, putauerit, decipiet se ipsum turpiter, cum honestum se deceptorem arbitretur aliorum.

C. IX. It is not lawful for anyone to lie for the sake of humility.

Likewise Augustine, On the Words of the Apostle, [sermon 31, otherwise 29]. When you lie for the sake of humility, if you were not a sinner before you lied, by lying you become what you had avoided. Truth is not in you unless you call yourself a sinner in such a way that you also know yourself to be one. But truth itself is that you say what is. For how is there humility where falsity reigns?

C. IX. Non licet alicui humilitatis causa mentiri.

Item Augustinus de uerbis Apostoli. [sermone XXXI. al. XXIX.] Cum humilitatis causa mentiris, si non eras peccator ante, quam mentireris, mentiendo efficeris quod euitaueras. Veritas in te non est, nisi te ita dixeris peccatorem, ut etiam esse cognoscas. Veritas autem ipsa est, ut quod est dicas. Nam quomodo est humilitas, ubi regnat falsitas?

C. X. On the same.

Likewise Gregory, [book XXVI of the Moralia, c. 2]. Those who entangle themselves in a lie are incautiously humble.

C. X. De eodem.

Item Gregorius. [lib. XXVI. Moralium, c. 2.] Incaute sunt humiles qui mendacio se illaqueant.

C. XI. It is not lawful to lie so that arrogance may be avoided.

Likewise Augustine on John, [tractate 43]. Let arrogance not be avoided in such a way that truth is abandoned.

C. XI. Non licet mentiri, ut arrogantia uitetur.

Item Augustinus super Iohannem. [tractatu XLIII.] Non ita caueatur arrogantia, ut ueritas relinquatur.

C. XII. Not every lie is an equal sin.

Likewise in the Enchiridion, [c. 18]. But it does not seem absurd to me that every lie is indeed a sin, while it makes a great difference with what intention and concerning what matters each person lies. For one who lies with the will to aid does not sin in the same way as one who lies with the will to harm, nor does one who by lying sends a traveler upon a contrary road do as much harm as one who corrupts the way of life by a deceiving lie.

C. XII. Non omne mendacium eque peccatum est.

Item in Enchiridion. [c. 18.] Michi autem non absurde uidetur omne quidem mendacium esse peccatum, sed multum interesse, quo animo et de quibus rebus quisque mentiatur. Non enim ita peccat, qui consulendi, quomodo ille, qui nocendi uoluntate mentitur, nec tantum nocet qui uiatorem mentiendo in aduersum iter mittit, quantum is, qui uiam uitae mendacio fallente deprauat.

C. XIII. No one is to be deceived in any manner.

Likewise Augustine in the book On the Conflict of Vices and Virtues, [c. 19]. One ought to deceive no one either by an artful lie or by a simple word, because in whatever manner a person lies, he kills his soul.

C. XIII. Non est aliquo modo decipiendus quilibet.

Item Augustinus in libro de conflictu uiciorum atque uirtutum. [c. 19.] Nec artificioso mendacio, nec simplici uerbo oportet quemquam decipere, quia quomodolibet mentitur quis, occidit animam.

C. XIV. A perfect person ought not to lie for someone's temporal life.

Likewise Augustine on the Fifth Psalm, [at the verse "You will destroy all who speak"]. Let no one think that a perfect and spiritual man ought to lie for this temporal life, by the death of which neither his own soul nor another's is killed. But because it is one thing to lie and another to conceal the truth —indeed, it is one thing to say what is false and another to keep silent about what is true—if perhaps someone is unwilling to betray a man to this visible death, he ought to be prepared to conceal the truth, not to say what is false, so that he neither betrays nor lies, nor kills his own soul for the body of another. § 1. But there are two kinds of lies in which there is no great fault, although they are nevertheless not without fault: when we either jest or lie while aiding our neighbor. The former, in jesting, is not pernicious for this reason: because it does not deceive. For the one to whom it is said knows that it was said for the sake of jesting. The latter is milder for this reason: because it retains some benevolence. § 2. But that which does not have a double heart is not even to be called a lie. For example, if a sword should be entrusted to someone and he should promise that he will return it when the person who entrusted it asks for it, and if perhaps the latter, raging, should demand his sword again, it is manifest that it is not to be returned, lest he kill either himself or others, until sanity is restored to him. Here the one to whom the sword was entrusted does not have a double heart for this reason: when he promised that he would return it to the one asking, he did not think that the man might demand it while raging. § 3. It is manifest that sometimes keeping silent about the truth is not to be blamed, but saying what is false is not found to have been conceded to the saints.

C. XIV. Pro temporali uita alicuius perfectus mentiri non debet.

Item Augustinus in quinto Psalmo. [ad uersic.: "Perdes omnes, qui locuntur".] Ne quis arbitretur perfectum et spiritualem hominem pro ista temporali uita, morte cuius sua uel alterius non occiditur anima, debere mentiri, sed quoniam aliud est mentiri, aliud uerum occultare; siquidem aliud est falsum dicere, aliud uerum tacere; ut si quis forte non uelit ad istam uisibilem mortem hominem prodere, paratus esse debet uerum occultare, non falsum dicere, ut neque prodat, neque mentiatur, nec occidat animam suam pro corpore alterius. §. 1. Duo uero sunt genera mendaciorum, in quibus non est magna culpa, sed tamen non sunt sine culpa; cum aut iocamur, aut, proximo consulendo, mentimur. Illud autem primum in iocando ideo non est perniciosum, quia non fallit. Nouit enim ille, cui dicitur, iocandi causa fuisse dictum. Secundum autem ideo mitius est, quia retinet nonnullam beniuolentiam. §. 2. Illud uero, quod non habet duplex cor, nec mendacium quidem dicendum est, uerbi gratia, tamquam, si cui gladius conmendetur, et promittat se redditurum, cum ille, qui conmendauit poposcerit; si forte gladium suum repetat furens, manifestum est, non esse reddendum, ne uel se occidat, uel alios, donec ei sanitas restituatur. Hic ideo non habet duplex cor, quia ille, cui conmendatus est gladius, cum promittebat, se redditurum poscenti, non cogitabat furentem posse repetere. §. 3. Manifestum est non esse culpandum aliquando uerum tacere, falsum autem dicere non inuenitur concessum sanctis.

C. XV. We ought not to provide for another's safety by our sin.

The same in the book On Lying, [c. 17]. Let a man do what he can even for the temporal safety of men. But when matters have come to such a point that he cannot provide for such safety except by sinning, let him then judge that he has nothing he can do, since he has perceived that the remaining course is what he will rightly do.

C. XV. Nostro peccato alterius saluti consulere non debemus.

Idem in libro de mendacio. [c. 17.] Faciat homo etiam pro temporali salute hominum quod potest. Cum autem ad hoc uentum fuerit, ut tali saluti nisi peccando consulere non possit, iam se existimet non habere quid faciat, quando id reliquum esse prospexerit, quod recte faciet.

C. XVI. On the same.

Likewise Isidore in the Synonyms, [c. 10]. Flee every kind of lie with the greatest care. Speak falsely neither by chance nor deliberately; do not strive to lie in order to render assistance, nor defend anyone's life by any deceit. Beware of a lie in all things.

[PALEA.

> C. XVI. De eodem.
> Item Ysidorus in Sinonimis. [c. 10.] Omne genus mendacii summopere fuge, nec casu, nec studio loquaris falsum, nec, ut prestes, mentiri studeas, nec qualibet fallacia uitam alicuius defendas. Caue mendacium in omnibus.
> [PALEA.

C. XVII. On the same.

Likewise Augustine in the book On Lying, c. 6. If anyone who could be freed from death by your lie should flee to you, you are not to lie. For the mouth that lies kills the soul. And below: § 1. Therefore, since eternal life is lost by lying, one must never lie for anyone's temporal life.]

> C. XVII. De eodem.
> Item Augustinus in libro de mendacio, c. 6. Si quis ad te confugiat, qui mendacio, tuo possit a morte liberari, non es mentiturus. Os enim, quod mentitur, occidit animam. Et infra: §. 1. Cum ergo mentiendo uita eterna amittitur, numquam pro cuiusquam uita temporali mentiendum est.]

C. XVIII. Statements made in jest concerning things that are not are not reckoned as lies.

Likewise Augustine in the book Questions on Genesis, c. 45, [question 145]. What Joseph says to his brothers—"Did you not know that there is no man like me in divination?"—and the fact that he also commanded this to be said to them through the man concerning this divination: what he means is commonly asked. Or, because it was said not seriously but in jest, as the outcome taught, is it not to be held a lie? For lies are performed seriously by liars, not in jest. But when things that are not are said as though in jest, they are not reckoned as lies. GRATIAN. But in the Old Testament many things were permitted whose examples it is not lawful to use today. Hence Gregory, [book XVIII of the Moralia, c. 3]:

> C. XVIII. Non deputantur mendacia, cum ea, que non sunt, ioco dicuntur.
> Item Augustinus in libro questionum Genesis c. 45. [quest. 145.] Quod ait fratribus suis Ioseph: "Nesciebatis, quia non est in augurio homo, qualis ego?" de hoc augurio etiam mandauit eis dicendum per hominem, quid sibi uelit, queri solet. Aut quia non serio, sed ioco dictum est, ut exitus docuit, non est habendum mendacium? Mendacia enim a mendacibus serio aguntur, non ioco. Cum autem que non sunt tamquam ioco dicuntur, non deputantur mendacia. Gratian. Sed in ueteri testamento multa permittebantur, quorum exemplis hodie uti non licet. Unde Gregorius: [lib. XVIII. Moral., c. 3.]

C. XIX. It is not lawful to lie by the example of the ancients.

If anyone wishes to defend his lie by the Old Testament because perhaps it harmed certain persons less there, he must say that the seizure of others' property and the repayment of injury, which were conceded there to the weak, cannot harm him. It is clear to all with how great a severity Truth pursues all these things—Truth who, with the shadow of his signification now laid aside, is manifested to us in true flesh.

C. XIX. Veterum exemplo mentiri non licet.

Si quis per testamentum uetus uult suum tueri mendacium, quia minus illic quibusdam fortasse nocuerit, dicat necesse est, rerum alienarum raptum, dicat retributionem iniuriae, que infirmis illic concessa sunt, sibi nocere non posse. Que omnia cunctis liquet quanta animaduersione ueritas insequitur, que nobis iam significationis suae umbra postposita in uera carne declaratur.

C. XX. The midwives were rewarded for their piety but punished for their lie.

The same, [in the same book, c. 2]. If any fault is customarily purged by a subsequent pious work, how much more easily is this fault wiped away when piety itself, the mother of the good work, accompanies it? But certain persons strive to assert from the midwives' deceit that this kind of lie is not a sin, especially because, when they lied, it is written "that the Lord built houses for them." In that recompense it is more clearly known what the fault of lying merits. For the reward of their kindness, which could have been repaid to them in eternal life, was diverted to an earthly recompense by the preceding fault of lying. GRATIAN. Abraham also, speaking to his servants, said: "Sit here with the ass; I and the boy will pass over to that place, and when we have worshiped, we will return to you." Although he had resolved that he would do something else, nevertheless he is excused from lying. Hence Ambrose in the book On the Patriarchs: "He prophesied what he did not know. He alone intended to return after his son had been sacrificed. But the Lord spoke through his mouth what he was preparing. Yet he spoke captiously with the servants lest, when the affair was known, either someone impede him or make an uproar with groaning or weeping." PART V. § 1. Sometimes by commanding something we signify that we will it to be done, although we do not will it to be done, but seek a test of obedience, just as Abraham is read to have been tested by God when he was commanded to sacrifice his son, whom the Lord did not will to be killed by him. Hence in the same book the same Ambrose says: "For God did not will the son to be sacrificed by his father, nor did he who offered a ram to be sacrificed for the son will this offering to be completed, but he tested the father's disposition, whether he would prefer God's commands to his son." And below: "'Do not lay,' he said, 'your hand upon the boy, nor do anything to him. I investigated your disposition; I did not exact the deed. I tested your mind, whether you would not spare even your most beloved son because of me. I do not take away what I myself gave, nor do I begrudge the heir whom I bestowed upon one who had none.'"

C. XX. Obstetrices de pietate remuneratae de mendacio sunt punitae.

Idem. [eodem lib. cap. 2.] Si quelibet culpa sequenti solet pia operatione purgari, quanto magis hec facile abstergitur, quam mater boni operis pietas ipsa comitatur? Nonnulli uero obstetricum fallacia conantur asserere, hoc mendacii genus non esse peccatum, maxime quia illis mentientibus scriptum est: "quod edificauit eis domos Dominus." In qua magis reconpensatione cognoscitur, quid mendacii culpa mereatur. Nam benignitatis earum merces, que eis in eterna potuit uita retribui, premissa culpa mendacii in terrena est reconpensatione declinata. Gratian. Abraham quoque loquens ad pueros suos ait: "Sedete hic cum asina; ego et puer illuc usque pertransibimus, et, cum adorauerimus, reuertemur ad uos;" licet aliud se facturum deliberaret, tamen excusatur a mendacio. Unde Ambrosius in libro de Patriarchis: "Prophetauit, quod ignorabat. Ipse solus disponebat redire inmolato filio. Sed Dominus per os eius locutus est quod parabat. Captiose autem loquebatur cum seruulis, ne cognito negocio aut inpediret eum aliquis, aut gemitu obstreperet aut fletu." V. Pars. §. 1. Quandoque aliquid iubendo significamus uelle fieri, quod tamen fieri nolumus, sed experimentum obedientiae querimus, sicut Abraham a Deo temptatus legitur, cum iussus est inmolare filium, quem Dominus nolebat ab eo occidi. Unde in eodem libro idem Ambrosius: "Non enim uolebat Deus inmolari a patre filium, nec inpleri hoc munus uolebat, qui ouem pro filio inmolandam obtulit, sed temptabat affectum patris, si Dei precepta preferret filio." Et infra: "Non inicias, inquit, manum in puerum, neque facias ei quicquam. Affectum tuum inquisiui, non factum exegi; temptaui mentem tuam, si etiam filio dilectissimo non parceres propter me. Non aufero quod ipse donaui, nec heredem inuideo, quem largitus sum non habenti."

C. XXI. A useful simulation is to be assumed at the proper time.

Likewise Jerome, [in the letter to the Galatians, c. 2]. Let the example of Jehu, King of Israel, teach us that a useful simulation is to be assumed at the proper time. When he could not kill the priests of Baal unless he pretended that he wished to worship the idol, he said: "Gather to me all the priests of Baal. Ahab served him in few things; I will serve him in many." And David, when he changed his countenance before Abimelech, who dismissed him, and he departed. Nor is it remarkable that even just men nevertheless simulate certain things for a time for their own and others' safety, since our Lord himself, having neither sin nor the flesh of sin, assumed the simulation of sinful flesh so that, condemning sin in the flesh, he might make us the justice of God in himself. GRATIAN. Behold which lies are venial and which condemnable. § 1. But it is asked why Augustine says that one must not lie for someone's temporal life, when Abraham, descending into Egypt, asked Sarah to lie that she was his sister, saying: "I know that you are a beautiful woman, and that, when the Egyptians see you, they will say, 'She is his wife,' and they will kill me and preserve you. Say, therefore, I beseech you, that you are my sister, so that it may be well with me because of you and my soul may live by your favor." But Abraham wished not that a lie be said, but that the truth be kept silent. Hence the same Augustine says in Questions on Genesis, [question 26]:

C. XXI. Simulatio utilis est et in tempore assumenda.

Item Ieronimus. [in epist. ad Galatas, c. 2.] Utilem simulationem et in tempore assumendam, Ieu regis Israel nos doceat exemplum, qui, cum non potuisset interficere sacerdotes Baal, nisi finxisset se ydolum uelle colere, dicens: "Congregate michi omnes sacerdotes Baal. Achab seruiuit ei in paucis, ego seruiam sibi in multis." Et Dauid, quando mutauit faciem suam coram Abimelech, et dimisit eum, et abiit. Nec mirum quamuis iustos homines tamen aliqua simulare pro tempore ob suam et aliorum salutem, cum et ipse Dominus noster, non habens peccatum, nec carnem peccati, simulationem peccatricis carnis assumpsit, ut, condempnans, in carne peccatum, nos in se faceret iusticiam Dei. Gratian. Ecce, que mendacia sint uenialia, et que dampnabilia. §. 1. Sed queritur, quare Augustinus dicat, non esse mentiendum pro temporali uita alicuius, cum Abraham descendens in Egiptum rogauerit Saram, ut sororem eius se esse mentiretur, dicens: "Noui, quod pulcra sis mulier, et quod, cum uiderint te Egiptii, dicturi sunt, uxor illius est, et interficient me, et te reseruabunt. Dic ergo, obsecro te, quod soror mea sis, ut bene sit michi propter te, et uiuet anima mea ob gratiam tui." Sed Abraham non mendacium dici, sed uerum taceri uoluit. Unde idem Augustinus ait in questionum Genesis: [quest. 26.]

C. XXII. How Abraham, who said that Sarah was his sister, is excused from lying.

It is asked why the Patriarch wished to lie by saying that Sarah was his sister, and did not rather entrust the matter to God, who, if he wished, could preserve her chastity before Pharaoh. But he wished the truth to be concealed, not a lie to be told. For she is called his sister because she was his brother's daughter. And in this it is shown that no one ought to tempt his God when he has something that he may do by reasonable counsel. He did what he could; what he could not do he entrusted to God, in whom he hoped, and neither faith nor hope failed him. But if, when questioned, he had indicated that she was his wife, he would have entrusted two things to God: his own life and his wife's chastity. GRATIAN. Likewise it is objected that Jacob by lying both benefited himself and harmed another, and nevertheless is not reproved but commended. But Jacob, by saying that he was Esau the firstborn, did not lie. For he did not say that he was firstborn by birth, but duly entered upon the right of primogeniture when the other sold it. Thus Christ also said that John was Elijah—not in person, but in imitation of virtue. Therefore Jacob was Esau, not by birth, as we have said, but by the purchase of the rights of the firstborn, passing from one not firstborn into the firstborn, just as Esau himself, by selling the rights of the firstborn, deserved to be made from the firstborn one not firstborn. Thus also the Jews, although they were children of Abraham by the flesh, because they were not his children by imitation, are not reckoned among the children of Abraham but are called children of the devil, whose children they are not by birth but by imitation. Hence they deserved to hear from the Lord: "If you are children of Abraham, do the works of Abraham. But now you seek to kill me, a man who has spoken the truth to you. Abraham did not do this. You are of your father the devil, and you will to do the desires of your father." § 1. Conversely, although the gentiles according to carnal origin were strangers to Abraham, nevertheless by imitation of faith and justice they succeeded among the children of Abraham. Hence it is said to them by the Apostle: "But if you are Christ's, then you are Abraham's seed." Therefore the same Apostle, writing to the Romans, says: "O Jew, if you are circumcised but do not observe his law, your circumcision has become foreskin; just as the foreskin, if it keeps the just requirements of the law, is reckoned as circumcision." Therefore, as is gathered from the foregoing, imitation in deed is preferred to origin in the flesh. Thus Jacob truthfully, not falsely, said that he was Esau; and not by lying but by speaking truth did he benefit himself, while he did not harm the other, because he received the blessing owed to himself and did not surreptitiously take another's. § 2. But this bishop concerning whom the case is being considered, although he swore falsely, nevertheless, because, as was said above, nothing but a guilty mind makes the tongue guilty, is by no means held guilty of perjury. This is also proved by the example of Saul. When he was in the camp about to fight against the Philistines, he swore that he would kill whoever ate before sunset. But his son Jonathan, not having heard the king's oath, after he had made a great slaughter of the enemy by fighting and had wrought salvation in Israel, being afflicted by hunger saw a honeycomb, which he took with the royal staff that he carried in his hands and ate. Immediately his eyes, which hunger had almost closed, were opened, and his face was made cheerful. When this was discovered, Saul wished to deliver him to death; but, appeased by the prayers and pious supplication of the people, he revoked the sentence of death, so that the one through whom salvation had been given in Israel and by whose fighting that people had been freed from the hands of the enemy might not be killed. Behold, Saul swore falsely, because, provoked by the prayers of the people, he did not do what he had decreed by swearing that he would do. Nevertheless, he is not accused as guilty of perjury, because, insofar as it lay with him, he fulfilled what he swore when he gave a sentence of death against his son, which he revoked not from carnal affection but by the people's supplication.

C. XXII. Quomodo Abraham excusetur de mendacio, qui Saram sororem suam esse dixit.

Queritur, cur Patriarcha mentiri uoluit, ut diceret Saram sororem suam, et non potius Deo conmisit, qui, si uellet, eius pudicitiam apud Pharaonem seruare posset. Sed ueritatem uoluit celari, non mendacium dici. Soror enim dicitur, quia filia fratris erat. Et in hoc ostenditur, quod nemo debet temptare Deum suum, dum habet quod rationabili consilio faciat. Fecit quod potuit: quod non potuit Deo conmisit, in quem sperauit, nec eum fides aut spes fefellit. Si autem interrogatus illam uxorem suam indicaret, duas res conmitteret Deo, et uitam suam, et uxoris pudicitiam. Gratian. Item opponitur, quod Iacob mentiendo et sibi profuit, et alii nocuit, nec tamen reprehenditur, sed conmendatur. Sed Iacob dicendo se esse Esau primogenitum, non est mentitus. Non enim dixit, se esse primogenitum nascendo, sed ius primogeniturae, illo uendente, rite adeundo. Sic et Christus Iohannem dixit esse Heliam, non persona, sed imitatione uirtutis. Erat ergo Iacob Esau, non nascendo, ut diximus, sed emptione primogenitorum, de non primogenito in primogenitum transeundo, sicut et ipse Esau primogenita uendendo de primogenito non primogenitus fieri meruit. Sic et Iudei, cum essent filii Abrahae carne, quia non fuerunt filii eius imitatione, non deputantur inter filios Abrahae, sed dicuntur filii diaboli, cuius filii sunt, non nascendo, sed imitando. Unde a Domino audire meruerunt: "Si filii Abrahae estis, opera Abrahae facite; nunc autem queritis me interficere, hominem, qui ueritatem locutus sum uobis. Hoc Abraham non fecit. Vos ex patre diabolo estis, et desideria patris uestri facere uultis." §. 1. Econtra gentiles, cum secundum originem carnis ab Abraham essent alieni, tamen imitatione fidei et iusticiae successerunt in filios Abrahae. Unde ab Apostolo dicitur eisdem: "Si autem Christi, ergo Abrahae semen estis." Hinc idem Apostolus scribens Romanis ait: "O tu Iudee, si circumcidaris, nec legem eius obserues, circumcisio tua preputium facta est, quomodo et preputium, si iusticias legis custodiat, in circumcisionem reputatur." Prefertur ergo, ut ex premissis colligitur, imitatio operis origini carnis. Veraciter ergo, non mendaciter, Iacob se dixit Esau esse; nec mentiendo, sed uerum dicendo sibi profuit, alteri uero non nocuit, quia benedictionem sibi debitam accepit, non alienum subripuit. §. 2. Episcopus uero iste, de quo agitur, etsi falsum iurauit, tamen quia, ut supra dictum est, ream linguam non facit nisi rea mens, nequaquam reus periurii habetur. Probatur etiam hoc exemplo Saulis, qui, cum esset in castris pugnaturus contra Philisteos, iurauit se interfecturum quicumque ante solis occasum comederet. Ionathas autem filius eius non audito regis iuramento, cum pugnando magnam hostium stragem dedisset, et salutem fecisset in Israel, fame laborans uidit fauum mellis, quem regia uirga, quam gestabat in manibus, accepit et comedit, statimque oculi, quos fere fames clauserat, aperti sunt, et facies eius est exhilarata. Quo conperto Saul uoluit eum dare neci; sed precibus et pia populi supplicatione placatus mortis reuocauit sententiam, ne interficeretur ille, per quem salus data erat in Israel, et quo pugnante de manibus hostium populus ille liberatus fuerat. Ecce Saul falsum iurauit, quia quod iurando se facturum decreuit precibus populi prouocatus non fecit. Nec tamen periurii reus arguitur, quia quantum in ipso fuit, quod iurauit inpleuit, dum sententiam mortis in filium dedit, quam non carnali affectu, sed populi supplicatione reuocauit.

GRATIAN. Therefore, since, as has been shown by reason and example, the bishop was not guilty of perjury, the customary obedience ought not to have been denied him by the archdeacon, since even if it were established that he was criminal, nevertheless, before a definitive sentence, as was shown above, it would be lawful for none of his clerics to withdraw from him. It is therefore established that what the archdeacon confirmed by oath is unlawful. Hence it is rightly asked whether it ought to be observed or not.

GRATIANUS. Cum ergo, ut ratione et exemplo monstratum est, episcopus reus periurii non esset, consueta obedientia ab archidiacono sibi denegari non debuit, cum etiamsi criminosum illum esse constaret ante diffinitiuam tamen sententiam, ut supra monstratum est, nulli suorum clericorum ab eo liceret discedere. Constat ergo illicitum esse quod archidiaconus iuramento firmauit. Unde merito queritur, an debeat seruari, uel non?

Question IV

GRATIAN. PART III. That unlawful oaths ought not to be observed is read in the Eighth Council of Toledo, [c. 2], in which it was established thus:

GRATIANUS. III. Pars. Quod autem illicita iuramenta seruari non debeant, in Tolletano Concilio VIII. [cap. 2.] legitur, in quo sic statutum est:

C. I. It is better not to fulfill the vows of a foolish promise than to commit a crime.

If in public records of oaths—may God avert it—an unlawful or evil condition had been alleged by any persons, which would compel someone either to slaughter the life of his father or to violate a most consecrated virgin, would it not be more tolerable to reject the vows of a foolish promise than, through observance of useless promises, to fulfill a measure of crimes that ought to be abhorred?

C. I. Melius est uota stultae promissionis non inplere quam crimen admittere.

Si publicis sacramentorum gestis (quod Deus auertat) a quibuslibet illicita uel non bona extitisset conditio allegata, que aut iugulare animam patris, aut gerere conpelleret stuprum sacratissimae uirginis, numquid non tollerabilius esset stultae promissionis uota reicere, quam per inutilium promissorum custodiam exorrendam criminum inplere mensuram?

C. II. Sometimes it is not expedient to discharge a promised oath.

Likewise Ambrose, On Duties, book I, [c. 50]. Sometimes it is even contrary to duty to discharge a promised oath, as Herod, who swore that he would give the daughter of Herodias whatever she asked, furnished the death of John lest he deny what he had promised. GRATIAN. Likewise in the sermon of Saint Augustine the Bishop on the beheading of Saint John the Baptist, which begins, "When the holy Gospel was read":

C. II. Aliquando non expedit promissum soluere sacramentum.

Item Ambrosius de offitiis, libro I. [cap. 50.] Est etiam contra offitium nonnumquam promissum soluere sacramentum, ut Herodes, qui iurauit, quoniam quicquid petitura esset daret filiae Herodiadis, necem Iohannis prestauit, ne promissum negaret. Gratian. Item in sermone S. Augustini Episcopi de decollatione S. Iohannis Baptistae, qui sic incipit: "Cum sanctum euangelium legeretur":

C. III. It was piety that David did not kill Nabal as he had sworn.

That David did not fulfill his oath through the shedding of blood was greater piety. I see David, a pious and holy man, to have fallen into a rash oath and to have preferred not to do what he had sworn rather than to fulfill his oath by the shedding of a man's blood.

C. III. Pietas fuit, quod Dauid Nabal, sicut iurauerat, non occidit.

Quod Dauid iuramentum per sanguinis effusionem non inpleuit, maior pietas fuit. Video Dauid pium hominem et sanctum in iurationem temerariam incidisse, et maluisse non facere quod iurauerat, quam iurationem suam hominis fuso sanguine inplere.

C. IV. On the same. Likewise.

David swore rashly, but through greater piety he did not fulfill the oath. § 1. Behold, although holy David was bound by an oath, he did not shed a man's blood; but who will be able to deny that he swore falsely? Of two sins he chose the lesser, but it was less in comparison with the worse. For, weighed by itself, to swear falsely is a great evil.

> C. IV. De eodem. Item.
> Iurauit Dauid temere, sed non inpleuit iurationem maiori pietate. §. 1. Ecce Dauid S. iuramento quidem astrictus non fudit sanguinem hominis: sed eum falsum iurasse negare quis poterit? De duobus peccatis minimum elegit; sed minus fuit illud in conparatione peioris. Nam, per se ipsum appensum, magnum malum est falsa iurare.

C. V. Base vows are not to be observed.

Likewise Isidore in the Synonyms, book II. In evil promises, break your pledge. In a base vow, change your decree. Do not do what you vowed incautiously. A promise that is fulfilled by crime is impious.

> C. V. Turpia uota seruanda non sunt.
> Item Ysidorus in Sinonimis, libro secundo. In malis promissis rescinde fidem. In turpi uoto muta decretum. Quod incaute uouisti non facias. Inpia est promissio, que scelere adinpletur.

C. VI. An oath by which evil is incautiously promised is not to be observed.

Likewise Bede in homily 44, [on the feast of the beheading of Saint John]. If perhaps it should happen that we swear somewhat incautiously to something which, if observed, would incline toward a worse outcome, let us know that it is freely to be changed by more salutary counsel, and that under pressing necessity we are rather to commit perjury than, for the sake of avoiding perjury, to turn aside into another, graver crime. Finally, David swore by God to kill Nabal, a foolish and impious man, and to destroy everything that pertained to him. But immediately, at the first intercession of Abigail, a prudent woman, he remitted his threats, called the sword back into its sheath, and did not grieve that he had contracted any fault for such perjury.

> C. VI. Non est obseruandum iuramentum, quo malum incaute promittitur.
> Item Beda in omelia XLIV. [in natali decollationis S. Iohannis] Si aliquid forte nos incautius iurare contigerit, quod obseruatum peiorem uergat in exitum, libere illud salubriore consilio mutandum nouerimus, ac magis instante necessitate peierandum nobis, quam pro uitando periurio in aliud crimen grauius esse diuertendum. Denique iurauit Dauid per Deum occidere Nabal uirum stultum et inpium, atque omnia, que ad eum pertinebant demoliri. Sed ad primam intercessionem Abigail feminae prudentis mox remisit minas, reuocauit ensem in uaginam, neque aliquid culpae se pro tali periurio contraxisse doluit.

C. VII. Of two evils, one ought to choose the lesser.

Likewise, [in the same place]. Not only in swearing but in everything that we do, this moderation is to be observed with especial care: if perhaps through the snares of the cunning enemy we fall into such a lapse from which we cannot rise without some contagion of sin, we should seek that passage of escape in which we perceive that we will suffer less danger.

> C. VII. De duobus malis minus eligi oportet.

Item. [ibidem] Non solum in iurando, sed in omne, quod agimus, hec est moderatio sollicitius obseruanda, ut, si talem forte in lapsum uersuti hostis inciderimus insidiis, ex quo sine aliquo peccati contagio surgere non possumus, illum pocius euadendi aditum petamus, in quo minus periculi nos perpessuros esse cernimus.

C. VIII. It is more tolerable not to fulfill an oath than to do what is base.

Likewise Ambrose, On Duties, [book III, c. 12]. Let each person bring forth simple speech; let him possess his vessel in sanctification and not ensnare his brother by a circumvention of words. Let him promise nothing dishonorable; or, if he has promised, it is more tolerable not to do what was promised than to do what is base. Frequently many bind themselves by the solemnity of an oath, and although they themselves have recognized that the promise ought not to have been made, nevertheless, out of regard for the oath, they do what they pledged, as we wrote above concerning Herod, who basely promised a reward to the dancing girl and cruelly discharged it. It is base that a kingdom is promised for dancing; it is cruel that the death of the Prophet is given for reverence of an oath. How much more tolerable would perjury have been than such an oath? If, nevertheless, that which he had sworn when drunk amid wine and promised under oath amid choruses of dancers could be called perjury. The Prophet's head is brought in upon a platter, and that which was a matter of friendship was reckoned to be fidelity. And after a few things, discoursing concerning Jephthah: § 1. "A miserable necessity," he says, "which is discharged by parricide. It is better not to vow that which the one to whom it is promised does not wish to be discharged to himself." And a little afterward: § 2. "Therefore not all promises are always to be discharged. Finally, the Lord himself, as Scripture indicates, frequently changes his sentence."

C. VIII. Tollerabilius est iuramentum non inplere, quam quod turpe est facere.

Item Ambrosius de offitiis. [lib. III., c. 12.] Unusquisque simplicem sermonem proferat; uas suum in sanctificatione possideat, nec fratrem circumscriptione inducat uerborum; nichil promittat inhonestum, aut, si promiserit, tollerabilius est promissum non facere, quam facere quod turpe sit. Sepe plerique constringunt se iurisiurandi sacramento, et cum ipsi cognouerint promittendum non fuisse, sacramenti tamen contemplatione faciunt quod spoponderunt, sicut de Herode supra scripsimus, qui saltatrici premium turpiter promisit, crudeliter soluit. Turpe est, quod regnum pro saltatione promittitur; crudele, quod mors Prophetae pro iurisiurandi religione donatur. Quanto tollerabilius tali fuisset periurium sacramento? Si tamen periurium dici posset quod ebrius inter uina iurauerat, quod et iuratus inter saltantium choros promiserat. Infertur disco Prophetae caput, et hoc estimatum est fidei esse, quod amicitiae fuit. Et post pauca de Iepte disserens: §. 1. Miserabilis, inquit, necessitas, que soluitur patricidio. Melius est non uouere id, quod sibi is, cui promittitur, nolit exsolui. Et post paululum: §. 2. Non semper igitur promissa soluenda sunt omnia. Denique ipse Dominus, sicut scriptura indicat, frequenter suam mutat sententiam.

C. IX. The immutable God sometimes changes his statutes.

Likewise from the Council of Toledo, [VIII, c. 2]. The nature of the highest God, immutable and always existing as the same, is often read in the sacred writings to have changed its promises and to have tempered a sentence for the sake of mercy. Hence, although he is impassible and immutable, nevertheless both his oaths and his repentance, which stand covered in sacred mysteries, are frequently read of. For God to swear is in no way to overturn what has been ordained by himself; but to repent is to change those same ordinances when he wishes. For thus he says through Jeremiah:

"Suddenly I will speak against a nation and against a kingdom, that I may uproot, destroy, and ruin it. If that nation shall have done penance for its evil, I too will repent of the evil that I thought to do to it."

C. IX. Inconmutabilis Deus quandoque sua mutat statuta.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano. [VIII. c. 2.] Inconmutabilis idemque semper existens Dei summi natura sua sepe in sacris litteris legitur mutasse promissa, et pro misericordia temperasse sententiam. Unde licet sit inpassibilis atque inconmutabilis, crebro tamen eius et iuramenta leguntur, et penitencia, que sacris extant misteriis adoperta. Iurare namque Dei est a se ipso nullatenus ordinata conuellere: penitere uero eadem ordinata, cum uoluerit, inmutare. Sic enim per Iheremiam dicit: "Repente loquar aduersum gentem, et aduersus regnum, ut eradicem et destruam et disperdam illud. Si penitenciam egerit gens illa malo suo, agam ego penitenciam a malo, quod cogitaui, ut facerem ei".

C. X. It belongs to a wise man to retract what he speaks badly.

Likewise Augustine. It is a matter of great wisdom for a man to retract what he has spoken badly.

C. X. Sapientis est quod male loquitur reuocare.

Item Augustinus. Magnae sapientiae est reuocare hominem quod male locutus est.

C. XI. With what penalty one who makes an unlawful oath is to be struck.

Likewise from the Council of Lérida, [c. 8]. One who has bound himself by an oath so that, while litigating with anyone, he will in no way return to peace is, for perjury, to be separated for one year from communion in the body and blood of the Lord, and is to absolve his guilt by alms, tears, and as many fasts as he can. But let him hasten quickly to come to charity, which covers a multitude of sins.

C. XI. Qua pena feriatur qui illicitum iuramentum facit.

Item ex Concilio Ylerdensi. [c. 8.] Qui sacramento se obligauerit, ut litigans cum quolibet ad pacem nullo modo redeat, pro periurio uno anno a conmunione corporis et sanguinis Domini segregatus, reatum suum elemosinis, fletibus et quantis potuerit ieiuniis absoluat. Ad karitatem uero, que operit multitudinem peccatorum, celeriter uenire festinet.

C. XII. Not all promises are to be discharged.

Likewise. Not all promises are always to be discharged. Finally, the Lord himself frequently changes his sentence, as Scripture indicates.

C. XII. Non omnia promissa soluenda sunt.

Item. Non semper promissa omnia soluenda sunt. Denique ipse Dominus frequenter mutat sententiam, sicut scriptura indicat.

C. XIII. On the same.

Likewise Isidore, Sentences, book II, [c. 31]. An oath by which evil is incautiously promised is not to be observed, as if someone should promise an adulteress that he will preserve perpetual fidelity by remaining with her. For it is more tolerable not to fulfill the oath than to remain in the crime of fornication.

C. XIII. De eodem.

Item Ysidorus Sententiarum libro II. [c. 31.] Non est obseruandum sacramentum, quo malum incaute promittitur, ueluti si quispiam adulterae perpetuam fidem cum ea permanendi polliceatur. Tollerabilius est enim non inplere sacramentum, quam permanere in stupri flagitio.

C. XIV. Let one who swears badly do penance.

Likewise from the Council of Toledo, c. 9. It is necessary that one who swears badly do worthy penance because, contrary to the Lord's command, he took his name in vain, since it is written in Exodus: "For the Lord will not hold guiltless the one who has taken the name of the Lord his God in vain."

C. XIV. Male iurans penitenciam agat.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano, c. 9. Necesse est, ut male iurans dignam penitenciam agat, eo quod nomen Domini contra preceptum illius sumpsit in uanum, quia in Exodo scriptum est: "Neque enim insontem habebit Dominus eum, qui assumpsit nomen Domini Dei sui frustra."

[C. XV.] Likewise in Leviticus.

"You shall not swear falsely in my name, nor pollute the name of the Lord your God; I am the Lord." Nevertheless, let him by no means do the evil that he vowed by an oath that he would do, because foolish vows are to be broken.

[C. XV.] Item in Leuitico.

"Non periurabis in nomine meo, nec pollues nomen Domini Dei tui, ego Dominus." Malum tamen, quod facturum se sacramento deuouerit, omnino non faciat, quia stulta uota frangenda sunt.

C. XVI. An oath by which evil is incautiously promised is not to be observed.

Likewise from the Decree of Pope Soter, c. 3. If perhaps it should happen that we have sworn somewhat incautiously to something which, if observed, would incline toward a worse outcome, let us know that it is to be changed by more salutary counsel, and that under pressing necessity we are rather to commit perjury than, on account of the oath that was made, to turn aside into another, greater crime.

C. XVI. Iuramentum, quo malum incaute promittitur, non est seruandum.

Item ex Decreto Sotheris Papae, c. 3. Si aliquid forte incautius nos iurasse contigerit, quod obseruatum peiorem uergat in exitum, illud consilio salubriori mutandum nouerimus, et magis instante necessitate periurandum nobis, quam pro facto iuramento in aliud crimen maius esse diuertendum.

C. XVII. Rashness is amended when an incautious determination is dissolved.

Likewise from the Council of Elvira, c. 1. An incautious determination is laudably to be dissolved; this is not transgression but the correction of rashness.

C. XVII. Temeritas emendetur, cum diffinitio incauta soluitur.

Item ex Concilio Eliberitano, c. 1. Diffinitio incauta laudabiliter soluenda est, nec est preuaricatio, sed temeritatis emendatio.

C. XVIII. An unlawful oath is not to be observed.

Likewise, the fourth action of the Seventh Synod. John, the representative of the eastern sees, said: "The discourse of our father Sophronius signifies that it is better for one who swears to commit perjury than to observe an oath in the breaking of sacred images. But we say this because certain persons excuse themselves by an oath." Patriarch Tarasius said: "Because Father Sophronius knew the goodness of God, for that reason he wished to transgress the impious oath." Likewise: § 1. Patriarch Tarasius said: "Herod observed his oath and perished; but Peter denied with an oath, and, having been converted, he wept and was saved. For the good God forgives every sin if anyone repents with his whole heart." The holy synod said: "Thus holy Scripture teaches." Likewise Leontius, Bishop of Phocaea, said: "It is written: 'Do not love a lying oath.' For this reason let our lying oath be dissolved as having no force."

> C. XVIII. Illicitum iuramentum non est seruandum.
> Item. Actio quarta septimae sinodi. Iohannes apocrisarius orientalium sedium dixit: Significat sermo patris nostri Sophronii, quod melius sit iurantem periurare, quam seruare sacramentum in fractione sacrarum ymaginum. Hoc autem dicimus, quia sacramento quidam se excusant. Tarasius patriarcha dixit: Quia pater Sophronius nouerat bonitatem Dei, propterea transgredi uoluit inpium iuramentum. Item: §. 1. Tarasius patriarcha dixit: Herodes obseruauit iuramentum, et periit: Petrus uero negauit cum iuramento, et conuersus fleuit, et saluatus est. Omne enim peccatum bonus Deus indulget, si quis ex toto corde peniteat. Sancta sinodus dixit: Sic docet sancta scriptura. Item Leontius episcopus Fociae dicit: Scriptum est: "Iuramentum mendax ne diligatis." Qua de causa iuramentum nostrum mendax dissoluatur, quasi nullam habens uirtutem.

C. XIX. Oaths made contrary to divine commands are not to be observed.

Likewise Isidore. If anyone shall have been forestalled so that he determines to do any of those things that do not please God, let him do penance, and let what was established contrary to the command of the Lord be revoked as void. Likewise Jerome in the book On the Nature of Things: § 1. Indeed, oaths contracted in three ways are to be dissolved. First, when someone swears badly. Second, when someone swears incautiously, not thinking this to be a sin. Third, if boys or girls in their parents' house shall have bound themselves by an oath and their fathers, after hearing of it, contradict them. PART II. GRATIAN. Behold, unlawful oaths are laudably dissolved and condemnably observed. This is to be understood when an unlawful oath is abandoned so that one may return to good. § 1. But if it is abandoned so that one may pass into another evil, the unlawful oath is condemnably observed, but is more condemnably contemned. Hence Augustine, On the Good of Marriage, [c. 4]:

> C. XIX. Non obseruentur iuramenta, que fiunt contra diuina mandata.
> Item Ysidorus. Si quis preuentus fuerit, ut diffiniat agere aliquid eorum, que non placent Deo, penitenciam agat, et quod contra mandatum Domini statutum est in irritum reuocetur. Item Ieronimus in libro de natura rerum: §. 1. Tribus siquidem modis iuramenta contracta soluenda sunt. Primo, cum quis male iurat. Secundo, cum quis incaute iurat, non putans hoc esse peccatum. Tertio, si pueri uel puellae in domo parentum se iuramento constrinxerint, patribus post, quam audierint, contradicentibus. II. Pars. Gratian. Ecce, quod iuramenta illicita laudabiliter soluuntur, dampnabiliter obseruantur. Quod tunc intelligendum est, quando iuramentum illicitum deseritur, ut ad bonum redeatur. §. 1. Ceterum si propterea deseritur, ut in aliud malum transeatur, illicitum sacramentum dampnabiliter seruatur, sed dampnabilius contempnitur. Unde Augustinus de bono coniugali: [c. 4.]

C. XX. A pledge that is employed for committing sin is not to be called fidelity.

If fidelity is employed for committing sin, it is remarkable if it is called fidelity. Nevertheless, of whatever kind it may be, if one also acts contrary to it, it is worse—unless it is abandoned for this reason, that one may return to true and lawful fidelity, that is, that the sin may be amended when the depravity of the will has been corrected. It is as if someone, when he cannot despoil a man alone, should find a partner in iniquity and make a pact with him that they will do this together and divide the spoil; and, when this crime has been committed, he alone should take away the whole. The other man indeed grieves and complains that fidelity was not preserved toward him; but in his very complaint he ought to consider that fidelity should instead have been preserved toward human society in a good life, so that unjust plunder would not be taken from a man, if he perceives how unjustly fidelity was not preserved toward him in the partnership of sin. For the former is faithless in both respects and certainly is to be judged more criminal.

> Si ad peccatum admittendum fides adhibetur mirum, si fides appelletur. Verumtamen, qualiscumque sit, si et contra ipsam fit, peius est, nisi cum propterea deseritur, ut ad fidem ueram legitimamque redeatur, id est ut peccatum emendetur uoluntatis prauitate correcta, tamquam si quisque, cum hominem solus expoliare non possit, inueniat socium iniquitatis, et cum eo paciscatur, ut simul id faciant, spoliumque partiantur, quo facinore conmisso totum solus auferat. Dolet quidem ille, et seruatam sibi non esse fidem conqueritur; uerum in ipsa sua querela cogitare debet, potius in bona uita ipsi humanae societati fuisse seruandum, ne preda iniqua ex homine fieret, si sentit, quam inique sibi in peccati societate seruata non fuerit. Ille quippe utrobique perfidus ac profecto sceleratior iudicandus est.

C. XXI. If a pledge is not preserved so that one may return to good, it is not for that reason said to be violated.

Likewise. If a woman, after violating marital fidelity, preserves fidelity toward an adulterer, she is certainly evil; if she does not preserve it even toward the adulterer, she is worse. But if she repents of the crime and, returning to marital chastity, rescinds the adulterous agreements and promises, I wonder whether even the adulterer himself will think her a violator of fidelity. GRATIAN. From these things, therefore, it appears that if anyone, as we said, does not observe an unlawful oath so that he may incline toward another pernicious evil, he sins the more gravely, the more condemnably sins are accumulated upon sins. But if it is abandoned so that one may return to good, no fault is contracted for such perjury; rather, it is to be lamented if it has happened that we sinned in anything on the occasion of that oath. Hence Augustine writes to Severus, Bishop of Milevis, who consulted him concerning a certain Hubald. Hubald had been compelled by the relatives of a certain concubine to swear that he would take her as his wife and would no longer furnish necessities to his mother or brothers. Therefore, as we have said, blessed Augustine writes back to Severus, Bishop of Milevis, speaking thus:

> Item. Mulier, si fide coniugali uiolata fidem seruet adultero, utique mala est; si nec adultero, peior. Porro si eam flagicii peniteat, et ad castitatem rediens coniugalem pacta ac placita adulterina rescindat, miror, si eam fidei uiolatricem uel ipse adulter putabit. Gratian. Ex his itaque apparet, quod si quisquam, ut diximus, illicitum iuramentum non seruauerit, ut in aliud malum perniciosum declinet, tanto grauius delinquit, quanto dampnabilius accumulantur peccata peccatis. Si autem propterea deseritur, ut ad bonum redeatur, nichil culpae pro tali periurio contrahitur; potius deflendum est, si in aliquo illius iuramenti occasione nos deliquisse contigerit. Unde Augustinus scribit Seuero Mileuitano Episcopo, consulenti de quodam Hubaldo, qui a consanguineis cuiusdam pelicis coactus fuerat iurare, se illam ducturum in coniugem, nec matri suae uel fratribus ulterius necessaria subministraturum. Rescribit ergo B. Augustinus, ut diximus, Seuero Mileuitano Episcopo, ita dicens:

C. XXII. Concerning a certain Hubald, who swore that he would not furnish necessities to his mother and brothers.

Among other things, as you had asked, I inquired of our father Ambrose what you, dearest brother, are to do concerning Hubald, your parishioner, who, after being captured and driven by fear of death, confirmed by oath to his concubine that he would take her as his wife, expel his own mother from the house together with his brothers, and never furnish them anything for sustenance. But because it is not a sin to take as wife the woman whom he previously had, let the marriage be firm and stable in God. § 1. Furthermore, an oath is not found to have been instituted for this reason: that it should be a bond of iniquity, matricide, fratricide, or any crime whatsoever. Nor do I believe that an oath ought to be made for this purpose: that an unjust oath should be the stripping of their goods from those who swear unjustly and eternal condemnation to the one who receives it. For the penalty of perjury strikes, and he will be struck down as by hail like a murderer in the final examination by the just Judge, through whom the sacrosanct Gospel is brought forward for something unjust, unlawful, and in no way pleasing to God, as though it were testimony to a just and humane petition. § 2. Therefore let Hubald support his mother and brothers, and let him lament if, through compulsion and fear of the oath, anything was lacking to his mother. But let those who compelled him to swear what he ought not be held bound by the guilt of the perjury in which they were implicated. For an injury unjustly inflicted is the disgrace of the one who does it. Nor is that which an unlawful condition of necessity extorted in any way drawn to the reproach of a coerced will. PART III. GRATIAN. But although by all these authorities unlawful oaths are proved not to be observed, it is objected that Joshua did not destroy the Gibeonites contrary to the Lord's command because the elders of Israel had confirmed peace with them by oath. But it is to be noted that the elders of Israel, although they knew that it had been commanded by the Lord that they destroy the nations of the promised land, nevertheless, having been deceived by the Gibeonites, did not know that they were inhabitants of the land promised to them. For they came, as the history relates, with worn-out shoes and dry loaves, saying: "We are peaceful men; we have come from a distant land. The shoes are worn out on our feet; the bread has failed in our sacks. We have heard that the Lord is with you, and we have come to make peace." This speech pleased the elders of Israel, and they made peace with them. But after the third day, when the children of Israel approached the Gibeonites, those to whom the elders of Israel had sworn met them. Then, seeing that they had been deceived, they wished to destroy them; but Joshua spared them because of the oath of the elders of Israel. Hence Ambrose in the book On Duties, [III, c. 10]:

C. XXII. De quodam Hubaldo, qui iurauit se non ministraturum necessaria matri et fratribus.

Inter cetera, ut rogaueras, a patre nostro Ambrosio quesiui, quid tibi, karissime, agendum sit de Hubaldo parrochiano tuo, qui captus et timore necis inpulsus suae concubinae iuramento firmauit ipsam in coniugem suscipere, propriamque matrem de domo cum fratribus expellere, nichilque eis alimoniae umquam inpendere. Quia uero quam prius habuerat non est peccatum in coniugem suscipere, matrimonium sit in Deo firmum et stabile. §. 1. Porro iuramentum non ob hoc inuenitur fuisse institutum, ut esset uinculum iniquitatis, uel matricidii, uel fratricidii, seu cuiuscumque criminis. Nec credo sacramentum ad hoc debere fieri, ut iniusta iuratio suorum bonorum sit iniuste iurantibus expoliatio, et accipienti eterna dampnatio. Periurii namque pena percutitur, et uelut homicida in extremo examine a iusto iudice degrandinabitur, per quem sacrosanctum euangelium ad iniustum et illicitum, et Deo minime amabile, quasi testimonium iustae et humanae petitionis adducitur. §. 2. Foueat itaque Hubaldus matrem et fratres, et lugeat, si coactione et timore iuramenti aliquid defuit matri. Qui uero eum iurare coegerunt quod non debuit, reatu periurii inpliciti teneantur. Iniuria quippe iniuste irrogata eius est infamia, qui facit. Nec enim ullo modo ad obprobrium coactae uoluntatis trahitur quod illicita conditio necessitatis extorsit. III. Pars. Gratian. Sed cum his omnibus illicita iuramenta non seruanda probentur, obponitur, quod Iosue Gabaonitas contra preceptum Domini non deleuerit, quia seniores Israel cum eis iuramento pacem firmauerant. Sed notandum est, quod seniores Israel, etsi scirent a Domino esse inperatum, ut delerent gentes terrae promissionis, decepti tamen a Gabaonitis eos nesciebant esse incolas terrae sibi promissae. Venerunt enim (ut historia refert) attritis calciamentis, et cum aridis panibus, dicentes: Viri pacifici, uenimus de terra longinqua, calciamenta sunt attrita in pedibus nostris; panis defecit in sistarciis nostris; audiuimus Dominum esse uobiscum, et uenimus conponere pacem. Quod uerbum placuit senioribus Israel, et fecerunt pacem cum eis. Post diem autem tertium, cum filii Israel appropinquarent Gabaonitis, occurrerunt eis, quibus iurauerant seniores Israel. Illi autem uidentes se esse deceptos, uoluerunt delere eos, sed pepercit eis Iosue propter iuramentum seniorum Israel. Unde Ambrosius in libro de Offitiis: [III., c. 10.]

C. XXIII. Certain things, although prohibited by God, nevertheless are not to be avoided when confirmed by oath.

"The innocent believes every word." His readiness is not to be blamed, but his goodness is to be praised. To be innocent is this: not to know what may harm, and, even if he is circumvented by someone, nevertheless to judge concerning all men that there is fidelity in all. Inclined, therefore, by this endowment of his mind to believe the Gibeonites, Joshua arranged a covenant, granted peace, and confirmed an alliance. But when they came into their lands and the fraud was discovered—that, although they were neighbors, they had pretended that they were foreigners—the people of the fathers began to be indignant that they had been circumvented. Joshua nevertheless did not judge that the peace he had granted should be revoked, because it had been confirmed by the religious obligation of an oath, lest, while reproving another's faithlessness, he should break his own pledge. Nevertheless, he punished them with the more excellent service of ministry. The sentence was more merciful, but more lasting. GRATIAN. Therefore, the unlawful oath that is prohibited from being observed is to be understood as one that is known to be unlawful when it is sworn. But if it is not known to be unlawful, ignorance itself excuses if it is thought to be lawful—not from ignorance of law, but of fact. For it is one thing if union with someone is believed to be lawful because she is not known to be a blood relative, or because she is believed to be a widow; it is another if it is thought lawful because the union of blood relatives or union with women left by others is believed to be prohibited by no law. For here there is ignorance of law, which excuses no one except one who is permitted to be ignorant of law; but there there is ignorance of fact, by which anyone is truly excused. The elders of Israel were not ignorant that the nations of the promised land were to be destroyed by the Lord's command; but they were ignorant that the Gibeonites were inhabitants of the promised land. They were indeed ignorant of the fact, but they were not ignorant of the law governing the fact, and therefore, although what they swore was unlawful, nevertheless what they confirmed by oath ought lawfully to have been observed. § 1. But the statement that an unlawful oath is prohibited from being observed is not to be understood generally. For an oath, as Jerome testifies upon Jeremiah, ought to have three companions: truth, judgment, and justice. But where these are lacking, it is not an oath but perjury. From this it is given to be understood that an oath in which any of these is lacking is unlawful; nevertheless, not everyone whose oath happens to lack one of them is prohibited from observing it. § 2. For sometimes justice is lacking from an oath, as when someone after a vow of chastity takes a wife, confirming by oath that he will never depart from her. Although this is unlawful because justice is proved to be lacking from it, nevertheless by Augustine's authority he is commanded to observe it. But if anyone contends that this is to be observed by the prerogative of marriage, not because of the religious obligation of the oath, let him notice that the Gibeonites were preserved contrary to the Lord's command solely because of that religious obligation. Therefore, since every command of the Lord is just, it is evident that justice is lacking from what is found contrary to his command. § 3. Judgment also is sometimes established to be lacking from an oath, as when someone, led by his own rashness, swears that he will eat and drink. Although this is proved unlawful through indiscreet levity, nevertheless it is not therefore commanded to be violated. § 4. Accordingly, an oath is understood to be unlawful in many ways. For it is unlawful sometimes from what is sworn, sometimes from the manner of swearing. An oath is unlawful from what is sworn when that which is sworn is vicious in its own nature, either taking away life, as adultery, homicide, and things similar to these; or not permitting life to be restored, as refusing to return to peace with an enemy or refusing mercifully to assist one in need. Because these have manifest injustice in themselves, although they are confirmed by oath, nevertheless they ought not to be observed. Accordingly, the statutes read above concerning the nonobservance of unlawful oaths are to be understood about such oaths. Therefore, whoever shall have confirmed by oath that he will do something by which either bodily or spiritual salvation is taken away, or without which either kind of salvation cannot be restored or preserved, is prohibited from preserving the pledge promised. The foregoing authorities supply examples of these when, by more salutary counsel, they do not permit unlawful vows to be observed by one who, by furnishing an oath, has promised to commit homicide, not to furnish food to his mother and brothers, to persevere in adultery, or not to return to peace with an adversary. § 5. That which is sworn is also sometimes vicious, not in its own nature but from causes coming from outside, as when someone after a vow of chastity swears to a woman that he will have her as wife. For to have a wife is not evil in itself; nevertheless, for this man it is pernicious because of his vow. Although this oath is unlawful, nevertheless he is not prohibited from observing it, but penance for the violation of his vow is commanded to be imposed upon him. § 6. An oath is unlawful from the manner of swearing when something is sworn inconsiderately and without circumspection by which neither bodily nor spiritual salvation is taken away, and without which either kind of salvation can be restored and life preserved—as when someone, compelled by his parents to receive the clerical tonsure or the habit of religious life, confirms by oath that he will do neither. Although this may seem blameworthy to some because he promised by oath that he would not perform a work of charity, nevertheless he is prohibited by no authority from observing it, because even if he never receives the clerical tonsure or the habit of religious life, he is nevertheless not for that reason any less able to merit salvation, since some persons in the lay habit are found to be most holy and chosen by God. By this example it is manifestly given to be understood that whenever someone swears that he will not do something by which a more expedient road to beatitude would be prepared for him, provided that he is able to find salvation without it, he is not prohibited from observing that oath. Hence, when we swear that we will not give someone something without which both kinds of his salvation can remain unharmed, even if some advantage would be furnished to him from it, nevertheless we are prohibited by no authority from observing the oath, provided that another way of assisting his necessities is open to us.

C. XXIII. Quedam, licet a Deo prohibeantur, tamen iuramento firmata non sunt euitanda.

"Innocens credit omni uerbo." Non uituperanda facilitas, sed laudanda bonitas. Hoc est innocentem esse, ignorare quid noceat, et si circumscribitur ab aliquo, de omnibus tamen iudicat qui fidem in omnibus esse arbitratur. Hac igitur mentis suae dote inclinatus Iesus, ut crederet Gabaonitis, testamentum disposuit, pacem dedit, confirmauit societatem. Sed ubi in terras eorum uentum est, deprehensa fraude, quod, cum essent finitimi, aduenas esse se simulauerint, circumscriptum se populus patrum indignari cepit. Iesus tamen pacem, quam dederat, reuocandam non censuit, quia firmata erat sacramenti religione, ne, dum alienam perfidiam redargueret, suam fidem solueret. Mulctauit meliori tamen eos obsequio ministerii. Clementior sentencia, sed diuturnior. Gratian. Illicitum ergo iuramentum, quod seruari prohibetur, intelligendum est, quod scitur illicitum esse, dum iuratur. Si autem nescitur illicitum esse, ipsa ignorantia excusetur si putetur licitum esse, non ex ignorantia iuris, sed facti. Aliud enim est, si alicuius copula credatur esse licita, quia nescitur esse consanguinea, uel quia creditur esse uidua; aliud, si ideo putatur licita, quia consanguinearum coniunctio uel relictarum copula nullo iure credatur esse prohibita. Hic est enim ignorantia iuris, que neminem excusat, nisi cui permittitur ius ignorare; ibi uero ignorantia facti, qua quisque uere excusatur. Seniores autem Israel non ignorabant gentes terrae promissionis ex precepto Domini esse delendas; sed ignorabant Gabaonitas esse incolas terrae promissionis. Ignorabant siquidem factum, sed non ignorabant ius facti, atque ideo, etsi illicitum esset quod iurauerunt, tamen licite seruari debuit quod iuramento firmauerunt. §. 1. Quod autem illicitum iuramentum seruari prohibetur, non est generaliter intelligendum. Iuramentum namque (ut Ieronimus testatur super Iheremiam), debet habere tres comites, ueritatem, iudicium, et iusticiam; ubi autem ista defuerint, non est iuramentum, sed periurium. Unde datur intelligi illicitum esse iuramentum, cui aliquod istorum defuerit; non tamen cuicumque contigerit aliquod istorum deesse prohibetur seruari. §. 2. Aliquando namque iuramento deest iusticia; ueluti, cum quispiam post uotum castitatis ducit uxorem, iuramento firmans, numquam ab ea se discessurum, quod, quamuis illicitum sit, quia iusticia sibi probatur deesse, tamen auctoritate Augustini seruari precipitur. Hoc autem si quis contendat prerogatiua coniugii, non propter religionem iurisiurandi seruari, animaduertat, Gabaonitas ob solam religionem contra inperium Domini reseruatos. Cum ergo omne preceptum Domini iustum sit, patet ei iusticiam deesse, quod eius precepto contrarium inuenitur. §. 3. Iudicium quoque aliquando iuramento constat deesse, ueluti, cum propria temeritate aliquis ductus iurat se manducaturum et bibiturum. Hoc quamuis leuitate indiscreta illicitum probetur, non tamen ideo uiolari iubetur. §. 4. Iuramentum itaque multipliciter illicitum intelligitur. Est enim illicitum aliquando ex eo, quod iuratur, aliquando ex modo iurandi. Ex eo, quod iuratur, tunc est illicitum iuramentum, quando id, quod iuratur, in sui natura uiciosum est uel uitam adimens, ut adulterium, homicidium, et his similia; uel reparari non permittens, ueluti cum inimico ad pacem non redire, indigenti misericorditer non subuenire. Ista, quia perspicuam habent in se iniusticiam, etsi iuramento firmentur, tamen seruari non debent. Circa hec itaque iuramenta intelligenda sunt que de illicitis iuramentis non obseruandis supra statuta leguntur. Quisquis ergo se iuramento firmauerit aliquid facturum, quo uel corporalis, uel spiritualis salus adimatur, uel sine quo utraque salus reparari uel conseruari non possit, fidem promissam seruare prohibetur; quorum exempla premissae auctoritates subiciunt, dum eum, qui homicidium facere, uel alimenta matri et fratribus non subministrare, in adulterio perseuerare, uel ad pacem cum aduersario non redire, iuramentum prestando promiserit, salubriori consilio illicita uota obseruare non permittunt. §. 5. Est etiam id, quod iuratur, aliquando uiciosum, non in natura sui, sed ex causis extra uenientibus; ueluti cum aliquis post uotum castitatis iurat alicui, se habiturum eam in coniugem. Coniugem namque habere in se ipso malum non est: tamen huic ex uoto perniciosum est. Hoc autem iuramentum, etsi illicitum sit, non tamen obseruari prohibetur, sed de uiolatione uoti penitencia sibi iubetur indici. §. 6. Ex modo iurandi tunc est illicitum iuramentum, quando inconsiderate et incircumspecte aliquid iuratur, quo nec corporalis, nec spiritualis salus adimitur, et sine quo utraque salus reparari et uita conseruari ualet: ueluti dum aliquis a parentibus coactus, ut clericatus tonsuram uel religionis uestem suscipiat, se neutrum facturum iuramento firmauerit. Hoc, quamuis aliquibus uideatur reprehensibile, quia opus karitatis iuramento se non facturum promisit, nulla tamen auctoritate seruari prohibetur, quia, etsi numquam clericatus tonsuram uel religionis uestem suscipiat, non tamen ideo minus salutem promereri ualet, cum nonnulli in laicali habitu sanctissimi et Deo delecti inueniantur. Quo exemplo euidenter datur intelligi, quotiens aliquis iurat, se non facturum aliquid, quo expeditior sibi uia preparetur ad beatitudinem, dummodo sine eo salutem ualeat inuenire, quod iuramentum non prohibetur obseruare. Unde, cum nos iuramus, non daturos alicui aliquid, sine quo utraque salus eius potest esse incolumis, etsi aliqua ex eo sibi commoditas prestaretur, nulla tamen auctoritate iuramentum seruare prohibemur, dummodo sit nobis alia uia necessitatibus eius subueniendi.

GRATIAN. PART I. As to what is asked in the fifth place—if what the archdeacon had sworn was lawful, whether the bishop who compelled the archdeacon to commit perjury would be guilty of perjury—it can easily be determined. For if one who consents is to be punished with a penalty equal to that of the doer, much more is one who compels proved guilty of the crime committed. Hence Pope Pius says:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem quinto loco queritur, si licitum esset quod archidiaconus iurauerat, an episcopus esset reus periurii, qui ad peierandum archidiaconum cogebat? facile potest discerni. Si enim consentiens pari pena cum faciente puniendus est, multo magis ille, qui cogit, reus admissi criminis probatur. Unde Pius Papa ait:

C. I. One who compels another to commit perjury and the one who is compelled are both held to be perjurers.

When one who is compelled by his lord knowingly commits perjury, both are perjurers, both the lord and the soldier: the lord, because he commanded it; the soldier, because he loved his lord more than his soul. If he is free, let him do penance for forty days on bread and water and for the following seven years; if he is that lord's slave, let him do penance for three forty-day periods and the appointed fast days.

C. I. Qui peierare conpellit, et qui conpellitur, periurus uterque habetur.

Qui conpulsus a domino sciens periurat, utrique sunt periuri, et dominus, et miles: dominus, quia precepit; miles, quia plus dominum quam animam dilexit. Si liber est, quadraginta dies in pane et aqua peniteat, et septem sequentes annos; si seruus eiusdem, tres quadragesimas et legitimas ferias peniteat.

C. II. The penance of one who commits perjury in the hand of a bishop or upon a consecrated cross.

Likewise. One who commits perjury in the hand of a bishop or upon a consecrated cross is to do penance for three years; but if upon an unconsecrated cross, he is to do penance for one year. One who was compelled and, not knowing it, committed perjury, and afterwards recognizes it, is to do penance for three forty-day periods.

> C. II. Penitencia eius, qui in manu episcopi aut in cruce consecrata periurat.
> Item. Qui periurat se in manu episcopi, aut in cruce consecrata, tres annos peniteat; si uero in cruce non consecrata, annum unum peniteat. Qui autem coactus fuerit, et ignorans se periurauerit, et post cognoscit, tres quadragesimas peniteat.

C. III. With what penalty one who commits perjury under compulsion of necessity is to be struck.

Likewise from the Penitential of Theodore. If anyone, having been compelled for the redemption of his life or for any cause or necessity, commits perjury, because he loved his body more than his soul, let him do penance for three forty-day periods. Others adjudge three years, one of them on bread and water.

> C. III. Qua pena sit feriendus qui necessitate coactus periurat.
> Item ex Penitenciali Theodori. Si quis coactus pro uita redimenda, uel pro qualibet causa uel necessitate periurat, quia plus corpus quam animam dilexit, tres quadragesimas peniteat. Alii iudicant tres annos, unum ex his in pane et aqua.

C. IV. With what penalty one who swears falsely and causes others to swear falsely is to be struck.

Likewise Pope Gelasius. If anyone shall have perjured himself and knowingly led others into perjury, let him do penance for forty days on bread and water and for the following seven years, and let him never be without penance. And if the others were aware of it, let them do penance likewise.

> C. IV. Qui deierat et alios deierare facit, qua pena sit feriendus.
> Item Gelasius Papa. Si quis se periurauerit, et alios sciens in periurium duxerit, quadraginta dies peniteat in pane et aqua, et septem sequentes annos, et numquam sit sine penitencia. Et alii, si conscii fuerint, similiter peniteant.

C. V. One who knowingly compels another to perjury surpasses a murderer.

Likewise Augustine in the sermon on the beheading of Saint John, [that is, sermon 11 On the Saints]. One who provokes a man to swear and knows that he will swear falsely surpasses a murderer, because the murderer is about to kill the body, but the former the soul—indeed, two souls, both that of the one whom he provoked to swear and his own. You know that what you say is true and what he says is false, and you compel him to swear? Behold, he swears; behold, he commits perjury. What have you gained? Rather, you too have perished, who wished to be sated by his death.

> C. V. Homicidam uincit qui sciens ad periurium conpellit.

Item Augustinus in sermone de decollatione S. Iohannis. [id est serm. XI. de sanctis] Ille, qui hominem prouocat ad iurationem, et scit, eum falsum esse iuraturum, uincit homicidam, quia homicida corpus occisurus est, ille animam, immo duas animas, et eius, quem iurare prouocauit, et suam. Scis, uerum esse quod dicis, et falsum quod ille dicit, et iurare conpellis?

Ecce iurat, ecce periurat. Tu quid inuenisti? immo et tu peristi, qui de illius morte saciari uoluisti.

C. VI. One who demands an oath from a person whom he does not know will swear falsely does not sin.

The same in the sermon on perjuries, [that is, in sermon 30 On the Words of the Apostle, otherwise 28]. As regards one who demands an oath, it makes a great difference whether he does not know that the other will swear falsely or knows it. For if he does not know and for that reason says, "Swear to me," so that confidence may be placed in him, it is not a sin; nevertheless, it is a human temptation. But if he knows that the man committed the deed and compels him to swear, he is a murderer. For the latter destroys himself by his perjury, but the former both placed and pressed the hand of the one killing.

C. VI. Non peccat qui iuramentum exigit ab eo, quem nescit falsum iurare.

Idem in sermone de periuriis. [id est in sermone de uerbis Apostoli, XXX. ad XXVIII.] Qui exigit iurationem, multum interest, si nescit illum iuraturum falsum, an scit. Si enim nescit, et ideo dicit: Iura michi, ut fides ei sit, non est peccatum: tamen humana temptatio est. Si autem scit, eum fecisse, et cogit eum iurare, homicida est. Ille enim se suo periurio interimit: sed iste manum interficientis et inpressit, et pressit.

C. VII. Let one who draws others into perjuries not communicate until the end of his life.

Likewise from the Council of Mâcon, [I, c. 17]. If anyone shall have been convicted of having drawn others into false testimony or perjuries, or of having solicited them by any corruption, let him indeed not communicate until the end of his life; but those who are proved to have consented to him in the perjury are thereafter to be removed from all testimony and will be marked with infamy according to the law. PART II. GRATIAN. Likewise, one who hears someone swear falsely and remains silent commits an offense. Hence Augustine says in Questions on Leviticus, c. 1: "The soul that shall have heard the voice of one swearing falsely, etc.":

C. VII. Usque ad exitum uitae non conmunicet qui ad periuria alios trahit.

Item ex Concilio Maticensi. [I. c. 17.] Si quis conuictus fuerit alios ad falsa testimonia uel periuria adtraxisse, uel quacumque corruptione sollicitasse, ipse quidem usque ad exitum uitae non conmunicet; hii uero, qui ei in periurio consensisse probantur, postea ab omni testimonio sunt remouendi, et secundum legem infamia notabuntur. II. Pars. Gratian. Item, qui audit aliquem falsum iurare, et tacet, delinquit. Unde Augustinus ait in questionibus Leuitici c. 1.: "Anima, que audierit uocem iurantis falsum etc.":

C. VIII. To whom the falsehood that is sworn by someone is to be disclosed.

This appears to say that a man sins when someone swears falsely in his hearing and he knows that the man swears falsely but remains silent. But he knows this if he was a witness to the matter about which the oath is sworn, either by seeing it or by being privy to it—that is, if he knew it in some manner, either perceived it with his own eyes, or the very man who swears disclosed it to him. For in this way he could have been privy to it. § 1. But between fear of this sin and fear of betraying men there very often exists no small temptation. For by warning or prohibiting him we can recall one prepared for perjury from so grave a sin; but if he shall not listen and in our presence shall swear falsely concerning a matter that we know, whether he is to be disclosed, so that after being disclosed he might even incur danger of death, is a most difficult question. But because he did not express here to whom this is to be disclosed—whether to the one to whom the oath is sworn, or to some priest who not only cannot persecute him by inflicting punishment but can also pray for him—it seems to me that a person frees himself from this bond of sin if he discloses it to such persons as can benefit rather than harm the perjurer, whether by correcting him or by appeasing God for him, if the perjurer himself also applies to himself the medicine of confession. GRATIAN. Therefore, if this man who hears someone swear falsely and remains silent commits an offense, as was said above, much more is one who compels another to swear falsely guilty. PART III. § 1. It is asked concerning one who thinks that by craftiness of words he circumvents the person to whom he furnishes an oath, whether he is guilty of perjury unless he observes what he is believed to have sworn. Isidore writes thus concerning this in Book II of the Sentences, [c. 31].

C. VIII. Cui sit indicandum falsum, quod ab aliquo iuratur.

Hoc uidetur dicere, peccare hominem, quo audiente iurat aliquis falsum, et scit, eum falsum iurare, et tacet. Tunc autem scit, si eius rei, de qua iuratur, testis fuit, aut uidens, aut conscius fuit, id est aliquo modo cognouit, aut oculis suis conspexit, aut ille ipse, qui iurat, illi indicauit. Ita enim potuit esse conscius. §. 1. Sed inter timorem huius peccati, et timorem proditionis hominum non parua existit plerumque temptatio. Possumus enim paratum ad periurium admonendo uel prohibendo a tam graui peccato reuocare; sed si non audierit, et coram nobis de re, quam nouimus, falsum iurauerit, utrum prodendus sit, ita ut proditus etiam periculum mortis incurrat, difficillima questio est. Sed quia hic non expressit, cui hoc indicandum sit, utrum illi, cui iuratur, an sacerdoti cuipiam, qui non solum eum persequi non potest irrogando supplicium, sed etiam orare pro illo potest: uidetur michi, quod se soluat ab hoc peccati uinculo, si indicet talibus, qui magis possunt prodesse quam obesse periuro, siue eum corrigendo, siue Deum pro eo placando, si et ipse confessionis sibi adhibeat medicinam. Gratian. Si ergo iste, ut supra dictum est, qui audit falsum iurare, et tacet, delinquit, multo magis ille reus est, qui ad deierandum aliquem conpellit. III. Pars. §. 1. Queritur de eo, qui uerborum calliditate se circumuenire putat illum, cui iuramentum defert, an sit reus periurii, nisi seruauerit quod iurasse creditur. De hoc ita scribit Ysidorus Sententiarum libro II.: [c. 31.]

C. IX. Concerning one who swears with craftiness of words.

By whatever artifice of words one may swear, nevertheless God, who is witness of the conscience, accepts it as the one to whom the oath is sworn understands it. Moreover, one who both takes the name of God in vain and ensnares his neighbor by deceit becomes guilty in two ways.

C. IX. De eo, qui calliditate uerborum iurat.

Quacumque arte uerborum quis iuret, Deus tamen, qui conscientiae testis est, ita hoc accipit, sicut ille, cui iuratur, intelligit. Dupliciter autem reus fit, qui et nomen Dei in uanum assumit, et proximum dolo capit.

C. X. One who swears falsely upon a stone is a perjurer.

Likewise from a sermon of Saint Augustine, [sermon 30 On the Words of the Apostle]. Behold, I say to your charity that one who swears falsely by a stone is also a perjurer. Why do I say this? Because many are deceived even in this and think that, because that by which they swear is nothing, they are not held by the crime of perjury. You are altogether a perjurer, because you swear falsely by that which you do not consider holy. If you do not consider it holy, the one to whom you swear considers it holy. For when you swear, you swear not to yourself or to the stone, but to your neighbor. You swear to a man before a stone; but is it not also before God? The stone does not hear you speaking, but God punishes you for deceiving. But that passage of Gregory in Book XXVI of the Moralia, [c. 7], is objected:

> C. X. Periurus est qui super lapidem falsum iurat.
> Item ex sermone S. Augustini: [XXX. de uerbis Apostoli] Ecce, karitati uestrae dico, et qui per lapidem iurat falsum periurus est. Unde hoc dico? quia multi et in hoc falluntur, et putant, quia nichil est per quod iurant, non se crimine teneri periurii. Prorsus periurus es, quia per id, quod sanctum non putas, falsum iuras. Si tu illud sanctum non putas, sanctum putat, cui iuras. Non enim quando, iuras, tibi aut lapidi, sed proximo iuras. Homini iuras ante lapidem, sed numquid non ante Deum? Non te audit lapis loquentem, sed punit Deus te fallentem. Sed obicitur illud Gregorii in XXVI. libro Moralium: [c. 7.]

C. XI. Before God our words proceed not from the mouth but from the heart.

Human ears judge our words to be such as they sound outwardly. But divine judgments hear them outwardly such as they are brought forth from within. § 1. Certainly let him who explains another's intention and will by various words know that one ought to consider not the words but the will and intention, because the intention ought not to serve the words, but the words the intention. GRATIAN. Therefore, if divine judgments hear our words outwardly such as they are brought forth from within, and if intention ought not to serve words but words intention, it is evident that God does not accept an oath as the one to whom it is sworn understands it, but rather as the one who swears understands it, since our words sound to the recipient not from within but from what is uttered outwardly. § 1. Likewise, it is objected that one who swears upon a stone while thinking that he swears upon the sacrosanct Gospel is bound just as if he had sworn upon the Gospel, even though the one to whom he swears had him swear upon the stone precisely so that, by not observing what he promises, he might not be held by the guilt of perjury. § 2. Likewise, the case is objected of citizens who believe that they swear that they will obey their consuls in all things that shall have been commanded to them for the honor of their city. But lest, by refusing obedience, they be ensnared by the guilt of perjury, a document is placed beneath the hands of those about to swear in which something other than what they suppose themselves about to swear is contained—namely, that they will not divert the Po into the Nile or do something of this kind. Therefore, if, contrary to what they had believed themselves to have sworn, they should deny obedience to their consuls, would God accept that oath according to the intention of the recipient, or not rather according to the intention of the one swearing? § 3. Likewise, if an innocent person charged with adultery or theft wished to assert his innocence, but should swear that he was as free from the charges as is contained in that document which he supposes himself to have written with his own hands, whereas it is contained in it that he is guilty of the charges, would he be reckoned a perjurer by the Lord? Or could he be accused of having sworn that he had incurred the guilt of adultery or theft? No. Hence John Chrysostom also says:

C. XI. Apud Deum uerba nostra non ex ore, sed ex corde procedunt.

Humanae aures talia uerba nostra iudicant, qualia foris sonant. Diuina uero iudicia talia foris audiunt, qualia ex intimis proferuntur. §. 1. Certe nouerit ille, qui intentionem et uoluntatem alterius uariis uerbis explicat, quia non debet aliquis uerba considerare, sed uoluntatem et intentionem, quia non debet intentio uerbis deseruire, sed uerba intentioni. Gratian. Si ergo diuina iudicia uerba nostra talia foris audiunt, qualia ex intimis proferuntur, si intentio non debet deseruire uerbis, sed uerba intentioni: patet, quod Deus non sic accipit iuramentum, sicut ille, cui iuratur, sed pocius sicut qui iurat intelligit, cum recipienti non ex intimis, sed ex his que proferuntur foris, uerba nostra sonent. §. 1. Item obicitur, qui iurat super lapidem, putans se iurare super sacrosanctum euangelium, perinde tenetur, ac si super euangelium iurauerit, licet ille, cui iurat, ideo super lapide illum iurare fecerit, ne, non seruando quod promittit, reatu periurii teneatur. §. 2. Item obicitur de ciuibus, qui credunt se iurare obedituros consulibus suis in omnibus, que sibi inperata fuerint pro honore suae ciuitatis; ne uero, obedientiam recusantes, reatu periurii illaqueentur, supponitur breue iuraturis, in quo aliud continetur, quam se iuraturos arbitrentur, uidelicet ne Padum in Nilum conuertant, uel aliquid huiusmodi faciant. Si ergo contra hoc, quod se iurasse crediderant, consulibus suis obedientiam denegarent, numquid secundum intentionem recipientis, an non pocius secundum intentionem iurantis Deus iuramentum illud acciperet? §. 3. Item, si innocens de adulterio uel furto inpetitus innocentiam suam uellet asserere, iuraret autem se ab obiectis sic esse inmunem, sicut in breui illo continetur, quod manibus suis se scripsisse arbitretur, contineatur autem in illo, hunc esse reum obiectorum, numquid a Domino periurus reputabitur? aut numquid poterit argui, se iurasse, adulterii aut furti reatum incurrisse? Non. Hinc et Iohannes Crisostomus ait:

C. XII. There ought to be no difference between the oath and the speech of the faithful.

The reason for this oath is that everyone who swears, swears for this purpose: that he may speak what is true. And therefore the Lord wills there to be no distance between an oath and our speech, because, just as no faithlessness ought to be in an oath, so also no lie ought to be in our words, because both perjury and lying are condemned by the penalty of divine judgment, Scripture saying: "The mouth that lies kills the soul." Therefore, whoever speaks the truth swears, because it is written: "A faithful witness will not lie."

C. XII. Inter iuramentum et locutionem fidelium nulla debet esse differentia.

Iuramenti huius causa est, quia omnis, qui iurat, ad hoc iurat, ut quod uerum est loquatur. Et ideo Dominus inter iuramentum et loquelam nostram nullam uult esse distantiam, quia, sicut in iuramento nullam conuenit esse perfidiam, ita quoque in uerbis nostris nullum debet esse mendacium, quia utrumque, et periurium et mendacium, diuini iudicii pena dampnatur, dicente scriptura: "Os, quod mentitur, occidit animam." Quisquis ergo uerum loquitur, iurat, quia scriptum est: "Testis fidelis non mentietur."

C. XIII. Before someone swears, he has committed perjury if he prepares to swear against his conscience.

The same. One who is prepared to commit perjury appears already to be a perjurer before he commits perjury, because God judges not from works but from thoughts and from the heart. GRATIAN. From all these things it is gathered that oaths are judged by God according to the intention of the one furnishing them, not of the one receiving them. How then, according to Isidore, does God accept an oath, by whatever artifice of words one may swear, as the one to whom it is sworn understands it? But just as it is one thing to swear with crafty artifice of words and another simply to declare one's intention by swearing, so it is one thing to receive an oath made with a simple intention and another to employ craftiness in receiving it, because, just as no one is able before God to harm another person, so neither is one able to benefit another contrary to that person's intention. But God, the despiser of duplicity, considers the simple intention of each party and, on the part both of the recipient and of the one furnishing the oath, spurns and hates artifice of words. PART VI. § 1. Concerning the age of persons swearing, however, it is asked at what age anyone ought to be compelled to swear. Concerning this it is found determined as follows in the first book of the Capitularies, [c. 63]:

> Idem. Qui periurare paratus est, ante, quam periuret, iam periurus uidetur, quia Deus non ex operibus iudicat, sed ex cogitationibus et ex corde. Gratian. Ex his omnibus colligitur, quod iuramenta secundum intentionem prestantis, non recipientis, a Deo iudicantur. Quomodo ergo, secundum Ysidorum, quecumque arte uerborum quis iuret, Deus sic accipit, sicut ille, cui iuratur, intelligit? Sed sicut aliud est callida arte uerborum iurare, aliud simpliciter intentionem suam iurando enunciare, sic aliud est simplici intentione iuramentum factum recipere, et aliud in recipiendo calliditate uti, quia, sicut quisquam apud Deum non ualet aliquem ledere, sic nec preter eius intentionem ualet quis alicui subuenire. Deus autem duplicitatis aspernator simplicem intentionem utriusque considerat, et tam ex parte recipientis quam ex parte prestantis uerborum artem aspernatur et odit. VI. Pars. §. 1. De etate uero iurantium queritur, qua etate quisque ad iurandum debeat cogi? De quo in primo libro Capitularium [c. 63.] sic inuenitur diffinitum:

C. XIV. Let those who are below the age of reason not be compelled to swear.

Little children who are below the age of reason are not to be compelled to swear. And one who has once committed perjury is thereafter neither to be a witness nor to approach an oath, nor to serve as a sworn person in his own cause or another's.

> C. XIV. Ante annos rationabiles aliqui non cogantur iurare.
> Paruuli, qui sine etate rationabili sunt, non cogantur iurare. Et qui semel periuratus fuerit, nec testis sit post hec, nec ad sacramentum accedat, nec in sua causa uel alterius iurator existat.

C. XV. Let no one be compelled to swear before fourteen years of age.

Likewise from the Council of Elvira. Boys are not to be compelled to swear before fourteen years of age. A girl also, if, being of childish age in her father's house, she shall have bound herself by oath without his knowledge, and her father, when he hears of it, shall immediately contradict it, her vows and oaths will be void, and she will be corrected more easily.

> C. XV. Ante quatuordecim annos nullus iurare cogatur.
> Item ex Concilio Eliberitano. Pueri ante quatuordecim annos non cogantur iurare. Puella quoque, si in puerili etate sita in domo patris, illo nesciente, se iuramento constrinxerit, et pater eius, ut audierit, statim contradixerit, uota eius et iuramenta irrita erunt, et facilius emendabitur.

C. XVI. On the same, and that oaths are to be furnished by those who are fasting.

Likewise Pope Cornelius. It also appears honorable that one who dares to swear upon holy things should do this while fasting, with all honorableness and fear of God, and that boys should not be compelled to swear before fourteen years of age. GRATIAN. Furthermore, there are certain times in which we are prohibited from swearing. Hence in the Council held at Saint-Médard:

> C. XVI. De eodem, et ut a ieiunis iuramenta prestentur.
> Item Cornelius Papa. Honestum etiam uidetur, ut, qui in sanctis audet iurare, hoc ieiunus faciat cum omni honestate et timore Dei, ut et pueri ante quatuordecim annos non cogantur iurare. Gratian. Preterea sunt quedam tempora, quibus iurare prohibemur. Unde in Concilio apud S. Medardum habito:

C. XVII. At what times we are prohibited from swearing.

The holy synod decreed that from Septuagesima until the octave of Easter, and from the Advent of the Lord until the octave of Epiphany, and also on the fasts of the Ember Days, on the Greater Litanies, on Sundays, and on the Rogation Days, no one is to presume to swear upon the holy Gospels, except concerning concord and peacemaking. PART V. GRATIAN. Concerning the form of fidelity, and what each person owes to his lord, or conversely, it is found as follows in the letter of Bishop Fulbert:

> C. XVII. Quibus temporibus iurare prohibemur.
> Decreuit sancta sinodus, ut a septuagesima usque in octauam pascae, et ab aduentu Domini usque in octauam epiphaniae, nec non et in ieiuniis quatuor temporum, et in letaniis maioribus, et in diebus dominicis, et in diebus rogationum (nisi de concordia et pacificatione) nullus super sacra euangelia iurare presumat. V. Pars. Gratian. De forma uero fidelitatis, et quid quisque debeat domino, uel e conuerso, sic inuenitur in epistola Filiberti Episcopi:

C. XVIII. What things are to be observed in fidelity.

Having been admonished to write something concerning the form of fidelity, I have briefly noted for you from the authority of books these things that follow. One who swears fidelity to his lord ought always to keep these six things in memory: harmless, safe, honorable, useful, easy, possible. Harmless, namely, lest he cause harm to his lord concerning his lord's body. Safe, lest he cause harm to him concerning his secret or concerning the fortifications through which he can be safe. Honorable, lest he cause harm to him concerning his justice or concerning other causes that appear to pertain to his honor. Useful, lest he cause harm to him concerning his possessions. Easy or possible, lest he make difficult for him the good that his lord could easily do, or render impossible for him what was possible. It is just that the faithful man guard against these injuries. § 1. But because it is not sufficient to abstain from evil unless what is good is done, it remains that in the same six things mentioned above he faithfully furnish counsel and assistance to his lord, if he wishes to appear worthy of his benefice and to be secure concerning the fidelity that he swore. § 2. The lord also ought to render the same in return to his faithful man in all these things. If he does not do so, he will deservedly be judged to have acted in bad faith, just as the former, if he shall have been discovered either doing or consenting to their violation, is faithless and a perjurer.

[PALEA.

C. XVIII. Que in fidelitate sunt obseruanda.

De forma fidelitatis aliquid scribere monitus, hec uobis, que secuntur, breuiter ex librorum auctoritate notaui. Qui domino suo fidelitatem iurat, ista sex in memoria semper habere debet: incolume, tutum, honestum, utile, facile, possible. Incolume uidelicet, ne sit in dampnum domino suo de corpore suo. Tutum, ne sit ei in dampnum de secreto suo, uel de munitionibus, per quas tutus esse potest. Honestum, ne sit ei in dampnum de sua iusticia, uel de aliis causis, que ad honestatem eius pertinere uidentur. Utile, ne sit ei in dampnum de suis possessionibus. Facile uel possible, ne id bonum, quod dominus suus facere leuiter poterat, faciat ei difficile, neue id, quod possibile erat, reddat ei inpossibile. Ut fidelis hec documenta caueat, iustum est. §. 1. Sed quia non sufficit abstinere a malo, nisi fiat, quod bonum est, restat, ut in eisdem sex supradictis consilium et auxilium domino suo fideliter prestet, si beneficio dignus uideri uult, et saluus esse de fidelitate, quam iurauit. §. 2. Dominus quoque fideli suo in his omnibus uicem reddere debet. Quod si non fecerit, merito censebitur malefidus, sicut ille, si in eorum preuaricatione uel faciendo, uel consentiendo deprehensus fuerit perfidus et periurus.

[PALEA.

C. XIX. On the same.

Augustine. If any layman profanes by violating the oath that he swears to his king and lord, and afterwards shall have dealt perversely and deceitfully with his kingdom and plots against his life by some contrivance, because he perpetrates sacrilege by laying his hand upon the Lord's anointed, let him be anathema unless he shall have amended himself through a worthy satisfaction of penance, as was established by the holy synod—that is, let him leave the world, lay down arms, enter a monastery, and do penance all the days of his life. Nevertheless, at the end of his life let him receive communion with the Eucharist. § 1. But if a bishop, priest, or deacon shall have committed this crime, let him be degraded.] PART VI. GRATIAN. Accordingly, as appears from the foregoing, a lie ought neither to be uttered in simple speech nor confirmed by oath. Moreover, a lie is proved to exist not only in words but also in feigned works. Hence Ambrose says in a sermon delivered on the Sunday concerning Abraham:

C. XIX. De eodem.

Augustinus. Si quis laicus iuramentum uiolando profanat, quod regi et domino suo iurat, et postea peruerse et dolose eius regnum tractauerit, et in mortem ipsius aliquo machinamento insidiatur, quia sacrilegium peragit, in Christum Domini manum mittens, anathema sit, nisi per dignam penitenciae satisfactionem emendauerit, sicut constitutum a sancta sinodo est, id est seculum relinquat, arma deponat, in monasterium eat, et peniteat omnibus diebus uitae suae. Verumtamen conmunionem in exitu uitae suae cum eucharistia percipiat. §. 1. Episcopus uero, presbiter, diaconus, si hoc crimen conmiserit, degradetur.] VI. Pars. Gratian. Ut itaque ex premissis apparet, mendacium nec simplici sermone debet proferri, nec iuramento firmari. Mendacium autem non solum in uerbis, sed etiam in simulatis operibus esse probatur. Unde Ambrosius ait in sermone habito in dominica de Abraham:

C. XX. One who does not show his profession by works lies.

Beware of lying, brothers, because all who love lying are sons of the devil. § 1. A lie exists not only in false words but also in feigned works. For it is a lie to call oneself a Christian and not to do the works of Christ. It is a lie to profess oneself a bishop, priest, or cleric and to perform things contrary to this order.

C. XX. Mentitur qui professionem suam operibus non ostendit.

Cauete, fratres, mendacium, quia omnes, qui amant mendacium, filii sunt diaboli. §. 1. Non solum in falsis uerbis, sed etiam in simulatis operibus mendacium est. Mendacium namque est, Christianum se dicere, et opera Christi non facere. Mendacium est episcopum, sacerdotem uel clericum se profiteri, et contraria huic ordini operari.

C. XXI. Whenever evil speech proceeds from our mouth.

Likewise Jerome, [on chapter 4 of the Epistle to the Ephesians]. Whenever we speak either at an inopportune time, or in an inopportune place, or not as is fitting for the hearers, so often evil speech proceeds from our mouth to the destruction of those who hear. Therefore let us consider what we say, because for every idle word we are to render an account on the day of judgment. PART VII. GRATIAN. A cleric, however, ought not to furnish an oath to a layman. Hence it is read in the Council of Reims:

C. XXI. Quociens sermo malus de ore nostro procedit.

Item Ieronimus. [in c. 4. epist. ad Ephesios] Quociens uero loquimur, aut non in oportuno tempore, aut non in oportuno loco, aut non ut conuenit audientibus, tociens sermo malus procedit de ore nostro ad destructionem eorum, qui audiunt. Consideremus itaque quid loquamur, quia pro omni otioso uerbo reddituri sumus rationem in die iudicii.

VII. Pars. Gratian. Iuramentum uero clericus laico prestare non debet. Unde in Remensi Concilio legitur:

C. XXII. Let a cleric not presume to swear anything to any layman.

Let no one of the ecclesiastical order presume to swear anything upon the holy Gospels to any layman, but let him say simply, with truth and purity: it is, or it is not. But if there is anything charged against him, according as those who are of the same order shall judge, let him either be corrected or clear himself. [PALEA. A cleric likewise ought not to furnish an oath to a bishop, except perhaps one to whom he commits the administration of the church. Hence Urban II says:

C. XXII. Cuiquam laico clericus nichil iurare presumat.

Nullus ex ecclesiastico ordine cuiquam laico quicquam super sacra euangelia iurare presumat, sed simpliciter cum ueritate et puritate dicat: est aut non. Sed si est aliquid, quod sibi obiciatur, prout iudicauerint qui eiusdem sunt ordinis, aut corrigatur, aut expurgetur. [PALEA. Episcopo similiter clericus iuramentum prestare non debet, nisi forte is, cui ecclesiae procurationem conmittit. Unde Urbanus II. ait:

C. XXIII. On the same.

Let no bishop compel his clerics to swear to him, except perhaps those to whom the administration of ecclesiastical affairs shall have been committed.]

C. XXIII. De eodem.

Nullus episcopus clericos suos, nisi forte quibus ecclesiasticarum rerum dispensatio conmissa fuerit, sibi iurare conpellat.]

Causa XXIII

GRATIAN. Certain bishops, together with the people committed to them, fell into heresy. They began by threats and tortures to compel the Catholics dwelling round about them into heresy. When this became known, the Apostolic commanded the Catholic bishops of the surrounding regions, who had received civil jurisdiction from the emperor, to defend the Catholics from the heretics and by whatever means they could to compel the heretics to return to the truth of the faith. The bishops, receiving these apostolic commands, summoned soldiers and began to fight against the heretics openly and by ambushes. At length, after some of them had been delivered to death, others despoiled of their own or ecclesiastical property, and others confined in prison and workhouse, they were compelled to return to the unity of the Catholic faith. (Question I.) Here it is asked first whether military service is a sin. (Question II.) Second, what war is just, and how just wars were waged by the children of Israel. (Question III.) Third, whether an injury to associates is to be repelled by arms. (Question IV.) Fourth, whether vengeance is to be inflicted. (Question V.) Fifth, whether it is a sin for a judge or minister to kill the guilty. (Question VI.) Sixth, whether the evil are to be compelled to good. (Question VII.) Seventh, whether heretics are to be despoiled of their own and the church's property, and whether one who possesses things taken from heretics is said to possess another's property. (Question VIII.) Eighth, whether bishops or any clerics may, by their own authority or by command of the Apostolic or the emperor, take up arms.

> GRATIANUS. Quidam episcopi cum plebe sibi conmissa in heresim lapsi sunt; circumadiacentes catholicos minis et cruciatibus ad heresim conpellere ceperunt, quo conperto Apostolicus catholicis episcopis circumadiacentium regionum, qui ab inperatore ciuilem iurisdictionem acceperant, inperauit, ut catholicos ab hereticis defenderent, et quibus modis possent eos ad fidei ueritatem redire conpellerent. Question I

GRATIAN. That military service appears alien to evangelical discipline seems capable of being proved from this: every military establishment was instituted either to repel injury or to inflict vengeance, but injury is repelled either from one's own person or from an associate, and both are prohibited by the evangelical law. For when it is said, "If anyone strikes you on one cheek, offer him the other also," and again, "Whoever compels you to go one thousand paces, go with him two thousand"; likewise, when the Apostle says to the Romans, "Do not defend yourselves, dearly beloved, but give place to wrath," what else are we prohibited from doing but repelling an injury to our own person? § 1. Likewise, when Christ said to Peter as he defended his master with a sword, "Turn your sword into its sheath; or do you think that I cannot ask my Father, and he will furnish me more than twelve thousand legions of angels?"; finally, as is read concerning blessed Andrew, when there was a gathering of the peoples to snatch him from the hands of the unjust judge and defend him from the injury of death, and he, on the contrary, teaching patience both by example and word, asked them not to impede his martyrdom—what else are we admonished to do but patiently endure injuries to our associates as well as our own, and not run to arms, but by their example prepare the mind to endure similar things? § 2. Likewise, when it is said in Proverbs, "Vengeance is mine, and I will repay, says the Lord"; likewise, when it is said in the Gospel, "Do not judge, and you will not be judged"; likewise, when the father of the household says to the servants wishing to gather the weeds, "Permit both to grow until the harvest, and then I shall say to the reapers: gather the weeds and bind them in bundles to be burned"; § 3. likewise, when that king who made a wedding for his son is said, after sending his armies—that is, the angels—to be about to destroy the murderers of the prophets and apostles, who, when called to the wedding, disdained to come by believing; likewise, when Paul the Apostle says in the Epistle to the Romans, "Do not judge one another"; likewise, "Who are you who judge another's servant? To his own lord he stands or falls. Therefore, whether we live or die, we are the Lord's. For to this end Christ died and rose again, that he might be Lord both of the living and of the dead"—in all these things what else is commanded but that vengeance upon offenders be reserved for divine judgment? Therefore, since, as was said above, military service appears to have been instituted either to repel injury or to inflict vengeance, but both are prohibited by the evangelical law, it appears that military service is a sin. Hence Gregory also says:

> GRATIANUS. Quod militare alienum uideatur ab euangelica disciplina, hinc uidetur posse probari, quia omnis milicia uel ob iniuriam propulsandam, uel propter uindictam inferendam est instituta, iniuria autem uel a propria persona, uel a socio repellitur, quod utrumque euangelica lege prohibetur. Cum enim dicitur: "Si quis te percusserit in unam maxillam, prebe ei et alteram," et iterum: "Qui angariauerit te mille passus, uade cum eo duo milia;" item cum Apostolus dicat ad Romanos: "Non uos defendentes, karissimi, sed date locum irae:" quid aliud prohibemur, quam propriae personae iniuriam repellere? §. 1. Item, cum Petro gladio defendenti magistrum, Christus dixerit: "Conuerte gladium tuum in uaginam; an putas, quia non possum rogare patrem meum, et exhibebit michi plus quam duodecim milia legiones angelorum?" denique, sicut de B. Andrea legitur, cum fieret concursus populorum, ut de manibus iniqui iudicis eum eriperent, et ab iniuria mortis illum defenderent, ipse econtra et exemplo et uerbo patienciam docens, rogabat eos, ne suum martirium inpedirent, quid aliud monemur, quam sicut proprias, ita et sociorum iniurias patienter tollerare, nec ad arma concurrere, sed eorum exemplo ad similia ferenda animum preparare? §. 2. Item cum in Prouerbiis dicatur: "Michi uindictam, et ego retribuam, dicit Dominus;" item, cum in euangelio dicatur: "Nolite iudicare, et non iudicabimini;" item, cum pater familias dicat seruis uolentibus colligere zizania: "Sinite utraque crescere usque ad messem, et tunc dicam messoribus, colligite zizania, et alligate fasciculos ad comburendum;" §. 3. item, cum rex ille, qui nuptias fecerat filio suo, missis exercitibus suis, angelorum uidelicet, dicatur perditurus homicidas prophetarum et apostolorum, qui uocati ad nuptias uenire contempserunt credendo; item, cum Paulus apostolus dicat in epistola ad Romanos: "Nolite iudicare inuicem;" item: "Tu quis es, qui iudicas seruum alienum? Suo domino stat, aut cadit. Siue ergo uiuimus siue morimur, Domini sumus. In hoc enim Christus mortuus est, et resurrexit, ut et uiuorum, et mortuorum dominetur:" in his omnibus quid aliud precipitur, quam ut uindicta delinquentium diuino reseruetur examini? Cum ergo, ut supra dictum est, milicia uideatur instituta uel ob iniuriam propulsandam, uel ad uindictam inferendam, utrumque autem lege euangelica prohibeatur, apparet, quod militare peccatum est. Hinc etiam Gregorius:

C. I. Carnal wars bear the figure of spiritual wars.

Unless these carnal wars bore the figure of spiritual wars, never, I think, would the books of Jewish histories have been handed down by the Apostles to be read in the churches by disciples of Christ, who came to teach peace. For how would that description of wars benefit those to whom Jesus says, "My peace I give to you, my peace I leave to you," and who through the Apostle are commanded and told, "Do not avenge yourselves, but rather receive injury and rather suffer fraud"? Hence the Apostle, knowing finally that wars were no longer to be carried on by us carnally, but that contests of the soul against spiritual adversaries were to be labored through, gives a command to the soldiers of Christ as a master of military service, saying, "Put on the armor of God, that you may be able to stand against the snares of the devil." GRATIAN. To these things the answer is thus: the precepts of patience are to be retained not so much in the display of the body as in the preparation of the heart. Hence Augustine says in the sermon concerning the centurion's servant:

> C. I. Bella carnalia bellorum spiritualium figuram gerunt.
> Nisi bella ista carnalia figuram bellorum spiritualium gererent, numquam, opinor, Iudaicarum historiarum libri discipulis Christi, qui uenit pacem docere, legendi in ecclesiis fuissent ab Apostolis traditi. Quomodo enim eis bellorum proficeret ista descriptio, quibus dicitur ab Iesu: "Pacem meam do uobis, pacem relinquo uobis?" et quibus per Apostolum iubetur et dicitur: "Non uosmetipsos uindicantes, sed magis iniuriam percipite, et magis fraudem patimini?" Unde denique sciens Apostolus, iam nobis ultra bella non esse carnaliter peragenda, sed animae certamina contra spiritales aduersarios desudanda, uelut magister miliciae preceptum dat militibus Christi, dicens: "Induite uos armatura Dei, ut possitis stare aduersus insidias diaboli?" Gratian. His ita respondetur: precepta patienciae non tam ostentatione corporis quam preparatione cordis sunt retinenda. Unde Augustinus ait in sermone de puero centurionis:

C. II. The precepts of patience are to be observed by strength of mind, not by display of the body.

A just and pious man ought to be prepared patiently to sustain the malice of those whom he seeks to become good, so that the number of the good may rather increase, not so that anyone by equal malice may add himself to the number of the evil. Finally, these precepts pertain more to the preparation of the heart than to the work done openly, so that patience with benevolence may be retained in the secrecy of the mind, but outwardly that may be done which appears to benefit those toward whom we ought to will good. § 1. From this it is clearly shown that the Lord Jesus himself, the singular example of patience, when he was struck in the face, answered, "If I have spoken badly, testify concerning the evil; but if well, why do you strike me?" Accordingly, if we look to the words, he by no means fulfilled his own precept. For he did not offer the other side to the one striking him, but rather prohibited him from doing so and increasing the injury. And yet he had come prepared not only to be struck in the face, but even to be killed, crucified for those by whom he suffered these things, for whom, hanging upon the cross, he said, "Father, forgive them, because they do not know what they do." § 2. Nor does Paul the Apostle appear to have fulfilled the precept of the Lord and his master when, after being struck in the face, he said to the chief priest, "God will strike you, whitewashed wall. You sit to judge me according to the law, and contrary to the law command me to be struck?" And when those standing by said, "Do you injure the chief priest?" mocking them, he wished to remind them of what he had said, so that those who were wise might understand that at Christ's advent the whitewashed wall—that is, the hypocrisy of the Jewish priesthood—was now to be destroyed. For he said, “I did not know, brothers, that he is the chief. For it is written: You shall not curse the chief of your people,” although without doubt one who had grown up among the same people and had been instructed in the law could not have failed to know that chief priest, nor could he in any way have deceived those to whom he had been so well known by saying that he did not know. Therefore, these precepts of patience are always to be retained in the preparation of the heart, and benevolence itself, lest evil be returned for evil, is always to be fulfilled in the will. § 3. Yet many things are to be done even to the unwilling, who are to be punished with a certain benevolent severity, and whose benefit rather than their will is to be consulted. For in correcting a son, however severely, paternal love is certainly never lost. Nevertheless, let what he does not will be done, and let him suffer pain who appears capable of being healed by pain even against his will. § 4. And through this, if this earthly commonwealth observes Christian precepts, even its wars will not be conducted without benevolence, but so that the vanquished may more easily be provided for in the fellowship of piety and justice. For one whose license for iniquity is taken away is vanquished to greater benefit, since nothing is more unhappy than the happiness of sinners, by which penal impunity is nourished and an evil will, as an inner enemy, is strengthened. And a little later: § 5. For if Christian discipline condemned all wars, this counsel of salvation would rather be given in the Gospel to those seeking it, that they should cast away their arms and withdraw themselves altogether from military service. But it was said to them: “Extort nothing from anyone; be content with your pay.” When he commanded that their own pay ought to suffice them, he certainly did not prohibit military service.

C. II. Precepta patienciae uirtute animi, non ostentatione corporis seruanda sunt.

Paratus debet esse homo iustus et pius patienter maliciam eorum sustinere, quos fieri bonos querit, ut numerus pocius crescat bonorum, non ut pari malicia se quis numero addat malorum. Denique ista precepta magis sunt ad preparationem cordis, quam ad opus, quod in aperto fit, ut teneatur in secreto animi patiencia cum beniuolentia, in manifesto autem id fiat, quod eis uidetur prodesse, quibus bene uelle debemus. §. 1. Hinc liquido ostenditur, quod ipse Dominus Iesus, exemplum singulare patienciae, cum percuteretur in facie, respondit: "Si male locutus sum, exprobra de malo; si autem bene, quid me cedis?" Nequaquam igitur preceptum suum, si uerba intueamur, inpleuit. Neque enim prebuit percutienti alteram partem, sed pocius prohibuit, ne faceret et iniuriam augeret. Et tamen paratus aduenerat non solum in faciem percuti, uerum etiam pro his quoque, a quibus hec paciebatur, crucifixus occidi, pro quibus ait in cruce pendens: "Pater, ignosce illis, quia nesciunt quid faciunt." §. 2. Neque Paulus apostolus preceptum Domini et magistri sui uidetur inplesse, ubi etiam percussus in faciem dixit principi sacerdotum: "Percutiet te Deus, paries dealbate; sedes me iudicare secundum legem, et contra legem iubes me percuti?" Et cum a circumstantibus diceretur: "Iniuriam facis principi sacerdotum?" irridens eos ammonere uoluit quid dixerit, ut qui saperent intelligerent iam destruendum esse in aduentu Christi parietem dealbatum, hoc est ypocrisin sacerdotii Iudeorum. Ait quippe: "Nesciui fratres, quia princeps est. Scriptum est enim: Principi populi tui non maledices," cum proculdubio qui in eodem populo creuerat, atque in lege fuerat eruditus, illum principem sacerdotum nescire non posset, nec eos, quibus ita notus fuerat, ullo modo falleret, quod nesciret. Sunt ergo ista precepta patienciae semper in cordis preparatione retinenda, ipsa quoque beniuolentia, ne reddatur malum pro malo, semper in uoluntate conplenda. §. 3. Agenda sunt autem multa etiam cum inuitis quadam benigna asperitate plectendis, quorum pocius utilitati consulendum est quam uoluntati. Nam in corripiendo filium quamlibet aspere numquam profecto paternus amor amittitur. Fiat tamen quod nolit, et doleat qui etiam inuitus dolore uidetur sanandus. §. 4. Ac per hoc, si terrena ista respublica Christiana precepta custodiat, etiam ipsa bella sine beniuolentia non gerentur, sed ut ad pietatis iusticiaeque societatem uictis facilius consulatur. Nam cui licentia iniquitatis eripitur utilius uincitur, quoniam nichil est infelicius felicitate peccantium, qua penalis nutritur inpunitas, et mala uoluntas, uelut interior hostis, roboratur. Et paulo post: §. 5. Nam si Christiana disciplina omnia bella culparet, hoc pocius, consilium salutis petentibus, in euangelio diceretur, ut abicerent arma, seque miliciae omnino subtraherent. Dictum est autem eis: "Neminem concusseritis; estote contenti stipendiis uestris." Quibus proprium stipendium sufficere debere precepit, militare utique non prohibuit.

C. III. Many can please God while bearing the arms of war.

Likewise the same to Boniface, [letter 207]. Do not suppose that no one who serves with the arms of war can please God. Among such men was holy David, to whom the Lord furnished so great a testimony. Among such men also were very many just men of that time. Among such men was that centurion who said to the Lord, "I am not worthy that you should enter under my roof." § 1. Therefore, when you are armed for battle, consider this first: that even your bodily strength itself is a gift of God. For thus you will consider that you must not use the gift of God against the Lord. For when fidelity is promised, it is to be preserved even toward the enemy against whom war is waged; how much more toward the friend for whom one fights? Peace ought to be a matter of will, but war a matter of necessity, so that God may deliver from necessity and preserve in peace. For peace is not sought so that war may be practiced, but war is waged so that peace may be acquired. Therefore, be peaceable in waging war, so that by conquering those whom you attack you may lead them to the benefit of peace. "For blessed are the peacemakers," says the Lord, "because they will be called sons of God." But if human peace is so sweet for the temporal safety of mortals, how much sweeter is divine peace for the eternal safety of the angels? Accordingly, let necessity crush the fighting enemy, not the will. Just as violence is returned to one fighting and resisting, so mercy is already owed to one defeated or captured, especially when no disturbance of the peace is feared in him. Likewise the same against the Manichaeans, [that is, Book XXII Against Faustus, cc. 74 and 75]:

C. III. In bellicis armis multi Deo placere possunt.

Item eiusdem ad Bonifatium. [epist. CCVII.] Noli existimare, neminem Deo placere posse, qui armis bellicis ministrat. In his erat sanctus Dauid, cui Dominus tam magnum perhibuit testimonium. In his etiam plurimi illius temporis iusti. In his erat ille centurio, qui Domino dixit: "Non sum dignus, ut intres sub tectum meum." §. 1. Hoc ergo primum cogita, quando armaris ad pugnam, quia uirtus tua etiam ipsa corporalis donum Dei est. Sic enim cogitabis de dono Dei non facere contra Dominum. Fides enim, quando promittitur, etiam hosti seruanda est, contra quem bellum geritur; quanto magis amico, pro quo pugnatur? Pacem habere uoluntatis, bellum autem debet esse necessitatis, ut liberet Deus a necessitate, et conseruet in pace. Non enim pax queritur, ut bellum exerceatur, sed bellum geritur, ut pax acquiratur. Esto ergo bellando pacificus, ut eos, quos expugnas, ad pacis utilitatem uincendo perducas. "Beati enim pacifici" (ait Dominus) "quoniam filii Dei uocabuntur." Si autem pax humana tam dulcis est pro temporali salute mortalium, quanto dulcior est pax diuina pro eterna salute angelorum? Itaque hostem pugnantem necessitas deprimat, non uoluntas. Sicut bellanti et resistenti uiolentia redditur, ita uicto uel capto misericordia iam debetur, maxime in quo pacis perturbatio non timetur. Item eiusdem contra Manicheos: [id est, libro XXII. contra Faustum, c. 74. et 75.]

C. IV. What things are rightly to be blamed in war.

What is blamed in war? Is it that those who will die at some time die so that those who will live may be subdued in peace? To have blamed this belongs to the timid, not to the religious. The desire to harm, the cruelty of taking vengeance, an unappeased and implacable spirit, the savagery of rebelling, the lust for domination, and anything similar—these are the things that are rightly blamed in wars. In order that these may also be punished by right, wars themselves are very often undertaken by the good against the violence of those resisting, whether at God's command or that of some legitimate authority, when they are found in that order of human affairs in which the order itself justly constrains them either to command something of this kind or to obey in such matters. Hence neither does John command soldiers to depart from arms, and Christ admonishes that tribute be rendered to Caesar, because pay necessarily must be furnished to the soldier on account of wars. Moreover, that natural order accommodated to the peace of mortals demands that the authority and counsel for undertaking war rest with princes. § 1. But if war is waged from human cupidity, it does not harm the saints, over whom no one has power except that given from above. For there is no power except from God, whether he commands or permits it. Therefore, if a just man should serve as a soldier even under a king who is a sacrilegious man, he can rightly fight at that king's command if, preserving the order that serves peace, it is certain that what is commanded of him is not contrary to God's command, or it is not certain whether it is; so that perhaps the iniquity of commanding makes the king guilty, while the order of serving shows the soldier innocent.

C. IV. Que sint in bello iure reprehendenda.

Quid culpatur in bello? An quia morituri quandoque moriuntur, ut domentur in pace uicturi? Hoc reprehendisse timidorum est, non religiosorum. Nocendi cupiditas, ulciscendi crudelitas, inplacatus atque inplacabilis animus, feritas rebellandi, libido dominandi, et si qua similia, hec sunt, que in bellis iure culpantur. Que plerumque ut etiam iure puniantur, aduersus uiolentias resistentium (siue Deo, siue aliquo legitimo inperio iubente) gerenda ipsa bella suscipiuntur a bonis, cum in eo rerum humanarum ordine inueniuntur, ubi eos uel iubere aliquid tale, uel in talibus obedire iuste ipse constringit.

Unde neque Iohannes ab armis iubet discedere milites, et tributa Christus Cesari monet reddi, quia propter bella necessario militi stipendium prebeatur. Ordo autem ille naturalis mortalium paci accommodatus hoc poscit, ut suscipiendi belli auctoritas atque consilium penes principes sit. §. 1. Sed si humana cupiditate bellum geritur, non nocet sanctis, in quos non habet quisquam potestatem, nisi desuper datam. Non enim est potestas, nisi a Deo, siue iubente siue sinente. Ergo uir iustus, si forte etiam sub rege, homine sacrilego, militet, recte potest illo iubente bellare, si, uice pacis ordinem seruans, quod sibi iubetur uel non esse contra Dei preceptum, certum est, uel utrum sit, certum non est, ita, ut fortasse reum faciat regem iniquitas inperandi, innocentem autem militem ostendat ordo seruiendi.

C. V. Military service is not a sin.

Likewise the same in the book On the Words of the Lord, tractate [or sermon] 19. Military service is not an offense, but to serve as a soldier for the sake of plunder is a sin; nor is it criminal to administer the commonwealth, but to administer the commonwealth for this reason, that you may increase riches, appears condemnable. For this reason pay was established for soldiers by a certain providence, lest, while expenses are sought, a robber should range about. Likewise: § 1. The Lord himself said, "Render to God the things that are God's, and to Caesar the things that are Caesar's." Therefore, what Caesar commands is to be borne, and what he orders is to be endured; but it becomes intolerable when exactors accumulate plunder. Likewise: § 2. "Soldiers questioned John, saying: And what shall we do? He said to them: extort nothing from anyone, nor make false accusation, but be content with your pay." Thus every man who serves ought to recognize himself. For Scripture speaks not only of those soldiers who are occupied in armed service, but whoever employs the belt of his service is enrolled as a soldier of his dignity; and therefore this sentence can be spoken, for example, to soldiers, protectors, and all rulers. Whoever receives pay publicly decreed for him, if he seeks more, is condemned by John's sentence as a false accuser and extortioner.

> Item eiusdem in libro de uerbis Domini, tractatu [siue sermone] XIX. Militare non est delictum, sed propter predam militare peccatum est; nec rempublicam gerere criminosum est, sed ideo agere rempublicam, ut diuitias augeas, uidetur esse dampnabile. Propterea enim quadam prouidentia militantibus sunt stipendia constituta, ne, dum sumptus queritur, predo grassetur. Item: §. 1. Dominus ipse dixit: "Reddite que Dei sunt Deo, et que sunt cesaris cesari." Igitur quod cesar precipit ferendum est, quod inperat tollerandum est; sed fit intollerabile, dum predam exactores accumulant. Item: §. 2. "Interrogauerunt Iohannem milites, dicentes: Quid faciemus et nos? Ait illis, neminem concutiatis, neque calumpniam faciatis, sed estote contenti stipendiis uestris." Sic autem se cognoscere debet omnis homo, qui militat. Non enim de his tantum militantibus scriptura loquitur, qui armata milicia detinentur, sed quisquis miliciae suae cingulo utitur, dignitatis suae miles asscribitur, atque ideo hec sentencia potest dici (uerbi gratia) militibus, protectoribus, cunctisque rectoribus. Quicumque sibi stipendia publice decreta consequitur, si amplius querit, tamquam calumpniator et concussor Iohannis sententia condempnatur.

C. VI. Wars waged so that the evil may be restrained and the good assisted are peaceful.

Likewise the same, On Diverse Observances of the Church. Among true worshipers of God, even wars themselves are peaceful when they are waged not from cupidity or cruelty but from zeal for peace, so that the evil may be restrained and the good assisted.

> C. VI. Pacata sunt bella, que geruntur, ut mali coherceantur et boni subleuentur.
> Item eiusdem de diuersis ecclesiae obseruationibus. Apud ueros Dei cultores etiam ipsa bella pacata sunt, que non cupiditate aut crudelitate, sed pacis studio geruntur ut mali coherceantur, et boni subleuentur.

C. VII. The highest praise of military service is to furnish obedience to the interests of the commonwealth.

Likewise Gregory to all the soldiers at Naples, [Book XII, letter 24]. Among other good merits, the highest praise of military service is this: to furnish obedience to the interests of the commonwealth and to obey whatever shall have been advantageously commanded to it, just as we have learned that your devotion has now done. It obeyed our letters by which we appointed the magnificent man Constantius the tribune to preside over the guardianship of the city, and it demonstrated the fitting obedience of military devotion. Hence we have taken care to admonish you by the present writing that you ought, as you have done, to furnish every obedience to the aforesaid magnificent man, the tribune, for the interest of the most serene lords or the preservation of the city, so that through the vigilance and solicitude of the present time you may augment whatever is recognized to have been well conducted by you thus far. GRATIAN. From all these things it is gathered that military service is not a sin, and that the precepts of patience are to be observed in the preparation of the heart, not in display of the body.

C. VII. Summa est laus miliciae republicae utilitatibus obedientiam exhibere.

Item Gregorius uniuersis militibus Neapolitanis. [lib. XII. epist. 24.] Summa laus miliciae inter alia bona merita hec est, obedientiam reipublicae utilitatibus exhibere, quicquid sibi utiliter inperatum fuerit obtemperare, sicut etiam nunc deuotionem uestram fecisse didicimus, que epistolis nostris, quibus magnificum uirum Constantium tribunum custodiae ciuitatis deputauimus preesse, paruit, et congruam militaris deuotionis obedientiam demonstrauit. Unde scriptis uos presentibus curauimus admonendos, uti predicto magnifico uiro tribuno, sicut et fecistis, omnem debeatis pro serenissimorum dominorum utilitate uel conseruanda ciuitate obedientiam exhibere, quatinus quicquid a uobis hactenus bene gestum agnoscitur per presentem temporis uigilantiam ac sollicitudinem augmentetis. Gratian. Ex his omnibus colligitur, quod militare non est peccatum, et quod precepta patienciae in preparatione cordis, non ostentatione corporis seruanda sunt.

Question II

GRATIAN. As to what is asked—what war is just—Isidore says in Book XVIII of the Etymologies:

GRATIANUS. Quod autem queritur, quod sit bellum iustum Ysidorus Ethimologiae libro XVIII. inquit:

C. I. What a just war is.

A war is just when it is waged by edict for the recovery of property or for the purpose of repelling men. § 1. A judge is so called because he declares right to the people, or because he decides by right. To decide by right is to judge justly. For he is not a judge if justice is not in him.

C. I. Quid sit iustum bellum.

Iustum est bellum, quod ex edicto geritur de rebus repetendis, aut propulsandorum hominum causa. §. 1. Iudex dictus est, quia ius dictat populo, siue quod iure disceptet. Iure autem disceptare est iuste iudicare. Non enim est iudex, si non est iusticia in eo.

C. II. It makes no difference to justice whether someone fights openly or by ambushes.

Likewise Augustine in the book of Questions, [VI, question 10]. The Lord our God commands Joshua son of Nun to establish ambushes behind him—that is, warriors lying in ambush to ambush the enemies. From this we are admonished that this is not done unjustly by those who wage a just war, so that above all the just man should consider nothing in these matters except that he undertake a war which it is lawful for him to wage. For it is not lawful for all. But when he has undertaken a just war, whether he fights openly or by ambushes makes no difference to justice. Just wars are customarily defined as those that avenge injuries, as when some nation or state that is to be attacked in war has neglected either to punish what was wickedly done by its own people or to restore what was taken away through injuries. But that kind of war also is undoubtedly just which God commands, who knows what ought to be done to each person; in such a war the commander of the army or the people itself is to be judged not so much the author of the war as its minister. GRATIAN. Therefore, since a just war is one waged by edict or one by which injuries are avenged, it is asked how just wars were waged by the children of Israel. Augustine writes thus concerning these in Questions on Numbers, [question 44, on c. 20]:

C. II Nichil interest ad iusticiam, siue aperte siue ex insidiis aliquis pugnet.

Item Augustinus in libro questionum. [VI., quest. 10.] Dominus Deus noster iubet ad Iesum Naue, ut constituat sibi retrorsum insidias, id est insidiantes bellatores ad insidiandum hostibus. Hinc admonemur, hoc non iniuste fieri ab his, qui iustum bellum gerunt, ut nichil iustus precipue cogitet in his rebus, nisi ut bellum suscipiat cui bellare fas est. Non enim fas est omnibus. Cum autem iustum bellum susceperit, utrum aperte pugnet, an ex insidiis, nichil ad iusticiam interest. Iusta autem bella solent diffiniri, que ulciscuntur iniurias, si qua gens uel ciuitas, que bello petenda est, uel uindicare neglexerit quod a suis inprobe factum est, uel reddere quod per iniurias ablatum est. Sed et hoc genus belli sine dubio iustum est, quod Deus inperat, qui, nouit quid cuique fieri debeat; in quo bello ductor exercitus uel ipse populus non tam auctor belli, quam minister iudicandus est. Gratian. Cum ergo iustum bellum sit, quod ex edicto geritur, uel quo iniuriae ulciscuntur, queritur, quomodo a filiis Israel iusta bella gerebantur. De his ita scribit Augustinus in questionibus Numeri: [quest. 44. ad c. 20.]

C. III. Harmless passage was denied to the children of Israel, and therefore just wars were waged.

It is certainly to be noted how just wars were waged by the children of Israel against the Amorites. For harmless passage was denied, which by the most equitable right of human fellowship ought to have lain open.

C. III. Innoxius transitus filiis Israel negabatur, atque ideo iusta bella gerebantur.

Notandum sane est, quemadmodum iusta bella gerebantur a filiis Israel contra Amorreos. Innoxius enim transitus negabatur, qui iure humanae societatis equissimo patere debebat.

Question III

GRATIAN. That an injury to associates is not to be repelled by arms is proved by examples and authorities. For when the Lord was sought by Herod in order to be killed, he did not seek for himself the protection of arms, although by a hidden impulse he could have turned the hands of the Jews against him, but, fleeing into Egypt, he lay hidden there for seven years. Thus also, when he was assailed with stones by the Jews, he hid himself and went out of the temple. Thus also, when he was led to the cross, he was unwilling to stir up against the elders of the Jews the crowd that had recently gone out to meet him and had received him with palms and praises. Thus also, when questioned by Pilate whether he was a king, he said, "My kingdom is not of this world. For if it were of this world, my servants certainly would fight so that I should not be handed over to the Jews," indicating that those belong to the kingdom of this world who strive to protect themselves from impending injury by the aid of human strength, not by divine protection. Likewise, when he said to his disciples, "If they persecute you in one city, flee into another," he taught that flight, not arms, was to be opposed to persecutors. § 1. Likewise, as is read in Isaiah, Egypt was devastated by Nebuchadnezzar because it promised aid of protection and defense to the children of Israel against the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Hence it was said: "The king of Egypt is a staff of reed; if anyone leans upon it, it will break and pierce the hand of the one leaning." The Jews themselves also were led away captive because they placed hope of their liberation not in God alone but also in man. Thus also it is read of the first believers that they received with joy the plundering of their goods, not seeking for themselves the patronage of others, but rejoicing because they were found worthy to suffer insult for the name of Jesus. Thus also the Apostle in the First Epistle persuades the Corinthians to endure injury and fraud patiently rather than scandalize their brothers by seeking recovery. Thus he judges that one ought to abstain from things offered to idols and from any food rather than eat with scandal to the brothers. Thus he also abstains from expenses lest he furnish any stumbling block to the Gospel of Christ. Therefore, since one who is restrained by arms from inflicting injury is no less scandalized than one from whom things taken are demanded back before a judge, it is evident that the aid of arms is not to be sought for repelling injury. But what is not to be sought ought not by right to be furnished. § 2. Yet many things are rightly furnished that nevertheless are not by right sought. For a good man would not rightly seek vengeance for an injury, because he would return evil for evil; yet a judge would rightly inflict it and would return nothing but good for evil. Hence Augustine says in the exposition of Psalm 108:

> GRATIANUS. Quod uero iniuria sociorum armis propulsanda non sit, exemplis et auctoritatibus probatur. Dominus enim, cum ab Herode quereretur ad interficiendum, non patrocinium sibi quesiuit armorum, cum occulto instinctu posset in eum conuertisse manus Iudeorum, sed fugiens in Egyptum latuit ibi per septennium. Sic etiam, cum a Iudeis lapidibus peteretur, abscondit se, et exiuit de templo. Sic etiam, cum duceretur ad crucem, noluit conmouere aduersus seniores Iudeorum turbam, que nuper ei obuiam processerat, et cum palmis et laudibus eum receperat. Sic etiam interrogatus a Pilato, an rex esset, ait: "Regnum meum non est de hoc mundo. Si enim esset de hoc mundo, ministri utique mei decertarent, ut ego non traderer Iudeis," insinuans illos ad regnum huius mundi pertinere, qui auxilio humanarum uirium, non diuino presidio ab inminenti iniuria se tueri contendunt. Item, cum discipulis suis ait: "Si uos persecuti fuerint in una ciuitate, fugite in aliam," non arma armis, sed fugam persequentibus docuit obponi. §. 1. Item, sicut in Ysaia legitur, Egyptus a Nabuchodonosor deuastata est, quia filiis Israel contra Assyrios et Chaldeos protectionis et defensionis auxilium promisit. Unde dictum est: "Baculus harundineus rex Egypti, super quem si aliquis innisus fuerit, confringetur, et perforabit manum innitentis." Ipsi etiam Iudei captiui ducti sunt, quia spem suae liberationis non in solo Deo, sed etiam in homine posuerunt. Sic etiam de primis credentibus legitur, quod rapinam suorum bonorum cum gaudio suscipiebant, non querentes sibi aliorum patrocinia, sed gaudentes, quoniam digni inueniebantur pro nomine Iesu contumeliam pati. Sic et Apostolus in prima epistola persuadet Chorinthiis, ut iniuriam et fraudem patienter ferant pocius, quam repetendo fratres scandalizent. Sic ab ydolotitis et a qualibet esca censet abstinendum pocius, quam cum scandalo fratrum edamus. Sic et a sumptibus abstinet, ne aliquod offendiculum euangelio Christi prestaret. Cum ergo ille, qui ab iniuria armis arcetur, non minus scandalizetur quam ille, a quo ablata coram iudice reposcuntur, patet, quod ad propulsandam iniuriam non sunt petenda armorum auxilia. Quod autem petendum non est, illud iure prestari non debet. §. 2. Sed multa rite prestantur, que tamen iure non petuntur. Bonus enim non rite iniuriae uindictam peteret quia malum pro malo redderet quam tamen iudex recte infligeret, nec nisi bonum pro malo redderet. Unde Augustinus in expositione Psalmi CVIII. ait:

C. I. How many differences of requital there are.

There are six differences: to return good things for evil things, and not to return evil things for evil things—these belong to the good, and the former is better. Not to return good things for good things, and to return evil things for good things—these two belong to the evil, and the latter is worse. To return good things for good things, and evil things for evil things—these two belong to those in the middle: the former is near to the good, which Christ does not condemn but says that more is required, because even the gentiles do this; the latter is near to the evil, yet it is fitting also for the good. Hence the law also established a measure of vengeance: "An eye for an eye." This, if it can be so called, is the justice of the unjust—not because the vengeance that the law established is inequitable, but because the desire to take vengeance is vicious; and it pertains more to a judge to decree this among men than to a good man to seek it for himself. For the latter would return evil for evil, but the judge would not; rather, from delight in justice he would return what is just for what is unjust, which is good for evil, as God the judge also does. GRATIAN. Likewise, what belongs to one is demanded unjustly from someone captured unjustly, but it is justly offered for the redemption of life. Likewise, sacred vessels are demanded unjustly by some barbarian, but they are justly furnished for the redemption of captives. Thus also, the repelling of injury, although it is sought unjustly, is nevertheless furnished justly, although the seeking itself is proved not altogether unjust. § 1. For it is one thing to repel injury so that one may be permitted to live pleasurably, and another so that one may freely devote oneself to the benefit of others. And thus it is one thing to seek support from a man as from a minister of justice, so that through his ministry the evil will of adversaries may lack effect and the will of the good may obtain effect through his support; it is another to transfer one's hope from God to man, so that adversities inflicted by God for correction of life may be repelled by human aid without any preceding correction. So did the Israelites, who thought that by the support of the Egyptians they could escape the captivity impending over them without penance for their past life, not recalling to memory: "Give us aid from tribulation, because the salvation of man is vain"; and likewise, "These in chariots and these on horses, but we shall invoke the name of our God." Therefore, to seek or furnish assistance in tribulation so that someone may live pleasurably in crime is condemnable. But to seek or furnish help so that the evil may be deprived of the opportunity to offend, so that the church may obtain peace, or so that someone may be preserved for the benefit of many is useful and honorable; but to dissemble is most grave. Hence it is read of Paul that, when certain Jews had sworn that they would not eat bread unless they killed him, he sought soldiers from the praetor by whose protection he might be preserved unharmed from the injury of the Jews, intending to live not for his own pleasure but for the benefit of all. Hence in the Gospel the hireling is one who sees the wolf coming, leaves the sheep, and flees. § 2. Hence also the church is admonished to seek aid from the emperor for its defense. Thus Augustine says to Boniface, [letter 50]:

C. I. Quot sint differentiae retributionis.

Sex differentiae sunt: reddere pro malis bona, non reddere mala pro malis; hec bonorum sunt, et prius melius. Non reddere bona pro bonis, reddere mala pro bonis; hec duo malorum sunt, et posterius deterius. Reddere pro bonis bona, et pro malis mala; hec duo mediocrium sunt: prius propinquum bonis, quod Christus non arguit, sed plus oportere dicit, quia et ethnici hoc faciunt; posterius propinquum malis, tamen conuenit et bonis. Unde et lex modum ultionis statuit: "Oculum pro oculo." Que, si dici potest, iniustorum iusticia est, non quia iniqua est ultio, quam lex statuit, sed quia uiciosa est libido ulciscendi, magisque ad iudicem hoc pertinet inter homines decernere, quam bonum hominem sibi expetere. Hic enim malum pro malo redderet, iudex uero non, sed delectatione iustitiae, iustum iniusto, quod est bonum pro malo, quod etiam Deus facit iudex. Gratian. Item ab aliquo capto iniuste sua exiguntur, pro uita tamen redimenda iuste offeruntur. Item uasa sacra ab aliquo barbaro exiguntur iniuste, pro redemptione tamen captiuorum iuste prestantur. Sic etiam iniuriae propulsatio, licet iniuste postuletur, tamen iuste prestatur, quamquam et ipsa postulatio non usquequaque iniusta probetur. §. 1. Aliud est enim iniuriam propellere, ut sibi liceat uoluptuose uiuere, aliud, ut aliorum utilitati libere possit uacare. Sicque aliud est suffragium ab homine tamquam a ministro iusticiae postulare, ut mala uoluntas aduersantium eius ministerio careat effectu, et bonorum uoluntas eius suffragio sortiatur effectum; aliud spem suam a Deo in hominem transferre, ut aduersa, que inferuntur a Deo ad uitae correctionem, humano pellantur auxilio nulla precedente correctione, sicut Israelitae, qui captiuitatem sibi inminentem Egyptiorum suffragio se putabant posse euadere sine penitencia preteritae uitae, non reuocantes ad memoriam: "Da nobis auxilium de tribulatione, quia uana salus hominis." Et item: "Hii in curribus, et hii in equis, nos autem in nomine Dei nostri inuocabimus." Petere ergo uel prestare in tribulatione subsidium, ut uoluptuose quis in crimine uiuat, dampnabile est. Petere autem uel prestare solacium, ut malis facultas delinquendi adimatur, ut ecclesia pacem adipiscatur, ut aliquis multorum utilitati seruetur, utile est et honestum; dissimulare uero est grauissimum. Hinc de Paulo legitur, quod, cum quidam Iudeorum iurassent, se non comesturos panem, nisi eum interficerent, petiit milites a pretore, quorum presidio illesus seruaretur ab iniuria Iudeorum, non suae uoluptati, sed omnium utilitati uicturus. Hinc in euangelio mercenarius uocatur qui uidet lupum uenientem, et dimittit oues, et fugit. §. 2. Hinc etiam ecclesia auxilium ab inperatore ad sui defensionem petere monetur. Unde Augustinus ad Bonifatium ait: [epist. L.]

C. II. The church ought to seek aid from the emperor.

Maximian, Bishop of Vaga, sought aid from the Christian emperor against the enemies of the church, not so much for the purpose of avenging himself as of protecting the church entrusted to him. If he had omitted this, his patience would not have been praiseworthy, but his negligence would deservedly have been blameworthy. For neither did the Apostle Paul provide for his own transitory life, but for the church of God, when he caused the plan of those who had conspired to kill him to be disclosed to the tribune. Hence it happened that an armed soldier escorted him to the place to which he was to be brought, lest he lie open to their ambushes.

C. II. Ab inperatore ecclesia auxilium postulare debet.

Maximianus episcopus Vagiensis auxilium petiuit ab inperatore Christiano contra hostes ecclesiae, non tam sui ulciscendi causa, quam tuendae ecclesiae sibi creditae.

Quod si pretermisisset, non eius fuisset laudanda patiencia, sed negligentia merito culpanda. Neque enim apostolus Paulus uitae suae transitoriae, sed ecclesiae Dei consuluit, quando contra illos, qui eum occidere conspirauerant, consilium illorum ut tribuno proderetur effecit. Unde factum est, ut eum ad locum, quo fuerat perducendus, deduceret miles armatus, ne illorum pateret insidiis.

C. III. Catholics can seek defense from the ordained powers against heretics.

Likewise Augustine to Emeritus, [letter 164]. Our people seek vengeance from the ordained powers against the unlawful and private acts of violence of your people—which even you there who commit such things lament and bewail—not because they persecute them, but because they defend themselves.

C. III. Catholici aduersus hereticos a potestatibus ordinatis defensionem postulare possunt.

Item Augustinus ad Emeritum. [epist. CLXIV.] Nostri aduersus illicitas et priuatas uestrorum uiolentias (quas et uos ibi, qui talia facitis, doletis et gemitis) a potestatibus ordinatis ultionem petunt, non quod hos persequantur, sed quia se defendant.

C. IV. How great the difference is between the persecution of heretics and that of Catholics.

Likewise the same against Petilian, [Book II, c. 88]. For the members of Christ they rage against you and resist you, whoever in the church are of that spirit in which Peter then was when he drew the sword for Christ's name. But there is a great difference between your persecution and theirs. You are like the priest's servant, because, serving your princes, you are armed against the Catholic Church—that is, against the body of Christ. But they are such as Peter then was, who fought even bodily for Christ's body—that is, for the church.

C. IV. Quantum interest inter persecutionem hereticorum et catholicorum.

Item eiusdem contra Petilianum. [I. II. c. 88.] Pro membris Christi aduersus uos seuiunt, et uobis resistunt, quicumque in ecclesia eo animo sunt, quo tunc Petrus fuit, cum ferrum pro Christi nomine strinxit. Sed multum interest inter uestram persecutionem, et istorum. Vos similes estis seruo sacerdotis, quia seruientes principibus uestris aduersus ecclesiam catholicam, id est aduersus corpus Christi, armamini. Isti autem tales sunt, qualis Petrus tunc fuit, qui pro Christi corpore, id est pro ecclesia, etiam corporaliter pugnauit.

C. V. One who protects his homeland from barbarians by war is full of justice.

Likewise Ambrose in Book I of On Duties, [c. 27]. Courage that protects the homeland from barbarians in war, or defends the weak at home, or protects associates from robbers, is full of justice.

C. V. Iusticia plenus est qui patriam bello tuetur a barbaris.

Item Ambrosius libro I. de offitiis. [c. 27.] Fortitudo, que bello tuetur a barbaris patriam, uel domi defendit infirmos, uel a latronibus socios, plena iustitia est.

C. VI. One who disables the limbs of a robber or pirate benefits him.

Likewise Jerome upon Zephaniah, [on c. 1]. If anyone enervates the strength of a robber or pirate and renders his limbs weak, their weakness benefits them. For their disabled limbs, which they formerly did not use well, will cease from evil work.

C. VI. Prodest latroni uel piratae qui membra eius debilitat.

Item Ieronimus super Sophoniam. [ad c. 1.] Si quis fortitudinem latronis, uel piratae eneruat et infirmos reddit, prodest illis sua infirmitas. Debilitata enim membra, quibus prius non bene utebantur, a malo opere cessabunt.

C. VII. One who does not repel an injury from an associate is like the one who inflicts it.

Likewise Ambrose in Book I of On Duties, [c. 36]. The law of courage consists not in inflicting injury but in repelling it. For one who does not repel an injury from an associate when he can is as much at fault as the one who inflicts it. Hence holy Moses first began from this the trials of his feeble courage. For when he had seen a Hebrew receiving injury from an Egyptian, he defended him in such a way that he struck down the Egyptian and hid him in the sand. Solomon also says: "Rescue him who is led to death."

C. VII. Qui a socio non repellit iniuriam similis est ei, qui facit.

Item Ambrosius libro I. de offitiis. [c. 36.] Non in inferenda, sed in depellenda iniuria lex uirtutis est. Qui enim non repellit a socio iniuriam, si potest, tam est in uicio quam ille, qui facit. Unde S. Moyses hinc prius orsus est temptamenta inbecillae fortitudinis. Nam cum uidisset Hebreum ab Egyptio iniuriam accipientem, defendit ita, ut Egyptium prosterneret, atque in arena absconderet. Salemon quoque ait: "Eripe eum, qui ducitur ad mortem."

C. VIII. One who ceases to oppose the evil favors their impiety.

Likewise Anastasius and Damasus. One who can oppose and disturb the perverse and does not do so is nothing other than a favorer of their impiety. Nor is one free from the scruple of secret association who ceases to oppose a manifest crime.

> C. VIII. Malorum inpietati fauet qui eis obuiare cessat.
> Item Anastasius et Damasus. Qui potest obuiare et perturbare peruersos, et non facit, nichil est aliud quam fauere inpietati eorum. Nec caret scrupulo societatis occultae qui manifesto facinori desinit obuiare.

C. IX. Those who contemn divine commands are to be restrained by severe punishments.

Likewise Callistus, [letter 2 to the bishops of Gaul]. It is just that those who contemn divine commands and are disobedient to paternal injunctions be corrected by more severe punishments, so that others may fear to commit such things, God may rejoice in fraternal concord, and all may receive an example of severity and goodness. For if—which may it not happen—we neglect ecclesiastical solicitude and vigor, idleness destroys discipline, and the souls of the faithful will assuredly be harmed.

> C. IX. Qui diuina mandata contempnunt seueris coherceantur uindictis.
> Item Calixtus. [epist. II. ad Episcopos Galliae] Iustum est, ut qui diuina contempnunt mandata et inobedientes paternis existunt iussionibus, seuerioribus corrigantur uindictis, quatinus ceteri talia conmittere timeant, et deus gaudeat fraterna concordia, et cuncti sumant seueritatis atque bonitatis exemplum. Nam si (quod absit) ecclesiasticam sollicitudinem uigoremque negligimus, perdit desidia disciplinam, et animabus fidelium profecto nocebitur.

C. X. Emperors, with the provision of the bishops, ought to undertake the defense of the church against the power of the rich.

Likewise from the Fifth Council of Carthage, [c. 9]. It is just that this be sought from all emperors because of the affliction of the poor, by whose troubles the church is wearied without interruption: that defenders be delegated to them against the powers of the rich, with the provision of the bishops. GRATIAN. Behold, sometimes the perverse are to be opposed, and an injury to associates is to be repelled by arms, so that both the opportunity to offend, having been taken from the evil, may benefit them, and the desired opportunity of freely providing for the church may be ministered to the good. One who does not do this consents. Hence Augustine says on Psalm 81:

> Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi V. [c. 9.] Ab inperatoribus uniuersis iustum est postulandum propter afflictionem pauperum, quorum molestiis sine intermissione fatigatur ecclesia, ut defensores eis aduersus potentias diuitum cum episcoporum prouisione delegentur. Gratian. Ecce, quod nonnumquam est obuiandum peruersis, et iniuria sociorum armis est propulsanda, ut et malis adempta facultas delinquendi prosit, et bonis optata facultas libere consulendi ecclesiae ministretur. Hoc qui non facit, consentit. Unde Augustinus ait in Psalmo LXXXI.:

C. XI. Those who do not free persons whom they can free from the deed are not immune from the crime.

The Prophet shows that those who permitted the rulers to kill Christ are not immune from the crime, since they were feared because of their multitude and could free the rulers from the deed and themselves from consent. One who ceases to oppose when he can consents.

> C. XI. Non sunt inmunes a scelere qui non liberant eos, quos possunt liberare a facto.
> Ostendit Propheta nec illos inmunes a scelere esse, qui permiserunt principibus Christum interficere, cum pro multitudine timerentur, et possent illos a facto, et se a consensu liberare. Qui desinit obuiare, cum potest, consentit.

Question IV

GRATIAN. PART I. That vengeance is not to be inflicted is proved in many ways. For the evil are to be tolerated, not cast away; struck by rebuke, not expelled bodily. Hence Augustine says in the book On the Words of the Lord, [sermon 18]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem uindicta inferenda non sit, multis modis probatur. Mali enim tollerandi sunt, non abiciendi; increpatione feriendi, non corporaliter expellendi. Unde Augustinus ait in libro de uerbis Domini: [sermone XVIII.]

C. I. How the evil are to be tolerated, and how one is to withdraw from them.

The evil are indeed to be tolerated for the sake of peace, nor is one to withdraw from them bodily; but to depart spiritually is to do what pertains to the correction of the evil, insofar as is permitted according to each person's rank, while preserving peace. To be displeased is not to touch. For the prophets who said this did not abandon their people, but lived among those whom they rebuked, entered one temple with them, and celebrated the same sacraments. Therefore, this is to depart: not to spare with the mouth. This is not to touch the unclean: not to consent with the will.

> Tollerandi sunt quidem mali pro pace, nec corporaliter ab eis recedatur; sed spiritualiter exire est facere quod pertinet ad correctionem malorum, quantum licet pro gradu cuiusque, salua pace; displicere est non tangere. Non enim prophetae, qui hoc dicebant, populum suum dimiserunt, sed inter eos habitabant, quos increpabant, unum templum cum eis intrabant, eadem sacramenta celebrabant. Hoc ergo est exire, ore non parcere, hoc est inmundum non tangere, uoluntate non consentire.

C. II. That the evil are to be tolerated by the good.

The same. You who are good, tolerate the evil man. For Christ also tolerated Judas, although he knew him to be a thief, sent him to preach, and gave him the Eucharist with the others.

> C. II. Quod mali sint tollerandi a bonis.
> Idem. Tu bonus tollera malum. Nam et Christus Iudam, cum sciret furem esse, tollerauit et ad predicandum misit, eique cum aliis eucharistiam dedit.

C. III. The evil are to be tolerated for the peace of the church.

The same upon John, [tractate 50, on c. 12]. What, therefore, brothers, did our Lord Jesus Christ wish to admonish his church when he willed to have one lost man among twelve, except that we should tolerate the evil lest we divide the body of Christ? Behold, Judas is among the saints; behold, Judas is a thief and, lest you dispute it, a thief and a sacrilegious man—not just any kind of thief, but a thief of the Lord's purses, of sacred things. Thus crimes are distinguished in a thief between theft of any kind and embezzlement—for theft from the commonwealth is called embezzlement, and theft of private property is not judged in the same way as that of public property. How much more severely is the sacrilegious thief to be judged, since this is to take not from just anywhere, but from the church? One who steals something from the church is compared to Judas the betrayer.

C. III. Pro pace ecclesiae mali sunt tollerandi.

Idem super Iohannem. [tractatu L., ad c. 12.] Quid ergo uoluit Dominus noster Iesus Christus, fratres mei, ammonere ecclesiam suam, quando unum perditum inter duodecim habere uoluit, nisi ut malos tolleremus, ne corpus Christi diuidamus? Ecce inter sanctos est Iudas, ecce fur est Iudas, et, ne contendas, fur et sacrilegus, non qualiscumque fur, sed loculorum dominicorum, sed sacrorum. Sic crimina discernuntur in fure qualiscumque furti et peculatus (peculatus enim dicitur furtum de re publica, et non sic iudicatur furtum rei priuatae, quomodo publicae), quanto uehementius est iudicandus sacrilegus fur, non undecumque tollere hoc est, sed de ecclesia. Qui aliquid de ecclesia furatur Iudae proditori conparatur.

C. IV. On the same.

The same, [sermon 18 On the Words of the Lord]. Behold, they say, the Prophet says: "Withdraw; depart from there, and do not touch the unclean." How, then, shall we tolerate the evil for the sake of peace, when we are commanded to depart and withdraw from them lest we touch the unclean? We understand that withdrawal spiritually; they understand it bodily. For I too cry out with the Prophet. We are equal vessels; God uses us in his dispensation toward you. We cry out and say to you: withdraw and depart from there, and do not touch the unclean—but by contact of the heart, not of the body. For what is it to touch the unclean except to consent to sins? But what is it to depart from there except to do what pertains to the correction of the evil, insofar as it can be done according to the rank and person of each, while preserving peace? And a little later: § 1. Therefore, my brothers, however many you have among you who are still weighed down by love of the world—the avaricious, perjurers, adulterers, spectators of trifles, consulters of astrologers, fanatics, augurs, soothsayers, drunkards, and the luxurious—whatever evil persons you know to be among you, condemn them insofar as you can, so that you may withdraw in heart; reprove them, so that you may depart from there; and do not consent, so that you may not touch the unclean.

C. IV. De eodem.

Idem. [serm. XVIII. de uerbis Domini] Ecce, inquiunt, dicit Propheta: "Recedite, exite inde, et inmundum ne tetigeritis." Quomodo ergo malos tollerabimus pro pace, a quibus exire et recedere iubemur, ne tangamus inmundum? Nos istam recessionem spiritualiter intelligimus: illi corporaliter. Nam et ego clamo cum

Propheta; equalia sumus uasa, utitur nobis Deus in dispensatione uestra. Clamamus nos, et dicimus uobis, recedite et exite inde, et inmundum ne tetigeritis, sed contactu cordis, non corporis. Quid est enim tangere inmundum, nisi consentire peccatis? Quid est autem exire inde, nisi facere quod pertinet ad correctionem malorum, quantum pro uniuscuiusque gradu atque persona, salua pace, fieri potest? Et paulo post: §. 1. Ergo, fratres mei, quotquot habetis inter uos, qui adhuc amore seculi pregrauantur, auaros, periuros, adulteros, spectatores nugarum, consultores mathematicorum, phanaticorum, augurum, aruspicum, ebriosos, luxuriosos, quicquid inter uos malorum esse nostis, quantum potestis, inprobate, ut corde recedatis, et redarguite, ut exeatis inde, et nolite consentire, ut inmundum non tangatis.

C. V. One who corrects what he can or excludes from himself what he cannot correct is peaceable.

The same in Book II Against Parmenian, c. 1. Whoever either corrects by reproving what he can, or excludes while preserving the bond of peace what he cannot correct, or equitably condemns and steadfastly supports what he cannot exclude while preserving the bond of peace, is peaceable and is altogether free, completely secure, and entirely separate from that curse in which Scripture says, "Woe to those who call what is wicked good, and what is good wicked." § 1. How, says Parmenian, will you be able to remain uncorrupted when you associate with the corrupt?

C. V. Pacificus est qui corrigit quod potest, uel excludit a se quod non potest.

Idem in secundo libro contra Parmenianum, c. 1. Quisquis uel quod potest arguendo corrigit, uel quod corrigere non potest saluo pacis uinculo excludit, uel quod saluo pacis uinculo excludere non potest equitate inprobat, firmitate supportat, hic est pacificus, et ab isto maledicto, quo scriptura dicit: "Vae his, qui dicunt quod nequam est bonum, et quod bonum est nequam," omnino liber, prorsus securus, penitus est alienus. §. 1. Quomodo, inquit Parmenianus, incorruptus poteris permanere, qui corruptis sociaris?

C. VI. What it is to associate with the evil.

The same, [continuing in the same chapter]. Thus, plainly, one is associated—that is, if he commits some evil with them or favors them when they commit it. But if he does neither, he is associated in no way. Moreover, if he adds a third thing, that he not be sluggish in punishing but either, as a just man, rebuke in mercy and reprove, or even, if he bears that office and the rationale of preserving peace admits it, reprove those sinning before all so that the others may fear, and let him also be removed either from some rank of honor or even from communion in the sacraments; and if he does all these things with love for correcting, not with the hatred of persecuting, he has fulfilled the fullest duty not only of the purest innocence but also of the most diligent severity. But where the other things are impeded, those two, always retained, preserve him uncorrupted and chaste: that he neither do evil nor approve it when done.

C. VI. Quid sit malis sociari.

Idem. [in eodem capite continuo] Ita plane, sociatur, id est si mali aliquid cum eis conmittit, aut conmittentibus fauet. Si autem neutrum facit, nullo modo sociatur. Porro, si addat tertium, ut non sit in uindicando piger, sed uel corripiat iustus in misericordia et arguat, uel etiam, si eam personam gerit, et ratio conseruandae pacis admittit, et coram omnibus peccantes arguat, ut ceteri timeant, remoueatur etiam uel ab aliquo gradu honoris, uel ab ipsa conmunione sacramentorum, et hec omnia cum dilectione corrigendi, non cum odio persequendi faciat, plenissimum offitium non solum castissimae innocentiae, sed etiam diligentissimae seueritatis inpleuit. Ubi autem cetera inpediuntur, illa duo semper retenta incorruptum castumque custodiunt, ut nec faciat malum, nec approbet factum.

C. VII. The sins of others in the church do not prejudice anyone.

The same in the conciliar letter to the Donatists. If anyone shall have been separated from the Catholic Church, however praiseworthily he may think that he lives, by this crime alone—that he is severed from Christianity—he will not have life, but the wrath of God remains upon him. But whoever shall have lived well in this holy church is in no way prejudiced by the sins of others, because in it each will bear his own burden, as the Apostle says. § 1. Therefore, communion with the evil does not stain anyone through participation in the sacraments, but consent to their deeds does. For if anyone does not consent to them in evil deeds, the evil man bears his own case and does not prejudice the other, whom he does not have as a partner in crime through consent to the evil work.

> Idem in epistola Concilii ad Donatistas. Si quis a catholica ecclesia fuerit separatus, quantumlibet laudabiliter se uiuere existimet, hoc solo scelere, quod a Christianitate disiunctus est, non habebit uitam, sed ira Dei manet super eum. Quisquis autem in hac sancta ecclesia bene uixerit, nichil ei preiudicant aliena peccata; quia in ea unusquisque proprium onus portabit, sicut Apostolus ait. §. 1. Ergo conmunio malorum non maculat aliquem participatione sacramentorum, sed consensio factorum. Nam si in malis factis non eis quisque consentiat, malus causam suam portat, nec preiudicat alteri, quem in consensione mali operis non habet socium criminis.

C. VIII. An evil man does not stain you if you do not consent to him but reprove him.

The same in a sermon [18] On the Words of the Gospel. Always separate yourselves from the evil in heart; for a time, cautiously be joined to them in body. § 6. An evil man does not stain you in two ways: if you do not consent, and if you reprove him. This is not to communicate: not to consent; for communication occurs when a partnership of will or approval is joined to his deed. § 2. Therefore, neither consent to the evil so as to approve them, nor be negligent so as not to reprove them, nor be proud so as to reprove them insultingly.

> C. VIII. Non te maculat malus, si ei non consentis, sed ipsum redarguis.
> Idem in sermone [XVIII.] de uerbis Euangelii. A malis disiungimini semper corde: ad tempus caute corpore copulamini. §. 6. Duobus modis non te maculat malus: si non consentias, et si redarguas. Hoc est non conmunicare, non consentire; conmunicatur quippe, quando facto eius consortium uoluntatis uel approbationis adiungitur. §. 2. Neque ergo consentientes sitis malis, ut approbetis; neque negligentes, ut non arguatis; neque superbientes, ut insultantes arguatis.

C. IX. To touch the unclean is to consent to sins.

Likewise in the same. Withdraw; depart from there, and do not touch the unclean—but by contact of the heart, not of the body. For what is it to touch the unclean except to consent to sins? What is it to depart from there except to do what pertains to their correction, insofar as it can be done according to the rank and person of each, while preserving peace? Were you displeased that someone sinned? You did not touch the unclean. Did you reprove, rebuke, admonish, and even apply, if the matter requires it, fitting discipline that does not violate unity? You departed from there. § 1. Moses cried these things; Isaiah cried them; Jeremiah cried them; Ezekiel cried them. Let us see whether they abandoned the people of God and transferred themselves to other nations. How many things, and how vehemently, did Jeremiah speak in rebuke against the sinners and criminals of the people? Yet he was among them, entered one temple with them, celebrated the same sacraments, and lived in the same congregation of criminal men; but by crying out he departed from there. This is to depart from there; this is not to touch the unclean: both not to consent with the will and not to spare with the mouth.

C. IX. Inmundum tangere est peccatis consentire.

Item in eodem. Recedite, exite inde, et inmundum ne tetigeritis. Sed contactu cordis, non corporis. Quid enim est tangere inmundum, nisi consentire peccatis? Quid est exire inde, nisi facere quod pertinet ad correctionem illorum, quantum pro uniuscuiusque gradu atque persona, salua pace, fieri potest? Displicuit tibi quod quisque peccauerit? non tetigisti inmundum. Redarguisti, corripuisti, monuisti, adhibuisti etiam, si res exigat, congruam, et que unitatem non uiolet disciplinam? existi inde. §. 1. Clamauit Moyses ista, clamauit Ysaias, clamauit Hieremias, clamauit Ezechiel. Videamus, si dimiserunt populum Dei, et se ad gentes alias transtulerunt. Quam multa, et quam uehementer Hieremias increpauit in peccatores et sceleratos populi? Inter eos tamen erat, unum cum eis templum intrabat, eadem sacramenta celebrabat, in eadem sceleratorum hominum congregatione uiuebat; sed clamando exibat inde. Hoc est exire inde, hoc est inmundum non tangere, et uoluntate non consentire, et ore non parcere.

C. X. Deeds of the guilty that cannot be proved to the innocent or believed by them do not stain the innocent.

The same in letter [48] to Vincentius. How great a crime it is to be separated from the communion of these innocent persons! For even deeds of the guilty that cannot be demonstrated to the innocent or believed by the innocent do not defile anyone if, for the sake of the innocent, they are tolerated even after becoming known. For the good are not to be abandoned on account of the evil, but the evil are to be tolerated on account of the good, just as the Prophets tolerated those against whom they said so many things and did not leave communion in the sacraments of that people; just as the Lord himself tolerated the guilty Judas until his deserved end and permitted him to share the sacred supper with the innocent; just as the Apostles tolerated those who proclaimed Christ through envy, which is a vice of the devil himself.

C. X. Non maculant innocentes facta nocentium, que ab eis credi non possunt.

Idem in epistola [XLVIII.] ad Vincentium. Quam magnum est crimen ab istorum innocentium communione separari? Nam et facta nocentium, que innocentibus demonstrari, uel ab innocentibus credi non possunt, non inquinant quemquam, si propter innocentes etiam cognita sustinentur. Non enim propter malos boni deserendi, sed propter bonos mali tollerandi sunt, sicut tollerauerunt Prophetae, contra quos tanta dicebant, nec communionem sacramentorum illius populi relinquebant; sicut ipse Dominus nocentem Iudam usque ad condignum eius exitum tollerauit, et eum sacram cenam cum innocentibus communicare permisit, sicut tollerauerunt Apostoli eos, qui per inuidiam (que ipsius diaboli est uicium) Christum annunciabant.

C. XI. Evil persons whom the church receives and does not expel are to be tolerated by the good.

The same in Book I On the One Baptism. Perhaps among the people of God there stands beside you an avaricious man, a robber, one gaping after the property of others, whom you know to be such; and he is faithful, or rather is called faithful. You cannot expel him from the church; you have no access by which to correct him through chastising and rebuking him; he is about to approach the altar with you. Do not fear: each will bear his own burden. Likewise: § 1. How, you ask, could I bear one whom I know to be evil? Would it not be better that you bear him than carry yourself outside? Behold how you could bear him: attend to the Apostle saying, "Each will bear his own burden." Let that sentence free you. For you would not share avarice with him, but you would share Christ's table with him. And how would it harm you if you shared Christ's table with him? The Apostle says: "For one who eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment to himself"—to himself, not to you. Certainly, if you are a judge, if you have received the power of judging by ecclesiastical rule, if he is accused before you, if he is convicted by true documents and witnesses, restrain, rebuke, excommunicate, degrade him. GRATIAN. There is also another distinction concerning those to be tolerated and those to be avoided, which may be gathered from the words of Augustine, who says, [sermon 49 On the Words of the Lord]:

C. XI. Mali, quos ecclesia recipit, nec expellit, a bonis sunt tollerandi.

Idem in libro I. de unico baptismo. Forte in populo Dei stat iuxta te auarus, raptor, inhians rebus alienis, quem nosti talem, et fidelis est, uel potius fidelis uocatur. Non eum potes de ecclesia pellere, non habes aliquem aditum castigando et corripiendo illum corrigere, accessurus est tecum ad altare. Noli timere: unusquisque onus suum portabit. Item: §. 1. Quomodo (inquis) ferrem quem noui malum? nonne melius ipsum ferres, quam te foras efferres? Ecce, quomodo ferres: adtende Apostolum dicentem: "Unusquisque proprium onus portabit." Liberet te ista sententia. Non enim conmunicares cum illo auariciam, sed conmunicares cum illo Christi mensam. Et quid tibi obesset, si cum illo conmunicares mensam Christi? Apostolus dicit: "Qui enim manducat et bibit indigne, iudicium sibi manducat et bibit:" sibi, non tibi. Sane si iudex es, si iudicandi potestatem accepisti, ecclesiastica regula, si apud te accusatur, si ueris documentis testibusque conuincitur, coherce, corripe, excommunica, degrada. Gratian. Est et alia distinctio tollerandorum et cauendorum, quam ex uerbis Augustini licet colligere, dicentis: [serm. XLIX. de uerbis Domini]

C. XII. The shepherd is to be loved, the hireling tolerated, the robber avoided.

The Lord spoke of three persons in the Gospel—and we ought to investigate them—the shepherd, the hireling, and the thief. He said that the shepherd lays down his life for the sheep and enters through the door. He said that the thief and robber climbs up by another way. He said that the hireling, if he sees the wolf or even the thief, flees because he has no care for the sheep; for he is a hireling, not a shepherd. The one who is a shepherd enters through the door; the one who is a thief climbs up by another way; the one who, on seeing those who wish to take away the sheep, fears and flees is a hireling, and he has no care for the sheep, for he is a hireling. If we find these three persons, your holiness finds whom you should love, whom you should tolerate, and whom you should avoid. The shepherd is to be loved, the hireling tolerated, the robber avoided. GRATIAN. Behold, the evil are to be tolerated and punished not with bodily but with spiritual vengeance. Hence, when the disciples, not having been received by the Samaritans, wished to bring down fire from heaven upon them, saying to the master, "Do you wish us to say that fire should descend from heaven and consume them?" they heard, "You do not know of what spirit you are." Likewise: "Everyone who takes the sword will perish by the sword."

C. XII. Pastor est diligendus, mercenarius tollerandus, latro cauendus.

Tres personas dixit Dominus (et debemus illas inuestigare) in euangelio, pastoris, et mercenarii, et furis. Pastorem dixit animam suam ponere pro ouibus, et intrare per ianuam. Furem dixit et latronem ascendere per aliam partem. Mercenarium dixit, lupum uel etiam furem si uideat, fugere, quia non est illi cura de ouibus: mercenarius autem est, non pastor. Ille intrat per ianuam, qui pastor est; ille ascendit per aliam partem, qui fur est; ille uidens eos, qui uolunt oues tollere, timet et fugit, quia mercenarius est, nec illi cura est de ouibus, mercenarius est enim. Si inuenerimus tres istas personas, inuenit sanctitas uestra quos diligatis, quos tolleretis, quos caueatis. Diligendus est pastor, tollerandus est mercenarius, cauendus est latro. Gratian. Ecce, quod mali tollerandi sunt, nec corporali, sed spirituali uindicta sunt puniendi. Unde, cum discipuli non recepti a Samaritanis ignem celitus super eos deducere uoluerunt, dicentes magistro: "Vis dicimus descendat ignis de celo, et consumat eos?" audierunt: "Nescitis, cuius spiritus estis?" Item: "Omnis, qui gladium acceperit, gladio peribit."

C. XIII. The spiritual man does not persecute the carnal, but conversely.

Hence Jerome also says, [in the commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, c. 4]. He who was born according to the flesh persecuted the spiritual man; but the spiritual man never persecutes the carnal, but forgives him as an uncultivated brother. He knows that the other can make progress with time; and if at any time he shall have seen the son of the Egyptian woman growing angry, he will remember the one Father who created both the oxen and the gnat, and who willed that in a great house there should be not only vessels of gold and silver but also wooden and earthen vessels.

C. XIII. Spiritualis carnalem non persequitur, sed e conuerso.

Hinc etiam Ieronimus ait. [in comment. ep. ad Gal. c. 4.] Qui secundum carnem natus est, persequebatur spiritualem: numquam uero spiritualis carnalem persequitur, sed ignoscit ei, quasi rusticano fratri. Scit, eum proficere posse per tempus, et si quando Egyptiae filium uiderit irascentem, recordabitur unius patris, qui boues creauit, et culicem, et in magna domo non solum esse uasa aurea et argentea, sed lignea et fictilia uoluit.

C. XIV. The good can never be separated entirely from the evil in this life.

Likewise Augustine in Book [IV] On Baptism, [c. 12]. How great a swelling of arrogance it is, how great a forgetfulness of humility and gentleness, and how great a boast of arrogance, that someone should believe himself able to do what the Lord did not grant even to the Apostles—namely, that he should think himself able to distinguish the weeds from the wheat.

C. XIV. Boni a malis numquam in hac uita penitus possunt separari.

Item Augustinus in libro [IV.] de baptismo. [c. 12.] Quantus arrogantiae tumor est, quanta humilitatis et lenitatis obliuio et arrogantiae quanta iactatio, ut quis se posse credat facere, quod nec Apostolis concessit Dominus, ut zizania uidelicet a frumento putet se posse discernere?

C. XV. The present church receives the good and the evil together.

Likewise Gregory, [homily 38 on the Gospels]. This life, which is situated between heaven and hell, just as it subsists in the middle, so receives in common the citizens of both parts; nevertheless, the holy church receives them without distinction and afterwards will distinguish them at their departure. Therefore, if you are good, so long as you subsist in this life, tolerate the evil with equanimity. For whoever does not tolerate the evil is by his intolerance a witness against himself that he is not good. For he refuses to be Abel whom Cain's malice does not exercise. PART II. GRATIAN. From all these things it is gathered that vengeance upon the evil is to be reserved to God, and that they are not to be punished bodily but invited to correction by frequent admonition and the benefit of charity. Hence Christ says in the Gospel: "You have heard that it was said in the law"—which manner of vengeance the law established—"An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth." But I, taking away this reciprocity and inviting you to gentleness and the perfection of charity, say to you: "Do not resist evil, but love your enemies; do good to those who hate you, so that you may be sons of your Father, who makes his sun rise upon the good and the evil and rains upon the just and the unjust." Hence Paul says: "If your enemy is hungry, feed him; if he thirsts, give him drink." Moreover, every unjust man is an enemy of the good, for every friend of this world is an enemy of God. But an enemy of God is an enemy of goodness and justice, and on this account he cannot love a lover of justice and goodness. Therefore, since we are commanded to love our enemies or do good to them and furnish them food and drink, we are prohibited from persecuting and punishing our enemies. § 1. For in the law of the Old Testament a bodily penalty was established, but in the law of the Gospel pardon through penance is promised to every sinner. Hence the former began from terror, saying, "I am the Lord, a jealous God, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the sons unto the third and fourth generation." But the latter began from the gentleness of meekness and mercy, saying thus: "Blessed are the poor in spirit; blessed are the meek; blessed are the merciful, because they shall obtain mercy." In the former it was said, "One who does this or that shall die the death." In the latter it is said, "I rejoice over one sinner doing penance more than over ninety-nine just persons who do not need penance." Likewise: "I came not to call the just but sinners." Likewise: "Be merciful, as your Father also is merciful." The beginning of the preaching of our Savior and of his herald also invited sinners to penance. For each began thus: "Do penance, for the kingdom of heaven will draw near." Thus also in the Acts of the Apostles, when the Jews, pierced concerning the crime of Christ's death, said to Peter, "What shall we do, men and brothers?" Peter is read to have answered them, "Do penance, and let each one of you be baptized." And, to speak universally, in the law that untutored people was compelled by servile fear of penalties; hence it also received the law as a pedagogue. But in the Gospel the free and adult people of grace is invited to the observance of divine service by filial love and certainty of inheritance. Hence, when certain persons preached that the law, as though restraining, was to be kept together with grace, the Apostle said, "For you have not received the spirit of servitude again in fear, but you have received the spirit of adoption as sons, in which we cry: Abba, Father." § 2. Hence Gregory also says in the exposition of the Gospel: "The kingdom of heaven was made like a man who was a king and made a wedding for his son."

C. XV. Presens ecclesia simul recipit bonos et malos.

Item Gregorius. [homilia XXXVIII. Euang.] Hec autem uita, que inter celum et infernum sita est, sicut in medio subsistit, ita utrarumque partium ciues communiter recipit: quos tamen sancta ecclesia et indiscrete suscipit, et postmodum in egressione discernet. Si igitur boni estis, quamdiu in hac uita subsistitis, equanimiter tollerate malos. Nam quisquis malos non tollerat, ipse sibi per intollerantiam testis est, quia bonus non est. Abel enim esse rennuit, quem Cain malicia non exercet. II. Pars. Gratian. Ex his omnibus colligitur, quod malorum uindicta Deo reseruanda est, nec sunt corporaliter puniendi, sed crebra ammonitione, et karitatis beneficio ad correctionem inuitandi. Unde Christus ait in euangelio: "Audistis: quia dictum est in lege," (quem modum ulcionis lex statuit) "Oculum pro oculo, dentem pro dente." Ego autem hanc uicissitudinem tollens, et ad mansuetudinem et karitatis perfectionem uos inuitans, dico uobis: "Nolite resistere malo, sed diligite inimicos uestros, benefacite his, qui oderunt uos, ut sitis filii patris uestri, qui solem suum oriri facit super bonos et malos, et pluit super iustos et iniustos." Hinc Paulus ait: "Si esurierit inimicus tuus, ciba illum; si sitit, potum da illi."

Omnis autem iniquus bonorum est inimicus; omnis enim amicus huius seculi inimicus est Dei. Inimicus autem Dei bonitatis et iusticiae est inimicus, ac per hoc amatorem iusticiae et bonitatis diligere non potest. Cum ergo inimicos diligere, uel illis benefacere, cibum et potum subministrare iubemur: inimicos persequi et punire prohibemur. §. 1. In lege enim ueteris testamenti corporalis pena statuta est: in lege uero euangelii omni peccanti per penitenciam uenia promittitur. Unde illa a terrore incepit, dicens: "Ego sum Dominus Deus zelotes, uisitans peccata patrum in filios usque in tertiam et quartam generationem." Hec uero a lenitate mansuetudinis et misericordiae, ita inquiens: "Beati pauperes spiritu, beati mites, beati misericordes, quoniam ipsi misericordiam consequentur." In illa dicebatur: "Qui fecerit hoc uel illud, morte moriatur." In ista dicitur: "Gaudeo super uno peccatore penitenciam agente, quam super nonaginta nouem iustis, qui non indigent penitencia." Item: "Non ueni uocare iustos, sed peccatores." Item: "Estote misericordes, sicut et pater uester misericors est." Inicium quoque predicationis saluatoris nostri, et preconis eiusdem, ad penitenciam peccatores inuitauit. Sic enim uterque exorsus est: "Penitenciam agite, appropinquabit enim regnum celorum." Sic et in Actibus Apostolorum, cum Iudei, conpuncti de scelere mortis Christi, dicerent Petro: "Quid faciemus, uiri fratres?" legitur Petrus his respondisse: "Penitenciam agite, et baptizetur unusquisque uestrum." Et, ut uniuersaliter dicatur, in lege populus ille rudis seruili timore penarum cogebatur: unde et legem in pedagogum accepit. In euangelio autem populus gratiae liber et adultus filiali amore, et hereditatis certitudine ad cultum diuinae seruitutis inuitatur. Unde, cum quidam legem, quasi cohercentem, predicarent esse tenendam simul cum gratia, ait Apostolus: "Non enim accepistis spiritum seruitutis iterum in timore, sed accepistis spiritum adoptionis filiorum, in quo clamamus: Abba pater." §. 2. Hinc etiam Gregorius ait in expositione euangelii: "Simile factum est regnum celorum homini regi, qui fecit nuptias filio suo."

C. XVI. Under the law each person was permitted to love a friend and hate an enemy.

Since it is written in the law, "You shall love your friend and hold your enemy in hatred," license had then been granted to the just to restrain the adversaries of God and of themselves with as much strength as they could, and to strike them by right of the sword. This is undoubtedly restrained in the New Testament, when Truth himself preaches, saying, "Love your enemies; do good to those who hate you." Therefore, what is signified by the bulls except the fathers of the Old Testament? For when, by permission of the law, they had received authority to strike their adversaries with the requital of hatred, what else were they, so to speak, but bulls that struck their enemies with the horn of bodily strength? But what is figured by the fattened animals except the fathers of the New Testament? For when they receive the grace of inner richness, rising from earthly desires, as though by the wing of contemplation they raise themselves to the heights. GRATIAN. To these things the answer is thus: There are certain things that are to be reproved only by salutary admonition and not punished with bodily scourges; but vengeance for them is to be reserved only to divine judgment when, namely, we cannot exercise discipline upon the offenders, either because they are not under our jurisdiction or because their crimes, although known to us, nevertheless cannot be proved by manifest evidence. § 1. Concerning those who are not under our jurisdiction, the Apostle says in the First Epistle to the Corinthians: "For what does it pertain to me to judge those who are outside? For the Lord will judge them." Augustine, expounding this, says:

C. XVI. In lege cuique permittebatur diligere amicum, et odire inimicum.

Cum in lege scriptum sit: "Diliges amicum tuum, et odio habebis inimicum tuum," accepta tunc licentia iustis fuerat, ut Dei suosque aduersarios, quanta possent uirtute, conprimerent, eosque iure gladii ferirent. Quod in nouo proculdubio testamento conpescitur, cum per semetipsam ueritas predicat, dicens: "Diligite inimicos uestros, benefacite his, qui oderunt uos." Quid ergo per tauros, nisi ueteris testamenti patres signantur? Nam dum ex permissione legis acceperant, quatinus aduersarios suos odii retributione percuterent (ut ita dicam), quid aliud quam tauri erant, qui inimicos suos cornu corporeae uirtutis feriebant? Quid uero per altilia, nisi patres noui testamenti figurantur? qui dum gratiam internae pinguedinis percipiunt, a terrenis desideriis innitentes, contenplationis penna ad sublimia quasi se subleuant. Gratian. His ita respondetur: Sunt quedam, que salubri tantum ammonitione sunt corripienda, non corporalibus flagellis sunt animaduertenda; sed eorum uindicta diuino examini tantum est reseruanda, quando in delinquentes disciplinam uidelicet exercere non possumus, uel quia non sunt nostri iuris, uel quia illorum crimina, etsi nobis nota sunt, tamen manifestis indiciis probari non possunt. §. 1. De his, qui non sunt nostri iuris, ait Apostolus in epistola prima ad Chorinthios: "Quid enim michi attinet de his, qui foris sunt, iudicare? de his enim Dominus iudicabit."

Quod Augustinus exponens ait:

C. XVII. Conversations and banquets with unbelievers are not to be avoided.

We cannot gain unbelievers for Christ if we avoid conversation and a banquet with them. Hence the Lord also ate and drank with publicans and sinners. But in those who are within—that is, the faithful—the putrefaction is to be cut away. GRATIAN. Hence also, when the Prophet says, "The Lord executes judgment for all who suffer injury," Augustine added by way of exposition: "from those who are not under his jurisdiction, upon whom discipline cannot be exercised." § 1. Likewise, when a multitude is involved in crime and the evils cannot be punished while preserving the peace of the church, they are rather to be tolerated than punished with the peace of the church violated. Hence Augustine says, [in the book On Faith and Works, cc. 4 and 5]:

C. XVII. Infidelium colloquia et conuiuia non sunt euitanda.

Infideles non possumus Christo lucrari, si colloquium eorum uitamus et conuiuium. Unde et Dominus cum publicanis et peccatoribus manducauit et bibit. In his uero, qui intus sunt, id est fidelibus, putredo resecanda est. Gratian. Hinc etiam, cum Propheta dicit: "Facit Dominus iudicium omnibus iniuriam patientibus," exponendo addidit Augustinus: "ab his, qui non sunt sui iuris, in quos nequit disciplina exerceri." §. 1. Item, quando multitudo est in scelere, nec salua pace ecclesiae mala puniri possunt, tolleranda sunt pocius, quam uiolata pace ecclesiae punienda. Unde Augustinus ait: [in libro de fide et operibus, c. 4. et 5.]

C. XVIII. Certain evils are to be punished and certain ones tolerated.

Some persons, when they have perceived that the mingling of the good and the evil in the church has been demonstrated or foretold, and have learned the precepts of patience—which render us most steadfast, so that even if weeds should be seen in the church, nevertheless neither our faith nor our charity is impeded, and because we discern that weeds are in the church we do not therefore ourselves withdraw from the church—think that ecclesiastical discipline is to be abandoned. They attribute to prelates a certain most perverse security, so that nothing pertains to them except to say what is to be avoided and what is to be done, but not to care what each person may do. But we judge that it pertains to sound doctrine to moderate life and judgment by both sets of testimonies, so that we tolerate dogs in the church for the sake of the church's peace, but do not give what is holy to dogs where the church's peace is secure. But when, through the negligence of prelates, or through some excusable necessity, or through hidden intrusions, we find in the church evil persons whom ecclesiastical discipline cannot correct or restrain, then—lest an impious and pernicious presumption rise in our heart by which we judge that we are to be separated from them so that we may not be defiled by their sins, and thus attempt to draw after us, as though pure and holy, disciples separated from the structure of unity as though from association with the evil—let those similitudes from the Scriptures, divine oracles, and most certain examples come to mind by which it has been demonstrated and pronounced that the evil, mingled with the good in the church until the end of the age and the time of future judgment, are to be tolerated, and will harm nothing in the good who do not consent to their deeds while remaining in the unity and participation of the sacraments. § 1. But when those by whom the church is governed possess, with peace preserved, the power to exercise discipline against the wicked or criminal, then again let us sleep through neither indifference nor sloth, but let us be roused by the goads of the precepts that pertain to severity of restraint, so that, directing our steps upon the way of the Lord from both sets of testimonies, with him as leader and helper, we may neither grow torpid in the name of patience nor rage under the pretext of diligence.

C. XVIII. Quedam mala sunt punienda, et quedam tolleranda.

Quidam, cum bonorum malorumque conmixtionem in ecclesia demonstratam uel predictam esse perspexerint, et precepta patienciae didicerint, (que nos firmissimos reddunt, ut etiamsi uiderentur in ecclesia zizania, tamen non inpediatur aut fides, aut karitas nostra, et quoniam zizania in ecclesia esse cernimus, non ideo ipsi de ecclesia recedamus) destituendam putant ecclesiae disciplinam, quandam peruersissimam securitatem prepositis tribuentes, ut ad eos non pertineat, nisi dicere quid cauendum sit, quidue faciendum sit; quodlibet autem quisque faciat non curare. Nos uero ad sanam doctrinam pertinere arbitramur utrisque testimoniis uitam sententiamque moderare, ut et canes in ecclesia propter pacem ecclesiae tolleremus, et canibus sanctum, ubi est pax ecclesiae tuta, non demus. Cum uero per negligentiam prepositorum, siue per aliquam excusabilem necessitatem, siue per occultas obreptiones inuenimus in ecclesia malos, quos ecclesiastica disciplina corrigere aut cohercere non possumus, tunc, ne ascendat in cor nostrum inpia et perniciosa presumptio, qua estimemus nos ab his esse separandos, ut peccatis eorum non inquinemur, atque ita post nos trahere conemur, ueluti mundos sanctosque discipulos ab unitatis conpage quasi a malorum coniunctione separatos, ueniant in mentem illae de scripturis similitudines, et diuina oracula, uel certissima exempla, quibus demonstratum et pronunciatum est, malos in ecclesia bonis permixtos usque in finem seculi tempusque iudicii futuri, malos tollerandos nichilque bonis in unitate ac participatione sacramentorum, qui eorum factis non consenserint, obfuturos. §. 1. Cum uero eis, per quos ecclesia regitur, adest pace salua potestas disciplinae aduersus inprobos aut nefarios exercendae, tunc rursus, neque socordia neque segnitia dormiamus, sed aculeis preceptorum, que ad seueritatem cohercionis pertinent, excitandi sumus, ut gressus nostros in uia Domini ex utrisque testimoniis illo duce atque adiutore dirigentes, nec patienciae nomine torpescamus, nec obtentu diligentiae seuiamus.

C. XIX. Hidden offenses are to be punished more lightly, but manifest offenses more severely by the church.

The same against the letter of Parmenian, [Book III, c. 2]. When any one of the brothers and Christians established within the fellowship of the church shall have been detected in some such sin that he is held worthy of anathema, let this be done where there is no danger of schism. Below: § 1. When anyone's crime is known and appears execrable to all, so that it has either no defenders at all or not such defenders through whom a schism could occur, let the severity of discipline not sleep. PART III. GRATIAN. There is also another cause by which correction with words or blows appears useless or superfluous. For those predestined to life are changed without correction, as Peter, whom the Lord, looking upon him while no one reproved him, moved to tears. Those foreknown for death become worse amid scourges, as Pharaoh did. Therefore, these things are found superfluous for the good and useless for those to be condemned. To these things the answer is thus by the authority of Gregory and Augustine:

> C. XIX. Leuius occulta, seuerius autem ab ecclesia punienda sunt delicta manifesta.
> Idem contra epistolam Parmeniani. [lib. III. c. 2.] Cum quisque fratrum et Christianorum, intus in ecclesiae societate constitutorum, in aliquo tali peccato fuerit deprehensus, ut anathemate dignus habeatur, fiat hoc, ubi periculum scismatis nullum est. Infra: §. 1. Quando cuiusquam crimen notum est, et omnibus execrabile apparet, ut uel nullos prorsus, uel non tales habeat defensores, per quos possit scisma contingere, non dormiat seueritas disciplinae. III. Pars. Gratian. Est etiam alia causa, qua correctio uerborum uel uerberum uidetur esse inutilis uel superflua. Predestinati enim ad uitam sine correctione mutantur, sicut Petrus, quem Dominus respiciens nemine corripiente conmouit ad lacrimas. Presciti ad mortem inter flagella deteriores fiunt, sicut Pharao. Bonis ergo superflua, dampnandis inueniuntur hec esse inutilia. His ita respondetur auctoritate Gregorii et Augustini:

C. XX. Just as one must not cease from prayer, so neither from correction.

Just as one must not cease from prayer for those whom we wish to be corrected, even though, when no man prayed for Peter, the Lord looked upon him and caused him to weep for his sin, so correction is not to be neglected, although God makes those whom he wills corrected without correction. A man then profits from correction when he who causes those whom he wills to profit even without correction has mercy and assists. Likewise in the Dialogues, [Book I, c. 8]:

> Sicut non est cessandum ab oratione pro eis, quos corrigi uolumus, etiamsi nullo hominum orante pro Petro Dominus respexit eum, et fecit eum suum flere peccatum: ita non est negligenda correctio, quamuis Deus, quos uoluerit, non correctos faciat esse correctos. Tunc autem ex correctione proficit homo, cum miseretur atque adiuuat qui facit, quos uoluerit, etiam sine correctione proficere. Item in Dialogo: [lib. I. c. 8.]

C. XXI. Only the predestined are saved, which nevertheless they merit through their labor in petitioning.

Things that have not been predestined can by no means be obtained. But those things that holy men effect by praying have been so predestined that they are obtained by prayers. For even the predestination of the everlasting kingdom itself has been so arranged by almighty God that the elect reach it through labor, so that by petitioning they may merit to receive what almighty God arranged before the ages to give them.

> Obtineri nequaquam possunt que predestinata non fuerint. Sed ea, que sancti uiri orando efficiunt, ita predestinata sunt, ut precibus obtineantur. Nam ipsa quoque perhennis regni predestinatio ita est ab omnipotenti Deo disposita, ut ad hoc electi ex labore perueniant, quatinus postulando mereantur accipere quod eis omnipotens Deus ante secula disposuit donare.

[C. XXII.]

Likewise Augustine, [in the book On Predestination and Grace, c. 15]. Nebuchadnezzar merited fruitful penance. Did he not repent after he had been scourged following innumerable impieties, and receive again the kingdom that he had lost? But was not Pharaoh rendered harder by the very scourges and did he not perish? Let the person who with a wise heart passes judgment upon the exceedingly deep divine counsel render me a reason why a medicine compounded by one physician availed for one man's destruction and for the other's salvation, unless because the good fragrance of Christ is for some a fragrance of life unto life and for others a fragrance of death unto death. As regards nature, both were men. As regards dignity, both were kings. As regards the cause, both possessed God's people captive. As regards the penalty, both were mercifully admonished by scourges. What, therefore, made their ends different, except that one, feeling the hand of God, groaned in remembrance of his own iniquity, while the other by free choice fought against the most merciful truth of God?

> [C. XXII.]
> Item Augustinus. [in libro de predestinatione et gratia, c. 15.] Nabuchodonosor penitenciam meruit fructuosam.
> Nonne post innumeras inpietates flagellatus penituit, et regnum, quod perdiderat, rursus accepit? Pharao autem ipsis est flagellis durior effectus et periit? Hic michi rationem reddat qui diuinum consilium nimium altum sapienti corde diiudicat, cur medicamentum unius medici confectum alii ad interitum, alii ualuerit ad salutem, nisi quia Christi bonus odor aliis est odor uitae in uitam, aliis est odor mortis in mortem? Quantum ad naturam, ambo homines erant. Quantum ad dignitatem, ambo reges. Quantum ad causam, ambo captiuum populum Dei possidebant. Quantum ad penam, ambo flagellis clementer ammoniti. Quid ergo fines eorum fecit esse diuersos, nisi quod unus Dei manum sentiens in recordatione propriae iniquitatis ingemuit, alter libero contra Dei misericordissimam ueritatem pugnauit arbitrio?

[C. XXIII.] The same.

God would never render destruction to vessels of wrath if man were not found to have voluntary sin, because God would not justly inflict wrath upon a sinning man if man had fallen into fault by God's predestination. The same: § 1. It is said most foolishly that God's predestination operates in all persons either toward good or toward evil, so that a certain necessity appears to impel men toward either, since in good things the will is to be understood not without grace, but in evil things the will is to be understood without grace. § 2. But when we read that some persons have either been handed over by God to their own desires, or hardened, or abandoned, we profess that they themselves merited this by their great sins, because such crimes of theirs preceded that they owed themselves the penalty by which even their punishment would be turned into guilt for them. And thus we neither complain of God's judgment by which he abandons those who deserve to be abandoned, and we give thanks for his mercy by which he frees those who do not deserve to be freed. § 3. Accordingly, he did not withdraw the powers of obedience from anyone because he did not predestine him, but he did not predestine him because he foresaw that he would withdraw from obedience itself. § 4. God's predestination also is always toward good; it knows that sin committed solely by man's will is either to be forgiven with praise of mercy or punished with praise of justice. But in our evil works only God's foreknowledge is to be understood, because, just as he foreknew and predestined the things that he himself did and gave us the power to do, so he only foreknew, but did not also predestine, the things that he neither did himself nor exacted that we do. § 5. But those concerning whom it is said, "They went out from us, but they were not of us. For if they had been of us, they certainly would have remained with us," went out by their will and fell by their will; and because they were foreknown as going to fall, they were not predestined. But they would have been predestined if they were going to return and remain in holiness and truth. And through this, God's predestination is for many a cause of standing, but for no one a cause of falling. GRATIAN. Therefore, divine predestination or foreknowledge does not create the necessity of correction or hardening, since the good are corrected through grace and the evil perish by free choice. For neither, because God's predestination or foreknowledge cannot be deceived, do the things that are predestined or foreknown happen necessarily, just as neither are the things that will be necessarily predestined or foreknown; rather, it is because good things cannot happen without his grace, nor evil things outside his knowledge. § 1. Therefore, although it is fittingly said, "If these things are predestined or foreknown, they will happen necessarily," nevertheless it is not therefore absolutely true that the things predestined or foreknown will happen necessarily, because here necessity is referred to the event of things, but there to the gaze of divine foreknowledge. Hence Augustine says: "There are," he says, "two necessities: one simple, as, for example, it is necessary that all men are mortal; the other conditional, as, if someone knows that a person is walking, it is necessary that he is walking. For what anyone knows cannot be otherwise than it is known. But this necessity by no means brings that simple necessity with it. For its own nature does not create this necessity, but the addition of a condition. For no necessity compels one who walks by his will to proceed, although at the time when he walks it is necessary that he is proceeding. In the same manner, therefore, if present providence sees something, it is necessary that it be, even though it has no necessity of nature. Yet foreknowledge beholds those future things that proceed from freedom of choice. Therefore, when referred to the divine gaze, these things become necessary through the disposition of divine knowledge. But considered in themselves, they do not abandon the absolute freedom of their own nature. Therefore, all things that God foreknows will be will undoubtedly happen; but certain of them proceed from free choice, and although they happen, nevertheless in coming to exist they do not lose their own nature by which, before they happened, they could also not have happened." § 2. By all these things our evils are ascribed to free choice, although elsewhere they are ascribed to divine indignation. Hence Gregory says: "When heavenly indignation moves itself, so to speak, from the marrow, human opinion does not move it away, nor does anyone's supplication usefully oppose it when once God, becoming angry from within, determines something. Hence it is that Moses, who wiped away the guilt of the whole people before the Lord by his prayers and, when he offered himself as an obstacle, appeased the force of divine wrath, upon coming to the rock of Horeb and distrusting concerning the furnishing of water, could not enter the promised land when the Lord was angry." § 3. Likewise Augustine: "Concerning the Tyrians and Sidonians, what else can we say except that it was not given to them to believe, whom Truth himself teaches would have believed if they had seen such signs of powers as were performed among those who did not believe? But why this was denied to them, let those who bring false accusation say, if they can, and let them show why the Lord performed among those whom they would not benefit wonders that would have benefited those among whom he did not perform them. For our part, if by reason of the deed we cannot penetrate the depth of his judgment, nevertheless we know most manifestly both that what he said is true and what he did is just, and that not only the Tyrians and Sidonians but even Chorazin and Bethsaida could have been converted and made faithful from unfaithful if the Lord had willed to work this in them. For that which Truth says can appear false to no one: 'No one can come to me unless it shall have been given to him by my Father.' Likewise, he who through the Prophet promised the Jewish people, 'Behold, I shall hedge your ways with thorns and fortify them with squared stones,' that is, 'I shall take from you the opportunity to sin,' had said the same through the Psalmist concerning those to be condemned: 'Let their ways become darkness and slippery ground, and the angel of the Lord pursuing them.' But in all these things our vices are ascribed to the choice of the human mind, which divine clemency mercifully turns to good in the elect and justly leaves to evil in those to be condemned. Therefore, just as, although we know most certainly that no one will live beyond the limit fixed for him by God, nevertheless we not unfittingly administer medicine to all the sick, so, although no one is saved unless predestined to life, nevertheless correction is to be applied to every offender, nor is discipline of the evil to be neglected." Hence the same Augustine to Boniface:

[C. XXIII.] Idem.

Vasis irae numquam Deus redderet interitum, si non spontaneum homo inueniretur habere peccatum, quia nec Deus peccanti homini iuste inferret iram, si homo ex predestinatione Dei cecidisset in culpam. Idem: §. 1. Predestinationem Dei siue ad bonum siue ad malum in omnibus operari ineptissime dicitur, ut ad utrumque homines quedam necessitas uideatur inpellere, cum in bonis uoluntas sit intelligenda non sine gratia, in malis autem uoluntas intelligenda sine gratia. §. 2. Cum uero aliquos a Deo aut traditos desideriis suis, aut obduratos legimus aut relictos, magnis peccatis suis hoc ipsos meruisse profitemur, quo quia talia eorum crimina precesserunt, ut ipsi sibi penam debuerint, qua eis etiam supplicium uerteretur in reatum. Atque ita nec de iudicio Dei querimur, quo deserit meritos deseri, et misericordiae eius gratias agimus, qua liberat non meritos liberari. §. 3. Vires itaque obedientiae non ideo cuiquam subtraxit, quia eum non predestinauit, sed ideo eum non predestinauit, quia recessurum ab ipsa obedientia esse preuidit. §. 4. Predestinatio quoque Dei semper in bono est, que peccatum sola hominis uoluntate conmissum aut remittendum nouit cum laude misericordiae, aut plectendum cum laude iusticiae. In malis autem operibus nostris sola prescientia Dei intelligenda est, quia, sicut presciuit et predestinauit que ipse fecit, et ut faceremus dedit, ita presciuit tantum, non etiam predestinauit, que nec ipse fecit, nec ut faceremus exegit. §. 5. Hi autem, de quibus dicitur: "Ex nobis exierunt, sed non fuerunt ex nobis. Si enim fuissent ex nobis, mansissent utique nobiscum," uoluntate exierunt, uoluntate ceciderunt, et quia presciti sunt casuri, non sunt predestinati; essent autem predestinati, si essent reuersuri, et in sanctitate ac ueritate mansuri. Ac per hoc predestinatio Dei multis est causa standi, nemini est causa labendi. Gratian. Non ergo necessitatem facit correctionis uel obdurationis diuina predestinatio seu prescientia, cum boni per gratiam corrigantur, et libero arbitrio mali pereant. Neque enim, quia predestinatio seu prescientia Dei non falli potest, necessario eueniunt que predestinantur uel presciuntur, sicut nec necessario predestinantur uel presciuntur que futura sunt: sed quia bona absque eius gratia, mala preter eius scientiam euenire non possunt. §. 1. Quamuis ergo conuenienter dicatur, si hec predestinata sunt uel prescita, necessario euenient: non tamen ideo absolute uerum est, necessario euenient que predestinata sunt uel prescita; quia hic necessitas refertur ad rerum euentum, ibi ad intuitum diuinae prescientiae. Unde Augustinus: "Duae sunt," inquit, "necessitates, simplex una, ueluti, necesse est omnes homines esse mortales: altera conditionis, ut, si aliquem ambulare quis scit, eum ambulare necesse est. Quod enim quisque nouit, id esse aliter, ac notum est, nequit. Sed hec minime secum illam simplicem trahit. Hanc enim necessitatem non propria facit natura, sed condicionis adiectio. Nulla enim necessitas cogit incedere gradientem uoluntate, quamuis eum tunc, cum gradiatur, incedere necessarium sit. Eodem igitur modo, si quid prouidentia presens uidet, id necesse est esse, tametsi nullam naturae habeat necessitatem. At quidem ea futura, que ex libertate arbitrii proueniunt, prescientia contuetur. Hec igitur, ad intuitum relata diuinum, necessaria fiunt per dispositionem diuinae nocionis. Per se uero considerata absolutam naturae suae libertatem non deserunt. Fient igitur proculdubio cuncta, que futura Deus esse prenoscit; sed eorum quedam de libero proficiscuntur arbitrio, que, quamuis eueniant, existendo tamen naturam propriam non amittunt, qua prius, quam fierent, etiam non euenire potuissent." §. 2. His omnibus mala nostra libero asscribuntur arbitrio, cum alibi diuinae asscribantur indignationi. Unde Gregorius: "Cum superna indignatio sese, ut ita dixerim, medullitus mouet, hanc opinio humana non remouet, nec se cuiuslibet utiliter deprecatio obicit, cum semel Deus aliquid ab intimis irascendo disponit. Hinc est enim, quod Moyses, qui reatum totius plebis apud Dominum suis precibus tersit, dumque se obicem obtulit, diuinae iracundiae uim placauit, ad petram Oreb ueniens, et pro aquae exhibitione diffidens, repromissionis terram ingredi Domino irascente non potuit." §. 3. Item Augustinus: "De Tyriis uero et Sydoniis quid aliud possumus dicere, quam non datum esse eis ut crederent, quos crediturus fuisse ipsa ueritas docet, si talia qualia apud non credentes facta sunt, uirtutum signa uidissent? Quare autem hoc negatum eis fuerit, dicant, si possunt, qui calumpniantur, et ostendant, cur apud eos Dominus mirabilia, quibus profutura non erant, fecerit, et apud eos, quibus erant profutura, non fecerit. Nos etenim, si ratione facti profunditatem iudicii eius penetrare non possumus, manifestissime tamen scimus, et uerum esse quod dixit, et iustum esse quod fecit, et non solum Tyrios et Sydonios, sed etiam Corozaim et Bethsaida potuisse conuerti, et fideles ex infidelibus fieri, si hoc in eis Dominus uoluisset operari. Neque enim ulli falsum uideri potest, quod ueritas ait: 'Nemo potest uenire ad me, nisi fuerit ei datum a patre meo.' Item qui per Prophetam plebi Iudaicae promisit: 'Ecce, ego sepiam uias tuas spinis, et muniam eas lapidibus quadris,' id est adimam tibi facultatem peccandi. Idem per Psalmistam de dampnandis dixerat: 'Fiant uiae eorum tenebrae et lubricum, et angelus Domini persequens eos.' Sed in his omnibus uicia nostra humanae asscribuntur mentis arbitrio, quod diuina clementia in electis misericorditer uertit ad bonum, in dampnandis iuste relinquit ad malum. Sicut ergo, quamuis certissime sciamus, neminem ultra terminum a Deo sibi prefixum esse uicturum, omnibus tamen languentibus non incongrue medemur: sic, quamuis nemo saluetur, nisi predestinatus ad uitam, omni tamen delinquenti est adhibenda correctio. nec malorum est negligenda disciplina." Unde idem Augustinus Bonifatio:

C. XXIV. Vengeance is not always to be exercised upon those who sin.

Piety itself, truth, and charity do not permit us to accept against Caecilian the testimony of those men whom we do not see in the church to which the Lord furnishes testimony. For those whom divine testimonies do not accompany have lost the weight of human testimony. Likewise: § 1. A physician is troublesome to a raging madman, and a father to an undisciplined son—the former by binding, the latter by beating, but both by loving. But if they neglect them and permit them to perish, that false gentleness is rather cruelty. Likewise: § 2. Therefore, if by the power that the church received by divine gift for the sake of religion and faith at the time when it ought, those who are found in the ways and hedges—that is, in heresies and schisms—are compelled to enter, let them not blame the fact that they are compelled, but attend to that to which they are compelled. The Lord's banquet is the unity of Christ's body, not only in the sacrament of the altar but also in the bond of peace. In the same: § 3. Emperor Theodosius promulgated a general law against all heretics that any bishop or cleric of theirs who was found anywhere should be fined ten pounds of gold. Likewise: § 4. If two persons were living together in one house that we knew most certainly would collapse, and, when we forewarned them of it, they refused to believe and persisted in remaining in it, if we could drag them out from there even against their will—we who had shown them beforehand that imminent collapse—so that they would not dare to return thereafter beneath its danger, I think that, unless we did so, we would not undeservedly be judged cruel. Furthermore, if one of them said to us, "When you enter to drag us out, I will immediately kill myself," but the other neither wished to depart from there nor to be dragged out, yet would not dare to kill himself, what would we choose: to leave both to be crushed by the collapse, or, when at least one had been freed by our labor, that the other should perish not by our fault but rather his own? No one is so unfortunate that he would not most easily judge what ought to be done in such matters. Likewise after a few words: § 5. But if there were very many in the house about to collapse, and at least one could be freed from it, and while I attempted to do this the others killed themselves by throwing themselves headlong, we would be consoled concerning the salvation of at least one, though grieving concerning the others. Nevertheless, lest the others destroy themselves, we would not permit all to perish with no one freed. What, therefore, is to be judged concerning a work of mercy that we ought to expend upon men for obtaining eternal life and avoiding eternal punishment, if true and benevolent reason compels us thus to assist men for freeing not only this temporal life but even a brief one of little duration? Likewise: § 6. If, say the Donatists, it is fitting that we repent of having been outside the church and against the church so that we can be saved, how after this penance do we remain clerics or even bishops among you? This would not happen—since in truth, as must be confessed, it ought not to happen—unless a few were healed by this compensation. But let those say this to themselves and grieve much more and humbly who lie in so great a death of severance, so that they may revive by this certain wound of the Catholic mother. For when a severed branch is grafted, another wound is made in the tree by which it can be received, so that what was perishing without the life of the root may live. But when the branch received shall have grown together with the tree receiving it, both vigor and fruit follow; but if it shall not grow together, the branch indeed will wither, but the life of the tree will remain. For there is also such a kind of grafting that, with no branch that is within cut off, the branch that is outside is grafted; nevertheless, not without a wound, though the slightest, to the tree. Thus, therefore, when these persons come to the Catholic root and, after they have scarcely repented of their error, the honor of the clerical or episcopal office is not taken away from them, something is indeed done as though in the bark of the mother tree contrary to the integrity of severity. Nevertheless, because neither he who plants nor he who waters is anything, with prayers poured out to God's mercy and peace growing together among its branches, charity has covered a multitude of sins. And a little later: § 7. But in causes of this kind, where through grave rents of dissensions the danger is not that of this or that man, but the slaughter of peoples lies before us, something must be taken away from severity so that sincere charity may assist in healing greater evils. Therefore, let them have bitter grief concerning their detestable former error, as Peter had concerning the fear that produced his lie, and let them come to the true church of Christ—that is, the Catholic mother. Let them be clerics in it; let them usefully be bishops who were hostilely against it. We do not envy this; rather, we embrace, exhort, and desire it. And those whom we find in the ways or hedges we compel to enter, and yet we still do not persuade some that we seek not their property but themselves?

> Ipsa pietas, ueritas, karitas, nos non permittit contra Cecilianum eorum hominum accipere testimonium, quos in ecclesia non uidemus, cui Dominus perhibet testimonium. Quos enim diuina testimonia non secuntur, pondus humani testimonii perdiderunt. Item: §. 1. Molestus est medicus furenti frenetico, et pater indisciplinato filio: ille ligando, ille cedendo, sed ambo diligendo. Si autem illos negligant, et perire permittant, ista pocius falsa mansuetudo est crudelitas. Item: §. 2. Quapropter si potestate, quam propter religionem ac fidem, tempore quo debuit, diuino munere accepit ecclesia, hii, qui inueniuntur in uiis et sepibus, id est in heresibus et scismatibus coguntur intrare, non quia coguntur reprehendant, sed quo coguntur adtendant. Conuiuium Domini est unitas corporis Christi non solum in sacramento altaris, sed etiam in uinculo pacis. In eodem: §. 3. Theodosius inperator legem generaliter in omnes hereticos promulgauit, ut quisquis eorum episcopus uel clericus ubilibet esset inuentus, decem libris auri mulctaretur. Item: §. 4. Si duo aliqui in una domo simul habitarent, quam certissime sciremus ruituram, nobisque id prenunciantibus nollent credere, atque in ea manere persisterent, si eos inde possemus eruere uel inuitos, quibus inminentem illam ruinam predemonstrauimus, ut ulterius redire sub eius periculum non auderent, puto, nisi faceremus, non inmerito crudeles iudicaremur. Porro, si illorum unus nobis diceret, quando intraueritis eruere nos, me ipsum continuo trucidabo; alter autem nec exire quidem inde, nec erui uellet, sed neque necare se auderet; quid eligeremus, utrum ambos ruinae obprimendos relinquere, an, uno saltim per nostram operam liberato, alterum non nostra culpa, sed sua pocius interire? Nemo est tam infelix, qui non quid fieri in talibus rebus oporteat facillime iudicet. Item post pauca: §. 5. Quod si plurimi essent in domo ruitura, et inde saltim unus liberari posset, atque, id cum facere conarer, alii semetipsos precipitio necarent, dolorem de ceteris, uerum de unius saltim salute consolaremur; non tamen, ne se ipsos alii perderent, perire uniuersos nullo liberato permitteremus. Quid igitur de opere misericordiae, quod pro uita eterna adipiscenda et pena eterna uitanda hominibus deberemus inpendere, iudicandum est, si pro salute ista non solum temporali, sed etiam breui et ad tempus exiguum liberanda sic nos subuenire hominibus ratio uera et benigna conpellit? Item: §. 6. Si (inquiunt Donatistae) oportet, ut nos extra ecclesiam et aduersus ecclesiam fuisse peniteat, ut salui esse possimus, quomodo post istam penitenciam apud uos clerici uel etiam episcopi permanemus? Hoc non fieret, quoniam reuera (quod fatendum est) fieri non deberet, nisi pauci ipsa conpensatione sanarentur. Sed sibi hoc dicant, et multo maxime doleant humiliter, qui in tanta morte precisionis iacent, ut isto quodam uulnere matris catholicae reuiuiscant. Cum enim precisus ramus inseritur, fit aliud uulnus in arbore, quo possit recipi, ut uiuat, qui sine uita radicis peribat; sed cum receptus recipienti coaluerit, et uigor consequitur et fructus; si autem non coaluerit, ille quidem arescet, sed uita arboris permanebit. Est enim et tale inserendi genus, ut nullo preciso ramo, qui intus est, ille, qui foris est, inseratur; non tamen nullo, sed uel leuissimo uulnere arboris. Ita ergo et isti, cum ad radicem catholicam ueniunt, nec eis, postquam uix erroris sui penitet honor clericatus aut episcopatus aufertur, si quidem fit aliquid tamquam in cortice arboris matris contra integritatem seueritatis; uerumtamen, quia neque qui plantat est aliquid, neque qui rigat, ad Dei misericordiam precibus fusis, coalescente pace ramorum suorum, karitas cooperuit multitudinem peccatorum. Et paulo post: §. 7. Verum in huiusmodi causis, ubi per graues dissensionum scissuras non huius aut illius hominis est periculum, sed populorum strages iacent, detrahendum est aliquid seueritati, ut maioribus malis sanandis sincera karitas subueniat. Habeant ergo de preterito detestabili errore, sicut Petrus habuit de mendacii timore, amarum dolorem, et ueniant ad ecclesiam Christi ueram, id est catholicam matrem: sint in illa clerici, sint episcopi utiliter, qui contra eam fuerunt hostiliter. Non inuidemus, imo amplectimur, hortamur, optamus, et quos in uiis aut sepibus inuenimus, intrare cogimus, et sic nondum quibusdam persuademus, quia non res eorum, sed ipsos querimus?

C. XXV. The evil are compelled to good by medicinal severity.

The same to Faustus, [letter 167]. What will the medicine of the church do, seeking the salvation of all with maternal charity, as though laboring amid the frenzied and the lethargic? Ought it or can it either contemn them or desist? If necessary, let it be troublesome to both, since it is the enemy of neither. For the frenzied are unwilling to be bound, and the lethargic are unwilling to be awakened, but the diligence of charity persists in binding the frenzied, stimulating the lethargic, and loving both. Both are offended, but both are loved. Both are indignant at being troubled so long as they are sick, but both rejoice when healed. In the same: § 1. They do not begin to be Catholics unless they cease to be heretics. For neither are their sacraments, which are common to us in them, hostile to us, because they are not human but divine. Their own error, which they entered badly, is to be taken away, not the sacraments that they received in the same manner, which they bear and have to their own punishment—the more unworthily they have them, but nevertheless they have them. PART IV. GRATIAN. Behold, crimes are to be punished when they can be struck while preserving the peace of the church; nevertheless, discretion is to be applied in this. For sometimes the multitude of offenders is to be awaited for a long time through patience unto penance; sometimes it is to be punished in a few, so that by their example the others may be terrified and provoked to penance. Hence, when the disciples wished to consume the Samaritans with heavenly fire, they were prohibited, and the Samaritans were awaited unto penance so that, when Christ preached, they might be converted to the faith. Hence Ambrose says, [Book VII of the commentary on Luke 9:54]:

> Idem Fausto. [epist. CLXVII.] Quid faciet ecclesiae medicina, salutem omnium materna karitate conquirens, tamquam inter freneticos et lethargicos estuans? Numquid contempnere, numquid desistere uel debet, uel potest? Utrisque si necesse est sit molesta, que neutris est inimica. Nam et frenetici nolunt ligari, et lethargici nolunt excitari, sed perseuerat diligentia karitatis freneticum ligare, lethargicum stimulare, ambos amare. Ambo offenduntur, sed ambo diliguntur. Ambo molestari, quamdiu egri sunt, indignantur, sed ambo sanati gratulantur. In eodem: §. 1. Catholici esse non incipiunt, nisi heretici destiterint esse. Neque enim sacramenta eorum inimica sunt nobis, que in illis nobis communia sunt, quia non humana sunt, sed diuina. Proprius error eorum est auferendus, quem male inierunt, non sacramenta, que similiter acceperunt, que ad penam suam portant et habent, quanto indignius habent, sed tamen habent. IV. Pars. Gratian. Ecce, quod crimina sunt punienda, quando salua pace ecclesiae feriri possunt; in quo tamen discretio adhibenda est. Aliquando enim delinquentium multitudo diu per patienciam ad penitenciam est expectanda: aliquando in paucis est punienda, ut eorum exemplo ceteri terreantur, et ad penitenciam prouocentur. Hinc, cum discipuli celesti igne Samaritanos uellent consumere, prohibiti sunt, et Samaritani ad penitenciam sunt expectati, ut Christo predicante conuerterentur ad fidem. Unde Ambrosius ait: [lib. VII. commentariorum ad c. 9. Lucae u. 54.]

C. XXVI. Vengeance is not always to be exercised upon those who sin.

That Christ rebuked the disciples because they desired fire to descend upon those who had not received him shows us that vengeance is not always to be taken upon those who sin, because sometimes clemency benefits you more toward patience than it benefits the fallen man toward correction. Finally, the Samaritans from whom fire is here withheld believed more quickly; nor do the disciples, who follow the law, sin. For they knew both that it was reckoned to Phinehas as justice because he had killed the sacrilegious, and that at Elijah's prayers fire had descended from heaven. GRATIAN. Another thing can be understood in this prohibition of the Apostles. The Apostles wished to consume the Samaritans with fire not from zeal for justice but from the hatred of bitterness, to avenge the injury of their own expulsion. But the Lord, wishing them to tolerate with patience and joy an injury to their own person, but not to leave unavenged an injury to divine service, said, "You do not know of what spirit you are." Hence also Peter, who had heard with the others, "You will be blessed when men curse you and say every evil against you; rejoice on that day and exult, because your reward is abundant in heaven," received with joy insults inflicted upon himself; but he punished most sharply sins that were committed against God. Hence he struck Ananias and Sapphira, who lied to the Holy Spirit, with the sentence of death. Thus also Paul, while recalling the Corinthians from contempt of himself by pious admonition and manifold commendation of himself, struck with blindness that magician Elymas, who was drawing those about to believe away from the faith, so that the others, terrified, would not impede his preaching, but, believing in Christ, would escape blindness of the soul. And he delivered to Satan for affliction that Corinthian fornicator because he had sinned against God. Hence Gregory also writes to Bishop Januarius, rebuking him because he had excommunicated someone on account of an injury to his own person, saying, [Book II, indiction 10, letter 34]:

> C. XXVI. Non semper est in eos, qui peccant, uindicta exercenda.
> Quod Christus discipulos increpauit, quia ignem descendere super eos gestiebant, qui ipsum non receperant, ostenditur nobis, non semper in eos, qui peccant, uindicandum, quia nonnumquam amplius prodest clementia, tibi ad pacientiam, quam lapso ad correctionem. Denique Samaritani citius crediderunt, a quibus hoc loco ignis arcetur; nec discipuli peccant, qui legem secuntur. Sciebant enim et Finees reputatum ad iusticiam, quod sacrilegos interemerat, et ad preces Helyae ignem descendisse de celo. Gratian. Potest in hac prohibitione Apostolorum aliud intelligi. Apostoli non zelo iusticiae, sed amaritudinis odio ob iniuriam suae expulsionis uindicandam Samaritanos igne uoluerunt consumere; Dominus autem uolens eos iniuriam propriae personae cum patiencia et gaudio tollerare, iniuriam uero seruitutis diuinae non inultam relinquere, ait: "Nescitis, cuius spiritus estis?" Hinc etiam Petrus, qui, cum aliis audierat: "Beati eritis, cum maledixerint uobis homines, et dixerint omne malum aduersum uos; gaudete in illa die, et exultate, quoniam merces uestra copiosa est in celis," contumelias sibi illatas cum gaudio suscipiebat; peccata uero, que in Deum conmittebantur, acerrime puniebat. Unde Ananiam et Saphiram Spiritui sancto mentientes mortis sentencia perculit. Sic etiam Paulus, dum a suo contemptu pia ammonitione et multimoda conmendatione sui Chorinthios reuocaret, magum illum Elymam qui credituros a fide retrahebat, cecitate percussit, ut ceteri perterriti predicationem eius non inpedirent, sed in Christum credentes animae cecitatem effugerent. Et Chorinthium illum fornicatorem, quia in Deum peccauerat, sathanae ad uexandum tradidit. Hinc etiam Gregorius scribit Ianuario Episcopo, reprehendens eum, quod ob iniuriam propriae personae quendam excommunicauerat, dicens: [l. II. Indict. 10. epist. 34.]

C. XXVII. A bishop is not permitted to excommunicate anyone for a personal injury.

Amid his many complaints, Isidore, a most illustrious man, complained that he had been excommunicated and anathematized by your fraternity without cause. When we wished to learn from your cleric, who was present, for what reason this had been done, it became known that it had been done for no other cause except that he had wronged you. This matter greatly afflicted us, because, if it is so, you show that you think nothing of heavenly things, but signify that your conduct is earthly, since for vengeance of a personal injury—which is prohibited by the sacred rules—you inflicted the curse of anathema. Henceforth, therefore, be altogether circumspect and solicitous, and do not again presume to inflict such things upon anyone in defense against an injury to you. For if you do any such thing, know that afterward it must be avenged upon you. GRATIAN. Hence the same in the Homilies, showing that sins committed against God or against a neighbor are to be punished by us, but those by which an offense is committed against us are patiently to be tolerated, or rather overlooked, says:

C. XXVII. Pro iniuria propria episcopo aliquem excommunicare non licet.

Inter querelas multiplices Ysidorus uir clarissimus a fraternitate tua frustra se excommunicatum anathematizatumque conquestus est. Quod quam ob rem factum fuerit, dum a clerico tuo, qui presens erat, uoluissemus addiscere, pro nulla alia causa, nisi pro eo, quod te iniuriauerat, factum innotuit. Que res nos uehementer afflixit, quia, si ita est, nichil te cogitare de celestibus ostendis, sed terrenam te habere conuersationem significas, dum pro uindicta propriae iniuriae (quod sacris regulis prohibetur) maledictionem anathematis inuexisti. Unde de cetero omnino esto circumspectus atque sollicitus, et talia cuiquam pro defensione tuae iniuriae inferre denuo non presumas. Nam si tale aliquid feceris, in te scias postea esse uindicandum. Gratian. Hinc idem in omeliis, ostendens, quod peccata, que in Deum uel in proximum conmittuntur, a nobis punienda sunt, ea uero, quibus in nos delinquitur, patienter tolleranda, uel potius dissimulanda sunt ait:

C. XXVIII. He greatly offends who lets debts owed to the Lord go unpunished.

If he who is prelate lets the faults of one indebted to the Lord go unpunished, he assuredly offends in no slight degree, since by his own presumption he releases the debts of the heavenly King and Lord. For those things that are committed against us we can easily forgive; but those that are committed against God we can remit with great discretion, yet not without penance. PART V. GRATIAN. But once a fault has been forgiven, it ought not to be recalled to mind again through recurring grief. Hence Gelasius to Bishops Gerontius, John, Germanus, and Peter:

C. XXVIII. Valde offendit qui dominica debita inpune dimittit.

Si is, qui prelatus est, debitori dominico culpas inpune dimittit, non mediocriter profecto offendit, qui debita celestis regis et Domini sua presumptione resoluit. Ea namque, que in nobis conmittuntur, facile possumus dimittere; ea uero, que in Deum conmissa sunt, cum magna discretione, nec tamen sine penitencia possumus relaxare. V. Pars. Gratian. Semel uero culpa remissa recidiuo dolore iterum ad animum reuocari non debet. Unde Gelasius Gerontio, Iohanni, Germano et Petro Episcopis:

C. XXIX. An injury that has once been forgiven ought not to be recalled again.

If, in the place where these things were done, it shall be established in the presence of both parties both that Stephen made satisfaction and that, his supplication having been received, the person who was badly treated forgave him, a punishment once sent into oblivion ought not to be repeated through recurring grief, in imitation, namely, of divine clemency, which does not permit forgiven sins to return for vengeance. But if nothing shall be proved either concerning satisfaction or concerning remission, let what was transacted be shown by a declaration of your charity, so that, if even now an appropriate satisfaction can be obtained, that may preferably be carried out whereby it can heal the mind of the afflicted man; or, if unforgiving bitterness persists, let punishment nonetheless be taken in that same place where the punishable presumption arose.

PART VI. GRATIAN. But that statement of Ambrose is raised as an objection: "At Elijah's prayers fire descended from heaven so that the Prophet's injury might be avenged." This is understood to have happened at the time when Ahab, king of Israel, after that barrenness of three years and six months which occurred when at Elijah's prayers heaven was closed for three years and six months, sent two captains of fifty to Elijah, who were to say to him, "Man of God, the king of Israel calls you"; he said, "If I am a man of God, let fire descend from heaven and consume you"; and immediately fire descended from heaven and consumed them. By this deed he wished to show not what merit he had before God, but by most evident signs to make manifest that the true God was the one whom he worshiped, not the one to whose worship Jezebel provoked certain persons by the prostitution of her own body. Therefore the Prophet's injury is understood as nothing other than the injury of the Lord himself, which is to be avenged upon a few so that the others may be terrified. Likewise that statement of Silverius is raised as an objection: [to Bishop Amator]

> Si illic, ubi hec acta sunt, presentibus utrisque constiterit, et satisfecisse Stephanum, et supplicatione suscepta eum, qui male tractatus est, ignouisse, semel in abolitione missa punitio recidiuo dolore non debet iterari, diuinae scilicet imitatione clementiae, que dimissa peccata in ulcionem redire non patitur. Sin uero nichil uel de satisfactione probabitur, uel de remissione transactum dilectionis uestrae sermone monstretur, quatinus, siue nunc saltim poterit conpetens satisfactio prouenire, illud pocius exerceatur, ubi animum sanare possit afflicti, siue irremissibilis prestat acerbitas, ibidem nichilominus uindicetur, ubi plectibilis est orta presumptio.
> VI. Pars. Gratian. Sed obicitur illud Ambrosii: "Ad preces Helyae ignis descendit de celo, ut Prophetae uindicaretur iniuria." Quod tunc intelligitur factum, quando Achab rex Israel post sterilitatem illam trium annorum et sex mensium, que facta est, quando precibus Helyae celum clausum est annis tribus et mensibus sex, misit duos quinquagenarios ad Helyam, qui dicerent ei: "Homo Dei, rex Israel uocat te, qui ait: Si homo Dei sum, descendat ignis de celo, et consumat uos, et statim ignis de celo descendit, et consumpsit eos." Quo facto non cuius meriti apud Deum esset uoluit ostendere, sed quod ille esset uerus Deus, quem colebat, non ille, ad cuius culturam stupro corporis proprii Iezabel nonnullos prouocabat, euidentissimis indiciis monstrare curauit. Iniuria ergo Prophetae non alia, quam iniuria ipsius Domini intelligitur, que in paucis uindicanda est, ut ceteri terreantur. Item obicitur illud Siluerii: [ad Amatorem Episcopum]

C. XXX.

Guilisarius our patrician commanded me to come peacefully to him in the prince's palace concerning certain ecclesiastical arrangements; and at the first and second veil he detained all the clergy and people who were coming with me, and permitted no one to enter except me alone and Vigilius our deacon. But after I had been detained by force and led before the aforesaid patrician woman, they sent me into exile, in which I am now sustained by the bread of tribulation and the water of anguish. Nevertheless, I did not, nor do I, abandon my office on that account; rather, with the bishops whom I was able to assemble, I anathematized those who did such things toward me, and together with them I established by apostolic authority that no one should ever be deceived in such a way, as I was deceived, and that if anyone thereafter should ever deceive any of the bishops in such a way, he should become anathema maranatha in the sight of God and the holy angels. The same to Vigilius: § 1. Therefore, have with those who consent to you a sentence of complete condemnation, and recognize that the name and function of the priestly ministry have been taken from you, condemned by the judgment of the Holy Spirit and by apostolic authority from us. GRATIAN. But here also he avenged not his own injury but that of the church. Moses taught by example that the sin of the people is to be punished in a few, for he avenged the sin of idolatry upon a few worshipers of the calf, expiating the sins of many by the death of a few, causing fear in the present and sanctioning discipline for the future. Thus also Christ himself punished the sins of the whole people by the death of a few, when in one day twenty-three thousand perished for the fornication of the whole people. Thus also for the sin of murmuring or temptation certain persons were punished, so that by their example the others might be compelled to penance. Thus also God daily punishes certain persons, so that divine providence may be known to keep watch even over human affairs; and he also awaits certain persons for penance through long periods, so that he may show us the patience of his kindness. Thus Elijah also avenged the worship of Baal by killing its priests and prophets, expiating by the death of its authors the sins of the peoples who imitated them. § 1. But that sins which lack public proofs are not to be punished is proved by that example in which Christ, who alone knew Judas to be a thief, is asserted not to have cast him away, but to have tolerated him patiently.

Hence Ambrose says upon the First Epistle to the Corinthians, [c. 5]:

C. XXX.

Guilisarius patricius noster mandauit me ad se uenire pacifice pro quibusdam ecclesiasticis dispositionibus in palacium principis, et ad primum et ad secundum uelum retinuit omnem clerum et populum, qui mecum ueniebat, et nullum permisit introire, nisi me solum, et Vigilium diaconem nostrum. Me uero ui retento, et ante predictam patriciam deducto, miserunt in exilium, in quo modo sustentor pane tribulationis et aqua angustiae. Ego tamen non dimisi, nec dimitto propterea offitium meum, sed cum episcopis, quos congregare potui, eos, qui talia erga me egerunt, anathematizaui, et una cum illis apostolica auctoritate statui, nullum umquam taliter decipiendum, sicut deceptus sum, et, si aliquis deinceps ullum umquam episcoporum taliter deceperit anathema maranatha fieret in conspectu Dei et sanctorum angelorum. Idem Vigilio: §. 1. Habeto itaque cum his, qui tibi consentiunt, plenae dampnationis sententiam, sublatumque tibi nomen et munus ministerii sacerdotalis agnosce, sancti Spiritus iudicio et apostolica a nobis auctoritate dampnatus. Gratian. Sed et hic non suam, sed ecclesiae iniuriam ultus est. Quod autem peccatum populi in paucis puniendum sit, Moyses exemplo docuit, qui peccatum ydolatriae in paucos cultores uituli uindicauit, morte paucorum expians peccata multorum, in presens terrens, in posterum disciplinam sanctiens. Sic et ipse Christus peccata totius populi morte paucorum puniuit, dum pro fornicatione totius populi una die XXIII. milia perierunt. Sic et pro peccato murmurationis uel temptationis nonnulli puniti sunt, ut eorum exemplo ceteri ad penitenciam cogerentur. Sic et cottidie nonnullos punit Deus, ut diuina prouidentia etiam circa humana uigilare cognoscatur, et nonnullos etiam per longa tempora ad penitenciam expectat, ut patienciam suae benignitatis nobis ostendat. Sic Helyas etiam culturam Baal uindicauit, sacerdotes et prophetas eius interficiendo, morte auctorum expians peccata imitantium populorum. §. 1. Quod uero peccata, que publicis indiciis deseruntur, punienda non sint, illo exemplo probatur, quo Christus, qui Iudam solus furem nouerat, non abiecisse, sed patienter tollerasse asseritur.

Unde Ambrosius super primam epistolam ad Chorinthios [cap. S.] ait:

C. XXXI. It is not for a judge to condemn without an accuser.

If anyone does not have the power to cast away one whom he knows to be guilty, or is unable to prove it, he is free from blame; and it is not for a judge to condemn without an accuser, just as Christ did not cast away Judas. GRATIAN. Similarly, a sentence is not to be issued when a multitude is involved in the case, or when the one who sins has a multitude as his associate. Hence Augustine in Book II, [c. 2], Against Parmenian:

> C. XXXI. Iudicis non est sine accusatore dampnare.
> Si quis potestatem non habet quem scit reum abicere, uel probare non ualet, inmunis est, et iudicis non est sine accusatore dampnare, sicut Christus non abiecit Iudam. Gratian. Similiter non est ferenda sentencia, quando multitudo est in causa, uel quando ille peccat, qui sociam habet multitudinem. Unde Augustinus in libro II. [c. 2.] contra Parmenianum:

C. XXXII. What is sinned by a multitude, or by one who has a multitude as an associate, is not punished by the church, but mourned.

Correction by many cannot be salutary unless the person who has no multitude as an associate is reproved. But when the same disease shall have seized very many, nothing else remains for the good except grief and groaning, so that through that sign which is revealed to holy Ezekiel they may merit to escape unharmed from their devastation. And below: § 1. Truly, when the contagion of sinning has invaded a multitude, the severe mercy of divine discipline is necessary. For counsels of separation are both empty and pernicious and sacrilegious, because they are impious and proud, and they disturb the weak good more than they correct the spirited evil. And below: § 2. But when there is opportunity among the peoples to bring forth a discourse, the crowd of the wicked is to be struck with a general rebuke, especially if some scourge from the Lord above shall have furnished the occasion and opportunity, by which it appears that they are being beaten for their deserts. GRATIAN. But the evangelical precepts concerning love of enemies and mercy to be expended upon neighbors, and also the Apostle's exhortations concerning feeding or giving drink to enemies, are not to be understood to such an extent that impunity for sinning is granted, but so that correction may be provided to the offender and assistance to his nature, until, through the sentence of a judge, once hope of correction has been taken away, the practice of evils is removed. In this, therefore, we are commanded to love our enemies and to have mercy on them: that we grieve over their perdition, desire their salvation, and daily labor and pray for their correction; that we expend consolations upon the penitent, bearing one another's burdens; not that we grant impunity to those who are obstinate and persist in evil. For just as we are admonished to be not severe but merciful toward the penitent, according to this: "Do not be excessively just, because there is a just man who perishes in his justice"; and again: "Judgment without mercy to him who has not shown mercy"; and likewise that statement of the Apostle in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians: "To whom you have forgiven anything, I also. For I too, if I forgave anything, forgave it for your sake, as if Christ himself were forgiving, so that we may not be circumvented by Satan. For we are not ignorant of his thoughts"—who makes those whom he cannot deceive by inducing consent excessively harsh—just as, I say, we are commanded to be merciful to the penitent, so we are prohibited from expending mercy upon the impenitent and those obstinate in evil.

Hence Ambrose in the book On Duties:

> C. XXXII. Quod a multitudine peccatur, uel ab eo, qui multitudinem habet sociam, ab ecclesia non punitur, sed defletur.
> Non potest esse salubris a multis correctio, nisi cum ille corripitur, qui non habet sociam multitudinem. Cum uero idem morbus plurimos occupauerit, nichil aliud restat bonis, quam dolor et gemitus, ut per illud signum, quod Ezechieli sancto reuelatur, illesi euadere ab illorum uastatione mereantur. Et infra: §.

1. Reuera cum contagio peccandi multitudinem inuaserit, diuinae disciplinae seuera misericordia necessaria est. Nam consilia separationis et inania sunt, et perniciosa atque sacrilega, quia inpia et superba sunt, et plus perturbant infirmos bonos, quam corrigant animosos malos. Et infra: §. 2. Turba autem iniquorum, cum facultas est in populis promendi sermonem, generali obiurgatione ferienda est, et maxime, si occasionem atque oportunitatem prebuerit aliquod flagellum desuper Domini, quo eos appareat pro suis meritis uapulare. Gratian. Precepta uero euangelica de dilectione inimicorum, et misericordia inpendenda proximis, exhortationes quoque Apostoli de cibandis uel potandis inimicis, non eatenus intelligenda sunt, ut peccandi relaxetur inpunitas, sed ut delinquenti correctio et naturae ministretur subsidium, donec per sententiam iudicis, adempta spe correctionis, malorum tollatur exercitium. In hoc ergo iubemur diligere inimicos, et misereri eorum, ut de eorum perditione doleamus, eorum salutem desideremus, et pro illorum correctione cottidie laboremus et oremus, penitentibus solacia inpendamus, alter alterius onera portantes; ut non pertinaces et in malo persistentes inpunitate donemus. Sicut enim erga penitentes non seueri, sed misericordes esse monemur, iuxta illud: "Noli esse nimis iustus, quia est iustus qui perit in iusticia sua," et iterum: "Iudicium sine misericordia ei, qui non fecit misericordiam;" et item illud Apostoli in secunda epistola ad Chorinthios: "Cui aliquid donastis, et ego. Nam et ego si quid donaui, propter uos donaui, ac si ipse Christus donaret, ut non circumueniamur a sathana, Non enim ignoramus cogitationes eius," qui quos nequit consentiendo decipere facit nimis asperos, sicut, inquam, penitentibus, ut dictum est, misericordes esse iubemur, sic inpenitentibus et obstinatis in malo inpendere prohibemur misericordiam.

Unde Ambrosius in libro de offitiis:

C. XXXIII. On just and unjust mercy.

There is an unjust mercy. Indeed, in the law it is written concerning a certain man, “You shall not have mercy upon him”; and in the books of Kings it is read that Saul incurred offense because he had mercy upon Agag, king of the enemies, whom the divine sentence had forbidden to be preserved. Thus, if anyone, moved by the entreaties of a robber’s children and swayed by the tears of his wife, thinks that a man whose inclination still aspires to robbery should be absolved, does he not hand over the innocent to destruction, he who frees one contemplating the destruction of many? Certainly, if he restrains the sword, dissolves the bonds, and relaxes the exile, why does he not take away the opportunity for robbery by the more merciful way available to him, since he could not wrest away the will? Then, between two persons—that is, an accuser and a defendant—contending at equal peril concerning their life, the former if he had not proved his case, the latter if he had been convicted by the accuser: if the judge does not carry out what belongs to justice but has mercy upon one of them, he will either condemn the one proving his case, or, while he favors the accuser in what he cannot prove, he will sentence the innocent; therefore, this cannot be called just mercy. In the church itself, where one especially ought to have mercy, the form of justice ought especially to be maintained, lest anyone, removed from participation on account of an accusation, extort from the indulgence of the priest—by a brief little tear prepared for the occasion, or even by more abundant weeping—the communion that he ought to seek for very many periods of time. When he grants indulgence to one unworthy man, does he not provoke all to the contagion of falling? For facility of pardon furnishes an incentive to offending.

C. XXXIII. De iusta et iniusta misericordia.

Est iniusta misericordia. Denique in lege scriptum est de quodam: "Non misereberis illius, "et in libris Regum legitur, quia Saul contraxit offensam, quia miseratus est Agag hostium regem, quem prohibuerat diuina sentencia seruari. Ita, si quis latronem filiis deprecantibus motus, et lacrimis coniugis eius inflexus absoluendum putat cui adhuc latrocinandi aspiret affectus, nonne innocentes tradet exitio qui liberat multorum exitia cogitantem? Certe si gladium reprimit, uincula dissoluit, laxat exilium? cur latrocinandi qua potest clementiori uia non eripit facultatem, qui uoluntatem extorquere non potuit? Deinde inter duos, hoc est accusatorem et reum, pari periculo de capite decertantes, alterum, si non probasset, alterum, si esset ab accusatore conuictus, si non id, quod iusticiae est, iudex exequatur: sed miseretur alterius, aut dampnabit probantem, aut, dum accusatori fauet, quod probare non possit, addicet innoxium; non potest igitur hec dici iusta misericordia. In ipsa ecclesia, ubi maxime quis misereri debet, teneri quam maxime debet forma iusticiae, ne quis a consortio criminationis abstractus, breui lacrimula atque ad tempus parata, uel etiam uberioribus fletibus communionem, quam plurimis debet postulare temporibus a facilitate sacerdotis extorqueat. Nonne cum uni indulget indigno, ad prolapsionis contagium prouocat uniuersos? Facilitas enim ueniae incentiuum tribuit delinquendi.

C. XXXIV. We ought not to have mercy upon a poor man in an evil case.

Likewise Augustine in the book of Psalms, [Psalm 32]. Lest judgment be lost, do not be merciful to a poor man in an evil case; for if you spare his purse, you strike his heart and render him so much more wicked as he sees that a just man favors him.

C. XXXIV. Non debemus in mala causa pauperi misereri.

Item Augustinus in libro Psalmorum. [Psal. 32.] Ne amisso iudicio sis pauperi in mala causa misericors, cuius si parcis saccello, percutis cor, et tanto nequiorem reddis, quanto iustum fauere uidet sibi.

C. XXXV. Mercy is to be shown to the man; anger is to be directed against the sinner.

The same. When we speak these two names, "man" and "sinner," they are assuredly not spoken without purpose. Because he is a sinner, reprove him; and because he is a man, have mercy upon him. Nor will you free the man at all unless you have persecuted the sinner. All discipline keeps watch over this office, as it is fitting and adapted to each person who governs: not only to a bishop governing his people, but also to a poor man governing his house, a rich man governing his household, a husband governing his wife, a father governing his offspring, a judge governing his province, and a king governing his nation. And a little later: § 1. Thus mercy is to be closed to no man, and impunity granted to no sin. Hence it is to be understood how alms, which by right of humanity is expended upon any poor persons, is not to be contemned, since the Lord relieved the need of the poor even from those money-boxes which he filled from the resources of others. And a little later: § 2. Therefore, let us not receive sinners on account of that by which they are sinners; nevertheless, because they are also men, let us treat those same persons with human consideration. Let us persecute their own iniquity in them; let us have mercy upon the nature common to us. GRATIAN. Likewise Augustine expounds in Book II Against the Manichaeans, [c. 70], that statement of the Gospel which was raised as an objection, "He who shall have used the sword will fall by the sword," saying thus:

C. XXXV. Homini est miserendum, peccatori est irascendum.

Idem. Duo ista nomina cum dicimus, homo peccator, non utique frustra dicuntur. Quia peccator est, corripe: et quia homo, miserere, nec omnino liberabis hominem, nisi eum persecutus fueris peccatorem.

Huic offitio omnis inuigilat disciplina, sicut cuique regenti apta et accommodata est, non solum episcopo regenti plebem suam, sed etiam pauperi regenti domum suam, diuiti regenti familiam suam, marito regenti coniugem suam, patri regenti prolem suam, iudici regenti prouinciam suam, regi regenti gentem suam. Et paulo post: §. 1. Ita nulli homini claudenda est misericordia, nulli peccato inpunitas relaxanda. Hinc itaque intelligendum est, quam non sit contempnenda elemosina, que quibusque pauperibus iure humanitatis inpenditur, quandoquidem Dominus subleuabat indigentiam pauperum etiam his loculis, quos ex opibus inplebat aliorum. Et paulo post: §. 2. Non ergo suscipiamus peccatores, propter quod sunt peccatores, sed tamen eos ipsos, quia et homines sunt, humana consideratione tractemus; persequamur in eis propriam iniquitatem, misereamur communem naturam. Gratian. Item illud euangelii, quod obiciebatur: "Qui gladio usus fuerit gladio cadet," Augustinus exponit in libro 2. contra Manicheos, [cap. 70.] ita dicens:

C. XXXVI. Who is said to take up the sword.

He takes up the sword who arms himself against anyone's blood with no superior and legitimate authority either commanding or permitting it. PART VII. GRATIAN. Furthermore, that statement of Jerome by which the church is denied to persecute anyone is not to be understood in such a way that the church generally persecutes no one, but that it persecutes no one unjustly. For not every persecution is culpable; rather, we reasonably persecute heretics, just as Christ also bodily persecuted those whom he expelled from the temple. Hence Augustine says to Vincentius the Donatist:

C. XXXVI. Qui dicatur gladium accipere.

Ille gladium accipit, qui, nulla superiori ac legitima potestate uel iubente, uel concedente, in sanguinem alicuius armatur. VII. Pars. Gratian. Porro illud Ieronimi, quo ecclesia negatur aliquem persequi, non ita intelligendum est, ut generaliter ecclesia nullum persequatur, sed quod nullum iniuste persequatur. Non enim omnis persecutio culpabilis est, sed rationabiliter hereticos persequimur, sicut et Christus corporaliter persecutus est eos, quos de templo expulit. Unde Augustinus ait Vincentio Donatistae:

C. XXXVII. Through the office of power, the unruly are usefully corrected.

They are exceedingly unruly, and it does not seem useless to me that they should be restrained and corrected through powers ordained by God. For we already rejoice in the correction of many. And after a few words: § 1. For if anyone saw his enemy, made frantic by dangerous fevers, running headlong, would he not then rather return evil for evil if he permitted him to go on in this way than if he bound him so that he might be corrected and cured? And nevertheless, at the time when he had proved most useful and most merciful to him, he would seem most troublesome and hostile to him. But assuredly, when health had been restored, the more fully would he give thanks to him, the more he perceived that he had not spared him. And after a few words: § 2. Yet these things do not benefit certain persons. Is medicine therefore to be neglected because the pestilence of some is incurable? Likewise after some words: § 3. Not everyone who spares is a friend, nor is everyone who beats an enemy. Better are the wounds of a friend than the kisses of an enemy. It is better to love with severity than to deceive with gentleness. It is more useful for bread to be taken from a hungry man if, secure concerning food, he was neglecting justice, than for bread to be broken for a hungry man so that, having been seduced, he may acquiesce in injustice. Likewise after a few words: § 4. Do you think that no one ought to be compelled to justice, when you read that the master of the household said to his servants, "Whomever you shall find, compel them to enter"; when you also read that Saul himself, first Saul and afterward Paul, was compelled to know and hold the truth by the great violence of Christ compelling him? Likewise after a few words: § 5. And you should know that a thief sometimes scatters fodder to lead cattle away, and a shepherd sometimes calls wandering cattle back with a whip. Likewise: § 6. If it were always culpable to carry out persecution, it would not have been written in the sacred books, "He who secretly slandered his neighbor, this man I persecuted." Therefore, sometimes both the one who suffers it is unjust and the one who carries it out is just. But assuredly, often both the evil have persecuted the good and the good the evil: the former by harming through injustice, the latter by consulting their welfare through discipline; the former savagely, the latter temperately; the former serving cupidity, the latter charity. For he who slaughters does not consider how he cuts. The one persecutes health; the other, putrefaction. The impious killed the Prophets; the Prophets also killed the impious. The Jews scourged Christ; Christ also scourged the Jews. The Apostles were handed over by men to human power; the Apostles handed men over to the power of Satan. In all these things, what is considered except who acts for truth, who for iniquity, who for the sake of harming, and who for the sake of correcting? And a little later: § 7. Emperor Constantine established that the property of those convicted and obstinately resisting unity should be claimed for the fisc. And after a few words: § 8. Certainly no one's crime stains one who is ignorant of it. Likewise: § 9. The deeds of those who do harm, which cannot be demonstrated to the innocent or believed by the innocent, do not defile anyone; rather, even when known, they are tolerated for the sake of fellowship with the innocent. For the good are not to be abandoned on account of the evil, but the evil are to be tolerated on account of the good, just as the Prophets tolerated those who said so many things against them, and did not abandon participation in the sacraments of that people.

C. XXXVII. Potestatis offitio utiliter inquieti corriguntur.

Nimium sunt inquieti, quos per ordinatas a Deo potestates cohiberi atque corrigi michi non uidetur inutile. Nam de multorum iam correctione gaudemus. Et post pauca: §. 1. Si enim quisquam inimicum suum periculosis febribus freneticum factum currere in preceps uideret, nonne tunc pocius malum pro malo redderet, si sic eum ire permitteret, quam si corrigendum curandumque ligaret? Et tamen ei tunc molestissimus et aduersissimus uideretur, quando utilissimus et misericordissimus extitisset. Sed plane salute reparata tanto uberius ei gratias ageret, quanto minus sibi pepercisse sensisset. Et post pauca: §. 2. At quibusdam ista non prosunt. Numquid ideo negligenda est medicina, quia nonnullorum est insanabilis pestilentia? Item post aliqua: §. 3. Non omnis, qui parcit, amicus est, nec omnis, qui uerberat, inimicus. Meliora sunt uulnera amici, quam oscula inimici. Melius est cum seueritate diligere, quam cum lenitate decipere. Utilius esurienti panis tollitur, si de cibo securus iusticiam negligebat, quam esurienti panis frangitur, ut iniusticiae seductus adquiescat. Item post pauca: §. 4. Putas, neminem debere cogi ad iusticiam, cum legas patremfamilias dixisse seruis: "Quoscumque inueneritis cogite intrare;" cum legas etiam ipsum primo Saulum, postea Paulum, ad ueritatem cognoscendam et tenendam magna uiolentia Christi cogentis conpulsum esse. Item post pauca: §. 5. Et noueritis furem aliquando auertendis pecoribus pabulum spargere, et aliquando pastorem flagello errantia pecora reuocare. Item: §. 6. Si semper esset culpabile persecutionem facere, non scriptum esset in libris sanctis: "Detrahentem proximo suo occulte, hunc persequebar." Aliquando ergo et qui eam patitur iniustus est, et qui eam facit iustus est. Sed plane sepe et mali persecuti sunt bonos, et boni malos; illi nocendo per iniusticiam, illi consulendo per disciplinam; illi inmaniter, illi temperanter; illi seruientes cupiditati illi karitati. Nam qui trucidat non considerat quemadmodum secet. Ille enim persequitur sanitatem, ille putredinem. Occiderunt inpii Prophetas: occiderunt inpios et Prophetae. Flagellauerunt Iudei Christum:

> Iudeos flagellauit et Christus; traditi sunt Apostoli ab hominibus humanae potestati: tradiderunt Apostoli homines potestati sathanae. In his omnibus quid adtenditur, nisi eorum quis pro ueritate, quis pro iniquitate, quis nocendi causa, quis emendandi? Et paulo post: §. 7. Constantinus inperator constituit, ut res conuictorum et unitati peruicaciter resistentium fisco uendicarentur. Et post pauca: §. 8. Certe nullius crimen maculat nescientem. Item: §. 9. Facta nocentium, que innocentibus demonstrari uel ab innocentibus credi non possunt, non inquinant quemquam, sed propter innocentium consortium etiam cognita sustinentur. Non enim propter malos boni sunt deserendi, sed propter bonos mali sunt tollerandi, sicut tolerauerunt Prophetae, contra quos tanta dicebant, nec communionem sacramentorum illius populi relinquebant.

C. XXXVIII. Heretics are to be drawn to salvation even against their will.

Likewise to Donatus the Presbyter, [letter 204]. It displeases you that you are drawn to the salvation of God, although you have drawn many of ours to destruction? For what do we wish except that you be apprehended, presented, and preserved, lest you perish? But as to the fact that you were injured in body, you did this to yourself, since you refused to use the pack animal that was immediately brought to you and violently dashed yourself against the ground. For certainly another man who was brought with you, a colleague of yours, came unharmed because he did not do such things to himself. But you think that this ought not to have been done to you either, because you suppose that no one is to be compelled to the good. Attend to what the Apostle said: "He who desires the episcopate desires a good work." And nevertheless, so many persons, that they may undertake the episcopate, are detained against their will, brought forward, shut in, and suffer so many things they do not wish until the will to undertake the good work is present in them. How much more are you to be drawn away from the pernicious error in which you are enemies to yourselves, and to be led to the truth either to be known or to be chosen, not only so that you may salutarily possess honor, but also lest you perish most wickedly? § 1. You say that the Lord gave free choice, and that therefore a man ought not to be compelled to the good. Why, then, are those of whom we spoke above compelled to the good? Attend, therefore, to what you do not wish to consider. Good will is mercifully expended for this purpose: that man's evil will may be directed. For who does not know both that a man is not condemned except by the desert of an evil will, and that he is not freed unless he has had a good will? Nevertheless, those who are loved are not therefore to be permitted to their evil will with impunity and cruelty; rather, where power is given, they are both to be prohibited from evil and compelled to good. For if an evil will is always to be permitted its liberty, why were the Israelites, when they refused and murmured, prohibited from evil by such harsh scourges and compelled to the land of promise? If an evil will is to be permitted its liberty, why was Paul not permitted to employ the most evil will by which he persecuted the church, but was prostrated so that he might be blinded, was blinded so that he might be changed, was changed so that he might be sent, and was sent so that he might suffer for the truth such things as he had done in error? If an evil will is always to be permitted its liberty, why is a father admonished in the holy Scriptures not only to reprove a hard son with words, but also to beat his sides, so that, compelled and subdued, he may be directed to good discipline? Hence the same Solomon says, "You strike him with the rod, but you free his soul from death." If an evil will is always to be permitted its liberty, why are negligent shepherds reproved, and why is it said to them, "You have not called back the wandering; you have not sought the lost"? And you are Christ's sheep; you bear the Lord's character in the sacrament which you received; but you wander and perish. Let us not therefore displease you because we call back the wandering and seek the wandering lost. For we better do the will of the Lord, who admonishes us to compel you to return to his fold, than consent to the will of those who wander, so that we permit you to perish. § 2. Therefore, do not now say what I hear you have repeatedly said: "Thus I will to wander; thus I will to perish." Much better, insofar as we can, we do not permit this. Just now, when you cast yourself into a well so that you might die, you assuredly did so by free will. But how cruel would the servants of God have been if they had permitted you to this evil will of yours and had not freed you from that death? Who would not deservedly blame them? Who would not rightly judge them impious? And yet you willingly cast yourself into the water so that you might die; they raised you unwilling from the water lest you die. You acted according to your will, but to your destruction; they acted against your will, but against your death. Therefore, if this bodily salvation is to be guarded in such a way that it is preserved even in the unwilling by those who love them, how much more that spiritual salvation, in the abandonment of which eternal death is feared? Although even in this death which you wished to inflict upon yourself, you would have died not only for a time but also eternally, because even if you were being compelled not to salvation, not to the church's peace, not to the unity of Christ's body, not to holy and undivided charity, but to some evil things, not even then ought you to have inflicted death upon yourself. Consider the divine Scriptures and examine, insofar as you can, and see whether any one of the just and faithful ever did this when they suffered such great evils from those who were driving them to destruction, not to life, to which you are being compelled. And after a few words: § 3. As I hear, you repeat what is written in the Gospel: that seventy disciples withdrew from the Lord and were permitted the choice of their evil and impious withdrawal, and that the other twelve who remained were answered, "Do you also wish to go away?" And you do not attend to the fact that at that time the church was first sprouting with a new shoot, and that prophecy had not yet been fulfilled: "And all the kings of the earth will adore him; all nations will serve him." Assuredly, the more this is fulfilled, the greater the power the church employs, so that it not only does not invite but also compels to the good. The Lord wished to signify this; although he had great power, he nevertheless first chose to commend humility. He also showed this sufficiently evidently in that similitude of the banquet, where he sent to the invited and they refused to come, and he said to the servant, "Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring the poor and the feeble, the blind and the lame, in here. And the servant said to the lord, 'It has been done as you commanded, and there is still room.' And the lord said to the servant, 'Go out into the ways and hedges and compel them to enter, so that my house may be filled.'" See now how, concerning those who had come first, it was said, "Bring them in"; now it is said, "Compel." Thus were signified the beginnings of the church while it was still growing, so that there might also be strength to compel.

C. XXXVIII. Heretici ad salutem etiam inuiti sunt trahendi.

Item Donato Presbitero. [epist. CCIV.] Displicet tibi, quod traheris ad salutem Dei, cum tamen multos nostros traxeris ad perniciem? Quid enim uolumus, nisi te conprehendi, et presentari, et seruari, ne pereas? Quod autem in corpore lesus es, ipse tibi fecisti, qui iumento tibi mox admoto uti noluisti, et te ad terram grauiter collisisti. Nam utique alius, qui adductus est tecum, collega tuus illesus uenit, quia ipse sibi talia non fecit. Sed neque putas hoc tibi fieri debuisse, quia neminem existimas cogendum ad bonum. Adtende quid dixerit Apostolus: "Qui episcopatum desiderat bonum opus desiderat." Et tamen tam multi ut episcopatum suscipiant tenentur inuiti, producuntur, includuntur, patiuntur tanta que nolunt, donec eis adsit uoluntas suscipiendi operis boni. Quanto magis uos ab errore pernicioso, in quo uobis inimici estis, trahendi estis et perducendi ad ueritatem uel cognoscendam, uel eligendam, non solum ut honorem salubriter habeatis, sed etiam ne nequissime pereatis? §. 1. Dicis, Dominum dedisse arbitrium liberum, ideo non debere hominem cogi ad bonum. Quare ergo illi, de quibus supra diximus, coguntur ad bonum? Adtende ergo quod considerare non uis. Ideo uoluntas bona misericorditer inpenditur, ut mala uoluntas hominis dirigatur. Nam quis nesciat, nec dampnari hominem, nisi merito malae uoluntatis, nec liberari, nisi bonam habuerit uoluntatem? Non tamen ideo qui diliguntur malae suae uoluntati inpune et crudeliter permittendi sunt, sed, ubi potestas datur, et a malo prohibendi, et ad bonum cogendi. Nam, si uoluntas mala semper suae permittenda est libertati, quare Israelitae recusantes et murmurantes tam duris flagellis a malo prohibebantur, et ad terram repromissionis conpellebantur? Si uoluntas mala suae permittenda est libertati, quare Paulus non est permissus uti pessima uoluntate, qua persequebatur ecclesiam, sed prostratus est, ut cecaretur, et cecatus est, ut mutaretur, et mutatus est, ut mitteretur, missus est, ut qualia fecerat in errore, talia pro ueritate pateretur? Si uoluntas mala semper suae permittenda est libertati, quare monetur pater in scripturis sanctis filium durum non solum uerbis corripere, sed etiam latera eius tundere, ut ad bonam disciplinam coactus ac domitus dirigatur? Unde idem Salomon dicit: "Tu percutis eum uirga, animam autem eius liberas a morte." Si mala uoluntas semper suae permittenda est libertati, quare corripiuntur negligentes pastores, et dicitur eis: "Errantem non reuocastis, perditum non requisistis?" Et uos oues Christi estis; characterem dominicum portatis in sacramento, quod accepistis; sed erratis et peritis. Non ideo uobis displiceamus, quia reuocamus errantes, et querimus errantes perditos. Melius enim facimus uoluntatem Domini monentis, ut uos ad eius ouile redire cogamus, quam consentiamus uoluntati errantium, ut perire uos permittamus. §. 2. Noli ergo iam dicere, quod te assidue audio dixisse: Sic uolo errare, sic uolo perire. Melius hoc omnino non permittimus, quantum possumus. Modo, quod te in puteum, ut morereris, misisti, utique libera uoluntate fecisti. Sed quam crudeles essent serui Dei, si huic malae uoluntati tuae te permitterent, et non te de illa morte liberarent? Quis eos non merito culparet? Quis non inpios recte iudicaret? Et tamen tu te uolens in aquam misisti, ut morereris; illi te nolentem leuauerunt de aqua, ne morereris. Tu fecisti secundum uoluntatem tuam, sed in perniciem tuam; illi contra uoluntatem tuam, sed contra mortem tuam. Si ergo salus ista corporalis sic custodienda est, ut etiam in nolentibus ab eis, qui eos diligunt, seruetur: quanto magis illa spiritualis, in cuius desertione mors eterna metuitur? Quamquam et in ista morte, quam tu ipse tibi uoluisti inferre, non solum ad tempus, sed etiam in eternum morereris, quia, etsi non ad salutem, non ad ecclesiae pacem, non ad Christi corporis unitatem, non ad sanctam et indiuiduam karitatem, sed ad mala aliqua cogereris, nec sic tibi ipse inferre mortem debuisti. Considera scripturas diuinas, et discute quantum potes, et uide, utrum hoc fecerit aliquis aliquando iustorum atque fidelium, cum ab eis mala tanta perpessi sunt, qui eos ad interitum, non ad uitam, quo conpelleris, adigebant. Et post pauca: §. 3. Repetis, sicut audio, quod in euangelio scriptum est, recessisse a Domino LXX. discipulos, et arbitrio suae malae atque inpiae discessionis fuisse permissos; ceterisque duodecim, qui remanserant, fuisse responsum: "Numquid et uos uultis abire?" Et non adtendis quia tunc primum ecclesia nouello germine pullulabat, nondumque conpleta fuerat illa prophetia: "Et adorabunt eum omnes reges terrae, omnes gentes seruient ei?" Quod utique quanto magis inpletur, tanto maiore ecclesia utitur potestate, ut non solum non inuitet, sed etiam cogat ad bonum. Hoc Dominus significare uolebat, qui, quamuis magnam haberet potestatem, prius tamen elegit conmendare humilitatem. Hoc et in illa conuiuii similitudine satis euidenter ostendit, ubi misit ad inuitatos, et noluerunt uenire, et ait seruo: "Exi cito in plateas et uicos ciuitatis, et pauperes ac debiles, cecos et claudos introduc huc. Et ait Domino seruus: Factum est, ut inperasti, et adhuc locus est. Et ait Dominus seruo: Exi in uias et sepes, et conpelle intrare, ut inpleatur domus mea." Vide nunc, quemadmodum de his, qui primi uenerant, dictum est: introduc eos; nunc dictum est: conpelle. Ita significata sunt ecclesiae primordia adhuc crescentis, ut essent uires etiam conpellendi.

C. XXXIX. Heretics usefully suffer the things that Catholics usefully inflict.

The same upon John, [tractate XI, on c. 3]. When God wills to rouse the powers against heretics, against schismatics, against destroyers of the church, against those who spurn Christ, against blasphemers of Christ's baptism, let them not marvel. Since God repeatedly calls for Hagar to be beaten by Sarah, let her recognize herself as Hagar and lower her neck. When she, after being humbled, withdrew from her mistress, an angel met her and said, "What is it with you, Hagar, Sarah's maidservant?" When she had complained concerning her mistress, what did she hear from the angel? "Return to your mistress." Therefore, she is afflicted for this purpose: that she may return —and would that she return—because her offspring, like Jacob, will hold the inheritance with his brothers. But they marvel because Christian powers are stirred against detestable destroyers of the church. If they were not stirred, how would they render an account to God concerning their imperial power? Let your charity attend to what I say, because this pertains to Christian kings of the age: that in their own times they should will their mother the church, from whom they were spiritually born, to be at peace. And a little later: § 1. King Nebuchadnezzar decreed, saying, "Whoever shall utter blasphemy against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego shall be destroyed, and their houses dispersed." Behold how a foreign king rages lest the God of Israel be blasphemed, who was able to free three boys from the fire. And they are unwilling for Christian kings to rage because Christ is spurned—Christ by whom not three boys, but the world together with the kings themselves, is freed from the fire of hell? And below: § 2. How, then, are these kings not to be stirred, who consider not three boys freed from the flame, but themselves freed from the flame of Gehenna, when they see Christ, by whom they were freed, spurned in Christians? When they hear it said to a Christian, "Say that you are not a Christian"? They wish to do such things, but at least they are unwilling to suffer such things. For see what things they do and what things they suffer: they kill souls; they are afflicted in body. They cause everlasting deaths, and complain that they suffer temporal ones.

C. XXXIX. Heretici utiliter patiuntur que utiliter catholici inferunt.

Idem super Iohannem. [tractatu XI. ad c. 3.] Quando uult Deus concitare potestates aduersus hereticos, aduersus scismaticos, aduersus dissipatores ecclesiae, aduersus exsufflatores Christi, aduersus blasphematores Christi baptismi non mirentur. Quia Deus uocitat, ut a Sara uerberetur Agar, cognoscat se Agar, ponat ceruicem; que, cum humiliata discederet a domina sua, occurrit ei angelus, et dixit: "Quid tibi est Agar, ancilla Sarae?" Cum conquesta esset de domina, quid audiuit ab angelo: "Reuertere ad dominam tuam." Ad hoc ergo affligitur, ut reuertatur, atque utinam reuertatur, quia proles eius, sicut Iacob, cum fratribus hereditatem tenebit. Mirantur autem, quia conmouentur potestates Christianae contra dissipatores detestandos ecclesiae. Si non mouerentur, quomodo redderent rationem de inperio suo Deo? Intendat karitas uestra quid dicam, quia hoc pertinet ad reges seculi Christianos, ut temporibus suis pacatam uellent suam matrem ecclesiam, unde spiritualiter nati sunt. Et paulo post: §. 1. Nabuchodonosor rex decreuit, dicens: "Quicumque dixerint blasphemiam in deum Sydrac, Mysac, et Abdenago, in interitu erunt, et domus eorum in dispersione." Ecce quomodo rex alienigena seuit, ne blasphemetur Deus Israel, qui potuit tres pueros de igne liberare. Et nolunt, ut seuiant reges Christiani, quia Christus exsufflatur, a quo non tres pueri, sed orbis terrarum cum ipsis regibus a gehennarum igne liberatur? Et infra: §. 2. Quomodo ergo reges isti non moueantur, qui non tres pueros attendunt liberatos de flamma, sed se ipsos de flamma gehennae, quando uident Christum, a quo liberati sunt, exsufflari in Christianis? quando audiunt dici Christiano: Dic te non esse Christianum? Talia facere uolunt, sed saltim talia pati nolunt. Nam uidete, qualia faciunt, et qualia patiuntur; occidunt animas, affliguntur in corpore; sempiternas mortes faciunt, et temporales se perpeti conqueruntur.

C. XL. The church reasonably persecutes heretics.

The same Against Petilian, [Book II, c. 79]. He who sins does not sin by the authority of the law, but against the authority of the law. But because you ask what the reason for persecuting is, I in turn ask you whose voice it is that says in the Psalm, "He who secretly slandered his neighbor, this man I persecuted." Therefore, inquire into the cause and manner of persecution, and do not with such ignorance generally reprehend persecutors of the evil. [c. 82]. For we do not persecute you except as truth persecutes falsehood. Likewise, [c. 10]: § 2. Petilian said, "Did the Apostles persecute anyone, or did Christ hand anyone over?" Augustine responded: I could indeed say that Satan himself is worse than all evil men, to whom nevertheless the Apostle handed a man over for the destruction of the flesh, so that the spirit might be saved on the day of the Lord Jesus; likewise, others concerning whom he says, "Whom I handed over to Satan, so that they may learn not to blaspheme." And the Lord, using a whip, expelled the dishonest merchants from the temple, where the testimony of Scripture that says, "Zeal for your house has consumed me," is also joined. Behold, we find the Apostle handing over, and Christ persecuting. [c. 19]: § 3. Why, through most violent crowds, are you even of your own accord wicked toward Catholic churches, wherever you have been able to attack, as the matter itself indicates by innumerable examples? But you say that you defend your own places, and you resist with cudgels and slaughter by whatever means you can. Why did you not hear there the voice of the Lord saying, "But I say to you, do not resist evil"? Or, if it is possible sometimes rightly to resist a violent man through bodily force, without thereby violating the precept that we heard from the Lord, "But I say to you, do not resist evil," why is it not also possible that through ordained and legitimate powers a pious man should expel an impious man, and a just man an unjust man, from sees that are unlawfully usurped or retained to the injury of God? For the false prophets did not suffer persecution from Elijah in the same manner as Elijah himself did from the most wicked king; nor, because the Lord was scourged by persecutors, are those whom he himself scourged and cast out of the temple to be compared to his sufferings. § 4. It remains, therefore, that you confess that nothing else is to be sought except whether you have acted justly or impiously. Do not marvel if God does not lack ministers through whom you may be scourged, because you suffer persecution not from us, but, as it is written, from your own deeds. And below: § 5. Your complaint concerning persecution will be quieted if you first consider and understand that not every persecution is culpable. Otherwise it would not laudably be said, "He who secretly slandered his neighbor, this man I persecuted." For daily we see both a son complain of a father as his persecutor, a wife of a husband, a servant of a master, a tenant of a landowner, a defendant of a judge, and a soldier or provincial of a commander or king, since the latter very often by most orderly power prohibit and restrain the men subject to them from graver evils through the terrors of lighter penalties, but very often deter them from a good life and good deeds by threatening and raging. But when they prohibit them from evil and unlawful things, they are correctors and counselors; but when from good and lawful things, they are persecutors and oppressors. Those who prohibit from evil are also blamed if the measure of correction exceeds the measure of the sin.

C. XL. Ecclesia ratione hereticos persequitur.

Idem contra Petilianum. [lib. II. c. 79.] Qui peccat, non peccat legis auctoritate, sed contra legis auctoritatem. Quia uero interrogas, que sit ratio persequendi, uicissim te interrogo, cuius sit uox in Psalmo dicentis: "Detrahentem secreto proximo suo, hunc persequebar." Quere itaque causam, et modum persecutionis, et noli tanta impericia malorum generaliter persecutores reprehendere. [c. 82.] Non enim persequimur uos, nisi quemadmodum ueritas persequitur falsitatem. Item: [c. 1O.] §. 2. Petilianus dixit, si Apostoli persecuti sunt aliquem, aut aliquem tradidit Christus? Augustinus respondit: Possem quidem dicere, ipsum sathanam omnibus malis hominibus esse peiorem, cui tamen tradidit Apostolus hominem in interitum carnis, ut spiritus sit saluus in die Domini Iesu, item alios, de quibus dicit: "Quos tradidi sathanae, ut discant non blasphemare." Et Dominus flagellatos expulit de templo inprobos mercatores, ubi etiam connexum est testimonium scripturae dicentis: "Zelus domus tuae comedit me." Ecce, inuenimus Apostolum traditorem, Christum persecutorem. [c. 19.]: §. 3. Quare per uiolentissimas turbas etiam ultro inprobi estis ecclesiis catholicis, ubi potueritis aduertere quod innumerabilibus exemplis res ipsa indicat? Sed dicitis, uos loca uestra defendere, et resistitis fustibus et cedibus, quibuscumque potueritis. Quare non audistis ibi uocem Domini dicentis: "Ego autem uobis dico, non resistere malo?" Aut, si fieri potest, ut aliquando recte per uim corporalem resistatur uiolenti, nec ideo preceptum uioletur, quod audiuimus a Domino: "Ego autem dico uobis, non resistere malo:" cur non etiam hoc fieri potest, ut per ordinatas et legitimas potestates de sedibus, que illicite usurpantur uel ad iniuriam Dei retinentur, pius expellat inpium, et iustus iniustum? Neque enim eo modo persecutionem passi sunt pseudoprophetae ab Helya, quomodo ipse Helyas a rege nequissimo, aut, quia flagellatus est Dominus a persecutoribus, passionibus eius conparandi sunt quos ipse de templo flagellatos eiecit. §. 4. Restat ergo, ut nichil aliud requirendum esse fateamini, nisi utrum iuste, an inpie feceritis, non miremini, si non desunt ministri Deo, per quos flagellemini, quia persecutionem patimini non a nobis, sed, sicut scriptum est, ab ipsis factis uestris. Et infra: §. 5. De persecutione uestra querela sedabitur, si cogitetis prius et intelligatis, non omnem persecutionem esse culpabilem. Alioquin non laudabiliter diceretur: "Detrahentem secreto proximo suo, hunc persequebar." Nam cottidie uidemus et filium de patre tamquam de persecutore suo conqueri, et coniugem de marito, et seruum de domino, et colonum de possessore, et reum de iudice, et militem uel prouincialem de duce uel rege, cum illi plerumque ordinatissima potestate homines sibi subditos per terrores leuium penarum a grauioribus malis prohibeant atque conpescant, plerumque autem a bona uita, et a bonis factis minando et seuiendo deterreant. Sed cum a malo et illicito prohibent, correctores et consultores sunt; cum autem a bono et licito, persecutores et obpressores sunt. Culpantur etiam qui prohibent a malo, si modum peccati modus correctionis excedat.

C. XLI. The church should seek aid from the kings of the earth against its enemies.

The same in the letter [48] to Vincentius. No example is found in the evangelical and apostolic writings of anything having been sought from the kings of the earth on behalf of the church against the enemies of the church. Who denies that it is not found? But that prophecy was not yet being fulfilled: "And now, O kings, understand; be instructed, you who judge the earth." For at that time what is read a little earlier in the same Psalm was still being fulfilled: "Why have the nations raged and the peoples meditated vain things? The kings of the earth stood forth, and the princes assembled together as one." Nevertheless, if past deeds in the prophetic books were figures of future things, in that king who was called Nebuchadnezzar both times were prefigured: both the one the church had under the Apostles and the one it now has. Therefore, in the times of the Apostles and martyrs, that which was figured when the aforesaid king compelled the pious and just to adore an image and cast those who refused into the fire was being fulfilled. Now that which a little later was figured in the same king is fulfilled, when, converted to honoring the true God, he decreed in his kingdom that whoever blasphemed the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego should be subject to due penalties. Therefore, the earlier period of that king signified the earlier times of unbelieving kings, whom Christians suffer as impious men. But the later period of that king signified the times of faithful kings, whom the impious suffer as Christians. But assuredly, in the case of those who under the name of Christ were seduced by perverse men—lest perhaps they be wandering sheep of Christ who are to be recalled to the flock in another manner—tempered severity, and rather gentleness, is preserved, so that by the coercion of banishments and losses they may be admonished to consider what and why they suffer and may learn to place the Scriptures that they read before the rumors and calumnies of men. For who among us, who among you, does not praise laws given by emperors against the sacrifices of pagans? And certainly a far more severe penalty was established there. For capital punishment was established for that impiety. But with regard to correcting and restraining you, a plan has been adopted by which you might preferably be admonished to withdraw from error rather than be punished for a crime.

C. XLI. A regibus terrae contra inimicos suos ecclesia auxilium petat.

Idem in epistola [XLVIII.] ad Vincentium. Non inuenitur exemplum in euangelicis et apostolicis litteris, aliquid petitum a regibus terrae pro ecclesia contra inimicos ecclesiae. Quis negat non inueniri? Sed nondum implebatur illa prophetia: "Et nunc reges intelligite, erudimini, qui iudicatis terram." Adhuc enim inplebatur illud, quod in eodem psalmo paulo superius legitur: "Quare fremuerunt gentes, et populi meditati sunt inania? Astiterunt reges terrae, et principes conuenerunt in unum." Verumtamen si facta preterita in propheticis libris figurae fuerunt futurorum, in rege illo, qui appellabatur Nabuchodonosor, utrumque tempus prefiguratum est, et quod sub Apostolis habuit, et quod nunc habet ecclesia. Temporibus itaque Apostolorum et martirum illud inplebatur, quod figuratum est, quando rex memoratus pios et iustos cogebat adorare symulacrum, et recusantes in ignem mittebat. Nunc illud inpletur, quod paulo post in eodem rege figuratum est, cum conuersus ad honorandum Deum uerum decreuit in regno suo, ut, quicumque blasphemaret Deum Sydrach, Mysach et Abdenago, penis debitis subiaceret. Prius ergo tempus illius regis significabat priora tempora regum infidelium, quos patiuntur Christiani pro inpiis. Posterius uero tempus illius regis tempora regum fidelium, quos patiuntur inpii pro Christianis. Sed plane in eis, qui sub nomine Christi erant seducti a peruersis, ne forte oues Christi sint errantes, ad gregem aliter reuocandae sint, temperata seueritas, et magis mansuetudo seruatur, ut cohercione exiliorum atque dampnorum ammoneantur considerare, quid et quare patiantur, et discant preponere rumoribus et calumpniis hominum scripturas, quas legunt. Quis enim nostrum, quis uestrum non laudat leges ab inperatoribus datas aduersus sacrificia paganorum? Et certe longe ibi pena seuerior constituta est. Illius quippe inpietatis capitale supplicium constitutum est. De uobis autem corripiendis atque cohercendis habita ratio est, qua pocius ammoneremini ab errore discedere, quam pro scelere puniremini.

C. XLII. The church justly persecutes the evil.

The same, from the same, to Count Boniface, [letter 50]. If the true church is the one that suffers persecution, not the one that carries it out, let them ask the Apostle which church Sarah signified when she persecuted the maidservant. For he says that your free mother, the heavenly Jerusalem—that is, the true church of God—was figured in that woman who afflicted the maidservant. But if we examine the matter more carefully, the latter persecuted Sarah more by acting proudly than Sarah did her by restraining her. For the former did injury to her mistress; the latter imposed discipline upon the proud woman. Then I ask: if good and holy men carry out persecution against no one but only suffer it, whose voice do they suppose it to be in the Psalm where it is read, "I will persecute my enemies and apprehend them, and I will not turn back until they fail"? Therefore, if we wish to speak or acknowledge the truth, there is an unjust persecution which the impious carry out against the church of Christ. For the latter is blessed, because it suffers persecution for justice; but the former are wretched, because they suffer persecution for injustice. Accordingly, the latter persecutes by loving, the former by raging:

the latter so that it may correct, the former so that it may overthrow; the latter so that it may call back from error, the former so that it may hurl into error. § 1. But when those who are unwilling for just laws to be established against their impieties say that the Apostles did not seek such things from the kings of the earth, they do not consider that there was a different time then and that all things are suited to their own times. For what emperor then had believed in Christ? Who served him on behalf of piety against impiety by enacting laws? For at that time this prophetic statement was still being fulfilled: "Why have the nations raged and the peoples meditated vain things? The kings of the earth stood forth, and the princes assembled together as one against the Lord and against his Christ." For that which is said a little later in the same Psalm was not yet being done: "And now, O kings, understand; be instructed, you who judge the earth. Serve the Lord in fear and exult in him with trembling." How, then, do kings serve the Lord in fear except by prohibiting and punishing with religious severity those things that are done contrary to the Lord's commands? For he serves in one way because he is a man, and in another way also because he is a king. Because he is a man, he serves by living faithfully; because he is a king, he serves by sanctioning with suitable vigor laws that command just things and prohibit their contraries.

C. XLII. Malos ecclesia iuste persequitur.

Idem eiusdem ad Bonifatium Comitem. [ep. L.] Si ecclesia uera ipsa est, que persecutionem patitur, non que fecit, querant ab Apostolo, quam ecclesiam significabat Sara, quando persecutionem faciebat ancillae. Liberam quippe matrem uestram, celestem Ierusalem, id est ueram Dei ecclesiam, in illa muliere dicit figuratam, que affligebat ancillam. Si autem melius discutiamus, magis illa persequebatur Saram superbiendo, quam Sara cohercendo. Illa enim faciebat dominae iniuriam, ista inponebat superbae disciplinam. Deinde quero, si boni et sancti uiri nemini faciunt persecutionem, sed tantummodo patiuntur, cuius putant in Psalmo uocem esse, ubi legitur: "Persequar inimicos meos, et conprehendam illos, et non conuertar, donec deficiant?" Ergo si uerum dicere uel agnoscere uolumus, est persecutio iniusta, quam faciunt inpii ecclesiae Christi. Ista namque beata est, que persecutionem patitur propter iusticiam; illi uero miseri, qui persecutionem patiuntur propter iniusticiam. Proinde ista persequitur diligendo, illa seuiendo: ista ut corrigat, illa ut euertat: ista ut reuocet ab errore, illa ut precipitet in errorem. §. 1. Quod autem dicunt qui contra suas inpietates leges iustas institui nolunt, non petisse a regibus terrae Apostolos talia non considerant, aliud tempus tunc fuisse, et omnia suis conuenire temporibus. Quis enim tunc in Christum crediderat inperator, quis ei pro pietate contra inpietatem leges ferendo seruiret. Tunc enim illud adhuc propheticum conplebatur: "Quare fremuerunt gentes, et populi meditati sunt inania? Astiterunt reges terrae, et principes conuenerunt in unum aduersus Dominum, et aduersus Christum eius." Nondum enim agebatur quod paulo post in eodem psalmo dicitur: "Et nunc reges intelligite, erudimini, qui iudicatis terram. Seruite Domino in timore, et exultate ei cum tremore." Quomodo ergo reges Domino seruiunt in timore, nisi ea, que contra Domini iussa fiunt, religiosa seueritate prohibendo atque plectendo? Aliter enim seruit, quia homo est, aliter etiam quia rex est. Quia homo est, seruit uiuendo fideliter; quia rex est, seruit leges iusta precipientes et contraria prohibentes conuenienti uigore sanctiendo.

C. XLIII. By Christ's example, the evil are to be compelled to the good.

The same, [in the same letter]. Who can love us more than Christ, who laid down his life for his sheep? And although he had called Peter and the other Apostles by his word alone, Paul—afterward a great builder of his church, but previously its dreadful devastator—he not only restrained by his voice, but also prostrated by his power; and, while he raged in the darkness of unbelief, in order that he might desire the light of the heart when he arose, Christ first struck him with bodily blindness. If that blindness were not a punishment, he would not afterward have been healed from it; and when with open eyes he saw nothing, if he had them sound, Scripture would not narrate that at the imposition of Ananias's hand, so that their sight might be opened, what were like scales by which it had been closed fell from them. Where is what these men are accustomed to cry out: "It is free to believe or not to believe"? Upon whom did Christ inflict force? Whom did he compel? Behold, they have the Apostle Paul. Let them recognize in him Christ first compelling and afterward teaching, first striking and afterward consoling. But it is marvelous how he who entered the Gospel compelled by a bodily penalty labored more in the Gospel than all those who were called by the word alone; and the perfect charity of him whom greater fear compelled to charity casts fear outside. Why, therefore, should the church not compel its lost children to return?

C. XLIII. Exemplo Christi mali sunt ad bonum cogendi.

Idem. [in eadem epistola] Quis potest nos amplius amare, quam Christus, qui animam suam posuit pro ouibus suis? Et, cum Petrum et alios apostolos uocasset uerbo solo, Paulum, ecclesiae suae postea magnum edificatorem, sed horrendum antea uastatorem, non solum uoce conpescuit, uerum etiam potestate prostrauit, atque infidelitatis tenebris seuientem, ad desiderandum lumen cordis, ut surgeret, prius cecitate corporis percussit. Si pena illa non esset, non ab ea postmodum sanaretur, et quando apertis oculis nichil uidebat si eos saluos haberet, non ad inpositionem manus Ananiae, ut eorum aperiretur intuitus, tamquam squamas, quibus clausus fuerat, inde cecidisse scriptura narraret. Ubi est quod isti clamare consueuerunt, liberum est credere uel non credere? cui uim Christus intulit? quem coegit? Ecce habent Paulum apostolum; agnoscant in eo prius cogentem Christum, et postea docentem, prius ferientem, et postea consolantem. Mirum est autem, quomodo ille, qui pena corporis ad euangelium coactus intrauit, plus illis omnibus, qui solo uerbo uocati sunt, in euangelio laborauit, et quem maior timor conpulit ad karitatem, eius perfecta karitas foras mittit timorem. Cur ergo non cogeret ecclesia perditos filios, ut redirent?

C. XLIV. Moses scourged the people not with cruelty but with love.

The same Against Faustus, [Book XXII, c. 79]. What cruel thing did Moses command or do when, exercising holy zeal for the people committed to him and desiring them to be subject to the living and one true God, after he learned that they had sunk to fabricating and worshiping an idol and had prostituted their shameless mind to demons, avenging the matter with the sword upon a few of them whom God himself, whom they had offended, willed by a profound and secret judgment to be struck and struck at once, he both salutarily terrified them in the present and sanctioned discipline for the future? For who does not recognize in his words that he did what he did with no cruelty but with great love, when he prayed for their sins and said, "If you forgive them the sin, forgive it; but if not, blot me out from your book"? § 1. Thus assuredly the Apostle also, not cruelly but lovingly, handed a man over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, so that the spirit might be saved on the day of the Lord Jesus; he also handed over others so that they might learn not to blaspheme.

C. XLIV. Non crudelitate, sed dilectione Moyses populum flagellauit.

Idem contra Faustum. [lib. XXII. c. 79.] Quid crudele Moyses mandauit aut fecit, cum conmissum sibi populum sancte zelans, uiuo et uni uero Deo subditum cupiens, posteaquam cognouit ad fabricandum et colendum ydolum defluxisse, mentemque inpudicam prostituisse demonibus, in paucos eorum uindicans gladio, quos Deus ipse, quem offenderant, alto et secreto iudicio feriendos uoluisset mox feriri, et in presenti salubriter terruit, et disciplinam in posterum sanxit? Nam eum nulla crudelitate, sed magna dilectione fecisse quod fecit, quis non in uerbis eius agnoscat, orantis pro peccatis eorum, et dicentis: "Si dimittis illis peccatum, dimitte: sin autem, dele me de libro tuo." §. 1. Sic plane et Apostolus non crudeliter, sed amabiliter tradidit hominem sathanae in interitum carnis, ut spiritus saluus sit in die Domini Iesu; tradidit et alios, ut discerent non blasphemare.

C. XLV. It is not imputed to the faithful who by reason of office either employ tortures or pronounce a capital sentence.

Likewise Innocent, [letter III to Exsuperius, Bishop of Toulouse, c. 3]. Inquiry was also made concerning those who have exercised public office after baptism and either employed tortures alone or also pronounced a capital sentence. We read nothing concerning them as defined by the fathers. For they remembered that these powers had been granted by God, that the sword had been permitted for vengeance upon the guilty, and that the ministry of God had been given to avengers of this kind. How, then, would they reprehend as done what they saw to have been permitted with the Lord as its author? Concerning these persons, therefore, let us maintain what has been observed until now, lest we dare either to overturn discipline or to act contrary to the Lord's authority. But all their deeds will be reserved to them in the rendering of an account.

C. XLV. Non inputatur fidelibus, qui ex offitio aut tormenta exercent, aut capitalem sententiam ferunt.

Item Innocentius. [epist. III. ad Exsuperium, Episcopum Tolosanum, c. 3.] Quesitum est etiam super his, qui post baptismum amministrauerunt, et aut tormenta sola exercuerunt, aut etiam capitalem protulere sententiam. Nichil de his legimus a maioribus diffinitum. Meminerant enim a Deo potestates has fuisse concessas, et propter uindictam noxiorum gladium fuisse permissum, et Dei ministerium esse datum in huiusmodi uindices. Quomodo igitur reprehenderent factum, quod auctore Domino uiderent esse concessum? De his ergo, ut hactenus seruatum est, sic habeamus, ne aut disciplinam auertere, aut contra auctoritatem Domini uenire audeamus. Ipsis autem in ratione reddenda gesta sua omnia seruabuntur.

C. XLVI. The drafter is free from guilt when the authority of the laws is exercised against the wicked.

The same to the Bishop of Toulouse. You also wished to inquire whether, certainly after the regeneration of baptism, freedom is granted to those dictating petitions to seek from princes the death or blood of someone on account of a charge. Princes never grant this without cognizance, but always remit the matters or crimes committed to the judges, so that, once the case is known, they may be avenged. When these have been delegated to an examining judge, either acquittal or condemnation is pronounced according to the character of the business. And while the authority of the laws is exercised against the wicked, the drafter will be free from guilt.

C. XLVI. Inmunis est dictator a culpa, cum legum auctoritas in inprobos exercetur.

Idem ad Tolosanum episcopum. Illud etiam sciscitari uoluisti, an preces dictantibus liberum concedatur utique post baptismi regenerationem a principibus poscere mortem alicuius uel sanguinem de reatu. Quam rem principes numquam sine cognitione concedunt, sed ad iudices conmissa ipsa uel crimina semper remittunt, ut causa cognita uindicentur; que cum quesitori fuerint delegata, aut absolutio aut dampnatio pro negotii qualitate profertur. Et dum legum auctoritas in inprobos exercetur, erit dictator inmunis.

C. XLVII. Almighty God is placated in the correction of the evil.

Likewise Gregory to Brunhild, Queen of the Franks, [Book VII, indiction 1, letter 5]. If, therefore, you know any violent persons, adulterers, thieves, or persons intent upon other depraved acts, hasten to placate God by their correction, so that through you he may not bring in the scourge of faithless nations, which, insofar as we see, has been roused for the vengeance of many nations; lest, if—as we do not believe—the anger of divine vengeance shall have been stirred by the activity of the wicked, the pestilence of war destroy those offending persons whom the precepts of God do not recall to the way of rectitude.

C. XLVII. In correptione malorum Deus omnipotens placatur.

Item Gregorius Brunichildae, Reginae Francorum. [lib. VII. Indict. 1. epist. 5.] Si quos igitur uiolentos, si quos adulteros, si quos fures, uel aliis prauis actibus studere cognoscitis, Deum eorum correctione placare festinate, ut per uos flagellum perfidarum gentium, quod (quantum uidemus) ad multarum nationum uindictam excitatum est, non inducat; ne, si, quod non credimus, diuinae ulcionis iracundia sceleratorum fuerit actione conmota, belli pestis interimat quos delinquentes ad rectitudinis uiam Dei precepta non reuocant.

C. XLVIII. The enemies of ecclesiastical religion are to be restrained even by wars.

The same to Gennadius, Patrician and Exarch of Africa, [Book I, letter 72]. Just as the Lord has caused your Excellency to shine in this life with the light of victories in hostile wars, so it is fitting also to oppose the enemies of his church with every liveliness of mind and body, so that the renown of your Excellency may shine forth more and more from each triumph, since you both vehemently resist the adversaries of the catholic church for the Christian people in external wars, and as warriors of the Lord you bravely wage ecclesiastical battles. For it is known that men of heretical religion, if—which God forbid—license to do harm is available to them, rise up vehemently against the catholic faith, so that they may pour out the poisons of their heresy to waste away, if they can, the members of the Christian body. For we have learned that, with the Lord opposing them, they raise their necks against the catholic church and wish to bow down the faith of the Christian name; but let your Eminence repress their attempts and press their proud necks beneath the yoke of rectitude. Command that the council of catholic bishops be admonished not to appoint a primate according to the order of place while setting aside merits of life, since before God it is not the more distinguished rank, but the action of a better life, that is approved. But let the primate himself reside not indiscriminately through villages, as is customary, but in one of their cities according to their election, so that the capacity to resist the Donatists may be arranged with better ingenuity by reason of the dignity obtained. But if any from the council of Numidia desire to come to the Apostolic See, permit them; and if any persons should think to oppose their journey, resist them. Assuredly, the glory of your Excellency increases more before the Creator if through it the fellowship of the scattered churches can be restored. For when he beholds the gifts bestowed being recalled to the glory of his name, he bestows all the more abundant ones, the more he sees the dignity of his religion enlarged through them. Moreover, discharging the affection of paternal charity, we petition the Lord that he may render your arm strong for repressing enemies, and sharpen the mind of your Excellency with zeal for the faith, like the edge of a flashing sword.

C. XLVIII. Ecclesiasticae religionis inimici etiam bellis sunt cohercendi.

Idem Genadio, Patricio et Exarcho Affricae. [lib. I. epist. 72.] Sicut excellentiam uestram hostilibus bellis in hac uita Dominus uictoriarum fecit luce fulgere, ita oportet etiam inimicis ecclesiae eius omni uiuacitate mentis et corporis obuiare, quatinus eius ex utroque triumpho magis ac magis enitescat opinio, cum et forensibus bellis aduersariis catholicae ecclesiae pro Christiano populo uehementer obsistitis, et ecclesiastica prelia sicut bellatores Domini fortiter dimicatis. Notum est enim hereticae religionis uiros, si eis, quod absit, suppetit nocendi licentia, contra catholicam fidem uehementer insurgere, quatinus hereseos suae uenena ad tabefacienda, si ualuerint, Christiani corporis membra transfundant. Cognouimus enim eos contra catholicam ecclesiam, Domino eis aduersante, colla subrigere, et fidem Christiani nominis inclinare uelle; sed eminentia uestra conatus eorum conprimat, et superbas eorum ceruices iugo rectitudinis premat. Concilium uero catholicorum episcoporum ammoneri precipite, ut primatem non ex ordine loci postpositis uitae meritis faciat, quoniam apud Deum non gradus elegantior, sed uitae melioris actio conprobatur. Ipse uero primas non passim (sicut moris est) per uillas, sed in una ciuitate eorum iuxta electionem resideat, quatinus adeptae dignitatis meliori ingenio resistendi Donatistis possibilitas disponatur. Ex concilio uero Numidiae si qui desiderant ad apostolicam sedem uenire, permittite, et, si quilibet eorum uiae contradicere putauerint, obuiate. Magis profecto excellentia uestra apud Creatorem gloria proficit, si per eam dispersarum ecclesiarum potuerit societas restaurari. Cum enim largita munera ad nominis sui conspicit gloriam reuocari, tanto largiora tribuit, quanto per ea religionis suae dignitatem uiderit ampliari. Persoluentes preterea paternae karitatis affectum, Dominum petimus, quo brachium uestrum ad conprimendos hostes forte efficiat, et mentem eius fidei zelo uelut mucrone gladii uibrantis exacuat.

C. XLIX. Victory in wars is granted by the merit of faith.

The same to the same, [Book I, epistle 73]. If such prosperity in military actions did not come to your Excellency from the merit of faith and the grace of the Christian religion, it would not have been a matter for wonder, since we know that these things were also granted to military leaders of old. But since, by God's largess, you anticipate future victories not by carnal foresight but rather by prayers, it comes about that this falls within the realm of astonishment, because your glory descends not by earthly counsel but by God's largess from above. For where does the eloquent report of your merits not range? It declares that you frequently seek wars not from the desire to shed blood, but for the sake of enlarging the commonwealth in which we behold God worshiped, so that the name of Christ might range everywhere through the subject nations by the preaching of the faith. For just as outward works of virtues establish you as eminent in this life, so also the inward adornments of morals proceeding from a pure heart glorify you in the future life by participation in heavenly joys. For we have learned that your Excellency has furnished very many resources for feeding the sheep of blessed Peter, prince of the Apostles, such that it restored no small number of places of his patrimony, stripped of their own cultivators, by inhabitants granted from the Dacians. Therefore, whatever things you confer upon him with a most Christian mind, you await their recompense through hope in the future judgment. PART VIII. GRATIAN. It has briefly been shown that the good laudably persecute the evil, and the evil culpably persecute the good. But that saying of the Apostle, "But who are you, who judge another's servant?" is to be understood of the hidden things of another's heart. That vengeance may be inflicted has been shown. It now remains to show that it ought to be inflicted and that those who are punished are loved more than those who are left unpunished; each of these points is proved by the authority of many. For Augustine says:

> Idem ad eundem. [lib. I. epist. 73.] Si non ex fidei merito et Christianae religionis gratia tanta excellentiae uestrae bellicorum actuum prosperitas eueniret, non miranda fuerant, cum sciamus, hec etiam antiquis bellorum ducibus fuisse concessa. Sed cum futuras, Deo largiente, uictorias non carnali prouidentia, sed magis orationibus preuenitis, fit, ut hoc in stuporem ueniat, quod gloria uestra non terreno consilio, sed Deo desuper largiente descendat. Ubi enim meritorum uestrorum loquax non discurrit opinio? que bella uos frequenter appetere non desiderio fundendi sanguinis, sed dilatandae causa reipublicae in qua Deum coli conspicimus, loquitur, quatinus Christi nomen per subditas gentes fidei predicatione circumquaque discurreret. Sicut enim exteriora uos uirtutum opera eminentes in hac uita constituunt, ita et interna morum ornamenta ex corde mundo procedentia in futuram uitam celestium gaudiorum participatione glorificant. Plurima enim pro pascendis ouibus B. Petri apostolorum principis utilitatibus excellentiam uestram prestitisse didicimus, ita, ut non parua loca patrimonii eius propriis nudata cultoribus, largitis Dacorum habitatoribus, restaurasset. Quecumque igitur illi Christianissima mente confertis, horum retributionem per spem in futuro iudicio sustinetis VIII. Pars. Gratian. Breuiter monstratum est, quod boni laudabiliter persecuntur malos, et mali dampnabiliter persecuntur bonos. Illud autem Apostoli: "Tu autem quis es, qui iudicas seruum alienum?" de occultis alieni cordis intelligendum est. Quod uindicta inferri possit, monstratum est. Nunc restat ostendere, quod debet inferri, et quod magis diliguntur illi, qui puniuntur, quam qui inpuniti relinquuntur; quod utrumque multorum auctoritate probatur. Ait enim Augustinus.

C. L. God is provoked to wrath when the punishment of sins is deferred.

If we defer pursuing or avenging those things by which God is vehemently offended, we assuredly provoke the patience of the divinity to wrath. "Did not Achan, son of Zerah, transgress the commandment of the Lord, and did not his wrath lie upon all the people of Israel? And he was one man—and would that he alone had perished in his crime."

> C. L. Ad iram Deus prouocatur, cum peccata puniri differuntur.
> Si ea de quibus uehementer Deus offenditur, insequi uel ulcisci differimus, ad irascendum utique diuinitatis patienciam prouocamus. "Nonne Achan filius Zare preteriit mandatum Domini, et super omnem populum Israel ira eius incubuit? Et ille erat unus homo, atque utinam solus perisset in scelere suo."

C. LI. Vengeance that avails for correction is not prohibited.

Likewise Augustine, On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, Book I, [cc. 37 and 38]. That vengeance is not prohibited which avails for correction, which also pertains to mercy and does not impede that disposition by which each person is prepared to endure more things from him whom he wishes to be corrected. But no one is fit to inflict this vengeance unless he has overcome, by the gentleness of love, the hatred with which those who desire to avenge themselves are accustomed to burn. For it is not to be feared that parents are seen to hate a little son when, sinning, he is beaten by them lest he sin further. And certainly the perfection of the love of God the Father himself is proposed to us for imitation when it is said in what follows: “Love your enemies; do good to those who hate you; and pray for those who persecute you.” And yet it is said of him through the Prophet: “For the Lord corrects him whom he loves, but he scourges every son whom he receives.” And the Lord also says: “The servant who does not know the will of his lord and does things not worthy of blows will be beaten with few; but the servant who knows the will of his lord and does things worthy of blows will be beaten with many.” Therefore, let no one avenge except him to whom power has been given in the order of things, and let him avenge with that will with which a father scourges a little son, whom nevertheless, on account of his age, he cannot hate. For from this a most evident example is stated, by which it appears sufficiently that a sin can be avenged from love rather than left unpunished, so that he may will that the person whom he avenges be not wretched through punishment, but blessed through correction; nevertheless, let him be prepared, if there is need, to tolerate with an even mind more unlawful things from the person whom he wishes to be corrected, whether he has power to coerce him or does not have it. § 1. But great and holy men, who already knew most excellently that this death, which dissolves the soul from the body, was not to be feared, nevertheless, in accordance with the mind of those who feared it, punished certain sins by death, so that a useful fear might be struck into the living and, for those who were punished by death, death itself might not harm them, but the sin that could have increased if they lived might be diminished. Those men judged not rashly, to whom God had granted such judgment. Hence it is that Elijah put many to death by his own hand and by fire obtained from God, a thing that many other great and divine men, by the same spirit, also did not rashly, taking counsel for human affairs. When the disciples gave an example from that Elijah, recalling what had been done by him, so that power might also be given them to ask for fire from heaven to consume those who had not furnished them hospitality, the Lord reproved in them not the example of the holy prophet, but ignorance of avenging, which was still in the inexperienced, observing that they did not love correction but desired vengeance from hatred. And so, after he taught them what it was to love one’s neighbor as oneself, and after the Holy Spirit was also poured in, whom, when ten days had been completed after his ascension, he sent from above as he had promised, such acts of vengeance were not lacking, although much more rarely than in the Old Testament. For there, for the greater part, servants were oppressed by fear; but here, above all, free persons were nourished by love. For at the words of the Apostle Peter, Ananias and his wife, as we read in the Acts of the Apostles, fell lifeless and were not raised again but buried.

C. LI. Vindicta, que ad correctionem ualet, non est prohibenda.

Item Augustinus de sermone Domini in monte, libro I. [c. 37. et 38.] Ea uindicta, non prohibetur, que ualet ad correctionem, que etiam ad misericordiam pertinet, nec inpedit illud propositum, quo quisque paratus est ab eo, quem correctum esse uult, plura perferre. Sed huic uindictae inferendae non est idoneus, nisi qui odium, quo flagrare solent qui se uindicare desiderant, dilectionis mansuetudine superauerit. Non enim metuendum est, ne odisse paruulum filium parentes uideantur, cum ab eis uapulat peccans, ne peccet ulterius. Et certe perfectio dilectionis ipsius Dei patris imitanda nobis proponitur, cum in sequentibus dicitur: "Diligite inimicos uestros, benefacite his, qui oderunt uos, et orate pro his, qui uos persecuntur." Et tamen dicitur de ipso per Prophetam: "Quem enim diligit Dominus corripit, flagellat autem omnem filium, quem recipit." Et dicit etiam Dominus: "Seruus, qui nescit uoluntatem Domini sui, et facit non digna plagis, uapulabit paucis; seruus autem, qui scit uoluntatem Domini sui, et non facit digna plagis, uapulabit multis." Non ergo, nisi ut ipse uindicet, cui rerum ordine potestas data est, et ea uoluntate uindicet, qua pater filium paruulum flagellat, quem tamen per etatem non potest odisse. Hinc enim apertissimum exemplum dicitur, quo satis apparet, posse peccatum amore pocius uindicari, quam inpunitum relinqui, ut illum, quem uindicat, non pena miserum, sed correctione beatum esse uelit; paratus tamen sit, si opus fuerit, equo animo plura tollerare ab eo illicita, quem uult esse correptum, siue in eum habeat potestatem cohercendi, siue non habeat. §. 1. Magni autem et sancti uiri, qui iam optime scirent mortem istam, que animam dissoluit a corpore, formidandam non esse, secundum eorum tamen animum, qui illam timerent, nonnulla peccata morte punierunt, quo et uiuentibus utilis metus incuteretur, et illis, qui morte puniebantur, non ipsa mors noceret, sed peccatum, quod augeri posset, si uiuerent, diminueretur. Non temere illi iudicabant, quibus tale iudicium Deus donauerat. Inde est, quod Helyas morte multos affecit propria manu, et igne diuinitus inpetrato, quod et alii multi magni et diuini uiri eodem spiritu consulendo rebus humanis non temere fecerunt. De quo Helya cum dedissent exemplum discipuli, conmemorantes quid ab eo factum sit, ut etiam ipsis daret potestatem petendi de celo ignem ad consumendum eos, qui sibi hospicium non prebuerant, reprehendit in eis Dominus non exemplum prophetae sancti, sed ignorantiam uindicandi, que adhuc erat in rudibus, animaduertens eos non amare correctionem, sed odio desiderare uindictam. Itaque posteaquam eos docuit, quid esset diligere proximum tamquam se ipsum, infuso etiam Spiritu sancto, quem decem diebus conpletis post ascensionem suam desuper, ut promiserat, misit, non defuerunt tales uindictae, quamuis multo rarius quam in ueteri testamento. Ibi enim ex maiori parte seruientes timore premebantur; hic autem maxime dilectione liberi nutriebantur. Nam et uerbis apostoli Petri Ananias, et uxor eius (sicut in Actibus Apostolorum legimus) exanimes ceciderunt, nec resuscitati sunt, sed sepulti.

C. LII. A Christian ought to persecute the things that are contrary to the truth.

Likewise Augustine, Against Cresconius the Grammarian, Book I. Any Christian who persecutes an unrighteous man is an enemy of Christ. What you say is true, if he does not persecute in him that which is an enemy of Christ. For surely a lord in a servant, a father in a son, and a husband in a wife, though both parties are Christians, ought not to leave unpersecuted vices contrary to Christian truth. Or indeed, if they do not persecute them, will they not deservedly be held guilty of negligence?

C. LII. Que ueritati contraria sunt Christianus persequi debet.

Item Augustinus contra Cresconium Grammaticum, libro I. Quisquis Christianus iniquum persequitur, Christi est inimicus. Verum dicis, si non hoc in illo persequitur, quod Christo est inimicum. Neque enim dominus in seruo, pater in filio, maritus in coniuge, cum sint utrique Christiani, non debent persequi uicia Christianae contraria ueritati. An uero, si non persequantur, non rei negligentiae merito tenebuntur?

C. LIII. In what manner a man ought to love his neighbor as himself.

Likewise Augustine to Macedonius, [epistle 52]. A man ought to love his neighbor as himself, so that, whichever man he can, he may bring to the worship of God by the consolation of beneficence, or by the instruction of teaching, or by the coercion of discipline.

[PALEA.

C. LIII. Quemadmodum homo debet diligere proximum sicut se ipsum.

Item Augustinus ad Macedonium. [ep. LII.] Debet homo diligere proximum tamquam se ipsum, ut quem potuerit hominem beneficentiae consolatione, uel informatione doctrinae, uel disciplinae cohercione, adducat ad colendum.

[PALEA.

C. LIV. On the same matter.

Likewise Augustine to Donatus the Presbyter, epistle 204. The evil are to be prohibited from evil and compelled to good.] GRATIAN. From all these things it is gathered that vengeance is to be inflicted not from love of vengeance itself, but from zeal for justice; not so that hatred may be exercised, but so that depravity may be corrected. But since vengeance is sometimes inflicted by losses of property, sometimes by scourgings, and sometimes even by death, it is asked whether it is a sin for a judge or minister to hand the guilty over to death.

C. LIV. De eodem.

Item Augustinus ad Donatum Presbiterum, epistola CCIV. Mali sunt prohibendi a malo, et cogendi ad bonum.] Gratian. Ex his omnibus colligitur, quod uindicta est inferenda non amore ipsius uindictae, sed zelo iusticiae; non ut odium exerceatur, sed ut prauitas corrigatur. Sed cum uindicta aliquando inferatur dampnis rerum, aliquando flagellis, aliquando etiam morte: queritur, an sit peccatum iudici uel ministro reos morti tradere?

Question V

GRATIAN. PART I. That it is lawful for no one to kill anyone is proved by that precept by which the Lord prohibited homicide in the law, saying: "You shall not kill." Likewise in the Gospel: "Everyone who shall have taken up the sword will perish by the sword."

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem nulli liceat aliquem occidere, illo precepto probatur, quo Dominus in lege homicidium prohibuit, dicens: "Non occides." Item in euangelio: "Omnis, qui gladium acceperit, gladio peribit."

C. I. The evil are not to be killed, but amended by scourges.

Likewise Augustine to Count Marcellinus, concerning the captured Donatists, [epistle 159]. I have learned that those Circumcellions and clerics of Donatus's party, whom the cause of public discipline had brought from the region of Hippo to trial on account of their deeds, were heard by your Nobility, and that very many of them confessed to the murder that they committed against Restitutus, a Catholic presbyter, and to the slaughter of Innocent, another Catholic presbyter, as well as to the gouging out of his eye and the cutting off of his finger. Hence the greatest solicitude was struck into me, lest perhaps your Sublimity decree that they be punished with such severity of the laws that they suffer things such as they did. And therefore by these letters I adjure your faith, which you have in Christ, through the mercy of our Lord himself, that you not do this and not at all permit it to be done. For although we could dissemble concerning their death, because they appear to have been presented for examination not with our people acting as accusers but by their notaries, to whom the vigilance for guarding the public peace pertained, nevertheless we do not wish the sufferings of the servants of God to be avenged, as it were, in the punishments of an opposing party—not because we prohibit the license for crimes from being taken away from wicked men, but because we wish this rather to suffice: that, alive and mutilated in no part of the body, they be directed either from insane restlessness to the repose of soundness by the coercion of the laws, or from malicious works be assigned to some useful work. This too is indeed called condemnation; but who does not understand that it is rather to be named a benefit than a punishment, where neither the audacity for raging is set free nor the salutary medicine of repenting withdrawn? Fulfill, Christian judge, the office of a pious father. Remember so to be inflamed against iniquity that you do not exercise the lust for avenging upon the atrocities of sinners, but apply the will to heal to the wounds of sinners. Do not lose the paternal diligence that you preserved in the inquiry itself, when you drew out the confession of so many crimes not by stretching them upon the rack, not by claws plowing them, not by burning flames, but by blows of rods—a manner of coercion that is applied both by teachers of the liberal arts and by parents themselves, and that is also often customarily employed by bishops in judgments. Therefore, do not avenge more harshly what you discovered more gently. The necessity of inquiring is greater than that of punishing. For even the mildest men ought diligently and insistently to examine an admitted crime for this purpose: that they may find those whom they may spare.

> C. I. Mali non sunt interficiendi, sed flagellis emendandi.
> Item Augustinus ad Marcellinum Comitem, de Donatistis captis. [epist. CLIX.] Circumcelliones illos, et clericos partis Donati, quos de Yponensi ad iudicium pro factis eorum publicae disciplinae causa deduxerat, a tua nobilitate conperi auditos, et plurimos eorum de homicidio, quod in Restitutum catholicum presbiterum conmiserunt, et de cede Innocentii alterius catholici presbiteri, atque de oculo eius effosso et digito preciso fuisse confessos. Unde michi sollicitudo maxima incussa est, ne forte sublimitas tua censeat eos tanta legum seueritate plectendos, ut qualia fecerunt talia patiantur. Ideoque his litteris obtestor fidem tuam, quam habes in Christo, per ipsius Domini nostri misericordiam, ut hoc non facias, nec omnino fieri permittas. Quamuis enim ob illorum interitum dissimulare possemus, quia non accusantibus nostris, sed illorum notariis, ad quos tuendae publicae pacis uigilantia pertinebat, presentati uideantur examini; nolumus tamen passiones seruorum Dei, quasi in alienae partis suppliciis uindicari; non quo scelestis hominibus licentiam facinorum prohibeamus auferri, sed hoc magis sufficere uolumus, ut uiui et nulla parte corporis truncati uel ab inquietudine insana ad sanitatis otium legum cohercione dirigantur, uel a malignis operibus alicui utili operi deputentur. Vocatur quidem et ista dampnatio; sed quis non intelligat magis beneficium quam supplicium nuncupandum, ubi nec seuiendi relaxatur audacia, nec penitendi salutaris medicina subtrahitur? Inple, Christiane iudex, pii patris offitium, sic succensere iniquitati memineris, ut non in peccatorum atrocitatibus exerceas ulciscendi libidinem, sed peccatorum uulneribus curandi adhibeas uoluntatem. Noli perdere paternam diligentiam, quam in ipsa inquisitione seruasti, quando tantorum scelerum confessionem non extendendo eculeo, non sulcantibus ungulis, non urentibus flammis, sed uirgarum uerberibus eruisti, qui modus cohercionis et a magistris artium liberalium, et ab ipsis parentibus adhibetur, ut sepe etiam in iudiciis ab episcopis solet haberi. Noli ergo atrocius uindicare, quod lenius inuenisti. Inquirendi quam puniendi maior necessitas est. Ad hoc enim et mitissimi homines facinus admissum diligenter atque instanter examinare debent, ut quibus parcant inueniant.

C. II. The guilty are to be punished short of the penalty of death.

The same to Marcellinus, [epistle 158]. I ask you that their punishment, although they have confessed to such great crimes, be short of the penalty of death, both on account of our conscience and on account of commending Catholic gentleness. For the fruit of their confession itself reaches us, because the Catholic Church finds where she may preserve and exhibit mildness toward the most atrocious enemies. For amid such great cruelty, whatever vengeance shall proceed short of blood will appear great mildness. And although now this seems unworthy to certain of our people, moved by that atrocity, and like dissolution and negligence, nevertheless, when the commotions of minds—which are accustomed to be more turbulently aroused by more recent deeds—have passed, its excellently luminous goodness will appear.

C. II. Preter supplicium mortis rei sunt puniendi.

Idem Marcellino. [epist. CLVIII.] Pena illorum, quamuis de tantis sceleribus confessorum, rogo te ut preter supplicium mortis sit, et propter conscientiam nostram, et propter catholicam mansuetudinem conmendandam. Ipse enim fructus ad nos peruenit confessionis illorum, quia inuenit ecclesia catholica, ubi erga atrocissimos inimicos seruet atque exhibeat lenitatem. In tanta quippe crudelitate quecumque preter sanguinem uindicta processerit, magna lenitas apparebit. Quod etsi modo quibusdam nostris illa atrocitate conmotis uidetur indignum, et quasi dissolutionis et negligentiae simile, transactis tamen motibus animorum (qui recentioribus factis solent turbulentius excitari) egregie luculenta bonitas apparebit.

C. III. The evil are to be prohibited from evil and compelled to good.

The same to Donatus, [epistle 127]. There is one thing alone that we fear in your justice: lest perhaps —since whatever evil is committed against Christian society by impious and ungrateful men is assuredly graver and more atrocious than if it were committed against others—you too decree that it be restrained in proportion to the enormity of the crimes and not rather in consideration of Christian mildness. We entreat you through Jesus Christ not to do this. And a little later: § 1. From the occasion of terrifying judges and laws, we desire them to be corrected, not killed, lest they pay the penalties of eternal judgment; and we do not wish discipline concerning them to be neglected, nor that they be restrained by the punishments of which they are worthy. Therefore, so check their sins that there may be persons who repent that they sinned. And a little later: § 2. Consequently, if you think that these men are to be killed, you will deter us from bringing any such matter to judgment through our agency. When this becomes known, they will run riot to our destruction with more unrestrained audacity, the necessity being imposed upon us that we choose even to be killed by them rather than bring them before your tribunals to be killed.

C. III. Mali sunt prohibendi a malo, et cogendi ad bonum.

Idem Donato. [epist. CXXVII.] Unum solum est, quod in tua iusticia pertimescimus, ne forte (quoniam quicquid mali contra Christianam societatem ab hominibus inpiis ingratisque conmittitur, profecto grauius est et atrocius, quam si in alios conmittatur) tu quoque pro inmanitate facinorum, ac non pocius pro lenitatis Christianae consideratione censeas cohercendum. Quod te per Iesum Christum ne facias obsecramus. Et paulo post: §. 1. Ex occasione terribilium iudicum et legum, ne eterni iudicii penas luant, corrigi eos cupimus, non necari; nec disciplinam circa eos negligi uolumus, nec suppliciis, quibus sunt digni, coherceri. Sic ergo eorum peccata conpesce, ut sint quos peniteat peccauisse. Et paulo post: §. 2. Proinde si occidendos in his uiros putatis, deterrebitis nos, ne per nostram operam iudicium tale quid perueniat. Quo conperto in nostram perniciem licentiori audacia grassabuntur, necessitate nobis inpacta, ut etiam occidi ab eis eligamus, quam eos occidendos uestris iudiciis inferamus.

C. IV. The peace of the church is assisted by the severity of princes.

The same, [to Macedonius, epistle 54]. Your severity, by whose ministry our peace too is assisted, is useful. Our intercession, by whose ministry your severity too is moderated, is useful. Let it not displease you that you are petitioned by the good, because neither does it displease us that you are feared by the evil. § 1. For the Apostle Paul frightened the iniquity of men not only by the future judgment, but also by your present secular powers, asserting that even they pertain to the dispensation of divine providence. “Let every soul,” he says, “be subject to higher powers, etc.” These words of the Apostle show the usefulness of your severity. Consequently, just as those who fear were commanded to owe love to those who terrify them, so those who terrify were commanded to owe love to those who fear them. Let nothing be done from the desire to harm, but all things from the charity of taking counsel, and let nothing be done brutally, nothing inhumanly. Let the vengeance of the examiner be feared in such a way that the piety of the intercessor is not despised, because both in punishing and in pardoning this alone is done well: that the life of men be corrected. But if there is such great perversity and impiety that the remedies neither of discipline nor of pardon support the correction of the matter, nevertheless, from every intention and conscience, which God beholds, whether by severity or by mildness, nothing but the office of love is fulfilled.

C. IV. Quies ecclesiae principum seueritate iuuatur.

Idem. [Macedonio, epist. LIV.] Prodest seueritas uestra, cuius ministerio quies adiuuatur et nostra. Prodest intercessio nostra, cuius ministerio seueritas temperatur et uestra. Non uobis displiceat, quod rogamini a bonis, quia nec nobis, quod timemini a malis. §. 1. Nam hominum iniquitatem etiam apostolus Paulus non tantum iudicio futuro, uerum etiam de presentibus uestris secularibus potestatibus terruit, asserens et ipsas ad dispensationem diuinae prouidentiae pertinere. "Omnis," inquit, "anima potestatibus sublimioribus subdita sit, etc." Hec uerba Apostoli utilitatem uestrae seueritatis ostendunt. Proinde sicut dilectionem iussi sunt terrentibus debere qui timent, ita dilectionem iussi sunt timentibus debere qui terrent. Nichil nocendi cupiditate fiat, sed omnia consulendi karitate, et nichil fiat inmaniter, nichil inhumaniter. Ita formidetur ulcio cognitoris, ut nec intercessoris religio contempnatur, quia et plectendo, et ignoscendo hoc solum bene agitur, ut uita hominum corrigatur. Quod si tanta est peruersitas et inpietas, ut corrigendae rei nec disciplinae, nec ueniae remedia suffragentur ab omni tamen intentione atque conscientia, quam Deus cernit, siue seueritate siue lenitate, non nisi offitium dilectionis inpletur.

[PALEA. C. V.

Nevertheless, this is to be understood of those whom present punishments change for the better, not of those who are obstinate in evil, who, if they lived forever, would sin forever, whose punishment begins here and will endure eternally.]

[PALEA. C. V.

Hoc tamen intelligendum est de illis, quos presentia supplicia in melius conmutant, non de illis, qui obstinati sunt in malo, qui, si semper uiuerent, semper peccarent, quorum pena hic incipit, et in eternum durabit.]

C. VI. Certain persons are punished at present lest they be scourged eternally.

Likewise Jerome on the Prophet Nahum, [at c. 1]. What, then, he says, do you devise against the Lord? He who created the world will also bring about its consummation. What if he seems to you cruel and harsh and bloodthirsty because in the flood he destroyed the human race, rained fire and sulfur upon Sodom and Gomorrah, submerged the Egyptians beneath the waves, and laid low the corpses of the Israelites in the wilderness? Know that he rendered punishments at present for this reason, that he might not punish eternally. Surely either the things the Prophets speak are true or they are false. If the things that they appear to say concerning his severity are true, they themselves said: “The Lord will not judge twice for the same thing in tribulation”; but if they are false, then that which is said, “A double tribulation will not arise,” is also false; therefore, the cruelty written in the law is also false. But if it is true—and they will not be able to deny it, since the Prophet says, “God will not judge twice for the same thing in tribulation”—then those who were punished will not be punished afterward. But if they will be punished afterward, Scripture lies, which it is impious to say. Therefore, those who perished in the flood, the Sodomites, the Egyptians, and the Israelites in the wilderness received their evils in their life. § 1. Someone may ask here: if a faithful man caught in adultery is beheaded, what happens to him afterward? For either he will be punished, and that which is said—“He will not judge twice for the same thing in tribulation”—is false; or he will not be punished, and it is to be wished for adulterers that by a brief and swift punishment at present they escape eternal torments. To this we shall answer that God, just as he knows the measures of all things, so also knows the measures of punishments; that he is not forestalled by the sentence of a judge; that the power thereafter to exercise punishment upon a sinner is not taken away from him; and that a great sin is expiated by great and long-lasting torments. But if anyone has been punished like that man in the law who had cursed the Israelites and the man who had gathered wood on the Sabbath, such persons are not punished afterward, because a slight fault has been compensated by present punishment.

C. VI. In presentiarum nonnulli puniuntur, ne in eternum flagellentur.

Item Ieronimus in Naum. [Prophetam, ad c. 1.] Quid ergo, ait, contra Dominum cogitatis? Ipse, qui creauit mundum, et eius consummationem faciet. Quid si uobis uidetur crudelis et rigidus et cruentus, quod in diluuio genus deleuit humanum, super Sodomam et Gomorram ignem et sulphurem pluit, Egyptios submersit fluctibus, Israelitarum cadauera prostrauit in eremo, scitote, eum ideo ad presens reddidisse supplicia, ne in eternum puniret. Certe aut uera sunt que Prophetae loquuntur, aut falsa. Si uera sunt que de seueritate eius uidentur dicere, ipsi dixerunt: "Non iudicabit Dominus bis in id ipsum in tribulatione;" sin autem falsa sunt, et falsum est quod dicitur: "Non consurget duplex tribulatio:" falsa est ergo et crudelitas, que in lege scripta est. Quod si uerum est, et negare non poterunt, dicente Propheta: "Non iudicabit Deus bis in id ipsum in tribulatione:" ergo qui puniti sunt postea non punientur. Si autem postea punientur, scriptura mentitur, quod nefas est dicere. Receperunt ergo et qui in diluuio perierant, et Sodomitae, et Egyptii, et Israelitae in solitudine mala sua in uita sua. §. 1. Querat hic aliquis, si fidelis deprehensus in adulterio decolletur, quid de eo postea fiat? Aut enim punietur, et falsum est hoc, quod dicitur: "Non iudicabit Deus bis in id ipsum in tribulatione," aut non punietur, et optandum est adulteris, ut in presentiarum breui et cita pena cruciatus frustrentur eternos. Ad quod respondebimus, Deum, ut omnium rerum, ita suppliciorum quoque scire mensuras, et non preueniri sententia iudicis, nec illi in peccatorem exercendae dehinc penae auferri potestatem, et magnum peccatum magnis diuturnisque cruciatibus lui. Si quis autem punitus sit ut ille in lege, qui Israelitis maledixerat, et qui in sabbato ligna collegerat, tales postea non puniri, quia culpa leuis presenti supplicio conpensata sit.

C. VII. Those guilty of blood are to be defended by the church.

Likewise Gregory. Let the church defend those guilty of blood, lest she become a participant in the shedding of blood. PART II. GRATIAN. From this it appears that the evil are to be restrained by scourges, not punished by truncation of limbs or temporal death. § 1. But that which the Lord says to Moses is objected: “You shall not suffer sorcerers to live”; likewise: “He who shall have intercourse with a beast shall die the death.” One marked by the crime of adultery or blasphemy is also ordered to be stoned without mercy. Likewise Moses, who had received the law, punished the worshipers of the idol by death. Samuel also cut the exceedingly fat King Agag into pieces. Phinehas too pierced with a sword a Jew having intercourse with a Midianite woman, and this was reckoned to him as justice. Similarly, certain persons in the Old Testament are found to have slaughtered the evil, and they are called not transgressors of the law but defenders. § 2. Therefore, by that precept each person is prohibited from being armed by his own authority for the killing of anyone, not from handing the guilty over to death by the command of the law. For he who, exercising public power, kills the evil by the command of the law itself is held neither a transgressor of that precept nor an alien from the heavenly fatherland. Hence Augustine to Publicola, [epistle 154]:

> Item Gregorius. Reos sanguinis defendat ecclesia, ne effusione sanguinis particeps fiat. II. Pars. Gratian. Hinc apparet, quod mali flagellis sunt cohercendi, non membrorum truncatione uel temporali morte plectendi. §. 1. Sed obicitur illud, quod ait Dominus ad Moysen: "Maleficos non patieris uiuere;" item: "Qui coierit cum iumento morte moriatur." Adulterii etiam uel blasphemiae crimine notatus inmisericorditer lapidari iubetur. Item Moyses, qui legem acceperat, cultores ydoli morte puniuit. Samuel etiam Agag regem pinguissimum in frusta conscidit. Finees quoque Iudeum cum Madianita coeuntem gladio transfixit, quod ei reputatum est ad iusticiam. Similiter nonnulli in ueteri testamento inueniuntur malos trucidasse, nec transgressores legis, sed defensores appellantur. §. 2. Prohibetur ergo illo precepto quisque sua auctoritate in necem alicuius armari, non legis inperio reos morti tradere. Qui enim, publica potestate functus, ipsius legis inperio malos perimit, nec illius precepti transgressor, nec a celesti patria alienus habetur. Unde Augustinus ad Publicolam: [epist. CLIV.]

C. VIII. It is not a sin to kill a man in the discharge of an office.

Concerning killing men lest someone be killed by them, the counsel does not please me, unless perhaps he is a soldier or is bound by a public function, so that he does this not for himself but for others or for the city in which he too is, having received lawful power, if it befits his person. But perhaps something is furnished even to those who are repelled by some terror lest they do evil. Now it was said, “Let us not resist evil,” lest vengeance, which feeds the mind upon another’s evil, delight us—not so that we neglect the correction of men. Hence neither is he guilty of another’s death who, after he has drawn the circuit of walls around his possession, has someone perish when struck by their use. Nor is a Christian guilty if his ox kills someone by goring, or his horse by kicking; nor for that reason ought Christians’ oxen not to have horns, or a horse hooves, or dogs teeth. Or indeed, since the Apostle Paul took sufficient action that the ambush prepared for him by certain abandoned men be brought to the tribune’s notice, and on this account received armed escorts, if those criminal men had fallen upon them, would Paul have acknowledged his own guilt in the shedding of their blood? Far be it that the things we do or possess for a good and lawful purpose should be imputed to us if, through them, something evil should happen to anyone contrary to our will. Otherwise neither are domestic and agricultural iron tools to be possessed, lest someone kill either himself or another with them; nor trees to be planted, lest someone hang himself from one; nor a window to be made, lest someone cast himself down through it. And why should I recount more, when I could not finish by recounting them? What is there in the good and lawful use of men from which destruction cannot be inflicted? PART III. GRATIAN. But to kill himself is permitted to no one by any authority of law. Hence Augustine in Book I of The City of God, [c. 17]:

C. VIII. Ex offitio non est peccatum hominem occidere.

De occidendis hominibus, ne ab eis quisque occidatur, non michi placet consilium, nisi forte sit miles, aut publica functione teneatur, ut non pro se hoc faciat, sed pro aliis, uel pro ciuitate, ubi etiam ipse est, accepta legitima potestate, si eius congruit personae. Qui uero repelluntur aliquo terrore, ne mala faciant, etiam ipsis fortasse aliquid prestatur. Hinc autem dictum est: "Non resistamus malo," ne nos uindicta delectet, que alieno malo animum pascit, non ut correctionem hominum negligamus. Unde nec reus est mortis alienae, qui cum suae possessioni murorum ambitum circumduxerit, aliquis ex ipsorum usu percussus interiit. Neque enim reus est Christianus, si bos eius aliquem feriendo, uel equus calcem iaciendo aliquem occidat, aut ideo non debent Christianorum boues habere cornua, aut equus ungulas, aut dentes canes. Aut uero, quoniam apostolus Paulus satis egit, ut in tribuni noticiam perferretur, insidias sibi a quibusdam perditis preparatas, et ob hoc deductores accepit armatos, si in illos scelerati homines incidissent, Paulus in effusione sanguinis eorum suum crimen agnosceret? Absit, ut ea, que propter bonum ac licitum facimus aut habemus, siquid per hec preter nostram uoluntatem cuiquam mali acciderit, nobis inputetur. Alioquin nec ferramenta domestica et agrestia sunt habenda, ne quis ex eis uel se uel alterum interimat, nec arbores plantandae, ne quis se inde suspendat, nec fenestra facienda, ne per hanc se quisquam precipitet. Et quid plura conmemorem, cum ea conmemorando finire non possem? Quid est in usu hominum bono ac licito, unde non possit inrogari pernicies? III. Pars. Gratian. Se ipsum autem perimere nulla legis auctoritate alicui permittitur. Unde Augustinus libro I. de ciuitate Dei: [c. 17.]

C. IX. Those who waged wars with God as author in no way transgressed the precept not to kill.

If by private power it is not lawful for anyone to kill an innocent man, for whose killing no law grants license, assuredly he who kills himself is also a homicide, and by so much does he become more guilty when he has killed himself as he was more innocent in that cause on account of which he thought he ought to be killed. For if we deservedly detest what Judas did, and Truth judges that, when he hanged himself with a noose, he increased rather than expiated the commission of that criminal betrayal—since, by despairing of God's mercy and repenting ruinously, he left himself no place for saving penance—how much more ought he who has nothing in himself to punish by such a penalty abstain from his own slaughter? For when Judas killed himself, he killed a criminal man, and yet he ended this life guilty not only of Christ's death but also of his own, because, although on account of a crime, he was nevertheless killed by another crime of his own. § 1. But why should a man who did nothing evil do evil to himself, and by killing himself kill an innocent man lest he suffer another man who is guilty, and perpetrate his own sin upon himself lest another's be perpetrated upon him? Likewise, [c. 20]: § 2. In the holy and canonical books it can nowhere be found divinely commanded or permitted to us that we inflict death upon ourselves, either for the sake of attaining immortality itself or for the sake of avoiding or curing anything. For it is to be understood that we too were prohibited where the law says, "You shall not kill," especially because it did not add "your neighbor," as when it prohibited false testimony: "You shall not speak," it says, "false testimony against your neighbor." Yet if anyone should speak false testimony against himself, he should not on that account think himself alien from this crime, since he received the rule for loving his neighbor from himself, seeing that it is written: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself." Moreover, if he who falsely confesses concerning himself is no less guilty of false testimony than if he did this against his neighbor, although in that precept by which false testimony is prohibited it is prohibited against one's neighbor and it can appear to those who do not understand rightly that it is not prohibited for each person to stand forth as a false witness against himself, how much more is it to be understood that it is not lawful for a man to kill himself, since in that which is written, "You shall not kill," with nothing added thereafter, assuredly he himself to whom the command is given is not understood to be excepted? Likewise: § 3. "You shall not kill"—neither yourself nor another. For he who kills himself kills nothing other than a man. § 4. But the same divine authority itself made certain exceptions, though with these excepted whom God commands to be killed, whether by a law given or by an express command to a person for a time; or he himself who kills owes ministry to the one commanding, as a sword is a support to the one using it. And therefore those who waged wars with God as author, or who, bearing the person of public power, punished criminals by death according to the right of law—that is, the command of most just reason—in no way acted against that precept which was said: "You shall not kill." And Abraham not only was not blamed for the crime of cruelty, but was even praised in the name of piety, because he willed to kill his son by no means criminally but obediently. And it is deservedly asked whether it is to be held as done by God's command that Jephthah killed his daughter who met her father, when he had vowed that he would sacrifice whatever first met him when he returned victorious from battle. Nor is Samson otherwise excused because he crushed himself together with his enemies by the fall of the house, unless because the Spirit who worked miracles through him had secretly commanded this. Therefore, excepting those whom either a just law generally or God himself, the fountain of justice, specially commands to be killed, whoever kills a man, whether himself or anyone else, is bound by the crime of homicide. Likewise, [c. 26]: § 5. This we say, this we affirm, this we approve in every way: that no one ought to inflict voluntary death upon himself, as though by fleeing temporal troubles, lest he fall into perpetual ones; no one on account of another's sins, lest by this very thing he begin to possess his own most grave sin; no one on account of his own past sins, for which there is greater need in this life so that they may be healed by repenting; no one as though from desire for a better life, which is hoped for after death, because a better life after death does not receive one guilty of his own death.

C. IX. Qui Deo auctore bella gesserunt, preceptum non occidendi nequaquam transgressi sunt.

Si non licet priuata potestate alicui hominem occidere innocentem, cuius occidendi licentiam lex nulla concedit, profecto etiam qui se ipsum occidit homicida est, et tanto fit nocentior, cum se occiderit, quanto innocentior in ea causa fuit, qua se occidendum putauit. Nam si Iudae merito factum detestamur, eumque ueritas iudicat, cum se laqueo suspendit, sceleratae illius traditionis auxisse pocius, quam expiasse conmissum, quoniam, de Dei misericordia desperando exiciabiliter penitens, nullum sibi salubris penitenciae locum reliquit: quanto magis a sua cede se abstinere debet qui tali supplicio quid in se puniat non habet? Iudas enim, cum se occidit, sceleratum hominem occidit, et tamen non solum Christi, uerum etiam suae mortis reus finiuit hanc uitam, quia, licet propter scelus, alio tamen suo scelere occisus est. §. 1. Cur autem homo, qui nichil mali fecit, sibi malefaciat, et se ipsum interficiendo hominem interficiat innocentem, ne alium patiatur nocentem, atque in se perpetret peccatum proprium, ne in eo perpetretur alienum? Item: [c. 20.] §. 2. In sanctis canonicisque libris nobis nusquam diuinitus preceptum permissumue reperiri potest, ut uel ipsius inmortalitatis adipiscendae, uel ipsius cauendi curandiue causa nobismetipsis necem inferamus. Nam et prohibitos nos esse intelligendum est, ubi lex ait: "Non occides," presertim, quia non addidit, proximum tuum, sicut falsum testimonium cum uetaret: "Falsum," inquit, "testimonium non dices aduersus proximum tuum." Nec ideo tamen, si aduersus se ipsum quisquam falsum testimonium dixerit, ab hoc se putauerit crimine alienum, quoniam regulam diligendi proximum a semetipso accepit, quandoquidem scriptum est: "Diliges proximum tuum sicut te ipsum." Porro si falsi testimonii non minus reus est qui de se ipso falsum fatetur, quam si aduersus proximum hoc faceret, cum in eo precepto, quo falsum testimonium prohibetur, aduersus proximum prohibeatur, possitque non recte intelligentibus uideri non esse prohibitum, ut aduersus se ipsum quisque falsus testis assistat: quanto magis intelligendum est, non licere homini se ipsum occidere, cum in eo, quod scriptum est: "Non occides," nichil deinde addito, nec ipse utique, cui precipitur, intelligatur exceptus? Item: §. 3. "Non occides," nec te, nec alterum. Neque enim qui se occidit aliud quam hominem occidit. §. 4. Quasdam uero exceptiones eadem ipsa diuina fecit auctoritas, sed his exceptis, quos Deus occidi iubet, siue data lege, ad personam pro tempore expressa iussione, siue ipse qui occidit, ministerium debet iubenti, sicut gladius amminiculum utenti. Et ideo nequaquam contra hoc preceptum fecerunt, quod dictum est: "Non occides," qui Deo auctore bella gesserunt, aut personam gerentes publicae potestatis secundum ius legis, hoc est iustissimae rationis inperium, sceleratos morte punierunt. Et Abraham non solum non est culpatus crudelitatis crimine, uerum etiam laudatus est nomine pietatis, quod uoluit filium nequaquam scelerate, sed obedienter occidere. Et merito queritur, utrum pro iussu Dei sit habendum, quod Iephte filiam, que patri occurrit, occidit, cum id uouisset se inmolaturum, quod ei uictori redeunti de prelio primitus occurrisset. Nec Samson aliter excusatur, quod se ipsum cum hostibus ruina domus obpressit, nisi quia Spiritus latenter hoc iusserat, qui per illum miracula faciebat. His igitur exceptis, quos uel lex iusta generaliter, uel ipse fons iustitiae Deus specialiter iubet occidi, quisquis hominem uel se ipsum uel quemlibet occiderit, homicidii crimine innectitur. Item: [c. 26.] §. 5. Hoc dicimus, hoc asserimus, hoc modis omnibus approbamus, neminem spontaneam mortem sibi inferre debere, uelut fugiendo molestias temporales, ne incidat in perpetuas; neminem propter aliena peccata, ne hoc ipso incipiat habere grauissimum proprium; neminem propter sua preterita peccata, que magis in hac uita opus est, ut possint penitendo sanari; neminem uelut desiderio melioris uitae, que post mortem speratur, quia reum suae mortis melior post mortem uita non suscipit.

C. X. It is lawful for no one to lay hands upon himself.

The same, Against Petilian, [Book II, c. 49]. You said: "The betrayer perished by a noose; he left the noose to such men." This does not pertain to us at all. For we do not venerate under the name of martyrs those who bound their own necks.

C. X. Nemini licet sibi manus inicere.

Idem contra Petilianum. [lib. II. c. 49.] Tu dixisti, laqueo traditor periit, laqueum talibus dereliquit. Hoc ad nos non pertinet omnino. Neque enim ueneramur nomine martirum eos, qui sibi collum ligauerunt.

C. XI. On the same matter.

Likewise Jerome on the Prophet Jonah, [at c. 1, not far from the end]. It is not ours to seize death, but willingly to receive it when inflicted by others. Hence also in persecutions it is not lawful to perish by one's own hand—apart from a case where chastity is endangered—but to submit one's neck to the striker.

C. XI. De eodem.

Item Ieronimus in Iona Propheta. [ad cap. I., non longe a fine.] Non est nostrum mortem arripere, sed illatam ab aliis libenter excipere. Unde et in persecutionibus non licet propria perire manu (absque eo, ubi castitas periclitatur), sed percutienti colla submittere.

C. XII. No prayer is to be made for those who kill themselves.

Likewise from the Council of Braga, [I, c. 34]. It was resolved that for those who voluntarily inflict death upon themselves either by iron, or by poison, or by a fall, or by hanging, or in any manner, no commemoration be made for them in the oblation, nor are their corpses to be conducted to burial with psalms. For many claim this for themselves through ignorance. It was likewise resolved that this be done concerning those who die for their crimes. GRATIAN. "Impenitent" is to be understood. The same in the same Book I:

> C. XII. Nulla fiat pro illis oratio, qui se ipsos interficiunt.
> Item ex Concilio Bracarensi. [I., c. 34.] Placuit, ut hii qui sibi ipsis uoluntarie aut per ferrum, aut per uenenum, aut per precipitium aut per suspendium, uel quolibet modo inferunt mortem, nulla pro illis in oblatione conmemoratio fiat, neque cum psalmis ad sepulturam eorum cadauera deducantur. Multi enim sibi hoc per ignorantiam usurpant. Similiter et de his placuit fieri, qui pro suis sceleribus moriuntur. Gratian. Inpenitentes subaudiatur. Idem in eodem libro I:

C. XIII. A soldier who kills a man in obedience to the power is not guilty of homicide.

PART IV. When a soldier, obeying the power under which he has lawfully been established, kills a man, he is guilty of homicide under no law of his city; rather, if he does not do it, he is guilty of having deserted and despised the command. But if he had done this of his own accord and authority, he would have incurred the crime of shed human blood. And so, from the same source from which he is punished if he does it without being ordered, he will be punished if he does not do it when ordered.

> IV. Pars. Miles, cum obediens potestati, sub qua legitime constitutus est, hominem occidit, nulla ciuitatis suae lege reus est homicidii; immo, nisi fecerit, reus inperii deserti atque contempti est. Quod si sua sponte atque auctoritate fecisset, crimen effusi humani sanguinis incidisset. Itaque unde punitur, si fecerit iniussus, inde punietur, si non fecerit iussus.

C. XIV. He who voluntarily kills those whom a judge orders to be killed is a homicide.

Likewise in the Questions on Exodus, [question 39, at c. 11]. When a judge's minister kills him whom the judge ordered to be killed, assuredly, if he does it voluntarily, he is a homicide, even if he kills him whom he knows ought to have been killed by the judge.

> C. XIV. Homicida est qui sponte occidit quos iudex iubet occidi.
> Item in questionibus Exodi. [quest. XXXIX. ad c. 11.] Cum minister iudicis occidit eum, quem iudex iussit occidi, profecto, si id sponte facit, homicida est, etiamsi eum occidat, quem scit a iudice debuisse occidi.

C. XV. Just as obedience is rightly praised, so he who usurps things not granted to him is reproved.

The same, [Book XXII Against Faustus, c. 73]. The eternal law has placed certain things in a kind of middle position in such a way that boldness is deservedly reproved in usurping them, while obedience is rightly praised in executing them. If Abraham had been moved of his own accord in killing his son, he would be held execrable; but by complying with God's command, he performed service.

> C. XV. Sicut iure laudatur obedientia, ita reprehenditur qui sibi non concessa usurpat.
> Idem. [lib. XXII. contra Faustum, c. 73.] Lex eterna ita medio quodam posuit loco aliqua, ut in eis usurpandis merito reprehendatur audacia, in exequendis iure laudetur obedientia. Abraham, si spontaneus motus fuisset in occidendo filio, execrabilis haberetur: at iubenti Deo obsecundans famulatus est.

C. XVI. The offices of vengeance can be fulfilled with a good intention.

The same in the Questions on Matthew, [Book I, question 10]. The good can fulfill the offices of vengeance with a good intention, as can a judge, as can the law.

> C. XVI. Bono animo offitia uindictae possunt inpleri.
> Idem in questionibus super Matheum. [lib. I. qu. 10.] Offitia uindictae possunt inplere boni bono animo, quomodo iudex, quomodo lex.

C. XVII. He who prosecutes a crime so that he may free a man is bound not by the fellowship of iniquity but of humanity.

The same to Macedonius, [epistle 54]. He who is a prosecutor of a crime in order that he may be a liberator of a man is bound by the fellowship not of iniquity but rather of humanity.

> C. XVII. Non est iniquus, sed humanus, qui crimen persequitur, ut hominem liberet.
> Idem ad Macedonium. [epist. LIV.] Non est iniquitatis, sed pocius humanitatis societate deuinctus, qui propterea est criminis persecutor, ut sit hominis liberator.

C. XVIII. Why royal power and legal torments were instituted.

The same, [in the same epistle]. Not in vain were instituted the power of the king, the right of the examiner, the executioner's claws, the soldier's weapons, the discipline of the ruler, and even the severity of a good father; let all these things have their measures, causes, reasons, and uses. When these things are feared, both the evil are restrained and the good live in peace among the evil.

> C. XVIII. Quare sint instituta regia potestas et legalia tormenta.
> Idem. [in eadem epistola] Non frustra sunt instituta potestas regis, ius cognitoris, ungulae carnificis, arma militis, disciplina dominantis, seueritas etiam boni patris; habeant ista omnia modos suos, causas, rationes, utilitates. Hec cum timentur, et mali cohercentur, et boni quieti inter malos uiuunt.

C. XIX. Sometimes he who furnishes the cause of death sins more than the one who kills.

Likewise. When a man is killed by a man, it makes a great difference whether it is done from a desire to harm or unjustly to take something away—as it is done by an enemy, as by a robber—or in the order of avenging or obeying—as by a judge, as by an executioner—or from the necessity of escaping or giving aid, as a robber is killed by a traveler, an enemy by a soldier. § 1. And sometimes he who was the cause of death is more at fault than the one who kills, as if someone should deceive his surety and the latter should pay the lawful penalty for him. Yet not everyone who is the cause of another's death is guilty. For example, what if someone seeks fornication and kills himself if he does not obtain it? What if a son, fearing the pious blows of his father, perishes by a fall? What if another, because a man has been freed or lest another be freed, inflicts death upon himself? Surely on account of these causes of others' deaths one must neither consent to crime, nor abolish even paternal vengeance for sin, which is done not from zeal for harming but for correcting, nor restrain works of mercy? When these things happen, we owe those persons human sorrow; we should not, on account of those things, restrain the will to do right lest they happen.

C. XIX. Nonnumquam pocius peccat qui causam mortis prebet, quam ille, qui occidit.

Item. Cum homo ab homine occiditur, multum distat, utrum fiat nocendi cupiditate, uel iniuste aliquid auferendi (sicut fit ab inimico, sicut a latrone), an ulciscendi uel obediendi ordine (sicut a iudice, sicut a carnifice), uel euadendi uel subueniendi necessitate, sicut interimitur latro a uiatore, hostis a milite. §. 1. Et aliquando qui causa mortis fuit pocius in culpa est, quam ille, qui occidit; uelut si quispiam decipiat fideiussorem suum, atque ille pro isto supplicium legitimum luat. Nec tamen omnis, qui causa alienae mortis est, reus est. Velut si stuprum quisquam petat, seseque, si non inpetrauerit, interimat? Quid si filius timens patris pia uerbera precipitio pereat? Quid si alius homine liberato, uel ne alius liberetur, sibi ipsi mortem inferat? Num propter istas alienarum mortium causas aut sceleri consentiendum est, aut uindicta peccati, que non fit nocendi, sed corrigendi studio, etiam paterna tollenda, aut opera misericordiae cohibenda sunt? Hec cum accidunt, debemus eis humanum dolorem, non propter illa, ne accidant, recte factorum reprimamus uoluntatem.

C. XX. What priests are not able to accomplish by teaching, let the power exact by the terror of discipline.

Likewise Isidore, [Book III of the Sentences on the Highest Good, c. 53]. Secular princes sometimes hold the summits of power attained within the church so that through that power they may fortify ecclesiastical discipline. Otherwise powers would not be necessary within the church, except so that what priests are not able to accomplish through the word of teaching the power may command through the terror of discipline. Often the heavenly kingdom profits through an earthly kingdom, so that those who, placed within the church, act against faith and discipline may be crushed by the rigor of princes, and the princely power may impose upon the necks of the proud that very discipline which the usefulness of the church is not able to exercise, and may impart the strength of power so that it may merit veneration. Let secular princes know that they will owe an account to God on account of the church that they undertake to protect for Christ. For whether the peace and discipline of the church is increased through faithful princes or dissolved, he who entrusted his church to their power exacts an account from them.

C. XX. Quod sacerdotes efficere docendo non ualent; disciplinae terrore potestas extorqueat.

Item Ysidorus. [lib. III. Sent. de summo bono, c. 53.] Principes seculi nonnumquam intra ecclesiam potestatis adeptae culmina tenent, ut per eandem potestatem disciplinam ecclesiasticam muniant. Ceterum intra ecclesiam potestates necessariae non essent, nisi ut quod non preualent sacerdotes efficere per doctrinae sermonem potestas hoc inperet per disciplinae terrorem. Sepe per regnum terrenum celeste regnum proficit, ut qui intra ecclesiam positi contra fidem et disciplinam agunt rigore principum conterantur, ipsamque disciplinam, quam ecclesiae utilitas exercere non preualet, ceruicibus superborum potestas principalis inponat, et, ut uenerationem mereatur, uirtutem potestatis inpertiatur. Cognoscant principes seculi Deo se debere esse rationem reddituros propter ecclesiam, quam Christo tuendam suscipiunt. Nam siue augeatur pax et disciplina ecclesiae per fideles principes, siue soluatur, ille ab eis rationem exigit, qui eorum potestati suam ecclesiam credidit.

C. XXI. Let both royal and priestly authority defend the things that pertain to divine confession.

Likewise Pope Leo, [epistle 29 to the Empress Pulcheria]. All affairs cannot be secure otherwise unless both royal and priestly authority defend the things that pertain to divine confession.

> C. XXI. Et regia, et sacerdotalis defendant auctoritas que ad diuinam confessionem pertinent.
> Item Leo Papa. [epist. XXIX. ad Pulcheriam Augustam.] Res omnes aliter tutae esse non possunt, nisi que ad diuinam confessionem pertinent, et regia et sacerdotalis defendat auctoritas.

C. XXII. Let secular power correct those whom priestly admonition cannot correct.

Likewise from the Third Council of Tours, [c. 41]. Many incestuous persons, parricides, and homicides are found among us; but some of them are unwilling to lend an ear to the admonitions of priests, wishing to persist in their former crimes. Those who were unwilling to return through the saving admonitions of priests ought to be restrained from so depraved a custom through the discipline of secular power.

> C. XXII. Sacerdotalis ammonitio quos corrigere non ualet secularis potentia corrigat.
> Item ex Concilio Turonensi III. [c. 41.] Incestuosi, patricidae, homicidae multi apud nos reperiuntur; sed aliqui ex illis sacerdotum nolunt ammonitionibus aurem accommodare, uolentes in pristinis perdurare criminibus, quos oportet per secularis potentiae disciplinam a tam praua consuetudine coherceri, qui per salutifera sacerdotum monita noluerunt reuerti.

C. XXIII. To restrain the evil and relieve the good is the office of kings.

Likewise Jerome on Jeremiah, [at c. 22]. It is proper to kings to execute judgment and justice, and to free from the hand of false accusers those oppressed by force, and to furnish aid to the stranger, the orphan, and the widow, who are more easily oppressed by the powerful. And in order that he might instill in them a greater care for the precepts of God, he added: "Do not afflict them," so that you not only rescue them, but not even suffer them, through your connivance, to come to be afflicted by others; "and do not shed innocent blood in this place." For homicides and sacrilegious persons, etc. And after a few things: "If," he says, "you do these things, O kings of Judah, you will hold your former power." PART V. GRATIAN. But faithfulness and reverence ought to be preserved toward princes and powers themselves, and whoever does not exhibit them will not be able to find rewards with God. Hence the same Jerome, [in the epistle to Titus, c. 2, at the verse, "Servants, to their masters"]:

> C. XXIII. Malos conprimere, et bonos subleuare regum offitium est.
> Item Ieronimus super Hieremiam. [ad c. 22.] Regum est proprium, facere iudicium atque iusticiam, et liberare de manu calumpniantium ui obpressos, et peregrino pupilloque et uiduae, qui facilius obprimuntur a potentibus, prebere auxilium. Et, ut curam eis preceptorum Dei maiorem iniceret, intulit: "Nolite contristare," ut non solum eripiatis, sed ne patiamini quidem ut uestra conniuentia eueniat eos ab aliis contristari, "et sanguinem innocentem non effundatis in loco isto." Homicidas enim, et sacrilegos etc. Et post pauca: "Si," inquit, "hec feceritis, o reges Iuda, tenebitis pristinam potestatem." V. Pars. Gratian. Ipsis autem principibus et potestatibus fidem et reuerentiam seruari oportet, quam qui non exhibuerit apud Deum premia inuenire non poterit. Unde idem Ieronimus: [in epist. ad Titum, c. 2. ad uers. Serui dominis]

C. XXIV. He who disdains to preserve faithfulness and reverence toward the powers is defrauded of eternal reward.

If they shall have been faithful to carnal masters in the least things, greater things will begin to be entrusted to them before the Lord. But he adorns the Lord's doctrine who does the things that are fitting to his condition, just as, conversely, he confounds it who is not subject in all things, whose condition displeases him, who, as a contradictor and defrauder, shows good faith in nothing. For how can he be faithful in the substance of God who was not able to exhibit faithfulness to a carnal master?

> Si apud dominos carnales in minimis fideles fuerint, incipient eis apud Dominum maiora conmitti. Ornat autem doctrinam Domini qui ea, que condicioni suae apta sunt, facit, ut e diuerso confundit eam qui non est subiectus in omnibus, cui condicio sua displicet, qui contradictor atque fraudator in nullo bonam fidem ostendit. Quomodo enim potest fidelis esse in substantia Dei qui carnali domino fidem exhibere non potuit?

C. XXV. Military discipline preserves all things for the king.

Likewise Ambrose in Book I On the Patriarchs, [that is, On Abraham, c. 3]. Someone may say: since Abraham himself conquered, how does he say to the king of the Sodomites, "I shall take nothing from you," when the spoil assuredly was in the power of the victor? He teaches military discipline: that all things be preserved for the king. To be sure, he asserts that a share of the profit was to be bestowed upon those who had perhaps been joined with him in aid, as the wages of labor. And therefore, since he did not seek a reward for himself from man, he received it from God, as we read it written that after these words the word of the Lord came to Abraham in a vision, saying: "Do not fear, Abraham; I shall protect you, and your reward will be exceedingly great." PART VI. GRATIAN. Moreover, just as we are compelled to exhibit faithfulness and reverence to princes and powers, so the necessity of defending churches lies upon the administrators of secular dignities. But if they disdain to do this, they are to be repelled from communion. Hence John VIII:

> C. XXV. Militaris disciplina regi omnia seruat.
> Item Ambrosius in libro I. de Patriarchis. [id est de Abraham cap. 3.] Dicat aliquis, cum ipse uicerit, quomodo dicit Abraham ad regem Sodomorum: "Nichil sumam abs te," cum preda fuerit utique in potestate uictoris? Docet militarem disciplinam, ut regi seruentur omnia. Sane his, qui secum fuissent in adiumentum fortasse sociati, partem emolumenti tribuendam asserit tamquam mercedem laboris. Ideoque, quoniam sibi mercedem ab homine non quesiuit, a Deo accepit, sicut legimus scriptum, quia post hec uerba factum est uerbum Domini ad Abraham in uisu, dicens: "Noli timere Abraham; ego protegam te, et merces tua magna erit ualde." VI. Pars. Gratian. Preterea, sicut principibus et potestatibus fidem et reuerentiam exhibere cogimur, ita secularium dignitatum amministratoribus defendendarum ecclesiarum necessitas incumbit. Quod si facere contempserint, a communione sunt repellendi. Unde Iohannes VIII.:

C. XXVI. Those who act in positions of dignity ought to hear the complaints of churches more attentively.

Assuredly, the administrators of secular dignities, who without doubt ought to have been established for the protection of churches, the protection of orphans and widows, and the restraint of the rapacious, whenever they shall have been approached by bishops and ecclesiastical men, are to hear their complaints more attentively, and, according as necessity shall require, examine them without negligence and correct them with diligent zeal. But if, not having the fear of God before their eyes, they shall have been found to neglect this after a second and third admonition, let them know themselves deprived of all communion until worthy satisfaction.

C. XXVI. Querimonias ecclesiarum qui in dignitatibus agunt attentius debent audire.

Amministratores plane secularium dignitatum, qui ad ecclesiarum tuicionem, pupillorum ac uiduarum protectionem, rapaciumque refrenationem constituti esse proculdubio debent, quotiens ab episcopis et ecclesiasticis uiris conuenti fuerint, eorum querimonias attentius audiant, et secundum quod necessitas expetierit absque negligentia examinent et diligenti studio corrigant. Quod si Dei timorem pre oculis non habentes negligere post secundam et tertiam ammonitionem inuenti fuerint, omni communione usque ad condignam se nouerint satisfactionem priuatos.

C. XXVII. The opposing powers are not only men but avengers of the wrath of God.

Likewise Jerome on Joel, [at c. 2]. PART VII. Not only are men ministers and avengers of God's wrath upon those who work evil—whence they do not bear the sword without cause—but also the opposing powers, which are called the fury and wrath of God.

C. XXVII. Contrariae fortitudines non solum homines sunt sed ultrices irae Dei.

Item Ieronimus super Iohel. [ad c. 2.] VII. Pars. Non solum homines ministri sunt et ultores Dei irae his, qui malum operantur (unde non sine causa gladium portant), sed et contrariae fortitudines, que appellantur furor et ira Dei.

C. XXVIII. He who slaughters the cruel is not such as he appears to those suffering.

The same on Isaiah, [at c. 13]. He who slaughters the cruel is not cruel, but appears cruel to those suffering. For a robber suspended upon a gibbet thinks the judge cruel.

C. XXVIII. Qui crudeles iugulat non est talis, qualis patientibus uidetur.

Idem super Ysaiam. [ad c. 13.] Non est crudelis qui crudeles iugulat: sed crudelis patientibus esse uidetur. Nam latro suspensus patibulo crudelem iudicem putat.

C. XXIX. He who strikes the evil in that in which they are evil is a minister of the Lord.

The same on Ezekiel, Book III, [at c. 9]. He who strikes the evil in that in which they are evil, and has instruments of killing so that he may kill the worst, is a minister of the Lord.

C. XXIX. Minister Domini est qui malos percutit in eo, quod mali sunt.

Idem super Ezechielem libro III. [ad c. 9.] Qui malos percutit in eo, quod mali sunt, et habet uasa interfectionis, ut occidat pessimos, minister est Domini.

C. XXX. A judge who binds a man does not commit a crime.

The same on the Epistle to the Galatians, Book II, [at c. 3]. A judge is not the author of a crime by binding men.

C. XXX. Non scelus admittit iudex, qui hominem uincit.

Idem super epistola ad Galathas libro II. [ad c. 3.] Iudex non est auctor sceleris, homines uinciendo.

C. XXXI. He who punishes homicides and sacrilegious persons does not shed blood.

The same on Jeremiah, [Book IV, at c. 22]. To punish homicides, sacrilegious persons, and poisoners is not the shedding of blood but the ministry of the laws.

C. XXXI. Non sanguinem fundit qui homicidas et sacrilegos punit.

Idem super Hieremiam. [lib. IV., ad c. 22.] Homicidas, et sacrilegos, et uenenarios punire non est effusio sanguinis, sed legum ministerium.

C. XXXII. Secular princes ought not to spare the worst persons.

Likewise Cyprian, [in the book On Exhortation to Martyrdom, c. 5]. If you hear in one of the cities that the Lord your God will give you to inhabit there persons saying, "Let us go and serve foreign gods, whom you do not know," by slaying you shall kill all who are in the city by the stroke of the sword, and you shall burn the city with fire, and it shall be without an inhabitant forever; it shall not be rebuilt even now, so that the Lord may be turned away from the indignation of his wrath. And he will give you mercy and have mercy upon you and multiply you, if you hear the voice of the Lord your God and observe his precepts. Mindful of this precept and rigor, Mattathias killed the man who had approached the altar to sacrifice. But if before the advent of Christ these precepts concerning worshiping God and spurning idols were observed, how much more are they to be observed after the advent of Christ, when he, coming, exhorted us not with words alone but also with deeds?

C. XXXII. Principes seculi pessimis parcere non debent.

Item Ciprianus. [libro de exhortatione martyrii, c. 5.] Si audieris in una ex ciuitatibus, quas Dominus Deus tuus dabit tibi inhabitare illic, dicentes: Eamus, et seruiamus Diis alienis, quos non nostis, interficiens necabis omnes, qui sunt in ciuitate, cede gladii, et incendes ciuitatem igni, et erit sine habitaculo in eternum: non reedificabitur etiam nunc, ut auertatur Dominus ab indignatione irae suae. Et dabit misericordiam tibi, et miserebitur tui, et multiplicabit te, si exaudieris uocem Domini Dei tui, et obseruaueris precepta eius. Cuius precepti et uigoris memor Matathias interfecit eum, qui ad aram sacrificaturus accesserat. Quod si ante aduentum Christi circa Deum colendum et ydola spernenda hec precepta sunt seruata, quanto magis post aduentum Christi seruanda sunt, quando ille ueniens non uerbis nos hortatus sit, sed et factis?

C. XXXIII. Unbelief is sometimes chastised by the scourges of tribulations.

Likewise Augustine, Against Petilian, [Book II, c. 83]. "No one is to be compelled to the faith," as you say; but unbelief is accustomed to be chastised through severity—indeed, also through the mercy of God—by the scourges of tribulations. Surely because the best morals are chosen by freedom of the will, are the worst morals therefore not punished by the integrity of the law? But nevertheless a discipline that avenges living evilly is inverted unless a preceding care for living well sets the teaching before it. Thus, therefore, by the laws established against you, you are not compelled to do good, but are prohibited from doing evil. For no one can do good unless he has chosen, unless he has loved, which is in the free will. § 1. When the laws establish something against you, believe that you are being admonished to consider why you suffer these things. If it is on account of justice, truly those men are your persecutors, but you are the blessed who, having suffered persecution on account of justice, will possess the kingdom of heaven. But if it is on account of the iniquity of your schism, then those men are indeed your correctors, while you, like the other guilty persons of diverse crimes who pay penalties under the laws, are assuredly unhappy both in this age and in the future one.

C. XXXIII. Tribulationum flagellis aliquando perfidia castigatur.

Item Augustinus contra Petilianum. [lib. II. c. 83.] Ad fidem nullus est cogendus ut dicitis, sed per seueritatem, immo et per misericordiam Dei tribulationum flagellis solet perfidia castigari. Numquid, quia mores optimi libertate uoluntatis eliguntur, ideo mores pessimi non legis integritate puniuntur? Sed tamen male uiuendi ultrix disciplina prepostera est, nisi cura precedens bene uiuendi doctrinam pretendat. Sic igitur que aduersus uos leges constitutae sunt, non eis benefacere cogimini, sed malefacere prohibemini. Nam benefacere nemo potest, nisi elegerit, nisi amauerit, quod est in libera uoluntate. §. 1. Cum aliquid aduersus uos leges constituunt, admoneri uos credite, ut cogitetis, quare ista patiamini. Si propter iusticiam, reuera illi persecutores uestri sunt, uos autem beati, qui persecutionem passi propter iusticiam possidebitis regnum celorum. Si autem propter iniquitatem scismatis uestri, illi quidem correctores uestri sunt; uos autem, sicut ceteri diuersorum scelerum rei, qui penas legibus pendunt, profecto infelices et in hoc, et in futuro seculo.

C. XXXIV. Injury to the sacraments of Christ is to be avenged by kings.

The same, [in the same book, c. 92]. If Nebuchadnezzar was not for that reason a persecutor, because he most justly avenged the crime committed against holy Daniel, how is the blowing away of the sacraments of Christ to be avenged by kings, if the limbs of a Prophet, because they were placed in danger, merited to be avenged in this way?

C. XXXIV. Iniuria sacramentorum Christi a regibus est uindicanda.

Idem. [in eodem lib., c. 92.] Si propterea persecutor non fuit Nabuchodonosor, quia scelus in sanctum Danielem conmissum uindicauit iustissime: quomodo uindicandum est a regibus, quod Christi sacramenta exsufflantur, si Prophetae membra, quia in periculum missa sunt, sic uindicari meruerunt?

C. XXXV. Those who persecute the evil so that they may flee from evil are most diligent rulers.

The same, [in the book On the Unity of the Church, c. 17]. If holy and canonical Scripture proves that you have erected altars against the church of Christ, that you have been separated by a sacrilegious schism from Christian unity, which is spread throughout the whole world, and that you are adversaries of the body of Christ—which is the church spread throughout the whole world—by rebaptizing, blaspheming, and opposing it as much as you are able, are you not impious and sacrilegious? But those who decree that, for so great a crime, you are to be deterred and restrained by such light admonitions of losses, or by deprivation of places, honors, or money, so that, considering why you suffer these things, you may recognize and flee your sacrilege and be freed from eternal condemnation, are reckoned most diligent rulers and most pious counselors.

C. XXXV. Diligentissimi rectores sunt, qui malos, ut a malo fugiant, persequuntur.

Idem. [in libro de unitate ecclesiae, c. 17.] Si uos contra ecclesiam Christi altaria erexisse, et a Christiana unitate, que toto orbe diffunditur, sacrilego scismate separatos esse, et corpori Christi (quod est ecclesia toto orbe diffusa), rebaptizando, et blasphemando, et quantum potestis obpugnando aduersarios sancta et canonica scriptura conuincit, non inpii atque sacrilegi: illi autem, qui uos pro tanto scelere tam leuiter dampnorum ammonitionibus, uel locorum, uel honorum, uel pecuniae priuatione deterrendos cohercendosque decernunt, ut cogitantes, quare ista patiamini, sacrilegium uestrum cognitum fugiatis, et ab eterna dampnatione liberemini, diligentissimi rectores, et piissimi consultores deputantur.

C. XXXVI. A servant or son is not loved when he is not corrected.

The same on the Epistle of John, [tractate VII]. Do not think that you love your servant when you do not beat him, or that you love your son when you do not give discipline, or that you love your neighbor when you do not correct him. That is not charity but languor. Let charity burn to amend, to correct. If the morals are good, let them delight; if they are evil, let them be amended.

C. XXXVI. Non amatur seruus uel filius, cum non corripitur.

Idem super epistolam Iohannis.[tractatu VII.] Non putes, te tunc amare seruum tuum, quando eum non cedis, aut tunc amare filium tuum, quando non das disciplinam, aut tunc amare uicinum tuum, quando non corrigis eum. Non est ista karitas, sed languor. Ferueat karitas ad emendandum, ad corrigendum. Si sunt boni mores, delectent: si sunt mali, emendentur.

C. XXXVII. It is the office of the innocent person to harm no one and to punish the sinner.

The same on Book [XIX] of The City of God, [c. 16]. It is not a matter of innocence, by sparing, to permit a person to fall into a graver evil. Therefore, it pertains to the office of the innocent person not only to inflict evil upon no one, but also to restrain from sin or to punish sin, so that either he who was previously held in hatred may himself be corrected by experience, or others may be terrified by example.

C. XXXVII. Innocentis offitium est nulli nocere, et peccantem punire.

Idem super libro [XIX.] de ciuitate Dei. [c. 16.] Non est innocentiae parcendo sinere, ut in malum grauius incidatur. Pertinet ergo ad innocentis offitium non solum nemini malum inferre, uerum etiam a peccato cohibere, uel punire peccatum, ut aut ipse, qui prius odio habetur, corrigatur experimento, aut alii terreantur exemplo.

C. XXXVIII. He who spares for the nourishment of vices is not merciful.

The same to Laetarius. He who spares and favors the nourishment of vices lest he afflict the will of those sinning is no more merciful than one who does not wish to snatch a knife from a boy lest he hear him crying, and does not fear lest he grieve over him wounded or dead.

C. XXXVIII. Non est misericors qui uiciis nutriendis parcit.

Idem ad Letarium. Qui uiciis nutriendis parcit et fauet, ne contristet peccantium uoluntatem, tam non est misericors, quam qui non uult cultrum rapere puero, ne audiat plorantem, et non timet, ne uulneratum doleat uel extinctum.

C. XXXIX. Enormous crimes are to be corrected through the judges of the age.

Likewise Haimo on the Epistle to the Romans, [c. 13]. There are certain enormous crimes that are avenged through the judges of the world rather than through prelates and rulers of churches, as when someone kills the apostolic pontiff, a bishop, a presbyter, or a deacon. The kings and princes of the world condemn guilty persons of this kind. Therefore, he who adjudicates such crimes does not bear the sword without cause. For they have been established especially on account of homicides and robbers, so that they may both condemn them and check others by fear of them.

C. XXXIX. Enormia flagicia per seculi iudices corripiantur.

Item Aimo super epistolam ad Romanos. [c. 13.] Sunt quedam enormia flagicia, que pocius per mundi iudices, quam per antistites et rectores ecclesiarum uindicantur, sicut est cum quis interficit Pontificem apostolicum, episcopum, presbiterum, siue diaconum. Huiusmodi reos reges et principes mundi dampnant. Ergo non sine causa gladium portat qui talia scelera diiudicat. Sunt enim maxime constituti propter homicidas, raptores, ut et illos dampnent, et alios suo timore conpescant.

C. XL. Thefts and other crimes are to be restrained by the king.

Likewise Cyprian in the ninth kind of abuse. A king ought to restrain thefts, punish adulteries, destroy the impious from the earth, not suffer parricides and perjurers to live, and not suffer his sons to act impiously.

C. XL. Furta et cetera crimina a rege sunt cohibenda.

Item Ciprianus in nono genere abusionis. Rex debet furta cohibere, adulteria punire, inpios de terra perdere, patricidas et periuros non sinere uiuere, filios suos non sinere inpie agere.

C. XLI. He who kills a guilty person in the discharge of an office does not sin.

Likewise Augustine, On Free Choice, Book I, [c. 4]. If it is homicide to kill a man, one can sometimes kill without sin. For neither a soldier who kills an enemy, nor a judge or his minister who kills a guilty person, nor one from whose hand a weapon perhaps escapes unwillingly and unknowingly, seems to me to sin when they kill a man. But these are not even customarily called homicides. The same in the Questions on Leviticus, [question 68, at c. 19]: § 1. When a man is justly killed, the law kills him, not you.

C. XLI. Non peccat qui ex offitio nocentem interficit.

Item Augustinus de libero arbitrio, libro I. [c. 4.] Si homicidium est hominem occidere, potest occidere aliquando sine peccato. Nam et miles hostem, et iudex uel minister eius nocentem, et cui forte inuito atque inprudenti telum manu fugit, non michi uidentur peccare, cum hominem occidunt. Sed nec etiam homicidae isti appellari solent. Idem in questionibus Leuitici: [quest. 68. ad cap. 19.] §. 1. Cum homo iuste occiditur, lex eum occidit, non tu.

C. XLII. It is not he who compels to good, but he who compels to evil, who persecutes.

Likewise Pope Pelagius. Let not the vain speeches of men delay you, when they say that the church carries out persecution while she either represses the things that are committed or seeks the salvation of souls. The tellers of such a report err. No one persecutes except one who compels to evil. But he who either punishes an evil already done or prohibits it from being done does not persecute, but loves. For if, as they think, no one is either to be reproved from evil or drawn back to good, human and divine laws must necessarily be emptied, which, with justice counseling, establish both punishment for the evil and rewards for the good. But that schism is evil, and that men of this kind ought to be oppressed even through external powers, both the authority of canonical Scripture and the truth of the rules of the fathers teach us. Therefore, whoever has been separated from the apostolic sees is without doubt in schism, and attempts to erect an altar against the universal church. § 1. But let your Glory consider what the canon inserted in the Council of Chalcedon establishes concerning such persons, where, after other things, it says thus: "He who withdrew himself from communion, made an assembly, established an altar, and refused to consent to the bishop when he called, and refused to acquiesce in or obey the same man when he called a first and a second time—let him be condemned altogether, never merit even prayer, nor be able to receive honor. But if he persists in making disturbances and seditions within the church, let him be restrained as seditious through an external power." § 2. And blessed Augustine says concerning such persons: "Many things are also to be done in the case of persons who are unwilling and are to be punished with a certain benign harshness, whose advantage is to be consulted rather than their will. For in correcting a son, however harshly, paternal love is never lost; nevertheless, that which he would not wish is done so that he may suffer pain who, even unwilling, appears to be healed by pain." Behold, you see how, by the testimony of so great a father, the church does not persecute by restraining such things, but always loves such persons by amending them. Therefore, you too do what we, knowing the intention of your Christianity, frequently exhort, and take pains that such things not be permitted to be done further, but also—which I do not doubt to be very easy for you—that those who have presumed to do such things be directed under fitting guard to the most pious prince. § 3. For your Loftiness ought to recall what God did through you at that time when, with the tyrant Totila possessing both Istria and Venetia and the Franks also laying waste all things, you nevertheless did not permit a bishop of Milan to be made before you had reported the matter to the most merciful prince, and had learned again from his writings what ought to have been done, and amid enemies raging everywhere, both he who was being ordained and he who was to ordain were nevertheless conducted to Ravenna by the providence of your Highness.

C. XLII. Non qui ad bonum, sed qui ad malum cogit persequitur.

Item Pelagius Papa. Non uos hominum uaniloquia retardent dicentium, quia persecutionem ecclesia faciat, dum uel ea, que conmittuntur, reprimit, uel animarum salutem requirit. Errant huiusmodi rumoris fabulatores. Non persequitur, nisi qui ad malum cogit. Qui uero malum uel factum iam punit, uel prohibet ne fiat, non persequitur iste, sed diligit. Nam si, ut illi putant, nemo nec reprehendendus a malo, nec retrahendus ad bonum est, humanas ac diuinas leges necesse est euacuari, que et malis penam, et bonis premia iusticia suadente constituunt. Malum autem scisma esse, et per exteras etiam potestates huiusmodi obprimi homines debere, et canonicae scripturae auctoritas, et paternarum nos regularum ueritas docet. Quisquis ergo ab apostolicis diuisus est sedibus, in scismate eum dubium non est esse, et contra uniuersalem ecclesiam altare conatur erigere. §. 1. Sed quid de talibus insertus Calcedonensi sinodo canon statuat, gloria uestra consideret, ubi post alia sic dicit: "Qui a communione semet ipsum suspendit, et collectam fecit, et altare constituit, et noluit uocanti episcopo consentire, et noluit eidem acquiescere, neque obedire et prius et secundo uocanti, hunc omnino dampnari, nec umquam uel orationem mereri, nec recipere eum posse honorem. Si enim permanserit turbas faciens et seditiones ecclesiae, per extraneam potestatem tamquam seditiosum conprimi." §. 2. Et B. Augustinus de talibus dicit: "Multa etiam cum inuitis benigna quadam asperitate plectendis agenda sunt, quorum pocius utilitati consulendum est quam uoluntati. Nam in corripiendo filio, quamuis aspere, numquam paternus amor amittitur; fit tamen quod nollet ut doleat qui etiam inuitus uidetur dolore sanandus." Ecce uidetis, quemadmodum tanti testimonio patris non persequatur talia cohercendo, sed diligat emendando tales semper ecclesia. Facite ergo etiam uos quod scientes intentionem Christianitatis uestrae frequenter hortamur, et date operam, ut talia ultra fieri non liceat, sed etiam (quod uobis facillimum esse non dubito) hii, qui presumpserunt talia, ad piissimum principem sub digna custodia dirigantur. §. 3. Recolere enim debet celsitudo uestra, quid per uos Deus fecerit tempore illo, quo et, Istrias et Venetias tyranno Totila possidente, Francis etiam cuncta uastantibus, non ante tamen Mediolanensem episcopum fieri permisistis, nisi ad clementissimum principem exinde retulissetis, et quid fieri debuisset eius iterum scriptis recognouissetis, et inter ubique feruentes hostes, Rauennam tamen et is, qui ordinabatur, et is, qui ordinaturus erat, prouidentia culminis uestri deducti sunt.

C. XLIII. Let the powers of the age restrain schismatics and heretics.

The same to Narses, Patrician [and Duke in Italy]. What shall I say of the bishops of the Ligurians, Venetians, and Istrians? Your Excellency is capable of repressing them both by reason and by power, yet you allow them, in contempt of the apostolic sees, to glory in their rusticity, although, if perhaps anything concerning the judgment of the universal synod that was held at Constantinople during the first indiction recently passed was moving them, they ought to have sent to the apostolic see—as was always done—certain persons chosen from among their own who could give and receive an account, and not, with closed eyes, tear apart the body of Christ our Lord, that is, the holy church. Therefore, do not hesitate to restrain men of this kind by princely or judicial authority, because the rules of the fathers specially established this: that if any person of ecclesiastical office resists the person to whom he is subject, or assembles separately, or erects another altar, or creates a schism, that person is to be excommunicated and condemned. But if perhaps he despises even this and persists in making divisions and schisms, let him be oppressed through the public powers. Behold, lord, because your spirit is perhaps timid lest you appear to persecute, I have taken care briefly to direct these things to you from the authority of the fathers, although there are a thousand other examples and constitutions by which it is evidently recognized that those who create rifts in the holy church ought to be restrained through the public powers not only by exiles, but also by confiscation of property and harsh custody.

C. XLIII. Scismaticos et hereticos seculi potestates coherceant.

Idem Narsae, Patricio. [et Duci in Italia] De Liguribus, atque Veneticis, et Istriis episcopis quid dicam? quos ydonea est excellentia uestra et ratione et potestate reprimere, et dimittitis eos in contemptum apostolicarum sedium de sua rusticitate gloriari, cum, si quid eos de iudicio uniuersalis sinodi, quod Constantinopoli per primam nuper elapsam indictionem actum est, forte mouebat, ad sedem apostolicam (quomodo semper factum est) electis aliquibus de suis, qui dare et accipere rationem possint, dirigere debuerunt, et non clausis oculis corpus Christi Domini nostri, hoc est sanctam ecclesiam, lacerare. Nolite ergo dubitare huiuscemodi homines principali uel iudiciali auctoritate conprimere, quia regulae Patrum hoc specialiter constituerunt, ut, si qua ecclesiastici offitii persona cui subiectus est restiterit, uel seorsum collegerit, aut aliud altare erexerit, seu scisma fecerit, iste excommunicetur atque dampnetur. Quod si forte et hoc contempserit, et permanserit diuisiones et scismata faciendo, per potestates publicas obprimatur. Ecce, domine, quia animus uester forte timidus est, ne persequi uidearis, de Patrum uobis auctoritate hec breuiter dirigenda curaui, cum mille alia exempla et constitutiones sint, quibus euidenter agnoscitur, ut facientes scissuras in sancta ecclesia non solum exiliis, sed etiam proscriptione rerum et dura custodia per publicas potestates debeant coherceri.

C. XLIV. Let those divided from the unity of the church be restrained by secular powers.

The same. With what judgment we rejoice over the zeal of your Glory, we believe not only you but many and almost all persons to have knowledge; and for that reason we have now considered that we ought confidently to complain before your Glory concerning those things which, with you present there, we are astonished to see being done. For Tertius and Maximilian, having only the names of bishops, are said both to disturb ecclesiastical unity there and to apply all ecclesiastical property to their own uses, to such an extent that certain persons, compelled by necessity, came indefatigably to us over so long a journey and offered petitions against one of them, namely Maximilian. For this reason we have considered that Peter, presbyter of our see, and also Projectus, a notary, ought to be sent to those same places, so that they may either check there with worthy vengeance the things they shall discover to have been committed by the aforesaid pseudo-bishops against the canonical statutes, or conduct those same men all the way to us. And therefore, greeting your Glory with paternal affection, we ask that you furnish assistance in all things to the aforesaid persons who were directed from our see, and do not think it to be any sin if men of this kind are restrained. For both divine and human laws have established this: that those divided from the unity of the church and most iniquitously disturbing its peace are to be restrained even by secular powers. Nor is there anything greater from which you can offer a sacrifice to God than if you arrange that those who rage to their own destruction and that of others ought to be checked with fitting rigor.

C. XLIV. Ab ecclesiae unitate diuisi a secularibus potestatibus coherceantur.

Idem. Quali nos de gloriae uestrae studiis iudicio gratulemur, non solum uestram, sed multorum ac pene omnium credimus habere noticiam, et idcirco nunc de his, que uobis presentibus ibi fieri stupemus, fiducialiter apud gloriam uestram duximus conquerendum. Tercius siquidem atque Maximilianus, nomina tantum episcoporum habentes, et ecclesiasticam ibi unitatem perturbare dicuntur, et omnes ecclesiasticas res suis usibus applicare, in tantum, ut contra unum eorum, id est Maximilianum, usque ad nos per tam longum iter necessitate conpellente quidam infatigabiliter uenientes preces offerrent. Ob quam causam Petrum presbiterum sedis nostrae, sed et Proiectum notarium ad eadem loca duximus destinandos, ut ea, que canonicis statutis a predictis pseudoepiscopis conpererint conmissa, uel digna ibi debeant ulcione conpescere, uel eosdem ad nos usque perducere. Et ideo salutantes paterno affectu gloriam uestram petimus, ut prefatis, qui a nostra sede directi sunt, in omnibus prebeatis auxilium, nec putetis alicuius esse peccati, si huiusmodi homines conprimuntur. Hoc enim et diuinae et humanae leges statuerunt, ut ab ecclesiae unitate diuisi, et eius pacem iniquissime perturbantes, a secularibus etiam potestatibus conprimantur. Nec quicquam maius est, unde Deo sacrificium possitis offerre, quam si id ordinetis, ut hii, qui in suam et in aliorum perniciem debachantur, conpetenti debeant uigore conpesci.

C. XLV. The iniquity of the depraved, although it profits the good, is nevertheless to be punished.

Likewise Pope Pelagius, [to John the Patrician]. Reading again the letters of your Excellency, we indeed grieved greatly over the injury that the presumption of iniquitous men inflicted upon you. But because we know that, by the hidden judgment of God, your soul, even if through the iniquity and pride of others, was guarded from the contamination of schism, we gave thanks to almighty God, who is accustomed to work good things even from the evil acts of men. For it is not to be believed that it happened without his providence that senseless and most perverse men should leap forward even to this point: that, believing their division to be the Catholic Church, they prohibited you from their own pollution. For thus through the mercy of God it also came about, while they were ignorant, that, rescued from the communion of schismatics, it befell you to be preserved for the Catholic Church, which you love. Therefore, although your advantage was produced through their crime, nevertheless do not permit the presumption of iniquitous men to run riot unpunished. For if that which they presumed against your Glory has not been checked by vengeance, it ought no longer to be doubted what they may have power to inflict upon lesser persons. Therefore, exercise the authority owed in such matters and, lest their hope of committing such things further increase, let it be repressed by your coercions. For by God's nod they presumed such things even against you for this purpose: that, with you correcting such things, by God's favor you might be able to fortify others against their crime. But what kind of men those who flee the church are, the crimes of Euphrasius—which God willed no longer to remain hidden—evidently inform you: he who, in homicide, considered neither the bond of a human being, nor the charity of a brother, nor reverence for the priesthood. But in incestuous adultery he even took away the measure from vengeance itself, because if you punish the adultery, there remains nothing in which the incest may be avenged; if you inflict punishment upon the incestuous act, the crime of adultery will remain unavenged. Behold the fellowship from which come those who, as regards their pride, attempted to inflict injury upon you, and, as regards the providence of God, preserved you undefiled for the church. Remove such persons from that province; use the occasion offered to you by God for oppressing the faithless. This will be able to be done more fully if the authors of the crimes are directed to the most merciful prince, and especially the invader of the church of Aquileia, who, both in schism and accursed in it, will be able to retain neither the honor nor the merit of a bishop.

C. XLV. Iniquitas prauorum, quamuis bonis proficiat, tamen punienda est.

Item Pelagius Papa. [Iohanni Patricio] Relegentes litteras excellentiae uestrae, de iniuria quidem, quam uobis iniquorum hominum presumptio ingessit, ualde doluimus. Sed quia scimus, occulto Dei iudicio animam uestram, etsi per aliorum iniquitatem ac superbiam, a contaminatione scismatis custoditam, egimus omnipotenti Deo gratias, qui etiam de malis hominum actibus bona operari consueuit. Nec enim sine illius prouidentia factum esse credendum est, ut insensati et peruersissimi homines ad hoc usque prosilirent, ut, suam diuisionem catholicam esse credentes ecclesiam, a pollutione sua uos prohiberent. Sic enim per misericordiam Dei etiam factum est nescientibus illis, ut a scismaticorum communione eruti, catholicae, quam diligitis, seruari uos contigisset ecclesiae. Quamuis igitur uestra per illorum scelus facta sit utilitas, nolite tamen inpunitam presumptionem iniquorum hominum grassari permittere. Si enim hoc, quod in uestram gloriam presumpserunt non fuerit uindicta conpressum, quod in minoribus ualeant puniri, ultra non debet ambigi. Exercete igitur in talibus debitam auctoritatem, et, ne eis amplius talia conmittendi spes crescat, uestris cohercionibus reprimatur. Ad hoc siquidem Dei nutu etiam contra uos talia presumpserunt, ut talia uobis corrigentibus ab eorum scelere alios possetis, Deo propitiante, munire. Quales sunt autem qui ecclesiam fugiunt, Eufrasii uos scelera (que Deus occulta amplius esse noluit) euidenter informant, qui in homicidio quidem nec hominis necessitudinem, nec karitatem fratris nec sacerdotii reuerentiam cogitauit. Incestuoso autem in adulterio etiam ipsi uindictae abstulit modum, quia, si adulterium punias, non remanet in quo uindicetur incestus. Si incestuoso ingeras penam, inultum crimen adulterii remanebit. Ecce, de quo collegio sunt qui, quantum ad superbiam suam, iniuriam uobis inferre moliti sunt, et, quantum ad prouidentiam Dei, inpollutos uos ecclesiae seruauerunt. Auferte tales ab ista prouincia, utimini oblata uobis a Deo obprimendi perfidos occasione. Quod tunc plenius fieri poterit, si auctores scelerum ad clementissimum principem dirigantur, et maxime ecclesiae Aquilegensis inuasor, qui et in scismate, et in eo maledictus, nec honorem episcopi poterit retinere, nec meritum.

C. XLVI. In the contest that is waged against unbelievers, whoever dies merits the heavenly kingdom.

Likewise Nicholas to the army of the Franks. We wish the charity of all of you to know that whoever —which we say without wishing it—shall have died faithfully in this contest of war, the heavenly kingdoms will by no means be denied to him.

C. XLVI. In certamine, quod contra infideles geritur, quisquis moritur, celeste regnum meretur.

Item Nycolaus exercitui Francorum. Omnium uestrum nosse uolumus karitatem, quoniam quisquis (quod non optantes dicimus) in hoc belli certamine fideliter mortuus fuerit, regna illi celestia minime negabuntur.

C. XLVII. Those who are armed against excommunicated persons from zeal for mother church are not homicides.

Likewise Urban II to Godfrey, bishop of Lucca. Impose upon the killers of excommunicated persons—as you have learned in the order of the Roman church—a measure of fitting satisfaction according to their intention. For we do not judge those men homicides who, burning with zeal for the Catholic mother against excommunicated persons, happen to have slaughtered some of them. Nevertheless, lest the discipline of the same mother church be abandoned, enjoin upon them, according to the tenor we have stated, a fitting penance by which they may be able to appease toward themselves the eyes of divine simplicity, if perhaps through human frailty they incurred some duplicity in that same crime.

C. XLVII. Non sunt homicidae qui aduersus excommunicatos zelo matris ecclesiae armantur.

Item Urbanus II Godifredo, Lucano Episcopo. Excommunicatorum interfectoribus (prout in ordine Romanae ecclesiae didicisti) secundum intentionem modum congruae satisfactionis iniunge. Non enim eos homicidas arbitramur, quos, aduersus excommunicatos zelo catholicae matris ardentes, aliquos eorum trucidasse contingit. Ne tamen eiusdem ecclesiae matris disciplina deseratur, tenore, quem diximus, penitenciam eis indicito congruentem, qua diuinae simplicitatis oculos aduersus se conplacare ualeant, si forte quid duplicitatis pro humana fragilitate in eodem flagicio incurrerint.

C. XLVIII. The peace of the church consoles sorrow for the lost.

Likewise Augustine, [epistle 50] to Boniface. For who among us would wish any of our enemies not only to perish but even to lose something? But if the house of David did not merit to have peace otherwise than if Absalom his son were extinguished in the war that he was waging against his father —although with great care he commanded his men that, so far as they could, they preserve him alive and safe, so that there might be one whom paternal affection could pardon when repentant—what remained for him except to weep for the one lost and, when the peace of his kingdom had been acquired, to console his sorrow? GRATIAN. Therefore, if holy men and public powers waging wars were not transgressors of that command, "You shall not kill," although they destroyed certain flagitious persons by a deserved death; if a soldier obeying his power is not guilty of homicide if he kills any flagitious person at its command; if to punish homicides and poisoners is not the shedding of blood but the ministry of the laws; if the peace of the church consoles sorrow for the lost; if those who, inflamed by zeal for the Catholic mother, kill excommunicated persons are not judged homicides: it is plain that it is lawful not only for the evil to be scourged but even to be killed. § 1. But it is asked: if it happens that certain evil persons are punished by those who do not possess lawful power, are those through whom they are punished guilty of shed blood? Concerning them Ambrose writes thus, [Book II On Cain and Abel, c. 4]:

> Item Augustinus [epistola L.] ad Bonifatium. Quis enim nostrum uelit aliquem inimicorum non solum perire, uerum etiam aliquid perdere? Sed si aliter non meruit habere pacem domus Dauid, nisi Absalon, filius eius, in bello, quod gerebat contra patrem, fuisset exstinctus, quamuis magna cura mandauerit suis, ut eum, quantum possent, uiuum saluumque seruarent, et esset cui paternus affectus penitenti ignosceret quid ei restitit, nisi perditum flere, et sui regni pace acquisita suam mesticiam consolari? Gratian. Si ergo uiri sancti et publicae potestates bella gerentes non fuerunt transgressores illius mandati: "Non occides," quamuis quosque flagitiosos digna morte perimerent; si miles suae potestati obediens non est reus homicidii, si eius inperio quemlibet flagitiosum interfecerit; si homicidas, et uenenarios punire non est effusio sanguinis, sed legum ministerium; si pax ecclesiae mesticiam consolatur perditorum; si illi, qui zelo catholicae matris accensi excommunicatos interficiunt, homicidae non iudicantur: patet, quod malos non solum flagellari, sed etiam interfici licet. §. 1. Sed queritur, si contingat aliquos malos puniri ab his, qui non habent legitimam potestatem, an sint rei effusi sanguinis hii, per quos puniuntur? De his ita scribit Ambrosius: [lib. II. de Cain et Abel, cap. 4.]

C. XLIX. Sins are sometimes punished through peoples aroused by divine command.

Sins are remitted through the word of God, whose interpreter and a certain executor the Levite is. They are remitted through the office of the priest and sacred ministry. Sins are also punished through men, as through judges who use power for a time. § 1. Sins are also punished through peoples, as we read that the Jewish people were often subdued by foreigners aroused at God's command on account of offense against the divine majesty. GRATIAN. From this it is to be noted that God sometimes punishes sins through those who do not know, and sometimes through those who know. He punishes sins through those who do not know, as through Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus, the princes of the Romans, and certain kings of the gentiles he sometimes afflicted and sometimes took captive the sinning people of Israel. § 1. Hence the Lord himself says through the Prophet: "Assyria is the rod of my fury; but he himself did not know." Assyria was the rod of the Lord's fury because through it divine justice arranged to scourge innumerable nations. But he himself did not know, because, raised up in pride, he attributed the victory that he had obtained not to divine power but to his own strength. Hence against his pride the Lord speaks, saying: "Will the saw glory against him who cuts with it? Or will the axe be exalted against him who hews with it?" By these similitudes it is shown sufficiently clearly that, just as a saw and an axe can neither cut nor hew wood unless they are directed by another and therefore ought not to be proud against the one directing them, so those through whom God punishes are able to do nothing without the nod of the divine disposition and therefore it is not lawful for them to be proud against the one directing them. § 2. Such persons are said to serve God in that they punish; but in that, ignorant that they are ministers of God's wrath, they are proud with impious vanity, they find from God only a temporal reward for their service, but do not escape the punishment of their pride. Hence, when the Lord said to the Prophet concerning Nebuchadnezzar, "What shall I give him for the labor by which he served me at Tyre?" he immediately added: "Give"—that is, announce that it has been given to him—"Egypt and Ethiopia." But when, afterward growing proud in his heart, he said, "Is this not Babylon, which I founded in the strength of my kingdom? etc.," God immediately changed his rational mind and clothed him with bestial savagery, so that, fleeing from men, he lived with beasts. § 3. Through Antiochus also, when the Lord was punishing the idolatry of the Jewish people and turning to their destruction the peace that they were seeking from casting aside God's law and taking up the sacred rites of the nations, because, ignorant of God's disposition, he attributed the devastation of that people to his own ability, the Prophet imprecates against him, saying: "Pour out your wrath upon the nations that have not known you, and upon the kingdoms that have not invoked your name, lest perhaps they say among the nations: Where is their God?" § 4. Similarly, when God had decreed to punish through the Romans the sin of Christ's death, they began to ascribe the destruction of the city and the wretched captivity of the Jewish people to their own strength. Hence the Prophet imprecates against them, saying: "Raise your hands against the prides of those who hate you," and who, having maliciously worked many things, placed the monuments of their victory in the midst of your court. § 5. Sins are punished through those who know, as through the sons of Israel God willed to punish the sins of the Amorites, Canaanites, and other nations whose land he gave to the Israelites to possess, to whom he also commanded that they spare none of them but hand all over to death. That this happened to them on account of their sins appears from the words of the Lord, who, when he said to Abraham, "To your seed I shall give this land," and, as though he asked, "Why do you not give it to me now?" heard: "For the sins of the Amorites have not yet been completed." They are understood to have been completed at the time when that people, freed from Egyptian servitude, received their land as an inheritance, as had been promised to Abraham. § 6. Therefore, when peoples are thus aroused by divine command to punish sins, as that Jewish people was aroused to occupy the land of promise and to destroy the sinful nations, guilty blood is shed without fault, and the things possessed evilly by them rightly pass into the right and dominion of the good. § 7. But when some persons are moved by a hidden prompting to persecute the evil, like Sennacherib and the others who persecuted the sinning people, although by the operation of a hidden prompting they are incited to persecute through the merits of those persons, nevertheless, because with a depraved intention they seek not to punish the sins of the offenders but to seize their goods or subject them to their dominion, they are not immune from crime. Concerning them it is also to be noted that they are sometimes aroused to punish the sins of the good, so that at last, through the good having been corrected, they themselves may also be punished; as it is read in the Book of Judges concerning Jabin, king of the Canaanites, and the Midianites, that on account of the idolatry of the people God raised them up to afflict Israel and occupy their land. But when the people of God, afflicted for a longer time under their hands, recognized their sin and appeased God toward themselves through penance, at God's command Barak, accompanied by Deborah the prophetess, wife of Lapidoth, crushed Jabin, king of the Canaanites, and Sisera, leader of his army; and Gideon handed over to death Zebah and Zalmunna, kings of the Midianites, and Oreb and Zeeb, their leaders. § 8. It therefore appears that sometimes through those bearing lawful power, sometimes through peoples aroused by divine command, the evil are not only scourged for their sins but also rightly destroyed. Nor is that passage of Augustine contrary in which, pleading with Marcellinus for the Circumcellions, he asked that he restrain them with blows, not destroy them by death. For although by pleading he asked that a span of life be reserved for them, nevertheless he did not teach that the severity of the laws by which such persons are punished by death is not to be observed.

C. XLIX. Aliquando puniuntur peccata per populos diuino iussu excitatos.

Remittuntur peccata per Dei uerbum, cuius Leuites interpres et quidam executor est. Remittuntur per offitium sacerdotis sacrumque ministerium. Puniuntur quoque peccata per homines, sicut per iudices, qui potestate ad tempus utuntur. §. 1. Puniuntur peccata etiam per populos, sicut legimus, quia sepe ab alienigenis, Dei iussu excitatis propter diuinae maiestatis offensam, subactus est populus Iudeorum. Gratian. Hinc notandum est, quod aliquando punit Deus peccata per nescientes, aliquando per scientes. Per nescientes peccata punit, sicut per Sennacherib, et per Nabuchodonosor, et per Antiochum, et per principes Romanorum, et per nonnullos reges gentilium populum Israeliticum delinquentem afflixit aliquando, aliquando captiuauit. §. 1. Unde ipse

Dominus ait per Prophetam: "Virga furoris mei Assur: ipse autem non cognouit." Assur erat uirga furoris Domini, quia per eum innumeras gentes diuina iusticia flagellare disposuit. Ipse uero non cognouit, quia in superbiam elatus uictoriam, quam assecutus fuerat, non diuinae potenciae, sed suis uiribus attribuit. Unde contra eius superbiam Dominus loquitur, dicens: "Numquid serra gloriabitur contra eum, qui secat in ea? aut numquid exaltabitur securis contra eum, qui cedit in ea?" Quibus similitudinibus satis perspicue ostenditur, quod sicut serra et securis nec secare, nec cedere ligna possunt, nisi ab alio regantur, ac ideo contra regentem se superbire non debent: sic illi, per quos Deus punit, absque nutu diuinae dispositionis nichil agere ualent, ac ideo contra se regentem superbire non licet eis. §. 2. Tales in eo, quod puniunt, Deo seruire dicuntur; in eo autem, quod ignorantes se esse ministros irae Dei inpia uanitate superbiunt, mercedem seruitutis suae a Deo non nisi temporalem inueniunt, penam uero superbiae suae non effugiunt. Unde, cum diceret ad Prophetam de Nabuchodonosor Dominus: "Quid dabo ei pro labore, quo seruiuit michi apud Tirum?" statim subiunxit: "Da," hoc est datam sibi pronuncia, "Egyptum et Ethiopiam." Cum autem in corde suo superbiens postea diceret: "Nonne hec est Babylon, quam ego condidi in robore regni mei? etc." statim inmutauit Deus rationabilem mentem eius, et induit eum bestialitate ferina, ut ab hominibus fugiens cum bestiis uiueret. §. 3. Per Antiochum quoque, cum ydolatriam Iudaicae plebis Dominus puniret, et pacem, quam ex lege Dei abiecta, et ex sacris nationum assumptis querebant, illis in perniciem uerteret, quia Dei dispositionem ignorans suae facultati deuastationem illius plebis attribuit, inprecatur in eum Propheta, dicens: "Effunde iram tuam in gentes, que te non nouerunt, et in regna, que nomen tuum non inuocauerunt, ne forte dicant in gentibus: ubi est Deus eorum?" §. 4. Similiter, cum per Romanos peccatum mortis Christi Deus punire decreuisset, urbis excidium et Iudaicae plebis miseram captiuitatem suis uiribus asscribere ceperunt, unde contra eos Propheta inprecatur, dicens: "Leua manus tuas in superbias eorum, qui te oderunt," et qui multa maligne operati monumenta suae uictoriae posuerunt in medio atrio tuo. §. 5. Per scientes peccata puniuntur, sicut per filios Israel uoluit peccata punire Amorrheorum, et Chananeorum et aliarum gentium, quarum terram Israelitis possidendam dedit, quibus etiam precepit, ut nemini eorum parcerent, sed omnes morti traderent. Quod propter peccata eorum illis contigisse ex uerbis Domini apparet, qui, cum diceret ad Abraham: "Semini tuo dabo terram hanc," ueluti quereret, quare non modo das eam michi? audiuit: "Nondum enim sunt peccata Amorrheorum consummata." Que tunc intelliguntur fuisse consummata, cum populus ille, de Egyptiaca seruitute liberatus, terram eorum, sicut Abrahae promissum fuerat, in hereditatem accepit. §. 6. Cum ergo sic diuino iussu ad puniendum peccata populi excitantur, sicut populus ille Iudaicus est excitatus ad occupandam terram promissionis, et ad delendas gentes peccatrices, sine culpa noxius sanguis effunditur, et que ab eis male possidentur in ius et dominium rite transeunt bonorum. §. 7. Cum uero occulto instinctu aliqui mouentur ad persequendum malos, sicut Sennacherib, et ceteri, qui populum delinquentem persecuti sunt, licet occulto instinctu operante illorum meritis incitentur ad persequendum, tamen, quia praua intentione non peccata delinquentium punire, sed illorum bona rapere uel suae dicioni subicere querunt, non sunt inmunes a crimine. De quibus etiam notandum est, quod aliquando excitantur ad puniendum peccata bonorum, ut tandem per bonos correctos ipsi quoque puniantur, sicut in libro Iudicum legitur de Iabin, rege Chananeorum, et de Madianitis, quod propter ydolatriam populi suscitauit eos Deus, ut Israelem affligerent, et terram eorum occuparent. Cum autem populus Dei sub manibus eorum diutius afflictus peccatum suum recognosceret, et per penitenciam Deum sibi placaret, ex Dei precepto et Barach, comitatus Delboram prophetissam, uxorem Lapidoth, Iabin, regem Chananeorum, et Sysaram ducem exercitus sui, contriuit, et Gedeon et Zebee et Salmana, reges Madianitarum, et Oreb et Zeb, duces eorum, morti tradidit. §. 8. Apparet ergo, quod aliquando per legitimam potestatem gerentes, aliquando per populos diuino iussu excitatos, mali pro peccatis suis non solum flagellantur, sed etiam rite perduntur. Nec est contrarium illud Augustini, quod ad Marcellinum pro circumcellionibus supplicans rogabat, ut uerberibus eos coherceret, non morte perderet. Quamuis enim supplicando spatium uitae eis reseruari poposcit, non tamen legum seueritatem, qua tales morte plectuntur, non obseruandam docuit.

Question VI

GRATIAN. But as to what is asked—whether the evil are to be compelled to good?—the answer readily appears. For the ancient people were compelled to the observance of the law by fear of punishments. In the Gospel also the Lord says to his disciples: "Do not fear those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul; rather fear him"—that is, serve him in fear—"who can destroy soul and body in Gehenna." Paul too, when he was persecuting the church of God, was compelled to be converted to God after being blinded on the way. Hence he testified that he was like one untimely born, saying: "But last of all, as though to one untimely born, he appeared also to me." Hence Augustine writes, [epistle 50] to Boniface:

GRATIANUS. Quod autem queritur, an mali sint cogendi ad bonum? facile apparet. Antiquus namque populus metu penarum ad legis obseruationem cogebatur. In euangelio quoque Dominus ait discipulis suis: "Nolite timere eos, qui occidunt corpus, animam autem occidere non possunt, sed pocius eum timete," id est ei in timore seruite, "qui potest animam et corpus perdere in gehennam." Paulus quoque, cum ecclesiam Dei persequeretur, in itinere cecatus ad Deum conuerti coactus est. Unde se abortiuo similem testatus est, dicens: "Nouissime autem omnium tamquam abortiuo uisus est et michi." Hinc Augustinus scribit [epist. L.] ad Bonifatium:

C. I. The church ought to compel the evil to good, just as Christ compelled Paul.

Schismatics say: upon whom did Christ inflict force; whom did he compel? Behold, they have the Apostle Paul. Let them recognize in him Christ first compelling, afterward teaching; first striking, afterward consoling. But it is wonderful how he who entered the Gospel compelled by punishment of the body labored more than all those who were called into the Gospel by the word alone; and the perfect charity of him whom a greater fear compelled to charity casts fear outside. Why, therefore, should the church not compel her lost sons to return, if lost sons compelled others to perish? Although the pious mother embraces more tenderly even those whom they did not compel but only seduced, if through terrifying and salutary laws they are recalled into her bosom, and rejoices much more over them than over those whom she had never lost. § 1. Or does it not pertain to pastoral diligence also to recall to the Lord's sheepfold, by terrors or even pains of scourges if they should wish to resist, those sheep that were not violently snatched away but, gently and softly seduced, had wandered from the flock and had begun to be possessed by strangers? Likewise: § 2. We show that Paul was compelled by Christ. And so the church imitates her Lord in compelling these persons, she who, before compelling anyone, waited for the prophetic preaching concerning the faith of kings and nations to be fulfilled. § 3. From this too that apostolic sentence is understood not absurdly, where blessed Paul said: "Ready to avenge all disobedience, when first your obedience shall have been fulfilled." § 4. Hence the Lord himself also first orders guests to be brought to his great supper, and afterward to be compelled. For when his servants had answered him, "Lord, what you ordered has been done, and still there is room," he said: "Go out into the ways and hedges, and whomever you find compel to enter." Therefore, in those who were first brought gently, the prior obedience was fulfilled; but in those who are compelled, disobedience is restrained. Likewise: § 5. If, through the power that the church received by divine gift through the religion and faith of kings at the time when she ought, those who are found in the ways and hedges—that is, in heresies and schisms—are compelled to enter, let them not reproach the fact that they are compelled, but attend to that to which they are compelled.

C. I. Ecclesia malos debet cogere ad bonum, sicut Christus Paulum coegit.

Scismatici dicunt: cui Christus uim intulit, quem coegit? Ecce habent apostolum Paulum. Agnoscant in eo prius cogentem Christum, postea docentem: prius ferientem, postea consolantem. Mirum est autem, quomodo ille, qui pena corporis ad euangelium coactus intrauit, plus omnibus illis laborauit, qui solo uerbo uocati sunt, in euangelio, et quem maior timor conpulit ad karitatem, eius perfecta karitas foras mittit timorem. Cur ergo non cogeret ecclesia perditos filios, ut redirent, si perditi filii coegerunt alios, ut perirent? Quamuis et illos, quos non coegerunt, sed tantummodo seduxerunt, si per terribiles et salubres leges in eius gremio reuocentur, blandius pia mater amplectitur, et de illis multo amplius, quam de his, quos numquam perdiderat, gratulatur. §. 1. An non pertinet ad diligentiam pastoralem etiam illas oues, que non uiolenter ereptae, sed blande leniterque seductae a grege aberrauerant, et ab alienis possideri ceperant, inuentas ad ouile dominicum, si resistere uoluerint, flagellorum terroribus uel etiam doloribus reuocare? Item: §. 2. A Christo coactum Paulum ostendimus. Imitatur itaque ecclesia in istis cogendis Dominum suum, que prius, ut neminem cogeret, expectauit, ut de fide regum atque gentium predicatio prophetica conpleretur. §. 3. Etiam hinc non absurde intelligitur apostolica illa sentencia, ubi B. Paulus dixit: "Parati ulcisci omnem inobedientiam, cum conpleta fuerit prior uestra obedientia." §. 4. Unde et ipse Dominus ad magnam cenam suam prius conuiuas adduci iubet, postea cogi. Nam, cum ei serui respondissent: "Domine, factum est quod iussisti, et adhuc locus est, exite," inquit, "in uias et sepes, et quoscumque inueneritis cogite intrare." In illis ergo, qui primo leniter adducti sunt, conpleta est prior obediencia; in istis autem, qui coguntur, inobedientia cohercetur. Item: §. 5. Si per potestatem, quam per religionem ac fidem regum, tempore quo debuit, diuino munere accepit ecclesia, hii, qui inueniuntur in uiis et sepibus, id est in heresibus et scismatibus, coguntur intrare, non quia coguntur, reprehendant, sed quo coguntur, attendant.

C. II. Those who err are corrected by the Lord in various ways.

The same to the Donatists, [epistle 166]. "That which had strayed," says the Lord, "you did not recall; and that which had perished, you did not seek." God himself does this to you through us: he himself by entreating, he himself by threatening, whether by correction, or by losses, or by labors, or through his hidden admonitions or visitations, or through the laws of temporal powers.

C. II. Variis modis errantes corripiuntur a Domino.

Idem ad Donatistas. [epist. CLXVI.] "Quod errauerat," inquit Dominus, "non reuocastis, et quod perierat non requisistis." Hoc uobis per nos ipse Deus facit, ipse obsecrando, ipse minando, siue corripiendo, siue dampnis, siue laboribus, siue per ammonitiones suas occultas uel uisitationes, siue per potestatum temporalium leges.

C. III. It is not to be considered that each person is compelled, but to what he is compelled.

The same in the epistle [48] to Vincentius. You see, as I think, that it is not to be considered that each person is compelled, but what that is to which he is compelled, whether good or evil—not because anyone can be good unwillingly, but, by fearing what he does not wish to suffer, he either abandons the animosity that impedes him or is compelled to recognize the truth that was unknown, so that, fearing, he may either reject the false thing concerning which he was contending or seek the truth that he did not know, and now willingly hold what he did not wish. Likewise: § 1. My opinion at first was that no one was to be compelled to the unity of Christ; that the matter was to be conducted by the word, fought by disputation, and conquered by reason, lest we have feigned Catholics whom we had known as open heretics. But this opinion of mine was overcome not only by the words of those contradicting, but by the examples of those demonstrating. For first my own city was set against me, which, although it was wholly on the side of Donatus, was converted to Catholic unity by fear of the imperial laws, and which we now see detesting the ruin of this animosity of yours in such a way that it is believed never to have been in it. So too many other cities were recalled to me by name, so that from the things themselves I might recognize that even in this cause that which is written can be rightly understood: “Give an occasion to the wise man, and he will be wiser.”

C. III. Non est considerandum, quod quisque cogitur, sed quo cogitur.

Idem in epistola [XLVIII.] ad Vincentium. Vides, ut oppinor, non esse considerandum, quod quisque cogitur, sed quale sit illud, quo cogitur, utrum bonum, an malum: non quod quisque bonus possit esse inuitus, sed timendo quod non uult pati uel relinquit inpedientem animositatem, uel ignoratam conpellitur cognoscere ueritatem, ut timens uel respuat falsum, de quo contendebat, uel querat uerum quod nesciebat, et uolens iam teneat quod nolebat. Item: §. 1. Mea primitus sentencia erat, neminem ad unitatem Christi cogendum esse, uerbo esse agendum, disputatione pugnandum, ratione uincendum, ne fictos catholicos haberem quos apertos hereticos noueram. Sed hec oppinio mea non contradicentium uerbis tantum, sed demonstrantium superabatur exemplis. Nam primo opponebatur michi ciuitas mea, que, cum tota esset in partes Donati, ad unitatem catholicam legum inperialium timore conuersa est, quam nunc uidemus ita huius uestrae animositatis perniciem detestari, ut in ea numquam fuisse credatur. Ita aliae multae, que michi nominatim conmemorabantur, ut ipsis rebus agnoscerem, etiam in hac causa recte intelligi posse quod scriptum est: "Da sapienti occasionem, et sapientior erit."

C. IV. Let a peasant be compelled to be converted to the Lord by the burden of rent.

Likewise Gregory to Bishop Maximian. But now, if a peasant shall have been found to possess such great unbelief and obstinacy that he by no means consents to come to the Lord, he is to be burdened with so great a burden of rent that by the very punishment of its exaction he may be compelled to hasten to rectitude. GRATIAN. From all these things it is gathered that the evil are to be compelled to good. § 1. But it is objected that no one is to be compelled to that to which he is compelled without benefit. Yet each person is compelled to good without benefit when God spurns compelled services. Hence the Apostle, when he exhorted the Corinthians to alms, said: "Let each person give according as he has determined in his heart, not from sorrow or from necessity. For God loves a cheerful giver." From this it is given to be understood that he who gives unwillingly on account of present shame loses both the property and the merit. Likewise, when he rendered the reason why he abstained from expenses, he said: "If I shall have evangelized from necessity, there will be no glory for me." § 2. Likewise: "If I shall have evangelized unwillingly, a stewardship has been entrusted to me. But if I do this willingly, I have a reward with God." Likewise, when he wrote to the Galatians that the legal observances are not to be maintained, he said: "If you are led by the Spirit, you are not under the law." From this it appears that he who is under the law—that is, who serves from fear of punishment and not from love of justice—is not led by the Holy Spirit. But if he is not led by the Spirit, he is by no means able to please God. § 3. Likewise: "You did not receive the spirit of servitude again in fear, but you received the spirit of adoption as sons, in whom we cry: Abba, Father." From these words it is given to be understood that, even if in the Old Testament men were compelled to good by fear of punishment, nevertheless in the New Testament they are to be invited to faith by freedom alone and love of justice. Hence the former are called servants and sons of the bondwoman, pertaining to Ishmael; the latter are called free and sons of the free woman, pertaining to Isaac. § 4. Likewise John in his epistle: "Fear is not in charity, but perfect charity casts fear outside." But he who is compelled is led by that fear which is not in charity, which restrains the hands but does not change the mind, by which punishment is feared but the good is not loved. Moreover, without love of the good no one will be able to please God or be numbered among the good. Hence, when the Prophet said, "Your animals will dwell in it," namely the inheritance, showing how they may arrive at that habitation, he adds: "In your sweetness, which you prepared for the poor," calling the delight of a good work "sweetness," by which good is done not from fear of punishment but from delight in justice. Therefore, since without this sweetness the animals do not dwell in the inheritance, it is plain that no one is compelled to good by fear alone except without benefit. For whoever is compelled to good is led by fear alone, not by love; therefore, the evil are not to be compelled to good. § 5. To these things answer is made thus: If the evil were always to tolerate unwillingly the good to which they are compelled, and never serve willingly, they would be compelled to it without benefit. But because it belongs to human nature both to abhor those things that are brought into disuse and to love accustomed things more, the evil are to be restrained from evil by the scourges of tribulations and provoked to good, so that, while through fear of punishment evil is brought into disuse, it may be abhorred, but the good may grow sweet from custom. Hence Augustine on Psalm 127: "When through fear of Gehenna a man restrains himself from sin, a custom of justice is formed, and that which was hard begins to be loved, and fear begins to be excluded by charity, and chaste fear succeeds, concerning which it is said here, by which we fear lest he delay, lest he depart, lest we be without him. The former is useful, but it does not remain eternally as does the latter."

C. IV. Onere pensionis rusticus ad Dominum conuerti cogatur.

Item Gregorius Maximiano Episcopo. Iam uero, si rusticus tantae perfidiae et obstinationis fuerit inuentus, ut ad Dominum minime uenire consentiat, tanto pensionis onere grauandus est, ut ipsa exactionis suae pena conpellatur ad rectitudinem festinare. Gratian. Ex his omnibus colligitur, quod mali sunt cogendi ad bonum. §. 1. Sed obicitur, quod nemo est cogendus ad id, ad quod inutiliter cogitur. Ad bonum autem quisque cogitur inutiliter, cum Deus aspernetur coacta seruicia. Unde Apostolus, cum ad elemosinas Chorinthios hortaretur, ait: "Unusquisque det, prout destinauit in corde suo, non ex tristicia, aut ex necessitate. Hilarem enim datorem diligit Deus." Unde datur intelligi, quod qui inuitus dat propter presentem pudorem, et rem et meritum perdit. Item, cum redderet causam, quare abstineret a sumptibus, ait: "Si ex necessitate euangelizauero, non erit michi gloria." §. 2. Item: "Si inuitus euangelizauero, dispensatio michi credita est. Si autem uolens hoc ago, mercedem habeo apud Deum." Item, cum Galathis scriberet, legalia non esse tenenda, ait: "Si Spiritu ducimini, non estis sub lege." Ex quo apparet eum, qui sub lege est, id est qui timore penae, non amore iusticiae seruit, non duci Spiritu sancto. Si autem Spiritu non ducitur, Deo placere minime ualet. §. 3. Item: "Non accepistis spiritum seruitutis iterum in timore, sed accepistis spiritum adoptionis filiorum, in quo clamamus: Abba pater." Ex quibus uerbis datur intelligi, quod, etsi in ueteri testamento timore penae homines cogebantur ad bonum, tamen in nouo testamento sola libertate et dilectione iusticiae sunt inuitandi ad fidem. Unde illi dicuntur serui et filii ancillae, pertinentes ad Ismahel: isti dicuntur liberi et filii liberae, pertinentes ad Ysaac. §. 4. Item Iohannes in epistola sua: "Timor non est in karitate, sed perfecta karitas foras mittit timorem." Qui autem cogitur, illo timore ducitur, qui non est in karitate; qui manus conprimit, non animum mutat, quo pena timetur, non bonum diligitur. Porro sine dilectione boni nullus Deo placere, uel in numero bonorum connumerari poterit. Unde, cum Propheta diceret: "Animalia tua habitabunt in ea," hereditate, ostendens, quomodo ad ipsam habitationem perueniant, subdit: "In dulcedine tua, quam tu preparasti pauperi," dulcedinem uocans suauitatem boni operis, qua bonum fit non timore penae, sed delectatione iusticiae. Cum ergo sine hac dulcedine animalia in hereditate non habitent, patet, quod nemo, nisi inutiliter, ad bonum cogitur solo timore. Quicumque etenim ad bonum cogitur, solo timore, non amore ducitur: non sunt ergo mali cogendi ad bonum. §. 5. His ita respondetur: Si bonum, ad quod mali coguntur, semper inuiti tollerarent, et numquam uoluntarii seruirent, inutiliter ad illud cogerentur. Sed quia humanae naturae est et ea, que in dissuetudinem ducuntur, abhorrere, et consueta magis diligere, flagellis tribulationum cohibendi sunt mali a malo, et prouocandi ad bonum, ut, dum timore penae malum in dissuetudinem ducitur, abhorreatur, bonum uero ex consuetudine dulcescat. Unde Augustinus in Psalmo 127.: "Cum per timorem gehennae continet se homo a peccato, fit consuetudo iusticiae, et incipit quod durum erat amari, et incipit excludi timor a karitate, et succedit timor castus, de quo hic dicitur, quo timemus, ne tardet, ne discedat, ne eo careamus. Ille utilis, sed non permanet in eternum ut iste."

Question VII

GRATIAN. But now it is asked whether heretics are to be despoiled of their own property and that of the church, and whether those who possess things taken from heretics are said to possess another's property. Concerning these things Augustine writes thus to Vincentius, [epistle 48]:

GRATIANUS. Nunc autem queritur, an heretici suis et ecclesiae rebus sint expoliandi? et qui possident hereticis ablata an dicantur possidere aliena? De his ita scribit Augustinus ad Vincentium: [epist. XLVIII.]

C. I. Earthly things are held only by divine or human right.

Whoever persecutes you on the occasion of this imperial law, not from the love of correcting but from the hatred of acting as an enemy, displeases us. And although no earthly thing whatever can rightly be possessed by anyone except either by divine right, by which all things belong to the just, or by human right, which is in the power of the kings of the earth—and therefore you falsely call those things yours that you neither possess justly nor, according to the laws of earthly kings, are permitted to retain, and in vain you say, "We labor to gather them," when you read it written, "The just eat the labors of the impious"—nevertheless, whoever, on the occasion of this law that the kings of the earth serving Christ promulgated for amending your impiety, greedily seeks property belonging to you, displeases us. Finally, whoever holds not through justice but through avarice those very goods of the poor or basilicas of the congregations that you held under the name of the church—which assuredly are owed only to that church which is the true church of Christ—displeases us. Whoever receives in such a way a person cast down by you for some flagitious deed or crime as those are received who, apart from the error by which you are separated from us, lived among you without crime, displeases us. But you do not easily show these things either. We tolerate certain persons whom we cannot correct or punish; nor on account of the chaff do we abandon the Lord's threshing floor; nor on account of the bad fish do we break the Lord's nets; nor on account of the kids to be separated at the end do we desert the Lord's flock; nor on account of the vessels made unto dishonor do we migrate from the Lord's house.

C. I. Res terrenae non nisi diuino uel humano iure tenentur.

Quicumque uos ex occasione huius legis inperialis, non corrigendi dilectione, sed odio inimicandi persequitur, displicet nobis. Et quamuis res queque terrena non recte a quoquam possideri possit, nisi uel iure diuino, quo cuncta iustorum sunt, uel iure humano, quod in potestate est regum terrae, (ideoque falso res appellatis uestras, quas nec iuste possidetis, et secundum leges terrenorum regum amittere iussi estis, frustraque dicitis, nos eis congregandis laboramus, cum scriptum legatis: "Labores inpiorum iusti edunt)," sed tamen, quisquis ex occasione legis huius, quam reges terrae Christo seruientes ad emendandam inpietatem uestram promulgauerunt, res proprias uestras cupide appetit, displicet nobis. Quisquis denique ipsas res pauperum, uel basilicas congregationum, quas sub nomine ecclesiae tenebatis (que omnino non debentur nisi ei ecclesiae, que uera est Christi ecclesia) non per iusticiam, sed per auariciam tenet, displicet nobis. Quisquis pro aliquo flagicio uel facinore deiectum a uobis ita suscipit, sicut suscipiuntur qui (excepto errore, quo a nobis separamini) sine crimine apud uos uixerunt, displicet nobis. Sed nec facile ista monstratis, nonnullos tolleramus, quos corrigere uel punire non possumus, neque propter paleam relinquimus aream Domini, neque propter pisces malos rumpimus retia Domini, neque propter hedos in fine segregandos deserimus gregem Domini, neque propter uasa facta in contumeliam migramus de domo Domini.

C. II. Catholics do not therefore possess another's property because they hold things taken from heretics.

The same, Against Petilian, [Book II, c. 43]. If you complain concerning ecclesiastical property or places that you do not hold, the Jews too can call themselves just and charge us with iniquity because Christians now possess the place in which the impious reigned. What, therefore, is unworthy if Catholics hold according to the equal will of the Lord those things that heretics held? That voice of the Lord has force against all the iniquitous and impious: "The kingdom of God will be taken from you and given to a nation that practices justice." Or was it written in vain, "The pious will eat the labors of the impious"? Therefore, you ought rather to marvel that you still hold something than that you have lost something. Likewise, [c. 59]: § 1. If you who have now been cut off began to possess any things, because the Lord gave to us the things taken from you, we do not therefore covet another's property, because by the command of him to whom all things belong they were made ours, and they are justly ours. For you used them for severance; we, for unity. Otherwise, those who were expelled by divine power from the face of those who used that land evilly could charge the first people of God too with coveting another's property; and the Jews themselves, from whom the kingdom was taken according to the words of the Lord and given to a nation that practices justice, can charge the coveting of another's property because the church of Christ possesses the place where the persecutors of Christ reigned.

C. II. Catholici non ideo aliena possident, quia ab hereticis ablata tenent.

Idem contra Petilianum. [lib. II. c. 43.] Si de rebus uel locis ecclesiasticis, que, non tenetis, querimini, possunt et Iudei se iustos dicere, et iniquitatem nobis obicere, quia locum, in quo inpii regnauerunt, modo Christiani possident. Quid ergo indignum, si ea, que tenebant heretici, secundum parem Domini uoluntatem catholici tenent? Ad omnes iniquos et inpios illa uox Domini ualet: "Auferetur a uobis regnum Dei, et dabitur genti facienti iusticiam." An frustra scriptum est: Labores inpiorum pii edent? Quapropter magis mirari debetis, quod adhuc tenetis aliquid, quam quod aliquid amisistis. Item: [c. 59.] §. 1. Si qua iam concisi possidere cepistis, quia uobis ablata nobis Dominus dedit, non ideo concupiscimus aliena, quia illius inperio, cuius sunt omnia, facta sunt nostra, et iuste sunt nostra. Vos enim utebamini ad precisionem, nos ad unitatem. Alioquin et primo populo Dei possent illi obicere alienae rei concupiscentiam, qui diuina potestate ab eorum facie, qui ea terra male utebantur, expulsi sunt, et ipsi Iudei, a quibus ablatum est regnum secundum uerba Domini, et datum est genti facienti iusticiam, possunt obicere alienae rei concupiscentiam, quia ecclesia Christi possidet ubi persecutores Christi regnabant.

C. III. Ecclesiastical property is unjustly possessed by heretics.

The same, [epistle 50 to Boniface]. But as to what they charge against us—that we covet and take away their property—would that they become Catholics and possess in peace and charity with us not only the things that they call theirs but also ours. But to such an extent are they blinded by the desire to make false accusations that they do not attend to how contrary to one another are the things they say. Surely they themselves say, and appear to complain most odiously concerning themselves, that we confine them in our communion by the violent command of the laws. We would in no way do this, therefore, if we wished to possess their property. What avaricious man seeks a co-possessor? What person inflamed by the desire to dominate or raised up by the haughtiness of domination desires to have a partner? Surely let them attend to those formerly their own but now also our companions and joined to us by fraternal love: how they hold as their own not only the things they had but also ours, which they did not have—things that, nevertheless, if we are co-sharers with the poor, are both ours and theirs. But if we privately possess things that suffice for us, those things are not ours but the poor's; we in some way conduct their administration, not claim ownership for ourselves by a damnable usurpation. Therefore, whatever they possessed in the name of the churches of Donatus's party, Christian emperors by religious laws ordered to be transferred, together with the churches themselves, to the Catholic Church. Therefore, since the peoples of those same churches are with us, and with us are the poor who were fed from those same little possessions, let those who are placed outside rather cease to covet another's property, but let them enter the fellowship of unity, so that together we may govern not only the things that they call theirs but also the things that they call ours. For it is written: "All things are yours, but you are Christ's, and Christ is God's."

C. III. Res ecclesiasticae ab hereticis iniuste possidentur.

Idem. [epist. L. ad Bonifacium] Quod autem nobis obiciunt, quod res eorum concupiscamus et auferamus, utinam catholici fiant, et non solum que dicunt sua, sed etiam nostra nobiscum in pace et karitate possideant. Usque adeo autem calumpniandi cupiditate cecantur, ut non adtendant, quam sint inter se contraria que loquuntur. Ipsi certe dicunt, et inuidiosissime sibi conqueri uidentur, quod eos in nostra communione uiolento legum inperio coartamus. Hoc itaque nullo modo faceremus, si res eorum possidere uellemus. Quis auarus querit conpossessorem? Quis dominandi cupiditate inflammatus, uel fastu dominationis elatus, desiderat habere consortem? Ipsos certe attendant quondam suos, modo etiam nostros socios et fraterna nobis dilectione coniunctos, quemadmodum sua teneant non solum, que habebant, sed etiam nostra, que non habebant, que tamen, si pauperum conpares sumus, et nostra sunt, et illorum. Si autem priuatim que nobis sufficiant possidemus, non sunt illa nostra, sed pauperum, quorum procurationem quodammodo gerimus, non proprietatem nobis usurpatione dampnabili uendicamus. Quicquid igitur nomine ecclesiarum partis Donati possidebant, Christiani inperatores legibus religiosis cum ipsis ecclesiis ad catholicam transferre iusserunt. Cum ergo nobiscum sunt plebes ecclesiarum earundem, nobiscum pauperes, qui de eisdem possessiunculis alebantur, ipsi pocius foris positi desinant concupiscere aliena, sed intrent unitatis societatem, ut pariter gubernemus non illa tantum, que dicunt sua, uerum etiam que dicunt et nostra. Scriptum est enim: "Omnia uestra, uos autem Christi, Christus autem Dei."

C. IV. He who is cut off from the body of Christ cannot retain the spirit of justice.

The same in the epistle to Vincentius. Just as a limb, if it is cut off from the body of a living man, cannot retain the spirit of life, so a man who is cut off from the body of the just Christ can in no way retain the spirit of justice, even if he retains the form of the limb that he received in the body. But let them come into the joining together of this body and possess their labors not from the desire to dominate but from the piety of using them well. But we, as has already been said, purge our will from the filth of this desire, with any enemy as judge, when, so far as we are able, we seek those very persons whose labors they are said to be, so that with us in Catholic fellowship they may use both theirs and ours. § 1. "But this," they say, "is what moves us: if we are unjust, why do you seek us?" To them we respond: we seek you, the unjust, lest you remain unjust; we seek the lost so that we may be able to rejoice over those found, saying: "The brother was dead and has revived; he had perished and has been found." "Why, then," he says, "do you not baptize me, so that you may wash me from sins?" I answer: because I do not inflict injury upon the emperor's character when I correct the deserter's error. "Why," he says, "do I not at least perform penance among you?" Rather, unless you perform it, you will not be able to be saved. For how will you rejoice that you have been corrected unless you grieve that you were perverse? "What, then," they say, "do we receive among you when we pass over to you?" I answer: indeed, you do not receive baptism, which could be present in you outside the joining together of the body of Christ but could not profit you; but you receive the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace—without which no one will be able to see God—and charity, which, as it is written, covers a multitude of sins. § 2. But if we consider what is written in the Book of Wisdom, "Therefore the just carried away the spoils of the impious," and likewise what is read in Proverbs, "But the riches of the impious are stored up for the just," then we shall see that it is not to be asked who possesses the property of heretics, but who are in the fellowship of the just. Likewise after some things: § 3. If the body of Christ carries away the spoils of the impious, and the riches of the impious are stored up for the body of Christ, the impious ought not to remain outside so that they may make false accusations, but to enter so that they may rather be justified. Likewise after some things: § 4. Therefore, let them come into the joining together of Christ's body and possess their labors not from the desire to dominate but from the piety of using them well. But we, as has already been said, have purged our will from the filth of this desire, with any enemy as judge, when, so far as we are able, we seek those very persons whose labors they are said to be, so that with us in Catholic fellowship they may use both theirs and ours. GRATIAN. Therefore, by these authorities it is clearly shown that the things that are possessed evilly by heretics are justly taken from them by Catholics, and that Catholics are not therefore said to possess another's property.

C. IV. Qui a corpore Christi preciditur spiritum iusticiae tenere non potest.

Idem in epistola ad Vincentium. Quemadmodum membrum, si precidatur ab hominis uiui corpore, non potest tenere spiritum uitae, sic homo, qui preciditur de Christi iusti corpore, nullo modo potest tenere spiritum iusticiae, etiamsi figuram membri teneat, quam sumpsit in corpore. In huius uero conpagem corporis ueniant, et labores suos non dominandi cupiditate, sed bene utendi pietate possideant. Nos autem uoluntatem nostram, ut iam dictum est, ab huius cupiditatis sordibus quolibet inimico iudicante purgamus, quando eos ipsos, quorum labores dicuntur, ut nobiscum et illis, et nostris in societate catholica utantur, quantum ualemus, inquirimus. §. 1. Sed hoc est, inquiunt, quod nos mouet: si iniusti sumus, quare nos queritis? Quibus respondemus: querimus uos iniustos, ne permaneatis iniusti; querimus perditos, ut de inuentis gaudere possimus, dicentes: "Mortuus erat frater, et reuixit; perierat, et inuentus est." Quare ergo me, inquit, non baptizas, ut abluas me a peccatis? Respondeo, quia non facio iniuriam caracteri inperatoris, cum errorem corrigo desertoris. Quare, inquit, apud te uel penitenciam non ago? Immo, nisi egeris, saluus esse non poteris. Quomodo enim gaudebis te esse correctum, nisi doleas te fuisse peruersum? Quid ergo, inquiunt, apud uos, cum ad uos transimus, accipimus? Respondeo, non quidem accipitis baptismum, qui uobis extra compagem corporis Christi inesse potuit, prodesse non potuit: sed accipitis unitatem Spiritus in uinculo pacis (sine qua nemo poterit uidere Deum) et karitatem, que, sicut scriptum est, operit multitudinem peccatorum. §. 2. Si autem consideremus quod scriptum est in libro Sapientiae: "Ideo iusti tulerunt spolia inpiorum;" item, quod legitur in Prouerbiis: "Thesaurizantur autem iustis diuitiae inpiorum," tunc uidebimus, non esse querendum, qui habeant res hereticorum, sed qui sint in societate iustorum. Item post aliqua: §. 3. Si corpus Christi tollit spolia inpiorum, et corpori Christi thesaurizant diuitiae inpiorum, non debent inpii foras remanere, ut calumpnientur, sed intrare ut pocius iustificentur. Item post aliqua: §. 4. In Christi ergo conpagem corporis ueniant, et labores suos non dominandi cupiditate, sed bene utendi pietate possideant. Nos autem uoluntatem nostram, ut iam dictum est, ab huius cupiditatis sordibus quolibet inimico iudicante purgauimus, quando eos ipsos, quorum labores dicuntur, ut nobiscum et illis, et nostris in societate catholica utantur, quantum ualemus, inquirimus. Gratianus. His igitur auctoritatibus liquido monstratur, quod ea, que ab hereticis male possidentur, a catholicis iuste auferuntur, nec ideo aliena possidere dicuntur.

Question VIII

GRATIAN. PART I. But concerning bishops or any clerics, that they are able to take up arms neither by their own authority nor by the authority of the Roman Pontiff is easily proved. For when Peter, who had been chosen first of the Apostles by the Lord, wielded the material sword in order to defend his master from the injury of the Jews, he heard: "Turn your sword into its sheath, for everyone who shall have taken up the sword will perish by the sword," as though it were openly said to him: "Until now it was lawful for you and your predecessors to persecute the enemies of God with the bodily sword; henceforth, as an example of patience, turn your sword—that is, the one granted to you until now—into its sheath, and wield only the spiritual sword, which is the word of God, in the slaughter of the old life." For everyone apart from that man, or the authority of him, who uses lawful power—who, as the Apostle says, does not bear the sword without cause, to whom also every soul ought to be subject—everyone, I say, who shall have taken up the sword apart from his authority will perish by the sword. § 1. Likewise Ambrose: "The weapons of a bishop are tears and prayers." Likewise that saying of the Apostle, "Not defending yourselves, dearly beloved," although it is said generally to all, is nevertheless understood to have been said specially to prelates. [PALEA. Hence Pope John VIII, excusing Bishop John from military service, says to the Empress Engelberga:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. De episcopis uero uel quibuslibet clericis, quod nec sua auctoritate, nec auctoritate Romani Pontificis arma arripere ualeant, facile probatur. Cum enim Petrus, qui primus apostolorum a Domino fuerat electus, materialem exerceret gladium, ut magistrum a Iudeorum iniuria defensaret, audiuit: "Conuerte gladium tuum in uaginam, omnis enim, qui acceperit gladium, gladio peribit," ac si aperte ei diceretur: hactenus tibi tuisque predecessoribus inimicos Dei corporali gladio licuit persequi; deinceps in exemplum patienciae gladium tuum, id est tibi hactenus concessum, in uaginam conuerte, et spiritualem tantum gladium, qui est uerbum Dei, in mactatione ueteris uitae exerce. Omnis enim preter illum, uel auctoritatem eius, qui legitima potestate utitur, qui, ut Apostolos ait, non sine causa gladium portat, cui etiam omnis anima subdita esse debet, omnis, inquam, qui preter huius auctoritatem gladium acceperit gladio peribit. §. 1. Item Ambrosius: "Arma episcopi lacrimae sunt et orationes." Item illud Apostoli: "Non uosmetipsos defendentes, karissimi," quamuis omnibus generaliter dicatur specialiter tamen prelatis dictum intelligitur. [PALEA. Unde Iohannes Papa VIII. Angebergae Inperatrici, excusans Iohannem episcopum remoueri de milicia, dicit:

C. I. On the same matter.

He assuredly fears exceedingly, and rightly dreads, to perform secular military service contrary to the profession of his order. To defend the land, to treat of battles and arms, belongs to the earthly power.]

[PALEA.

> C. I. De eodem.
> Nimium certe ueretur, et iure formidat contra professionem sui ordinis secularem miliciam exercere; terram defendere, de preliis tractare, de armis, terrenae potestatis est.]
> [PALEA.

C. II. On the same matter.

Likewise Pope Innocent. When the Lord, he says, was being seized by the Jews, and Peter cut off the ear of a certain disobedient man, he prohibited striking and, as the model of all priests—of whom he was the first—prohibited taking up carnal arms even for himself.]

[PALEA.

> C. II. De eodem.
> Item Innocentius Papa. Cum a Iudeis, inquit, Dominus caperetur, et Petrus cuiusdam inobedientis aurem abscinderet, ferire prohibuit, et forma omnium sacerdotum (quorum prior erat) etiam pro se ipso capi arma carnalia prohibuit.]
> [PALEA.

C. III. On the same matter.

Likewise Ambrose. The soldiers of Christ do not seek iron javelins, do not seek arms. When compelled to fight back, I did not know how; but sorrow, weeping, prayers, and tears were my weapons against the soldiers. For such are the fortifications of a priest. Otherwise I neither ought nor am able to resist; but I am not accustomed to flee and abandon the church. Not bodily guard, but the providence of the Lord, is accustomed to enclose a servant of Christ.] GRATIAN. Hence also concerning those who die in war or in a brawl, it was established thus in the Council of Tribur:

C. III. De eodem.

Item Ambrosius. Non pila querunt ferrea, non arma Christi milites. Coactus repugnare non noui: sed dolor, fletus, orationes, lacrimae fuerunt mihi arma aduersus milites. Talia enim munimenta sunt sacerdotis. Aliter nec debeo, nec possum resistere; fugere autem, et relinquere ecclesiam non soleo. Seruum Christi non custodia corporalis, sed Domini prouidentia sepire consueuit.] Gratian. Hinc etiam de his, qui in bello aut in rixa moriuntur, in Concilio Triburiensi sic statutum est:

C. IV. For a cleric who dies in war or in a brawl, prayer or oblation is not to be offered.

Whatever cleric shall have died either in war, or in a brawl, or in the games of gentiles, let no petition be made for him either in the oblation or in prayer, but let him fall into the hands of the judge; nevertheless, let him not be deprived of burial.

C. IV. Pro clerico, qui in bello aut in rixa moritur oratio uel oblatio non offeratur.

Quicumque clericus aut in bello, aut in rixa, aut gentilium ludis mortuus fuerit, neque in oblatione, neque in oratione pro eo postuletur, sed in manus incidat iudicis; sepultura tamen non priuetur.

C. V. Let clerics who voluntarily take up arms be thrust into a monastery after losing their grade.

Likewise from the [Fourth] Council of Toledo, [c. 44], concerning clerics bearing arms. Clerics who shall be found willingly to have taken up arms in any faction, after losing the grade of their order, are to be handed over perpetually to a monastery.

C. V. Gradu amisso in monasterio trudantur clerici uoluntarie arma sumentes.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano [IV. c. 44.] de clericis arma ferentibus. Clerici, qui in quacumque factione arma uolentes sumpserint, reperti amisso ordinis sui gradu in monasterio perhenniter tradantur.

C. VI. Clerics bearing military arms are to be punished by loss of their own grade.

Likewise from the Council of Meaux, [c. 37]. Whoever are seen to be of the clergy are not to take up military arms or proceed armed, but are to exhibit the designation of their profession by religious morals and religious dress. But if they disdain this, as despisers of the sacred canons and profaners of ecclesiastical authority they are to be punished by loss of their own grade, because they cannot serve as soldiers for God and the age at the same time. PART II. GRATIAN. To these things answer is made thus: priests ought not to take up arms with their own hand, but it is lawful for them to exhort others to take them up for the defense of the oppressed and the assault upon the enemies of God. Hence Leo IV writes to Emperor Louis:

C. VI. Proprii gradus amissione mulctentur militaria arma clerici ferentes.

Item ex Concilio Meldensi. [c. 37.] Quicumque ex clero uidentur esse, arma militaria non sumant, nec armati incedant; sed professionis suae uocabulum religiosis moribus et religioso habitu prebeant. Quod si contempserint, tamquam sacrorum canonum contemptores et ecclesiasticae auctoritatis profanatores proprii gradus amissione mulctentur, quia non possunt simul Deo et seculo militare. II. Pars. Gratian.

His ita respondetur: Sacerdotes propria manu arma arripere non debent; sed alios ad arripiendum, ad oppressorum defensionem, atque ad inimicorum Dei oppugnationem eis licet hortari. Unde Leo IV. scribit Ludouico Augusto:

C. VII. On account of the Saracens, the Pope orders the people to be assembled and to meet them at the seashore.

Therefore, since adverse reports frequently arrive from the regions of the Saracens, certain persons were saying that Saracens would come secretly and furtively into the port of the Romans. On this account we ordered our people to be assembled, decreed that they descend to the maritime shore, and departed from Rome.

C. VII. Pro Sarracenis Papa iubet populum congregari, et eis ad litus maris occurrere.

Igitur cum sepe aduersa a Sarracenorum partibus perueniant nuntia, quidam in Romanorum portum Sarracenos clam furtiueque uenturos esse dicebant. Pro quo nostrum precipimus congregari populum, maritimumque ad litus descendere decreuimus, et egressi sumus Romam.

C. VIII. The Pope ought to be the avenger and principal helper of his flock.

Likewise. You ought to know that we never suffer our men to be oppressed by anyone; but if any necessity shall occur, we avenge them in person, because we ought in all things to be the avengers and principal helpers of our flock.

C. VIII. Ultor sui gregis Papa debet esse ac precipuus adiutor.

Item. Scire uos oportet, quod numquam ab aliquibus nostros homines sinimus opprimi; sed, si necessitas ulla incurrerit, presentialiter uindicamus, quia nostri gregis in omnibus ultores esse debemus et precipui adiutores.

C. IX. He who dies in defense of Christians obtains the heavenly kingdom from God.

The same to the army of the Franks. Having laid aside every fear and terror, strive to act manfully against the enemies of the holy faith and the adversaries of all religions. For the Almighty knows, if any one of you dies, that he died for the truth of the faith, the salvation of the fatherland, and the defense of Christians; therefore, he will obtain the heavenly reward from God.

C. IX. Celeste regnum a Deo consequitur qui pro Christianorum defensione moritur.

Idem exercitui Francorum. Omni timore ac terrore deposito, contra inimicos fidei sanctae et aduersarios omnium religionum uiriliter agere studete. Nouit enim omnipotens, si quilibet uestrorum morietur, quod pro ueritate fidei, et saluatione patriae, ac defensione Christianorum mortuus est, ideo ab eo celeste premium consequetur.

C. X. At the prayers of Pope Hadrian, Charles undertook war against the Lombards.

Likewise Alcuin. King Charles, prevailed upon by the exhortation and prayers of Hadrian, bishop of the city of Rome, undertook war against the Lombards—a war that previously, with the Pope entreating, had indeed been undertaken by his father too with great difficulty.

C. X. Contra Longobardos precibus Adriani Papae Karolus bellum suscepit.

Item Alcuinus. Hortatu et precibus Adriani Romanae urbis episcopi exoratus Karolus rex bellum contra Longobardos suscepit, quod prius quidem et a patre eius Papa supplicante, cum magna difficultate susceptum est.

C. XI. We ought not to persecute the Jews, but the Saracens.

Likewise Pope Alexander [II] to all the bishops of Spain. The cause of the Jews and that of the Saracens are plainly unlike. For war is justly waged against the latter, who persecute Christians and drive them from cities and their own dwelling places; the former are everywhere prepared to serve.

C. XI. Iudeos non debemus persequi, sed Sarracenos.

Item Alexander Papa [II.] omnibus Episcopis Hispaniae. Dispar nimirum est Iudeorum et Sarracenorum causa. In illos enim, qui Christianos persecuntur, et ex urbibus et propriis sedibus pellunt, iuste pugnatur; hii ubique seruire parati sunt.

C. XII. He who does not correct crimes that he can amend commits them himself.

Likewise John VIII to the glorious Duke Demago. Moreover, we exhort the zeal of your devotion that you be inflamed the more vehemently against the petty sea-robbers who rage against worshipers of Christ under the pretext of your name, the more you recognize that the reputation of your name has been darkened by their depravity; for although it can be believed that they lie in ambush for those sailing against your will, nevertheless, because they are said to be able to be restrained by you, unless you check them, you will not be held innocent.

For it is written: "He who does not correct crimes that he can amend commits them himself."

C. XII. Qui crimina, que potest emendare, non corrigit, ipse conmittit.

Item Iohannes VIII. Demago Duci glorioso. Preterea deuotionis tuae studium exhortamur, ut contra marinos latrunculos, qui sub pretextu tui nominis in Christicolas debachantur, tanto uehementius accendaris, quanto illorum prauitate famam tui nominis obfuscatam fuisse cognoscis; quoniam, licet credi possit, quod te nolente illi nauigantibus insidientur, tamen, quia a te conprimi posse dicuntur, nisi eos conpescueris, innoxius non habeberis.

Scriptum quippe est: "Qui crimina, que potest emendare, non corrigit, ipse conmittit."

C. XIII. To punish crimes for God is not cruelty but piety.

Likewise Jerome to Riparius, [against Vigilantius]. I have read of the lance of Phinehas, the sternness of Elijah, the zeal of Simon the Canaanite, the severity of Peter slaying Ananias and Sapphira, and the constancy of Paul, who condemned Elymas the magician, resisting the ways of the Lord, to perpetual blindness. To punish crimes for God is not cruelty but piety. Hence it is also said in the law: "If your brother, and your friend, and the wife who sleeps in your bosom should wish to turn you away from the truth, let your hand be upon them, and you shall shed their blood."

C. XIII. Crimina pro Deo punire non est crudelitas sed pietas.

Item Ieronimus ad Riparium. [contra Vigilantium] Legi syromasten Finees, austeritatem Helyae, et zelum Simonis Chananei, Petri seueritatem Ananiam et Saphiram trucidantis, Pauli constantiam, qui Helimam magum uiis Domini resistentem eterna cecitate dampnauit. Non est crudelitas pro Deo crimina punire, sed pietas. Unde et in lege dicitur: "Si frater tuus, et amicus tuus, et uxor, que in sinu tuo dormit, deprauare te uoluerit a ueritate, sit manus tua super eos, et effundes sanguinem ipsorum."

C. XIV. Certain things were lawful in the Old Testament that are now prohibited.

Likewise John Chrysostom on Matthew, homily XVII, [at c. 5]. Phinehas killed a man, and it was reckoned to him as justice. But Abraham, made not only a homicide but even a parricide—which certainly is graver—pleased God more. But Peter committed a double homicide; nevertheless, what was done was a spiritual work. Therefore, let us attend not only to the works but to the time, the cause, and the will; let us also inquire most diligently into the difference of the persons and however many other things attended the works themselves. For we cannot otherwise arrive at the truth.

C. XIV. Quedam in ueteri testamento licebant, que modo prohibentur.

Item Iohannes Crisostomus super Mattheum omelia XVII. [ad c. 5.] Occidit Finees hominem, et reputatum est illi ad iusticiam. Abraham uero, non solum homicida, uerum etiam patricida (quod certe est grauius) effectus Deo magis placuit. Petrus uero geminum fecit homicidium: fuit tamen opus spirituale, quod factum est. Non solum igitur respiciamus ad opera, sed ad tempus, et ad causam, et ad uoluntatem, personarum quoque differentiam, et quantacumque alia ipsis operibus acciderunt, diligentissime requiramus. Non enim possumus aliter ad ueritatem peruenire.

C. XV. When necessity presses, it is lawful to enter upon war even during the days of Lent.

Likewise Nicholas in the responses to the Bulgarians, [c. 46]. If no necessity presses, one must abstain from battles not only in the time of Lent but at every time. But if unavoidable urgency presses, without doubt the preparation of wars is not to be spared even in the time of Lent for the defense both of oneself and of the fatherland or of the paternal laws, lest, assuredly, a man appear to tempt God if he has something that he can do and does not take care to provide for his own salvation and theirs, and does not take precautions against losses to the holy religion.

C. XV. Necessitate instante etiam a quadragesimalibus diebus bellum inire licet.

Item Nycolaus ad consulta Bulgarorum. [c. 46.] Si nulla urget necessitas, non solum quadragesimali tempore, sed etiam omni tempore est a preliis abstinendum. Si autem ineuitabilis urget inportunitas, nec quadragesimali tempore pro defensione tam sua quam patriae, seu legum paternarum, est bellorum proculdubio preparationi parcendum, ne uidelicet Deum uideatur homo temptare, si habet quod faciat, et suae ac illorum saluti consulere non procurat, et sanctae religionis detrimenta non precauet.

C. XVI. Peter handed Ananias and Sapphira over to death by rebuking them.

Likewise Gregory in the Dialogues, [Book II, c. 30]. Peter, who raised the dead Tabitha by praying, handed Ananias and Sapphira, when they lied, over to death by rebuking them. For he is not read to have prayed for their destruction, but only to have rebuked the fault that they had perpetrated. It is therefore established that sometimes such things are exhibited from power, sometimes from entreaty, since by rebuking he took life away from these persons, and by praying he restored it to her.

C. XVI. Petrus Ananiam et Saphiram increpando morti tradidit.

Item Gregorius in Dialogis. [lib. II. c. 30.] Petrus, qui Tabitam mortuam orando suscitauit, Ananiam et Saphiram mentientes morti increpando tradidit. Neque enim orasse in eorum extinctione legitur, sed solummodo culpam, quam perpetrauerant, increpasse. Constat ergo, quia aliquando talia ex potestate exhibentur, aliquando expostulatione, dum et istis increpando uitam abstulit, et illi reddidit orando.

C. XVII. Blessed Gregory exhorts certain persons to assemble soldiers and manfully prepare arms against the enemies.

The same to Velox, Master [of the Soldiers], [Book XII, epistle 21]. Previously we also notified your Glory that soldiers had been prepared to come there; but because your letter had signified that the enemies had been assembled and were ranging here, this cause detained them here. But now it has seemed useful that some soldiers be sent there. Let your Glory take care to admonish and exhort them to be prepared for labor; and, when an occasion has been found, speak with our glorious sons Mauricius and Vitalianus, and do whatever, with God as helper, they persuade you is for the advantage of the commonwealth. And if you learn that the unspeakable Arnulf is making an incursion here or toward the regions of Ravenna, labor at his rear, as befits strong men, so that your reputation may, with God's aid, advance further in the commonwealth according to the quality of your labor. Nevertheless, before all things we admonish you to release without any delay or excuse the household of Aloyn, Adobin, Vigild, and Grussing, who are known to be with the glorious master of the soldiers Mauricius, so that, when the aforesaid men come there, they ought to march with them without any impediment.

C. XVII. B. Gregorius quosdam hortatur, ut milites congregent, et contra hostes arma uiriliter parent.

Idem Veloci, Magistro. [lib. XII. ep. 21.] Et pridem gloriae uestrae notificauimus quia milites illuc erant parati uenire; sed quoniam inimicos congregatos et huc discurrere epistola uestra significauerat, hec eos hic causa retinuit. Nunc uero utile est uisum, ut aliquanti illuc milites transmittantur, quos gloria tua ammonere et hortari, ut parati sint ad laborem, studeat, et occasione inuenta cum gloriosis filiis nostris Marcio et Vitalio loquere, et quecumque uobis Deo adiutore pro utilitate reipublicae persuaserint facite; et si huc uel ad Rauennae partes nec dicendum Arnulfum cognoueritis excurrere, uos a dorso eius ita, sicut uiros fortes condecet, laborate, quatinus opinio uestra ex laboris uestri qualitate amplius in republica Deo auxiliante proficiat. Illud tamen pre omnibus ammonemus, ut familiam Aloyn, et Adobin, Vigildi, atque Grussingi, qui cum glorioso magistro militum Mauricio esse noscuntur, sine aliqua mora uel excusatione relaxes, quatinus uenientes illuc homines predicti uiri sine aliquo inpedimento cum eis debeant ambulare.

[C. XVIII.]

Likewise the same to Mauricius and Vitalianus, [Book XII, epistle 23]. Through our son Vitalianus, with whom you had also deliberated, we humbly commanded your Glory both by word and in writing. But on the eleventh day of the month of June Arnulf sent this letter that we directed to you; and therefore, reading it again, see whether the inhabitants of Suana have persisted in the fidelity that they promised to the commonwealth, and receive from them worthy hostages in whom you can trust, and in addition bind them anew by oaths, returning to them what you took in the place of a pledge and healing them by your words. But if you learn most manifestly that they spoke with Arnulf concerning their subjection, or certainly gave hostages to him—as Arnulf's letter that we directed to you has rendered us doubtful—then, considering the matter with salutary counsel, lest your soul or ours be burdened in any respect concerning the oaths, perform whatever you judge useful to the commonwealth. But let your Glory act in such a way that there is neither anything for which we can be reproved by the adversaries, nor is the advantage of the commonwealth—which may the Lord avert—neglected. Moreover, glorious sons, be solicitous, because, so far as I have learned, the enemy has a multitude assembled and is said to reside at Narina; so that, if with God angry with him he should wish to direct his course here, either plunder his places—so far as the Lord shall assist you—or certainly let the scouts whom you send search carefully, lest, angered by what has been done, he range against you. GRATIAN. It is also read in the register that blessed Gregory commanded the citizens of Tuscany to prepare arms against the Lombards and decreed stipends for those serving as soldiers. Therefore, from this example and the preceding authorities, it is clear that although priests ought not to take up arms with their own hand, nevertheless they are able either to persuade those to whom offices of this kind have been committed, or by their authority to command any persons, to take them up. PART III. § 1. But that saying of Nicholas to Emperor Charles is objected:

[C. XVIII.]

Item Eiusdem Mauricio et Vitaliano. [lib. XII. epist. 23.] Suppliciter gloriae uestrae per filium nostrum Vitalianum, cum quo et tractaueratis, et uerbo et scripto mandauimus. Undecimo autem die mensis Iunii Arnulfus hanc epistolam, quam uobis direximus, transmisit, et ideo relegentes eam uidete, si in fide Suanenses, quam reipublicae promiserunt, perstiterunt, obsidesque dignos, de quibus possitis confidere, ab eis accipite, et insuper denuo eos sacramentis astringite, reddentes eis quod loco Pignoris sustulistis sermonibus uestris eos sanantes. Si autem manifestissime cognoueritis, eos cum Arnulfo de sua subiectione locutos fuisse, uel certe obsides ei dedisse, sicut nos Arnulfi epistola, quam uobis direximus, dubios reddidit, salubri consilio pertractantes, ne in aliquo anima uestra uel nostra de sacramentis grauetur, quicquid reipublicae utile iudicaueritis peragite. Sed ita faciat gloria uestra, ut neque sit aliquid, unde possimus ab aduersariis reprehendi, neque utilitas reipublicae (quod Dominus auertat) negligatur. Preterea, gloriosi filii, estote solliciti, quia, quantum conperi, hostis multitudinem habet collectam, et Narina dicitur residere; ut si huc cursum, Deo sibi irato, mittere uoluerit, uel loca ipsius (quantum uos Dominus adiuuerit) depredamini, aut certe sculcas, quos mittes, sollicite requirant, ne dolens factum ad uos discurrat. Gratian. In registro etiam legitur, quod B. Gregorius ciuibus Tusciae, ut contra Longobardus arma pararent, mandauit, et militantibus stipendia decreuit. Hoc igitur exemplo et premissis auctoritatibus claret, quod sacerdotes, etsi propria manu arma arripere non debeant, tamen uel his, quibus huiusmodi offitia conmissa sunt, persuadere, uel quibuslibet, ut ea arripiant, sua auctoritate ualeant inperare. III. Pars. §. 1. Sed obicitur illud Nycolai ad Imperatorem Karolum:

C. XIX. Bishops ought not to be occupied with military affairs.

It is established to be exceedingly reprehensible that you added, saying that the greater part of all the bishops keep watch day and night with your other faithful men against maritime pirates, and that for this reason the bishops are impeded from coming, since it belongs to Christ's soldiers to serve Christ, but let the soldiers of the age serve the age, as it is written: "No one serving as a soldier for God entangles himself in secular affairs." But if the soldiers of the age devote themselves to military service, what pertains to bishops and Christ's soldiers except that they be free for prayers?

C. XIX. Episcopi non debent militaribus occupari negociis.

Reprehensibile ualde esse constat quod subintulisti, dicendo, maiorem partem omnium episcoporum die noctuque cum aliis fidelibus tuis contra piratas maritimos inuigilare, ob idque episcopi inpediantur uenire, cum militum Christi sit Christo seruire, milites uero seculi seruiant seculo, sicut scriptum est: "Nemo militans Deo inplicat se negociis secularibus." Quod si seculi milites miliciae student, quid ad episcopos et milites Christi, nisi ut uacent orationibus?

C. XX. Let bishops fear to involve themselves in the death of any man.

Likewise Gregory, [Book VII, epistle 1, to Sabinianus]. If I had wished to involve myself in the death of the Lombards, today the nation of the Lombards would have neither king nor duke. But because I fear God, I fear to involve myself in the death of any man. GRATIAN. Behold, Pope Nicholas prohibits bishops from being occupied with secular military service and does not even permit them to approach battle against maritime pirates. How, therefore, does Pope Leo depart from the city against the Saracens and call the people together from every direction to keep them far from the shore, and personally avenge the injuries of his people, and, with Gregory, invite soldiers to arms? But it is to be noted that certain bishops are content with only the Levitical portion, who, just as they are numbered only in the lot of God, so receive God himself alone as an inheritance, saying: "The Lord is the portion of my inheritance." These have nothing in common with the princes of the age, because they cast temporal things entirely aside, lest on their occasion they be held liable to the laws of the emperors. No occasion for occupation in secular military service is left to such persons, because, since they live from tithes and first fruits, as sons of the highest king they are free from earthly exactions throughout every kingdom, so that they are able to say: "The prince of this world comes, and in us he has nothing." But there are others who, not content with tithes and first fruits, possess estates, villages, castles, and cities, from which they owe tributes to Caesar unless by imperial benignity they have merited immunity from things of this kind. To them it is said by the Lord: "Render the things that are Caesar's to Caesar, and the things that are God's to God." To them the same Apostle says: "Render to all the things owed: tribute to whom tribute is owed; tax to whom tax." Hence Ambrose, [to his sister Marcellina, epistle 33]:

C. XX. In morte cuiuslibet hominis episcopi se miscere formident.

Item Gregorius. [lib. VII. epist. I., ad Sabinianum] Si in morte Longobardorum me miscere uoluissem, hodie Longobardorum gens nec regem, nec ducem, haberet. Sed quia Deum timeo in mortem cuiuslibet hominis ne miscere formido. Gratian. Ecce quod Nycolaus Papa prohibet episcopos seculari milicia occupari, nec etiam contra maritimos piratas permittit eos ad pugnam accedere. Quomodo ergo Leo Papa aduersus Sarracenos urbem egreditur, et, ut procul eos a littore arceat, populum undique conuocat, et suorum iniurias presentialiter uindicat, atque cum Gregorio milites ad arma inuitat? Sed notandum est, quosdam episcopos Leuitica tantum portione esse contentos, qui, sicut in Dei sorte tantum numerantur, sic ipsum Deum solummodo in hereditatem accipiunt, dicentes: "Dominus pars hereditatis meae est." His nichil commune est cum principibus seculi, quia temporalia penitus abiciunt, ne eorum occasione legibus inperatorum obnoxii teneantur. Talibus nulla occasio relinquitur occupationis secularis miliciae, quia, cum de decimis et primiciis uiuunt tamquam summi regis filii in omni regno a terrenis exactionibus liberi sunt ita, ut dicere ualeant: "Venit princeps mundi huius, et in nobis non habet quicquam." Porro alii sunt, qui non contenti decimis et primiciis, predia, uillas, et castella, et ciuitates possident, ex quibus Cesari debent tributa, nisi inperiali benignitate inmunitatem promeruerint ab huiusmodi. Quibus a Domino dicitur: "Reddite que sunt Cesaris Cesari; et que sunt Dei Deo." Quibus idem Apostolus: "Reddite omnibus debita, cui tributum, tributum; cui uectigal, uectigal." Unde Ambrosius: [ad Marcellinam sororem, epist. XXXIII.]

C. XXI. Let churches not be subject to emperors.

I myself am approached by counts so that through me a prompt surrender of the basilica might be made, saying that the emperor by his right had ordered that it ought to be surrendered, seeing that all things were in his power. I answered: if he sought from me what is mine—that is, my estate, my silver, anything of this kind that is mine—I would not resist, although all the things that are mine belong to the poor; but the things that are divine are not subject to imperial power. If he seeks the patrimony, invade it; if my body, I shall meet him. Do you wish to drag me into chains? Do you wish to drag me to death? It is a pleasure to me. I shall not fortify myself by a surrounding mass of peoples, nor shall I hold the altars while entreating for life; but I shall freely be sacrificed for the altars. For I shuddered in spirit when I learned that armed men had been sent to occupy the church's basilica, lest, while the people claimed the basilica, some slaughter occur that would come to the destruction of the whole city. I prayed that I might not survive the funeral pyre of so great a city, or rather of all Italy. And below: § 1. It is commanded: surrender the basilica. This is: "Speak some word against God and die"; and not only speak against God, but also act against God. It is commanded: surrender the altars of God. Therefore, we are pressed by royal commands, but we are strengthened by the words of Scripture, which answered: "You have spoken as one of the foolish women." And below: § 2. Why, therefore, are you disturbed? Willingly I shall never desert you; when compelled to fight back, I did not know how. I shall be able to grieve, I shall be able to weep, I shall be able to groan. Against arms and soldiers, even Goths, my tears are my weapons. For such are the fortifications of a priest. Otherwise I neither ought nor am able to resist. § 3. Would that I were secure that the church would by no means be handed over to heretics. I would gladly go to the emperor's palace, if this suited the office of a priest, so that I might contend in the palace rather than in the church. But in the council chamber Christ is accustomed to be not the accused but the judge. Who would deny that the cause of the faith is to be conducted in the church? If anyone is confident, let him come here. And below: § 4. It is alleged that all things are lawful for the emperor and that all things are his. I answer: do not burden yourself, emperor, by thinking that you have any imperial right over the things that are divine; do not exalt yourself, but if you wish to rule longer, be subject to God. It is written: "The things of God to God; the things of Caesar to Caesar." Palaces pertain to emperors; churches to priests. The right over the public fortifications has been entrusted to you, not the sacred things. Again it is said to me: "The emperor has commanded; I too ought to have one basilica." I answer: it is not lawful for you to have it. What have you to do with an adulteress? For she is an adulteress who is not joined to Christ in lawful marriage. And below: § 5. We know that Naboth, a holy man and possessor of his own vineyard, was assailed by a royal request that he give his vineyard, where the king, after the vines had been cut down, might sow cheap vegetables; and that he answered: "Far be it that I hand over the inheritance of my fathers." We know that the king was saddened because another's right was denied to him by a just reply, but, deceived by a woman's counsel, came into the field through death. For holy Naboth defended his vines even with his own blood. If he did not hand over his vineyard, shall we hand over the church of Christ? What, then, was answered contumaciously by me? For when approached, I said: "Far be it from me that I hand over Christ's inheritance." Naboth did not hand over his own; shall I hand over Christ's inheritance? But I added this: "Far be it that I hand over the inheritance of Dionysius, who died in exile for the cause of the faith, the inheritance of Eustorgius the confessor, the inheritance of Mirocles, and of all the faithful bishops of earlier times." I answered what belongs to a priest. Let the emperor do what belongs to the emperor. It is prior that he take away my soul rather than my faith. And below: § 6. Caesar's tribute is not denied. The church belongs to God. Assuredly, it is not owed to Caesar, because God's temple cannot be Caesar's right. No one can deny that this was said with honor for the emperor. For what is more honorable than that the emperor be called a son of the church? What is said is said without sin; it is said with grace. For the emperor is within the church. A good emperor seeks the church's aid; he does not reject it. And below: § 7. If something were exacted and sought from me—either an estate, or a house, or gold, or silver, that which belonged to my right—I would willingly offer it. From the temple of God I can neither take anything away nor hand it over. I received it to be guarded, not surrendered. Furthermore, I also take counsel for the emperor's salvation, because neither would it be expedient for me to surrender it nor for him to receive it. Let him receive the voice of a free priest; if he wishes counsel to be taken for him, let him withdraw from injury to Christ. These things are full of humility and, as I judge, full of the affection that a priest owes to the emperor.

C. XXI. Ecclesiae inperatoribus non sint obnoxiae.

Conuenior ipse a comitibus ut per me basilicae fieret matura traditio, dicentibus, inperatorem iure suo iussisse tradi debere utpote in cuius potestate essent omnia. Respondi, si a me peteret quod meum est, id est fundum meum, argentum meum, huiusmodi meum, me non refragaturum, quanquam omnia, que mea sunt, sint pauperum; uerum ea, que diuina sunt, inperatoriae potestati non esse subiecta. Si patrimonium petit, inuadite; si corpus, occurram. Vultis in uincula rapere? uultis in mortem? uoluntatis est michi, non ego me uallabo circumfusione populorum, nec altaria tenebo uitam obsecrans; sed pro altaribus gratis inmolabor. Horrebam quippe animo, cum armatos ad basilicam ecclesiae occupandam missos cognoscerem, ne, dum populus basilicam uendicat, aliqua strages fieret, que in perniciem totius ueniret ciuitatis; orabam, ne tantae urbis, uel pocius totius Italiae busto superuiuerem. Et infra: §. 1. Mandatur, trade basilicam, hoc est: "Dic aliquod uerbum in Deum, et morere," nec solum dic aduersus Deum, sed etiam fac aduersus Deum. Mandatur, trade altaria Dei. Urgemur igitur regalibus preceptis; sed confirmamur scripturae sermonibus, que respondit: "Tamquam una ex insipientibus locuta es." Et infra: §. 2. Quid igitur turbamini? uolens numquam uos deseram; coactus repugnare non noui; dolere potero, flere potero, gemere potero; aduersus arma, milites Gothos quoque, lacrimae meae mea arma sunt. Talia enim munimenta sunt sacerdotis. Aliter nec debeo, nec possum resistere. §. 3. Utinam securus essem, quod ecclesia hereticis minime traderetur; ad palatium inperatoris irem libenter, si hoc congrueret sacerdotis offitio, ut in palatio magis certarem, quam in ecclesia. Sed in consistorio solet non Christus reus esse, sed iudex. Causam fidei in ecclesia agendam quis abnuat? Si quis confidit, huc ueniat. Et infra: §. 4. Allegatur, inperatori licere omnia, ipsius esse uniuersa. Respondeo: Noli te grauare, inperator, ut putes, te in ea, que diuina sunt, inperiale aliquod ius habere; noli te extollere, sed, si uis diutius inperare, esto Deo subditus. Scriptum est: "Que Dei Deo; que Cesaris Cesari." Ad inperatores palatia pertinent, ad sacerdotes ecclesiae. Publicorum menium tibi ius conmissum est, non sacrorum. Iterum dicitur michi, mandasse inperatorem, debeo et ego unam basilicam habere. Respondeo, non licet tibi illam habere. Quid tibi cum adultera? Adultera est enim, que non est legitimo coniugio Christi copulata. Et infra: §. 5. Nabute, sanctum uirum, possessorem uineae suae scimus interpellatum petitione regia, ut uineam suam daret, ubi rex succisis uitibus olus uile sereret, eumque respondisse: "Absit, ut ego Patrum meorum tradam hereditatem." Regem contristatum esse, quod sibi esset alienum ius relatione iusta negatum: sed muliebri concilio deceptum morte in agrum uenisse. Sanctus enim Nabute uites suas uel proprio cruore defendit. Si ille uineam non tradidit suam, nos trademus ecclesiam Christi? Quid igitur a me responsum est contumaciter? Dixi enim conuentus, absit a me, ut tradam Christi hereditatem. Non tradidit Nabute suam, ego tradam Christi hereditatem? sed hoc addidi: absit, ut tradam Dyonisii hereditatem, qui in exilio causa fidei defunctus est, hereditatem Eustorgii confessoris, hereditatem Myrocletis, atque omnium fidelium retro episcoporum. Respondi ego quod sacerdotis est. Quod inperatoris est faciat inperator. Prius est, ut animam michi quam fidem auferat. Et infra: §. 6. Tributum Cesaris est, non negatur. Ecclesia Dei est. Cesari utique non debetur, quia ius Cesaris esse non potest Dei templum. Quod cum honorificentia inperatoris dictum nemo potest negare. Quid enim honorificentius, quam ut inperator ecclesiae filius esse dicatur? Quod enim dicitur, sine peccato dicitur, cum gratia dicitur. Inperator enim intra ecclesiam est. Bonus enim inperator querit auxilium ecclesiae, non refutat. Et infra: §. 7. Si de me aliquid compelleretur et posceretur, aut fundus, aut domus, aut aurum, aut argentum, id quod mei iuris esset, libenter offerrem: templo Dei nichil possum nec decerpere, nec tradere illud custodiendum, non tradendum acceperim. Deinde consulere etiam me inperatoris saluti, quia nec michi expediret tradere, nec illi accipere. Accipiat uocem liberi sacerdotis, si uult sibi esse consultum, recedat a Christi iniuria. Hec plena humilitatis sunt, et, ut arbitror, plena affectus eius, quem inperatori debet sacerdos.

C. XXII. Churches pay tribute from their external things.

Likewise Pope Urban. Tribute was found in the mouth of the fish when Peter was fishing, because from her external things, which appear openly to all, the church renders tribute. But he was not ordered to give the whole fish, but only the stater that was found in its mouth, because neither can the church be given to the emperor nor can the pontifical summit, which is preeminent in the mouth of the head of the church, be subjected to kings. But assuredly, as we have said, that which is found in the fish's mouth is ordered to be given for Peter and the Lord, because from the church's external things that which was established of old is to be paid to emperors for the peace and quiet in which they ought to protect and defend us. PART IV. GRATIAN. Although even things of this kind do not appear to be subject to imperial exactions. For when, in a time of famine, Pharaoh bought for himself the land of all the Egyptians and under the same famine subjected all of them to his servitude, he furnished necessary things to the priests in such a way that they were stripped neither of possessions nor of liberty, the Lord proclaiming from that time that priests ought to be free in every nation. Hence Constantius and Constans gave this immunity to the church, saying:

C. XXII. De suis exterioribus ecclesiae soluunt tributum.

Item Urbanus Papa. Tributum in ore piscis piscante Petro inuentum est, quia de exterioribus suis, que palam cunctis apparent, tributum ecclesia reddit. Non autem totum piscem dare iussus est, sed tantum staterem, qui in ore eius inuentus est, quia non ecclesia dari inperatori, non pontificalis apex, qui in ore capitis ecclesiae preminet, subici regibus potest. Sed sane, ut diximus, quod in ore piscis inuenitur pro Petro et Domino dari iubetur, quia de exterioribus ecclesiae, quod constitutum antiquitus est, pro pace et quiete, qua nos tueri et defensare debent, inperatoribus persoluendum est. IV. Pars. Gratian. Quamuis etiam huiusmodi non uideantur inperialibus exactionibus subiciendi. Nam, cum tempore famis cunctorum Egyptiorum terram Pharao sibi emeret, atque sub eadem fame suae seruituti cunctos subiceret, sacerdotibus ita necessaria subministrauit, ut nec possessionibus, nec libertate nudarentur, Domino ex tunc prenunciante, sacerdotes in omni gente liberos esse oportere. Unde Constantius et Constans hanc inmunitatem dederunt ecclesiae, dicentes:

[C. XXIII.]

"In any city, in any town or village, castle, or municipality, whoever by the vow of the Christian religion shall have made known to all the merit of exceptional and singular virtue, let him obtain perpetual security. We wish him always to rejoice and glory from faith, knowing that our commonwealth is sustained more by religions than by offices and bodily labor or sweat." Valentinian and Valens also decreed, saying: § 1. "We decree that all those who are established to be guardians of churches or holy places and to serve religious observances are to sustain the harassment of no exaction." Emperor Justinian: § 2. "We decree that property descending to venerable churches, guesthouses, monasteries, poorhouses, foundling homes, orphanages, homes for the aged, or any other fellowship of this kind from any curial liberality—whether made among the living, on account of death, or in last wills—is to be free and immune from registrations of lucrative acquisitions; the law that was established concerning registrations of this kind retaining its force in the case of other persons, but, from regard for piety, mitigating its force in the ecclesiastical portion or that of other houses that have been assigned to these pious fellowships." Hence it is also read in the Council of Paris:

> "In qualibet ciuitate, in quolibet oppido, uel uico, castello, municipio, quicumque uoto Christianae religionis meritum eximiae singularisque uirtutis omnibus intimauerit, securitate perpetua potiatur. Gaudere eum et gloriari ex fide uolumus semper, scientes, magis religionibus, quam offitiis et labore corporis uel sudore nostram rempublicam contineri." Valentinianus quoque et Valens decreuerunt, dicentes: §. 1. "Uniuersos, quos constiterit custodes ecclesiarum esse uel sanctorum locorum, ac religiosis obsequiis deseruire, nullius attemptationis molestiam sustinere decreuimus." Inperator Iustinianus: §. 2. "Sanccimus res ad uenerabiles ecclesias, uel xenones, monasteria, uel ptochotrophia, uel brephotrophia, uel orphanotrophia, uel gerontocomia, uel si quid tale aliud consortium descendentes ex qualicumque curiali liberalitate, siue inter uiuos, siue mortis causa, siue in ultimis uoluntatibus habita, lucratiuorum inscriptionibus liberas esse et inmunes; lege scilicet, que super huius modi inscriptionibus posita est, in aliis quidem personis suum robur obtinente, in parte autem ecclesiastica, uel aliarum domuum, que his piis consortiis deputatae sunt, suum uigorem pietatis intuitu mitigante." Hinc etiam in Parisiensi Concilio legitur:

C. XXIV. A presbyter is not to be compelled to pay a tax from an ecclesiastical field.

According to canonical authority and the constitution of the lord Emperor Louis, from an ecclesiastical field and manse, from the bondsmen whom he himself designated in his capitularies, or if anyone has bestowed something upon a church for a place of burial, from the tithes and oblations of the faithful, let no one compel any of the presbyters to pay any tax, nor let anyone of any order or dignity subtract anything therefrom or exact any temporal repayment. But if he does this, let him be deprived of communion until satisfaction and be compelled by royal power to make restitution.

C. XXV. Likewise from the Council of Worms, c. 50.

It was decreed that one entire manse be assigned to each church without any service, and that presbyters established in them render no service except ecclesiastical service from tithes, from the obligations of the faithful, from houses, from courtyards or gardens placed next to the church, or from the aforesaid manse. And if they have anything more, from it let them render the service owed to their superiors.] GRATIAN. From this it is given to be understood that from the things the church possesses by imperial benefice or from any persons for the benefit of burial, she is held bound to the right of no one except the bishop. But from the things that she shall have bought from any persons or received by donations of the living, she owes customary services to the princes, so that she both pays annual tributes to them and, when the army is summoned, sets out with them for the camps. Nevertheless, this very thing ought not to be done without the consent of the Roman Pontiff. Hence Pope Gelasius to Bishop Elpidius:

> C. XXV. Item ex Concilio Wormaciensi, c. 50.
> Sanccitum est, ut unicuique ecclesiae unus mansus integer absque ullo seruitio attribuatur, et presbiteri in eis constituti non de decimis, neque de obligationibus fidelium, non de domibus, neque de atriis, uel de hortis iuxta ecclesiam positis, neque de prescripto manso aliquod seruicium faciant preter ecclesiasticum. Et si aliquid amplius habuerint, inde maioribus suis debitum seruicium inpendant.] Gratian. Hinc datur intelligi, quod de his, que inperiali beneficio, uel a quibuslibet pro beneficio sepulturae ecclesia possidet, nullius iuri, nisi episcopi, teneatur asstricta. De his uero, que a quibuslibet emerit uel uiuorum donationibus acceperit, principibus consueta debet obsequia, ut et annua eis persoluat tributa, et conuocato exercitu cum eis proficiscatur ad castra. Quod tamen hoc ipsum non sine consensu Romani Pontificis fieri debet. Unde Gelasius Papa Elpidio Episcopo:

C. XXVI. Without the authority of the Roman Pontiff, bishops are not to dare to proceed to the imperial court.

With what audacity, with what rashness do you write in reply that you are preparing to proceed to Ravenna, when the canons evidently command that none at all of the pontiffs ought to hasten to the imperial court unless they have first seen and consulted us? How do you think lawful for you that which is not lawful, unless because you are hastening to be without this office, of which by these excesses you show yourself unworthy?

> C. XXVI. Absque auctoritate Romani Pontificis ad comitatum episcopi proficisci non audeant.
> Quo ausu, qua temeritate rescribis, ad Rauennam te parare proficisci, cum canones euidenter precipiant nullum omnino pontificum, nisi nobis ante uisis atque consultis ad comitatum debere contendere? Quemadmodum tibi putas licere quod non licet, nisi quod hoc offitio carere festinas, quo his excessibus te ostendis indignum?

C. XXVII. Without the counsel of the metropolitan or the provincial bishops, bishops are not to proceed to the emperor.

Likewise from the Council of Antioch, [c. 11]. If any bishop, presbyter, or anyone at all who has been established under the ecclesiastical rule shall proceed to the emperor without the counsel or letters of those bishops who are within the province, and especially of the metropolitan, he ought to be removed and cast out not only from communion but also deprived of his own dignity, as troublesome and importunate to the imperial ears contrary to the ecclesiastical statutes. GRATIAN. Therefore, the Gallican bishops are reproved by Nicholas because, having despised apostolic authority, they had chosen to follow arms rather than present themselves before the apostolic countenance. Although those proceeding to the imperial court can be understood not to have followed the emperor in order to assist him with arms, but to commend him with his army to God by daily prayers. In this case that authority of the Council of Sardica appears to speak, in whose eighth chapter Bishop Hosius is read to have said:

> C. XXVII. Absque metropolitani consilio uel prouincialium episcoporum ad inperatorem episcopi non pergant.
> Item ex Concilio Antioceno. [c. 11.] Si quis episcopus, uel presbiter, uel omnis omnino, qui est sub ecclesiastica regula constitutus, preter consilium uel litteras eorum episcoporum, qui intra prouinciam sunt, et maxime metropolitani, ad inperatorem perrexerit, hunc abdicari et eici non solum de conmunione debere, sed etiam propria dignitate priuari tamquam molestum et inportunum inperialibus auribus contra ecclesiastica constituta. Gratian. Reprehenduntur ergo Gallicani episcopi a Nykolao, quoniam auctoritate apostolica contempta potius arma sequi elegerant, quam apostolico conspectui sese representarent. Quamquam proficiscentes ad comitatum possunt intelligi non secuti inperatorem, ut armis sibi auxilientur, sed ipsum cum exercitu suo cottidianis orationibus Deo conmendent. In quo casu auctoritas illa Sardicensis Concilii loqui uidetur, in cuius octauo capitulo Osius Episcopus dixisse legitur:

C. XXVIII. Let bishops who have not been called by religious emperors not approach the imperial court.

If it pleases you, dearest brothers, decree that bishops not approach the imperial court, except perhaps those who shall have been either invited or called by religious emperors. But because it often happens that those who suffer injury flee to the mercy of the church, and those who, having sinned, are condemned to exile or the islands, or certainly receive any sentence, it is therefore necessary to aid them, and without doubt indulgence is to be sought for them through the church. GRATIAN. Therefore, it is lawful for prelates of the church, by the example of blessed Gregory, to ask emperors or any dukes for defense for the faithful. It is also lawful, with blessed Leo, manfully to exhort any persons to their own defense against the adversaries of the holy faith, and to summon any persons to keep the force of unbelievers far away. But it is lawful for no bishop, by his own authority or that of the emperors, to command the shedding of blood. Hence in the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 30], it is read:

> C. XXVIII. Qui a religiosis inperatoribus uocati episcopi non fuerint ad comitatum non accedant.
> Si uobis, fratres karissimi, placet, decernite, ne episcopi ad comitatum accedant, nisi forte hi, qui a religiosis inperatoribus uel inuitati uel uocati fuerint. Sed quoniam sepe contingit, ut ad misericordiam ecclesiae confugiant qui iniuriam patiuntur, et qui peccantes in exilium uel in insulas dampnantur, aut certe quamcumque sententiam suscipiunt: ideoque subueniendum his, et sine dubitatione eis est petenda per ecclesiam indulgentia. Gratian. Licet ergo prelatis ecclesiae exemplo B. Gregorii ab inperatoribus uel quibuslibet ducibus defensionem fidelibus postulare. Licet etiam cum B. Leone quoslibet ad sui defensionem contra aduersarios sanctae fidei uiriliter adhortari, atque ad uim infidelium procul arcendam quosque citare. Effusionem uero sanguinis nulli episcoporum sua uel inperatorum auctoritate inperare licet. Unde in Tolletano Concilio IV. [c. 30.] legitur:

C. XXIX. Let priests consent to be made judges where pardon from punishment is promised by oath.

Princes often entrust their affairs against any persons guilty of an offense against majesty to priests. But because priests were chosen by Christ for the ministry of salvation, let them consent to be made judges by kings where indulgence from punishment is promised by oath, not where a sentence of peril is prepared. Therefore, if any of the priests, contrary to this common counsel, shall have stood forth as an examiner in dangers belonging to others, let him be guilty of shed blood before Christ and lose his own grade before the church.

> Sepe principes contra quoslibet maiestatis obnoxios sacerdotibus negocia sua conmittunt. Quia uero sacerdotes a Christo ad ministerium salutis electi sunt, ibi consentiant regibus fieri iudices, ubi iureiurando supplicii indulgentia promittitur, non ubi discriminis sentencia preparatur. Si quis ergo sacerdotum contra hoc conmune consultum discussor in alienis periculis extiterit, sit reus effusi sanguinis apud Christum, et apud ecclesiam perdat proprium gradum.

C. XXX. Those who handle the sacraments of the Lord ought not to conduct a judgment of blood.

Likewise from the Eleventh Council of Toledo, [c. 6]. It is not lawful for those by whom the sacraments of the Lord are to be handled to conduct a judgment of blood. And therefore persons of this kind must be greatly prohibited from such excesses, lest, agitated by the impulses of indiscriminate presumption, they either presume by their own sentence to judge that which is to be punished by death, or themselves inflict mutilations upon any persons, or command them to be inflicted. But if anyone, forgetful of these precepts, should do such a thing either to the servants of his church or to any persons, let him be deprived of the honor and place of the order granted to him; let him also be held bound under the perpetual confinement of condemnation. Nevertheless, communion is not to be denied to him when departing from this life, on account of the mercy of the Lord, who does not will the death of the sinner, but that he be converted and live. GRATIAN. Others too are prohibited from carrying out mutilations of limbs and burnings of houses without judicial authority. Hence in the Decrees of Pope Eutychian:

> C. XXX. Non debent agitare iudicium sanguinis qui sacramenta Domini tractant.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano XI. [c. 6.] His a quibus Domini sacramenta tractanda sunt, iudicium sanguinis agitare non licet. Et ideo magnopere talibus excessibus prohibendum est, ne indiscretae presumptionis motibus agitati aut quod morte plectendum est sentencia propria iudicare presumant, aut per se inferant truncationes quibuslibet personis aut inferendas precipiant. Quod si quisquam horum inmemor preceptorum aut in ecclesiae suae famulis, aut in quibuslibet personis tale aliquid fecerit, concessi ordinis priuetur honore et loco; sub perpetuo quoque dampnationis teneatur ergastulo religatus. Cui tamen conmunio exeunti ex hac uita non est neganda propter Domini misericordiam, qui non uult peccatoris mortem, sed ut conuertatur et uiuat. Gratian. Ceteri etiam absque iudiciali auctoritate membrorum truncationes et domorum incendia facere prohibentur. Unde in Decretis Euticiani Papae:

C. XXXI. Let one who mutilates limbs or burns houses without judicial authority be excommunicated.

If anyone shall have carried out mutilations of limbs or burnings of houses, or ordered them to be done, or consented to the person doing them, until he shall have made amends for these things to each person legally or amicably before the bishop of the city and the other citizens, let him be separated from every fellowship of Christians as a gentile and a publican. PART VI. GRATIAN. Concerning incendiaries also Innocent II in a universal council, [c. 18], established generally, saying:

> C. XXXI. Membra detruncans, domos incendens absque iudiciali auctoritate, excommunicetur.
> Si quis membrorum truncationes, domorum incendia fecerit, siue facere iusserit aut facienti consenserit, quousque de his unicuique legaliter uel amicabiliter coram episcopo ciuitatis aliisque ciuibus non emendauerit, tamquam ethnicus et publicanus ab omni Christianorum collegio separetur. VI. Pars. Gratian. De incendiariis quoque Innocentius II. in uniuersali Concilio [c. 18.] generaliter constituit, dicens:

[C. XXXII.]

"By the authority of God and of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul, we altogether detest and prohibit the exceedingly wicked, depopulating, and horrible malice of incendiaries. § 1. Therefore, if anyone after the promulgation of this prohibition of ours, from evil zeal, whether from hatred or for vengeance, shall set fire, cause it to be set, or knowingly furnish counsel or aid to those setting it, let him be excommunicated; and if the incendiary shall have died, let him lack Christian burial. Nor is he to be absolved unless first, after the loss that he inflicted has been repaired according to his means, he swears that he will not set fire further. But let a penance be given to him that he remain in the service of God at Jerusalem or in Spain for one complete year. But if any archbishop or bishop relaxes this, let him restore the loss and abstain from the episcopal office for one year. To be sure, after archbishops and bishops have been consulted, we do not deny kings and princes the ability to execute justice."

> "Pessimam quidem et depopulatricem, et horrendam incendiariorum maliciam auctoritate Dei, et beatorum apostolorum Petri et Pauli omnino detestamur et interdicimus. §. 1. Si quis igitur post huius nostrae prohibitionis promulgationem malo studio, siue pro odio, siue pro uindicta ignem apposuerit, uel apponi fecerit, aut appositoribus consilium aut auxilium scienter tribuerit, excommunicetur, et si mortuus fuerit incendiarius, Christianorum careat sepultura, nec absoluatur, nisi prius, dampno cui intulit secundum facultatem suam resarcito, iuret, se ulterius ignem non appositurum. Penitencia autem ei detur, ut Iherosolimis aut in Hispania in seruicio Dei per annum integrum permaneat. Si quis autem archiepiscopus uel episcopus hoc relaxauerit, dampnum restituat, et per annum ab offitio episcopali abstineat. Sane regibus et principibus faciendae iusticiae facultatem consultis archiepiscopis et episcopis non negamus."

C. XXXIII. He who, not possessing a public function, kills or maims anyone is a homicide.

Likewise Augustine in the book On the City of God. "He who strikes evil men because they are evil, and has a cause for killing, is a minister of God. But he who, without any public administration, shall have killed or slaughtered an evildoer, thief, sacrilegious man, adulterer, perjurer, or any criminal, or shall have maimed him in his limbs, will be judged as a homicide, and all the more severely inasmuch as he did not fear abusively to usurp a power not granted to him by God." PART VII. GRATIAN. But concerning those who wound a man together, it is asked: if he shall have died, which of them incurs the guilt of homicide? Concerning these things it was established thus in the Council at Verberie:

C. XXXIII. Homicida est, qui, publicam functionem non habens, aliquem occidit aut debilitat.

Item Augustinus in libro de ciuitate Dei. "Qui percutit malos in eo, quod mali sunt, et habet causam interfectionis, minister Dei est. Qui uero sine aliqua publica amministratione maleficum, furem, sacrilegum, adulterum et periurum, uel quemlibet criminosum interfecerit, aut trucidauerit, uel membris debilitauerit, uelut homicida iudicabitur, et tanto acrius, quanto non sibi a Deo concessam potestatem abusiue usurpare non timuit." VII. Pars. Gratian. De his autem, qui simul hominem uulnerant, queritur, si ille mortuus fuerit, quis eorum homicidii reatum incurrat? De his ita statutum est in Concilio apud Vermerias:

C. XXXIV. If several persons fight against one, with what penalty each of them is to be struck.

If four or five men, or even more, shall have fought against one man, and, wounded by them, he shall have died, whoever among them inflicted a wound is to be judged a homicide according to the statutes of the canons; but let the others who attacked him, wishing to kill him, perform penance similarly. Let those who neither attacked nor wounded him, nor were collaborators by counsel or aid, but were merely present, be without guilt.

C. XXXIV. Si plures contra unum rixentur, qua pena quisque eorum feriatur.

Si quatuor aut quinque homines, seu etiam plures, contra unum hominem rixati fuerint, et ab his uulneratus mortuus fuerit, quicumque eorum plagam inposuit, secundum statuta canonum ut homicida iudicetur; reliqui autem, qui eum inpugnabant, uolentes eum interficere, similiter peniteant. Qui nec eum impugnabant, nec uulnerabant, nec consilio nec auxilio cooperatores fuerunt, sed tantum affuerunt, extra noxam sint.

Causa XXIV

CAUSE XXIV.

GRATIAN. A certain bishop, having fallen into heresy, deprived some of his priests of office and marked them with a sentence of excommunication. Accused of heresy after his death, he is condemned, together with his followers and his entire household. (Question I.) Here it is first asked whether one fallen into heresy can deprive anyone of office or mark him with a sentence. (Question II.) Second, whether anyone can be excommunicated after death. (Question III.) Third, whether an entire household is to be excommunicated for the sin of one person.

GRATIANUS. Quidam episcopus in heresim lapsus aliquos de sacerdotibus suis offitio priuauit, et sentencia excommunicationis notauit. Post mortem de heresi accusatus dampnatur, et sequaces eius cum omni familia sua. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, an lapsus in heresim possit aliquos offitio priuare, uel sentencia notare? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an post mortem aliquis possit excommunicari? (Qu. III.) Tertio, an pro peccato alicuius tota familia sit excommunicanda?

Question I

GRATIAN. That anyone cannot be deposed or excommunicated by a heretic is easily proved. For every heretic either follows a heresy already condemned or fashions a new one. But he who follows a heresy already condemned makes himself a participant in its condemnation. Hence, when Acacius complained that he had been condemned by the Apostolic See without synodal authority, Gelasius writes against him, saying:

> GRATIANUS. Quod autem ab heretico aliquis deponi aut excommunicari non possit, facile probatur. Omnis enim hereticus aut iam dampnatam heresim sequitur, aut nouam confingit. Qui uero heresim iam dampnatam sequitur, eius dampnationis se participem facit. Unde cum Achatius absque sinodali auctoritate ab Apostolico se dampnatum quereretur, contra Gelasius scribit, dicens:

C. I. He who falls into a heresy already condemned makes himself a participant in its condemnation.

Acacius was not made the inventor of a new error, but an imitator of an old one, and therefore it was not necessary that new decrees go forth against him, but only that the old ones be renewed. And so I was made the executor of an old constitution, not the promulgator of a new one. For whoever falls into a heresy once condemned envelops himself in its condemnation.

> C. I. Qui in iam dampnatam heresim labitur, eius dampnationis se participem facit.
> Achatius non est inuentor factus noui erroris, sed ueteris imitator, atque ideo non erat necessarium, ut aduersus eum noua scita prodirent, sed antiqua tantummodo renouarentur. Factus sum itaque executor ueteris constituti, non promulgator noui. Quicumque enim in heresim semel dampnatam labitur, eius dampnatione se ipsum inuoluit.

C. II. That which a synod once established against each heresy is not to be reconsidered.

The same, [in the epistle to the bishops of Dardania]. Our forebears, discerning by divine inspiration, necessarily took precaution that they not permit that which a synod, once assembled against each heresy, had promulgated for communion of faith and Catholic and apostolic truth to be mutilated afterward by new reconsiderations, lest an occasion be furnished to the depraved to assail the things that had been established medicinally; but, after the author of any insanity and his error had alike been condemned, they judged it sufficient that whoever should at any time become a participant in this error be bound by the principal sentence of its condemnation. § 1. Thus a synod condemned Sabellius, and it was not necessary that his followers afterward be condemned; but according to the tenor of the ancient constitution, the universal church considered that those who became participants either in that depravity or in its communion were to be rejected. Thus, by condemning Arius, Eunomius, Macedonius, and Nestorius, the synod once held does not permit anyone thereafter to come to new councils—

> C. II. Non est retractandum quod semel sinodus statuit contra unamquamque heresim.
> Idem. [in epistola ad Episcopos Dardaniae] Maiores nostri diuina inspiratione cernentes necessarie precauerunt, ut quod contra unamquamque heresim coacta semel sinodus pro fidei conmunione et ueritate catholica atque apostolica promulgasset non sinerent nouis posthec retractationibus mutilari, ne prauis occasio preberetur que medicinaliter fuerant statuta pulsandi, sed, auctore cuiuslibet insaniae, ac pariter errore dampnato, sufficere iudicarunt, ut quisquis aliquando huius erroris communicator existeret, principali sentencia dampnationis eius esset obstrictus. §. 1. Sic Sabellium dampnauit sinodus, nec fuit necesse, ut eius sectatores postea dampnarentur; sed pro tenore constitutionis antiquae, qui uel prauitatis illius uel communionis extitere participes, uniuersalis ecclesia duxit esse refutandos. Sic Arrium, Eunomium, Macedonium, Nestorium, sinodus semel gesta condempnans, ulterius ad noua concilia uenire non sinit

C. III. It is not fitting to proceed further against one who relapses into a condemned heresy.

Likewise Felix. Acacius was not the inventor of a new or his own error, so that new decrees should proceed against him, but mingled his communion with another's crime. And so it was necessary that by the just balance he fall into that sentence which the author of the error had received together with his successors through synodal agreement. GRATIAN. Therefore, if that bishop fell into a heresy already condemned, being condemned by the ancient excommunication he was not able to condemn others. For one excommunicated is not able to excommunicate others. Hence Alexander II writes to Valerian, bishop and martyr:

C. III. Non ultra eum procedere oportet, qui in heresim dampnatam recidit.

Item Felix. Achatius non fuit noui uel proprii inuentor erroris, ut in eum noua scita procederent; sed alieno facinori suam conmunionem miscuit. Itaque necesse est, ut in illam recideret iusta lance sentenciam, quam cum suis successoribus per conuenientiam sinodalem susceperat auctor erroris. Gratian. Si ergo ille episcopus in heresim iam dampnatam lapsus est, antiqua excommunicatione dampnatus alios dampnare non poterat. Excommunicatus enim alios excommunicare non ualet. Unde Alexander II. scribit Valeriano Episcopo, Martiri:

C. IV. One excommunicated cannot excommunicate another.

We have heard that Henry, called archbishop of Ravenna, has attempted to excommunicate you. But because one excommunicated could not excommunicate you, absolving you and yours by apostolic authority, we command you never to be concerned about it. GRATIAN. But if from his own heart he fashioned a new heresy, from the time he began to preach such things he could condemn no one, because one already prostrate cannot cast anyone down. For the power of binding and loosing was handed over by the Lord to true priests, not false ones. For when he was about to say to the Apostles, "Whose sins you shall remit, etc.," he first said, "Receive the Holy Spirit," so that he might show evidently to all that he who does not possess the Holy Spirit cannot retain or remit sins. Moreover, no one receives the Holy Spirit except within the church, because he also creates that very unity through grace. § 1. Hence it was said only to those gathered into one, "Receive the Holy Spirit," and only upon those gathered into one on the day of Pentecost did the Holy Spirit descend. But just as he is not received outside the church, so outside her he works nothing. Therefore, since, as the Apostle says, the Spirit petitions and the Spirit obtains, outside the church he causes neither petitioning nor obtaining. Hence the Lord, when about to say, "Whatever you shall ask, etc.," first said, "If two of you shall agree upon earth, etc." And again: "Wherever two or three shall have been gathered in my name, there am I also in their midst," plainly showing to all that he does not dwell in the hearts of those who, having followed the singularity of pride, tear themselves away from the joining together of Christ's body. But in those in whom Christ does not dwell, the Holy Spirit, fleeing the rifts of minds, has no place. Therefore, since remitting or retaining sins, excommunicating or reconciling, is the work of the Holy Spirit and the power of Christ, it appears that those who are outside the church can neither bind nor loose, neither by reconciling restore anyone to ecclesiastical communion nor by excommunicating deprive anyone of her fellowship, of which they themselves—polluted by heresy or schism or marked by a sentence—are proved to be entirely deprived. Hence, when the Lord gave all the disciples an equal power of binding and loosing, he promised that he would give Peter, for all and before all, the keys of the kingdom of heaven, saying: "To you I shall give the keys of the kingdom of heaven." Therefore, whoever shall have been alien from the unity of the church—which is understood through Peter—cannot execrate and is not able to consecrate; he does not possess the power of excommunication or reconciliation. Hence the Apostle, when he wrote that the Corinthian fornicator was to be excommunicated, said: "I indeed, absent in body but present in spirit, have already judged as though present him who has acted thus: in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when you and my spirit have been gathered together, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, to hand such a person over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh." In this, showing the form of excommunication, he taught that no one except a faithful person is to be marked, and only by a faithful person. For only a faithful person is able to work anything in the name of the Lord and with his power cooperating, since no one can say, "The Lord Jesus," except in the Holy Spirit. Likewise, since the Lord prohibits the lamb from being eaten outside the Catholic Church, those who are alien from her by profession of faith are not repelled from her participation, which they abandoned by their own choice, but are permitted to depart, like those who, hearing, "Unless you shall have eaten the flesh of the Son of Man and drunk his blood, etc.," said, "This saying is hard, and who can hear it?" and so went backward, not repelled but permitted to depart. Hence also the Apostle, when treating of those to be excommunicated, first said, "If any brother"; but concerning unbelievers he added, saying, "The Lord will judge those who are outside." But he entrusted to us judgment concerning those who are within. Now, just as from the fact that the Apostle said "brother," and from the things he added concerning the faithful and unbelievers, it appears that only a faithful person is to be excommunicated, so from the fact that this is written only to the faithful—or rather, because just as he who blesses is greater than the person who is blessed, so he who curses by office is greater than the person who is cursed—it is clearly established that he who withdraws from the integrity of the Catholic faith possesses no power of cursing or blessing. For he is not able to curse a Catholic, as one superior to himself; he cannot give a sentence against one alien from the faith, as against one equal to himself. But these things that have been said concerning heretics, schismatics, or excommunicated persons—namely, that they do not possess the power of binding or loosing—are proved by the authorities of many. For Pope Leo says, [sermon III on the anniversary of his elevation, and sermon II on the birthday of the Apostles]:

C. IV. Excommunicatus alium excommunicare non potest.

Audiuimus, quod Henricus, Rauennas dictus archiepiscopus, nisus sit te excommunicare. Verum, quia excommunicatus te non potuit excommunicare, apostolica auctoritate te tuosque absoluendo mandamus exinde numquam curare. Gratian. Si autem ex corde suo nouam heresim confinxit, ex quo talia predicare cepit, neminem dampnare potuit, quia non potest deicere quemquam iam prostratus. Ligandi namque uel soluendi potestas ueris, non falsis sacerdotibus a Domino tradita est. Apostolis enim dicturus: "Quorum remiseritis peccata, etc." premisit: "Accipite Spiritum sanctum," ut euidenter cunctis ostenderet, eum, qui Spiritum sanctum non habet, peccata non posse tenere uel remittere. Porro Spiritum sanctum nemo nisi intra ecclesiam accipit, quia et ipsam unitatem facit per gratiam. §. 1. Unde non nisi congregatis in unum dictum est: "Accipite Spiritum sanctum," nec nisi super congregatos in unum die pentecostes descendit Spiritus sanctus. Sicut autem extra ecclesiam non accipitur, ita extra eam nichil operatur. Cum ergo, sicut Apostolus ait, Spiritus postulet Spiritus inpetret, extra ecclesiam nec postulare facit, nec inpetrare. Unde Dominus dicturus: "Quodcumque petieritis, etc." premisit: "Si duo ex uobis consenserint super terram, etc." Et iterum: "Ubicumque duo uel tres congregati fuerit in nomine meo, ibi et ego sum in medio eorum;" nimirum cunctis ostendens, se non habitare in cordibus eorum, qui superbiae singularitatem secuti a corporis Christi conpage semetipsos abrumpunt. In quibus autem Christus non habitat, in eis Spiritus sanctus mentium scissuras refugiens locum non habet. Cum ergo dimittere peccata uel tenere, excommunicare uel reconciliare opus sit Spiritus sancti et uirtus Christi: apparet, quod hii, qui extra ecclesiam sunt, nec ligare, nec soluere possunt, nec reconciliando ecclesiasticae conmunioni reddere, nec excommunicando eius societate priuare, qua ipsi, heresi uel scismate polluti siue sentencia notati, penitus carere probantur. Unde, cum Dominus omnibus discipulis parem ligandi atque soluendi potestatem daret, Petro pro omnibus et pre omnibus claues regni celorum se daturum promisit, dicens: "Tibi dabo claues regni celorum." Quicumque ergo ab unitate ecclesiae (que per Petrum intelligitur) fuerit alienus, execrare non potest, consecrare non ualet; excommunicationis uel reconciliationis potestatem non habet. Unde Apostolus, cum fornicatorem Corinthium excommunicandum scriberet, ait: "Ego quidem absens corpore, presens autem spiritu, iam iudicaui ut presens eum, qui sic operatus est, in nomine Domini nostri Iesu Christi, congregatis uobis, et meo spiritu, cum uirtute Domini nostri Iesu Christi, tradere huiusmodi sathanae in interitum carnis." In quo formam excommunicationis ostendens, docuit, non nisi fidelem et a fideli notandum. In nomine namque Domini atque eius uirtute cooperante non nisi fidelis aliquid operari ualet, cum nemo possit dicere: "Dominus Iesus, nisi in Spiritu sancto." Item, cum Dominus prohibeat agnum comedi extra catholicam ecclesiam, qui professione fidei ab ea sunt alieni, ab eius participatione, quam suo arbitrio reliquerunt, non repelluntur, sed abire permittuntur, sicut illi, qui audientes: "Nisi manducaueritis carnem filii hominis, et biberitis eius sanguinem, etc.," dixerunt: "Durus est hic sermo, et quis potest eum audire?" atque ita abierunt retrorsum, non repulsi, sed abire permissi. Hinc etiam Apostolus, cum de excommunicandis ageret, premisit: "Si quis frater;" de infidelibus autem supposuit, dicens: "Eos, qui foris sunt, Dominus iudicabit." De his autem qui intus sunt, nobis iudicium conmisit. Sicut autem ex eo, quod Apostolus ait: "Frater," et ex his, que de fidelibus et infidelibus supposuit, apparet, non nisi fidelem excommunicandum, ita ex eo, quod fidelibus tantum hoc scribitur, uel potius, quia sicut ille, qui benedicit, maior est eo, cui benedicitur, ita qui ex offitio maledicit maior est eo, cui maledicitur, liquido constat, eum, qui ab integritate catholicae fidei recedit, maledicendi uel benedicendi potestatem minime habere. Catholicum namque, utpote superiorem se, maledicere non ualet; in alienum a fide, tamquam in sibi equalem, sentenciam dare non potest. Hec autem, que de hereticis, atque scismaticis, uel excommunicatis dicta sunt, uidelicet, quod ligandi uel soluendi potestatem non habeant, multorum auctoritatibus probantur. Ait enim Leo Papa: [serm. III. in anniuersario suae assumtionis, et serm. II. de natali Apostolorum]

C. V. No one is loosed or bound except him whom the authority of blessed Peter shall have loosed or bound.

Therefore, Peter's privilege remains wherever judgment is rendered from his equity, and there is neither excessive severity nor remission where nothing will be loosed or bound except what blessed Peter shall either have bound or loosed.

C. V. Non soluitur uel ligatur nisi quem auctoritas B. Petri soluerit aut ligauerit.

Manet ergo Petri priuilegium, ubicumque ex ipsius equitate fertur iudicium, nec nimia uel seueritas, uel remissio, ubi nichil erit solutum uel ligatum, nisi quod B. Petrus aut ligauerit, aut soluerit.

C. VI. In the person of Peter the church received the power of binding and loosing.

Likewise Augustine on John, [tractate 50, at c. 12]. "Whatever you shall have bound upon earth will be bound also in heaven." If this was said to Peter alone, the church does not do this. But if it is also done in the church—as surely the things bound on earth are bound also in heaven, and the things loosed on earth are loosed also in heaven, because when the church excommunicates, the excommunicated person is bound in heaven; when the church reconciles, the reconciled person is loosed in heaven—if, therefore, this is done in the church, Peter, when he received the keys, signified the holy church. If the good in the church were signified in the person of Peter, the evil in the church were signified in the person of Judas.

> C. VI. In persona Petri ecclesia ligandi et soluendi potestatem accepit.
> Item Augustinus super Iohannem. [tract. L. ad c. 12.] Quodcumque ligaueris super terram, erit ligatum et in celo. Si Petro hoc tantum dictum est, non hoc facit ecclesia. Si autem et in ecclesia fit, (utique que in terra ligantur et in celo, et que soluuntur in terra soluta sunt et in celo, quia, cum excommunicat ecclesia, in celo ligatur excommunicatus; cum reconciliat ecclesia, in celo soluitur reconciliatus), si hoc ergo in ecclesia fit, Petrus, quando claues accepit, ecclesiam sanctam significauit. Si in Petri persona significati sunt in ecclesia boni, in Iudae persona significati sunt in ecclesia mali.

C. VII. One firm in his own merits is sometimes disturbed by those of another.

Likewise Ambrose, [at c. 5 of Luke]. The ship that has Peter is not disturbed; that one which has Judas is disturbed. Although the merits of many disciples were sailing there, nevertheless the faithlessness of the betrayer was still agitating it. Peter is in each, but he who is firm in his own merits is disturbed by those of another. Therefore, let us beware of the faithless man; let us beware of the betrayer, lest through one man many of us be tossed upon the waves. Therefore, this ship in which prudence sails is not disturbed; faithlessness is absent, faith prevails. For how could that ship be disturbed over which he presided in whom is the foundation of the church? Disturbance is therefore there where faith is small; security is where love is perfect. Finally, although others are commanded to let down their nets, to Peter alone it is said: "Put out into the deep," that is, into the depth of disputations. For what is so deep as to see the depth of riches, to know the Son of God, and to take up the profession of divine generation? Although the human mind cannot comprehend it fully by the investigation of reason, nevertheless the fullness of faith embraces it.

> C. VII. Suis meritis firmus nonnumquam turbatur alienis.
> Item Ambrosius. [ad c. 5. Lucae] Non turbatur nauis, que Petrum habet: turbatur illa, que Iudam habet. Etsi multa illic discipulorum merita nauigabant, tamen adhuc eam proditoris perfidia agitabat. In utraque Petrus: sed qui suis meritis firmus est turbatur alienis. Caueamus igitur perfidum, caueamus proditorem, ne per unum plurimi fluctuemus. Ergo non turbatur hec nauis, in qua prudentia nauigat, abest perfidia, fides superat. Quemadmodum enim turbari poterat, cui preerat is, in quo ecclesiae firmamentum est? Illic ergo turbatio, ubi modica fides: ibi securitas, ubi perfecta dilectio. Denique etsi aliis inperatur, ut laxent retia sua, soli tantum Petro dicitur: "Duc in altum," hoc est in profundum disputationum. Quid enim tam altum quam altitudinem diuitiarum uidere, scire filium Dei, et professionem diuinae generationis assumere? quam licet mens nequeat humana plene rationis inuestigatione conprehendere, fidei tamen plenitudo conplectitur.

C. VIII. Peter alone received the command to catch a fish with a hook.

The same, [in the same place, a little below]. There is another apostolic kind of fishing, by which kind the Lord commands Peter alone to fish, saying: "Cast in a hook, and take the fish that first comes up."

C. VIII. Solus Petrus mandatum accepit, ut amo piscem caperet.

Idem. [ibidem paulo inferius] Est aliud apostolicum piscandi genus, quo genere solum Petrum piscari Dominus iubet, dicens: "Mitte hamum, et eum piscem, qui primum ascenderit, tolle."

C. IX. Let no disturbance draw anyone away from the path of the Apostolic See, which has always destroyed all heresies.

Likewise Pope Lucius to all bishops. Therefore, do not withdraw from the right faith and the apostolic path on account of any disturbance, knowing that, according to the sentence of the Savior, blessed are those who suffer persecution on account of justice. This is the living tradition of the Apostles; this is true charity, which is to be preached and especially loved and cherished, and held confidently by all; this holy and apostolic mother of all churches, the church of Christ, which by the grace of almighty God is proved never to have erred from the path of apostolic tradition, nor has succumbed to being depraved by heretical novelties, but, as in the beginning she received the rule of the Christian faith from her founders, the chief Apostles of Christ, remains unblemished in faith.

C. IX. Nulla perturbatio a tramite apostolicae sedis retrahat, que omnes hereses semper destruxit.

Item Lucius Papa omnibus Episcopis. A recta fide ergo et apostolico tramite propter ullam perturbationem nolite recedere, scientes, quoniam iuxta Saluatoris sententiam beati sunt qui persecutionem patiuntur propter iusticiam. Hec est Apostolorum uiua traditio; hec uera karitas, que predicanda est, et precipue diligenda ac fouenda, atque fiducialiter ab omnibus tenenda; hec sancta et apostolica mater ecclesiarum omnium Christi ecclesia, que per Dei omnipotentis gratiam a tramite apostolicae traditionis numquam errasse probatur, nec hereticis nouitatibus deprauanda succubuit, sed, ut in exordio normam fidei Christianae percepit ab auctoribus suis Apostolorum principibus Christi, illibata fidetenus manet.

C. X. The faith of the Roman church destroys all heresies and cherishes none.

Likewise Sixtus, [Pope Sixtus II to Bishop Gratus, epistle 1]. I remember that I preside under the name of that church whose confession was glorified by the Lord Jesus Christ, and whose faith never cherishes any heresy but indeed destroys them all. But I understand that it is not lawful for me to act otherwise than to expend all my efforts upon that cause in which the salvation of the universal church is assailed.

C. X. Fides Romanae ecclesiae omnes hereses destruit, nullam fouet.

Item Syxtus.[Papa II. ad Gratum Episcopum, ep. I.] Memor sum, me sub illius nomine ecclesiae presidere, cuius confessio a Domino Iesu Christo est glorificata, et cuius fides nullam umquam fouet, sed omnes quidem hereses destruit. Intelligo autem michi aliter non licere, quam ut omnes conatus meos ei causae, in qua uniuersalis ecclesiae salus infestatur, inpendam.

C. XI. The Roman church has succumbed to no heresies.

Likewise Pope Eusebius, [to the bishops of Tuscany, epistle 3]. In the Apostolic See the Catholic religion has always been preserved without stain.

> C. XI. Romana ecclesia nullis heresibus succubuit.
> Item Eusebius Papa. [Episcopis Thusciae, epist. III.] In sede apostolica extra maculam semper est catholica seruata religio.

C. XII. Whenever a matter of faith is debated, let it be referred to the Roman church.

Likewise Innocent, [Pope Innocent to the bishops of the Council of Milevis, epistle 26]. Whenever a matter of faith is debated, I judge that all our brothers and fellow bishops ought to refer only to Peter —that is, to the authority of his name and honor—that which can benefit all the churches throughout the whole world, just as your Charity has now referred it.

> C. XII. Ad Romanam referatur ecclesiam, quotiens ratio fidei uentilatur.
> Item Innocentius. [Papa Episcopis Concilii Mileuitani, epist. XXVI.] Quotiens fidei ratio uentilatur, arbitror omnes fratres et coepiscopos nostros non nisi ad Petrum, id est sui nominis et honoris auctoritatem, referre debere (ueluti nunc retulit uestra dilectio) quod per totum mundum possit ecclesiis omnibus prodesse.

C. XIII. The Roman church has possessed zeal for the Christian religion before the others.

Likewise Pope Julius, [to the eastern bishops, epistle 1]. In consideration of our office, it is not for us to dissemble; there is no freedom to be silent for us, upon whom a greater zeal for the Christian religion lies than upon all others.

> C. XIII. Religionis christianae zelum Romana ecclesia pre ceteris habuit.
> Item Iulius Papa. [ad Episcopos orientales, epist. I.] Offitii nostri consideratione non est nobis dissimulare, non est tacere libertas, quibus maior cunctis Christianae religionis zelus incumbit.

C. XIV. The faith that the Roman church commends does not fear the mouths of others.

Likewise Jerome, [to Damasus in the exposition of the creed]. This is the faith, most blessed Pope, that we learned in the Catholic Church and that we have always held. If perhaps something has been set forth in it less skillfully or too incautiously, we desire to be corrected by you, who hold both the see and the faith of Peter. But if this confession of ours is approved by the judgment of your apostolate, whoever wishes to blame me will prove himself unskilled, or malevolent, or even not Catholic but a heretic. Likewise: § 1. The holy Roman church, which has always remained immaculate, by the Lord's providence and with the blessed Apostle Peter bringing aid, will remain in the future without any assault by heretics, and will persist firm and immovable at every time.

> C. XIV. Aliorum ora fides non timet, quam Romana conmendat ecclesia.
> Item Ieronimus. [ad Damasum in expositione symboli] Hec est fides, Papa beatissime, quam in catholica ecclesia didicimus, quamque semper tenuimus; in qua si minus perite aut parum caute forte aliquid positum est, emendari cupimus a te, qui Petri et sedem tenes et fidem. Si autem hec nostra confessio apostolatus tui iudicio conprobatur, quicumque me culpare uoluerit, se inperitum, uel maliuolum, uel etiam non catholicum, sed hereticum conprobabit. Item: §. 1. Sancta Romana ecclesia, que semper inmaculata permansit, Domino prouidente et B. apostolo Petro opem ferente in futuro manebit, sine ulla hereticorum insultatione atque firma et inmobilis omni tempore persistet.

C. XV. It is permitted neither to think nor to will anything other than the Roman church.

Likewise Marcellus to all the bishops established throughout Antioch, [epistle 1]. We ask you, most beloved brothers, that you teach and think nothing other than what you have received from blessed Peter the Apostle and the other Apostles and Fathers. For he is the head of the whole church, to whom the Lord says: "You are Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church." For his see was first among you, which afterward, at the Lord's command, was transferred to Rome, over which, with divine grace giving support, we preside on this present day. But if your see of Antioch, which was formerly the first, yielded to the Roman See, there is no see that is not subject to its dominion. Nor ought you to deviate from its ordering, to which, by the ordering of divine grace, all greater ecclesiastical affairs have been commanded to be referred, so that they may be ordered regularly by that see from which they took their beginnings.

C. XV. Aliud quam Romana ecclesia neque sentire, neque uelle permittitur.

Item Marcellus uniuersis Episcopis per Antiocenam constitutis. [epist. I.] Rogamus uos, fratres dilectissimi, ut non aliud doceatis neque sentiatis, quam quod a B. Petro apostolo et reliquis apostolis et Patribus accepistis. Ipse enim est caput totius ecclesiae, cui ait Dominus: "Tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram edificabo ecclesiam meam". Eius enim sedes primitus fuit apud uos, que postea iubente Domino translata est Romam, cui amminiculante gratia diuina hodierna praesidemus die. Si uero uestra Antiocena, que olim prima erat, Romanae cessit sedi, nulla est, que eius non sit subiecta ditioni. Nec ab eius dispositione uos deuiare oportet, ad quam cuncta maiora ecclesiastica negocia diuina disponente gratia iussa sunt referri, ut ab ea regulariter disponantur, a qua sumpsere principia.

C. XVI. It is not lawful for the church of Alexandria to dissent from the Roman church.

Likewise Bishop Leo to Dioscorus, Bishop of Alexandria, [epistle 79, otherwise 81]. Since the most blessed Apostle Peter received the primacy from the Lord, and the Roman church remains in his institutions, it is impious to believe that the holy bishop Mark, his disciple, who first governed the church of Alexandria, confirmed the decrees of his traditions by other rules, since without doubt disciple and master were of one spirit from the same fountain of grace, and the ordained could hand down nothing other than what he received from the ordainer.

C. XVI. Alexandrinae ecclesiae a Romana dissentire non licet.

Item Leo Episcopus Dioscoro Episcopo Alexandrino. [epist. LXXIX. al. LXXXI.] Cum beatissimus Petrus apostolus a Domino acceperit principatum, et Romana ecclesia in eius permaneat institutis, nefas est credere, quod sanctus episcopus discipulus ipsius Marcus, qui Alexandrinam primus ecclesiam gubernauit, aliis regulis traditionum suarum decreta firmauerit, cum sine dubio de eodem fonte gratiae unus spiritus et discipuli fuerint et magistri, nec aliud ordinatus tradere potuit, quam quod ab ordinatore suscepit.

C. XVII. By the profession of her faith the Roman church cuts off the ear of error.

Likewise Gregory. If Peter deliberately struck the ear, he taught that they ought not to have in appearance the ear that they did not have in ministry. But the good Lord both restored hearing even to him, according to the prophetic sayings, and showed that even those who have been wounded in the Passion of Christ can be healed if they are converted, because every sin is washed away in the ministry of faith. Peter, therefore, takes away the ear. Why Peter? Because he is the one who received the keys of the kingdom of heaven. For he condemns who also absolves, since the same man obtained the power of binding and loosing. Moreover, he takes away the ear of one who hears badly; with the spiritual sword he takes away the inner ear of one who understands badly. Let us beware lest anyone's little ear be taken away. The Passion of the Lord is read: if we refer the weakness of his bodily Passion to his divinity, the little ear is cut off, and it is cut off by Peter, who did not permit Christ to be considered a prophet, but taught that he should be designated the Son of God by a faithful confession.

> C. XVII. Professione suae fidei aurem erroris Romana abscidit ecclesia.
> Item Gregorius. Si Petrus uolens percussit aurem, docuit, quod aurem in specie habere non deberent, quam in ministerio non habebant. Sed bonus Dominus et ipsi refundit auditum, secundum prophetica dicta demonstrans, et ipsos, si conuertantur, posse sanari, qui in passione Christi uulnerati sunt, eo, quod omne peccatum in ministerio fidei abluatur. Tollit ergo Petrus aurem. Quare Petrus? Quia ipse est, qui claues accepit regni celorum. Ille enim condempnat, qui et absoluit, quoniam ligandi et soluendi idem adeptus est potestatem. Tollit autem aurem male audientis, tollit autem gladio spirituali aurem interiorem male intelligentis. Caueamus, ne cui tollatur auricula, legitur passio Domini. Si ad diuinitatem eius referimus infirmitatem corporeae passionis, exciditur auricula, et exciditur a Petro, qui non passus est Christum prophetam estimari, sed Dei filium docuit fideli confessione signari.

C. XVIII. Outside the unity of the church the Holy Spirit is not received.

Likewise Cyprian, [in the treatise On the Unity of the Church]. The Lord speaks to Peter: "I say to you that you are Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church." Upon one man he builds the church, and although after his resurrection he grants equal power to all the Apostles and says, "As the Father has sent me, I also send you. Receive the Holy Spirit," nevertheless, in order to manifest unity, by his authority he arranged that the origin of that same unity should begin from one man. The other Apostles assuredly were what Peter was, endowed with an equal partnership both of honor and of power. But the beginning proceeds from unity, so that the church of Christ may be shown to be one; this one church the Holy Spirit also designates in the Song of Songs from the person of Christ the Lord, saying: "One is my dove, my perfect one; one is she to her mother, chosen by her who bore her." Blessed Paul the Apostle also teaches this unity of the church and reveals the sacrament of unity, saying: "One body and one spirit; one hope of your calling. One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God." We ought firmly to hold and vindicate this unity, especially we bishops who preside in the church of God, so that we may prove the episcopate itself also to be one and undivided. Let no one deceive the brotherhood; let no one corrupt the truth of the faith by faithless prevarication. § 1. The episcopate is one, a share of which is held by each for the whole. And the church is one, which by an increase of fruitfulness is extended more widely into a multitude, just as there are many rays but one light, and there are many branches of a tree but one strength founded upon a tenacious root, and just as from one fountain very many streams flow down; and although their numerousness appears diffused by the abundance of overflowing plenty, unity is nevertheless preserved in the source. Tear a ray of the sun from its body: unity admits no division. Break a branch from the tree: it will not be able to put forth fruit. Cut off a stream from the fountain: once cut off, it dries up. So too the Lord's church, flooded with light, extends its rays throughout the whole world; nevertheless, it is one light that is diffused everywhere, nor is the unity of the body divided. By the abundance of her fruitfulness she extends her branches throughout the whole earth, pours forth her flowing streams, and spreads more widely; nevertheless, there is one head, and one origin, and one mother rich in fruitfulness. The bride of Christ cannot be defiled: she is incorrupt and chaste. She knows one house; with chaste modesty she guards the sanctity of one bedchamber.

> C. XVIII. Extra unitatem ecclesiae Spiritus sanctus non accipitur.
> Item Ciprianus. [in tractatu de unitate ecclesiae] Loquitur Dominus ad Petrum: "Ego dico tibi, quia tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram edificabo ecclesiam meam". Super unum edificat ecclesiam, et quamuis Apostolis omnibus post resurrectionem suam parem potestatem tribuat, et dicat: "Sicut misit me pater, et ego mitto uos. Accipite Spiritum sanctum", tamen ut unitatem manifestaret, unitatis eiusdem originem ab uno incipientem sua auctoritate disposuit. Hoc erant utique ceteri Apostoli, quod Petrus fuit, pari consortio prediti et honoris et potestatis. Sed ab unitate exordium proficiscitur, ut ecclesia Christi una monstretur, quam unam ecclesiam in Cantico quoque Canticorum Spiritus sanctus ex persona Christi Domini designat dicens: "Una est columba mea, perfecta mea; una est matri suae, electa genitrici suae." Hanc ecclesiae unitatem et B. Paulus apostolus docet, et sacramentum unitatis ostendit, dicens: "Unum corpus, et unus spiritus: una spes uocationis uestrae. Unus dominus, una fides, unum baptisma, unus Deus." Quam unitatem tenere firmiter et uendicare debemus, maxime nos episcopi, qui in ecclesia Dei presidemus, ut episcopatum quoque ipsum unum atque indiuisum probemus. Nemo fraternitatem fallat, nemo ueritatem fidei perfida preuaricatione corrumpat. §. 1. Episcopatus unus est, cuius a singulis in solidum pars tenetur. Et ecclesia una est, que in multitudinem latius incremento fecunditatis extenditur, quomodo multi radii sunt, sed unum lumen, et rami arboris multi sunt, sed robur unum tenaci radice fundatum, et quomodo de fonte uno riui plurimi defluunt, et numerositas licet diffusa uideatur exundantis copiae largitate, unitas tamen seruatur in origine. Auelle radium solis a corpore: diuisionem unitas non capit. Ab arbore frange ramum: fructus germinare non poterit. A fonte precide riuum: precisus arescit. Sic et ecclesia Domini luce perfusa per totum orbem radios suos porrigit: unum tamen est, quod ubique diffunditur, nec unitas corporis separatur. Ramos suos per uniuersam terram copia ubertatis extendit, profluentes largitur riuos, latius pandit: unum tamen caput est, et origo una, et una mater fecunditatis copiosa. Adulterari non potest sponsa Christi: incorrupta est et pudica. Unam domum nouit: unius cubiculi sanctitatem casto pudore custodit.

C. XIX. He who abandons the unity of the universal church does not have God as Father.

The same, [in the same place, a little below]. He is an alien, he is profane, he is an enemy: he cannot have God as Father who does not hold the unity of the universal church. The same: § 1. When the Lord urged unanimity and peace upon his disciples, he said: "I say to you that if two of you agree upon earth concerning anything whatever that you ask, it will be granted to you by my Father, who is in heaven. For wherever two or three have been gathered in my name, I am with them," showing that very much is granted not to the multitude but to the unanimity of those praying. "If two," he says, "of you agree upon earth": he placed unanimity first; he set the concord of peace before it, and taught that we should agree faithfully and firmly. But how can he agree with anyone who does not agree with the body of the church itself and with the universal brotherhood? And how can two or three be gathered in the name of Christ who, it is established, are separated from Christ and from his Gospel?

C. XIX. Non habet Deum patrem uniuersalis ecclesiae relinquens unitatem.

Idem. [ibidem paulo inferius] Alienus est, profanus est, hostis est: habere non potest Deum patrem qui uniuersalis ecclesiae non tenet unitatem. Idem: §. 1. Cum dominus discipulis suis unanimitatem suaderet et pacem: "Dico," inquit, "uobis quia si duo ex uobis conuenerint in terra, de omni re, quamcumque petieritis, continget uobis a patre meo, qui est in celis. Ubicumque enim duo aut tres fuerint collecti in nomine meo, ego cum eis sum," ostendit non multitudini, sed unanimitati deprecantium plurimum tribui. "Si duo," inquit "ex uobis conuenerint in terra:" unanimitatem prius posuit, concordiam pacis ante premisit, ut conueniat nobis fideliter et firmiter, docuit. Quomodo autem potest ei cum aliquo conuenire, cui cum corpore ipsius ecclesiae, et cum uniuersa fraternitate non conuenit? Quomodo autem possunt duo uel tres in nomine Christi colligi, quos constat a Christo et ab eius euangelio separari?

C. XX. He who does not hold the unity of Catholic peace does not have the power of binding and loosing.

Likewise Jerome. All things considered, I think that I do not rashly say that some are in the house of God in such a way that they themselves are also that same house of God, which is said to be built upon the rock, which is called the one dove, the beautiful bride without wrinkle and blemish, the enclosed garden, the sealed fountain, the well of living water, and the paradise with the fruit of apples; this house also received the keys and the power of loosing and binding. If anyone despises this house when it corrects and reproves, “let him be to you,” he says, “as a gentile and a publican.” Of this house it is said: “Lord, I have loved the beauty of your house and the place where your glory dwells”; and: “Who makes those of one mind dwell in a house”; and: “I rejoiced in the things that were said to me: We shall go into the house of the Lord”; and: “Blessed are those who dwell in your house; they will praise you for ages of ages.”

C. XX. Ligandi et soluendi non habet potestatem qui unitatem pacis catholicae non tenet.

Item Ieronimus. Omnibus consideratis puto me non temere dicere, alios ita esse in domo Dei, ut ipsi etiam sint eadem domus Dei, que dicitur edificari super petram, que unica columba appellatur, que sponsa pulchra sine ruga et macula, et hortus conclusus et fons signatus et puteus aquae uiuae et paradysus cum fructu pomorum; que domus etiam claues accepit, ac potestatem soluendi et ligandi. Hanc domum si quis corrigentem corripientemque contempserit, "sit tibi," inquit, "tamquam ethnicus et publicanus." De hac domo dicitur: "Domine, dilexi decorem domus tuae, et locum habitationis gloriae tuae;" et: "Qui habitare facit unanimes in domo;" et: "Iocundatus sum in his, que dicta sunt michi: in domum Domini ibimus;" et: "Beati, qui habitant in domo tua; in secula seculorum laudabunt te."

C. XXI. Different crimes are to be visited with different penalties.

Likewise Jerome. Let us not bring deceitful scales on which we weigh what we wish according to our judgment, saying, “This is grave; this is light”; but let us bring the divine scale from the Holy Scriptures, as from the Lord’s treasuries, and upon it let us weigh what is graver. At the time when the Lord showed that earlier offenses were to be guarded against by recent examples of penalties, an idol was both fashioned and worshiped, a prophetic book was burned by the wrath of a contemptuous king, and a schism was attempted: idolatry was punished by the sword; the burning of the book, by slaughter in war and captivity in a foreign land; schism, by the opening of the earth, its authors being buried alive and the others being consumed by heavenly fire. Who now would doubt that the deed which was punished more gravely was the more criminal?

C. XXI. Varia crimina uariis penis sunt afficienda.

Item Ieronimus. Non afferamus stateras dolosas, ubi appendamus quod uolumus pro arbitrio nostro, dicentes, hoc graue, hoc leue est: sed afferamus diuinam stateram de scripturis sanctis, tamquam de thesauris dominicis, et in illa quid sit grauius appendamus. Tempore, quo Dominus priora delicta recentibus penarum exemplis cauenda monstrauit, et ydolum fabricatum atque adoratum est, et propheticus liber ira regis contemptoris incensus, et scisma temptatum, ydolatria gladio punita est, exustio libri bellica cede et peregrina captiuitate, scisma hiatu terrae, sepultis auctoribus uiuis, et ceteris celesti igne consumptis. Quis iam dubitauerit, hoc esse sceleratius commissum, quod est grauius uindicatum?

C. XXII. The Lord receives sacrifice from the church alone.

Likewise Gregory in the Morals, [book 35, c. 6]. Because the truth is beheld from the Catholic Church alone, the Lord declares that with himself is the place from which he may be seen. Moses is placed upon the rock so that he may contemplate the face of God, because unless one holds the solidity of faith, he does not recognize the divine presence. Of this solidity the Lord says: "Upon this rock I will build my church." § 1. For she alone is the one through whom the Lord gladly receives sacrifice; she alone is the one who confidently intercedes for those who err. Hence the Lord also commanded concerning the offering of the lamb, saying: "In one house you shall eat it, and you shall not carry any of its flesh outside the doors." For it is eaten in one house because in the one Catholic Church the true offering is sacrificed to the Redeemer. The divine law forbids any of its flesh to be carried outside because it forbids what is holy to be given to dogs. She alone is the one who guards those placed within her by the strong bond of charity. Hence also the water of the flood indeed raised the ark to higher places, but destroyed all whom it found outside the ark.

C. XXII. Ex sola ecclesia sacrificium Dominus accipit.

Item Gregorius in Moralibus. [lib. XXXV. c. 6.] Quia ex sola ecclesia catholica ueritas conspicitur, apud se esse locum Dominus perhibet, de quo uideatur. In petra Moyses ponitur, ut Dei faciem contempletur, quia nisi quis fidei soliditatem tenuerit, diuinam presentiam non agnoscit. De qua soliditate Dominus dicit: "Super hanc petram edificabo ecclesiam." §. 1. Sola quippe est, per quam sacrificium Dominus accipiat libenter: sola, que pro errantibus intercedat fiducialiter. Unde etiam de agni hostia Dominus precepit, dicens: "In una domo comedetis, nec efferetis de carnibus eius extra fores." In una namque domo comedetur, quia in una catholica ecclesia uera hostia redemptori inmolatur. De cuius carnibus diuina lex efferri foras prohibet, quia dari sanctum canibus uetat. Sola est, que intra se positos ualida karitatis conpage custodit. Unde et aqua diluuii archam quidem ad sublimiora sustulit, omnes autem, quos extra archam inuenit, extinxit.

C. XXIII. He who tears Christ's body apart does not exhibit faith toward Christ.

Likewise Ambrose, [in the funeral oration On the Death of His Brother]. Satyrus summoned a bishop to himself and thought no grace true except the grace of the true faith; and he inquired of him whether he was in agreement with the Catholic bishops—that is, with the Roman church. And perhaps in that region the church of that locality was in schism. For Lucifer had divided himself from our communion, and although he had gone into exile for the faith and had left heirs of his faith, nevertheless Satyrus did not think that faith existed in schism. For although they held faith toward God, nevertheless they did not hold it toward God's church, whose limbs, as it were, they allowed to be divided and whose members to be torn apart. For since Christ suffered for the sake of the church, and the church is the body of Christ, faith does not seem to be exhibited toward Christ by those by whom his Passion is made void and his body is torn apart. And so, although he owed a debt of gratitude and feared to sail as a debtor of so great an obligation, nevertheless he preferred to cross over to the place where he could safely discharge it. For he judged that the payment of gratitude to God lay in disposition and faith; and indeed, as soon as freer access to the church was first available, he did not delay to fulfill it, and he both received the desired grace of God and preserved it once received.

C. XXIII. Non exhibet fidem Christo qui corpus eius discerpit.

Item Ambrosius. [in oratione funebri de obitu fratris] Aduocauit ad se episcopum Satyrus nec ullam putauit ueram, nisi uerae fidei gratiam, percunctatusque ex eo est, utrumnam cum episcopis catholicis, hoc est cum Romana ecclesia conueniret. Et forte ad id locorum in scismate regionis illius ecclesia erat. Lucifer enim se a nostra conmunione diuiserat, et quamquam pro fide exulasset, et fidei suae reliquisset heredes, non tamen putauit fidem esse in scismate. Nam etsi fidem erga Deum tenerent, tamen erga Dei ecclesiam non tenebant, cuius patiebantur uelut quosdam artus diuidi et membra lacerari. Etenim, cum propter ecclesiam Christus passus sit, et Christi corpus sit ecclesia, non uidetur ab his exhiberi Christo fides, a quibus euacuatur eius passio, corpusque distrahitur. Itaque quamuis gratiae fenus teneret, et metueret tanti nominis debitor nauigare, tamen eo transire maluit, ubi tuto posset exsoluere. Iudicabat enim diuinae solutionem gratiae in affectu ac fide esse, quam quidem statim, ubi primum copia ecclesiae liberior fuit, inplere non distulit, Dei gratiam et accepit desideratam, et seruauit acceptam.

C. XXIV. One must withdraw even bodily from him who does not have the faith of Christ.

Likewise Bede on the Epistle of John, [the second, sole chapter]. "Everyone who departs and does not remain in the doctrine of Christ does not have God. He who remains in the doctrine of Christ has both the Son and the Father. If anyone comes to you and does not bring this doctrine, do not receive him into the house, nor say 'Hail' to him. For he who says 'Hail' to him shares in his evil works." What John here taught in words about avoiding schismatics or heretics, he also displayed in deeds. § 1. For his hearer, the most holy and most valiant martyr Polycarp, bishop of the Smyrnaeans, relates of him that at one time, when he had entered the baths at Ephesus for the sake of washing and had seen Cerinthus there, he immediately leapt out and departed without washing, saying: "Let us flee from here, lest the very baths in which Cerinthus, the enemy of truth, is washing should collapse." This same Polycarp also, when he once encountered Marcion saying to him, "Do you recognize us?" answered: "I recognize the firstborn of Satan."

C. XXIV. Etiam corpore ab eo est recedendum, qui fidem Christi non habet.

Item Beda super epistolam Iohannis. [secundam, c. un.] "Omnis, qui recedit, et non permanet in doctrina Christi, Deum non habet. Qui permanet in doctrina Christi, hic et Filium, et Patrem habet. Si quis uenerit ad uos, et hanc doctrinam non affert, nolite eum recipere in domum, nec aue ei dixeritis. Qui enim dicit illi aue, conmunicat operibus eius malis". Hec Iohannes de scismaticis siue hereticis deuitandis que uerbis docuit etiam factis exhibuit. §. 1. Narrat enim de illo auditor eius sanctissimus et martir fortissimus Policarpus, Smirneorum antistes, quia tempore quodam, cum apud Ephesum balneas lauandi gratia fuisset ingressus, et uidisset ibi Cherinthum, exiliret continuo, et discessit non lotus, dicens: Fugiamus hinc, ne et balneae ipsae corruant, in quibus Cherinthus lauatur inimicus ueritatis. Idem etiam Policarpus Marcioni cum occurrisset aliquando, dicenti sibi: Agnosce nos? respondit: Agnosco primogenitum sathanae.

C. XXV. He who attempts to eat the lamb outside the church of blessed Peter is profane.

Likewise Jerome, [to Damasus]. Since the ancient East, dashed against itself by the fury of its peoples, tears the Lord's seamless tunic, woven from above, piecemeal into fragments, and foxes lay waste Christ's vineyard, amid broken cisterns that have no water it is difficult to understand where the sealed fountain and that enclosed garden may be; therefore I judged that I should consult the chair of Peter and the faith praised by the apostolic mouth, now requesting food for my soul from the place from which formerly I received the garments of Christ. Nor indeed could the vastness of so great a liquid element and the intervening breadth of lands prevent me from seeking the precious pearl. Wherever the body shall be, there too the eagles will be gathered. Though the patrimony has been squandered by wicked offspring, among you alone the uncorrupted authority of the fathers is preserved. There the earth, with its fertile turf, returns the purity of the Lord's seed in hundredfold fruit; here the grain buried in the furrows degenerates into darnel and oats. Now in the West the sun of justice arises; but in the East that Lucifer who had fallen has placed his throne above the stars. You are the light of the world; you are the salt of the earth; you are vessels of gold and silver; here the earthen vessels await the iron rod and eternal burning. Therefore, although your greatness frightens me, your kindness nevertheless invites me.

From the priest I, a sacrificial victim, ask salvation; from the shepherd I, a sheep, demand protection. Let envy of the Roman summit depart; let ambition recede. I speak with the successor of the fisherman and the disciple of Christ. Following no reward except Christ, I am joined in communion with your Beatitude—that is, with the chair of Peter. I know that the church was founded upon that rock. Whoever shall have eaten the lamb outside this house is profane. If anyone shall not have been in Noah's ark, he will perish when the flood reigns. And because, on account of my crimes, I migrated to that desert which bounds Syria along the adjoining frontier of the barbarians, I cannot, with so many intervening spaces, always seek the holy thing of the Lord from your Holiness; and therefore I follow your colleagues, the Egyptian confessors, and conceal myself, a little boat, beneath ships of burden. I do not know Vitalis; I reject Meletius; I am ignorant of Paulinus. Whoever does not gather with you scatters—that is, he who is not Christ's is Antichrist's.

C. XXV. Profanus est extra ecclesiam B. Petri agnum comedere temptans.

Item Ieronimus. [ad Damasum] Quoniam uetus oriens inter se populorum furore collisus indiscissam Domini tunicam et desuper textam minutatim per frusta decerpit, et Christi uineam uulpes exterminant, inter lacus contritos, qui non habent aquam, difficile ubi fons signatus et hortus ille conclusus sit possit intelligi, ideo michi cathedram Petri et fidem apostolico ore laudatam censui consulendam, inde nunc meae animae postulans cibum, unde olim Christi uestimenta suscepi. Neque uero uastitas tanti elementi liquentis, et interiacens latitudo terrarum me a preciosae potuit margaritae inquisitione prohibere. Ubicumque fuerit corpus, illuc congregabuntur et aquilae. Profligato a sobole mala patrimonio, apud uos solos incorrupta patrum seruatur auctoritas. Ibi cespite terra fecundo dominici seminis puritatem centeno fructu refert, hic obruta sulcis frumenta lolium auenasque degenerant. Nunc in occidente sol iusticiae oritur, in oriente autem Lucifer ille, qui ceciderat, supra sidera posuit thronum suum. Vos estis lux mundi, uos sal terrae, uos uasa aurea et argentea: hic testea uasa uirgam ferream et eternum opperiuntur incendium. Quamquam igitur tui me terreat magnitudo, tamen inuitat humanitas.

A sacerdote uictima salutem, a pastore presidium ouis flagito. Facessat inuidia Romani culminis, recedat ambicio. Cum successore piscatoris discipulo Christi loquor. Ego nullum premium nisi Christum sequens, beatitudini tuae, id est cathedrae Petri, conmunione consocior. Super illam petram fundatam ecclesiam scio. Quicumque extra domum hanc agnum comederit, profanus est. Si quis in Noe archa non fuerit, peribit regnante diluuio. Et quia pro facinoribus meis ad eam solitudinem conmigraui, que Syriam iuncto Barbariae fine determinat, non possum sanctum Domini, tot interiacentibus spaciis, a sanctimonia tua semper expetere, ideoque collegas tuos Egyptios confessores sequor, et sub honerariis parua nauicula delitesco. Non noui Vitalem, Meletium respuo, ignoro Paulinum. Quicumque tecum non colligit, spargit, hoc est, qui Christi non est antichristi est.

C. XXVI. Fellowship with heretics is to be shunned by Catholics.

Likewise Ambrose, [in the commentary on Luke, c. 9]. What house is more worthy of the entrance of apostolic preaching than the holy church? Or who appears more worthy to be preferred to all than Christ, who was accustomed to wash the feet of his guests, and does not permit any whom he has received into his house to dwell there with polluted footsteps, but, although stained by their former life, deigns nevertheless to cleanse them for the remainder of their course? He, therefore, is the only one whom no one ought to abandon, no one ought to exchange, to whom it is well said: "Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life, and we believe." Do you see the executor of the heavenly precepts, who, because he did not change his lodging, merited the fellowship of a heavenly dwelling? Therefore, it is commanded that the faith of the church be sought first; if Christ is an inhabitant in her, without doubt she is to be chosen. But if a faithless people or a heretical teacher deforms the dwelling, communion with heretics is judged to be avoided and the synagogue to be fled; the dust of the feet is to be shaken off, lest, when the barren dryness of faithlessness is crumbling away, the footprint of your mind be polluted as though by dry and sandy soil. For just as the preacher of the Gospel ought to take upon himself the bodily infirmities of the faithful people, according to what is written, "Who is weak, and I am not weak?" so, if there is any church that rejects the faith and does not possess the foundations of apostolic preaching, it is to be abandoned lest it be able to sprinkle any stain of faithlessness. This the Apostle also asserted plainly, saying: "Avoid a heretical man after one correction."

C. XXVI. Hereticorum consortia a catholicis sunt fugienda.

Item Ambrosius. [in commentariis ad c. 9. Lucae] Que dignior domus apostolicae predicationis ingressu, quam sancta ecclesia? aut quis preferendus magis omnibus uidetur, quam Christus, qui pedes suis lauare consueuit hospitibus, et quoscumque sua receperit domo, pollutis non patitur habitare uestigiis, sed maculosos licet uitae prioris, in reliquum tamen dignetur mundare processus? Hic est igitur solus, quem nemo deserere debet, nemo mutare, cui bene dicitur: "Domine, ad quem ibimus? uerba uitae eternae habes, et nos credimus." Vides executorem celestium preceptorum, qui, quoniam non mutauit hospitium, celestium consortium habitationis emeruit? Fides ergo in primis ecclesiae querenda mandatur, in qua, si Christus habitator sit, haud dubie sit legendum. Si uero populus perfidus, aut preceptor hereticus deformet habitaculum, uitanda hereticorum conmunio, fugienda synagoga censetur, excutiendus pedum puluis, ne fatiscentibus perfidiae sterilis siccitatibus tamquam humi arido arenosoque mentis tuae uestigium polluatur. Nam sicut corporeas infirmitates populi fidelis suscipere in se debet euangelii predicator, iuxta quod scriptum est: "Quis infirmatur, et ego non infirmor?" ita, si qua est ecclesia, que fidem respuat, nec apostolicae predicationis fundamenta possideat, ne quam labem perfidiae possit aspergere, deserenda est. Quod Apostolus quoque euidenter asseruit, dicens: "Hereticum hominem post unam correptionem deuita."

C. XXVII. One divided from the unity of the church can neither be loosed from sins nor enter the heavenly kingdom.

Likewise Bede on Matthew, [in the homily for the feast of the Apostles Peter and Paul, on Matthew c. 16]. Whoever shall in any way have separated themselves from the unity of the faith or fellowship of the Apostle Peter can neither be absolved from the bonds of sins nor enter the gate of the heavenly kingdom.

C. XXVII. Nec peccatis solui, nec regnum celeste ingredi potest ab unitate diuisus ecclesiae.

Item Beda super Mattheum. [in homilia de festo apostolorum Petri et Pauli, ad c. 16. Matthei] Quicumque ab unitate fidei uel societatis Petri apostoli quolibet modo semetipsos segregauerint tales nec uinculis peccatorum absolui, nec ianuam possunt celestis regni ingredi.

C. XXVIII. The sacrifices of those whose faith and life are condemned are not to be received.

Likewise Jerome on the prophet Amos, [on c. 5]. "I have hated and cast away your festivals, and I will not receive the odor of your assemblies. But if you offer me your holocausts and gifts, I will not accept them, and I will not regard the vows of your fatlings." § 1. Moreover, God hates—and not only hates but casts away—the festivals of those who celebrate not God's festivals but their own. And a little later: § 2. Moreover, to hate, not to smell, and to cast away are spoken by a human similitude, so that in our words we may recognize the disposition of God. And if they offer holocausts, so that they appear to fast, to give alms, and to promise chastity—which are true holocausts—the Lord does not receive them. For he judges not the greatness of the sacrifices, but the merits and causes of those offering them. § 3. Hence also the widow who had put two mites into the treasury is preferred by the Savior to all, because the Lord regards not the things that are offered but the will of those offering them.

C. XXVIII. Non suscipiantur sacrificia, quorum fides et uita reprobatur.

Item Ieronimus in Amos propheta. [ad c. 5.] "Odi et proieci festiuitates uestras, et non capiam odorem cetuum uestrorum. Quod si obtuleritis michi holocaustomata et munera uestra, non accipiam, et uota pinguium uestrorum non respiciam." §. 1. Odit autem Deus, et non solum odit, sed proicit festiuitates eorum, qui non celebrant festiuitates Dei, sed suas. Et post pauca: §. 2. Odisse autem, et non odorari et proicere, humana loquitur similitudine, ut nos affectum Dei nostris sermonibus agnoscamus. Et si holocausta obtulerint, ut uideantur ieiunare, dare elemosinas, pudicitiam polliceri (que holocausta sunt uera), non ea suscipit Dominus. Nam non sacrificiorum magnitudinem, sed offerentium merita causasque diudicat. §. 3. Unde et uidua, que in corbonam duo minuta miserat, omnibus a Saluatore prefertur, quia dominus non ea, que offeruntur, sed uoluntatem respicit offerentium.

C. XXIX. Where charity is not, there faith or justice has no place.

Likewise Augustine, [On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, Book I, c. 9]. Where sound faith is not, justice cannot be, because the just man lives by faith. Nor should schismatics promise themselves anything from this reward, because likewise, where charity is not, justice cannot be. For love of neighbor works no evil; if heretics possessed this love, they would not tear apart the body of Christ, which is the church.

> Item Augustinus. [de sermone Domini in monte, lib. I. c. 9.] Ubi sana fides non est, non potest esse iusticia, quia iustus ex fide uiuit. Neque scismatici aliquid sibi ex ista mercede promittant, quia similiter, ubi karitas non est, non potest esse iusticia. Dilectio enim proximi malum non operatur, quam si heretici haberent, non dilaniarent corpus Christi, quod est ecclesia.

C. XXX. One who withdraws from the faith loses the perfection of the Spirit.

Likewise Innocent, [Pope Innocent to Alexander, epistle 18]. When heretics departed from the Catholic faith, they lost the perfection of the Spirit that they had received.

> C. XXX. A fide recedens perfectionem Spiritus amittit.
> Item Innocentius. [Papa ad Alexandrum, ep. XVIII.] Heretici, cum a fide catholica destiterint, perfectionem Spiritus, quam acceperant, amiserunt.

C. XXXI. Heretics are wholly without the power of sacred office.

Likewise Cyprian, greeting his son Magnus, [Book I, epistle 6]. We say that absolutely all heretics and schismatics have no power or right. For this reason Novatian neither ought nor can be excepted from being himself also counted among the adversaries and antichrists, since he stands outside the church and acts against the peace and love of Christ. And a little later: § 1. The church is one, which is one and cannot be both within and without. For if she is with Novatian, she was not with Cornelius. But if she was with Cornelius, who succeeded Bishop Fabian by lawful ordination and whom, after the honor of the priesthood, the Lord also glorified by martyrdom, Novatian is not in the church, nor can he be counted a bishop, since, after despising the evangelical and apostolic tradition, he succeeded no one and arose from himself. For he who was not ordained in the church can in no way possess or hold the church. And a little later: § 2. But as to their being said to know the same God the Father as we, the same Son Christ, and the same Holy Spirit, not even this can assist such persons. And below: § 3. We find that in such a crime not only the leaders and authors but also the participants are destined for punishment unless they separate themselves from the communion of the evil, the Lord commanding through Moses and saying: "Separate yourselves from the tents of these most hard men, and do not touch anything that belongs to them, lest you perish together in their sins." And the Lord fulfilled what he had threatened through Moses, so that whoever had not separated himself from Korah, Dathan, and Abiram immediately paid the penalties for impious communion. By this example it is shown and proved that all will be liable to punishment and guilt who with irreligious rashness mingle themselves with schismatics against their prelates and priests, just as the Holy Spirit also testifies through the prophet Hosea and says: "Their sacrifices are like the bread of mourning; all who eat them will be contaminated," plainly teaching and showing that absolutely all who have been contaminated by their sin are joined in punishment with their authors. What merits, therefore, can there be with God among those upon whom punishments are divinely inflicted? And below: § 4. But if all heretics and schismatics who are outside do not possess the Holy Spirit, and therefore the hand is imposed upon them among us so that here that may be received which is not there and cannot be given there, it is manifest that the remission of sins cannot be given through those who, it is established, do not possess the Holy Spirit.

C. XXXI. Sacri offitii potestate penitus carent heretici.

Item Ciprianus Magno filio salutem. [lib. I. epist. 6.] Dicimus omnino omnes hereticos et scismaticos nil habere potestatis ac iuris. Propter quod Nouatianus nec debet nec potest excipi, quo minus ipse quoque extra ecclesiam consistens, et contra pacem ac dilectionem Christi faciens, inter aduersarios et antichristos conputetur. Et paulo post: §. 1. Ecclesia una est, que una et intus esse et foris non potest. Si enim apud Nouatianum est, apud Cornelium non fuit. Si uero apud Cornelium fuit, qui Fabiano episcopo legitima ordinatione successit, et quem post sacerdotii honorem martirio quoque Dominus glorificauit, Nouatianus in ecclesia non est, nec episcopus conputari potest, qui, euangelica et apostolica traditione contempta, nemini succedens a se ipso ortus est. Habere namque aut tenere ecclesiam nullo modo potest qui ordinatus in ecclesia non est. Et paulo post: §. 2. Quod uero eundem, quem et nos, Deum Patrem, eundem Filium Christum, eundem Spiritum sanctum nosse dicuntur, nec hoc adiuuare tales potest. Et infra: §. 3. Inuenimus in tali facinore non solum duces et auctores, sed etiam participes penis destinari, nisi a conmunione malorum se separauerint, precipiente per Moysen Domino et dicente: "Separamini a tabernaculis hominum istorum durissimorum, et nolite tangere de omnibus, que sunt eorum, ne simul pereatis in peccatis eorum." Et quod conminatus per Moysen fuerat Dominus inpleuit, ut quisque se a Chore, et Dathan, et Abiron non separasset, penas statim pro inpia conmunione persolueret. Quo exemplo, ostenditur et probatur, obnoxios omnes penae et culpae futuros, qui se scismaticis contra prepositos et sacerdotes irreligiosa temeritate miscuerint, sicut etiam per Osee prophetam Spiritus sanctus contestatur et dicit: "Sacrificia eorum tamquam panis luctus, omnes, qui manducant ea, contaminabuntur," docens scilicet et ostendens, omnes omnino cum auctoribus suis supplicio coniungi, qui fuerint eorum peccato contaminati. Que ergo apud eos merita esse circa Deum possunt, quibus supplicia diuinitus irrogantur? Et infra: §. 4. Si autem foris cuncti heretici et scismatici non habent Spiritum sanctum, et ideo apud nos eis manus inponitur, ut hic accipiatur quod illic non est, nec dari potest: manifestum est, nec remissionem peccatorum per eos dari posse, quos constat Spiritum sanctum non habere.

C. XXXII. Let those who strive against the peace of the church be stripped of their honor.

Likewise Pope Liberius, [in the epistle to Athanasius]. Those who are against the peace of the church, if they possess a dignity or the belt of military service, are to be stripped of them. But if they are private persons, then, if they are noble, let them suffer proscription of their property; but if they are of low birth, let them not only be beaten in the body but also be punished with perpetual exile.

C. XXXII. Proprio spolientur honore qui contra pacem ecclesiae nituntur.

Item Liberius Papa. [in ep. ad Athanasium] Qui contra pacem ecclesiae sunt, si dignitatem aut cingulum miliciae habent, nudentur eis. Si autem priuati, siquidem nobiles sunt, suarum substantiarum proscriptionem patiantur; si autem ignobiles, non solum in corpore uerberentur, sed exilio perpetuo castigentur.

C. XXXIII. A bishop established in schism does not consecrate.

Likewise Pope Pelagius. Shameful, so to speak, is the plunder in division: a bishop not consecrated but execrated. For if we examine the very name of consecration with rational and vigorous understanding, he who refuses to be consecrated together with the universal church can by no reason be called or be consecrated. For to consecrate is to make sacred together. But, divided from the inward parts of the church and separated from the Apostolic Sees, he himself rather execrates; he does not consecrate. Rightly, therefore, will he be able to be called only execrated, not consecrated, whom the church does not recognize as making sacred together in unity with her joined members. Nevertheless, let us see whether he preserved even the custom of those very regions in his disordering. Assuredly, this was the ancient custom: because it had been burdensome for them to be ordained by the Apostolic See on account of the distance or difficulty of the journey, the bishops of Milan and Aquileia ought to ordain one another, yet in such a way that the pontiff of the other city ought to come to the city in which the bishop was to be ordained, so that the election of the person to be ordained could be recognized better and more easily by the ordainer present, from the consent of the universal church over which he was to be placed, and so that the man who was to be advanced to the episcopate, but was nevertheless not to be subjected to his ordainer, might be ordained in his own church. For since, as we have said, the church is one, to whom it is said in the Song of Songs, "One is my dove," it is established that there is no other except the one founded upon the apostolic root, by whom it cannot be doubted that the faith itself was propagated throughout the whole world. Although this is altogether very well known to you, let us nevertheless prove it by the testimony of blessed Augustine. Hear what the most illustrious doctor of the church says in a certain work of his. For he says: "But if the church in which there is schism can in no way rightly be called the church, it remains that, since the church cannot be nonexistent, she is the one who, established upon the root of the Apostolic See through the successions of bishops, can in no way be extinguished by the malice of any men—even if that malice is known and cannot be excluded, but is judged, according to the circumstances of the times, to be tolerated."

C. XXXIII. Non consecrat in scismate constitutus episcopus.

Item Pelagius Papa. Pudenda, ut ita dicam, in diuisione rapina est non consecratus, sed execratus episcopus. Si enim ipsum consecrationis nomen rationabili ac uiuaci intellectu discutimus, is, qui cum uniuersali detrectat consecrari ecclesia, consecratus dici uel esse poterit nulla ratione. Consecrare enim est simul sacrare. Sed ab ecclesiae uisceribus diuisus et ab apostolicis sedibus separatus execrat ipse pocius, non consecrat. Iure ergo execratus tantum, non consecratus poterit dici, quem simul sacrare in unitate coniunctis membris non agnoscit ecclesia. Videamus tamen, utrum uel ipsarum consuetudinem partium in sua exordinatione conseruauerit. Nempe hic mos antiquus fuit, ut, quia pro longinquitate uel difficultate itineris ab Apostolico onerosum illis fuerat ordinari, ipsi se inuicem Mediolanensis et Aquileiensis ordinare episcopi debuissent, ita tamen, ut in ea ciuitate, in qua ordinandus erat episcopus, alterius ciuitatis pontifex occurrere debuisset, ut ordinandi electio a presenti ordinatore ex consensu uniuersalis, cui preficiendus erat, ecclesiae melius ac facilius potuisset agnosci, et in sua qui ad episcopatum prouehendus erat, nec tamen ordinatori suo subdendus fuerat, ordinaretur ecclesia. Etenim cum, sicut diximus, ecclesia una sit, cui in Canticis Canticorum dicitur: "Una est columba mea," nullam aliam esse constat, nisi que in apostolica est radice fundata, a quibus ipsam fidem uniuerso orbe propagatam non potest dubitari. Quod ut licet uobis, notissimum sit omnino, beati tamen Augustini testimonio conprobemus. Audite, quid in quodam opere suo preclarissimus doctor ecclesiae dicat. Ait enim: "Quod si nullo modo recte dici potest ecclesia, in qua scisma est, restat, ut, quoniam ecclesia nulla esse non potest, ea sit, quam in apostolicae sedis per successiones episcoporum radice constitutam nullorum hominum malicia (etiamsi nota et excludi non possit, sed pro temporum ratione tolleranda iudicetur) ullo modo ualeat exstinguere."

C. XXXIV. He who consents to schismatics does not share in unity.

The same. Schism itself, which is a Greek name, signifies a tearing. But a tearing cannot be in unity. Therefore, he who communicates with schismatics does not communicate with unity. They made parties for themselves and, separating themselves from that which is one—to speak now in the words of the Apostle Jude—they do not have the Spirit. From all these things it is brought about that, because they are not one in unity, because they wished to be in a party, and because they do not possess the Spirit, they cannot possess the sacrifice of the body of Christ. § 1. But the question for us now is not whether we should tolerate the evil, but whether we ought to be joined with schismatics. If they themselves too, although abounding in their own opinion, nevertheless sought the truth while placed within the maternal inward parts, they were not to be repelled by us until, with reason as guide, the truth of the matter had become clear among them. But because they divided themselves from the universal church, as blessed Augustine says, every Catholic securely detests that party which he knows does not communicate with the universal church strengthened by the Apostolic Sees. § 2. Nor indeed does it lighten their crime—but rather increases it—that you said they resisted for a long time lest they receive into their communion those communicating with the Apostolic Sees. For in this, while those too are to be blamed who wished to communicate with such persons, nevertheless much more are those to be execrated who scorned communion with the Apostolic Sees not only in priests but even in laypersons themselves. Nor does it profit them that in the same letter you declare that they suspended themselves from our communion either through ignorance of reason or through the simplicity of their understanding. For this very thing is rather why they are schismatics: not a judgment of thinking differently, but a certain most evil opinion divided them, because they feared things reported among themselves yet unknown to them and rashly believed them against the Apostolic See. § 3. Blessed Augustine announces this to be schism in a special sense, saying concerning such persons: "By rashly believing against the authority of those churches that merited to receive letters from the Apostolic See, he will not be able to repel from himself the most monstrous crime of schism." In sum, either you believe them to be the church—and, since there cannot be two churches, you will judge us, which may it not be, to be schismatics—or, if it is established that the true church is in the Apostolic Sees, recognize them also as divided from unity, and that the question of communion has been removed, since it is established that true communion cannot exist except in unity. § 4. Therefore, do not wish to be joined indiscriminately to the sacrifices of both, as though there were no difference between schismatics and the church. What a schismatic confects is not the body of Christ, if we are directed with truth as guide. For no one will be able to invent that Christ can be divided without the Apostle's reproof. It is established that the church—which, as has often been said, is Christ's body—is one, and she cannot be divided into two or more. For as soon as anyone shall have departed from her, he ceases to be the church.

C. XXXIV. Unitati non conmunicat scismaticis consentiens.

Idem. Scisma siquidem ipsum, quod grecum nomen est, scissuram sonat. Sed scisura in unitate esse non potest. Non ergo unitati conmunicat qui scismaticis conmunicat. Partes sibi ipsi fecerunt, et ab eo, quod unum est, ut apostoli Iudae iam uerbis loquar, semetipsos segregantes, Spiritum non habent. Quibus omnibus illud efficitur, ut, quia in unitate unum non sunt, ut, quia in partem esse uoluerunt, ut, quia Spiritum non habent, corpus Christi sacrificium habere non possint. §. 1. Non autem nobis nunc illa questio est, utrum tollerare malos, sed utrum debeamus scismaticis sociari. Si etiam ipsi, licet in suo sensu habundantes, intra materna tamen positi uiscera quererent ueritatem, a nobis repellendi non erant, donec apud eos ratione duce rei ueritas claruisset. Sed quia se ab uniuersali ecclesia diuiserunt, sicut B. Augustinus ait, omnis catholicus securus eam partem detestatur, cui ecclesiam uniuersalem apostolicis sedibus roboratam non conmunicare cognoscit. §. 2. Nec enim leuigat eorum crimen, magis uero auget, quod eos restitisse diu dixistis, ne apostolicis conmunicantes sedibus in sua conmunione reciperent. In hoc enim dum et illi culpandi sunt, qui conmunicare talibus uoluerunt, multo magis tamen illi execrandi sunt, qui non solum in sacerdotibus conmunionem apostolicarum sedium, uerum etiam in ipsis laicis spreuerunt. Sed nec illud eis prodest, quod eos in eisdem litteris uel ignorantia rationis, uel simplicitate intellectus sui a nostra se conmunione suspendisse perhibetis. Id ipsum enim magis est, propter quod scismatici sunt, quia non eos diuersa sentiendi iudicium, sed quedam apud se delata, sibi tamen incognita metuentes et contra apostolicam sedem temere credentes, pessima diuisit oppinio. §. 3. Quod scisma specialiter esse beatus denunciat Augustinus, dicens de talibus: "Aduersus auctoritatem illarum ecclesiarum, que ab apostolica sede epistolas accipere meruerunt, temere credendo, inmanissimum crimen scismatis a se propulsare non poterit." Ad summam, aut illos ecclesiam esse creditis, (et, cum duae ecclesiae esse non possint, nos, quod absit, scismaticos iudicabitis,) aut, si ueram in apostolicis sedibus esse constat ecclesiam, et illos ab unitate diuisos cognoscite, et conmunionis questionem esse sublatam, quam ueram nisi in unitate constat esse non posse. §. 4. Noli ergo, quasi nulla scismaticorum atque ecclesiae differentia sit, uelle indifferenter utrorumque sacrificiis sociari. Non est Christi corpus, quod scismaticus conficit, si ueritate duce dirigimur. Nec enim diuisum esse poterit Christum quisquam sine Apostoli reprobatione confingere. Unam, ut sepe dictum est, que Christi corpus est, constat esse ecclesiam que in duo uel in plura diuidi non potest. Simul enim, cum ab ea quisque discesserit, ecclesia esse desistit.

C. XXXV. From the time a bishop teaches things contrary to the faith, he cannot despoil another.

Likewise Pope Nicholas writes to Emperor Michael, [epistle 7]. Pope Celestine, writing to the eastern bishops, says: “If anyone was either excommunicated or stripped of the dignity of bishop or cleric by Bishop Nestorius or by others who follow him, from the time they began to preach such things, it is manifest that he both has remained and remains in our communion; nor do we judge him to have been removed, because the sentence of one who had already rendered himself fit to be removed could remove no one.”

C. XXXV. Ex quo episcopus fidei contraria docet, alium expoliare non potest.

Item Nykolaus Papa scribit Michaeli Augusto. [epist. VII.] Ait Celestinus Papa, orientalibus episcopis scribens: "Si quis ab episcopo Nestorio, aut ab aliis, qui eum secuntur, ex quo talia predicare ceperunt, uel excommunicatus, uel exutus est seu antistitis seu clerici dignitate, hunc in nostra communione et durasse, et durare manifestum est, nec iudicamus eum esse remotum, quia non poterat quemquam eius remouere sentencia, qui iam se prebuerat ipse remouendum."

C. XXXVI. Those who are excommunicated by heretics are not to be regarded as excommunicated.

Likewise to the clergy of Constantinople. The authority of our see, he says, has openly decreed that no bishop, cleric, or Christian of any profession who was cast down from communion or from his place by Nestorius or those like him, from the time they began to preach such things, is to be seen as either cast out or excommunicated; but all these persons remain in our communion to this day, because he who staggered while preaching such things could cast down or remove no one. You have understood, emperor, from the things recalled above that those who had formerly been removed and already cast down could not remove anyone, so that we need not say even their own prelate, or cast down anyone already prostrate.

> Item ad Clerum Constantinopolitanum. Aperte, inquit, sedis nostrae sanxit auctoritas, nullum siue episcopum, siue clericum, seu professione aliqua Christianum, qui a Nestorio, uel eius similibus, ex quo talia predicare ceperunt, uel conmunione uel loco suo deiecti sunt, uel eiectum uel excommunicatum uideri: sed hii omnes in nostra conmunione hucusque perdurant, quia neminem deicere uel remouere poterat qui predicans talia titubabat. Intellexisti, inperator, ex supra memoratis non potuisse, ut non dicamus saltim prelatum suum, quemlibet remouere, qui fuerant olim remoti, nec deicere quemquam iam ante prostrati?

C. XXXVII. Excommunicated persons are not to be received to render judgment.

Likewise Pope Nicholas, [in the same place, a little below]. We marvel how excommunicated persons were received to render judgment, since according to the apostolic canons they are prohibited from being received into communion alone without commendatory letters. For it is absurd that one who, according to the sacred rules, is not permitted even to communicate with the least should be permitted even to judge those who are almost his superiors. GRATIAN. By these authorities it is manifestly shown that, from the time anyone begins to teach anything contrary to the faith, he is able neither to cast anyone down nor to condemn him. § 1. Nevertheless, that saying of Augustine is objected: "Those departing from the faith lose neither baptism nor the power of baptizing." Therefore, since both powers—namely, of baptizing and of excommunicating—follow priestly anointing, those departing from the faith will either retain both or lack both. But the power of office is one thing, its execution another. Often the power of office is either received, as by monks in priestly anointing, or, once received, is retained without its execution, as by suspended persons, to whom administration is forbidden but the power is not taken away. Therefore, the power is not removed from those departing from the faith, just as it is not restored to those returning, lest injury appear to be done not to the man but to the sacrament. Hence those baptized or ordained by heretics, when they return to the unity of the Catholic faith, if perhaps for the sake of ecclesiastical peace they are received in their orders, will not have repeated the sacrament that is proved to have been administered in the church's form; but through the imposition of the hand the efficacy of the sacrament will be supplied, which is taught to have been conferred upon no one outside the church. Therefore, since both powers remain in heretics, if a heretic excommunicates a Catholic or another heretic in order to draw him into the communion of his heresy, because the sentence is unjust it lacks weight. § 2. But if he gives sentence against a Catholic living wickedly or against a heretic devoted to flagitious deeds or crimes, so that otherwise each might return to the rule of right living, it appears deservedly to be asked whether both are bound by his sentence, or only the heretic. It can be said, however, that the Catholic is in no way bound by the heretic's sentence. For he cannot strike with the sword of the mouth one whom he is unable to accuse or against whom he is unable to testify. For if those whom divine testimonies do not support, because they are outside the church, have lost the weight of human testimony against those who appear to be in the church, neither will those who are proved to have departed from her faith, and therefore have been condemned by the church, be able to possess the weight of ecclesiastical authority against those same persons. But a heretic appears to have power over a heretic, just as the devil also has power over the evil, as over his own livestock. Hence Augustine writes to Vincentius the Donatist and Rogatist, [epistle 48]:

C. XXXVII. Ad iudicandum excommunicati non sunt recipiendi.

Item Nykolaus Papa. [ibidem paulo inferius] Miramur, quomodo excommunicati ad iudicandum recepti sint, cum secundum apostolicos canones sine conmendaticiis litteris in sola conmunione recipi prohibeantur. Absurdum enim est, ut, cui non licet etiam cum minimis iuxta sacras regulas conmunicare, liceat etiam ei de suis pene maioribus iudicare. Gratian. His auctoritatibus perspicue monstratur, quod, ex quo aliquis contra fidem ceperit aliqua docere, nec deicere aliquem ualet nec dampnare. §. 1. Obicitur tamen illud Augustini: "Recedentes a fide nec baptisma, nec baptizandi potestatem amittunt." Cum ergo sacerdotalem unctionem utraque potestas, baptizandi uidelicet et excommunicandi, sequatur, a fide recedentes aut utramque retinebunt, aut utraque carebunt. Sed aliud est potestas offitii, aliud executio. Plerumque offitii potestas uel accipitur, ueluti a monachis in sacerdotali unctione, uel accepta sine sui executione retinetur, ueluti a suspensis, quibus amministratio interdicitur, potestas non aufertur. A fide itaque recedentibus potestas non adimitur, sicut redeuntibus non redditur, ne non homini, sed sacramento iniuria uideatur fieri. Unde ab hereticis baptizati uel ordinati, cum ad unitatem fidei catholicae redierint, si forte intuitu ecclesiasticae pacis in suis recipiantur ordinibus, non iterabitur sacramentum, quod in forma ecclesiae probabitur ministratum, sed per inpositionem manus prestabitur uirtus sacramenti, que extra ecclesiam nulli docetur esse collata. Cum ergo utraque potestas in hereticis remaneat, si hereticus catholicum uel alium hereticum excommunicauerit, ut in conmunionem suae heresis illum deducat, quia iniqua est sentencia, pondere caret. §. 2. Quod si in catholicum praue uiuentem, uel in hereticum flagiciis uel facinoribus deditum, ut alias ad recte uiuendi normam uterque redeat, sentenciam dederit, an uterque, an hereticus tantum eius sentencia teneatur, merito querendum uidetur? Potest autem dici, catholicum sentencia heretici minime teneri. Non enim potest oris gladio ferire quem accusare uel in quem testificari non ualet. Si enim quos diuina testimonia non secuntur, quia extra ecclesiam sunt, pondus humani testimonii perdiderunt aduersus eos, qui in ecclesia esse uidentur, nec aduersus eosdem ecclesiasticae auctoritatis pondus habere poterunt qui ab eius fide discessisse probati sunt, atque ideo ab ecclesia sunt condempnati. In hereticum autem potestatem habere uidetur hereticus, sicut et diabolus potest in malis, tamquam in suo pecore. Unde Augustinus scribit Vincentio Donatistae et Rogatistae: [epist. XLVIII.]

C. XXXVIII. One excommunicated by heretics for a crime is not to be received by Catholics.

Whoever receives one cast out by you for some flagitious deed or crime in the same way as those are received who, apart from the error by which you are separated from us, lived among you without crime, displeases us. But you do not easily show these things either; and if you show them, we tolerate certain persons whom we cannot correct or punish; nor on account of the chaff do we abandon the Lord's threshing floor, nor on account of the bad fish do we break the Lord's nets, nor on account of the kids to be separated at the end do we desert the Lord's flock, nor on account of the vessels made unto dishonor do we migrate from the Lord's house.

C. XXXVIII. Pro facinore ab hereticis excommunicatus a catholicis non est recipiendus.

Quisquis pro aliquo facinore uel flagicio proiectum a uobis ita suscipit, sicut suscipiuntur qui excepto errore, quo a nobis separamini, sine crimine apud uos uixerunt, displicet nobis. Sed nec facile ista monstratis, et, si monstretis, nonnullos tolleramus, quos corrigere uel punire non possumus, neque propter paleam relinquimus aream Domini, neque propter pisces malos rumpimus retia Domini, neque propter hedos in fine segregandos deserimus gregem Domini, neque propter uasa facta in contumeliam migramus de domo Domini.

C. XXXIX. Whoever is excommunicated by heretics for discipline is not to be received by Catholics.

The same to Eusebius, [epistle 169]. A former subdeacon of the church of Hispania, named Primus, when he was prohibited from undisciplined access to consecrated women and despised orderly and sound precepts, was removed from the clergy. § 1. I, if it pleases the Lord, observe this rule: whoever, after being degraded among them for discipline, wishes to pass over to the Catholic Church is to be received in the humiliation of penance, to which perhaps they too would compel him if he had wished to remain among them. GRATIAN. But this statement of Augustine is understood to have been made not on account of the sentence, whose power outside the church is none, but in detestation of crimes, which are equally to be punished in heretics as in Catholics. Nevertheless, that statement of Augustine can be understood of the power of baptizing, not of binding or loosing or of administering the other sacraments. For baptism, whether it shall have been administered by a heretic or even by a layman, provided that it is received in the unity of the Catholic faith, will not lack effect. But the other sacraments—such as those of the sacred body and blood of the Lord, excommunication, or reconciliation—if they are administered by a heretic or by a Catholic who is not a priest, will have either no effect or a deadly one. Hence they are by no means to be received by faithful men. On this Augustine writes in Book I On the One Baptism, [against the Donatists, c. 2]:

C. XXXIX. Quisquis propter disciplinam ab hereticis excommunicatur, a catholicis non est recipiendus.

Idem ad Eusebium. [epist. CLXIX.] Subdiaconus quondam Hispaniensis ecclesiae, uocabulo Primus, cum ab accessu indisciplinato sanctimonialium prohiberetur, atque ordinata et sana precepta contempneret, a clericatu remotus est. §. 1. Ego, si Domino placet, istum modum seruo, ut quisquis apud eos propter disciplinam degradatus ad catholicam transire uoluerit, in humiliatione penitenciae recipiatur, quo et ipsi forsitan eum cogerent, si apud eos manere uoluisset. Gratian. Sed istud Augustini intelligitur dictum non propter sentenciam, cuius potestas nulla est extra ecclesiam, sed in detestatione criminum, que in hereticis, sicut in catholicis, eque sunt punienda. Potest tamen illud Augustini de potestate baptizandi intelligi, non ligandi, aut soluendi, uel cetera sacramenta ministrandi. Baptisma namque siue ab heretico, siue etiam laico ministratum fuerit, dummodo in unitate catholicae fidei accipiatur, non carebit effectu. Alia uero sacramenta, ut sacri corporis et sanguinis Domini, excommunicationis uel reconciliationis, si ab heretico uel catholico non sacerdote ministrentur, uel nullum, uel letalem habebunt effectum. Unde et ab hominibus fidelibus nullatenus sunt recipienda. Hinc Augustinus scribit in I. libro de unico baptismo: [contra Donatistas c. 2.]

C. XL. One placed at the point of death can receive penance even from a heretic.

If extreme necessity should perhaps compel someone, and he should not find a Catholic through whom he might receive it, and, preserving Catholic peace in his mind, should receive through someone placed outside Catholic unity what he would have received within Catholic unity itself, if he should immediately depart from this life, we reckon him only a Catholic. But if he shall have been delivered from bodily death, when he restores himself by bodily presence to the Catholic congregation, from which he had never departed in heart, we not only do not condemn what he did but even praise it most securely and truly, since he believed God to be present to his heart, where he preserved unity, and did not wish to depart from this life without the sacrament of holy baptism—which, wherever he found it, he recognized to belong not to men but to God. But if anyone, although he can receive it within Catholic unity itself, through some perversity of mind chooses to be baptized in schism, even if he afterward comes to the Catholic Church, it is certain that there the sacrament profits which can be received elsewhere but cannot profit elsewhere; he is perverse and iniquitous, and the more perniciously so, the more knowingly he acts.

C. XL. In extremo positus etiam ab heretico penitenciam accipere ualet.

Si quem forte coegerit extrema necessitas et ubi catholicum, per quem accipiat, non inuenerit, et in animo pacem catholicam custodiens, per aliquem extra unitatem catholicam positum acceperit quod in ipsa erat catholica unitate percepturus, si statim etiam de hac uita migrauerit, non eum nisi catholicum deputamus. Si autem fuerit a corporali morte liberatus, cum se catholicae congregationi et presentia corporali reddiderit, unde numquam corde discesserat, non solum non inprobamus quod fecit, sed etiam securissime uerissimeque laudamus, quoniam presentem Deum credidit cordi suo, ubi unitatem seruabat, et sine sancti baptismi sacramento (quod, ubicumque inuenit, non hominum, sed Dei esse cognouit) noluit ex hac uita migrare. Si quis autem, cum possit in ipsa accipere, aliqua mentis peruersitate elegerit in scismate baptizari, etiamsi postea uenerit ad catholicam ecclesiam, certum est ibi prodesse sacramentum, quod alibi accipi potest, prodesse non potest; peruersus et iniquus est, et tanto perniciosius, quanto scientius.

C. XLI. Let one who unknowingly received prohibited communion from the hand of a heretic do penance for a year.

Likewise Pope Julian. If anyone shall have given or received communion from the hand of a heretic and does not know that the Catholic Church forbids it, upon understanding it afterward let him do penance for one complete year. But if he knows and neglects it, and afterward performs penance, let him do penance for ten years. Others judge seven, and certain persons more humanely, that he should do penance for five years. § 1. If anyone shall have permitted a heretic to celebrate his mass in a Catholic church and does not know, let him do penance for forty days; if from reverence for him, let him do penance for one year; if for condemnation of the Catholic Church and of the custom of the Romans, let him be cast out of the church as a heretic unless he has repentance; if he has it, let him do penance for ten years. If he shall have withdrawn from the Catholic Church into a congregation of heretics and persuaded others, afterward, if he performs penance, let him do penance for twelve years: three outside the church, seven among the hearers, and two still outside communion. Concerning these it is said thus in the canon: that in the twelfth year they should receive communion without an oblation.

C. XLI. Annum peniteat qui de manu heretici nesciens prohibitam conmunionem accepit.

Item Iulianus Papa. Si quis dederit aut acceperit conmunionem de manu heretici, et nescit, quod catholica ecclesia contradicit, postea intelligens, annum integrum peniteat. Si autem scit, et neglexerit, et postea penitenciam egerit, decem annos peniteat. Alii iudicant septem, et quidam humanius, ut quinque annos peniteat. §. 1. Si quis permiserit hereticum missam suam celebrare in ecclesia catholica, et nescit, quadraginta dies peniteat; si pro reuerentia eius, annum unum peniteat; si pro dampnatione ecclesiae catholicae, et consuetudinis Romanorum, proiciatur ab ecclesia, sicut hereticus, nisi habeat penitenciam; si habuerit, decem annos peniteat. Si recesserit ab ecclesia catholica in congregatione hereticorum, et alios persuaserit, postea si penitenciam egerit, duodecim annos peniteat, tres extra ecclesiam et septem inter audientes, et duos adhuc extra conmunionem. De his ita in canone dicitur, ut duodecimo anno conmunionem sine oblatione percipiant.

C. XLII. It is better to seize death than to receive communion from the hand of a heretic.

Likewise Gregory, [Pope Gregory, Dialogues, Book III, c. 31]. The young King Hermenegild began, despising an earthly kingdom and seeking the heavenly one with strong desire, to lie bound in haircloth and to pour forth prayers to almighty God for his strengthening, and to despise the glory of the passing world all the more loftily, inasmuch as, when bound, he had recognized that what could be taken away was nothing. But when the day of the Paschal feast arrived, in the silence of the dead of night his faithless father sent an Arian bishop to him so that he might receive from his hand the communion of a sacrilegious consecration and through this merit to return to his father's favor. But the man devoted to God reproached the arriving Arian bishop as he ought and repelled his faithlessness from himself with fitting rebukes; for although he lay bound outwardly, nevertheless within himself he stood secure upon a great summit of mind. And so, when the Arian bishop returned to him, his father raged and immediately sent his attendants to kill the most steadfast confessor of God there where he lay.

C. XLII. Pocius est mortem arripere quam de manu heretici conmunionem accipere.

Item Gregorius. [Papa lib. III. Dialog., cap. 31.] Cepit Erminegildus rex iuuenis terrenum regnum despiciens, et forti desiderio celeste querens, in ciliciis iacere uinculatus et omnipotenti Deo ad confortandum se preces effundere, tantoque sublimius gloriam transeuntis mundi despicere, quanto et religatus agnouerat nil fuisse, quod potuit auferri. Superueniente autem festiuitatis pascalis die, intempestae noctis silentio ad eum perfidus pater Arrianum episcopum misit, ut de eius manu sacrilegae consecrationis conmunionem perciperet, atque per hoc ad patris gratiam redire mereretur. Sed uir Deo deditus Arriano episcopo uenienti exprobrauit ut debuit, eiusque a se perfidiam dignis increpationibus repulit, quia etsi exterius iacebat ligatus, apud se tamen in magno mentis culmine stabat securus. Ad se itaque reuerso episcopo Arriano pater infremuit, statimque suos apparitores misit, qui constantissimum confessorem Dei illic, ubi iacebat, occiderent.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. That no one can be excommunicated or absolved after death is shown from the words of the Gospel in which it is said: "Whatever you shall have bound upon earth, etc." "Upon earth," he says, not beneath the earth, showing that we can loose or bind the living according to the diversity of their merits, but cannot render sentence concerning the dead. Hence Pope Leo writes to Rusticus, Bishop of Narbonne, [epistle 90, c. 7; otherwise epistle 92, c. 6]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem post mortem nullus excommunicari ualeat uel absolui, ex uerbis euangelii monstratur, quibus dicitur: "Quodcumque ligaueris super terram etc." Super terram, inquit, non sub terra; ostendens, quod uiuentes pro uarietate suorum meritorum soluere possumus uel ligare; de mortuis autem sententiam ferre non possumus. Unde Leo Papa scribit Rustico, Narbonensi Episcopo: [epist. XC. cap. 7. al. epist. XCII. c. 6.]

C. I. Those who were unwilling to be absolved by the church in this life cannot be loosed by her after death.

Concerning those deprived of communion and thus deceased. Their case is to be reserved for the judgment of God, in whose hand it was that the death of such persons should not be delayed until the remedy of communion. But we cannot communicate when dead with those with whom we did not communicate while they were living.

> C. I. Non possunt ab ecclesia solui post mortem qui in hac uita ab ea noluerunt absolui.
> De conmunione priuatis, et ita defunctis. Horum causa iudicio Dei reseruanda est, in cuius manu fuit, ut talium obitus non usque ad conmunionis remedium differretur. Nos autem quibus uiuentibus non conmunicamus mortuis conmunicare non possumus.

C. II. The church can bind or loose the living, not the dead.

Likewise Gelasius, to Faustus the magister performing the office of legate at Constantinople. Let it be read, from the time the Christian religion began, or certainly let an example be given in the church of God, that pardon was granted by any pontiffs, or by the Apostles themselves, or finally by the Savior himself, except to those correcting themselves. But it is altogether neither read nor said that what their voice brings forth has been heard beneath this heaven: "Grant us pardon, yet so that we persist in error." Likewise, let those who strive to oppose the canons to us show by which canons, which rules, which reading, or which document—whether from our forebears, or from the Apostles themselves, who without doubt were deservedly more powerful, or from the Lord the Savior himself, who is believed to be about to judge the living and the dead—this either was ever done or is commanded to be done. We read that Christ raised the dead; we do not read that he absolved those dead in error. And he who alone possessed so great a power of doing this principally commanded blessed Peter the Apostle: "Whatever you shall have bound upon earth, etc." "Upon earth," he says. For he nowhere said that one deceased in a bond was to be absolved.

> C. II. Ecclesia uiuentes potest ligare uel soluere, non mortuos.
> Item Gelasius, Fausto Magistro, fungenti legationis offitio Constantinopolim. Legatur, ex quo est religio Christiana, uel certe detur exemplum in ecclesia Dei a quibuslibet Pontificibus aut ab ipsis Apostolis, ab ipso denique Saluatore ueniam, nisi se corrigentibus, fuisse concessam. Auditum autem sub isto celo non legitur omnino, nec dicitur, quod eorum uoce depromitur: date nobis ueniam, ut tamen nos in errore duremus. Id quoque pariter ostendant qui nobis canones nituntur opponere, quibus hoc canonibus, quibus regulis, qua lectione, quoue documento, siue a maioribus nostris, siue ab Apostolis ipsis (quos potiores merito fuisse non dubium est) seu ab ipso Domino Saluatore, qui iudicaturus creditur uiuos et mortuos, siue factum est umquam, uel faciendum esse mandatur? Mortuos suscitasse Christum legimus; in errore mortuos absoluisse non legimus. Et qui hoc tantum faciendi solus habuerit potestatem, B. Petro apostolo principaliter mandauit: "Quodcumque ligaueris super terram etc." Super terram, inquit. Nam alligatione defunctum nusquam dixit esse absoluendum.

C. III. One ought not to abstain after their death from the alms of those with whom we did not cease to communicate in life.

Likewise Urban II to Bishop Vilimundus. Assuredly, we praise what your Fraternity made known that it did concerning Richard, son of Borrell, from zeal for God and love of souls. But it is not to be feared to such an extent; you are not to abstain from his alms to such an extent. For among the other fathers of our faith, blessed Leo, an outstanding doctor, says: "Those with whom we do not communicate while living, we ought not to communicate with when dead." It is established, therefore, that with those with whom we communicate while they live—to speak from the opposite—we can also communicate when they are dead. We, plainly placed between two opposing groups, can in no way communicate with the impious and schismatics; but with these persons, although they are sinners and plunderers, we communicate dispensationally for a time, because they have supported the church until now and promise that they will be more faithful in the future. Otherwise, it would be necessary for us to depart from these regions of the world. Under this pledge we also recently granted them absolution on the feast of blessed Peter. Therefore, because the aforesaid man departed neither excommunicated by name nor communicating with persons excommunicated by name, but in the faith and service of his Lord, it is lawful for us dispensationally—that is, for as long as we tolerate them—to share in their alms and to assist the soul of the deceased by every means of the Christian religion.

C. III. Non oportet ab elemosinis eorum abstinere post mortem, quibus in uita conmunicare non destitimus.

Item Urbanus. [II.] Vilimundo Episcopo. Sane quod super Richardo, filio Borelli, uestra fraternitas se egisse innotuit pro zelo Dei et animarum karitate, laudamus. Sed non est adeo timendum, non adeo est uobis ab eius elemosinis abstinendum. Inter ceteros quippe nostrae fidei patres B. Leo doctor egregius: "Quibus" inquit, "uiuis, non conmunicamus nec mortuis conmunicare debemus." Constat ergo, quoniam, quibus uiuis (ut ex opposito loquamur), conmunicamus mortuis quoque conmunicare possimus. Nos plane inter duo obpugnantia positi, impiis quidem et scismaticis conmunicare nullo modo possumus, istis autem, licet peccatoribus et predonibus, dispensatiue pro tempore conmunicamus, quia et hactenus ecclesiam sustentauerunt, et se fideliores in posterum pollicentur. Alioquin oportet nos de his mundi partibus exire. Sub qua etiam sponsione nos eis nuper in B. Petri nataliciis absolutionem indulsimus. Quia ergo predictus uir neque excommunicatus nominatiue, neque conmunicans cum excommunicatis ex nomine exiit, sed in Domini sui fide atque seruicio, licet nobis dispensatiue, id est quamdiu eos patimur, eorum elemosinis conmunicare, et defuncti animam Christianae religionis modis omnibus adiuuare.

[C. IV.] Likewise Gelasius to all the bishops established throughout Dardania or Illyricum.

And let no one at all persuade you that the crime of his prevarication was relaxed for Acacius, because he who, after falling back into the fellowship of depravity, deserved by right to be excluded from apostolic communion, and died while persisting in this same condemnation, now dead cannot obtain the absolution that while alive he neither sought at all nor merited. For it was delegated to the Apostles themselves by the voice of Christ: "The things that you shall have bound upon earth, and the rest." But concerning him who has been placed under divine judgment, it is not lawful for us to decree anything other than that in which his final day found him. And therefore, unless his name and the other associates of this error have been rejected, you ought to share with none of them at all the purity of the Lord's table, which our forebears always preserved carefully as separate from heretical pollution.

[C. IV.] Item Gelasius uniuersis Episcopis, per Dardaniam siue per Illiricum constitutis.

Nec quisquam uobis omnino persuadeat, Achatio preuaricationis suae crimen fuisse laxatum, quia qui post, quam in collegium recidens prauitatis iure meruit ab apostolica conmunione secludi, in hac eadem persistens dampnatione defunctus est, absolutionem, quam superstes non quesiuit omnino, nec meruit, mortuus iam non potest inpetrare. Siquidem ipsis apostolis Christi uoce delegatum est: "Que ligaueritis super terram et reliqua". Ceterum de eo, qui in diuino iudicio est constitutus, nobis fas non est aliud decernere preter id, in quo eum dies supremus inuenit. Atque ideo, nisi eius nomine refutato, ceterisque consortibus huius erroris, cum nullo prorsus eorum participare debetis mensae dominicae puritatem, quam maiores nostri semper ab heretica magnopere seruauerunt pollutione discretam.

C. V. The sentence of condemnation against an incorrigible person cannot be relaxed.

Likewise Pope Leo, [epistle 13 to the Empress Pulcheria]. Whoever merits to receive a sentence of condemnation, if he wishes to remain in his own opinion, no one will be able to relax it. PART II. GRATIAN. By these authorities it is proved that we can loose or bind the living, not the dead. But this is not to be understood of every crime. For there are certain crimes concerning which any persons can be accused or condemned even after death, such as heresy. Hence in the first session of the Fifth Synod it is read:

C. V. Incorrigibilis dampnationis sentencia relaxari non potest.

Item Leo Papa. [epist. XIII. ad Pulcheriam Augustam] Dampnationis sentenciam quicumque meretur excipere, si in suo sensu uoluerit permanere, nullus poterit relaxare. II. Pars. Gratian. His auctoritatibus probatur, quod uiuentes, non mortuos soluere possumus uel ligare. Verum hoc non de omni crimine intelligendum est. Sunt enim quedam crimina, de quibus etiam post mortem accusari possunt quilibet uel dampnari, ueluti heresis. Unde in prima actione V. Sinodi legitur:

C. VI. Heretics are to be excommunicated even after death.

Assuredly, it is put forward by certain persons who say that heretics ought to be anathematized after death and that in this the teaching of the holy Fathers is to be followed, who not only condemned living heretics but also the dead, just as they recalled after death those who had been unjustly condemned and wrote them in the sacred diptychs. This was done in the case of John and Flavian, bishops of Constantinople of religious memory. Likewise in the fifth session: § 1. Augustine says: “If perhaps these books designate their betrayer just as the Lord designated Judas, let them read in them by name and expressly that either Caecilian or his ordainers were betrayers of those same books; and unless I anathematize them, let me myself be judged to have betrayed them.” § 2. Augustine of holy memory advised and established that the things that have just been recited were held in the church from the beginning. For an impious dogma has already been accused and condemned, and the tradition of the church wills those who are liable to such a dogma to be anathematized, even though they were also dead. Therefore Augustine of holy memory says: “If Caecilian were now convicted of the things alleged against him, even after his death I anathematize him.” Likewise: § 3. Many bishops, having assembled and arranged certain matters from different cases pertaining to ecclesiastical status, established concerning deceased bishops who leave their property to heretics that they should be subjected to anathema even after death. There are also epistles of Augustine of holy memory saying that if any persons during their life were not of right understanding, although they had not yet been condemned while alive, nevertheless, when the sin has been demonstrated, they too should be subjected to anathema after death. Likewise: § 4. “If the things objected against Caecilian are true and could at some time be shown to us, we would anathematize him though dead.” Likewise: § 5. “You say that it is lawful for me to judge even concerning the dead, because judgment is customarily made not only concerning the living but also concerning the dead." Likewise: § 6. Rabbula of holy memory, having been made bishop of the city of Edessa, who shone among the priests, anathematized Theodore of Mopsuestia after death in the church. Likewise: § 7. The church of the Romans also, a few years ago, anathematized Dioscorus, who was pope of that same church, even after death, although he had not sinned in the faith. And all who live here in Rome know this, especially those who are established in dignities, who also remained communicants with the same Dioscorus until his death. Likewise: § 8. If anyone goes back to the times of Theophilus of holy memory or further, he will also find Origen anathematized after death. This both your Holiness and Vigilius, most religious Pope of Old Rome, also did in this case. Likewise: § 9. The holy synod said: The things that have been said and put forward suffice to demonstrate the ecclesiastical tradition that heretics ought to be anathematized even after death. Likewise in the fourth session: § 10. The holy synod said: Various epistles of Augustine of holy memory, who shone among the African bishops, have been recited, signifying that heretics ought to be anathematized even after death. The other most reverend African bishops also preserved such an ecclesiastical tradition; but the holy Roman church too anathematized certain bishops even after death, although during their life they had not been accused concerning the faith, and the records held among us attest both things.

C. VI. Heretici etiam post mortem sunt excommunicandi.

Sane profertur a quibusdam, qui dicunt oportere post mortem hereticos anathematizari, et sequi doctrinam in hoc sanctorum Patrum, qui non solum uiuentes hereticos condempnauerunt, sed etiam mortuos, sicut eos, qui iniuste condempnati sunt, reuocauerunt post mortem, et in sacris dipticis scripserunt. Quod factum est in Iohanne, et in Flauiano religiosae memoriae episcopis Constantinopolitanis. Item in actione V.: §. 1. Augustinus ait: "Si forte isti libri ita designant traditorem suum, sicut Dominus designauit Iudam, legant in eis nominatim et expresse uel Cecilianum, uel eius ordinatores eorumdem librorum fuisse traditores, et nisi eos anathematizauero, ipse cum eis iudicer tradidisse." §. 2. Que modo recitata sunt Augustinus sanctae memoriae consuluit, et statuit teneri ab initio in ecclesia. Inpium enim dogma iam inculpatum est et condempnatum et eos, qui tali dogmati obnoxii sunt, anathematizari uult ecclesiae traditio, licet etiam mortui essent. Ideo sanctae memoriae Augustinus dicit: "Si modo conuinceretur Cecilianus de his, que inferuntur ei, etiam post mortem eius illum anathematizo." Item: §. 3. Multi episcopi congregati, et quedam de diuersis causis ad ecclesiasticum statum pertinentibus disponentes, de episcopis statuerunt defunctis, qui suas facultates hereticis relinquunt, ut etiam post mortem anathemati subiciantur. Sunt autem et Augustini sanctae memoriae dicentes epistolae, quod si qui in uita sua non recte sapuerunt, licet non condempnati fuissent adhuc uiuentes, tamen demonstrato peccato etiam isti post mortem anathemati subiciantur. Item: §. 4. "Si uera sunt que Ceciliano obiecta sunt, et nobis aliquando possent monstrari, ipsum mortuum anathematizaremus." Item: §. 5. "Dicis, licere michi etiam de mortuis iudicare, quia iudicium non tantum de uiuis, sed etiam de mortuis solet fieri." Item: §. 6. Rabula sanctae memoriae, episcopus factus Edissenae ciuitatis, qui in sacerdotibus resplenduit Theodorum Mopsuestenum post mortem in ecclesia anathematizauit. Item: §. 7. Romanorum etiam ecclesia ante paucos annos Dioscorum, qui fuit Papa eiusdem ecclesiae, post mortem etiam anathematizauit, cum nec in fide peccasset. Et hoc sciunt omnes, qui degunt hic Romae, et maxime qui in dignitatibus existunt, qui etiam eidem Dioscoro conmunicatores permanserunt usque ad eius mortem. Item: §. 8. Si ad tempora Theophili sanctae memoriae uel superius aliquis recurrerit, etiam Origenem post mortem inueniet anathematizatum. Quod etiam in isto fecit et uestra sanctitas, et Vigilius religiosissimus Papa antiquioris Romae. Item: §. 9. Sancta sinodus dixit: Sufficiunt que dicta et prolata sunt ecclesiasticam traditionem demonstrare, quod oportet hereticos etiam post mortem anathematizari. Item in actione IV.: §. 10. Sancta sinodus dixit: Augustini sanctae memoriae, qui inter Affricanos episcopos splenduit, diuersae epistolae sunt recitatae, significantes, quod hereticos oportet etiam post mortem anathematizari. Talem autem ecclesiasticam traditionem et alii Affricani reuerentissimi episcopi seruauerunt; sed et Romana sancta ecclesia quosdam episcopos etiam post mortem anathematizauit, licet pro fide in uita sua non essent accusati, et utrumque apud nos gesta habita significant.

Question III

GRATIAN. PART I. That an entire household is to be excommunicated for the sin of one person is proved by many examples. For on account of the sin of the Sodomites, their little children, who by the privilege of their age did not know their fathers' flagitious deeds, were consumed by heavenly fire. § 1. Likewise, on account of the sin of the Amalekites, not only their little children but even the brute animals down to the one urinating against a wall were commanded by the Lord to be destroyed. § 2. Likewise, Dathan and Abiram were authors of schism against Moses and Aaron, and not only they themselves alone but all their substance descended with them into hell. § 3. In the New Testament too it is sometimes read that, when sins demanded it, a grave pestilence raged, which involved even those who had no consciousness of the sin. Therefore, if little children are found to have been punished so severely for the sins of their parents, there is no doubt that for the sins of the same they can equally be struck by a sentence of excommunication. § 4. To these things answer is made thus: that little children are scourged bodily for the sins of their parents appears from the words of the Gospel, where the disciples are said to have asked concerning the man born blind: "Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents, that he should be born blind?" In them is also fulfilled what the Lord said to Moses: "I am a jealous God, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the sons to the third and fourth generation." Spiritually, however, little children are not held by the sins of their parents after they have been cleansed from original sin through the sacrament of regeneration. Hence through Ezekiel the Lord says: "The soul that shall have sinned, that soul shall die; the son will not bear the iniquity of the father, and the father does not bear the iniquity of the son; the justice of the just will be upon him, and the impiety of the impious will be upon him." Whatever sins the parents committed after the son was personally separated from them are not imputed to him for punishment. Hence all posterity are said to be held by the sin of Adam because no one had yet been physically propagated from him. But because before God not the sentence of the priests but the life of the accused is sought, it is evident that one whom the stain of sin does not infect is not to be marked by a sentence. Hence also Paul, writing to the Corinthians, says: "If anyone is named a brother and is a fornicator, or avaricious, or serving idols, with such a person you ought not even to take food." From these words it is given to be understood that unless someone has first been named concerning a crime—that is, either accused and convicted before a judge or has himself confessed concerning himself in law—he is neither to be struck by a sentence nor is one to abstain from communion with him. Therefore, an entire household is not to be excommunicated for the sin of one person. Hence Augustine writes to Bishop Auxilius, [epistle 75]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem pro peccato alicuius tota familia excommunicanda sit, multorum exemplis probatur. Pro peccato namque Sodomitarum paruuli eorum, qui beneficio etatis paterna flagicia nesciebant, celesti igne sunt consumpti. §. 1. Item pro peccato Amalecitarum non solum paruuli eorum, sed etiam bruta animalia usque ad mingentem ad parietem iussa sunt deleri a Domino. §. 2. Item Dathan et Abiron auctores scismatis fuerunt contra Moysen et Aaron nec tantum ipsi soli, sed omnis substantia eorum cum ipsis descendit ad inferos. §. 3. In nouo etiam testamento nonnumquam peccatis exigentibus grauis pestilentia deseuisse legitur, que etiam illos inuoluit, qui peccati conscientiam non habebant. Si ergo tam seuerissime pro peccatis parentum inueniuntur paruuli puniti, nulli dubium est, quin pro peccatis eorundem sentencia excommunicationis pariter feriri ualeant. §. 4. His ita respondetur: Pro peccatis parentum paruulos corporaliter flagellari ex uerbis euangelii apparet, ubi discipulis de ceco nato interrogasse dicuntur: "Rabbi, quis peccauit, hic, aut parentes eius, ut cecus nasceretur?" In quibus etiam illud conpletur, quod Dominus ait ad Moysen: "Ego sum Deus zelotes, uisitans peccata patrum in filios usque in tertiam et quartam generationem." Spiritualiter autem peccatis parentum paruuli non tenentur, ex quo per sacramentum regenerationis ab originali peccato fuerint emundati. Unde per Ezechielem Dominus ait: "Anima, que peccauerit, ipsa morietur; filius non portabit iniquitatem patris, et pater non portat iniquitatem filii; iustitia iusti super eum erit, et inpietas inpii erit super eum." Quecumque etiam peccata parentes conmiserunt, ex quo filius personaliter ab eis separatus fuerit, ei non inputantur ad penam. Unde peccato Adae ideo omnes posteri teneri dicuntur, quia nondum aliquis ex illo materialiter fuerat proseminatus. Quia uero apud Deum non sentencia sacerdotum, sed uita reorum queritur, patet, quod non est notandus sentencia quem peccati macula non inficit. Hinc etiam Paulus scribens Chorinthiis ait: "Si quis frater nominatur fornicator, aut auarus, aut idolis seruiens, cum eiusmodi nec cibum sumere debetis." Ex quibus uerbis datur intelligi, quod nisi primum fuerit aliquis nominatus de crimine, id est uel coram iudice accusatus et conuictus, uel in iure ipse de se fuerit confessus, quod nec sentencia est feriendus, nec ab eius conmunione est abstinendum. Non ergo pro alicuius peccato tota familia excommunicanda est. Unde Augustinus scribit ad Auxilium Episcopum: [epist. LXXV.]

C. I. A son is not to be anathematized for the sin of his father.

If you have concerning this matter a judgment explored by certain reasons or testimonies of Scripture, deign to teach us how a son is rightly anathematized for the sin of his father, or a wife for that of her husband, or a servant for that of his master, or anyone in the household who has not even yet been born, if he is born at the time when the entire household is bound by anathema, and aid cannot be given to him through the washing of regeneration when he is in danger of death. For that was a bodily punishment by which we read that certain contemners of God were killed together with all their people who were participants in the same impiety. For then mortal bodies, which were some day to die in any case, were destroyed for the terror of the living. But the spiritual punishment by which what is written comes about—"The things you shall have bound upon earth will be bound also in heaven"—binds souls, concerning which it was said: "As the soul of the father, so the soul of the son is mine. The soul that shall have sinned, that soul shall die." § 1. Perhaps you have heard that some priests of great name anathematized one of those who sinned together with his household. But perhaps, if they were questioned, they would be found capable of rendering a reason for it. But I, if anyone should ask me whether this is rightly done, do not find what I should answer him; I have never dared to do this concerning the flagitious deeds of certain persons perpetrated unanimously against the church unless I were most gravely moved. But if the Lord has revealed to you how justly it may be done, I by no means despise your youthful age and the beginnings of your ecclesiastical honor. For I, an old man, am prepared to be taught by a young man, and I, a bishop of so many years, by a colleague not yet a year old, how I can render a just reason either to God or to men if we punish with spiritual torment innocent souls for another's crime—a crime that they do not inherit from Adam, in whom all have sinned. For although Classitianus's son inherited from his father the guilt of the first man, to be expiated by the sacred font of baptism, nevertheless who doubts that whatever sin his father committed after he begot him does not pertain to him, since he himself was not a participant in it? What shall I say concerning the spouse? What concerning so many souls of the entire household? Hence, if one soul through that severity by which this entire household was anathematized should perish by departing from the body without baptism, the death of innumerable bodies, if innocent people were violently dragged away from the church and killed, cannot be compared to this loss. Therefore, if you can render a reason concerning this matter, would that by writing back you also furnish it to us, so that we too may be able to do so. But if you cannot, what is it to you to do through an unconsidered agitation of mind that for which, if you are questioned, you are unable to find a right answer? But I have said these things even if our son Classitianus committed something that most justly seemed to you deserving of punishment by anathema. PART II. GRATIAN. Therefore, as is shown most evidently by this authority, one is unlawfully excommunicated for the sin of another, and those who for the sin of one person render a sentence of excommunication against an entire household rest upon no reason. But an unlawful excommunication does not injure the person marked; it injures the one excommunicating. Hence Gregory writes to Magnus, Bishop of Milan, [Book II, epistle 26]:

C. I. Pro peccato patris non est filius anathematizandus.

Si habes de hac re sententiam certis rationibus uel scripturarum testimoniis exploratam, nos docere digneris, quomodo recte anathematizetur pro patris peccato filius, aut pro mariti uxor, aut pro domini seruus, aut quisquam in domo etiam nondum natus, si eo tempore, quo uniuersa domus est anathemate obligata, nascatur, nec ei possit per lauacrum regenerationis in mortis periculo subueniri. Hec enim fuit corporalis pena, qua legimus quosdam contemptores Dei cum suis omnibus, qui eiusdem impietatis participes fuerunt, pariter interfectos. Tunc quippe ad terrorem uiuentium mortalia corpora perimebantur, quandoque etiam moritura. Spiritualis autem pena, qua fit quod scriptum est: "Quae ligaueris super terram erunt ligata et in celo," animas obligat, de quibus dictum est: "Ut anima patris, et anima filii mea est. Anima, que peccauerit, ipsa morietur." §. 1. Audistis fortassis aliquos magni nominis sacerdotes cum domo sua quempiam anathematizasse peccantium. Sed forte, si essent interrogati, reperirentur ydonei inde reddere rationem. Ego autem, si quis a me quesierit, utrum id recte fiat, quid ei respondeam non inuenio, numquam hoc facere ausus sum de quorumdam facinoribus unanimiter aduersus ecclesiam perpetratis, nisi grauissime conmouerer. Sed si tibi quam iuste id fiat Dominus reuelauit, nequaquam iuuenilem etatem tuam, et honoris ecclesiastici rudimenta contempno. Senex enim a iuuene, et episcopus tot annorum a collega necdum anniculo paratus sum doceri, quomodo possim uel Deo, uel hominibus iustam reddere rationem, si animas innocentes pro scelere alieno quod non trahunt ex Adam, in quo omnes peccauerunt, spirituali supplicio puniamus. Etenim Classitiani filius, etsi traxit ex patre noxam primi hominis, sacro fonte baptismatis expiandam, tamen quicquid post, quam eum genuit, peccati pater eius admisit, ubi particeps ipse non fuit, ad eum non pertinere quis ambigit? Quid dicam de coniuge? Quid de tot animabus uniuersae familiae? Unde si una anima per istam seueritatem, qua tota domus ista anathematizata est, sine baptismate de corpore exeundo perierit, innumerabilium mors corporum, si de ecclesia homines innocentes uiolenter abstrahantur et interficiantur, huic dampno non potest conparari. Si ergo de hac re potes reddere rationem, utinam et nobis rescribendo prestes, ut possimus et nos. Si autem non potes, quid tibi est inconsulta conmotione animi facere, unde, si interrogatus fueris, responsionem rectam non uales inuenire? Hec autem dixi, etiamsi filius noster Classitianus aliquid admisit, quod tibi anathemate plectendum iustissime uideretur. II. Pars. Gratian. Ut ergo ex hac auctoritate euidentissime monstratur, illicite excommunicatur quis pro peccato alterius, neque aliqua ratione nituntur qui pro peccato unius in totam familiam sententiam ferunt excommunicationis. Illicita autem excommunicatio notatum non ledit, sed excommunicantem. Unde Gregorius scribit Magno, Episcopo Mediolanensi: [lib. II. epist. 26.]

C. II. One who unlawfully excommunicates another condemns himself, not the other.

We have learned that Lawrence, formerly our brother and fellow bishop, deprived you of communion although no faults of yours were established. And therefore, fortified by the authority of this precept of ours, perform your office securely and receive communion without any fear.

C. II. Illicite aliquem excommunicans, semet ipsum, condempnat non illum.

Conperimus, quod Laurentius quondam frater et coepiscopus noster nullis te culpis extantibus conmunione priuauerit. Ideoque huius precepti nostri auctoritate munitus offitium tuum securus perage, et conmunionem sine aliqua sume formidine.

C. III. Those who curse not in heart but with the mouth contract uncleanness of the lips.

Likewise Jerome on Leviticus. Those who neglect to cut away the habit of an accursed mouth, even if they do not curse in heart, nevertheless incur uncleanness of the lips, according to the word of Isaiah, and defilements of the mouth.

C. III. Qui non corde, sed ore maledicunt, labiorum inmundiciam contrahunt.

Item Ieronimus in Leuitico. Qui negligunt oris maledicti consuetudinem resecare, etiamsi non corde maledicant, tamen inmundiciam labiorum (secundum Ysaiae uerbum) et inquinamenta oris incurrunt.

C. IV. Life, not a sentence, binds or looses anyone.

Likewise. If anyone is driven away and cast outside by the incorrect judgment of those who preside over the church, if he himself did not depart beforehand—that is, if he did not so act that he deserved to depart—he is injured in nothing by the fact that he appears to have been expelled by men through an incorrect judgment. And so it comes about that sometimes he who is cast outside is within, and he who appears to be retained within is outside.

C. IV. Vita, non sentencia ligat quemlibet uel soluit.

Item. Si quis non recto iudicio eorum, qui presunt ecclesiae, depellatur, et foras mittatur, si ipse antea non exiit, hoc est, si non ita egit, ut mereretur exire, nichil leditur in eo, quod non recto iudicio ab hominibus uidetur expulsus. Et ita fit, ut interdum ille, qui foras mittitur, intus sit, et ille foris, qui intus uidetur retineri.

C. V. On the same matter.

Likewise Rabanus, On Ecclesiastical Oppressions, Book I. We are not condemned forever when we are judged unjustly, as the Psalmist says: "Nor will he condemn him when judgment is rendered against him." Many priests profess that they persecute a fault from zeal for God; but while they do this without discernment, they incur the crime of sacrilege, and while they rush headlong as though to amend, they themselves also fall much worse.

C. V. De eodem.

Item Rabanus de ecclesiasticis pressuris, libro I. Non in perpetuum dampnamur, cum iniuste iudicamur, dicente Psalmista: "Nec dampnabit illum, cum iudicabitur illi." Multi sacerdotum culpam se zelo Dei persequi profitentur; sed, dum indiscrete hoc agunt, sacrilegii facinus incurrunt, et dum precipites quasi ad emendandum ruunt, ipsi quoque multo magis deterius cadunt.

C. VI. By what penalty one who unlawfully excommunicates another is to be struck.

Likewise from the Council of Paris in the time of Louis. Concerning unlawful excommunication, the law of the Catholic emperor Justinian, which the Catholic Church approves and observes, decreed in constitution 128, chapter 351, that no presbyter should excommunicate anyone before the cause for which the ecclesiastical canons command this to be done is proved. But if anyone contrary to these things excommunicates someone, the one who was excommunicated is indeed to return to the grace of holy communion by the authority of the higher priest; but the one who did not excommunicate lawfully is to abstain from holy communion for as long a time as shall have seemed good to the higher priest, so that he may himself justly suffer what he did unjustly. Hence also Saint Gregory wrote, among other things, to Bishop John, who was excommunicating unjustly, saying: "After first quashing and reducing to nothing the decrees of your aforesaid sentence, by the authority of blessed Peter, prince of the Apostles, we decree that, deprived of holy communion for a period of thirty days, you implore from almighty God pardon for so great an excess with the greatest penance and tears. But if we learn that you have fulfilled this sentence of ours too remissly, know that with the Lord's aid not merely the injustice but the contumacy of your Fraternity is to be punished more severely," because no one is to be judged hastily or out of order—that is, without having been admonished or convicted. § 1. But concerning a summons of this kind, the emperor's law concerning manifest crimes says: "Whoever shall have been summoned by three authoritative summonses of the judge, or called before the judge by three edicts, or by one peremptory edict in place of all—that is, one that extinguishes the case—and shall have refused to present himself before that judge by whom notice was given to him, can be judged against as contumacious. Indeed, cases cannot be retried even through an appeal whenever judgment shall have been rendered against a contumacious person." And this ruling concerning persons summoned by three authoritative summonses was confirmed from evangelical truth by Celestine speaking to Nestorius, the Synod of Ephesus decreeing concerning the same, and blessed Gregory writing to John. § 2. Concerning a peremptory writ the African Council demonstrates in the case of Cresconius that, if after being summoned he refuses to return to wisdom, through the effect of his own contempt and contumacy he is henceforth to be excluded at once by judicial authority. Likewise blessed Gregory, concerning a sentence against a contumacious person, writing to Maximus, the presumptuous bishop of Salona, said: "We exhort you to hasten to come to us, every excuse having been set aside, so that, with justice preserved, through Christ's revelation we may be able both to investigate and to conclude according to the canonical institutes these things of which you are accused. But act in such a way that you impose no further delays upon your coming, lest your very absence rather assign you as liable to the things that are said and compel us to render against you from the council a harsher judgment—that is, as against a contumacious person—not only on account of the aforesaid crimes from which you evade clearing yourself, but also on account of the fault of disobedience."

C. VI. Qua pena feriatur qui illicite aliquem excommunicat.

Item ex Concilio Parisiensi tempore Lodouici. De illicita excommunicatione lex Iustiniani inperatoris catholici, quam probat et seruat catholica ecclesia, constitutione CXXVIII capitulo CCCLI decreuit, ut nemo presbiter excommunicet aliquem ante, quam causa probetur, propter quam ecclesiastici canones hoc fieri iubent. Si qui autem aduersus ea aliquem excommunicauerit, ille quidem, qui excommunicatus est, maioris sacerdotis auctoritate ad gratiam sanctae conmunionis redeat: is autem, qui legitime non excommunicauerit, in tantum abstineat a sacra conmunione tempus, quantum maiori sacerdoti uisum fuerit, ut quod iniuste fecit ipse iuste patiatur. Hinc et S. Gregorius ad Iohannem episcopum iniuste excommunicantem inter cetera scripsit, dicens: "Cassatis prius atque ad nichilum redactis predictae sentenciae tuae decretis, ex B. Petri principis apostolorum auctoritate decreuimus, triginta dierum spacio sacra conmunione priuatum ab omnipotenti Deo tanti excessus ueniam cum summa penitencia ac lacrimis exorare. Quod si hanc sentenciam nostram te cognouerimus inplesse remissius, non iam tantum iniusticiam, sed contumaciam fraternitatis tuae cognoscas iuuante Domino seuerius puniendam," quia nemo propere uel prepostere, scilicet non conmonitus neque conuictus est iudicandus. §. 1. De conuentione autem huiusmodi inperatoris manifestorum criminum lex dicit: "Quicumque tribus auctoritatibus iudicis conuentus, uel tribus edictis fuerit ad iudicem prouocatus, aut uno pro omnibus peremptorio, id est quod causam exstinguit, fuerit uocatus, et presenciam suam apud eum iudicem, a quo ei denunciatum est, exhibere noluerit, aduersus eum quasi in contumacem iudicari potest. Quinimo retractari nec per appellationem negocia possunt, quociens in contumacem fuerit iudicatum." Et hanc sentenciam de tribus auctoritatibus conuentis ex euangelica ueritate Celestinus ad Nestorium dicens, et Ephesina sinodus de eodem decernens, et B. Gregorius ad Iohannem scribens, conprobauit. §. 2. De peremptorio scripto Affricanum concilium demonstrat de Cresconio, ut, si conuentus resipiscere detrectauerit, suo contemptu et sua contumacia faciente, auctoritate iudiciaria iam protinus excludatur. Item B. Gregorius de sentencia in contumacem, scribens ad Maximum presumptorem Salonitanum episcopum, dixit: "Hortamur, ut ad nos uenire omni postposita excusatione festines, quatinus seruata iusticia hec, de quibus accusaris, et cognoscere, et finire secundum canonica instituta Christo reuelante possimus. Ita autem fac, ut ad ueniendum amplius iam moras non ingeras, nec magis ipsa te absencia obnoxium his, que dicuntur, assignet, et nos in te hec res, non solum propter predicta crimina, que purgare subterfugis, sed etiam propter inobedientiae culpam, durius, scilicet ut in contumacem, cogat ex concilio ferre iudicium."

C. VII. Life, not a sentence, casts someone out of the church or brings him back to her.

Likewise Origen on Leviticus, [homily 14, on c. 24]. When anyone departs from truth, from the fear of God, from faith, and from charity, he departs from the camp of the church even if he is by no means cast out by the voice of the bishop; just as, conversely, someone is cast outside by an incorrect judgment, but if he did not depart beforehand—that is, did not act so that he deserved to depart—he is injured in nothing. For sometimes he who is cast outside is within, and he who is outside appears to be retained within.

C. VII. Vita, non sentencia aliquem ab ecclesia eicit, uel ad eam reducit.

Item Origenes super Leuiticum. [hom. XIV. ad c. 24.] Cum aliquis exiit a ueritate, a timore Dei, a fide, a karitate, exit de castris ecclesiae, etiamsi per episcopi uocem minime abiciatur; sicut e contrario, aliquis non recto iudicio foras mittitur, sed si ante non exierit, id est non egerit ut mereretur exire, nichil leditur. Interdum enim qui foras mittitur intus est, et qui foris est intus uidetur retineri.

C. VIII. Both he who is separated from the faithful by open sacrilege and he who is separated by a perverse

Likewise Augustine, [sermon 11 On the Words of the Lord]. Concerning those who are separated from the church, he does not say, "Not perceiving the things that are of the Spirit," lest it be referred to the perception of knowledge; but it was said: "Not having the Spirit." § 1. This assuredly would not be said except of persons separated from the church, who were said not to possess the Spirit. But neither is he to be said to be in the church and to pertain to this fellowship of the Spirit who is mingled with Christ's sheep with a feigned heart. "For the Holy Spirit of discipline will flee deceit." For not only do those not pertain to the church who are manifest through the open sacrilege of separation, but also those who, bodily mingled in her unity, are separated through a most evil life.

C. VIII. Et qui aperto sacrilegio, et qui peruersa uita fidelibus non sociatur, ad ecclesiam non pertinere probatur.

Item Augustinus. [serm. XI. de uerbis Domini] De illis, qui sunt ab ecclesia segregati, non dicit: "Ea, que sunt Spiritus, non percipientes;" ne ad scientiae perceptionem referretur: sed dictum est: "Spiritum non habentes." §. 1. Hoc utique non diceretur nisi de segregatis ab ecclesia, qui dicti sunt Spiritum non habentes. Sed nec ille dicendus est esse in ecclesia, et ad istam societatem Spiritus pertinere, qui ouibus Christi ficto corde miscetur. "Spiritus enim sanctus disciplinae effugiet fictum." Neque enim non solum ad ecclesiam pertinent qui separationis aperto sacrilegio manifesti sunt, sed etiam illi, qui in eius unitate corporaliter mixti per pessimam uitam separantur.

C. IX. We separate from God those whom we show to be impious.

Likewise from the Fifth Synod, [conference 5]. It is certain that one who has been shown to be impious is altogether separated from God, just as one who has been anathematized as impious is also separated. For anathema signifies nothing other than separation from God. PART III. GRATIAN. Therefore, as appears from the foregoing, an unlawful excommunication does not injure him who is marked but him by whom he is marked; and through this, those who are innocent cannot be condemned for another's crime, as the households of powerful men are accustomed to be marked by the imprudent for the sins of their lords. But it is further objected that not only the innocent but not even criminals are to be struck by a sentence of malediction. For Christ says in the Gospel: "Pray for those who persecute and calumniate you; do good to those who hate you." Likewise the Apostle: "Bless those who persecute you; bless and do not curse." Likewise: "Revilers will not possess the kingdom of God."

C. IX. A Deo separamus, quos inpios demonstramus.

Item ex V. Sinodo. [collatione 5.] Certum est, quod qui inpius demonstratus est omnino separatus est a Deo, sicut etiam ille, qui anathematizatus est tamquam inpius separatus est. Nichil enim aliud significat anathema, nisi a Deo separationem. III. Pars. Gratian. Illicita ergo excommunicatio, ut ex premissis apparet, non ledit eum, qui notatur, sed quo notatur, ac per hoc qui innocentes sunt ex alterius crimine condempnari non possunt, sicut ab inprudentibus familiae potentum pro peccatis dominorum consueuerunt notari. Sed adhuc obicitur, quod non solum innocentes, sed nec etiam criminosi sentencia maledictionis sint feriendi. Ait enim Christus in euangelio: "Orate pro persequentibus et calumpniantibus uos, benefacite his, qui oderunt uos." Item Apostolus: "Benedicite persequentibus uos: benedicite et nolite maledicere." Item: "Maledici regnum Dei non possidebunt."

C. X. The faithful ought to be free from every curse.

Likewise Jerome in the epistle to Titus, [at the beginning of c. 3]. If, therefore, Michael did not dare to bring a judgment of blasphemy against the devil, who is certainly most worthy of a curse, how much more ought we to be pure from every curse? The devil deserved a curse, but blasphemy ought not to have gone forth through the mouth of an archangel. Read again the ancient books and see which tribes were placed upon Mount Gerizim to bless the people and which upon the other mountain to curse. Reuben, who had defiled his parent's bed, and Zebulun, the last son of Leah, and the children of the handmaids are placed upon Mount Ebal so that they might curse those who are worthy of a curse.

> C. X. Ab omni maledicto fideles inmunes esse oportet.
> Item Ieronimus in epistola ad Titum. [initio cap. 3.] Si igitur Michael non fuit ausus diabolo et certe maledictionis dignissimo iudicium inferre blasphemiae, quanto magis nos ab omni maledicto puri esse debemus? Merebatur diabolus maledictum, sed per os archangeli blasphemia exire non debuit. Relege ueteres libros, et uide, que tribus in monte Garizim constitutae sunt ut benedicerent populo, et que in monte altero, ut maledicerent. Ruben, qui maculauerat thorum parentis, et Zabulon nouissimus Liae filius, et ancillarum liberi in monte Hebal ponuntur, ut maledicant his, qui maledictione digni sunt.

C. XI. Whom those chosen from the sons of Israel for blessing and those chosen for cursing signify.

The same in the book of Judges. Therefore, since among the individual faithful there is such diversity of purpose, it appears to me that this is signified in this place: that those halves who walk beside Mount Gerizim—the one chosen for blessing—figuratively indicate those who come to salvation not from fear of punishment but from desire for blessings and promises; but those other halves who walk beside Mount Ebal, upon which the curses were pronounced, indicate those others who, by fear of evils and dread of punishments, fulfill the things written in the law and come to salvation. GRATIAN. But he who commanded prayer for persecutors struck our first parents with the curse of death for transgression of the command. Cain too, because he added fratricide to the first transgression, received back a sentence of malediction from the Lord. The Lord also said to Abraham: "I will curse those cursing you, and I will bless those blessing you." In the Gospel too, when he came hungry to a fig tree and did not find fruit upon it, by his curse he condemned it to perpetual sterility. § 1. Likewise Noah, when he learned that his shameful parts had been mocked by Ham, cursed his son Canaan, saying: "Cursed be Canaan; let him be the servant of his brothers." Likewise Isaac, when he blessed his son Jacob, said: "He who shall have cursed you, let him be cursed; and he who shall have blessed you, let him be filled with blessings." § 2. Likewise, as is read in the Book of Numbers, Moses, at God's command, divided the twelve tribes of the children of Israel into two parts and ordered six tribes, walking beside Mount Ebal, to proclaim aloud the curse of those transgressing the law; but he commanded the others, walking beside the other mountain, to cry aloud the blessings of those observing it. § 3. In the New Testament too the Apostle Peter is read to have cursed Simon when he said: "Let your money be with you unto perdition." Paul too, who had said, "Bless and do not curse," ordered the Corinthian fornicator to be excommunicated. Likewise, in another epistle he says: "If anyone shall not have followed the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema, maranatha." Likewise to the Galatians: "If an angel coming from heaven shall have evangelized to you anything other, let him be anathema." § 4. A distinction, therefore, is to be made between the curse that is prohibited and the curse that is rationally pronounced by the Lord and by holy men. The curse that is prohibited is that which proceeds from a desire for vengeance and hatred of the persecutor, not from love of justice. But the curse by which the saints curse is that which proceeds from love of justice, not from the spite of vengeance. Hence Gregory says in Book III of the Morals:

> Idem in libro Iudicum. Cum ergo in singulis quibusque fidelium sit talis propositi uarietas, hoc michi designari uidetur in hoc loco, quod dimidii illi, qui iuxta montem Garizim incedunt (illum, qui ad benedictionem electus est), istos figuraliter indicent, qui non metu penae, sed benedictionum et repromissionum desiderio ueniunt ad salutem; illi uero dimidii, qui iuxta montem Gebal incedunt, in quo maledictiones prolatae sunt, istos alios indicant, qui malorum metu et suppliciorum timore conplentes que in lege scripta sunt, perueniunt ad salutem. Gratian. Sed qui pro persecutoribus iussit orare, primos parentes pro transgressione mandati mortis maledicto percussit. Cain quoque, quia primae preuaricationi fratricidium adiunxit, sententiam maledictionis a Domino reportauit. Abrahae quoque dixit Dominus: "Maledicam maledicentibus tibi, et benedicam benedicentibus tibi." In euangelio etiam, cum esuriens ueniret ad ficum, non inueniens fructum in ea, sua maledictione perpetua sterilitate ipsam dampnauit. §. 1. Item Noe, cum uerenda sua a Cham derisa cognosceret, filium eius Chanaan maledixit dicens: "Maledictus Chanaan sit seruus fratrum suorum." Item Ysaac, cum benediceret Iacob filio suo, ait: "Qui maledixerit tibi, sit ille maledictus, et qui benedixerit tibi benedictionibus repleatur." §. 2. Item, sicut in libro Numerorum legitur, Moyses ex precepto Dei duodecim tribus filiorum Israel in duas partes diuisit, et sex tribus iussit, ut iuxta montem Gebal incedentes maledictionem transgredientium legem uociferarent; aliis uero precepit, ut iuxta alium montem incedentes benedictiones obseruantium inclamarent. §. 3. In nouo etiam testamento Petrus apostolus Symoni legitur maledixisse, cum ait: "Pecunia tua tecum sit in perditione." Paulus quoque, qui dixerat: "Benedicite, et nolite maledicere," fornicatorem Chorinthium iussit excommunicari. Item in alia epistola ait: "Si quis non fuerit secutus doctrinam Domini nostri Iesu Christi, sit anathema, maranatha." Item Galathis: "Si angelus de celo ueniens aliud uobis euangelizauerit, anathema sit." §. 4. Distinguendum est ergo inter maledictum, quod prohibetur, et maledictum, quod a Domino et a sanctis uiris rationabiliter profertur. Maledictum, quod prohibetur, est illud, quod procedit ex uoto ultionis et odio persequentis, non ex amore iusticiae. Maledictum uero, quo sancti maledicunt, est illud, quod procedit ex amore iusticiae, non ex liuore uindictae. Unde Gregorius in Moralibus ait libro III.:

C. XII. Holy men curse certain persons not from a desire for vengeance but from love of justice.

When holy men pronounce a sentence of malediction, they burst forth into it not from a desire for vengeance but from an examination of justice. Inwardly they regard the subtle judgment and recognize with what curse they ought to strike the evils arising outwardly; and they do not sin by that curse in which they do not disagree with the inner judge. Likewise: § 1. Sacred Scripture recalls a curse in two ways: namely, one that it approves and another that it condemns. For a curse is pronounced in one way by a judgment of justice, as it was pronounced against the very first sinner when he heard: “Cursed is the earth in your work, etc.,” and as it is said to Abraham: “I will curse those cursing you.” But in another way a curse is pronounced that is brought forth not by a judgment of justice but by the spite of vengeance; we are admonished to cease from this by the voice of Paul preaching, who says: “Bless and do not curse.”

> C. XII. Sancti uiri non ex uoto ultionis, sed amore iusticiae aliquos maledicunt.

Cum sancti uiri maledictionis sentenciam proferunt, non in hanc ex uoto ultionis, sed ex iusticiae examine prorumpunt. Intus subtile iudicium respiciunt, et mala foris surgentia qua maledictione ferire debeant cognoscunt, et eo maledicto non peccant, quo ab interno iudice non discordant. Item: §. 1. Scriptura sacra duobus modis maledictum memorat: aliud uidelicet, quod approbat, aliud, quod dampnat. Aliter enim maledictum profertur iudicio iusticiae, ut in ipso primo peccante prolatum est, cum audiuit: "Maledicta terra in opere tuo, etc." et sicut Abrahae dicitur: "Maledicam maledicentibus tibi." Aliter uero profertur maledictum, quod non iudicio iusticiae, sed liuore uindictae promitur, a quo uoce Pauli predicantis cessare ammonemur, qui ait: "Benedicite, et nolite maledicere."

C. XIII. Those who err and those who send others into error are to be excommunicated.

Likewise Pope Pelagius to Bishop Angellius. By the example of apostolic authority we have learned that the spirits of those who err and send others into error are to be handed over to Satan, so that they may unlearn blasphemy.

C. XIII. Errantes et in errorem mittentes excommunicentur.

Item Pelagius Papa Angellio Episcopo. Apostolicae auctoritatis exemplo didicimus, errantium et in errorem mittentium spiritus tradendos esse sathanae, ut blasphemare dediscant.

C. XIV. Offenders are to be corrected by priests; if they are found incorrigible, they are to be excommunicated.

Likewise Pope Anacletus, [epistle 3]. Both priests and all the rest of the faithful ought to have the greatest care for those who are perishing, so that either they may be corrected from their sins by their reproof, or, if they appear incorrigible, may be separated from the church.

C. XIV. Delinquentes corrigantur a sacerdotibus, incorrigibiles inuenti excommunicentur.

Item Anacletus Papa. [epist. III.] Tam sacerdotes quam reliqui fideles omnes summam debent habere curam de his, qui pereunt, quatinus eorum redargutione aut corrigantur a peccatis, aut, si incorrigibiles apparuerint, ab ecclesia separentur.

C. XV. After a second or third admonition has intervened, let the sentence of excommunication proceed.

Likewise Gregory, [Pope Gregory, Book II, epistle 37, to Bishop Natalis]. Your Beatitude complains without merit concerning the clause of excommunication—which nevertheless, after the condition of grade had been interposed, was annexed for the second or third time now, so to speak, from necessity—since the Apostle Paul says: “Having in readiness to avenge every disobedience.”

C. XV. Secunda uel tertia ammonicione interposita excommunicationis sentencia procedat.

Item Gregorius. [Papa lib. II. epist. 37. ad Natalem Episcopum] De excommunicationis articulo (que tamen interposita condicione gradus, secundo uel tertio iam ut ita dicam, ex necessitate subiuncta est) beatitudo uestra inmerito queritur, cum Paulus apostolus dicat: "In promptu habentes ulcisci omnem inobedientiam."

C. XVI. The evil are to be eliminated from the church.

Likewise Jerome, [on the Epistle to the Galatians, c. 5]. Rotten flesh is to be cut away, and a mangy sheep is to be driven from the folds, lest the whole house, lump, body, and flock burn, be corrupted, rot, and perish. Arius was one spark in Alexandria, but because it was not immediately extinguished, its flame laid waste the whole world.

C. XVI. Mali ab ecclesia sunt eliminandi.

Item Ieronimus. [in epistolam ad Galatas, c. 5.] Secandae sunt carnes putridae, et scabiosa a caulis ouis repellenda, ne tota domus, massa, corpus et pecora ardeat, corumpatur, putrescat, intereat. Arrius in Alexandria una scintilla fuit, sed quoniam non statim oppressus est, totum orbem eius flamma populata est.

C. XVII. Subjects are to be corrected by their prelates differently according to the diversity of their faults.

Likewise Augustine, [in the book On Rebuke and Grace, c. 15]. Therefore, let subjects be corrected by their prelates with different corrections proceeding from charity, lesser or greater according to the diversity of their faults, because even that which is called condemnation, which episcopal judgment effects—a penalty greater than which there is none in the church—can, if God wills, turn out and advance toward a most salutary correction. For we do not know what may happen on the following day. Or must one despair concerning anyone before the end of this life? Or can God be contradicted, so that he should not look upon him and give him repentance and, after receiving the sacrifice of a troubled spirit and a contrite heart, absolve from the guilt of even a just condemnation the condemned man whom he himself does not condemn? Nevertheless, the necessity of the shepherd requires that, lest dreadful contagions creep through many, he separate the diseased sheep from the healthy ones, perhaps to be healed by that very separation by him to whom nothing is impossible. For, not knowing who pertains to the number of the predestined and who does not pertain, we ought to be affected by the disposition of charity in such a way that we will all to be saved.

C. XVII. Pro diuersitate culparum subditi a prepositis corripiantur.

Item Augustinus. [in libro de correptione et gratia, c. 15.] Corripiantur itaque subditi a prepositis suis correptionibus de karitate uenientibus pro culparum diuersitate diuersis, uel minoribus, uel amplioribus, quia et ipsa, que dampnatio nominatur, quam facit episcopale iudicium (qua pena in ecclesia nulla maior est), potest, si Deus uoluerit, in correptionem saluberrimam cedere atque proficere. Neque enim scimus quid contingat sequenti die. Aut ante finem huius uitae de aliquo desperandum est? Aut contradici Deo potest, ne respiciat et det penitenciam, et, accepto sacrificio spiritus contribulati cordisque contriti, a reatu quamuis iustae dampnationis absoluat dampnatum quem ipse non dampnet? Pastoris tamen necessitas habet, ne per plures serpant dira contagia, separare ab ouibus sanis morbidam, ab illo, cui nichil est inpossibile, ipsa forsitan separatione sanandam. Nescientes enim quis pertineat ad predestinatorum numerum, quis non pertineat, sic affici debemus karitatis affectu, ut omnes uelimus saluos fieri.

C. XVIII. Those who are unwilling to be corrected ought to be cut off by the iron of excommunication.

Likewise Prosper, [Book On the Contemplative Life, c. 7]. But behold, if the crimes of any persons—when the criminals themselves are unwilling to confess—become known from any source, whatever crimes have not been healed by the gentle medicine of patience are to be burned and treated, as it were, by a certain fire of pious rebuke. But if the remedy of one enduring calmly and rebuking piously has not advanced among those who, after having been borne with for a long time and rebuked wholesomely, have been unwilling to be corrected, they ought to be cut off by the iron of excommunication like parts of a putrid body; lest, just as flesh deadened by diseases, if it shall not have been cut off, corrupts the health of the remaining flesh by the contagion of its putrefaction, so these persons who disdain to be amended and persist in their disease, if they remain in the fellowship of the holy with depraved morals, should kill them by the example of their perdition.

C. XVIII. Qui corrigi nolunt excommunicationis ferro debent abscidi.

Item Prosper. [libro de uita contemplatiua, c. 7.] Ecce autem crimina quorumlibet, si ipsis criminosis confiteri nolentibus undecumque claruerint quecumque non fuerint patienciae leni medicamento sanata, ueluti quodam igne piae increpationis urenda sunt et curanda. Quo si nec sic quidem equanimiter sustinentis ac pie increpantis medela processerit in eis, qui diu portati et salubriter obiurgati corrigi noluerint, tamquam putridae corporis partes debent ferro excommunicationis abscidi, ne, sicut caro morbis emortua, si abscissa non fuerit, salutem reliquae carnis putredinis suae contagione corrumpit, ita isti, qui emendari despiciunt, et in suo morbo persistunt, si moribus deprauatis in sanctarum societate permanserint, eos suae perditionis exemplo interficiant.

C. XIX. He who presumes to have two wives at the same time is to be excommunicated.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to King Lothair. Are you not to be struck by strict vengeance, you who are recognized to have imitated Lamech's adultery and flagitious deed in two wives? The Lord did not destroy this until seventy-seven generations later by his saving advent, whereas Cain's fratricide was abolished in the seventh generation by the waters of the cataclysm.

C. XIX. Excommunicandus est qui simul duas uxores habere presumit.

Item Nykolaus Papa Lothario Regi. An non districta ultione feriendus es, qui in duabus uxoribus adulterium Lamech et flagitium imitatus esse dinosceris? Quod Dominus non nisi post septuaginta septem generationes suo salutifero aduentu deleuit, cum Cain fratricidium septima generatione aquis abolitum sit cataclismi.

C. XX. False witnesses and homicides are to be deprived of communion.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 37]. Therefore, we have decreed that homicides and false witnesses are to be removed from ecclesiastical communion unless they wash away the crimes committed by the satisfaction of penance.

C. XX. Falsi testes et homicidae conmunione priuentur.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 37.] Itaque censuimus homicidas et falsos testes a conmunione ecclesiastica submouendos, nisi penitenciae satisfactione crimina admissa diluerint.

C. XXI. Let a powerful man who presumes to despoil a poor cleric or religious be excommunicated.

Likewise from the First Council of Toledo, [c. 11]. If any of the powerful shall have despoiled a cleric, any poorer person, or a religious, and the bishop shall have commanded him to come to him so that he may be heard, and he shall have despised the command, let written notices at once pass in turn among all the bishops of the province and whomever they shall have been able to reach, so that he himself may be regarded as excommunicated until he obeys and restores the property of another.

[PALEA.

C. XXI. Excommunicetur potens, qui clericum pauperem religiosum spoliare presumit.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano I. [cap. 11.] Si quis de potentibus clericum, aut quemlibet pauperiorem, aut religiosum expoliauerit, et mandauerit eum ad se uenire episcopus, ut audiatur, et contempserit, inuicem mox scripta percurrant per omnes prouinciae episcopos, et quoscumque adire potuerint, ut excommunicatus habeatur ipse, donec obediat et reddat aliena.

[PALEA.

C. XXII. On the same matter.

From the sayings of Pope Gregory. Whoever deceitfully lays his hand upon the Lord's anointed—that is, a bishop or presbyter—because he commits grave sacrilege, and if anyone lays waste, attacks, or burns the church of God, because this too is most grave sacrilege, it pleased the holy synod that first all his goods be made public by proscription; then, enclosed in one place—that is, in a monastery—let him do penance all the days of his life.]

C. XXII. De eodem.

Ex dictis Gregorii Papae. Quisquis per dolum manum suam mittit in Christum Domini, id est episcopum uel presbiterum, quia sacrilegium graue conmittit, et si quis ecclesiam Dei uastat, aut inpugnat, aut incendit, quia et hoc grauissimum est sacrilegium, placuit sanctae sinodo, ut inprimis omnia bona eius proscriptione publicentur; deinde in uno loco, id est in monasterio, inclusus peniteat omnibus diebus uitae suae.]

C. XXIII. Let one who presumes to molest pilgrims to Rome, other pilgrims, or merchants be deprived of communion.

Likewise Pope Callixtus. If anyone shall have attempted to capture pilgrims to Rome and other pilgrims visiting the thresholds of the Apostles and the oratories of other saints, or to despoil them of the things that they carry, or to molest merchants with new exactions of tolls and road dues, let him lack Christian communion until he has made satisfaction.

C. XXIII. Conmunione priuetur qui Romipetas, et peregrinos, uel mercatores molestare presumpserit.

Item Calixtus Papa. Si quis Romipetas et peregrinos Apostolorum limina, et aliorum sanctorum oratoria uisitantes capere, seu rebus, quas ferunt, spoliare, et mercatores nouis teloneorum et pedaticorum exactionibus molestare temptauerit, donec satisfecerit, conmunione careat Christiana.

C. XXIV. Let one who presumes to harass pilgrims and churches, their goods, and the persons serving there be excommunicated.

Likewise Urban. Admonished by the examples of paternal traditions and discharging the debt of pastoral office, we establish that churches with their goods, both persons and possessions—namely, clerics and monks and their converts—and also pilgrims with the things that they carry are to be safe and without molestation. But if anyone shall have presumed to act against this and, after he has recognized his crime, shall not have amended it competently within the space of thirty days, let him be barred from the thresholds of the church and struck by the sword of anathema.

C. XXIV. Excommunicetur qui oratores et ecclesias, earumque bona et personas ibidem seruientes infestare presumit.

Item Urbanus. Paternarum traditionum exemplis conmoniti, pastoralis offitii debitum persoluentes, ecclesias cum bonis suis, tam personis quam possessionibus, clericos uidelicet ac monachos, eorumque conuersos, oratores quoque cum suis nichilominus rebus, quas ferunt, tutos et sine molestia esse statuimus. Si quis autem contra hoc facere presumpserit, et post, quam facinus suum recognouerit, infra spacium dierum triginta conpetenter non emendauerit, a liminibus ecclesiae arceatur, et anathematis gladio feriatur.

C. XXV. Let those who meet pilgrims or unarmed poor persons for evil be excommunicated.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to all bishops. Those who shall have plundered travelers or pilgrims to any saint—whether clerics, monks, women, or unarmed poor persons—or shall have seized their goods or met them for evil are to be struck by the bond of anathema unless they make worthy amends. § 1. But let that peace which we call the truce of God be observed just as it has been established by the archbishops of each province. But whoever breaks it is to be subjected to excommunication. PART IV. GRATIAN. But because the discussion concerns heretics, it must be seen what the difference is between schism and heresy, who are heretics, and how many sects of heretics there are. Jerome assigns the difference between schism and heresy in the epistle to the Galatians, saying:

C. XXV. Qui oratoribus, pauperibus non arma ferentibus in malum obuiauerint, excommunicentur.

Item Nykolaus Papa omnibus Episcopis. Illi, qui peregrinos, uel oratores cuiuscumque sancti, siue clericos, siue monachos, uel feminas, aut inermes pauperes depredati fuerint, uel bona eorum rapuerint, uel in malum eis obuiauerint, anathematis uinculo feriantur, nisi digne emendauerint. §. 1. Pax uero illa, quam treugam Dei dicimus, sic obseruetur, sicut ab archiepiscopis uniuscuiusque prouinciae constituta est. Qui autem eam infregerit excommunicationi subdatur. IV. Pars. Gratian. Quia uero de hereticis sermo habetur, uidendum est, quid intersit inter scisma et heresim, et qui sint heretici, et quot sint hereticorum sectae? Differentiam autem inter scisma et heresim Ieronimus in epistola ad Galathas assignat, dicens:

C. XXVI. The difference between schism and heresy.

I judge this to be the difference between heresy and schism: heresy possesses a perverse dogma; schism separates from the church because of episcopal dissension. This can indeed be understood to differ in some part at the beginning; but no schism fails to fashion some heresy for itself, so that it may appear to have withdrawn from the church rightly. Moreover, Jerome defines in the same epistle whence heresy is so called, saying:

C. XXVI. Scismatis et heresis differentia.

Inter heresim et scisma hoc esse arbitror, quod heresis peruersum dogma habeat, scisma propter episcopalem dissensionem ab ecclesia separetur. Quod quidem in principio aliqua ex parte intelligi potest diuersum; ceterum nullum scisma nisi heresim aliquam sibi confingit, ut recte ab ecclesia uideatur recessisse. Unde autem heresis dicatur, in eadem epistola Ieronimus diffinit, dicens:

C. XXVII. Whence is heresy so called?

Heresy in Greek is so called from choice, because each person chooses for himself that discipline which he thinks is better. Therefore, whoever understands Scripture otherwise than the meaning of the Holy Spirit, by whom it was written, demands, although he has not withdrawn from the church, can nevertheless be called a heretic; and he is among the works of the flesh, choosing those things that are worse. PART V. GRATIAN. But showing who are properly called heretics, Augustine says, [in the book On the Usefulness of Believing, c. 1]:

C. XXVII. Unde dicatur heresis?

Heresis grece ab electione dicitur, quod scilicet eam sibi unusquisque eligat disciplinam, quam putat esse meliorem. Quicumque igitur aliter scripturam intelligit, quam sensus Spiritus sancti flagitat, a quo scripta est, licet ab ecclesia non recesserit, tamen hereticus appellari potest, et de carnis operibus est, eligens que peiora sunt. V. Pars. Gratian. Qui uero proprie dicantur heretici, Augustinus [in lib. de utilitate credendi c. 1.] ostendens ait:

C. XXVIII. Who are properly called heretics.

A heretic is one who, for the sake of some temporal advantage and especially of his own glory and primacy, either begets or follows false and novel opinions. But he who believes men of this kind has been deceived by a certain appearance of truth.

C. XXVIII. Qui proprie dicantur heretici.

Hereticus est, qui alicuius temporalis commodi et maxime gloriae principatusque sui gratia falsas ac nouas oppiniones uel gignit, uel sequitur. Ille autem, qui huiusmodi hominibus credit, est imaginatione quadam ueritatis illusus.

C. XXIX. Those who are seduced into error not by their own audacity but by another's are not heretics.

The same, [to Glorius, Eleusius, and others, epistle 162]. The Apostle said: "Avoid a heretical man after the first and second correction, because such a man is subverted and sins, condemned by himself." But those who defend their opinion, although false and perverse, with no obstinate animosity—especially an opinion that they produced not by the audacity of their own presumption but received from parents who had been seduced and fallen into error—and who seek the truth with cautious solicitude, prepared to be corrected when they find it, are by no means to be reckoned among heretics.

C. XXIX. Non sunt heretici, qui non sua audatia, sed aliena seducuntur in errorem.

Idem. [Glorio, Elesuio, et aliis, epist. CLXII.] Dixit Apostolus: "Hereticum hominem post primam et secundam correctionem deuita, quia subuersus est huiusmodi, et peccat, in semetipso dampnatus." Sed qui sententiam suam, quamuis falsam atque peruersam, nulla pertinaci animositate defendunt, presertim quam non audacia suae presumptionis pepererunt, sed a seductis atque in errorem lapsis parentibus acceperunt, querunt autem cauta sollicitudine ueritatem, corrigi parati, cum inuenerint, nequaquam sunt inter hereticos deputandi.

C. XXX. Those who despise the discipline of truth become masters of error.

Likewise Leo, [Pope Leo, epistle 10 to Flavian]. But what is more iniquitous than to hold impious opinions and not to believe those who are wiser and more learned? But those fall into this folly who, when they are hindered by something obscure from recognizing the truth, recur not to the prophetic voices, not to the apostolic letters, nor to the evangelical authorities, but to themselves; and therefore they become masters of error because they were not disciples of truth.

C. XXX. Magistri erroris existunt qui ueritatis disciplinam contempnunt.

Item Leo. [Papa epist. X. ad Flauianum] Quid autem iniquius est quam inpia sapere, et sapientioribus doctioribusque non credere? Sed in hanc insipientiam cadunt, qui, cum ad cognoscendam ueritatem aliquo inpediuntur obscuro, non ad propheticas uoces, non ad apostolicas litteras, nec ad euangelicas auctoritates, sed ad semetipsos recurrunt, et ideo magistri erroris existunt, quia ueritatis discipuli non fuerunt.

C. XXXI. Those who obstinately defend what they perversely think are heretics.

Likewise Augustine against the Manichaeans. Those who think something diseased and perverse in the church of Christ, if, when corrected so that they might think what is sound and right, they resist obstinately and are unwilling to amend their pestiferous and death-bearing dogmas but persist in defending them, are heretics.

C. XXXI. Heretici sunt qui quod praue sapiunt contumaciter defendunt.

Item Augustinus contra Manicheos. Qui in ecclesia Christi morbidum aliquid prauumque sapiunt, si correcti, ut sanum rectumque sapiant, resistunt contumaciter, suaque pestifera et mortifera dogmata emendare nolunt, sed defensare persistunt, heretici sunt.

C. XXXII. One who defends the error of a person who errs is more condemnable than he.

Likewise Pope Urban. He who defends the error of others is much more condemnable than those who err, because not only does he err, but he also prepares stumbling blocks of error for others and confirms them. Hence, because he is a master of error, he is to be called not only a heretic but even a heresiarch.

C. XXXII. Errante dampnabilior est qui eius defendit errorem.

Item Urbanus Papa. Qui aliorum errorem defendit multo est dampnabilior illis, qui errant, quia non solum ille errat, sed etiam aliis offendicula preparat erroris et confirmat. Unde quia magister erroris est, non tantum hereticus, sed etiam heresiarcha dicendus est.

C. XXXIII. Those who change truth into a lie are proved to move the boundaries of the fathers.

Likewise Jerome, [Book II of the commentary on Hosea c. 5]. The princes of Judah move the boundaries that their fathers established when they change truth into a lie and preach something other than what they received from the Apostles. The same: § 1. Concerning heretics the meaning is manifest: that by their sophisms and dialectical art they often oppress ecclesiastical men. The same: § 2. In searching the ancient histories, I cannot find any who tore the church and seduced peoples from the house of the Lord except those who had been established by God as priests and prophets—that is, watchmen. Therefore, these are turned into a crooked snare, placing a stumbling block in every place.

C. XXXIII. Qui mendacio ueritatem inmutant patrum terminos transferre probantur.

Item Ieronimus. [lib. II. Conment. ad cap. 5. Oseae] Transferunt principes Iuda terminos, quos posuerunt patres eorum, quando inmutant mendacio ueritatem, et aliud predicant quam ab Apostolis acceperunt. Idem: §. 1. De hereticis manifestus est sensus, quod sophismatibus suis et arte dialectica sepe opprimant ecclesiasticos. Idem: §. 2. Veteres scrutans historias inuenire non possum scidisse ecclesiam, et de domo Domini populos seduxisse, preter eos, qui sacerdotes a Deo positi fuerant et prophetae, id est speculatores. Isti ergo uertuntur in laqueum tortuosum, in omnibus locis ponentes scandalum.

C. XXXIV. Let those who agree with the depravity of adversaries be cast out.

Likewise Pope Leo, [epistle 74 to Anatolius]. I signify that this assuredly displeases me greatly: that among the clerics of your jurisdiction certain persons are said to exist who agree with the depravity of the adversaries, and vessels of mercy are mingled with vessels of madness. Your diligence ought vigilantly to persist in investigating them and restraining them with fitting severity, in such a way that excision does not spare those whom correction could not benefit. For it is fitting for us to remember the evangelical command which is prescribed by the Truth itself: that if our eye, foot, or right hand shall have scandalized us, it is to be removed from the joining of the body, because it is better to lack these members in this age than to go with them into eternal torments. For in vain do we resist those placed outside the church if we are wounded, in those whom they deceive, by those who are within. This pestiferous patience, which by sparing the sins of others does not spare itself, is wholly to be cast away from priestly vigor.

C. XXXIV. Abiciantur qui aduersariorum conueniunt prauitati.

Item Leo Papa. [epistola LXXIV. ad Anatolium] . Illud sane plurimum michi displicere significo, quod inter ditionis tuae clericos quidam esse dicuntur, qui aduersariorum conueniant prauitati, et uesaniae uasis misericordiae uasa misceantur. Quibus inuestigandis et seueritate congrua cohercendis debet diligentia tua uigilanter insistere ita, ut his, quibus prodesse correctio non potuerit, non parcat abscisio. Oportet enim nos euangelici meminisse mandati, quod ab ipsa ueritate precipitur, ut, si nos oculus, aut pes, aut dextera scandalizauerit manus, a conpage corporis auferatur, quia melius sit his in seculo carere membris, quam cum ipsis in eterna supplicia ire. Nam superfluo extra ecclesiam positis resistimus, si ab his, qui intus sunt, in eis, quos decipiunt, uulneramur. Abicienda prorsus pestifera hec a sacerdotali uigore patiencia est, que sibimet, peccatis aliorum parcendo, non parcit.

C. XXXV. Clerics ought to avoid both the associations and banquets of heretics.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [cc. 70, 71, 72]. Let a cleric equally avoid both the banquets and associations of heretics or schismatics. Their assemblies are to be called not churches but conventicles. One is neither to pray nor to sing psalms with them.

C. XXXV. Et sodalitates et conuiuia hereticorum clerici uitare debent.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 70. 71. 72.] Clericus hereticorum aut scismaticorum tam conuiuia quam sodalitates euitet equaliter. Eorum conuenticula non ecclesia, sed conciliabula sunt appellanda. Cum eis neque orandum est, neque psallendum.

C. XXXVI. Observers of the canons ought to enter into no contest with heretics.

Likewise Pope Gelasius, [in the epistle to the bishops of Dardania]. With whom was a synod to be entered into? Catholic pontiffs had already been driven away on every side; only the associates of the faithless remained, with whom it was no longer lawful even to have an assembly, as the Psalm says:

"I have not sat with the council of vanity, and I will not enter with those acting iniquitously." Nor is it the ecclesiastical custom to mingle a council with those who have a polluted communion mixed with the faithless. Rightly, therefore, according to the form of the Synod of Chalcedon, a prevarication of this kind was repelled rather than called to a council, which was neither necessary after the first synod nor lawful to have with such persons. The same, [in the instruction to Faustus]: § 1. For us, as teachers and guardians of the canons, it is not lawful to enter into any contest with men of an alien communion.

C. XXXVI. Canonum obseruatores cum hereticis nullum debent inire certamen.

Item Gelasius Papa. [in epistola ad Episcopos Dardaniae] Cum quibus erat sinodus ineunda? Catholici pontifices fuerant undique iam depulsi, soli remanserant socii perfidorum, cum quibus nec iam licebat habere conuentum, dicente Psalmo: "Non sedi cum concilio uanitatis, et cum iniqua gerentibus non introibo." Nec ecclesiastici moris est cum his, qui pollutam habent conmunionem permixtamque cum perfidis, miscere concilium. Recte igitur per Calcedonensis sinodi formam huiusmodi preuaricatio repulsa est potius quam ad concilium uocata, quod nec opus erat post primam sinodum, nec cum talibus habere licebat. Idem: [in commonitorio ad Faustum] §. 1. Canonum magistris atque custodibus nobis nullum fas est inire certamen cum hominibus conmunionis alienae.

C. XXXVII. He who excommunicates the evil does not contradict the Gospel but rather obeys it.

Likewise from an epistle of Pope Urban. It is to be noted that certain persons say that we act contrary to the evangelical parable where the Lord commanded that the tares not be uprooted, when we subject to excommunication persons worthy of excommunication; and they say that Saint Augustine also contradicts this in the place where he says: "Because unity is not to be cut apart, the evil are to be borne with, not cast out." To these this must first be answered: if heretics and evil men are not to be excommunicated, why did that holy father Augustine himself, with the legates of the holy Roman church and with his holy fellow bishops, excommunicate Pelagius and Celestius, who were introducing a new heresy into the holy church of God, and separate them from the church of God? Why did both he and the entire church of God hold as excommunicated the Donatists themselves, against whom he speaks these and many things similar to them, and by no means communicate with them unless they had first performed penance and been reconciled through the imposition of hands? The same Lord himself, who expounds this here parabolically, elsewhere openly commands excommunication to be done, saying: "A brother who is rebuked by the church and does not obey, let him be to you as a gentile and a publican." Hence it appears plainly that excommunication is one thing and uprooting another. For he who is excommunicated—as the Apostle says—is excommunicated for this purpose: that his spirit may be saved on the day of the Lord. For excommunication is discipline, not uprooting, [GRATIAN.] unless perhaps uprooting results from the contempt and pride of the excommunicated person. Hence Augustine in the book on Numbers, [homily 15, on c. 23]:

C. XXXVII. Non contradicit, sed pocius euangelio obedit qui malos excommunicat.

Item ex epistola Urbani Papae. Notandum est, quod quidam dicunt contra euangelicam parabolam nos facere, ubi de zizaniis non eradicandis Dominus precepit, cum excommunicatione aliquos dignos excommunicationi subicimus, et aiunt etiam S. Augustinum hoc contradicere eo in loco, ubi ait: "Quia non est precidenda unitas, ferendi sunt mali, non abiciendi." Quibus hoc primum respondendum est: Si heretici et mali homines non sunt excommunicandi, quare ipse pater sanctus Augustinus cum legatis S. Romanae ecclesiae, et cum sanctis episcopis suis Pelagium et Celestinum, nouam heresim in sanctam Dei ecclesiam introducentes, excommunicauit, et ab ecclesia Dei separauit? Quare ipsos Donatistas, contra quos ista et multa his similia loquitur, tam ipse quam omnis ecclesia Dei excommunicatos habuit, et, nisi prius penituissent, et per manus inpositionem reconciliati essent, eis nequaquam conmunicabat? Idem ipse Dominus, qui hoc parabolice hic enarrat, aperte alibi excommunicationem fieri iubet, dicens: "Frater, qui corripitur ab ecclesia, et non obedit, sit tibi sicut ethnicus et publicanus." Unde apparet liquido, aliud esse excommunicationem, et aliud eradicationem. Qui excommunicatur enim (ut Apostolus ait) ad hoc excommunicatur, ut spiritus eius saluus fiat in die Domini. Disciplina enim est excommunicatio, et non eradicatio, [Gratian.] nisi forte ex contemptu et superbia excommunicati proueniat. Unde Augustinus in libro Numeri: [hom. XV. ad c. 23.]

C. XXXVIII. A divine curse designates the desert of the one cursed.

In those whom God curses, he designates the desert of the person who is cursed and pronounces sentence, seeing that neither the quality of the sin nor the disposition of the sinner deceives him. Because man cannot know this—for one person can neither see nor know the purpose and mind of another—therefore, even if he pronounces a curse from the perspective of one judging or pronouncing sentence, there can be no cause for cursing where the disposition of the sinner is unknown, especially since human vice then knows how to pronounce curses when perhaps it is provoked by insults or injuries. Wishing to cut away this vice, the Apostle establishes a necessary command that we bless, lest we provoke curses with curses and insults with insults, not so that the truth of judging—which lies hidden from men—and the authority of pronouncing sentence should be destroyed. GRATIAN. But how many sects of heretics there are and whence they received their names Isidore determines in Book VIII of the Etymologies, c. 5, saying:

C. XXXVIII. Diuina maledictio meritum maledicti designat.

Deus, quibus maledicit, meritum designat eius, cui maledicitur, et sententiam promit, utpote quem non fallit neque peccati qualitas, neque peccantis affectus. Homo, hoc quia non potest scire (neque enim propositum mentemque alterius alius uidere aut cognoscere potest), idcirco etiam si iudicantis uel sententiam promentis intuitu proferat maledictum, non potest esse maledicendi causa, ubi ignoratur peccantis affectus, maxime cum humanum uicium tunc sciat maledicta proferre, cum forte conuiciis aut iniuriis prouocatur. Quod uicium resecare uolens Apostolus, ne maledictis maledicta et conuiciis conuicia prouocemus, mandatum necessarium ponit, ut benedicamus, quo conuiciandi uicium resecetur, non quo iudicandi ueritas, que homines latet, et pronunciandi auctoritas perimatur. Gratian. Sectae uero hereticorum quot sint, et unde nomina acceperint, Ysidorus VIII. libro Ethimologiarum c. 5. determinat, dicens:

C. XXXIX. How many sects of heretics there are.

Some heretics who have withdrawn from the church are named from the names of their founders, while others are named from the causes that they established by choosing them. § 1. The Simonians are so called from Simon, a man skilled in the magical discipline, whom Peter cursed in the Acts of the Apostles because he wished to buy the grace of the Holy Spirit from the Apostles with money. They say that creation is not from God, but was created by a certain supernal power. § 2. The Menandrians are named from Menander the magician, Simon's disciple, who asserted that the world was made not by God but by angels. § 3. The Basilidians are named from Basilides, who, among his other blasphemies, denied that Jesus suffered. § 4. The Nicolaitans are so called from Nicolas, a deacon of the church of Jerusalem who was appointed by Peter with Stephen and the others. Because of her beauty, he abandoned his wife and said that whoever wished might use her; such a custom was turned into debauchery, so that marriages were exchanged among them. John reproves them in the Apocalypse, saying: "But this you have, that you hate the deeds of the Nicolaitans." § 5. The Gnostics wished to call themselves this because of the excellence of knowledge. They say that the soul is the nature of God; in their dogmas they fashion a good God and an evil God. § 6. The Carpocratians are named from a certain Carpocrates, who said that Christ was merely a man and was begotten of both sexes. § 7. The Cerinthians are named from a certain Cerinthus. Among other things, they observe circumcision and preach that after the resurrection there will be a thousand years in the pleasure of the flesh. Hence they are called Chiliasts in Greek and Millenarians in Latin. § 8. The Nazarenes are so called because, although they confess Christ—who was called a Nazarene from the village—to be the Son of God, they nevertheless observe everything in the old law. § 9. The Ophites are named from the serpent, for a serpent is called ophis in Greek. They worship the serpent, saying that in paradise it introduced the knowledge of virtue. § 10. The Valentinians are named from a certain Valentinus, a follower of Plato, who introduced aeons—that is, certain ages—into the origin of God the Creator; he also asserted that Christ assumed nothing bodily from the Virgin, but passed through her as though through a pipe. § 11. The Apellites, whose principal founder was Apelles, made the Creator some glorious angel—I know not whom—of the higher God and, affirming that the God of the law of Israel was that fiery one, said that Christ appeared not as God in truth but as a man in appearance. § 12. The Archontics are named from rulers, because they maintain that the universe which God founded is the work of archangels. § 13. The Adamites are so called because they imitate Adam's nakedness. Hence they pray naked, and naked men and women assemble together. § 14. The Cainites are so called because they worship Cain. § 15. The Sethians received their name from Adam's son, who was called Seth, saying that he is Christ. § 16. The Melchizedekians are so called because they think that Melchizedek, the priest of God, was not a man but a power of God. § 17. The Angelics are so called because they worship angels. § 18. The Apostolics assumed this name for themselves because, possessing nothing of their own, they do not receive those who use anything in this world. § 19. The Cerdonians are named from a certain Cerdo, who asserted two contrary principles. § 20. The Marcionites are named from Marcion, a Stoic philosopher, who, following Cerdo's dogma, asserted that one God was good and another just, as though there were two principles of creation and goodness. § 21. The Artotyrites are named from their offering, for they offer bread and cheese, saying that the first human beings celebrated an offering from the fruits of the earth and the fruits of sheep. § 22. The Aquarians are so called because they offer only water in the sacramental chalice. § 23. The Severians, sprung from Severus, do not drink wine and do not receive the Old Testament or the resurrection. § 24. The Tatians are named from Tatian; they are also called Encratites because they abhor meats. § 25. The Alogians are called as though "without the Word," for logos in Greek means "word." They do not believe in God the Word, rejecting John's Gospel and the Apocalypse. § 26. The province of Phrygia gave the Cataphrygians their name, because their founders Montanus, Prisca, and Maximilla arose there. They assert that the coming of the Holy Spirit was handed down not in the Apostles but in themselves. § 27. The Cathari named themselves thus because of purity: glorying in their merits, they deny the pardon of sins to penitents; they condemn widows as adulteresses if they marry; and they proclaim themselves purer than others. If they wished to recognize their own name, they would call themselves worldly rather than pure. § 28. The Paulianists sprang from Paul of Samosata, who said that Christ did not always exist but took his beginning from Mary. § 29. The Hermogenians are named from a certain Hermogenes, who introduced unbegotten matter, compared it with the unbegotten God, and asserted that it was the mother of the elements and a goddess; the Apostle reproves those who serve the elements. § 30. The Manichaeans arose from a certain Persian called Manes. He introduced two natures and substances, namely, a good one and an evil one, and asserted that souls flow from God as though from a certain spring; they reject the Old Testament and receive the New in part. § 31. The Anthropomorphites are so called because in rustic simplicity they think that God has the human members that are written of in the divine books; for anthropos in Greek is translated "man" in Latin. They are ignorant of the Lord's declaration, "God is spirit." For he is incorporeal: he is neither distinguished by members nor measured by bodily bulk. § 32. The Hieracites sprang from Hieracas their founder; they receive only monks, reject marriages, and do not believe that little children possess the kingdom of heaven. § 33. The Novatians sprang from Novatus, a presbyter of the city of Rome, who, after attempting to seize the sacerdotal chair against Cornelius, established a heresy, refused to receive apostates, and rebaptized the baptized. § 34. The Montani are called heretics because during a persecution they hid in the mountains, on which occasion they separated themselves from the body of the Catholic Church. § 35. The Ebionites are named from Ebion, or from poverty, for they think that Christ was made a just man only through advancement. Hence they are fittingly called Ebionites because of their poverty of understanding. For they are Jews, and they hold the Gospel in such a way as to observe the law carnally; the Apostle inveighs against them when writing to the Galatians. § 36. The Photinians are named from Photinus, bishop of Sirmium in Gallograecia; reviving the heresy of the Ebionites, he asserted that Christ was conceived by Mary from Joseph through marital intercourse. § 37. The Haerians are named from a certain Haerius; they scorn to offer sacrifice for the dead. § 38. The Aetians are named from Aetius and are also called Eunomians from a certain dialectician Eunomius, a disciple of Aetius, by whose name they became better known; they assert that the Son is unlike the Father and the Holy Spirit unlike the Son. They also say that no sin is imputed to those remaining in the faith. § 39. The Origenists sprang from Origen their founder, saying that the Son cannot see the Father, nor the Holy Spirit the Son. They also say that souls sinned at the beginning of the world and, according to the diversity of their sins, merited diverse bodies as bonds from heaven down to earth, and that for this reason the world was made. § 40. The Noetians are named from a certain Noetus, who said that Christ is himself both the Father and the Holy Spirit, and they understand the Trinity itself in names of offices, not in persons. Hence they are also called Patripassians, because they say that the Father suffered. § 41. The Sabellians are said to have sprouted from the same Noetus, whose disciple Sabellius is reported to have been; they became especially known from his name and hence are called Sabellians. They assert one person of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. § 42. The Arians sprang from Arius, a presbyter of Alexandria, who, not acknowledging the Son as coeternal with the Father, asserted diverse substances in the Trinity, contrary to what the Lord says: "I and the Father are one." § 43. The Macedonians are named from Bishop Macedonius; they deny that the Holy Spirit is God. § 44. The Apollinarists are named from Apollinaris; they say that Christ assumed only a body without a soul. § 45. The Antidicomarianites are so called because they contradict Mary's virginity, asserting that after Christ was born she had intercourse with her husband. § 46. The Metangismonites received such a name because angeion means "vessel" in Greek. They assert that the Son is in the Father as a smaller vessel within a larger vessel. § 47. The Patricians are named from a certain Patricius; they say that the substance of human flesh was founded by the devil. § 48. The Coluthians are named from a certain Coluthus; they say that God does not make evils, contrary to what is written: "I, the Lord, creating evils." § 49. The Florinians are named from Florinus; on the contrary, they say that God created evils, contrary to what is written: "God made all things good." § 50. The Donatists are named from a certain African Donatus who, coming from Numidia, deceived almost all Africa by his persuasion, asserting that the Son is less than the Father and the Holy Spirit less than the Son, and rebaptizing Catholics. § 51. The Bonosians are reported to have sprung from a certain bishop Bonosus; they assert that Christ is the adoptive, not the proper, Son of God. § 52. The Circumcellions are so called because they are rustics, whom they call Cotopitae, holding the teaching of the aforesaid heresy. Through love of martyrdom they kill themselves so that, departing violently from this life, they may be called martyrs. § 53. The Priscillianists are named from Priscillian, who in Spain composed a dogma mixed from the error of the Gnostics and Manichaeans. § 54. The Luciferians arose from Lucifer, bishop of Sirmium. The Catholic bishops who, under the pressure of persecution, had consented to the unbelief of the Arians and afterward, once corrected and condemning what they had believed or dissembled having believed, chose to return to their chairs, the Catholic Church received into her maternal bosom as Peter was received after he wept for his denial. But the Luciferians, receiving this motherly charity with disdain and refusing to receive them, withdrew from the church's communion; and with Lucifer himself, their founder who arose in the morning, they merited to fall. § 55. The Jovinianists are named from a certain monk Jovinian; they assert that there is no difference between marriage and virginity, and no distinction between those who abstain and those who feast without restraint. § 56. The Helvidians are named from Helvidius; they say that after Christ was born Mary bore other sons by her husband Joseph. § 57. The Paternians sprang from a certain Paternus; they suppose that the lower parts of the body were made by the devil. § 58. The Arabians are so called because they arose in Arabia; they say that the soul dies with the body and that both rise again at the last day. § 59. The Tertullianists are named from Tertullian, a presbyter of Carthage, a city of the province of Africa; they proclaim that the soul is immortal but corporeal and think that the souls of sinful persons are turned into demons after death. § 60. The Quartodecimans are so called because they contend that Passover is to be observed with the Jews on the fourteenth moon. For tessera signifies four and deka ten. § 61. The Nyctages are named from sleep because they reject nocturnal vigils, saying that these are superstition and that the divine laws, which allotted the night for rest, are violated. § 62. The Pelagians sprang from the monk Pelagius. They place free choice before divine grace, saying that the will suffices to fulfill the divine commands. § 63. The Nestorians are named from Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople, who asserted that the Blessed Virgin Mary was not the mother of God but only of a man, so that he made one person of the flesh and another of the Godhead; he did not believe in one Christ in the Word of God and the flesh but separately and disjointedly proclaimed one to be the Son of God and the other the son of man. § 64. The Eutychians are named from Eutyches, abbot of Constantinople, who denied that after the assumption of humanity Christ existed from two natures, but asserted that in him there was only the divine nature. § 65. The Acephalites are so called—that is, "without a head"—for no founder from whom they arose is found. These opponents of the three Chapters of Chalcedon deny the proper character of two substances in Christ and proclaim one nature in his person. § 66. The Theodosians and Gaianites are named from Theodosius and Gaianus, who in the time of Emperor Justinian were ordained bishops in Alexandria on one day by the election of the perverse people. Following the errors of Eutyches and Dioscorus, they reject the Council of Chalcedon and assert one nature in Christ from two; the Theodosians contend that it is corruptible, the Gaianites that it is incorruptible. § 67. The Agnoetae and Tritheites sprang from the Theodosians. Of these the Agnoetae are named from ignorance, because they add to the perversity from which they arose that Christ's divinity is ignorant of future things, which are written concerning the last day and hour, not remembering the person of Christ speaking in Isaiah: "The day of judgment is in my heart." § 68. The Tritheites are so called because, just as they assert that there are three persons in the Trinity, so too they assert that there are three Gods, contrary to what is written: "Hear, Israel: the Lord your God is one God." § 69. There are also other heresies without founders and without names. Some of these think that God is threefold; others say that Christ's divinity is passible; others assign a beginning in time to Christ's birth from the Father; others do not believe that the liberation of human beings in the lower regions was accomplished by Christ's descent; others deny that the soul is the image of God; others think that souls are converted into demons and every kind of animal; others dissent concerning the state of the world; others suppose that there are innumerable worlds; others make water coeternal with God; others walk with bare feet; others do not eat with other human beings. These are the heresies that have arisen against the Catholic faith and were condemned beforehand by the Apostles and holy Fathers or councils. Although divided within themselves by many errors and dissenting from one another, they nevertheless conspire under a common name against the church of God. § 70. But whoever understands sacred Scripture otherwise than the meaning of the Holy Spirit, by whom it was written, demands, although he has not withdrawn from the church, can nevertheless be called a heretic.

C. XXXIX. Quot sint sectae hereticorum.

Quidam autem heretici, qui de ecclesia recesserunt, ex nomine auctorum suorum nuncupantur; quidam uero ex causis, quas eligentes instituerunt. §. 1. Symoniani a Symone dicti, magicae disciplinae perito, cui Petrus in Actibus Apostolorum maledixit pro eo, quod ab Apostolis Spiritus sancti gratiam pecunia emere uoluisset. Hii dicunt, creaturam non a Deo esse, sed a uirtute creatam quadam superna. §. 2. Menandriani a Menandro mago, discipulo Symonis nuncupati, qui mundum non a Deo, sed ab angelis factum asseruit. §. 3. Basilidiani a basilide appellati, qui inter reliquas blasphemias passum Iesum abnegauit. §. 4. Nykolaitae a Nykolao dicti diacono ecclesiae Iherosolimorum, qui cum Stephano et ceteris constitutus est a Petro; qui, propter pulchritudinem uxorem relinquens, dixit ut qui uellet ea uteretur; uersa est in stuprum talis consuetudo, ut inuicem coniugia conmutarentur. Quos Iohannes in Apokalipsi inprobat dicens: "Sed hoc habes, quod odisti facta Nykolaitarum." §. 5. Gnostici propter excellentiam scientiae se ita appellare uoluerunt. Animam naturam esse Dei dicunt; bonum et malum Deum suis dogmatibus fingunt. §. 6. Carpocratiani a Carpocrate quodam uocantur, qui dixit, Christum hominem fuisse tantum, et de utroque sexu progenitum. §. 7. Cherinthiani a quodam Cherintho nuncupati. Hii inter cetera circumcisionem obseruant, mille annos post resurrectionem in uoluptate carnis futuros predicant. Unde et grece Ciliastae, latine Miliasti sunt appellati. §. 8. Nazarei dicti, qui dum Christum (qui a uico Nazareus est appellatus) filium Dei confiteantur, omnia tamen ueteris legis custodiunt. §. 9. Ofitae a colubro nominati sunt. Coluber enim grece ofi dicitur. Colunt enim serpentem, dicentes, ipsum in paradyso induxisse uirtutis cognicionem. §. 10. Valentiniani a quodam Valentino Platonico sectatore uocati, qui EONAS, id est secula quedam in originem Dei creatoris induxit, Christum quoque de Virgine nichil corporis assumpsisse, sed per eam quasi per fistulam transisse asseruit. §. 11. Apellitae, quorum auctor Apelles princeps fuit, qui, creatorem angelum nescio quem gloriosum superioris Dei faciens, Deum legis Israelis illum igneum affirmans qui dixit, Christum non Deum in ueritate, sed hominem in fantasia apparuisse. §. 12. Archontiaci a principibus appellantur, quia uniuersitatem, quam Deus condidit, opera esse archangelorum defendunt. §. 13. Adamiani uocati, quia Adae imitentur nuditatem. Unde et nudi orant, et nudi inter se mares feminaeque conueniunt. §. 14. Caiani proinde sunt appellati, quoniam Cain adorant. §. 15. Sethiani nomen acceperunt a filio Adae, qui uocatus est Seth, dicentes, eundem esse Christum. §. 16. Melchisedechiani uocati pro eo, quod Melchisedech, sacerdotem Dei, non hominem fuisse, sed uirtutem Dei esse arbitrantur. §. 17. Angelici uocati, quia angelos colunt. §. 18. Apostolici hoc ideo sibi nomen sumpserunt, quod nichil possidentes proprium nequaquam recipiant eos, qui aliquo in hoc mundo utuntur. §. 19. Cerdoniani a Cerdone quodam nominati, qui duo contraria principia asseruit. §. 20. Marcionistae a Marcione, Stoico philosopho, appellati, qui Cerdonis dogma secutus alterum bonum, alterum iustum Deum asseruit, tamquam duo principia creationis et bonitatis. §. 21. Artotyritae ab oblatione uocati, panem enim et caseum offerunt, dicentes, a primis hominibus oblationem a fructibus terrae et a fructibus ouium fuisse celebratam. §. 22. Aquarii appellati eo, quod aquam solam offerunt in calice sacramenti. §. 23. Seueriani a Seuero exorti, uinum non bibunt; uetus testamentum et resurrectionem non recipiunt. §. 24. Taciani a Taciano uocati, qui et Enchratitae dicti, quia carnes abhominantur. §. 25. Alogii uocantur tamquam sine uerbo, logos enim grece uerbum dicitur. Deum enim uerbum non credunt, respuentes Iohannis Euangelium et Apokalipsim. §. 26. Catafrigiis nomen prouincia Frigia dedit, quia ibi extiterunt auctores eorum Montanus, Prisca et Maximilla. Hii aduentum Spiritus sancti non in Apostolis, sed in se traditum asserunt. §. 27. Cathareae propter mundiciam ita se nominauerunt: gloriantes enim de suis meritis negant penitentibus ueniam peccatorum; uiduas, si nupserint, tamquam adulteras dampnant; mundiores se ceteris predicant. Qui nomen suum si cognoscere uellent, mundanos pocius se quam mundos uocarent. §. 28. Pauliani a Paulo Samosateno exorti sunt, qui dixit, non semper fuisse Christum, sed a Maria sumpsisse inicium. §. 29. Ermogeniani ab Ermogene quodam uocati, qui materiam non natam introducens,

Deo non nato eam conparauit, matremque elementorum et Deam asseruit, quos Apostolus inprobat elementis seruientes. §. 30. Manichei a quodam extiterunt Persa, qui uocatus est Manes. Hic duas naturas et substancias introduxit, id est bonam et malam, et animas ex Deo quasi ex aliquo fonte manare asseruit; testamentum uetus respuunt, nouum ex parte recipiunt. §. 31. Antropomorfitae dicti pro eo, quod simplicitate rustica Deum habere membra humana, que in diuinis libris scripta sunt, arbitrantur; antropos enim grece latine homo interpretatur. Ignorantes uocem Domini, qui ait: "Spiritus est Deus." Incorporeus est enim; nec enim membris distinguitur, nec corporis mole censetur. §. 32. Eraclitae ab Eraclio auctore exorti, monachos tantum recipiunt, coniugia respuunt, regna celorum paruulos habere non credunt. §. 33. Nouatiani a Nouato Romanae urbis presbitero exorti, qui aduersus Cornelium cathedram sacerdotalem conatus inuadere, heresim instituit, noluit apostatas suscipere et rebaptizans baptizatos. §. 34. Montani heretici dicti, quod tempore persecutionis in montibus latuerunt, qua occasione se a catholicae ecclesiae corpore diuiserunt. §. 35. Ebionitae ab Ebione dicti, siue a paupertate; Christum enim per prouectum solum uirum iustum putant effectum. Unde conpetenter Ebionitae pro paupertate intelligentiae appellati sunt. Hii enim Iudei sunt, et ita tenent euangelium, ut legem carnaliter seruent; aduersus quos ad Galathas Apostolus scribens inuehitur. §. 36. Fotiniani a Fotiniano Gallogreciae Sirmiae episcopo nuncupati, qui Ebionitarum heresim suscitans asseruit, Christum a Maria per Ioseph nuptiali coitu fuisse conceptum. §. 37. Haeriani ab Haereo quodam nuncupati sunt; hii offerre sacrificium pro defunctis spernunt. §. 38. Haetiani ab Haetio sunt uocati, idemque Eunomiani ab Eunomio quodam dialectico, Haetii discipulo, ex cuius nomine magis innotuerunt, dissimilem patri asserentes Filium, et Filio Spiritum sanctum. Dicunt etiam, nullum inputari peccatum in fide manentium. §. 39. Origeniani Origene auctore exorti sunt, dicentes, quod non possit Filius uidere Patrem, nec Spiritus sanctus Filium. Animas quoque in mundi principio dicunt peccasse, et pro diuersitate peccatorum e celis usque ad terras diuersa corpora quasi uincula meruisse, eaque causa factum esse mundum. §. 40. Noetiani a quodam Noeto uocati, qui dicebant Christum eundem esse et Patrem, et Spiritum sanctum, ipsamque Trinitatem in offitiorum nominibus, non personis accipiunt. Unde et Patripassiani uocantur, quia Patrem passum dicunt. §. 41. Sabelliani ab eodem Noeto pullulasse dicuntur, cuius discipulum perhibent fuisse Sabellium, ex cuius nomine maxime innotuerunt, unde et Sabelliani uocati sunt. Hii unam personam Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti astruunt. §. 42. Arriani ab Arrio Alexandrino presbitero exorti sunt, qui, coeternum Patri Filium non agnoscens, diuersas in Trinitate substantias asseruit, contra illud, quod Dominus ait: "Ego et Pater unum sumus." §. 43. Macedoniani a Macedonio episcopo sunt dicti, negantes Deum esse Spiritum sanctum. §. 44. Apollinaristae ab Apollinare uocati sunt, dicentes Christum corpus tantummodo sine anima assumpsisse. §. 45. Antidicomaritae appellati sunt, eo, quod Mariae uirginitati contradicunt, asserentes eam post Christum natum uiro suo fuisse conmixtam. §. 46. Metangismonitae ideo tale nomen acceperunt, quia angios grece uas dicitur. Asserunt enim sic esse in Patre Filium, tamquam uas minus inter uas maius. §. 47. Patriciani a quodam Patricio nuncupati sunt, qui substantiam humanae carnis a diabolo conditam dicunt. §. 48. Coliciani a quodam Colitho nominati, qui dicunt, Deum non facere mala contra illud, quod scriptum est: "Ego Dominus creans mala." §. 49. Floriani a Florino, qui e contrario dicunt Deum creasse mala, contra hoc, quod scriptum est: "Fecit Deus omnia bona." §. 50. Donatistae a Donato quodam Afro nuncupati sunt, qui, de Numidia ueniens, totam pene Affricam sua persuasione decepit, asserens minorem Patre Filium, et minorem Filio Spiritum sanctum, et rebaptizans catholicos. §. 51. Bonosiani a quodam episcopo Bonoso exorti produntur, qui Christum filium Dei adoptiuum, non proprium asserunt. §. 52. Circumcelliones dicti eo, quod agrestes sint, quos Cotopitas uocant, supradictae heresis habentes doctrinam. Hii amore martyrii semetipsos perimunt, ut uiolenter de hac uita discedentes martyres nominentur. §. 53. Priscillianistae a Priscilliano uocati, qui in Hispania ex errore Gnosticorum et Manicheorum permixtum dogma conposuit. §. 54. Luciferiani a Lucifero Sirmiae episcopo orti, qui episcopos catholicos, qui instanti persecutione perfidiae Arrianorum erant consentientes, et postea correcti in cathedram redire delegerunt, dampnantes quod crediderunt siue quod credidisse dissimulauerunt, quos ecclesia catholica materno recepit sinu, tamquam Petrum post fletum negationis: hanc illi matris karitatem super accipientes eos recipere nolentes, ab ecclesiae conmunione recesserunt, et cum ipso Lucifero auctore suo, qui mane oriebatur, cadere meruerunt.

§. 55. Iouinianistae a Iouiniano quodam monacho dicti, asserentes, nullam nuptiarum et uirginum esse distantiam, nullumque inter abstinentes et simpliciter epulantes esse discrimen. §. 56. Eluidiani ab Eluidio nominati, qui dicunt post natum Christum alios Mariam filios de uiro Ioseph peperisse. §. 57. Paterniani Paterno quodam exorti, qui inferiores corporis partes a diabolo factas opinantur. §. 58. Arabici nuncupati eo, quod in Arabia exorti sunt, dicentes animam cum corpore mori, atque in nouissimo utrumque resurgere. §. 59. Tertullianistae dicti a Tertulliano, presbitero Affricanae prouinciae ciuitatis Cartaginensis, animam inmortalem esse, sed corpoream predicantes, et animas peccatorum hominum post mortem in demones uerti putantes. §. 60. Tesserescedecatitae dicti, quod quartadecima luna pasca cum Iudeis obseruare contendunt. Nam tessera quatuor, deka decem significat. §. 61. Nictages a somno nuncupati, quod uigilias noctis respuant, supersticionem esse dicentes, iura temerari diuina, qui noctem ad requiem tribuit. §. 62. Pelagiani a Pelagio monacho exorti. Hii liberum arbitrium diuinae gratiae anteponunt, dicentes, sufficere uoluntatem ad inplenda iussa diuina. §. 63. Nestoriani a Nestorio Constantinopolitano episcopo nuncupati, qui B. uirginem Mariam non Dei, sed hominis tantummodo genetricem asseruit, ut aliam personam carnis, aliam faceret Deitatis, nec unum Christum in uerbo Dei et carne credidit, sed separatim atque seiunctim alterum filium Dei, alterum hominis predicauit. §. 64. Euticiani dicti ab Eutice Constantinopolitano abbate, qui Christum post humanam assumptionem negauit existere de duabus naturis, sed solam in eo diuinam asseruit esse naturam. §. 65. Acephalitae dicti, id est sine capite. Nullus enim eorum repperitur auctor, a quo exorti sint. Hii trium Calcedonensium capitulorum inpugnatores, duarum in Christo substanciarum proprietatem negant, et unam in eius persona naturam predicant. §. 66. Theodosiani et Gaianitae appellati a Theodosio et Gaiano, qui temporibus Iustiniani principis in Alexandria populi peruersi electione una die ordinati sunt episcopi. Hii errores Euticis et Dioscori sequentes Calcedonense concilium respuunt, ex duabus unam in Christo naturam asserunt, quam Theodosiani corruptam, Gaianitae incorruptam contendunt. §. 67. Agnoitae et Tritheitae a Theodosianis exorti sunt, ex quibus Agnoitae ab ignorantia dicti, quia peruersitati, a qua exorti sunt, id adiciunt, quod Christi diuinitas ignoret futura, que sunt scripta de die et hora nouissima, non recordantes Christi personam in Esaia loquentis: "Diem iudicii in corde meo." §. 68. Tritheitae uero uocati, quod sicut tres personas in Trinitate, ita quoque tres asserunt Deos esse, contra illud, quod scriptum est: "Audi Israel, Dominus Deus tuus Deus unus est." §. 69. Sunt et aliae hereses sine auctore et sine nominibus. Ex quibus aliae putant trinum esse Deum; aliae Christi diuinitatem passibilem dicunt; aliae Christi de patre natiuitati in tempore inicium temporis dant; aliae liberationem hominum apud inferos factam Christi descensione non credunt; aliae animam imaginem Dei negant; aliae animas conuerti in demones et in quecumque animalia existimant; aliae de mundi statu dissentiunt; aliae innumerabiles mundos oppinantur; aliae aquam Deo coeternam faciunt; aliae nudis pedibus ambulant; aliae cum hominibus non manducant. He sunt hereses aduersus catholicam fidem exortae, ab Apostolis et sanctis Patribus uel conciliis predampnatae, que, dum in se multis erroribus diuisae inuicem sibi dissentiunt, conmuni tamen nomine aduersus ecclesiam Dei conspirant. §. 70. Sed quicumque aliter scripturam sanctam intelligit, quam sensus Spiritus sancti flagitat, a quo conscripta est, licet de ecclesia non recesserit, tamen hereticus appellari potest.

C. XL. Why divine providence permits many to err.

Augustine, [On Genesis Against the Manichaeans, Book I, c. 1]. PART VI. Divine providence therefore permits there to be many heretics of diverse error, so that, when they question us about those things that we do not know, we may thus shake off sluggishness and desire the divine Scriptures. For this reason the Apostle says: "That those who are approved may be made manifest." Those who are able to teach well are approved by God.

C. XL. Quare diuina prouidentia multos errare permittit.

Augustinus. [de Genesi contra Manichaeos, lib. I. cap. 1.] VI. Pars. Ideo diuina prouidentia multos diuersi erroris hereticos esse permittit, ut, cum interrogant nos ea, que nescimus, sic discutiamus pigriciam, et diuinas scripturas cupiamus. Propterea Apostolus ait: "ut probati manifesti fiant." Hii autem Deo probati sunt, qui bene possunt docere.

Causa XXV

GRATIAN. The holy Roman Church fortified a certain baptismal church with its privileges, assigning to it in full the tithes of its diocese. It likewise fortified a certain monastery with its own privileges, decreeing that it should pay tithes to no one from its own estates. It therefore happened that within the diocese of the fortified baptismal church the aforesaid monastery acquired estates for itself, some by purchase and others by donation. A dispute therefore arises between the monks and clerics concerning the tithes. (Question I.) First it is now asked whether the clerics of the baptismal church can claim for themselves in full the tithes of their diocese by the authority of the privilege. (Question II.) Second, whether the later privilege of the monks derogates from the earlier privileges of the baptismal churches.

GRATIANUS. Sancta Romana ecclesia quandam baptismalem ecclesiam suis muniuit priuilegiis, decimationes suae diocesis ex integro sibi attribuens. Item quoddam monasterium similiter muniuit priuilegiis propriis, decernens, ut ex propriis prediis nulli decimas persolueret. Accidit itaque, ut intra diocesim premunitae baptismalis ecclesiae prefatum monasterium alia emptione, alia donatione predia sibi inueniret. Oritur itaque contentio inter monachos et clericos de decimis. (Qu. I.) Nunc primum queritur, an clerici baptismalis ecclesiae auctoritate priuilegii decimas suae diocesis ex integro sibi ualeant uendicare? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an subsequenti priuilegio monachorum derogetur antiquioribus priuilegiis baptismalium ecclesiarum?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. That the clerics cannot claim the tithes for themselves in full by the authority of that privilege is proved from this: according to the decrees of the holy Fathers, tithes are divided into four parts, of which one part is assigned to bishops, the second to clerics, the third to restoring buildings, and the fourth to the poor. But no one ought to observe the decrees of the holy canons more than the Apostolic. Hence Pope Gelasius says, [in the epistle to the bishops of Dardania]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod uero auctoritate illius priuilegii decimas sibi ex integro clerici uendicare non ualeant, hinc probatur, quia decimae iuxta decreta sanctorum Patrum quadripertito diuiduntur, quarum una pars episcopis, secunda clericis, tercia fabricis restaurandis, quarta uero pauperibus est assignata. Decreta uero sanctorum canonum neminem magis quam Apostolicum seruare oportet. Unde Gelasius Papa ait: [in epistola ad Episcopos Dardaniae]

C. I. The Roman See ought to observe the constitution of a synod that the consent of the universal church has approved.

We trust that no one who is truly a Christian is now ignorant that, before the other sees, none ought more to execute the constitution of each synod that the consent of the universal church has approved than the first see, which has both confirmed each synod by its authority and preserves it with continuous moderation.

C. I. Constitutionem sinodi, quam uniuersalis ecclesiae probauit assensus, Romanam sedem seruare oportet.

Confidimus, quod nullus iam ueraciter Christianus ignoret, uniuscuiusque sinodi constitutum, quod uniuersalis ecclesiae probauit assensus, nullam magis exequi sedem pre ceteris oportere, quam primam, que et unamquamque sinodum sua auctoritate confirmauit et continuata moderatione custodit.

C. II. One who negligently feeds the Lord's flock entrusted to him is proved not to love the supreme Shepherd.

Likewise Pope Leo, [epistle 4 to the bishops of Sicily]. We are incited by divine precepts and apostolic admonitions to watch over the condition of all the churches with an untiring disposition and, if anything is ever found liable to reproof, to recall it either from the unskillfulness of ignorance or from the usurpation of presumption. For by the command of the divine voice, by which the most blessed Apostle is instructed through a threefold repetition in mystical ordinances that he who loves Christ should feed Christ's sheep, we are exhorted by reverence for that see over which, through the abundance of divine grace, we preside, to avoid as far as we can the danger of sloth, lest the profession of the supreme Apostle, by which he testified that he loved the Lord, be found not to be in us, because one who negligently feeds the Lord's flock so often commended to him is proved not to love the supreme Shepherd.

C. II. Qui negligenter pascit dominicum gregem sibi commendatum conuincitur summum non amare pastorem.

Item Leo Papa. [epist. IV. Episcopis Siciliae] Diuinis preceptis et apostolicis monitis incitamur ut pro omnium ecclesiarum statu inpigro uigilemus affectu, ac, si quid umquam reprehensioni inuenitur obnoxium, aut ab ignorantiae inpericia, aut a presumptionis usurpatione reuocemus. Ammonente enim diuinae uocis inperio, quo beatissimus apostolus trina repetitione misticis sanctionibus inbuitur, ut Christi oues qui Christum diligit pascat, ipsius sedis, cui per habundantiam diuinae gratiae presumus, reuerentia cohortamur, ut periculum desidiae, quantum possumus, declinemus, ne professio summi Apostoli, qua se amatorem Domini testatus est, non inueniatur in nobis, quia qui negligenter pascit tociens conmendatum dominicum gregem conuincitur summum non amare pastorem.

C. III. Things ordained for perpetual peace ought not to be altered in any way.

The same to Bishop Anatolius, [epistle 51]. Let those things that have been ordained generally for perpetual advantage be varied by no change, nor let those things established for the common good be drawn to private advantage; but with the boundaries that the Fathers established remaining, let no one unjustly usurp what belongs to another, but let each person exercise himself in the breadth of charity within his own proper and lawful bounds, as he shall be able.

C. III. Non debent ullo modo uariari que ad perpetuam quietem ordinantur.

Idem Anatholio Episcopo. [epist. LI.] Que ad perpetuam generaliter ordinata sunt utilitatem nulla conmutatione uarientur, nec ad priuatum trahantur commodum que ad bonum sunt conmune prefixa, sed manentibus terminis, quos constituerunt Patres nemo iniuste usurpet alienum, sed intra fines proprios atque legitimos, prout quisque ualuerit, in latitudine se exerceat karitatis.

C. IV. It is lawful for no one to violate divine constitutions and decrees of the Apostolic See.

Likewise Pope Hilary, [in the Roman Synod, c. 1]. Let it be lawful for no one, without danger to his status, to violate either divine constitutions or the decrees of the Apostolic See, because the guilt of such transgressions will regard us, who administer the offices of the most powerful priest, if we are found slothful in the causes of God, for we remember how God threatens the negligence of priests, which we ought to fear. Indeed, one who enjoys higher honor commits a greater offense by his guilt, and the loftiness of those sinning makes the vices of sinners more grave.

C. IV. Diuinas constitutiones et apostolicae sedis decreta nulli temerare licet.

Item Hilarius Papa. [in Sinodo Romana, c. 1.] Nulli fas sit sine status sui periculo uel diuinas constitutiones, uel apostolicae sedis decreta temerare, quia nos, qui potentissimi sacerdotis amministramus offitia, talis transgressionum culpa respiciet, si in causis Dei desides fuerimus inuenti, quia meminimus, quod timere debemus, qualiter conminetur Deus negligentiae sacerdotum. Siquidem maior reatu delinquit qui pociori honore fruitur, et grauiora facit uicia peccatorum sublimitas peccantium.

C. V. Those who violate the sacred canons blaspheme against the Holy Spirit.

Likewise Pope Damasus. Voluntary violators of the canons are judged gravely by the holy Fathers and are condemned by the Holy Spirit—by whose inspiration and gift they were dictated—because those who, not compelled by necessity but willingly, as was said above, act or presume to speak anything insolently against those same sacred canons, or freely consent to those who wish to do so, appear not unfittingly to blaspheme the Holy Spirit. For such presumption is manifestly one kind of blaspheming the Holy Spirit, because, as has already been touched upon, it acts against him by whose exertion and grace the holy canons were issued.

> C. V. In Spiritum sanctum blasphemant qui sacros canones uiolant.
> Item Damasus Papa. Violatores canonum uoluntarie grauiter a sanctis Patribus iudicantur, et a sancto Spiritu (instinctu cuius ac dono dictati sunt) dampnantur, quoniam blasphemare Spiritum sanctum non incongrue uidentur qui contra eosdem sacros canones non necessitate conpulsi, sed libenter, ut premissum est, aliquid aut proterue agunt, aut loqui presumunt, aut facere uolentibus sponte consentiunt. Talis enim presumptio manifeste unum genus est blasphemantium Spiritum sanctum, quoniam, ut iam prelibatum est, contra eum agit, cuius nisu et gratia sancti canones editi sunt.

C. VI. In what matters the Roman Pontiff may establish new laws.

Likewise Pope Urban. There are some who say that it has always been lawful for the Roman Pontiff to establish new laws. This we not only do not deny, but also affirm very strongly. Yet it must above all be known that he can establish new laws concerning those matters about which the Evangelists said nothing at all. But where the Lord or his Apostles, and the holy Fathers following them, have openly defined something by a sentence, there the Roman Pontiff ought not to give a new law, but rather to confirm what has been preached even unto soul and blood. For if he should attempt—which may it not be—to destroy what the Apostles and Prophets taught, he would be proved not to give a sentence but rather to err. But let this be far from those who have always guarded the Lord's church most excellently against the snares of wolves.

> C. VI. In quibus liceat a Romano Pontifici nouas condere leges.
> Item Urbanus Papa. Sunt quidam dicentes, Romano Pontifici semper licuisse nouas condere leges. Quod et nos non solum non negamus, sed etiam ualde affirmamus. Sciendum uero summopere est, quia inde nouas leges condere potest, unde Euangelistae aliquid nequaquam dixerunt. Ubi uero aperte Dominus, uel eius Apostoli, et eos sequentes sancti Patres sententialiter aliquid diffinierunt, ibi non nouam legem Romanus Pontifex dare, sed pocius quod predicatum est usque ad animam et sanguinem confirmare debet. Si enim quod docuerunt Apostoli et Prophetae destruere (quod absit) niteretur, non sententiam dare, sed magis errare conuinceretur. Sed hoc procul sit ab eis, qui semper Domini ecclesiam contra luporum insidias optime custodierunt.

C. VII. The authority of the Apostolic See cannot grant anything contrary to the statutes of the saints.

Likewise Pope Zosimus. Not even the authority of this see can grant or alter anything contrary to the statutes of the Fathers. For among us antiquity lives with unshaken roots, and the decrees of the Fathers have sanctioned reverence for it.

> C. VII. Contra sanctorum statuta apostolicae sedis auctoritas aliquid concedere a non ualet.

Item Zosimus Papa. Contra Patrum statuta concedere aliquid uel mutare nec huius quidem sedis potest auctoritas. Apud nos enim inconuulsis radicibus uiuit antiquitas, cui decreta Patrum sanxere reuerentiam.

C. VIII. What has been done contrary to evangelical or prophetic teaching or constitution cannot stand.

Likewise Pope Marcellinus, [epistle 2]. The Catholic Church defends everything that is irreprehensible. And below: § 1. Let an unjust judgment and an unjust definition ordained by judges through royal fear or command have no force. What has been done contrary to evangelical, prophetic, or apostolic teaching or their constitution, or that of the holy Fathers, will by no means stand; and what has been done by unbelievers or heretics will be made wholly void.

C. VIII. Stare non ualet quod contra euangelicam uel propheticam doctrinam seu constitutionem factum fuerit.

Item Marcellinus Papa. [epist. II.] Omne, quod inreprehensibile est, catholica defendit ecclesia. Et infra: §. 1. Iniustum iudicium et diffinitio iniusta, regio metu uel iussu a iudicibus ordinata, non ualeat. Nequaquam quod contra euangelicam, uel propheticam, uel apostolicam doctrinam constitutionemue eorum, siue sanctorum Patrum actum fuerit, stabit, et quod ab infidelibus uel hereticis factum fuerit omnino cassabitur.

C. IX. The first salvation is not to deviate from the statutes of the Fathers and to preserve the rule of faith.

Likewise Pope Hormisdas, [to the bishops of Spain]. The first salvation is to preserve the rule of right faith and in no way to deviate from the constitutions of the Fathers.

C. IX. A statutis Patrum non deuiare et fidei regulam custodire prima salus est.

Item Hormisda Papa. [Episcopis Hispaniae] Prima salus est rectae fidei regulam custodire, et a constitutis Patrum nullatenus deuiare.

C. X. Pelagius professes that he observes the Tome of his predecessor in all things.

Likewise Pelagius to King Childebert. We must endeavor, in order to remove the scandal of suspicion, to render the service of our confession to the laws to which sacred Scripture commands that even we be subject. For when Rufinus, a magnificent man and legate of Your Excellency, came, he confidently requested of us, as was fitting, that we ought either to signify to you that the Tome of Pope Leo of blessed memory is preserved by us in all things, or to send a confession of our faith in our own words. And because the first part of his request was easier, we fulfilled it at once, as he said, and by a profession of our own hand we signified to you that, with God's favor, I preserve in all things the Tome written by the Prelate for the assertion of the Catholic faith. But so that no occasion for suspicion—which may it not be—might thereafter remain, I hastened also to do that other part of which the aforesaid illustrious man admonished me: namely, I set forth in my own words the confession of faith that we hold.

C. X. Profitetur Pelagius thomum sui decessoris se per omnia seruare.

Item Pelagius Childiberto Regi. Satagendum est, ut pro auferendo suspicionis scandalo obsequium confessionis nostrae legibus ministremus, quibus nos etiam subditos esse sacrae scripturae precipiunt.

Veniens etenim Rufinus uir magnificus, legatus excellentiae uestrae, confidenter a nobis, ut decuit, postulauit, quatinus uobis aut beatae recordationis Leonis Papae thomum a nobis per omnia conseruari significare debuissemus, aut propriis uerbis nostrae confessionem fidei destinare. Et primam quidem petitionis eius partem, quia facilior fuit, mox, ut dixit, inpleuimus, meque in omnibus Presulis thomum pro catholicae fidei assertione conscriptum, Deo propicio, custodire manus nostrae ad uos professione significauimus. Ut autem deinceps nullius (quod absit) suspicionis resideret occasio, etiam illam aliam partem, quam memoratus uir illustris ammonuit, facere maturaui scilicet propriis uerbis confessionem fidei, quam tenemus, exposui.

C. XI. Let one who violates the censure of the Roman Pontiffs be made anathema before God.

Likewise Pope Hadrian, [in the Capitularies, last chapter]. By a general decree we establish that whoever among kings, bishops, or powerful persons shall henceforth believe or permit the censure of the decrees of the Roman Pontiffs to be violated in anything shall be made an execrable anathema and shall always stand guilty before God as a transgressor of the Catholic faith.

C. XI. Anathema apud Deum fiat qui censuram Romanorum Pontificum uiolat.

Item Adrianus Papa. [in Capitulis, c. ult.] Generali decreto constituimus, ut execrandum anathema fiat, et ueluti preuaricator fidei catholicae semper apud Deum reus existat, quicumque regum, seu episcoporum, uel potentum deinceps Romanorum Pontificum decretorum censuram in quoquam crediderit uel permiserit uiolandam.

C. XII. It is not lawful for any bishop to act contrary to the decrees of the Roman Pontiffs.

Likewise Pope Damasus to Archbishop Stephen. We command that all decretal constitutions of all our predecessors that have been promulgated concerning ecclesiastical orders and the disciplines of the canons ought so generally to be observed by all bishops and priests that, if they commit anything against them, they should know that pardon concerning their honor will thereafter be denied them.

C. XII. Non licet alicui episcopo contra decreta Romanorum Pontificum aliquid agere.

Item Damasus Papa, Stephano Archiepiscopo. Omnia decretalia cunctorum predecessorum nostrorum constituta, que de ecclesiasticis ordinibus et canonum promulgata sunt disciplinis, ita a omnibus episcopis, ac sacerdotibus generaliter custodiri debere mandamus, ut si quid in illa conmiserint, ueniam sibi honoris deinceps nouerint denegari.

C. XIII. Let one who does not know how to obey the sacred canons not communicate at the sacred altars.

Likewise Gregory, [Book II, epistle 7, to Bishop John]. We sanction these things by a definition consonant with the holy Fathers: one who does not know how to obey the sacred canons is worthy neither to minister at the sacred altars nor to receive communion there.

C. XIII. Non conmunicet sacris altaribus qui nescit sacris obedire canonibus.

Item Gregorius. [lib. II. ep. 7. ad Iohannem Episcopum] Hec consona sanctis Patribus diffinitione sanccimus, ut qui sacris canonibus obedire nescit nec sacris ministrare, uel conmunionem capere sit dignus altaribus.

C. XIV. The rules established by the holy Fathers in synod are to be observed.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 1]. We establish that the rules brought forth until now by the holy Fathers in each synod are to be maintained.

> C. XIV. Seruandae sunt regulae a sanctis Patribus in sinodo statutae.
> Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 1.] A sanctis Patribus in unaquaque sinodo usque nunc prolatas regulas tenere statuimus.

C. XV. Let one who wishes his own statutes to be observed preserve the will and statutes of his predecessors.

Likewise Gregory to Montanus and Thomas, [Book V, epistle 12]. The order of justice and reason counsels that one who desires his commands to be observed by his successors should without doubt preserve the will and statutes of his predecessor.

> C. XV. Voluntatem et statuta suorum decessorum custodiat qui sua seruari uoluerit.
> Item Gregorius ad Montanum et Thomam. [lib. V. epist. 12.] Iusticiae ac rationis ordo suadet, ut qui sua a successoribus desiderat mandata seruari decessoris sui proculdubio uoluntatem et statuta custodiat.

C. XVI. One who does not preserve the statutes of the holy Fathers inviolate acts contrary to them.

Likewise Leo IV. We have therefore been made pastors of human beings by the Lord's permission, so that we ought in no way to transgress what our Fathers established either in the holy canons or in worldly laws. For we act contrary to their most salutary institutes if we do not preserve inviolate what they established by divine counsel. PART II. GRATIAN. Therefore, if the first see ought to observe the statutes of councils before all others; if it is necessary for it to watch over the condition of all the churches with an untiring disposition; if it is fitting that the things decreed by the Roman Pontiffs be observed by all; if those who do not know how to obey the sacred canons ought not to minister at the altars: it is evident that privileges by which the condition of the churches is confounded or disturbed ought not to be granted by the Apostolic contrary to the statutes of the holy canons. § 1. To these things answer is made thus: the sacrosanct Roman Church imparts right and authority to the sacred canons, but is not bound by them. For she possesses the right to establish canons, inasmuch as she is the head and hinge of all the churches, from whose rule no one is permitted to dissent. She therefore furnishes authority to the canons in such a way that she does not subject herself to them. But just as Christ, who gave the law, fulfilled that law carnally—being circumcised on the eighth day and presented with offerings in the temple on the fortieth day—so that he might sanctify it in himself, yet afterward, in order to show himself Lord of the law, cleansed a leper by touching him contrary to the letter of the law, and also excused the Apostles who, contrary to the letter of the sabbath, passed through the grainfields, plucked ears, and rubbed them in their hands, by the approved example of David, circumcision, and the temple, saying: "Have you not read what Abimelech did when David came to him, and he gave him the loaves of proposition, from which it was not lawful for any but the priests alone to eat, and he himself and his servants ate?" Likewise, a boy is circumcised on the eighth day according to the law, and you circumcise a man on the sabbath. Likewise, since a continual holocaust was offered under the law, and since, according to the law's command, a male on the fortieth day and a female on the eightieth day from the beginning of birth was presented with offerings in the temple—whence the priests offering sacrifices in the temple relax the letter of the sabbath and are without crime—then much more can the Son of Man relax the letter of the law, who is Lord even of the sabbath. Hence it is also said of him: "Jesus was teaching as one having authority," that is, as Lord of the law, adding to the moral precepts those things that were lacking for perfection, changing the shadow of figurative things into the light of spiritual understanding, not as their scribes, who, bound by the letter of the law, did not dare to add or alter anything. Thus also the pontiffs of the supreme see show reverence to canons established by themselves or by others through their authority, and by humbling themselves to them they observe those canons, so that they may present them to others as things to be observed. Sometimes, however, whether by commanding, defining, decreeing, or acting otherwise, they show themselves to be lords and founders of the decrees. In the chapters set forth above, therefore, the necessity of obeying is imposed upon others, but the authority of observing is shown to belong to the supreme Pontiffs, so that by observing what was handed down by them they may demonstrate to others that it is not to be contemned, after the example of Christ, who first received in himself the sacraments that he commanded the church to observe, so that he might sanctify them in himself. Therefore, as we have said, the first see ought to observe the things that it commanded by decreeing, not through the necessity of obeying but through the authority of imparting. It is therefore lawful for it to grant special privileges contrary to general decrees and by a special benefit to grant what is prohibited by a general decree. § 2. Although, if we diligently attend to the intention of the decrees, they are found to grant nothing at all contrary to the authority of the holy canons. For the sacred canons constitute something in such a way as to reserve the authority of their interpretation to the holy Roman Church. Indeed, those alone can interpret the canons who possess the right to establish them. Hence in some chapters of councils, when something is decreed to be observed, it is immediately added: "Unless the authority of the Roman Church shall have commanded otherwise," or: "The right of the holy Roman Church nevertheless being preserved in all things," or: "The apostolic authority nevertheless being preserved in all things." Therefore, whatever is defined by the sacred canons concerning tithes or any ecclesiastical affairs is to be understood as necessarily observed unless the authority of the Roman Church commands or permits it to be done otherwise. Therefore, when certain privileges are granted to some persons by the Apostolic, although they appear to sound something contrary to the general law, they are nevertheless not understood to grant anything contrary to that law, since by the authority of the law itself the privileges of individuals are reserved to the mother of all the churches. For privileges would not be granted to anyone if nothing special beyond the general law were granted to anyone. Indeed, they are called privileges as though private laws, because they generate a private law for individuals. Gregory, intimating this distinction, says: "If you claim this neither by general custom nor by privilege, it remains that you have usurped what you did." § 3. Likewise Jerome in his exposition of Jonah, [on c. 1]: "The privileges of individuals cannot make a common law." § 4. Therefore, as is gathered from the foregoing, the holy Roman Church has power to fortify any persons with her privileges and to grant certain things beyond the general decrees by a special benefit, provided nevertheless that the equity of reason is considered, so that she who is the mother of justice may be found to dissent from it in nothing—namely, so that privileges granted for the sake of religion, necessity, or service rendered do not, by relieving anyone, make him so rich that, through failure to consider the losses of many, they cast some into the misery of poverty—calling to mind that saying of the Apostle, who wrote to the Corinthians: “For we do not wish that there be relief for others but tribulation for you.” The sacred law of the princes, agreeing with this, says: “We command that rescripts elicited contrary to law be rejected by all judges, unless perhaps there is something that does not injure another and benefits the petitioner, or grants indulgence for a crime to the suppliants.” § 5. Likewise a constitution of the emperor to the people: “Neither things harmful to the fisc nor things contrary to law ought to be requested.” § 6. Therefore, the clerics of this baptismal church, fortified by the authority of the privilege, can claim for themselves in full the tithes of their diocese, unless perhaps the bishops are compelled by extreme necessity to receive their quarter and those clerics are shown to possess a surplus.

C. XVI. Contra statuta agit sanctorum Patrum qui non ea seruat intacta.

Item Leo IV. Ideo permittente Domino pastores hominum sumus effecti, ut quod Patres nostri siue in sanctis canonibus siue in mundanis affixere legibus excedere minime debeamus. Contra eorum quippe saluberrima agimus instituta, si quod ipsi diuino statuerunt consulto intactum non conseruamus. II. Pars. Gratian. Si ergo primam sedem statuta conciliorum pre omnibus seruare oportet, si pro statu omnium ecclesiarum necesse est illam inpigro uigilare affectu; si ea, que a Romanis Pontificibus decreta sunt, ab omnibus seruari conuenit; si illi, qui nesciunt sacris canonibus obedire, altaribus ministrare non debent: patet, quod contra statuta sanctorum canonum, quibus status ecclesiarum uel confundantur uel perturbantur, priuilegia ab Apostolico concedi non debent. §. 1. His ita respondetur: Sacrosancta Romana ecclesia ius et auctoritatem sacris canonibus inpertit, sed non eis alligatur. Habet enim ius condendi canones, utpote que caput et cardo est omnium ecclesiarum, a cuius regula dissentire nemini licet. Ita ergo canonibus auctoritatem prestat, ut se ipsam non subiciat eis. Sed sicut Christus, qui legem dedit, ipsam legem carnaliter inpleuit, octaua die circumcisus, quadragesimo die cum hostiis in templo presentatus, ut in se ipso eam sanctificaret, postea uero, ut se dominum legis ostenderet, contra litteram legis leprosum tangendo mundauit, Apostolos quoque contra litteram sabbati per sata pretergredientes, spicas uellentes et confricantes manibus suis, probabili exemplo Dauid, circumcisionis, et templi excusauit, dicens: "Non legistis, quid fecerit Abimelech, quando uenit ad eum Dauid, et dedit ei panes proposicionis, de quibus non licebat edere, nisi solis sacerdotibus, et comedit ipse et pueri eius?" Item octaua die secundum legem puer circumciditur, et uos in sabbato circumciditis hominem. Item, cum iuge holocaustum ex lege offeratur, cum masculus quadragesimo femina uero octuagesimo die ab ortu suae natiuitatis secundum legis inperium in templum cum hostiis presentaretur, unde sacerdotes hostias offerentes in templo litteram sabbati soluunt, et sine crimine sunt: tunc filius hominis multo magis ualet soluere litteram legis, qui est dominus etiam sabbati. Hinc etiam de eo dicitur: "Erat Iesus docens, tamquam potestatem habens," id est tamquam dominus legis, addens moralibus ea, que deerant ad perfectionem, umbram figuralium in lucem spiritualis intelligentiae conmutans, non tamquam scribae eorum, qui littera legis astricti non audebant aliquid addere uel conmutare. Sic et summae sedis Pontifices canonibus a se siue ab aliis sua auctoritate conditis reuerentiam exhibent, et eis se humiliando ipsos custodiunt, ut aliis obseruandos exhibeant. Nonnumquam uero seu iubendo, seu diffiniendo, seu decernendo, seu aliter agendo, se decretorum dominos et conditores esse ostendunt. In premissis ergo capitulis aliis inponitur necessitas obsequendi: summis uero Pontificibus ostenditur inesse auctoritas obseruandi, ut a se tradita obseruando aliis non contempnenda demonstrent, exemplo Christi, qui sacramenta, que ecclesiae seruanda mandauit, primum in se ipso suscepit, ut ea in se ipso sanctificaret. Oportet ergo primam sedem, ut diximus, obseruare ea, que mandauit decernendo, non necessitate obsequendi, sed auctoritate inpertiendi. Licet itaque sibi contra generalia decreta specialia priuilegia indulgere, et speciali beneficio concedere quod generali prohibetur decreto. §. 2. Quamquam si decretorum intentionem diligenter aduertamus, nequaquam contra sanctorum canonum auctoritatem aliquid concedere inueniantur: Sacri siquidem canones ita aliquid constituunt, ut suae interpretationis auctoritatem sanctae Romanae ecclesiae reseruent. Ipsi namque soli canones ualent interpretari, qui ius condendi eos habent. Unde in nonnullis capitulis conciliorum, cum aliquid obseruandum decernitur, statim subinfertur: "Nisi auctoritas Romanae ecclesiae inperauerit aliter," uel: "saluo tamen in omnibus iure sanctae Romanae ecclesiae," uel: "salua tamen in omnibus apostolica auctoritate." Quecumque ergo de decimis uel quibuslibet ecclesiasticis negociis sacris canonibus diffiniuntur, intelligenda sunt necessario seruari, nisi auctoritas Romanae ecclesiae aliter fieri mandauerit uel permiserit. Cum ergo aliqua priuilegia ab Apostolico aliquibus conceduntur, etsi contra generalem legem aliquid sonare uideantur, non tamen contra ipsam aliquid concedere intelliguntur, cum ipsius legis auctoritate priuilegia singulorum penes matrem omnium ecclesiarum reseruentur. Neque enim priuilegia aliquibus concederentur, si preter generalem legem nulli aliquid speciale indulgeretur. Priuilegia namque dicuntur quasi priuata legia, eo quod priuatam legem singulis generent. Quam distinctionem Gregorius innuens ait: "Si hoc neque consuetudine generali neque priuilegio uendicas, restat te usurpasse quod fecisti." §. 3. Item Ieronimus in expositione Ionae: [ad c. 1.] "priuilegia singulorum non possunt legem facere conmunem." §. 4. Valet ergo, ut ex premissis colligitur, sancta Romana ecclesia quoslibet suis priuilegiis munire, et extra generalia decreta quedam speciali beneficio indulgere, considerata tamen rationis equitate, ut que mater iusticiae est in nullo ab ea dissentire inueniatur, ut priuilegia uidelicet, que ob religionis, uel necessitatis, uel exhibiti obsequii gratiam conceduntur, neminem releuando ita diuitem faciant, ut, multorum detrimenta non circumspiciendo, in paupertatis miseriam nonnullos deiciant; illud Apostoli ad memoriam reuocantes, quod ad Chorinthios scribens ait: "Non enim uolumus, ut aliis sit remissio, uobis autem tribulatio." Cui sacra lex principum concordans ait: "Rescripta contra ius elicita ab omnibus iudicibus precipimus refutari, nisi forte aliquid est, quod non ledat alium et prosit petenti, uel crimen supplicantibus indulgeat." §. 5. Item constitutio inperatoris ad populum: "Nec dampnosa fisco, nec iuri contraria postulari oportet." §. 6. Clerici ergo huius baptismalis ecclesiae priuilegii auctoritate muniti, suae diocesis decimas ex integro sibi uendicare ualent, nisi forte summa necessitate episcopi cogantur ad quartam suam accipiendam, et illi superhabundare monstrentur.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. That later privileges cannot derogate from earlier ones is proved by the authority of Anacletus, who, writing to all bishops and the other priests of Christ, says, [in epistle 1, c. 37]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem antiquioribus priuilegiis subsequentibus derogari non possit auctoritate Anacleti probatur, qui, scribens omnibus Episcopis et reliquis Christi sacerdotibus, ait: [in epist. I. c. 37.]

C. I. Let the privileges of churches be preserved undefiled at all times.

We have decreed that the privileges of churches and priests remain undefiled and inviolate at all times. We confirm the laws of the church by apostolic authority, and we remove foreign judgments.

C. I. Ecclesiarum priuilegia cunctis temporibus intemerata seruentur.

Priuilegia ecclesiarum et sacerdotum intemerata et inuiolata decreuimus cunctis manere temporibus. Leges ecclesiae apostolica auctoritate firmamus, et peregrina submouemus iudicia.

C. II. The privileges of churches ought neither to be altered by novelty nor overthrown by dishonesty.

Likewise Pope Leo to Emperor Marcian, [epistle 52, otherwise 54]. The privileges of churches and monasteries, established by the authority of the holy Fathers, can be overthrown by no dishonesty and altered by no novelty. In faithfully executing this work with Christ's aid, it is necessary that the pontiffs of this holy see exhibit persevering service. For a dispensation has been entrusted to us, and it tends to our guilt if the rules of paternal sanctions are violated with our consent or through our negligence.

> C. II. Nec nouitate mutari, nec inprobitate conuelli ecclesiarum priuilegia debent.
> Item Leo Papa Marciano Augusto. [ep. LII. al. LIV.] Priuilegia ecclesiarum et monasteriorum, sanctorum Patrum auctoritate instituta, nulla possunt inprobitate conuelli, nulla nouitate mutari. In quo opere auxiliante Christo fideliter exequendo necesse est huius sanctae sedis Pontifices perseuerantem exhibere famulatum. Dispensatio enim nobis credita est, et ad nostrum reatum tendit, si paternarum regulae sanctionum nobis consentientibus uel negligentibus uiolentur.

C. III. No one ought to divest a church of the privilege of its dignity.

Likewise Gregory to Augustine, bishop of the English, [response 9]. We bestow no authority upon you over the bishops of Gaul, because from the ancient times of our predecessors the bishop of Arles received the pallium, and we ought by no means to deprive him of the authority he received. Therefore, if it should happen that Your Fraternity passes into the provinces of Gaul and something must be done by authority, let it be done with the aforesaid bishop of Arles, lest that which the ancient institution of the Fathers established be omitted. But we commit all the bishops of the Britons to Your Fraternity, so that the untaught may be taught and the weak strengthened by persuasion.

> C. III. Priuilegio suae dignitatis aliquis ecclesiam exuere non debet.
> Item Gregorius Augustino, Anglorum Episcopo. [respons. 9.] In Galliarum episcopis nullam tibi auctoritatem tribuimus, quia ab antiquis predecessorum nostrorum temporibus pallium Arelatensis episcopus accepit, quem nos priuare auctoritate percepta minime debemus. Si ergo contingat, ut fraternitas tua ad Galliarum prouincias transeat, et aliquid ex auctoritate agendum fuerit, cum predicto Arelatensi agatur episcopo, ne pretermitti possit hoc, quod antiqua Patrum institutio inuenit. Brittannorum uero omnes episcopos tuae fraternitati conmittimus, ut indocti doceantur, infirmi persuasione roborentur.

C. IV. The Apostolic ought not to destroy the statutes of his apostolic predecessors.

The same to Bishop Felix, [Book XII, epistle 31]. If I destroyed the things that our predecessors established, I would justly be proved to be not a builder but an overthrower, as the voice of truth testifies when it says: "Every kingdom divided against itself" will be made desolate, and every science and law divided against itself will be destroyed.

> C. IV. Statuta Apostolicorum decessorum Apostolicus destruere non debet.
> Idem Felici Episcopo. [lib. XII. epist. 31.] Si ea destruerem, que antecessores nostri statuerunt, non constructor, sed euersor esse iuste conprobarer, testante ueritatis uoce, que ait: "Omne regnum in se ipsum diuisum," desolabitur et omnis scientia et lex aduersum se diuisa destruetur.

C. V. Let a metropolitan retain undefiled the right of the dignity handed down to him from antiquity.

Likewise Pope Leo, [epistle 82, otherwise 84, to Anastasius, c. 2]. Therefore, according to the canons of the holy Fathers, founded by the Spirit of God and consecrated by the reverence of the whole world, we decree that the metropolitan bishops of the individual provinces—over whom the care of Your Fraternity is extended by our delegation—shall possess undefiled the right of the dignity handed down to them from antiquity, in such a way that they depart from the established rules through neither negligence nor presumption.

> C. V. Metropolitanus ius dignitatis traditae sibi antiquitus intemeratum obtineat.
> Item Leo Papa. [epist. LXXXII. al. LXXXIV. ad Anastasium, c. 2.] Igitur secundum sanctorum Patrum canones, spiritu Dei conditos et totius mundi reuerentia consecratos, metropolitanos singularum prouinciarum episcopos, quibus ex delegatione nostra fraternitatis tuae cura pretenditur, ius traditae sibi antiquitus dignitatis intemeratum habere decernimus, ita, ut a regulis prestitutis nulla aut negligentia aut presumptione discedant.

C. VI. The privileges of metropolitans ought to be preserved unshaken.

Likewise Pope Hormisdas, [in the epistle to Bishop John]. With the privileges of the metropolitans preserved, we delegate to you the office of the Apostolic See, so that, after these matters have been examined, both whether those things recently commanded by us are observed and whatever concerning ecclesiastical causes shall come to Your Revelation may be disclosed to us through your report. It will belong to your diligence and solicitude to show yourself in those things that are enjoined to be such that you imitate the faith and integrity of him whose care you undertake.

> C. VI. Metropolitanorum inconuulsa seruari oportet priuilegia.
> Item Ormisda Papa. [in epistola ad Iohannem Episc.] Seruatis priuilegiis metropolitanorum uices uobis apostolicae sedis delegamus, ut inspectis istis, siue ea, que a nobis sunt nuper mandata, seruentur, siue, que de ecclesiasticis causis tuae reuelationi contigerit, sub tua nobis insinuatione pandantur. Erit hoc studii ac sollicitudinis tuae, ut talem te in his, que iniunguntur, exhibeas, ut fidem integritatemque eius, cuius curam suscipis, imiteris.

C. VII. Let apostolic decrees be violated by no presumption.

Likewise Gregory to Boniface, first defender, [Book VII, epistle 17]. We establish that the decrees of our institution, which have been arranged by privileges and ordination, are to be preserved with perpetual stability and without any opposition, whether those things that we decreed in writing or those that appear to have been arranged in our presence; and we decree that they are not to be overthrown or altered in whole or in part by any of the pontiffs on any occasion. For it is exceedingly harsh, and especially inimical to the good morals of priests, for anyone to strive under any pretext of reason to rescind things that have been well ordained and by his example to teach others that his own constitutions may sometimes be dissolved.

> C. VII. Decreta apostolica nulla presumptione uiolentur.
> Item Gregorius Bonifatio primo Defensori. [lib. VII. epist. 17] Institutionis nostrae decreta, que sunt priuilegiis et ordinatione disposita, perpetua stabilitate et sine aliqua constituimus refragatione seruari, siue que scripto decreuimus, seu que in nostra presencia uidentur esse disposita, nec a quoquam pontificum in totum uel in partem ea qualibet occasione conuelli decreuimus uel mutari. Nam nimis est asperum, et precipue bonis sacerdotum moribus inimicum, niti quempiam quantacumque rationis excusatione que bene sunt ordinata rescindere, et exemplo docere ceteros sua quandoque posse constituta dissoluere.

C. VIII. The Apostolic ought to preserve the privileges of churches unharmed.

The same to Dominicus, bishop of Carthage, [Book II, indiction 10, epistle 39]. Concerning ecclesiastical privileges, let Your Fraternity hold without hesitation what it writes: just as we defend our own rights, so we preserve their rights for each of the individual churches; nor, with favor prevailing, will I impart to anyone more than he merits, nor, with ambition urging, will I derogate from anyone what belongs to his right. Rather, I desire to honor my brothers in all things and for each to be sustained by honor, provided that there is nothing that one may rightfully oppose to another.

C. VIII. Priuilegia ecclesiarum Apostolicus debet seruare illesa.

Idem Dominico, Cartaginensi Episcopo. [lib. II. Indict. 10. epist. 39.] De ecclesiasticis priuilegiis quod uestra fraternitas scribit, hoc postposita dubitatione teneat, quia, sicut nostra defendimus, ita singulis quibusque ecclesiis sua iura seruamus, nec cuilibet gratia fauente ultra quam meretur inpertior, nec ulli hoc, quod sui iuris est, ambitu stimulante derogabo: sed fratres meos per omnia honorare cupio, sicque honore singulos subuehi, dummodo non sit quod alteri iure ab altero possit opponi.

C. IX. What has been reasonably defined ought in no way to be violated.

Likewise to Vigilius, bishop of Arles, [Book VII, epistle 117]. Since the desire of a pious will and the intention of a praiseworthy definition are always to be aided by sacerdotal endeavors, the care of solicitude must be applied so that those things arranged or ordained for the peace of religious life can neither be neglected through dissimulation nor disturbed by any presumption; but just as what reason advantageously required obtained definition, so what has been defined ought not to be violated.

C. IX. Quod rationabiliter diffinitum est nullo modo uiolari debet.

Item Vigilio, Arelatensi Episcopo. [lib. VII. ep. 117.] Cum piae desiderium uoluntatis, et laudandae diffinitionis intentio sacerdotalibus sit semper studiis adiuuanda, cura est sollicitudinis adhibenda, ut ea, que pro quiete religiosae conuersationis sunt disposita uel ordinata, nec dissimulatio negligere, nec quedam ualeat presumptio perturbare: sed sicut hoc, quod ratio exigebat utiliter, obtinuit diffiniri, ita quod diffinitum est non debet uiolari.

C. X. The Apostolic does injury to himself when he disturbs the rights of his brothers.

The same, [to Bishop Natalis, Book II, epistle 37]. As to what you say, that the things handed down or preserved by my predecessors also ought to be observed in our times: let it be far from me to infringe the statutes of my forebears with respect to my fellow bishops in any church, because I do injury to myself if I disturb the rights of my brothers.

C. X. Sibi iniuriam facit Apostolicus qui fratrum suorum iura perturbat.

Idem. [ad Natalem Episcopum, lib. II. epist. 37.] Quod uero dicitis, nostris temporibus debere seruari que a meis quoque decessoribus tradita uel custodita sunt, absit hoc a me, ut statuta maiorum consacerdotibus meis in qualibet ecclesia infringam, quia michi iniuriam facio, si fratrum meorum iura perturbo.

C. XI. Let those things established by the Apostles and their successors be violated by no presumption.

Likewise Pope Julius, [epistle 1 to the easterners, c. 4]. With every excess of usurpation cut away, let no one presume those things that do not appear to have been granted to him. § 1. Let the things established by the Apostles and their successors be neglected by no sloth, violated by no dissension, and disturbed by no contention.

C. XI. Nulla presumptione uiolentur que ab Apostolis et eorum successoribus sunt instituta.

Item Iulius Papa. [epist. I. ad Orientales, c. 4.] Amputato totius usurpationis excessu nullus presumat que sibi non uidentur esse concessa. §. 1. Ea que sunt ab Apostolis eorumque successoribus instituta, nulla desidia negligantur, nulla dissensione uiolentur, nulla concertatione turbentur.

C. XII. Things reasonably ordained ought to be disturbed by no opposition.

Likewise Pope Gregory, [Book VII, indiction 2, epistle 60, to the illustrious Praerectus]. It is altogether fitting to ecclesiastical moderation that the things that have been ordained or decided ought to be disturbed thereafter by no opposition.

C. XII. Que rationabiliter ordinata sunt nulla debent refragatione turbari.

Item Gregorius Papa. [lib. VII. Indict. 2. epist. 60. Praerecti Illustri] Ecclesiasticae moderationi est omnino conueniens, ut que ordinata fuerint, uel decisa, nulla in posterum debeant refragatione turbari.

C. XIII. Let things done contrary to the laws be regarded as not done.

The same in the Register, [Book VII, indiction 2, epistle 7, to Januarius of Cagliari]. It has been openly sanctioned by an imperial constitution that things done contrary to the laws are to be regarded not only as ineffectual but even as not done.

C. XIII. Que contra leges fiunt pro infectis habeantur.

Idem in Registro. [lib. VII. Indict. 2. epist. 7. Ianuario Caralitano] Inperiali constitutione sancitum est aperte, ut ea, que contra leges fiunt, non solum inutilia, sed etiam pro infectis habenda sint.

[C. XIV.]

From Book I of the Code, under the title On Petitions to Be Offered to the Emperor, Emperor Constantine. Things harmful to the fisc and things contrary to law ought not to be requested.

[C. XIV.]

Codicis libro I. titulo de precibus inperatori offerendis, Inperator Constantinus. Nec dampnosa fisco, nec iuri contraria postulari oportet.

[C. XV.] Emperors Theodosius and Valentinian.

We command that rescripts elicited contrary to law be rejected by all judges, unless perhaps there is something that does not injure another and benefits the petitioner, or grants indulgence for a crime to the suppliants.

[C. XV.] Inp. Theodosius et Valentinianus.

Rescripta contra ius elicita ab omnibus iudicibus precipimus refutari, nisi forte sit aliquid, quod non ledat alium, et prosit petenti, uel crimen supplicantibus indulgeat.

C. XVI. A rescript that accords with the principle of right and the laws merits effect.

Likewise Pope Pelagius to Count John. To the one saying that he had sacred commands before him, we responded that he ought to know that the most clement prince himself established by general laws that those sacred commands granted to the desire of each suppliant prevail and are committed to effect which accord with the principle of right and the laws; but those that perhaps are obtained by subreption or false petitions bring no remedy to the suppliants. GRATIAN. Rescripts, whether they are annotations or pragmatic sanctions, ought to have an express condition in themselves: "If the petitions rest upon truth." For a lying petitioner ought to lack the things obtained, and those to whom the writings are directed are to be punished if they have forbidden the falsehoods of the petitions to be challenged. Hence Emperors Diocletian, Maximian, and Constantius in Book I of the Code, under the title If Contrary to Law or Public Utility: § 1. "When an objection of falsehoods has been interposed—whether a falsehood is found in a narration of law or of fact, or in fraudulent silence—we command that the judge appointed ought to investigate according to the tenor of the truth, not the assertion of the petitioner, and in accordance with this it is fitting to render sentence concerning the case." Likewise Emperor Constantine: "We command that judges who have forbidden the falsity of petitions to be challenged be punished by a fine of ten pounds of gold." Emperors Theodosius and Valentinian: § 3. "And if a lying petitioner shall present a sacred oracle consonant with the laws, let him wholly lack the things obtained; and if the liar's excessive dishonesty is found, let him also be subject to the severity of the judge." Likewise Constantine: § 4. "And if not investigation but execution is commanded, it is fitting that the truth of the petitions be investigated, so that if fraud intervenes, the whole matter may be investigated." Emperor Anastasius: § 5. "We admonish all judges of every greater or lesser administration of the entire commonwealth that they should permit no rescript, no pragmatic sanction, and no sacred annotation that appears adverse to general law or public utility to be produced in the adjudication of any litigation; but let them not doubt that the general sacred constitutions are to be observed in every way." Under the title of the Code On Diverse Rescripts, Emperors Diocletian and Maximian: § 6. "We sanction that the authentic and original rescripts themselves, even those signed by our hand, not copies of them, be formally presented." Emperor Constantine: § 7. "If any personal grants are discovered without day and consul, let them lack authority." Emperor Zeno: § 8. "We command that all rescripts—whether issued to the person of the petitioners or to any judge, whether called an annotation or any pragmatic sanction—be produced under this condition: 'If the petitions rest upon truth'; nor may the petitioner obtain any fruit of an oracle procured, although he asserts its truth in court, unless the question of the reliability of the petitions is shown to have been inserted in the imperial grant. For both the magnificent man the quaestor and the respectable masters of the bureaus who shall have dictated any divine response without the aforesaid addition, and the judges who shall have received it, will incur reproof; and the memorial clerks of any bureau, or pragmaticaries, or assistants to the primicerius, who shall have dared to write things unlawfully dictated will be struck with the loss of their belt."

C. XVI. Rescriptum meretur effectum, quod cum iuris et legum ratione concordat.

Item Pelagius Papa Iohanni Comiti. Dicenti, sacras iussiones se habere pre manibus, respondimus scire illum oportere, quod ipse clementissimus princeps generalibus legibus constituerit, illa sacra uniuscuiusque supplicantis desiderio concessa preualere et effectui mancipari, que cum iuris et legum ratione concordant; ea uero, que subreptione uel falsis precibus forsitan inpetrantur, nullum remedium supplicantibus ferre. Gratian. Rescripta, siue sint adnotationes siue pragmaticae sanctiones, expressam debent habere in se condicionem: Si preces ueritate nituntur. Mendax enim precator debet carere inpetratis, et quibus scripta diriguntur sunt puniendi, si precum mendacia uetuerint argui. Unde Inpp. Diocletianus, et Maximianus, et Constantius libro I. Codicis titulo si contra ius uel utilitatem publicam: §. 1. "Prescriptione mendaciorum opposita, siue in iuris narratione mendacium reperiatur, siue in facti, siue in tacendi fraude, pro tenore ueritatis, non deprecantis affirmatione, datum iudicem cognoscere debere, et secundum hoc de causa conuenit ferre sententiam." Item Inp. Constantinus:

"Puniri iubemus decem librarum auri mulcta iudices, qui uetuerunt precum argui falsitatem." Inpp. Theodosius et Valentinianus: §. 3. "Et si legibus consentaneum sacrum oraculum mendax precator attulerit, careat penitus inpetratis, et, si nimia mentientis inuenitur inprobitas, etiam seueritati subiaceat iudicantis." Item Constantinus: §. 4. "Et si non cognitio, sed executio, mandatur, de ueritate precum inquiri oportet, ut si fraus interuenit de omni negocio cognoscatur." Inp. Anastasius: §. 5. "Omnes cuiuscumque maioris uel minoris amministrationis uniuersae reipublicae iudices monemus, ut nullum rescriptum, nullam pragmaticam sanctionem, nullam sacram annotationem, que generali iuri uel utilitati publicae aduersa esse uideatur in disceptatione cuiuslibet litigii patiantur proferri; sed generales sacras constitutiones modis omnibus non dubitent obseruandas." Codicis titulo de diuersis rescriptis Inpp. Diocletianus et Maximianus: §. 6. "Sanccimus, ut autentica ipsa atque originalia rescripta, etiam ex nostra manu subscripta, non exempla eorum insinuentur." Inp. Constantinus: §. 7. "Si qua beneficia personalia sine die et consule fuerint deprehensa, auctoritate careant." Inp. Zeno: §. 8. "Uniuersa rescripta, siue in personam precantium siue ad quemlibet iudicem manauerint, que uel annotatio, uel queuis pragmatica sanctio nominetur, sub ea condicione proferri precipimus, si preces ueritate nituntur, nec aliquem fructum precator oraculi percipiat inpetrati, licet in iudicio asseueret ueritatem, nisi questio fidei precum inperiali beneficio monstretur inserta. Nam et magnificus uir questor, et uiri spectabiles magistri scriniorum, qui sine prefata adiectione qualecumque diuinum responsum dictauerint, et iudices, qui susceperint, reprehensionem subibunt, et qui illicite dictata ausi fuerint scribere cuiuscumque scrinii memoriales, seu pragmaticarii, uel adiutores primicerii; amissione cinguli ferientur."

C. XVII. The privileges of churches ought to be overthrown by no dishonesty.

Likewise Pope Leo, [epistle 52, otherwise 54, to Emperor Marcian]. The privileges of churches, established by the canons of the saints and fixed by the decrees of venerable Nicaea, can be overthrown by no dishonesty or altered by novelty. Likewise Pope Nicholas, presiding over a universal synod, said, [in the Council of Rome, last chapter]:

C. XVII. Priuilegia ecclesiarum nulla debent inprobitate conuelli.

Item Leo Papa. [epist. LII. al. LIV. ad Marcianum Augustum] Priuilegia ecclesiarum, sanctorum canonibus instituta, et uenerabilis Nicenae fixa decretis, nulla possunt inprobitate conuelli, uel nouitate mutari. Item Nykolaus Papa, uniuersali sinodo presidens, dixit: [in Concilio Romano, c. ult.]

C. XVIII. Let one who has contemned observing the commands or decrees of the Roman Pontiffs be anathema.

If anyone shall have contemned dogmas, commands, prohibitions, sanctions, or decrees salutarily promulgated by the prelate of the Apostolic See for the Catholic faith or ecclesiastical discipline, for the correction of imminent or future evils, let him be anathema.

Likewise Gelasius to Cresconius and John, bishops of Mesalia, among other things:

> C. XVIII. Anathema sit qui mandata uel decreta Romanorum Pontificum seruare contempserit.
> Si quis dogmata, mandata, interdicta, sanctiones uel decreta pro catholica fide uel ecclesiastica disciplina, pro correctione inminentium uel futurorum malorum a sedis apostolicae Presule salubriter promulgata contempserit, anathema sit.
> Item Gelasius Cresconio Iohanni, Mesaliae Episcopis, inter cetera:

C. XIX. Successors ought to observe the statutes of their predecessors.

Just as it is fitting for a successor to preserve the statutes of his predecessors as lawful and just, so also he ought to correct things badly done. Hence also Arcadius and Honorius:

> C. XIX. Statuta priorum successores seruare oportet.
> Decessorum statuta sicut legitima et iusta successorem custodire conuenit, ita debet etiam male facta corrigere. Hinc etiam Archadius et Honorius:

[C. XX.]

We command, they say, that whatever was established by our forebears at diverse times concerning the sacrosanct churches remain inviolate and uncorrupted. Therefore, let nothing be altered in the privileges; let protection be extended to all who serve the churches, because in our times we desire reverence to be increased rather than anything to be altered from those things formerly granted. The same, [law 30]. § 1. By the present sanction we do not so much command anything new as confirm those things that appear to have been granted long ago. Therefore, under threat even of punishment, we prohibit mutilating the privileges that reverence for religion obtained long ago, so that those also who obey the church may enjoy its benefits. The same, [law 34]. § 2. If the privileges of the venerable church shall have been either violated by anyone's rashness or neglected through dissimulation, let the offense be punished with a condemnation of twelve pounds of gold, as was also formerly established. And let the privileges themselves nevertheless possess their fullest force in all things. Likewise Pelagius to Armentarius, master of soldiers, among other things:

> [C. XX.]
> Quecumque, inquiunt, a parentibus nostris diuersis sunt statuta temporibus, manere inuiolata atque incorrupta circa sacrosanctas ecclesias precipimus. Nichil igitur a priuilegiis inmutetur, omnibus, qui ecclesiis deseruiunt, tuicio deferatur, quia temporibus nostris addi pocius reuerenciae cupimus, quam ex his, que olim prestita sunt, inmutari. Idem: [leg. 30.] §. 1. Non tam nouum aliquid presenti sanctione precipimus, quam illa, que olim uidentur indulta, firmamus. Priuilegia igitur, que olim reuerentia religionis obtinuit, mutilare sub penae etiam interminatione prohibemus ita, ut hii quoque, qui ecclesiae obtemperant, ipsius beneficiis perfruantur. Idem: [leg. 34.] §. 2. Si ecclesiae uenerabilis priuilegia cuiusquam fuerint uel temeritate uiolata, uel dissimulatione neglecta, conmissum duodecim librarum auri (sicut etiam prius constitutum est) condempnatione plectatur. Ipsaque priuilegia nichilominus plenissimum per omnia obtineant uigorem. Item Pelagius Armentario, Magistro militum, inter cetera:

C. XXI. Let it not be lawful for a pontiff to depart from the right of the church that is confirmed by the authority of documents.

After the rights of the church have also been confirmed by the authority of intervening documents, let a pontiff in no way be permitted to have free license to depart from them, even if he wishes. GRATIAN. Therefore, if the privileges of monasteries or any churches are preserved inviolate by the authority of Leo, Gregory, Gelasius, and some other pontiffs of the holy Roman Church; if things done contrary to the laws are to be regarded as not done; if a pontiff does not have free license to depart from documents by which the rights of a church are confirmed: it is evident that later privileges cannot derogate from earlier ones, nor by their authority will any exception be raised against them, since even if they were issued specially against them, they would be regarded as not done. PART II. § 1. To these things answer is made thus: by her authority the holy Roman Church has power to separate things joined and to join things separated, provided the equity of reason is considered. Hence, in view either of piety or of necessity, she has power to alter either wholly or in part things once granted by her. For because of the necessity of correcting vices, the privileges of many churches are either diminished or wholly altered, whether personally or generally. § 2. Personally, according to this: "One who abuses the power permitted to him altogether merits losing his privilege."

C. XXI. Non liceat Pontifici a iure ecclesiae discedere, quod documentorum auctoritate firmatur.

Posteaquam ecclesiae iura documentorum quoque intercedentium fuerint auctoritate firmata, nullatenus ab his discedendi liberam Pontifex, uel si uult, permittatur habere licentiam. Gratian. Si ergo priuilegia monasteriorum uel quarumlibet ecclesiarum auctoritate Leonis, Gregorii, Gelasii et nonnullorum aliorum Pontificum sanctae Romanae ecclesiae inuiolata seruantur; si ea, que contra leges fiunt, pro infectis habenda sunt; si Pontifex non habet liberam licentiam discedendi a documentis, quibus iura ecclesiae firmantur: patet, quod posteriora priuilegia antiquioribus derogare non possunt, nec eorum auctoritate eis aliqua obicietur exceptio, cum etiam, si contra illa specialiter ferent, pro infectis essent habenda. II. Pars. §. 1. His ita respondetur: Sancta Romana ecclesia sua auctoritate congregata ualet disiungere, et disiuncta congregare; rationis tamen equitate considerata. Unde uel pietatis, uel necessitatis intuitu semel a se concessa ualet uel totum uel in partem conmutare. Pro necessitate namque corrigendorum uiciorum priuilegia multarum ecclesiarum uel inminuuntur, uel penitus inmutantur, siue personaliter siue generaliter. §. 2. Personaliter iuxta illud: "Priuilegium omnino meretur amittere qui permissa sibi abutitur potestate."

C. XXII. Let one who usurps what he did not receive lose what he has.

Likewise Pope Silverius to Bishop Vigilius, [epistle 2]. Thus it is fitting that the faith of the holy Fathers be preserved in the Catholic Church: one who with reprehensible rashness has assumed what he did not receive should lose what he possessed.

C. XXII. Quod habet amittat qui quod non accepit usurpat.

Item Siluerius Papa Vigilio Episcopo. [ep. II.] Sic decet fidem sanctorum Patrum in ecclesia seruari catholica, ut quod habuit amittat qui inprobabili temeritate quod non accepit assumpserit.

C. XXIII. One who does not lawfully use his power loses his privilege.

Likewise Simplicius, [epistle 2], to John, bishop of Ravenna, shortly after those things by which he prohibited him from an unlawful ordination. But we declare that if after this you shall presume anything of this kind and perhaps believe you can make anyone a bishop, presbyter, or deacon against his will, know that the ordinations of the church of Ravenna or Emilia are to be taken away from you.

> C. XXIII. Priuilegium amittit qui sua potestate non legitime utitur.
> Item Simplicius [epist. II.] Iohanni, Episcopo Rauennati post pauca, quibus eum ab illicita ordinatione prohibuit. Denunciamus autem, quod si posthec aliquid tale presumpseris, et aliquem seu episcopum, uel presbiterum, seu diaconem inuitum facere forte credideris, ordinationes tibi Rauennatis uel Emiliensis ecclesiae noueris auferendas.

C. XXIV. Those who consecrate an unworthy person lose the right of ordaining.

Likewise Pope Leo, [epistle 85, otherwise 87, to the African bishops]. If any bishops shall have consecrated as priest a person of a sort that it is not lawful for him to be, even if they in some way escape loss of their own honor, they will thereafter not possess the right of ordination, nor will they ever take part in that sacrament which, with divine judgment neglected, they bestowed upon an unworthy person. GRATIAN. Generally, as when the episcopal dignity is perpetually withdrawn from a city that was accustomed to kill its bishops. Hence Pope Gelasius writes:

> C. XXIV. Ius ordinandi amittunt qui inmeritum consecrant.
> Item Leo Papa. [epist. LXXXV. al. LXXXVII. ad Episcopos Africanos] Si qui episcopi talem consecrauerint sacerdotem, qualem esse non liceat, etiamsi aliquo modo dampnum proprii honoris euaserint, ordinationis ius ulterius non habebunt nec umquam ei sacramento intererunt, quod, neglecto diuino iudicio, inmerito prestiterunt. Gratian. Generaliter, ueluti dum ciuitati episcopalis dignitas perpetuo subtrahitur, que suos episcopos interimere consueuit. Unde Gelasius Papa scribit:

C. XXV. The episcopal dignity is withdrawn from a city that kills its prelates.

Thus the repeated slaughter of the pontiffs of Sila confounded us by the atrocity of its horrifying crime, so that the determination of our deliberation hesitated for a long time, since we both detested imposing a bishop upon examples of parricide and judged that a church, however destitute, ought not to be left so entirely abandoned. Wherefore, now avoiding as it were a sacrilegious use and custom, we have judged that provision should be made for religion to the extent that, in the manner of a parish, it be governed by priests placed outside it, since it has learned to kill with the sword the pastors dwelling there; and that by an unheard-of crime—for it is nowhere at all read that this has happened even in those provinces afflicted by continual and diverse incursions of wars—a city should be found that, without a persecutor, strikes down the prelates ministering the Christian faith to it. Care must therefore be taken that its deadly destruction be healed by the cessation of its own bishops, and that the occasion of so great a fury at least be removed in this way: if no settled person against whom this cruelty can be perpetrated is present there. In this manner either that city, when it has no one against whom it may rage, may desist from rashness of this kind, or it may not offer to others the dire contagion of imitation. Therefore, let the city that cruelly stains with shed blood the sacred dignity placed within its bosom be in need of episcopal assistance supplied to it from elsewhere; in either case it is to be punished by this vengeance, whether it commits this when incited by domestic impulse or by external furies. Therefore, let Your Affection furnish the ministry of visitation to the church placed in this condition, and, either assembling together or by turns, as the quality and cause of the matters shall demand, present the divine mysteries to the ungrateful, lest, while we avoid the tares, we appear to pass by the Lord's wheat. PART III. GRATIAN. Through the necessity of hostility or poverty, episcopal sees are also either transferred or two are combined into one, just as above, in the title concerning changes of bishops, blessed Gregory is read to have done. Therefore, the privileges of churches are not judged to remain inviolate in such a way that, when certain causes intervene, they cannot be derogated from by apostolic authority; otherwise the multitude of churches would be reduced to few, since innumerable churches are frequently found to have been founded within the dioceses of others. Therefore, let the privileges of churches be preserved unshaken at all times, so that, without the authority of the one by whom they were given, it may be lawful for no one to act against them. § 1. But that saying of Pope Symmachus is objected: "The possessions that each person has left to a church at his discretion, etc.," which is written above under the title concerning alienation of ecclesiastical things. Hence it is given to be understood that those things conferred from the right of each church, whether in view of necessity, as upon travelers, or in view of piety, as upon religious houses, are to be possessed by those upon whom they are conferred not perpetually but temporally. Although that saying of Symmachus can be referred to regard for necessity, not to consideration of piety—namely, so that the things necessity counseled should be bestowed upon travelers or captives, but not those things granted to religious houses for the peace of religious life, are prohibited from being possessed perpetually. Or rather it is to be understood of both: namely, that just as those suffering necessity are compelled, when the necessity ceases, to renounce the benefits that the consideration of mercy granted them, so those living religiously, when they cease from religion, are divested of the privileges that religious life merited. Therefore, the privileges granted to religious houses are either to be understood in the case in which provision is made for them in such a way that nothing is derogated from anyone—namely, that by the authority of privileges they are not compelled to pay tithes to anyone from newly cultivated lands whose tithes had been assigned to no one—or, if on account of the pressing necessity of the time provision cannot be made for them unless derogation is made from others, the authority of the privileges appears to be preserved in such a way that their poverty is relieved, not so that, by the increase of their riches and the no small extension of their possessions, baptismal or parochial churches are utterly destroyed.

C. XXV. Episcopalis dignitas ciuitati subtrahitur, que suos presules interimit.

Ita nos Sillanorum cedes geminata pontificum horrendi criminis atrocitate confudit, ut diu constitutio nostrae deliberationis hesitaret, dum et ingerere quemquam parricidalibus exemplis detestaremur antistitem, et ecclesiam utcumque destitutam non usque adeo iudicaremus relinquendam. Quapropter iam uelut usum consuetudinemque sacrilegam declinantes, eatenus duximus religioni consulendum, ut parrochiae uice ab extrinsecus positis sacerdotibus gubernetur, que ibidem conmanentes ferro didicit necare pastores, inauditoque facinore (quod etiam in illis prouinciis nusquam prorsus legitur accidisse, que bellorum continuis diuersisque incursionibus affliguntur) ut aliqua reperta sit ciuitas, que presules ministrantes sibi fidei Christianae sine persecutore prosternat. Curandum est igitur, ut funesta pernicies cessatione propriorum sanetur antistitum, atque ita saltim furoris tanti materia subtrahatur, si in quam hec possit acerbitas perpetrari consistens persona ibidem defuerit, eoque modo uel illa ciuitas, dum in quos deseuiat non habebit, ab huiusmodi temeritate desistat, uel aliis imitandi contagia dira non prebeat. Egeat ergo episcopalibus subsidiis sibimet aliunde pensatis, que sacram in suo gremio collocatam fuso crudeliter maculat sanguine dignitatem, que in utroque hac est ultione plectenda, siue instinctu domestico seu furiis incitata hoc conmittit externis. Prebeat ergo uestra dilectio in hoc statu positae ministerium uisitationis ecclesiae, et aut conueniendo pariter, aut uicissim, prout qualitas rerum causaque proposcerit, diuina misteria representet ingratis, ne, cum deuitamus zizania, dominica uideamur preterire frumenta. III. Pars. Gratian. Hostilitatis quoque uel paupertatis necessitate episcopales sedes uel mutantur, uel duae in unum rediguntur, sicut supra in titulo de mutationibus episcoporum B. Gregorius fecisse legitur. Non ergo priuilegia ecclesiarum sic inuiolata permanere censentur, ut quibusdam de causis interuenientibus apostolica auctoritate eis derogari non possit; alioquin multitudo ecclesiarum ad paucitatem redigeretur, cum innumerae ecclesiae in diocesibus aliarum frequenter conditae inueniantur. Seruentur ergo priuilegia ecclesiarum cunctis inconcussa temporibus, ne uidelicet preter eius auctoritatem, a quo data sunt, contra ea liceat ire alicui. §. 1. Sed obicitur illud Simaci Papae: "Possessiones, quas unusquisque ecclesiae suo reliquit arbitrio, etc." que supra in titulo de alienatione rerum ecclesiasticarum leguntur asscripta. Unde datur intelligi, quod ea, que de iure uniuscuiusque ecclesias uel necessitatis, sicut peregrinis, uel pietatis intuitu, sicut religiosis domibus conferuntur, non perpetuo, sed temporaliter ab eis, quibus conferuntur, sunt possidenda. Quamquam illud Simaci ad necessitatis intuitum, non ad pietatis prospectum possit referri, uidelicet, ut ea, que peregrinis uel captiuis necessitas largiri suasit, non ea, que religiosis domibus ob quietem religiosae conuersationis concessa sunt prohibeantur perpetuo possideri. Vel pocius de utrisque intelligendum est, uidelicet, ut sicut necessitatem patientes cessante necessitate beneficiis renunciare coguntur, que eis miserationis indulsit intuitus, sic religiose uiuentes, cum a religione cessauerint, priuilegiis exuuntur que religiosa conuersatio meruit. Priuilegia ergo, que religiosis domibus conceduntur, uel in eo casu accipienda sunt, in quo ita eis consulitur, quod nulli aliquid derogatur, uidelicet ut ex noualibus, quorum decimationes nulli assignatae fuerant, priuilegiorum auctoritate decimas aliquibus persoluere non cogantur, uel si propter instantem temporis necessitatem eis consuli non poterit, nisi aliis derogetur, ita priuilegiorum auctoritas uidetur esse seruanda, ut eorum subueniatur inopiae, non ut suarum diuitiarum augmento, et possessionum non modica extensione porrecta, baptismales seu parrochianae ecclesiae penitus destruantur.

Causa XXVI

GRATIAN. A certain priest is convicted before the bishop of being a practitioner of sortilege and a diviner. Corrected by the bishop, he was unwilling to desist; he is excommunicated. At length, acting at the point of death, he is reconciled by a certain priest without the bishop having been consulted; penance is enjoined upon him according to the quantity of time established by the canons. (Question I.) First it is asked: who are practitioners of sortilege? (Question II.) Second, whether it is a sin to be a practitioner of sortilege? (Question III.) Third, from whom did the kind of divination take its beginning? (Question IV.) Fourth, how many kinds of divination are there? (Question V.) Fifth, are practitioners of sortilege or diviners to be excommunicated if they are unwilling to desist? (Question VI.) Sixth, can one excommunicated by a bishop be reconciled by a presbyter without the bishop having been consulted? (Question VII.) Seventh, is penance according to a quantity of time to be enjoined upon the dying?

GRATIANUS. Quidam sacerdos sortilegus esse et diuinus conuincitur apud episcopum; correctus ab episcopo noluit cessare; excommunicatur; tandem agens in extremis reconciliatur a quodam sacerdote episcopo inconsulto; indicitur penitencia sibi sub quantitate temporis canonibus prefixa. (Qu. I.) Primum queritur, qui sint sortilegi? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an sit peccatum esse sortilegum? (Qu. III.)

Tertio, a quibus genus diuinationis sumpsit exordium? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, quot sint genera diuinationis? (Qu. V.) Quinto, an sortilegi uel diuini sint excommunicandi, si cessare noluerint? (Qu. VI.) Sexto, an excommunicatus ab episcopo possit reconciliari a presbitero, illo inconsulto? (Qu. VII.) Septimo, si morientibus est indicenda penitencia sub quantitate temporis?

Question I

GRATIAN. Isidore defines who practitioners of sortilege are in Book VIII of the Etymologies, [c. 9], saying thus:

GRATIANUS. Qui sint sortilegi, Ysidorus diffinit Ethimologiarum libro VIII. [cap. 9.] ita dicens:

SOLE CHAPTER. Who are practitioners of sortilege?

Practitioners of sortilege are those who, under the name of a feigned religion, profess knowledge of divination through certain lots that they call lots of the saints or Apostles, or promise future things by inspection of any writings.

C. UN. Qui sint sortilegi?

Sortilegi sunt qui sub nomine fictae religionis per quasdam, quas sanctorum seu apostolorum uocant sortes, diuinationis scientiam profitentur, aut quarumcumque scripturarum inspectione futura promittunt.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. That seeking lots is not a sin is proved by examples and authorities. For when Achan had secretly stolen from the anathema and, on account of his sin, the people, having been cut down at Ai, had turned their backs upon the enemy, the Lord commanded Joshua to seek by lots through whose sin the people had merited to fall into the hands of the enemy. Joshua, receiving the command, cast lots first over the tribes, then over the families, and finally over the persons; and the lot thus fell upon Achan. Saul also, when fighting against the Philistines, had sworn that he would kill whoever among the people ate before sunset; by lot he discovered that his son Jonathan had eaten honey, which he had taken with his staff. When he wished to hand him over to death, he revoked the sentence at the people's supplication. Jonah also, when he fled from the Lord's face, was discovered by the sailors through lot, cast into the sea, and swallowed by a whale. It is also read of Zechariah that his lot came forth that he should offer incense. Matthias likewise is chosen by lot for the apostolate and as successor to Judas by blessed Peter. Therefore, what is proved by so many examples is manifestly not evil. Hence Augustine too says in the book of Psalms, [on Psalm 30, discourse 2, at the verse In Your Hands Are My Lots]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem sortes exquirere peccatum non sit, exemplis et auctoritatibus probatur. Cum enim Achan de anathemate furtim subripuisset, et ob eius peccatum populus cesus apud Ain hostibus terga dedisset, precepit Dominus Iosue, ut sortibus exquireret, quo peccante populus in manibus hostium cadere meruerat. Iosue preceptum accipiens misit sortes, primum super tribus, deinde super familias, demum super personas, et sors ita cecidit super Achan. Saul quoque, cum pugnans contra Philisteos iurasset, se interfecturum quicumque de populo ante solis occasum comederet, sorte deprehendit Ionathan filium suum mel comedisse, quod sceptro acceperat, quem cum morti tradere uellet, populo supplicante reuocauit sententiam. Ionas quoque, cum a facie Domini fugeret, a nautis sorte deprehensus in mari deiectus, et a ceto est absorptus. De Zacharia etiam legitur, quod sorte exiit, ut incensum poneret. Matthias uero similiter a B. Petro sorte in apostolatum et Iudae successor eligitur. Quod ergo tantorum exemplis probatur, patet malum non esse. Unde et Augustinus ait in libro Psalmorum: [in Psal. XXX. concione 2. ad uersic. In manibus tuis sortes]

C. I. What a lot is.

A lot is not something evil, but a thing indicating the divine will amid human uncertainty. PART II. GRATIAN. To these things answer is made thus: before the Gospel shone forth, many things were permitted that in the time of a more perfect discipline were wholly eliminated. For the union of priests or of consanguineous persons is prohibited by neither legal, evangelical, nor apostolic authority, yet it is wholly forbidden by ecclesiastical law. Thus also it is shown that there is nothing evil in lots, yet they are prohibited to the faithful lest under this appearance of divination they return to the ancient worship of idolatry. Hence the Apostle says to certain persons observing constellations and signs of future things: "You observe days, and months, and times, and years. Hence I fear lest perhaps I have labored among you without cause." Thus also astronomy and astrology fell into disuse among Catholics because, while through their own curiosity they were too intent upon them, they had less leisure for those things adapted to the salvation of souls.

That one ought not to trust in lots is attested by Jerome, writing upon Jonah, [c. 1]:

C. I. Quid sit sors.

Sors non est aliquid mali, sed res in humana dubietate diuinam indicans uoluntatem. II. Pars. Gratian. His ita respondetur: Ante, quam euangelium claresceret, multa permittebantur, que tempore perfectioris disciplinae penitus eliminata sunt. Copula namque sacerdotalis uel consanguineorum nec legali, nec euangelica, uel apostolica auctoritate prohibetur, ecclesiastica tamen lege penitus interdicitur. Sic et sortibus nichil mali inesse monstratur, prohibetur tamen fidelibus, ne sub hac specie diuinationis ad antiquos ydolatriae cultus redirent. Unde quibusdam constellationes et futurorum signa custodientibus Apostolus ait: "Dies obseruatis, et menses, et tempora, et annos. Unde timeo, ne forte sine causa laborauerim in uobis." Sic et astronomia, seu et astrologia apud catholicos in dissuetudinem abiit, quia, dum propria curiositate his nimis erant intenti, minus uacabant his, que saluti animarum erant accommodata.

Quod autem sortibus credi non oporteat, Ieronimus testatur, scribens super Ionam: [c. 1.]

C. II. One ought not to trust in lots from the example of Jonah or Matthias.

We ought not immediately to trust in lots under the example of Jonah, or join to this testimony that passage from the Acts of the Apostles where Matthias is chosen for the apostolate by lot.

C. II. Exemplo Ionae uel Matthiae non oportet sortibus credi.

Non statim debemus sub exemplo Ionae sortibus credere, uel illud de Actibus Apostolorum huic testimonio copulare, ubi sorte Matthias in apostolatum eligitur.

C. III. Divine oracles are not to be turned to secular affairs.

Augustine in reply to the inquiries of Januarius, [epistle 119]. As for those who read lots from pages of the Gospels, although it is to be wished that they do this rather than run to consult demons, nevertheless this custom displeases me: wishing to turn divine oracles to secular affairs and the vanity of this life.

C. III. Ad secularia negocia diuina oracula non sunt conuertenda.

Augustinus ad inquisitiones Ianuarii. [epist. CXIX.] Hii, qui de paginis euangelicis sortes legunt, etsi optandum est, ut id pocius faciant, quam ad demonia consulenda concurrant, tamen ista michi displicet consuetudo, ad negocia secularia et ad uitae huius uanitatem diuina oracula uelle conuertere.

C. IV. Lots are not to be trusted indiscriminately from the example of Matthias or Jonah.

Likewise Bede upon the Acts of the Apostles, [on c. 1]. Lots are not to be trusted indiscriminately from the example of Matthias, or because the prophet Jonah was discovered by lot, since the privileges of individuals, as Jerome says, altogether cannot make a common law. § 1. Yet if any persons, compelled by some necessity, think that God is to be consulted by lots after the example of the Apostles, let them see that the Apostles themselves did this only after the assembly of the brethren had been gathered and prayers poured forth to God. But concerning diviners Augustine writes thus, [Book V upon Deuteronomy, c. 19]:

C. IV. Exemplo Matthiae uel Ionae non est sortibus indifferenter credendum.

Item Beda super Actus Apostolorum. [ad c. 1.] Non exemplo Matthiae, uel quod Ionas propheta sorte deprehensus sit, indifferenter sortibus est credendum, cum priuilegia singulorum (ut Ieronimus ait) conmunem legem facere omnino non possint. §. 1. Si qui tamen necessitate aliqua conpulsi Deum putant sortibus exemplo Apostolorum esse consulendum, uideant hoc ipsos Apostolos non nisi collecto fratrum cetu, et precibus ad Deum fusis egisse. De diuinis uero scribit Augustinus, [lib. V. super Deuter. c. 19.,] ita dicens:

C. V. The things commanded by diviners are not to be observed, although the things foretold by them occur.

The Lord wished it to be understood that even those things said by diviners not according to God, if the things said occur, are not to be received in such a way that the things commanded by them are done or the things worshiped by them are worshiped.

C. V. Non sunt obseruanda que a diuinis precipiuntur, quamuis ea contingant, que ab eis prenunciantur.

Intelligi uoluit Dominus etiam illa, que a diuinantibus non secundum Deum dicuntur, si acciderint que dicuntur, non sic accipienda, ut fiant que precipiuntur ab eis, aut colantur que colantur ab eis.

C. VI. Which institutions of human beings are superstitious and which are not.

The same in Book [II] of On Christian Doctrine, [cc. 19, 20, and 21]. That which is according to the institutions of human beings is partly superstitious and partly not superstitious. Superstitious is whatever has been instituted by human beings pertaining to making and worshiping idols, or to worshiping as God either a creature or any part of a creature, or to consultations and certain compacts of signs agreed upon and covenanted with demons, such as are the enterprises of the magical arts, which poets are accustomed to commemorate rather than teach. Of this kind, though with a seemingly more permissible vanity, are the books of haruspices and augurs. § 1. To this kind also belong all amulets and remedies that even the discipline of physicians condemns, whether in incantations, in certain marks that they call characters, or in any things to be suspended and bound or even in some manner made to dance, not for the balancing of bodies but for certain signs, whether hidden or manifest. They call these by the more eminent name "physic," so that they may appear not to entangle one in superstition but to benefit nature. Such are earrings at the top of each ear, little rings made from the bones of ostriches on the fingers, or when a person with hiccups is told to hold his thumb with his right hand. To these are joined a thousand most empty observances: if some member has twitched; if, while friends walk together, a stone or a boy intervenes between them. § 2. From this kind also are these things: to tread upon the threshold when passing before one's house; to return to bed if someone sneezes while putting on his shoes; to return home if, while proceeding, he stumbles; or if a garment is gnawed by mice. § 3. Nor are those formerly called genethliacs because of their observations of natal days, but now called mathematicians, to be separated from this kind of pernicious superstition. For even though they obtain and sometimes ascertain the true position of the stars when each person is born, nevertheless they err exceedingly in what they attempt to derive from it, whether our actions or the outcomes of actions. § 4. Divine authority did not salutarily remain silent about this kind of fornication of the soul, nor did it deter the soul from it merely by saying that such things are not to be followed because falsehoods are spoken by their professors, but it says: "Even if they shall have spoken to you and it shall so happen, do not believe them." For because the image of the dead Samuel pronounced true things to Saul, sacrileges of the sort by which that image was presented are not therefore less execrable; nor because in the Acts of the Apostles a ventriloquist woman offered true testimony to the Lord's Apostles did the Apostle Paul therefore spare that spirit, but rather he cleansed the woman by correcting and expelling that demon. § 5. Therefore, all arts of this kind, whether of trifling or harmful superstition, established from a certain pestiferous fellowship of human beings and demons as though compacts of a faithless and deceitful friendship, are wholly to be repudiated and shunned by a Christian.

C. VI. Instituciones hominum que sint supersticiosae uel non.

Idem in libro [II.] de doctrina Christiana. [c. 19. et 20. et 21.] Illud, quod est secundum institutiones hominum, partim supersticiosum est, partim non est supersticiosum. Supersticiosum est quicquid institutum est ab hominibus ad facienda ydola et colenda pertinens, uel ad colendam sicut Deum creaturam, partemue ullam creaturae, uel ad consultationes et pacta quedam significationum cum demonibus placita atque federata, qualia sunt molimina magicarum artium, que quidam conmemorare pocius quam docere solent poetae. Ex quo genere sunt, sed quasi licentiori uanitate, aruspicum et augurum libri. §. 1. Ad hoc etiam genus pertinent omnes ligaturae atque remedia, que medicorum quoque disciplina condempnat, siue in precantationibus, siue in quibusdam notis, quas karacteres uocant, siue in quibuscumque rebus suspendendis atque ligandis, uel etiam saltandis quodammodo, non ad temperationem corporum, sed ad quasdam significationes aut occultas, aut manifestas, que eminentiori nomine uocant physicam, ut quasi non superstitionem inplicare, sed naturae prodesse uideantur, sicut sunt inaures in summo singularum aurium, aut de struthionum ossibus ansulae in digitis, aut cum tibi dicitur singultienti, ut dextera manu pollicem teneas. His adiunguntur milia inanissimarum obseruationum, si membrum aliquod salierit, si iunctim ambulantibus amicis lapis, aut puer medius interuenerit. §. 2. Hinc etiam sunt illa, limen calcare, cum ante domum suam transit; redire ad lectum, si quis, dum se calciat, sternutauerit; redire ad domum, si procedens offenderit; uel si uestis a soricibus roditur. §. 3. Neque ab hoc genere superstitionis perniciosae segregandi sunt, qui olim genethliaci propter naturalium considerationes dierum, nunc autem mathematici uocantur. Nam et ipsi, quamuis ueram stellarum positionem, cum quisque nascitur, consecuntur, et aliquando peruestigant, tamen quod inde conantur uel actiones nostras, uel actionum euenta producere, nimis errant. §. 4. Hoc autem genus fornicationis animae salubriter diuina auctoritas non tacuit, neque ab ea sic deterruit animam, ut propterea talia negaret esse sectanda, quia falsa dicuntur a professoribus eorum, sed "etiamsi dixerint uobis," inquit, "et ita euenerit, ne credatis eis." Non enim quia imago Samuelis mortui Sauli uera pronunciauit propterea talia sacrilegia, quibus illa imago presentata est, minus execranda sunt, aut quia in Actibus Apostolorum femina uentriloqua uerum testimonium perhibuit Apostolis Domini, ideo Paulus apostolus pepercit spiritui illi, ac non pocius feminam illius demonii correctione atque exclusione mundauit. §. 5. Omnes igitur artes huiusmodi uel nugatoriae uel noxiae supersticionis, ex quadam pestifera societate hominum et demonum quasi pacta infidelis et dolosae amicitiae constituta, penitus sunt repudiandae et fugiendae Christiano.

C. VII. An inquiry or cure sought from diviners or magicians is not life but death.

The same in the book On the City of God. One who wishes to possess salvation without the Savior and thinks that he can become prudent without true wisdom will labor as one not healthy but sick, not prudent but foolish, in continual sickness, and will remain foolish and demented in harmful blindness. Consequently, every inquiry and every cure sought from diviners and magicians, or from the demons themselves in the worship of idols, is to be called death rather than life; and those who follow them, if they do not correct themselves, tend toward eternal perdition, as the Psalmist says: "All the gods of the nations are demons." Through deceived human beings they daily desire to deceive others, so that they may make them participants in their perdition. Thus this vanity of the magical arts, from the tradition of evil angels, prevailed throughout the whole world for very many ages through a certain knowledge of future and infernal things; and through their inventions were invented haruspicy, auguries, those things called oracles, and necromancy.

C. VII. Non est uita, sed mors inquisitio uel curatio, que a diuinis uel magis expetitur.

Idem in libro de ciuitate Dei. Qui sine Saluatore salutem uult habere, et sine uera sapientia estimat se prudentem fieri posse, non sanus, sed eger, non prudens, sed stultus in egritudine assidua laborabit, et in cecitate noxia stultus et demens permanebit. Ac proinde omnis inquisitio, et omnis curatio, que a diuinis et magis, uel ab ipsis demoniis in ydolorum cultura expetitur, mors pocius dicenda est quam uita, et qui ea sectantur, si se non correxerint, ad eternam perdicionem tendunt, Psalmista dicente: "Omnes dii gentium demonia sunt," qui per deceptos homines alios decipere cottidie gestiunt, ut perdicionis suae faciant eos esse participes. Itaque hec uanitas magicarum artium ex traditione malorum angelorum in toto terrarum orbe plurimis seculis ualuit per quandam scientiam futurorum et infernorum, et per inuentiones eorum inuenta sunt aruspicia, augurationes, et ipsa, que dicuntur, oracula, et nigromantia.

C. VIII. Christian and true piety expels and condemns astrologers.

The same in Book IV of the Confessions, [c. 3]. They plainly did not cease to consult those astrologers whom they call mathematicians, because supposedly no sacrifice was offered by them and no prayers were directed to any spirit for divination. Christian and true piety nevertheless consistently expels and condemns this.

C. VIII. Christiana et uera pietas planetarios expellit et dampnat.

Idem Confessionum libro IV. [c. 3.] Illos planetarios, quos mathematicos uocant, plane consulere non desistebant, quod quasi nullum eis sacrificium, et nullae preces ad aliquem spiritum ob diuinationem dirigerentur. Quod tamen Christiana et uera pietas consequenter expellit et dampnat.

C. IX. To observe auguries and inquire into the courses of the stars is the worship of idolatry.

Likewise Jerome. But add this also: because one who fornicates sins against his own body—not only this body that has been made a temple, but also that which is spoken of because the whole church is the body of Christ. And one who has stained his own body appears to sin against the whole church, because through one member a stain is diffused throughout the whole body. § 1. There is also that reproach of Egypt which, if you neglect it, is suggested by the brand of ancient custom even after the crossing of the Jordan and after the second circumcision of baptism: to observe auguries, inquire into the courses of the stars, scrutinize from them the outcomes of future things, and become entangled in other superstitions of this kind. For Egypt is the mother of idolatry, from which it is certain that reproaches of this kind sprout. If after crossing the Jordan you take them up and bind yourself again with these snares, without doubt you draw the reproaches of Egypt with you. PART III. GRATIAN. But these sacrileges are not to be detested to such an extent that, if something from a threshing floor or winepress has been sacrificed to demons, what remains is therefore believed to be unclean, or that, if it should happen that we unknowingly consume the very thing that had been offered, we therefore believe that we have sinned. Hence Augustine to Publicola, [epistle 154]:

C. IX. Cultura est ydolatriae auguria seruare, et stellarum requirere cursus.

Item Ieronimus. Sed et illud adde, quoniam qui fornicatur in corpus suum peccat, non istud corpus solum, quod templum est effectum, sed et illud, quod dicitur, quia omnis ecclesia corpus Christi est. Et in omnem ecclesiam uidetur delinquere qui corpus suum maculauerit, quia per unum membrum macula in omne corpus diffunditur. §. 1. Est et illud obprobrium Egypti, quod, si neglexeris, et post Iordanis transitum, et post baptismi secundam circumcisionem uetustae consuetudinis inustione suggeritur, obseruare auguria, requirere stellarum cursus, et euentus ex his futurorum rimari ceterisque huiusmodi supersticionibus inplicari. Ydolatriae mater namque est Egyptus, ex qua certum est huiusmodi obprobria pullulare, que, si transito Iordane susceperis, et his te laqueis rursus illigaueris, tecum sine dubio obprobria Egypti trahis. III. Pars. Gratian. Hec autem sacrilegia non usque adeo sunt detestanda, ut, si aliquid de area uel torculari demonibus fuerit inmolatum, quod reliquum est ideo credatur esse inmundum, aut, si ipsum, quod oblatum fuerat, a nobis ignorantibus sumi contigerit, ideo credamus nos deliquisse. Unde Augustinus ad Publicolam: [CLIV.]

C. X. The remaining things are not unclean because something is taken from a threshing floor or winepress for sacrifices to demons.

If something is taken from a threshing floor or winepress for sacrifices to demons with a Christian's knowledge, he sins because he permits it to be done where he has the power to prohibit it. But if he learns that it has been done, or did not possess the power to prohibit it, he uses the clean remainder of the fruits from which those things were taken.

C. X. Non ideo reliqua sunt inmunda, quia de area uel torculari aliquid ad demonum sacrificia tollitur.

Si de area aut torculari tollitur aliquid ad sacrificia demoniorum, sciente Christiano, ideo peccat, quia permittit fieri, ubi prohibendi potestas est. Quod si factum conperit, aut prohibendi potestatem non habuit, utitur mundis reliquis fructibus, unde illa sublata sunt.

C. XI. One who buys what he does not know was sacrificed to idols is free from guilt.

Likewise Ambrose in the first epistle to the Corinthians, [on c. 10]. Although something is polluted accidentally—that is, by an offering to an idol—nevertheless, when one who buys it does not know, he suffers no scruple and is guiltless before God.

C. XI. Inmunis est a reatu qui emit quod nescit ydolis inmolatum.

Item Ambrosius in prima epistola ad Chorinthios. [ad c. 10.] Licet aliquid pollutum sit per accidentiam, id est oblationem ydoli, cum tamen nescit qui emit, nullum patitur scrupulum, et apud Deum inmunis est.

Questions III and IV

GRATIAN. PART I. Augustine explains in the book On the Nature of Demons from whom the kind of divination took its beginning and how many kinds of it there are, saying thus:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. A quibus autem genus diuinationis exordium sumpserit, uel quot sint genera eius, Augustinus exponit in libro de natura demonum, ita dicens:

C. I. Concerning the manifold kind of divination.

Therefore, the kind of divination is said to have been brought from the Persians. § 1. But Varro said that there are four kinds of divination—earth, water, air, and fire—and from these they think geomancy, hydromancy, aeromancy, and pyromancy are named. § 2. Diviners are so called as though full of God. For they pretend that they are full of divinity, and by a certain fraudulent cunning they conjecture future things for human beings. But there are two kinds of divination: art and frenzy. Incantators are those who accomplish the art by words. § 3. Arioli are so called because around the altars of idols they send forth impious prayers and offer deadly sacrifices, and through these solemnities of demons they receive responses. § 4. Haruspices are named as though inspectors of hours; for they observe days and hours in undertaking affairs and works, and attend to what a person ought to observe at each time. They also inspect the entrails of animals and predict future things from them. § 5. Augurs are those who attend to the flights and calls of birds and report other signs of things or unforeseen observations that occur to human beings. They are the same as auspices, for auspices are the things that those making a journey observe. Auspices and auguries are so called as though "bird-bearing," because birds bear them. There are two kinds of auspices: one pertains to the eyes, the other to the ears—flight pertains to the eyes, and the call of birds to the ears. § 6. Pythonesses are named from Pythian Apollo, because he was the founder of divining. Astrologers are so called because they augur from the stars. Genethliacs are named because of observations of natal days. For they describe the births of human beings through the twelve signs of heaven and attempt to predict the characters, deeds, and outcomes of those being born from the courses of the stars—that is, they interpret under what sign each person was born or what outcome of life one who is born will have. These are those commonly called mathematicians; the Latins call this kind of superstition constellations—that is, notations of the stars, how they stand when each person is born. § 7. At first those same interpreters of the stars were called Magi, as is read of those who announced in the Gospel that Christ was born. Afterward only mathematicians were called by this name. Knowledge of this art was permitted until Christ, so that after Christ was brought forth no one should thereafter interpret anyone's nativity from heaven. Horoscopists are so called because they inspect the hours of human births with a dissimilar and diverse fate. Practitioners of sortilege are those who, under the name, etc. As above. § 8. Twitch-diviners are so called because, when any parts of their members twitch, they proclaim that something prosperous or sad is signified to them from it. PART III. GRATIAN. But it is asked concerning the nature of demons: of what nature are they, whether they are able to know future things beforehand, or in how many ways do they know future things beforehand? Augustine writes thus concerning these things in the same book, [On the Divination of Demons, c. 3]:

> Igitur genus diuinationis a Persis fertur allatum. §. 1. Varro autem dixit quatuor esse genera diuinationum, terram, aquam, aerem, et ignem: hinc geomanticam ydromanticam, aeromanticam, piromanticam dictam autumant. §. 2. Diuini dicti sunt, quasi deo pleni. Diuinitate enim se esse plenos simulant, et astutia quadam fraudulenta hominibus futura coniectant. Duo autem sunt genera diuinationis, ars et furor. Incantatores autem dicti sunt qui artem uerbis peragunt. §. 3. Arioli uocati sunt propter quod circa aras ydolorum nefarias preces emittunt, et funesta sacrificia offerunt, hisque celebritatibus demonum accipiunt responsa. §. 4. Aruspices nuncupantur quasi horarum inspectores; dies enim et horas in agendis negociis operibusque custodiunt, et quid per singula tempora obseruare debeat homo intendunt; hii etiam exta pecudum inspiciunt, et ex eis futura predicunt. §. 5. Augures sunt qui uolatus auium et uoces intendunt, aliaque signa rerum uel obseruationes inprouisas hominibus occurrentes ferunt. Idem sunt et auspices; nam auspicia sunt, que iter facientes obseruant. Dicta sunt autem auspicia, et auguria quasi auigerum, quod aues gerunt. Duo sunt autem genera auspiciorum, unum ad oculos, alterum ad aures pertinens: ad oculos scilicet uolatus, ad aures uox auium. §. 6. Phithonissae a Phithonio Apolline dictae, quod is auctor fuerit diuinandi.
> Astrologi dicti sunt eo, quod in astris auguriantur. Genethliaci appellati sunt propter nataliciorum considerationes dierum. Geneses enim hominum per duodecim celi signa describunt, siderumque cursus nascentium mores, actus, et euentus predicere conantur, id est quis quali signo fuerit natus, aut quem effectum habeat uitae qui nascitur interpretantur. Hii sunt, qui uulgo mathematici uocantur, cuius superstitionis genus constellationes Latini uocant, id est notationes syderum, quomodo se habeant, cum quisque nascitur. §. 7. Primum autem idem stellarum interpretes magi nuncupantur, sicut de his legitur qui in euangelio natum Christum annunciauerunt. Postea hoc nomine soli mathematici dicti sunt. Cuius artis scientia usque ad Christum fuit concessa, ut Christo edito nemo exinde natiuitatem alicuius de celo interpretetur. Horoscopi dicti, quod horas natiuitatis hominum speculentur dissimili et diuerso fato. Sortilegi sunt qui sub nomine etc. Ut supra: §. 8. Salisatores sunt uocati, qui, dum eis membrorum quecumque partes salierint, aliquid sibi exinde prosperum seu triste significari predicunt. III. Pars. Gratian. Queritur autem de natura demonum, cuius naturae sint, an futura prescire ualeant, uel quot modis futura prenoscant? De his ita scribit Augustinus in eodem libro: [de diuinatione demonum, c. 3.]

C. II. In how many ways demons know future things beforehand.

It must be known that the nature of demons is such that through the perception of an aerial body they easily surpass the perception of earthly bodies; and in speed also, because of the superior mobility of an aerial body, they incomparably surpass not only the courses of any human beings or beasts but even the flights of birds. Endowed with these two things insofar as the aerial body is concerned—that is, keenness of perception and speed of movement—they announce things planned long before, or report things at which human beings marvel because of the slowness of earthly perception. There has also accrued to demons, through the very long time over which their life extends, an experience of things far greater than can come to human beings because of the brevity of life. Through these capacities that the nature of an aerial body has obtained, demons not only predict many future things but also do many things; and because human beings cannot say or do these things, some think them worthy to be served and to receive divine honors, especially through the instigation of the vice of curiosity, because of love of false and earthly felicity and temporal excellence. [c. 5.] § 1. Now therefore, since the question concerns the divination of demons, first it must be known that they very often foretell those things that they themselves will do. For they frequently receive the power both to inflict diseases and, by corrupting the air itself, to render it diseased, and to persuade evil deeds upon perverse persons and lovers of earthly advantages; concerning their characters they are certain that they will consent to those who persuade such things. They persuade in marvelous and invisible ways, penetrating by that subtlety the bodies of human beings who do not perceive them and mingling themselves with their thoughts through certain imaginary visions, whether they are awake or asleep. § 2. Sometimes, however, they foretell not things that they themselves do, but things that they know beforehand will occur from natural signs—signs that cannot enter into human perception. For because a physician foresees what one ignorant of this art does not know how to foresee, he is not therefore to be regarded as a diviner. And what wonder is it if, just as the physician, from the disturbed or failing temperament of a human body, foresees good health or future illnesses, so demons, from a condition of the air known to themselves but unknown to us, foresee future storms? Sometimes also they learn with total ease the dispositions of human beings—not only those uttered by voice but even those conceived in thought—when certain signs are expressed in the body from the mind; and from this they also foretell many future things that are indeed marvelous to others who did not know that these things had been planned. [c. 6.] § 3. They also deceive through zeal for deceiving and through an envious will by which they rejoice in the error of human beings. But lest they lose the weight of authority among their worshipers, they arrange that blame be attributed to their interpreters and to the conjecturers of their signs when they themselves have been deceived or have lied. § 4. Sometimes, however, the malignant spirits themselves, mockers of human beings and enemies of their salvation, are accustomed to predict the failure of their own worship and the ruin of idols so that they may appear to know beforehand what is to come in individual kingdoms or places and what adversity can befall their own faction. Even those who read the histories of the gentiles are not ignorant of this. What wonder is it, therefore, if, when the overthrow of temples and images was already imminent—which the prophets of the supreme God predicted so long beforehand—the demon Serapis disclosed this shortly beforehand to one of his worshipers, so that in departing or fleeing he might commend his supposed divination? PART. GRATIAN. That the devil detects the dispositions of human beings conceived in thought through exterior signs does not appear to be approved by the firmest reasoning. Hence the same Augustine says in Book II of the Retractions, [c. 30]:

C. II. Quot modis demones futura prenoscunt.

Sciendum est, hanc esse naturam demonum, ut aerii corporis sensu terrenorum corporum sensum facile precedant, celeritate etiam propter aerii corporis superiorem mobilitatem non solum cursus quorumlibet hominum uel ferarum, uerum etiam uolatus auium inconparabiliter uincant. Quibus duabus rebus, quantum ad aerium corpus attinet, prediti, hoc est acumine sensus et celeritate motus, multo ante cogitata prenunciant, uel nunciant que homines pro sensus terreni tarditate mirentur. Accessit etiam demonibus per tam longum tempus, quo eorum uita protenditur, rerum longe maior experientia, quam potest hominibus propter breuitatem uitae peruenire. Per has efficacias, quas aerii corporis natura sortita est, non solum multa futura predicunt demones, uerum etiam multa faciunt, que quoniam homines dicere aut facere non possunt, eos dignos quidam, quibus seruiant et quibus honores diuinos deferant, arbitrantur, instigante maxime uicio curiositatis, propter amorem felicitatis falsae atque terrenae, et exellentiae temporalis. [c. 5.] §. 1. Nunc igitur, quoniam de diuinatione demonum questio est, primum sciendum est, illos ea plerumque prenunciare, que ipsi facturi sunt. Accipiunt enim sepe potestatem et morbos inmittere, et ipsum aerem uitiando morbidum reddere, et peruersis atque amatoribus terrenorum commodorum malefacta suadere, de quorum moribus certi sunt, quod sint eis talia suadentibus consensuri. Suadent miris et inuisibilibus modis, per illam subtilitatem corpora hominum non sentientium penetrando, et se cogitationibus eorum per quedam imaginaria uisa miscendo, siue uigilantium siue dormientium. §. 2. Aliquando autem non que ipsi faciunt, sed que naturalibus signis futura prenoscunt (que signa in hominum sensus uenire non possunt) ante predicunt. Neque enim, quia preuidet medicus quod preuidere nescit huius artis ignarus, ideo tamen diuinus habendus est. Quid autem mirum, si, quemadmodum ille corporis humani uel perturbata uel mortificata temperie seu bonas seu futuras malas preuidet ualetudines, sic demones in aeris affectione sibi notas, nobis ignota, futuras preuident tempestates? Aliquando etiam hominum dispositiones non solum uoce prolatas, uerum etiam cogitatione conceptas, cum signa quedam ex animo exprimuntur in corpore, tota facilitate perdiscunt, atque hinc etiam multa futura prenunciant, aliis uidelicet mira, qui ista disposita non nouerunt. [c. 6.] §. 3. Fallunt etiam studio fallendi, et inuida uoluntate, qua hominum errore letantur. Sed ne apud cultores suos pondus auctoritatis amittant, id agunt, ut interpretibus suis signorumque suorum coniectoribus culpa tribuatur, quando ipsi decepti fuerint uel mentiti. §. 4. Nonnumquam uero ipsi maligni spiritus et illusores hominum atque inuisores salutis eorum solent predicere defectum culturae suae et ydolorum ruinam, quatinus prescii uideantur quid in singulis regnis aut locis uenturum, et quid aduersi suae factioni contingere possit; quod etiam illi, qui gentilium hystorias legunt, non ignorant. Quid ergo mirum si, iam inminente templorum et simulachrorum euersione, quam Prophetae summi Dei tanto ante predixerunt, Serapis demon alicui cultorum suorum hoc de proximo prodidit, ut suam quasi diuinationem recedens uel fugiens conmendaret? Pars. Gratian. Quod autem hominum dispositiones cogitatione conceptas per exteriora signa diabolus deprehendat, non firmissima ratione uidetur approbatum. Unde idem Augustinus ait in libro II. retractationum: [c. 30.]

C. III. That the devil comprehends the internal thoughts of the soul from bodily movements is a most hidden matter.

In a certain place I said that demons sometimes learn with total ease the dispositions of human beings—not only those uttered by voice but even those conceived in thought—when certain signs are expressed in the body from the mind. I stated a most hidden matter with a bolder assertion than I ought to have done. For it has been learned, even through certain experiments, that these things come to the knowledge of demons. But whether certain signs are given from the body of those thinking, perceptible to them but hidden from us, or whether they know these things by some other spiritual power, can either be discovered by human beings only with the greatest difficulty or cannot be discovered at all.

C. III. Quod ex corporeis motibus internas animae cogitationes diabolus conprehendat res occultissima est.

> Quodam loco dixi, demones aliquando hominum dispositiones non solum uoce prolatas, uerum etiam cogitatione conceptas, cum signa quedam ex animo exprimuntur in corpore, tota facilitate perdiscere. Rem dixi occultissimam audaciori assertione quam debui. Nam peruenire ista ad noticiam demonum per nonnulla etiam experimenta conpertum est. Sed utrum quedam signa dentur ex corpore cogitantium, illis sensibilia, nos autem latentia, an alia ui spirituali ista cognoscant, aut difficillime potest ab hominibus, aut omnino non potest inueniri.

Question V

GRATIAN. That practitioners of sortilege and diviners, if they are unwilling to desist, are to be excommunicated is proved by reason and authority. For it is a certain kind of worship of idols to predict future things from consultations with demons. For just as the avaricious person, because he expends upon money the worship owed to God, is called a worshiper of idols by the Apostle, so those who labor to discover future things—which are sometimes found to have been revealed from an oracle of God—either by consultation with demons or by any deceptions attribute the rights of divinity to creatures. For to know future things beforehand belongs to God alone, who in contemplation of himself causes even the angels to know them beforehand. Hence Isaiah says: "Announce to me the former and the last things, and I will say that you are gods." § 1. But worshipers of idols are to be separated from the communion of the faithful. Hence the Apostle says in the epistle to the Corinthians: "If anyone is named a brother and is a fornicator, or avaricious, or serving idols, with such a person do not even take food." Hence it is also read in the decree of Gregory the Younger, [presiding in the Roman Council, c. 12]:

> GRATIANUS. Quod autem sortilegi et diuini, si cessare noluerint, excommunicandi sint, ratione et auctoritate probatur. Est enim quoddam genus culturae ydolorum, ex demonum consultationibus futura predicere. Sicut enim auarus, quia cultum Deo debitum nummo inpendit, ydolorum cultor ab Apostolo nominatur, sic illi, qui futura, que ex Dei oraculo nonnumquam reuelata inueniuntur, uel demonum consultatione, uel quibuslibet prestigiis inuenire laborant, diuinitatis iura creaturis attribuunt. Futura enim prescire solius Dei est, qui in sui contemplatione etiam angelos illa prescire facit. Unde Ysaias ait: "Priora et nouissima annunciate michi, et dicam, quod Dii estis." §. 1. Cultores uero ydolorum a conmunione fidelium separandi sunt. Unde Apostolus ait in epistola ad Chorinthios: "Si quis frater nominatur fornicator, aut auarus, aut ydolis seruiens, cum eiusmodi nec cibum sumere." Hinc etiam in decreto Gregorii iunioris, [in Concilio Romano presidentis, c. 12.] legitur:

C. I. Let one who observes altar-diviners or incantators be anathema.

If anyone shall have observed altar-diviners, haruspices, or incantators, or used phylacteries, let him be anathema.

> C. I. Anathema sit qui ariolos uel incantatores obseruat.
> Si quis ariolos, aruspices uel incantatores obseruauerit, aut philacteriis usus fuerit, anathema sit.

C. II. Let those who seek divinations do penance for five years.

Likewise from the Council of Ancyra, c. 23, [otherwise 24]. Those who seek divinations and follow the custom of the gentiles, or introduce persons of this kind into their houses for the purpose of seeking something by magical art or of expiation, shall lie under a rule of five years according to the defined grades of penance.

C. II. Quinquennio peniteant qui diuinationes expetunt.

Item ex Ancirano Concilio, c. 23. [al. 24.] Qui diuinationes expetunt, et morem gentilium subsecuntur, uel in domos suas huiusmodi homines introducunt, exquirendi aliquid arte magica, aut expiandi causa, sub regula quinquennii iaceant secundum gradus penitenciae diffinitos.

C. III. It is not lawful for Christians to worship the elements or observe the courses of the moon and stars in their works.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [that is, from the Capitula of Martin of Braga, c. 72]. Let it not be lawful for Christians to maintain the traditions of the gentiles and to observe or worship the elements, or the courses of the moon or stars, or the empty deceit of signs for building a house, planting crops or trees, or joining marriages. For it is written: "Everything you do, whether in word or deed, do all things in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, giving thanks to God." § 1. Nor in the gathering of medicinal herbs is it lawful to attend to any observations or incantations, except only with the divine Creed or the Lord's Prayer, so that God alone, Creator of all things and Lord, may be honored. § 2. But if anyone, following the custom of pagans, shall introduce diviners and practitioners of sortilege into his house, as though they might cast out evil, discover acts of sorcery, or perform pagan purifications, let him do penance for five years. § 3. Nor is it lawful for Christian women to observe vanity in their wool-working; rather, let them invoke as helper God, who gave them the wisdom of weaving.

C. III. Elementa colere, lunae stellarum cursus in suis operibus seruare Christianis non licet.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papa. [id est, ex Cap. Martini Bracarensis, c. 72.] Non liceat Christianis tenere traditiones gentilium, et obseruare uel colere elementa, aut lunae aut stellarum cursus, aut inanem signorum fallaciam pro domo facienda, uel propter segetes uel arbores plantandas, uel coniugia socianda. Scriptum est enim: "Omnia, que facitis aut in uerbo, aut in opere, omnia in nomine Domini nostri Iesu Christi facite, gratias agentes Deo." §. 1. Nec in collectionibus herbarum, que medicinales sunt, aliquas obseruationes aut incantationes liceat attendere, nisi tantum cum symbolo diuino, aut oratione dominica, ut tantum Deus creator omnium et Dominus honoretur. §. 2. Si quis autem, paganorum consuetudinem sequens, diuinos et sortilegos in domum suam introduxerit, quasi ut malum foras mittant, aut maleficia inueniant, uel lustrationes paganorum faciant, quinque annis penitenciam agat. §. 3. Mulieribus quoque Christianis non liceat in suis lanificiis uanitatem obseruare, sed Deum inuocent adiutorem, qui eis sapientiam texendi donauit.

C. IV. Those dedicated to sacred offices must not become magicians or incantators.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea, c. 30. Those dedicated to sacred offices or clerics ought not to be magicians or incantators, or to make phylacteries, which are proved to be bonds of their souls. We have ordered those who use such things to be cast out of the church.

C. IV. Sacris offitiis dediti magi uel incantatores non fiant.

Item ex Concilio Laudicensi, c. 30. Non oportet sacris offitiis deditos uel clericos magos aut incantatores existere, aut facere philacteria, que animarum suarum uincula conprobantur. Hos autem, qui talibus rebus utuntur, proici ab ecclesia iussimus.

C. V. Let a bishop or presbyter who consults magicians or haruspices be deprived of honor.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, c. 30. If any bishop, presbyter, deacon, or anyone from the orders of clerics shall have been discovered to have consulted haruspices, incantators, altar-diviners, augurs, practitioners of sortilege, those who profess the magical art, or any persons practicing things similar to theirs, let him, suspended from the honor of his dignity, undertake the discipline of a monastery and there, dedicated to perpetual penance, discharge the admitted crime of sacrilege.

> Item ex Concilio Tolletano IV., c. 30. Si quis episcopus, aut presbiter, siue diaconus, uel quilibet de ordinibus clericorum aruspices, aut incantatores, aut ariolos, aut certe augures uel sortilegos, uel qui profitentur artem magicam, aut aliquos eorum similia exercentes consuluisse fuerit deprehensus, ab honore dignitatis suae suspensus monasterii curam excipiat, ibique penitenciae perpetuae deditus scelus admissum sacrilegii soluat.

C. VI. Concerning those who devote themselves to auguries and divinations.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, c. 38. Some clerics or laypersons devote themselves to auguries and, under the name of a feigned religion, profess knowledge of divination through those things they call the lots of the holy Fathers, or promise future things through inspection of any writings. Any cleric or layperson who shall have been discovered either to consult or to teach this is to be regarded as a stranger from the church.

> C. VI. De his, qui auguriis et diuinationibus student.
> Item ex Concilio Agathensi, c. 38. Aliquanti clerici siue laici student auguriis, et sub nomine fictae religionis per eas, quas sanctorum Patrum sortes uocant, diuinationis scientiam profitentur, aut quarumcumque scripturarum inspectione futura promittunt. Hoc quicumque clericus aut laicus detectus fuerit uel consulere uel docere, ab ecclesia habeatur extraneus.

C. VII. A lot is decreed to be nothing other than divination and sorcery.

Likewise Leo IV to the bishops of Britain, [c. 4]. We decree that the lots by which you decide all things in your judgments—which the Fathers condemned—are nothing other than divinations and acts of sorcery. Wherefore, we wish them to be condemned altogether, and we do not wish them to be named any longer among Christians; and we prohibit them from being practiced by the prohibition of anathema.

> C. VII. Sors nichil aliud quam diuinatio et maleficium esse decernitur.
> Item Leo IV. Episcopis Brittanniae. [c. 4.] Sortes, quibus uos cuncta in uestris discriminatis iudiciis, (quas Patres dampnauerunt) nichil aliud quam diuinationes et maleficia esse decernimus. Quamobrem uolumus illas omnino dampnari, et ultra inter Christianos nolumus nominari, et ne exerceantur anathematis interdicto prohibemus.

C. VIII. Incantators and practitioners of sortilege are to be pursued as enemies of Christ.

Likewise Gregory to Hadrian the notary, [Book IX, epistle 47]. It has come to us that you pursued certain incantators and practitioners of sortilege; know that your solicitude and zeal have been altogether pleasing to us. Therefore, let it belong to your diligence to seek them carefully and to correct with strict punishment any enemies of Christ of this kind whom you shall find.

> C. VIII. Incantatores sortilegos uelut Christi inimicos insequi oportet.
> Item Gregorius Adriano Notario. [lib. IX. ep. 47.] Peruenit ad nos, quod quosdam incantatores atque sortilegos fueris insecutus, et omnino nobis sollicitudinem zelumque tuum gratum fuisse cognoscas. Studii enim tui sit sollicite querere, et, quoscumque huiusmodi Christi inimicos inueneris, districta ultione corrigere.

C. IX. Let a cleric, monk, or layperson who has followed divinations, auguries, or lots be excommunicated.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, [I, c. 32]. If any cleric, monk, or secular person shall have believed that divination, auguries, or the lots that they falsely claim belong to the saints ought to be observed, or shall have thought that they should be disclosed to any persons, let them be expelled from the communion of the church together with those who shall have believed them.

> C. IX. Excommunicetur clericus, monachus, laicus, diuinationes, uel auguria, uel sortes secutus.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I., c. 32.] Si quis clericus, monachus uel secularis diuinationem uel auguria crediderit obseruanda, uel sortes, quas mentiuntur esse sanctorum, quibuscumque putauerint intimandas, cum his, qui eis crediderint, ab ecclesiae conmunione pellantur.

C. X. Let pastoral vigilance watch against practitioners of sortilege and worshipers of idols.

Likewise Gregory, [Book VII, epistle 66, to Bishop Januarius]. We exhort Your Fraternity to watch more vigorously with pastoral vigilance against worshipers of idols, haruspices, and practitioners of sortilege. If you find that they are unwilling to amend themselves from such things, if they are slaves, we wish them to be chastised with lashes; but if they are free, they are to be directed to punishment worthy of confinement and strictness.

> C. X. Contra sortilegos, et ydolorum cultores, custodia pastoralis inuigilet.
> Item Gregorius. [lib. VII. epist. 66. ad Ianuarium Episcopum.] Contra ydolorum cultores, uel aruspices atque sortilegos, fraternitatem tuam uehementius pastorali hortamur inuigilare custodia. Quod, si emendare se a talibus nolle repereris, si serui sunt, uolumus uerberibus, castigari, si uero liberi, inclusione digni districtaque sunt in pena dirigendi.

C. XI. Let one devoted to auguries and incantations be separated from the church.

Likewise from the Council of Carthage, [IV], c. 39. We command that one devoted to auguries or incantations, and likewise one adhering to Jewish superstitions or festivals, be separated from the assembly of the church.

> C. XI. Ab ecclesia separetur auguriis et incantationibus deseruiens.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi, [IV.,] c. 39. Auguriis uel incantationibus seruientem, similiter et Iudaicis superstitionibus uel feriis inherentem a conuentu ecclesiae separandum precipimus.

C. XII. Let bishops endeavor in every way to eliminate the art of sortilege and magic.

Likewise from the Council of Ancyra, c. 1. Let bishops and their ministers labor with all their strength to eradicate wholly from their parishes the pernicious art of sortilege and magic invented by the devil; and if they find any man or woman a follower of a crime of this kind, let them cast that person, shamefully dishonored, from their parishes. For the Apostle says: "Avoid a heretical person after the first and second correction, knowing that one who is of this kind is subverted." Those who, having abandoned their Creator, seek the devil's assistance are subverted and held captive by the devil; and therefore the holy church ought to be cleansed from such a pestilence. § 1. Nor is this to be omitted: certain criminal women, turned backward after Satan and seduced by the illusions and phantasms of demons, believe and profess that during the nocturnal hours they ride upon certain beasts with Diana, goddess of the pagans, or with Herodias and an innumerable multitude of women; that they traverse great spaces of lands in the silence of the dead of night; that they obey her commands as those of a mistress; and that on certain nights they are summoned to her service. But would that these women alone had perished in their unbelief and had not drawn many with them into the destruction of infidelity. For an innumerable multitude, deceived by this false opinion, believe these things to be true; and by believing, they deviate from the right faith and are enveloped in the error of the pagans when they suppose that there is anything of divinity or divine power outside the one God. Wherefore, throughout the churches committed to them, priests ought with every urgency to preach to the people of God so that they may know that these things are altogether false, and that phantasms of this kind are imposed upon the minds of the faithful not by the divine but by a malignant spirit. § 2. Indeed, Satan himself, who transforms himself into an angel of light, when he has captured the mind of any woman and subjugated it to himself through unbelief, immediately transforms himself into the forms and likenesses of diverse persons; and, deluding in dreams the mind he holds captive, showing now joyful things, now sad things, now known persons, now unknown, leads it through every byway. And although the spirit alone suffers this, the unbelieving woman supposes that this happens not in the mind but in the body. For who in dreams and nocturnal visions is not led outside himself and sees many things while sleeping that he had never seen while waking? But who is so foolish and dull that he thinks all these things, which occur in the spirit alone, also happen in the body, since the prophet Ezekiel saw and heard the visions of the Lord in the spirit, not in the body, as he himself says: "Immediately," he says, "I was in the spirit"? And Paul does not dare to say that he was caught up in the body. Therefore, it is to be announced publicly to all that one who believes such and similar things loses the faith; and one who does not possess the right faith is not Christ's but belongs to him in whom he believes, that is, the devil. For of our Lord it is written: "All things were made through him." Therefore, whoever believes that any creature can be changed either for the better or for the worse, or transformed into another form or another likeness, except by the Creator himself, who made all things and through whom all things were made, is without doubt an unbeliever and worse than a pagan. PART II. GRATIAN. Some persons are found who, moved by inward envy to the destruction of their enemies, strip the altar of sacred vestments, clothe it in mournful vesture, withdraw the customary service of lights from the churches of God, or celebrate for living persons the Mass promulgated for the pious repose of the dead. The Council of Toledo [XIII] condemns the most wicked acts of sorcery of all such persons, saying, [c. 7]:

> Item ex Concilio Anquirensi, c. 1. Episcopi, eorumque ministri omnibus uiribus elaborare studeant, ut perniciosam et a zabulo inuentam sortilegam et magicam artem ex parrochiis suis penitus eradicent, et si aliquem uirum aut mulierem huiuscemodi sceleris sectatorem inueniunt, turpiter dehonestatum de parrochiis suis eiciant. Ait enim Apostolus: "Hereticum hominem post primam et secundam correctionem deuita, sciens, quia subuersus est qui eiusmodi est." Subuersi sunt et a diabolo captiui tenentur qui relicto creatore suo diaboli suffragia querunt, et ideo a tali peste debet mundari sancta ecclesia. §. 1. Illud etiam non est omittendum, quod quedam sceleratae mulieres retro post sathanam conuersae, demonum illusionibus et fantasmatibus seductae, credunt se et profitentur, cum Diana nocturnis horis dea paganorum, uel cum Herodiade, et innumera multitudine mulierum equitare super quasdam bestias, et multa terrarum spacia intempestae noctis silentio pertransire, eiusque iussionibus obedire uelut dominae, et certis noctibus euocari ad eius seruicium. Sed utinam he solae in perfidia sua perissent, et non multos secum ad infidelitatis interitum pertraxissent. Nam et innumera multitudo hac falsa opinione decepta uera esse credunt, et credendo a recta fide deuiant, et errore paganorum inuoluuntur, cum aliquid diuinitatis aut numinis extra unum Deum arbitrantur. Quapropter sacerdotes per ecclesias sibi conmissas populo Dei omni instantia predicare debent, ut nouerint hec omnino falsa esse, et non a diuino, sed a maligno spiritu talia fantasmata mentibus fidelium irrogari. §. 2.
> Siquidem ipse sathanas, qui transfigurat se in angelum lucis, cum mentem cuiusque mulieris ceperit, et hanc per infidelitatem sibi subiugauerit, illico transformat se in diuersarum personarum species atque similitudines, et mentem, quam captiuam tenet, in sompnis deludens, modo leta, modo tristia, modo cognitas, modo incognitas personas ostendens, per deuia queque deducit, et, cum solus spiritus hoc patitur, infidelis hoc non in animo, sed in corpore euenire opinatur. Quis enim in somnis et nocturnis uisionibus se non extra ipsum educitur, et multa uidet dormiendo, que uigilando numquam uiderat? Quis uero tam stultus et hebes sit, qui hec omnia, que in solo spiritu fiunt, etiam in corpore accidere arbitretur, cum Ezechiel propheta uisiones Domini in spiritu, non in corpore uidit, et audiuit, sicut ipse dicit: "Statim," inquit, "fui in spiritu?" Et Paulus non audet dicere se raptum in corpore. Omnibus itaque publice annunciandum est, quod qui talia credit et his similia fidem perdit, et qui rectam fidem non habet, hic non est eius, sed illius, in quem credit, id est diaboli. Nam de Domino nostro scriptum est: "Omnia per ipsum facta sunt." Quisquis ergo credit fieri posse, aliquam creaturam aut in melius aut in deterius inmutari, aut transformari in aliam speciem uel in aliam similitudinem, nisi ab ipso creatore, qui omnia fecit, et per quem omnia facta sunt, proculdubio infidelis est, et pagano deterior. II. Pars. Gratian. Nonnulli inueniuntur, qui interno liuore permoti in perniciem suorum inimicorum altare sacris uestibus exuunt, aut lugubri ueste accingunt, uel consueta luminariorum obsequia Dei ecclesiis subtrahunt, uel missam pio requie defunctorum promulgatam pro uiuis celebrant hominibus. Quorum omnium maleficia nequissima Toletanum Concilium [XIII.] condempnat, dicens: [c. 7.]

C. XIII. Let a priest who has devoted his effort to an act of sorcery of this kind be cast out.

Whichever of the priests or ministers, moved henceforth by the cause of any grievance, shall have presumed either to strip an altar of sacred vestments, clothe it in any other mournful vesture, withdraw the customary service of lights from the temple of God, or order them to be extinguished, unless the satisfaction of true penitence before the metropolitan has previously purged him, let him know that he is to be deprived of the dignity and honor of his place. Without doubt, there are excluded from this sentence of punishments those persons who happen to have done this either fearing the contamination of sacred orders or the subversion of the holy faith, enduring hostility or siege, or also fearing the sentence of divine judgments; in their deed humility by which God is placated is declared more than the deceitfulness of inward envy. § 1. Many priests also, wounded by the deceit of enmity, strive with a deceitful vow to celebrate for living persons the Mass promulgated for the repose of the dead, so that the one for whom they offer that sacrifice may incur the danger of death. Therefore, the assembly of our unanimity has chosen that, if anyone shall henceforth be discovered to have perpetrated such things, he is to be deposed from the grade of his own order; and both that priest himself and the person who is judged to have incited him to perform such things are to be bound in the prison of perpetual exile. PART III. GRATIAN. From the foregoing authorities it is gathered that altar-diviners, haruspices, incantators, practitioners of sortilege, and other followers of this kind are to be eliminated from the church and, unless they return to wisdom, perpetually excommunicated. § 1. But what is said in the last chapter from Ancyra—that the things done through incantators occur not in the body but in the spirit—Augustine appears to assert in the book On the City of God, saying thus:

> Quicumque sacerdotum uel ministrorum deinceps causa cuiuslibet doloris permotus aut altare uestibus sacris exuere presumpserit, aut qualibet alia lugubri ueste accinxerit, seu etiam si consueta luminariorum obsequia de templo Dei subtraxerit, uel extingui preceperit, si eum antea uerae penitudinis coram metropolitano satisfactio non purgauit, loci sui dignitate se nouerit et honore priuari; illis proculdubio personis ab hac ultionum sentencia separatis, que aut contaminationem sacrorum ordinum, uel subuersionem sanctae fide metuentes, aut hostilitatem uel obsidionem perferentes, seu etiam diuinorum iudiciorum sentenciam metuentes fecisse contigerit, in quorum facto plus humilitas, qua Deus placatur, quam interni dolositas liuoris declaratur. §. 1. Plerique etiam sacerdotum sauciati inimicitiae dolo missam pro requie defunctorum promulgatam fallaci uoto pro uiuis student celebrare hominibus ut is, pro quo ipsum offerunt sacrificium mortis incurrat periculum. Proinde nostrae elegit unanimitatis conuentus, ut, si quis deinceps talia perpetrasse fuerit detectus, a proprii deponatur ordinis gradu, et tam ipse sacerdos quam etiam ille, qui eum ad talia peragenda incitasse perpenditur, exilii perpetui ergastulo religentur. III. Pars. Gratian. Ex premissis auctoritatibus colligitur, quod arioli, aruspices, incantatores, et sortilegi, atque ceteri huiusmodi sectatores ab ecclesia sunt eliminandi, et, nisi resipuerint, perpetuo excommunicandi. §. 1. Sed quod in ultimo Anquirensi capitulo ea, que per incantatores fiunt, non in corpore, sed in spiritu fieri dicuntur, Augustinus in libro de ciuitate Dei uidetur asserere ita dicens:

C. XIV. Things done by the deceptions of magicians are proved to be not real but phantasmal.

Nor is it wonderful concerning the deceptions of magicians, whose arts of sorcery have advanced so far that they even resisted Moses in those signs, turning rods into dragons and water into blood, since it is also reported in the books of the gentiles that a certain sorceress, Circe, changed the companions of Ulysses into beasts. It is also read concerning a sacrifice that the Arcadians offered to their god Lycaeus, from which whoever ate was converted into the forms of beasts. But all these things were fashioned by magical deceptions rather than accomplished in the truth of things. Therefore, so that the errors themselves may be made manifest to the ignorant, we judge it fitting first to speak concerning their proper character and inventors according to the tradition of the forebears. § 1. Magicians are those who are commonly called evildoers because of the magnitude of their crimes. They are those who, by God's permission, shake the elements, disturb the minds of persons who trust less in God, and kill by the force of an incantation alone without any drinking of poison. Hence Lucan also says: "A mind polluted by no corruption from drunk poison perishes through incantation." For after summoning demons, they dare to agitate them so that by evil arts they may kill any of their enemies. They also use blood and often touch the bodies of the dead with victims. § 2. Necromancers are those through whose invocations the dead appear to be raised, to divine, and to respond to questions. For nigro in Greek means "dead," and mantia is called "divination"; to raise them blood is applied to a corpse. For demons are said to love blood, and therefore, whenever necromancy is performed, gore is mixed with water, and they are more easily summoned by the color of blood. § 3. Hydromancers are named from water. For hydromancy is to summon the shadows of demons in an inspection of waters, to see the images of their mockeries, and there to hear certain things from them; there, when blood is applied, they are also said to raise those in the lower regions. And below: § 4. To all the aforesaid things belong the amulets of execrable remedies that the physicians' art does not commend, whether in invocations or in characters to be suspended and bound. In all of these is the art of demons, sprung from a certain pestiferous fellowship of human beings and evil angels. Hence all are to be avoided by a Christian and altogether and wholly repudiated and condemned with execration. § 5. Auguries, however, concern birds. The Phrygians first invented these. § 6. Mercury is said to have first invented deception. Deception is so called because it dazzles the keen sight of the eyes. § 7. A certain Tages is said to have first handed down the art of haruspicy to the Etruscans. Lifeless, he dictated haruspicy and afterward did not appear. For it is said fabulously that, while a certain rustic was plowing, he suddenly leapt from the clods and dictated haruspicy, on which day he died. The Romans changed those books from the Etruscan language into their own. § 8. Therefore, by these portents human curiosity is mocked through the deceit of demons when persons shamelessly desire to know that which by no reason does it belong to them to investigate. This power is therefore given to unclean spirits so that they may fit the perverse to themselves—that is, evil persons—and seduce those who scorn the truth and believe a lie and, according to Paul's sentence, will not endure sound doctrine but, with itching ears, will heap up teachers for themselves according to their desires; they will turn their hearing away from the truth and be turned to fables; burdened with sins, they will be led by various desires, always learning and never arriving at knowledge of the truth. But just as Jannes and Mambres resisted Moses, so these persons resist the truth, being corrupted in mind and reprobate concerning the faith; but they will advance no further, for their folly will be manifest to all, just as that of the former persons was. § 9. Nor ought anyone therefore to believe that any persons are able to do anything by magical arts without God's permission—who either does all things that occur by his just judgment or permits them thus to occur by his permission—because the aforesaid magicians are read to have done things similar to Moses. He cast down his rod, and it was turned into a dragon; and they each cast down their rods, which were turned into dragons, but Aaron's rod devoured their rods. For neither the magicians nor the evil angels, by whose ministry those things were worked, were creators of dragons. For throughout all the elements there are present in bodily things certain hidden seminal principles; when a temporal and causal opportunity has been given to them, they burst forth into the forms due to them according to their modes and ends. And thus the angels who do these things are not called creators of animals, just as farmers are not to be called creators of crops or of any things generated on earth, although they know how to furnish certain visible opportunities and causes so that those things may be born. What these persons do visibly, those others do invisibly. But God alone is the one Creator, who inserted the causes themselves and the seminal principles into things. § 10. Moreover, some think it is to be asked how Scripture relates that the Pythoness raised the prophet Samuel for a conversation with Saul, the most impious king, if Pythian divination is to be assigned to the error of magical art. To these it can be answered thus: it is an altogether unworthy act if assent is accommodated according to the words of the history. For how could it happen that a man holy from birth and just by the works of his life was drawn forth by magical art? But if he was not drawn and consented, this too is contrary to belief concerning a just man. For justice has no assistance if, whether dragged or willing, he lost the spiritual merit that he had sought while placed in the flesh. This is exceedingly absurd, because one who departs from here just remains just. Rather, this is a deception of Satan, by which, in order to deceive very many, he feigns that even the good are in his power. The Apostle shows this among other things, saying: "Satan himself transforms himself into an angel of light." For in order to create an error in which he might be glorified, he arrayed himself in the appearance and name of a just man, so that he might falsely declare that the hope they preached to the worshipers of God availed nothing, when he feigned that the just departing from here were in his power. But this deceives some persons: that he did not lie concerning the death of Saul and his son, as though it were a great thing for the devil to foresee the death of the body before its occurrence, since certain signs are accustomed to appear to those about to die, especially to those from whom God's protection appears to have been removed. How much more could the devil foresee it, whom the prophetic oracles testify to have been sublime in angelic majesty, concerning whose magnitude the Apostle says: "Or are you ignorant of the depth of Satan?" What wonder is it, therefore, if he was able to foresee a death closely imminent, since this is the means by which he deceives and wishes to be worshiped as though in God's power? For Saul had been made mad by such great dullness that he fled to a Pythoness. Depraved because of sin, he betook himself to those things he had condemned. But if anyone, on account of the history, thinks that the things expressed in words are not to be passed over, lest the account of the history be empty, he indeed does rightly, provided that he draws this in no way to the principle of truth, but to Saul's vision and understanding. For having become reprobate, he could not possess a good understanding. The historian described Saul's mind and Samuel's appearance, expressing the things said and seen while passing over whether they were true or false. For he says: "Hearing in what appearance he had been raised, he understood," it says, "that this was Samuel." It reported what he understood; and because he did not understand rightly, contrary to Scripture he worshiped another than God, and, thinking him Samuel, he worshiped the devil, so that Satan might possess the fruit of his deceit. For he strives for this: to be worshiped as God. If Samuel had truly appeared to him, the just man certainly would not have permitted himself to be worshiped, for he had preached that the Lord alone was to be worshiped. And how would the man of God, who was with Abraham in refreshment, say to a pestilential man worthy of the burning of Gehenna, "Tomorrow you will be with me"? By these two claims the improvident Satan provided for the subtlety of his deceit: he both permitted himself to be worshiped under Samuel's appearance and name contrary to the law, and falsely said that a man weighed down by sins would be with the most just Samuel, although there is a great distance between sinners and the just. Yet it can be said to be true and can appear true if Samuel's name is omitted, because Saul was to be with the devil; for he passed over to the one whom he worshiped.

Therefore, the devil, always hidden beneath a veil, betrays himself when he fashions things that adhere to the persons through whom he strives to deceive. § 11. But if anyone objects and says, "How do those things occur which those diviners predict as future? Or how can they furnish healing to the sick or inflict illness upon the healthy if they have no power or capacity of their own?" let him receive this response from us: each person therefore ought not to believe them because the things they predict sometimes occur, or because they appear to heal the sick or injure the healthy, since this happens by God's permission so that those who hear or see this may be tested and it may appear of what sort their faith or devotion toward God is. Thus in Deuteronomy Moses is read to have commanded the people of God from the word of the Lord, saying: "If there arises in your midst a prophet, or one who says that he has seen a dream, and he predicts a sign and a portent, and what he has spoken occurs, and he says to you, 'Let us go and follow foreign gods whom you do not know, and let us serve them,' you shall not hear the words of the prophet or dreamer, because the Lord your God tests you, so that it may be manifest whether you love him or not. Follow the Lord your God with all your heart and all your soul, and fear him; keep his commandments and hear his voice; you shall serve him and cleave to him, etc." Here he plainly wished it to be understood that even those things said by diviners not according to God, if the things said occur, are not to be received in such a way that the things commanded by them are done or the things worshiped by them are worshiped. Nor did he show that the fact they occur is beyond his power; rather, as though it were asked why he permits them, he set forth the cause of testing: namely, for their love to be known, whether they possess it toward their God—known rather by themselves than by him, who knows all things before they occur.

C. XIV. Que magorum prestigiis fiunt non uera, sed fantastica esse probantur.

Nec mirum de magorum prestigiis, quorum in tantum prodiere maleficiorum artes, ut etiam Moysi in illis signis resisterent, uertentes uirgas in dracones, aquam in sanguinem, cum fertur in gentilium etiam libris, quod quedam maga Circe socios Ulixis mutauit in bestias. Legitur etiam de sacrificio, quod Archades deo suo Lieo inmolabant, ex quo quicumque sumerent in bestiarum formas conuerterentur. Sed hec omnia magicis prestigiis pocius fingebantur quam rerum ueritate conplerentur. Ut ergo ipsi errores ignorantibus manifesti fiant, de eorum proprietate atque inuentoribus iuxta traditionem maiorum primum dicere congruum arbitramur. §. 1. Magi sunt qui uulgo malefici ob facinorum magnitudinem nuncupantur. Hi sunt qui permissu Dei elementa concutiunt, mentes hominum turbant minus confidentium in Deo, ac sine ullo ueneni haustu uiolentia tantum carminis interimunt. Unde et Lucanus: "Mens hausti nulla sanie polluta ueneni, incantata perit." Demonibus enim accitis audent uentilare, ut quosque suos perimant malis artibus inimicos. Hi etiam sanguine utuntur et uictimis sepe contingunt corpora mortuorum. §. 2. Nigromantici sunt quorum precantationibus uidentur resuscitari mortui, diuinare et ad interrogata respondere.

Nigro enim grece mortuus, mantia diuinatio nuncupatur, ad quos suscitandos cadaueri sanguis adicitur. Nam amare sanguinem demones dicuntur, ideoque, quociescumque nigromantia fit, cruor aquae miscetur, et colore sanguinis facilius prouocantur. §. 3. Ydromantici ab aqua dicti. Est enim ydromantia in aquarum inspectione umbras demonum euocare, et imagines ludificationes eorum uidere, ibique ab eis aliqua audire, ubi adhibito sanguine etiam inferos perhibentur suscitare. Et infra: §. 4. Ad hec omnia supradicta pertinent ligaturae execrabilium remediorum, que ars non conmendat medicorum, seu in precantationibus, seu in karacteribus suspendendis atque ligandis, in quibus omnibus ars demonum est, ex quadam pestifera societate hominum et angelorum malorum exorta. Unde et cuncta uitanda sunt Christiano, et omnino penitus execratione repudianda atque dampnanda. §. 5. Auguria autem sunt auium. Hec autem Friges primi inuenerunt. §. 6. Prestigium uero Mercurius dicitur primus inuenisse. Dictum est autem prestigium, quod prestringat aciem oculorum. §. 7. Aruspicinae artem primus Etruscis tradidisse dicitur quidam Tages. Hic exanimis aruspicinam dictauit, et postea non apparuit. Nam dicitur fabulose arante quodam rustico subito ex glebis exiluisse, et aruspicinam dictasse, qua die mortuus est. Quos libros Romani ex Etrusca lingua in propriam mutauerunt. §. 8. His ergo portentis per demonum fallaciam illuditur curiositas humana, quando id inpudenter appetunt scire, quod nulla eis ratione conpetit inuestigare. Hec potestas ideo datur inmundis spiritibus, ut peruersos sibi aptent, hoc est prauos homines, seducant illos, qui spernunt ueritatem, et credunt mendacio, et iuxta Pauli sententiam sanam doctrinam non ferent, sed ad sua desideria coaceruabunt sibi magistros prurientes auribus, et a ueritate quidem auertent auditum, ad fabulas autem conuertentur, onerati peccatis ducentur uariis desideriis, semper discentes, et numquam ad scientiae ueritatem peruenientes. Quemadmodum autem Iamnes et Mambres restiterunt Moysi, ita et isti resistunt ueritati, homines corrupti mente, reprobi circa fidem; sed ultra non proficient, insipientia eorum manifesta erit omnibus, sicut et illorum fuit. §. 9. Nec ideo quisquam credere debet, quoslibet magicis artibus aliquid facere posse sine permissu Dei, (qui omnia, que fiunt, aut iusto iudicio facit, aut permissu suo ita fieri sinit), quod predicti magi leguntur similia fecisse Moysi, qui uirgam suam proiecit, et conuersa est in draconem, proieceruntque singuli uirgas suas, que conuersae sunt in dracones, sed deuorauit uirga Aaron uirgas eorum. Non enim fuerunt creatores draconum nec magi, nec angeli mali, quibus ministris illa operabantur. Insunt enim rebus corporeis per omnia elementa: quedam occultae rationes seminariae, quibus cum data fuerit oportunitas temporalis atque causalis, prorumpunt in species debitas suis modis et finibus: et sic non dicuntur angeli, qui ista faciunt, animalium creatores, sicut nec agricolae segetum, uel quorumcumque gignentium in terra creatores dicendi sunt, quamuis nouerint prebere quasdam uisibiles oportunitates et causas, ut illa nascantur. Quod autem isti faciunt uisibiliter, hoc illi inuisibiliter. Deus uero solus unus est creator, qui causas ipsas et seminarias rationes rebus inseruit. §. 10. Preterea quidam putant querendum, quomodo scriptura narret Phithonissam Samuelem prophetam suscitasse ad colloquium Saulis inpiissimi regis, si phithonica diuinatio errori magicae artis deputanda sit. Quibus ita responderi potest, indignum omnino facinus esse, si secundum uerba ystoriae conmodetur assensus. Quomodo enim fieri poterat, ut arte magica attraheretur uir a natiuitate sanctus, et uitae operibus iustus; at, si non attractus est, consensit? Quod utrumque de iusto credere aduersum est. Nullum enim suffragium habet iusticia si tractus aut uoluntarius, amisit meritum spiritale, quod positus in carne quesierat, quod ualde absurdum est, quia qui hinc iustus recedit permanet iustus. Porro hoc est prestigium sathanae, quo, ut plurimos fallat, etiam bonos habere se in potestate confingit. Quod Apostolus inter cetera ostendit, dicens: "Ipse sathanas transfigurat se in angelum lucis." Ut enim errorem faceret, in quo glorificaretur, in habitu uiri iusti et nomine se subornauit, ut nichil proficere spem, quam predicabant Dei cultoribus, mentiretur, quando hinc exeuntes iustos finxit in sua esse potestate. Sed hoc quosdam fallit, quod de morte Saulis et filii eius non sit mentitus, quasi magnum sit diabolo ante occasum mortem corporis preuidere, cum signa quedam soleant apparere morituris, quippe a quibus Dei protectio amota uidetur, quanto magis diabolus, quem angelica maiestate sublimem prophetica oracula fuisse testantur, de cuius magnitudine Apostolus ait: "An ignoratis altitudinem sathanae?" Quid mirum ergo, si inminentem prope mortem potuit preuidere, cum hoc sit, unde fallit et se in potestate Dei uult adorari? Nam tanta ebitudine demens effectus est Saul, ut ad Phithonissam confugeret. Deprauatus enim causa peccati ad hec se contulit, que dampnauerat. Sed si quis propter ystoriam ea, que uerbis expressa sunt, putet non pretermittenda, ne ratio ystoriae inanis sit, recte facit quidem: si tamen minime istud ad ueri rationem rapiat, sed ad uisum et ad intellectum Saulis. Neque enim reprobus factus bonum poterat intellectum habere. Historicus enim mentem Saulis et habitum Samuelis descripsit, ea, que dicta sunt et uisa, exprimens, pretermittens, si uera an falsa sint. Qui ait? "Audiens, in quo habitu esset excitatus, intellexit," inquit, "hunc Samuelem esse." Quid intellexerit retulit, et, quia non bene intellexit, contra scripturam alium adorauit quam Deum, et putans Samuelem adorauit diabolum, ut fructum fallaciae suae haberet sathanas. Ad hoc enim nititur, ut adoretur quasi Deus. Si enim Samuel illi uere aparuisset, non utique uir iustus permisisset se adorari, qui predicauerat Dominum solum esse adorandum. Et quomodo homo Dei, qui cum Abraham in refrigerio erat, diceret ad uirum pestilentiae, dignum ardore gehennae: "Cras mecum eris?" His duobus titulis subtilitatem fallaciae suae prouidit inprouidus sathanas, quia et adorari se permisit sub habitu et nomine Samuelis contra legem, et uirum peccatis pressum, cum magna distantia peccatorum et iustorum sit, cum Samuele iustissimo futurum mentitus est. Verum potest dici, uerum potest uideri, si de Samuelis nomine taceatur, quia Saul cum diabolo futurus erat; ad eum enim transmigrauit, quem adorauit. Semper ergo diabolus sub uelamine latens prodit se, dum ea confingit, que hereant personis, per quas fallere nititur. §. 11. Si autem quilibet opponit, ac dicit, quomodo eueniunt illa, que illi diuini predicunt futura? aut quomodo possunt egris prebere medelam, aut sanis inmittere egritudinem, si aliquid propriae uirtutis ac potestatis non habeant? hoc a nobis recipiat responsum, quod ideo quisque non debet eis credere, quia aliquando eueniunt que predicunt, aut sanare uidentur languidos, uel ledere sanos, quia hoc permissu Dei fit, ut ipsi, qui hoc audiunt uel uident, probentur, et apareat quali fide sint uel deuotione erga Deum. Sicut in Deuteronomio legitur Moyses ex uerbo Domini populo Dei precepisse, ita dicens: "Si surrexerit in medio tui propheta, aut qui somnium dicat se uidisse, et predixerit signum atque portentum, et euenerit quod locutus est, et dixerit tibi: eamus, et sequamur Deos alienos, quos ignoras, et seruiamus eis: non audies uerba prophetae aut somniatoris, quia temptat uos Dominus Deus uester, ut palam fiat, utrum diligatis eum, an non. In toto corde uestro et in tota anima uestra Dominum Deum uestrum sequimini, et ipsum timete; mandata eius custodite, et audite uocem illius, ipsi seruietis, et ipsi adherebitis etc." Ubi sane intelligi uoluit, etiam illa, que a diuinantibus non secundum Deum dicuntur, si acciderint que dicuntur, non sic accipienda, ut fiant que precipiuntur ab eis, aut colantur que coluntur ab eis. Nec preter suam potestatem Deus ostendit esse, quod contingunt, sed quasi quereretur, cur ea permittat, causam temptationis exposuit, ad cognoscendum utique eorum dilectionem, utrum eam habeant erga Deum suum, cognoscendum uero ab ipsis pocius, quam ab illo, qui scit omnia ante, quam fiant.

GRATIAN. That one excommunicated by a bishop cannot be reconciled by another without that bishop having been consulted—unless perhaps by his metropolitan or by the supreme Pontiff—is proved by reason and authority. For presbyters receive the power of excommunicating or reconciling from bishops, not bishops from presbyters; and therefore they can reconcile those excommunicated by priests, but priests cannot reconcile those excommunicated by bishops. For the reconciliation of penitents is an episcopal office, not a sacerdotal one. Hence in the Second Council of Carthage, c. 3, Bishop Fortunatus said:

GRATIANUS. Quod autem ab episcopo excommunicatus eo inconsulto ab alio reconciliari non possit, nisi forte per eius metropolitanum uel per summum Pontificem, ratione et auctoritate probatur. Presbiteri namque potestatem excommunicandi uel reconciliandi ab episcopis accipiunt, non episcopi a presbiteris, atque ideo excommunicatos a sacerdotibus reconciliare possunt, excommunicatos uero ab episcopis sacerdotes reconciliare non ualent. Reconciliatio namque penitentium episcopale offitium est, non sacerdotale. Unde in Concilio Cartaginensi II. c. 3. Fortunatus Episcopus dixit:

C. I. Let the reconciliation of penitents and the consecration of chrism and maidens not be performed by presbyters.

If Your Holiness commands, I make a suggestion. For I remember that it was established in the preceding council that chrism, the reconciliation of penitents, and also the consecration of maidens are not to be performed by presbyters. But if anyone shall emerge as doing this, what is to be established concerning him? Bishop Aurelius said: Your Dignity has heard the suggestion of our brother and fellow bishop Fortunatus; what do you say to these things? It was said by all the bishops: Let the preparation of chrism and the consecration of maidens not be performed by presbyters. Let it not be lawful for a presbyter to reconcile anyone at a public Mass. This pleases all. GRATIAN. Nevertheless, the consecration of maidens can be performed by a presbyter after the bishop has been consulted. Hence in the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 36]:

C. I. Penitentium reconciliatio, crismatis et puellarum consecratio a presbiteris non fiat.

Si iubet sanctitas uestra, suggero. Nam memini, preterito concilio statutum, ut crisma, uel reconciliatio penitentium, nec non et puellarum consecratio a presbiteris non fiat. Si quis autem emerserit hoc faciens, quid de eo statuendum sit? Aurelius episcopus dixit: Audiuit dignatio uestra suggestionem fratris et coepiscopi nostri Fortunati, quid ad hec dicitis? Ab uniuersis episcopis dictum est: Crismatis confectio, et puellarum consecratio a presbiteris non fiat. Reconciliare quemquam in publica missa presbitero non liceat. Hoc omnibus placet. Gratian. Puellarum tamen consecratio episcopo consulto per presbiterum fieri ualet. Unde in Cartaginensi Concilio III.: [c. 36.]

C. II. With the bishop's permission a presbyter has power to consecrate virgins.

Let a presbyter not consecrate virgins without the bishop having been consulted; but let him never prepare chrism.

C. II. Permissione episcopi uirgines consecrare presbiter ualet.

Presbiter inconsulto episcopo uirgines non consecret; crisma uero numquam conficiat.

C. III. It is lawful neither for a deacon to minister nor for a presbyter to bless a penitent in church.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [cc. 43 and 44]. Let a deacon not presume to minister or a presbyter to consecrate an altar. § 1. Nor shall it be at all lawful for a presbyter to pour forth a blessing over the people in church or to bless a penitent in church.

GRATIAN. Behold, one excommunicated by a bishop cannot be reconciled through a priest. But it must be noted that one reconciliation is public and another private. Public reconciliation occurs when penitents are publicly presented before the entrance of the church and are publicly reconciled to the church through the imposition of an episcopal hand. This appears to be prohibited to priests. Hence toward the end of that chapter they are not prohibited simply from reconciling penitents, but from doing so at a public Mass. But private reconciliation occurs when penitents concerning hidden sins, or those acting at the point of death, approach the grace of reconciliation. This reconciliation can be performed through a priest. Hence Pope Evaristus says:

C. III. Nec diacono ministrare, nec penitentem in ecclesia benedicere presbitero licet.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 43. et 44.] Ministrare diaconus, aut consecrare altare presbiter non presumat. §. 1. Benedictionem quoque super plebem in ecclesia fundere, aut penitentem in ecclesia benedicere presbitero penitus non licebit.

Gratian. Ecce, quod ab episcopo excommunicatus per sacerdotem reconciliari non potest. Sed notandum est, quod reconciliatio alia est publica, alia priuata. Publica reconciliatio est, quando penitentes ante ecclesiae ingressum publice representantur, et per inpositionem manus episcopalis ecclesiae publice reconciliantur. Hec uidetur sacerdotibus esse prohibita. Unde circa finem illius capituli non simpliciter prohibentur penitentes reconciliare, sed in publica missa. Priuata uero reconciliatio est, quando de peccatis occultis penitentes uel in extremis agentes ad gratiam reconciliationis accedunt. Hec reconciliatio potest fieri per sacerdotem. Unde Euaristus Papa ait:

C. IV. At the bishop's command, let presbyters reconcile penitents concerning hidden sins.

At the bishop's command, let presbyters reconcile penitents concerning hidden sins and, as we stated above, absolve and communicate the infirm.

C. IV. Iussione episcopi presbiteri de occultis peccatis penitentes reconcilient.

Presbiteri de occultis peccatis iussione episcopi penitentes reconcilient, et, sicut supra premisimus, infirmantes absoluant et conmunicent.

C. V. If the bishop is absent, let one placed in danger be reconciled through a presbyter.

Likewise from the Second Council of Carthage, [c. 4]. Bishop Aurelius said: If anyone shall have been placed in danger and shall have requested to be reconciled to the divine altars, if the bishop is absent, the presbyter ought certainly to consult the bishop and thus reconcile the one in danger at his command. We ought to strengthen this matter by salutary counsel. It was said by all the bishops: What Your Holiness has deigned necessarily to instruct us pleases us.

C. V. Si episcopus absens est, per presbiterum reconcilietur in periculo constitutus.

Item ex concilio Cartaginensi II. [c. 4.] Aurelius episcopus dixit: Si quisquam in periculo fuerit constitutus, et se reconciliari diuinis altaribus petierit, si episcopus absens fuerit, debet utique presbiter consulere episcopum, et sic periclitantem eius precepto reconciliare. Quam rem debemus salubri consilio roborare. Ab uniuersis episcopis dictum est: Placet quod sanctitas uestra necessario nos instruere dignata est.

C. VI. Let one reconciled through fear of death, if he recovers, complete the time of penance without communion.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 82]. If anyone departing from the body seeks the final and necessary viaticum of communion, let it not be denied him. But if, placed in a desperate condition, he shall again have been made healthy after receiving communion, let him participate only in prayer and not receive the sacrament until he completes the established time of penance. Therefore, those who are at the departure of death and desire to receive the sacrament ought to receive it with the consideration and examination of the bishop.

C. VI. Qui metu mortis reconciliatur conualescens sine conmunione penitenciae impleat tempus.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 82.] Si quis de corpore exiens nouissimum et necessarium conmunionis uiaticum expetit, non ei denegetur. Quod si in desperatione positus post acceptam conmunionem iterum sanus fuerit factus, tantum oratione particeps sit, sacramentum uero non accipiat, donec institutum penitenciae inpleat tempus. Qui ergo in exitu mortis sunt, et desiderant accipere sacramentum, cum consideratione et probatione episcopi accipere debent.

C. VII. Let those departing from the body be reconciled without imposition of the hand.

Likewise from the Council of Orange, [c. 3]. Concerning those who depart from the body after receiving penance, it was resolved to communicate them without a reconciling imposition of the hand, because this suffices for the reconciliation of one dying according to the definitions of the Fathers, who fittingly named communion of this kind viaticum. But if they survive, let them stand in the order of penitents, so that, after necessary fruits of penance have been displayed, they may receive lawful communion with a reconciling imposition of the hand. § 1. Penance is not to be denied to clerics who desire it. § 2. Likewise, one suddenly rendered mute can, as was established, be baptized or receive penance if he has testimony of his former will through the words of others or of his present will through his own gesture. § 3. All things that belong to piety are also to be conferred upon the insane.

C. VII. Sine manus inpositione recedentes de corpore reconcilientur.

Item ex Concilio Aurasico. [c. 3.] Qui recedunt de corpore penitencia accepta, placuit sine reconciliatoria manus inpositione eis conmunicare, quod morientis sufficit reconciliationi secundum diffinitiones Patrum, qui huiusmodi conmunionem uiaticum congrue, nominauerunt. Quod si superuixerint, stent in ordine penitentium, ut ostensis necessariis penitenciae fructibus legitimam conmunionem cum reconciliatoria manus inpositione recipiant. §. 1. Clericis quoque desiderantibus penitencia non est neganda. §. 2. Similiter subito obmutescens (prout statutum est) baptizari, aut penitenciam accipere potest, si uoluntatis preteritae testimonium aliorum uerbis habet, aut presentis in suo nutu. §. 3. Amentibus etiam quecumque pietatis sunt conferenda.

C. VIII. Let one about to die be reconciled by the testimony of others if he has become mute or turned to frenzy.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 76]. If one who seeks penance in infirmity should happen, while the summoned priest comes to him, to become mute through the oppression of infirmity or to be turned to frenzy, let those who heard him give testimony; and let him receive penance and, if it is believed that he is about to die immediately, let him be reconciled through imposition of the hand, and let the Eucharist be poured into his mouth. If he survives, let him be admonished by the aforesaid witnesses that his petition was satisfied, and let him be subjected to the established laws of penance for as long as the priest who gave the penance shall approve. Likewise, [c. 78]. § 1. Let penitents who in infirmity have received the viaticum of the Eucharist not believe themselves absolved without imposition of the hand if they survive.

C. VIII. Aliorum testimonio moriturus reconcilietur, si obmutuit uel in frenesim uersus est.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 76.] Is qui penitenciam in infirmitate petit, si casu, dum ad eum sacerdos inuitatus uenit, oppressus infirmitate obmutuerit uel in frenesim conuersus fuerit, dent testimonium qui eum audierunt, et accipiat penitenciam, et, si continuo creditur moriturus, reconcilietur per manus inpositionem, et infundatur ori eius eucharistia. Si superuixerit, admoneatur a supradictis testibus peticioni suae satisfactum, et subdatur statutis penitenciae legibus quamdiu sacerdos, qui penitenciam dederit, probauerit, Item: [c. 78.] §. 1. Penitentes, qui in infirmitate uiaticum eucharistiae acceperint, non se credant absolutos sine manus inpositione, si superuixerint.

C. IX. Let the dying be reconciled by the bishop's care and examination.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea, [c. 12]. Concerning those who depart from the body, the rule of the ancient law will even now be observed in such a way that, if anyone should depart from the body, he is not deprived of the necessary viaticum of his life. But if any desperate person survives after receiving communion, let him be among those who communicate in prayer alone. Nevertheless, concerning all those who depart from the body, in giving them communion let there be the care and examination of the bishop.

C. IX. Cura et probatione episcopi morientes reconcilientur.

Item ex Concilio Niceno. [c. 12.] De his uero, qui recedunt ex corpore, antiquae legis regula obseruabitur etiam nunc ita, ut, si forte quis recedit ex corpore, necessario uitae suae non defraudetur uiatico. Quod si desperatus aliquis recepta conmunione superuixerit, sit inter eos, qui sola oratione conmunicant. De omnibus tamen his, qui a corpore recedunt, in dando eis communionem cura et probatio sit episcopi.

C. X. Reconciliation is not to be denied to those who implore it in a time of necessity.

Likewise Bishop Leo, [to Theodore, epistle 89, otherwise 91]. To those who in a time of necessity and under the urgency of pressing danger implore the assistance of penance and immediately afterward reconciliation, neither satisfaction is to be forbidden nor reconciliation denied, because we can neither set measures nor define times for the mercy of God, before whom conversion permits no delays to intervene, as the Spirit of God says through the Prophet: "When, having been converted, you groan, then you will be saved." § 1. But if they are so weighed down by some infirmity that they cannot signify in the present what they had requested a little before, the testimony of the faithful standing around ought to benefit them. Let them obtain at the same time the benefit of both penance and reconciliation, while nevertheless the rule of the paternal canons is preserved concerning the persons of those who sinned by departing from the Lord's faith.

C. X. Non est neganda reconciliatio his, qui tempore necessitatis eam inplorant.

Item Leo Episcopus. [ad Theodorum, ep. LXXXIX. al. XCI.] His qui in tempore necessitatis, et in periculi urgentis instantia presidium penitenciae, et mox reconciliationis inplorant, nec satisfactio interdicenda est, nec reconciliatio deneganda, quia misericordiae Dei nec mensuras possumus ponere, nec tempora diffinire, apud quem nullas patitur uenire moras conuersio, dicente Dei spiritu per Prophetam: "Cum conuersus ingemueris, tunc saluus eris." §. 1. Quod si ita aliqua egritudine aggrauati sunt, ut quod paulo ante poscebant sub presenti significare non ualeant, testimonia eis fidelium circumstantium prodesse debebunt. Simul tamen et penitenciae, et reconciliationis beneficium consequantur, seruata tamen regula canonum paternorum circa eorum personas, qui in dominica fide discedendo peccauerunt.

C. XI. Let the offering of one who hastened to penance but could not find a priest not be rejected.

Likewise from the Council of Épaone. If anyone shall have died who had already confessed and has good testimony, and could not come to a priest, but death overtook him at home or on the road, let his relatives make an offering for him at the altar and give a ransom for captives. GRATIAN. Behold, at the bishop's command penitents concerning hidden sins, or those placed in danger, can be reconciled through a presbyter. § 1. But if a sinner is pressed by the necessity of death and the bishop is so far removed that the presbyter cannot consult him, will penance be denied to the dying person? Will the benefit of reconciliation not be bestowed upon the penitent whom God receives, once converted, for pardon, according to this: "At whatever hour the sinner shall have been converted, etc.," and likewise: "Be converted to me with your whole heart, and I will be converted to you"? Will the church neglect to reconcile to herself one whom God has raised up within? Will the bishop's absence condemn one whom the grace of divine presence illuminates through the washing of regeneration? Assistance is given to the dying even by laypersons if presbyters are lacking. Why, therefore, can he not be assisted through a presbyter by the benefit of reconciliation if it should happen that the bishop is absent? If, according to Augustine, one who at the point of death confesses the shamefulness of his crime to a companion becomes worthy of pardon through desire for a priest, why is one who does not deny the stain of his guilt to a priest not similarly worthy of reconciliation through desire for the bishop? Likewise, presbyters ought not to deny penance to the dying. Hence Pope Julius says:

> C. XI. Non respuatur eius oblatio, qui festinans ad penitenciam sacerdotem inuenire non potuit.
> Item ex Concilio Epanensi. Si aliquis fuerit mortuus, qui iam sit confessus, et testimonium habet bonum, et non poterat uenire ad sacerdotem, sed preoccupauit eum mors in domo aut in uia, faciant pro eo parentes eius oblationem ad altare, et dent redemptionem pro captiuis. Gratian. Ecce, quod episcopo precipiente penitentes de occultis peccatis, siue in periculo constituti per presbiterum possunt reconciliari. §. 1. Sed si necessitate mortis peccator urgetur, et episcopus ita remotus est, quod eum presbiter consulere non possit, negabitur penitencia morienti? et beneficium reconciliationis non prestabitur penitenti, quem conuersum Deus recipit ad ueniam, iuxta illud: "In quacumque hora peccator conuersus fuerit etc.," et item: "Conuertimini ad me in toto corde uestro et ego conuertar ad uos," ecclesia sibi reconciliare negliget? quem intus Deus suscitauit ecclesia foris absoluere contempnet? dampnabit episcopi absentia quem gratia diuinae presenciae illustrat per lauacrum regenerationis? Morituris succurritur etiam a laicis, si presbiteri defuerint. Cur ergo beneficio reconciliationis per presbiterum subueniri ei non poterit, si contigerit episcopum deesse? si secundum Augustinum qui agens in extremis confitetur socio turpitudinem criminis fit dignus uenia ex desiderio sacerdotis, cur non similiter sit dignus reconciliatione ex desiderio episcopi qui sacerdoti non negat maculam sui reatus? Item morientibus penitenciam negare presbiteri non debent. Unde Iulius Papa ait:

C. XII. A presbyter who denies penance to the dying is guilty of their souls.

If a presbyter shall have denied penance to the dying, he will be guilty of their souls, because the Lord says: "On whatever day the sinner shall have been converted to penance, he will live with life and will not die." For true confession can occur at the final time, because the Lord is an inspector not only of time but also of the heart, just as the thief by the penance of one moment merited to be in paradise at the hour of his final confession. Likewise Pope Celestine, [in epistle 2 to the bishops of Gaul]:

> C. XII. Reus est animarum presbiter, qui penitenciam morientibus abnegat.
> Si presbiter penitenciam abnegauerit morientibus, reus erit animarum, quia Dominus dicit: "Quacumque die conuersus fuerit peccator ad penitenciam, uita uiuet, et non morietur." Vera enim confessio in ultimo tempore potest esse, quia Dominus non solum temporis, sed etiam cordis inspector est, sicut latro unius penitencia momenti meruit esse in paradyso in hora ultimae confessionis. Item Celestinus Papa: [in epist. II. ad Episcopos Galliae]

C. XIII. Penance is not to be denied to the dying.

We have learned that penance is denied to the dying and that assent is not given to the desires of those who at the time of their death desire that aid be given to their soul by this remedy. I confess that we shudder that anyone of such great impiety is found that he despairs of God's kindness, as though God could not come to the aid of one running to him at any time and redeem a person endangered under the burden of sins, from which he desires and wishes to be delivered and freed. What else, I ask, is this but to add death to one dying and by one's cruelty to kill his soul, lest it be capable of being absolved? The Lord, although most ready to come to aid, invites to penance and thus promises the sinner: "At whatever hour, etc.," and likewise: "I do not desire the death of the sinner, but that he be converted and live." Therefore, whoever shall have denied penance to a person at the time of death takes salvation from him and has despaired of the mercy of God, since he did not believe that God could suffice to aid the dying even in a moment. The thief hanging upon the cross at Christ's right would have lost the reward if the penance of one hour had not assisted him. While he was in punishment, he repented; and for the profession of one declaration he merited, through Christ's promise, a dwelling in paradise. Therefore, the true conversion to God of those placed at the end is to be estimated by the mind rather than by time, as the Prophet asserts thus: "When, having been converted, you groan, then you will be saved." Therefore, since the Lord is the inspector of the heart, penance is not to be denied at any time to one requesting it, since he binds himself to that judge to whom he knows that all hidden things are revealed. GRATIAN. But one to whom penance is not denied must not be denied reconciliation either. Therefore, a presbyter ought not to reconcile a penitent without the bishop having been consulted, unless final necessity compels him.

Hence it is read in the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 32]:

> C. XIII. Penitencia morientibus non est deneganda.
> Agnouimus penitenciam morientibus denegari, nec illorum desideriis annui, qui obitus sui tempore hoc animae suae cupiunt remedio subueniri. Horremus (fateor) tantae inpietatis aliquem reperiri, ut de Dei pietate desperet, quasi non possit ad se quouis tempore concurrenti succurrere, et periclitantem sub onere peccatorum hominem redimere, quo se uelle expediri desiderat et liberari. Quid hoc, rogo, aliud est quam morienti mortem addere, eiusque animam sua crudelitate, ne absoluta possit esse, occidere? cum Dominus ad subueniendum paratissimus, inuitat ad penitenciam, sic promittit peccatori: "In quacumque hora etc.," et item: "Nolo mortem peccatoris, sed ut conuertatur, et uiuat." Salutem ergo homini adimit quisquis mortis tempore penitenciam sibi denegauerit, et desperauerit de misericordia Dei, qui eum ad subueniendum morienti sufficere uel in momento posse non crediderit. Perdidisset latro in cruce premium ad Christi dexteram pendens, si illum unius horae penitencia non iuuisset. Cum esset in pena, penituit, et pro unius professione sermonis habitaculum paradysi eo promittente promeruit. Vera ergo ad Deum conuersio in ultimis positorum mente pocius est estimanda quam tempore, Propheta hoc asserente taliter: "Cum conuersus ingemueris, tunc saluus eris." Cum ergo Dominus sit cordis inspector, quouis tempore non est deneganda penitencia postulanti, cum illi se obliget iudici, cui occulta omnia nouerit reuelari. Gratian. Cui autem penitencia non denegatur, nec reconciliatio sibi deneganda est. Inconsulto ergo episcopo penitentem presbiter reconciliare non debet, nisi ultima necessitas cogat.

Unde in Cartaginensi Concilio III. [c. 32.] legitur:

C. XIV. Let a presbyter not reconcile a penitent without the bishop having been consulted, unless final necessity compels it.

Let a presbyter not reconcile a penitent without the bishop having been consulted, unless final necessity compels it while the bishop is absent. For any penitent whose crime is public and exceedingly notorious, and has disturbed the whole city, let a hand be imposed upon him before the apse of the church.

C. XIV. Inconsulto episcopo penitentem presbiter non reconciliet, nisi ultima cogat necessitas.

Presbiter inconsulto episcopo non reconciliet penitentem, nisi absente episcopo ultima necessitas cogat. Cuiuscumque penitentis publicum et uulgatissimum crimen est, quod uniuersam conmouerit urbem, ante absidam ecclesiae ei manus inponatur.

Question VII

GRATIAN. PART I. Concerning the time of satisfaction—whether it is to be imposed upon the dying—Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, defines thus in his Penitential:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. De tempore uero satisfactionis, an sit inponendum morituris, Theodorus Cantuariensis Archiepiscopus in Penitenciali suo ita diffinit:

C. I. A quantity of penance is not to be imposed upon those placed in danger, but made known to them.

A pure confession of sins is to be sought from the infirm placed in danger of death; nevertheless, a quantity of penance is not to be imposed upon them, but is to be made known, and the burden of penance is to be relieved by the prayers of friends and endeavors of almsgiving if perhaps they should depart, lest, being bound, they become strangers to both communion and participation in pardon. If, divinely rescued from that danger, he recovers, let him diligently observe the measure of penance imposed upon him by the priest. Therefore, according to canonical authority, lest the door of piety appear closed to them, let them be refreshed by prayers and ecclesiastical consolations and by communion of the viaticum, anointed with the sacred anointing of oil according to the statutes of the holy Fathers. PART II. GRATIAN. But for others, times of penance are to be decreed according to the quality of the sin and the judgment of those presiding. Hence Pope Leo, [epistle 77, otherwise 79, to Bishop Nicetas, c. 6]:

C. I. In periculo constitutis penitenciae quantitas non est inponenda, sed innotescenda.

Ab infirmis in periculo mortis positis pura est confessio peccatorum inquirenda, non tamen illis inponenda est quantitas penitenciae, sed innotescenda, et cum amicorum orationibus et elemosinarum studiis pondus penitenciae subleuandum, si forte migrauerint, ne obligati et conmunione et consortio ueniae fiant alieni. A quo periculo si diuinitus ereptus conualuerit, penitenciae modum a sacerdote sibi inpositum diligenter obseruet, et ideo secundum auctoritatem canonicam, ne illis ianua pietatis clausa uideatur, orationibus et consolationibus ecclesiasticis, sacra unctione olei inuncti, secundum statuta sanctorum Patrum conmunione uiatici reficiantur. II. Pars. Gratian. Aliis uero pro qualitate peccati et presidentium arbitrio tempora penitenciae decernenda sunt. Unde Leo Papa: [ep. LXXVII. al. LXXIX. ad Nicetam episcopum, c. 6.]

C. II. Let the times of penitence be fixed by the judgment of those presiding.

With moderation observed, the times of penitence are to be established by your judgment, according as you shall have perceived the minds of the converted to be devoted, likewise taking account of old age and considering the necessities of any dangers or illnesses. In these, if anyone is so gravely pressed that, while he is still doing penance, his salvation is despaired of, it is fitting that he be assisted by the grace of communion through sacerdotal solicitude.

C. II. Presidentium arbitrio prefigantur tempora penitudinis.

Tempora penitudinis habita moderatione constituenda sunt tuo iudicio, prout conuersorum animos prospexeris esse deuotos, pariter etiam habentes et etatis senilis intuitum, et periculorum quorumcumque, aut egritudinum respicientes necessitates. In quibus si quis ita grauiter urgeatur, ut, dum adhuc penitet, de salute ipsius desperetur, oportet ei per sacerdotalem sollicitudinem conmunionis gratia subueniri.

C. III. Both the quality of the crimes and the contrition of the penitents are to be considered by the priest in imposing satisfaction.

Likewise Pope Nicholas. Concerning those who perform penance for crimes and return to the military belt, it is established that they act contrary to the sacred rules. But because the crimes are not equal, and you report that some of these persons fell into despair on account of excessive dullness while others fled to the pagans for this reason, we commit this to you for decision, since, being present, you can examine the places and circumstances of that region, the measure of the fault, and also the penance and groans of the persons coming to confession.

C. III. Et qualitas criminum, et contricio penitentium in satisfactione inponenda a sacerdote consideretur.

Item Nykolaus Papa. De his uero, qui pro criminibus penitenciam gerunt, et ad cingulum miliciae reuertuntur, constat eos contra sacras regulas agere. Verum quia crimina non equalia sunt, perhibesque alios horum propter nimiam ebetudinem in desperationem cecidisse, alios ob hoc ad paganos fugisse: tibi hoc conmittimus decernendum, nimirum, qui loca et tempus regionis illius, modumque culpae, nec non et penitenciam, et gemitus hominum ad confessionem uenientium presens positus inspicere uales.

C. IV. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea, [c. 2]. To those who incur lapses of diverse sins and through prayer, confession, and penance for their evils demonstrate perfect conversion, a time of penance is to be assigned according to the quality of the sin, on account of the mercy and goodness of God. Therefore, those who are of this kind are to be recalled and joined to communion.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 2.] His, qui diuersorum peccatorum lapsus incurrunt, et oratione, et confessione ac penitencia malorum suorum perfectam conuersionem demonstrant, pro qualitate peccati penitenciae tempus adtribuendum est propter misericordiam et bonitatem Dei. Qui ergo huiusmodi sunt reuocandi et ad conmunionem sunt applicandi.

C. V. Let times of penance be distributed according to the quality of the sin by the bishop's judgment.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 31]. Let times of penance be decreed for penitents according to the difference of their sins by the bishop's judgment.

C. V. Episcopi arbitrio pro qualitate peccati penitenciae tempora distribuantur.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 31.] Penitentibus secundum differenciam peccatorum episcopi arbitrio penitenciae tempora decernantur.

C. VI. Let penance be given to one imploring it without respect of persons.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [cc. 74, 75, 80, 82, 81, 64, and 79]. Let a priest enjoin penance according to the laws upon one imploring penance, without respect of person. But let more negligent penitents be reconciled more slowly. During every time of fasting let hands be imposed upon penitents by priests. On days of remission also, let penitents bend their knees, carry the dead into the church, and bury them. But on the Lord's day let them not fast. For one who deliberately fasts on the Lord's day is not believed to be Catholic. But if penitents who attentively execute the laws of penance should happen to die on a journey or at sea, where assistance cannot be given to them, let their memory be commended both by prayers and offerings. Hence it is read in the Eighth Synod:

C. VI. Sine personarum acceptione inploranti penitencia detur.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 74. 75. 80. 82. 81. 64. 79.] Sacerdos penitenciam imploranti absque personae acceptione penitenciam secundum leges iniungat. Negligentiores uero penitentes tardius reconcilientur. Omni autem tempore ieiunii penitentibus manus a sacerdotibus inponantur. Diebus etiam remissionis penitentes genua flectant, mortuos in ecclesiam efferant, et sepeliant. Die autem dominico non ieiunent. Nam qui dominico die studiose ieiunat non creditur esse catholicus. Penitentes uero, qui leges penitenciae attente executur, si casu in itinere uel in mari mortui fuerint, ubi eis subueniri non possit, memoria eorum et orationibus et oblationibus conmendetur. Unde in VIII. Sinodo legitur:

C. VII. The time of penance follows the quality of the offense.

Let the time of penance be expended according to the quality of the offense.

C. VII. Tempus penitenciae qualitatem sequitur delicti.

Pro qualitate delicti penitenciae tempus inpendatur.

C. VIII. Let the time and manner of doing penance be imposed upon offenders by the judgment of the one presiding.

Likewise. Let this be placed in the judgment of those who preside: for how much time or in what manner those who offend ought to do penance, because age too causes there to be a great difference in punishment for instruction. PART III. GRATIAN. With what disposition we ought to receive the penitent and cast out the impenitent is shown clearly from the same synod when it says:

C. VIII. Tempus et modus penitendi delinquentibus presidentis inponatur iudicio.

Item. Hoc sit positum in iudicio eorum, qui presunt, uel quanto tempore, uel quali modo penitere debeant qui delinquunt, quia etas ad eruditionem multam facit haberi differenciam penae. III. Pars. Gratian. Quo affectu penitentem suscipere et inpenitentem abicere debeamus, ex eadem Sinodo euidenter ostenditur, dum dicitur:

C. IX. We ought to receive the penitent with the inward disposition of charity.

One who repents from the heart ought to be received just as the Lord showed when he says: "I called together my friends and neighbors, saying: Rejoice with me, because I have found my sheep that I had lost."

C. IX. Intimo karitatis affectu penitentem debemus suscipere.

Penitentem ex corde ita oportet suscipi, sicut Dominus ostendit, cum dicit, quia conuocaui amicos meos et uicinos, dicens: Congratulamini michi, quia inueni ouem meam, quam perdideram.

C. X. Let penitents love the law of God and hold iniquity in hatred.

Likewise. Let the penitent receive into himself the disposition borne by the one who said: "I have held iniquity in hatred and abhorred it," according to those things written in the sixth Psalm and in very many others, or those things the Apostle said to those who were made sorrowful according to God: "How much," he says, "it has worked in us solicitude, indeed defense, indeed indignation, indeed emulation, indeed vengeance. In all things you have shown yourselves to be circumspect in the matter." But also, in the very things in which he offended, let him do many contrary things, just as Zacchaeus did.

C. X. Penitentes legem Dei diligant, iniquitatem odio habeant.

Item. Affectum illum in se recipiat penitens, quem gerebat ille, qui dicebat: "Iniquitatem odio habui, et abhominatus sum;" secundum ea, que scripta sunt in sexto Psalmo atque in aliis quamplurimis; uel ea, que Apostolus dixit ad eos, qui secundum Deum contristati sunt: "Quantum operatum est," inquit, "in nobis sollicitudinem, sed excusationem, sed indignationem, sed emulationem, sed uindictam. In omnibus exhibuistis uos cautos esse negocio." Sed et ipsis in quibus deliquit, agens multa contraria, sicut et Zacheus fecit.

C. XI. Let impenitents be regarded as gentiles.

Likewise. Toward one who does not punish his sins, we ought to be such as the Lord commanded, saying: "Let him be to you as a gentile and a publican"; and as the Apostle taught, saying: "Withdraw yourselves from every brother walking in a disorderly manner and not according to the tradition that we handed down to you."

C. XI. Inpenitentes tamquam ethnici habeantur.

Item. Erga eum, qui peccata sua non punit, tales esse debemus, sicut Dominus precepit, dicens: "Sit tibi sicut gentilis et publicanus;" et sicut Apostolus docuit dicens: "Subtrahite uos ab omni fratre ambulante inordinate et non secundum traditionem, quam tradidimus uobis."

C. XII. It is better to err in the mercy of forgiving than in the severity of avenging.

Likewise John Chrysostom, [that is, the author of the Imperfect Work, homily on c. 23 of Matthew]. "But they bind heavy and unbearable burdens, etc." Such even now are the priests who command all justice to the people and themselves observe not even a little, evidently so that they may appear just not by doing but by speaking. Such are those who impose a heavy burden upon those coming to penance, because they say and do not; and thus, while the punishment of present penance is fled, the future punishment of sin is contemned. For just as, if you place upon the shoulders of a young man a bundle that he cannot carry, he necessarily either casts away the bundle or is crushed beneath its weight, so also a person upon whom you impose a heavy burden of penance will either reject the penance or, undertaking it, because he cannot bear it, will be scandalized and sin further. Then, even if we err by imposing a small penance, is it not better to render an account because of mercy than because of cruelty? For where the father of the household is generous, the steward ought not to be miserly. If God is kind, why does his priest wish to appear austere?

> C. XII. Melius est errare in misericordia remittendi quam in seueritate ulciscendi.
> Item Iohannes Crisostomus. [id est auctor operis imperfecti, homilia. ad c. 23. Matthaei.] "Alligant autem opera grauia et inportabilia, etc." Tales sunt sacerdotes etiam nunc, qui omnem iusticiam populo mandant, et ipsi nec modicam seruant, uidelicet, non ut faciendo sint, sed ut dicendo appareant iusti. Tales sunt qui graue pondus uenientibus ad penitenciam inponunt, quia dicunt, et non faciunt, et sic, dum pena penitenciae presentis fugitur, contempnitur pena peccati futura. Sicut enim, si fascem super humeros adolescentis, quem non potest baiulare, posueris, necesse habet ut aut fascem reiciat, aut sub pondere confringatur: sic et homo, cui graue pondus penitenciae inponis, aut penitenciam reiciet, aut suscipiens, dum sufferre non potest, scandalizatus amplius peccat. Deinde, etsi erramus modicam penitenciam inponentes, nonne melius est propter misericordiam rationem dare, quam propter crudelitatem? Ubi enim paterfamilias largus est, dispensator non debet esse tenax. Si Deus benignus, ut quid sacerdos eius austerus uult apparere?

C. XIII. It is not lawful to perform observances of the Kalends.

Likewise Pope Martin, [c. 74]. PART IV. It is not lawful to perform the unlawful observances of the Kalends, to devote oneself to idleness, or to encircle houses with laurel or the greenery of trees; this entire observance belongs to the pagans. Pope Zacharias, [in the Roman Council, c. 9]:

> C. XIII. Kalendarum obseruationes agere non licet.
> Item Martinus Papa. [c. 74.] IV. Pars. Non licet iniquas obseruationes agere kalendarum, et otiis uacare neque lauro aut uiriditate arborum cingere domos; omnis hec obseruatio paganorum est. Zacharias Papa: [in Concilio Romano, c. 9.]

C. XIV. Let one who observes the Kalends according to the rite of pagans be anathema.

If anyone shall have presumed to observe the Kalends of January according to the rite of pagans, to do anything more of a new kind because of the new year, to prepare tables with lamps or banquets in houses, or to lead singers and dances through streets and squares, let him be anathema.

> C. XIV. Anathema sit qui ritu paganorum kalendas obseruat.

Si quis kalendas Ianuarii ritu paganorum colere, uel aliquid plus noui facere propter nouum annum aut mensas cum lampadibus uel epulis, in domibus preparare, et per uicos et plateas cantatores et choros ducere presumpserit, anathema sit.

C. XV. Incantations furnish no remedy for human infirmities.

Likewise Augustine. Let priests admonish the faithful peoples so that they may know that magical arts and incantations can furnish no remedy for any infirmities of human beings and can heal nothing in sick, lame, or even dying animals, but that these are snares and ambushes of the ancient enemy by which that faithless one strives to deceive the human race. And if anyone shall have practiced these things, let a cleric be degraded and a layperson anathematized.

C. XV. Infirmitatibus hominum incantationes nichil remedii prestant.

Item Augustinus. Ammoneant sacerdotes fideles populos, ut nouerint magicas artes incantationesque quibuslibet infirmitatibus hominum nichil posse remedii conferre; non animalibus languentibus, claudicantibusue, uel etiam moribundis quicquam mederi: sed hoc esse laqueos et insidias antiqui hostis, quibus ille perfidus genus humanum decipere nititur. Et si quis hec exercuerit, clericus degradetur, laicus anathematizetur.

C. XVI. The Egyptian days and the Kalends of January are not to be observed.

Likewise Augustine. Do not observe the days called Egyptian or the Kalends of January, on which certain songs and feastings occur and gifts are given to one another as an augury of good fortune at the beginning of the year; or any months, seasons, days, and years; or the course of the moon, month, and sun. For one who observes or attends to these or any divinations, fates, or auguries, or consents uselessly and without cause to those observing them, tends more toward his own condemnation than toward salvation. This applies whether through certain numbers of letters and of the moon they inquire by Pythagorean necromancy into the life or death of the sick, or future prosperity or adversity; whether they attend to dream books written and falsely entitled in the name of Daniel and the lots called those of the holy Apostles, and the auguries of birds; whether they say incantations for building a house, joining marriages, or gathering herbs; whether they place little written images for any infirmity upon human beings or animals, apart from the Creed and the Lord's Prayer; or whether they believe in magical falsehoods concerning hailmakers and storms. But those who believe such persons, go to their houses, or introduce them into their own houses in order to question them should know that they have transgressed the Christian faith and baptism, have become a pagan and apostate—that is, one going backward—and an enemy of God, and have gravely incurred the wrath of God for eternity unless, amended by ecclesiastical penance, they are reconciled to God. For the Apostle says: "Whether you eat, or drink, or do anything else, do it in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, in whom we live, move, and are." Augustine also writes concerning observations of times in the Enchiridion, [c. 79]:

C. XVI. Dies Egiptiaci, et Ianuarii kalendae non sunt obseruandae.

Item Augustinus. Non obseruetis dies, qui dicuntur Egiptiaci, aut kalendas Ianuarii, in quibus cantilenae quedam, et comessationes, et ad inuicem dona donantur, quasi in principio anni boni fati augurio, aut aliquos menses, aut tempora, aut dies, et annos, aut lunae et mensis solisque cursum, quia qui et has, et quascumque diuinationes, aut fata, aut auguria obseruat, aut adtendit, aut consentit obseruantibus inutiliter et sine causa, et magis ad sui dampnationem quam ad salutem tendit; siue per quosdam numeros litterarum, et lunae, per Pitagoricam nigromantiam egrotantium uitam uel mortem, uel prospera uel aduersa futura inquirunt, siue qui adtendunt somnialia scripta, et falso in Danielis nomine intitulata, et sortes, que dicuntur sanctorum Apostolorum, et auguria auium, aut aliqua pro domo facienda, aut coniugia copulanda, aut in collectionibus herbarum carmina dicunt, aut pictatiolas pro quauis infirmitate scriptas, super homines aut animalia ponunt, preter simbolum et orationem dominicam, aut magicis falsitatibus in grandinariis et tempestatibus credunt. Qui autem talibus credunt, aut ad eorum domos euntes, aut suis domibus introducunt, ut interrogent, sciant, se fidem Christianam et baptismum preuaricasse, et paganum, et apostatam, id est retro abeuntem et Dei inimicum, iram Dei grauiter in eternum incurrisse, nisi ecclesiastica penitencia emendatus Deo reconcilietur. Dicit enim Apostolus: "Siue manducatis, siue bibitis, siue quid aliud facitis, in nomine Domini nostri Iesu Christi facite, in quo uiuimus, mouemur, et sumus." De temporum quoque obseruationibus scribit Augustinus in Enchiridion: [c. 79.]

C. XVII. It is a grave sin to observe days, months, and years.

Who would think how great a sin it is to observe days, months, years, and seasons—as those observe them who on certain days, months, or years wish or refuse to begin something because according to the vain doctrines of human beings they regard the times as auspicious or inauspicious—unless we weighed the magnitude of this evil from the Apostle's fear, who says to such persons: "I fear for you, lest perhaps I have labored among you without cause"? The same upon the epistle to the Galatians, [on c. 4]. § 1. Let the reader understand that superstitious observations of times pertain to so great a danger of the soul that the Apostle says: "I fear for you, lest perhaps I have labored among you without cause." Although this is read throughout the world in the churches with such solemnity and authority, nevertheless our assemblies are full of persons who receive from astrologers the times for undertaking affairs. Indeed, they often do not hesitate to admonish even us that nothing should be begun—whether buildings or any works of this kind—on the days they call Egyptian.

C. XVII. Graue peccatum est dies obseruare, et menses et annos.

Quis existimaret, quam magnum peccatum sit dies obseruare, et menses, et annos, et tempora, (sicut obseruant qui certis diebus, siue mensibus, siue annis uolunt uel nolunt aliquid inchoare, eo quod secundum uanas doctrinas hominum fausta uel infausta existiment tempora), nisi huius mali magnitudinem ex timore Apostoli pensaremus, qui talibus ait: "Timeo uos, ne forte sine causa laborauerim in uobis?" Idem super epistolam ad Galathas: [ad c. 4.] §. 1. Intelligat lector ad tantum periculum animae pertinere supersticiosas temporum obseruationes, ut dicat Apostolus: "Timeo uos, ne forte sine causa laborauerim in uobis." Quod quamuis tanta celebritate atque auctoritate per orbem terrarum in ecclesiis legatur, plena sunt tamen conuenticula nostra hominibus, qui tempora rerum agendarum a mathematicis accipiunt. Iam uero, ne aliquid inchoetur aut edificiorum, aut huiusmodi quorumlibet operum, diebus, quos Egiptiacos uocant, sepe etiam nos monere non dubitant.

C. XVIII. It is lawful to possess herbs or stones without incantation.

Likewise Jerome. It is lawful for one suffering a demon to possess stones or herbs without incantation.

C. XVIII. Sine incantatione herbas uel petras habere licet.

Item Ieronimus. Demonium sustinenti licet petras uel herbas habere sine incantatione.

Causa XXVII

GRATIAN. A certain man who had a vow of chastity betrothed a wife to himself. Renouncing the prior agreement, she transferred herself to another and married him. The man to whom she had first been betrothed seeks her back. (Question I.) Here it is first asked whether marriage can exist between persons under vows. (Question II.) Second, is it lawful for a betrothed woman to withdraw from her betrothed and marry another?

> GRATIANUS. Quidam uotum castitatis habens desponsauit sibi uxorem; illa priori condicioni renuncians, transtulit se ad alium, et nupsit illi; ille, cui prius desponsata fuerat, repetit eam. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, an coniugium possit esse inter uouentes? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an liceat, sponsae a sponso recedere, et alii nubere?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. That persons under vows cannot contract marriages is proved by many authorities. For in the Council of Carthage, c. 104, a statute is found concerning widows who have violated professed continence:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod uero uouentes matrimonia contrahere non possunt, multis auctoritatibus probatur. In Concilio namque Cartaginensi c. CIV. statutum inuenitur de uiduis, que professam continentiam preuaricate sunt:

C. I. Let widows who have cast aside the religious habit and chosen marriage be excommunicated.

Just as the reward of chastity is good, so it is also to be guarded with greater observance and command, so that if any widows, although still placed in their younger years and left by a husband at an immature age, shall have devoted themselves to God and, having cast aside lay clothing, appeared in a religious habit under the testimony of the bishop and church, but afterward shall have passed to secular marriages, according to the Apostle they will have condemnation because they appear to have made void the pledge of chastity that they vowed to God. Therefore, let such persons be separated from the communion of Christians and not communicate with Christians at a banquet. For if married women are guilty of adultery if they are not subject to their husbands, how much more will widows who have changed the religious state belonging to God be marked by the crime of adultery if with lustful pleasure they seize upon the devotion that they offered to God voluntarily, not under compulsion, and make a passage to second marriages? Even if, when violence assailed them, they were oppressed by someone and afterward consented through the delight of lust to remain in marriage with the ravisher or violent man, let them be held liable to the condemnation stated above. Of such persons the Apostle says: "For when they have grown wanton, they wish to marry in Christ, having condemnation because they have made their first pledge void."

> C. I. Excommunicentur uiduae, que religioso habitu abiecto nuptias elegerint.
> Sicut bonum est castitatis premium, ita et maiori obseruantia et preceptione custodiendum est, ut si que uiduae, quamlibet adhuc in minoribus annis positae, et inmatura etate a uiro relictae, se deuouerint Deo, et ueste laicali abiecta sub testimonio episcopi et ecclesiae in religioso habitu apparuerint, postea uero ad seculares transierint nuptias, secundum Apostolum dampnationem habebunt, quia fidem castitatis, quam Deo uouerunt, irritam facere uisae sunt. Tales ergo personae a Christianorum conmunione sequestrentur, neque in conuiuio cum Christianis conmunicent. Nam si adulterii coniuges reae sunt si suis obnoxiae uiris non fuerint, quanto magis uiduae, que Dei religiositatem mutauerunt, crimine adulterii notabuntur, si deuotionem, quam sponte, non coactae, Deo obtulerunt, libidinosa corriperunt uoluptate, atque ad secundas nuptias transitum fecerint? Que etsi uiolentia irruente ab aliquo oppressae fuerint, ac postea delectatione libidinis permanere in coniugio raptori uel uiolento uiro consenserint, dampnatione superius dicta teneantur obnoxiae. De talibus Apostolus ait: "Cum enim luxuriatae fuerint, nubere in Christo uolunt, habentes dampnationem, quia primam fidem irritam fecerunt."

C. II. Concerning widows and virgins who depart from a religious resolve.

Likewise from the epistle of Gregory sent to Boniface. Concerning widows departing from the resolve of widowhood, about whom Your Affection wished to consult us, dearest brother, I believe you know that they were long ago condemned by Saint Paul and many holy Fathers unless they are converted. By apostolic authority we judge that they are to be condemned and barred from the communion of the faithful and the thresholds of the church until they obey their bishops and return, unwillingly or voluntarily, to the good that they began. § 1. But concerning unveiled virgins, if they have deviated, we have this decree from our predecessor of holy memory, Pope Innocent: “Those who, although not yet covered by the sacred veil, nevertheless have always declared that they would remain in the virginal resolve, although they were not veiled, nevertheless, if they marry, are to do penance for some time, because their pledge was held by the Lord. For if among human beings a contract of good faith is customarily dissolved for no reason, how much more can that promise which she covenanted with God not be dissolved without punishment, etc.” § 2. If virgins not yet veiled are thus punished by public penance and excluded from the assembly of the faithful until satisfaction, how much more are widows—who are of a more perfect age and of more mature wisdom and counsel, have often experienced the fellowship of men, assumed the religious habit, and finally apostatized and returned to their former vomit—to be eliminated by us and all the faithful from the thresholds of the church and the assembly of the faithful until satisfaction and handed over to prisons, so that, according to the Apostle Paul, by handing a person of this kind over to Satan, his spirit may be saved on the day of the Lord. For of such persons the Lord speaks through Moses, saying: “Remove the evil from your midst.” Of them he says through the Prophet: “The just man will rejoice when he sees the vengeance upon the impious; he will wash his hands in the sinner’s blood.” For of such persons and those similar to them, and those consenting to them, it is said: “Because not only those who do these things, but also those who consent to those doing them, are guilty.”

C. II. De uiduis et uirginibus que a religionis proposito discedunt.

Item ex epistola Gregorii missa ad Bonifatium. Viduas a proposito discedentes uiduitatis, super quibus nos consulere uoluit dilectio tua, frater karissime, credo te nosse a S. Paulo et a multis sanctis Patribus, nisi conuertantur, olim esse dampnatas. Quas nos apostolica auctoritate dampnandas, et a conmunione fidelium atque a liminibus ecclesiae arcendas fore censemus, usquequo obediant episcopis suis, et ad bonum, quod ceperunt, inuite aut uoluntarie reuertantur. §. 1. De uirginibus autem non uelatis, si deuiauerint, a sanctae memoriae predecessore nostro Papa Innocentio taliter decretum habemus: "He uero, que necdum sacro uelamine tectae, tamen in proposito uirginali semper se simulauerint permanere, licet uelatae non fuerint, tamen si nupserint, aliquanto tempore his agenda penitencia est, quia sponsio earum a Domino tenebatur. Si enim inter homines solet bonae fidei contractus nulla ratione dissolui, quanto magis ista pollicitatio, quam cum Deo pepigit, solui sine uindicta non poterit, etc." §. 2. Si uirgines nondum uelatae taliter penitencia publica puniuntur, et a cetu fidelium usque ad satisfactionem excluduntur, quanto magis uiduae, que perfectioris etatis et maturioris sapientiae atque consilii existunt, uirorumque consortio multociens usae sunt, et habitum religionis assumpserunt, et demum apostatauerunt, atque ad priorem uomitum sunt reuersae, a nobis et ab omnibus fidelibus a liminibus ecclesiae et a cetu fidelium usque ad satisfactionem sunt eliminandae, et carceribus tradendae, qualiter iuxta apostolum Paulum tradentes huiusmodi hominem sathanae, ut spiritus eius sit saluus in die Domini. De talibus enim Dominus per Moysen loquitur, dicens: "Auferte malum de medio uestri." De quibus per Prophetam ait: "Letabitur iustus, cum uiderit uindictam inpiorum: manus suas lauabit in sanguine peccatoris." De talibus namque, et eorum similibus, atque eisdem consentientibus dicitur: "Quia non solum qui faciunt, sed etiam qui consentiunt facientibus rei sunt."

C. III. Widows and virgins cannot pass to marriage after a religious resolve.

Likewise from the decree of Pope Gelasius sent to the bishops of Sicily, c. 9. We do not permit widows who have remained in a religious resolve through long observance to pass to marriage. Likewise, we prohibit virgins who happen to have passed many years of their age in monasteries from marrying.

C. III. Transire non possunt uiduae et uirgines post religionis propositum ad nuptias.

Item ex Decreto Gelasii Papae ad Sicilienses Episcopos misso, c. 9. Neque uiduas ad nuptias transire patimur, que in religioso proposito diuturna obseruatione permanserunt. Similiter uirgines nubere prohibemus, quas annis plurimis in monasteriis etatem peregisse contigerit.

C. IV. A woman can be corrupted through any sense of the body.

Likewise Cyprian to Pomponius concerning virginity. Nor let anyone think that she can be defended by this excuse: that it can be inspected and proved whether she is a virgin, since both the hand of midwives and the eye are often deceived; and if a virgin is found uncorrupted in that part by which a woman can be so, she could nevertheless have sinned through another part of the body that can be corrupted and yet cannot be inspected. Certainly, the intercourse itself, the embrace itself, the conversation itself and kissing, and the shameful and foul sleeping of two persons lying together—how much disgrace and crime does it confess? If a husband arriving unexpectedly should see his betrothed lying with another, does he not become indignant and rage, and through the pain of jealousy carry a sword in his hand? And when Christ our Lord and judge sees his virgin, dedicated to him and destined for his holiness, lying with another, how indignant and angry is he? And what punishments does he threaten against heavenly unions of this kind? So that each of the brethren may be able to evade his spiritual sword and the coming day of judgment, we ought to make provision and labor with every counsel.

C. IV. Ex quolibet sensu corporis mulier corrumpi potest.

Item Ciprianus ad Pomponium de uirginitate. Nec aliqua putet se posse hac excusatione defendi, quod inspici et probari possit, an uirgo sit, cum et manus obstetricum et oculus sepe fallatur, et, si incorrupta inuenta fuerit uirgo ea parte, qua mulier potest esse, poterit tamen ex alia corporis parte peccasse, que corrumpi potest, et tamen inspici non potest. Certe ipse concubitus, ipse conplexus, ipsa confabulatio, et osculatio, et coniacentium duorum turpis et feda dormitio, quantum dedecoris et criminis confitetur? Si superueniens maritus sponsam suam iacentem cum altero uideat, nonne indignatur et fremit, et per zeli dolorem, portat gladium in manu sua? Et Christus Dominus et iudex noster, cum uirginem suam sibi dicatam et sanctitati suae destinatam iacere cum altero cernit, quam indignatur et irascitur? et quas penas in celestis huiusmodi coniunctionibus conminatur? Cuius ut gladium spiritalem et uenturum iudicii diem unusquisque fratrum possit euadere, omni consilio prouidere et elaborare debemus.

[C. V.]

The same, [in the same epistle]. But if they have done penance for this unlawful intercourse of theirs and withdrawn from one another, let the virgins again be inspected carefully by midwives; and if they are found to be virgins, after receiving communion let them be admitted to the church, yet with this threat: if they afterward return to the same males, or if they dwell with them together in one house and under the same roof, let them be cast out under a graver censure and not afterward be easily received into the church. But if any of them shall have been corrupted and discovered, let her who committed this crime do full penance, for she is now an adulteress not of a husband but of Christ; and therefore, after a just time has been assessed and her exomologesis afterward made, let her return to the church. But if they obstinately persist and do not separate from one another, let them know that with this shameless obstinacy of theirs they can never be admitted by us into the church, lest by their offenses they begin to make for others an example leading to ruin. Nor let them think that a principle of life or salvation stands for them if they are unwilling to obey bishops and priests.

[C. V.]

Idem. [in eadem epistola] Quod si penitenciam huius illiciti concubitus sui egerint, et a se inuicem recesserint, inspiciantur iterum uirgines ab obstetricibus diligenter, et si uirgines inuentae fuerint, accepta conmunione ad ecclesiam admittantur; hac tamen interminatione, ut, si ad eosdem masculos postmodum reuersae fuerint, aut si cum eisdem in una domo et sub eodem tecto simul habitauerint, grauiore censura eiciantur, nec in ecclesia postmodum facile recipiantur. Si autem de eis aliqua corrupta fuerit et deprehensa, agat penitenciam plenam, que hoc crimen admisit que iam non mariti, sed Christi adultera est, et ideo estimato iusto tempore, postea exomoloysi sui facta ad ecclesiam redeat. Quod si obstinate perseuerant, nec se ab inuicem separant, sciant se cum hac sua inpudica obstinatione numquam a nobis admitti in ecclesiam posse, ne exemplum ceteris ad ruinas delictis suis facere incipiant, nec putent sibi uitae aut salutis constare rationem, si episcopis et sacerdotibus obtemperare noluerint.

C. VI. Let a cleric who has committed adultery with a nun be deposed, and a layperson excommunicated.

Likewise from the Sixth Synod, [in Trullo, c. 4]. If any bishop, presbyter, deacon, subdeacon, lector, psalmist, or doorkeeper shall have committed adultery with a woman consecrated to God, let him be deposed, because he corrupted a bride of Christ; but if he is a layperson, let him be excommunicated.

C. VI. Clericus deponatur, laicus excommunicetur, qui cum moniali mechatus fuerit.

Item ex VI. Sinodo. [in Trullo c. 4.] Si quis episcopus, presbiter, aut diaconus, aut subdiaconus, aut lector, aut psalmista, aut hostiarius cum muliere sanctificata Deo mechatus fuerit, deponatur, quia sponsam Christi corrupit; si uero laicus, excommunicetur.

C. VII. Let widows and maidens who marry after assuming the religious habit be suspended from communion.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, c. 8. Concerning widows and maidens who in their own homes changed to a religious habit, whether by their parents or by themselves: if afterward they believe marriages are to be joined contrary to the institutes of the Fathers or the precepts of the canons, let both be held suspended from communion until they amend what they unlawfully perpetrated. But if they neglect to amend it, let them be separated perpetually from communion or the banquet of all Christians.

[PALEA

C. VII. Viduae et puellae, que post religionis habitum nubunt, a conmunione suspendantur.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano IV., c. 8. De uiduis et puellis, que habitum religionis in domibus propriis tam a parentibus, quam per se mutauerunt si postea contra instituta patrum uel precepta canonum coniugia crediderint copulanda, tam diu utrique habeantur a conmunione suspensi, quousque quod illicite perpetrauerunt emendent. Quod si emendare neglexerint, a conmunione uel omnium Christianorum conuiuio perpetuo sint sequestrati.

[PALEA

C. VIII. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin. Let no pontiff attempt to veil widows, as was established in the decrees of Pope Gelasius, chapter 13, because neither divine authority nor the form of the canons has granted it. But if she has professed continence by her own will, it is read in chapter 21 of the same Gelasius: let her intention render an account for itself to God, because, just as according to the Apostle she was by no means prohibited from marrying if she could not contain herself, so, after deliberating with herself, she ought to preserve for God the promised pledge of chastity. But we, supported by the authority of the Fathers, sanction and freely judge in this holy council that if she voluntarily placed upon herself a veil, although unconsecrated, and in church offered an oblation to God among the veiled women, whether she wills it or not she ought thereafter to retain the habit of sanctimony, even if she wishes to affirm by oath that she placed the veil upon herself under this tenor and understanding: that she could remove it again.]

C. VIII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. Viduas autem uelare pontificum nullus attemptet prout statutum est in decretis Gelasii Papae capitulo XIII. quod nec auctoritas diuina, nec canonum forma prestituit. Quod si propria fuerit uoluntate continentiam professa, in eiusdem Gelasii capitulo XXI. legitur, eius intentio pro se reddat rationem Deo, quia, sicut secundum Apostolum, si se continere non poterat, nullatenus nubere uetabatur, sic secum habita deliberatione promissam fidem pudicitiae Deo debet custodire. Nos autem auctoritate Patrum suffulti in hoc sancto concilio sancimus et libere iudicamus, si sponte uelamen quamuis non consecratum sibi inposuerit, et in ecclesia inter uelatas Deo oblationem obtulerit, uelit nolit, sanctimoniae habitum ulterius habere debet, licet sacramento confirmare uelit, eo tenore et ratione sibi uelamen inposuisse, ut iterum posset deponere.]

C. IX. Concerning those who, having a vow of virginity, marry while not yet covered by the sacred veil.

Likewise from the Decrees of Pope Innocent, c. 20, [in the Code of Canons, and epistle 2 to Victricius, c. 13]. But those who are not yet covered by the sacred veil, nevertheless had always declared that they would remain in the virginal resolve, etc. And below: [PALEA. Although they were not veiled, if perhaps they marry, they are to do penance for some time, because their pledge was held by the Lord. For if among human beings a contract of good faith is customarily dissolved for no reason, how much more ought that promise which she covenanted with God not to be dissolved without punishment?] For if the Apostle had said that those who departed from the resolve of widowhood had condemnation because they made their first pledge void, how much more do virgins who attempted to break their pledge have condemnation?

C. IX. De his, que uotum uirginitatis habentes nubunt, necdum sacro uelamine tectae.

Item ex Decretis Innocentii Papae, c. 20. [in Codice canonum, et epist. 2. ad Victricium, c. 13.] He uero, que nondum sacro uelamine sunt tectae, tamen in proposito uirginali semper simulauerant se permanere etc. et infra. [PALEA. Licet uelatae non fuerint, si forte nupserint his agenda aliquanto tempore penitencia est, quia sponsio earum a Domino tenebatur. Si enim inter homines solet bonae fidei contractus nulla ratione dissolui, quanto magis ista pollicitatio, quam cum Deo pepigit, solui sine uindicta non debet?] Nam si Apostolus illas, que a proposito uiduitatis discesserunt, dixerat habere dampnationem, quia primam fidem irritam fecerunt; quanto magis uirgines que frangere fidem conatae sunt.

C. X. Consecrated virgins are not to be admitted to penance if they have married publicly.

Likewise from a decree of the same, chapter 19, [in the Code of Canons, but in the epistle to Victricius, c. 12]. Those who spiritually marry Christ, if they afterward marry publicly, are not to be admitted to penance unless those to whom they joined themselves have departed from the world. For if this principle is observed concerning human beings—that whoever marries another while her husband lives is regarded as an adulteress, and permission to do penance is not granted to her unless one of them has died—how much more is it to be maintained concerning her who previously joined herself to an immortal bridegroom and afterward migrated to human marriage?

C. X. Non sunt admittendae ad penitenciam uirgines sacrae, si publice nupserint.

Item ex Decreto eiusdem, capitulo 19. [in Codice canonum, in epistola autem ad Victricium c. 12.] Que Christo spiritualiter nubunt si postea publice nupserint, non eas admittendas esse ad penitenciam, nisi hii, quibus se iunxerant, de mundo recesserint. Si enim de hominibus hec ratio custoditur, ut quecumque uiuente uiro alteri nupserit, adultera habeatur, nec ei agendae penitenciae licentia conceditur, nisi unus de his fuerit defunctus, quanto magis de illa tenenda est, que ante se inmortali sponso coniunxerat et postea ad humanas transmigrauit nuptias.

C. XI. Shameless persons among monks or nuns are to be eliminated from the church and thrust into prisons.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur, c. 6. We command that shameless and detestable persons—namely, monks and nuns—who, after casting aside the resolve of sanctity, mingled themselves in unlawful and sacrilegious contamination and, brought through desperation to the judgment of conscience, freely begot children from unlawful embraces, are to be eliminated from the assembly of monasteries and gatherings of churches, so that, shut within their prisons and lamenting so great a crime with continual mourning, they can be thoroughly purified by the purgatorial fire of penitence, so that at least at death, solely in view of mercy, assistance may be given to them through the grace of communion.

C. XI. Ab ecclesia eliminandae et ergastulis retrudendae sunt monachorum uel monacharum inpudicae personae.

Item ex Concilio Triburiensi, c. 6. Inpudicas detestabilesque personas monachorum scilicet atque monacharum, que abiecto proposito sanctitatis illicita ac sacrilega contagione se miscuerunt, et in arbitrium conscientiae desperatione perductae, de illicitis conplexibus libere filios procreauerint, a monasteriorum cetu ecclesiarumque conuentibus eliminandas esse mandamus, quatinus retrusae in suis ergastulis tantum facinus continua lamentatione deflentes purificatorio possint penitudinis igne decoqui, ut eis uel ad mortem solius misericordiae intuitu per conmunionis gratiam possit subueniri.

C. XII. If a monk and a virgin consecrated to the Lord marry, let them be excommunicated.

Likewise from the same. We decree that it is not lawful for a virgin who has consecrated herself to God, and likewise a monk, to contract the rights of marriage. But if they are found perpetrating this, let them be excommunicated. We decree, however, that with respect to those who confess, the bishop of that place has authority to grant mercy and humanity.

C. XII. Monachus et uirgo Domino consecrata si nupserint, excommunicentur.

Item ex eodem. Virginem, que se Deo consecrauerit, similiter et monachum decernimus non licere nuptialia iura contrahere. Quod si hoc inuenti fuerint perpetrantes, excommunicentur. Confitentibus autem decreuimus, ut habeat auctoritatem eiusdem loci episcopus misericordiam humanitatemque largiri.

C. XIII. While they live, let those who knowingly unite with nuns afflict themselves with the lamentations of penance.

Likewise from the same. Therefore, let those who knowingly are joined in marriage with nuns, to the injury of Christ, be separated according to the censure of Christian zeal; and let it never be granted to them to be bound by the conjugal bond, but while they live let them afflict themselves vehemently with the lamentations of penance.

C. XIII. Dum uiuunt, lamentis penitenciae se afficiant qui sanctimonialibus scienter copulantur.

Item ex eodem. Hii igitur, qui scientes sanctimonialibus in matrimonio sunt ad iniuriam Christi copulati, iuxta censuram zeli Christiani separentur, et numquam eis concedatur iugali uinculo religari, sed in penitenciae lamentis se uehementer, dum uiuunt, afficiant.

C. XIV. Let those who associate themselves with sacred virgins be deprived of holy communion.

Likewise from the same. We have learned that certain persons rashly associate themselves with sacred virgins and after a resolve dedicated to God mingle in incestuous compacts and sacrilegious unions. It is equitable that they immediately be driven from holy communion and not be received at all except through public and approved penance. Nevertheless, let viaticum not be denied to them as they depart from the world if they have worthily repented.

C. XIV. A sacra conmunione priuentur qui sacris uirginibus se sociant.

Item ex eodem Virginibus sacris se quosdam temere sociare cognouimus, et post dicatum Deo propositum incesta federa sacrilegaque miscere. Quos protinus equum est a sacra conmunione detrudi, et nisi per publicam probatamque penitenciam omnino non recipi. Sed tamen his uiaticum de seculo transeuntibus, si digne penituerint, non negetur.

C. XV. Let a woman who is unwilling to withdraw from fornication be recalled and enclosed in a monastery.

Likewise Gregory. It has come to us that a certain most wicked man, by diabolical instigation, persuaded a woman consecrated to God to leave a monastery; and although she was recalled by a certain man to the place from which she had departed, that most wicked man, again casting her out of the monastery by wicked persuasion, shamelessly retains her with himself. We wish her to be recalled and enclosed in the monastery by the authority of your episcopate.

> C. XV. In monasterio reuocetur ac recludatur que a fornicatione recedere noluerit
> Item Gregorius. Peruenit ad nos, quod quidam uir nequissimus diabolico instinctu de monasterio suaserat exire quandam Deo sacratam, atque a quodam uiro, unde exierat, sit reuocata, rursusque eam uir ille nequissimus iniqua suasione de monasterio eiciens, apud se retineat inpudice. Volumus autem, ut episcopatus tui auctoritate in monasterio reuocetur ac recludatur.

C. XVI. It is not lawful for widows to depart from a sacred resolve after receiving the veil.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, c. 3. Concerning widows who by voluntary will receive from the altar the veil of sacred life, the synod decreed that they remain in the same resolve. For we have decreed that it is not lawful, after they have once consecrated themselves to the Lord beneath the veil, for permission again to be granted to them to lie to the Holy Spirit.

> C. XVI. Non est fas uiduis post susceptum uelamen a sacro proposito discedere.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi, c. 3. Viduae, que spontanea uoluntate ab altari sacrae conuersationis uelamen suscipiunt decreuit sinodus in eodem proposito permanere. Non enim fas esse decreuimus, postquam se semel Domino sub uelo consecrauerint, iterum eis concedi Spiritui sancto mentiri.

C. XVII. Let one who takes in marriage a woman covered by the sacred veil be anathema.

Likewise from the same. If anyone shall have taken in marriage a woman consecrated by the sacred veil and, after a resolve dedicated to God, shall have mingled in incestuous compacts and sacrilegious unions, as is read in chapter 20 of the constitutions of Pope Gelasius, it is equitable that he immediately be driven from holy communion and not be received at all except through public and approved penance. If they have repented, let viaticum not be denied them as they depart from the world. § 1. In the Council of Chalcedon, chapter 17: "Let those perpetrating this be excommunicated; let mercy be granted to those confessing by the authority of the bishop." § 2. In the epistle of Pope Siricius, c. 6: "If veiled women consecrated to God, after casting aside the resolve of sanctity, secretly mingle themselves in sacrilegious contamination and publicly and freely beget children from unlawful embraces, it has been judged that these marriages and detestable persons are to be eliminated from the assembly of monasteries and gatherings of churches, so that, thrust into prisons, they may lament so great a crime with continual mourning." Hence, both by the word of the Lord and by canonical authority, we command in this holy synod that they be separated altogether and bound by oath not thereafter to dwell under one roof.

> C. XVII. Qui sacro tectam uelamine in coniugium ducit anathema sit.
> Item ex eodem. Si quis sacro uelamine consecratam in coniugium duxerit, et post dicatum Deo propositum incesta federa sacrilegaque miscuerit, ut in constitutis Gelasii Papae capitulo XX. legitur, protinus equum est a sacra conmunione detrudi, et nisi per publicam probatamque penitenciam non recipi omnino. Si penituerint, transeuntibus de seculo uiaticum non negetur. §. 1. In Calcedonensi concilio capitulo XVII.: "Hoc perpetrantes excommunicentur; confitentibus auctoritate episcopi misericordia largiatur." §. 2. In epistola Syricii Papae c. 6.: "Velatae et Deo consecratae, si abiecto proposito sanctitatis clanculo sacrilega contagione se miscuerint, et illicitis conplexibus publice et libere filios procreauerint, has nuptias detestabilesque personas a monasteriorum cetu et ecclesiarum conuentibus eliminandas esse iudicatum est, quatinus detrusae ergastulis tantum facinus continua lamentatione defleant." Unde et uerbo Domini, et canonica auctoritate in hac sancta sinodo precipimus, ut omnino separentur, et iuramento colligentur, ut ulterius sub uno non cohabitent tecto.

C. XVIII. Let one who has cast aside religious clothing be compelled to return to the habit and enclosed in a monastery.

Likewise Gregory to Vitalian, bishop of Siponto, [Book VII, indiction 1, epistle 9]. If you either knew how to be the guardian of the religious habit or were a bishop, it would not have been lawful, while you were placed there, for the daughter of Tullianus, master of soldiers of glorious memory, after casting aside religious clothing, either to return to secular dress or to send a perverse letter to us. But because you are weighed down by excessive sloth and torpor, to your disgrace an unlawful matter has for the present been committed there with impunity. For, as we stated before, if you had been solicitous, the punishment of the most wicked woman ought to have reached us before her fault. Therefore, because you are so dull and so negligent that, unless you experience canonical coercion against yourself, you do not know how to preserve strictness and discipline in others, we will demonstrate to you at a fitting time, if it pleases the Lord, in what manner you ought to be solicitous. § 1. Therefore, upon receiving the present writings, awake and, now at last aroused, execute what, oppressed by idleness, you have delayed until now. Let it therefore belong to your urgency, together with Sergius our defender, to seize the aforesaid woman and immediately not only to recall her, without any excuse, to the habit wickedly contemned, but also to thrust her into a monastery where she can be guarded altogether strictly; and display such complete solicitude concerning her that by your strictness she may be able to recognize how impious is what she committed. § 2. In this matter, if any layperson—which we do not believe—shall attempt by any device to oppose you, suspend him from participation in most holy communion and hasten to report it to us, so that, since he did not perceive by his own consideration how execrable is what he presumes, he may recognize it by the quality of his correction. § 3. But in all these things endeavor to show yourself so cautious and vigilant that you may be able not to double your fault by neglect but to lessen it somewhat by solicitude.

C. XVIII. Ad habitum redire cogatur, et recludatur in monasterio, qui religiosam uestem abiecit.

Item Gregorius Vitaliano, Episcopo Sipontino. [lib. VII. Indict. 1. epist. 9.] Si custos religiosi habitus, aut esse nosses episcopus, filiam gloriosae memoriae Tulliani magistri militiae, te illic posito proiectis religiosis uestibus nec ad secularem reuerti habitum, nec ad nos licuisset peruersam epistolam destinare. Sed quia nimia desidia ac torpore deprimeris, in tuo dedecore res ad presens illicita inpune conmissa est. Nam sicut, prefati sumus, si sollicitus extitisses, prius ad nos ultio mulieris prauissimae quam culpa debuit peruenire. Quia ergo tantum hebes tantumque es negligens, ut, nisi canonicam in te fueris cohercionem expertus, in aliis districtionem et disciplinam nescias custodire, qualiter debeas esse sollicitus congruo tibi, si Domino placuerit, tempore demonstrabimus. §. 1. Presentia igitur scripta suscipiens, euigila et excitatus saltim exequere quod pressus nunc usque ignauia distulisti. Instantiae ergo tuae sit predictam mulierem una cum Sergio defensore nostro conprehendere, et statim non solum ad male contemptum habitum sine excusatione aliqua reuocare, sed etiam in monasterio, ubi omnino districte ualeat custodiri, detrudere, et ita omnem circa illam sollicitudinem exhibere, ut quam sit nefarium quod conmisit ex tua possit districtione cognoscere. §. 2. Qua in re si quis (quod non credimus) laicorum aliquo tibi ingenio temptauerit obsistendum, a sanctissimae eum conmunionis participatione suspende nobisque renunciare festina, ut quantum sit execrabile quod presumit, postquam consideratione propria non aduertit, emendationis qualitate cognoscat. §. 3. In his autem omnibus ita cautum stude te uigilantemque ostendere, ut culpam tuam non geminare neglectu, sed aliquantisper ualeas sollicitudine minuere.

C. XIX. Let a woman who returned from a religious resolve to secular dress be handed over to strict custody.

The same to Sergius the defender, [Book VII, indiction 1, epistle 10]. If you were a man or possessed any discernment, you ought to have existed as such a guardian of regular discipline that unlawful things committed there would be corrected by punishment before a report of them reached us. But while excessive foolishness makes you negligent, we are not only offended concerning those things but are likewise provoked to punish your sloth. Therefore, with every delay and every excuse set aside, together with our brother and fellow bishop Vitalian hasten to seize the daughter of Tullianus, master of soldiers of glorious memory, who, after casting aside the religious garments that she voluntarily assumed, disfigured herself with lay clothing; recall her again to the religious habit and send her into a monastery where she can be guarded altogether strictly. Do not permit her custody to be relaxed in any way until you receive our writings again. For if in any way you are negligent or slow in this matter, know that punishment will be inflicted upon you so strictly that you may be able, through punishment cutting away, to learn what you do not know from yourself; because, as we have said, if you possessed the understanding of a human being, you ought already to have recognized and done, even with punishment, the things that you are now commanded to do.

C. XIX. Districtae custodiae tradatur que a religionis proposito ad secularem habitum rediit.

Idem Sergio Defensori. [lib. VII. Indict. 1. ep. 10.] Si homo esses, aut discretionem aliquam habuisses, ita regularis disciplinae debuisti custos existere, ut ea, que illicite conmittuntur, ante uindicta corrigerentur quam ad nos eorum nuncius perueniret. Sed dum nimia te facit stulticia negligentem, non solum de illis offendimur, sed etiam ad ulciscendum desidiam tuam nichilominus prouocamur. Omni ergo dilatione omnique excusatione postposita filiam gloriosae memoriae Tulliani magistri miliciae, que proiectis, quas sponte assumpsit, religiosis uestibus, indumentis se laicis deturpauit, una cum fratre et coepiscopo nostro Vitaliano festina conprehendere, atque ad religiosum rursus habitum reuocare, ac in monasterio mittere, ubi districte omnino ualeat custodiri, nec eius custodiam aliquatenus releuari permittas, quousque denuo nostra scripta susceperis. Nam si quolibet modo in hac re negligens uel lentus extiteris, ita in te districtissime noueris uindicandum, ut quod ex te nescis pena possis resecante cognoscere, quia sicut diximus si intellectum hominis habuisses, que facere modo preciperis, ante debueras etiam cum ultione a te facta cognoscere.

C. XX. Permission to marry is not granted to those who have decreed to observe continence.

Likewise Augustine, On the Conflict of Vices and Virtues, [c. 24]. Permission to marry is granted to some —namely, those who have by no means professed virginity or the chastity of widowhood. But it is not granted to others—namely, those who have decreed to be virgins or continent. Fornication, however, is conceded with impunity to no one.

C. XX. Non tribuitur licentia nubendi, qui continentiam seruare decreuerunt.

Item Augustinus de conflictu uiciorum atque uirtutum. [cap. 24.] Nubendi licentia quibusdam tribuitur: illis uidelicet, qui uirginitatem uel castitatem uidualem nequaquam professi sunt. Quibusdam autem non tribuitur: illis uidelicet, qui uirgines uel continentes esse decreuerunt. Fornicatio autem nulli inpune conceditur.

C. XXI. Those who violate a resolve of continence are worse than adulterers.

The same in the book On the Good of Marriage. It is manifest that women who have lapsed from the better resolve of holier chastity that is vowed to God, if they marry, are worse than adulteresses.

C. XXI. Peiores sunt adulteris qui continentiae propositum uiolant.

Idem in libro de bono coniugii. Proposito meliore lapsas, si nupserint, feminas a castitate sanctiori, que uouetur Deo, adulteris esse peiores manifestum est.

C. XXII. A monk and a virgin who has dedicated herself to God cannot be joined in marriage.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon, [c. 16]. If any virgin has dedicated herself to God, and likewise a monk, it is not lawful for them to be joined in marriage. But if they are found doing this, let them remain excommunicated. We establish, however, that humanity can be shown to them if the bishop of the place has so approved.

C. XXII. Monachus et uirgo, que se Deo dedicauit, nuptiis iungi non possunt.

Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. [c. 16.] Si qua uirgo se dedicauerit Deo, similiter monachus, non licet eis nuptiis iungi. Si uero fuerint inuenti hoc facientes, maneant excommunicati. Statuimus uero posse eis fieri humanitatem, si ita probauerit episcopus loci.

C. XXIII. Let a deaconess who marries after ordination be anathema.

Likewise from the same, [c. 15]. We establish that a deaconess ought not to be ordained before forty years, and this with diligent examination. But if she has received ordination and has observed the ministry for however much time, and afterward hands herself over to marriage, doing injury to the grace of God, let her be anathema together with the one who joined in her marriage.

C. XXIII. Diaconissa, que post ordinationem nubit, anathema sit.

Item ex eodem. [c. 15.] Diaconissam non debere ante annos quadraginta ordinari statuimus, et hoc cum diligenti probatione. Si uero susceperit ordinationem, et quantocumque tempore obseruauerit ministerium, et postea se nuptiis tradiderit, iniuriam faciens gratiae Dei, hec anathema sit cum eo, qui in illius nuptiis conuenerit.

C. XXIV. Those who violate promised virginity are numbered among bigamists.

Likewise from the Synod of Ancyra, [c. 18]. As many as have violated promised virginity after contemning their profession ought to be regarded among digamists—that is, those who have passed to second marriages.

C. XXIV. Inter bigamas reputantur qui uirginitatem pollicitam preuaricantur.

Item ex Sinodo Anchiritana. [c. 18.] Quotquot uirginitatem pollicitam preuaricatae sunt professione contempta, inter digamos, id est qui ad secundas nuptias transierunt, haberi debent.

C. XXV. Communion is not to be given even at the end to virgins dedicated to God if they have served lust.

Likewise from the Council of Elvira, [c. 13]. If virgins who dedicated themselves to God shall have lost the covenant of virginity and served that same lust, not understanding what they lost, it was resolved that communion is not to be given to them even at the end. But if they shall have persuaded themselves that they lapsed through infirmity of the body, and during the time of their life have done penance and abstained from intercourse, it was resolved that they ought to receive communion at the end.

C. XXV. Virginibus Deo dedicatis nec in fine danda est conmunio, si libidini seruierint.

Item ex Concilio Elibertano. [c. 13.] Virgines, que Deo se dedicauerunt, si perdiderint pactum uirginitatis, atque eidem libidini seruierint, non intelligentes quid amiserint, placuit nec in fine dandam eis esse conmunionem. Quod si semet persuaserint, quod infirmitate corporis lapsae fuerint, et tempore uitae suae penitenciam egerint, et a coitu se abstinuerint, placuit eas in fine conmunionem accipere debere.

C. XXVI. Let the daughter of a cleric be compelled to penance if, after being vowed, she takes a husband.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 30]. Concerning the daughter of a bishop, presbyter, or deacon: if she shall have been vowed and takes a husband, if her father or mother receives her into their affection, let them be held as strangers from communion. But let the father know that he will render an account in council. Let the woman not be admitted to communion unless, after her husband has died, she has done penance. But if while he is living she withdraws and does penance or seeks communion, let her receive it when she is failing at the final end of her life.

C. XXVI. Cogatur ad penitenciam filia clerici, si deuota maritum duxerit.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 30.] De filia episcopi uel presbiteri, siue diaconi, si deuota fuerit, et maritum duxerit, si eam pater uel mater in affectum receperit, a conmunione habeantur alieni. Pater uero in concilio causas se nouerit prestaturum. Mulier uero non admittatur ad conmunionem, nisi marito defuncto egerit penitenciam. Si autem uiuente eo secesserit, et penitenciam, egerit, uel petierit conmunionem, in ultimo fine uitae suae deficiens eam accipiat.

C. XXVII. A woman under a vow is not to be received into the church unless she has ceased to sin.

Likewise from the First Council of Toledo, [c. 16]. A woman under a vow who sins is not to be received into the church unless she has ceased to sin; and if, after ceasing, she has performed suitable penance for ten years, let her receive communion. But before she is admitted to prayer in the church, let her approach no banquet of a Christian woman. But if she has been admitted, let even the woman who received her be held in abstinence. Let an equal punishment also constrain her corrupter. But she who has taken a husband is not to be admitted to penance unless either she has begun to live chastely while her husband is living or after he has died.

C. XXVII. Deuota, nisi peccare desierit, non est in ecclesia recipienda.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano I. [c. 16.] Deuotam peccantem non recipiendam esse in ecclesia nisi peccare desierit, et, si desinens egerit aptam penitenciam decem annis, recipiat conmunionem. Prius autem, quam in ecclesia admittatur ad orationem, ad nullius conuiuium Christianae mulieris accedat. Quod si admissa fuerit, etiam hec, que eam receperit, habeatur abstenta. Corruptorem etiam par pena constringat. Que autem maritum acceperit non admittatur ad penitenciam, nisi aut uiuente marito caste uiuere ceperit, aut postquam ipse decesserit.

C. XXVIII. Concerning a nun who is led to a fall into adultery.

Likewise Gregory to John, bishop of Cagliari, [Book III, epistle 9]. If any of the nuns, either through a former permission or through a depraved custom of impunity, has been led to a fall into adultery, or in future shall have been led into that abyss, after the fitting severity of punishment we wish her to be committed for penance to another and stricter monastery of virgins, so that there she may devote herself to prayers and fasts, may thus make progress by doing penance, and may furnish to others a fearsome example of stricter discipline. But the man who shall have been found in any iniquity with women of this kind is to be deprived of communion if he is a layperson; but if he is a cleric, after also being removed from his office, let him be thrust into a monastery continually to lament his transgressions.

C. XXVIII. De monacha, que ad lapsum adulterii deducitur.

Item Gregorius Iohanni, Episcopo Caralitano. [lib. III. epist. 9.] Si qua monacharum uel per antiquiorem licentiam, uel per inpunitatis prauam consuetudinem ad lapsum adulterii deducta fuerit, aut in futurum fuerit perducta uoraginem, hanc post conpetentis seueritatem uindictae in aliud districtius monasterium uirginum in penitenciam uolumus redigi, ut illic orationibus atque ieiuniis uacet, et sic penitendo proficiat, et metuendum ceteris artioris disciplinae prestet exemplum. Is autem, qui cum huiusmodi feminis in aliqua fuerit iniquitate repertus, conmunione priuetur, si laicus: si uero clericus est, a suo remotus quoque offitio pro suis continue lugendis excessibus in monasterium detrudatur.

C. XXIX. After worthy penance, let those who transgress against religious women receive communion.

The same to Bishop Januarius, [Book III, epistle 24]. But those who transgressed against women who departed from monasteries and are now said to be suspended from communion, if Your Fraternity shall have perceived that they worthily repented of such a crime, we wish you to recall to holy communion.

C. XXIX. Post dignam penitenciam conmunionem recipiant qui in religiosas mulieres excedunt.

Idem Ianuario Episcopo. [lib. III. epist. 24.] Eos autem, qui in mulieres, que egressae sunt de monasteriis, excesserunt, et nunc dicuntur conmunione suspensi, si fraternitas tua de tali facinore digne penituisse preuiderit, ad sacram conmunionem uolumus te reuocare.

C. XXX. Concerning the laws of the emperors.

Likewise from the Novels of Emperor Justinian. If anyone shall have abducted, solicited, or corrupted an ascetic woman, a deaconess, a nun, or another woman having a religious life or habit, let his goods and those of the persons contaminated by participation in this crime be claimed for the religious house in which such a woman dwelt, through the religious bishops, stewards, provincial governors, and their officials; but let those persons themselves be subjected to capital punishment. Let the woman, moreover, be sought everywhere and, together with her property, handed over to a more secure monastery. But if she was a deaconess having legitimate children, let the lawful portion be furnished to her children.

C. XXX. De legibus inperatorum.

Item ex Nouellis Iustiniani Inperatoris. Si quis rapuerit, uel sollicitauerit, uel corruperit assistriam, uel diaconissam, uel monastriam, uel aliam mulierem religiosam uitam uel habitum habentem, bona ipsius, et eorum, qui huius sceleris conmunione contaminati sunt, religioso loco uendicentur, in quo talis mulier habitabat, per religiosos episcopos, et yconomos, et presides prouinciarum, et offitiales eorum; ipsi autem capitali periculo subiciantur. Mulier autem ubique inuestigetur, et cum suis rebus monasterio cautiori tradatur. Sin autem diaconissa fuerit liberos habens legitimos, pars legitima liberis eius prestetur.

C. XXXI. Let women veiled under the pretext of religion observe the religious habit chastely.

Likewise from a decree of Pope Eugenius, [II, in the Roman Council, c. 29]. Let women veiled under the pretext of religion either live according to the rule in a monastery or chastely observe the habit they assumed in their own homes.

C. XXXI. Caste obseruent religionis habitum, que religionis obtentu uelantur.

Item ex Decreto Eugenii Papae. [II. in Concilio Romano, c. 29.] Mulieres obtentu religionis uelatae aut in monasterio regulariter uiuant, aut in domibus suis susceptum habitum caste obseruent.

C. XXXII. Let a monk who takes a wife never obtain an office of sacred rank.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, [I, cc. 22 and 23]. Let it not be lawful for a monk to have an orarium or girdles in a monastery. And if afterward he shall have been joined to a wife, as one guilty of so great a transgression let him never obtain an office of ecclesiastical rank.

C. XXXII. Monachus uxorem ducens numquam sacri gradus sortiatur offitium.

Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I., c. 22. et 23.] Monacho orarium in monasterio uel zonas habere non liceat. Et si postea uxori fuerit sociatus, tantae preuaricationis reus numquam ecclesiastici gradus sortiatur offitium.

C. XXXIII. Before professing continence, let widows marry whom they wish.

Likewise Augustine, On the Good of Widowhood, [c. 28]. Let widows who do not contain themselves marry before, having professed continence, they vow it to God. Unless they render what they vow, they are justly condemned.

C. XXXIII. Ante professam continentiam nubant uiduae quibus uolunt.

Item Augustinus de bono uiduitatis. [c. 28.] Viduae, que se non continent, nubant ante, quam professae continentiam Deo uoueant. Quod nisi reddant, iure dampnantur.

C. XXXIV. Let a widow not be permitted to abandon her vow after a profession of continence.

Likewise Nicholas to Archbishop Charles and his suffragans. Indeed, if a widow who placed the sacred veil upon her head prayed in church among the other veiled women and offered oblations with them, and if she professed that she would remain in the same habit, promising that she would never lay aside the veil of religion, let her not presume to depart from the observance of religion.

> C. XXXIV. Non permittatur uidua post professionem continentiae uotum deserere.
> Item Nykolaus Carolo Archiepiscopo, et eius Suffraganeis. Vidua quidem, que capiti sacrum uelamen inposuit, si inter ceteras uelatas feminas in ecclesia orauerit, et oblationes cum illis obtulerit, si professa est in eodem habitu permanere, spondens numquam uelamen religionis deponere, a religionis obseruantia discedere non presumat.

C. XXXV. A profession of widowhood made before a bishop after the habit has been assumed is permitted to no one to violate.

Likewise from the Council of Orange, [c. 27]. We say that a profession to preserve widowhood, made before a bishop in the sacristy after a widow's garment has been imposed before the bishop, is not to be violated. We decree that one who deserts such a profession is deservedly to be condemned.

> C. XXXV. Professio uiduitatis coram episcopo facta post habitum susceptum nulli uiolari permittitur.
> Item ex Concilio Aurasico. [c. 27.] Viduitatis seruandae professionem coram episcopo in secretario habitam, inposita coram episcopo ueste uiduali, dicimus non esse uiolandam. Ipsam talis professionis desertricem merito esse dampnandam decernimus.

C. XXXVI. Let the manner and solemnity of making a profession be observed in this order.

Likewise from the Council of Toledo, [X, c. 5]. Let all women coming to sacred religion cover their heads with a mantle and make a written and confirmed profession, after which writing let them not be permitted to relapse into the audacity of transgression. § 1. But whichever of all these women shall be found to have given either their mind or their clothing over to transgression, let them bear a sentence of excommunication and, after their habit has again been changed, let them remain bound in monasteries under the hardships of arduous penance until they close their final day.

> Item ex Concilio Tolletano. [X., c. 5.] Omnes feminae uenientes ad sacram religionem pallio capita contegant, et conscriptam roboratamque professionem faciant, post quam scripturam non sinantur relabi ad preuaricationis audaciam. §. 1. Que uero ex omnibus his fuerint repertae animum aut uestem in transgressionem dedisse, excommunicationis sententiam ferant, et rursus mutato habitu in monasteriis, donec diem ultimum claudant, sub erumpnis arduae penitenciae permaneant religatae.

C. XXXVII. Those who violate the bodies of women consecrated to God are sons of perdition.

Likewise from the Council of Arles. It is to be known by all that the bodies of women consecrated to God, consecrated to God through the vow of their own pledge and the words of a priest, are proved by the testimonies of the Scriptures to be temples; and therefore their violators are known to be sacrilegious persons and, according to the Apostle, sons of perdition.

[PALEA.

> C. XXXVII. Filii sunt perditionis qui uiolant corpora feminarum Deo sacratarum.
> Item ex Concilio Arelatensi. Sciendum est omnibus, quod Deo sacratarum feminarum corpora per uotum propriae sponsionis et uerba sacerdotis Deo consecrata esse templa scripturarum testimoniis conprobantur, et ideo uiolatores earum sacrilegi, ac iuxta Apostolum filii perditionis esse noscuntur.
> [PALEA.

C. XXXVIII. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise. If widows choose to marry before they profess continence, let them marry those whom by their own will they wished to have as husbands. Let a similar condition also be maintained concerning virgins, and let them not be compelled to receive husbands contrary to the will of their parents or their own will.]

> C. XXXVIII. De eodem.
> Item. Viduae, si prius, quam continentiam profiteantur, nubere elegerint, illis nubant, quos propria uoluntate uoluerint habere maritos. Similis conditio et de uirginibus habeatur, nec extra uoluntatem parentum uel suam cogantur accipere maritos.]

C. XXXIX. Let monks joined to wives be confined in monasteries.

Likewise Gregory to Artemius the subdeacon, in epistle 41, [Book I]. And because we have learned that some monks have leapt forth to such great wickedness that they publicly take wives, we command you to seek them out with every vigilance and, after exercising coercion upon those found, cause them to be returned to the monasteries where they had been monks.

> C. XXXIX. In monasteriis retrudantur monachi uxoribus sociati.
> Item Gregorius Artemio Subdiacono, in epistola 41. [lib. I.] Et quia aliquos monachorum usque ad tantum nefas prosiluisse cognouimus, ut uxores publice sortiantur, precipimus ut sub omni uigilantia requiras, et inuentos habita cohercione in monasteriis, quo monachi fuerant, remitti facias.

C. XL. Concerning a nun who is led to a fall into adultery.

Likewise Pope Innocent, [II, in the Roman Council, c. 7, § Ut lex]. So that the law of continence and purity pleasing to God may be extended among ecclesiastical persons and sacred orders, we establish that bishops, presbyters, deacons, subdeacons, canons regular, monks, and professed converts who, transgressing their sacred resolve, shall have presumed to join wives to themselves are to be separated. For we judge that a union of this kind, which is known to have been contracted contrary to the ecclesiastical rule, is not matrimony. After being separated from one another, let them also perform penance worthy of such great transgressions. We decree that this same thing is also to be observed concerning women religious if—may it not happen—they attempt to marry.

GRATIAN. By all these authorities, those under vows are prohibited from contracting marriages, and some of them, if they contract them, are ordered to be separated. PART II. Augustine, on the contrary, asserts that separations of such persons are sinful, speaking thus, [in the book On the Good of Widowhood, c. 8]:

> C. XL. De monacha que ad lapsum adulterii deducitur.
>
> Item Innocentius Papa [II. in Concilio Romano, c. 7. §. Ut lex.] Ut lex continentiae et Deo placens mundicia in ecclesiasticis personis et sacris ordinibus dilatetur, statuimus, quatinus episcopi, presbiteri, diaconi, subdiaconi, regulares canonici, monachi atque conuersi professi, qui sacrum transgredientes propositum uxores sibi populare presumpserint, separentur. Huiusmodi namque copulationem, quam contra ecclesiasticam regulam constat esse contractam, matrimonium non esse censemus. Qui etiam ab inuicem separati pro tantis excessibus condignam penitenciam agant. Id ipsum quoque de sanctimonialibus feminis, si (quod absit) nubere adtemptauerint, obseruari decernimus.
> Gratian. His omnibus auctoritatibus uouentes prohibentur contrahere matrimonia, et quidam eorum, si contraxerint, separari iubentur. II. Pars. Augustinus econtra talium separationes peccatum asserit esse, ita dicens: [in libro de bono uiduitatis, c. 8.]

C. XLI. The marriages of persons under vows are not to be dissolved.

The good of marriage is indeed always a good—a good that has always existed among the people of God—but at one time it was obedience to the law, now it is a remedy for infirmity, and in some persons it is a consolation of human nature. For applying oneself to the procreation of children, not after the manner of dogs through promiscuous use of women but in the honorable order of marriage, is now an affection to be approved in a human being; and nevertheless a Christian mind thinking upon heavenly things more praiseworthily surpasses and conquers it. But because, as the Lord says, "Not all receive this word," let one who can receive it receive it; let her who does not contain herself marry; let her who has not begun deliberate; let her who has set out persevere. Let no occasion be given to the adversary; let no offering be withdrawn from Christ. § 1. For in the bond of marriage, if chastity is preserved, condemnation is not feared. But in virginal and widowed continence the excellence of a more ample gift is sought; once it has been sought and chosen and offered by the obligation of a vow, not only to enter upon marriage, but even if they do not marry, to will to marry is now damnable. For to demonstrate this the Apostle did not say, "When they have lived in pleasures, they marry in Christ," but, "They wish to marry, having condemnation," he says, "because they have made their first pledge void"—even if not by marrying, nevertheless by willing. This is not because marriages themselves, even those of such women, are judged worthy of condemnation; rather, the deceit against their resolve is condemned, fidelity to a broken vow is condemned, and what is condemned is not the taking up of a lower good but the fall from a higher good. Finally, such women are condemned not because they entered into the pledge of marriage afterward but because they made void their first pledge of continence. To intimate this briefly, the Apostle did not wish to say that those who marry after a resolve of more ample holiness have condemnation—not because they are not condemned, but lest marriages themselves be thought condemned in them. Rather, when he had said, "They wish to marry," he immediately added, "having condemnation," and said why: "because they have made their former pledge void," so that it might appear that the will which fell from its resolve is condemned, whether marriages follow or are absent. § 2. Consequently, those who say that the marriages of such women are not marriages but rather adulteries do not seem to me to consider with sufficient acuteness and diligence what they say. For a likeness to the truth deceives them. Because those who do not marry in Christian holiness are said to choose marriage with Christ, some persons argue from this, saying: If a woman who marries another while her husband lives is an adulteress, as the Lord himself defined in the Gospel, but Christ lives, over whom death shall have no further dominion, then she who had chosen marriage with him is an adulteress if she marries a man. § 3. Those who say this are indeed moved by an acute argument, but they pay too little attention to how great an absurdity follows this reasoning. For since a woman, while her husband is living and with his consent, praiseworthily vows continence to Christ, according to their reasoning no woman ought to do this, lest Christ himself—may it be impious to think it—commit adultery, to whom she marries while her husband is living. Next, since first marriages are of better merit than second marriages, may it be far from holy widows to hold the opinion that Christ appears to them as though a second husband. For they had him even before, when they faithfully served in subjection to their husbands, not carnally but spiritually as a husband; the church herself, of which they are members, is his spouse, and in the integrity of faith, hope, and charity she is wholly a virgin, not only in sacred virgins but also in married faithful persons. For the Apostle says to the universal church, of which all those women are members: "I have betrothed you to one husband, to present you as a chaste virgin to Christ." But that husband knows how to make a virgin spouse fruitful without corruption, for he was also able to have a mother bring him forth in that same flesh without corruption. § 4. Moreover, through this insufficiently considered opinion, by which they think that the marriages of women who have lapsed from a sacred resolve are not marriages if they marry, no small evil occurs: wives are separated from husbands as though they were adulteresses, not wives; and while they wish to restore the separated women to continence, they make their husbands true adulterers when, while their wives are living, they take others. § 5. Wherefore I indeed cannot say that if women who have lapsed from a better resolve marry, their unions are adulteries and not marriages; but I would plainly not hesitate to say that lapses and falls from the holier chastity that is vowed to God are worse than adulteries. For if—as is in no way to be doubted—it pertains to the offense of Christ when a member does not preserve fidelity to her husband, how much more gravely is he offended when fidelity is not preserved to him in that matter in which he demands what was offered though he had not demanded that it be offered? For when anyone does not render what he vowed, not compelled by command but admonished by counsel, the less necessity he had to vow, the more he increases the iniquity of the defrauded vow.

C. XLI. Coniugia uouentium non sunt dissoluenda.

Nuptiarum bonum semper quidem est bonum, quod bonum semper in populo Dei fuit, sed aliquando fuit legis obsequium, nunc est infirmitatis remedium, in quibusdam uero humanitatis solatium. Filiorum quippe procreationi operam dare, non canino more per usum promiscuum feminarum, sed honesto ordine coniugali nunc est in homine probandus affectus: et ipsum tamen laudabilius transcendit et uincit celestia cogitans animus Christianus. Sed quoniam, sicut ait Dominus, non omnes capiunt uerbum hoc, qui potest capere capiat, que se non continet nubat, que non cepit deliberet, que egressa est perseueret; nulla aduersario detur occasio, nulla subtrahatur Christo oblatio. §. 1. In coniugali quippe uinculo, si pudicitia conseruatur, dampnatio non timetur. Sed in uirginali et uiduali continentia excellentia muneris amplioris expetitur, qua expetita et electa, et uoti debito oblata, iam non solum capessere nuptias, sed, etiam si non nubant, nubere uelle dampnabile est. Nam ut hoc demonstraret Apostolus, non ait, cum in deliciis egerint, in Christo nubunt, sed: "nubere uolunt, habentes" (inquit) "dampnationem, quoniam primam fidem irritam fecerunt," etsi non nubendo, tamen uolendo; non quia ipsae nuptiae uel etiam talium dampnandae iudicentur, sed dampnatur propositi fraus, dampnatur fracti uoti fides, dampnatur non susceptio a bono inferiore, sed ruina ex bono superiore. Postremo dampnantur tales, non quia coniugalem fidem posterius inierunt, sed quia continentiae primam fidem irritam fecerunt. Quod ut breuiter insinuaret Apostolus, noluit eas dicere habere dampnationem, que post amplioris sanctitatis propositum nubunt, non quia non dampnantur, sed ne in eis ipsae nuptiae dampnari putarentur; sed cum dixisset: "nubere uolunt," continuo addidit: "habentes dampnationem," et dixit quare: "quoniam priorem fidem irritam fecerunt," ut uoluntas, que a proposito cecidit, appareat esse dampnata, siue subsequantur nuptiae siue desint. §. 2. Proinde, qui dicunt talium nuptias non esse nuptias, sed potius adulteria, non michi uidentur satis acute ac diligenter considerare quid dicant. Fallit quippe eos similitudo ueritatis. Quia enim coniugium Christi dicuntur eligere que Christiana sanctitate non nubunt, hinc argumentantur quidam, dicentes: Si uiro suo uiuo que alteri nubit adultera est, sicut ipse Dominus in euangelio diffiniuit uiuit autem Christus, cui mors ultra non dominabitur, que ergo coniugium eius elegerat, si homini nubit, adultera est. §. 3. Qui dicunt hoc acute quidem mouentur, sed parum adtendunt, hanc argumentationem quanta rerum sequatur absurditas. Cum enim laudabiliter etiam uiuente uiro ex eius consensu continentiam femina Christo uoueat, secundum istorum rationem nulla hoc facere debet, ne ipse Christus (quod sentire nefas est) adulterium faciat, cui uiuente marito nubit. Deinde cum primae nuptiae melioris sint meriti quam secundae, absit, ut sanctarum uiduarum iste sit sensus, ut Christus eis uideatur quasi secundus maritus. Ipsum enim habebant et antea (quando uiris suis subditae fideliter seruiebant) non carnaliter, sed spiritualiter uirum, cui ipsa ecclesia, cuius membra sunt, coniunx est, que fidei, spei et karitatis integritate non solum in uirginibus sacris, sed etiam in coniugatis fidelibus tota uirgo est. Uniuersae quippe ecclesiae, cuius illa omnia membra sunt, Apostolus dicit: "Aptaui uos uni uiro uirginem castam exhibere Christo." Nouit autem ille uirginem coniugem sine corruptione fetare, quem in ipsa carne etiam potuit mater sine corruptione procreare. §. 4. Fit autem per hanc minus consideratam oppinionem, qua putant lapsarum a sancto proposito feminarum, si nupserint, non esse coniugia, non paruum malum, ut a maritis separentur uxores, quasi adulterae sint, non uxores; et, cum uolunt eas separatas reddere continentiae, faciunt maritos earum adulteros ueros, cum suis uxoribus uiuis alteras ducunt. §. 5. Quapropter non possum quidem dicere, a proposito meliore lapsas si nupserint feminas, adulteria esse, non coniugia: sed plane non dubitauerim dicere, lapsus et ruinas a castitate sanctiore, que uouetur Deo, adulteriis esse peiores. Si enim (quod nullo modo dubitandum est) ad offensionem Christi pertinet, cum membrum fidem non seruat marito, quanto grauius offenditur, cum illi ipsi non seruatur fides in eo, quod exigit oblatum quod non exegerat offerendum? Cum enim quisque non reddit quod non inperio conpulsus, sed consilio conmonitus uouit, tanto magis fraudati uoti auget iniquitatem, quanto minus habuit uouendi necessitatem.

C. XLII. Concerning widows who have made their first pledge void.

Likewise Gelasius, [in the epistle to the bishops of Lucania and Bruttium, c. 23]. We have spoken above broadly and sufficiently concerning widows who are to be veiled under no blessing. But if by their own will, with a changeable mind, they tread underfoot the chastity professed after their former marriage, it will be at their peril by what satisfaction they ought to placate God, because according to the Apostle they have made their first pledge void. For just as, if perhaps they could not contain themselves, they were by no means prohibited from marrying according to the Apostle, so, after deliberating with themselves, they ought to preserve the pledge of chastity promised to God. We, however, do not cast any snare upon such women, but only set before them the exhortations of eternal reward and the punishments of divine judgment, so that our conscience may be absolved and their intention may render an account for itself to God. For what the blessed Apostle Paul testifies concerning their conduct and actions is to be guarded against. We pass over explaining it more fully, lest the unstable sex appear not so much to be deterred as admonished.

C. XLII. De uiduis, que primam fidem irritam fecerunt.

Item Gelasius. [in epistola ad Episcopos Lucaniae et Brutiorum, cap. 23.] De uiduis sub nulla benedictione uelandis superius late sufficienterque prediximus. Que si propria uoluntate professam pristini coniugii castitatem mutabili mente calcauerint, periculi earum intererit, quali Deum debeant satisfactione placare, quia iuxta Apostolum primam fidem irritam fecerunt. Sicut enim, si se forsitan continere non poterant, secundum Apostolum nullatenus nubere uetabantur, sic habita secum deliberatione promissam Deo pudicitiae fidem debent custodire. Nos autem nullum talibus laqueum inicere, sed solum adhortationes premii sempiterni penasque proponere diuini iudicii, ut et nostra sit absoluta conscientia, et illarum pro se rationem Deo reddat intentio. Cauendum est quippe quod de earum moribus actibusque B. Paulus testatur apostolus. Quod plenius exponere preterimus, ne sexus instabilis non tam deterreri quam admoneri uideatur.

C. XLIII. Concerning the same matter. Likewise Theodore.

If anyone has a vow of virginity, etc. GRATIAN. It is clearly shown in the chapter concerning the ordination of clerics which persons under vows are ordered by the preceding authorities to withdraw from one another, and whose marriages are not to be dissolved by the authority of Augustine and Theodore. § 1. Moreover, that statement of Innocent by which sacred virgins who marry publicly are prohibited, while the man to whom they joined themselves is living, from being admitted to penance is not to be understood so that women who have wished worthily to do penance are excluded from penance for any period; rather, those who are unwilling to withdraw from the incestuous union are prohibited from being admitted to penance. For after a resolve of sacred religion, one who has neglected to return to the habit of her profession cannot be reconciled to God through penance. For the man to whom she joined herself will then be dead to her when she has withdrawn altogether from his unlawful embraces, so that this may be the sense of the chapter: "Those who spiritually marry Christ, if they afterward marry publicly, we judge are not to be admitted to penance unless those to whom they joined themselves have departed from the world"—with respect to the women marrying them, it must be understood. For then do the men depart from the world, then do they die, when the women have altogether estranged themselves from their concupiscence, just as the world is said to be dead to one whom it does not bind by its enticements, and one is declared dead to the world who desires nothing of the world. That this is to be understood thus the same Innocent shows from the following example, saying: "Whoever marries another while her husband is living is to be regarded as an adulteress, nor is a place for doing penance granted to her unless one of these has died." This is to be understood of a woman who has been abandoned: if she marries another while her husband is living, she is an adulteress and is not admitted to penance unless either the first returns to the dust from which he was taken or the second, by ceasing from union with her, dies to her, as was said above. Therefore, because Christ, whom they marry spiritually, now dies no more and death shall have no further dominion over him, it remains that the man whom they marry second must die to them. In either case, however, unless it were understood thus, Innocent would be contrary to the Lord, who says through the Prophet, "At whatever hour the sinner shall have been converted, etc.," and would be found opposed to all interpreters of the divine law. This same thing is proved by the authority of that chapter in which a woman under a vow who has taken a husband is prohibited from being admitted to penance unless either both have professed continence or the man to whom she joined herself has departed from this world.

C. XLIII. De eodem. Item Theodorus.

Si quis uotum uirginitatis habens, etc. Gratian. Quod autem uouentes premissis auctoritatibus iubentur ab inuicem discedere, quorum uero coniugia auctoritate Augustini et Theodori soluenda non sunt, in capitulo de ordinatione clericorum euidenter ostenditur. §. 1. Illud autem Innocentii, quo uirgines sacrae publice nubentes, illo uiuente, cui se coniunxerant, prohibentur admitti ad penitenciam, non ita intelligendum est, ut aliquo tempore excludantur a penitencia que digne penitenciam agere uoluerint; sed prohibentur admitti ad penitenciam que ab incesti copula discedere noluerint. Post propositum namque sacrae religionis non potest Deo per penitenciam reconciliari que ad habitum professionis suae redire neglexerit. Tunc enim ille, cui se iunxerat, ei defunctus erit, cum ab eius illicitis amplexibus hec penitus recesserit, ut iste sit sensus capituli: "Que Christo spiritualiter nubunt, si postea publice nupserint, non eas admittendas esse ad penitenciam censemus, nisi hii quibus se iunxerant, de mundo recesserint," eis, subaudiendum est, nubentibus. Tunc enim uiri de mundo recedunt, tunc defunguntur, cum ab eorum concupiscentia ipsae penitus se alienauerint, sicut mundus ei dicitur mortuus, quem suis illecebris non astringit, et ille perhibetur mortuus mundo, qui nichil mundi concupiscit. Hoc autem sic intelligendum esse, ex subsequenti exemplo idem Innocentius ostendit, dicens: "Quecumque uiro uiuente alteri nupserit adultera habeatur, nec ei agendae penitenciae locus conceditur, nisi unus ex his fuerit defunctus." Hoc de derelicta intelligendum est, que, si uiuente uiro suo alteri nubit, adultera est, nec ad penitenciam admittitur, nisi uel primus reuertatur in puluerem, de quo sumptus est, uel secundus, ab eius copula cessando, ei moriatur, ut supra dictum est. Quia ergo Christus, cui spiritualiter nubunt, iam non moritur, mors illi ultra non dominabitur, restat, ut ille, cui secundo nubunt, eis moriatur. In utroque autem, nisi sic intelligeretur, esset contrarius Domino, dicenti per Prophetam "In quacumque hora peccator conuersus fuerit, etc." et cunctis interpretibus diuinae legis inueniretur aduersus. Probatur illud idem auctoritate illius capituli, quo deuota, que maritum acceperit, prohibetur ad penitenciam admitti, nisi uel uterque continentiam professus fuerit, uel ille, cui se iunxerat, de hoc mundo discesserit.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. The second question follows, in which it is asked whether a girl betrothed to one person can renounce the prior agreement and transfer her vows to another. (Question I.) Here it must first be seen whether there is a marriage between them. (Question II.) Second, whether they can withdraw from one another. § 1. That these persons are spouses is easily proved both from the definition of marriage and from the authority of many persons. For nuptials or matrimony are a union of a man and a woman retaining an indivisible manner of life. But between these persons there was a union that required an indivisible manner of life. For there was consent between them, which is the efficient cause of matrimony, according to that statement of Isidore: “Consent makes matrimony.” Likewise John Chrysostom upon Matthew, [that is, the author of the Imperfect Work, homily 32 on Matthew]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Sequitur secunda questio, qua queritur, an puellae alteri desponsatae possint renunciare priori condicioni, et transferre sua uota ad alium. (Qu. I.) Hic primum uidendum est, an sit coniugium inter eos? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an possint ab inuicem discedere? §. 1. Hos autem coniuges esse, et ex diffinitione coniugii, et auctoritate multorum facile probatur. Sunt enim nuptiae siue matrimonium uiri mulierisque coniunctio, indiuiduam uitae consuetudinem retinens. Inter hos autem fuit coniunctio, que indiuiduam uitae consuetudinem exigebat. Fuit enim inter eos consensus, qui est efficiens causa matrimonii, iuxta illud Ysidori: "Consensus facit matrimonium." Item Iohannes

Chrisostomus super Matheum: [id est auctor operis imperfecti, homil. XXXII. in Math.]

[C. I.]

“Indeed, intercourse does not make matrimony, but the will; therefore separation of the body does not dissolve it, but separation of the will. Therefore, one who dismisses his spouse and does not take another is still a husband. For although he is now separated in body, he is nevertheless still joined in will. Therefore, when he takes another, he then dismisses her fully. Thus it is not the man who dismisses who commits adultery, but he who marries another.”

>
> "Matrimonium quidem non facit coitus, sed uoluntas ideo non soluit illud separatio corporis, sed uoluntatis. Ideo qui dimittit coniugem suam, et aliam non accipit, adhuc maritus. Nam etsi corpore iam separatus est, tamen adhuc uoluntate coniunctus est. Cum ergo aliam acceperit, tunc plene dimittit. Non ergo qui dimittit mechatur, sed qui alteram ducit."

[C. II.]

Likewise Pope Nicholas, [in the responses to the Bulgarians, c. 3]. “According to the laws, let the consent alone of those whose unions are at issue suffice. If this alone is absent, all other things, even when celebrated with intercourse itself, are frustrated.” [GRATIAN.] Therefore, since consent—which alone makes matrimony—occurred between these persons, it is apparent that they were spouses. But it is asked what consent makes matrimony: consent to cohabitation, consent to carnal union, or both? If consent to cohabitation makes matrimony, then a brother can contract matrimony with a sister; if consent to carnal union does so, there was no marriage between Mary and Joseph. For Mary had vowed that she would persevere as a virgin. Hence she said to the angel: “How shall this be, since I know not a man?”—that is, I resolved that I would not know one. For it was not necessary to ask how she could have a son merely because she did not then know a man, but because she had resolved that she would never know one. § 1. Therefore, if afterward she consented to carnal union contrary to her resolve, she became guilty in mind of violating her virginal vow, even if not in deed. It is impious to think this concerning her; but, as Augustine says:

>
> Item Nykolaus Papa. [ad consulta Bulgarorum, c. 3.] "Sufficiat solus secundum leges consensus eorum, de quorum quarumque coniunctionibus agitur. Qui solus si defuerit, cetera etiam cum ipso coitu celebrata frustrantur." [Gratian.] Cum ergo inter istos consensus intercesserit, qui solus matrimonium facit, patet hos coniuges fuisse. Sed queritur, quis consensus facit matrimonium, an consensus cohabitationis, an carnalis copulae, an uterque? Si cohabitationis consensus facit matrimonium, tunc frater cum sorore potest contrahere matrimonium; si carnalis copulae, inter Mariam et Ioseph non fuit coniugium. Vouerat enim Maria se uirgine perseueraturam. Unde ait angelo: "Quomodo fiet istud, quoniam uirum non cognosco?" id est, me non cogniturum proposui. Neque enim quia tunc uirum non cognoscebat, necesse erat inquiri, quomodo posset habere filium, sed quia numquam se cogniturum proposuerat. §. 1. Si ergo contra suum propositum postea consensit in carnalem copulam, rea facta est uoti uirginalis mente, etsi non opere uiolati. Quod de ea sentire nefas est, sed, sicut Augustinus ait:

“Blessed Mary resolved in her heart that she would preserve a vow of virginity, but she did not express that vow of virginity with her mouth. She subjected herself to the divine disposition when she resolved that she would persevere as a virgin unless God revealed otherwise to her. Therefore, committing her virginity to the divine disposition, she consented to carnal union, not by desiring it but by obeying divine inspiration in either event. But afterward, when she bore a son, what she had conceived in her heart she expressed with her lips together with her husband, and each remained in virginity. § 1. Therefore, intervening consent to cohabit and to retain an indivisible manner of life makes them spouses. An indivisible manner of life is for her to show herself to her husband in all things as she is to herself, and conversely. Thus it pertains to an indivisible manner of life that without the consent of her lawful husband she cannot sometimes devote herself to prayer or profess continence. Therefore, because this consent existed between these persons, it is apparent that they were spouses."

[C. III.]

"Beata Maria proposuit se conseruaturam uotum uirginitatis in corde, sed ipsum uotum uirginitatis non expressit ore. Subiecit se diuinae dispositioni, dum proposuit se perseueraturam uirginem, nisi Deus ei aliter reuelaret. Conmittens ergo uirginitatem suam diuinae dispositioni consensit in carnalem copulam, non illam appetendo, sed diuinae inspirationi in utroque obediendo. Postea uero filium genuit quod corde conceperat simul cum uiro labiis expressit, et uterque in uirginitate permansit. §. 1. Consensus ergo cohabitandi et indiuiduam uitae consuetudinem retinendi interueniens eos coniuges facit. Indiuidua uero consuetudo est talem se in omnibus exhibere uiro, qualis ipsa sibi est, et e conuerso. Ad indiuiduam itaque consuetudinem pertinet absque consensu legitimi uiri orationi aliquando non posse uacare, nec continentiam profiteri. Quia ergo iste consensus fuit inter istos, patet hos coniuges fuisse."

[PALEA. C. IV.

John Chrysostom—that is, the author of the Imperfect Work, homily 32 on Matthew. Every thing is dissolved through the same causes through which it arises. For intercourse does not make matrimony, but the will; and therefore separation of the body does not dissolve it, but separation of the will. Therefore, one who dismisses his spouse and does not take another is still a husband. For although he is now separated in body, he is nevertheless still joined in will. Therefore, when he takes another, he then plainly dismisses her. Thus it is not the man who dismisses who commits adultery, but he who marries another.] GRATIAN. Likewise, they are proved to be spouses by authority. For Ambrose says in the book On Virgins, [c. 6]:

[PALEA. C. IV.

Iohannes Chrisostomus, id est auctor operis imperfecti, homilia XXXII. in Matheum. Omnis res, per quascumque causas nascitur, per easdem dissoluitur. Matrimonium enim non facit coitus, sed uoluntas, et ideo non soluit illud separatio corporis, sed separatio uoluntatis. Ideo qui dimittit coniugem suam, et aliam non accipit, adhuc maritus est. Nam etsi corpore iam separatus est, tamen adhuc uoluntate coniunctus est. Cum ergo aliam acceperit, tunc plane dimittit. Non ergo qui dimittit mechatur, sed qui alteram ducit.] Gratian. Item auctoritate probantur coniuges. Ait enim Ambrosius in libro de uirginibus: [c. 6.]

C. V. A marital compact, not the deflowering of virginity, makes matrimony.

When marriage is initiated, the name of marriage is assumed. The deflowering of virginity does not make marriage, but a marital compact. Accordingly, marriage exists when she is joined to a man, not when she is known through union with the man.

C. V. Coniugalis pactio, non uirginitatis defloratio facit matrimonium.

Cum initiatur coniugium, coniugii nomen assciscitur. Non defloratio uirginitatis facit coniugium, sed pactio coniugalis. Denique cum iungitur uiro, coniugium est, non cum uiri admixtione cognoscitur.

C. VI. They are called spouses from the first pledge of betrothal.

Likewise Isidore, Etymologies, Book IX, c. 7. They are more truly called spouses from the first pledge of betrothal, although marital intercourse is still unknown between them.

C. VI. A prima fide desponsationis coniuges appellantur.

Item Ysidorus Ethimologiarum libro IX., c. 7. Coniuges uerius appellantur a prima desponsationis fide, quamuis adhuc inter eos ignoretur coniugalis concubitus.

[PALEA. C. VII.

That an interposed condition has no force is proved from the African Council.]

[PALEA.

[PALEA. C. VII.

Quod condicio interposita non ualeat, ex concilio Affricano probatur.]

[PALEA.

C. VIII. Concerning the same matter.

Whoever shall have betrothed a woman under the name of a condition and afterward wished to leave her, we say that the condition is broken and the betrothal is to be held irrefragably.]

C. VIII. De eodem.

Quicumque sub condicionis nomine aliquam desponsauerit, et eam postea relinquere uoluerit, dicimus quod condicio frangatur, et desponsatio irrefragabiliter teneatur.]

C. IX. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise Augustine, On the Good of Marriage, [Book I, c. 11]. She is called a spouse from the first pledge of betrothal, though he had not known her by intercourse, nor was he going to know her; nor had the designation of spouse perished or remained false where there had not been, and was not going to be, any commingling of flesh. § 1. Therefore both parents of Christ merited to be called faithful spouses—not only she, his mother, but also he, his father, just as he was also the spouse of his mother—each in mind, not in flesh.

C. IX. De eodem.

Item Augustinus de bono coniugali. [lib. I. c. 11.] Coniunx uocatur a prima desponsationis fide, quam concubitu non agnouerat, nec fuerat cogniturus, nec perierat, nec mendax manserat coniugis appellatio, ubi nec fuerat, nec futura erat carnis ulla conmixtio. §. 1. Propter quod fidele coniugium ambo parentes Christi uocari meruerunt, non solum illa mater, uerum etiam ille pater eius, sicut et coniunx matris eius, utrumque mente, non carne.

C. X. The threefold good of marriage existed in the parents of Christ.

Likewise in the same work, [book and chapter]. Thus every good of nuptials was fulfilled in those parents of Christ: fidelity, sacrament, offspring. We recognize the Lord himself as the offspring; fidelity, because there was no adultery; sacrament, because there was no divorce—that is, no separation. There alone marital intercourse did not occur, because in the flesh of sin it could not occur without the shameful concupiscence of the flesh that came from sin, without which he who was to be without sin wished to be conceived. GRATIAN. Likewise in Leviticus the Lord commanded Moses, saying: "If anyone shall have violated another's betrothed woman in the field, let him die by death, because he violated another's wife." § 1. Likewise, in the laws of rulers a betrothed woman is ordered to mourn the death of her betrothed as though he were her husband. Likewise, it is found in the Canons:

> C. X. Triplex bonum coniugii fuit in parentibus Christi.
> Item in eodem. [lib. et capite] Omne itaque nuptiarum bonum inpletum est in illis parentibus Christi, fides, sacramentum, proles. Prolem cognoscimus ipsum Dominum, fidem: quia nullum adulterium; sacramentum: quia nullum diuortium; solus ibi nuptialis concubitus non fuit, quia in carne peccati fieri non poterat sine pudenda concupiscentia carnis, que accidit ex peccato, sine qua concipi uoluit qui futurus erat sine peccato. Gratian. Item in Leuitico precepit Dominus Moysi, dicens: "Si quis sponsam alterius in agro oppresserit, morte moriatur, quia uxorem alterius uiolauit." §. 1. Item in legibus principum sponsa iubetur lugere mortem sponsi tamquam uiri sui. Item in Canonibus inuenitur:

C. XI. A brother cannot marry his brother's betrothed after his death.

If anyone shall have betrothed a woman to himself and, with the moment of death intervening, was unable to know her, his brother cannot take her as a wife.

> C. XI. Frater sponsam fratris post mortem eius non potest ducere.
> Si quis desponsauerit sibi aliquam, et preueniente mortis articulo eam cognoscere non potuerit, frater eius non potest eam in uxorem ducere.

[C. XII.]

Likewise Gregory to Emperor Maurice, concerning a certain count who married the betrothed wife of his dead nephew. Let one who has taken in marriage the betrothed girl of his kinsman be anathema, both he and all who consent to him, because according to the law of God he is decreed to die. § 1. For it is the custom of divine law to call betrothed women wives, as in the Gospel: "Take Mary your wife," and that statement in Deuteronomy: "If anyone shall have violated the betrothed girl of any man in a field or in any place, or brought her into his house, let him die, because he violated the wife of his neighbor"—not one who was already a wife, but one who was to become a wife through her parents. And below: § 2. Just as it is lawful for no Christian to take in marriage anyone from his own consanguinity or one whom his kinsman had, so also it is not lawful to take anyone from the consanguinity of his wife.

> [C. XII.]
> Item Gregorius Mauricio Inperatori, ob quendam comitem, qui nepotis sui mortui desponsatum duxit uxorem. Qui desponsatam puellam proximi sui acceperit in coniugium, anathema sit ipse, et omnes consentientes ei, quia secundum legem Dei mori decernitur. §. 1. Nam diuinae legis mos est, sponsas appellare coniuges, ut in euangelio: "Accipe Mariam coniugem tuam," et illud in Deuteronomio: "Si quis cuiuslibet hominis desponsatam puellam in agro uel in quolibet loco oppresserit, uel adduxerit in domum suam, moriatur, quia uxorem proximi sui uiolauit;" non que iam uxor erat, sed que a parentibus uxor fieri debebat. Et infra: §. 2. Sicut nulli Christiano licet de sua consanguinitate uel quam cognatus habuit in matrimonium assumere, ita et de consanguinitate uxoris suae.

C. XIII. After his wife's death, it is lawful for a man to take another, but not a repudiated or betrothed woman.

Likewise Jerome. Another, fourth kind of lawful marriage is added. When anyone's wife has died, it is lawful for him to take another, but not one repudiated or betrothed to a man, but a free woman; a woman ought to do likewise. Hence Paul also says: "A woman who is under a husband is bound under the law of her husband for as long as her husband lives." Therefore, while her husband is living, she will be called an adulteress if she is joined to another man. But if her husband has died, she is freed from the law of her husband, so that she is not an adulteress if she is joined to another man.

C. XIII. Uxore mortua licet uiro aliam accipere, sed non repudiatam uel desponsatam.

Item Ieronimus. Additur aliud quartum legitimum coniugium. Dum mortua fuerit uxor cuiuslibet, licet illi accipere aliam, sed non repudiatam, nec desponsatam uiro, sed liberam; similiter et mulier debet. Unde et Paulus ait: "Mulier, que sub uiro est, ligata est sub lege uiri, quamdiu uiuit uir eius." Viro igitur uiuente uocabitur adultera, si iuncta fuerit alteri uiro. Si autem mortuus fuerit uir eius, liberata est a lege uiri ita, ut non sit adultera, si iuncta fuerit alteri uiro.

C. XIV. After anyone's death, let no one of his consanguinity take his betrothed.

Likewise Gregory. If anyone shall have betrothed or pledged himself to a woman, although afterward, with the day of his death intervening, he was unable to take her as his wife, nevertheless it is lawful for no one of his consanguinity to take her in marriage; and if this is found to have been done, let them be separated altogether.

C. XIV. Post mortem alicuius nullus de consanguinitate eius sponsam accipiat.

Item Gregorius. Si quis uxorem desponsauerit, uel eam subarrauerit, quamquam postmodum preueniente die mortis eius nequiuerit eam ducere in uxorem, tamen nulli de consanguinitate eius licet accipere eam in coniugio, et si inuentum fuerit factum, separetur omnino.

C. XV. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise Pope Julius. If anyone shall have betrothed or pledged himself to a wife and, whether with the day of death intervening or with certain other causes arising, has not known her, neither his surviving brother nor anyone of his consanguinity may ever take that same woman as his wife. PART II. GRATIAN. By all these authorities these persons are proved to be spouses. But Augustine testifies to the contrary, saying:

C. XV. De eodem.

Item Iulius Papa. Si quis desponsauerit uxorem uel subarrauerit, et siue preueniente die mortis, siue irruentibus quibusdam aliis causis minime eam cognouerit, neque superstes eius frater, neque ullus de consanguinitate eius eandem sibi tollat in uxorem ullo umquam tempore. II. Pars. Gratian. His omnibus auctoritatibus probantur isti coniuges esse. Sed Augustinus contra testatur, dicens:

C. XVI. There is no matrimony between those whom sexual commingling does not unite.

There is no doubt that a woman with whom it is shown that there was no sexual commingling does not pertain to matrimony.

C. XVI. Non est inter eos matrimonium, quos non copulat conmixtio sexuum.

Non dubium est, illam, mulierem non pertinere ad matrimonium, cum qua docetur non fuisse conmixtio sexus.

C. XVII. That woman in whom the nuptial mystery is not celebrated does not pertain to matrimony.

Likewise Pope Leo. Since the partnership of nuptials was instituted from the beginning in such a way that apart from the commingling of the sexes nuptials do not possess within themselves the sacrament of Christ and the church, there is no doubt that a woman in whom it is shown that there was no nuptial mystery does not pertain to matrimony.

C. XVII. Illa mulier non pertinet ad matrimonium, cum qua non celebratur nuptiale misterium.

Item Leo Papa. Cum societas nuptiarum ita a principio sit instituta, ut preter conmixtionem sexuum non habeant in se nuptiae Christi et ecclesiae sacramentum, non dubium est, illam mulierem non pertinere ad matrimonium, in qua docetur non fuisse nuptiale misterium.

[PALEA. C. XVIII.

Benedict, servant of the servants of God, to the patriarch of Grado, greeting, etc. The law of the divine constitution placed the apostolic see as teacher of the whole world, so that whatever is doubted anywhere, the rationale concerning it may be sought from that see. Now a certain John of your people addressed us, the occupant of that see, by his letters and asked concerning the marriage of his surviving daughter. Her deceased sister had been betrothed by simple words to a certain young man named Stephen and was overtaken by death before she came to the nuptials. He asked, namely, whether matrimony can be celebrated between that same young man and the surviving daughter or not. For he testified that the rationale of this matter is regarded as doubtful among you. With God teaching, we render it most certain in these words. That first-formed man, our root and origin, seeing the rib taken from him formed into a woman, brought forth among other things in a prophetic spirit: "For this reason a man shall leave father and mother and cleave to his wife, and the two shall be in one flesh." By these words it became known that a man and woman can become one flesh in no other way unless they cleave to one another by carnal union. Therefore, one who was in no way commingled with a woman unrelated to him by the nuptial bond—by what compact can they become one flesh through bare words of betrothal? We are wholly unable to perceive it. For blood relationship is expressed by words, not effected by words. Nor does a kiss produce relationship, since it effects no commingling of blood. But because the matter of this John stands altogether thus—that he wishes to unite his second daughter in nuptials to the man to whom he had already determined to betroth the first—by the censure of apostolic authority we command that this can be done without the fault of any crime if it accords with the will of both parties. For why should that be prohibited which holy Scripture never declares is to be prohibited? Nor do secular laws say anything of this kind among the persons whom they enumerate as not contracting nuptials with one another. Therefore, do not deny what you teach is to be denied by no reason.] GRATIAN. Likewise, the Apostle commands that the wife render the debt to the husband and the husband to the wife, except perhaps by consent for a time so that they may devote themselves more readily to prayer. From this it is given to be understood that without the consent of the other it is not lawful for either to devote himself or herself to prayer. § 1. Likewise, a man cannot assume a resolve of a better life without his wife's consent, and conversely. Hence Gregory writes to the patrician Theoctista, [Book IX, epistle 39]:

> Benedictus seruus seruorum Dei Grandensi Patriarchae salutem, etc. Lex diuinae constitutionis apostolicam cathedram totius posuit orbis terrarum magistram, ut quicquid ubique locorum dubitantur, ab ea ratio eiusdem requiratur. Affatus est autem nos suis litteris eiusdem cathedrae sessorem, ac percunctatus est quidam uestras nomine Iohannes, pro conubio filiae suae superstitis, cuius soror defuncta cuidam iuueni, Stephano nomine, simplicibus uerbis fuerat desponsata, et ante, quam ad nuptias perueniret, morte preuenta: utrum scilicet cum eodem iuuene possit matrimonium celebrari superstitis filiae, nec ne. Namque testatus est huius rei rationem apud uos haberi ambiguam. Quam Deo docente reddimus his uerbis certissimam. Protoplastus ille, radix et origo nostra, detractam sibi costam in mulierem uidens formatam, prophetico spiritu inter alia protulit: "Propter hoc relinquet homo patrem et matrem, et adherebit uxori suae, et erunt duo in carne una." Quibus uerbis innotuit, non aliter uirum et mulierem posse fieri unam carnem, nisi carnali copula sibi cohereant. Qui ergo nequaquam mixtus est extraneae mulieri federe nuptiali, quo pacto per nuda sponsionis uerba possunt una caro fieri, nullatenus ualemus intueri. Propinquitas enim sanguinis uerbis dicitur, non uerbis efficitur. Sed neque osculum parit propinquitatem, quod nullam facit sanguinis conmixtionem. Quoniam uero ita prorsus sese habet res Iohannis istius, ut uelit secundam filiam illi nuptiis copulare, cui primam iam decreuerat desponsare, censura apostolici magistratus mandamus, hoc absque ullius criminis uicio posse fieri, si utriusque partis sederit uoluntati. Nam cur prohibeatur quod prohibendum numquam sancta scriptura declarat? Sed neque mundanae leges connumeratis personis, que inter se nuptias non contrahunt, de huiusmodi aliquid dicunt. Ne ergo abnegetis quod negandum nulla ratione docetis.] Gratian. Item Apostolus precipit, ut uxor reddat debitum uiro, et uir uxori, nisi forte ex consensu ad tempus, ut expeditius uacent orationi. Unde datur intelligi, quod sine consensu alterius non licet alteri uacare orationi. §. 1. Item propositum melioris uitae uir sumere non potest sine consensu uxoris, et e conuerso. Unde Gregorius scribit Theutistae Patriciae: [lib. IX. epist. 39.]

C. XIX. Marriages ought not to be dissolved for the sake of religion.

There are some who say that marriages ought to be dissolved for the sake of religion. But it is to be known that, although human law has permitted this, divine law has prohibited it. For Truth himself says: "What God has joined, let man not separate." He also says: "It is not lawful to dismiss a wife except for the cause of fornication." Who, therefore, would contradict this legislator? We know that it is written: "The two shall be in one flesh." Therefore, if husband and wife are one flesh, and for the sake of religion the husband dismisses his wife, or the wife her husband, who remains in this world or perhaps passes over to unlawful acts, what sort of conversion is this, in which one and the same flesh in one part passes to continence and in another part remains in pollution? But if it pleases both to lead a continent life, who would dare accuse this, since it is certain that almighty God, who permitted lesser things, did not prohibit greater things? For in two ways holy persons are accustomed to abstain even from lawful things: sometimes so that they may increase their merits before almighty

God, and sometimes so that they may wipe away the faults of their past life. § 1. Consequently, when good spouses desire either to increase merit or to erase the faults of their past life, it is lawful for them to bind themselves and seek a better life. For we know that many saints both first led a continent life with their spouses and afterward passed to the governance of the holy church. But if the woman does not follow the continence that the man seeks, or the man refuses what the wife seeks, the marriage cannot be divided, because it is written: "The woman does not have power over her own body, but the man; likewise the man does not have power over his own body, but the woman."

C. XIX. Causa religionis coniugia solui non debent.

Sunt qui dicunt, religionis causa coniugia debere dissolui. Verum sciendum est, quia, etsi hoc lex humana concessit, lex tamen diuina prohibuit. Per se enim ueritas dicit: "Quod Deus coniunxit homo non separet." Qui etiam ait: "Non licet dimittere uxorem, excepta causa fornicationis." Quis ergo huic legislatori contradicat? Scimus, quia scriptum est: "Erunt duo in carne una." Si igitur: uir et uxor una caro sunt, et religionis causa dimittit uir uxorem, uel mulier uirum in hoc mundo remanentem, uel fortasse ad illicita migrantem, que est ista conuersio, in qua una et eadem caro ex parte transit ad continentiam, et ex parte remanet in pollutione? Si uero utrisque conueniat continentem uitam ducere, hoc quis audeat accusare? cum certum est, quia omnipotens Deus, qui minora concessit, maiora non prohibuit. Duobus enim modis sancti uiri etiam a licitis abstinere solent: aliquando, ut merita sibi apud omnipotentem Deum augeant; aliquando, ut anteactae uitae culpas detergant. §. 1. Proinde cum boni coniuges aut meritum augere desiderant, aut anteactae uitae culpas delere, ut se astringant, et meliorem uitam appetant, licet. Sic enim multos sanctorum nouimus cum suis coniugibus et prius continentem uitam duxisse, et postmodum ad sanctae ecclesiae regimina migrasse. Si uero continentiam, quam uir appetit, mulier non sequitur, aut quam appetit uxor uir recusat, diuidi coniugium non potest, quia scriptum est: "Mulier sui potestatem corporis non habet, sed uir; similiter et uir potestatem sui corporis non habet, sed mulier."

C. XX. A woman assigned to a monastery without her husband's consent is not prohibited from returning to union with him.

The same to Leo, bishop of Catania, [Book III, epistle 34]. We have learned from the report of many persons that this was formerly the custom among you: subdeacons lawfully united with their wives. So that no one might presume to do this anew, it was prohibited by Servusdei, deacon of our see, on the authority of our predecessor, in this manner: at that time those who had already been joined to wives were to choose one of two things—that is, either they were in no way to presume to minister or they were to abstain from their wives. And, as is said, Speciosus, who was then a subdeacon, suspended himself from the office of administration for this reason; until the time of his death he indeed discharged the office of notary and ceased from the ministry that a subdeacon ought to perform. After his death, because his widow Honorata was joined to a husband, we have learned that she was assigned by Your Fraternity to a monastery. Therefore, if, as is reported, her husband suspended himself from administration, it ought not to harm the aforesaid woman that she passed to the second vows of marriage, especially if she was not joined to the subdeacon with such an intention that she would abstain from the pleasures of the flesh. Therefore, if you know the truth to stand as we have been informed, it is altogether fitting that you release the aforesaid woman from the monastery, so that she can return to her husband without any fear.

C. XX. Absque uiri consensu monasterio mulier deputata ad eius consortium redire non prohibetur.

Idem Leoni, Episcopo Catanensi. [lib. III. ep. 34.] Multorum relatione conperimus, hanc apud uos olim consuetudinem fuisse, ut subdiacones suis licite miscerentur coniugibus. Quod ne denuo quisquam presumeret, a Seruo dei, sedis nostrae diacone, ex auctoritate nostri decessoris isto est modo prohibitum, ut eodem tempore hii, qui iam uxoribus fuerant copulati, unum e duobus eligerent, id est aut certe ministrare nulla ratione presumerent, aut a suis uxoribus abstinerent. Et, quantum dicitur, Speciosus tunc subdiaconus pro hac re ab administrationis se suspendit offitio, et usque in obitus sui tempora notarii quidem gessit offitium, et a ministerio, quod subdiaconum oportuerat exhibere, cessauit. Post cuius obitum, quia relicta eius Honorata marito est sociata, a tua fraternitate in monasterio cognouimus deputatam. Ideoque, si, ut fertur, eius se maritus ab administratione suspendit, antedictae mulieri non debet officere, quod ad secunda uota coniugii migrauerit: presertim, si non tali mente subdiacono iuncta est, ut a carnis uoluptatibus abstineret. Si ergo ita se ueritatem, quemadmodum edocti sumus, habere cognoscis, predictam mulierem de monasterio per omnia conuenit te relaxare, ut ad suum maritum sine aliqua possit formidine remeare.

C. XXI. One who assumed religious clothing without his wife's consent is compelled to return to her.

The same to Hadrian, notary of Palermo, [Book IX, epistle 44]. Agathosa, the bearer of the present writings, complained that her husband was converted in the monastery of Abbot Urbicus contrary to her will. Wherefore we command Your Experience to examine by diligent inquiry whether perhaps he was converted with her consent or whether she herself promised to change her state. If it finds this, let it both provide that he remain in the monastery and compel her to change her state as she promised. But if neither of these is the case, and you learn that the aforesaid woman did not formerly commit the crime of fornication—for which it is lawful to dismiss a wife—lest his conversion become an occasion of perdition to the wife left in the world, we wish you, every excuse ceasing, to restore her husband to her even if he has already been tonsured. For although secular law commands that for the sake of conversion a marriage can be dissolved when either party is unwilling, divine law nevertheless does not permit this to be done. For no reason permits a man to dismiss his wife except for the cause of fornication, because after one body is effected from a man and woman through the union of marriage, it cannot in one part be converted and in another part remain in the world.

C. XXI. Ad uxorem redire cogitur qui sine eius consensu religiosam uestem suscepit.

Idem Adriano, Panormitano Notario. [lib. IX. epist. 44.] Agathosa latrix presentium questa est, uirum suum contra uoluntatem suam in monasterio Urbici abbatis esse conuersum. Quapropter experientiae tuae praecipimus, ut diligenti inquisitione discutiat, ne forte eius uoluntate conuersus sit, uel ipsa mutare se promiserit. Et si hoc reppererit, et illum in monasterio permanere prouideat, et hanc, sicut promisit, mutare conpellat. Si uero nichil horum est, nec quondam fornicationis crimen (propter quod licet uxorem dimittere) predictam mulierem conmisisse cognoueris, ne illius conuersio uxori relictae in seculo fieri possit perditionis occasio, uolumus, ut maritum suum illi etiamsi iam tonsuratus est, reddere debeas omni excusatione cessante, quia etsi mundana lex precipit conuersationis gratia utrolibet inuito solui posse coniugium, diuina tamen lex fieri non permittit. Nam, nisi fornicationis causa, uirum uxorem dimittere nulla ratio concedit, quia post, quam copulatione coniugii uiri atque mulieris unum corpus efficitur, non potest ex parte conuerti, et ex parte remanere in seculo.

C. XXII. Without his wife's consent, a man cannot assume a religious resolve.

Likewise from the Eighth Synod. If any married man wishes to be converted to a monastery, he is not to be received unless he has first been released by his spouse professing chastity. For if she marries another through incontinence while he is living, she will without doubt be an adulteress. Nor is the conversion of that man received before God when the prostitution of the marital covenant follows it. Therefore, such persons then follow Christ without fault after abandoning the world if they possess by equal will a mutual consent to chastity.

> C. XXII. Sine uxoris consensu religionis propositum uir sumere non ualet.
> Item ex VIII. Sinodo. Si quis coniugatus uult conuerti ad monasterium, non est recipiendus, nisi prius a coniuge castimoniam profitente fuerit absolutus. Nam si illa uiuente illo per incontinentiam alteri nupserit, proculdubio adultera erit. Nec recipitur apud Deum eiusdem uiri conuersio, cuius sequitur coniugalis federis prostitutio. Tales igitur tunc sine culpa secuntur Christum derelicto seculo, si habent ex pari uoluntate castitatis consensum.

C. XXIII. Without the bishop's knowledge, it is not lawful for a husband and wife to separate for the sake of religion.

Likewise from the Synod of Pope Eugenius, [II, in the Roman Synod, c. 36]. If a husband and wife consent between themselves to separate solely for a religious life, let it by no means be done without the bishop's knowledge, so that they may be established by him in individually designated places. For if the wife, or either of them, is unwilling, the matrimony is not dissolved even for such a reason.

> C. XXIII. Sine conscientia episcopi uiro et uxori causa religionis diuertere non licet.
> Item ex Sinodo Eugenii Papae. [II., in Sinodo Romana c. 36.] Si uir et uxor diuertere pro sola religiosa inter se consenserint uita, nullatenus sine conscientia episcopi fiat, ut ab eo singulariter prouiso constituantur loco. Nam uxore nolente, aut altero eorum, etiam pro tali re matrimonium non soluitur.

C. XXIV. It is not lawful for a man to practice continence without his wife's will.

Likewise Augustine, On Adulterous Marriages. If you abstain without your wife's will, you grant her license to fornicate, and her sin will be imputed to your abstinence.

> C. XXIV. Sine uxoris uoluntate uiro continere non licet.
> Item Augustinus de adulterinis coniugiis. Si tu abstines sine uxoris uoluntate, tribuis ei fornicandi licentiam, et peccatum illius tuae inputabitur abstinentiae.

C. XXV. A man is not to be received into a monastery unless his wife is converted.

Likewise Gregory to Abbot Urbicus, [Book V, epistle 49]. Because Agatho, the bearer of the present writings, desires to be converted in the monastery of Your Charity, we exhort you to receive him with every gentleness and devotion. § 1. Know, nevertheless, that he is to be received in this way: if his wife likewise wishes to be converted. For since the one body of both has been made through the union of marriage, it is unfitting for one part to be converted and the other part to remain in the world.

> C. XXV. Vir non est suscipiendus in monasterium, nisi uxor conuertatur.

Item Gregorius Urbico Abbati. [lib. V. ep. 49.] Quia Agatho lator presentium in monasterium dilectionis tuae conuerti desiderat, hortamur, ut eum omni cum dulcedine deuotioneque suscipias. §. 1. Quem tamen suscipiendum ita esse cognosce, si et uxor illius similiter conuerti uoluerit. Nam dum unum utrorumque corpus coniugii copulatione sit factum, incongruum est partem conuerti, et partem in seculo remanere.

C. XXVI. It is not lawful for a wife to assume vows of continence unless her husband has chosen the same life.

Likewise Pope Nicholas, [to King Charles]. Queen Theutberga wrote to us that she wished to be divested of her dignity or marital union and desired to be content with a private life alone. We wrote to her that this could not be done otherwise unless her spouse Lothair chose the same life. § 1. For although it is written, "What God has joined let man not separate," nevertheless God, and not man, separates when marriages are dissolved by the consent of both spouses in contemplation of divine love. But we prohibit your mutual separation from being effected otherwise. GRATIAN. Behold, married persons cannot profess continence without the other's consent. But betrothed persons are proved by examples and authority to be able to observe continence even without consulting those whom they betrothed to themselves. For, as blessed Jerome relates, Macarius, foremost among Christ's hermits, after the wedding banquet had been celebrated, when in the evening he was about to enter the bridal chamber, departed from the city, sought lands across the sea, and chose for himself the solitude of the desert. § 1. Likewise blessed Alexius, son of the most distinguished Epiphanius, similarly called from his nuptials by divine grace, abandoned his betrothed and began to serve Christ naked. From their example it is apparent that betrothed men can profess continence without seeking the consent of their betrothed women. The same is proved by the authority of Pope Eusebius, who says:

C. XXVI. Continentiae uota non licet uxori suscipere, nisi eandem uir eius elegerit uitam.

Item Nykolaus Papa. [Carolo Regi] Scripsit nobis Theberga regina, se uelle dignitate seu copula exui, et sola uita priuata esse contentam desiderare. Cui nos scripsimus, non hoc aliter fieri posse, nisi eandem uitam coniux eius Lotharius elegerit. §. 1. Nam licet sit scriptum: "Quod Deus coniunxit homo non separet." Deus tamen, et non homo separat, quando diuini amoris intuitu ex consensu utriusque coniugis matrimonia dissoluuntur. Aliter autem fieri mutuam separationem uestram prohibemus. Gratian. Ecce, quod coniugati sine consensu alterius continentiam profiteri non possunt. Sponsi uero, etiam inconsultis quas sibi desponsauerunt, exemplis et auctoritate probantur continentiam posse seruare. Ut enim refert B. Ieronimus, Macharius, precipuus inter Christi heremitas, celebrato nuptiarum conuiuio, cum uespere thalamum esset ingressurus, ex urbe egrediens transmarina petiit, et heremi solitudinem sibi elegit. §. 1. Item B. Alexius, Epiphanii clarissimi filius, similiter ex nuptiis diuina gratia uocatus, sponsam deseruit, et nudus Christo famulari cepit. Horum exemplo patet, quod sponsi non exquisito consensu suarum sponsarum continentiam profiteri ualent. Probatur idem auctoritate Eusebii Papae dicentis:

C. XXVII. A betrothed girl is not prohibited from choosing a monastery.

It is not lawful for parents to hand a betrothed girl over to another man; nevertheless, it is lawful for her to choose a monastery for herself.

C. XXVII. Desponsata puella non prohibetur monasterium eligere.

Desponsatam puellam non licet parentibus alii uiro tradere; tamen monasterium sibi licet eligere.

C. XXVIII. A betrothed woman can choose a monastery without penalty.

Likewise Gregory in the Register, [Book VI, epistle 20, to Fortunatus]. Legal decrees have judged that if a betrothed woman wishes to be converted, she is to be punished by no penalty whatsoever. GRATIAN. Therefore, since the continence of married persons cannot be offered to God except by the consent of both; since the man does not have power over his own body, but the woman does; but betrothed women can choose a monastery, and betrothed men can assume a resolve of a better life without seeking the consent of their betrothed women: it is apparent that there is no marriage between a betrothed man and a betrothed woman. § 1. Likewise, since according to Augustine that woman with whom it is shown that there was no sexual commingling does not pertain to matrimony; likewise, according to Leo, that woman in whom it is shown that there was no nuptial mystery does not pertain to matrimony: it appears that there is no marriage between a betrothed man and a betrothed woman. § 2. Likewise Pope Nicholas commanded concerning those who are blinded by enemies or mutilated in their members that their marriages are not to be dissolved on account of this infirmity. § 3. But concerning those who, because of frigidity, cannot render the marital debt to their wives, Pope Gregory established that each of them, with seven kinsmen acting as oath-helpers and with the most sacred relics touched, is to declare under oath that they had never become one flesh joined through commingling of the flesh. Then the woman will be able to contract a second marriage; but the man who is of a frigid nature is to remain without hope of marriage. Hence the same Gregory writes to Venerius, bishop of Cagliari, speaking thus:

> C. XXVIII. Desponsata inpune monasterium potest eligere.
> Item Gregorius in Registro. [lib. VI. epist. 20. ad Fortunatum] Decreta legalia desponsatam, si conuerti uoluerit, nullo censuerunt omnino dampno mulctari. Gratian. Cum ergo coniugatorum continentia, nisi ex amborum consensu, Deo offerri non ualeat; cum uir sui corporis potestatem non habeat, sed mulier, sponsae autem monasterium possint eligere, et sponsi non exquisito consensu sponsarum propositum melioris uitae assumere ualeant: patet, quod inter sponsum et sponsam coniugium non est. §. 1. Item cum secundum Augustinum illa mulier non pertineat ad matrimonium, cum qua docetur non fuisse conmixtio sexus. Item secundum Leonem illa non pertinet ad matrimonium, in qua docetur non fuisse nuptiale misterium: apparet, quod inter sponsum et sponsam coniugium non est. §. 2. Item Nykolaus Papa precepit, de his, qui ab aduersariis excecantur aut membris detruncantur, ut ob hanc infirmitatem talium coniugia non soluantur. §. 3. De his autem, qui causa frigiditatis uxoribus debitum reddere non possunt, statuit Gregorius Papa, ut uterque eorum septima manu propinquorum tactis sacrosanctis reliquiis iureiurando dicat, quod numquam permixtione carnis coniuncti una caro effecti fuissent. Tunc mulier secundas nuptias poterit contrahere; uir autem, qui frigidae naturae est, maneat sine spe coniugii. Unde idem scribit Venerio, Caralitano Episcopo, ita dicens:

C. XXIX. If a woman proves that she was never known by her husband, let her be separated.

Concerning what you asked me about those who are joined in matrimony and cannot consummate it: whether he may take another woman or she another man. Concerning them it is written: If a man and woman have joined themselves, and afterward the woman shall say concerning the man that he cannot have intercourse with her, if she can prove by a true judgment that it is true, let her take another. GRATIAN. Behold, inability to have intercourse, if it is found in anyone after carnal union, does not dissolve the marriage. But if it is detected before carnal union, it makes the woman free to take another man. Hence it appears that those persons were not spouses; otherwise it would not be lawful for them to withdraw from one another except for the cause of fornication, and persons withdrawing in this way must remain unmarried or be reconciled to one another. § 1. Likewise, if a betrothed woman were a spouse, after the death of her betrothed she would remain a widow. But if she were a widow, her husband could not ascend to sacred orders. For the husband of a widow, just as much as a bigamist, is prohibited from becoming a priest. But no one is prohibited from sacred orders because of union with such a woman. For, as Pope Pelagius says: "There is nothing, so far as this point is concerned, that opposes him from the canonical institutes." Therefore, it appears that these persons were not spouses. § 2. Likewise, if they were spouses, withdrawal from one another would be divorce—that is, marital separation. But Ambrose denies that their separation was divorce, saying concerning blessed Mary, whom Joseph had betrothed to himself and taken into his home: "Joseph never knew her. For if the just man had known her, he would never have permitted her to withdraw from him; nor would the Lord, who had commanded that a wife not withdraw from her husband except for the cause of fornication, have been an author of divorce by commending her to the disciple." Behold, Mary's commendation to John and her removal from Joseph is denied to have been divorce because Joseph had not known her. Hence it appears that they were not spouses. But if blessed Mary, whom Joseph had betrothed to himself and taken into his home, is denied to have been a spouse, much less is that woman who was simply betrothed to be called a spouse.

C. XXIX. Si mulier probauerit, quod a uiro suo numquam cognita fuerit, separetur.

Quod autem interrogasti me de his, qui matrimonio iuncti sunt, et nubere non possunt, si ille aliam, uel illa alium possit accipere de quibus scriptum est: Vir et mulier, si se coniunxerint, et postea dixerit mulier de uiro, quod non possit coire cum illa, si potest probare per uerum iudicium, quod uerum sit, accipiat alium. Gratian. Ecce, inpossibilitas coeundi, si post carnalem copulam inuenta fuerit in aliquo, non soluit coniugium. Si uero ante carnalem copulam deprehensa fuerit, liberum facit mulieri alium uirum accipere. Unde apparet, illos non fuisse coniuges; alioquin non liceret eis ab inuicem discedere, excepta causa fornicationis; et sic discedentes oportet manere innuptos, aut sibi inuicem reconciliari. §. 1. Item si coniunx sponsa esset, mortuo sponso remaneret uidua. Si autem uidua esset, uir eius ad sacros ordines conscendere non posset. Maritus enim uiduae, eque sicut et bigamus, sacerdos fieri prohibetur. Ex huius autem copula nullus prohibetur a sacris ordinibus. Ut enim ait Pelagius Papa: "Nichil est (quantum ad hunc articulum attinet) quod ei obuiet de canonicis institutis." Apparet ergo, non fuisse hos coniuges. §. 2. Item si coniuges essent, discessio ab inuicem esset diuortium. Sed horum separationem negat Ambrosius esse diuortium, dicens de B. Maria, quam Ioseph sibi desponsauerat, et in suam duxerat: "Ioseph numquam cognouit eam. Nam si uir iustus eam cognouisset, numquam a se discedere passus esset, nec Dominus, qui uxorem preceperat a uiro non discedere, nisi causa fornicationis, conmendans eam discipulo, auctor diuortii fuisset." Ecce, conmendatio Mariae Iohanni, et detractio Ioseph negatur fuisse diuortium, quia Ioseph non cognouerat eam. Unde apparet, eos non fuisse coniuges. Si autem B. Maria, quam Ioseph sibi desponsauerat, et in suam duxerat, coniux negatur fuisse, multo minus ista, que simpliciter sponsa erat, coniux est appellanda.

C. XXX. One who defiles his wife's sister can have neither woman.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans. One who has slept with two sisters, one of whom had previously been his wife, is to have neither of them; nor are the adulterous persons themselves ever to be joined in marriage. GRATIAN. That is, it is not lawful for his own wife to render the marital debt to him, for he has made her unlawful to himself by knowing her sister. Nor, even after the wife's death, is it lawful for him or for the adulteress to be joined to anyone in marriage. Concerning a betrothed woman, however, the contrary is read in the Council of Tribur:

C. XXX. Sororem uxoris polluens neutram ualet habere.

Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. Qui dormierit cum duabus sororibus, et una ex illis ante uxor fuerat nec unam ex ipsis habeat, nec ipsi adulteri umquam in coniugio copulentur. Gratian. Id est, nec propriae uxori licet sibi reddere debitum, quam sibi reddidit illicitam, sororem eius cognoscendo. Nec etiam post mortem uxoris licet ei, uel adulterae alicui copulari in coniugium. De sponsa uero econtra legitur in Concilio Triburiensi:

C. XXXI. Concerning one who slept with his brother's betrothed.

A certain man betrothed and endowed a wife but was unable to have intercourse with her; his brother secretly corrupted her and made her pregnant. It was decreed that, although she could not be married to her lawful husband, the brother nevertheless cannot have the woman betrothed to his brother; but let the adulterer and adulteress sustain the punishment of fornication, while lawful marriages are not denied to them.

C. XXXI. De eo, qui dormiuit cum sponsa fratris sui.

Quidam desponsauit uxorem, et dotauit, et cum ea coire non potuit: quam clanculo frater eius corrupit et grauidam reddidit. Decretum est, ut, quamuis nupta non potuerit esse legitimo uiro, desponsatam tamen fratri frater habere non possit; sed mechus et mecha fornicationis quidem uindictam sustineant, licita uero coniugia eis non negentur.

C. XXXII. Let one who violates his son's betrothed, and the woman likewise, remain without hope of marriage.

Likewise from the same. If anyone shall have violated his son's betrothed and afterward his son shall have married her, let the father thereafter have no wife, nor the woman a husband. Let the son, who was ignorant of his father's crime, take another.

GRATIAN. If the woman whom the husband of her sister has known is perpetually prohibited from being joined in marriage, but this man who corrupted his brother's betrothed is permitted to contract matrimony after completing penance, it appears that she was not his brother's spouse. § 1. Likewise, a woman dismissed by her husband for the cause of fornication will either be reconciled to him or remain unmarried while he lives. But concerning a betrothed woman the contrary is found in Book I of the Capitularies, [c. 105, and Book VII, c. 183], in which it is read thus:

C. XXXII. Qui sponsam filii sui obprimit, simul cum ea sine spe coniugii maneat.

Item ex eodem. Si quis sponsam filii sui oppresserit, et postea filius eius eam duxerit, pater postmodum non habeat uxorem, nec mulier uirum. Filius, qui facinus patris ignorauit, aliam accipiat.

Gratian. Si illa, quam uir sororis suae cognouerit, perpetuo copulari prohibetur, hic uero, qui sponsam fratris sui corrupit, peracta penitencia matrimonium contrahere permittitur, apparet, hanc non fuisse coniugem fratris eius. §. 1. Item mulier causa fornicationis a uiro suo dimissa aut ei reconciliabitur, aut illo uiuente manebit innupta. De sponsa uero contra inuenitur in I. libro Capitularium [c. 105. et l. VII. c. 183.,] in quo ita legitur:

C. XXXIII. If a betrothed man is unwilling to receive an abducted woman, let it be lawful for her to marry another.

Let the abductor be punished by public penance. But if the betrothed man is unwilling to receive the abducted woman, and she did not consent to the same crime, let permission to marry another not be denied her.

> C. XXXIII. Si sponsus raptam recipere noluerit, liceat sibi nubere alii.
> Raptor publica penitencia mulctetur. Raptam uero, si sponsus recipere noluerit, et ipsa eidem crimini consentiens non fuerit, licentia nubendi alii non negetur.

C. XXXIV. Concerning the same woman.

Likewise from the Council of Toledo. It was established by the sacred assembly that if anyone abducts another's betrothed, let him be punished by public penance and remain without hope of marriage. And if she did not consent to the same crime, let permission to marry another not be denied her. But if after this they presume to join themselves, let both be anathematized until satisfaction. PART III. GRATIAN. Therefore, it appears that she was not a spouse, since while her betrothed lives she is not denied permission to marry another. How, then, are betrothed women called spouses according to Ambrose and the other Fathers, while by all these arguments they are proved not to be spouses? But it is to be known that marriage is initiated by betrothal and perfected by commingling. Hence between a betrothed man and woman there is a marriage, but one initiated; between those carnally united there is a ratified marriage. Hence Ambrose:

> C. XXXIV. De eadem.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano. Statutum est a sacro conuentu, ut si quis sponsam alterius rapuerit, publica penitencia mulctetur, et sine spe coniugii maneat. Et si ipsa eidem crimini consentiens non fuerit, licentia nubendi alii non negetur. Quod si post hec coniungere se presumpserint, utrique usque ad satisfactionem anathematizentur. III. Pars. Gratian. Apparet ergo, hanc non fuisse coniugem, cui uiuente sponso alteri nubendi licentia non negatur. Quomodo ergo secundum Ambrosium et reliquos Patres sponsae coniuges appellantur, et his omnibus argumentis coniuges non esse probantur? Sed sciendum est, quod coniugium desponsatione initiatur, commixtione perficitur. Unde inter sponsum et sponsam coniugium est, sed initiatum; inter copulatos est coniugium ratum. Unde Ambrosius:

C. XXXV. Marriage is initiated in betrothal.

When marriage is initiated, the name of marriage is assumed, not when the girl is known through union with the man. GRATIAN. Behold, marriage is initiated in betrothal, not perfected.

> C. XXXV. In desponsatione coniugium initiatur.
> Cum initiatur coniugium, coniugii nomen asciscitur, non cum puella uiri admixtione cognoscitur. Gratian. Ecce, quod in desponsatione coniugium initiatur, non perficitur.

C. XXXVI. The commingling of those joined perfects matrimony.

Likewise Ambrose in the book [I] On the Patriarchs. In every matrimony a spiritual union is understood, which the bodily commingling of those joined confirms and perfects.

> C. XXXVI. Coniunctorum permixtio matrimonium perficit.

Item Ambrosius in libro [I.] de Patriarchis. In omni matrimonio coniunctio intelligitur spiritualis, quam confirmat et perficit coniunctorum conmixtio corporalis.

C. XXXVII. Matrimony is initiated by a betrothal agreement and perfected by commingling.

Likewise Jerome upon Obadiah. "Wherefore they will fornicate with your daughters, and your betrothed women will be adulteresses." It is to be noted that he says there will be fornication among daughters and adulteries in marriages, which are initiated by a betrothal agreement and perfected by the commingling of bodies.

C. XXXVII. Matrimonium sponsali conuentione initiatur, conmixtione perficitur.

Item Ieronimus super Abdiam. "Quapropter in filiabus uestris fornicabuntur, et sponsae uestrae adulterae erunt." Notandum, quod in filiabus dicit futuram fornicationem, et in coniugiis adulteria, que sponsali conuentione initiantur, et conmixtione corporum perficiuntur.

C. XXXVIII. When a betrothed woman has been handed over and brought into use, she is rightly called a spouse.

Likewise Ambrose to Paternus, [epistle 66]. If anyone has use of a woman betrothed and handed over to him, it is called marriage. GRATIAN. Augustine shows in Book IV of the Confessions, [c. 3], why women are not handed over immediately after nuptial compacts, saying:

C. XXXVIII. Cum desponsata fuerit tradita et in usum deducta, recte coniunx appellatur.

Item Ambrosius ad Paternum. [epist. LXVI.] Si quis desponsata sibi et tradita utatur coniugium uocatur. Gratian. Quare autem post nuptialia pacta non statim tradantur, Augustinus in libro IV. Confessionum [c. 3.] ostendit, dicens:

C. XXXIX. Why betrothed women are not handed over immediately after the compact.

It was established that women already pledged in betrothal are not handed over immediately, lest a husband regard as cheap what was given, for which as a betrothed man he sighed while it was delayed. GRATIAN. According to this distinction, that authority of Augustine is to be understood: "There is no doubt that a woman with whom it is shown that there was no sexual commingling does not pertain to matrimony." It is to be understood: to perfected matrimony, namely, such as possesses within itself the sacrament of Christ and the church. That statement of Pope Leo is likewise to be understood. § 1. But that statement of Augustine is objected: "Between Mary and Joseph there was a perfect marriage." But it is understood as perfect not from the office of marriage but from those things that accompany marriage, namely fidelity, offspring, and sacrament. All these things are proved by Augustine's authority to have existed between the parents of Christ. Therefore, all the things adduced concerning a marriage not to be separated are understood of a perfected marriage, which was initiated by the union of betrothal and consummated by the office of bodily commingling. But those things by which a separable marriage is shown are understood of an initiated marriage, which has not yet been perfected by its office. § 2. It can also be distinguished otherwise. Betrothed women are called spouses by the custom of Scripture in hope of future things, not by the effect of present things. Hence Ambrose, when he had said, "When marriage is initiated," did not add, "then the reality or effect," but "then the name of marriage is assumed," showing that such persons possess the name of marriage, not its reality or effect. Likewise Augustine, when he spoke concerning the parents of the Lord, said: "They were spouses in mind, not in flesh, just as they were parents." From this it is given to be understood that just as Joseph was called the father of the Lord, not by the effect of generation but by the office and care of providing, so also he was called the spouse of his mother, not by the effect of marriage but by the provision of necessities and the affection of an indivisible mind. Hence Augustine says: "Do not fear to take Mary your wife"; he named her a wife because she was going to be one. Hence also Bede upon Leviticus: "If anyone shall have violated another's betrothed, etc." He called the betrothed woman a wife, not one who then was a wife but one who was going to be a wife. Hence also Jerome upon Matthew in the Gospel: "When she had been betrothed."

C. XXXIX. Quare sponsae post pactum non statim tradantur.

Institutum est, ut iam pactae sponsae non statim tradantur, ne uilem habeat maritus datam, quam suspirauerit sponsus dilatam. Gratian. Iuxta hanc distinctionem intelligenda est auctoritas illa Augustini: "Non dubium est, illam mulierem non pertinere ad matrimonium, cum qua docetur non fuisse conmixtio sexus." Ad matrimonium perfectum subintelligendum est, tale uidelicet, quod habeat in se Christi et ecclesiae sacramentum. Ita et illud Leonis Papae intelligendum est. §. 1. Sed obicitur illud Augustini: "Inter Mariam et Ioseph fuit perfectum coniugium." Sed perfectum intelligitur non ex offitio, sed ex his que comitantur coniugium, ex fide uidelicet, prole et sacramento. Que omnia inter parentes Christi fuisse auctoritate Augustini probantur. Cuncta ergo, que de non separando coniugio inducta sunt, de perfecto intelliguntur, quod sponsali coniunctione est initiatum, et offitio corporalis conmixtionis est consummatum. Illa uero, quibus separabile coniugium ostenditur, de initiato intelliguntur, quod nondum offitio sui perfectum est. §. 2. Potest et aliter distingui. Sponsae appellantur coniuges consuetudine scripturae spe futurorum, non effectu presentium. Unde Ambrosius, cum dixisset: "Cum initiatur coniugium," non addidit: tunc res uel effectus, sed: "tunc nomen coniugii asciscitur," ostendens, tales nomen coniugii habere, non rem uel effectum. Item Augustinus, cum de parentibus Domini loqueretur, ait: "coniuges fuerunt mente, non carne, sicut et parentes." Ex quo datur intelligi, quod sicut Ioseph pater Domini dictus est non effectu geniturae, sed offitio et cura prouidendi: sic et coniux matris eius appellatus est non coniugii effectu, sed subministratione necessariorum, et indiuiduae mentis affectu. Hinc Augustinus ait: "Noli timere accipere Mariam coniugem tuam;" coniugem nominauit, quia futura erat uxor. Hinc et Beda super Leuiticum: "Si quis sponsam alterius uiolauerit, etc." sponsam uxorem dixit, non que tunc esset, sed que futura erat uxor. Hinc et Ieronimus super Mattheum in euangelio: "Cum esset desponsata."

C. XL. By the custom of Scripture, betrothed women are called wives and betrothed men husbands.

"He begot Joseph, the husband of Mary." When you hear "husband," let no suspicion of nuptials enter you, but recall the custom of the Scriptures, that betrothed men are called husbands and betrothed women wives. And below: § 1. She was found by no one other than Joseph, who with nearly marital license knew all the affairs of his future wife. And below: § 2. "Joseph, son of David, etc." As we have already said above, betrothed women are called wives, as the book Against Helvidius teaches more fully.

C. XL. Consuetudine scripturae sponsae coniuges, et sponsi uiri appellantur.

"Genuit Ioseph uirum Mariae". Cum uirum audieris, suspicio tibi non subeat nuptiarum, sed recordare consuetudinis scripturarum, quod sponsi uiri, et sponsae uocentur uxores. Et infra: §. 1. Non ab alio inuenta est, nisi a Ioseph, qui pene licentia maritali futurae uxoris omnia nouerat. Et infra: §. 2. "Ioseph fili Dauid, etc." Iam ut supra diximus, sponsas uxores appellari, quod plenius liber aduersus Heluidium docet.

C. XLI. Concerning the same matter. The same upon Genesis.

"Therefore Lot went out and spoke to his sons-in-law, who were going to receive his daughters." In what follows, Lot's daughters are said to have been virgins. And he himself said to the Sodomites: "Behold my two daughters, who have not known a man, etc." Yet now he is said to have had sons-in-law. But some persons think that the daughters who had husbands perished in Sodom and those who were virgins departed with their father. But the Hebrew truth has: "Lot went out and spoke to his betrothed sons-in-law," which appears more likely from what follows: "who were going to receive his daughters." GRATIAN. Hence it is given to be understood that Scripture calls betrothed men sons-in-law.

C. XLI. De eodem. Idem super Genesim.

"Egressus itaque Loth locutus est ad generos suos, qui accepturi erant filias suas." In sequentibus filiae Loth uirgines fuisse dicuntur. Et ipse ad Sodomitas dixit: "Ecce duae filiae meae, que non cognouerunt uirum etc." Nunc autem dicitur habuisse generos. Sed quidam arbitrantur eas, que uiros habuerunt, in Sodomis perisse, et que uirgines erant, cum patre exisse. Sed Hebraica ueritas habet: "Egressus Loth locutus est ad sponsos suos," quod magis esse uidetur ex hoc quod sequitur: qui accepturi erant filias suas. Gratian. Unde datur intelligi, quod scriptura sponsos generos uocat.

C. XLII. Mary is called a wife according to the custom of Scripture, although she was simply betrothed.

Likewise John Chrysostom upon the same Gospel. "Before they came together." He did not say, "before she was brought into the house of her betrothed." For antiquity observed this custom, that betrothed women were kept in the houses of their betrothed men. Just as Lot's sons-in-law are read to dwell with their father-in-law together with the women betrothed to them but not yet united to them by the law of marriage, so also Mary dwelt with her betrothed. And below: § 1. For he did not wish to expel her from the house, but to dismiss her. And below: § 2. "Do not fear to take Mary your wife." By this expression he likewise indicated a betrothed woman, just as Scripture also customarily calls those who are still betrothed sons-in-law. But what does "to take" mean? Certainly, to retain her at home. For he had already dismissed her in his mind. And below: § 3. For just as Christ afterward commends her to the disciple himself, so also now the angel joins her to her betrothed, not in the solemn covenant of marriage but in the fellowship of a common dwelling.

C. XLII. Maria coniunx dicitur more scripturae, cum simpliciter sponsa esset.

Item Iohannes Os aureum in eodem euangelio. "Prius, quam conuenirent." Non dixit, prius, quam in sponsi adduceretur domum. Hunc enim morem seruabat antiquitas, ut sponsae in sponsorum domibus haberentur. Ut autem generi Loth apud socerum leguntur habitare cum sponsis nondum sibi copulatis lege coniugii, sic et Maria habitabat cum sponso. Et infra: §. 1. Neque enim expellere eam de domo uoluit, sed dimittere. Et infra: §. 2. "Noli timere accipere Mariam coniugem tuam:" Quo sermone sponsam similiter indicauit, sicut etiam eos, qui adhuc sponsi sunt, generos appellare consueuit scriptura. Quid est autem accipere? domi profecto retinere. Iam enim illam mente dimiserat. Et infra: §. 3. Sicut enim illam postea conmendat Christus ipsi discipulo, sic etiam nunc angelus copulat sponso, non in fedus solempne coniugii, sed in consortium conmunis habitaculi.

C. XLIII. The Lord would not have commended his mother to the disciple if Joseph had known her.

The same in the same work, homily V, [on the same c. 1 of Matthew]. For if he had known her and held her in the place of a wife, how would the Lord commend her to the disciple as though she were without solace and had nothing at all, ordering him to receive her as his own?

> C. XLIII. Dominus non conmendasset matrem discipulo, si eam Ioseph cognouisset.
> Idem in eodem omelia V. [ad idem c. 1. Matth.] Si enim cognouisset eam, et loco uxoris habuisset, quomodo illam Dominus quasi absque solatio, et nichil penitus habentem discipulo conmendaret, iubens illi, ut reciperet eam in suam?

C. XLIV. Mary is called Joseph's wife because he thought she was going to be so.

Likewise Origen upon the same, [homily I on the Gospel]. "She was found having a child in the womb." By blessed Joseph, who, although he did not touch her, nevertheless knew all the affairs of the woman who, as he thought, was to be his wife. And below: § 1. If she is named a wife to you, if she is said to be yours in betrothal, nevertheless she is not your wife, but is the eternal mother of God's Only-begotten. And below: § 2. I call her a wife for this reason: that I may conceal her virginity from the devil and not destroy the institutes of the law. In what follows I will demonstrate that neither is she regarded as your wife according to the custom of marriage nor is he who is begotten believed to be your son.

> C. XLIV. Maria uxor Ioseph appellatur, quia sic ab eo putabatur futura.
> Item Origenes in eodem. [hom. I. Euang.] "Inuenta est habens in utero." A B. Ioseph, qui, licet eam non contingeret, futurae tamen, ut putabat, uxoris omnia nouerat. Et infra: §. 1. Si tibi uxor nominatur, si in desponsatione tibi esse dicitur, non tamen tibi uxor est, sed Dei unigeniti mater est eterna. Et infra: §. 2. Coniugem dico propterea, ut diabolo uirginitatem eius occultem, ut legis instituta non destruam. In sequentibus demonstrabo, quod nec ista tua coniux secundum consuetudinem coniugii habeatur, nec iste, qui generatur, tuus filius esse credatur.

C. XLV. Joseph did not come to nuptials with Mary.

Likewise Gregory in the exposition of the Gospel, "When it was evening on that day," [homily 26]. For thus he permitted the disciple to doubt after his resurrection, yet did not abandon him in doubt, just as before his nativity he wished Mary to have a betrothed man who nevertheless did not come to nuptials with her. For the doubting and touching disciple was thus made a witness of the true resurrection, just as the mother's betrothed had been guardian of her wholly intact virginity. GRATIAN. From all these things it appears that betrothed women are called spouses in hope of future things, not by the reality of present things. How, therefore, are spouses called such from the first pledge of betrothal if this woman, who is asserted to have been betrothed, is denied to have been a spouse? But she is said to be called a spouse from the first pledge of betrothal, not because she becomes a spouse in the betrothal itself, but because from the pledge that they owe to one another through betrothal they afterward become spouses, just as sins are said to be remitted through faith—not because they are remitted through faith before baptism, but because faith is the cause why we are cleansed from sins in baptism. § 1. Moreover, that statement of John Chrysostom, "Intercourse does not make matrimony, but the will," and likewise that statement of Ambrose, "Not the deflowering of virginity but a marital compact makes matrimony," are to be understood thus: intercourse without the will to contract matrimony and the deflowering of virginity without a marital compact do not make matrimony; rather, the preceding will to contract matrimony and the marital compact cause the woman, in the deflowering of her virginity or in intercourse, to be said to marry the man or to celebrate nuptials. § 2. Likewise Pope Siricius calls the departure of a betrothed woman from her betrothed a marital separation. But such a departure is called a violation not of a marriage already existing but of a future marriage, as it was hoped for from the betrothal itself. So also the devil is said to have fallen from blessedness, not only that which he then possessed but also that which he was created to possess. So one who by the merit of his life or learning is elected as a priest or bishop, if meanwhile he shall have deserved to have his election annulled, is said to lose sacerdotal or episcopal anointing—not one he had already received but one to receive which he had been elected. Therefore, by that authority a betrothed woman cannot be proved to be a spouse. § 3. But let it be conceded that a betrothed woman is not a spouse; nevertheless, it is asked whether it is lawful for her to renounce the prior agreement. This is prohibited by the authority of the Council of Ancyra, [c. 11], in which the statute is read thus:

> C. XLV. Ad nuptias Mariae Ioseph non peruenit.
> Item Gregorius in expositione Euangelio, cum esset sero die illa. [hom. XXVI.] Sic quippe discipulum post resurrectionem suam dubitare permisit, nec tamen in dubitatione deseruit, sicut ante natiuitatem suam habere Mariam sponsum uoluit, qui tamen ad eius nuptias non peruenit. Nam ita factus est discipulus dubitans et palpans testis uerae resurrectionis, sicut sponsus matris fuerat custos integerrimae uirginitatis. Gratian. Ex his omnibus apparet, sponsas coniuges appellari spe futurorum, non re presentium. Quomodo ergo coniuges a prima fide desponsationis appellantur, si ista, que sponsa asseritur, coniux esse negatur? Sed a prima fide desponsationis coniunx dicitur appellari, non quod in ipsa desponsatione fiat coniunx, sed quia ex fide, quam ex desponsatione sibi inuicem debent, postea efficiuntur coniuges, sicut per fidem dicuntur remitti peccata, non quod ante baptisma per fidem remittantur, sed quia fides est causa, quare in baptismate a peccatis emundamur. §. 1. Illud autem Iohannis Crisostomi: "Matrimonium non facit coitus, sed uoluntas;" item illud Ambrosii: "Non defloratio uirginitatis, sed pactio coniugalis matrimonium facit," ita intelligendum est: Coitus sine uoluntate contrahendi matrimonium, et defloratio uirginitatis sine pactione coniugali non facit matrimonium, sed precedens uoluntas contrahendi matrimonium, et coniugalis pactio facit, ut mulier in defloratione suae uirginitatis uel in coitu dicatur nubere uiro, uel nuptias celebrare. §. 2. Item Siricius Papa discessionem sponsae a sponso uocat coniugalem separationem. Sed talis discessio dicitur uiolatio coniugii non iam existentis, sed futuri, ut ex ipsa desponsatione sperabatur. Sic et diabolus dicitur cecidisse a beatitudine, non solum quam tunc habebat, sed etiam ad quam habendam creatus erat. Sic qui merito suae uitae uel scientiae in sacerdotem uel in episcopum eligitur, si interim electionem suam cassari meruerit, dicitur amittere sacerdotalem uel episcopalem unctionem, non quam iam acceperat, sed ad quam accipiendam electus erat. Non ergo illa auctoritate sponsa coniux potest probari. §. 3. Sed concedatur, quod sponsa non sit coniux, tamen queritur, utrum liceat ei renunciare priori condicioni? Hoc autem prohibetur auctoritate Anchiritani Concilii, [c. 11.] in quo statutum ita legitur:

C. XLVI. Betrothed girls are to be restored to their former betrothed men if they have been abducted from them.

It was resolved that girls who were betrothed and afterward abducted by others are to be rescued and restored to those to whom they had previously been betrothed, even if it is established that violence was inflicted upon them by their abductors.

C. XLVI. Puellae desponsatae prioribus reddendae sunt, si eis raptae fuerint.

Desponsatas puellas et post ab aliis raptas placuit erui, et eis reddi, quibus ante fuerant desponsatae, etiam si eis a raptoribus uis illata constiterit.

C. XLVII. Let a betrothed woman be deprived of communion unless she is willing to leave her abductor and return to her betrothed.

Likewise John VIII to Archbishop Rostagnus. Atto, bearer of the present writings, complains that while he kept watch faithfully in our service, a certain man abducted the woman betrothed to him. Therefore, supported by our authority, let Your Fraternity summon its suffragan bishops to appear in person and thus, by a unanimous sentence, if the abductor does not restore the betrothed woman to him, let both that man and the abducted woman—if she is unwilling to return to her former betrothed—be deprived of all communion. PART IV. GRATIAN. But it is one thing to renounce the prior agreement and arrange nuptials with another; it is another to be abducted, that is, unlawfully violated. Hence Isidore says in Book V of the Etymologies, c. 24:

C. XLVII. Conmunione priuetur sponsa, nisi raptorem deserere, et ad sponsum suum redire uoluerit.

Item Iohannes VIII. Rostano Archiepiscopo. Atto presentium lator, dum in nostro seruitio fideliter excubaret, quendam uirum feminam sibi desponsatam queritur rapuisse. Et ideo fraternitas tua nostra auctoritate suffulta suffraganeos suos episcopos presentialiter conuocet, sicque unanimi sentencia, si sponsam huic raptor non reddiderit, tam idem, quam rapta, si ad pristinum sponsum remeare noluerit omni conmunione priuentur. IV. Pars. Gratian. Sed aliud est priori condicioni renunciare, et de nuptiis cum alio agere; aliud est rapi, hoc est illicite constuprari. Unde Ysidorus Ethimologiarum libro V. c. 24. ait:

C. XLVIII. What is raptus?

Raptus is unlawful intercourse, named from corruption; hence one who obtains another by raptus enjoys defilement. GRATIAN. This woman, however, is shown not to have been abducted by another but to have been betrothed to another. Pope Gelasius prohibits such a woman from being called abducted, speaking thus:

C. XLVIII. Quid sit raptus?

Raptus est illicitus coitus, a corrumpendo dictus; unde qui rapto potitur stupro fruitur. Gratian. Hec autem non ab alio rapta, sed alii desponsata monstratur. Raptam uero talem dici prohibet Gelasius Papa, ita dicens:

C. XLIX. Raptus is admitted where a girl is abducted concerning whose nuptials it is proved that nothing was previously arranged.

That law of former rulers said that raptus was committed where a girl concerning whose nuptials nothing had previously been arranged is seen to have been abducted. PART V. GRATIAN. What is appended at the end of the chapter—"even if it is established that violence was inflicted upon them by their abductors"—was added for this reason: some abducted women expose themselves to be abducted, while others are violently carried away. Therefore, in whatever manner they are abducted, they are to be restored to their former betrothed men. But this woman, as was said above, is numbered not among abducted women but among other betrothed women, and therefore she is not to be taken away from this man and restored to the former man. § 1. Other authorities follow, by which this woman is prohibited from marrying the second man and ordered to return to her former vows. For Pope Siricius says to Himerius, bishop of Tarragona, [epistle I, c. 4]:

C. XLIX. Ibi raptus admittitur, ubi puella abducitur, de cuius ante nuptiis nichil actum probatur.

Lex illa preteritorum principum ibi raptum dixit esse conmissum, ubi puella, de cuius ante nuptiis nichil actum fuerit, uideatur abducta. V. Pars. Gratian. Quod autem in fine capituli subiungitur: "etiam si eis a raptoribus uis illata constiterit," ideo additum est, quia raptarum aliae se rapiendas exponunt, aliae uiolenter abducuntur. Quolibet ergo modo rapiantur, prioribus reddendae sunt. Hec autem, ut supra dictum est, non inter raptas, sed inter alias desponsatas connumeratur, et ideo non est huic auferenda, et priori reddenda. §. 1. Secuntur aliae auctoritates, quibus ista prohibetur nubere secundo, et iubetur redire ad priora uota. Ait enim Siricius Papa Himerio, Episcopo Terraconensi: [epist. I. c. 4.]

C. L. Another cannot take a girl betrothed to someone else.

You asked concerning a violation of marriage whether another man can take in matrimony a girl betrothed to someone else. Therefore, we anathematize such a union and prohibit by every means that it occur, because among the faithful that blessing which the priest imposes upon a woman about to marry is comparable to a certain sacrilege if it is violated by any transgression. GRATIAN. But by this authority of Siricius, the woman prohibited from passing to second vows is one who has been brought into her own household and has been veiled and blessed together with her betrothed. By the departure of such persons, the blessing that the priest imposes upon a woman about to marry is violated. But this betrothed man had not yet brought this woman into his home, nor had he received the blessing with her. Therefore, their union is not prohibited by this authority.

§ 1. Likewise, that statement of Pope Eusebius, "It is not lawful for parents to hand a betrothed girl over to another man," is similarly understood of a betrothed woman of this kind—namely, one who has been veiled and blessed together with her betrothed. § 2. Likewise, that statement of Gregory is objected: "A woman who was separated from her husband because of frigidity and married to another, if her husband has known another woman, is to be taken from the second and restored to the first." But it is resolved in the same way: namely, because this woman had received the blessing with that man.

C. L. Puellam alteri desponsatam alter accipere non ualeat.

De coniugali uiolatione requisisti, si puellam alteri desponsatam alter in matrimonium possit accipere. Tale igitur conubium anathematizamus, et modis omnibus ne fiat prohibemus, quia illa benedictio, quam nupturae sacerdos inponit, apud fideles cuiusdam sacrilegii instar est, si ulla transgressione uioletur. Gratian. Sed auctoritate hac Siricii illa prohibetur ad secunda uota transire, que in propria domo est ducta, et cum sponso suo est uelata et benedicta. Talium discessione uiolatur benedictio, quam nupturae sacerdos inponit. Verum hanc necdum sponsus in suam duxerat, nec cum ea benedictionem acceperat. Nec ergo hac auctoritate huius copula prohibetur.

§. 1. Item illud Eusebii Papae: "Desponsatam puellam non licet parentibus alii uiro tradere," similiter de huiusmodi desponsata intelligitur, que uidelicet cum sponso est uelata et benedicta. §. 2. Item obicitur illud Gregorii: "Que propter frigiditatem a uiro suo separata est, et alii nupta, si uir eius aliam cognouerit, illa est detrahenda secundo, et reddenda primo." Sed eodem modo soluitur, quia ista uidelicet cum illo benedictionem acceperat.

[PALEA.

C. LI. If anyone has given a pledge of consent to a woman, it is not lawful for him to marry another.

Augustine, On the Pledge of Compact and Consent. A pledge is spoken of in two ways: of compact and of consent. If anyone has given a woman a pledge of compact, he ought not to marry another. If he marries another, he ought to do penance for the falsified pledge; nevertheless, let him remain with the woman whom he married. For so great a sacrament ought not to be severed. But if he has given a pledge of consent, it is not lawful for him to marry another. If, however, he has married another, he is to dismiss her and cleave to the former woman. "A pledge of compact exists when someone promises a woman his pledge that he will marry her if she permits him to have intercourse with her, or even in place of consent. But a pledge of consent exists when, even if he does not clasp her hand, he nevertheless consents in heart and mouth to marry her, and they mutually grant themselves to one another and mutually receive one another."]

C. LI. Si quis alicui mulieri consensus fidem fecerit, non licet illi aliam ducere.

Augustinus de fide pactionis, et consensus. Duobus modis dicitur fides, pactionis et consensus. Si aliquis alicui mulieri fidem fecerit pactionis, non debet aliam ducere. Si aliam duxerit, penitenciam debet agere de fide mentita: maneat tamen cum illa, quam duxit. Non enim rescindi debet tantum sacramentum. Si autem fecerit fidem consensus, non licet aliam ducere. Si autem duxerit, dimittet eam, et adherebit priori. "Est autem fides pactionis, quando aliquis promittit fidem alicui, quod eam ducet, si permiserit ei rem secum habere, uel etiam pro consensu. Fides autem consensus est, quando, etiamsi non stringit manum, corde tamen et ore consentit ducere, et mutuo se concedunt unus alii, et mutuo se suscipiunt."]

Causa XXVIII

GRATIAN. A certain unbeliever, placed in marriage, was converted to the faith, but his wife departed from him out of hatred for the Christian faith. He took a certain faithful woman as his wife, and after her death he became a cleric. At length, by the merit of his life and learning, he is elected as a bishop. (Question I.) Here it is first asked whether marriage exists between unbelievers. (Question II.) Second, whether it is lawful for this man to marry another while the first is living. (Question III.) Third, whether one who had one wife before baptism and another after baptism is to be regarded as a bigamist.

GRATIANUS. Quidam infidelis in coniugio positus ad fidem conuersus est, uxor uero odio Christianae fidei ab eo discessit. Ille quamdam fidelem in uxorem accepit, qua mortua clericus efficitur. Tandem uitae et scientiae merito in episcopum eligitur. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, an coniugium sit inter infideles? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an liceat huic aliam ducere priore uiuente? (Qu. III.) Tercio, an sit reputandus bigamus qui ante baptismum habuit unam, et post baptismum alteram?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. That marriage does not exist between unbelievers is proved by many authorities. For Paul says: "Everything that is not from faith is sin." But the union of unbelievers is not from faith and therefore is sin. It is not, therefore, marriage, because no marriage is sin. Likewise Augustine:

“There is no true chastity of an unbelieving man with his spouse.” But where true chastity cannot exist, neither is there true marriage. Likewise Ambrose: “Ezra ordered foreign wives to be dismissed, through whom they went to foreign gods. For what was done outside God’s decree is not to be thought matrimony. But when it is recognized, it is to be corrected.” Likewise Augustine: “A marriage that is without God is not ratified.” By all these authorities it is proved that marriage does not exist between unbelievers. § 1. On the contrary, other authorities are found by which it is proved that marriage exists between unbelievers. The first of these is that statement of the Gospel in which Christ says: “There will be five in one house; two will be divided against three and three against two.” Then, when he enumerated those persons, he said that a wife would be divided against her husband and conversely. Likewise: “One who does not hate father, or mother, or sister, or wife, for my sake is not worthy of me”; he says that an unbelieving wife, not a believing one, is to be held in hatred. Likewise: “Everyone who leaves house, or father, or mother, or sister, or wife, will receive a hundredfold, etc.” In this place he signifies an unbelieving wife, who is dismissed for Christ when she, rather than faith in Christ, is abandoned. Likewise the Apostle: “If any brother has an unbelieving wife and she consents to dwell with him, let him not dismiss her; and if any woman has an unbelieving husband and he consents to dwell with her, let her not dismiss her husband. For the unbelieving husband has been sanctified through the believing woman, and the unbelieving woman has been sanctified through the believing husband.” Likewise to Titus: “Exhort the young women to love their husbands.” This is to be understood concerning believers as well as unbelievers. For believing women ought to obey unbelieving husbands more earnestly for God’s sake, so that they may thus be able to win their husbands for Christ, as is read to have occurred wondrously concerning Theodora and Sisinnius in the Passion of blessed Clement.

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod inter infideles coniugium non sit, multis auctoritatibus probatur. Ait enim Paulus: "Omne, quod non est ex fide, peccatum est." Coniunctio autem infidelium non est ex fide, et ideo peccatum est. Non est ergo coniugium, quia nullum coniugium peccatum est. Item Augustinus: "Non est uera pudicitia hominis infidelis cum coniuge sua." Ubi autem uera pudicitia esse non potest, ibi nec uerum coniugium est. Item Ambrosius: "Iussit Hesdras dimitti uxores alienigenas, per quas ibant ad Deos alienos. Non est enim putandum matrimonium, quod extra Dei decretum est factum. Sed cum cognoscitur, est emendandum." Item Augustinus: "Non est ratum coniugium, quod sine Deo est. His omnibus auctoritatibus probatur, coniugium non esse inter infideles." §. 1. Econtra inueniuntur aliae auctoritates, quibus probatur coniugium esse inter infideles. Quarum prima est illud euangelii, quod Christus ait: "Erunt quinque in una domo, duo in tres, et tres in duos diuidentur," Deinde, cum personas illas enumeraret, uxorem in uirum esse diuidendam dixit et e conuerso. Item: "Qui non odit patrem, aut matrem, aut sororem aut uxorem, propter me, non est me dignus;" uxorem infidelem, non fidelem dicit odio habendam. Item: "Omnis, qui reliquerit domum, aut patrem, aut matrem, aut sororem, uel uxorem, centuplum accipiet etc." Uxorem in hoc loco infidelem significat, que propter Christum dimittitur, dum potius ipsa, quam Christi fides deseritur. Item Apostolus: "Si quis frater uxorem habet infidelem, et hec consentit habitare cum illo, non dimittat illam, et si qua mulier habet uirum infidelem, et hic consentit habitare cum illa, non dimittat uirum. Sanctificatus est enim uir infidelis per mulierem fidelem, et sanctificata est mulier infidelis per uirum fidelem." Item ad Titum: "Hortare adolescentulas, ut diligant uiros suos." Hoc tam de fidelibus quam de infidelibus intelligendum est. Infidelibus namque uiris fideles mulieres propensius propter Deum debent obsequi, ut sic uiros suos Christo lucrari ualeant. Sicut in passione B. Clementis de Theodora et Sisinnio legitur mirabiliter contigisse.

C. I. Those who had one wife before baptism and another after baptism are proved to be bigamists.

Likewise Pope Innocent to Rufus and Eusebius, bishops in Macedonia, [epistle 22, c. 2]. Are those who were begotten of the woman who was a wife before baptism not to be admitted to a share in the inheritance? And will they be called natural children because—as it seems to you—there is no lawful matrimony except that which is assumed after baptism? When the Lord himself was asked by the Jews whether it was lawful to dismiss a wife and explained that it ought not to be done, he added: "What God has joined, let man not separate." And lest he be thought to have spoken concerning those who take wives after baptism, let them remember that this was both asked by Jews and answered to Jews. I ask, and anxiously ask: if the wife of one who was first a catechumen and afterward becomes faithful is one and the same, and he begot children from her when he was a catechumen and afterward other children when he was faithful, are they to be called brothers? Or, after the father has died, do they not possess with the others a share in dividing the inheritance because spiritual regeneration is said to have taken the name of children away from them? Since it is absurd to judge and think thus, what reason is there for this evil to be defended and vaunted more by empty opinion than strengthened by any authority, when that which the law commands and God has joined cannot be counted among sins?

> C. I. Bigami probantur qui ante baptismum habuerunt unam, et post baptismum alteram.
> Item Innocentius Papa Rufo et Eusebio, Episcopis Macedonibus. [epist. XXII. c. 2.] Numquid non erunt admittendi in hereditatis consortium, qui ex ea suscepti sunt, que ante baptismum fuerit uxor? eruntque appellandi naturales, quia non est matrimonium legitimum (ut uobis uidetur) nisi illud, quod post baptismum assumitur? Ipse Dominus, cum interrogaretur a Iudeis, si liceret dimittere uxorem, atque exponeret fieri non debere, addidit: "Quod Deus coniunxit homo non separet." Ac ne de his putetur esse locutus qui post baptismum uxores sortiuntur, hoc et a Iudeis interrogatum, et Iudeis esse responsum meminerint. Quero, et sollicitus quero, si una et eadem sit uxor eius, qui ante catecuminus postea fidelis fit, filiosque ex ea, cum esset catecuminus, susceperit, et postea alios filios, cum fidelis, utrum sint fratres appellandi, an non habeant postea defuncto patre cum ceteris hereditatis herciscundae consortium, quibus filiorum nomen regeneratio spiritualis dicitur abstulisse? Quod cum ita iudicare atque sentire absurdum est, que ratio est hoc malum defendi, et uacua magis oppinione iactari, quam aliqua auctoritate roborari, cum non possit inter peccata deputari quod lex precipit, et Deus coniunxit?

C. II. Let it be in the believer's power after baptism to receive the wife whom he had previously dismissed.

Likewise from a decree of Pope Eutychian. PART II. If any gentile shall have dismissed a gentile wife before baptism, after baptism it will be in his power to have her or not to have her.

> C. II. In fidelis potestate sit post baptismum uxorem recipere, quam ante dimiserat.
> Item ex Decreto Euticiani Papae. II. Pars. Si quis gentilis gentilem uxorem dimiserit ante baptismum, post baptismum in potestate eius erit eam habere, uel non habere.

C. III. A believer is not compelled to follow an unbeliever who departs.

The same. In like manner, if one of the married persons is baptized and the other is a gentile and does not wish to follow, as the Apostle says, if the unbeliever departs, let that person depart.

C. III. Fidelis infidelem discedentem sequi non cogitur.

Idem. Simili modo, si unus ex coniugatis baptizatus est, et alter gentilis, et sequi non uult, sicut dicit Apostolus, infidelis si discedit, discedat.

C. IV. A wife who is unwilling to dwell with a believer is left without fault.

Likewise Augustine, On Faith and Works, [c. 16]. A wife joined in a lawful partnership is left without any fault if she is unwilling to remain with a Christian husband. Nor is it considered that she is most rightly dismissed in the same way if she says to her husband: "I will not be your wife unless you amass riches for me by robbery, or unless, even as a Christian, you practice the customary acts of procuring by which you maintained our household," or if she knew anything else criminal or disgraceful in the man, by which, delighted, she either fulfilled her lust, possessed an easy livelihood, or even went about more adorned. For then the man to whom his wife has said these things, if he truly performed penance from dead works when he approached baptism and possesses in the foundation faith that works through love, will without doubt be held more by love of divine grace than by the lust of the flesh and will resolutely cut off the member that scandalizes him.

C. IV. Sine culpa relinquitur uxor, que cum fideli habitare noluerit.

Item Augustinus de fide et operibus. [c. 16.] Uxor legitima societate coniuncta sine ulla culpa relinquitur, si cum uiro Christiano permanere noluerit. Non adtenditur, eo modo eam rectissime dimitti, si uiro suo dicat: Non ero uxor tua, nisi michi uel de latrocinio diuitias congreges, aut nisi solita lenocinia, quibus nostram domum transigebas, etiam Christianus exerceas, aut si quid aliud uel facinorosum aut flagitiosum in uiro nouerat, quo delectata uel libidinem explebat, uel facilem uictum habebat uel etiam incedebat ornatior. Tunc enim ille, cui uxor hec dixit, si ueraciter egerit penitenciam ab operibus mortuis, quando ad baptismum accessit, habetque in fundamento fidem, que per dilectionem operatur, proculdubio plus tenebitur amore diuinae gratiae, quam carnis luxuria, et membrum, quod eum scandalizat, fortiter amputabit.

C. V. A wife who seeks to compel her husband to evil is lawfully dismissed.

The same in The Lord's Sermon on the Mount, Book I, [cc. 27 and 28]. Idolatry, which unbelievers follow, and every harmful superstition are fornication. But the Lord permitted a wife to be dismissed for the cause of fornication. Yet because he permitted and did not command it, he gave the Apostle occasion to admonish that one who wishes should not dismiss an unbelieving wife, so that in this way perhaps she can become faithful. Likewise, [c. 28]. § 1. If unbelief is fornication, idolatry unbelief, and avarice idolatry, there is no doubt that avarice is also fornication. Who, then, can now rightly separate any unlawful concupiscence from the genus of fornication if avarice is fornication? From this it is understood that because of unlawful concupiscences—not only those committed in debaucheries with other men or women, but altogether any that cause the soul, using the body badly, to stray from the law of God and to be perniciously and shamefully corrupted—a husband can dismiss his wife and a wife her husband without crime. For the Lord makes the cause of fornication an exception, which fornication, as was considered above, we are compelled to understand generally and universally. But when he says, "Except for the cause of fornication," he does not say whose, whether the man's or the woman's. For permission is granted not only to dismiss a wife who fornicates; rather, whoever also dismisses a wife by whom he himself is compelled to fornicate dismisses her for the cause of fornication—for example, if a wife compels someone to sacrifice to idols. One who dismisses such a woman dismisses her for the cause of fornication, not only hers but also his own: hers, because she fornicates; his own, lest he fornicate.

C. V. Licite dimittitur uxor, que uirum suum cogere querit ad malum.

Idem in sermone Domini in monte, libro I. [c. 27. et 28.] Idolatria, quam secuntur infideles, et quelibet noxia superstitio fornicatio est. Dominus autem permisit causa fornicationis uxorem dimitti. Sed quia permisit, et non iussit, dedit Apostolo locum monendi, ut qui uoluerit non dimittat uxorem infidelem, quo sic fortassis possit fidelis fieri. Item: [c. 28.] §. 1. Si infidelitas fornicatio est, et idolatria infidelitas, et auaritia idolatria, non est dubitandum, et auaritiam fornicationem esse. Quis ergo iam quamlibet illicitam concupiscentiam potest recte a fornicationis genere separare, si auaritia fornicatio est? Ex quo intelligitur, quod propter illicitas concupiscentias non tantum que in stupris cum alienis uiris aut feminis conmittuntur, sed omnino quaslibet, que animam corpore male utentem a lege Dei aberrare faciunt, et perniciose turpiterque corrumpi, possit sine crimine et uir uxorem suam dimittere, et uxor uirum; quia exceptam facit Dominus causam fornicationis, quam fornicationem (sicut supra consideratum est) generalem et uniuersalem intelligere cogimur. Cum autem ait: "Excepta fornicationis causa" non, cuius ipsorum, uiri aut feminae. Non enim fornicantem tantum uxorem dimittere conceditur, sed quisquis eam quoque uxorem dimittit, a qua ipse cogitur fornicari, causa utique fornicationis dimittit; uelut si aliquem cogat uxor sacrificare idolis. Qui talem dimittit causa fornicationis dimittit, non tantum illius, sed et suae; illius, quia fornicatur: suae, ne fornicetur.

C. VI. Let a woman who makes an idol and does not return to wisdom be dismissed by her husband.

The same, On Adulterous Marriages, Book II. Adultery is committed not only by a woman who defiles her flesh, but a woman who makes an idol also commits adultery. But if she perseveres in these deeds and does not perform penance, withdraw from her and do not live with her. Otherwise you too will be a participant in her sin.

C. VI. Que simulacrum facit, nec resipiscit, dimittatur a uiro.

Idem de adulterinis coniugiis, libro II. Non solum mechatio est illius, que carnem suam coinquiat, sed etiam que simulacrum facit mechatur. Quod si in his factis perseuerat, et penitenciam non agit, recede ab illa, et noli uiuere cum illa. Sin autem, et tu particeps eius peccati eris.

C. VII. One must not depart from the faith for the love of anyone.

Likewise Ambrose to Hilary. "If the unbeliever," says the Apostle, "departs, let that person depart; a brother or sister is not subject to servitude in such a case"—that is, if the unbeliever is unwilling to be with a believing spouse, let the believer recognize his or her freedom, lest that person suppose himself or herself subject to servitude in such a way as to dismiss the faith itself in order not to lose an unbelieving spouse. This is also understood concerning children and parents, and concerning brothers and sisters: they are to be dismissed for Christ when this condition is imposed, that one must dismiss Christ if one desires to have that person with oneself. This is therefore also to be understood concerning a house and fields and the other things possessed by proprietary right.

C. VII. Amore cuiuslibet non est a fide recedendum.

Item Ambrosius ad Hylarium. "Si infidelis" (dicit Apostolus) "discedit, discedat; non est seruituti subiectus frater aut soror in huiusmodi," id est: si infidelis noluerit esse cum coniuge fideli, hic agnoscat fidelis suam libertatem, ne ita se subiectum putet seruituti, ut ipsam dimittat fidem, ne coniugem amittat infidelem. Hoc et de filiis atque parentibus, hoc et de fratribus atque sororibus intelligitur, propter Christum dimittendos esse, cum ponitur ista condicio, ut Christum dimittat, si eum secum habere desiderat. Hoc ergo et de domo et de agris, et de ceteris rebus, que iure pecuniario possidentur, intelligendum est.

C. VIII. That unbelievers are spouses, and that it is lawful for a believer to put away an unbeliever.

Likewise Augustine to Pollentius, [Book I, On Adulterous Marriages, cc. 13 and 14]. PART III. Let us now consider what the Apostle says:

"But to the rest I say, not the Lord"—namely, when he was about to speak of unequal marriages, in which both had not been Christians. It seemed to me that he said this by way of admonition. For because a believing spouse can lawfully leave an unbelieving spouse, the Lord does not prohibit this from being done, but the Apostle does. What the Lord prohibits absolutely may not be done. The Apostle therefore admonishes that which can be an occasion for winning many: that believing spouses should not use the permission granted them to leave unbelievers. But it seems to you that unbelievers also may not be put away by believers, because the Apostle forbids this, whereas I say that it is lawful, because the Lord does not forbid it; nevertheless, it is not expedient, because the Apostle admonishes that it not be done, and he also gives the reason why it is not expedient to do it, although it is lawful. "For how do you know, woman," he says, "whether you will save your husband? Or how do you know, husband, whether you will save your wife?" since he had also said above: "The unbelieving husband is sanctified in the believing woman, and the unbelieving woman is sanctified in the brother" (that is, in the Christian). "Otherwise your children would be unclean; but now they are holy." Thus, even by examples that had already occurred, he seems to have exhorted them to win spouses and children for Christ. The reason why it is not expedient for unbelieving spouses to be put away by believers is therefore clearly expressed. For the Apostle forbids departure from unbelieving spouses, not because the marital bond with such persons must be preserved, but so that they may be sought in Christ. Many things, moreover, are to be done not because the law commands them, but from free charity; and those things among our duties are more pleasing which, although it would be lawful for us not to expend them, we nevertheless expend for the sake of love. Hence the Lord himself first, although he had shown that he did not owe the tribute, nevertheless paid it, lest he scandalize those whom he was accommodating while consulting their eternal salvation. Indeed, how the Apostle commends these things is attested by his words where he says: "Although I am free from all, I made myself the servant of all, that I might gain the more," when a little above he had said: "Do we not have the right to eat and drink? Do we not have the right to take about a sister, a woman, as do the other Apostles, and the brothers of the Lord, and Cephas? Or do only I and Barnabas not have the power to do this work? Who ever serves as a soldier at his own expense? Who plants a vineyard and does not eat of its fruit? Who tends a flock and does not eat of the milk of the flock?" And a little afterward he says: "If others share by right in this authority over you, do not we more so? But we have not used this authority; rather, we endure all things, lest we place any impediment in the way of the gospel of Christ."

C. VIII. Quod infideles sunt coniuges, et quod fideli licet dimittere infidelem.

Item Augustinus ad Pollentium. [lib. I. de adulter. coniugiis, c. 13. et 14.] III. Pars. Iam nunc illud uideamus, quod ait Apostolus:

"Ceteris autem ego dico, non Dominus, ad inparia scilicet, ubi non ambo Christiani fuerant, coniugia locuturus. Quod michi uisum est eum monendo dixisse. Quia enim coniux fidelis relinquere coniugem licite potest infidelem, ideo hoc fieri non Dominus, sed Apostolus prohibet. Quod enim Dominus prohibet fieri omnino non licet. Monet ergo Apostolus, quod possit esse multorum occasio lucrandorum, ut fideles coniuges in relinquendis infidelibus permissa licentia non utantur. Tibi autem uidetur, infideles quoque dimitti a fidelibus non licere, quia hoc uetat Apostolus, cum ego dicam licere, quia hoc non uetat Dominus; non tamen expedire, quia hoc ne fiat monet Apostolus, qui reddit etiam rationem, cur fieri non expediat, quamuis liceat. 'Quid enim scis' (inquit) 'mulier, si uirum saluum facies? aut unde scis uir, si uxorem saluam facies?' cum etiam superius dixisset: 'Sanctificatus est uir infidelis in muliere fideli, et mulier infidelis sanctificata est in fratre' (hoc est in Christiano)." Alioquin filii uestri, inmundi essent: nunc autem sancti sunt." Sic ad lucrandos coniuges et filios Christo etiam exemplis, que iam prouenerant, uidetur hortatus. Cur ergo non expediat etiam infideles coniuges dimitti a fidelibus, causa euidenter expressa est. Non enim propter uinculum cum talibus coniugale seruandum, sed ut querantur in Christo, recedi ab infidelibus coniugibus Apostolus uetat. Multa sunt autem facienda non iubente lege, sed libera karitate, et ea sunt in nostris offitiis gratiora, que, cum liceret nobis etiam non inpendere, tamen causa dilectionis inpendimus. Unde Dominus ipse prior, cum se tributum non debere monstrasset, soluit tamen, ne scandalizaret eos, quibus ad eternam salutem gerens morem consulebat. Iam uero Apostolus, quemadmodum ista conmendet, eius uerba testantur ubi dicit: "Cum sim liber ex omnibus, omnium ne seruum feci, ut plures lucrifacerem," cum paulo superius dixisset: "Numquid non habemus licentiam manducandi et bibendi? numquid non habemus licentiam sororem mulierem circumducendi, sicut et ceteri Apostoli, et fratres Domini, et Cephas? An ego solus, et Barnabas non habemus potestatem hoc operandi? Quis militat suis stipendiis umquam? Quis plantat uineam, et de fructu eius non edit? Quis pascit gregem, et de lacte gregis non comedit?" Et paulo post: "Si alii," inquit, potestatis uestrae iure participant, nonne magis nos? sed non sumus usi hac potestate, sed omnia tolleramus, ne quod inpedimentum demus euangelio Christi.

C. IX. It is lawful to depart from unbelieving spouses, but it is not expedient.

Likewise, [in the same work, c. 18 and the following chapters]. For in this way believing men or women are neither forbidden by the Lord to depart from unbelieving wives or husbands, nor are they commanded to do so. For if they were commanded to put away such spouses, there would be no place for the counsel of the Apostle admonishing that this not be done. For in no way does the servant of the Lord forbid what the Lord commands.

Likewise: Therefore, when the gospel began to be preached to the gentiles, it found gentiles joined to gentile spouses. If, of these, both did not believe, but one man or one woman did, and the unbeliever consented to dwell with the believer, the believer ought neither to have been forbidden by the Lord to put away the unbeliever nor commanded to do so. He ought not to have been forbidden, namely, because justice permits departure from a fornicator, and the fornication of an unbelieving person is greater in the heart; nor can his chastity with his spouse indeed be called true, because everything that is not of faith is sin, although the believer has true chastity even with an unbelieving spouse, who does not have true chastity. Yet believers ought not to have been commanded to separate from unbelievers, because the two gentiles had not been joined contrary to the Lord's command.

§ 1. Since, therefore, the Lord neither forbids nor commands a believer to depart from an unbeliever, the Apostle—not the Lord—says that the believer should not depart, having, certainly, the Holy Spirit, in whom he could give useful and faithful counsel. Hence, after he had said concerning a woman whose husband had died, "But she will be happier if she remains thus, according to my counsel," lest anyone think that this counsel, as human and not divine, was to be despised, he added: "But I think that I too have the Spirit of God." Accordingly, it must be understood that even those things which are not commanded by the Lord but are usefully advised by his holy servant are advised by the inspiration of the same Lord. For far be it from any Catholic to say that what the Holy Spirit advises is not advised by the Lord, since the Holy Spirit himself is Lord and the works of the Trinity are inseparable. Yet the Apostle says: "Concerning virgins, however, I have no command of the Lord, but I give counsel," not so that we might suppose this counsel to be foreign to the Lord, since he immediately continues and says, "as one who has obtained mercy from the Lord to be faithful." Therefore he gives faithful counsel according to God, in the same Spirit concerning whom he says, "But I think that I too have the Spirit of God."

§ 2. Nevertheless, the command of the Lord who orders is one thing; the faithful counsel of a servant, according to the mercy of charity inspired and given to him by the Lord, is another. For in the former it is not lawful to do otherwise; in the latter it is lawful, yet in such a way that what is lawful is in part expedient, but in part not expedient. It is expedient when it is not only permitted on account of the justice that exists before God, but also causes no impediment to the salvation of human beings. For example, when the Apostle gives virgins counsel not to marry—concerning which he testifies that he has no command of the Lord—it is lawful to do otherwise, that is, to marry and to maintain the lesser good of continence in marriage; and this lawful thing is also expedient, since the honorable state of marriage has thus received the weakness of the flesh, which would otherwise rush into forbidden and unlawful acts, so that it impedes no one from salvation, although it would be more expedient and more honorable if the virgin embraced the counsel to which no command compels her. But what is lawful is not expedient when it is indeed permitted, but the exercise of that power brings others an impediment to salvation. Such is the departure—which we have now long been discussing —of a believing spouse from an unbeliever. The Lord does not forbid it by a command of law, because it is not unjust before him; but the Apostle forbids it by the counsel of charity, because it brings unbelievers an impediment to salvation, not only because, being offended, they are most ruinously scandalized, but also because, when they have fallen into other marriages while those by whom they are put away are living, they are bound by adulterous bonds and are released with difficulty.

§ 4. Accordingly, in these two cases—the one concerning marrying or not marrying, the other concerning putting away or not putting away an unbelieving spouse—something in the Apostle's words is similar and something dissimilar. This is similar: there he says, "I have no command of the Lord, but I give counsel," and here he says, "I say, not the Lord." For "I have no command of the Lord" is like "the Lord does not say," and "I give counsel" is like "I say." But this is dissimilar: concerning marrying or not marrying it can be said that this can be done well, but that better, since both are expedient, one less and the other more. But concerning putting away or not putting away an unbelieving spouse, since one of these is not expedient and the other is expedient, it ought not to be said, "He who puts the spouse away does well, and he who does not put the spouse away does better"; rather, it ought to be said, "Let him not put the spouse away," because, namely, it is not expedient. Thus, therefore, we can say that it is better not to put away an unbelieving spouse, although it is also lawful to put the spouse away, just as we rightly say that what is lawful and expedient is better than what is lawful and not expedient.

§ 5. For these reasons it happened that, when expounding the Lord's lengthy discourse on the mountain, once the question of putting away or not putting away spouses was reached, I employed from the Apostle—not a command of the Lord—the passage in which he says, "But to the rest I say, not the Lord," admonishing those who have unbelieving spouses not to put them away if they consent to dwell with them. This certainly had to be admonished, not commanded, because human beings are not prohibited with so great a weight from doing lawful things, although they are not expedient, as unlawful things must be prohibited. But if the Apostle somewhere deigns to admonish even those things that must be commanded, he does this by sparing weakness, not by prejudicing the command. Hence he said thus: "I write these things not to confound you, but to admonish you as my dearest children." What question is there where he says, "I say, not the Lord"? Likewise, where he says, "Behold, I Paul say to you that if you be circumcised, Christ will profit you nothing"? Did he also say here, "Behold, I say, not the Lord"? These things, therefore, are not similar, because even as to those things that the Lord commands, it is neither unworthy nor contrary if the Apostle also admonishes them. For we admonish those whom we hold dear to perform the Lord's precepts or commands. But when he says, "I say, not the Lord," he sufficiently shows that the Lord does not forbid what he himself was forbidding. But the Lord would have forbidden it if it were unlawful. Therefore, according to the matters we discussed above and treated at length, it was lawful by justice; but even what was lawful was not to be done because of free benevolence.

§ 6. But you, to whom it seems that what the Lord does not forbid, but the Apostle does, is no more lawful than what the Lord forbids—when you wished to explain what he meant when he said, "I say, not the Lord," as he addressed believers who had unbelieving spouses—you said that the Lord commanded that marriages of differing religion not be joined to one another. And you employed the very testimony of the Lord saying: "You shall not take a wife for your son from the daughters of foreigners, lest she draw him after her gods and his soul perish." You also added the words of the Apostle where he says: "A woman is bound for as long as her husband lives; but if her husband has died, she is free; let her marry whom she wishes, only in the Lord." You explained this by adding: that is, a Christian. Then you continued and added: This, therefore, is the Lord's command both in the Old Testament and in the New; this the Lord commands, this the Apostle teaches: that only marriages of the same religion and faith should remain joined. Why, contrary to the Lord's command, contrary to holy teaching, contrary to the precept of the Old and New Testament, does the Apostle command that marriages of differing faith remain joined?

Because Paul, he says, the preacher and apostle of the gentiles, not only admonishes but even commands those already placed in marriage that, if one of the spouses should believe, that person should not put away the other, who does not believe but nevertheless consents to dwell together. By these words of yours you show sufficiently clearly that this is one thing and that another. For there the matter concerns marriages that have not been joined in the first place: that a woman marry only a man of her religion, or that a man take such a woman as wife; for this, as you say, the Lord commands, the Apostle teaches, and both Testaments prescribe. But who would deny that this is different, since here the matter concerns not persons to be joined but persons already joined? For both were of one and the same unbelief when they were joined; but when the gospel came, either the one without the other, or the other without the one, believed. Therefore, if this is another matter—as appears without any scruple of doubt—why is it not lawful for a believer to remain with an unbelieving spouse? Does not the Lord also command it, just as the Apostle does? Unless perhaps in this place that which the Apostle so faithfully says is void: "Do you seek proof of the Christ who speaks in me?" And Christ is certainly the Lord.

§ 7. Do you understand what I am saying? Or shall I linger somewhat more carefully in explaining this? Pay attention, so that we may set forth the matter itself to be explained, as though it were to be made clear before our eyes, in plainer speech. Behold, when two spouses were joined, they were both of one unbelief. There is no question about them that pertains to that command of the Lord, the apostolic teaching, and the precept of the Old and New Testament by which a believer is forbidden to join in marriage with an unbeliever. They are already spouses, and both are still unbelievers; they are still such as they were before they were joined and such as they were when joined. Then the preacher of the gospel comes, and either the man or the woman believes, but in such a way that the unbeliever consents to dwell with the believer. Does the Lord command the believer to put away the unbeliever, or does he not command it? If you say, "He commands it," the Apostle cries out against you: "I say, not the Lord." If you say, "He does not command it," I ask the reason. Nor will you answer me with the reason you inserted into your writings, namely that the Lord forbids believers to be joined to unbelievers. For that reason has no place here at all: we are speaking of those already joined, not of those to be joined. Therefore, if you have not found your reason why the Lord does not forbid what the Apostle forbids, you now perceive, I suppose, that it is not the reason you had thought it was.

PART IV. GRATIAN. To the contrary, it is found in the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 62]:

> C. IX. Ab infidelibus coniugibus licet alicui recedere, sed non expedit.
> Item. [ibidem, c. 18. et sequentibus.] Sic enim neque recedere ab uxoribus infidelibus uel maritis fideles uiri uel feminae non prohibentur a Domino. ut neque iubeantur. Nam si dimittere tales coniuges iuberentur, nullus locus esset consilio monentis Apostoli, ne hoc fieret. Nullo modo enim quod Dominus iubet seruus Domini prohibet. Item: Cum ergo cepisset gentibus euangelium predicari, iunctos gentiles gentilibus conperit coniugibus. Ex quibus si non ambo crederent, sed unus aut una et infidelis cum fideli consentiret habitare, nec prohiberi a Domino debuit fidelis infidelem dimittere, nec iuberi: ideo scilicet non prohiberi, quia iusticia permittit a fornicante discedere, et infidelis hominis fornicatio est maior in corde, nec uera eius pudicitia cum coniuge quidem dici potest, quia omne, quod non est ex fide, peccatum est, quamuis ueram fidelis habeat pudicitiam etiam cum infideli coniuge, que non habet ueram. Ideo autem nec iuberi debuerunt fideles ab infidelibus separari, quia non contra iussionem Domini gentiles fuerunt ambo coniuncti. §. 1. Quoniam ergo ab infideli fidelem discedere non prohibet, nec iubet Dominus: ideo, ut non discedat, Apostolus dicit, non Dominus, habens utique Spiritum sanctum, in quo dare posset utile et fidele consilium. Unde cum dixisset de muliere, cuius uir mortuus fuerit: "Beatior autem erit, si sic permanserit, secundum consilium meum," ne quis hoc consilium tamquam humanum, non diuinum, contempnendum putaret, adiecit: "Puto autem, quod et ego spiritum Dei habeam." Proinde intelligendum est, etiam ipsa, que a Domino non iubentur, sed a sancto eius famulo utiliter suadentur, eodem Domino inspirante suaderi. Absit enim, ut quisquam catholicus dixerit, quod suadet Spiritus sanctus non Dominum suadere, cum et ipse Dominus sit, et inseparabilia sint opera Trinitatis. Dicit tamen Apostolus: "De uirginibus autem preceptum Domini non habeo; consilium autem do," non ut hoc consilium alienum existimemus a Domino, cum continuo sequatur, et dicat: "tamquam misericordiam consecutus a Domino, ut fidelis essem." Secundum Deum ergo dat consilium fidele in eodem spiritu, de quo ait: "Puto autem, quod et ego spiritum Dei habeam." §. 2. Verumtamen aliud est Domini iubentis inperium aliud serui secundum misericordiam karitatis, que illi a Domino est inspirata atque donata, fidele consilium. Aliud enim ibi facere non licet, hic autem licet, ita sane, ut licitum ipsum partim quidem expediat, partim uero non expediat. Expedit tunc, quando non solum propter iusticiam, que coram Deo est permittitur, sed etiam hominibus nullum ex hoc inpedimentum salutis infertur; uelut cum dat consilium non nubendi Apostolus uirginibus (unde preceptum Domini se non habere testatur), licet aliud facere, id est nubere, et minus continentiae bonum tenere in nuptiis, ipsumque licitum etiam expedit, quoniam in uetita et illicita ruituram carnis infirmitatem sic excepit honestate nubendi, ut neminem inpediat ad salutem, quamuis magis expediret magisque honestum esset, si uirgo consilium, quo preceptum eam non conpellit, arriperet. Tunc autem non expedit id, quod licitum est, quando permittitur quidem, sed usus ipsius potestatis aliis affert inpedimentum salutis, sicut est (unde iamdiu loquimur) discessio coniugis fidelis ab infideli, quam non prohibet Dominus precepto legis, quia coram illo iniusta non est, sed prohibet Apostolus consilio karitatis, quia infidelibus affert inpedimentum salutis non solum, quia perniciosissime scandalizantur offensi, uerum etiam, quia, cum in alia coniugia ceciderint uiuentibus eis, a quibus dimittuntur, adulterinis nexibus colligati difficile resoluuntur. §. 3. Ideo hic, ubi, quod licet, non expedit, non potest dici, si dimiserit infidelem, bene facit, si non dimiserit, melius facit, sicut dictum est: "Qui dat nuptum bene facit, et qui non dat nuptum melius facit;" quoniam illud non solum sed utrumque pariter licet (unde ad nichil horum precepto Domini quisque conpellitur), sed utrumque expedit, aliud minus, aliud amplius. Unde ad id, quod amplius expedit, consilio Apostoli quicumque potest capere prouocatur. Hic autem, ubi de dimittendo uel non dimittendo infidelis cum fideli coniugio queritur, utrumque quidem pariter licitum est per iusticiam, que coram Domino est, et ideo nichil horum prohibet Dominus; sed utrumque non expedit propter infirmitatem hominum, et ideo id, quod non expedit, Apostolus prohibet, Domino dante sibi liberum prohibendi locum, quia neque id, quod monet Apostolus, prohibet Dominus, neque id, quod prohibet Apostolus, iubet Dominus. Quod nisi ita esset, neque contra prohibitionem Domini Apostolus aliquid moneret, neque contra iussionem eius aliquid prohiberet. §. 4. Proinde in his duabus causis, una de nubendo uel non nubendo, altera de infideli coniuge dimittenda uel non dimittenda, aliquid simile est in uerbis Apostoli, aliquid dissimile. Simile quidem est illud, quod et ibi dicit: "Preceptum Domini non habeo, consilium autem do," et hic dicit: "Ego dico, non Dominus." Quale est enim: "preceptum Domini non habeo," tale est: "non dicit Dominus," et quale est: "consilium do," tale est: "ego dico." Illud autem dissimile est, quia de nubendo uel non nubendo dici potest, hoc bene fieri potest, illud autem melius, quoniam utrumque expedit unum minus, aliud magis: at uero de coniuge infideli dimittendo uel non dimittendo, quoniam unum horum non expedit, aliud expedit, dici non oportet, qui dimittit bene facit, et qui non dimittit melius facit: sed dici oportet, non dimittat, quia scilicet non expedit. Sic ergo possumus dicere, melius esse infidelem coniugem non dimittere, quamuis liceat et dimittere, quemadmodum recte dicimus melius esse quod licet et expedit, quam id, quod licet et non expedit. §. 5. His de causis factum est, ut exponens Domini sermonem, quem prolixum in monte habuit, ubi uentum est ad questionem de coniugibus dimittendis uel non dimittendis, adhibuerim ab Apostolo, non preceptum Domini, ubi ait: "Ceteris autem ego dico, non Dominus," monens eos, qui habent coniuges infideles, ut consentientes habitare secum non dimitterent. Quod utique ideo monendum, non iubendum fuit, quia non tanto pondere prohibentur homines facere licita, quamuis non expediant, quanto pondere prohibenda sunt illicita. Si autem alicubi Apostolus etiam illa, que iubenda sunt, monere dignatur, hoc facit parcendo infirmitati, non preiudicando iussioni. Unde sic dixit: "Non ut confundam uos, hec scribo, sed ut filios karissimos moneo;" quid habet questionis, ubi ait: "Ego dico, non Dominus;" item, ubi ait: "Ecce ego Paulus dico uobis, quia, si circumcidamini, Christus uobis nichil proderit?" Numquid etiam hic dixit: Ecce ego dico, non Dominus? Non sunt itaque ista similia, quia etiam illa, que iubet Dominus, non est indignum uel contrarium, si eadem monet Apostolus. Monemus enim quos karos habemus, ut faciant Domini precepta uel iussa. Cum uero dicit: "Ego dico, non Dominus," satis ostendit, Dominum non prohibere quod ipse prohibebat. Prohibuisset autem Dominus, si esset illicitum. Ergo secundum ea, que supra diximus multumque uersauimus, licitum erat per iusticiam; sed etiam licitum non erat faciendum propter liberam beniuolentiam. §. 6. Tu autem, cui placet ita non licere quod non uetat Dominus, sed Apostolus, quemadmodum non licet quod uetat Dominus, cum exponere uoluisses, quid sibi uelit quod ait: "Ego dico, non Dominus," cum alloqueretur fideles, quibus essent coniuges infideles, dixisti, quia Dominus iussit, ne coniugia sibimet diuersae religionis copularentur, et ipsum adhibuisti testimonium Domini dicentis: "Non accipies uxorem filio tuo de filiabus alienigenarum, ne traducat eum post Deos suos, ut pereat anima eius." Addidisti etiam uerba Apostoli, ubi ait: "Mulier alligata est, quamdiu uir eius uiuit; quod si mortuus fuerit uir eius, liberata est; cui uult nubat: tantum in Domino." Quod ita exposuisti, ut adiungeres: id est Christiano. Deinde secutus es, et addidisti: Hoc est ergo Domini preceptum tam in ueteri testamento quam in nouo, et hoc iubet Dominus, hoc docet Apostolus, ut non nisi eiusdem religionis et fidei maneant copulata coniugia: quare contra Domini iussum, contra doctrinam sanctam, contra preceptum ueteris et noui testamenti iubet Apostolus, ut diuersae fidei maneant coniugia copulata?

Quia Paulus, inquit, predicator gentium et apostolus, iam in coniugio positos non solum monet, sed etiam iubet, ut si alter ex coniugibus credidisset, alterum non credentem, secum habitare tamen consentientem, non dimitteret. His uerbis tuis aliud hoc esse, aliud illud, satis euidenter ostendis. Illud enim de his coniugiis agitur, que non sunt primitus copulata ne nubat femina nisi suae religionis uiro, uel ne uir talem ducat uxorem; id enim (ut dicis) iubet Dominus, docet Apostolus, utrumque precipit testamentum. Hoc autem diuersum esse quis abnuat, ibi agitur non de coniungendis, sed de coniunctis? Ambo quippe unius eiusdemque infidelitatis fuerunt, quando coniuncti sunt; sed euangelium cum uenisset, alter sine altera, uel altera sine altero credidit. Si ergo aliud est hoc (quod sine scrupulo ullius dubitationis apparet), cur fidelem cum infideli coniuge permanere non licet nonne etiam Dominus, sicut Apostolus iubet? Nisi forte loco isto uacat illud quod tam fideliter Apostolus ait: "An uultis experimentum accipere eius, qui in me loquitur Christus?" Et utique Dominus est Christus. §. 7. Intelligisne quid dicam? An in hoc explanando aliquanto diligentius inmorabor? Attende, ut rem ipsam explanandam tamquam in conspectu declarandam planiore sermone ponamus. Ecce, coniuges duo unius infidelitatis ita fuerunt, quando iuncti sunt. Nulla de his questio est, que pertineat ad illam Domini iussionem, doctrinamque apostolicam, et preceptum testamenti ueteris et noui, quo prohibetur fidelis cum infideli copulare coniugium. Iam sunt coniuges, et ambo adhuc sunt infideles; adhuc tales sunt, quales fuerunt ante, quam coniungerentur, qualesque coniuncti sunt. Venitque euangelii predicator, credidit eorum aut unus, aut una; sed ita, ut infidelis cum fideli habitare consentiat. Iubet fideli Dominus, ut infidelem dimittat, an non iubet? Si dixeris, iubet, reclamat Apostolus: "Ego dico, non Dominus." Si dixeris, non iubet, causam requiro. Neque illam michi responsurus es, quam tuis litteris indidisti, quia Dominus uidelicet prohibet fideles infidelibus iungi. Hic enim nullo modo est ista causa; de iam iunctis loquimur, non de coniungendis. Si ergo tuam causam non inuenisti, cur non uetet Dominus quod prohibet Apostolus: (cernis iam, ut estimo non esse ipsam, quam esse putaueras). IV. Pars. Gratian. Contra inuenitur in Concilio Tolletano IV.: [c. 62.]

C. X. Unless a Jew comes to the faith, let him be separated from his believing wife.

Jews who have Christian women in marriage are to be admonished by the bishop of that city that, if they desire to remain with them, they should become Christians. But if, after being admonished, they are unwilling, let them be separated, because an unbeliever cannot remain in union with one who has now been transferred to the Christian faith. Moreover, the children born from such persons are to follow the faith and condition of the mother. Likewise, those who have been begotten of unbelieving women and believing men are to follow the Christian religion, not Jewish superstition.

GRATIAN. But this was established for this reason: lest, while the believer seeks the salvation of the unbeliever, the believer rather find with the unbeliever the perdition of unbelief. Hence in the same Council, [c. 59], it was established both concerning the children of Jews and concerning others coming to the faith that they should avoid the company of unbelievers:

C. X. Nisi ad fidem Iudeus accesserit, separetur ab uxore fideli.

Iudei, qui Christianas mulieres in coniugio habent, admoneantur ab episcopo ciuitatis illius, ut, si cum eis permanere cupiunt, Christiani efficiantur. Quod si admoniti noluerint, separentur, quia non potest infidelis in eius permanere coniunctione, que iam in Christianam translata est fidem. Filii autem, qui ex talibus nati sunt, fidem atque condicionem matris sequantur. Similiter illi, qui procreati sunt de infidelibus mulieribus et fidelibus uiris, Christianam sequantur religionem, non Iudaicam superstitionem. Gratian. Verum hoc ideo statutum est, ne, dum fidelis salutem querit infidelis, pocius ipse cum eo infidelitatis perditionem inueniat. Unde in eodem Concilio [c. 59.] tam de filiis Iudeorum quam de ceteris ad fidem uenientibus statutum est, ut infidelium consortia euitent:

C. XI. Let believers be separated from the company of their parents, lest they be entangled in their errors.

We decree that the sons or daughters of Jews, lest they be further entangled in the errors of their parents, be separated from their company and assigned either to monasteries or to God-fearing Christian women and men, so that under their manner of life they may learn the worship of the faith and, being better instructed, may advance both in morals and in faith.

C. XI. A parentum separentur consortio fideles, ne eorum inuoluantur erroribus.

Iudeorum filios uel filias, ne parentum ultra inuoluantur erroribus, ab eorum consortio separari decernimus, deputatos aut monasteriis, aut Christianis mulieribus ac uiris, Deum timentibus, ut sub eorum conuersatione cultum fidei discant, atque melius instituti tam in moribus quam in fide proficiant.

C. XII. Let Jews coming to the faith have no communion with unbelievers.

Likewise, [in the same Council, c. 61]. The company of evil persons often corrupts even the good; how much more those who are prone to vices? Therefore, let Hebrews transferred to the Christian faith henceforth have no communion with those who still remain in the old rite, lest perhaps they be subverted by participation with them. Therefore, henceforth, whoever among those who have been baptized do not avoid the company of unbelievers, let the former be handed over to Christians and the latter assigned to public beatings.

C. XII. Iudeis ad fidem uenientibus cum infidelibus nulla sit conmunio.

Item. [in eodem, c. 61.] Sepe malorum consortia etiam bonos corrumpunt; quanto magis eos, qui ad uicia proni sunt? Nulla igitur ultra conmunio sit Hebreis ad fidem Christianam translatis cum his, qui adhuc in ueteri ritu consistunt, ne forte eorum participatione subuertantur. Quicumque ergo amodo ex his, qui baptizati sunt, infidelium consortia non uitauerint, et hi Christianis donentur, et illi publicis cedibus deputentur.

C. XIII. One is neither to eat nor dwell with Jews, nor to receive medicine from them.

Likewise from the Sixth Synod, [c. 11]. Let no one among those who are in sacred orders, nor any layperson, eat their unleavened bread, or dwell with them, or call any one of them in his illnesses, or receive medicine from them, or bathe with them in a bathhouse. But if anyone does this, if he is a cleric, let him be deposed; but if a layperson, let him be excommunicated.

C. XIII. Cum Iudeis nec manducandum, nec habitandum, nec ab eis medicamentum accipiendum est.

Item ex VI. Sinodo. [c. 11.] Nullus eorum, qui in sacro sunt ordine, aut laicus azima eorum manducet, aut cum eis habitet aut aliquem eorum in infirmitatibus suis uocet, aut medicinam ab eis percipiat, aut cum eis in balneo lauet. Si uero quisquam hoc fecerit, si clericus est, deponatur, laicus uero excommunicetur.

C. XIV. Let clerics and laypersons avoid the banquets of Jews, and let them not receive Jews into their own company.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 40]. Henceforth let all clerics and laypersons avoid the banquets of Jews, nor let anyone receive them at a banquet, because, since they do not use foods in common with Christians, it is unworthy and sacrilegious for their foods to be taken by Christians, since those things which, with the Apostle's permission, we take are judged unclean by them. Thus Christians will begin to be inferior to Jews if we use the things set before us by them, while they despise those offered by us.

PART V. GRATIAN. From these things, therefore, it is clearly gathered that marriage exists between unbelievers. But that saying of the Apostle, "Whatever is not of faith is sin," is not to be understood so that whatever is done by unbelievers is believed to be sin, but rather that everything done against conscience builds toward hell. Hence Ambrose: "It is sin when something is done otherwise than has been approved."

§ 1. Likewise Augustine on the same passage: "Everything done otherwise than is approved is sin; nevertheless, not everything done with faith is good. For ignorance that proceeds from fault is harmful." Hence the Apostle also says: "Blessed is he who does not judge himself in that which he approves," that is, he who does not render himself condemnable by doing otherwise than he approves ought to be done. Or everything that is not of faith is said to be sin, because whatever is not done with that faith by which it may avail toward eternal salvation is reckoned useless before the Lord. Hence Augustine says: "The whole life of unbelievers is sin, nor can that which is done without God be good. For where there is no recognition of eternal and immutable truth, virtue is false even in the best morals."

§ 2. Likewise, when it is said, "There is no true chastity of an unbelieving person with his spouse," chastity is denied to be true with respect to its effect, namely the reward of eternal salvation. For just as sacraments among heretics are denied to be true, not with respect to form but with respect to power, so also virtues among unbelievers are denied to be true—not because they are not true in them, according to Jerome's saying, "By virtues the Romans merited empire"—but because they lack the effect of eternal salvation.

§ 3. Likewise, that saying of Ambrose, "A marriage made outside God's decree is not to be acknowledged; but when it is recognized, it is to be corrected," does not show that marriage does not exist between unbelievers. For by no command of the Lord are gentiles forbidden to be joined to gentiles. Their marriage, therefore, is not made outside—that is, contrary to—God's decree. Accordingly, by that authority those are commanded to be separated from one another who have been joined contrary to the decree of God or of the Church, such as unbelievers with believers, blood relatives with blood relatives, or relations by marriage with relations by marriage. All these, if they have been joined to one another, are to be separated. Hence also the same Ambrose in the book On the Patriarchs, [Book I, On Abraham, c. 9]:

C. XIV. Clerici siue laici Iudeorum conuiuia uitent, nec ad sua consortia eos recipiant.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 40.] Omnes deinceps clerici siue laici Iudeorum conuiuia uitent, nec eos quisquam ad conuiuium excipiat, quia, cum apud Christianos conmunibus cibis non utantur, indignum atque sacrilegum est eorum cibos a Christianis sumi, cum ea, que Apostolo permittente nos sumimus, ab illis iudicentur inmunda, ac sic inferiores Christiani incipient esse, quam Iudei, si nos que ab illis apponuntur utamur, illi uero a nobis oblata contempnant. V. Pars. Gratian. Ex his itaque euidenter colligitur, coniugium esse inter infideles. Illud uero Apostoli: "Quicquid non est ex fide, peccatum est," non ita intelligendum est, ut quicquid ab infidelibus fit peccatum esse credatur, sed omne, quod contra conscientiam fit, edificat ad gehennam. Unde Ambrosius: "Peccatum est, quod aliter fit quam probatum est." §. 1. Item Augustinus super eundem locum: "Omne, quod aliter fit quam probatur, peccatum est; non tamen omne, quod fit cum fide, bonum est. Ignorantia enim, que est ex culpa, nocet." Hinc etiam Apostolus ait: "Beatus, qui non iudicat semetipsum in eo, quod probat," id est qui non facit dampnabilem semetipsum aliter faciendo quam probet esse faciendum. Vel omne, quod non est ex fide, dicitur esse peccatum, quia quicquid non fit ea fide, ut ad eternam ualeat salutem, inutile reputatur apud Dominum. Unde Augustinus ait: "Omnis uita infidelium peccatum est, nec ualet bonum esse quod fit absque Deo. Ubi enim agnitio eternae et inconmutabilis ueritatis, falsa uirtus est etiam in optimis moribus." §. 2. Item cum dicitur: "non est uera pudicitia hominis infidelis cum coniuge sua," negatur pudicitia esse uera quantum ad effectum, ad premium uidelicet eternae salutis. Sicut enim apud hereticos sacramenta negantur esse uera, non quantum ad formam, sed quantum ad uirtutem, sic et uirtutes negantur apud infideles esse uerae, non quin uerae sint in eis, iuxta illud Ieronimi: "Virtutibus Romani promeruerunt inperium," sed quia effectu carent eternae salutis. §. 3. Item illud Ambrosii: "Non est inputandum matrimonium, quod extra Dei decretum factum est; sed cum cognoscitur, est emendandum," non ostendit coniugium non esse inter infideles. Nullo enim Domini precepto gentiles prohibentur coniungi gentilibus. Nec ergo eorum coniugium extra i. e. contra Dei decretum fit. Illa itaque auctoritate iubentur separari ab inuicem qui contra Dei uel ecclesiae decretum copulati sunt, utpote infideles cum fidelibus, consanguinei cum consanguineis, uel affines cum affinibus. Hii omnes, si sibi inuicem copulati fuerint, separandi sunt. Hinc etiam idem Ambrosius in libro de Patriarchis: [lib. I. de Abraham, c. 9.]

C. XV. Believers are not to be joined in marriage to unbelievers.

Beware, Christian, of giving your daughter to a gentile or a Jew. Beware, he says, of seeking for yourself as a wife a gentile woman, a Jewish woman, or a foreign woman—that is, a heretic—and every woman foreign to your faith. The first fidelity of marriage is the grace of chastity.

§ 1. If she is Christian, that is not enough unless both of you have been initiated by the sacrament of baptism. Together you must rise at night for prayer and beseech God with joined prayers.

C. XV. Fideles infidelibus non sunt coniugio sociandi.

Caue, Christiane, gentili aut Iudeo filiam tuam tradere, Caue, inquit, gentilem, aut Iudeam atque alienigenam, hoc est hereticam, et omnem alienam a fide tua uxorem accersas tibi. Prima coniugii fides gratia castitatis est. §. 1. Si Christiana sit, non est satis, nisi ambo initiati sitis sacramento baptismatis. Simul ad orationem nocte uobis surgendum est, et coniunctis precibus obsecrandus Deus.

C. XVI. Let Catholics not mingle in marriages with heretics.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 67]. It is not fitting to mingle in marriages with all heretics and to give either sons or daughters to them; rather, they are to be received, provided that they profess that they will become Christians and Catholics.

C. XVI. Cum hereticis catholici non misceant coniugia.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 67.] Non oportet cum omnibus hereticis miscere conubia, et uel filios uel filias dare, sed potius accipere, si tamen se profitentur Christianos esse futuros et catholicos.

C. XVII. Let one who associates himself with Jewish depravity by a marital bond be deprived of Christian communion.

Likewise from the Council of Clermont. If anyone is joined to Jewish depravity by marital association —whether a Christian woman is mingled in carnal company with a Jew, or a Jewish woman with a Christian—whichever of them is known to have committed so great a wickedness, let that person immediately be separated from the Christian assembly and banquet and from the communion of the Church.

GRATIAN. Likewise, that saying of Augustine, "A marriage that is without God is not ratified," does not deny that marriage exists between unbelievers. For one marriage is legitimate and not ratified; another is ratified and not legitimate; another is legitimate and ratified. A legitimate marriage is one contracted by legal institution or by the customs of the province. Between unbelievers this is not ratified, because their marriage is not firm and inviolable. For once a bill of repudiation has been given, it is lawful for them to depart from one another and to be joined to others according to the law of the forum, not the law of heaven, which they do not follow. But between believers marriage is ratified, because marriages once entered between them cannot thereafter be dissolved. Some of these are legitimate, as when a wife is handed over by her parents, endowed by the bridegroom, and blessed by a priest. Such marriages are called legitimate and ratified. But the marriages of those who, with all those solemnities disregarded, join some woman to themselves as wife by affection alone are believed to be not legitimate but only ratified.

C. XVII. Christiana conmunione careat qui Iudaicae prauitati coniugali uinculo se sociat.

Item ex Concilio Aruernensi. Si quis Iudaicae prauitati coniugali societate iungitur, siue Christiana Iudeo, siue Iudea Christiano mulier carnali consortio misceatur, quicumque eorum tantum nefas admisisse cognoscitur, a Christiano cetu atque conuiuio, et a conmunione ecclesiae protinus segregetur. Gratian. Item illud Augustini: "Non est ratum coniugium, quod sine Deo est," non negat coniugium esse inter infideles. Coniugium enim aliud est legitimum et non ratum, aliud ratum et non legitimum, aliud legitimum et ratum. Legitimum coniugium est, quod legali institutione uel prouinciae moribus contrahitur. Hoc inter infideles ratum non est, quia non est firmum et inuiolabile coniugium eorum. Dato enim libello repudii licet eis discedere ab inuicem, et aliis copulari lege fori, non lege poli, quam non secuntur. Inter fideles uero ratum coniugium est, quia coniugia, semel inita inter eos, ulterius solui non possunt. Horum quedam sunt legitima, ueluti cum uxor a parentibus traditur, a sponso dotatur, et a sacerdote benedicitur. Hec talia coniugia legitima et rata appellantur. Illorum uero coniugia, qui contemptis omnibus illis solempnitatibus solo affectu aliquam sibi in coniugem copulant, huiuscemodi coniugium non legitimum, sed ratum tantummodo esse creditur.

Question II

GRATIAN. That one cannot take another wife while his wife is living is attested by Scripture, saying: "Otherwise, if you depart from one another, and, though willing to dwell together, put one another away, and join yourselves to others, you will be adulterers, and your children who are afterward born will be unclean, that is, illegitimate."

GRATIANUS. Quod uero uxore uiuente alteram ducere non possit, testatur scriptura, dicens: "Alioquin si disceditis ab inuicem, et uolentes cohabitare dimittitis, et aliis uos copulaueritis adulteri eritis, et filii uestri, qui postea nascentur, erunt inmundi, id est spurii."

C. I. After baptism one cannot take another wife while the one who was joined to him as a virgin before baptism is living.

Likewise from the Council of Meaux, [c. 1]. If anyone had a virgin wife before baptism, while she is living he cannot have another after baptism. For crimes are dissolved in baptism, not marriages. But Gregory testifies to the contrary, saying:

C. I. Non potest aliquis post baptismum alteram ducere uiuente ea, que ante baptismum sibi fuerit uirgo copulata.

Item ex Concilio Meldensi. [c. 1.] Si quis habuerit uxorem uirginem ante baptismum, uiuente illa post baptismum alteram habere non potest. Crimina enim in baptismo soluuntur, non coniugia. Gregorius autem contra testatur, dicens:

C. II. It is lawful for a believer to take another wife when an unbelieving wife puts him away out of hatred for the Christian faith.

"If the unbeliever departs out of hatred for the Christian faith, let the unbeliever depart. For a brother or sister is not subjected to servitude in such cases." For it is no sin, when one has been put away for God's sake, if one is joined to another. Indeed, contempt of the Creator dissolves the right of marriage with respect to the one who is abandoned. But the unbeliever who departs sins both against God and against marriage; nor is the fidelity of marriage to be preserved for one who departed for this reason, lest that person hear that Christ is the God of Christian marriages.

GRATIAN. A distinction must be made here: it is one thing to put away one who is willing to dwell together, and another not to follow one who departs. It is indeed lawful to put away one willing to dwell together, but not to bring in another while that person is living; but one ought not to follow one who departs, and it is lawful to take another while that person is living. Yet this is to be understood only of those who were joined to one another in unbelief. But if both were converted to the faith, or if both were believers when joined in marriage, and in the course of time one of them departed from the faith and abandoned the spouse out of hatred for the faith, the abandoned spouse will not accompany the one departing; nevertheless, the abandoned spouse will not be able to take another while the other is living, because there had been a ratified marriage between them, which can in no way be dissolved.

> "Si infidelis discedit odio Christianae fidei, discedat. Non est enim frater aut soror subiectus seruituti in huiusmodi." Non est enim peccatum dimisso propter Deum, si alii se copulauerit. Contumelia quippe creatoris soluit ius matrimonii circa eum, qui relinquitur. Infidelis autem discedens et in Deum peccat, et in matrimonium, nec est ei fides seruanda coniugii, qui propterea discessit, ne audiret Christum esse Deum Christianorum coniugiorum. Gratian. Hic distinguendum est, aliud esse dimittere uolentem cohabitare, atque aliud discedentem non sequi. Volentem enim cohabitare licet quidem dimittere, sed non ea uiuente aliam superducere; discedentem uero sequi non oportet, et ea uiuente aliam ducere licet. Verum hoc non nisi de his intelligendum est, qui in infidelitate sibi copulati sunt. Ceterum si ad fidem uterque conuersus est, uel si uterque fidelis matrimonio coniunctus est, et procedente tempore alter eorum a fide discesserit, et odio fidei coniugem dereliquerit, derelictus discedentem non comitabitur; non tamen illa uiuente alteram ducere poterit, quia ratum coniugium fuerat inter eos, quod nullo modo solui potest.

Question III

GRATIAN. Whether one who had one wife before baptism and another after baptism is to be reckoned twice-married is evident from the authority of Jerome. For he says on Paul's epistle to Timothy:

> GRATIANUS. Utrum uero bigamus sit reputandus qui ante baptismum habuerit unam, et post baptismum alteram, auctoritate Ieronimi patet. Ait enim super epistolam Pauli ad Timotheum:

C. I. One who had one wife before baptism and another after baptism is not twice-married.

A bishop must be the husband of one wife. But this means after baptism. Yet if he had one wife before baptism and another after baptism, he is not to be reckoned twice-married, since, after being entirely made new through baptism, all old things have been forgiven him. Augustine, however, and Innocent testify to the contrary. For Augustine says on Paul's epistle to Titus:

> C. I. Non est bigamus qui ante baptismum habuerit unam, et post baptismum alteram.
> Oportet episcopum esse unius uxoris uirum. Verum hoc post baptismum. Ceterum, si ante baptismum habuerit unam, et post baptismum habuerit alteram, non est reputandus bigamus, cui prorsus innouato per baptismum omnia uetera sunt dimissa. Augustinus uero contra testatur, et Innocentius. Ait enim Augustinus super epistolam Pauli ad Titum:

C. II. One who had one wife before baptism and another after baptism ought not to be made a bishop.

They understand more acutely who have judged that not even one who had one wife before baptism and another after baptism is to be ordained. For in baptism crimes are abolished; the bond of marriage is not dissolved. Just as a woman who was violated while a catechumen cannot be consecrated among God's virgins, so also one who had one wife before baptism and another after baptism is to be reckoned none other than twice-married. For he has lost something, not as to the merit of life, but as to the sacrament of the sign.

GRATIAN. Likewise Innocent, writing to Bishops Rufus and Eusebius of Macedonia, proves by many arguments that such a man is to be reckoned twice-married. Therefore, because this man whose case is presently at issue had one wife before baptism and another after baptism, he is judged twice-married; and although he excels in merit of life and skill in knowledge, nevertheless he cannot be ordained as a bishop.

> C. II. Non debet fieri episcopus qui ante baptismum habuerit unam, et post baptismum alteram.
> Acutius uero intelligunt, qui nec eum ordinandum censuerunt, qui ante baptismum habuerit unam, et post baptismum alteram. In baptismate enim crimina abolentur, non federatio coniugii dissoluitur. Sicut illa, que catecumina uitiata est, inter Dei uirgines consecrari non potest, sic et qui ante baptismum habuit unam, et post baptismum alteram, non nisi bigamus reputandus est. Amisit enim quiddam non ad uitae meritum, sed ad signaculi sacramentum. Gratian. Item Innocentius Rufo et Eusebio episcopis
> Macedoniae multis argumentis probat, talem bigamum reputari. Quia ergo iste, cuius causa in presenti agitur, ante baptismum habuit unam, et post baptismum alteram, bigamus iudicatur, et, licet uitae merito et industria scientiae polleat, tamen in episcopum ordinari non potest.

Causa XXIX

CASE XXIX.

GRATIAN. It was announced to a certain noblewoman that she was being sought as wife by the son of a certain nobleman; she gave her assent. But another man of ignoble and servile condition presented himself under that man's name and took her as wife. The man who had first found favor with her finally came and sought her as wife for himself. She complains that she was deceived and aspires to union with the former man. (Q. I.) Here it is asked first whether there is a marriage between them. (Q. II.) Second, if she had first thought this man to be free and afterward discovered that he was a slave, whether she may depart from him immediately.

> GRATIANUS. Cuidam nobili mulieri nunciatum est, quod a filio cuiusdam nobilis petebatur in coniugem; prebuit illa assensum. Alius uero quidam ignobilis atque seruilis condicionis nomine illius se ipsum obtulit, atque eam in coniugem accepit. Ille, qui sibi prius placuerat, tandem uenit, eamque sibi in coniugem petit. Illa se delusam conqueritur, et ad prioris copulam aspirat. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, an sit coniugium inter eos? (Qu. II.) Secundo, si prius putabat, hunc esse liberum, et postea deprehendit, illum esse seruum, an liceat ei statim ab illo discedere?

Question I

GRATIAN. That there is a marriage between them is proved in this manner. Wedlock or marriage is the union of a man and a woman maintaining an indivisible manner of life. Likewise, the consent of both makes marriage. Therefore, because these two were joined so as to preserve an indivisible manner of life, and because each consented to the other, they are to be called spouses.

§ 1. To these things it is answered thus: Consent is the perception of two or more persons directed to the same thing. But one who errs does not perceive; therefore that person does not consent, that is, does not perceive together with others. But this woman erred; therefore she did not consent. Accordingly, she is not to be called a spouse, because the consent of both, without which there can be no marriage, was not present there. For just as one who is ordained by a man whom he thinks to be a bishop, but who is still a layman, errs and is not called ordained—indeed, he must still be ordained by a bishop—so this woman, erring, has been joined to no one in marriage; indeed, she must still be joined.

§ 2. To this it is said: not every error voids consent. For one who takes as wife a woman whom he thinks to be a virgin, or one who takes a prostitute whom he thinks to be chaste, each errs, because the one considers a corrupted woman to be a virgin and the other reckons a prostitute chaste. Are they therefore to be said not to have consented to them? Or will each man be given the faculty of putting each woman away and taking another? It is true that not every error excludes consent. But one error concerns person, another fortune, another condition, another quality. Error of person is when this man is thought to be Virgil, but he is Plato. Error of fortune is when one who is poor is thought to be rich, or conversely. Error of condition is when one who is a slave is thought to be free. Error of quality is when one who is evil is thought to be good. Error of fortune and quality does not exclude consent to marriage. But error of person and condition does not admit consent to marriage. For if someone were to make an agreement that he would sell a field to Marcellus, and afterward Paul were to come, saying that he was Marcellus, and purchase the field from him, did that man agree upon the price with Paul, or is he to be said to have sold the field to him? Likewise, if someone promised that he would sell me gold, but offered me orichalcum in place of gold and thus deceived me, would I be said to have consented to the orichalcum? I never wished to buy orichalcum, and therefore I never consented to it, because consent belongs only to the will. Therefore, just as error concerning the material excludes consent here, so also does error of person in marriage. For she consented not to this man, but to the man whom she thought this man to be.

§ 3. But it is objected: Jacob had not consented to Leah, but to Rachel; indeed, he had served seven years for Rachel. Therefore, when Leah was substituted for Rachel without his knowledge, there was no marriage between them, if error of person excludes consent, because, as was said, he had consented not to Leah but to Rachel. To these things it is answered thus: One consent precedes and another follows. Consent precedes when, before carnal union, each consents to an indivisible manner of life; it follows when, after concubinary or fornicatory intercourse, they consent to the same thing. Therefore, preceding consent did not make Jacob and Leah spouses, but subsequent consent did. Yet from the first intercourse they are not judged fornicators, since he knew her with marital affection and she rendered him his due with wifely affection, thinking herself joined to him by right through the law of firstborn daughters and her father's commands.

§ 4. That error of person excuses some persons is proved by that authority in which the wife's sister, with both sister and husband unaware, is reported to have gone into the wife's bed and to have been known by her sister's husband. Although she is judged to remain perpetually without hope of marriage, nevertheless the man who knew her through ignorance is excused. This is also proved in another way. The devil sometimes transforms himself into an angel of light, and the error is not dangerous if he is then believed to be good when he feigns himself good. Therefore, if he were then to ask some simple person whether that person wished to be a participant in his blessedness, and the person answered that he wished to pass into fellowship with him, would he be said to have consented to fellowship in diabolical damnation, or rather to participation in eternal glory? Likewise, if one of the heretics, under the name of Augustine, Ambrose, or Jerome, presented himself to some Catholic and called him to imitate his faith, if the Catholic gave assent, to the judgment of whose faith would he be said to have consented? Not to the sect of the heretics, but to the integrity of the Catholic faith which that heretic falsely claimed to have. Therefore, because this person, deceived by error, consented not to this man but to the man whom he falsely claimed to be, it is evident that she was not his spouse.

§ 5. Error of fortune and quality does not exclude consent. For example, if someone consented to the prelacy of a church which he thought to be rich, but it was less wealthy, although he was deceived by an error of fortune, he could not renounce the prelacy he had accepted. Similarly, a woman who marries a poor man, thinking him rich, cannot renounce her former condition, although she erred. Error of quality likewise does not exclude consent. For example, if someone bought a field or vineyard which he thought to be exceedingly fruitful, although he erred as to the quality of the things by buying a less fertile property, he nevertheless cannot rescind the sale. Similarly, one who takes as wife a prostitute or a corrupted woman whom he thinks to be chaste or a virgin cannot put her away and take another.

> GRATIANUS. Quod autem coniugium sit inter eos, probatur hoc modo. Coniugium siue matrimonium est uiri et mulieris coniunctio, indiuiduam uitae consuetudinem retinens. Item consensus utriusque matrimonium facit. Quia ergo isti coniuncti sunt, ut indiuiduam uitae consuetudinem conseruarent, quia uterque consensit in alterum, coniuges sunt appellandi. §. 1. His ita respondetur: Consensus est duorum uel plurium sensus in idem. Qui autem errat non sentit, non ergo consentit, id est simul cum aliis sentit. Hec autem errauit; non ergo consensit: non itaque coniux est appellanda, quia non fuit ibi consensus utriusque, sine quo nullum matrimonium esse potest. Sicut enim qui ordinatur ab eo, quem putat esse episcopum, et adhuc est laicus, errat, nec uocatur ordinatus, immo adhuc ab episcopo est ordinandus: sic ista errans nulli est copulata coniugio, immo adhuc est copulanda. §. 2. Ad hec, non omnis error consensum euacuat; qui enim accipit in uxorem, quam putat uirginem, uel qui accipit meretricem, quam putat esse castam, uterque errat, quia ille corruptam existimat esse uirginem, et iste meretricem reputat castam. Numquid ergo dicendi sunt non consensisse in eas? aut dabitur utrique facultas dimittendi utramque, et ducendi aliam? Verum est, quod non omnis error consensum excludit; sed error alius est personae, alius fortunae, alius condicionis, alius qualitatis. Error personae est, quando hic putatur esse Virgilius, et ipse est Plato. Error fortunae, quando putatur esse diues qui pauper est, uel e conuerso. Error condicionis, quando putatur esse liber qui seruus est. Error qualitatis, quando putatur esse bonus qui malus est. Error fortunae et qualitatis coniugii consensum non excludit. Error uero personae et condicionis coniugii consensum non admittit. Si quis enim pacisceretur, se uenditurum agrum Marcello, et postea ueniret Paulus dicens se esse Marcellum, et emeret agrum ab illo, numquid cum Paulo conuenit iste de precio, aut dicendus est agrum sibi uendidisse? Item si quis promitteret, se uenditurum michi aurum, et pro auro offerret michi auricalcum, et ita me deciperet, numquid dicerer consensisse in auricalcum? Numquam uolui emere auricalcum, nec ergo aliquando in illud consensi, quia consensus non nisi uoluntatis est. Sicut ergo hic error materiae excludit consensum, sic et in coniugio error personae. Non enim consensit in hunc, sed in eum, quem hunc putabat esse. §. 3. Sed obicitur: Iacob non consenserat in Liam, sed in Rachel septem quidem annis pro Rachel seruierat. Cum ergo eo ignorante Lia esset sibi subposita, non fuit coniugium inter eos, si error personae consensum excludit, quia, ut dictum est, non in eam consenserat, sed in Rachel. His ita respondetur: Consensus est alius precedens, alius subsequens. Precedit consensus, quando ante carnalem copulam in indiuiduam uitae consuetudinem uterque consentit; subsequitur, quando post concubinalem siue fornicarium coitum consentiunt in idem. Iacob ergo et Liam non fecit coniuges precedens consensus, sed subsequens; nec tamen ex primo concubitu fornicarii iudicantur, cum ille maritali affectu eam cognouerit, et illa uxorio affectu sibi debitum persoluerit, putans lege primogenitarum et paternis inperiis se sibi iure copulatam. §. 4. Quod autem error personae nonnullos excuset, illa auctoritate probatur, qua soror uxoris utroque inscio, sorore uidelicet et marito, in lectulum eius iisse, et a uiro suae sororis cognita perhibetur, que cum sine spe coniugii perpetuo manere censeatur, ille tamen, qui cognouit eam per ignorantiam, excusatur. Aliter etiam hoc probatur. Diabolus nonnumquam se in angelum lucis transformat, nec est periculosus error, si tunc creditur esse bonus, cum se bonum simulat. Si ergo tunc ab aliquo simplici quereret, an suae beatitudinis uellet esse particeps, et ille responderet, se in eius consortium uelle transire, numquid dicendus esset consensisse in consortium diabolicae dampnationis, an non pocius in participationem eternae claritatis? Item, si quis hereticorum, nomine Augustini, uel Ambrosii, uel Ieronimi, alicui catholicorum se ipsum offerret, atque eum ad suae fidei imitationem prouocaret, si ille preberet assensum, in cuius fidei sententiam diceretur consensisse non in hereticorum sectam, sed in integritatem catholicae fidei, quam ille hereticus se mentiebatur habere. Quia ergo hec persona decepta errore non in hunc, sed in eum, quem iste se mentiebatur esse, consensit, patet, quod eius coniux non fuerit. §. 5. Error fortunae et qualitatis non excludit consensum, ueluti si quis consentiret in prelaturam alicuius ecclesiae, quam putaret esse diuitem, et illa esset minus copiosa, quamuis hic deciperetur errore fortunae, non tamen posset renunciare prelaturae acceptae. Similiter, que nubit pauperi, putans illum esse diuitem, non potest renunciare priori condicioni, quamuis errauerit. Error qualitatis similiter non excludit consensum; utpote si quis emerit agrum uel uineam, quam putaret esse uberrimam, quamuis iste erraret qualitate rerum, rem minus fertilem emendo, non potest tamen uenditionem rescindere. Similiter, qui ducit meretricem in uxorem uel corruptam, quam putat esse castam uel uirginem, non potest eam dimittere, et aliam ducere.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. The second question was proposed concerning condition: whether it is lawful for a woman to put away a man whom she thought free if she afterward finds him to be a slave. That it is not lawful for a woman to depart from a slave appears capable of proof by many reasons. For in Christ Jesus there is neither Jew nor Greek, neither slave nor free; therefore neither is there such a distinction in the marriage of Christians. For each is governed by the same law in the faith of Christ. For it is said by the Apostle without distinction to all: “He who wishes to marry, let him marry in the Lord.” And likewise: “Let a woman marry whom she wishes, only in the Lord.” It is not commanded that a freeborn woman marry a freeborn man, or a female slave a slave; rather, let any one of them marry whom she wishes, provided that it is in the Lord.

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Secunda questio de condicione proposita est, an liceat mulieri dimittere eum, quem putabat liberum, si postea inuenerit illum seruum? Quod uero mulieri non liceat a seruo discedere, multis rationibus uidetur posse probari. In Christo enim Iesu nec Iudeus, nec Grecus, nec seruus, neque liber: ergo nec in coniugio Christianorum. Eadem enim lege in fide Christi uterque regitur. Indifferenter enim ab Apostolo dicitur omnibus: "Qui uult nubere nubat in Domino." Et item: "Mulier nubat cui uult; tantum in Domino." Non precipitur, ut ingenua nubat ingenuo, ancilla seruo; sed quelibet nubat earum cui uult, dummodo in Domino.

C. I. It is lawful for slaves to contract marriages.

Likewise Pope Julius, c. 4. All of us have one Father in heaven, and each person, rich and poor, free and slave, will render an account equally for himself and for their souls. Therefore, we do not doubt that all, of whatever condition they may be, have one law with respect to the Lord. But if all have one law, then, just as a freeborn person cannot be put away, so neither will a slave once joined in marriage be able thereafter to be put away.

C. I. Licet seruis matrimonia contrahere.

Item Iulius Papa, c. 4. Omnibus nobis unus pater est in celis, et unusquisque, diues et pauper, liber et seruus, equaliter pro se et pro animabus eorum rationem reddituri sunt. Quapropter omnes, cuiuscumque condicionis sint, unam legem quantum ad Dominum habere non dubitamus. Si autem omnes unam legem habent, ergo sicut ingenuus dimitti non potest, sic nec seruus semel coniugio copulatus ulterius dimitti poterit.

C. II. It is not lawful for a man to put away a female slave received in marriage.

Likewise Pope Zachary. If a free man has received a female slave in marriage, he does not have permission to put her away if they were joined by the consent of both, except for the cause of fornication; rather, henceforth there will be in all things one law for the man and the woman.

C. II. Ancillam in matrimonio susceptam uiro dimittere non licet.

Item Zacharias Papa. Si quis liber ancillam in matrimonium acceperit, non habet licentiam dimittere eam si consensu amborum coniuncti sunt, excepta causa fornicationis; sed una lex deinceps erit per omnia et uiro et feminae.

C. III. It is established that there is a legitimate marriage between a patron and his freedwoman.

Likewise Pope Julius. If anyone has given his female slave freedom and associated her with himself in marriage, it was doubted among some whether marriages of this kind should appear legitimate or not. We, therefore, resolving the ancient ambiguity, judge such marriages to be legitimate. For if all marriages come about from affection, nothing impious or contrary to the laws can occur in such a union. Why, then, should we have considered the aforesaid marriages to be prohibited?

PART II. GRATIAN. To these things it is answered thus: It is not denied that a freeborn woman can marry a slave; rather, it is said that, if he is not known to be of servile condition, he can freely be put away when his servitude has been discovered. But that saying of the Apostle and of Pope Julius is to be understood of those whose condition is known to both. Yet this man's condition was unknown to the woman. Therefore, she is not compelled by the foregoing authorities to remain with him, but is shown to be free either to remain or to depart. Hence at the Council of Verberie, which King Pepin attended, it was established in c. 6:

C. III. Inter patronum et libertam constat esse coniugium legitimum.

Item Iulius Papa. Si quis ancillam suam libertate donauerit, et in matrimonio sibi sociauerit, dubitabatur apud quosdam, utrum huiusmodi nuptiae legitimae esse uideantur, an non. Nos itaque, uetustam ambiguitatem decidentes talia conubia legitima esse censemus. Si enim ex affectu fiunt omnes nuptiae, nichil inpium et legibus contrarium in tali copulatione fieri potest, quare predictas nuptias inhibendas existimauerimus? II. Pars. Gratian. His ita respondetur: Non negatur, ingenuam posse nubere seruo, sed dicitur, quod si nescitur esse seruilis condicionis, libere potest dimitti, cum seruitus eius fuerit deprehensa. Illud autem Apostoli et Iulii Papae intelligendum est de his, quorum condicio utrique nota est. Huius autem condicio mulieri incognita erat; non ergo premissis auctoritatibus cogitur manere cum eo, sed liberum illi esse ostenditur uel manere, uel discedere. Unde in Concilio apud Vermeriam, cui interfuit Rex Pipinus, statutum est c. 6.:

C. IV. Concerning a man who takes as wife a female slave whom he thinks to be free.

If any freeborn man has received as wife another man's female slave and thinks that she is freeborn, if the woman is afterward discovered to be in servitude, if he can redeem her from servitude, let him do so; if he cannot, let him receive another if he wishes. But if he knew that she was a female slave and approved it, thereafter let him have her as a legitimate wife. A freeborn woman ought to act similarly concerning another man's slave.

C. IV. De eo, qui ancillam ducit in uxorem, quam putat liberam esse.

Si quis ingenuus homo ancillam uxorem alterius acceperit, et existimat, quod ingenua sit, si ipsa femina fuerit postea in seruitute detecta, si eam a seruitute redimere potest, faciat; si non potest, si uoluerit, aliam accipiat. Si autem ancillam eam scierat et collaudauerat, post ut legitimam habeat. Similiter et mulier ingenua de seruo alterius facere debet.

C. V. It is not lawful for a woman to put away a man whom she knowingly received as a husband while he was a slave.

Likewise from the same Council, c. 8. If a freeborn woman has received a slave, knowing that he was a slave, let her keep him, because we all have one Father in heaven. There will be one law for the man and the woman.

C. V. Non licet mulieri dimittere quem sciens seruum accepit in uirum.

Item ex eodem c. 8. Si femina ingenua acceperit seruum, sciens quod seruus esset, habeat eum, quia omnes unum patrem habemus in celis. Una lex erit uiro et feminae.

C. VI. A woman who, after a dispute concerning her status, proves herself free cannot be put away on the ground of servitude.

Likewise Gregory, [Book VI, epistle 1, to Bishop Fortunatus]. Your Fraternity knows more carefully for what cause the bearer of these presents, when compelled to come here with her mother last year, came: namely, because her husband, your cleric, is known to have removed her from his company after she was accused of having been of servile condition. They also assert that, while you were here, you promised that, if by the Lord's aid she were able to prove herself free, you would restore her to her marriage. Therefore, let Your Fraternity know that, by the revelation of God, the author of liberty, she has been proved free, and no blemish of servile status has been found in her. These things being known, we wish her to be restored to her husband without any delay, and let that same man no longer seek for himself contrived pretexts by which he may cast her off. For if this is not fulfilled by you—which we do not believe—and perhaps he delays receiving her, know that we will correct it with rigorous punishment.

GRATIAN. When it is said, "knowing that he was a slave," it is given to be understood that, if she did not know that he was a slave, she is not compelled to remain with him. Therefore, because this woman suffered deceit both as to person and condition, she is not compelled to adhere to the man by whose fraud she was deceived. But if she received a free man, and he, in order to furnish a cause for discord, made himself someone's slave, he will neither be able to put away his wife, nor will she be able to be reduced to servitude because of the bond of marriage. Hence in the Council of Tribur:

> C. VI. Seruitutis occasione dimitti non ualet que post controuersiam status se in libertatem asseuerauerit.
> Item Gregorius. [lib. VI. epist. 1. ad Fortunatum Episcopum] Cuius rei causa cum matre sua huc conpulsa anno preterito presentium uenerit latrix, fraternitas tua cautius nouit, quia scilicet maritus suus clericus uester quod de seruili fuerat condicione pulsata, a suo noscitur remouisse consortio, uosque hic positos asserunt promisisse, ut, si probare se liberam adiuuante Domino ualuisset, suo eam uos coniugio reformaretis. Fraternitas igitur uestra cognoscat, quod reuelante Deo libertatis auctore, approbata sit libera, nullaque in ea macula est seruilis inuenta. His ergo cognitis, sine mora aliqua suo eam uolumus marito restitui, nec ulterius idem uir eius argumenta sibi occasionis exquirat, quibus eam possit abicere. Nam si a uobis (quod non credimus) minime fuerit adinpletum, eamque recipere forte distulerit, nos illud cognoscatis cum districta uindicta corrigere. Gratian. Cum dicitur: "sciens illum seruum," datur intelligi, quod si nescierit, illum seruum esse, non cogitur cum eo manere. Quia hec ergo et personae et condicionis dolum passa est, non cogitur adherere ei, cuius fraude decepta est; si uero liberum acceperit, et ille, ut causam prestet dissidii, se alicuius seruum fecerit, nec uxorem dimittere, nec illa ob uinculum coniugii in seruitutem redigi poterit. Unde in Triburiensi Concilio:

C. VII. On the ground of a condition deceitfully changed, a husband is not to depart from the woman whom he received while free.

It was reported to the holy synod that a certain freeborn man had received a freeborn wife and, after the procreation of children, had made himself someone's slave as an occasion for divorce—that is, marital separation. It was asked whether he necessarily ought to keep the woman and, if he kept her, whether she too ought to be subjected to servitude according to secular law. It was judged that the wife ought by no means to be put away, yet that, because of Christ's law, the woman was not to be reduced to servitude, since he made himself a slave without the consent of the spouse who had received him as a free husband.

GRATIAN. It is also asked whether, if the slave of one person receives another person's female slave, there is a marriage between them. Concerning these persons it was established thus in the Council of Chalon, [II, c. 30]:

> C. VII. Occasione condicionis dolose mutatae uir non discedat ab ea, quam tempore libertatis accepit.
> Perlatum est ad sanctam sinodum, quod quidam ingenuus ingenuam acceperit uxorem, et post filiorum procreationem occasione diuortii cuiusdam seruum se fecerit, utrum necessario mulierem tenere debeat, et si tenuerit, utrum illa quoque secundum secularem legem seruituti subici debeat, quesitum est. Iudicatum est, uxorem minime debere dimitti, non tamen ob Christi legem mulierem in seruitutem redigi, dum ille non ex consensu coniugis se seruum fecerit, quem liberum ipsa maritum acceperat. Gratian. Queritur etiam, si seruus unius alterius ancillam acceperit, an sit coniugium inter eos? De his ita statutum est in Concilio Cabillonensi: [II. cap. 30.]

C. VIII. Let masters not dissolve legitimate marriages of slaves by their own authority.

It has been told to us that certain persons dissolve legitimate marriages of slaves by a certain presumptuous exercise of power, not attending to that saying of the Gospel, "What God has joined, let man not separate." Hence it has seemed good to us that marriages of slaves are not to be dissolved, even if they have different masters; rather, while remaining in one marriage, let them serve their own masters. And this is to be observed in those cases where there was a lawful union and it occurred by the will of the masters.

C. VIII. Legitima seruorum coniugia sua auctoritate domini non dirimant.

Dictum est nobis, quod quidam legitima seruorum matrimonia potestatiua quadam presumptione dirimant, non adtendentes illud euangelii "Quod Deus coniunxit homo non separet." Unde nobis uisum est, ut coniugia seruorum non dirimantur, et si diuersos dominos habeant, sed in uno coniugio permanentes dominis seruiant suis. Et hoc in illis obseruandum est, ubi legalis coniunctio fuit, et per uoluntatem dominorum.

Causa XXX

CASE XXX.

GRATIAN. A certain man, hindered by the great crowd of people, received his own son from baptism while believing that he was receiving another's child. His wife, while craftily wishing to receive her own child, received another child whom the man adopted as his son; and a daughter is born to him from his wife, whom, while each was in the cradle, he gave to his adopted son, his wife's spiritual son. After three years the wife dies, and the man who was her coparent secretly betrothed to himself the widow of his wife's coparent; a little time passed, and another man publicly took her as wife. (Q. I.) It is asked whether one who received his own son from sacred baptism can render the marital due to his wife. (Q. II.) Second, whether betrothals are contracted between infants. (Q. III.) Third, whether spiritual or adopted children can be joined to natural children. (Q. IV.) Fourth, whether it is lawful for anyone to take the wife of his wife's coparent. (Q. V.) Fifth, whether a clandestine betrothal prejudices a public one.

GRATIANUS. Populorum frequentia quidam inpeditus filium suum de baptismate suscepit, dum crederet se alienum suscipere; uxor eius, dum callide uellet suscipere proprium, suscepit alienum, quem uir adoptauit sibi in filium, et ex uxore sibi filia nascitur, quam filio suo adoptiuo, spirituali uxoris, dum uterque esset in cunabulis, tradidit. Post triennium uxor moritur, et conpater eius relictam conpatris uxoris suae uir clam sibi desponsauit; aliquantulum temporis effluxit, et alius publice duxit eam in uxorem. (Qu. I.) Queritur, an uxori suae debitum reddere ualeat qui proprium filium de sacro baptismate suscepit? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an sponsalia contrahantur inter infantes? (Qu. III.) Tertio, an spirituales uel adoptiui filii naturalibus copulari ualeant? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, an uxorem conpatris uxoris suae alicui ducere liceat? (Qu. V.) Quinto, an clandestina desponsatio manifestae preiudicet?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. That one who transfers his own son to himself as a spiritual son cannot render the marital due to his wife is proved by reason and authority. For by no authority is it permitted that anyone be carnally joined to his co-mother. But this man made his wife his co-mother; therefore, he will not be able thereafter to be joined carnally to her. Hence Deusdedit, Bishop of the Holy Roman Church, writes to Gordian, bishop of the church of Hispania and his dearest brother:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem proprium filium in spiritualem sibi transferens suae uxori debitum reddere non ualeat, ratione et auctoritate probatur. Nulla enim auctoritate permittitur, ut quis conmatri suae carnaliter copuletur. Hic autem uxorem suam sibi conmatrem effecit: non ergo illi ulterius carnaliter copulari poterit. Hinc Deusdedit Sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae Episcopus, scribit Gordiano, Hispaniensis ecclesiae Episcopo, et fratri karissimo:

C. I. Let men be separated from wives who by some accident held their own children before bishops.

A deacon came to us bearing the letter of Your Holiness, reporting that, on the past Holy Saturday, certain men and women, because of the great influx of people, unknowingly received their own children from the sacred font. You therefore desire to know whether, on account of such a circumstance that occurred, the men and women ought to return to their own marital relations or not. Grieved by this matter, we investigated the sayings of our predecessors. We found in the archives of the Apostolic See that such things had already happened in the churches of Isauria and Ephesus, as well as Jerusalem and other churches. When the bishops of those cities also wished to know from this Apostolic See whether the men and women should return to their own bed, the holy Fathers of blessed memory Julius, Innocent, and Celestine, with the consent of a great many bishops and priests, forbade such things in the church of the Prince of the Apostles, prescribed, and confirmed that women and men, whoever for any reason received their own children, should in no way receive one another in marriage but should separate, lest, at the devil's persuasion, such a vice grow strong. You know that, just as there are seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, so there are seven gifts of baptism, from the first nourishment of blessed salt and entrance into the church up to confirmation through chrism. Therefore, from the first up to the seventh, no Christian ought to receive his co-mother in marriage. And let anyone who has presumed to do so be bound by the bond of anathema until he has performed penance worthily.

> C. I. Separentur uiri ab uxoribus, que aliquo casu natos suos coram episcopis tenent.
> Peruenit ad nos diaconus, sanctitatis uestrae epistolam deferens, quod quidam uiri et mulieres, preterito sabbato pascali die, pro magno populorum incursu nescientes proprios filios suscepissent ex lauacro sancto. Cupis ergo scire, utrum pro tali ratione accidenti debeant uiri ac mulieres ad proprium usum redire, an non. Nos uero hac re mesti inquisiuimus priorum dicta. Inuenimus in archiuis apostolicae sedis, iam talia contigisse in ecclesiis Isauriae et Ephesiorum, simulque Iherosolimorum, aliarumque ecclesiarum. Episcopis etiam earum ciuitatum ab hac apostolica sede uolentibus scire, utrum uiri ac mulieres redirent ad proprium torum, beatae memoriae sancti Patres Iulius, Innocentius, et Celestinus cum episcoporum plurimorum et sacerdotum consensu in Apostolorum principis ecclesia prohibentes talia prescripserunt, et confirmauerunt, ut nullo modo se in coniugio reciperent mulieres ac uiri, quicumque aliqua ratione susceperunt natos, sed separarent se, ne suadente diabolo tale uicium inolescat. Scitis, quia quomodo sunt septem dona Spiritus sancti, ita sunt septem dona baptismi a primo ergo pabulo sacrati salis et ingressu ecclesiae usque ad confirmationem per crisma. Hoc est a primo usque ad septimum nullus Christianus suam conmatrem in coniugium suscipere debet. Et qui presumpserit tamdiu anathematis uinculo religetur, donec penitenciam digne egerit.

C. II. Let one who held his stepchild before a bishop be separated from his wife.

Likewise from the Council of Verberie, c. 4. If anyone has held his stepson or stepdaughter before a bishop for confirmation, let him be separated from his wife and never receive another. The same applies to a woman.

PART II. GRATIAN. To the contrary, however, Nicholas writes to the bishop of Salona, saying:

C. II. Ab uxore separetur qui filiastrum suum coram episcopo tenuit.

Item ex Concilio apud Vermeriam c. 4. Si quis filiastrum uel filiastram suam ante episcopum tenuerit ad confirmationem, separetur ab uxore sua, et aliam numquam accipiat. Similiter et mulier.

II. Pars. Gratian. Econtra uero scribit Nykolaus Salonitano Episcopo, dicens:

C. III. Let a woman who lifted her stepson from the sacred font not be separated from her husband.

You desire to know whether a woman who lifted from the sacred font her husband's son born of another woman can afterward be joined to the same man. We decree that they can be joined for this reason: according to the sacred canons, unless by the consent of both, no spouse ought to put away a spouse on the pretext of religion. It leads to the great ruin of a wife who, bearing hatred for her husband or not considering his weakness, commits impiety as though for the sake of piety, especially since the Apostle commands: "Do not," he says, "defraud one another, except by consent for a time, so that you may give yourselves to prayer; and return again to the same thing, lest Satan tempt you because of your lack of continence." Therefore, if it is proved not to have been done by the consent of both spouses, let them not defraud one another, but let them return to the same thing, especially since the Apostle says: "The wife does not have power over her own body, but the husband; just as the husband does not have power over his own body, but the woman."

C. III. Non separetur a uiro que filiastrum suum de sacro fonte leuauit.

Nosse desideras, utrum mulier, que uiri filium ex alia femina genitum de sacro fonte leuauerit, postmodum possit cum eodem uiro copulari. Quos ideo coniungi posse decernimus, quia secundum canones sacros, nisi amborum consensu, nullius religionis obtentu debet coniux dimittere coniugem. Pertinet ad ingens uxoris exitium, que habens odio uirum, uel infirmitatem eius non considerans, quasi causa pietatis operatur inpietatem, maxime cum Apostolus precipiat: "Nolite," inquiens, "fraudare inuicem, nisi ex consensu ad tempus, ut uacetis orationi; et iterum reuertimini in id ipsum, ne temptet uos sathanas propter incontinentiam uestram." Ergo si non ex consensu utriusque coniugis factum esse probatur, non fraudentur inuicem, sed reuertantur in id ipsum, presertim cum dicat Apostolus: "Uxor sui corporis potestatem non habet, sed uir; sicut uir potestatem sui corporis non habet, sed mulier."

C. IV. Let a woman who fraudulently held her own son before a bishop not be separated from her husband, but let her perform penance.

Likewise from the Second Council of Chalon, c. 4. It has been told to us that certain women, some carelessly and others fraudulently, held their own sons before bishops for confirmation so that they might be separated from their husbands. Hence we have judged it worthy that, if any woman through carelessness or some fraud has held her own son before a bishop for confirmation, she is to perform penance for as long as she lives because of her deceit or fraud; nevertheless, she is not to be separated from her husband.

C. IV. Non separetur a uiro, sed penitenciam agat que filium suum coram episcopo fraudulenter tenuit.

Item ex Concilio Cabillonensi: [II.,] c. 4. Dictum est nobis, quasdam feminas desidiose, quasdam uero fraudulenter, ut a uiris suis separentur, proprios filios coram episcopis ad confirmandum tenuisse. Unde nos dignum duximus, ut, si qua mulier filium suum desidia aut fraude aliqua coram episcopo tenuerit ad confirmandum, propter fallaciam suam aut propter fraudem, quamdiu uiuat penitenciam agat; a uiro tamen suo non separetur.

C. V. Let those who take their goddaughter or spiritual mother as wife be separated and struck with a grave penalty.

Likewise from the Council of Mainz, c. 10, held in the cloister of Saint Alban. Concerning what you asked—if anyone took his goddaughter as wife, and concerning one who lay with his spiritual co-mother, and concerning one who baptized his own son and whose wife received him from the font for this purpose, that a separation of the marriage might occur: whether they can afterward remain in such a union—the response concerning such persons is as follows. If anyone has taken his goddaughter or his co-mother in marriage, we judge that they are to be separated and struck with grave penance.

But if legitimate spouses, one or both, deliberately acted so that they received their own son from the font, if they wish to remain unmarried, it is good; but if not, let grave penance be enjoined upon the one who plotted it, and let them remain together. And if the violator of the marriage survives the other, let that person be punished with the most severe penance and remain without hope of marriage.

C. V. Separentur et graui pena plectantur qui filiolam suam uel spiritualem matrem ducunt in uxorem.

Item ex Concilio Magontiensi c. 10., in claustro sancti Albani habito. De eo, quod interrogastis, si aliquis filiolam suam duxit uxorem, et de eo, qui concubuit cum conmatre spirituali, et de eo, qui filium suum baptizauit et cuius uxor eum de fonte suscepit, hac causa, ut discidium fieret coniugii, si postea in tali copulatione possint permanere: de talibus sic respondendum est. Si filiolam aut conmatrem suam aliquis in coniugio duxerit, separandos esse iudicamus, et graui penitencia plectendos

Si autem coniuges legitimi, unus aut ambo, ex industria fecerint, ut filium suum de fonte susciperent, si innupti manere uoluerint, bonum est; sin autem, grauis penitencia insidiatori iniungatur, et simul maneant, et, si preuaricator coniugii superuixerit, acerrima penitencia multetur et sine spe coniugii maneat.

C. VI. Let those who hold their stepchildren before a bishop not be separated from their wives.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to Rudolf, bishop of Bourges. Concerning those who hold their stepchildren before bishops for confirmation—that is, who support upon themselves the sons of their wives by a former husband while they are chrismated by the bishops—if it is done through ignorance, as you assert, although it is a sin, nevertheless it is not to be punished as far as separation of the marriage. Yet let them mourn and, washing this away by worthy penance, say to the Lord: "Remember not the offenses of our ignorance."

C. VI. Non separentur ab uxoribus qui filiastros suos coram episcopo tenent.

Item Nykolaus Papa Rodulfo, Bituricensi Episcopo. De his, qui filiastros suos ad confirmationem coram episcopis tenent, id est qui filios uxoris suae de uiro priori, dum crismantur ab episcopis, super se sustinent, si inscientia, sicut asseris, fiat, licet sit peccatum, tamen non usque ad separationem coniugii puniendus est; lugeant tamen, et digna penitencia hoc diluentes Domino dicant: "Delicta ignorantiae nostrae ne memineris."

C. VII. Let one who baptized his own son because of necessity not be separated from his wife.

Likewise Pope John to Anselm, bishop of the church of Limoges. This man present here, named Stephen, coming for the sake of prayer to the threshold of blessed Peter, prince of the Apostles, made known to our episcopate by his representation that, when his son lay at the extremity of life, not yet washed by the water of baptism, he baptized him because, in the absence of priests, extreme necessity compelled him; and he himself received him, holding him in his own hands. When this affair was disclosed to you, Your Reverence, as though burning with zeal for rectitude, judged that the aforesaid man was to be separated from his spouse. This ought by no means to be done, since Scripture says that a wife has been joined to a husband by the Lord, and: "What God has joined, let man not separate." Hence the Lord too most openly commands in the Gospel that a man cannot put away his wife except for the cause of fornication. And we, relying upon the preeminent command of so great an authority, say that what necessity occasioned is to be let go and judged blameless. For this work of baptizing, according to canonical authority, is freely permitted to faithful laypersons to do if it should be necessary. Hence, if the aforesaid father, seeing his son dying in body, washed him with the sacred water of baptism lest he leave his soul to perish by perpetual death, so that he might snatch him from the power of the author of death and darkness and send him without doubt into the kingdom of Christ, there now to reign, he is praised for having done well. For that reason we judge him to remain joined without penalty, for as long as he lives, to his wife already long ago legitimately associated with him, and not in any way to be separated on this account contrary to the aforesaid divine authorities.

PART III. GRATIAN. A woman is called a spiritual daughter not only of the one who receives her, but also of the one who dips her in sacred baptism with the invocation of the threefold immersion. A woman who confesses her sins to a priest is also called the priest's spiritual daughter. The mingling with all these is shameful and is to be struck with the same penalty. Hence Symmachus says:

C. VII. Non separetur ab uxore qui causa necessitatis filium suum baptizauit.

Item Iohannes Papa Anselmo, Lemosinae ecclesiae Episcopo. Ad limina beati Petri apostolorum principis hic presens homo, nomine Stephanus, orationis causa ueniens, nostro presulatui suggerendo innotuit, quod filium suum in extremo uitae positum, necdum baptismatis unda lotum, absentia scilicet sacerdotum, nimia cogente baptizauit eumque ipse propriis manibus retinendo suscepit, atque pro huius rei negocio noticiae tuae patefacto reuerentia tua, quasi rectitudinis zelo flagrans, prefatum hominem a sua coniuge iudicauit esse separandum. Quod fieri nullatenus debet, dicente scriptura, a Domino iunctam esse uiro uxorem, et: "Quod Deus coniunxit homo non separet." Unde et Dominus in euangelio non dimittere posse uxorem suam, nisi causa fornicationis, apertissime iubet. Et nos, tantae auctoritatis precipua freti iussione, dicimus dimittendum esse, et inculpabile iudicandum quod necessitas intulit. Nam hoc baptizandi opus laicis fidelibus iuxta canonicam auctoritatem, si necesse fuerit facere, libere conceditur. Unde si supradictus genitor filium suum corpore morientem aspiciens, ne animam perpetua morte pereuntem dimitteret, sacri unda baptismatis lauit, ut eum de potestate auctoris mortis et tenebrarum eriperet, et in regnum Christi iam regnaturum sine dubitatione transmitteret, bene fecisse laudatur; et idcirco suae uxori sibi iam olim legitime sociatae inpune, quamdiu uixerit, iudicamus manere coniunctum, nec ob hoc contra prefatas auctoritates diuinas aliquatinus separari debere. III. Pars. Gratian. Filia dicitur spiritualis non solum eius, qui accipit, sed etiam eius, qui trinae mersionis uocabulo eam sacro baptismate tingit. Dicitur etiam spiritualis filia sacerdotis, que ei peccata sua confitetur. Harum omnium flagitiosa conmixtio est, et eadem pena plectenda est. Unde Simacus ait:

C. VIII. Equal penance is enjoined upon one who is shown to have violated his spiritual daughter and his female penitent.

All whom we receive in penance are our spiritual children, just as are those whom the water of sacred baptism regenerated either when we received them or when we immersed them under the invocation of the threefold immersion. Sylvester also teaches and admonishes every priest that no one should approach his female penitent for the purpose of fornication, because it is written: "All whom we receive in penance are our children, just as those received in baptism." Therefore, if anyone has perpetrated this crime, let him not only lose the honor of his dignity but also subject himself to continual penance until death.

C. VIII. Par penitencia ei indicitur, qui spiritualem filiam, et penitencialem suam uiolare monstratur.

Omnes, quos in penitencia suscipimus, ita nostri spirituales sunt filii, ut et ipsi, quos uel nobis suscipientibus, uel sub trinae mersionis uocabulo mergentibus, unda sacri baptismatis regenerauit. Siluester quoque docens ammonet unumquemque sacerdotem, ut nullus causa fornicationis ad suam penitencialem accedat, quia scriptum est: "Omnes, quos in penitencia accipimus, ita nostri filii sunt, ut baptismate suscepti." Quapropter si quis hoc scelus perpetrauerit, non solum dignitatis honorem amittat, uerum etiam usque ad exitum iugi penitenciae se subdat.

C. IX. Concerning the same matter. Likewise Celestine.

If any priest has fornicated with his spiritual daughter, let him know that he has committed grave adultery. Therefore, if the woman is a laywoman, let her leave all things, hand over her possessions to the poor, and, having converted, serve God in a monastery until death. But let the priest who gave an evil example to human beings be deposed from every office and perform penance by pilgrimage for fifteen years; afterward, let him go to a monastery and serve God there all the days of his life.

C. IX. De eodem. Item Celestinus.

Si quis sacerdos cum filia spirituali fornicatus fuerit, sciat, se graue adulterium conmisisse. Idcirco femina si laica est, omnia derelinquat et res suas pauperibus tradat, et conuersa in monasterio Deo usque ad mortem seruiat. Sacerdos autem, qui malum exemplum dedit hominibus, ab omni offitio deponatur, et peregrinando quindecim annis peniteat, postea uero ad monasterium uadat, ibique cunctis diebus uitae suae Deo seruiat.

C. X. Concerning the same matter. The same.

A bishop or priest ought not to mingle with women who have confessed their sins to him. If perhaps —which may it not be—this happens, let him perform penance as for a spiritual daughter: a bishop for fifteen years and a priest for twelve, and let him be deposed, provided that the matter has come to the knowledge of the people.

GRATIAN. By these authorities, therefore, it appears that whether a woman received from the sacred font her own son or only her husband's son, she is not for that reason to be separated from her husband. The same must likewise be understood concerning a man.

> C. X. De eodem. Idem.
> Non debet episcopus aut presbiter conmisceri cum mulieribus, que ei sua fuerint confessae peccata. Si forte (quod absit) hoc contigerit, sic peniteat, quomodo de filia spirituali, episcopus quindecim annis, presbiter duodecim, et deponatur; si tamen in conscientia populi deuenerit. Gratian. His itaque auctoritatibus apparet, quod siue proprium, siue tantummodo uiri filium mulier de sacro fonte susceperit, non ideo a uiro suo est separanda. Quod et de uiro similiter oportet intellegi.

Question II

GRATIAN. Betrothals cannot be contracted before the age of seven. For they are contracted by consent alone, which cannot intervene unless what is transacted between them is understood by each party. Therefore, betrothals are proved unable to be contracted between children whose weakness of age does not admit consent. Pope Nicholas attests this same thing, saying:

> GRATIANUS. Sponsalia ante septennium contrahi non possunt. Solo enim consensu contrahuntur, qui interuenire non potest, nisi ab alterutra parte id intelligatur, quod inter eos agitur. Probantur ergo sponsalia non posse contrahi inter pueros, quorum etatis infirmitas consensum non admittit. Testatur hoc idem Nykolaus Papa dicens:

SOLE CHAPTER. Before the time for consenting, marriage cannot be contracted.

Where there is not the consent of both, there is no marriage. Therefore, those who give girls to boys in their cradles, and conversely, accomplish nothing unless each of the children consents after reaching the time of discretion, even if the father and mother did this and willed it.

> C. UN. Ante tempus consentiendi coniugium contrahi non potest.
> Ubi non est consensus utriusque, non est coniugium. Ergo qui pueris dant puellas in cunabulis, et e conuerso, nichil faciunt, nisi uterque puerorum post, quam uenerit ad tempus discretionis, consentiat, etiamsi pater et mater hoc fecerint et uoluerint.

Question III

GRATIAN. PART I. That spiritual or adopted children cannot be joined to natural children is attested by Pope Nicholas in his response to the inquiries of the Bulgars, [c. 2], saying thus:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem spirituales uel adoptiui filii naturalibus copulari non possint, Nykolaus Papa respondens ad consulta Bulgarorum [cap. 2.] testatur, ita dicens:

C. I. One who is received from the sacred font is the son of the one by whom he is received.

A person ought to love the one who received him from the sacred font as a father.

Likewise: § 1. Between spiritual brothers and children there is a gratuitous and holy communion, which is not to be called consanguinity, but is to be held as spiritual kinship. Hence I judge that no lawful marriage whatever can take place between them, since the venerable laws do not permit marriages to be contracted even between those who are children by nature and those who are children by adoption.

Likewise: § 2. If marriage is not contracted between those whom adoption joins, how much more ought those whom regeneration of the Holy Spirit binds through the heavenly sacrament to abstain from carnal union with one another? Far more fittingly, therefore, he says, is one whom divine grace rather than human will chose to be his son or my brother called the son of my father or my brother; and more prudently do we separate them from mutual mingling of the body.

> C. I. Qui de sacro fonte suscipitur filius eius est, a quo suscipitur.
> Ita diligere debet homo eum, qui se suscepit de sacro fonte, sicut patrem. Item: §. 1. Est inter fratres et filios spirituales gratuita et sancta conmunio, que dicenda non est consanguinitas, sed habenda spiritualis proximitas. Unde inter eos arbitror non posse fieri quodlibet legale coniugium, quod quidem nec inter eos, qui natura, et eos, qui adoptione filii sunt, uenerandae leges matrimonia contrahi permittunt. Item: §. 2. Si inter eos non contrahitur matrimonium, quos adoptio iungit, quanto potius a carnali oportet inter se contubernio cessare quos per celeste sacramentum regeneratio Spiritus sancti uincit? Longe ergo inquit congruentius filius patris mei uel frater meus appellatur is, quem diuina gratia potius, quam humana uoluntas, ut filius eius uel frater meus esset, elegit; prudentiusque ab alterna corporis conmixtione secernimus.

C. II. A spiritual daughter can in no way marry a natural son.

Likewise Bishop Zachary, servant of the servants of God, to the most reverend Theodore, bishop of the church of Pavia. Your venerable Fraternity offered us a letter by which you wished to ask us whether it is lawful for the son of a father who received another man's daughter from sacred baptism to receive in marriage the girl received—that is, that father's spiritual daughter—which it is cruel even to say, and which you asserted had occurred monstrously in your jurisdiction.

§ 1. But Your Holy Fraternity knows well that the Lord commanded Moses, saying: "You shall not uncover the nakedness of your father, or mother, or sister; for it is your nakedness." Therefore, since we are commanded to abstain from our own blood kin, much more is it fitting that, with every excuse or argument set aside, we guard ourselves under the greatest strictness from the spiritual daughter of our father, lest one incur the wrath of divine judgment if, after being mingled in such a crime, one has by no means restrained the reins of lust. Hence all must also be kept from a mingling involving so great a crime, lest they perish perpetually. But Your Fraternity is in every way to strive to separate this man who, despising the salvation of his soul, has mingled himself in an impious marriage of this ruinous rashness, and to subject him to worthy penance, so that you may gain his soul, snatched from eternal damnation.

> C. II. Filia spiritualis carnali filio nullo modo nubere potest.

Item Zacharias Episcopus, seruus seruorum Dei, reuerentissimo Theodoro Episcopo ecclesiae Ticinensis. Pitacium quod nobis tua ueneranda fraternitas obtulit, per quod nos sciscitari uoluisti, si liceat filio, cuius pater alterius filiam ex sacro baptismate suscepit, susceptam, id est spiritualem eius patris filiam (quod dici crudele est), in matrimonio suscipere, quod apud te enormiter asseruisti contigisse. §. 1. Sed bene tua sancta fraternitas conpertum habet, quod Dominus precepit Moysi, dicens: "Turpitudinem patris tui, uel matris, uel sororis non reuelabis; turpitudo enim tua est." Cum ergo a propria consanguinitate iubemur abstinere, multo magis a spirituali patris nostri filia omni excusatione aut argumento seposito sub nimia districtione nos cauere conuenit, ne in iram diuinae examinationis incidat, si quis tali facinore mixtus minime restrinxerit frena luxuriae. Unde etiam omnes cauendi sunt a tali sceleris conmixtione, ne in perpetuum pereant; sed hunc, qui huius perniciosae temeritatis, animae suae salutem despiciens, inpio se miscuit matrimonio, per omnia tua fraternitas studeat separare, et penitenciae dignae submittere, quatinus ab eterna erutam dampnatione animam eius lucreris.

C. III. Let no one dare to give to his own son a girl whom he received from the sacred font.

Likewise Zachary and Deusdedit. One ought never to give in marriage to one's own son a daughter whom one received from the sacred font, because in the divine judgment they are found to be siblings. If anyone mingled in such a crime has by no means restrained the reins of lust, he will be abhorred by the Catholic Church. But if he has been converted, after the separation let him perform penance for seven years. Let this condition apply to those who knew of it together with the principal actor; that is, let the collaborators and those consenting perform penance together with him.

PART II. GRATIAN. But children, whether born before or after the relationship of coparenthood, can lawfully be joined. Hence Urban II writes to Vitalis, priest of Brescia, saying:

C. III. Filio suo, quam de sacro fonte susceperit nullus tradere audeat.

Item Zacharias et Deusdedit. Non oportet filiam, quam de sacro fonte susceperit, aliquando filio suo in matrimonium tradere, quia in diuina sentencia germani esse inueniuntur. Si quis tali facinore conmixtus minime restrinxerit frena luxuriae, ab ecclesia catholica abhominabitur. Sed si conuersus fuerit, post separationem septem annis penitenciam gerat. Consciis simul cum auctore sit ista condicio, id est simul cum cooperatoribus et consentientibus peniteat. II. Pars. Gratian. Filii uero, siue ante conpaternitatem siue post nati fuerint, licite coniungi possunt. Unde Urbanus II. scribit Vitali Presbitero Brisciensi, dicens:

[C. IV.]

"Concerning the matters on which Your Love consulted us, this seems to us to be the response according to judgment: both that there is baptism if, when necessity presses, a woman baptizes a boy in the name of the Trinity, and that the sons or daughters of spiritual parents, begotten before or after the relationship of coparenthood, can lawfully be joined, except for the person through whom they were made coparents."

But Paschal II prohibits those begotten after the relationship of coparenthood from being joined, writing to Bishop Reginus:

[C. IV.]

"Super quibus consuluit nos tua dilectio, hoc uidetur nobis ex sentencia respondendum, ut et baptismus sit, si instante necessitate femina puerum in nomine Trinitatis baptizauerit, et quod spiritualium parentum filii uel filiae, ante uel post conpaternitatem genitae, possunt legitime coniungi, preter illam personam, qua conpatres sunt effecti."

Pascalis uero secundus, post compaternitatem genitos copulari prohibet, scribens Regino Episcopo:

C. V. Those born of a co-father or co-mother after children have been received from the font cannot be joined.

But after a spiritual son or daughter has been received from the font, those who have been born of the co-father or co-mother cannot be joined in marriage, because secular laws forbid those not emancipated from being joined to adopted children.

C. V. Qui ex conpatre uel conmatre post susceptos filios de fonte nati fuerint, coniungi non possunt.

Post susceptum uero de fonte filium uel filiam spiritualem, qui ex conpatre uel conmatre nati fuerint, matrimonio coniungi non possunt, quia leges seculi non emancipatos adoptiuis prohibent copulari.

[PALEA. C. VI.

The same is considered from Book XXIII of the Digest, under the title On the Rite of Marriage, in which it is read thus: Brotherhood acquired through adoption impedes marriages for as long as the adoption remains; and therefore I will be able to take as wife a woman whom my father adopted and emancipated. Equally, if, after I have been emancipated, he retains her in his power, we will be able to be joined in marriage. Therefore, one who wishes to adopt a son-in-law is advised to emancipate his daughter. Similarly, one who wishes to adopt a daughter-in-law is advised to emancipate his son.]

PART III. GRATIAN. But if anyone, through some fortuitous event, has taken the daughter of his co-mother as wife, he is not compelled to put her away. Hence it is read in the Council of Tribur, [c. 48]:

[PALEA. C. VI.

Idem ex libro XXIII. Digestorum, titulo de ritu nuptiarum, perpenditur, in quo ita legitur: Per adoptionem quesita fraternitas eousque inpedit nuptias, donec manet adoptio, ideoque eam, quam pater meus adoptauit et emancipauit, potero uxorem ducere. Eque et si me emancipato illam in potestate retinuerit, poterimus iungi matrimonio. Itaque uolenti generum adoptare, suadetur, ut filiam emancipet. Similiter suadetur ei, qui uelit nurum adoptare, ut emancipet filium.] III. Pars. Gratian. Si quis uero aliquo fortuito casu filiam suae conmatris uxorem acceperit, non cogitur eam dimittere. Unde in Triburiensi Concilio legitur: [c. 48.]

C. VII. One is not compelled to put away the daughter of one's co-mother whom one took in marriage.

We neither define this by canonical institution nor reject it by any prohibition; but because of those who think differently about it, we record something in this place. If anyone has taken in marriage the daughter of his spiritual co-mother fortuitously and through circumstances so occurring, after mature counsel has been observed, let him keep her and duly devote himself to a respectable, legitimate marriage.

C. VII. Non cogitur quis dimittere filiam suae conmatris, quam duxit in coniugium.

> Illud etiam nec canonica institutione diffinimus, nec interdictione aliqua refutamus, sed propter eos, qui diuerse de eo sentiunt, hoc loco aliquid conmemoramus. Si quis suae spiritualis conmatris filiam fortuitu et ita contingente rerum casu in coniugium duxerit, consilio maturiori seruato habeat, atque honeste legitimo coniugio operam det.

Question IV

GRATIAN. PART I. No one can take as wife the widow of his wife's co-father. Hence Pope Nicholas writes to Solomon, bishop of Constance:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Relictam uero conpatris uxoris suae nullus in coniugem ducere potest. Unde Nykolaus Papa scribit Constantiensi Episcopo Salomoni:

C. I. It is not lawful for anyone to have two co-mothers.

Your Holiness asks us whether any man can have two co-mothers, one after the other. In this matter he ought to remember that it is written: "The two shall be in one flesh." Therefore, since it is established that a man and woman are made one flesh through marriage, it clearly follows that the man is constituted co-father of the woman whose co-mother the wife taken in marriage appeared to be. For that reason it is clear that the man cannot be joined in union to the woman who was co-mother of the woman with whom that same man had been made one flesh.

> C. I. Duas conmatres alicui habere non licet.
> Sciscitatur a nobis sanctitas uestra, si aliquis homo duas conmatres habere ualeat unam post alteram. In quo meminisse debet scriptum esse: "Erunt duo in carne una." Itaque cum constet, quia uir et mulier una caro per conubium efficiuntur, restat nimirum uirum conpatrem constitui illi mulieri, cuius matrimonio assumpta uxor conmater esse uidebatur, et idcirco liquet, uirum illi feminae non posse iungi in copula, que conmater eius erat, cum qua idem fuerat una caro effectus.

C. II. Let one who mingles with two co-mothers perform penance for eight years.

Likewise from the Council of Chalcedon. If a father and son, or two brothers, have lain with one woman; or if someone has lain with a mother and daughter, or with two sisters, or with two co-mothers, let him perform penance for eight years according to the ancient and more humane determination.

> C. II. Octo annis peniteat qui duabus conmatribus conmiscetur.
> Item ex Concilio Calcedonensi. Si pater et filius, aut duo fratres cum una muliere, aut si cum matre et filia, aut cum duabus sororibus, aut cum duabus conmatribus aliquis concubuerit, secundum antiquam et humaniorem diffinitionem octo annis peniteat.

C. III. Let no one mingle with two co-mothers.

Likewise Innocent to Exsuperius, bishop of Toulouse. If either one of a married pair receives the son or daughter of another from the sacred font, holds the child for chrism, or imparts the mystery of Christianity, both wife and husband become coparents of the infant's parents, because man and woman have been made one flesh.

PART II. GRATIAN. To the contrary it is found in the Council of Tribur, c. 47:

C. III. Nullus duabus conmatribus misceatur.

Item Innocentius Exsuperio Tolosano Episcopo. Si quis unus ex coniugio filium aut filiam alterius de sacro fonte susceperit, aut ad crisma tenuerit, uel Christianitatis misterium dederit, ambo, et uxor et uir, conpatres existunt parentibus infantis, quia uir et mulier caro una effecti sunt. II. Pars. Gratian. Econtrario inuenitur in Concilio Triburiensi, c. 47.:

C. IV. One may take the wife of one's co-father if she herself had not been one's co-mother.

One who has a spiritual co-father, whose son he received from the washing of the sacred font, and whose wife is not his co-mother, may, after his co-father has died, take the widow as wife if she has no nearness of consanguinity. For what then? Can those whom no carnal kinship and no spiritual generation separates not be joined?

C. IV. Uxorem conpatris ducere potest, cuius ipsa conmater non fuerat.

Qui spiritualem conpatrem habet, cuius filium de lauacro sacri fontis accepit, et eius uxor conmater non est, liceat ei defuncto conpatre suo eius uiduam ducere in uxorem, si nullam habet consanguinitatis propinquitatem. Quid enim? Numquid non possunt coniungi quos nulla propinquitas carnalis, uel nulla generatio secernit spiritualis?

C. V. Concerning the same matter.

Likewise from the letter of Pope Paschal II to Bishop Reginus. No reason or authority appears to prohibit a surviving husband, after his wife's death, from being joined in marriage with his wife's co-mother. For spiritual kinship is not equated with kinship of the flesh, nor does one pass through the union of the flesh to union of the spirit.

PART III. GRATIAN. But it must be noted that it is one thing to know carnally someone's co-mother and another thing for a woman left behind by someone to become someone's co-mother. That authority of Pope Nicholas and of the Synod of Chalcedon prohibits from being joined in marriage to his wife's co-mother the man who rendered the marital due to his wife after she became the co-mother of that woman. But that authority of the Council of Tribur permits those to be joined in marriage in the case where his wife, after she is left by her husband, becomes the co-mother of that woman, and is not known carnally by her husband after the relationship of coparenthood. It is asked, moreover, whether a wife ought together with her husband to receive a child in baptism. Concerning these matters Urban II writes thus to Vitalis, priest of Brescia:

C. V. De eodem.

Item ex epistola Pascalis Papae II. ad Reginum Episcopum. Post uxoris obitum cum conmatre uxoris uiri superstitis coniugio copulari, nulla uidetur ratio uel auctoritas prohibere. Neque enim cognationi carnis cognatio spiritus conparatur, neque per carnis unionem ad unionem spiritus pertransitur. III. Pars. Gratian. Notandum uero est, quod aliud est conmatrem alicuius cognoscere, atque aliud derelictam ab aliquo conmatrem alicuius fieri. Auctoritas illa Nykolai Papae et Calcedonensis sinodi illum prohibet conmatris suae uxoris matrimonio copulari, qui uxori suae debitum reddidit, postquam illius conmater extitit. Illa uero auctoritas Triburiensis concilii illos permittit matrimonio copulari, cuius uxor post, quam a uiro suo derelinquitur, illius conmater efficitur, nec post conpaternitatem a uiro suo cognoscitur. Queritur autem, an uxor cum marito in baptismate simul debeant suscipere puerum? De his ita scribit Urbanus II. Vitali, Presbytero Brixiensi:

C. VI. Let a wife not receive someone's child in baptism together with her husband.

That a wife ought not to receive a child in baptism with her husband is found to be prohibited by no authority. But so that the purity of spiritual paternity may be preserved immune from every blemish and infamy, we have decreed it worthy that both should by no means presume together to aspire to this. But because one who married two co-mothers or two sisters committed an expiable crime, great penance ought to be enjoined upon him according to the measure of the fault.

GRATIAN. But that saying of the Council of Tribur, "One who has a spiritual co-father, etc.," is understood to have been said before this prohibition; or the wife is understood to be a co-mother not from the same child as the husband, but from another.

> C. VI. Uxor simul cum uiro filium alicuius in baptismate non suscipiat.
> Quod autem uxor cum marito in baptismate non debeat suscipere puerum, nulla auctoritate reperitur prohibitum. Sed ut puritas spiritualis paternitatis ab omni labe et infamia conseruetur inmunis, dignum esse decreuimus, ut utrique insimul ad hoc aspirare minime presumant. Quia uero piaculare flagicium conmisit qui duabus conmatribus uel duabus sororibus nupsit, magna iuxta modum culpae penitencia sibi debet iniungi. Gratian. Illud uero Triburiensis concilii: "Qui spiritualem habet conpatrem etc.," ante hanc prohibitionem dictum intelligitur, uel uxor conmater accipiatur non ex eodem filio cum uiro, sed ex alio.

Question V

GRATIAN. PART I. That clandestine marriages ought not to be made is attested by Pope Evaristus, writing to the bishops of Africa, [epistle 1]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem clandestina coniugia fieri non debeant, Euaristus Papa testatur, scribens Episcopis Affricae: [epist. I.]

C. I. Clandestine marriages ought not to be made.

A marriage is not made legitimate otherwise than if the wife is sought from those who are seen to have authority over the woman herself and by whom she is guarded; if she is betrothed by her nearest relatives and endowed according to the laws; if, at the proper time, as is the custom, she is blessed by a priest with prayers and offerings; if, guarded and accompanied by the bridal attendants as custom teaches, sought from her relatives at the proper time, she is endowed according to the laws and solemnly received; and if for two or three days they devote themselves to prayers and preserve chastity.

Likewise: § 1. Know that marriages performed thus are legitimate; but do not doubt that those presumed otherwise are not marriages, but rather adulteries, informal unions, acts of defloration, or fornications rather than legitimate marriages, unless their own will has supported them and lawful vows have come to their aid.

> C. I. Clandestina coniugia fieri non debent.
> Aliter legitimum non fit coniugium, nisi ab his, qui super ipsam feminam dominationem habere uidentur, et a quibus custoditur uxor petatur, et a parentibus propinquioribus sponsetur, et legibus dotetur, et suo tempore sacerdotaliter, ut mos est, cum precibus et oblationibus a sacerdote benedicatur, et a paranimphis, ut consuetudo docet, custodita et sociata, a proximis congruo tempore petita legibus dotetur, ac solempniter accipiatur, et biduo uel triduo orationibus uacent, et castitatem custodiant. Item: §. 1. Ita peracta legitima scitote esse conubia; aliter uero presumpta non coniugia, sed adulteria, uel contubernia, uel stupra, aut fornicationes potius, quam legitima coniugia esse non dubitate, nisi uoluntas propria suffragauerit, et uota succurrerint legitima.

C. II. It is not lawful for marriages to be celebrated secretly.

Likewise from a decree of Pope Hormisdas, c. 6. Let no believer, of whatever condition, make a marriage secretly; rather, having received a blessing from a priest, let that person marry publicly in the Lord.

C. II. Nuptias occulte celebrari non licet.

Item ex Decreto Hormisdae Papae, c. 6. Nullus fidelis, cuiuscumque condicionis sit, occulte nuptias faciat, sed benedictione accepta a sacerdote publice nubat in Domino.

C. III. Marriages ought to be celebrated publicly.

Likewise Nicholas in response to the inquiries of the Bulgars, [c. 3]. Our people, both men and women, do not wear upon their heads a band of gold or silver, or one fashioned from any metal, when they contract the bonds of marriage. Rather, after the betrothal, which is the promise of future marriage, the covenants are also celebrated by the consent of those who contract these things and of those in whose power they are. And after the bridegroom has betrothed the bride by pledges, marking her finger with the ring of fidelity, and has delivered to her, before persons invited by both parties, the dowry pleasing to each together with a writing containing this agreement—either immediately or at a suitable time, lest, namely, they presume to do any such thing before the time determined by law—both are led to the bonds of marriage. First they are placed in the church of the Lord with offerings, which they ought to offer to God through the hand of the priest, and thus at last they receive the blessing and heavenly veil.

Likewise: § 1. These, besides other things that do not occur to memory, are the solemn agreements of marriages. We do not, however, say that it is a sin if all these things do not intervene in the marriage covenant.

C. III. Nuptiae publice celebrari debent.

Item Nykolaus ad consulta Bulgarorum. [c. 3.] Nostrates, tam mares quam feminae, non ligaturam auream, uel argenteam, aut ex quolibet metallo conpositam, quando nuptialia federa contrahunt, in capitibus deferunt: sed post sponsalia, que futurarum sunt nuptiarum promissio, federa quoque consensu eorum, qui hec contrahunt, et eorum, in quorum potestate sunt, celebrantur; et post, quam arrhis sibi sponsam sponsus per digitum fidei annulo insignitam desponderit, dotemque utrique placitam sponsus ei cum scripto pactum hoc continente coram inuitatis ab utraque parte tradiderit (aut mox aut apto tempore, ne uidelicet ante tempus lege diffinitum tale quid facere presumant), ambo ad nuptialia federa perducuntur, et primum in ecclesia Domini cum oblationibus, quas offerre debent Deo per sacerdotis manum, statuuntur, sicque demum benedictionem et uelamen celeste suscipiunt. Item: §. 1. Hec sunt, preter alia, que ad memoriam non occurrunt, pacta coniugiorum solempnia. Peccatum autem esse, si hec cuncta in nuptiali federe non interueniant, non dicimus.

C. IV. These things are to be observed in contracting marriage.

Likewise Pope Leo. What sort of wife is to be had according to the law: a chaste virgin, betrothed in virginity, lawfully endowed, handed over to the bridegroom by her parents, to be received by the bridal attendants, and thus, according to the law and the Gospel, plainly to be taken into marriage in public nuptials; never to be separated for a human reason during all the days of her life—except by consent and for the sake of devoting themselves to God—and, if she has fornicated, to be put away, but while she is living another is not to be taken, because adulterers will not possess the kingdom of God; and her penance is to be received in writing.

> C. IV. In contrahendo coniugio ista sunt obseruanda.
> Item Leo Papa. Qualis debeat esse uxor, que habenda est secundum legem. Virgo casta, et desponsata in uirginitate, et dotata legitime, et a parentibus tradita sponso, et a paranimphis accipienda, et ita secundum legem et euangelium publicis nuptiis in coniugium liquide sumenda, et omnibus diebus uitae suae (nisi ex consensu, et causa uacandi Deo) numquam propter hominem separanda, et, si fornicata fuerit, dimittenda, sed illa uiuente altera non ducenda, quia adulteri regnum Dei non possidebunt, et penitencia illius per scripturam recipienda.

C. V. How the bridegroom and bride are to approach the blessing.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 13]. When the bridegroom and bride are to be blessed by a priest, let them be presented in the church to the priest by their parents or by the bridal attendants; and when they have received the blessing, let them remain in virginity that same night out of reverence for the blessing.

> C. V. Quomodo sponsus et sponsa ad benedictionem accedant.
> Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 13.] Sponsus et sponsa cum benedicendi sunt a sacerdote, a parentibus uel a paranimphis offerantur in ecclesia sacerdoti, qui, cum acceperint benedictionem, eadem nocte pro reuerentia benedictionis in uirginitate permaneant.

C. VI. Let no one take a wife without public nuptials.

Likewise from the Council of Arles, c. 6. Let no marriage be made without a dowry; let a dowry be made according to one's means, and let no one presume to marry or take a wife without public nuptials.

GRATIAN. By all these authorities secret nuptials are prohibited, and therefore, when nuptials occur contrary to authority, they ought to be held as not having occurred.

PART II. § 1. But it is asked what those solemnities of the veil and ring that are observed in marriages mean. Concerning these Isidore writes thus in Book II of On Ecclesiastical Offices, c. 16:

> C. VI. Sine publicis nuptiis nullus ducat uxorem.
> Item ex Concilio Arelatensi, c. 6. Nullum sine dote fiat coniugium; iuxta possibilitatem fiat dos, nec sine publicis nuptiis quisquam nubere uel uxorem ducere presumat. Gratian. His omnibus auctoritatibus occultae nuptiae prohibentur, atque ideo, cum contra auctoritatem fiunt nuptiae, pro infectis haberi debent. II. Pars. §. 1. Sed queritur, quid sibi uelint solempnitates illae uelaminis et annuli, que in coniugiis obseruantur? De his ita scribit Ysidorus in II. libro de offitiis, c. 16.:

C. VII. Why women are veiled when they marry.

Women are veiled when they marry so that they may know that they are always to be subject and humble to their husbands.

§ 1. Likewise, the fact that after the blessing those marrying are joined to one another by a headband in a single bond is done, namely, so that they may not break apart the joining of marital unity.

§ 2. But the fact that the same headband is interwoven with white and purple color has this meaning: whiteness is purity of life, while purple is applied to the posterity of blood, so that by this sign both continence and the rule of practicing continence for a time may be impressed upon each, and afterward the rendering of the marital due may not be denied.

§ 3. Likewise, the fact that at the beginning a ring is given by the bridegroom to the bride is done, certainly, either as a sign of mutual love, or rather so that their hearts may be joined by the same pledge. Hence the ring is also placed upon the fourth finger, because a certain vein in it, as is reported, reaches all the way to the heart.

> C. VII. Quare feminae uelantur, dum maritantur.
> Feminae, dum maritantur, ideo uelantur, ut nouerint, se semper uiris suis subditas esse et humiles. §. 1. Item, quod nubentes post benedictionem uitta inuicem, uno uinculo copulantur, uidelicet fit ideo, ne conpagem coniugalis unitatis disrumpant. §. 2. At uero, quod eadem uitta candido purpureoque colore permiscetur, candor quippe est mundicia uitae, purpura ad sanguinis posteritatem adhibetur, ut hoc signo et continentia et lex continendi ab utrisque ad tempus admoneatur, et posthec reddendum debitum non negetur. §. 3. Item, quod in primis annulus a sponso sponsae datur fit nimirum uel propter mutuae dilectionis signum, uel propter id magis, ut eodem pignore corda eorum iungantur. Unde et quarto digito annulus inseritur, ideo quod in eo uena quedam, ut fertur, sanguinis ad cor usque perueniat.

C. VIII. Nuptials are said to be named from veiling, because women are accustomed to veil their head.

Ambrose in the book On the Patriarchs. PART III. Nor is it without significance that, when Rebecca came, she saw Isaac walking about and, when she had asked who he was and learned that he was the one to whom she was being led as wife, she descended and began to veil her head, teaching that modesty ought to precede nuptials. For from this nuptials are also named, because, for the sake of modesty, young women veiled themselves.

PART IV. GRATIAN. But it is objected to the foregoing: There are many things that are prohibited which, if they occur, acquire validity afterward. Those who have taken vows are prohibited from contracting marriages, which nevertheless, if they have contracted them, must remain inviolate. So also clandestine marriages are indeed made contrary to the laws; nevertheless, once contracted, they cannot be dissolved, because they are strengthened by a lawful vow that follows. Hence also Evaristus, after he had said, "Marriages presumed otherwise are not marriages, but adulteries," added: "unless their own will has supported them and lawful vows have come to their aid." Hence also in the Novels:

> C. VIII. Nuptiae dicuntur ab obnubendo, eo quod caput suum obnubere soleant.
> Ambrosius in libro de Patriarchis. III. Pars. Nec illud otiosum, quod cum Rebecca ueniret, uidit Ysaac deambulantem, et cum interrogasset quis esset, cognito, quod ipse esset, cui duceretur uxor, descendit et caput suum obnubere cepit, docens uerecundiam nuptiis preire debere. Inde enim et nuptiae dictae, quod pudoris gratia se puellae obnuberent. IV. Pars. Gratian. Sed obicitur premissis: Multa sunt, que prohibentur, que, si fiant, ex postfacto conualescunt. Prohibentur uouentes matrimonia contrahere, que tamen si contraxerint, inuiolata permanere oportet. Sic et clandestina coniugia contra leges quidem fiunt, tamen contracta dissolui non possunt, quia ex legitimo uoto subsequente corroborantur. Unde et Euaristus, cum dixisset: "aliter coniugia presumpta non sunt, sed adulteria;" addidit: "nisi uoluntas propria suffragauerit, et uota succurrerint legitima." Hinc etiam in Nouellis:

[C. IX.]

"If anyone, touching the divine Scriptures, has sworn to a woman that he will have her as his lawful wife, or if he has given such an oath in an oratory, let her be his lawful wife, although no dowry and no other written instrument has intervened."

[GRATIAN.] To these things it is answered thus: Marriages that are contracted secretly are not denied to be marriages, nor are they commanded to be dissolved, if they can be proved by the confession of both. Nevertheless, they are prohibited because, when the will of one of them has changed, credibility cannot be created for the judge by the confession of the other. Hence, when the vows of one have publicly transferred themselves to another party, a judgment cannot be rendered for the former marriage, which is uncertain to the judge. For, as Pope Sixtus writes to the bishops established throughout Spain, let none of the pontiffs presume to judge uncertain matters; and although they are true, those things are nevertheless not to be believed unless they are proved by certain indications, unless they are established by manifest judgment, unless they are made public by judicial order. Hence Pope Victor also writes to Bishop Theophilus: "Dearest brother, let us in no way judge uncertain matters until the Lord comes, who will bring hidden things into the light, illuminate the things concealed in darkness, and manifest the counsels of hearts. For although they are true, they are nevertheless not to be believed unless they are proved by manifest indications, unless they are established by manifest judgment, unless they are made public by judicial order."

[C. IX.]

"Si quis diuinis tactis scripturis iurauerit mulieri, legitimam se eam uxorem habiturum, uel si in oratorio tale sacramentum dederit, sit illa legitima uxor, quamuis nulla dos, nulla scriptura alia interposita sit." [Gratian.] His ita respondetur: Coniugia, que clam contrahuntur, non negantur esse coniugia, nec iubentur dissolui, si utriusque confessione probari poterunt: uerumtamen prohibentur, quia mutata alterius eorum uoluntate, alterius confessione fides iudici fieri non potest. Unde publice, cum alterius uota in alteram partem se transtulerint, pro priori coniugio, quod iudici incertum est, sentencia ferri non poterit. Incerta enim (ut Syxtus Papa scribit episcopis per Hispaniam constitutis) nemo pontificum iudicare presumat, et quamuis uera sint, non tamen credenda sunt nisi que certis indiciis conprobantur, nisi que manifesto iudicio conuincuntur, nisi que iudiciario ordine publicantur. Hinc etiam Victor Papa scribit Theophilo episcopo: "Incerta, karrissime, nullatenus iudicemus, quousque ueniat Dominus, qui latentia producet in lucem, et illuminabit abscondita tenebrarum, et manifestabit consilia cordium. Quamuis enim uera sint, non tamen credenda sunt nisi que manifestis indiciis conprobantur, nisi que manifesto iudicio conuincuntur, nisi que iudiciario ordine publicantur."

C. X. No one is to be judged or condemned before just proof.

Likewise Pope Evaristus, [epistle II], to all bishops. We ought to judge or condemn no one before true and just proof, as the Apostle testifies when he says: "Who are you who judges another's servant? To his own master he stands or falls." Therefore, let evil things heard move no one, nor let anyone ever believe things said indiscriminately without certain proof; rather, let him carefully investigate what he has heard beforehand, and let no one do anything precipitately.

> C. X. Ante iustam probationem nullus iudicandus aut dampnandus est.
> Item Euaristus Papa [epist. II.] omnibus Episcopis. Nullum ante ueram iustamque probationem iudicare aut dampnare debemus, teste Apostolo, qui ait: "Tu quis es, qui iudicas alienum seruum? Suo domino stat aut cadit?" Mala itaque audita nullum moueant, nec passim dicta absque certa probatione quisquam umquam credat; sed ante audita diligenter inquirat, nec precipitando quicquam aliquis agat.

C. XI. No matters are to be judged before they are demonstrated by certain indications.

Likewise Pope Eleutherius, [epistle to the provinces of Gaul]. One who judges must examine all things and investigate the order of events by a full inquiry, with patience for asking, answering, and objecting afforded by him, so that there the case of both parties may be fully illuminated. Nor should a judge wish to forestall the litigants by his judgment before, after everything has already been completed, they have nothing in question to propose; and let the case be debated until they arrive at the truth of the matter. It is necessary to ask questions repeatedly, lest perhaps something remain omitted which ought to be adjoined.

GRATIAN. From the foregoing it is most manifestly gathered that one must not depart from certain things on account of uncertain things, nor is a definite judgment to be given in a doubtful matter. But since credibility concerning a doubtful matter cannot be created for a judge except by the confirmation of witnesses or by a lawful confession, and since, by the authority of Pope Callixtus, witnesses cannot give testimony concerning cases or affairs other than those which are known to have been done in their presence, it appears that clandestine marriages are prohibited for this reason: when one of them wishes to deny having had marital affection toward the other, that person will not be able to be convicted by lawful proofs. When these are lacking and each has been duly absolved by the judgment of the judge, each incurs the guilt of adultery when, while both of them are living, they join themselves to others.

> C. XI. Non sunt aliqua iudicanda prius, quam certis demonstrentur indiciis.
> Item Eleutherius Papa. [epistola ad Galliae prouincias] Iudicantem oportet cuncta rimari, et ordinem rerum plena inquisitione discutere, interrogandi et respondendi obiciendique prebita patiencia ab eo, ut ibi ambarum actio partium illuminata sit pleniter, nec litigantibus prius uelit iudex sua sententia obuiare, nisi quando iam peractis omnibus nichil habeant in questione, quod proponant, et tamdiu actio uentiletur, quousque ad ueritatem rei perueniant. Frequenter interrogari oportet, ne aliquid pretermissum forte remaneat, quod annecti conueniat. Gratian. Ex premissis manifestissime colligitur quod pro incertis a certis recedendum non est, nec in re dubia certa danda est sentencia. Cum autem fides dubiae rei nisi testium approbatione uel legitima confessione iudici fieri non ualeat, testes autem auctoritate Calixti Papae de aliis causis uel negociis testimonium dicere non ualeant, nisi de his, que sub eorum presentia facta noscuntur: apparet clandestina coniugia ideo esse prohibita, quia, cum alter eorum coniugalem affectum se ad alterum habuisse negare uoluerit, legitimis probationibus conuinci non poterit, quibus deficientibus, iudicis sentencia rite absolutus, reatum adulterii uterque incurrit, dum utroque eorum uiuente aliis se copulauerint.

Causa XXXI

CASE XXXI.

GRATIAN. Another man defiled a certain man's wife; after that man died, the adulterer took the adulteress as his wife. He swore that he would give as wife to a certain man a daughter begotten of her. She did not give her assent. Then her father handed her over to another; she is reclaimed by the first. (Q. I.) It is asked whether one who was first polluted through adultery can be taken in marriage. (Q. II.) Second, whether a daughter is to be handed over to someone against her will. (Q. III.) Third, whether, after her father's promise, she can marry another.

> GRATIANUS. Uxorem cuiusdam alius constuprauit; eo mortuo adulter adulteram sibi in uxorem accepit; filiam ex ea susceptam cuidam in coniugem se daturum iurauit; illa assensum non prebuit; deinde pater alii eam tradidit; a primo reposcitur. (Qu. I.) Queritur: an possit duci in coniugium que prius est polluta per adulterium? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an filia sit tradenda inuita alicui? (Qu. III.) Tertio, an post patris sponsionem illa possit nubere alii?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. A woman polluted by adultery is prohibited from being taken in marriage by the authority of Pope Leo, in which it is said:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Adulterio polluta prohibetur duci in coniugium auctoritate Leonis Papae, qua dicitur:

C. I. Let no one take in marriage a woman whom he previously polluted by adultery.

Let no one take in marriage a woman whom he previously polluted by adultery. But Augustine testifies to the contrary, writing to Valerius in On Marriage and Concupiscence, [Book I, c. 10]:

> C. I. Adulterio polluta non ducatur ab eodem in matrimonium.
> Nullus ducat in matrimonium quam prius polluit adulterio. Sed Augustinus econtra testatur, scribens ad Valerium de nuptiis et concupiscentia: [lib. I. c. 10.]

C. II. It is lawful for someone to take in marriage a woman whom he previously polluted through adultery.

Finally, after the man with whom there was a true marriage has died, a marriage can be made with the woman with whom adultery preceded.

Likewise in the book On the Good of Marriage, [c. 14]. § 1. It is manifest that lawful marriages can be made from persons lawfully joined, when an honorable agreement follows.

GRATIAN. This last authority speaks of concubines, asserting that concubines can pass to the honorable agreement of marriage. The first authority of Augustine speaks of a repudiated woman. When someone takes her in marriage while her husband is living, he commits adultery; this adultery has some pardon when his union with her is believed to be lawful.

§ 1. But that saying of Pope Leo is to be understood of a woman who had not been repudiated by her husband, whose husband was living and rendering her the marital due. Hence at the Council held at Altheim in the presence of King Conrad it was established in c. 6:

> C. II. Licet alicui ducere in matrimonium quam prius polluit per adulterium.
> Denique mortuo eo, cum quo fuit uerum conubium fieri potest coniugium, cum qua precessit adulterium. Item in libro de bono coniugali: [c. 14.] §. 1. Posse sane fieri licitas nuptias ex personis licite coniunctis, honesto placito subsequente, manifestum est. Gratian. Hec ultima auctoritas de concubinis loquitur, perhibens, concubinas posse transire ad honestum placitum nuptiarum. Prima auctoritas Augustini loquitur de repudiata, quam dum uiuente uiro suo aliquis ducit in coniugium, conmittit adulterium; cuius adulterii aliquam habet ueniam, dum eius copula creditur esse licita. §. 1. Illud uero Leonis Papae de ea intelligendum est, que a uiro suo non erat repudiata, cuius uiuebat uir, reddens ei coniugale debitum.
> Unde in Concilio apud Altheum habito presente Conrado Rege statutum est c. 6.:

C. III. Let no one take in marriage a woman whom he previously polluted through adultery.

By common decree, in accordance with the institutions of the canons, we determine and adjudge that, if anyone has fornicated with another man's wife while he was living, after the husband has died the unlawful approach to her is to be closed to him by synodal judgment, nor is the woman whom he previously polluted by adultery thereafter to be joined to him in marriage. For we do not will, nor does it accord with the Christian religion, that anyone take in marriage a woman whom he previously polluted through adultery.

GRATIAN. Here it must be understood: unless penance has first been completed, and if he contrived nothing toward the husband's death, or if, while the husband was living, he did not give the adulteress his pledge that he would take her as his wife if he survived her husband. Hence it is read in the Council of Tribur:

> C. III. Nullus ducat in coniugium quam prius polluit per adulterium.
> Illud uero communi decreto secundum canonum instituta diffinimus et preiudicamus, ut, si quis cum uxore alterius uiuente eo fornicatus fuerit, moriente marito sinodali iudicio aditus ei claudatur illicitus, nec ulterius ei coniungatur matrimonio, quam prius polluit adulterio. Nolumus enim, nec Christianae religioni conuenit, ut ullus ducat in coniugium quam prius polluit per adulterium. Gratian. Hic subaudiendum est, nisi prius peracta penitencia et si nichil in morte uiri machinatus fuerit, uel si uiuente uiro fidem adulterae non dedit, sumpturum eam sibi in coniugem si uiro eius superuiueret. Unde in Concilio Triburiensi legitur.

C. IV. After the husband's death, a man who, while the husband was living, gave the adulteress an oath concerning their future marriage cannot take her in marriage.

It was reported to the ears of the holy priests that a certain man had violated another man's wife by illicit intercourse and, moreover, while her husband was living, had given the adulteress an oath that, after the death of her lawful husband, if he survived him, he would take her as wife—which was also done. Therefore, we prohibit and anathematize such a marriage.

> C. IV. Post mortem uiri non potest adulteram in coniugium ducere qui uiro uiuente iuramentum sibi futurarum prebuit nuptiarum.

Relatum est auribus sanctorum sacerdotum, quendam alterius uxorem stupro uiolasse, et insuper mechae uiuente uiro suo iuramentum dedisse, ut post legitimi mariti mortem, si superuixisset, duceret eam uxorem, quod et factum est. Tale igitur conubium prohibemus et anathematizamus.

C. V. After completing penance, a man will be able to take as wife the widow whom he polluted by adultery while her husband was living.

Likewise in the same Council. If anyone is accused of having committed adultery with another man's spouse while the husband was living, and, when he died soon afterward, is known to have taken the same woman, let him in every respect be subjected to public penance. Concerning him, after penance, the aforesaid rule will also be observed if it is expedient, unless perhaps that same man—or the woman—is reported to have killed the husband who had died, or kinship or any other criminal action impedes them. But if this has been proved, let them remain perpetually with penance, without any hope of marriage.

C. V. Post peractam penitenciam uiduam in coniugem ducere poterit, quam uiuente uiro polluit adulterio.

Item in eodem. Si quis uiuente marito coniugem illius adulterasse accusatur, et, eo in proximo defuncto, eandem sumpsisse dinoscitur, omnimodis penitenciae publicae subiciatur. De quo etiam post penitenciam prefata, si expedierit, seruabitur regula; nisi forte idem, aut mulier uirum, qui mortuus fuerat, occidisse notentur, aut propinquitas, uel alia quelibet actio criminalis inpediat. Quod si probatum fuerit, sine ulla spe coniugii cum penitencia perpetuo maneant.

[PALEA. C. VI.

Likewise from the Council at Verberie. If any woman has conspired with others toward her husband's death, and the husband himself, in defending himself, has killed one of them, if that man can prove that she was guilty of the conspiracy, he can, as it seems to us, put away that wife and, if he wishes, take another. But let the woman who plotted against him remain subject to penance without hope of marriage.]

[PALEA. C. VI.

Item ex Concilio apud Vermerias. Si qua mulier in mortem mariti sui cum aliis consiliata sit, et ipse uir aliquem illorum se defendendo occiderit, si probare potest ille uir, eam ream esse consilii, potest (ut nobis uidetur) ipsam uxorem dimittere, et, si uoluerit, aliam ducere. Ipsa autem insidiatrix penitenciae subiecta absque spe coniugii maneat.]

C. VII. After penance, let a widow who took her adulterer as her husband be reconciled to communion.

Likewise from the Council of Elvira, [c. 72]. If any widow has committed adultery and afterward had the same man as her husband, it was decided that, after a period of five years and the performance of lawful penance, she is to be reconciled to communion.

PART II. GRATIAN. But it is objected: David committed adultery with Bathsheba and contrived the death of Uriah, and nevertheless afterward took the same Bathsheba as wife. But in the Old Testament many things were permitted because of weakness which have been eliminated in the perfection of the Gospel. Thus, anyone was permitted to give a bill of repudiation, lest innocent blood be shed through hatred. The Lord later prohibited this in the Gospel, saying that a wife is not to be put away by her husband except for the cause of fornication. Certain things were permitted on account of weakness and as a sacrament of future things. Thus the Lord permitted the children of Israel to offer to him in sacrifice animals which in Egypt they had been accustomed to sacrifice to demons, preferring that they be offered to himself rather than to idols, and so that they might be sacraments of future things for them. So also Bathsheba was permitted to be taken as wife, not more on account of his weakness than as a signification of future things.

§ 1. But there is another reason why the wife of the deceased cannot marry this man. For men and women are generally prohibited from contracting marriages repeatedly. Hence priests ought not to be present at the wedding feast of second marriages, as is read in the Council of Neocaesarea, [cc. 3 and 7]:

> C. VII. Post penitenciam reconcilietur ad conmunionem uidua, que mechum suum in uirum accepit.
> Item ex Concilio Elibertano. [c. 72.] Si qua fuerit uidua mechata, et postea eundem habuerit maritum, post quinquennii tempus acta legitima penitencia placuit eam ad conmunionem reconciliari. II. Pars. Gratian. Sed obicitur: Dauid cum Bersabee adulterium conmisit, et mortem Uriae machinatus est, et tamen Bersabee eandem postea duxit in uxorem. Sed in ueteri testamento multa permittebantur propter infirmitatem, que in euangelii perfectione eliminata sunt: sicut permittebatur quibuslibet dare libellum repudii, ne per odium funderetur sanguis innoxius. Quod postea Dominus in euangelio prohibuit, dicens uxorem a uiro non esse dimittendam, nisi causa fornicationis. Quedam permittebantur causa infirmitatis, et sacramenti futurorum: sicut Dominus permisit filiis Israel offerre animalia sibi in sacrificium, que in Egipto consueuerant inmolare demonibus, malens ea sibi offerri quam idolis, et ut essent illis sacramenta futurorum. Sic et Bersabee permissa est duci in uxorem, non magis causa suae infirmitatis, quam significatione futurorum. §. 1. Sed est alia ratio, qua uxor defuncti huic nubere non possit. Generaliter enim prohibentur uiri et mulieres frequenter matrimonia contrahere. Unde in conubio nuptiarum secundarum presbiteri interesse non debent, sicut in Neocesariensi Concilio [c. 3. et 7.] legitur:

C. VIII. Let the faith and manner of life of those who repeatedly take spouses shorten their penance.

Concerning those who repeatedly take wives and those women who marry more often, a definite period has indeed been established for them, but their manner of life and faith shorten the period.

§ 1. A priest, moreover, ought not to be present at the wedding feast of a second marriage, especially since he is commanded to assign penance for second marriages. What priest will there be who, for the sake of the banquet, consents to those marriages?

> C. VIII. Fides et conuersatio penitenciam adbreuiet eorum, qui frequenter ducunt uxores.
> De his, qui frequenter uxores ducunt, et de his, qui sepius nubunt, tempus quidem his manifestum constitutum est, sed conuersatio et fides eorum tempus adbreuiat. §. 1. Presbiterum uero secundarum nuptiarum conubio interesse non debere; maxime cum precipiatur secundis nuptiis penitenciam tribuere: quis erit presbiter, qui propter conuiuium illis consentiat nuptiis?

C. IX. According to the reckoning of truth, one who takes a second wife is proved to fornicate.

Likewise John Chrysostom, [that is, the author of the Incomplete Work on Matthew, homily XXXII]. For this reason even the Apostles commanded recourse to second marriages because of human incontinence. For although it is lawful to receive a second spouse according to the Apostle's precept, according to the reckoning of truth it is truly fornication. But because it is committed publicly and lawfully by God's permission, it becomes honorable fornication. Therefore he said well that Moses permitted this; he did not command it. For it is one thing to command and another to permit. For what we unwillingly permit we command, because we cannot completely prohibit the evil wills of human beings.

> C. IX. Secundum ueritatis rationem fornicari conuincitur qui secundam ducit uxorem.
> Item Iohannes Crisostomus. [id est auctor operis imperfecti in Matth., hom. XXXII.] Hac ratione et Apostoli preceperunt secundas adire nuptias propter incontinentiam hominum. Nam secundam quidem accipere secundum preceptum Apostoli licitum est, secundum ueritatis rationem uere fornicatio est. Sed cum permittente Deo publice et licenter conmittitur, fit honesta fornicatio. Propterea bene dixit, quia Moyses hoc permisit, non precepit. Aliud est enim precipere, aliud permittere. Quod enim permittimus nolentes precipimus, quia malas hominum uoluntates ad plenum prohibere non possumus.

C. X. To avoid the danger of fornication, second marriages are conceded.

Likewise Jerome, On Virgins. Just as he concedes marriage to virgins because of the danger of fornication and renders excusable that which is not sought for its own sake, so because of the same danger of fornication he concedes second marriages to widows. For it is better, although it be a second and a third husband, to know one man than many; that is, it is more tolerable to have been prostituted to one man than to many. Indeed, even that Samaritan woman in the Gospel, saying that she had a sixth husband, is reproved by the Lord because he is not her husband. For where there is a number of husbands, there a husband, who properly is one, ceases to exist. One rib at the beginning was turned into one wife. "And the two," he says, "shall be in one flesh"—not three or four, otherwise they are not two but many. Lamech, the first bloodthirsty man and murderer, divided one flesh among two wives; fratricide and second marriage were destroyed by the same punishment of the flood. Vengeance was taken sevenfold for the one and seventy-sevenfold for the other. As far as they differ in number, so far also in crime.

§ 1. How holy second marriage is, is shown by this: a twice-married man cannot be elected to the clergy. And the same Apostle says to Timothy: "Let a widow be selected who is not less than sixty years old and who was the wife of one husband." Here there is a common precept concerning those widows who are fed by the Church's alms, and therefore an age is prescribed, so that only those who can no longer work may receive the food of the poor. At the same time consider that a woman who had two husbands, even if she is old, decrepit, and needy, does not deserve to receive the Church's contributions. But if the bread of alms is taken away from her, how much more that bread which descended from heaven, of which whoever shall eat unworthily will be guilty of violating the body and blood of the Lord? Although some interpret these testimonies I set down above, in which widows are conceded permission to marry again if they wish, as concerning those widows whom the faith of Christ found in this state after they had lost their husbands.

PART III. GRATIAN. But that he said this as an exhortation to widowed continence, not in condemnation of second and subsequent marriages—which are established to be lawful by the authorities of many—is given to be understood from his own words. For he says to Pammachius, [in the Apology against Jovinian]:

> C. X. Ut uitetur periculum fornicationis, secunda matrimonia conceduntur.
> Item Ieronimus de uirginibus. Quomodo uirginibus fornicationis periculo concedit nuptias, et excusabile facit quod per se non appetitur, ita eodem fornicationis periculo concedit uiduis secunda matrimonia. Melius est enim, licet alterum et tertium, unum uirum nosse, quam plurimos, id est tollerabilius est uni homini prostitutam esse, quam multis. Siquidem et illa in euangelio Samaritana, sextum maritum habere se dicens, arguitur a Domino, quod non sit uir eius; ubi enim numerus maritorum est, ibi uir, qui proprie unus est, esse desistit. Una costa a principio in unam uxorem uersa est. "Et erunt," inquit, "duo in carne una," non tres, neque quatuor, alioquin non duo, sed plures. Primus Lamech sanguinarius atque homicida unam carnem in duas diuisit uxores; fratricidium et digamiam eadem cataclismi pena deleuit: de altero septies, de altero septuagies septies uindicatum est. Quantum distant in numero, tantum et in crimine. §. 1. Quam sancta sit digamia, hinc ostenditur, quod digamus ad clerum eligi non potest, et idem Apostolus ad Timotheum: "Vidua," inquit, "eligatur non minus sexaginta annorum, que fuerit unius uiri uxor." Hic commune preceptum de his uiduis est, que ecclesiae pascuntur elemosinis, et idcirco etas prescribitur, ut illae tantum accipiant pauperum cibos, que iam laborare non possunt. Simulque considera, quod que duos habuit uiros, etiamsi anus est, et decrepita, et egens, ecclesiae stipes non meretur accipere; si autem panis illi tollitur elemosinae, quanto magis, qui descendit de celo, quem qui indigne comederit, reus erit uiolati corporis et sanguinis Domini? Quamquam hec testimonia, que supra posui, in quibus uiduis conceditur, ut, si uelint, denuo nubant, quidam interpretantur super his uiduis, quas amissis maritis sic inuenerat fides Christi. III. Pars. Gratian. Verum hoc eum ad exhortationem uidualis continentiae, non in condempnationem secundarum et deinceps nuptiarum dixisse, quam multorum auctoritatibus constat licitas esse, ut ex uerbis eiusdem datur intelligi. Ait enim ad Pamachium: [in Apologetico contra Iouinianum]

C. XI. Neither second, third, nor subsequent marriages are to be condemned.

Let my detractors, I ask, open their ears and see that I have conceded second and third marriages in the Lord. I who did not condemn second and third marriages—could I have condemned a first marriage?

The same: § 1. I do not condemn the twice-married—indeed, not even the thrice-married, and, if it can be said, those married eight times.

The same: § 2. I now proclaim in a free voice that second marriage is not condemned in the Church—indeed, neither is third marriage—and that it is lawful to marry a fifth and sixth and subsequent husband just as it is to marry a second.

> C. XI. Nec secundae, nec tertiae, nec deinceps nuptiae sunt condempnandae.
> Aperiant, queso, aures obtrectatores mei, et uideant, me concessisse secundas et tercias nuptias in Domino. Qui secundas et tercias nuptias non dampnaui, primum potui dampnare matrimonium? Idem: §. 1. Non dampno digamos imo nec trigamos, et si dici potest, octogamos. Idem: §. 2. Ego nunc libera uoce proclamo, non dampnari in ecclesia digamiam, imo nec trigamiam, et ita licere quinto, et sexto, et ultra, quomodo et secundo marito nubere.

C. XII. Second marriages, like first marriages, are proved to be lawful.

Likewise Augustine, Book II Against the Adversary of the Law and the Prophets, [c. 11]. God joined male and female in nuptial chastity for the sake of propagating the race, and showed that second marriages, which are permitted also in the New Testament, are lawful.

> C. XII. Secunda coniugia, sicut et prima, licita esse probantur.
> Item Augustinus libro II. contra aduersarium legum et Prophetarum. [c. 11.] Deus masculum et feminam propagandi generis causa nuptiali castitate coniunxit, et secundas nuptias, que in nouo quoque testamento permittuntur, licitas esse monstrauit.

[C. XIII.]

The same, on the First Epistle to the Corinthians. "But if her husband shall have fallen asleep." He does not say first, second, or fourth, nor is it for us to define what the Apostle does not define. Hence I ought neither to condemn any marriages nor to remove from them the modesty associated with their number. But the Lord did not condemn the woman who had had seven husbands, nor does he say that she cannot exist in the resurrection, but only: "They shall neither marry nor be given in marriage." Hence, contrary to the sense of human modesty, I do not dare to say that they may marry as often as they wish, nor do I from my own heart condemn marriages of any number whatever. What is said to a once-married woman is said to every widow: "She will be happier if she remains thus."

>
> Idem super primam epistolam ad Chorinthios. "Quod si dormierit uir eius." Non dicit, primus uel secundus, uel quartus, nec nobis diffiniendum est quod non diffinit Apostolus. Unde nec ullas debeo dampnare nuptias, nec eis uerecundiam numerositatis auferre. Dominus autem septemuiram non dampnauit, nec dicit in resurrectione non posse esse, sed tantum: "Neque nubent, neque nubentur." Unde nec contra humanae uerecundiae sensum audeo dicere, ut quotiens uoluerint nubant, nec ex corde meo quotaslibet nuptias condempnare. Quod dicitur uniuirae, hoc omni uiduae: "Beatior erit, si sic permanserit."

Question II

GRATIAN. That no woman is to be compelled to marry someone is attested by Ambrose on the First Epistle to the Corinthians: "Let a widow marry whom she wishes, only in the Lord"; that is, let her marry the man whom she considers suitable for herself, because unwilling marriages are accustomed to have evil outcomes.

"Only in the Lord": that is, so that she may marry without suspicion of shamefulness, and may marry a man of her own religion.

> GRATIANUS. Quod autem aliqua non sit cogenda nubere alicui, Ambrosius testatur super primam epistolam ad Chorinthios: "Nubat uidua cui uult: tantum in Domino;" id est quem sibi aptum putauerit, illi nubat; quia inuitae nuptiae solent malos prouentus habere.
> "Tantum autem in Domino:" Id est, ut sine suspicione turpitudinis nubat, et uiro suae religionis nubat.

C. I. A girl is not compelled by her father's oath to marry a man to whom she never gave assent.

Likewise the judgment of Pope Urban. If it is established to be true what the envoys of Prince Jordan reported to us—namely, that he himself, under compulsion and grieving, betrothed his infant daughter, unwilling, weeping, and resisting with all her strength, to Rainald, son of Rodellus, while her mother and kindred did not assent but grieved greatly—then, because the authority of the canons and laws does not approve such betrothals, as is shown below, lest what we say seem too harsh to those ignorant of the laws and canons, we temper the judgment thus: if the prince, with the assent of the daughter, mother, and kindred, wishes to complete what was begun, we concede it. But if not, let our legate hear both parties; and if there is nothing further on the part of the aforesaid Rainald that would impede it, let him receive from Jordan himself an oath that these things stand as they have been stated. Then, following the decrees of the canons and laws, we henceforth do not prohibit his aforesaid daughter from marrying another man, if she wishes, only in the Lord.

> C. I. Iuramento patris non cogitur puella nubere, cui numquam assensum prebuit.
> Item Iudicium Urbani Pape. Si uerum esse constiterit, quod nobis legati Iordanis principis retulerunt, scilicet, quod ipse coactus et dolens filiam suam infantulam nolentem, flentem, et pro uiribus renitentem, non assentientibus, sed ualde dolentibus matre et parentela, Rainaldo Rodelli filio desponsauerit, quoniam canonum et legum auctoritas talia sponsalia (ut infra ostenditur) non approbat, ne ignorantibus leges et canones nimis durum quod dicimus uideatur, ita sententiam temperamus, ut, si princeps cum filiae, matris, et parentelae assensu id, quod ceptum est, perficere uoluerit, concedamus. Sin autem, legatus noster utrasque partes audiat, et si nichil fuerit ex parte supradicti Rainaldi amplius, quod inpediat, ab ipso Iordane sacramentum, quod ita constent hec, ut dicta sunt, accipiat, et nos canonum ac legum scita sequentes deinceps non prohibemus, quin alii uiro, si uoluerit, predicta filia eius tantum in Domino nubat.

[PALEA. C. II.

To the contrary, Pope Hormisdas writes to Bishop Eusebius. Your Holiness, venerable brother, asked us concerning an adult son whom his father wishes to contract a marriage: whether the father can do so without the will of the adult son. To this we say that, if the son does not consent in any way, it cannot be done. But concerning a son not yet adult, whose will cannot yet be discerned, the father can hand him over in marriage to whomever he wishes; and after the son reaches perfect age, he ought entirely to observe and fulfill it. We command that this, established by us, is to be maintained by all worshipers of the orthodox faith.]

> Econtra Hormisda Papa scribit Eusebio Episcopo. Tua sanctitas nos requisiuit, frater uenerande, de filio adulto, quem pater matrimonium contrahere uult, si sine uoluntate filii adulti facere potest. Ad quod dicimus, si aliquo modo non consentit filius, fieri non posse. Potest autem de filio nondum adulto, uoluntas cuius nondum discerni potest, pater eum, cui uult, in matrimonium tradere, et post, quam filius peruenerit ad perfectam etatem, omnino obseruare et adinplere debet. Hoc ab omnibus orthodoxae fidei cultoribus sancitum a nobis tenendum mandamus.]

C. III. Those whose body will be one ought also to have one mind; and therefore no unwilling woman is to be joined to anyone.

Likewise Sanctio, to the king of Aragon. Concerning the marriage of your granddaughter, whom, when necessity pressed, you confirmed under a pledge of faith that you would give to a certain knight, we decree, as equity dictates, that if she utterly refuses that man, as is said, and persists in the same exercise of her will, so that she entirely refuses that she will marry that man, you are in no way to compel her, unwilling and resisting, to be associated in marriage with that man. For those whose body is one ought also to have one mind, lest perhaps, when a virgin has been joined to someone unwillingly, contrary to the command of the Lord and the Apostle, she incur either the guilt of separation or the crime of fornication. It is established that the evil of this sin redounds upon the one who joined her against her will. The same is to be held concerning a man by an equal rule.

> C. III. Quorum unum futurum est corpus, unus debet esse et animus: atque ideo nulla inuita est copulanda alicui.
> Item Sanctio, Regi Aragonum. De neptis tuae coniugio, quam te cuidam militi daturum necessitatis instante articulo sub fidei pollicitatione firmasti, hoc equitate dictante decernimus, ut, si illa uirum illum, ut dicitur, omnino rennuit, et in eadem uoluntatis auctoritate persistit, ut uiro illi prorsus se deneget nupturam, nequaquam eam inuitam et renitentem eiusdem uiri cogas sociari coniugio. Quorum enim unum corpus est, unus debet esse et animus, ne forte, cum uirgo fuerit alicui inuita copulata contra Domini Apostolique preceptum aut reatum discidii, aut crimen fornicationis incurrat. Cuius uidelicet peccati malum in eum redundare constat, qui eam coniunxit inuitam. Quod pari tenore de uiro est sentiendum.

C. IV. It is not lawful for a man to desert a woman whom, after the dowry had been promised, he took as wife with public attestation.

Likewise Nicholas to Raduald, bishop of Porto, and John, bishop of Ficocle. King Lothair professes in his memorandum that he received Waldrada from her father and afterward admitted Hubert's sister. Here first inquire by diligent investigation; and if you find in every respect that the same glorious king received the aforesaid Waldrada after the dowry had been promised, before witnesses, according to the law and the rite by which nuptials are customarily celebrated, and that by public manifestation the same Waldrada was admitted into marriage with him, it remains for you to investigate why she was repudiated or Boso's daughter admitted. But because the same glorious king says that through fear he admitted Theutberga, so great a king ought not, through fear of one man, to have plunged himself into an immense precipice contrary to the divine precept. In this he certainly shows himself more blameworthy, because in it he placed the love of the world before the love of God, since not even killers of the body, impelling a person against justice, are to be feared. Therefore, when the same king has been convicted by his own declaration, we command you nothing other than that, relying upon canonical authority in our stead, you decide his case. But if it is by no means proved that Waldrada was his lawful wife or had been joined to our son Lothair by nuptials celebrated in the customary manner—namely, through the blessing of a priest—advise him not to bear it with distress that his lawful wife, if she appears innocent, is reconciled to him.

§ 1. Furthermore, I wish you to know that the aforesaid Theutberga appealed to the Apostolic See twice and three times and complained that she had been unjustly cast off by the aforesaid glorious king and compelled by force to fabricate a false crime against herself. For at the time of her appeal she sent a written petition to the Apostolic See, in which she made known that she had not yet confessed, but was being compelled to state a false crime against herself, adding further: "But if I am compelled further, know that, not from truth but from fear of death and zeal to escape—because I cannot do otherwise—I will say what they wish." Hence we command you that, when the same Theutberga comes to the appointed synod as we established, you treat her case by diligent examination. And if it is objected to her that she had confessed that she committed some crime, while, to the contrary, she proclaims that she suffered violence, or if she testifies that those judges were hostile to her, then renew that judgment according to the norm of equity, so that she is not oppressed by a weight of injustice.

GRATIAN. By these authorities it is clearly shown that no woman is to be joined to anyone except by her free will.

> C. IV. Non licet deserere uiro quam premissis dotibus in publica attestatione duxit uxorem.
> Item Nykolaus Radualdo Portuensi, et Iohanni Ficolensi Episcopis. Lotharius rex (in conmonitorio profitetur, Gualdradam se a patre accepisse, et sororem postmodum admisisse Huberti. Ubi primum diligenti inuestigatione inquirite, et si eundem gloriosum regem predictam Gualdradam premissis dotibus, coram testibus, secundum legem, et ritum, quo nuptiae celebrari solent, per omnia inueneritis accepisse, et publica manifestatione eadem Gualdrada in matrimonium ipsius admissa est, restat, ut perscrutemini, cur illa repudiata sit, uel filia Bosonis admissa. Sed quia idem gloriosus rex metu Thebergam se admisisse dicit, metu unius hominis non debuit tantus rex contra diuinum preceptum in inmane precipitium mergi. In hoc certe magis reprehensibilem se ostendit, in quo amorem Dei amori mundi postposuit, cum nec etiam occisores corporis sint timendi, contra iusticiam hominem inpellentes. Nichil itaque precipimus aliud uobis, manifestatione sua eodem rege conuicto, nisi ut secundum canonicam auctoritatem nostra uice freti causam illius diffiniatis. Si uero minime probatum fuerit Gualdradam uxorem fuisse legitimam, neque nuptiis more celebratis, per benedictionem scilicet sacerdotis, filio nostro Lothario extitisse coniunctam, suggerite illi, ut non moleste ferat legitimam sibi (si ipsa innocens apparuerit) reconciliari uxorem. §. 1. Preterea uos scire uolo, quia prefata Theberga apostolicam sedem bis et ter appellauit, et se a prefato glorioso rege questa est iniuste fuisse deiectam, et ui coactam falsum contra se conposuisse piaculum. Nam eo tempore appellationis suae libellum ad apostolicam sedem misit, in quo non quidem adhuc confessam, sed ut contra se falsum diceret crimen, cogi sese innotuit, insuper subiungens: "Quod si amplius conpulsa fuero, scitote, non ueritate, sed timore mortis et euadendi studio (quia aliter non possum) quod uoluerint dicam". Unde uobis precipimus, ut cum eadem Theberga ad condictam sinodum, sicut statuimus, aduenerit, causam eius diligenti examinatione tractetis, et, si ei obicitur, quod illa se crimen aliquod admisisse confessa fuisset, et econtra, illa uiolentiam se pertulisse proclamauerit, uel si inimicos iudices illos sibi fuisse testata fuerit, tunc illud renouetis iudicium secundum equitatis normam, ut iniusticiae mole non obprimatur. Gratian. His auctoritatibus euidenter ostenditur, quod nisi libera uoluntate nulla est copulanda alicui.

Question III

GRATIAN. That, after their parents' promise, they cannot marry others is shown by the authority of the Council of Elvira, [c. 54], in which it is said:

> GRATIANUS. Quod autem post parentum sponsionem aliis nubere non ualeant, auctoritate Elibertani Concilii [c. 54.] monstratur, qua dicitur:

SOLE CHAPTER. Concerning parents who break the pledge of a betrothal.

If any parents have broken the pledge of a betrothal, let them abstain from communion for a period of three years. But if the same bridegroom or bride have not been discovered in that grave crime, the parents will be excused. But if they have been involved in the same vice and have polluted themselves by consenting, let the foregoing judgment be observed.

GRATIAN. Behold, it is not lawful for parents to break the betrothals of their children. But this is to be understood of those betrothals that are contracted with the children's consent.

> C. UN. De parentibus, qui fidem frangunt sponsaliorum.
>
> Si qui parentes fidem fregerint sponsaliorum, triennii tempore a conmunione abstineant. Si uero idem sponsus uel sponsa in illo graui crimine non fuerint deprehensi, excusati erunt parentes. Si uero in eodem fuerint uicio, et polluerint se consentiendo, superior sentencia seruetur. Gratian. Ecce, quod non licet parentibus sponsalia filiorum suorum frangere. Verum hoc de illis intelligendum est, que illorum consensu contrahuntur.

Causa XXXII

CASE XXXII.

GRATIAN. A certain man, when he did not have a wife, joined to himself in marriage a certain prostitute who was sterile, the granddaughter of a freeborn man and the daughter of an estate-bound tenant. When her father wished to hand her over to another man, her grandfather joined her to this man solely on account of incontinence. Then this man, moved by repentance, began to seek children for himself from his own female slave. Afterward, having been convicted and punished for adultery, he asked a certain man to violate his wife by force, so that he might thereby be able to put her away. When this had been done, he joined a certain unbelieving woman to himself, yet under the condition that she would pass to the Christian religion. (Q. I.) Here it is asked first whether a prostitute is lawfully taken as wife. (Q. II.) Second, whether a woman who is taken on account of incontinence is to be called a wife. (Q. III.) Third, whose decision a woman is to follow: that of her free grandfather or that of her estate-bound father. (Q. IV.) Fourth, whether, while his wife is living, it is lawful for someone to seek children from a female slave. (Q. V.) Fifth, whether a woman who suffers force is proved to lose her chastity. (Q. VI.) Sixth, whether an adulterous man can put away an adulterous wife. (Q. VII.) Seventh, whether, while the woman put away is living, he can receive another. (Q. VIII.) Eighth, whether it is lawful for one of the faithful to take an unbelieving woman as wife under the aforesaid condition.

> GRATIANUS. Quidam, cum non haberet uxorem, quandam meretricem sibi coniugio copulauit, que erat sterilis, neptis ingenui, filia originarii; quam cum pater uellet alii tradere, auus huic eam copulauit, causa solius incontinentiae. Deinde hic, penitencia ductus, ex ancilla propria filios sibi querere cepit. Postea de adulterio conuictus et punitus quendam rogauit, ut ui uxorem suam opprimeret, ut sic eam dimittere posset, quo facto quandam infidelem sibi copulauit, ea tamen condicione, ut ad Christianam religionem transiret. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, an licite meretrix ducatur in uxorem? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an ea, que causa incontinenciae ducitur, sit coniux appellanda? (Qu. III.) Tercio, cuius arbitrium aliqua sequatur, an liberi aui, an originarii patris? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, si uiuente uxore liceat alicui ex ancilla filios querere? (Qu. V.) Quinto, si ea, que uim patitur, pudicitiam amittere conprobetur? (Qu. VI.) Sexto, si adulter adulteram possit dimittere? (Qu. VII.) Septimo, si uiuente dimissa aliam possit accipere? (Qu. VIII.) Octauo, si infidelem sub premissa condicione licet alicui fidelium in coniugem ducere?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. That a prostitute ought not to be taken as wife is proved by many authorities and reasons. For a woman who is proved guilty of adultery ought not to be retained in the fellowship of marriage unless after penance has been completed. Hence John Chrysostom, [that is, the author of the Incomplete Work, homily XXXII], says on Matthew c. 9:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem meretrix in coniugem duci non debeat, multis auctoritatibus et rationibus probatur. Illa enim, que adulterii rea conuincitur, nisi post peractam penitenciam in coniugii consortio retineri non debet. Unde Iohannes Crisostomus [id est auctor operis imperfecti hom. XXXII.] ait super Mattheum c. 9:

C. I. One who refuses to put away his adulterous wife is a patron of shamefulness.

Just as one who puts away a chaste woman is cruel and unjust, so one who retains a prostitute is foolish and unjust. For one who conceals his wife's crime is a patron of shamefulness.

C. I. Patronus turpitudinis est qui uxorem suam adulteram dimittere noluerit.

Sicut crudelis et iniquus est qui castam dimittit, sic fatuus est et iniustus qui retinet meretricem. Patronus enim turpitudinis est, qui celat crimen uxoris.

C. II. A man is to put away his wife for the cause of fornication, but is not to take another.

Likewise Jerome, [in the commentary on Matthew c. 19]. The Lord says in the Gospel: "Whoever puts away his wife, except on account of fornication, and takes another, commits adultery; and he who takes the woman put away commits adultery." Fornication alone is that which conquers affection for a wife. Indeed, since she has divided one flesh into another and has separated herself from her husband by fornication, she ought not to be retained, lest she also bring her husband under a curse, as Scripture says: "He who retains an adulteress is foolish and impious." Therefore, wherever there is fornication or suspicion of fornication, the wife is freely put away. And because it could happen that someone might make a false accusation against an innocent woman and, for the sake of a second marital union, impute a crime to the former union, he is commanded to put away the first wife in such a manner that, while the first is living, he does not have a second.

C. II. Causa fornicationis uir dimittat uxorem, non tamen alteram ducat.

Item Ieronimus. [in comm. ad c. 19. Matth.] Ait Dominus in euangelio: "Quicumque dimiserit uxorem, nisi ob fornicationem, et aliam duxerit, mechatur, et qui dimissam duxerit, mechatur." Sola fornicatio est, que uxoris uincit affectum; imo, cum illa unam carnem in aliam diuiserit, et se fornicatione a marito separauerit, non debet teneri, ne uirum quoque sub maledicto faciat, dicente scriptura: "Qui tenet adulteram stultus et inpius est." Ubicumque est igitur fornicatio uel fornicationis suspicio, libere uxor dimittitur. Et quia poterat accidere, ut aliquis calumpniam faceret innocenti, et ob secundam copulam nuptialem ueteri copulae crimen inpingeret, sic priorem dimittere iubetur uxorem, ut prima uiuente secundam non habeat.

C. III. Only a husband's fornication stains his wife.

The same, on Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians, [1 Cor. 6, in the Ordinary Gloss]. Whatever sins a man placed in marriage commits do not defile his own wife; but fornication pollutes even the wife, so that she is no longer lawful for her husband, but adulterous.

> C. III. Sola uiri fornicatio uxorem maculat.
> Idem in epistola Pauli ad Corinthios. [1. c. 6. in glossa ordinaria] In coniugio quis positus quecumque peccata fecerit, non propriam infuscant coniugem; sed fornicatio etiam uxorem coinquinat, ut iam non sit uiro suo licita, sed adultera.

C. IV. One who refuses to put away his adulterous wife is to perform penance for two years if he has rendered her the marital due.

Likewise John Chrysostom. If anyone has found his wife adulterous and thereafter has resolved to have her in marriage, let him perform penance for two years because he has been mingled with an adulteress who has not yet been purified of her crime; or let him abstain from marriage with her until the satisfaction of penance for her crime has been fulfilled, because after satisfaction through penance she does not deserve to be called an adulteress. Similarly, if a wife has found her husband adulterous, she is not judged by unequal standards.

PART II. GRATIAN. It is to be understood: unless the woman should wish to depart from adultery. In that case a man can receive his wife without bringing any danger upon her. Hence Pope Pelagius to Melleus the subdeacon:

> C. IV. Qui uxorem suam dimittere noluerit adulteram, duobus annis peniteat, si ei debitum reddiderit.
> Item Iohannes Crisostomus. Si quis uxorem suam inuenerit adulteram, et postea deinceps placuerit habere eam in matrimonio, duobus annis peniteat ideo, quia cum adultera mixtus sit, que adhuc crimine suo non est purgata, aut abstineat se a matrimonio eius, donec expleatur satisfactio criminis penitenciae suae, ideo, quia post satisfactionem penitenciae non meretur uocari adultera. Similiter, si uxor inuenerit uirum suum adulterum, non ad inparia iudicatur. II. Pars. Gratian. Subauditur, nisi ab adulterio mulier uoluerit recedere, quo casu uxorem suam uir recipere potest, nullum periculum ei illaturus. Unde Pelagius Papa Melleo Subdiacono:

C. V. After penance for adultery, a man can receive his wife.

Concerning Benedict also, whom you reported to have carried off another man's wife with a criminal spirit and hitherto to presume to detain her in his own company: if this is the truth of the matter, we command Your Experience not to delay in punishing him strictly together with the adulteress herself, to shave them and separate them from one another, and to cause him to migrate without delay to Lucius the defender on the patrimony in the province of Apulia. But as to her, if perhaps her husband wishes to receive her without any deceit, let him receive her under safeguard through your ordinance, provided that he will bring no danger upon her if she commits nothing similar hereafter. But if he is altogether unwilling to receive her, station her by prudent arrangement in some other place in which it is not lawful for her to live wickedly.

> C. V. Post penitenciam adulterii uxorem suam uir recipere potest.

De Benedicto quoque, quem uxorem alienam facinoroso spiritu indicasti sustulisse, et in suum hactenus presumere detinere consortium, si hoc rerum ueritas habet, iubemus experientiae tuae, ut eum cum ipsa quoque adultera districte non differas mactare, et caluatos ab inuicem separare, et illum quidem ad Lucium defensorem in Apuliae prouinciae patrimonium sine dilatione migrare; illam uero, siquidem maritus suus sine aliquo dolo recipere forte uoluerit, tua ordinatione sub cautela recipiat, nullum ei dumtaxat de cetero simile conmittenti periculum illaturus. Si uero omnino eam recipere noluerit, in alium quendam locum, in quo ei non liceat male uiuere, prouida eam dispensatione constitue.

C. VI. One who renders the marital due to an adulteress is to perform penance for three years.

Likewise from the Penitential of Theodore. If anyone knows his wife to be an adulteress and is unwilling to put her away but wishes to have her in marriage, let him perform penance for three years, and let him abstain from her for as long as she performs penance.

C. VI. Qui adulterae reddit debitum tribus annis peniteat.

Item ex Penitenciali Theodori. Si quis uxorem suam scit adulteram, et non uult dimittere eam, sed in matrimonio habere, tres annos peniteat, et quamdiu illa penitet, abstineat se ab illa.

C. VII. After adultery has been purged by penance, reconciliation of the marriage can take place.

Likewise Augustine to Pollentius, Book II On Adulterous Marriages, [c. 6]. But as to what seems harsh to you—that after adultery a spouse should be reconciled—if faith is present, it will not be harsh. For why do we still reckon as adulterers those whom we believe to have been washed by baptism or healed by penance? In the old law of God these crimes were cleansed by no sacrifices; in the law of the New Testament they are cleansed without sacrifice. And therefore at that time it was altogether prohibited to receive a wife contaminated by another, although David, a prefigurer of the New Testament, received without hesitation Saul's daughter, whom the woman's father had separated from him and given to another. But now, after Christ said to the adulteress, "Neither will I condemn you; go, and from now on sin no more," who does not understand that a husband ought to forgive what he sees that the Lord of both has forgiven? And that he ought no longer to call adulterous a woman whose crime, after she repented, has been blotted out by God?

C. VII. Adulterio purgato per penitenciam potest fieri reconciliatio coniugii.

Item Augustinus ad Polentium [de adulterinis coniugiis] libro II. [c. 6.] Quod autem tibi durum uidetur, ut post adulterium reconcilietur coniux, si fides adsit, non erit durum. Cur enim adhuc deputamus adulteros, quos credimus uel baptismate ablutos, uel penitencia esse sanatos? Hec crimina in ueteri lege Dei nullis sacrificiis mundabantur, que in lege noui testamenti sine mundatione mundantur, et ideo tunc omnino prohibitum est ab alio contaminatam accipere uxorem, quamuis Dauid Saulis filiam, quam pater eiusdem mulieris ab eo separatam dederat alteri, tamquam noui testamenti prefigurator sine cunctatione receperit. Nunc autem, posteaquam Christus ait adulterae: "Nec ego te condempnabo; uade, deinceps noli peccare:" quis non intelligat maritum debere ignoscere quod uidet ignouisse Dominum amborum? nec iam se debere adulteram dicere, cuius penitentis crimen deletum est a Deo?

C. VIII. Concerning the same matter.

The same, On Adulterous Marriages. Even after adulteries have been perpetrated and purged, reconciliation of the marriage will be neither shameful nor difficult where it is not doubted that remission of sins occurs through the keys of the kingdom of heaven—not so that, after divorce from her husband—that is, marital separation—an adulteress may be called back, but so that, after fellowship with Christ, she may not be called an adulteress.

> C. VIII. De eodem.
> Idem de adulterinis coniugiis. Non erit turpis neque difficilis etiam post patrata atque purgata adulteria reconciliatio coniugii, ubi per claues regni celorum non dubitatur fieri remissio peccatorum; non ut post uiri diuortium adultera reuocetur, sed ut post Christi consortium adultera non uocetur.

C. IX. When the vice of fornication is excluded, the virtue of chastity is taken on.

Likewise Ambrose, [Book II, On Cain and Abel, c. 4]. When wickedness is renounced, virtue is immediately taken on. For departure from malice works an entrance of virtue, and by the same endeavor by which crime is excluded, innocence is joined.

> C. IX. Cum fornicationis uicium excluditur, castitatis uirtus asciscitur.
> Item Ambrosius. [l. II. de Cain et Abel, c. 4.] Cum renunciatur inprobitati, statim asciscitur uirtus. Egressus enim maliciae uirtutis operatur ingressum, eodemque studio, quo crimen excluditur, innocentia copulatur.

C. X. One who returns to truth by repenting is not held deceitful before God.

Likewise Gregory, [homily XXIX on the Gospels]. Before the merciful judge, indeed, not even one who returns to truth after lying will be held deceitful, because almighty God, when he willingly receives our penance, himself conceals by his judgment that in which we erred.

GRATIAN. But if she has chosen to persevere in adultery, the husband will be held a patron of shamefulness and guilty of pandering unless he wishes to bring an accusation of adultery against her. Hence in Book VIII of the Code, under the title On Adultery and Illicit Intercourse, Emperors Severus and Antoninus say: "Those who have detained in marriage a wife apprehended in adultery contract the crime of pandering, not those who held a wife suspected of adultery."

§ 1. This does not obtain for women. For they are not permitted to bring charges of adultery against their husbands. Hence in the same book and title the same Emperor says: "The Julian law declares that women do not have an accusation of adultery in a public trial, although they may wish to complain of a violated marriage. Although it conferred upon males, by the right of a husband, the faculty of accusing, it did not confer the same privilege upon women."

§ 2. Therefore, if, as is gathered from these authorities, no one is permitted to retain an adulteress, much less will it be lawful to take in marriage a woman for whose chastity no hope is held. For fidelity and the sacrament ought to be preserved between spouses; when these are absent, they are called not spouses but adulterers. Hence Augustine writes against Julian in Book I:

> C. X. Non habetur fallax apud Deum qui penitendo ad ueritatem reuertitur.

Item Gregorius. [hom. XXIX. Euangel.] Apud misericordem namque iudicem nec ille fallax habebitur, qui ad ueritatem reuertitur, etiam postquam mentitur, quia omnipotens Deus, dum libenter nostram penitenciam suscipit, ipse suo iudicio hoc, quod errauimus, abscondit. Gratian. Quod si in adulterio perseuerare elegerit, patronus turpitudinis et lenocinii reus maritus habebitur, nisi eam adulterii ream facere uoluerit. Unde in VIII. libro Codicis titulo de adulterio et stupro Inp. Seuerus et Antoninus: "Crimen lenocinii contrahunt qui deprehensam in adulterio uxorem in matrimonio detinuerunt, non qui suspectam habuerunt adulteram." §. 1. Hoc in mulieribus non obtinet. Non enim eis permittitur maritos suos adulterii reos facere. Unde in libro, et titulo eodem, idem Imp.: "publico iudicio non habere mulieres adulterii accusationem, quamuis de matrimonio uiolato queri uelint, lex Iulia declarat, que cum masculis iure mariti accusandi facultatem detulisset, non idem feminis priuilegium detulit." §. 2. Si ergo, ut ex his auctoritatibus colligitur, adulteram retinere nulli permittitur, multo minus in coniugium duci licebit cuius pudicitiae nulla spes habetur. Debet enim inter coniuges fides seruari et sacramentum, que cum defuerint, non coniuges, sed adulteri appellantur. Unde Augustinus scribit contra Iulianum libro I:

C. XI. The truth of marriage does not consist in the mingling of male and female.

The truth of marriage does not lie solely, as you rave, in the mingling of male and female, although without it marriage cannot procreate children. Rather, there are other things properly pertaining to marriage by which marriages are distinguished from adulteries, such as fidelity to the marital bed, care for procreating children in an ordered manner, and—the greatest difference—the good use of an evil, that is, the good use of the concupiscence of the flesh, which good adulterers use badly.

GRATIAN. These are the goods by which marriages are commended and distinguished from unlawful use.

PART III. But, to the contrary, Ambrose appears to disapprove marriages, saying:

C. XI. Veritas nuptiarum non consistit in conmixtione maris et feminae.

Non in sola, ut deliras, conmixtione maris et feminae nuptiarum ueritas est, quamuis sine illa nuptiae filios procreare non possint. Sed alia sunt proprie ad nuptias pertinentia, quibus ab adulteriis nuptiae decernuntur, sicuti est tori coniugalis fides, et cura ordinate filios procreandi, et (que maxima differentia est) bonus usus mali, hoc est bonus usus concupiscentiae carnis, quo bono adulteri male utuntur. Gratian. Hec sunt bona, quibus conmendantur, et ab illicito usu discernuntur. III. Pars. Contra uero Ambrosius inprobare nuptias uidetur, dicens:

C. XII. By this authority first and second marriages appear to be disapproved.

Marriages fill the earth; virginity fills paradise. But this also must be considered—at least according to the Hebrew truth—that Scripture, after the works of each day had been completed on the first, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth day, said: "And God saw that it was good," but on the second day omitted this altogether, leaving us the understanding that the double number, which divides from unity and prefigures the covenants of marriage, is not good. Hence also in Noah's ark all the animals whatsoever that enter two by two are unclean. The odd number is clean, although in the double number another sacrament is also understood: that second marriage is not approved even among beasts and unclean birds. For the unclean enter two by two, but the clean by sevens, so that after the flood Noah would have something in an odd number that he could immediately offer to God.

GRATIAN. But this refers to an exhortation, not to the necessity of observing virginity. Hence the same Ambrose says, [in the book Exhortation to Virgins]:

> C. XII. Primae ac secundae nuptiae hac auctoritate inprobari uidentur.
> Nuptiae terram replent, uirginitas paradisum. Sed et hoc intuendum est dumtaxat iuxta hebraicam ueritatem, quod scriptura in primo, et tertio, et quarto, et quinto, et sexto die expletis operibus singulorum dierum dixit: "Et uidit Deus, quia bonum est;" in secundo die hoc omnino subtraxit, nobis intelligentiam derelinquens non esse bonum dupplicem numerum, qui ab unione diuidat, et prefiguret federa nuptiarum. Unde et in arca Noe omnia animalia, quecumque bina ingrediuntur, inmunda sunt. Inpar numerus mundus est, quamquam in duplici numero intelligatur et aliud sacramentum, quod nec in bestiis quidem, et inmundis auibus digamia conprobata sit: bina enim et bina ingrediuntur inmunda, et septena, que munda sunt; ut haberet Noe post diluuium, quod inpari numero statim Deo posset offerre. Gratian. Verum hoc ad exhortationem, non ad necessitatem obseruandae uirginitatis refertur. Unde idem Ambrosius ait: [in libro exhortationis ad uirgines]

C. XIII. Virginity is advised by counsel; it is not commanded by authority.

Integrity of body is to be sought by us. I advise it as counsel; I do not command it by authority. For virginity alone is that which can be advised but cannot be commanded; it is a matter more of a vow than of a precept.

PART IV. GRATIAN. Since, therefore, as we have said, there is no hope of fidelity in a prostitute and no certainty of chastity, it is evident that she is not to be taken in marriage.

§ 1. But it is objected: although Rahab of Jericho was a prostitute, she was nevertheless joined in marriage to a prince of the tribe of Judah, from whom Christ also afterward deigned to be born. Hosea also, the first of the twelve Prophets, at the Lord's command bought a prostitute for a cor of barley and associated her with himself in marriage. But it is one thing to take a prostitute, or to retain an adulteress, whom you adorn with chastity and modesty by your manner of life; it is another to have one of them whom you are able by no agreement to recall from the wantonness of her flesh. For the latter is utterly prohibited; the former is read to have been done laudably. Hence Jerome on Hosea, Book I, [on c. 1]:

> C. XIII. Virginitas ex consilio suadetur, non ex inperio precipitur.
> Integritas corporis expetenda a nobis est, quam ego pro consilio suadeo, non pro inperio precipio. Sola est enim uirginitas, que suaderi potest, inperari non potest: res magis est uoti, quam precepti. IV. Pars. Gratian. Cum ergo in meretrice, ut diximus, nulla sit spes fidei, nulla sit certitudo pudicitiae, patet, quod non est in coniugium ducenda. §. 1. Sed obicitur: Raab Hierichontina, quamuis esset meretrix, tamen principi de tribu Iuda coniugio copulata est, de qua etiam Christus postea nasci dignatus est. Osee quoque, duodecim Prophetarum primus, ex precepto Domini choro hordei meretricem emit, quam sibi in coniugio sociauit. Sed aliud est meretricem ducere, uel adulteram retinere, quam tua consuetudine, castitate et pudicitia exornes: atque aliud aliquam habere earum, quam nullo pacto a luxu carnis suae reuocare ualeas. Hoc enim penitus prohibetur: illud laudabiliter factum legitur. Unde Ieronimus super Osee libro I.:[ad c. 1.]

C. XIV. It is not a sin to take a prostitute as wife.

The prophet Hosea is not to be blamed if he converted the prostitute whom he took to chastity; rather, he is to be praised because he made a good woman from an evil one. For one who remains good is not polluted if he is associated with an evil person; rather, one who is evil is turned to good if that person follows the examples of the good. From this we understand that the Prophet, when joined to a prostitute, did not lose chastity, but that the prostitute assumed the chastity which she did not have before.

> C. XIV. Non est peccatum meretricem ducere in uxorem.
> Non est culpandus Osee propheta si meretricem, quam duxit, ad pudicitiam conuertit: sed potius laudandus, quod ex mala bonam fecit. Non enim qui bonus permanet polluitur, si societur malo: sed qui malus est in bonum uertitur, si boni exempla sectetur. Ex quo intelligimus, non Prophetam perdidisse pudicitiam fornicariae copulatum, sed fornicariam assumpsisse pudicitiam, quam antea non habebat.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. That a woman who is taken solely on account of incontinence is not a wife appears capable of proof from this: marriage was instituted by God for the sake of propagation, not for satisfying lust. For this was the blessing of marriage: "Increase and multiply." Hence Ambrose on Luke, [Book I, on c. 1]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem non sit uxor que sola causa incontinentiae ducitur, hinc uidetur posse probari, quia coniugium propagationis, non explendae libidinis causa a Deo institutum est. Hec namque fuit benedictio coniugii: "Crescite et multiplicamini." Unde Ambrosius super Lucam: [l. I. ad c. 1.]

C. I. Childbearing is women's sole cause for marrying.

It is a shame for women not to have the rewards of marriage, for whom this is the sole cause of marrying.

The same, [at the beginning of Book II]. § 1. Since childbearing is the reward of marriage and the grace of nuptials for women, it is no slight reason that Mary's virginity should deceive the prince of the world.

GRATIAN. Therefore, those who are joined to one another not for the sake of procreating offspring but of satisfying lust appear not so much spouses as fornicators. Hence Jerome also, [on Ephesians c. 5]:

> C. I. Partus feminarum est eis sola causa nubendi.
> Pudor est feminis nuptiarum premia non habere, quibus hec sola nubendi causa est. Idem: [lib. 2. in princ.] §. 1. Cum coniugii premium et gratia nuptiarum partus sit feminarum, non mediocris causa est, ut uirginitas Mariae falleret principem mundi. Gratian. Qui ergo non procreandae causa sobolis, sed explendae libidinis sibi inuicem copulantur, non tam coniuges quam fornicarii uidentur. Hinc etiam Ieronimus: [ad c. 5. epistolae ad Ephesios]

C. II. Those who are not joined according to the precepts of Christ are called not spouses but adulterers.

Just as not every congregation of heretics can be called the Church of Christ, nor is Christ their head, so not every marriage in which a woman is not joined to her own husband according to the precepts of Christ can rightly be called a marriage, but rather adultery.

PART II. GRATIAN. To these things it is answered thus: The first institution of marriage was made in paradise, so that the bed might be undefiled and the nuptials honorable, from which women would conceive without ardor and give birth without pain. The second was made outside paradise to eliminate unlawful movement, so that weakness, prone to fall into shamefulness, might be received by the honorable state of marriage. Hence the Apostle, writing to the Corinthians, says: "Because of fornication, let each man have his own wife, and each woman her own husband." From this cause, therefore, it happens that married persons owe themselves to one another and cannot deny themselves to one another. Hence the Apostle says: "Do not defraud one another, except perhaps by consent and for a time, so that you may more readily devote yourselves to prayer; and return again to the same thing, lest Satan tempt you. But I say this because of your incontinence." Therefore, those who because of incontinence are admonished to return to natural use are clearly not commanded to mingle solely for the procreation of children.

§ 1. Nevertheless, marriages are not therefore judged evil. For what is done apart from the intention of begetting is not an evil of marriage, but is venial because of the good of marriage, which is threefold: namely, fidelity, offspring, and sacrament. Hence Augustine, On the Good of Marriage, [c. 6]:

> C. II. Non coniuges, sed adulteri uocantur, qui non secundum precepta Christi iunguntur.
> Sicut non omnis congregatio hereticorum ecclesia Christi dici potest, nec caput eorum Christus; sic non omne matrimonium, quo non uiro suo secundum precepta Christi coniungitur, rite coniugium appellari potest, sed magis adulterium. II. Pars. Gratian. His ita respondetur: Prima institutio coniugii in paradyso facta est, ut esset inmaculatus thorus, et honorabiles nuptiae, ex quibus sine ardore conciperent, sine dolore parerent. Secunda propter illicitum motum eliminandum extra paradysum facta est, ut infirmitas, prona in ruinam turpitudinis, honestate exciperetur coniugii. Unde Apostolus scribens ad Chorinthios ait: "Propter fornicationem unusquisque suam uxorem, et unaqueque uirum suum habeat." Ex hac itaque causa fit, ut coniugati se sibi inuicem debeant, nec se sibi negare possint. Unde Apostolus: "Nolite fraudare inuicem, nisi forte ex consensu, et ad tempus, ut expeditius uacetis orationi, et iterum reuertimini in id ipsum, ne temptet uos sathanas. Hoc autem dico propter incontinentiam uestram." Qui ergo propter incontinentiam in naturalem usum redire monentur, patet, quod non propter filiorum procreationem tantum misceri iubentur. §. 1. Non tamen ideo nuptiae malae iudicantur. Quod enim preter intentionem generandi fit, non est nuptiarum malum, sed est ueniale propter nuptiarum bonum, quod est tripertitum; fides uidelicet, proles, et sacramentum. Unde Augustinus de bono coniugali: [c. 6.]

C. III. The immoderate use of married persons is not an evil of marriage, but is venial because of the good of marriage.

Whatever immoderate, immodest, or sordid thing married persons conduct between themselves is a vice of human beings, not a fault of marriage. Even in the immoderate exaction of the carnal due itself, which the Apostle does not command them by authority but concedes by indulgence, so that they may mingle with one another even apart from the cause of procreation, although depraved morals impel them to such intercourse, marriage nevertheless defends them from adultery or fornication. Nor is that admitted because of marriage; rather, it is forgiven because of marriage. Therefore, married persons owe to one another not only fidelity in the mingling of their sex for the sake of procreating children—which is the first society of the human race in this mortality—but also a kind of mutual servitude for receiving one another's weakness, in order to avoid unlawful intercourse, so that, even if perpetual continence pleases one of them, it cannot occur except by the other's consent.

PART III. GRATIAN. But the presence of the Holy Spirit is not given during the time in which marital acts are performed. Hence Jerome on Matthew:

> C. III. Inmoderatus usus coniugatorum non est nuptiarum malum, sed est ueniale propter nuptiarum bonum.
> Quicquid inter se coniugati inmodestum, inuerecundum, sordidum gerunt, uicium est hominum, non culpa nuptiarum. Iam in ipsa quoque inmoderata exactione debiti carnalis, quam eis non secundum inperium precepit, sed secundum ueniam concedit Apostolus, ut etiam preter causam procreandi sibi misceantur, etsi eos praui mores ad talem concubitum inpellunt, nuptiae tamen ab adulterio seu fornicatione defendunt. Neque illud propter nuptias admittitur, sed propter nuptias ignoscitur. Debent ergo sibi coniugati non solum ipsius sexus sui conmiscendi fidem liberorum procreandorum causa (que prima est humani generis in ista mortalitate societas), uerum etiam infirmitatis inuicem excipiendae, ad illicitos concubitus euitandos, mutuam quodammodo seruitutem, ut, etsi alteri eorum continentia perpetua placeat, nisi ex alterius consensu non possit. III. Pars. Gratian. Non autem datur presentia S. Spiritus tempore, quo coniugales actus geruntur. Unde Ieronimus super Mattheum:

C. IV. The presence of the Holy Spirit is not given during the time in which marital acts are performed.

Lawful marriages indeed lack sin; nevertheless, at that time in which marital acts are performed, the presence of the Holy Spirit will not be given, even if one who attends to the duty of generation appears to be a prophet. But there are also many other things in which human power alone suffices for itself, and the matter neither needs nor is fitting for the presence of the Holy Spirit to attend.

GRATIAN. Therefore, just as such intercourse is not fornicatory but lawful because of the good of marriage, so also that union about which the question is asked is not fornicatory but lawful because of the good of marriage. Likewise, as Augustine says in the book On the Good of Marriage, [c. 14]:

> C. IV. Non datur presentia S. Spiritus tempore, quo coniugales actus geruntur.
> Conubia legitima carent quidem peccato, nec tamen tempore illo, quo coniugales actus geruntur, presentia S. Spiritus dabitur, etsi propheta esse uideatur qui offitio generationis obsequitur. Sed et alia plura sunt, in quibus sufficit sibi sola uis humana, et neque res indiget, neque decet adesse presentiam S. Spiritus. Gratian. Sicut ergo talis concubitus non est fornicarius, sed propter bonum coniugii licitus: sic et coniunctio illa, de qua queritur, non est fornicaria, sed propter bonum coniugii licita. Item, sicut Augustinus ait in libro de bono coniugali: [c. 14.]

[C. V.]

"Concubines taken for a time do not make their concubinage just, not even if they have intercourse for the sake of children."

PART IV. [GRATIAN.] Thus, to the contrary, it is given to be understood concerning those who are joined to one another with marital affection that, even if they come together not for the sake of procreating children but of satisfying lust, they are not for that reason called fornicators, but spouses. This same thing is proved by the authority of Augustine in the book On the Good of Marriage, [c. 5]:

> [C. V.]

"Concubinae ad tempus adhibitae, nec etiamsi causa filiorum concumbant, iustum faciunt concubinatum suum." IV. Pars. [Gratian.] Sic econtrario datur intelligi de his, qui coniugali affectu sibi copulantur, quod etsi non causa procreandorum filiorum, sed explendae libidinis conueniunt, non ideo fornicarii, sed coniuges appellantur. Probatur hoc idem auctoritate Augustini in libro de bono coniugali: [c. 5.]

C. VI. Those who are joined to one another solely on account of incontinence are spouses.

It is customary to ask: when a male and female, neither he the husband nor she the wife of another, are joined to one another not for the sake of procreating children but solely for intercourse on account of incontinence, with this pledge between them—that neither he will do this with another woman nor she with another man—are these to be called nuptials? And perhaps it can indeed not absurdly be called a marriage if this has pleased them until the death of one of them, and if they have nevertheless not avoided the generation of offspring, although they were not joined for that cause, so that they either do not wish children to be born to them or employ some evil work so that they are not born. But if either both or one of these things is absent, I do not find how we can call these nuptials. For if a man has taken some woman to himself for a time, until he finds another worthy of his honors or his resources whom he may take in marriage, he is an adulterer by that very intention—not with the woman whom he desires to find, but with this woman with whom he lies in such a way that he does not have marital fellowship with her.

C. VI. Coniuges sunt qui causa solius incontinentiae sibi inuicem copulantur.

Solet queri, cum masculus et femina, nec ille maritus, nec illa uxor alterius, sibimet non filiorum procreandorum, sed pro incontinentia solius concubitus causa copulantur, ea fide media, ut nec ille cum altera, nec illa cum altero id faciat, utrum nuptiae sint uocandae? Et potest quidem fortasse non absurde hoc appellari conubium, si usque ad mortem alicuius eorum id inter eos placuerit, et prolis generationem, quamuis non ea causa coniuncti sint, non tamen uitauerint, ut uel nolint sibi nasci filios, uel etiam opere aliquo malo agant ne nascantur. Ceterum, si uel utrumque, uel unum horum desit, non inuenio, quemadmodum has nuptias appellare possimus. Etenim si aliquam sibi ad tempus adhibuerit, donec aliam dignam honoribus, uel suis facultatibus inueniat, quam in coniugio ducat, animo ipso adulter est, nec cum illa, quam cupit inuenire, sed cum ista, cum qua sic cubat, ut cum ea non habeat maritale consortium.

C. VII. Those who procure poisons of sterility are fornicators, not spouses.

The same, On Marriage and Concupiscence, [Book I, c. 15]. Sometimes this lustful cruelty, or cruel lust, reaches such a point that it even procures poisons of sterility and, if these have accomplished nothing, by some means extinguishes or expels the fetuses conceived within the womb, willing that its offspring perish before living, or, if it was living in the womb, that it be killed before being born. Assuredly, if both are such, they are not spouses; and if they were such from the beginning, they came together not by marriage but rather by illicit intercourse. But if both are not such, I dare to say that either she is in some manner the prostitute of her husband, or he the adulterer of his wife.

PART V. GRATIAN. Concerning those who procure abortion, it is asked whether they are judged murderers or not. Augustine in the book Questions on Exodus, [question LXXX], says:

C. VII. Fornicarii sunt non coniuges, qui sterilitatis uenena procurant.

Idem de nuptiis et concupiscentiis. [lib. I. c. 15.] Aliquando eo usque peruenit hec libidinosa crudelitas, uel libido crudelis, ut etiam sterilitatis uenena procuret, et, si nichil ualuerit, conceptos fetus aliquo modo intra uiscera exstinguat aut fundat, uolendo suam prolem prius interire quam uiuere; aut, si in utero uiuebat, occidi ante, quam nasci. Prorsus, si ambo tales sint, coniuges non sunt, et, si ab initio tales fuerunt, non sibi per conubium, sed per stuprum pocius conuenerunt. Si autem ambo tales non sunt, audeo dicere, aut illa quodammodo est mariti meretrix, aut ille adulter uxoris. V. Pars. Gratian. De his, qui aborsum procurant, queritur, an iudicentur homicidae, uel non? Augustinus in libro questionum Exodi [quest. LXXX.] ait:

C. VIII. One who procures abortion before the soul is infused into the body is not a murderer.

But in not willing unformed offspring to pertain to homicide, he certainly did not reckon as a human being that which is carried in the womb in such a state. Here the question concerning the soul is customarily discussed: whether whatever is not formed can be understood not yet to be ensouled, and therefore whether it is not homicide, because it cannot be said to have been deprived of a soul if it did not have a soul.

Likewise: § 1. If that unformed offspring indeed already existed but was still ensouled in some unformed manner—since the great question concerning the soul is not to be rushed by the unexamined rashness of a judgment—the law therefore did not wish it to pertain to homicide, because it cannot yet be called a living soul in a body that lacks sensation.

C. VIII. Non est homicida qui aborsum procurat ante, quam anima corpori sit infusa.

Quod uero non formatum puerperium ad homicidium pertinere noluit, profecto nec hominem deputauit, quod tale in utero geritur. Hic de anima questio solet agitari, utrum quicquid formatum non est nec animatum quidem possit intelligi, et ideo non homicidium sit, quia nec exanimatum dici potest, si animam non habebat. Item: §. 1. Si illud informe puerperium iam quidem fuerat sed adhuc informiter quodammodo animatum (quoniam magna de anima questio non est) precipitanda indiscussa temeritate sentenciae, ideo lex noluit ad homicidium pertinere, quia nondum dici potest anima uiua in eo corpore, quod sensu caret.

[C. IX.]

The same, in the book Questions of the Old and New Testament, [c. 23]. Moses handed down: "If anyone strikes a woman carrying in the womb and causes an abortion, if it was formed, let him give a life for a life; but if it was unformed, let him be fined with money," to prove that there is no soul before form. Therefore, if it is given to a body already formed, it is not born at the body's conception, derived with the seed. For if a soul exists from a soul together with the seed, many souls perish every day when seed, by some discharge, does not advance to birth. But if we look first, we will see what we ought to follow. Let us contemplate the formation of Adam. For in Adam an example was given so that from it it may be understood that a body already formed received a soul. For God could have mingled a soul with the clay of the earth and formed the body in this way. But this would be weakened by reason, because first the house had to be fitted together, and thus the inhabitant brought in. The soul certainly, because it is spirit, cannot dwell in what is dry, and therefore is reported to dwell in the blood. Therefore, when the outlines have not been fitted together, where will the soul be?

[C. IX.]

Idem in libro questionum Veteris et Noui Testamenti. [c. 23.] Moyses tradidit: "Si quis percusserit mulierem in utero habentem, et abortiuum fecerit, si formatum fuerit, det animam pro anima; si autem informatum fuerit, mulctetur pecunia," ut probaret non esse animam ante formam. Itaque si iam formato corpori datur, non in conceptu corporis nascitur cum semine deriuata. Nam si cum semine et anima existit ex anima, et multae animae cottidie pereunt, cum semen fluxu quodam non proficit natiuitati; sed si prius respiciamus, uidebimus, quid sequi debeamus. Contemplemur facturam Adae. In Adam enim exemplum datum est, ut ex eo intelligatur, quia iam formatum corpus accepit animam. Nam poterat animam limo terrae admiscere, et sic formare corpus. Sed ratione infirmabatur, quia primum oportebat domum compaginari, et sic habitatorem induci. Anima certe, quia spiritus est, in sicco habitare non potest, ideo in sanguine fertur habitare. Cum ergo liniamenta conpacta non fuerint, ubi erit anima?

[C. X.]

Likewise Jerome to Algasia, [question IV]. Just as seeds are gradually formed in the womb, and it is not reckoned homicide until the elements, once completed, receive their shapes and limbs, so a thought conceived by reason, unless it breaks forth into works, is still retained in the womb and quickly perishes by the enemy.

PART VI. GRATIAN. Therefore, since one who takes some woman to himself for a time is said to be an adulterer with her, he does not sin by departing from her, nor does one sin by handing one's daughter over to him. Hence Pope Leo, [to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne, epistle XC, otherwise XCII, cc. 5 and 6]:

[C. X.]

Item Ieronimus ad Algasiam. [quest. IV.] Sicuti semina paulatim formantur in utero, et tamdiu non reputatur homicidium, donec elementa confecta suas imagines membraque suscipiant: ita sensus ratione conceptus, nisi in opera proruperit, adhuc in uentre retinetur, et cito perit ab hoste. VI. Pars. Gratian. Cum ergo qui aliquam sibi ad tempus adhibet, cum ea adulter esse dicitur, nec ab ea discedens, nec filiam suam illi tradens peccat. Unde Leo: [Papa ad Rusticum, Narbonensem Episcopum, epist. XC. al. XCII., c. 5. et 6.]

C. XI. To cast off a fornicator and receive a lawful wife is an advance in honorable conduct.

To cast a female slave from the bed and receive a wife of certain freeborn status is not a doubling of marriage but an advance in honorable conduct.

§ 1. Indeed, let the negligence of such persons be blamed, but not utterly despaired of, so that, stirred by repeated exhortations, they may faithfully carry out what they sought by necessity. For no one is to be despaired of while established in this body, because sometimes what is deferred by the diffidence of age is completed by more mature counsel.

C. XI. Profectus est honestatis fornicariam abicere, et uxorem legitimam accipere.

Ancillam a thoro abicere, et uxorem certae ingenuitatis accipere, non duplicatio coniugii, sed profectus est honestatis. §. 1. Culpanda sit sane talium negligentia, sed non penitus desperanda, ut crebris cohortationibus incitati quod necessarie expetiuerunt fideliter exequantur. Nemo enim desperandus est, dum in hoc corpore constitutus est, quia nonnumquam quod diffidentia etatis differtur consilio maturiore perficitur.

C. XII. A woman who is handed over to a man having a concubine is joined in lawful marriage.

The same, [in the same place, c. 4]. Not every woman joined to a man is the man's wife, because not every son is his father's heir. But the covenants of marriage are lawful between freeborn persons and between equals, and this was so much earlier, when the Lord himself established it, than the beginning of Roman law existed. Accordingly, a wife is one thing and a concubine another, just as a female slave is one thing and a free woman another.

§ 1. For this reason the Apostle also, to make clear the distinction between these persons, set down a testimony from Genesis, where it is said to Abraham: "Cast out the female slave and her son, for the son of the female slave will not be heir with the son of the free woman."

§ 2. Therefore, if a cleric of any place has given his daughter in marriage to a man having a concubine, it is not to be understood as though he had given her to a married man, unless perhaps that woman is seen both to have been made freeborn, lawfully endowed, and honored by public nuptials.

§ 4. Women joined to men by their father's decision are without fault if the women who were kept by the men were not in marriage, because a wife is one thing and a concubine another.

PART VII. GRATIAN. When it is said, "women joined to men by their father's decision," it is given to be understood that paternal consent is desired in nuptials, and that without it nuptials are not held lawful, according to that saying of Pope Evaristus: "A marriage is not made lawful otherwise than if she is handed over by her parents."

C. XII. Legitimo matrimonio copulatur que concubinam habenti traditur.

Idem. [ibidem, c. 4.] Non omnis mulier coniuncta uiro uxor est uiri, quia nec omnis filius heres est patris. Nuptiarum autem federa inter ingenuos sunt legitima, et inter coequales et multo prius hoc ipsum Domino constituente, quam initium Romani iuris existeret. Itaque aliud est uxor, aliud concubina; sicut aliud ancilla et aliud libera. §. 1. Propter quod etiam Apostolus ad manifestandum harum personarum discretionem testimonium posuit ex Genesi, ubi dicitur Abrahae: "Eice ancillam et filium eius; non enim heres erit filius ancillae cum filio liberae". §. 2. Igitur cuiuslibet loci clericus si filiam suam uiro habenti concubinam in matrimonium dederit, non ita accipiendum est, quasi eam coniugato dederit, nisi forte illa mulier et ingenua facta, et dotata legitime, et publicis honestata nuptiis uideatur. §. 4. Paterno arbitrio uiris iunctae carent culpa, si mulieres, que a uiris habebantur, in matrimonio non fuerint, quia aliud est uxor, aliud concubina. VII. Pars. Gratian. Cum dicitur: "paterno arbitrio feminae iunctae uiris," datur intelligi, quod paternus consensus desideratur in nuptiis, nec sine eo legitimae nuptiae habeantur, iuxta illud Euaristi Papae: "Aliter non fit legitimum coniugium, nisi a parentibus tradatur."

[C. XIII.]

Likewise Ambrose in the book On the Patriarchs, [that is, Book I, On Abraham, final chapter]. "Rebecca's parents are honored with gifts; the girl is consulted not about the betrothal—for she awaits the judgment of her parents, since it does not belong to virginal modesty to choose a husband—but, when already betrothed to a man, she is consulted concerning the day of departure, and not without cause did she offer no delay. For by right she ought to hasten to her husband. Hence it is manifest whence that saying of Euripides, whose source many wonder at, has been translated. For he says in the person of a woman who nevertheless wished to leave her husband and was being sought for another marriage: 'My father will undertake the care of my betrothal. For this is not mine.' Therefore, virgins, preserve what even the philosophers themselves have admired. But also, if some young woman, having quickly lost her husband, fears that she may fall into the snare of her weakness, if she wishes to marry, let her marry, only in the Lord, so that she may defer the choice of a husband to her parents, lest she be reckoned the author of desire if she claims for herself the choice concerning her own marriage. She ought to appear rather to have been sought by a man than herself to have sought a man. Let her send modesty before her before she marries, so that modesty may commend the marriage itself all the more."

[C. XIII.]

Item Ambrosius in libro de Patriarchis. [id est lib. I. de Abraham, cap. ult.] "Honorantur parentes Rebeccae muneribus, consulitur puella non de sponsalibus (illa enim iudicium expectat parentum: non est enim uirginalis pudoris eligere maritum), sed iam desponsata uiro de profectionis consulitur die, nec inmerito dilationem non attulit. Iure etenim properare debuit ad maritum. Unde illud Euripideon, quod mirantur plerique, unde translatum sit manifestum est. Ait enim in persona mulieris, que tamen maritum uolebat relinquere, et ad alias petebatur nuptias: 'sponsaliorum meorum pater meus curam subibit. Hoc enim non est meum.' Ergo quod et ipsi philosophi mirati sunt seruate uirgines. Sed etiam, si qua mulier amisso cito marito adolescentula laqueum infirmitatis suae timet incidere, si uult nubere, nubat, tantum in Domino; ut electionem mariti parentibus deferat, ne appetentiae estimetur auctor si ipsa de nuptiis suis electionem sibi uendicet. Expetita magis debet uideri a uiro, quam ipsa uirum expetisse. Verecundiam premittat ante, quam nubat, quo ipsum coniugium plus conmendet uerecundia."

[C. XIV.]

Likewise in the Book of Numbers, [c. XXX, v. 4 and following]. "If a woman makes any vow and binds herself by an oath while she is in her father's house and still of girlhood age, if her father learns of the vow she promised and the oath by which she bound her soul, and remains silent, she will not be guilty; whatever she promised and swore she will fulfill in deed. But if her father contradicts her immediately when he hears it, both her vows and her oaths will be void, nor will she be held liable to the promise, because her father contradicted it."

[C. XIV.]

Item in libro Numerorum. [c. XXX. u. 4. seqq.] "Mulier, si quippiam uouerit, et se constrinxerit iuramento, que est in domo patris sui, et in etate adhuc puellari, si cognouerit pater uotum, quod pollicita est, et iuramentum, quo obligauit animam suam, et tacuerit, non rea erit, quicquid pollicita est et iurauit, opere conplebit. Sin autem statim, ut audierit, contradixerit pater, et uota et iuramenta eius irrita erunt, nec obnoxia tenebitur sponsioni eo, quod contradixerit pater."

[C. XV.]

Augustine, [question LVII on Numbers]. "Deservedly, the question is asked here also concerning a vow of virginity. For in Scripture even virgins are customarily called women, and the Apostle also appears to speak of a father when he says: 'Let him keep his virgin,' and: 'Let him give his virgin in marriage.'"

To the contrary, in the Third Council of Toledo, [c. 10]:

> [C. XV.]
>
> Augustinus. [quest. LVII. super Numero] "Merito hic queritur etiam de uoto uirginitatis. Mulieres enim etiam uirgines in scriptura solent appellari, et uidetur etiam Apostolus de patre loqui, cum dicit: 'Seruet uirginem suam;' et: 'Det nuptum uirginem suam.'" Contra in Concilio Tolletano III: [c. 10.]

C. XVI. Let widows and virgins choose husbands for themselves by their own will.

This holy council affirms that widows whom it has pleased may maintain chastity. But if, before they profess continence, they have chosen to marry, let them marry those whom they wished by their own will to have as husbands. Let a similar condition also be maintained concerning virgins, and let them not be compelled to receive husbands contrary to the will of their parents or their own. But if anyone impedes the purpose of chastity of a widow or virgin, let him be held a stranger from holy communion and from the thresholds of the church.

GRATIAN. By the foregoing authorities it is clearly asserted that, although some come together not for the sake of procreating children but because of incontinence, they are nevertheless called spouses.

> C. XVI. Viduae et uirgines propria uoluntate sibi maritos eligant.
> Hoc sanctum affirmat concilium, ut uiduae, quibus placuerit, teneant castitatem. Quod si prius, quam profiteantur continentiam, elegerint nubere, illis nubant, quos propria uoluntate uoluerint habere maritos. Similis condicio et de uirginibus habeatur, nec extra uoluntatem parentum uel suam cogantur maritos accipere. Si quis uero propositum castitatis uiduae uel uirginis inpedierit, a sancta conmunione et a liminibus ecclesiae habeatur extraneus. Gratian. Premissis auctoritatibus euidenter asseritur quod, quamuis aliqui non filiorum procreandorum, sed incontinentiae causa conueniant, tamen coniuges appellantur.

Question III

GRATIAN. Concerning the third question, Pelagius determines the matter, writing to Potentius the defender:

> GRATIANUS. De tercia uero questione Pelagius diffinit, scribens Potentio Defensori:

SOLE CHAPTER. A girl ought in marriage to follow the decision of her free grandfather, not that of her estate-bound father.

It is established that the girl's father is a servant of your church, but her grandfather was born of free parents; and therefore we decree that greater regard is to be given to the grandfather's choice concerning the union of his granddaughter than to that of her father, whose decision can in no way be free.

GRATIAN. Therefore, because this woman is proved to have married this man by the choice of her grandfather, it is established that she was lawfully joined to him.

> C. UN. Arbitrium liberi aui, non originarii patris, puellam in nuptiis sequi oportet.
> Patrem puellae ecclesiae uestrae famulum, auum uero liberis ortum constat esse natalibus, et ideo aui magis electionem de coniunctione neptis, quam patris eius, cuius nullo modo liberum potest esse arbitrium, decernimus attendi. Gratian. Quia ergo electione aui huic ista nupsisse probatur, hanc constat legitime sibi copulatam.

Question IV

GRATIAN. That it is lawful for someone to seek children from a female slave because of his wife's sterility is proved by the example of Abraham, who, because of the sterility of his wife Sarah, went in to Hagar the Egyptian so that he might receive children from her. Likewise Jacob, when he could not have children from Rachel, raised up children for himself from her female slave; and not only because of sterility, but also because fertility had ceased, he is read to have gone in to Leah's female slave and to have begotten children from her. From all these things it is gathered that because of a wife's sterility children may lawfully be sought either from a female slave or from any other woman; otherwise Abraham and Jacob will be marked with the stain of adultery. But just as, after Sarah's death, Abraham took Keturah as wife so that, according to Augustine, Christians might not think it a sin to take another after a wife's death, so he appears to have received children from a female slave while his wife was living, lest this be reckoned a crime by some. But that saying of Augustine is found in Book II Against the Adversary of the Law and the Prophets, [c. 9]:

GRATIANUS. Quod autem ex ancilla propter uxoris sterilitatem filios querere alicui liceat, exemplo probatur Abrahae, qui propter sterilitatem uxoris suae Sarai ingressus est ad Agar Egiptiam, ut ex ea filios acciperet. Item Iacob, cum ex Rachele filios habere non posset, filios ex ancilla eius sibi suscitauit, nec solum propter sterilitatem, uerum etiam propter fecunditatem cessantem legitur intrasse ad ancillam Liae, et ex ea filios genuisse. Ex quibus omnibus colligitur, propter sterilitatem uxoris siue ex ancilla siue ex qualibet alia licite filios queri; alioquin adulterii macula Abraham et Iacob notabuntur. Sed sicut post mortem Sarae Abraham Cethuram duxit in uxorem, ne secundum Augustinum Christiani putarent esse peccatum post mortem uxoris aliam ducere: sic uidetur uiuente uxore sua filios ex ancilla suscepisse, ne aliquibus hoc reputaretur in crimen. Illud autem Augustini dicitur contra aduersarium legum et Prophetarum, libro II.: [c. 9.]

C. I. How Abraham is excused from the crime of fornication.

This man also objects against Abraham the crime of fornication even into the decrepit age of old age, evidently because he took another wife even after Sarah's death. Here, even if no sacrament of a hidden matter were understood, Abraham ought to have done this for this reason alone: lest the heretics who oppose the people of God—among whom Tertullian also stands as a supporter—think that it is a crime to take a wife after a wife's death.

GRATIAN. The sacrament of this matter is that through good persons the evil and good were to be begotten in faith, and through evil persons the good and evil were to come to the faith. Hence Augustine on John, [tractate XI]:

C. I. Quomodo Abraham excusetur a crimine fornicationis.

Iste Abrahae etiam usque ad decrepitam senectutis etatem fornicationis obicit crimen: profecto quia et post mortem Sarae alteram duxit. Ubi etsi nullum intelligeretur rei abditae sacramentum, propter hoc solum id facere debuit Abraham, ne putarent heretici aduersus populum Dei (quibus etiam Tertullianus astipulator assistit) post uxoris mortem crimen esse ducere uxorem. Gratian. Sacramentum huius rei est quod per bonos mali et boni erant in fide generandi, et per malos boni et mali ad fidem accessuri. Unde Augustinus super Iohannem: [tract. XI.]

C. II. Just as the evil and good are begotten in faith through the ministry of good persons, so the good and evil are begotten through the ministry of evil persons.

Let your mind now return to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. In these three we find free women giving birth; we find female slaves giving birth. There we find offspring of free women; there we find offspring of female slaves. A female slave signifies nothing good. "Cast out the female slave," he says, "and her son."

§ 1. We find a wondrous matter in these generations of free women and female slaves: namely, four kinds of human beings. In these four kinds the figure of the whole Christian people is fulfilled, so that it is no wonder that concerning those three it was said: "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." For among all Christians—brothers, attend—either good persons are born through evil persons, or evil persons are born through good persons, or good through good, or evil through evil. Beyond these four kinds nothing can be found.

§ 2. There you find good sons of Jacob born from female slaves and good sons born from free women. Birth from the wombs of female slaves did not harm them when they recognized their seed in their father and consequently held the kingdom with their brothers. Therefore, just as in the sons of Jacob it did not harm those who were born from female slaves so as to prevent them from holding the kingdom and the land of promise which they received with their brothers—their birth from female slaves did not harm them, but the paternal seed prevailed—so all who are baptized through evil persons appear to have been born, as it were, from female slaves; nevertheless, because they are from the seed of the word of God, which is figured in Jacob, they will possess the inheritance together with their brothers. Therefore, let one who is born from good seed be secure; only let him not imitate the female slave. If you are born from a female slave, do not imitate the evil, proud female slave. For why did the sons of Jacob born from female slaves possess the land of promise with their brothers, while Ishmael, born from a female slave, was expelled from the inheritance? Why, unless because he was proud and they humble? He raised his neck and wished to seduce his brother, playing with him. A great sacrament is there. Ishmael and Isaac were playing together; Sarah saw them playing.

§ 3. She who bore Abel, Enoch, Noah, and Abraham herself bore Moses and the Prophets who came later in time before the Lord's advent; and she who bore them herself bore the Apostles, our martyrs, and all good Christians. For she bore all who appeared born at different times but are contained in the fellowship of one people, and who, as citizens of the same city, experienced the labors of this pilgrimage; some of them experience them now, and the rest will experience them until the end. Likewise she who bore Cain, Ham, Ishmael, and Esau herself bore Dathan and others like them among the same people; and she who bore them herself bore Judas the false apostle, Simon Magus, and all other false Christians down to these times, obstinately hardened in an animal affection, whether they are mingled within unity or dissent by open separation.

§ 4. But when such persons are evangelized by spiritual persons and imbued with the sacraments, Rebecca, as it were, bears them through herself, as she did Esau. But when such persons are begotten among the same people through those who do not proclaim the Gospel chastely, Sarah does not indeed bear through herself, but through Hagar. Likewise, when good spiritual persons are begotten by carnal persons who evangelize or baptize, Leah or Rachel indeed bears them by marital right, but through the womb of the female slaves.

§ 5. But when through spiritual persons good believers are begotten in the Gospel—who either advance into a spiritual affection of piety, or do not cease striving toward it, or do not do so for this reason, because they cannot—they are born into the new life and New Testament as Isaac from Sarah's womb or Jacob from Rebecca's. Therefore, whether they appear to dwell within or are openly outside, what is flesh is flesh. Whether they persevere on the threshing floor in their sterility or are carried outside on the occasion of temptation as though by the wind, what is chaff is chaff. And even one who in carnal obduracy is mingled with the congregation of the saints is always divided from the unity of that Church which is without spot or wrinkle. Nevertheless, one must despair of no one, whether such a person appears within or more manifestly opposes from without.

PART II. GRATIAN. To these things it is answered thus: According to the diversity of times, a diverse dispensation of the Creator is found. It had been promised to Abraham that all nations would be blessed in his seed; he had also promised that he would give to his seed the land of his sojourn. Therefore, since, with the others left in idolatry, the Lord had chosen Abraham and his sons as a peculiar people for himself, the multiplication of God's people was rightly sought through the fertility of many women, because in succession of blood there was succession of faith. Hence it was said in the law: "Cursed is the sterile woman who has not left her seed upon the earth." Hence marriages were also decreed for priests, because in the succession of the family the succession of office was established. But because through the incarnation of Christ the grace of faith has been spread everywhere, and it is no longer said, "Speak to the house of Judah and the house of Israel," but "Go, teach all nations," and "In every nation, whoever fears God and works justice is acceptable to him," the choice for an office is not sought in succession of lineage, but in perfection of life and sincerity of knowledge; virginity is preferred to fertility, and the chastity of continence is commanded to priests. Therefore, neither Abraham nor Jacob sinned because he sought children from a female slave in addition to his wife, nor by their example is it lawful for anyone to seek fertility in some woman in addition to the marital due, since their marriages are equated with or preferred to our virginity, and the immoderate use of marriage in our time almost imitates the shamefulness of fornication in that time. Hence Ambrose writes in the book On the Patriarchs, [Book I, On Abraham, c. 4]:

> C. II. Sicut bonorum ministerio mali et boni, ita ministerio malorum boni et mali in fide generantur.
> Recurrat nunc animus uester ad Abraham, Ysaac, et Iacob. In istis tribus inuenimus parere liberas, parere ancillas. Inuenimus ibi partus liberarum, inuenimus ibi partus ancillarum. Ancilla nichil boni significat. "Eice ancillam," inquit, "et filium eius." §. 1. Inuenimus rem miram in istis generationibus liberarum et ancillarum: quatuor scilicet genera hominum, in quibus quatuor generibus conpletur figura totius populi Christiani, ut non sit mirum quod in illis tribus dictum est: "Ego sum Deus Abraham, et Deus Ysaac, et Deus Iacob." In omnibus enim Christianis (fratres adtendite) aut per malos nascuntur boni, aut per bonos nascuntur mali, aut per bonos boni, aut per malos mali. Amplius istis quatuor generibus non potest inueniri. §. 2. Inuenis ibi bonos filios Iacob natos de ancillis, et bonos filios natos de liberis. Nichil obfuit natiuitas de uteris ancillarum, quando in patre cognouerunt semen suum, et consequenter regnum cum fratribus tenuerunt. Quomodo ergo in filiis Iacob non obfuit illis, qui nati sunt de ancillis, quo minus tenerent regnum, et terram promissionis quam cum fratribus acceperunt, non illis obfuerunt natales ancillarum, sed preualuit semen paternum: sic quicumque per malos baptizantur tamquam de ancillis uidentur nati, sed tamen, quia ex semine uerbi Dei, quod figuratur in Iacob, simul hereditatem cum fratribus possidebunt. Securus ergo sit qui de semine bono nascitur: tantum ne imitetur ancillam. Si de ancilla nasceris, ancillam malam superbientem ne imiteris. Unde enim filii Iacob de ancillis nati possederunt terram promissionis cum fratribus, Ismahel autem de ancilla natus expulsus est ab hereditate? Unde, nisi quia ille superbus erat, illi humiles? Erexit ille ceruicem, et uoluit seducere fratrem suum, ludens cum illo. Magnum ibi sacramentum. Ludebant simul Ismahel et Ysaac; uidit illos Sara ludentes. §. 3. Que autem peperit Abel, et Enoch, et Noe, et Abraham, ipsa peperit Moysen et Prophetas tempore posteriores ante Domini aduentum, et que istos, ipsa et Apostolos, et martires nostros, et bonos omnes Christianos. Omnes enim peperit qui diuersis temporibus nati apparuerunt, sed societate unius populi continentur et eiusdem ciuitatis ciues labores huius peregrinationis experti sunt, et quidam eorum nunc experiuntur, et usque in finem ceteri experientur. Item que peperit Cayn, et Cham, et Ismahel, et Esau, eadem ipsa peperit et Dathan, et alios in eodem populo similes, et que istos, eadem ipsa et Iudam pseudoapostolum, et Symonem magum, et ceteros usque ad hec tempora pseudochristianos, in affectione animali pertinaciter obduratos, siue sint permixti in unitate, siue aperta precisione dissentiant. §. 4. Sed cum tales a spiritualibus euangelizantur, et sacramentis inbuuntur, tamquam per se ipsam Rebecca eos parit, sicut Esau; cum autem per illos, qui non caste annunciant euangelium, tales in eodem populo generantur, non Sara quidem per se ipsam parit, sed per Agar. Item boni spirituales, quando euangelizantibus uel baptizantibus carnalibus generantur, Lia quidem uel Rachel iure coniugali eos, sed per ancillarum uterum parit. §. 5. Cum uero per spirituales in euangelio generantur boni fideles, qui uel uadunt in spiritualem affectum pietatis, uel eo tendere non desistunt, uel ideo non faciunt, quia non possunt, sicut ex utero Sarae Ysaac, uel Rebeccae Iacob in nouam uitam et nouum testamentum nascuntur. Itaque siue intus uersari uideantur, siue aperte foris sint, quod caro est caro est; siue in area in sua sterilitate perseuerent, siue occasione temptationis tamquam uento extra tollantur, quod palea est palea est, et semper ab illius ecclesiae, que sine macula est et ruga, unitate diuisus est etiam qui congregationi sanctorum in carnali obduratione miscetur. De nullo tamen desperandum est, siue qui intus talis appareat, siue qui foras manifestius aduersetur. II. Pars. Gratian. His ita respondetur: Pro uarietate temporum uaria inuenitur dispensatio conditoris. Promissum erat Abrahae, quod in semine eius benedicerentur omnes gentes; promiserat quoque se daturum semini eius terram peregrinationis suae. Cum ergo, ceteris in idolatria relictis, Abraham et filios eius in peculiarem populum sibi Dominus elegisset, rite multarum fecunditate mulierum populi Dei multiplicatio querebatur, quia in successione sanguinis erat successio fidei. Unde in lege dicebatur: "Maledicta sterilis, que non reliquerit semen suum super terram." Hinc etiam sacerdotibus coniugia decreta sunt, quia in successione familiae successio constabat offitii. Quia uero per incarnationem Christi gratia fidei ubique dilatata est, nec iam dicitur: "Dic domui Iudae, et domui Israel;" sed: "Euntes docete omnes gentes," et: "In omni gente quicumque timet Deum, et operatur iusticiam, acceptus est illi:" nec electio muneris queritur in successione generis, sed in perfectione uitae et sinceritate scientiae, et uirginitas fecunditati prefertur, et sacerdotibus continentiae castitas inperatur. Nec ergo Abraham aut Iacob deliquit, quia preter uxorem filios ex ancilla quesierit, nec illorum exemplo, preter coniugale debitum, fecunditatem in aliqua licet alicui querere, cum illorum coniugia nostrorum equentur uel preferantur uirginitati, et inmoderatus usus coniugii nostri temporis turpitudinem fere imitetur fornicationis illius temporis. Unde Ambrosius scribit in libro de Patriarchis: [lib. I. de Abraham, c. 4.] :

C. III. Abraham, who received children from a female slave while his wife was living, is not guilty of adultery.

Sarah said to Abraham: “Behold, the Lord has closed me up so that I do not bear; therefore, go in to my female slave so that you may make a son from her.” And so it was done. But consider first that Abraham lived before the law of Moses and before the Gospel; adultery did not yet appear to be prohibited. The penalty for a crime exists from the time of the law that prohibited the crime; before the law there is no condemnation of a guilty person, but it comes from the law. Abraham therefore did not commit against the law, but preceded the law. God had praised marriage in paradise; he had not condemned adultery.

§ 1. You have Abraham's first defense. The second is this: not inflamed by any ardor of wandering lust, not captivated by the beauty of an alluring form, did he place the marital bed after union with a female slave, but from zeal for seeking posterity and propagating offspring. There was still, after the flood, a scarcity of the human race; there was also a scarcity of religion, lest anyone appear not to have rendered the debt owed to nature. Finally, the daughters of holy Lot had this cause of seeking posterity, lest the human race fail; and therefore the grace of a public duty covered over a private fault.

> C. III. Abraham non est reus adulterii, qui uxore uiuente filios ex ancilla suscepit.
> Dixit Sara ad Abraham: "Ecce conclusit me Dominus, ut non pariam; intra ergo ad ancillam meam, ut filium facias ex illa". Et ita factum est. Sed considera primum, quod Abraham ante legem Moysi et ante euangelium fuit; nondum interdictum adulterium uidebatur. Pena criminis ex tempore legis est, que crimen inhibuit, nec ante legem nulla rei dampnatio est, sed ex lege. Non ergo in legem conmisit Abraham, sed legem preuenit. Deus in paradiso coniugium laudauerat, non adulterium dampnauerat. §. 1. Habes Abrahae defensionem primam. Secunda illa est, quod non ardore aliquo uagae succensus libidinis, non petulantis formae captus decore, ancillae contubernio coniugalem posthabuit thorum, sed studio querendae posteritatis, et propagandae sobolis. Adhuc post diluuium raritas erat generis humani; erat etiam religionis, ne quis non reddidisse debitum uideretur naturae. Denique et Loth sancti hanc filiae causam querendae posteritatis habuerunt, ne genus deficeret humanum, et ideo publici muneris gratia priuatam culpam pretexuit.

C. IV. What is committed outside lawful marriage is condemned as the crime of adultery.

The same, in the same work, [in the chapter of the book]. Let no one flatter himself concerning human laws. Every illicit intercourse is adultery, nor is that lawful for a man which is not lawful for a woman. The same chastity is owed by a husband as by a wife. Whatever is committed with a woman who is not a lawful wife is condemned as the crime of adultery.

In the same work, [Book I, c. 7]. § 1. It is lawful for no one to know a woman except his wife. Therefore, the right of marriage has been given to you lest you fall into a snare and sin with another woman.

§ 2. A fault is more tolerable if it lies hidden than if authority is usurped for the fault. Nor is adultery only to sin with another man's wife, but everything that does not have the authority of marriage. Nevertheless, this passage teaches that the crime is more grave where the rights of a celebrated marriage are violated and the wife's modesty is undone. Therefore, when Abimelech claimed that he had not known her to be another man's wife, since the husband himself had said that she was his sister, the Lord answered him: "And I knew that you did this with a pure heart, and I spared you so that you would not sin against me; for this reason I did not permit you to touch her." We recognize God to be, as it were, the protector and guardian of marriage, who does not permit another's bed to be polluted; and if anyone does this, he sins against God, whose law he violates and whose grace he dissolves. And because he sins against God, he loses fellowship in the heavenly sacrament.

C. IV. Quod preter legitimam uxorem conmittitur adulterii crimine dampnatur.

Idem in eodem. [libro de cap.] Nemo sibi blandiatur de legibus hominum. Omne stuprum adulterium est, nec uiro licet quod mulieri non licet. Eadem a uiro, que ab uxore, debetur castimonia. Quicquid in eam, que non sit legitima uxor, conmissum fuerit, adulterii dampnatur crimine. In eodem: [lib. cap. 7.] §. 1. Nulli licet scire mulierem preter uxorem; ideoque coniugii tibi datum est ius, ne in laqueum incidas, et cum aliena muliere delinquas. §. 2. Tollerabilior est, si lateat culpa, quam si culpae usurpetur auctoritas. Nec hoc solum est adulterium, cum aliena peccare coniuge, sed omne, quod non habet potestatem coniugii. Tamen locus iste docet, grauius crimen esse, ubi celebrati coniugii iura temerantur, et uxoris pudor soluitur. Ideoque, cum pretenderet Abimelech, quod uxorem alienam esse ignorauerit, quam sororem esse uir ipse suam dixerit, respondit ei Dominus: "Et ego cognoui, quoniam puro corde fecisti hoc, et peperci tibi, ut non peccares in me; propter hoc non sum passus te tangere eam". Cognoscimus uelut presulem custodemque esse coniugii Deum, qui non patiatur alienum thorum pollui, et si quis fecerit, eum peccare in Deum, cuius legem uiolet, et gratiam soluat. Et, quia in Deum peccat, sacramenti celestis amittit consorcium.

C. V. Nothing is more shameful than to love one's wife as though she were an adulteress.

Likewise Jerome, [Book I Against Jovinian]. PART III. The origin of the love was indeed honorable, but its magnitude was deformed.

§ 1. It makes no difference from what honorable cause someone goes mad. Hence Sextus also says in his Sentences: "A man who is too ardent a lover of his own wife is an adulterer toward her." Indeed, all love for another man's wife is shameful; excessive love for one's own wife is shameful. A wise man ought to love his spouse by judgment, not by passion. The impulse of pleasure does not reign in him, nor is he carried headlong toward intercourse. Nothing is more shameful than to love one's wife as though she were an adulteress.

§ 2. Certainly, those who say that they are joined to wives for the sake of the commonwealth and the human race and to procreate children should at least imitate the beasts; and after the belly of the wife has swollen, let them not destroy the children, nor present themselves to their wives as lovers, but as husbands.

C. V. Nichil fedius est quam amare uxorem quasi adulteram.

Item Ieronimus. [contra Iouinianum lib. I.] III. Pars. Origo quidem honesta erat amoris, sed magnitudo deformis. §. 1. Nichil autem interest ex qua honesta causa quis insaniat. Unde et Sextus in sententiis:

"Adulter est," inquit, "in suam uxorem amator ardentior." In aliena quippe uxore omnis amor turpis est, in sua nimius. Sapiens iudicio debet amare coniugem, non affectu. Non regnat in eo inpetus uoluptatis, nec preceps fertur ad coitum. Nichil est fedius quam uxorem amare quasi adulteram. §. 2. Certe, qui dicunt se causa reipublicae et generis humani uxoribus iungi, et filios procreare, imitentur saltim pecudes, et post, quam uenter uxoris intumuerit, non perdant filios, nec amatores se uxoribus exhibeant, sed maritos.

C. VI. Virginal chastity is not preferred to the marriage of Abraham.

The same, [Book II]. Who does not know that, under a different dispensation of God in former times, all his saints were of the same merit as Christians now are? Just as Abraham then pleased in marriage, so now virgins please in chastity. He served the law and his own time; let us also serve the law and our own time, upon whom the ends of the ages have come.

C. VI. Virginalis castitas non prefertur coniugio Abrahae.

Idem. [libro II.] Quis ignoret, sub altera dispensatione Dei retro omnes sanctos eiusdem fuisse meriti, cuius nunc Christiani sunt? Quomodo ante Abraham placuit in coniugio, sic nunc uirgines placent in castitate. Seruiuit ille legi et tempori suo: seruiamus et nos legi et tempori nostro, in quos fines seculorum deuenerunt.

C. VII. The Patriarchs had several wives not from a desire to satisfy lust but for the sake of numerous offspring.

Likewise Augustine, [Book XXII Against Faustus, cc. 47 and 48]. Jacob's four wives are objected against him, although what was customary at that time was not a crime. Just as the Patriarchs mingled with their spouses, who received their seed, not from a desire to perfect pleasure but from providence for propagating succession, so the Apostles took delight together with hearers who admired their teaching, not from a greed to obtain praise but from charity for sowing truth.

C. VII. Patriarchae non concupiscentia explendae libidinis, sed causa numerosae prolis plures habebant uxores.

Item Augustinus. [lib. XXII. contra Faustum, c. 47. et 48.] Obiciuntur Iacob quatuor uxores, quod, quando mos erat, crimen non erat. Sicut Patriarchae coniugibus excipientibus semen suum miscebantur, non concupiscentia perficiendae uoluptatis, sed prouidentia propagandae successionis: sic Apostoli admirantibus auditoribus doctrinam suam condelectabantur, non auiditate consequendae laudis sed karitate seminandae ueritatis.

C. VIII. It is better to die without children than to seek offspring from unlawful intercourse.

Likewise Augustine, On the Good of Marriage, [c. 16]. PART IV. Just as it is better to die from hunger than to eat things sacrificed to idols, so it is better to die without children than to seek offspring from unlawful intercourse. But from wherever human beings are born, if they do not follow the vices of their parents and worship God rightly, they will be honorable and saved. For the seed of a human being, from whatever human being it comes, is God's creature; it will go badly for those who use it badly, but it will never itself be evil.

C. VIII. Satius est absque liberis defungi, quam ex illicito concubitu stirpem querere.

Item Augustinus de bono coniugali. [c. 16.] IV. Pars. Sicut satius est mori fame, quam ydolothitis uesci: ita satius est defungi sine liberis, quam ex illicito coitu stirpem querere. Undecumque autem nascantur homines, si parentum uicia non sectentur et Deum recte colant, honesti et salui erunt. Semen enim hominis ex qualicumque homine, Dei creatura est, et eo male utentibus male erit, non ipsum aliquando malum erit.

C. IX. Children are not to be sought from a female slave.

Likewise a sermon of Saint Ambrose concerning Saint John which begins, "We said on the preceding Lord's Day," [no. LXV]. Someone may say: I do not have a wife, and therefore I have associated a female slave with myself. Hear what Scripture says to Abraham: "Cast out the female slave and her son; for the son of the female slave will not be heir with the son of the free woman." Therefore, if the son of the female slave is not an heir, neither, then, is he a son. But why is such a union sought, from which the son received can be heir neither by succession nor by blood? For one who does not have the privilege of origin cannot have fellowship in the inheritance. Why, I ask, is such an informal union sought, from which the children born are witnesses not of marriage but of adultery? Why are adulterous children of this kind received, who are a shame to the father, not an honor? Scripture says: "The children of adulterers, etc." Therefore, if your woman is furnished with such morals that she deserves fellowship, let her also deserve the name of wife. Grant your concubine freedom and the name of wife, lest you be her adulterer rather than her husband.

> C. IX. Ex ancilla filii non sunt querendi.
> Item sermo sancti Ambrosii de S. Iohanne, qui sic incipit: "Diximus superiore Dominica." [num. LXV.] Dicat aliquis: uxorem non habeo, et ideo ancillam michi sociaui. Audi, quid dicat scriptura ad Abraham: "Eice ancillam et filium eius; non enim erit heres ancillae filius cum filio liberae." Si igitur ancillae filius heres non est, nec ergo filius est. Cur autem queritur tale coniugium, de quo susceptus filius nec successionis possit esse heres nec sanguinis? Nec enim potest habere hereditatis consortium qui non habet originis priuilegium. Cur, inquam, queritur tale contubernium, de quo nati filii non sunt testes matrimonii, sed adulterii? Cur huiusmodi suscipiuntur adulterini, qui patri pudori sunt, non honori? Dicit scriptura: "Adulterorum filii etc." Mulier igitur tua, si talibus moribus predita est, ut mereatur consortium, mereatur et nomen uxoris. Presta concubinae tuae libertatem et nomen uxoris, ne tui adulter sis potius quam maritus.

C. X. Adulteries are not to be committed with the will of begetting children.

Likewise Augustine to Claudius, Book V Against Julian. Adulteries are not to be committed even with the will of begetting children, just as thefts are not to be committed even with the will of feeding the holy poor. The latter is nevertheless to be done not by perpetrating thefts, but by making good use of the mammon of iniquity.

PART V. GRATIAN. Behold, it is in no way lawful for someone, while his wife is living, to seek children either from a female slave or from any other woman; those received are even judged unworthy of the name of children. Simple fornication is also prohibited by sacred Scripture. Hence Augustine in Questions on Deuteronomy, [question XXXVII on c. 23]:

> C. X. Adulteria non sunt facienda uoluntate generandi filios.
> Item Augustinus ad Claudium contra Iulianum libro V. Sic non sunt facienda adulteria etiam uoluntate filios generandi, quemadmodum nec furta sunt facienda etiam uoluntate pascendi pauperes sanctos; quod tamen est faciendum non furta perpetrando, sed bene utendo mammona iniquitatis. V. Pars. Gratian. Ecce, quod nullo modo licet alicui uiuente uxore sua, uel ex ancilla, uel ex alia qualibet filios querere, qui etiam suscepti filiorum nomine iudicantur indigni. Simplex etiam fornicatio sacra scriptura prohibetur. Unde Augustinus in questionibus Deuteronomii: [quest. XXXVII. ad c. 23.]

C. XI. Unlawful intercourse and every illegitimate use of those members is understood by the name of adultery.

The Lord prohibits there being prostitutes and approaching prostitutes, whose shamefulness is publicly for sale. But in the Decalogue he does not appear openly to have prohibited this under the name of adultery, since adultery is customarily understood only as a violation of marriage.

The same, on Exodus, [question 71]. § 1. Every adultery is also called fornication in the Scriptures. But whether every fornication can also be called adultery, no example of this manner of speaking occurs to me in the same Scriptures for the present. But if every fornication cannot also be called adultery, I do not know whether it can be found where in the Decalogue that fornication is prohibited which men who do not have wives commit with women who do not have husbands. But if under the name of theft every unlawful usurpation of another's property is rightly understood—for he who prohibited theft did not permit robbery, but certainly wished the whole to be understood from a part: whatever of a neighbor's property is unlawfully taken—assuredly under the name of adultery every unlawful intercourse and illegitimate use of those members ought to be understood as prohibited.

C. XI. Illicitus concubitus et omnis non legitimus usus illorum membrorum nomine mechiae intelligitur.

Meretrices esse, et ad meretrices accedere prohibet Dominus, quarum publice uenalis est turpitudo. In Decalogo autem mechiae nomine non uidetur hoc aperte prohibuisse, quoniam mechia non nisi adulterium intelligi solet. Idem super Exodum: [quest. 71.] §. 1. Omnis mechia etiam fornicatio in scripturis dicitur. Sed utrum etiam omnis fornicatio mechia dici possit, in eisdem scripturis non michi interim occurrit locutionis exemplum; sed si omnis fornicatio etiam mechia dici non potest, ubi sit in Decalogo prohibita illa fornicatio, quam faciunt qui uxores non habent, cum feminis, que uiros non habent, an inueniri possit, ignoro. Sed si furti nomine bene intelligitur omnis illicita usurpatio rei alienae (non enim rapinam permisit qui furtum prohibuit, sed utique a parte totum intelligere uoluit, quicquid illicite rerum proximi aufertur) profecto nomine mechiae omnis illicitus concubitus atque illorum membrorum non legitimus usus prohibitus debet intelligi.

C. XII. Extraordinary pleasure and immodest acts of marriage are called wantonness and uncleanness.

Likewise Jerome, [on Galatians c. 5, at "But manifest"]. In this the fornicator is guilty of a greater crime: he takes the members of Christ and makes them members of a prostitute, "for the two shall be in one flesh." One who is not faithful and does not believe in Christ makes his own members the members of a prostitute. To the contrary, whether an unbeliever in his fornication violates or builds a temple for an idol, I do not know. For demons are especially worshiped through vices. This one thing I know: one who fornicates after receiving the faith of Christ violates the temple of God. The second work of the flesh is called uncleanness, and wantonness follows it as its companion. For just as in the old law Scripture comprehended generally the unspeakable crimes that are done in secret, which it is most shameful even to name, lest both the speaker's mouth and the hearers' ears be polluted, saying: "Make the children of Israel modest or fearful of every uncleanness," so in this passage he called the other extraordinary pleasures—and also the acts of marriage themselves, if they are not done modestly and honorably, as though under God's eyes, so that service is rendered only to children—uncleanness and wantonness.

C. XII. Extraordinaria uoluptas et inuerecunda opera nuptiarum luxuria et inmundicia appellantur.

Item Ieronimus. [in c. 5. epist. ad Gal. ad uers. Manifesta autem.] In eo fornicator est maioris criminis, quia tollit membra Christi, et facit ea membra meretricis; "erunt quippe duo in carne una." Qui non est fidelis, nec credit in Christo, sua membra facit membra meretricis. E contrario infidelis in fornicatione sua utrum uiolet, an edificet templum idolo, nescio. Per uicia quippe uel maxime demones coluntur. Hoc unum scio, quod qui post fidem Christi fornicatur uiolat templum Dei. Secundum opus carnis inmunditia nuncupatur, et eam comes luxuria sequitur. Quomodo enim in ueteri lege de nefandis criminibus, que in occulto fiunt, que etiam nominare turpissimum est, ne et dicentis os, et aures audientium polluerentur, generaliter scriptura conplexa est, dicens: "Verecundos uel uerentes facite filios Israel ab omni inmundicia," sic in hoc loco ceteras extraordinarias uoluptates, ipsarum quoque opera nuptiarum, si non uerecunde et cum honestate quasi sub oculis Dei fiant, ut tantum liberis seruiatur immunditiam et luxuriam nominauit.

C. XIII. The immoderate use of women drew Solomon to idolatry.

Likewise Gregory, [Morals, Book XII, c. 12]. Solomon indeed was brought by the immoderate use and constant company of women to such a point that he built a temple for idols; and he who had formerly constructed a temple for God, prostrated beneath constant lust and unbelief, did not fear to construct temples for idols.

C. XIII. Inmoderatus usus mulierum Salomonem ad idolatriam traxit.

Item Gregorius. [in Moralibus lib. XII. c. 12.] Salomon quippe inmoderato usu atque assiduitate mulierum ad hoc usque perductus est, ut templum idolis fabricaret, et qui prius Deo templum construxerat, assiduitate libidinis et perfidiae substratus idolis construere templa non timuit.

C. XIV. The procreation of children is praised in marriage; pleasure characteristic of prostitutes is condemned even with a wife.

Likewise Jerome, [on Ephesians c. 5, at "Husbands, love"]. Therefore, as we have said, acts for the sake of children have been conceded in marriage; but pleasures taken from the embraces of prostitutes are condemned even with a wife.

PART VI. GRATIAN. But why such persons are not called children, or which of their parents those who are born from a free man and a female slave follow, Isidore determines in Book IX of the Etymologies, [c. 5]:

C. XIV. Liberorum procreatio in matrimonio laudatur; meretricia uoluptas etiam in uxore dampnatur.

Item Ieronimus. [in c. 5. epist. ad Ephesios, ad uers. Viri diligite.] Liberorum ergo, ut diximus, in matrimonio opera concessa sunt; uoluptates autem, que de meretricum capiuntur amplexibus, in uxore dampnatae. VI. Pars. Gratian. Quare autem tales non dicantur filii, uel quem suorum parentum sequantur, qui ex libero et ancilla nascuntur, Ysidorus Ethimologiarum libro IX. [c. 5.] determinat:

C. XV. Who are free children, and which condition of their parents they follow.

Those are called free children who were born of a free marriage. For children of a free man and a female slave are of servile condition. For one who is born always takes the worse part. But natural children are said to be the children of freeborn concubines, whom nature alone, not the honorable state of marriage, begot.

§ 1. But those who are not from a lawful marriage follow the mother rather than the father.

C. XV. Qui sint liberi, et quam condicionem parentum sequantur.

Liberi dicti sunt, qui ex libero matrimonio sunt orti. Nam filii ex libero et ancilla seruilis condicionis sunt. Semper enim qui nascitur deteriorem partem sumit. Naturales autem filii dicuntur ingenuarum > concubinarum filii, quos sola natura genuit, non honesta coniugii. §. 1. Hii uero, qui non sunt de legitimo matrimonio, matrem potius quam patrem secuntur.

Question V

GRATIAN. PART I. That chastity cannot be taken away by violence is proved by the authorities of many. For it is a virtue of the mind, which does not experience violence. Indeed, force is brought upon the body, not upon the mind. Hence, although the body is violated by force, if chastity of mind is preserved unharmed, chastity is nevertheless doubled. Thus blessed Lucy is reported to have said to Paschasius: "If you cause me to be violated against my will, my chastity will be doubled for my crown." For God judges concerning perceptions and wills. Hence Ambrose writes in Book V On Virgins:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem pudicitia uiolenter eripi non possit, multorum auctoritatibus probatur. Est enim uirtus animi, que uiolentiam non sentit. Corpori namque uis infertur, non animo. Unde, quamuis corpus uiolenter corrumpatur si pudicitia mentis seruetur illesa, tamen castitas duplicatur. Sicut B. Lucia fertur dixisse Pascasio. "Si inuitam me feceris uiolari, castitas michi duplicabitur ad coronam." De sensibus enim et uoluntatibus iudicat Deus. Hinc Ambrosius scribit in libro V. de uirginibus:

C. I. Virginity of mind is better than virginity of flesh.

It is more tolerable to have the mind virgin than the flesh. Both are good, if it is permitted; if it is not permitted, let us at least be chaste not for a human being but for God.

§ 1. A virgin can be prostituted; she cannot be made an adulteress. Wherever a virgin of God is, there is a temple of God. Brothels do not bring infamy upon chastity; rather, chastity abolishes even the infamy of the place.

> C. I. Melior est uirginitas mentis quam carnis.
> Tollerabilius est mentem uirginem, quam carnem habere. Utrumque bonum, si liceat; si non liceat, saltim non homini casti, sed Deo simus. §. 1. Virgo prostitui potest, adulterari non potest. Ubicumque Dei uirgo est, templum Dei est; nec lupanaria infamant castitatem, sed castitas etiam loci abolet infamiam.

C. II. When the mind is uncorrupted, the flesh is not corrupted.

The same, [To a Fallen Virgin, c. 4]. Truly, the flesh cannot be corrupted beforehand unless the mind has first been corrupted.

> C. II. Mente incorrupta non corrumpitur caro.
> Idem. [ad uirginem lapsam, c. 4.] Reuera non potest caro ante corrumpi, nisi mens fuerit ante corrupta.

C. III. Another's lust pollutes no one.

Likewise Augustine, The City of God, [Book I, c. 18]. Is there fear, then, that another's lust may pollute someone? It will not pollute if it is another's; but if it pollutes, it will not be another's. But since chastity is a virtue of the mind and has fortitude as its companion, it determines to tolerate any evils rather than consent to evil. And since no magnanimous and chaste person has in that person's power what is done to the flesh, but only what the mind assents to or refuses, who, then, being of sound mind, would think that one loses chastity if perhaps another's lust, not one's own, is exercised and satisfied upon one's flesh after it has been seized or overpowered?

C. III. Aliena libido neminem polluit.

Item Augustinus de ciuitate Dei. [lib. I. c. 18.] Ita, ne aliquem polluat aliena libido, metuitur? Non polluet, si aliena erit, si autem polluet, non aliena erit. Sed cum pudicitia sit uirtus animi, comitemque habeat fortitudinem, potius quelibet mala tollerare, quam malo consentire decernat, nullus autem magnanimus et pudicus in potestate habet quid de sua carne fiat, sed tantum quod annuat mente uel rennuat: quis tandem sana scilicet mente putauerit, se perdere pudicitiam, si forte in apprehensa uel oppressa carne sua exerceatur et expleatur libido non sua?

[C. IV.] The same, [in the same place].

When the purpose of the mind remains—the purpose through which the body also merited to be sanctified—the violence of another's lust does not take sanctity from the body itself, for the perseverance of its own continence preserves it. Or indeed, if some woman, corrupted in mind and having violated the purpose she vowed to God, proceeds to be violated by her seducer, do we still call her holy even in body while she proceeds, after the sanctity of the mind through which the body is sanctified has been lost and destroyed? Far be this error. And from this let us rather be admonished that the sanctity of the body is thus lost even when the body is untouched.

The same, [c. 19]. § 1. They extol Lucretia, a noble matron of ancient Rome, with great praises of chastity. When the violent son of King Tarquin had lustfully taken possession of her body, she disclosed the most wicked young man's crime to her husband Collatinus and her kinsman Brutus, most illustrious and brave men, and bound them to vengeance. Then, sickened by and unable to endure the shameful deed committed against her, she killed herself. What do we say? Is she to be called an adulteress or chaste? Who will labor in this controversy? Someone declaiming on this matter excellently and truthfully said: "Wonderful to say: there were two, and one committed adultery." Splendidly and most truthfully. For, looking in the mingling of two bodies at the most defiled desire of one and the most chaste will of the other, and attending not to what was done by the joining of bodies but to what was done by the diversity of minds, he says: "There were two, and one committed adultery."

[C. IV.] Idem. [ibidem]

Proposito animi permanente, per quod etiam corpus sanctificari meruit, ipsi corpori non aufert sanctitatem uiolentia libidinis alienae, quam seruat perseuerantia suae continentiae. An uero, si aliqua femina mente corrupta, uiolatoque proposito, quod Deo uouerat, pergat uicianda ad suum deceptorem, adhuc eam pergentem sanctam uel corpore dicimus, ea sanctitate animi, per quam corpus sanctificatur, amissa atque destructa? Absit hic error, et hinc potius ammoneamur, ita amitti corporis sanctitatem, etiam intacto corpore. Idem: [c. 19.] §. 1.

Lucretiam, matronam nobilem ueteremque Romanam, magnis pudicitiae laudibus efferunt. Huius corpore cum uiolentus Tarquinii regis filius libidinose potitus esset, illa scelus inprobissimi iuuenis marito Collatino, et propinquo Bruto, uiris clarissimis et fortissimis indicauit, eosque ad uindictam constrinxit. Deinde fedi in se conmissi egra atque inpatiens se peremit. Quid dicimus? adultera hec, an casta dicenda est? Quis in hac controuersia laborabit? Egregie quidam ex hoc et ueraciter declamans ait: "Mirabile dictu; duo fuerunt, et adulterium unus admisit." Splendide atque uerissime. Intuens enim in duum corporum conmixtione unius inquinatissimam cupiditatem, unius castissimam uoluntatem, et non quod corporum coniunctione, sed quod animorum diuersitate ageretur, attendens: "Duo," inquit, "fuerunt, et unus adulterium admisit."

[PALEA.

C. V. The same, in the same book, chapter 27.

Let your life not become wearisome to you who are faithful to Christ if your chastity was made a mockery by enemies. You have a great and true consolation if you retain a faithful conscience that you did not consent to the sins of those who were permitted to sin against you.

The same, in the book On Two Souls, [c. 10]. § 1. Sin is committed only by the will.]

C. V. Idem in eodem libro, capitulo 27.

Non fidelibus Christi sit tedio uestra uita, si ludibrio fuit hostibus castitas uestra. Habetis magnam ueramque consolationem, si fidam conscientiam retinetis, non consensisse peccatis eorum, qui in uos peccare permissi sunt. Idem in libro de duabus animabus: [c. 10.] §. 1. Non nisi uoluntate peccatur.]

[C. VI.]

The same, in Book I On Free Choice, [c. 5]. Concerning chastity, who has doubted that it is established in the mind, since it is a virtue? Hence it cannot itself be taken away even by a violent ravisher.

Likewise Jerome, on the Epistle to the Romans, Book I. § 1. It is impossible for anyone to commit adultery in the body unless that person first commits adultery in the heart.

[PALEA. The same, on Luke, Book II. § 2. Imagine that in a persecution some virgin has been prostituted. According to the Gospel she is received as a virgin, because she does not sin by her will; under the law she is repudiated as though corrupted.

The same, in the book Hebrew Questions, [on Genesis at c. 12]. § 3. Force does not stain a woman's body, but the will.]

Likewise Augustine, in the book On Holy Virginity, [c. 8]. § 4. Just as no one uses the body immodestly unless wickedness has first been conceived in the spirit, so no one preserves chastity in the body unless chastity has first been implanted in the spirit.

[C. VI.]

Idem in libro I. de libero arbitrio. [c. 5.] De pudicitia quis dubitauit, quin ea sit in animo constituta, quandoquidem uirtus est? Unde a uiolento stupratore nec ipsa eripi potest. Item Ieronimus super epistolam ad Romanos libro 1.: §. 1. Fieri non potest, ut, nisi quis prius mechetur in corde, mechari possit in corpore. [PALEA. Idem super Lucam in libro 2.: §. 2. Finge in persecutione aliquam uirginem prostitutam; hec apud euangelium, quia uoluntate non peccat, uirgo suscipitur, in lege quasi corrupta repudiatur. Idem in libro hebraicarum questionum: (in Genes. ad cap. 12.) §. 3. Corpus mulieris non uis maculat, sed uoluntas.] Item Augustinus in libro de sancta uirginitate: [c. 8.] §. 4. Sicut nemo inpudice utitur corpore, nisi prius spiritu concepta nequitia: ita nemo seruat pudicitiam in corpore, nisi spiritui prius insita castitate.

C. VII. Chastity cannot be violated in the body if the mind is preserved inviolate.

The same, to Victorianus, [epistle CXXII]. He who is accustomed to be present to his own will surely be present to those of his own who groan to God. Either he permits nothing to be perpetrated upon their most chaste members by hostile lust, or, if he permits it, since their mind is stained by no shamefulness of consent, they defend even their own flesh from blame. Whatever the lust of the sufferer neither committed nor permitted in it will belong solely to the fault of the doer, and all that violence will be reckoned not as the shamefulness of corruption but as the wound of suffering. For the integrity of chastity has such great force in the mind that, while it remains inviolate, chastity cannot be violated even in the body whose members could be overcome.

> C. VII. In corpore pudicitia uiolari non potest, si mens inuiolata seruetur.
> Idem Victoriano. [epist. CXXII.] Ad Deum ingemiscentibus omnino suis aderit qui suis adesse consueuit, et aut nichil in earum castissimis membris libidine hostili perpetrare permittit, aut si permittit, cum earum animus nulla consensionis turpitudine maculatur, etiam carnem suam defendunt a crimine, et quicquid in ea nec conmisit, nec permisit libido patientis, solius erit culpae facientis, omnisque illa uiolencia non pro corruptionis turpitudine, sed pro passionis uulnere deputabitur. Tantum enim ualet in mente integritas castitatis, ut illa inuiolata nec in corpore possit pudicitia uiolari, cuius membra potuerunt superari.

C. VIII. The flesh does not sin if the soul has been clean from contamination.

Likewise Isidore, in the Synonyms, Book II, [c. 1]. The body cannot be corrupted unless the mind has first been corrupted. For flesh clean from contamination of the mind does not sin.

> C. VIII. Caro non peccat, si a contagione anima fuerit munda.
> Item Ysidorus in Sinonimis, libro II. [c. I.] Non potest corpus corrumpi, nisi prius animus corruptus fuerit. Munda namque a contagione animi caro non peccat.

C. IX. Chastity of the flesh is not taken away if it is preserved in the mind.

Likewise Augustine to Bishop Honoratus, [epistle CLXXX]. Let us fear more that the chastity of faith may perish when the interior perception has been corrupted than that women may be violated by force in the flesh, because chastity is not violated by violence if it is preserved in the mind. For it is not violated even in the flesh when the will of the sufferer does not use the flesh shamefully, but without consent endures what another does.

> C. IX. Pudicitia carnis non eripitur, si mente seruatur.
>
> Item Augustinus Honorato Episcopo. [ep. CLXXX.] Magis timeamus, ne sensu interiore corrupto pereat castitas fidei, quam ne feminae constuprentur uiolenter in carne, quia uiolentia non uiolatur pudicitia, si mente seruatur, quoniam nec in carne uiolatur, quando uoluntas patientis turpiter carne non utitur, sed sine consensione tollerat quod alius operatur.

C. X. Neither sin nor justice is perfected by a work without the will.

Likewise John Chrysostom, [that is, the author of the Incomplete Work], on Matthew, [homily XXXII on c. 19]. Just as a work does not make sin without the will, so also justice is not consummated from a work unless the will is present. For many indeed pursue chastity in the body but commit adultery by the will, since the Lord says: "He who looks upon a woman to desire her has already committed adultery with her in his heart." Therefore, the will frequently sins without a work. That, therefore, is glorious continence—not one which the necessity of bodily weakness is unable to transgress, but one which the will of a holy purpose embraces.

> C. X. Nec peccatum, nec iusticia opere sine uoluntate perficitur.
> Item Iohannes Crisostomus [id est auctor operis imperfecti] super Mattheum. [hom. XXXII. ad. c. 19.] Sicut enim peccatum opus sine uoluntate non facit, ita et iusticia ex opere non consummatur, nisi et uoluntas affuerit. Multi enim corpore quidem castitati student, adulterium quidem uoluntate conmittunt cum Dominus dicat: "Qui uiderit mulierem ad concupiscendum eam, iam mechatus est eam in corde suo." Ergo uoluntas sine opere frequenter peccat. Illa est ergo gloriosa continentia, non quam transgredi non potest necessitas debilitatis corporis, sed quam conplectitur uoluntas sancti propositi.

C. XI. Virginity of the flesh is not preserved when the mind is corrupted.

Likewise Jerome, in the epistle to Eustochium, [On the Preservation of Virginity]. PART II. If the Apostle Paul, a vessel of election and prepared for the Gospel of Christ, on account of the goads of the flesh and incitements of vices restrains his body and subjects it to servitude, lest, while preaching to others, he himself be found reprobate, and nevertheless sees another law in his members fighting against the law of his mind and taking him captive in the law of sin; if, after nakedness, fasts, hunger, prisons, scourges, and torments, returning into himself he cries out, "Unhappy man that I am, who will deliver me from the body of this death?"—do you think that you ought to be secure? Beware, I ask, lest God at some time say also concerning you: "The virgin of Israel has fallen, and there is no one to raise her." I will say boldly: although God can raise all things, he cannot make a virgin after a fall. He is indeed able to deliver her from punishment, but he is not able to crown one who has been corrupted.

§ 1. Let us fear lest that prophecy also be fulfilled in us: "And good virgins will fail." Observe what he says: "And good virgins will fail," because there are also evil virgins. "He who looks upon a woman to desire her," he says, "has already committed adultery with her in his heart." Therefore, virginity also perishes in the mind. These are evil virgins: virgins in flesh, not in spirit; foolish virgins who, not having oil, are excluded by the bridegroom. But if even those who are virgins are nevertheless not saved by the virginity of their bodies because of other faults, what will happen to those who prostituted the members of Christ and changed the temple of the Holy Spirit into a brothel? Immediately they will hear the prophet saying: "Descend, sit upon the earth, virgin daughter of Babylon; sit upon the earth. There is no throne for the daughter of the Chaldeans; you will no longer be called tender and delicate. Take the millstone, grind flour, uncover your veil, bare your legs, cross the rivers; your disgrace will be revealed, your reproaches will appear." And this after the bridal chamber of the Son of God, after the kisses of the kinsman and bridegroom. She concerning whom the prophetic discourse once sang, "The queen stood at your right hand in gilded clothing, surrounded with variety," will be stripped, and her hinder parts will be placed before her face. She will sit by the waters of solitude and, after placing her vessel, will spread her feet to every passerby and be polluted up to the crown of her head. It would have been more right to have undertaken human marriage and walked upon level ground than, while striving for higher things, to fall into the depth of hell. Let not the daughter of Zion, I beseech, become a city that is a prostitute, lest, after the hospitality of the Trinity, demons dance there and Sirens and hedgehogs make their nests.

C. XI. Virginitas carnis non seruatur mente corrupta.

Item Ieronimus in epistola ad Eustochium. [de custodia uirginitatis] II. Pars. Si Paulus apostolus uas electionis, et preparatus in euangelio Christi, ob carnis aculeos et incentiua uiciorum reprimit corpus suum, et seruituti subicit, ne aliis predicans ipse reprobus inueniatur, et tamen uidet aliam legem in membris suis, repugnantem legi mentis suae, et captiuantem se in lege peccati; si post nuditatem, ieiunia, famem carceres, flagella, supplicia, in semet reuersus exclamat: "Infelix ego homo, quis me liberabit de corpore mortis huius?" tu te putas securam esse debere? Caue, queso, ne quando et de te dicat Deus: "Virgo Israel cecidit, et non est qui suscitet eam." Audenter dicam: cum omnia possit Deus suscitare uirginem non potest post ruinam. Valet quidem liberare de pena, sed non ualet coronare corruptam. §. 1. Timeamus illam prophetiam, ne in nobis etiam conpleatur: "Et uirgines bonae deficient." Obserua quid dicat: Et uirgines bonae deficient, quia sunt et uirgines malae. "Qui uiderit," inquit, "mulierem ad concupiscendum eam, iam mechatus est eam in corde suo." Perit ergo et mente uirginitas. Istae sunt uirgines malae, uirgines carne, non spiritu; uirgines stultae, que oleum non habentes excluduntur a sponso. Si autem et illae, que uirgines sunt, ob alias tamen culpas uirginitate corporum non saluantur, quid fiet illis, que prostituerunt membra Christi, et inmutauerunt templum sancti Spiritus in lupanar? Illico audient prophetam dicentem: "Descende, sede in terra uirgo filia Babilonis, sede in terra; non est filiae Chaldeorum thronus; non uocaberis ultra mollis et delicata. Accipe molam, mole farinam, discooperi uelamen tuum, denuda crura tua, transi flumina, reuelabitur ignominia tua, apparebunt opprobria tua." Et hoc post Dei filii thalamum, post oscula fratruelis et sponsi; illa, de qua quondam sermo propheticus concinebat: "Astitit regina a dextris tuis in uestitu deaurato, circumdata uarietate," nudabitur, et posteriora eius ponentur in faciem ipsius. Sedebit ad aquas solitudinis, et posito uase diuaricabit pedes suos omni transeunti, et usque ad uerticem polluetur. Rectius fuerat hominem subisse coniugium, et ambulasse per plana, quam ad altiora tendentem in profundum inferni cadere. Non fiat, obsecro, ciuitas meretrix filia Syon, ne post Trinitatis hospitium ibi demones saltent, et Syrenae nidificent et hericii.

C. XII. Sometimes chastity is lost while the body is untouched.

Likewise Augustine, On the Christian Faith. PART III. Concupiscence both seeks and is sought after by women not only by touch and affection but also by sight. Nor should you say that you have chaste minds if you have immodest eyes, because an immodest eye is the messenger of an immodest heart. And when, even while the tongue is silent, immodest hearts make themselves known to one another by mutual gaze and take delight in one another's ardor according to the concupiscence of the flesh, chastity itself flees from their conduct even though the bodies remain untouched by unclean violation.

C. XII. Corpore intacto nonnumquam castitas amittitur.

Item Augustinus de fide christiana. III. Pars. Nec solo tactu et affectu sed aspectu quoque concupiscentia appetitur et appetit feminarum. Nec dicatis uos habere animos pudicos, si habeatis oculo inpudicos, quia inpudicus oculus inpudici cordis est nuncius et, cum se inuicem sibi, etiam tacente lingua, conspectu mutuo corda nunciant inpudica, et secundum concupiscentiam carnis alterutro delectantur ardore, etiam intactis ab inmunda uiolatione corporibus fugit ipsa castitas de moribus.

C. XIII. Adultery is perpetrated when either an unmarried or married woman is shamefully desired.

Likewise Gregory, [Morals, Book XXI, c. 9]. "He who looks upon a woman to desire her has already committed adultery with her in his heart." For since an adulterer is called moechus by a Greek word, when it is not another man's wife but a woman whom one is prohibited from looking upon, the Truth openly shows that adultery is perpetrated even by sight alone when an unmarried woman is shamefully desired. Yet this is generally distinguished according to the place or order of those desiring, because an eager desire stains this person in sacred orders just as the fault of adultery stains that person; nevertheless, among persons not dissimilar the same guilt of lust is distinguished.

PART IV. GRATIAN. But although women overpowered by violence have not lost chastity, let them nevertheless not dare to equate themselves with uncontaminated virgins. Hence Pope Leo, [epistle LXXXV, otherwise LXXXVII, to the bishops of Africa, c. 5]:

> C. XIII. Adulterium perpetratur, cum uel innupta uel nupta turpiter concupiscitur.
> Item Gregorius. [in Moralibus, lib. XXI. c. 9.] "Qui uiderit mulierem ad concupiscendum eam, iam mechatus est eam in corde suo." Quia enim greco uerbo adulter mechus dicitur, cum non aliena coniux, sed mulier uideri prohibetur, aperte ueritas ostendit, quia etiam solo uisu, cum turpiter uel innupta concupiscitur, adulterium perpetratur. Quod tamen plerumque ex loco uel ordine concupiscentium discernitur, quia sic hunc studiosa in sacro ordine concupiscentia, sicut illum adulterii inquinat culpa, in personis tamen non dissimilibus idem luxuriae distinguitur reatus. IV. Pars. Gratian. Quamuis autem uiolenter oppressae pudicitiam non amiserint, incontaminatis tamen se non audeant exequare uirginibus. Unde Leo Papa: [epist. LXXXV. al. LXXXVII. ad Episcopos Afric., c. 5.]

C. XIV. Let women who are overpowered not dare to compare themselves with uncontaminated virgins.

But those handmaids of God who lost the integrity of their modesty through barbarian oppression will be more praiseworthy in humility and modesty if they do not dare to compare themselves with uncontaminated virgins. For although every sin is born from the will, and the unwilling mind could remain unpolluted by the corruption of the flesh, nevertheless this will harm them less if they grieve that they have lost in the body what they were able not to lose in the mind.

GRATIAN. Therefore, since this woman who suffered violence cannot be proved to have lost chastity, she is in no way established to have incurred the crime of fornication or adultery. For, as Augustine says in the book On the Good of Marriage, [c. 4]: "Adultery is committed when, either by the impulse of one's own lust or by consent to another's, one lies with another woman or man contrary to the marital covenant; and thus fidelity is broken, which in bodily and abject matters is a great good of the mind, and therefore it is certain that even bodily safety, by which this life also is sustained, ought to be placed after it."

> C. XIV. Que opprimuntur incontaminatis se uirginibus conparare non audeant.
> Illae autem famulae Dei, que integritatem pudoris oppressione barbarica perdiderunt, laudabiliores erunt in humilitate ac uerecundia, si se incontaminatis non audeant conparare uirginibus. Quamuis enim omne peccatum ex uoluntate nascatur, et potuerit corruptione carnis mens inuita non pollui, minus tamen hoc illis oberit, si quod potuerunt animo non amittere doleant se uel corpore perdidisse. Gratian. Cum ergo hec, que uiolentiam passa est, pudicitiam amisisse probari non potest, nullo modo conuincitur fornicationis uel adulterii crimen incurrisse. Ut enim Augustinus ait in libro de bono coniugali: [c. 4.] "Adulterium conmittitur, cum uel propriae libidinis instinctu, uel alienae consensu cum altera uel altero contra pactum coniugale concumbitur, atque ita frangitur fides, que in rebus corporeis et abiectis magnum animi bonum est, et ideo ei salutem quoque corporalem, qua etiam uita ista continetur, certum est debere postponi."

C. XV. One who mingles with someone outside the covenant of marriage commits adultery.

Likewise Isidore on Exodus, [c. 29]. "You shall not commit adultery," that is, neither let anyone mingle with other women outside the covenants of marriage to satisfy lust. For one who approaches another woman besides his own commits adultery.

C. XV. Mechatur qui alicui preter matrimonii fedus miscetur.

Item Ysidorus super Exodum. [c. 29.] "Non mechaberis," id est, nec quisquam preter matrimonii federa aliis feminis admisceatur ad explendam libidinem. Nam adulterium facit qui preter suam ad alteram accedit.

C. XVI. One who knows another woman while his wife is living commits adultery.

Likewise Augustine, On Adulterous Marriages, [Book II, c. 13]. I think no Christian disputes that a man is an adulterer who has been mingled with another woman while his own wife is either long ill, long absent, or desirous of living continently.

PART V. GRATIAN. Therefore, since none of these things is discovered to have been present in this woman—because she neither adhered to another by the impulse of her own lust, nor by consent to another's, nor while her husband was ill, absent, or desirous of living continently, but, having been violently overpowered by another's lust, suffered force—it appears that she can be called neither a fornicator nor an adulteress. Hence she cannot be put away on any ground. For when the Jews asked Christ whether it was lawful for a man to put away his wife for any cause, he answered them: "Have you never read that he who made them from the beginning created them male and female? Therefore, what God has joined, let man not separate." Then he concluded his discourse by saying that no one can put away his wife except for the cause of fornication. Hence the Apostle says in the Epistle to the Corinthians: "To those who are joined in marriage I command—not I, but the Lord—that the wife is not to depart from the husband." From this it is given to be understood that, whatever the husband and wife may be like, once they have adhered to one another with marital affection, they cannot thereafter depart from one another. Hence Ambrose writes in the Hexameron, under the title of the fourth day:

C. XVI. Qui uiuente uxore sua alteram cognoscit adulterium conmittit.

Item Augustinus de adulterinis coniugiis. [l. II. c. 13.] Puto Christianum neminem reluctari, adulterum esse, qui uel diu languente, uel diu absente, uel continenter uiuere cupiente sua uxore, alteri conmixtus est feminae. V. Pars. Gratian. Cum ergo nichil horum in ista deprehendatur fuisse, quia nec propriae libidinis instinctu, nec alienae consensu, nec uiro languente uel absente, uel continenter uiuere cupiente alii adhesit, sed uiolenter aliena libidine oppressa uim pertulit, apparet, quod nec fornicaria, nec adultera dici potest. Unde nec aliqua occasione ualet dimitti. Cum enim quererent Iudei Christo, utrum liceret homini dimittere uxorem suam quacumque ex causa, respondit eis: "Numquam legistis, quia qui fecit eos ab inicio masculum et feminam creauit eos? Quod ergo Deus coniunxit homo non separet." Deinde ita sermonem suum conclusit, ut diceret, neminem posse dimittere uxorem suam, excepta causa fornicationis. Hinc Apostolus ait in epistola ad Chorinthios: "His, qui matrimonio iuncti sunt, precipio non ego, sed Dominus, uxorem a uiro non discedere." Unde datur intelligi, quod qualiscumque fuerit uir et uxor, ex quo coniugali affectu sibi adheserint, ulterius ab inuicem discedere non ualent. Unde Ambrosius in Hexameron, titulo diei quartae, scribit:

C. XVII. Whatever a husband may be like, once he was pleasing, he is not to be put away.

The husband who once was pleasing is horrible and uncultivated; is another husband therefore to be chosen? A horse loves its mate, and if another is substituted, it does not know how to draw the yoke with another's mate and thinks itself not whole. You repudiate your yoke-mate and think that he must often be changed? Change him, and if he fails for one day, bring in a rival; and immediately, when the cause is unknown, do you prosecute an injury to modesty as though it were known?

C. XVII. Qualiscumque sit uir, ex quo semel placuit, non est dimittendus.

Horrendus et incultus est uir qui semel placuit; numquid uir alius est eligendus? Conparem suum equus diligit, et, si mutetur alius, trahere iugum nescit conpar alterius, et se non totum putat. Tu iugalem repudias tuum, et sepe mutandum putas? muta et si uno defecerit die, superduc riualem, et statim, incognita causa, quasi cognitam pudoris exequeris iniuriam?

C. XVIII. The same is understood concerning a wife.

Likewise Augustine, [On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, Book I, c. 32]. If someone has a wife who is sterile, deformed in body, weak in her limbs, blind, deaf, lame, or anything else; or if she is worn down by diseases, labors, and pains; and whatever intensely horrible thing can be imagined, except fornication—let him sustain it for the sake of fellowship and fidelity.

C. XVIII. Similiter de uxore intelligitur.

Item Augustinus. [de sermone Domini in monte, lib. I. c. 32.] Si uxorem quis habeat sterilem, siue corpore deformem siue debilem membris, uel cecam, uel surdam, uel claudam, uel si quid aliud, siue morbis, uel laboribus doloribusque, confectam, et quicquid (excepta fornicatione) cogitari potest uehementer horrible, pro societate fideque sustineat.

C. XIX. It is not lawful for a man to put away his wife except for the cause of fornication.

Likewise Jerome to Oceanus, On the Death of Fabiola. The Lord commanded that a wife ought not to be put away except for the cause of fornication, and that, if she has been put away, she is to remain unmarried. Whatever is commanded to men consequently redounds to women. For an adulterous wife is not to be put away while an adulterous husband is to be retained.

C. XIX. Non licet uiro uxorem dimittere nisi causa fornicationis.

Item Ieronimus ad Oceanum de morte Fabiolae. Precepit Dominus, uxorem non debere dimitti, excepta causa fornicationis, et, si dimissa fuerit, manere innuptam. Quicquid uiris precipitur, hoc consequenter redundat ad feminas. Neque enim adultera uxor dimittenda est, et uir mechus tenendus est.

[C. XX.] Likewise.

Among us, what is not lawful for women is equally not lawful for men, and the same servitude is assessed under an equal condition.

> [C. XX.] Item.
> Apud nos quod non licet feminis eque non licet uiris, et eadem seruitus pari condicione censetur.

C. XXI. Let one who puts away his wife apart from the cause of fornication be deprived of communion.

Likewise from the Twelfth Council of Toledo, [c. 8]. PART VI. It is the Lord's precept that a wife ought not to be put away by her husband except for the cause of fornication. Therefore, whoever leaves his wife on any ground apart from guilt of the aforesaid crime, because he has determined to separate what God joined, is to remain deprived of ecclesiastical communion and alien to the assembly of all Christians for as long as he does not sincerely embrace and foster fellowship with the spouse he left. Accordingly, those who, after already being admonished once, twice, and three times by a priest to correct themselves, are unwilling to return to fellowship with their spouse will by their own merits separate themselves also from an office of palatine dignity and, furthermore, will lose the testimony of noble dignity for as long as they remain in the fault, because they have delivered their own flesh to the throat of separation.

> C. XXI. Conmunione priuetur qui citra fornicationis causam uxorem suam dimittit.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano XII. [c. 8.] VI. Pars. Preceptum Domini est, ut excepta causa fornicationis uxor a uiro dimitti non debeat, et ideo quicumque citra culpam criminis supradicti uxorem suam quacumque occasione reliquerit, quia quod Deus iunxit ille separare disposuit, tamdiu ab ecclesiastica conmunione priuatus, et a cetu omnium Christianorum maneat alienus, quamdiu societatem relictae coniugis sinceriter amplectatur et foueat. Itaque qui iam admoniti sacerdote semel et bis et ter, ut corrigantur, ad suae coniugis noluerint redire consortium ipsi se suis meritis et a palatinae dignitatis offitio separabunt, et insuper generosae dignitatis testimonium, quamdiu in culpa fuerint, amissuri sunt, quia carnem suam discidii iugulo tradiderunt.

[C. XXII.] Likewise.

Nicholas in response to the inquiries of the Bulgars, [c. 96]. Whatever a woman has plotted against you, or if she has accused you, she is not to be rejected or utterly held in hatred, except for the cause of fornication.

PART VII. GRATIAN. But it is asked: since the condition of each is equal, why are men who have communion with adulterous wives not summoned, while, to the contrary, wives are seen to remain in fellowship with adulterous husbands? Concerning these matters Pope Innocent writes thus, [epistle III, to Bishop Exsuperius, c. 4]:

> [C. XXII.] Item.
> Nykolaus ad consulta Bulgarorum. [c. 96.] Quicquid mulier contra te cogitauerit uel si te accusauerit, non est, excepta causa fornicationis, reicienda uel prorsus odio habenda VII. Pars. Gratian. Sed queritur, cum sit par utriusque condicio, cur communicantes uiri cum adulteris uxoribus non conueniant, cum econtra uxores in consortio adulterorum uirorum manere uideantur. De his ita scribit Innocentius Papa: [epist. III., ad Exsuperium Episcopum, c. 4.]

C. XXIII. Adultery is punished by equal reasoning in each sex.

The Christian religion condemns adultery by equal reasoning in each sex. But women do not readily accuse their husbands of adultery, and hidden sins do not have punishment. Men, however, are accustomed more freely to report adulterous wives before priests, and therefore, when their crime has been disclosed, communion is denied to women; but when the deed of men lies hidden, no one is readily excluded on the basis of suspicions. He will certainly be removed if his shameful deed is uncovered. For since the case is equal, sometimes, when proof is lacking, the principle of punishment rests.

> C. XXIII. In utroque sexu adulterium pari ratione punitur.
> Christiana religio adulterium in utroque sexu pari ratione condempnat. Sed uiros suos mulieres non facile de adulterio accusant, et non habent latentia peccata uindictam. Viri autem liberius uxores adulteras apud sacerdotes deferre consueuerunt, et ideo mulieribus, prodito earum crimine, conmunio denegatur; uirorum autem latente conmisso non facile quisquam ex suspicionibus abstinetur; qui utique submouebitur, si eius flagicium detegatur. Cum enim par causa sit, interdum probatione cessante uindictae ratio conquiescit.

Question VI

GRATIAN. Behold, this woman cannot be put away, since she is found innocent of fornication. But suppose that she herself is an adulteress. It is asked whether an adulterous man can put her away for the cause of fornication. For it does not seem that one infected by an equal crime can punish another for the same. Hence, when the Jews accused the adulteress, they received from the Lord the judgment of equity: "Whichever of you is without sin, let him first cast a stone at her." Hence it is also commanded in the Gospel: "Hypocrite, first cast the beam out of your eye, and afterward you will cast the mote out of your brother's eye." Hence Augustine also writes in Book I On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, [c. 28]:

> GRATIANUS. Ecce, quod ista dimitti non ualet, cum innocens a fornicatione inueniatur. Sed ponatur, quod ipsa sit adultera, queritur, si adulter possit dimittere eam causa fornicationis? Non enim uidetur, quod pari crimine infectus alium de eodem punire possit. Unde, cum Iudei adulteram accusarent equitatis sententiam a Domino acceperunt: "Quicumque uestrum sine peccato est primus in illam lapidem mittat." Hinc etiam in euangelio precipitur: "Ypocrita, primum eice trabem de oculo tuo, et postea educes festucam de oculo fratris tui." Hinc etiam Augustinus scribit in libro I. de sermone Domini in monte: [c. 28.]

C. I. One who fornicates cannot put away his wife for the cause of fornication.

Nothing is more unjust than to put away a wife for the cause of fornication if the man himself is also proved to fornicate. For that saying meets him: "In that in which you judge another, you condemn yourself, for you do the same things that you judge." Therefore, whoever wishes to cast off his wife for the cause of fornication must first be purged of fornication. I would say the same also concerning a woman.

> C. I. Qui fornicatur fornicationis causa uxorem suam dimittere non potest.

Nichil iniquius est quam causa fornicationis dimittere uxorem, si et ipse conuincitur fornicari. Occurrit enim illud: "In quo alterum iudicas te ipsum condempnas, eadem enim agis, que iudicas." Quapropter quisquis fornicationis causa uult abicere uxorem, prior debet a fornicatione esse purgatus. Quod similiter etiam de femina dixerim.

C. II. Let each man preserve himself for his wife as he wishes to find her.

The same, On the Words of the Lord, tractate [or sermon] XLVI. If you are going to take wives, preserve yourselves for your wives. As you wish to find them, let them also find you. What young man is there who does not wish to take a chaste wife? And if he is going to receive a virgin, who does not desire her untouched? You seek one untouched? Be untouched. You seek one pure? Be pure. For it is not the case that she can and you cannot.

C. II. Qualem quisque uult inuenire uxorem, talem se seruet eidem.

Idem de uerbis Domini, tractatu [siue serm.] XLVI. Si ducturi estis uxores, seruate uos uxoribus uestris. Quales uultis eas inuenire, tales et ipsae uos inueniant. Quis iuuenis est, qui non castam uelit ducere uxorem? et si accepturus est uirginem, quis non intactam desideret? Intactam queris intactus esto; queris puram? purus esto. Non enim illa potest, et tu non potes.

C. III. One who disdains being judged concerning himself ought not to seek judgment concerning another.

The same, in the epistle to Paxentius, the Arian count, [epistle CLXXIV]. It is unjust for someone to wish to judge concerning another and to be unwilling to be judged concerning himself.

C. III. Iudicium de alio expetere non debet qui de se iudicari contempnit.

Idem in epistola ad Paxentium, Comitem Arrianum. [epist. CLXXIV.] Iniquum est, ut quisque de alio iudicare uelit, et iudicari de se nolit.

C. IV. Men are to be punished more gravely than women for adultery.

The same, On Adulterous Marriages, [Book II, c. 8]. Husbands are indignant if they hear that adulterous men pay penalties similar to adulterous women, although the former ought to be punished so much more gravely insofar as it pertains more to them both to conquer women by virtue and to govern them by example.

C. IV. Viri grauius sunt puniendi quam mulieres de adulterio.

Idem de adulterinis coniugiis. [lib. II. c. 8.] Indignantur mariti, si audiant adulteros uiros pendere similes adulteris feminis penas, cum tanto grauius eos puniri oportuerit, quanto magis ad eos pertinet et uirtute uincere, et exemplo regere feminas.

C. V. Just as the man is the head of the woman, so by committing adultery he sins more gravely than the woman.

The same, On the Ten Strings, [c. 3]. "You shall not commit adultery," that is, you shall not go to any other woman besides your wife. But do you demand this from your wife and refuse to render it to your wife? And although you ought to precede your wife in virtue—since chastity is a virtue—do you fall under one impulse of lust? And do you wish your wife to be victorious while you lie conquered? And since you are the head of your wife, does she whose head you are precede you to God? Do you wish your house to hang upside down? For the man is the head of the woman. But where the woman lives better than the man, the house hangs upside down. If the man is the head, the man ought to live better and to precede his wife in all good works.

GRATIAN. By these authorities it is shown that an adulterous man cannot put away an adulterous wife.

> C. V. Sicut uir est caput mulieris, sic adulterando grauius delinquit quam mulier.
> Idem de decem cordis. [c. 3.] "Non mechaberis," id est non ibis ad aliquam aliam preter uxorem tuam. Tu autem exigis hoc ab uxore, et non uis reddere hoc uxori? et cum debeas in uirtute precedere uxorem, (quoniam castitas uirtus est) tu sub uno impetu libidinis cadis? et uis uxorem tuam uictricem esse, tu uictus iaces? et cum tu caput sis uxoris precedit te ad Deum cuius caput es? uis tuam domum capite deorsum pendere? Caput enim mulieris est uir. Ubi autem melius uiuit mulier quam uir, capite deorsum pendet domus. Si caput est uir, melius debet uiuere uir, et precedere in omnibus bonis factis uxorem suam. Gratian. His auctoritatibus monstratur, quod adulter adulteram dimittere non ualet.

Question VII

GRATIAN. PART I. But now it is asked whether one who has put away his wife for the cause of fornication can take another while she is living. That this cannot be done is attested by Augustine in the book On the Good of Marriage, [c. 7], saying:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Nunc autem queritur, si ille, qui dimiserit uxorem suam causa fornicationis, illa uiuente aliam ducere poterit? Quod autem hoc fieri non possit, testatur Augustinus in libro de bono coniugali [c. 7.] dicens:

C. I. The bond of marriage cannot be dissolved by fornication.

When divorce—that is, marital separation—intervenes, the marriage covenant is not abolished, so that even separated persons are spouses to one another; but adultery is committed with those to whom they have been joined after their repudiation.

> C. I. Vinculum coniugii fornicatione dissolui non potest.
> Interueniente diuortio non aboletur confederatio nuptialis, ita ut sibi coniuges sint etiam separati, cum illis autem adulterium conmittitur, quibus etiam fuerint post suum repudium copulati.

C. II. A marriage that is proved to have once been entered is dissolved for no reason.

The same, On Adulterous Marriages, Book II, [cc. 4 and 5]. A wife is lawfully put away on account of the cause of fornication, but the former bond remains. For this reason, whoever takes a woman put away on account of fornication becomes guilty of adultery. But just as, while the sacrament of regeneration remains in that person, whoever is guilty of a crime is excommunicated, so a woman who is separated from her husband will never lack the sacrament of marriage, even if she is not reconciled to her husband. But she will lack it if her husband has died. One guilty of excommunication, however, will for this reason never lack the sacrament of regeneration, even while unreconciled, because God never dies.

> C. II. Nulla ratione dissoluitur coniugium, quod semel initum probatur.

Idem de adulterinis coniugiis, libro II. [c. 4. et 5.] Licite dimittitur uxor ob causam fornicationis, sed manet uinculum prioris. Propter quod fit reus adulterii quicumque duxerit dimissam ob causam fornicationis. Sicut autem, manente in se sacramento regenerationis, excommunicatur quisquis reus criminis est, ita que separatur a uiro numquam carebit sacramento coniugii, etiamsi non reconcilietur uiro. Carebit autem, si mortuus fuerit uir eius. Reus uero excommunicationis ideo numquam carebit regenerationis sacramento, etiam non reconciliatus, quia numquam moritur Deus.

C. III. Whether a husband has departed from his wife or a wife from her husband for the cause of fornication, the departing spouse is prohibited from adhering to another.

The same, on Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians. The Apostle says: "To those who are in marriage I command—not I, but the Lord—that the wife is not to depart from the husband; but if she has departed, she is to remain unmarried or be reconciled to her husband." For it can happen that she departs for the cause which the Lord permitted. But if a woman is permitted to put away her husband because of the cause of fornication, what will we answer concerning what he says afterward: "And let the husband not put away the wife"? Why does he not add "except for the cause of fornication," which the Lord permits, unless because he wishes a similar form to be understood: that if he has put her away—which is permitted for the cause of fornication—he is to remain without a wife or be reconciled to his wife?

And after a few words: § 1. But the Lord permitted a wife to be put away for the cause of fornication. Yet because he permitted it, he did not command it.

C. III. Siue uir ab uxore, siue uxor a uiro causa fornicationis discesserit, alteri adherere prohibetur.

Idem super epistolam Pauli ad Chorinthios. Apostolus dicit: "His, qui sunt in coniugio precipio non ego, sed Dominus, uxorem a uiro non discedere; quod si discesserit, manere innuptam, aut reconciliari uir suo." Potest enim fieri, ut discedat ea causa, quam Dominus permisit. At, si feminae licet uirum dimittere propter causam fornicationis quid respondebimus de hoc, quod dicit posterius: "Et uir uxorem non dimittat?" quare non addit: "excepta causa fornicationis," quod Dominus permittit? nisi quod similem formam uult intelligi, ut, si dimiserit, (quod causa fornicationis permittitur), maneat sine uxore, aut reconcilietur uxori? Et post pauca: §. 1. Dominus autem permisit causa fornicationis uxorem dimitti. Sed quia permisit, non iussit.

[C. IV.]

The same, On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, [Book I, c. 25]. It can happen that a man puts away his wife for the cause of fornication, which the Lord wished to be excepted. But if neither is she permitted to marry while the husband from whom she departed is living, nor is he permitted to take another while the wife whom he put away is living, much less is it right to commit unlawful acts of illicit intercourse with anyone whatever.

[C. IV.]

Idem de sermone Domini in monte. [lib. I. c. 25.] Fieri potest, ut uir dimittat uxorem causa fornicationis, quam Dominus exceptam esse uoluit. Iam uero si nec illi nubere conceditur uiro uiuo, a quo recessit, neque huic alteram ducere uiua uxore, quam dimisit, multo minus fas est illicita cum quibuslibet stupra conmittere.

C. V. A man put away by his wife, or a woman put away by her husband, is to be brought to penance unless they wish either to live continently or to be reconciled to one another.

Likewise from the Council of Milevis, [c. 17]. It was decided that, according to evangelical and apostolic discipline, neither a man put away by his wife nor a woman put away by her husband is to be joined to another, but let them remain thus or be reconciled to one another. But if they despise this, let them be brought to penance.

> C. V. Ab uxore dimissus, uel dimissa a uiro, ad penitenciam redigantur, nisi aut continenter uiuere, aut sibi reconciliari uoluerint.
> Item ex Concilio Mileuitano. [c. 17.] Placuit, ut secundum euangelicam et apostolicam disciplinam neque dimissus ab uxore, neque dimissa a marito alteri coniungatur, sed ita maneant, aut sibimet reconcilientur. Quod si contempserint, ad penitenciam redigantur.

C. VI. One who presumes to take a woman put away by her husband commits adultery.

Likewise Augustine, Book I On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, [c. 25]. To confirm that a wife is not readily put away, the Lord excepted the sole cause of fornication; but he commands all other troubles, if any arise, to be bravely sustained for the sake of marital fidelity and chastity. And he also calls the man who takes a woman released from her husband an adulterer.

> C. VI. Mechatur qui a uiro dimissam ducere presumit.
> Item Augustinus [l. I.] de sermone Domini in monte. [c. 25.] Dominus ad illud confirmandum, ut non facile dimittatur uxor, solam causam fornicationis excepit, ceteras uero uniuersas molestias, si que extiterint, iubet pro fide coniugali, et pro castitate fortiter sustineri. Et mechum dicit etiam uirum, qui eam duxerit, que soluta est a uiro.

C. VII. A woman who marries another while her husband is living is proved to be an adulteress.

Likewise Jerome to the priest Amandus. Cutting off all excuses, the Apostle most openly determined that a woman is an adulteress if she marries another while her husband is living. I do not wish you to put forward to me the violence of an abductor, the provision of a mother, the authority of a father, a crowd of relatives, the snares of servants, or losses to the parents' household property. For as long as the husband lives—although he is an adulterer, although a sodomite, although covered with every shameful deed and abandoned by his wife because of these crimes—he is reckoned her husband, and she is not permitted to receive another husband. The Apostle does not determine this by his own authority; rather, with Christ speaking in him, he followed the words of Christ, who says in the Gospel: "He who puts away his wife, except for the cause of fornication, causes her to commit adultery; and he who receives a woman put away is an adulterer." Hence the Apostles also, understanding the grave burden of marriage, say: "If it is so, it is not expedient for a man to receive a wife." To this the Lord says, "He who is able to receive it, let him receive it," and immediately, under the example of the three eunuchs, introduces the blessedness of virginity, which is restrained by no law of the flesh.

> C. VII. Adultera probatur que uiuente marito alteri nubit.

Item Ieronimus ad Amandum Presbiterum. Omnes causationes Apostolus amputans apertissime diffiniuit, uiuente uiro esse adulteram mulierem, si alteri nupserit. Nolo michi proferas raptoris uiolentiam, matris prestationem, patris auctoritatem, propinquorum cateruam, seruorum insidias, parentum dampna rei familiaris. Quamdiu uiuit uir, licet adulter sit, licet sodomita, licet flagiciis omnibus coopertus, et ab uxore propter hec scelera derelictus, maritus est reputatus, cui alterum uirum accipere non licet. Non hoc Apostolus propria auctoritate decernit, sed Christo in se loquente Christi uerba sectatus est, qui ait in euangelio: "Qui dimittit uxorem suam, excepta causa fornicationis, facit eam mechari, et qui dimissam acceperit adulter est." Unde et Apostoli grauem coniugii sarcinam intelligentes: "Si ita est," inquiunt, "non expedit homini uxorem accipere." Ad quod Dominus, "qui potest," inquit, "capere capiat," statimque sub exemplo trium eunuchorum uirginitatis infert beatitudinem, que nulla carnis lege retinetur.

C. VIII. It is not lawful for a believing woman who puts away an adulterous husband to marry another.

Likewise from the Council of Elvira, [c. 9]. Let a believing woman who has left a believing adulterous husband and takes another be prohibited from taking him. But if she has taken him, let her not receive communion before the man whom she left has departed from the world, unless perhaps the necessity of illness compels it to be given.

C. VIII. Mulieri fideli, que uirum adulterum dimittit, alii nubere non licet.

Item ex Concilio Elibertano. [c. 9.] Fidelis femina, que adulterum maritum reliquerit fidelem, et alterum ducit, prohibeatur ne ducat. Si autem duxerit, non prius accipiat conmunionem, quam is, quem reliquerit, de seculo exierit, nisi forte necessitas infirmitatis dare conpulerit.

C. IX. One who is joined in many marriages is to be compelled to penance.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [that is, from the Capitula of Martin of Braga, c. 80]. If anyone has been joined in many marriages, let him perform penance. But let the penitent's manner of life and faith determine the period.

C. IX. Ad penitenciam est cogendus qui multis nuptiis copulatur.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [id est ex cap. Martini Bracarensis, c. 80.] Si quis fuerit multis nuptiis copulatus, penitenciam agat. Conuersatio autem et fides penitentis tempus conprehendat.

C. X. One who puts away his wife because of fornication and takes another is proved to commit adultery.

Likewise Augustine, On Adulterous Marriages, Book I, [c. 9]. Just as it cannot rightly be said, "If a person does not know, he does not sin"—for there are also sins of the ignorant, although lesser than those of persons who know—so it cannot rightly be said, "If a husband has put away his wife for the cause of fornication and has taken another, he does not commit adultery." For there is adultery also by those who take other women after leaving their former wives because of fornication, although it is certainly lesser than that of those who put them away not because of fornication.

PART II. GRATIAN. For there are degrees in fornication, so that, just as an adulterer sins more gravely than a fornicator, so one who takes another without his own wife having been put away commits a graver offense than one who puts away his own and knows another. Likewise, one who has a wife and approaches his neighbor's spouse sins more gravely than one who, without a wife, violates another's bed, or one who, being married, approaches an unmarried woman. But incestuous persons surpass all these, and those who sin against nature surpass them. Hence Augustine, On Adulterous Marriages:

C. X Qui ob fornicationem uxorem dimittit, et aliam ducit, mechari probatur.

Item Augustinus de adulterinis coniugiis, libro I. [c. 9.] Quemadmodum non recte dici potest: si nescit homo, non peccat, (sunt enim etiam peccata ignorantium, quamuis minora quam scientium), ita non recte dici potest: si causa fornicationis dimiserit uxorem uir, et aliam duxerit, non mechatur. Est enim mechatio etiam eorum, qui alias ducunt relictis propter fornicationem prioribus, sed utique minor, quam eorum, qui non propter fornicationem dimittunt. II. Pars. Gratian. Sunt enim in fornicatione gradus, ut, sicut grauius peccat adulter quam fornicator, sic grauius delinquit qui nec sua dimissa aliam ducit, eo, qui suam dimittens aliam cognoscit; grauius quoque, qui uxorem habens ad coniugem proximi sui accedit, quam qui sine uxore thorum alterius uiolat, uel uxoratus ad solutam accedens. Sed hos omnes incestuosi transcendunt, quos uincunt contra naturam delinquentes. Unde Augustinus de adulterinis coniugiis:

[C. XI.]

"The evil of adultery surpasses fornication, but is surpassed by incest. For it is worse to lie with one's mother than with another man's wife. But the worst of all these is what is done against nature, as if a man should wish to use a woman's member not conceded for this purpose. For if natural use slips beyond measure, it is indeed venial with a wife but condemnable with a prostitute. The use that is against nature is done execrably with a prostitute, but more execrably with a wife. The ordering of the Creator and the order of the creature have such great force that, in matters conceded for use, even when the measure is exceeded, this is far more tolerable than one or a rare excess in those matters that have not been conceded."

[C. XI.]

"Adulterii malum uincit fornicationem, uincitur autem ab incestu. Peius est enim cum matre, quam cum aliena uxore concumbere. Sed omnium horum pessimum est quod contra naturam fit, ut si uir membro mulieris non ad hoc concesso uoluerit uti. Usus enim naturalis si ultra modum prolabitur, in uxore quidem ueniale est, in meretrice dampnabile Iste, qui est contra naturam, execrabiliter fit in meretrice, sed execrabilius in uxore. Tantum ualet ordinatio creatoris et ordo creaturae, ut in rebus ad utendum concessis, etiam cum modus exceditur, longe sit tollerabilius, quam in eis, que concessa non sunt, uel unus uel rarus excessus."

C. XII. Intercourse according to nature is a lesser evil than sinning against nature.

Likewise Ambrose, in the book On the Patriarchs, [Book I, On Abraham, c. 6]. Holy Lot offered the modesty of his daughters. For although that too was shameful impurity, nevertheless intercourse according to nature was a lesser evil than sinning against nature. He preferred the gracious duty of hospitality, inviolable even among barbarous nations, to the modesty of his house.

C. XII. Minus est secundum naturam coire, quam contra naturam delinquere.

Item Ambrosius in libro de Patriarchis. [lib. I. de Abraham c. 6.] Offerebat sanctus Loth filiarum pudorem. Nam etsi illa quoque flagiciosa inpuritas erat, tamen minus erat secundum naturam coire, quam aduersus naturam delinquere. Preferebat domus suae uerecundiae hospitalem gratiam, etiam apud barbaras gentes inuiolabilem.

C. XIII. Shameful deeds that are proved to be against nature are more grave.

Likewise Augustine, Confessions, Book III, [c. 8]. Shameful deeds that are against nature are everywhere and always to be repudiated and punished, such as those of the Sodomites. If all nations committed them, they would be held by divine law under the same guilt of crime, for that law did not make human beings so that they would use one another in that manner. Indeed, the very fellowship that we ought to have with God is violated when the same nature, whose author he is, is polluted by the perversity of lust.

C. XIII. Grauiora sunt flagicia, que contra naturam probantur.

Item Augustinus Confessionum libro III. [c. 8.] Flagicia, que sunt contra naturam, ubique ac semper repudianda atque punienda sunt; qualia Sodomitarum fuerunt. Que si omnes gentes facerent, eodem criminis reatu diuina lege tenerentur, que non sic fecit homines, ut se illo uterentur modo. Violatur quippe ipsa societas, que cum Deo nobis esse debet, cum eadem natura, cuius ipse auctor est, libidinis peruersitate polluitur.

C. XIV. Use against nature is more shameful and more disgraceful than fornication or adultery.

The same, Against Jovinian, Book I. Natural use is lawful, as in marriage, and unlawful, as in adultery. But that which is against nature is always unlawful and without doubt more disgraceful and shameful. The holy Apostle reproved it both in women and in men, wishing them to be understood as more condemnable than if they sinned in natural use either by committing adultery or fornication.

C. XIV. Turpior et flagitiosior est usus contra naturam, quam fornicationis uel adulterii.

Idem contra Iouinianum, libro I. Usus naturalis et licitus est sicut in coniugio, et illicitus sicut in adulterio. Contra naturam uero semper illicitus, et proculdubio flagiciosior atque turpior, quem S. Apostolus et in feminis, et in masculis arguebat, dampnabiliores uolens intelligi, quam si in usu naturali uel adulterando uel fornicando peccarent.

C. XV. Every unclean pollution is fornication, although the sins of fornication are various.

Likewise Isidore, [Book II On the Highest Good, c. 39]. PART III. Sin reigns in a person not only from committed fornication but, if that person still takes delight in it and it holds the mind, without doubt it reigns. Fornication of the flesh is adultery; fornication of the mind is servitude to idols. There is also spiritual fornication, concerning which the Lord says: "He who looks upon a woman to desire her has already committed adultery with her in his heart." Every unclean pollution is called fornication, although each person prostitutes himself by a different pleasure of shamefulness. For from delight in fornicating various shameful deeds are begotten, by which the kingdom of God is closed, so that a person is separated from God.

§ 1. Among the other seven vices, fornication is of the greatest wickedness, because through the uncleanness of the flesh it violates the temple of God. There are also certain women who, like animals, continually serve lust without any discretion; I would not compare them even to dumb beasts. For when cattle have conceived, they no longer grant males access to themselves.

> Item Ysidorus. [lib. II. de summo bono c. 39.] III. Pars. Non solum de conmissa fornicatione peccatum regnat in homine, sed, si adhuc delectatur, atque animum teneat, proculdubio regnat. Fornicatio carnis adulterium est: fornicatio animi seruitus est idolorum. Est autem et spiritualis fornicatio, de qua Dominus ait: "Qui uiderit mulierem ad concupiscendum eam, iam mechatus est eam in corde suo." Omnis inmunda pollutio fornicatio dicitur, quamuis quisque diuersa turpitudinis uoluptate prostituatur. Ex delectatione enim fornicandi uaria gignuntur flagicia, quibus regnum Dei clauditur, ut homo a Deo separetur. §. 1. Inter cetera septem uicia fornicatio maximi est sceleris, quia per carnis inmunditiam templum Dei uiolat. Sunt autem quedam, que sicut animalia absque ulla discretione indesinenter libidini seruiunt, quas ego nec mutis pecudibus conparauerim. Pecora enim cum conceperint, ultra non indulgent maribus copiam sui.

C. XVI. Adultery holds the second place among punishments.

Likewise from the First Epistle of Clement, [to James]. What among all sins is more grave than adultery? For it holds the second place among punishments; those indeed hold the first who stray from God, even if they have lived soberly.

GRATIAN. By these authorities it is most clearly shown that whoever puts away his wife for the cause of fornication will not be able to take another while she is living; and if he has taken one, he will be guilty of adultery.

PART IV. § 1. To these things it is answered thus: These authorities speak of those whose continence carnal weakness does not impede, or of those who, by furnishing the cause of separation, rendered themselves unworthy of union with others. Hence Ambrose on the First Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, [on c. 7]:

> C. XVI. Adulterium secundum in penis obtinet locum.
> Item ex epistola [I.] Clementis. [ad Iacobum] Quid in omnibus peccatis est adulterio grauius? Secundum namque in penis obtinet locum, quem quidem primum illi habent, qui aberrant a Deo, etiamsi sobrie uixerint. Gratian. His auctoritatibus euidentissime monstratur, quod quicumque causa fornicationis uxorem suam dimiserit, illa uiuente aliam ducere non poterit, et, si duxerit, reus adulterii erit. IV. Pars. §. 1. His ita respondetur. He auctoritates de eis locuntur, quorum continentiam carnalis infirmitas non inpedit, uel de his, qui, prestantes causam discidii, aliorum coniunctione se reddiderunt indignos. Unde Ambrosius super [1.] epistolam Pauli ad Chorinthios: [ad c. 7.]

[C. XVII.]

"Let a wife not depart from her husband except for the cause of fornication; but if she has departed, let her either remain unmarried or be reconciled to her husband; and likewise let the husband not put away his wife." Therefore, he does not add concerning the husband what he set forth concerning the wife, because the husband is permitted to take another.

> [C. XVII.]
> '"Uxor a uiro non discedat, nisi causa fornicationis; quod si discesserit, aut maneat innupta, aut reconcilietur uiro suo; et uir similiter non dimittat uxorem.' Ideo non subdit de uiro quod de uxore premisit, quia uiro licet ducere aliam."

C. XVIII. It is lawful for a man whose wife is unable to render him the marital due because of bodily infirmity to take another.

Likewise Gregory the Younger to Bishop Boniface, [epistle IV]. As to what you proposed—if a woman seized by infirmity has been unable to render the marital due to her husband, what her spouse is to do—it would be good if he remained thus, so that he might devote himself to abstinence. But because this belongs to great persons, let one who cannot contain himself marry instead; nevertheless, let him not withdraw the aid of support from her whom infirmity impedes and no detestable fault excludes.

PART V. GRATIAN. But that saying of Ambrose is said to have been inserted by falsifiers. That saying of Gregory is found to be utterly opposed to the sacred canons—indeed, to evangelical and apostolic teaching. But certain persons, desiring to preserve the judgment of Ambrose, judge that it is to be understood not of just any fornication, so that a man might lawfully put away his wife on account of any fornication and take another while the woman put away is living, but only of incestuous fornication: namely, when someone's wife has publicly handed herself over to be defiled by the father and son, the husband's brother or maternal uncle, or someone similar. Because she has rendered herself permanently unlawful for her husband by passing through union with a blood relative into the first, second, or third degree of affinity, she is lawfully put away and another is brought in while she lives. If anyone here contends that it is no more lawful for a man than for a woman—if the husband fornicates with someone in the same manner—let that person know that "man" was used by Ambrose not for sex but for strength of mind, and understand that "woman" likewise was named not for the sex of the body but for softness of mind. But because no authority permits another wife to be brought in while a wife is living, that saying of Ambrose is understood, in the aforesaid kind of fornication, not to mean that one can take another while the woman put away is living, but that after the death of the female fornicator or male fornicator—each of whom, as was said above, is called "woman" because of the corruption of lust—the one who is clean from fornication, whether man or woman, can be joined to another; but adulterers, if they survive, will in no way be able to be joined to others. Thus also is understood what is read in a chapter of a certain Council:

C. XVIII Licet ducere aliam infirmo, cui sua ob infirmitatem corporis debitum reddere non ualet.

Item Gregorius iunior Bonifatio Episcopo. [epist. IV.] Quod posuisti, si mulier infirmitate correpta non ualuerit uiro debitum reddere, quid eius faciat iugalis: bonum esset, si sic permaneret, ut abstinentiae uacaret. Sed quia hoc magnorum est, ille, qui se non poterit continere, nubat magis; non tamen ei subsidii opem subtrahat, quam infirmitas prepedit, non detestabilis culpa excludit. V. Pars. Gratian. Sed illud Ambrosii a falsatoribus dicitur insertum. Illud Gregorii sacris canonibus, imo euangelicae et apostolicae doctrinae penitus inuenitur aduersum. Quidam uero, sententiam Ambrosii seruare cupientes, non de qualibet fornicatione illud arbitrantur intelligi, ut ob quamlibet fornicationem uir licite dimittat uxorem, et uiuente dimissa aliam ducat, sed de incestuosa tantum fornicatione intelligitur, cum uxor uidelicet alicuius, patri et filio, fratri uel auunculo uiri sui, uel alicui similium se constuprandam publice tradiderit. Hec autem, quia uiro suo se illicitam reddidit in perpetuum, dum per copulam consanguinitatis in primum, uel secundum, uel tertium gradum transiuit affinitatis, licite dimittitur, et ea uiuente superducitur alia. Hic si quis contendat, non magis uiro, quam mulieri licitum esse, si uir alicuius eodem modo fornicetur, sciat, uirum ab Ambrosio appellatum non sexu, sed animi uirtute; mulierem quoque nominatam sentiat non sexu corporis, sed mollicie mentis. Sed quia nulla auctoritate permittitur, ut uiuente uxore alia superducatur, intelligitur illud Ambrosii in supradicto fornicationis genere: non tamen, quod uiuente dimissa aliam ducere possit, sed post mortem fornicariae uel fornicarii, (quorum uterque, ut supra dictum est, a corruptione luxuriae mulier appellatur), ille, qui a fornicatione mundus est, uir siue mulier aliis copulari possunt; adulteri autem, si superuixerint, nullo modo aliis copulari poterunt. Sic et illud intelligitur, quod in Capitulo cuiusdam Concilii legitur:

C. XIX. Lawful marriage is not to be denied to the man whose wife slept with his brother.

A certain woman slept with her husband's brother. It was decreed that the adulterers are never to be joined in marriage; but lawful marriages are not to be denied to the man whose wife was violated. The passage of the Council of Mainz is also understood thus:

C. XIX. Licitum coniugium non negetur illi, cuius uxor cum suo fratre dormiuit.

Quedam cum fratre uiri sui dormiuit: decretum est, ut adulteri numquam coniugio copulentur; illi uero, cuius uxor stuprata est, licita coniugia non negentur. Sic et illud Maguntiensis Concilii intelligitur:

C. XX. Let those who have committed any of the acts set forth below be separated and never joined in marriage.

If anyone has taken a widow as wife and afterward has fornicated with his stepdaughter or with two sisters; or if any woman has fornicated with two brothers or with a father and son; if anyone has polluted his brother's widow, his granddaughter, stepmother, daughter-in-law, female cousin, maternal uncle's daughter or his widow, or stepdaughter—we command them to be separated and never thereafter joined in marriage.

C. XX. Disiungantur, et numquam coniugio copulentur, qui quodlibet infra subiectorum admiserit.

Si quis uiduam duxerit uxorem, et postea cum filiastra fornicatus fuerit, seu cum duabus sororibus, aut si qua cum duobus fratribus, seu cum patre et filio, si quis relictam fratris, si quis neptem, aut nouercam, aut nurum, aut consobrinam, aut filiam auunculi, aut eius relictam, aut priuignam polluerit, eos disiungi, et ulterius numquam coniugio copulari precipimus.

C. XXI. One who pollutes his wife's sister can have neither woman.

Likewise. One who has slept with two sisters, one of whom was previously his wife, is to have neither of them; nor are the adulterers themselves ever to be joined in marriage.

C. XXI. Sororem uxoris polluens neutram habere ualet.

Item. Qui dormierit cum duabus sororibus, et una ex illis antea uxor fuerit, neutram ex ipsis habeat: nec ipsi adulteri umquam in coniugio copulentur.

C. XXII. One who leaves his wife because of adultery is to preserve continence.

Likewise that saying of Gregory. But those who discover their wives in adultery will not be permitted —neither the man nor the woman—to receive another wife or another husband for as long as both live. But if the adulteress has died, her husband, if he wishes, may marry, only in the Lord; the adulteress, however, may never marry, even if her husband has died. Yet on all the days of her life let her discharge the lamentations of the most severe penance.

C. XXII. Causa adulterii uxorem relinquens continentiam seruet.

Item illud Gregorii. Hii uero, qui uxores suas in adulterio deprehendunt, non licebit nec eum, nec illam aliam uxorem accipere, uel alium uirum, quamdiu ambo uiuunt. Si autem adultera mortua fuerit, uir eius, si uult, nubat, tantum in Domino; adultera uero numquam, etiamsi mortuus fuerit uir eius. Omnibus tamen diebus uitae suae acerrimae penitenciae lamenta persoluat.

C. XXIII. Let one who polluted his wife's sister have neither woman.

Likewise from a decree of Pope Zachary. Did you lie with your wife's sister? If you did, you are to have neither. And if the woman who was your wife was unaware of the crime, if she is unwilling to contain herself, let her marry whom she wishes in the Lord. But you and the adulteress are to remain without hope of marriage and, for as long as you live, perform penance according to the priest's precept.

C. XXIII. Neutram habeat qui sororem uxoris polluit.

Item ex Decreto Zachariae Papae. Concubuisti cum sorore uxoris tuae? si fecisti, neutram habeas, et si illa, que uxor tua fuit, conscia sceleris non fuit, si se continere non uult, nubat in Domino cui uelit. Tu autem et adultera sine spe coniugii permaneatis, et, quamdiu uiuitis, iuxta preceptum sacerdotis penitenciam agite.

C. XXIV. One who sleeps with his stepmother, stepdaughter, or wife's sister cannot come to marriage; lawful marriages are not denied to their husbands.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur. If anyone has slept with his stepmother, neither can come to marriage; but her husband can, if he wishes, receive another if he cannot contain himself.

§ 1. The same is to be observed concerning one who has slept with his stepdaughter or with his wife's sister.

GRATIAN. Although what is set down at the end of the Council of Mainz is understood by some to have been said not of those lawfully joined but of fornicators—namely, that the fornicators are to depart from one another and remain without hope of marriage—that saying of Gregory to Boniface was permitted for a time to the English, to whom blessed Gregory permitted marriages to be contracted in the fourth and fifth generation. Otherwise it would be empty, since Augustine says in the Sermon on the Mount: "If someone has a sterile wife, etc."

C. XXIV. Cum nouerca, uel filiastra, uel sorore uxoris dormiens ad coniugium non potest peruenire; uiris earum legitima non negantur coniugia.

Item ex Triburiensi Concilio. Si quis cum nouerca sua dormierit, neuter potest ad coniugium peruenire; sed uir eius potest, si uult, aliam accipere, si se continere non potest. §. 1. Similiter qui cum filiastra sua, uel cum sorore suae uxoris dormierit, obseruandum est. Gratian. Quamuis illud, quod in fine Maguntiensis concilii ponitur, a nonnullis non de legitime coniunctis, sed de fornicariis dictum intelligatur, uidelicet ut fornicarii discedant ab inuicem, et sine spe coniugii maneant; illud uero Gregorii ad Bonifatium Anglicis pro tempore permissum est, quibus B. Gregorius in quarta et quinta generatione coniugia contrahi permisit; alias autem inane esset, cum Augustinus dicat in sermone Domini in monte: "Si uxorem quis habeat sterilem, etc."

C. XXV. It is not lawful for a marriage to be dissolved because of infirmity or bodily injuries.

Likewise Nicholas to Charles, archbishop of Mainz. PART VI. The marriages of those who contracted marriage while healthy, and madness, frenzy, or some infirmity befell one of the two, cannot be dissolved because of this infirmity. The same is to be known concerning those who are blinded by enemies, mutilated in their members, or castrated by barbarians.

> C. XXV. Ob infirmitatem uel dampna corporis coniugium solui non licet.
>
> Item Nykolaus ad Carolum, Maguntiensem Episcopum. VI. Pars. Hii, qui matrimonium sani contraxerunt, et uni ex duobus amentia, aut furor, aut aliqua infirmitas accesserit, ob hanc infirmitatem coniugia talium solui non possunt. Similiter est sciendum de his, qui ab aduersariis excecantur, aut membris truncantur, aut a barbaris exsecti fuerint.

C. XXVI. A mad man and a mad woman cannot contract marriage.

Likewise Pope Fabian. Neither a mad man nor a mad woman can contract marriage; but if it has been contracted, let them not be separated.

PART VII. GRATIAN. Therefore, as is gathered from the foregoing, it is not lawful for this man to take another after putting away his wife. For a certain marital bond remains between them which is not dissolved even by the separation itself. Hence Augustine says in the book On the Good of Marriage, [c. 7]:

> C. XXVI. Furiosus et furiosa matrimonium contrahere non possunt.
> Item Fabianus Papa. Neque furiosus, neque furiosa matrimonium contrahere possunt; sed si contractum fuerit, non separentur. VII. Pars. Gratian. Ut ergo ex premissis colligitur, non licet huic dimissa uxore sua aliam ducere. Manet enim inter eos quoddam uinculum coniugale, quod nec ipsa separatione dissoluitur. Unde Augustinus ait in libro de bono coniugali: [cap. 7.]

C. XXVII. It is not lawful for someone to put away a sterile wife and take another for the sake of fertility.

The social bond has such great force that, although it is bound together for the sake of procreation, it is not dissolved by the failure of that very purpose of procreation. For a man could put away a sterile wife and take one from whom he might have children, and nevertheless it is not lawful.

Likewise, [c. 15]. § 1. The bond of nuptials remains even if offspring, for whose sake it was entered, does not follow because of manifest sterility, so that, even when the spouses already know that they will not have children, it is nevertheless not lawful for them to separate even for the sake of children and to join themselves to others. But if they do this, they commit adultery with those to whom they have joined themselves, while the marriage itself remains. Certainly, among the ancient fathers it was right, with the wife's consent, to employ another woman from whom common children would be born—through the union and seed of the one, but under the right and power of the other. Whether it is right even now I would not rashly say.

> C. XXVII. Sterilem uxorem dimittere, et causa fecunditatis aliam ducere alicui non licet.
> Tantum ualet sociale uinculum, ut, cum causa procreandi colligitur, nec ipsa causa procreandi soluatur. Posset enim homo dimittere sterilem uxorem et ducere de qua filios haberet, et tamen non licet. Item: [c. 15.] §. 1. Manet uinculum nuptiarum, etiam si proles, cuius causa initum est, manifesta sterilitate non subsequatur, ita, ut iam scientibus coniugibus non se filios habituros, separare se tamen uel ipsa causa filiorum, atque aliis copulare non liceat. Quod si fecerint, cum eis, quibus se copulauerint, adulterium conmittunt, ipso autem coniugio manente. Plane uxoris uoluntate adhibere aliam, unde communes filii nascantur unius conmixtione ac semine, alterius autem iure ac potestate, apud antiquos patres fas erat. Utrum et nunc fas sit, temere non dixerim.

[C. XXVIII.]

The same, in the same work. The rights of nuptials once entered remain among the living to such a degree that, even when separated, they are spouses to one another rather than to those to whom they have adhered.

And afterward: § 1. A certain marital bond remains among the living which neither separation nor union with another can take away; just as an apostate soul, departing as it were from marriage with Christ, does not lose the sacrament of faith which it received in the washing of regeneration even after faith has been lost. For without doubt it would be restored to one returning if that person had lost it in departing. But one who has departed has this for an accumulation of punishment, not for the merit of a reward.

[C. XXVIII.]

Idem in eodem. Usque adeo manent inter uiuentes semel inita iura nuptiarum, ut potius inter se sint coniuges etiam separati, quam cum his, quibus adheserunt. Et post: §. 1. Manet inter uiuentes quoddam uinculum coniugale, quod nec separatio, nec cum altero copulatio possit auferre; sicut apostata anima, uelut de coniugio Christi recedens, etiam fide perdita sacramentum fidei non amittit, quod lauachro regenerationis accepit. Redderetur enim proculdubio redeunti, si amisisset abscedens. Habet autem hoc, qui recessit, ad cumulum supplicii, non ad meritum premii.

Question VIII

GRATIAN. Therefore, since it has been proved that this man cannot put away his wife and take another, it is asked whether it is lawful for him to sin under this condition: that he might lead an unbelieving woman to the faith. Augustine affirms that this cannot be done, speaking thus in Book I On Adulterous Marriages, [c. 24]:

GRATIANUS. Cum itaque probatum sit, quod hic uxorem suam dimittere, et aliam ducere non potest, queritur, si liceat ei hac condicione peccare, ut infidelem ad fidem adducat? Quod non posse fieri Augustinus affirmat, in libro [I.] de adulterinis coniugiis [c. 24.] ita dicens:

SOLE CHAPTER. No one ought to depart from a vow of continence, even if an unbelieving woman promises that she will become Christian.

Not only is adultery not to be committed—which certain persons do, but everyone who puts away his wife and takes another commits it, even if he has taken her for this reason, that he may make her Christian—but also whoever, not bound to a wife, has vowed continence to God ought in no way to sin by this compensation, so that he therefore believes that he is to take a wife because the woman who seeks marriage with him has promised that she will become Christian. For what was lawful for someone before he vowed will not be lawful when he has vowed that he will never do it, provided that he vowed that which is to be vowed, such as perpetual virginity; or, after marriages have been experienced, the chastity of widowhood by those released from the marital bond; or continual continence by faithful and chaste spouses who vow by consent and release the carnal dues to one another—which it is not right for the one to vow without the other. These things, therefore, and any others that are most rightly vowed, once human beings have vowed them, are to be broken under no condition, since they vowed them without any condition.

> C. UN. Non debet aliquis a continentiae uoto recedere, etiamsi infidelis Christianam se fieri polliceatur.
> Non solum mechandum non est, (quod faciunt quidam, sed omnis, qui dimittit uxorem suam, et ducit alteram, etsi propterea duxerit, ut Christianam faciat,) sed etiam quisquis non alligatus uxori continentiam Deo uouit, nullo modo debet ista conpensatione peccare, ut ideo credat uxorem sibi esse ducendam, quia promisit que nuptias eius appetit, futuram se esse Christianam. Quod enim cuiquam ante, quam uouisset, licebat, cum id se numquam facturum uouerit, non licebit: si tamen id uouerit, quod uouendum sit, sicuti est perpetua uirginitas, uel post experta conubia solutis a uinculo coniugali uidualis castitas, seu ex consensu uouentibus et carnalia debita sibi inuicem relaxantibus fidelibus castisque coniugibus (quod alterum sine altera, uel alteram sine altero uouere fas non est) iugis continentia. Hec ergo, et si qua alia sunt, que rectissime uouentur, cum homines uouerint, nulla condicione rumpenda sunt, que sine ulla condicione uouerunt.

Causa XXXIII

CASE XXXIII.

GRATIAN. A certain man, impeded by acts of magic, could not render the marital due to his wife. Meanwhile, another man secretly corrupted her; separated from her husband, she publicly marries her corrupter. The crime she had committed she confesses to God only in her heart. The faculty of knowing her is restored to this man; he seeks his wife again. After receiving her, so that he might more readily devote himself to prayer and approach the flesh of the Lamb in purity, he promised that he would preserve continence; but his wife did not give her consent. (Q. I.) It is asked whether, because of the impossibility of intercourse, a woman is to be separated from her husband. (Q. II.) Second, whether, after the separation, she can marry the man with whom she had previously fornicated. (Q. III.) Third, whether a crime can be blotted out by confession of the heart alone. (Q. IV.) Fourth, whether someone can render the marital due during a time of prayer. (Q. V.) Fifth, whether a man can vow continence without his wife's consent, or whether he can extort from her by threats or terrors permission to vow.

> GRATIANUS. Quidam uiri maleficiis inpeditus uxori suae debitum reddere non poterat. Alius interim clanculo eam corrupit; a uiro suo separata corruptori suo publice nubit; crimen, quod admiserat, corde tantum Deo confitetur; redditur huic facultas cognoscendi eam: repetit uxorem suam; qua recepta, ut expedicius uacaret orationi, et ad carnes agni purus accederet, continentiam se seruaturum promisit; uxor uero consensum non adhibuit. (Qu. I.) Queritur, an propter inpossibilitatem coeundi, a uiro suo) aliqua sit separanda? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an post separationem ei nubere ualeat, cum quo prius fornicata est? (Qu. III.) Tertio, si sola confessione cordis crimen possit deleri? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, si tempore orationis quis ualeat reddere coniugii debitum? (Qu. V.) Quinto, an uir sine consensu uxoris continenciam uouere possit, uel si minis uel terroribus licentiam uouendi ab ea extorquere ualeat?

Question I

GRATIAN. PART I. That a woman cannot be separated from her husband because of his inability to render the marital due is proved by evangelical and apostolic authority. For Christ says thus in the Gospel: "No one is permitted to put away his wife except for the cause of fornication"—either that by which one of them, as Augustine explains, has fornicated, or that to which one wished to draw the other.

Likewise the Apostle: "A woman, for as long as her husband lives, is bound to his law," not the law of rendering her the marital due, but of not transferring herself to another.

Likewise: "To those who are joined in marriage I command—not I, but the Lord—that the wife is not to depart from the husband except for the cause of fornication." Therefore, by evangelical and apostolic authority a woman is prohibited from departing from her husband except for that cause most well known to all. If she has departed when it intervenes, she must remain unmarried or be reconciled to her husband. Hence it is given to be understood that inability to render the marital due does not make a separation of the marriage.

§ 1. To these things it is answered thus: Marriage is confirmed by consummation, as was proved above. But after it has been confirmed by consummation, it is not lawful for a husband to put away his wife or for a wife to depart from her husband except for the cause of fornication. Yet before it is confirmed, inability to consummate dissolves the bond of marriage. Hence Gregory writes to John, bishop of Ravenna:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem propter inpossibilitatem reddendi debitum mulier a uiro suo separari non possit, auctoritate euangelica et apostolica probatur. Sic enim Christus ait in euangelio: "Nulli licet dimittere uxorem suam, nisi causa fornicationis," uel qua alter eorum (sicut Augustinus exponit) fornicatus fuerit, uel ad quam alter alterum pertrahere uoluerit. Item Apostolus:
> "Mulier, quanto tempore uiuit uir eius, alligata est legi ipsius," non legi reddendi sibi debitum, sed non transferendi se ad alium. Item: "His, qui matrimonio iuncti sunt, precipio non ego, sed Dominus, uxorem a uiro non discedere, nisi causa fornicationis." Euangelica itaque et apostolica auctoritate prohibetur mulier a uiro discedere, nisi ob causam illam cunctis notissimam, qua interueniente si discesserit, oportet eam manere innuptam, aut reconciliari uiro suo. Unde datur intelligi, quod inpossibilitas reddendi debitum non facit discidium coniugii. §. 1. His ita respondetur: Coniugium confirmatur offitio, ut supra probatum est; postquam uero offitio confirmatum fuerit, nisi causa fornicationis non licet uiro uxorem dimittere, uel uxori a uiro discedere. Verum ante, quam confirmetur, inpossibilitas offitii soluit uinculum coniugi. Unde Gregorius scribit Iohanni, Rauennati Episcopo:

C. I. It is lawful for a woman whom her husband could not know because of frigidity to marry another.

As to what you asked concerning those who are joined in marriage and cannot marry in fact—whether he can take another, or she another—concerning them it is written: "If a man and woman have joined themselves, and the woman afterward says concerning the man that he cannot have intercourse with her, if she can prove by a just judgment that it is true, let her receive another. But if he has received another, let them be separated."

> C. I. Licet mulieri alteri nubere, quam ob frigiditatem uir cognoscere non potuit.

Quod autem interrogasti de his, qui matrimonio iuncti sunt, et nubere non possunt, si ille aliam, uel illa alium ducere possit? De quibus scriptum est: "Vir et mulier, si se coniunxerint, et dixerit postea mulier de uiro, quod non possit coire cum ea, si potest probare, quod uerum sit, per iustum iudicium, accipiat alium. Si autem ille aliam acceperit, separentur."

[C. II.] Likewise from an epistle of the same.

You asked concerning those who say that, because of the cause of a frigid nature, they cannot mingle with one another by giving their labor to the flesh. But if this man cannot use her as a wife, let him have her as a sister. But if they wish to break the marital bond, let each remain unmarried. For if he could not naturally agree with this woman, how will he be compatible with another? Therefore, if the man wishes to receive another wife, the reason lies manifestly open: at the devil's suggestion, feeding hatred, he held her hateful, and for this reason he strives to put her away by the falsity of a lie. But if the woman brings the complaint and says, "I wish to be a mother and to procreate children," let each of them, with seven relatives acting as oath-helpers, touching the most sacred relics, state under oath that they were never joined by mingling of the flesh and made one flesh. Then the woman appears able to contract a second marriage. I speak in a human manner because of the weakness of their flesh. But the man who is of a frigid nature is to remain without a spouse. But if he too has received another union, then those who had sworn are to be held guilty of the crime of perjury, and after penance has been completed they are to be compelled to receive their former marriages again.

PART II. GRATIAN. But this is commanded to be observed when each confesses the same thing. Yet if the man asserts that he rendered the marital due to his wife and she denies it, it is deservedly asked to whom credibility is rather to be given. Concerning these matters it was established thus in the Council held at Compiègne:

[C. II.] Item ex epistola eiusdem.

De his requisisti, qui ob causam frigidae naturae dicunt se inuicem non posse operam carni dantes conmisceri. Iste uero si non potest ea uti pro uxore, habeat eam quasi sororem. Quod si retinaculum uoluerint coniugale rescindere, maneant utrique innupti. Nam si huic non potuit naturaliter concordare, quomodo alteri conueniet? Igitur si uir aliam uult uxorem accipere, manifesta patet ratio, quia, suggerente diabolo odii fomitem, exosam eam habuit, et idcirco eam dimittere mendacii falsitate molitur. Quod si mulier causatur, et dicit: Volo mater esse, et filios procreare, uterque eorum septima manu propinquorum tactis sacrosanctis reliquiis iureiurando dicat, ut numquam per conmixtionem carnis coniuncti una caro effecti fuissent, tunc uidetur mulierem secundas posse contrahere nuptias. Humanum dico propter infirmitatem carnis eorum. Vir autem, qui frigidae naturae est, maneat sine coniuge. Quod si et ille aliam copulam acceperit, tunc hii, qui iurauerant, periurii, crimine rei teneantur, et penitencia peracta priora cogantur recipere conubia. II. Pars. Gratian. Hoc autem seruari precipitur, cum uterque idem fatetur. Ceterum si uir asseruerit, se reddidisse debitum uxori, et illa diffitetur, cui potius habenda sit fides, merito queritur. De his in Concilio apud Conpendium habito ita statutum est:

C. III. Let the matter rest upon the truthfulness of the man if the woman denies that she was known by him.

If anyone has received a wife and has had her for some time, and the woman herself says that he never had intercourse with her, while the man says that he did so, let the matter rest upon the truthfulness of the man, because the man is the head of the woman.

PART III. GRATIAN. Behold, inability to render the marital due dissolves the bond of marriage. But this was established concerning natural inability. This woman, however, was separated from her husband because an impediment of magic, not natural frigidity, prohibited the marital due. Hence it is asked whether in this case also it is lawful for her to depart from her husband and join herself to another. Hincmar, archbishop of Reims, writes thus concerning these matters:

> C. III. In ueritate uiri consistat, si mulier negat se cognitam ab eo.
> Si quis accepit uxorem, et habuit eam aliquo tempore, et ipsa femina dicit, quod numquam coisset cum ea, et ille uir dicit, quod sic fecit, in ueritate uiri consistat, quia uir est caput mulieris. III. Pars. Gratian. Ecce, quod inpossibilitas reddendi debitum uinculum soluit coniugii. Sed hoc de naturali inpossibilitate statutum est. Hec autem maleficii inpedimento, non frigiditate naturali debitum coniugale prohibente, a uiro suo separata est. Unde queritur, si liceat ei etiam in hoc casu a uiro suo discedere, et alii se copulare? De his ita scribit Igmarus Remensis Archiepiscopus:

C. IV. Concerning those who, impeded by acts of magic, cannot have intercourse.

If, through female diviners and sorceresses—with the hidden but never unjust judgment of God permitting and the devil preparing it—intercourse does not follow, those to whom these things happen are to be exhorted to make to God and a priest a pure confession of all their sins with a contrite heart and a humbled spirit, to make satisfaction to the Lord with abundant tears, more generous alms, prayers, and fasts, and that, through exorcisms and the other duties of ecclesiastical medicine, the ministers of the Church should strive to heal such persons insofar as the Lord—who healed Abimelech and his house through Abraham's prayers—assents. But if perhaps they have been unable to heal them, they will be able to be separated. Yet after they have sought other marriages, while those to whom they were joined in the flesh are living, they will be unable to be reconciled to the former spouses whom they left, even if the ability to have intercourse has been restored to them.

GRATIAN. But in this Hincmar appears contrary to the preceding chapter of Gregory. For there, after the ability has been restored, she is commanded to be separated from the man whom she married second and to return to the first. Here, however, while the man to whom she had been joined second is living, she will not be able to be reconciled to the first.

> C. IV. De his, qui maleficiis inpediti coire non possunt.
> Si per sortiarias atque maleficas occulto, sed numquam iniusto Dei iudicio permittente, et diabolo preparante, concubitus non sequitur, hortandi sunt quibus ista eueniunt, ut corde contrito et spiritu humiliato Deo et sacerdoti de omnibus peccatis suis puram confessionem faciant, et profusis lacrimis, et largioribus elemosinis et orationibus atque ieiuniis Domino satisfaciant, et per exorcismos ac cetera munia ecclesiasticae medicinae ministri ecclesiae tales, quantum annuerit Dominus, qui Abimelech et domum eius Abrahae orationibus sanauit, sanare procurent. Qui si forte sanare non potuerint, separari ualebunt; sed post, quam alias nuptias expetierint, illis in carne uiuentibus, quibus iunctae fuerint, prioribus, quos reliquerant, etiamsi possibilitas concumbendi eis reddita fuerit, reconciliari nequibunt. Gratian. Sed in hoc uidetur contrarius premisso capitulo Gregorii. Ibi enim post possibilitatem redditam iubetur separari ab eo, cui secundo nupserat, et redire ad primum. Hic autem uiuente eo, cui secundo copulata fuerat, primo reconciliari non poterit.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. That, after the separation, she can marry the man with whom she had previously fornicated was proved above. For her husband is dead to her. From the time when, separated from him by the judgment of the Church, she was released from his law. Hence, according to the Apostle, let her marry whom she wishes, only in the Lord.

§ 1. But it is asked: if, without ecclesiastical judgment and with no reasonable cause for separation proved, he had departed from her, would he be compelled to return to her? Concerning this it was established thus in the Council of Carthage, which Augustine attended, c. 30:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem ei, cum quo prius fornicata fuerat, post separationem nubere possit, superius probatum est. Mortuus est enim sibi uir eius. Ex quo, iudicio ecclesiae ab eo separata, ab eius lege soluta est. Unde iuxta Apostolum nubat cui uult, tantum in Domino. §. 1. Sed queritur, si sine ecclesiastico iudicio nulla causa discidii rationabiliter probata ab ea discessisset, an esset cogendus redire ad eam. De hoc ita statutum est in Concilio Cartaginensi, cui interfuit Augustinus, c. 30.:

C. I. It is not lawful for anyone to put away his wife unless the cause of separation is first proved to the Church.

Laypersons who leave, or have already left, marital fellowship without any more grave fault, and who, proposing no probable causes of separation, leave their marriages so that they may presume upon either unlawful or other persons' unions: if they have cast off their wives before stating the causes of separation before the bishops of the province and before being condemned by judgment, let them be excluded from the communion of the Church and the holy assembly of the people because they stain fidelity and marriages.

> C. I. Non licet alicui uxorem dimittere, nisi causa discidii primum ecclesiae probetur.
> Seculares, qui coniugale consortium nulla grauiori culpa dimittunt uel etiam dimiserunt, et, nullas causas discidii probabiliter proponentes, propterea sua matrimonia dimittunt, ut aut illicita aut aliena presumant: si ante, quam apud episcopos conprouinciales discidii causas dixerint, et prius, quam iudicio dampnentur, uxores suas abiecerint, a conmunione ecclesiae et sancto populi cetu pro eo, quod fidem et coniugia maculant, excludantur.

C. II. Divine law prohibits a man from putting away his wife except for the cause of fornication.

Likewise Ambrose on Luke, [on c. 16]. Or is what is wicked against subjects right against an equal? Therefore, you put away your wife as though by right, without a crime, and think this lawful for you because human law does not prohibit it? But divine law prohibits it. You who comply with human beings, fear God. Hear the law of the Lord, which even those who bear laws obey: "Those whom God has joined, let man not separate."

> C. II. Lex diuina prohibet uirum uxorem dimittere, nisi causa fornicationis.
> Item Ambrosius super Lucam. [ad c. 16.] An quod in subditos nefas est in conparem fas est? dimittis ergo uxorem quasi iure, sine crimine, et putas, hoc tibi licere, quia lex humana non prohibet? Sed prohibet lex diuina. Qui hominibus obsequeris, Deum uerere; audi legem Domini, cui obsecuntur etiam qui leges ferunt: "Quos Deus coniunxit homo non separet."

C. III. A woman put away by her husband without cognizance of the case is to be restored to all things.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to Emperor Charles. The Ecclesiastical History composed by Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, says concerning a certain woman who was accused by her husband regarding chastity: "It was commanded by a law issued by the emperor that first she be freely permitted to arrange her household property over a longer time; then afterward she would answer the objections. All laws—ecclesiastical as well as common and public—command this."

§ 1. But if these things were established concerning women and secular men, much more are they conceded to ecclesiastical men and priests.

> C. III. Absque causae cognitione a uiro suo dimissa ad omnia restituatur.
> Item Nykolaus Papa Karolo Inperatori. Istoria ecclesiastica, ab Eusebio Cesariensi episcopo confecta, de muliere quadam, que de castitate a marito accusabatur, ait: "Preceptum est ab inperatore lege lata, ut primo permitteretur ei libere rem familiarem diutius ordinare; tunc deinde responderet obiectis. Hoc omnes leges tam ecclesiasticae quam uulgares publicaeque precipiunt." §. 1. Si autem de mulieribus et secularibus uiris hec constituta sunt, multo magis ecclesiasticis hominibus et sacerdotibus sunt concessa.

C. IV. Unless after restitution, no judgment concerning either the marriage covenant or the crime of adultery is to be conducted between husband and wife.

Likewise Pope Nicholas, [in the epistle to King Charles]. PART II. Whether a judgment is to be conducted concerning the marriage covenant or the crime of adultery, no reason permits Theutberga to be able to enter into litigation with Lothair unless she has first been restored for a time to her own power and freely associated with her own blood relatives. Among these things, a place is also to be provided in which no force of a multitude is feared, nor is it difficult to produce witnesses or the other persons who are required in controversies of this kind both by the holy canons and by the venerable Roman laws.

PART III. GRATIAN. In this chapter, although a cause appears to be set forth why it is not lawful for anyone to put away his wife by his own authority, and when this cause ceases the prohibition itself also appears to cease, nevertheless, because the separation itself is a penalty and a penalty is to be inflicted upon no one except through a judge, this is to be understood generally: whether because of the aforesaid cause or when no cause exists, it is not lawful for anyone to put away his wife by his own authority. The same is also to be understood concerning the penalty for homicide or any other penalty. Hence Pope Nicholas writes to Rudolf, archbishop of Bourges:

> C. IV. Nisi post restitutionem, neque de coniugii federe, neque de adulterii crimine inter uirum et uxorem iudicium est agitandum.
> Item Nykolaus Papa. [in epistola Karolo Regi] II. Pars. Siue de coniugii federe, siue de adulterii crimine iudicium sit agitandum, nulla ratio patitur, Thebergam cum Lothario posse inire certamen, nisi prius ad tempus suae fuerit reddita potestati, et consanguineis propriis libere sociata. Inter que etiam locus prouidendus est, in quo nulla uis multitudinis formidetur, nec sit difficile testes producere uel ceteras personas, que tam a sanctis canonibus, quam a uenerandis Romanis legibus in huiusmodi controuersiis requiruntur. III. Pars. Gratian. In hoc capitulo quamuis causa uideatur exposita, quare sua auctoritate non licet alicui uxorem dimittere, qua cessante ipsa quoque prohibitio cessare uidetur: tamen quia ipsa separatio pena est, et pena nulli est inferenda nisi per iudicem, generaliter hoc intelligendum est, ut siue ob causam premissam, siue nulla causa existente, non liceat alicui sua auctoritate uxorem dimittere. Quod etiam de pena homicidii uel qualibet alia intelligendum est. Unde Nykolaus Papa scribit Rodulpho, Bituricensi Archiepiscopo:

C. V. Marriage is to be utterly forbidden to those who kill their wives.

What else are killers of their spouses without a judgment to be held than murderers—and therefore to be brought to penance—when you do not add that the wives were adulterous or anything of this kind? Marriage is utterly denied to them, except for youths, concerning whom the twenty-fifth decretal rule—or rather indulgence—of blessed Pope Leo is to be observed.

GRATIAN. In this chapter Nicholas appears to permit husbands to kill their wives for the cause of adultery or another crime of this kind. But ecclesiastical discipline commands criminals to be struck by the spiritual sword, not the material one: namely, by that sword with which Peter is commanded to slay and eat. Concerning this sword Christ also says in the Gospel: "I came not to send peace upon the earth, but a sword." Hence the same Nicholas writes to Archbishop Albinus:

C. V. Coniugia penitus interdicantur his, qui suas uxores occidunt.

Interfectores suarum coniugum sine iudicio, cum non addis, adulterarum, uel aliquid huiusmodi, quid aliud habendi sunt quam homicidae, ac per hoc ad penitenciam redigendi? Quibus penitus coniugium denegatur, exceptis adolescentibus, de quibus est B. Leonis Papae XXV. regula decretalium, imo indulgentia obseruanda. Gratian. In hoc capitulo uidetur Nykolaus permittere maritis causa adulterii, uel alterius eiusmodi criminis, uxores suas interficere. Sed ecclesiastica disciplina spirituali gladio, non materiali criminosos feriri iubet; illo uidelicet gladio, quo Petrus iubetur mactare et manducare. De quo etiam gladio Christus ait in euangelio: "Non ueni pacem mittere in terram, sed gladium." Hinc idem Nykolaus scribit Albino Archiepiscopo:

C. VI. It is not lawful for anyone to kill an adulterous wife.

Among these matters Your Holiness endeavored to add the question whether, if anyone's wife has perpetrated adultery, her husband is permitted to kill her according to worldly law. But God's holy Church is never bound by worldly laws. It has no sword except the spiritual; it does not kill but gives life.

C. VI. Non licet alicui uxorem adulteram occidere.

Inter hec uestra sanctitas addere studuit, si cuius uxor adulterium perpetrauerit, utrum marito illius liceat secundum mundanam legem eam interficere. Sed sancta Dei ecclesia numquam mundanis constringitur legibus; gladium non habet, nisi spiritualem; non occidit, sed uiuificat.

C. VII. The penance of one who kills his own wife without cause.

Likewise Pope Pius. Whoever has killed his own wife outside the law or without cause and certain proof, and has taken another wife, is to lay aside his arms and perform public penance; and if he is contumacious and has remained disobedient to his bishop, let him be anathematized until he consents. The same law will apply to one who has killed his superior.

C. VII. Penitencia eius, qui propriam uxorem absque causa perimit.

Item Pius Papa. Quicumque propriam uxorem absque lege, uel sine causa et certa probatione interfecerit, aliamque duxerit uxorem, armis depositis publicam agat penitenciam, et, si contumax fuerit, et episcopo suo inobediens extiterit, anathematizetur, quousque consentiat. Eadem lex erit illi, qui seniorem suum interfecerit.

C. VIII. The penance of Astulf, who killed his wife.

Likewise Stephen V to Astulf. We take care to admonish you with tears and much groaning of heart, son Astulf; but you ought not to be called a son, you who so cruelly perpetrated an unhappy homicide. For you killed your wife, a part of your body joined to you in lawful marriage, without cause for death, when she did not resist you and in no way plotted against your life. You did not find her doing a wicked thing with another man; rather, stirred by the devil, inflamed with impious fury, in the manner of robbers, more cruel than every beast, you most savagely slew her with your sword. And now after her death you add iniquity upon iniquity, an impious robber of your children. You who did not spare their mother made your children orphans, and after her death you wish to bring upon her a cause for death through one man, a murderer and reprobate witness. For neither the Gospel nor any divine or human law condemns or justifies anyone by the testimony of one man, even a suitable witness. How much more, through this wicked and most shameful man, ought she neither to have been condemned while alive nor to be accused by you after her death? First the cause of the crime had to be investigated carefully, and then, if it had been found to be so, she ought to have received the retribution of punishment according to the path of the law. For if it had been true—which may it not be—as the adulterer falsely claimed, after completing seven years of penance you could have put her away for a proved cause if you wished; nevertheless, you ought in no way to have killed her. For God does not will the death of a sinner, but that the sinner be converted to penance and live.

Therefore, let our counsel be pleasing to you, and do that which can appear better and lighter for you: have mercy on your soul, so that you are not a murderer of your very self. Therefore, we ask you, leave this evil world which drew you to so monstrous a criminal deed of sin. Enter a monastery, humble yourself under the hand of an abbot, and, aided by the prayers of many brothers, observe with a suppliant mind all things commanded to you, if perhaps the infinite goodness of God may forgive your sins and refresh your soul before you are tormented by perpetual flames. Know most certainly that this is lighter and better for you.

But if you wish to perform public penance while remaining in your house or in this world—which you should not doubt will be worse, harder, and graver for you—we exhort you to do it as you ought. On all the days during which you must perform penance, do not drink wine or any strong drink; never eat flesh at any time, except at Easter and on the day of the Lord's Nativity. Perform penance on bread, water, and salt. Persevere at all times in fasts, vigils, prayers, and alms. Never gird yourself with arms, nor presume to litigate in any place. Never take a wife, have no concubine, nor dare to commit adultery. Never wash in a bath; never mingle yourself in the banquets of those rejoicing. In the church, separated from other Christians, place yourself humbly behind the door and doorposts. Commend yourself in supplication to the prayers of those entering and departing. Consider yourself unworthy of communion in the body and blood of the Lord on all the days of your life. Yet on the final day of your departure from life, if you have merited it, we mercifully concede that you receive it only as viaticum, if there is someone to give it. There are also many other things, unhappy man, which according to the great weight of your sin ought to have been added for you more harshly and with sufficient severity. But if, with the Lord's aid, you do and preserve with a perfect heart all these things mercifully stated to you above, we trust in God's immense clemency that you will have remission of your sins; and according to the saying of the just and good shepherd, holy Church will release you on earth from this bond of sin, so that by the grace of him who acquired her with his blood you may be released in heaven.

But if you act otherwise and despise so salutary an admonition of holy mother Church, be a judge unto yourself, and you will remain in the snare of the devil by which you are held entangled; your blood will be upon your head. We, estranged from fellowship with you, strive with every solicitude, with God himself aiding, to labor for the salvation of the other children of God and daily to implore the Lord's mercy more attentively.

C. VIII. Penitencia Astulphi, qui uxorem suam interfecerat.

Item Stephanus V. Astulpho. Admonere te cum lacrimis et multo gemitu cordis curamus, fili Astulphe; sed non filius dici debes, qui tam crudeliter infelix homicidium perpetrasti. Nam occidisti uxorem tuam, partem corporis tui, legitimo matrimonio tibi sociatam, sine causa mortis, non tibi resistentem, non insidiantem quocumque modo uitae tuae. Non inuenisti eam cum alio uiro nefariam rem facientem, sed concitatus a diabolo, inpio furore flammatus, more latronum atrocius eam gladio tuo, crudelior omni bestia, interemisti, et nunc post mortem eius addis iniquitatem super iniquitatem, filiorum tuorum inprobe predo. Qui matri non pepercisti, filios tuos orphanos fecisti, inducere super eam uis mortis causam post mortem, per unum hominem homicidam et reprobum testem. Quoniam nec euangelium, nec ulla diuina humanaque lex unius testimonio etiam idoneo quempiam condempnat uel iustificat: quanto magis per istum scelestum et flagiciosissimum nec illa uiua debuit condempnari, nec a te post mortem eius accusari? Prius causa criminis subtiliter erat inuestiganda, et tunc, si ita fuisset inuenta, secundum legis tramitem debuit excipere ultionis uindictam. Nam si uerum (quod absit) fuisset, sicut adulter mentitus est, post septem annos peracta penitencia dimittere eam per approbatam causam poteras, si uoluisses; occidere tamen eam nullatenus debuisti. Non enim uult Deus mortem peccatoris, sed ut conuertatur ad penitenciam, et uiuat. Idcirco placeat tibi consilium nostrum, et facias hoc, quod melius tibi et leuius uideri potest: miserere animae tuae, ut non sis tuus tibimet ipsi homicida. Relinque quapropter, te rogamus, hoc malum seculum, quod te traxit ad tam inmanissimum peccati facinus; ingredere monasterium, humiliare sub manu abbatis, multorum fratrum precibus adiutus obserua cuncta supplici animo, que tibi fuerint inperata, si forte ignoscat infinita Dei bonitas peccatis tuis et refrigeret animam tuam prius, quam crucieris perpetuis flammis. Hoc leuius et melius tibi esse certissime scias. Sin autem publicam penitenciam, permanens in domo tua uel in hoc mundo, uis agere (quod tibi peius, et durius, et grauius esse non dubites) ita, ut agere debeas, exhortamur, omnibus diebus, quibus penitere debes, uinum et omnem siceram non libas, carnem numquam ullo tempore comedas, preterquam in Pasca, et in die Natalis Domini; in pane, et aqua, et sale penitenciam age; in ieiuniis, in uigiliis, orationibus, et elemosinis omni tempore perseuera; armis numquam cingere, nec in quolibet loco litigare presumas. Uxorem numquam ducere, concubinam non habere, nec adulterium committere audeas; in balneo numquam laueris, in conuiuiis letantium numquam te misceas; in ecclesia segregatus ab aliis Christianis post hostium et postes humiliter te repone; ingredientium et egredientium suppliciter orationibus conmendare, conmunione corporis et sanguinis Domini cunctis diebus uitae tuae indignum te existimes; in ultimo tamen exitus uitae tuae die, si merueris, pro uiatico, si sit qui tribuat, tantummodo uenialiter tibi ut accipias concedimus. Sunt et alia multa, que tibi durius et satis acrius erant iuxta magnum pondus peccati, infelix, adicienda. Sed si hec omnia, que tibi misericorditer supra dicta sunt, perfecto corde Domino auxiliante feceris et custodieris, confidimus de inmensa clementia Dei, remissionem te tuorum habiturum peccatorum, et secundum dictum iusti bonique pastoris resoluet te sancta ecclesia ab hoc uinculo peccati in terris, ut per ipsius gratiam, qui eam suo sanguine acquisiuit, solutus sis in celis. Si autem aliter feceris, et sanctae matris ecclesiae tam salubrem admonitionem despexeris, ipse tibi sis iudex, et in laqueo diaboli, quo irretitus teneris, permanebis; sanguis tuus super caput tuum; nos alieni a consortio tuo pro aliorum filiorum Dei salute, ipso opitulante, omni sollicitudine nitimur desudare, et Domini misericordiam attentius cottidie inplorare.

C. IX. Let one take another wife while his wife is living rather than shed human blood.

Likewise Augustine, On Adulterous Marriages, [Book II, c. 15]. If, as is more truly said, it is not lawful for a Christian man to kill an adulterous spouse, but only to put her away, who is so senseless as to say to him: "Do what is not lawful so that what is not lawful may be lawful for you"? For since each is unlawful according to the law of Christ—both to kill an adulteress and to take another while she is living—one must abstain from both, and an unlawful thing is not to be done in place of an unlawful thing. For if he is going to do what is not lawful, let him now commit adultery and not commit homicide, so that while his wife is living he takes another but does not shed human blood.

PART IV. GRATIAN. In the foregoing authorities, all are prohibited from killing their adulterous spouses; but after seven years of penance they are permitted to put them away. But if they have killed them, they are commanded to remain perpetually without hope of marriage, unless perhaps mercy is extended to them to contract marriages because of a lapse of youthful incontinence. Clerics, moreover, are conceded permission, if their wives have sinned, to keep them in custody without the severity of death and to compel them to fasts, but not to afflict them as far as death. Hence it is read in the First Council of Toledo, [c. 7]:

C. IX. Potius uxore uiuente quis aliam ducat, quam humanum sanguinem fundat.

Item Augustinus de adulterinis coniugiis. [lib. II. c. 15.] Si (quod uerius dicitur) non licet homini Christiano adulteram coniugem occidere, sed tantum dimittere: quis est tam demens, qui dicat ei: fac quod non licet, ut liceat tibi quod non licet? Cum enim utrumque secundum legem Christi illicitum sit, siue adulteram occidere, siue alteram ducere illa uiuente, ab utroque est abstinendum, non illicitum pro illicito faciendum. Si enim facturus est quod non licet, iam faciat adulterium et non faciat homicidium, ut uiuente uxore aliam ducat, non humanum sanguinem fundat. IV. Pars. Gratian. In premissis auctoritatibus quique prohibentur adulteras coniuges suas occidere; sed post septem annorum penitenciam permittitur eis illas dimittere. Si autem illas interfecerint, iubentur sine spe coniugii perpetuo manere, nisi forte propter lapsum iuuenilis incontinentiae ad matrimonia contrahenda eis misericordia inpendatur. Clericis autem conceditur, si uxores eorum peccauerint, sine mortis acerbitate habere eas in custodia, et ad ieiunia eas cogere, non tamen usque ad necem affligere. Unde in Tolletano Concilio I. [c. 7.] legitur:

C. X. If the wives of clerics have sinned, let the clerics guard them at home short of death and compel them to salutary fasts.

It was decided that, if the wives of any clerics have sinned, lest perhaps they have greater license to sin, their husbands are to receive this power: short of death, to guard and bind them in their own house, compelling them to salutary, not deadly, fasts, so that poor clerics may render help to one another if they do not have servants. But let them not take food with the wives themselves who had sinned, unless perhaps, after performing penance, they return to the fear of God.

PART V. GRATIAN. But now it is asked why it was established by the sacred canons that penitents are recalled to their former status after seven years. Concerning these matters Isidore writes thus to

Bishop Masona, [in the preface to the book On the Highest Good]:

> C. X. Clerici si uxores eorum peccauerint, preter necem eas domi custodiant, et ad salutaria eas ieiunia cogant.
> Placuit, ut, si quorumcumque clericorum uxores peccauerint, ne forte licentiam peccandi plus habeant, accipiant mariti earum hanc potestatem, preter necem custodiendi, ligandi in domo sua, ad ieiunia salutaria, non mortifera eas cogentes, ita, ut inuicem sibi clerici pauperes auxilium ferant, si seruicia non habeant. Cum uxoribus autem ipsis, que peccauerant, non cibos sumant, nisi forte ad timorem Dei acta penitencia reuertantur. V. Pars. Gratian. Nunc autem queritur, quare sacris canonibus sit institutum, ut post septem annos penitentes in pristinum statum reuocentur? De his ita scribit Ysidorus ad Masonem Episcopum: [in prefatione ad librum de summo bono]

C. XI. Why it was established that after seven years a penitent should return to the former status.

This very thing—that the censure of the canons commanded a penitent to return to the former status after seven years—the holy Fathers established not by the choice of their own judgment but rather from the judgment of divine justice. For it is read that Miriam, the prophetess and sister of Aaron, when she incurred the offense of detraction against Moses, was immediately covered with the mark of leprosy; and when Moses sought that she be cleansed, the Lord commanded her to go outside the camp for seven days and, after cleansing, to be admitted into the camp again. Therefore, Miriam, sister of Aaron, is understood as the flesh of a priest. When it is given to pride and stained by the most filthy contagions of thoughts, it is to be cast outside the camp for seven days—that is, outside the college of holy Church for seven years—so that after cleansing from vices it may receive the merit of its place or former dignity.

And after a few words: § 1. But at the end of the epistle I thought this was to be added: whenever a discordant judgment is found in the acts of councils, the judgment of that council whose authority is earlier or more powerful is rather to be maintained.

GRATIAN. Although this appears to have been said specifically concerning priests, it nevertheless ought to be understood generally concerning all penitents. For in imitation of that dominical judgment, David, reproved for adultery and homicide, is read to have offered to God a fast of one week in satisfaction for the shameful deed he had committed. Hence it has also been adopted by ecclesiastical custom that penance for major crimes is concluded within a period of seven years, unless either excellence of office or the magnitude of crimes exceeding common custom—such as when, contrary to the nature of human society, we immodestly adhere to parents, children, or other persons of this kind; or when, after abandoning natural use, we fornicate against nature in the manner of the Sodomites; or when we descend even to intercourse with brute animals—compels one to exceed the aforesaid period.

PART VI. § 1. Concerning penitents it is also asked whether marriages are generally conceded to them after penance has been completed. For by canonical authority penitents are generally prohibited from returning to secular military service or contracting marriages. Hence Pope Siricius, [epistle I to Bishop Himerius, c. 5]:

> C. XI. Quare sit institutum post septem annos in pristinum statum penitentem redire.

Hoc ipsum, quod canonum censura post septem annos remeare penitentem in pristinum statum precepit non electione proprii arbitrii sancti Patres, sed potius ex sentencia diuini iudicii sanxerunt. Nam legitur, quod Maria soror Aaron prophetissa, dum detractionis aduersum Moysen incurrisset delictum, illico stigmate leprae perfusa est, cumque peteret Moyses, ut emundaretur, precepit eam Dominus extra castra septem diebus egredi, et post emundationem rursus eam in castra admitti. Maria ergo soror Aaron caro intelligitur sacerdotis, que, dum superbiae dedita sordidissimis cogitationum maculatur contagiis, extra castra septem diebus, hoc est extra collegium sanctae ecclesiae septem annis proiciatur, ut post emundationem uiciorum loci uel pristinae dignitatis recipiat meritum. Et post pauca: §. 1. In fine autem epistolae hoc adiciendum putaui, ut, quotiescumque in gestis conciliorum discors sentencia inuenitur, illius magis teneatur sentencia, cuius antiquior aut potior extat auctoritas. Gratian. Hoc quamquam de sacerdotibus uideatur specialiter dictum, generaliter tamen de omnibus penitentibus oportet intelligi. Ad imitationem namque illius dominicae sentenciae Dauid de adulterio et homicidio reprehensus unius ebdomadae ieiunium in satisfactionem admissi sceleris Deo legitur obtulisse. Hinc etiam ecclesiastica consuetudine est usurpatum, ut maiorum criminum penitencia septem annorum spacio concludatur, nisi uel offitii exellentia, uel criminum magnitudo uulgarem consuetudinem excedens (ueluti dum contra naturam humanae societatis parentibus, uel liberis, uel aliis huiusmodi personis inpudice adheremus, uel dum relicto naturali usu contra naturam more Sodomitico fornicamur, uel usque ad coitum brutorum animalium prolabimur), premissum spacium transcendere cogat. VI. Pars. §. 1. De penitentibus quoque queritur, an eis generaliter post penitenciam peractam coniugia concedantur? Generaliter enim canonica auctoritate penitentes prohibentur ad secularem miliciam redire, uel matrimonia contrahere. Unde Siricius Papa: [epist. I. ad Himerium Episcopum, c. 5.]

C. XII. Penitents are prohibited from contracting marriages.

Concerning those persons Your Love not unfittingly believed that the Apostolic See should be consulted who, after performing penance, returned like dogs and swine to their former vomit and wallowing places and sought again the belt of military service, theatrical pleasures, new marriages, and prohibited intercourse. Children begotten after absolution betrayed the continence they had professed. Concerning these persons, because they now have no aid from performing penance, we judged that this should be decreed: let them be joined to the faithful within the church in prayer alone; let them be present at the sacred celebrations of the mysteries, although they do not deserve it; but let them be separated from the banquet of the Lord's table, so that, corrected at least by this strictness, they may both chastise their errors in themselves and give an example to others, so that they may be drawn back from obscene desires. Nevertheless, because they fell through carnal frailty, when they begin to set out toward the Lord we wish them to be aided by the gift of viaticum through the grace of communion. We judge that this same form is to be observed also concerning women who bound themselves to such pollutions after penance.

GRATIAN. But because, from fear of dissolving their marriage, some delay approaching penance, or because of a lapse of youth which they fear, neglect to receive the remedy of penance, by canonical authority they are permitted either to retain marriages already contracted or to contract others. Hence Pope Leo writes to Galerius, bishop of Tripoli:

C. XII. Penitentes matrimonia contrahere prohibentur.

De his uero non incongrue dilectio tua sedem apostolicam credidit consulendam, qui acta penitencia tamquam canes et sues ad uomitus pristinos et uolutabra redeuntes, et miliciae cingulum, et ludicras uoluptates, et noua coniugia, et inhibitos denuo appetiuere concubitus, quorum professam continentiam generati post absolutionem filii prodiderunt. De quibus, quia iam suffragium non habent penitendi, id duximus decernendum, ut sola intra ecclesiam fidelibus oratione iungantur, sacris misteriorum celebritatibus (quamuis non mereantur) intersint, a dominicae autem mensae conuiuio segregentur, ut hac saltim districtione correcti et ipsi in se sua errata castigent, et aliis exemplum tribuant, quatenus ab obscenis cupiditatibus retrahantur. Quibus tamen, quoniam carnali fragilitate ceciderunt, uiatico munere, cum ad Dominum ceperint proficisci, per conmunionis gratiam uolumus subueniri, quam formam et circa mulieres, que se post penitenciam talibus pollutionibus deuinxerunt, seruandam esse censemus. Gratian. Sed quia timore soluendi coniugii nonnulli ad penitenciam accedere differunt, uel propter lapsum adolescentiae, quem formidant, penitenciae remedium suscipere negligunt, auctoritate canonica permittitur eis uel contracta matrimonia retinere, uel alia contrahere. Unde Leo Papa scribit Galerio Episcopo Tripolitano:

C. XIII. By indulgence, lawful marriages are not to be denied after penance.

We have heard from certain persons that in your dioceses and the territories of Christians assemblies withdraw themselves from the yoke of penance on a slight ground, saying: "If we perform penance, we must abandon marital union." In this they err and depart from the path of truth, because every worshiper of Christ's name ought earnestly to undertake and complete penance for all unlawful things, as the Lord says: "Perform penance, for the kingdom of heaven will draw near." But it is lawful for none of the orthodox to dissolve the lawful marriage of anyone undertaking penance.

And below: § 1. It is expedient for you to instruct them by addressing them with sacred discourses, so that they may be snatched from the darkness of error and, while joined in lawful unions, take care to perform penance for all unlawful things.

C. XIII. Ex indulgentia post penitenciam legitima non negentur matrimonia.

Audiuimus a quibusdam, quod in uestris diocesibus et finibus Christianorum cetus leui occasione se subtrahunt penitenciae iugo, dicentes, quia, si penitenciam agimus, coniugii debemus relinquere copulam; in quo errant et de ueritatis calle discedunt, quia pro omnibus illicitis penitenciam unusquisque Christi nominis cultor sustinere atque peragere summopere debet, dicente Domino: "Penitenciam agite, appropinquabit enim regnum celorum." Coniugium uero legitimum nulli orthodoxorum penitenciam sustinenti soluere licet. Et infra: §. 1. Sacris uos expedit eos alloquiis edocere, ut erroris eripiantur caligine, et licitis copulationibus iuncti de omnibus illicitis penitenciam agere procurent.

C. XIV. Because of a lapse of youthful incontinence, lawful marriages are not to be denied to penitents.

Likewise Leo IV. If one established in youth has performed penance because either fear of death or danger of captivity pressed him, and afterward, fearing a lapse of youthful incontinence, has chosen union with a wife lest he incur the crime of fornication, he appears to have done a venial thing if he has known no woman at all besides his spouse. Yet in this we do not establish a rule, but estimate what is more tolerable.

C. XIV. Propter lapsum iuuenilis incontinentiae non negentur penitentibus licita coniugia.

Item Leo IV. In adolescentia constitutus si urgente aut metu mortis, aut captiuitatis periculo penitenciam gesserit et postea timens lapsum incontinentiae iuuenilis copulam uxoris elegerit, ne crimen fornicationis incurreret, rem uidetur fecisse uenialem, si preter coniugem nullam omnino cognouerit. In quo tamen non regulam constituimus, sed quid sit tollerabilius estimamus.

C. XV. This penance is to be imposed upon one who has killed his mother.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to Rathold, bishop of the holy church of Strasbourg. PART VII. We have learned that the bearer of these presents is a matricide. We command him to remain under the yoke of penance in such a manner that for one year he does not enter the church, but, standing before the doors of the basilica, perseveres in praying and beseeching God that he may be snatched from so great a crime. But when the circuit of the year has been completed, let him have permission to enter the church; only let him stand among the hearers and not yet receive communion. But when the courses of three years have been completed, let the grace of holy communion be conceded to him; yet let him not offer oblations unless the courses of another seven years have first been completed.

§ 1. During all these years and times, let him not eat flesh or presume to drink wine, except on feast days and Sundays and from Easter until Pentecost. And wherever he wishes to go, let him be conveyed by no vehicle, but let him journey on foot. Let him not take arms except against pagans. Let him fast three days each week until evening. Let him not be separated from his own lawful spouse, lest he fall into the abyss of fornication, which we desire not to happen. But if the end of his life approaches before the course of three years, let him become a participant in the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ; but if not, let it be done as established above. Nevertheless, if you see his manner of life and the fountain of tears spring forth in all flourishing actions and excellent works, let watchful solicitude appear more humane toward him and let him be shown gentle to all.

C. XV. Hec penitencia est inponenda ei, qui matrem occiderit.

Item Nykolaus Papa Rhatoldo, Episcopo sanctae Argenteae Retensis. VII. Pars. Latorem presentium matricidam esse cognouimus. Cui precipimus, ut sub penitenciae iugo permaneat ita, ut per annum unum ecclesiam non ingrediatur, sed ante fores basilicae stans orans, et deprecans Deum perseueret, qualiter tanto eripiatur piaculo. Conpleto uero anni circulo introeundi licentiam in ecclesiam habeat; tantum inter audientes stet, et nondum conmunicet. Conpletis autem trium annorum curriculis sacrae conmunionis illi gratia concedatur, oblationes uero non offerat, nisi prius aliorum septem annorum curricula expleantur. §. 1. In his autem omnibus annis atque temporibus carnem non manducet, nec uinum bibere presumat, exceptis festis diebus atque dominicis, et a Pasca usque ad Pentecosten. Et, quocumque ire uoluerit, nullo uehiculo deducatur, sed pedibus proficiscatur; arma non sumat, nisi contra paganos; ieiunet autem tribus diebus per ebdomadam usque ad uesperam. A propria ac legitima coniuge non separetur, ne in fornicationis uoraginem corruat, quod ne fiat optamus. Si autem ante annorum trium cursum finis uitae illius appropinquauerit, corporis et sanguinis Domini nostri Iesu Christi particeps fiat; sin autem, ut supra statui efficiatur. Tamen, si illius conuersationem et lacrimarum fontem in omnibus uideritis floridis actionibus et optimis operibus pullulare, humanius circa eum sollicitudo peruigil appareat, mitisque omnibus demonstretur.

C. XVI. After lawful penance, lawful marriages are permitted to young persons.

Likewise. PART VIII. If anyone has fornicated with two sisters or with those persons concerning whom holy Scripture prohibits it, if he has performed worthy penance and has been unable to sustain the continence of chastity, let him be permitted to receive a lawful wife in marriage. The same applies also to a woman who has fallen through such a crime, lest she be brought to the abyss of fornication. But we establish this solely concerning laymen and laywomen.

> C. XVI. Post penitenciam legitimam adolescentibus permittuntur licita coniugia.
> Item. VIII. Pars. Si quis cum duabus fuerit sororibus fornicatus, aut cum his personis, de quibus sancta scriptura prohibet, si dignam egerit penitenciam, et castitatis non ualuerit sustinere continentiam, liceat ei legitimam in coniugio uxorem accipere. Similiter et mulier, que tali fuerit scelere lapsa, ut fornicationis non perducatur ad chaos. Sed hoc de laicis uiris ac mulieribus solummodo statuimus.

C. XVII. Let him who commits these crimes be punished, but let him not dismiss his lawful wife.

The same. If anyone has fornicated with his spiritual mother, he is struck, as you know, with the blows of anathema. Likewise, moreover, we decree that he also be struck who has perpetrated the crime of fornication with her whom he received from the sacred font of baptism, or with her whom he held before the bishop when she was anointed with sacred chrism; nevertheless, if he has a lawful wife, let him not dismiss her.

PART IX. GRATIAN. § 1. For a judge ought not by his own authority to separate those whom God has joined. Although Isidore understands this otherwise, saying:

> C. XVII. Puniatur qui hec crimina conmittit, non tamen legitimam dimittat uxorem.
> Idem. Si quis cum matre spirituali fuerit fornicatus, anathematis (ut scitis) percutitur ictibus. Similiter autem et illum percutere promulgamus, qui cum ea, quam de sacro fonte baptismatis susceperit, aut cum illa, quam ante episcopum tenuerit, cum sacro crismate fuerit uncta, fornicationis perpetrauerit scelus; legitimam tamen, si habuerit, non dimittat uxorem. IX. Pars. Gratian. §. 1. Quos enim Deus coniunxit iudex sua auctoritate separare non debet. Quamquam Ysidorus hoc aliter intelligat, dicens:

C. XVIII. A human being does not separate those whom punishment condemns.

"What God has joined, let no human being separate." You ask how? You understand: violently, without law, without reason—what God has joined, let no human being separate. For a human being does not separate those whom punishment condemns, whom guilt accuses, whom crime constrains.

GRATIAN. But this is understood to have been said concerning those whom secular judges strike with the severity of the laws for their crimes, whom they either punish with death or order to be deported.

> C. XVIII. Non homo separat quos pena condempnat.
>
> "Quos Deus coniunxit homo non separet." Queris quomodo? subaudis uiolenter, sine lege, absque ratione quos Deus coniunxit homo non separet. Non enim homo separat quos pena dampnat, quos reatus accusat, quos maleficium coartat. Gratian. Verum hoc pro his dictum intelligitur, quos iudices seculi pro suis sceleribus legum seueritate percellunt, quos uel morte puniunt, uel deportari iubent.

C. XIX. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Sixth Council of Toledo, [c. 8]. PART X. It is a judgment of the ancient and most holy father Pope Leo that, if one who is situated in the age of youth, while fearing the occurrence of death, comes to the remedy of penance, and if perhaps, being married, he is incontinent, lest he afterward fall into adultery, he should return to his former marriage until, with the maturity of time, he can attain the state of continence. We judge this in an equal manner concerning women as concerning men. This indeed was not commanded generally and canonically, but it is established that it was granted to you on account of human frailty, only on this condition: if the one who is not subjected to the laws of penance departs from this life before one of them, by consent, has returned to continence, the survivor is not permitted again to pass to the embraces of a wife. But if the life of the one who did not accept the penitent's absolution survives, let him marry if he cannot contain himself, and let him enjoy the companionship of another wife. It is clear that this was decreed by us equally for both sexes, namely in such a way that in all these matters the priest's direction is awaited, so that, according as he shall perceive a suitable age, he may give the law of absolution from penance.

> C. XIX. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano VI. [c. 8.] X. Pars. Antiqui et sanctissimi est patris sentencia Papae Leonis, ut is, qui in etatis adolescentia positus, dum mortis formidat casum, si peruenerit ad penitenciae remedium, si coniugatus forte fuerit incontinens, ne postea adulterii lapsum incurrat, redeat ad pristinum coniugium, quousque possit adipisci temporis maturitate continentiae statum, quod nos ut de uiris, ita et de feminis equo modo censemus. Non quidem hoc generaliter et canonice preceptum, sed constat uobis pro humana fragilitate indultum ea dumtaxat ratione, ut si is, qui penitenciae non est legibus deditus, ante ab hac uita discesserit, quam ex consensu ad continentiam unus eorum fuerit regressus, superstiti non liceat denuo ad uxoris transire amplexus. Si autem illius uita extiterit superstes, qui non accepit absolutionem penitentis, nubat, si se continere non potest, et alterius consortio fruatur uxoris. Quod in utroque sexu pari modo a nobis manifestum est esse decretum, ita uidelicet, ut in his omnibus sacerdotis expectetur ordinatio, ut, iuxta quod etatem aptam prospexerit, penitenciae absolutionis tribuat legem.

Question III: Treatise on Penance (De poenitentia)

QUESTION III. [TREATISE ON PENANCE.]

GRATIAN. Having briefly run through these matters, in which we have wandered somewhat beyond the end of the case, let us proceed to discuss the third question of the proposed case, in which it is asked:

> QUESTIO III.[TRACTATUS DE PENITENCIA.]
>
> GRATIANUS. His breuiter decursis, in quibus extra negocii finem aliquantulum euagati sumus, ad propositae causae terciam questionem pertractandam, qua queritur:

Distinction I

GRATIAN. PART I. Let us return to whether anyone can satisfy God by contrition of heart alone and secret satisfaction, without confession of the mouth. For there are those who say that anyone can merit pardon for a crime without confession to the Church and priestly judgment, according to that saying of Ambrose on Luke, [at chapter 22]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Utrum sola cordis contritione, et secreta satisfactione, absque oris confessione quisque possit Deo satisfacere, redeamus. Sunt enim qui dicunt, quemlibet criminis ueniam sine confessione ecclesiae et sacerdotali iudicio posse promereri, iuxta illud Ambrosii super Lucam: [ad cap. 22.]

[C. I.]

"Peter grieved and wept because, as a human being, he erred. I do not find what he said; I know that he wept. I read of his tears; I do not read of a satisfaction."

[C. I.]

"Petrus doluit et fleuit, quia errauit, ut homo. Non inuenio quid dixerit; scio, quod fleuerit. Lacrimas eius lego, satisfactionem non lego."

[C. II.] Likewise John Chrysostom.

"Tears wash away the fault that shame prevents one from confessing with the voice."

[C. II.] Item Iohannes Chrisostomus.

"Lacrimae lauant delictum, quod uoce pudor est confiteri."

[C. III.] Likewise the Prophet.

"A sacrifice to God is a contrite spirit; a contrite and humbled heart, O God, you will not despise."

[C. III.] Item Propheta.

"Sacrificium Deo spiritus contribulatus; cor contritum et humiliatum, Deus, non despicies."

[C. IV.] Likewise.

"I said, I will confess against myself my injustice to the Lord, and you remitted the impiety of my sin." Augustine, explaining this, says:

[C. IV.] Item.

"Dixi, confitebor aduersum me iniusticiam meam Domino, et tu remisisti inpietatem peccati mei." Quod Augustinus exponens, ait:

[C. V.]

"Great is God's loving-kindness, that he remitted sins upon the promise alone. § 1. He does not yet pronounce it with his mouth, and nevertheless God already hears it in his heart, because the very act of saying it is a kind of pronouncement. For the vow is accounted as the work."

[C. V.]

"Magna pietas Dei, ut ad solam promissionem peccata dimiserit. §. 1. Nondum pronunciat ore, et tamen Deus iam audit in corde, quia ipsum dicere quasi quoddam pronunciare est. Votum enim pro opere reputatur."

[C. VI.] In Book I of the Code, under the title On Bishops and Clerics, Emperor Jovinian.

PART II. "If anyone has dared—I will not say to seize, but merely to attempt—to join most sacred virgins in marriage, he shall be struck with capital punishment."

[C. VI.] Codicis libro I. titulo de Episcopis et Clericis Inp.

Iouinianus. II. Pars. "Si quis non dicam rapere, sed attemptare tantum matrimonii iungendi causa sacratissimas uirgines ausus fuerit, capitali pena ferietur."

[C. VII.] In the book of the Code under the title On Pleading, Emperors Leo and Anthemius to Nicostratus, Praetorian Prefect.

"Let no one enter the association of advocates either in the forum of Your Magnitude, in a provincial court, or before any judge, unless he has been imbued with the sacred mysteries of the Catholic religion. But if anything shall have been done or attempted in any manner or by some contrivance, the office of Your Sublimity shall sustain the loss of one hundred pounds of gold by way of condemnation."

[C. VII.] Libro Codicis titulo de postulando Inp. Leo et Ant. Nicostrato P. P.

"Nemo uel in foro magnitudinis tuae, uel in prouinciali iudicio, uel apud quemquam iudicem accedat ad togatorum consortium, nisi sacrosanctis catholicae religionis fuerit inbutus misteriis. Sin autem aliquid quoquo modo uel quadam machinatione factum uel attemptatum fuerit, offitium quidem sublimitatis tuae centum librarum auri iacturam pro condempnatione sustineat."

[C. VIII.] The same.

"But whoever shall have dared, contrary to the provident decree of Our Serenity, to seize the office of advocacy by subreption and shall have furnished prohibited patronage, removed from the offices of advocacy, shall especially sustain the sentence of proscription and perpetual exile. The governors of the provinces are also to know that he under whose administration anything of this kind shall have been attempted will sustain proscription of half his goods and the punishment of exile for five years."

[C. VIII.] Idem.

"Quicumque uero ausus fuerit contra prouidum nostrae serenitatis decretum offitium aduocationis per subreptionem arripere, et prohibitum patrocinium prestiterit, aduocationis offitia remotus stilum proscriptionis atque perpetui exilii specialiter sustinebit; scituris etiam prouinciarum rectoribus, quod is, sub cuius amministratione aliquid huiusmodi fuerit attemptatum, partis bonorum dimidiae proscriptionem, et penam exilii per quinquennium sustinebit."

[C. IX.] Likewise in Book IX, under the title On the Julian Law of Treason, [law 5].

"Whoever has plotted with soldiers—for the laws wished the will to commit a crime to be punished with the same severity as its accomplishment."

[GRATIAN.] Likewise under the Cornelian Law concerning assassins: "He who has gone about with a weapon for the purpose of killing a human being, just like him who has killed a human being, or by whose evil fraud the deed was committed, shall be restrained by the penalty of the Cornelian Law concerning assassins."

[C. IX.] Item libro IX. titulo ad legem Iuliam maiestatis. [l. 5.]

"Quisquis cum militibus cogitauerit (eadem enim seueritate uoluntatem sceleris, qua effectum iura puniri uoluerunt)." [Gratian.] Item ad legem Corneliam de sicariis: "Is qui cum telo ambulauerit hominis necandi causa, sicut is, qui hominem occiderit, uel cuius dolo malo factum erit conmissum, legis Corneliae de sicariis coherceatur pena."

[C. X.] Emperors Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian.

"If any man or woman has undertaken the abomination of killing an infant, let that person know that he or she is to be punished with capital punishment."

> [C. X.] Inpp. Valentinianus, Valens, et Gratianus.
> "Si quis necandi infantis piaculum aggressus aggressaue fuerit, sciat, se capitali supplicio esse puniendum."

[C. XI.] Emperors Gratian and Valentinian.

"If perhaps a woman is found to have prepared snares of death for her husband, or to have had the will to kill him in any other way, or perhaps a husband pursues his wife in that manner, in the same examination under torture inquiry is to be made, without anyone's protection, not only of the entire slave-household of the husband but also of the wife—of those, however, who were then present in the house."

> [C. XI.] Inpp. Gratianus et Valentinianus.
>
> "Si forte mulier marito mortis parasse insidias, uel quolibet alio genere uoluntatem occidendi habuisse inueniatur, uel forte maritus eo modo insequetur uxorem, in eadem questione non solum ab omni familia mariti, sed etiam uxoris (que tamen tunc temporis domi fuerit) querendum est, sine cuiusquam defensione."

[C. XII.] Likewise from the Digest, under the title On Insults, in the law But It Is a Question.

"If anyone has attempted to render either a male or a female, whether freeborn or freed, unchaste, he will be liable for insult. § 1. But even if the chastity of a slave has been assailed, insult has place. § 2. Chastity is said to be assailed when the object is that a chaste person be made unchaste. § 3. Not only is he who inflicted the insult—that is, he who struck—liable for insult, but he also is included who maliciously caused or arranged that someone's jaw should be struck with a fist."

> [C. XII.] Item Digestorum titulo de iniuriis, lege Sed est questionis.
> "Si quis tam masculum quam feminam, siue ingenuos siue libertinos, inpudicos facere attemptauerit, iniuriarum tenebitur. §. 1. Sed et si serui pudicitia attemptata sit, iniuria locum habet. §. 2. Attemptari pudicitia dicitur, cum id agitur, ut ex pudico inpudicus fiat. §. 3. Non solum is iniuriarum tenetur, qui fecit iniuriam, hoc est qui percussit, uerum ille quoque continetur, qui dolo fecit, uel qui curauit ut cui mala pugno percuteretur."

[C. XIII.] Likewise according to Labeo.

"If anyone indeed was not struck, but hands were raised against him and he was repeatedly frightened as though he were about to be beaten, although he was not struck, the other is liable under an action for insult."

PART III. To the contrary, in the same book under the title On Punishments:

> [C. XIII.] Item apud Labeonem.
>
> "Si quis pulsatus quidem non est, uerum manus aduersus eum leuatae, et sepe territus, quasi uapulaturus, non tamen percussus, iniuriam actione tenetur." III. Pars. Contra libro eodem titulo de penis:

[C. XIV.]

"Let no one suffer punishment for thought."

> [C. XIV.]
>
> "Cogitationis penam nemo patiatur."

[C. XV.] Under the title On Extraordinary Crimes.

"Solicitors of the marriages of others, and likewise interrupters of marriages, although they cannot obtain the accomplishment of the crime, are punished extraordinarily on account of the will of destructive lust. § 1. He who has persuaded a boy to debauchery, after his companion has been led away or corrupted, or has solicited a woman or girl, or has done anything for the sake of unchastity, furnished a house, or given a price by which another might persuade him, is punished capitally if the disgraceful act was completed, and is deported to an island if it was incomplete. Corrupted companions are afflicted with the supreme punishment."

> [C. XV.] Titulo de extraordinariis criminibus.
> "Sollicitatores alienarum nuptiarum, itemque matrimoniorum interpellatores, etsi effectu sceleris potiri non possunt, propter uoluntatem perniciosae libidinis extra ordinem puniuntur. §. 1. Qui stuprum puero (abducto uel corrupto comite,) persuaserit, aut mulierem aut puellam interpellauerit, quidue inpudicitiae gratia fecerit, domum prebuerit pretiumue, quo is persuadeat, dederit, perfecto flagicio punitur capite, inperfecto in insulam deportatur. Corrupti comites summo supplicio afficiuntur."

[C. XVI.] Likewise under the title On Thefts.

"It is a common question whether he who took a measure from a heap of grain commits theft of the whole thing, or only of what he took. Ofilius thinks him a thief of the whole heap. For Trebatius says that he who touched someone's ear is also regarded as having touched his whole person. Consequently, one who opened a cask and took a little wine from it seems to have committed theft of the whole. But it is true that he is liable under the action for theft to the extent of what he took. For if anyone opened a cabinet that he could not carry away, handled all the things that were in it, and departed in this way, then returned and took one of them, and was caught before he withdrew to the place for which he had set out, he will be both a manifest and a non-manifest thief of the same thing. But also, if anyone cuts a crop before dawn and handles what he cuts, he is a manifest and a non-manifest thief."

> [C. XVI.] Item titulo de furtis.
> "Vulgaris est questio, an is, qui ex aceruo frumenti modium sustulit, totius rei furtum faciat, an uero eius tantum, quod abstulit. Ofilius totius acerui furem esse putat. Nam et qui aurem alicuius tetigit (inquit Trebatius) totum eum uideri tetigisse. Proinde et qui dolium aperuit, et exinde parum abstulit uini, totius furtum uidetur fecisse. Sed uerum est, in tantum eum furti actione teneri, quantum abstulerit. Nam et si quis armarium, quod tollere non poterat, aperuerit, et omnes res, que in eo erant, contrectauerit, atque ita discesserit, deinde reuersus unam ex his abstulerit, et ante, quam reciperet se quo destinauerat, deprehensus fuerit, eiusdem rei et manifestus, et nec manifestus fur erit. Sed et si quis segetem ante lucem secat et contrectat eius, quod secat, manifestas et nec manifestus fur est."

[C. XVII.] Likewise in Book II, under the title Whatever Law Anyone Establishes, law 1.

"But these words, 'What one who presides over a jurisdiction shall have established,' we understand with accomplishment, not merely in words. Therefore, if he was prevented when he wished to establish it and the decree did not have effect, the edict does not apply. For the word 'established' signifies a completed thing and a consummated injury, not one begun."

> [C. XVII.] Item libro II. titulo Quod quisque iuris, lege 1.
> "Hec autem uerba: 'Que statuerit qui iurisdictioni preest,' cum effectu accipimus, non uerbotenus; et ideo, si, cum uellet statuere, prohibitus sit, nec effectum decretum habuit, cessat edictum. Nam 'statuit' uerbum rem perfectam significat, et consummatam iniuriam, non ceptam."

[CHAPTER XVIII.]

"Punishments," as is read in the Digest under the title On Punishments, "are to be softened rather than made harsher by interpretation of the laws."

[GRATIAN.] And therefore they do not extend beyond their own case. But the things said concerning the seizure of virgins, advocates, the crime of treason, or assassins were introduced out of favor for religion and faith and the ruler's hatred of assassins. A person can, however, become guilty of insults in many ways according to their variety. The variety of crimes therefore introduces a variety of punishments. Hence in the Digest under the title On Punishments:

> [CAP. XVIII.]
> "Penae" (sicut in Digestorum titulo de penis legitur) "legum interpretatione molliendae sunt pocius, quam exasperandae." [Gratian.] Atque ideo proprium casum non excedunt; sed que de raptu uirginum, uel aduocatis, seu de crimine maiestatis, uel de sicariis dicta sunt, fauore religionis et fidei, atque principali odio sicariorum introducta sunt. Iniuriarum uero pro earum uarietate multipliciter quis reus fieri potest. Varietas itaque criminum uarietatem inducit penarum. Unde in Digestis titulo de penis:

[C. XIX.]

[PART IV.] "Either deeds are punished, such as thefts and killings; or words, such as abusive speech and faithless advocacy; or writings, such as forgeries and defamatory writings; or counsels, such as conspiracies or complicity with robbers, and in whatever other cases advising and admonishing is equivalent to the crime. § 1. But these four kinds are to be considered in seven ways: cause, person, place, time, quality, quantity, and outcome. § 2. Cause, as in beatings, which are unpunished when inflicted by a teacher or parent because they are seen to be applied with the intention of correction, not for the sake of insult. They are punished when someone is struck by a stranger in anger. § 3. Person is considered in two ways: that of the one who acted and that of the one who suffered. For slaves are punished differently from free persons for the same offenses; and one who dared something against a master or parent is punished differently from one who did so against a stranger, and one who dared it against a magistrate differently from one who did so against a private person. In considering this matter, account is also to be taken of age. § 4. Place causes the same act to be either theft or sacrilege, and to be expiated either capitally or by a lesser punishment. § 5. Time distinguishes an absentee from a deserter, and a housebreaker or thief by day from one by night. § 6. By quality a deed is either more atrocious or lighter, as manifest thefts are customarily distinguished from non-manifest thefts, a brawl from violent assaults, pillaging from thefts, and wantonness from violence. On this matter Demosthenes, the greatest orator among the Greeks, speaks thus. § 7. Quantity distinguishes a thief from a cattle-rustler. For one who steals one pig will be restrained as a thief; one who steals a herd, as a cattle-rustler. § 8. The outcome is considered, even in deeds done by the most merciful person; although the law punishes no less the one who is found with a weapon for the purpose of killing a human being than the one who has killed. And therefore among the Greeks fortuitous cases were expiated by voluntary exile, as is written in the foremost of the poets."

> [C. XIX.]
> [IV. Pars.] "Aut facta puniuntur, ut furta cedesque; aut dicta, ut conuicia et infidae aduocationes; aut scripta, ut falsa et famosi libelli; aut consilia, ut coniurationes, aut latronum conscientia, quosque alios suadendo monuisse sceleris est instar. §. 1. Sed hec quatuor genera consideranda sunt septem modis: causa, persona, loco, tempore, qualitate, quantitate, euentu. §. 2. Causa, ut in uerberibus, que inpunita sunt a magistro illata uel parente, quoniam emendationis animo, non iniuriae gratia uidentur adhiberi. Puniuntur, cum quis per iram ab extraneo pulsatur. §. 3. Persona duppliciter spectatur, eius qui fecit, et eius qui passus est. Aliter enim puniuntur ex eisdem facinoribus serui, quam liberi; et aliter qui in dominum parentemue ausus est, quam qui in extraneum et in magistratum quam qui in priuatum. In huius rei consideratione etatis quoque ratio habeatur. §. 4. Locus facit, ut idem uel furtum uel sacrilegium sit, et capite luendum, uel minore supplicio. §. 5. Tempus discernit emansorem a fugitiuo et effractorem uel furem diurnum ac nocturnum. §. 6. Qualitate, factum uel atrocius, uel leuius est, ut furta manifesta a non manifestis discerni solent, rixa a crassaturis, expilationes a furtis, a uiolentia petulantia, de qua re maximus apud Grecos orator Demosthenes sic ait. §. 7. Quantitas discernit furem ab abigeo. Nam qui unum suem subripuerit, ut fur cohercebitur: qui gregem, ut abigeus. §. 8. Euentus spectatur, ut a clementissimo queque facta; quamquam lex non minus eum, qui inuentus occidendi hominis causa cum telo fuerit, quam eum, qui occiderit, puniat, et ideo apud Grecos exilio uoluntario fortuiti casus luebantur, ut apud precipuum poetarum scriptum est."

[C. XX.]

PART V. Thought does not merit punishment under civil law when it is contained within its own bounds. Those acts that by law require an effect are nevertheless distinguished from crimes. For in these nothing but the judgment of the mind is considered. Hence in the Digest under the title On Repudiations:

> [C. XX.]
>
> V. Pars. Cogitatio non meretur penam lege ciuili, cum suis terminis contenta est. Discernuntur tamen a maleficiis ea, que de iure effectum desiderant. In his enim non nisi animi iudicium consideratur. Unde in Digestis titulo de repudiis:

[C. XXI.]

"A divorce—that is, marital separation—is not real unless it is made with the intention of establishing perpetual dissension. Therefore, whatever is done or said in the heat of anger is not otherwise valid unless it becomes apparent from perseverance that it was the judgment of the mind. And therefore, if a repudiation was sent in that heat but the wife returned in a short time, she is not regarded as having been divorced—that is, separated from the marriage." Hence also in the Canons:

> [C. XXI.]

"Diuortium non est uerum nisi, quod animo perpetuam constituendi dissensionem fit. Itaque quicquid calore iracundiae fit, uel dicitur, non aliter ratum est, quam si perseuerantia apparuerit, iudicium animi fuisse. Ideoque per eum calorem misso repudio, si breui reuersa est uxor, nec diuertisse uidetur." Hinc etiam in Canonibus:

[C. XXII.]

"If anyone in anger has cast a charge against someone, etc."

PART VI. [GRATIAN.] Augustine proves that someone is liable on account of counsel just as on account of a deed, saying thus:

[C. XXII.]

"Si quis iratus crimen alicui obiecerit etc." VI. Pars. [Gratian.] Ex consilio autem uelut ex facto aliquem teneri Augustinus probat, ita dicens:

C. XXIII. Not only those who kill with their hands, but also those by whose counsel and fraud others are killed, are proved to be murderers.

They dangerously deceive themselves who think that only those who kill a human being with their hands are murderers, and not rather those through whose counsel, fraud, and exhortation human beings are destroyed. For the Jews by no means killed the Lord with their own hands, as it is written: "It is not lawful for us to kill anyone." Nevertheless, the Lord's death is imputed to them because they killed him with their tongue, saying: "Crucify him, crucify him." Hence one Evangelist says that the Lord was crucified at the third hour, another at the sixth, because the Jews crucified him with their tongue at the third hour and the soldiers with their hands at the sixth. Therefore, he who handed a human being over killed him, as the Lord says: "He who handed me over to you has the greater sin." Hence in the Psalm: "The sons of men—their teeth are weapons and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword." Therefore, let those by whose counsel blood is shed subject themselves to penance if they wish to merit pardon.

C. XXIII. Non solum qui manibus occidunt, sed etiam quorum consilio et fraude alii occiduntur, homicidae probantur.

Periculose se decipiunt, qui existimant, eos tantum homicidas esse, qui manibus hominem occidunt, et non potius eos, per quorum consilium, et fraudem, et exhortationem homines exstinguntur. Nam Iudei Dominum nequaquam propriis manibus interfecerunt, sicut scriptum est: "Nobis non licet interficere quemquam." Sed tamen illis Domini mors inputatur, quia ipsi lingua eum interfecerunt, dicentes: "Crucifige, crucifige eum." Unde unus Euangelista dicit, Dominum crucifixum esse hora tertia, alius sexta, quia Iudei crucifixerunt eum hora tertia lingua, milites hora sexta manibus. Qui ergo hominem tradidit, ille interfecit eum, Domino dicente: "Maius peccatum habet qui me tradidit tibi." Unde Psalmo: "Filii hominum, dentes eorum arma et sagittae, et lingua eorum gladius acutus." Subiciant ergo se penitenciae quorum consilio sanguis funditur, si ueniam promereri uoluerint.

C. XXIV. Killers of their brothers, their detractors, and those who hate them are accounted murderers.

Likewise from the letter of Clement, [the first to James]. Blessed Peter used to say that there are three kinds of homicide, and he said that their punishment would be equal. For just as he declared the killers of brothers to be murderers, so he declared their detractors and those who hate them to be murderers, because he who kills his brother, he who hates him, and he who detracts from him are alike shown to be murderers.

C. XXIV. Interfectores fratrum, detractores eorum, eosque odientes, homicidae habentur.

Item ex epistola Clementis. [I. ad Iacobum] Homicidiorum uero tria genera esse dicebat B. Petrus, et penam eorum parilem fore dicebat. Sicut enim homicidas interfectores fratrum, ita detractores eorum, eosque odientes, homicidas esse manifestabat, quia et qui occidit fratrem suum, et qui odit, et qui detrahit, ei pariter homicidae esse demonstrantur.

C. XXV. In crimes, the will is accounted as the deed.

Likewise Jerome on Isaiah, [c. 33]. Every iniquity, oppression, and injustice is a judgment of blood; and although you do not kill with the sword, you nevertheless kill by the will.

C. XXV. In maleficiis uoluntas pro opere reputatur.

Item Ieronimus in Ysaia. [c. 33.] Omnis iniquitas, et oppressio, et iniusticia, iudicium sanguinis est: et, licet gladio non occidas, uoluntate tamen interficis.

C. XXVI. On the same matter.

Likewise Cyprian, [Treatise IV, On Mortality]. Had Cain killed his brother when he offered a gift to the Lord? And nevertheless the provident God condemned beforehand the parricide conceived in his mind. Just as there an evil thought and destructive conception were foreseen by God's providence, so also among God's servants, in whom martyrdom is contemplated and conceived in the mind, a mind devoted to the good is crowned by God the judge. It is one thing for the mind to be wanting to martyrdom, another for martyrdom to have been wanting to the mind. As the Lord finds you when he calls, so also he judges you, when he himself testifies and says: "And all the churches shall know that I am the searcher of reins and heart."

C. XXVI. De eodem.

Item Ciprianus. [tract. IV. de mortalitate.] Numquid Cayn, cum Domino, munus offerret peremerat fratrem? et tamen parricidium mente conceptum Deus prouidus ante dampnauit. Ut illic cogitatio mala et perniciosa conceptio Deo prouidente prospecta est, ita et in Dei seruis, apud quos cogitatur, et martirium mente concipitur, animus ad bonum deditus Deo iudice coronatur. Aliud est martirio animum deesse, aliud animo defuisse martirium. Qualem te inuenit Dominus, cum uocat, talem pariter et iudicat, quando ipse testatur et dicit: "Et scient omnes ecclesiae, quia ego sum scrutator renum et cordis."

C. XXVII. He who counsels evil to his brother is a murderer.

Likewise Augustine, [Tractate XLII on John 8]. Do not think that you are not a murderer when you persuade your brother to evil. If you persuade your brother to evil, you kill. And that you may know that you kill, hear the Psalm: "The sons of men—their teeth are weapons and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword."

C. XXVII. Homicida est qui fratri suo mala suadet.

Item Augustinus. [tract. XLII. ad c. 8. Ioannis.] Noli putare, te non esse homicidam, quando fratri tuo mala persuades. Si fratri tuo mala persuades, occidis. Et ut scias, quia occidis, audi Psalmum: "Filii hominum, dentes eorum arma et sagittae, et lingua eorum machera acuta."

C. XXVIII. He who is moved to harm kills.

The same, [Book XIX Against Faustus, c. 23]. Homicide forbidden by the law was thought to be nothing other than the killing of the body. The Lord therefore disclosed that every unjust movement toward harming one's brother is reckoned in the class of homicide.

> C. XXVIII. Occidit qui ad nocendum mouetur.
> Idem. [lib. XIX. contra Faustum, c. 23.] Homicidium lege uetitum putabatur non aliud esse, nisi corporis peremptio. Aperuit ergo Dominus, omnem iniquum motum ad nocendum fratri in homicidii genere deputari.

C. XXIX. He who does not steal solely from fear is liable for theft.

Likewise Augustine, [Book of Fifty Homilies, homily 28]. If you do not commit theft for this reason, that you fear lest you be seen, inwardly, in your heart, you have committed it; you are liable for theft, and you have taken nothing.

> C. XXIX. Furti tenetur qui solo timore non furatur.
>
> Item Augustinus. [lib. L. Hom., homil. 28.] Si propterea non facis furtum, quia times ne uidearis, intus, in corde fecisti; furti teneris, et nil tulisti.

C. XXX. One who lacks only the opportunity does not therefore offend less.

The same, On Free Choice, [Book I, c. 3]. If someone does not even obtain the opportunity to lie with another's wife, but it is nevertheless in some way plain that he desires it and would do it if the ability were given, he is no less guilty than if he were caught in the act itself.

Likewise, as authority testifies: § 1. The will is rewarded, not the work. The will, moreover, is in contrition of heart, while the work is in confession of the mouth.

GRATIAN. It is established more clearly than light that sins are remitted through contrition of heart, not confession of the mouth.

> C. XXX. Non ideo minus delinquit, cui sola deest facultas.
> Idem de libero arbitrio. [lib. I. c. 3.] Si cui etiam non contingat facultas concumbendi cum coniuge aliena, planum tamen aliquo modo sit eum cupere, et, si potestas detur, facturum esse, non minus reus est, quam si in ipso facto deprehenderetur. Item, sicut auctoritas testatur: §. 1. Voluntas remuneratur, non opus. Voluntas autem in cordis contritione est, opus uero in oris confessione. Gratian. Luce clarius constat cordis contritione, non oris confessione peccata dimitti.

[C. XXXI.] Likewise Prosper, [Book II On the Contemplative Life, chapter 7].

"Furthermore, those whose sins lie hidden from human knowledge, neither confessed by themselves nor made public by others, if they are unwilling to confess or amend them, will have God, whom they have as witness, also as avenger. And what does it profit them to avoid human judgment when, if they remain in their evil, they will go, by God's retribution, into eternal punishment? But if they make themselves their own judges and, as though avengers of their own iniquity, exercise here upon themselves the voluntary punishment of the most severe chastisement, they will exchange eternal torments for temporal punishments, and with tears flowing from true compunction of heart they will extinguish the conflagrations of eternal fire."

[C. XXXI.] Item Prosper. [lib. II. de uita contemplatiua, cap. 7.]

"Porro illi, quorum peccata humanam noticiam latent, non ab ipsis confessa, nec ab aliis publicata, si ea confiteri uel emendare noluerint, Deum, quem habent testem, ipsum habituri sunt et ultorem. Et quid eis prodest humanum iudicium uitare, cum, si in malo suo permanserint, ituri sunt in eternum, Deo retribuente, supplicium? Quod si sui ipsi iudices fiant, et ueluti suae iniquitatis ultores, hic in se uoluntariam penam seuerissimae animaduersionis exerceant, temporalibus penis mutabunt eterna supplicia, et lacrimis ex uera cordis conpunctione fluentibus restinguent eterni ignis incendia."

[C. XXXII.] And below.

"Those will more easily reconcile God to themselves who, not convicted by human judgment, voluntarily acknowledge the crime; who either disclose it by their own confessions or, while others do not know—for they are hidden—pronounce upon themselves a sentence of voluntary excommunication, and, separated from the altar at which they ministered not in spirit but in office, mourn their life as though dead, certain that, once reconciled to themselves by the fruits of effective penance, they will not only receive back from God what they lost but, also made citizens of the heavenly city, will attain everlasting joys."

PART VII. [GRATIAN.] This same point is proved by that prophetic authority: "At whatever hour the sinner shall have been converted and shall have groaned." For it does not say: shall have confessed with the mouth, but only: "shall have been converted and shall have groaned; he shall live with life and shall not die." Hence the prophet Joel says:

[C. XXXII.] Et infra.

"Facilius Deum sibi placabunt illi, qui non humano conuicti iudicio, sed ultro agnoscunt crimen, qui aut propriis illud confessionibus produnt, aut nescientibus aliis (quales occulti sunt) ipsi in se uoluntariae excommunicationis sententiam ferunt, et ab altari, cui ministrabant, non animo, sed offitio separati uitam suam tamquam mortuam plangunt, certi, quod reconciliati sibi efficacis penitenciae fructibus a Deo non solum amissa recipiant, sed etiam ciues supernae ciuitatis effecti ad gaudia sempiterna perueniant." VII. Pars. [Gratian.] Hoc idem probatur auctoritate illa prophetica: "In quacumque hora peccator fuerit conuersus, et ingemuerit." Non enim dicitur: ore confessus fuerit, sed tantum: "Conuersus fuerit, et ingemuerit, uita uiuet, et non morietur." Hinc Iohel Propheta ait:

[C. XXXIII.]

"Rend your hearts and not your garments."

[GRATIAN.] Showing that sins are remitted through contrition of heart, which is understood in its rending, not through confession of the mouth, which is part of exterior satisfaction, which he called the rending of garments, understanding the whole from the part. Hence also through the same prophet the Lord says:

[C. XXXIII.]

"Scindite corda uestra, et non uestimenta uestra." [Gratian.] Ostendens contritionem cordis, que in eiusdem scissione intelligitur, non in confessione oris, que pars est exterioris satisfactionis, quam scissuram uestium nominauit, a parte totum intelligens, peccata dimitti. Hinc etiam per eundem Prophetam Dominus ait:

C. XXXIV.

"Turn to me, and I will turn to you."

[GRATIAN.] Conversion is so called as though it were the turning of the heart from every side. But if our heart is turned from evil to God from every side, it immediately merits the fruit of its conversion, so that God, turned from wrath to mercy, grants indulgence for the sin for which he was first preparing vengeance. Hence it is given to be understood that we can obtain pardon even while the mouth is silent. Hence also those lepers whom the Lord commanded to show themselves to the priests were cleansed on the way, before they came to the priests. From this deed it is surely given to be understood that, before we show our mouths to the priests—that is, confess our sins—we are cleansed from the leprosy of sin. Hence also Lazarus came forth alive from the tomb. He was not first led out of the tomb and afterward raised by the Lord; rather, when the stone by which the tomb was closed had been removed, he came back to life in the sepulcher and came forth alive.

§ 1. Hence also, in order that the Lord might show that the sinner is cleansed not by priestly judgment but by the generosity of divine grace, he cleansed the leper by touching him and afterward commanded him to offer the sacrifice according to the law to the priest. For the leper is touched when the sinner's mind, enlightened by a regard of divine loving-kindness, is pierced with compunction. Hence after his threefold denial Peter, when the Lord looked upon him, poured forth bitter tears, by which he washed away the guilt of his denial. The leper presents himself to the priest when the penitent confesses his sin to the priest. He offers the sacrifice according to the law when he carries out in deeds the satisfaction imposed upon him by the judgment of the Church. But he is cleansed before he comes to the priests, when pardon of sin is granted through contrition of heart before confession of the mouth.

Hence also physicians are denied the power to raise anyone so that the one raised may confess, when it is said through the prophet: "Will physicians raise them, and will they confess to you?" Likewise: "From the dead man, as authority says, as from one who does not exist, confession perishes." Hence that penitent who, terrified by fear of the eighth [day], had cried out, "O Lord, do not rebuke me in your fury," afterward said in supplication: "Save me for the sake of your mercy, because in death there is no one who is mindful of you; but in hell no one will confess to you." If, therefore, no one confesses unless raised, while no one who is a child of eternal Gehenna and worthy of perpetual condemnation lives, it is plain that before anyone confesses a sin, through the grace of inward compunction that person is absolved from the guilt of the transgression for which eternal torments were owed.

§ 2. Likewise, if before anyone confesses that person is raised by the Lord, either the person raised lives while confessing, or after being raised has died again and confesses. But just as the dead person could not confess before being raised, so after the resurrection a dead person is unable to confess. It remains, therefore, that the person raised lives while confessing the sin. Thus that person has the one who raised him present to him and dwelling in him. For, as Augustine says on Psalm 62:

C. XXXIV.

"Conuertimini ad me et ego conuertar ad uos."

[Gratian.] Conuersio autem dicitur quasi cordis undique uersio. Si autem cor nostrum undique ad Deum a malo uertitur, mox conuersionis suae fructum meretur, ut Deus ab ira ad misericordiam conuersus peccati prestet indulgentiam, cuius primo preparabat uindictam. Unde datur intelligi, quod etiam ore tacente ueniam consequi possumus. Hinc etiam leprosi illi quibus Dominus precepit, ut ostenderent se sacerdotibus, in itinere, ante, quam ad sacerdotes uenirent, mundati sunt. Ex quo facto nimirum datur intelligi, quod ante, quam sacerdotibus ora nostra ostendamus, id est peccata confiteamur, a lepra peccati mundamur. Hinc etiam Lazarus de monumento uiuus prodiit; non prius de monumento est eductus, et postea a Domino suscitatus, sed lapide remoto, quo monumentum claudebatur, in sepulchro reuixit, et foras uiuus prodiit. §. 1. Hinc etiam, ut Dominus ostenderet, quod non sacerdotali iudicio, sed largitate diuinae gratiae peccator emundatur, leprosum tangendo mundauit, et postea ut sacerdoti sacrificium ex lege offerret precepit. Leprosus enim tangitur, cum respectu diuinae pietatis mens peccatoris illustrata conpungitur. Unde post trinam negationem Petrus, Domino eum respiciente, profudit amaras lacrimas, quibus culpam suae negationis diluit. Leprosus semetipsum sacerdoti representat, dum peccatum suum sacerdoti penitens confitetur. Sacrificium offert ex lege, dum satisfactionem ecclesiae iudicio sibi inpositam factis exequitur. Sed ante, quam ad sacerdotes perueniat, emundatur, dum per contritionem cordis ante confessionem oris peccati uenia indulgetur. Hinc etiam medici negantur resuscitare aliquem, ut resuscitatus confiteatur, dum per prophetam dicitur: "Numquid medici resuscitabunt, et confitebuntur tibi?" Item: "A mortuo, ut auctoritas ait, uelut ab eo, qui non est, perit confessio." Unde penitens ille, qui timore octauae territus exclamauerat: "Domine, ne in furore tuo arguas me," postea supplicans aiebat: "Saluum me fac propter misericordiam tuam, quoniam non est in morte qui memor sit tui; in inferno autem nullus confitebitur tibi." Si ergo nullus confitetur, nisi suscitatus, nemo autem uiuit eternae gehennae filius, et perpetua dampnatione dignus, patet, quod ante, quam quisque confiteatur peccatum, a reatu suae preuaricationis, quo eterna sibi debebantur supplicia, per gratiam internae conpunctionis absoluitur. §. 2. Item: Si ante, quam quisque confiteatur, a Domino resuscitatur, uel resuscitatus uiuit, dum confitetur, uel post resuscitationem iterum mortuus est, et confitetur. Sed, sicut ante, quam resuscitaretur mortuus, confiteri non poterat, sic post resurrectionem mortuus confiteri non ualet. Restat ergo, ut resuscitatus uiuat, dum peccatum confitetur. Habet itaque resuscitatorem suum sibi presentem, seque inhabitantem. Ut enim Augustinus ait in Psalmo LXII.:

[C. XXXV.]

"One raised in the body lives while the one who raised him is absent. But it is not so with one raised in the soul."

[GRATIAN.] For since God is the life of the soul, while the soul is the life of the body, just as the body cannot live when the soul is absent, so the soul cannot live unless God is present. Therefore, the soul that, living, confesses its sin has God present to it through grace, and the life that is God inhabits it, making it live by inhabiting it. But if he inhabits it, then it has been made a temple of the Holy Spirit; then it has been enlightened; then it has been cleansed from the darkness of sins; then it has ceased to be a temple of the devil—it that comes to the light, whose gaze puts darkness to flight. For, as the Apostle says, there is no agreement of Christ with Belial, no participation of light with darkness, no communion of justice and iniquity, no accord of the temple of God with idols.

Likewise, as Christ says: "Everyone who hates evil acts in the light." But one who acts in the light works with God, as Augustine says. And one who works in Christ is proved to be his son. For everyone is declared to be the son of the one whose works he does. Hence the Lord says to certain persons: "If you are sons of Abraham, do the works of Abraham." Likewise: "You are from your father the devil, because you wish to do the works of your father." But no one can be a son of God and of the devil at the same time. “For no one,” as he himself says, “can serve two lords.” Likewise, as John says in his epistle, [I, chapter 3]:

[C. XXXV.]

"Resuscitatus corpore uiuit absente suscitatore. Non autem sic resuscitatus in anima." [Gratian.] Cum enim Deus sit uita animae, anima uero uita corporis, sicut corpus uiuere non potest anima absente, ita non nisi Deo presente anima uiuere ualet. Habet itaque anima sibi Deum presentem per gratiam, que uiuens peccatum suum confitetur, eamque uita, que Deus est, inhabitat, quam inhabitando uiuere facit. Si autem illam inhabitat, ergo templum Spiritus sancti facta est, ergo illuminata est, ergo a tenebris peccatorum expiata est, ergo templum diaboli esse desiit, que ad lucem uenit, cuius respectus tenebras fugat. Nulla enim (ut ait Apostolus) conuentio Christi ad Belial, nulla participatio lucis ad tenebras, nulla conmunicatio iusticiae et iniquitatis, nullus consensus templo Dei cum ydolis. Item, ut Christus ait: "Omnis, qui odit malum, in luce agit." Qui autem in luce agit, operatur, sicut Augustinus ait, cum Deo. Qui autem in Christo operatur, eius filius probatur. Cuius enim opera quisque facit, eius filius esse perhibetur. Unde quibusdam Dominus ait: "Si filii Abrahae estis, opera Abrahae facite." Item: "Vos ex patre diabolo estis, quia opera patris uestri uultis facere." Nemo autem filius Dei et diaboli simul esse potest. "Nemo enim," ut ipse ait, "potest duobus Dominis seruire." Item, ut Iohannes ait in epistola sua: [I. cap. 3.]

[C. XXXVI.]

“He who is born of God does not sin.”

[GRATIAN.] Therefore he is not a son of the devil either. For only through sin are we sons of the devil. Therefore we have been transferred from his kingdom into the kingdom of the love of the Son of God, and we have been rescued from the power of darkness and made sons of light. Therefore, since before confession, as has been proved, we are raised through grace and made sons of light, it appears most evidently that through contrition of heart alone, without confession of the mouth, sin is remitted.

[C. XXXVI.]

"Qui natus est ex Deo, non peccat". [Gratian.] Ergo nec est filius diaboli. Solo enim peccato filii diaboli sumus. Ergo de regno eius translati sumus in regnum karitatis filii Dei, et sumus erepti de potestate tenebrarum, et facti filii lucis. Cum ergo ante confessionem, ut probatum est, simus resuscitati per gratiam, et filii lucis facti, euidentissime apparet, quod sola contritione cordis sine confessione oris, peccatum remittitur.

[C. XXXVII.] Likewise.

“Everyone who does not love remains in death.”

[GRATIAN.] Therefore, if he lives, he also loves; if he loves, love is in him. But love is not in an evil person. For it is the proper fountain of good things, in which a stranger does not share. Therefore this person has been made good through grace before confession of the sin; thus he is not evil, for someone cannot be good and evil at the same time. But if he is not evil, he is proved not to be a member of the devil; therefore, neither is he worthy of Gehenna, which is owed only to the devil and his members, just as eternal beatitude is prepared only for the members of Christ. Therefore the sin is not remitted in confession, because it is proved already to have been remitted. Confession is therefore made for the manifestation of penance, not for obtaining pardon, just as circumcision was given to Abraham as a sign of justice, not as a cause of justification. Thus confession is offered to the priest as a sign of pardon received, not as a cause of remission to be received.

PART II. § 11. Others, on the contrary, testify, saying that without confession of the mouth and satisfaction in deed no one can be cleansed from sin if that person has had time to make satisfaction. Hence the Lord says through the prophet: "Speak your iniquities, so that you may be justified."

[C. XXXVII.] Item.

"Omnis, qui non diligit, manet in morte." [Gratian.] Si ergo uiuit, et diligit; si diligit, dilectio in eo est; dilectio autem in malo non est. Est enim fons bonorum proprius, in quo non conmunicat alienus. Ergo bonus factus est iste per gratiam ante confessionem peccati: non itaque malus est; bonus enim et malus aliquis simul esse non potest. Quod si malus non est, membrum diaboli non esse probatur: nec ergo dignus est gehenna, que diabolo et eius membris solummodo debetur, sicut eterna beatitudo solummodo membris Christi paratur. Non ergo in confessione peccatum remittitur, quod iam remissum esse probatur. Fit itaque confessio ad ostensionem penitenciae, non ad inpetracionem ueniae, sicut circumcisio data est Abrahae in signum iusticiae, non in causam iustificationis, sic confessio sacerdoti offertur in signum ueniae acceptae, non in causam remissionis accipiendae. II. Pars. §. 11. Alii e contra testantur, dicentes sine confessione oris et satisfactione operis neminem a peccato posse mundari, si tempus satisfaciendi habuerit. Unde Dominus per Prophetam ait: "Dic tu iniquitates tuas, ut iustificeris."

[C. XXXVIII.] Likewise Ambrose in the book On Paradise, [chapter 14].

"No one can be justified from sin unless the sin has first been confessed."

[C. XXXVIII.] Item Ambrosius in libro de Paradyso.

[cap. 14.] "Non potest quisquam iustificari a peccato, nisi fuerit peccatum ante confessus."

[C. XXXIX.] The same, in the [first] sermon for Lent.

"Behold, the acceptable time is now at hand, in which confession frees the soul from death; confession opens paradise; confession gives the hope of being saved. Hence Scripture says: 'Speak your iniquities, so that you may be justified.' By these words it is shown that one who is unwilling to confess one's sins during one's life does not merit to be justified. That confession frees you which is made with penance.

§ 1. True penance is grief of heart and bitterness of soul for the evils that each person has committed. Penance is both to lament past evils and not to commit again deeds that must be lamented."

[C. XXXIX.] Idem in sermone [I.] Quadragesimae.

"Ecce nunc tempus acceptabile adest, in quo confessio a morte animam liberat, confessio aperit paradysum, confessio spem saluandi tribuit. Unde scriptura dicit: 'Dic tu iniquitates tuas, ut iustificeris.' His uerbis ostenditur, quia non meretur iustificari qui in uita sua peccata non uult confiteri. Illa confessio uos liberat, que fit cum penitencia. §. 1. Penitencia uera est dolor cordis, et amaritudo animae pro malis, que quisque conmisit. Penitencia est et mala preterita plangere, et plangenda iterum non conmittere."

[C. XL.] Likewise John Golden-Mouth, [in the homily on penance that begins, "With a Provident Mind"].

"Perfect penance compels the sinner willingly to suffer all things. § 1. In that person's heart is contrition, in the mouth confession, in the work complete humility: this is fruitful penance."

> [C. XL.] Item Iohannes Os aureum. [in hom. de penitencia, que incipit: "Prouida mente."]
> "Perfecta penitencia cogit peccatorem omnia libenter sufferre. §. 1. In corde eius contritio, in ore confessio, in opere tota humilitas: hec est fructifera penitencia."

[C. XLI.] The same.

"No one can receive the grace of the heavenly God unless that person has been purified from every stain of sin through the confession of penance, through the gift of saving baptism."

> [C. XLI.] Idem.
>
> "Non potest quis gratiam Dei celestis accipere, nisi purgatus fuerit ab omni sorde peccati per penitenciae confessionem, per donum baptismi salutaris."

[C. XLII.] Likewise Augustine, [in the book On Continence, chapter 6].

"No one receives pardon from a graver punishment that is owed unless that person has paid some punishment, even if far less than is owed. For the generosity of mercy is imparted by God in such a way that the justice of discipline is not abandoned."

> [C. XLII.] Item Augustinus. [in lib. de continentia, cap. 6.]

[C. XLIII.] The same, to Vincentius, [Letter XLVIII].

"Do not think that anyone can pass from error to truth, or from any sin, whether small or great, to correction without penance."

> "Neminem putes ab errore ad ueritatem, et a peccato quocumque seu paruo seu magno ad correctionem sine penitencia posse transire."

[C. XLIV.] The same, [in the Book of Fifty Homilies, homily 49], on penance.

"Do penance of the kind that is done in the Church, so that the Church may pray for you. Let no one say to himself: I do it secretly; I do it before God; God, who pardons me, knows because I do it in my heart. Was it therefore said without cause: 'What you loose on earth will be loosed also in heaven'? Were the keys therefore given to the Church of God without cause? We make void God's Gospel; we make void the words of Christ; we promise you what he denies—do we not deceive you? Job says: 'If I was ashamed to confess my sins in the sight of the people.' And therefore, if you were unable or unwilling to possess either marital chastity or continence, and you wandered from your purpose, whether from the bond of marriage or the devotion of continence, let there be in you the humility and grief of penance. I speak more openly: let no one say, I did not understand. Because after your wives you stained yourselves by illicit intercourse, if besides your wives you lay with any woman, do penance, etc."

[C. XLIV.] Idem [in lib. L. Homil., hom. 49.] de penitencia.

"Agite penitenciam, qualis agitur in ecclesia, ut oret pro uobis ecclesia. Nemo dicat sibi: occulte ago, apud Deum ago, nouit Deus, qui ignoscit michi, quia in corde ago. Ergo sine causa dictum est: 'Que solueritis in terra soluta erunt et in celo.' Ergo sine causa claues datae sunt ecclesiae Dei, frustramus euangelium Dei, frustramus uerba Christi; promittimus uobis quod ille negat: nonne uos decipimus? Iob dicit: 'Si erubui in conspectu populi peccata mea confiteri.' Atque ideo, si non potuistis habere uel noluistis pudicitiam coniugalem, seu continentiam, et deuiastis a proposito, uel uinculo coniugali, uel deuotione continentiae, sit in uobis humilitas et dolor penitenciae. Apertius dico: Nemo dicat, non intellexi. Quia post uxores uestras illicito concubitu uos maculastis, si preter uxores uestras cum aliqua concubuistis, agite penitenciam etc."

[C. XLV.] Likewise Jerome on Exodus.

PART II. "'And Aaron came,' he says, 'and all the elders of Israel, to eat bread with Moses' father-in-law in the sight of God.' Therefore all things that the saints do, they do in the sight of God; but the sinner flees from the sight of God. Finally, it is written that Adam, after he sinned, fled from the sight of God and, when questioned, replied: 'I heard,' he says, 'your voice, and I hid myself because I was naked.' But Cain also, condemned by God for fratricide, 'went out,' he says, 'from the face of God and dwelt in the land of Naim.' Therefore one who is unworthy of his sight goes out from the face of God. But the saints eat and drink in the sight of God, and all things that they do, they do in the sight of God."

"Examining the present passage still further, I see that those who receive a fuller knowledge of God and are more fully imbued with divine disciplines—even if they do evil—do it before God and in his sight, like him who said: 'Against you alone have I sinned, and I have done evil before you.' What advantage, then, does one who does evil before God have? He immediately repents and says: I have sinned. But one who departs from the sight of God does not know how to be converted and to purge sin by repenting. This, therefore, is the difference between doing evil before God and the sinner's having departed from the sight of God."

[C. XLV.] Item Ieronimus super Exodum.

II. Pars. "'Et uenit,' inquit, 'Aaron, et omnes presbiteri de Israel, manducare panem cum socero Moysi in conspectu Dei.' Omnia ergo, que faciunt sancti, in conspectu Dei faciunt, peccator autem a conspectu Dei fugit. Denique scriptum est, quia Adam, postquam peccauit, fugit a conspectu Dei, et interrogatus respondit: 'Audiui,' inquit, 'uocem tuam, et abscondi me, quia nudus eram.' Sed et Cayn, de fratricidio condempnatus Deo: 'Exiit,' inquit, 'a facie Dei, et habitauit in terra Naim.' Exiit ergo a facie Dei qui indignus est conspectu eius. Sancti autem manducant et bibunt in conspectu Dei, et omnia, que agunt, in conspectu Dei agunt. Ego amplius adhuc locum presentem discutiens uideo, quia qui pleniorem scientiam Dei accipiunt, et plenius diuinis inbuti sunt disciplinis, isti, etiamsi malum faciunt, coram Deo faciunt, et in conspectu eius faciunt, sicut ille, qui dixit: 'Tibi soli peccaui, et malum coram te feci.' Quid ergo plus habet qui malum coram Deo facit? Continuo penitet, et dicit: Peccaui. Qui autem discedit a conspectu Dei, nescit conuerti, et peccatum penitendo purgare. Hoc ergo interest, malum coram Deo facere, et a Dei conspectu discessisse peccantem."

[C. XLVI.] Likewise Augustine.

"And immediately he who had said, 'I will make you like Admah and like Zeboiim'—two cities that from their proximity to Sodom drew partnership in a like destruction—says: 'My heart is turned; my soul is troubled within me; I will not act according to the anger of my fury.' Does it not therefore appear that the Lord Jesus is indignant with us when we sin in order to convert us by the terror of his indignation? His indignation, therefore, is not an execution of vengeance but rather an operation of absolution."

[C. XLVI.] Item Augustinus.

"Sed et continuo, qui dixerat: 'Sicut Adama faciam te, et sicut Seboym,' que duae urbes ex uicinia Sodomorum parilis excidii traxere consortium, 'Conuersum est,' inquit, 'cor meum: in me ipso conturbata est anima mea; non faciam secundum iracundiam furoris mei.' Nonne ergo apparet, quod ideo nobis peccantibus indignatur Dominus Iesus, ut indignationis suae terrore nos conuertat? Indignatio ergo eius non ultionis executio, sed magis absolutionis operatio est."

[C. XLVII.] Likewise Ambrose in the book On Paradise, [chapter 14].

"'The serpent deceived me, and I ate.' The fault that is followed by an acknowledgment of offenses is pardonable. Therefore the woman who did not keep silent before God but rather confessed the sin was not despaired of. How healing was the sentence that followed! It is good to be condemned in sin and scourged for an offense, so that we may be scourged with human beings. Finally Cain, who wished to deny his crime, was judged unworthy to be punished in his sin, but was sent away without a prescribed punishment, perhaps not so much on account of the greater crime of parricide—for he committed that against his brother—as of sacrilege, because he believed that God could be lied to, saying: 'I do not know; am I my brother's keeper?' And therefore the accusation was reserved for his accuser, the devil, so that he might be scourged with his angels, he who was unwilling to be scourged with human beings.

§ 1. For that shepherd in the Gospel is read to have carried the sheep that had fallen, not cast it away, and Solomon says: 'Do not be excessively just.' For moderation ought to temper justice. For how is someone to present himself to you to be cured whom you regard with disgust, who thinks that he will be an object of contempt, not compassion, to his physician?"

[C. XLVII.] Item Ambrosius in libro de Paradyso.

[cap. 14.] "'Serpens decepit me, et manducaui.' Venialis culpa, quam sequitur professio delictorum. Ideo non desperata mulier, que non reticuit Deo, sed magis confessa est peccatum quam medicabilis sentencia secuta est. Bonum est condempnari in peccato, et flagellari in delicto, ut cum hominibus flagellemur. Denique Cayn, qui uoluit crimen negare, indignus iudicatus est, qui puniretur in peccato, sed remissus est sine prescripto penae, fortasse non tam maiore crimine parricidii (illud enim conmisit in fratrem) quam sacrilegii, quod Deo credidit mentiendum, dicens: 'Nescio; numquid custos fratris mei sum ego?' Et ideo accusatori eius diabolo accusatio reseruata est, ut cum eius angelis flagelletur, qui cum hominibus noluit flagellari. §. 1. Nam pastor ille euangelicus lapsam ouem uexisse legitur, non abiecisse, et Salomon ait: 'Noli esse nimis iustus.' Debet enim iusticiam temperare moderatio. Nam quemadmodum tibi curandus prebeatur, quem fastidio habeas? qui contemptui se, non conpassioni medico suo putet futurum?"

[C. XLVIII.] The same.

"I willingly pardon; I readily grant indulgence; I prefer mercy to sacrifice, because through sacrifice a just person is commended, but through mercy a sinner is redeemed. 'I did not come to call the just, but sinners to penance.' In the law there is sacrifice; in the Gospel there is mercy. The law was given through Moses; grace through me."

[C. XLVIII.] Idem.

"Libenter ignosco, prompte indulgeo, misericordiam malo quam sacrificium, quia per sacrificium iustus conmendatur, per misericordiam peccator redimitur. 'Non ueni uocare iustos, sed peccatores ad penitenciam.' In lege sacrificium, in euangelio misericordia est; lex per Moysen data est, per me gratia."

[C. XLIX.] Likewise Bishop Leo to Theodore, bishop of Forum Julii, [Letter LXXXIX, otherwise XCI].

"The manifold mercy of God comes to the aid of human lapses in such a way that the hope of eternal life is restored not only through the grace of baptism but also through the medicine of penance, so that those who had violated the gifts of regeneration might, by condemning themselves through their own judgment, arrive at remission of crimes. Thus the safeguards of the divine will have been ordained so that God's indulgence cannot be obtained except through the supplications of priests. For the mediator of God and human beings, the man Christ Jesus the Lord, delivered this power to the prelates of the Church: that they should give the satisfaction of penance to those confessing and, when they had been purified by this saving satisfaction, admit them to the communion of the sacraments through the gate of reconciliation."

And a little later: § 1. "But if any of those for whom we supplicate the Lord, intercepted by some obstacle, should depart from the present life without the gift of indulgence and should end temporal life by the human condition before coming to the appointed remedies, that which he did not receive while remaining in the body he will not be able to obtain when stripped of the flesh."

And after some things: § 2. "But to those who, at a time of necessity and under the pressure of urgent danger, implore the aid of penance and immediately afterward reconciliation, neither satisfaction is to be prohibited nor reconciliation denied, because we can neither place measures upon God's mercy nor define times for it, with whom conversion suffers no delays in pardon."

And likewise: § 3. "Necessity, therefore, is to be aided in such a way that neither the performance of penance nor the grace of communion is denied to them if they are proved to seek it, even after the function of speech has been lost, through indications of unimpaired understanding. But if they have been so burdened by some sickness that they cannot signify in the present what they sought a little earlier, the testimony of the faithful standing around them ought to benefit them, so that they may obtain at the same time the benefit both of penance and of reconciliation. Nevertheless, the rule of the paternal canons is to be preserved concerning the persons of those who sinned by defecting from the Lord's faith."

[C. XLIX.] Item Leo Episcopus Theodoro, Foroiuliensi Episcopo. [epist. LXXXIX. al. XCI.]

"Multiplex misericordia Dei lapsibus humanis ita subuenit, ut non solum per baptismi gratiam, sed etiam per penitenciae medicinam spes uitae reparetur eternae, ut qui regenerationis dona uiolassent, proprio iudicio se condempnantes, ad remissionem criminum peruenirent, sic diuinae uoluntatis presidiis ordinatis, ut indulgentia Dei, nisi supplicationibus sacerdotum, nequeat obtineri. Mediator enim Dei et hominum homo dominus Christus Iesus hanc prepositis ecclesiae tradidit potestatem, ut confitentibus penitenciae satisfactionem darent, et eadem salubri satisfactione purgatos ad conmunionem sacramentorum per ianuam reconciliationis admitterent." Et post pauca: §. 1. "Si autem aliquis eorum, pro quibus Domino supplicamus, quocumque interceptus obstaculo a munere indulgentiae presentis excesserit, et prius, quam ad constituta remedia perueniat, temporalem uitam humana condicione finierit, quod manens in corpore non recepit, consequi exutus carne non poterit." Et post aliqua: §. 2. "His autem, qui tempore necessitatis et periculi urgentis instantia presidium penitenciae, et mox reconciliationis inplorant, nec satisfactio interdicenda est, nec reconciliatio deneganda, quia misericordiae Dei nec mensuras possumus ponere, nec tempora diffinire, apud quem nullas ueniae moras patitur conuersio." Et item: §. 3. "Ita ergo necessitati auxiliandum est, ut nec actio illis penitenciae, nec conmunionis gratia denegetur, si eam etiam amisso uocis offitio per indicia integri sensus querere conprobentur. Quod si aliqua egritudine ita fuerint aggrauati, ut quod paulo ante poscebant sub presenti significare non ualeant, testimonia eis fidelium circumstantium prodesse debebunt, simul tamen et penitenciae, et reconciliationis beneficium consequantur. Seruata tamen regula canonum paternorum circa eorum personas, qui in dominica fide discedendo peccauerunt."

[C. L.] Likewise Ambrose, [Book I On Penance, c. 1].

PART III. "No one can do penance well unless that person has hoped for indulgence. But they deny that communion ought to be restored to those who have fallen by transgression. § 1. God, however, excepted no one's crime, he who forgave all sins."

[C. L.] Item Ambrosius. [lib. I. de penit., c. 1.]

III. Pars. "Nemo potest bene agere penitenciam, nisi qui sperauerit indulgentiam. Sed negant, his oportere reddi conmunionem, qui preuaricatione lapsi sunt. §. 1. Deus autem nullius crimen excepit, qui peccata omnia donauit."

[C. LI.] Likewise Ambrose, [Book II On Cain and Abel, c. 4].

"The Word of God remits sins; the priest is the judge. The priest indeed performs his office and exercises the rights of no power."

And a little later: § 1. "The Lord wished the right both of loosing and of binding to be equal, for he permitted both upon an equal condition. Therefore, one who does not have the right of loosing does not have that of binding either."

And below: § 2. "It is certain that both are permitted to the Church; heresy has neither. For this right was permitted to priests alone. Rightly, therefore, does the Church claim this, which has true priests; heresy cannot claim it, which does not have God's priests."

[C. LI.] Item Ambrosius. [lib. II. de Cain et Abel, c. 4.]

"Verbum Dei dimittit peccata: sacerdos est iudex; sacerdos quidem offitium suum exhibet, et nullius potestatis iura exercet." Et paulo post: §. 1. "Dominus par ius et soluendi esse uoluit, et ligandi, qui utrumque pari conditione permisit. Ergo qui soluendi ius non habet nec ligandi habet." Et infra: §. 2. "Certum est, quod utrumque licet ecclesiae, heresis utrumque non habet. Ius enim hoc solis permissum est sacerdotibus. Recte igitur ecclesia hoc uendicat, que ueros habet sacerdotes; heresis uendicare non potest, que sacerdotes Dei non habet."

[C. LII.] Likewise in the same work, [Book I On Penance, c. 3].

PART IV. "It can happen that someone, overcome by tortures, denies with speech and worships in the heart. Is the case of one who denies voluntarily the same as that of one whom torments bent toward sacrilege? No. But how unworthy it is, when the favor due to a contest has force among human beings, for it to be asserted not to have force with God! For often in this secular contest of athletes the crowd of human beings has been accustomed to crown together with the victors even the defeated whose contests were proven, especially those whom it saw perhaps robbed of victory by deceit or fraud. And will Christ permit his athletes, whom he has seen yield for a short time to grave torments, to remain without pardon? Will one who also cast some down not have the reward of his labor?"

And below, [c. 6]: § 1. "You say to Peter, when he makes an excuse lest you wash his feet: 'Unless I wash your feet, you will have no part with me.' What fellowship, then, can those have with you who do not receive the keys of the kingdom, denying that they ought to remit sins? They indeed confess this rightly concerning themselves. For those who do not have Peter's see, which they tear apart by an impious division, do not have Peter's inheritance."

And a little later: § 2. "Sickness of the flesh repels sin, but luxury of the flesh nourishes guilt. The devil is therefore mocked, so that he wounds himself with his own bite and arms against himself the one whom he thought was to be weakened."

And below: § 3. "What harms the body helps the spirit."

And a little later: § 4. "Just as Christ was sacrificed once for all, so, as often as sins are forgiven, we receive the sacrament of his body so that remission of sins may be given through his blood. Therefore it was most evidently commanded by the Lord's preaching that even those guilty of the gravest crime, if they perform penance with their whole heart and with manifest confession of the sin, are to be bathed in the grace of the heavenly sacrament."

> [C. LII.] Item in eodem. [I. lib. de penit. c. 3.]
> IV. Pars. "Potest fieri, ut aliquis uictus suppliciis sermone neget, et corde adoret. Numquid eadem causa eius, qui sponte negat, et eius, quem tormenta inclinauerunt ad sacrilegium? Non. Quam indignum autem est, cum apud homines ualeat certaminis gratia, ut apud Deum non ualere asseratur? Nam sepe in hoc athletarum seculari certamine etiam uictos, quorum fuerunt certamina probata, hominum uulgus cum uictoribus coronare consueuit; maxime quos uiderit aut forte, dolo, aut fraude excussos uictoria. Et Christus athletas suos, quos uiderit grauibus paulisper cessisse suppliciis, sine uenia patietur manere? Numquid non habebit remunerationem laboris, qui etiam aliquos proiecit?" Et infra: [c. 6.] §. 1. "Dicis Petro excusanti, ne eius pedes lauares: 'Nisi lauero tibi pedes, non habebis partem mecum.' Quid ergo isti possunt tecum consortium habere, qui claues regni non suscipiunt, negantes, quod peccata dimittere debeant? Quod recte quidem de se fatentur. Non enim Petri hereditatem habent qui Petri sedem non habent, quam inpia diuisione discerpunt." Et paulo post: §. 2. "Egritudo carnis peccatum repellit, luxuria autem carnis culpam adolet. Illuditur ergo diabolus, ut se ipsum morsu suo uulneret, et contra se armet, quem debilitandum putauit." Et infra: §. 3. "Quod nocet corpori iuuat spiritum." Et paulo post: §. 4. "Sicut semel pro omnibus inmolatus est Christus, ita, quotiescumque peccata donantur, corporis eius sacramentum sumimus, ut per sanguinem eius remissio peccatorum detur. Ergo euidentissime Domini predicatione mandatum est etiam grauissimi criminis reis, si ex toto corde et manifesta confessione peccati penitenciam gerant, sacramenti celestis perfundendam gratiam."

[C. LIII.] The same, [Book II On Penance, c. 7].

PART V. "However great the stench of the dead man may be, it is all abolished when the sacred ointment has given forth its fragrance, and the dead man rises; the bonds of him who is still in sin are ordered to be loosed; the veil is removed from his face that obscured the truth of the grace he had received. But because pardon was given, he is ordered to reveal his face, to uncover his countenance. For one whose sin has been remitted has nothing of which to be ashamed. For when, amid so great a grace of the Lord and so great a miracle of the divine gift, all ought to have rejoiced, the impious were disturbed and gathered a council against Christ; they also wished to kill Lazarus. Do you not recognize that you are deservedly their successors, whose hardness you inherit? For you too are indignant and gather a council against the Church because you see the dead coming back to life in the Church and being raised by indulgence of sins. And thus, so far as lies in you, through envy you again wish to kill those raised. But Jesus does not revoke his benefits; indeed, he enlarges them by an increase of freedom. The one raised comes back to life solicitously, and, joyful because the grace of resurrection has been celebrated, comes to the supper."

[C. LIII.] Idem. [lib. II. de penit., c. 7.]

V. Pars. "Quantuslibet ergo mortui fetor sit, aboletur omnis, ubi sacrum redoleuerit unguentum, et surgit defunctus, solui iubentur uincula eius, qui adhuc in peccato est; tollitur uelamen de facie eius, quod ueritatem gratiae, quam acceperat, obumbrabat. Sed quia uenia donatus est, reuelare faciem, aperire uultum iubetur. Non enim habet quod erubescat, cui peccatum dimissum est. In tanta enim Domini gratia tantoque diuini muneris miraculo cum oporteret uniuersos letari, conmouebantur inpii, et aduersus Christum concilium congregabant, Lazarum quoque interficere uolebant. Nonne merito eorum successores uos fore cognoscitis, quorum heredes duriciae estis? Nam et uos indignamini, et contra ecclesiam congregatis concilium, quia uidetis mortuos in ecclesia reuiuiscere, et peccatorum indulgentia resuscitari. Itaque (quod in uobis est) per inuidiam rursus uultis interficere resuscitatos. Sed Iesus non reuocat beneficia, immo cumulo libertatis amplificat, reuiuiscit sollicite suscitatus, et celebrata resurrectionis gratia letus ad cenam uenit."

[C. LIV.] Likewise, [in the same place, c. 4].

"He denies to these the grace of his power, which is in the remission of sins, who by a diabolical spirit separate his heavenly power from the Lord's Church, so that he might include the heretics and schismatics of all times, to whom he denies indulgence because every sin concerns individuals and all together."

And below, [c. 5]: § 1. "What wonder is it if you deny salvation to others, you who refuse your own? —although those who seek penance from you differ in nothing from you. For I think that even Judas could not have been excluded from pardon by so great a compassion of the Lord if he had performed penance not among the Jews but before Christ."

And a little later: § 2. "One who does penance ought not only to wash away sin with tears but also to cover and conceal former offenses with amendments, so that sin may not be imputed to that person."

[C. LIV.] Item. [ibidem, c. 4.]

"His potestatis suae gratiam negat, (que in remissione peccatorum est), qui celestem eius potestatem diabolico spiritu separant ab ecclesia Domini, ut omnium temporum hereticos et scismaticos conprehenderet, quibus indulgentiam negat quod omne peccatum circa singulos est ac uniuersos." Et infra: [c. 5.] §. 1. "Quid mirum, si salutem negatis aliis, qui uestram recusatis? licet illi nichil a uobis differant, qui a uobis penitenciam petunt. Arbitror enim, quod et Iudas potuisset tanta miseratione Domini non excludi a uenia, si penitenciam non apud Iudeos, sed apud Christum gessisset." Et paulo post: §. 2. "Qui agit penitenciam, non solum diluere lacrimis debet peccatum sed etiam emendationibus operire, et tegere delicta superiora, ut non inputetur ei peccatum."

[C. LV.] Likewise in the same work, [Book II, c. 9].

PART VI. “Some seek penance for this reason, that they wish communion to be restored to them immediately. These do not so much desire to loose themselves as to bind the priest. For they do not so much desire to strip their own conscience as to clothe the priest, to whom it was commanded: ‘Do not give what is holy to dogs, nor cast your pearls before swine’; that is: participation in sacred communion is not readily to be granted to unclean spirits.”

[C. LV.] Item in eodem. [II. lib. c. 9.]

VI. Pars. "Nonnulli ideo poscunt penitenciam, ut statim sibi reddi conmunionem uelint. Hii non tam se soluere cupiunt, quam sacerdotem ligare. Sua enim conscientia se non tam exuunt, quam sacerdotem indui cupiunt, cui preceptum est: 'Nolite sanctum dare canibus, neque miseritis margaritas uestras ante porcos;' hoc est: inmundis spiritibus sacrae communionis non sunt facile tribuenda consortia."

[C. LVI.] In the same work.

“There are those who think that this is penance: if they abstain from the heavenly sacraments. These are harsher judges against themselves, who prescribe punishment if they decline the remedy; it was fitting for them to grieve on account of the punishment because they were being deprived of heavenly grace.”

And a little later: § 1. “You more easily find one who has preserved innocence than one who has fittingly performed penance for sin. Where is there ambition for dignity to be acquired? Where an outpouring of wine? Where the use of the marital union itself? The world is to be renounced, and less is to be indulged even to sleep than nature demands; it is to be interrupted by groans, broken off by sighs, separated by prayers. One must live in such a way as to die to this use of life; a human being must deny oneself and be changed entirely.”

And below, [c. 11]: § 2. “No one situated in sins ought to arrogate to oneself the authority or usurpation of the sacraments, because it is written: ‘Have you sinned? Be still.’”

(And a little later): § 3. “We say, therefore, that penance is to be done, and to be done at that time when the guilt of luxury cools, and that those situated in captivity to sin ought to be more reverent, not usurpers. For if it is said to Moses when he desires to approach nearer, so that he might drink in knowledge of the heavenly mystery, ‘Loose the shoe from your feet,’ how much more ought we to strip the feet of our soul from bodily bonds and to release its steps from the fetter of this world?”

And below: § 4. “There is nothing that is a matter of such great grief as when each person, situated under captivity to sin, remembers from what state one fell and from what state one descended, and that one flowed down to bodily and earthly things from that beautiful and fair intention of the divine creation.”

[C. LVI.] In eodem.

"Sunt qui arbitrentur, hanc esse penitenciam, si abstineant sacramentis celestibus. Hii seueriores in se iudices sunt, qui penam prescribunt si remedium declinant, quos ob penam conueniebat dolere, quia celesti fraudarentur gratia." Et paulo post: §. 1. "Facilius autem inuenis qui innocentiam seruauerit, quam qui congrue egerit penitenciam peccati; ubi acquirendae ambitio dignitatis, ubi uini effusio, ubi ipsius copulae coniugalis usus? Renunciandum seculo est, et ipsi somno minus indulgendum quam natura postulet, interpellandum est gemitibus, interrumpendum est suspiriis, sequestrandum orationibus, uiuendum ita, ut uitali huic moriatur usui, se ipsum homo abneget, et totus inmutetur." Et infra: [c. 11.] §. 2. "Nemo in peccatis positus arrogare sibi debet auctoritatem aut usurpationem sacramentorum, quia scriptum est: 'Peccasti? quiesce.'" (Et paulo post): §. 3. "Dicimus ergo, agendam penitenciam, et eo tempore agendam, quo culpa deferuescat luxuriae, et in peccati captiuitate positos reuerentiores, non usurpatores esse debere. Nam si Moysi propius accedere gestienti, ut cognitionem misterii celestis hauriret, dicitur: 'Solue calciamentum pedum tuorum:' quanto magis nos animae nostrae pedes exuere uinculis corporalibus, et nexu mundi istius gressus eius debemus absoluere?" Et infra: §. 4. "Nichil est, quod tam summi doloris sit, quam si unusquisque positus sub captiuitate peccati recordetur, unde lapsus sit, atque unde deciderit, et quod ad corporea atque terrena ab illa speciosa ac pulchra diuinae conditionis intentione defluxerit."

[C. LVII.] Likewise Cyprian, [Book IV, Letter 2 to Antonianus].

"But I marvel that some are so obstinate that they think penance should not be given to the fallen, or think pardon should be denied to penitents, when it is written: 'Remember from where you have fallen, and do penance, and perform the former works.' This is certainly said to one who is established to have fallen and whom the Lord exhorts to rise again through works, because it is written: 'Alms deliver from death'—certainly not from that death which Christ's blood extinguished once and from which saving baptism and the grace of our Redeemer freed us, but from that which afterward creeps in through offenses."

[C. LVII.] Item Ciprianus. [lib. IV. epist. 2. ad Antonianum]

"Miror autem quosdam sic obstinatos esse, ut dandam non putent lapsis penitenciam, aut penitentibus existiment ueniam denegandam, cum scriptum sit: 'Memento, unde cecideris, et age penitenciam, et priora opera fac.' Quod utique ei dicitur, quem constat cecidisse, et quem Dominus hortatur per opera rursus exurgere, quia scriptum est: 'Elemosina a morte liberat,' non utique ab illa morte, quam semel Christi sanguis exstinxit, et a qua nos salutaris baptismi et redemptoris nostri gratia liberauit, sed ab ea, que per delicta postmodum serpit."

[C. LVIII.] Likewise Jerome.

"The importunate woman in the Gospel at last merited to be heard, and when the door had been shut with the servants, although it was the middle of the night, a friend received bread from a friend. God himself, who cannot be overcome within himself by any powers, is overcome by the prayers of the publican. The city of Nineveh, which perished through sin, stood firm through weeping. To what end have these things been repeated with so long a beginning? Clearly, so that, though great, you may look upon the small; so that, a rich shepherd, you may not despise a diseased sheep. Christ brought the robber from the cross into paradise, and lest anyone ever think conversion too late, he made the punishment for homicide a martyrdom. Christ, I say, joyfully embraces the returning prodigal son, and, when the ninety-nine animals have been left, the one little sheep that had remained is carried upon the shoulders of the good shepherd. § 1. But where a sinner, understanding the wound, hands himself over to the physician to be cured, there a rod is not necessary, but the spirit of gentleness."

PART III. [GRATIAN.] But that pardon is promised to every sinner by Ambrose's authority seems false. For pardon is denied to some either because of the magnitude of the sin or because of the grade of their office. Hence John says in his epistle: "There is a sin unto death: who will pray for it?" Elsewhere it is also read: "Who will heal an enchanter wounded by a serpent?"

[C. LVIII.] Item Ieronimus.

"Inportuna in euangelio mulier tandem meruit audiri, et clauso cum seruis ostio, media licet nocte, ab amico panes amicus accepit; Deus ipse, qui nullis intra se superari uiribus potest, publicani precibus uincitur. Niniue ciuitas que peccato periit, fletibus stetit. Quorsum ista tam longo repetita principio? uidelicet ut paruum magnus aspicias, ut diues pastor morbidam non contempnas ouem. Christus in paradysum de cruce latronem intulit, et, ne quis aliquando seram conuersionem putaret, fecit homicidii penam martirium. Christus, inquam, prodigum filium reuertentem letus amplectitur, et nonaginta nouem pecudibus derelictis una ouicula, que remanserat, humeris boni pastoris aduehitur. §. 1. Ubi uero peccator intelligens uulnus suum tradit medico se curandum, ibi non est uirga necessaria, sed spiritus lenitatis." III. Pars. [Gratian.] Quod autem omni peccanti auctoritate Ambrosii uenia promittitur, falsum uidetur. Quibusdam enim uenia denegatur aut ex magnitudine peccati, aut ex gradu offitii. Unde Iohannes in epistola: "Est peccatum ad mortem: quis orabit pro eo?" Alibi quoque legitur: "Quis medebitur incantatori uulnerato a serpente?"

[C. LIX.] Likewise.

"If a priest has sinned, who will pray for him?"

[GRATIAN.] But questions of this kind do not always introduce a negation; rather, they denote difficulty or rarity, as in that saying of the Gospel: "Who, do you think, is the faithful and prudent servant, etc.?" Hence also Ambrose: "God, who will be like you?" Certainly not no one, because the Son is the image of the Father. "Who will pray for him?" is to be understood similarly; that is, someone of singular life ought to pray for the one who has sinned in the Lord. "For how would John say that one should not pray for a graver offense, when he had read that Moses prayed and obtained his request where there was voluntary transgression, and when he knew that Jeremiah also prayed?"

§ 1. That saying of John—"There is a sin unto death, etc."—can also be understood otherwise, according to Augustine, so that there is no contradiction between it and the foregoing. For he says: "'There is a sin unto death; I do not say that anyone should pray for it.' Concerning what sin, because it is not expressed, many different things can be thought. But I say that this is the sin: to abandon unto death the faith that works through love." This is also the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit that the Lord asserted in the Gospel is to be remitted neither in this age nor in the future. Whether through delight in sin or despair of pardon someone perseveres in sin unto death, it is just that one who has sinned without end be punished without end. Hence Gregory, [Pope, Book IV of the Dialogues, c. 43]:

[C. LIX.] Item.

"Si sacerdos peccauerit, quis orabit pro eo?" [Gratian.] Sed huiuscemodi interrogationes non semper negationem inferunt; sed potius difficultatem uel raritatem notant, ut est illud euangelii: "Quis, putas, est fidelis seruus et prudens etc." Hinc etiam Ambrosius: "Deus, quis similis erit tibi? non utique nullus; quia imago patris filius est." Similiter accipiendum: "Quis orabit pro eo?" hoc est, singularis uitae aliquis debet orare pro eo, qui peccauit in Domino. "Nam quomodo Iohannes diceret, non orandum pro delicto grauiori, qui legisset, Moysen rogasse, et inpetrasse, ubi erat preuaricatio uoluntaria? qui sciret etiam Ieremiam rogasse?" §. 1. Potest etiam secundum Augustinum aliter intelligi illud Iohannis: "Est peccatum ad mortem etc." ut nulla sit eius et superiorum contrarietas. Ait enim: 'Est peccatum ad mortem, non pro illo dico, ut roget quis.' De quo peccato, quoniam non est expressum, possunt multa et diuersa sentiri. Ego autem dico, hoc esse peccatum, fidem, que per dilectionem operatur, deserere usque ad mortem." Hec etiam est blasphemia in Spiritum sanctum, quam neque in hoc seculo, neque in futuro remittendam in euangelio Dominus asseruit. Siue autem delectatione peccati, siue desperatione ueniae usque ad mortem quis in peccato perseueret, iustum est, ut sine fine puniatur qui sine fine peccauerit. Unde Gregorius: [Papa, lib. IV. Dial. c. 43.]

[C. LX.]

"The wicked would have wished, if they had been able, to live without end so that they could sin without end. Those who never cease to sin while they live show that they desire always to live in sin. It therefore belongs to the great justice of the judge that those who in this life never wished to be without sin should never be without punishment."

PART IV. [GRATIAN.] From these things, therefore, it appears that sin is not remitted without confession of the mouth and satisfaction in deed. For if it is necessary that we speak our iniquities so that we may afterward be justified; if no one can be justified from sin unless the sin has first been confessed; if confession opens paradise and acquires pardon; if only that confession is useful which is made with penance—in which it is noted that confession is one thing and penance another, whether penance is understood as interior or exterior; if one who promises pardon to a person doing penance secretly before God, not before the Church, makes void the Gospel and the keys given to the Church, and also promises the offender what God denies; if no one can obtain pardon unless that person has paid some punishment for the sin, however small and even if less than is owed; if the power of binding and loosing was delivered by God to priests alone; if no one receives pardon unless one strives to obtain it by the supplications of the Church: it is therefore concluded that no one abolishes the guilt of sin before confession of the mouth and satisfaction in deed.

§ 1. Finally, that it may appear plainly that no one is cleansed from sin without confession, let us take our beginning from the very beginning of the human race. The first parents, corrupted by the sin of transgression, were questioned by the Lord concerning their guilt, so that by confessing they might destroy the sin that they had committed by transgressing. But the serpent was not questioned concerning the guilt, because it was not being called back to life through confession. Cain also, when he had added fratricide to the first transgression, was similarly questioned by the Lord concerning his guilt when it was said to him: "Where is your brother Abel?" But because, being proud, he was unwilling to confess his sin and rather attempted by a mendacious denial to deceive the Lord, saying, "Am I my brother's keeper?" he was judged unworthy of pardon. Hence, plunged into the depth of despair when he said, "My iniquity is greater than that I should merit pardon," he went out, a wanderer and fugitive, from the face of the Lord, signifying that those who conceal their sin instead of confessing it are held unworthy of a regard of divine compassion.

The kings also who, led by ignorance, had offended against Abraham merited to be healed only when he prayed. In this it is figured that the passions of conduct are healed only by the prayers of the Church. The Lord also commanded Moses that if leprosy appeared, whether in skin, in a house, or in a garment, it should be shown to the priest and, separated according to his decision, should by his judgment be declared contaminated or cleansed. Saul also, when he was tormented by an evil spirit, could not return to the function of a sound mind unless David first took up the psaltery and played before him, and in this way the devil ceased from tormenting him. In this it is shown mystically that whoever is handed over to the devil on account of sin cannot be rescued from his dominion unless David—that is, the Church—takes up the psaltery and plays before him; that is, makes him a participant in spiritual grace by admonishing him savingly, praying devoutly for him, and presenting to him examples of good work, and thus restrains the devil from invisibly tormenting him.

David also, when he had committed adultery and homicide, did not hear from the prophet, "The Lord has removed your sin from you," before he confessed the sin itself. For he first confessed the sin when the prophet rebuked him, and afterward he heard: "The Lord has removed your sin from you." Ahab also, when he heard the sentence of God threatening him for the shedding of innocent blood, clothed himself with sackcloth, making satisfaction to God through penance. Hence the Lord said to Elijah: "Because Ahab has revered my face, I will not bring evil in his days." When the Ninevites heard, "Yet forty days, and Nineveh will be overthrown," they performed penance by decree of the king and princes, saying: "Who knows whether God may turn and pardon and leave a blessing after him?" Through this humility of satisfaction they merited to escape the imminent overthrow. By their examples it is evidently shown that no one obtains pardon from God unless one first makes satisfaction to him through penance. Nebuchadnezzar, changed from a rational mind into a bestial disposition on account of his pride and departing as a fugitive from his kingdom, did not regain the kingdom before, having been converted, he proclaimed God. Finally the Israelite people, handed over to captivity for the guilt of their transgression, did not merit to be freed before, confessing their sins, they received pardon through the prayers of Daniel and the other saints.

§ 2. In the Gospel also, those coming to John to be baptized by him with the baptism of penance first confessed their sins, showing that each person ought, by condemning one's sins, to confess them and promise the renewal of a better life if one desires to receive the grace of regeneration. Christ also is read to have raised some from the dead, cleansed others from leprosy, enlightened others, and strengthened the limbs of others that were loosened by paralysis. Nevertheless, the petition of their own voice or that of friends is read to have preceded the healing of them all. For, from Luke's account, we learned that he was first asked concerning Peter's mother-in-law before he restored her to health. But that leper whom the Lord cleansed as he descended from the mountain first cried out to him: "Lord, if you will, you can cleanse me"; afterward he cleansed him by touching him. When the blind man cried out to him, "Have mercy on me, Son of David," Jesus asked him: "What do you wish me to do for you?" He said: "Rabboni, that I may see the light." He also heard concerning three dead persons, whom he restored to life when others prayed. He also heard of a fourth when a disciple reported it; but because there were no living persons to pray for him, he did not merit to be raised.

§ 3. By these examples it is most evidently given to be understood that one whom the stain of graver guilt infects cannot be healed unless confession from that person's own mouth or the intercession of the Church assists. Hence that penitent who had first merited to be scourged by keeping silent about his sins afterward, when corrected, said: "Because I kept silent, my bones grew old while I cried out all day." Hence Christ says in the person of his members: "Let not the depth swallow me, nor let the pit press its mouth over me." Augustine explains this, saying: "The pit is the depth of human iniquity. If you fall into it, it will not close its mouth over you if you do not close your mouth. Therefore confess and say: From the depths I have cried to you, O Lord, and you will escape. It will close over the one who in the depth despises, from whom, being dead as though nonexistent, confession perishes." Hence the same prophet says: "Enter his gates in confession," showing that someone can reach the gates of mercy only through confession of sin.

§ 4. Hence also blessed John the Baptist and our Savior took the beginning of their preaching from penance, saying: “Do penance, for the kingdom of heaven will draw near,” showing that no one can reach the heavenly kingdoms unless one first takes care to make satisfaction to God through penance. Hence also in the Acts of the Apostles it is read that believers came to the Apostles, announcing their deeds.

§ 5. From all these things it is easily shown that without confession no one can merit pardon. Hence also Pope Leo says, [Letter LXXVIII, otherwise LXXX, to the bishops of Campania]:

> [C. LX.]
> "Voluissent iniqui, si potuissent, sine fine uiuere, ut potuissent sine fine peccare. Ostendunt quia in peccato semper uiuere cupiunt, qui numquam peccare desinunt, dum uiuunt. Ad magnam ergo iusticiam iudicantis pertinet, ut numquam careant supplicio qui in hac uita numquam uoluerunt carere peccato." IV. Pars. [Gratian.] Ex his itaque apparet, quod sine confessione oris et satisfactione operis peccatum non remittitur. Nam si iniquitates nostras necesse est, ut dicamus, ut postea iustificemur; si nemo potest iustificari a peccato, nisi antea fuerit confessus peccatum; si confessio paradysum aperit, ueniam acquirit; si illa solum confessio utilis est, que fit cum penitencia (in quo notatur aliud esse confessio, aliud penitencia, siue interior siue exterior accipiatur); si ille, qui promittit ueniam occulte apud Deum non apud ecclesiam penitenciam agenti, frustrat euangelium et claues datas ecclesiae, promittit etiam quod Deus negat delinquenti; si nemo potest consequi ueniam, nisi quantulamcumque, etsi minorem quam debeat, peccati soluerit penam; si solis sacerdotibus ligandi soluendique potestas a Deo tradita est; si nullus ueniam accipit, nisi ecclesiae supplicationibus ipsam inpetrare contendat: concluditur ergo, quod nullus ante confessionem oris et satisfactionem operis peccati abolet culpam. §. 1. Denique, ut perspicue appareat, neminem sine confessione a peccato mundari, ab ipsius humani generis principio sumamus exordium. Peccato transgressionis primi parentes corrupti a Domino sunt requisiti de culpa, ut peccatum, quod transgrediendo conmiserant, confitendo delerent. Serpens autem de culpa requisitus non est, quia per confessionem non reuocabatur ad uitam. Cayn quoque, cum primae preuaricationi fratricidium addidisset, similiter a Domino de culpa requisitus est, dum dicitur ei: "Ubi est Abel frater tuus?" Sed quia superbus peccatum suum confiteri noluit, potius mendaciter negando Dominum fallere conatus est, dicens: "Numquid custos fratris mei sum ego?" indignus uenia iudicatus est. Unde in desperationis profundum mersus, dum ait: "Maior est iniquitas mea, quam ut ueniam merear" Vagus et profugus exiit a facie Domini, significans, eos, qui peccatum suum confiteri dissimulant, respectu diuinae miserationis indignos haberi. Reges quoque, qui ignorantia ducti in Abraham deliquerant, non nisi eodem orante sanari meruerunt. In quo figuratur, quod passiones morum non sanantur, nisi orationibus ecclesiae. Moysi quoque precepit Dominus, ut lepra, siue in cute, siue in domo, siue in ueste, appareret, sacerdoti ostenderetur, et, iuxta eius arbitrium separata, eius iudicio contaminaretur, uel mundaretur. Saul quoque, cum a spiritu maligno uexaretur, non poterat ad sanae mentis offitium redire, nisi prius Dauid psalterium arriperet, et coram eo psalleret, et ita ab eius uexatione cessaret diabolus. In quo mistice ostenditur, quod quicumque diabolo propter peccatum mancipatur, ab eius dominio eripi non ualet, nisi Dauid, id est ecclesia, psalterium accipiat, et coram eo psallat, id est participem spiritualis gratiae ipsum faciat, et salubriter ammonendo, et pie pro eo orando, et exempla boni operis sibi prebendo, diabolum ab inuisibili eius uexatione conpescat. Dauid quoque, cum adulterium conmisisset et homicidium, non ante audiuit a Propheta: "Transtulit Dominus peccatum tuum a te," quam ipsum peccatum confiteretur. Prius enim Prophetae redarguenti peccatum confessus est, et postea audiuit: "Transtulit Dominus peccatum tuum a te." Achab quoque, cum de innocentis sanguinis effusione sententiam conminantis Dei audiret, induit se ipsum cilicio, satisfaciens Deo per penitenciam. Unde Dominus ad Helyam ait: "Quoniam Achab reueritus est faciem meam, non inducam malum in diebus eius." Niniuita cum audirent: "Adhuc quadraginta dies, et Niniue subuertetur," ex edicto regis et principum penitenciam egerunt, dicentes: "Quis scit, si conuertatur, et ignoscat Deus, et relinquat post se benedictionem?" Hac humilitate satisfactionis inminentem subuersionem euadere meruerunt. Quorum exemplis euidenter ostenditur, quod nullus a Deo consequatur ueniam, nisi primum satisfecerit sibi per penitenciam. Nabuchodonosor propter superbiam suam a rationabili mente in bestialem animum conmutatus, atque a regno suo profugus recedens, non ante regnum recepit, quam conuersus Deum predicauit. Denique plebs Israelitica ob culpam suae transgressionis captiuitati tradita non ante liberari meruit, quam peccata sua confitens Danielis et aliorum sanctorum precibus ueniam accepit. §. 2. In euangelio quoque uenientes ad Iohannem, ut baptizarentur ab eo baptismo penitenciae, primum confitebantur peccata sua, ostendentes, quod quisque debet peccata sua dampnando: confiteri, et innouationem melioris uitae promittere, si regenerationis gratiam desiderat accipere. Christus quoque alios legitur suscitasse a mortuis, alios a lepra mundasse, alios illuminasse, aliorum membra paralisi dissoluta consolidasse: omnium tamen sanitatem petitio propriae uocis uel amicorum legitur precessisse. Luca enim referente didicimus, quod pro socru Petri prius rogatus est, quam eam sanitati redderet. Leprosus uero ille, quem descendens Dominus de monte mundauit, prius clamauit ad eum: "Domine, si uis, potes me mundare," quem postea tangendo mundauit. Cecus quoque dum clamaret ad eum: "Miserere mei, fili Dauid," interrogauit eum Iesus: "Quid uis, ut faciam tibi?" ait: "Rabboni, ut uideam lumen." Tres quoque mortuos audiuit, quos aliis orantibus reddidit uitae. Quartum quoque discipulo nunciante audiuit; sed quia defuerunt uiui, qui pro eo precarentur, resuscitari non meruit. §. 3. Quibus nimirum exemplis euidentissime datur intelligi, quod ille, quem macula grauioris culpae inficit, nisi confessione proprii oris, uel intercessione ecclesiae suffragante, sanari non poterit. Hinc penitens ille, qui prius tacendo peccata flagellari meruerat, postea correptus dicebat: "Quoniam tacui, inueterauerunt ossa mea, dum clamarem tota die." Hinc Christus ex persona membrorum ait: "Non absorbeat me profundum, neque urgeat super me puteus os suum." Quod Augustinus exponit, dicens: "Puteus est humanae iniquitatis profunditas, in quem si cecideris, non claudet super te os suum, si tu non claudis os tuum; confitere ergo, et dic: De profundis clamaui ad te, Domine, et euades. Claudet super illum, qui in profundo contempnit, a quo mortuo, uelut ab eo, qui non est, perit confessio." Hinc idem Propheta ait: "Introite portas eius in confessione," ostendens ad portas misericordiae non nisi per confessionem peccati aliquem posse pertingere. §. 4. Hinc etiam B. Iohannes Baptista, et Saluator noster exordium suae predicationis a penitencia sumpserunt dicentes: "Penitenciam agite, appropinquabit enim regnum celorum;" ostendentes neminem ad regna celorum posse pertingere, nisi primum per penitenciam Deo curauerit satisfacere. Hinc etiam in Actibus Apostolorum legitur, quod credentes ueniebant ad Apostolos, annunciantes actus suos. §. 5. Ex his omnibus facile monstratur, sine confessione nullum ueniam posse mereri. Hinc etiam Leo Papa ait: [epist. LXXVIII. al. LXXX. ad Episcopos Campaniae]

[C. LXI.]

“For a penitent, confession suffices, which is offered first to the Lord and then to the priest, who approaches as an intercessor for the offenses of penitents.”

[C. LXI.]

"Sufficit penitenti confessio, que primum Domino offertur, deinde sacerdoti, qui pro delictis penitencium precator accedit."

[C. LXII.] The same, [to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne, Letter XC, otherwise XCII, c. 7].

"Penance that has been delayed is not to be denied when it has been sought more earnestly, so that in this way the wounded soul may come to the medicine of indulgence."

> [C. LXII.] Idem. [ad Rusticum, Narbonensem Episcopum, epist. XC. al. XCII. c. 7.]

> "Penitencia, que dilata est, cum studiosius petita fuerit, non negetur, ut eo modo ad indulgentiae medicinam anima uulnerata perueniat."

[C. LXIII.] Likewise Augustine in the sermon on penance, [otherwise the book On the Medicine of Penance].

"It does not suffice to change one's conduct for the better and to withdraw from past evils unless satisfaction is also made to the Lord for those things that were done, through the grief of penance, through the groan of humility, through the sacrifice of a contrite heart, with alms and fasts cooperating."

> [C. LXIII.] Item Augustinus in sermone de penitencia: [al. lib. de penitenciae medicina]
> "Non sufficit mores in melius conmutare, et a preteritis malis recedere, nisi etiam de his, que facta sunt, satisfiat Domino per penitenciae dolorem, per humilitatis gemitum, per contriti cordis sacrificium, cooperantibus elemosinis et ieiuniis."

[C. LXIV.] Likewise Ambrose, [on Luke 1].

"God knows how to change a sentence if you know how to amend an offense."

> [C. LXIV.] Item Ambrosius. [in c. 1. Lucae.]
> "Nouit Deus mutare sententiam, si tu noueris emendare delictum."

[C. LXV.] Likewise Pope Leo, [Letter XC, otherwise XCII, to Rusticus, c. 8].

"It is indeed one thing to demand back just things that are owed, another to despise one's own things from love of perfection. One seeking pardon for unlawful things ought also to abstain from many lawful things, as the Apostle says: 'All things are lawful for me, but not all things are expedient.' Hence, if a penitent has a case that perhaps ought not to be neglected, that person will better seek an ecclesiastical judgment than a forensic one."

> [C. LXV.] Item Leo Papa. [epist. XC. al. XCII. Ad Rusticum, c. 8.]
> "Aliud quidem est debita iusta reposcere, aliud propria perfectionis amore contempnere. Illicitorum ueniam postulantem oportet etiam a multis licitis abstinere; dicente Apostolo: 'Omnia michi licent, sed non omnia expediunt.' Unde si penitens habeat causam, quam negligere forte non debeat, melius expetet ecclesiasticum, quam forense iudicium."

[C. LXVI.] Likewise Jerome on Malachi.

"Let him who is a holy priest and eats the Lord's Passover be girded with the belt of chastity, and let him hear with the Apostles: Let your loins be girded, and lamps burning in your hands. But let one who is a sinner and whom his own conscience bites be girded with sackcloth, and let him lament either his own offenses or those of the people, and let him enter the church from which he had gone out on account of sins, and let him lie down or sleep in sackcloth, so that by austerity of life he may compensate for the past delights through which he had offended God."

[C. LXVI.] Item Ieronimus in Malachia.

"Qui sanctus sacerdos est, et comedit Pasca Domini, accingatur baltheo castitatis, et audiat cum Apostolis: Sint lumbi uestri precincti, et lucernae ardentes in manibus uestris. Qui autem peccator est, et quem remordet propria conscientia, cilicio accingatur, et plangat uel propria delicta uel populi, et ingrediatur ecclesiam, de qua fuerat egressus propter peccata, et cubet uel dormiat in sacco, ut preteritas delicias, per quas Deum offenderat, austeritate uitae conpenset."

[C. LXVII.] The same on the prophet Amos, [at c. 9].

"If we do penance, he too will repent of his sentence. Again, according to the same Jeremiah, he promises prosperous things if we do penance. But if we are dissolved by negligence, he will also repent of his promise and will change the things promised. Of this matter we can have Samaria and Jerusalem as an example, of whom some were freed from imminent punishments, while others lost the things that had been promised to their fathers."

[C. LXVII.] Idem in Amos Propheta. [ad c. 9.]

"Si agamus penitenciam, ipsum quoque suae penitebit sentenciae. Rursus iuxta eundem Iheremiam promittit prospera si penitenciam egerimus. Quod si negligentia dissoluamur, et illum penitebit sponsionis, promissaque mutabit. Cuius rei exemplum Samariam et Iherusalem habere possumus, quorum alii de inminentibus suppliciis liberati sunt, alii que patribus promissa fuerant perdiderunt."

[C. LXVIII.] The same on Daniel, [at c. 4].

"'Therefore, let my counsel be pleasing to you, and redeem your sins with alms and your iniquities with mercies toward the poor, if perhaps God may pardon your offenses.' If he foretold a sentence that cannot be changed, how does he exhort him to alms for the poor and mercy so that God's sentence may be altered? This is easily solved by the example of King Hezekiah, whom Isaiah said was to die, and of the Ninevites, to whom it had been said: 'Yet forty days, and Nineveh will be overthrown.' And nevertheless, at the prayers of Hezekiah and Nineveh, God's sentence was changed. Again, he asserts that he promises indulgence to one doing good, and elsewhere in Jeremiah God says that he threatens evils over a nation and, if it does good, changes the threats through clemency. Again he asserts that he promises to one acting, and, if that person does evil, he says that he changes his sentence, not toward human beings but toward works that have been changed. For God is not angry with human beings but with vices, and when these are not in a human being he by no means punishes what has been changed."

"Let us also speak otherwise. Nebuchadnezzar therefore performed mercies toward the poor according to Daniel's counsel, and for that reason the sentence against him was delayed until the twelfth month. But because afterward, walking in the palace of Babylon, he boasts and says, 'Is this not great Babylon, which I built as a house of the king by the strength of my power and for the glory of my name?' he lost the good of mercy through the evil of pride. 'Perhaps God may pardon your offenses.' Since blessed Daniel, foreknowing future things, doubts concerning God's sentence, those who boldly promise pardon to sinners do a rash thing. And nevertheless it is to be known that pardon is promised in return to Nebuchadnezzar when he does good works."

[C. LXVIII.] Idem super Danielem. [ad c. 4.]

"'Quamobrem, consilium meum placeat tibi, et peccata tua elemosinis redime, et iniquitates tuas in misericordiis pauperum: si forte ignoscat Deus delictis tuis.' Si predixit sententiam, que mutari non potest, quomodo hortatur ad elemosinas pauperum et misericordiam ut Dei sentencia permutetur? Quod facile soluitur regis Ezechiae exemplo (quem Ysaias dixit esse moriturum) et Niniuitarum, quibus dictum fuerat: 'Adhuc quadraginta dies et Niniue subuertetur.' Et tamen ad preces Ezechiae et Niniue Dei sentencia mutata est. Rursum bona agenti se asserit polliceri et indulgentiam, alioquin et in Ieremiam loquitur deus se mala minari super gentem, et, si bona fecerit minas clementia commutare. Rursum agenti asserit polliceri, et, si male fecerit, dicit, suam mutare sentenciam, non in homines, sed in opera, que mutata sunt. Neque enim Deus hominibus irascitur, sed uiciis, que cum in homine non fuerint, nequaquam punit quod mutatum est. Dicamus quidem et aliter. Fecit igitur Nabuchodonosor iuxta Danielis consilium misericordias in pauperes, et idcirco usque ad mensem duodecimum in eo dilata est sentencia. Sed quia postea ambulans in aula Babylonis gloriatur, et dicit: 'Nonne hec est Babilon magna, quam ego edificaui in domum regis et in robore fortitudinis meae, et gloria nominis mei?' bonum misericordiae perdidit malo superbiae. 'Forsitan ignoscat Deus delictis tuis.' Cum B. Daniel prescius futurorum de sentencia Dei dubitet, rem temerariam faciunt qui audacter ueniam peccantibus pollicentur. Et tamen sciendum est, quod Nabuchodonosor bona opera facienti uenia repromittitur."

[C. LXIX.] The same.

"See the kindly Lord mixing mercy with severity and weighing the measure of the punishment itself with a just and merciful balance. He did not hand over the offenders forever, but for as much time, he says, as they served Chushan-rishathaim, that is, eight years. Learn this also, O hearer, whoever you are who are conscious to yourself of some error: for as much time as you know that you erred, for as much time as you offended, humble yourself to God for no less time and make satisfaction to him in the confession of penance. Do not wait for Chushan-rishathaim to humble you and for necessity to extort penance from you against your will; rather, anticipate the hardness of that torturer yourself, because if you amend yourself, if you correct yourself, the Lord is loving and merciful, and tempers vengeance from one who anticipates it by repenting."

"But let us also consider that, as long as those who had been handed over for their offenses served Chushan-rishathaim and did not cry out to the Lord, no one was raised who could save them. But when they cried out to the Lord, then the Lord raised a savior of Israel and saved them."

[C. LXIX.] Idem.

"Vide benignum Dominum misericordiam cum seueritate miscentem, et ipsius penae modum iusta et clementi libratione pensantem. Non in perpetuum tradidit delinquentes, sed quanto, inquit, tempore seruierunt Chusarsathon, hoc est octo annis. Disce et hoc, o tu auditor, quisquis ille es, qui tibi conscius es alicuius erroris, et quanto tempore errasse te nosti, quanto tempore deliquisti, tanto nichilominus tempore humilia te ipsum Deo, et satisfacito ei in confessione penitenciae; non expectes, ut humiliet te Chusarsathon, et inuito necessitas extorqueat penitenciam: sed ipse preueni tortoris istius duriciam, quia, si te ipse emendaueris, si te ipse correxeris, pius est Dominus et misericors, qui uindictam temperet ab eo, qui illam penitendo preuenit. Sed et illud consideremus, quia, donec seruierunt Chusarsathon hi, qui traditi fuerant pro delictis suis, et non clamauerunt ad Dominum, nemo suscitatus est, qui saluare eos posset. Cum uero clamauerunt ad Dominum, tunc suscitauit Dominus saluatorem Israel et saluauit eos."

[C. LXX.] The same, [Jerome on chapter 5 of the Epistle to the Ephesians].

"The Church of Christ is that which has neither spot nor wrinkle nor anything of this kind. Therefore, one who is a sinner and stained by some filth cannot be called of the Church of Christ or be said to be subject to Christ. But it is possible that, just as the Church that formerly had wrinkle, spot, and uncleanness was afterward restored, so also the sinner may run to the physician—because the healthy have no need of a physician, but those who are ill—so that they may cure his wounds and he may become of the Church, which is the body of Christ."

> [C. LXX.] Idem. [Ieronimus in c. 5. Epistolae ad Ephesios]
> "Ecclesia Christi est, non habens maculam neque rugam, aut aliquid istiusmodi. Qui ergo peccator est, et aliqua sorde maculatus, de ecclesia Christi non potest appellari, nec Christo subiectus dici. Possibile autem est, ut, quomodo ecclesia, que prius rugam habuerit et maculam, et inmunditiam postea restituta est, ita et peccator currat ad medicum, quia non habent opus sani medico, sed male habentes, ut curent uulnera ipsius, et fiat de ecclesia, que est corpus Christi."

[C. LXXI.] The same, [on Amos 1].

"'For three crimes of Damascus and for four, I will not convert it.' According to tropology we can say this. The first sin is to have thought things that are evil. The second is to have assented to perverse thoughts. The third is to have completed in deed what you decreed in the mind. The fourth is not to do penance after sin and to be pleased with oneself in one's offense."

> [C. LXXI.] Idem. [in c. 1. Amos.]
> "'Super tribus sceleribus Damasci, et super quatuor non conuertam eum.' Iuxta tropologiam hoc possumus dicere. Primum peccatum est cogitasse que mala sunt. Secundum, cogitationibus acquieuisse peruersis. Tertium, quod mente decreueris opere conplesse. Quartum, post peccatum non agere penitenciam, et suo sibi conplacere delicto."

[C. LXXII.] The same, [Letter LXV to Pammachius and Oceanus].

"The second plank after shipwreck is to confess one's guilt simply. You imitated the one erring; imitate also the one corrected. We erred as young men; let us be amended as old men. Let us join groans and couple tears."

> [C. LXXII.] Idem. [epist LXV. ad Pammachium et Oceanum]
>
> "Secunda post naufragium tabula est culpam simpliciter confiteri. Imitati estis errantem, imitamini et correctum. Errauimus iuuenes, emendemur senes; iungamus gemitus et lacrimas copulemus."

[C. LXXIII.] The same.

"Because the divine nature is merciful and loving and more inclined toward indulgence than toward vengeance, because it does not will the death of the sinner but that the sinner be converted and live, if anyone after a lapse into sins converts oneself to true penance, that person will quickly obtain pardon from the merciful judge."

> [C. LXXIII.] Idem.
> "Quia diuinitatis natura clemens est et pia, magisque ad indulgentiam quam ad uindictam prona, quia non uult mortem peccatoris, sed ut conuertatur et uiuat: si quis post lapsum peccatorum ad ueram penitenciam se conuertit, cito a misericordiae iudice ueniam inpetrabit."

[C. LXXIV.] The same on Malachi.

“Lest perhaps, mindful of sin, they return more slowly, he says, ‘Yet I will cause you to dwell in tabernacles as in the days of festivity,’ so that what baptism does, penance may do, and they may dwell in the tabernacles of the Savior, that is, in the Church.”

[C. LXXIV.] Idem in Malachia.

"Ne forsitan peccati memores tardius reuertantur 'adhuc,' inquit, 'sedere uos faciam in tabernaculis, sicut in diebus festiuitatis,' ut, quod facit baptisma, hoc faciat penitencia, et habitent in tabernaculis Saluatoris, hoc est in ecclesia."

[C. LXXV.] The same, [on Daniel 9].

“Jeremiah had foretold seventy years of the desolation of the temple, after which the people would return again to Judea and the temple and Jerusalem would be built there. This does not make Daniel negligent but rather provokes him to pray, so that what God promised through his clemency he may fulfill through their prayers, lest negligence beget pride and pride beget offense. § 1. Finally, in Genesis we read that one hundred and twenty years were appointed for penance before the flood. Because for so much time—that is, for one hundred years—they were unwilling to do penance, he by no means waits for the other twenty to be completed, but brings on earlier what he had threatened for later. Hence it is said to Jeremiah on account of the hardness of the heart of the Jewish people: ‘Do not pray for this people, because I will not hear you.’ And to Samuel: ‘How long do you mourn over Saul? I have rejected him.’ Therefore, in ashes and sackcloth he asks that what God had promised be fulfilled, not because he was unbelieving concerning future things, but lest security prepare negligence and negligence prepare offense.”

[C. LXXV.] Idem. [in c. 9. Danielis]

"Predixerat Iheremias septuaginta annos dessolationis templi, post quos rursum ueniret populus in Iudeam, et edificaretur ibi templum et Iherusalem. Que res Danielem non facit negligentem, sed magis prouocat ad rogandum, ut quod Deus per suam clementiam promisit per eorum inpleat preces, ne negligentia superbiam, et superbia pariat offensam. §. 1. Denique in Genesi legimus, centum et uiginti annos penitencias constitutos ante diluuium, quia tanto tempore, hoc est centum annis, noluerunt agere penitenciam, nequaquam expectat, ut et uiginti alii conpleantur, sed infert ante quod postea fuerat conminatus. Unde Iheremiae dicitur ob duriciam cordis populi Iudeorum: 'Ne ores pro populo hoc, quia non exaudiam te.' Et ad Samuel: 'Usquequo luges super Saul? Et ego abieci eum.' In cinere igitur et sacco postulat inpleri quod promiserat Deus, non quod esset incredulus futurorum, sed ne securitas negligentiam, et negligentia preparet offensam."

C. LXXVI. By works of mercy we do not buy God, but redeem ourselves.

Likewise Ambrose in the sermon for the Sunday concerning Abraham. “The medicine of mercy takes away great sins.” We have many aids by which we redeem our sins. You have money: redeem your sin. The Lord is not for sale, but you yourself are for sale. You were sold by your sins; redeem yourself by your works, redeem yourself by your money. Money is cheap, but mercy is precious. § 1. “Alms,” he says, “deliver from sin.”

GRATIAN. Crimes, therefore, are redeemed by alms.

C. LXXVI. Operibus misericordiae non Deum emimus, sed nosmetipsos redimimus.

Item Ambrosius in sermone in Dominica de Abraham. "Medicina misericordiae tollit peccata magna." Habemus plura subsidia, quibus peccata nostra redimimus: pecuniam habes, redime peccatum tuum. Non uenalis est Dominus, sed tu ipse uenalis es. Peccatis tuis uenundatus es, redime te operibus tuis, redime te pecunia tua; uilis pecunia, sed preciosa est misericordia. §. 1. "Elemosina," inquit, "a peccato liberat." Gratian. Crimina ergo elemosinis redimuntur.

[C. LXXVII.] Likewise John Golden-Mouth, [Homily IX on chapter 6 of the Epistle to the Hebrews].

"This is the stronger medicine, which works most powerfully in penance. Just as in the precepts of medicine a remedy indeed receives many herbs but one most dominant herb, so also in penance this herb is more dominant and more powerful, and itself effects the whole. For hear what divine Scripture said: 'Give alms, and behold, all things are clean for you.'"

[C. LXXVII.] Item Iohannes Os aureum. [homil. IX. ad c. 6. epist. ad Hebraeos.]

"Medicamentum fortius, quod maxime operatur in penitencia, hoc est. Sicut in preceptis medicinae medicamentum multas quidem herbas accipit, unam autem dominantissimam: sic et in penitencia ista herba dominantior et potentior est, et uniuersum ipsa efficit. Audi enim quid dixit diuina scriptura: 'Date elemosinam, et ecce, omnia munda sunt uobis.'"

[C. LXXVIII.] Likewise Ambrose in [Book I] On Penance, [c. 2].

"God draws no boundary, who promised his mercy to all and granted to his priests permission to release without any exception. But let one who has aggravated the guilt aggravate the penance. For greater crimes are washed away by greater weeping."

[C. LXXVIII]. Item Ambrosius in libro [I.] de penitentia. [c. 2.]

"Deus diffinitionem non facit, qui misericordiam suam omnibus promisit, et sacerdotibus suis relaxandi licentiam sine ulla exceptione concessit. Sed qui culpam exaggerauerit exaggeret penitenciam. Maiora enim crimina maioribus abluuntur fletibus."

[C. LXXIX.] The same, [Book II On Penance, c. 10].

"Let mother Church weep for you and wash away your guilt with tears. Let Christ see you grieving and say: 'Blessed are those who mourn, for you will rejoice.' He loves that many pray for one. Finally, in the Gospel, moved by the widow's tears, because very many were weeping for her, he raised her son."

[C. LXXIX.] Idem. [lib. II. de penit. c. 10.]

"Fleat pro te mater ecclesia, et culpam tuam lacrimis lauet. Videat te Christus merentem, et dicat: 'Beati tristes, quia gaudebitis,' Amat, ut pro uno multi rogent. Denique in euangelio motus uiduae lacrimis, quia plurimi pro ea flebant, filium eius resuscitauit."

[C. LXXX.] The same, [in the same Book II, c. 11].

"God cast Adam out of paradise immediately after the guilt. He did not delay, but immediately separated him from delights so that he might do penance. He immediately clothed him with a tunic of skins, not silk."

[C. LXXX.] Idem. [eodem lib. II. c. 11.]

"Adam de paradyso statim post culpam Deus eiecit. Non distulit; sed statim separauit a deliciis, ut ageret penitenciam; statim tunica uestiuit eum pellicea, non serica."

[C. LXXXI.] Likewise Augustine to Felicianus.

PART V. "There are three acts of penance, which Your Learning recognizes with me. One is that which gives birth to the new human being, until through saving baptism the washing away of all past sins takes place. For everyone who has already been established as master of one's own will, when coming to the sacraments of the faithful, cannot begin a new life unless that person repents of the old life. From this penance infants alone are immune when they are baptized. For they cannot yet use free choice. Nevertheless, for their consecration and remission of original sin, the faith of those by whom they are offered benefits them.

§ 1. But the second penance is that whose performance is to be undertaken through this whole life, which we pass in mortal flesh, with perpetual humility of supplication. First, because no one desires eternal, incorruptible, and immortal life unless that person repents of this temporal, corruptible, and mortal life. For someone is not born into new life through the sanctification of baptism in such a way that, just as there one puts away all past sins, so one also immediately puts away the mortality and corruption of the flesh itself.

§ 2. The third is the act of penance that is to be undertaken for those sins that the law of the Decalogue contains and concerning which the Apostle says: 'For if we judged ourselves, we would certainly not be judged by the Lord.'"

And below: § 3. "There is also the daily penance of humble and good faithful persons, in which we strike our breasts, saying: 'Forgive us our debts, etc.' Nor do we wish those things to be forgiven us which we do not doubt were forgiven in baptism, but certainly those that, although small, nevertheless frequently creep in through human frailty. If these were gathered against us, they would so burden and oppress us as one great sin. For what difference does it make to shipwreck whether a ship is covered and overwhelmed by one great wave, or whether water gradually creeping into the bilge and abandoned and disregarded through negligence fills and sinks the ship? On account of these things fasts, alms, and prayers keep watch. In these, when we say, 'Forgive us, as we also forgive,' we manifest that we have something to be forgiven us; and, humbling our souls in these words, we do not cease to perform daily penance, as it were."

[C. LXXXI.] Item Augustinus ad Felicianum.

V. Pars. "Tres sunt autem actiones penitenciae, quas mecum uestra eruditio recognoscit. Una est, que nouum hominem parturit, donec per baptismum salutare omnium preteritorum fiat ablutio peccatorum. Omnis enim, qui iam uoluntatis suae arbiter constitutus est, cum accedit ad sacramenta fidelium, nisi eum peniteat uitae ueteris, nouam non potest inchoare. Ab hac penitencia, cum baptizantur, soli paruuli inmunes sunt. Nondum enim uti possunt libero arbitrio. Quibus tamen ad consecrationem remissionemque originalis peccati prodest eorum fides, a quibus offeruntur. §. 1. Altera uero penitencia est, cuius actio per totam uitam istam, qua in carne degimus mortali, perpetua supplicationis humilitate subeunda est. Primo, quia nemo uitam eternam, incorruptibilem inmortalemque desiderat, nisi eum uitae huius temporalis, corruptibilis, mortalis peniteat. Non enim sic quisque in nouam uitam per sanctificationem baptismi nascitur, ut, quemadmodum ibi deponit omnia peccata preterita, ita etiam statim mortalitatem ipsam carnis, corruptionemque deponat. §. 2. Tertia est actio penitenciae, que pro illis peccatis subeunda est, que legis Decalogus continet, et de quibus Apostolus ait: 'Si enim nos iudicaremus, non a Domino utique iudicaremur.'" Et infra: §. 3. "Est etiam penitencia humilium et bonorum fidelium pena cottidiana, in qua pectora tundimus, dicentes: 'Dimitte nobis debita nostra etc.' Neque ea dimitti nobis uolumus, que dimissa in baptismo non dubitamus, sed illa utique, que humanae fragilitati quamuis parua, tamen crebra subrepunt, que, si collecta contra nos fuerint, ita nos grauabunt, eo oppriment, sicut unum aliquod grande peccatum. Quid enim interest ad naufragium, utrum non grandi fluctu nauis operiatur et obruatur, an paulatim subrepens aqua in sentinam, et per negligentiam derelicta atque contempta inpleat nauem atque submergat? propter hec ieiunia, elemosinae, et orationes inuigilant: in quibus cum dicimus: 'Dimitte nobis, sicut et nos dimittimus,' manifestamus nos habere quod nobis dimittatur, atque in his uerbis humiliantes animas nostras cotidianam quodammodo agere penitenciam non cessamus."

[C. LXXXII.] Likewise Gregory.

PART VI. "If the Lord removed so detestable a sin of David, why is it that after all the things that were said to him afterward by the Lord through the prophet concerning the same sin, he endured so much? But without doubt the Lord does not leave an offense without vengeance. For either the penitent person punishes it in oneself, or God strikes it while taking vengeance together with the person. Therefore sin is by no means spared, because it is in no way released without vengeance. Thus David merited to hear after confession, 'The Lord has removed your sin,' and nevertheless, afterward afflicted by many torments and fleeing, he discharged the guilt of the fault that he had perpetrated. In the same way we are absolved from the fault of the first human being by the water of salvation. Nevertheless, even after being absolved, washing away the guilt of that same fault, we still die carnally, because he cuts away our offenses either through us or through himself even when he releases them. For he strives by temporal affliction to wipe away from his elect the stains of iniquities that he does not wish to see in them perpetually."

[C. LXXXII.] Item Gregorius.

VI. Pars. "Si peccatum Dauid Dominus transtulit tam detestabile, quid est, quod post omnia que de eodem peccato per Prophetam ei a Domino dicta sunt postmodum tanta tollerauit? Sed proculdubio Dominus delictum sine ultione non deserit. Aut enim ipse homo hoc in se penitens punit, aut hoc Deus cum homine uindicans percutit. Nequaquam igitur peccato parcitur, quia nullatenus sine uindicta laxatur. Sic enim Dauid audire post confessionem meruit: 'Dominus transtulit peccatum tuum,' et tamen multis post cruciatibus afflictus ac fugiens reatum culpae, quam perpetrauerat, exsoluit. Sicut nos salutis unda a culpa primi hominis absoluimur. Sed tamen, reatum eiusdem culpae diluentes, absoluti quoque adhuc carnaliter obimus, quia delicta nostra siue per nos, siue per semetipsum resecat etiam, cum relaxat. Ab electis enim suis iniquitatum maculas studet temporali afflictione tergere, quas in eis in perpetuum non uult uidere."

[C. LXXXIII.] Likewise Augustine, [On the Merits and Remission of Sins, book II, c. 34].

"Just as the first human beings, by afterward living justly, are rightly believed to have been freed through the Lord's blood from the last judgment, yet by that life did not merit to be recalled to paradise, so also the flesh of sin, even if, after sins have been remitted, a human being has lived justly in it, does not immediately merit not to undergo that death which it drew from the propagation of sin. Something of this kind has been intimated to us concerning the patriarch David in the Book of Kings. When the prophet had been sent to him and threatened him with evils that would befall him because of the sin he had committed, he merited pardon by confession of the sin, the prophet replying that that shameful crime and deed had been remitted to him; and nevertheless the things with which God had threatened him followed, so that he was thus humbled by his son. And now, therefore, it is asked: if God had threatened him because of that sin, why, after the sin was remitted, did he fulfill what he had threatened him with? The only answer—most rightly—is that the remission of that sin was made so that the man would not be hindered from receiving eternal life; but that example of the threat followed so that the man's piety might be exercised and proved in that humiliation. Thus also God inflicted bodily death upon the human being because of sin, and after the remission of sins he did not take it away, for the sake of exercising justice."

[C. LXXXIII.] Item Augustinus. [de peccatorum meritis et remiss. lib. II., c. 34.]

"Sicut primi homines postea iuste uiuendo merito creduntur per Domini sanguinem ab extremo iudicio liberati non tamen illa uita meruerunt ad paradysum reuocari: sic et caro peccati, etiamsi peccatis remissis homo in ea iuste uixerit, non continuo meretur eam mortem non perpeti, quam traxit de propagine peccati. Tale aliquid nobis insinuatum est de patriarcha Dauid in libro Regnorum, ad quem cum Propheta missus esset, eique propter peccatum, quod admiserat, euentura mala conminaretur, confessione peccati ueniam meruit, respondente Propheta, quod illud ei flagitium facinusque remissum sit; et tamen consecuta sunt que Deus fuerat conminatus, ut sic humiliaretur a filio. Quare et nunc dicitur, si Deus propter peccatum illud fuerat conminatus, cur dimisso peccato, quod erat ei minatus, inpleuit? nisi quia rectissime, si dictum fuerit, respondetur, remissionem illam peccati factam, ne homo a percipienda uita inpediretur eterna; subsecutum uero illud conminationis exemplum, ut pietas hominis in illa humilitate exerceretur atque probaretur. Sic et mortem corporis propter peccatum Deus homini inflixit, et post peccatorum remissionem propter exercendam iusticiam non ademit."

C. LXXXIV. In performing penance, the measure of sorrow rather than of time is to be considered.

The same in a homily on penance. PART VII. In performing penance, where an offense of such a kind has been committed that the one who committed it is separated even from the body of Christ, the measure not so much of time as of sorrow is to be considered: "For God will not despise a contrite and humbled heart." But because the sorrow of one heart is very often hidden from another and does not come to the knowledge of others except through words or any other signs, although it is before him to whom it is said, "My groaning is not hidden from you," times of penance are rightly established by those who preside over churches, so that satisfaction may also be made to the church in which those sins are remitted. For outside it they are not remitted. Therefore, when the wound of sin and the attack of disease are so great that the medicines of the Lord's body and blood must be deferred, each person ought, by the authority of the bishop, to remove oneself from the altar in order to perform penance, and by the same authority to be reconciled.

C. LXXXIV. Doloris mensura potius quam temporis in actione penitenciae consideranda est.

Idem in omelia de penitencia. VII. Pars. In actione penitenciae, ubi tale conmissum est, ut is, qui conmisit, a Christi etiam corpore separetur, non tam consideranda est mensura temporis, quam doloris: "Cor enim contritum et humiliatum Deus non despiciet." Verum quia plerumque dolor alterius cordis occultus est alteri, nec in aliorum noticiam nisi per uerba uel quecumque alia signa procedit, cum sit coram illo, cui dicitur: "Gemitus meus a te non est absconditus;" recte constituuntur ab his, qui ecclesiis presunt, tempora penitenciae, ut satisfiat etiam ecclesiae, in qua remittuntur ipsa peccata. Extra eam quippe non remittuntur. Ergo cum tanta est plaga peccati, atque inpetus morbi, ut medicamenta corporis et sanguinis Domini differenda sint, auctoritate antistitis debet se quisque ab altario remouere ad agendam penitenciam, et eadem auctoritate reconciliari.

C. LXXXV. The same in the same work, [homily L, c. 11].

Let a person judge oneself voluntarily while one can, and change one's conduct for the better, lest, when one will no longer be able, one be judged by the Lord against one's will. And when one has pronounced against oneself the sentence of the most severe but most useful medicine, let one come to the bishops through whom the keys are administered to that person in the church; and, as a son now beginning to be good, with the order of the mother's members preserved, let one receive from the prelates of the sacraments the measure of one's satisfaction, devout and suppliant in offering the sacrifice of a troubled heart. Yet let one do what profits not only that person for receiving salvation, but also others as an example, so that, if one's sin is not only to that person's grave harm but also to so great a scandal of others, and the bishop judges this expedient for the church's welfare, one should not refuse to perform penance in the knowledge of many or before the multitude of the whole people, nor resist, lest through shame one add swelling to a lethal and deadly wound.

§ 1. For many are corrected, like Peter; many are tolerated, like Judas, etc.

C. LXXXV. Idem in eadem. [hom. L., c. 11.]

Iudicet se ipsum homo uoluntate, dum potest, et mores conuertat in melius, ne, cum iam non poterit, preter uoluntatem a Domino iudicetur. Et cum in se protulerit seuerissimae medicinae sed tamen utilissimae sententiam, ueniat ad antistites, per quos illi claues in ecclesia ministrantur tamquam bonus iam incipiens esse filius, maternorum membrorum ordine custodito, a prepositis sacramentorum accipiat satisfactionis suae modum, in offerendo sacrificio contribulati cordis deuotus et supplex, id tamen agat, quod non solum ipsi prosit ad recipiendam salutem, sed etiam ceteris ad exemplum, ut, si peccatum eius non solum in graui eius malo, sed etiam in tanto scandalo aliorum est, atque hoc expedire utilitati ecclesiae uidetur antistiti, in noticia multorum, uel coram totius plebis multitudine, agere penitenciam non recuset, nec resistat, ne letali et mortiferae plagae per pudorem addat tumorem. §. 1. Multi enim corriguntur, ut Petrus; multi tollerantur, ut Iudas, etc.

C. LXXXVI. The mortification of vices rather than abstinence from foods is necessary for a penitent.

Likewise Jerome. The canons do not therefore prescribe the measure of time in performing penance sufficiently openly for each crime, so as to say concerning every one how each is to be amended; rather, they establish that it is to be left to the judgment of an understanding priest, because before God not so much the measure of time as that of sorrow avails, nor so much abstinence from foods as the mortification of vices. For this reason they command that the times of penance be shortened in accordance with the faith and manner of life of penitents, and they judge that they are to be prolonged in accordance with negligence. Nevertheless, measures of penance have been imposed for certain faults.

C. LXXXVI. Mortificatio uiciorum magis quam abstinentia ciborum penitenti est necessaria.

Item Ieronimus. Mensuram temporis in agenda penitencia idcirco non satis aperte prefigunt canones pro unoquoque crimine, ut de singulis dicant, qualiter unumquodque emendandum sit, sed magis in arbitrio sacerdotis intelligentis relinquendum statuunt, quia apud Deum non tam ualet mensura temporis, quam doloris, nec abstinentia tantum ciborum, quam mortificatio uiciorum. Propter quod tempora penitenciae pro fide et conuersatione penitentium abbreuianda precipiunt, et pro negligentia protelanda existimant. Tamen pro quibusdam culpis modi penitenciae sunt inpositi.

C. LXXXVII. Likewise John Chrysostom, [that is, the author of the Imperfect Work on Matthew, homily 40].

Who has ever seen a cleric quickly performing penance? And if, when detected, he humbles himself, he does not therefore grieve because he sinned, but is confounded because he lost his glory.

PART VII. GRATIAN. By these authorities it is asserted that no one can be cleansed from sins without penance and confession by one's own voice. Hence the foregoing authorities, by which it seemed to be proved that pardon is granted by contrition of heart alone, are to be interpreted otherwise than they are expounded by those persons. For the satisfaction of tears and a threefold confession of love for the Lord followed Peter's denial, by which he wholly blotted out the sin of the threefold denial. A determinate satisfaction for sin was therefore not necessary for him, whose entire lifetime was being spent in obedience to his Creator. For he imitated that prophetic saying, "Turn away from evil and do good," and that saying of Isaiah, "Let the impious abandon his way, and the iniquitous man his thoughts, etc." Beyond these things nothing is required from a sinner. Therefore, by that authority of Pope Leo the satisfaction of penance is not denied to be necessary for every delinquent, but only for the one who, imitating blessed Peter, utterly renounces this world and wholly mortifies within oneself the tinder of all vices.

§ 1. Likewise, that saying of John Chrysostom, "Tears wash away the fault that shame prevents one from confessing with the voice," and that other saying which he writes in the letter to the Hebrews, "I do not tell you to betray yourself publicly, nor to accuse yourself before others; rather, I wish you to obey the prophet who says, 'Reveal your way before the Lord.' Therefore confess your sins; pronounce your offenses before the true Judge with prayer, not with the tongue but with the memory of your conscience, and only then hope that you can obtain mercy. If you have your sins continually in mind, you will never harbor evil in your heart against your neighbor," are not to be understood as saying that sins are remitted without confession of the mouth, but without public satisfaction. For secret sins are purged by secret confession and hidden satisfaction, nor is it necessary that we confess anew the things that we have once confessed to the priest; but with the tongue of the heart, not of the flesh, we ought continually to confess them before the true Judge. Hence the same John Chrysostom also says: "But now, if you remember your sins, frequently pronounce them in God's sight, and implore his clemency for them, you will blot them out more quickly. But if you now forget your sins, then you will remember them unwillingly, when they are made public in the whole world and brought forth in the sight of all—of both your friends and your enemies, and of the holy angels and the heavenly powers. For it was not to David alone that he said, 'You did it in secret; I shall make it manifest to all'; rather, this is also said to all of us."

§ 2. The saying of Prosper is understood similarly: "Those who of their own accord acknowledge their crime and either disclose it by their own confessions, or, while others do not know, as hidden persons, etc." "While others do not know," that is, while they confess their sin to these persons by a hidden confession and do not manifest it publicly. Likewise that saying of the prophet, "I said, I shall confess, and you remitted"—that is, you judged remissible—"the impiety of my sin." Thus also that saying of Augustine is understood: "Great is the piety of God, that he remitted sins upon the promise alone," that is, judged them remissible. Likewise: "A vow is accounted as the deed when the capacity for the deed is lacking." Hence the vow of confession is accounted as the deed of the voice when the capacity for confession is lacking. Likewise: "The will is rewarded, not the deed," is understood thus: the will makes the deed rewardable; the deed does not make the will rewardable. Likewise that saying, "In whatever hour the sinner shall be converted": one is said to be converted who is turned wholly; one is turned wholly whose deed, voice, and thought labor in the mortification of sin just as they previously served iniquity. Thus also that saying is understood: "Be converted to me, etc." Likewise, "Rend your hearts and not your garments," is said to those who trust that they can please God by exterior satisfaction alone, with no interior satisfaction preceding. Likewise all the things adduced concerning the cleansed lepers or the raised Lazarus are to be referred to contrition of heart, not to the pardon of remission. For obstinacy of mind and contempt for confession are a certain death of impiety and leprosy of pride, from which each person revives when, through grace, sorrow for the fault and a vow of confession are inspired in that person.

§ 3. To this article also pertain those things that have been said concerning persons who live, or walk in the light, or possess the love of God, or have been made dwellings of the Holy Spirit: namely, so that each person is said to have attained all these things by the contrition of heart that one has, not by the full remission of sin that one has not yet found. For just as in baptism sin is remitted and nevertheless its punishment is reserved, so through contrition of heart each person is said to be raised by God, although still held by the guilt of sin. Therefore no one is proved by the foregoing authorities or arguments to be cleansed from sin without confession of the mouth and satisfaction of deed.

PART II. § 4. On the contrary, that authority of John Chrysostom and Prosper seems to be wrested against the author's meaning. For it is not said, "I do not tell you to accuse yourself publicly," but, "I do not tell you to accuse yourself before others." So also Prosper does not say "while everyone does not know," but simply "while others do not know." Hence it is most evidently given to be understood that sins can be blotted out without confession of the mouth. But those things said as an exhortation to penance and confession do not seem contrary to this opinion. For either they are words of exhortation, not command, such as, "Confess your sins to one another," or, if any were spoken as commands, they are to be referred not to confession of the mouth but of the heart, not to exterior but to interior satisfaction.

§ 5. For one penance is interior, another exterior. Interior penance is that of which Augustine says, "Everyone who has been established as master of one's own will cannot begin a new life unless that person repents of the old life." Likewise Peter is read to have said concerning the same thing in the Acts of the Apostles, "Perform penance, and let each one of you be baptized." This is understood to have been said concerning interior, not exterior, penance. But concerning exterior penance Ambrose says on the letter to the Romans: "The grace of God in baptism does not require groaning or weeping, nor any work, but confession of the heart alone, and freely pardons all things." Therefore, whatever things have been said as commands concerning penance are to be referred, as we said, not to exterior but to interior penance, without which no one was ever able to be reconciled to God.

§ 6. But that saying of Augustine by which someone is denied to obtain pardon unless that person has first discharged however small a punishment for sin is not found contrary to this opinion. For no one is asserted to be cleansed from sin unless that person has suffered the punishment of sin. But it is one thing to confess sin to a priest and to make satisfaction for the sin at his judgment, and another to confess to God in the heart and to punish the sin within oneself by secret satisfaction. For penance is, as Augustine says, sorrow of heart by which each person punishes in oneself what one has transgressed. Concerning this satisfaction the same again says, expounding Psalm 50: "Because I know my iniquity. Do not punish it, because I punish it; forgive, because I acknowledge it and do not dissemble." And below: "God so gives mercy that he preserves truth, so that the sins of the one whom he forgives are not unpunished. For he forgives the one who punishes oneself. It is mercy that the person is freed; truth, that the sin is punished." The same on Psalm 84: "Truth springs from the earth, that is, confession from a human being, so that the person may accuse oneself; and thus justice has looked down from heaven, so that the publican, confessing, returned justified. Justice looks down, as though God said: Let us spare this one, because this one does not spare oneself; let us forgive, because this one acknowledges. Therefore justice looked down from heaven, that is, justification was given by God to the penitent."

§ 7. Therefore this secret satisfaction for light or hidden crimes is to be offered to God, and the things believed to be expiated in this way are proved not to be released without punishment. But those things said concerning public satisfaction or confession of the mouth are to be understood concerning public and manifest crimes. For the sins of Nebuchadnezzar, which the prophet counseled to be redeemed by works of mercy and alms, and also the sins of the Ninevites, which were expiated by public satisfaction, were known to all. And a public offense, as Augustine testifies, needs a public remedy.

§ 8. Therefore, by the foregoing authorities, manifest satisfaction and confession of the mouth are proved to be offered for manifest crimes. But hidden sins are not proved necessarily to be confessed to a priest and expiated at his judgment.

PART III. § 9. On the contrary, the things said in assertion of this opinion are supported in part by truth and in part lack weight. For it is supported by the firmest reasoning that no sin can be remitted without contrition of heart, and that hidden sins ought to be expiated by secret satisfaction and public sins by manifest penance. But that any grave offense is expiated without confession of the mouth, if the opportunity of confessing was not lacking, is proved altogether contrary to authority. For how, according to the authority of Pope Leo, can indulgence not be obtained without the supplications of priests, if we can be cleansed from sin without confession of the mouth? For who will supplicate for a sin that one does not know?

§ 10. Likewise, how, according to Augustine, does the one who performs penance without the judgment of a priest frustrate the keys of the church, if one obtains indulgence for a crime without confession of the mouth?

§ 11. Likewise, how, according to Ambrose, is the right of binding and loosing believed to have been permitted by the Lord to priests alone, if each person at one's own judgment binds oneself by sinning, or, by secret penance according to Prosper, pronounces against oneself a sentence of excommunication, and after satisfaction reconciles oneself to God or to his altar without priestly judgment?

§ 12. These things do not accord with the foregoing authorities, but are proved contrary by the examples of many. For the Lord raised the ruler of the synagogue's daughter after the crowds had been cast out; nevertheless, she was not restored to life except in the presence of the girl's mother and father, and also Peter, James, and John. In this we are instructed morally that secret sins, which are understood through the girl's death, are believed to be remitted by the Lord only by the supplications of the church, which is designated through the girl's mother and father, and by the ministry of priests, who are understood through Peter and the others.

§ 13. Likewise in Leviticus: "One who has consecrated one's house or field to the Lord by a vow cannot redeem it except by the shekel of the sanctuary, and with the priest, not the person oneself, computing the number of years until the jubilee." In this we are similarly taught that whoever has wished through penance to offer to the Lord the house of conscience or field of conduct, and by the price of good works to redeem oneself from the vain conduct of one's life, cannot do this except by the shekel of the sanctuary, that is, by the works of penance prescribed by sacred Scripture. Hence blessed John, to the crowds coming to him, did not say simply, "Perform penance," or "fruits of penance," but added "worthy," so that, namely, a quality of good works may be offered in proportion to the quality of sins. For the fruit of the good work of one who has transgressed nothing or little ought not to be equal to that of one who has committed great things. The former, as conscious of no crime, grants oneself the use of lawful things; the latter, as burdened by many, ought to abstain even from lawful things. In the jubilee full remission was granted. Hence through it perfect remission of sin is figured. Therefore the priest computes the number of years until the jubilee when the times of penance are determined at his judgment, through which each person may find full remission of sin. For, as Hesychius says on the same passage, each person is not fully cleansed from sin immediately after the penance has been determined.

§ 14. Therefore, since, as is gathered from the foregoing, the times of penance are determined at the priest's judgment, it appears most evidently that sins are not remitted without confession by one's own voice. For who will prescribe times of penance for anyone unless that person has first taken care to manifest one's sins to him?

§ 15. Likewise, silence concerning sin arises from pride of heart. For each person desires to conceal one's sin so that one's iniquity may not become manifest to others, so that one may not be regarded outwardly among human beings as such as one has already exhibited oneself in the divine sight. No one doubts that this arises from the fountain of pride; for it is a species of pride to wish to seem just when one is a sinner. And the one who, in imitation of the first parents, either strives to lighten one's sins by evasion in words or, like Cain, seeks wholly to suppress one's sin by keeping silent is convicted as a hypocrite. But where pride or hypocrisy reigns, humility cannot have a place. Without humility, however, it is not permitted to hope for pardon. Therefore, where there is silence of confession, pardon for the crime is not to be hoped for. This same thing is proved by the authority of Augustine, who says in the Book on Penance, [c. 10]:

> C. LXXXVII. Item Iohannes Crisostomus. [id est, auctor operis imperfecti in Matthaeum, homil. 40.]
> Quis aliquando uidit clericum cito penitenciam agentem? et si deprehensus humiliauerit se, non ideo dolet, quia peccauit, sed confunditur, quia perdidit gloriam suam. VII. Pars. Gratian. His auctoritatibus asseritur, neminem sine penitencia et confessione propriae uocis a peccatis posse mundari. Unde premissae auctoritates, quibus uidebatur probari, sola contritione cordis ueniam prestari, aliter interpretandae sunt, quam ab eis exponantur. Negationem namque Petri secuta est satisfactio lacrimarum, et trina confessio dominicae dilectionis, qua penitus deleuit peccatum trinae negationis.

Non ergo necessaria sibi erat certa satisfactio peccati, cuius totum uitae tempus obedientiae inpendebatur sui conditoris. Imitabatur enim illud propheticum: "Declina a malo, et fac bonum;" et illud Ysaiae: "Derelinquat inpius uiam suam, et uir iniquus cogitationes suas etc." Amplius horum a peccatore nichil exigitur. Non ergo illa auctoritate Leonis Papae satisfactio penitenciae negatur esse necessaria cuilibet delinquenti, sed ei tantum, qui B. Petrum imitatus huic seculo penitus abrenunciat, et cunctorum uitiorum fomitem in se funditus mortificat. §. 1. Item illud Iohannis Crisostomi: "Lauant lacrimae delictum, quod uoce est pudor confiteri;" et illud aliud, quod scribit in epistola ad Ebreos: "Non tibi dico, ut te prodas in publicum, neque apud alios accuses; sed obedire te uolo Prophetae dicenti: Reuela uiam tuam ante Dominum. Ergo confitere peccata tua, apud uerum iudicem cum oratione delicta tua pronuncia, non lingua, sed conscientiae tuae memoria, et tunc demum spera, te misericordiam posse consequi, si habueris in mente peccata tua continue, numquam malum in corde aduersus proximum tenebis," non ita intelligendum est, ut sine confessione oris peccata dicantur dimitti, sed sine publica satisfactione. Secreta namque peccata secreta confessione et occulta satisfactione purgantur, nec est necesse, ut que semel sacerdoti confessi fuerimus denuo confiteamur, sed lingua cordis, non carnis apud iudicem uerum ea iugiter confiteri debemus. Hinc etiam idem Iohannes Crisostomus ait: "Nunc autem si recorderis peccatorum tuorum, et frequenter ea in conspectu Dei pronuncies, et pro eis clementiam eius depreceris, citius illa delebis. Si autem nunc obliuiscaris peccatorum tuorum, tunc eorum recordaberis nolens, quando in toto mundo publicabuntur, et in conspectu proferentur omnium tam amicorum quam inimicorum tuorum, et sanctorum angelorum, celestiumque uirtutum. Non enim ad Dauid solum dicebat: 'Tu secreto fecisti ego cunctis manifestabo;' sed etiam ad omnes nos hoc dicitur." §. 2. Similiter et illud Prosperi intelligitur: "Qui crimen suum ultro agnoscunt, et aut propriis confessionibus illud produnt, aut nescientibus aliis, quales occulti sunt etc." Aliis nescientibus, id est occulta confessione istis peccatum suum confitentibus, non publice illud manifestantibus. Item illud prophetae: "Dixi: confitebor, et tu remisisti," id est remissibilem iudicasti, "inpietatem peccati mei." Ita et illud Augustini intelligitur: "Magna pietas Dei, ut ad solam promissionem peccata dimiserit," id est remissibilia iudicauerit. Item: "Votum pro opere reputatur, cum deest facultas operis." Unde uotum confessionis reputatur pro opere uocis, cum deest facultas confessionis. Item: "Voluntas remuneratur, non opus," ita intelligitur: uoluntas facit opus remunerabile, non opus uoluntatem. Item illud: "In quacumque hora peccator conuersus fuerit," conuerti dicitur qui omnino uertitur: omnino uertitur, cuius opus, uox et cogitatio ita mortificationi desudat peccati, sicut prius seruierat iniquitati. Ita et illud intelligitur: "Conuertimini ad me etc." Item: "Scindite corda uestra, et non uestimenta, "eis dicitur, qui nulla interiori satisfactione precedente, sed sola exteriori se Deum posse placare confidunt. Item cuncta, que de leprosis mundatis uel de Lazaro suscitato inducuntur, ad contritionem cordis, non ad ueniam remissionis referenda sunt. Obstinatio enim animi, et confessionis contemptus, quedam mors est inpietatis et lepra superbiae, a qua quisque reuiuiscit, dum sibi per gratiam dolor delicti et uotum confessionis inspiratur. §. 3. Ad hunc etiam articulum pertinent ea, que de uiuentibus, uel in luce ambulantibus, uel dilectionem Dei habentibus, uel de habitaculis Spiritus sancti factis dicta sunt, ut hec omnia quisque dicatur assecutus ex cordis contritione, quam habet, non ex plenaria peccati remissione, quam nondum inuenit. Sicut enim in baptismate peccatum remittitur, et tamen eius pena reseruatur, sic per contritionem cordis quisque a Deo resuscitari dicitur, licet adhuc peccati reatu teneatur. Non ergo premissis auctoritatibus uel argumentis sine confessione oris et satisfactione operis aliquis probatur a peccato mundari. II. Pars. §. 4. Econtra auctoritas illa Iohannis Crisostomi et Prosperi contra mentem auctoris extorta uidetur. Non enim dicitur: "non tibi dico, ut te publice accuses," sed: "non tibi dico, ut apud alios te accuses." Sic et Prosper non ait: "omnibus," sed simpliciter: "aliis nescientibus." Unde euidentissime datur intelligi, quod sine confessione oris possunt peccata deleri. Ea uero, que ad exhortationem penitenciae et confessionis dicta sunt, non huic sententiae contraria uidentur. Vel enim sunt uerba exhortationis, non iussionis, sicut illud: "Confitemini alterutrum peccata uestra," uel si qua iubendo dicta sunt, non ad oris confessionem, sed cordis, non ad exteriorem satisfactionem, sed ad interiorem referenda sunt. §. 5. Est enim penitencia alia interior, alia exterior. Interior penitencia est illa, de qua Augustinus ait: "Omnis, qui suae uoluntatis arbiter est constitutus, non potest inchoare nouam uitam, nisi peniteat eum ueteris uitae." Item de eadem Petrus in Actibus Apostolorum legitur dixisse: "Penitenciam agite, et baptizetur unusquisque uestrum." Quod de interiori penitencia, non de exteriori dictum accipitur. De exteriori uero penitencia Ambrosius ait super epistolam ad Romanos: "Gratia Dei in baptismate non requirit gemitum uel planctum, non opus aliquod, sed solam confessionem cordis, et omnia gratis condonat." Quecumque ergo de penitencia iubendo dicta sunt, non ad exteriorem, ut diximus, sed ad interiorem referenda sunt, sine qua nullus umquam Deo reconciliari potuit. §. 6. Illud autem Augustini, quo quisque negatur ueniam consequi, nisi prius quantulamcumque peccati soluerit penam, non huic sententiae inuenitur aduersum. Nullus enim asseritur a peccato mundari, nisi penam peccati passus fuerit. Sed aliud est peccatum sacerdoti confiteri, et eius arbitrio de peccato satisfacere: atque aliud Deo confiteri corde, et secreta satisfactione in se ipso peccatum punire. Est enim penitencia (ut ait Augustinus) dolor cordis, quo quisque in se punit quod deliquit. De hac iterum satisfactione idem ait in Psalmo L. exponens: "Quoniam iniquitatem meam ego cognosco. Tu ne punias, quia ego punio: ignosce, quia ego cognosco non dissimulo." Et infra: "Sic Deus misericordiam dat, ut seruet ueritatem, ut nec peccata eius sint inpunita, cui ignoscit. Ignoscit enim se ipsum punienti. Misericordia est, quod homo liberatur; ueritas, quod peccatum punitur." Idem in Psalmo LXXXIV.: "Veritas de terra oritur, id est confessio de homine, ut se accuset, et sic iusticia de celo prospexit, ut publicanus confitens rediit iustificatus; iusticia prospicit, quasi Deus dicat: parcamus huic, quia non parcit sibi; ignoscamus, quia agnoscit. De celo ergo iusticia prospexit, id est, a Deo data est iustificatio penitenti." §. 7. Hec ergo secreta satisfactio leuium siue occultorum criminum Deo offerenda est, nec sine pena relaxari probantur que sic expiari creduntur. Ea uero, que de publica satisfactione uel oris confessione dicuntur, in publicis et manifestis criminibus intelligenda sunt. Peccata namque Nabuchodonosor, que propheta misericordiis et elemosinis redimi suasit, peccata quoque Niniuitarum, que publica satisfactione expiata sunt, cunctis nota erant. Et publica noxa (ut Augustinus testatur) publico eget remedio. §. 8. Premissis itaque auctoritatibus pro manifestis criminibus manifesta probatur offerenda satisfactio et oris confessio. Latentia uero peccata non probantur sacerdoti necessario confitenda, et eius arbitrio expianda. III. Pars. §. 9. Econtra ea, que in assertione huius sententiae dicta sunt, partim ueritate nituntur, partim pondere carent. Sine contritione etenim cordis nullum peccatum posse dimitti, occulta uero peccata secreta satisfactione, publica quoque manifesta penitencia expiari debere, firmissima constat ratione subnixum. Porro sine confessione oris, si facultas confitendi non defuerit, aliquod graue delictum expiari, auctoritati penitus probatur aduersum. Quomodo enim secundum auctoritatem Leonis Papae sine supplicationibus sacerdotum indulgentia nequit obtineri, si sine confessione oris a peccato possumus emundari? Quis enim supplicabit pro peccato, quod nescit? §. 10. Item, quomodo secundum Augustinum frustrat claues ecclesiae qui sine arbitrio sacerdotis penitenciam agit, si sine oris confessione criminis indulgentiam inpetrat? §. 11. Item, quomodo secundum Ambrosium ius ligandi et soluendi solis sacerdotibus a Domino creditur esse permissum, si quisque suo arbitrio se ipsum peccando ligat, uel secreta penitencia, secundum Prosperum, in se ipsum sententiam profert excommunicationis, atque post satisfactionem absque sacerdotali iudicio se ipsum Deo uel altario eius reconciliat? §. 12. Non sunt hec premissis auctoritatibus consentanea: sed multorum exemplis probantur aduersa. Filiam namque archisynagogi turbis eiectis Dominus resuscitauit: non tamen, nisi presentibus matre et patre puellae, Petro quoque, Iacobo, et Iohanne, uitae reddita est. In quo moraliter instruimur, ut secreta peccata, que per mortem puellae intelliguntur, non nisi supplicationibus ecclesiae, que per matrem et patrem puellae designantur, et sacerdotum ministerio, qui per Petrum et ceteros intelliguntur, a Domino existimentur dimitti. §. 13. Item in Leuitico: "Qui domum suam uel agrum Domino uouendo consecrauerit, non potest eam redimere, nisi syclo sanctuarii, sacerdote quoque (non ipso) supputante annorum numerum usque ad iubileum." In quo similiter docemur, quod quicumque domum conscientiae uel agrum conuersationis per penitenciam Domino offerre, atque precio bonorum operum de uana uitae suae conuersatione se ipsum redimere uoluerit, non potest hoc facere, nisi syclo sanctuarii, id est operibus penitenciae, sacra scriptura prefixis. Unde uenientibus ad se turbis B. Iohannes non ait simpliciter: facite penitenciam, uel fructus penitenciae, sed addidit: "dignos," ut pro qualitate uidelicet peccatorum qualitas offeratur operum bonorum. Non par enim debet esse fructus boni operis eius, qui nichil uel parum deliquit, atque eius, qui grandia conmisit. Ille tamquam nullius criminis sibi conscius usum sibi in rebus licitis prebet; hunc tamquam multis grauatum etiam a licitis temperare oportet. In iubileo plena remissio prestabatur. Unde per eum perfecta remissio peccati figuratur. Sacerdos ergo numerum annorum usque ad iubileum supputat, cum eius arbitrio penitenciae tempora diffiniuntur, quibus quisque plenam peccati remissionem inueniat. Non enim (sicut Esicius ait super eundem locum) statim post diffinitam penitenciam quisque a peccato plene mundatur. §. 14. Cum ergo, ut ex premissis colligitur, tempora penitenciae sacerdotis arbitrio diffiniantur, euidentissime apparet, sine confessione propriae uocis peccata non dimitti. Quis enim tempora penitenciae alicui prefiget, nisi primum peccata sua sibi manifestare curauerit? §. 15. Item: Taciturnitas peccati ex superbia nascitur cordis. Ideo enim peccatum suum quisque celare desiderat, ne iniquitas sua aliis manifesta fiat, ne talis reputetur apud homines foris, qualem se iamdudum exhibuit diuino conspectui. Quod ex fonte superbiae nasci nulli dubium est; species etenim superbiae est, se uelle iustum uideri, qui peccator est; atque ypocrita conuincitur qui ad imitationem primorum parentum uel tergiuersatione uerborum peccata sua leuigare contendit, uel, sicut Cayn, peccatum suum reticendo penitus supprimere querit. Ubi autem superbia regnat, uel ypocrisis, humilitas locum habere non ualet. Sine humilitate uero alicui ueniam sperare non licet. Nec ergo, ubi est taciturnitas confessionis, uenia speranda est criminis. Probatur hoc idem auctoritate Augustini, qui in libro de penitencia [c. 10.] ait:

[C. LXXXVIII.]

“Let the one who repents repent altogether, and show sorrow by tears; let that person present one’s life to God through a priest; let one forestall God’s judgment by confession. For the Lord commanded those who were to be cleansed to show their faces to the priests, teaching that sins must be confessed by bodily presence, not manifested through a messenger, not through writing. For he said, ‘Show your faces,’ and ‘all,’ not one for all. Do not appoint another as a messenger to offer for you the gift established by Moses; rather, you who sinned through yourselves, you yourselves also blush. For shame itself has a share in remission. The Lord commanded this out of mercy, so that no one should repent in secret. For in this, that the person speaks through oneself to the priest and conquers shame by fear of the one offended, pardon of the crime comes to pass. For through confession what was criminal in action becomes venial; and, even if it is not purified immediately, nevertheless what one had committed as mortal becomes vital. For one who, mastering shame, denied to God’s messenger none of the things committed has offered much satisfaction. For God, who is merciful and just, just as he preserves mercy in justice, so also justice in mercy. It is a work of mercy to remit sins to one who sins, but it is necessary that the just one have mercy justly. For it is necessary that he consider not only what the person grieves over but in what manner, whether the person is worthy, I do not say of justice, but of mercy. For justice alone condemns; but the one who seeks grace by spiritual labor is worthy of mercy. For the mind labors by suffering shame; and because modest shame is a great punishment, one who blushes for Christ becomes worthy of mercy. Hence it is clear that the more persons to whom one confesses the baseness of the crime in hope of pardon, the more easily one obtains the grace of remission. For the priests themselves can now profit more, can spare those confessing more. For those whom they remit, God remits. For Lazarus, already raised from the tomb, he offered to the disciples to be loosed, showing through this the power of loosing granted to the priest. For he said, 'Whatever you loose upon earth will be loosed also in heaven'; that is: I, God, and all the ranks of the heavenly host, and all the saints in my glory praise and confirm with you those whom you bind and loose. He did not say 'those whom you think you bind and loose,' but 'those upon whom you exercise a work of justice or mercy.' But I do not acknowledge your other works against sinners.

§ 1. Therefore, one who wishes to confess sins so as to find grace should seek a priest who knows how to bind and loose, lest, when he has proved negligent concerning himself, he be neglected by the one who mercifully admonishes and seeks him, and lest both fall into the pit which the fool refused to avoid.

§ 2. Accordingly, the power of confession is so great that, if a priest is lacking, one should confess to one's neighbor. For it often happens that a penitent cannot be ashamed before a priest, since neither place nor time yields one to the person desiring him. And although the one to whom the person confesses does not have the power of loosing, nevertheless the one who confesses the baseness of the crime to a companion becomes worthy of pardon because of the desire for a priest. For the lepers were cleansed while they were going to show their faces to the priests, before they reached them. Hence it is clear that God looks to the heart when necessity prevents persons from reaching the priests. Indeed, often they seek them while healthy and joyful; while they seek, they die before they arrive. But God's mercy is everywhere, which knows how to spare even the just, although they would not be loosed so quickly as by a priest.

§ 3. Therefore, one who confesses altogether should confess to the better priest whom one can find. If the sin is hidden, let it suffice to bring it to the knowledge of the priest, so that the offering of the gift may be pleasing. For few who might see were present at the raising of the ruler's daughter. For she had not yet been buried, had not yet been carried outside the gate of the city, had not yet been carried outside the house into public knowledge. He raised inwardly the one whom he found inwardly, after leaving only Peter, James, and John, and the girl's father and mother, in whom the priests of the church are figuratively contained. But as for those whom he found outside, it must be considered how he raised them. For a crowd was weeping after the widow's son. Martha and Mary were weeping, supplicating for their brother. The crowd that had followed Mary was also weeping, moved by Mary's tears. In this we are taught that, for those sinning publicly, not their own merit but the merit of the church suffices."

> [C. LXXXVIII.]
> "Quem penitet omnino peniteat, et dolorem lacrimis ostendat, representet uitam suam Deo per sacerdotem, preueniat iudicium Dei per confessionem. Precepit enim Dominus mundandis, ut ostenderent ora sacerdotibus, docens corporali presentia confitenda peccata, non per nuncium, non per scriptum manifestanda. Dixit enim: 'Ora monstrate,' et: 'Omnes,' non unus pro omnibus; non alium statuatis nuncium, qui pro uobis offerat munus a Moyse statutum, sed qui per uos peccastis et uos erubescatis. Erubescentia enim ipsa partem habet remissionis. Ex misericordia enim hoc precepit Dominus, ut neminem peniteret in occulto. In hoc enim, quod per se ipsum dicit sacerdoti, et erubescentiam uincit timore offensi, fit uenia criminis. Fit enim ueniale per confessionem quod criminale erat in operatione, et, si non statim purgatur, fit tamen uitale quod conmiserat mortale. Multum enim satisfactionis obtulit qui erubescentiae dominans nichil eorum, que conmisit, nuncio Dei denegauit. Deus enim qui misericors et iustus est; sicut conseruat misericordiam in iusticia, ita et iusticiam in misericordia. Opus enim est misericordiae peccanti peccata dimittere: sed oportet, ut iustus iuste misereatur. Oportet enim, ut non solum quid, sed in quo doleat consideret, si dignus est, non dico iusticia, sed misericordia. Iusticia enim sola dampnat; sed dignus est misericordia qui spirituali labore petit gratiam. Laborat enim mens patiendo erubescentiam, et, quoniam uerecundia magna est pena, qui erubescit pro Christo fit dignus misericordia. Unde patet, quia quanto pluribus confitebitur in spe ueniae turpitudinem criminis, tanto facilius consequitur gratiam remissionis. Ipsi enim sacerdotes plus iam possunt proficere, plus confitentibus parcere. Quibus enim remittunt remittit Deus. Lazarum enim iam de monumento suscitatum obtulit discipulis soluendum, per hoc ostendens potestatem soluendi concessam sacerdoti. Dixit enim: 'Quodcumque solueritis super terram erit solutum et in celis,' hoc est: ego Deus, et omnes celestis miliciae ordines, et omnes sancti in gloria mea laudant uobiscum et confirmant quos ligatis et soluitis. Non dixit: quos putatis ligare et soluere, sed in quos exercetis opus iusticiae aut misericordiae. Alia autem opera uestra in peccatores non cognosco. §. 1. Quare, qui confiteri uult peccata, ut inueniat gratiam, querat sacerdotem scientem ligare et soluere, ne, cum negligens circa se extiterit, negligatur ab illo, qui eum misericorditer monet et petit, ne ambo in foueam cadant, quam stultus euitare noluit. §. 2. Tanta itaque uis confessionis est, ut, si deest sacerdos, confiteatur proximo. Sepe enim contingit, quod penitens non potest uerecundari coram sacerdote, quem desideranti nec locus, nec tempus. Et si ille cui confitebitur, potestatem soluendi non habeat, tamen fit dignus uenia ex desiderio sacerdotis, qui confitetur socio turpitudinem criminis. Mundati enim sunt leprosi, dum ibant ostendere ora sacerdotibus ante, quam ad eos peruenirent. Unde patet, Deum ad cor respicere, dum ex necessitate prohibentur ad sacerdotes peruenire. Sepe quidem eos querunt sed sani et leti; dum querunt ante, quam perueniunt moriuntur. Sed misericordia est Dei ubique, qui et iustis nouit parcere, etsi non tam cito, sicut soluerentur a sacerdote. §. 3. Qui ergo omnino confitetur, et sacerdoti meliori, quam potest, confiteatur, si peccatum occultum est, sufficiat referre in noticiam sacerdotis, ut grata sit oblatio muneris. Nam in resurrectione filiae principis pauci interfuerunt qui uiderent. Nondum enim erat sepulta, nondum extra portam ciuitatis delata, nondum extra domum in noticiam portata. Intus resuscitauit quam intus inuenit, relictis solis Petro, et Iacobo, et Iohanne, patre et matre puellae, in quibus figuraliter continentur sacerdotes ecclesiae. Quos autem extra inuenit, animaduertendum est, quomodo suscitauit. Flebat enim turba post filium uiduae. Fleuit Martha et Maria, supplicantes pro fratre. Flebat et turba, que Mariam fuerat secuta, lacrimis Mariae admonita. In quo docemur peccantibus publice non proprium, sed ecclesiae sufficere meritum."

C. LXXXIX. That confession which is offered first to God and then to a priest suffices.

Likewise Pope Leo, [letter LXXVIII, otherwise LXXX]. PART IX. Although the fullness of faith that, because of fear of God, does not fear to blush before human beings seems laudable, nevertheless, because not everyone's sins are of such a kind that those whose sins demand penance do not fear to publish them, let the objectionable custom be removed, lest many be kept from the remedies of penance while they either blush or fear to disclose their deeds to their enemies, by which they could be struck down under the provision of the laws. For that confession suffices which is offered first to God, then also to the priest, who approaches as an intercessor for the offenses of penitents. For then more persons can be provoked to penance if the conscience of the one confessing is not published to the ears of the people.

GRATIAN. We have briefly set forth openly the authorities and supports of reasons upon which each opinion concerning confession and satisfaction rests. But to which of these one should rather adhere is reserved to the reader's judgment. For each has wise and religious men as supporters. Hence Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, says in his Penitential:

> C. LXXXIX. Sufficit illa confessio, que primum Deo, deinde sacerdoti offertur.
> Item Leo Papa. [epist. LXXVIII. al. LXXX.] IX. Pars. Quamuis plenitudo fidei uideatur esse laudabilis, que propter Dei timorem apud homines erubescere non ueretur, tamen, quia non omnium huiusmodi sunt peccata, ut ea, que penitenciam poscunt, non timeant publicare, remoueatur inprobabilis consuetudo, ne multi a penitenciae remediis arceantur, dum aut erubescunt, aut timent inimicis suis sua facta reserare, quibus possint legum percelli constitutione. Sufficit enim illa confessio, que primum Deo offertur, tum etiam sacerdoti, qui pro delictis penitentium precator accedit. Tunc enim plures ad penitenciam poterunt prouocari, si populi auribus non publicetur conscientia confitentis. Gratian. Quibus auctoritatibus, uel quibus rationum firmamentis utraque sentencia confessionis et satisfactionis nitatur, in medium breuiter proposuimus. Cui autem harum potius adherendum sit, lectoris iudicio reseruatur. Utraque enim fautores habet sapientes et religiosos uiros. Unde Theodorus Cantuariensis Archiepiscopus ait in Penitenciali suo:

[C. XC.]

"Some say that sins ought to be confessed to God alone, as the Greeks do. Others judge that they are to be confessed to priests, as almost the whole holy church does. Each is done within the holy church not without great fruit, provided only that we confess our sins to God, who is the remitter of sins—and this belongs to the perfect—and say with David, 'I made my offense known to you, and I did not hide my injustice. I said, I shall confess against myself my injustice to the Lord, and you remitted the impiety of my sin.' Nevertheless, the Apostle's institution is to be followed by us: that we confess our sins to one another and pray for one another, so that we may be saved. Therefore the confession made to God alone, which belongs to the just, purges sins. But that which is made to the priest teaches how those sins are to be purged. For God, the author and giver of salvation and holiness, very often supplies this medicine of his penance by an invisible administration, and very often by the activity of physicians."

> [C. XC.]
> "Quidam Deo solummodo confiteri debere peccata dicunt, ut Greci. Quidam uero sacerdotibus confitenda esse percensent, ut fere tota sancta ecclesia. Quod utrumque non sine magno fructu intra sanctam fit ecclesiam, ita dumtaxat, ut Deo, qui remissor est peccatorum, peccata nostra confiteamur, et hoc perfectorum est, et cum Dauid dicamus: 'Delictum meum cognitum tibi feci, et iniusticiam meam non abscondi. Dixi, confitebor aduersum me iniusticiam meam Domino, et tu remisisti inpietatem peccati mei.' Sed tamen Apostoli institutio nobis sequenda est, ut confiteamur alterutrum peccata nostra, et oremus pro inuicem, ut saluemur. Confessio itaque que soli Deo fit, quod iustorum est purgat peccata. Ea uero, que sacerdoti fit, docet, qualiter ipsa purgentur peccata. Deus namque, salutis et sanctitatis auctor et largitor, plerumque prebet hanc suae penitenciae medicinam inuisibili amministratione, plerumque medicorum operatione."

Distinction II

GRATIAN. PART I. Since, however, a discourse concerning penance has once begun, it seems that the matter must be taken up again somewhat more deeply, setting forth openly the opinions of different persons fortified by sure authorities. Some say that penance is useful only once. For it is one and cannot be repeated. But if it is repeated, the preceding penance was not penance. And even if, by the sentence of that person's judge, the person's sins deservedly seem to have been remitted, nevertheless, in the presence of him to whom all future things are present, they are never held to have been remitted, because that sentence of the true priest was not observed: "Go, and now sin no more." Likewise: "Behold, you have been made well; now sin no more, lest something worse happen to you." Likewise, from the Eighth Synod:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quia uero de penitencia semel cepit haberi sermo, aliquantum altius repetendum uidetur, diuersorum sentencias certis auctoritatibus munitas in medium proponentes. Alii dicunt penitenciam semel tantum esse utilem. Unica enim est, nec reiterari potest. Si uero reiteratur, precedens penitencia non fuit. Et si de sentencia iudicis eius merito peccata uidentur esse remissa, apud eius tamen presentiam, cui omnia futura presentia sunt, numquam habentur remissa: quia non est seruata sentencia illa ueri sacerdotis: "Vade, et amplius noli peccare." Item: "Ecce sanus factus es, iam amplius noli peccare, ne deterius tibi aliquid contingat." Item ex VIII. Sinodo:

C. I. One who afterward falls back into the same vice has not utterly extinguished its first cause.

If anyone has once been marked by the vice of envy or contention and falls again into that very thing, let that person know that the first cause from which envy or contention is born lies stored in the inner marrow. Therefore, it is necessary that the person be cured by contrary and opposed things, that is, by the practice of humility. The exercises of humility are these: if one subjects oneself to lowlier duties and assigns oneself to more unworthy ministries. For in this way the vice of arrogance and human glory can be cured, so that, once the affection has been habituated to humility, it no longer falls into the offense of arrogance and vainglory. But a similar cure is applied to every individual vice of this kind.

GRATIAN. Likewise, without charity no sin is remitted to an adult. But one who will at some time sin criminally does not possess charity. Hence Augustine to Count Julian:

> C. I. Primam uicii causam non penitus extinguit qui in idem illam postea recidit.
>
> Si quis semel notatus fuerit inuidiae uel contentionis uicio, et rursum in hoc ipsum inciderit, sciat, se primam causam, ex qua inuidia uel contentio nascitur, in interioribus medullis habere reconditam. Oportet ergo eum per contraria atque aduersa curari, id est per humilitatis exercitium. Exercitia uero humilitatis sunt, si se uilioribus offitiis subdat, et ministeriis indignioribus tradat. Ita namque arrogantiae et humanae gloriae uicium curari poterit, ut in consuetudine humilitatis affectus iam ultra non incidat arrogantiae et uanae gloriae delictum. Sed in huiuscemodi singulis uiciis cura similis adhibetur. Gratian. Item sine karitate nulli adulto peccatum remittitur. Non autem habet karitatem qui aliquando peccaturus est criminaliter. Unde Augustinus ad Iulianum Comitem:

[C. II.]

"Charity that can be abandoned was never true."

> [C. II.]

"Karitas, que deseri potest, numquam uera fuit."

[C. III.] The same on the First Letter of John, [tractate 8].

"Has charity taken root? Be secure; nothing evil can proceed from it."

[C. III.] Idem super epistolam [I.] Iohannis. [tract. 8.]

"Radicata est karitas? securus esto; nichil mali procedere potest."

[C. IV.] Likewise Gregory in the Moralia.

"'Love is strong as death.' For love is compared to the power of death, because it utterly kills, to delight in the world, the mind that it has once seized."

[C. IV.] Item Gregorius in Moralibus.

"'Valida est, ut mors, dilectio.' Virtuti etenim dilectio comparatur, quia nimirum mentem, quam semel ceperit, a delectatione mundi funditus occidit."

[C. V.] Likewise Prosper in Book III of the Contemplative Life, [c. 13].

"Charity is, as it seems to me, a right will, wholly turned away from all earthly and present things, inseparably joined and united to God, kindled by a certain fire of the Holy Spirit, from whom it is and to whom it is referred; foreign to every defilement, ignorant of corruption, subject to no vice of mutability, exalted above all things that are loved carnally, the most powerful of all affections, eager for divine contemplation, always unconquered in all things, the summit of good actions, the salvation of conduct, the end of the heavenly precepts, the death of crimes, the life of virtues, the strength of those fighting, the palm of the victors, the soul of holy minds, the cause of good merits, the reward of the perfect; without it no one has pleased God, with it no one either could sin or will be able to sin; fruitful in penitents, joyful in those advancing, glorious in those persevering, victorious in martyrs, active in absolutely all the faithful, from which whatever good work exists will live."

Likewise: § 1. "This is true, genuine, perfect charity, which the holy Apostle calls a more excellent way. For just as no one arrives where one is tending without a way, so without charity, which has been called the way, human beings cannot walk, but wander."

Likewise, [in the same work, c. 15]: § 2. "Therefore, if we show charity to God and to our neighbor from a pure heart, a good conscience, and an unfeigned faith, we easily resist sin, abound in all good things, despise the allurements of the age, and accomplish with love all things that are difficult or even harsh to human frailty, provided nevertheless that we love God with perfect charity, which is from him for us, from our whole heart and whole soul and all our strength. For each person sins from that part from which one loves God less; if we love him from the whole heart, there will be nothing in us from which we serve the desires of sin. And what is it to love God except to be occupied with him in mind, to conceive the affection for enjoying the sight of him, hatred of sin, weariness of the world, and also to love one's neighbor, whom he judged must be loved in himself; to preserve the lawful measure in that love and not overturn the established order of love? Those overturn the order of love and do not preserve the measure of loving who either love the world, which is to be despised, or love their bodies, which are to be loved less, more; or do not love their neighbors as themselves; or perhaps do not love God more than themselves."

Likewise: § 3. "Our body, because it is a part of us, is to be loved by us for this purpose: that we may naturally take counsel for its welfare and frailty and act so that, orderly subjected to the spirit, it may attain eternal salvation after receiving immortality and incorruption."

Likewise: § 4. "But we then love our neighbors as ourselves if we love them not because of some advantages of ours, not because of benefits hoped for or received, not because of affinities or blood relationships, but for this alone: that they are participants in our nature."

Likewise: § 5. "Not only those whom a degree of blood joins to us are to be believed our neighbors; rather, all human beings who participate in our nature, as I have said, are to be believed our neighbors."

Likewise: § 6. "Accordingly, we love all our neighbors as ourselves when we take counsel for their welfare, as for our own, toward good conduct and the attainment of eternal life; when we consider ourselves in their sins and dangers and come to their aid just as we would wish aid to be given to us, or, if capacity is lacking, retain the will to give aid. Therefore the whole of love for one's neighbor is this: that you will for your neighbor the good that you wish to be conferred upon yourself. But those love God more than themselves who, for love of him, do not spare their temporal welfare, hand themselves over to tribulations and dangers, are prepared to be stripped of their own possessions, to become exiles from their homeland, and to renounce parents, wives, and children; and, to say the whole, not only do not shrink from bodily death but even receive it willingly, choosing to depart from the life of their body rather than from God, the life of their life."

> [C. V.] Item Prosper in libro [III.] de contemplatiua uita. [c. 13.]
> "Karitas est, ut michi uidetur, recta uoluntas, ab omnibus terrenis ac presentibus prorsus auersa, iuncta Deo inseparabiliter et unita, igne quodam Spiritus S. a quo est et ad quem refertur, incensa, inquinamenti omnis extranea, corruptionis nescia, nulli uicio mutabilitatis obnoxia, supra omnia, que carnaliter diliguntur, excelsa, affectionum omnium potentissima, diuinae contemplationis auida, in omnibus semper inuicta, summa actionum bonarum, salus morum, finis celestium preceptorum, mors criminum, uita uirtutum, uirtus pugnantium, palma uictorum, sanctarum mentium anima, causa meritorum bonorum, premium perfectorum; sine qua nullus Deo placuit, cum qua aliquis nec potuit peccare, nec poterit; fructuosa in penitentibus, leta in proficientibus, gloriosa in perseuerantibus, uictoriosa in martiribus, operosa in omnibus omnino fidelibus, ex qua quicquid operis boni est uiuet." Item: §. 1. "Hec est karitas uera germana, perfecta, quam excellentiorem uiam nominat S. Apostolus. Sicut enim sine uia nullus peruenit quo tendit, ita sine karitate, que dicta est uia, ambulare non possunt homines, sed errare." Item: [ibidem cap. 15.] §. 2. "Ergo si karitatem Deo exhibeamus, et proximo de corde puro, et conscientia bona, et fide non ficta, facile peccato resistimus, bonis omnibus habundamus, seculi blandimenta contempnimus, et omnia, que difficilia humanae fragilitati sunt, uel aspera etiam, cum dilectione perficimus, si tamen Deum karitate perfecta, que nobis ab illo est, ex toto corde et ex tota anima, et ex totis uiribus diligamus. Ex ea enim parte quis peccat, ex qua minus diligit Deum; quem si ex toto corde diligamus, nichil erit in nobis, unde peccati desideriis seruiamus. Et quid est diligere Deum, nisi illi occupari animo, concipere fruendae uisionis eius affectum, peccati odium, mundi fastidium, diligere etiam proximum, quem in se censuit diligendum, in ipso amore seruare legitimum modum, nec peruertere dilectionis ordinem constitutum? Ordinem dilectionis illi peruertunt, nec modum diligendi custodiunt, qui aut mundum, qui contempnendus est, diligunt, aut corpora sua minus diligenda plus diligunt, aut proximos non sicut se ipsos, aut Deum plus quam se ipsos forte non diligunt." Item: §. 3. "Corpus nostrum, qua pars nostri est, ad hoc nobis diligendum est, ut saluti eius ac fragilitati naturaliter consulamus, et agamus, quatinus spiritui ordinate subiectum ad eternam salutem accepta inmortalitate et incorruptione perueniat." Item: §. 4. "Proximos autem tunc diligimus sicut nos, si non propter aliquas utilitates nostras, non propter speranda beneficia uel accepta, non propter affinitates uel consanguinitates, sed propter hoc tantum, quod sunt naturae nostrae participes, diligamus." Item: §. 5. "Non illi proximi nostri tantum credendi sunt, quos nobis gradus sanguinis iungit, sed proximi nostri credendi sunt omnes homines naturae nostrae, sicut dixi, participes." Item: §. 6. "Proinde, secundum nos proximos omnes diligimus, quando ad mores bonos, et ad eternam uitam consequendam, sicut nobis, eorum saluti consulimus; quando nos in eorum peccatis ac periculis cogitamus, et, sicut nobis subueniri optaremus, ita eis subuenimus, aut, si facultas defuerit, uoluntatem subueniendi tenemus. Quapropter est proximi tota dilectio, ut bonum, quod tibi conferri uis, uelis et proximo. Illi uero plus quam se diligunt Deum, qui pro eius amore suae ad tempus saluti non parcunt, se ipsos tribulationibus ac periculis tradunt, nudari facultatibus propriis, patriae suae extorres fieri, parentibus, et uxoribus, ac filiis renunciare parati sunt, et, ut totum dicam, ipsam mortem corporis non solum non refugiunt, sed etiam libenter excipiunt, ambientes a corporis sui uita magis, quam a Deo uita uitae suae discedere."

[C. VI.] Likewise Bede on John, [at c. 1].

"Meanwhile it must be asked how it was a special sign for recognizing the Son of God that the Spirit descended upon him and remained.

§ 1. What great thing is it for the Son of God that the Spirit is asserted to remain in him? It must be noted that the Holy Spirit always remained in the Lord; but in holy human beings, as long as they bear a mortal body, in part he remains forever, and in part he withdraws, to return. For he remains with them so that they persist in good actions, love voluntary poverty, attain meekness, mourn from desire for eternity, hunger and thirst for justice, embrace mercy, purity of heart, and the tranquillity of peace; but also so that they do not fear to suffer persecution for the observance of justice and desire to persist in alms, prayers, fasts, and the other fruits of the Spirit. But he withdraws for a time so that they do not always have the capacity to cure the sick, raise the dead, cast out demons, or even prophesy. He remains always so that they may possess virtues and may themselves live wondrously. He comes for a time so that through signs of miracles it may shine forth also to others what sort of persons they are within."

[C. VI.] Item Beda super Iohannem. [ad c. 1.]

"Querendum est interea, quomodo speciale filii Dei agnoscendi signum fuerit, quod super eum descenderit et manserit Spiritus. §. 1. Quid magni est filio Dei, quod in ipso manere Spiritus astruatur? Notandum, quod semper in Domino manserit Spiritus sanctus; in sanctis autem hominibus, quamdiu mortale corpus gestauerint, partim maneat in eternum, partim rediturus secedat. Manet quippe apud eos, ut bonis insistant actibus, uoluntariam paupertatem diligant, mansuetudinem consequantur, pro eterno desiderio lugeant, esuriant et sitiant iusticiam, misericordiam, munditiam cordis, et tranquillitatem pacis amplectantur: sed et pro obseruatione iusticiae persecutionem pati non uereantur, elemosinis, orationibus, ieiuniis, ceterisque Spiritus fructibus insistere desiderent. Recedit autem ad tempus, ne semper infirmos curandi mortuos suscitandi, demones eiciendi, uel etiam prophetandi habeant facultatem. Manet semper, ut possint habere uirtutes, ut mirabiliter ipsi uiuant. Venit ad tempus, ut etiam aliis per miraculorum signa, quales sint intus, effulgeant."

[C. VII.] Likewise the Apostle, [1 Corinthians 13].

"Charity never falls away."

[C. VII.] Item Apostolus. [I. Cor. 13.]

"Karitas numquam excidit."

[C. VIII.] Likewise Augustine on the First Letter of John.

[Tractate 3.] "The invisible anointing is the Holy Spirit; the invisible anointing is charity, which, in whomsoever it shall be, will be like a root for that person, which cannot wither although the sun burns; it is nourished by the sun's heat, not withered."

[C. VIII.] Item Augustinus super epistolam [I.] Iohannis.

[tract. 3.] "Unctio inuisibilis Spiritus sanctus est, unctio inuisibilis karitas est, que, in quocumque fuerit tamquam radix illi erit, quamuis ardente sole arescere non potest, nutritur calore solis, non arescit."

[C. IX.] Likewise Gregory on Ezekiel, [homily III].

"The winged living creatures do not turn back at all when they advance, because the holy preachers so pass from earthly actions to spiritual things that they are thereafter by no means turned back to the things they had abandoned." And a little later: "'No one putting his hand to the plow, etc.' For to put one's hand to the plow is, as it were, to open the earth of one's heart by a certain plowshare of compunction to bring forth fruits. But one looks backward after the plow who, after beginnings of a good work, returns to the evils that one abandoned. Because this does not at all happen to God's elect, it is rightly said now through the prophet, 'They did not turn back when they advanced.'" And a little later: "Hence also Paul says, 'But one thing: forgetting the things that are behind, and stretching myself toward the things that are ahead, I pursue toward the palm of the heavenly calling.' For, stretched toward the things ahead, he had forgotten those behind, because, despising temporal things, he sought only those that are eternal."

[C. IX.] Item Gregorius super Ezechielem. [hom. III.]

"Pennata animalia, minime reuertuntur, cum incedunt, quia sancti predicatores, sic a terrenis actibus ad spiritualia transeunt, ut ad ea, que reliquerant, ulterius nullatenus reflectantur." Et paulo post: 'Nemo mittens manum suam in aratrum, etc.' Manum quippe in aratrum mittere est quasi per quendam conpunctionis uomerem ad proferendos fructus terram sui cordis aperire. Sed retro post aratrum aspicit, qui post exordia boni operis ad mala reuertitur, que reliquit. Quod quia electis Dei minime contingit, recte nunc per Prophetam dicitur: 'Non reuertebantur, cum incederent.' Et paulo post: "Unde et Paulus: 'Unum uero, que retro sunt, oblitus, in ea, que sunt ante, extendens me, sequor ad palmam supernae uocationis.' In anteriora etenim extentus, eorum, que retro sunt, oblitus fuerat, quia temporalia despiciens sola que sunt eterna requirebat."

[C. X.] The same in the same work, homily V.

"'They did not turn back when they advanced,' because all the elect so tend toward good things that they do not return to perpetrate evils. 'For the one who has persevered to the end, this one will be saved.' And, as is said through Solomon, 'The path of the just, like a shining light, proceeds and grows unto the perfect day.' For in their mind good desire and understanding of the inward light are already a part of the day; but because they advance in virtue until the end of life, they then come to the perfect day, when, having been led to the heavenly kingdoms, they will no longer have anything less in that light which they desire."

[C. X.] Idem in eodem, omelia V.

"'Non reuertebantur, cum incederent,' quia electi quique sic ad bona tendunt, ut ad mala perpetranda non redeant. 'Qui enim perseuerauerit usque in finem, hic saluus erit.' Et, sicut per Salomonem dicitur: 'Iustorum semita quasi lux splendens procedit, et crescit usque ad perfectum diem.' In eorum namque animo bonum desiderium atque intellectus lucis intimae iam pars diei est; sed quia usque ad finem uitae in uirtute proficiunt, ad perfectum diem tunc ueniunt, quando ad regna celestia perducti, in ea luce, quam desiderant, iam minus aliquid non habebunt."

[C. XI.] The same in the same work, homily V.

"The movement and mobility of the Spirit can be understood thus. In the hearts of the saints he always remains in respect of certain virtues; but in respect of certain others he comes in order to withdraw, and withdraws in order to come. For in faith, hope, and charity, and in the other good things without which one cannot reach the heavenly homeland—such as chastity, humility, justice, and mercy—he does not desert the hearts of the perfect. But in the power of prophecy, eloquence of teaching, and display of miracles, he is at times present to the elect and at times withdraws himself." And a little later: § 1. "Accordingly, in those virtues without which one does not at all reach life, the Holy Spirit remains in the hearts of his elect; hence he is rightly called stable. But in those through which the power of holiness is shown, he is at times mercifully present and at times mercifully withdraws." Hence Ambrose on the Second Letter to the Corinthians, [at c. 6]:

[C. XI.] Idem in eodem omelia V.

"Potest discursus atque mobilitas Spiritus sic intelligi. In sanctorum quippe cordibus iuxta quasdam uirtutes semper manet; iuxta quasdam uero recessurus uenit, et uenturus recedit. In fide enim, spe atque karitate, et in bonis aliis, sine quibus ad celestem patriam non potest perueniri (sicut est castitas, humilitas, iusticia atque misericordia) perfectorum corda non deserit. In prophetiae uero uirtute, doctrinae facundia, miraculorum exhibitione, electis aliquando adest, aliquando se subtrahit." Et paulo post: §. 1. "In his itaque uirtutibus, sine quibus ad uitam minime peruenitur, Spiritus sanctus in cordibus electorum suorum permanet, unde recte stabilis dicitur. In his uero, per quas sanctitatis uirtus ostenditur, aliquando misericorditer presto est, aliquando misericorditer recedit." Unde Ambrosius super epistolam II. ad Chorinthios: [ad c. 6.]

[C. XII.]

"That charity which abandons in adversity is feigned."

PART II. GRATIAN. Therefore, from the foregoing it appears that charity, once possessed, is not thereafter lost. But one who has once possessed charity will thereafter be unable to sin criminally, so that the impossibility is referred to grace, not to nature. Augustine testifies that one possessing charity cannot sin criminally, saying in the Book of Fifty Homilies, homily 8:

[C. XII.]

"Ficta karitas est, que deserit in aduersitate." II. Pars. [Gratian.] Ex premissis itaque apparet, quod karitas semel habita ulterius non amittitur. Qui autem karitatem semel habuerit criminaliter ulterius peccare non poterit, ut ad gratiam, non ad naturam inpossibilitas referatur. Quod autem karitatem habens criminaliter peccare non possit, testatur Augustinus [in lib. L. Homiliarum,] omelia 8. dicens:

[C. XIII.]

"Because cupidity is the root of all evils and charity is the root of all good things, and the two cannot exist together, unless one has been torn out by the root, the other cannot be planted. Someone strives in vain to cut off the branches if one does not endeavor to tear out the root."

GRATIAN. Therefore, since one who sins criminally is proved never to have possessed charity, it is evidently gathered that a person who at any time sinned criminally does not perform penance. Hence Augustine:

> [C. XIII.]
>
> "Quia radix omnium malorum est cupiditas, et radix omnium bonorum est karitas, et simul ambae esse non possunt, nisi una radicitus euulsa fuerit, alia plantari non potest. Sine causa aliquis conatur ramos incidere, si radicem non contendit euellere." [Gratian.] Cum ergo qui criminaliter peccat karitatem numquam habuisse probatur, euidenter colligitur, penitenciam non agere, qui quandoque criminaliter peccauit. Unde Augustinus:

[C. XIV.]

"Charity is the water of which the Lord says in the Gospel, 'Whoever drinks from the water that I shall give will not thirst forever.'"

GRATIAN. Therefore, since the reprobate, consigned to eternal fires, will thirst forever, how will that person drink the living water, or how will one drink the water springing up into eternal life, who, sunk like lead into the depths, pays the penalties of eternal condemnation?

Likewise: Without charity, how will anyone be able to possess true contrition of heart? How, therefore, remission of offenses? If they are not remitted, how are absolutely all of them not to be exacted for punishment?

Likewise the Lord says, "Amen, amen, I say to you: one who believes in me has eternal life." Therefore one who does not have eternal life does not believe in Christ. But one who possesses charity believes in Christ. For to believe in Christ is to tend toward him by loving. This is the faith, as the Apostle defines it, that works through love; remission of offenses is promised to this alone. But if charity cannot be separated from the faith of Christians, to which alone pardon is promised, how did one who did not possess charity possess the faith of Christians, that is, believe in Christ? How, therefore, did that person receive pardon of offenses? If one did not receive it, how are absolutely all one's works not to be struck with eternal torments?

Likewise the Lord says, "I am the living bread that descended from heaven; if anyone eats from this bread, that person will live forever." Therefore one who does not live forever did not eat the living bread; but one who did not eat did not believe in him. For to eat the living bread is to believe in Christ, that is, to tend toward him by loving. Since, therefore, the reprobate did not believe in him whom one did not eat, and thus did not possess the faith of Christians, by which alone sins are released, how—if the Lord lives, to whom the Father gave all judgment—will that person escape the judgment of perpetual condemnation for all sins, not only actual but also original?

PART III. § 1. These things said concerning charity can be understood concerning perfect charity, which, once possessed, is never lost. But the beginnings of charity are nurtured so that they may grow, and are trampled so that they may fail. For no one suddenly becomes highest; rather, in a good manner of life, which does not exist without charity, each begins from the least things so as to arrive at great ones. Accordingly, there are degrees not only between virtue and virtue, but also in the same virtue. Hence Gregory writes on Ezekiel, [homily XV], saying:

>
> "Karitas est aqua, de qua Dominus ait in euangelio: 'Qui biberit ex aqua, quam ego dabo ei, non sitiet in eternum.'" [Gratian.] Reprobus ergo, cum eternis mancipatus incendiis in eternum sitiat, quomodo bibet aquam uiuam, aut quomodo potabit aquam salientem in uitam eternam, qui, quasi plumbeus demersus in ima, penas luit dampnationis eternae? Item: Sine karitate quomodo ueram contritionem cordis quis habere poterit? quomodo ergo delictorum remissionem? que si non dimissa, quomodo non omnia prorsus ad penam exigenda? Item Dominus: "Amen, amen dico uobis, qui credit in me habet uitam eternam." Qui ergo non habet uitam eternam non credit in Christum. In Christum uero credit qui karitatem habet. In Christum quippe credere est amando in ipsum tendere. Hec est fides, ut diffinit Apostolus, que per dilectionem operatur; huic duntaxat delictorum remissio promittitur. Quod si karitas a fide Christianorum seiungi nequit, cui scilicet soli uenia promittitur, quomodo qui karitatem non habuit fidem Christianorum habuit, id est in Christum credidit? quomodo ergo ueniam delictorum accepit? quam si non accepit, quomodo non omnia prorsus opera eternis sunt ferienda suppliciis? Item Dominus: "Ego sum panis uiuus, qui de celo descendi; si quis manducauerit ex hoc pane, uiuet in eternum." Qui ergo non uiuit in eternum non manducauit panem uiuum: sed qui non manducauit in eum non credidit. Hoc est enim manducare panem uiuum, quod credere in Christum, id est amando tendere in ipsum. Cum igitur reprobus in eum non crediderit, quem non manducauit, et ita fidem Christianorum (qua sola peccata relaxantur) non habuerit, quomodo, si uiuit Dominus, cui omne iudicium dedit Pater, iudicium perpetuae dampnationis effugiet omnium non solum actualium, sed etiam originalium? III. Pars. §. 1. Hec, que de karitate dicuntur, de perfecta intelligi possunt, que semel habita numquam amittitur. Exordia uero karitatis enutriuntur, ut crescant, et conculcantur, ut deficiant. Nemo enim repente fit summus, sed in bona conuersatione, que sine karitate nulla est, a minimis quisque inchoat, ut ad magna perueniat. Sunt itaque gradus non solum inter uirtutem et uirtutem, sed etiam in eadem uirtute. Unde Gregorius super Ezechielem [homil. XV.] scribit, dicens:

[C. XV.]

“When the Lord receives the holy church, he is recognized in its steps, because his glory is declared through its increases. For to the degree that the holy church advances by ascending, God becomes known to human beings from its virtue. Concerning these steps blessed Job also speaks, saying, ‘Through each of my steps I shall proclaim him.’ For one proclaims the almighty Lord through each of one’s steps who, through the increases of the virtues that one receives, always renders him praise for his loving-kindness. If there were not certain steps in the heart’s ascent, the Psalmist would not say, ‘They will walk from virtue to virtue.’ Nor is it remarkable if there are steps from virtue to virtue, when each individual virtue itself is increased by certain steps, as it were, and is thus led through increases of merits to the summit.

§ 1. For one thing is the beginning of virtue, another its advancement, another its perfection. For if even faith itself were not led to its perfection by certain steps, the holy Apostles would by no means have said, ‘Increase our faith.’ And a certain man came to the Lord who wished his son to be cured; but when asked whether he believed, he replied, ‘I believe, Lord; help my unbelief.’ Consider, I ask, what is said. If he believed, why did he say ‘unbelief’? But if he knew that he possessed unbelief, how did he believe? Rather, because through the hidden inspiration of grace faith grows by the steps of its merits, at one and the same time the person who did not yet believe perfectly both believed and was unbelieving.

§ 2. The Lord describes these steps under the name of the harvest, saying: 'Thus is the kingdom of God: as if a man casts seed upon the earth and sleeps and rises night and day, and the seed sprouts and grows while he does not know it. For the earth bears fruit of itself, first the blade, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear; and when it has produced the fruit from itself, immediately he puts in the sickle, because the time of harvest is present.' A person casts seed upon the earth when one plants a good intention in one's heart; and after one has cast the seed, one sleeps, because one now rests in the hope of the good work. But one rises by night and day, because one advances amid adverse and prosperous things; and the seed sprouts and grows while the person does not know it, because, even when one is still unable to measure one's increases, the virtue once conceived is led to advancement. And the earth bears fruit of itself, because, as grace precedes, the human mind spontaneously rises to the fruit of good work. But this same earth produces first the blade, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear. To produce the blade is to possess the still-tender state of a good beginning. But the blade comes to the ear when the virtue conceived in the mind draws itself onward to the advancement of good work. And it bears the full grain in the ear when the virtue has now advanced so far that it is capable of robust and perfect work. But when it has produced the fruit from itself, immediately he puts in the sickle, because the time of harvest is present. For almighty God, when the fruit has been produced, sends the sickle and cuts down his harvest, because, when he has led each person to perfect works, he cuts off that person's temporal life by a sentence sent forth, so as to lead his grain to the heavenly barns. Therefore, when we conceive good desires, we cast seed into the earth. When we begin to work right things, we are the blade. But when we grow toward the advancement of good work, we come to the ear; and when we are made firm in the perfection of that same work, we now bring forth the full grain in the ear.

§ 3. For Peter had been the blade when, at the time of the Passion, following the Lord through love, he feared to confess him before the voice of a maidservant. There was already greenness in his mind, because he believed in the Redeemer of all; but, still very flexible, it was trampled by the foot of fear. He had now risen into the ear when, at the angel's announcement, he saw living in Galilee the one whom he had feared to confess when that one was about to die. But he reached the full grain in the ear when the Spirit came from above and strengthened his mind in love of him, and he was so made firm that, when beaten, he despised the powers of the persecutors and freely preached his Redeemer amid the lashes.

§ 4. Accordingly, let no one who is perceived still to be in the tenderness of mind toward a good purpose be despised, because God's grain begins from the blade so that it may become grain. Therefore the man comes to the gate because our Lord and Redeemer leads his entering members to himself; and he ascends through its steps, because, as we advance, he is exalted the more insofar as he is recognized to be high and incomprehensible. For he is said to ascend in the steps of our virtues because he is shown to us to be so much more sublime, the more our mind is separated from the lowest things."

Hence Augustine also says in the Book on Free Choice, [c. 17]:

> [C. XV.]

"Dum sanctam ecclesiam Dominus suscipit, in gradibus eius dinoscitur, quia eius gloria per illius incrementa declaratur. Quantum enim sancta ecclesia ascendendo proficit, tantum Deus hominibus ex eius uirtute innotescit. De his quoque gradibus B. Iob loquitur, dicens: 'Per singulos gradus meos pronunciabo illum.' Omnipotentem quippe Dominum per singulos gradus suos pronunciat, qui per incrementa uirtutum, que accipit, ei semper laudem suae pietatis reddit. Si quidam gradus in cordis ascensione non essent, Psalmista non diceret: 'Ambulabunt de uirtute in uirtutem.' Nec mirum, si de uirtute in uirtutem gradus sunt, quando ipsa unaqueque uirtus quibusdam quasi gradibus augetur, et sic per incrementa meritorum ad summam perducitur. §. 1. Alia namque sunt uirtutis exordia, aliud prouectus, aliud perfectio. Si enim et ipsa fides ad perfectionem suam non gradibus quibusdam duceretur, sancti Apostoli minime dixissent: 'Auge nobis fidem.' Et quidam uenit ad Dominum, qui curari uoluit filium suum; sed requisitus, an crederet, respondit: 'Credo, Domine, adiuua incredulitatem meam.' Pensate, rogo, quod dicitur. Si credebat, cur incredulitatem dicebat? Si uero incredulitatem habere se nouerat, quomodo credebat? Sed quia per occultam inspirationem gratiae suorum meritorum gradibus fides crescit, uno eodemque tempore is, qui necdum perfecte crediderat, simul et credebat, et incredulus erat. §. 2. Hos nimirum gradus Dominus sub messis nomine describit, dicens: 'Sic est regnum Dei, quemadmodum si iactet homo semen in terram, et dormiat, et exsurgat nocte ac die, et semen germinet, et crescat, dum nescit ille. Ultro enim terra fructificat, primum herbam, deinde spicam, deinde plenum frumentum in spica; et cum ex se produxerit fructus, statim mittit falcem, quoniam adest tempus messis.' Semen homo iactat in terram, cum cordi suo bonam intentionem inserit, et post, quam semen iactauerit, dormit, quia iam in spe boni operis quiescit. Nocte uero surgit ac die, quia inter aduersa et prospera proficit, et semen germinat et crescit, dum nescit ille, quia, et cum adhuc metiri sua incrementa non ualet, semel concepta uirtus ad prouectum ducitur, et ultro terra fructificat, quia preueniente se gratia mens hominis spontanea ad fructum boni operis assurgit. Sed hec eadem terra primum herbam, deinde spicam deinde plenum frumentum producit in spica. Herbam quippe producere est inchoationis bonae adhuc teneritudinem habere. Ad spicam uero herba uenit, cum se uirtus animo concepta ad prouectum boni operis pertrahit. Plenum uero frumentum in spica fructificat, quando iam tantum uirtus proficit, ut esse robusti et perfecti operis possit. Sed cum ex se produxerit fructum, statim mittit falcem, quoniam adest tempus messis. Omnipotens enim Deus producto fructu falcem mittit, et messem suam desecat, quia, cum unumquemque ad opera perfecta perduxerit, eius temporalem uitam per emissam sententiam incidit, ut granum suum ad celestia horrea perducat. Cum igitur desideria bona concipimus, semen in terram mittimus. Cum uero operari recta incipimus, herba sumus. Cum autem ad prouectum boni operis crescimus, ad spicam peruenimus, cumque in eiusdem operationis perfectione solidamur, iam plenum frumentum in spica proferimus. §. 3. Herba etenim Petrus fuerat, qui, passionis tempore per amorem Dominum sequens, hunc confiteri ante ancillae uocem timebat. Erat enim iam uiriditas in mente, quia credebat omnium redemptorem; sed ualde adhuc flexibilis pede conculcabatur timoris. Iam in spica surrexerat, quando eum, quem moriturum confiteri timuerat, nunciante angelo in Galilea uiuentem uidebat. Sed ad plenum granum in spica peruenerat, quando ueniente desuper Spiritu, et suam mentem in illius amore roborante, ita solidatus est, ut uires persequentium cesus despiceret, et redemptorem suum libere inter flagella predicaret. §. 4. Nullus itaque, qui ad bonum propositum adhuc in mentis teneritudine esse conspicitur, despiciatur, quia frumentum Dei ab herba incipit, ut granum fiat. Vir ergo uenit ad portam, quia Dominus ac redemptor noster membris suis intrantibus perducit ad se, et ascendit per gradus eius, quia nobis proficientibus eo amplius exaltatur, quo altus et inconprehensibilis esse cognoscitur. In uirtutum quippe nostrarum gradibus ipse ascendere dicitur, quia tanto ipse nobis sublimior ostenditur, quanto noster animus a rebus infimis separatur." Hinc etiam Augustinus ait in libro de libero arbitrio: [c. 17.]

[C. XVI.]

“One who wishes to perform God’s commandments and cannot do so indeed already possesses a good will, but one that is still small and weak. That person will be able when one possesses a great and robust will. For when the martyrs performed those great commandments, they certainly performed them with a great will, that is, with great charity, concerning which the Lord himself says, ‘No one has greater charity, etc.’” And a little later: § 1. “The apostle Peter did not yet possess that charity when he denied the Lord three times out of fear. And nevertheless, although small and imperfect, charity was not absent from him when he said, ‘Lord, I shall lay down my soul for you.’”

The same on the Letter of John, [tractate 5]: § 2. “If anyone possesses such charity that the person is prepared even to die for one’s brothers, charity is perfect in that person. But is it already completely perfect as soon as it is born? It is born so that it may be perfected; when it has been born, it is nurtured; when it has been nurtured, it is strengthened; when it has been strengthened, it is perfected; when it has come to perfection, what do you say? ‘For me to live is Christ and to die is gain.’”

[C. XVI.]

"Qui uult facere Dei mandata, et non potest, iam quidem habet bonam uoluntatem, sed adhuc paruam et inualidam. Poterit autem, cum magnam habuerit et robustam. Quando enim martires illa mandata magna fecerunt, magna utique uoluntate, id est magna karitate fecerunt, de qua ipse Dominus ait: 'Maiorem karitatem nemo habet etc.'" Et paulo post: §. 1. "Ipsam karitatem apostolus Petrus nondum habebat, quando timore Dominum ter negauit. Et tamen, quamuis parua et inperfecta, non deerat ei karitas, quando dicebat: 'Domine, animam meam pro te ponam.'" Idem super epistolam Iohannis: [tract. 5.] §. 2. "Si quis tantam habuerit karitatem, ut paratus sit etiam pro fratribus mori, perfecta est in illo karitas; sed numquid mox, ut nascitur, iam prorsus perfecta est? ut perficiatur, nascitur; cum fuerit nata, nutritur; cum fuerit nutrita, roboratur; cum fuerit roborata, perficitur; cum ad perfectum uenerit, quid dicis? 'Michi uiuere Christus est et mori lucrum.'"

[C. XVII.] In the same work, [tractate IX].

“Just as a bristle draws in the thread, so fear draws in charity; charity grows, fear diminishes, and conversely.”

[C. XVII.] In eadem. [tract. IX.]

"Sicut seta introducit linum, ita timor karitatem; crescit karitas, minuitur timor, et e conuerso."

[C. XVIII.] In the same work.

“Perhaps charity has been born in you, but is not yet perfect; do not despair; nurture it, lest perhaps it be choked.”

[C. XVIII.] In eadem.

"Forte nata est in te karitas, sed nondum perfecta; noli desperare, nutri eam, ne forte suffocetur."

[C. XIX.] The same to Jerome, [letter XXIX].

“Charity is perfect in some, imperfect in others; but the most perfect charity cannot be possessed in this life.”

[C. XIX.] Idem ad Ieronimum. [epist. XXIX.]

"Karitas in quibusdam perfecta est, in quibusdam inperfecta: perfectissima autem in hac uita haberi non potest."

[C. XX.] Likewise Gregory.

"If my discourse finds in your hearts some spark of the gratuitous love of God, nurture that very spark; take care to summon yourselves to increase it." And a little later: "Blow upon it; nurture it within yourselves, so that, when it has grown and made a most worthy flame, it may consume the wood of all cupidities."

GRATIAN. Conversely, it is also proved that degrees exist in virtue because the degrees of sin itself also appear evidently. For just as no one suddenly becomes the highest, so no one suddenly becomes base. Hence also Augustine in Book I of the Sermon of the Lord on the Mount, [c. 23]:

[C. XX.] Item Gregorius.

"Si sermo meus inuenerit in cordibus uestris aliquam scintillam gratuiti amoris Dei, ipsam nutrite, ad hanc augendam uos aduocare studete." Et paulo post: "Flate, nutrite in uobis; ut cum creuerit, et flammam dignissimam fecerit omnium cupiditatum ligna consumat." [Gratian.] E contrario etiam gradus in uirtute esse probantur, quia et ipsius peccati gradus euidenter apparent. Sicut enim nemo repente fit summus, ita nemo repente fit turpis. Hinc etiam Augustinus in [lib. I.] sermone Domini in monte: [c. 23.]

[C. XXI.]

"Just as sin is reached by three degrees—suggestion, delight, and consent—so there are three differences of sin itself: in the heart, in the deed, and in custom, like three deaths. One is as though in the house, that is, when consent is given in the heart to lust; another as though now carried outside the gate, when consent proceeds into the deed; the third when the mind is pressed beneath the mass of an evil custom, as though now putrefying in the tomb. Whoever reads the Gospel recognizes that the Lord raised these three kinds of dead persons."

[C. XXI.]

"Sicut tribus gradibus ad peccatum peruenitur, suggestione, delectatione, consensione: ita ipsius peccati tres sunt differentiae, et in corde, et in facto, et in consuetudine, tamquam tres mortes; una, quasi in domo, id est cum in corde consentitur libidini; altera, quasi prolata iam extra portam, cum in factum procedit assensio; tertia, cum in consuetudinis malae tamquam mole terrena premitur animus, quasi in sepulchro iam putens. Que tria genera mortuorum Dominum resuscitasse, quisquis euangelium legit agnoscit."

[C. XXII.] Likewise Gregory, [book XXV of the Moralia, c. 16].

"It must certainly be known that sin is committed in three ways. For it is perpetrated either through ignorance, or weakness, or deliberate purpose; and one sins more gravely through weakness than through ignorance, but much more gravely through deliberate purpose than through weakness."

[C. XXII.] Item Gregorius. [lib. XXV. Moralium, c. 16.]

"Sciendum quippe est, quod peccatum tribus modis admittitur. Nam aut ignorantia, aut infirmitate, aut studio perpetratur, et grauius quidem infirmitate, quam ignorantia, sed multo grauius studio, quam infirmitate peccatur."

[C. XXIII.] The same, [book XXI of the Moralia, c. 3].

"Among these things it must be known that it is one thing for the mind to suffer from the temptation of the flesh, but another when it is bound to delights through consent. For it is very often struck by a depraved thought, but resists. Very often, however, it conceives something perverse within itself and even turns it over through desire. And certainly an unclean thought does not defile the mind when it strikes, but when it subjugates the mind to itself through delight.

Hence the eminent preacher says, 'Let no temptation apprehend you except a human one.' For human temptation is that by which we are very often touched in thought even unwillingly, because the fact that unlawful things sometimes come to mind is certainly something we possess within ourselves from the weight of corruptible humanity. But temptation is now demonic and not human when the mind binds itself through consent to that which the corruptibility of the flesh suggests."

> [C. XXIII.] Idem. [lib. XXI. Moralium c. 3.]
>
> "Inter hec sciendum est, aliud esse, quod animus de temptatione carnis patitur, aliud uero, cum per consensum delectationibus obligatur. Plerumque enim cogitatione praua pulsatur, sed renititur. Plerumque autem peruersum quid concipit intra semetipsum etiam per desiderium uoluit. Et nimirum mentem nequaquam cogitatio inmunda inquinat, cum pulsat, sed cum hanc sibi per delectationem subiugat.
>
> Hinc etenim predicator egregius: 'Temptatio uos non apprehendat, nisi humana.' Humana quippe temptatio est, qua plerumque in cogitatione tangimur etiam nolentes, quia, ut nonnumquam illicita ad animum ueniant, hoc utique in nobismetipsis ex humanitatis corruptibilis pondere habemus. Iam uero demoniaca et non humana est temptatio, cum ad hoc, quod carnis corruptibilitas suggerit, per consensum se animus astringit."

[C. XXIV.] Likewise Jerome, [at c. 1 of Amos].

"For three crimes of Damascus, etc.," as above.

GRATIAN. It is not remarkable if degrees are said to exist in virtue, since the degrees of sin also are shown so evidently.

§ 1. Accordingly, this charity, which in Peter before the denial was the blade and which is born in each person before it is strengthened, is lost and restored before its perfection. Hence Augustine in the Book on Correction and Grace, [c. 7]: "Whoever have been distinguished from that original condemnation by this bounty of divine grace, there is no doubt that the Gospel is procured for them; and when they hear, they believe and persevere to the end in the faith that works through love. And if at any time they wander outside the course, being corrected they are amended; and some of them, even if they are not reproved by human beings, return to the way they had abandoned, and the rest."

> [C. XXIV.] Item Ieronimus. [ad c. 1. Amos.]
> "Super tribus sceleribus Damasci etc." ut supra. [Gratian.] Non est mirum, si in uirtute gradus esse dicuntur, quandoquidem et peccati gradus ita euidenter monstrantur. §. 1. Hec itaque karitas, que in Petro ante negationem herba fuit, et in singulis nascitur ante, quam roboretur, ante sui perfectionem amittitur et reparatur. Unde Augustinus in libro de correctione et gratia: [c. 7.] "Quicumque ab illa originali dampnatione ista diuinae gratiae largitate discreti sunt, non est dubium, quin procuretur eis euangelium, et, cum audiunt, credunt, et in fide, que per dilectionem operatur, usque in finem perseuerant, et, si quando exorbitant, correcti emendantur, et quidam eorum, etsi ab hominibus non corripiantur, in uiam, quam reliquerant, redeunt et cetera."

[C. XXV.] In the same work.

"'God's firm foundation stands, having this immovable seal: The Lord knows who are his.' Their faith, which works through love, assuredly either does not fail at all, or, if there are any whose faith fails, they are restored before this life is ended; and, after the intervening iniquity has been blotted out, perseverance to the end is reckoned to them."

[C. XXV.] In eodem.

"'Firmum fundamentum Dei stat, inmobile habens signaculum hoc: Scit Dominus qui sunt eius.' Horum fides, que per dilectionem operatur, profecto aut omnino non deficit, aut, si qui sunt, quorum deficit, reparantur ante, quam uita ista finiatur, et deleta iniquitate, que intercurrerat, usque in finem perseuerantia deputatur."

[C. XXVI.] In the same work, [c. 9].

"None of them ends this life changed from good to evil."

[C. XXVI.] In eodem. [c. 9.]

"Nullus eorum ex bono in malum conmutatus finit hanc uitam."

[C. XXVII.] In the same work.

"For such persons who love him, God makes all things work together for good—altogether all things to such an extent that, even if some of them deviate and wander outside the course, he will cause this very thing also to profit them for good."

[C. XXVII.] In eodem.

"Talibus Deus diligentibus eum omnia cooperatur in bonum, usque adeo prorsus omnia, ut etiam, si qui eorum deuiant et exorbitant, etiam hoc ipsum faciet eis proficere in bonum."

[C. XXVIII.] Likewise the Apostle to the Galatians, [c. 5, v. 6].

"Circumcision is nothing, nor is uncircumcision, but faith that works through love. And this was formerly in you, because you were running well through the works of faith and from love."

[C. XXVIII.] Item Apostolus ad Galathas. [c. 5. u. 6.]

"Circumcisio non est aliquid, neque preputium, sed fides, que per dilectionem operatur. Et hoc olim in uobis, quia currebatis bene per opera fidei et ex dilectione."

[C. XXIX.] Likewise to the Hebrews, [c. 6, v. 10].

"God is not so unjust that he forgets your work, etc."

GRATIAN. The work by which they made all their things common—and this from love, and this for God's glory. Behold a threefold good, as if he were saying: Formerly you performed many things for which, if you repent of evils, God will do good to you. Also, when the Apostle reproved the Romans and Galatians, he proves that by the merit of faith they attained remission of sins, sanctification in the Holy Spirit, and the justice of good work; all these things either were never truly in them without charity, or those who gloried in the works of the law possessed true charity, from which they afterward fell. Likewise Augustine says concerning any adult:

> [C. XXIX.] Item ad Ebreos. [c. 6. u. 10.]
>
> "Non est tam iniustus Deus, ut obliuiscatur operis uestri etc."
> [Gratian.] Operis, quod omnia sua fecerunt conmunia, et hoc ex dilectione, et hoc ad gloriam Dei. Ecce triplex bonum, quasi diceret: olim multa operati estis, pro quibus, si penitetis de malis, benefaciet uobis Deus. Romanos quoque et Galathas dum Apostolus redargueret, merito fidei probat assecutos remissionem peccatorum, et sanctificationem in Spiritu sancto, et iusticiam bonae operationis, que omnia aut sine karitate numquam uere in eis fuerunt, aut ueram karitatem habuerunt, a qua postea lapsi sunt qui de operibus legis gloriabantur. Item de quolibet adulto Augustinus ait:

[C. XXX.]

"Remove charity; hatred holds possession."

Likewise: § 1. "Everyone who does not love hates."

Likewise in the Gospel: § 2. "No one can serve two lords; for either one will hate the one and love the other, or one will uphold the one and despise the other."

GRATIAN. But Adam, since he was created by the Lord at a manly age, before he was tempted by the devil—while his wife was being formed from his side, while, rapt in ecstasy, he was present in the angelic court, while, awakening, he foretold the future sacraments of Christ and the church—possessed either charity or hatred. But if he possessed hatred, the devil was not the author of our sin. Likewise, if he was created by God without charity, he by no means received God's likeness in his creation. Likewise, if he was created without charity, he was not made just and innocent by God; for a creature capable of reason and free choice cannot participate in justice and innocence without charity. It is therefore gathered that before Adam sinned he possessed charity, without which he could not be just and innocent. Hence Augustine in Genesis According to the Letter, [book VI, c. 24]:

> [C. XXX.]
>
> "Tolle karitatem, odium tenet." Item: §. 1. "Omnis, qui non diligit, odit." Item in euangelio: §. 2. "Nemo potest duobus Dominis seruire; aut enim unum odio habebit, et alterum diliget, aut unum sustinebit et alterum contempnet." [Gratian.] Adam uero, cum in uirili etate a Domino creatus sit, ante, quam a diabolo temptaretur, dum de latere eius uxor formabatur, dum in extasi raptus angelicae curiae intererat, dum euigilans futura Christi et ecclesiae sacramenta uaticinabatur, aut karitatem, aut odium habebat. Si autem odium habebat, non fuit diabolus auctor nostri peccati. Item, si sine karitate a Deo creatus est, similitudinem eius nequaquam in sui creatione accepit. Item, si sine karitate creatus est, iustus et innocens a Deo factus non est; creatura namque, rationis capax et liberi arbitrii, iusticiae et innocentiae sine karitate particeps esse non potest. Colligitur ergo, quod Adam ante, quam peccaret, karitatem habuit, sine qua iustus et innocens esse non potuit. Unde Augustinus in Genesi ad litteram: [lib. VI. c. 24.]

[C. XXXI.]

"How are we said to be renewed if we do not receive what the first human being lost? We plainly receive this, because [we receive] the justice from which he fell through sin." And a little later, [c. 7]: § 1. "'Stripping yourselves of the old human being, put on the new, who is renewed in the knowledge of faith according to the image of him who created that person.' Adam lost through sin this image impressed upon the spirit of the mind." And after a few words: § 2. "That first robe is justice itself, from which Adam fell."

[C. XXXI.]

"Quomodo renouari dicimur, si non recipimus, quod perdidit primus homo? Hoc plane recipimus, quia iusticiam, ex qua per peccatum lapsus est." Et paulo post: [c. 7.] §. 1. "'Expoliantes uos ueterem hominem, induite nouum, qui renouatur in agnitione fidei secundum imaginem eius, qui creauit eum.' Hanc imaginem in spiritu mentis inpressam perdidit Adam per peccatum." Et post pauca: §. 2. "Stola illa prima ipsa iusticia est, unde lapsus est Adam."

[C. XXXII.] The same in homily XI.

"When the prince of all vices saw Adam, made from the clay of the earth in God's image, adorned with chastity, ordered by temperance, and splendid with charity, he stripped the first parents of those gifts and such great goods and killed them together. For when he had taken chastity and continence from the human being, he subjected the person to his dominion." And a little later: § 1. "After temperance had been lost, Adam became intemperate; after charity had been lost, he was found evil."

[C. XXXII.] Idem in omelia XI.

"Princeps uiciorum omnium, dum uidit Adam ex limo terrae ad imaginem Dei factum, pudicitia ornatum, temperantia conpositum, karitate splendidum, primos parentes illis donis ac tantis bonis expoliauit, pariter ac peremit. Namque cum homini abstulisset pudicitiam, continentiam, suo dominio eum subiugauit." Et paulo post: §. 1. "Adam amissa temperantia factus est intemperans; perdita karitate malus inuentus est."

[C. XXXIII.] Likewise Ambrose to Sabinus, [book VI, letter 14].

"When Adam was alone, he did not transgress, because his mind adhered to God."

[C. XXXIII.] Item Ambrosius [lib. VI. epist. 14.] ad Sabinum.

"Quando Adam solus erat, non est preuaricatus, quia mens eius adherebat Deo."

[C. XXXIV.] The same to the same, [in the same book, letter 42].

"The first human being, God's fresh work, a constant conversational partner, had been planted with the virtues of the saints."

[C. XXXIV.] Idem ad eundem. [eodem lib., ep. 42.]

"Primus homo Dei opus recens, confabulator assiduus, qui sanctorum, conplantatus erat uirtutibus."

[C. XXXV.] The same in the Hexaemeron, [book VI, c. 7].

"That soul is painted by God which possesses within itself the shining grace of the virtues and the splendor of piety. That soul is well spoken of in which the likeness of divine operation shines forth. That soul is well painted in which there is the splendor of glory and the image of the Father's substance. According to this image, which shines, the painting is precious. According to this image Adam was depicted before sin; but when he fell, he put it away."

[C. XXXV.] Idem in Exameron. [lib. VI. c. 7.]

"Illa anima a Deo pingitur, que habet in se uirtutum gratiam renitentem, splendoremque pietatis. Illa anima bene dicta est, in qua elucet diuinae operationis effigies. Illa anima bene picta est, in qua est splendor gloriae, et paternae imago substantiae. Secundum hanc imaginem, que refulget, pictura preciosa est. Secundum hanc imaginem depictus fuit Adam ante peccatum; sed ubi lapsus est deposuit."

[C. XXXVI.] The same on Flight from the World, [c. 4].

"To be like God is to possess justice and wisdom and to be perfect in virtue."

[C. XXXVI.] Idem de fuga seculi. [c. 4.]

"Similem Dei esse est habere iusticiam, sapientiam, et in uirtute esse perfectum."

[C. XXXVII.] The same on the Blessed Life, [c. 5].

"The wise person is never empty, but always possesses within oneself the raiment of prudence and can say, 'I put on justice; I clothed judgment.' For these are the interior coverings of the mind, which no one else can take away, except when one's own fault strips someone. Thus, finally, Adam, having been stripped, was found naked."

[C. XXXVII.] Idem de uita beata. [c. 5.]

"Sapiens numquam inanis est, sed semper in se habens amictum prudentiae, qui potest dicere: 'Iusticiam induebam, uestiebam iudicium.' Mentis namque hec sunt interna uelamina, que nemo alius potest auferre, nisi cum aliquem sua culpa despoliat. Denique sic spoliatus Adam nudus inuentus est."

[C. XXXVIII.] The same in the Book on Isaac and the Soul, [c. 5].

"But neither was the first Adam naked, whom innocence clothed."

[C. XXXVIII.] Idem in libro de Ysaac et anima. [c. 5.]

"Sed nec Adam primus nudus erat, quem innocentia uestiebat."

[C. XXXIX.] The same in the Book on Paradise, [c. 13].

"'When they knew that they were naked.' And indeed they were naked before, but not without a covering of virtues."

GRATIAN. That also is objected which every authority proclaims: if he had remained as he was before sin, he would have been translated into the glory that the saints will possess; but no adult enters without charity. Therefore he possessed charity.

§ 1. Likewise, an objection is made concerning Moses, whose faith the Apostle, commending it in his letter to the Hebrews, proclaimed his merits with worthy praises: when Moses denied that he was a son of Pharaoh's daughter, preferring to be afflicted with his brothers rather than to enjoy the pleasure of a temporal palace; when, suffering with his brother, he buried the Egyptian in the sand; when, fearing the animosity of the king, he left Egypt; when, fortified by divine aid, he despised the king's fury and led the people out of Egypt in the power of signs. With what praises are all these things to be extolled if charity was not in him then, when a branch of good work has no greenness within itself unless it proceeds from the root of charity? But how did he not possess charity, to whom the Lord spoke face to face, as a person is accustomed to speak with one's friend? How did he not possess charity who, supplicating for the people, said, "Either forgive it this offense, or blot me out of your book"? Did he not love his neighbor, who, interposing himself for the people, freed them from destruction? Did he not love God, who, raging against the worshipers of the calf for his sake, ground the head of that calf into powder and, mixed with water so that it might be cast out into the privy, gave it to the Israelites to drink, ordering some of its worshipers to be struck with the sword so that he might reconcile to God the people whose destruction would otherwise have been greater? Did he not possess charity, from whose spirit the Lord took and placed it upon the seventy elders of Israel? Yet, at the water of contradiction, doubting God's power or his kindness, although he had promised the other things with sure faith, when about to bring forth water from the rock, he exclaimed distrustfully, saying, "Shall I be able to bring water forth for you from this rock?" Let this seem light to no one, since as punishment for that offense it was said to him and Aaron by the Lord: "Because you did not hearken to my voice so that you might glorify me before the children of Israel, you will not bring this people into the land that I gave them."

§ 2. Did Aaron not possess charity when he was given as a helper to his brother, so that he would be his mouth to the people and so that signs would be done through him in Egypt? Yet he afterward gave his consent to the people in the worship of the calf. Did he not possess charity when, alone from the entire multitude of the children of Israel, he was chosen by the Lord to exercise the pontificate before him? If he did not possess charity, he was not good; but if he was not good, why was he chosen by the Lord before the others as pontiff? Did he not possess charity when, with the censer, he placed himself against the conflagration on behalf of the people and appeased the wrath? And nevertheless, as was said before, he afterward provoked the Lord's wrath against himself at the water of contradiction.

§ 3. Did David also not possess charity, upon whom the Spirit of the Lord was directed from the day of his anointing? Or perhaps it will be said that it was directed upon him so that from then he would possess the grace of prophesying, not so that from it he would receive the grace of divine love? It plainly seems absurd to think this concerning the one of whom the Lord says, "I have found a man according to my heart." How also did he not possess charity, who spared the one seeking his soul and, because he cut off the hem of that person's cloak, afterward his heart struck him heavily, as he cried out, "Whom do you persecute, O king of Israel—a dead dog and a single flea?" How did he not possess charity, who bore the death of his enemy so very heavily? How did he not possess charity, who did not drink the water from the cistern of Bethlehem offered to him at the peril of his men, but poured it out before the Lord? How did he not possess charity, who, mocked by Michal, the daughter of Saul, because he had danced before the ark of the Lord while striking the cithara and psaltery, said, "I shall play and become more vile in my eyes"? If he did not possess charity, with what security of conscience did he invoke against himself, saying, "If I have rendered evils to those repaying me, let me deservedly fall empty before my enemies"? If he did not possess charity, with what temerity did he ask to be judged justly, saying, "Judge me, O Lord, according to my justice and according to my innocence over me"? Likewise: "Judge me, O Lord, because I have entered in my innocence." And nevertheless, after so many and innumerable other proofs of divine and heavenly love, how gravely he transgressed no one who has heard of his adultery with Bathsheba and his killing of Uriah does not know. If he offered his penance to the Lord without charity, he did not possess true contrition of heart. How, therefore, did he dare to promise to the Lord the sacrifice of a contrite heart and troubled spirit, saying, "If you had wished for sacrifice, I would surely have given it; you will not delight in burnt offerings. A sacrifice to God is a troubled spirit, etc."? Finally, since no remission is promised by God to false penance, how did he merit to hear from the prophet, "Your sin has been remitted," if he did not possess true contrition of heart? Accordingly, it appears evidently that he then possessed charity and, from charity, offered to the Lord the sacrifice of a contrite heart and troubled spirit. Otherwise he would rashly have asked, "Turn your face away from my sins," and the other things contained in the same psalm, unless hatred of evil and love of good had provoked him to the humility of penance. Concerning him also Saint Ambrose writes in the Book on the Soul and Isaac, [c. 3], saying: "Holy David had fled the hatreds of King Saul, not by leaving the lands, but by avoiding the contagions of a cruel and proud king, because his mind adhered to God," to whom no adult can adhere without charity. And nevertheless, how gravely he afterward transgressed in the census of the people was indicated by the punishment for that offense.

§ 4. Likewise, according to this opinion, one who transgresses criminally did not obtain true remission of sins in baptism, whether the person approached baptism in the years of infancy or as an adult, because the person did not possess the love of God, without which no one ever finds grace. And thus, according to the heresy of Jovinian, if anyone has truly been reborn from water and the Spirit, that person cannot afterward sin criminally; or, if one sins criminally, one is proved to have been reborn by water alone, not by the Spirit. That passage from the Letter of John seems to agree with this opinion: "Everyone who is born of God does not commit sin, because his seed remains in that person; and one cannot sin because one is born of God. In this the children of God and the children of the devil are manifest." And at the end of the letter: "Everyone who is born of God does not sin, but the generation of God preserves that person, and the evil one does not touch that person." But how much this authority of the Apostle favors that opinion, and how contrary to truth that sect of error is, Jerome shows, writing against Jovinian, [book II, at the beginning]:

[C. XXXIX.] Idem in libro de Paradyso. [c. 13.]

"'Ut cognouerunt, quia nudi essent.' Et ante quidem nudi erant; sed non sine uirtutum tegumento." [Gratian.] Opponitur etiam illud, quod omnis clamat auctoritas: si sic permansisset, ut erat ante peccatum, esset translatus in gloriam, quam habituri sunt sancti; sed nemo adultus sine karitate intrat: karitatem ergo habebat. §. 1. Item opponitur de Moyse, cuius fidem Apostolus in epistola sua ad Ebreos conmendans, dignis preconiis eius merita predicauit, dum se negauit esse filium filiae Pharaonis, malens affligi cum fratribus, quam perfrui iocunditate temporalis palacii; dum fratri conpatiens Egiptium sabulo obruit; dum ueritus animositatem regis Egiptum reliquit; dum diuino uallatus auxilio regis furorem contempsit, atque in uirtute signorum populum de Egipto eduxit. Que omnia quibus laudibus sunt efferenda, si tunc karitas in eo non erat, cum non habeat in se aliquid uiriditatis ramus boni operis, nisi procedat ex radice karitatis? Quomodo autem karitatem non habebat, cui Dominus facie ad faciem loquebatur, sicut loqui solet homo cum amico suo? Quomodo karitatem non habebat, qui pro populo supplicans dicebat: "Aut dimitte ei hanc noxam, aut dele me de libro tuo? "An non proximum diligebat, qui pro populo se obiciens, illum ab interitu liberauit? An non Deum diligebat, qui pro eo in uituli cultores deseuiens, ipsius uituli caput in puluerem conminuit, atque, ut in secessum proiceretur, aquae inmixtum Israelitis bibendum dedit, nonnullos ex eius cultoribus gladio feriri precipiens, ut populum, cuius erat interitus maior futurus, Deo reconciliaret? An non karitatem habebat, de cuius spiritu Dominus accepit, et super septuaginta seniores Israelis posuit? Qui tamen ad aquam contradictionis de Dei potencia, siue de eius benignitate dubitans, cum cetera certa fide promisisset, producturus aquam de petra, diffidenter excrepuit, dicens: "Numquid de petra hac potero uobis aquam educere?" Quod nulli leue uideatur, cum in penam eius delicti sibi et Aaron a Domino dictum sit: "Quia non exaudistis uocem meam, ut glorificaretis me coram filiis Israel, non introducetis populum hunc in terram, quam dedi eis." §. 2. An non karitatem habebat Aaron, quando fratri coadiutor datus est, ut esset os eius ad populum, ut fierent signa in Egipto per eum? Qui tamen in cultura uituli postea consensum populo adhibuit. An non karitatem habebat, quando ex omni multitudine filiorum Israel solus electus est a Domino, ut pontificatu ante eum fungeretur? Si karitatem non habebat, bonus non erat; si autem bonus non erat, cur pre ceteris a Domino in pontificem electus est? An non karitatem habebat, quando pro populo cum thuribulo incendio se opposuit, et iram placauit? Et tamen, ut premissum est, ad aquam contradictionis iram Domini aduersum se postea prouocauit. §. 3. Numquid etiam Dauid karitatem non habuit, super quem spiritus Domini a die unctionis directus est? An forte dicetur directus esse super eum, ut ex tunc gratiam prophetandi haberet, non ut ex eo gratiam diuinae dilectionis acciperet? Quod absurdum plane uidetur de eo sentire, de quo Dominus ait: "Inueni hominem secundum cor meum." Quomodo etiam karitatem non habebat, qui querenti animam suam pepercit, et quia oram clamidis eius precidit, postea cor suum grauiter percussit, clamans: "Quem persequeris rex Israel, canem mortuum, et culicem unum?" Quomodo karitatem non habebat, qui mortem inimici sui tam grauissime tulit? Quomodo karitatem non habebat, qui aquam de cisterna Bethleem suorum periculo sibi oblatam non bibit, sed coram Domino libauit? Quomodo karitatem non habebat, qui irrisus a Michol filia Saul, eo quod ante archam Domini cytharam et psalterium percutiens saltasset, ait: "Ludam, et uilior fiam in oculis meis." Si karitatem non habebat, qua conscientia securus sibi ipsi inprecabatur dicens: "Si reddidi retribuentibus michi mala, decidam merito ab inimicis meis inanis?" Si karitatem non habebat, qua temeritate iuste se iudicari rogabat, dicens: "Iudica me, Domine, secundum iusticiam meam, et secundum innocentiam meam super me?" Idem: "Iudica me, Domine, quoniam ego in innocentia mea ingressus sum?" Et tamen post tot et innumera alia diuinae et supernae dilectionis iudicia quam grauiter deliquerit nullus ignorat, qui Bethsabeae adulterium, et Uriae homicidium audiuit. Cuius penitenciam si sine karitate Domino obtulit, ueram cordis contritionem non habuit. Quomodo ergo sacrificium contriti cordis et spiritus contribulati Domino promittere audebat, dicens: "Si uoluisses sacrificium, dedissem utique; holocaustis non delectaberis. Sacrificium Deo spiritus contribulatus etc.?" Denique, cum falsae penitenciae nulla a Deo promittatur remissio, quomodo a Propheta audire meruit: "Dimissum est peccatum tuum," si ueram contritionem cordis non habuit? Euidenter itaque apparet, eum tunc karitatem habuisse, et ex karitate sacrificium cordis contriti et spiritus contribulati Domino obtulisse; alioquin temerarie postulasset: "Auerte faciem tuam a peccatis meis," et cetera, que in eodem Psalmo continentur, nisi odium mali et dilectio boni ad humilitatem penitenciae illum prouocasset. De quo etiam S. Ambrosius in libro de anima et Ysaac [c. 3.] scribit, dicens: "Fugerat sanctus Dauid odia Saul regis, non relinquens terras, sed declinans contagia regis inmitis et superbi, quia mens eius adherebat Deo" cui nullus adultus sine karitate adherere potest. Et tamen, quam grauiter in populi dinumeratione postea deliquerit, ipsius delicti pena indicauit. §. 4. Item, secundum hanc sentenciam qui criminaliter delinquit ueram peccatorum remissionem in baptismo consecutus non est, siue in annis infantiae siue adultus ad baptisma accessit, quia Dei amorem non habuit, sine quo nemo inuenit umquam gratiam, atque ita secundum heresim Iouiniani, si uere ex aqua et Spiritu quis renatus est, ulterius criminaliter peccare non potest, uel, si criminaliter peccat, aqua tantum, non Spiritu probatur esse renatus. Cui sentenciae illud epistolae Iohannis consentire uidetur: "Omnis, qui natus est ex Deo, peccatum non facit, quoniam semen ipsius in eo manet; et non potest peccare quia ex Deo natus est. In hoc enim manifesti sunt filii Dei, et filii diaboli." Et in fine epistolae: "Omnis, qui natus est ex Deo, non peccat, sed generatio Dei conseruat eum, et malignus non tangit eum." Verum hec auctoritas Apostoli quantum illi sentenciae faueat, atque illa erroris secta quam ueritati sit aduersa, Ieronimus ostendit, scribens contra Iouinianum: [lib. II. in principio]

[C. XL.]

"For if, he says, 'everyone who is born of God does not sin and cannot be tempted by the devil,' how does he command them to take care lest they be tempted, saying, 'Little children, keep yourselves from idols'? And again in the same letter: 'If we say that we do not have sin, we seduce ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just, so as to remit our sins to us and cleanse us from all iniquity. If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us.' I judge that blessed John, a baptized man, wrote to baptized persons, and that every sin is from the devil. He confesses himself a sinner and hopes for remission of sins after baptism. And my Jovinian says, 'Do not touch me, because I am clean.' What, then? Does the Apostle speak things contrary to himself? By no means. For in the same place he immediately declared why he said this: 'My little children, I write these things to you so that you may not sin; but if anyone sins, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the just, and he is the propitiation for our sins—not for ours alone, but also for those of the whole world. And in this we know that we have known him: if we observe his commandments. One who says that one knows God and does not keep his commandments is a liar, and the truth is not in that person. But one who keeps his word, truly in this person the charity of God is perfect. In this we know that we are in him. One who says that one remains in him ought oneself also to walk just as he walked.' For this reason I write to you, my little children: everyone who is born of God does not sin. Therefore I tell you not to sin, and to know that you remain in the generation of the Lord for as long as you have not sinned; indeed, those who persevere in the generation of the Lord cannot sin. For what fellowship has light with darkness? Christ with Belial? Just as day and night cannot be mingled, so neither can justice and iniquity, sin and good works, Christ and antichrist. If we receive Christ into the lodging of our breast, immediately we put the devil to flight. If we sin and the devil enters through the door of sin, immediately Christ withdraws. Hence David also says after sin, 'Restore to me the joy of your salvation,' namely, that which he had lost by sinning. 'One who says that one knows God and does not keep his commandments is a liar, and the truth is not in that person.' Christ is called Truth—indeed, he is Truth: 'I am,' he says, 'the way and the truth and the life.' In vain do we applaud ourselves in him whose commandments we do not perform. 'To one knowing good and not doing it, it is sin. For just as the body without the spirit is dead, so also faith without works is dead.' Nor should we think it a great thing that we know the one God, since even the demons believe and tremble. 'One who says that one remains in him ought oneself also to walk just as he walked.'

PART IV. § 1. Let the adversary choose whichever of two alternatives he wishes; we give him the choice. Does he remain in Christ, or does he not remain? If he remains, then let him walk as Christ did. But if it is rash to promise the likeness of the Lord's virtues, he does not remain in Christ, because he does not walk as Christ did. He committed no sin, nor was deceit found in his mouth; when he was cursed, he did not curse in return, and like a lamb before its shearer, so he did not open his mouth. To him the prince of this world came and found nothing in him. Although he had committed no sin, God made him sin for us. But according to the letter of James, we all sin in many things; and no one is clean from sins, not even an infant if that person's life has been only one day. For who will glory that one possesses a chaste heart? Or who will trust that one is clean from sins? And we are held guilty in the likeness of Adam's transgression. Hence David also says, 'Behold, I was conceived in iniquities, and in offenses my mother bore me.' And blessed Job says, 'If I am just, my mouth will speak impious things; and if without crime, I shall be found depraved; and if purified in snow and washed with clean hands, you have sufficiently stained me with filth, and my garment has become execrable.' But lest we despair utterly, judging that we cannot be saved after the sins committed after baptism, he immediately tempers this very thing: 'And if anyone sins, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the just, and he is the propitiation for our sins—not for ours alone, but also for those of the whole world.' He speaks this to believers after baptism and promises the Lord as advocate for their offenses. Nor does he say, 'If you sin in any respect, you have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ, and he is the propitiation for your sins,' lest you say that they had obtained baptism without full faith; rather, he says, 'We have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ, and he is the propitiation for our sins,' and not only for the sins of John and the others, but also 'for those of the whole world.' But in the whole world are both the Apostles and all believers. From these things it is clearly proved that one can sin after baptism. For in vain do we have Jesus Christ as advocate with the Father if it is not possible to sin. The apostle Peter, to whom it had been said, 'One who is washed has no need to wash again,' and, 'You are Peter, and upon this rock I shall build my church,' denies after being terrified by a maidservant. And the Lord himself says, 'Simon, behold, Satan has sought you so that he might sift you like wheat; but I have prayed for you, that your faith may not fail.'"

And below: § 2. "If we do not sin after baptism, why do we ask that sins be remitted to us which were already remitted in baptism? It is another matter if this prayer, 'Forgive us our debts as we also forgive our debtors,' pertains to catechumens and does not befit the faithful and Christians. Paul, a vessel of election, chastises his body and reduces it to servitude, lest, while preaching to others, he himself be found reprobate.

§ 3. Writing also to the Hebrews, he says: 'For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened and tasted the heavenly gift and were made participants in the Holy Spirit, who likewise tasted the good word of God and the powers of the age to come, and have fallen away, to be renewed again to penance, since they crucify again for themselves the Son of God and hold him up to display.' Certainly we cannot deny that those who were enlightened and tasted the heavenly gift, were made participants in the Holy Spirit, and tasted the good word of God were baptized. But if the baptized cannot sin, how does the Apostle now say, 'And they have fallen away'? Yet, lest Montanus and Novatus return from this passage, who contend that those who have crucified for themselves the Son of God and held him up to display cannot be renewed through penance, he subsequently resolves this error and says, 'But we trust concerning you, most beloved, better things and things nearer to salvation, even if we speak thus. The Lord is not unjust, so as to forget your work and the love that you showed in his name, you who ministered to the saints and now minister.' And it would truly be great injustice in God if he punished only sins and did not receive good works. The Apostle says: I have spoken thus so that I might draw you back from sins and make you more cautious through fear of despair. Nevertheless, I trust concerning you, most dear, better things and things nearer to salvation. For neither does it belong to God's justice that he forget the good works and ministry that you have shown and show to the saints on account of his name, and remember only sins."

And a little later: § 4. "God created us with free choice, and we are drawn by necessity neither to virtue nor to vices; otherwise, where there is necessity there is no crown. Just as in good works God is the perfecter—for it is not of the one willing nor of the one running, but of God who has mercy and helps, so that we may be able to reach the finish—so in evils and sins the seeds and incitements are ours, and the perfection belongs to the devil. When he sees that we have built hay, wood, and stubble upon the foundation of Christ, then he sets fire beneath it. Let us build gold, silver, and precious stones, and he will not dare to tempt. Although even in this the possession is not certain and secure. For the lion sits in ambush to kill the innocent in secret; and the furnace tests the potter's vessels, but the temptation of tribulation tests just persons. And in another place it is written, 'Son, when you approach the service of God, prepare yourself for temptation.' Again the same James says, 'Be doers of the word and not hearers only. If anyone is a hearer of the word and not a doer, that person is like a man who considers the countenance of his birth in a mirror; he considered it, and immediately, withdrawing, forgot what sort of person he had been.' He admonished them in vain to join works to faith if they could not sin after baptism. 'One who,' he says, 'has kept the whole law and sins in one thing has become guilty of all.' Who among us is without sin? God has enclosed all things under offense, so that he might have mercy on all. Peter also says, 'God knows how to rescue the pious from temptation.' And concerning false teachers: 'These are springs without water and mists driven by whirlwinds, for whom the gloom of darkness is reserved. For, speaking proud things of vanity, they entice in the desires of fleshly luxury those who had escaped for a little while and were turned back to error.' Does the apostolic discourse not seem to you to have depicted a new faction of ignorance? For they open, as it were, springs of knowledge that contain no water of doctrines; like prophetic clouds, they promise rain to which the truth of God may come, and they are driven by whirlwinds of demons and vices. They speak grand things, and their whole discourse is pride—for everyone who exalts one's heart is unclean before God—so that those who had taken refuge for a little while from sins return to their error; and they persuade them toward the luxury of foods and the delights of the flesh. For who would not willingly hear, 'Let us eat and drink, and we shall reign forever'? They call wise and prudent persons depraved, but they give a fuller hearing to those who are sweet in speech. The apostle John—or rather, the Savior writing in John—says to the angel of the church of Ephesus: 'I know,' he says, 'your works and labor and patience, and that you endured for my name and did not fail; but I have against you that you have abandoned your first charity. Remember from where you have fallen, and perform penance, and do the first works. Otherwise, I shall come to you and move your lampstand from its place unless you perform penance.' Similarly, he provokes the other churches—Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea—to penance, and threatens them unless they return to their former works; and in Sardis he says that he has a few who have not defiled their garments and will walk with him in white because they are worthy. But to whom does he write, 'Remember from where you have fallen,' and, 'Behold, the devil is about to send some of you into prison so that you may be tempted,' and, 'I know where you dwell, where the seat of Satan is,' and, 'Hold in mind how you received and heard,' and, 'Keep it and perform penance,' and the rest? Certainly he says it to one who believed and was baptized and, having once stood, fell through offense.

§ 5. I had for a little while deferred examples from the Old Testament, because whenever it speaks against them they are accustomed to say, 'The law and the prophets were until John.' Yet who does not know that under the deep dispensation of God all the saints of old were of the same merit as Christians now are? Just as Abraham then pleased in marriage, so now virgins please in perpetual chastity. He served the law and his time; let us too serve the law and our time, upon whom the ends of the ages have come. David, chosen according to the Lord's heart, who was to perform all his wills and who had said in a certain psalm, 'Judge me, O Lord, because I have entered in my innocence, and, hoping in the Lord, I shall not be weakened. Prove me, O Lord, and tempt me; burn my reins and my heart,' afterward, tempted by the devil and penitent after sin, says, 'Have mercy on me, O God, according to your great mercy.' A great sin wishes to be blotted out by great mercy. Solomon, beloved by the Lord and to whom God had been revealed twice, departed from the love of God because he was a lover of women. The Book of Days relates that Manasseh, a most impious king, was restored to his former dignity after the Babylonian captivity. And Josiah, a holy man, was pierced by the Egyptian king on the plain of Megiddo. Joshua also, the son of Josedech, the high priest, although in type he preceded the Savior, who bore our sins and joined to himself the church as a foreign woman from among the nations, nevertheless according to the letter is introduced as defiled after the priesthood, and the devil stands at his right hand, and afterward white garments are restored to him. It is superfluous to write concerning Moses and Aaron, that they offended God at the water of contradiction and did not enter the promised land, since blessed Job recalls that even angels and every creature can sin, saying, 'For what? Is a human being clean before God? Or is a man without stain from his works? If he does not trust his servants and has found something depraved in his angels, how much more those dwelling in houses of clay, of which we also are from the same clay? The life of a human being upon earth is temptation.' And Lucifer fell, who sent to all the nations; and the one who was nourished among twelve stones in the paradise of delights, wounded from the mountain of the Lord, descended to the lower regions. Hence also the Savior says in the Gospel, 'I saw Satan falling like lightning from heaven.' If that highest sublimity fell, who could not fall? If there are ruins in heaven, how much more on earth. And nevertheless, although Lucifer fell—indeed, after his fall, the ancient serpent—his strength is in his loins and his power over the navel of his belly. Great trees are overshadowed in him, and he sleeps beside the rush and reed and sedge. He is the king of all who are in the waters, where, namely, are pleasure and luxury and the propagation and irrigation of marriages."

And below: § 6. "We have passed to the second division, in which he denies that those who obtained baptism with whole faith can afterward sin; and we have taught that, excepting God, every creature is subject to fault—not because all have sinned, but because they can sin—and that the fall of like persons should be a fear to those standing."

GRATIAN. Accordingly, it appears evidently from the foregoing that some possess charity, which they afterward lose by transgressing criminally. But if anyone contends that this is to be understood not concerning virtue but concerning the work of virtue, let that person consider what one should reply concerning the innocence of Adam, the justice of David, Moses, and the others who approached baptism with full faith. Although they were afterward to fall, nevertheless they taste the heavenly gifts and become participants in the Holy Spirit, so that not only before human beings but also before God's eyes they are found reborn from water and the Holy Spirit. If they did not possess charity before God's eyes, they would be regenerated by water alone, not by the Spirit. For works or participation in the sacraments, unless they proceed from charity, furnish neither justice nor innocence before God. "For if," says the Apostle, "I shall possess all faith, so that I move mountains, and if I distribute all my possessions as food for the poor, and if I hand over my body so that I burn, but do not possess charity, it profits me nothing."

§ 1. But because it is conceded by some concerning those predestined to life that they lose charity and recover it after it is lost, it must also be considered concerning the reprobate whether they possess charity, after losing which they are afterward condemned. Concerning them Augustine writes thus in the Book on Correction and Grace, [c. 9]:

> [C. XL.]

"Si enim, 'omnis,' inquit, 'qui natus est ex Deo, non peccat, et a diabolo temptari non potest:' quomodo precipit, ut caueant, ne temptentur, dicens: 'Filioli, custodite uos a simulachris?' Et in eadem rursus epistola: 'Si dixerimus, quia peccatum non habemus, ipsi nos seducimus, et ueritas in nobis non est. Si confiteamur peccata nostra, fidelis est et iustus, ut remittat nobis peccata nostra, et emundet nos ab omni iniquitate. Si dixerimus, quoniam non peccauimus, mendacem facimus eum, et uerbum eius non est in nobis.' Estimo, quod beatus Iohannes baptizatus ad baptizatos scripserit, et quod omne peccatum ex diabolo sit. Ille peccatorem se confitetur, et sperat remissionem peccatorum post baptisma. Et Iouinianus meus dicit: 'Ne tangas me, quoniam mundus sum.' Quid ergo? Contraria sibi Apostolus loquitur? Minime. In eodem quippe loco, cur hoc dixerit, statim edixit: 'Filioli mei, hec scribo uobis, ut non peccetis; sed et si quis peccauerit, aduocatum habemus apud Patrem Iesum Christum iustum, et ipse est propitiatio pro peccatis nostris: non pro nostri autem tantum, sed etiam pro totius mundi. Et in hoc scimus, quoniam cognouimus eum, si mandata eius obseruemus. Qui dicit se nosse Deum, et mandata eius non custodit, mendax est, et in eo ueritas non est. Qui autem seruat uerbum eius, uere in hoc karitas Dei perfecta est. In hoc scimus, quoniam in ipso sumus. Qui dicit, se in ipso manere, debet, sicut ille ambulauit, et ipse ambulare.' Propterea scribo uobis, filioli mei, omnis, qui natus est ex Deo, non peccat. Ideo dico uobis ut non peccetis, et tamdiu uos sciatis in generatione Domini permanere, quamdiu non peccaueritis; immo, qui in generatione Domini perseuerant peccare non possunt. Que enim conmunicatio luci et tenebris? Christo et Belial? Quomodo dies et nox misceri nequeunt, sic iusticia et iniquitas, peccatum et bona opera, Christus et antichristus. Si susceperimus Christum in hospicio pectoris nostri, illico fugamus diabolum. Si peccauerimus, et per peccati ianuam ingressus fuerit diabolus, protinus Christus recedit. Unde et Dauid post peccatum: 'Redde michi,' ait, 'leticiam salutaris tui,' scilicet quam peccando amiserat. 'Qui dicit se nosse Deum, et mandata eius non custodit, mendax est, et in eo ueritas non est.' Christus ueritas appellatur immo est: 'Ego sum,' inquit, 'uia et ueritas, et uita.' Frustra in eo nobis applaudimus cuius mandata non facimus. 'Scienti bonum et non facienti illud, peccatum est. Quomodo enim corpus sine spiritu mortuum est, sic et fides sine operibus mortua est.' Nec grande putemus unum Deum nosse, cum et demones credant et contremiscant. 'Qui dicit se in ipso manere, debet, sicut ille ambulauit, et ipse ambulare.' IV. Pars. §. 1. Eligat aduersarius e duobus quod uult, optionem damus; manet in Christo, an non manet? Si manet, ita ergo ambulet, ut Christus. Si autem temerarium est similitudinem uirtutum Domini polliceri, non manet in Christo, quia non ingreditur, ut Christus. Ille peccatum non fecit, nec inuentus est dolus in ore eius, qui, cum malediceretur, non remaledixit, et tamquam agnus coram tondente se, sic non aperuit os suum; ad quem uenit princeps mundi istius, et inuenit in eo nichil; qui cum peccatum non fecisset, pro nobis peccatum eum fecit Deus. Nos autem iuxta epistolam Iacobi multa peccamus omnes, et nemo mundus a peccatis, nec infans, si unius diei quidem fuerit uita eius. Quis enim gloriabitur castum se habere cor? aut quis confidet mundum a peccatis se esse? tenemurque rei in similitudinem preuaricationis Adae. Unde et Dauid: 'Ecce,' ait, 'in iniquitatibus conceptus sum, et in delictis peperit me mater mea.' Et B. Iob: 'Si fuero iustus, os meum inpia loquetur, et si sine crimine, prauus inueniar, et si purificatus in niue, et lotus mundis manibus, satis me sorde tinxisti, et execratum est uestimentum meum.' Verum, ne penitus desperemus, arbitrantes, nos post peccata baptismi non posse saluari, statim hoc ipsum temperat. 'Et si quis peccauerit, aduocatum habemus apud Patrem Iesum Christum iustum, et ipse est propitiatio pro peccatis nostris; non pro nostris autem tantum, sed etiam pro totius mundi.' Hoc ad credentes post baptisma loquitur, et aduocatum pro delictis eorum Dominum pollicetur. Nec dicit, siquid peccaueritis, aduocatum habetis apud Patrem Iesum Christum, et ipse est propitiatio pro peccatis uestris, ne eos diceres non plena fide baptisma consecutos; sed: 'aduocatum,' inquit, 'habemus apud Patrem Iesum Christum, et ipse est propitiatio pro peccatis nostris,' et non solum pro Iohannis aliorumque peccatis, sed etiam, 'pro totius mundi.' In toto autem mundo et Apostoli sunt, omnesque credentes. Ex quibus liquido conprobatur, post baptisma posse peccare. Frustra enim aduocatum habemus apud patrem Iesum Christum, si peccari non potest. Petrus apostolus, ad quem dictum fuerat: 'Qui lotus est, non habet necesse, ut iterum lauet;' et: 'Tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram edificabo ecclesiam meam,' ab ancilla perterritus negat. Et ipse Dominus: 'Symon, ecce,' inquit, 'sathanas postulauit uos, ut cribraret sicut triticum; ego autem rogaui pro te, ne deficeret fides tua.'" Et infra: §. 2. "Si non peccamus post baptisma, cur nobis poscimus peccata dimitti, que in baptismate iam dimissa sunt? Aliud est autem, si ad catecuminos hec oratio pertinet, 'dimitte nobis debita nostra sicut et nos dimittimus debitoribus nostris' et non conuenit fidelibus et Christianis. Paulus uas electionis castigat corpus suum, et in seruitutem redigit, ne aliis predicans ipse reprobus inueniatur. §. 3. Ad Ebreos quoque scribens ait: 'Inpossibile est enim, eos, qui semel sunt illuminati, et gustauerunt donum celeste, et participes facti sunt Spiritus sancti, gustauerunt nichilominus bonum Dei uerbum, uirtutesque seculi futuri, et prolapsi sunt, renouari iterum ad penitenciam, rursus crucifigentes sibimetipsis filium Dei, et ostentui habentes.' Certe eos, qui illuminati sunt, et gustauerunt donum celeste, et participes facti sunt Spiritus sancti, gustaueruntque bonum Dei uerbum, negare non possumus baptizatos. Si autem baptizati peccare non possunt, quomodo nunc Apostolus dicit: 'Et prolapsi sunt?' Verum ne Montanus et Nouatus hinc redeant, qui contendunt, non posse renouari per penitenciam eos, qui crucifixerunt sibimet filium Dei, et ostentui habuerunt, consequenter hunc errorem soluit et ait: 'Confidimus autem de uobis, dilectissimi, meliora et uiciniora saluti, tametsi ita loquimur. Non iniustus est Dominus, ut obliuiscatur operis uestri, et dilectionis, quam ostendistis in nomine ipsius, qui ministrastis sanctis, et nunc ministratis.' Et reuera grandis iniusticia Dei, si tantum peccata puniret, et bona opera non susciperet. Locutus sum, inquit Apostolus ita, ut a peccatis uos retraherem, et desperationis metu facerem cautiores. Ceterum confido de uobis, karissimi, meliora et uiciniora saluti. Neque enim iusticiae Dei est, ut obliuiscatur bonorum operum, et ministerii, quod propter nomen eius exhibuistis et exhibetis in sanctos, et tantum meminerit peccatorum." Et paulo post: §. 4. "Liberi arbitrii nos condidit Deus, nec ad uirtutem, nec ad uicia necessitate trahimur; alioquin, ubi necessitas nec corona est. Sicut in bonis operibus perfector est Deus: (non est enim uolentis, neque currentis, sed miserentis Dei et adiuuantis, ut peruenire ualeamus ad calcem), sic in malis atque peccatis semina nostra sunt incentiua, et perfectio diaboli. Cum uiderit, nos super fundamentum Christi edificasse fenum, ligna, stipulam, tunc supponit incendium. Edificemus aurum, argentum, lapides pretiosos, et temptare non audebit. Quamquam et in hoc non sit certa et secura possessio. Sedet quippe leo in insidiis, ut in occultis interficiat innocentem: et uasa figuli probat fornax, homines autem iustos temptatio tribulationis. Et in alio loco scribitur: 'Fili, accedens ad seruitutem Dei, prepara te ad temptationem.' Rursus idem Iacobus ait: 'Estote factores uerbi, et non auditores tantum. Si quis auditor est uerbi, et non factor, iste similis est uiro, qui considerat uultum natiuitatis suae in speculo; considerauit illud, et statim recedens oblitus est, qualis fuerit.' Frustra monuit, ut iungerent opera fidei si post baptisma peccare non poterant. 'Qui totam,' inquit, 'legem, seruauerit, et in uno peccauerit, factus est omnium reus.' Quis nostrum est absque peccato? conclusit Deus omnia sub delicto, ut omnibus misereatur. Petrus quoque: 'Nouit,' inquit, 'Deus pios de temptatione eripere.' Et de falsis doctoribus: 'Hi sunt fontes sine aqua, et nebulae turbinibus exagitatae, quibus caligo tenebrarum reseruatur. Superba enim uanitatis loquentes pelliciunt in desideriis carnis luxuriae eos, qui paululum effugerant, et ad errorem conuersi sunt.' Nonne tibi uidetur pinxisse sermo apostolicus nouam imperitiae factionem? Aperiunt enim quasi fontes scientiae, qui aquam non habent doctrinarum, promittunt imbrem, uelut nubes propheticae, ad quas perueniat ueritas Dei, et turbinibus exagitantur demonum atque uiciorum. Locuntur grandia, et totus eorum sermo superbia est, (inmundus autem est apud Deum omnis, qui exaltat cor suum), ut qui paululum refugerant a peccatis ad suum reuertantur errorem, et suadent in luxuria ciborum carnisque deliciis. Quis enim non libenter audiat: Manducemus, et bibamus, et in eternum regnabimus? Sapientes et prudentes prauos uocant; eos uero, qui dulces sunt in sermonibus, plus audiunt. Iohannes apostolus, immo in Iohanne Saluator scribens Angelo ecclesiae Ephesi: 'Scio,' inquit, 'opera tua, et laborem, et patienciam tuam, et quia sustinuisti propter nomen meum, et non defecisti; sed habeo aduersum te, quod karitatem tuam primam reliquisti. Memor esto, unde cecideris, et age penitenciam, et prima opera fac. Sin autem, uenio tibi, et mouebo candelabrum tuum de loco suo, nisi penitenciam egeris.' Similiter ceteras ecclesias, Smirnam, Pergamum, Thyatiram, Sardis, Philadelfiam, Laodiciam, ad penitenciam prouocat, et, nisi reuertantur ad opera pristina, conminatur, et in Sardis paucos habere se dicit, qui non coinquinauerunt uestimenta sua, et ambulaturi sunt cum eo in albis, quia digni sunt. Cui autem scribit: 'Memento, unde cecideris,' et: 'Ecce, missurus est diabolus ex uobis in carcerem, ut temptemini,' et: 'Scio, ubi habitas, ubi est sedes sathanae,' et: 'In mente habe, qualiter acceperis et audieris,' et: 'Serua, et penitenciam age,' et reliqua? utique dicit, qui crediderit, et baptizatus fuerit, et stans quondam corruit per delictum. §. 5. Paulisper de ueteri testamento exempla distuleram, quia solent, ubicumque contra eos facit, dicere: 'Lex et prophetae usque ad Iohannem.' Ceterum quis ignoret sub alta dispensatione Dei omnes retro sanctos eiusdem fuisse meriti, cuius nunc Christiani sunt? Quomodo ante Abraham placuit in coniugio, sic nunc placent uirgines in perpetua castitate. Seruiuit ille legi et tempori suo, seruiamus et nos legi et tempori nostro, in quos fines seculorum deuenerunt. Dauid electus secundum cor Domini, qui omnes eius faceret uoluntates, et qui in quodam Psalmo dixerat: 'Iudica me, Domine, quoniam ego in innocentia mea ingressus sum, et in Domino sperans non infirmabor. Proba me, Domine, et tempta me; ure renes meos, et cor meum,' postea temptatus a diabolo, et post peccatum penitens loquitur: 'Miserere mei, Deus, secundum magnam misericordiam tuam.' Magnum peccatum magna uult deleri misericordia. Salomon amabilis Domino, et cui bis fuerat Deus reuelatus, quia amator mulierum fuit, a Dei amore discessit; Manassem impiissimum regem post captiuitatem Babilonicam in pristinam dignitatem liber dierum restitutum refert. Et Iosias uir sanctus in campo Mageddon ab Egiptio rege confoditur. Iesus quoque filius Iosedech sacerdos magnus, quamquam in typo precesserit Saluatoris, qui nostra peccata portauit, et alienigenam sibi ex gentibus copulauit ecclesiam, tamen secundum litteram post sacerdotium sordidatus inducitur, et stat diabolus a dextris eius, et candida illi deinceps uestimenta redduntur. Superfluum est de Moyse et Aaron scribere, quod ad aquam contradictionis offenderint Deum, et terram repromissionis non intrauerint, cum B. Iob angelos quoque et omnem creaturam peccare posse conmemoret, dicens: 'Quid enim numquid homo mundus est coram Deo? aut ab operibus suis sine macula uir? si contra seruos suos non credit, et aduersos angelos suos prauum quid repperit: quanto magis habitantes in domibus luteis, de quibus et nos ex eodem luto sumus? Temptatio est uita hominis super terram.' Et cecidit lucifer, qui mittebat ad uniuersas nationes, et ille, qui in paradyso deliciarum inter duodecim nutritus est lapides, uulneratus a monte Domini ad inferna descendit. Unde et Saluator in euangelio: 'Videbam,' inquit, 'sathanam, quasi fulgur de celo cadentem.' Si altissima illa sublimitas cecidit, quis cadere non possit? Si in celo ruinae, quanto magis in terra. Et tamen, cum ceciderit lucifer, immo post casum coluber antiquus, uirtus eius in lumbis est et potestas eius super umbilicum uentris. Obumbrantur in eo arbores magnae, et dormit iuxta iuncum, et calamum, et caricem. Ipse est rex omnium, qui in aquis sunt, ubi scilicet uoluptas, et luxuria, et propago et irrigatio nuptiarum." Et infra: §. 6. "Transiuimus ad secundam particionem, in qua negat eos, qui tota fide baptisma consecuti sunt, deinde posse peccare, et docuimus, quod excepto Deo omnis creatura sub uicio sit, non quod uniuersi peccauerint, sed quod peccare possint, et similium ruina, stantium metus sit." [Gratian.] Euidenter itaque ex premissis apparet, nonnullos karitatem habere, quam postea criminaliter delinquendo amittunt. Quod si quis contendat non de uirtute, sed de uirtutis opere debere intelligi, deliberet quid respondeat de innocentia Adae, de iusticia Dauid Moysi, et ceterorum, qui plena fide ad baptisma accedentes, licet postea prolapsuri sint, tamen celestia dona degustant, et Spiritus sancti fiunt participes, ut non solum ante humanos, uerum etiam ante Dei oculos ex aqua et Spiritu sancto inueniantur renati; qui, si karitatem non haberent ante Dei oculos; aqua tantum regenerarentur, non Spiritu. Opera enim, seu sacramentorum participatio, nisi ex karitate procedant, apud Deum nec iusticiam, nec innocentiam prestant. "Si enim," inquit Apostolus, "habuero omnem fidem, ita ut montes transferam, et si distribuero omnes facultates meas in cibos pauperum, et si tradidero corpus meum ita, ut ardeam, karitatem autem non habeam, nichil michi prodest." §. 1. Sed quia de predestinatis ad uitam a nonnullis conceditur, quod karitatem amittant, et amissam recuperent, de reprobis etiam uidendum est, an ipsi karitatem habeant, qua amissa postea dampnentur. De his ita scribit Augustinus in libro de correctione et gratia: [c. 9.]

[C. XLI.]

"The Apostle, knowing that some love God and do not remain in that good to the end, immediately added, 'to those who according to purpose are called saints, etc.'"

In the same work, [c. 6]: § 1. "Will this person, still unwilling to be corrected, also be able to say, 'What have I done that I did not receive?' It is certain that the person received and by one's own fault lost what one had received. I can, one says, I can indeed, when you reprove me, say that I have now fallen back from a good life into an evil one by my own will: What have I done that I did not receive? For I received the faith that works through love, but I did not receive perseverance in it to the end."

In the same work, [c. 9]: § 2. "Without doubt I wished them to remain in good; they certainly were in good, but they did not remain in it."

In the same work, [c. 13]: § 3. "For the sake of the usefulness of this secret, it must be believed that some of the children of perdition, without receiving the gift of persevering to the end, begin to live by the faith that works through love, and afterward fall," etc.

GRATIAN. There are many similar things concerning the reprobate, also from the Gospel: "The one who has persevered to the end, etc." In the same work: "Again this man began, etc."

[C. XLI.]

"Apostolus, sciens, nonnullos diligere Deum, et in eo bono usque in finem non permanere, mox addidit: 'his, qui secundum propositum uocati sunt sancti etc.'" In eodem: [c. 6.] §. 1. "An adhuc et iste nolens corripi poterit dicere: Quid ego feci, quod non accepi? quem constat accepisse, et sua culpa quod acceperat amisisse. Possum, inquit, possum omnino, quando me arguis dicere, quod ex bona uita in malam mea uoluntate relapsus sum adhuc: quid feci, quod non accepi? Accepi enim fidem, que per dilectionem operatur, sed in illa usque in finem perseuerantiam non accepi." In eodem: [c. 9.] §. 2. "In bono illos uolebam proculdubio manere; erant utique in bono, sed in eo non permanserunt." In eodem: [c. 13.] §. 3. "Propter huius utilitatem secreti credendum est, quosdam de filiis perditionis non accepto dono perseuerandi usque in finem, fide, quae per dilectionem operatur, incipere uiuere, et postea cadere" etc. [Gratian.] Multa similia de reprobis de euangelio etiam: "Qui perseuerauerit usque in finem, etc." In eodem: "Iterum homo iste incepit, etc."

[C. XLII.] Likewise in the same work, [c. 8].

"It is to be wondered why God gives to certain children of perdition faith working through love, but does not give perseverance in it."

GRATIAN. Likewise that saying of the Gospel: "Not the one who begins, but the one who has persevered to the end, this one will be saved."

[C. XLII.] Item in eodem. [c. 8.]

"Mirandum est, quare Deus quibusdam filiis perditionis det fidem per dilectionem operantem, nec det in ea perseuerantiam." [Gratian.] Item illud euangelii: "Non qui ceperit, sed qui perseuerauerit usque in finem, hic saluus erit."

[C. XLIII.] Likewise Gregory, [book VIII of the Moralia, c. 35].

"Many begin well who end life in evil."

GRATIAN. But one who never works from charity does not begin well. But if one does something from charity, it is also necessary that charity be in that person at some time.

PART V. § 1. But that saying of Gregory, "Those who can be seduced, never at any time to return, etc.," is to be understood not generally concerning all the reprobate, but specifically concerning hypocrites. This is given to be understood evidently from the words of the same author. For when he proposed the question why the merciful God permits these things to happen—that Leviathan, either now through cunning suggestions or through that condemned man whom he fills, subjects to himself either the rays of the sun, that is, all the learned and wise, or gold, that is, men shining with the brightness of holiness, laying them beneath himself like mud by defiling them with vices—he immediately added in the solution of the same question, saying:

[C. XLIII.] Item Gregorius. [lib. VIII. Moralium, cap. 35.]

"Multi bene incipiunt, qui in malo uitam finiunt." [Gratian.] Non autem bene incipit qui numquam ex karitate operatur. Quod si ex karitate aliquid agit, et karitatem aliquando in ipso necesse est esse. V. Pars. §. 1. Illud autem Gregorii: "Qui seduci possunt quandoque non reuersuri etc.," non de omnibus generaliter reprobis, sed de ypocritis specialiter intelligendum est. Quod ex uerbis eiusdem euidenter datur intelligi. Cum enim questionem proponeret, cur misericors Deus ista fieri permittat, ut Leuiathan seu nunc per suggestiones callidas, siue per dampnatum illum, quem replet, hominem, uel solis sibi radios, id est doctos quosque sapientesque subiciat, uel aurum, hoc est uiros sanctitatis claritate fulgentes, quasi lutum sibi uiciis coinquinando substernat, mox in eiusdem questionis solutione supposuit, dicens:

[C. XLIV.]

"We quickly answer this: the gold that could be spread like mud by his depraved persuasions was never gold before God's eyes. For those who can be seduced, never at any time to return, seem to lose before human eyes the holiness that they had, but they never possessed it before God's eyes. For often a person is entangled in many secret sins and appears great in one particular virtue; this virtue itself also, becoming empty, fails, because, when it becomes known to human beings, without doubt it is praised, and their favor is greedily sought. Hence it comes to pass that this very virtue is not virtue before God's eyes, since the person conceals what displeases and discloses what pleases. What merits, therefore, can there be before God when the evils are hidden and the good things public? For very often, as we have said, pride lies hidden and chastity becomes known. And therefore chastity shown for a long time is lost near the end of life, because hidden pride is retained uncorrected to the end. Another devotes oneself to alms and distributes one's possessions, but nevertheless serves many injustices, or perhaps exercises one's tongue in detractions; and it very often comes to pass that one who had been merciful blazes near the end of one's life with the goads of rapacity and cruelty. This is done by a very just judgment, so that the person loses even before human beings that by which one pleased human beings, since that person never took care to correct that by which one displeased God.

Another applies oneself to patience but does not take care to avoid envying others and preserving malice in the heart; the person at some time becomes impatient because one long lay hidden in pain. Accordingly, these persons are gold in one respect and mud in another. And this gold is spread like mud when, as their hidden sins exact, even the virtue that had shone publicly is dissipated.

§ 1. But we believe it worthwhile if in these things we weigh more subtly the power of the heavenly order. For often almighty God tolerates their hidden evils for a long time and dispenses their manifest goods so that they may profit the uses of his elect. For some, by no means utterly abandoning the world, enter the narrow way without being destined to persevere, but by their example kindle those who are destined to persevere to seek the narrow way. Hence it very often happens that, by the very fact that they seem to live well, they live not for themselves but rather for the elect alone, since, though not destined to persevere, by their examples they provoke others who are destined to persevere toward the pursuits of living well. For we often see certain persons enter upon a way and hasten toward a proposed place; others, because they see them going, follow and seek the same place together with them. But it very often comes to pass that, when some entangling difficulty rushes in, those who were going before turn back behind them, and those who were following reach the place. Thus certainly are those who do not persevere and who enter the way of holiness. For this reason they begin the path of virtue without being destined to arrive: so that they may show those who are destined to arrive the way upon which they should walk. Even their fall serves with no small usefulness for the advancement of the elect, because, when the elect behold their fall, they tremble concerning their own state; and the ruin that condemns the former humbles the latter. For they learn to trust in the protection of heavenly aid when they behold many fall by their own strength. Therefore, when the reprobate seem to act well, they show, as it were, a level way to the elect following them. But when they fall into the collapse of wickedness, they show, as it were, to the elect proceeding behind them a pit of pride that must be avoided."

GRATIAN. But the fact that the reprobate are denied to eat the bread that descended from heaven or drink the living water is not to be understood so that they are believed altogether foreign to charity, but so that they are understood not to plant a root in charity. For it is one thing to eat or drink, and another to taste. Hence in the Gospel it is read concerning Christ: "And when he had tasted, he refused to drink." Therefore, one who plants a root in charity drinks the living water and eats the bread that descended from heaven; one tastes who shares it to some degree but afterward withdraws from it by transgressing. Concerning such persons the Apostle says, "It is impossible for those who were once enlightened and tasted the heavenly gift and after all these things have fallen away to be renewed again to penance."

§ 1. Hence also the devil is denied to have stood in truth, not to have been created in it. For he was established in truth; but when he presumed concerning himself by growing proud, he was made foreign to it. But how is he declared to have been created in truth if he is proved to have been created without love for his Creator? Or how is he asserted to have been established good by God if he received nothing of divine direction in his creation? How did he exist without vice before the movement of pride if he did not love his Creator in any way? Or how is he said to have been created equal or more excellent than the others if, while some of them were established in the love of God, he was made empty of his love? But from where did this difference between the good and evil angels proceed? If from the Creator, God seems unjust, who inflicts punishment before sin or punishes what he infused by creating. But if not from the Creator, since it is not from propagation, it remains that the vice of pride proceeded into the angelic nature from the judgment of its own liberty. Therefore that nature was established good which by its own vice was changed from good into evil. But how could it have been good if it wholly lacked love? For neither was the angel made like us, whom weakness burdens until a determinate time of life, so that neither virtue nor any vice obtains a place in us. Therefore he received love in his creation, as did the others, concerning whom it is said, "The angelic powers that persisted in the love of God." He does not say, "that began to love God," but "that persisted in his love," which had begun to love from creation, so that the beginning of divine love is believed common to all, but perseverance is understood to belong only to those who merited to receive this in reward: that, having been confirmed, they could no longer fall and would know this most certainly concerning themselves. Hence it is well said in Moses that heaven was made first and then the firmament, because, namely, the angelic nature was first established equally subtle in the higher things, and afterward was wondrously confirmed in those persisting in love of their Creator.

§ 2. Hence also Gregory in the Moralia, repeatedly treating many things concerning the perfection of angelic creation, denies that the devil was filled with charity; he does not assert that he was wholly empty of it. If he had wholly lacked it, the things said concerning his excellence could never suitably be understood of him.

[C. XLIV.]

"Citius ad hoc respondemus, quia aurum, quod prauis eius persuasionibus quasi lutum sterni potuerit, aurum ante Dei oculos numquam fuit. Qui enim seduci quandoque non reuersuri possunt, quasi habitam sanctitatem ante oculos hominum uidentur amittere, sed eam ante Dei oculos numquam habuerunt. Sepe namque homo multis occulte peccatis inuoluitur, et in una aliqua uirtute magnus uidetur, que ipsa quoque uirtus inanescens deficit, quia, dum innotescit hominibus, proculdubio laudatur, eiusque fauor inhianter appetitur: unde fit, ut et ipsa uirtus ante Dei oculos uirtus non sit, dum abscondit quod displicet, prodit quod placet. Que itaque esse merita apud Deum possunt, quando et mala occulta sunt, et bona publica? Plerumque enim, sicut diximus, latet superbia, et castitas innotescit. Atque ideo ostensa diu castitas circa finem uitae perditur, quia cooperta superbia usque ad finem incorrecta retinetur. Alius elemosinis uacat, propria distribuit, sed tamen multis iniusticiis seruit, uel fortasse linguam in detractionibus exercet, et fit plerumque, ut is, qui misericors fuerat, iuxta uitae suae terminum rapacitatis et crudelitatis stimulis inardescat. Quod ualde iusto iudicio agitur, ut perdat et ante homines unde hominibus placuit, qui hoc, unde Deo displicuit, corrigere numquam curauit. Alius patienciae studet, sed inuidere aliis, et seruare maliciam in corde non cauet, fit quandoque inpatiens, quia diu latuit dolens. Hi itaque et per aliquid aurum sunt, et per aliquid lutum sunt. Atque hoc aurum quasi lutum sternitur, quando occultis peccatis exigentibus etiam uirtus, que publice claruerat, dissipatur. §. 1. Sed operae precium credimus, si in his uirtutem superni ordinis subtilius perpendamus. Sepe enim Deus omnipotens occulta eorum mala diu tollerat, et aperta eorum bona electorum suorum usibus profutura dispensat. Nam nonnulli, mundum nequaquam funditus deserentes, non perseueraturi angustum iter arripiunt, sed ad querendam angustam uiam exemplo suo eos, qui perseueraturi sunt, accendunt. Unde contingit plerumque, ut hoc ipsum, quod bene uidentur uiuere, non sibi, sed potius solis electis uiuant, dum exemplis suis ad bene uiuendi studia perseueraturos alios non perseueraturi prouocant. Sepe enim quosdam uidemus ad uiam ingredi, ad locum propositum festinare, quos alii, quia euntes conspiciunt, secuntur, eundemque pariter locum petunt; sed fit plerumque, ut irruente aliquo inplicationis articulo post se redeant qui preibant, et hi ad locum perueniant, qui sequebantur. Ita nimirum sunt qui non perseuerant et uiam sanctitatis arripiunt.

Idcirco enim uirtutis iter non peruenturi inchoant, ut eis, qui peruenturi sunt, uiam, qua gradiantur, ostendant, quorum etiam casus utilitate non modica electorum prouectibus seruit, quia illorum lapsum dum conspiciunt, de suo statu contremiscunt, et ruina, que illos dampnat, istos humiliat. Discunt enim in superni adiutorii protectione confidere, dum plerosque conspiciunt de suis uiribus cecidisse. Quando ergo bene agere uidentur reprobi, quasi planum iter electis sequentibus monstrant. Quando uero in lapsum nequiciae corruunt, electis post se pergentibus quasi cauendam superbiae foueam ostendunt." [Gratian.] Quod uero reprobi negantur comedere panem, qui de celo descendit, uel bibere aquam uiuam, non sic accipiendum est, ut a karitate penitus credantur alieni, sed ut in karitate radicem figere non intelligantur. Aliud est enim manducare uel bibere, atque aliud degustare. Unde in euangelio de Christo legitur: "Et cum gustasset, noluit bibere." Bibit ergo aquam uiuam, manducat panem, qui de celo descendit, qui in karitate radicem figit; degustat, qui ea aliquatenus conmunicat, a qua postea recedit delinquendo. De qualibus Apostolus ait: "Inpossibile est, eos, qui semel illuminati sunt, et gustauerunt celeste donum, et post hec omnia prolapsi sunt, rursus renouari ad penitenciam." §. 1. Hinc etiam diabolus in ueritate stetisse, non in ea creatus esse negatur. Fuit enim in ueritate conditus; sed, dum de se superbiendo presumpsit, ab ea alienus factus est. In ueritate autem quomodo creatus perhibetur, si sine dilectione sui conditoris creatus esse probatur? Aut quomodo bonus a Deo conditus asseritur, si nichil diuinae directionis in sui creatione accepit? Quomodo ante superbiae motum sine uicio extitit, si conditorem suum nullatenus dilexit? Aut quomodo par, siue exellentior ceteris creatus dicitur, si, nonnullis eorum in Dei amore conditis, hic ab eius dilectione uacuus factus est? Unde autem hec differentia inter bonos et malos angelos processit? Si ex creante, iniustus uidetur Deus, qui ante peccatum infert penam, uel qui hoc punit, quod creando infudit. Si autem non ex creante, cum non ex traduce, restat, ut ex propriae libertatis arbitrio uicium superbiae in angelicam naturam processerit. Bona ergo condita est, que suo uicio a bono in malum conmutata est. Sed quomodo bona esse potuit, si dilectione penitus caruit? Neque enim angelus nobis similis factus est, quos usque ad tempus etatis certum infirmitas grauat, ut neque uirtus, neque uicium ullum in nobis obtineat locum. Accepit ergo dilectionem in sui creatione, sicut et ceteri, de quibus dicitur: "Angelicae uirtutes, que in Dei amore perstiterunt." Non ait, que Deum diligere ceperunt, sed: "que in eius amore perstiterunt," que ex creatione diligere ceperant, ut principium diuinae dilectionis omnibus credatur esse conmune, perseuerantia uero eorum tantummodo intelligatur, qui in retributione hoc accipere meruerunt, ut confirmati ulterius cadere non possent, et hoc de se certissime scirent. Unde bene apud Moysem prius celum, deinde firmamentum factum esse dicitur, quia nimirum angelica natura prius equaliter subtilis in superioribus est condita, postea in persistentibus in amore sui conditoris mirabiliter confirmata. §. 2. Hinc etiam Gregorius in Moralibus multa de perfectione angelicae creationis replicans, karitate repletum negat, non ea penitus uacuum asserit, qua si penitus caruisset, numquam ea, que de eius excellentia dicuntur, conuenienter de eo intelligi possent.

[C. XLV.]

“For blessed Gregory says, ‘Behemoth is called the beginning of the ways of God because, certainly, when the Creator made all things, he established this one first and made him more eminent than the other angels. The prophet beholds the eminence of his primacy when he says, “The cedars were not higher than he in the paradise of God; the fir trees did not equal his summit; the plane trees were not equal to his foliage; no precious tree of the paradise of God was likened to him and to his beauty, because he made him beautiful with many dense branches.” For what can be understood in the cedars, fir trees, and plane trees except those troops of heavenly powers of towering loftiness, planted in the greenness of eternal joy? Although they were established exalted, nevertheless they were neither preferred nor equaled to this one, who is said to have been made beautiful with many dense branches, because the degree to which he was set over the other legions rendered him more beautiful was as great as the multitude of angels placed beneath him adorned him. That tree in the paradise of God had as many dense branches, as it were, as it beheld legions of heavenly spirits placed beneath it. And therefore, sinning, he was condemned without pardon because he had been created great beyond comparison. Hence it is again said to him through the same prophet, "You, the seal of likeness, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty, were in the delights of the paradise of God." For, being about to speak many things concerning his greatness, in the first word he comprehended all. For what good did one who was the seal of God's likeness not possess? From the seal of a ring such a likeness is expressed as an image as is contained essentially in that same seal. And although the human being was created in God's likeness, nevertheless, as though attributing something greater to the angel, he does not say that he was established in God's likeness, but that he was the very seal of God's likeness, so that, the subtler his nature is, the more fully God's likeness is believed to have been expressed in him.

§ 1. Hence, still intimating the power of his primacy, the same prophet adds, "Every precious stone was your covering: sardius, topaz, jasper, chrysolite, onyx, beryl, sapphire, carbuncle, and emerald." He named nine kinds of stones because there are certainly nine orders of angels. For when angels, archangels, thrones and dominions, virtues, principalities, powers, cherubim, and seraphim are recalled in an open narration through the sacred writings, it is shown how many distinctions there are among the heavenly citizens. Yet this Behemoth is described as having been covered with them, because he possessed as a garment for his ornament those whose brightness he surpassed and, by comparison with them, was brighter.

§ 2. Concerning his description he further adds, "Gold was the work of your beauty, and your perforations were prepared on the day when you were established." Gold was the work of his beauty because he shone with the brightness of wisdom, which he received when created good. But perforations are made in stones for this reason: that, bound with gold, they may be joined in the composition of the ornament, and that those whom the interposed gold binds by filling their perforations may by no means part from one another. Therefore the perforations of this stone were prepared on the day of its establishment, because he was created capable of charity. If he had wished to be filled with it, he could have adhered to the standing angels like stones set in the king's ornament. For if he had rendered himself penetrable to the gold of charity, joined to the holy angels in the ornament, as we have said, he would have remained a fixed royal stone. Therefore this stone had perforations, but through the vice of pride they were not filled with the gold of charity. For because stones are bound with gold so that they do not fall, this one therefore fell because, although perforated by the artisan's hand, he disdained to be bound by the bonds of love. But now the other stones, which had been perforated similarly here, are bound by charity, penetrating one another; and when this one fell, they merited this in the gift: that they would no longer be loosened from the royal ornament by falling.

§ 3. Still beholding the loftiness of his principality, the same prophet adds, "You were the extended and protecting cherub upon God's holy mountain, and you walked perfect in the midst of the fiery stones." For cherub is interpreted as fullness of knowledge, and therefore this one is called cherub because it is not doubted that he surpassed all in knowledge. He walked perfect in the midst of the fiery stones because, among the hearts of angels kindled by the fire of charity, he existed illustrious in the glory of his establishment. He well calls him extended and protecting. For whatever we protect while extended over it, we overshadow, because he is believed to have overshadowed the brightness of the others by comparison with his own brightness; he is found to have been extended and protecting. For he covered the others as though by overshadowing them, since he surpassed their greatness with greater excellence.

§ 4. Therefore what there is called beautiful with many branches, what there is called the seal of likeness, what there is called cherub, what there is called protecting—this is what here, by the Lord's voice, this Behemoth is called the beginning of the ways of God. Concerning him, therefore, he intimates such wondrous things, in which he once was and which he lost, so that he may show a human being what that person, if proud, will suffer for the fault of one's exaltation, since in striking he refused to spare the one whom in creating he exalted in the glory of such great brightness. Therefore let an exalted human being consider what one merits on earth, if one preferred to angels is cast down in heaven.'"

PART VI. GRATIAN. But charity that is abandoned in adversity is declared to be feigned, that is, earthen and fragile, just as the faith from which charity proceeds is denied by the Apostle to be feigned, that is, fragile. Similarly, charity that can be abandoned in adversity is said never to have been true. For as Jerome writes against Jovinian, "Every creature is subject to fault, not because every creature has sinned, but because there is none that cannot sin." But, as Augustine says, to be able to sin is not to be able to do something; rather, it is not to be able to do something. Hence he alone is called omnipotent who cannot do this, because he can do all things in which ability is the ability to do something. Therefore, just as in comparison with him who knows no mutability every creature is called faulty because it is capable of mutability, according to that saying, "No living being will be justified in your sight," and, "The stars are not clean in his sight," so in comparison with that creature which does not receive change, every creature that is changed is proved not true but vain. Hence every human being is called a liar and made like vanity.

§ 1. Hence Ecclesiastes also says that all things beneath the sun—that is, those that receive the succession of times—are called not merely vanity, which inheres in every creature by reason of mutability, but also vanity of vanities by the variation of change that they receive. Thus, therefore, in comparison with divine charity no virtue is proved true; or in comparison with that charity which is not abandoned, that which is lost is said to be true; thus also charity that is abandoned is denied in its own manner to be true. But just as every creature is said in its own manner to be good and true, so also charity that is abandoned is shown in its own manner to be true; otherwise, if it were in no manner in that person, it would be abandoned by no one. For what in no manner truly exists can in no manner be abandoned. But if it is truly abandoned in some manner, it must also truly exist in some manner.

[C. XLV.]

"Principium enim," inquit B. Gregorius, "uiarum Dei Behemoth dicitur, quia nimirum, cum cuncta creans ageret, hunc primum condidit, quem reliquis angelis eminentiorem fecit. Huius primatus eminentiam conspicit Propheta, cum dicit: 'Cedri non fuerunt altiores illo in paradyso Dei; abietes non adequauerunt summitatem eius; platani non fuerunt equales frondibus illius; omne lignum preciosum paradysi Dei non est assimilatum illi et pulchritudini eius, quoniam speciosum fecit eum in multis, condensisque frondibus.' Quid namque accipi in cedris, abietibus, et platanis potest, nisi illa uirtutum celestium procerae celsitudinis agmina, in eternae leticiae uiriditate plantata? Que quamuis exelsa sint condita, huic tamen nec prelata sunt, nec equata, qui speciosus factus in multis, condensisque frondibus dicitur, quia prelatum ceteris legionibus tanta illum species pulchriorem reddidit, quanta et supposita angelorum multitudo decorauit. Ista arbor in paradyso Dei tot quasi condensas frondes habuit, quot sub se positas supernorum spirituum legiones attendit. Qui et idcirco peccans sine uenia est dampnatus, quia magnus sine conparatione fuerat creatus. Hinc ei rursum per eundem Prophetam dicitur: 'Tu signaculum similitudinis plenus sapientia, et perfectus decore, in deliciis paradysi Dei fuisti.' Multa enim de eius magnitudine locuturus, primo uerbo cuncta conplexus est. Quid namque boni non habuit qui signaculum Dei similitudinis fuit? De sigillo quippe annuli talis similitudo imaginaliter exprimitur, qualis in sigillo eodem essentialiter habetur. Et licet homo ad similitudinem Dei creatus sit, angelo tamen quasi maius aliquid tribuens, non eum ad similitudinem Dei conditum, sed ipsum signaculum Dei similitudinis dicit, ut, quo subtilior est natura, eo in illum similitudo Dei plenius credatur expressa. §. 1. Hinc est, quod primatus eius potenciam adhuc insinuans idem Propheta subiungit: 'Omnis lapis preciosus operimentum tuum, sardius, et topazius, et iaspis, crisolitus, onix, et berillus, saphirus, carbunculus, et smaragdus.' Nouem dixit genera lapidum, quia nimirum nouem sunt ordines angelorum. Nam cum per sacra eloquia angeli, archangeli, throni et dominationes, uirtutes, principatus, potestates, Cherubim et Seraphim aperta narratione memorantur, supernorum ciuium quantae sint distinctiones ostenditur; quibus tamen Behemoth iste opertus fuisse describitur, quia eos quasi uestem ad ornamentum suum habuit, quorum dum claritatem transcenderet, ex eorum conparatione clarior fuit. §. 2. De cuius adhuc descriptione subiungit: 'Aurum opus decoris tui, et foramina tua in die, qua conditus es, preparata sunt.' Aurum opus extitit decoris eius, quia sapientiae claritate canduit, quam bene creatus accepit. Foramina uero in lapidibus idcirco fiunt, ut uinculati auro in ornamenti conpositione iungantur, et nequaquam a se dissideant, quos interfusum aurum repletis foraminibus ligat. Huius ergo lapidis in die condicionis suae foramina preparata sunt, quia uidelicet capax karitatis est conditus, qua si repleri uoluisset, stantibus angelis tamquam positis in regis ornamento lapidibus inherere potuisset. Si enim karitatis auro sese penetrabilem prebuisset, sanctis angelis sociatus in ornamento, ut diximus, regio lapis fixus maneret. Habuit ergo lapis iste foramina; sed superbiae uicio karitatis auro non sunt repleta. Nam quia idcirco ligantur auro, ne cadant, idcirco iste cecidit, quia etiam perforatus manu artificis amoris uinculis ligari contempsit. Nunc autem ceteri lapides, qui hic similiter fuerant perforati, penetrantes se inuicem karitate ligati sunt, atque hoc in munere, isto cadente, meruerunt, ut nequaquam iam de ornamento regio cadendo soluantur. §. 3. Huius principatus celsitudinem adhuc idem Propheta intuens adiungit: 'Tu Cherub extentus, et protegens in monte sancto Dei, et in medio lapidum ignitorum perfectus ambulasti.' Cherub quippe plenitudo scientiae interpretatur, et idcirco iste Cherub dicitur, quia transscendisse cunctos scientia non dubitatur, qui in medio lapidum ignitorum perfectus ambulauit, quia inter angelorum corda karitatis igne succensa clarus gloria condicionis extitit. Quem bene extentum ac protegentem dicit. Omne enim, quod extenti protegimus, obumbramus, quia conparatione claritatis suae obumbrasse ceterorum claritatem creditur, ipse fuisse extentus et protegens repperitur. Reliquos enim quasi obumbrando operuit, qui eorum magnitudinem excellentia maiore transscendit. §. 4. Quod ergo illic speciosus in multis frondibus, quod illic signaculum similitudinis, quod illic Cherub, quod illic protegens dicitur, hoc hic uoce dominica Behemoth iste principium uiarum Dei uocatur. De quo idcirco tam mira, in quibus fuit, et que amisit, insinuat, ut homini ostendat, quid ipse, si superbiat, de elationis suae culpa passurus sit, si feriendo illi parcere noluit, quem creando in gloria tantae claritatis eleuauit. Consideret ergo homo, elatus quid in terra mereatur, et si angelis prelatus in celo prosternitur." VI. Pars. [Gratian.] Karitas autem, que in aduersitate deseritur, ficta, id est fictilis et fragilis, esse perhibetur, sicut fides, ex qua karitas procedit, ficta, id est fragilis, apud Apostolum esse negatur. Similiter karitas, que in aduersitate deseri potest, dicitur numquam uera fuisse. Sicut enim Ieronimus contra Iouinianum scribit: "Omnis creatura sub uicio est, non quod omnis peccauerit, sed quia nulla est, que peccare non possit." Posse autem peccare, ut Augustinus ait, non est aliquid posse, immo aliquid non posse. Unde ille solus uocatur omnipotens, qui hoc non potest, quia omnia potest, que posse est aliquid posse. Sicut ergo eius conparatione, qui mutabilitatem nescit, omnis creatura uiciosa dicitur, quia mutabilitatis est capax, iuxta illud: "Non iustificabitur in conspectu tuo omnis uiuens," et: "Astra non sunt munda in conspectu eius:" sic conparatione eius creaturae, que mutationem non recipit, omnis creatura, que permutatur, non uera sed uana esse probatur. Unde omnis homo mendax dicitur, et uanitati similis factus. §. 1. Hinc etiam Ecclesiastes: Cuncta, que sub sole sunt, id est que temporum uicissitudinem recipiunt, non tantummodo uanitas, que omni creaturae ratione mutabilitatis inest, sed etiam uanitas uanitatum, uarietate permutationis, quam recipiunt, esse dicuntur. Sic ergo conparatione diuinae karitatis nulla uirtus uera probatur, aut conparatione eius, que non deseritur, illa, que amittitur, uera esse dicitur, sic et karitas, que deseritur, suo modo uera esse negatur. Sicut autem omnis creatura suo modo bona et uera esse dicitur, sic et karitas, que deseritur, suo modo uera esse monstratur: alioquin, si nullo modo in eo esset a nullo desereretur. Quod enim nullo modo uere est nullo modo deseri potest. Quod si aliquo modo uere deseritur, et aliquo modo id uere esse oportet.

Distinction III

GRATIAN. PART I. We have written these things briefly concerning charity because of those who deny that penance can be repeated, asserting that, just as charity once possessed is never lost, so penance once truly celebrated is stained by no subsequent fault; but if a criminal fault at some time follows it, it was not true penance and did not obtain pardon from the Lord. They strive to prove this from the definition of penance itself and from many authorities. For, as Ambrose says in a certain Lenten sermon:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Hec de karitate breuiter scripsimus propter eos, qui penitenciam negant reiterari posse, asserentes, quod sicut karitas semel habita numquam amittitur, ita penitencia semel uere celebrata nulla sequenti culpa maculatur; si uero criminalis culpa illam aliquando sequitur, uera penitencia non fuit, nec ueniam a Domino inpetrauit. Quod ex diffinitione ipsius penitenciae, et multorum auctoritatibus probare contendunt. Ut enim ait Ambrosius in quodam sermone Quadragesimae:

[C. I.]

“Penance is both to lament past evils and not to commit again things that must be lamented.”

[C. I.]

"Penitencia est et mala preterita plangere, et plangenda iterum non conmittere."

[C. II.] The same in Book II on One Penance, [c. 10].

“There are found those who think that penance is to be performed repeatedly, who indulge themselves wantonly in Christ. For if they truly performed penance in Christ, they would not think that it must afterward be repeated, because just as baptism is one, so penance is one. But we ought always to repent of past sin; yet this [concerns] lighter offenses. But I more easily find one who has rightly preserved innocence than one who has fittingly performed penance.”

[C. II.] Idem in libro [II.] de unica penitentia. [c. 10.]

"Repperiuntur qui sepius penitenciam agendam putant, qui luxuriantur in Christo. Nam si uere in Christo penitenciam agerent, iterandam postea non putarent; quia, sicut unum baptisma, ita unica est penitencia. Verum preteriti nos semper debet penitere peccati: sed hec delictorum leuiorum. At ego facilius inueni qui recte seruauerit innocentiam, quam qui congrue egerit penitenciam."

[C. III.] Likewise Augustine, [Book on Ecclesiastical Dogmas, c. 54].

"The satisfaction of penance is to cut away the causes of sins and not to grant entrance to their suggestions."

[C. III.] Item Augustinus. [libro de dogmatibus ecclesiasticis, c. 54.]

"Satisfactio penitenciae est peccatorum causas excidere, nec earum suggestionibus aditum indulgere."

[C. IV.] The same in the Book on Penance, [c. 8].

"Penance is a certain vengeance of one grieving, punishing in oneself what one grieves to have committed."

And below, [c. 19]: § 1. "One must grieve continually over sin; the very force of the expression declares this. For to repent is to hold punishment, so that one may always punish within oneself by avenging what one committed by sinning. For punishment is properly called an injury that punishes and avenges what each person committed. The one holds punishment who always avenges what one grieves to have committed."

GRATIAN. Accordingly, penance is vengeance always punishing in oneself what one grieves to have committed.

[C. IV.] Idem in libro de penitentia. [c. 8.]

"Penitencia est quedam dolentis uindicta, puniens in se quod dolet conmisisse." Et infra: [c. 19.] §. 1. "Continue dolendum est de peccato: quod declarat ipsa dictionis uirtus. Penitere enim est penam tenere, ut semper in se puniat ulciscendo quod conmisit peccando. Pena enim proprie dicitur lesio, que punit et uindicans quod quisque conmisit. Ille penam tenet, qui semper uindicat quod commisisse dolet."

[Gratian.] Penitencia itaque est uindicta semper puniens in se quod dolet conmisisse.

[C. V.] In the same work, [c. 13].

"If the Apostle continually laments even sins remitted through baptism, what remains for us, placed upon the foundation of the Apostles, except to lament? What, except always to grieve in life? For where sorrow ends, penance also fails. But if penance ends, what remains of pardon? For let one rejoice and hope concerning grace for as long as one is sustained by penance. For the Lord says, 'Go, and now sin no more.' He did not say only, 'Do not sin,' but, 'Let not even the will to sin arise in you.' How will this be observed unless sorrow is continually guarded in penance? Hence let one always grieve and rejoice concerning sorrow; and if it happens, let one always grieve concerning the penance of sorrow. And let it not suffice that one grieves, but let one grieve from faith and grieve that one has not always grieved."

[C. V.] In eodem. [c. 13.]

"Si Apostolus etiam peccata per baptismum dimissa continue plorat, nobis super fundamentum Apostolorum positis quid preter plorare restat? quid, nisi semper dolere in uita? Ubi enim dolor finitur, deficit et penitencia. Si autem penitencia finitur, quid relinquitur de uenia? Tamdiu enim gaudeat et speret de gratia, quamdiu sustentatur a penitencia. Dicit enim Dominus: 'Vade, et amplius noli peccare.' Non dixit: ne pecces, sed: nec uoluntas peccandi in te oriatur. Quod quomodo seruabitur, nisi dolor in penitencia continue custodiatur? Hinc semper doleat, et de dolore gaudeat, et de doloris penitencia, si contigerit, semper doleat, et non satis sit, quod doleat, sed ex fide doleat, et non semper doluisse doleat."

[C. VI.] Likewise Gregory for the summer season, [that is, homily XXXIV on the Gospels].

"We cannot perform penance worthily unless we also know the measure of that penance. For to perform penance is both to lament evils perpetrated and not to perpetrate things that must be lamented. For one who so deplores some things that one nevertheless commits others either does not yet know how to perform penance or dissembles. For what does it profit if someone laments sins of lust and nevertheless still pants after the fires of avarice?"

The same, [book IX, letter 39, to Theoctista]: § 1. "But if they say that penance of a short time ought to suffice against sin, so that it may again be permitted to return to sin, the sentence of the first shepherd rightly strikes them; he says, 'The dog returned to its vomit, and the washed sow to the wallowing place of mud.' For the power of penance against sin is great, but only if someone perseveres in that penance.

§ 2. Truly to perform penance is to lament things committed, but to avoid things that must again be lamented."

[C. VI.] Item Gregorius in estiuum tempus. [id est homil. XXXIV. Euang.]

"Penitenciam agere digne non possumus, nisi modum quoque eiusdem penitenciae cognoscamus. Penitenciam quippe est agere et perpetrata mala plangere, et plangenda non perpetrare. Nam qui sic alia deplorat, ut tamen alia conmittat, adhuc penitenciam agere aut ignorat, aut dissimulat. Quid enim prodest, si peccata quis luxuriae defleat, et tamen adhuc auaritiae estibus anhelat?" Idem: [lib. IX. epist. 39. ad Theoctistam] §. 1. "Si autem dicunt, pauci temporis penitenciam contra peccatum debere sufficere, ut iterum liceat ad peccatum redire, recte hos pastoris primi sentencia percutit, qui ait: 'Canis reuersus ad suum uomitum, et sus lota in uolutabro luti.' Magna est enim contra peccatum uirtus penitenciae, sed si quis in eadem penitencia perseueret. §. 2. Penitenciam uere agere est conmissa plangere, sed iterum plangenda declinare."

[C. VII.] The same, [tractate CXXIV on c. 21 of John].

"The punishment is more prolonged than the fault, lest the fault be thought small if the punishment also ended with it. And through this, either for the demonstration of deserved misery, or for the amendment of a changeable life, or for the exercise of necessary patience, punishment temporally holds the person whom the fault no longer holds guilty for everlasting condemnation.

§ 1. God's wrath is not like a human being's, that is, a disturbance of an agitated mind, but the tranquil establishment of a just punishment."

[C. VII.] Idem. [tract. CXXIV. in c. 21. Iohannis.]

"Productior est pena, quam culpa, ne parua putaretur culpa, si cum illa finiretur et pena. Ac per hoc uel ad demonstrationem debitae miseriae, uel ad emendationem labilis uitae, uel ad exercitationem necessariae patienciae temporaliter hominem detinet pena, quem iam ad dampnationem sempiternam reum non retinet culpa. §. 1. Ira Dei non est ut hominis, id est perturbatio concitati animi, sed tranquilla iusti suplicii constitutio."

[C. VIII.] Likewise John Golden Mouth, [in the homily on penance].

“Perfect penance compels the sinner willingly to suffer all things.” And below: “In that person’s heart is contrition, in the mouth confession, in the deed complete humility. This is fruitful penance.”

> [C. VIII.] Item Iohannes Os aureum. [in homilia de penitencia]
>
> "Perfecta penitencia cogit peccatorem omnia libenter sufferre." Et infra: "In corde eius contritio, in ore confessio, in opere tota humilitas. Hec est fructifera penitencia."

[C. IX.] Likewise Smaragdus, [in the exposition of the Rule of Saint Benedict, c. 4].

“That person performs penance worthily who so deplores past evils that one does not again commit future ones. For one who laments a sin and again admits a sin is like someone washing an unbaked brick: the more one washes it, the more mud one makes.”

> [C. IX.] Item Smaragdus. [in expositione regulae S. Benedicti, c. 4.]
> "Ille penitenciam digne agit, qui sic preterita mala deplorat, ut futura iterum non conmittat. Nam qui plangit peccatum, et iterum admittit peccatum, quasi quis lauet laterem crudum: quem quanto magis abluerit, tanto magis lutum facit."

[C. X.] Likewise Augustine, [homily XLI].

“Penitents—if, nevertheless, you are penitents and not mockers—change your life, be reconciled to God, and you too will graze with a chain. With what chain, you ask? ‘The things you bind on earth will be bound also in heaven.’ You hear the binding and think that you can deceive God? You perform penance, bend your knees, and laugh; you mock God’s patience? If you perform penance, repent; if you do not repent, you are not a penitent. Therefore, if you repent, why do you do what you did evilly? If you repent of having done it, do not do it; if you still do it, certainly you are not a penitent.”

> [C. X.] Item Augustinus. [hom. XLI.]
> "Penitentes (si tamen estis penitentes, et non estis irridentes) mutate uitam, reconciliamini Deo, et uos cum catena pascetis. Qua, inquis, catena? 'Que ligaueritis in terra erunt ligata et in celo.' Audis ligaturam, et Deo putas facere inposturam? penitenciam agis, genua figis, et rides, subsannas patienciam Dei? Si penitenciam agis penitet; si non penitet, penitens non es. Si ergo penitet, cur facis quod male fecisti? si fecisse penitet, noli facere; si adhuc facis, certe non es penitens."

[C. XI.] Likewise Isidore, [book II] on the Highest Good, [c. 16].

“One who still does what one repents of is a mocker, not a penitent, and does not seem to petition God as a subject, but to mock him as a proud person. A penitent returning to sin is a dog returning to vomit. For many shed tears without ceasing and do not cease to sin. I perceive some receiving tears for penance yet not possessing the disposition of penance, because through inconstancy of mind they now shed tears at the remembrance of sin, but now, when habit revives, by repeating they commit the things that they had lamented. Isaiah says concerning sinners, ‘Wash yourselves; be clean.’ The one is washed and clean who both laments past things and does not again admit things that must be lamented. The one is washed and is not clean who laments the things done but does not abandon them, and after tears repeats the things that had been lamented.”

> [C. XI.] Item Ysidorus. [lib. II.] de summo bono [c. 16.]

"Irrisor est, non penitens, qui adhuc agit quod penitet, nec uidetur Deum poscere subditus, sed subsannare superbus; canis reuersus ad uomitum est penitens ad peccatum. Multi enim indesinenter lacrimas fundunt, et peccare non desinunt. Quosdam accipere lacrimas ad penitenciam cerno, et affectum penitenciae non habere, quia inconstantia mentis nunc recordatione peccati lacrimas fundunt, nunc uero reuiuiscente usu ea, que fleuerunt, iterando conmittunt. Ysaias de peccatoribus dicit: Lauamini, mundi estote. Lauatur, et mundus est, qui et preterita plangit, et flenda iterum non admittit. Lauatur, et non est mundus, qui plangit que gessit, nec deserit, et post lacrimas ea, que fleuerat, repetit."

[C. XII.] Likewise Augustine in the Book of Soliloquies.

"That penance which a subsequent fault defiles is empty. A wound inflicted again is healed more slowly; one who sins and mourns frequently scarcely merits pardon. Laments profit nothing if sins are repeated. It avails nothing to seek pardon from evils and to repeat the evils anew. Therefore persist in confession; be firmly confirmed in penance. Do not cease to hold the good life that you began; continually preserve the purpose of a good life."

[C. XII.] Item Augustinus in libro soliloquiorum.

"Inanis est penitencia, quam sequens culpa coinquinat. Vulnus iteratum tardius sanatur, frequenter peccans et lugens ueniam uix meretur. Nichil prosunt lamenta, si replicantur peccata. Nichil ualet a malis ueniam poscere, et mala denuo iterare. Persiste ergo in confessione; esto in penitencia fortiter confirmatus; uitam bonam, quam cepisti, tenere non deseras; propositum bonae uitae conserua iugiter."

[C. XIII.] Likewise Gregory in the Pastoral Rule, [part III, admonition 31].

"Let those who lament the things admitted but nevertheless do not abandon them know to consider carefully that by weeping they vainly cleanse what by living wickedly they defile, since they wash themselves with tears for this purpose: that, clean, they may return to filth."

[C. XIII.] Item Gregorius in Pastorali. [part. III., admon. 31.]

"Qui admissa plangunt, nec tamen deserunt, considerare sollicite sciant, quia flendo inaniter mundant qui uiuendo se nequiter inquinant, cum idcirco lacrimis se lauant, ut mundi ad sordes redeant."

[C. XIV.] Likewise.

"One who laments what was admitted but nevertheless does not abandon it subjects oneself to a graver punishment, because one despises the very pardon that one could have obtained by weeping."

[C. XIV.] Item.

"Qui admissa plangit, nec tamen deserit, penae grauiori se subicit, quia ipsam, quam flendo inpetrare potuit ueniam, contempnit."

[C. XV.] Likewise.

"'Wash yourselves; be clean.' For after washing, whoever does not preserve the innocence of life after tears neglects to be clean. Therefore, those who do not cease to weep for things committed but again commit things to be wept for are washed but are not clean."

[C. XV.] Item.

"'Lauamini, mundi estote.' Post lauachrum enim mundus esse negligit quisquis post lacrimas uitae innocentiam non custodit. Et lauantur ergo, nec mundi sunt, qui conmissa flere non desinunt, sed rursus flenda conmittunt."

[C. XVI.] Likewise.

"The one who cleanses oneself from sin by tears is indeed washed from [contact with] a dead body; but one touches a dead body after washing who repeats faults after tears."

[C. XVI.] Item.

"Baptizatur quippe a mortuo qui mundat se fletibus a peccato; sed post baptisma mortuum tangit qui culpas post lacrimas repetit."

[C. XVII.] Likewise in the Moralia, [book I, final chapter].

"Indeed, a good thing is done in vain if it is abandoned before the end of life, because one who fails before reaching the goals also runs swiftly in vain."

PART II. GRATIAN. But the words of the definition are referred not to different times but to the same time: namely, that during the time when the person laments the evils committed, one does not commit what it is still necessary for one to lament. This is given to be understood from the subsequent words of the same authority, when it is said: "For one who so deplores some things that one nevertheless commits others either does not yet know how to perform penance or dissembles." Hence Augustine in the Enchiridion, [c. 70]:

[C. XVII.] Item in Moralibus. [lib. I. c. ult.]

"Incassum quippe bonum agitur, si ante terminum uitae deseratur, quia et frustra uelociter currit qui prius, quam ad metas ueniat, deficit." II. Pars. [Gratian.] Sed uerba diffinitionis non ad diuersa tempora, sed ad idem tempus referuntur, uidelicet, ut tempore, quo deflet mala, que conmisit, non conmittat quod adhuc eum flere oporteat. Quod ex subsequentibus uerbis eiusdem auctoritatis datur intelligi, dum dicitur: "Nam qui sic alia deplorat, ut tamen alia conmittat, adhuc penitenciam agere aut ignorat, aut dissimulat." Hinc Augustinus in Enchiridion: [c. 70.]

[C. XVIII.]

"Certainly care must be taken lest anyone think that those unspeakable crimes, such that those who perform them will not possess the kingdom of God, are to be perpetrated daily and redeemed daily by alms. For life is to be changed for the better, and God is to be propitiated through alms concerning past sins; he is not, as it were, to be purchased for this purpose: that it may always be permitted to commit them with impunity. For he gave no one license to sin, although in showing mercy he blots out sins already committed, if fitting satisfaction is not neglected."

[C. XVIII.]

"Sane cauendum est, ne quisquam existimet infanda illa crimina, qualia qui agunt regnum Dei non possidebunt, cottidie perpetranda, et elemosinis cottidie redimenda. In melius quippe est uita mutanda, et per elemosinas de peccatis preteritis est propiciandus Deus, non ad hoc emendus quodammodo, ut ea semper liceat inpune conmittere. Nemini enim dedit laxamentum peccandi, quamuis miserando deleat iam facta peccata, si non satisfactio congrua negligatur."

[C. XIX.] Likewise.

"One who wishes to give alms in an ordered manner ought to begin with oneself and first give it to oneself. For the work of truest mercy is called alms, concerning which it is said, 'Have mercy on your soul by pleasing God.' For this purpose we are reborn: that we may please God."

[C. XIX.] Item.

"Qui uult ordinate dare elemosinam, a se ipso debet incipere, et eam sibi primum dare. Est enim elemosina opus misericordiae uerissimae dictum de qua est: 'Miserere animae tuae placens Deo.' Propter hoc renascimur, ut Deo placeamus."

[C. XX.] Likewise John Chrysostom.

"For daily, brief, and light sins, without which this life is not lived, the daily prayer of the faithful makes satisfaction. For it belongs to those who have now been reborn to such a Father from water and the Holy Spirit to say, 'Our Father, who are in heaven.' This prayer utterly blots out the least daily sins; it also blots out those from which the life of the faithful, even if conducted criminally but changed for the better by repenting, withdraws, provided that, just as it is truthfully said, 'Forgive us our debts,' because things to be forgiven are not lacking, so it is truthfully said, 'As we also forgive our debtors'; that is, let what is said be done, because to forgive altogether those seeking pardon is itself also alms."

[C. XX.] Item Iohannes Crisostomus.

"De cottidianis, breuibus, leuibusque peccatis, sine quibus hec uita non ducitur, cottidiana oratio fidelium satisfacit. Eorum enim est dicere: 'Pater noster, qui es in celis,' qui iam patri taliter sunt regenerati ex aqua et Spiritu sancto. Delet omnino hec oratio minima cottidiana peccata, delet et illa, a quibus uita fidelium etiam scelerate gesta, sed penitendo in melius mutata discedit, sic, quemadmodum ueraciter dicitur: 'Dimitte nobis debita nostra,' quoniam non desunt que dimittuntur ita ueraciter dicatur: 'Sicut et nos dimittimus debitoribus nostris,' id est, fiat quod dicitur, quia et ipsa elemosina est ueniam petentibus omnino ignoscere."

[C. XXI.] Likewise Pope Pius, [letter I].

"It profits a person nothing to fast and pray and perform other works of religion unless the mind is recalled from iniquity."

PART III. GRATIAN. From the person of a penitent of this kind is also understood that saying of Smaragdus, "That person performs penance worthily, etc.," and that saying of Augustine, "Penitents, etc.," and that saying of Isidore, "One is a mocker and not a penitent," and that saying of Isaiah, "Wash yourselves; be clean." Likewise also that saying of the Soliloquies, "Penance is empty." Similarly also that saying of Gregory, "Those who lament the things admitted," and, "One is washed from a dead body." But that saying of Ambrose, "There are found, etc.," is understood to have been said not according to the general but according to the special custom of the church concerning solemn penance, which among some is not repeated after it has once been celebrated. Hence Augustine writes to Macedonius, [letter LIV]:

[C. XXI.] Item Pius Papa. [epist. I.]

"Nichil prodest homini ieiunare, et orare, et alia religionis opera agere, nisi mens ab iniquitate reuocetur."

III. Pars. [Gratian.] Ex persona huiuscemodi penitentis etiam illud Smaragdi intelligitur: "Ille penitenciam digne agit etc." et illud Augustini: "Penitentes etc.," et illud Ysidori: "Irrisor est, et non penitens," et illud Ysaiae: "Lauamini mundi estote." Item et illud Soliloquiorum: "Inanis est penitencia." Similiter et illud Gregorii: "Qui admissa plangunt," et: "Baptizatur a mortuo." Illud autem Ambrosii: "Repperiuntur etc.," non secundum generalem, sed secundum specialem consuetudinem ecclesiae de solempni penitencia dictum intelligitur, que apud quosdam semel celebrata non iteratur. Unde Augustinus scribit ad Macedonium: [ep. LIV.]

[C. XXII.]

"Although it was cautiously and salutarily provided that a place for that most humble penance be granted once in the church, lest a medicine made cheap be less useful to the sick—a medicine that is the more salutary, the less contemptible it is—nevertheless, who would dare to say to God, 'Why do you still spare again this person who, after the first penance, binds oneself again with the snares of iniquity?'"

PART IV. GRATIAN. By this authority that saying of Ambrose is both qualified and it is shown that pardon is given through the first penance to one who will sin again; otherwise God, who had not yet spared the person, would by no means spare that person again. "The satisfaction of penance" also, and, "Go, and now sin no more," have the same meaning as the definition. But what is said in the Book on Penance is to be understood concerning perfect penance. For just as one charity is beginning, another advancing, and another perfect, so one penance belongs to beginners, another to those advancing, and another to the perfect. But just as pardon of sins is given in baptism to charity, although not yet perfect, so that, although someone will afterward sin gravely, nevertheless that person is then understood to have been reborn not by water alone, as Jovinian handed down, but by water and the Spirit, as Jerome writes against him, so pardon is not denied to the penance of beginners. This penance can be called perfect according to one consideration, because it groans and grieves with the whole heart, although according to another consideration it can be called imperfect, because it will not endure to the end.

§ 1. According to the first manner of perfection is understood that saying of John Golden Mouth, "Perfect penance, etc." According to the second manner of perfection is understood that saying of Augustine, "Penance is vengeance always punishing in oneself what one grieves to have committed." But that saying, "If penance ends, nothing of pardon remains," can be understood in two ways. For if, according to the opinion of certain persons, remitted sins return, it is easy to understand that nothing of pardon remains, because the sins that were previously remitted are repeated again. For just as one who is manumitted from a just servitude into freedom is meanwhile truly free, although afterward recalled into servitude because of ingratitude, so also sins are truly remitted to the penitent, although because of ingratitude for pardon the person is afterward to be entangled in the same sins. But if remitted sins do not return, it is said that nothing of pardon remains because nothing remains to the person of the purity of life and hope of eternal beatitude that one obtained with pardon. For just as nothing of its beauty remains to silver that has been perfectly purified if it is defiled by subsequent rust—although it is stained not by the first filth but by the subsequent one—so nothing of pardon is said to remain to one expiated through penance when one is defiled nevertheless not by sins already blotted out, but by sins still to be expiated.

PART V. § 2. But that sins are remitted through penance not only once but very often is proved by the authority of many.

For Jerome says to Rusticus concerning penance:

> [C. XXII.]
>
> "Quamuis caute et salubriter prouisum sit, ut locus illius humillimae penitenciae semel in ecclesia concedatur, ne medicina uilis minus utilis esset egrotis, que tanto magis salubris est, quanto minus contemptibilis fuerit, quis tamen audeat Deo dicere: quare huic homini, qui post primam penitenciam rursus se laqueis iniquitatis obstringit, adhuc iterum parcis?" IV. Pars. [Gratian.] Hac auctoritate et illud Ambrosii determinatur, et iterum peccaturo per primam penitenciam uenia dari monstratur; alioquin nequaquam iterum parceret Deus, qui nec dum pepercisset. "Satisfactio quoque penitenciae," et: "Vade, et amplius noli peccare," eundem cum diffinitione intellectum habet. Illud autem, quod in libro de penitencia dicitur, de perfecta intelligendum est. Sicut enim karitas alia est incipiens, alia est proficiens, alia perfecta: sic et penitencia alia est incipientium, alia proficientium, alia perfectorum. Sicut autem karitati, licet nondum perfectae, in baptismo datur uenia peccatorum, ut quamuis postea grauiter aliquis sit peccaturus, tamen tunc intelligatur esse renatus, non aqua tantum (sicut Iouinianus tradidit), sed aqua et spiritu (sicut Ieronimus contra eum scribit): sic et incipientium penitenciae uenia non negatur, que quadam ratione perfecta dici potest, quia toto corde gemit et dolet, licet alia ratione potest dici inperfecta, quia non usque in finem duratura. §. 1. Secundum primum modum perfectionis intelligitur illud Iohannis Oris aurei: "Perfecta penitencia etc." Iuxta secundum modum perfectionis illud Augustini intelligitur: "Penitencia est uindicta semper puniens in se quod dolet conmisisse." Illud autem: "Si penitencia finitur, nichil de uenia relinquitur," dupliciter intelligi potest. Si enim iuxta quorumdam sentenciam peccata dimissa redeunt, facile est intelligere, nichil de uenia relinquitur, quoniam peccata, que prius erant dimissa, iterum replicantur. Sicut enim ille, qui ex iusta seruitute in libertatem manumittitur, interim uere liber est, quamuis ob ingratitudinem in seruitutem postea reuocetur: sic et peccata uere remittuntur penitenti, quamuis ob ingratitudinem ueniae eisdem postea sit inplicandus. Si autem peccata dimissa non redeunt, dicitur nichil relinqui de uenia, quia nichil sibi relinquitur de uitae mundicia, et spe eternae beatitudinis, quam cum uenia assecutus est. Sicut enim argento perfecte purgato nichil sui decoris relinquitur, si sequenti erugine fedatur, non tamen prima, sed subsequenti sordidatur: sic expiato per penitenciam nichil de uenia dicitur relinqui, cum tamen iam non deletis, sed adhuc expiandis coinquinetur. V. Pars. §. 2. Quod autem per penitenciam non semel tantum, sed sepissime peccata remittantur, multorum auctoritate probatur.
> Ait enim Ieronimus ad Rusticum de penitencia:

[C. XXIII.]

"'Seven times the just person falls and rises again.' If one falls, how is one just? If just, how does one fall? But one who always rises again through penance does not lose the name of just. And sins are pardoned not only to one transgressing seven times, but seventy-seven times, if the person is converted to penance. 'The one to whom more is remitted loves more.'"

GRATIAN. David also obtained through penance pardon at once for adultery and killing. Concerning his penance Jerome says in the same book:

> [C. XXIII.]
> "'Septies cadit iustus, et resurgit.' Si cadit, quomodo iustus? si iustus, quomodo cadit? sed iusti uocabulum non amittit qui per penitenciam semper resurgit. Et non solum septies, sed septuagies septies delinquenti, si conuertatur ad penitenciam, peccata donantur. 'Cui plus dimittitur, plus diligit.'" [Gratian.] Dauid quoque per penitenciam adulterii simul et homicidii ueniam inpetrauit. De cuius penitencia in eodem libro Ieronimus ait:

[C. XXIV.]

"The fiftieth psalm shows the whole penance of the sinner, when David entered to the wife of Uriah and, reproved by Nathan the prophet, replied, saying, 'I have sinned,' and immediately merited to hear, 'And the Lord has taken your sin away from you.' For he had joined killing to adultery and nevertheless, turned to tears, said, 'Have mercy on me, O God, according to your great mercy.' For a great sin needs great mercy. Hence he joins and says, 'Wash me greatly from my iniquity and cleanse me from my sin, because I know my iniquity, and my sin is always against me. Against you alone have I sinned'—for, being king, he feared no other—'and I have done evil before you, so that you may be justified in your words and prevail when you are judged.' For God enclosed all things under sin so that he might have mercy on all. And he advanced so far that one who had lately been a sinner and penitent passed into being a teacher: 'I shall teach the iniquitous your ways, and the impious will be converted to you.' For confession and beauty are before him, so that one who has confessed one's sins and said, 'My scars have become corrupted and putrefied,' may change the foulness of wounds into the beauty of health."

[C. XXIV.]

"Totam penitenciam peccatoris ostendit Psalmus quinquagesimus, quando ingressus est Dauid ad uxorem Uriae et a Nathan propheta correptus, respondit dicens: 'peccaui,' statimque meruit audire: 'et Dominus abstulit a te peccatum.' Adulterio enim iunxerat homicidium, et tamen conuersus ad lacrimas: 'Miserere,' ait, 'mei Deus, secundum magnam misericordiam tuam.' Magnum enim peccatum magna indiget misericordia. Unde iungit et dicit: 'Multum laua me ab iniquitate mea, et a peccato meo munda me, quoniam iniquitatem meam ego agnosco, et peccatum, meum contra me est semper. Tibi soli peccaui,' (rex enim, alium non timebat,) 'et malum coram te feci, ut iustificeris in sermonibus tuis, et uincas, cum iudicaris.' Conclusit enim Deus omnia sub peccato, ut omnibus misereatur. Tantumque profecit, ut dudum peccator et penitens transierit in magistrum: 'Docebo iniquos uias tuas, et inpii ad te conuertentur.' Confessio enim et pulchritudo coram eo, ut qui fuerit peccata sua confessus, et dixerit: Corruptae sunt et conputruerunt cicatrices meae, feditatem uulnerum in sanitatis decorem conmutet."

[C. XXV.] Likewise Ambrose in the Apology of David, [c. 2].

"That king, so great and powerful, did not permit the consciousness of the offense to remain with him even for a very small moment, but by prompt confession and immeasurable sorrow returned his sin to the Lord."

And below: § 1. "Finally, the sorrow of his innermost affection moves the Lord, so that Nathan said, 'Because you have repented, the Lord also has carried your sin away.' Accordingly, the swiftness of pardon declared that the king's penance was profound, since it carried away the offense of so great an error."

And below: § 2. "Holy persons who desire to complete the pious contest and run the course of salvation, if perchance they fall anywhere as human beings, more through the frailty of nature than through a lust for sinning, rise again more keenly to run, renewing greater contests through the goad of shame, so that the fall may be judged not only to have brought no impediment but even to have accumulated incentives of speed. Therefore, if the course of runners is not broken when some perchance have fallen, nor the contest of wrestlers, but their contests remain uninjured—and indeed very many have conquered with greater grace after one or another fall—how much more ought those who entered the struggle of piety not to be censured by the offense of one fall, since blessed is the one who was able to restore oneself after a fall?"

And below, [c. 4]: § 3. "That he sinned belongs to his condition; that he supplicated, to correction. The fall is common, but the confession exceptional. Accordingly, to have fallen into guilt belongs to nature; to have washed it away belongs to virtue."

And below, [c. 13]: § 4. "Sin is either pardoned, or blotted out, or covered. It is pardoned through grace, blotted out through the blood of the cross, covered through charity; similarly also iniquity, which is judged to be the disposition of an unjust mind, although John in his letter says that one who committed sin also committed iniquity. Sin is iniquity, because iniquity is in sin itself. Nevertheless, as it seems to us, sin is the work of iniquity, but iniquity is the worker of fault and offense. Therefore, it comes first that iniquity itself be blotted out, that the root and seedbed of sins be cut away. Accordingly, just as discipline entering the soul of a wise person takes away imprudence, and knowledge ignorance, so perfect virtue takes away iniquity, and the remission of sins blots out every sin."

> [C. XXV.] Item Ambrosius in Apologia Dauid. [c. 2.]
> "Ille rex tantus ac potens ne exiguo quidem momento manere penes se delicti passus est conscientiam, sed prematura confessione atque inmenso dolore reddidit peccatum suum Domino." Et infra: §. 1. "Denique Dominum dolor intimi mouet affectus, ut Nathan diceret: 'Quoniam penituit te, et Dominus transtulit peccatum tuum.' Maturitas itaque ueniae profundam regis fuisse penitenciam declarauit, que tanti erroris offensam transduxerit." Et infra: §. 2. "Sancti qui consummare pium certamen gestiunt, et currere cursum salutis, sicubi forte ut homines corruunt, naturae magis fragilitate quam peccandi libidine, acriores ad currendum resurgunt, pudoris stimulo maiora reparantes certamina, ut non solum nullum attulisse estimetur lapsus inpedimentum, sed etiam uelocitatis incentiua cumulasse. Ergo si currentium non soluitur cursus, cum aliqui forte ceciderint, non luctantium contentio, sed inoffensa manent certamina, quin etiam plerique post unum uel alterum lapsum gratia maiore uicerunt: quanto magis agonem pietatis ingressi non debent unius prolapsionis offensione censeri, cum beatus sit qui se potuit reparare post lapsum?" Et infra: [c. 4.] §. 3. "Quod peccauit, condicionis est; quod supplicauit, correctionis; lapsus conmunis, sed specialis confessio. Culpam itaque incidisse naturae est, diluisse uirtutis." Et infra: [c. 13.] §. 4. "Peccatum aut donatur, aut deletur, aut tegitur. Donatur per gratiam, deletur per sanguinem crucis, tegitur per karitatem; similiter et iniquitas, que estimatur habitudo mentis iniustae, licet Iohannes in epistola eum, qui fecerit peccatum, et iniquitatem fecisse dixerit. Peccatum est iniquitas, quia in peccato ipso iniquitas est. Tamen, ut nobis uidetur, peccatum opus est iniquitatis, iniquitas autem operatrix culpae atque delicti. Prius est ergo, ut ipsa iniquitas deleatur, excidatur radix et seminarium peccatorum. Itaque quemadmodum intrans in animam sapientis disciplina inprudentiam tollit, et scientia ignorantiam: sic perfecta uirtus iniquitatem, et remissio peccatorum delet omne peccatum."

[C. XXVI.] Likewise in the same work, [c. 7].

"But how wondrous is that, that he offered himself to the angel striking the people, saying, 'What has this flock done? Let your hand be against me and against the house of my father.' By this deed the one who might be judged unworthy of absolution was immediately judged worthy of sacrifice.

Nor is it remarkable if by such an offering of himself on behalf of the people he obtained pardon for his sin, since Moses, by offering himself to the Lord for the people's error, washed away sins. Therefore, did he cover his sins or not? But who would deny this, since the prophet himself taught that iniquities are remitted, sins are covered, and they are not imputed by the Lord? 'I acknowledge my offense, and I have not covered my injustice. I said, I shall pronounce my injustice to the Lord, and you remitted the impiety of my heart.' If he said, 'I shall pronounce,' and merited pardon before he pronounced, how much more, when he pronounced concerning himself, saying, 'I acknowledge my iniquity, and my offense is always before me,' was every sin remitted to him? Although Nathan the prophet replied specifically concerning this, 'And the Lord has carried away your sin.' Therefore he both merited remission of iniquity and covered his sins with charity and covered them with good works, and sin was not imputed to him, because in him there was no deceit of malice, but a fall of error. Finally, there was no heat of depravity but the shadow of a mystery; and nevertheless he confessed his offense, acknowledged his iniquity, saw the washing, both saw and believed; he loved much, so that he could cover any error with exceeding charity."

PART VI. GRATIAN. Behold: the multitude of the people laid low shows how gravely the one whose penance is commended here and to whom pardon is shown to have been given even through the prophet afterward transgressed. Ahab also, as Jerome writes against Jovinian, a most impious king, obtained by fasting and sackcloth that he might escape God's sentence and that the overthrow of his house might be deferred to his descendants. Concerning him the same Jerome writes to the same Rusticus, saying:

> [C. XXVI.] Item in eodem. [c. 7.]
> "Illud uero quam ammirabile est, quod angelo ferienti plebem se obtulit, dicens: 'Grex iste quid fecit? fiat manus tua in me, et in domum patris mei.' Quo facto statim sacrificio dignus iudicatus est qui absolutione estimabitur indignus. Nec mirum, si tali sua oblatione pro populo peccati sui adeptus est ueniam, cum Moyses, offerendo se Domino pro plebis errore peccata diluerit. Texit igitur peccata sua, an non? Sed quis hoc neget cum ipse Propheta docuerit, quod remittantur iniquitates, tegantur peccata, non inputentur a Domino? 'Delictum meum agnosco, et iniusticiam meam non operui. Dixi, pronunciabo iniusticiam meam Domino, et tu dimisisti inpietatem cordis mei.' Si dixit: 'pronunciabo,' et ueniam meruit ante, quam pronunciaret; quanto magis, ubi de se pronunciauit dicens: 'iniquitatem meam ego agnosco et delictum meum coram me est semper,' remissum est ei omne peccatum? licet specialiter de hoc Nathan propheta responderit: 'Et Dominus transtulit peccatum tuum.' Ergo et remissionem meruit iniquitatis, et texit karitate atque operuit peccata sua et texit operibus bonis, nec inputatum est ei peccatum, quia non fuit in eo dolus maliciae, sed lapsus erroris; denique non fuit inprobitatis estus, sed umbra misterii, et tamen confessus est delictum suum, agnouit iniquitatem, uidit lauacrum, et uidit, et credidit; dilexit multum, ut nimia karitate tegere quemuis posset errorem." VI. Pars. [Gratian.] Ecce, cuius penitencia hic conmendatur, cui uenia etiam per prophetam data monstratur, quam grauiter postea deliquerit, populi multitudo prostrata ostendit. Achab quoque (ut Ieronimus contra Iouinianum scribit) rex inpiissimus, ut sentenciam Dei subterfugeret, et euersio domus eius differretur in posteros, ieiunio inpetrauit et sacco. De quo ad eundem Rusticum scribit idem Ieronimus, dicens:

[C. XXVII.]

"Ahab, a most impious king, possessed Naboth's vineyard by blood; and when, together with Jezebel, joined to him not so much in marriage as in cruelty, he is corrected by Elijah's rebuke, the Lord says these things: ‘You have killed and possessed,’ and again, ‘In the place where the dogs licked Naboth’s blood, there they will lick your blood. And the dogs will eat Jezebel before the walls of Jezreel.’ When Ahab had heard this, he tore his garments, placed sackcloth over his flesh, fasted, and slept in haircloth. And the word of the Lord came to Elijah, saying, ‘Because Ahab has reverenced my face, I shall not bring evil in his days.’ Ahab and Jezebel committed one crime; nevertheless, both the punishment of Ahab, converted to penance, is deferred to his descendants, and Jezebel, persevering in crime, is condemned by a present judgment.”

[C. XXVII.]

"Achab rex inpiissimus uineam Nabuthae cruore possedit, et, cum Iezabel, non tam coniugio sibi quam crudelitate coniuncta, Helyae increpatione corrigitur, hec dicit Dominus: 'Occidisti et possedisti,' et iterum: 'In loco, in quo linxerunt canes sanguinem Nabuthae, ibi lingent sanguinem tuum. Et Iezabel canes comedent ante muros Iezrahel. Quod cum audisset Achab, scidit uestimenta sua, et posuit saccum super carnem suam, ieiunauitque et dormiuit in cilicio. Factusque est sermo Domini ad Helyam, dicens: Quoniam reueritus est faciem meam Achab, non inducam malum in diebus eius.' Unum scelus Achab et Iezabel conmiserunt; tamen et conuerso ad penitenciam Achab pena differtur in posteros, et Iezabel in scelere perseuerans presenti condempnatur iudicio."

[C. XXVIII.]

Likewise John Chrysostom on the restoration of the fallen, [letter V to the fallen Theodore]. “Such, believe me, such is God’s piety toward human beings; such piety never spurns penance if it is offered to him sincerely and simply. Even if someone reaches the summit of evils and nevertheless afterward wishes to return to the way of virtue, he receives the person and willingly embraces that person; he does all things so as to recall the person to the former state. And what is still more excellent and eminent, even if someone has not been able to complete the whole order of making satisfaction, he nevertheless does not spurn the least penance, however brief a time it was performed. He receives even that penance and does not permit the reward of even a very small conversion to be lost. For Isaiah indicates this to me, where he says certain such things concerning the people of the Jews: ‘Because of sin I troubled him a little and struck him, and turned my face away from him; and he was saddened and walked sorrowfully, and I healed him and consoled him.’ But that impious king will also give us a more evident testimony. He sought the prey of his cupidity through his wife’s wickedness, but, disturbed by the enormity of the crime itself, he repented and, clothed in sackcloth, wept for his deed. And he so provoked the Lord’s mercy toward himself that it absolved him from all sins. For thus God says to Elijah, ‘Have you seen how Ahab was pierced with compunction before my face? And because he wept in my sight, I shall not bring evils in his days.’”

[C. XXVIII.]

Item Iohannes Crisostomus de reparatione lapsi. [epist. V. ad Theodorum lapsum.] "Talis, michi crede, talis est erga homines pietas Dei; talis nunquam spernit penitenciam, si ei sincere et simpliciter offeratur. Etiam si ad summum quis perueniat malorum, et inde tamen reuerti uelit ad uirtutis uiam, suscipit, libenter amplectitur; facit omnia, quatinus ad priorem reuocet statum, quodque est adhuc prestantius et eminentius, etiamsi non potuerit quis explere omnem satisfaciendi ordinem, quantulamcumque tamen et quamlibet breui tempore gestam non respuit penitenciam; suscipit etiam ipsam, nec patitur quamuis exiguae conuersionis perdere mercedem. Hoc enim michi indicat Ysaias, ubi de populo Iudeorum talia quedam dicit: 'Propter peccatum modice conturbaui eum, et percussi eum, et auerti faciem meam ab eo; et contristatus est, et ambulauit tristis, et sanaui eum, et consolatus sum eum.' Euidentius autem nobis testimonium dabit etiam rex ille inpius, qui cupiditatis suae quidem predam uxoris nequicia quesiuit, sed perturbatus ipsius sceleris inmanitate penituit, et cilicio circumdatus facinus suum fleuit, atque erga se ita Domini misericordiam prouocauit, ut a cunctis absolueret eum peccatis. Sic enim Deus ait ad Helyam: 'Vidisti, quomodo conpunctus est Achab a facie mea? et quia fleuit in conspectu meo, non inducam mala in diebus eius.'"

[C. XXIX.] Likewise Gregory in homily X on Ezekiel, [at the end].

"Just as the iniquitous King Ahab, reproved by the prophet, when he heard the divine sentence against himself, became terrified and was seized by great sorrow, so that the Lord said to his prophet, 'Have you not seen Ahab humbled before me? Therefore, because he was humbled for my sake, I shall not bring evil in his days.' In these words of the Lord it must be weighed how the sorrow of bitterness pleases him in his elect, who fear to lose God, if penance thus pleased him even in a reprobate who feared to lose the present world; or how pleasing to him is voluntary affliction for faults in those who please him, if this pleased him for a time even in one who displeased him."

GRATIAN. The Ninevites also, whom the Lord commends in the Gospel, performed penance at Jonah's preaching and, obtaining indulgence from the Lord's mercy, merited to escape the destruction of the overthrow. But the text of the Book of Kings declares what sort of life Ahab lived after receiving pardon. Concerning him Ambrose also writes that his wife Jezebel, by whose judgment he was inflamed, turned his heart, made him execrable by excessive sacrileges, and revoked this disposition of his penance. But concerning the Ninevites Jerome writes at the beginning of Jonah:

[C. XXIX.] Item Gregorius in omelia X. super Ezechielem. [in extremo.]

"Sicut Achab rex iniquus a propheta reprehensus, cum contra se diuinam sententiam audisset, pertimuit, in magno merore deprehensus est, ita ut Prophetae suo Dominus diceret: 'Nonne uidisti humiliatum Achab coram me? Quia ergo humiliatus est mei causa, non inducam malum in diebus eius.' In quibus Domini uerbis pensandum est, quomodo ei in electis suis meror amaritudinis placeat, qui amittere timent Deum si sic ei et in reprobo penitencia placuit, qui timebat perdere presens seculum; aut quomodo ei grata sit spontanea afflictio pro culpis in eis, qui placent, si hec ad tempus placuit et in illo, qui displicebat." [Gratian.] Niniuitae quoque, quos Dominus in euangelio conmendat, penitenciam egerunt in predicatione Ionae, et ex misericordia Domini indulgentiam consecuti subuersionis interitum subterfugere meruerunt. Sed qualis Achab post acceptam ueniam uixerit, textus libri Regum declarat, de quo etiam scribit Ambrosius, quod Iezabel uxor eius, cuius inflammabatur arbitrio, cor eius conuertit, et nimiis sacrilegiis execrabilem fecit, et hunc penitenciae eius affectum reuocauit. De Niniuitis autem in principio Ionae scribit Ieronimus

[C. XXX.]

"As Herodotus says, Nineveh was overthrown by the king of the Medes while Josiah was reigning among the Hebrews. Hence it is clear that, when Jonah preached, it merited pardon through penance, but because it afterward returned to its vomit, it was overthrown by God's wrath."

[C. XXX.]

"Sicut ait Herodotus, Niniue a Rege Medorum subuersa est, regnante apud Ebreos Iosia. Unde patet, illam predicante Iona ex penitencia ueniam meruisse, sed quia post ad uomitum rediit, ex ira Dei fuisse subuersam."

[C. XXXI.] Likewise at the beginning of Nahum.

"The tradition of the Hebrews confirms that the prophet Nahum existed before the coming of the king of the Assyrians who transferred the people of Israel captive into his own regions. Indeed, at the end of this reading the same prophet is shown to announce the coming of the aforesaid king. But when the inhabitants of Nineveh, as Jonah preached the destruction of the city, performed penance for their sins and impiety so that they would not sustain the destruction announced by divine wrath, after receiving God's mercy they entangled themselves in graver crimes. For this reason the aforesaid prophet, filled with the Holy Spirit and announcing God's judgment, spoke thus: 'God is jealous and the Lord avenges.'"

PART VII. GRATIAN. Likewise, that pardon is frequently granted to one frequently repenting is testified by Augustine in the Book on Penance, writing against certain heretics who said that penance was useful only once to those sinning after baptism. Against them Augustine writes, saying:

> [C. XXXI.] Item in principio Naum.
> "Naum prophetam ante aduentum regis Assyriorum, qui populum Israel captiuum in suas regiones transtulerat, fuisse, Ebreorum traditio confirmat. Siquidem in fine huius lectionis predicti regis aduentum idem Propheta annunciare monstratur. Sed cum habitatores Niniuae, Iona interitum ciuitatis predicante, ne diuina ira denunciatum interitum sustinerent, peccatorum et inpietatis penitenciam egissent, accepta Dei misericordia grauioribus se criminibus inplicuerunt. Qua de causa memoratus Propheta, Spiritu sancto plenus iudicium Dei annuncians, ita est elocutus: 'Deus zelans et ulciscens Dominus.'" VII. Pars. [Gratian.] Item, quod frequenter penitenti uenia frequenter prestetur, testatur Augustinus in libro de penitencia scribens contra quosdam hereticos, qui peccantibus post baptismum semel tantum dicebant utilem esse penitenciam, contra quos scribit Augustinus dicens:

[C. XXXII.]

"Still the faithless press their case, because they are wise beyond what is proper—not sober, but exceeding the measure. For they say: Even if penance avails those who sin once after baptism, nevertheless repeated penance will not profit those who sin frequently; otherwise remission would be an incitement to sin. For they say: Who would not always sin if one could always return? For they say that God is an inciter of evil if he always comes to the aid of penitents, and that sins even please him, since grace is always ready for them. But they err; indeed, it is very evident that sins displease the one who is always ready to destroy them. For if he loved them, he would not always destroy them in this way, but would preserve them and cherish them as his gifts. He always destroys the sins he finds, lest what he created be dissolved, lest what he loved be corrupted. These hypocrites take occasion from the Lord's deeds. Whom did he enlighten twice? Whom did he cleanse from leprosy twice? Whom did he raise from the dead twice? Not Lazarus, whom he loved; not the widow's son, whom he pitied and restored to his mother. He is not read to have received the prodigal son twice, nor to have freed Abraham's daughter from a demon twice. He repeated the deed in no person, teaching, as they say, that a remedy is not given frequently by the Lord. He said to many, 'Go, and now sin no more, lest something worse happen to you,' promising punishment, not further pardon.

§ 1. But the fact that he enlightened many blind persons and at different times, and strengthened many weak persons, shows that in those different persons the same sins are frequently remitted, so that the leper whom he first healed he enlightened as a blind person at another time. For this reason he healed so many lame, blind, and withered persons: so that the frequent sinner may not despair.

For this reason it is not written that anyone was healed more than once: so that each person may fear to be joined to sin. Still today we see in the church those frequently feverish, frequently weak, frequently captured by sufferings, frequently freed, so that it may appear that the work of the one showing mercy occurs as many times as the confession of the penitent occurs. For how would he frequently heal the body, which is more vile and more unlike him, and not as often free the soul, which is more worthy and redeemed? He calls himself a physician, suitable not for the healthy but for those who are ill. But what sort of physician is this who would not know how to cure a repeated evil? For it belongs to physicians to cure one sick a hundred times a hundred times. He would be less than the others if he did not know things possible to others. He is mindful of himself who promised, 'I do not desire the death of the sinner, but that the person be converted and live.' For what sinner does he exclude? He who promised indulgence to all declares it by other promises. 'Whoever confesses me before human beings'—everyone, however great and however frequent a sinner, of whatever order, even if that person were a priest—'I also shall confess that person.' For 'whoever invokes the name of the Lord'—that is, according to the fact that he is named Lord, namely, whoever invokes him over oneself by serving and not contradicting him, as perhaps one often did—'everyone'—that is, whoever that sinner may be—'will be saved.' For this promiser has satisfied every soul with good things, even those sitting in darkness and the shadow of death, excepting no soul.

§ 2. That disciple understood this master who wished to correct the Corinthians through his letters and, as he himself testifies, corrected them three times in writing. For it was necessary that, as often as he saw them fall, so often he should help them rise. For he was mindful of the one who had said, 'The sins of those whose sins you remit are remitted to them.' But we know that both the first Fathers and, in every age, the church of God always remit sins up to seventy-seven times—which means always. These persons attempt to take this power away from the church. For the church that confesses that it sins ought to believe thus. For they deny that truth is in those seduced persons who dare to boast that they are without sin. For we all offend in many things, nor can an infant of one day be without sin upon earth. Therefore one who ever denies indulgence to penitents must be cast out of the church. For that person does not inquire what the Apostle meant when he said, 'I am conscious of nothing in myself, but I am not justified in this.' Perceiving that sins are accustomed to befall even the just, he did not affirm that he was without sin, although he knew that he had been joined to Christ by the indissoluble bond of charity. For unless he knew that the just frequently come to pardon, how would he doubt that he sinned, when he knew that he possessed the Spirit of God and served him with the purest intention? For why would the Lord have washed Peter's feet and taught the church this same thing unless, because the offense is daily, it is fitting that remission also be daily? Why would he have taught those praying to say, 'Forgive us our debts,' unless he himself persevered as merciful, who does not wish us to cease from this petition?"

[C. XXXII.]

"Adhuc instant perfidi, quoniam sapiunt plus quam oportet, non sobrii, sed excedentes mensuram. Dicunt enim: etsi semel peccantibus post baptismum ualeat penitencia, non tamen sepe peccantibus proderit iterata; alioquin remissio ad peccatum esset incitatio. Dicunt enim: quis non semper peccaret, si redire semper posset? Dicunt enim Deum incitatorem mali, si semper penitentibus subuenit, et etiam ei placere peccata, quibus semper presto est gratia. Errant autem, immo multum constat ei displicere peccata, qui semper presto est ea destruere. Si enim ea amaret, non ita semper destrueret, sed conseruaret, atque ut sua munera foueret. Semper destruit peccata, que inuenit, ne soluatur quod creauit, ne corrumpatur quod amauit. Sumunt ypocritae occasionem isti ex factis Domini. Quem enim bis illuminauit? quem leprosum bis mundauit? quem mortuum bis suscitauit? non Lazarum, quem dilexit; non filium uiduae, quem misertus matri reddidit; non filium dissipatorem legitur bis suscepisse; non filiam Abrahae bis a demonio liberasse. In nulla persona iterauit factum, docens, ut aiunt, non sepe a Domino fieri remedium. Dixit multis: 'Vade, et amplius noli peccare, ne deterius tibi aliquid contingat,' promittens penam, non amplius ueniam. §. 1. Quod autem multos cecos et in diuerso tempore illuminauit, et multos debiles confortauit, ostendit in diuersis illis eadem sepe peccata dimitti, ut quem prius sanauit leprosum alio tempore illuminauit cecum. Ideo enim tot sanauit claudos, cecos, et aridos, ne desperet sepe peccator; ideo non scribitur aliquem nisi semel sanatum, ut quisque timeat iungi peccato. Videmus adhuc cottidie in ecclesia sepe febricitantes, sepe languidos, sepe passionibus captos sepe liberari, ut appareat tociens opus miserentis, quociens confessio fit penitentis. Quomodo enim corpus, quod uilius est et ab ipso dissimilius, sepe sanaret, et animam digniorem et redemptam tociens non liberaret? Medicum se uocat, et non sanis, sed male habentibus oportunum. Sed qualis hic medicus, qui malum iteratum nesciret curare? Medicorum enim est centies infirmum centies curare. Qui ceteris minor esset, si aliis possibilia ignoraret, memor est sui, qui promisit: 'Nolo mortem peccatoris, sed ut conuertatur et uiuat.' Quem enim peccatorem excludit? Qui omnibus promisit indulgentiam, aliis promissionibus declarat. 'Qui me confessus fuerit coram hominibus,' omnis quantumcumque et quociens peccator, cuiuscumque ordinis, etiamsi fuerit sacerdos, 'confitebor et ego eum.' Nam 'qui inuocauerit nomen Domini,' (id est secundum quod nominatur Dominus, id est qui inuocauerit eum ad se seruiendo, et non contradicendo, ut forsitan sepe fecit,) 'omnis' (id est quicumque sit ille peccator,) 'saluus erit.' Omnem enim animam iste promissor saturauit bonis, etiam sedentes in tenebris et umbra mortis, nullam excipiens animam. §. 2. Hunc magistrum intellexit discipulus ille, qui Chorinthios per epistolas suas corrigere uoluit, et, ut ipse testatur, ter in litteris eos correxit. Oportebat enim, ut quociens uidebat eos cadere, tociens iuuaret surgere. Memor enim erat illius, qui dixerat: 'Quorum remiseritis peccata, remittuntur eis.' Scimus autem, et primos patres, et in omni tempore ecclesiam Dei semper usque in septuagies septies (quod est semper) peccata remittere. Quam potestatem isti ab ecclesia auferre conantur. Oportet enim ecclesiam sic credere, que confitetur se peccare. Negant enim ueritatem seductis esse, qui se absque peccato audent iactare. In multis enim offendimus omnes, nec infans unius diei absque peccato super terram esse potest. Quapropter eliminandus est ab ecclesia, qui umquam penitentibus negat indulgentiam. Non enim inquirit quid Apostolus senserit, qui dixit: 'Nichil mihi conscius sum, sed non in hoc iustificatus sum.' Sentiens etiam iustis peccata solere contingere, non se confirmabat absque peccato, qui se cognouit indissolubili uinculo karitatis coniunctum Christo. Nisi enim sciret, iustos sepe uenire ad ueniam, quomodo dubitaret, se peccare, qui se sciebat spiritum Dei habere, et intentione mundissima ei seruire? Cur enim Dominus pedes lauisset Petri, et ecclesiam hoc idem docuisset, nisi (quoniam cottidiana est offensio) oportet, ut cottidiana sit remissio? Cur docuisset orantes dicere: 'Dimitte nobis debita nostra,' nisi ipse misericors perseueraret, qui nos ab hac petitione non uult deficere?"

[C. XXXIII.] Likewise Augustine to Macedonius.

[Letter LIV.] "But human iniquity sometimes advances so far that even after penance has been performed, after reconciliation to the altar, persons commit either similar or graver things. And nevertheless God causes his sun to rise even upon such persons and grants the most abundant gifts of life and health no less than he had granted before. And although that place of penance is not granted to them in the church, nevertheless God does not forget his patience toward them. If anyone from their number should say to us, 'Tell me whether it profits me at all toward the future life if in this life I have despised the allurements of most enticing pleasure; if by repenting I have tormented myself more vehemently than before; if I have groaned more pitiably; if I have wept more abundantly; if I have lived better; if I have supported the poor more generously; if I have blazed more ardently with charity, which covers a multitude of sins'—who among us is so foolish as to say to this person, 'These things will profit you nothing hereafter; go, at least enjoy the sweetness of this life'? May God avert so empty and sacrilegious a madness."

PART VIII. GRATIAN. Whether anyone says that only the first penance after baptism is useful, not a subsequent one, or anyone contends that pardon is given only to the last penance, not to a preceding one, nevertheless the person is always opposed to the authority that repeatedly promises pardon to one repenting. But what is the true penance to which pardon is never denied, and what is the false penance to which indulgence is never promised, Adamantius and Hesychius testify upon Leviticus. Adamantius:

> [C. XXXIII.] Item Augustinus ad Macedonium.
> [epist. LIV.] "In tantum autem hominum iniquitas aliquando progreditur, ut etiam post actam penitenciam, post altaris reconciliationem, uel similia uel grauiora conmittant. Et tamen facit Deus etiam super tales oriri solem suum, nec minus tribuit, quam ante tribuerat, largissima munera uitae ac salutis; et quamuis eis in ecclesia locus ille penitenciae non concedatur, Deus tamen super eos patienciae suae non obliuiscitur. Ex quorum numero si quis nobis dicat dicite, utrum michi aliquid prosit ad uitam futuram, si in ista uita illecebrosissimae uoluptatis blandimenta contempsero, si me penitendo uehementius quam prius excruciauero, si miserabilius ingemuero, si fleuero uberius, si uixero melius, si pauperes sustentauero largius, si karitate, que operit multitudinem peccatorum, flagrauero ardentius: quis nostrum ita desipit, ut huic homini dicat: Nichil tibi ista in posterum proderunt; uade, saltim huius uitae suauitate fruere? Auertat Deus tam inanem sacrilegamque dementiam." VIII. Pars. [Gratian.] Siue autem quis dicat, primam penitenciam tantum post baptismum utilem esse, non sequentem, siue quis contendat, ultimae tantum ueniam dari, non precedenti, semper tamen auctoritati aduersatur, que sepissime penitenti ueniam repromittit. Que autem sit uera penitencia, cui numquam uenia negatur, et que sit falsa, cui numquam indulgentia promittitur, Adamantius et Esitius super Leuiticum testantur. Adamantius:

[C. XXXIV.]

"'Among these things, the goat that had been offered, etc.' Not to sin belongs to God alone; to amend belongs to the wise. But you will rarely find one who corrects oneself. Rare is confession of sin, rare is penance. Nature and shame resist, because all flesh is liable to fault, and each person is ashamed to confess sin while considering present things more than future ones. Moses wishes to find a soul empty of sin, so that it may lay aside the spoils of error and, naked of fault, depart without shame for itself. But an irrational impulse forestalls it, and the flame of a most rapid movement consumes the soul and burns up its innocence. For present things outweigh future ones, pleasant things serious ones, joyful things sorrowful ones, and things most hasty those that are slower. For iniquity is swift, because it supplies an occasion for doing harm; virtue is slow and delaying: before it begins, it judges what is becoming and what honorable; iniquity rushes all things headlong. Penance, therefore, is sluggish and ashamed, because it is weighed down by shame concerning present things. For it attends only to future things, whose hope is late and whose fruit slower.

"Meanwhile shamelessness runs ahead, and through hope of present things penance is shut out, and its disposition is burned up and abolished. The law seeks it and does not find it, for it has been burned up by the heat and smoke of iniquity. Hence it grows angry and says that penance ought to have been eaten in the Holy of Holies; it reproaches the priests as though they were negligent.

§ 1. "Aaron replies that priestly judgment ought to be provident and that this duty ought not readily to be entrusted to an unhealthy conscience, lest the later error become worse than the first. For either oil or wine is easily corrupted in a fetid vessel. But how could sin be burned away where there was strange fire, and in the sight of the Lord, to whom all things lie open? It is as though one who keeps injustice shut within the heart and declares oneself to perform penance does not please God. Strange fire is lust, avarice, and every depraved cupidity. This fire burns up; it does not cleanse. For if those in whom it exists make an offering in the sight of the Lord, heavenly fire consumes them, just as it consumed Nadab and Abihu together with the things that had been offered for sin.

§ 2. "Therefore, one who wishes to be cleansed should remove the strange fire and offer oneself to that fire which burns away the fault, not the human being. This fire dried up the flowing blood of the woman with the hemorrhage; this fire dried up the fault of the thief. For it is a consuming fire; it heals those who confess simply and purely. Judas said, 'I have sinned by betraying just blood'; but he had a strange fire in his breast, by whose kindling he ran to the noose. He was unworthy of the remedy, because he did not repent with a pure mind. Therefore the priests do not take away the fault of one who deceitfully offers oneself, nor can they feast in that person, whose food is the remission of sins. Hence the true priest says, 'My food is that I do the will of my Father,' that is, that sinners who are converted and penitent may be saved. A sacrifice is not acceptable to God unless it is true and sincere."

[C. XXXIV.]

"'Inter hec hyrcum, qui oblatus fuerat, etc.' Non peccare solius Dei est: emendare sapientis. Sed raro inuenias qui se corrigat. Rara confessio peccati, rara penitencia. Repugnat natura et uerecundia, quia obnoxia est culpae omnis caro, et quisque erubescit peccatum confiteri, dum magis presentia cogitat quam futura. Vult Moyses peccati uacuam reperire animam, ut exuuias erroris deponat, et culpae nuda sine pudore sui discedat. Sed irrationabilis inpetus preuenit, et flamma celerrimi motus animam depascitur, exurit eius innocentiam. preponderant enim futuris presentia, seriis iocunda, et tristibus leta, et tardioribus prepropera. Velox enim iniquitas, que ad nocendum occasionem suggerit; lenta uirtus et cunctatrix ante iudicat, quam incipit, quid decorum, quid honestum; iniquitas omnia precipitat. Pigra ergo et uerecunda penitencia, quia presentium pudore premitur. Solis enim intendit futuris, quorum spes sera, tardior fructus.

Interim precurrit inpudentia, et spe presentium penitencia excluditur, et affectus eius exuritur et aboletur. Querit eam lex, et non inuenit, conbusta est enim feruore et fumo iniquitatis. Inde irascitur, et dicit, deuorandam fuisse penitenciam in sanctis sanctorum; sacerdotes quasi segnes increpat. §. 1. Respondet Aaron, prouidum esse debere sacerdotale iudicium, nec male sanae conscientiae facile esse credendum id muneris, ne fiat error deterior priore. Vase enim fetido uel oleum uel uinum facile corrumpitur. Quomodo autem poterat, ubi ignis alienus erat, peccatum exuri et in conspectu Domini, cui cuncta sunt aperta? quasi non conplacet Deo qui iniusticiam corde inclusam tenet, et se penitenciam agere perhibet. Ignis alienus libido, auaricia, et omnis cupiditas praua. Hic ignis exurit, non mundat. In quibus enim est, si offerant in conspectu Domini, ignis eos celestis absumit, sicut Nadab et Abiud cum his, que pro peccato fuerant oblata. §. 2. Qui ergo uult mundari ignem alienum remoueat, et illi igni se offerat, qui culpam exurit, non hominem. Hic ignis siccauit emoroissae sanguinem profluentem; hic siccauit culpam latronis. Ignis enim consumens est; sanat simpliciter et pure confitentes. Iudas: 'Peccaui,' inquit, 'tradens sanguinem iustum;' sed in pectore habuit ignem alienum, quo inflammante cucurrit ad laqueum. Indignus autem remedio fuit, quia non pura mente penituit. Culpam ergo eius non auferunt sacerdotes, qui dolose offert se, nec in eo possunt epulari, quorum cibus est peccatorum remissio. Unde uerus sacerdos ait: 'Meus cibus est, ut faciam uoluntatem patris mei,' id est, ut peccatores conuersi et penitentes saluentur. Non est acceptum Deo sacrificium, nisi uerum et sincerum."

[C. XXXV.] Likewise Hesychius, [book II, on Leviticus c. 10].

"'Among these things, the goat that is offered, etc.' Because every sin is destroyed through penance, and those who committed the aforesaid sin of foreign teaching and of blasphemy were not saved, the Lawgiver explains the cause of their death: 'Among these things, the goat that had been offered, etc.' For the sons of Aaron did not eat in the holy place what was for sin; that is, they did not cause penance for the sin committed to be performed in the church—those to whom this was commanded, whom Christ established as his vicars in the church. But he offered in the holy place, that is, in heaven, in the sight of the Father, the blood of his offering, which was offered for our blood. This sacrifice, however, ought to be eaten in the holy place, namely in the church, for the propitiation of sins. Hence he adds, 'as it was commanded to me': thus I commanded. Moses, therefore, bears the person of Christ. He found it burned up because they had sinned against the Holy Spirit; the offering for penance was taken away by the intelligible fire of the Holy Spirit. For those who sin voluntarily, no sacrifice for sin remains. For just as true penance merits pardon, so feigned penance provokes God, because the Holy Spirit of discipline will flee what is feigned. The holy Fathers, moreover, said that this is the unforgivable sin and blasphemy against the Holy Spirit: to persevere in crimes until the end of life and to distrust the power and mercy of God and of the Redeemer."

[C. XXXV.] Item Esitius. [lib. II. ad c. 10. Leuitici]

"'Inter hec hyrcum, qui offertur etc.' Quia omne peccatum per penitenciam deletur, et qui predictum peccatum alterius doctrinae et blasphemiae conmiserunt saluati non sunt, causam mortis eorum Legislator exponit: 'Inter hec hyrcum, qui oblatus fuerat etc.' Quia scilicet non comederunt filii Aaron quod pro peccato erat in loco sancto, id est, penitenciam conmissi peccati in ecclesia peragi non fecerunt, quibus hoc preceptum est, quos Christus uicarios suos in ecclesia constituit. Ipse autem oblationis suae sanguinem, que pro nostro sanguine oblata est, in sanctum, id est in celum, in conspectu patris obtulit. Debet autem comedi hoc sacrificium in loco sancto, scilicet in ecclesia, in propitiationem peccatorum. Unde addit: 'quemadmodum preceptum est michi,' sic precepi. Moyses ergo gerit personam Christi. Exustum repperit, quia in Spiritum sanctum peccauerant; ab intelligibili igne Spiritus sancti oblatio pro penitencia ablata est. Voluntarie peccantibus non relinquitur hostia pro peccato. Nam sicut uera penitencia ueniam promeretur, ita simulata irritat Deum, quia Spiritus sanctus disciplinae effugiet fictum. Hoc autem sancti Patres irremissibile peccatum et blasphemiam in Spiritum sanctum dixerunt, in sceleribus usque ad finem uitae perseuerare, de potentia et misericordia Dei et redemptoris diffidere."

[C. XXXVI.] Likewise John Chrysostom, [homily XXXI], on [c. 12 of] the Letter to the Hebrews.

"Judas repented, but badly; for he hanged himself with a noose. Esau also repented; rather, the latter did not repent. For the tears were not those of penance, but of a violent spirit and infernal indignation. This is disclosed by his works.

§ 1. "Therefore, let us not deny our sins, nor let shamelessness make us hard. Let us punish ourselves voluntarily, lest we pay penalties involuntarily. Cain heard from God, 'Where is your brother Abel?' and said, 'I do not know; am I my brother's keeper?' You see how he committed a still greater sin by this. Did not his father act similarly? For when he too heard, 'Adam, where are you?' he said, 'I heard your voice, Lord, and was afraid because I am naked, and I hid myself.' It is a great thing for someone to acknowledge one's sins and perseveringly to retain their memory. No remedy for offenses is found to be such as the continual memory of them."

[C. XXXVI.] Item Iohannes Os aureum [hom. XXXI.] in [c. 12.] epistola ad Ebreos.

"Iudas penituit, sed male; laqueo namque se suspendit; penituit etiam Esau, magis iste neque penituit. Lacrimae quippe non erant penitenciae, sed animi uiolenti, et indignationis infernae. Quod eius operibus aperitur. §. 1. Non igitur negemus peccata nostra, neque nos inpudentia duros efficiat. Sponte nostra puniamus, ne pendamus non sponte supplicia. Audiuit Cayn a Deo: 'Ubi est Abel frater tuus?' et dixit: 'Nescio, numquid custos fratris mei sum?' Vides, quomodo ex hoc peccatum amplius operatus est; nonne et pater eius similiter? Audiens enim et ipse: 'Adam ubi es?' dixit: 'Vocem tuam audiui Domine, et timui, quoniam nudus sum, et abscondi me.' Magnum est, ut quis peccata sua agnoscat, et memoriam eorum perseueranter retineat. Nullum inuenitur delictorum tale remedium, sicut eorum continuata memoria."

[C. XXXVII.] Likewise Ambrose in Book II on Penance, [c. 11].

"'On the willows,' he says, 'in its midst we hung up our instruments.' How shall we sing the Lord's song in a foreign land? For if the flesh resists the mind and is not subjected to the governance of the soul and the command of the mind, it is a foreign land, which is not subdued by the cultivator's exercise. It cannot bring forth the fruit of charity, penance, and peace. It is therefore better then to rest than to act; do not seek the works of penance, lest in penance itself there be done what afterward needs penance. If penance has once been usurped and not celebrated rightly, it neither obtains the fruit of the former penance nor permits the use of a later one. Certainly, even when the flesh resists, the mind ought to be intent upon God; and if works do not follow, let faith not depart; and if the enticements of the flesh or adverse powers attack, let the mind remain dedicated to God. For it is then most pressed when the flesh does not yield and there are those who bear down violently, seeking to take away every defense of the wretched soul. Hence there is that saying: 'Empty it, empty it down to its foundation.' Pitying it, David says, 'Wretched daughter of Babylon.' It is certainly a daughter of Babylon when it ceases to be a daughter of God; yet he invites a physician for it, saying, 'Blessed is he who will seize your little ones and dash them against the rock'; that is, let one who has weak and slippery thoughts dash them against Christ, who diminishes all irrational movements by reverence for himself and by discretion."

[C. XXXVII.] Item Ambrosius in libro [II.] de penitencia. [c. 11.]

"'In Salicibus,' inquit, 'in medio eius suspendimus organa nostra.' Quomodo cantabimus canticum Domini in terra aliena? Si enim caro menti repugnat, nec subdita est animi gubernaculo et mentis inperio, aliena est terra, que non domatur exercitio cultoris. Non potest fructus karitatis penitenciae pacis afferre. Melius ergo est tunc quiescere, quam exercere non queras opera penitenciae, ne in ipsa penitencia fiat quod postea indigeat penitencia. Que si semel fuerit usurpata, nec iure celebrata, nec prioris fructum obtinet, et usum aufert posterioris. Sane et cum caro repugnat, mens ad Deum debet esse intenta, et, si opera non secuntur, fides non deserat; et, si carnis inpugnant illecebrae uel potestates aduersariae, maneat mens Deo dedita. Tunc enim maxime urgetur, cum caro non cedit, et sunt qui uehementer incumbant, miserae animae querentes omne auferre presidium. Unde illud est: 'Exinanite, exinanite usque ad fundamentum in ea.' Quam miseratus Dauid ait: 'Filia Babylonis misera,' utique, Babylonis filia est, que Dei esse filia desinit, cui tamen medicum inuitat, dicens: 'Beatus, qui tenebit et allidet paruulos suos ad petram,' hoc est qui infirmas et lubricas cogitationes habet elidat ad Christum, qui omnes irrationabiles motus sui reuerentia et discretione conminuat."

[C. XXXVIII.] Likewise Jerome on Matthew, [at c. 27].

"It profited Judas nothing to have performed penance through which he could not correct his crime. If at any time a brother so sins against a brother that he is able to amend what he sinned, it can be divinely remitted to him; but if the works remain, penance is assumed by the voice in vain. This is what is said concerning him: 'And let his prayer become sin,' so that he was not only unable to amend the wickedness of the betrayal but added the crime of his own murder."

[C. XXXVIII.] Item Ieronimus super Mattheum.

[ad c. 27.] "Nichil profuit Iudae egisse penitenciam, per quam scelus corrigere non potuit. Si quando frater sic peccat in fratrem, ut emendare ualeat quod peccauit, potest ei diuinitus dimitti; sin autem permanent opera, frustra uoce assumitur penitencia. Hoc est quod de eo dicitur: 'Et oratio eius fiat in peccatum,' ut non solum emendare nequiuerit proditionis nefas, sed proprii homicidii scelus addiderit."

[C. XXXIX.] Likewise Pope Leo in the sermon "Among All."

"You proved more criminal than all and more unhappy, Judas; penance did not recall you to the Lord, but despair dragged you to the noose. Would that you had awaited the consummation of your crime and had delayed the hideous noose of death until Christ's blood was poured out for sinners."

PART IX. GRATIAN. By these authorities it is shown which penance is true and which false, and it is proved that no indulgence is given to false penance. In this is destroyed the opinion of those according to which it is asserted that one entangled in several offenses, through penance for one offense, obtains pardon of that offense from the Lord without penance for the other crime. They also endeavor to prove this by many authorities. The first of these is that saying of the prophet Nahum: "God will not judge twice for the same thing." But the one whom a priest judges, God judges, whose person the priest bears in the church. Therefore, one who is punished once by a priest for a sin will not again be judged by God for the same sin.

[C. XXXIX.] Item Leo Papa in sermone: "Inter omnia".

"Sceleratior omnibus, Iuda, et infelicior extitisti; quem non penitencia reuocauit ad Dominum, sed desperatio traxit ad laqueum. Expectasses consummationem criminis tui, et donec sanguis Christi pro peccatoribus funderetur, informis lethi suspendium distulisses." IX. Pars. [Gratian.] His auctoritatibus, que sit uera, que falsa penitencia ostenditur, et falsae nulla indulgentia dari probatur; in quo illorum sentencia destruitur, qua eum, qui pluribus irretitus fuerit, asseritur unius delicti penitencia eiusdem ueniam a Domino consequi sine alterius criminis penitencia. Quod etiam multorum auctoritatibus probare conantur. Quarum prima est illa Naum prophethae: "Non iudicabit Deus bis in idipsum." Sed quem sacerdos iudicat Deus iudicat, cuius personam in ecclesia gerit. Qui ergo a sacerdote semel pro peccato punitur, non iterum pro eodem peccato a Deo iudicabitur.

[C. XL.] Likewise Gregory on Ezekiel, [homily X].

"The Lord rained upon one city and did not rain upon another, and he rained upon one part of the same city and left another part dry. When one who hates a neighbor corrects oneself of other vices, one and the same city is rained upon in part and remains dry in part, because there are those who, while cutting away certain vices, gravely persist in others."

> [C. XL.] Item Gregorius super Ezechielem. [hom. X.]
> "Pluit Dominus super unam ciuitatem, et super alteram non pluit, et eandem ciuitatem ex parte conpluit, et ex parte aridam relinquit. Cum ille, qui proximum odit, ab aliis uiciis se corrigit, una eademque ciuitas ex parte conpluitur, et ex parte arida manet, quia sunt, qui, cum uicia quedam resecant, in aliis grauiter perdurant."

[C. XLI.] Likewise Ambrose in the eighteenth octonary, [on Psalm 118].

"The first consolation is that God does not forget to have mercy; the second is through punishment, where, even if faith is lacking, punishment makes satisfaction and brings relief."

GRATIAN. Likewise, an objection is raised from Jerome, who on Nahum seems to hold that, if an unbeliever were killed while committing adultery, he would not afterward be punished by God for the adultery. Likewise, if that was not satisfaction which he offered for homicide while living in adultery, when he has repented of the adultery, penance for both will have to be imposed upon him. This is proved alien to reason by ecclesiastical custom, which imposes penance twice upon no one for the same sin, unless it has been repeated.

§ 1. But that pardon for one sin is not granted to one who reserves another crime for oneself is proved not only by the foregoing authorities of Hesychius, Origen, Augustine, Smaragdus, Isidore, and Gregory, but also by another authority of the same Augustine in the Book on Penance. For he says:

> [C. XLI.] Item Ambrosius in XVIII. octonario.
> [Psalm. 118.] "Prima consolatio est, quia non obliuiscitur misereri Deus; secunda per punitionem ubi etsi fides desit, pena satisfacit et releuat."
> [Gratian.] Item opponitur de Ieronimo, qui super Naum sentire uidetur, quod, si infidelis adulterando interficeretur, de adulterio non amplius a Deo puniretur. Item, si illa satisfactio non fuit, quam in adulterio uiuens pro homicidio obtulit, cum adulterii eum penituerit, utriusque penitencia ei inponenda erit; quod a ratione alienum ecclesiastica probatur consuetudine, que pro eodem peccato (nisi reiteratum fuerit) nulli penitenciam bis inponit. §. 1. Sed quod ei, qui crimen sibi reseruat, de alio uenia non prestetur, non solum premissis probatur auctoritatibus Esitii, Adamantii, Augustini, Smaragdi, Ysidori, Gregorii, uerum etiam alia auctoritate eiusdem Augustini in libro de penitencia. Ait enim:

[C. XLII.]

"There are many who repent of having sinned, but not altogether, reserving for themselves certain things in which they may delight, not observing that the Lord freed one who was at once mute and deaf from a demon. Through this he teaches that we are never healed except of all sins. For if he had wished sins to be reserved in part, he could have made perfect the one who had seven demons after six had been expelled. But he expelled seven, so as to teach that all crimes must be cast out together. And when casting the legion out of another, he left no one of them to possess the person who had been freed, showing that, even if the sins should be a thousand, it is necessary to repent of them all. For the Lord was praised because, when the demon had been cast out, the mute person spoke. He never healed anyone whom he did not free altogether. For he healed the whole human being on the sabbath, both the body from infirmity and the soul from every contagion, indicating that penitents ought to grieve at once for every crime arisen in soul and body. For I know the Lord to be an enemy of every criminal person. How, then, would one who reserves one crime receive pardon for another? Would that person obtain pardon without love of God, without which no one has ever found grace? For that person is an enemy of God while persevering in offense. For it is a certain impiety of unbelief to hope for half a pardon from him who is just and is justice. Would one thus find grace without true penance? For true penance strives to lead the one confessing to the purity of baptism. It is right that one who repents should wash away whatever filth one contracted after purification, at least with the tears of the mind. But one whose bodily eyes cannot disclose the sorrow of the mind is sufficiently hard; and let one know oneself culpably hard who bewails temporal losses or the death of a friend and does not show sorrow for sin in tears. Therefore, no one who has at any time shown sorrow for temporal things with tears may excuse oneself by saying that one does not have a fountain of tears. Therefore, let one who repents repent altogether, etc."

PART X. GRATIAN. That authority of the prophet Nahum, "God will not judge twice, etc.," does not show that all things punished temporally are not afterward to be punished by God. For although Jerome, on the same passage, says that the Sodomites, the Egyptians, and the Israelites in the desert were punished temporally by God so that they would not be punished eternally, nevertheless this is not to be understood generally of everyone. Otherwise, it would be desirable for every criminal person to perish by divine action for one's sins, struck by a thunderbolt from heaven, submerged in waters, or wounded by serpents, so that a brief and momentary penalty might put an end to eternal torments. That saying of the Apostle would also be false which, writing in the Letter to the Hebrews concerning those laid low in the desert, says, "Because of their unbelief they did not enter the land of promise." There it is proved that, just as by the desert of their unbelief they lost that rest, so because of the same unbelief they in no way entered the true rest of eternal beatitude.

§ 1. Therefore, that saying of Jerome is understood only of those who performed penance amid the very scourges—penance which, although brief and momentary, God nevertheless did not reject. Likewise, that saying of the prophet, "God will not judge twice for the same thing," must be understood only of those whom present punishments change, against whom a double tribulation will not arise. But those who amid scourges become harder and worse, like Pharaoh, who, when scourged by the Lord, was made harder, join eternal punishments to present ones, so that temporal punishment is for them the beginning of eternal condemnation. Hence Augustine on the Song of Deuteronomy:

> [C. XLII.]
> "Sunt plures, quos penitet peccasse, sed non omnino, reseruantes sibi quedam, in quibus delectentur, non animaduertentes, Dominum simul mutum et surdum a demonio liberasse. Per hoc docet, nos numquam nisi de omnibus sanari. Si enim uellet peccata ex parte reseruari, habentem septem demonia, perficere potuit sex expulsis. Expulit autem septem, ut omnia crimina simul eicienda doceret. Legionem autem ab alio eiciens, neminem reliquit de omnibus, qui liberatum possideret, ostendens, quod, etiamsi peccata sint mille, oportere de omnibus penitere. Laudatus est enim Dominus, quoniam eiecto demonio locutus est mutus. Numquam aliquem sanauit, quem non omnino liberauit. Totum enim hominem sanauit in sabbato, quia et corpus ab infirmitate, et animam ab omni contagione, indicans penitentes oportere simul dolere de omni crimine in anima orto et in corpore. Scio enim Dominum inimicum omni criminoso. Quomodo ergo qui crimen reseruat de alio reciperet ueniam? Sine amore Dei consequeretur ueniam, sine quo nemo umquam inuenit gratiam. Hostis enim Dei est, dum offendit perseueranter. Quedam enim inpietas infidelitatis est, ab illo, qui iustus et iusticia est, dimidiam sperare ueniam. Nam sine uera penitencia inueniret gratiam? Penitencia enim uera ad baptismi puritatem confitentem conatur ducere. Recte enim penitens quicquid sordis post purificationem contraxit oportet ut abluat, saltim lacrimis mentis. Sed satis durus est cuius mentis dolorem oculi carnis nequeunt declarare; sed sciat culpabiliter se durum, qui deflet dampna temporis, uel mortem amici, et dolorem peccati non ostendit in lacrimis. Non itaque est, ut quis excuset se fontem non habere lacrimarum, qui umquam lacrimis ostendit dolorem temporalium. Quem ergo penitet omnino peniteat etc." X. Pars. [Gratian.] Auctoritas illa Naum prophetae: "Non iudicabit Deus bis etc.," non ostendit omnia, que temporaliter puniuntur, non ulterius a Deo punienda. Quamquam enim Sodomitas, Egyptios, Israelitas in heremo super eundem locum dicat Ieronimus temporaliter a Deo punitos, ne in eternum punirentur, non tamen intelligendum est de omnibus hoc generaliter; alioquin cuique sceleroso optandum esset, ut celesti fulmine percussus, aut aquis inmersus, aut a serpentibus uulneratus pro peccatis suis diuinitus interiret, ut eternos cruciatus breuis et pena momentanea terminaret. Illud etiam

Apostoli falsum esset, quod de prostratis in deserto in epistola ad Ebreos scribens ait: "Propter incredulitatem suam non intrauerunt in terram promissionis." Ubi probatur, quod sicut merito suae infidelitatis requiem illam amiserunt, ita propter eandem infidelitatem ueram requiem eternae beatitudinis nullo modo intrauerunt. §. 1. Intelligitur ergo illud Ieronimi de his tantum, qui inter ipsa flagella penitenciam egerunt, quam, etsi breuem et momentaneam, tamen non respuit Deus; sicut et illud Prophetae: "Non iudicabit Deus bis in idipsum," de his tantum intelligi oportet, quos supplicia presentia conmutant, super quos non consurget duplex tribulatio. Qui autem inter flagella duriores et deteriores fiunt, sicut Pharao, qui flagellatus a Domino durior factus est, presentibus eterna connectunt, ut temporale supplicium sit eis eternae dampnationis initium. Unde Augustinus in Cantico Deuteronomii:

[C. XLIII.]

"'A fire has been kindled, etc.' That is, vengeance will begin here and will burn unto the final condemnation."

GRATIAN. This must be noted against those who say that "God will not judge twice for the same thing" pertains to all scourges, because some are amended or judged here by scourges, while others are punished both here and eternally, such as Antiochus and Herod.

§ 1. But what Jerome seems to hold on the same passage concerning an unbelieving adulterer is proved false from his own words. For, by the example of the one who had cursed the Israelites and the one who had gathered wood on the sabbath, he shows that small sins are purged by brief and temporal punishments, but great sins are reserved for lasting and eternal punishments. For he says, [on the first chapter of Nahum]:

[C. XLIII.]

"'Ignis succensus est etc.' Hoc est, uindicta hic incipiet, et ardebit usque ad extremam dampnationem." [Gratian.] Hoc contra illos notandum est, qui dicunt: "Non iudicabit Deus bis in id ipsum," ad omnia pertinere flagella, quia quidam hic flagellis emendantur uel iudicantur, alii hic et in eternum puniuntur, sicut Antiochus et Herodes. §. 1. Quod autem super eundem locum de adultero infideli Ieronimus sentire uidetur, ex uerbis eiusdem falsum esse probatur. Exemplo enim illius, qui Israelitas maledixerat, et qui ligna in sabbato collegerat, ostendit parua peccata breuibus et temporalibus suppliciis purgari, magna uero diuturnis et eternis suppliciis reseruari. Ait enim: [in primum caput Naum]

[C. XLIV.]

"Someone may ask here: if a member of the faithful, caught in adultery, is beheaded, what happens to him afterward? For either he will be punished, and what is said—'God will not judge twice for the same thing in tribulation'—is false; or he will not be punished, and it is desirable for adulterers that they be punished for the present by a brief penalty, so that they may frustrate eternal torments. To this we reply that God knows the measures both of all things and of punishments; that he is not forestalled by the sentence of a judge, nor is the power of afterward exacting punishment for sins taken away from him; and that a great sin is expiated by great and lasting torments. But if someone has been punished, like the one in the law who had cursed an Israelite and the one who had gathered wood on the sabbath, such persons are not punished afterward, because a light fault has been compensated by a present punishment."

GRATIAN. That saying of Gregory, "The Lord rained upon one city, etc.," is to be referred not to pardon of the crime but to detestation of it, so that a part of the city is said to have been rained upon because one begins to detest the crime that one had loved, not because one obtains pardon for it. The detestation of a crime is called rain because it is instilled into our heart from the fountain of divine grace, so that each person may at least thereby arrive at true penance, or be punished less by God because, by a more lasting delight in sin, one would have accumulated a greater punishment for oneself. But if the rain is referred to indulgence for the crime, it will seem to contradict the Gospel sentence.

For if, because of fraternal hatred, even those things that have been remitted are brought back for punishment, much more are those that have not been remitted proved to be reserved for vengeance.

§ 1. Likewise, if, according to Augustine, one who is master of one's own will cannot begin a new life unless one repents of the old life, how will one who has not laid aside the oldness of hatred arrive at indulgence belonging to newness? Therefore, as has been said, that rain is proved to pertain to detestation of the crime, not to indulgence for it.

§ 2. Likewise, that saying of Ambrose, "Even if faith is lacking, punishment makes satisfaction," is not understood of that faith concerning which it is said, "Faith without works is dead," but of that of which the Apostle says, "Everything that is not from faith"—that is, everything done against conscience—"is sin." Faith, therefore, is lacking when there is no consciousness of sin beneath it. But because no one understands all one's offenses, sometimes there is in a human being a sin of which one has no consciousness. Hence the Apostle says, "I am conscious of nothing in myself, but I am not justified in this." Therefore, for a sin of which consciousness is lacking, its punishment, if patiently borne, makes satisfaction and relieves the person burdened.

But the argument raised at the end—"If that was satisfaction, it obtained pardon; but if it did not obtain pardon, it was not satisfaction; and if it was not satisfaction, a punishment must still be imposed upon him"—does not follow. For it is satisfaction when the cause of that sin is cut off and access is not granted to its suggestions; but its fruit is not received, because it is impeded by the sin that has not yet been abandoned. It will, however, be received when penance for that sin has followed, just as one who approaches the washing of regeneration deceitfully receives the sacrament but is nevertheless not reborn in Christ; but one is reborn by the power of the sacrament that one had received when that deceit has departed from one's heart through truthful penance. Hence Augustine also writes in the Book on Penance:

[C. XLIV.]

"Querat hic aliquis, si fidelis deprehensus in adulterio decolletur, quid de eo postea fiat. Aut enim punietur, et falsum est hoc, quod dicitur: 'Non iudicabit Deus bis in idipsum in tribulatione;' aut non punietur, et optandum est adulteris, ut in presentiarum breui pena puniantur ut frustrentur cruciatus eternos. Ad quod respondemus, Deum, ut omnium rerum, ita suppliciorum quoque scire mensuras, et non preueniri sentencia iudicis, nec illi in peccatorum exercendae dehinc penae auferri potestatem, et magnum peccatum magnis diuturnisque lui cruciatibus; si quis autem punitus sit, ut ille in lege, qui Israelitae maledixerat, et qui in sabbato ligna collegerat, tales postea non puniri, quia culpa leuis presenti supplicio conpensata sit." [Gratian.] Illud autem Gregorii: "Pluit Dominus super unam ciuitatem etc.," non ad criminis ueniam, sed ad eius detestationem referendum est, ut ideo pars ciuitatis dicatur esse conpluta, quia crimen, quod dilexerat, detestari incipit, non quod eius ueniam consequatur. Criminis autem detestatio pluuia uocatur, quia ex fonte diuinae gratiae cordi nostro instillatur, ut uel sic quisque ad ueram penitenciam perueniat, aut eo minus a Deo puniatur, quod diuturniori delectatione peccati maius sibi supplicium accumulasset. Si uero ad indulgentiam criminis pluuia referatur, euangelicae sentenciae contraire uidebitur.

Si enim propter odium fraternum etiam que dimissa sunt replicantur ad penam: multo magis que non sunt dimissa ad uindictam reseruari probantur. §. 1. Item, si secundum Augustinum arbiter suae uoluntatis non potest inchoare nouam uitam, nisi peniteat eum ueteris uitae, quomodo ad nouitatis indulgentiam perueniet qui odii uetustatem non deposuit? Ad detestationem ergo criminis, ut dictum est, non ad eius indulgentiam pluuia illa pertinere probatur. §. 2. Item illud Ambrosii: "Et si fides desit, pena satisfacit," non de ea fide intelligitur, de qua dicitur: "fides sine operibus mortua est," sed de ea, de qua Apostolus ait: "Omne, quod non est ex fide," id est omne, quod contra conscientiam fit, "peccatum est." Deest ergo fides, cum non subest conscientia peccati. Sed quia delicta omnia nullus intelligit, est aliquando in homine peccatum, cuius conscientiam non habet. Unde Apostolus: "Nichil michi conscius sum, sed non in hoc iustificatus sum." Cuius ergo peccati deest conscientia, illius pena, si patienter feratur, satisfacit, et releuat grauatum. Quod autem in fine obicitur: "Si satisfactio illa fuit, ueniam inpetrauit; si autem ueniam non inpetrauit, satisfactio non fuit; si autem satisfactio non fuit, adhuc sibi pena inponenda est," non procedit argumentatio; satisfactio namque est, dum exciditur illius peccati causa, et eius suggestionibus aditus non indulgetur, sed eius fructus non percipitur, inpeditus peccato, quod nondum deseritur. Percipietur autem, cum eius penitencia fuerit subsecuta, sicut ad lauacrum ficte accedens regenerationis accipit sacramentum, non tamen in Christo renascitur; renascitur autem uirtute sacramenti, quod perceperat, cum fictio illa de corde eius recesserit ueraci penitencia. Hinc etiam Augustinus scribit in libro de penitencia:

[C. XLV.]

"It is pious to believe, and our faith demands this, that, when Christ's grace has destroyed the former evils in a human being, it also rewards the good things, and, when it destroys what it did not find as its own, it loves and cherishes the good that it planted in the person while that person was sinning."

That saying of Jerome also seems to have been spoken according to this meaning, [at c. 1 of Haggai]:

[C. XLV.]

"Pium est credere, et nostra fides hoc expostulat, ut, cum gratia Christi in homine destruxerit mala priora, etiam remuneret bona, et, cum destruit quod suum non inuenit, amat et diligit bonum, quod in peccante plantauit." Ex hoc sensu etiam illud Ieronimi dictum uidetur: [ad c. 1. Aggaei]

[C. XLVI.]

"If at any time you see someone, amid many works of sin, doing some things that are just, God is not so unjust that, because of the many evil things, he forgets the few good things."

PART XI. GRATIAN. Although the remembrance of good things can be referred to present recompense, as Gregory writes in the homily on the rich man and Lazarus:

[C. XLVI.]

"Si quando uideris inter multa opera peccatorum facere quemquam aliqua, que iusta sunt, non est tam iniustus Deus, ut propter multa mala obliuiscatur paucorum bonorum." XI. Pars. [Gratian.] Quamquam memoria bonorum ad presentem remunerationem possit referri, sicut Gregorius in omelia de diuite et Lazaro scribit:

[C. XLVII.]

"We must beware lest, if perhaps we do some good thing, we receive its recompense in the present age, lest perhaps it be said to us, 'They have received their reward.' For unless that rich man had done some good thing for which he received recompense in the present age, Abraham would by no means have said to him, 'You received good things in your life.'"

[C. XLVII.]

"Cauendum est nobis, ut, si forte aliquod bonum agimus, in presenti seculo remunerationem accipiamus, ne forte dicatur nobis: 'Receperunt mercedem suam.' Nisi enim diues iste aliquod bonum egisset, unde in presenti seculo remunerationem accepisset, nequaquam Abraham ei diceret: 'Recepisti bona in uita tua.'"

[C. XLVIII.] Likewise John Chrysostom, [homily LXVII to the People of Antioch].

"Why, then, are we disturbed? Let no one be disturbed on seeing evil persons possess prosperity. Here there is no retribution for wickedness or for virtue; and if it sometimes happens that there is some retribution either for malice or for virtue, it is nevertheless not according to what is deserved, but merely as a certain foretaste of judgment, so that those who do not believe in the resurrection may be taught by such things. Accordingly, when we see an evil person become rich, let us not be overthrown; and when we see a good person suffer evils, let us not be disturbed. There are the crowns; there are the punishments. There is also another reason: an evil person cannot be evil in all things but has some good things, nor can a good person be good in all things but has some sins. Therefore, when an evil person has prosperity, it is to that evil person's own harm. For when one receives recompense here for those few good things, one will afterward be punished there more fully."

GRATIAN. The remembrance of good things can also be referred to receiving a milder punishment, so that good things done amid many evil things do not avail for obtaining the reward of the present or future life, but for undergoing a more tolerable punishment at the final judgment, as Augustine writes concerning faith and the other things that are possessed without charity in the Book on Patience, saying, [c. 26]:

> [C. XLVIII.] Item Iohannes Crisostomus. [hom. LXVII. ad populum Antiochenum]
> "Quid ergo turbamur? nemo, uidens malignos prosperitatem habere, turbetur. Non est hic retributio malignitatis, neque uirtutis; ac, si aliquando contingit, ut aliqua sit retributio uel maliciae, uel uirtutis, non tamen secundum quod dignum est, sed simpliciter, ueluti quidam gustus iudicii, ut, qui resurrectionem non credunt, talibus doceantur. Quando itaque uidemus malignum ditescere, non subruamur, et quando uidemus bonum mala pati, non turbemur. Illic corona: illic supplicia. Est et alia ratio, quia non potest uel malus in omnibus malus esse, sed habet aliqua bona, neque bonus in omnibus bonus esse, sed habet aliqua peccata. Quando ergo prosperitatem habet malus, malo capitis sui est. Cum enim pro illis bonis paucis retributionem hic accipit, illic iam plenius punietur." [Gratian.] Potest etiam memoria bonorum referri ad mitiorem penam habendam, ut bona, que inter multa mala fiunt, non proficiant ad presentis uel futurae uitae premium obtinendum, sed ad tollerabilius extremi iudicii supplicium subeundum, sicut de fide, et ceteris, que sine karitate habentur Augustinus scribit in libro de patiencia dicens: [c. 26.]

[C. XLIX.]

"But if someone who does not have charity—which pertains to the unity of the spirit and the bond of peace by which the Catholic Church is gathered and joined together—being established in some schism, suffers tribulations, distresses, hunger, nakedness, persecution, dangers, prisons, chains, torments, the sword, flames, beasts, or the cross itself, lest one deny Christ, from fear of Gehenna and eternal fire, these things are in no way to be blamed. Indeed, patience is to be praised even here. For we shall not be able to say that it would have been better for that person to suffer none of those things by denying Christ than to suffer them by confessing him; rather, it must be judged that the judgment will perhaps be more tolerable for that person than if one had suffered none of those things by denying Christ. Thus the Apostle's saying, 'If I hand over my body so that I burn, but do not have charity, it profits me nothing,' is understood to profit nothing for obtaining the kingdom of heaven, not for undergoing a more tolerable punishment at the final judgment." And below, [c. 23]:

§ 1. "These things have been said because of charity, without which true penance cannot exist in us, because in good persons there is the charity of God, which endures all things."

PART XII. GRATIAN. Therefore, as appears from the foregoing, penance is useful to no one who perseveres in sin; nevertheless, it is to be denied to no one, because one will perceive its fruit when one has performed penance for the other crime. Thus, therefore, the definition of penance and the other authorities consonant with it deny that one who perseveres in crime performs penance—that is, penance useful and fruitful to oneself.

§ 2. That saying of Ambrose, "Penance once undertaken, and not truly celebrated, both takes away the fruit of the former and loses the use of the following," is understood of solemn penance. When solemn penance has not been truly celebrated, it both loses the fruit of the former—that is, of itself, which follows the preceding penance, because the person scorned the pardon that one could have obtained—and takes away the use of a following penance, according to the custom of certain churches among which the solemnity of penance is not repeated. Concerning this same penance that saying also is understood: "There is no second place for penance."

[C. XLIX.]

"Si quis autem non habens karitatem, que pertinet ad unitatem spiritus et uinculum pacis, quo catholica ecclesia congregata connectitur, in aliquo scismate constitutus, ne Christum neget, patitur tribulationes, angustias, famem, nuditatem, persecutionem, pericula, carceres, uincula, tormenta, gladium, uel flammas, uel bestias, uel ipsam crucem timore gehennarum et ignis eterni, nullo modo ista culpanda sunt; immo uero et hic laudanda patiencia est; non enim dicere poterimus, melius ei fuisse, ut Christum negando nichil eorum pateretur, que passus est confitendo, sed estimandum est, fortasse tollerabilius ei futurum iudicium, quam si Christum negando nichil eorum pateretur. Ut illud, quod ait Apostolus: 'Si tradidero corpus meum ita, ut ardeam, karitatem autem non habuero nichil michi prodest,' nichil prodesse intelligatur ad regnum celorum obtinendum, non ad extremi iudicii tollerabilius supplicium subeundum." Et infra: [c. 23.] §. 1. "Hec propter karitatem dicta sunt, sine qua in nobis non potest esse uera penitencia, quoniam in bonis karitas Dei est, que tollerat omnia." XII. Pars. [Gratian.] Penitencia ergo, ut ex premissis apparet, nulli in peccato perseueranti utilis est, non tamen alicui deneganda est, quia sentiet fructum eius, cum alterius criminis penitenciam egerit. Sic itaque penitenciae diffinitio, et ceterae auctoritates sibi consonantes negant, eum agere penitenciam, qui perseuerat in crimine, utilem uidelicet sibi et fructuosam §. 1. Illud autem Ambrosii: "Penitencia semel usurpata, nec uere celebrata, et fructum prioris aufert, et usum sequentis amittit," de solempni intelligitur, que, cum non uere celebrata fuerit, et fructum prioris, id est sui ipsius secuturam precedentis, amittit, (quia ueniam, quam inpetrare potuit, contempsit), et usum sequentis aufert, secundum consuetudinem quarumdam ecclesiarum, apud quas solempnitas penitenciae non reiteratur. De hac eadem penitencia etiam illud intelligitur: "Non est secundus locus penitenciae."

Distinction IV

GRATIAN. PART I. Since it has been shown above by the authorities of many that penance is truly celebrated and sins are truly remitted to one who will at some time fall back into crime, it is asked whether remitted sins return. The opinions of different persons on this question vary, some asserting and others, on the contrary, denying that remitted sins are afterward brought back for punishment.

§ 1. That sins once remitted return is proved by the authorities of many. The first of these is that saying of the prophet, “Let the iniquity of his fathers return into memory, etc.”; the second is that saying of the Gospel, “Wicked servant, I forgave you the entire debt, etc.” Then Augustine says in the Book of Psalms, [on Psalm 108]:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quia uero multorum auctoritatibus supra monstratum est, penitenciam uere celebrari, et peccata uere dimitti ei, qui aliquando in crimen recasurus est: queritur, an peccata dimissa redeant? Huius questionis diuersorum uaria est sentencia, aliis asserentibus, aliis econtra a negantibus, peccata dimissa ulterius replicari ad penam. §. 1. Quod autem peccata semel dimissa redeant, multorum probatur auctoritatibus; quarum prima est illa Prophetae: "In memoriam redeat iniquitas patrum eius etc.;" secunda illa euangelii: "Serue nequam, omne debitum dimisi tibi, etc." Deinde Augustinus in libro Psalmorum ait: [ad Psalmum CVIII.]

[C. I.]

“If Judas had retained that to which he was called, neither his own past iniquity nor that of his parents would in any way have pertained to him. Therefore, because he did not retain adoption in God’s family but instead chose the iniquity of his old stock, the iniquity of his fathers returned into the Lord’s sight, so that it too might be punished in him.”

Likewise Rabanus: § 1. "'He handed him over to the torturers, etc.' It must be considered that he says 'the entire debt,' because not only the sins that a human being committed after baptism will be imputed to one for punishment, but also the original sins that were remitted to one in baptism."

> [C. I.]
>
> "Si Iudas teneret illud, ad quod uocatus est, nullo modo ad eum uel sua preterita, uel parentum iniquitas pertineret. Quia ergo non tenuit adoptionem in familia Dei, sed iniquitatem uetusti generis potius elegit, rediit iniquitas patrum in conspectu Domini, ut in eo etiam ipsa puniretur." Item Rabanus: §. 1. "'Tradidit eum tortoribus etc.' Considerandum est, quod dicit: 'uniuersum debitum,' quia non solum peccata, que post baptismum homo egit, reputabuntur ei ad penam, uerum etiam peccata originalia, que in baptismo ei dimissa sunt."

[C. II.] Likewise Gregory, [Dialogues, book IV, c. 60].

"It is established from the Gospel sayings that, if we do not forgive from the heart what is committed against us, that is again exacted which we were rejoicing had already been remitted to us through penance."

> [C. II.] Item Gregorius. [lib. IV. Dialog., c. 60.]
>
> "Ex dictis euangelicis constat, quia, si, in nos, quod delinquitur, ex corde non dimittimus, et illud rursus exigitur, quod nobis iam per penitenciam dimissum fuisse gaudebamus."

[C. III.] Likewise Augustine in homily L.

"The Lord says, 'Forgive, and it will be forgiven you.' But I forgave first; do you forgive even afterward. For if you do not forgive, I shall recall you, and whatever I had forgiven I shall bring back upon you."

> [C. III.] Item Augustinus in omelia L.
> "Dicit Dominus: 'Dimitte et dimittetur tibi:' sed ego prius dimisi, dimitte uel postea. Nam si non dimiseris, reuocabo te, et quicquid dimiseram replicabo tibi."

[C. IV.] Likewise.

"One who, forgetful of the divine benefit, wishes to avenge one's own injuries will not only fail to merit pardon for future sins, but even the past sins that one believed had already been remitted will be brought back upon that person for vengeance."

> [C. IV.] Item.
> "Qui diuini beneficii oblitus suas uult uindicare iniurias, non solum de futuris peccatis ueniam non merebitur, sed etiam preterita, que iam sibi dimissa credebat, ad uindictam ei replicabuntur."

[C. V.] Likewise Bede on Luke, [book IV, c. 48].

"'I shall return to my house.' This verse is to be feared, not expounded, lest the fault that we believed extinguished in us overwhelm us while we are unoccupied through negligence."

> [C. V.] Item Beda super Lucam. [lib. IV. c. 48.]
> "'Reuertar in domum meam.' Timendus est uersiculus iste, non exponendus, ne culpa, quam in nobis exstinctam credebamus, per incuriam nos uacantes opprimat."

[C. VI.] Likewise.

“For whatever heretical depravity or worldly cupidity seizes a person after baptism will soon cast that person down into the depths of all vices.”

> [C. VI.] Item.
>
> "Quecumque enim post baptisma siue prauitas heretica, seu mundana cupiditas arripuerit, mox prosternet in ima omnium uiciorum."

[C. VII.] Likewise Augustine in the Book of Questions on Deuteronomy, [question XLII].

“The sin that is drawn from Adam is repaid temporally, because all die on account of it; but it is not repaid eternally in those who have been regenerated through grace, if they remain in it until the end.”

PART II. GRATIAN. But among those who follow this opinion, some say that sins that will return are remitted according to justice, but not according to foreknowledge. Thus the names of the disciples who went backward were written in the book of life on account of the justice which they served, but not according to the foreknowledge that did not hold them among the number of those to be saved. Thus a thousand are said to be about to fall at God’s side and ten thousand at his right hand, although divine foreknowledge had never numbered them among his own. Hence the Lord also says to Moses, “If anyone sins before me, I shall erase that person from the book of life,” so that according to the justice of the judge, one who according to foreknowledge had never been inscribed is said to be erased by sinning.

§ 1. Hence Augustine on the Letter to the Corinthians says: “But God was not well pleased with many of them,” even if he was with some. All the sacraments were common, but grace was not common; so also now baptism is common, but the power of baptism is not.

PART III. § 2. But this is understood of those who approach deceitfully or of those who are baptized outside the church, who indeed receive the integrity of the sacrament but by no means attain its power. Sins are altogether remitted, however, to little children or adults approaching with full faith, even if they are at some time to depart from good and finish life in evil. Hence Augustine in the Book on Correction and Grace, [cc. 8 and 9]:

> [C. VII.] Item Augustinus in libro questionum Deuteronomii. [quest. XLII.]
> "Peccatum, quod ex Adam trahitur, temporaliter redditur, quia omnes propter hoc moriuntur, non autem in eternum eis qui fuerint per gratiam regenerati, si in ea usque in finem permanserint."
> II. Pars. [Gratian.] Eorum uero, qui hanc sententiam secuntur, alii dicunt, quod peccata reditura dimittuntur secundum iusticiam, sed non secundum prescientiam, sicut nomina discipulorum, qui retro abierunt, erant scripta in libro uitae propter iusticiam, cui deseruiebant, non secundum prescientiam, que in numero saluandorum eos non habebat. Sic a latere Dei dicuntur mille casuri, et decem millia a dextris eius, quos tamen diuina prescientia numquam suis annumerauerat. Hinc etiam Dominus ait Moysi: "Si quis peccauerit ante me, delebo eum de libro uitae," ut secundum iusticiam iudicis ille peccando dicatur deleri, qui secundum prescientiam numquam fuerat ascriptus. §. 1. Hinc Augustinus in epistola ad Chorinthios: "Sed non in pluribus eorum beneplacitum est Deo," etsi in aliquibus. Communia omnia sacramenta, sed non communis gratia; ita et nunc baptismus communis est, sed non uirtus baptismi. III. Pars. §. 2. Verum hoc de ficte accedentibus, uel de his, qui extra ecclesiam baptizantur, intelligitur, qui sacramenti quidem integritatem accipiunt, uirtutem uero eius minime assecuntur. Paruulis uero, uel adultis plena fide accedentibus omnino peccata remittuntur, etsi aliquando a bono recessuri in malo uitam sint finituri. Unde Augustinus in libro de correctione et gratia: [c. 8. et 9.]

[C. VIII.]

"If those who fall away from good into evil die with a good will, let them answer, if they can, why God, when those persons were living faithfully and piously, did not then snatch them from the dangers of this life, lest malice change their understanding and lest deception beguile their souls. Did he not have this within his power, or did he not know their future evils? Certainly, neither of these things is said except most perversely and most insanely. Why, then, did he not do it? Let those answer who ridicule us when, in matters of this kind, we exclaim: 'How inscrutable are his judgments, and how unsearchable his ways!' For God does not fail to give this to those to whom he wills, nor indeed does that Scripture lie which says concerning the seemingly untimely death of a just person, 'He was snatched away lest malice change his understanding and lest deception beguile his soul.' Why, therefore, does God give this so great a benefit to some and not give it to others—God with whom there is no iniquity or acceptance of persons, and in whose power it lies how long each person remains in this life, which is called a trial upon earth? Therefore, just as they are compelled to confess that it is a gift of God for a human being to end this life before being changed from good into evil, while they do not know why it is given to some and not given to others, so let them confess with us, according to the Scriptures—many testimonies from which I have already set forth—that perseverance in good is a gift of God; and let them deign to be ignorant with us, without murmuring against God, why it is given to some and not given to others.

§ 1. "Nor should it disturb us that God does not give this perseverance to some of his children. For far be it that it should be so if they were among those predestined and called according to purpose who are truly children of the promise. For these, when they live piously, are called children of God; but because they will live impiously and die in that same impiety, the foreknowledge of God does not call them children.

"For there are children of God who are not yet such for us but already are for God. Concerning them John the Evangelist says, 'Because Jesus was about to die for the nation, and not only for the nation, but also that he might gather into one the scattered children of God.' They were certainly to become such by believing through the preaching of the Gospel; and nevertheless, before that happened, they were already children of God, inscribed with unshaken stability in the memorial of their Father. And again there are certain persons who, because of grace received even temporally, are called children of God by us, but nevertheless are not God's children. Concerning these the same John says, 'They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would certainly have remained with us.' He does not say, 'They went out from us, but because they did not remain with us, they are now no longer of us'; rather, he says, 'They went out from us, but they were not of us.' That is: even when they appeared to be among us, they were not of us. And as though it were said to him, 'How do you show this?' he says, 'For if they had been of us, they would certainly have remained with us.' This is the voice of God's children: John speaks, established in a preeminent place among God's children.

"Therefore, when the children of God say concerning those who did not possess perseverance, 'They went out from us, but they were not of us,' and add, 'For if they had been of us, they would certainly have remained with us,' what else do they say except that they were not children of God even when they were in the profession and name of children—not because they feigned justice, but because they did not remain in it? For he does not say, 'For if they had been of us, they would certainly have maintained true, not feigned, justice with us'; rather, he says, 'If they had been of us, they would certainly have remained with us.' Without doubt, he wished them to remain in good; they were, therefore, in good. But because they did not remain in it, that is, did not persevere to the end, he says that they were not of us even when they were with us. That is: they were not of the number of the children even when they were in the faith of the children, because those who are truly children are foreknown and predestined to be conformed to the image of God's Son and are called according to purpose so that they might be elect. For a son of the promise does not perish, but a son of perdition does. These persons, therefore, were among the multitude of those called, but they were not among the fewness of the elect.

"God, therefore, did not fail to give perseverance to his predestined children. For they would have it if they were in that number of the children; and what would they have that they had not received, according to the true apostolic sentence? And thereby such children would be those given to Christ the Son, as he himself says to the Father: 'That everything you have given me may not perish but may have eternal life.' Those, therefore, are understood to be given to Christ who have been ordained to eternal life. They are those predestined and called according to purpose, none of whom perishes; and thereby none of them, changed from good into evil, ends this life, because one has been both ordained and therefore given to Christ in such a way that one does not perish but has eternal life. And again, those whom we call his enemies, or the little children of his enemies, whichever of them he is to regenerate in such a way that they end this life in that faith which works through love, are, even before this occurs, his children in that predestination and have been given to Christ his Son, so that they may not perish but may have eternal life.

§ 2. "Finally, the Savior himself says, 'If you remain in my word, you are truly my disciples.' Are those to be counted among them concerning whom the Gospel speaks as follows? When the Lord had commended the eating of his flesh and the drinking of his blood, the Evangelist says: 'He said these things while teaching in the synagogue at Capernaum. Therefore, many of his disciples, on hearing, said: This saying is hard; who can hear it? But Jesus, knowing within himself that his disciples were murmuring about this, said to them: Does this scandalize you? What, then, if you shall see the Son of Man ascending where he was before? It is the Spirit who gives life; the flesh profits nothing. The words that I have spoken to you are spirit and life. But there are certain persons among you who do not believe. For Jesus knew from the beginning who were believers and who would betray him, and he said: For this reason I told you that no one comes to me unless it has been given to that person by my Father. From this time many of his disciples went backward and no longer walked with him.' Were not these persons also called disciples, as the Gospel speaks? And nevertheless, they were not truly disciples, because they did not remain in his word, according to what he says: 'If you remain in my word, you will truly be my disciples.' Therefore, because they did not possess perseverance, just as they were not truly disciples of Christ, so they were not truly children of God, even when they seemed to be and were so called.

"We therefore call persons elect, disciples of Christ, and children of God because those whom we see regenerated and living piously must be so called. But they are then truly what they are called if they remain in that on account of which they are so called. But if they do not possess perseverance—that is, if they do not remain in that which they began to be—they are not truly called what they are called on account of, and they are not such. For before him they are not this, since what they will be is known to him—that is, evil persons from good ones."

PART IV. GRATIAN. The end of this authority agrees with the opinion of those who say that sins are remitted according to justice and not according to foreknowledge. Others, however, although they admit that sins return, nevertheless assert that sins are altogether remitted, whether through baptism or through penance; that one approaching the washing with full faith is reborn not only by water but also by the Holy Spirit; and that one who subsequently is going to sin, and thereafter repents, although at some time going to fall back, is nevertheless so perfectly expiated at the time of one's penance that, if one died then, one would find eternal salvation.

The beginning of the same authority agrees with their opinion. For when it proposes the question why God, while those foreknown for death were living faithfully and piously, did not then snatch them from the dangers of this life, lest malice change their understanding and deception beguile their souls—although Scripture says concerning the untimely death of a predestined person, "He was snatched away lest malice change his understanding and lest deception beguile his soul"—it evidently shows that they were such persons as would certainly have attained eternal life if they had been withdrawn from the dangers of this life by a fatal necessity. Therefore, so that the end may agree with the beginning and the authority may not seem to contradict itself, it must be defined what it is to be written in the book of life, or to be erased from it, according to justice, and what according to foreknowledge. To be written according to foreknowledge is to be foreordained to life, which was done from eternity. Hence the Apostle says in the Letter to the Ephesians, [c. 1]:

[C. VIII.]

"Si ex bono in malum deficientes bona uoluntate moriuntur, respondeant, si possunt, cur illos Deus, cum fideliter et pie uiuerent, non tunc de uitae huius periculis rapuit, ne malicia mutaret intellectum eorum, et ne fictio deciperet animas eorum? Utrum hoc in potestate non habuit, an eorum mala futura nesciuit? Nempe nichil horum nisi peruersissime atque insanissime dicitur. Cur ergo non fecit? Respondeant qui nos irrident, quando in rebus talibus exclamamus: 'Quam inscrutabilia sunt iudicia eius, et inuestigabiles uiae eius.' Neque enim hoc non donat Deus quibus uoluerit, aut uero illa scriptura mentitur, que de morte uelut inmatura hominis iusti ait: 'Raptus est, ne malicia mutaret intellectum eius, et ne fictio deciperet animam eius.' Cur igitur hoc tam magnum beneficium aliis dat, aliis non dat Deus, apud quem non est iniquitas, nec acceptio personarum, et in cuius potestate est, quamdiu quisque in hac uita maneat, que temptatio dicta est super terram? Sicut ergo coguntur fateri, donum Dei esse ut finiat homo uitam istam ante, quam ex bono mutetur in malum, cur autem id aliis donetur, aliis non donetur, ignorant: id tamen donum Dei esse in bono perseuerantiam secundum scripturas (de quibus testimonia multa iam posui), fateantur nobiscum, et cur aliis detur, aliis non detur, sine murmure aduersus Deum dignentur ignorare nobiscum. §. 1. Nec nos moueat, quod filiis suis Deus quibusdam non dat istam perseuerantiam. Absit enim, ut ita sit, si de illis predestinatis essent, et secundum propositum uocatis, qui uere sunt filii promissionis. Nam isti, cum pie uiuunt, dicuntur filii Dei; sed quia uicturi sunt inpie, et in eadem inpietate morituri, non eos dicit filios prescientia Dei.

Sunt enim filii Dei, qui nondum sunt nobis, et sunt iam Deo, de quibus euangelista Iohannes ait: 'quia Iesus moriturus erat pro gente, nec tantum pro gente, sed etiam, ut filios Dei dispersos congregaret in unum,' quod utique credendo futuri erant per euangelii predicationem, et tamen ante, quam factum esset, iam filii Dei erant in memoriali patris sui inconcussa stabilitate conscripti sunt. Et sunt rursus quidam, qui filii Dei propter susceptam uel temporaliter gratiam dicuntur a nobis, nec tamen sunt Dei, de quibus ait idem Iohannes: 'Ex nobis exierunt, sed non erant ex nobis; quod si fuissent ex nobis, mansissent utique nobiscum.' Non ait: ex nobis exierunt, sed quia non manserunt nobiscum, iam non sunt ex nobis; uerum ait: 'ex nobis exierunt, sed non erant ex nobis;' hoc est: et quando uidebantur in nobis, non erant ex nobis. Et tamquam ei diceretur, unde id ostendis? 'Quod si fuissent,' inquit, 'ex nobis, permansissent utique nobiscum.' Filiorum Dei uox est: Iohannes loquitur in filiis Dei loco precipuo constitutus. Cum ergo filii Dei dicunt de his, qui perseuerantiam non habuerunt: 'ex nobis exierunt, sed non erant ex nobis;' et addunt: 'quod si ex nobis fuissent, permansissent utique nobiscum;' quid aliud dicunt, nisi non erant filii Dei, etiam quando erant in professione et nomine filiorum non quia iusticiam simulauerunt, sed quia in ea non permanserunt. Neque enim ait: nam, si fuissent ex nobis, ueram, non fictam, iusticiam tenuissent utique nobiscum; sed: 'si fuissent,' inquit, 'ex nobis, permansissent utique nobiscum.' In bono illos uolebat proculdubio permanere, erant itaque in bono, sed quia in eo non permanserunt, id est usque in finem non perseuerauerunt, non erant, inquit, ex nobis, et quando erant nobiscum; hoc est: non erant ex numero filiorum, et quando erant in fide filiorum, quoniam qui uere filii sunt presciti et predestinati sunt conformes imaginis filii Dei et secundum propositum uocati sunt, ut electi essent. Non enim perit filius promissionis, sed filius perditionis. Fuerunt ergo isti ex multitudine uocatorum; ex electorum autem paucitate non fuerunt. Non igitur filiis suis predestinatis non dedit Deus perseuerantiam. Haberent enim eam, si in eo filiorum numero essent, et quid haberent, quod non accepissent secundum apostolicam ueramque sententiam? Ac per hoc tales filii filio Christo dati essent, quemadmodum ipse dicit ad patrem: 'Ut omne, quod dedisti michi, non pereat, sed habeat uitam eternam.' Hi ergo intelliguntur Christo dari, qui ordinati sunt in uitam eternam. Ipsi sunt illi predestinati et secundum propositum uocati, quorum nullus perit, ac per hoc nullus eorum ex bono in malum mutatus finit hanc uitam, quoniam sic et ordinatus, et ideo Christo datus, ut non pereat, sed habeat uitam eternam. Et rursus, quos dicimus inimicos eius, uel paruulos filios inimicorum eius, quoscumque eorum sic regeneraturus est, ut in ea fide, dilectionem operatur, hanc uitam finiant, iam et ante, quam hoc fiat, in illa predestinatione filii sunt eius, et dati sunt Christo filio eius, ut non pereant, sed habeant uitam eternam. §. 2. Denique ipse Saluator: 'Si manseritis,' inquit 'in uerbo meo, uere discipuli mei estis.' Numquid in his conputandi sunt illi, de quibus euangelium sic loquitur? ubi Dominus, cum conmendasset manducandam carnem suam, et bibendum sanguinem suum, ait Euangelista: 'Hec dixit in synagoga docens in Capharnaum. Multi ergo audientes ex discipulis eius, dixerunt: Durus est hic sermo, quis eum potest audire? Sciens autem Iesus apud semetipsum, quia murmurabant de hoc discipuli eius, dixit eis: Hoc uos scandalizat? Si ergo uideritis filium hominis ascendentem, ubi erat prius? Spiritus est qui uiuificat: caro autem non prodest quicquam. Verba, que ego locutus sum uobis, spiritus et uita sunt. Sed sunt quidam ex uobis, qui non credunt. Sciebat enim Iesus ab inicio, qui essent credentes, et quis esset eum traditurus, et dicebat: Propterea dixi uobis, quia nemo uenit ad me, nisi fuerit ei datum a patre meo. Ex hoc multi discipulorum eius abierunt retro, et iam cum illo non ambulabant.' Numquid non et isti discipuli appellati sunt, loquente euangelio? et tamen non erant uere discipuli, quia non manserunt in uerbo eius, secundum id, quod ait: 'Si manseritis in uerbo meo, uere discipuli mei eritis.' Quia ergo non habuerunt perseuerantiam, sicut non uere discipuli Christi, ita nec filii Dei uere fuerunt, etiam quando esse uidebantur, et ita uocabantur. Appellamus ergo nos electos et Christi discipulos, et Dei filios, quia appellandi sunt quos regeneratos pie uiuere cernimus. Sed tunc uere sunt quod appellantur, si manserint in eo, propter quod sic appellantur. Si autem perseuerantiam non habent, id est in eo, quod ceperunt esse, non manent, non uere appellantur propter quod appellantur, et non sunt. Apud eum enim hoc non sunt, cui notum est quod futuri sunt, id est ex bonis mali." IV. Pars. [Gratian.] Finis huius auctoritatis eorum sentenciae concordat, qui peccata dicunt remitti secundum iusticiam, et non secundum prescientiam. Alii uero, quamuis fateantur peccata redire, tamen seu per baptisma, seu per penitenciam asserunt omnino remitti peccata, et plena fide accedentem ad lauacrum renasci non aqua tantum, sed etiam Spiritu sancto, et, si postea peccaturus sit, deinde penitentem, etsi aliquando recasurus sit, tamen tempore suae penitenciae ita perfecte expiatum affirmant, ut, si tunc moreretur, salutem inueniret eternam. Quorum sentenciae eiusdem auctoritatis principium consentit. Cum enim questionem proponat, quare prescitos ad mortem, cum fideliter ac pie uiuerent, non tunc de uitae huius periculis Deus rapuit, ne malicia mutaret intellectum eorum, et ne fictio deciperet animas eorum, cum de inmatura morte predestinati scriptura dicit: "Raptus est, ne malicia mutaret intellectum eius, et ne fictio deciperet animam illius," euidenter ostendit, illos tales fuisse, qui, si fatali necessitate huius uitae subducti essent periculis, profecto uitam consecuti essent eternam. Ut ergo finis principio conueniat, et ne sibi ipsi contraire uideatur, diffiniendum est, quid sit scribi in libro uitae, uel de eodem deleri secundum iusticiam, quid secundum prescientiam. Secundum prescientiam scribi est ad uitam preordinari; quod ab eterno factum est. Unde Apostolus in epistola ad Ephesios: [c. 1.]

[C. IX.]

"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has blessed us in Christ Jesus with every spiritual blessing in heavenly places, just as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world, that we might be holy and immaculate in his sight in charity; who predestined us unto adoption as children through Jesus Christ."

GRATIAN. Similarly, to be erased according to foreknowledge is to be foreknown for death, not for life, which also was done from eternity. Hence the Lord says in the Gospel, "One who believes in me has eternal life; but one who does not believe has already been judged." Hence Augustine also says:

[C. IX.]

"Benedictus Deus et pater Domini nostri Iesu Christi, qui benedixit nos in omni benedictione spirituali in celestibus in Christo Iesu, sicut elegit nos in ipso ante mundi constitutionem, ut essemus sancti et inmaculati in conspectu eius in karitate; cui predestinauit nos in adoptionem filiorum per Iesum Christum." [Gratian.] Similiter secundum prescientiam deleri est ad mortem, non ad uitam presciri, quod et ipsum ab eterno factum est. Unde Dominus in euangelio: "Qui credit in me, habet uitam eternam; qui autem non credit, iam iudicatus est." Hinc etiam Augustinus ait:

[C. X.]

"'The Lord knows those who are his.' None of these is seduced. The judgment has not yet appeared, but it has already been made."

GRATIAN. Moreover, to be written according to justice is, with God as author, to perform those things by whose merit one is worthy of eternal salvation. God indicated this twofold manner of being written in the Gospel, saying to the disciples: "In my Father's house are many dwellings; if it were otherwise, I would have told you, because I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you, I come again and shall receive you to myself, so that where I am you also may be." By saying, "In my Father's house are many dwellings; if it were otherwise, I would have told you, because I go to prepare a place for you," he shows that those to whom he spoke were written in the book of life by predestination. By adding, "If I go and prepare a place for you, etc.," he shows that they were still to be written by operation. Hence Augustine also says in his explanation of the same passage:

[C. X.]

"'Nouit Dominus qui sunt eius.' Ex his nemo seducitur. Nondum apparuit iudicium, sed iam factum est." [Gratian.] Porro secundum iusticiam scribi est Deo auctore ea operari, quorum merito sit dignus eterna salute. Hunc duplicem modum scribendi in euangelio Deus assignauit, discipulis dicens: "In domo patris mei mansiones multae sunt; si quo minus, dixissem uobis, quia uado parare uobis locum; et si abiero, et preparauero uobis locum, iterum uenio, et accipiam uos ad me ipsum, ut ubi sum ego et uos sitis:" Dicens: "In domo patris mei mansiones multae sunt; si quo minus, dixissem uobis, quia uado parare uobis locum," ostendit, eos, quibus loquebatur, scriptos in libro uitae predestinatione. Subiciens: "si abiero, et preparauero uobis locum etc.," ostendit, illos adhuc esse scribendos operatione. Hinc etiam Augustinus in eiusdem loci explanatione ait:

[C. XI.]

"'In my Father's house are many dwellings.' The house of God, the temple of God, and the kingdom of heaven are just human beings, among whom there are many differences, and these are the dwellings of that house. These have already been prepared in predestination, as the Apostle says, 'Who chose us before the foundation of the world'—by predestining, but preparing in operation. Hence: 'Those whom he predestined, these he also called.' According to this it is said, 'God made the things that are to be,' that is, those that he is going to make." And below:

§ 1. "'If it were otherwise' confirms that they exist, because, if they did not exist, he would have said, 'I shall go and prepare,' that is, predestine. But because they are there, it is not necessary to prepare any. But because they do not yet exist in operation, he adds, 'And if I go and prepare.' By going but not abandoning, he prepares, because he withdraws himself and lies hidden, so that there may be faith, which is not concerned with a thing seen, and from this comes the merit of faith.

§ 2. "From this faith the just person lives, and one's heart is cleansed while one sojourns, and in it that which is not yet possessed is desired. This is the preparation of the dwelling, because he so prepares us for himself and himself for us that he may remain in us and we in him, according as each person will participate in him more or less in accordance with the diversity of merits. And this is the multitude of dwellings."

GRATIAN. One is erased according to justice because, grace having been withdrawn, one is permitted to perform those things by which one merits eternal condemnation. Hence the prophet, speaking in the person of Christ, says, "Let them be erased from the book of the living"—that is, let grace be withdrawn from them, upon whose withdrawal they are cast headlong into the depth of vices and thereafter into eternal condemnation—"and let them not be written with the just"—that is, let grace not be added to them by which they may become worthy of eternal salvation.

Thus sins are remitted according to foreknowledge when grace is prepared from eternity by which the one called is justified and the one justified is at last eternally glorified. But sins are remitted according to justice when either baptism is received with full faith or penance is celebrated with the whole heart; and this remission itself also is not unfittingly said to occur according to foreknowledge.

§ 1. For, as is given to be understood from the foregoing authority of the Apostle, there are two foreordinations: one by which each person is foreordained here to receive justice and remission of sins; the other by which someone is predestined to obtain eternal life in the future. Their effects are present justification and future glorification, all of which are fittingly distinguished in the foregoing authority. For the first predestination, by which persons are foreordained to present justice, is designated when it is said, “Just as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world, etc.” Its effect is added below: “In which he graced us in his beloved Son, etc.” The second foreordination is shown there: “Who predestined us unto the adoption of children, etc.” Its effect is placed first, when it is said, “Who blessed us with every blessing, etc.”

§ 2. These two foreordinations and their effects are so related that the first and its effect precede by nature and are inferred according to the rule of consequence. For if someone is foreordained to life, it is consequently inferred that one is predestined to justice; and if one attains eternal life, one has therefore attained justice. But the converse does not follow. Hence many are participants in the first foreordination and its effect to whom the second or its effect is proved in no way to pertain.

§ 3. According to this distinction that authority of John is to be understood: “They went out from us, but they were not of us. For if they had been of us, they would certainly have remained with us.” “They went out from us,” he says; that is, they withdrew from our fellowship, in which they were participants with us in the first foreordination and its effect. “But they were not of us”; that is, they had not entered with us into fellowship in the second foreordination and its effect. This can be seen from the fact that, if they had been of us—that is, if they had been participants with us in that foreordination—they would certainly have remained with us; that is, they would not have withdrawn from fellowship in the effect of that foreordination which they had contracted with us. For if each phrase were referred to the second foreordination, “they would have remained” would not fittingly be inferred; rather, they would certainly have begun to be with us. But if they were referred to the first, the proposition “if they had been of us, etc.” would be false. For many become participants in present justice and holiness who nevertheless do not persevere in it. Hence the Lord says in the Gospel, “Not the one who has begun, but the one who has persevered to the end, this one will be saved.”

> [C. XI.]
> "'In domo patris mei mansiones multae sunt.' Domus Dei, templum Dei, regnum celorum sunt homines iusti, in quibus sunt multae differentiae, et hae sunt mansiones ipsius domus. Hae autem iam paratae sunt in predestinatione, sicut ait apostolus: 'Qui elegit nos ante mundi constitutionem,' predestinando, parando autem in operatione. Unde: 'Quos predestinauit, hos et uocauit,' secundum hoc dicitur: 'Fecit Deus que futura sunt,' id est que facturus est." Et infra: §. 1. "'Si quo minus,' esse confirmat, quia, si non essent, dixisset: ibo et parabo, id est predestinabo. Sed quia ibi sunt, non est opus aliqua parare. Quia uero nondum sunt in operatione, addit: 'Et si abiero et preparauero.' Abiens, sed non relinquens, parat, quia subtrahit se et latet, ut sit fides, que non est de uisa re, et inde est meritum fidei." §. 2. "Ex hac uiuit iustus, et mundatur ei cor, dum peregrinatur, et in ea desideratur quod nondum habetur. Hec preparatio mansionis est, quia sic parat nos sibi, et se nobis, ut maneat in nobis, et nos in eo, quantum quisque erit particeps eius plus uel minus pro diuersitate meritorum. Et hec est multitudo mansionum." [Gratian.] Secundum iusticiam deletur quia gratia subtracta ea operari permittitur, quibus eternam dampnationem meretur. Hinc Propheta loquens ex persona Christi ait: "Deleantur de libro uiuentium," hoc est: subtrahatur eis gratia, qua subtracta hi in profundum uiciorum, deinde in eternam dampnationem precipitentur, "et cum iustis non scribantur," id est: non apponatur eis gratia, quo fiant digni eterna salute. Sic itaque peccata secundum prescientiam remittuntur, cum ab eterno gratia preparatur, qua uocatus iustificetur, iustificatus tandem eternaliter glorificetur. Secundum iusticiam uero peccata remittuntur, cum uel baptisma plena fide accipitur, uel penitencia toto corde celebratur, que remissio et ipsa secundum prescientiam non inconuenienter fieri dicitur. §. 1. Ut enim ex premissa auctoritate Apostoli datur intelligi, duae sunt preordinationes; una, qua quisque preordinatur hic ad iusticiam et remissionem peccatorum percipiendam; altera, qua aliquis predestinatur ad uitam eternam in futuro obtinendam. Harum effectus sunt presens iustificatio, et futura glorificatio, que omnia in premissa auctoritate conuenienter distinguuntur. Prima enim predestinatio qua preordinantur ad presentem iusticiam, designatur, dum dicitur: "Sicut elegit nos in ipso ante mundi constitutionem etc.," cuius effectus infra supponitur: "in qua gratificauit nos in dilecto filio suo etc." Secunda preordinatio ibi ostenditur: "qui predestinauit nos in adoptionem filiorum etc." Eius effectus premittitur, dum dicitur: "qui benedixit nos in omni benedictione etc." §. 2. Hae duae preordinationes et earum effectus ita se habent, ut prima et eius effectus natura precedant, lege consequendi inferantur. Si enim est aliquis preordinatus ad uitam, consequenter infertur, ergo predestinatus est ad iusticiam, et, si consequitur uitam eternam, est ergo consecutus iusticiam; sed non conuertitur. Unde multi sunt participes primae preordinationis et eius effectus, ad quos secunda uel eius effectus minime pertinere probantur. §. 3. Iuxta hanc distinctionem intelligenda est auctoritas illa Iohannis: Ex nobis exierunt; sed non erant ex nobis." Nam si fuissent ex nobis, mansissent utique nobiscum. "Ex nobis," inquit, "exierunt," id est: a nostra societate recesserunt, qua primae preordinationis et eius effectus nobiscum participes erant; "sed non erant ex nobis," id est secundae preordinationis et eius effectus societatem nobiscum non inierant. Quod ex eo uideri potest, quia, si fuissent ex nobis, id est, si illius preordinationis nobiscum participes essent, mansissent utique nobiscum, id est, a societate effectus eius preordinationis, quam nobiscum contraxerant, non recessissent. Si enim ad secundam preordinationem utrumque referretur, non conuenienter illud inferretur: 'mansissent;' immo cepissent utique esse nobiscum. Si uero ad primam, falsa esset propositio: 'si fuissent ex nobis etc.' Multi enim presentis iusticiae et sanctitatis participes fiunt, qui tamen in ea non perseuerant. Unde Dominus in euangelio ait: "Non qui ceperit, sed qui perseuerauerit usque in finem, hic saluus erit."

[C. XII.]

If someone says that this fellowship is contracted by those to be condemned in name and profession alone, but not in the truth of the thing, one is refuted by the testimony of the same authority. For concerning those who are participants in the first, but not the second, foreordination, it says: “Nor should it disturb us that God does not give this perseverance to some of his children. For far be it that it should be so if they were among the predestined,” and the other things contained above in the same authority.

For the sheep concerning whom the Lord says in the Gospel, “And I have other sheep that are not of this fold,” and the children concerning whom John says, “that he might gather into one the children of God who were scattered,” were sheep and children according to foreknowledge in such a way that, according to the quality of their present state, not merely in appearance but even before God’s eyes, they were children of wrath and eternal perdition. Hence the Apostle does not say, “We seemed to be,” but, “We too were by nature children of wrath.” Nor does he say, “You will be accounted by human beings,” but, “You were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord.” Writing about himself to Timothy, he also does not say, “I seemed to be,” but, “I was a blasphemer, a persecutor, and insulting; but now I have obtained mercy.” All those who are reborn in Christ and are redeemed from the devil by his blood are first born sinners from Adam and liable to diabolical servitude. Therefore, just as these, although they are going to be children of God, are nevertheless first children of the devil, so those of whom the discussion is being held, although by departing from justice they are going to be children of eternal perdition, nevertheless, while they live piously and faithfully, truly are children of God, just, and worthy of eternal beatitude. Hence the authority does not say, “when they seemed to live piously and faithfully,” but “when they lived piously and faithfully.” For those who were never truly good would not truly be changed from good into evil. Nor does the Lord say through Ezekiel, "If the just person turns away from the justice that one seemed to possess," but "from one's own justice," namely, that which one truly possesses.

§ 1. What follows in the same authority—"They were not in the number of the children when they were in the profession of children"—is to be understood thus: persons are called children of God in two ways. They are called children of God by participation in the eternal inheritance, as John says in the Gospel, "As many as believed in him, to them he gave the power to become children of God." And the Apostle says in the Letter to the Romans, "The expectation of creation awaits the revelation of the children of God." And below: "Creation itself will be freed from the servitude of corruption into the freedom of the glory of the children of God." And below: "We ourselves groan within ourselves, awaiting the adoption of the children of God." Hence Augustine also, expounding these same words of the Apostle, says: "For the present, only a creature, since the form of the children is not yet perfect." In this manner, therefore, none are children except participants in eternal beatitude.

§ 2. In the present life, persons are also called children in three ways: either by predestination alone, like those concerning whom John says, "that he might gather the children of God who were scattered, etc."; or by predestination and hope of eternal beatitude, like those to whom the Lord says, "Little children, I am with you yet a little while"; or by the merit of faith and present justice, but not by predestination to eternal glory, like those concerning whom the Lord says, "If his children abandon my law and do not walk in my judgments, etc." Therefore, those concerning whom the present discussion is held are children by the merit of faith and present justice, but they are not children of eternal adoption.

Those who admit that remitted sins return must therefore confess that they are remitted according to justice but not also according to foreknowledge, just as sins are imputed to those who will be saved according to justice unto eternal condemnation, but not according to foreknowledge; because to the former, who fall away from good into evil, every sin will be brought back for punishment, while to the latter, who persevere in good to the end, none will be imputed for punishment.

PART V. GRATIAN. But those who say that remitted sins do not return endeavor to affirm their opinion by the authority of Gregory and Prosper. For Gregory says in book XV of the Moralia, [c. 22]:

> [C. XII.]
> Hanc societatem si quis solo nomine et professione, non autem rei ueritate a dampnandis dicat contrahi, eiusdem auctoritatis testimonio conuincitur. De his enim, qui primae, non secundae preordinationis sunt participes, ait: "Nec nos moueat, quod filiis suis quibusdam Deus non dat istam perseuerantiam. Absit enim, ut ita sit, si de predestinatis essent," et cetera, que in eadem auctoritate supra continentur. Oues namque, de quibus in euangelio ait Dominus: "Et alias oues habeo, que non sunt ex hoc ouili," et filii, de quibus Iohannes ait: "ut filios Dei, qui erant dispersi, congregaret in unum," ita prescientia erant oues et filii, ut qualitate presentium, non specie tantum, sed etiam ante Dei oculos essent filii irae et perditionis eternae. Unde Apostolus non ait: uidebamur esse, sed: "eramus," inquit, "et nos natura filii irae." Nec ait: reputabimini ab hominibus, sed: "fuistis aliquando tenebrae, nunc autem lux in Domino." De se quoque scribens ad Tymotheum non ait: uidebar, sed: "fui blasphemus, et persecutor, et contumeliosus; nunc autem sum misericordiam consecutus." Omnes quoque, qui in Christo renascuntur, et qui eius sanguine a diabolo redimuntur, prius ex Adam peccatores nascuntur, et diabolicae seruituti obnoxii. Sicut ergo isti, quamuis sint futuri filii Dei, tamen prius sunt filii diaboli: sic hi, de quibus sermo habetur, quamuis recedendo a iusticia sint filii futuri perditionis eternae, tamen cum pie et fideliter uiuunt, uere sunt filii Dei, et iusti, et eterna beatitudine digni. Unde auctoritas non ait: cum uiderentur pie et fideliter uiuere, sed: "cum pie et fideliter uiuerent." Ne ueraciter a bono in malum conmutarentur qui numquam ueraciter boni fuerunt. Dominus quoque non ait per Ezechielem: si auerterit se iustus a iusticia, quam uidebatur habere, sed: "sua," scilicet quam ueraciter habet. §. 1. Quod autem in eadem auctoritate sequitur: "Non erant in numero filiorum, quando erant in professione filiorum," ita intelligendum est: filii Dei duobus modis appellantur. Dicuntur filii Dei participatione hereditatis eternae, sicut Iohannes ait in euangelio: "Quotquot crediderunt in eum, dedit eis potestatem filios Dei fieri." Et Apostolus in epistola ad Romanos: "Expectatio creaturae reuelationem filiorum Dei expectat." Et infra: "Ipsa creatura liberabitur a seruitute corruptionis in libertatem gloriae filiorum Dei." Et infra: "Ipsi intra nos gemimus, adoptionem filiorum Dei expectantes." Hinc etiam Augustinus, eadem uerba Apostoli exponens, ait: "Modo tantum creatura, cum nondum filiorum forma perfecta." Hoc ergo modo non sunt filii, nisi participes beatitudinis eternae. §. 2. In presenti etiam dicuntur filii tribus modis, uel predestinatione tantum (sicut hi, de quibus Iohannes ait: "ut filios Dei, qui erant dispersi etc.;" uel predestinatione, et spe eternae beatitudinis (sicut illi, quibus Dominus ait: Filioli, adhuc modicum uobiscum sum)," uel merito fidei et presentis iusticiae, non autem predestinatione, claritatis eternae, (sicut hi, de quibus Dominus ait: "Si dereliquerint filii eius legem meam, et in iudiciis meis non ambulauerint etc.)" Hi ergo, de quibus in presenti agitur, filii sunt merito fidei et presentis iusticiae, non autem sunt filii adoptionis eternae. Qui ergo peccata dimissa redire fatentur, secundum iusticiam, non etiam secundum prescientiam ea dimitti necesse est ut confiteantur, sicut saluandis peccata secundum iusticiam ad eternam dampnationem inputantur, non secundum prescientiam, quia et illis a bono in malum deficientibus singula replicabuntur ad supplicium, et his usque in finem in bono perseuerantibus nulla inputabuntur ad penam. V. Pars. [Gratian.] Qui autem dicunt, quod peccata dimissa non redeant, auctoritate Gregorii et Prosperi sententiam suam affirmare conantur. Ait enim Gregorius in Moralibus, libro XV.: [c. 22.]

[C. XIII.]

"What is meant by what is said, 'Who repays iniquity to children and grandchildren'? We certainly draw original sin from our fathers, and unless we are saved through the grace of baptism, we also bear the fault of our parents, because we are one with them. He will repay the iniquity of the fathers in the children when the soul of the offspring is polluted by original sin because of the parent's fault. And again, he does not repay the iniquity of the fathers in the children, because, when we are freed from original fault through baptism, we no longer possess the faults of our parents but those that we ourselves commit."

Likewise in Prosper's Responses, [to the second Objection of the Gauls]:

[C. XIII.]

"Quid est quod dicitur: 'Qui reddis iniquitatem filiis ac nepotibus?' Peccatum scilicet originale a patribus trahimus, et nisi per baptismi gratiam saluamur, etiam parentum culpam portamus, quia unum cum illis sumus. Reddet iniquitatem patrum in filiis, dum pro culpa parentis ex originali peccato anima polluitur prolis. Et rursus non reddit iniquitatem patrum in filiis, quia, cum ab originali culpa per baptismum liberamur, non iam parentum culpas, sed quas ipsi conmittimus habemus." Item in responsionibus Prosperi: [ad secundam obiectionem Gallorum]

[C. XIV.]

“One who withdraws from Christ and ends this life estranged from grace—where does that person go except into perdition? But one does not fall back into that which was remitted, nor will one be condemned in original sin; nevertheless, that person is afflicted by the death that was owed on account of the things remitted.”

GRATIAN. The end of this authority seems to contradict its beginning. For to have remitted sins return, or to be condemned in original sin, is nothing other than to undergo, after the remission of the sin, the penalty owed to it. The defenders of this opinion resolve the authorities that are contrary to one another in this way: remitted sins are said to return because whoever, after receiving remission, returns to vomit will be punished all the more severely insofar as, having more greatly abused God’s kindness, one proved ungrateful for the remission received for each sin.

PART VI. § 1. But the former opinion seems more favorable, because it is strengthened by more authorities and confirmed by more evident reason. For, as the Lord says through Ezekiel, [c. 18]:

> [C. XIV.]
>
> "Qui recedit a Christo, et alienus a gratia finit hanc uitam quid nisi in perditionem uadit? sed non in id, quod remissum est, recidit, nec in originali peccato dampnabitur; qui tamen ea morte afficitur, que ei propter dimissa, debebatur." [Gratian.] Finis huius auctoritatis principio contraire uidetur. Neque enim est aliud peccata dimissa redire, uel in originali peccato dampnari, quam penam peccato debitam post eiusdem remissionem excipere. Auctoritates uero sibi contrarias assertores huius sententiae ita determinant: peccata dimissa redire dicuntur, quia quisquis post acceptam remissionem ad uomitum redierit tanto grauius punietur, quanto magis benignitate Dei abusus singulorum remissionis acceptae ingratus extitit. VI. Pars. §. 1. Verum illa sentencia fauorabilior uidetur, quia pluribus roboratur auctoritatibus, et euidentiori ratione firmatur. Ut enim Dominus ait per Ezechielem: [c. 18.]

[C. XV.]

“If the just person turns away from one’s justice and commits iniquity according to all the abominations that an impious person is accustomed to commit, shall that person live? All the person’s just deeds that one had done will not be remembered; one will die in one’s sin, and the just deeds that one performed will not be in memory.”

> [C. XV.]
>
> "Si auerterit se iustus a iusticia sua, et fecerit iniquitatem secundum omnes abhominationes, quas operari solet inpius, numquid uiuet? omnes iusticiae eius, quas fecerat, non recordabuntur; in peccato suo morietur, et non erunt in memoria iusticiae eius, quas fecit."

[C. XVI.] Likewise Gregory in his explanation of the same passage.

“This must especially be considered by us: when we commit evil things, we recall our past good things without cause, because in the perpetration of evils there ought to be no confidence in preceding good things.”

> [C. XVI.] Item Gregorius in eiusdem loci explanatione.
>
> "Hoc nobis maxime considerandum est, quia, cum mala conmittimus, sine causa bona nostra transacta reuocamus, quoniam in perpetratione malorum nulla debet esse fiducia bonorum preteritorum."

[C. XVII.] The same, [in homily IV on Ezekiel c. 1].

"For from a perforated bag, what is put in from one place goes out through another, because undiscerning minds do not observe how the reward acquired from a good work is lost through an evil work."

[C. XVII.] Idem. [in homil. IV. ad c. 1. Ezech.]

"De pertuso quippe sacculo aliunde exit quod aliunde inmittitur, quia indiscretae mentes mercedem, que ex bono opere acquiritur, non aspiciunt, quomodo ex malo opere perdatur."

[C. XVIII.] Likewise Peter in the Second Letter, [c. 2].

"If those who escape the defilements of the world through knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ are again entangled in them and overcome, the later things have become worse for them than the former. For it would have been better for them not to know the way of justice than, after knowing it, to turn backward from the holy commandment handed down to them." Paul also, writing to the Hebrews, says, [c. 6]:

[C. XVIII.] Item Petrus in epistola II. [c. 2.]

"Si refugientes coinquinationes mundi in cognitione Domini nostri et saluatoris Iesu Christi, his rursus inplicati superantur, facta sunt eis posteriora deteriora prioribus. Melius enim erat illis non cognoscere uiam iusticiae, quam post cognitionem retrorsum conuerti ab eo, quod illis traditum est sancto mandato." Paulus quoque scribens ad Ebreos ait: [c. 6.]

[C. XIX.]

"Leaving behind the discourse concerning the beginning of Christ, let us be borne onward to his perfection, not again laying the foundation of penance from dead works."

GRATIAN. By saying "dead works," he signifies the former good things that had been made dead through the subsequent sin, because by sinning these persons rendered their former good things void. Just as these are made void by sinning, so through penance they revive, and each begins to avail toward the merit of eternal beatitude—even those found mingled with sins. Hence Augustine says, "It is pious to believe, etc.," and Jerome, "God is not unjust, etc." The Apostle also, writing to the Hebrews, after briefly recalling their faith, love, and good works, shows that after penance they would receive from the Lord the reward for all these things which they had lost by sinning.

Moreover, the one who said through the prophet, "If the just person turns away from one's justice, etc.," himself promised through the same prophet, saying, "If the impious person performs penance for all the sins that one has committed, keeps all my precepts, and performs judgment and justice, that person shall live by life and shall not die. I shall not remember any of the iniquities that one committed; that person shall live in the justice that one performed." To the children of Israel who were to be taken captive by the Assyrians, the Lord also reproaches through Hosea the sin of their old idolatry, and shows that the sin which had been remitted to their fathers when Moses supplicated had revived in the children, saying:

[C. XIX.]

"Intermittentes sermonem inchoationis Christi feramur ad eius perfectionem, non rursus iacientes fundamentum penitenciae ab operibus mortuis." [Gratian.] Dicens opera mortua, priora bona significat, que per sequens peccatum erant mortua, quia hi peccando priora bona irrita fecerunt. Hec, sicut peccando fiunt irrita, ita per penitenciam reuiuiscunt, et ad meritum eternae beatitudinis singula prodesse incipiunt etiam illa, que peccatis inueniuntur admixta. Unde Augustinus: "Pium est credere etc." et Ieronimus: "Non est iniustus Deus etc." Apostolus etiam scribens ad Ebreos, cum fidem, et dilectionem, et bona opera eorum breuiter conmemorasset, horum omnium mercedem, quam peccando amiserant, post penitenciam a Domino eos recepturos ostendit. Porro, qui per Prophetam dixit: "Si auerterit se iustus a iusticia sua etc.," ipse per eundem prophetam promisit dicens: "Si inpius egerit penitenciam ab omnibus peccatis suis, que operatus est, et custodierit uniuersa precepta mea, et fecerit iudicium et iusticiam, uita uiuet, et non morietur; omnium iniquitatum eius non recordabor, quas operatus est; in iusticia sua, quam operatus est, uiuet." Filiis quoque Israel per Assyrios captiuandis ueteris ydolatriae peccatum per Osee Dominus inproperat, et peccatum, quod Moyse supplicante patribus fuerat dimissum, hoc in filiis reuixisse ostendit, dicens:

[C. XX.]

"Woe to them, because they have withdrawn from me; they will be laid waste because they have transgressed against me. Yet I redeemed them, and they spoke lies against me; they did not cry out to me in their heart, but howled in their beds. They ruminated upon wheat and wine and withdrew from me. I instructed them and strengthened their arms, and they devised malice against me. They turned back so that they might be without a yoke; they became like a deceitful bow. Their princes will fall by the sword because of the fury of their tongue."

PART VII. GRATIAN. The divine discourse reproaches the children with the ancient sins of their parents and for that reason predicts that their princes will fall by the sword. But through the same prophet the Lord shows that he acts against himself, saying:

[C. XX.]

"Ve eis, quoniam recesserunt a me; uastabuntur, quia preuaricati sunt in me. Ego tamen redemi eos, et ipsi locuti sunt contra me mendacia, et non clamauerunt ad me in corde suo, sed ululabant in cubilibus suis; super triticum et uinum ruminabant, et recesserunt a me, et ego erudiui eos, et confortaui brachia eorum, et in me cogitauerunt maliciam; reuersi sunt, ut essent absque iugo; facti sunt quasi arcus dolosus; cadent in gladio principes eorum a furore linguae suae." VII. Pars. [Gratian.] Antiqua peccata parentum filiis inproperat sermo diuinus, et propterea principes eorum in gladio casuros predicit. Sed per eundem Prophetam contra se Dominus facere ostendit, dicens:

[C. XXI.]

"Lest perhaps they say in their hearts that I have remembered all their malice: now their inventions have surrounded them; they were made before my face."

[C. XXI.]

"Ne forte dicant in cordibus suis, omnem maliciam eorum me recordatum, nunc circumdederunt eos adinuentiones suae; coram facie mea factae sunt."

[C. XXII.] Jerome, [on Hosea c. 7].

"When they are punished in this way, let them not think that I punish them for the old sins of their fathers, because now—that is, in the present—they are surrounded with punishment for their own malicious deeds which they have devised; and their evils, as they suppose, cannot lie hidden from me. Rather, the very inventions lie open before my face, which sees all things clearly."

[C. XXII.] Ieronimus. [ad c. 7. Oseae]

"Cum ita puniantur, ne cogitent, quod pro ueteribus peccatis patrum puniam eos, quia nunc, id est in presenti, pro maliciis suis, quas inuenerunt, circumdati sunt pena, et mala eorum, sicut putant, non possunt me latere; sed potius ipsae adinuentiones apertae sunt coram facie mea, que omnia clare uidet."

[C. XXIII.] The same.

"Heretics cannot plead old sins against God when they add a new impiety to ancient works and are bound by their own sins; and although they think that they conceal themselves from God, they cannot avoid his eyes, because the Lord's countenance is upon those who do evil things."

[C. XXIII.] Idem.

"Heretici non possunt uetera peccata contra Deum causari, cum antiquis operibus nouam addant inpietatem, et suis ligentur peccatis, et, cum Deum celare se putant, oculos eius uitare non possunt, quia uultus Domini super facientes mala."

[C. XXIV.] Likewise Gelasius.

"Divine clemency does not permit remitted sins afterward to return for vengeance."

GRATIAN. But by these authorities children, expiated from original sin, are taught that they are not punished because their fathers sinned; rather, their fathers' sins return upon them because they follow their fault. So also good things that die through sin will avail toward reward, not because they were done, but because they revive through penance. Of this kind is also that saying of Augustine in the Book of Psalms, "If Judas had retained adoption, etc." Thus also that saying of Gregory in the Moralia is understood: "What is meant by what is said, 'You repay the iniquity of the fathers, etc.'?" For the parents' iniquity is repaid to those who are punished because they drew the bitterness of sin in its root. But it is said not to be repaid to those in whom the parent's sins do not revive through the desert of their own iniquity. Therefore, just as good things that die through sin revive through penance unto reward, so evil things that are destroyed through penance revive unto punishment. Hence the prophet, in the person of a penitent, laments, saying, "My scars have putrefied and become corrupted"—that is, the wounds healed through baptism. Hence also the same prophet, although he knew himself cleansed from original sin by faith and the sacrament of circumcision, nevertheless, understanding that it had revived through the adultery and homicide he had committed, not without cause confesses it among the other things and says, "Behold, for I was conceived in iniquities, etc."

[C. XXIV.] Item Gelasius.

"Diuina clementia dimissa peccata in ultionem ulterius redire non patitur." [Gratian.] Sed his auctoritatibus docentur filii, ab originali peccato expiati, non ideo puniendi, quia patres peccauerunt, sed ideo peccata patrum in eos redire, quia eorum culpam secuntur. Sic et bona, que peccato moriuntur, non proficient ad premium, quia facta sunt, sed quia per penitenciam reuiuiscunt. Tale est et illud Augustini in libro Psalmorum: "Si Iudas teneret adoptionem etc." Sic etiam illud Gregorii in Moralibus intelligitur: "Quid est quod dicitur: 'Reddis iniquitatem patrum etc.'" Illis namque parentum iniquitas redditur, qui propterea puniuntur, quia in radice traxerunt amaritudinem peccati. Illis autem non reddi dicitur, in quibus merito suae iniquitatis non reuiuiscunt parentis peccata. Sicut ergo bona, que peccato moriuntur, per penitenciam reuiuiscunt ad premium: sic et mala, que per penitenciam delentur, reuiuiscunt ad supplicium. Unde Propheta ex persona penitentis deplorat dicens: "Putruerunt et corruptae sunt cicatrices meae," id est plagae per baptismum sanatae. Hinc etiam idem propheta, quamuis fide et sacramento circumcisionis ab originali peccato se mundatum cognosceret, tamen adulterio et homicidio, quod conmiserat, illud reuixisse intelligens, non sine causa inter cetera ipsum confitetur, et dicit: "Ecce enim in iniquitatibus conceptus sum etc."

Distinction V

GRATIAN. PART I. Augustine teaches in the Book on Penance what things it is necessary for a sinner to consider in penance, saying:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. In penitencia autem, que peccatorem considerare oportet, Augustinus in libro de penitencia docet, dicens:

[C. I.]

"Let one consider the quality of the crime in place, in time, in perseverance, in the variety of the person, with what temptation one committed it, and in the manifold execution of the vice itself. For it is necessary that one who fornicates repent according to the eminence of one's status or office, or according to the condition of the prostitute, and according to the manner of one's deed and how one accomplished one's baseness: whether in a consecrated place, or with one to whom one owed the eminence of fidelity—as in the houses of lords and of many others—or at a time appointed for prayer, such as the festivals of the saints and times of fasting. Let one consider how long one persevered and lament that one sinned perseveringly, and how great an assault overcame one. There are those who not only are not overcome, but voluntarily offer themselves to sin; they do not await temptation, but anticipate pleasure. And let one discuss with oneself by how manifold an exercise of the vice one sinned pleasurably. All this variety must be confessed and lamented, so that, when one has recognized that the sin is great, one may quickly find God propitious.

§ 1. "In recognizing the increase of the sin, let one consider oneself: of what age, wisdom, and order one was, and the entire state of another who does not sin. Let one linger over each of these things and perceive the measure of the crime, purging with tears every quality of the vice.

§ 2. "Let one lament the virtue of which one was deprived in the meantime. For one must grieve and purge by grief not only the fact that one sinned, but also that one deprived oneself of virtue. For although one hopes to obtain pardon, one can nevertheless grieve because one did not merit that for which one trusts one will be rewarded.

§ 3. "Let one be distressed and grieve that, by now escaping punishment for past things, the wretched person does not expect glory from that time, all of which, because it is exceedingly brief, one ought to have spent contending to attain the reward.

§ 4. "Let one also lament because, by offending in one thing, one has been made guilty of all. For one who, full of virtues, did not altogether fear God proved ungrateful. Each sinner is more culpable in this insofar as one is more acceptable to God. For this reason Adam sinned more, because he abounded in every good. In another manner also, one who offends in one thing is guilty of all, because every virtue suffers loss from one vice. For if someone falls into avarice, one destroys generosity and also diminishes chastity. For from love of money one would either violate chastity or at least love it less. For if there is still so much chastity in one on account of God that one does not wish to lose it, nevertheless one guards it at least with lesser joy and lesser affection where one sees that a loss of money proceeds from it. So also in the other virtues: even if they are not expelled, they are nevertheless diminished greatly or a little through the reception of one vice, or are made worse in intention. Hence every virtue must be lamented in the case of every crime, and indulgence must be sought concerning them all.

§ 5. "It is also necessary to observe and, by observing, to lament the soul of one's neighbor which the fornicator snatched away from God or confirmed in evil after it had been snatched away; and also that one proved an example of evil in the commission of one's crime, although it would have profited one more to have been for others a cause of conversion. Therefore, let one groan over the life of others corrupted in one's own, or preserved incorrupt, and over the benefit to one's neighbor that one would have given by a good example. Let one grieve over the sorrow that one brought upon good persons by sinning and over the joy that one did not furnish them. And let one consider not only what one did and how, but how unjustly, as we have said, one offended God by sinning. Let one fear that sentence of truth: 'You cannot serve two masters.' Therefore, let one fear lest, by persevering in one sin, one has lost through the excommunication of evil all the good things that one did, so that one who served the devil through crime has lost the virtues one offered to God. Nevertheless, it is pious to believe that, once the grace of God has been received—which destroys the former evils in that person—it also rewards the good things, so that, when it has destroyed what it did not find as its own, it loves and cherishes the good that it planted even in a sinner.

§ 6. "Grieving in all things, let one either abandon the world or at least those things that are not administered without an admixture of evil, such as commerce, military service, and other things harmful to those who employ them, such as the administrations of secular powers, unless one employs them by permission of obedience. Let one place oneself altogether in the power of the judge, in the judgment of the priest, reserving nothing of oneself for oneself, so that at his command one is prepared to do, for recovering the life of the soul, whatever one would do to avoid the death of the body; and this with desire, because one recovers life without end, like God. For one who is going to be immortal ought to do with joy what one who is going to die would do to defer death. Let one always supplicate God, certain of pardon, who, if doubtful, would ask an earthly power in every way and without weariness. Let one who committed unlawful things in the freedom of one's choice abstain from many lawful things.

"Let one always offer God the mind and contrition of heart, and then what one can from one's possession; then let one securely offer what one offers. 'For the Lord looked upon Abel and his gifts.' But Scripture says 'upon Abel' before 'upon his gifts.' For, accepting the mind that he knew to be humble and pure, he rewarded the gifts of that person's liberality. But he did not look upon Cain or his gifts. For he did not receive his gifts because he did not acknowledge his mind, which he had seen. Therefore, in the judgment of the heart the alms of the giver is to be considered; one must no longer consider how much, but with what mind and what affection one gives what one can. For the widow, generous with the two small coins that she possessed, put in more than all. Therefore, one who wishes to redeem one's sins by an offering of temporal things should take care first to offer the mind.

§ 7. “Let one take care lest, led by shame, one divide one’s confession within oneself, so as to wish to manifest different things to different priests. For some conceal from one priest certain things which they preserve to be manifested to another. This is to praise oneself, to tend toward hypocrisy, and always to lack the pardon at which one thinks to arrive whole by fragments.

§ 8. “Moreover, let one whom true penance delights be fearful; let one not approach the Lord’s body before a good conscience strengthens one. But in this separation let one consider the dreadful judgment, where he will separate the impenitent into the fire by a greater and more terrible separation. Let one grieve that one does not yet dare to receive the saving food which one greatly desires. These are worthy fruits of penance, disentangling the captive soul and preserving it in liberty.

§ 9. “Moreover, let one who wishes to attain the perfect grace of remission restrain oneself from games and the spectacles of the world. For if Dinah had restrained herself and remained among her own, she would not have been corrupted by a foreign ravisher. Therefore, let the soul that has often, or even once, been seized and corrupted beware for itself and restrain itself all the more; taught by experience, let it fear what it did not know while a virgin. Let it choose one whom it may imitate; let it not follow one whom its own soul condemns. For one judges oneself who does not distance from oneself a person who lacks the fruits of penance. For one praises and loves those whom one knows to bear fruit worthily. Let one seek worthy fruits, even if they are not worthy fruits of penance. For the fruits of the virtues are worthy fruits, but they do not suffice for penitents. Penance demands weightier fruits, so that the church may thus be appeased and, appeased by sorrow and groans, may obtain life for the dead.”

> [C. I.]
> "Consideret qualitatem criminis in loco, in tempore, in perseuerantia, in uarietate personae, et quali hoc fecerit temptatione, et in ipsius uicii multiplici executione. Oportet enim penitere fornicantem secundum exellentiam sui status aut offitii aut secundum modum meretricis, et in modo operis sui, et qualiter turpitudinem suam peregit, si in loco sacrato, aut cui debuit exellentiam fidei (ut sunt domus dominorum, et aliorum multorum), si in tempore orationi constituto, ut festiuitates sanctorum et tempora ieiunii. Consideret, quantum perseuerauerit, et defleat quod perseueranter peccauit, et quanta fuerit uictus inpugnatione. Sunt qui non solum non uincuntur, sed ultro se peccato offerunt, nec expectant temptationem, sed preueniunt uoluptatem, et pertractet secum, quam multiplici actione uicii delectabiliter peccauit. Omnis ista uarietas confitenda est et deflenda, ut, cum cognouerit quod peccatum est multum, cito inueniat Deum propitium. §. 1. In cognoscendo augmentum peccati inueniat se, cuius etatis fuerit, cuius sapientiae, et ordinis, et statum omnem alterius non peccantis. Inmoretur in singulis istis, et sentiat modum criminis, purgans lacrimis omnem qualitatem uicii. §. 2. Defleat uirtutem, qua interim caruit. Dolendum enim est, et dolore purgandum, non solum quia peccauit, sed quod se uirtute priuauit. Nam, licet speret se consecuturum ueniam, dolere tamen potest, quia non promeruit unde remunerari confidat. §. 3. Anxietur et doleat, quod modo effugiens de preteritis penam, miser non inde exspectet gloriam, cuius omne tempus, quoniam breuissimum est, debuit decertauisse ad consequendum premium. §. 4. Defleat etiam, quoniam offendens in uno factus est omnium reus. Ingratus enim extitit qui plenus uirtutibus Deum non omnino timuit. In hoc enim quisque peccator fit culpabilior, quo est Deo acceptior. Ideo enim Adam plus peccauit, quia omni bono habundauit. Etiam alio modo offendens in uno est omnium reus, quia omnis uirtus patitur detrimentum ab uno uicio. Nam si quis cadit in auariciam, largitatem destruit, et etiam castitatem minorauit. Amore enim pecuniae uel uiolaret castitatem, uel saltim minus amaret. Si enim tanta propter Deum adhuc castitas inest, ut nolit eandem perdere, tamen saltim minori gaudio, minori affectione tuetur eam, ubi uidet inde procedere dampnum pecuniae, sicque et in aliis, que, etiamsi non expellantur, tamen perceptione unius uicii uel satis uel parum minuuntur, uel intentione deteriorantur. Unde omnis uirtus cuicumque crimini est deflenda, et de omnibus indulgentia est petenda. §. 5. Animaduertere etiam oportet, et animaduertendo deflere animam proximi, quam fornicator Deo eripuit, uel ereptam in malo confirmauit; etiam quod exemplum extitit mali in operatione sui criminis; cui magis profuisset, si aliis causa fuisset conuersionis. Gemat itaque aliorum uitam in sua corruptam, uel incorruptam conseruatam, et commodum proximi, quod dedisset exemplo boni. Doleat de tristicia, quam bonis peccando intulit, et de leticia, quam eis non adhibuit. Et non solum cogitet quid et qualiter fecerit, sed quam iniuste Deum, ut diximus, peccando offenderit. Timeat illam sentenciam ueritatis: 'Non potestis duobus dominis seruire.' Timeat ergo, ne omnia bona, que fecit, dum in uno peccato perseuerauerit, excommunicatione mali perdiderit, ut qui seruiuit diabolo per crimen, Deo, quas obtulit, uirtutes amiserit. Pium tamen est credere, ut recepta gratia Dei, que in eo destruit mala priora, etiam remuneret bona, ut, cum destruxerit quod suum non inuenit, amet et diligat bonum, quod etiam in peccante plantauit. §. 6. In omnibus dolens aut seculum derelinquat, aut saltim illa, que sine ammixtione mali non sunt amministrata, ut mercatura, et milicia, et alia, que utentibus sunt nociua, ut amministrationes secularium potestatum, nisi his utatur ex obedientiae licentia. Ponat se omnino in potestate iudicis, in iudicio sacerdotis, nichil sibi reseruans sui, ut omnia eo iubente paratus sit facere pro recipienda uita animae, quecumque faceret pro euitanda corporis morte, et hoc cum desiderio, quia uitam recuperat infinitam, ut Deus. Cum gaudio enim facere debet immortalis futurus que faceret pro differenda morte moriturus. Semper deprecetur Deum, certus de uenia, qui omnibus modis et sine tedio dubius rogaret potestatem terrenam. Abstineat a multis licitis qui in libertate arbitrii conmisit illicita. Semper offerat Deo mentem, et cordis contritionem, deinde et quod potest de possessione; tunc quod offerat securus offerat. 'Respexit enim Dominus ad Abel, et ad munera eius.' Sed prius dicit ad Abel, quam ad munera. Sumens enim mentem, quam cognouit humilem et puram, remunerauit eius largitatis munera. Ad Cayn uero non respexit, neque ad munera eius. Mentem enim eius, quam uiderat, quoniam non cognouit, eius munera non recepit. In iudicio itaque cordis consideranda est elemosina tribuentis, nec iam considerandum est quantum, sed qua mente, qua affectione dat quod potest. Vidua enim duobus, que habuerat, minutis larga, plus omnibus posuit. Qui igitur peccata sua redimere uult temporalium oblatione, caueat prius offerat mentem. §. 7. Cautus sit, ne uerecundia ductus diuidat apud se confessionem, ut diuersa diuersis uelit sacerdotibus manifestare. Quedam enim uni celant que alii manifestanda conseruant, quod est se laudare, et ad ypocrisim tendere, et semper uenia carere, ad quam per frusta totam putat peruenire. §. 8. Paueat preterea quem uera delectat penitencia; non prius ad corpus Domini accedat, quam confortet bona conscientia. Sed in hac separatione tremendum iudicium cogitet ubi maius et terribilius inpenitentes separabit in ignem. Doleat, quod nondum audet sumere, quem multum desiderat, cibum salutarem. Isti sunt digni fructus penitenciae, animam captiuam elaqueantes et in libertate seruantes. §. 9. Cohibeat se preterea a ludis, a spectaculis seculi, qui perfectam uult consequi gratiam remissionis. Nam Dina, si se cohibuisset, si inter suos remansisset, ab extraneo raptore corrupta non esset. Tanto itaque magis sibi anima caueat et cohibeat se, que sepe uel semel rapta est et corrupta; timeat iam docta experimento, quod ignorauit uirgo; eligat quem imitetur; non sequatur quem animus suus dampnat. Se enim iudicat qui penitenciae fructus non habentem a se non elongat. Laudat enim et amat quos digne fructificare non ignorat; querat fructus dignos etsi non dignos penitenciae. Sunt enim digni fructus uirtutum fructus, qui non sufficiunt penitentibus. Penitencia enim grauiores expostulat, ut sic pacetur ecclesia, ut, pacata dolore et gemitibus, mortuis uitam inpetret."

C. II. Let a penitent cast away the profits of commerce.

Likewise Pope Leo, [letter XC, otherwise XCII, to Bishop Rusticus, c. 9]. PART II. The quality of the profit either accuses or indicts the merchant, because gain can be both honorable and base. Nevertheless, it is more useful for a penitent to suffer losses than to be bound by the dangers of commerce, because it is difficult for sin not to intervene in commerce between buyer and seller.

C. II. Penitens negotiationis lucra abiciat.

Item Leo Papa. [epist. XC. al. XCII. ad Rusticum Episcopum, c. 9.] II. Pars. Qualitas lucri negotiantem aut accusat, aut arguit, quia et est honestus questus, et turpis. Verumtamen penitenti utilius est dispendia pati, quam periculis negotiationis astringi, quia difficile est inter ementis uendentisque commercium non interuenire peccatum.

C. III. After penance it is not permitted to return to secular military service.

The same, [in the same letter, c. 10]. It is altogether contrary to ecclesiastical rules to return to secular military service after performing penance, since the Apostle says, "No one serving as a soldier for God entangles oneself in secular affairs." Hence one who wishes to entangle oneself in worldly military service is not free from the snares of the devil.

C. III. Post penitenciam ad miliciam secularem redire non licet.

Idem. [ibidem, c. 10.] Contrarium omnino est ecclesiasticis regulis, post penitenciae actionem redire ad miliciam secularem, cum Apostolus dicat: "Nemo militans Deo inplicat se negociis secularibus." Unde non est liber a laqueis diaboli qui se miliciae mundanae uoluerit implicare.

C. IV. Those who return to secular military service after penance are to perform penance for ten years.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea, [c. 11]. But if any, called by God's grace, first indeed showed their faith by laying aside the military belt, but afterward returned to their own vomit, so that they both gave money and sought again to enter military service, let these spend ten years among the penitents after the first three years during which they were among the hearers. But this is especially to be observed by everyone: that their disposition and the fruits of penance be attended to. For all who with every fear, persevering tears, and good works demonstrate their conversion not by words alone but by deed and truth, when the time established for them has been completed and they have now begun to share in the prayers, it will be permitted to the bishop to consider something still more humane concerning them. But those who have regarded their fall with indifference and judge it sufficient for themselves that they entered the church shall complete the appointed times in every respect.

C. IV. Decennio peniteant qui post penitenciam ad secularem miliciam redeunt.

Item ex Niceno Concilio. [c. 11.] Si qui uero per Dei gratiam uocati primo quidem ostenderunt fidem suam deposito miliciae cingulo, post hec autem ad proprium uomitum reuersi sunt, ut et pecunias darent, et ambirent rursus ad miliciam, isti decem annis sint inter penitentes post primum triennium, quo fuerint inter audientes. Ab omnibus uero illud precipue obseruetur, ut animus eorum et fructus penitenciae attendatur. Quicumque enim cum omni timore, et lacrimis perseuerantibus, et operibus bonis conuersationem suam non uerbis solis, sed opere et ueritate demonstrant, cum tempus statutum a his fuerit inpletum, et orationibus iam ceperint conmunicare, licebit episcopo etiam humanius circa eos aliquid cogitare. Qui uero indifferentem habuerint lapsum, et sufficere sibi, quod ecclesiam introierint, arbitrantur, isti omnimodo tempora statuta conplebunt.

C. V. Those who return to secular affairs after penance are to be suspended from communion.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, [I, c. 13]. Concerning those who, after undertaking penance, forget the religious obligation of their profession and relapse into secular affairs, it was resolved that they be both suspended from communion and separated from the meals of all Catholics. But if, after the prohibition, anyone presumes to eat with them, let that person also be deprived of communion.

C. V. A communione suspendantur qui post penitenciam ad secularia redeunt.

Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I., c. 13.] De his, qui suscepta penitencia religionem suae professionis obliti ad secularia relabuntur, placuit eos et a conmunione suspendi, et ab omnium catholicorum conuiuiis separari. Quod si post interdictum cum eis quisque presumpserit manducare, et ipse conmunione priuetur.

C. VI. What false penance is.

Likewise Gregory, [VII, at the Roman Synod celebrated in 1078, c. 6]. PART III. We call those penances false which are not imposed according to the authority of the holy Fathers in proportion to the quality of the crimes. Therefore, if a soldier, merchant, or person devoted to any office that cannot be exercised without sin comes to penance entangled in graver faults—or one who unjustly retains another's goods, or bears hatred in the heart—let that person recognize that one cannot perform true penance through which one may be able to arrive at eternal life unless one abandons the business, leaves the office, dismisses hatred from the heart, restores the goods that one unjustly took away, lays down arms, and bears them no longer, except by the counsel of religious bishops for the defense of justice. Nevertheless, lest that person despair, meanwhile we exhort one to do whatever good one can, so that almighty God may illuminate that person's heart toward penance.

C. VI. Que sit falsa penitencia.

Item Gregorius. [VII. in Sinodo Romana, celebrata anno 1078., c. 6.] III. Pars. Falsas penitencias dicimus, que non secundum auctoritatem sanctorum Patrum pro qualitate criminum inponuntur. Ideoque miles, uel negotiator, uel alicui offitio deditus, quod sine peccato exerceri non possit si culpis grauioribus irretitus ad penitenciam uenerit, uel qui bona alterius iniuste detinet, uel qui odium in corde gerit, recognoscat, se ueram penitenciam non posse peragere, per quam ad eternam uitam ualeat peruenire, nisi negotium relinquat, uel offitium deserat, et odium ex corde dimittat, bona quidem que iniuste abstulit, restituat, arma deponat, ulteriusque non ferat, nisi consilio religiosorum episcoporum pro defendenda iusticia. Ne tamen desperet, interim quicquid boni facere poterit hortamur ut faciat, ut omnipotens Deus cor illius illustret ad penitenciam.

C. VII. After conversion it is not permitted to return to a business that cannot be conducted without sin.

Likewise Gregory in homily XXIV on the Gospels. A business that existed without sin before conversion was also not a fault to resume after conversion. For there are many businesses that can scarcely, or not at all, be carried on without sins. Therefore, the mind must not return after conversion to those things that entangle it in sin.

C. VII. Post conuersionem ad negotium redire non licet, quod sine peccato agi non potest.

Item Gregorius in omelia XXIV. [Euangel.] Negotium, quod ante conuersionem sine peccato extitit, hoc etiam post conuersionem repetere culpa non fuit. Sunt enim pleraque negotia, que sine peccatis exhiberi aut uix, aut nullatenus possunt. Que ergo ad peccatum inplicant, ad hec necesse est ut post conuersionem animus non recurrat.

C. VIII. On the same matter.

Likewise Innocent II, [at the Roman Council, c. 22]. PART IV. We admonish our brothers and priests not to permit the souls of laypersons to be deceived by false penances and dragged into hell. It is established that penance is false when, after many sins have been spurned, penance is performed for only one, or when penance is so performed for one that there is no withdrawal from another. Hence it is written: "Whoever observes the whole law but offends in one thing has become guilty of all"—namely, with respect to eternal life; for just as if one were entangled in all sins, so, if one remains in only one, one will not enter the gate of eternal life. Penance is also false when the penitent does not withdraw from a curial or commercial office that cannot in any way be conducted without sins; or if one bears hatred in the heart; or if one does not make satisfaction to anyone one has offended; or if the offended person does not forgive the offender; or if anyone bears arms against justice.

C. VIII. De eodem.

Item Innocentius II. [in Concilio Romano, c. 22] IV. Pars. Fratres nostros et presbiteros ammonemus, ne falsis penitenciis laicorum animas decipi et in infernum pertrahi patiantur. Falsam autem penitenciam esse constat, cum spretis pluribus de uno solo penitencia agitur, aut cum sic de uno agitur, ut ab alio non discedatur. Unde scriptum est: "Qui totam legem obseruauerit, offendat autem in uno, factus est omnium reus;" scilicet quantum ad uitam eternam; sicut enim si peccatis omnibus esset inuolutus, ita si in uno tantum maneat, eternae uitae ianuam non intrabit. Falsa est etiam penitencia, cum penitens ab offitio uel curiali uel negotiali non recedit, quod sine peccatis nullatenus agi preualet; aut si odium in corde gesserit, aut si offenso cuilibet non satisfaciat, aut si offendenti offensus non indulgeat, aut si arma quis contra iusticiam gerat.

Distinction VI

GRATIAN. PART I. To whom confession ought to be made, or what sort of person the one who judges the crimes of others ought to be, is taught from the same Book on Penance, [c. 10], when it is said:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Cui autem debeat fieri confessio, uel qualem illum oporteat esse, qui aliorum crimina iudicat, ex eodem libro [de penitencia c. 10.] docetur, cum dicitur:

[C. I.]

"One who wishes to confess sins so as to find grace should seek a priest who knows how to bind and loose, lest, when one has proved negligent concerning oneself, one be neglected by him who mercifully admonishes and seeks one, and lest both fall into the pit which the fool refused to avoid." And below: "Accordingly, the power of confession is so great that, if a priest is lacking, one should confess to one's neighbor. For it often happens that a penitent cannot be ashamed before a priest, since neither place nor time provides one to the person desiring him. And although the one to whom the person confesses does not have the power of loosing, nevertheless the one who confesses the baseness of the crime to a companion becomes worthy of pardon because of the desire for a priest. For the lepers were cleansed while they were going to show their faces to the priests, before they reached them. Hence it is clear that God looks to the heart when necessity prevents persons from reaching the priests. Indeed, often they seek them while healthy and joyful; while they seek, they die before they arrive. But God's mercy is everywhere, which knows how to spare even the just, although they would not be loosed so quickly as by a priest. Therefore, one who confesses altogether should confess to the better priest whom one can find. If the sin is hidden, let it suffice to bring it to the priest's knowledge, so that the offering of the gift may be pleasing." And below, [c. 12]:

§ 1. "Therefore, let the penitent labor to be in the church and tend toward the church's unity. For unless the church's unity comes to one's aid, unless it completes by its own operation what is lacking to the sinner, the soul of the dead person will not be rescued from the enemy's hands. For it must be believed—and the piety of faith demands that it be believed—that all the alms of the whole church, its prayers, and its works of justice and mercy come to the aid of one who acknowledges one's death unto conversion. Therefore, no one can worthily repent whom the church's unity does not sustain. Therefore, let one not seek priests divided from the church's unity through any fault.

"For Judas, who went as a penitent to the Pharisees, abandoning the Apostles, found no help except an increase of despair. For they said, 'What is that to us? See to it yourself.' If you have sinned, let it be yours; we do not come to your aid, we do not charitably take up your sins, we do not promise that they will be borne together, we do not teach you how to lay down the burden. For what have we to do with mercy, who do not even pursue the works of justice? He should have gone to the brothers; he should have gone to those who had prayed for Peter's mother-in-law when she had a fever, who had presented the importunate Canaanite woman to mercy. He should have asked Peter, who was pouring forth tears for himself. He should not have fled Mary and Martha, who had obtained life for Lazarus, nor the weeping crowd that had regained the widow's only son. He went to those divided, and divided he perished." And below, [c. 20]:

§ 2. "Therefore, the priest to whom every sinner is offered, before whom every infirmity is set, must be liable to judgment in none of those things which he is ready to judge in another. For one who judges another while oneself liable to judgment condemns oneself. Therefore, let one know oneself and purge in oneself what one sees others offer to one. Let one take care to have cast away from oneself whatever one has found harmful in another; let one heed what is said: 'Let the one who is without sin be first to cast a stone at her.' For he freed the sinful woman because there was no one who could justly cast a stone. How would one stone her who knew oneself worthy of stoning? For no one was without sin, by which it is understood that all were guilty. For venial sins were always remitted through ceremonies. Therefore, if there was any sin in them, it was criminal.

"Accordingly, priests who do not first edify themselves are worse in this respect than those who were watching the Lord with snares. In this, therefore, the crime of priests is most manifest and detestable beyond measure: they do not first judge themselves, and they bind others. For they ought to fear the crime which those persons feared and perceived to be detestable—those who were so blind that they hoped to seize the highest Wisdom with their snares. What was manifest to them, what each then avoided, let the priest avoid, who in this error has proved worse than those Jews.

§ 3. "Let the spiritual judge take care that, just as one has not committed the crime of wickedness, so one not lack the gift of knowledge. It is necessary that one know how to recognize whatever one ought to judge. For judicial power demands that one discern what one ought to judge. Therefore, let the diligent examiner and subtle investigator question the sinner wisely and as though shrewdly concerning what one perhaps does not know or what the sinner through shame wishes to conceal. Once the crime has been ascertained, let one not hesitate to investigate its varieties, the place, the time, and the other things that we discussed above in expounding their quality. Once these are known, let one be benevolent, prepared to raise the sinner and to carry the burden together; let one possess sweetness in affection, compassion concerning another's crime, and discretion regarding its variety. Let one assist the person confessing by praying, giving alms, and doing the other good things for that person. Let one always help by soothing, consoling, promising hope, and, when necessary, even rebuking. Let one teach by speaking and instruct by acting. Let one who wishes to become a participant in joy be a participant in labor. Let one teach perseverance; let one take care not to fall, lest one justly lose judicial power.

"For although penance can acquire grace for that person, it nevertheless does not immediately restore one to the former power. For although Peter was restored after his fall, and the power of dignity has often been returned to fallen priests, it is nevertheless not necessary that it be conceded to everyone as though by authority. One authority is found that concedes and, as it were, commands it; another is found that by no means concedes it but forbids it. These scriptural authorities do not conflict but agree, if the time, place, and manner of penance introduce peace. For when there are so many who fall that they claim their former dignity by authority and make for themselves, as it were, a practice of sinning, this hope must be cut away. But if there is a place where these things do not concur, those who sin can be restored. Therefore, a just and discerning pontiff is not compelled always to cast away his priests or immediately to restore them, unless it has been established by the Roman Pontiff."

PART II. GRATIAN. Let a priest take care not to disclose the sins of penitents to others. But if one does so, let that person be deposed. Hence Gregory:

> [C. I.]
> "Qui uult confiteri peccata, ut inueniat gratiam, querat sacerdotem scientem ligare et soluere, ne, cum negligens circa se extiterit, negligatur ab illo, qui eum misericorditer monet et petit, ne ambo in foueam cadant, quam stultus euitare noluit." Et infra: "Tanta itaque uis confessionis est, ut, si deest sacerdos, confiteatur proximo. Sepe enim contingit, quod penitens non potest uerecundari coram sacerdote, quem desideranti nec locus, nec tempus offert, et, si ille, cui confitebitur, potestatem soluendi non habet, fit tamen dignus uenia ex desiderio sacerdotis qui socio confitetur turpitudinem criminis. Mundati enim sunt leprosi, dum ibant ostendere ora sacerdotibus ante, quam ad eos peruenirent. Unde patet, Deum ad cor respicere, dum ex necessitate prohibentur ad sacerdotes peruenire. Sepe quidem eos querunt sed sani et leti; dum querunt ante, quam perueniant moriuntur. Sed misericordia Dei est ubique, qui et iustis nouit parcere, etsi non tam cito, ut soluerentur a sacerdote. Qui ergo omnino confitetur, sacerdoti meliori, quam potest, confiteatur; si peccatum occultum est, sufficiat referre in noticiam sacerdotis, ut grata sit oblatio muneris." Et infra: [c. 12.] §. 1. "Laboret itaque penitens in ecclesia esse, et ad ecclesiae, unitatem tendere; nisi enim unitas ecclesiae succurrat, nisi quod deest peccatori sua operatione conpleat, de manibus inimici non eripietur anima mortui. Credendum est enim, et fidei pietas expostulat credere, quod omnes elemosinae totius ecclesiae, et orationes, et opera iusticiae, et misericordiae succurrant recognoscenti mortem suam ad conuersionem. Ideoque nemo digne penitere potest, quem non sustineat unitas ecclesiae, ideoque non petat sacerdotes per aliquam culpam ab ecclesiae unitate diuisos. Iudas enim qui penitens iuit ad Phariseos, relinquens Apostolos, nichil inuenit auxilii nisi augmentum desperationis. Dixerunt enim: 'Quid ad nos? tu uideris;' si peccasti, tibi sit; non tibi succurrimus, non peccata tua karitatiue suscipimus, non conportanda promittimus, non qualiter deponas onus docemus. Quid enim nobis et misericordiae, qui nec opera sequimur iusticiae? Isset ad fratres, isset ad illos, qui orauerant pro socru Petri febricitante, qui Cananeam inprobam misericordiae obtulerant. Interrogasset Petrum pro se effundentem lacrimas; non fugisset Mariam et Martham, que uitam Lazaro inpetrauerant; non turbam plorantem, que unicum filium acquisierat uiduae. Iuit ad diuisos, et diuisus periit." Et infra: [c. 20.] §. 2. "Sacerdos itaque, cui omnis offertur peccator, ante quem statuitur omnis languor, in nullo eorum sit iudicandus, que in alio est iudicare promptus. Iudicans enim alium, qui est iudicandus, condempnat se ipsum. Cognoscat igitur se, et purget in se quod alios uidet sibi offerre. Caueat, ut a se proiecerit quicquid in alio dampnosum repperit; animaduertat quod dicitur: 'Qui sine peccato est primus in illam lapidem mittat.' Ideo enim liberauit peccatricem, quia non erat qui iuste proiceret lapidem. Quomodo lapidaret qui se lapidandum cognosceret? Nullus enim erat sine peccato: in quo intelligitur, omnes fuisse reos. Nam uenialia semper remittebantur per ceremonias. Si quod ergo in eis erat peccatum, criminale erat. Deteriores itaque in hoc sacerdotes sunt, se prius non edificantes, illis, qui Dominum obseruabant insidiis. In hoc itaque patentissimum est crimen sacerdotum et ultra modum detestabile, qui non prius se iudicant, et alios alligant. Deberent enim timere crimen, quod timuerunt, et detestabile esse senserunt. Hi qui adeo erant ceci, quod summam sapientiam sperabant capere suis insidiis. Quod illis patuit, quod tunc quisque uitauit, uitet sacerdos, qui in hoc errore peior illis Iudeis extitit. §. 3. Caueat spiritualis iudex, ut, sicut non conmisit crimen nequiciae, ita non careat munere scientiae. Oportet, ut sciat cognoscere quicquid debet iudicare. Iudiciaria enim potestas hoc expostulat, ut quod debet iudicare discernat. Diligens igitur inquisitor subtilis inuestigator sapienter et quasi astute interroget a peccatore quod forsitan ignoret, uel uerecundia uelit occultare. Cognito itaque crimine uarietates eius non dubitet inuestigare, et locum, et tempus, et cetera, que supra diximus in exponenda eorum qualitate. Quibus cognitis adsit beniuolus, paratus erigere, et secum onus portare; habeat dulcedinem in affectione, pietatem in alterius crimine, discretionem in uarietate; adiuuet confitentem orando, elemosinas faciendo; et cetera bona pro eo faciendo; semper eum iuuet leniendo, consolando, spem promittendo, et, cum opus fuerit, etiam increpando. Doceat loquendo, instruat operando, sit particeps laboris qui uult particeps fieri gaudii: doceat perseuerantiam; caueat, ne corruat, ne iuste perdat potestatem iudiciariam. Etsi enim penitencia ei possit acquirere gratiam, non tamen mox restituit in primam potestatem. Etsi enim Petrus post lapsum restitutus fuerit, et sepe lapsis sacerdotibus reddita sit dignitatis potestas, non tamen est necesse, ut omnibus concedatur quasi ex auctoritate. Inuenitur auctoritas, que concedit et quasi inperat; inuenitur alia, que minime concedit, sed uetat; que scripturae non repugnant, sed concordant, si tempus et locus, et modus penitenciae pacem adhibeant. Cum enim tot sunt qui labuntur, ut pristinam dignitatem ex auctoritate defendant, et quasi usum peccandi sibi faciant, recidenda est spes ista. Si uero locus est, ubi ista non concurrant, restitui possunt qui peccant. Itaque pontifex iustus atque discretus non cogitur suos sacerdotes semper abicere, nec mox restituere, nisi statutum fuerit a Romano Pontifice." II. Pars. [Gratian.] Caueat sacerdos, ne peccata penitencium aliis manifestet. Quod si fecerit, deponatur. Unde Gregorius:

[C. II.] Let a priest who presumes to disclose the sins of a penitent be deposed.

Above all, let a priest take care not to tell anyone concerning those who confess their sins to him that the person confessed them—not to relatives, not to strangers, nor, which God forbid, because of any scandal. For if he does this, let him be deposed and proceed as an ignominious wanderer all the days of his life.

PART III. GRATIAN. But what is said—that the penitent should choose a priest who knows how to bind and loose—seems contrary to what is found in the canons, namely, that no one should presume to judge the parishioner of another. But it is one thing to despise one's own priest from favor or hatred, which is prohibited by the sacred canons; it is another to avoid a blind person, which each person is admonished by this authority to do, lest, if the blind provides leadership to the blind, both fall into the pit. Hence Urban II:

> [C. II.] Deponatur sacerdos, qui peccata penitentis publicare presumit.
> Sacerdos ante omnia caueat, ne de his, qui ei confitentur peccata sua, recitet alicui quod ea confessus est non propinquis, non extraneis, neque, quod absit, pro aliquo scandalo. Nam si hoc fecerit, deponatur, et omnibus diebus uitae suae ignominiosus peregrinando pergat. III. Pars. Gratian. Quod autem dicitur, ut penitens eligat sacerdotem scientem ligare et soluere, uidetur esse contrarium ei, quod in canonibus inuenitur, ut nemo uidelicet alterius parrochianum iudicare presumat. Sed aliud est fauore uel odio proprium sacerdotem contempnere, quod sacris canonibus prohibetur; aliud cecum uitare, quod hac auctoritate quisque facere monetur, ne, si cecus ceco ducatum prestet, ambo in foueam cadant. Unde Urbanus II.:

C. III. Let another priest not receive for penance a person entrusted to any priest, except because of that priest's ignorance.

It was resolved that henceforth no priest may receive for penance anyone entrusted to another priest without the consent of the one to whom the person first entrusted oneself, except because of the ignorance of the one to whom the penitent first confessed. But one who attempts to act against these statutes will be subject to danger to one's rank.

> C. III. Cuilibet sacerdoti conmissum, nisi pro eius ignorantia, alter sacerdos ad penitenciam non suscipiat.
> Placuit, ut deinceps nulli sacerdotum liceat quemlibet conmissum alteri sacerdoti ad penitenciam suscipere sine eius consensu, cui se prius conmisit, nisi pro ignorantia illius, cui penitens prius confessus est. Qui uero contra hec statuta facere temptauerit gradus sui periculo subiacebit.

Distinction VII

GRATIAN. PART I. The time for penance extends to the final moment of life. Hence Pope Leo, [letter XC, otherwise XCII, to Rusticus, c. 5]:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Tempus uero penitenciae est usque in ultimum articulum uitae. Unde Leo Papa: [ep. XC. ad XCII. ad Rusticum, c. 5.]

[C. I.]

"No one is to be despaired of while established in this body, because sometimes what is deferred through the distrustfulness of age is completed by more mature counsel."

PART II. GRATIAN. Although Augustine writes concerning those who defer penance, [in the Book of Fifty Homilies, homily 41]:

> [C. I.]
>
> "Nemo desperandus est, dum in hoc corpore constitutus est, quia nonnumquam quod diffidentia etatis differtur consilio maturiore perficitur." II. Pars. [Gratian.] Quamquam de differentibus penitentiam

Augustinus scribat: [in lib. L. Homil., hom. 41.]

[C. II.]

“If anyone, placed in the final extremity of one’s illness, wishes to receive penance, and receives it, and is immediately reconciled and departs from here, I confess to you: we do not deny that person what one seeks, but we do not presume that one departs well from here. Whether one departs safely from here, I do not know. We can give penance, but we cannot give assurance. Do I say, ‘That person will be condemned’? But neither do I say, ‘That person will be freed.’ Do you therefore wish to be freed from doubt? Do you wish to escape what is uncertain? Perform penance while you are healthy. If you act thus, I tell you that you are secure, because you performed penance at a time when you were able to sin. But if you wish to perform penance when you can no longer sin, your sins have abandoned you; you have not abandoned them.”

[C. II.]

"Si quis positus in ultima necessitate suae egritudinis uoluerit accipere penitenciam, et accipit, et mox reconciliabitur et hinc uadit: fateor uobis, non illi negamus quod petit, sed non presumimus, quia bene hinc exit; si securus hinc exierit, ego nescio; penitenciam dare possumus, securitatem autem dare non possumus. Numquid dico: dampnabitur? Sed nec dico: liberabitur. Vis ergo a dubio liberari? uis quod incertum est euadere? age penitenciam, dum sanus es. Si sic agis, dico tibi, quia securus es, quia penitenciam egisti eo tempore, quo peccare potuisti. Si autem uis agere penitenciam, quando iam peccare non potes, peccata te dimiserunt, non tu illa."

[C. III.] The same, [in the same homily, a little earlier].

“One who has truly performed penance and has been loosed from the bond by which one was bound and separated from Christ’s body, and has lived well after penance as one ought to have lived before penance, whenever one dies after reconciliation, goes to God, goes to rest, will not be deprived of God’s kingdom, and will be separated from the people of the devil.”

[C. III.] Idem. [in eadem homilia, paulo superius.]

"Qui egerit penitenciam ueraciter, et solutus fuerit a ligamento, quo erat obstrictus, et a Christi corpore separatus, et bene post penitenciam uixerit, sicut ante penitenciam uiuere debuit, post reconciliationem quandocumque defunctus fuerit, ad Deum uadit, ad requiem uadit, regno Dei non priuabitur, a populo diaboli separabitur."

[C. IV.]

“But if anyone, etc.” And below: “One baptized at the final hour departs from here safely; a member of the faithful who lives well departs from here safely; one who performs penance and is reconciled while healthy and afterward lives well departs from here safely. Whether one who performs penance at the end and is reconciled departs from here safely, I am not certain. Where I am certain, I speak and give assurance; where I am not certain, I can give penance but cannot give assurance.” And a little later:

§ 1. “‘But how do you know,’ one says, ‘whether perhaps God will forgive me?’ You speak truly: I know the former; I do not know the latter. For this reason I give you penance, because I do not know; for if I knew it profited you nothing, I would not give it to you. Likewise, if I knew it profited you, I would not admonish you or frighten you. There are two possibilities: either you are forgiven or you are not forgiven. Which of these will happen to you, I do not know. Therefore, hold to what is certain and abandon what is uncertain."

GRATIAN. Cyprian shows why Augustine said this, [book IV, letter 2 to Antonianus], saying:

> [C. IV.]
>
> "Si quis autem etc." Et infra: "Baptizatus ad horam securus hinc exit; fidelis bene uiuens securus hinc exit; agens penitenciam, et reconciliatus, cum sanus est et postea bene uiuens, hinc securus exit. Agens penitenciam ad ultimum, et reconciliatus, si securus hinc exit, ego non sum securus. Unde sum securus, dico, et do securitatem; unde non sum securus, penitenciam dare possum, securitatem dare non possum." Et post pauca: §. 1. "Sed unde scis, inquit, ne forte Deus dimittat michi? uerum dicis: illud scio; hoc nescio. Nam ideo do tibi penitenciam, quia nescio; nam si scirem nichil tibi prodesse, non tibi darem. Item si scirem, tibi prodesse, non te ammonerem, non te terrerem. Duae sunt res: aut ignoscitur tibi, aut non ignoscitur. Quid horum tibi futurum sit, nescio. Ergo tene certum, et dimitte incertum." [Gratian.] Hoc autem quare Augustinus dixerit, Ciprianus ostendit, [lib. IV. epist. 2. ad Antonianum] dicens:

[C. V.]

"For this reason, dearest brother, we have judged that those who do not perform penance and do not testify with their whole heart, in sorrow for their offenses, to a manifest profession of their lamentation must be altogether prohibited from hope of communion and peace if they begin to supplicate during illness and danger; because it is not repentance for the offense but the warning of pressing death that compels them to ask, and one who did not reflect that one would die is not worthy to receive consolation in death."

> [C. V.]
> "Idcirco, frater karissime, penitenciam non agentes, nec in dolore delictorum suorum toto corde manifestam lamentationis suae professionem testantes, prohibendos omnino censuimus a spe conmunionis et pacis, si in infirmitate atque periculo ceperint deprecari, quia rogare illos non delicti penitencia, sed mortis urgentis ammonitio conpellit, nec dignus est in morte accipere solatium qui se non cogitauit moriturum."

[C. VI.] Likewise Augustine in the Book on Penance, [cc. 17 and 18].

"Let no one wait until one cannot sin. For penance seeks freedom of choice, so that one may be able to destroy the things committed, not necessity. Therefore, one who is abandoned by one's sins before oneself abandoning them condemns them not freely but, as it were, by necessity. For although the thief merited pardon at the end for every crime, he nevertheless did not give baptized persons authority to sin and persevere. For the one who then first confessed Christ on the cross was then baptized. Indeed, if penance comes at the final gasp of life, it heals and frees in the washing of baptism in such a way that those baptized at the end do not experience even purgatory; rather, enriched with the goods of holy mother church, they are to receive manifold good in true beatitude.

"But those who, when they could, never wished to be converted, confessing when they can no longer sin, do not even thus easily obtain what they wish. For it is necessary that penance bear fruit, so that it may obtain life for the dead person. It is written that no one is saved without charity. Therefore, a human being does not live by fear alone. Accordingly, one who repents late must not only fear God as judge but love him as just; let one not only fear punishment but be distressed for glory. For one ought to grieve concerning the crime and all its aforesaid variety. Because this is scarcely possible, Augustine could doubt concerning that person's salvation.

§ 1. "I indeed believe him who said, 'In whatever hour the sinner groans and is converted, that person shall live by life.' He said that one converted, not merely turned, shall live. I consider one turned who grieves concerning the crime; one converted who grieves concerning all its variety that we have explained. One is turned away from sin who now wishes to abandon sin; one is converted—that is, turned wholly and altogether—who now not only does not fear punishments but hastens to tend toward the good God. If this conversion happens to anyone even at the end, one must not despair of that person's remission. But because so just a conversion scarcely or rarely occurs, there must be fear concerning one who repents late. For one whom sickness presses and punishment terrifies will scarcely arrive at true satisfaction, especially when the children whom one loved unlawfully are present, and wife and world call one to themselves. Late penance is accustomed to deceive many.

"But because God is always powerful, he is always able, even in death, to help those whom he pleases. Therefore, since fruitful penance is a work not of a human being but of God, he can by his mercy inspire it whenever he wills and reward from mercy those whom he can condemn from justice. But because there are many things that impede and draw back the sick person, it is most dangerous and close to destruction to defer the remedy of penance until death. But the one in whom God then inspires true penance is great: that person awaits God's clemency, perceiving God's goodness to be greater than one's own wickedness.

§ 2. "But even if one has been converted in this way, we do not promise that one shall 'live by life and not die' in such a way as to escape every punishment. For one who deferred the fruit of conversion into another age must first be purged by the fire of purgation. Although this fire is not eternal, it is grievous in a wondrous manner. For it surpasses every punishment that anyone has ever suffered in this life. So great a punishment has never been found in the flesh, although the martyrs suffered wondrous torments and many persons have often wickedly endured very great punishments. Therefore, let each person strive so to correct one's offenses that it will not be necessary to endure punishment after death.

§ 3. "For there are certain sins that, although mortal, are made vital in penance, but are nevertheless not immediately healed. For there is often one who would die unless treated. One is not immediately healed; the person who before was going to die languishes but will live. But one who dies impenitent dies altogether and is tormented eternally. For one who ends impenitent, if one lived forever, would sin forever. But it belongs to God in his mercy that he brings an end to the sinner's activity. For this reason the sinner is also tormented without end, because one is never enriched with virtue; always full of iniquity, always without charity, one is tormented without end."

> [C. VI.] Item Augustinus in libro de penitencia.
> [cap. 17. et 18.] "Nullus expectet, quando peccare non potest. Arbitrii enim querit libertatem, ut delere possit conmissa, non necessitatem. Qui prius itaque a peccatis relinquitur, quam ipse relinquat, ea non libere, sed quasi necessitate condempnat. Licet enim latro ueniam meruisset in fine de omni crimine, non tamen dedit baptizatis peccandi et perseuerandi auctoritatem. Tunc enim baptizatus est qui tunc primum in cruce Christum confessus est. Penitencia enim, si in extremo hiatu uitae aduenerit, sanat et liberat in ablutione baptismi ita, quod nec purgatorium sentiunt qui in fine baptizantur; sed ipsi ditati bonis sanctae matris ecclesiae recepturi sunt multiplex bonum in uera beatitudine. Illi autem, qui, cum potuerunt, numquam conuerti uoluerunt, confitentes, cum iam peccare nequeunt, nec sic facile acquirunt, quod uolunt. Oportet enim, ut penitencia fructificet, ut uitam mortuo inpetret. Scriptum est, sine karitate saluum neminem esse. Non itaque in solo timore uiuit homo. Quem ergo sero penitet, oportet non solum timere Deum iudicem, sed iustum diligere; non tantum penam timeat sed anxietur pro gloria. Debet enim dolere de crimine, et de omni eius predicta uarietate. Quod quoniam uix licet, de eius salute Augustinus potuit dubitare. §. 1. Credo quidem illi, qui dixit: 'Quacumque hora peccator ingemuerit, et conuersus fuerit, uita uiuet.' Dixit conuersum, non tantum uersum uiuere. Versum quidem puto qui dolet de crimine; conuersum, qui dolet de omni eius, quam exposuimus, uarietate. Vertitur a peccato qui iam uult dimittere peccatum; conuertitur id est totus et omnino uertitur, qui iam non penas tantum non timet, sed ad bonum Deum festinat tendere. Que conuersio si contigerit alicui etiam in fine, desperandum non est de eius remissione. Sed quoniam uix uel raro est tam iusta conuersio, timendum est de penitente sero. Quem enim morbus urget et pena terret, uix ad ueram ueniet satisfactionem, maxime cum filii, quos illicite dilexit, sint presentes, uxor et mundus ad se uocet. Multos solet serotina penitencia decipere. Sed quoniam Deus semper potens est, semper, etiam in morte iuuare ualet quibus placet. Cum itaque opus sit non hominis, sed Dei fructifera penitencia, inspirare eam potest, quandocumque uult, sua misericordia, et remunerare ex misericordia quos dampnare potest ex iusticia. Sed quoniam multa sunt, que inpediunt et languentem retrahunt, periculosissimum est, et interitui uicinum, ad mortem protrahere penitenciae remedium. Sed magnum est, cui Deus tunc inspirat ueram penitenciam qui exspectat, Dei clementiam, maiorem sentiens Dei bonitatem sua nequicia. §. 2. Sed si etiam sic conuersus fuerit, uita uiuat et non moriatur non promittimus, quod euadat omnem penam. Nam prius purgandus est igne purgationis qui in aliud seculum distulit fructum conuersionis. Hic autem ignis, etsi eternus non sit, miro modo est grauis. Exellit enim omnem penam, quam umquam passus est aliquis in hac uita. Numquam in carne tanta inuenta est pena, licet mirabilia martires passi sint tormenta, et multi nequiter quanta sepe sustinuerunt supplicia. Studeat ergo quisque sic delicta corrigere, ut post mortem non oporteat penam tollerare. §. 3. Quedam enim peccata sunt, que mortalia, in penitencia sunt uitalia, non tamen statim sanata: Sepe enim est qui moreretur, nisi medicaretur. Non statim sanatur; languet uicturus qui prius erat moriturus. Qui autem inpenitens moritur omnino moritur, et eternaliter cruciatur. Qui enim inpenitens finitur, si semper uiueret, semper peccaret. At Dei est miserentis, quod operatur finem peccanti; ob hoc etiam sine fine torquetur, quia numquam uirtute ditatur; semper plenus iniquitate, semper sine karitate, torquetur sine fine."

Question IV

GRATIAN. PART I. That it is not permitted for anyone to devote oneself to the conjugal act during a time of prayer, blessed Jerome writes in a certain sermon, saying as follows:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem orationis tempore coniugali operi alicui uacare non liceat, B. Ieronimus, scribit in quodam sermone ita dicens:

C. I. At the time when the debt is rendered to one's wife, one must abstain from the flesh of the Lamb.

Know, dearest brothers, that whoever renders the debt to one's wife cannot devote oneself to prayer or eat from the flesh of the Lamb.

Likewise: § 1. If the loaves of proposition could not be eaten by those who had touched their wives, how much more can that bread which descended from heaven not be violated and touched by those who a little earlier clung to conjugal embraces? This is not because we condemn marriage, but because at the time when we are going to eat the flesh of the Lamb we ought to abstain from carnal works.

C. I. Tempore, quo uxori debitum redditur, a carnibus agni abstinere oportet.

Sciatis, fratres karissimi, quoniam quicumque uxori debitum reddit uacare non potest orationi, nec de carnibus agni comedere. Item: §. 1. Si panes propositionis ab his, qui uxores suas tetigerant, comedi non poterant, quanto magis panis ille, qui de celo descendit, non potest ab his, qui coniugalibus paulo ante conplexibus hesere, uiolari atque contingi? non quod nuptias condempnemus, sed quod eo tempore, quo carnes agni manducaturi sumus, uacare a carnalibus operibus debeamus.

C. II. One must abstain from conjugal intercourse on the solemnities of the saints.

Likewise Augustine, [sermon II on the season, that is, on the second Sunday of Advent]. Whenever either the Lord's birthday or the other festivals arrive, we ought to abstain not only from intercourse with unbelieving concubines but even from our own wives.

C. II. A coniugali concubitu in sanctorum solempnitatibus est abstinendum.

Item Augustinus. [serm. II. de tempore, id est, de 2. dominica Aduentus] Quocienscumque aut dies natalis Domini, aut reliquae festiuitates aduenerint, non solum ab infidelium concubinarum consortio, sed etiam a propriis uxoribus abstinere debemus.

C. III. On days of fasting one must abstain even from one's own wife.

Likewise Ambrose in the sermon on the Lord's Advent. Brothers, you ought not only to abstain from every impurity, but also most zealously to contain yourselves from your own wives. Let absolutely no one be joined to one's wife.

C. III. Diebus ieiuniorum a propriis etiam uxoribus abstinere oportet.

Item Ambrosius in sermone de aduentu Domini. Fratres, non solum debetis ab omni inmundicia abstinere, sed etiam ab uxoribus propriis studiosissime contineatis. Nullus omnino uxori suae iungatur.

C. IV.

The same on the First Letter to the Corinthians, [at c. 7]. If a wife is taken for the sake of procreating children, not much time seems conceded for that use, because festival days, days of procession, and the very circumstances of conception and birth demonstrate that, according to the law, the use of the flesh ought to cease at those times.

C. IV.

Idem super epistolam I. ad Chorinthios. [in c. 7.] Si causa procreandorum filiorum ducitur uxor, non multum tempus concessum uidetur ad ipsum usum, quia et dies festi, et dies processionis, et ipsa ratio conceptus et partus iuxta legem cessare usum carnis debere his temporibus demonstrant.

C. V. The use of one's wife is commanded to cease on certain days.

Likewise Augustine in the Book of Questions of the Old and New Testaments, [question CXXVII]. A Christian is sometimes permitted to come together with one's wife and sometimes is not permitted. For on account of days of procession and fasting it is sometimes not permitted to come together, because one must abstain even from lawful things so that what is sought may be obtained more easily. Hence the Apostle says that one must abstain for a time by consent, so that you may devote yourselves to prayer. For according to the law it is also not permitted to strike or quarrel during a fast, but afterward it is permitted.

> C. V. Uxoris usus certis diebus cessare iubetur.
> Item Augustinus libro questionum Veteris et Noui Testamenti. [quest. CXXVII.] Christiano cum uxore sua conuenire aliquando licet, aliquando non licet. Propter processionis enim dies et ieiuniorum aliquando non licet conuenire, quia etiam a licitis abstinendum est, ut facilius inpetrari possit quod postulatur. Unde Apostolus ex consensu, ait, abstinendum est ad tempus, ut uacetis orationi. Nam etiam secundum legem in ieiunio cedere et iurgari non licet, post uero licet.

C. VI. One who does not observe continence does not truly perform penance.

Likewise John Chrysostom. One who says that one performs penance by chastisement of food promises this in vain by word unless one leaves one's bed and adds continence to fasting.

> C. VI. Non uere agit penitenciam qui continentiam non seruat.
>
> Item Iohannes Crisostomus. Qui in castigatione uictus se dicit agere penitenciam, frustra hoc sermone promittit, nisi egrediatur de cubili suo, et ieiunio continentiam addat.

C. VII. A man who sleeps with his own wife ought to refrain from entering the church.

Likewise Gregory, [in response X to Augustine's questions]. PART II. A man sleeping with his own spouse ought not to enter the church unless washed with water.

§ 1. Although different nations of human beings hold different opinions concerning this matter and seem to observe different practices, nevertheless the custom of the Romans has always been, from more ancient times, to seek purification by washing after intercourse with one's own spouse and to refrain a little from entering the church. In saying this, we do not account marriage a fault; but because even lawful intercourse with one's spouse cannot occur without pleasure of the flesh, one must abstain from entering a sacred place, because that pleasure can in no way exist without fault. For the one who said, "Behold, for I was conceived in iniquities," had been conceived not from adultery or fornication but from lawful marriage.

§ 2. It is therefore necessary that lawful carnal union be for the sake of offspring, not pleasure, and that the union of flesh be for the sake of creating children, not the satisfaction of vices. But if anyone uses one's spouse not carried away by desire for pleasure, but solely for the sake of creating children, that person is certainly to be left to one's own judgment whether concerning entering the church or receiving the mystery of the Lord's body and blood, because one who, though placed in fire, does not know how to burn ought not to be prohibited by us from receiving. But when not love for procreating offspring but pleasure dominates in the act of union, spouses have something to lament even concerning their union.

§ 3. But a man who has washed with water after intercourse with his spouse is then able also to receive holy communion, when according to the foregoing opinion he has been permitted to enter the church.

PART III. GRATIAN. Hence marriages are also prohibited from being celebrated on days of abstinence. Thus at the Council of Laodicea, [c. 52]:

> C. VII. Ab ingressu ecclesiae temperare debet uir cum propria uxore dormiens.
> Item Gregorius. [in responsione X. ad interrogationes Augustini] II. Pars. Vir cum propria coniuge dormiens, nisi lotus aqua, ecclesiam intrare non debet: §. 1. Quamuis de hac re diuersae hominum nationes diuersa sentiant atque alia custodire uideantur, Romanorum tamen semper ab antiquioribus usus fuit, post ammixtionem propriae coniugis et lauacri purificationem querere, et ab ingressu ecclesiae paululum temperare. Nec hoc dicentes culpam deputamus esse coniugium; sed quia ipsa licita ammixtio coniugis sine uoluptate carnis fieri non potest, a sacri loci ingressu est abstinendum, quia uoluptas ipsa sine culpa esse nullatenus potest. Non enim de adulterio uel fornicatione, sed de legitimo matrimonio susceptus erat qui dicebat: "Ecce enim in iniquitatibus conceptus sum." §. 2. Oportet itaque legitimam carnis copulam ut causa prolis sit, non uoluptatis, et carnis conmixtio creandorum liberorum sit gratia, non satisfactio uiciorum. Si quis uero sua coniuge non cupidine uoluptatis raptus, sed solummodo creandorum liberorum gratia utitur, iste profecto siue de ingressu ecclesiae, seu de sumendo dominici corporis sanguinisque misterio, suo est iudicio relinquendus, quia a nobis prohiberi non debet accipere qui in igne positus nescit ardere. Cum uero non amor procreandae sobolis, sed uoluptas dominatur in opere conmixtionis, habent coniuges etiam de conmixtione sua quod defleant. §. 3. Tunc autem uir, qui post ammixtionem coniugis lotus aqua fuerit, etiam sacram communionem ualet accipere, cum ei secundum prefinitam sententiam ecclesiam licuerit intrare. III. Pars. Gratian. Hinc etiam in diebus abstinentiae nuptiae celebrari prohibentur. Unde in Laodicensi Concilio: [c. 52.]

C. VIII. It is not permitted to celebrate marriages during Lent.

One ought not to celebrate either marriages or any birthday feasts during Lent.

> C. VIII. In diebus Quadragesimae nuptiae celebrare non licet.
> Non oportet in Quadragesima aut nuptias uel quelibet natalicia celebrari:

C. IX. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 48]. It is not permitted to celebrate the birthdays of martyrs during Lent, but only on Saturday and Sunday to offer offerings in their commemoration. Neither birthday feasts nor marriages may be celebrated during Lent.

> C. IX. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 48.] Non licet in Quadragesima natales martirum celebrare, sed tantum in sabbato et dominica pro conmemoratione eorum oblationes offerre. Sed nec natalicia, nec nuptias liceat in Quadragesima celebrari.

C. X. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Lérida. One ought not to celebrate marriages from Septuagesima until the octave of Easter, during the three weeks before the festival of Saint John, and from the Lord's Advent until after Epiphany. But if it has been done, let them be separated.

> C. X. De eodem.
>
> Item ex Concilio Ylerdensi. Non oportet a Septuagesima usque in octauam Pascae, et tribus ebdomadibus ante festiuitatem sancti Iohannis et ab Aduentu domini usque post Epiphaniam nuptias celebrare. Quod si factum fuerit, separentur.

C. XI. On the same matter.

Likewise Nicholas in reply to the questions of the Bulgarians, [c. 48]. I judge in no way that either taking a wife or holding banquets can fittingly occur during the Lenten season.

PART IV. GRATIAN. These things, however, are to be observed if the wife is willing to give consent; otherwise, without her consent, continence ought not to be observed even for the sake of prayer. Hence Augustine in book I On Adulterous Marriages, [c. 2]:

> C. XI. De eodem.
> Item Nycolaus ad consulta Bulgarorum. [c. 48.] Nec uxorem ducere, nec conuiuia facere in quadragesimali tempore conuenire posse, nullo modo arbitror. IV. Pars. Gratian. Hec autem seruanda sunt, si uxor consensum adhibere uoluerit; ceterum sine eius consensu nec causa orationis continentia seruari debet. Unde Augustinus in libro [I.] de adulterinis coniugiis: [c. 2.]

C. XII. Spouses cannot devote themselves to prayer except by common consent.

The Apostle did not wish spouses mutually to be deprived of the carnal debt, even temporarily so that they might devote themselves to prayer, except by consent. Hence it is also read at the Second Council of Arles, [c. 22]:

> C. XII. Nisi ex consensu communi orationi coniuges uacare non possunt.
>
> Apostolus nec ad tempus, ut uacent orationi, nisi ex consensu uoluit coniuges inuicem carnali fraudari debito. Hinc etiam in II. Concilio Arelatensi [c. 22.] legitur:

C. XIII. Penance is not to be given to married persons except by consent.

We command that penance is not to be given to married persons except by consent.

> C. XIII. Nisi ex consensu coniugatis penitencia non detur.
> Penitenciam coniugatis non nisi ex consensu dandam esse precipimus.

Question V

GRATIAN. PART I. That a husband cannot vow continence without his wife's consent is proved by many authorities. For Augustine says on Psalm 146:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Quod autem sine consensu uxoris uir continentiam uouere non possit, multis auctoritatibus probatur. Ait enim Augustinus super Psalmum CXLVI.:

C. I. A husband cannot observe continence unless he possesses his wife's assent.

If a husband says, "I now wish to be continent; I no longer wish to have a wife," he cannot do so. For what you wish, she does not wish. Ought she to be made a fornicator through your continence? If she marries another while you live, she will be an adulteress. God does not wish such a loss to be compensated by such a gain. Render the debt; and if you do not exact it, render it. God will account it to you as perfect sanctification if you do not exact what is owed to you but render what is owed to your wife.

> C. I. Non potest uir continentiam seruare, nisi uxoris teneat assensum.

Si dicat uir: continere iam uolo; nolo iam uxorem; non potest. Quod enim tu uis illa non uult. Numquid per tuam continentiam debet illa fieri fornicaria? si alii nupserit te uiuo, adultera erit. Non uult tali lucro Deus tale dampnum conpensari. Redde debitum, et, si non exigis, redde. Pro sanctificatione perfecta Deus tibi conputabit, si non quod tibi debetur exigis, sed reddis quod uxori debetur.

C. II. A woman's consent to vowing continence to God ought not to be extorted.

Likewise Alexander II to Landulf in Corsica. You notified us that, gravely ill almost unto death and greatly terrified by the recollection and terror of your sins, you anxiously sought to become a monk; that by threats and terrors of killing your wife you extorted from her permission for this; that in this way you took monastic clothing without an abbot and sought a monastery; but afterward, when you had become healthy, overcome as a penitent by your wife's protests, wailings, and lamentations and by the dispersal of your household, you returned home; and that after many days, by the counsel of certain wise persons, you returned to the bed of the aforesaid woman. But now you seek our counsel whether it is permitted to use your wife.

If, then, it is as your messenger relates, it does not seem to us to have been done reasonably or justly. For although everything is to be carried out lawfully, holily, and justly by every person tending toward monastic life, you, contrary to the laws, threateningly and violently, being unnerved partly by fear of death and partly by the pains of your illness, followed a devious course and, having received no permission from your wife, as is said, withdrew and sought the monastery. For this ought to be done not by violence but by equal will and consent, as the holy Fathers say; nor ought a husband to choose a monastery or, after professing continence, hastily change his habit.

C. II. Non debet extorqueri mulieris consensus ad continentiam Deo uouendam.

Item Alexander II. Landulpho in Corsica. Notificasti, te morte tenus infirmatum, et peccatorum tuorum recordatione et terrore ualde pauefactum anxie quesisse monachum fieri, et a tua uxore minis et terroribus eam occidendi ad hoc licentiam extorsisse, et sic te monachicam uestem sine abbate sumpsisse, et monasterium petisse; postea uero, cum sanus factus esses, tuae uxoris reclamationibus, eiulatibus et planctibus, tuaeque familiae dispersionibus, utpote penitens deuictus, domum remeasse, et post multos dies quorumdam sapientum consilio ad iam dictae mulieris cubile rediisse. Nunc autem, si tua uxore uti liceat, nostrum requiris consilium. Si ita denique est, ut tuus nuncius narrat, non uidetur nobis rationabiliter iuste factum, quoniam, cum omni homini ad monachicam uitam tendenti legaliter, sancte et iuste sit peragendum, tu contra leges minaciter et uiolenter a tua uxore partim terrore mortis, partim tuae infirmitatis doloribus exanimatus, deuia secutus, nulla, ut dicitur, licentia accepta recessisti, et monasterium petisti. Non enim uiolentia, sed ex pari uoluntate et consensu (sicut sancti Patres dicunt) hoc fieri debet, neque uir monasterium eligere, aut professa continentia habitum cum festinatione debet mutare.

C. III. A husband can reject vows of continence that his wife offered to God without his consent.

Likewise from the Council at Compiègne. If a woman has placed a veil upon her head without her husband's permission, let him, if it pleases him, receive her again into marriage.

C. III. Vir potest abnuere uota continentiae, que sine eius consensu Deo uxor obtulerit.

Item ex Concilio apud Conpendium. Mulier, si sine licentia mariti sui uelum in caput miserit, si uiro placuerit, recipiat eam iterum ad coniugium.

C. IV. A husband cannot rescind vows of continence that a woman promised to God with his assent.

Likewise Augustine to Ecdicia, [letter CXCIX]. What you had vowed to God by equal consent, you ought to have rendered perseveringly to the end. If he has fallen away from that purpose, you at least should persevere most insistently. I would not exhort you to this unless he himself had consented to it for you. For if you had never possessed his assent, no number of years would have defended you. And a little later:

§ 1. Your husband had not ceased to be your husband because you were equally abstaining from carnal union. Indeed, you remained spouses between yourselves all the more holily insofar as you concordantly observed holier resolutions. Therefore, you ought to have done nothing concerning your clothing, nothing concerning gold or silver or any money or any earthly possessions of yours, without his decision. And below:

§ 2. There is a certain matronly clothing, proportioned to the person and distinct from a widow's clothing, which can fittingly belong to married members of the faithful while preserving the cause or observance of religion. If your husband was unwilling for you to lay this aside, lest you boast yourself a widow while he was living, consider that he was not to be led in this matter as far as the scandal of dissension, with the evil of disobedience being greater than the good of any abstinence. For what is more absurd than for a woman to become proud over humble clothing, when it would profit you more to obey in radiant conduct than to resist in dark garments? For although a nun's garment delighted you, even this could have been assumed more pleasingly after your husband had been respected and entreated than presumed upon without consulting him and while despising him. But if he did not permit it at all, what would perish from your purpose? Far be it that you should thereby displease God because, while your spouse had not yet died, you did not dress like Anna but like Susanna.

> C. IV. Non potest uir continentiae uota rescindere, que eius assensu mulier Deo promisit.
> Item Augustinus ad Editiam. [ep. CXCIX.] Quod Deo pari consensu uoueratis perseueranter usque in finem reddere debuistis. A quo proposito si ille lapsus est, tu saltim instantissime perseuera. Quod non te exhortarer, nisi quia tibi ad hoc ipse consensit. Nam si numquam tenuisses eius assensum, numerus te nullus defendisset annorum. Et post pauca: §. 1. Non quia pariter temperabatis a conmixtione carnali, ideo tuus maritus esse destiterat, immo uero tanto sanctius inter uos coniuges manebatis, quanto sanctiora concorditer placita seruabatis. Nichil ergo de tua ueste, nichil de auro uel argento, uel quacumque pecunia, uel rebus ullis terrenis tuis sine arbitrio eius facere debuisti. Et infra: §. 2. Est quidam pro modulo personae habitus matronalis a uiduali ueste distinctus, qui potest fidelibus coniugatis salua religionis causa uel obseruantia conuenire. Hunc te maritus si deponere noluit, ne te uelut uiduam illo uiuente iactares, puta, quia non fuerat in hac re usque ad dissensionis scandalum perducendus, magis inobedientiae malo, quam ullius abstinentiae bono. Quid enim est absurdius, quam mulierem de humili ueste superbire, cui te potius expediret obtemperare candidis moribus, quam in nigellis uestibus repugnare? quia, etsi te indumentum monachae delectabat, etiam hoc gratius posset marito obseruato exoratoque sumi, quam illo inconsulto contemptoque presumi. Quod si omnino non sineret, quid tuo proposito deperiret? Absit, ut hinc displiceres Deo, quod coniuge tuo nondum defuncto non indueris sicut Anna, sed sicut Susanna.

C. V. One who is compelled by a wife's incontinence to render the debt to her possesses the merit of continence.

The same. According to the apostolic words, even if the husband had wished to be continent and you had been unwilling, he would be compelled to render the debt to you, and God would impute continence to him if he yielded not to his own weakness but to yours, lest you fall into adultery.

§ 1. Therefore, whoever, having compassion upon a wife's weakness, renders but does not exact the debt; or if, because of one's own weakness, one takes a wife, lamenting rather that one could not exist without a wife than rejoicing that one took her; whoever sells what one knows would not make one blessed even if it remained; whoever buys what one knows will pass away, does not presume concerning these things, and from it has performed mercy with those who do not have—such a person securely awaits the last day.

> C. V. Continentiae meritum habet qui incontinentia uxoris debitum sibi reddere cogitur.
> Idem. Secundum uerba apostolica, etiam si uir continere uoluisset, et tu noluisses, debitum tibi reddere cogeretur, et illi Deus inputaret continentiam, si non suae, sed tuae cederet infirmitati, ne in adulterium caderes. §. 1. Quisquis igitur conpatiens infirmitati uxoris reddit, non exigit debitum, aut si propter propriam infirmitatem ducit uxorem, plangens potius, quia sine uxore esse non potuit, quam gaudens, quia duxit, quisquis uendit quod nouit, quia, etsi maneret, beatum non faceret; quisquis emit quod nouit, quia transiet, et de his non presumit, et fecit ex eo, misericordiam cum non habentibus, securus expectat diem nouissimum.

C. VI. Vows of continence cannot be fulfilled without the wife's consent.

The same to Armentarius and Paulina, [letter XLV]. There can be one cause alone on account of which we would not only not exhort you to fulfill what you vowed, but would even prohibit you from fulfilling it: if perhaps your spouse, because of weakness of mind or flesh, refused to undertake this with you. For such things are not to be vowed by married persons except by consent and common will; and if it has been done too hastily, the rashness should be corrected rather than the promise fulfilled. For God does not exact it if someone vows something from another's property, but instead forbids the usurpation of another's property.

> C. VI. Vota continentiae sine uxoris consensu reddi non possunt.
> Idem ad Armentarium, et Paulinam. [epist. XLV.] Una sola causa esse potest, qua te ad id, quod uouisti, non solum non hortaremur, uerum etiam prohiberemus inplere, si forte tua coniunx hoc tecum suscipere animi seu carnis infirmitate recusaret. Nam et uouenda talia non sunt a coniugatis, nisi ex consensu et uoluntate conmuni, et, si prepropere factum fuerit, magis est corrigenda temeritas, quam persoluenda promissio. Neque enim Deus exigit, si quis ex alieno aliquid uouerit, sed potius usurpare uetat alienum.

C. VII. Without the other works, neither does virginity alone save, nor do the other works avail without virginity.

Likewise Jerome, [book I Against Jovinian]. PART II. A woman will then be saved if she bears those children who will remain virgins; if she obtains in her children what she herself lost and compensates for the loss and decay of the root by flower and fruits.

> C. VII. Absque ceteris operibus nec sola uirginitas saluat, nec cetera absque uirginitate proficiunt.

Item Ieronimus. [lib. I. aduersus Iouinianum.] II. Pars. Tunc saluabitur mulier, si illos genuerit filios, qui uirgines permansuri sunt; si quod ipsa perdidit acquirat in liberis, et dampnum radicis et cariem flore conpenset et pomis.

[C. VIII.] The same.

I now say only this: just as virginity alone does not save without the other works, so all works are imperfect without virginity, purity, continence, and chastity.

[C. VIII.] Idem.

Hoc solum nunc dico, quod quomodo absque ceteris operibus uirginitas sola non saluat, sic omnia opera absque uirginitate, puritate, continentia, castitate inperfecta sunt.

[C. IX.] The same.

"Let one who thirsts come and drink; let one who can receive it receive it." He does not say, "Whether you will or not, you must drink and run"; rather, the one who wills, the one who is able to run and drink, that one conquers, that one will be satisfied. And for this reason Christ loves virgins more: because they voluntarily give what had not been commanded of them, and it belongs to greater grace to offer what you do not owe than to render what is exacted from you.

The Apostles, having contemplated the burden of a wife, say, "If such is a man's situation with a wife, it is not expedient to marry." Approving their opinion, the Lord rightly says: You perceive rightly that it is not expedient for a person tending toward the kingdom of heaven to take a wife; but it is a difficult matter, and not everyone receives this word, but those to whom it is given. Nature makes some human beings eunuchs; the force of human beings makes others. Those eunuchs please me whom not necessity but will has castrated. I willingly receive into my bosom those who have castrated themselves for the sake of the kingdom of heaven and, on account of my worship, were unwilling to be what they were born.

At the same time, the sentence must be considered: "Who," he says, "have castrated themselves for the sake of the kingdom of heaven." If the castrated have the kingdom of heaven as their reward, then those who have not castrated themselves cannot receive the place of the castrated.

GRATIAN. The end of this authority and the two preceding authorities are understood of the disposition toward virginity, which exists not in will alone but also in necessity. But the beginning is understood of its effect, which before a vow exists not in necessity but in the will, and is not exacted unless it is promised.

[C. IX.] Idem.

"Qui sitit ueniat et bibat; qui potest capere capiat." Non dicit: uelitis nolitis, bibendum est uobis atque currendum; sed: qui uoluerit, qui potuerit currere atque potare, ille uincit, ille satiabitur. Et ideo plus amat uirgines Christus, quia sponte tribuunt quod sibi non fuerat inperatum, maiorisque gratiae est offerre quod non debeas, quam reddere quod exigeris. Apostoli uxoris onere contemplato: "Si talis est," inquiunt, "causa hominis cum uxore, non expedit nubere." Quorum Dominus sententiam probans: recte ait, quidem sentitis, quod non expediat homini ad regna celorum tendenti accipere uxorem; sed difficilis res est, et non omnes capiunt uerbum istud, uerum quibus datum est. Alios hominum natura facit eunuchos, alios uis hominum; michi illi eunuchi placent, quos castrauit non necessitas, sed uoluntas; libenter illos in meo sinu recipio, qui se castrauerunt propter regnum celorum, et ob meum cultum noluerunt esse quod nati sunt. Simulque tractanda est sentencia: "Qui se," inquit, "castrauerunt propter regnum celorum." Si castrati mercedem habent regnum celorum, ergo qui se non castrauerunt locum non possunt accipere castratorum. Gratian. Finis huius auctoritatis et duae precedentes de uirginitatis affectu intelliguntur, qui non in uoluntate solum, sed in necessitate est; principium uero de effectu intelligitur, qui non in necessitate ante uotum, sed in uoluntate est, nec exigitur, nisi repromittatur.

C. X. One who permitted his wife to take the veil is not permitted to marry another.

Likewise from the Council of Reims. PART III. One who has permitted his wife to take the veil shall not take another, but shall likewise be converted.

C. X. Non licet illi uxorem ducere, qui suam uelare permiserit.

Item ex Concilio Remensi. III. Pars. Qui uxorem suam uelare permiserit aliam non accipiat, sed similiter conuertatur.

C. XI. A woman is not compelled to observe vows of abstinence that she promised with her husband's permission if he afterward prohibits her.

Likewise Augustine in Questions on Numbers, [question LIX]. PART IV. It is manifest that the law wished a woman to be under her husband in such a way that none of her vows which she vowed for the sake of abstinence are fulfilled by her unless her husband was their author by giving permission. For although the law wished it to pertain to the same husband's sin if he first permitted and afterward prohibited, nevertheless it did not say even this: that the woman should do what she had vowed because she had already previously been permitted by her husband. It said that it was the husband's sin because he rejected what he had previously conceded; nevertheless, it did not thereby give the woman a command that, if her husband, after previously conceding it to her, afterward prohibited it, he should be contemned.

GRATIAN. From the foregoing it appears that neither can a woman render vows of continence to God without her husband's consent, nor a husband without his wife's consent. But if a vow has been promised by one with the consent of the other, even if the one who gave permission afterward wishes to render it void, that person nevertheless cannot, because in the debt of marriage the woman equally has power over the husband, just as the husband over the woman. And therefore, if either of them has released the other from one's right, one will not be able to recall the other to the former servitude.

But because in other things the husband is the head of the woman and the woman the body of the husband, a woman can promise vows of abstinence with her husband's permission in such a way that, if he afterward prohibits it, she cannot fulfill what was promised. This, as we have said, is because of the condition of servitude by which she ought to be subject to her husband in all things. Hence Augustine says in the Book of Questions on Genesis, [question CLIII]:

C. XI. Vota abstinentiae, que mulier permittente uiro promiserit. illo prohibente seruare non cogitur.

Item Augustinus in Questionibus Numeri. [qu. LIX.] IV. Pars. Manifestum est, ita uoluisse legem feminam sub uiro esse, ut nulla eius uota, que abstinentiae causa uouerit, reddantur ab ea, nisi auctor uir fuerit permittendo. Nam cum ad peccatum eiusdem uiri pertinere uoluerit, si prius permiserit, et postea prohibuerit etiam hoc tamen non dixit, ut faciat mulier quod uouerat, quia permissa iam prius a uiro fuerat. Viri dixit esse peccatum, quia abnuit quod prius concesserat; non tamen mulieri ex hoc iussum dedit, ut cum prius uir ei concesserit, postea si prohibuerit, contempnatur. Gratian. Ex premissis apparet, quod continentiae uota nec mulier sine uiri consensu, nec uir sine mulieris consensu Deo reddere potest. Si autem consensu alterius eorum ab altero promissa fuerit, et si postmodum in irritum deducere uoluerit qui permisit, non tamen ualet, quia in debito coniugii eque mulier habet potestatem uiri, sicut et uir mulieris; atque ideo, si quilibet eorum alterum a suo iure absoluerit, ad preteritam seruitutem ipsum reuocare non poterit. Quia uero in ceteris uir est caput mulieris, et mulier corpus uiri, ita uota abstinentiae uiro permittente mulier potest promittere, ut tamen eodem prohibente repromissa non ualeat inplere, et hoc, ut diximus, propter condicionem seruitutis, qua uiro in omnibus debet subesse. Unde Augustinus ait in libro questionum Genesis: [qu. CLIII.]

C. XII. Women ought to be subject to their husbands.

There is a natural order among human beings that women serve men and children serve parents, because among them this is justice: that the lesser serve the greater.

C. XII. Mulieres uiris suis debent subesse.

Est ordo naturalis in hominibus, ut feminae seruiant uiris, et filii parentibus, quia in illis hec iusticia est, ut maiori seruiat minor.

C. XIII. The husband is the head of the woman.

The same in Questions of the Old and New Testaments, [mixed from both, c. 106]. This is the image of God in the human being: that one was made from whom the others might arise, possessing God's dominion as though his vicar, because he possesses the image of the one God. Therefore, the woman was not made in God's image. For thus it says: "And God made the human being; in God's image he made him." Hence the Apostle also says, "A man indeed ought not to veil his head, because he is the image and glory of God; a woman veils for this reason, because she is not the glory or image of God."

C. XIII. Vir est caput mulieris.

Idem in Questionibus Veteris et Noui Testamenti. [ex utroque mixtim, c. 106.] Hec imago Dei est in homine, ut unus factus sit ex quo ceteri oriantur, habens inperium Dei, quasi uicarius eius, quia unius Dei habet imaginem, ideoque mulier non est facta ad Dei imaginem. Sic etenim dicit: "Et fecit Deus hominem; ad imaginem Dei fecit illum." Hinc etiam Apostolus: "Vir quidem," ait, "non debet uelare caput, quia imago et gloria Dei est; mulier ideo uelat, quia non est gloria aut imago Dei."

[C. XIV.] Likewise in the same work.

It is sufficiently apparent from this how the law wished women to be subject to men and wives to be almost servants. For it established that a husband should give testimony against his wife, by which she would be stoned if it were demonstrated to be true; but he in turn is not stoned if it is established to be false. Rather, he is merely chastised and fined and is commanded to adhere perpetually to her whom he had wished to lack. But in other cases, the law commands that one who has harmed anyone by false testimony be punished by that same penalty by which, if the testimony had been proved true, the accused person would have been punished.

[C. XIV.] Item in eodem.

Satis hinc apparet, quemadmodum uiris feminas subditas, et pene famulas lex esse uoluerit uxores, dum constituit ut diceret aduersus uxorem uir testimonium, unde lapidaretur illa, si hoc uerum esse demonstraretur, ipse tamen non uicissim lapidatur, si hoc falsum esse constiterit; sed tantummodo castigatur, et dampnificatur, eique perpetuo iubetur adherere, qua carere uoluerat. In aliis autem causis eum, qui testimonio falso cuiquam nocuerit, quod si probaretur, iussit occidi, eadem plecti iubet pena, qua fuerat, si uerum esset, ipse plectendus.

C. XV. On the same matter.

Likewise Jerome on the Letter to Titus, [at c. 2]. Since the husband is the head of the woman, but Christ the head of the husband, every wife who is not subject to her husband—that is, to her head—is guilty of the same crime as a husband who is not subject to his head. The word of the Lord is blasphemed either when God's first sentence is contemned and accounted as nothing, or when Christ's Gospel is brought into disrepute because a Christian woman, who is subject under God's law, desires, against the law and faith of nature, to command her husband, although even Gentile women serve their husbands by the common law of nature.

C. XV. De eodem.

Item Ieronimus super epistolam ad Titum. [in c. 2.] Cum caput mulieris uir sit, caput autem uiri Christus, quecumque uxor non subicitur uiro, hoc est capiti suo, eiusdem criminis rea est, cuius et uir, si non subiciatur capiti suo. Verbum autem Domini blasphematur, uel cum contempnitur Dei prima sentencia, et pro nichilo ducitur, uel cum Christi infamatur euangelium, dum contra legem fidemque naturae ea, que Christiana est, et ex lege Dei subiecta, uiro inperare desiderat, cum gentiles etiam feminae uiris suis seruiant communi lege naturae.

C. XVI. A woman ought to follow her husband's decision in all things.

Likewise Augustine in Questions on Numbers, [question LIX]. Accordingly, the law did not wish a woman to vow anything to God against her own soul, so that in those same vows authority to abstain from certain lawful and conceded things should belong not to the woman but to the man. Thus, if her father had permitted her while still unmarried to fulfill vows, but she married before fulfilling them and this, when known to her husband, did not please him, she is not to fulfill them. And this is altogether without sin, because God cleansed her, as it says—that is, judged her clean. Nor must this be considered to be done against the Lord, since God himself commanded and willed it.

C. XVI. Arbitrium uiri mulierem sequi oportet omnibus.

Item Augustinus in Questionibus Numeri. [qu. LIX.] Noluit itaque lex aliquid uouere Deo aduersus animam suam, ut non in aliquarum rerum licitarum atque concessarum abstinentia in eisdem uotis feminae ualeat auctoritas, sed uirilis. Ita, ut si adhuc innuptae concesserat pater uota persoluere, si ante, quam persoluerit, nupserit, et uiro eius hoc cognitum non placuerit, non persoluat, et hoc omnino sine peccato quia Deus mundauit eam, sicut dicit, id est mundam iudicauit. Neque hoc contra Dominum fieri putandum est, cum ipse Deus hoc preceperit, hoc uoluerit.

C. XVII. A woman has no power, but is to be subject in all things to the dominion of the husband.

Likewise Ambrose in the Book of Questions of the Old Testament, [question XLV]. It is established that a woman is subject to her husband's dominion and possesses no authority: she can neither teach, nor be a witness, nor give a pledge, nor judge.

C. XVII. Nulla est mulieris potestas, sed in omnibus uiri dominio subsit.

Item Ambrosius in libro questionum Veteris Testamenti. [qu. XLV.] Mulierem constat subiectam dominio uiri esse, et nullam auctoritatem habere; nec docere potest, nec testis esse, neque fidem dare, nec iudicare.

[C. XVIII.] The same in the Hexaemeron, in the treatise on the fourth day.

Adam was deceived through Eve, not Eve through Adam. It is just that the man whom the woman called to fault should take her under his governance, lest the woman again fall through facility.

[C. XVIII.] Idem in Exameron in tractatu diei quartae:

Adam per Euam deceptus est, non Eua per Adam. Quem uocauit ad culpam mulier, iustum est, ut eam in gubernationem assumat, ne iterum femina facilitate labatur.

[C. XIX.] The same on the First Letter to the Corinthians, [at c. 2].

A woman ought to veil her head because she is not the image of God. But so that she may be shown to be subject, and because transgression was begun through her, she ought to have this sign: in the church, out of episcopal reverence, let her not have her head uncovered but covered with a veil; let her not have the power of speaking, because the bishop bears the person of Christ. Therefore, let her be before the bishop as though before Christ the judge, because he is the Lord's vicar. On account of original sin she ought to appear subject.

[C. XIX.] Idem super primam epistolam ad Chorinthios.

[in c. 2.] Mulier debet uelare caput, quia non est imago Dei. Sed ut ostendatur subiecta, et quia preuaricatio per illam inchoata est, hoc signum debet habere, in ecclesia propter reuerentiam episcopalem non habeat caput liberum, sed uelamine tectum, non habeat potestatem loquendi quia episcopus personam habet Christi. Quasi ergo ante iudicem Christum, ita ante episcopum sit, quia uicarius Domini est, propter peccatum originale debet subiecta uideri.

[C. XX.] The same in the Book on Paradise, [c. 10].

PART V. Nor is it without significance that the woman was made not from the same earth from which Adam was fashioned, but from Adam's own rib, so that we might know that there is one nature of the body in man and woman and one source of the human race. Therefore, man and woman were not made as two from the beginning, nor were two men or two women made; rather, first the man, and then the woman from him. For God, wishing to establish one nature of human beings and beginning this from one principle of creation, removed the possibility of many and disparate natures.

GRATIAN. Accordingly, it appears most evidently that the husband is the head of the woman in such a way that she is permitted to offer God no vows of abstinence or religious conversion without his permission. Even if they were promised with the husband's permission, she is not permitted to fulfill the vow in deed when the husband wishes to revoke what was permitted. But vows of continence can be offered by one with the other's permission in such a way that after permission they cannot be rendered void.

[C. XX.] Idem in libro de Paradyso. [c. 10.]

V. Pars. Nec illud otiosum est, quod non de eadem terra, de qua plasmatus est Adam, sed de ipsius Adae costa facta sit mulier, ut sciremus, unam in uiro et muliere corporis esse naturam, unum fontem generis humani. Ideo non duo a principio facti uir et mulier, neque duo uiri, neque duae mulieres; sed primum uir, deinde mulier ex eo. Unam enim naturam hominum uolens constituere Deus, ab uno principio creaturae hoc incipiens, multarum et disparium naturarum eripuit facultatem. Gratian. Euidentissime itaque apparet, ita uirum esse caput mulieris, ut nulla uota abstinentiae uel religiosae conuersationis liceat sibi sine eius licentia Deo offerre; etiamsi uiro permittente repromissa fuerint, non licet ei uotum opere conplere, cum uir uoluerit reuocare permissum. Vota uero continentiae ita alterius permissu ab altero ualent offerri, quod post permissionem non ualent in irritum deduci.

Causa XXXIV

GRATIAN. A certain man was led into captivity; afterward his wife, hearing that he was dead, married another; finally he, returning from captivity, reclaims his wife; she, captivated by love of the later man, spurns the bed of the former. (Question I.) Now it is asked first whether she is guilty of adultery who married another while her husband was living. (Question II.) Second, whether, when the first returns, she is to be compelled to withdraw from the second and return to the first.

GRATIANUS. Quidam uir in captiuitatem ductus est; postea uxor eius, audiens illum mortuum, nupsit alii; demum ille, de captiuitate rediens, repetit uxorem suam; illa, posterioris amore capta, aspernatur thorum prioris. (Qu. I.) Nunc primum queritur, an sit rea adulterii, que uiuente uiro suo alteri nupsit? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an redeunte primo sit cogenda recedere a secundo, et redire ad primum?

Questions I and II

GRATIAN. PART I. Both questions are determined by the authority of Pope Leo, who, writing to Nicetas, Bishop of Aquileia, [letter LXXVII, c. 1 and following], says:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Utraque questio terminatur auctoritate Leonis Papae, qui scribens Nicetae Aquilegensi Episcopo [epist. LXXVII. c. 1. et sequentibus] ait:

C. I. A woman who married another, thinking her husband to be dead, is compelled, when he returns, to return to the former husband.

Since you say that, through the calamity of war and the most grievous assaults of hostility, certain marriages have been divided in such a way that, when the husbands were led away into captivity, their women remained destitute, believing their own husbands to have been killed or that they would never be freed from an unjust dominion, and, with anxiety compelling them, passed into marriage with others; and since, with the Lord's help, the condition of affairs has been changed for the better and some of those who were thought to have perished have returned: your charity rightly appears to doubt what ought to be ordained by us concerning the women who are joined to other husbands. But because we know it to be written that a woman is joined to a man by the Lord, and again we acknowledge the precept that a human being is not to separate what the Lord has joined, it is necessary that we believe the bonds of lawful marriages are to be restored and, with those things which hostility introduced removed, that what was lawfully contracted be restored to each one; and it must be procured with every effort that each one receive what is his own.

§ 1. Nor should he who took the person of that husband who was now thought not to exist be judged so blameworthy or regarded as an invader of another's right. For in this way many things that belonged to those led into captivity could pass into another's right, and nevertheless it belongs to complete justice that, when those persons return, their own things be restored to them. If this is rightly observed in slaves, or fields, or even houses and possessions, how much more must it be done in restoring married persons?—so that what was disturbed by the calamity of war may be restored by the remedy of peace. And therefore, if husbands returning after a long captivity so persevere in love of their wives that they desire them to return into their fellowship, what necessity introduced must be disregarded and judged blameless, and what fidelity demands must be restored. And below, [c. 4]:

§ 2. But if any women are so captivated by love of the later husbands that they prefer to cleave to them rather than pass back into lawful fellowship, they are deservedly to be censured, so that they are deprived of ecclesiastical communion, because from an excusable matter they chose the defilement of a crime, showing that, on account of their incontinence, what a just remission could have expiated was pleasing to them. Therefore, let the marriages return to their own condition by a voluntary restoration, and let what the condition of necessity extorted in no way be drawn into the reproach of an evil will; because, just as those women who refuse to return to their husbands are to be regarded as impious, so those who return to an affection begun from God are deservedly to be praised.

C. I. Que alii nupserit, putans uirum suum mortuum esse, illo redeunte ad priorem redire cogatur.

Cum per bellicam cladem, et per grauissimos hostilitatis incursus ita quedam dicatis diuisa esse coniugia, ut, abductis in captiuitatem uiris, feminae eorum remanserint destitutae, que uiros proprios interemptos putarent, aut ab iniqua dominatione numquam crederent liberandos, et in aliorum coniugium sollicitudine cogente transierunt; cumque, statu rerum auxiliante Domino in meliora conuerso, nonnulli eorum, qui putabantur perisse, remearunt: merito karitas tua uidetur ambigere, quid de mulieribus, que aliis sunt iunctae uiris, a nobis debeat ordinari. Sed quia nouimus scriptum, quod a Domino iungitur mulier uiro, et iterum agnouimus preceptum, ut quod Dominus iunxit homo non separet, necesse est, ut legitimarum federa nuptiarum redintegranda credamus, et remotis his, que hostilitas intulit, unicuique, quod legitime intulit, reformetur, omnique studio procurandum est, ut recipiat unusquisque quod proprium est. §. 1. Nec tam culpabilis iudicetur et tamquam alieni iuris peruasor habeatur, qui personam eius mariti, qui iam non esse estimabatur, assumpsit. Sic enim multa, que ad eos, qui in captiuitatem ducti sunt, pertinebant, in ius alienum transire potuerunt, et tamen plenae iusticiae est, ut eisdem reuersis propria reformentur. Quod si in mancipiis, uel in agris, aut etiam in domibus, ac possessionibus recte seruatur, quanto magis in coniugatorum redintegratione faciendum est? ut quod clade bellica turbatum est pacis remedio reformetur. Et ideo, si uiri post longam captiuitatem reuersi ita in dilectione suarum coniugum perseuerant, ut eas cupiant redire in suum consortium, omittendum est, et inculpabile iudicandum est quod necessitas intulit, et restituendum quod fides poscit. Et infra: [c. 4.] §. 2. Sin autem aliquae mulieres ita posteriorum uirorum amore sunt captae, ut maluerint his coherere, quam ad legitimum transire consortium, merito sunt notandae, ita ut ecclesiastica communione priuentur, que de re excusabili contaminationem criminis elegerunt, ostendentes, sibimet pro sua incontinentia placuisse quod iusta remissio poterat expiare. Redeant ergo in suum statum uoluntaria redintegratione coniugia, neque ullo modo ad opprobrium malae uoluntatis trahatur quod condicio necessitatis extorsit, quia, sicut hae mulieres, que reuerti ad uiros suos noluerint, inpiae sunt habendae: ita illae que in affectum ex Deo initum redeunt, merito sunt laudandae.

C. II. When a husband or wife returns from captivity, the former marriages are to be restored.

Likewise Pope Innocent to Probus, [in letter IX]. While a woman named Ursa was held in captivity, we learned that Fontanus contracted another marriage with Restituta. But when, by the Lord's favor, Ursa returned, she approached us and, with no one denying it, demonstrated fully that she was the wife of the man mentioned. Concerning this, dearly beloved and deservedly illustrious son, we establish, with the Catholic faith supporting us, that the marriage is that which divine grace first founded, and that the union with the second woman, while the first was surviving and had not been cast off by a bill of repudiation, is in no way lawful.

> C. II. Viro uel uxore de captiuitate redeuntibus priora redintegrentur coniugia.
> Item Innocentius Papa Probo. [in ep. IX.] Cum in captiuitate Ursa mulier teneretur, aliud coniugium cum Restituta Fontanum conmisisse cognouimus. Sed fauore Domini reuersa Ursa nos adiit, et nullo diffitente uxorem se esse memorati perdocuit. Qua de re, fili karissime merito illustris, statuimus, fide catholica suffragante, coniugium illud esse, quod erat gratia diuina primitus fundatum, conuentumque secundae mulieris, priore superstite nec diuortio eiecta, nullo pacto esse legitimum.

C. III. A woman who, after leaving her first husband, adheres to a second cannot be reconciled to the first unless she leaves the second.

Likewise Jerome to the priest Amandus. I was not sufficiently able to perceive what he wished to mean by saying, "another man having been received by force." Evidently, after a multitude had been gathered, he seized her against her will. And did the woman who was seized afterward leave the man, but not the ravisher? Let her read the books of Moses, and she will find that, if a woman betrothed to a man was violated in a city and did not cry out, she is punished as an adulteress; but if violated by force in a field, she is innocent, and the violent man is subject to the laws. Therefore, if that sister who, as he says, suffered force so that she was joined to an adulterer wishes to receive the body of Christ and not be reckoned an adulteress, let her do penance, but only on this condition: that from the time of her penance she is not joined to the second man, who is called not a husband but an adulterer. But if this seems hard to her, and she cannot abandon the one once loved nor prefer the Lord to pleasure, let her hear the Apostle crying: "You cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of demons. You cannot partake of the Lord's table and the table of demons"; and in another place: "What fellowship has light with darkness? What agreement has Christ with Belial?" I speak of a new thing—or rather, not a new but an old one, which is confirmed by the authority of the Old Testament. If she leaves the second man and wishes to be reconciled to the first, she cannot. For it is written in Deuteronomy: "If a man takes a wife and has her, and she does not find favor in his sight on account of some foulness, let him write a bill of repudiation and give it to her and send her from his house. And when, having gone out as an adulteress, she has taken a husband, and he too hates her and gives her a bill of repudiation and sends her from his house, or indeed has died, the former husband will not be able to receive her as wife, because she has been polluted and made abominable before the Lord, lest you cause the land which the Lord your God delivered to you to possess to sin."

PART III. GRATIAN. But if, under the compulsion of unavoidable necessity, a husband has fled into another province and his wife refuses to follow him, let her remain unmarried while he lives. Hence in the Council at Verberie:

C. III. Que primo uiro relicto secundo adheserit, nisi secundum relinquens, primo reconciliari non potest.

Item Ieronimus ad Amandum Presbiterum. Non satis animaduertere potui, quid sit quod dicere uoluit: "alio uiro per uim accepto." Congregata uidelicet multitudine nolentem rapuit. Et uirum postea non raptorem rapta dimisit? legat libros Moysi, et inueniet desponsatam uiro, si in ciuitate fuerit oppressa, et non clamauerit, puniri quasi adulteram; ui autem in agro oppressam, innoxiam esse, et uiolentum legibus subiacere. Ergo et ista soror, que, ut dicit, uim passa est, ut adultero iungeretur, si uult corpus Christi accipere, et non adultera reputari, agat penitenciam; ita dumtaxat, ut secundo uiro, qui non appellatur uir, sed adulter, a tempore penitenciae non copuletur. Quod si ei durum uidetur, et semel dilectum non potest derelinquere, neque preferre Dominum uoluptati, audiat Apostolum clamantem: "Non potestis calicem Domini bibere, et calicem demoniorum. Non potestis mensae Domini conmunicare, et mensae demoniorum;" et in alio loco: "Que conuentio luci ad tenebras? quis consensus Christi ad Belial?" Rem nouam loquor, immo non nouam, sed ueterem, que ueteris testamenti auctoritate firmatur. Si reliquerit secundum uirum, et reconciliari priori uoluerit, non potest. Scriptum est enim in Deuteronomio: "Si acceperit homo uxorem, et habuerit eam, et non inuenerit gratiam in conspectu eius propter aliquam feditatem, scribat libellum repudii, et dabit ei, et dimittet eam de domo sua. Cumque egressa adultera maritum duxerit, et ille quoque oderit eam, dederitque ei libellum repudii, et dimiserit de domo sua, aut certe mortuus fuerit, non poterit eam prior maritus recipere uxorem, quoniam polluta est, et abhominabilis facta est coram Domino, ne peccare facias terram, quam Dominus Deus tuus tradidit tibi possidendam." III. Pars. Gratian. Si autem ineuitabili necessitate cogente uir in aliam prouinciam fugerit, et uxor eius eum sequi noluerit, illo uiuente innupta permaneat. Unde in Concilio apud Vermeriam:

C. IV. A woman who refuses to follow her husband when he is led into captivity shall remain unmarried as long as her husband lives.

If anyone, under the compulsion of unavoidable necessity, has fled into another duchy or province, and his wife, although she is able and has the means, refuses to follow him out of love for her relatives or her property, let her always remain unmarried for the whole time that her husband, whom she did not follow, lives.

PART IV. GRATIAN. But what is said of married women on the authority of Pope Leo is also to be understood of virgins: if they marry another's husband without knowledge of the fact, they are not held guilty. Hence Augustine in the book On Faith and Works, [c. 7]:

C. IV. Que uirum in captiuitate ductum sequi noluerit, maneat innupta, quamdiu uir eius uixerit.

Si quis necessitate cogente ineuitabili in alium ducatum seu prouinciam fugerit, et eius uxor, cum ualet et potest, amore parentum aut rerum suarum eum sequi noluerit, ipsa omni tempore, quamdiu uir eius, quem insecuta non fuit, uiuit, semper innupta permaneat. IV. Pars. Gratian. Quod autem de coniugatis auctoritate Leonis Papae dicitur, hoc etiam de uirginibus intelligendum est, ut, si preter conscientiam uiro nupserint alieno, non teneantur. Unde Augustinus in libro de fide et operibus: [c. 7.]

C. V. A virgin who unknowingly marries another woman's husband is not an adulteress.

If a virgin unknowingly marries another woman's husband, then, if she always remains ignorant of this, she will never thereby be an adulteress. But if she comes to know it, she begins to be one from the time when she knowingly lies with another woman's husband; just as, in the law of estates, each person is most rightly called a possessor in good faith for as long as he does not know that he possesses another's property. But when he has learned this and has not withdrawn from another's possession, he is then declared to be in bad faith; then he will justly be called unjust.

PART V. GRATIAN. Thus ignorance also excuses a man who unknowingly slept with his wife's sister. Hence it is read in the Council of Tribur:

> C. V. Non est adultera uirgo, que nesciens uiro nubit alieno.
>
> Si uirgo nesciens uiro nupserit alieno, hoc si semper nesciat, numquam ex hoc erit adultera. Si autem sciat, iam ex hoc esse incipit, ex quo cum alieno sciens cubauerit, sicut in iure prediorum tamdiu quisque bonae fidei possessor rectissime dicitur, quamdiu se possidere ignorat alienum; cum uero scierit, nec ab aliena possessione recesserit, tunc malae fidei perhibetur, tunc iuste iniustus uocabitur. V. Pars. Gratian. Sic etiam ignorantia excusat eum, qui nesciens dormiuit cum sorore uxoris. Unde in Concilio Triburiensi legitur:

C. VI. A man who unknowingly slept with his wife's sister is not compelled to leave his lawful wife.

In the wife's absence, the wife's sister went into the husband's bed, and he, thinking her to be his wife, slept with her. Concerning this, it was determined that, if he proves by a true assurance that he committed this crime unknowingly, he shall indeed perform whatever penance is adjudged to him, but shall be permitted to retain his lawful marriage. The woman, however, shall be afflicted with a worthy punishment and perpetually deprived of marriage.

> C. VI. Non cogatur legitimam deserere uxorem qui nesciens dormiuit cum eius sorore.
>
> In lectum mariti absente uxore soror iuit uxoris, quam ille uxorem suam putans esse, dormiuit cum ea. Super hoc uisum est, si ipse per securitatem ueram hoc probauerit, quod inscius fecerit hoc scelus, penitenciam quidem, que sibi iudicata fuerit, agat; legitimum uero coniugium suum habere permittatur. Illa uero digna uindicta affligatur, et in eternum coniugio priuetur.

[PALEA. C. VII.

Likewise Hermas in the book of the Shepherd, Mandate IV. I said to the shepherd: Lord, if anyone has a wife faithful in the Lord and finds her in adultery, does the husband sin if he lies with her? And he said to me: As long as he does not know her sin, the husband living with her is without fault. But if the husband knows that his wife has sinned and the woman has not done penance but persists in her fornication, and the husband has intercourse with her, he will be guilty of her sin and a participant in her adultery. And I said to him: What, then, if the woman persists in her vice? And he said: Let the husband put her away, and let the husband remain by himself. But if he puts away his wife and takes another, he too commits adultery. And I said to him: What if the woman who was put away has done penance and wishes to return to her husband; will she not be received by her husband? And he said to me: Indeed she will. If her husband does not receive her, he sins and brings a great sin upon himself; rather, he ought to receive the sinful woman who has done penance. Therefore, a husband ought not to take another after putting away his wife. This act is alike in man and woman.]

PART VI. GRATIAN. Concerning those who simply commit fornication, or with two sisters, or with a mother and daughter, or with a father and son, the same is to be understood: marriages are not to be denied to those who acted unknowingly, but are to be perpetually prohibited to those who acted knowingly. Hence it is read in the same Council:

> [PALEA. C. VII.
> Item Hermes in libro Pastoris mandato IV. Ego dixi pastori: Domine, si quis habuerit uxorem fidelem in Domino, et inuenerit hanc in adulterio, numquid peccat uir, si cum illa concumbit? Et dixit michi: Quamdiu nescit peccatum eius, sine crimine est uir uiuens cum illa. Si autem scit uir, uxorem suam deliquisse, et non egerit penitenciam mulier, sed permanet in fornicatione sua, et coierit uir cum illa, reus erit peccati eius, et particeps mechationis illius. Et dixi illi: Quid ergo, si permanserit in uicio suo mulier? et dixit: Dimittat illam uir, et uir per se maneat. Quod si dimiserit mulierem suam, et aliam duxerit, et ipse mechatur. Et dixi illi: Quid, si mulier dimissa penitenciam egerit, et uoluerit ad uirum suum reuerti, nonne recipietur a uiro suo? Et dixit michi: Immo, si non receperit eam uir suus, peccat, et magnum peccatum sibi admittit, sed debet recipere peccatricem, que penitenciam egit. Ergo non debet dimissa coniuge sua uir aliam ducere. Hic actus similis est in uiro et muliere.] VI. Pars. Gratian. De simpliciter uero fornicantibus, uel cum duabus sororibus, uel cum matre et filia, uel cum patre et filio, idem accipiendum est, ut ignorantibus coniugia non negentur, scientibus perpetuo prohibeantur. Unde in eodem Concilio legitur:

C. VIII. Those whose incest is excused by ignorance are not prohibited from contracting lawful marriages.

If anyone has committed fornication with two sisters, and one sister did not know that her sister had previously been violated by the same man, or did not understand herself to be the sister of her whom he had previously violated, then, if he has worthily repented and has not been able to remain continent, marriages shall not be denied to them after seven years. But if they were not ignorant, let them abstain from marriage until death.

> C. VIII. Matrimonia legitima non prohibeantur contrahere quorum incestum ignorantia excusat.
> Si quis cum duabus sororibus fornicatus fuerit, et soror sororem ab eodem antea stupratam nescierit, uel se sororem eius quam antea stuprauerat, non intellexit si digne penituerit, et se continere non ualuerit, post annos septem coniugia illis non negentur. Si autem non ignorauerint, usque ad mortem a coniugio abstineant.

[C. IX.] Likewise from the same Council.

If anyone has committed fornication with a mother and daughter, the mother being ignorant concerning the daughter and the daughter concerning the mother, let him never take a wife; but let the women, if they wish, take husbands. But if the women themselves knew this, let them remain perpetually without husbands.

> [C. IX.] Item ex eodem.
>
> Si quis cum matre et filia fornicatus est, ignorante matre de filia, et filia de matre, ille numquam accipiat uxorem; illae uero, si uoluerint, accipiant maritos. Si autem hoc scierint ipsae feminae, absque maritis perpetuo maneant.

[C. X.] Likewise from the same Council.

A certain man committed fornication with a certain woman; and afterward his son, not knowing his father's deed, violated the same woman. When the father learned this, he made confession concerning himself and his son. They established that it was better that lawful marriages be permitted to those who had fallen in this way, together with worthy penance, than that they perhaps sin more grievously. But let the woman with whom they committed fornication remain without hope of marriage.

[C. X.] Item ex eodem.

Quidam fornicatus est cum quadam muliere; et postea filius nesciens patris factum, stuprauit eandem. Quod cum pater resciret, de se filioque confessus est. Statuerunt, melius esse, ut taliter lapsis cum digna penitencia legitima permittantur coniugia, quam forte deterius delinquant. Fornicaria autem sine spe coniugii maneat.

Causa XXXV

GRATIAN. A certain man, after his wife had died, joined another woman to himself in marriage, who was related to the deceased wife in the fourth degree of consanguinity but to the man in the sixth line. After three years, when children had been received from her, he is accused before the Church; he alleges ignorance. (Question I.) Here it is asked first whether it is lawful for someone to take a woman from his own kindred as wife. (Question II.) Second, whether some woman from the consanguinity of one's wife can be taken as spouse. (Question III.) Third, to what degree each person ought to abstain either from his own female blood relatives or from those of his wife. (Question IV.) Fourth, why consanguinity is reckoned to the seventh degree, in such a way that it neither extends beyond it nor stops short of it. (Question V.) Fifth, how the degrees of consanguinity are to be reckoned. (Question VI.) Sixth, who ought to affirm the kinship by oath. (Question VII.) Seventh, whether those born of incestuous unions are reckoned as children. (Question VIII.) Eighth, if a woman from consanguinity or affinity has unknowingly been taken as wife, whether she can adhere to her husband by dispensation. (Question IX.) Ninth, if it happens that the Church is deceived and separates a woman from her husband on account of consanguinity, and after four years, marriages having been celebrated on both sides, she is discovered not to have been a blood relative of the former husband, whether the second marriages are to be dissolved and the former ones restored. (Question X.) Tenth, if the widow of someone from one's own kindred passes to a second marriage, whether offspring received from them can enter into union with someone from the kindred of the former husband.

GRATIANUS. Quidam mortua uxore sua aliam sibi matrimonio copulauit, que uxori defunctae quarto gradu consanguinitatis, uiro autem sexta linea adherebat. Post triennium uero, susceptis ex ea liberis, accusatur apud ecclesiam; iste pretendit ignorantiam. (Qu. I.) Hic primum queritur, si liceat aliquam ex propria cognatione duci in uxorem? (Qu. II.) Secundo, si ex consanguinitate uxoris aliqua possit in coniugem duci? (Qu. III.) Tertio, usque ad quem gradum quisque debeat abstinere siue a propriis, siue ab uxoris suae consanguineis? (Qu. IV.) Quarto, quare usque ad septimum gradum consanguinitas conputatur, ita quod nec ultra protenditur, nec infra subsistit? (Qu. V.) Quinto, quomodo gradus consanguinitatis conputandi sunt? (Qu. VI.) Sexto, qui iureiurando propinquitatem firmare debeant? (Qu. VII.) Septimo, an illi, qui de incestuosis nati sunt, filii reputentur? (Qu. VIII.) Octauo, si ignoranter aliqua de consanguinitate uel affinitate in uxorem ducta est, an ex dispensatione uiro suo possit adherere? (Qu. IX.) Nono, si contigerit ecclesiam decipi, et causa consanguinitatis aliquam a uiro suo separare, que post quadriennium nuptiis hinc inde celebratis deprehenditur non fuisse consanguinea prioris, an secunda coniugia sint rescindenda, et priora sint redintegranda? (Qu. X.)

> Decimo, si relicta alicuius de propria cognatione ad secundas nuptias transierit, an proles ex eis suscepta possit pertingere ad consortium alicuius de cognatione prioris uiri?

Question I

GRATIAN. That it is lawful for us to take our own female blood relatives, or those of our wife, in marriage is proved by examples and authorities. For Abraham took Sarai, the daughter of his brother —namely, Lot's sister—as wife. Isaac received Rebecca as spouse, who was the daughter of his mother's male cousin. Jacob joined two sisters, namely Leah and Rachel, daughters of his maternal uncle Laban, to himself in marriage.

§ 1. In the law also, the Lord commanded Moses that no one should take a wife except from his own tribe and family. Likewise, if anyone died without children, the Lord commanded that his brother join the wife of the deceased to himself and raise up offspring from her for his brother. Moreover, all those to whom the law itself has come are proved to be bound by its precepts, except for those which are shown to have been nullified either by evangelical commands or apostolic institutions. But unions between blood relatives are found to be prohibited by no command of the Gospel or apostolic institution. Hence they are proved lawful now just as at the beginning.

§ 2. To these things the response is as follows: unions between blood relatives are found at one time to have been permitted on account of necessity, at another to have been commanded for a just reason. For when at the beginning one man and one woman from his side were formed by God, sisters were necessarily joined to brothers. But what is done under the compulsion of necessity ought likewise to cease when the necessity ceases. Therefore, union between blood relatives is now usurped all the more damnably insofar as it is proved less necessary. Hence a union of this kind is afterward found prohibited by the law, when the Lord says through Moses: "You shall not uncover the nakedness of your sister." Hence Augustine says in the book The City of God, [XV, c. 16]:

> GRATIANUS. Quod consanguineas nostras siue uxoris nostrae in coniugium nobis ducere liceat, exemplis et auctoritatibus probatur. Abraham namque Sarai filiam fratris sui, sororem uidelicet Loth, in uxorem duxit. Ysaac Rebeccam in coniugem accepit, que erat filia consobrini matris suae. Iacob duas sorores, Liam uidelicet et Rachel filias Laban auunculi sui, sibi matrimonio sociauit. §. 1. In lege quoque precepit Dominus Moysi, ut nullus duceret uxorem, nisi de propria tribu et familia. Item si aliquis absque liberis moreretur, precepit Dominus, ut frater eius uxorem defuncti sibi copularet, et ex ea semen fratri suo suscitaret. Porro, ad quoscumque lex ipsa peruenit, eius preceptis probantur obnoxii, nisi que uel euangelicis mandatis uel apostolicis institutis euacuata monstrantur. Nullo autem euangelii precepto uel apostolico instituto consanguineorum coniunctiones prohibitae inueniuntur. Unde sicut ab inicio, ita et nunc licitae probantur. §. 2. His ita respondetur: Consanguineorum coniunctiones alias causa necessitatis permissae, alias causa iustae rationis inueniuntur inperatae. Cum enim unus ab inicio uir, atque una ex latere eius mulier formaretur a Deo, necessario sorores fratribus copulabantur. Quod autem necessitate cogente fit cessante necessitate pariter cessare oportet. Tanto ergo nunc dampnabilius usurpatur consanguineorum coniunctio, quanto minus necessaria probatur. Unde huiuscemodi copula postea lege prohibita inuenitur, Domino dicente per Moysen: "Turpitudinem sororis tuae non reuelabis." Hinc Augustinus ait in libro de ciuitate Dei: [XV. c. 16.]

C. UN. Why it was established that we should not take our female blood relatives as wives.

Since, therefore, after the first union of the man made from dust and of his spouse from the man's side, the human race had need of the commingling of males and females in order that they might be multiplied by begetting, and there were no human beings except those born from those two, the men took their sisters as spouses. Certainly, the more ancient this is because necessity compelled it, the more damnable it afterward became when religion prohibited it. For the most certain consideration of charity was had: that human beings, for whom useful and most honorable concord was fitting, should be bound together by the bonds of diverse relationships; that one person should not have many relationships in one person, but individual relationships should be spread among individual persons, and thus many relationships might more diligently bind many persons to social life. For "father" and "father-in-law" are names of two relationships. Therefore, when someone has one man as father and another as father-in-law, charity extends itself more numerously. But the one Adam was compelled to be both to his sons and to his daughters when brothers and sisters were joined in marriage. Thus Eve his wife also was both mother-in-law and mother to the children of each sex. If these had been two women, one the mother and the other the mother-in-law, social affection would have bound itself more abundantly.

§ 1. But at that time there was no source from which this could be done, when there were no human beings from those first two except brothers and sisters. Therefore, what could be done had to be done, so that, when there existed an abundance of women from whom wives could be taken who were now not sisters, that former thing would not only not be done where there was no necessity.

§ 2. With the human race increasing, we discern that this is so observed even among impious worshipers of many false gods that, even if marriages between brother and sister are permitted by perverse laws, a better custom nevertheless prefers to shudder at that very license and so opposes it as though it could never have been lawful.

§ 3. Therefore, the joining of male and female, insofar as it concerns the human race, is a certain seedbed of charity; but the heavenly city has need, so that it may escape the harm of generation.

GRATIAN. Accordingly, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the others who took wives from their own kindred are excused by this custom, which took its origin from the very beginning of human propagation and which no law had nullified by commanding the contrary. Yet another cause of most right reason, on account of which this was done, can also be understood. While all the others were defiled by idolatry, only the family of Eber remained in the worship of the one God. Hence Abraham was cast by the Chaldeans with his brother into the fire which he refused to worship, so that by burning he might experience the divine power of its divinity, which he had disdained to worship with veneration. Therefore, lest believers slide into idolatry through union with unbelievers and so offend God—as once before the flood the sons of God, mingled with the daughters of men, had provoked him to anger—it was most rightly provided that the patriarchs, most holy men, should take wives for themselves only from their own kindred, that is, from the family of believers. Hence also, when the children of Israel, as they were about to enter the promised land, heard from the Lord that they were not to take the daughters of the Canaanites as wives for themselves nor give their own daughters to them in marriage, the Lord immediately added: "Lest they cause you to withdraw from your God and fornicate with strange gods." Hence also Ezra ordered that the Idumaean women and women of other nations, through whom the children of Israel were going to strange gods, be separated from them.

§ 1. There is also another cause why unions between blood relatives in the people of God were first permitted, or rather commanded. From the beginning God so ordered the salvation of the human race that he established the primitive Church among that people who were near to him by consanguinity of the flesh. Hence he first chose the Apostles from the Jewish people and established them as the foundation of the Church; by their preaching many from the same people, having been converted to God, furnished in themselves the origin of the Church. Thereafter, the Jewish people having been abandoned in the blindness of their unbelief, the preaching of the Gospel was transferred to the nations, who were alien from Christ both in faith and in kinship of the flesh; and Christ, as though spurning union with a female blood relative, chose for himself a wife from an alien kindred, fulfilling what he had foretold through the prophet: "In your sins I sent away your mother as an adulteress and a repudiated woman." And likewise through another Prophet: "I shall call the people not mine my people." Therefore, as a sacrament of this matter, unions between blood relatives were at first permitted among the people but are now prohibited. And because a faithful people is found not only in one family but in the whole multitude of nations, each person is permitted to take a wife not from his own kindred but from any other.

§ 2. But that statement that the precepts of the law which are proved to have been nullified neither by evangelical nor apostolic institutions are to be observed is indeed true; but since the Apostle proves that all figurative things were given for a time, and therefore affirms that, when the truth comes, those things are no longer to be observed, and since this, as was shown above, is proved to have been instituted by God for the sake of a sacrament, it is most certainly established that this too was revoked together with the other figurative things. Nevertheless, just as the Apostle by way of counsel added certain things which were not found defined by evangelical precepts, and yet were not therefore repudiated by the other Apostles as rash or superfluous, so also the Church, after the apostolic institutions, added certain things by a counsel of perfection, such as those concerning the continence of ministers, the confection of the mysteries, and the celebration of the offices; these are in no way to be repudiated but are to be received with diligent veneration. Therefore, although unions between blood relatives are not found prohibited by evangelical and apostolic precepts, they are nevertheless to be avoided, because they are found to have been delimited by ecclesiastical institutions.

C. UN. Quare constitutum fit, ne consanguineas ducamus uxores.

Cum igitur genus humanum post primam copulam uiri facti ex puluere, et coniugis eius ex uiri latere, marium feminarumque conmixtione opus haberet, ut gignendo multiplicarentur, nec essent ulli homines nisi qui ex illis duobus nati fuissent, uiri coniuges sorores suas acceperunt. Quod profecto quanto est antiquius conpellente necessitate, tanto postea dampnabilius factum est religione prohibente. Habita enim est ratio certissima karitatis, ut homines, quibus esset utilis atque honestissima concordia, diuersarum necessitudinum uinculis necterentur, nec unus in uno multas haberet, sed singulae spargerentur in singulos, ac sic ad socialem uitam diligentius plurimae plurimos obtinerent. Pater quippe et socer duarum sunt necessitudinum nomina. Dum ergo quis alium habet patrem, alium socerum, numerosius se karitas porrigit. Utrumque autem unus Adam esse cogebatur et filiis et filiabus suis, quando fratres sororesque coniugio iungebantur. Sic et Eua uxor eius utrique sexui filiorum fuit et socrus et mater; que si duae fuissent feminae, altera mater altera socrus, copiosius se socialis dilectio colligaret. §. 1. Sed hoc unde fieret, tunc non erat, quando nisi fratres et sorores ex illis duobus primis nulli homines erant. Fieri ergo debuit, quod potuit, ut existente copia unde ducerentur uxores, que iam non erant sorores, non solum illud non fieret ubi nulla necessitas esset. §. 2. Quod humano genere crescente etiam inter inpios deorum multorum falsorumque cultores sic obseruari cernimus, ut etiamsi peruersis legibus permittantur fraterna coniugia, melior tamen consuetudo ipsam malit exhorrere licentiam, sicque aduersetur, quasi numquam licere potuerit. §. 3. Copulatio igitur maris et feminae, quantum attinet ad genus humanum, quoddam seminarium est karitatis; celestis uero ciuitas opus habet, ut noxam generationis euadat. Gratian. Hac itaque consuetudine, que ab ipso exordio humanae propagationis originem habuit, quam nulla lex contra iubendo euacuauerat, excusantur Abraham, Ysaac, et Iacob, et ceteri, qui de propria cognatione ducebant uxores. Quamuis etiam alia causa rectissimae rationis, qua id factum sit, possit intelligi. Ceteris idolatria fedatis, sola familia Heber in cultu unius Dei remansit. Unde Abraham a Chaldeis cum fratre suo in ignem quem adorare noluit, proiectus est, ut numen suae diuinitatis exurendo sentiret, quem uenerando colere contempsit. Ne ergo ex coniunctione infidelium fideles ad idolatriam prolaberentur, et ita Deum offenderent, sicut quondam ante diluuium filii Dei, conmixti filiabus hominum, ipsum ad iracundiam prouocauerant, rectissime cautum est, ut patriarchae uiri sanctissimi nonnisi de propria cognatione, id est de familia fidelium, sibi uxores acciperent. Hinc etiam, cum filii Israel intraturi terram promissionis a Domino audirent, ne filias Chananeorum sibi in uxores acciperent, nec suas eis nuptui traderent, statim subiunxit Dominus: "Ne faciant uos recedere a Deo uestro, et fornicari cum diis alienis." Hinc etiam Hesdras Idumeas atque aliarum mulieres nationum, per quas filii Israel ibant ad deos alienos, ab eis separari iussit. §. 1. Est etiam alia causa, quare coniunctiones consanguineorum in populo Dei permissae primum, uel potius inperatae fuerint. Deus sic ab inicio salutem humani generis dispensauit, ut primitiuam ecclesiam in populo illo institueret, qui sibi carnis consanguinitate erat propinquus. Unde de plebe Iudaica primum Apostolos elegit, quos quasi fundamentum ecclesiae instituit, quorum predicatione de eadem plebe multi ad Deum conuersi, in se ipsis originem ecclesiae prestiterunt. Deinde in cecitate suae perfidiae Iudaica plebe relicta ad gentes, que tam fide quam cognatione carnis a Christo erant alienae, predicatio euangelica translata est, et quasi consanguineae copulam Christus aspernatus, de aliena cognatione sibi uxorem elegit, adinplens illud, quod per prophetam predixerat: "In peccatis uestris dimisi matrem uestram quasi adulteram et repudiatam." Et item per alium Prophetam: "Vocabo non plebem meam plebem meam." In huius ergo rei sacramentum consanguineorum coniunctiones primum in populo permissae sunt, nunc autem prohibitae. Et quia non in una tantum familia, sed in omni multitudine gentium fidelium populus inuenitur, non de propria cognatione, sed de qualibet alia cuique uxorem ducere conceditur. §. 2. Illud autem, quod precepta legis seruanda dicuntur, que nec euangelicis, nec apostolicis institutis euacuata probantur, uerum quidem est; sed cum omnia figuralia Apostolus probet ad tempus esse data, atque ideo ueniente ueritate affirmet illa non ultra esse seruanda, hoc autem, ut supra monstratum est, causa sacramenti a Deo institutum esse probetur: et hoc cum ceteris figuralibus euocatum certissime constat; quamquam, sicut Apostolus quedam consulendo addidit, que euangelicis preceptis non inueniebantur diffinita, nec ideo tamen tamquam temeraria uel superflua ab aliis Apostolis sunt repudiata; sic et ecclesia post apostolica instituta quedam consilio perfectionis addidit, utpote de continentia ministrorum, de confectione misteriorum, de celebratione offitiorum, que nullatenus sunt repudianda, sed diligenti ueneratione suscipienda. Consanguineorum ergo coniunctiones, quamuis euangelicis et apostolicis preceptis non inueniantur prohibitae, sunt tamen fugiendae, quia ecclesiasticis institutionibus inueniuntur terminatae.

GRATIAN. Therefore, because it is necessary to abstain from unions between blood relatives, as has been proved, it must be seen to what degree one ought to abstain from one's own female blood relatives, or whether it is lawful to take as spouse any woman from the kindred of one's own wife.

Pope Gregory writes thus concerning these matters in the Council of Meaux:

> GRATIANUS. Quia ergo a consanguineorum coniunctionibus, sicut probatum est, abstinere oportet, uidendum est, usque ad quem gradum a consanguineis propriis abstinere oporteat, uel si ex cognatione propriae uxoris aliquam duci in coniugem liceat?
> De his ita scribit Gregorius Papa in Concilio Meldensi:

C. I. No one shall take a wife from his kindred down to the seventh generation.

Concerning the affinity of consanguinity, it was resolved to observe the degrees of kinship down to the seventh generation. For the inheritance of property, established through the legal determinations of instruments, also extends the succession of heirs to the seventh degree. For they would not succeed unless it were owed to them from the stock of kinship.

> C. I. Usque ad septimam generationem nullus de sua cognatione ducat uxorem.
> De affinitate consanguinitatis per gradus cognationis placuit usque ad septimam generationem obseruare. Nam et hereditas rerum, per legales instrumentorum diffinitiones sancita, usque ad septimum gradum protendit heredum successionem. Non enim succederent, nisi eis de propagine cognationis deberetur.

C. II. Those who take their female blood relatives as wives are branded with infamy.

Likewise Pope Callistus, [letter II to the bishops of Gaul]. Unions between blood relatives are prohibited from being made. Why? Because both divine and secular laws prohibit them. Therefore, the divine laws cast out not only those who do these things but also those who issue from them, and even call them accursed. The secular laws, moreover, call such persons infamous and repel them from inheritance. But we, following our fathers, brand them with infamy and judge them to be infamous, because they are bespattered with the stains of infamy; nor ought we to receive as men or to receive the accusations of those whom the secular laws reject.

§ 1. But we call those persons consanguineous whom the divine laws and the laws of emperors, Romans, and Greeks call consanguineous and receive in inheritance, and whom they cannot repel.

> C. II. Infamia notantur qui consanguineas ducunt uxores.
> Item Kalixtus Papa. [ep. II. ad Episcopos Galliae] Coniunctiones consanguineorum fieri prohibentur. Quare? quia has et diuinae seculique prohibent leges. Leges ergo diuinae hec agentes, et eos, qui ex eis prodeunt, non solum eiciunt, sed etiam maledictos appellant. Leges ergo seculi infames tales uocant, et ab hereditate repellunt. Nos uero sequentes patres nostros infamia eos notamus, et infames esse censemus, quia infamiae maculis sunt aspersi, nec eos uiros, nec accusationes, quas leges seculi reiciunt, suscipere debemus. §. 1. Eos autem consanguineos dicimus, quos diuinae, et inperatorum, ac Romanorum, atque Grecorum leges consanguineos appellant, et in hereditate suscipiunt, nec repellere possunt.

C. III. Affines can be joined in the fifth generation; if they are found joined in the fourth, they are not to be separated.

Likewise Pope Fabian. Concerning relatives who come into affinity through husband and wife: when the wife or husband has died, let them be joined in the fifth generation; if they are found joined in the fourth, let them not be separated. Nevertheless, in the third degree of relationship it is not lawful to take another's wife after his death. A man shall be joined in marriage equally with his own female blood relatives and with his wife's female blood relatives after his wife's death.

> C. III. Affines in quinta generatione copulari possunt; in quarta, si inuenti fuerint, non separentur.
> Item Fabianus Papa. De propinquis, qui ad affinitatem per uirum et uxorem ueniunt, defuncta uxore uel uiro, in quinta generatione coniungantur; in quarta, si inuenti fuerint, non separentur. In tertia tamen propinquitate non licet uxorem alterius accipere post obitum eius. Equaliter uir coniungatur in matrimonio eis, qui sibi consanguinei sunt, et uxoris suae consanguineis post mortem uxoris.

[C. IV.] The same.

Those who take a woman related by blood as wife and are separated shall not be permitted to join other wives to themselves in marriage as long as both are living.

GRATIAN—unless they are excused by ignorance. Hence in the Council at Verberie:

> [C. IV.] Idem.
> Qui propinquam sanguinis ducunt uxorem, et separantur, non licebit eis, sibi in coniugio sociare alias uxores, quamdiu utrique uiuunt. Gratianus nisi ignorantia excusentur. Unde in Concilio apud Vermeriam:

C. V. Those who unknowingly commit incest are not prohibited from taking spouses.

If anyone has committed fornication with a mother and daughter, the mother being ignorant concerning the daughter and the daughter concerning the mother, let him never take a wife; but let the women, if they wish, take husbands. But if the women themselves knew this, let them remain perpetually without husbands.

> C. V. Non prohibentur ducere uxores qui ignoranter incestum conmittunt.
> Si quis cum matre et filia fornicatus est ignorante matre de filia, et filia de matre, ille numquam accipiat uxorem; illae uero, si uoluerint, accipiant maritos. Si autem hoc scierint ipsae feminae, absque maritis perpetuo maneant.

[C. VI.] Likewise from the same Council.

If a man has committed fornication with a woman and his brother, unaware of this, has taken the same woman as wife, let the brother do penance because he concealed the crime from his brother, and let him marry after the penance. But let the woman do penance until death and remain without hope of marriage.

GRATIAN. But the other authorities are to be understood concerning those who are unknowingly joined. Hence Pope Julius:

> [C. VI.] Item ex eodem.

Si homo fornicatus fuerit cum muliere, et frater eius nesciens eandem duxerit uxorem, frater, eo quod fratri crimen celauerit, peniteat, et post penitenciam nubat. Mulier autem usque ad mortem peniteat, et sine spe coniugii maneat. Gratian. De his uero, qui ignoranter coniunguntur, ceterae auctoritates intelligendae sunt. Unde Iulius Papa:

C. VII. No one shall take a wife from the relationship of his own blood or his wife's down to the seventh degree.

We permit no one of either sex to take a wife from the relationship of his own blood or his wife's down to the seventh degree of lineage, or to be joined with the stain of incest. Moreover, we also added this: that, just as it is not lawful for any Christian to take a spouse from his own consanguinity, so it is also not lawful to take one from the consanguinity of his wife, on account of the unity of flesh.

C. VII. Ex propinquitate sui sanguinis uel uxoris usque in septimum gradum nullus ducat uxorem.

Nullum in utroque sexu permittimus ex propinquitate sanguinis sui uel uxoris usque in septimum generis gradum uxorem ducere, uel incesti macula copulari. Preterea illud quoque adiecimus, quia, sicut non licet cuiquam Christiano de sua consanguinitate, sic etiam nec licet de consanguinitate uxoris suae coniugem ducere propter carnis unitatem.

C. VIII. Incestuous persons are worthy of no name of marriage.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 61]. Concerning incestuous unions, we reserve absolutely no pardon unless they have healed the adultery by separation. But those whom it is deadly even to designate as incestuous are to be considered worthy of no name of marriage.

§ 1. For we judge these persons to be such: if anyone has polluted by carnal union the widow of his brother, who had previously existed almost as his sister; if any brother has taken his own full sister as wife; if anyone has taken his stepmother; if anyone has joined himself to his female cousin or niece; if anyone mingles with the widow or daughter of his maternal uncle, or the daughter of his paternal uncle, or his own stepdaughter; or one who has polluted by intercourse or taken as wife any woman from his own consanguinity, or a woman whom his blood relative had. All these persons we do not doubt to be incestuous both under the ancient law and under this constitution, and we command that they remain and pray among the catechumens until lawful satisfaction. We so prohibit this at the present time that we do not dissolve those things which have been established hitherto.

§ 2. Certainly, those to whom an unlawful union is forbidden will have liberty to enter a better marriage.

C. VIII. Incestuosi nullo sunt digni nomine coniugii.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 61.] De incestis coniunctionibus nichil prorsus ueniae reseruamus, nisi cum adulterium separatione sanauerint. Incestos uero nullo coniugii nomine deputandos, quos etiam designare funestum est. §. 1. Hos enim esse censemus, si quis relictam fratris, (que pene prius soror extiterat) carnali coniunctione polluerit; si quis frater germanam uxorem acceperit; si quis nouercam duxerit; si quis consobrinae sobrinaeque se sociauerit; si quis relictae uel filiae auunculi misceatur, aut patrui filiae, uel priuignae suae; aut qui ex propria consanguinitate aliquam, aut quam consanguineus habuit concubitu polluerit aut uxorem duxerit. Quos omnes et olim, et sub hac constitutione incestos esse non dubitamus, et inter catecuminos usque ad legitimam satisfactionem manere et orare precipimus. Quod ita presenti tempore prohibemus, ut ea, que sunt hactenus constituta, non dissoluamus. §. 2. Sane quibus coniunctio illicita interdicitur, habebunt ineundi melioris coniugii libertatem.

C. IX. Incestuous persons are to be excommunicated until satisfaction.

Likewise from the Council of Lérida, [c. 4]. Concerning those who defile themselves with the pollution of incest, it was resolved that, for as long as they persevere in that detestable and unlawful carnal union, they are to be admitted in church only as far as the Mass of the catechumens; nor will any Christians be permitted to take food with them, as the Apostle commanded.

C. IX. Incestuosi usque ad satisfactionem excommunicentur.

Item ex Concilio Ylerdensi. [c. 4.] De his, qui incesti pollutione conmaculant placuit, quousque in ipso detestando et illicito carnis contubernio perseuerant, usque ad missam tantum catecuminorum in ecclesia admittantur; cum quibus etiam nec cibum sumere ulli Christianorum, sicut Apostolus iussit, licebit.

C. X. No one shall take as wife a woman known by his blood relative or stained by any pollution.

Likewise Pope Gregory to Felix, Bishop of the city of Messina, [book XII, letter 31]. It is not and will not be lawful for any Christian to take in marriage either a woman whom someone from his own consanguinity had as wife or one whom he stained by any unlawful pollution, because such intercourse is incestuous and abominable to God and all human beings. We read that it was established by the holy Fathers that incestuous persons are to be considered worthy of no name of marriage.

GRATIAN. That is, according to the order of nature; but if extraordinarily, it is not so. For Urban II says to Hugh, Bishop of Grenoble:

C. X. Nullus ducat uxorem a consanguineo suo cognitam, uel aliqua pollutione maculatam.

Item Gregorius Papa ad Felicem, Missenae ciuitatis Episcopum. [lib. XII. epist. 31.] Nec eam, quam aliquis ex propria consanguinitate coniugem habuerit, uel aliqua illicita pollutione maculauerit ulli Christianorum in coniugium ducere licet uel licebit, quia incestuosus est talis coitus, et abhominabilis Deo et cunctis hominibus. Incestuosos uero nullo coniugii nomine deputandos sanctis Patribus statutum esse legimus. Gratian. Naturae uidelicet ordine; si uero extraordinarie, non sic. Ait enim Urbanus II. Hugoni, Gratianopolitano Episcopo:

C. XI. Extraordinary pollution does not impede affection in natural relations.

Extraordinary pollution, when admitted only in natural relations or repeated more frequently short of the marital effect, does not appear to impede marriage, provided that, after the sacraments have been furnished, it is established to have occurred as was signified to us by your letters, although that pollution itself is criminal and damnable.

C. XI. Extraordinaria pollutio in naturalibus non inpedit affectum.

Extraordinaria pollutio non nisi in naturalibus admissa, uel sepius reiterata citra maritalem effectum, si prebitis sacramentis ita esse constiterit, quemadmodum nobis tuis significatum est litteris, non uidetur matrimonium inpedire, quamuis ipsa criminosa sit et dampnabilis.

C. XII. No one shall take as spouse the widow of his wife's blood relatives down to the third generation.

Likewise Pope Julius. This too was established: let no one take in marriage the widow of his wife's father, the widow of his wife's brother, or the widow of his wife's son. Let no one take as wife the widow of his wife's blood relatives down to the third generation; but if they are found joined in the fourth or fifth, let them not be separated.

> C. XII. Nullus ducat in coniugem relictam consanguineorum uxoris suae usque in tertiam progeniem.
> Item Iulius Papa. Et hoc quoque statutum est, ut relictam patris uxoris suae, relictam fratris uxoris suae, relictam filii uxoris suae nemo sibi in matrimonium sumat; relictam consanguineorum uxoris suae usque in tertiam progeniem nemo in uxorem sumat; in quarta autem et in quinta si inuenti fuerint, non separentur.

C. XIII. Each person is equally to abstain from his own blood relatives and those of his wife.

The same. Let a man be considered equally connected to his own blood relatives and to his wife's blood relatives.

> C. XIII. A consanguineis propriis uel suae uxoris pariter cuique est abstinendum.
> Idem. Equaliter uir coniungatur consanguineis propriis, et consanguineis uxoris suae.

C. XIV. The same consanguinity is to be observed in one's own kindred and that of one's spouse.

Likewise Isidore from the Council of Mâcon. Certainly, the consanguinity that is to be observed in one's own person is undoubtedly to be guarded by the law of marriage in the kindred of one's wife. Because it is established that those two were in one flesh, each kindred must therefore be believed common to them, as it is written: "The two shall be in one flesh."

> C. XIV. In parentela propria et coniugis eadem consanguinitas est obseruanda.
>
> Item Ysidorus ex Concilio Maticensi. Sane consanguinitas, que in proprio uiro conseruanda est, hec nimirum in uxoris parentela de lege nuptiarum custodienda est. Quia constat eos duos fuisse in carne una, ideo que communis illis utraque parentela credenda est, sicut scriptum est: "Erunt duo in carne una."

C. XV. A daughter-in-law is to be considered no differently from a daughter.

Likewise Augustine, [book XXII Against Faustus, c. 61]. If husband and wife are now not two but one flesh, a daughter-in-law is to be considered no differently from a daughter.

> C. XV. Nurus non aliter deputanda est quam filia.
> Item Augustinus. [lib. XXII. contra Faustum, c. 61.] Si uir et uxor non iam duo, sed una caro sunt, non aliter nurus est deputanda, quam filia.

C. XVI. Each person ought to observe his own stock down to the seventh generation.

Likewise Gregory to the bishops of Gaul. We decree that each person is to observe his own stock down to the seventh generation, and, for as long as they recognize themselves to be near by affinity, we deny them access to conjugal union. But if they do it, let them be separated.

> C. XVI. Usque ad septimam generationem progeniem suam unumquemque seruare oportet.
> Item Gregorius Episcopis Galliae. Progeniem suam unumquemque usque ad septimam decernimus obseruare generationem, et, quamdiu se agnoscunt affinitate propinquos, ad coniugalem copulam accedere denegamus. Quod si fecerint, separentur.

C. XVII. On the same matter.

Likewise Nicholas to the suffragans of the see of Amalfi. Let no one take a wife from his own consanguinity until after the seventh generation, or for as long as the kinship can be recognized.

§ 1. But let a layman who has a wife and concubine at the same time not communicate with the Church.

> C. XVII. De eodem.
> Item Nykolaus Amalfitanae sedis Suffraganeis. De consanguinitate sua nullus uxorem ducat usque post septimam generationem, uel quousque parentela cognosci poterit. §. 1. Laicus uero uxorem simul et concubinam habens non communicet ecclesiae.

C. XVIII. For as long as the generation between any persons is recalled or retained in memory, they shall not be joined to one another.

Likewise from the Council of Worms, [c. 32]. In the union of the faithful we do not define the number of the generation, but establish that no Christian may take a wife from his own consanguinity or kinship for as long as the generation is recalled and recognized or retained in memory.

> C. XVIII. Quousque inter aliquos generatio recordatur aut in memoria retinetur, sibi inuicem non copulentur.

> Item ex Concilio Wormaciensi. [c. 32.] In copulatione fidelium generationis numerum non diffinimus, sed statuimus, ut nulli Christiano liceat de propria consanguinitate seu cognatione accipere uxorem, usque dum generatio recordatur et cognoscitur aut in memoria retinetur.

C. XIX. No one shall take a wife from the relationship of his own blood down to the seventh degree.

Likewise from the Council of Lyon. Let no one take wives from the relationship of his own blood down to the seventh degree, nor without the blessing of a priest. But let those who are about to marry dare to marry after being blessed by a priest.

GRATIAN. By the foregoing authorities everyone is prohibited from union with blood relatives down to the seventh generation. But that passage of Gregory to Augustine, Bishop of the English, is objected, [c. 6]:

> C. XIX. Ex propinquitate sui sanguinis usque ad septimum gradum nullus ducat uxorem.

Item ex Concilio Lugdunensi. Nulli ex propinquitate sui sanguinis usque ad septimum gradum uxores ducant, neque sine benedictione sacerdotis. Qui autem nupturi erunt, a sacerdote benedicti nubere audeant. Gratian. Premissis auctoritatibus quique prohibentur a coniunctione consanguineorum usque in septimam generationem. Sed obicitur illud Gregorii ad Augustinum, Anglorum Episcopum: [c. 6.]

C. XX. The English are permitted to be joined in the fourth or fifth generation.

A certain Roman law permits the son and daughter either of a brother and sister, of two full brothers, or of two sisters to be joined. But we have learned by experience that offspring cannot grow from such a marriage. Hence it is necessary that the fourth or fifth generation of the faithful be lawfully joined to one another.

§ 1. But when the same most humble Father Gregory, a long time afterward, was asked by Felix, prelate of Messina in Sicily, whether he had written to Augustine that marriages contracted among the English in the fourth generation should by no means be dissolved, among other things he supplied this reason: You should know with complete certainty that what I wrote to Augustine, bishop of the nation of the English—your alumnus, as you recall—I wrote specially to him and also to the nation of the English, which had recently come to the faith, and not generally, lest, through fear of harsher things, it withdraw from the good it had begun. Hence the whole Roman city also stands as my witness. Nor did I write these commands to them with the intention that, after they had been consolidated in the faith with a firm root, they should not be separated if found within their own consanguinity, or should be joined within the line of affinity, that is, down to the seventh generation. Rather, because they were still neophytes, it was first necessary to tolerate unlawful things among them and to instruct them by words and examples. For according to the Apostle, who says, "I gave you milk to drink, not solid food," we granted things to be observed at those times to them only, not to their descendants, as was stated, lest the good that had been planted with a weak root be burned away, but rather be made somewhat firm and guarded unto perfection.

GRATIAN. Likewise, that passage of the Council of Chalon is objected:

C. XX. Anglis permittitur, ut in quarta uel in quinta generatione copulentur.

Quedam lex Romana permittit, ut siue fratris et sororis, seu duorum fratrum germanorum, seu duarum sororum filius et filia misceantur. Sed experimento didicimus, ex tali coniugio sobolem non posse succrescere. Unde necesse est ut quarta uel quinta generatio fidelium licenter sibi iungantur. §. 1. Sed idem humillimus Pater Gregorius, post multum temporis a Felice Messinae Siciliae presule requisitus, utrum Augustino scripserit, ut Anglorum quarta generatione contracta matrimonia minime soluerentur, inter cetera talem rationem reddidit: Quod scripsi Augustino Anglorum gentis episcopo, alumno uidelicet, ut recordaris tuo, ipsi, etiam Anglorum genti, que nuper ad fidem uenerat, ne a bono, quod ceperat, metuendo austeriora recederet, specialiter, et non generaliter me certissime scripsisse cognoscas. Unde et michi omnis Romana ciuitas testis existit. Nec ea intentione hec eis scripsi mandata, ut post, quam firma radice in fide fuerint solidati, si infra propriam consanguinitatem inuenti fuerint, non separentur aut infra affinitatis lineam, id est usque ad septimam generationem, iungantur. Sed quod adhuc illis neophitis existentibus, eis primum illicita consentire et eos, et uerbis ac exemplis instruere oportet. Nam iuxta Apostolum, qui ait: "Lac uobis potum dedi, non escam," illis modo, non posteris, ut prefixum est, temporibus tenenda indulsimus, ne bonum, quod infirma radice plantatum erat, exureretur, sed aliquantulum firmaretur et usque ad perfectionem custodiretur. Gratian. Item obicitur illud Cabilonensis Concilii.

C. XXI. No one shall any longer be joined in marriage in the fifth or sixth generation.

We forbid that anyone any longer be joined in marriage in the fourth, fifth, or sixth generation. But where it is found to have occurred after the prohibition, let the union be separated.

GRATIAN. Since marriage is prohibited in the sixth generation by this authority, it appears to be permitted in the seventh. But the degrees of kinship are variously reckoned according to certain persons. For some place the father in the first degree and the children in the second. Others call the children the first degree, denying that there is a degree of kinship between father and son, since father and son are proved to be one flesh. Therefore, the authorities that prohibit union within consanguinity down to the seventh degree place the father in the first degree; but those that prohibit it down to the sixth degree call the children the first degree. Thus it happens that the same persons, according to this diversity, are found in the sixth or seventh degree.

§ 1. Likewise, that passage of Fabian, by which affines are commanded to be joined in the fifth generation, appears contrary to that decree of Pope Julius: "Just as it is not lawful for any Christian to take a spouse from his own consanguinity, so it is also not lawful to take one from his wife's consanguinity, on account of the unity of flesh." Similarly, it is also found contrary to that chapter of Gregory: "Nor her whom someone from his own consanguinity had as wife, etc." But that passage of Fabian is to be understood of two persons joined to one another by affinity, such as the wives of two brothers. If it happens that one of them is joined to someone in marriage, after his death the man will not be able to take the surviving affine as spouse unless they are found in the fifth degree of affinity. Hence one who takes someone's stepmother as wife will not be able, after her death, to take the wife of the stepson. Hence the same Pope Julius also says elsewhere: "The widow of his wife's blood relatives"—he does not say "a blood relative of his wife," but "the widow of the blood relatives"—"let no one take as wife down to the fourth generation." But Paschal II, writing to Bishop Reginus, assigns a third kind of affinity, union within which is found prohibited no further than the second degree. For he says:

> C. XXI. In quinta uel sexta generatione nullus amplius copuletur coniugio.
> Contradicimus, ut in quarta, uel quinta sextaque generatione nullus amplius coniugio copuletur. Ubi autem post interdictum factum fuerit inuentum separetur. Gratian. Hac auctoritate dum sexta generatione coniugium interdicitur, in septima permitti uidetur. Sed gradus cognationis secundum quosdam uarie conputantur. Alii namque patrem in primo gradu, filios in secundo ponunt. Alii primum gradum filios appellant, negantes, gradum cognationis inter patrem et filium esse, cum una caro probentur pater et filius. Auctoritates ergo, que consanguinitatis cautelam usque in septimum gradum prohibent, patrem ponunt in primo gradu; illae uero, que usque ad sextum gradum prohibent, primum gradum filios appellant, atque ita fit, ut eaedem personae secundum hanc diuersitatem inueniantur in sexto uel septimo gradu. §. 1. Item illud Fabiani, quo affines in quinta generatione copulari iubentur, uidetur esse contrarium illi decreto Iulii Papae: "Sicut non licet ulli Christiano de sua consanguinitate, sic etiam non licet de consanguinitate uxoris suae coniugem ducere propter carnis unitatem." Similiter inuenitur etiam contrarium illi capitulo Gregorii: "Nec eam, quam ex propria consanguinitate coniugem habuit etc." Sed illud Fabiani intelligendum est de duabus personis inter se affinitate coniunctis, ut sunt uxores duorum fratrum; si contigerit unam earum alicui matrimonio copulari, post mortem eius uir non poterit affinem superstitem in coniugem ducere, nisi in quinto gradu affinitatis inueniantur. Unde, qui nouercam alicuius in uxorem duxerit, post mortem eius uxorem priuigni ducere non poterit. Hinc etiam idem Iulius Papa alibi ait: "Relictam consanguineorum uxoris suae," (non ait consanguineam uxoris suae, sed relictam consanguineorum) "usque in quartam generationem nullus ducat in uxorem." Pascalis uero II., scribens Regino Episcopo, tertium genus affinitatis assignat, cuius copula non ultra secundum gradum inuenitur prohibita. Ait enim:

C. XXII. The wives of two cousins cannot marry one and the same man.

Moreover, the justice of public decency, even apart from canonical authority, forbids the wives of two cousins from marrying one man, although at different times, the one after the death of the other. And your prudence knows that one must abstain from the wife's blood relatives just as from the husband's.

GRATIAN. But those passages of Gregory and Julius are understood of the consanguinity of a husband or wife, so that after the death of either of them the survivor is joined in marriage to no one from the kindred of the deceased. It has been demonstrated to what degree each person ought to abstain from his own consanguinity or the kinship of his wife.

C. XXII. Duorum consobrinorum coniuges uni et eidem nubere non possunt.

Porro duorum consobrinorum coniuges, quamuis diuersis temporibus, uiro uni alteram post alterius obitum nubere, ipsa preter auctoritatem canonicam publicae honestatis iusticia contradicit. Et nouit prudentia tua, quia ita ab uxoris, sicut a uiri consanguineis abstinendum est. Gratian. Illud autem Gregorii et Iulii intelligitur de consanguinitate uiri uel uxoris, ut post mortem alicuius eorum nulli de cognatione defuncti superstes matrimonio copuletur. Demonstratum est, usque ad quem gradum quisque a propria consanguinitate uel cognatione suae uxoris abstinere debeat.

Question IV

GRATIAN. It is now asked why union within consanguinity is prohibited down to the sixth degree. Isidore writes about these matters as follows in book XI of the Etymologies, c. 6:

GRATIANUS. Modo queritur, quare usque ad sextum gradum consanguinitatis coniunctio prohibeatur? De his ita scribit Ysidorus Ethimologiarum libro XI. c. 6.:

C. UN. Why consanguinity is observed down to the sixth degree.

When consanguinity, gradually separating itself through the orders of its lines of descent, has withdrawn itself down to the last degree and has ceased to be relationship, then for the first time the law will receive it into the bond of marriage and will, as it were, call back what is fleeing. Consanguinity was established down to the sixth degree of lineage for this reason: so that, just as the generation and condition of the human being is ended in the six ages of the world, so the relationship of lineage may be terminated in as many degrees.

C. UN. Quare usque ad sextum gradum consanguinitas obseruetur.

Consanguinitas dum se paulatim propaginum ordinibus dirimens usque ad ultimum gradum se subtraxerit, et propinquitas esse desierit, tunc primum lex in matrimonii uinculum eam recipiet, et quodammodo reuocabit fugientem. Ideo autem usque ad sextum gradum generis consanguinitas constituta est, ut sicut sex etatibus mundi generatio, et hominis status finitur, ita propinquitas generis tot gradibus terminetur.

Question V

GRATIAN. Concerning how the degrees of consanguinity are to be reckoned, blessed Isidore speaks as follows:

> GRATIANUS. De gradibus uero consanguinitatis, quomodo conputandi sint, b. Ysidorus sic loquitur:

C. I. How the degrees of consanguinity are distinguished.

The series of consanguinity is distinguished in six degrees in this manner: let the son and daughter—that is, the brother and sister—be the trunk itself. When they have been separated apart, these little branches emerge from the root of that trunk: grandson and granddaughter, the first; great-grandson and great-granddaughter, the second; great-great-grandson and great-great-granddaughter, the third; descendants in the next generation, the fourth; descendants in the following generation, the fifth; the grandson of the male descendant and the granddaughter of the female descendant of that generation, the sixth.

> C. I. Quomodo dirimuntur gradus consanguinitatis.
> Series consanguinitatis sex gradibus hoc modo dirimitur: filius et filia, quod est frater et soror, sit ipse truncus; illis seorsum seiunctis ex radice illius trunci egrediuntur isti ramusculi: nepos et neptis: primus; pronepos et proneptis: secundus; abnepos et abneptis: tertius; atnepos et atneptis: quartus; trinepos et trineptis: quintus; trinepotis nepos et trineptis neptis: sextus.

C. II. How the degrees of consanguinity are to be reckoned.

Likewise Alexander II writes to the clergy of Naples and to all bishops and judges established throughout Italy concerning this matter, saying as follows. A newly arisen question concerning the degrees of consanguinity has been brought to the Apostolic See. Certain persons unskilled in the laws and canons, stirring up this question, strive to number those same degrees of relationship contrary to the sacred canons and ecclesiastical custom, affirming in a new and unheard-of error that full brothers or sisters are among themselves in the second generation, their sons or daughters in the fourth, and their grandsons or granddaughters in the sixth. Reckoning the line of descent in this manner and terminating it in the sixth degree of this kind, they say that thereafter men and women can contract the rights of marriage with one another. And to confirm this profane error they assume as an argument the secular laws which Emperor Justinian promulgated concerning the successions of blood relatives. Trusting in these, they attempt to show that brothers are numbered in the second degree, their children in the fourth, and grandsons and granddaughters in the sixth. By thus terminating the genealogical line, they strive by a certain perverse cunning to disturb the reckoning of the holy Fathers and the ancient computation of the Church handed down even to us. But with God's favor, we took care to examine this question at a synod held in the Lateran consistory, bishops, clerics, and judges from diverse provinces having been summoned for this work.

§ 1. Finally, after the laws and sacred canons had long been discussed, we found distinctly that one computation is made by the laws and another by the canons for different reasons. For in the laws mention of the degrees was made for no reason other than that inheritance or succession might be transferred among blood relatives from one person to another. But in the canons the line of descent is reckoned so that it may be shown openly down to what generation one must abstain from marriages with blood relatives. There it is prescribed that inheritance be conferred upon relatives in a lawful manner; here, that marriages be celebrated rightly and canonically among the faithful. In the laws the degrees are not distinctly numbered except down to the sixth; but in the canons they are distinguished down to the seventh generation. Therefore, for this reason—because inheritances cannot be transferred except from one person to another—the secular emperor took care to assign individual degrees to individual persons. But because marriages cannot occur without two persons, the sacred canons therefore place two persons in one degree.

§ 2. Nevertheless, if each computation is considered attentively and subtly, it will be most manifest that they have understood the same thing, that the same judgment is in them, and that they arrive at the same terminus. For Justinian did not define in his laws the degree down to which consanguinity itself endures. But the canons number no generation beyond the seventh. For after defining the sixth degree, the emperor added in those laws: "Let it suffice to have shown thus far how the degrees of kinship are numbered. For from these it is plain to understand how we ought to number the further degrees. For each person generated adds a degree." Behold, in these words it is openly shown that degrees of the kind these persons reckon ought to be numbered not only down to the sixth but even beyond it, since he decrees that further degrees beyond the sixth are to be numbered. For where he names further degrees, he openly indicates that there are not only six degrees, but that when six have ended still others are to be numbered. Nor is this remarkable, since in what precedes the emperor himself affirmed a right even in the tenth degree; by saying this he confesses more clearly than light that there are not only six.

§ 3. Therefore, let those whom an error of this kind has hitherto struck awaken and, if they can, direct the keenness of their minds. For indeed, where succession is transferred among agnates or cognates according to the laws, there is no doubt that they are blood relatives. For they would not succeed to one another unless, according to Justinian's testimony, they were related to one another in the tenth degree; therefore, those who thus succeed to one another are blood relatives to one another. But if they are blood relatives to one another in the tenth degree, consanguinity is not terminated—as those persons acknowledge—in the sixth degree alone. What, then, will they say? For when the degrees are reckoned as they number them, consanguinity either ends in the sixth degree or it does not. But if it ends, the laws upon which they rely, which command blood relatives to succeed to one another in the tenth degree, will be false. But if consanguinity does not end in a sixth degree of this kind, those who refuse to reckon consanguinity beyond that sixth degree will be speakers of falsehood. Therefore, either the laws will be false or those who terminate the generation in this way.

§ 4. But so that the laws may be truthful and the canons true, let us say what the truth maintains: namely, that consanguinity is not terminated in a sixth degree of this kind, and according to the canons it is terminated in the seventh degree. For each computation, as we said above, is concluded at one end. Indeed, two legal degrees make one canonical degree. Accordingly, brothers who according to the secular laws are said to be in the second degree are numbered in the first according to the canons. The sons of brothers, who are numbered there in the fourth, are reckoned here in the second; but grandsons, who are there in the sixth, are numbered here in the third. So thereafter those who are written in the laws to be in the eighth and tenth are defined in the canons to be in the fourth and fifth. And the same is to be understood concerning the rest: those who according to the canons are said to be in the sixth or seventh are understood according to the laws to be in the twelfth or fourteenth.

§ 5. Most prudent Pope Gregory, understanding this computation, when asked in what generation the faithful ought to be joined, adduced the secular laws themselves as testimony and wrote back to Augustine, bishop of the English, as follows: "A certain earthly law in the Roman republic permits the son and daughter either of a brother and sister, of two full brothers, or of two sisters to be joined. But we have learned by experience that offspring cannot grow from such a union. Hence it is necessary that the union of the faithful may lawfully be joined in the third or fourth generation. For one must altogether abstain from the second, which we mentioned." Behold, it is openly shown here that the sons and daughters of brothers are numbered in the second generation. And if the sons or daughters of brothers are numbered in the second, it cannot be that the brothers themselves are not in the first. But if brothers are reckoned in the first, their children in the second, there is no doubt that their grandchildren are in the third, great-grandchildren in the fourth, and so concerning the rest down to the seventh.

§ 6. But there are certain persons who take from these words of Saint Gregory, in which he says that the faithful may be joined in the third or fourth generation, an occasion for contracting unlawful marriages, saying that they can justly do what so prudent a doctor defined by his judgment. Accordingly, those who strive to defend themselves with this covering should observe in the judgments of the same Father that he commanded this not generally to everyone but specially to the nation of the English. For afterward, when asked by Felix, prelate of Messina in Sicily, whether what he had commanded Augustine was to be observed generally by the whole Church, he showed most openly that he had commanded this to no others than that nation, lest they abandon the good they had begun through fear of harsher things. But he judged that, after they had been consolidated in the faith with a firm root, this was always to be observed by them and by the universal Church: that no one should dare to join to himself in marriage anyone from his own consanguinity or affinity within the seventh generation.

§ 7. Behold, it has been openly shown from both the words of the law itself and the authority of most prudent Pope Gregory what we ought to understand concerning the numbering of the degrees of consanguinity. Yet another reason also refutes those adversaries in like manner. For if, as they acknowledge, consanguinity ended in that sixth degree, all the little branches of persons contained beyond that degree in the depiction of the tree would have to be cut off as superfluous. But because all those who are numbered in the depiction of the aforesaid tree consist from one kindred, they can never be separated from one another without diminishing the consanguinity, just as hands, arms, and feet cannot be cut from one's own body without injury to the person.

§ 8. That precept of the sacred canons which commands abstention from one's own consanguinity for as long as the generation is recalled or retained in memory also does not disagree with the aforesaid reckoning of kindred. For it is numbered canonically and customarily in seven degrees, beyond which neither consanguinity is found, nor are names of degrees discovered, nor can succession be extended any farther, nor can the generation be recalled from memory by anyone.

§ 9. But lest any ambiguity henceforth be able to remain in this reckoning of consanguinity, we have judged that another numbering which certain persons make must also be examined in this disputation. For there are certain persons who begin to number the genealogy not from brothers but from their children, that is, paternal or maternal cousins, saying that the children of brothers ought to be reckoned in the first generation because the brothers exist as a certain trunk from which the other little branches arise. But neither can this reckoning of degrees, if rightly understood, differ in judgment from that which we explained above. For those who take the beginning of the numbering from the children of brothers do not advance beyond the sixth generation. Rather, just as there are six ages of the whole world and likewise six of human life, so too they think that only six generations are to be reckoned in consanguinity; when these have ended, they say that the beginning of a new union can be made, so that they can, as it were, call back the fleeing consanguinity.

§ 10. Accordingly, this computation, which begins from the children of brothers and is numbered down to the sixth, has as much force as that which begins from brothers and reckons down to the seventh. Nor does any difference exist in sense, although a variation appears in the number of degrees. For the last generation, if it takes the beginning of the numbering from brothers, is found to be the seventh; if from the children of brothers, it is found to be the sixth. Therefore, with the degrees of consanguinity determined in this way, by apostolic authority we admonish you, brothers and sons, that you make known to everyone that the genealogical line is to be reckoned just as the holy Fathers decreed that it be numbered and as the ancient custom of the holy and universal Church is shown long ago to have reckoned it through long periods. For if anyone with a perverse and obstinate mind wishes to deviate from the right path of the Apostolic See and contends that in celebrating marriages the degrees of kindred are to be numbered otherwise than by us, first that person will be struck by heavenly punishment for his rashness, and afterward let him know that he is to be slain by the sword of perpetual anathema.

C. II. Quomodo sint conputandi gradus consanguinitatis.

Item Alexander II. Neapolitanis clericis et omnibus Episcopis atque Iudicibus per Italiam constitutis scribit de huiusmodi ita dicens. Ad sedem apostolicam perlata est questio nouiter exorta de gradibus consanguinitatis, quam quidam legum et canonum inperiti excitantes, eosdem propinquitatis gradus contra sacros canones et morem ecclesiasticum numerare nituntur, nouo et inaudito errore affirmantes, quod germani fratres uel sorores inter se sint in secunda generatione, filii eorum uel filiae in quarta, nepotes uel neptes eorum in sexta. Talique modo progeniem conputantes, et in huiusmodi sexto gradu eam terminantes, dicunt, deinceps uiros ac mulieres inter se nuptialia iura posse contrahere. Et ad huiusmodi profanum errorem confirmandum in argumento assumunt seculares leges, quas Iustinianus inperator promulgauit de successionibus consanguineorum. Quibus confisi ostendere moliuntur, fratres in secundo gradu esse numeratos, filios eorum in quarto, nepotes et neptes in sexto. Sic seriem genealogiae terminantes, numerationem sanctorum Patrum et antiquam ecclesiae conputationem ad nos usque perductam peruersa quadam calliditate disturbare nituntur. Nos uero Deo annuente hanc questionem discutere curauimus in sinodo habita in Lateranensi consistorio, conuocatis ad hoc opus episcopis, et clericis, atque iudicibus diuersarum prouinciarum. §. 1. Denique diu uentilatis legibus et sacris canonibus distincte inuenimus, ob aliam atque aliam causam alteram fieri legum, alteram canonum conputationem. In legibus siquidem ob nichil aliud ipsa graduum mentio facta est, nisi ut hereditas uel successio ad alteram ab una personam inter consanguineos deferatur. In canonibus uero ob hoc progenies conputatur, ut aperte monstretur, isque ad quotam generationem a consanguineorum sit nuptiis abstinendum. Ibi prescribitur, ut hereditas propinquis modo legitimo conferatur; hic uero, ut rite et canonice inter fideles nuptiae celebrentur. In legibus distincte non numerantur gradus, nisi usque ad sextum; in canonibus autem usque ad septimam distinguuntur generationem. Hac igitur de causa, quia hereditates nequeunt deferri nisi de una ad alteram personam, idcirco curauit secularis inperator in singulis personis singulos preficere gradus. Quia uero nuptiae sine duabus non ualent fieri personis, ideo sacri canones duas in uno gradu constituere personas. §. 2. Utramque tamen conputationem, si attente ac subtiliter perspecta fuerit, idem sensisse, et eandem in eis sententiam esse, atque ad eundem terminum conuenire manifestissimum erit. Iustinianus namque usque ad quem gradum consanguinitas ipsa perduret, in suis legibus non diffiniuit. Canones uero ultra septimam nullam numerant generationem. Sexto quippe gradu determinato, in ipsis legibus subintulit inperator: "Hactenus ostendisse sufficiat, quemadmodum gradus cognationis numerentur. Namque ex his palam est intelligere, quemadmodum ulteriores gradus numerare debeamus. Generata quippe persona gradum adicit." Ecce in his uerbis aperte ostenditur, tales gradus, quales isti conputant, non tantum usque ad sextum, uerum etiam ultra numerari debere, quippe cum ultra sextum ulteriores gradus numerandos esse decernat. Ubi enim ulteriores nominat gradus, aperte indicat, non sex tantummodo esse gradus, sed sex finitis adhuc alios numerandos. Nec mirum, cum in precedentibus ipse firmauerit inperator, decimo etiam gradu, quod dicendo, non esse tantummodo sex, luce clarius confitetur. §. 3. Hi ergo euigilent, et aciem mentis, si possunt, intendant, quos hactenus istiusmodi perculit error. Enimuero, ubi secundum leges inter agnatos uel cognatos defertur successio, consanguineos esse non dubium est. Neque enim sibi succederent, nisi inter se, teste Iustiniano, in decimo gradu sibi attinerent; consanguinei igitur sibi sunt qui sic sibi succedunt. Quod si in decimo gradu consanguinei sibi existunt, non est terminata consanguinitas (ut isti fatentur) in sexto tantummodo gradu. Quid igitur dicent? Conputatis namque gradibus, sicut isti numerant, aut finitur consanguinitas in sexto gradu, aut non. Si autem finitur, fallaces erunt leges, quibus isti nituntur, que in decimo gradu sibi succedere consanguineos iubent. Quod si non finitur consanguinitas in huiusmodi sexto gradu, falsidici erunt isti, qui ultra illum sextum gradum nolunt conputare consanguinitatem. Igitur aut leges erunt falsae, aut isti, qui sic finiunt generationem. §. 4. Sed, ut ueridicae leges et ueraces sint canones, dicamus id, quod ueritas habet, scilicet, quod non terminatur consanguinitas in huiusmodi sexto gradu, et terminatur in septimo secundum canones gradu. Utraque enim computatio, sicut superius diximus, uno fine concluditur. Namque duo gradus legales unum gradum canonicum efficiunt. Fratres itaque, qui secundum leges seculares dicuntur in secundo gradu, iuxta canones numerantur in primo. Filii fratrum, qui illic numerantur in quarto, hic conputantur in secundo; nepotes uero, qui ibi in sexto, istic numerantur in tertio; sic deinceps, qui legibus scribuntur in octauo et decimo, in canonibus diffiniuntur in quarto et quinto. Atque hoc modo de reliquis sciendum est, ut qui secundum canones dicuntur in sexto uel in septimo, secundum leges accipiantur in duodecimo uel in quartodecimo. §. 5. Hanc conputationem intelligens prudentissimus Papa Gregorius, dum quereretur, in quota generatione fideles coniungi debeant, ipsas seculares leges in testimonium adducens, Augustino Anglorum episcopo sic rescripsit: "Quedam terrena lex in Romana republica permittit, ut siue fratris et sororis, seu duorum fratrum germanorum, uel duarum sororum filius et filia misceantur. Sed experimento didicimus, ex tali coniugio sobolem non posse succrescere. Unde necesse est, ut iam in tertia uel quarta generatione copulatio fidelium licenter sibi coniungi debeat. Nam a secunda, quam prediximus, omnimodo debet abstinere." Ecce hic aperte monstratur, filios et filias fratrum in secunda generatione numerari. Et si fratrum filii uel filiae numerantur in secunda, fieri non potest, ut ipsi fratres non sint in prima. Quod si fratres conputantur in prima, filii eorum in secunda, dubium non est, quin eorum nepotes sint in tertia, pronepotes in quarta, et sic de reliquis usque ad septimam. §. 6. Sed sunt quidam, qui ex his sancti Gregorii uerbis, quibus ait, ut in tertia uel in quarta generatione copulentur fideles, occasionem accipiunt illicita matrimonia contrahendi, dicentes, se hoc iuste facere posse, quod tam prudentissimus doctor sua sentencia diffiniuit. Isti itaque, qui se hoc uelamento defendere nituntur, aduertant in eiusdem Patris sententiis, non hoc generaliter cunctis, sed specialiter Anglorum genti mandasse. Nam postmodum a Felice Messanae Siciliae presule requisitus, si hoc, quod Augustino mandauerat, generaliter cunctae ecclesiae tenendum esset, apertissime monstrauit, non aliis hoc, quam illi genti mandasse, ne bonum, quod ceperant, metuendo austeriora desererent; sed illis, postquam in fide essent firma radice solidati, et uniuersali ecclesiae censuit semper esse tenendum, ut nullam de propria consanguinitate uel affinitate infra septimam generationem aliquis sibi audeat coniugio copulare. §. 7. Ecce aperte monstratum est et ex uerbis ipsius legis et auctoritate prudentissimi Papae Gregorii, quid de gradibus consanguinitatis numerandis sentire debeamus. Quamuis alia quoque ratio pari modo ipsos reuincat aduersarios.

Nam si, ut ipsi fatentur, in illo sexto gradu consanguinitas finiretur, omnes personarum ramusculos, qui ultra gradum illum in pictura arboris continentur, uelut superfluos oporteret detruncari. Sed quia omnes, qui in pictura arboris predictae numerantur, ex una parentela consistunt, numquam sine diminutione consanguinitatis a se poterunt separari, ueluti non sine dampno cuiusque personae ualent a proprio corpore manus, brachia et pedes truncari. §. 8. Illa quoque sacrorum preceptio canonum, que iubet a propria abstineri consanguinitate, quamdiu generatio recordatur aut in memoria retinetur, nec a predicta parentelae discrepat conputatione. Nam si in septem gradibus, canonice et usualiter numeretur, ultra quos nec consanguinitas inuenitur, nec nomina graduum reperiuntur, nec successio potest amplius prerogari, nec memoriter ab aliquo generatio recordari. §. 9. Ne uero in hac consanguinitatis conputatione aliqua dehinc ambiguitas ualeat remanere, aliam, quam quidam faciunt, numerationem in hac etiam disputatione duximus discutiendam. Sunt enim quidam, qui non a fratribus, sed a filiis eorum, id est patruelibus uel consobrinis, genealogiam numerare incipiunt, dicentes, filios fratrum in prima generatione conputari debere, quia fratres quasi quidam truncus, ex quo ceteri ramusculi oriantur, existunt. Sed nec ista graduum conputatio, si bene intellecta fuerit, ab ea, quam superius exposuimus, in sentencia poterit esse diuersa. Isti enim, qui numerandi inicium sumunt a filiis fratrum, non progrediuntur ultra sextam generationem; sed sicut totius mundi sex etates existunt, et humanae uitae itidem sex, ita et in consanguinitate sex tantummodo autumant conputandas esse generationes, quibus finitis nouae coniunctionis dicunt posse fieri inicium, ut quasi fugientem possint reuocare consanguinitatem. §. 10. Hec itaque conputatio, que incipit a fratrum filiis, et numeratur usque ad sextam, tantumdem ualet, quantum, que incipit a fratribus, et conputat usque ad septimam. Nec ulla in sensu consistit diuersitas, quamuis in numero graduum uideatur uarietas. Ultima enim generatio, si a fratribus sumat inicium numerandi, septima inuenitur; si a filiis fratrum, sexta repperitur. Taliter igitur determinatis gradibus consanguinitatis, apostolica auctoritate monemus uos, fratres et filii, ut omnibus sic seriem genealogiae conputandam esse intimetis, quemadmodum sancti patres numerandam esse sanxerunt, et antiquus mos sanctae et uniuersalis ecclesiae per longa tempora olim conputasse monstratur. Nam, si quis peruersa et obstinata mente a recto tramite apostolicae sedis deuiare uoluerit, et aliter, quam nos, in nuptiis celebrandis gradus parentelae numerare contenderit, primum pro sua temeritate celesti pena plectetur, postmodum uero gladio perpetui anathematis nouerit se iugulandum.

C. III. Why the wife's blood relatives are said to pertain to the husband, and how affinities are to be reckoned.

Likewise Gregory. Moreover, concerning affinity, which you say is the kinship that pertains to the husband on the wife's side or to the wife on the husband's side, the reason is most manifest: if, according to the divine sentence, my wife and I are one flesh, then surely her kindred and mine become one relationship for her and for me. Therefore, my wife's sister and I will be in one and the first degree; but her son will be in the second degree from me, and her granddaughter in the third. The same must be done from either side in the other successions.

§ 1. But I ought to regard the wife of a relative, of whatever degree he may be, just as though she were a woman of my own relationship in that same degree. Undoubtedly, the same is fittingly to be observed by my wife concerning her husband's relationship in all degrees of kinship. But those who think otherwise are antichrists, against whom you ought to guard all the more solicitously insofar as you detect more openly that they assail the divine laws.

C. III. Quare consanguinei uxoris ad uirum pertinere dicantur, et quomodo affinitates sint conputandae.

Item Gregorius. Porro autem de affinitate, quam dicitis parentelam esse, que ad uirum ex parte uxoris, seu que ex parte uiri ad uxorem pertinet, manifestissima ratio est, quia, si secundum diuinam sententiam ego et uxor mea sumus una caro, profecto michi et illi mea suaque parentela propinquitas una efficitur. Quocirca ego et soror uxoris meae in uno et primo gradu erimus, filius uero eius secundo gradu erit a me, neptis uero tertio; idque utrinque in ceteris agendum est successionibus. §. 1. Uxorem uero propinqui, cuiuscumque gradus sit, ita oportet me attendere, quemadmodum ipsius quoque gradus aliqua femina propriae propinquitatis sit. Quod nimirum uxori meae de propinquitate sui uiri in cunctis cognationis gradibus conuenit obseruari. Qui uero aliorsum sentiunt antichristi sunt, a quibus tanto uos sollicitius oportet cauere, quanto apertius deprehenditis illos diuinis legibus oppugnare.

C. IV. How the degrees of kindred are reckoned.

Likewise Pope Zacharias. We reckon the degrees of kindred in this manner: indeed, my brother and I are one generation and make the first degree; we are separated by no degree. Again, my son and my brother's son are the second generation and make the second degree; nor are they separated from one another by any degree. And the other successions are reckoned in this manner. Moreover, concerning affinity, which you call kindred, etc., as above in the chapter of Gregory.

C. IV. Qualiter gradus parentelae conputantur.

Item Zacharias Papa. Parentelae gradus taliter conputamus: Siquidem ego et frater meus una generatio sumus, primumque gradum efficimus, nullo gradu distamus. Rursum filius meus fratrisque mei filius secunda generatio sunt, ac secundum gradum faciunt, nec a se aliquo gradu separantur. Atque ad hunc modum ceterae successiones. Porro de affinitate, quam dicitis parentelam etc. ut supra capitulo Gregorii.

C. V. It is an equivocation when the wife's sister is called a cognata.

Likewise Pope Alexander II. But that your wife's brother or sister are called cognati occurs by the law of equivocation and the necessity of common usage rather than through any ground of kinship. For a brother's wife is called fratrissa rather than cognata. A husband's brother is called levir. The wives of two brothers are called ianitrices, as though wearing out the same door or entering through the same door. A husband's sister is called glos. But a sister's husband has no special name, nor does a wife's brother.

C. V. Equiuocatio est, cum soror uxoris cognata uocatur.

Item Alexander Papa II. Quod autem frater sororue uxoris tuae dicuntur cognati, equiuocationis iure fit, et necessitate uulgaris appellationis potius quam ulla causa cognationis. Uxor enim fratris fratrissa pocius quam cognata uocatur. Mariti frater leuir dicitur. Duorum autem fratrum uxores ianitrices uocantur, quasi eandem ianuam terentes, uel per eandem ianuam intrantes. Viri soror glos appellatur. Sororis autem uir non habet speciale nomen, nec frater uxoris.

C. VI. The names of the degrees of ascendants, descendants, and those coming from the side.

Likewise Isidore. In the first degree, the father and mother are contained in the ascending line; the son and daughter in the descending line. No other persons are joined to them.

§ 1. In the second degree, the grandfather and grandmother are contained in the ascending line; the granddaughter in the descending line; brother and sister in the transverse line. These persons are doubled. For grandfather and grandmother are understood both from the father and from the mother. These persons are likewise doubled in the following degrees, in the same order, according to the substance of those who stand in each degree. (These persons in the second degree are called double for this reason: there are two grandfathers, paternal and maternal. Likewise, there are two kinds of grandchildren, those begotten from a son and those from a daughter. Brother and sister come from the transverse line, that is, either the father's brother or the mother's brother, who is named either paternal uncle or maternal uncle; and they themselves too are doubled in this order.)

§ 2. In the third degree there come above the great-grandfather and great-grandmother; below, the great-grandson and great-granddaughter. From the oblique line come a brother's or sister's son or daughter; paternal uncle and paternal aunt, that is, the father's brother and sister; maternal uncle and maternal aunt, that is, the mother's brother and sister.

§ 3. In the fourth degree there come above the great-great-grandfather and great-great-grandmother; below, the great-great-grandson and great-great-granddaughter. From the oblique line come a brother's or sister's grandson and granddaughter; male and female paternal cousins, that is, a paternal uncle's son or daughter; male and female maternal cousins, that is, a maternal uncle's or maternal aunt's son or daughter; male and female cousins through a paternal aunt, that is, a paternal aunt's son or daughter; likewise, the cousins who are born from two sisters. To these are added the great paternal uncle and great paternal aunt, that is, the paternal grandfather's brother and sister; and the great maternal uncle and great maternal aunt, that is, the brother and sister of either the paternal or maternal grandmother.

§ 4. In the fifth degree there come above the third great-grandfather and third great-grandmother; below, the third great-grandson and third great-granddaughter. From the oblique line come a brother's or sister's great-grandson and great-granddaughter; the son or daughter of a male or female paternal cousin, a male or female cousin through a paternal aunt, or a male or female maternal cousin; the nearer male cousin and nearer female cousin, that is, the son or daughter of a great paternal uncle, great paternal aunt, great maternal uncle, or great maternal aunt. To these are added the great-great paternal uncle and great-great paternal aunt. These are the brother and sister of the paternal great-grandfather; also the great-great maternal uncle and great-great maternal aunt. These are the brother and sister of the paternal and maternal great-grandmother and of the maternal great-grandfather. (This class cannot be declared in any degrees other than that in which it is written, nor by any other terms.)

§ 5. In the sixth degree there come above the fourth great-grandfather and fourth great-grandmother; below, the fourth great-grandson and fourth great-granddaughter. From the oblique line come a brother's or sister's great-great-grandson and great-great-granddaughter; the grandson and granddaughter of a male or female paternal cousin, a male or female cousin through a paternal aunt, a male or female maternal cousin, a great paternal uncle, great paternal aunt, great maternal uncle, or great maternal aunt; the son or daughter of a nearer maternal cousin; the paternal great-great-great-uncle and paternal great-great-great-aunt. These are the brother and sister of the paternal great-great-grandfather; also the maternal great-great-great-uncle and maternal great-great-great-aunt. These are the brother and sister of the paternal and maternal great-great-grandmother and of the maternal great-great-grandfather. (These too cannot be explained more fully than the author himself discussed them.)

§ 6. Those who are blood relatives in the direct line above and below in the seventh degree are not called by names proper to them; but in the transverse line are contained a brother's or sister's third great-grandson and third great-granddaughter, and the sons and daughters of a maternal cousin.

§ 7. Six degrees of succession were established for this reason: beyond them, by the nature of things, neither can names be found nor can succession be extended farther. (In these six degrees are contained all the names of every relationship; beyond them neither is affinity found nor can succession be propagated farther.)

GRATIAN. By the authority of blessed Isidore, Gregory, and Alexander, it has been sufficiently shown how many degrees of consanguinity or affinity there are, how they are to be reckoned, and by what names they are called.

C. VI. Nomina graduum superiorum, siue inferiorum siue ex latere uenientium.

Item Ysidorus. Primo gradu superiori linea continentur pater et mater: inferiori filius et filia; quibus nullae aliae personae iunguntur. §. 1. Secundo gradu continentur superiori linea auus, auia; inferiori neptis; in transuersa frater, soror; que personae duplicantur. Auus enim et auia tam ex patre quam ex matre accipiuntur. Que personae sequentibus quoque gradibus similiter pro substantia eorum, que in quo gradu consistunt, ipso ordine duplicantur. (Istae personae in secundo gradu ideo duplices appellantur, quia duo aui sunt, et paternus et maternus. Item duo sunt genera nepotum, siue ex filio siue ex filia procreati. Frater et soror ex transuerso ueniunt, id est, aut frater patris, aut frater matris, qui aut patruus, aut auunculus nominatur; qui et ipsi hoc ordine duplicantur.) §. 2. Tertio gradu ueniunt supra proauus, proauia; infra pronepos, proneptis. Ex obliquo fratris sororisque filius uel filia, patruus, amita, id est patris frater et soror, auunculus, matertera, id est matris frater et soror. §. 3. Quarto gradu ueniunt supra abauus abauia; infra abnepos, abneptis. Ex obliquo fratris et sororis nepos, neptis, patruelis frater, soror patruelis, id est patrui filius uel filia; consobrinus, consobrina, id est auunculi et materterae filius uel filia; amitinus, amitina, id est amitae filius uel filia; itemque consobrini, qui ex duabus sororibus nascuntur; quibus accrescit patruus magnus, amita magna, id est aui paterni frater et soror, auunculus magnus, matertera magna, id est auiae tam paternae quam maternae frater et soror. §. 4. Quinto gradu, ueniunt, supra quidem atauus, atauia, infra atnepos atneptis. Ex obliquo fratris et sororis pronepos, proneptis, fratris patruelis, sororis patruelis, amitini, amitinae, consobrini, consobrinae filius uel filia, propius sobrinus, proprius sobrina, id est patrui magni, amitae magnae, auunculi magni, materterae magnae filius uel filia; quibus accrescunt propatruus et proamita. Hii sunt proaui paterni frater et soror, proauunculus, promatertera. Hii sunt proauiae paternae, maternaeque frater, et soror, proauique materni. (Hec species nec aliis gradibus, quam scripta est, nec aliis declarari uocabulis potest.) §. 5. Sexto gradu ueniunt supra tritauus tritauia; infra trinepos, trineptis. Ex obliquo fratris et sororis abnepos, abneptis, fratris patruelis et sororis patruelis amitini, amitinae, consobrini, consobrinae patrui magni, amitae magnae, auunculi magni, materterae magnae nepos, neptis, propioris consobrini filius uel filia, abpatruus, abamita. Hi sunt abaui paterni frater et soror; abauunculus, abmatertera. Hi sunt abauiae paternae maternaeque frater et soror, abauique materni. (Hec quoque explanari amplius non possunt quam ipse auctor disseruit.) §. 6. Septimo gradu qui sunt cognati recta linea supra infraque propriis nominibus non appellantur; sed ex transuersa linea continentur fratris sororis atnepos, atneptis, consobrini filii filiaeque. §. 7. Successionis idcirco gradus sex constituti sunt, quia ulterius per rerum naturam nec nomina inueniri, nec ultra successio potest prorogari (In his sex gradibus omnium propinquitatum omnia nomina continentur, ultra quos nec affinitas inueniri, nec successio potest amplius propagari.) Gratian. De gradibus consanguinitatis uel affinitatis, quot sint, et quomodo conputandi, quibus etiam nominibus appellentur, auctoritate b. Ysidori, atque Gregorii, et Alexandri sufficienter monstratum est.

Question VI

GRATIAN. PART I. It is now asked upon whose accusation or testimony a union between blood relatives is to be dissolved. Pope Fabian decreed as follows concerning these matters:

GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Nunc queritur, quibus accusantibus uel testificantibus consanguineorum coniunctio dirimenda sit? De his ita decreuit Fabianus Papa:

C. I. Only blood relatives—or, if the line of descent has failed, elderly and truthful persons—shall reckon the relationship in a synod.

Let no one accuse the blood relatives of strangers or reckon their consanguinity in a synod; rather, let the relatives to whose knowledge it pertains do so, that is, father and mother, sister and brother, paternal uncle, maternal uncle, paternal aunt, maternal aunt, and their offspring. But if the entire line of descent has failed, let the bishop inquire canonically from the older and more truthful persons to whom the same relationship is known; and if the relationship is found, let the persons be separated.

C. I. Consanguinei tantum, uel, si progenies defecerit, antiqui et ueraces propinquitatem in sinodo conputent.

Consanguineos extraneorum nullus accuset, uel consanguinitatem in sinodo conputet; sed propinqui, ad quorum noticiam pertinet, id est pater et mater, soror frater, patruus, auunculus, amita, matertera, et eorum procreatio. Si autem progenies tota defecerit, ab antiquioribus et ueracioribus, quibus eadem propinquitas nota sit, episcopus canonice perquirat, et, si inuenta fuerit propinquitas, separentur.

[PALEA. C. II.

A decree of Pope Celestine sent to the Church of Florence. It appears to us that the second woman, whom he took contrary to the Church's prohibition, is not his wife, even if he had not betrothed the first. For the authority of both divine and human law proclaims that what is done contrary to the Church's prohibition and order is not to be regarded as ratified, since it is disordered. Therefore, because the woman whom he irregularly brought in is not his wife while the prohibition stands against it, he must be compelled to receive the woman whom he swore to marry and betrothed and from whom he begot offspring, so that the sanctity of the oath is not treated as worthless, the fidelity mutually promised is observed, the offspring is nourished and educated in the worship of God, and others cannot thereby take an occasion for perjuring themselves and deceiving others.

§ 1. But that parents, brothers, and blood relatives of either sex are admitted to give testimony for joining or dissolving the marriages of their own relatives is approved both by ancient custom and by the laws. For this reason parents are admitted especially, and, if the parents are lacking, those nearer, because each person labors to know one's own genealogy both from witnesses and charters and also from the recitation of ancestors. For who ought to be received more than those who know better and whose interest is involved, such that, if they were not present and did not furnish consent, no marriage is made according to the laws?

§ 2. But what is read—"A father shall not be received in the cause of his son, nor a son in the cause of his father"—is true in criminal causes and contracts. But in joining and disjoining a marriage they are fittingly received on account of the prerogative of marriage itself and because it is a matter receiving favor.]

> [PALEA. C. II.
> Celestini Papae Decretum Ecclesiae Florentinae missum. Videtur nobis, quod secunda, quam contra prohibitionem ecclesiae duxit, non sit uxor, etiamsi primam non haberet desponsatam. Nam quod contra interdictum et ordinem ecclesiae factum est, tamquam inordinatum ratum non haberi, tam diuinae quam humanae legis proclamat auctoritas. Quia igitur ea, quam inordinate superduxit, prohibitione renitente uxor non est, cogendus est eam recipere, quam iurauit et desponsauit, et ex ea prolem genuit, ut iuramenti religio non uilipendatur, et fides ad inuicem promissa seruetur, et proles in cultu Dei nutriatur et educetur, et alii exinde occasionem peierandi et alios decipiendi assumere non ualeant. §. 1. Quod autem parentes, fratres et cognati utriusque sexus in testificationem suorum ad matrimonium coniungendum uel dirimendum admittantur, tam antiqua consuetudine quam legibus approbatur. Ideo enim maxime parentes, et, si defuerint parentes, proximiores admittuntur, quoniam unusquisque suam genealogiam cum testibus et chartis, tum etiam ex recitatione maiorum scire laborat. Qui enim melius recipi debent, quam illi, qui melius sciunt, et quorum est interesse, ita ut, si non interfuerint, et consensum non adhibuerint, secundum leges nullum fiat matrimonium? §. 2. Quod uero legitur: "Pater non recipiatur in causa filii, nec filius in causa patris," in criminalibus causis et contractibus uerum est; in matrimonio uero coniungendo et disiungendo ex ipsius coniugii prerogatiua, et quia fauorabilis res est, congrue recipiuntur.]

C. III. Who ought to affirm relationship by oath.

Likewise Urban to Richerius, Bishop of Genoa. We notify you that, after two or three of the nearer relatives of the wife—whether now deceased or still living—of the man who is accused have affirmed this relationship by oath, or if three or two of the older Genoese to whom this relationship is known, who are of good repute and truthful testimony, have affirmed the consanguinity in the aforesaid manner with love, fear, payment, and every evil zeal removed, the marriages are to be dissolved without any delay. But if relatives or strangers testify to the relationship by words alone and refuse or are unable to prove it by oath, the marriage is by no means to be dissolved. Rather, an appropriate penance is to be imposed upon them for the infamy or the stain of sin, if perhaps they have contracted any in this matter.

> C. III. Qui iurando propinquitatem firmare debeant.
> Item Urbanus Richario Genuensi Episcopo. Notificamus tibi, ut post, quam duo aut tres ex propinquioribus iam defunctae uxoris uel uiuae eius, qui accusatur, hanc propinquitatem iureiurando firmauerint, uel si tres aut duo ex antiquioribus Genuensibus, quibus hec propinquitas nota sit, qui bonae famae et ueracis testimonii sint, remoto amore, timore, precio et omni malo studio, supradicto modo consanguinitatem firmauerint, sine omni mora coniugia dissoluantur. Quod si propinqui uel extranei uerbis tantum propinquitatem testantur, et iuramento probare noluerint, uel nequiuerint, coniugium nullatenus dissoluatur; sed conpetens eis penitencia propter infamiam uel peccati maculam (si forte in hoc contraxerint aliquam) iniungatur.

C. IV. Those whose incest no one affirms by oath are left to their own confession.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Urban held in Apulia. If two or three men have affirmed consanguinity by oath, or if the persons themselves have perhaps confessed, let the marriages be dissolved. But if neither occurs, let the bishops adjure them by baptism, by faith in Christ, and by the judgment of Christ, in true obedience, to make manifest whether they recognize themselves to be blood relatives, as report has it. If they deny it, they are to be left to themselves; yet in such a way that, if they have something else in their conscience, they should know themselves separated from the thresholds of the church, from the body and blood of the Lord, and from the communion of the faithful, and made infamous, until they desist from the crime of incest. If they have separated themselves by the judgment of the bishops, those who are young shall not be prohibited from contracting other marriages.

PART II. GRATIAN. Behold, upon whose accusation or testimony unions between blood relatives are to be dissolved. The form of oath to be exacted from an accuser is found in the Roman Order. It is as follows:

> C. IV. Suae confessioni relinquitur quorum incestum nullus iurando affirmat.
>
> Item ex Concilio Urbani Papae habitu in Apulia. Si duo uiri uel tres consanguinitatem iureiurando firmauerint, uel ipsi forte confessi fuerint, coniugia dissoluantur. Si uero neutrum contigerit, episcopi eos per baptismum, per fidem Christi, per Christi iudicium in uera obedientia obtestentur, quatinus palam faciant, utrum se sicut fama est, recognoscant consanguineos. Si negauerint, sibi ipsis relinquendi sunt; ita tamen, ut, si aliud in conscientia habeant, se a liminibus ecclesiae, a corpore et sanguine Domini, a fidelium conmunione nouerint segregatos, atque infames effectos, donec ab incesti facinore desinant. Si se episcoporum iudicio segregauerint, qui iuuenes sunt, alia matrimonia contrahere non prohibeantur. II. Pars. Gratian. Ecce, quibus accusantibus uel testificantibus consanguineorum coniunctiones sunt dirimendae. Cuiusmodi uero iuramentum ab accusatore sit exigendum, ex Romano Ordine habetur. Est autem huiusmodi:

C. V. The accuser's oath.

Concerning that kinship which is said to exist between N. and this spouse of his, N., whatever you know concerning it or have heard from your neighbors or your older relatives, you shall conceal from your bishop—or from his envoy whom he has ordered to investigate it—by no device, nor on account of fear, love, reward, or consanguinity, whenever he questions you concerning it. So may God and the relics of these saints help you.

> C. V. Iuramentum accusatoris.
> De parentela illa, quam dicunt esse inter N. et istam eius coniugem N., quicquid inde scis aut audisti a tuis uicinis, aut a tuis propinquis antiquioribus, tu per nullum ingenium, nec propter timorem aut propter amorem, aut propter premium, aut propter consanguinitatem celabis tuo episcopo, aut eius misso, cui hoc requirere iusserit, quandocumque te ex hoc interrogauerit. Sic te Deus adiuuet, et istorum sanctorum reliquiae.

C. VI. The oath of the witnesses.

That oath which this man swore concerning that kinship which is reckoned between the son and his spouse N., you will observe it insofar as you know. So may God help you.

PART III. GRATIAN. This is not the oath of separation but the synodal oath instituted by Pope Eutychian. For he says:

> C. VI. Iuramentum testium.
>
> Illud sacramentum, quod iste iurauit de parentela illa, que inter filium et eius coniugem N. conputatur, quod tu illud obseruabis, in quantum sapis. te Deus adiuuet. III. Pars. Gratian. Hoc iuramentum separationis non est, sed sinodale, institutum ab Euticiano Papa. Ait enim:

C. VII. The synodal oath.

A bishop sitting in a synod, after an appropriate address, ought to call into the midst seven men from the people of that parish—or more, as he sees expedient—who are more mature, more honorable, and more truthful. When the relics of the saints have been brought forth, he must bind each of them by an oath such as this: From this time forward, whatever you know, have heard, or afterward will inquire into which has been done or will be done in this parish contrary to God's will and right Christianity, if it occurs in your days, provided only that it comes to your knowledge in any way—if you know or have been informed that it is a synodal cause and pertains to the ministry of the bishop—you shall in no way conceal it on account of love, fear, payment, or kinship from the bishop or from his envoy whom he has ordered to investigate it, whenever he questions you concerning it. So may God and those relics of the saints help you. This oath which this man swore concerning a synodal cause, you will observe it for your own part in this way, insofar as you know or have heard, or will inquire from this day forward. So may God help you.

PART IV. GRATIAN. The former oath was taken from this one, with its beginning slightly altered. Moreover, Pope Innocent II prescribes the oath of separation to Otto, Bishop of Lucca, saying:

> C. VII. Sinodale iuramentum.
> Episcopus in sinodo residens, post congruam allocutionem septem ex plebe eius parrochiae, uel eo amplius, prout uiderit expedire, maturiores, honestiores atque ueraciores uiros in medium debet aduocare, et allatis sanctorum pignoribus unumquemque illorum tali sacramento constringere: Amodo in antea quicquid nosti, aut audisti, aut postmodum inquisiturus es, quod contra uoluntatem Dei, et rectam Christianitatem in ista parrochia factum sit aut futurum erit, si in diebus tuis euenerit, tantum ad cognitionem tuam modo quocumque perueniat, si scis, aut indicatum tibi fuerit sinodalem causam esse, ad ministerium episcopi pertinere, quod tu nec propter amorem, nec propter timorem, nec propter precium, nec propter parentelam ullatenus celes episcopum, aut eius missum, cui hoc inquirere iusserit, quandocumque te ex hoc interrogauerit. Sic te Deus adiuuet, et illae sanctorum reliquiae. Istud sacramentum, quod iste iurauit de sinodali causa, quod tu illud ex te ita obseruabis, in quantum sapis, aut audisti, aut in antea ab hac die inquisiturus es. Sic te Deus adiuuet. IV. Pars. Gratian. Ab hoc iuramento illud sumptum est, principio paululum deriuato. Porro iuramentum separationis Innocentius Papa II. prescribit Ottoni Lucensi Episcopo, dicens:

C. VIII. The oath of those who prove consanguinity.

Concerning that kinship about which you wished to consult us and because of which an appeal was also made to our hearing, we received writings from other brothers, who indeed narrated the cause itself in diverse ways. At first the reckoners of that kinship are said to have disagreed both in the degrees and in the names of the persons, but afterward to have agreed in one of them. Yet in cases of this kind the quality of the persons who wish to assert something against anyone must be considered with the greatest care. They must also furnish an oath that they say this against those who are at issue neither from favor nor for payment nor from hatred of anyone, but rather because they believe it to be true in this way and to have heard it thus from their ancestors. In all these matters no variation or contradiction ought to be found.

PART V. GRATIAN. But those who are separated from one another will furnish an oath of this kind.

> C. VIII. Iuramentum illorum, qui consanguinitatem probant.
> De parentela illa, unde nos consulere uoluisti, pro qua etiam ad nostram audientiam est appellatum, aliorum fratrum scripta suscepimus, qui utique causam ipsam diuerso modo narrabant. Et primo quidem tam in gradibus quam in nominibus personarum discordasse, postmodum uero in altero eorum conputatores eiusdem parentelae dicuntur conuenisse. Ceterum in huiusmodi casibus summopere consideranda est qualitas personarum, que aliquid contra quoslibet astruere uelint, que etiam iusiurandum prestare debent, quod neque gratia, neque precio, uel odio alicuius hoc dicunt contra eos, de quibus agitur; sed potius, quia credant ita uerum esse, et ita se a suis antecessoribus audiuisse. In quibus omnibus non debet aliqua uarietas uel contrarietas inueniri. V. Pars. Gratian. Qui uero separantur ab inuicem, huiusmodi iuramentum prestabunt.

C. IX. The oath of separation.

From this day forward, by no device will you associate yourself with this female blood relative of yours, either in marriage or in adultery; nor will you eat and drink with her at one table or remain under one roof, except in a church or another public place where no evil suspicion can exist, so that there, before suitable witnesses, you may speak together for a certain necessity. Nor will you take another spouse unless perhaps, after penance has been performed, permission has been given to you by your bishop or his envoy. So may God help you.

PART VI. GRATIAN. But no one is permitted to put away his wife on the occasion of consanguinity and take another unless the cause has first been proved. Hence Alexander II to William of Mosterico:

> C. IX. Iuramentum separationis.
> Ab isto die in antea tu per nullum ingenium sociabis te huic tuae consanguineae, nec in coniugio, nec in adulterio, nec cum illa ad unam mensam manducabis et bibes, aut sub uno tecto manebis, nisi in ecclesia, aut in alio publico loco, ubi nulla mala suspicio possit esse, ut ibi coram testibus idoneis pro certa necessitate pariter colloquamini; nec aliam coniugem accipies, nisi forte post actam penitenciam tibi licentia data fuerit ab episcopo tuo, aut eius misso. Sic te Deus adiuuet. VI. Pars. Gratian. Occasione uero consanguinitatis uxorem suam dimittere, et aliam ducere non licet alicui, nisi causa primum fuerit probata. Unde Alexander II. Guilielmo de Mostorico:

C. X. It is not permitted to put away one's wife unless consanguinity has been proved before the Church.

We have learned from the report of many that you wish to cast away your own wife and adhere to another, alleging the occasion of consanguinity. Hence, forbidding this by apostolic authority, we command you that you in no way presume to put away the wife whom you now have or to take another until you have examined a just cause before a council of religious bishops.

PART VII. GRATIAN. But one who is to receive back the woman whom he unjustly put away will swear in this manner:

C. X. Nisi coram ecclesia consanguinitate probata uxorem dimittere non licet.

Multorum relatione cognouimus, te propriam uelle abicere uxorem, et adherere alteri, pretendentem consanguinitatis occasionem. Unde apostolica auctoritate interdicendo mandamus tibi, ut hanc, quam nunc habes uxorem, nullatenus presumas dimittere, uel aliam ducere, donec apud episcoporum religiosorum concilium causam iustam examinaueris. VII. Pars. Gratian. Recepturus uero eam, quam iniuste dimisit, hoc modo iurabit:

C. XI. The oath of reconciliation.

From this day forward you will keep this spouse N., whom you had unjustly put away, as a husband ought to have his spouse in affection and due discipline. You will not separate her from yourself by any evil device, nor will you take another while she is living. So may God help you.

GRATIAN. But the fact that among certain persons marriages are dissolved by the testimony of one person is held ratified by no reason. For the Lord said, "Every word shall stand in the mouth of two or three witnesses." Likewise, since it is said in the Council of Lérida, [c. 20]: "Every controversy which arises concerning ecclesiastical matters shall be terminated according to divine law under two or three witnesses, as the Lord says: 'Let not one stand against another, but in the mouth of two or three witnesses let every word stand'"; and likewise since it is said elsewhere, "Nothing shall be believed on the testimony of any one person, however practiced": it appears most evidently that marriages are not to be dissolved by the assertion of one person.

C. XI. Reconciliationis iuramentum.

Ab isto die in antea istam coniugem N., quam iniuste dimiseras, ita tenebis, sicut maritus suam coniugem debet habere in dilectione et debita disciplina; nec eam per ullum malum ingenium a te separabis, nec ea uiuente aliam accipies. Sic te Deus adiuuet. Gratian. Quod autem unius testimonio coniugia apud quosdam dirimuntur, nulla ratione ratum habetur. Cum enim Dominus dixerit: "Omne uerbum stabit in ore duorum uel trium testium;" item cum in concilio Ylerdensi [c. 20.] dicatur:

"Omnis controuersia, que de ecclesiasticis rebus fit, secundum diuinam legem sub duobus uel tribus testibus terminetur, Domino dicente: 'Non unus stet contra alium, sed in ore duorum uel trium testium stet omne uerbum;' item cum alibi dicatur: "Nullius personae quantumlibet exercitatae testimonio aliquid credatur:" euidentissime apparet, unius assertione coniugia non esse dirimenda.

Question VII

GRATIAN. But concerning the question whether those born of incestuous unions are reckoned as children, Augustine determines it in the Book of Questions on Leviticus, chapter 77, saying as follows:

GRATIANUS. Quod autem queritur, si illi, qui de incestuosis nascuntur, filii reputentur, Augustinus in libro questionum super Leuiticum capitulo 77. determinat, ita dicens:

C. UN. Those born of incestuous unions are not called children.

What does this mean: "Whoever sleeps with his female blood relative shall die without children," since children both have previously been born from unions of this kind and are born even today? Or must it be understood that this was established by God's law: that whoever are born of them are not reckoned as children and succeed to their parents by no right?

C. UN. Non appellantur filii, qui de incestuosis nascuntur.

Quid est: "Quicumque dormierit cum cognata sua, sine filiis morietur," cum filii ex huiusmodi coniunctionibus et ante nati sint, hodieque nascantur? An hoc intelligendum est lege Dei constitutum, ut quicumque ex eis nati fuerint non deputentur filii, et nullo parentibus iure succedant?

Question VIII

GRATIAN. Concerning those who were unknowingly joined, Gregory defined in the Register in what degree of consanguinity or affinity they may be left together by dispensation of the Church, saying:

GRATIANUS. De his uero, qui ignoranter coniuncti sunt, in quo gradu consanguinitatis uel affinitatis ex dispensatione ecclesiae relinquantur, Gregorius in Registro diffiniuit, dicens:

C. I. Those unknowingly joined within the seventh generation are not to be separated.

Concerning the degrees of kinship: if those who are found in marriage within the seventh generation acted unknowingly, and many courses of years have passed so that they have children, let persons of this kind who are found in the sixth, or perhaps in the fifth, not be separated until, with the Lord's permission, we speak face to face. But I say this according to indulgence, not according to command. Yet those who appear to have contracted new marriages in these two degrees are in every way to be separated within the circle of the year. For the future, let general statutes be confirmed throughout the whole province by proceeding in such a way that no one may dare hereafter to perpetrate such a crime, and that those who do so, punished more severely by penalties and without the mercy of reconsideration, are separated. But those who have joined to themselves in marriage the blood relatives of their wife, as we wrote to you some time ago, if they are found in the same degree, are to be separated, or let their cause be suspended until, with the Lord's help, we come together.

The same: § 1. Concerning those who, after the death of a wife, wish to contract second marriages, we have justly, honorably, and reasonably provided that they abstain from those women's blood relatives down to the fourth degree of genealogy. We have set forth these things more mildly according to the indulgence of holy mother Church. Yet according to the judgment of the secular laws, all these evil and unlawful things are in every way to be rejected with worthy coercions and grave attacks of discipline, so that all may be at rest in future time.

C. I. Non separentur qui infra septimam generationem ignoranter copulantur.

De gradibus uero cognationum, qui infra septimam generationem in matrimonio sunt inuenti, si nescienter fecerunt, et multa curricula annorum sunt reuoluta, ita ut filios habeant, in sexto qui inuenti sunt, aut fortasse in quinto, huiusmodi non separentur, donec nos permittente Domino ore ad os loquamur. Hoc autem dico secundum indulgentiam, non secundum inperium. Qui uero de his duobus gradibus nouas contraxisse nuptias uidentur, idem infra anni coronam, modis omnibus separentur. De cetero uero generalia per omnem prouinciam taliter percurrens statuta firmentur, ut nullus audeat deinceps tale scelus perpetrare, et qui fecerint sine retractionis misericordia acrius puniti ultionibus separentur. Hi uero, qui propinquas sanguinis uxoris suae in matrimonio sibi sociauerunt, sicut iamdudum uobis scripsimus, qui in eodem gradu inuenti sunt, separentur, aut suspendatur eorum causa, usque dum nos insimul Domino auxiliante conueniamus. Idem: §. 1. De his, qui mortua uxore secundas contrahere nuptias uolunt, iuste et honeste et rationabiliter prospeximus, ab earum consanguineis usque ad quartum gradum genealogiae abstineri. Hec nos secundum indulgentiam sanctae matris ecclesiae mitius prelibauimus. Ceterum iuxta legum secularium censuram dignis cohercionibus grauibusque disciplinae inuectionibus hec omnia mala et illicita modis omnibus refutanda sunt, ut futuro deinceps tempore cuncta quiescant.

C. II. Those found joined in the fourth or fifth degree are to be separated.

The same to Felix, Bishop of the city of Messina. We decree that these things are to be guarded against salutarily: no member of the faithful is to desire to join to himself in marriage a person related by his own blood for as long as the lines of affinity are recognized through the succession of the lineage. Rather, just as it was defined by our ancestors, so let it be observed in every way, because we never grant anyone permission to contract a union within the seventh number of kindred, namely, to those who descend by the kindred of consanguinity from father and mother. But let men and women who are found joined in the fourth or fifth degree be separated, because it is written: "No human being shall approach one near to him by blood in order to uncover that person's nakedness"; and again: "The soul that does anything from these things shall perish from the midst of its people." Certainly, those to whom an unlawful union is forbidden will have liberty to enter a better marriage —unless they have contumaciously persevered in the same crime until the death of one of them. Hence in the Council of Orléans:

C. II. In quarto uel quinto gradu qui coniuncti inuenti fuerint separentur.

Idem Felici, Messanae ciuitatis Episcopo. Hec salubriter precauenda sancimus, ne quis fidelium propinquam sanguinis sui, usquequo affinitatis liniamenta generis successione cognoscuntur, in matrimonio sibi desideret copulari sed, sicut a maioribus nostris diffinitum est, ita modis omnibus obseruetur, quoniam usque ad septenarium numerum parentelae nulli umquam copulam contrahere licentiam damus, his uidelicet, qui ex patre et matre consanguinitatis descendunt parentela. Qui autem et que in quarto uel quinto gradu coniuncti inuenti fuerint, separentur, quoniam scriptum est: "Omnis homo ad proximam sanguinis sui non accedat, ut reuelet turpitudinem eius;" et iterum: "Anima, que fecerit quippiam ex istis, peribit de medio populi sui." Sane quibus coniunctio interdicitur illicita, habebunt ineundi coniugii melioris libertatem. Nisi in eodem crimine usque ad mortem alterius eorum contumaciter perseuerauerint. Unde in Concilio Aurelianensi:

C. III. One who perseveres in incest until the other's death shall not take a wife.

As long as incestuous persons remain in that detestable and unspeakable crime, let them be regarded not among the Christian faithful but among catechumens or Gentiles; that is, let them take neither food nor drink with Christians, but let them do this alone; let them not be kissed or greeted by them. But if they prove disobedient to their priests and refuse to be separated from so unspeakable a crime and return to public penance, let them be regarded among those who are imperiled by an unclean spirit, or even among those of whom the Truth itself says: "If he does not hear you, let him be to you as a heathen and a publican." And if one of them is overtaken by death, let the other repent gravely for as long as that person lives and remain without hope of marriage.

GRATIAN. By this authority those found joined in the fourth or fifth degree of consanguinity are commanded to be separated by the Church.

C. III. Non ducat uxorem qui usque ad mortem alterius in incestu perseuerauerit.

> Incestuosi, dum in ipso detestando atque nefando scelere manent, non inter fideles Christianos, sed inter cathecuminos aut gentiles habeantur, id est, cum Christianis non sumant cibum neque potum, sed soli faciant hoc; non osculentur, nec salutentur ab eis. Sed si suis sacerdotibus inobedientes extiterint, et a tam nefando scelere segregari, atque ad publicam penitenciam redire noluerint, inter eos habeantur, qui spiritu periclitantur inmundo, uel etiam inter eos, de quibus per se ueritas ait: "Si te non audierit, sit tibi sicut ethnicus et publicanus." Et si alter eorum morte preuentus fuerit, alter, quamdiu uiuit, grauiter peniteat, et sine spe coniugii maneat. Gratian. Hac auctoritate qui in quarto uel in quinto gradu consanguinitatis coniuncti inuenti fuerint ab ecclesia separari iubentur.

Question IX

GRATIAN. PART I. Hence it is asked: if the Church, deceived by the fraud or ignorance of witnesses, separates persons who after the separation contract other marriages, and afterward the witnesses' cunning or false opinion is discovered, are the former marriages to be restored? That this cannot be done is proved by arguments and authority. For a judgment, unless it has been relieved by appeal within the limit established by law, will obtain irrevocable force. Hence blessed Gregory also writes, saying:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Unde queritur, si ecclesia fraude testium aut ignorantia eorum decepta aliquos separauerit, qui post separationem alia coniugia contraxerint, si postea deprehensa fuerit calliditas uel falsa opinio testium, an priora coniugia sint redintegranda? Quod fieri non posse argumentis et auctoritate probatur. Sentencia namque, nisi per appellationem infra terminum lege constitutum releuata fuerit, irreuocabile robur obtinebit. Hinc etiam B. Gregorius scribit, dicens:

C. I. It is not expedient for things reasonably decided to be changed.

It is fitting in every way for ecclesiastical discipline or moderation that things which have been reasonably ordained or decided ought not afterward to be disturbed by any opposition.

> C. I. Que rationabiliter decisa sunt mutari non expedit.
> Omnibus modis ecclesiasticae disciplinae uel moderationi conueniens est, ut que rationabiliter ordinata fuerint uel decisa nulla in posterum debeant refragatione turbari.

C. II. Things advantageously decided are to be confirmed by successors; things rashly presumed are to be cut away.

Likewise Stephen V to Paul, Bishop of Piacenza. Consideration of our office admonishes us, by the authority of reason, to confirm things advantageously decided by our predecessors and likewise readily to punish things presumed by rash persons. Let one who strives to rescind things advantageously concluded and dares in any way to violate things confirmed know oneself to be guilty before the sight of the divine Judge. For the order of ecclesiastical vigor is confounded if either unlawful things are rashly presumed or unconceded things are attempted with impunity. Therefore, if we negligently disregard things that are evilly usurped, we undoubtedly open a way of transgression to others.

GRATIAN. Therefore, because this judgment was given reasonably and was not relieved by appeal within a fixed limit, it appears that the former marriages are by no means to be restored. To these things the response is as follows: it is one thing to rescind a judgment and disturb things reasonably decided, and another to correct things that occurred by surreption after they have been discovered.

For each person is permitted to correct one's own error; and therefore things unlawfully committed by anyone, or found to have been admitted by predecessors, ought to be recalled to a better condition. Moreover, the wife was unlawfully separated from her husband and joined to another while he was living, since the Lord commands that a wife be separated from her husband for the cause of fornication alone. Therefore, just as, if a woman whose husband was thought dead were joined to someone and, when any occasion intervened, withdrew from his fellowship, then, although by the Church's judgment she was compelled to return to the one whom she had left, nevertheless, if after three years the husband who was thought dead happened to return, the former marriage would be restored: so, when persons separated from one another on account of consanguinity are discovered not to have been blood relatives, the bonds of the former fellowship are to be repaired.

PART II. § 1. But that things unlawfully admitted or found to have been admitted are to be corrected, and that even a judgment of the Roman See can be changed for the better, is shown by the authority of Popes Hilary and Nicholas. For Hilary, Bishop of the city of Rome, presiding over a synod, says, [c. 4]:

> C. II. Que utiliter decisa sunt a successoribus roborentur, a temerariis presumpta resecentur.
> Item Stephanus V. Paulo, Episcopo Placentino. Loci nostri consideratio nos ammonet rationis auctoritate, que a decessoribus nostris utiliter decisa fuerint roborare, et que a temerariis presumpta fuerint in promptu nichilominus ulcisci. Reum quippe ante conspectum diuini iudicis se nouerit esse qui nititur utiliter finita rescindere, ac roborata quolibet ausu uiolare. Ecclesiastici quippe uigoris ordo confunditur, si aut temere illicita presumantur, aut non concessa inpune temptentur. Proinde si negligenter ea, que male usurpantur, omittimus, excessus uiam proculdubio aliis aperimus. Gratian. Quia ergo hec sentencia rationabiliter data est, nec per appellationem infra certum terminum releuata, apparet, quod nequaquam priora coniugia sunt redintegranda. His ita respondetur: Aliud est sententiam rescindere et rationabiliter decisa turbare, atque aliud que per surreptionem eueniunt deprehensa corrigere; suum namque errorem cuique corrigere licet, atque ideo que a quolibet illicite conmittuntur, siue a decessoribus admissa inueniuntur, in melius reuocari oportet. Porro illicite uxor a uiro suo separata est, et illo uiuente alii copulata, cum Dominus solius fornicationis causa uxorem a uiro suo separari iubeat. Sicut ergo, si aliqua, cuius uir putaretur defunctus, alicui copularetur, et qualibet occasione interueniente ab eius consortio discederet, quamuis iudicio ecclesiae cogatur redire ad eum, quem reliquerat, tamen, si post triennium uirum, qui mortuus putabatur, redire contigerit, priora coniugia redintegrabuntur: sic, cum deprehenduntur non fuisse consanguinei qui causa consanguinitatis ab inuicem separati sunt, prioris consortii federa sunt reparanda. II. Pars. §. 1. Quod autem que illicite admittuntur, uel admissa inueniuntur, corrigenda sint, uel quod sentencia etiam Romanae sedis in melius conmutari ualeat, auctoritate Hilarii Papae, et Nykolai monstratur. Ait namque Hilarius Episcopus Urbis Romae Sinodo presidens: [c. 4.]

C. III. What is unlawfully admitted, or is found to have been admitted by predecessors, must be corrected.

Whatever anyone has committed unlawfully, or has found admitted by one's predecessors, one will condemn if one wishes to avoid one's own peril. For we wish to exercise severity of vengeance in no matter; but one who sins in the causes of God either through contumacy or some transgression, or who refuses personally to abolish what is wrongly done, will find in oneself whatever one did not cut away in another. So that this can be observed more tenaciously hereafter, if it pleases you, furnish all your judgments and your own subscriptions, so that unlawful access may be closed by synodal judgment.

C. III. Corrigendum est quod illicite admittitur, aut a predecessoribus admissum inuenitur.

Quod quis conmisit illicite, aut a predecessoribus suis inuenit admissum, si proprium periculum uult uitare, dampnabit. Nos enim in nullo uolumus seueritatem exercere ultionis; sed qui in causis Dei uel contumacia, uel aliquo excessu deliquerit, aut ipse qui perperam facit abolere noluerit, in se quicquid in alio non resecauerit inueniet. Quod ut deinceps tenacius possit custodiri, si placet, omnes sentencias, et subscriptiones proprias commodate, ut sinodali iudicio aditus claudatur illicitus.

C. IV. An apostolic judgment can be changed according to the tenor of its condition.

Likewise Gregory. A judgment of the Apostolic See is always conceived with such moderation of counsel, matured with such maturity of patience, and delivered with such gravity of deliberation that it does not deem alteration necessary—unless perhaps it was delivered in such a way that it can be reconsidered, or exists as one to be altered according to the tenor of the condition previously stated.

C. IV. Secundum suae condicionis tenorem apostolica ualet mutari sentencia.

Item Gregorius. Apostolicae sedis sentencia tanta semper consilii moderatione concipitur, tanta pacientiae maturitate decoquitur, tantaque deliberationis grauitate profertur, ut, nec inmutari necessarium ducat, nisi forte sic prolata sit, ut retractari possit, uel inmutanda secundum tenorem premissae condicionis existat.

C. V. The Apostolic Church restores persons condemned by predecessors to their former status upon the supplications of others.

Likewise Innocent, [letter XXII to the bishops of Macedonia]. I shall now come to Photinus as to a certain principal theme and—what is anxious and most difficult for me—I shall review the judgments of my predecessors. Something indeed rather grave had been established concerning him in some manner, as you yourselves also remember. But because, as you assert, it is shown that this was surreptitiously obtained from this See through a false rumor and elicited by snares, because the matter has returned to salvation, with you urging us so greatly in this matter we supply pardon after condemnation according to apostolic custom; and we judge it harder than every hard thing not to give assent to such great assertions of yours and to you who are so good and so dear. Therefore, on account of your approval, judgment, and petition, regard Photinus as bishop—it is lawful to establish it as you entreat—and receive for yourselves our judgment changed for the better, sharing in your labor or testimony. But do not expect Eustasius, who has very often been approved by me, to be stripped of the grace of the diaconate. For I willingly hear you when you are solicitous for salvation; on the contrary, even if something is to be done, I do not willingly admit it. To the one to whom you extend a hand, I extend it with you; to the one to whom I extend a hand, extend it with me.

C. V. A predecessoribus dampnatos aliorum supplicationibus in pristinum statum apostolica reformat ecclesia.

Item Innocentius. [epist. XXII. ad Episcopos Macedoniae.] Veniam nunc ad Maximum, quasi ad quoddam thema

Fotinum, et (quod michi anxium est ac difficillimum) maiorum meorum reuoluam sentencias. Fuerat de illo quoquo pacto (ut etiam ipsi conmeministis) aliquid utique grauius constitutum. Verum, quoniam id per rumorem falsum, ut asseritis, subreptum huic sedi et elicitum per insidias demonstratur, quia res ad salutem rediit, ueniam hinc tantum uobis annitentibus post condempnationem more apostolico subrogamus, tantisque uestris assertionibus, uobisque tam bonis, tam karis non dare consensum, omnibus duris rebus durius arbitramur. Pro uestra ergo approbatione (fratres karissimi), et sentencia, ac postulatione, episcopum Fotinum habetote, (licitum est, constituere ita, ut deprecamini), et nostram in melius conuersam sentenciam, labore uel testimonio uestro conpotem, uobis suscipite. Eustasium uero a me sepissime conprobatum nolite expectare, ut diaconii gratia expolietur. Sollicitos enim uos pro salute libenter audio: contra, etiam si faciendum est, non libenter admitto. Cui manum porrigitis uobiscum porrigo, cui porrigo mecum porrigite.

C. VI. A judgment of the Roman See can be changed for the better.

Likewise Pope Nicholas, [to Emperor Michael in letter VII]. We do not deny that a judgment of the Roman See can be changed for the better when either something has been obtained by surreption, or it has itself decreed, by consideration of ages and times or grave necessities, to ordain something dispensatorily—since we read that the eminent Apostle Paul dispensatorily did certain things which he is afterward read to have reproved. Yet this is to be observed when that Church, namely the Roman Church, has chosen with most discerning consideration that this be done, not when it wishes to reconsider things which have been well defined.

C. VI. Sententiam Romanae sedis in melius conmutari potest.

Item Nykolaus Papa. [ad Michaelem Imp. in epist. VII.] Sententiam Romanae sedis non negamus posse in melius conmutari, cum aut surreptum fuerit aliquid, aut ipsa pro consideratione etatum, et temporum, seu grauium necessitatum dispensatorie quiddam ordinare decreuit, (quoniam et egregium apostolum Paulum quedam fecisse dispensatorie legimus, que postea reprobasse legitur); quod tamen obseruandum est quando illa, Romana uidelicet ecclesia, disertissima consideratione hoc fieri delegerit, non quando ipsa que bene sunt diffinita retractare uoluerit.

C. VII. (VIII.) Persons deposed by predecessors are restored by successors.

Likewise from the Book of the Pontiffs. Gregory IV consecrated as bishop of the Church of Segni Theodosius, whom his predecessor Eugenius had deprived of the honor of the priesthood. Leontius was deposed while he was a priest and afterward was patriarch in Antioch. Gelasius, his successor, both restored to communion Misenus the bishop, who had been condemned by Pope Felix, and restored him to his church.

C. VII. (VIII.) A predecessoribus depositi a successoribus restituuntur.

Item ex Libro Pontificali. Gregorius quartus Theodosium, quem Eugenius antecessor eius presbiterii honore priuauerat, ecclesiae Segninae consecrauit episcopum. Leontius, dum esset presbiter, depositus fuit; et postea in Antiochia patriarcha fuit. Misenum episcopum a Felice Papa dampnatum Gelasius successor illius et communioni reddidit, et ecclesiae suae restituit.

C. VIII. (VII.) The authority of the Apostolic See can reconsider anyone's judgment.

Likewise Innocent to the bishops established throughout Macedonia, [letter VII]. It ought not to have seemed burdensome to your most pious minds to reconsider anyone's judgment, because truth, when more frequently examined, shines forth more brightly into the light, and ruin, when recalled into judgment, is condemned more gravely and without penance. For it is a divine fruit that justice be reviewed more frequently.

> C. VIII. (VII.) Cuiusque iudicium apostolicae sedis auctoritas retractare ualet.
>
> Item Innocentius Episcopis per Macedoniam constitutis. [epist. VII.] Graue non oportuit uideri piissimis mentibus uestris cuiuscumque retractare iudicium, quia ueritas sepius exagitata magis splendescit in lucem, et pernicies reuocata in iudicium grauius et sine penitencia condempnatur. Nam fructus diuinus est iusticiam sepius recenseri.

[C. IX.]

GRATIAN. Therefore, just as a judgment of the Roman See can be changed for the better, so a judgment of any church, when it is recognized to have been given through surreption, can reasonably be revoked.

> [C. IX.]
>
> Gratian. Sicut ergo sentencia Romanae sedis in melius conmutari ualet, sic cuiuslibet ecclesiae sentencia, cum per surreptionem data cognoscitur, rationabiliter reuocari poterit.

Question X

GRATIAN. Concerning a woman who passes to a second marriage, it is rightly asked whether she remains in the same affinity with the blood relatives of her former husband, or whether offspring received from the second marriage can be joined to the blood relatives of the former husband. Gregory writes as follows concerning these matters to Venerius, Bishop of Cagliari:

> GRATIANUS. De ea autem, que ad secundas nuptias transit, utrum in eadem affinitate consanguineorum prioris uiri remaneat, an soboles ex secundis nuptiis suscepta consanguineis prioris uiri copulari possit, merito queritur. De his ita scribit Gregorius Venerio, Caralitano Episcopo:

C. I. Affinity is not erased in the survivor.

Beloved brother, I render the thanks I owe to the diligent sagacity of your fraternity. Because you asked what you ought, you made me joyful. Hence I respond calmly to the matters asked. You resolved to consult the Apostolic See whether a woman joined by the marriage bond to a man who is a stranger pertains to his kin; whether, if he dies, the kinship remains; whether under another husband the names of kinship are dissolved; or whether offspring received can lawfully pass into union with the kin of the former husband.

For the word of God is powerful and strong, durable, persevering, and immutable—not momentary, not transitory. For the Truth itself, who is God and the Word of God, says: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." Before God appeared in the flesh among human beings, Adam said by his inspiration: "Therefore a man shall leave his father and mother and cleave to his wife, and the two shall be in one flesh." Then, when Truth arose from the earth into the earth and appeared visibly in humanity, he was asked whether it was lawful for a man to leave his wife. Prohibiting this, he forbade it, unless perhaps fornication excluded the marital union. Hence he immediately brought forward the very same sentence which, remaining with the Father before the ages, the Word had inspired in Adam, himself confirming what the first human being himself uttered:

"Therefore a man shall leave father and mother and cleave to his wife, and the two shall be in one flesh." If they become one flesh, how can anyone related to one pertain to that one without pertaining to the other? It must be believed that this can by no means occur.

Moreover, when one has died, affinity is not erased in the survivor, nor can another conjugal union dissolve the affinity of the former union. Nor is it pleasing for the offspring of another union to pass into fellowship with the affinity of the former husband, because the word of the Lord is powerful and strong and, as the Prophet said when speaking, "The word of the Lord shall stand forever." And another Prophet says: "Because he spoke, and they were made; he commanded, and they were created. He established them forever and unto the age of the age; he placed a command, and it shall not pass away." For after the word and command he made two one flesh—that is, male and female—who has not ceased to make the innumerable multitude of either sex one with himself, as the Truth said through himself: "I ask not only for these, but also for those who will believe in me through their word, that they may be one, as you, Father, are in me and I in you, that they too may be one in us."

Therefore, if anyone with sacrilegious and rash daring seeks to extinguish relationship in the deceased, or to dissipate it under the name of another affinity, or believes that offspring received from another union is lawfully joined to the relationship of the former one, that person denies that God's word is powerful and strong; and one who seeks to dissolve it so easily or swiftly does not believe that God's word remains forever.

Mix earth from four places separated from one another by a great interval; when it has been mixed and glued together, fashion a body of whatever shape or size you wish. Will there be any human ingenuity capable of separating those four parts from one another so that each can be recognized by itself? Thus, from four grandparents two are formed into one, and from two one joint creation is made. You can gather this likeness from the four elements from which the human being was jointly created, if you assign each of their kinds—which is divided into many divisions—through parts distinct from one another. The same occurs in metals; this is also proved in liquids; a painter pursues it in colors by the art of mixing colors, fashioning bodies from visible pigments.

> Fraternitatis uestrae studiosae sagacitati, frater amande, quas debeo refero grates. Quoniam quesisti que debuisti, iocundum me reddidisti. Unde placide ad inquisita respondeo. Sedem apostolicam consulere decreuisti, si mulier copula nuptiali extraneo uiro coniuncta cognationi eius pertineat, si eo defuncto cognatio maneat, uel si sub altero uiro cognationis uocabula dissoluantur, uel si susceptae soboles possunt legitime ad prioris uiri cognationis transire copulam. Est enim uerbum Dei ualidum et forte, et durabile, et perseuerabile, et inmutabile, non momentaneum, non transitorium. Ait enim per se ipsa ueritas, que Deus est et uerbum Dei est: "Celum et terra transibunt, uerba autem mea non transibunt." Ante, quam Deus in carne appareret inter homines, eo inspirante dixit Adam: "Quamobrem relinquet homo patrem suum et matrem, et adherebit uxori suae, et erunt duo in carne una." Deinde cum ueritas oriretur de terra in terram, et uisibilis appareret in humanitate, interrogatus est, si licitum esset homini uxorem relinquere. Quod prohibens uetuit, nisi forte fornicatio excluderet maritalem copulam. Unde statim protulit in medium eandem ipsam sententiam, quam ante secula manens cum Patre uerbum inspirauerat Adae, ipse confirmans quod ipse primus protulit homo: "Quamobrem relinquet homo patrem et matrem, et adherebit uxori suae, et erunt duo in carne una." Si una caro fiunt, quomodo potest aliquis eorum propinquus uni pertinere nisi pertineat alteri? Hoc minime fieri posse credendum est. Porro uno defuncto in superstite affinitas non deletur, nec alia copula coniugalis affinitatem prioris copulae soluere ualet. Sed neque alterius coniunctionis soboles placet ad affinitatis prioris uiri consortium transire, pro eo, quod uerbum Domini ualidum est et forte, et, ut inquiens dixit Propheta: "Verbum Domini stabit in eternum." Et alius Propheta: "Quoniam ipse dixit, et facta sunt, ipse mandauit, et creata sunt; statuit ea in eternum, et in seculum seculi; preceptum posuit, et non preteribit." Nam post uerbum atque preceptum effecit duo carnem unam (id est masculum et feminam), qui innumeram multitudinem utriusque sexus non destitit unum facere secum, sicut per se ueritas dixit: "Non pro his rogo tantum, sed etiam pro his, qui crediturі sunt per uerbum eorum in me, ut unum sint, sicut tu Pater in me, et ego in te, ut et ipsi in nobis unum sint." Si quis ergo sacrilego et temerario ausu in defuncto querit propinquitatem exstinguere, uel sub altero affinitatis uocabulo dissipare, uel susceptam sobolem alterius copulae propinquitati prioris credit legitime sociari, hic negat Dei uerbum ualidum esse et forte, et qui tam facile uel tam uelociter querit dissoluere, hic non credit uerbum Dei in eternum manere. Confice terram ex quatuor locis magna intercapedine a se distantibus, confecta et conglutinatam finge cuiuscumque figurae uel inmensitatis corpus uolueris, numquid erit humanum ingenium, quod ipsas quatuor partes ab inuicem ualeat segregare, ut unaqueque per se possit agnosci? Sic a quatuor auis duo conficiuntur in unum, et de duobus fit una concreatio. Hanc similitudinem de quatuor elementis, unde homo concreatus est, colligere potes, si eorum unamquamque speciem, que in multis diuisionibus partita est, per discretas inter se assignaueris partes. Fit idem in metallis; hoc etiam in liquoribus probatur in coloribus pictor prosequitur, arte colores admiscendo, ex uisibilibus fucis corpora fingens.

C. II. Offspring begotten from a second marriage ought not to be joined to the blood relatives of the former husband.

Likewise Innocent. If anyone's paternal or maternal uncle dies while married, and his wife afterward takes another man and begets sons or daughters by him, we prohibit union with these persons in every way, because man and woman are one flesh.

C. II. Soboles ex secundis nuptiis genita consanguineis prioris uiri copulari non debet.

Item Innocentius. Si cuius patruus uel auunculus uxoratus obierit, et illa uirum alium postea duxerit, filios filiasue ex illo genuerit, cum his modis omnibus conmisceri prohibemus, quia uir et mulier una caro est.

[C. III.]

Likewise from a Roman Synod. If any woman passes to a second marriage and begets offspring from it, the offspring can in no way enter into union with the kindred of the former husband.

Causa XXXVI

GRATIAN. A certain man, without her father's knowledge, enticed someone's daughter with gifts and invited her to a banquet. When the banquet had ended, the young man violated the virgin. When this was discovered by her parents, the girl was handed over to the young man, and in the manner of those marrying she was dowered by the young man and publicly taken as wife. (Question I.) It is asked whether he committed ravishment. (Question II.) Second, whether the woman ravished can marry the ravisher when her father furnishes assent.

> GRATIANUS. Filiam cuiusdam patre ignorante quidam muneribus illexit, ad conuiuium inuitauit; finito conuiuio iuuenis uirginem oppressit. Quo conperto a parentibus iuueni traditur puella, ac more nubentium a iuuene dotatur, et publice in uxorem ducitur. (Qu. I.) Queritur, an ille raptum admiserit? (Qu. II.) Secundo, an rapta raptori nubere possit, patre assensum prestante?

Question I

GRATIAN. That he committed ravishment is proved by the authority of many. For Isidore says in book II of the Etymologies, c. 33:

> GRATIANUS. Quod autem ille raptum admiserit, probatur auctoritate multorum. Ait enim Ysidorus in II. libro Ethimologiarum c. 33.:

C. I. What ravishment is.

Ravishment is also unlawful intercourse, so called from corrupting; hence one who gains possession by abduction enjoys defilement. Likewise Pope Gelasius:

> C. I. Quid sit raptus.
>
> Raptus quoque est illicitus coitus a corrumpendo dictus; unde qui rapto potitur stupro fruitur. Item Gelasius Papa:

C. II. Where ravishment is committed.

That law of former rulers said that ravishment was committed where a girl concerning whose marriage nothing had previously been arranged appears to have been led away.

GRATIAN. Therefore, since she was corrupted by unlawful intercourse and was so led away—that is, led from her father's house—when nothing had previously been arranged concerning her marriage, it cannot be denied that she is to be called ravished. But not every unlawful intercourse, nor the unlawful defloration of any person, is called ravishment. For fornication is one thing, defloration another, adultery another, incest another, and ravishment another.

§ 1. Fornication, although it appears to be the genus of every unlawful intercourse that occurs outside a lawful wife, is nevertheless understood specifically in the use of widows, prostitutes, or concubines.

§ 2. But defloration is properly the unlawful deflowering of virgins: namely, when, no conjugal compact preceding, a virgin is corrupted by the will of both parties, and the father does not immediately take the injury to heart after learning of it.

§ 3. But adultery is violation of another's bed. Hence adulterium is so called as though ad alterius thorum accessio, "an approach to another's bed."

§ 4. Incest is the abuse of blood relatives or affines. Hence those who abuse their blood relatives or affines are called incestuous.

§ 5. Ravishment is committed when a girl is violently led from her father's house so that she may be possessed as wife after being corrupted, whether it is established that force was inflicted upon the girl alone, upon the parents alone, or upon both. The ravisher is punished by death. But if he flees to a church with the woman ravished, he merits immunity from death through the church's privilege. Hence it is read in the Council of Orléans, [I, c. 4]:

> C. II. Ubi raptus admittitur.
> Lex illa preteritorum principum ibi raptum dixit esse conmissum, ubi puella, de cuius ante nuptiis nichil actum fuerat, uideatur abducta. Gratian. Cum ergo hec illicito coitu sit corrupta, cumque ita sit abducta, id est a domo patris ducta, quod de eius nuptiis nichil actum ante fuerit, raptam appellandam negari non potest. Sed non omnis illicitus coitus, nec cuiuslibet illicita defloratio raptus appellatur. Aliud enim est fornicatio, aliud stuprum, aliud adulterium, aliud incestus, aliud raptus. §. 1. Fornicatio, licet uideatur esse genus cuiuslibet illiciti coitus, qui fit extra uxorem legitimam, tamen specialiter intelligitur in usu uiduarum, uel meretricum, uel concubinarum. §. 2. Stuprum autem est proprie uirginum illicita defloratio, quando uidelicet non precedente coniugali pactione utriusque uoluntate uirgo corrumpitur, patre iniuriam ad animum statim post cognitionem non reuocante. §. 3. Adulterium uero est alieni thori uiolatio. Unde adulterium dicitur quasi ad alterius thorum accessio. §. 4. Incestus est consanguinearum uel affinium abusus. Unde incestuosi dicuntur qui consanguineis uel affinibus suis abutuntur. §. 5. Raptus admittitur, cum puella a domo patris uiolenter ducitur ut corrupta in uxorem habeatur, siue puellae solummodo, siue parentibus tantum, siue utrisque uis illata constiterit; hic morte mulctatur. Sed si ad ecclesiam cum rapta confugerit, priuilegio ecclesiae mortis inpunitatem promeretur. Unde in Concilio Aurelianensi [I. c. 4.] legitur:

C. III. What ought to be done if a ravisher flees to a church with the woman ravished.

Concerning ravishers, we judged that this must be established: if a ravisher flees to a church with the woman ravished and it is established that the woman herself suffered violence, let her immediately be freed from the ravisher's power; and let the ravisher, after immunity from death or penalties has been granted, either be subjected to servitude or have free power to redeem himself. But if it is established that the woman who is ravished has a father and that the girl consented to the ravisher, let her be excused and returned to her father's power, and let the ravisher be bound to make satisfaction to the father according to the foregoing condition.

GRATIAN. From this authority it is clear that sometimes force is inflicted upon the parents and not upon the girl, when it says, "if the girl consented to the ravisher." Sometimes both suffer violence, when it is stated before: "if a ravisher flees with the woman ravished and it is established that the woman herself suffered violence." But force is inflicted upon the girl and not upon the parents when, by the father's will, the girl is violently led away so that she may suffer the intercourse of one to whose union she never furnished consent. But this man appears to have inflicted force neither upon the parents nor upon the girl, since she was violently led away neither while they prohibited it nor while she resisted. For it is one thing to seduce someone by promises, another to inflict force upon her. Hence, because it is proved that force was inflicted upon neither, this man ought not by law to be called a ravisher.

But plunder is said to occur in two ways: sometimes the thing itself is seized; sometimes only the use of the thing itself is violently taken away. The thing itself is seized when it is violently taken from its owner so that it may be held perpetually; but sometimes the thing itself is not sought, but its use is violently usurped while the owner prohibits it. Therefore, this man committed ravishment because he violently took away the flower of virginity from the resisting girl.

C. III. Si raptor cum rapta ad ecclesiam confugerit, quid fieri debeat.

De raptoribus autem id constituendum esse censuimus, ut, si ad ecclesiam raptor cum rapta confugerit, et feminam ipsam uiolentiam pertulisse constiterit, statim liberetur de potestate raptoris, et raptor, mortis uel penarum inpunitate concessa, aut ad seruiendum subiectus sit, aut redimendi se liberam habeat facultatem. Si uero que rapitur patrem habere constiterit, et puella raptori consenserit, potestati patris excusata reddatur, et raptor patri superioris condicionis satisfactione teneatur obnoxius. Gratian. Ex hac auctoritate liquet, quod aliquando uis infertur parentibus, et non puellae, cum dicitur: "si puella raptori consenserit." Aliquando utrique uiolentiam perferunt, cum premittitur: "si raptor cum rapta confugerit, et feminam ipsam uiolentiam pertulisse constiterit." Puellae autem et non parentibus uis infertur, cum uoluntate patris puella uiolenter abducitur, ut eius patiatur concubitum, cuius copulae numquam adhibuit consensum. Hic autem neque parentibus, neque puellae uim intulisse uidetur, cum neque illis prohibentibus, neque illa renitente uiolenter abducta sit. Aliud enim est promissionibus aliquam seducere, aliud uim sibi inferre. Unde, quia neutri uis illata probatur, raptor hic iure dici non debet. Sed rapina dupliciter fieri dicitur; aliquando enim res ipsa rapitur, aliquando ipsius rei usus tantummodo uiolenter eripitur. Res ipsa tunc rapitur, cum uiolenter domino eripitur, ut in perpetuum teneatur; aliquando uero non res ipsa affectatur, sed usus eius domino prohibente uiolenter usurpatur. Hic ergo raptum admisit, quia florem uirginitatis puellae renitenti uiolenter eripuit.

Question II

GRATIAN. PART I. It is now asked whether, after the vice of ravishment has been purged, the ravisher can take the woman ravished as wife. Their union is wholly prohibited by the authority of the holy canons. For it is read in the Council of Chalcedon, c. 27:

> GRATIANUS. I. Pars. Nunc queritur, an purgato uicio rapinae raptor in uxorem possit raptam accipere? Quorum coniunctio auctoritate sanctorum canonum penitus prohibetur. Legitur namque in Concilio Calcedonensi c. 27.:

C. I. Ravishers of girls and those who consent are to be excommunicated.

The holy synod decreed concerning those who seize girls or women under the pretext of living together, and those who cooperate with or connive at the ravishers, that if they are clerics they shall fall from their own rank; but if laypersons, they shall be anathematized.

> C. I. Raptores puellarum et consentientes excommunicentur.
> Eos, qui rapiunt puellas siue mulieres sub nomine simul habitandi, cooperantes, aut conniuentes raptoribus, decreuit sancta sinodus, ut, si quidem clerici sunt, decidant gradu proprio; si uero laici, anathematizentur.

C. II. Ravishers of widows or virgins are to be cast out on account of the enormity of the crime.

Likewise Symmachus, [letter to Caesarius, c. 3]. Therefore, we detest ravishers of widows or virgins on account of the enormity of so great a crime, pursuing more vehemently those who attempt to join sacred virgins, whether willing or unwilling, to themselves in marriage. On account of the atrocity of so unspeakable a crime, we command that they be suspended from communion.

> C. II. Ob inmanitatem sceleris abiciantur raptores uiduarum uel uirginum.
> Item Simacus. [epistola ad Cesarium, c. 3.] Raptores igitur uiduarum uel uirginum ob inmanitatem tanti facinoris detestamur; illos uehementius persequendo, qui sacras uirgines, uel uolentes uel inuitas, matrimonio suo sociare temptauerint. Quos pro tam nefandissimi criminis atrocitate a communione suspendi precipimus.

[C. III.]

Likewise Emperor Jovian in book I of the Code, title On Bishops and Clerics. If anyone has dared—I do not say to seize, but merely to attempt—to join most sacred virgins in marriage, let that person be struck with capital punishment.

> [C. III.]
>
> Item Iouinianus Inp. Codicis libro I. titulo de Episcopis et Clericis. Si quis non dicam rapere, sed attemptare tantummodo matrimonii iungendi causa sacratissimas uirgines ausus fuerit, capitali pena feriatur.

C. IV. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Chalon. Concerning girls who have been seized but not yet betrothed, it is written in the Council of Chalcedon: the holy synod decreed concerning those who seize girls under the pretext of living together, and those who cooperate with and connive at ravishers, that if they are clerics they shall fall from their own rank; but if laypersons, they shall be excommunicated. By these words it is given to be understood how the authors of this evil are to be condemned, when participants in the counsel and those who connive are struck by so great an anathema; and according to canonical authority they can in no way lawfully claim for themselves in lawful marriage the woman ravished.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cabilonensi. De puellis raptis, necdum desponsatis, in Calcedonensi concilio scriptum est, eos, qui rapiunt puellas sub nomine simul habitandi, cooperantes et conniuentes raptoribus, decreuit sancta sinodus, ut, si quidem clerici sunt, decidant a proprio gradu; si uero laici, excommunizentur. Quibus uerbis datur intelligi, qualiter huius mali auctores dampnandi sunt, quando participes consilii et conniuentes tanto anathemate feriuntur et iuxta canonicam auctoritatem ad coniugia legitima raptam sibi iure uendicare nullatenus possunt.

C. V. Ravishers of a widow or virgin are to be excommunicated together with their supporters.

Likewise Gregory, [Pope Gregory II at a Roman Synod]. If anyone seizes a virgin or widow, unless he has betrothed her, or steals her as wife, let him be anathema together with his supporters.

C. V. Excommunicentur raptores uiduae uel uirginis, cum sibi fauentibus.

Item Gregorius. [Papa II. in Sinodo Romana] Si quis uirginem uel uiduam, nisi desponsauerit, rapuerit, uel furatus fuerit in uxorem, cum sibi fauentibus anathema sit.

C. VI. One who seizes another's widow or daughter against the parents' will, or seeks her by the king's favor, is to be excommunicated.

Likewise from the Council of Paris, [I, c. 6]. Let no one presume either to seize a widow or another's daughter against the parents' will, or consider that she is to be sought by the king's favor. But if anyone does so, let that person, removed from the communion of the Church, be struck by the sword of anathema.

PART II. GRATIAN. By these authorities it is clearly given to be understood that the ravisher cannot take the woman ravished as wife. But "ravisher" and "woman ravished" are names of vices, not of persons. When vices have been purged through penance, their names are abolished. Hence Gregory says in a certain homily:

C. VI. Excommunicetur qui uiduam uel filiam alterius extra uoluntatem parentum rapit, aut regis beneficio postulat.

Item ex Concilio Parisiacensi. [I., c. 6.] Nullus aut uiduam, aut filiam alterius extra parentum uoluntatem aut rapere presumat, aut regis beneficio estimet postulandam. Quod si fecerit, ab ecclesiae communione remotus anathematis gladio feriatur. II. Pars. Gratian. His auctoritatibus euidenter datur intelligi, quod raptor in uxorem raptam ducere non ualet. Sed raptor et rapta nomina sunt uiciorum, non personarum. Vicia autem cum per penitenciam purgata fuerint, nomina eorum abolentur. Unde in quadam omelia Gregorius ait:

[C. VII.]

"For before the almighty Lord, even one who erases the fault of falsehood through penance will not be regarded as deceitful."

GRATIAN. Therefore, by the foregoing authorities the woman ravished is prohibited from being joined to the ravisher before the vice of ravishment is abolished, for as long as he is rightly called a ravisher and she a woman ravished. But when she has been restored to her father's power, the ravisher has performed penance for his ravishment, and the will of the parents of both has come together as one, they are not prohibited from being joined to one another. Hence Jerome says:

[C. VII.]

"Apud omnipotentem quippe Dominum nec ille fallax habebitur, qui culpam mendacii per penitenciam delet." [Gratian.] Prohibetur ergo premissis auctoritatibus rapta copulari raptori ante, quam uicium rapinae aboleatur, donec ille raptor, et illa iure rapta appellatur. Ceterum, cum illa patriae potestati restituta fuerit, et raptor suae rapinae penitenciam, egerit, cum uoluntas parentum utriusque in unum conuenerit, non prohibentur ad inuicem copulari. Unde Ieronimus ait:

C. VIII. How many kinds of lawful marriage there are, and that the woman ravished can marry the ravisher by her father's will.

Three lawful marriages are read of in the Scriptures. The first lawful marriage is a chaste virgin lawfully given to a man in virginity, together with the other things that follow among those stated above. The second is a virgin found by a man in a city and joined to him by force. If her father wills, this man will dower her by as much as the father judges and will give the price of her chastity. The third is the aforesaid daughter when found. If the father's will is lacking, he will draw her away from the aforesaid man, hand her over to another, and dower her, and she will be a lawful wife to him. But the first is preferred to these two.

C. VIII. Quot sint legitima coniugia, et quod uoluntate patris rapta raptori nubere potest.

Tria legitima coniugia in scripturis leguntur. Primum legitimum est, uirgo casta in uirginitate data uiro legitime, et reliqua, que secuntur in predictis. Secundum, uirgo in ciuitate deprehensa a uiro, et illi per uim copulata. Si uoluerit pater eius, dotabit eam iste uir, quantum iudicauerit pater, et dabit precium pudicitiae eius. Tertium, filia predicta deprehensa. Si non fuerit uoluntas patris, trahet eam a predicto uiro, et tradet eam alii, et dotabit eam, et legitima erit ei. Sed primum his duobus prefertur.

C. IX. It is permitted to have women who were ravished in marriage with the parents' will.

Likewise Ambrose in the Apology of David, [c. 8]. Finally, the father of that girl, betrothed to no one, who suffered the violence of intercourse will receive fifty silver drachmas; but she herself will remain in marriage.

C. IX. Cum uoluntate parentum raptas in coniugium habere permittitur.

Item Ambrosius in Apologia Dauid. [c. 8.] Denique et puellae illius pater, que uim concubitus nulli desponsata pertulerit, quinquaginta drachmas argenteas accipiet; ipsa autem in coniugio permanebit.

C. X. After penance, lawful marriages are to be conceded to the ravisher and the woman ravished.

Likewise from the Council of Meaux, [c. 65]. But if, when this constitution has been promulgated to everyone, they have not yet taken in marriage with the parents' will under the name of betrothal or dower those women whom they had seized, let them be separated from union with them and subjected to public penance; but let the women ravished be lawfully restored to their parents. When public penance has been completed, if age demands relief from incontinence, let them be joined in a marriage agreed upon by both sides. We do not establish a rule in these matters but—as we may use the words of the great Leo—consider what is more tolerable. But if one of the spouses dies and the one who has completed public penance survives, let that person not presume to repeat marriage unless the bishop has granted some indulgence so that a graver offense can be removed.

GRATIAN. By this authority of the Council of Meaux, the woman ravished is not permitted to be joined to the ravisher after penance; rather, each is permitted after penance to be joined in lawful marriage, so that the woman ravished may marry after penance not the ravisher but another. Similarly, after penance the ravisher is permitted to have as wife not the woman whom he ravished but another. For since the ravisher and the woman ravished are commanded to be subjected to penance, if that authority permitted their union with one another, it would be said in vain near the end of the chapter: "But if one of the spouses dies and the one who has completed public penance survives, let that person not presume to repeat marriage." For whichever of them died, the one who completed penance would remain as survivor. Therefore, by this authority the ravisher is not proved able to take the woman ravished in marriage. Rather, it is found in the Council at Aachen that they cannot be joined to one another even by the will of the parents. For it is read as follows in the aforesaid council:

> C. X. Post penitenciam raptori uel raptae licita coniugia concedantur.
> Item ex Concilio Meldensi. [c. 65.] Si autem necdum eas, quas rapuerant, cum uoluntate parentum sub desponsationis uel dotalitii nomine in coniugium duxerunt, quando hec constitutio omnibus fuerit promulgata, ab eorum coniunctione separentur, et publicae penitenciae subigantur; raptae autem parentibus legaliter restituantur. Peracta uero penitencia publica, si etas incontinentiam exegerit, ex utrisque partibus placito coniugio socientur. Non in his regulam constituimus, sed (ut uerbis magni Leonis utamur) quid sit tollerabilius estimamus. Quod si unus ex coniugatis obierit, et is, qui publicam penitenciam exegerit et superstes extiterit, iterare coniugium non presumat, nisi episcopus aliquam concesserit indulgentiam, ut grauiorem possit amouere offensam. Gratian. Hac auctoritate Meldensis concilii non permittitur raptae raptori post penitenciam copulari, sed permittitur utrique post penitenciam legitimo coniugio copulari, ut rapta uidelicet non raptori, sed alii post penitenciam nubat. Similiter raptor post penitenciam non eam, quam rapuit, sed aliam permittitur habere uxorem. Cum enim raptor et rapta penitenciae subici precipiantur, si utriusque copulam auctoritas illa permitteret, frustra circa finem capituli diceretur: "Quod si unus ex coniugatis obierit, et is, qui publicam penitenciam exegerit, superstes extiterit, iterare coniugium non presumat." Eorum namque quolibet decedente, qui penitenciam exegit superstes remanebit. Non ergo hac auctoritate raptor probatur in coniugium rapta posse accipere. Potius inuenitur in Concilio apud Aquasgrani, quod nec etiam uoluntate parentum possunt adinuicem copulari. Sic enim in prefato concilio legitur:

C. XI. Ravishers cannot have the women ravished as spouses even with the parents' will.

It was resolved that those who seize, steal, or seduce women shall in no way have them as wives, although the women afterward agree with them, or the men have dowered them, or have received them in marriage with their parents' consent.

GRATIAN. This authority does not prejudice the authority of Jerome, especially since the latter is supported by the testimony of divine law. Therefore, after penance has been completed, the ravisher will lawfully be able to join to himself the woman whom he ravished, unless the girl's father wishes to withdraw her from the ravisher.

[PALEA. Likewise in book V of the Code, title On Marriages: The discipline of the laws does not permit even a son under paternal power to be compelled against his will to take a wife. Therefore, as you desire, provided that the precepts of law are observed, you are not prevented from joining in marriage to yourself the woman whom you wish, yet in such a way that your father's consent accedes to the marriage being contracted. Likewise in the same work, [law 20]: In the union of daughters placed under paternal power, let the father's decision be awaited. Likewise in the Digest, On the Rites of Marriage, [law 2]: Marriages cannot exist unless all consent, that is, those who come together and those under whose power they are. Likewise in book I of the Institutes, title On Marriages: Roman citizens contract lawful marriages among themselves when they come together according to the precepts of the laws—males who have reached puberty and females who are of marriageable age, whether they are heads of households or children under paternal power—provided, however, that children under paternal power possess the consent of the parents under whose power they are. For both civil and natural reason persuade that this ought to be done, to such an extent that the parent's authorization ought to precede.]

> C. XI. Nec etiam uoluntate parentum raptores raptas possunt habere coniuges.
> Placuit, ut hi, qui, rapiunt feminas uel furantur, aut seducunt, eas nullatenus habeant uxores, quamuis eis postmodum conueniant, aut eas dotauerint, uel nuptialiter cum consensu parentum suorum acceperint. Gratian. Hec auctoritas non preiudicat auctoritati Ieronimi, maxime cum illa testimonio diuinae legis nitatur. Legitime igitur post peractam penitenciam raptor poterit sibi copulare quam rapuit nisi pater puellae illam raptori detrahere uoluerit. [PALEA. Item Codicis libro 5. titulo de nuptiis: Nec filium quidem familias inuitum ad ducendam uxorem cogi legum disciplina permittit. Igitur, sicut desideras, obseruatis iuris preceptis, sociare coniugio tuo quam uolueris, non inpediris; ita tamen, ut in contrahendis nuptiis patris tui consensus accedat. Item in eodem: [leg. 20.] In coniunctione filiarum in sacris positarum patris expectetur arbitrium. Item Digestis de ritibus nuptialibus: [leg. 2.] Consistere non possunt nuptiae, nisi consentiant omnes, id est qui coeunt, quorumque in potestate sunt. Item Institutionum libro I. titulo de nuptiis: Iustas autem nuptias inter se ciues Romani contrahunt, qui secundum precepta legum coeunt; masculi quidem puberes, feminae autem uiripotentes, siue patresfamilias sint siue filiifamilias, dum tamen filiifamilias consensum habeant parentum, quorum in potestate sunt. Nam hoc fieri debere et ciuilis et naturalis ratio persuadet in tantum, ut iussus parentis precedere debeat.]

Part III: On Consecration (De consecratione)

THIRD PART OF THE DECRETUM: ON CONSECRATION

> DECRETI PARS TERTIA DE CONSECRATIONE

Distinction I

GRATIAN.

> GRATIANUS.

[C. I.]

"That the consecration of churches and celebrations of Masses ought not to take place anywhere other than in places consecrated to the Lord, except under great necessity, is clear to all to whom the precepts of the New and Old Testaments are known."

> [C. I.]
>
> "De ecclesiarum consecratione, et missarum celebrationibus non alibi quam in sacratis Domino locis absque magna necessitate fieri debere, liquet omnibus, quibus sunt nota noui et ueteris testamenti precepta."

[C. II.]

"For we read that Moses, at the Lord's command, made and consecrated the tabernacle, together with its table and altar and bronze vessels and utensils for fulfilling divine worship; and we know that he consecrated them not only by divine prayers but also anointed them with the anointing of holy oil, at the Lord's command. But how these things were done, and how none other than priests imbued with sacred anointing and consecrated to the Lord together with holy vestments, and the Levites, handled, carried, erected, and took down the sacred things themselves, is found in the law of the Lord, in the very ordinances that were written through Moses at the Lord's command. How, therefore, David, the most devout of kings, enlarged the worship of God and wished to build the temple of the Lord, but was prohibited because of the great quantity of blood that he had shed, and how he himself had gathered the expenses; and how Solomon his son, at the Lord's command and with his assistance, completed what David himself had desired to do, and consecrated the temple with the altar and the other things for carrying out divine worship, is read in the Book of Kings.

§ 1. Therefore at that time Solomon held a celebrated festivity, and all Israel with him, a great multitude from the entrance of Hamath to the brook of Egypt, before the Lord our God for seven days and seven days, that is, fourteen days; and on the eighth day he dismissed the peoples.

§ 2. Therefore the Jews held the places in which they sacrificed to the Lord to have been consecrated by divine supplications, nor did they offer gifts to the Lord in places other than those dedicated to God. For if the Jews, who served the shadow of the law, did these things, much more ought we—to whom the truth has been disclosed, and grace and truth have been given through Jesus—to build temples to the Lord and adorn them as well as we can; devoutly and solemnly to consecrate them by divine prayers and holy anointings, together with their altars and vessels, vestments also, and the remaining utensils for fulfilling divine worship; and to celebrate Masses and offer sacrifices to the Lord in none other than places consecrated to the Lord by bishops and not by chorepiscopi—who have often been prohibited from doing so—unless, as was said before, the highest necessity requires it. And if the highest necessity compels this to be done, offerings are not prohibited from being made in houses.

§ 3. But if, as is read in chapter 27 of the Council of Laodicea, those who have not been ordained by bishops cannot exorcize either in churches or in houses, much more ought the ministries of a higher grade not to be performed, nor offices carried out or sacrifices offered, except by those who have been consecrated to the grades whose functions they ought to exercise. But that offerings ought not to be made in houses, as was touched upon a little above, is held to be prohibited in chapter 59 of the same council thus: 'Offerings ought not to be celebrated in houses by bishops or presbyters.'"

[C. II.]

"Tabernaculum enim Moysen Domino precipiente fecisse et sacrasse, cum mensa et altari eius, et ereis uasis et utensilibus ad diuinum cultum explendum legimus, et non solum diuinis precibus ea sacrasse, sed etiam sancti olei unctione, Domino iubente, perlinisse nouimus. Qualiter autem hec facta sunt, et non alii ipsa sacra, quam sacerdotes sacra unctione delibuti, Dominoque cum uestibus sanctis sacrati, et Leuitae tractabant, ferebant, erigebant, et deponebant, in ipsis institutionibus, que iubente Domino per Moysem conscriptae sunt, in lege Domini reperitur. Qualiter ergo Dauid piissimus regum amplificauerit cultum Dei, et templum Domini edificare uoluit, sed propter multum sanguinem, quem effuderat, prohibitus est, et ipse expensas collegerat; Salomon quoque filius eius, quod ipse facere optauerat, iubente et auxiliante Domino perfecit, et templum cum altari, et reliqua ad diuinum cultum peragendum consecrauit, in libro Regum legitur. §. 1. Fecit ergo Salomon in tempore illo festiuitatem celebrem, et omnis Israel cum eo, multitudo magna ab introitu Emath usque ad riuum Egipti coram Domino Deo nostro septem diebus et septem diebus, id est quatuordecim diebus, et in die octauo dimisit populos. §. 2. Iudei ergo loca, in quibus Domino sacrificabant, diuinis habebant supplicationibus consecrata, nec in aliis, quam in Deo dicatis locis, munera Domino offerebant. Si enim Iudei, qui umbrae legis deseruiebant, hec faciebant, multo magis, quibus ueritas patefacta, et gratia et ueritas per Iesum data est, templa Domino edificare, et, prout possumus melius, ornare, eaque diuinis precibus, et sanctis unctionibus suis cum altaribus, et uasis, uestibus quoque et reliquis ad diuinum cultum explendum utensilibus deuote et solempniter sacrare, et non in aliis, quam in Domino sacratis ab episcopis, et non a chorepiscopis (qui sepe prohibiti sunt, nisi, ut predictum est, summa necessitate exigente), missas celebrare, nec sacrificia Domino offerre debemus. Et hoc si summa necessitas agere conpulerit, non in domibus offerre prohibita sunt. §. 3. Si autem, ut legitur in concilio Laudicensi capitulo 27., quod hi, qui non sunt ab episcopis ordinati, tam in ecclesiis quam in domibus exorcizare non possunt, multo magis maioris gradus ministeria nisi ab eis, qui ad eos gradus sunt consecrati, quibus fungi debent, offitia agi debent uel sacrificia offerri licet. Quod autem, ut paulo superius prelibatum est, oblationes in domibus offerri non debent, in eodem concilio c. 59. prohibitum habetur ita: 'Non oportet in domibus oblationes celebrari ab episcopis uel presbiteris.'"

C. III. The consecration of churches ought not to take place without a Mass.

Likewise Pope Hyginus, c. 5. PART II. All basilicas must always be consecrated with a Mass.

§ 1. And as for ruined churches, where there are more than are necessary, or they are of greater size than can be restored from the things belonging to them, let a measure be found by the bishop's providence whereby they can subsist.

> C. III. Ecclesiarum consecratio absque missa fieri non debet.
> Item Iginus Papa, c. 5. II. Pars. Omnes basilicae cum missa debent semper consecrari. §. 1. Et ecclesiae destructae, ubi autem plures sunt, quam necesse sit, aut maioris magnitudinis, quam ut ex rebus ad eas pertinentibus restaurari possint, episcopi prouidentia modus inueniatur, qualiter consistere possint.

C. IV. A new church shall not be dedicated without a precept of the apostolic see.

Gelasius, c. 34. PART III. Concerning the consecration of places, although it was briefly embraced above, it has also been disclosed to me that some presume to consecrate churches or oratories that have been made without a precept of the apostolic see.

> C. IV. Absque precepto sedis apostolicae noua non dedicetur ecclesia.
> Gelasius c. 34. III. Pars. De locorum consecratione, quamuis superius strictim fuerit conprehensum, michi quoque patefactum est, quod absque precepto sedis apostolicae nonnulli factas ecclesias uel oratoria sacrare presumant.

C. V. A new church shall not be dedicated without the authority of the Supreme Pontiff.

The same. The synodal precepts that were directed from our see to the province a few months ago both agree with the ancient canons, and we have added those things that are proved to be lacking; and it is established in both respects that a newly founded church cannot be dedicated without the authority of the Supreme Pontiff. We reasonably judge that you suspended Masses from this basilica, which had been brought into use for a procession in such a way. But because a devoted place ought not long to remain empty of the grace of the ministries, dearest brother, having received the tenor of our authority, you shall consecrate it in the name of those martyrs whom the report contains, so that the gathering of the peoples whom you directed eagerly to assemble there may, with the ecclesiastical rules and canons preserved, have an unimpaired assembly secured by religion.

> C. V. Sine auctoritate summi Pontificis noua non dedicetur ecclesia.
> Idem. Precepta sinodalia, que ante paucos menses de sede nostra ad prouinciam sunt directa, et antiquis canonibus consentiunt, et ea, que minus esse probantur, addidimus, et in utraque parte constat, sine summi Pontificis auctoritate ecclesiam nouiter conditam non posse dedicari; teque ex hac basilica, que taliter fuerat ad cultum processionis adducta, suspendisse missas probabiliter conputamus. Sed quia deuotus locus non debet a ministeriorum gratia diu uacuus permanere, frater karissime, eorum martirum nomine, quorum relatio continet, auctoritatis nostrae suscepta serie consecrabis, ut populorum frequentatio, quam illic auide conuenire mandasti, seruatis regulis ecclesiasticis et canonibus, integrum habeat firmata religione conuentum.

C. VI. Basilicas that have been built without the authority of the apostolic see shall not be dedicated.

The same, [to the Bishops throughout Lucania, c. 6]. Let no one dare to dedicate newly established basilicas without the customary precepts having been sought, nor let bishops strive to claim for themselves clerics belonging to another's authority.

[And c. 11.] § 1. For since we too strive greatly to guard the decrees of venerable sanctions, and believe that even those things which may perhaps seem capable of being relaxed for the advantage of some utility ought to be relaxed without injury to them; and since we desire to say nothing rashly against reverence for the salutary rules; and since the apostolic see, by the Lord's favor, endeavors with a devout and pious purpose to hold above all those things that have been prescribed by the paternal canons: it is quite unworthy for anyone, either of the pontiffs or of the orders that follow, to reject this observance which he sees the see of blessed Peter both follow and teach. And it is quite fitting that the whole body of the Church agree with itself in that observance which it sees flourishing there where the Lord placed the primacy of the whole Church.

> C. VI. Non dedicentur basilicae, que preter auctoritatem apostolicae sedis fuerint edificatae.
> Idem. [Episcopis per Lucaniam c. 6] Basilicas nouiter institutas, non petitis ex more preceptionibus, dedicare nemo audeat, nec ambiant sibimet episcopi uendicare clericos potestatis alienae. [Et c. 11.] §. 1. Cum enim decreta uenerabilium sanctionum nos quoque magnopere custodire nitamur, ac sine eorum dispendio etiam illa, que pro alicuius utilitatis conpendio fortasse uideantur, laxanda credamus, cumque nobis contra salutarium reuerentiam regularum cupiamus nichil dicere temere, et cum sedes apostolica superior his omnibus, fauente Domino, que paternis canonibus sunt prefixa pio deuotoque studeat tenere proposito: satis indignum est, quemquam uel pontificum uel ordinum subsequentium hanc obseruantiam refutare, quam B. Petri sedem et sequi uideat et docere; satisque conueniens sit, ut totum corpus ecclesiae in hac sibimet obseruatione concordet, quam illic uigere conspiciat, ubi Dominus ecclesiae totius posuit principatum.

C. VII. Public processions shall not take place in oratories that are consecrated without the authority of the apostolic see.

The same to John, Bishop of Sora. It is indeed certain that it was established by our precepts that no one should think a public procession was to be held in a church or oratory that is not recorded as having been dedicated with the permission of our see, lest founders leap beyond the statutes of the rules by furtive subreptions. But because Megetia, an illustrious woman, suggested to us by the presentation of a petition that she had buried the little bodies of her people in her own possessions, dearest brother, from a regard for humanity you are to know that ministries are to be furnished for the solemnity only in the places embraced in the petition—which does not stain the former statutes by funerals and tombs—so that the divine offices may be celebrated solely in the name of the deceased, with public attendance and procession ceasing.

> C. VII. Publicae processiones non fiant in oratoriis, que preter auctoritatem sedis apostolicae consecrantur.
> Idem Iohanni, Episcopo Sorano. Certum est quidem nostris preceptionibus constitutum, ne quis in ecclesia aut in oratorio, quod sedis nostrae non legitur permissione dedicatum, processionem publicam putaret inpendi, ne conditores furtiuis subreptionibus contra regularum statuta prosilirent. Sed quia Megetia spectabilis femina petitorii nobis oblatione suggessit, in possessionibus propriis suorum corpuscula condidisse, frater karissime, humanitatis intuitu, quod priora statuta non maculet funeribus et sepulchris, tantum in conprehensis petitorio locis ministeria noueris pro solempnitate prestanda, ut defunctorum nomine solummodo diuina celebrentur offitia, publica frequentatione et processione cessante.

C. VIII. A church ought not to be established without the assent of the apostolic see.

Likewise Pope Nicholas to the Clergy and People of the Church of Nona. How will the Church, that is, the gathering of Catholics, be established without the assent of the apostolic see, when according to the sacred decrees not even the newly constructed basilica, which is known to embrace within itself that very multitude of Catholics, ought to be built without a precept of the Pope?

> C. VIII. Sine nutu sedis apostolicae ecclesia non debet institui.
> Item Nykolaus Papa Clero et Plebi Nonensis Ecclesiae. Ecclesia, id est catholicorum collectio, quomodo sine apostolicae sedis instituetur nutu, quando iuxta sacra decreta nec ipsa debet absque preceptione Papae basilica nouiter construi, que ipsam catholicorum intra semet amplecti cateruam dinoscitur?

C. IX. A church shall not be built without the bishop's designation.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans. PART IV. Let no one build a church before the bishop of the city comes, fixes a cross there, publicly marks out the atrium, and, beforehand, the one who wishes to build specifies what things will suffice for lights, maintenance, and the stipends of the keepers; and after showing the donation, let him thus build the house, and after it has been consecrated, let him sprinkle the atrium of that church with holy water.

> C. IX. Sine designatione episcopi non edificetur ecclesia.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. IV. Pars. Nemo ecclesiam edificet ante, quam ciuitatis episcopus ueniat, et ibidem crucem figat, publice atrium designet, et ante prefiniat, qui edificare uult, que ad luminaria, et ad custodiam, et stipendia custodum sufficiant, et ostensa donatione sic domum edificet, et post, quam consecrata fuerit, atrium eiusdem ecclesiae sancta aqua conspergat.

C. X. A church that is built for the profit of greed shall not be consecrated.

Likewise from the Council of Braga, [II, c. 6]. If anyone builds a basilica not from devotion of faith but for the profit of greed, so that he may divide with the clerics half of whatever is collected from the offering of the people because he founded the basilica on his own land, this ought henceforth to be observed: that none of the bishops consent to so abominable a vow, nor dare to consecrate a basilica that was founded not for the patronage of the saints but rather under a tributary condition.

> C. X. Non consecretur ecclesia, que pro questu cupiditatis edificatur.
> Item ex Concilio Bracarensi. [II. c. 6.] Si quis basilicam non pro deuotione fidei, sed pro questu cupiditatis edificat, ut quicquid de oblatione populi colligitur medium cum clericis diuidat, eo quod basilicam in terra sua condiderit, hoc de cetero obseruari debet, ut nullus episcoporum tam abhominabili uoto consentiat, nec basilicam, que non pro sanctorum patrocinio, sed magis sub tributaria condicione est condita, audeat consecrare.

C. XI. Sacrifices shall be offered only upon an altar and in places consecrated to God.

Likewise Bishop Felix to all the orthodox, [letter I]. PART V. Just as none other than priests consecrated to the Lord ought to celebrate Masses or offer sacrifices upon the altar, so it is not permitted to sing Masses or offer sacrifices in places other than those consecrated to the Lord, that is, in tabernacles dedicated by pontiffs with divine prayers, unless the highest necessity compels it. It is therefore more satisfactory not to sing or hear Mass than to do so in those places where it ought not to take place, unless it happens because of the highest necessity, since necessity has no law. Hence it is written: “See that you do not offer your holocausts in every place that you see, but in every place that the Lord your God shall choose.” Nevertheless, it is in no way permitted for offerings to be celebrated in houses by bishops or presbyters.

C. XI. Sacrificia non nisi super altare et in locis Deo consecratis offerantur.

Item Felix Episcopus omnibus orthodoxis. [ep. I.] V. Pars. Sicut non alii, quam sacrati Domino sacerdotes debent missas celebrare, nec sacrificia super altare offerre, sic nec in aliis, quam Domino consecratis locis, id est in tabernaculis diuinis precibus a pontificibus delibatis, missas cantare, aut sacrificia offerre licet, nisi summa coegerit necessitas. Satius ergo est missam non cantare, aut non audire, quam in his locis, ubi fieri non oportet; nisi pro summa necessitate contingat, quoniam necessitas legem non habet. Unde scriptum est: "Vide, ne offeras holocausta tua in omni loco, quem uideris, sed in omni loco, quem elegerit Dominus Deus tuus." In domibus tamen ab episcopis siue presbiteris oblationes celebrari nullatenus licet.

C. XII. The solemnities of Masses shall be celebrated only in consecrated places.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur. We judge that the solemnities of Masses are to be celebrated not everywhere, but in places consecrated by the bishop or where he has permitted it.

C. XII. Non nisi in locis sacratis missarum solempnia celebrentur.

Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. Missarum solempnia non ubicumque, sed in locis ab episcopo consecratis, uel ubi ipse permiserit, celebranda esse censemus.

C. XIII. Churches shall be consecrated by divine prayers.

Likewise Clement, [letter II to James]. Construct churches in suitable and useful places, which ought to be consecrated by divine prayers and burdened by no one.

C. XIII. precibus diuinis consecrentur ecclesiae.

Item Clemens. [epist. II. ad Iacobum.] Ecclesias per congrua et utilia facite loca, que diuinis precibus sacrare oportet, et non a quoquam grauari.

C. XIV. It is not permitted to sacrifice and celebrate Masses except in consecrated places.

The same. Here, therefore, that is, while placed in the present life, you ought to recognize the will of God, where there is a place both for acting and for sacrificing, since in other places it is not permitted to sacrifice and celebrate Masses, except in those in which the bishop has commanded, or which have been consecrated by a regularly ordained bishop, one who, namely, holds a city. For otherwise these things are not to be done or rightly celebrated. Likewise Pope Sylvester, [presiding in a general synod, said]:

C. XIV. Sacrificare et missas celebrare non licet, nisi in locis sacratis.

Idem. Hic ergo, id est in presenti uita positos, oportet uos agnoscere uoluntatem Dei, ubi et agendi, et sacrificandi locus est, quoniam in aliis locis sacrificari et missas celebrari non licet, nisi in his, in quibus episcopus iusserit, aut ab episcopo regulariter ordinato, tenente uidelicet ciuitatem, consecrata fuerint.

Aliter enim non sunt hec agenda, nec rite celebranda. Item Siluester Papa: [in generali residens Sinodo dixit]

C. XV. A priest who presumes to celebrate Masses in unconsecrated places shall be cast out.

Let no presbyter presume to celebrate Masses except in places consecrated by the bishop, if he wishes henceforth to be a participant in his priesthood.

C. XV. Abiciatur sacerdos, qui in locis non consecratis missas celebrare presumit.

Nullus presbiter missas celebrare presumat, nisi in sacratis ab episcopo locis, qui sui particeps de cetero uoluerit esse sacerdotii.

C. XVI. The solemnities of dedications shall be celebrated every year, and a church about whose consecration there is doubt shall also be consecrated.

Likewise Pope Felix to all the orthodox, [letter I, cc. 1 and 2]. PART VI. The solemnities of the dedications of churches and of priests are to be celebrated in each year.

§ 1. Concerning the consecrations of churches, whenever doubt exists, so that neither a certain writing nor witnesses exist from whom the consecration may be known, know without any doubt that they are to be consecrated; nor does such trepidation create a repetition, since that which is not known to have been done is not shown to have been repeated.

C. XVI. Singulis annis dedicationum solempnitates celebrentur, et consecretur etiam ecclesia, de cuius consecratione dubitatur.

Item Felix Papa omnibus orthodoxis. [ep. I. c. 1. et 2.] VI. Pars. Solempnitates dedicationum ecclesiarum, et sacerdotum, per singulos annos sunt celebrandae. §. 1. De ecclesiarum consecrationibus quociens dubitatur, ut nec certa scriptura, nec testes existunt, a quibus consecratio sciatur, absque ulla dubitatione scitote eas esse sacrandas; nec talis trepidatio facit iterationem, quoniam non monstratur esse iteratum quod nescitur factum.

C. XVII. On the same matter, and that the solemnity of dedications is to be celebrated for eight days.

Likewise Gregory. The solemnities of the dedications of churches are solemnly to be celebrated in each year, with the Lord himself giving an example, who, giving everyone a form for doing this, came with the rest of the peoples to celebrate that same festivity at the feast of the dedication of the temple, as it is written: “The feast of the dedication took place at Jerusalem, and it was winter, and Jesus walked in the temple in Solomon’s porch.” But that the dedication feast is to be celebrated for eight days you will find in the Book of Kings, when the dedication of the temple has been read through.

C. XVII. De eodem et quod octo diebus dedicationum solempnitas est celebranda.

Item Gregorius. Solempnitates dedicationum ecclesiarum sunt solempniter celebrandae per singulos annos, ipso Domino exemplum dante, qui ad festum dedicationis templi, omnibus id faciendi dans formam, cum reliquis populis eandem festiuitatem celebraturus uenit, sicut scriptum est: "Facta sunt encenia in Ierosolimis, et hiemps erat, et ambulabat Iesus in templo in porticu Salomonis." Quod autem octo diebus encenia sint celebranda, in libro Regum perlecta dedicatione templi reperies.

C. XVIII. Churches about whose consecration there is doubt shall be consecrated.

Likewise from the Council of Meaux, c. 8. PART VII. Churches or altars that are of doubtful consecration shall be consecrated, and superfluous altars shall be destroyed.

> C. XVIII. Consecrentur ecclesiae, de quarum consecratione dubitatur.
> Item ex Concilio Meldensi, c. 8. VII. Pars. Ecclesiae uel altaria, que ambigua sunt de consecratione, consecrentur, et superflua altaria destruantur.

C. XIX. When a church is to be consecrated anew, and when it is only to be exorcized with salts.

Likewise Pope Hyginus. If the altar has been moved, let the church be consecrated anew; if the walls are changed but not the altar, let it only be exorcized with salts.

§ 1. If a church has been violated by homicide or adultery, let it be most diligently purified and consecrated anew.

> C. XIX. Quando ecclesia est denuo consecranda, et salibus tantum exorcizanda.
> Item Iginus Papa. Si motum fuerit altare, denuo consecretur ecclesia; si parietes mutantur, et non altare, salibus tantum exorcizetur. §. 1. Si homicidio uel adulterio ecclesia uiolata fuerit, diligentissime expurgetur et denuo consecretur.

C. XX. When a church once consecrated to God is to be consecrated again.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea. Consecration ought not to be applied again to churches once consecrated to God, unless they have been either consumed by fire, polluted by the shedding of blood, or polluted by someone's semen; because just as an infant, once baptized by any priest in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, ought not to be baptized again, so neither is a place dedicated to God to be consecrated again, except for those causes that we named above—provided, however, that those who consecrated it held the faith of the Holy Trinity.

> C. XX. Ecclesia semel Deo consecrata quando sit iterum consecranda.
> Item ex Niceno Concilio. Ecclesiis semel Deo consecratis non debet iterum consecratio adhiberi, nisi aut ab igne exustae, aut sanguinis effusione, aut cuiusquam semine pollutae fuerint; quia sicut infans, a qualicumque sacerdote in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti semel baptizatus, non debet iterum baptizari: ita nec locus Deo dicatus iterum consecrandus est, nisi propter eas causas, quas superius nominauimus; si tamen fidem sanctae Trinitatis tenuerint qui eum consecrauerunt.

C. XXI. On the same matter.

Likewise Pope John, [to the Bishops of Italy]. Wherever you find churches of the Arians, consecrate them as Catholic by divine prayers and works without any delay, just as we too did when we were at Constantinople on account of King Theodoric's affair.

> C. XXI. De eodem.
> Item Iohannes Papa. [Episcopis Italiae.] Ecclesias Arrianorum ubicumque inueneritis, catholicas eas diuinis precibus et operibus absque ulla mora consecrate, sicut et nos fecimus cum pro causa Theodorici regis Constantinopolim fuissemus.

C. XXII. On the same matter.

Likewise Gregory in the Dialogues, [book III, c. 30]. When a church of the Arians in the region of this city called Subura had remained closed for as long as two years, it was resolved that it ought to be dedicated in the Catholic faith, with relics of blessed Sebastian and of the martyr Saint Agatha brought in there; and this was done.

> C. XXII. De eodem.
> Item Gregorius in Dialogo. [lib. III. c. 30.] Arrianorum ecclesia in regione urbis huius, que Subura dicitur, cum clausa usque biennium permansisset, placuit, ut in fide catholica (introductis illic B. Sebastiani et S. Agathae martiris reliquiis) dedicari debuisset, quod et factum est.

C. XXIII. On the same matter.

Pope Agapetus, a Catholic vessel, trumpet of the Gospel, herald of justice, cleansed by his Catholic prayers the sacred coverings of the altar and see that had been infected by the sacrilegious fables of Anthimus.

> C. XXIII. De eodem.
> Agapitus Papa uas catholicum, euangelii tuba, preco iusticiae, sacra altaris sedisque uelamina, sacrilegis Antimi infecta fabulis, suis catholicis precibus eluit.

C. XXIV. On the same matter.

Likewise Pope Julius, [letter I to Eutherius, c. 4]. Concerning the fabric of any church that is to be restored if it has fallen into ruin, and whether the solemnity of consecration ought to be repeated in that place in which there were no sacred relics, we judge that nothing hinders this if exorcized water is by no means sprinkled through it, because we know that the consecration of any church in which an altar of the Holy Spirit is not set up is only the celebration of Masses. And therefore, if any basilica of the saints has been renewed even from its foundations without movement of the altar, without any doubt, when the solemnity of Masses has been celebrated in it, the consecration of the whole sanctification will be completed. But if the sacred relics that it had have been removed, it will again receive the reverence of sanctification by their deposition and by the solemnity of Masses.

> C. XXIV. De eodem.
> Item Iulius Papa. [ad Eutherium epist. I. C. 4.] De fabrica uero cuiuslibet ecclesiae instauranda, si diruta fuerit, et si in eo loco consecrationis solempnitas debeat iterari, in quo sanctuaria non fuerint, nichil iudicamus officere, si per eam minime aqua exorcizata iactetur, quia consecrationem cuiuslibet ecclesiae, in qua Spiritus sancti ara non ponitur, celebritatem tantum scimus esse missarum. Et ideo, si qua sanctorum basilica a fundamentis etiam fuerit innouata sine altaris motione, sine aliqua dubitatione, cum in ea fuerit missarum celebrata solempnitas, totius consecratio sanctificationis inplebitur. Si uero sanctuaria, que habebat, ablata sunt, rursus earum depositione, et missarum solempnitate reuerentiam sanctificationis accipiet.

C. XXV. Without the bishop's permission an altar shall not be erected in a consecrated church.

Likewise from the Decrees of Pope Hormisdas, c. 10. PART VIII. Let no presbyter erect another altar in a consecrated church unless it has been sanctified or permitted by the bishop of the place, so that there may be a distinction between sacred and not sacred; nor let him feign a dedication unless there is one. But if he has done so, let him be degraded if he is a cleric; if a layman, let him be anathematized.

> C. XXV. Absque episcopi permissu in ecclesia consecrata non erigatur altare.
> Item ex Decretis Ormisdae Papae c. 10. VIII. Pars. Nullus presbiter in ecclesia consecrata aliud altare erigat, nisi quod ab episcopo loci fuerit sanctificatum uel permissum, ut sit discretio inter sacrum et non sacrum; nec dedicationem fingat, nisi sit. Quod si fecerit, degradetur, si clericus est; si laicus, anathematizetur.

C. XXVI. Altars erected without relics of saints shall be overturned.

Likewise from the African Council, c. 50. It was resolved that altars which are erected here and there throughout the fields and villages as memorials of martyrs, in which no body or relics of a martyr are proved to have been buried, are to be overturned, if it can be done, by the bishops who preside over those places. But if this is not allowed because of popular disturbances, let the peoples be admonished not to frequent those places, so that those who think rightly may not be held overcome there by any superstition. And let no memorial of martyrs whatsoever be accepted as genuine unless either a body or certain relics are there, or unless the origin of someone's habitation, possession, or passion is handed down by a most trustworthy origin. For altars that are erected anywhere through dreams and through the empty, supposed revelations of any persons are to be rejected in every way.

> C. XXVI. Euertantur altaria, que sine sanctorum reliquiis eriguntur.
> Item ex Concilio Affricano, c. 50. Placuit, ut altaria, que passim per agros et per uillas tamquam memoriae martirum constituuntur, in quibus nullum corpus aut reliquiae martiris conditae probantur, ab episcopis, qui eisdem locis presunt, si fieri potest, euertantur. Si autem hoc propter tumultus populares non sinitur, plebes ammoneantur, ne illa loca frequentent, ut qui recte sapiunt nulla ibi superstitione deuicti teneantur. Et omnino nulla memoria martirum probabiliter accipiatur nisi ubi aut corpus aut certae sunt reliquiae, aut ubi origo alicuius habitationis, uel possessionis, uel passionis fidelissima origine traditur. Nam que per sompnia et per inanes quasi reuelationes quorumlibet hominum ubicumque constituuntur altaria, omnimodo reprobentur.

C. XXVII. A church in which a pagan is found buried is not to be consecrated.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, c. 3. It is not permitted to consecrate a church where a pagan is buried, nor to celebrate Masses in it; rather, it is necessary to cast him outside and for the church to be cleansed.

> C. XXVII. Non est consecranda ecclesia, in qua paganus sepultus inuenitur.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi c. 3. Ecclesiam, ubi paganus sepultus est, non liceat consecrari, neque missas in ea celebrare, sed iactare foras, et mundari oportet.

C. XXVIII. Concerning a church in which the corpses of the faithful or of unbelievers are buried.

Likewise from the Council of Cologne. It is not permitted to sanctify a church in which corpses of unbelieving dead persons are buried; but if it seems fit to be consecrated, after the bodies have been dug out from it and the walls or timbers of that place have been scraped, let it be rebuilt. But if it was previously consecrated, it is permitted to celebrate Masses in it, provided, however, that those who were buried in it were faithful.

> C. XXVIII. De ecclesia, in qua cadauera fidelium siue infidelium sepeliuntur.
> Item ex Concilio Agrippinensi. Ecclesiam, in qua mortuorum cadauera infidelium sepeliuntur, sanctificare non licet; sed si apta uidetur ad consecrandum, inde euulsis corporibus, et rasis parietibus uel tignis eius loci, reedificetur. Sed si hec consecrata prius fuerit, missas in ea celebrare licet; si tamen fideles fuerunt qui in ea sepulti sunt.

C. XXIX. The sacred mysteries shall not be distributed over tombs in the field.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [Council of Braga, cc. 68 and 69; Greek synods]. Ignorant and presumptuous clerics ought not to carry ministries to tombs in the field or distribute sacraments there, but either in a church or in a basilica where relics of martyrs have been deposited, where offerings are customarily offered for the deceased.

§ 1. Nor is it permitted for Christians to carry meals to the tombs of the deceased and sacrifice to the dead.

> C. XXIX. Super monumenta in campo sacra non distribuantur misteria.
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [Bracarensis, c. 68. et 69. sinod. grecarum] Non oportet clericos ignaros et presumptores super monumenta in campum ministeria portare, aut distribuere sacramenta; sed aut in ecclesia, aut in basilica, ubi martirum reliquiae sunt depositae, ubi pro defunctis offerri oblationes solent. §. 1. Nec liceat Christianis prandia ad defunctorum sepulchra deferre, et sacrificare mortuis.

C. XXX. How Mass can be celebrated in a burned church.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur. We also concede that, wherever churches have been set on fire and burned by the Normans and Slavs, by the Hungarians and evil Christians, or in any other manner —as, by the exaction of our sins, has happened very often—we permit Masses meanwhile to be celebrated in chapels with a consecrated tablet, until the churches themselves can be restored. But for those situated on a journey, if a church is lacking, we permit the solemnities of Masses to be celebrated in the open air or in tents, if likewise a consecrated altar-tablet and the other sacred mysteries pertaining to that office are present there.

> C. XXX. Quomodo in ecclesia conbusta missa possit celebrari.
> Item ex Concilio Triburiensi. Concedimus etiam, ut sicubi (quod peccatis nostris exigentibus perplurimum factum est) a Normanis et a Sclauis, ab Ungaris, et a malis Christianis, seu alio qualicumque modo ecclesiae fuerint incensae et conbustae, in capellis cum tabula consecrata missas interim celebrari permittimus, donec ecclesiae ipsae restaurari queant. In itinere uero positis, si ecclesia defuerit, sub diuo, seu in tentoriis, item si tabula altaris consecrata ceteraque sacra misteria ad id offitium pertinentia ibi affuerint, missarum solempnia celebrari concedimus.

C. XXXI. Altars shall not be anointed with chrism unless they are of stone.

Likewise from the Council of Epaon, c. 6. If altars are not of stone, let them not be consecrated by anointing with chrism. But for celebrating the divine offices, their comprovincials will have to observe the order that the metropolitans observe.

C. XXXI. Crismate non ungantur altaria, nisi fuerint lapidea.

Item ex Concilio Epaonensi, c. 6. Altaria, si non sint lapidea, crismatis unctione non consecrentur. Ad celebranda autem diuina offitia ordinem, quem metropolitani tenent, conprouinciales eorum obseruare debebunt.

C. XXXII. Altars shall be consecrated by anointing with chrism and priestly blessing.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 14]. It was resolved that altars are to be consecrated not only by anointing with chrism but also by priestly blessing.

C. XXXII. Crismatis unctione et sacerdotali benedictione sacrentur altaria.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 14.] Altaria placuit non solum unctione crismatis, sed etiam sacerdotali benedictione sacrari.

C. XXXIII. It is permitted to pray in private oratories, but not to celebrate Masses.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, c. 3. It is permitted for each of the faithful to have an oratory in his own house and to pray there; but it is not permitted to celebrate Masses there.

C. XXXIII. In priuatis oratoriis licet orare, sed non missas celebrare.

Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi c. 3. Unicuique fidelium, licet in domo sua oratorium habere, et ibi orare; missas autem ibi celebrare non licet.

C. XXXIV. No one shall presume to minister in private oratories without the bishop's consent.

Likewise from the Sixth Synod, [c. 31]. We command that clerics who minister in oratories that are within houses do this with the consent of the bishop of that place. But if anyone does not observe this, let him be deposed.

C. XXXIV. In priuatis oratoriis absque consensu episcopi nullus ministrare presumat.

Item ex VI. Sinodo. [c. 31.] Clericos, qui ministrant in oratoriis, que intra domos sunt, cum consensu episcopi loci illius hoc facere precipimus. Si quis uero hoc non obseruauerit, deponatur.

C. XXXV. Those who have oratories outside the parishes shall be compelled on these days to return to the parishes.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 21]. If anyone wishes to have an oratory even outside the parishes in which there is a lawful and regular assembly, on the other feast days we permit in due order that he hear Masses there on account of the weariness of the household. But at Easter, the Nativity of the Lord, Epiphany, the Ascension of the Lord, Pentecost, and the Nativity of Saint John the Baptist, and on whatever days are held to be greatest among the feasts, let them hear Masses only in cities or parishes. But if any clerics wish to celebrate Masses in oratories on these feasts that we mentioned above, without the bishop commanding or permitting it, let them be driven from communion.

C. XXXV. Qui extra parrochias habent oratoria, his diebus ad parrochias redire cogantur.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 21.] Si quis etiam extra parrochias, in quibus legitimus est ordinariusque conuentus, oratorium habere uoluerit, reliquis festiuitatibus, ut ibi missas audiat, propter fatigationem familiae iusto ordine permittimus. Pasca uero, Natale Domini, Epiphaniam, Ascensionem Domini, Pentecosten et Natale S. Iohannis Baptistae, et si que maximae dies in festiuitatibus habentur, non nisi in ciuitatibus aut in parrochiis audiant. Clerici uero, si qui in his festiuitatibus, quas supra diximus in oratoriis (nisi iubente aut permittente episcopo) missas celebrare uoluerint, a communione pellantur.

C. XXXVI. For what causes the places of saints are to be changed.

Likewise Augustine. PART IX. The places of saints are to be moved for three causes. The first is when the necessity created by persecutors has burdened their places. The second, when there has been difficulty of the places. The third, when they are burdened by the society of evil persons.

C. XXXVI. Quibus ex causis loca sanctorum mutanda sint.

Item Augustinus. IX. Pars. Tribus ex causis loca sanctorum transmutanda sunt. Prima, cum necessitas persecutorum loca eorum grauauerit. Secunda, cum difficultas locorum fuerit. Tercia, cum malorum societate grauantur.

C. XXXVII. When it is not permitted for anyone to transfer the bodies of saints from place to place.

Likewise from the Council of Mainz, [I], c. 51. Let no one presume to transfer bodies of saints from place to place without the counsel of the prince or permission of the bishops and holy synod.

C. XXXVII. Quando alicui corpora sanctorum de loco ad locum transferre non licet.

Item ex Concilio Maguntiensi, [I.] c. 51. Corpora sanctorum de loco ad locum nullus transferre presumat sine consilio principis, uel episcoporum sanctaeque sinodi licentia.

C. XXXVIII. The timbers of a dedicated church may not be converted to the use of laypersons.

Likewise Pope Hyginus. PART X. The timbers of a dedicated church ought not to be joined to another work, except to another church, or to be burned by fire, or for the benefit of the brothers in a monastery; they ought not to be admitted to the works of laypersons.

C. XXXVIII. In usum laicorum non conuerti licet ligna ecclesiae dedicatae.

Item Iginus Papa. X. Pars. Ligna ecclesiae dedicatae non debent ad aliud opus iungi, nisi ad aliam ecclesiam, uel igni conburenda, uel ad profectum in monasterio fratribus; in laicorum opera non debent admitti.

C. XXXIX. Sacred vestments and vessels consumed by age shall be burned, and their ashes cast into hidden places.

Likewise Clement to James, Bishop of Jerusalem, [letter II]. If an altar cloth, chair, candlestick, or veil has been consumed by age, let it be given to fire, since it is not permitted that things which were in the sacristy be treated badly; rather, let all be handed over to fire. Let their ashes also be brought into the baptistery, where no one has passage, or cast into the wall or into hollows in the pavement, lest they be defiled by the feet of those entering.

C. XXXIX. Vestimenta sacra et uasa pre uetustate consumpta incendantur, et cineres eorum in loca occulta proiciantur.

Item Clemens Iacobo, Iherosolimitanorum Episcopo. [epist. II.] Altaris palla, cathedra, candelabrum, et uelum, si fuerint uetustate consumpta, incendio dentur, quoniam non licet ea, que in sacrario fuerint, male tractari, sed incendio uniuersa tradantur. Cineres quoque eorum in baptisterio inferantur, ubi nullus transitum habeat; aut in pariete, aut in fossis pauimentorum iactentur, ne introeuntium pedibus coinquinentur.

C. XL. The dead shall not be wrapped in altar vestments.

The same. Let no cleric through ignorance think that a dead person is to be wrapped in, or wish to cover his shoulders with, a cloth that was upon the altar, or certainly one that was given to the deacon at the Lord's table. A deacon who has done this, or has regarded it lightly, as nothing, and negligently, shall be removed from the Lord's altar for three years and six months, struck by a grave anathema. Because the presbyter did not admonish the cleric, let him be excommunicated for ten years and five months, because he did not admonish the ministries subject to him concerning the Lord's sacraments; and afterward let him be reconciled to mother Church with great humility.

§ 1. But let the deacons, with the inferior ministers, wash within the sanctuary the altar cloths and veils that have been soiled in the sanctuary, as well as the sacred implements and the coverings of the Lord's table, lest perhaps dust of the Lord's body fall away improperly. But let them not wash the linen cloth outside, and it will be a sin for one who does not do this. Therefore we command that it be guarded diligently by the ministers within the sacristy. But if a new basin is procured, let nothing else besides this touch it. Nor let that basin itself be applied to washing any veils except those that pertain to the service of the Lord's altar; let the altar cloths be washed in one basin and the door veils in another.

§ 2. Let care also be taken by the doorkeepers, at the admonition of their superior, lest any negligent or ignorant person wipe his unclean hands on the veil of the door of the Lord's house; but let every person, immediately restrained, learn that it is the veil of the court of the Lord's house.

C. XL. Mortui non obuoluantur uestimentis altaris.

Idem. Nemo per ignorantiam clericus mortuum credat aduoluendum aut eius scapulas operire uelit palla que fuit in altari, aut certe que diacono data est in mensa Domini. Qui hoc fecerit, uel leuiter, quasi nichil et negligenter habuerit, diaconus triennio sexque mensibus a dominico erit remotus altari, graui percussus anathemate. Eo quod clericum non ammonuerit presbiter, decem annis et quinque mensibus excommunicatus sit, propter quod de dominicis sacramentis subiecta sibi non ammonuerit ministeria; et postea cum grandi humilitate matri reconcilietur ecclesiae. §. 1. Pallas uero et uela que in sanctuario sordidata fuerint ac ministeria, diaconi cum humilibus ministris intra sanctuarium, et uelamina dominicae mensae abluant, ne forte puluis dominici corporis male decidat. Sindonem uero non foris abluant, et erit hoc non operanti peccatum. Idcirco intra sacrarium ministris precipimus cum diligentia custodire. Sin peluis noua conparetur, et preter hoc nichil aliud tangat. Sed nec ipsa peluis apponatur lauandis uelis, nisi que ad dominici altaris cultum pertinent; pallae in alia pelui lauentur, et in alia uela ianuarum. §. 2. Cura sit etiam hostiariis ex admonitione maioris, ne quis negligens aut ignarus ad uelum ianuae domus Domini manus incognite tergat; sed statim cohercitus discat omnis homo, quia uelum atrii domus Domini est.

C. XLI. Sacred vessels shall be handled only by consecrated persons.

Likewise Sixtus, [letter II]. It was established in the holy apostolic see that sacred vessels are to be handled by none other than persons consecrated and dedicated to the Lord, lest the Lord, angered by such presumptions, lay a plague upon his people and even those who did not sin perish, because the righteous person very often perishes for the impious.

> C. XLI. Sacra uasa non nisi a sacratis contrectentur hominibus.
>
> Item Sixtus. [epist. II.] In sancta apostolica sede statutum est, ut sacra uasa non ab aliis, quam a sacratis Dominoque dicatis contrectentur hominibus. Ne pro talibus presumptionibus iratus Dominus plagam inponat populo suo, et hi etiam, qui non peccauerunt, pereant quia perit iustus sepissime pro inpio.

C. XLII. Sacred vestments shall be carried only by consecrated persons.

Likewise Bishop Stephen to his familiar friend Hilary, [letter I, c. 5]. The vestments of the Church with which service is rendered to the Lord ought to be both sacred and honorable, and they ought not to be used for purposes other than ecclesiastical offices worthy of God; nor ought they to be touched or carried by any except consecrated persons, lest the vengeance that struck King Belshazzar come upon those who transgress in this matter and cause them to fall to the depths.

> C. XLII. Non nisi a sacratis hominibus uestimenta sacra ferentur.
> Item Stephanus Episcopus familiari amico Hilario. [epist. I. c. 5.] Vestimenta ecclesiae quibus Domino ministratur, et sacrata debent esse et honesta, quibus in aliis usibus non debent frui, quam ecclesiasticis et Deo dignis offitiis; que nec ab aliis debent contingi aut offerri, nisi a sacratis hominibus, ne ultio, que Baltasar regem percussit, super hoc transgredientes ueniat, et corruere eos faciat ad ima.

C. XLIII. Divine mysteries shall not be furnished for the ornaments of weddings.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans. Let divine mysteries not be furnished as wedding ornamentation, lest, while they are polluted by the touch of the wicked or by the display of secular luxury, they seem unworthy for the office of the sacred mystery.

> C. XLIII. Diuina misteria nuptiarum non prestantur ornatibus.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. Ad nuptiarum ornatum misteria diuina non prestentur, ne, dum inproborum tactu uel pompa secularis luxuriae polluuntur, ad offitium sacri misterii uideantur indigna.

C. XLIV. The sacraments of the Lord's body and blood are not to be confected in little wooden vessels.

Likewise from the Council of Tribur, c. 9. PART XI. The vessels in which the most sacred mysteries are confected are chalices and patens. When Boniface, martyr and bishop, was asked concerning these whether it was permitted to confect the sacraments in little wooden vessels, he responded: Formerly priests used not golden but wooden chalices. Zephyrinus, the sixteenth Roman bishop, established that Masses be celebrated with glass patens. Then Urban, the tenth Pope, made all the sacred implements of silver. For in this, as also in the remaining forms of worship, the splendor of churches grew more and more through the progress of time. For in our days, we who are servants of the master of the household, lest the splendor of mother Church be diminished, but rather accumulated and enlarged, establish that henceforth no priest presume in any manner to confect the sacred mystery of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ in little wooden vessels, lest God be angered by that through which he ought to be appeased.

> C. XLIV. In ligneis uasculis dominici corporis et sanguinis sacramenta non sunt celebranda.
> Item ex Concilio Triburiensi, c. 9. XI. Pars. Vasa, quibus sacrosancta conficiuntur misteria, calices sunt et patenae, de quibus Bonifatius martir et episcopus, interrogatus, si liceret in uasculis ligneis sacramenta conficere, respondit: Quondam sacerdotes non aureis sed ligneis calicibus utebantur. Zepherinus, XVI. Romanus episcopus, patenis uitreis missas celebrare constituit. Deinde Urbanus X. Papa omnia ministeria sacra fecit argentea. In hoc enim, sicut et in reliquis cultibus, magis et magis per incrementum temporum decus succreuit ecclesiarum. Nostris enim diebus, qui serui patrisfamilias sumus, ne decus matris ecclesiae minuatur, sed magis cumuletur et amplificetur, statuimus, ut deinceps nullus sacerdos sacrum misterium corporis et sanguinis Domini nostri Iesu Christi in ligneis uasculis ullo modo conficere presumat, ne, unde placari debet, inde irascatur Deus.

C. XLV. From what material a chalice with its paten ought to be made.

Likewise from the Council of Reims, c. 6. Let the chalice of the Lord with its paten, if not of gold, be made wholly of silver.

§ 1. But if anyone is so poor, let him at least have a tin chalice.

§ 2. But let it not be made of bronze or brass, because by the strength of the wine it produces verdigris and likewise vomiting.

§ 3. But let no one presume to sing Mass in a wooden or glass chalice.

> C. XLV. Ex qua materia calix cum patena fieri debeat.
> Item ex Concilio Remensi c. 6. Ut calix Domini cum patena, si non ex auro, omnino ex argento fiat. §. 1. Si quis autem tam pauper est, saltim uel stagneum calicem habeat. §. 2. De ere autem aut ex auricalco non fiat, quia ob uini uirtutem eruginem pariterque uomitum prouocat. §. 3. Nullus autem in ligneo aut in uitreo calice presumat missam cantare.

C. XLVI. The sacrifice of the altar shall be consecrated not on silk but on pure linen.

Likewise from the letter of Popes Eusebius and Sylvester. By the counsel of all we establish that no one presume to celebrate Mass with the sacrifice of the altar on a silk or dyed cloth, but on pure linen consecrated by the bishop, namely linen produced from the earth and woven, just as the body of our Lord Jesus Christ was buried in a clean linen shroud.

> C. XLVI. Non in serico, sed in puro lintheo sacrificium consecretur altaris.
> Item ex epistola Eusebii et Siluestri Papae. Consulto omnium constituimus, ut sacrificium altaris non in serico panno aut intincto quisquam celebrare missam presumat, sed in puro lineo ab episcopo consecrato, terreno scilicet lino procreato atque contexto; sicut corpus Domini nostri Iesu Christi in sindone linea munda sepultum fuit.

C. XLVII. By whom the celebration of Masses was handed down.

Likewise from the Sixth Synod, [c. 32]. PART XII. James, brother of the Lord according to the flesh, to whom the church of Jerusalem was first entrusted, and Basil, Bishop of Caesarea, whose renown shone throughout the whole world, added for us in writings the celebration of the Mass.

C. XLVII. A quibus sit tradita missarum celebratio.

Item ex VI. Sinodo. [c. 32.] XII. Pars. Iacobus frater Domini secundum carnem, cui primum credita est Iherosolimitana ecclesia, et Basilius, episcopus Cesariensis, cuius claritas per totum orbem refulsit, in scripturis addiderunt nobis missae celebrationem.

C. XLVIII. At what hour the solemnities of Masses are to be celebrated.

Likewise Pope Telesphorus, seventh from Peter, [in his letter to all, c. 2]. PART XIII. On the holy night of the Nativity of the Lord and Savior, let presbyters celebrate Masses and solemnly chant the angelic hymn in them, since on that same night it was also announced to the shepherds by an angel.

§ 1. "And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God and saying: 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to persons of good will.'" But at other times celebrations of Masses are by no means to be celebrated before the third hour of the day, because at that same hour both the Lord was crucified and the Holy Spirit is read to have descended upon the Apostles.

C. XLVIII. Qua hora sint missarum solempnia celebranda.

Item Thelesphorus Papa VII. a Petro. [in epistola ad omnes c. 2.] XIII. Pars. Nocte sancta Natiuitatis Domini saluatoris missas celebrent presbiteri, et ymnum angelicum in eis solempniter decantent, quoniam et eadem nocte ab angelo pastoribus est nunciatus. §. 1. Et subito facta est cum angelo multitudo miliciae celestis laudantium Deum, et dicentium: "Gloria in excelsis Deo, et in terra pax hominibus bonae uoluntatis." Reliquis uero temporibus missarum celebrationes ante horam diei terciam minime sunt celebrandae, quia in eadem hora et Dominus crucifixus est, et super Apostolos Spiritus sanctus legitur descendisse.

C. XLIX. The sacraments of the altar shall be celebrated only by persons who are fasting.

Likewise from the Council of Carthage, c. 8. PART XIV. The sacraments of the altar are to be celebrated only by persons who are fasting, except on the one anniversary day on which the Supper of the Lord is celebrated. For if the commemoration of any deceased persons, whether bishops or others, is to be made in the afternoon, let it be done by prayers alone if those who perform it are found already to have eaten.

C. XLIX. Non nisi a ieiunis hominibus sacramenta celebrentur altaris.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi, c. 8. XIV. Pars. Sacramenta altaris non nisi a ieiunis hominibus celebrentur, excepto uno die anniuersario, quo cena Domini celebratur. Nam si aliquorum promeridiano tempore defunctorum, siue episcoporum siue ceterorum, conmendatio facienda est, solis orationibus fiat, si illi, qui faciunt, iam pransi inueniantur.

C. L. In Lent no one is permitted to eat before the solemnities of Masses, chanted around the ninth hour.

Likewise from the Council of Chalon. PART XV. Many who think themselves to be fasting in Lent are accustomed to eat as soon as they have heard the signal for the ninth hour. They are in no way to be believed to be fasting if they eat before the evening office is celebrated. For one must gather for Mass, and after the solemnities of Masses and evening offices have been heard and alms given, one must approach food. But if anyone has been constrained by necessity so that he cannot come to Mass, after estimating the evening hour and completing his prayer, let him break his fast.

PART XVI. GRATIAN. At the fasts of the four seasons, too, the solemnities of Masses are to be celebrated around the evening hours, but on Holy Saturday around the beginning of night. Hence Bishop Leo: "What by our Fathers." Likewise Gelasius: "The ordinations of presbyters." Likewise Pelagius: "The rescript of your affection." Seek these in the treatise on those to be ordained. In the first part of the day also the solemnities of Masses are not unfittingly celebrated. Hence Pope Leo to Dioscorus, Bishop of Alexandria, [letter LXXIX, otherwise LXXXI, c. 2]:

> Item ex Concilio Cabilonensi. XV. Pars. Solent plures, qui se ieiunare putant in Quadragesima, mox ut signum audierint ad horam nonam, manducare. Qui nullatenus ieiunare credendi sunt, si ante manducauerint, quam uespertinum celebretur offitium. Concurrendum est enim ad missam, et auditis missarum solempnibus et uespertinis offitiis largitis elemosinis ad cibum accedendum est. Si uero aliquis necessitate constrictus fuerit, ut ad missam uenire non ualeat, estimata uespertina hora, conpleta oratione sua ieiunium soluat. XVI. Pars. Gratian. In ieiuniis etiam quatuor temporum circa uespertinas horas, in sabbato uero sancto circa noctis inicium missarum solempnia sunt celebranda. Unde Leo episcopus: "Quod a patribus nostris." Item Gelasius: "Ordinationes presbiterorum." Item Pelagius: "Dilectionis tuae rescripta." Require in tractatu ordinandorum. Prima quoque parte diei missarum solempnia non incongrue celebrantur. Unde Leo Papa Dioscoro, Alexandrino Episcopo: [epist. LXXIX. al. LXXXI. c. 2.]

C. LI. It is permitted to celebrate Masses even in the first part of the day.

But it is necessary that some part of the people be deprived of its devotion if, with the custom of only one Mass being observed, they cannot offer the sacrifice unless they have assembled in the first part of the day. Therefore we earnestly admonish your fraternity with familiarity that your care not neglect what has become settled in our custom from the form of paternal tradition, so that in all things we may agree in faith and actions. For this reason we gave our son Possidonius the presbyter, as he returned, this letter to carry to your affection; he frequently took part in our processions and actions and, having been sent to us so many times, learned what the authority of the apostolic see held in all matters.

> C. LI. Etiam prima parte diei missas celebrare licet.
> Necesse est autem, ut quedam pars populi sua deuotione priuetur, si unius tantum missae more seruato sacrificium offerre non possunt, nisi primi parte diei conuenerint. Studiose ergo fraternitatem tuam familiariter ammonemus, ut quod nostrae consuetudini ex forma paternae traditionis insedit tua quoque cura non negligat, ut per omnia nobis fide et actibus congruamus. Propter quod remeanti filio nostro Possidonio presbitero hanc ad tuam dilectionem epistolam dedimus perferendam, qui nostris processionibus atque actionibus frequenter interfuit, et tociens ad nos missus quid in omnibus apostolicae sedis auctoritas teneret agnouit.

C. LII. Private Masses are not to be sung in public.

Likewise Augustine. And this is to be attended to: that private Masses which are held for priests on solemn days are not to be held in public in such a way that through them the people are drawn away from the public solemnities of Masses, which canonically take place at the third hour.

§ 1. But let the priests who are around the city or in that same city, and the people, assemble as one for the public celebration of Masses.

C. LII. Missae peculiares non sunt in publico cantandae.

Item Augustinus. Et hoc attendendum est, ut missae peculiares, que per dies solempnes sacerdotibus fiunt, non ita in publico fiant, ut per eas populus a publicis missarum solempnibus, que hora tercia canonice fiunt, abstrahatur. §. 1. Sed sacerdotes, qui in circuitu urbis, aut in eadem urbe sunt, et populus in unum ad publicam missarum celebrationem conueniant.

C. LIII. How many Masses priests are permitted to celebrate in a day.

Likewise Pope Alexander. PART XVII. It is enough for a priest to celebrate one Mass on one day, because Christ suffered once and redeemed the whole world. It is no small thing to perform one Mass, and very happy is he who can celebrate one worthily. Some, however, perform one for the deceased and another for the day, if it is necessary. But those who, for money or the flatteries of secular persons, presume to perform several Masses in one day, I do not judge to escape damnation.

C. LIII. Quot missas in die sacerdotibus celebrare liceat.

Item Alexander Papa. XVII. Pars. Sufficit sacerdoti unam in die una celebrare missam, quia Christus semel passus est, et totum mundum redemit. Non modica res est unam missam facere, et ualde felix qui unam digne celebrare potest. Quidam tamen pro defunctis unam faciunt, et alteram de die, si necesse sit. Qui uero pro pecuniis aut adulationibus secularium una die presumunt plures facere missas, non estimo euadere dampnationem.

C. LIV. We are taught by the example of the Savior and the Apostles to sing hymns.

Likewise from the Third Council of Toledo, [c. 12]. PART XVIII. For singing hymns we have the example both of the Savior and of the Apostles. For the Lord himself is also reported to have said a hymn, as the evangelist Matthew testifies: "And when a hymn had been said, they went out to the Mount of Olives." And the Apostle Paul writes to the Ephesians, saying: "Be filled with the Spirit, speaking among yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs." And because some hymns are known to have been composed by human endeavor in praise of God and of the triumphs of the Apostles and martyrs—such as those which the most blessed doctors Hilary and Ambrose produced, but which some specially reject because they do not exist from the Scriptures of the holy canons or apostolic tradition—let them therefore also spurn that hymn composed by human beings which we say daily in public and private office at the end of all the psalms: "Glory and honor to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Spirit for ages of ages. Amen." For that hymn too which the angels sang when Christ was born in the flesh—"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to persons of good will"—and the rest that follow there, ecclesiastical doctors composed. Therefore, are not even these to be sung in churches because they are not found in the books of the holy Scriptures? Masses are composed, whether prayers or orations, commendations or impositions of hands; and if none of them is chanted in the church, all ecclesiastical offices are empty. The Apostle admonishes and exhorts Timothy that this be done, saying: "I therefore entreat first of all that supplications, prayers, petitions, and thanksgivings be made for all persons, for kings, and for all who are in high station." Therefore, just as prayers, so let none of us further condemn hymns composed in praise of God.

C. LIV. Ex Saluatoris et Apostolorum docemur exemplo ymnos cantare.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano III. [c. 12.] XVIII. Pars. De ymnis canendis et Saluatoris, et Apostolorum habemus exemplum. Nam et ipse Dominus ymnum dixisse perhibetur, Mattheo euangelista testante: "Et ymno dicto exierunt in montem Oliueti." Et Paulus apostolus ad Ephesios scribit dicens: "Inplemini Spiritu, loquentes uobis in psalmis, et ymnis, et canticis spiritualibus." Et quia nonnulli ymni humano studio in laudem Dei, atque Apostolorum et martirum triumphos noscuntur esse conpositi, sicut hi, quos beatissimi doctores Ylarius atque Ambrosius ediderunt, quos tamen quidam specialiter reprobant pro eo, quod de scripturis sanctorum canonum uel apostolica traditione non existunt: respuant ergo et illum ymnum ab hominibus conpositum, quem cottidie publico priuatoque offitio in fine omnium psalmorum dicimus: "Gloria et honor Patri, et Filio, et Spiritui sancto in secula seculorum, Amen." Nam et ille ymnus, quem nato Christo in carne angeli cecinerunt: "Gloria in excelsis Deo, et in terra pax hominibus bonae uoluntatis," et reliqua, que ibi secuntur, ecclesiastici doctores conposuerunt. Ergo nec ipsi in ecclesiis canendi sunt, quia in sanctarum scripturarum libris non inueniuntur? Conponuntur missae, siue preces, uel orationes, siue conmendationes, seu manus inpositiones, ex quibus, si nulla decantentur in ecclesia, uacant omnia offitia ecclesiastica. Ammonet hoc fieri atque hortatur Tymotheum apostolus, dicens: "Obsecro igitur primo omnium fieri obsecrationes, orationes, postulationes, gratiarum actiones pro omnibus hominibus, pro regibus, pro omnibus, qui in sublimitate sunt." Sicut igitur orationes, ita et ymnos in laudem Dei conpositos, nullus nostrum ulterius inprobet.

C. LV. What hymns are found to have been chanted by angels in the New Testament.

Leo IX. These two hymns alone are found to have been chanted by angels in the New Testament: "Alleluia" and "Glory to God in the highest." We omit them both in Septuagesima because, expelled through the sin of the old man from the assembly of angelic jubilation into the Babylon of this wretched life, we sit by its rivers and weep while we remember that Zion in which a hymn befits God. That we omit the Alleluia for nine weeks is not unfittingly understood through nine weeks as the nine orders of angels, whose tenth order, falling through pride, diminished the angelic number and disturbed its felicity. Grieving for their diminution and fearing an equal fall for themselves, they were hindered from the perfect praise of the Creator. Counseling for their recovery and consolation, almighty God the Creator formed the first human being from the slime of the earth, who would repair by the multiplication of his race the losses of the heavenly homeland and supply the joys of the angels. The angelic choir, somewhat gladdened by this hope, was unsurprisingly disturbed by the fall of that very human being. Hence the harmony of the nine orders remained imperfect in the praise of the Creator until, with Christ rising, that fallen first-formed man rose. There the angelic host, rejoicing at the increase of its company and in a better hope, rose entire into a new Alleluia and persists devoutly in it. Imitating it according to our measure, we omit the Alleluia for nine weeks from Septuagesima, when the fall of the first-formed man is recited in the church, namely until Easter, where Christ, rising from the dead, turns our sorrow into joy and restores the Alleluia to us.

C. LV. In nouo testamento qui ymni ab angelis decantati inueniuntur.

Leo IX. Hii duo solummodo ymni ab angelis in nouo testamento inueniuntur decantati: "Alleluia," atque: "Gloria in excelsis Deo." Quos pariter in Septuagesima intermittimus, quia peccato hominis ueteris a conuentu angelicae iubilationis expulsi in huius miserae uitae Babilonem, super flumina eius sedemus, et flemus, dum recordamur illius Sion, in qua Deum decet ymnus. Quod nouem ebdomadibus Alleluia intermittimus, non incongrue per nouem ebdomadas nouem angelorum ordines accipimus, quorum decimus ordo per superbiam corruens angelicum numerum inminuit, et a felicitate perturbauit. Qui condolentes suae diminutioni, et parem ruinam sibi timentes, a perfecta laude creatoris fuere prepediti. Quorum recuperationi et consolationi consulens omnipotens Deus creator primum hominem de limo terrae formauit, qui sui generis multiplicatione dampna celestis patriae resarciret, atque angelorum gaudia suppleret. Qua spe angelicus chorus admodicum letatus. Non mirum, si ex lapsu ipsius hominis fuit conturbatus. Unde nouem ordinum concentus in laude creatoris remansit inperfectus, donec in Christo resurgente resurrexit prolapsus ille protoplastus. Ibi augmento sui collegii, et spe meliori angelicus exercitus gauisus, in nouum Alleluia consurrexit totus, et in eo perstat deuotus. Quem et nos pro modulo nostro imitantes, a Septuagesima, quando lapsus protoplasti recitatur in ecclesia, Alleluia nouem ebdomadibus intermittimus, scilicet usque in Pasca, ubi Christus resurgens a mortuis tristiciam nostram in gaudium uertit, et Alleluia nobis reddit.

C. LVI. At the Supper of the Lord, Gloria in excelsis shall be chanted.

Nicholas to Ralph, Archbishop of Bourges. Further, Gloria in excelsis Deo is to be said by bishops according to our custom among the solemnities of Masses on the Supper of the Lord. But on that day it is permitted to use the apostolic pallium for those to whom this has been permitted by the apostolic see.

C. LVI. In cena Domini Gloria in excelsis decantetur.

Nykolaus Rodulfo, Bituricensi Archiepiscopo. Porro Gloria in excelsis Deo ab episcopis in cena Domini inter missarum solempnia more nostro dicenda est. Pallio uero apostolico eadem die uti illis est licitum, quibus est ab apostolica sede permissum.

C. LVII. A cleric shall not enter to celebrate the solemnities of Masses with a staff or with covered head.

Pope Zachary, [at the Roman Synod, cc. 13 and 14]. PART XIX. Let no bishop, presbyter, or deacon presume to enter with a staff to celebrate the solemnities of Masses or to stand at the altar of God with covered head, since the Apostle also prohibits men from praying in church with covered head; and if he has rashly presumed to do so, let him be deprived of communion. But when a bishop or presbyter has entered to celebrate the solemnities of Masses, unless some affliction intervenes, let him in no way dare to withdraw after the prayer has been given so that the solemnities of Masses may be completed by another bishop or presbyter; rather, let the one who makes the beginning complete it to the end. But if anyone has presumed to act otherwise than we have set down, let him be suspended from the sacred body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ.

C. LVII. Cum baculo aut capite uelato ad celebrandum missarum solempnia clericus non ingrediatur.

Zacharias Papa. [in Sinodo Romana, c. 13. et 14.] XIX. Pars. Nullus episcopus aut presbiter, seu diaconus ad celebrandum missarum solempnia presumat cum baculo introire, aut uelato capite altario Dei assistere, quoniam et Apostolus prohibet uiros uelato capite orare in ecclesia; et si temere presumpserit conmunione priuetur. Cum uero ingressus fuerit episcopus aut presbiter ad missarum solempnia celebranda, nisi passio aliqua interuenerit, nullo modo audeat data oratione recedere, ut ab aliquo episcopo aut presbitero missarum suppleantur solempnia; sed qui inicium ponit; suppleat usque in finem. Si quis uero presumpserit, preter quod posuimus, agere, a sacro corpore et sanguine Domini nostri Iesu Christi sit suspensus.

[PALEA. C. LVIII.

Likewise from the Decrees of Pope Soter. So that individuals may guard carefully against that divine oracle in which it is written, "Woe to one alone, because when he falls, he has no one to raise him," we must greatly fear and guard lest, in those hours and times in which psalmody or sacrifice is offered to God, a harmful seizure or some infirmity of body befall anyone attending the divine offices alone, which may either cause the body suddenly to collapse or confuse the mind by derangement or terror. Therefore, taking precautions for cases of this kind, we have deemed it necessary to establish that, where an abundance of time, place, or clergy affords support, each person singing and sacrificing to God shall have behind him a helper providing nearby aid, so that if by some chance the one who approaches to complete the offices has been disturbed or dashed to the ground, he may always have behind him someone who intrepidly performs his duty and completes the office begun.]

> [PALEA. C. LVIII.
> Item ex Decretis Soteris Papae. Ut illud diuini oraculi singuli precaueant, quo scribitur: "Vae soli, quia, cum ceciderit, non habet subleuantem," summopere uerendum nobis est atque cauendum, ne horis illis atque temporibus, quibus Deo psallitur uel sacrificatur, unicuique diuinis singulariter offitiis insistenti perniciosa passio uel corporis quelibet inualetudo occurrat, que aut corpus subito subrui faciat, aut mentem alienatione uel terrore confundat. Pro huiusmodi ergo casibus precauentes, necessarium duximus instituere, ut, ubi temporis, uel loci, siue cleri copia suffragatur, habeat quisque canens Deo atque sacrificans post se uicini solaminis adiutorem, ut, si aliquo casu ille, qui offitia inpleturus accedit, turbatus fuerit, uel ad terram elisus, a tergo semper habeat qui eius uicem exequatur intrepidus, et offitium inceptum adinpleat.]

C. LIX. How many witnesses a sacrificing bishop ought to have with him.

Anacletus, servant of Christ Jesus, to all Bishops, [letter I]. PART XX. Let a bishop sacrificing to God have witnesses with him. On more solemn days, indeed, let him have with him either seven, five, or three deacons, who are called his eyes, and subdeacons and the remaining ministers, who, clothed in sacred vestments, shall stand in front and behind, while presbyters stand opposite at right and left, with contrite heart, humbled spirit, and face inclined, guarding him from malicious persons and giving consent to the sacrifice. But when the consecration has been completed, let all communicate who do not wish to be deprived of the thresholds of the Church.

> C. LIX. Quot testes episcopus sacrificans secum habere debeat.
> Anacletus seruus Christi Iesu, omnibus Episcopis. [epist. 1.] XX. Pars. Episcopus Deo sacrificans secum testes habeat. In solempnioribus quippe diebus aut septem, aut quinque, aut tres diaconos, qui oculi eius dicuntur, et subdiaconos, atque reliquos ministros secum habeat, qui sacris induti uestimentis in fronte et a tergo, et presbiteri e regione dextra leuaque, corde contrito et humiliato spiritu, ac prono stent uultu, custodientes eum a maleuolis hominibus, et consensum prebentes sacrificio. Peracta autem consecratione omnes conmunicent, qui noluerint ecclesiasticis carere liminibus.

C. LX. Bishops shall not confect the Lord's sacraments without religious witnesses.

Likewise Pope Lucius to all Bishops. By apostolic authority we command that you always have priests and Levites as witnesses with you. And although one's own conscience can suffice, nevertheless, because of malicious persons, according to the Apostle, you must also have good testimony from those who are outside. Therefore, let two presbyters and three deacons in every place not leave a bishop, for the sake of ecclesiastical testimony.

C. LX. Episcopi sine religiosis testibus Domini sacramenta non conficiant.

Item Lucius Papa omnibus Episcopis. Iubemus apostolica auctoritate, ut semper testes uobiscum sacerdotes habeatis et Leuitas. Et licet conscientia possit sufficere propria, tamen propter maliuolos iuxta Apostolum etiam testimonium uos oportet habere bonum ab his, qui foris sunt. Igitur duo presbiteri, et tres diaconi in omni loco episcopum non deserant, propter testimonium ecclesiasticum.

C. LXI. A presbyter shall not presume to celebrate Mass unless two are present.

Likewise Pope Soter. This also was established: that no presbyter presume to celebrate the solemnities of Masses unless, with two present and responding to him, he is counted as the third; because, when he says in the plural, "The Lord be with you," and in the secrets, "Pray for me," it is most fitting that a response be made to his salutation.

C. LXI. Nisi duobus presentibus presbiter missam celebrare non presumat.

Item Sother Papa. Hoc quoque statutum est, ut nullus presbiterorum missarum solempnia celebrare presumat, nisi duobus presentibus sibique respondentibus ipse tercius habeatur; quia, cum pluraliter dicitur ab eo: "Dominus uobiscum," et illud in secretis: "Orate pro me," aptissime conuenit, ut ipsius respondeatur salutationi.

C. LXII. Those who do not hear the solemnities of Masses through to the end shall be deprived of communion.

Likewise from the Canon of the Apostles, [10]. PART XXI. Let all the faithful who assemble in church for the sacred solemnities also hear the Scriptures of the Apostles and the Gospel. But those who do not persevere in prayer until the Mass is completed, nor receive holy communion, ought to be deprived of communion, as persons stirring up disturbances in the Church.

C. LXII. Communione priuentur qui usque ad finem missarum solempnia non audiunt.

Item ex Canone Apostolorum. [10.] XXI. Pars. Omnes fideles, qui conueniunt in solempnitatibus sacris ad ecclesiam, et scripturas Apostolorum et euangelium audiant. Qui autem non perseuerant in oratione, usque dum missa peragatur, nec sanctam conmunionem percipiunt, uelut inquietudines ecclesiae conmouentes conuenit conmunione priuari.

C. LXIII. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 24]. When the priest is delivering the word in the church, whoever goes out from the audience shall be excommunicated.

C. LXIII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 24.] Sacerdote uerbum in ecclesia faciente qui egressus de auditorio fuerit, excommunicetur.

C. LXIV. Secular persons ought to hear Masses in their entirety on the Lord's day.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 47]. By a special order we command secular persons to hear Masses in their entirety on the Lord's day, so that the people shall not presume to depart before the priest's blessing. But if they do so, let them be publicly confounded by the bishop.

C. LXIV. Die dominico missas ex integro seculares audire debent.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 47.] Missas die dominica secularibus totas audire speciali ordine precipimus ita, ut ante benedictionem sacerdotis egredi populus non presumat. Quod si fecerint, ab episcopo publice confundantur.

C. LXV. The people shall not depart before Mass is celebrated in its entirety.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, [I, c. 28]. When the people assemble in the name of God to celebrate Masses, let them not depart before the solemnity of the Mass is completed; and where there is no bishop, let them receive the priest's blessing.

C. LXV. Populus non ante discedat, quam missa ex integro celebretur.

Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I., c. 28.] Cum ad celebrandas missas in nomine Dei conuenitur populus non ante discedat, quam missae solempnitas conpleatur, et ubi episcopus non fuerit, benedictionem accipiat sacerdotis.

C. LXVI. One who goes to spectacles after neglecting the assembly of the Church shall be excommunicated.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 88]. One who goes to spectacles on a solemn day after neglecting the assembly of the Church shall be excommunicated.

C. LXVI. Excommunicetur qui pretermisso ecclesiae conuentu ad spectacula uadit.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 88.] Qui die solempni pretermisso ecclesiae conuentu ad spectacula uadit, excommunicetur.

C. LXVII. No one shall be prohibited from entering the church up to the Mass of the catechumens.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 84]. PART XXII. Let a bishop prohibit no one from entering the church and hearing the word of God, whether gentile, heretic, or Jew, up to the Mass of the catechumens.

C. LXVII. Usque ad missam catecuminorum nullus ecclesiam ingredi prohibeatur.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV., [c. 84.] XXII. Pars. Episcopus nullum prohibeat ingredi ecclesiam, et audire uerbum Dei, siue gentilem, siue hereticum, siue Iudeum, usque ad missam catecuminorum.

C. LXVIII. We ought to hear the Gospels not sitting but standing.

Likewise Bishop Anastasius to all Bishops, [letter I, c. 1]. PART XXIII. By apostolic authority we command that, while the holy Gospels are read in church, priests and all the others, not sitting but reverently bowed and standing in the sight of the Gospel, intently hear and faithfully adore the Lord's words.

C. LXVIII. Euangelia non sedendo, sed stando audire debemus.

Item Anastasius Episcopus omnibus Episcopis. [epist. I. c. 1.] XXIII. Pars. Apostolica auctoritate mandamus, dum sancta euangelia in ecclesia leguntur, ut sacerdotes et ceteri omnes non sedentes, sed uenerabiliter curui et in conspectu euangelii stantes dominica uerba intente audiant, et fideliter adorent.

C. LXIX. Something is always to be offered at the solemnities of Masses.

Likewise Gregory VII, [at the Roman Synod held in the year of the Lord 1078, c. 13]. PART XXIV. Let every Christian take care to offer something to God at the solemnities of Masses, and call to memory what God said through Moses: "You shall not appear in my sight empty." And in the collections of the holy Fathers it clearly appears that all Christians ought, according to the usage of the holy Fathers, to offer something to God. For recourse must first be had to him who can heal the sufferings of our soul. But in a perverse order, human beings first summon aid for themselves from human beings. But when human supports have failed, they then think that the grace of divine favor is to be sought.

> C. LXIX. Ad missarum solempnia semper aliquid est offerendum.
> Item Gregorius VII. [in Sinodo Romana habita anno Domini 1078. c. 13.] XXIV. Pars. Omnis Christianus procuret ad missarum solempnia aliquid Deo offerre, et ducere ad memoriam, quod Deus per Moysen dixit: "Non apparebis in conspectu meo uacuus." Et in collectis sanctorum Patrum liquido apparet quod omnes Christiani offerre aliquid Deo ex usu sanctorum Patrum debent. Ad ipsum enim prius est confugiendum, qui nostrae animae possit curare passiones. Verum homines prepostero ordine ante sibi opem ab hominibus accersiunt. Ubi autem humana subsidia defecerint, tunc opinantur diuini fauoris gratiam postulandam.

C. LXX. Why "Lift up your hearts" is said in the preface.

Likewise Cyprian, [sermon VI on the Lord's Prayer]. PART XXV. But when we stand for prayer, dearest brothers, we ought to be watchful and apply ourselves to prayers with the whole heart. Let the thought of the carnal and secular person depart, nor then let the mind think anything except that alone which it prays. Therefore the priest too, before the prayer, prepares the minds of the brothers by a preface sent before, saying, "Lift up your hearts," so that when the people respond, "We have them toward the Lord," they may be admonished that they ought to think of nothing except the Lord. Let the breast be closed against the adversary and lie open to God alone, nor let it suffer the enemy of God to come to it at the time of prayer.

> C. LXX. Quare "Sursum corda" in prefatione dicatur.
> Item Ciprianus. [sermone VI. de oratione dominica.] XXV. Pars. Quando autem stamus ad orationem, fratres dilectissimi, inuigilare et incumbere ad preces toto corde debemus; cogitatio hominis carnalis et secularis abscedat, nec quicquam tunc animus quam id solum cogitet, quod precatur. Ideo et sacerdos ante orationem prefatione premissa parat fratrum mentes, dicendo: "Sursum corda," ut dum respondet plebs: "habemus ad Dominum," ammoneatur, nichil aliud se quam Dominum cogitare debere. Claudatur contra aduersarium pectus, et soli Deo pateat, nec ad se hostem Dei tempore orationis uenire patiatur.

C. LXXI. Which prefaces are to be sung in the Mass.

Pelagius, Bishop of the Roman Church and the apostolic see, to all the Bishops of Germany and Gaul. PART XXVI. We find that only these nine prefaces are to be received in the sacred catalogue: that is, one for the Paschal in albis, another on the day of the Lord's Ascension, the third on the day of Pentecost, the fourth for the Nativity of the Lord, the fifth for the Manifestation of the Lord, the sixth for the Apostles, the seventh for the Holy Trinity, the eighth for the Cross, and the ninth to be said only for the fast in Lent.

> C. LXXI. Que prefationes in missa sunt cantandae.

Pelagius Romanae ecclesiae et apostolicae sedis Episcopus uniuersis Germaniarum atque Galliarum Episcopis. XXVI. Pars. Inuenimus has nouem prefationes in sacro catalogo tantummodo recipiendas, id est: unam in Albis pascalibus, aliam die Ascensionis Domini, tertiam die Pentecosten, quartam de Natali Domini, quintam de Apparitione Domini, sextam de Apostolis, septimam de sancta Trinitate, octauam de Cruce nonam de ieiunio in Quadragesima tantummodo dicendam.

C. LXXII. In all solemnities of Masses prayer shall be made for the deceased.

Likewise from the Council of Chalon, [II, c. 39]. PART XXVII. It further seemed good to us that in all solemnities of Masses the Church beseech the Lord in a fitting place for the spirits of the deceased. For just as no day is excepted on which prayer is not made for the living and for any necessities, so assuredly no day ought to be excepted on which prayers are not poured out to the Lord for the souls of the faithful in the solemnities of Masses. From antiquity, therefore, the holy Church holds this custom: that both in the solemnities of Masses and in other prayers the spirits of those at rest are commended to the Lord, as blessed Augustine says: "Supplications for the spirits of the dead are not to be omitted, which we commend to be made for all in the Christian and Catholic fellowship, even with the names of the deceased kept silent, those whom the Church has received under a general commemoration, so that for those who lack parents, children, or any relatives or friends for these things, this service may be furnished to them by the one common and pious mother."

C. LXXII. In omnibus missarum solempnibus pro defunctis oratio fiat.

Item ex Concilio Cabillonensi. [II., c. 39.] XXVII. Pars. Visum preterea est nobis, ut in omnibus missarum solempnibus pro defunctorum spiritibus loco conpetenti ecclesia Dominum deprecetur. Sicut enim nulla dies excipitur, qua non pro uiuentibus et pro quibuslibet necessitatibus deprecetur: ita nimirum nulla dies excipi debet, quin pro animabus fidelium preces missarum solempnibus Domino fundantur. Antiquitus igitur hunc morem sancta tenet ecclesia, ut et missarum solempnibus, et aliis precibus Domino spiritus quiescentium conmendentur, dicente B. Augustino: "Non sunt pretermittendae supplicationes pro spiritibus mortuorum, quas faciendas pro omnibus in Christiana et catholica societate laudamus. Defunctorum etiam tacitis nominibus eorum, quos sub generali conmemoratione suscepit ecclesia, ut quibus ad ista desunt parentes, aut filii, aut quicumque cognati uel amici, ab una eis exhibeatur pia matre communi."

C. LXXIII. Names are not to be recited by the priest before the prayers.

Likewise Innocent, Bishop of the City of Rome, to Decentius of Gubbio, [letter I, c. 2]. Concerning names being recited before the priest performs the prayer and commends by his prayer the offerings of those whose names are to be recited, you yourself recognize through your prudence how superfluous it is that you announce the name of one whose sacrifice you have not yet offered to God, although nothing is unknown to him.

C. LXXIII. Ante preces non sunt a sacerdote nomina recitanda.

Item Innocentius Episcopus Urbis Romae Decentio Eugubino. [epist. I. c. 2.] De nominibus recitandis ante, quam sacerdos precem faciat, atque eorum oblationes, quorum nomina recitanda sunt, sua oratione conmendet, quam superfluum sit, et ipse per tuam prudentiam recognoscis; ut cuius hostiam necdum Deo offeras, eius ante nomen insinues, quamuis illi nichil sit incognitum.

Distinction II

GRATIAN.

GRATIANUS.

C. I. Bread, wine, and water are to be offered in the sacraments.

Alexander, Bishop of the City of Rome, to all the orthodox, [letter I, c. 4]. PART I. In the offerings of the sacraments that are offered to the Lord among the solemnities of Masses, let only bread and wine mixed with water be offered in sacrifice. For neither wine alone nor water alone ought to be offered in the Lord's chalice, but both mixed, because both are read to have flowed from his side in his Passion.

C. I. Panis, et uinum, et aqua in sacramentis sunt offerenda.

Alexander, Urbis Romae Episcopus, omnibus orthodoxis. [epist. I. c. 4.] I. Pars. In sacramentorum oblationibus, que inter missarum solempnia Domino offeruntur, panis tantum et uinum aqua permixtum in sacrificium offerantur. Non enim debet in calice Domini aut uinum solum, aut aqua sola offerri, sed utrumque permixtum, quia utrumque ex latere eius in passione sua profluxisse legitur.

C. II. Wine without water, or conversely, may not be offered in the sacraments.

Likewise Cyprian, [book II, letter 2], greetings to brother Caecilius. Just as water alone cannot be offered in sanctifying the Lord's chalice, so neither can wine alone. For if someone offers wine only, the blood of Christ begins to be without us. For when both are mixed and, united by a mingling with one another, are joined, then the spiritual and heavenly sacrament is effected. But so the Lord's chalice is not water alone or wine alone unless both are mixed, just as the Lord's body cannot be flour alone unless both have been united and joined and made firm by the coherence of one bread.

C. II. Vinum sine aqua, uel e conuerso in sacramentis offerri non licet.

Item Ciprianus [lib. II. epist. 2.] Cecilio fratri salutem. Sic in sanctificando calicem Domini offerri sola aqua non potest, quomodo nec uinum solum potest. Nam si uinum tantum quis offerat, sanguis Christi incipit esse sine nobis. Quando enim utrumque miscetur, et adunatione confusa sibi inuicem copulantur, tunc sacramentum spirituale et celeste efficitur. Sic uero calix Domini non est aqua sola, et uinum solum, nisi utrumque misceatur, quomodo nec corpus Domini potest esse farina sola, nisi utrumque adunatum fuerit et copulatum, et panis unius conpage solidatum.

C. III. The same concerning the same matter.

Scripture says that as often as we offer the chalice in commemoration of the Lord and his Passion, we are to do what it is established that the Lord did. But see, dearest brother: if any of our predecessors either ignorantly or in simplicity did not observe and hold this which the Lord taught us to do by example and instruction, pardon can be granted to his simplicity from the Lord's indulgence; but we cannot be excused, who now have been admonished and instructed by the Lord to offer the Lord's chalice mixed with wine, according to what the Lord offered.

C. III. Idem de eodem.

Scriptura dicit: ut quotiescumque calicem in conmemorationem Domini et passionis eius offerimus, id quod constat Dominum fecisse, faciamus. Sed uide, frater karissime, si quis de antecessoribus nostris uel ignoranter uel simpliciter non hoc obseruauit et tenuit, quod nos Dominus facere exemplo et magisterio docuit, potest simplicitati eius de indulgentia Domini uenia concedi; nobis uero non potest ignosci, qui nunc a Domino ammoniti et instructi sumus, ut calicem Domini cum uino mixtum, secundum quod Dominus obtulit, offeramus.

C. IV. Nothing except wine, water, and bread ought to be offered in the sacrament.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 45]. Nothing else ought to be offered in the sanctuary except wine and water, which are blessed in a type of Christ, because while he hung on the cross, blood and water flowed from his body. These three are one in Christ Jesus; this is the victim and offering of God as an odor of sweetness.

C. IV. Preter uinum et aquam et panem in sacramento nichil debet offerri.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 45.] Non oportet aliquid aliud in sanctuario offerri preter uinum et aquam, que in tipo Christi benedicuntur, quia dum in cruce penderet, de corpore eius effluxit sanguis et, aqua. Hec tria unum sunt in Christo Iesu; hec hostia et oblatio Dei in odorem suauitatis.

C. V. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 24]. In the sacrament of the Lord's body and blood, let nothing more be offered than what the Lord himself handed down, that is, bread and wine mixed with water.

§ 1. Nor let anything more be offered in sacrifices than what comes from grapes and grains of wheat.

C. V. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 24.] In sacramento corporis et sanguinis Domini nichil amplius offeratur, quam quod ipse Dominus tradidit, hoc est panis et uinum aqua mixtum. §. 1. Nec amplius in sacrificiis offeratur, quam de uuis et frumentis.

C. VI. Let no one join grapes to the sacrifice of the offering.

Likewise from the Sixth Synod, [c. 28]. We have learned that in certain churches priests join grapes, which according to custom are offered upon the altar, to the sacrifice of the offering, and thus distribute both together to the people. We therefore command that no priest do this further, but distribute the offering alone to the people for the remission of sins; and let the people who seek them receive the grapes separately after they have been blessed and give thanks for the fruits.

C. VI. Oblationis sacrificio uuas nemo coniungat.

Item ex VI. Sinodo. [c. 28.] Didicimus, quod in quibusdam ecclesiis sacerdotes sacrificio oblationis coniungant uuas, que secundum usum in altario offeruntur, et sic simul utraque populo dispensent. Precipimus igitur, ut nullus sacerdos hoc ulterius faciat, sed in remissionem peccatorum populo oblationem solam distribuat, et uuas seorsum benedictas populus, qui petierit, accipiat, et fructuum gratias agat.

C. VII. Concerning those who erred in various ways while sacrificing.

Pope Julius to the Bishops throughout Egypt. Since every crime and sin is blotted out by sacrifices offered to God, what henceforth will be given to the Lord for the expiation of offenses when error occurs in the very offering of the sacrifice? For we have heard that some, held by schismatic ambition contrary to the divine ordinances and apostolic institutions, dedicate milk in place of wine in the divine sacrifices; that others offer the dipped Eucharist to the people as the completion of communion; that some also offer expressed wine in the sacrament of the Lord's chalice; but that others preserve throughout the whole year a linen cloth dipped in must and, at the time of sacrifice, wash a part of it with water and offer it thus. How contrary this is to evangelical and apostolic doctrine and opposed to ecclesiastical custom will not be difficult to prove from the very fountain of truth from which the ordered mysteries of the sacraments themselves proceeded. For when the teacher of truth commended the true sacrifice of our salvation to his disciples, we know that under this sacrament he gave no one milk, but only bread and the chalice. For it is read in the truth of the Gospel: "Jesus took bread and the chalice, and blessing them, gave them to his disciples." Therefore let milk cease to be offered in sacrifice, because the manifest and evident example of evangelical truth has shone forth that it is not permitted to offer anything except bread and wine.

§ 1. But as for the fact that they hand the dipped Eucharist to the people as the completion of communion, they did not receive this either from the testimony brought forth from the Gospel, where he commended his body and blood to the Apostles. For the commendation of the bread is recorded separately, and that of the chalice separately. For we do not read that Christ gave dipped bread to others, except only to that disciple whom the dipped morsel would point out as the betrayer of the master, not signify the institution of this sacrament. For that the people communicate from an expressed cluster, that is, from the berries of grapes, is altogether greatly confused; but if it is necessary, let a grape-cluster be pressed into the chalice and mixed with water, because according to the precept of the canons the Lord's chalice ought to be offered mixed with wine and water, because we see that the people are understood in the water, but the blood of Christ is shown in the wine. Therefore, when water is mixed with wine in the chalice, the people are united to Christ, and the assembly of believers is coupled and joined to him in whom it believes. This coupling and conjunction of water and wine is so mixed in the Lord's chalice that the mixture cannot be separated. For if anyone offers wine only, the blood of Christ begins to be without us. But if there is water alone, the people begin to be without Christ. Therefore, when a grape-cluster alone is offered, in which only the efficacy of wine is signified, the sacrament of our salvation, which is signified by the water, is neglected. For the Lord's chalice cannot be water alone or wine alone unless both are mixed.

§ 2. And therefore, because a very great and manifold judgment of our forebears has already flowed forth concerning this, henceforth every such error and presumption ought to cease, lest the disordered coherence of the perverse enervate the state of truth. And therefore it will henceforth be permitted to no one to offer anything else in the divine sacrifices except, according to the judgment of the ancient councils, bread alone and the chalice mixed with wine and water. One who henceforth acts otherwise than was commanded shall cease from sacrificing for as long as, corrected by lawful satisfaction of penance, he returns to the office of the grade that he lost.

C. VII. De his, qui sacrificando uarie errabant.

Iulius Papa Episcopis per Egiptum. Cum omne crimen atque peccatum oblatis Deo sacrificiis deleatur, quid de cetero pro delictorum expiatione Domino dabitur, quando in ipsa sacrificii oblatione erratur? Audiuimus enim, quosdam scismatica ambitione detentos contra diuinos ordines et apostolicas institutiones lac pro uino in diuinis sacrificiis dedicare; alios quoque intinctam eucharistiam populis pro conplemento communionis porrigere; quosdam etiam expressum uinum in sacramento dominici calicis offerre, alios uero pannum lineum musto intinctum per totum annum reseruare, et in tempore sacrificii aqua partem eius lauare, et sic offerre. Quod quam sit euangelicae atque apostolicae doctrinae contrarium, et consuetudini ecclesiasticae aduersum, non difficile ab ipso fonte ueritatis probabitur, a quo ordinata ipsa sacramentorum misteria processerunt. Cum enim magister ueritatis uerum salutis nostrae sacrificium suis conmendaret discipulis, nulli lac, sed panem tantum et calicem sub hoc sacramento cognoscimus dedisse. Legitur enim in euangelica ueritate: "Accepit Iesus panem et calicem, et benedicens dedit discipulis suis." Cesset ergo lac sacrificando offerri, quia manifestum et euidens exemplum euangelicae ueritatis illuxit, quod preter panem et uinum aliud offerri non liceat. §. 1. Illud uero, quod pro conplemento conmunionis intinctam tradunt eucharistiam populis, nec hoc prolatum ex euangelio testimonium receperunt, ubi Apostolis corpus suum et sanguinem conmendauit. Seorsum enim panis, et seorsum calicis conmendatio memoratur. Nam intinctum panem aliis Christum prebuisse non legimus, excepto illo tantum discipulo, quem intincta buccella magistri proditorem ostenderet, non que sacramenti huius institutionem signaret. Nam quod de expresso botro, id est de uuarum granis, populus communicat, ualde est omnino confusum; sed si necesse fuerit, botrus in calice conprimatur, et aqua misceatur, quia calix dominicus iuxta canonum preceptum uino et aqua permixtus debet offerri, quia uidemus in aqua populum intelligi, in uino uero ostendi sanguinem Christi. Ergo, cum in calice uino aqua miscetur, Christo populus adunatur, et credentium plebs ei, in quem credit, copulatur et iungitur. Que copulatio et coniunctio aquae et uini sic miscetur in calice Domini, ut illa mixtio non possit separari. Nam si uinum tantum quis offerat, sanguis Christi incipit esse sine nobis. Si uero aqua sit sola, plebs incipit esse sine Christo. Ergo, quando botrus solus offertur, in quo uini efficientia tantum designatur, salutis nostrae sacramentum negligitur, quod aqua significatur. Non enim potest calix Domini esse aqua sola, aut uinum solum, nisi utrumque misceatur. §. 2. Et ideo, quia ex hoc iam plurima et multiplex maiorum manauit sentencia, deinceps omnis talis error atque presumptio cessare debet, ne peruersorum inordinata conpago statum ueritatis eneruet. Et ideo nulli deinceps licitum erit aliud in diuinis sacrificiis offerre, nisi iuxta antiquorum sentenciam conciliorum panem tantum et calicem uino et aqua permixtum. De cetero aliter quam preceptum est faciens tamdiu a sacrificando cessabit, quamdiu legitima penitenciae satisfactione correptus ad gradus sui offitium redeat, quod amisit.

C. VIII. No offering can be compared to the body and blood of Christ.

Likewise Pope Alexander, fifth from Peter, [letter I]. PART II. Nothing can be greater among sacrifices than the body and blood of Christ, nor is any offering more excellent than this; rather, this surpasses all, and is to be offered to the Lord with a pure conscience, received with a pure mind, and venerated by all; and just as it is more excellent than the others, so it ought the more to be cultivated and venerated.

C. VIII. Nulla oblatio corpori et sanguini Christi conparari ualet.

Item Alexander Papa V. a Petro. [epist. I.] II. Pars. Nichil in sacrificiis maius esse potest, quam corpus et sanguis Christi, nec ulla oblatio hac potior est, sed hec omnes precellit, que pura conscientia Domino offerenda est, et pura mente sumenda, atque ab omnibus ueneranda, et sicut potior est ceteris, ita potius excoli et uenerari debet.

C. IX. We ought not to offer the peace before the mysteries have been confected.

Likewise Pope Innocent, greetings to Decentius, Bishop of Gubbio, [letter I, c. 1]. PART III. You assert, therefore, that some command the peace to the people before the mysteries have been confected, or that priests hand it among themselves, although after all those things—which I ought not disclose—the peace must necessarily be proclaimed. Through it, it is established that the people have given their consent to all that is enacted in the mysteries and celebrated in the church, and it is shown that these things have been finished by the seal of the concluding peace.

C. IX. Ante confecta misteria pacem non debemus offerre.

Item Innocentius Papa Decentio, Eugubino Episcopo, salutem. [epist. I. c. 1.] III. Pars. Pacem igitur asseris ante confecta misteria quosdam populis inperare, uel sibi sacerdotes inter se tradere, cum post omnia (que aperire non debeo) pax sit necessario indicenda, per quam constet populum ad omnia, que in misteriis aguntur atque in ecclesia celebrantur, prebuisse consensum, ac finita esse pacis concludentis signaculo demonstrentur.

C. X. A minister who disdains to communicate after the consecration shall be deprived of the thresholds of the Church.

Likewise Pope Anacletus, [letter I]. When the consecration has been completed, let all communicate who do not wish to be deprived of the thresholds of the Church. For so the Apostles also established, and the holy Roman Church holds.

C. X. Ecclesiasticis liminibus careat minister, qui post consecrationem conmunicare contempnit.

Item Anacletus Papa. [epist. I.] Peracta consecratione omnes communicent, qui noluerint ecclesiasticis carere liminibus. Sic enim et Apostoli statuerunt, et sancta Romana tenet ecclesia.

C. XI. Every priest shall receive holy communion as many times as he celebrates Mass.

Likewise from the Twelfth Council of Toledo, [c. 5]. PART IV. It has been reported to us that some priests do not receive the grace of holy communion as many times as they are seen to offer sacrifices in one day; rather, if they offer many sacrifices to God on one day, in all the offerings they withhold themselves from communion, and receive the grace of holy communion only in the offering of the final sacrifice, as though that true and singular sacrifice were not to be participated in as many times as the immolation of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ is established to have taken place. For behold, the Apostle says: *"Are not those who eat the victims participants in the altar?"* It is certain that those who sacrifice and do not eat are guilty concerning the Lord's sacrament. Therefore, whichever of the priests henceforth approaches the divine altar to offer sacrifice and withholds himself from communion, let him know that for one year he is repelled from that grace of communion of which he indecently deprived himself. For what sort of sacrifice will it be in which even the one sacrificing is not known to be a participant? Therefore it must be maintained in every way that as many times as the one sacrificing immolates upon the altar the body and blood of Jesus Christ our Lord, so many times he is to make himself a participant in receiving the body and blood of Christ.

C. XI. Quisque sacerdos, quociens missam celebrat, tociens sacram communionem percipiat.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano XII. [c. 5.] IV. Pars. Relatum est nobis, quosdam de sacerdotibus non tot uicibus communionis sanctae gratiam sumere, quot sacrificia in uno die uidentur offerre; sed si in uno die plurima deo offerant sacrificia, in omnibus se oblationibus a communione suspendunt, et in sola tantum extremi sacrificii oblatione communionis sanctae gratiam sumunt, quasi non sit tociens illi uero et singulari sacrificio participandum, quociens corporis et sanguinis Domini nostri Iesu Christi inmolatio facta constiterit. Nam ecce Apostolus dicit: "Nonne qui edunt hostias participes sunt altaris?"

Certum est, quod hi, qui sacrificantes non edunt, rei sunt dominici sacramenti. Quicumque ergo sacerdotum deinceps diuino altario sacrificium oblaturus accesserit, et se a communione suspenderit, ab ipsa, qua se indecenter priuauit, gratia communionis anno uno repulsum se nouerit. Nam quale erit sacrificium, cui nec ipse sacrificans particeps esse dinoscitur? Ergo modis omnibus tenendum est, ut, quocienscumque sacrificans corpus et sanguinem Iesu Christi Domini nostri in altario inmolat, tociens perceptionis corporis et sanguinis Christi participem se prebeat.

C. XII. A priest ought not to receive the body of Christ without his blood.

Likewise Pope Gelasius to Bishops Majoricus and John. We have discovered that some, having received only a portion of the sacred body, abstain from the chalice of the consecrated blood. These, without doubt—since they are said to be bound by I know not what superstition—must either receive the sacraments in their entirety or be barred from them in their entirety, because a division of one and the same mystery cannot occur without great sacrilege.

C. XII. Corpus Christi sine eius sanguine sacerdos non debet accipere.

Item Gelasius Papa Maiorico et Iohanni Episcopis. Conperimus autem, quod quidam sumpta tantummodo sacri corporis portione a calice sacrati cruoris abstineant. Qui proculdubio (quoniam nescio qua superstitione docentur astringi) aut integra sacramenta percipiant, aut ab integris arceantur, quia diuisio unius eiusdemque misterii sine grandi sacrilegio non potest prouenire.

C. XIII. One who receives communion of the Eucharist daily is neither reproved nor praised.

Likewise Augustine, [On Ecclesiastical Dogmas, c. 53]. PART V. I neither praise nor censure receiving communion of the Eucharist daily, yet I exhort that one communicate on every Lord's day. If, however, the mind is disposed toward sinning, I say that it is burdened by receiving the Eucharist rather than purified. And therefore, although someone is being gnawed by sin, nevertheless let him not have a will to sin henceforth; and when about to communicate, let him make satisfaction by tears and prayers and, trusting in the Lord's mercy, approach the Eucharist intrepid and secure. But I say this concerning one whom mortal sins do not burden.

The same, [letter 118, c. 3]. § 1. One person may say that the Eucharist is not to be received daily; another affirms that it is daily: let each do what according to his faith he piously believes is to be done. For Zacchaeus and that centurion did not quarrel with one another, nor did either place himself above the other, when one of them joyfully received the Lord in his house and the other said: "Lord, I am not worthy that you should enter under my roof." Both honored the Savior, although not in one manner; both were wretched in sins; both obtained mercy. To this pertains the fact that the manna tasted in each person's mouth according to his own will.

C. XIII. Eucharistiae communionem qui cottidie accipit, nec reprehenditur, nec laudatur.

Item Augustinus. [de ecclesiasticis dogmatibus, c. 53.] V. Pars. Cottidie eucharistiae communionem accipere nec laudo, nec uitupero, omnibus tamen dominicis diebus communicandum hortor; si tamen mens in affectu peccandi est. Grauari magis dico eucharistiae perceptione, quam purificari. Et ideo, quamuis quis peccato mordeatur, peccandi tamen de cetero non habeat uoluntatem, et communicaturus satisfaciat lacrimis et orationibus, et confidens de Domini miseratione, accedat ad eucharistiam intrepidus et securus. Sed hoc de illo dico, quem mortalia peccata non grauant. Idem: [epist. 118. c. 3.] §. 1. Dixerit quispiam, non cottidie accipiendam eucharistiam, alius affirmat cottidie: faciat unusquisque quod secundum fidem suam pie credit esse faciendum. Neque enim litigauerunt inter se, aut quisquam eorum alteri se preposuit, Zacheus et ille centurio, cum alter eorum gaudens in domo sua susceperit Dominum, alter dixerit: "Domine non sum dignus ut intres sub tectum meum." Ambo Saluatorem honorificantes quamuis non uno modo, ambo peccatis miseri, ambo misericordiam consecuti. Ad hoc ualet quod manna secundum propriam uoluntatem in ore cuiusque sapiebat.

C. XIV. One who always sins shall always receive the medicine of the heavenly sacrament.

Likewise Ambrose, [book IV On the Sacraments, final chapter]. If, as often as the blood of Christ is poured out, it is poured out for the remission of sins, I ought always to receive it. I, who always sin, ought always to have medicine.

C. XIV. Qui semper peccat celestis sacramenti medicinam semper accipiat.

Item Ambrosius. [lib. IV. de sacramentis, c. ult.] Si, quocienscumque effunditur sanguis Christi, in remissionem peccatorum effunditur, debeo semper accipere. Qui semper pecco, debeo semper habere medicinam.

C. XV. Let no one abstain from the body of the Lord unless he deserves to be excommunicated.

Likewise Bishop Hilary. If the sins are not so great that someone is to be excommunicated, he ought not to separate himself from the medicine of the Lord's body. Likewise Pope Fabian says:

C. XV. Non abstineat a corpore Domini, nisi qui excommunicari meretur.

Item Hylarius Episcopus. Si non sunt tanta peccata, ut excommunicetur quis, non se debet a medicina corporis Domini separare. Item Fabianus Papa ait:

C. XVI. Every one of the faithful shall communicate three times a year.

Even if not more frequently, let persons communicate at least three times a year, unless perhaps someone is impeded by any greater crimes: namely, at Easter, Pentecost, and the Nativity of the Lord. Likewise Pope Soter:

C. XVI. Ter in anno quisque fidelium communicet.

Etsi non frequentius, saltim ter in anno communicent homines, nisi forte quis maioribus criminibus quibuslibet inpediatur; in Pasca uidelicet, et Pentecosten, et Natale Domini. Item Sother Papa:

C. XVII. We ought to receive holy communion also at the Supper of the Lord.

At the Supper of the Lord the reception of the Eucharist is neglected by some. Ecclesiastical usage demonstrates that it is to be received on that same day by all the faithful—except those for whom it has been prohibited because of grave crimes—since even penitents are reconciled on that same day for receiving the sacraments of the Lord's body and blood.

C. XVII. Etiam in cena Domini sacram communionem debemus accipere.

In cena Domini perceptio eucharistiae a quibusdam negligitur, que quoniam in eadem die ab omnibus fidelibus (exceptis his, quibus pro grauibus criminibus inhibitum est) percipienda sit, ecclesiasticus usus demonstrat, cum etiam penitentes eadem die ad percipienda corporis et sanguinis dominici sacramenta reconcilientur.

C. XVIII. One who turns himself away from communion of the sacrament because of his wantonness shall be cast out of the Church.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, c. 83. If anyone enters the Church of God and hears the sacred Scriptures, but because of his wantonness turns himself away from communion of the sacrament and departs from the established rule of discipline in observing the mysteries, we decree that such a person is to be cast out of the Catholic Church until he does penance and shows the fruit of his penance, so that by receiving communion he may merit indulgence.

> C. XVIII. Proiciatur ab ecclesia qui a communione sacramenti se pro luxuria auertit.
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. c. 83. Si quis intrat in ecclesiam Dei, et sacras scripturas audit, et pro luxuria sua auertit se a communione sacramenti, et in obseruandis misteriis declinat constitutam regulam disciplinae, istum talem proiciendum esse de ecclesia catholica decernimus, donec penitenciam agat, et ostendat fructum penitenciae suae, ut possit communione percepta indulgentiam promereri.

C. XIX. Those who disdain to communicate at these three times shall not be regarded as Catholics.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 18]. Secular persons who have not communicated at the Nativity of the Lord, Easter, and Pentecost shall not be believed to be Catholics, nor be regarded among Catholics.

> C. XIX. Non habeantur catholici qui his tribus temporibus communicare despiciunt.
> Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 18.] Seculares, qui in Natale Domini, Pasca, Pentecosten non communicauerint, catholici non credantur, nec inter catholicos habeantur.

C. XX. Those who disdain to communicate in church shall be corrected.

From the Council of Toledo, [I, c. 13]. Those who enter the church and are discovered never to communicate shall be admonished. So that if they do not communicate, they shall approach penance; if they do communicate, they shall not always abstain; if they have not done so, let them abstain.

> C. XX. Corripiantur qui in ecclesia communicare contempnunt.
>
> Ex Concilio Tolletano. [I. c. 13.] Hii, qui intrant ecclesiam, et deprehenduntur numquam communicare, ammoneantur. Ut si non communicant, ad penitenciam accedant. Si communicant, non semper abstineant; si non fecerint, abstineant.

C. XXI. Before holy communion everyone shall abstain from his own wife.

Likewise from the Council of Elvira. Every person ought to abstain from his own wife for three, four, or seven days before holy communion; nor will one be numbered among Catholics who has not communicated at these times, namely Easter, Pentecost, and the Nativity of the Lord. Likewise Pope Sergius:

> C. XXI. Ante sanctam communionem a propria uxore quisque contineat.
> Item ex Concilio Elibertano. Omnis homo ante sacram communionem a propria uxore abstinere debet tribus, aut quatuor, aut septem diebus, nec inter catholicos connumerabitur qui in istis uidelicet temporibus, Pasca, Pentecosten, Natale Domini non communicauerit. Item Sergius Papa:

C. XXII. Why three parts are made from the body of Christ.

PART VI. The body of the Lord is threefold. The part of the offering placed into the chalice shows the body of Christ that has already risen. The part consumed shows the body still walking upon the earth. The part remaining on the altar until the end of the Mass shows the body in the tomb, because until the end of the age the bodies of the saints will be in tombs. Clement, [letter II]:

> C. XXII. Quare tres partes fiant ex corpore Christi.
> VI. Pars. Triforme est corpus Domini. Pars oblatae, in calicem missa, corpus Christi, quod iam resurrexit, monstrat. Pars comesta, ambulans adhuc super terram. Pars in altari usque ad finem missae remanens, corpus in sepulchro, quia usque in finem seculi corpora sanctorum in sepulchris erunt. Clemens: [epist. II.]

C. XXIII. By whom the Lord's sacraments are to be handled.

PART VII. The sacraments of the divine secrets have been entrusted to three grades, that is, the presbyter, the deacon, and the minister, who must guard with trembling and fear the remnants of the fragments of the Lord's body.

The same. § 1. Certainly, let as many holocausts be offered upon the altar as ought to suffice for the people. But if any remain, let them not be preserved for the next day, but consumed with the fear, trembling, and diligence of the clerics. But those who consume the remnants of the Lord's body that have been left in the sacristy shall not immediately assemble to receive ordinary foods, lest they appear to mix with the holy portion food that, digested through the intestines, is discharged into the privy. Therefore, if the Lord's portion is eaten in the morning, let the ministers who consumed it fast until the sixth hour; and if they have received it at the third or fourth hour, let them fast until evening. Thus are the sacraments to be guarded by an eternal, secret sanctification.

§ 2. We also command that portions of the Lord's offerings never be given at table to an outside cleric of the church or to a layperson. How do you know, you who indiscriminately dispense the sanctuary's loaves to the unworthy—how do you know whether they are clean from women? Hence David too, when he sought bread for himself to eat, was questioned by Abimelech the priest, and when he professed himself to have been clean for three days, he ate the loaves of proposition.

> C. XXIII. A quibus sunt contrectanda sacramenta dominica.
> VII. Pars. Tribus gradibus conmissa sunt sacramenta diuinorum secretorum, id est presbitero, diacono, et ministro, qui cum tremore et timore clericorum reliquias corporis domini custodire debent fragmentorum. Idem: §. 1 Tanta in altario certe holocausta offerantur, quanta populo sufficere debeant. Quod si remanserint in crastinum non reseruentur, sed cum timore et tremore clericorum et diligentia consumantur. Qui autem residua corporis Domini, que in sacrario relicta sunt, consumunt, non statim ad accipiendos communes cibos conueniant, ne putent sanctae portioni miscere cibum, qui per aqualiculos digestus in secessum diffunditur. Si ergo mane dominica portio editur, usque ad sextam ieiunent ministri, qui eam consumpserunt, et, si tertia uel quarta hora acceperint, ieiunent usque ad uesperum. Sic secreta sanctificatione eterna custodienda sunt sacramenta. §. 2. Precipimus etiam, ne umquam extero clerico ecclesiae siue laico de fragmentis oblationum Domini ad mensam donatur. Unde scis tu, qui passim sanctuarii panes indignis inpendis, unde nosti, si mundi sunt a mulieribus? Hinc et Dauid ab Abimelech sacerdote interrogatus, cum panem sibi ad comedendum posceret, cum se mundum ante triduum profiteretur, panes propositionis manducauit.

C. XXIV. Wicked persons who do not cease to communicate are polluted, not cleansed.

Likewise Isidore, [book I On the Highest Good, c. 24]. PART VIII. Let those who live wickedly in the Church and do not cease to communicate, thinking themselves to be cleansed by such communion, learn that it profits them nothing toward cleansing, as the Prophet says: "Why has my beloved committed many crimes in my house? Will holy flesh take your wickednesses away from you?" And the Apostle says: "Let a person prove himself, and so let him eat of that bread and drink from the chalice." Likewise from the Eighth Synod. Bishop Basil said:

> C. XXIV. Inficiuntur, non mundantur scelerosi, qui communicare non desinunt.
> Item Ysidorus. [lib. I. de summo bono, c. 24.] VIII. Pars. Qui scelerate uiuunt in ecclesia, et communicare non desinunt, putantes se tali communione mundari, discant nil ad emundationem proficere sibi, dicente Propheta: "Quid est, quod dilectus meus in domo mea fecit scelera multa? Numquid carnes sanctae auferent a te malicias tuas?" et Apostolus: "Probet," inquit, "se homo, et sic de pane illo edat, et de calice bibat." Item ex VIII. Sinodo. Basilius Episcopus dixit:

C. XXV. One who communicates unworthily in Christ's sacraments acquires damnation, not salvation.

The Apostle indeed teaches us fear, saying: "One who eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment for himself." But the word of the Lord teaches us faith, saying: "This is my body, which is given for many. Do this in commemoration of me."

§ 1. And the Apostle says concerning the only-begotten Son of God: "He humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, even death on a cross." Therefore, when the soul has faith in these sayings, considers the magnificence of his glory, and wonders at the excess of his humility—how so great and such a one was obedient to the Father unto death for our life—I judge that it can be aroused to affection and love for him and for God the Father, who did not spare his only Son but handed him over for us all.

§ 2. Therefore, one who receives the Lord's bread and chalice ought to prepare such faith and affection in his mind.

> C. XXV. Dampnationem, non salutem acquirit qui indigne sacramentis Christi communicat.
> Timorem quidem docet nos Apostolus, dicens: "Qui manducat et bibit indigne, iudicium sibi manducat et bibit." Fidem uero edocet nos sermo Domini, dicens: "Hoc est, quod pro multis datur, corpus meum. Hoc facite in meam conmemorationem." §. 1. Et Apostolus de unigenito Dei filio: "Humiliauit semetipsum factus obediens usque ad mortem, mortem autem crucis." Cum ergo anima fidem habet his dictis, et considerat magnificentiam gloriae ipsius, et admiratur nimietatem humilitatis, quomodo tantus ac talis obediens patri fuit usque ad mortem pro uita nostra: puto, quia possit prouocari ad affectum, et dilectionem ipsius, et Dei patris, qui unico filio non pepercit, sed pro nobis omnibus tradidit illum. §. 2. Talem ergo fidem uel affectum preparare debet in animo suo is, qui panem et calicem Domini percipit.

C. XXVI. It is to be considered not by whom, but before whom, an offering is made.

Likewise Augustine in the book Questions on Numbers, [question XX]. "And the Lord said to Moses and to Eleazar son of Aaron the priest: 'Take the bronze censers from the midst of those who were burned, and scatter this strange fire there, because they sanctified the censers of these sinners with their lives; and you shall make them into beaten plates as a covering for the altar, since they were offered before the Lord and were sanctified, and were made as a sign to the sons of Israel.'" But it is to be noted that their punishment was called "sanctified" in a new manner, the punishment of those by whom this sin had been perpetrated, because through them an example was given to the others whereby they might fear. But why he wished a covering for the altar to be made from them he added, saying: "Since they were offered before the Lord and were sanctified, they were made as a sign to the sons of Israel." Therefore, in them he did not wish the fact that they were offered by such persons to be condemned; rather, he wished this to be thought and attended to: before whom they were offered, that is, because they were offered before the Lord, so that the name of the Lord, before whom they were offered, might possess greater force in them than the most wicked merit of those by whom they were offered.

C. XXVI. Non a quo, sed ante quem offeratur, considerandum est.

Item Augustinus in libro questionum Numeri. [quest. XX.] Et dixit Dominus ad Moysem, et ad Eleazarum filium Aaron sacerdotem: "Tollite thuribula erea e medio exustorum, et ignem alienum hunc semina ibi, quia sanctificauerunt thuribula peccatorum horum in animabus suis; et facies laminas ductiles, circumpositionem altari, quoniam oblata sunt ante Dominum, et sanctificata sunt, et facta sunt in signum filiis Israel." Sed notandum, nouo modo dicta sanctificata pena eorum, a quibus hoc peccatum fuerat perpetratum, quia per eos exemplum datum est ceteris, quo timerent. Circumpositionem autem altari cur ex eis fieri uoluit, addidit dicens: "quoniam oblata sunt ante Dominum, et sanctificata facta sunt in signum filiis Israel." Non ergo in eis reprobari uoluit, quod a talibus oblata sunt, sed potius hoc cogitare et attendi, ante quem oblata sint, id est, quia ante Dominum, ut plus in eis ualeret nomen Domini, ante quem oblata sunt, quam pessimum meritum eorum, a quibus oblata sunt.

C. XXVII. The penance of one through whose negligence some of Christ's blood spills.

Likewise from the Decree of Pope Pius. PART IX. If through negligence some of the blood has spilled upon the ground, let it be licked up and the board scraped. If there was no board, let the place be scraped so that it is not trodden upon, and let what was scraped be consumed by fire, and let the ash be stored within the altar; and let the priest do penance for forty days. If the chalice has spilled upon the altar, let the minister suck up the drop and do penance for three days. If it has spilled upon the altar linen and the drop has reached another linen, let him do penance for four days. If as far as a third, for nine days. If as far as a fourth, for twenty days. And let the minister wash the linens that the drop touched three times, with a chalice placed beneath; and let the water of the washing be taken up and stored beside the altar.

C. XXVII. Penitencia eius, cuius negligentia de Christi sanguine aliquid stillat.

Item ex Decreto Papae Pii. IX. Pars. Si per negligentiam aliquid de sanguine stillauerit in terram, linguabitur, tabula radetur. Si non fuerit tabula, ut non conculcetur, locus corradetur, et igne consumetur, et cinis intra altare condetur, et sacerdos XL. diebus peniteat. Si super altare stillauerit calix, sorbeat minister stillam, et III. diebus peniteat. Si super linteum altaris, et ad aliud stilla peruenerit, IV. diebus peniteat. Si usque ad tercium, IX. diebus peniteat. Si usque ad quartum, XX. diebus peniteat, et lintheamina, que tetigerint stillam, tribus uicibus minister abluat calice subter posito, et aqua ablutionis sumatur, et iuxta altare recondatur.

C. XXVIII. What penance is to be imposed upon one who vomits the sacrifice.

Likewise from the Penitential of Bede the Presbyter, [chapter on drunkenness]. If anyone has vomited the Eucharist through drunkenness or gluttony, let him do penance for forty days; clerics, monks, deacons, or presbyters, for seventy days; bishops, for ninety. If one has vomited because of illness, let them do penance for seven days.

> C. XXVIII. Que penitencia sit inponenda ei qui sacrificium euomit.
>
> Item ex Penitenciali Bedae Presbiteri. [c. de ebrietate] Si quis per ebrietatem uel uoracitatem eucharistiam euomuerit, XL. diebus peniteat; clerici, uel monachi, seu diaconi, presbiteri LXX. diebus peniteant; episcopi XC. Si pro infirmitatis causa euomuerit, VII. diebus peniteant.

C. XXIX. Priests shall administer the divine sacraments only in person.

Likewise from the Council of Reims, c. 2. PART X. It has come to our knowledge that certain presbyters hold the divine mysteries in so little regard that they hand the sacred body of the Lord to a layman or woman to carry to the sick, and the holy of holies are entrusted to those who are prohibited from entering the sacristy or approaching the altar. How horrible and detestable this is, the prudence of all religious persons perceives. Therefore the synod altogether prohibits such rash presumption from taking place further; rather, in every way let the presbyter communicate the sick person in person. But if he has acted otherwise, he will lie under danger to his grade.

> C. XXIX. Sacerdotes non nisi per se diuina sacramenta ministrent.
> Item ex Concilio Remensi, c. 2. X. Pars. Peruenit ad notitiam nostram, quod quidam presbiteri in tantum paruipendant diuina misteria, ut laico aut feminae sacrum corpus Domini tradant ad deferendum infirmis, et quibus prohibetur, ne sacrarium ingrediantur, nec ad altare appropinquent, illis sancta sanctorum conmittuntur. Quod quam sit horribile quam que detestabile, omnium religiosorum animaduertit prudentia. Igitur interdicit per omnia sinodus, ne talis temeraria presumptio ulterius fiat; sed omnimodis presbiter per semetipsum infirmum communicet. Quod si aliter fecerit, gradus sui periculo subiacebit.

C. XXX. When Mass is celebrated, laypersons shall not presume to enter the presbytery.

Likewise Pope Clement. PART XI. It is fitting that the honors of priests and other clerics serving churches appear distinct from those of laypersons. Therefore it is permitted to no layperson to stand in the place where priests and the other clerics stand—which is called the presbytery—when Mass is celebrated, so that the sacred offices can be exercised freely and honorably.

> C. XXX. Quando celebratur missa, presbiterium laici ingredi non presumant.
> Item Clemens Papa. XI. Pars. Sacerdotum aliorumque clericorum ecclesiis seruientium honores a laicorum discrete apparere conueniunt. Quamobrem nulli laicorum liceat in eo loco, ubi sacerdotes et reliqui clerici consistunt (quod presbiterium nuncupatur), quando missa celebratur, consistere, ut libere ac honorifice possint sacra offitia exerceri.

C. XXXI. Just as in the metropolitan church, so everywhere the solemnities of Masses shall be celebrated.

Likewise from the Council of Girona, [c. 1]. PART XII. Let the institution of Masses be observed in the name of God in all provinces just as it is performed in the metropolitan church, both the order of the Mass itself and the custom of psalmody or ministry.

> C. XXXI. Sicut in metropolitana ecclesia, ita ubique missarum solempnia celebrentur.
> Item ex Concilio Gerundensi. [c. 1.] XII. Pars. Institutio missarum, sicut in metropolitana ecclesia agitur, ita in Dei nomine in omnibus prouinciis tam ipsius missae ordo, quam psallendi uel ministrandi consuetudo seruetur.

C. XXXII. What sacrifice is; what sacrament is.

Likewise Augustine in book X of The City of God, [c. 5]. PART XIII. A sacrifice is the visible sacrament of an invisible sacrifice, that is, a sacred sign.

Likewise elsewhere. § 1. A sacrament is the visible form of invisible grace.

> C. XXXII. Quid sit sacrificium, quid sacramentum.
> Item Augustinus in libro X. de ciuitate Dei. [c. 5.] XIII. Pars. Sacrificium est uisibile inuisibilis sacrificii sacramentum, id est sacrum signum. Item alibi: §. 1. Sacramentum est inuisibilis gratiae uisibilis forma.

C. XXXIII. What a sign is.

The same in book II of On Christian Doctrine, [c. 1]. A sign is a thing which, beyond the appearance that it presents to the senses, causes something else to come into cognition from itself. Likewise Gregory in an Easter homily:

> C. XXXIII. Quid sit signum.
> Idem in libro II. de doctrina Christiana. [c. 1.] Signum est res preter speciem, quam ingerit sensibus, aliud aliquid ex se faciens in cognitionem uenire. Item Gregorius in omelia pascali:

C. XXXIV. After consecration, not the substance but the species remains.

"Species" and "likeness" are the names of those things that existed before, namely bread and wine. Hence at the end of a certain Mass prayer is made and it is said: "May your sacraments, we beseech you, Lord, accomplish in us what they contain, so that what we now bear in a species we may receive in the reality of the things."

The priest indeed asks that the body of Christ, which is now borne under the species of bread and wine, may sometime be received in manifest vision, just as it truly is. Concerning this vision the Lord says in the Gospel according to John: "He who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I will love him and manifest myself to him." Although some not improbably expound in this place the reality itself of the flesh and blood as the efficacy of those same things, that is, the remission of sins.

> C. XXXIV. Post consecrationem non substantia, sed species remanet.
> Species et similitudo illarum rerum uocabula sunt, que ante fuerunt, scilicet panis et uini. Unde in fine cuiusdam missae oratur et dicitur: "Perficiant in nobis, quesumus Domine, tua sacramenta quod continent, ut que nunc specie gerimus rerum ueritate capiamus."

Postulat quippe sacerdos, ut corpus Christi, quod sub specie panis et uini nunc geritur, manifesta uisione, sicuti reuera est, quandoque capiatur. De qua uisione Dominus in euangelio secundum Iohannem: "Qui diligit me diligetur a patre meo, et ego diligam eum, et manifestabo ei me ipsum." Quamuis non inprobabiliter quidam exponant hoc loco carnis et sanguinis ueritatem ipsam eorundem efficientiam, id est peccatorum remissionem.

C. XXXV. Visible creatures are invisibly converted into Christ's body and blood.

Likewise Eusebius of Emesa. PART XIV. Because he was about to remove the assumed body from sight and bring it to the stars, it was necessary that on the day of the Supper he consecrate for us the sacrament of his body and blood, so that what was once offered as a price might perpetually be cultivated through a mystery; so that, because a daily and unwearied redemption was proceeding for the salvation of human beings, the offering of redemption might be perpetual, and that perpetual victim might live in memory and always be present in grace, truly a unique and perfect sacrifice, to be appraised by faith, not by appearance, nor judged by outward sight, but by inward affection. Hence heavenly authority confirms that "my flesh is truly food and my blood is truly drink."

§ 1. Therefore let every uncertainty of unbelief withdraw, since he who is the author of the gift is himself also a witness of its reality. For the invisible priest also converts the visible creatures into the substance of his body and blood by his word through hidden power, saying thus: "Take and eat; this is my body"; and with the sanctification repeated: "Take and drink; this is my blood." Therefore, at the nod of the Lord who commands, the heights of the heavens, the depths of the waves, and the expanses of the lands suddenly came forth from nothing. By equal power in the spiritual sacraments, where power commands, the effect serves.

§ 2. Therefore, how great and how worthy of celebration are the benefits that the force of the divine blessing works, and how it ought not to seem new and impossible to you that earthly and mortal things are converted into Christ's substance—ask yourself, you who have been regenerated in Christ. A little while ago, alien to life, a stranger to mercy, and inwardly dead to the way of salvation, you wandered in exile. Suddenly, initiated into Christ's laws and renewed by the saving mysteries, you passed over into the body of the Church not by seeing but by believing; and from a son of perdition you merited to become an adopted son of God by hidden purity. Remaining in visible measure, you became greater than yourself invisibly without increase of quantity. Although you were one and the same, you came forth greatly other through the advances of faith; nothing was added outwardly, and everything was changed inwardly. And thus a human being was made a son of Christ, and Christ was formed in the mind of the human being. Therefore, just as without bodily perception you suddenly put aside your former vileness and were clothed with new dignity; and just as what God healed in you when injured, washed when infected, and wiped clean when stained, was entrusted not to your eyes but to your understanding: so, when you ascend the reverend altar to be filled with spiritual foods, behold the sacred body and blood of your God by faith; honor it, marvel at it, touch it with the mind, receive it with the hand of the heart, and above all take the whole of it by the draught of the inward person.

C. XXXV. Visibiles creaturae in Christi corpus et sanguinem inuisibiliter conuertuntur.

Item Eusebius Emisenus. XIV. Pars. Quia corpus assumptum ablaturus erat ab oculis, et illaturus sideribus, necessarium erat, ut die cenae sacramentum nobis corporis et sanguinis consecraret, ut coleretur iugiter per misterium, quod semel offerebatur in precium, ut quia cottidiana, et indefessa currebat pro hominum salute redemptio, perpetua esset redemptionis oblatio, et perhennis uictima illa uiueret in memoria, et semper presens esset in gratia uere unica et perfecta hostia, fide estimanda, non specie, nec exteriori censenda uisu, sed interiori affectu. Unde celestis confirmat auctoritas, quia "caro mea uere est cibus, et sanguis meus uere est potus." §. 1. Recedat ergo omne infidelitatis ambiguum, quandoquidem qui auctor est muneris ipse etiam est testis ueritatis. Nam et inuisibilis sacerdos uisibiles creaturas in substantiam corporis et sanguinis sui uerbo suo secreta potestate conuertit, ita dicens: "Accipite et comedite, hoc est corpus meum;" et sanctificatione repetita: "Accipite, et bibite, hic est sanguis meus." Ergo ad nutum precipientis Domini repente ex nichilo substiterunt excelsa celorum, profunda fluctuum, uasta terrarum: pari potestate in spiritualibus sacramentis, ubi precipit uirtus, seruit effectus. §. 2. Quanta itaque et quam celebranda beneficia uis diuinae benedictionis operetur, et, quomodo tibi nouum et inpossibile esse non debeat, quod in Christi substantiam terrena et mortalia conuertuntur, te ipsum, qui in Christo es regeneratus, interroga. Dudum alienus a uita, peregrinus a misericordia, a salutis uia intrinsecus mortuus exulabas; subito initiatus Christi legibus, et salutaribus misteriis innouatus, in corpus ecclesiae non uidendo, sed credendo transsiluisti, et de filio perditionis adoptiuus Dei fieri occulta puritate meruisti; in mensura uisibili permanens maior factus es te ipso inuisibiliter sine quantitatis augmento; cum idem atque ipse esses, multo alter fidei processibus extitisti; in exteriori nichil additum est, et totum in interiori mutatum est, ac sic homo Christi filius effectus, et Christus in mente hominis est formatus. Sicut ergo sine corporali sensu, uilitate preterita deposita, subito indutus es dignitatem nouam, et sicut hoc, quod Deus lesa in te curauit, infecta diluit, maculata detersit, non oculis, sed sensibus tuis sunt credita: et cum reuerendum altare cibis spiritualibus satiandus ascendis, sacrum Dei tui corpus et sanguinem fide respice, honora, mirare, mente continge, cordis manu suscipe, et maxime totum haustu interioris hominis assume.

C. XXXVI. Why Christ ministered his sacrament to us in the species of bread and wine.

Likewise Augustine. Because the Lord suffered for us, he commended to us in this sacrament his blood and body, which he also made us ourselves. For we too have been made his body, and through his mercy we are what we have received. Remember: you did not exist, and you were created; you were carried to the Lord's threshing floor; you were threshed by the labors of the oxen, that is, of those announcing the Gospel. When you were being carried as catechumens, you were being kept in the granary; you gave your names; you began to be ground by fasts and exorcisms; afterward you came to the water and were sprinkled, and you were made the Lord's bread. Behold what you have received. Therefore, just as you see that what was made is one, so be one yourselves, loving one another, holding one faith, one hope, an undivided charity. When heretics receive this, they receive testimony against themselves, because they seek division when this bread points to unity. So too wine was in many clusters and now is one; the chalice is one in its birth after the pressing of the winepress. And you, after those fasts, after labors, after humiliation and contrition, have now come in Christ's name as though to the chalice; and there you are upon the table and in the chalice; you are with us. For together we receive this, together we drink, because together we live.

Likewise in the sermon on infants. § 1. Thus our Lord Jesus Christ signified us, willed us to belong to himself, and consecrated at the table the mystery of our peace and unity. One who receives the mystery of unity and does not hold the bond of peace has not received a mystery for himself but testimony against himself. It is in no way to be doubted by anyone that each of the faithful is then a participant in the Lord's body and blood when in baptism he is made a member of Christ, nor is he estranged from the fellowship of that bread and chalice even if, before he eats that bread and drinks the chalice, he departs from this world while established in the unity of Christ's body. For he is not deprived of participation in and the benefit of that sacrament when that which the sacrament signifies is found in him.

C. XXXVI. Quare in specie panis et uini sacramentum suum Christus nobis ministrauit.

Item Augustinus. Quia passus est pro nobis Dominus, conmendauit nobis in isto sacramento sanguinem suum et corpus, quod etiam fecit nosmetipsos. Nam et nos corpus ipsius facti sumus, et per misericordiam ipsius quod accepimus nos sumus. Recordamini: et uos non fuistis, et creati estis; ad aream dominicam conportati estis; laboribus boum, id est annunciantium euangelium, triturati estis; quando catecumini deferebamini, in horreo seruabamini, nomina uestra dedistis, cepistis moli ieiuniis et exorcismis; postea ad aquam uenistis, et conspersi estis, et panis dominicus facti estis. Ecce, quod accepistis. Quomodo ergo unum uidetis esse quod factum est, sic unum estote uos, diligentes uos, tenendo unam fidem, unam spem, indiuiduam karitatem. Heretici, quando hoc accipiunt, testimonium contra se accipiunt, quia illi querunt diuisionem, cum panis iste indicet unitatem. Sic et uinum in multis racemis fuit, et modo unum est, unum est in sua natiuitate calix post pressuram torcularis. Et uos post illa ieiunia, post labores, post humilitatem et contricionem, iam in nomine Christi tamquam ad calicem uenistis, et ibi uos estis in mensa, et in calice, nobiscum uos estis. Simul enim hoc sumimus, simul bibimus, quia simul uiuimus. Item in sermone de infantibus: §. 1. Ita Dominus noster Iesus Christus nos significauit, nos ad se pertinere uoluit, misterium pacis et unitatis nostrae in mensa consecrauit. Qui accepit misterium unitatis, et non tenet uinculum pacis, non misterium accepit pro se, sed testimonium contra se. Nulli est aliquatenus ambigendum, unumquemque fidelium corporis et sanguinis dominici tunc esse participem, quando in baptismate membrum efficitur Christi, nec alienari ab illius panis calicisque consortio, etiamsi ante, quam panem illum comedat, calicemque bibat, de hoc seculo migrauerit in unitate corporis Christi constitutus. Sacramenti quippe illius participatione ac beneficio non priuatur, quando in se hoc, quod illud sacramentum significat, inuenitur.

C. XXXVII. While the host is broken, Christ's Passion is recalled to memory.

The same in the book of Prosper's Sentences. While the host is broken, while the blood from the chalice is poured into the mouths of the faithful, what else is signified but the immolation of the Lord's body upon the cross and the pouring out of his blood from his side? Likewise Bishop Leo and the holy synod that assembled in the city of Rome, to the Clergy, honored persons, and people dwelling at Constantinople:

C. XXXVII. Dum hostia frangitur, passio Christi ad memoriam reuocatur.

Idem in libro sentenciarum Prosperi. Dum hostia frangitur, dum sanguis de calice in ora fidelium funditur, quid aliud, quam dominici corporis in cruce inmolatio, eiusque sanguinis de latere effusio designatur? Item Leo Episcopus, et sancta sinodus, que in urbe Romana conuenit, Clero, honoratis, et plebi consistenti Constantinopolim:

C. XXXVIII. No one is permitted to doubt the reality of Christ's body and blood.

PART XV. In what darkness of ignorance, in what torpor of sloth have these persons lain until now, so that they learned neither by hearing nor knew by reading what is so harmonious in the mouth of all in the Church that even from the tongues of infants the reality of Christ's body and blood is taught among the sacraments of communion? For in that mystical distribution of spiritual nourishment, this is imparted, this is received: that, receiving the power of the heavenly food, we pass into the flesh of him who became our flesh. The same is the food of refreshment, is the food of blood. For just as the Lord's flesh is truly food, so his blood truly is our drink.

The same. § 1. It is the body concerning which it was said: "My flesh is truly food, and my blood is truly drink." Around this body are the eagles that fly about on spiritual wings.

§ 2. Hence we also eat that same body of Christ so that we may be participants in eternal life.

The same. § 3. Let us use the examples of him whose clear arguments we use; and by the example of the incarnation also let us establish the reality of the mystery.

§ 4. Why do you seek the order of nature here in Christ's body, when Christ himself was born from a Virgin beyond nature?

> C. XXXVIII. De ueritate corporis et sanguinis Christi nulli ambigere licet.
> XV. Pars. In quibus isti ignorantiae tenebris, in quo hactenus desidiae torpore iacuerunt, ut nec auditu discerent, uel lectione cognoscerent, quod in ecclesia in omnium ore tam consonum est, ut nec ab infantium linguis ueritas corporis et sanguinis Christi inter communionis sacramenta doceatur, quia in illa mistica distributione spiritualis alimoniae hoc inpertitur, hoc sumitur, ut accipientes uirtutem celestis cibi in carnem ipsius qui caro nostra factus est, transeamus? Idem est cibus refectionis, est cibus sanguinis. Sicut enim caro Domini uere est cibus, ita sanguis uere noster est potus. Idem: §. 1. Est corpus, de quo dictum est: "Caro mea uere est esca, et sanguis meus uere est potus." Circa hoc corpus aquilae sunt, que alis circumuolant spiritualibus. §. 2. Unde et idem corpus Christi edimus, ut uitae eternae possimus esse participes. Idem: §. 3. Cuius clare argumentis utimur, suis utamur exemplis, incarnationis quoque exemplo astruamus misterii ueritatem. §. 4. Quid hic queris naturae ordinem in Christi corpore, cum preter naturam sit ipse Christus partus ex Virgine?

C. XXXIX. The body and blood of Christ are not born by nature but confected for us by consecration.

Likewise Ambrose in the book On Catechizing the Uninstructed. The bread and chalice—not just any bread and chalice, but made mystical for us by a determinate consecration—are not born. Therefore, what is made thus for us, although it is bread and chalice, is nourishment of the resurrection, not a sacrament of religion; not that which we bless and for which we give thanks to the Lord in every gift of his, not only spiritual but also bodily.

> C. XXXIX. Non natura nascitur, sed consecratione nobis conficitur corpus et sanguis Christi.
> Item Ambrosius in libro de catecizandis rudibus. Panis et calix non quilibet, sed certa consecratione misticus fit nobis, non nascitur. Proinde, quod ita fit nobis, quamuis sit panis et calix, alimentum est resurrectionis, non sacramentum religionis; non quod benedicimus, gratiasque agimus Domino in omni eius munere, non tantum spirituali, uerum etiam corporali.

C. XL. What before the blessing is bread and wine, after the blessing is the body and blood of Christ.

The same in the book On Offices. Before the blessing one species is named; after the blessing the body is signified.

Likewise. § 1. In that sacrament Christ is.

Likewise, [book IV On the Sacraments, c. 5]. § 2. Whoever eats this body, remission of sins will be effected for him.

> C. XL. Quod ante benedictionem panis et uinum est post benedictionem est corpus et sanguis Christi.
> Idem in libro de offitiis. Ante benedictionem alia species nominatur, post benedictionem corpus significatur. Item: §. 1. In illo sacramento Christus est. Item: [lib. 4. de sacramentis, c. 5.] §. 2. Qui manducauerit hoc corpus, fiet ei remissio peccatorum.

C. XLI. Under the species of bread and wine we honor the invisible flesh and blood of Christ.

Likewise Augustine in the book of Prosper's Sentences. But we honor, in the species of bread and wine which we see, the invisible realities, that is, flesh and blood; nor do we value these two species in the same manner as we valued them before consecration, since we faithfully confess that before consecration there are bread and wine, which nature formed, but after consecration there are Christ's flesh and blood, which the blessing consecrated.

> C. XLI. Sub specie panis et uini inuisibilem Christi carnem et sanguinem honoramus.
> Item Augustinus in libro sententiarum Prosperi. Nos autem in specie panis et uini, quam uidemus, res inuisibiles, id est carnem et sanguinem, honoramus, nec similiter pendimus has duas species, quemadmodum ante consecrationem pendebamus, cum fideliter fateamur, ante consecrationem panem esse et uinum, quod natura formauit; post consecrationem uero Christi carnem esse et sanguinem, quod benedictio consecrauit.

C. XLII. The confession of Berengar.

PART XVI. I, Berengar, unworthy deacon of the Church of Saint Maurice of Angers, acknowledging the true, Catholic, and apostolic faith, anathematize every heresy, especially that of which I have until now been accused, which endeavors to assert that the bread and wine which are placed upon the altar are after consecration only a sacrament and not the true body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that they cannot perceptibly—except in the sacrament alone—be handled or broken by the hands of the priests or ground by the teeth of the faithful. But I consent to the holy Roman Church and apostolic see, and with mouth and heart profess that concerning the sacraments of the Lord's table I hold the same faith which lord and venerable Pope Nicholas and this holy synod, by evangelical and apostolic authority, have handed down as to be held and have confirmed for me: namely, that the bread and wine which are placed upon the altar are after consecration not only a sacrament but also the true body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and perceptibly are not only a sacrament but in truth are handled and broken by the hands of the priests and ground by the teeth of the faithful; swearing by the holy and consubstantial Trinity and by these most sacred Gospels of Christ. I pronounce that those who come against this faith, together with their doctrines and their followers, are worthy of eternal anathema. But if I myself should at any time presume to think or preach anything contrary to these things, let me lie under the severity of the canons. Having read and reread it, I willingly subscribed.

§ 1. Pope Nicholas sent throughout the cities of Italy, Germany, and Gaul, and to whatever places the report of his depravity had previously been able to reach, this confession of his faith concerning the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, made by Berengar at Rome in the presence of 113 bishops, so that the churches which had first grieved over one who was turned away and adverse might afterward rejoice over one who was returned and converted.

C. XLII. Confessio Berengarii.

XVI. Pars. Ego Berengarius, indignus ecclesiae S. Mauritii Andegauensis diaconus, cognoscens ueram, catholicam et apostolicam fidem, anathematizo omnem heresim, precipue eam, de qua hactenus infamatus sum, que astruere conatur, panem et uinum, que in altari ponuntur, post consecrationem solummodo sacramentum, et non uerum corpus et sanguinem Domini nostri Iesu Christi esse, nec posse sensualiter, nisi in solo sacramento manibus sacerdotum tractari, uel frangi, aut fidelium dentibus atteri. Consentio autem sanctae Romanae ecclesiae et apostolicae sedi, et ore et corde profiteor, de sacramentis dominicae mensae eandem fidem me tenere, quam dominus et uenerabilis Papa Nykolaus, et hec sancta sinodus auctoritate euangelica et apostolica tenendam tradidit michique firmauit: scilicet panem et uinum, que in altari ponuntur, post consecrationem non solum sacramentum, sed etiam uerum corpus et sanguinem Domini nostri Iesu Christi esse, et sensualiter non solum sacramentum, sed in ueritate manibus sacerdotum tractari, frangi, et fidelium dentibus atteri; iurans per sanctam, et homousion Trinitatem, et per hec sacrosancta Christi euangelia. Eos, qui contra hanc fidem uenerint, cum dogmatibus et sectatoribus suis eterno anathemate dignos esse pronuncio. Quod si ego ipse aliquando contra hec aliquid sentire presumpsero aut predicare, canonum seueritati subiaceam. Lecto et perlecto sponte subscripsi. §. 1. Hanc confessionem suae fidei de corpore et sanguine Domini nostri Iesu Christi a Berengario Romae coram CXIII. episcopis factam misit Nykolaus Papa per urbes Italiae, Germaniae, Galliae, et ad quecumque loca fama prauitatis eius peruenire ante potuit, ut ecclesiae, que prius doluerant de auerso atque aduerso, postea gaudeant de reuerso atque conuerso.

C. XLIII. Why the species of the elements are preserved, although there truly is Christ's body and blood.

Ambrose in the book On Offices. Perhaps you say: How is there true flesh, how true blood, when I do not see the likeness of flesh, I do not see the reality of blood? First of all, I told you concerning the word of Christ, which works so as to be able to change and convert the kinds and institutions of nature. Then, when his disciples did not bear the word of Christ but, hearing that he would give his flesh to eat and his blood to drink, were withdrawing, Peter alone nevertheless said: "You have the words of eternal life, and how shall I withdraw from you?" Therefore, lest more persons say this, and lest there be as it were a certain horror of blood, but the grace of redemption remain, for this reason you indeed receive the sacrament in a likeness, but truly attain the glory and power of the nature. "I am," he says, "the living bread that descended from heaven."

C. XLIII. Quare elementorum species reseruentur, cum uere sit Christi corpus et sanguis.

Ambrosius in libro de offitiis. Forte dicas, quomodo uera caro, quomodo uerus sanguis, qui similitudinem non uideo carnis, non uideo sanguinis ueritatem? Primo omnium dixi tibi de sermone Christi, qui operatur, ut possit mutare et conuertere genera et instituta naturae. Deinde, ubi non tulerunt sermonem Christi discipuli eius, sed audientes, quod carnem suam daret manducare, et sanguinem suum ad bibendum, recedebant, solus tamen Petrus dixit: "Verba uitae eternae habes, et ego a te quomodo recedam?" Ne igitur plures hoc dicerent, et ne ueluti quidam esset horror cruoris, sed maneret gratia redemptionis, ideo in similitudine quidem accipis sacramentum, sed uere naturae gloriam uirtutemque consequeris. "Ego sum," inquit, "panis uiuus, qui de celo descendi."

C. XLIV. We ought to receive Christ's body and blood not carnally but spiritually.

Likewise Augustine in the exposition of Psalm 54. The first heresy, he says, indeed arose among Christ's disciples, as though from the hardness of his discourse. For when he said, "Unless someone eats my flesh and drinks my blood, he will not have eternal life," they, not understanding, said to one another: "This is a hard discourse; who can eat it?" By saying that this is a hard discourse, they separated themselves from him, and he remained with the twelve. As they departed, he instructed those who had remained. "It is the Spirit," he says, "that gives life; the flesh profits nothing. The words that I have spoken to you are Spirit and life." Have you understood them spiritually? They are Spirit and life. Have you understood them carnally? Even so, they are Spirit and life, but they are not so for you. Understand spiritually the things that I have spoken. You are not going to eat this body which you see and drink that blood which those who crucify me are going to pour out. I have commended a certain sacrament to you: understood spiritually, it will give you life; but the flesh profits nothing. Yet how did they understand it? They understood flesh in the manner in which it is sold in a corpse or torn apart in the meat market. "But Jesus, knowing, said: Does this scandalize you, because I said: I give you my flesh to eat and my blood to drink? What, then, if you see the Son of Man ascending where he was before?" What is this? From this he resolved what had disturbed them; from this he disclosed the source of their scandal: from this plainly, if they understood. But they thought that he was going to distribute his body. He said that he was going to ascend into heaven, assuredly whole. "When you see the Son of Man ascending where he was before," certainly then at least you will see that he does not distribute his body in the manner in which you think, or then at least you will understand that his grace is not received in bites.

Likewise, [tractate 30 on John]. § 1. Until the age is ended, the Lord is above; but nevertheless even here the Lord's reality is with us. For the body in which he rose must be in one place, but his reality is diffused everywhere.

C. XLIV. Non carnaliter, sed spiritualiter Christi corpus et sanguinem debemus accipere.

Item Augustinus in expositione Psalmo LIV. Prima quidem, inquit, heresis in discipulis Christi, uelut a duricia sermonis eius facta est. Cum enim diceret: "Nisi quis manducauerit carnem meam, et biberit sanguinem meum, non habebit uitam eternam," illi non intelligentes dixerunt ad inuicem: "Durus est hic sermo, quis eum potest manducare." Dicentes, quia durus est hic sermo, separauerunt se ab illo; et remansit cum duodecim. Discedentibus illis instruxit eos, qui remanserant. Spiritus est, inquit, qui uiuificat; caro nichil prodest. Verba, que locutus sum ad uos, Spiritus et uita sunt. Intellexistis spiritualiter? Spiritus et uita sunt. Intellexistis carnaliter? Etiam sic illa spiritus et uita sunt, sed tibi non sunt. Spiritualiter intelligite que locutus sum. Non hoc corpus, quod uidetis, manducaturi estis, et bibituri illum sanguinem, quem fusuri sunt qui me crucifigent. Sacramentum, aliquod uobis conmendaui: spiritualiter intellectum uiuificabit uos; caro autem non prodest quicquam. Sed quomodo illi intellexerunt? Carnem quippe sic intellexerunt, quomodo in cadauere uenditur, aut in macello dilaniatur. "Sciens autem Iesus ait: hoc uos scandalizat, quia dixi: do uobis carnem meam manducare, et sanguinem meum bibere? Si ergo uideritis filium hominis ascendentem, ubi erat prius?" Quid est hoc? Hinc soluit, quod illos mouerat; hinc aperuit, unde fuerant scandalizati: hinc plane, si intelligerent. Illi autem putabant, erogaturum corpus suum. Ille dixit, se ascensurum in celum, utique integrum. Cum uideritis filium hominis ascendentem, ubi erat prius? certe uel tunc uidebitis, quia non eo modo, quo putatis, erogat corpus suum, uel tunc intelligetis, quia gratia eius non sumitur morsibus. Item: [tractatu 30. in Iohannem: §. 1.] Donec seculum finiatur, sursum est Dominus; sed tamen etiam hic nobiscum est ueritas Dominus. Corpus enim, in quo resurrexit, uno loco esse oportet; ueritas autem eius ubique diffusa est.

C. XLV. How Christ's body that hung upon the cross is received, and how it is not.

Likewise Augustine in the letter to Irenaeus. You are not going to eat this body which you see and drink that blood which those who crucify me will pour out: the same indeed and not the same—the same invisibly, not the same visibly. Hence it is also added: If it is necessary that it be celebrated visibly, nevertheless it is necessary that it be understood invisibly.

C. XLV. Quomodo Christi corpus quod in cruce pependit, accipitur, et quomodo non.

Item Augustinus in epistola ad Ireneum. Non hoc corpus, quod uidetis, manducaturi estis, et bibituri illum sanguinem quem effusuri sunt illi qui me crucifigent; ipsum quidem et non ipsum ipsum inuisibiliter, non ipsum uisibiliter. Unde et subditur: Si necesse est, illud celebrari uisibiliter, necesse tamen est, inuisibiliter intelligi.

C. XLVI. What it is to eat Christ's body and drink his blood.

Likewise Augustine in the sermon on the words of the Gospel. What is it to eat Christ? It is not this alone: to receive his body in the sacrament. For many receive it unworthily, concerning whom the Apostle says: "He who eats and drinks the chalice of the Lord unworthily eats and drinks judgment for himself." But how is Christ to be eaten? As he himself says: "He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood remains in me, and I in him." Even if he receives the sacrament, he acquires a great torment.

C. XLVI. Quid sit corpus Christi manducare, et sanguinem eius bibere.

Item Augustinus in sermone de uerbis euangelii. Quid est Christum manducare? non est hoc solum, in sacramento corpus eius accipere. Multi enim indigne accipiunt, de quibus Apostolus ait: "Qui manducat et bibit calicem Domini indigne, iudicium sibi manducat et bibit." Sed quomodo manducandus est Christus? Quomodo ipse dicit: "Qui manducat carnem meam, et bibit sanguinem meum, in me manet, et ego in illo." Etsi accipit sacramentum, acquirit magnum tormentum.

C. XLVII. To believe in Christ is to eat him.

Likewise Augustine in the book On the Remedy of Penance. Why do you prepare tooth and belly? Believe, and you have eaten. For to believe in him is to eat the living bread. He who believes in him eats him.

C. XLVII. Credere in Christum est manducare ipsum.

Item Augustinus in libro de remedio penitenciae. Ut quid paras dentem et uentrem? Crede, et manducasti. Credere enim in eum, hoc est panem uiuum manducare. Qui credit in eum manducat eum.

C. XLVIII. The sacrament and the reality of the sacrament are confected as the sacrifice of the Church.

Likewise Augustine in the book of Prosper's Sentences. This is what we say, what we strive in every way to prove: that the sacrifice of the Church is confected from two things and consists of two things —the visible species of the elements and the invisible flesh and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ; and the sacrament and the reality of the sacrament, that is, the body of Christ—just as the person of Christ consists and is composed of God and a human being, since Christ himself is true God and true man, because every thing contains in itself the nature and reality of those things from which it is composed. But the sacrifice of the Church is confected from two things: the sacrament and the reality of the sacrament, that is, the body of Christ. Therefore there is the sacrament and the reality of the sacrament, that is, the body of Christ.

Likewise. § 1. It is his flesh which we receive in the sacrament covered by the form of bread, and his blood which we drink under the species and flavor of wine. The flesh, namely, is the sacrament of flesh, and blood the sacrament of blood; by flesh and blood, each invisible, spiritual, and intelligible, is signified the visible and palpable body of our Lord Jesus Christ, full of the grace of all virtues and of divine majesty.

Likewise. § 2. Therefore, just as the heavenly bread, which truly is Christ's flesh, is in its own manner called the body of Christ, although in reality it is the sacrament of Christ's body—namely, of that body which, visible, palpable, and mortal, was placed upon the cross—and the immolation of the flesh itself which is performed by the hands of the priest is called Christ's Passion, death, and crucifixion, not in the reality of the thing but in a signifying mystery: so the sacrament of faith, by which baptism is understood, is faith.

> C. XLVIII. Sacramentum, et res sacramenti sacrificium ecclesiae conficitur.
> Item Augustinus in libro sententiarum Prosperi. Hoc est, quod dicimus, quod omnibus modis approbare contendimus, sacrificium ecclesiae confici duobus, duobus constare: uisibili elementorum specie, et inuisibili Domini nostri Iesu Christi carne et sanguine; et sacramento, et re sacramenti, id est corpore Christi, sicut persona Christi constat et conficitur ex Deo et homine, cum ipse Christus uerus Deus sit, et uerus homo, quia omnis res illarum rerum naturam et ueritatem in se continet, ex quibus conficitur. Conficitur autem sacrificium ecclesiae duobus, sacramento, et re sacramenti, id est corpore Christi. Est igitur sacramentum, et res sacramenti, id est corpus Christi. Item: §. 1. Caro eius est, quam forma panis opertam in sacramento accipimus, et sanguis eius, quem sub uini specie ac sapore potamus. Caro uidelicet carnis, et sanguis sacramentum sanguinis; carne et sanguine, utroque inuisibili, spirituali, intelligibili, significatur corpus uisibile Domini nostri Iesu Christi, et palpabile, plenum gratia omnium uirtutum, et diuina maiestate. Item: §. 2. Sicut ergo celestis panis, qui uere caro Christi est, suo modo uocatur corpus Christi, cum reuera sit sacramentum corporis Christi, illius uidelicet, quod uisibile, quod palpabile, mortale in cruce est positum, uocaturque ipsa carnis inmolatio, que sacerdotis manibus fit, Christi passio, mors, crucifixio, non rei ueritate, sed significanti misterio: sic sacramentum fidei, quod baptismus intelligitur, fides est.

C. XLIX. In how many ways Christ's flesh is understood.

Jerome in the letter to the Ephesians, [on chapter 1]. Christ's flesh and blood, he says, are understood in two ways: either that spiritual and divine flesh concerning which he himself says, "My flesh is truly food, and my blood is truly drink," and, "Unless you eat my flesh and drink my blood, you will not have eternal life"; or my flesh which was crucified, and the blood which was poured out by the soldier's lance.

> C. XLIX. Quot modis caro Christi intelligatur.
> Ieronimus in epistola ad Ephesos. [ad cap. 1.] Dupliciter inquit intelligitur caro Christi et sanguis: uel spiritualis illa atque diuina, de qua ipse ait: "Caro mea uere est cibus, et sanguis meus uere est potus," et: "Nisi manducaueritis carnem meam, et meum sanguinem biberitis, non habebitis uitam eternam;" uel caro mea, que crucifixa est, et sanguis, qui militis effusus est lancea.

C. L. On the same matter.

Likewise Augustine in the book On the Trinity to the Corinthians. Because we have been freed by the Lord's death, mindful of this thing, in eating and drinking we signify the flesh and blood that were offered for us.

> C. L. De eodem.
> Item Augustinus in libro de trinitate ad Chorinthios. Quia morte Domini sumus liberati, huius rei memores in edendo et potando carnem et sanguinem, que pro nobis oblata sunt, significamus.

C. LI. How Christ was immolated once and how he is immolated daily.

Likewise on Psalm 20. PART XVII. Christ died once, the righteous for the unrighteous; and we know, hold as certain, and retain with immovable hope that "Christ, rising from the dead, now dies no more; death will have no further dominion over him." These are the words of the Apostle. Nevertheless, lest we forget, what was done once takes place every year in our memory. As often as Easter is celebrated, is Christ killed so often? Yet the anniversary recollection represents what was done long ago and thus causes us to be moved as though we saw the Lord present upon the cross.

> C. LI. Quomodo Christus semel sit inmolatus, et quomodo cottidie inmoletur.
>
> Item in Psalmo XX. XVII. Pars. Semel Christus mortuus est, iustus pro iniustis, et scimus, et certum habemus, et spe inmobili retinemus, quia, Christus resurgens a mortuis iam non moritur, mors illi ultra non dominabitur. Verba ista Apostoli sunt; tamen, ne obliuiscamur, quod semel factum est in memoria nostra omni anno fit. Quociens
> Pasca celebratur, numquid tociens Christus occiditur? sed tamen anniuersaria recordatio representat quod olim factum est, et sic nos facit moueri, tamquam uideamus in cruce presentem Dominum.

C. LII. Likewise in the book of Prosper's Sentences.

Christ was immolated once in himself and nevertheless is immolated daily in the sacrament. This is to be understood thus: that in the manifestation of his body, in the distinction of all his members, true God and true man hung only once upon the cross, offering himself to the Father as a living and passible victim, mortal and effectual for the redemption of the living and the dead—namely, of those whom the height of divine counsel judged, foreknew, predestined, and called as to be redeemed, in the manners and at the times in which it was fitting for this to take place.

> C. LII. Item in libro sententiarum Prosperi.
> Semel inmolatus est in semetipso Christus, et tamen cottidie inmolatur in sacramento. Quod ita intelligendum est, quia in manifestatione sui corporis, in distinctione membrorum suorum omnium uerus Deus et uerus homo semel tantum in cruce pependit, offerens patri se ipsum hostiam uiuam et passibilem, mortalem, uiuorum ac mortuorum redemptionis efficacem, eorum scilicet, quos altitudo diuini consilii redimendos iudicauit, presciuit predestinauit, uocauit, modis atque temporibus, quibus id fieri congruebat.

C. LIII. The victim that was offered once is offered daily in recollection of his death.

Likewise Ambrose in the letter to the Hebrews, [c. 10]. In Christ a victim powerful for everlasting salvation was offered once. What, then, of us? Do we not offer on each day? We offer, but in recollection of his death, and there is one victim, not many. How one and not many? Because Christ was offered once. But this sacrifice is an exemplar of that one, always the selfsame, the selfsame. Accordingly, this is the sacrifice; otherwise, will it be said that, because it is offered in many places, there are many Christs? By no means; rather, Christ is one everywhere, existing in fullness both here and there. For just as what is offered everywhere is one body and not many bodies, so too there is one sacrifice. But he is the pontiff who offered the victim that cleanses us. Even now we offer that same victim which, offered then, cannot be consumed. What we do takes place in commemoration of what was done: "For do this," he says, "in commemoration of me."

C. LIII. Hostia, que semel oblata est, in recordationem suae mortis cottidie offertur.

Item Ambrosius in epistola ad Ebreos. [c. 10.] In Christo semel oblata est hostia ad salutem sempiternam potens. Quid ergo nos? nonne per singulos dies offerimus? Offerimus, sed ad recordationem mortis eius, et una est hostia, non multae. Quomodo una et non multae? quia semel oblatus est Christus. Hoc autem sacrificium exemplum est illius, id ipsum semper id ipsum. Proinde hoc est sacrificium, alioquin dicetur, quoniam in multis locis offertur, multi sunt Christi? Nequaquam, sed unus ubique Christus, et hic plenus existens, et illic plenus. Sicut enim quod ubique offertur unum est corpus, et non multa corpora: ita et unum sacrificium. Pontifex autem ille est, qui hostiam obtulit nos mundantem. Ipsam offerimus etiam nunc, que tunc oblata consumi non potest. Quod nos facimus, in conmemorationem fit eius, quod factum est: "Hoc enim facite," ait, "in meam conmemorationem."

C. LIV. We ought to receive the sacrament of Christ's body only while fasting.

Likewise Augustine in the book of responses to Januarius, [c. 6]. PART XVIII. It plainly appears that when the disciples first received the Lord's body and blood, they did not receive them while fasting. Is the universal Church nevertheless to be assailed on that account because it is always received by persons who are fasting? For from this it pleased the Holy Spirit that, in honor of so great a sacrament, the Lord's body enter a Christian's mouth before external foods. For this reason this custom is observed throughout the whole world. Nor indeed, because the Lord gave it after foods, ought brothers who have eaten lunch or supper therefore to assemble to receive that sacrament, or mix these things with their own tables, as those whom the Apostle reproves and corrects were doing. For the Savior, that he might commend the sublimity of that mystery more vehemently, wished to impress this last upon the hearts and memory of the disciples from whom he was about to depart for the Passion; and therefore he did not prescribe the order in which it was thereafter to be received, so that he might reserve this place for the Apostles through whom he was going to order the churches. For if he had admonished that it always be received after other foods, I believe no one would have changed that custom. But when the Apostle, speaking of this sacrament, says, "Therefore, brothers, when you assemble to eat, wait for one another; if anyone is hungry, let him eat at home, so that you do not assemble unto judgment," he immediately added: "But the other things I will order when I come." From this it is given to be understood that, because it was too much to intimate to them in a letter the whole order of what was to be done, that which the universal Church throughout the world observes, and which is varied by no diversity of hours, was ordered by him.

C. LIV. Sacramentum corporis Christi non nisi ieiuni debemus accipere.

Item Augustinus in libro responsionum ad Ianuarium. [c. 6.] XVIII. Pars. Liquido apparet, quando primo acceperunt discipuli corpus et sanguinem Domini, non eos accepisse ieiunos. Numquid tamen propterea calumpniandum est uniuersae ecclesiae, quod a ieiunis semper accipitur? Ex hoc enim placuit Spiritui sancto, ut in honore tanti sacramenti prius in os Christiani dominicum corpus intraret, quam exteri cibi. Nam ideo per uniuersum orbem mos iste seruatur. Neque enim, quia post cibos Dominus dedit, propterea pransi aut cenati fratres ad illud sacramentum accipiendum conuenire debent, aut, sicut faciebant quos Apostolus arguit et emendat, mensis suis ista miscere. Namque Saluator, quo uehementius conmendaret misterii illius altitudinem, ultimum hoc uoluit infigere cordibus et memoriae discipulorum, a quibus ad passionem disgressurus erat, et ideo non precepit, quo deinceps ordine sumeretur, ut Apostolis, per quos ecclesias dispositurus erat, seruaret hunc locum. Nam si hoc ille monuisset, ut post cibos alios semper acciperetur, credo, quod eum morem nemo mutasset. Cum uero ait Apostolus, de hoc sacramento loquens: "Propter quod, fratres, cum conuenitis ad manducandum, inuicem expectate, si quis esurit, domi manducet, ut non ad iudicium conueniatis," statim subtexuit: "cetera autem, cum uenero, ordinabo." Ubi intelligi datur, quia multum erat, ut in epistola totum illis agendi ordinem insinuaret, quod uniuersa per orbem seruat ecclesia, ab ipso ordinatum esse, quod nulla horarum diuersitate uariatur.

C. LV. Before consecration it is bread, but by Christ's words it is converted into his body.

Likewise Ambrose in book IV On the Sacraments, [c. 4]. PART XIX. There is customary bread upon the altar before the words of the sacraments; when consecration has acceded, from bread it becomes Christ's flesh. But how can that which is bread be Christ's body? By consecration. But by what words, by whose discourses, is the consecration? Those of the Lord Jesus. For in all the other things that are said, praise is offered to God and request is made in prayer for the people, for kings, and for the others. But when the sacrament is confected, the priest no longer uses his own discourses but the discourses of Christ. Therefore the word of Christ confects this sacrament. What word of Christ? This one, by which all things were made. The Lord commanded, and heaven, earth, and sea were made. You see, therefore, how operative the word of Christ is. If, then, there is such power in the word of the Lord Jesus that what did not exist began to exist, how much more operative is it that things which existed should exist and be changed into another thing? And thus what was bread before consecration is now Christ's body after consecration, because the word of Christ changes the creature, and thus from bread Christ's body is made, and wine mixed with water in the chalice becomes blood by the consecration of the heavenly word.

§ 1. But perhaps you say: I do not see the species of blood; but it has a likeness. For just as you assumed the likeness of death, so you also drink the likeness of blood, so that there may be no horror of blood and yet the price of redemption may operate. You have learned that you receive Christ's body.

[And c. 5.] § 2. Do you wish to know that it is consecrated by heavenly words? Hear what the words are. The priest says: "Make this offering for us," he says, "enrolled, rational, etc." From that point all those words belong to the Evangelist until "Take," whether the body or the blood. From that point they are Christ's words: "Take and drink from this, all of you; for this is my blood." See each thing. "Who," he says, "on the day before he suffered took bread into his holy hands." Before it is consecrated, it is bread; but when Christ's words have acceded, it is Christ's body. Then hear him saying: "Take and eat from it, all of you; for this is my body." And before Christ's words, the chalice is full of wine and water. When Christ's words have operated, there the blood that redeemed the people is effected.

§ 3. Therefore see how powerful Christ's word is to convert all things. Then Jesus himself testifies that we receive his body and his blood. We ought not to doubt his faith and testimony.

C. LV. Ante consecrationem est panis, sed uerbis Christi in eius corpus conuertitur.

Item Ambrosius in libro [IV.] de sacramentis. [c. 4.] XIX. Pars. Panis est in altari usitatus ante uerba sacramentorum; ubi accessit consecratio, de pane fit caro Christi. Quomodo autem potest qui panis est corpus esse Christi? Consecratio autem quibus uerbis, cuius sermonibus est? Domini Iesu. Nam reliqua omnia, que dicuntur, laus Deo defertur, oratione petitur pro populo, pro regibus, pro ceteris. Ubi autem sacramentum conficitur, iam non suis sermonibus sacerdos, sed utitur sermonibus Christi. Ergo sermo Christi hoc conficit sacramentum. Quis sermo Christi? hic, quo facta sunt omnia. Iussit Dominus, et facta sunt celum et terra mare. Vides ergo, quam operatorius sit sermo Christi. Si ergo uis tanta est in sermone Domini Iesu, ut inciperet esse quod non erat: quanto magis operatorius est, ut sint que erant et in aliud conmutentur? Et sic quod erat panis ante consecrationem iam corpus Christi est post consecrationem, quia sermo Christi creaturam mutat, et sic ex pane fit corpus Christi, et uinum cum aqua in calice missum fit sanguis consecratione uerbi celestis. §. 1. Sed forte dicis: Speciem sanguinis non uideo; sed habet similitudinem. Sicut enim mortis similitudinem sumpsisti, ita etiam similitudinem sanguinis bibis, ut nullus horror cruoris sit, et precium tamen operetur redemptionis. Didicisti, quia accipis corpus Christi. [Et c. 5.] §. 2. Vis scire, quia uerbis celestibus consecratur? Accipite, que sunt uerba. Dicit sacerdos: "Fac nobis," inquit, "hanc oblationem scriptam rationabilem etc." Inde: omnia illa euangelistae sunt usque ad "Accipite" siue corpus, siue sanguinem. Inde uerba sunt Christi: "Accipite et bibite ex hoc omnes; hic est enim sanguis meus." Vide singula. Qui pridie, inquit, quam pateretur, in sanctis manibus accepit panem. Ante, quam consecretur, panis est: ubi autem uerba Christi accesserint, corpus Christi est. Deinde audi dicentem: Accipite, et edite ex eo omnes; hoc est enim corpus meum. Et ante uerba Christi calix est uini et aquae plenus. Ubi uerba Christi operata fuerint, ibi sanguis efficitur, qui plebem redemit. §. 3. Ergo uide, quam potens est sermo Christi uniuersa conuertere. Deinde ipse Iesus testificatur, quod corpus suum, et sanguinem suum accipiamus. De cuius fide et testificatione dubitare non debemus.

C. LVI. The bread of eternal life sustains not the body but the soul.

Likewise. This is not the bread that goes into the body, but the bread of eternal life, which sustains the substance of our soul.

§ 1. This bread is daily; receive daily what may profit you daily; so live that you may merit to receive daily.

C. LVI. Non corpus, sed animam fulcit panis uitae eternae.

Item. Non iste panis est, qui uadit in corpus, sed panis uitae eternae, qui animae nostrae substantiam fulcit. §. 1. Iste panis cottidianus est; accipe cottidie quod cottidie tibi prosit; sic uiue, ut cottidie merearis accipere.

C. LVII. Christ is living bread also according to the flesh.

Likewise Augustine in the letter to Irenaeus. Christ is the bread of which one who eats lives eternally, concerning which he himself said: "And the bread that I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world, etc." He determines how he is bread: not only according to the Word, by whom all things live, but according to the flesh assumed for the life of the world. For human flesh, which was dead in sin, united to the pure flesh, incorporated into and made one with it, lives from his Spirit, just as one body lives from its own spirit. But one who is not of Christ's body does not live from Christ's Spirit.

C. LVII. Etiam secundum carnem Christus est panis uiuus.

Item Augustinus in epistola ad Ireneum. Christus panis est, de quo qui manducat uiuit in eternum, de quo ipsemet dixit: "Et panis, quem ego dabo, caro mea est, pro mundi uita etc." Determinat, quomodo sit panis, non solum secundum uerbum, quo uiuunt omnia, sed secundum carnem assumptam pro mundi uita. Humana enim caro, que erat peccato mortua, carni mundae unita, incorporata, unum cum illa effecta, uiuit de spiritu eius, sicut unum corpus de suo spiritu. Qui uero non est de corpore Christi, non uiuit de spiritu Christi.

C. LVIII. That Christ is eaten and drunk visibly in the sacrament, spiritually in reality.

Likewise. Those who eat and drink Christ eat and drink life. To eat that is to be refreshed; to drink that is to live. What is visibly received in the sacrament is spiritually eaten and drunk in reality itself. Christ is eaten; once eaten he lives, because, having been killed, he rose. Nor when we eat do we make parts from him. And because it takes place thus in the sacrament—and the faithful know how they eat Christ's flesh—each receives his own part, whence by this grace they are also called parts. He is eaten in parts and remains whole and entire in your heart. He was wholly with the Father when he came into the Virgin; he filled her and did not withdraw from him.

§ 1. What is seen is bread and a chalice, which the eyes also report. But what faith, which must be instructed, demands is that the bread is Christ's body and the chalice his blood.

§ 2. These are therefore called sacraments because in them one thing is seen and another is understood. What is seen has a bodily species; what is understood has spiritual fruit.

§ 3. One who receives the mystery of unity and does not hold the bond of peace does not receive the mystery for himself but testimony against himself.

C. LVIII. Quod Christus uisibiliter in sacramento spiritualiter in ueritate manducatur et bibitur.

Item. Qui manducant et bibunt Christum, uitam manducant et bibunt. Illud manducare est refici; illud bibere est uiuere. Quod in sacramento uisibiliter sumitur, in ipsa ueritate spiritualiter manducatur et bibitur. Manducatur Christus: uiuit manducatus, quia surrexit occisus. Nec quando manducamus, partes de illo facimus. Et quia in sacramento sic fit, et norunt fideles, quomodo manducent carnem Christi; unusquisque accipit partem suam, unde et ipsa gratia partes uocantur. Per partes manducatur et manet integer totus in corde tuo. Totus erat apud Patrem, quando uenit in Virginem; inpleuit illam, nec recessit ab illo. §. 1. Quod uidetur panis est et calix, quod etiam oculi renunciant. Quod autem fides postulat instruenda, panis est corpus Christi, calix sanguis. §. 2. Ista ideo dicuntur sacramenta, quia in eis aliud uidetur, et aliud intelligitur. Quod uidetur speciem habet corporalem; quod intelligitur fructum habet spiritualem. §. 3. Qui accipit misterium unitatis, et non tenet uinculum pacis, non misterium accipit pro se, sed testimonium contra se.

C. LIX. How Christ's body is to be received spiritually.

The same on John, [on c. 6, tractates XXVI and XXVII]. To believe in Jesus Christ is to eat the living bread. One who believes eats. He is invisibly fattened because he is invisibly reborn. "And he who eats my flesh and drinks my blood has eternal life." For by participation in the Son—which is through the unity of his body and blood—the person who eats lives, not receiving merely in the sacrament, which the wicked also do, but as far as participation in the Spirit, so that he may remain in the Lord's body as a member and be made vigorous by his Spirit, which occurs while he keeps his commandments.

§ 1. He arrives at the invisible altar of God—which the unjust person does not approach—who approaches this present altar justified. He who here discerns his own cause will find life there.

> C. LIX. Quomodo spiritualiter corpus Christi sit accipiendum.
> Idem super Iohannem. [ad c. 6. tract. XXVI. et XXVII.] Credere in Iesum Christum, hoc est manducare panem uiuum. Qui credit manducat. Inuisibiliter saginatur, quia inuisibiliter renascitur. "Et qui manducat carnem meam, et bibit sanguinem meum uitam habet eternam." Participatione enim filii (quod est per unitatem corporis eius et sanguinis) homo manducans uiuit, non sumens tantum in sacramento (quod et mali faciunt), sed usque ad Spiritus participationem, ut in corpore Domini tamquam membrum maneat, et eius Spiritu uegetetur, quod est, dum eius mandata seruat. §. 1. Ad altare Dei inuisibile (quo non accedit iniustus) ille peruenit, qui ad hoc presens iustificatus accedit. Inueniet illic uitam, qui hic discernit causam suam.

C. LX. The Holy Spirit invisibly sanctifies Christ's body and blood.

The same in book III On the Trinity, [c. 4]. We call Christ's body and blood that which, received from the fruits of the earth and consecrated by mystical prayer, we rightly receive for spiritual salvation in memory of the Lord's Passion. Although this is brought through human hands to that visible species, it is not sanctified so as to be so great a sacrament unless the Spirit of God operates invisibly, since God operates all these things that take place through bodily movements in that work.

> C. LX. Spiritus sanctus inuisibiliter corpus et sanguinem Christi sanctificat.
> Idem in libro III. de Trinitate. [c. 4.] Corpus et sanguinem Christi dicimus illud, quod ex fructibus terrae acceptum, et prece mistica consecratum, recte sumimus ad salutem spiritualem in memoriam dominicae passionis. Quod cum per manus hominis ad illam uisibilem speciem perducatur, non sanctificatur, ut sit tam magnum sacramentum, nisi operante inuisibiliter spiritu Dei, cum hec omnia, que per corporales motus in illo opere fiunt, Deus operetur.

C. LXI. Through the blessing bread becomes Christ's body.

Likewise. Not every bread, but that which receives Christ's blessing, becomes Christ's body.

> C. LXI. Per benedictionem panis efficitur corpus Christi.
> Item. Non omnis panis, sed accipiens benedictionem Christi, fit corpus Christi.

C. LXII. Christ's body is understood in two ways.

Likewise. For Christ commended in this sacrament his body and blood, which he also made us ourselves. For we too have been made his body.

> C. LXII. Dupliciter corpus Christi intelligitur.
>
> Item. Commendauit enim Christus in hoc sacramento corpus et sanguinem suum, quod etiam fecit et nos ipsos. Nam et nos ipsius corpus facti sumus.

C. LXIII. The sacrifice of the altar is the sacrament of unity.

Likewise, [tractate XXVI on c. 6 of John]. This is the sacrament of piety, the sign of unity, the bond of charity. Let one who wishes to live approach and believe; let him be incorporated.

§ 1. He wishes this food and drink to be understood as the fellowship of his body and members, which belongs to the Church among the predestined.

> C. LXIII. Sacrificium altaris sacramentum est unitatis.
> Item. [tractatu XXVI. ad c. 6. Iohannis] Hoc sacramentum pietatis est, signum unitatis, uinculum karitatis. Qui uult uiuere, accedat et credat, incorporetur. §. 1. Hunc cibum et potum societatem uult intelligi corporis et membrorum suorum, quod est ecclesiae in predestinatis.

C. LXIV. We ought to receive Christ's body more spiritually than bodily.

Likewise. PART XX. To eat the bread from the altar spiritually is to bring innocence to the altar. Even if sins are daily, let them not be mortal. Before you approach: "Forgive your debtors." If you forgive, you will be forgiven. Approach securely; it is bread and not poison. But see whether you forgive, lest you lie to God, whom you do not deceive. You can lie to God; you cannot deceive him.

> C. LXIV. Spiritualiter magis quam corporaliter corpus Christi debemus accipere.
> Item. XX. Pars. Panem de altari spiritualiter manducare est innocentiam ad altare portare. Peccata etsi sint cottidiana, uel non sint mortifera. Ante, quam accedatis: "dimittite debitoribus uestris." Si dimittis, dimittetur tibi: securus accede, panis est et non uenenum. Sed uide, si dimittis, ne mentiaris Deo, quem non fallis. Mentiri Deo potes: fallere ipsum non potes.

C. LXV. One who is in discord with Christ receives the sacrament, not the reality, of Christ's body.

Likewise, [in the book of Sentences, c. 139]. One who is in discord with Christ neither eats his flesh nor drinks his blood, even if he daily receives the sacrament of so great a thing unto the judgment of his own perdition.

> C. LXV. Sacramentum, non ueritatem Christi corporis accipit, qui ab eo discordat.
> Item. [in libro Sententiarum c. 139] Qui discordat a Christo, nec manducat eius carnem, nec sanguinem bibit, et si tantae rei sacramentum ad iudicium suae perditionis cottidie accipit.

C. LXVI. Holy things harm the wicked, and evil things profit the good.

Likewise, [tractates VI and LXII on John]. Even holy things can harm the wicked; they are unto salvation for the good, unto judgment for the wicked. Hence the Apostle: "He who eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment for himself," not because that thing is evil, but because an evil person receives badly what is good. For the morsel that was given to Judas by the Lord was not evil. The physician gave salvation; but because one who was unworthy received it, he received it unto his own destruction. And evil things profit the good, as the angel of Satan profited Paul. For good is made through evil when evil is received well.

> C. LXVI. Sancta nocent malis, et mala prosunt bonis.
> Item. [tractatu VI. et LXII. in Iohannem] Et sancta malis possunt obesse; bonis sunt ad salutem, malis ad iudicium. Unde Apostolus: "Qui manducat et bibit indigne, iudicium sibi manducat et bibit," non quia illa res mala est, sed quia malus male accipit quod bonum est. Non enim mala erat buccella, que Iudae data est a Domino. Salutem medicus dedit; sed quia ille, qui indignus erat, accipit, ad perniciem sui accepit. Et mala prosunt bonis, sicut angelus sathanae Paulo. Per malum enim fit bonum, cum bene accipitur malum.

C. LXVII. The wicked shall not be prohibited from eating from the Lord's table.

The same. Let the steward not prohibit the fat ones of the earth from eating the Lord's table, but let him admonish them to fear the exactor.

> C. LXVII. Non prohibeantur mali de mensa Domini manducare.
> Idem. Non prohibeat dispensator manducare pingues terrae mensam Domini, sed exactorem moneat timere.

C. LXVIII. Even one who approaches unworthily nevertheless receives Christ's body.

The same, [in book V On Baptism, c. 8]. Just as Judas, when Christ handed him the morsel, gave place to the devil not by receiving an evil thing but by receiving badly, so anyone unworthily receiving Christ's body does not cause it to be evil because he is evil, or cause himself to receive nothing because he does not receive unto salvation. For the Lord's body and blood were nevertheless in those to whom the Apostle said: "He who eats unworthily eats and drinks judgment for himself."

> C. LXVIII. Et qui indigne accedit tamen corpus Christi accipit.
> Idem. [in lib. V. de baptismo, c. 8.] Sicut Iudas, cum buccellam Christus tradidit, non malum accipiendo, sed male accipiendo locum prebuit diabolo, sic indigne quisque sumens corpus Christi, non efficit, ut, quia malus est, malum sit, aut, quia ad salutem non accipit, nichil accipit. Corpus enim et sanguis Domini nichilominus erat in illis, quibus dicebat Apostolus: "Qui manducat indigne, iudicium sibi manducat et bibit."

C. LXIX. By what examples it is proved that, beyond nature, the substance of bread and wine is converted into Christ's body and blood.

Likewise Ambrose, On the Sacraments. PART XXI. It is truly marvelous that God rained manna upon the fathers and that they were fed by the daily nourishment of heaven. Hence it was said: "A human being ate the bread of angels." Nevertheless, all who ate that bread died in the desert. But this food which you receive, this living bread which descended from heaven, ministers the substance of eternal life, and whoever eats it will not die eternally; and it is Christ's body. Consider now whether the bread of angels is more excellent, or the flesh of Christ, which assuredly is the body of life. That manna was from heaven; this is above heaven. That was of heaven; this is of the Lord of the heavens. That was liable to corruption if it was preserved for another day; this is alien to all corruption, and whoever tastes it religiously will not be able to experience corruption. For them water flowed from a rock; for you blood flowed from Christ. Water satisfied them for an hour; blood washes you eternally. The Jew drinks and thirsts; when you have drunk, you will not be able to thirst. And that was in a shadow; this is in reality. If that which you marvel at is a shadow, how great is that whose shadow you marvel at? Hear that what occurred among the fathers is a shadow: "They drank," he says, "from the rock following them; but the rock was Christ. Yet God was not pleased with many of them, for they were laid low in the desert. But these things were done as a figure of us." You have recognized the more excellent things: for light is more excellent than shadow, reality than figure, the body of the author than manna from heaven.

§ 1. Perhaps you say: I see another thing; how do you assert to me that I receive Christ's body? And this still remains for us to prove. How many examples, therefore, do we use to prove that this is not what nature formed but what the blessing consecrated, and that the power of the blessing is greater than that of nature, because by the blessing even nature itself is changed? Moses was holding a rod; he cast it down and it became a serpent. Again he took hold of the serpent's tail, and it returned to the nature of a rod. You see, therefore, that by prophetic grace the nature both of the serpent and of the rod was changed twice. The rivers of Egypt were running with the pure course of waters; suddenly blood began to burst forth from the veins of the springs; there was no drink in the rivers. Again, at the Prophet's prayers, the gore of the rivers ceased and the nature of waters returned. The people of the Hebrews were enclosed on every side, hemmed in here by the Egyptians, shut in there by the sea. Moses raised the rod; the water separated itself and congealed into the appearance of walls, and a path for feet appeared between the waves. The Jordan, turned backward against nature, returns toward the beginning of its spring. Is it not clear that the nature either of the waves of the sea or of the river's course was changed? The people of the fathers were thirsty; Moses touched the rock, and water flowed from the rock. Did grace not operate beyond nature, so that a rock vomited forth water which it did not have by nature? The river Marah was most bitter, so that the thirsty people could not drink; Moses cast wood into the water, and the nature of the waters put aside its bitterness, which grace suddenly infused tempered. Under the prophet Elisha, the iron was knocked from an axe belonging to one of the sons of the prophets and immediately sank. The one who had lost the iron entreated Elisha; Elisha also cast wood into the water, and the iron swam. Assuredly we know that this too was done beyond nature, for the species of iron is heavier than the liquid of waters.

§ 2. We perceive, therefore, that grace is greater than nature; and yet until now we are recounting the grace of a prophetic blessing. But if a human blessing possessed such power that it converted nature, what do we say of the divine consecration itself, where the very words of the Lord and Savior operate? For this sacrament which you receive is confected by Christ's discourse. If Elijah's discourse possessed such power that it brought fire down from heaven, will Christ's discourse not have power to change the species of the elements? You have read concerning the works of the whole world: "Because he spoke and they were made; he commanded and they were created." Therefore the discourse of Christ, which was able to make from nothing what did not exist, cannot change those things which exist into that which they were not? For it is no lesser thing to give new natures to things than to change them.

§ 3. But why do we use arguments? Let us use his own examples, and by the mystery of the incarnation let us establish the reality of the mystery. Did the customary course of nature precede when the Lord Jesus was born from Mary? If we seek the order, a woman joined to a man was accustomed to generate. It is clear, therefore, that the Virgin generated beyond the order of nature. And this which we confect is the body from the Virgin. Why do you seek the order of nature here in Christ's body, when the Lord Jesus himself was born from a Virgin beyond nature? It was assuredly the true flesh of Christ which was crucified, which was buried. Therefore it truly is the sacrament of that flesh. The Lord Jesus himself cries: "This is my body." Before the blessing of the heavenly words, another species is named; after consecration, the body is signified. He himself calls it his blood. Before consecration, another thing is said; after consecration, it is called blood. You say, "Amen," that is, "It is true." Let the affection feel what the discourse sounds.

C. LXIX. Quibus exemplis preter naturam substantia panis et uini in corpus et sanguinem Christi conuerti probetur.

Item Ambrosius de sacramentis. XXI. Pars. Reuera mirabile est, quod manna Deus pluerit patribus, et cottidiano celi pascebantur alimento. Unde dictum est: "Panem angelorum manducauit homo." Sed tamen panem illum qui manducauerunt, omnes in deserto mortui sunt. Ista autem esca, quam accipitis iste panis uiuus, qui de celo descendit, uitae eternae substantiam ministrat, et quicumque hunc manducauerit, non morietur in eternum, et corpus est Christi. Considera nunc, utrum prestantior sit panis angelorum, an caro Christi, que utique corpus est uitae. Manna illud de celo, hoc super celum; illud celi, hoc Domini celorum; illud corruptioni obnoxium, si in diem alterum seruaretur, hoc alienum ab omni corruptione, quicumque religiose gustauerit, corruptionem sentire non poterit. Illis aqua de petra fluxit, tibi sanguis e Christo; illos ad horam satiauit aqua, te sanguis diluit in eternum. Iudeus bibit et sitit; tu, cum biberis, sitire non poteris; et illud in umbra, hoc in ueritate. Si illud, quod miraris, umbra est, quantum istud est, Cuius umbram miraris? Audi, quia umbra est, que apud patres est facta: "Bibebant" inquit, "de consequenti eos petra; petra autem erat Christus. Sed non in pluribus eorum conplacitum est Deo. Nam prostrati sunt in deserto. Hec autem facta sunt in figura nostri." Cognouisti potiora: potior enim est lux quam umbra, ueritas quam figura, corpus auctoris quam manna de celo. §. 1. Forte dicas: aliud uideo; quomodo tu michi asseris, quod Christi corpus accipiam? Et hoc nobis adhuc superest ut probemus. Quantis igitur utimur exemplis, ut probemus, hoc non esse, quod natura formauit, sed quod benedictio consecrauit, maioremque uim esse benedictionis, quam naturae, quia benedictione etiam natura ipsa mutatur? Virgam tenebat Moyses; proiecit eam, et facta est serpens. Rursus apprehendit caudam serpentis, et in uirgae naturam reuertit. Vides ergo, prophetica gratia bis mutatam esse naturam, et serpentis et uirgae. Currebant Egypti flumina puro meatu aquarum; subito de fontium uenis sanguis cepit erumpere; non erat potus in fluuiis; rursus ad Prophetae preces cruor cessauit fluminum, aquarum natura remeauit. Circumclusus erat undique populus Ebreorum, hinc Egyptiis uallatus, inde mari clausus. Virgam leuauit Moyses; separauit se aqua, et in murorum speciem congelauit, atque inter undas uia pedestris apparuit. Iordanis retrorsum conuersus contra naturam in sui fontis reuertitur exordium. Nonne claret, naturam uel maritimorum fluctuum, uel fluuialis cursus esse mutatam? Sitiebat populus patrum, tetigit Moyses petram, et aqua de petra fluxit. Numquid non preter naturam operata est gratia, ut aquam uomeret petra, quam non habebat natura? Marath fluuius amarissimus erat, ut sitiens populus bibere non posset; misit Moyses lignum in aquam, et amaritudinem suam aquarum natura deposuit, quam infusa subito gratia temperauit. Sub Heliseo propheta uni ex filiis prophetarum excussum est ferrum de securi, et statim mersum est; rogauit Heliseum qui amiserat ferrum; misit etiam Heliseus lignum in aquam, et ferrum natauit. Utique et hoc preter naturam factum cognouimus. Grauior est enim ferri species quam aquarum liquor. §. 2. Aduertimus igitur, maioris esse gratiam quam naturam, et adhuc tamen propheticae benedictionis numeramus gratiam. Quod si tantum ualuit humana benedictio, ut naturam conuerteret, quid dicimus de ipsa consecratione diuina, ubi uerba ipsa Domini saluatoris operantur? Nam sacramentum istud, quod accipis, Christi sermone conficitur. Quod si tantum ualuit sermo Helyae, ut ignem de celo deponeret, non ualebit Christi sermo, ut species elementorum mutet? De totius mundi operibus legisti: "quia ipse dixit, et facta sunt: ipse mandauit, et creata sunt." Sermo igitur Christi, qui potuit ex nichilo facere quod non erat, non potest ea, que sunt, in id mutare, quod non erant non enim minus est dare, quam mutare nouas naturas rebus. §. 3. Sed quid argumentis utimur? suis utamur exemplis, incarnationisque misterii astruamus ueritatem. Numquid naturae usus presensit, cum Iesus Dominus ex Maria nasceretur? Si ordinem querimus, uiro mixta femina generare consueuerat. Liquet igitur, quod preter naturae ordinem uirgo generauit. Et hoc, quod conficimus, corpus ex Virgine est. Quid hic naturae ordinem queris in Christi corpore, cum preter naturam sit ipse Dominus Iesus partus ex Virgine? Vera utique caro Christi, que crucifixa est, que sepulta est. Vere ergo illius carnis sacramentum est. Ipse Dominus Iesus clamat: "Hoc est corpus meum." Ante benedictionem uerborum celestium alia species nominatur; post consecrationem corpus significatur. Ipse dicit sanguinem suum. Ante consecrationem aliud dicitur; post consecrationem sanguis nuncupatur, tu dicis: Amen, hoc est: uerum est. Quod sermo sonat affectus sentiat.

C. LXX. How Christ is eaten in parts and remains whole.

Augustine in a certain sermon on the words of the Gospel. The Lord invites servants and prepares himself as food for them. Who would dare to eat his Lord? And nevertheless he says: "He who eats me lives because of me." When he is eaten, life is eaten; nor is he killed in order to be eaten, but he gives life to the dead. When he is eaten, he refreshes but does not fail. Christ is eaten; once eaten he lives, because, having been killed, he rose. Nor when he is eaten do we make parts from him. And indeed it takes place thus in the sacrament; the faithful know how they eat Christ's flesh. Each receives his own part; he is eaten in parts and remains whole and entire. He is eaten in parts in the sacrament, remains whole and entire in heaven, remains whole and entire in your heart.

C. LXX. Quomodo per partes Christus manducatur, et integer permanet.

Augustinus in quodam sermone de uerbis Euangelii. Inuitat Dominus seruos, et preparat eis cibum se ipsum. Quis audeat manducare Dominum suum? et tamen ait: "Qui manducat me, uiuit propter me." Quando manducatur, uita manducatur, nec occiditur, ut manducetur, sed mortuos uiuificat. Quando manducatur, reficit, sed non deficit. Manducatur Christus: uiuit manducatus, quia surrexit occisus, nec, quando manducatur, partes de illo facimus. Et quidem in sacramento sic fit, norunt fideles, quemadmodum manducent carnem Christi; unusquisque suam partem accipit; per partes manducatur, et manet integer totus; per partes manducatur in sacramento, manet integer totus in celo, manet integer totus in corde tuo.

C. LXXI. The daily sacrifice is not a repetition of the Passion but a commemoration.

Likewise Paschasius, On the Body and Blood of Christ, [c. 9]. PART XXII. This offering is repeated daily, although Christ, having suffered once in the flesh, saved the world once through one and the same Passion of death, and rising from that death to life, "death will have no further dominion over him." The wisdom of God the Father assuredly foresaw this as necessary for many causes. First, because we sin daily, at least in sins without which mortal infirmity cannot live; because, although all sins were forgiven in baptism, the infirmity of sin nevertheless still remains in the flesh. Hence the Psalmist: "Bless the Lord, my soul, who is propitious to all your iniquities, who heals all your infirmities." And therefore, because we fall daily, Christ is mystically immolated for us daily, and Christ's Passion is handed down in the mystery, so that he who by dying once had conquered death may daily remit through these sacraments of the body and blood the recurrent sins of offenses. Hence we pray, "Forgive us our debts," because if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us.

Likewise. § 1. This mystery is also repeated for the commemoration of Christ's Passion, as he himself says: "As often as you do this, do it in commemoration of me. Therefore, as often as you receive this bread and drink this chalice, you will announce the Lord's death until he comes." It is not therefore to be understood thus: until Christ's death comes, because he now dies no more, but until the Lord himself comes to judgment. Meanwhile, however, Christ's death is always to be announced to posterity throughout the life of the age, so that they may learn with what charity he loved his own, who deigned to die for them; and all of us owe him a return of charity, because he first loved us for this purpose, when we were children of Gehenna, that we, now freed from death, might love him.

> C. LXXI. Cottidianum sacrificium non reiteratio est passionis, sed conmemoratio.
> Item Pascasius de corpore et sanguine Christi. [c. 9.] XXII. Pars. Iteratur cottidie hec oblatio, licet Christus, semel passus in carne, per unam eandemque mortis passionem semel saluauerit mundum, ex qua morte resurgens ad uitam, mors ei ultra non dominabitur, qui profecto sapientia Dei patris necessarium pro multis causis hoc prouidit. Primo quidem, quia cottidie peccamus, saltim in peccatis, sine quibus mortalis infirmitas uiuere non potest, quia, licet omnia peccata donata sint in baptismo, infirmitas tamen peccati adhuc in carne manet. Unde Psalmista; "Benedic anima mea Domino, qui propitiatur omnibus iniquitatibus tuis, qui sanat omnes infirmitates tuas." Et ideo, quia labimur cottidie, Christus cottidie pro nobis mistice inmolatur, et passio Christi in misterio traditur, ut qui semel moriendo mortem uicerat, cottidie recidiua delictorum per hec sacramenta corporis et sanguinis peccata relaxet. Unde oramus "Dimitte nobis debita nostra," quia, si dixerimus, quia peccatum non habemus, ipsi nos seducimus, et ueritas in nobis non est. Item: §. 1. Iteratur hoc misterium et ob conmemorationem passionis Christi, sicut ipse ait: "Hoc quociescumque agitis, in meam conmemorationem facite. Quotiescumque ergo hunc panem sumitis, et bibitis hunc calicem, mortem Domini annunciabitis, donec ueniat." Non itaque sic accipiendum est, donec mors Christi ueniat, quia iam ultra non moritur, sed donec ipse Dominus ad iudicium ueniet. Interdum autem semper mors est Christi per seculi uitam posteris nuncianda, ut discant, qua karitate dilexit suos, qui pro eis mori dignatus est, cui omnes uicem debemus rependere karitatis, quia ad hoc nos prior dilexit, cum essemus gehennae filii, ut diligeremus eum a morte iam liberati.

C. LXXII. The sacrament of the Lord's body and blood is celebrated not only under a figure but also in reality.

Likewise Augustine. Whether this mystical sacrament of the chalice takes place under a figure or under reality. The Truth says: "My flesh is truly food, and my blood is truly drink." Otherwise, how will this be great: "The bread that I will give is my flesh for the life of the world," unless it is true flesh? But because it is not right for Christ to be devoured by teeth, he willed this bread and wine in a mystery truly to be created as his flesh and blood potentially by the consecration of the Holy Spirit, and to be mystically immolated daily for the life of the world, so that, just as true flesh is created from the Virgin through the Spirit without intercourse, so through the same Spirit from the substance of bread and wine that same body of Christ may mystically be consecrated. Christ's body is both reality and figure: reality, while Christ's body and blood are effected by the power of the Spirit, in his power, from the substance of bread and wine; but figure is that which is perceived outwardly.

§ 1. This offering is repeated daily, although Christ suffered once, because we sin daily with sins without which mortal infirmity cannot live. And therefore, because we fall daily, Christ is mystically immolated daily for us.

§ 2. Within the Catholic Church, in the mystery of Christ's body, nothing greater is accomplished by a good priest, nothing less by an evil one, because it is effected not by the merit of the one consecrating but by the word of the Creator and the power of the Holy Spirit. For if it were by the priest's merit, it would in no way pertain to Christ. But now, just as he himself is the one who baptizes, so he himself is the one who through the Holy Spirit effects this flesh of his and passes into blood. Hence the priest also says: "Command," he says, "this to be carried by the office of your holy angel to your altar on high in the sight of your divine majesty." Why does he request that these things be carried into the light unless it is to be understood that they take place in that priesthood? Therefore this offering is blessed, through which we are blessed; enrolled, through which human beings are enrolled in heaven; ratified, through which we are reckoned in the inward parts of Christ; rational, through which we are stripped of bestial sense; acceptable, so that we who displease ourselves may through it be acceptable to his only-begotten Son. Nothing is more rational than that, because we have already received in baptism the likeness of his death, we should also receive the likeness of his blood, so that neither reality may be lacking in the sacrament nor anything ridiculous be done by pagans, namely that we drink the gore of a slain human being. For if the disciples could not patiently bear what the Lord had said—"He who does not eat my flesh, etc."—if they said, "This is a hard discourse," how would unbelievers bear these things? It must be believed that the sacraments are confected in Christ's words. For by whose power they are created, by his word assuredly they are procreated into something better.

§ 3. All the other things that the priest says or the clergy of the choir sing are nothing other than praises and thanksgivings, or certainly supplications and petitions of the faithful. Hence the priest also says, first assuming the words of the Evangelists: "Who on the day before he suffered, etc." In this, therefore, that body is created.

C. LXXII. Non solum sub figura, sed etiam in ueritate dominici corporis et sanguinis sacramentum celebratur.

Item Augustinus. Utrum sub figura, an sub ueritate hoc misticum calicis sacramentum fiat. Veritas ait: "Caro mea uere est cibus, et sanguis meus uere est potus." Alioquin quomodo erit magnum: "Panis, quem ego dabo, caro mea est pro mundi uita," nisi uera sit caro? Sed quia Christum fas uorari dentibus non est, uoluit hunc panem et uinum in misterio uere carnem suam et sanguinem consecrationem sancti Spiritus potentialiter creari, et cottidie pro mundi uita mistice inmolari, ut, sicut de Virgine per Spiritum uera caro sine coitu creatur, ita per eundem ex substantia panis et uini mistice idem Christi corpus consecretur. Corpus Christi et ueritas et figura est: ueritas, dum corpus Christi et sanguis uirtute Spiritus in uirtute ipsius ex panis uinique substantia efficitur; figura uero est id, quod exterius sentitur. §. 1. Iteratur autem cottidie hec oblatio, licet Christus semel passus sit, quia cottidie peccamus, peccatis, sine quibus mortalis infirmitas uiuere non potest. Et ideo, quia cottidie labimur, cottidie Christus inmolatur mistice pro nobis. §. 2. Intra catholicam ecclesiam in misterio corporis Christi nichil a bono maius, nichil a malo minus perficitur sacerdote, quia non in merito consecrantis, sed in uerbo efficitur Creatoris, et uirtute Spiritus sancti. Si enim in merito esset sacerdotis, nequaquam ad Christum pertineret. Nunc autem, sicut ipse est, qui baptizat, ita ipse est, qui per Spiritum sanctum hanc suam efficit carnem, et transit in sanguinem. Unde et sacerdos: "Iube," inquit, "hoc perferri per munus sancti angeli tui in sublime altare tuum in conspectu diuinae maiestatis tuae." Ut quid deferenda in lucem deposcit, nisi ut intelligatur, quod ista fiant in eo sacerdotio? Hanc igitur oblationem benedictam, per quam benedicimur; asscriptam; per quam homines in celo asscribimur; ratam, per quam uisceribus Christi censeamur; rationabilem, per quam a bestiali sensu exuamur; acceptabilem, ut qui nobis ipsis displicemus per hanc acceptabiles eius unico filio simus. Nichil rationabilius, ut, quia nos iam similitudinem mortis eius in baptismo accepimus, similitudinem quoque et sanguinis sumamus, ita, et ueritas non desit in sacramento, et ridiculum nullum fiat a paganis, quod cruorem occisi hominis bibamus. Si enim discipuli patienter ferre nequiuerunt, quod Dominus dixerat: "Qui non manducat meam carnem etc." si dixerunt: "durus est hic sermo," quomodo ferrent ista increduli? Credendum est, quod in uerbis Christi sacramenta conficiantur. Cuius enim potentia creantur, eius utique uerbo ad melius procreantur. §. 3. Reliqua omnia, que sacerdos dicit, aut clerus chori canit, nichil aliud quam laudes et gratiarum actiones sunt, aut certe obsecrationes et fidelium petitiones. Unde et sacerdos dicit prius Euangelistarum uerba assumens: "Qui pridie, quam pateretur etc." In hoc ergo creatur illud corpus.

C. LXXIII. In the blood of the lamb, Christ's blood, which now is truly received, was formerly prefigured.

Gregory in an Easter homily. What the blood of the lamb is, you have learned not now by hearing but by drinking. This blood is placed upon both doorposts when it is drawn not only by the mouth of the body but also by the mouth of the heart.

Likewise, [Dialogues, book IV, c. 58]. § 1. This saving victim restores to us through a mystery that death of the Only-begotten, who, although "rising from the dead, now dies no more; death will have no further dominion over him," nevertheless, living immortally and incorruptibly in himself, dies again in this mystery. His body too is received everywhere, his flesh is divided for the salvation of the people, his blood is poured no longer into the hands of unbelievers but into the mouths of the faithful. From this, therefore, let us consider what sort of sacrifice this is which for our absolution always imitates the Passion of the only-begotten Son. For who of the faithful can have doubt that at the very hour of immolation the heavens are opened at the priest's voice; that the choirs of angels are present in that mystery of Jesus Christ; that highest and lowest are associated; that one thing is made from invisible and visible things?

The same. § 2. At one and the same time and moment, he says, it is both carried away in heaven by the ministry of angels to be associated with Christ's body, and seen upon the altar before the priest's eyes.

And below. § 3. So great is the unity of the Church in Christ that everywhere there is one bread of Christ's body and one chalice of his blood. For the chalice which a Catholic priest sacrifices is no other than that which the Lord handed to the Apostles; because, just as the divinity of the Word of God is one and fills the whole world, so, although that body is consecrated in many places and on innumerable days, nevertheless there are not many bodies of Christ or many chalices, but one body of Christ and one blood with that which he assumed in the Virgin's womb and which he gave to the Apostles. For the divinity of the Word fills that which is everywhere and joins it and causes that, just as the divinity itself is one, so it is joined to Christ's body and his body is one in reality. Hence it is to be observed that whether one receives more or less from it, all equally receive Christ's body in its complete integrity, both all generally and each one particularly.

Likewise. § 4. It is called the mystery of faith because you ought to believe that our salvation consists there. For, providing for us, he gave this sacrament of salvation so that, because we sin daily and he now cannot die, through this sacrament we may attain remission of sins. For he himself is eaten and drunk daily in reality, but remains whole, living, and immaculate; and therefore it is a great and fearful mystery, because one thing is seen and another understood. But since it is a mystery, why is it called body and blood? It has the figure of bread and wine by the Lord's action, because we do not have it as a custom to eat raw flesh and drink blood.

C. LXXIII. In sanguine agni Christi sanguis, qui uere nunc sumitur, olim prefigurabatur.

Gregorius in omelia Pascali. Quid sit sanguis agni, non iam audiendo, sed bibendo didicistis. Qui sanguis super utrumque postem ponitur, quando non solum ore corporis, sed etiam ore cordis hauritur.

Item: [Dial. l. 4. c. 58.] §. 1. Hec salutaris uictima illam nobis mortem unigeniti per misterium reparat, qui, licet surgens a mortuis iam non moritur, mors illi ultra non dominabitur, tamen in se ipso inmortaliter et incorruptibiliter uiuens, iterum in hoc misterio moritur. Eius quoque ubique corpus sumitur, eius caro in salutem populi partitur, eius sanguis non iam in manus infidelium, sed in ora fidelium funditur. Hinc ergo pensemus, quale sit hoc sacrificium, quod pro absolutione nostra passionem unigeniti filii semper imitatur. Quis enim fidelium habere dubium possit, in ipsa inmolationis hora ad sacerdotis uocem celos aperiri? in illo Iesu Christi misterio angelorum choros adesse? summa et ima sociari, unum quid ex inuisibilibus atque uisibilibus fieri? Idem: §. 2. Uno, inquit, eodemque tempore ac momento et in celo rapitur ministerio angelorum consociandum corpori Christi, et ante oculos sacerdotis in altari uidetur. Et infra: §. 3. Tanta est ecclesiae unitas in Christo, ut unus ubique sit panis corporis Christi, et unus sit calix sanguinis eius. Calix enim, quem sacerdos catholicus sacrificat, non est alius, nisi ipse, quem Dominus Apostolis tradidit, quia, sicut diuinitas uerbi Dei una est, que totum inplet mundum, ita, licet multis locis et innumerabilibus diebus illud corpus consecretur, non sunt tamen multa corpora Christi, neque multi calices, sed unum corpus Christi, et unus sanguis cum illo, quod sumpsit in utero Virginis, et quod dedit Apostolis. Diuinitas enim uerbi replet illud, quod ubique est, et coniungit, ac facit, ut, sicut ipsa una est ita corpori Christi, et unum eius corpus sit in ueritate. Unde animaduertendum est, quia, siue plus siue minus quis inde percipiat, omnes equaliter corpus Christi integerrime sumunt, et generaliter omnes, et specialiter unusquisque. Item: §. 4. Misterium fidei dicitur, quia credere debes, quod ibi salus nostra consistat. Prouidens enim nobis dedit hoc sacramentum salutis, ut, quia nos cottidie peccamus, et ille iam mori non potest, per istud sacramentum remissionem consequamur peccatorum. Cottidie enim ipse comeditur et bibitur in ueritate, sed integer, et uiuus, atque inmaculatus manet, et ideo magnum et pauendum misterium est, quia aliud uidetur, et aliud intelligitur Sed cum misterium sit, unde corpus et sanguis dicitur? Figuram panis et uini habet faciente Domino, quia non habemus in usu carnem crudam comedere, et bibere sanguinem.

C. LXXIV. Although the figure of bread and wine remains after consecration, nevertheless nothing is there except Christ's body and blood.

Likewise Ambrose. "The Lord did all things whatsoever he willed in heaven and on earth." And because he willed it, so it was done. Thus, although the figure of bread and wine is seen, nevertheless after consecration there is nothing other than Christ's flesh and blood. The Truth himself says to the disciples: "This," he says, "is my flesh, for the life of the world." And, that I may speak more marvelously, it is plainly no other flesh than that which was born from Mary, suffered on the cross, and rose from the tomb; this, I say, is that very flesh. And therefore it is Christ's flesh which is still offered today for the life of the world, and when it is worthily received, eternal life is assuredly restored in us. Indeed, by this bread which we receive in the mystery, I assuredly understand that bread which was formed by the hand of the Holy Spirit in the Virgin's womb and baked by the fire of the Passion upon the altar of the cross. For the bread of angels was made the food of human beings, whence he himself says: "I am the living bread which descended from heaven," and likewise: "The bread that I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world." For from these two judgments it is openly given to be understood that this bread and that are not two, but one bread and one flesh, and undoubtedly one body is effected: truly that one, assuredly that one, which was assumed from the Virgin, which suffered and was buried, which also rose, ascended into heaven, sits at the right hand of God the Father, and is to come to judge the living and the dead.

C. LXXIV. Post consecrationem licet figura panis et uini remaneat, tamen nichil est ibi, nisi corpus et sanguis Christi.

Item Ambrosius. "Omnia, quecumque uoluit Dominus, fecit in celo et in terra." Et quia uoluit sic factum est ita licet figura panis et uini uideatur nichil tamen aliud, quam caro Christi et sanguis post consecrationem sunt ipsa ueritas ad discipulos: "Hec," inquit, "caro mea est, pro mundi uita." Et, ut mirabilius loquar, non alia plane, quam que nata est de Maria, et passa in cruce, et resurrexit de sepulcro; hec, inquam, ipsa est. Et ideo Christi est caro, que pro mundi uita adhuc hodie offertur, et, cum digne percipitur, uita utique eterna in nobis reparatur. Panem quidem istum, quem sumimus in misterio, illum utique intelligo panem, qui manu S. Spiritus formatus est in utero Virginis, et igne passionis decoctus in ara crucis. Panis enim angelorum factus est cibus hominum, unde ipse ait: "Ego sum panis uiuus, qui de celo descendi," et item: "Panis, quem ego dabo, caro mea est, pro mundi uita." Ex his namque duabus sentenciis aperte datur intelligi, quia panis iste et ille non duo, sed unus panis et una caro, proculdubio unum corpus efficitur; illud uere, illud sane, quod sumptum est de Virgine, quod passum est, et sepultum, quodque resurrexit, et in celum ascendit, et sedet ad dexteram Dei patris, et quod uenturum est iudicare uiuos et mortuos.

C. LXXV. Although Christ is eaten daily, he nevertheless remains whole and living.

Likewise Augustine from a sermon on the Lord's words. "He who eats me lives because of me." Therefore, brothers, let us not fear to eat this bread lest perhaps we finish it and afterward find nothing to eat. Let Christ be eaten: once eaten he lives, because, having been killed, he rose; nor when we eat do we make parts from him. And indeed it takes place thus in the sacrament, and the faithful know how they eat Christ's flesh. Each receives his own part, whence by this grace they are also called parts. He is eaten in parts and remains whole and entire; he is eaten in parts in the sacrament and remains whole and entire in heaven; he remains whole and entire in your heart. For he was wholly with the Father when he came into the Virgin; he filled her and did not withdraw from him. He was coming into flesh so that human beings might eat him, and remained whole with the Father so that he might feed the angels.

C. LXXV. Quamuis cottidie manducatur Christus, integer tamen permanet uiuus.

Item Augustinus ex sermone de uerbis Domini. "Qui manducat me, uiuit propter me." Non ergo, fratres, timeamus manducare panem istum, ne forte finiamus illum, et postea quod manducemus non inueniamus. Manducetur Christus: uiuit manducatus, quia surrexit occisus; nec, quando manducamus, partes de illo facimus. Et quidem in sacramento sic fit, et norunt fideles, quemadmodum manducent carnem Christi. Unusquisque accipit partem suam, unde et ipsa gratia partes uocantur. Per partes manducatur, et manet integer totus; per partes manducatur in sacramento, et manet integer totus in celo; manet integer totus in corde tuo. Totus enim erat apud patrem, quando uenit in Virginem; inpleuit illam, nec recessit ab illo. Veniebat in carnem, ut homines eum manducarent et manebat integer apud patrem, ut angelos pasceret.

C. LXXVI. It is permitted to no one to receive Christ's body according to itself.

Likewise Jerome on Leviticus. It is permitted to eat of this victim which is marvelously made in commemoration of Christ; but of that which Christ offered upon the altar of the cross, according to itself, it is permitted to no one to eat.

C. LXXVI. Corpus et sanguinem Christi secundum se nulli accipere licet.

Item Ieronimus in Leuitico. De hac quidem hostia, que in Christi conmemoratione mirabiliter fit, edere licet; de illa uero, quam Christus in ara crucis obtulit, secundum se nulli edere licet.

C. LXXVII. In the individual portions, individuals receive Christ whole.

The same in the sermon for the fifth Lord's day after Theophany. But individuals receive the Lord Christ, and in the individual portions he is whole; nor is he diminished among individuals, but furnishes himself whole in each.

C. LXXVII. Corpus Christi in singulis portionibus singuli totum accipiunt.

Idem in sermone dominicae V. post Theophaniam. Singuli autem accipiunt Dominum Christum, et in singulis portionibus totus est, nec per singulos minuitur, sed integrum se prebet in singulis.

C. LXXVIII. On the same matter.

Likewise Hilary. Where there is a part of the body, there is also the whole. The same rationale exists in the Lord's body as in the manna which preceded as its figure, concerning which it is said: "He who had gathered more did not have more, nor did he who had prepared less have less." Visible quantity is not to be appraised in this mystery, but the spiritual power of the sacrament.

C. LXXVIII. De eodem.

Item Hylarius. Ubi pars est corporis, est et totum. Eadem ratio est in corpore Domini, que in manna, quod in eius figura precessit, de quo dicitur: "Qui plus collegerat non habuit amplius, neque qui minus parauerat habuit minus." Non est quantitas uisibilis in hoc estimanda misterio, sed uirtus spiritualis sacramenti.

C. LXXIX. Christ's body which is received is both figure in species and reality in substance.

The same. Christ's body which is received from the altar is a figure while bread and wine are seen outwardly, but reality while Christ's body and blood are believed inwardly in reality.

C. LXXIX. Corpus Christi, quod sumitur, et figura est in specie, et ueritas in substantia.

Idem. Corpus Christi, quod sumitur de altari, figura est, dum panis et uinum extra uidetur; ueritas autem, dum corpus et sanguis Christi in ueritate interius creditur.

C. LXXX. At the altar we receive life-giving flesh made proper to the Word himself.

Likewise from the Creed of Ephesus. Therefore, we necessarily add this too. We celebrate in the churches the bloodless service of the sacrifice. And we are sanctified as participants in Christ's body and precious blood, receiving it not as common flesh, nor as the flesh of a sanctified man joined to the Word according to a unity of dignity, but as truly life-giving flesh made proper to the Word himself.

C. LXXX. Carnem uiuificatricem, et ipsius uerbi propriam factam in altari accipimus.

Item ex Simbolo Ephesino. Necessarie igitur et hoc adicimus. Incruentam celebramus in ecclesiis sacrificii seruitutem. Et sanctificamur participes corporis et preciosi sanguinis Christi, non ut communem carnem percipientes, nec uiri sanctificati, et uerbo coniuncti secundum dignitatis unitatem, sed uere uiuificatricem, et ipsius uerbi propriam factam.

C. LXXXI. How manna and water from the rock are the same as our food and drink.

Likewise Augustine, [tractate XXVI on c. 6 of John]. The Apostle says: "They all ate the same spiritual food." Assuredly the same spiritual food, for a different bodily food, because they ate manna and we another; "and they all drank the same spiritual drink." They drank one thing and we another, but in visible species; nevertheless, it is the same in spiritual power.

C. LXXXI. Quomodo manna et aqua de petra sint idem cum nostro cibo et potu.

Item Augustinus. [tractatu XXVI. ad c. 6. Iohannis] Inquit Apostolus: "Omnes eandem escam spiritualem manducauerunt." Spiritualem utique eandem: nam corporalem aliam, quia illi manna manducauerunt, nos aliud, "et omnes eundem potum spiritualem biberunt." Aliud illi, aliud nos: sed specie uisibili. Quod tamen idem est uirtute spirituali.

C. LXXXII. That we receive the reality of the Lord's body and blood.

Likewise Hilary, book VIII On the Trinity. PART XXIII. The Father in Christ and Christ in us cause us to be one in these things. If Christ truly assumed the flesh of our body, and that man truly is Christ, and we truly receive under a mystery the flesh of his body, and through this we will be one because the Father is in him and he in us, how is a unity of will asserted, when the natural property through the sacrament is a perfect sacrament of unity? One must not speak of these things by human or worldly sense, nor through a violent and imprudent preaching of heavenly sayings must the perversity of an alien and impious understanding be wrested from their soundness. For unless we learned from him the things we say concerning Christ's natural reality in us, we would speak foolishly and impiously. For he himself says: "My flesh is truly food, and my blood is truly drink. He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood remains in me, and I in him." No place for doubt is left concerning the reality of the flesh and blood. For now, both by the profession of the Lord himself and by our faith, it truly is flesh and truly is blood; and these things, received and drunk, cause both that we are in Christ and that Christ is in us. Therefore he himself is in us through the flesh.

§ 1. But that through the sacrament of the communicated flesh and blood we are in him, he himself testifies, saying: "But you will see me, because I live and you will live, because I am in my Father, and you in me, and I in you." If he wished only a unity of will to be understood, why did he set forth a certain degree and order of the unity to be consummated, unless so that he might be believed to be in the Father through the nature of divinity, we contrariwise to be in him through his bodily birth, and he in turn to be in us through the mystery of the sacraments, and thus a perfect unity through the mediator might be taught, since, with us remaining in him, he remained in the Father, and remaining in the Father remained in us, and so we advanced toward unity, since, as he who is naturally in him according to birth exists, we too would naturally be in him, while he naturally remained in us?

§ 2. But that this unity is naturally in us he himself testified thus: "He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood remains in me, and I in him." For no one will be in him except one in whom he himself has been, nevertheless having in himself the assumed flesh of him who had assumed his flesh. Likewise: "As the living Father sent me, and I live through the Father, so he who eats my flesh will himself live through me." As he lives through the Father, in the same manner we live through his flesh.

§ 3. This, therefore, is the cause of our life: that through the flesh we have Christ remaining in us, and will live through him by the condition by which he lives through the Father. Therefore, if according to the flesh we naturally live through him, that is, having attained the nature of his flesh, how does he not naturally according to the Spirit have the Father in himself, since he himself lives through the Father?

Likewise. § 4. But these things were recalled by us for this reason: because heretics, falsely claiming only a unity of will between the Father and the Son, were using the example of our unity with God, as though, with us united to the Son and through the Son to the Father only by obedience and the will of religion, no natural property of communion through the sacrament of flesh and blood were granted; although both through the honor of the Son given to us, and through him remaining carnally in us, and us bodily in him, with us inseparably united, the mystery of true and natural unity is to be proclaimed.

The same. § 4. Christ's body which is received from the altar is a figure while bread and wine are seen outwardly, but reality while Christ's body and blood are inwardly believed in reality.

C. LXXXII. Quod ueritatem dominici corporis et sanguinis sumimus.

Item Hylarius de Trinitate, libro VIII. XXIII. Pars. In Christo pater, et Christus in nobis unum in his esse nos faciunt. Si uere carnem corporis nostri Christus assumpsit, et uere homo ille. Christus est, nosque uere sub misterio carnem corporis sui sumimus, et per hoc unum erimus, quia pater in eo est, et ille in nobis, quomodo uoluntatis unitas asseritur, cum naturalis per sacramentum proprietas perfectum sacramentum sit unitatis? Non est humano aut seculi sensu de his rebus loquendum, neque per uiolentam atque inprudentem predicationem dictorum celestium sanitati alienae atque inpiae intelligentiae peruersitas est extorquenda. De naturali enim in nobis Christi ueritate que dicimus, nisi ab eo didicimus stulte atque inpie dicemus. Ipse enim ait: "Caro mea uere est esca, et sanguis meus uere est potus. Qui edit carnem meam, et bibit sanguinem meum, in me manet, et ego in eo." De ueritate carnis et sanguinis non est relictus ambigendi locus. Nunc enim et ipsius Domini professione et fide nostra uere caro est, et uere sanguis est, et hec accepta atque hausta efficiunt, ut et nos in Christo, et Christus in nobis sit. Est ergo in nobis ipse per carnem. §. 1. Quod autem in eo per sacramentum conmunicatae carnis et sanguinis simus, ipse testatur, dicens: "Vos autem uidebitis me, quia ego uiuo, et uos uiuetis, quoniam ego in patre meo, et uos in me, et ego in uobis." Si uoluntatis tantum intelligi unitatem uellet, cur gradum quendam atque ordinem consummandae unitatis exposuit nisi ut ille in patre per naturam diuinitatis nos contra in eo per corporalem eius natiuitatem, et ille rursus in nobis per sacramentorum inesse misterium crederetur, ac sic perfecta per mediatorem unitas doceretur, cum nobis in se manentibus ipse maneret in patre, et in patre manens maneret in nobis, et ita ad unitatem proficisceremur, cum qui in eo naturaliter secundum natiuitatem inest, nos quoque in eo naturaliter inessemus, ipso in nobis naturaliter permanente? §. 2. Quod autem in nobis naturaliter hec unitas sit, ipse ita testatus est: "Qui edit carnem meam, et bibit sanguinem meum, in me manet, et ego in eo." Non enim in eo erit, nisi in quo ipse fuerit, eius tamen assumptam in se habens carnem, qui suam sumpserat. Item: "Sicut misit me uiuens pater, et ego uiuo per patrem, et qui manducauerit meam carnem, et ipse uiuet per me." Quomodo per patrem uiuit, eodem modo nos per carnem eius uiuimus. §. 3. Hec ergo uitae nostrae causa est, quod in nobis manentem per carnem Christum habemus, uicturi per eum ea condicione, qua uiuit ille per patrem. Si ergo nos naturaliter secundum carnem per eum uiuimus, id est naturam suae carnis adepti, quomodo non naturaliter secundum spiritum in se patrem habeat, cum uiuat ipse per patrem? Item: §. 4. Hec autem idcirco conmemorata sunt a nobis, quia, uoluntatis tantum inter patrem et filium unitatem heretici mentientes unitatis nostrae ad Deum utebantur exemplo, tamquam nobis ad filium, et per filium ad patrem obsequio tantum et uoluntate religionis unitis, nulla per sacramentum carnis et sanguinis conmunionis naturalis proprietas indulgeretur, cum et per honorem nobis datum filii, et permanentem in nobis carnaliter, et nos in eo nobis corporaliter et inseparabiliter unitis misterium uerae ac naturalis unitatis sit predicandum. Idem: §. 4. Corpus Christi, quod sumitur de altari, figura est, dum panis et uinum extra uidetur; ueritas autem, dum corpus et sanguis Christi in ueritate interius creditur.

C. LXXXIII. Why water is mixed with wine in the sacrifice.

Likewise Ambrose in book V On the Sacraments, [c. 1]. PART XXIV. Wine and water are placed in the chalice. But you say: How, then, did Melchizedek offer bread and wine? What does the admixture of water mean? "But they drank from the rock following them; and the rock was Christ." Not an immobile rock, which followed the people. And you, drink, so that Christ may follow you. See the mystery. Moses: this is the Prophet. The rod: this is the word of God. The priest touches the rock with the word of God, and water flows, and the people of God drink. Water overflows in the chalice; it springs unto eternal life.

Likewise. Receive this too. § 2. From his side flowed water and blood: water, that it might cleanse; blood, that it might redeem. Why from the side? Because whence the fault, thence grace; fault through a woman, grace through Christ.

Likewise, [c. 3]. § 3. Hear the Psalm. See how suitable it is for the heavenly sacraments: "The Lord shepherds me, and nothing will be lacking to me, etc. Your rod and your staff, etc." The rod is command; the staff is the Passion; the eternal divinity of Christ and the temporal Passion. The former created; the latter redeemed. "You have prepared a table in my sight, and my inebriating cup, how splendid it is."

Likewise. § 4. As often as you drink, you receive remission of sins and are inebriated by the Spirit. Hence the Apostle also says: "Do not be inebriated with wine, in which there is wantonness, but be filled with the Holy Spirit." Likewise: Splendid inebriation, which operates sobriety of mind.

Likewise, [c. 4]. § 5. "Your will be done, as in heaven and on earth. Give us today our daily bread." By Christ's blood all things either in heaven or on earth have been pacified. Heaven has been sanctified; the devil has been cast down to where the human being whom he deceived moves.

§ 6. I told you that before Christ's words what is offered is called bread. When Christ's words have been brought forth, it is no longer called bread but body. Why, therefore, in the Lord's Prayer does he say, "Our bread"? He indeed said bread, but epiousion, that is, supersubstantial.

C. LXXXIII. Quare in sacrificio aqua uino miscetur.

Item Ambrosius in libro [V.] de sacramentis: [c. 1.] XXIV. Pars. In calice mittitur uinum, et aqua. Sed dicis: quomodo ergo Melchisedech panem et uinum obtulit? Quid sibi uult admixtio aquae? "Bibebant autem de consequenti eos petra: petra autem erat Christus." Non inmobilis petra, que populum sequebatur. Et tu bibe, ut te Christus sequatur. Vide misterium. Moyses, hoc est Propheta; uirga, hoc est uerbum Dei. Sacerdos uerbo Dei tangit petram, et fluit aqua, et bibit populus Dei. Redundat aqua in calice, salit in uitam eternam. Item: Accipe et illud. §. 2. De latere eius fluxit aqua et sanguis. Aqua, ut mundaret; sanguis, ut redimeret. Quare de latere? quia unde culpa, inde gratia; culpa per feminam, gratia per Christum. Item: [c. 3.] §. 3. Audi Psalmum. Vide, quam, aptus sit celestibus sacramentis: "Dominus pascit me, et nichil michi deerit etc. Virga tua, et baculus tuus et cet." Virga inperium, baculus passio est, eterna deitas Christi passio temporalis. Illa creauit, hec redemit. "Parasti in conspectu meo mensam et poculum meum inebrians, quam preclarum est." Item: §. 4. Quocienscumque bibis, remissionem accipis peccatorum, et inebriaris spiritu. Unde et Apostolus: "Nolite inebriari uino in quo est luxuria, sed inplemini Spiritu sancto." Item: Preclara ebrietas, que sobrietatem mentis operatur. Item: [c. 4.] §. 5. "Fiat uoluntas tua; sicut in celo et in terra. Panem nostrum cottidianum da nobis hodie." Sanguine Christi pacificata sunt omnia uel in celo, et in terra. Sanctificatum est celum, deiectus est diabolus, ubi uersatur homo, quem ille decepit. §. 6. Dixi uobis, quod ante uerba Christi quod offertur panis dicatur. Ubi uerba Christi deprompta fuerint, non iam panis sed corpus dicitur. Quare ergo in oratione dominica ait: "Panem nostrum?" Panem dixit quippe sed EPIOUSION hoc est supersubstantialem.

C. LXXXIV. We eat and drink Christ's true flesh and true blood.

The same in book VII. PART XXV. Just as the Lord Jesus Christ is the true Son of God—not as human beings are through grace, but as Son from the Father's substance—so the flesh of Christ which we receive is true, as he himself said, and his blood is true drink.

Likewise. § 1. "I am," he says, "the living bread that descended from heaven." But the flesh did not descend from heaven. How, then, did the living bread descend from heaven? Because the same Lord Jesus is a participant in divinity and in the body. And you who receive the flesh participate in his divine substance in that nourishment.

C. LXXXIV. Veram Christi carnem, et uerum Christi sanguinem manducamus et bibimus.

Idem in libro VII. XXV. Pars. Sicut est uerus Dei filius Dominus Iesus Christus, non quemadmodum homines per gratiam, sed quasi filius ex substantia patris: ita uera Christi caro, sicut ipse dixit, quam accipimus, et uerus sanguis eius est potus. Item: §. 1. "Ego sum," inquit, "panis uiuus, qui de celo descendi." Sed caro non descendit de celo. Quomodo ergo descendit de celo panis uiuus? quia idem Dominus Iesus consors est diuinitatis, et corporis. Et tu, qui accipis carnem, diuinae eius substantiae in illo participas alimento.

C. LXXXV. In the sacrifice we receive not bodily but spiritual food.

Likewise in the book On the Mysteries, [c. 9]. In that sacrament Christ is, because it is Christ's body. Therefore it is not bodily but spiritual food. Hence the Apostle also says concerning its type that our fathers ate the same spiritual food. For the body of God is a spiritual body; Christ's body is the body of the divine Spirit.

C. LXXXV. In sacrificio non corporalem, sed spiritualem escam accipimus.

Item in libro de misteriis. [cap. 9.] In illo sacramento Christus est, quia Christi corpus est. Non ergo corporalis esca, sed spiritualis. Unde et Apostolus de tipo eius ait, quia patres nostri eandem escam spiritalem manducauerunt. Corpus enim Dei corpus est spirituale: corpus Christi corpus est diuini spiritus.

C. LXXXVI. We offer upon the altar the flesh assumed by Christ and the transfigured body.

The same in the sermon On Abel and Cain. If you believe that flesh was assumed by Christ and offer the transfigured body upon the altar, but nevertheless do not distinguish the nature of the Word and of the body, it is said to you: "If you offer rightly but do not divide rightly, you have sinned."

C. LXXXVI. Carnem a Christo susceptam, et corpus transfiguratum in altari offerimus.

Idem in sermone de Abel et Cayn. Si credis, a Christo, carnem esse susceptam, et offeras transfiguratum corpus in altari, nec tamen distinguis naturam uerbi et corporis, dicitur tibi: "Si recte offeras, recte autem non diuidas, peccasti."

C. LXXXVII. At the Supper Christ was both guest and banquet.

Likewise Jerome to Hedibia, [question II]. Moses did not give you the true bread, but the Lord Jesus himself is both guest and banquet, himself eating and being eaten.

C. LXXXVII. In cena Christus fuit conuiua et conuiuium.

Item Ieronimus ad Heldibiam [quaest. II.] Nec Moyses dedit uobis panem uerum, sed Dominus Iesus ipse conuiua et conuiuium, ipse comedens, et qui comeditur.

C. LXXXVIII. In the reality of his body and blood Christ presented to his disciples what Melchizedek offered sacramentally.

Likewise on Matthew, [book IV on c. 26]. "Take and eat. This is my body." After the typical Passover had been completed and he had eaten the flesh of the lamb with the Apostles, he took bread, which strengthens the human being, and passed to the true sacrament of the Passover, so that, just as Melchizedek had done in his prefiguration when offering bread and wine, he too might present it in the reality of his body and blood.

C. LXXXVIII. In ueritate sui corporis et sanguinis Christus suis discipulis presentauit quod Melchisedech sacramentaliter obtulit.

Item super Mattheum. [lib. IV. ad c. 26.] "Accipite et comedite. Hoc est corpus meum." Postquam tipicum fuerat pasca conpletum, et agni carnes cum Apostolis comederat, assumpsit panem, qui confortator est hominis, et ad uerum Pascae transit sacramentum, ut, quomodo in prefiguratione eius Melchisedech panem et uinum offerens fecerat, ipse quoque in ueritate sui corporis et sanguinis representaret.

C. LXXXIX. Christ is both priest and sacrifice.

The same in the book On the Lord's Members. The Son of God is called the priest of God the Father according to the humanity in which he offered himself to God as an acceptable sacrifice for us, so that he himself who is the sacrifice is the priest.

C. LXXXIX. Christus idem est sacerdos et sacrificium.

Idem in libro de membris Domini. Sacerdos Dei patris dicitur filius Dei, secundum humanitatem, in qua se pro nobis acceptabile sacrificium Deo obtulit, ut ipse sit sacerdos, qui est sacrificium.

C. XC. The believing Jews drank the blood that they shed upon the cross.

Likewise Augustine, On the Usefulness of Doing Penance. Then Peter announced to them that the one whom they had crucified was to be worshiped, so that, believing, they might now drink his blood which, raging, they had shed.

C. XC. Iudei credentes biberunt sanguinem, quem in cruce fuderunt.

Item Augustinus de utilitate agendae penitenciae. Tunc eis Petrus annunciauit eum colendum, quem crucifixerunt, ut eius iam sanguinem biberent credentes, quem fuderant seuientes.

C. XCI. The body that was assumed from the Virgin is received by the faithful.

The same in the letter to Irenaeus. That bodily manna is now the reality of so great a miracle because what is perfect has come; but the perfect thing is the bread from heaven, the body from the Virgin.

C. XCI. Corpus, quod ex Virgine sumptum est, a fidelibus accipitur.

Idem in epistola ad Ireneum. Corporeum illud manna nunc est tanti res miraculi, quia uenit quod perfectum est; perfectum autem panis de celo corpus ex Virgine.

C. XCII. We daily eat Christ's true body and drink his true blood.

The same, in the second homily on Psalm 33. The Jews approached Jesus to crucify him; let us approach to receive his body and blood.

Likewise. § 1. Truly great is God and great his mercy, who gave us his body to eat, in which he endured so much, and his blood to drink.

Likewise on Psalm 27, to the Jews. § 2. Now drink securely the blood that you shed.

On Psalm 75. § 3. The very blood which they shed through madness, they drank through grace.

On Psalm 28. § 4. From Mary's flesh he received flesh, and he gave that very flesh to be eaten for salvation. But no one eats that flesh unless he has first adored it.

On Psalm 33. § 5. "David was carried in his own hands." No one is carried in his own hands. We do not find how this is to be understood literally in David himself, but we find it in Christ. For Christ was carried in his own hands when, commending his own body, he said: "This is my body." For that body was carried in his own hands.

The same, tractate 35 on John. § 6. Until they drank the blood that they had shed, they despaired.

The same on Psalm 54. § 7. The Jews were fed as though from the Lord's punishment, and we are fed from the Lord's cross because we eat his body. Therefore the impious have their feasts, and the pious have theirs. "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for justice."

C. XCII. Verum Christi corpus, uerumque eius sanguinem cottidie manducamus et bibimus.

Idem in psalmo XXXIII. omelia II. Accesserunt Iudei ad Iesum, ut crucifigerent; nos accedamus, ut corpus eius et sanguinem accipiamus. Item: §. 1. Vere magnus Deus et magna misericordia eius, qui nobis dedit corpus suum manducare, in quo tanta perpessus est, et sanguinem suum bibere. Item in Psalmo 27. ad Iudeos: §. 2. Iam et securi bibite sanguinem, quem fudistis. Psalmo 75.: §. 3. Ipsum sanguinem, quem per insaniam fuderunt, per gratiam biberunt. Psalmo 28.: §. 4. De carne Mariae carnem accepit, et ipsam carnem ad manducandum ad salutem dedit. Nemo autem carnem illam manducat, nisi prius adorauerit. Psalmo 33.: §. 5. "Dauid ferebatur manibus suis." Manibus suis nemo portatur. Quomodo intelligatur in ipso Dauid, secundum literam non inuenimus: in Christo autem inuenimus. Ferebatur enim Christus manibus suis, quando conmendans ipsum corpus suum ait: "Hoc est corpus meum." Ferebatur enim illud corpus in manibus suis. Idem super Iohannem tractatu 35.: §. 6. Quousque biberent sanguinem, quem fuderant, desperauerunt. Idem in Psalmo 54.: §. 7. Iudei pascebantur tamquam de pena Domini, et nos de cruce Domini pascimur, quia corpus ipsius manducamus. Habent ergo inpii epulas suas, habent pii suas. "Beati, qui esuriunt et sitiunt iusticiam."

C. XCIII. The Eucharist ought always to be prepared for the sick.

Likewise from the Council of Worms. PART XXVI. Let a presbyter always have the Eucharist prepared so that, when anyone becomes ill, he may immediately communicate him, lest he die without communion.

> C. XCIII. Pro infirmantibus eucharistia semper debet esse parata.
> Item ex Concilio Wormaciensi. XXVI. Pars. Presbiter eucharistiam semper habeat paratam, ut, quando quis infirmatus fuerit, statim eum conmunicet, ne sine conmunione moriatur.

C. XCIV. The penance of one who does not guard the sacrifice well.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans. PART XXVII. One who has not guarded the sacrifice well, and a mouse or some other animal has eaten it, shall do penance for forty days. But one who has lost it in the church, or a part of it has fallen and has not been found, shall do penance for thirty days.

> C. XCIV. Penitencia eius, qui non bene sacrificium custodit.
>
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. XXVII. Pars. Qui bene non custodierit sacrificium, et mus uel aliud aliquod animal illud comederit, XL. dies peniteat. Qui autem perdiderit illud in ecclesia, aut pars eius ceciderit, et inuenta non fuerit, XXX. dies peniteat.

C. XCV. The sacred mysteries shall not be entrusted to actors.

Cyprian, greetings to his fellow bishop Eucratius, [book I, letter 10]. PART XXVIII. On account of your affection you judged that I should be consulted, dearest brother, concerning what seems to me regarding that actor and magician established among you, who still perseveres in the disgrace of his art and, as master and teacher not of boys to be instructed but of boys to be destroyed, also insinuates to others what he learned wickedly: whether sacred communion ought to be given to such persons together with the other Christians, or he ought to communicate with you. I judge it to accord neither with the divine majesty nor with evangelical discipline that the modesty and honor of the Church be defiled by so shameful and infamous a contagion.

> C. XCV. Ystrionibus sacra non conmittantur misteria.
> Ciprianus Euricacio confratri salutem. [lib. I. ep. 10.] XXVIII. Pars. Pro dilectione tua consulendum me existimasti, frater karissime, quid michi uideatur de ystrione et mago illo, qui apud uos constitutus adhuc in suae artis dedecore perseuerat, et magister et doctor non erudiendorum, sed perdendorum puerorum, id, quod male didicit, ceteris quoque insinuat: an talibus debeat sacra conmunio cum ceteris Christianis dari aut debeat conmunicare uobiscum? Puto nec maiestati diuinae, nec euangelicae disciplinae congruere, ut pudor et honor ecclesiae tam turpi et infami contagione fedetur.

C. XCVI. After conversion, the grace of communion is not to be denied.

Likewise from the Third Council of Carthage, [c. 35]. Let grace or reconciliation with God not be denied to stage performers, actors, and other persons of this kind, or to apostates who have been converted or returned.

> C. XCVI. Post conuersionem non est deneganda gratia conmunionis.
> Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi III. [c. 35.] Scenicis atque ystrionibus, ceterisque huiusmodi personis, uel apostaticis conuersis, uel reuersis, ad Deum gratia uel reconciliatio non negetur.

C. XCVII. A presbyter shall not celebrate Mass upon an altar on which a bishop celebrated that same day.

Likewise from the Council of Urbinum. Let no presbyter presume to celebrate another Mass on that day upon an altar at which the bishop sang Mass.

> C. XCVII. Presbiter in altari missam non celebret, in quo eadem die episcopus celebrauit.
>
> Item ex Concilio Urbico. In altari, quo missam episcopus cantauit, presbiter eo die aliam celebrare non presumat.

Distinction III

GRATIAN.

> GRATIANUS.

C. I. The times for abstaining from work are to be announced to laypersons at Mass.

Likewise from the Council of Lyon. PART I. It is to be proclaimed so that they may know the times for abstaining from work throughout the year, that is, every Lord's day from evening to evening, lest they be seized by Judaism. But these are the days for abstaining from work throughout the year: the Nativity of the Lord; Saint Stephen; Saint John the Evangelist; the Holy Innocents; Saint Sylvester; the octave of the Lord's Theophany; the Purification of Saint Mary; holy Easter with the whole week; the Rogations for three days; the Ascension of the Lord; the holy days of Pentecost; Saint John the Baptist; the twelve Apostles, and especially Saints Peter and Paul, who illuminated the world by their preaching; Saint Lawrence; the Assumption of Saint Mary; the Nativity of Saint Mary; the Dedication; Saint Michael the Archangel; the dedication of any oratory; All Saints; and Saint Martin; and those feasts which individual bishops with the people have approved in their episcopal sees, which are to be proclaimed only to neighbors dwelling nearby, not generally to all. But the remaining feasts throughout the year are neither to be compelled to abstain from work nor prohibited. But when an appointed fast has been announced, let it be observed by all.

> C. I. Tempora feriandi in missa sunt laicis annuncianda.
> Item ex Concilio Lugdunensi. I. Pars. Pronunciandum est, ut sciant tempora feriandi per annum, id est: omnem dominicam a uespera usque ad uesperam, ne a Iudaismo capiantur. Feriandi uero per annum isti sunt dies: Natalis Domini, S. Stephani, S. Iohannis Euangelistae, Innocentium, S. Siluestri, Octauae Domini Theophaniae, Purificatio S. Mariae, sanctum Pasca cum tota hebdomada, Rogationes tribus diebus, Ascensio Domini, sancti dies Pentecostes, S. Iohannis Baptistae, duodecim Apostolorum, et maxime sanctorum Petri et Pauli, qui mundum sua predicatione illuminauerunt, S. Laurentii, Asumptio S. Mariae, Natiuitas S. Mariae, Dedicatio, S. Michaelis Archangeli, Dedicatio cuiuscumque oratorii, et omnium sanctorum, et S. Martini, et illae festiuitates, quas singuli episcopi in suis episcopiis cum populo collaudauerint, que uicinis tantum circummorantibus indicendae sunt, non generaliter omnibus. Reliquae uero festiuitates per annum non sunt cogendae ad feriandum, nec prohibendae. Indictum uero ieiunium quando fuerit denunciatum, ab omnibus obseruetur.

C. II. On the solemnities of the saints, the peoples ought to attend to divine offices, not dances or songs.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 23]. It is an irreligious custom which the common people are accustomed to practice during the solemnities of the saints. The peoples, who ought to attend the divine offices, keep watch over shameful dances and songs, not only singing evil things but also making a din through the offices of religious persons. So that this may be driven away from all provinces, it is entrusted by the holy council to the care of priests and judges.

> C. II. In sanctorum solempnitatibus diuinis offitiis, non saltationibus uel cantilenis, populi debent uacare.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano IV. [c. 23.] Irreligiosa consuetudo est, quam uulgus per sanctorum solempnitates agere consueuit. Populi, qui debent diuina offitia attendere, saltationibus turpibus inuigilant cantica, non solum mala canentes, sed et religiosorum offitiis perstrepunt. Hoc etenim, ut ab omnibus prouinciis depellatur, sacerdotum et iudicum a concilio sancto curae conmittitur.

C. III. Litanies shall be celebrated for three days before the Lord's Ascension.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, [I, c. 29]. It was resolved that the Rogations, that is, the litanies, be celebrated before the Lord's Ascension in such a way that the three-day fast sent before be broken on the solemnity of the Lord's Ascension. During this three-day period, let male and female servants be released from work so that the whole people may assemble in greater number. During this three-day period, let all abstain and use Lenten foods.

> C. III. Ante Ascensionem Domini tribus diebus litaniae celebrentur.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi. [I. c. 29.] Rogationes, id est letanias, ante Ascensionem Domini placuit celebrari ita, ut premissum triduanum ieiunium in dominicae Ascensionis solempnitate soluatur. Per quod triduum serui et ancillae ab opere relaxentur, quo magis plebs uniuersa conueniat. Quo triduo omnes abstineant, et quadragesimalibus cibis utantur.

C. IV. A bishop shall not be absent from church on the Lord's day.

Likewise from the same, [c. 33]. A bishop, if he has not been impeded by infirmity, ought not to be absent on the Lord's day from the church to which he is nearest.

> C. IV. Episcopus die dominico non desit ecclesiae.
> Item ex eodem. [c. 33.] Episcopus, si infirmitate non fuerit inpeditus, ecclesiae, cui proximus fuerit, die dominico deesse non debet.

C. V. Citizens are not permitted to celebrate these days at a country estate.

Likewise from the same, [c. 27]. Let no citizen ever be permitted to celebrate the solemnity of Easter, the Nativity of the Lord, or Lent at a country estate, except one whom infirmity is proved to have detained.

> C. V. Hos dies ciuibus in uilla celebrare non licet.
> Item ex eodem. [c. 27.] Nulli ciuium umquam Pascae, Natalis Domini, uel Quadragesimae solempnitatem in uilla liceat celebrare, nisi quem infirmitas probabitur tenuisse.

C. VI. Lent is to be celebrated before the solemnity of Easter.

Likewise from the same, [c. 26]. It was decreed for all priests that before the solemnity of Easter not Quinquagesima but Quadragesima is to be observed.

> C. VI. Ante solempnitatem Pascae Quadragesima est celebranda.
> Item ex eodem. [c. 26.] Sacerdotibus omnibus decretum est, ut ante Pascae solempnitatem non Quinquagesima, sed Quadragesima teneatur.

C. VII. It is not permitted to break the fast on the fifth day of the final week of Lent.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 50]. Let it not be permitted, brothers, to break the fast on the fifth day of the final week and dishonor the whole of Lent, but, sincerely abstaining, to pass through the whole of Lent.

> C. VII. Quinta feria ultimae septimanae Quadragesimae ieiunium solui non licet.
> Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 50.] Non liceat quinta feria, fratres, nouissimae septimanae ieiunium soluere, et omnem Quadragesimam exhonorare, sed sincere abstinentes totam Quadragesimam perexire.

C. VIII. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea, [c. 50]. One ought not to dissolve the fast in Lent on the fifth day of the final week and dishonor the whole of Lent, but to fast through all the days and use foods suitable for abstinence, that is, drier foods.

> C. VIII. De eodem.
>
> Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 50.] Non oportet in Quadragesima quinta feria ultimae hebdomadae ieiunium dissolui, et totam Quadragesimam inhonorari; sed per totos dies ieiunare, et escis abstinentiae conuenientibus, id est aridioribus, uti.

C. IX. Except on the Lord's days, the fast shall not be broken in Lent.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 12]. It was resolved that all churches, except on the Lord's days, fast in Lent even on the Sabbath by priestly prayer and the communion of discretion.

> C. IX. Exceptis diebus dominicis in Quadragesima non soluatur ieiunium.
> Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 12.] Placuit, ut omnes ecclesiae, exceptis diebus dominicis, in quadragesima etiam die sabbati sacerdotali oratione et discretionis conmunione ieiunent.

C. X. The knees shall be bent in prayer neither on the Lord's day nor during the days of Pentecost.

Likewise from the Council of Nicaea, [c. 20]. Since there are some who bend their knees in prayer on the Lord's day and during the days of Pentecost, it was therefore established by the holy synod—because a harmonious and fitting custom is to be guarded throughout all the churches—that, standing in prayer, we render vows to the Lord.

> C. X. Nec in die dominica, nec in diebus Pentecostes in oratione genua flectantur.
> Item ex Concilio Niceno. [c. 20.] Quoniam sunt in die dominica quidam ad orationem genua flectentes, et in diebus Pentecostes, propterea itaque statutum est a sancta sinodo, (quoniam consona, et conueniens consuetudo per omnes ecclesias custodienda est), ut stantes ad orationem Domino uota reddamus.

C. XI. At what time one is to abstain from eating meats.

Likewise Leo IV. PART II. Concerning the eating of meats, among us the most ancient and irreproachable tradition is always to be maintained: that from the end of the meal which takes place at the beginning of the night of the fourth day, which dawns on the fourth day, until the dawn of the fifth day; and similarly from the meal of the night of the sixth day, which dawns on the sixth day, fasting is not unskillfully to be prolonged until the light of the Sabbath, for as much of the portion of the day as someone prefers or ought to fast.

C. XI. Quo tempore ab esu carnium sit abstinendum.

Item Leo IV. II. Pars. De esu carnium apud nos uetustissima, et non inprobanda traditio semper tenenda est, ut a cenae termino, que fit in principio noctis quartae feriae, que lucescit in quarta feria, usque in diluculum quintae feriae, et similiter a cena noctis sextae feriae, que lucescit in sexta feria, non inperite ieiunatio usque ad sabbati lucem, quantum de diei parte aliquis ieiunare maluerit uel debuerit, protendatur.

C. XII. Neither is one to abstain from work on the Sabbath, nor is bathing prohibited on the Lord's day.

Likewise Gregory to his most beloved citizens of Rome, [book XI, letter 3]. PART III. It has come to me that certain persons of a perverse spirit have sown among you some depraved things opposed to the holy faith, such that they prohibited any work from being done on the Sabbath day. What else shall we call them except preachers of Antichrist? He, when he comes, will cause both the Sabbath day and the Lord's day to be guarded from all work. For because he feigns that he dies and rises, he wishes the Lord's day to be held in veneration; and because he compels the people to Judaize, so that he may recall the exterior rite of the law and subject the perfidy of the Jews to himself, he wishes the Sabbath to be cultivated.

§ 1. Another thing also has been reported to me: that it was preached to you by perverse persons that no one ought to bathe on the Lord's day. And indeed, if someone desires to bathe for wantonness and pleasure, we do not concede that this be done on any other day either. But if for bodily necessity, we do not prohibit this even on the Lord's day.

C. XII. Nec die sabbati feriandum, nec die dominico lauacrum est prohibendum.

Item Gregorius dilectissimis ciuibus Romae. [lib. XI. epist. 3.] III. Pars. Peruenit ad me, quosdam peruersi spiritus homines praua inter uos aliqua et sanctae fidei aduersa seminasse, ita ut in die sabbati aliquid operari prohiberent. Quos quid aliud nisi antichristi predicatores dixerimus? qui ueniens diem sabbatum atque dominicum ab omni faciet opere custodiri. Quia enim mori se et resurgere simulat, haberi uult in ueneratione dominicum diem; et quia populum iudaizare conpellit, ut exteriorem ritum legis reuocet, et sibi Iudeorum perfidiam subdat, coli uult sabbatum. §. 1. Aliud quoque ad me perlatum est, uobis a peruersis hominibus esse predicatum, ut dominico die nullus debeat lauari. Et quidem si pro luxuria et pro uoluptate lauari quis appetit, hoc fieri nec reliquo die quolibet concedimus. Si autem pro necessitate corporis hoc nec die dominico prohibemus.

C. XIII. Out of reverence for the Lord's burial, we ought to fast on the Sabbath.

Likewise Pope Innocent, [letter I to Decentius, c. 4]. PART IV. A most evident rationale demonstrates that one is to fast on the Sabbath. For if we celebrate the Lord's day not only at Easter on account of the venerable resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ, but also frequent the image of that day during each week, and just as we fast on the sixth day on account of the Lord's Passion, we ought not to omit the Sabbath, since it appears enclosed between the sorrow and joy of that time. For it is certainly established that during these two days the Apostles were both in grief and hid themselves for fear of the Jews. And there is assuredly no doubt that they fasted during the two days mentioned, to such an extent that the tradition of the Church holds that the sacraments are not celebrated at all during these two days. This form also is to be maintained during each week because the commemoration of that day is always to be celebrated. But if they think one is to fast once and on one Sabbath, then the Lord's day and the sixth day will assuredly also be celebrated once, at Easter.

> C. XIII. Ob reuerentiam sepulturae dominicae sabbato ieiunare debemus.
> Item Innocentius Papa. [ep. I. ad Decentium, c. 4.] IV. Pars. Sabbato uero ieiunandum esse, ratio euidentissima demonstrat. Nam, si diem dominicam ob uenerabilem resurrectionem Domini nostri Iesu Christi non solum in Pasca celebramus, uerum etiam per singulas hebdomadas ipsius diei imaginem frequentamus, ac sicut sexta feria propter passionem Domini ieiunamus, sabbatum pretermittere non debemus, quoniam inter tristiciam et leticiam temporis illius uidetur inclusum. Nam utique constat, Apostolos biduo isto et in merore fuisse, et propter metum Iudeorum se occuluisse. Quod utique non dubium est in tantum eos ieiunasse biduo memorato, ut traditio ecclesiae habeat isto biduo sacramenta penitus non celebrari. Que etiam forma per singulas tenenda est hebdomadas propter id, quod conmemoratio diei illius semper est celebranda. Quod si putant semel atque uno sabbato ieiunandum, ergo et dominica, et sexta feria semel in Pasca erit utique celebranda.

C. XIV. A fast is not to be celebrated on the Lord's day or the fifth day.

Likewise Pope Miltiades, [to the Bishops of Spain, c. 3]. PART V. No one ought to celebrate a fast on the Lord's day or the fifth day, so that a true and not false distinction may be maintained between the fast of Christians and gentiles, and of those who truly believe and unbelievers and heretics.

> C. XIV. Die dominica et quinta feria non est celebrandum ieiunium.
>
> Item Melciades Papa. [ad Episcopos Hispaniarum, cap 3.] V. Pars. Ieiunium dominici diei, et quintae feriae nemo celebrare debet, ut inter ieiunium Christianorum et gentilium et ueraciter credentium et infidelium atque hereticorum, uera et non falsa discretio habeatur.

C. XV. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Saragossa, [c. 2]. Let no one fast on the Lord's day from fear or persuasion; nor during the days of Lent let the faithful be absent from the churches or inhabit the hiding places of chambers and mountains, those who persevere in suspicious practices; but let them guard the example and precept of the priests and not assemble at others' country estates for the sake of holding assemblies. It was said by all the bishops: Let one who has committed this be anathema.

> C. XV. De eodem.
> Item ex Concilio Cesaraugustano. [c. 2.] Ne quis ieiunet die dominica causa timoris, aut persuasionis, nec Quadragesimarum diebus ab ecclesiis fideles desint, nec habitent in cubiculorum latibulis, ac montium, qui in suspicionibus perseuerant; sed exemplum ac preceptum custodiant sacerdotum, et ad alienas uillas agendorum conuentuum causa non conueniant. Ab uniuersis episcopis dictum est: Anathema sit qui hoc conmiserit.

C. XVI. The fasts of the fourth and sixth days are not to be broken.

Likewise from the sayings of Saint Apollonius. PART VI. The lawful fasts, namely of the fourth and sixth days, are not to be broken unless there is some great necessity, because on the fourth day Judas contemplated the betrayal of the Lord, and on the sixth day the Savior was crucified. Therefore, one who without necessity breaks the established fasts on these days will appear either to betray the Savior with the betrayer or crucify him with those crucifying. But on the Lord's day nothing else is to be done except to attend to God. Let no work be carried out on that holy day; rather, let that day be passed only in hymns, psalms, and spiritual songs.

C. XVI. Quarta et sexta feria sunt soluenda ieiunia.

Item ex dictis S. Apollonii. VI. Pars. Ieiunia sane legitima, id est quarta et sexta feria, non sunt soluenda, nisi grandis aliqua necessitas fuerit, quia quarta feria Iudas traditionem Domini cogitauit, et sexta feria crucifixus est Saluator. Videbitur ergo, qui in his diebus sine necessitate soluerit statuta ieiunia, uel cum tradente tradere Saluatorem, uel cum crucifigentibus crucifigere. Die autem dominica nichil aliud agendum est, nisi Deo uacandum. Nulla operatio in illa die sancta agatur, nisi tantum ymnis, et psalmis, et canticis spiritualibus dies illa transigatur.

C. XVII. On the fifth day of the final week of Lent, penitents shall receive remission.

Likewise Innocent, [letter I to Decentius, c. 7]. PART VII. Concerning penitents who perform penance either for graver offenses committed or for lighter ones, if no sickness intervenes, the custom of the Roman Church demonstrates that remission is to be given to them on the fifth day before Easter.

§ 1. But it belongs to the priest to judge concerning the weight of the offenses to be appraised, so that he attends to the confession of the penitent and to the weeping and tears of the one correcting himself.

§ 2. Certainly, if anyone falls into sickness and reaches the point of desperation, release is to be granted to him before the time of Easter, lest he depart from the world without communion.

C. XVII. Quinta feria ultimae hebdomadae quadragesimae penitentes remissionem accipiant.

Item Innocentius. [ep. I. ad Decentium c. 7.] VII. Pars. De penitentibus uero, qui siue ex grauioribus conmissis, siue ex leuioribus penitenciam gerunt, si nulla interueniat egritudo, quinta feria ante Pasca eis remittendum, Romanae ecclesiae consuetudo demonstrat. §. 1. Ceterum de pondere estimando delictorum sacerdotis est iudicare, ut attendat ad confessionem penitentis, et ad fletus atque lacrimas corrigentis. §. 2. Sane si quis in egritudinem inciderit, atque usque ad desperationem deuenerit, est ei ante tempus Pascae relaxandum, ne de seculo absque conmunione discedat.

C. XVIII. Each year on the fifth day of the final week of Quinquagesima, new chrism shall be confected.

Likewise Pope Fabian to the Eastern Bishops, [letter II]. PART VIII. Among other things inserted in your letters, we found that certain bishops of your religion depart from your order and ours and do not confect chrism each year at the Supper of the Lord. But those who devise such things err, and dare to do these things while thinking with an insane rather than upright mind.

§ 1. For just as the solemnity of that day itself is to be celebrated each year, so the confection of that holy chrism is to be performed each year and renewed from year to year, and it is to be handed to the faithful, because it is a new sacrament and is to be renewed each year on the aforesaid day, and the old chrism is to be burned in the holy churches. We received these things from the holy Apostles and their successors, and command that they be held by you.

C. XVIII. Singulis annis quinta feria ultimae hebdomadae quinquagesimae nouum crisma conficiatur.

Item Fabianus Papa orientalibus Episcopis. [epist. II.] VIII. Pars. Litteris uestris inter cetera insertum inuenimus, quosdam religionis uestrae episcopos a uestro nostroque ordine discrepare, et non per singulos annos in cena Domini crisma conficere. Errant uero qui talia excogitant, et mente uesana potius, quam recta sentientes hec facere audent. §. 1. Sicut enim ipsius diei solempnitas per singulos annos est celebranda, ita ipsius sancti crismatis confectio per singulos annos est agenda, et de anno in annum renouanda, et fidelibus tradendum, quia nouum sacramentum est et per singulos annos, in iam dicta die innouandum, et uetus in sanctis ecclesiis cremandum. Ista a sanctis Apostolis et successoribus eorum accepimus, uobisque tenenda mandamus.

C. XIX. The feast of the finding of the Lord's cross shall be observed by all.

Likewise Pope Eusebius, [letter III]. PART IX. We command you solemnly to celebrate, on the aforesaid day of the Kalends, the feast of the finding of the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was recently found on the fifth day before the Nones of May while we held the governance of the holy Roman Church.

C. XIX. Seruetur ab omnibus festiuitas inuentionis dominicae crucis.

Item Eusebius Papa. [epist. III.] IX. Pars. Crucis Domini nostri Iesu Christi, que nuper, nobis gubernacula sanctae Romanae ecclesiae tenentibus, quinto nonas Maii inuenta est, in predicto Kalendarum die inuentionis festum uobis solempniter celebrare mandamus.

C. XX. Why it was established that water sprinkled with salt is to be sanctified.

Likewise Pope Alexander, fifth from Peter, [letter I, c. 5]. PART X. We bless water sprinkled with salt for the peoples, so that all who are sprinkled with it may be sanctified and purified. And we command that this be done by all priests. For if the ash of a heifer, when sprinkled, sanctified and cleansed the people, much more does water sprinkled with salt and consecrated by divine prayers sanctify and cleanse the people. And if through salt sprinkled by the prophet Elisha the sterility of the water was healed, how much more does salt consecrated by divine prayers remove the sterility of human affairs, sanctify and purge the defiled, multiply other goods, turn away the snares of the devil, and defend human beings from the deceits of phantasms?

C. XX. Quare sit institutum, ut aqua sale conspersa sanctificetur.

Item Alexander Papa V. a Petro. [epist. I. c. 5.] X. Pars. Aquam sale conspersam populis benedicimus, ut ea cuncti aspersi sanctificentur et purificentur. Quod et omnibus sacerdotibus faciendum esse mandamus. Nam si cinis uitulae aspersus populum sanctificabat atque mundabat: multo magis aqua sale aspersa, diuinisque precibus sacrata, populum sanctificat atque mundat. Et, si sale asperso per Heliseum prophetam sterilitas aquae sanata est: quanto magis diuinis precibus sacratus sterilitatem rerum aufert humanarum, et coinquinatos sanctificat, et purgat, et cetera bona multiplicat, et insidias diaboli auertit, et a fantasmatis uersutiis homines defendit?

C. XXI. Holy Easter shall be celebrated only on the Lord's day.

Likewise Pope Pius, ninth from the Apostle Peter, in the first of his decretals. We wish you to know that the Lord's Easter is to be celebrated annually on the Lord's day. For in these times Hermas, a teacher of faith and Scripture, shone among us. And although we celebrated Easter on the aforesaid day, nevertheless, because some doubted concerning it, an angel of the Lord appeared to the same Hermas in the form of a shepherd, to strengthen their souls, and commanded him that the Lord's Easter be celebrated by all on the Lord's day. Hence we too establish by apostolic authority that all ought to observe the same things, because we also observe the same, nor ought you to depart from the head in any manner.

C. XXI. Non nisi die dominico sanctum Pasca celebretur.

Item Pius Papa IX. a Petro Apostolo, in primo suorum decretalium. Nosse uos uolumus, quod Pasca Domini die dominico annuis temporibus sit celebrandum. Istis enim temporibus Hermes doctor fidei et scripturae inter nos effulsit. Et licet nos idem Pasca predicto die celebraremus, tamen quia quidam inde dubitabant, ad corroborandas animas eorum eidem Hermae angelus Domini in habitu pastoris apparuit, et precepit ei, ut Pasca Domini die dominico ab omnibus celebraretur. Unde et nos apostolica auctoritate instituimus, omnes eadem seruare debere, quia et nos eadem seruamus, nec debetis a capite quoquo modo discedere.

C. XXII. Holy Easter shall be celebrated only on the Lord's day.

Likewise Pope Victor, thirteenth from Peter, in his first decretal. Our predecessors have already established that the solemnity of holy Easter ought to be celebrated on the Lord's day, and we command that it be solemnly celebrated on that same day, because it is not fitting that the members disagree with the head or act otherwise. But let that feast be celebrated from the fourteenth moon of the first month through the twenty-first day of the same month.

§ 1. At the same time Catholic baptism is also to be celebrated. But nevertheless, if it is necessary or danger of death threatens, let gentiles coming to the faith, in whatever place or moment it occurs, whether in a river, the sea, or springs, be baptized, provided that they are made illustrious by the confession of Christian belief. They themselves must also attend with the greatest care to what they promised in baptism, lest they be found not unbelieving but faithful. But those who are sprinkled with the mark of unbelief are made infamous and are by no means reckoned among the faithful.

§ 2. These statutes ought not to be torn away by any dishonesty or changed by any novelty, because the rationale of secular causes is one thing, that of divine causes another.

C. XXII. Non nisi dominico sanctum pasca celebretur.

Item Victor Papa XIII. a Petro, in primo decretali suo. Celebritatem sancti Pascae die dominica agi debere, et predecessores nostri iam statuerunt, et nos illud eadem die solempniter celebrare mandamus, quia non decet, ut membra a capite discrepent, aut aliter gerant. A XIV. uero luna primi mensis usque ad XXI. diem eiusdem mensis eadem celebretur festiuitas. §. 1. Eodem quoque tempore baptisma celebrandum est catholicum. Sed tamen, si necesse fuerit, aut mortis periculum ingruerit, gentiles ad fidem uenientes quocumque loco uel momento, ubicumque euenerit, siue in flumine, siue in mari, siue in fontibus, tantum Christianae credulitatis confessione clarificati baptizentur. Ipsis etiam quod in baptismo polliciti sunt summopere attendendum est, ne non infideles, sed fideles inueniantur. Ipsi uero, qui infidelitatis nota asperguntur, infames efficiuntur, atque inter fideles minime reputantur. §. 2. Hec uero statuta nulla debent inprobitate conuelli, nulla nouitate mutari, quia alia ratio est causarum secularium, alia diuinarum.

C. XXIII. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 65]. The solemnity of Easter is to be celebrated on one day and at one time.

C. XXIII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 65.] Pascae solempnitas uno die et tempore celebranda est.

C. XXIV. The days of Easter and of the council shall be made known to all by the endorsement of letters of form.

Likewise from the Fifth Council of Carthage, [c. 7]. It was resolved that the day of venerable Easter be made known to all by the endorsement of letters of form, but that the day of the council be observed on the eleventh day before the Kalends of November. It is also to be written to the primates of each of the provinces that, when they assemble councils among themselves, they not impede this day.

C. XXIV. Dies Pascae, et concilii, formatarum subscriptione omnibus intimetur.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi V. [c. 7.] Placuit, ut dies uenerabilis Pascae formatarum subscriptione omnibus intimetur; dies uero concilii XI. Kal. Nouembris seruetur. Scribendum est etiam ad singularum quarumque prouinciarum primates, ut, quando apud se concilia congregant, istum diem non inpediant.

C. XXV. When all things have been established in council, the coming Easter shall be announced.

Likewise from the Second Council of Braga, [c. 9]. It was resolved that, after all things have been ordered in the council of priests, this is to be observed in every way: that the metropolitan bishop make known on what day of the Kalends or at what moon Easter of that approaching year is to be observed. The other bishops or remaining clergy, noting this in a brief writing, shall each announce it to the people in his own church after the Gospel reading on the approaching day of the Nativity of the Lord.

C. XXV. Cum in concilio omnia statuta fuerint, uenturum Pasca annuncietur.

Item ex Concilio Bracarensi II. [c. 9.] Placuit, ut post, quam omnia in concilio sacerdotum fuerint ordinata, illud omnimodis obseruetur, ut superuenturum ipsius anni Pasca quo Kalendarum die uel quota luna debeat suscipi, a metropolitano episcopo intimetur. Quod ceteri episcopi uel clerus reliquus breuiculo subnotantes, unusquisque in sua ecclesia adueniente Natalis Domini die post euangelicam lectionem populo annuncient.

C. XXVI. Easter shall be celebrated on one day and at the same time throughout the whole world.

Likewise from the First Council of Arles, which Pope Sylvester confirmed, [c. 1]. Concerning the observance of the Lord's Easter, we establish that it be observed on one day and at one time throughout the whole world, and that letters be directed to all according to custom.

> C. XXVI. Per orbem uniuersum uno die, et eodem tempore Pasca celebretur.
> Item ex Concilio Arelatensi I., quod confirmauit Papa Siluester. [c. 1.] De obseruatione Pascae Dominicae statuimus, ut uno die et tempore per omnem orbem obseruetur, et iuxta consuetudinem litterae ad omnes dirigantur.

C. XXVII. Concerning images of saints that are not to be violated.

Likewise Gregory to Serenus, Bishop of Marseille, [book IX, letter 9]. PART XII. It had been reported to us that, inflamed by inconsiderate zeal, you broke images of saints under this supposed excuse: that they ought not to be adored. And indeed, because you had forbidden them to be adored, we praised you altogether; but we reproved you for having broken them. Tell me, brother: from what priest was it ever heard that he did what you did? For it is one thing to adore a picture, another to learn through the history in a picture what is to be adored. For what Scripture furnishes to those who read, a picture furnishes to the unlearned who behold, because in it the ignorant see what they ought to follow; in it those who do not know letters read. Hence a picture is especially in place of reading for the gentiles.

> C. XXVII. De imaginibus sanctorum non uiolandis.
> Item Gregorius Sereno, Episcopo Massiliensi. [lib. IX. epist 9.] XII. Pars. Perlatum ad nos fuerat, quod inconsiderato zelo succensus sanctorum imagines sub hac quasi excusatione, ne adorari debuissent, confregeris. Et quidem, quia eas adorari uetuisses, omnino laudauimus, fregisse uero reprehendimus. Dic, frater, a quo factum sacerdote aliquando auditum quod fecisti? Aliud enim est picturam adorare: aliud per picturae historiam quid sit adorandum addiscere. Nam quod legentibus scriptura, hoc idiotis prestat pictura cernentibus, quia in ipsa ignorantes uident quod sequi debeant, in ipsa legunt qui litteras nesciunt. Unde et precipue gentibus pro lectione pictura est.

C. XXVIII. Images of saints are a memory and recollection of past things.

Likewise from the Seventh Synod, [action 6]. Christians do not call venerable images gods, nor serve them as gods, nor place hope of salvation in them, nor expect future judgment from them; but for the memory and recollection of the prototypes they venerate and adore them, yet do not serve them with divine worship, nor any creature.

> C. XXVIII. Imagines sanctorum memoria sunt et recordatio preteritorum.
> Item ex VII. Sinodo, [actione 6.] Venerabiles imagines Christiani non deos appellant, neque seruiunt eis, ut diis, neque spem salutis ponunt in eis, neque ab eis expectant futurum iudicium: sed ad memoriam et recordationem primitiuorum uenerantur eas et adorant, sed non seruiunt eis cultu diuino, nec alicui creaturae.

C. XXIX. Christ is to be depicted not in the appearance of a lamb, but in that of a human being.

Likewise Pope Hadrian to Patriarch Tarasius, [in action II of the same Seventh Synod]. PART XIII. I receive the holy Sixth Synod with all its canons, in which it is said: In certain depictions of holy images a lamb is portrayed as pointed out by the finger of the Forerunner; this was received as a figure of grace, showing us beforehand through the law of Moses the true Lamb, our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, bidding farewell to the ancient figures and shadows handed down to the holy Church for the prefiguration of the truth, we prefer grace and truth, and receive it as the fulfillment of the law. We therefore command that henceforth the true Lamb, our Lord Jesus Christ, be depicted also in images according to his human form, in place of the ancient lamb.

C. XXIX. Non in agni, sed in hominis specie Christus est figurandus.

Item Adrianus Papa Tharasio Patriarchae. [in actione II. eiusdem VII. Synodi] XIII. Pars. Sextam sanctam sinodum recipio cum omnibus canonibus suis, in quibus dicitur: In quibus scripturis sanctarum imaginum agnus precursoris digito ostensus depingitur, qui in figuram transit gratiae, uerum nobis per legem Moysi premonstrans agnum Iesum Christum Dominum nostrum. Antiquis ergo figuris et umbris, ad ueritatis prefigurationem ecclesiae sanctae traditis, uale dicentes, gratiam et ueritatem preferimus, et sicut plenitudinem legis recipimus. Verum igitur agnum Dominum nostrum Iesum Christum secundum imaginem humanam amodo etiam in imaginibus pro ueteri agno depingi iubemus.

C. XXX. The faith of the Trinity and Unity is to be preserved inviolate.

Likewise Augustine in book I On the Trinity, [c. 4]. All those whom I have been able to read, who before me wrote about the Trinity which is God—Catholic expositors of the divine books of the Old and New Testaments—have intended to teach this according to the Scriptures: that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, being of one and the same substance in inseparable equality, intimate the divine unity, and therefore are not three Gods but one God; although the Father begot the Son, and therefore the Son is not he who is the Father; and the Son was begotten by the Father, and therefore the Father is not he who is the Son; and the Holy Spirit is neither the Father nor the Son, but only the Spirit of the Father and the Son, himself also coequal with the Father and the Son and pertaining to the unity of the Trinity. Nevertheless, it was not this same Trinity that was born of the Virgin Mary, crucified and buried under Pontius Pilate, rose on the third day, and ascended into heaven, but the Son alone; nor was it this same Trinity that descended in the appearance of a dove upon Jesus when he was baptized, or, on the day of Pentecost after the Lord's ascension, when a sound was made from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind and divided tongues as of fire, but the Holy Spirit alone; nor was it this same Trinity that said from heaven, "You are my Son," whether when he was baptized by John or upon the mountain when the three disciples were with him, or when the voice sounded saying, "I have glorified it and will glorify it again," but it was the Father's voice alone that was made to the Son, although the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, just as they are inseparable, so also work inseparably.

C. XXX. De fide Trinitatis et Unitatis inuiolabiliter seruanda.

Item Augustinus in libro [I.] de Trinitate. [c. 4.] Omnes, quos legere potui, qui ante me scripserunt de Trinitate, que Deus est, diuinorum librorum ueterum et nouorum catholici tractatores, hoc intenderunt secundum scripturas docere, quod Pater, et Filius, et Spiritus sanctus unius eiusdemque substantiae inseparabili equalitate diuinam insinuant unitatem, ideoque non sint tres Dii, sed unus Deus, quamuis Pater Filium genuerit, et ideo Filius non sit qui Pater est, Filiusque a Patre sit genitus, et ideo Pater non sit qui Filius est, Spiritusque sanctus nec Pater sit, nec Filius, sed tantummodo Patris et Filii Spiritus, et Patri et Filio etiam ipse coequalis, et ad Trinitatis pertinens unitatem; non tamen eandem Trinitatem natam de Virgine Maria, et sub Pontio Pilato crucifixam et sepultam et tercia die resurrexisse, et in celum ascendisse, sed tantummodo Filium; nec eandem Trinitatem descendisse in specie columbae super Iesum baptizatum, aut die Pentecostes post ascensionem Domini sonitu facto de celo, quasi ferretur flatus uehemens, et linguis diuisis, uelut ignis, sed tantummodo Spiritum sanctum; nec eandem Trinitatem dixisse de celo: "Tu es filius meus," siue cum baptizatus est a Iohanne, siue in monte, quando cum illo erant tres discipuli, aut quando sonuit uox dicens: "Et clarificaui, et iterum clarificabo:" sed tantummodo Patris uocem fuisse factam ad Filium, quamuis Pater et Filius, et Spiritus sanctus, sicut inseparabiles sunt, ita inseparabiliter operentur.

Distinction IV

GRATIAN.

GRATIANUS.

C. I. No one is saved without the visible sacrament and invisible faith.

The same on John. PART I. The visible sacrament of water is necessary for the washing of the visible body, just as the teaching of invisible faith is necessary for the sanctification of the invisible soul. The same. § 1. A human being is reborn of water, the visible sacrament, and of spirit, namely invisible understanding, so that he may receive the symbol of baptism visibly and perceive the spiritual understanding of that symbol. Or: of visible water and the Holy Spirit.

C. I. Sine sacramento uisibili et fide inuisibili nemo saluatur.

Idem super Iohannem I. Pars. Necessarium est uisibile sacramentum aquae ad ablutionem uisibilis corporis, sicut necessaria est doctrina inuisibilis fidei ad sanctificationem inuisibilis animae. Idem: §. 1. Renascitur homo ex aqua, uisibili sacramento, et spiritu, inuisibili scilicet intellectu, ut simbolum baptismi uisibiliter accipiat, et spiritualem intellectum ipsius simboli percipiat. Vel ex aqua uisibili et Spiritu sancto.

C. II. In baptism concupiscence is extinguished, not so that it does not exist, but so that it does not harm.

The same in book I On the Baptism of Infants, [c. 39]. Through Christ's baptism this is accomplished: that the flesh of sin is emptied.

It is not, however, emptied in such a way that innate concupiscence does not exist in the flesh, but so that it does not harm. For if after baptism they reach the natural age, there they have something against which to struggle and which, with God's help, to overcome, if they have not received grace in vain. For not even to adults is this granted in baptism—except perhaps by a miracle of God—that the law of sin, resisting the law of the mind, is utterly extinguished and does not exist; rather, whatever was said, done, or thought by a human being while his mind served in subjection to this concupiscence is wholly abolished and regarded as though it had not been done.

C. II. In baptismate concupiscentia exstinguitur, non ut non sit, sed ut non obsit.

Idem in libro [I.] de baptismo paruulorum. [c. 39.] Per baptismum Christi id agitur, ut caro peccati euacuetur.

Non sic autem euacuatur, ut in carne concupiscentia innata non sit: sed ne obsit. Nam si post baptismum, ad etatem naturalem peruenerint, ibi habent cum qua pugnent eamque Deo adiuuante superent, si non gratiam in uacuum susceperint. Nam nec adultis id prestatur in baptismo, nisi forte miraculo Dei, ut lex peccati, repugnans legi mentis penitus exstinguatur, et non sit: sed, ut quicquid ab homine dictum, factum, cogitatum est, cum eidem concupiscentiae subiecta mente seruiret, totum aboleatur, et quasi factum non sit habeatur.

C. III. One who is conceived from a man and a woman is born with original sin and is not saved without baptism.

The same to Peter the Deacon, [c. 26]. Hold most firmly and in no way doubt that every human being who is conceived through intercourse between a man and a woman is born with original sin, subjected to impiety and subject to death, and on this account is born naturally a child of wrath, concerning which the Apostle says: "For we were by nature children of wrath, like the rest." From this wrath no one is freed except through faith in the mediator, the man Jesus Christ. § 1. Hold most firmly that not only human beings who use reason, but also little children—whether they begin to live in their mothers' wombs and die there, or, already born from their mothers, pass from this world without the sacrament of baptism, which is given in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit—are to be punished with eternal fire; because, although they have no sin of their own action, they have nevertheless drawn the condemnation of original sin from birth through carnal conception.

C. III. Qui ex uiro et muliere concipitur, cum originali peccato nascitur, nec sine baptismate saluatur.

Idem ad Petrum Diaconum, [c. 26.] Firmissime tene, et nullatenus dubites, omnem hominem, qui per concubitum uiri et mulieris concipitur, cum originali peccato nasci, inpietati subditum, mortique subiectum, et ob hoc naturaliter nasci irae filium, de qua dicit Apostolus: "Eramus enim natura filii irae, sicut et ceteri." A qua ira nullus liberatur, nisi per fidem mediatoris hominis Iesu Christi. §. 1. Firmissime tene, non solum homines ratione utentes, uerum etiam paruulos, qui siue in uteris matrum uiuere incipiunt, et ibi moriuntur, siue iam de matribus nati sine baptismatis sacramento, quod datur in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti, de hoc seculo transeunt, sempiterno igne puniendos; quia, etsi peccatum propriae actionis nullum habent, originalis tamen peccati dampnationem carnali conceptione ex natiuitate traxerunt.

C. IV. On the same matter.

Likewise John Chrysostom. No one can receive the grace of heavenly life unless he has been cleansed from every stain of sin through the confession of penance, through the gift of the saving baptism of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who is blessed for ages of ages.

C. IV. De eodem.

Item Iohannes Crisostomus. Non potest quis gratiam uitae celestis accipere, nisi purgatus fuerit ab omni sorde peccati per penitenciae confessionem, per donum baptismi salutaris Domini et saluatoris nostri Iesu Christi, qui est benedictus in secula seculorum.

C. V. Just as sins are now remitted in baptism, so formerly they were remitted in circumcision.

Likewise Gregory in the Moralia, [book IV, c. 2]. What the water of baptism effects among us, among the ancients either faith alone effected for little children, or the power of sacrifice for adults, or, for those who came forth from the stock of Abraham, the mystery of circumcision.

> C. V. Sicut nunc in baptismate, ita olim in circumcisione remittebantur peccata.
> Item Gregorius in Moralibus. [lib. IV. c. 2.] Quod apud nos ualet aqua baptismatis, hoc egit apud ueteres uel pro paruulis sola fides, uel pro maioribus uirtus sacrificii, uel pro his, qui de stirpe Abrahae prodierunt, misterium circumcisionis.

C. VI. Original sin is now remitted in baptism; formerly it was remitted in circumcision.

Likewise Augustine to Valerius, Against Julian, [book II, c. 11]. From the time circumcision was instituted among the people of God—which was then the seal of the faith of God's righteousness—it availed little children for the sanctification of cleansing from original and ancient sin, just as baptism also began to avail for the renewal of the human being from the time it was instituted.

> C. VI. Originale peccatum nunc in baptismate, olim in circumcisione remittebatur.
> Item Augustinus ad Valerium contra Iulianum. [lib. II. c. 11] Ex quo instituta est circumcisio in populo Dei (quod erat tunc signaculum fidei iusticiae Dei) ad sanctificationem purgationis ualebat paruulis originalis ueterisque peccati, sicut etiam baptismus ex illo ualere cepit ad innouationem hominis, ex quo constitutus est.

C. VII. The faith of those presenting them profits little children.

The same in book III On Free Choice, [c. 23]. Human beings are accustomed to investigate what benefit the sacrament of Christ's baptism affords little children, since after receiving it they often die before they have been able to know anything of themselves. In this matter it is believed with sufficient piety and correctness that the faith of those by whom the little child is presented for consecration profits him. And the authority of the Church commends this, so that from it each person may perceive how his own faith profits him, when it is beneficial also for the benefit of others who do not yet have power of their own.

> C. VII. Paruulis in fide offerentium prodest fides.
> Idem de libero arbitrio, libro III. [c. 23.] Illud perscrutari homines solent, sacramentum baptismi Christi quid prosit paruulis, cum eo accepto plerumque moriuntur prius, quam ex se quicquam potuerint cognoscere. Qua in re satis pie recteque creditur prodesse paruulo fides eorum, a quibus consecrandus offertur. Et hoc ecclesiae conmendat auctoritas, ut ex eo quisque sentiat quid sibi prosit fides sua, quando in aliorum quoque beneficio, qui propriam nondum habent potestatem, conmoda sit.

C. VIII. Through faith and baptism we are justified from sins.

The same On the Baptism of Infants, [book I, cc. 32 and 33]. The Son of God assumed the flesh of sin and punishment without fault, so that in the flesh of sin both fault and punishment might be dissolved. Therefore, through faith in him and through his baptism, a human being is freed from sin through justification and from death through resurrection. § 1. Even baptized little children are counted among believers through the power of the sacrament and the response of those presenting them. But those who have not been baptized are judged among unbelievers from the Gospel of John: "Unless someone is reborn of water and the Holy Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

C. VIII. Per fidem et baptisma iustificamur a peccatis.

Idem de baptismo paruulorum. [lib. I. c. 32. et 33.] Filius Dei carnem peccati suscepit, et penam sine culpa, ut in carne peccati et culpa solueretur et pena. Per fidem ergo et baptismum eius homo a peccato per iustificationem, et a morte liberatur per resurrectionem. §. 1. Paruuli etiam baptizati inter credentes reputantur per sacramenti uirtutem, et offerentium responsionem. Qui uero non sunt baptizati, inter non credentes iudicantur ex euangelio Iohannis: "Nisi quis renatus fuerit ex aqua et Spiritu sancto, non potest introire in regnum Dei."

C. IX. Through the water of baptism an earthly human being becomes heavenly.

Likewise Ambrose in book I On the Sacraments, [cc. 4 and 5]. Through the water of baptism there is a passage from earthly things to heavenly things. Therefore Pascha is called a passage; this passage is from sin to life, from fault to grace, from defilement to sanctification. He who passes through this water does not die but rises again. § 1. Not every water heals, but that which has the grace of Christ. The element is one thing, the consecration another. Water does not heal unless the Holy Spirit descends and consecrates that water, as it is read that, when Christ was giving the form of baptism, he came to John, and John said to him: "I ought to be baptized by you, and you come to me?" Jesus answered: "Thus it befits us to fulfill all righteousness." See what all righteousness is. Christ descended to baptism not so that the flesh which he assumed from our condition might be cleansed. For a washing away of sin was not necessary for Christ, who committed no sin; but it was necessary for us, who were liable to sin. § 2. Christ descended; the Holy Spirit also descended. But why did Christ descend first and the Holy Spirit afterward, when the form and use of baptism have it that the font is first consecrated and then the one to be baptized descends? § 3. Christ, however, descended first, and the Holy Spirit followed, so that he might never seem himself to need the mystery of sanctification, but so that he himself might sanctify and the Holy Spirit also might sanctify.

C. IX. Per aquam baptismi de terreno fit homo celestis.

Item Ambrosius in libro [I.] de sacramentis. [c. 4. et 5.] Per aquam baptismi transitus est de terrenis ad celestia. Ideo Pasca, transitus dicitur, hic transitus est de peccato ad uitam, de culpa ad gratiam, de inquinamento ad sanctificationem. Qui per hanc aquam transit, non moritur, sed resurgit. §. 1. Non omnis aqua sanat, sed illa, que habet gratiam Christi. Aliud est elementum, aliud est consecratio. Non sanat aqua, nisi Spiritus sanctus descendat, et consecret aquam illam, sicut legitur, quia, cum Christus formam baptismatis daret, uenit ad Iohannem, et ait illi Iohannes: "Ego a te debeo baptizari, et tu uenis ad me? respondit Iesus: Sic decet nos inplere omnem iusticiam." Vide, que omnis iusticia sit. Christus ad baptismum descendit non ut caro mundaretur, quam suscepit de nostra condicione. Non enim ablutio peccati Christo necessaria fuit, qui peccatum non fecit; sed nobis erat necessaria, qui peccato eramus obnoxii. §. 2. Descendit Christus: descendit et Spiritus sanctus. Quare autem prior descendit Christus, postea Spiritus sanctus, cum forma et usus baptismi hoc habeat, ut ante fons consecretur, et tunc descendat baptizandus? §. 3. Christus autem ante descendit, secutus est Spiritus sanctus? ut numquam ipse egere sanctificationis misterio uideretur, sed ut sanctificaret ipse, sanctificaret et Spiritus sanctus.

C. X. The water of baptism would not cleanse sins unless it had been sanctified by the touch of the Lord's body.

Likewise John Chrysostom. The waters of baptism could never cleanse the sins of believers unless they had been sanctified by the touch of the Lord's body.

> C. X. Aqua baptismi non purgaret peccata, nisi tactu dominici corporis esset sanctificata.
> Item Iohannes Crisostomus. Numquam aquae baptismi purgare peccata credentium possent nisi tactu dominici corporis sanctificatae fuissent.

C. XI. General baptism is to be celebrated only on the holy Sabbath of Easter and Pentecost.

Likewise Pope Siricius to Himerius of Tarragona, [letter I]. PART II. It is presumed upon not by reason of any authority but by temerity alone that innumerable peoples are baptized indiscriminately and freely on the Nativity of Christ, or Epiphany, and also on the feasts of the Apostles or martyrs, although the Lord's Easter, together with its Pentecost, specially vindicates this privilege for itself among us and among all the churches.

> C. XI. Generale baptisma non nisi sabbato sancto Pascae et Pentecostes celebretur.
> Item Siricius Papa Ymerio Terraconensi, [epist. I.] II. Pars. Non ratione auctoritatis alicuius, sed sola temeritate presumitur, ut passim et libere in natiuitate Christi, seu Apparitione, nec non Apostolorum seu martirum festiuitatibus, innumerae plebes baptizentur, cum sibi hoc priuilegium apud nos, et apud omnes ecclesias dominicum specialiter Pasca defendat cum suo Pentecosten.

C. XII. On the same matter.

Likewise Pope Leo to all the bishops established throughout Sicily, [letter IV, c. 5]. Two times, namely Easter and Pentecost, have been fixed by the Roman Pontiff as lawful for baptizing. Hence, because it is most manifest that these two times of which we have spoken are lawful for those chosen to be baptized in the Church, we admonish your Charity not to mingle any other days with this observance.

> C. XII. De eodem.
>
> Item Leo Papa uniuersis Episcopis per Siciliam constitutis. [epist. IV. c. 5.] Duo tempora, id est Pasca et Pentecosten, ad baptizandum a Romano Pontifice legitima sunt prefixa. Unde, quia manifestissime patet, baptizandis in ecclesia electis hec duo tempora, de quibus locuti sumus, esse legitima, dilectionem uestram monemus, ut nullos alios dies huic obseruantiae misceatis.

C. XIII. Why baptism is celebrated at the aforesaid times.

The same, [in the same letter, c. 3]. Precisely in the death of the crucified one and in his resurrection from the dead, the power of baptism founded a new creature from the old, so that both the death and life of Christ might work in those being reborn, as the Apostle says: "Or do you not know that all of us who have been baptized in Christ Jesus have been baptized in his death? For we were buried with him through baptism into death, so that, just as Christ rose from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also may walk in newness of life. For if we have been made planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be so also in the resurrection," and the rest, which the teacher of the gentiles discussed more fully to commend the sacrament of baptism. Thus it would appear that, from the spirit of this teaching, for the sons of human beings who are to be regenerated and adopted as sons of God, that day and time was chosen on which, through the likeness and form of the mystery, the things done in the members accord with those accomplished in the head himself: while, in the rule of baptism, both death intervenes through the slaying of sin, and triple immersion imitates the three-day burial, and the raising from the waters is a likeness of one rising from the tomb. Therefore, the very character of the work teaches that the lawful day for the general celebration of grace is that on which both the power of the gift and the form of the action arose. § 1. For confirmation of this matter, it is of very great force that the Lord Jesus Christ himself, after he rose from the dead, delivered to his disciples—in whom all the prelates of the churches were being taught—both the form and the power of baptizing, saying: "Going, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." He could certainly have instructed them about this even before the Passion, had he not wished it to be understood particularly that the grace of regeneration began from his resurrection. § 2. Added to this observance also is the sacred solemnity of Pentecost from the coming of the Holy Spirit, which depends upon the turning point of the Paschal feast; and while other feasts pertain to other days, this one always falls upon the day distinguished by the Lord's resurrection. It extends, as it were, the hand of assisting grace and invites those whom either the distress of sickness, the length of a journey, or the difficulty of navigation excluded from Easter day, so that, impeded by whatever necessities, they may obtain the effect of their desire by the gift of the Holy Spirit. § 3. That we defend this not from our own persuasion but preserve it from apostolic authority, we prove by a sufficiently fitting example, following blessed Peter the Apostle, who, on the very day when the coming of the promised Holy Spirit filled the whole number of believers, consecrated in the washing of baptism a people of three thousand converted by his preaching. Holy Scripture, which contains the Acts of the Apostles, teaches this in a faithful history, saying: "When they had heard these things, they were pierced in heart and said to Peter and the remaining Apostles: What shall we do, men and brothers? But Peter said to them: Do penance, and let each one of you be baptized in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ for the remission of your sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit."

C. XIII. Quare in predictis temporibus baptisma celebretur.

Idem. [in eadem epistola c. 3.] Proprie in morte crucifixi, et in resurrectione ex mortuis potencia baptismi nouam creaturam condidit ex uetere, ut in renascentibus et mors Christi operetur, et uita, dicente apostolo: "An ignoratis, quia, quicumque baptizati sumus in Christo Iesu, in morte ipsius baptizati sumus? consepulti enim sumus cum illo per baptismum in morte, ut quomodo Christus surrexit a mortuis per gloriam patris, ita et nos in nouitate uitae ambulemus. Si enim conplantati facti sumus similitudini mortis eius, simul et resurrectionis erimus," et cetera, que latius magister gentium ad conmendandum sacramentum baptismatis disputauit, ut appareret, ex huius doctrinae spiritu regenerandis filiis hominum, et in Dei filios adoptandis illum diem et illud tempus electum, in quo per similitudinem formamque misterii ea, que geruntur in membris, his, que in ipso sunt capite gesta, congruere, dum in baptismatis regula et mors interuenit interfectione peccati, et sepulturam imitatur triduanam trina dimersio, et ab aquis eleuatio resurgentis instar est de sepulchro. Ipsa igitur qualitas operis docet, celebrandae generaliter gratiae diem legitimum eum esse, in quo orta est et uirtus muneris, et species actionis. §. 1. Ad cuius rei confirmationem plurimum ualet quod ipse Dominus Iesus Christus postquam resurrexit a mortuis, discipulis suis (in quibus omnes ecclesiarum presules docebantur) et formam et potestatem tradidit baptizandi, dicens: "Euntes docete omnes gentes, baptizantes eos in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti." De quo utique eos etiam ante passionem potuisset instruere, nisi proprie uoluisset intelligi, regenerationis gratiam ex sua resurrectione cepisse.

§. 2. Additur sane huic obseruantiae etiam Pentecostes ex aduentu Spiritus sancti sacra solempnitas, que de pascalis festi pendet articulo, et, cum ad alios dies alia festa pertineant, hec semper ad eum diem, qui resurrectione Domini est insignis, occurrit, porrigens quodammodo auxiliantis gratiae manum, et eos, quos a die Pascae aut molestia infirmitatis, aut longinquitas itineris, aut nauigationis difficultas interclusit, inuitat, ut quibuslibet necessitatibus inpediti desiderii sui effectum dono Spiritus sancti consequantur. §. 3. Hoc autem nos non ex nostra persuasione defendere, sed ex apostolica auctoritate seruare, satis idoneo probamus exemplo, sequentes B. Petrum apostolum, qui in ipso die, quo omnem credentium numerum promissus Spiritus sancti repleuit aduentus, trium milium populum sua predicatione conuersum lauacro baptismatis consecrauit. Quod sancta scriptura, que Apostolorum actus continet, fideli historia docet, dicens: "His auditis conpuncti sunt corde, et dixerunt ad Petrum et ad reliquos Apostolos: Quid faciemus uiri fratres? Petrus autem ad illos penitenciam, inquit, agite, et baptizetur unusquisque uestrum in nomine Domini nostri Iesu Christi in remissionem peccatorum uestrorum, et accipietis donum Spiritus sancti."

[C. XIV.]

Likewise. But if anyone thinks that the feast of Epiphany—which in its proper order is to be venerated with due honor—has the privilege of baptism because some think that on that day the Lord approached the baptism of Saint John, let him know that the grace of that baptism was one thing and its rationale another, and that it did not pertain to the same power by which those are reborn through the Holy Spirit of whom it is said: "Who were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of a man, but of God." For the Lord, needing no remission of sin and seeking no remedy of rebirth, willed to be baptized just as he also willed to be circumcised and an offering to be presented for cleansing, so that he who was made of a woman, as the Apostle says, might be made under the law, which he had come not to dissolve but to fulfill and, by fulfilling it, to bring it to an end, just as the Apostle proclaims, saying: "For Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness for everyone who believes." But he founded in himself the sacrament of his baptism, because, holding primacy in all things, he taught that he was the beginning, and he then sanctioned the power of regeneration when the blood of redemption and the water of baptism flowed from his side.

[C. XIV.]

Item. Si quis autem Epiphaniae festiuitatem (que in suo ordine debito honore ueneranda est) ob hoc estimat priuilegium habere baptismatis, quia hoc quidam putant, quod in eadem die Dominus ad baptismum sancti Iohannis accesserit, sciat illius baptismi aliam gratiam, aliam fuisse rationem, nec ad eandem pertinuisse uirtutem, qua per Spiritum sanctum renascuntur de quibus dicitur: "qui non ex sanguinibus, neque ex uoluntate carnis, neque ex uoluntate uiri, sed ex Deo nati sunt." Dominus enim nullius indigens remissione peccati, nec querens remedium renascendi, sic uoluit baptizari, quomodo et uoluit circumcidi, hostiamque pro emundatione offerri, ut qui factus erat ex muliere (sicut Apostolus ait) fieret sub lege, quam non uenerat soluere, sed inplere et inplendo finire, sicut Apostolus predicat, dicens: "Finis autem legis Christus ad iusticiam omni credenti." Baptismi autem sui in se condidit sacramentum, quia in omnibus primatum tenens se docuit esse principium, et tunc regenerationis potenciam sanxit, quando de latere ipsius profluxerunt sanguis redemptionis et aqua baptismatis.

C. XV. Catechumens are to be baptized on the solemnities of Easter and Pentecost.

Likewise from the Council of Girona, [c. 4]. Concerning the baptizing of catechumens, it was decreed that they are to come for baptism at the solemnity of Easter or Pentecost; on other solemnities only the sick ought to be baptized.

> C. XV. In solempnitate pascali et Pentecostes catecumini baptizentur.
>
> Item ex Concilio Gerundensi. [c. 4.] De catecuminis baptizandis id decretum est ut in Pascali festiuitate uel Pentecostes, ad baptizandum ueniant; ceteris solempnitatibus infirmi tantum debent baptizari.

C. XVI. When necessity compels, it is permitted to baptize at any time.

Likewise Pope Leo, [letter IV, c. 6]. Those who are pressed by the necessity of death, sickness, siege, persecution, or shipwreck ought to be baptized at every time.

> C. XVI. Necessitate cogente quolibet tempore baptizare licet.
> Item Leo Papa. [epist. IV. c. 6.] Hi qui necessitate mortis, egritudinis, obsidionis, persecutionis, et naufragii urgentur, omni tempore debent baptizari.

C. XVII. Unless necessity compels, no one is to presume to baptize outside Easter and Pentecost.

Likewise Gelasius to the clergy and people of Taranto. Let a bishop not presume to confer the venerable sacrament of baptism except on the feast of Easter and Pentecost, with the exception of those laboring under sickness, to whom, when danger of death presses, it is necessary to give aid by such remedies, lest they perish eternally.

> C. XVII. Nisi necessitate cogente preter Pasca et Pentecostem nullus baptizare presumat.
> Item Gelasius Clero et Plebi Tarentino. Venerabilis baptismi sacramentum nisi in festiuitate pascali et Pentecostes tradere non presumat episcopus; exceptis egritudine laborantibus, quibus urgente mortis periculo talibus oportet, ne in eternum pereant, remediis subueniri.

C. XVIII. On the same matter.

The same. Let no one who is to be baptized believe that he possesses any confidence at any time other than the Paschal feast and the venerable sacrament of Pentecost, except only when a most grave illness assails him, in which it is to be feared that, with the danger of disease increasing, the sick person, overtaken by death, may perhaps depart without the saving remedy.

> C. XVIII. De eodem.
> Idem. Baptizandi sibi quispiam quocumque tempore nullam credat inesse fiduciam, preter pascale festum, et Pentecostes uenerabile sacramentum, excepto dumtaxat grauissimi languoris incursu, in quo uerendum est ne morbi crescente periculo sine remedio salutari fortassis egrotans exitio preuentus abscedat.

C. XIX. No one except a priest is to presume to baptize.

Likewise Isidore, On Offices, book II, c. 24. It is established that baptism was entrusted to priests alone, and that it is not lawful even for deacons themselves to carry out its ministry without a bishop or presbyter, unless, when these are far absent, the final necessity of sickness compels. This is also often permitted to faithful laypersons. Likewise Gelasius. § 1. "Deacons also then," as above in the tract on those to be ordained, where the reverence of deacons toward priests is treated.

> C. XIX. Nemo nisi sacerdos baptizare presumat.

Item Ysidorus de offitiis, libro II. c. 24. Constat, baptisma solis sacerdotibus esse traditum eiusque ministerium nec ipsis diaconibus explere est licitum absque episcopo uel presbitero, nisi his procul absentibus ultima languoris cogat necessitas. Quod et laicis fidelibus plerumque permittitur. Item Gelasius: §. 1. Diaconos quoque tunc, ut supra in tractatu ordinandorum, ubi de reuerentia diaconorum erga sacerdotes agitur.

C. XX. A woman is not to presume to baptize.

Likewise from the Fifth Council of Carthage, [cc. 99 and 100]. PART III. A woman, although learned and holy, is not to presume to baptize anyone or to teach men in an assembly. Gratian. Unless necessity compels. Hence Urban II: "Concerning the matters about which he consulted, etc.," as above in the tract on marriage, where godparents are treated.

C. XX. Non presumat mulier baptizare.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi V. [c. 99. et 100.] III. Pars. Mulier, quamuis docta et sancta, baptizare aliquos uel uiros docere in conuentu, non presumat. Gratian. Nisi necessitate cogente. Unde Urbanus II.: "Super quibus consuluit etc.," ut supra in tractatu coniugii, ubi de conpatribus agitur.

C. XXI. Even laypersons can baptize when necessity compels.

Likewise Augustine to Fortunatus. In necessity, when bishops or presbyters or any of the ministers are not found, and danger presses the one who asks, lest he end this life without this sacrament, we are accustomed to hear that even laypersons ordinarily give the sacrament which they have received.

[PALEA.

C. XXI. Etiam laici necessitate cogente baptizare possunt.

Item Augustinus ad Fortunatum. In necessitate, cum episcopi, aut presbiteri, aut quilibet ministrorum non inueniuntur, et urget periculum eius, qui petit, ne sine isto sacramento hanc uitam finiant, etiam laicos solere dare sacramentum, quod acceperunt, solemus audire.

[PALEA.

C. XXII. On the same matter.

Likewise from Decree III of Pope Martin. Whatever presbyter, found in his own province or in another, or wherever he may be, refuses to baptize a sick person entrusted to him, whether because of his intention to journey or from some other excuse, and thus the sick person dies without baptism, is to be deposed.]

C. XXII. De eodem.

Item ex Decreto Martini Papae III. Quicumque presbiter in prouincia propria, uel in alia, uel ubicumque inuentus Fuerit, conmendatum sibi infirmum baptizare noluerit, uel pro intentione itineris, uel de alia aliqua excusatione, et sic sine baptismo moritur, deponatur.]

C. XXIII. Baptism administered by a pagan is not to be repeated.

Isidore. The Roman Pontiff does not judge the human being who baptizes, but that the Spirit of God supplies the grace of baptism, even if the one who baptizes is a pagan.

C. XXIII. Non reiteretur baptisma, quod a pagano ministratur.

Ysidorus. Romanus Pontifex non hominem iudicat, qui baptizat, sed spiritum Dei subministrare gratiam baptismi, licet paganus sit, qui baptizat.

C. XXIV. On the same matter.

Likewise Nicholas, in response to the inquiries of the Bulgarians, c. 4. You assert that many in your country were baptized by a certain Jew—you do not know whether he was a Christian or a pagan—and you ask what is to be done about it. Assuredly, if these were baptized in the name of the Holy Trinity, or only in Christ's name, as is read in the Acts of the Apostles—for it is one and the same thing, as Saint Ambrose explains—they ought not to be rebaptized, because it is not theirs but his.

C. XXIV. De eodem.

Item Nykolaus ad consulta Bulgarorum, c. 4. A quodam Iudeo, nescitis utrum Christiano, an pagano, multos in patria uestra baptizatos asseritis, et quid inde sit agendum consulitis. Hi profecto, si in nomine S. Trinitatis, uel tantum in Christi nomine, sicut in Actibus Apostolorum legitur, baptizati sunt (unum quippe idemque est, ut sanctus Ambrosius exponit) quia non illorum, sed eius est, rebaptizari non debent.

C. XXV. Baptism is administered equally through a bad minister as through a good one.

Likewise Augustine, Against Cresconius the Grammarian, [book III, c. 6]. If, among good ministers, although one is better than another, the baptism given through the better one is not better, in no way is that which is given even through a bad one bad, since the same baptism is given. And therefore God's equal gift is given through unequal ministers, because it is not theirs but his.

C. XXV. Sicut per bonum, ita per malum ministrum eque baptisma ministratur.

Item Augustinus contra Crescentium Grammaticum. [lib. III. c. 6.] Si inter bonos ministros, cum sit alius alio melior, non est melior baptismus, qui per meliorem datur, nullo modo malus est, qui etiam per malum datur, quando idem baptismus datur, et ideo per ministros dispares Dei munus equale est, quia non illorum, sed eius est.

C. XXVI. Not the merits of the ministers but the power of Christ works in baptism.

The same on John, part I, tractate V, [on c. 1]. Baptism is such as he is in whose power it is given, not such as he is through whose ministry it is given. Likewise. § 1. What did John the Baptist know? The Lord. What did he not know? That the power of the Lord's baptism would pass from the Lord to no human being, although its ministry would certainly pass: the power from the Lord to no one, but the ministry to good and bad persons. Let the dove not recoil from the ministry of the bad; let it look to the Lord's power. What does a bad minister do to you where the Lord is good? How does a malicious herald impede you where the judge is benevolent? Likewise. § 2. Neither he who plants is anything, nor he who waters, but God who gives the increase. Likewise. § 3. Therefore I say, and all of us say, that those through whom one is baptized ought to be righteous, because the ministers of so great a judge ought to be righteous, if they wish to minister righteously. But if those who sit in the chair of Moses are unwilling to be righteous, my Teacher has made me secure, of whom his Spirit says: "This is he who baptizes." Likewise. § 4. I do not fear an adulterer, a drunkard, or a murderer, because I look to the dove through which it is said to me: "This is he who baptizes."

C. XXVI. Non merita ministrorum, sed uirtus Christi in baptismate operatur.

Idem super Iohannem parte 1. tractatu V. [ad c. 1.] Baptismus talis est, qualis ille est, in cuius potestate datur, non qualis ille est, per cuius ministerium datur. Item: §. 1. Quid nouerat Iohannes Baptista? Dominum. Quid non nouerat? potestatem baptismi dominici in nullum hominem transituram a Domino, sed ministerium plane transiturum; potestatem a Domino in neminem sed ministerium in bonos et malos. Non exhorreat columba ministerium malorum; respiciat Domini potestatem. Quid tibi facit minister malus, ubi bonus est Dominus? Quid te inpedit maliciosus preco, ubi beniuolus est iudex? Item: §. 2. Neque qui plantat est aliquid, neque qui rigat, sed qui incrementum dat Deus. Item: §. 3. Ergo dico, et omnes nos dicimus, quia iustos oportet esse, per quos baptizatur, quia iustos oportet esse tanti iudicis ministros, si ministrare iuste uoluerint. Si autem noluerint esse iusti qui in cathedra Moysi sedent, securum me fecit magister meus, de quo spiritus eius dicit: "Hic est, qui baptizat." Item: §. 4. Non timeo adulterum, ebriosum, non homicidam, quia columbam attendo, per quam michi dicitur: "Hic est, qui baptizat."

C. XXVII. On the same matter.

The same in tractate VI, [on c. 1 of John]. When a bad person baptizes through either some ignorance or toleration of the Church—for either the bad are unknown, or the chaff is tolerated until the threshing floor is winnowed at the end—that which is given is one, neither unequal because of unequal ministers, but alike and equal because of: "This is he who baptizes."

C. XXVII. De eodem.

Idem in tractatu VI. [ad c. 1. Iohannis.] Cum baptizat malus ex aliqua uel ignorantia ecclesiae uel tollerantia (aut enim ignorantur mali, aut tolleratur palea, quousque in ultimo uentiletur area), illud, quod datum est, unum est, nec inpar propter inpares ministros, sed par et equale propter: "Hic est, qui baptizat."

C. XXVIII. Baptism conferred in the name of the Holy Trinity is not repeated.

The same, On Ecclesiastical Rules, [c. 52]. If any have been baptized among those heretics who baptize with confession of the Holy Trinity and come to the Catholic faith, let them indeed be received as baptized, lest the invocation or confession of the Holy Trinity be annulled. But let them be fully taught and instructed in what the mystery of the Holy Trinity is held to be in the Church; and if they consent to believe or agree to confess it, once cleansed by the integrity of faith, let them be confirmed by the imposition of a hand. But if they are little children or dull-witted persons who cannot grasp teaching, let those who present them answer on their behalf according to the custom of baptizing; and thus, through the imposition of a hand, having been given communion by chrism, let them be admitted to the mysteries of the Eucharist.

C. XXVIII. Non reiteratur baptisma, quod in nomine S. Trinitatis prestatur.

Idem de ecclesiasticis regulis. [c. 52.] Si qui apud illos hereticos baptizati sunt, qui S. Trinitatis confessione baptizant, et ueniunt ad catholicam fidem recipiantur quidem ut baptizati, ne S. Trinitatis inuocatio uel confessio annulletur: sed doceantur integre et instruantur, quod S. Trinitatis misterium in ecclesia teneatur, et, si consentiunt credere, uel acquiescunt confiteri, purgati fidei integritate firmentur manus inpositione. Si uero paruuli sunt et ebetes, qui doctrinam non capiant, respondeant pro illis qui eos offerunt iuxta morem baptizandi, et sic per manus inpositionem crismate conmunicati cum eucharistiae misteriis admittantur.

C. XXIX. On the same matter.

The same to Orosius, [in book LXV of Questions in Dialogue, question 59]. Although there is one baptism both of heretics—namely, those who baptize in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit—and of the Catholic Church, nevertheless those who are baptized outside the Church receive baptism not unto salvation but unto destruction, possessing indeed the form of the sacrament but denying its power. And therefore the Church does not rebaptize them, because they were baptized in the name of the Trinity. And this assuredly is the form of the sacrament. Therefore, when they have returned, let them receive the power of the Holy Spirit, which those baptized outside the Church do not yet possess.

> C. XXIX. De eodem.
> Idem ad Orosium. [in lib. LXV. Quaestionum dialog. quest. 59.] Quamuis unum baptisma sit, et hereticorum, eorum scilicet, qui in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti baptizant et ecclesiae catholicae: tamen qui foris ecclesiam baptizantur, non sumunt baptismum ad salutem, sed ad perniciem, habentes nimirum formam sacramenti, uirtutem autem eius abnegantes. Et ideo ecclesia eos non rebaptizat, quia in nomine Trinitatis baptizati sunt. Et ipsa est profecto forma sacramenti. Ideo, cum reuersi fuerint, accipiant uirtutem Spiritus sancti, quam, qui foris ecclesiam baptizantur, nondum habent.

C. XXX. Those who are proved to have been baptized only in the name of the Lord are baptized.

Likewise Pelagius to Bishop Gaudentius. If in truth those heretics who are said to dwell in places neighboring your Charity perhaps confess that they were baptized only in the name of the Lord, without the ambiguity of any doubt you shall baptize them, when they come to the Catholic faith, in the name of the Holy Trinity. But if it has become clear to your Charity from the manifest confession of those who wish to be converted that they were baptized in the name of the Trinity, you shall hasten to unite them to the Catholic faith by bestowing only the grace of reconciliation, so that, with such dispensation preserved, nothing other than what evangelical authority commands may seem to have been effected by a spirit of anyone's temerity.

> C. XXX. Baptizantur qui tantum in nomine Domini baptizati probantur.
> Item Pelagius Gaudentio Episcopo. Si reuera hi de hereticis, qui in locis dilectioni tuae uicinis conmorari dicuntur, solummodo se in nomine Domini baptizatos fuisse forsitan confitentur, sine cuiusquam dubitationis ambiguo eos ad catholicam fidem uenientes S. Trinitatis nomine baptizabis. Sin uero apud dilectionem tuam eorum, qui conuerti uolunt, manifesta confessione claruerit, quod in nomine Trinitatis fuerint baptizati, sola reconciliationis gratia inpensa catholicae fidei sociare maturabis, ut tali dispensatione seruata nichil aliter, quam quod euangelica iubet auctoritas, temeritatis cuiusquam spiritu uideatur effectum.

C. XXXI. Whether baptism conferred by one who has not been baptized is to be approved.

Likewise Augustine, On the One Baptism, book VIII, [c. 53]. PART IV. It is also customary to ask whether baptism received from one who has not received it is to be approved, if perhaps he learned from some curiosity how it is to be given; and whether it makes no difference with what intention the person to whom it is given receives it—with simulation or without simulation; and, if with simulation, whether as one deceiving, as in the Church or in that which is thought to be the Church, or as one jesting, as in a mime. § 1. Nevertheless, if someone perhaps pressed me, placed in a council where the question of such matters was being discussed, there being no preceding judgments whose opinions I would prefer to follow, to say what I myself thought, if I were affected in the same manner as I was when I dictated these things, I would in no way doubt that those possess baptism who, wherever and from whomever, received it consecrated with the evangelical words without simulation on their part and with some faith, although it would not profit them for spiritual salvation if they lacked charity, by which they are inserted into the Catholic Church. "For if I have faith so as to move mountains, but do not have charity, I am nothing." So, from the statutes of our predecessors, I do not doubt that those also possess baptism who, although they receive it deceitfully, nevertheless receive it in the Church or where those in whose society it is received believe the Church to be; concerning them it was said: "They went out from us." But where no society at all was believed to exist in such a way, and the whole thing was done playfully, mimically, and jestingly, I would judge that God's judgment as to whether baptism given in this way was to be approved ought to be implored by the oracle of some revelation, with concordant prayer and groaning—yet in such a way that I would humbly examine whether those who would state opinions after me brought forward anything already investigated and known.

C. XXXI. An approbetur baptisma, quod a non baptizato prestatur.

Item Augustinus de unico baptismo, libro VIII. [c. 53.] IV. Pars. Solet etiam queri, utrum approbandum sit baptisma, quod ab eo, qui non accepit, accipitur, si forte hoc aliqua curiositate didicit, quomodo dandum sit, et utrum nichil intersit, quo animo accipiat ille, cui datur, cum simulatione, an sine simulatione; si cum simulatione, utrum fallens, sicut in ecclesia, uel in ea, que putatur ecclesia, an iocans, sicut in mimo. §. 1. Verumtamen, si quis me forte in eo concilio constitutum, ubi talium rerum questio uersaretur non precedentibus, quorum sentencias sequi mallem, urgeret, ut dicerem quid ipse sentirem, si eo modo affectus essem, quo eram, dum ea dictarem, nequaquam dubitarem, habere baptismum eos, qui ubicumque et a quibuscumque illud uerbis euangelicis consecratum sine sua simulatione et cum aliqua fide accepissent, quamquam eis ad salutem spiritualem non prodesset, si karitate caruissent, qua catholicae inseruntur ecclesiae. "Si enim habeam fidem, ut montes transferam, karitatem autem non habeam, nichil sum;" sicut iam preteritis maiorum statutis non dubito, illos etiam habere baptismum quia quamuis fallaciter id accipiant, in ecclesia tamen accipiunt, uel ubi ab eis putatur esse ecclesia, in quorum societate id accipitur; de quibus dictum est: "Ex nobis exierunt." Ubi autem neque societas ulla esse ita crederetur, sed totum ludicre, et mimice, et ioculariter ageretur, utrum approbandus esset baptismus, qui sic daretur, diuinum iudicium per alicuius reuelationis oraculum, concordi oratione, gemitibus esse inplorandum censerem, ita sane, ut post me dicturos sentencias, si quid iam exploratum et cognitum afferrent, humiliter explorarem.

C. XXXII. Baptism conferred by heretics in the faith of the Holy Trinity is not repeated.

The same in book II. PART V. Those are shown to act impiously who try to rebaptize the unity of the world, and we to act rightly who do not dare to disapprove God's sacraments even in schism itself. For in that in which they agree with us, in that they also are with us. But they have withdrawn from us in that in which they disagree with us. Likewise. § 1. The sacrament of baptism is what the one who is baptized possesses, and the sacrament of giving baptism is what the one who is ordained possesses. For just as one baptized, if he withdraws from unity, does not lose the sacrament of baptism, so also one ordained, if he withdraws from unity, does not lose the sacrament of giving baptism. For injury is to be done to no sacrament. If he departs from the bad, both depart; if he remains among the bad, both remain. Therefore, just as the baptism which one who had withdrawn from unity could not lose is accepted, so the baptism given by one who did not lose the sacrament of giving when he withdrew is to be accepted. Likewise, [c. 12]. § 2. If one approaches baptism feignedly, have his sins been remitted to him or have they not been remitted? Let them choose what they wish; whichever they choose suffices for us. If they say that they have been remitted, how will the Spirit of discipline flee from the feigned person, if he has worked the remission of sins in him? If they say that they have not been remitted, I ask: if afterward, with his heart converted and with true sorrow, he confessed his feigning, would he be judged to require baptism anew? But if it is utterly mad to say this, let them acknowledge that a human being can be baptized with the true baptism of Christ and yet his heart, persevering in malice or sacrilege, not permit the abolition of sins to occur. And let them understand that people can be baptized in communions separated from the Church, where Christ's baptism is given and received with the same celebration of the sacrament, which nevertheless then profits for the remission of sins when someone, reconciled to unity, is stripped of the sacrilege of dissension by which his sins were held and not permitted to be remitted.

> C. XXXII. Non reiteratur baptisma, quod in fide sanctae Trinitatis ab hereticis prestatur.
> Idem in libro II. V. Pars. Ostenditur, illos inpie facere, qui rebaptizare conantur orbis unitatem, et nos recte facere, qui Dei sacramenta inprobare nec ipso scismate audemus. In quo enim nobiscum sentiunt, in eo etiam nobiscum sunt. In eo autem a nobis recesserunt, in quo a nobis dissentiunt. Item: §. 1. Sacramentum baptismi est, quod habet qui baptizatur, et sacramentum dandi baptismi est, quod habet qui ordinatur. Sicut enim baptizatus, si ab unitate recesserit, sacramentum baptismi non amittit: sic etiam ordinatus, si ab unitate recesserit, sacramentum dandi baptismi non amittit. Nulli enim sacramento iniuria facienda est. Si discedit a malis, utrumque discedit; si permanet in malis, utrumque permanet. Sicut ergo acceptatur baptismus, quem non potuit amittere qui ab unitate discesserat: sic acceptandus est baptismus, quem dedit ille, qui sacramentum dandi, cum discederet, non amiserat. Item: [c. 12.] §. 2. Si ad baptismum fictus accedit, dimissa sunt ei peccata, an non sunt dimissa? Eligant quod uolunt: utrumlibet elegerint, sufficit nobis. Si dimissa dixerint, quomodo Spiritus disciplinae effugiet fictum, si in isto remissionem operatus est peccatorum? Si dixerint non esse dimissa, quero, si postea fictionem suam corde conuerso et uero dolore fateretur, denuo baptizandus iudicaretur? Quod si dementissimum est dicere, fateantur, uero baptismo Christi baptizari posse hominem, et tamen cor eius in malicia uel sacrilegio perseuerans peccatorum abolitionem non sinere fieri, atque intelligant, in conmunicationibus ab ecclesia separatis posse homines baptizari, ubi Christi baptismus eadem celebratione sacramenti datur et sumitur, qui tamen tunc prosit ad remissionem peccatorum, cum, quis reconciliatus unitati sacrilegio dissensionis exuitur, quo eius peccata tenebantur, et dimitti non sinebantur.

C. XXXIII. Baptism avails unto salvation even if little children are not presented with that faith.

The same in letter XXIII to Boniface. PART VI. Do not let this disturb you: that certain persons bring little children to receive baptism, not with the faith that they may be regenerated by spiritual grace unto eternal life, but because they think that by this remedy they may retain or recover temporal health. For the children are not on that account not regenerated, because they are not presented by these persons with this intention.

C. XXXIII. Valet ad salutem baptisma, etsi non ea fide paruuli offeruntur.

Idem in epistola [XXIII.] ad Bonifatium. VI. Pars. Non illud te moueat, quod quidam non ea fide ad baptismum percipiendum paruulos ferunt, ut gratia spiritali ad uitam regenerentur eternam: sed hoc eos putant remedio temporalem retinere uel recipere sanitatem. Non enim propterea non regenerantur, quia non ab istis hac intentione offeruntur.

C. XXXIV. The shedding of blood fulfills the place of baptism.

Likewise, On the One Baptism, book IV, [c. 22]. PART VII. Blessed Cyprian takes from that thief to whom, though not baptized, it was said, "Today you shall be with me in paradise," no slight proof that suffering sometimes fulfills the place of baptism. Considering this again and again, I find that not only suffering for Christ's name can supply what was lacking from baptism, but also faith and conversion of heart, if perhaps in the constraints of time aid cannot be given for celebrating the mystery of baptism. For that thief was not crucified for Christ's name, but for the deserts of his crimes; nor did he suffer because he believed, but while he suffered he believed. Therefore, how greatly even without the visible sacrament of baptism that which the Apostle says avails—"With the heart belief is made unto righteousness, but with the mouth confession is made unto salvation"—was declared in that thief. But this is fulfilled invisibly when not contempt for religion but an exigency of necessity excludes the ministry of baptism. [c. 24]. § 1. And just as in that thief the omnipotent one's kindness completed what was lacking from the sacrament of baptism, because it was lacking not through pride or contempt but through necessity, so the same grace of the omnipotent one must be believed to supply in infants who die baptized what, not from an impious will but from the want of age, they are able neither to believe with the heart unto righteousness nor to confess with the mouth unto salvation. Therefore, when prayer is made for them so that the celebration of the sacrament may be fulfilled toward them, it assuredly avails for their consecration, because they cannot answer for themselves. § 2. For it is another's work when one believes through another, just as it was another's work when one sinned in another. Likewise, [in the same book IV Against the Donatists, c. 23]. § 3. But just as in the thief, because through necessity baptism was bodily absent, salvation was perfect because through piety it was spiritually present, so also, when piety itself is present, if through necessity that which was absent from the thief is absent, salvation is perfected. The universality of the Church holds this as handed down when infant children are baptized, who certainly cannot yet believe with the heart unto righteousness and confess with the mouth unto salvation, which the thief could; indeed, by weeping and wailing while the mystery is celebrated for them, they themselves make a din against the mystical voices, yet no Christian would say that they are baptized in vain. Likewise, [c. 25]. § 4. By all these things it is shown that the sacrament of baptism is one thing and conversion of heart another, but that a human being's salvation is completed from both. Nor, if one of them is lacking, ought we therefore to think it follows that the other is also lacking, because the former can exist without the latter, as in an infant, and the latter could exist without the former, as in the thief, God completing, whether in the one or in the other, what had been lacking not by will. But when one of these has been lacking by will, a human being is enveloped in guilt. And baptism indeed can be present where conversion of heart has been lacking. Conversion of heart, however, can indeed be present when baptism has not been received, but cannot be present when baptism has been contemned. Nor is it in any way to be called conversion of the heart to God when God's sacrament is contemned.

C. XXXIV. Effusio sanguinis inplet uicem baptismi.

Item de unico baptismo, libro IV. [c. 22] VII. Pars. Baptismi uicem aliquando inplere passionem, de latrone illo, cui non baptizato dictum est: "Hodie mecum eris in paradyso," B. Ciprianus non leue documentum assumit. Quod etiam atque etiam considerans, inuenio, non tantum passionem pro nomine Christi id, quod baptismo deerat, posse supplere, sed etiam fidem conuersionemque cordis, si forte ad celebrandum misterium baptismi in angustiis temporum succurri non potest. Neque enim latro ille pro nomine Christi crucifixus est, sed pro meritis facinorum suorum, neque quia credidit, passus est, sed, dum patitur, credidit. Quantum itaque ualeat etiam sine uisibili baptismi sacramento quod ait Apostolus: "Corde creditur ad iusticiam, ore autem confessio fit ad salutem," in illo latrone declaratum est. Sed tunc inpletur inuisibiliter, cum ministerium baptismi non contemptus religionis, sed articulus necessitatis excludit. [c. 24.] §. 1. Et sicut in illo latrone quod de baptismi sacramento defuerat conpleuit omnipotentis benignitas, quia non superbia, non contemptu, sed necessitate defuerat, sic infantibus qui baptizati moriuntur, eadem gratia omnipotentis explere credenda est, quod non ex inpia uoluntate, sed ex etatis indigentia, nec corde credere ad iusticiam possunt nec ore confiteri ad salutem. Ideo cum pro eis oratur, ut inpleatur erga eos celebratio sacramenti, ualet utique ad eorum celebrationem, quia ipsi respondere non possunt. §. 2. Alienum quippe opus est, cum credit per alterum, sicut alienum opus fuit, cum peccauit in alterum. Item: [eodem lib. 4. contra Donatistas, c. 23.] §. 3. Sicut autem in latrone, quia per necessitatem corporaliter baptismus defuit, perfecta salus est, quia per pietatem spiritaliter affuit: sic, et cum ipsa presto est, si per necessitatem desit quod latroni defuit, perficitur salus. Quod traditum tenet uniuersitas ecclesiae, cum paruuli infantes baptizantur, qui certe nondum possunt credere ad iusticiam, et ore confiteri ad salutem, quod latro potuit, quin etiam flendo et uagiendo, cum eis misterium celebratur, ipsi misticis uocibus obstrepunt, et nullus Christianorum dixerit, eos inaniter baptizari. Item: [c. 25.] §. 4. Quibus rebus omnibus ostenditur, aliud esse sacramentum baptismi, aliud conuersionem cordis: sed salutem hominis ex utroque conpleri. Nec si unum eorum defuerit, ideo putare debemus consequens esse, ut et alterum desit, quia et illud sine isto potest esse ut in infante, et istud sine illo potuit esse in latrone, conplente Deo, siue in illo siue in isto, quod non uoluntate defuisset; cum uero ex uoluntate alterum horum defuerit, reatu hominem inuolui. Et baptismus quidem potest inesse, ubi conuersio cordis defuerit. Conuersio autem cordis potest quidem inesse non percepto baptismo; sed contempto baptismo non potest. Neque ullo modo dicenda est conuersio cordis ad Deum, cum Dei sacramentum contempnitur.

C. XXXV. Not everything in a human being is baptized when he is baptized.

The same, Against Julian, [book VI, c. 6]. If whatever is in a human being when he is baptized and sanctified is to be believed to be baptized and sanctified, you are going to say that those very things in him which are digested in the intestines and bladder through bodily digestions are baptized and sanctified. You are going to say that a human being situated in his mother's womb is baptized and sanctified if necessity compels a pregnant woman to receive this sacrament, and therefore that one who is afterward born ought not now to be baptized. Finally, you are going to say that fevers are baptized and sanctified when the sick are baptized.

C. XXXV. Non baptizatur in homine, quicquid in eo est.

Idem contra Iulianum. [lib. VI. c. 6.] Si quicquid in homine est, quando baptizatur et sanctificatur, baptizari et sanctificari credendum est, dicturus es, et ipsa in illo baptizari et sanctificari, que in intestinis et uesica per digestiones corporis digeruntur; dicturus es, baptizari et sanctificari hominem in matris utero constitutum, si ad hoc sacramentum accipiendum necessitas cogat grauidam, et ideo baptizari iam qui nascitur non debere; postremo dicturus es, baptizari febres et sanctificari, quando baptizantur egroti.

C. XXXVI. Baptism is valid even if it is ministered by laypersons.

The same to Fortunatus. Baptism is holy in itself, which is given in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, so that in the same sacrament there is also the authority of its transmission through our Lord to the Apostles, and through them to bishops and other priests, and even to lay Christians coming from the same origin and stock. § 1. For when that story is told, all who hear it are moved to tears. When on a certain ship there was no believer except one penitent, shipwreck began to threaten. There was someone there not unmindful of his salvation and a most vehement demander of the sacrament, and there was no one who could give it except that penitent. For he had received it; because of the sin for which he was doing penance, he had lost holiness, but he had not lost the sacrament. For if those who sin lose this, why are they not baptized again when they are reconciled after penance? Therefore he gave what he had received; and, lest he dangerously end his life unreconciled, he asked the very person whom he had baptized to reconcile him, and it was done. They escaped shipwreck. You know what they did. There was no one among those who heard of them who did not believe their disposition so pious as to believe that the Lord had been present to their counsels in that danger. For a religious and suppliant disposition demanded the sacrament from a human being and obtained holiness from God. But if someone perhaps does not wish to believe what I have narrated concerning those who were in danger when shipwreck threatened—for the authority of divine Scripture does not commend this, but report from an uncertain author—I shall not dispute it; but I ask: if something like this should happen, what will occur? For no one can say that the person who desires to be baptized when death threatens is to be abandoned. Whoever does not believe that it happened that he was baptized by a penitent must believe that it can happen.

C. XXXVI. Valet baptisma etsi per laicos ministretur.

Idem ad Fortunatum. Sanctum est baptisma per se ipsum, quod datum est in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti, ita ut in eodem sacramento sit etiam auctoritas traditionis per Dominum nostrum ad Apostolos, per illos autem in episcopos, et alios sacerdotes etiam laicos Christianos ab eadem origine ac stirpe uenientes. §. 1. Nam cum illa historia narratur, omnes, qui audiunt, ad lacrimas mouentur. Cum in naui quadam nullus fidelis esset preter unum penitentem, cepit inminere naufragium. Erat ibi quidam non inmemor suae salutis, et sacramenti uehementissimus flagitator, nec erat aliquis, qui dare posset, nisi penitens ille; acceperat enim, pro peccato, de quo agebat penitenciam, amiserat sanctitatem, sed non amiserat sacramentum. Nam si hoc amittunt peccantes, cum reconciliantur post penitenciam, quare non iterum baptizantur. Dedit ergo quod acceperat, et, ne periculose uitam finiret non reconciliatus, petiit ab eo ipso, quem baptizauerat, ut eum reconciliaret, et factum est: euaserunt naufragium. Cognitum habes quod fecerunt. Nemo extitit eorum, qui non pium animum ita crederet, ut consiliis eorum in illo periculo Dominum crederet affuisse. Motus enim animus religiosus et supplex ab homine exegit sacramentum, a Deo inpetrat sanctitatem. Quod si forte hoc, quod narraui de his, qui naufragio inminente periclitabantur, non uult aliquis credere, (non enim hoc diuinarum scripturarum auctoritas, sed incerto auctore fama conmendat), non repugnabo, sed interrogo, si tale aliquid contingat, quid futurum est? Non enim potest quisquam dicere, relinquendum illum esse, qui morte inminente baptizari desiderat.

Quem baptizatum a penitente quisquis non credit contigisse, oportet, ut credat posse contingere.

C. XXXVII. Although a catechumen lives rightly, he nevertheless cannot be saved without baptism.

The same. We do not believe that a catechumen, although he died amid good works, has life, except only if he completes the sacrament of martyrdom. A baptized person confesses his faith before a priest and answers when questioned. A martyr does this same thing before a persecutor: he both confesses the faith and answers when questioned. The former, after confession, is sprinkled with water; the latter is sprinkled with blood or immersed in fire. The former receives the Holy Spirit by the pontiff's imposition of a hand; the latter becomes a dwelling of the Holy Spirit, since it is not he himself who speaks, but the Holy Spirit who speaks in him. The former communicates in the Eucharist in commemoration of the Lord's death; the latter dies together with Christ himself. The former confesses that he renounces the deeds of the world; the latter renounces those deeds and life itself. All the former's sins are remitted; the latter's are extinguished.

> C. XXXVII. Quamuis recte uiuat catecuminus, sine baptismo tamen non potest saluari.
> Idem. Catecuminum, quamuis in bonis operibus defunctum, uitam habere non credimus, excepto dumtaxat nisi martirii sacramentum conpleat. Baptizatus confitetur fidem suam coram sacerdote, et interrogatus respondet. Hoc idem martir coram persecutore facit, qui et confitetur fidem, et interrogatus respondet. Ille post confessionem aspergitur aqua. Hic uero aspergitur sanguine, uel tingitur igne. Ille manus inpositione pontificis accipit Spiritum sanctum; hic habitaculum efficitur Spiritus sancti, dum non est ipse, qui loquitur, sed spiritus sanctus, qui in illo loquitur Ille conmunicat eucharistiae in conmemoratione mortis Domini, hic ipsi Christo conmoritur. Ille confitetur se mundi actibus renunciare, hic ipsis renunciat et uitae. Illi omnia peccata dimittuntur; isti exstinguntur.

C. XXXVIII. Baptism whose form is established to have been conferred in full is not to be repeated.

Likewise Pope Leo, [letter XC, otherwise XCII, to Rusticus, c. 16]. PART VIII. Those concerning whom you wrote, who know that they were baptized but profess that they do not know of what faith those who baptized them were, are not to be rebaptized if in any manner they received the form of baptism; but through the imposition of a hand they are to be joined to Catholics by the power of the Holy Spirit, which they could not receive from heretics.

> C. XXXVIII. Non reiteretur baptisma, cuius formam constat integre collatam.
>
> Item Leo Papa. [epist. XC. al. XCII. ad Rusticum, c. 16.] VIII. Pars. Hii de quibus scripsisti, qui se baptizatos sciunt, sed cuius fidei fuerint qui eos baptizauere, nescire se profitentur, quolibet modo formam baptismatis acceperunt rebaptizandi non sunt; sed per inpositionem manus uirtute Spiritus sancti, quam ab hereticis accipere non potuerunt, catholicis copulandi sunt.

C. XXXIX. Christ baptizes equally through good and bad ministers.

Likewise Augustine on John, [tractate V on c. 1]. PART IX. It is one thing to baptize by ministry, another to baptize by power. Likewise. § 1. Therefore his disciples baptized, and Judas was still there among his disciples. But if Judas baptized any, were they not baptized again, while those whom John baptized were baptized again? Clearly again, but not with baptism repeated. For those whom John baptized, John baptized; but those whom Judas baptized, Christ baptized. Likewise, [tractate 6]. § 2. For through this power which Christ alone retained for himself and poured into none of his ministers —although he deigned to baptize through ministers—through this power, I say, stands the unity of the Church, which is signified in the dove, of which it was said: "One is my dove, the one chosen for her mother." For if, as I have already said, my brothers, power were transferred from the Lord to a minister, there would be as many baptisms as there were ministers, and the unity of baptism would no longer stand. Attend, brothers. Before our Lord Jesus Christ came to baptism, the dove descended upon the water. John recognized something proper to him to whom it was said: "Upon whom you see the Spirit descending and remaining upon him, this is he who baptizes in the Holy Spirit." Now he knew that he baptized in the Holy Spirit; but that he did so with such a property that the power would not pass from him to another, although by his gift, this he learned there. Likewise, [tractate 80]. § 3. "Now you are clean because of the word which I have spoken to you." Why did he not say, "You are clean because of the baptism with which you were washed," but said, "Because of the word which I have spoken to you," unless because the word cleanses also in the water? Likewise, [tractate 5]. § 4. If the minister is righteous, I count him with Paul, with Peter; with these I count righteous ministers. But because righteous ministers do not seek their own glory—for they are ministers—they do not wish to be regarded as leaders; they shudder at hope being placed in themselves. Therefore I count a righteous minister with Paul. For what does Paul say? "I planted, Apollo watered, but God gave the increase."

C. XXXIX. Et per bonos et per malos ministros eque baptizat Christus.

Item Augustinus super Iohannem. [tract. V. ad c. 1.] IX. Pars. Aliud est baptizare per ministerium: aliud baptizare per potestatem. Item: §. 1. Ergo baptizabant discipuli eius, et ibi adhuc erat Iudas inter discipulos eius. Si quos autem baptizauit Iudas, non sunt iterum baptizati, et quos baptizauit Iohannes, iterum sunt baptizati? Plane iterum: sed non iterato baptismo. Quos enim baptizauit Iohannes, baptizauit Iohannes: quos autem Iudas baptizauit, Christus baptizauit. Item: [tract. 6.] §. 2. Per hanc enim potestatem, quam Christus solus tenuit sibi, et in neminem ministrorum transfudit, quamuis per ministros baptizare dignatus sit, per hanc inquam stat unitas ecclesiae, que significatur in columba, de qua dictum est: "Una est columba mea, una est matri suae electa." Si enim, ut iam dixi, fratres mei, transferretur a Domino potestates ad ministrum, tot baptismata essent, quot ministri essent, et iam non staret unitas baptismi. Intendite fratres. Ante, quam ueniret Dominus noster Iesus Christus ad baptismum, descendit columba in aquam; cognouit Iohannes quiddam proprium ei cui dictum est: "Super quem uideris Spiritum descendentem, et manentem super eum, ipse, est, qui baptizat in Spiritu sancto." Nouerat autem, quia ipse in Spiritu sancto baptizabat; sed quia tali proprietate, ut potestas ab eo non transiret in alterum, quamuis eo donante, ibi didicit. Item: [tract. 80.] §. 3. "Iam uos mundi estis propter uerbum, quod locutus sum uobis." Quare non ait: mundi estis propter baptismum, quo abluti estis, sed ait: "propter uerbum, quod locutus sum uobis," nisi quia et in aqua uerbum mundat? Item: [tract. 5.] §. 4. Si fuerit iustus minister, conputo eum cum Paulo, cum Petro, cum istis conputo ministros iustos. Quia uero iusti ministri gloriam suam non querunt (ministri enim sunt), pro ducibus haberi nolunt, spem in se poni exhorrescunt. Ergo conputo cum Paulo iustum ministrum. Quid enim Paulus dicit? "Ego plantaui, Apollo rigauit; sed Deus incrementum dedit."

C. XL. Schismatics lose neither baptism nor the power of baptizing.

The same in book I On Baptism. No one denies that even apostates possess baptism; when they return and are converted through penance, it is assuredly not restored to them, because it is judged that it cannot be lost. So also those who withdraw from the communion of the Church into the sacrilege of schism assuredly possess the baptism which they received before they withdrew. For even if they themselves return, it is not given to them again. From this it is shown that what they received while situated in unity could not be lost when they were separated. But if it can be possessed outside, why can it not also be given there? If you say, "It is not rightly given outside," we answer: just as it is not rightly possessed outside and yet is possessed, so it is not rightly given outside and yet is given. But just as through reconciliation to unity that which was possessed uselessly outside unity begins to be possessed usefully, so through the same reconciliation that which was given uselessly outside it begins to be useful. Likewise, [book III, c. 19]. § 1. Heretics possess the sacraments and the Scriptures for appearance, not for salvation. Likewise, [book IV, c. 11]. § 2. If a faithless person remains in faithlessness, through baptism he does not receive remission of sins even outside the Church; or, if because of the power of the sacrament he receives it for a point of time, that power works both outside and inside, just as the power of Christ's name worked the expulsion of demons even outside.

C. XL. Nec baptisma, nec baptizandi potestatem scismatici amittunt.

Idem in libro [I.] de baptismo. Nullus autem negat, habere baptismum etiam apostatas, quibus utique redeuntibus, et per penitenciam conuersis, non redditur, quia amitti non posse iudicatur. Sic et illi, qui in sacrilegium scismatis ab ecclesiae conmunione discedunt, habent utique baptismum, quem prius, quam discederent, acceperunt. Nam etsi ipsi redeant, non eis iterum datur. Unde ostenditur, illud, quod acceperunt in unitate positi, non potuisse amittere separatos. Quod si haberi foris potest, etiam dari cur non potest? Si dicis: non recte foris datur, respondemus: sicut non recte foris habetur, et tamen habetur, sic non recte foris datur; et tamen datur. Sicut autem per unitatis reconciliationem incipit utiliter haberi quod extra unitatem inutiliter habebatur: sic per eandem reconciliationem incipit utile esse quod extra eam inutiliter datum est. Item: [lib. 3. c. 19.] §. 1. Heretici sacramenta et scripturas habent ad speciem, non ad salutem. Item: [lib. 4. c. 11.] §. 2. Perfidus, si in perfidiae permanserit, per baptismum nec extra ecclesiam, remissionem accipit peccatorum; aut, si propter uim sacramenti ad punctum temporis excipit, et foris et intus eam uim operatur, sicut uis nominis Christi expulsionem demonum etiam foris operabatur.

C. XLI. Bad persons minister baptism not by their own power but by Christ's power.

Likewise. How does God hear a murderer praying, whether over the water of baptism, over oil, over the Eucharist, or over the heads of those upon whom a hand is imposed? Yet all these things are both done and valid even through murderers, that is, through those who hate their brothers. Even within the Church itself, since no one can give what he does not possess, how does a murderer give the Holy Spirit? And yet within it even he baptizes. Therefore God gives the Holy Spirit even when he baptizes. Consequently, God gives the sacrament of grace even through bad persons, but grace itself only through himself or through his saints; and therefore he effects the remission of sins either through himself or through the members of that dove, to whom he says: "If you remit the sins of anyone, they shall be remitted." But if the imposition of a hand were not applied to one coming from heresy, although he would be judged to be entirely without fault, nevertheless, for the joining of charity—which is the greatest gift of the Holy Spirit, without which whatever other holy things may be in a human being do not avail unto salvation—a hand is imposed upon corrected heretics. Human beings, moreover, put on Christ sometimes as far as the reception of the sacrament, sometimes also as far as the sanctification of life; and that first can be common to both good and bad persons, but this is proper to the good and pious. § 2. It seemed to certain even excellent men, bishops of Christ—among whom blessed Cyprian especially stood forth—that Christ's baptism could not exist among heretics or schismatics, for no reason other than that the sacrament was not distinguished from the effect or use of the sacrament; and because its effect and use in liberation from sins and rectitude of heart was not found among heretics, they thought that the sacrament itself also did not exist there. But when they turned their eyes to the multitude of interior chaff—since even those who within unity itself are perverse and live ruinously appear to be able neither to give nor possess the remission of sins, because it was said not to malignant sons but to the good, "If you remit the sins of anyone, they are remitted to them," and the rest, and yet they possess, give, and receive the sacrament of baptism—it shone forth sufficiently clearly to the shepherds of the Catholic Church that even a sheep which wandered outside and received the Lord's character outside, upon coming to the salvation of Christian unity, was to be corrected from error, but that the Lord's character in it was to be recognized rather than disapproved, since many who are both wolves and imprint it upon wolves appear to be within, but nevertheless do not belong to that sheep which is one from many. § 3. When a bad person transmits baptism to a good person, that is, one changed by true conversion within the bond of unity, the malice of the giver does not separate the good sacrament which is transmitted from the good believer to whom it is transmitted. And when sins are remitted to one truly converted to God, they are remitted by those to whom he is joined by true conversion; the Holy Spirit remits them, who has been given to all the saints cohering with him by charity, whether they have known one another bodily or have not known one another. Similarly, when someone's sins are retained, they are retained by those from whom he is disjoined by depravity of heart, whether known or unknown bodily. § 4. All bad persons are spiritually separated from the good. But if they are separated also bodily by open withdrawal, they become worse. Yet it makes no difference to the sanctity of baptism how much worse anyone who possesses it is, or to how much worse a person he transmits it. One separated can nevertheless transmit it, just as one separated can possess it. But as pernicious as it is to possess, so perniciously does he transmit it. The person to whom he transmits it, however, can receive it salutarily if he himself, not separated, received it when the necessity of death pressed. § 5. Why can heretics not baptize outside? Is it because they are worse by the very fact that they are outside? But it makes no difference to the integrity of baptism how much worse a person transmitting it is. For there is not as much difference between a bad and a worse person as between a good and a bad person, and yet, when a bad person baptizes, he gives nothing other than one who is less bad. Or perhaps does it pertain not to the merit of the human being but to the sacrament of baptism itself that it cannot be given outside? If this were so, it could not be possessed outside either, and it would be necessary to baptize someone as many times as, having withdrawn from the Church, he returned again to the Church. § 6. For those who are baptized with a feigned heart, either sins are in no way remitted, because the Holy Spirit of discipline will flee from the feigned person, or, remitted at the very point of time through the power of the sacrament, they are again brought back through the feigning, so that both this may be true—"As many of you as have been baptized in Christ"—and this: "The Holy Spirit of discipline will flee from the feigned person"; that is, let the sanctity of baptism clothe him with Christ, and let the ruin of feigning strip him of Christ. For the Lord teaches most openly in the Gospel, in that servant from whom the Lord demanded the debt that had been remitted because he would not remit the debt to his fellow servant, that remitted sins return where fraternal charity is absent. Thus the grace of baptism is not impeded from remitting all sins, even if fraternal hatred persists in the mind of the one to whom they are remitted. For yesterday is absolved, and whatever remains is absolved, even the hour and moment itself before baptism and in baptism; but immediately afterward he begins to be guilty not only of the succeeding days, hours, and moments, but also of the preceding ones, as all the things that were remitted return.

C. XLI. Mali non sua potestate, sed Christi uirtute baptisma ministrant.

Item. Quomodo exaudit Deus homicidam deprecantem, uel super aquam baptismi, uel super oleum, uel super eucharistiam, uel super capita eorum, quibus manus inponitur? Que tamen omnia et fiunt, et ualent etiam per homicidas, id est per eos, qui oderunt fratres. Etiam in ipsa intus ecclesia, cum dare nemo possit quod non habet, quomodo dat homicida Spiritum sanctum? et tamen intus etiam ipse baptizat. Deus ergo dat etiam ipso baptizante Spiritum sanctum. Quapropter sacramentum gratiae dat Deus etiam per malos; ipsam uero gratiam non nisi per se ipsum, uel per sanctos suos, et ideo remissionem peccatorum uel per se ipsum facit, uel per illius columbae membra, quibus ait: "Si cui dimiseritis, dimittentur." Manus autem inpositio si non adhiberetur ab heresi uenienti, quamquam extra omnem culpam esse iudicaretur, propter karitatis tamen copulationem (quod est maximum donum Spiritus sancti, sine quo non ualent ad salutem quecumque alia fuerint sancta in homine) manus hereticis correctis inponitur. Induunt autem homines Christum aliquando usque ad sacramenti perceptionem, aliquando et usque ad uitae sanctificationem; atque illud primum et bonis et malis potest esse conmune: hoc autem proprium est bonorum et piorum. §. 2. Non ob aliud uisum est quibusdam etiam egregiis uiris antistitibus Christi, (inter quos precipue B. Ciprianus eminebat), non posse esse apud hereticos uel scismaticos baptismum Christi, nisi quia non distinguebatur sacramentum ab effectu uel usu sacramenti, et quia eius effectus atque usus in liberatione a peccatis et cordis rectitudine apud hereticos non inueniebatur, ipsum sacramentum quoque illic non esse putabant. Sed conuertentibus oculos ad interioris paleae multitudinem (cum et hi, qui in ipsa unitate peruersi sunt, et perdite uiuunt, appareant remissionem peccatorum nec dare posse, nec habere, quia non malignis filiis sed bonis dictum est: "Si cui dimiseritis peccata, dimittuntur eis et reliqua," habere tamen, et dare, et accipere baptismi sacramentum); satis eluxit pastoribus ecclesiae catholicae, etiam ouem, que foris errabat, et dominicum characterem foris accipiebat, uenientem ad Christianae unitatis salutem ab errore corrigi, characterem tamen dominicum in ea cognosci potius, quam inprobari, quandoquidem ipsum characterem multi et lupi, et lupis infigunt, qui uidentur esse intus, uerumtamen ad illam ouem, que ex multis una est, non pertinent. §. 3. Cum malus tradit baptismum bono, id est in unitatis uinculo, ueraci conuersione mutato, inter bonum sacramentum, quod traditur, et bonum fidelem, cui traditur, tradentis malicia non separat, et, cum ueraciter illi ad Deum conuerso peccata dimittuntur ab eis dimittuntur, quibus ipse ueraci conuersione coniungitur, Spiritus sanctus ea dimittit, qui datus est omnibus sanctis sibi karitate coherentibus, siue se nouerint corporaliter, siue non nouerint. Similiter, cum alicuius tenentur peccata, ab eis tenentur, a quibus ille cordis prauitate disiungitur, siue corporaliter notis, siue ignotis. §. 4. Omnes mali spiritualiter a bonis seiuncti sunt. Si autem corporaliter etiam aperta discessione separentur, peiores fiunt. Sed nichil interest ad baptismi sanctitatem, quanto quisque peior id habeat, et quanto peiori tradat. Potest tamen tradere separatus, sicut potest habere separatus. Sed quam perniciosum est habere, tam perniciose tradere. Ille autem, cui tradit, potest salubriter accipere, si ipse non separatus acceperit urgente mortis necessitate. §. 5. Cur heretici foris baptizare non possunt? an quia peiores sunt eo ipso, quod foris sunt? Sed nichil interest ad integritatem baptismi, quanto peior id tradat. Neque enim tantum interest inter malum et peiorem, quantum inter bonum et malum, et tamen, cum baptizat malus, non aliud dat, quam ille, qui minus malus est. An forte non ad hominis meritum, sed ad ipsius baptismi sacramentum pertinet, ut foris dari non possit? Si hoc ita esset, nec haberi foris posset, et tociens baptizari necesse esset, quociens recedens quisque ab ecclesia rursus ad ecclesiam remeasset. §. 6. His, qui ficto corde baptizantur, aut peccata nullatenus dimittuntur, quia spiritus sanctus disciplinae effugiet fictum, aut in ipso temporis puncto per uim sacramenti dimissa iterum per fictionem replicantur, ut etiam illud uerum sit: "Quotquot in Christo baptizati estis," et illud:

"Spiritus sanctus disciplinae effugiet fictum:" id est, induat eum Christum sanctitas baptismi, et exuat eum Christum pernicies fictionis. Nam redire dimissa peccata, ubi fraterna karitas non est, apertissime Dominus in euangelio docet in illo seruo, a quo Dominus dimissum debitum petiuit, eo quod ille conseruo suo debitum nollet dimittere. Sic non inpeditur baptismi gratia, quo minus omnia peccata dimittat, etiamsi fraternum odium in eius, cui dimittuntur, animo perseuerat. Soluitur enim hesternus dies, et quicquid superest, soluitur etiam ipsa hora momentumque ante baptismum, et in baptismo; deinceps autem continuo reus esse incipit non solum consequentium, sed etiam preteritorum dierum, horarum, momentorum, redeuntibus omnibus, que dimissa sunt.

C. XLII. When baptism profits one who approaches feignedly.

The same. PART X. Baptism begins to avail unto salvation when that feigning which, while the heart persevered in malice or sacrilege, did not permit the washing away of sins to occur has withdrawn through truthful confession.

C. XLII. Quando prosit baptismus ei, qui ficte accedit.

Idem. X. Pars. Tunc ualere incipit ad salutem baptismus, cum illa fictio ueraci confessione recesserit, que, corde in malicia uel sacrilegio perseuerante, peccatorum ablutionem non sinebat fieri.

C. XLIII. Sacraments ministered outside the Church are not repeated.

The same to the Donatists, [letter XLVIII]. We do not change in you those things in which you are with us—for in many things you are with us, since of such persons it was said: "Because they were with me in many things"—but we correct those things in which you are not with us, and we wish you to receive here the things you do not possess there, where you are. For you are with us in baptism, in the creed, and in the other sacraments of the Lord. But in the spirit of unity and bond of peace, and finally in the Catholic Church itself, you are not with us. § 1. But those with whom or concerning whom we are dealing are not to be despaired of, for they are still in the body; but let them not seek the Holy Spirit except in Christ's body. Outside they possess its sacrament, but within they do not hold the reality itself to which that sacrament belongs; and therefore they eat and drink judgment for themselves.

C. XLIII. Non reiterantur sacramenta, que extra ecclesiam ministrantur.

Idem ad Donatistas. [epist. XLVIII.] Non in uobis mutamus in quibus nobiscum estis, (in multis enim nobiscum estis), nam et de talibus dictum est: "Quoniam in multis erant mecum;" sed ea corrigimus, in quibus non estis, et ea uos hic accipere uolumus, que non habetis illic, ubi estis. Nobiscum enim estis in baptismo, in symbolo, in ceteris dominicis sacramentis. In spiritu autem unitatis et uinculo pacis, in ipsa denique catholica ecclesia nobiscum non estis. §. 1. Isti autem, cum quibus, uel de quibus agimus, non sunt desperandi, adhuc enim in corpore sunt; sed non querant Spiritum sanctum, nisi in Christi corpore, cuius habent foris sacramentum, sed rem ipsam non tenent intus, cuius est illud sacramentum, et ideo sibi iudicium manducant et bibunt.

C. XLIV. How those baptized among heretics in the name of the Trinity are received into the Church.

Likewise Gregory to Bishop Quiricus and the other bishops in Iberia, [book IX, letter 61]. We have learned from the ancient institution of the Fathers that those who are baptized in the name of the Trinity among a heresy, when they return to holy Church, are recalled to the bosom of Mother Church either by anointing with chrism, by the imposition of a hand, or by profession of faith alone.

Hence the West reforms Arians for entrance into the Catholic Church through the imposition of a hand, but the East through anointing with holy chrism. It receives Monophysites and others by confession alone, because the holy baptism which they obtained among heretics then receives in them the powers of cleansing when either the former have received the Holy Spirit through the imposition of a hand, or the latter have been united to the inward parts of the holy and universal Church through profession of the true faith.

C. XLIV. Quomodo recipiantur in ecclesia qui in nomine Trinitatis apud hereticos baptizantur.

Item Gregorius Quirico Episcopo, et ceteris in Hyberia Episcopis. [lib. IX. epist. 61.] Ab antiqua Patrum institutione didicimus, ut qui apud heresim in Trinitatis nomine baptizantur, cum ad sanctam ecclesiam redeunt, aut unctione crismatis, aut inpositione manus, aut sola professione fidei ad sinum matris ecclesiae reuocentur. Unde Arrianos per inpositionem manus occidens, per unctionem uero sancti crismatis ad ingressum catholicae ecclesiae oriens reformat. Monofisitas uero, et alios ex sola confessione recipit, quia sanctum baptisma, quod apud hereticos sunt consecuti, tunc in eis uires emundationis accipit cum uel illi per inpositionem manus Spiritum sanctum acceperint, uel isti per professionem uerae fidei sanctae et uniuersalis ecclesiae uisceribus fuerint uniti.

C. XLV. Baptism can be received outside the Church, but it does not profit there.

Likewise Augustine. The Church, compared to paradise, indicates to us that human beings can indeed receive its baptism even outside, but that no one outside it can either receive or retain the salvation of beatitude. For the happiness of life which is commemorated in paradise is not in Mesopotamia or Egypt, to which those rivers came. Thus, therefore, the Church's baptism can be outside the Church, but the gift of a good life is found only within the Church.

C. XLV. Extra ecclesiam baptismus accipi potest, sed non prodest.

Item Augustinus. Ecclesia paradiso conparata indicat nobis, posse quidem baptismum eius homines etiam foris accipere, sed salutem beatitudinis extra eam neminem uel percipere, uel tenere. Non enim in Mesopotamia uel Egypto, quo illa flumina peruenerunt, est felicitas uitae, que in paradiso conmemoratur. Sic ergo baptismus ecclesiae potest esse extra ecclesiam, munus autem bonae uitae non nisi intra ecclesiam repperitur.

C. XLVI. Heresy and sacrilege belong to heretics, not the sacraments.

The same, On the One Baptism, [Against the Donatists], book III, [c. 11]. But now, just as heresy belongs to heretics, as their error belongs to them, and as the sacrilege of their dissension also belongs to them, so the baptism, which belongs to Christ, ought not also to be called theirs.

C. XLVI. Heresis et sacrilegium hereticorum sunt, non sacramenta.

Idem de unico baptismo, [contra Donatistas] libro III. [c. 11.] Nunc autem non, sicut heresis hereticorum est, sicut error ipsorum est, sicut etiam sacrilegium dissensionis ipsorum est, sic etiam baptisma, quod Christi est, debet dici ipsorum.

C. XLVII. On the same matter.

The same in book V, [c. 13]. Since baptism through a contemptible human being avails as much as that given through an Apostle, it is thereby known to belong neither to the one nor to the other, but to Christ. Likewise, [c. 14]. § 1. We find that the Apostles said "my glory," although certainly in the Lord, and "my prudence," and "my ministry," and "my Gospel," although certainly imparted and given by the Lord; but none of them ever called baptism "mine." For not everyone's glory is equal, nor do all minister equally; nor are all endowed with equal prudence or knowledge, and in evangelizing one works better than another. And therefore one can be called more learned than another in saving doctrine itself. But one cannot be called more or less baptized than another, whether he is baptized by an inferior or a superior.

C. XLVII. De eodem.

Idem libro V. [c. 13.] Cum tantum ualeat baptismus per hominem contemptibilem, quantum per Apostolum datus, ita nec illius nec illius sed Christi esse cognoscitur. Item: [c. 14.] §. 1. Inuenimus dictum ab Apostolis, et gloriam meam, quamuis utique in Domino, et prudentiam meam, et ministerium meum, et euangelium meum, quamuis utique a Domino inpertitum atque donatum; baptismum autem eorum nemo meum dixit omnino. Neque enim omnium equalis est gloria, nec ministrant omnes equaliter; nec equali prudentia uel scientia omnes sunt prediti, et in euangelizando alius alio melius operatur. Et ideo dici potest alius alio doctior in ipsa salutari doctrina. Alius autem alio maius minusue baptizatus dici non potest, siue ab inferiore siue a maiore baptizetur.

C. XLVIII. On the same matter.

The same in book IV, [c. 15]. We have shown sufficiently that the error of anyone, whether giver or receiver, does not pertain to baptism which is consecrated with the evangelical words, whether he thinks differently about the Father, the Son, or the Holy Spirit from what heavenly teaching intimates.

C. XLVIII. De eodem.

Idem in libro IV. [c. 15.] Satis ostendimus, ad baptismum, quod uerbis euangelicis consecratur, non pertinere cuiusquam uel dantis, uel accipientis errorem, siue de Patre, siue de Filio, siue de Spiritu sancto aliter sentiat, quam celestis doctrina insinuat.

C. XLIX. The Church's sacraments are common to good and bad persons.

The same in the book On Baptism. There is a unity of the Church which extends widely, namely in the fellowship and communion of the sacraments, which embraces the chaff together with the grains when it tolerates them thus bodily mixed, so that the righteous neither avoid them nor are avoided by them. Thus bad human beings are in the Church as bad humors are in the human body, which sometimes go out from the body.

C. XLIX. Quod bonis et malis sacramenta ecclesiae conmunia sunt.

Idem in libro de baptismo. Est unitas ecclesiae, que late patet, in sacramentorum uidelicet societate et conmunione, que conplectitur cum granis etiam paleas, quando eas corporaliter mixtas ita patitur, ut neque illas iusti uitent, neque ab illis iusti uitentur. Sic sunt in ecclesia homines mali, ut in corpore humano humores mali, qui interdum exeunt ex corpore.

C. L. Nevertheless, the malice of the one blessing does not harm the water of baptism.

The same, On the One Baptism, book VI. The water over which the Lord's name is invoked is not profane and adulterous, even if it is invoked by profane persons and adulterers, because neither the creature itself nor the name itself is adulterous.

C. L. Non tamen obsit ad aquam baptismi malicia benedicentis.

Idem de unico baptismo libro VI. Non est aqua profana et adultera, super quam nomen Domini inuocatur, etiamsi a profanis et ab adulteris inuocetur, quia nec ipsa creatura, nec ipsum nomen adulterum est.

C. LI. One baptized by heretics is not to be rebaptized.

Likewise Bede, homily XXXVI, [on c. 3 of John]. Whether a heretic, a schismatic, or any criminal baptizes in the confession of the Holy Trinity, the person baptized cannot be rebaptized by good Catholics, lest the confession or invocation of so great a name seem to be annulled.

C. LI. Non est rebaptizandus qui ab hereticis baptizatur.

Item Beda omelia XXXVI. [ad c. 3. Iohannis] Siue hereticus, siue scismaticus, siue facinorosus quisque in confessione sanctae Trinitatis baptizet, non ualet ille, qui est baptizatus, a bonis catholicis rebaptizari, ne confessio uel inuocatio tanti nominis uideatur annullari.

C. LII. Those baptized by pagans are to be baptized in the name of the Trinity.

Likewise Gregory II to Bishop Boniface. Concerning those whom you asserted to have been baptized by pagans, if this is so, we command that you baptize them anew in the name of the Trinity.

C. LII Baptizati a paganis in nomine baptizentur Trinitatis.

Item Gregorius II. Bonifatio Episcopo. Quos a paganis baptizatos esse asseruisti, si ita habetur, ut denuo baptizes in nomine Trinitatis, mandamus.

C. LIII. No one is to be baptized without exorcisms and exsufflations.

Likewise Pope Celestine. PART XI. Whether little children or young persons come to the sacrament of regeneration, let them not approach the font of life before the unclean spirit is driven from them by the exorcisms and exsufflations of clerics.

C. LIII. Sine exorcismis et exsufflationibus nullus baptizetur.

Item Celestinus Papa. XI. Pars. Siue paruuli, siue iuuenes ad regenerationis ueniunt sacramentum, non prius fontem uitae adeant, quam exorcismis et exsufflationibus clericorum Spiritus inmundus ab eis abigatur.

C. LIV. The office of catechizing should precede the baptizing.

Likewise Rabanus, On the Instruction of Clerics, [book I, c. 25]. Before baptism the office of catechizing ought to precede a human being, so that the catechumen may first receive the rudiment of faith. Likewise. § 1. Christ himself first smeared the eyes of the man born blind with clay made from spittle and thus sent him to the waters of Siloam, because one to be baptized ought first to be instructed in the faith of Christ's incarnation and thus, now believing, be admitted to baptism, so that he may know of whose grace he is made a participant in it and to whom he thereafter becomes a debtor.

C. LIV. Offitium baptizandi catecumini preueniant.

Item Rabanus de institutione clericorum. [lib. I. c. 25.] Ante baptismum catecizandi debet hominem preuenire offitium, ut fidei primum catecuminus accipiat rudimentum. Item: §. 1. Prius ipse Christus ceci nati oculos luto ex sputo facto superliniuit, et sic ad aquas Syloe misit, quia prius debet baptizandus fide incarnationis Christi instrui, et sic ad baptismum iam credulus admitti, ut sciat, cuius gratiae in eo est particeps, et cui iam debitor fiat deinceps.

C. LV. At what time catechumens are to be brought for exorcism.

Likewise from the Second Council of Braga, [c. 1]. For twenty days before baptism, catechumens are to hasten to the cleansing of exorcism; during these twenty days they are to be taught spiritually the whole creed, which is: "I believe in God the Father almighty."

C. LV. Quo tempore catecumini ad exorcizandum sunt deferendi.

Item ex Concilio Bracarensi II. [c. 1.] Ante uiginti dies baptismi ad purgationem exorcismi catecumini currant, in quibus uiginti diebus omnino symbolum, quod est: Credo in Deum Patrem omnipotentem, spiritualiter doceantur.

C. LVI. At what time the creed is to be preached to the competentes.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 13]. It was also resolved that the creed be preached publicly in church to the competentes by all churches on one day, that is, eight days before the Lord's resurrection.

C. LVI. Quo tempore conpetentibus symbolum est predicandum.

Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 13.] Symbolum etiam placuit ab omnibus ecclesiis una die, id est ante octo dies dominicae resurrectionis, publice in ecclesia conpetentibus predicari.

C. LVII. Those to be baptized can be catechized in each church.

Likewise Pope Nicholas. The catechisms of those to be baptized can be performed by the priests of each church, as they are proved to be solemnly performed in this holy Roman Church, to which, by God's authority, we render the ministry of our service.

C. LVII. In unaquaque ecclesia baptizandi catecizari possunt.

Item Nykolaus Papa. Catecismi baptizandorum a sacerdotibus uniuscuiusque ecclesiae possunt fieri, sicut in sancta hac Romana ecclesia (cui, Deo auctore, ministerium nostri famulatus exhibemus) solempniter fieri conprobantur.

C. LVIII. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea, [c. 46]. Those to be baptized ought to learn the creed of the faith and recite it to either the bishop or presbyter on the Thursday of the final week.

C. LVIII. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 46.] Baptizandos oportet fidei symbolum discere, et quinta feria ultimae septimanae uel episcopo uel presbitero reddere.

C. LIX. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 49]. It is not permitted to receive anyone for baptism two weeks before Easter, but three weeks before. Those who are to be baptized ought, during these days, to learn the creed and recite it to the bishop or presbyter on the Thursday of the final week.

C. LIX. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 49.] Non liceat ante duas septimanas Pascae, sed ante tres ad baptismum suscipere aliquem. Oportet autem, ut in his diebus, qui baptizandi sunt, symbolum discant, et in quinta feria nouissimae septimanae episcopo uel presbitero reddant.

C. LX. Before they are baptized, all are to be examined.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 85]. Those to be baptized are to give their names, and for a long time, under abstinence from wine and meats and through frequent examination with imposition of a hand, receive baptism.

C. LX. Ante, quam baptizentur, quilibet sunt examinandi.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 85.] Baptizandi nomen suum dent, et diu sub abstinentia uini et carnium, ac manus inpositionis crebra examinatione baptismum percipiant.

C. LXI. Why those to be baptized are exorcized and exsufflated.

Likewise Rabanus, On the Instruction of Clerics, [book I, c. 27]. After the one to be baptized has commended himself through confession of the true faith to the dominion of another and through renunciation has alienated himself from the service of his former possessor, the savage power is exsufflated from him, so that, through the pious ministry of the priest, the malign spirit may flee and yield to the Holy Spirit.

C. LXI. Baptizandi quare exorcizentur et exsufflentur.

Item Rabanus de institutione clericorum. [lib. I. c. 27.] Postquam se baptizandus per confessionem uerae fidei in alterius conmendauerit dominium, et per abrenunciationem a prioris possessoris se alienauerit seruicio, exsufflatur ab eo seua potestas, ut per pium sacerdotis ministerium spiritui sancto cedat fugiens spiritus malignus.

C. LXII. On the same matter.

Likewise Augustine, On the Creed, book I, [c. 1]. As you know, dearest brothers, little children are exsufflated and exorcized so that the hostile power of the devil, which deceived the human being in order to possess human beings, may be driven from them. Therefore, it is not the creature in the infants that is exorcized or exsufflated, but he under whom those who are born under sin are held.

C. LXII. De eodem.

Item Augustinus de symbolo, libro I. [c. 1.] Sicut nostis, fratres karissimi, paruuli exsufflantur et exorcizantur, ut pellatur ab eis diaboli potestas inimica, que decepit hominem, ut possideret homines. Non ergo creatura in infantibus exorcizatur aut exsufflatur, sed ille, sub quo sunt, qui sub peccato nascuntur.

C. LXIII. Why one to be baptized is signed upon the heart and forehead.

Likewise Rabanus, On the Instruction of Clerics, [book I, c. 27]. Afterward the one to be baptized is signed with the sign of the holy cross both on the forehead and on the heart, so that from that time the apostate devil, recognizing in his former vessel the sign of his own destruction, may know that it is thereafter alien to him.

C. LXIII. Quare signetur baptizandus in corde et in fronte.

Item Rabanus de institutione clericorum. [lib. I. c. 27.] Postea signatur baptizandus signaculo sanctae crucis tam in fronte quam in corde, ut ab eo tempore apostata diabolus in uase suo pristino, interemptionis suae cognoscens signum, iam sibi deinceps illud sciat esse alienum.

C. LXIV. Why prayers are said over him.

The same in the same book. From this point prayers are said over him so that he may become a catechumen. Then blessed salt is given into the mouth of the one to be baptized so that, seasoned through the typological salt with the salt of wisdom, he may lack the stench of iniquity and no longer putrefy from the worms of sins, but rather be preserved unharmed for receiving greater grace.

> C. LXIV. Quare super eum orationes dicantur.
> Idem libro eodem. Exhinc iam dicuntur orationes super eum, ut fiat catecuminus. Tunc datur baptizando sal benedictum in os, ut per sal tipicum, sale sapientiae conditus, fetore careat iniquitatis, ne a uermibus peccatorum ultra putrefiat, sed magis illesus seruetur ad maiorem gratiam percipiendam.

C. LXV. Why they are initiated with salt.

Likewise Bede on the Book of Kings. We are commanded to offer in all the sacrifices of our works the salt of heavenly wisdom with which catechumens are initiated.

> C. LXV. Quare sale initientur.
> Item Beda super librum Regum. Sal celestis sapientiae, quo initiantur catecumini, in cunctis operum nostrorum sacrificiis iubemur offerre.

C. LXVI. Why they are exorcized again.

Likewise Rabanus, On the Instruction of Clerics, [book I, c. 27]. Then the devil is exorcized again, so that, recognizing his own wickedness and fearing God's just judgment upon himself, he may withdraw from the human being and no longer strive by his art to overthrow him lest he obtain baptism, but rather, exhibiting honor to God his creator, may restore the work to God its maker.

> C. LXVI. Quare iterum exorcizentur.
> Item Rabanus de institutione clericorum, [lib. I. c. 27.] Dehinc iterum exorcizatur diabolus, ut suam nequiciam cognoscens iustum super se Dei iudicium timens, recedat ab homine, nec iam contendat eum arte sua subuertere, ne baptismum consequatur, sed magis honorem Deo creatori suo exhibens reddat opus Deo factori suo.

C. LXVII. Priests drive away demons by exorcizing.

Likewise Gregory in homily XXIV. When priests, through the grace of exorcism, impose a hand upon believers and forbid malignant spirits to dwell in their mind, what else do they do but cast out demons?

> C. LXVII. Sacerdotes exorcizando demonia depellunt.
>
> Item Gregorius in omelia XXIV. Sacerdotes, cum per exorcismi gratiam manum credentibus inponunt, et habitare malignos spiritus in eorum mente contradicunt, quid aliud faciunt, nisi demonia eiciunt?

C. LXVIII. Why nostrils and ears are touched with saliva.

Likewise Rabanus, On the Instruction of Clerics, [book I, c. 27]. Afterward his nostrils and ears are touched with saliva, and the evangelical word is said to him which Jesus, when he healed the deaf and mute man, said while touching his tongue with spittle and putting his fingers into his ears: "Ephphatha," which is "Be opened." For this sacrament is enacted here: that through the typological saliva and the priest's touch divine wisdom and power may work the salvation of the same catechumen, so that his nostrils may be opened to receive the fragrance of the knowledge of God, his ears may be opened to hear God's commandments, and his senses may be opened in his inmost heart to respond.

> C. LXVIII. Quare de saliua nares et aures tanguntur.
> Item Rabanus de institutione clericorum. [lib. I. c. 27.] Postea tanguntur ei nares et aures de saliua, et dicitur ei uerbum euangelicum, quod Iesus, quando surdum et mutum sanauit, tangens cum sputo linguam eius, et mittens digitos in auriculas eius, dixit: "Effeta," quod est adaperire. Hoc enim sacramentum hic agitur, ut per saliuam tipicam et sacerdotis tactum sapientia et uirtus diuina salutem eiusdem catecumini operetur, ut aperiantur ei nares ad accipiendum odorem noticiae Dei, ut aperiantur illi aures ad audiendum mandata Dei, ut aperiantur illi sensus in intimo corde ad respondendum.

C. LXIX. Why the bishop touches the nostrils, not the mouths, of those to be baptized.

Likewise Ambrose, On the Sacraments, [book I, c. 1]. On account of the glory of the gift and work, the bishop does not touch the mouth but the nostrils, so that the person may receive the good fragrance of eternal piety.

> C. LXIX. Quare nares, non ora baptizandorum episcopus tangit.
> Item Ambrosius de sacramentis. [lib. I. c. 1.] Propter gloriam muneris et operis non os tangit episcopus, sed nares, ut bonum odorem accipiat pietatis eternae.

C. LXX. Why they are anointed by a priest.

Likewise Rabanus, On the Instruction of Clerics, [book I, c. 27]. Then he is anointed by the priest so that holy baptism together with the faith received may be preserved. His breast is then anointed with consecrated oil, with invocation of the Holy Trinity, so that no remnants of the lurking enemy may remain in him, but his mind may be strengthened in the faith of the Holy Trinity. He is anointed between the shoulders with the same oil so that he may be fortified on every side and strengthened by God's grace for performing good works. The same, [c. 28]. § 1. The font is consecrated so that the catechumen may approach it for baptism itself.

> C. LXX. Quare a sacerdote inungantur.
>
> Item Rabanus de institutione clericorum. [lib. I. c. 27.] Deinde a sacerdote inungitur, ut sacrum baptisma cum accepta fide custodiantur. Ungitur tunc illius pectus de oleo sanctificato cum inuocatione S. Trinitatis, ut nullae reliquiae latentis inimici in eo resideant, sed in fide S. Trinitatis mens eius confortetur. Ungitur inter scapulas de eodem oleo, ut undique muniatur, et ad bona opera facienda per Dei gratiam roboretur. Idem: [c. 28.] §. 1. Consecratur fons, ut ad ipsum baptismum catecuminus accedat.

C. LXXI. How the presence of the Trinity consecrates the baptismal font.

Likewise Ambrose in book II On the Sacraments, [c. 5]. The priest comes to the font, says a prayer, invokes the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and uses heavenly words. Heavenly are the words which are Christ's. The presence of the Trinity is at hand; the eternal Word works; and there the Holy Spirit descends. First he descended as a dove so that unbelievers might be called to faith. In the beginning there had to be a sign; in later times, perfection. For the Holy Spirit was given to the Apostles in fiery tongues on account of unbelievers; but for us, now in the fullness of the Church, the truth is to be gathered not through signs but through faith.

C. LXXI. Quomodo fontem baptismi Trinitatis presentia consecrat.

Item Ambrosius in libro [II.] de sacramentis. [c. 5.] Venit sacerdos, ad fontem, dicit precem, inuocat nomen Patris, et Filii et Spiritus sancti, utitur uerbis celestibus. Celestia sunt uerba, que sunt Christi. Presentia Trinitatis adest; operatur sermo eternus; et ibi descendit Spiritus sanctus, primo descendit quasi columba, ut increduli uocarentur ad fidem. In principio signum debuit esse: in posterioribus perfectio. Apostolis enim Spiritus sanctus datus est in linguis igneis propter incredulos; nobis autem in plenitudine iam ecclesiae non per signa, sed per fidem ueritas est colligenda.

C. LXXII. Words of error uttered through inexperience do not impede the sanctification of the water.

Likewise Augustine, On the One Baptism, book VI, [c. 25]. PART XII. If water is not sanctified when the one praying pours forth some words of error through inexperience, many brothers within the Church itself, not only bad but also good, do not sanctify water. For the prayers of many are corrected daily if they are recited to learned teachers, and many things contrary to the Catholic faith are found in them. Surely, if it should be disclosed that some were baptized when those prayers had been said over the water, are they ordered to be baptized anew? Why is this? Because the disposition of the one praying frequently overcomes the fault of the prayer; because those other evangelical words, without which baptism cannot be consecrated, are so powerful that through them whatever is said in a faulty prayer contrary to the rule of faith is nullified, just as a demon is driven out by Christ's name. For assuredly, if a heretic offers a faulty prayer, he does not possess the good disposition of charity by which that inexperience can be overcome—and therefore whoever within the Catholic Church is envious, unclean, or malevolent, such as Cyprian rebukes here, is like him. Let him also offer, as often happens, some prayer in which he speaks contrary to the rule of faith—for many fall upon prayers composed not only by inexperienced talkers but even by heretics, and, being unable to discern these things through the simplicity of ignorance, use them thinking them good—yet what is perverse in them does not nullify those things that are right there, but rather is nullified by them.

C. LXXII. Verba erroris per inpericiam prolata non inpediunt aquae sanctificationem.

Item Augustinus de unico baptismo, libro VI. [c. 25.] XII. Pars. Si non sanctificatur aqua, cum aliqua erroris uerba per inpericiam precator refundit, multi non solum mali, sed etiam boni fratres in ipsa ecclesia non sanctificant aquam. Multorum enim preces emendantur cottidie, si doctoribus fuerint recitatae, et multa in eis repperiuntur contra fidem catholicam. Numquid, si manifestetur aliquos baptizatos, cum illae preces dictae fuissent super aquam, iubentur denuo baptizari? Quid ita? quia plerumque precis uicium superat precantis affectus, quia illa cetera uerba euangelica, sine quibus non potest baptismus consecrari, tantum ualent, ut per illa sic euacuentur quecumque in prece uiciosa contra regulam fidei dicuntur, quemadmodum demonium Christi nomine excluditur. Nam utique hereticus, si afferat precem uiciosam, nec bonum habet karitatis affectum, quo possit illa superari inpericia (et ideo similis est ei, quicumque in ipsa catholica inuidus, inmundus uel maliuolus est, qualis arguit hic Ciprianus), afferat etiam, ut fieri solet, aliquam precem, in qua loquatur contra regulam fidei, (multi quippe irruunt in preces non solum ab inperitis loquacibus, sed etiam ab hereticis conpositas, et, per ignorantiae simplicitatem non ea ualentes discernere, utuntur eis arbitrantes, quod bonae sint), nec tamen quod in eis peruersum est euacuat illa, que ibi recta sunt, sed ab eis potius euacuatur.

C. LXXIII. What the mysteries celebrated in the baptismal font signify.

Likewise Augustine to the Neophytes, [homily III]. PART XIII. In the first and second sermon, therefore, we spoke only about those things which, before you came to the holy font, we handed down to you according to the institutions of the Catholic Church. And, insofar as the Lord deigned to grant it, we interpreted what the anointing signified, which, applied to diverse parts of our body, designates a diverse understanding, when we showed that through the oil of sanctification you were prepared for hearing the full faith and called to the good fragrance of Christ, and were admonished from the whole heart to renounce the devil. Now, however, we are going to speak about the more inward mysteries which were celebrated in the holy font itself. For, after issuing the most certain bond by which you promised to renounce all the pomps of the devil, his works, and every diabolical fornication, you descended into the font—the sacred font, the font of redemption, the font sanctified by heavenly power. Likewise. In this font, therefore, before we immersed you with the whole body, we asked: "Do you believe in God the Father almighty?" You answered: "I believe." Again we asked: "Do you believe also in Jesus Christ his Son, who was born of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary?" Each of you answered: "I believe." Likewise we asked: "And in the Holy Spirit?" You similarly answered: "I believe." We do this according to the command of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who, when he was ascending to the Father in heaven, commanded his disciples, that is, the Apostles, saying: "Going, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." Likewise. § 1. But when we asked, "Do you believe the holy Church, the remission of sins, the resurrection of the flesh?" we did not ask in such a way that you would believe in the holy Catholic Church as in God. It is holy and Catholic for this reason: because it believes rightly in God. Therefore we did not say that you should believe in the Church as in God; but understand that we say, and said, that while dwelling in the holy Catholic Church you should believe in God, and should also believe the resurrection of the flesh which is to come.

C. LXXIII. Quid significent misteria, que in fonte baptismatis celebrantur.

Item Augustinus ad Neophytos. [hom. III.] XIII. Pars. Prima igitur et secunda predicatione de his tantum locuti sumus, que uobis prius, quam ad fontem sanctum ueniretis, iuxta catholicae ecclesiae instituta tradidimus. Et quid significaret unctio, que diuersis corporis nostri adhibita partibus diuersum intellectum designat, prout Dominus donare dignatus est, interpretati sumus, cum ostenderemus, uos per oleum sanctificationis ad auditum plenae fidei preparatos, et ad bonum Christi odorem uocatos, ex toto corde ad abrenunciandum diabolo esse conmonitos. Nunc uero de interioribus iam misteriis locuturi sumus, que in ipso sancto fonte celebrata sunt. Emissa enim certissima cautione, qua uos abrenunciare omnibus pompis diaboli, et operibus eius, et omni fornicationi diabolicae spopondistis, descendistis in fontem, fontem sacrum, fontem redemptionis, fontem sanctificatum uirtute celesti. Item: In hoc ergo fonte ante, quam uos toto corpore tingueremus, interrogauimus: Credis in Deum Patrem omnipotentem? Respondistis: Credo. Rursum interrogauimus: Credis et in Iesum Christum filium eius, qui natus est de Spiritu sancto et Maria Virgine? Respondistis singuli: Credo. Item interrogauimus: et in Spiritum sanctum? Respondistis similiter: Credo. Hoc autem facimus iuxta Domini nostri Iesu Christi saluatoris inperium, qui, cum ad patrem in celum ascenderet, discipulis suis, id est Apostolis, mandauit dicens: "Euntes docete omnes gentes, baptizantes eos in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti." Item: §. 1. Quod autem interrogauimus: Credis sanctam ecclesiam, remissionem peccatorum, carnis resurrectionem? non eo modo interrogauimus, ut quomodo in Deum sic in ecclesiam sanctam catholicam. Propterea sancta et catholica est, quia recte credit in Deum. Non ergo diximus, ut in ecclesiam quasi in Deum crederetis: sed intelligite nos dicere et dixisse, ut in ecclesia sancta et catholica conuersantes in Deum crederetis, crederetis etiam resurrectionem carnis, que futura est.

C. LXXIV. Little children are baptized through the faith and profession of others.

Likewise Isidore, On Offices, book II, [c. 24]. PART XIV. Little children are baptized with another professing because they do not yet know how to speak or believe, just as also the sick, mute, and deaf, in whose place another professes so that he may answer for them while they are baptized.

C. LXXIV. Aliorum fide et professione paruuli baptizantur.

Item Ysidorus de offitiis, libro II. [c. 24.] XIV. Pars. Paruuli alio profitente baptizantur, quia adhuc loqui uel credere nesciunt, sicut etiam egri, muti, et surdi, quorum uice alius profitetur, ut pro eis respondeat, dum baptizantur.

C. LXXV. The sick are to be baptized on the testimony of others.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 48]. If sick persons cannot answer for themselves, let them be baptized when their own people have spoken testimony to their will. The same is to be done concerning penitents.

C. LXXV. Aliorum testimonio egrotantes sunt baptizandi.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV., [c. 48.] Egrotantes, si pro se respondere non possunt, cum uoluntatis eorum testimonium sui dixerint, baptizentur. Similiter et de penitentibus agendum est.

C. LXXVI. The sacrament of faith, not faith itself, makes a little child faithful.

Likewise Augustine, [letter XXIII to Boniface]. To believe is nothing other than to have faith, and by this, when the answer is given that the little child believes, though he does not yet possess the effect of faith, the answer is given that he has faith on account of the sacrament of faith, and that he turns himself to God on account of the sacrament of conversion, because that very response also pertains to the celebration of the sacrament. Likewise. § 1. Although that faith which consists in the will of believers does not yet make the little child faithful, nevertheless the sacrament of faith itself now does, just as the answer is given that he believes; for in this way they are called faithful, not by assenting to the reality itself with the mind, but by receiving the sacrament of the reality itself.

C. LXXVI. Sacramentum fidei, non ipsa fides paruulum facit fidelem.

Item Augustinus. [epist. XXIII. ad Bonifatium] Nichil est aliud credere quam fidem habere, et per hoc, cum respondetur credere paruulus, qui fidei nondum habet effectum, respondetur fidem habere propter fidei sacramentum, et conuertere se ad Deum propter conuersionis sacramentum, quia et ipsa responsio ad celebritatem sacramenti pertinet. Item: §. 1. Paruulum, etsi nondum fides illa, que in credentium uoluntate consistit, iam tamen ipsius fidei sacramentum fidelem facit, sicut credere respondetur, ita etenim fideles uocantur, non rem ipsam mente annuendo, sed ipsius rei sacramentum percipiendo.

C. LXXVII. Another's profession does not avail one who can answer for himself.

The same in book IV On Baptism, [c. 24]. When others answer for little children so that the celebration of the sacrament may be fulfilled toward them, it assuredly avails for their consecration, because they cannot answer for themselves. But if another answers for one who can answer, it does not avail in the same way. From this rule comes that saying of the Gospel which naturally moves everyone when it is read: “He is of age; let him speak for himself.”

C. LXXVII. Alterius professio non ualet ei, qui per se respondere potest.

Idem in libro [IV.] de baptismo. [c. 24.] Cum pro paruulis alii respondent, ut inpleatur erga eos celebratio sacramenti, ualet utique ad eorum consecrationem, quia ipsi pro se respondere non possunt. At si pro eo, qui respondere potest, alius respondeat, non itidem ualet. Ex qua regula illud euangelii dictum est, quod omnes, cum legitur, naturaliter mouet: "Etatem habet; pro ipse se loquatur."

C. LXXVIII. Why triple immersion is celebrated in baptism.

Likewise Augustine in homily III. After you promised to believe, we immersed your heads three times in the sacred font. This order of baptism is celebrated with a twofold signification of the mystery. For rightly were you immersed three times, who received baptism in the name of the Holy Trinity. Rightly were you immersed three times, who received baptism in the name of Jesus Christ, who rose from the dead on the third day. For that immersion repeated three times expresses the type of the Lord’s burial, through which you were buried together with Christ in baptism and rose together with Christ in faith, so that, absolved from sins, you may live Christ in the sanctity of virtues by imitating him.

C. LXXVIII. Quare trina mersio in baptismate celebretur.

Item Augustinus in omelia III. Postquam uos credere promisistis, tertio capita uestra in sacro fonte dimersimus. Qui ordo baptismatis duplici misterii significatione celebratur. Recte enim tertio mersi estis, qui accepistis baptismum in nomine S. Trinitatis. Recte tertio mersi estis, qui accepistis baptismum in nomine Iesu Christi, qui tertia die resurrexit a mortuis. Illa enim tertio repetita dimersio typum dominicae exprimit sepulturae, per quam Christo consepulti estis in baptismo, et cum Christo resurrexistis in fide, ut peccatis absoluti in sanctitate uirtutum Christum uiuatis imitando.

C. LXXIX. Concerning those who are immersed once, not three times, in baptism.

Likewise from the Canons of the Apostles, [c. 50]. If any presbyter or bishop does not celebrate the triple immersion of the one mystery, but immerses once in baptism—which some command to be given in the Lord’s death—let him be deposed. For the Lord did not say to us, “Baptize in my death,” but: “Going, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.”

C. LXXIX. De his, qui semel, non tertio in baptismate merguntur.

Item ex Canonibus Apostolorum. [c. 50.] Si quis presbiter aut episcopus non trinam mersionem unius misterii celebret, sed semel mergat in baptismate, (quod dari a quibusdam iubetur in morte Domini), deponatur. Non enim dixit nobis Dominus: in morte mea baptizate; sed: "Euntes docete omnes gentes, baptizantes eos in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti."

C. LXXX. On the same matter.

Likewise Gregory to Bishop Leander, [book I, letter 41]. PART XV. Concerning the triple immersion of baptism, nothing can be answered more truly than what you yourselves perceived, because diversity of custom harms holy Church in no way in one faith. For our part, because we immerse three times, we signify the sacraments of the three-day burial, and while the infant is raised from the waters three times, the resurrection of the three-day period is expressed. But if someone perhaps also considers that it is done in veneration of the supreme Trinity, neither does this in any way prevent immersing those to be baptized once in the waters; for since there is one substance in three subsistences, it can in no way be reprehensible to immerse an infant in baptism either three times or once, because in three immersions the Trinity of persons can be designated, and in one the singularity of the divinity.

C. LXXX. De eodem.

Item Gregorius Leandro, Episcopo. [lib. I. epist. 41.] XV. Pars. De trina mersione baptismatis nil responderi uerius potest, quam quod ipsi sensistis, quia in una fide nil officit sanctae ecclesiae consuetudo diuersa. Nos autem, quod tertio mergimus, triduanae sepulturae sacramenta signamus, et, dum tertio ab aquis infans educitur, resurrectio triduani temporis exprimitur. Quod si quis forte etiam pro summae Trinitatis estimet ueneratione fieri, neque hoc aliquid obsistit, baptizandos semel in aquis mergere, quia, dum tribus subsistenciis una substantia est, reprehensibile esse nullatenus potest, infantem in baptismate uel ter, uel semel inmergere, quoniam et in tribus mersionibus personarum trinitatis, et in una potest diuinitatis singularitas designari.

C. LXXXI. On the same matter.

Likewise Jerome on the Letter to the Philippians, book II, [on c. 4, v. 5]. In the same way we are baptized in the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit and are immersed three times, so that the one sacrament of the Trinity may appear. Likewise. Although one is baptized three times on account of the mystery of the Trinity, nevertheless it is reckoned one baptism.

C. LXXXI. De eodem.

Item Ieronimus super Epistolam ad Philippenses, libro II. [ad c. 4. u. 5.] Eodem modo in Patre, et Filio, et Spiritu sancto baptizamur et ter mergimur, ut Trinitatis unum appareat sacramentum. Item: Licet ter baptizetur propter misterium Trinitatis, tamen unum baptisma reputatur.

C. LXXXII. Concerning those who are immersed only once in Christ's name.

Likewise Pelagius to Bishop Gaudentius. There are many who assert that they are baptized only in Christ's name, even with one immersion. But the evangelical precept, handed down by God himself, our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, admonishes us to confer holy baptism upon each person in the name of the Trinity, even with a triple immersion, as our Lord Jesus Christ says to his disciples: "Go, baptize all nations in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit."

C. LXXXII. De his, qui in Christi nomine semel tantum merguntur

Item Pelagius Gaudentio Episcopo. Multi sunt, qui in nomine Christi solummodo una etiam mersione se asserunt baptizari. Euangelicum uero preceptum, ipso Deo Domino et saluatore nostro Iesu Christo tradente, nos ammonet, in nomine Trinitatis, trina etiam mersione sanctum baptisma unicuique tribuere, dicente Domino nostro Iesu Christo discipulis suis "Ite, baptizate omnes gentes in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti."

C. LXXXIII. At the invocation of the Trinity we ought to immerse three times in baptism.

Likewise Pope Zacharias to Bishop Boniface, [in the letter whose beginning is "At the Sacred Thresholds"]. PART XVI. It is known to have been decreed in the synod of the English, most firmly commanded, and diligently demonstrated that whoever had been immersed without invocation of the Trinity did not possess the sacrament of regeneration. This is altogether true, because if anyone has been immersed in the baptismal font without invocation of the Trinity, he is not a perfect Christian unless he has been baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. § 1. The priests in the aforesaid synod also wished this to be observed: that if anyone did not name even one person of the Trinity in baptism, that baptism could not be true. This is certainly true, because one who has not confessed the name of one of the Holy Trinity cannot be a perfect Christian. For one who confesses the Father and the Son, if he has not confessed the Holy Spirit, possesses neither the Father nor the Son; and one who has confessed the Father and the Holy Spirit but has not confessed the Son possesses neither the Father nor the Holy Spirit, but is empty of divine grace.

C. LXXXIII. In inuocatione Trinitatis tertio in baptismate mergere debemus.

Item Zacharias Papa Bonifatio Episcopo. [in epist., cuius initium: "Sacris liminibus"] XVI. Pars. In sinodo Anglorum decretum, et firmissime preceptum, et diligenter demonstratum esse dinoscitur, quod quicumque sine inuocatione Trinitatis mersus fuisset, sacramentum regenerationis non haberet. Quod omnino uerum est, quia, si mersus in fonte baptismatis quis fuerit sine inuocatione Trinitatis, perfectus Christianus non est, nisi in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus sancti fuerit baptizatus. §. 1. Hoc quoque obseruari sacerdotes in supradicta sinodo uoluerunt, ut qui uel unam de Trinitate personam in baptismo non nominaret, illud baptisma uerum esse non posset. Quod pro certo uerum est, quia, qui unum ex sancta Trinitate confessus non fuerit nomen, perfectus Christianus esse non potest. Qui enim confitetur Patrem et Filium, si confessus non fuerit Spiritum sanctum, neque Patrem habet, neque Filium; et qui confessus fuerit Patrem et Spiritum sanctum, et Filium non fuerit confessus, neque Patrem habet, neque Spiritum sanctum, sed uacuus est a diuina gratia.

C. LXXXIV. Those who were not baptized in the name of the Trinity are to be rebaptized.

Likewise Gregory to Bishop Quirinus in Iberia, [book IX, letter 61]. But those heretics who are not baptized in the name of the Trinity, such as the Bonosians and Cataphrygians—because the former do not believe Christ the Lord, and the latter, with perverse understanding, believe the Holy Spirit to have been a certain depraved man, Montanus, and there are many others like them—when they come to holy Church, are to be baptized, because that was not baptism which, situated in error, they did not receive in the name of the Holy Trinity.

C. LXXXIV. Rebaptizentur qui in nomine Trinitatis baptizati non fuerint.

Item Gregorius Quirino, Episcopo in Hyberina. [lib. IX. epist. 61.] Hi uero heretici, qui in Trinitatis nomine minime baptizantur, sicut sunt Bonosiaci et Catafrigae (quia et illi Christum Dominum non credunt, et isti Spiritum S. peruerso sensu esse quendam prauum hominem Montanum credunt, quorum similes multi sunt) alii, cum ad sanctam ecclesiam ueniunt, baptizentur quia baptisma non fuit, quod in errore positi S. Trinitatis nomine minime perceperunt.

C. LXXXV. It is permitted to immerse once in baptism.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Toledo, [c. 5]. For the avoidance of the scandal of schism or the usage of heretical doctrine, let us retain the single immersion of baptism.

C. LXXXV. Semel in baptismate mergere licet.

Item ex Concilio Tolletano IV. [c. 5.] Propter uitandum scismatis scandalum, uel heretici dogmatis usum, simplam teneamus baptismi mersionem.

C. LXXXVI. Concerning a priest who, through inexperience in the Latin language, erred in the invocation of the Trinity.

Likewise Pope Zacharias to Bishop Boniface. Your messengers reported that in that same province there was a priest who was entirely ignorant of the Latin language and, while baptizing, not knowing how to speak Latin and mangling the language, would say: "I baptize you in the name of the Fatherland, and the Daughter, and the Holy Spirit." And on account of this your reverend Holiness considered rebaptizing them. But, most holy brother, if the one who baptized, introducing no error or heresy, but solely through ignorance of Roman speech and mangling the language, said this while baptizing, as we stated above, we cannot consent that they be baptized anew.

C. LXXXVI. De sacerdote, qui per inpericiam linguae latinae in inuocatione Trinitatis deliquit.

Item Zacharias Papa Bonifatio Episcopo. Retulerunt nuncii tui, quod fuerit in eadem prouincia sacerdos, qui linguam latinam penitus ignorabat, et, dum baptizaret, nesciens loqui latine, infringens linguam diceret: baptizo te in nomine Patria, et Filia, et Spiritus sancta. Et per hoc tua reuerenda sanctitas considerauit eos rebaptizare. Sed, sanctissime frater, si ille, qui baptizauit, non errorem introducens aut heresim, sed pro sola ignorantia Romanae locutionis infringendo linguam, ut supra diximus hoc baptizans dixisset, non possumus consentire, ut denuo baptizentur.

C. LXXXVII. Why those baptized are anointed by a priest.

Likewise Ambrose, On the Sacraments, tractate I, [c. 2]. PART XVII. You came to the font; you entered. Consider what you saw; carefully repeat what you said. A Levite met you, a presbyter met you; you were anointed like an athlete of God so that as a catechumen you might approach baptism.

C. LXXXVII. Quare baptizati a sacerdote ungantur.

Item Ambrosius de sacramentis, tractatu I. [c. 2.] XVII. Pars. Venisti ad fontem: ingressus es; considera quid uideris; quid locutus sis repete diligenter; occurrit tibi Leuita, occurrit tibi presbiter; unctus es quasi athleta Dei, ut ad baptismum catecuminus accedas.

C. LXXXVIII. Why one baptized is anointed on the crown of the head by a presbyter.

Likewise Rabanus in book II on the Letter to the Ephesians. After the baptized person ascends from the font, he is immediately signed on the crown of the head by the presbyter with sacred chrism, with a prayer accompanying it at the same time, so that he may become a participant in Christ's kingdom and may be called a Christian from Christ.

C. LXXXVIII. Quare baptizatus a presbitero ungatur in cerebro.

Item Rabanus in epistola ad Ephesios libro II. Postquam ascendit baptizatus de fonte, statim signatur in cerebro a presbitero cum sacro crismate, sequente simul et oratione, ut Christi regni particeps fiat et a Christo possit Christianus uocari.

C. LXXXIX. What is said over one baptized by the priest.

Likewise Ambrose, On the Sacrament, tractate II, [c. 7]. You emerged; you came to the priest. What did he say to you? "God," he says to you, "the almighty Father, who regenerated you from water and the Holy Spirit and forgave you your sins, may he himself anoint you unto eternal life." See to what you were anointed: "Unto eternal life," he says.

C. LXXXIX. Quid super baptizatum a sacerdote dicatur.

Item Ambrosius de sacramento, tractatu II. [c. 7.] Emersisti: uenisti ad sacerdotem. Quid tibi dixit? "Deus," inquit tibi, "Pater omnipotens, qui te regenerauit ex aqua et Spiritu sancto, concessitque tibi peccata tua, ipse te ungat in uitam eternam." Vide, ubi unctus es: in uitam, inquit, eternam.

C. XC. Why ointment is placed upon the head of one baptized.

Likewise, [in book III On the Sacraments, cc. 1 and 2]. You received the mystery, that is, ointment upon the head. Why upon the head? Because the senses of a wise person are in his head. [c. 2]. § 1. The spiritual seal follows, which you heard read today, which remains after the font so that perfection may be brought about when, at the invocation of the priest, the Holy Spirit is poured forth.

C. XC. Quare unguentum super caput baptizati ponatur.

Item. [in lib. III. de sacramentis c. 1. et 2.] Accepisti misterium, hoc est unguentum supra caput. Quare supra caput? quia sapientis sensus in capite eius. [c. 2.] §. 1. Sequitur spiritale signaculum, quod audistis legi hodie, quod post fontes superest, quo perfectio fiat, quando ad inuocationem sacerdotis Spiritus sanctus infunditur.

C. XCI. Why a white garment is handed to Christians.

Likewise Rabanus, On the Instruction of Clerics, [book I, c. 29]. After baptism a white garment is handed to the Christian, which signifies Christian innocence and purity; after the old stains have been washed away, he ought to preserve it immaculate by zeal for holy conduct, to present it before Christ's tribunal. All the reborn are clothed in white garments for the mystery of the rising Church. Likewise. § 1. The baptized use white garments so that the attire of second regeneration may display a garment of glory for those whose countenance at their first birth the cloth of ancient error had darkened. For after the sacred anointing his head is covered with a mystical veil so that he may understand that he possesses the diadem of the kingdom and priestly dignity.

C. XCI. Quare candida uestis traditur Christianis.

Item Rabanus de institutione clericorum. [lib. I. c. 29.] Post baptismum traditur Christiano uestis candida, que significat innocentiam et puritatem Christianam, quam post ablutas ueteres maculas studio sanctae conuersationis inmaculatam seruare debet ad representandum ante tribunal Christi. Cuncti uero renati albis induuntur uestibus ad misterium resurgentis ecclesiae Item: §. 1. Utuntur baptizati albis uestibus, ut quorum primae natiuitatis faciem uetusti erroris pannus fuscauerat habitus secundae regenerationis gloriae preferat indumentum. Tegitur enim post sacram unctionem caput eius mistico uelamine, ut intelligat, se diademate regni et sacerdotali dignitate potiri.

C. XCII. On the same matter.

Likewise Ambrose, On the Mysteries, [c. 7]. After baptism you received white garments so that it might be an indication that you had put off the pleasure of sins and put on the chaste veils of innocence.

> C. XCII. De eodem.
> Item Ambrosius de misteriis. [c. 7.] Accepisti post baptismum uestimenta candida, ut esset indicium, quod exueris uoluptatem peccatorum, et indueris innocentiae casta uelamina.

C. XCIII. For how many months Jews are to be held among the catechumens.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 34]. PART XVIII. If Jews, whose faithlessness frequently returns to its vomit, wish to come to the Catholic laws, let them enter the threshold of the Church for eight months among the catechumens; and if they are known to come with pure faith, then at last let them merit the grace of baptism. But if, through some occurrence, they encounter the danger of sickness within the prescribed time and are despaired of, let them be baptized.

> C. XCIII. Quot mensibus Iudei inter catecuminos habeantur.
>
> Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 34] XVIII. Pars. Iudei, quorum perfidia frequenter ad uomitum redit, si ad leges catholicas uenire uoluerint, octo menses inter catecuminos ecclesiae limen introeant, et, si pura fide uenire noscuntur, tunc demum baptismatis gratiam mereantur. Quod si casu aliquo periculum infirmitatis intra prescriptum tempus incurrerint, et desperati fuerint, baptizentur.

C. XCIV. Concerning the many Jews who frequently return to Judaism.

Likewise from the Fifth Council of Toledo, [c. 58]. Many of the Jews who long ago were advanced to the Christian faith are now known, while blaspheming Christ, not only to have perpetrated Jewish rites but also to practice abominable circumcisions. Concerning them, at the counsel of our most pious and religious lord King Sisenand, this holy council decreed that transgressors of this kind, corrected by pontifical authority, are to be recalled to the worship of Christian dignity, so that priestly chastisement may restrain those whom their own will does not amend. But those whom they circumcised, if they are their children, are to be separated from association with their parents; if slaves, they are to be delivered to liberty for the injury to their bodies.

> C. XCIV. De Iudeis plerisque frequenter ad Iudaismum redeuntibus.
> Item ex Concilio Tolletano V. [c. 58.] Plerique ex Iudeis, qui dudum ad Christianam fidem promoti sunt, nunc blasphemantes Christum non solum Iudaicos ritus perpetrasse noscuntur, sed etiam abhominandas circumcisiones exercere. De quibus consultu piissimi ac religiosissimi domini nostri Sisemandi regis hoc sanctum decreuit concilium, ut huiusmodi transgressores pontificali auctoritate correcti ad cultum Christianae dignitatis reuocentur, ut quos propria uoluntas non emendat animaduersio sacerdotalis coherceat. Eos autem, quos circumciderunt, si filii eorum sunt, a parentum consortio separentur; si serui, pro iniuria corporis sui libertati tradantur.

C. XCV. Before baptism we ought to renounce the devil and his works.

Likewise Rabanus, On the Instruction of Clerics, [book I, c. 27]. First let the pagan be asked whether he renounces the devil and all his harmful and deceitful works, so that he may first reject error and thus approach truth, and, according to the Apostle, may be able to put off the old human being according to his former conduct, who is corrupted according to the desires of error, renouncing impiety and secular desires.

C. XCV. Ante baptismum diabolo et eius operibus abrenunciare debemus.

Item Rabanus de institutione clericorum. [lib. I. c. 27.] Primum interrogetur paganus, si abrenunciet diabolo, et omnibus operibus eius dampnosis atque fallacibus cunctis ut primum respuat errorem, et sic appropinquet ad ueritatem, possitque iuxta Apostolum deponere ueterem hominem, secundum pristinam conuersationem, qui corrumpitur secundum desideria erroris, abnegans inpietatem et secularia desideria.

C. XCVI. One who does not repent of the old life does not pass to the new life.

Likewise Augustine, On Penance, [c. 2]. Everyone who has now been established arbiter of his own will, when he approaches the sacrament of the faithful, cannot begin the new life unless he repents of the old life. Little children alone are exempt from this penance when they are baptized, for they cannot yet use free choice.

C. XCVI. Non transit ad nouam uitam quem non penitet ueteris uitae.

Item Augustinus de penitencia. [c. 2.] Omnis, qui iam suae uoluntatis arbiter constitutus est, cum accedit ad sacramentum fidelium, nisi eum peniteat uitae ueteris, nouam non potest inchoare. Ab hac penitencia, cum baptizantur, soli paruuli inmunes sunt. Nondum enim possunt uti libero arbitrio.

C. XCVII. We ought to do penance before baptism.

The same to the man of Salecta, [letter CVIII]. Human beings do penance before baptism for their former sins, yet in such a way that they are also baptized, as is written in the Acts of the Apostles, when Peter speaks to the Jews and says: "Do penance, and let each of you be baptized in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ."

C. XCVII. Ante baptisma penitenciam agere debemus.

Idem ad Salectitanum. [epist. CVIII.] Agunt homines ante baptismum penitenciam de prioribus peccatis, ita tamen, ut etiam baptizentur, sicut scriptum est in Actibus Apostolorum, loquente Petro ad Iudeos ac dicente: "Agite penitenciam, et baptizetur unusquisque uestrum in nomine Domini nostri Iesu Christi."

C. XCVIII. Abstinence of forty days is enjoined upon Jews who are to be baptized.

Likewise Gregory to the Defender Faustinus, [book VII, letter 24]. Lest—which may it not happen—a long delay be able to call back the minds of the Jews, speak with our brother the bishop of that place, so that, after penance and abstinence of forty days have been enjoined, you may baptize them either on a Sunday or, if a most celebrated feast occurs, under the protection of almighty God's mercy.

C. XCVIII. Quadraginta dierum abstinentia Iudeis baptizandis indicatur.

Item Gregorius Faustino Defensori. [lib. VII. epist. 24.] Ne, quod absit, longa dilatio retro possit animos Iudeorum reuocare, cum fratre nostro loci illius episcopo loquere, ut, penitencia ac abstinentia quadraginta dierum indicta, aut die dominica, aut si celeberrima festiuitas occurrerit, eos omnipotentis Dei misericordia protegente baptizes.

C. XCIX. Penance is not necessary for those to be baptized.

Likewise Ambrose on the Letter to the Romans, [on c. 11]. The gifts and calling of God are without repentance, because the grace of God in baptism requires no groaning, requires no lamentation or any work, but faith alone, and freely forgives all things.

> C. XCIX. Penitencia non est necessaria baptizandis.
> Item Ambrosius super epistolam ad Romanos. [ad c. 11.] Sine penitencia sunt dona et uocatio Dei, quia gratia Dei in baptismate non requirit gemitum, non requirit planctum, uel opus aliquod, sed solam fidem, et omnia gratis condonat.

C. C. When necessity compels, the same godparent can serve in catechism and confirmation.

Likewise Pope Hyginus. PART XIX. In catechism, baptism, and confirmation, one sponsor can serve if necessity compels. Yet this is not the Roman custom, but individual persons receive individual persons.

> C. C. Necessitate cogente in catecismo et confirmatione idem conpater esse potest.
>
> Item Yginus Papa. XIX. Pars. In catecumino, et in baptismo, et in confirmatione unus patrinus fieri potest, si necessitas cogit. Non est tamen consuetudo Romana, sed singuli per singulos suscipiunt.

C. CI. Not several persons, but one, is to receive a little child in baptism.

Likewise from a decree of Pope Leo. Let no more than one person, whether man or woman, approach to receive an infant from baptism. Let the same also be done in confirmation.

> C. CI. Non plures, sed unus paruulum in baptismate suscipiat.
>
> Item ex Decreto Leonis Papae. Non plures ad suscipiendum de baptismo infantem accedant, quam unus, siue uir siue mulier. In confirmatione quoque id ipsum fiat.

C. CII. One who is neither baptized nor confirmed ought not to hold another in chrism or baptism.

Likewise from the Council of Mainz. In baptism or chrism, one who is neither baptized nor confirmed cannot receive another as a godchild.

> C. CII. Qui non est baptizatus nec confirmatus, alium in crismate uel baptismate tenere non debet.
> Item ex Concilio Magontiensi. In baptismate uel in crismate non potest alium suscipere filiolum ipse qui non est baptizatus uel confirmatus.

C. CIII. It is not permitted for an abbot or monk to have co-mothers.

Likewise from the Council of Auxerre, [c. 25]. It is not permitted for an abbot or monk to receive children from baptism or to have co-mothers.

> C. CIII. Abbati uel monacho non licet conmatres habere.
>
> Item ex Concilio Autisiodorensi. [c. 25.] Non licet abbati uel monacho de baptismo suscipere filios, nec conmatres habere.

C. CIV. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Book of Capitularies. Let monks not make for themselves co-fathers or co-mothers, nor kiss women.

> C. CIV. De eodem.
> Item ex libro Capitulorum. Monachi sibi conpatres conmatresue non faciant, nec osculentur feminas.

C. CV. Those who receive little children in baptism stand as sureties for them before God.

Likewise from a sermon of Saint Augustine after the Lord's Easter, which begins, "Today's day." Above all, I admonish you, women as well as men, who have received children in baptism, to recognize that you have stood as sureties before God for those whom you were seen to receive from the sacred font. Therefore, always admonish them to preserve chastity, love justice, and retain charity. § 1. Above all, both hold the creed and the Lord's prayer yourselves and show them to those whom you received.

> C. CV. Qui in baptismo paruulos suscipiunt, pro eis apud Deum fideiussores existunt.
> Item ex sermone S. Augustini post Pasca Domini, qui sic incipit: "Hodiernus dies". Vos ante omnia, tam mulieres quam uiros, qui filios in baptismo suscepistis, moneo, ut uos cognoscatis fideiussores apud Deum extitisse pro illis, quos uisi estis de sacro fonte suscipere. Ideo semper eos admonete, ut castitatem custodiant, iusticiam diligant, karitatem teneant. §. 1. Ante omnia simbolum et orationem dominicam et uos ipsi tenete, et illis, quos excepistis, ostendite.

C. CVI. Priests ought to have proper vessels for the office of baptizing and for washing the altar cloths.

Likewise from the Council of Lleida. PART XX. Every presbyter who has been unable to have a stone font is to have a suitable vessel solely for the office of baptizing, which is not to be carried outside the church. Similarly, proper vessels are to be kept for washing the corporal and the altar palls, in which nothing else is to be done.

> C. CVI. Ad baptizandi offitium et ad uestimenta altaris lauanda sacerdotes propria debent habere uasa.
> Item ex Concilio Ylerdensi. XX. Pars. Omnis presbiter, qui fontem lapideum habere nequiuerit, uas conueniens solummodo ad offitium baptizandi habeat, quod extra ecclesiam non deportetur. Similiter ad corporale lauandum, et ad pallas altaris propria habeantur uasa, in quibus nichil aliud fiat.

C. CVII. Neither rebaptizations nor reordinations are permitted to be performed.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 38]. PART XXI. It is not permitted for rebaptizations, reordinations, or retranslations of bishops to be performed.

> C. CVII. Neque rebaptizationes, neque reordinationes fieri licet.
>
> Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 38.] XXI. Pars. Non licet fieri rebaptizationes, reordinationes, uel retranslationes episcoporum.

C. CVIII. On the same matter.

Likewise from letter CCIII of Augustine to Maximinus. To rebaptize a heretical person who has received those signs of the Holy Trinity which Christian discipline has handed down is altogether a sin; but to rebaptize a Catholic is a most monstrous crime.

> C. CVIII. De eodem.
> Item ex epistola Augustini [CCIII.] ad Maximinum. Rebaptizare hereticum hominem, qui hec signa sanctae trinitatis perceperit, que Christiana tradidit disciplina, omnino peccatum est; rebaptizare autem catholicum inmanissimum scelus est.

C. CIX. Concerning Arians: when they are rebaptized and when not.

Likewise in the First Council of Arles, [c. 8]. Concerning Arians who use their own law, it was resolved that if any come to the Church from this heresy, the priests of our faith are to question them about the creed; and if they perceive that they were baptized in the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, only a hand is to be imposed upon them so that they may receive the Holy Spirit. But if, when questioned, they do not answer this Trinity, let them be baptized.

> C. CIX. De Arrianis, quando rebaptizentur uel quando non.
> Item in Concilio Arelatensi I. [c. 8.] De Arrianis, qui propria sua lege utuntur placuit, si ad ecclesiam aliqui de hac heresi uenerint, interrogent eos nostrae fidei sacerdotes simbolum, et, si peruiderint, eos in Patre, et Filio, et Spiritu sancto esse baptizatos, manus eis tantum inponatur, ut accipiant Spiritum sanctum. Quod si interrogati non responderint hanc Trinitatem, baptizentur.

C. CX. Those concerning whom it is unknown whether they were baptized are to be baptized.

Likewise Gregory III to Boniface, [letter IV]. Reason requires that you ought to baptize, according to the traditions of the Fathers, little children who have been taken from their parents and concerning whom it is unknown whether they were baptized or not, if there are none who can testify.

> C. CX. Baptizentur, de quibus ignoratur, an sint baptizati.
>
> Item Gregorius III. Bonifatio. [epist. IV.] Paruulos, qui parentibus subtracti sunt, et an baptizati sint an non ignoratur, ut hos baptizare debeas secundum Patrum traditiones, si non fuerint qui testificetur, ratio poscit.

C. CXI. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Fifth Council of Carthage, [c. 5]. It was resolved concerning infants that, whenever no wholly certain witnesses are found who testify without doubt that they were baptized, and the infants themselves are not by reason of age fit to answer concerning the sacraments handed down to them, they are to be baptized without any scruple, lest this hesitation cause them to be deprived of the cleansing of the sacraments. Hence also our brothers, the legates of the Moors, sought counsel, because they redeem many such persons from barbarians. The same is to be done concerning churches whenever there is hesitation over their consecration; that is, they are to be consecrated without any hesitation.

> C. CXI. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi V. [c. 5.] Placuit de infantibus, quociens non inueniuntur certissimi testes, qui eos baptizatos esse sine dubitatione testentur, neque ipsi sunt per etatem idonei de traditis sibi sacramentis respondere, absque ullo scrupulo eos esse baptizandos, ne ista trepidatio eos faciat sacramentorum purgatione priuari. Hinc etiam legati Maurorum fratres nostri consuluerunt, quia multos tales a barbaris redimunt. Similiter et de ecclesiis, quociens super earum consecratione hesitatur, agendum est, id est, ut sine ulla trepidatione consecrentur.

C. CXII. On the same matter.

Likewise Pope Leo to Leo, Bishop of Ravenna, [letter XXXV, c. 1]. Therefore, when one who desires regeneration remembers nothing of his baptism and no other person who knows that he was consecrated can attest concerning him, nor can the one who is consecrated—indeed, we know it to be an inexpiable crime whenever, according to the dogmas of heretics and contrary to the institutions of the holy Fathers, someone is compelled to undergo twice the washing once bestowed upon those to be regenerated, while the apostolic sentence protests, preaching to us one divinity in the Trinity, one confession in faith, and one sacrament in baptism. But nothing similar is feared in this case, since what is altogether unknown to have been done cannot fall into the crime of repetition. And therefore, whenever such a person should appear, first examine the matter with solicitous inquiry, and for a long time—unless perhaps the final end threatens—investigate whether there is utterly no one who can assist the ignorance of the one who does not know by his testimony. And when it has been established that this person, who needs the sacrament of baptism, is prohibited by empty suspicion alone, let him approach without fear to obtain the grace of which he knows there is no trace in himself; nor should we fear to open for him the gate of salvation which he is never shown to have entered before.

C. CXII. De eodem.

Item Leo Papa Rauennae Episcopo Leoni. [epist. XXXV. c. 1.] Cum itaque baptismi sui nichil recordetur qui regenerationis est cupidus, nec alter attestari de eo possit, qui sciat consecratum, nec ille, qui consecratur. Scimus quidem, inexpiabile esse facinus, quociens iuxta hereticorum dogmata contra sanctorum Patrum instituta cogitur aliquis lauacrum, quod regenerandis semel tributum est, bis subire, apostolica reclamante sentencia, que nobis unam predicat in Trinitate deitatem, unam in fide confessionem, unum in baptismate sacramentum. Sed in hoc nichil simile formidatur, quoniam non potest in iterationis crimen uenire quod factum esse nescitur omnino. Atque ideo, quociens persona talis inciderit, solicita primum examinatione discutite, et longo tempore (nisi forte supremus finis inmineat) indagate, utrum nemo penitus sit, qui testimonio suo iuuare possit ignorantiam nescientis, et, cum constiterit, hunc, qui baptismatis indiget sacramento, sola inaniter suspicione prohiberi, accedat intrepidus ad consequendam gratiam, cuius in se nullum scit esse uestigium, nec uereamur huic ianuam salutis aperire, quam numquam docetur ante ingressus.

C. CXIII. On the same matter.

The same, [letter XC, otherwise XCII, to Rusticus, c. 16]. If no indications exist among relatives and associates, none among clerics or neighbors, by which those concerning whom inquiry is made are shown to have been baptized, it is to be arranged that they be reborn, lest they manifestly perish; in their case, since what is not shown to have been done cannot by any rationale be regarded as repeated. But those who can remember that they used to come to church with their parents can remember whether they received what was given to their parents. Yet if this too is foreign to their memory, it seems that what is not known to have been conferred should be conferred upon them, because there is no rashness of presumption where there is diligence of piety.

C. CXIII. De eodem.

Idem. [epist. XC. al. XCII. ad Rusticum c. 16.] Si nulla extant indicia inter propinquos et familiares, nulla inter clericos aut uicinos, quibus hi, de quibus queritur, baptizati fuisse doceantur, agendum est, ut renascantur, ne manifeste pereant, in quibus, quod non ostenditur gestum, nulla ratio sinit ut uideatur iteratum. Qui autem possunt meminisse, quod ad ecclesiam ueniebant cum parentibus, possunt recordari, an quod eorum parentibus dabatur acceperint. Sed si hoc etiam ab ipsa memoria alienum est, conferendum eis uidetur quod collatum esse nescitur, quia non temeritas interuenit presumptionis, ubi est diligentia pietatis.

C. CXIV. Whatever is in a mother's body is not baptized with the mother.

Likewise Augustine, Against Julian, [book VI, c. 5]. PART XXII. If that which is conceived in a mother pertained to her body in such a way as to be reckoned a part of it, an infant whose mother was baptized while carrying him in the womb, when some danger of death pressed, would not be baptized. But now, since he too is baptized, he assuredly did not pertain to the maternal body when he was in the womb.

C. CXIV. Non baptizatur cum matre, quicquid in eius corpore est.

Item Augustinus contra Iulianum. [lib. VI. c. 5.] XXII. Pars. Si ad matris corpus id, quod in ea concipitur, pertineret ita, ut eius pars deputetur, non baptizaretur infans, cuius mater baptizata est aliquo mortis urgente periculo, cum eum gestaret in utero. Nunc uero cum etiam ipse baptizetur, non utique ad maternum corpus, cum esset in utero, pertinebat.

C. CXV. Why one who is in his mother's womb is not baptized with her.

Likewise Isidore, Sentences, book I. Those who are in their mothers' wombs cannot be baptized with their mother for this reason: one who has not yet been born according to Adam cannot be regenerated according to Christ. For regeneration cannot be said to occur in one whom generation has not preceded. § 1. Let those who live criminally in the Church and do not cease to communicate, thinking that they are cleansed by such communion, learn that it profits them nothing for cleansing.

C. CXV. Quare non baptizatur cum matre qui in eius utero est.

Item Ysidorus sententiarum libro I. Qui in maternis uteris sunt, ideo cum matre baptizari non possunt, quia qui natus adhuc secundum Adam non est, regenerari secundum Christum non potest. Neque enim dici regeneratio in eum potest, quem generatio non precessit. §. 1. Qui scelerate uiuunt in ecclesia, et conmunicare non desinunt, putantes, se tali conmunione mundari, discant, nichil ad emundationem proficere sibi.

C. CXVI. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 54]. If any pregnant woman desires to receive the grace of baptism, let her have the power whenever she wishes. For the mother shares nothing in this with the infant who is born, because each person's own will is manifested in confession.

C. CXVI. De eodem.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 54.] Si qua mulier pregnans desiderauerit gratiam baptismi percipere, quando uoluerit, habeat potestatem. Nam nichil participat in hoc mater infanti, qui nascitur, propterea, quod unicuique propria uoluntas in confessione monstratur.

C. CXVII. Concerning those who are baptized twice unknowingly.

Likewise from the Penitential of Theodore. PART XXIII. Those who have been baptized twice unknowingly do not need to do penance for it, except that according to the canons they cannot be ordained unless some great necessity compels.

But those who were baptized again not in ignorance, because they as it were crucified Christ again, are to do penance for seven years on Wednesday and Friday and during three Lents. If they did it because of some vice, likewise. If they thought they did it for cleansing, let them similarly do penance for three years.

C. CXVII. De his, qui ignoranter bis baptizantur.

Item ex Penitenciali Theodori. XXIII. Pars. Qui bis ignoranter baptizati sunt, non indigent pro eo penitere, nisi quod secundum canones ordinari non possunt, nisi magna aliqua cogat necessitas.

Qui autem non ignari baptizati sunt iterum, quia quasi iterum crucifixerunt Christum, per septem annos peniteant quarta et sexta feria, et tres Quadragesimas. Si pro uicio aliquo fecerint, similiter. Si pro mundicia putauerint, tres annos similiter peniteant.

C. CXVIII. Concerning those who are baptized twice deliberately.

Likewise Pope Felix III, [letter I, c. 2 and following]. Those who are established to have been bishops, presbyters, or deacons, and who are shown, whether perhaps willingly or under compulsion, to have made shipwreck of that one washing, ought—if they recover their senses—to lie in penance until the day of their departure and in every way to participate neither in the prayer of the faithful nor even of the catechumens; only lay communion is to be restored to them at death. § 1. But concerning clerics, monks, virgins of God, or secular persons, we command that this tenor be observed which the Nicene Synod established was to be observed among those who have fallen or shall fall: namely, that those who, under no necessity and from fear or danger of no thing, impiously handed themselves over to heretics to be rebaptized, if nevertheless they repent from the heart, are to be among the hearers for three years; for seven years they are to be subjected among the penitents to the hands of the priests; for two years they are in every way not to be permitted to offer oblations, but are only to be joined to the people in prayer. And let those who did not fear to deny God not be ashamed to bow their necks to him. § 2. But to boys, who are called from puberty because they are still beardless, whether clerics or laypersons, and also to similar girls, for whom ignorance of age lends support, communion is to be restored after they have been detained for some time under imposition of a hand; nor is the penance of those whom a censure excepts for correction to be awaited.

C. CXVIII. De his, qui ex industria bis baptizantur.

Item Felix Papa. [III., epist. I. c. 2. et seqq.] Eos, quos episcopos, presbiteros uel diaconos fuisse constiterit, et seu optantes forsitan, seu coactos lauacri illius unici claruerit fecisse iacturam, usque ad exitus sui diem in penitencia (si resipiscunt) iacere conuenit, nec orationi non modo fidelium, sed nec catecuminorum quidem omnimodis interesse; quibus laica tantum conmunio in morte reddenda est. §. 1. De clericis autem, et monachis, et puellis Dei, aut secularibus, seruari precipimus hunc tenorem, quem Nicena sinodus inter eos, qui lapsi sunt uel fuerint, seruandum esse constituit: ut scilicet, qui nulla necessitate, nullius rei timore atque periculo, se, ut rebaptizarentur, hereticis inpie dederunt, si tamen eos ex corde peniteat, tribus annis inter audientes sint; septem uero subiaceant inter penitentes manibus sacerdotum; duobus etiam oblationes modis omnibus non sinantur offerre, sed tantummodo popularibus in oratione socientur, nec confundantur Deo colla submittere qui eum non timuerunt abnegare. §. 2. Pueris autem, quibus, quod adhuc inberbes sunt, a pubertate uocabulum est, seu clericis seu laicis, aut etiam similibus puellis, quibus ignorantia suffragatur etatis, aliquamdiu sub manus inpositione detentis reddenda est conmunio, nec eorum exspectanda penitencia, quos excipit ad cohercionem censura.

C. CXIX. Presbyters are permitted to anoint the baptized with chrism.

Likewise Pope Innocent to Bishop Decentius, [letter I, c. 3]. PART XXIV. Let presbyters—whether in the bishop's absence or in his presence when they baptize—be permitted to anoint the baptized with chrism, but with chrism that has been consecrated by the bishop; they are not, however, to sign the forehead with the same oil, because this is owed to bishops alone when they hand on the Paraclete.

C. CXIX. Presbiteris baptizatos crismate ungere licet.

Item Innocentius Papa Decentio Episcopo. [epist. I. c. 3.] XXIV. Pars. Presbiteris (seu extra episcopum seu presente episcopo cum baptizant) crismate baptizatos ungere liceat, sed quod ab episcopo fuerit consecratum; non tamen frontem ex eodem oleo signare, quod solis debetur episcopis, cum tradunt paraclitum.

C. CXX. Presbyters are not permitted to anoint the baptized on their foreheads.

Likewise from the Register of Gregory to Januarius, Bishop of Cagliari, [book III, letter 9]. Let presbyters not presume to sign baptized infants on their foreheads with sacred chrism. But let presbyters anoint the baptized on the breast so that bishops may afterward confirm them on the forehead.

C. CXX. Baptizatos in frontibus presbiteris ungere non licet.

Item ex Registro Gregorii ad Ianuarium, Episcopum Carolitanum. [lib. III. epist. 9.] Presbiteri baptizatos infantes signare in frontibus sacro crismate non presumant. Sed presbiteri baptizatos ungant in pectore, ut episcopi postmodum confirment in fronte.

C. CXXI. It is permitted to smear the chrism cloth a second time and place it upon another baptized person.

Likewise from the Council at Beauvais. If anyone wishes to smear a cloth with chrism again and place it upon another baptized person, it is not absurd.

C. CXXI. Crismatis pannum secundo linire, et super alium baptizatum mittere licet.

Item ex Concilio apud Beluacum. Si quis uoluerit crismate pannum iterum linire, et super alium baptizatum mittere, non est absurdum.

C. CXXII. It is not permitted to consecrate baptism with old chrism.

Likewise from the Council of Lyon. If anyone has attempted to baptize using chrism other than that new chrism which he received by the generosity or concession of his own bishop, unless death forestalls him, he is manifestly shown by the audacity of his temerity to have pronounced upon himself the sentence of his own condemnation.

C. CXXII. De ueteri crismate baptisma consecrare non licet.

Item ex Concilio Lugdunensi. Si quis de alio crismate, quam de illo nouo, quod proprii episcopi largitione uel concessione accepit, baptizare, nisi preoccupante morte, temptauerit, pro temeritatis ausu ipse in se suae dampnationis protulisse sententiam manifestatur.

C. CXXIII. They are to receive chrism only from their own bishops.

Likewise from the Council at Valencia. Presbyters who govern diocesan churches are to seek chrism before the solemnity of Easter, not from any bishops whatever but from their own, and not through a junior cleric but by themselves or through one who is of the same order.

C. CXXIII. Non nisi a propriis episcopis crisma accipiant.

Item ex Concilio apud Valentiam. Presbiteri, qui diocesianas regunt ecclesias, non a quibuslibet episcopis, sed a suo, nec per iuniorem clericum, sed per se ipsos, aut per illum, qui eiusdem ordinis sit, ante Pascae solempnitatem crisma petant.

C. CXXIV. A bishop is permitted at every time to confect chrism and send it throughout the dioceses.

Likewise from the Council of Pope Martin, [c. 51 and following]. Let a bishop be permitted at every time to confect chrism and send it throughout his dioceses, in such a way that a deacon or subdeacon is sent from the individual churches to the bishop before Easter day to receive chrism. § 1. But let a presbyter not sign infants in the bishop's presence unless perhaps it was commanded him by the bishop. § 2. Nor is a presbyter permitted to enter the baptistery before the bishop, but with the bishop, unless perhaps the bishop is absent or sick.

C. CXXIV. Conficere crisma et per dioceses destinare omni tempore episcopo licet.

Item ex Concilio Martini Papae. [c. 51. et seqq.] Omni tempore liceat episcopo crisma conficere, et per suas dioceses destinare ita, ut ad accipiendum crisma diaconus aut subdiaconus ante diem Pascae de singulis ecclesiis ad episcopum destinetur. §. 1. Presbiter uero presente episcopo non signet infantes, nisi forte ab episcopo fuerit illi preceptum. §. 2. Nec liceat presbitero prius episcopo in baptisterium introire, sed cum episcopo, nisi forte aut absens fuerit, aut egrotus.

C. CXXV. One who receives the office of baptizing ought not to set out without chrism.

Likewise from the Council of Orange, [c. 1]. No minister who receives the office of baptizing ought to proceed anywhere without chrism, because it was resolved among us that one is to be chrismated once in baptism. But concerning one who, in baptism, through whatever necessity, was not chrismated, the priest is to be admonished at confirmation. For among us there is only one blessing of the chrism itself. We say this without prejudicing anyone, but so that chrismation may be regarded as necessary.

C. CXXV. Qui baptizandi accipit offitium sine crismate proficisci non debet.

Item ex Concilio Aurasico. [c. 1.] Nullus ministrorum, qui baptizandi recipit offitium, sine crismate usquam debet progredi, quia inter nos placuit semel in baptismate crismari. De eo autem, qui in baptismate, quacumque necessitate faciente, crismatus non fuerit, in confirmatione sacerdos conmonebitur. Nam inter nos crismatis ipsius non nisi una benedictio est. Non preiudicantes cuiquam hoc dicimus, sed ut necessaria habeatur crismatio.

C. CXXVI. Before chrism is poured in, it is permitted to take water from the font for sprinkling.

Likewise the Capitularies, book VI, c. 77. On the holy Sabbath of Easter or Pentecost, if anyone wishes to receive consecrated water for sprinkling in his house, let him receive it before the chrism is poured in.

C. CXXVI Ante, quam crisma infundatur, ad aspergendum aquam de fonte accipere licet.

Item Capitularium libro VI. c. 77. In sabbato sancto Pascae uel Pentecostes si quis uelit aquam consecratam ad aspersionem in domo sua recipere, ante crismatis infusionem recipiat.

C. CXXVII. Whence sanctification by sprinkling took its beginning.

Likewise Cyprian, [book IV, letter 7 to Magnus]. Nor ought it to trouble anyone that the sick are commanded to be sprinkled or have water poured over them when they obtain the Lord's grace, since holy Scripture speaks through the prophet Ezekiel and says: "I shall sprinkle clean water upon you, and you shall be cleansed from all your uncleannesses, and I shall cleanse you from all your idols; and I shall give you a new heart, and I shall give a new spirit within you." Likewise in Numbers. § 1. "He who touches the corpse of a human being and for this reason is unclean for seven days is to be sprinkled with this water on the third and seventh day, and thus he shall be cleansed." § 2. If he has not been cleansed by faith in the Trinity, at the resurrection he shall be unclean among the assembly of the saints. "If he has not been sprinkled on the third day, he will not be able to be cleansed on the seventh. Everyone who touches the dead body of a human soul and has not been sprinkled with this mixture shall pollute the Lord's tabernacle and shall perish from Israel; because he has not been sprinkled with the water of expiation, he shall be unclean, and his filth shall remain upon him." And again: "And the Lord spoke to Moses, saying: Take the Levites from the midst of the children of Israel, and you shall purify them; and thus you shall perform their purification for them: you shall sprinkle them round about with the water of purification." And again: "The water of sprinkling is purification."

From this it appears that the sprinkling of water also obtains the likeness of the saving washing; and when these things are done in the Church, it is known most truly that through the faith of the recipient and the giver all things stand whole and can be consummated and perfected by the majesty of the Lord and the truth of faith. § 3. The Holy Spirit, however, is not given by measure but is poured out whole upon believers. For if the day rises equally for all and if the sun is diffused over all with like and equal light, how much more does the true sun and day in his Church bestow the light of eternal life with like equality? We see the sacrament of this equality celebrated in Exodus, when manna flowed down from heaven and, by prefiguration of future things, showed the nourishment of heavenly bread and the food of the Christ who was to come. For there each person, without distinction either of sex or age, gathered equally a gomor. From this it appeared that Christ's indulgence and the heavenly grace which would afterward follow were divided equally among all, without variety of sex, without distinction of years, without acceptance of person, and that the gift of spiritual grace was poured out upon all God's people. Certainly the same spiritual grace which is received equally by believers in baptism is afterward either diminished or increased in our conduct and action, just as in the Gospel the Lord's seed is sown equally; but according to the variety of the soil, some is consumed, while some, abounding unto a manifold supply of fruit of the thirtieth, sixtieth, or hundredth number, is heaped up. § 4. But if anyone is troubled by the fact that certain of those who are baptized while sick are still held by unclean spirits, let him know that the persistent wickedness of the devil prevails up to the saving water, but in baptism loses all the poison of its wickedness. We perceive an example of this in King Pharaoh, who, long resisting and lingering in his faithlessness, was able to resist and prevail until he came to the water; but when he came to it, he was both conquered and extinguished. Blessed Paul the Apostle declares that sea to have been the sacrament of baptism, saying: "For I do not wish you to be ignorant, brothers, that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea, and all were baptized in Moses in the cloud and in the sea"; and he added, saying: "But all these things were figures of us." This assuredly is what occurs today: through exorcists, by a human voice and divine power, the devil is scourged, burned, and tormented; and although he often says that he will depart and release the human beings, he nevertheless lies in what he says and exercises, with the same manner of obstinacy and fraud, that which was previously enacted through Pharaoh. Yet when one comes to the saving water and to the sanctification of baptism, we ought to know and trust that there the devil is crushed and the human being dedicated to God is liberated by divine indulgence.

C. CXXVII. Unde aspersionis sanctificatio exordium sumpsit.

Item Ciprianus. [lib. IV. epist. 7. ad Magnum] Nec quemquam mouere debet, quod aspergi uel perfundi iubentur egri, cum gratiam dominicam consecuntur, cum sancta scriptura per Ezechielem prophetam loquatur et dicat: "Aspergam super uos aquam mundam, et mundabimini ab omnibus inmundiciis uestris, et ab omnibus simulachris uestris mundabo uos; et dabo uobis cor nouum, et spiritum nouum dabo in uobis." Item in Numeris: §. 1. "Qui tetigerit cadauer hominis, et propter hoc septem diebus fuerit inmundus, aspergatur ex hac aqua die tertia et septima, et sic mundabitur." §. 2. Si fide Trinitatis mundatus non fuerit, in resurrectione apud sanctorum collegium inmundus erit. "Si die tertio aspersus non fuerit, septimo non poterit emundari. Omnis, qui tetigerit humanae animae morticinium, et aspersus ex hac conmixtione non fuerit, polluet tabernaculum Domini, et peribit ex Israel, quia aqua expiationis non est aspersus inmundus erit, et manebit spurcitia eius super eum." Et iterum: "Et locutus est Dominus ad Moisen, dicens: Accipe Leuitas de medio filiorum Israel, et purificabis eos, et ita facies eis purificationem eorum, circumsparges eos aqua purificationis." Et iterum: "Aqua asparsionis purificatio est."

Unde apparet, asparsionem quoque aquae instar salutaris lauacri obtinere, et, quando hec in ecclesia fiunt uerissime scitur per accipientis et dantis fidem, integra omnia stare, et consummari ac perfici posse maiestate Domini, et fidei ueritate. §. 3. Spiritus uero sanctus non de mensura datur, sed super credentes infunditur totus. Nam si dies omnibus equaliter nascitur, et si sol super omnes pari et equali luce diffunditur: quanto magis sol et dies uerus in ecclesia sua lumen uitae eternae pari equalitate largitur? Cuius equalitatis sacramentum uidemus in Exodo esse celebratum, cum de celo manna deflueret, et futurorum prefiguratione alimentum panis celestis, et cibum Christi uenientis ostenderet. Illic enim sine discrimine uel sexus uel etatis gomor singuli equaliter colligebant. Unde apparebat, Christi indulgentiam et celestem gratiam postmodum secuturam equaliter omnibus diuidi, sine sexus uarietate, sine annorum discrimine, sine acceptione personae super omnem Dei populum spiritualis gratiae munus infundi. Plane eadem gratia spiritualis, que in baptismo equaliter a credentibus sumitur, in conuersatione atque actu nostro postmodum uel minuitur, uel augetur, ut in euangelio dominicum semen equaliter seminatur; sed pro uarietate terrae aliud absumitur aliud in multiformem copiam uel trigesimi, uel sexagesimi, uel centesimi numeri fructum exuberans cumulatur. §. 4. Quod si aliquis in illo mouetur, quod quidam de his, qui egri baptizantur, spiritibus adhuc inmundis teneantur, sciat, diaboli nequiciam pertinacem usque ad aquam salutarem ualere; in baptismo uero omnis nequitiae suae uirus amittere. Quod exemplum cernimus in rege Pharaone, qui diu reluctatus et in sua perfidia demoratus, tamdiu resistere potuit et preualere, donec ad aquam ueniret, quo cum uenisset, et uictus est et exstinctus. Mare illud sacramentum baptismi fuisse declarat B. Paulus apostolus, dicens: "Nolo enim uos ignorare, fratres, quia patres nostri omnes sub nube fuerunt, et omnes per mare transierunt, et omnes in Moyse baptizati sunt in nube, et in mari," et addidit, dicens: "Hec autem omnia figurae nostrae fuerunt." Quod hodie uidelicet per exorcistas uoce humana, et potestate diuina flagelletur, et uratur, et torqueatur diabolus, et cum se exire, et homines dimittere sepe dicat, in eo tamen, quod dixerit, fallat, et id, quod per Pharaonem prius gestum est, eodem modo obstinationis et fraudis exerceat. Cum tamen ad aquam salutarem atque ad baptismi sanctificationem uenitur, scire debemus et fidere, quia illic diabolus opprimitur, et homo Deo dicatus diuina indulgentia liberatur.

C. CXXVIII. Concerning those who defer receiving baptism until the end of life.

Likewise John Chrysostom on the Letter to the Hebrews, [homily XIII on c. 7]. PART XXV. When someone sins for this reason, that he may receive holy baptism at his final expiration, perhaps he does not attain it. And believe me: I do not say what I am about to say to terrify you. I have known many who suffered this, who committed many sins in the hope of baptism but departed empty near the day of death. For God gave baptism for this reason, that it might dissolve sins, not add them. But if anyone uses baptism for this purpose, that he may offend more greatly, it becomes itself a cause of negligence.

C. CXXVIII. De his, qui usque ad exitum uitae suscipere baptisma differunt.

Item Iohannes Crisostomus in epistola ad Ebreos. [homil. XIII. ad c. 7.] XV. Pars. Quando quis propterea peccat, ut sanctum baptisma in nouissima sua expiratione suscipiat, fortassis non adipiscitur. Et credite michi, non terrens uos dico quod dicturus sum. Multos noui, qui hoc passi sunt, qui spe baptismatis multa peccabant, circa diem autem mortis discesserunt uacui; Deus enim propter hoc baptisma tribuit, ut soluat peccata, non addat. Si uero quis ad hoc utitur baptismo, ut ampliora delinquat, ipsum fit negligentiae causa.

C. CXXIX. The faithlessness of parents does not harm baptized little children.

Likewise Augustine to Boniface, [letter XXIII]. PART XXVI. You ask me whether parents harm their baptized little children when they try to heal them by sacrifices to demons: how does the faith of the parents profit them when they are baptized, while their faithlessness cannot harm them? To this I answer that the power of that sacrament, that is, of saving baptism, in the holy structure of Christ's body is so great that one who has once been generated through the will of others cannot thereafter be bound by the bond of another's iniquity, to which he does not consent by any will of his own. "For both the soul of the father is mine," he says, "and the soul of the son. The soul that sins, it shall die." For the soul itself does not sin when its parents, while it is wholly ignorant, or anyone else employs the sacrileges of demons. But it drew from Adam that which was to be dissolved by the grace of that sacrament because it was not yet a soul living separately, that is, another soul, concerning which it might be said: "Both the soul of the father is mine and the soul of the son." Therefore, when the human being has now been made another in himself from the one who begot him, he is not held liable for another's sin without his own consciousness. § 1. How, then, do adults sin against a little child when, presenting him, they try to bind him with the sacrilegious bonds of demons? The soul is not common to them both so that they can also have a common fault. For fault is not shared through another's will in the same way that grace is shared through the unity of the Holy Spirit. Likewise. The regenerating Holy Spirit is common to the adults who present and to the little child who is reborn and presented. The same. Through this fellowship of one and the same Spirit, the will of those presenting profits the little child presented. For one Spirit can be in both this human being and that one, even if they do not know one another, through whom the grace of both is common. But the human spirit through which one sins cannot belong both to this person and that, so that, while the other does not sin, the fault is nevertheless common. And by this, a little child once generated from the flesh of his parents can be regenerated by God's Spirit so that the obligation contracted from them may be dissolved. But one once regenerated by God's Spirit cannot be generated again from the flesh of his parents so that the obligation which was dissolved may be contracted again. And therefore a little child does not lose the grace of Christ once received except by his own impiety. § 2. Nevertheless, parents or whatever adults who try to bind their children or any baptized little children by the sacrileges of demons are rightly called spiritual murderers. For they do not indeed accomplish the killing in them, but, so far as lies in them, they become killers. Therefore it is rightly said to them when they are prohibited from this crime: "Do not kill your little children." For the Apostle says, "Do not extinguish the Spirit," not because he can be extinguished, but those who act so as to wish him extinguished are deservedly called, so far as lies in them, his extinguishers. § 3. Nor let that move you, etc. And below: For necessary ministries are celebrated through them. Little children are indeed presented to receive spiritual grace not so much by those in whose hands they are carried—although also by them, if they too are good believers—as by the universal society of saints and believers. For they are rightly understood to be presented by all to whom it is pleasing that they are presented and by whose holy and indivisible charity they are assisted toward communion in the Holy Spirit. Therefore the whole Mother Church, which is in the saints, does this, because as a whole she gives birth to all and as a whole to each. § 4. You seemed indeed to have proposed a most difficult question at the end of your inquiry, namely with that intention by which you are accustomed vehemently to guard against falsehood. If, you say, I place a little child before you and ask whether, when he comes to adult age, he will be chaste or a thief, or will not be one, you will without doubt answer: "I do not know"; and whether, situated in the same infant age, he thinks anything good or evil, you will say: "I do not know." Therefore, if you dare promise nothing certain concerning his future conduct or concerning his present thought, what else is it that, when they are presented for baptism, the parents answer for them as guarantors of the faith and say that they do what that age cannot think, or, if it can, it is hidden? For we ask those by whom they are presented and say: "Does he believe in God?" concerning an age which does not know whether God exists. They answer: "He believes"; and to the other things that are asked individually the answer is made thus. Hence I wonder that parents answer so confidently for the little child in these matters that they say he does such great good things when the baptizer asks at the hour when he is baptized; yet if at the same hour I add, "Will the one being baptized be chaste or a thief, or will he not?" I do not know whether anyone would dare to say, "He will be one of these," or "He will not," as he answers me without doubt that the child believes in God or turns himself to God. § 5. Behold, I do what I can. May the Lord help me to be able to do what you request. We often speak in such a way that, when Easter approaches, we call tomorrow or the day after tomorrow the Lord's Passion, although he suffered many years ago and the Passion itself was accomplished altogether only once. On the Lord's day itself we say: "Today the Lord rose," although so many years have passed since he rose. Why is no one so foolish as to accuse us of lying when we speak thus, unless because we name these days according to the likeness of those on which these things were done, so that the day which is not that very day by revolution of time but is similar to it is called that very day, and what was done not on that day but long ago is said to be done on that day because of the celebration of the sacrament? § 6. Therefore the little child, etc. And below: § 7. But when the human being begins to understand, he does not repeat that sacrament, but understands it and will be joined to its truth by a consonant will. As long as he cannot do this, the sacrament will avail for his protection against contrary powers; and it will avail so greatly that, if before the use of mature age he migrates from this life, through the sacrament itself, with the charity of the Church commending him, he is freed by Christian aid from that condemnation which entered the world through one human being. One who does not believe this and thinks it cannot occur is assuredly an unbeliever, even if he possesses the sacrament of faith; and far better is this little child who, although he does not yet have faith in thought, nevertheless does not oppose to it the obstacle of contrary thought, whence he receives its sacrament salutarily.

C. CXXIX. Paruulis baptizatis parentum non nocet perfidia.

Item Augustinus ad Bonifatium. [epist. XXIII.] XXVI. Pars. Queris a me utrum parentes baptizatis paruulis suis noceant, cum eos demoniorum sacrificiis sanare conantur quomodo eis prosit parentum fides, cum baptizantur, quorum non potest eis obesse perfidia? Ubi respondeo, tantam illius sacramenti uirtutem esse, hoc est baptismi salutaris, in sancta conpage corporis Christi, ut semel generatus per aliorum uoluntatem deinceps non possit uinculo alienae iniquitatis obstringi, cui nulla sua uoluntate consentit. "Et anima enim patris mea est," inquit, "et anima filii. Anima, que peccauerit, ipsa morietur." Non enim peccat ipsa, cum parentes eius omnino nescienti uel quilibet alius adhibet sacrilegia demoniorum. Sed ideo ex Adam traxit, quod sacramenti illius gratia solueretur, quia nondum erat anima separatim uiuens, id est altera anima, de qua diceretur: "Et anima patris mea est, et anima filii." Iam itaque cum homo in se ipso est ab eo, qui genuit, alter effectus, peccato alterius sine sua conscientia non tenetur obnoxius. §. 1. Quomodo itaque in paruulum maiores peccant offerentes eum, obligare conantes demonum sacrilegis uinculis? non est anima utrorumque communis, ut etiam culpam possint habere communem. Non enim sic conmunicatur culpa per alterius uoluntatem, quemadmodum gratia conmunicatur per S. Spiritus unitatem. Item: Regenerans Spiritus sanctus in maioribus offerentibus et paruulo renato oblatoque communis est. Idem: Per hanc societatem unius eiusdemque Spiritus prodest offerentium uoluntas paruulo oblato. Potest enim et in hoc, et in illo homine unus Spiritus esse, etiamsi se inuicem nesciant, per quem sit utriusque gratia communis; non autem potest spiritus hominis esse et huius, et illius, per quem peccat alter, ut altero non peccante, sit tamen culpa communis. Ac per hoc potest paruulus ex parentum carne semel generatus Dei spiritu regenerari, ut ex illis obligatio contracta soluatur. Non potest autem Dei spiritu semel regeneratus ex parentum carne regenerari, ut obligatio, que soluta est, iterum contrahatur. Et ideo semel perceptam paruulus gratiam Christi non amittit, nisi propria inpietate. §. 2. Verumtamen recte dicuntur parentes, uel quicumque maiores, filios seu quoslibet paruulos baptizatos demoniorum sacrilegiis obligare conantes, spiritaliter homicidae. Nam in illis quidem interfectionem non faciunt, sed, quantum in ipsis est, interfectores fiunt, recte ergo illis dicitur, quando ab hoc scelere prohibentur: nolite occidere paruulos uestros. Dicit enim Apostolus: "Spiritum nolite exstinguere," non quia ille exstingui potest, sed, quantum in ipsis est, exstinctores eius merito dicuntur, qui sic agunt, ut exstinctum uelint. §. 3. Nec illud te moueat etc. Et infra: Celebrantur enim per eos necessaria ministeria. Offeruntur quippe paruuli ad percipiendam spiritalem gratiam non tam ab eis, quorum gestantur manibus, (quamuis et ab ipsis, si et ipsi boni fideles sunt), quam ab uniuersa societate sanctorum atque fidelium. Ab omnibus namque offerri recte intelliguntur, quibus placet, quod offeruntur, et quorum sancta atque indiuidua karitate ad conmunionem S. Spiritus adiuuantur. Tota hoc ergo mater ecclesia, que in sanctis est, facit, quia tota omnes, tota singulos parit. §. 4. Difficillimam sane questionem tibi proposuisse uisus es in extremo inquisitionis tuae, ea uidelicet intentione, qua soles uehementer cauere mendacium. Si constituam, inquis, ante te paruulum, et interrogem, utrum, cum ad etatem adultam uenerit, futurus sit castus, uel fur, uel non sit futurus? sine dubio respondebis: nescio; et utrum in eadem paruula etate constitutus cogitet aliquid boni uel mali? dices: nescio. Si itaque de moribus eius futuris certi nichil audes promittere, et de eius presenti cogitatione quid est aliud, quod, quando ad baptismum offeruntur parentes pro eis tamquam fidei auctores respondent, et dicunt illos facere quod illa etas cogitare non potest, aut, si potest, occultum est? Interrogamus enim eos, a quibus offeruntur, et dicimus: Credit in Deum? de illa etate, que utrum sit Deus ignorat. Respondent: Credit et ad cetera que singula, queruntur sic respondetur. Unde miror, parentes in istis rebus tam fidenter pro paruulo respondere, ut dicant, eum tanta bona facere, que ad horam, qua baptizatur, baptizator interrogat, tamen eadem hora, si subiciam, erit castus qui baptizatur, uel fur, aut non erit? nescio, utrum audeat dicere aliquis, aliquid horum erit, uel non erit, sicut michi sine dubitatione respondet, quod credat in Deum, aut quod se conuertat ad Deum. §. 5. Ecce facio, quantum possum. Dominus adiuuet, ut quod postulas possim. Nempe sepe ita loquimur, ut Pasca propinquante dicamus crastinam, uel perendianam Domini passionem, cum ille ante annos multos passus sit nec omnino, nisi semel, ipsa passio facta. Nempe ipso die dominico dicimus: hodie Dominus resurrexit, cum ex quo resurrexit tot anni transierint. Cur nemo tam ineptus est, ut nos ita loquentes arguat esse mentitos, nisi quia istos dies secundum illorum, quibus hec gesta sunt, similitudinem nuncupamus, ut dicatur ipsa dies, que non est ipsa reuolutione temporis sed similis eius, et dicatur illo die fieri propter sacramenti celebrationem, quod non illo, sed iam olim factum est? §. 6. Itaque paruulum etc. Et infra: §. 7. Cum autem homo sapere ceperit, non illud sacramentum repetit, sed intelligit, eiusque ueritati consona uoluntate coaptabitur. Hoc quamdiu non potest, ualebit sacramentum ad eius tutelam aduersus contrarias potestates, et tantum ualebit, ut, si ante maioris etatis usum ex hac uita emigrauerit, per ipsum sacramentum conmendata ecclesiae karitate ab illa condempnatione, que per unum hominem intrauit in mundum, Christiano adiutorio liberetur. Qui hoc non credit, et fieri non posse arbitratur, profecto infidelis est, etsi habeat fidei sacramentum, longeque melior est iste paruulus, qui, etiamsi fidem non habeat in cogitatione, non tamen ei obicem contrariae cogitationis opponit, unde sacramentum eius salubriter percipit.

C. CXXX. The faith of others saves little children in baptism.

The same to Boniface, Against the Heresy of the Pelagians, [book I, c. 22]. In the Church of the Savior little children believe through others, just as from others they drew the sins which are remitted in baptism; nor do you consider that those who are without the body and blood of Christ cannot have life, since he himself says: “Unless you eat my flesh, etc.”

C. CXXX. Aliorum fides in baptismo paruulos saluat.

Idem Bonifatio contra heresim Pelagianorum. [lib. I. c. 22.] In ecclesia Saluatoris per alios paruuli credunt, sicut ex aliis que in baptismo remittuntur, peccata traxerunt; nec illud cogitatis, uitam eos habere non posse, qui sunt expertes corporis et sanguinis Christi, dicente ipso: "Nisi manducaueritis carnem meam etc."

C. CXXXI. One who through baptism becomes his member participates in Christ's body and blood.

The same. No one is in any way to doubt that each of the faithful then becomes a participant in the Lord's body and blood when in baptism he becomes a member of Christ's body, and that he is not alienated from the fellowship of that bread and chalice even if, before he eats that bread and drinks the chalice, he departs from this world while established in the unity of Christ's body. For he is not deprived of participation in and the benefit of that sacrament when he himself is found to be that which the sacrament is.

> C. CXXXI. Corpore et sanguine Christi participat qui per baptisma membrum eius efficitur.
> Idem. Nulli est aliquatenus ambigendum, tunc unumquemque fidelium corporis sanguinisque dominici participem fieri, quando in baptismate membrum Christi corporis efficitur, nec alienari ab illius panis calicisque consortio, etiamsi ante, quam panem illum comedat, et calicem bibat, de hoc seculo in unitate corporis Christi constitutus abscedat. Sacramenti quippe illius participatione ac beneficio non priuatur, quando ipse hoc, quod ipsum sacramentum est, inuenitur.

C. CXXXII. Why one born of a baptized person is to be baptized.

The same, On the Baptism of Infants, [book II, cc. 25 and 26]. PART XXVII. If the flesh of Christ, which was without sin, was baptized for an example of imitation, how much more must the flesh of death be baptized to avoid the judgment of condemnation? But just as in the time of circumcision one who was born of a circumcised person had to be circumcised, so now one who is born of a baptized person must be baptized. § 1. For the sacrament of baptism is the sacrament of regeneration. Hence, just as one who has not lived cannot die, so one who has not been born cannot be reborn. From this it is established that no one could have been reborn in his parent when he was not yet born. And although a parent's own sins do not harm him after conversion, nevertheless they harm those who are generated from him. They do not harm the parent because he has been reborn; but unless those born of him are reborn in the same way, the things drawn from the parent will harm them, because even a renewed father carnally begets not from newness but from the remnants of oldness, and children escape through the sacrament of regeneration the condemnation of sin propagated in the flesh from the remaining oldness of their parents' whole oldness.

> C. CXXXII. Quare sit baptizandus qui de baptizato nascitur.
> Idem de baptismo paruulorum. [lib. II. c. 25. et 26] XXVII. Pars. Si baptizata est caro Christi, que sine peccato erat, propter exemplum imitationis: quanto magis baptizanda est caro mortis propter euitandum iudicium dampnationis? Sicut uero in tempore circumcisionis qui de circumciso nascebatur fuit circumcidendus: sic nunc qui de baptizato nascitur erit baptizandus. §. 1. Sacramentum enim baptismi sacramentum est regenerationis. Quare sicut qui non uixerit non potest mori, ita qui natus non fuerit non potest renasci. Ex quo conficitur, neminem in suo parente potuisse renasci cum nondum sit natus. Et quamuis parenti post conuersionem propria peccata non obsint, tamen illis obsunt, qui ab eo generantur. Parenti propter hoc non obsunt, quia renatus est; illis autem, qui de illo nati sunt, nisi eodem modo renascantur, que a parente tracta sunt oberunt, quia etiam innouatus est pater non de nouitate, sed de reliquiis uetustatis carnaliter gignit, et filii ex reliqua parentum uetustate totius uetustatis carne propagata peccati dampnationem sacramento regenerationis euadunt.

C. CXXXIII. In baptism all sins die.

Likewise in the Enchiridion, [c. 52]. In order to show that we are dead to sin, the Apostle says: "Or do you not know that all of us who have been baptized in Christ Jesus have been baptized in his death?" Therefore, if from this we are shown to be dead to sin, because we have been baptized in Christ's death, assuredly little children who are baptized in Christ die to sin because they are baptized in his death. For it was said with no one excepted: "All of us who have been baptized in Christ have been baptized in his death"; and it was said for this reason, to prove that we are dead to sin. But do little children by being reborn die to that sin which they contracted by being born? And through this, what follows pertains to them: "For we were buried together with him through baptism into death." § 1. Therefore, to those baptized in Christ's death, in which not only adults but also little children are baptized, he says: "So reckon yourselves indeed to be dead to sin, but living to God in Christ Jesus."

C. CXXXIII. In baptismate omnia peccata moriuntur.

Item in Enchiridion. [c. 52.] Ut ostenderet Apostolus, nos mortuos esse peccato: inquit, "an ignoratis quoniam quicumque baptizati sumus in Christo Iesu, in morte ipsius baptizati sumus?" Si ergo hinc ostendimur mortui esse peccato, quia in morte Christi baptizati sumus, profecto paruuli, qui in Christo baptizantur, peccato moriuntur, quia in ipsius morte baptizantur. Nullo enim excepto dictum est: "Quicumque baptizati sumus in Christo in morte ipsius baptizati sumus," et ideo dictum est, ut probaret nos mortuos esse peccato. Paruuli autem renascendo moriuntur illi peccato, quod nascendo contraxerunt? Et per hoc ad ipsos pertinet quod sequitur: "Consepulti enim sumus illi per baptismum in morte." §. 1. Baptizatis igitur in morte Christi, in qua non solum maiores, uerum etiam paruuli baptizantur, ait: "Sic uos existimate mortuos quidem esse peccato, uiuentes autem Deo in Christo Iesu."

C. CXXXIV. Just as baptism is denied to no one, so there is no one who does not die to sin.

The same in the same work, [c. 43]. From the newly born little child to the decrepit old man, just as no one is to be prohibited from baptism, so there is no one who does not die to sin in baptism. But little children die only to original sin, while adults die also to all the sins which by living badly they added to the original one.

C. CXXXIV. Sicut nulli baptisma negatur, ita nemo est, qui non peccato moriatur.

Idem in eodem. [c. 43] A paruulo recenter nato usque ad decrepitum senem sicut nullus prohibendus est a baptismo, ita nullus est, qui non peccato moriatur in baptismo. Sed paruuli tantum originali, maiores autem etiam omnibus moriuntur peccatis, que male uiuendo addiderunt originali.

C. CXXXV. In John's baptism there was no remission of sin.

Likewise in the same work, [c. 49]. Those who were baptized with John's baptism were not regenerated, but by a certain forerunning ministry of him who said, "Prepare the way of the Lord," they were prepared for him in whom alone they could be reborn. For his baptism is not only in water, as John's was, but also in the Holy Spirit, so that whoever has believed in Christ may be regenerated from him; from him Christ is generated, who had no need of regeneration. § 1. Therefore he willed to be baptized in water not so that his iniquity might be washed away, but that his humanity might be commended. For just as baptism had nothing in him to wash away, so death found nothing to punish.

C. CXXXV. In baptismo Iohannis non erat peccati remissio.

Item in eodem. [c. 49] Non regenerabantur qui baptismo Iohannis baptizabantur. Sed quodam precursorio illius ministerio, qui dicebat: "Parate uiam Domino," in quo solo renasci poterant, parabantur. Huius enim baptisma est non in aqua tantum, ut fuit Iohannis, uerum etiam in Spiritu sancto, ut de illo regeneretur si quis in Christum crediderit, de illo Christus generatur qui regeneratione non eguit. §. 1. In aqua ergo baptizari uoluit non ut eius iniquitas dilueretur, sed humanitas conmendaretur. Ita quippe nichil baptismus in eo habuit quod ablueret, sicut mors nichil inuenit quod puniret.

C. CXXXVI. Not only original but also actual sins are remitted in baptism.

The same, On the Baptism of Infants, [or On the Merits of Sins, book I, cc. 15 and 16]. When the flesh generates, only original sin is drawn; but when the Spirit regenerates, remission is made not only of original sins but also of voluntary sins. Consequently, it can rightly be said that little children departing without baptism will be in the mildest punishment of all. But one who proclaims that they will not be in condemnation both deceives and is deceived, since the Apostle says: "Through the offense of one, all human beings unto condemnation, etc."

C. CXXXVI. Non solum originalia, sed etiam actualia peccata remittuntur in baptismate.

Idem de baptismo paruulorum. [siue de peccatorum meritis, lib. I. c. 15. et 16.] Regenerante autem carne tantummodo trahitur originale peccatum; regenerante autem Spiritu non solum originalium, sed etiam uoluntariorum fit remissio peccatorum. Proinde dici recte potest, paruulos sine baptismo discedentes in mitissimam omnium futuros penam. Fallit autem et fallitur qui eos in dampnatione predicat non futuros, dicente Apostolo: "Per unius delictum omnes homines in condempnationem etc."

C. CXXXVII. Whoever is born from concupiscence is regenerated through baptism.

The same in the same work, [c. 16]. Whoever is carnally generated from obedience to the flesh and the law of sin and death needs to be spiritually regenerated, so that he may not only be led to the kingdom of God but also be freed from the condemnation of sin. Just as through the first human being they are born in sin and death, so also through Christ they are reborn in baptism in righteousness and eternal life.

C. CXXXVII. Quicumque ex concupiscentia nascitur per baptismum regeneratur.

Idem in eodem. [c. 16.] Quisquis ex obedientia carnis, et lege peccati et mortis carnaliter generatur, regenerari spiritualiter habet opus, ut non solum ad regnum Dei perducatur sed etiam a dampnatione peccati liberetur. Sicut etiam per primum hominem in peccato et morte nascuntur, sic etiam per Christum in iusticia et uita eterna in baptismo renascuntur.

C. CXXXVIII. The faith of those presenting them makes little children faithful.

Likewise in the same work, [c. 19]. Little children are rightly called faithful who in some manner confess the faith through the words of those carrying them and through the words of the same persons renounce the devil and also the world. And this occurs by the power of the sacrament and of divine grace, which God gave to the Church. But if a little child who is baptized, upon reaching the years of reason, does not believe and does not abstain from illicit things, what he received as a little child profits him nothing.

C. CXXXVIII. Offerentium fides paruulos facit fideles.

Item in eodem. [c. 19] Paruuli fideles recte uocantur, qui fidem per uerba gestantium quodammodo confitentur et per eorumdem uerba diabolo etiam mundo abrenunciant. Et hoc fit ui sacramenti et diuinae gratiae, quam dedit Deus ecclesiae. Paruulus autem, qui baptizatur, si ad annos rationales ueniens non crediderit, nec ab illicitis abstinuerit, nichil ei prodest quod paruulus accepit.

C. CXXXIX. On the same matter.

Likewise Augustine in the book On the Merits and Remission of Sins, [cc. 25 and 19]. Mother Church supplies a maternal mouth to little children so that they may be imbued with the sacred mysteries, because they cannot yet believe with their own heart unto righteousness or confess with their own mouth unto salvation. Yet no one of the faithful can therefore call them unfaithful—a name assuredly derived from believing—although they themselves did not answer, but others answered for them amid the sacraments. But if they are rightly called faithful because in some manner they profess the faith through the words of those carrying them, why are they not also regarded as penitents, since through the words of those carrying them they are shown to renounce the devil and this world?

C. CXXXIX. De eodem.

Item Augustinus in libro de peccatorum meritis et remissione peccatorum. [c. 25. et 19.] Mater ecclesia os maternum paruulis prebet ut sacris misteriis inbuantur, quia nondum possunt corde proprio credere ad iusticiam, nec ore proprio confiteri ad salutem. Nec ideo tamen eos quisquam fidelium infideles dicere potest, quod a credendo utique nomen est, quamuis hoc non ipsi, sed alii pro eis inter sacramenta responderint. Si autem propterea fideles recte uocantur, quoniam fidem per uerba gestantium quodammodo profitentur, cur etiam non penitentes habeantur, cum per eorum uerba gestantium diabolo et huic seculo renunciare monstrantur?

C. CXL. The charity of the Church remits or retains sins.

The same, [in tractate CXXI on c. 20 of John]. The charity of the Church, which is poured forth through the Holy Spirit in the hearts of those who are its participants, remits sins; it retains those of persons who are not its participants.

C. CXL. Karitas ecclesiae peccata dimittit, uel tenet.

Idem. [in tract. CXXI. ad c. 20. Iohannis] Ecclesiae karitas, que per Spiritum sanctum diffunditur in cordibus eorum, qui participes sui sunt, peccata dimittit; eorum, qui non sunt, tenet.

C. CXLI. Christ alone remits sins.

The same, Against Julian, book II. No one takes away sins except Christ alone, who is the Lamb taking away the sins of the world. He takes them away by remitting those which have been done—in which original sin also is contained—by assisting so that they are not done, and by leading to the life where they cannot be done at all.

C. CXLI. Solus Christus peccata dimittit.

Idem contra Iulianum, libro II. Nemo tollit peccata, nisi solus Christus, qui est agnus tollens peccata mundi. Tollit autem et dimittendo que facta sunt, (ubi et originale continetur), et adiuuando ne fiant, et perducendo ad uitam, ubi omnino fieri non possint.

C. CXLII. Apart from Christ's baptism, no salvation is promised to little children.

The same, On the Baptism of Infants. No salvation apart from baptism is promised to infants, because infants remain in darkness if through the sacrament divinely instituted for this purpose they do not pass into the number of believers.

> C. CXLII. Preter baptisma Christi paruulis nulla salus promittitur.
> Idem de baptismo paruulorum. Nulla preter baptismum salus promittitur infantibus, quia infantes, si per sacramentum, quod ad hoc diuinitus institutum est, in credentium numerum non transeant, in tenebris manent.

C. CXLIII. Those baptized are incorporated into Christ and become his members.

The same in the same work, [c. 26]. Baptism avails for this: that those baptized may be incorporated into Christ as his members and buried together with him, and that those presented may through the sacrament and the charity of the faithful be reconciled to God, so that in him they may be made living, safe, liberated, redeemed, and illuminated.

> C. CXLIII. Baptizati in Christo incorporantur, et eius membra fiunt.
> Idem in eodem. [c. 26.] Ad hoc baptismus ualet, ut baptizati Christo incorporentur, ut membra eius, et consepeliantur, et oblati per sacramentum karitatemque fidelium reconcilientur Deo, ut in eo uiui, salui, liberati, redempti, illuminati fiant.

[C. CXLIV.] The same, [c. 27].

But who does not know that for infants to believe is to be baptized, while not to believe is not to be baptized?

> [C. CXLIV.] Idem. [c. 27.]
> Quis autem nesciat, credere esse infantibus baptizari non credere autem non baptizari?

C. CXLV. Grace not only remits sins but also causes the law to be fulfilled.

The same in the book On Free Choice, [c. 14]. Grace, which is given through Christ, effects not only the remission of sins but also that the law may be fulfilled, that nature may be liberated, and that sin may not rule. The Spirit of grace also gives faith, which is granted by God even when not requested, so that other things may also be granted to the human being who asks. For faith is not only from free choice, but is God's gift.

> C. CXLV. Gratia non solum peccata dimittit, sed etiam legem inplere facit.
> Idem in libro de libero arbitrio. [c. 14.] Gratia, que per Christum datur, non solum peccatorum remissionem facit sed etiam ut lex inpleatur, ut natura liberetur, nec peccatum dominetur; Spiritus etiam gratiae dat fidem, que etiam non petita a Deo conceditur, ut homini petenti et alia concedantur. Nam fides non est liberi arbitrii tantum, sed donum Dei.

C. CXLVI. The old infirmity is not entirely consumed in baptism, but loses its strength.

The same, On the Baptism of Infants, [book II, c. 7]. PART XXVIII. Not from the moment anyone is baptized is every old infirmity consumed in him; rather, renewal begins from the remission of all sins and from the understanding and operation of spiritual things. But the remaining things are in hope until they come to be in reality, which will occur in the resurrection. For in baptism, although full remission of sins takes place, there is not yet full newness and perfect change, because corruption still remains not only in the body but also in the mind, which is the inner human being; if newness were perfect in it, the Apostle would not say that it is renewed from day to day. Likewise, [c. 27]. § 1. We ought to remember this: that full and perfect remission of all sins takes place in baptism, but the whole human being is not changed immediately; rather, in those progressing well, as newness increases from day to day, that which is old and carnal is changed until it is so renewed that the animal infirmity of the body arrives at spiritual and incorrupt strength. § 2. But this law of sin, concerning which the Apostle says, "Let sin not reign in your mortal body," does not remain in the members of those who have been reborn as though remission had not been made for them where there is full remission of all our sins, with all the enemies by whom they were separated from God killed; but it remains in the oldness of the flesh as conquered and slain, if it does not revive through illicit consent and is not recalled to its own kingdom. But the life of the Spirit, in whose newness the baptized are reborn, is distinguished to such an extent from this oldness of the flesh and from sin which has been remitted that such persons are said even in the present to be not only not in sin, but also not in the flesh, whose desires they do not follow, but in the Spirit. But one uses the corruptible flesh well who turns its members to working well, not living according to the desires of the flesh by the law of sin which, although it has now been remitted, nevertheless remains in the oldness of the flesh. Faithful married persons use it well when, from the fact that they are in the newness of Christ, they do not permit lust to rule over them; but from the fact that they still draw the oldness of Adam, they mortally generate children who must be regenerated, with the propagation of sin to which the reborn are not held liable and from which those born are freed by being reborn. Likewise. § 3. Just as iniquitous things said, done, and thought pertain to soul and body, and although as regards their movements they have now passed and do not exist, nevertheless, once they have passed, their guilt remains unless the sin is dissolved by remission, so, while the law of concupiscence not past but still remains, its guilt is dissolved and will not exist when full remission of sin takes place in baptism.

C. CXLVI. Vetus infirmitas in baptismo non penitus absumitur, sed uires amittit.

Idem de baptismo paruulorum, [lib. II. c. 7.] XXVIII. Pars. Non ex quo quisque baptizatur omnis uetus infirmitas in eo absumitur, sed renouatio incipit a remissione omnium peccatorum, et intelligentia, et operatione spiritualium. Cetera uero in spe, donec fiant in re, quod erit in resurrectione. Nam in baptismate quamuis fiat plena peccatorum remissio, tamen nondum est plena nouitas et perfecta mutatio, quia adhuc remanet corruptio non solum in corpore, sed etiam in animo, qui est homo interior; in quo si perfecta esset nouitas, non diceret Apostolus, quod de die in diem renouatur. Item: [c. 27.] §. 1. Hoc meminisse debemus, omnium peccatorum plenam perfectamque remissionem in baptismo fieri, hominem uero non totum conmutari continuo; sed in bene proficientibus de die in diem crescente nouitate conmutari quod uetustum et carnale est, donec ita renouetur quod animalis infirmitas corporis ad firmitatem spiritualem incorruptamque perueniat. §. 2. Hec autem lex peccati, de qua dicit Apostolus: "Non regnet peccatum in uestro mortali corpore," non sic maneat membris eorum, qui renati sunt, tamquam non sit eis facta remissio, ubi plena sit omnium peccatorum nostrorum remissio, omnibus inimicis interfectis, quibus separabantur a Deo: sed manet in uetustate carnis tamquam superatum et peremptum, si non illicito consensu reuiuiscat, et in regnum proprium reuocetur. Ab hac autem uetustate carnis et peccati, quod remissum est uita Spiritus usque adeo discernitur, in cuius nouitate baptizati renascuntur, ut tales etiam in presenti non solum in peccato, sed etiam nec in carne esse dicantur, cuius desideria non secuntur, sed in Spiritu. Ipsa uero carne corruptibili bene utitur qui membra eius ad bene operandum conuertit, non secundum desideria carnis uiuens lege peccati, quod, licet iam remissum est, tamen in uetustate carnis manet; bene utuntur fideles coniugati, qui ex eo, quod sunt in nouitate Christi, dominari sibi libidinem non patiuntur; ex eo autem, quod adhuc trahunt Adae uetustatem, filios regenerandos mortaliter generant cum propagine peccati, qua renati obnoxii non tenentur, et qui nascuntur renascendo soluuntur. Item: §. 3. Sicut dicta facta, et cogitata iniqua animae et corpori pertinent, licet autem quantum ad motus iam preterierunt, et non sunt, tamen eis preteritis reatus eorum manet, nisi peccatum remissione soluatur: sic non preterita, sed adhuc manente lege concupiscentiae reatus soluitur, et non erit, cum fiat in baptismo plena remissio peccati.

C. CXLVII. Christ's disciples are believed to have been washed with his baptism.

The same in letter CVIII to Seleucianus. PART XXIX. When Jesus went out from Jerusalem with his disciples into the land of Judea and remained there with them, he baptized not through himself but through his disciples, whom we understand already to have been baptized, whether with John's baptism, as some think, or—which is more credible—with Christ's baptism. Likewise. § 1. The Lord answered Peter: "He who has been washed needs only to wash his feet, but is wholly clean." From this it is understood that Peter had already been baptized.

C. CXLVII. Discipuli Christi eius baptismate creduntur abluti.

Idem in epistola [CVIII.] ad Seleucianum. XXIX. Pars. Quando ab Iherosolimis exiit Iesus cum discipulis suis in Iudeam terram, et ibi morabatur cum eis, baptizabat non per se ipsum, sed per discipulos suos, quos intelligimus iam fuisse baptizatos siue Iohannis baptismo (sicut nonnulli arbitrantur) siue (quod magis est credibile) baptismo Christi. Item: §. 1. Respondit Dominus Petro: "Qui lotus est, non indiget, nisi ut pedes lauet, sed est mundus totus." Unde intelligitur, quod iam Petrus fuerit baptizatus.

C. CXLVIII. All the Apostles are believed to have been baptized with Christ's baptism.

The same to Vincentius Victor. If we contend that those concerning whom it is not written whether they were baptized or not departed from this life without baptism, we make a calumny against the Apostles themselves, for, apart from the Apostle Paul, we do not know when they were baptized. But that they themselves were baptized could become known to us through this: that the Lord said to blessed Peter the Apostle, "He who has been washed needs only to wash his feet."

C. CXLVIII. Apostoli omnes Christi baptismate baptizati creduntur.

Idem ad Vincentium Victorem. Si eos, de quibus scriptum non est, utrum fuerint baptizati siue non, sine baptismo de hac uita recessisse contendimus, ipsis calumpniamur Apostolis, qui, preter apostolum Paulum, quando baptizati fuerint ignoramus. Sed ipsos baptizatos esse per hoc nobis innotescere potuit, quod B. Petro apostolo Dominus ait: "Qui lotus est, non indiget, nisi ut pedes lauet."

C. CXLIX. A Catholic catechumen is preferred to a baptized heretic.

The same in book IV On Baptism, [c. 21]. PART XXX. I do not doubt that a Catholic catechumen burning with divine charity is to be preferred to a baptized heretic; but even within the Church itself we prefer a catechumen to a bad baptized person. Yet we do not thereby do injury to the sacrament of baptism with which the former has not yet, but the latter has already, been imbued. § 1. For deservedly the centurion, not yet baptized, is preferred to the baptized Simon. The former was filled with the Holy Spirit received even before baptism; the latter was puffed up by an unclean spirit even after baptism. Nevertheless, if Cornelius, after already receiving the Holy Spirit, had refused to be baptized, he would become guilty of contempt for so great a sacrament. § 2. But just as baptism is lacking to a good catechumen for attaining the kingdom of heaven, so true conversion is lacking to a bad baptized person. For he who said, "Unless someone is reborn of water and the Holy Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven," also said: "Unless your righteousness abounds more than that of the scribes and Pharisees, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven."

C. CXLIX. Catecuminus catholicus heretico baptizato prefertur.

Idem in libro [IV.] de baptismate. [c. 21.] XXX. Pars. Non dubito, catecuminum catholicum diuina karitate flagrantem heretico baptizato anteponere; sed etiam in ipsa intus ecclesia catecuminum malo baptizato anteponimus. Nec ideo tamen sacramento baptismi, quo iste nondum, ille iam inbutus est, facimus iniuriam. §. 1. Merito enim centurio nondum baptizatus Simoni baptizato anteponitur. Iste enim etiam ante baptismum S. Spiritu accepto repletus est: ille et post baptismum inflatus est inmundo spiritu. Verumtamen Cornelius, si Spiritu sancto iam accepto baptizari noluisset, contemptu tanti sacramenti reus fieret. §. 2. Sicut autem bono catecumino baptismus deest ad regnum celorum capessendum, sic malo baptizato uera conuersio. Qui enim dixit: "Nisi quis renatus fuerit ex aqua et Spiritu sancto, non potest intrare in regnum celorum," ipse etiam dixit: "Nisi habundauerit iusticia uestra plus quam scribarum et Phariseorum, non intrabitis in regnum celorum."

C. CL. Baptism consists not so much in the washing of the body as in the faith of the heart.

The same in the book of Prosper's Sentences. True baptism consists not so much in the washing of the body as in the faith of the heart, as apostolic teaching hands down, saying: "Cleansing their hearts by faith," and elsewhere: "Baptism saves—not the removal of the filth of the flesh, but the questioning of a good conscience toward God."

C. CL. Non tam ablutione corporis, quam fide cordis baptisma constitit.

Idem in libro sententiarum Prosperi. Verus baptismus constat non tam ablutione corporis, quam fide cordis, sicut apostolica doctrina tradit, dicens: "Fide mundans corda eorum," et alibi: "Saluos facit baptisma non carnis depositio sordium, sed conscientiae bonae interrogatio in Deum."

C. CLI. Just as certain spiritual persons are found in the Old Testament, so certain carnal persons are found in the New.

The same, On Baptism. Just as in the sacraments of the Old Testament certain spiritual persons lived, secretly pertaining to the New Testament which was then hidden, so also now, in the sacrament of the New Testament which has now been revealed, certain animal persons live who, because they are unwilling to advance to perceive the things that are of the Spirit of God, as the apostolic discourse exhorts, will pertain to the Old Testament. But if they advance, even before they attain, by the very approach and progress they pertain to the New; and if, before they become spiritual, they are snatched from this life, preserved through the sanctity of the sacrament they are counted in the land of the living. Nor do I find what can be found more true in what is written: "Your eyes saw my imperfection, and in your book all shall be written." Likewise, [book III, c. 14]. § 1. When the integrity and sanctity of the sacrament is treated, it makes no difference what the person who receives the sacrament believes or with what kind of faith he is imbued. It indeed makes a very great difference to the way of salvation, but no difference to the question of the sacrament. Likewise. § 2. It is manifest that it can happen that the sacrament of baptism remains whole in someone whose faith is not whole. Likewise, [c. 15]. § 3. If it were possible for individuals to be questioned diligently, there would perhaps be as many diversities of opinions as human beings are numbered. "For the animal human being does not perceive the things that are of the Spirit of God." Do they therefore not receive the sacrament whole? Or therefore, if they advance and amend the vanity of their carnal opinions, must what they had received be repeated anew? Each person receives according to his faith, but as much as he grasps, with the mercy of God governing.

C. CLI. Sicut in ueteri testamento quidam spirituales, ita in nouo quidam carnales inueniuntur.

Idem de baptismo. Sicut in sacramentis ueteris testamenti uiuebant quidam spirituales, ad nouum scilicet testamentum, quod tunc occultum erat, occulte pertinentes, sic et nunc in sacramento noui testamenti, quod iam reuelatum est, quidam uiuunt animales, qui proficere scilicet nolunt ad percipienda que sunt Spiritus Dei, quod hortatur sermo apostolicus, ad uetus testamentum pertinebunt. Si autem proficiunt, et ante, quam capiant, ipso accessu et profectu ad nouum pertinent, et, si prius, quam spirituales fiant, ex hac uita rapiuntur custoditi per sacramenti sanctitatem in terra uiuentium conputantur. Nec inuenio quid uerius inueniatur in eo, quod scriptum est: "Inperfectum meum uiderunt oculi tui. Et in libro tuo omnes scribentur." Item: [lib. 3. c. 14.] §. 1. Non interest, cum de sacramenti integritate tractatur et sanctitate, quid credat, aut quali fide inbutus sit ille, qui accipit sacramentum. Interest quidem plurimum ad salutis uiam, sed nichil interest ad sacramenti questionem. Item: §. 2. Manifestum est fieri posse, ut fide non integra maneat integrum in quoquam baptismi sacramentum. Item: [c. 15.] §. 3. Si fieri posset ut singuli diligenter interrogarentur, tot diuersitates opinionum forsitan, quot homines numerantur. "Animalis enim homo non percipit ea, que sunt spiritus Dei." Numquid tamen ideo non integrum sacramentum accipiunt? aut numquid ideo, si profecerint, et opinionum carnalium uanitatem emendauerint, denuo quod acceperant repetendum est? Accipit quisque secundum fidem suam, sed quantum capit, gubernante misericordia Dei.

C. CLII. Adam was going to die not by necessity of nature but by the desert of sin.

Likewise from the Council of Milevis, at which Augustine and Anselm, legate of the Roman Church, were present, against the Pelagians, [c. 1]. PART XXXI. Therefore it pleased all the bishops who were in this holy synod to establish these things which were defined in the present council: that whoever says that Adam, the first human being, was made mortal in such a way that, whether he sinned or did not sin, he would die in the body, that is, would depart from the body, not by the desert of sin but by necessity of nature, let him be anathema.

C. CLII. Non naturae necessitate, sed merito peccati Adam moriturus erat.

Item ex Concilio Mileuitano, cui interfuit Augustinus, et Anselmus Romanae ecclesiae Legatus, contra Pelagianos. [c. 1.] XXXI. Pars. Placuit igitur omnibus episcopis, qui fuerunt in hac sancta sinodo, constituere hec, que in presenti concilio diffinita sunt: ut quicumque dicit, Adam primum hominem mortalem factum ita, ut, siue peccaret siue non peccaret, moreretur in corpore, hoc est, de corpore exiret, non peccati merito, sed necessitate naturae, anathema sit.

C. CLIII. Little children draw from their parents not only punishment but also fault.

Likewise from the same Council, [c. 2]. It was resolved that whoever denies that newborn little children are to be baptized from their mothers' wombs, or says that they are baptized for the remission of sins but draw nothing from Adam of original sin which is to be expiated by the washing of regeneration—whence it follows that in them the form of baptism "for the remission of sins" is understood not as true but as false—let him be anathema; because what the Apostle says, "Through one human being sin entered the world, and through sin death, and thus it passed into all human beings, in whom all sinned," is to be understood in no other way than the Catholic Church diffused everywhere has always understood it. For on account of this rule of faith, even little children who have not yet been able to commit any sins in themselves are therefore truly baptized for the remission of sins, so that what they drew by generation may be cleansed in them by regeneration.

C. CLIII. Paruuli non solum penam, sed etiam culpam a parentibus trahunt.

Item eiusdem Concilii. [c. 2.] Placuit, ut quicumque paruulos recentes ab uteris matrum baptizandos negat, aut dicit, in remissionem peccatorum eos baptizare, sed nichil ex Adam trahere originalis peccati, quod lauacro regenerationis expietur (unde fit consequens, ut in eis forma baptismatis in remissionem peccatorum non uera, sed falsa intelligatur), anathema sit, quoniam non aliter intelligendum est quod ait Apostolus: "Per unum hominem intrauit peccatum in mundum, et per peccatum mors, et ita in omnes homines pertransiit, in quo omnes peccauerunt," nisi quemadmodum ecclesia catholica ubique diffusa semper intellexit. Propter hanc enim fidei regulam etiam paruuli, qui nichil peccatorum in semetipsis adhuc conmittere potuerunt, ideo in remissionem peccatorum ueraciter baptizantur, ut in eis regeneratione mundetur quod generatione traxerunt.

C. CLIV. Grace both remits sins and assists so that they are not repeated.

Likewise, [c. 3]. It was resolved that whoever says that the grace of God by which a human being is justified through Jesus Christ our Lord avails only for the remission of sins which have already been committed, and not also for assistance so that they are not committed, let him be anathema.

C. CLIV. Gratia et peccata dimittit, et ne reiterentur adiuuat.

Item. [c. 3.] Placuit, ut quicumque dixerit, gratiam Dei, qua iustificatur homo per Iesum Christum Dominum nostrum, solam remissionem peccatorum ualere, que iam conmissa sunt, non etiam ad adiutorium, ut non conmittantur, anathema sit.

C. CLV. Grace teaches what sin is and causes it to be avoided.

Likewise, [c. 4]. Whoever says that the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord assists us not to sin only for this reason—that through it the understanding of the commandments is revealed and opened to us, so that we may know what we ought to pursue and what to avoid—but that through it we are not granted also to do, or to be able to do, what we have learned must be done, let him be anathema.

C. CLV. Quid sit peccatum gratia docet, et ut uitetur facit.

Item. [c. 4.] Quisquis dixerit, gratiam Dei per Iesum Christum Dominum nostrum propter hoc tantum nos adiuuare ad non peccandum, quia per ipsam nobis reuelatur et aperitur intelligentia mandatorum, ut sciamus, quid appetere, quid uitare debeamus, non autem per illam nobis prestari, ut quod faciendum cognouerimus etiam facere debeamus aut ualeamus, anathema sit.

C. CLVI. Without divine grace the commandments cannot be fulfilled.

Likewise, [c. 5]. PART XXXII. It was resolved that whoever says that the grace of justification is given to us so that what we are commanded to do by free choice we can fulfill more easily through grace, as though, even if grace were not given, we could—indeed not easily, but nevertheless even without it—fulfill the divine commandments, let him be anathema.

C. CLVI Sine gratia diuina mandata inpleri non possunt.

Item. [c. 5.] XXXII. Pars. Placuit, ut quicumque dixerit, ideo nobis gratiam iustificationis dari, ut quod facere iubemur per liberum arbitrium facilius possimus inplere per gratiam, tamquam etsi gratia non daretur, non quidem facile, sed tamen possimus etiam sine illa inplere mandata diuina, anathema sit.

Distinction V

GRATIAN.

GRATIANUS.

C. I. After baptism the sacrament of confirmation is to be conferred.

Likewise Pope Urban to all Christians, [letter I, c. 7]. PART I. All the faithful ought to receive the Holy Spirit after baptism through the imposition of the bishops' hands, so that they may be found full Christians, because when the Holy Spirit is poured in, the faithful heart is enlarged toward prudence and constancy.

C. I. Post baptisma confirmationis sacramentum prestetur.

Item Urbanus Papa omnibus Christianis. [ep. I. c. 7.] I. Pars. Omnes fideles per manus inpositiones episcoporum Spiritum sanctum post baptismum accipere debent, ut pleni Christiani inueniantur, quia, cum Spiritus sanctus infunditur, cor fidele ad prudentiam et constantiam dilatatur.

C. II. What the Holy Spirit confers in baptism and what in confirmation.

Likewise Pope Melchiades, [in the letter to the bishops of Spain, c. 2]. The Holy Spirit, who descends with saving descent upon the waters of baptism, gives fullness at the font for innocence and in confirmation supplies increase for grace. And because those who will live their whole age in this world must walk among invisible enemies and dangers, in baptism we are regenerated for life; after baptism we are confirmed for battle. In baptism we are washed; after baptism we are strengthened. And although the benefits of regeneration suffice for those who will pass on immediately, nevertheless the aids of confirmation are necessary for those who will live. Regeneration by itself saves those who are soon to be received in the peace of the blessed age; confirmation arms and equips for the contests of this world and battles those who are kept back. But one who after baptism arrives at death unstained, with the innocence acquired, is confirmed by death, because after death he can no longer sin.

C. II. Quid conferat Spiritus sanctus in baptismate, quid in confirmatione.

Item Melciades Papa. [in ep. ad Episc. Hisp., c. 2.] Spiritus sanctus, qui super aquas baptismi salutifero descendit lapsu, in fonte plenitudinem tribuit ad innocentiam, in confirmatione augmentum prestat ad gratiam. Et quia in hoc mundo tota etate uicturis inter inuisibiles hostes et pericula gradiendum est, in baptismo regeneramur ad uitam, post baptismum confirmamur ad pugnam; in baptismo abluimur, post baptismum roboramur. Et quamuis continuo transituris sufficiant regenerationis beneficia, uicturis tamen necessaria sunt confirmationis auxilia. Regeneratio per se saluat mox in pace beati seculi recipiendos; confirmatio armat et instruit ad agones mundi huius et prelia reseruandos. Qui autem post baptismum cum acquisita innocentia inmaculatus ad mortem peruenit, confirmatur morte, quia iam non potest peccare post mortem.

C. III. The sacrament of the imposition of a hand is more dignified than the sacrament of baptism.

The same to the bishops of Spain. Concerning those things about which you asked to be informed, that is, whether the sacrament of the bishops' imposition of a hand or baptism is greater, know that each is a great sacrament; and just as the one has been assigned to the greater persons, that is, the supreme pontiffs, and cannot be completed by lesser persons, so also it is to be venerated and held with greater veneration. But these two sacraments are so joined that, unless death intervenes, they can in no way be separated from one another, and one cannot be perfected without the other.

C. III. Manus inpositionis sacramentum dignius est sacramento baptismi.

Idem Hispaniarum episcopis. De his uero, super quibus rogastis uos informari, id est: utrum maius sit sacramentum manus inpositionis episcoporum, aut baptismus? scitote, utrumque magnum esse sacramentum, et, sicut unum maioribus, id est summis pontificibus est accomodatum, quod a minoribus perfici non potest, ita et maiori ueneratione uenerandum et tenendum est. Sed ita coniuncta sunt hec duo sacramenta, ut ab inuicem nisi morte preueniente nullatenus possint segregari, et unum sine altero perfici non potest.

C. IV. The sacrament of the imposition of a hand can be completed by none other than bishops.

Likewise Pope Eusebius, [letter III to the bishops of Tuscany and Campania]. The sacrament of the imposition of a hand is also to be held with great veneration, because it cannot be completed by others except the supreme priests; nor in the time of the Apostles is it read or known to have been performed by others than the Apostles themselves; nor can it ever be completed or ought it to be done by others than those who hold their place. For if it is presumed otherwise, let it be regarded as ineffectual and empty, nor shall it ever be reckoned among the ecclesiastical sacraments.

C. IV. Non ab aliis quam ab episcopis manus inpositionis sacramentum perfici potest.

Item Eusebius Papa. [epist. III. ad Episcopos Tusciae et Campaniae] Manus quoque inpositionis sacramentum magna ueneratione tenendum est, quod ab aliis perfici non potest, nisi a summis sacerdotibus, nec tempore Apostolorum ab aliis quam ab ipsis Apostolis legitur aut scitur peractum esse, nec ab aliis, quam, qui eorum tenent locum, umquam perfici potest aut fieri debet. Nam si aliter presumptum fuerit, irritum habeatur et uacuum, nec inter ecclesiastica umquam reputabitur sacramenta.

C. V. Why the sacrament of confirmation is handed to one baptized.

Likewise Rabanus, On the Instruction of Clerics, [book I, c. 30]. Finally, through the imposition of a hand by the supreme priest, the Paraclete is handed to the baptized person so that he may be strengthened through the Holy Spirit to preach to others the same gift which he obtained in baptism, having been endowed through grace with eternal life. For the baptized person is signed with chrism by the priest upon the crown of the head, but by the pontiff upon the forehead, so that in the first anointing the descent of the Holy Spirit upon him may be signified for consecrating a dwelling to God; and in the second, that the sevenfold grace of the same Holy Spirit, with every fullness of holiness, knowledge, and power, is declared to come into the human being.

> C. V. Quare confirmationis sacramentum baptizato tradatur.
> Item Rabanus de institutione clericorum. [lib. I. c. 30.] Nouissime a summo sacerdote per manus inpositionem Paraclitus traditur baptizato, ut roboretur per Spiritum sanctum ad predicandum aliis idem donum, quod in baptismate consecutus est per gratiam uitae donatus eternae. Signatur enim baptizatus cum crismate per sacerdotem in capitis summitate; per pontificem uero in fronte, ut in priore unctione significetur super ipsum Spiritus sancti descensio ad habitationem Deo consecrandam: in secunda quoque, ut eiusdem Spiritus sancti septiformis gratia cum omni plenitudine sanctitatis, et scientiae, et uirtutis uenire in hominem declaretur.

C. VI. Only those fasting are to come to confirmation.

Likewise from the Council of Orléans, c. 3. Let those of mature age come fasting to confirmation, and let them be admonished first to make confession so that, clean, they may be able to receive the gift of the Holy Spirit; and because one will never be a Christian unless he has been chrismated in episcopal confirmation.

> C. VI. Ad confirmationem non nisi ieiuni ueniant.
> Item ex Concilio Aurelianensi, c. 3. Ut ieiuni ad confirmationem ueniant perfectae etatis, ut moneantur confessionem facere prius, ut mundi donum Spiritus S. ualeant accipere, et quia numquam erit Christianus, nisi in confirmatione episcopali fuerit crismatus.

C. VII. Bishops are to confirm the baptized only while fasting.

Likewise from the Council of Meaux, c. 6. Let bishops hand on the Holy Spirit through the imposition of hands only while fasting, except to the sick and those in danger of death. But just as baptism ought to be celebrated by those fasting at two times, namely Easter and Pentecost, so it is fitting that the handing on of the Holy Spirit be celebrated by fasting pontiffs.

> C. VII. Episcopi non nisi ieiuni baptizatos confirment.
> Item ex Concilio Meldensi c. 6. Ut episcopi non nisi ieiuni per inpositionem manuum Spiritum sanctum tradant, exceptis infirmis et morte periclitantibus. Sicut autem duobus temporibus, Pasca uidelicet et Pentecosten, a ieiunis debet baptismus celebrari, ita et traditionem Spiritus sancti a ieiunis pontificibus conuenit celebrari.

C. VIII. No one is to be confirmed a second or third time.

Likewise from the Council of Tarragona, c. 6. It was reported to us that certain persons among the people are confirmed twice or three times or more by the same bishops, although the bishops are ignorant of this. Hence it seemed to us that the same confirmation, just like baptism, ought by no means to be repeated, because it was decreed that those baptized or confirmed twice or more are to serve most religiously not the world but God alone under a regular or clerical habit.

> C. VIII. Secundo uel tertio nullus confirmetur.
> Item ex Concilio Terraconensi c. 6. Dictum est nobis, quod quidam de plebe bis, uel ter, aut eo amplius, episcopis ignorantibus tamen, ab eisdem episcopis confirmentur. Unde uisum est nobis, eandem confirmationem, sicut nec baptisma, iterari minime debere, quia bis, uel amplius baptizatos aut confirmatos non seculo, sed soli Deo sub habitu regulari uel clericali religiosissime famulari decretum est.

C. IX. On the same matter.

Likewise Gregory II, [letter IV to Boniface]. Concerning a human being who has been confirmed by a pontiff, such repetition anew is to be prohibited.

> C. IX. De eodem.
> Item Gregorius II. [epist. IV. ad Bonifatium] De homine, qui a pontifice confirmatus fuerit, denuo talis iteratio prohibenda est.

C. X. All sacraments are perfected by the sign of the cross.

Likewise Stephen. PART II. Surely all chrismations of the priestly ministry are perfected by the figure of the cross? Surely the water of baptism, unless sanctified by the cross, does not release sins? And, to pass over the rest, without the sign of the cross who ascends to a grade of the priesthood?

> C. X. Omnia sacramenta crucis signaculo perficiuntur.
> Item Stephanus. II. Pars. Numquid non omnia crismata sacerdotalis ministerii crucis figura perficiuntur? Numquid baptismatis unda nisi cruce sanctificata peccata relaxat, et, ut cetera pretereamus, sine crucis signaculo quis sacerdotii gradus ascendit?

C. XI. The possessed are to be exorcized every day.

Likewise from the Fourth Council of Carthage, [c. 90 and following]. PART III. Every day let exorcists impose hands upon the possessed, but let the possessed sweep the floors of the houses of God. While they sit in the house of God, let daily sustenance be ministered to them by the exorcists at the proper time.

> C. XI. Energumini omnibus diebus exorcizentur.
> Item ex Concilio Cartaginensi IV. [c. 90. et seqq.] III. Pars. Omni die exorcistae energuminis manus inponant, energumini uero pauimenta domorum Dei uerrant. Quibus assidentibus in domo Dei uictus cottidianus per exorcistas opportuno tempore ministretur.

C. XII. From what things neophytes ought to abstain.

Likewise from the same, [c. 86]. Let neophytes abstain for some time from richer feasts, spectacles, or spouses.

> C. XII A quibus neophiti abstinere debent.
> Item ex eodem. [c. 86.] Neophiti aliquamdiu a lautioribus epulis, et spectaculis, uel coniugibus abstineant.

C. XIII. Concerning the order of offices.

Likewise from the Council of Agde, [c. 30]. PART IV. It is fitting that the order of the Church be preserved equally by all. Hence it is to be established that, as is done everywhere, after the antiphons, conferences are to be spoken by bishops or presbyters; the morning or evening hymns are to be sung every day; and at the conclusion of the morning or evening masses, after the hymns, short passages from the psalms are to be said; and after a collect the people are to be dismissed by the bishop at evening with a blessing.

> C. XIII De ordine offitiorum.
> Item ex Concilio Agatensi. [c. 30.] IV. Pars. Conuenit ordinem ecclesiae ab omnibus equaliter custodiri. Unde statuendum est, ut sicut ubique fit, post antiphonas collationes ab episcopis uel presbiteris dicantur, et ymni matutini uel uespertini diebus omnibus decantentur, et in conclusione matutinarum uel uespertinarum missarum post ymnos capitella de psalmis dicantur, et plebs collecta oratione ad uesperam ab episcopo dimittatur cum benedictione.

C. XIV. On the same matter.

Likewise from the Council of Girona, [c. 10]. It has always been resolved that this be observed: that on all days after matins and vespers the Lord's prayer is to be pronounced by the priest. Likewise Gregory VII in a general synod:

> C. XIV. De eodem.
> Item de Concilio Gerundensi. [c. 10.] Id semper placuit obseruari, ut omnibus diebus post matutinos et uesperas oratio dominica a sacerdote proferatur. Item Gregorius VII. in generali Sinodo:

C. XV. On the same matter.

On the day of the Resurrection through Saturday in albis, and on the day of Pentecost through its Saturday, we sing and read at nocturns only three psalms and three lessons according to ancient custom. On all other days throughout the whole year, if there is a feast, we say nine lessons. But on other days we recite twelve psalms and three lessons. On Sundays—except Easter and Pentecost—we celebrate eighteen psalms and nine lessons. But those who on ordinary days wish to celebrate only three psalms and three lessons are proved to do this not from the rule of the holy Fathers but from weariness. But we, both investigating the Roman order and imitating the ancient Fathers according to the ancient custom of our Church, establish that it be done as we have noted above.

> C. XV. De eodem.
> In die Resurrectionis usque in sabbatum in albis, et in die Pentecostes usque in sabbatum eiusdem III. psalmos tantum ad nocturnos, tresque lectiones antiquo more canimus et legimus. Omnibus diebus aliis per totum annum, si festiuitas est IX. lectiones dicimus. Aliis uero diebus XII. psalmos, et III. lectiones recitamus. In dominicis diebus XVIII. psalmos (excepto die Pascae et Pentecostes) et IX. lectiones celebramus. Illi autem, qui in diebus cottidianis tres tantummodo psalmos, et III. lectiones celebrare uolunt, non ex regula sanctorum Patrum, sed ex fastidio conprobantur hoc facere. Nos autem et ordinem Romanum inuestigantes et antiquum morem nostrae ecclesiae, imitantes antiquos Patres, statuimus fieri sicut superius prenotauimus.

C. XVI. Concerning the observance of Lent.

Likewise from a homily of Pope Gregory. PART V. Lent is to be observed with the highest observance, so that the fast during it—apart from Sundays, which are subtracted from abstinence—is in no way relaxed unless sickness impedes someone, because those days are the tithe of the year. Therefore, from the first Sunday of Lent until the Lord's Easter, six weeks are counted, which assuredly make forty-two days; when six Sundays are subtracted from them for abstinence, no more than thirty-six days remain in abstinence. For example, if the year revolves through 365 days and we afflict ourselves for thirty-six days, we give God as it were the tithes of the year. But so that the sacred number of forty days, which our Savior consecrated by a sacred fast, may be completed, let the four days of the preceding week be taken to supply the forty days, that is, Wednesday, which is designated the head of the fast, and the following Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. Unless we join these four days to the preceding thirty-six, we do not have forty days in abstinence. We are also commanded by almighty God to give tithes of all our goods.

> C. XVI. De obseruatione Quadragesimae.
> Item ex omelia Gregorii Papae. V. Pars. Quadragesima summa obseruatione est obseruanda, ut ieiunium in ea, (preter dominicos dies, qui de abstinentia subtracti sunt), nisi quem infirmitas inpedierit, nullatenus soluatur, quia ipsi dies decimae sunt anni. A prima igitur dominica Quadragesimae usque in Pasca Domini sex ebdomadae conputantur, quarum uidelicet dies quadraginta et duo fiunt, e quibus dum sex dies dominici abstinentiae subtrahuntur, non plus in abstinentia, quam triginta et sex dies remanent. Verbi gratia, si per CCCLXV. dies annus uoluitur, et nos per XXXVI. dies affligimur, quasi anni decimas Deo damus. Sed ut sacer numerus XL. dierum adinpleatur, quem Saluator noster sacro ieiunio consecrauerat, IV. dies prioris ebdomadae ad supplementum XL. dierum tollantur, id est quarta feria, que caput ieiunii subnotatur, et quinta feria sequens, sexta, et sabbatum. Nisi istos dies IV. superioribus XXXVI. adiunxerimus, XL. dies in abstinentia non habemus. Iubemur etiam ab omnipotenti Deo omnium bonorum nostrorum decimas dare.

C. XVII. Lawful fasts are not to be relaxed without a probable necessity.

Likewise Pope Eusebius. Fasts established in the Church by priests are not to be relaxed without reasonable necessity.

> C. XVII. Ieiunia legitima non soluantur absque necessitate probabili.
> Item Eusebius Papa. Ieiunia in ecclesia a sacerdotibus constituta sine rationabili necessitate non soluantur.

C. XVIII. Daily fasts are to be preferred to doubled or tripled fasts.

Likewise Jerome. I do not prescribe weeks, I do not prescribe doubled fasts, but let us at least pass individual days without the luxury of foods.

> C. XVIII. Cottidiana ieiunia duplicatis uel triplicatis sunt preferenda.
> Item Ieronimus. Non dico ebdomadas, non dico duplicata ieiunia, sed saltim singulos dies absque ciborum luxuria transigamus.

C. XIX. On the same matter.

The same. Let your fasts be daily, with refection fleeing satiety. For it profits you nothing to carry an empty belly after two or three days have passed if it is stuffed to the same degree.

C. XIX. De eodem.

Idem. Sint tibi cottidiana ieiunia, refectio sacietatem fugiens. Nichil enim prodest tibi biduo uel triduo transmisso uacuum portare uentrem, si pariter obstruatur.

C. XX. On the same matter.

The same. Let your fasts be pure, continuous, and moderate, that is, to hunger daily and dine daily. The Apostle says: "Do not still drink water, but use a little wine on account of your infirmities." Fasting heals the wounds of the offender and sanctifies those who have been healed.

C. XX. De eodem.

Idem. Sint tibi ieiunia pura, continua, moderataque id est cottidie esurire, et cottidie prandere. Apostolus inquit: "Noli adhuc aquam bibere, sed modico uino utere propter infirmitates tuas." Curat uulnera delinquentis, curatosque sanctificat ieiunium.

C. XXI. The precepts of medicine are contrary to the divine condition.

Likewise Ambrose on Psalm 130. PART VI. The precepts of medicine are contrary to the divine condition. They call one back from fasting, do not permit one to keep vigil, and draw one away from every application of meditation. Therefore, one who has given himself to physicians denies himself to himself.

C. XXI. Medicinae precepta diuinae sunt condicioni contraria.

Item Ambrosius in Psalmo CXXX. VI. Pars. Contraria diuinae condicionis precepta medicinae sunt. A ieiunio reuocant, lucubrare non sinunt, ab omni intentione meditationis abducunt. Itaque qui se medicis dederit, se ipsum sibi abnegat.

C. XXII. In how many ways the vice of gluttony touches us.

Likewise Gregory in the exposition of blessed Job, [book XXX, c. 27]. The vice of gluttony tempts in five ways. For sometimes it anticipates the times of need; sometimes it does not anticipate the times but seeks richer foods; sometimes it demands that the things to be consumed be prepared more carefully; sometimes both the quality of the foods and the time are fitting, but in the very quantity of consuming it exceeds the measure of refection. Sometimes what it desires is even more contemptible, and yet it sins worse by the very heat of immeasurable desire.

C. XXII. Quot modis uicium gulae nos tangat.

Item Gregorius in expositione B. Iob. [lib. XXX. c. 27.] Quinque modis gulae uicium temptat. Aliquando namque indigentiae tempora preuenit; aliquando tempora non preuenit, sed cibos lautiores querit; aliquando que sumenda sunt, procurari accuratius expetit; aliquando autem et qualitas ciborum, et tempus congruit, sed in ipsa quantitate sumendi mensuram refectionis excedit. Nonnumquam et abiectius est quod desiderat, et tamen ipso estu inmensi desiderii deterius peccat.

C. XXIII. Without purity of mind, fasts and prayers do not profit.

Likewise Pope Pius, [letter I]. For it profits a human being nothing to fast and pray and perform other good works of religion unless the mind is restrained from iniquity and the tongue from detractions.

C. XXIII. Absque puritate mentis ieiunia et orationes non prosunt.

Item Pius Papa. [epist. I.] Nichil enim prodest homini ieiunare, et orare, et alia bona religionis agere, nisi mens ab iniquitate, et ab obtrectationibus lingua cohibeatur.

C. XXIV. A moderate good is not to be preferred to a great one.

Likewise Jerome. One errs not moderately who prefers a moderate good to a great good. Does not a rational human being lose his dignity if he prefers either fasting to charity or vigils to soundness of sense, so that, on account of immoderate and indiscriminate abstinence and the singing of psalms or offices, he incurs the mark either of madness or of sadness? Can God be swayed by a multitude of words like a human being? For God is to be prayed to not only with words, but with the heart. Consequently, the singing of five psalms with purity and serenity of heart and spiritual cheerfulness is better than the chanting of the psalter with anxiety and sadness of heart. Therefore, when a psalm or mass is said for one hundred souls, each receives nothing less than if it were said for any one of them. Accordingly, let those who withdraw from the body the things that are necessary hear what the Lord speaks through the Prophet: "I am the Lord, hating robbery in a holocaust." One offers a holocaust from robbery who immoderately afflicts the body either by excessive want of foods or deprivation of sleep.

C. XXIV. Mediocre bonum non est magno preferendum.

Item Ieronimus. Non mediocriter errat qui magno bono prefert mediocre bonum. Nonne rationabilis homo dignitatem amittit, qui uel ieiunium karitati, aut uigilias prefert sensus integritati, ut propter abstinentiam inmoderatam, atque indiscretam psalmorum uel offitiorum decantationem aut amentiae, aut tristiciae notam incurrat? Numquid uerborum flecti multitudine ut homo Deus potest? Non enim uerbis tantum, sed corde orandus est Deus. Quapropter melior est quinque psalmorum cantatio cum cordis puritate, ac serenitate, et spirituali ylaritate, quam psalterii modulatio cum anxietate cordis atque tristicia. Cum igitur pro centum animabus psalmus uel missa dicitur, nichil minus, quam si pro uno quolibet ipsorum diceretur, accipitur. Audiant itaque, qui ea, que necessaria sunt, corpori subtrahunt, illud, quod per Prophetam Dominus loquitur: "Ego Dominus odiens rapinam holocaustorum." De rapina uero holocaustum offert qui uel ciborum nimia egestate uel sompni penuria corpus inmoderate affligit.

C. XXV. To abstain not from foods but from iniquities is the great and general fast.

Likewise Augustine on John, [tractate XVII]. The great and general fast is to abstain from iniquities and from the illicit pleasures of the age; this is the perfect fast. § 1. In this age we celebrate, as it were, a Lent of abstinence when we live well, when we abstain from iniquities and illicit pleasures. But because this abstinence will not be without reward, we await that blessed hope and the revelation of the glory of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ. In that hope, when the reality has been made from hope, we shall receive the denarius as reward. § 2. Therefore the denarius, which receives its name from the number ten, is rendered and, joined to forty, makes fifty. Hence with labor we celebrate Lent before Easter, but with gladness, as though the reward has been received, the Fifty Days after Easter. For to this saving labor, as it were, of good work, which pertains to the number forty, is added the ten of rest and happiness so that fifty may be made. The Lord himself signified these things much more openly when, after the resurrection, he dwelt with his disciples for forty days, but on the fortieth day, when he had ascended into heaven, after ten days had passed he sent the reward of the Holy Spirit.

C. XXV. Non a cibis, sed ab iniquitatibus abstinere, est magnum et generale ieiunium.

Item Augustinus super Iohannem. [tract. XVII.] Ieiunium autem magnum et generale est abstinere ab iniquitatibus et ab illicitis uoluptatibus seculi, quod est perfectum ieiunium. §. 1. In hoc seculo quasi Quadragesimam abstinentiae celebramus, cum bene uiuimus, cum ab iniquitatibus et ab illicitis uoluptatibus abstinemus. Sed quia hec abstinentia sine mercede non erit, exspectamus illam beatam spem, et reuelationem gloriae magni Dei, et saluatoris nostri Iesu Christi. In illa spe, cum fuerit de spe facta res, accepturi sumus mercedem denarium. §. 2. Denarius ergo, qui accipit nomen a decem numero, redditur, et coniunctus quadragenario fit quinquagenarius. Unde cum labore celebramus Quadragesimam ante Pasca, cum leticia uero, tamquam accepta mercede, Quinquagesimam post Pasca. Nam huic tamquam salutari labori boni operis, qui pertinet ad quadragenarium numerum, additur quietis et felicitatis denarius, ut quinquagenarius fiat. Significauit ipse Dominus hec multo apertius, quando post resurrectionem quadraginta diebus conuersatus est cum discipulis suis, quadragesimo autem die, cum ascendisset in celum, peractis decem diebus misit mercedem Spiritus sancti.

C. XXVI. Necessity does not make a robber or thief, but will does.

Likewise from the sayings of Apollonius. When the disciples, passing through the fields, plucked ears and ate them, Christ's own voice calls them innocent because they did this compelled by hunger.

C. XXVI. Raptorem, uel furem non facit necessitas, sed uoluntas.

Item ex dictis Apollonii. Discipulos, cum per segetes transeundo euellerent spicas, et ederent, ipsius Christi uox innocentes uocat, quia coacti fame hoc fecerunt.

C. XXVII. Not necessity but will makes perseverance.

Likewise Jerome, [on c. 7 of Hosea]. Whatever is done from necessity is quickly dissolved; what is seized by will perseveres.

C. XXVII. Non necessitas, sed uoluntas facit perseuerantiam.

Item Ieronimus. [in c. 7. Oseae.] Quicquid necessitate fit cito soluitur; quod uoluntate arripitur perseuerat.

C. XXVIII. Temperance in foods engenders health; abundance engenders the contrary.

Likewise John Golden-Mouth, [homily XXIX on c. 12 of the Letter to the Hebrews]. Nothing is so pleasant as food well digested or thoroughly cooked. Nothing so produces health, nothing so produces keenness of the senses, nothing so puts sickness to flight, as moderate refection; for sufficiency together with nourishment produces both health and pleasure, but from abundance it makes disease, introduces troubles, and generates and produces illnesses. For what hunger does, fullness of foods also does—but much worse. Hunger indeed carries off a human being in a few days and frees him from this penal life; but excess of foods consumes the human body, causes it to putrefy, and wastes it with prolonged sickness, and then consumes it with a cruel death.

C. XXVIII. Ciborum temperantia salutem, abundantia contrarium parit.

Item Iohannes Os aureum. [hom. XXIX. ad c. 12. ep. ad Hebr.] Nichil enim sic iocundum est, sicut cibus bene digestus aut decoctus. Nichil sic salutem, nichil sic sensuum acumen operatur, nichil sic egritudinem fugat, sicut moderata refectio; sufficientia quippe cum nutrimento et sospitatem simul procreat et uoluptatem; ex habundantia uero morbum facit et molestias ingerit, et egritudines generat et facit. Quod enim facit fames, hoc etiam plenitudo ciborum; magis autem multo peiora. Fames quippe in paucis diebus aufert hominem et liberat ex hac uita penali; excessus uero ciborum consumit et conputrescere facit corpus humanum et macerat egritudine diuturna, et tunc cum morte crudeli consumit.

C. XXIX. Delicacies of foods harm if they superabound.

Likewise Jerome, [Against Jovinian, book II]. Let us not take such foods as we either digest with difficulty or, once they have been eaten, grieve to have acquired with great labor and lost. Vegetables, fruits, and legumes are both easier to prepare, do not need the art and expenses of cooks, and sustain the human race without care when taken moderately—because that which lacks enticements of gluttony is not devoured greedily—and they are thoroughly cooked with easier digestion. For no one is burdened to the swelling of the belly by one or two foods, and those cheap, which swelling is conceived from a diversity of meats and pleasure of flavor. When dishes smoke with various odors, they draw persons as though captive to their consumption by hunger that must be filled. Hence illnesses too are stirred up by excessive satiety; many are remedied from the impatience of gluttony by vomiting, and what they shamefully ingested they cast out more shamefully. Hippocrates teaches in the Aphorisms and Epidemics that thick and obese persons who have fulfilled the measure of growth, unless they are quickly diminished by the letting of blood, break forth into paralysis and the worst kinds of diseases; and that for this reason a reduction is necessary, so that they may again have room into which they can grow. For the nature of bodies does not remain in one state but always either grows or decreases, and an animal cannot live unless it is capable of growing. Hence Galen also, a most learned man and interpreter of Hippocrates, says in his Exhortation to Medicine that athletes, whose life and art is fattening, can neither live long nor be healthy, and that their souls, enveloped by excessive blood and fat as though by mud, breathe forth nothing subtle, nothing heavenly, but always think about meats, belching, and the maw of the belly.

C. XXIX. Ciborum deliciae, si superhabundauerint ledunt.

Item Ieronimus. [aduersus Iouinianum, lib. II.] Ne tales accipiamus cibos, quos aut difficulter digerere, aut comestos partos magno et perditos labore doleamus. Holerum et pomorum ac leguminum et facilior apparatus est, et arte inpendiisque coquorum non indiget, et sine cura sustentat humanum genus, moderate sumptus (quia nec auide deuoratur quod irritamenta gulae non habet) et leuiori digestione decoquitur. Nemo enim uno et duobus cibis hisque uilibus usque ad inflationem uentris oneratur, que diuersitate carnium et saporis delectatione concipitur. Cum uariis nidoribus fumant patinae, ad usum sui explenda esurie quasi captiuos trahunt. Unde et morbi saturitate nimia concitantur, multique inpatientia gulae uomitu remediantur, et quod turpiter ingesserunt turpius egerunt. Ypocrates in aphorismis epidemiis docet, crassa et obesa, que crescendi mensuram inpleuerint, nisi cito sanguinis ablatione inminuantur, in paralisim et pessima morborum genera erumpere, et idcirco esse necessariam demptionem, ut rursus habeant in que possint crescere; non enim manere in uno statu naturam corporum, sed aut crescere semper, aut decrescere, nec posse uiuere animal, nisi crescendi capax sit. Unde et Galienus uir doctissimus Ypocratis interpres athletas, quorum uita et ars sagina est, dicit in exhortatione medicinae, nec uiuere posse diu, nec sanos esse, animasque ita nimio sanguine et adipibus quasi luto inuolutas, nichil tenue, nichil celeste, sed semper de carnibus, eructuare, et uentris ingluuie cogitare.

C. XXX. Fasts heal the infirmities of many.

The same. We read that certain persons laboring from articular disease and the humors of gout recovered when, by the confiscation of their goods, they were reduced to a simple table and poor foods. For they lacked solicitude for managing a household and profusion of feasts, which break both body and soul. Horace mocks the appetite for foods which, once consumed, leave repentance.

> C. XXX. Multorum infirmitates ieiunia sanant.
> Idem. Legimus quosdam, morbo articulari et podagrae humoribus laborantes, proscriptione bonorum ad simplicem mensam et pauperes cibos redactos conualuisse. Caruerant enim sollicitudine dispensandae domus et epularum largitate, que et corpus frangunt et animam. Irridet Horatius appetitum ciborum, qui consumpti relinquunt penitenciam.

C. XXXI. We ought to abstain from meats on Saturdays.

Likewise Gregory VII, [in the synod celebrated at Rome in the sixth year of his pontificate, c. 8]. PART VII. Because Saturday was held by our holy Fathers to be celebrated in abstinence, we, following their authority, salutarily admonish that whoever desires himself to be a participant in the Christian religion abstain from the eating of meats on that day, unless a greater feast intervenes or infirmity impedes.

> C. XXXI. Dies sabbatorum a carnibus abstinere debemus.
> Item Gregorius VII. [in Sinodo celebrata Romae anno sui Pontif. VI., c. 8.] VII. Pars. Quia dies sabbati apud sanctos Patres nostros in abstinentia celebris est habitus, nos eorumdem auctoritatem sequentes salubriter ammonemus, ut quicumque Christianae religionis participem se esse desiderat, ab esu carnium eadem die (nisi maiori festiuitate interueniente, uel infirmitate inpediente) abstineat.

C. XXXII. A monk is not permitted to taste meat.

Likewise Bishop Fructuosus. PART VIII. Permission neither to taste nor consume meat is granted to any monk, not because we judge God's creature unworthy, but because abstinence from meat is considered useful and fitting for monks, with the moderation of piety toward the sick nevertheless preserved. § 1. But if any monk violates this and presumes to eat meats contrary to the sanction of the rule and the usage of the ancients, he shall be subjected to confinement and penance for the space of six months.

> C. XXXII. Monacho carnem gustare non licet.
> Item Fructuosus Episcopus. VIII. Pars. Carnem cuiquam monacho nec gustandi nec sumendi, est concessa licentia, non quod creaturam Dei iudicemus indignam, sed quod carnis abstinentia utilis et apta monachis estimetur, seruato tamen moderamine pietatis erga egrotos. §. 1. Quod si quis monachus uiolauerit, et contra sanctionem regulae usumque ueterum uesci carnibus presumpserit, sex mensium spacio retrusioni et penitenciae subiacebit.

C. XXXIII. Concerning the daily works of monks.

Likewise Jerome to the monk Rusticus. Let the book of the psalter never depart from your hand or your eyes; let prayer without interruption be repeated word for word. Let the sense keep vigil, not lying open to wandering thoughts; let body and mind alike be stretched toward the Lord. Conquer anger by patience. Love the knowledge of the Scriptures, and you will not love the vices of the flesh.

Nor let your mind be vacant for various disturbances which, if they settle in your breast, will rule you and lead you to the greatest offense. Do some work so that the devil may always find you occupied. If the Apostles, having the power to live from the Gospel, labored with their hands so as not to burden anyone and bestowed relief upon others from whom they ought to reap carnal things for spiritual things, why do you not prepare what will serve for your own uses? Either weave a little basket from rushes, or plait a basket from pliant twigs. Let the earth be hoed; let little plots be divided by an even boundary, in which, when the seeds of vegetables have been cast or plants set in rows, channels of water may be led. Here you shall stand as spectator of those most beautiful verses: "Behold, from the brow of the sloping path he draws forth the wave; falling, it stirs a hoarse murmur over smooth stones and tempers the parched fields with springs." § 1. Let fruitful trees be grafted either with buds or shoots, so that a short time afterward you may pluck the sweet fruits of your labor. Construct hives for bees, to which the Proverbs of Solomon send you; learn the order of monasteries and royal discipline in their little bodies. Let linen nets for catching fish also be woven. And let books be written, so that the hand may both work for food and the soul be satiated by reading. "Every idle person is in desires." The monasteries of the Egyptians hold this custom: that they receive no one without work and labor, not so much on account of the necessities of sustenance as on account of the soul's salvation, lest they wander through pernicious thoughts and, in the likeness of fornicating Jerusalem, spread their feet to every passerby. And in what follows. § 2. What, then? Will all who dwell in cities perish? Behold, they enjoy their own goods, minister to churches, go to baths, do not disdain ointments, and live amid the flower of all things. To this I answered before and now answer briefly: in the present little work I am not discussing clerics, but instructing a monk.

C. XXXIII. De cottidianis operibus monachorum.

Item Ieronimus ad Rusticum monachum. Numquam de manu aut oculis tuis liber psalterii discedat; dicatur ad uerbum, oratio sine intermissione. Vigilet sensus, nec uagis cogitationibus patens; corpus pariterque animus tendatur ad

Dominum. Iram uince patiencia. Ama scientiam scripturarum, et carnis uicia non amabis. Nec uacet mens tua uariis perturbationibus, que, si pectori insederint, dominabuntur tui, et deducent te ad delictum maximum. Facito aliquid operis, ut semper diabolus te inueniat occupatum. Si apostoli, habentes potestatem de euangelio uiuere, laborabant manibus suis, ne quem grauarent, et aliis tribuebant refrigeria, quorum pro spiritualibus metere debebant carnalia: cur tu in usus tuos successura non prepares? Vel fiscellam texe iunco, uel canistrum lentis plecte uiminibus; sarriatur humus; areolae equo limite diuidantur, in quibus cum holerum iactata fuerint semina, uel plantae per ordinem positae, aquae ducantur irriguae, hic pulcherrimorum uersuum spectator assistes: "Ecce supercilio cliuosi tramitis undam Elicit; illa cadens raucum per leuia murmur Saxa ciet, scatebrisque arentia temperat arua." §. 1. Inserantur fructuosae arbores uel gemmis, uel surculis, ut paruo post tempore laboris tui dulcia poma decerpas. Apum fabricare aluearia, ad quas te mittunt Salomonis prouerbia, monasteriorum ordinem ac regiam disciplinam in paruis disce corporibus. Texantur et linea capiendis piscibus. Scribantur et libri, ut et manus operetur cibos, et anima lectione saturetur. "In desideriis est omnis otiosus." Egiptiorum monasteria hunc morem tenent, ut nullum absque opere et labore suscipiant, non tam propter uictus necessaria, quam propter animae salutem, nec uagentur perniciosis cogitationibus, et instar fornicantis Iherusalem diuaricent pedes suos omni transeunti. Et in sequentibus: §. 2. Quid? ergo peribunt omnes, qui in urbibus habitant? Ecce illi fruuntur suis rebus, ministrant ecclesiis, adeunt balnea, unguenta non spernunt, et in omnium flore uersantur. Ad quod et ante respondi, et nunc breuiter respondeo, me in presenti opusculo non de clericis disputare, sed monachum instituere.

C. XXXIV. Canons are permitted to do nothing without the license of their prelate.

Likewise in book V of the Capitularies, [c. 115]. PART IX. In all things, therefore, insofar as human frailty permits, we decree that canonical clerics live canonically, observing the teaching of divine Scripture and the instructions of the holy Fathers, and presume to do nothing in a disorderly way without the license of their bishop or their master. In each episcopate let them eat and sleep together where they have the means of doing this. Let those who receive stipends from ecclesiastical goods remain in their cloister; and each day in the morning at prime let them come to the reading and hear what is commanded them. Likewise, at table let them hear the reading and render obedience according to the canons to their masters.

C. XXXIV. Absque prelati sui licentia canonicis nichil agere licet.

Item in V. libro Capitulorum. [c. 115.] IX. Pars. In omnibus igitur (quantum humana permittit fragilitas) decernimus, ut canonici clerici canonice uiuant, obseruantes diuinae scripturae doctrinam, et documenta sanctorum Patrum, et nichil sine licentia episcopi sui uel magistri eorum inconposite agere presumant; in unoquoque episcopatu simul manducent et dormiant, ubi his facultas id faciendi suppetit; qui de rebus ecclesiasticis stipendia accipiunt, in suo claustro maneant; et singulis diebus mane prima ad lectionem ueniant, et audiant quid eis inperetur. Ad mensam uero similiter lectionem audiant, et obedientiam secundum canones suis magistris faciant.

C. XXXV. Presbyters who assemble together are above all to avoid drunkenness and revelries.

Likewise from the Council of Nantes, [c. 10]. PART X. Whenever presbyters assemble for the anniversary, thirtieth, or third day of someone deceased, or when presbyters gather for a collection on any summons, let none of them presume in any way to become drunk; nor, when entreated, to drink for love of the saints or of the soul itself, or to compel another to drink, or to gorge himself at another's entreaty; nor let him presume to bring forth or sing disorderly applause and laughter or empty tales there; nor are they to permit shameful jests to be performed before them with a bear or dancing women; nor are they to consent for masks of demons to be carried before them, because this is diabolical and prohibited by the sacred canons.

C. XXXV. Presbiteri, qui simul conueniunt, ebrietatem et comessationes summopere uitent.

Item ex Concilio Nannetensi. [c. 10.] X. Pars. Nullus presbiterorum, quando ad anniuersarium diem trigesimum, uel tertium alicuius defuncti, aut quacumque uocatione ad collectam presbiteri conuenerint, se inebriare nullatenus presumant; nec precati in amore sanctorum uel ipsius animae bibere, aut ad bibendum cogere, uel se aliena precatione ingurgitare; nec plausus et risus inconditos et fabulas inanes ibi referre aut cantare presumat; uel turpia ioca uel urso uel tornatricibus ante se fieri patiantur; nec laruas demonum ante se ferri consentiant, quia hoc diabolicum est, et sacris canonibus prohibitum.

C. XXXVI. At what spectacles clerics ought to be present.

Likewise from the Council of Laodicea, [c. 54]. Ministers of the altar or any clerics ought not to be present at any spectacles which are exhibited either at weddings or dinners, but before the theatrical performers enter they ought to rise from the banquet and depart.

> C. XXXVI. Quibus spectaculis clerici interesse debent.
> Item ex Concilio Laudicensi. [c. 54.] Non oportet ministros altaris uel quoslibet clericos spectaculis aliquibus, que aut in nuptiis, aut in cenis, exhibentur, interesse, sed ante, quam thimelici ingrediantur, surgere eos de conuiuio, et abire debere.

C. XXXVII. A cleric or layperson is not to go on pilgrimage without the bishop's command.

Likewise from the same, [cc. 42 and 41]. PART XI. A minister of the altar or any cleric ought not to set out on pilgrimage apart from the bishop's command. § 1. Likewise, a layperson ought not to set out anywhere without canonical letters, that is, a formata.

> C. XXXVII. Clericus uel laicus sine iussione episcopi non peregrinetur.
> Item ex eodem. [c. 42. et 41.] XI. Pars. Non oportet ministrum altaris, uel quemlibet clericum preter iussionem episcopi ad peregrinandum proficisci. §. 1. Laicum etiam sine canonicis litteris, id est formata, similiter non oportet alicubi proficisci.

C. XXXVIII. Women ought not to use cosmetic coloring.

Likewise Augustine to Possidius and the brothers who are with him, [letter LXXIII]. PART XII. To color oneself with pigments so as to appear either redder or whiter is an adulterous deception by which I do not doubt that even husbands themselves do not wish to be deceived; for women are permitted to adorn themselves for their husbands alone, by indulgence, not by command. For the true adornment, especially of Christian men and women, is not only no lying cosmetic and not even the display of gold and clothing, but good conduct. § 1. But the execrable superstition of amulets—which are reckoned to include even those hung from the top of one ear of men—is employed not to please human beings but to serve demons.

> C. XXXVIII. Colorum fucis mulieres uti non debent.
>
> Item Augustinus ad Possidium, et qui cum eo sunt fratres. [epist. LXXIII.] XII. Pars. Fucare pigmentis, quo uel rubicundior, uel candidior appareat, adulterina fallacia est qua non dubito etiam ipsos maritos se nolle decipi, quibus solis permittendae sunt feminae ornari secundum ueniam, non secundum inperium. Nam uerus ornatus, maxime
> Christianorum et Christianarum, non tantum nullus fucus mendax, uerum ne auri quidem uestisque pompa, sed mores boni sunt. §. 1. Exsecranda autem superstitio ligaturarum (in quibus etiam in aures uirorum in summis ex una parte auriculis suspensae deputantur) non ad placendum hominibus, sed ad seruiendum demonibus adhibentur.

C. XXXIX. That the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son.

Likewise from the Creed of the Council of Ephesus of two hundred bishops, which was held against Nestorius. PART XIII. Concerning the Spirit, the Lord says in the Gospel: "He shall glorify me." Understanding this most rightly, we confess that the one Christ and Son attained glory from the Holy Spirit not as though needing the glory of another, because his Spirit is neither better than nor superior to him; but because, when performing human works for the demonstration of his divinity, he used the power of his own Spirit, he is said to have been glorified by him, because his own power or any discipline glorifies each person. For although his Spirit is in his own substance and a property is understood in the person according to the fact that he is the Spirit and not the Son, nevertheless he is not alien to him. For he has been called the Spirit of truth, and Christ is the truth. Hence he proceeds from him similarly as from God the Father. Finally, this same Spirit, also performing glorious miracles through the hands of the holy Apostles, glorified the Lord Jesus Christ after he ascended into heaven. For Christ is believed by nature to exist as God, effecting power through his Spirit; and therefore he said: "He shall receive of mine and announce it to you."

C. XXXIX. Quod Spiritus sanctus procedit a Patre et Filio.

Item ex Simbolo Ephesini Concilii CC. Episcoporum, quod habitum est contra Nestorium. XIII. Pars. De Spiritu dicit Dominus in euangelio: "Ille me clarificabit." Hoc rectissime sentientes, unum Christum et Filium, non uelut alterius egentem gloria, confitemur a Spiritu sancto gloriam consecutum, quia spiritus eius nec melior, nec superior ipso est, sed quia humana opera faciens ad demonstrationem suae deitatis uirtute proprii spiritus utebatur, ab ipso glorificatus dicitur, eo quod uirtus sua uel disciplina quelibet unumquemque clarificet. Quamuis enim in sua sit substantia spiritus eius, et intelligatur in persona proprietas, iuxta id quod Spiritus est, et non Filius: attamen alienus non est ab illo. Nam spiritus appellatus est ueritatis, et ueritas Christus est. Unde et ab isto similiter sicut a Deo Patre procedit. Denique hic ipse Spiritus etiam per sanctorum apostolorum manus miracula gloriosa perficiens glorificauit Dominum Iesum Christum, postquam ascendit in celum. Nam creditur Christus natura Deus existere per suum spiritum uirtutem efficiens, ideoque dicebat: "De meo accipiet, et annunciabit uobis."

C. XL. On the same matter.

Likewise Didymus in book II On the Holy Spirit, against the error of the Greeks. The Savior, who is also the truth, says: "For he shall not speak from himself," that is, without me and without my judgment and that of the Father, because he is inseparable from my will and the Father's. And further. § 1. Because he is not from himself but is from the Father and from me. For this very thing—that he subsists and speaks—is from the Father and from me. "I speak the truth," that is, I inspire the things he speaks, since he is the Spirit of truth. But "to say" and "to speak" in the Trinity is to be understood not according to our custom by which we converse and speak to one another, but according to the form of incorporeal natures, and especially of the Trinity, which brings its will into the hearts of believers and implants it in the hearts of those who are worthy to hear it. § 2. Therefore, plainly, for the Father to speak and the Son to hear, or conversely for the Father to hear the Son speaking, signifies that the Father and the Son are of the same nature and that there is agreement in the Father and the Son. The Holy Spirit, who is the Spirit of truth and the Spirit of wisdom, cannot hear the Son speaking things he does not know, since he is that very thing which is uttered by the Son, that is, God proceeding from God, the Spirit of truth proceeding from truth, the consoler flowing from the consoler. Finally, lest anyone separate him from the fellowship and will of the Father and the Son, it is written: "For he does not speak from himself, but as he hears, so he speaks." Similar to this the Savior also says of himself: "As I hear, I judge," and elsewhere: "The Son can do nothing from himself except what he sees the Father doing."

C. XL. De eodem.

Item Didimus in libro [II.] de Spiritu sancto, contra errorem grecorum. Saluator, qui et ueritas ait: "Non enim loquetur a semetipso," hoc est: sine me, et sine meo et sine Patris arbitrio, quia inseparabilis est a mea et Patris uoluntate. Et amplius: §. 1. Quia ex se non est, sed ex Patre et a me est. Hoc enim ipsum, quod consistit, et loquitur, a Patre et a me ille est: "Ego ueritatem loquor," id est inspiro que loquitur, siquidem spiritus ueritatis est. Dicere autem et loqui in Trinitate, non secundum consuetudinem nostram, qua ad nos sermocinamur et loquimur, est accipiendum, sed iuxta formam incorporalium naturarum, et maxime Trinitatis, que uoluntatem suam ingerit in corda credentium; eorum cordibus inserit, qui eam digni sunt audire. §. 2. Liquido ergo est dicere Patrem et audire Filium, uel e contra Filium loquentem audire Patrem, eiusdem naturae esse Patrem et Filium, et in Patre et Filio consensus est significatio. Spiritus sanctus, qui est spiritus ueritatis, et spiritus sapientiae, non potest audire Filium loquentem que nescit, cum hoc ipsum sit, quod profertur a Filio, id est Deus procedens de Deo, Spiritus ueritatis procedens a ueritate, consolator manans de consolatore. Denique, ne quis illum a Patris et Filii societate et uoluntate discerneret, scriptum est: "Non enim a semetipso loquitur: sed sicut audit et loquitur." Cui simile etiam de se ipso Saluator ait: "Sicut audio, iudico," et alibi: "Non potest Filius a se facere quicquam, nisi quod uiderit Patrem facientem."
